

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

COBBETT'S COMPLETE COLLECTION

OF State Trials.

244. The Trial* of EDWARD COLEMAN,† at the King's-Bench, for High Treason : 30 CHARLES II. A. D. 1678.

ON Wednesday the 27th of November, 1678, Mr. Coleman, having been arraigned the Saturday before for High-Treason, was brought to the King's-bench bar, to receive his trial, and the Court proceeded thereupon, as followeth :

Cl. of Cr. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O yes ! Our sovereign lord the king does strictly charge and command all manner of persons to keep silence upon pain of imprisonment. If any one can inform our sovereign lord the king, the king's serjeant, or the king's attorney-general, or this inquest now to be taken, of any treason, murder, felony, or any other misdemeanour committed or done by the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth, and they shall be heard, for the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, make an O yes.

Crier. O yes ! You good men that are impannelled to enquire between our sovereign lord the king, and Edward Coleman prisoner at the bar, answer to your names.

Cl. of Cr. Edward Coleman, hold up thy hand. These good men that are now called, and here appear, are those which are to pass between you and our sovereign lord the king, upon your life or death ; if you challenge any of them, you must speak as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they are sworn.

* From a pamphlet, entitled ; " The Trial of Edward Coleman, gent. for conspiring the Death of the King, and the Subversion of the Government of England, and the Protestant Religion : who upon full evidence was found Guilty of High Treason, and received Sentence accordingly, on Thursday, November 28, 1678. London, printed for Robert Pawlet at the Bible in Chancery-lane near Fleet-street, 1678. November 28, 1678. I do appoint Robert Pawlet to print the Trial of Edward Coleman : And that no other person presume to print the same. Wm. Scrooses."

† See the Introduction to the Trials for the Popish Plot, vol. 6, p. 1401. Burnet's Hist. of his Own Time, vol. 1, p. 398, thus introduces Coleman : " The duchess of York had one put about her to be her secretary, Coleman ; who became so active in the affairs of the party, and ended his life so unfortunately, that since I had much conversation with him, his circumstances may deserve that his character should be given, though his person did not. I was told, he was a clergyman's son : But he was early catched by the Jesuits, and bred many years among them. He understood the art of managing controversies, chiefly that great one of the authority of the church, better than any of their priests. He was a bold man, resolved to raise himself, which he did by dedicating himself wholly to the Jesuits : And so he was raised by them. He had a great easiness in writing in several languages ; and writ many long letters, and was the chief correspondent the party had in England. He lived at a vast expence. And talked in so positive a manner, that it looked like one who knew he was well supported. I soon saw into his temper ; and I warned the duke of it : For I looked on him as a man much liker to spoil business, than to carry it on dexterously. He got into the confidence of P. Ferrier the king of France's confessor ; and tried to get into the same pitch of confidence with P. de la Chaise, who succeeded him in that post. He went about every where, even to the jails among the criminals, to make proselytes. He dealt much both in the giving and taking of bribes." See more of him, p. 392, et seq. of the same volume. His name occurs in the Pièces Historiques, annexed to the Œuvres de Louis xiv.

B

The prisoner challenging none, the Court proceeded, and the Jury were sworn, viz. sir Reginald Forster, bart.; sir Charles Lee; Edward Wilford, esq.; John Bathurst, esq.; Joshua Galliard, esq.; John Bifield, esq.; Simon Middleton, esq.; Henry Johnson, esq.; Charles Umfreville, esq.; Thomas Johnson, esq.; Thomas Eaglesfield, esq.; Wm. Bohec, esq.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, make an O yes.

Crier. O yes! Our sovereign lord the king does strictly charge and command all manner of persons to keep silence upon pain of imprisonment.

Cl. of Cr. Edward Coleman, hold up thy hand. You Gentlemen of the Jury that are now sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his charge. You shall understand, that the prisoner stands indicted by the name of Edward Coleman, late of the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster in the county of Middlesex, gent. for that he as a false traitor against our most illustrious, serene, and most excellent prince Charles, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, &c. and his natural lord; having not the fear of God in his heart, nor duly weighing his allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, his cordial love and true duty, and natural obedience, (which true and lawful subjects of our said lord the king ought to bear towards him, and by law ought to have) altogether withdrawing, and with all his strength intending, the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom of England to disturb, and the true worship of God within the kingdom of England practised, and by law established, to overthrow, and sedition and rebellion within this realm of England to move, stir up and procure; and the cordial love and true duty and allegiance, which true and lawful subjects of our sovereign lord the king towards their sovereign bear, and by law ought to have, altogether to withdraw, forsake, and extinguish; and our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to bring and put, the 29th day of September, in the 27th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord Charles the 2nd, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland king, defender of the faith, &c. at the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously and traitorously proposed, compassed, imagined and intended, to stir up, and raise sedition and rebellion within the kingdom of England, and to procure and cause a miserable destruction among the subjects of our said lord the king, and wholly to deprive, depose, deject and disinherit our said sovereign lord the king, of his royal state, title, power, and rule of his kingdom of England, and to bring and put our said sovereign lord the king to final death and destruction, and to overthrow and change the government of the kingdom of England, and to alter the sincere and true religion of God, in this kingdom by law established; and wholly to subvert and destroy the state of the whole kingdom, being in the universal parts thereof well established and ordained, and to levy war against our said sovereign lord the king, within his realm of England: And to accomplish and fulfil these his most wicked treasons, and traitorous designs and imaginations aforesaid, the said Edward Coleman afterwards, that is to say, the 29th day of September, in the 27th year of the reign of our said lord the king, at the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, deceitfully and traitorously composed, contrived, and writ two letters, to be sent to one M. La Chaise, then servant and confessor of Lewis the French king, to desire, procure, and obtain, for the said Edward Coleman, and other false traitors against our said sovereign lord the king, the aid, assistance, and adherence of the said French king, to alter the true religion in this kingdom established, to the superposition of the Church of Rome, and to subvert the government of this kingdom of England: And afterwards, that is to say, the said 29th day of September in the year aforesaid, at the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, the said Edward Coleman falsely, traitorously and maliciously, composed and writ two other letters, to be sent to the said M. La Chaise, then servant and confessor to the said French king, to the intent that he the said M. La Chaise should intreat, procure, and obtain for the said Edward Coleman and other false traitors against our sovereign lord the king, aid, assistance, and adherence of the said French king, to alter the true religion in this kingdom of England established, to the superposition of the Church of Rome, and to subvert the government of this kingdom of England: And that the said Edward Coleman, in further prosecution of his treason and traitorous imaginations and intentions, as aforesaid, afterwards, viz. the 29th day of September, in the 27th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord king Charles of England, &c. the said several letters, from the said parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, maliciously and traitorously, did send to the said M. La Chaise, into parts beyond the seas, there to be delivered to him: And that the said Edward Coleman, afterwards, viz. the 1st day of December, in the 27th year of our said sovereign lord the king, at the said parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, did receive from the said M. La Chaise one letter, in answer to one of the said letters first mentioned, and written by him the said Edward Coleman to the said M. La Chaise; which said letter in answer as aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, and traitorously received, the day and year aforesaid at the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster aforesaid, the said Edward Coleman did falsely, traitorously, and maliciously read over and peruse; And that the said Edward Coleman, the letter so as aforesaid, by him in answer to the said letter received into his custody and possession, the day and year last mentioned, at the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, did falsely, maliciously, and traitorously detain, conceal and keep. By which letter the said M. La Chaise, the day and year last mentioned, at the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, did signify and promise^o to the said Edward Coleman, to obtain for the said Edward Coleman, and other false traitors against our sovereign lord the king, aid, assistance and adherence from the said French king: And that the said Edward Coleman afterwards, viz. the 10th day of December, in the 27th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king, at the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, his wicked treasons and traitorous designs and proposals as aforesaid did tell and declare to one M. Ravigni, envoy-extraordinary from the French king to our most serene and sovereign lord king Charles, &c. in the county aforesaid residing, and did falsely, maliciously, and traitorously move and excite the said envoy-extraordinary to partake in his treason; and the sooner to fulfil and complete his traitorous designs, and wicked imaginations and intentions, the said Edward Coleman afterwards, viz. the 10th day of December in the 27th year of the reign of our sovereign lord king Charles the second of England, &c. aforesaid, at the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, did advisedly, maliciously, deceitfully, and traitorously compose and write three other letters to be sent to one sir William Throckmorton, kt. then a subject of our said sovereign lord the king of this kingdom of England, and residing in France, in parts beyond the seas, viz. at the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, to solicit the said M. La Chaise to procure and obtain of the said French king, aid, assistance and adherence as aforesaid, and the said letters last mentioned, afterwards, viz. the day and year last named as aforesaid, from the said parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, did falsely and traitorously send, and cause to be delivered to the said sir William Throckmorton in France aforesaid, against his true allegiance, and against the peace of our sovereign lord the king that now is, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided.

Cl. of Cr. Upon this Indictment he hath been arraigned, and hath pleaded thereunto Not Guilty; and for his trial he puts himself upon God and his country: which country you are. Your charge is to enquire, whether he be guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty. If you find him guilty, you are to inquire what goods and chattels, lands and tenements he had at the time when the high-treason was committed, or at any time since: If you find him not guilty, you are to say so, and no more, and hear your evidence.

Crier. If any one will give evidence on the behalf of our sovereign lord the king, against Edward Coleman the prisoner at the bar, let him come forth, and he shall be heard; for the prisoner now stands at the bar upon his deliverance.

Mr. Recorder. (Sir George Jefferies.) May it please you, my Lord, and you gentlemen of the jury; Mr. Edward Coleman, now the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted for high treason, and the indictment sets forth that the said Edward Coleman, endeavouring to subvert the protestant religion, and to change and alter the same; and likewise to stir up rebellion and sedition amongst the king's liege people, and also to kill the king; did on the 29th of September in the 27th year of the reign of our sovereign lord the king, at the parish of St. Margaret's, Westminster, in this county, compose and write two several letters to one M. La Chaise, that was then servant and confessor to the French king, and this was to procure the French king's aid and assistance to him and other traitors, to alter the religion practised, and by law established here in England, to the Romish superstition. The Indictment sets forth likewise, That on the same day he did write and compose two other letters to the same gentleman, that was servant and confessor to the said king, to prevail with him to procure the French king's assistance to alter the religion in this kingdom established to the Romish religion. The Indictment sets further forth, that he caused these two letters to be sent beyond seas. And it also sets forth, that on the 10th of December, the same month, he did receive a letter from the gentleman that was the confessor, in answer to one of the former letters, and in that letter aid and assistance from the French king was promised; and that he did traitorously conceal that letter. My Lord, the Indictment sets out further, that on the 10th day of the same month, he did reveal his treasons and traitorous conspiracies to one Monsieur Ravigni, who was envoy from the French king to his majesty of Great-Britain. And his Indictment declares, he afterwards did write three letters more to sir William Throckmorton, then residing in France, to procure the French king's assistance to the alteration of the religion practised here in England. Of these several offences he stands here indicted.

To this he hath pleaded Not Guilty. If we prove these, or either of them in the Indictment, you ought to find him guilty.

Serj. Maynard. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury: This is a case of great concernment. Gentlemen, the prisoner at the bar stands indicted for no less than an intention and endeavour to murder the king; for an endeavour and attempt to change the government of the nation, so well settled and instituted, and to bring us all to ruin and slaughter of one another; and for an endeavour to alter the Protestant religion, and to introduce instead of it the Romish superstition, and Popery.

This is the charge in general, of the Indictment. We will proceed unto particulars, whereby it may appear, and whereupon he endeavoureth to accomplish his ends. One or two letters written to M. La Chaise (he is a foreigner, and we have nothing to say to him, being confessor to the French king) it was to excite and stir him up to procure aid and assistance (and you know what aid and assistance means) from a foreign prince, arms, and other levies. We charge him with it, that he did receive this letter, ay, and received an answer with a promise, that he should have assistance. He writ other letters to sir William Throckmorton, who traitorously conspired with him, and had intelligence from time to time from him. This is the charge in the Indictment; To which he hath pleaded, Not Guilty. We will go on in our evidence: I shall, but more generally, open our method, that we intend to take. For it may seem strange, and is not reasonably to be imagined, that a private gentleman, as the prisoner at the bar is, should have such vast and great designs as this, to alter religion, destroy the government, ay, and destroy the subjects too in a great measure. But it is not himself alone, but he employs himself for foreign assistance, great confederacies and combinations with the subjects of that king, many of whom he did pervert.

In the course of the Evidence I shall not open the particulars: (Mr. Attorney, I think, will do that by and by) those that we have occasion to speak of, and shall in proof mention to you, will be these: La Chaise, the French king's present confessor, we have mentioned: before him there was one Father Ferryer, with whom he held correspondence. That Ferryer being removed by death, the prisoner had an employment here amongst us, by which he gave La Chaise instructions how to proceed. This gentleman is the great contriver and plotter, which gives him instructions how to proceed. He doth give him an account by way of narrative, how all things had stood upon former treaties and negotiations, how businesses were contrived, and how far they were gone; this he diligently and accurately gives an account of. This (my lord) doth discover and delineate what hath been done before until 1674. My lord, there was likewise sir Wm. Throckmorton and some others, that are Englishmen too, there are none of them but what were first Protestants; but when they once renounced their religion, no wonder they should renounce their nation, and their prince too. He was gone beyond the seas, several letters past between them, and all to promote, and encourage, and accomplish this design. My lord, there is likewise a consult of Jesuits used too, where, in express words, they designed to murder the king, or contrived and advised upon it.

My Lord, there were four Irishmen (I open but the heads of things) sent to Windsor to murder the king: this gentleman received and disbursed money about this business, and one Ashby a Jesuit here had instructions from him to prosecute the design, and to treat with a physician to poison the king. This the prisoner approved of, and contributed to it. There were commissions, as I take it, delivered from Ferryer, or by his hand, that came from foreign powers. Sir Henry Titchbourne was another that received and delivered commissions. Pcompose the French gentleman, he maintains intelligence with him about this business, the titular archbishop of Dublin.

There is Cardinal Norfolk, by him he had accession to the Pope. There was likewise the Pope's Nuncio (I do not open the transactions of these instructions); these particulars will be made out, not only by witness viva voce, and not single only, but by letters of this Mr. Coleman's own writing. But I offer that to the consideration of the jury.

Mr. Oates was the first man, that we hear of, that discovered this treason; he was the single man that discovered so many active agents in so great a treason as this was, and it needed to be well seconded; but he being found to be but single, the boldness and courage of these complotters in it grew great thereupon. We know what followed; the damnable murder of that gentleman, in execution of his office, so hellishly contrived, and the endeavours that were used to hide it, every body knows: how many stories were told to hide that abominable murder, how many lies there were about it, but it could not be suppressed. The nation is awakened out of sleep, and it concerns us now to look about us. But all this while Mr. Coleman thought himself safe, walked in the fields, goes abroad, jealousy increasing, and he himself still secure.

The letters that are produced go but to some part of the year 1675: from 1675 unto 1678 all lies in the dark, we have no certain proof of it; but we apprehend he had intelligence until 1678; that there were the same persons continuing here, and his company increasing here: but this I speak but as probable, (but very exceeding probable) that there was other passages of intelligence between this person and other confederates.

It seems, my lord, that this Coleman was aware that he was concerned: but God blinded and infatuated him, and took away his reason. It is no question but he carried away some of those papers; those that were left behind, and are produced, he forgot and neglected; and by that (my lord) those which are produced, are evidence against him at this time. Surely he thought we were in such a condition, that had eyes and could not see, and ears that could not hear, and understandings without understanding: for he was bold, and walked abroad, and that until this prosecution was made upon him, he endeavoured to murder the king, change the government, make an alteration of religion, and destruction of Protestants, as well as the Protestant religion; and it will be proved by some letters, when they were rejected by the duke, that he sent them in the duke's name. And by this no man will doubt but he is a great traitor.

Attorn. Gen. (Sir William Jones.) May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, the king's serjeant hath opened the general parts of our evidence; and we have reason to foresee that our evidence will be very long, and will take up much of your time; and therefore I shall spend no more time in opening of it than is just necessary. And indeed, my lord, Mr. Coleman himself hath saved us much of the labour, which otherwise I should have bestowed; for he hath left such elegant and copious narratives of the whole design under his own hand, that the reading of them will be better than any new one I can make.

But, my lord, some short account I shall give you, such as may shew you the course of our Evidence, and will make our evidence, when it comes to be given, to be more intelligible.

My lord, It will appear, that there hath been for many years last past a more than ordinary design and industry to bring in the Popish, and extirpate the Protestant religion. I doubt not but this design, in some measure, hath been contriving ever since the reformation, by the Jesuits, or some of their emissaries, but hath often received interruption; so that they have proceeded sometimes more coldly, sometimes more hotly; and I do think, at no time since the reformation, that ever this design was carried on with greater industry, nor with fairer hopes of success, than for these last years.

My lord, You will hear from our witnesses, that the first onset, which was to be made upon us, was by whole troops of Jesuits and priests, who were sent hither from the seminaries abroad, where they had been trained up in all the subtilty and skill that was fit to work upon the people.

My lord, you will hear how active they have been, and what insinuations they used for the perverting of particular persons. After some time spent in such attempts, they quickly grew weary of that course; though they got some Proselytes, they were but few. Some bodies, in whom there was a predisposition of humours, were infected, but their numbers were not great. They at last resolve to take a more expeditious way; for in truth, my lord, they could not far prevail by the former. And I wish with all my heart, that the bodies of Protestants may be as much out of danger of the violence of their hands, as their understandings will be of the force of their arguments. But, my lord, when this way would not take, they began then to consider they must throw at all at once. No doubt that they would have been glad, that the people of England had had but one neck; but they knew the people of England had but one head, and therefore they were resolved to strike at that.

My lord, you will find, that there was a summons of the principal Jesuits, of the most able head-pieces, who were to meet in April or May last, to consult of very great things, of a most diabolical nature, no less than how to take away the life of the king our sovereign.

My lord, you will find (as is usually practised in such horrid conspiracies, to make all secure, that there was an oath of secrecy taken, and that upon the Sacrament. You will find agreements made, that this most wicked and horrible design should be attempted. You will find two villains were found among them, who undertook to do this execrable work; and you will hear of the rewards they were to have: money in case they did succeed, and masses good store in case they perished; so that their bodies were provided for in case they survived, and their souls if they died. My lord, What was the reason they did not effect their design, but either that these villains wanted opportunity, or their hearts failed them when they came to put in execution this wicked design? Or, perhaps (which is most probable) it was the Providence of God, which over-ruled them, that this bloody design did not take its effect.

But these gentlemen were not content with one essay, they quickly thought of another; and there were four Irish-men prepared (men of very mean fortunes, and desperate conditions), and they were to make the attempt no longer since, than when the king was last at Windsor.

My lord, I perceive by the Proofs, that these last assassins went down thither; but it came to pass (for some of the reasons aforesaid) that that attempt failed likewise.

My lord, These gentlemen, those wise heads, who had met here in consultation, did then, and long before, consider with themselves, that so great a cause as this was not to be put upon the hazard of some few hands; they therefore proposed forces, aids, and assistances, both at home and abroad, to second this wicked design, if it had succeeded as to the person of the king; and if that failed, then by their foreign and domestic aids and assistances, to begin and accomplish the whole work of subverting our government and religion. And here we must needs confess, as to the former part of this Plot, which we have mentioned, I mean the attempt upon the king's person, Mr. Coleman was not the contriver, nor to be the executioner; but yet your lordship knows, in all treasons there is no accessory, but every man is a principal. And thus much we have against him, even as to this part of the design, which will involve him in the whole guilt of it, that Mr. Coleman consented to it, though his hand were not to do it. Mr. Coleman encouraged a messenger to carry money down as a reward of these murderers, that were at Windsor; of this we have proof against him, which is sufficient. My lord, Mr. Coleman, as a man of greater abilities, is reserved for greater employments, and such wherein, I confess, all his abilities were little enough. There were negotiations to be made with men abroad, money to be procured, partly at home from friends here, and partly abroad from those that wished them well: and in all these negotiations Mr. Coleman had a mighty hand; and you will perceive by and by what a great progress he made in them. This conspiracy went so far, as you will hear it proved, that there were general officers named and appointed, that should command their new Catholic army, and many were engaged, if not listed. There were not only in England, but in Ireland likewise, where arms and all other necessaries were provided, and whither great sums of money were returned to serve upon occasion. But one thing these is, my lord, that comes nearest Mr. Coleman: as there were military officers named, so likewise the great civil places and offices of the kingdom were to be disposed of; I will not name to whom at this time, more than what is pertinent to the present business.

This gentleman, such were his great abilities, the trust and reliance that his party had upon him, that no less an office would serve his turn than that of principal secretary of state; and he had a commission, that came to him from the superiors of the Jesuits, to enable him to execute that great office. My lord, it seems strange, that so great an office should be conferred by no greater a man than the superior of the Jesuits. But if the pope can depose kings, and dispose of kingdoms, no wonder if the superior of the Jesuits can by a power delegated from him make secretaries. It is not certain what the date of this commission was, nor the very time when he received it: but I believe he was so earnest and forward in this Plot, that he began to execute his office long before he had his commission for it; for I find by his letters, which are of a more early date, that he had proceeded so far as to treat with Father Ferryer, who was the French king's confessor, before he had actually received this commission. You will understand by the letters, which we shall produce, what he had to do with him, and what with the other confessor that succeeded, Father La Chaise. There were two small matters they treated of, no less than the dissolving the parliament; and the extirpation of the Protestant religion. Nay, you will find, and you will hear enough, when the letters come to be read, that Mr. Coleman made many strokes at the parliament, he had no good opinion of them. And we cannot blame him; for without all peradventure they had made, and I hope ever will make, strong resistance against such designs as these. But a great mind he had to be rid of them; and he had hopes of great sums of money from abroad, if it had been to be done that way. And it is very remarkable (and shews the vanity of the man,) he had such an opinion of the success of these negotiations, that he had penned a declaration prepared by him, and writ with his own hand, to be published in print, upon the dissolution of the parliament, to justify that action with many specious and plausible reasons. As he did this without any direction, so he takes upon him to write a declaration, as in the name of the king, without the least shadow of any command to do it, so he prepares a letter also in the name of the duke: and I would not affirm, unless I could prove it, and that from his own confession, (being examined before the lords upon oath) that he had no manner of authority from the duke to prepare such a letter; and when it was written and brought to the duke, it was rejected, and the writer justly blamed for his presumption. By this you will perceive the forwardness of this man. And you must of necessity take notice, that in his letters he took upon himself to manage affairs as authorized by the greatest persons in the kingdom, yet without the least shadow of proof that he was by them empowered to do it.

My lord, you shall find, Mr. Coleman thought himself above all; and such was his own over-weening opinion of his wit and policy, that he thought himself the sole and supreme director of all the affairs of the Catholics. You will likewise perceive that he held intelligence with cardinal Norfolk, with Father Sheldon, and the pope's internuncio at Brussels. And I cannot but observe out of the proofs, that as we shall find Mr. Coleman very ambitious and forward in all great affairs, so he had a little too much eye to the reward; he looked too much a-squint upon the matter of money: his great endeavours were not so much out of conscience, or out of zeal to his religion, as out of temporal interest; to him gain was instead of godliness. And by his letters to the French confessor M. La Chaise, it will be proved, that he got much money from the Catholics here, and some from abroad, but still he wanted money. What to do? (I do not mean the greater sum of 200,000*l.* to procure the dissolution of the parliament, but some 20,000*l.* only) to be expended by him in secret service, I do not know what account he would have given of it, if he had been intrusted with it. But that he earnestly thirsted after money, appeareth by most of his letters.

My lord, you will observe, besides his intelligences, that he had with father La Chaise, and several others, one that deserves to be named, and that is his negotiation with sir William Frogmorton, who was sent over into France, and there resided a long time to promote these designs. He is dead; therefore I will not say much of him, as I would say against him, if he was here to be tried. But, my lord, I find in his letters such treasonable, such impious expressions against the king, such undutiful characters of him, that no good subject would write, and no good subject would receive and conceal, as Mr. Coleman hath done. My lord, it may pass for a wonder, how we came to be masters of all these papers; it has in part been told you already.

There was an information given of the general design, nay of some of the particulars against the king's life. And without all peradventure, Mr. Coleman knew of this discovery; and he knew that he had papers that could speak too much, and he had time and opportunity enough to have made them away, and I make no question but he did make many away. We are not able to prove the continuance of his correspondence, so as to make it clearly out; but we suppose that continued until the day he was seized. And there is this to be proved, that letters came for him, though we cannot say any were delivered to him, after he was in prison. But without all peradventure the man had too much to do, too many papers to conceal: then, you'll say, he might have burnt them all (for many would learn as well as a few :) But then he had lost much of the honour of a great statesman; many a fine sentence, and many a deep intrigue had been lost to all posterity. I believe that we owe this discovery to something of Mr. Coleman's vanity: he would not lose the glory of managing these important negotiations about so great a design: He thought it was no small reputation to be intrusted with the secrets of foreign ministers. If this was not his reason, God (I believe) took away from him that clearness of judgment, and strength of memory, which he had upon other occasions.

My lord, I shall no longer detain you from reading the papers themselves. But I cannot but account this kingdom happy, that these papers are preserved. For (my lord) we are to deal with a sort of men, that have that prodigious confidence, that their words and deeds (though proved by never so unsuspected testimony) they will still deny. But (my lord) no denial of this plot will prevail, for Mr. Coleman himself hath, with his own hand, recorded this conspiracy: and we can prove his hand, not only by his own servants, and relations, but by his own confession. So that (my Lord) I doubt not, that if there be any of their own party that hear this trial, they themselves will be satisfied with the truth of these things. And I believe we have an advantage in this case, which they will not allow us, in another matter; namely, that we shall be for this once permitted to believe our own senses. Our Evidence consisteth of two parts: one is, witness oiva voce, which we desire (with the favour of the court) to begin with; and when that is done, we shall read several letters or negotiations, in writing, and so submit the whole to your lordship's direction.

Pris. I beg leave that a poor ignorant man, that is so heavily charged, that it seems a little unequal to consider the reason, why a prisoner, in such a case as this is, is not allowed counsel; but your lordship is supposed to be counsel for him. But I think it very hard I cannot be admitted counsel; and I humbly hope your lordship will not suffer me to be lost by things that myself cannot answer. I deny the conclusion, but the premises are too strong and artificial.

Sir William Scroggs L. C. J.* You cannot deny the premises, but that you have done these things: but you deny the conclusion, that you are a traitor?

Pris. I can safely and honestly.

L. C. J. You would make a better Secretary of State, than a Logician; for they never deny the conclusion.

Pris. I grant it your Lordship: you see the advantage great men have of me, that do not pretend to Logic.

L. C. J. The labour lies upon their hands; the proof belongs to them to make out these intrigues of yours; therefore you need not have counsel, because the proof must be plain upon you,† and then it will be in vain to deny the conclusion.

Pris. I hope, my lord, if there be any point of law that I am not skilled in, that your lordship will be pleased not to take the advantage over me. Another thing seems most dreadful, that is, the violent prejudice that seems to be against every man in England, that is confessed to be a Roman Catholic. It is possible that a Roman Catholic may be very innocent of these crimes. If one of those innocent Roman Catholics should come to this bar, he lies under such disadvantages already, and his prejudices so greatly biaseth human nature, that unless your lordship will lean extremely much on the other side, justice will hardly stand upright, and lie upon a level. But to satisfy your lordship, I do not think it any service to destroy any of the king's subjects, unless it be in a very plain case.

L. C. J. You need not make any preparations for us in this matter, you shall have a fair, just, and legal trial: if condemned, it will be apparent you ought to be so; and without a fair proof, there shall be no condemnation. Therefore you shall find, we will not do to you, as you do to us, blow up at adventure, kill people because they are not of your persuasion; our religion teacheth us another doctrine, and you shall find it clearly to your advantage. We seek no man's blood but our own safety. But you are brought here from the necessity of things, which yourselves have made; and from your own actions you shall be condemned or acquitted.

Pris. It is supposed upon Evidence, that the Examinations that have been of me in prison, are like to be evidence against me now; I have nothing to say against it: but give me leave to say at this time, that when I was in prison, I was upon my ingenuity charged; I promised I would confess all I knew. And I only say this. That what I said in prison is true, and am ready at any time to swear and evidence, that that is all the truth.

L. C. J. It is all true that you say; but did you tell all that was true?

Pris. I know no more, than what I declared to the two Houses.

L. C. J. Mr. Coleman, I will tell you when you will be apt to gain credit in this matter: you say, that you told all things that you knew, the truth, and the whole truth. Can mankind be persuaded, that you, that had this negotiation in 1674 and 1675, left off just then, at that time when your letters were found according to their dates? do you believe, there was no negotiation after 1675, because we have not found them? have you spoke one word to that? have you confessed, or produced those papers and weekly intelligence? when you answer that, you may have credit; without that, it is impossible: for I cannot give credit to one word you say unless you give an account of the subsequent negotiation.

Pris. After that time (as I said to the House of Commons). I did give over corresponding. I did offer to take all oaths and tests in the world, that I never had one letter for at least two years; yea, (that I may keep myself within compass) I think it was for three or four. Now I have acknowledged to the House of Commons, I have had a chirography correspondence, which I never regarded or valued; but as the letters came, I burnt them, or made use of them as common paper. I say, that for the general correspondence I have had for two or three years, they have had every one of them letters that I know of.

Att. Gen. Whether you had or no, you shall have the fairest trial that can be. And we cannot blame the gentleman, for he is more used to greater affairs, than these matters or forms of law. But my Lord, I desire to go unto evidence, and when that is done, he shall be heard, as long as he pleaseth, without any interruption. If he desire it, before I give my evidence, let him have Pen, Ink, and Paper with your lordship's leave.

L. C. J. Help him to pen, ink, and paper.

Record. Then we desire to go on in our evidence. We desire that Mr. Oates may not be interrupted.

Court. He shall not be interrupted.

Att. Gen. The first thing we will inquire, what account he can give of the prisoner at the bar, whether he was any way privy to the murder of the king?

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, we leave it to yourself to take your own way, and your own method: only this we say, here's a gentleman stands at the bar, for his life; and on the other side, the king is concerned for his life: you are to speak the truth and the whole truth; for there is no reason in the world that you should add any one thing that is false. I would not have a title added for any advantage, or consequences that may fall, when a man's blood and life lieth at stake: let him be condemned by truth; you have taken an oath, and you being a minister know the great regard you ought to have of the sacredness of an oath; and that to take a man's life away by a false oath is murder, I need not teach you that. But that Mr. Coleman may be satisfied in the trial, and all people else be satisfied, there is nothing required or expected, but downright plain truth, and without any art either to conceal, or exaltate, to make things larger than in truth they are: he must be condemned by plain evidence of fact.

Oates. My Lord, Mr. Coleman, in the month of November last, did entertain in his own house John Keiss, which John Keiss was a Father-Confessor to certain persons that were converted, amongst which I was one. My Lord, I went and visited this John Keiss at Mr. Coleman's house then in Stable-yard. Mr. Coleman inquiring of John Keiss who I was? He said I was one that designed to go over upon business to St. Omer. My Lord, Mr. Coleman told me then he should trouble me with a letter or two to St. Omer, but he told me he would leave them with one Fenwick, that was procurator for the society of Jesuits in London. I went on Monday morning and took coach, went to Dover, and had his packet with me, which packet when I came to St. Omer I opened. The outside cover of this paper was a letter of news which was called Mr. Coleman's letter, and at the bottom of this letter there was this recommendation, Pray recommend me to my kinsman Playford. In this letter of news there were expressions of the king, calling him tyrant, and that the marriage between the prince of Orange and the lady Mary the duke of York's eldest daughter would prove the traitor's and tyrant's ruin.

L. C. J. In what language was it written?

Oates. In plain English words at length.

L. C. J. Directed to whom?

Oates. It was directed to the Rector of St. Omer, to give him intelligence how affairs went in England.

L. C. J. Did you break it open?

Oates. I was at the opening of it, and saw it, and read it. There was a letter to Father La Chaise, which was superscribed by the same hand that the treasonable letter of news was written, and the same hand that the recommendation to Playford was written in. When this letter was open there was a seal fixt, a flying seal, and no man's name to it.

L. C. J. What was the contents of that letter to La Chaise?

Oates. My Lord, to give you an account of the import of this letter, it was writ in Latin, and in it there were thanks given to Father La Chaise for the 10,000*l.* which was given for the propagation of the Catholic Religion, and that it should be employed for no other intent and purpose but that for which it was sent, now that was to cut off the king of England; those words were not in that letter, but La Chaise letter, to which this was the answer, I saw and read. It was dated the month of August, and as near as I remember there was this instruction in it, That the 10,000*l.* should be employed for no other intent and purpose but to cut off the king of England; I do not swear the words, but that is the sense and substance; I believe I may swear the words.

L. C. J. To whom was that directed?

Oates. To one Strange, that was then provincial of the society in London, which Mr. Coleman answered.

L. C. J. How came Mr. Coleman to answer it?

Oates. Strange having run a reed into his finger, had wounded his hand, and secretary Mico was ill, so he got Mr. Coleman to write an answer unto it.

L. C. J. Did he write it as from himself?

Oates. Yes, by order of the provincial.

L. C. J. What was the substance of that answer?

Oates. That thanks was given to him in the name of the whole society for the 10,000*l.* which was paid and received here, and that it should be employed to the intent for which it was received. It was superscribed from Mr. Coleman.

L. C. J. Was it subscribed Coleman?

Oates. It was not subscribed; I did not see him write it, but I really believe it was by the same hand. I went and delivered this letter.

L. C. J. I understood you because of the accident of his hand he had employed Mr. Coleman to write this for him.

Oates. He did write this letter then, the body of the letter was written by Mr. Coleman. I did not see him write it, but I shall give an account how I can prove he wrote it. I delivered this Letter to La Chaise his own hand. When I opened the letter he asked me how a gentleman (naming a French name) did do.

L. C. J. When you carried this letter, you carried it to La Chaise and delivered it to him; then he asked you of the gentleman of the French name, whom meant he by that name?

Oates. I understood it to be Mr. Coleman.

L. C. J. Did he know him by some French name? What said you?

Oates. I could say little to this.

L. C. J. Could you guess whom he meant?

Oates. He told me he was sometime secretary to the dutchess of York, which I understood to be Mr. Coleman. I stuck at it, and when he said he was sometime secretary to the dutchess of York, I spoke in Latin to him, and asked whether he meant Mr. Coleman, and his answer I cannot remember. He sends an answer to this letter. I brought it to St. Omers and there it was inclosed in the letter from the society to Coleman; wherein the society expressly told him this letter was delivered and acknowledged. I saw the letter at St. Omers, and the letter was sent to him.

VOL. VII.

Mr. Coleman did acknowledge the receipt of this letter from La Chaise in the same hand with that of the news letter, and so it was understood by all. I saw it.

L. C. J. How came you to see it?

Oates. I by a patent from them was of the consult.

L. C. J. You saw the letter of the same hand which the news letter was of with Mr. Coleman's name subscribed?

Oates. The contents of the letter did own the letter from La Chaise was received; this letter was presumed to be the hand-writing of Mr. Coleman, and it was understood to be Mr. Coleman's letter.

L. C. J. You say the letter was thanks for the 10,000*l.* what was the other contents?

Oates. That all endeavours should be used to cut off the Protestant Religion root and branch.

L. C. J. You say you delivered this letter, from whom had you it?

Oates. From Fenwick, it was left in his hand, and he accompanied me from Groves to the coach, and gave it to me.

L. C. J. Did you hear him speak to Mr. Coleman to write for him?

Oates. Strange told me he had spoke to him.

L. C. J. He doth suppose it was Mr. Coleman's hand because it was just the same hand that the news letter was. Are you sure the letter was of his hand?

Oates. It was taken for his hand.

Justice Wild. Had he such a kinsman there?

Oates. Yes, he hath confessed it.

Att. Gen. We desire your lordship he may give an account of the consult here in May last, and how far Mr. Coleman was privy to the murdering of the king.

Oates. In the month of April old stile in the month of May new stile, there was a consult held, it was begun at the White-Horse Tavern, it did not continue there. After that there they had consulted to send one Father Cary to be agent and procurator to Rome, they did adjourn themselves to several clubs in companies; some met at Wild-House, and some at Harcourt's lodging in Duke-street some met at Ireland's lodging in Russel-street; and some in Fenwick's lodging in Drury-Lane. They were ordered to meet by virtue of a brief from Rome, sent by the Father general of the society: They went on to these resolves, that Pickering and Groves should go on and continue in attempting to assassinate the king's person by shooting, or other means. Groves was to have 1,500*l.* Pickering being a religious man was to have 30,000 Masses, which at 1*2d.* a mass amounted much what to that money. This resolve of the Jesuits was communicated to Mr. Coleman in my hearing at Wild-House. My Lord, this was not only so, but in several letters he did mention it; and in one letter (I think I was gone a few miles out of London) he sent to me by a messenger, and did desire the duke might be trepanned into this Plot to murder the king.

L. C. J. How did he desire it?

Oates. In a letter, that all means should be used for the drawing in the duke. This letter was written to one Ireland. I saw the Letter and read it.

L. C. J. How do you know it was his letter?

Oates. Because of the instructions, which I saw Mr. Coleman take a copy of and write, which was the same hand with the news letter, and what else I have mentioned, the subscription was, 'Recommènd me to Father La Chaise?' and it was the same hand whereof I now speak.

L. C. J. What was the substance of the Letter?

Oates. Nothing but compliment, and commendation, and that all means might be used for the trepanning the duke of York (as near as I can remember that was the word).

Just. Wild. You did say positively that Mr. Coleman did consent and agree to what was consulted by the Jesuits, which was to kill the king, and Pickering and Groves were the two persons designed to do it. Did you hear him consent to it?

Oates. I heard him say at Wild-House, he thought it was well contrived.

Recorder. Do the gentlemen of the jury hear what he saith?

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the jury, do you hear what he saith?

Jury. Yes.

Att. Gen. What do you know of any rebellion to have been raised in Ireland? and what was to be done with the duke of Ormond?

Oates. In the month of August there was a consult with the jesuits, and with the Benedictine monks at the Savoy. In this month of August there was a letter writ from archbishop Talbot, the titular archbishop of Dublin; wherein he gave an account of a legate from the pope, an Italian bishop, (the bishop of Cassey I think) who asserted the pope's right to the kingdom of Ireland. In this letter (to mention in special) there were four jesuits had contrived to dispatch the duke of Ormond, these were his words, 'To find the most expedient way for his death,' and Fogarthy was to be sent to do it by poison, if these four good Fathers did not hit of their design. My Lord, Fogarthy was present. And when the consult was almost at a period, Mr. Coleman came to the Savoy to the consult, and was mighty forward to have Father Fogarthy sent to Ireland to dispatch the Duke by poison. This letter did specify they were there ready to rise in rebellion against the king for the pope.

Att. Gen. Do you know any thing of arms?

Oates. There were 40,000 black bills, I am not so skilful in arms to know what they meant (military men know what they are) that were provided to be sent into Ireland; but they were ready for the use of the catholic party.

L. C. J. Who were they provided by?

Oates. I do not know.

L. C. J. How do you know they were provided?

Oates. That letter doth not mention who they were provided by, but another letter mentioned they were provided by those that were commission officers for the aid and help of the pope; the popish commissioners they were provided by, and they had them ready in Ireland.

L. C. J. Who wrote this letter?

Oates. It came from Talbot, I might forget the day of the month because my information is so large, but it was the former part of this year, I think either January or February, 1667-8, last January or February.

L. C. J. Was this consult but in August last?

Oates. I am forced to run back from that consult to this; Mr. Coleman was privy, and was the main agent, and did in the month of August last past say to Fenwick, he had found a way to transmit the 200,000*l.* for the carrying on of this rebellion in Ireland.

L. C. J. Did you hear him say so?

Oates. I did, a week before.

L. C. J. You say he was very forward to send Fogarthy into Ireland to kill the duke of Ormond?

Oates. Yes, that I say; and that he had found a way to transmit 200,000*l.* to carry on the rebellion in Ireland.

Court. Who was by besides Fenwick?

Oates. Myself and nobody else.

Court. Where was it said?

Oates. In Fenwick's chamber in Drury-lane.

Att. Gen. Do you know any thing of transmitting the money to Windsor, or persuading any to be sent thither, and the time when?

Oates. In the month of August there were four ruffians procured by Dr. Fogarthy. These four were not nominated in the consult with the Benedictine Convent, but, my Lord, these four ruffians without names were accepted of by them.

Court. Who proposed them?

Oates. Fogarthy. These four Irishmen were sent that night to Windsor. How they went I know not, but the next day there was a provision of 80*l.* ordered to them by the rector of London, which is a jesuit, one William Harcourt, in the name of the provincial, because he acted in his name and authority, the provincial being then beyond the seas, visiting his colleges in Flanders.

L. C. J. Did he order the 80*l.*

Oates. Mr. Coleman came to this Harcourt's house, then lying in Duke street, and Harcourt was not within; but he was directed to come to Wild-house, and at Wild-house he found Harcourt.

L. C. J. How do you know that?

Oates. He said he had been at his house, and was not within; finding him at Wild-house, he asked what care was taken for those four gentleman that went last night to Windsor? He said there was 80*l.* ordered.

L. C. J. Who said so?

Oates. Harcourt. And there was the messenger that was to carry it. I think the most part of this 80*l.* was in guineas: Mr. Coleman gave the messenger a guinea to be nimble, and to expedite his journey.

L. C. J. How know you they were guineas?

Oates. I saw the money upon the table before Harcourt, not in his hand.

L. C. J. Were the four Irishmen there?

Oates. No, they were gone before I came.

L. C. J. Who was to carry it after them, what was his name?

Oates. I never saw him before or since. The money was upon the table when Mr. Coleman came in, he gave the messenger a guinea to expedite the business.

Recorder. You say Mr. Coleman enquired what case was taken for those ruffians that were to assassinate the king; pray, Mr. Oates, tell my Lord, and the jury, what you can say concerning Mr. Coleman's discourse with one Ashby.

Oates. In the month of July, one Ashby, who was sometime Rector of St. Omers, being ill of the gout was ordered to go to the bath; this Ashby being in London, Mr. Coleman came to attend him; this Ashby brought with him treasonable instructions, in order to dispatch the king by poison, provided Pickering and Groves did not do the work: 10,000*l.* should be proposed to sir George Wakeman to poison the king, in case pistol and stab did not take effect, and opportunity was to be taken at the king's taking physic. I could give other evidence, but will not, because of other things which are not fit to be known yet.

L. C. J. Who wrote this letter?

Oates. It was under hand of White the provincial beyond the seas, whom Ashby left; it was in the name of memorials to impower Ashby and the rest of the consulters at London to propound 10,000*l.* to sir George Wakeman to take the opportunity to poison the king. These instructions were seen and read by Mr. Coleman, by him copied out, and transmitted to several conspirators of the king's death, in this kingdom of England, that were privy to this plot.

Recorder. Know you of any commission? We have hitherto spoken altogether of the work of others; now we come to his own work a little nearer.

L. C. J. Who saw Mr. Coleman read these instructions? What said he?

Oates. He said he thought it was too little, I heard him say so.

L. C. J. Did you see him take a copy of these instructions?

Oates. Yes, and he said he did believe sir George Wakeman would scarce take it, and thought it necessary the other 5,000*l.* should be added to it, that they might be sure to have it done.

L. C. J. Where was it he said this?

Oates. It was in the provincial's chamber, which Ashby had taken for his convenience at London, until he went down to the bath; it was at Wild-house, at Mr. Sanderson's house.

L. C. J. Ashby was employed by his instructions to acquaint the consult of the jesuits, that there should be 10,000*l.* advanced, if Dr. Wakeman would poison the king, now Ashby comes and acquaints him with it. Why should Coleman take copies?

Oates. Because he was to send copies to several conspirators in the kingdom of England.

L. C. J. To what purpose should Mr. Coleman take a copy of these instructions?

Oates. The reason is plain; they were then a gathering a contribution about the kingdom, and these instructions were sent that they might be encouraged, because they saw there was encouragement from beyond seas to assist them. And another reason was, because now they were assured by this, their business would quickly be dispatched, and by this means some thousands of pounds were gathered in the kingdom of England.

L. C. J. To whom was Mr. Coleman to send them?

Oates. I know not of any persons, but Mr. Coleman did say he had sent his suffrages (which was a canting word for instructions) to the principal gentry of the catholics of the kingdom of England.

L. C. J. How know you this, that Mr. Coleman did take a copy of these instructions for that purpose, as you say?

Oates. Because he said so.

L. C. J. Did any body ask him why he took them?

Oates. Smith Ashby, You had best make haste and communicate these things. Mr. Coleman answered, I will make haste with my copies, that I may dispatch them away this night.

Recorder. Was he not to be one of the principal secretaries of state?

Oates. In the month of May last New Stile, April Old Stile, I think within a day after our consult, I was at Mr. Langhorn's chamber, he had several commissions, which he called patents: Among his commissions, I saw one from the general of the society of Jesus Joannes Paulus D'Oliva, by virtue of a brief from the pope, by whom he was enabled.

L. C. J. Did you know his hand?

Oates. I believe I have seen it forty times, I have seen forty things under his hand, and this agreed with them, but I never did see him write in my life; we all took it to be his hand and we all knew the hand and seal.

L. C. J. What inscription was upon the seal?

Oates. I.H.S. with a cross, in English it had the characters of I. H. S. This commission to Mr. Coleman in the month of July, I saw in Fenwick's presence, and at his chamber in Drury-lane, where then Mr. Coleman did acknowledge the receipt of this patent, opened it, and said, It was a very good exchange.

L. C. J. What was the commission for?

Oates. It was to be secretary of state. I saw the commission, and heard him own the receipt of it.

Justice Wild. What other commissions were there at Mr. Langhorn's chamber?

Oates. A great many, I cannot remember, there was a commission for my lord Arundel of Warder, the lord Powis, and several other persons. But this belongs not to the prisoner at the bar: I mention his commission.

L. C. J. Were you acquainted with Mr. Langhorn?

Oates. Yes, I will tell your lordship how I was acquainted. I was in Spain, he had there two sons; to shew them special favour and kindness (being mere strangers at the College) I did use to transmit some letters for them to the kingdom of England in my packet. When I came out of Spain, I did receive recommendations from them to their father, and in great civility he received me. This was in November that I came to his house. He lived in Shearlane, or thereabouts. I understood that his wife was a zealous protestant; therefore he desired me not to come any more to his house, but for the future to come to his chamber in the Temple.

L. C. J. Had you ever seen Mr. Langhorn in London before?

Oates. I never saw him till Nov. 1677 to my knowledge. I was several times in his company at his chamber, and he brought me there to shew me some kindness upon the account of his sons. It was at the Temple, for his wife being a protestant, was not willing any Jesuits should come to the house. I was to carry him a summary of all the results and particulars of the consult at the White-horse and Wild-house. The provincial ordered me to do it, he knowing me, being in that affair often employed.

L. C. J. Was it the second time you saw him; that you saw the commissions?

Oates. I saw him several times in the month of November.

L. C. J. When did you see the commissions? Oates. In the month of April, Old Stile; May, New Stile.

L. C. J. How came he to shew you the commissions?

Oates. I hearing of their being come, had a curiosity to see them, and he knew me to be privy to the concerns.

L. C. J. How did you know he had the commissions?—Oates. By letters.

L. C. J. From whom?

Oates. From those of the society at Rome, wherein one Harcourt, one of the fathers, was certified, that the commissions were come to Langhorn, and were in his hand; I saw the letters at St. Omers, before they came to Harcourt, we read the letters there before they came to England. I had power to open them.

L. C. J. Did you open the letters?

Oates. Yes.

L. C. J. When saw you the letters at St. Omers?

Oates. I saw the letters at St. Omers in the month of January; then they came from Rome, and after I received summons to be at this consult in the month of April; and accordingly we came over.

L. C. J. What time did you come over?

Oates. In the month of April.

L. C. J. What time went you to Langhorn's chamber? I cannot reconcile the months together.

Just. Dolben. Did you not say you came to Langhorn in November?

Oates. Yes, before I went to St. Omers.

Just. Wild. How many came over with you? Oates. I cannot tell how many came over together; there were nine of us, all Jesuits.

L. C. J. Did not you say you went to Langhorn in November?

Oates. That was before I went to St. Omers.

Att. Gen. Tell how many priests or Jesuits were lately in England, that you know of, at one time?

Oates. There was, and have been to my knowledge in the kingdom of England, secular priests eightscore, and Jesuits fourscore, and by name in the catalogue, I think 300 and odd.

L. C. J. How long had you been in England before you were at Mr. Langhorn's chamber?

Oates. Not long; because I had letters in my packet from his sons, as soon as I had rested a little, I went to him.

L. C. J. What said Mr. Langhorn to you about the commissions in his chamber?

Oates. Not a word; but seemed glad.

L. C. J. Did you see them open upon his table? or did you ask to see them?

Oates. They did not lie open upon the table, but the commissions were before him; I asked to see them. Mr. Langhorn (said I) I hear you have received the commissions from Rome; he said, he had. Shall I have the honour to see some of them? He said I might; he thought he might trust me; and so he might, because that very day I gave him an account of the consult.

L. C. J. When was it you gave him an account of the consult?

Oates. In the morning.

L. C. J. You say you were twice there that day.—Oates. I was there the whole forenoon.

L. C. J. That day you saw the commissions?

Oates. I had been there several times the same day, and meeting him at last, he asked me how often I was there before, I said twice or thrice; but that day was the last time I ever saw him; I have not seen him since, to my knowledge.

L. C. J. Was that the first time that you saw him after you came from Spain?

Oates. I saw him thrice in November, then I went to St. Omers, the first time I saw him after I came from thence, I saw the commissions.

Att. Gen. What were the names of those men that came over from St. Omers besides yourself?

Oates. As near as I can remember, the rector of Liege was one; Father Warren; sir Thomas Preston; the rector of Waiton; one Francis Williams; sir John Warner, bart.; one Further Charges; one Pool, a monk; I think I made the ninth.

Att. Gen. If the prisoner at the bar be minded, he may ask him any question.

Pris. I am mighty glad to see that gentleman sir Thomas Dolman in the Court, for I think he was upon my Examination before the council, and this man that gives now in evidence against me, there told the king, he never saw me before; and he is extremely well acquainted with me now, and hath a world of intimacy. Mr. Oates at that time gave such an account of my concern in this matter, that I had orders to go to Newgate, I never saw Mr. Oates since I was born, but at that time.

L. C. J. You shall have as fair a search and examination in this matter for your life as can be, therefore, Mr. Oates, answer to what Mr. Coleman saith.

Oates. My lord, when Mr. Coleman was upon his examination before the council board, he saith, I said there that I never saw him before in my life, I then said I would not swear that I had seen him before in my life, because my sight was bad by candle-light, and candle-light alters the sight much, but when I heard him speak I could have sworn it was he, but it was not then my business. I cannot see a great way by candle-light.

L. C. J. The stress of the objection lieth not upon seeing so much, but how come you that you laid no more to Mr. Coleman's charge at that time?

Oates. I did design to lay no more to his charge then, than was matter for information. For prisoners may supplant evidence when they know it, and bring persons to such circumstances, as time and place. My lord, I was not bound to give in more than a general information against Mr. Coleman; Mr. Coleman did deny he had correspondence with Father La Chaise at any time, I did then say he had given him an account of several transactions. And (my Lord) then was I so weak, being up two nights, and having been taking prisoners, upon my salvation, I could scarce stand upon my legs.

L. C. J. What was the information you gave at that time to the council against Mr. Coleman?

Oates. The information I gave at that time (as near as I can remember, but I would not trust to my memory) was for writing of newsletters, in which I did then excuse the treasonable reflections, and called them base reflections at the Council-Board; the king was sensible, and so was the council. I was so wearied and tired (being all that afternoon before the council, and Sunday night, and sitting up night after night) that the king was willing to discharge me. But if I had been urged I should have made a larger information.

L. C. J. The thing you accused him of was his own letter.

Pris. He doth not believe it was my letter.

L. C. J. You here charge Mr. Coleman to be the man that gave a guinea to expedite the business at Windsor, &c. At the time when you were examined at the council-table, you gave a particular account of attempting to take away the king's life at Windsor, and raising 20,000*l.* and all those great transactions; why did you not charge Mr. Coleman to be the man that gave the guinea to the messenger to expedite the business, when the 80*l.* was sent? That he found out a way of transmitting 200,000*l.*, to carry on the design? He consulted the killing the king, and approved of it very well. And of the instructions for 10,000*l.*, he said it was too little for to poison the king. When you were to give an account to the council of the particular contrivance of the murder of the king at Windsor, with a reward, you did mention one reward of 10,000*l.* to Dr. Wakeman, and would you omit the guinea to expedite the messenger, and that he said that 10,000*l.* was too little; would you omit all this?

Oates. I being so tired and weak that I was not able to stand upon my legs, and I remember the council apprehended me to be so weak that one of the lords of the council said, that if there were any occasion further to examine Mr. Coleman, that Mr. Oates should be ready again, and bid me retire.

L. C. J. You was by when the council were ready to let Mr. Coleman go almost at large?

Oates. No; I never apprehended that, for if I did, I should have given a further account.

L. C. J. What was done to Mr. Coleman at that time? Was he sent away prisoner?

Oates. Yes, at that time to the messenger's house, and within two days after he was sent to Newgate, and his papers were seized.

L. C. J. Why did you not name Coleman at that time?

Oates. Because I had spent a great deal of time in accusing other Jesuits.

Just. Wild. What time was there betwixt the first time you were at the council, before you told of this matter concerning the king?

Oates. When I was first at the board (which was on Saturday night) I made information, which began between 6 and 7, and lasted almost to 10. I did then give a general account of the affairs to the council without the king. Then I went and took prisoners, and before Sunday night, I said, I thought if Mr. Coleman's Papers were searched into, they would find matter enough against him in those papers to hang him: I spake those words, or words to the like purpose. After that Mr. Coleman's Papers were searched, Mr. Coleman was not to be found; but he surrendered himself the next day. So that on Sunday I was commanded to give his majesty a general information, as I had given to the council on Saturday; and the next day again, I took prisoners that night 5, and next night 4.

Just. Wild. How long was it betwixt the time that you were examined, and spoke only as to the letters, to that time you told to the king and council, or both of them, concerning this matter you swear now?

Oates. My Lord, I never told it to the king and council, but I told it to the houses of parliament.

L. C. J. How long was it between the one and the other?

Oates. I cannot tell exactly the time; it was when the parliament first sat.

L. C. J. How came you (Mr. Coleman being so desperate a man as he was, endeavouring the killing of the king) to omit your information of it to the council and to the king at both times?

Oates. I spoke little of the persons till the persons came face to face.

L. C. J. Why did you not accuse all those Jesuits by name?

Oates. We took a catalogue of their names, but those I did accuse positively and expressly we took up.

L. C. J. Did you not accuse sir George Wakeman by name, and that he accepted his reward?

Oates. Yes, then I did accuse him by name.

L. C. J. Why did you not accuse Mr. Coleman by name?

Oates. For want of memory; being disturbed and wearied in sitting up two nights, I could not give that good account of Mr. Coleman, which I did afterwards, when I consulted my Papers; and when I saw Mr. Coleman was secured, I had no need to give a farther account.

L. C. J. How long was it between the first charging Mr. Coleman, and your acquainting the parliament with it?

Oates. From Monday the 30th of September, until the parliament sat.

L. C. J. Mr. Coleman, will you ask him any thing?

Pris. Pray ask Mr. Oates, whether he was not as near to me as this gentleman is, because he speaks of his eyes being bad?

Oates. I had the disadvantage of a candle upon my eyes; Mr. Coleman stood more in the dark.

Pris. He names several times that he met with me; in this place and that place, a third and fourth place about business.

Oates. He was altered much by his periwig in several meetings, and had several periwigs, and a periwig doth disguise a man very much; but when I heard him speak, then I knew him to be Mr. Coleman.

L. C. J. Did you hear him speak? How were the questions asked? Were they thus? Was that the person? Or, how often had you seen Mr. Coleman?

Oates. When the question was asked by my lord chancellor, Mr. Coleman, when were you last in France? He said, At such a time. Did you see father La Chaise? He said he gave him an accidental visit. My lord chancellor asked him whether or no he had a pass? He said, No. Then he told him, that was a fault for going out of the kingdom without a pass. Have you a kinsman whose name is Playford, at St. Omers? He said he had one ten years old, (who is in truth sixteen) That question I desired might be asked. Then the king bade me go on.

L. C. J. Did the king, or council, or lord chancellor ask you whether you knew Mr. Coleman, or no?

Oates. They did not ask me.

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, Answer the question in short and without confounding it with length. Were you demanded if you knew Mr. Coleman?

Oates. Not to my knowledge.

L. C. J. Did you ever see him, or how often?

Pris. He said, he did not know me.

L. C. J. You seemed, when I asked you before, to admit, as if you had been asked this question, how often you had seen him, and gave me no answer, because you were doubtful whether it was the man, by reason of the inconveniency of the light, and your bad sight.

Oates. I must leave it to the king what answer I made Mr. Coleman; he wonders I should give an account of so many intricacies, when I said I did not know him at the council-table.

Pris. It is very strange Mr. Oates should swear now, that he was so well acquainted with me, and had been so often in my company, when upon this accusation at the council-table, he said nothing of me more than the sending of one letter, which he thought was my hand.

Oates. I did not say that.

Pris. And he did seem to say there, he never saw me before in his life.

L. C. J. Was he asked whether he was acquainted with you? (for those words are to the same purpose.)

Pris. I cannot answer directly, I do not say he was asked, if he was acquainted with me, but I say this, that he did declare he did not know me.

L. C. J. Can you prove that?

Pris. I appeal to sir Tho. Dolman, who is now in Court, and was then present at the Council-table.

L. C. J. Sir Thomas, you are not upon your oath, but are to speak on the behalf of the prisoner: What did he say?

Sir Tho. Dolman. That he did not well know him.

L. C. J. Did he add, that he did not well know him by the candle-light? But Mr. Oates, when you heard his voice, you said you knew him; why did you not come then, and say you did well know him?

Oates. Because I was not asked.

L. C. J. But, sir Thomas, did he say he did not well know him after Mr. Coleman spake? Was Mr. Coleman examined before Mr. Oates spake?—Sir T. Dolman. Yes.

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, you say you were with him at the Savoy and Wild House, pray, sir Thomas, did he say he did not know him, or had seen Mr. Coleman there?

Sir T. Dolman. He did not know him as he stood there.

L. C. J. Knowing, or not knowing, is not the present question; but did he make an answer to the knowing or not knowing him?

Just. Dolbin. Did he say he did not well know Mr. Coleman, or that he did not well know that man?

Sir T. Dolman. He said he had no acquaintance with that man (to the best of my remembrance).

L. C. J. Sir Robert Southwell, you were present at Mr. Oates his examination before the Council; in what manner did he accuse Mr. Coleman then?

Sir R. Southwell. The question is so particular, I cannot give the Court satisfaction; but other material things then said are now omitted by Mr. Oates; for he did declare against sir George Wakeman, that 5,000*l.* was added, in all 15,000*l.*, and that Mr. Coleman paid five of the fifteen to sir George in hand.

L. C. J. This answers much of the objection upon him. The Court has asked Mr. Oates how he should come now to charge you with all these matters of poisoning and killing the king, and yet he mentioned you so slightly at the Council-table; but it is said by sir Robert Southwell he did charge you with 5,000*l.* (for poisoning the king) to be added to the 10,000*l.*, and he charged you expressly with it at the Council-table.

Pris. The charge was so slight against me by Mr. Oates, that the council were not of his opinion: For the first order was to go to Newgate, and sir R. Southwell came with directions to the messenger not to execute the order. I humbly ask whether it was a reasonable thing to conceive that the council should extenuate the punishment, if Mr. Oates came with such an amazing account to the council.

Sir R. South. Mr. Oates gave so large and general an information to the council, that it could not easily be fixed. Mr. Coleman came voluntarily in upon Monday morning. The warrant was sent out on Sunday night for Mr. Coleman and his papers; His papers were found and seized, but Mr. Coleman was not found at that time nor all night, but came on Monday morning voluntarily, and offered himself at sir Joseph Williamson's house, hearing there was a warrant against him: By reason of so many prisoners that were then under examination, he was not heard till the afternoon, and then he did with great indignation and contempt hear these vile things, as thinking himself innocent.

Pris. If I thought myself guilty, I should have charged myself: I hope his majesty, upon what hath been said, will be so far satisfied as to discharge me.

Sir R. South. Mr. Coleman then made so good a discourse for himself, that though the lords had filled up a blank warrant to send him to Newgate, that was respited, and he was only committed to a messenger. I did say to the messenger, Be very civil to Mr. Coleman, for things are under examination, but you must keep him safely. Saith the messenger, Pray let me have a special warrant, that doth dispelte with the warrant I had to carry him to Newgate, and such a warrant he had. The king went away on Tuesday morning to Newmarket, and appointed a particular committee to examine the papers brought of Mr. Coleman and others. His papers were found in a deal box, and several of these papers and declarations sounded so strange to the lords, that they were amazed; and presently they signed a warrant for Mr. Coleman's going to Newgate.

L. C. J. Did Mr. Oates give a round charge against Mr. Coleman?

Sir R. South. He had a great deal to do, he was to repeat in the afternoon on Sunday when the king was present, all he had said to the lords on Saturday. He did say of Mr. Coleman, that he had corresponded very wickedly and basely with the French king's confessor, and did believe if Mr. Coleman's papers were searched, there would be found in them that which would cost him his neck. And did declare that the 15,000*l.* was accepted for the murder of the king, and that 5,000*l.* was actually paid by Mr. Coleman to sir George Wakeman. But Mr. Oates at the same time did also declare that he did not see the money paid, he did not see this particular action of sir George Wakeman, because at that time he had the stone, and could not be present.

Oates. I was not present at that consult where the 15,000*l.* was accepted, but I had an account of it from those that were present.

L. C. J. It appears plainly by this testimony, that he did charge you Mr. Coleman home, that 15,000*l.* was to be paid for poisoning the king; and that it was generally said among them (though he did not see it paid) that it came by your hands, viz. 5,000*l.* of it; which answers your objection as if he had not charged you, when you see he did charge you home then for being one of the conspirators, in having a hand in paying of money for poisoning the king: he charges you now no otherwise than in that manner: he doth not charge you now as if there were new things started, but with the very conspiracy of having a hand in paying the money for murdering the king. What consultation was that you had at the Savoy, in the month of August?

Oates. It was about the business of the four Irish ruffians proposed to the consult.

The End of Mr. Oates's Examination.

Mr. Bedlow's* Examination.

Sir Francis Winnington, (Sol. Gen.) We will call him to give an account what he knows of the prisoner's being privy to the conspiracy of murdering the king (particularly to that). Mr. Bedlow, pray acquaint my lord and the jury what you know, I desire to know particularly as it concerns Mr. Coleman, and nothing but Mr. Coleman.

* See the Examinations of this witness taken before a Committee of the House of Lords, and in his last sickness before Chief Justice North, vol. 6, p. 4498.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, pray keep to that question close.

Att. Gen. I have two short questions to ask him: the first is, what he hath seen or heard touching any commission to Mr. Coleman, what say you?

Mr. Bedlow. In particular I know not of any commission directed to Mr. Coleman, I do not know any thing of it but what sir Henry Tichbourn told me, that he had a commission, and he brought a commission for Mr. Coleman and the rest of the lords, from the principal Jesuits at Rome, by order of the pope.

Att. Gen. A commission for what?

Bedlow. To be principal secretary of state: the title of it I do not know because I did not see it, but to be principal secretary of state, that was the effect.

Att. Gen. I desire to know what discourse you had with Mr. Coleman about that design.

Bedlow. If your lordship please, I shall be short in the narrative.

L. C. J. Make use of your notes to help your memory, but let not your testimony be merely to read them.

Bedlow. I carried over to M. La Chaise (the French king's confessor) a large packet of letters, April 1675, from Mr. Coleman, which letters I saw Mr. Coleman deliver to Father Harcourt, at his house in Duke-Street.

Council. And Harcourt gave them to you?

Bedlow. Yes; which letters were directed to be delivered to M. La Chaise, and I did carry them to La Chaise, and brought him an answer from La Chaise, and other English monks at Paris: I did not understand what was in it, because it was a language I do not well understand; it was about carrying on the Plot; at a consultation there were present two French abbots and several English monks at Paris; what I heard them say, was about carrying on the Plot to subvert the government of England, to destroy the king and the lords of the council. The king was principally to be destroyed, and the government subverted as well as the Protestant religion.

Court. When was this? when you were to receive the answer?

Bedlow. It was upon the consultation: there was a packet of letters from Mr. Coleman, they did not know I understood French, or if they did, they had tried me so long I believe they would have trusted me.

L. C. J. The letter that La Chaise wrote, to whom was it directed?

Bedlow. It was directed to Mr. Coleman, the packet was directed to Harcourt, and within that La Chaise wrote an answer and directed it to Mr. Coleman, particularly to Mr. Coleman.

L. C. J. How do you know?

Bedlow. The Superscription was this [in French, A M. Coleman]. To Mr. Coleman; with other letters directed to Father Harcourt.

L. C. J. He saith plainly the letter was yours. You gave Harcourt a packet of letters to be delivered to La Chaise, Harcourt delivered them to him, and he did carry them to La Chaise, and heard them talk about this Plot: that La Chaise wrote a letter to you (particularly by name) inclosed in a letter to Harcourt; that answer he brought back.

Recorder. Do you know any thing concerning any money Mr. Coleman said he had received? the sums, and for what?

Bedlow. It was to carry on the design to subvert the government of England, to free England from damnation and ignorance, and free all Catholics from hard tyranny and oppression of Heretics.

Att. Gen. What words did you hear Mr. Coleman express, what he would do for the Catholic cause?

Bedlow. May 24, or 25, 1677, I was at Mr. Coleman's with Mr. Harcourt, and received another packet from Mr. Harcourt, and he had it from Mr. Coleman.

L. C. J. You say, Mr. Coleman did give this packet to Harcourt?

Bedlow. Yes, and Harcourt delivered it to me to carry it to Paris to the English monks. I was to go by Doway to see if they were not gone to Paris before me.

L. C. J. And what did they say when you delivered the letters to the English monks?

Bedlow. They told me how much reward I deserved from the pope and the church, both here and in the world to come. I overtook three, and that night I went to Paris with them; and upon the consultation, 1677, I believe they sent the bishop of Tornes the substance of those letters; and not having a final answer what assistance the Catholic party in England might expect from them, they were resolved to neglect their design no longer than that summer, having all things ready to begin in England.

Recorder. What did you hear Mr. Coleman say?

Bedlow. That he would adventure any thing to bring in the Popish religion: after the consultation, I delivered the letters to La Faire, and he brought them to Harcourt, he delivered the packet of letters to Harcourt, who was not well, but yet went and delivered them to Mr. Coleman, and I went as far as Mr. Coleman's house, but did not go in, but stayed over the way; but Harcourt went in, and after he had spoke with Mr. Coleman, he gave me a beck to come to him; and I heard Mr. Coleman say, If he had a hundred lives, and a sea of blood to carry on the cause, he would spend it all to further the cause of the Church of Rome, and to establish the Church of Rome in England: and if there was an hundred Heretical kings to be deposed, he would see them all destroyed.

L. C. J. Where was this?

Bedlow. At his own house.

L. C. J. Where?

Bedlow. Behind Westminster Abbey.

L. C. J. In what room?

Bedlow. At the foot of the stair-case.

L. C. J. Where were you then?

Bedlow. There, I was called in by Harcourt, and was as near to him as to my lord Duras. [My lord being heard by Mr. Bedlow in court.]

Pris. Did I ever see you in my life?

Bedlow. You may ask that question; but in the stone-gallery in Somerset-House, when you came from a consult, where were great persons, which I am not to name here; that would make the bottom of your Plot tremble: you saw me then.

Att. Gen. We did before acquaint you with something of the substance of the letters; we shall now acquaint you with something of the manner of finding them. Your lordship hath heard, Mr. Oates hath been examined before the council, and there it was said, Mr. Coleman's papers would make such a discovery (if they were looked into) as would be enough to hang him. I remember he said the Lords of the Council were pleased to order the papers to be seized; the execution of their warrant they committed to one Bradly, who was a messenger that attended the king and council; and I desire he may be called: he did find and seize as many papers as Mr. Coleman was pleased to leave, and they are those papers which we now bring before you. The papers seized he had put in a deal box, and four or five several bags, and brings them to the council; the clerks of the council are here attending the Court: they will tell you these papers how produced were papers found in those bags: Mr. Bradly will tell you, the papers seized in the bags and box were brought to them, and they will swear they were the papers and bags that were brought.

Record. Mr. Bradly, give my lord and the jury an account whether you went to Mr. Coleman, whether you seized his papers, and what papers you saw, and how you disposed of them after they were seized.

Bradly. The 29th of September being Sunday evening at six of the clock, I received a warrant from the council-board to apprehend Mr. Coleman, and to seize his papers, and to bring them to the council-board: He being not at home, I spoke with his wife, and told her I came to search her house, I had a warrant so to do. She told me I was welcome; I desired her to send for her husband: I found in several parts of the house a great many papers; I put them up in several bags: I found some in a private corner in a deal box.

L. C. J. What kind of corner?

Bradly. In Mr. Coleman's chamber, not in his own study, but in another place behind the chimney; the box was tacked together with a nail: I lifted it up, and saw they were letters, I put it down again as it was, and gave it into the custody of one that was with me, to look into it; Then I came to his own study, where his scrutore was, and put 'up all I could find in several bags, and sealed them, and brought them to the council-chamber.

Att. Gen. Did you put up any other papers among them than what you found at Mr. Coleman's house?

VOL. VII.

Bradly. I did not, (upon my oath) I had them all at Mr. Coleman's house.

Att. Gen. Did you bring them all to the clerks of the council?

Bradly. Yes. Before I came out I tied them all up, and sealed them with my own seal, and was constantly with them.

Att. Gen. Now we will give your lordship an account how these things were received, that were there found. Sir Robert Southwell, look upon the large letter, and tell my lord and the jury whether that were among the papers brought by this messenger.

Sir R. Southwell. My lord, I did not see this letter in several days after the papers brought me from Bradly; when he came in with three great bags, and a box of letters on Sunday night, said I, which are Mr. Coleman's principal papers? Said he, those that are in the large speckled cloth-bag; for these we took first in the scrutores: These I took, and meddled not with the other. I presume other clerks of the council can give a particular account where this paper was found.

Att. Gen. Sir Thomas Dolman, look upon the letter, whether you can remember any thing of it.

Sir T. Dolman. I remember I found it in a deal box among Mr. Coleman's papers, these that Bradly brought.

Court. That is plain enough.

Att. Gen. That we may not often prove what we shall often make use of, I would prove it fully once for all, that all these papers were of his hand-writing; this we can prove by two sorts of evidences; his own confession, and the witness of two persons; one that was his servant: and the other a sub-secretary, that did write very many things for him. Mr. Boatman, look upon these papers; Tell my lord and the jury whose hand it is; Are you acquainted with Mr. Coleman's hand? What relation had you to him?

Boatman. I was his gentleman that waited on him in his chamber five years: This is very like his hand.

L. C. J. Do you believe it is his hand?

Boatman. I believe it is.

L. C. J. Little proof will serve the turn, because they were taken in his possession.

Att. Gen. I desire to prove it fully; look upon all the papers, turn all the leaves, see if they be not all one hand, and whether you believe all to be Mr. Coleman's hand-writing or not?

Boatman. I believe it to be all his hand.

L. C. J. Do you know when the last packet of letters came up, that were sent to Mr. Coleman, from beyond the seas?

Boatman. Two or three days after he was taken prisoner.

L. C. J. Do you know where they are bestowed? Did you receive M. la Chaise's letters for Mr. Coleman?

Boatman. Yes.

L. C. J. Did you ever write any for him to la Chaise?—Boatman. No.

D

Att. Gen. Inform the court whether he kept any book to make entry of letters he sent or received?

Boatman. Yes, there was a large book my master did enter his letters in, and his news.

Att. Gen. What is become of that book?

Boatman. I know not.

Att. Gen. When did you see that book last, upon your oath?

Boatman. On Saturday.

Att. Gen. How long before he was sent to prison?

Boatman. Two days, because the next day was Sunday, when he did not make use of it: On Monday my master was in prison, and I did not mind the book.

L. C. J. Were there any entries of letters in that book within two years last past?

Boatman. I cannot be positive.

Att. Gen. Did he not usually write and receive letters from beyond sea? Till that time had he not negotiation as usually?

Boatman. He had usually news every post from beyond the seas.

Pria. There is letters from the Hague, Brussels, Franoc and Rome; they are all with the council, which were all the letters I received.

Att. Gen. We have another witness: Cat-taway, are you acquainted with Mr. Coleman's hand writing? Do you believe it to be his hand writing?

Witness. I believe it is, they are his hand-writing.

Att. Gen. It will appear, if there were no other proof in this cause, his own papers are as good as an hundred witnesses to condemn him: Therefore I desire to prove them fully by his own confession.

Sir Phil. Lloyd, a witness. These are the papers I received from sir Thomas Dolman; I found them (as he saith) in a deal box; Among his papers I found this letter. Mr. Coleman hath owned this was his hand-writing; it is all one letter.

Att. Gen. It is all the same hand, and he acknowledged it to be his.

Mr. Recorder. I desire Mr. Astrey may read it so that the Jury may hear it.

Mr. Astrey, Clerk of the Crown, reads the letter.

The 29th of September (1675.) It is subscribed thus; "Your most humble and most obedient Servant," but no name.

MR. COLEMAN'S LONG LETTER.

"Since Father St. Germaan has been so kind to me, as to recommend me to your reverence so advantageously, as to encourage you to accept of my correspondency; I will own to him that he has done me a favour without consulting me, greater than I could have been capable of if he had advised with me; because I could not then have had the confidence to have permitted him to ask it on my behalf. And I am so sensible of the Honour you are pleased to do me, that though I cannot deserve it, yet to shew at least the sense I have of it, I will deal as freely and openly with you this first time, as if I had had the honour of your acquaintance all my life; and shall make no apology for so doing, but only tell you that I know your character perfectly well, though I am not so happy as to know your person; and that I have an opportunity of putting this letter into the hands of Father St. German's nephew (for whose integrity and prudence he has undertaken) without any sort of hazard.

"In order then, sir, to the plainness I profess, I will tell you what has formerly passed between your reverence's predecessor, Father Ferrier, and myself. About three years ago, when the king my master sent a troop of horse-guards into his most Christian majesty's service, under the command of my lord Durass, he sent with it an officer called sir William Throckmorton, with whom I had a particular intimacy, and who had then very newly embraced the Catholic religion: to him did I constantly write, and by him address myself to Father Ferrier. The first thing of great importance I presumed to offer him (not to trouble you with lesser matters, or what passed here before, and immediately after the fatal revocation of the king's declaration for liberty of conscience, to which we owe all our miseries and hazards,) was in July, August, and September 1673, when I constantly inculcated the great danger Catholic religion and his most Christian majesty's interest would be in a tour next sessions of parliament, which was then to be in October following; at which I plainly foresaw that the king my master would be forced to something in prejudice to his alliance with France, which I saw so evidently and particularly that we should make peace with Holland; that I urged all the arguments I could, which to me were demonstrations, to convince your court of that mischief; and pressed all I could to persuade his most Christian majesty to use his utmost endeavour to prevent that session of our parliament, and proposed expedients how to do it: but I was answered so often and so positively, that his most Christian majesty was so well assured by his ambassador here, our ambassador there, the lord Arlington, and even the king himself; that he had no such apprehensions at all, but was fully satisfied of the contrary, and looked upon what I offered as a very zealous mistake, that I was forced to give over arguing, though not believing as I did; but confidently appealed to time and success to prove who took their measures rightest. When it happened what I foresaw came to pass, the good Father was a little surprized, to see all the great men mistaken, and a little one in the right; and was pleased by sir William Throckmorton to desire the continuance of my correspondency, which I was mighty willing to comply with, knowing the interest of our king; and in a more particular manner of my more immediate master the duke, and his most Christian majesty, to be so inseparably united, that it was impossible to divide them, without destroying them all: upon this I shewed that our parliament in the circumstances it was managed, by the tinorous counsels of our ministers, who then governed, would never be useful either to England, France, or Catholic religion, but that we should as certainly be forced from our neutrality at their next meeting, as we had been from our active alliance with France the last year: that a peace in the circumstances we were in, was much more to be desired than the continuance of the war; and that the dissolution of our parliament would certainly procure a peace; for that the confederates did more depend upon the power they had in our parliament, than upon any thing else in the world; and were more encouraged from them to the continuing of the war; so that if they were dissolved, their measures would be all broken, and they consequently in a manner necessitated to a peace.

“The good father minding this discourse somewhat more than the court of France thought fit to do my former, urged it so home to the king, that his majesty was pleased to give him orders to signify to his royal highness my master, that his majesty was fully satisfied of his royal highness's good intention towards him, and that he esteemed both their interests but as one and the same; that my lord Arlington and the parliament were both to be looked upon as very unuseful to their interest: That if his royal highness would endeavour to dissolve this parliament, his most christian majesty would assist him with his power and purse, to have a new one as should be for their purpose. This, and a great many more expressions of kindness and confidence, Father Ferrier was pleased to communicate to sir William Throckmorton, and commanded him to send them to his royal highness, and withal to beg his royal highness to propose to his most christian majesty, what he thought necessary for his own concern, and the advantage of religion, and his majesty would certainly do all he could to advance both or either of them. This sir William Throckmorton sent to me by an express, who left Paris the 2d of June 1674, Stilo novo: I no sooner had it, but I communicated it to his R. H. To which his R. H. commanded me to answer, as I did on the 29th of the same month: That his R. H. was very sensible of his most christian majesty's friendship, and that he would labour to cultivate it with all the good offices he was capable of doing for his majesty; that he was fully convinced that their interests were both one, that my lord Arlington and the parliament were not only unuseful, but very dangerous both to England and France: that therefore it was necessary that they should do all they could to dissolve it. And that his royal highness's opinion was, that if his most christian majesty would write his thoughts freely to the king of England upon this subject and make the same proffer to his majesty of his purse to dissolve this parliament, which he had made to his royal highness to call another, he did believe it very possible for him to succeed, with the assistance we should be able to give him here; and that if this parliament were dissolved, there would be no great difficulty of getting a new one, which would be more useful: the constitutions of our parliaments being such, that a new one can never hurt the crown, nor an old one do it good.

“His royal highness being pleased to own these propositions, which were but only general, I thought it reasonable to be more particular, and come closer to the point, that we might go the faster about the work, and come to some resolution before the time was too impatient.

“I laid this for my maxim: the dissolution of our parliament will certainly procure a peace; which proposition was granted by every body I conversed withal, even by M. Rouvigny himself, with whom I took liberty of discoursing so far, but durst not say any thing of the intelligence I had with father Ferrier. Next; that a sum of money certain, would certainly procure a dissolution; this some doubted, but I am sure I never did; for I knew perfectly well that the king had frequent disputes with himself at that time, whether he should dissolve or continue them; and he several times declared that the arguments were so wrong on both sides, that he could not tell to which to incline; but was carried at last to the continuance of them by this one argument; if I try them once more, they may possibly give me money; if they do I have gained my point, if they do not, I can dissolve them then, and be where I am now: so that I have a possibility at least of getting money for their continuance, against nothing on the other side; but if we could have turned this argument, and said; Sir, their dissolution will certainly procure you money, when you have only a bare possibility of getting any by their continuance, and have shewn how far that bare possibility was from being a foundation to build any reasonable hope upon, which I am sure his majesty was sensible of: and how much 300,000*l.* sterling certain (which was the sum we proposed) was better than a bare possibility (without any reason to hope that that could ever be compassed) of having half so much more (which was the most he designed to ask,) upon some vile dishonourable terms, and a thousand other hazards, which he had great reason to be afraid of: if, I say, we had power to have argued this, I am most confidently assured we could have compassed it, for Logic in our court built upon money, has more powerful charms than any other sort of reasoning. But to secure his most christian majesty from any hazard as to that point, I proposed his majesty should offer that sum upon that condition; and if the condition were not performed, the money should never be due; if it were and that a peace would certainly follow thereupon, (which nobody doubted) his majesty would gain his ends and save all the vast expences of the next campaign, by which he could not hope to better his condition, or put himself into more advantageous circumstances of Treaty than he was then in; but might very probably be in a much worse, considering the mighty opposition he was like to meet with, and the uncertain chances of war. But admitting that his majesty could by his great strength and conduct maintain himself in as good a condition to treat the next year as he was then in; (which was as much as could then reasonably be hoped for) he should have saved by this proposal as much as all the men he must needs lose, and all the charges he should be at in a year, would be valued to amount to more than 300,000*l.* sterling, and so much more in case his condition should decay, as it should be worse than it was when this was made; and the condition of his royal highness and of the Catholic religion here (which depends very much upon the success of his most christian majesty,) delivered from a great many frights and real hazards. F. Ferrier seemed to be very sensible of the benefit all parties would gain by this proposal; but yet it was unfortunately delayed by an unhappy and tedious fit of sickness, which kept him so long from the king in the Franche Comte, and made him so unable to wait on his majesty after he did return to Paris: but so soon as he could compass it, he was pleased to acquaint his majesty with it, and wrote to the Duke himself; and did me the honour to write unto me also on the 15th of September 1674, and sent his letter by sir William Throckmorton, who came upon express that errand: in these letters he gave his royal highness fresh assurance of his most christian majesty's friendship, and of his zeal and readiness to comply with every thing his royal highness had, or should think fit to propose in favour of religion, or the business of money: and that he had commanded M. Rouvigny as to the latter, to treat and deal with his royal highness and to receive and observe his orders and directions; but desired that he might not at all be concerned as to the former, but that his royal highness would cause what proposition he should think fit to be made about religion, to be offered either to Father Ferrier, or M. Pomponne.

"These letters came to us about the middle of September, and his royal highness expected daily when M. Rouvigny should speak to him about the subject of that letter; but he took no notice at all of any thing till the 29th of September, the evening before the king and duke went to Newmarket for a fortnight, and then only said, that he had commands from his master to give his royal highness the most firm assurance of his friendship imaginable, or something to that purpose, making his royal highness a general compliment, but made no mention of any particular orders relating to Father Ferrier's letter. The duke wondering at this proceeding, and being obliged to stay a good part of October at Newmarket; and soon after his coming back, hearing of the death of Father Ferrier, he gave over all further prosecuting of the former project. But I believe I saw M. Rouvigny's policy all along, who was willing to save his master's money, upon assurance that we would do all we could to ~~save~~ off the parliament for our own sakes, that we would struggle as hard without money as with it; and we having by that time, upon our own interest, prevailed to get the parliament prorogued to the 13th of April, he thought that prorogation being to a day so high in the spring, would put the confederates so far beyond their measures, as that it might procure a peace, and be as useful to France as a dissolution: upon these reasons I suppose he went. I had several discourses with him; and did open myself so far to him as to say, I could wish his master would give us leave to offer to our master 300,000*l.* for the dissolution of the parliament; and shewed him that a peace would most certainly follow a dissolution (which he agreed with me in,) and that we desired not the money from his master to excite our wills, or to make us more industrious to use our utmost powers to procure a dissolution, but to strengthen our power and credit with the king, and to render us more capable to succeed with his majesty, as most certainly we should have done, had we been fortified with such an argument.

"To this purpose I pressed M. Pomponne frequently by sir William Throckmorton, who returned hence again into France on the 10th of November, the day our parliament should have met, but was prorogued. M. Pomponne (as I was informed by sir William) did seem to approve the thing; but yet had two objections against it: First, that the sum we proposed, was great; and could be very ill spared, in the circumstances his most Christian majesty was in. To which we answered, that if by his expending that sum, he could procure a dissolution of our parliament, and thereby a peace, which every body agreed would necessarily follow; his most Christian majesty would gain his ends, and save five or ten times a greater sum, and so be a good husband by his expence; and if we did not procure a dissolution, he should not be at that expence at all; for that we desired him only to promise upon that condition, which we were content to be obliged to perform first. The second Objection was, The duke did not move, nor appear in it himself. To that we answered, That he did not indeed to M. Pomponne, because he had found so ill an effect of the negotiation with Father Ferrier, when it came into M. Rouvigny's hands; but that he had concerned himself in it to Father Ferrier.

"Yet I continued to prosecute and press the dissolution of the parliament, detesting all prorogations as only so much loss of time, and a means of strengthening all those who depend upon it in opposition to the crown, the interest of France and Catholic religion, in the opinion they had taken. That our king durst not part with his parliament; apprehending that another would be much worse. Secondly, That he could not live long without a parliament, therefore they must suddenly meet; and the longer he kept them off, the greater his necessity would grow; and consequently their power to make him do what they listed, would increase accordingly: and therefore, if they could but maintain themselves a while, the day would certainly come in a short time, in which they should be able to work their wits. Such discourses as these kept the Confederates and our Male contents in heart, and made them weather on the war in spite of all our prorogations: therefore I pressed (as I have said) a dissolution until February last, when our circumstances were so totally changed, that we were forced to change our counsels too, and be as much for the parliament's sitting, as we were before against it.

"Our Change was thus: Before that time, the lord Arlington was the only minister in credit, who thought himself out of all danger of the parliament; he having been accused before them and justified, and therefore was zealous for their sitting; and to increase his reputation with them, and to become a perfect favourite, he sets himself all he could to persecute the Catholic religion, and to oppose the French: To shew his zeal against the first, he revived some old dormant Orders for prohibiting Roman Catholics to appear before the king, and put them in execution at his first coming into his office of Lord Chamberlain: And to make sure work with the second, as he thought; prevailed with the king to give him and the earl of Ossory, (who married two sisters of Myne Heere Odyke's) leave to go over into Holland with the said Heere, to make a visit, as they pretended, to their relations; but indeed, and in truth, to propose the lady Mary, eldest daughter of his royal highness, as a match for the prince of Orange; not only without the consent, but against the good liking of his royal highness: Inasmuch, that the lord Arlington's creatures were forced to excuse him, with a distinction, that the said lady was not to be looked upon as the duke's daughter, but as the king's, and a child of the state was, and so the duke's consent not much to be considered in the disposal of her, but only the interest of state. By this he intended to render himself the darling of parliament and Protestants, who looked upon themselves as secured in their religion by such an alliance, and designed further to draw us into a close conjunction with Holland, and the enemies of France. The lord Arlington set forth upon this errand the 10th of November, 1674, and returned not till the 6th of January following: During his absence, the Lord Treasurer, Lord Keeper, and the duke of Lauderdale, who were the only ministers of any considerable credit with the king, and who all pretended to be entirely united to the Duke, declaimed loudly and with great violence, against the said lord, and his actions in Holland; and did hope, in his absence, to have totally supplanted him, and so have routed him out of the king's favour; and after that, thought they might easily enough have dealt with the parliament. But none of them had courage enough to speak against the parliament, till they could get rid of him; for fear they should not succeed, and that the parliament would sit in spite of them, and come to hear that they had used their endeavours against it: which would have been so unpardonable a crime with our Omnipotent Parliament, that no power could have been able to have saved them from punishment: But they finding at his return, that they could not prevail against him by such means and arts as they had then tried, resolved upon new counsels; which were to outran him in his own course; which accordingly they undertook, and became as fierce apostles, and as zealous for Protestant religion, and against Popery, as ever my lord Arlington had been before them; and in pursuance thereof, persuaded the king to issue out those severe Orders and Proclamations against Catholics, which came out in February last; by which they did as much as in them lay to extirpate all Catholics, and Catholic religion, out of the kingdom; which counsels were in my poor opinion so detestable, being levelled, as they must needs be, so directly against the Duke, by people which he had advanced, and who had professed so much duty and service to him, that we were put upon new thoughts how to save his royal highness now from the deceits and snares of those men upon whom we formerly depended. We saw well enough, that their design was to make themselves as grateful as they could to the parliament, if it must sit; they thinking nothing so acceptable to them, as the persecution of Popery; and yet they were so obnoxious to the parliament's displeasure in general, that they would have been glad of any expedient to have kept it off; though they durst not engage against it openly themselves, but thought this device of theirs might serve for their purposes, hoping the Duke would be so alarmed at their proceedings, and by his being left by every body, that he would be much more afraid of the parliament than ever, and would use his utmost power to prevent its sitting: which they doubted not but he would endeavour; and they were ready enough to work underhand too for him (for their own sakes, not his), in order thereunto; but durst not appear openly; and to encourage the Duke the more to endeavour the dissolution of the parliament, their creatures used to say up and down, That this rigor against the Catholics was in favour of the Duke, and to make a dissolution of the parliament more easy, (which they knew he coveted) by obviating one great objection which was commonly made against it, which was, That if the parliament should be dissolved, it would be said, That it was done in favour of Popery; which clamour they had prevented beforehand by the severity they had used against it.

"As soon as we saw these tricks put upon us we plainly saw, what men we had to deal withal, and what we had to trust to, if we were wholly at their mercy: But yet durst not seem so dissatisfied as we really were, but rather magnified the contrivance, as a device of great cunning and skill: All this we did purely to hold them in a belief, that we would endeavour to dissolve the parliament, and that they might rely upon his royal highness for that which we knew they longed for, and were afraid they might do some other way, if they discovered that we were resolved we would not: At length when we saw the sessions secured, we declared, that we were for the parliament's meeting; as indeed we were, from the moment we saw ourselves handled by all the king's ministers at such a rate that we had reason to believe they would sacrifice France, religion, and his royal highness too, to their own interest, if occasion served; and that they were led to believe, that that was the only way they had to save themselves at that time: For we saw no expedient fit to stop them in their career of persecution, and those other destructive counsels, but the parliament; which had set itself a long time to dislike every thing the ministers had done, and had appeared violently against popery, whilst the court seemed to favour it; and therefore we were confident, that the ministers having turned their faces, the parliament would do so too, and still be against them; and be as little for persecution then, as they had been for popery before. This I undertook to manage for the Duke and the king of France's interest; and assured M. Rouvigny, which I am sure he will testify, if occasion serves, that that session should do neither of them any hurt; for that I was sure I had power enough to prevent mischief, though I durst not engage for any good they would do; because I had but very few assistants to carry on the work, and wanted those helps which others had, of making friends: The Dutch and Spaniards spared no pains or expence of money to animate as many as they could against France; our Lord Treasurer, Lord Keeper, all the bishops, and such as called themselves Old Cavaliers, (who were all then as one man) were not less industrious against popery, and had the purse at their girdle too; which is an excellent instrument to gain friends with; and all united against the Duke, as patron both of France and catholic religion. To deal with all this force, we had no money, but what came from a few private hands; and those so mean ones too, that I dare venture to say, that I spent more my particular self out of my own fortune, and upon my own single credit, than all the whole body of catholics in England besides; which was so inconsiderable, in comparison of what our adversaries commanded, and we verily believe did bestow in making their party, that it is not worth mentioning: Yet notwithstanding all this, we saw that by the help of the Nonconformists, as Presbyterians, Independants, and other sects, (who were as much afraid of persecution as ourselves) and of the enemies of the ministers, and particularly of the Treasurer; who by that time had supplanted the earl of Arlington, and was grown sole manager of all affairs himself, we should be very able to prevent what they designed against us, and so render the sessions ineffectual to their ends, though we might not be able to compass our own; which were, to make some briak step in favour of his royal highness, to shew the king, that his majesty's affairs in parliament were not obstructed, by reason of any aversion they had to his royal highness's person, or apprehensions they had of him, or his religion; but from faction and ambition in some, and from a real dissatisfaction in others, that we have not had such fruits and good effects of those great sums of money which have been formerly given, as was expected. If we could then have made but one such step, the king would certainly have restored his royal highness to all his commissions; upon which he would have been much greater than ever yet he was in his whole life, or could probably ever have been by any other course in the world, than what he had taken of becoming catholic, &c. And we were so very near gaining this point, that I did humbly beg his royal highness to give me leave to put the parliament upon making an Address to the king, that his majesty would be pleased to put the fleet into the hands of his royal highness, as the only person likely to have a good account of so important a charge as that was to the kingdom; and shewed his royal highness such reasons to persuade him that we could carry it, that he agreed with me in it, that he believed we could. Yet others telling him how great a damage it would be to him, if he should miss in such an undertaking (which for my part I could not then see, nor do I yet), he was prevailed upon not to venture, though he was persuaded he could carry it. I did communicate this design of mine to M. Rouvigny, who agreed with me, that it would be the greatest advantage imaginable to his master, to have the Duke's power and credit so far advanced as this would certainly do, if we could compass it: I shewed him all the difficulty we were like to meet with, and what helps we should have; but that we should want one very material one, money, to carry on the work as we ought; and therefore I do confess, I did shamefully beg his master's help, and would willingly have been in everlasting disgrace with all the world, if I had not with that assistance of 20,000*l.* sterling, which perhaps is not the tenth part of what was spent on the other side, made it evident to the Duke, that he could not have mised it. M. Rouvigny used to tell me, That if he could be sure of succeeding in that design, his master would give a very much larger sum, but that he was not in a condition to throw away money upon uncertainties. I answered, That nothing of that nature could be so infallibly sure, as not to be subject to some possibilities of failing; but that I durst venture to undertake to make it evident, that there was as great an assurance of succeeding in it, as any husbandman can have of a crop in harvest who sows his ground in its due season; and yet it would be counted a very imprudent piece of wariness in any body, to scruple the venturing of so much seed in its proper time, because it is possible it may be totally lost, and no benefit of it found in harvest; he that minds the winds and the rains at that rate, shall neither sow nor reap. I take our case to be much the same as it was the last sessions: If we can advance the Duke's interest one step forward, we shall put him out of the reach of chance for ever; for he makes such a figure already, that cautious men do not care to act against him, nor always without him, because they do not see that he is much outpowered by his enemies; yet is he not at such a pitch, as to be quite out of danger, or free from opposition: But if he could gain any considerable new addition of power, all would come over to him as the only steady center of our government, and nobody would contend with him further. Then would catholics be at rest, and his most Christian majesty's interest secured with us in England beyond all apprehensions whatsoever.

"In order to this, we have two great Designs to attempt this next sessions. First, that which we were about before, viz. To put the parliament upon making it their humble request to the king, that the Fleet may be put into his royal highness's care. Secondly, to get an Act for general Liberty of Conscience. If we carry these two, or either of them, we shall in effect do what we list afterwards; and truly, we think we do not undertake these great points very unreasonably, but that we have good cards for our game; not but that we expect great opposition, and have great reason to beg all the assistance we can possibly get; and therefore, if his most Christian majesty would stand by us a little in this conjuncture, and help us with such a sum as 20,000*l.* sterling (which is no very great matter to venture upon such an undertaking as this), I would be content to be sacrificed to the utmost malice of my enemies, if I did not succeed. I have proposed this several times to M. Rouvigny, who seemed always of my opinion; and has often told me, that he has writ into France upon this subject, and has desired me to do the like: but I know not whether he will be as zealous in that point as a Catholic would be; because our prevailing in these things would give the greatest blow to the Protestant religion here, that ever it received since its birth; which perhaps he would not be very glad to see; especially when he believes there is another way of doing his master's business well enough without it; which is by a dissolution of the parliament; upon which I know he mightily depends, and concludes, that if that come to be dissolved, it will be as much as he needs care for; proceeding perhaps upon the same manner of discourse which he had this time 12 months. But with submission to his better judgment, I do think that our case is extremely much altered to what it was, in relation to a dissolution; for then the body of our governing ministers (all but the earl of Arlington) were entirely united to the duke; and would have governed his way, if they had been free from all fear and controul, as they had been. if the parliament had been removed. But they having since that time engaged in quite different counsels, and embarked themselves and interests upon other bottoms, having declared themselves against popery, &c. To dissolve the parliament simply, and without any other step made, will be to leave them to govern what way they list, which we have reason to suspect will be to the prejudice of France and Catholic religion. And their late declarations and actions have demonstrated to us, that they take that for the most popular way for themselves, and likeliest to keep them in absolute power; whereas, if the duke should once get above them (after the tricks they have played with him) they are not sure he will totally forget the usage he has had at their hands; therefore it imports us now to advance our interest a little further, by some such project as I have named, before we dissolve the parliament; or else, perhaps, we shall but change masters (a parliament for ministers), and continue still in the same slavery and bondage as before. But one such step as I have proposed, being well made, we may safely see them dissolved, and not fear the ministers; but shall be established, and stand firm without any opposition; for every body will then come over to us, and worship the rising sun.

"I have here given you the history of three years, as short as I could, though I am afraid it will seem very long and troublesome to your reverence, among the multitude of affairs you are concerned in: I have also shewn you the present state of our case, which may (by God's providence, and good conduct) be made of such advantage to God's church; that for my part, I can scarce believe myself awake, or the thing real, when I think on a prince in such an age as we live in, converted to such a degree of zeal and piety, as not to regard any thing in the world in comparison of God Almighty's glory, the salvation of his own soul, and the conversion of our poor kingdom; which has been a long time oppressed, and miserably harassed with heresy and schism. I doubt not but your reverence will consider our case, and take it to heart, and afford us what help you can; both with the king of heaven, by your holy prayers, and with his most Christian majesty, by that great credit which you most justly have with him. And if ever his majesty's affairs (or your own) can want the service of so inconsiderable a creature as myself, you shall never find any body readier to obey your commands, or faithfuller in the execution of them, to the best of his power, than your most humble and obedient servant."

Att. Gen. That I may make things clear, as much as possible; you see, here is a letter prepared to be sent, writ with Mr. Coleman's own hand, to M. la Chaise: This letter bears date the 29th of September. We have an Answer to it from Paris, October 23, whereby M. la Chaise owns the receipt of this: and in this Answer is expressed thanks to Mr. Coleman for his long letter. Sir Robert, Pray tell how you came by this Letter.

Sir Rob. Southwell. I found this Letter in Mr. Coleman's canvas bag; after we had once looked over the letters, we found it: sir Philip Lloyd examined it; and we looked over those papers very exactly. Because the House of Commons were very much concerned, and thought those papers were not thoroughly examined, I reviewed them again. This Letter was found on Sunday following after the papers were seized.

Att. Gen. Sir Robert Southwell, I pray read the Letter in French first to the court. Sir Robert having read the letter in French, Mr. Attorney desired him to read it in English. Sir Robert read it in English: The letter was dated Paris, Oct. 23, 1675. And subscribed, "Your most humble and obedient Servant, D. L. C." at the bottom.

The LETTER.

"Sir; " From Paris, Oct. 23, 1675.

"The letter which you gave yourself the trouble to write to me, came to my hands but the last night. I read it with great satisfaction; and I assure you, that its length did not make it seem tedious. I should be very glad on my part to assist in seconding your good intentions; I will consider of the means to effect it; and when I am better informed than I am as yet, I will give you an account: to the end I may hold intelligence with you, as you did with my predecessor. I desire you to believe that I will never fail as to my good will, for the service of your master, whom I honour as much as he deserves; and that it is with great truth that I am your most humble and most obedient Servant, " D. L. C."

Att. Gen. We made mention of a Declaration: By his long narrative it plainly appears, that Mr. Coleman would have had another parliament. And the reason why he was pleased to publish a Declaration, was, thereby to shew the reasons for its dissolution. Sir Philip Lloyd, did you find this writing among Mr. Coleman's papers?

Sir P. L. I did find it among his papers.

Att. Gen. Pray read the Declaration.

Clerk of the Crown reads the Declaration.

The DECLARATION which Mr. Coleman prepared, thereby shewing his Reasons for the Dissolution of the Parliament.

"We having taken into our serious consideration the heats and animosities which have of late appeared among many of our very loyal and loving subjects of this kingdom, and the many fears and jealousies which some of them seem to lie under, of having their liberties and properties invaded, or their religion altered; and withal, carefully reflecting upon our own government since our happy Restoration, and the end and aim of it, which has always been the ease and security of our people in all their rights, and advancement of the beauty and splendor of the true Protestant religion established in the Church of England; of both which we have given most signal testimonies, even to the stripping ourself of many royal prerogatives which our predecessors enjoyed, and were our undoubted due; as the court of wards, purveyances, and other things of great value; and denying to ourself many advantages, which we might reasonably and legally have taken by the forfeitures made in the times of rebellion, and the great revenues due to the Church at our return, which no particular person had any right to; instead of which, we consented to an act of oblivion of all those barbarous usages which our royal father and ourself had met withal, much more full and gracious than almost any of our subjects, who were generally become in some measure or other obnoxious to the laws, had confidence to ask; and freely renounced all our title to the profit which we might have made by the church lands, in favour of our bishops and other ecclesiastical ministers, out of our seal to the glory of our Protestant Church; which clemency towards all, and some even high offenders, and zeal for religion, we have to this day constantly continued to exercise. Considering all this, we cannot but be sensibly afflicted to see, that the frowardness of some few tumultuous heads should be able to infect our loyal and good people with apprehensions destructive of their own, and the general quiet of our kingdom; and more especially, their perverseness should be powerful enough to distract our very parliament, and such a parliament, as has given us such testimonies of its loyalty, wisdom, and bounty, and to which we have given as many marks of our affection and esteem, so as to make them misconstrue all our endeavours for to preserve our people in ease and prosperity, and against all reason and evidence to represent them to our subjects as arguments of fear and disquiet; and under these specious pretences of securing property and religion, to demand unreasonable things, manifestly destructive of what they would be thought to aim at; and from our frequent condescensions, out of our mere grace, to grant them what we conceived might give them satisfaction, though to the actual prejudice of our royal prerogative, to make them presume to propose to advance such extravagancies into laws, as they themselves have formerly declared detestable; of which we cannot forbear to give our truly loyal subjects some instances, to undeceive our innocent and well-minded people, who have many of them of late been too easily misled, by the factious endeavours of some turbulent spirits. For example, We having judged it necessary to declare war against the States of Holland, during a recess of parliament, which we could not defer longer, without losing an advantage which then presented itself, nor have done sooner, without exposing our honour to a potent enemy without due preparation, we thought it prudent to unite all our subjects at home, and did believe a general indulgence of tender consciences the most proper expedient to effect it; and therefore did by our authority in ecclesiastics, which we thought sufficient to warrant what we did, suspect penal laws against dissenters in religion, upon conditions expressed in our Declaration, out of reason of state, as well as to gratify our own nature, which always, we confess, abhorred rigor, especially in religion, when tenderness might be as useful. After we had engaged in the war, we prorogued our parliament from April to October, being confident we should be able by that time to shew our people such success of our arms, as should make them cheerfully contribute to our charge. At October we could have shewn them success even beyond our own hopes, or what they could possibly expect; our enemies having lost by that time, near 100 strong towns and forts, taken in effect by us, we holding them busy at sea, whilst our allies possessed themselves of their lands, with little or no resistance; and of which, the great advantage would most visibly have been ours, had not the feuds we now complain of, which have been since unhappily started, and factiously improved by some few, disunited our people, distracted our councils, and rendered our late endeavours vain and fruitless; so that we had no reason to doubt of our people's ready and liberal concurrence to our assistance in that conjuncture. Yet our enemies proposing to us at that time a treaty for peace, which we were always ready to accept upon honourable terms; and considering with ourself; that in case that treaty succeeded, a far less sum of money would serve our occasions, than otherwise would be necessary: We, out of our tender regard to the ease of our people, prorogued our parliament again to February, to attend the success of our treaty, rather than to demand so much money in October, as would be fit to carry on the war. But we soon finding that our enemies did not intend us any just satisfaction, saw a necessity of prosecuting the war, which we designed to do most vigorously; and in order to it, resolved to press our parliament to supply us as speedily as may be, to enable us to put our fleet to sea early in the spring, which would after their meeting grow on apace. And being informed that many members were dead during the long recess, we issued out our writs for new elections, that our House of Commons might be full at the first opening of the sessions, to prevent any delay in our public affairs, or dislike in our people, as might possibly have risen from the want of so great a number of their representatives, if any thing of moment should be concluded before it had been supplied. Having governed our actions all along with such careful respect to the ease of our subjects, we at the meeting of our parliament in February 1673, expected from them some suitable expressions of their sense of our favours; but quite contrary, found ourself alarmed with clamorous complaints from several cabals against all our proceedings, frightening many of our good subjects into strange conceits of what they must look for, by their seditious and false constructions of what we had so candidly and sincerely done for their good; and surprised with a vote of our House of Commons, against our writs of elections, which we intended for their satisfactions, against many precedents of ours, or without any colour of law of their side, denying our power to issue out such writs addressing to us to issue out others: which we consented to do at their request, choosing rather to yield to our subjects in that point, than to be forced to submit to our enemies in others; hoping that our parliament being sensibly touched with that our extraordinary condescension, would go on to consider the public concern of the kingdom, without any further to do; but we found another use of our so easy compliances, which served to encourage them to ask more; so that soon after we found our declaration for indulging tender consciences arraigned and voted illegal; though we cannot to this day understand the consistencies of that vote, with our undoubted supremacy in all ecclesiastica, recognized by so many acts of parliament, and required to be sworn to by all our subjects, and addresses made to us one after another to recal it, which we condescended to also; from hence they proceeded to us to weaken ourself in an actual war, and to render many of our subjects, of whose loyalty and ability we were well satisfied, incapable to serve us, when we wanted officers and soldiers, and had reason to invite as many experienced men as we could to engage in our arms, rather than to incapacitate or discourage any; yet this also we gratified them in, to gain their assistance against our enemies, who grew high by these our differences, rather than expose our country to their power and fury; hoping that in time our people would be confounded to see our concessions, and be ashamed of their errors in making such demands. But finding the unfortunate effects of our divisions the following summer, we found our parliament more extravagant at the next meeting than ever, addressing to us to hinder the consummation of our dear brother's marriage, contrary to the law of God, which forbiddeth any to separate any whom he hath joined, against our faith and honour engaged in the solemn Treaty, obstinately persisting in that Address, after we had acquainted them, that the marriage was then actually ratified, and that we had acted in it by our ambassador; so that we were forced to separate them for a while; hoping they would bethink themselves better at their meeting in January. Instead of being more moderate, or ready to consider our wants towards the war; they voted, as they had done before, not to assist us still, until their religion were effectually secured against popery, grievances redressed, and all obnoxious men removed from us; which we had reason to take for an absolute denial of all aid; considering the indefiniteness of what was to proceed, and the moral impossibility of effecting it in their senses; for when will they say their religion is effectually secured from popery, if it were in danger then, by reason of the insolency of papists; when our House of Commons, which is made up of members from every corner of our kingdom, with invitations publicly posted up to all men to accuse them, has not yet in so many years as they have complained of them, been able to charge one single member of that communion, with so much as a misdemeanor? Or what security could they possibly expect against that body of men, or their religion, more than we had given them? or how can we hope to live so perfectly, that study and pains may not make a collection of grievances, as considerable as that which was lately presented to us, than which we could not have wished for a better vindication of our government? or when shall we be sure that all obnoxious men are removed from us, when common fame thinks fit to call them so; which is to every body, without any proof, sufficient to render any man obnoxious, who is popishly affected, or any thing else that is ill, though they have never so often or lately complied with their own tests, and marks of distinction and discriminations? finding our people thus unhappily disordered, we saw it impossible to prosecute the war any longer; and therefore did by their advice make a peace upon such conditions as we could get; hoping that being gratified in that darling point they would at least have paid our debts, and enabled us to have built some ships for the future security of our honour, and their own properties; but they being transported with their success in asking, were resolved to go on still that way, and would needs have us put upon the removing of our judges from those charges, which they have always hitherto held at the will and pleasure of the crown, out of our power to alter the ancient laws of trying of peers, and to make it a premunire in our subjects (in a case supposed) not to fight against ourself; nay, some had the heart to ask, that the hereditary succession of our crown (which is the foundation of all our laws) should be changed into a sort of election, they requiring the heir to be qualified with certain conditions to make him capable of succeeding; and outdoing that Popish doctrine, which we have so long and so loudly with good reason decried, that heresy incapacitates kings to reign. They would have had, that the heir of the crown, marrying a papist, though he continued never so orthodox himself, should forfeit his right of inheritance; not understanding this paradoxical way of securing religion by destroying it, as this would have done that of the church of England, which always taught obedience to their natural kings, as an indispensable duty in all good christians, let the religion or deportment of their prince be what it will; and not knowing how soon that impediment, which was supposed as sufficient to keep out an heir, might be thought as fit to remove a possessor: And comparing that bill which would have it a premunire in a sheriff not to raise the Posse Comitatus, against our commission in a case there supposed, though we ourself should assist that our commission in our person: For not being excepted is implied with the other made by this very parliament in the 14th year of our reign, which all our subjects, or at least many of them, were obliged to swear (viz. That the doctrine of taking up arms by the king's authority, against his person, was detestable); and we soon found that the design was levelled against the good Protestant religion of our good church, which its enemies had a mind to blemish, by siding in slyly those damnable doctrines, by such an authority as that of our parliament, into the profession of our faith or practices, and so expose our whole religion to the scorn and reproach of themselves, and all the world: We therefore thought it our duty to be so watchful as to prevent the enemies sowing such mischievous tares as these, in the wholesome field of our church of England, and to guard the unspotted spouse of our blessed Lord from that foul accusation with which she justly charges other churches, of teaching their children loyalty, with so many reserves and conditions, that they shall never want a distinction to justify rebellion; nor a text of scripture, as good as Curse ye Meroz, to encourage them to be traitors: Whereas our truly reformed church knows no such subtilties; but teaches according to the simplicity of christianity, to submit to every ordinance of man for God's sake, according to the natural signification of the words, without equivocation or artificial turns. In order to which, having thought to dissolve that body, which we have these many years so tenderly cherished, and which we are sure consists generally of most dutiful and loyal members, we were forced to prorogue our parliament till November next, hoping thereby to cure those disorders, which have been sown among the best and loyalest subjects by a few malicious incendiaries. But understanding since, that such who have sowed that seditious seed, are as industriously careful to water it by their cabals, and emissaries, instructed on purpose to poison our people with discourses in public places, in hopes of a great crop of confusion, their beloved fruit, the next sessions; we have found it absolutely necessary to dissolve our parliament, though with great reluctance and violence to our inclination: But remembering the days of our royal father, and the progress of affairs then, how from a cry against popery the people went on to complain of grievances, and against evil counsellors and his majesty's prerogative; until they advanced into a formal rebellion, which brought forth the most direful and fatal effects that ever were yet heard of amongst any men, christians or others; and withal, finding so great a resemblance between the proceedings then and now, that they seem both broth of the same brains: And being confirmed in that conceit, by observing the actions of many now, who had a great share in the former rebellion, and their zeal for religion who by their lives gave us too much reason to suspect they have none at all; we thought it not safe to dally too long, as our Royal Father did, with submissions and condescensions, endeavouring to cure men infected, without removing them from the air where they got the disease, and in which it still rages and increases daily. For fear of meeting with no better success than he found in suffering his parliament to challenge power they had nothing to do with, till they had bewitched the people into fond desires of such things as quickly destroyed both king and country, which in us would [be] an intolerable error, having been warned so lately by the most execrable murder of our Royal Father, and the inhuman usage which we our self in our royal person and family have suffered, and our loyal subjects have endured, by such practices: and lest this our great care of this our kingdom's quiet, and our own honour and safety, should, as our best actions hitherto have been, be wrested to some sinister sense and arguments be made from it to scare our good people into any apprehensions of an arbitrary government either in church or state: We do hereby solemnly declare and faithfully engage our royal word, that we will in no case either ecclesiastical or civil, violate or alter the known laws of our kingdom, or invade any man's property or liberty without due course of law: But that we will with our utmost endeavours preserve the true Protestant Religion, and redress all such things as shall indifferently, and without passion, be judged grievances by our next parliament, which we do by God's blessing intend to call before the end of February next. In the mean time we do strictly charge and command all manner of persons whatsoever, to forbear to talk seditiously, slightly or irreverently of our dissolving of the parliament, of this our declaration, or of our person or government, as they will answer it at their perils; we being resolved to prosecute all offenders in that kind with the utmost rigour and severity of the law. And to the end that such licentious persons, if any shall be so impudent and obstinate as to disobey this our royal command, may be detected and brought to due punishment, we have ordered our Lord Treasurer to make speedy payment of twenty pounds to any person or persons who shall discover or bring any such seditious, slight or irreverent talker before any of our principal secretaries of state."

Recorder. I would have the jury should know the Declaration ends, "To one of his majesty's principal secretaries of state;" whereof he hoped to be one.

Att. Gen. This is written in the name of the king; for Mr. Coleman thought himself now secretary of state, and he pens the Declaration, for the king to give an account why the parliament was dissolved.

Serj. Maynard. The long letter, it appears, was to dissolve the parliament; and to make it rock-sure, he provides a Declaration to shew the reason of it: it was done in order to bring in popery; that may appear by the subsequent proof.

Att. Gen. I have other evidence to offer to your lordship, which is, That Mr. Coleman was not only so bold as to prepare a Declaration for the king, but also out of his own further ingenuity, prepares a Letter (contrary to the duke's knowledge) for the duke, which before several Lords he confessed; and sir Philip Floyd is here ready to justify it.

Sir Philip Floyd. I did attend a Committee of the House of Lords to Newgate, who examined Mr. Coleman, and told him of the letter Mr. Attorney mentioneth; he then confessed, that it was prepared without the order and priority of the duke; and when he was so bold as to shew it the duke, the duke was very angry and rejected it.

L. C. J. He hath been a very forward undertaker on the behalf of the duke.

Att. Gen. I desire the Letter may be read.

The Copy of the Letter written to M. La Chaise the French king's Confessor; which Mr. Coleman confessed he himself wrote and counterfeited in the duke's name.

Clerk of the Crown reads the Letter.

"The 2d of June last past, his most christian majesty offered me most generously his friendship, and the use of his purse, to the assistance against the designs of my enemies and his: and protested unto me, that his interest and mine were so clearly linked together, that those that opposed the one, should be looked upon as enemies to the other; and told me moreover his opinion of my lord Arlington, and the parliament; which is, That he is of opinion that neither the one nor the other is in his interest or mine: And thereupon he desired me to make such propositions as I should think fit in this conjuncture.

"All was transacted by the means of Father Ferrier, who made use of Sir William Throckmorton, who is an honest man, and of truth, who was then at Paris, and had held correspondence with Coleman, one of my family, in whom I have great confidence.

"I was much satisfied to see his most christian majesty altogether of my opinion, so I made him answer the 29th of June, by the same means he made use of to write to me, that is, by Coleman, who addressed himself to Father Ferrier (by the forementioned knight), and entirely agreed to his most christian majesty, as well to what had respect to the union of our interests, as the usefulness of my lord Arlington, and the parliament, in order to the service of the king my brother, and his most christian majesty; and that it was necessary to make use of our joint and utmost credits, to prevent the success of those evil designs, resolved on by the lord Arlington and the parliament, against his most christian majesty and myself; which, of my side, I promise really to perform: of which, since that time, I have given reasonable good proof.

"Moreover I made some proposals, which I thought necessary to bring to pass what we were obliged to undertake, assuring him, That nothing could so firmly establish our interest with the king my brother, as that very same offer of the help of his purse; by which means I had much reason to hope I should be enabled to persuade to the dissolving of the parliament, and to make void the designs of my lord Arlington, who works incessantly to advance the interest of the prince of Orange and the Hollanders, and to lessen that of the king your master, notwithstanding all the protestations he hath made to this hour to render him service.

“But as that, which was proposed, was at a stand by reason of the sickness of Father Ferrier, so our affairs succeeded not according to our designs; only Father Ferrier wrote to me, the 15th of the last month, That he had communicated those propositions to his most christian majesty, and that they had been very well liked of; but as they contained things that had regard to the catholic religion, and to the offer and use of his purse, he gave me to understand he did not desire I should treat with M. Rouvigny upon the first, but as to the last, and had the same time acquainted me, that M. Rouvigny had order to grant me whatsoever the conjuncture of our affairs did require; and have expected the effects of it to this very hour: But nothing being done in it, and seeing, on the other hand, that my lord Arlington and several others endeavoured by a thousand deceptions to break the good intelligence which is between the king my brother, his most christian majesty, and myself, to the end they might deceive us all three; I have thought fit to advertise you of all that is past, and desire of you your assistance and friendship to prevent the rogueries of those, who have no other design than to betray the concerns of France and England also, and who by their pretended service are the occasion they succeed not.

“As to any thing more, I refer you to sir William Throckmorton, and Coleman, whom I have commanded to give an account of the whole state of our affair, and of the true condition of England, with many others, and principally my lord Arlington’s endeavours, to represent to you quite otherwise than it is.

“The two first I mention to you are firm to my interest, so that you may treat with them without any apprehension.”

Serj. Maynard. Gentlemen of the Jury, pray observe that he takes upon him to prepare a letter, and that in the duke’s name, but contrary to the duke’s knowledge or privacy; for when he had so much boldness as to tell him of it, the duke was angry, and rejected it. But in it we may see what kind of passages there are, he takes very much upon him in this matter. And Mr. Coleman must keep the secret too.

Att. Gen. My Lord, I have but one paper more to read, and I have kept it till the last; because if we had proved nothing by witnesses, or not read any thing but this, this one letter is sufficient to maintain the charge against him: It plainly appears to whom it was directed and at what time. It begins thus (I sent your reverence a tedious long letter on our 29th of September). I only mention this, to shew about what time it was sent. There are some clauses in it will speak better than I can. Sir Thomas Doleman and sir Philip Floyd swear he hath confessed and owned it to be his handwriting. I desire the letter may be read.

Clerk of the Crown reads the Letter.

“Sir; I sent your reverence a tedious long letter on our 29th Sept. to inform you of the progress of affairs for these two or three last years; I having now again the opportunity of a very sure hand to convey this by, I have sent you a cypher, because our parliament now drawing on, I may possibly have occasion to send you something which you may be willing enough to know, and may be necessary for us that you should, when we may want the conveniency of a messenger. When any thing occurs of more concern, other than which may not be fit to be trusted even to a cypher alone, I will, to make such a thing more secure, write in lemon between the lines of a letter, which shall have nothing in it visible, but what I care not who sees, but dried by a warm fire, shall discover what is written; so that if the letter comes to your hands, and upon drying it any thing appears more than did before, you may be sure no body has seen it by the way. I will not trouble you with that way of writing, but upon special occasions, and then I will give you a hint to direct you to look for it, by concluding my visible letter with something of fire; or burning, by which mark you may please to know, that there is something underneath, and how my letter is to be used to find it out.

“We have here a mighty work upon our hands, no less than the conversion of three kingdoms, and by that perhaps the utter subduing of a pestilent heresy, which has dominated over great part of this Northern world a long time; there were never such hopes of success since the death of our queen Mary, as now in our days: When God has given us a prince, who is become (may I say a miracle) zealous of being the author and instrument of so glorious a work; but the opposition we are sore to meet with, is also like to be great: So that it imports us to get all the aid and assistance we can, for the harvest is great, and the labourers but few. That which we rely upon most, next to God Almighty’s providence, and the favour of my master the Duke, is the mighty mind of his most Christian majesty, whose generous soul inclines him to great undertakings, which being managed by your reverence’s exemplary piety and prudence, will certainly make him look upon this as most suitable to himself, and best becoming his power and thoughts; so that I hope you will pardon me, if I be very troublesome to you upon this occasion, from whom I expect the greatest help we can hope for. I must confess I think his Christian majesty’s temporal interest is so much attracted to that of his royal highness (which can never be considerable, but upon the growth and advancement of the catholic religion) that his ministers cannot give him better advice, even in a politic sense, abstracting from the considerations of the next world, that of our blessed Lord, 'to seek first the kingdom of heaven, and the righteousness thereof, that all other things may be added unto him.' That I know his most Christian majesty has more powerful motives suggested to him by his own devotion, and your reverence's zeal for God's glory, to engage him to afford us the best help he can in our present circumstances. But we are a little unhappy in this, that we cannot press his majesty by his present minister here upon these latter arguments (which are most strong), but only upon the first, Mr. Rouvigny's sense and ours differing very much upon them, though we agree perfectly upon the rest: And, indeed, though he be a very able man, as to his master's service, in things where religion is not concerned; yet I believe it were much more happy (considering the posture he is now in), that his temper were of such a sort, that we might deal clearly with him throughout, and not be forced to stop short in a discourse of consequence, and leave the most material part out, because we know it would shock his particular opinion, and so perhaps meet with dislike and opposition, though never so necessary to the main concern. I am afraid we shall find too much reason for this complaint in this next session of parliament: For had we had one here from his most Christian majesty, who had taken the whole business to heart, and who would have represented the state of our case truly, as it is, to his master, I do not doubt but his most Christian majesty would have engaged himself further in the affair than at present I fear he has done, and by his approbation have given such counsels as have been offered to his royal highness by those few catholics who have access to him, and who are bent to serve him and advance the catholic religion with all their might, and might have more credit with his royal highness than I fear they have found, and have assisted them also with his purse as far as 10,000 crowns, or some such sum (which to him is very inconsiderable, but would have been to them of greater use than can be imagined), towards gaining others to help them, or at least not to oppose them. If we had been so happy as to have had his most Christian majesty with us to this degree, I would have answered with my life for such success this session, as would have put the interest of the catholic religion, his royal highness and his most Christian majesty, out of all danger for the time to come. But wanting those helps of recommending those necessary counsels, which have been given his royal highness in such manner as to make him think them worth his accepting, and fit to govern himself by; and of those advantages, which a little money, well managed, would have gained us; I am afraid we shall not be much better at the end of this session than we are now. I pray God we do not lose ground. By my next, which will be drawing, I shall be able to tell your reverence more particularly, what we are like to expect.

In the mean time I most humbly beg your holy prayers for all our undertakings, and that you will be pleased to honour me so far as to send me what I am entirely, and without any reserve,

Moa très Reverend Pere, de votre R.

Le plus humble, plus obeissant serviteur.

[Several other Letters were read, but because of prolixity they are omitted, these being most material.]

Att. Gen. I have done with my evidence; we need no more proof against him.

Pris. My Lord, I would, if your lordship please, very faintly ask of Mr. Oates (because he was pleased to say he was present with me in May or April), whether he knows the particular days of the months.

[Here Mr. Oates (who being tired, withdrew to rest himself) was called, and the prisoner was asked, whether he would speak with Bedloe, but he desired not to speak with him.]

Oates. The consult that was held in May New-stile, is April Old-stile; it was within a day, or two, or three of the consult?

Pris. Where was the consult?

Oates. It was begun at the White-Horse Tavern; then they did adjourn it to several clubs and companies, and you came two or three days after the consult to the Provincial's chamber, we then desiring to go out of town.

Pris. Was you there, and who else?

Oates. There was the provincial, and Micho and Strange the old provincial, and Keins your companion.

Pris. What day of August was that at the Savoy?

Oates. I cannot swear the particular day of the month, I cannot so far charge my memory.

The result at the consult in May was, that Pickering and Groves should go on in their attempt to assassinate the person of his majesty, by shooting or otherwise. Mr. Coleman knew of this, and said, it was a good design.

L. C. J. Who was there? Was Mr. Coleman with them at the consultation?

Oates. No, my lord; but two or three days after the consultation, he was at Wild-House, and there he expressed that he approved of it.

L. C. J. Did he consent to it?

Oates. He did consent to it.

Just. Wild. Did he use no words about it?

Oates. He did shew his approbation of it. But in those instructions, that were brought to Ashby, he did say it was a very good proposition, but he thought the reward was too little.

L. C. J. Did he use any words to declare his assent?

Oates. Two things he couched in the question, whether your lordship means the consult; or the instructions he did approve of.

L. C. J. How long after the consultation was it that he approved of it?

Oates. It was two or three days before he did give his approbation.

Just. Wild. What words did he say?

Oates. He did express his consent; but to say the very words, I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Will you ask him any more?

Pris. I would know the day in August?

L. C. J. He saith he doth not remember the day.

Oates. I believe, I will not be positive in it, it was about the 21st day of August.

Just. Wild. and Just. Jones. Was it in August Old-stile?

Oates. Yes.

Pris. I can prove I was in Warwickshire at that time. That day he guesseth, the 21st of August, I can make it appear I was fourscore miles off.

L. C. J. You will do well to prove you was there when the guinea was given. Will you ask any more?

Pris. No.

L. C. J. You may say as you will, but Mr. Oates doth charge, that expressly in August (according to the English stile) you were at this Wild-House, and that he saw fourscore pounds prepared. You, Mr. Coleman, asked the question, what preparations were made for the men going to Windsor? It was answered, fourscore pounds are prepared: and yourself gave a guinea for expedition. It is a hard matter to press a man to tell the precise day of the month, but positively he doth say it was in August.

Pris. I was two and twenty or three and twenty days in August in Warwickshire.

L. C. J. What have you now more to say?

Pris. My Lord, I never saw Mr. Oates but in the council-chamber, I never saw him in Rome, in other parts I never saw the face of him, or knew him in my whole life; nor did I see the other till now in court, as I hope to be saved. And then, my lord, as to their testimony, neither of them swear the self same fact.

L. C. J. No man shall be guilty if denial shall make him innocent: they swear to the fact of killing the king, both of them, and that's enough. If one saith you have a plot to poison, that is killing the king; and the other swears a plot to shoot, or stab him, that is to the killing of the king also: then there is your own undertaking, in your letter, under your hand.

Pris. For treason (with submission to your lordship), I hope there is none in that, though there are very extravagant expressions in it. I hope some expressions explain it, that it was not my design to kill the king.

L. C. J. No, your design was for the conversion of three kingdoms, and subduing of that hereby that had reigned so long in this northern part of the world: and for effecting whereof, there were never more hopes since our queen Mary's time till now, and therefore pressing the king of France, to use his power? aid and assistance? and does this signify nothing?

Pris. Doth aid and assistance signify more than money? the word aid in French is power, they are promiscuous words.

L. C. J. You are charged to have had a correspondency and agency with foreign power to subvert our religion, and bring in foreign authority and power upon us, which must be the necessary consequence: How can this be proved plainer than by your letter, to press the French king that he would use his power?

Pris. Consider the contexture and connection of things, whether the whole series be not to make the king and the duke (as far as I thought in my power) as great as could be.

L. C. J. How well or ill you excuse the fault, that is not the question; they relate to the duke most of them, little to the king. You were carrying on such a design, that you intended to put the duke in the head off, in such method and ways as the duke himself would not approve, but rejected.

Pris. Do not think I would throw any thing upon the duke. Though I might (in the beginning of it) possibly make use of the duke's name, it is possible (they say I did), but can any imagine the people will lay down money 200,000*l.* or 20,000*l.* with me upon the duke's name, and not know whether the duke be in it? And consequently nobody will imagine the duke would ever employ any sum to this king's prejudice or disservice while he lived. I take it for granted (which sure none in the world will deny), that the law was ever made immediately subject to the king or duke: and consequently to the duke, I cannot think this will ever be expounded by the law of England, or the jury, to be treason.

L. C. J. What a kind of way and talking is this? You have such a swimming way of melting words, that it is a troublesome thing for a man to collect matter out of them. You give yourself up to be a great negotiator in the altering of kingdoms, you would be great with mighty men for that purpose; and your long discourses and great abilities might have been spared. The thing these letters do seem to import, is this, That your design was to bring in popery into England, and to promote the interest of the French king in this place, for which you hoped to have a pension (that is plain). The duke's name is often mentioned, that is true; sometimes it appears it is against his will, and sometimes he might know of it, and be told that the consequence was not great. Now say you these sums of money and all that was done, it did relate to the king or duke, and it was to advance their interest, and you thought it was the way to do it. How can this advance them, unless it were done to do them service? And if they do not consent to it, and how can this be treason, what kind of stuff is this? You do seem to be a mighty agent, might not you for a colour use the duke of York's name to drive on the Catholic cause, which you was driven to by the priests mightily, and think to get 200,000*l.* advance money, and a pension for yourself, and make yourself somebody for the present, and secretary of state for the future? If you will make any defence for yourself, or call in witnesses, we will hear them; Say what you can; for these vain inconsequential discourses signify nothing.

Pris. I have witnesses to prove I was in Warwickshire.

L. C. J. (to Boatman a witness). Where was Mr. Coleman in August last?

Boatman. In Warwickshire.

L. C. J. How long?

Boatman. All August, to my best remembrance.

L. C. J. Can you say that he was in Warwickshire all August? that he was not at London?

Boatman. I am not certain what time of the month he was in London.

L. C. J. That he was there in August, may be very true; I do not ask how long he was in Warwickshire, but was he no where else? (To which the witness could make no positive answer.)

Pris. I was at lord Denby's, and at Mr. Francis Fisher's; I was there at least 20 days.

L. C. J. Have you any more witnesses?

Pris. None.

L. C. J. If you have a mind to say any thing more, say what you can.

Pris. I can say nothing more than what I have said. Positively I say, and upon my salvation, I never saw these witnesses, Oates but once, and Bedlow never before.

Mr. Solicitor General, (Sir Francis Winton):

May it please your Lordship, and 'you Gentlemen of the Jury; The cause before you (I dare adventure to say) is a cause of as great a nature, and includes as great crimes, as ever came to this bar.

It is not a cause of a particular treason, but it is a treason that runs to the whole; the king, the government, and the Protestant religion, all are comprehended in it.

The defence the prisoner has made is so very short and of so slight a nature, that I shall contract myself very much in what I had to say, and only state to the Court, and Jury, the principal things I rely upon.

The first crime laid in the indictment, is the design of killing and destroying the royal person of his majesty. The second, the subverting of the government, and in doing that, the destruction of the protestant religion.

And these treasons have been punctually proved, as well by two witnesses, as by letters under Mr. Coleman's own hand, whereby he corresponded with M. La Chaise, the French king's confessor, as also by the answers which were sent by M. La Chaise to Mr. Coleman.

As to the proofs made by the witnesses, the substance of them is this: Mr. Oates swears, that in April last O. S., and May N. S., there was a general consult or meeting of the Jesuits, at the White-Horse tavern in the Strand; and afterwards they divided themselves into several companies, or clubs; and in those consults they conspired the death of the king; and contrived how to effect it. The manner of it was this (as Mr. Oates positively swears): That Oates and Pickering were employed to murder the king; and their design was to pistol him in St. James's Park. Grove was to have 1,500^l in money, and Pickering (being a priest) was to have 30,000 masses, which was computed to be of equal value to 1,500^l. according to the usual price in the church of Rome. And this conspiracy and contrivance Mr. Coleman was privy to, and did well approve of the same, as Mr. Oates affirmeth upon his oath. So that here is a plain treason proved upon the prisoner, by his assenting to the fact to be done, the law not allowing any accessaries in treason. And this in law makes the prisoner as guilty as any of the assassins, who designed to kill the king with their own hands.

If this design should fail, Mr. Oates swears, that the conspirators intended a further attempt upon the royal person of the king, when he should be at Windsor; and four Irish assassins were provided by Dr. Fogarty, whose names he would not tell, and fourscore guineas were provided by Father Harcourt, a Jesuit, to maintain the assassins at Windsor, till they should have effected their wicked design.

While the conspiracy was thus in agitation, Mr. Coleman, the prisoner, went to visit Harcourt the Jesuit at his house in town; but finding him not at home, and being informed that he was at Wild-House, Mr. Coleman went thither and found him there; and Mr. Coleman asking what provision Harcourt had made for the gentlemen at Windsor; Harcourt replied, that there were fourscore guineas, which then lay upon the table, which were to be sent to them; and said, that the person who was in the room was to carry them; to which Mr. Coleman replied, he liked it very well; and gave a guinea out of his own pocket to the messenger who was to carry the money to Windsor, to encourage him to expedite the business. But in case the design of killing his majesty at Windsor should be any ways prevented, then there was a further conspiracy to destroy the king by poison. Mr. Oates swears, that in July last, Ashby (a Jesuit) brought instructions to London from Flanders, that in case Pickering and Grove could not kill the king at London, nor the four Irish assassins at Windsor, that 10,000^l. was to be proposed to sir George Wakeman to poison the king. But it did appear by the letters that passed between White the provincial (here in London) and Ashby, that Mr. Coleman said, he thought 10,000^l. was too little; and therefore thought it necessary to offer 5,000^l. more, which afterwards was assented to by the Jesuits abroad. And Mr. Oates swears, he saw letters from the provincial at London to the Jesuits at St. Omers, signifying, that sir George Wakeman had accepted of the proposition, and received 5,000^l. of the money. By which testimony of Mr. Oates, it plainly appears, that Mr. Coleman, the prisoner at the bar, was privy to the conspiracy, and aiding and abetting to the wicked and damnable design of murdering the king.

The second Witness is Mr. Bedlow, who swears that he was employed by Harcourt, the Jesuit, to carry packets of letters to M. La Chaise, the French king's confessor; and further says, he was at a consult in France, where the Plot was discoursed on for killing the king; and did bring back an answer from La Chaise to Harcourt in London; and swears particularly, that on the 24th or 25th of May, 1677, he was at Coleman's house with Father Harcourt and some other persons, where Mr. Coleman, discoursing of the great design in hand, said these words following: "That if he had a sea of blood, and an hundred lives, he would lose them all to carry on the design; and if to effect this it were necessary to destroy an hundred heretic kings he would do it." So that here is another positive oath to an act of treason committed by Mr. Coleman, in relation to the murdering the king.

The other part of the Evidence consists of Papers and Letters, which generally relate to prove the latter part of the Indictment, to wit, The extirpation of the protestant religion, and introducing of Popery, and the subverting of the government. And this appears by a Letter written by Mr. Coleman, dated 29 Sept. 1675, and sent to M. La Chaise, the French king's confessor; wherein he gives him an account of the transactions of several years before, and of the correspondence between Mr. Coleman and M. Ferrier predecessor of La Chaise; wherein he does also assert, that the true way to carry on the interest of France and the promoting of the Popish religion here in England, was to get this parliament dissolved; which (says he) had been long since effected, if 300,000*l.* could have been obtained from the French king; and that things yet were in such a posture, that if he had but 20,000*l.* sent him from France, he would be content to be a sacrifice to the utmost malice of his enemies, if the Protestant religion did not receive such a blow as it could not subsist. And the receipt of this Letter was acknowledged by M. La Chaise, in an Answer which he wrote to Mr. Coleman, dated from Paris October 23, 1675, in which he gives him thanks for his good service, in order to the promoting the Popish religion.

Several other letters have been produced and read, which were written by Mr. Coleman to M. Ferrier and others, and more particularly one letter dated August 21, 1674, written by Mr. Coleman to the pope's inter-nuncio at Brussels; wherein he says, the Design prospered so well, that he doubted not but in a little time the business would be managed, to the utter ruin of the Protestant party.

And by other letters he writes to the French king's confessor, that the assistance of his most Christian majesty is necessary, and desires money from the French king to carry on the design.

But there is one letter without date, more bloody than all the rest, which was written to M. La Chaise in some short time after the long letter of Sept. 29, 1675, wherein among many other things, Coleman expresses himself: "We have a mighty work upon our hands, no less than the conversion of three kingdoms, and the utter subduing of a pestilent heresy, which hath for some time domineered over this Northern part of the world; and we never had so great hopes of it since our queen Mary's days." And in the conclusion of the letter he implores M. La Chaise to get all the aid and assistance he can from France, and that next to God Almighty they did rely upon the mighty mind of his most Christian majesty, and therefore did hope La Chaise would procure money and assistance from him.

Now, any man that considers the contents of these Letters, must needs agree that the latter part of the Indictment, to wit, the treason of endeavouring the subverting the government and the Protestant religion, is fully proved upon Mr. Coleman, the prisoner at the bar; and that these letters were written by him, and the answers received, he does not deny. But all he has to say for himself, is, that it was to make the king of England great; whereas the contrary is most manifest, because the Jesuits who love force and tyranny, always adhere to those princes that are greatest in strength and power. For it appears in history, that when the house of Austria were in their greatness, and like to arrive to the universal monarchy in these parts of the world, the Jesuits all adhered to that house: but since the French king hath grown more mighty in power and greatness, they declined the interest of the Austrian family, and do now promote the counsels of France, thinking that now that king will become the universal monarch.

I shall therefore now conclude the Evidence, only observing to the jury, that the several treasons in the indictment are fully proved. The first, as to the destruction of the royal person of the king, by two witnesses, Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow; the other part of it, viz. the subversion of the government, and extirpation of the Protestant religion, by the several letters which have been before remembered, which have not been denied by the prisoner to be his. Therefore I hope, gentlemen, that when you meet with offenders that are guilty of such stupendous crimes, you will do justice upon them, which will be great comfort and satisfaction to the king and all his good Protestant subjects.

Serj. Pemberton. Gentlemen, you hear the crime is of the highest nature, it is the subversion of three kingdoms, and the subduing of that religion which he defames by the name of 'Pestilent Heresy.' It concerns us all to look about us, and all the kingdom, when there shall be a design managed in this manner, to destroy our king, and to take away our religion, and to enslave us all to the pope, and make us all truckle to the priests.

It is wonderful it is capable (at this day) of so great evidence, there is Digitus Dei in it, or else it would be impossible such a thing should be made so manifest: all the rest that is said in the Indictment are but circumstances that declare it : there is a strong evidence of many matters of fact in this design, which declare the intention hatched in his breast for many years together : here hath been a design to kill the king, and he doth not only consent to it, but commend it; what can be said to his giving the money to him that was to pay the spursore pieces of gold to those ruffians sent to Windsor? and adding 5,000*l.* to the 10,000*l.* for the doctor that was to poison the king? He denies all.

No question but a man that hath had a heart to design such contrivances, will have the face to deny it publicly : it is a thing to be acted in the dark. But there is both Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow plainly prove it upon him, that he consented to the acting the king's death. What is the sense of his letters, but to shew his design, and to beg the assistance of France to them in their necessities? The whole current is to destroy our religion, I think you, gentlemen of the jury, have had such evidence as will satisfy any man.

Prisoner. I deny all Mr. Oates's testimony, for his saying to the council he did not know me because he could not see me, when I was as near as the next gentleman but one, but knew me when I spake, and I spoke to almost all the matters asked. He accuseth me of a thing in August, but names not the day : now if there be one error in his testimony, it weakens all the rest. I went out of town on the 10th of August, it was the latter end I came home, about the middle of Bartholomew fair, the last day of August.

L. C. J. Have you any witness to prove that?

Pris. I cannot say I have a witness.

L. C. J. Then you say nothing.

Pris. People cannot speak to a day, to a thing they neither imagined or thought of.

L. C. J. I ask your servant, do you know when Mr. Coleman went out of town?

Coleman's Serv. In August; I cannot say particularly the day.

L. C. J. Do you know when he came home?

Serv. I cannot remember.

Just. Wyld. Where was you the last Bartholomew-day?

Serv. I was in town.

Just. Wyld. Where was your master?

Serv. I do not remember.

L. C. J. You say you went out of town the 10th, and came home the last of August; you say it is impossible that he should say right, but yet you do not prove it.

Pris. I have no more to say but I entered down all my expences every day in a book, which book will shew where I was.

L. C. J. Where is your book?

Pris. At my lodgings in Vere-Street by Covent-Garden; in a trunk that came by the carrier, that will shew when they were sent.

L. C. J. If the cause did turn upon that matter, I would be well content to sit until the book was brought; but I doubt the cause will not stand upon that foot; but if that were the case it would do you little good. Observe what I say to the jury.

VOL. VII.

My Lord Chief Justice his Speech to the Jury upon his summing up of the Evidence.

Gentlemen of the jury; my care at this time shall be to contract this very long evidence, and to bring it within a short compass, that you may have nothing before you to consider of, as near as I can, but what is really material to the acquitting or condemning of Mr. Coleman.

The things he is accused of are two sorts; the one is, to subvert the Protestant religion and to introduce Popery: the other was to destroy and kill the king. The evidence likewise was of two sorts; the one by letters of his own hand-writing, and the other by Witnesses viva voce. The former he seems to confess, the other totally to deny.

For that he confesseth, he does not seem to insist upon it, that the letters were not his, he seems to admit they were; and he rather makes his defence by expounding what the meaning of these letters were, than by denying himself to be the author.

I would have you take me right, when I say he doth admit; he doth not admit the construction, that the king's counsel here makes upon them; but he admits that these letters were his. He admits it so far, that he does not deny them. So that you are to examine what these letters import in themselves, and what consequences are naturally to be deduced from them.

That which is plainly intended, is to bring in the Roman Catholic, and to subvert the Protestant Religion. That which is by consequence intended, was the killing the king, as being the most likely means to introduce that, which, as it is apparent by his letters, was designed to be brought in.

For the first part of the Evidence. All his great long letter that he wrote, was to give the present confessor of the French king an account of what had passed between him and his predecessor; by which agency, you may see that Mr. Coleman was in with the former confessor.

And when he comes to give an account of the three years transactions to this present confessor, and to begin a correspondence with him, about what is it? Why, the substance of the heads of the long Letter comes to this. It was to bring in the Catholic as he called it, (that is) the Romish Catholic religion, and to establish that here; and to advance an interest for the French king, be that interest what it will.

It is true his letters do not express what sort of interest, neither will I determine: but they say it was to promote the French king's interest, which Mr. Coleman would expound in some such sort, as may consist with the king of England's and the duke of York's interest. But this is certain, it was to subvert our religion, as it is now by law established. This was the great end thereof, it cannot be denied: to promote the interest, I say, of the French king, and to gain to himself a pension as a reward of his service, is the contents of his first long letter, and one or two more concerning that pension.

His last letters expound more plainly what was meant by the French king's interest. "We are" (saith he) "about a great work, no less than the conversion of three kingdoms, and the total and utter subversion and subduing of that pestilent heresy" (that is the Protestant Religion) "which hath reigned so long in this Northern part of the world; and for the doing of which, there never was such great hopes since our queen Mary's days, as at this time."

Now this plainly shews, that our religion was to be subverted, Popery established, and the three kingdoms to be converted; that is, indeed, to be brought to confusion. For I say, that when our religion is to be subverted, the nation is to be subverted and destroyed, that is most apparent: for there could be no hope of subverting or destroying the Protestant religion, but by a subversion and conversion of the three kingdoms. How was it to be done otherwise? Why, I would have brought this religion in (says he) by dissolving of the parliament. I would have brought it in by an edict and proclamation of Liberty of Conscience. In these ways I would have brought it in.

Mr. Coleman knows it is not fit for him to own the introducing of his religion by the murder of the king, or by a foreign force. The one was too black and the other too bloody, to be owned. And few people (especially the English) will be brought to save their lives (as he may do his) by confession of so bloody and barbarous a thing, as an intention to kill the king, or of levying a war; which, though it be not a particular, is a general murder. I say, it was not convenient for Mr. Coleman, when he seems to speak something for himself, to give such an account, how he would have done it; Therefore he tells us, he would have done it by the dissolving of the parliament and by toleration of religion. Now I would very fain know of any man in the world, whether this was not a very fine and artificial covering of his design for the subversion of our religion?

Pray, how can any man think, that the dissolving of the parliament could have such a mighty influence to that purpose? it is true, he might imagine it might in some sort contribute towards it: yet it is so doubtful, that he himself mistrusts it. For he is sometimes for the dissolving of the parliament, and other times not, as appears by his own papers: for which we are not beholden to him, so much as for any one, more than what were found by accident, and produced to the king and council. But in truth, why should Mr. Coleman believe that another parliament (if this parliament were dissolved) should comply with Popery; that is to say, That there should be great hopes of bringing in of Popery by a new parliament?

unless he can give me a good reason for this, I shall hold it as insignificant and as unlikely to have that effect, as his other way by a general toleration.

And therefore next, Upon what ground does he presume this? I do assure you, that man does not understand the inclinations of the English people, or knows their tempers, that thinks, if they were left to themselves and had their liberty, they would turn Papists. It is true, there are some amongst us that have so little wit as to turn Fanatics, but there is hardly any, but have much more wit than to turn Papists. These are therefore the counterfeit pretensions of Mr. Coleman.

Now, if not by these means, in what way truly did he intend to bring in Popery? why, his own letters plainly convict him of one step towards it, in endeavouring with foreign powers to bring in that religion, and to subvert ours. And for the other way of doing it, by killing the king; I leave it to you whether there were any more probable way than that indeed to do it.

And could he think, that the French king would not have thought himself cozened of his money, if he had not given him hopes that he would use the most probable methods that he could, to effect his design?

Therefore, there must be more in it: for he that was so earnest for that religion, would not have stuck at any violence to bring it in; he would not have stuck at blood. For we know their doctrines and their practices, and we know well, with what zeal the priests push them forward to venture their own lives, and to take away other mens, that differ from them, to bring in their religion, and to set up themselves. For indeed in the kingdoms and countries where Popery reigns, the priests have dominion over men's consciences, and power over their purses. And they use all arts imaginable of making proselytes, and take special care, that those in their communion shall know no more than the priests shall give them leave to understand. And for this reason they prohibit the use of all books without their licence. This blind obedience begets blind ignorance, and this is a great subtily of theirs to keep them in it, that they may perfectly submit to them.

What cannot they command, when they have made others slaves in their understandings, and that they must know no more, than what they give them leave to know? but in England it is not so, Mr. Coleman; and therein you would have found a great disappointment. For if liberty of conscience had been tolerated here, that the consequence of it would have been Popery, I deny.

Nothing is more unlikely; for though in the short reign of queen Mary, Popery came in for some time, which was but for a little time, and then the people were not so well grounded in the Protestant religion, nor in the principles of it; but now they are, inasmuch, that scarce a cobbler but is able to baffle any Roman priest that ever I saw or met with. And thanks be to God we have a preaching ministry, and the free use of the Scriptures allowed amongst us, which they are not permitted to have.

And after this I wonder, that a man, who hath been bred up in the Protestant religion (as I have reason to believe that you Mr. Coleman have been,) for (if I am not misinformed) your father was a minister in Suffolk; for such an one to depart from it, is an evidence against you, to prove the Indictment. I must make a difference between us, and those who have been always educated that way, and so are under the prepossession of their education, which is a difficult thing to be overcome.

And I do assure you, there are but two things, that I know of, can make one do it, interest, or gross ignorance. No man of understanding, but for by-ends, would have left his religion to be a Papist. And for you, Mr. Coleman, who are a man of reason and subtility, I must tell you (to bring this to yourself) upon this account, that it could not be conscience, I cannot think it to be conscience. Your pension was your conscience, and your Secretary's place your bait.

For such men (I say) as have been bred up in the Protestant religion, and left it, I can hardly presume that they do it out of conscience, unless they do it upon a mighty search, not leaning upon their own understanding and abilities, not hearing of one side alone. Conscience is a tender thing, conscience will tremble when it leaves the religion it has been bred in, and its sincerity is shown by being fearful, lest it should be in the wrong. No man may pretend to conscience truly, that takes not all courses imaginable to know the right, before he lets his religion slip from him.

Have we so soon forgot our reverence to the late king, and the pious advice he left us? A king that was truly a Defender of the Faith, not only by his title, but by his abilities and writings. A king, who understood the Protestant religion so well, that he was able to defend it against any of the cardinals of Rome. And when he knew it so thoroughly, and died so eminently for it, I will leave this characteristic note, That whosoever after that departs from his judgment, had need have a very good one of his own, to bear him out.

I do acknowledge, many of the popish priests formerly were learned men, and may be so still; beyond the seas: but I could never yet meet with any here, that had other learning or ability but artificial only, to delude weak women, and weaker men. They have, indeed, ways of conversion, and conviction, by enlightening our understandings with a faggot, and by the powerful and irresistible arguments of a dagger: But these are such wicked solemnities in their religion, that they seem to have left them neither natural sense, nor natural conscience, not natural sense, by their absurdity, in so unreasonable a belief, as of the wine turned into blood: Not natural conscience, by their cruelty, who make the Protestants blood as wine, and these priests thirst after it; 'Tantum religio potuit suadere malo- rum?'

Mr. Coleman, in one of his letters, speaks of routing out 'our religion and party;' And he is in the right, for they can never root out the Protestant religion, but they must kill the Protestants. But let him and them know, if ever they shall endeavour to bring popery in, by destroying of the king, they shall find, that the papists will thereby bring destruction upon themselves, so that not a man of them would escape—'Ne Cutulus quidem relinquendus.' Our execution shall be as quick as their gunpowder, but more effectual. And so, gentlemen, I shall leave it to you, to consider, what his Letters prove him guilty of directly, and what by consequence; What he plainly would have done, and then, how he would have done it; And whether you think his fiery zeal had so much cold blood in it, as to spare any others? For the other part of the Evidence, which is by the testimony of the present witnesses, you have heard them. I will not detain you longer now, the day is going out.

Mr. J. Jones. You must find the prisoner guilty, or bring in two persons perjured.

L. C. J. Gentlemen, If your consultation shall be long, then you must lie by it all night, and we will take your verdict to-morrow morning. If it will not be long, I am content to stay a while.

Jury. My lord, we shall be short.

J. Wyld. We do not speak to you to make more haste, or less, but to take a full consultation, and your own time; There is the death of a man at the stake, and make not too much haste. We do not speak it on that account.

The Jury went from the bar, and returned.

Court. Are you all agreed of your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Court. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. The foreman.

Court. Edward Coleman, hold up thy hand?

Court. Is Edward Coleman Guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?—Jury. Guilty, my lord.

Court. What goods, chatels, &c.

Prisoner. You were pleased to say to the jury, that they must either bring me in Guilty, or two persons perjured; I am a dying man, and upon my death, and expectation of salvation, declare, That I never saw these two gentlemen, excepting Mr. Oates, but once in all my life, and that was at the council table.

L. C. J. Mr. Coleman, your own papers are enough to condemn you.

Court. Capt. Richardson, you must bring Mr. Coleman hither again to-morrow morning to receive his Sentence.

The Day following, being November the 28th, Mr. Coleman was brought to the Bar, to receive his Sentence, and the Court proceeded thereupon as followeth:

L. C. J. Ask him what he can say for himself: Make silence, crier.

Cl. of Cr. Edward Coleman, hold up thy hand. Thou hast been indicted of high treason, thou hast thereunto pleaded Not Guilty; thou hast put thyself upon God and thy country, which country hath found thee Guilty; What canst thou say for thyself, wherefore judgment of death should not be given against thee, and an execution awarded according to law?

Mr. Coleman. May it please you, my lord, I have this to say for myself; As for my papers, I humbly hope, (setting aside Oral Testimony) that I should not have been found guilty of any crime in them, but what the act of grace would have pardoned, and I hope I shall have the benefit of that; The evidence against me, namely Oral, I do humbly beg that you would be pleased to give me a little time to shew you, how impossible it is that those testimonies should be true; For that testimony of Mr. Oates in August, my man, that is now either in the court or hall, hath gotten a book that is able to make it appear, that I was out of town from the 15th of August to the 31st of August late at night.

L. C. J. That will not do, Mr. Coleman.

Coleman. I do humbly offer this, for this reason; because Mr. Oates, in all his other evidences, was so punctual, as to distinguish between Old Stile and New, he never missed the month, hardly the week, and oftentimes put the very day; for his testimony that he gave against me, was, that it was the 21st of August.

L. C. J. He thought so, but he was not positive, but only as to the month.

Coleman. He was certain it was the latter end of August, and that about Bartholomew-tide.

L. C. J. He conceived so, he thought so.

Coleman. Now if I was always out of town from the 15th day of August, to the 31st late at night, it is then impossible, my lord, that should be a true testimony. Your lordship was pleased to observe, that it would much enervate any man's testimony, to the whole, if he could be proved false in any one thing. I have further in this matter to say, besides my man's testimony, the king hath, since I have been seized on, seized on my papers and my book of accounts, where I used punctually to set down where I spent my money; and if it doth not appear by that book that I was all those days and times, and several other days in August, to be out of town, I desire no favour. You cannot suppose, my lord, nor the world believe, that I prepared that book for this purpose in this matter; and I can make it appear by others, if I had time; but I only offer this to your lordship, that seeing Mr. Oates did name so many particulars and circumstances, it is very strange, that he should fail in a particular of such importance as about killing the king; and no man living of common sense would think or believe that I should speak about such a thing in company that I did not well know, and this to be done frequently and oftentimes, as he asserts it; when Oates seemed to the king and council (and I believe the king himself rememberebers it) when I was examined, that he did not know me, that he knew nothing of me, so that here is two things against this witness that can hardly happen again.—My circumstances are extraordinary, and it is a great providence, and I think your lordship and the whole world will look upon it as such, if for any crimes that are in my papers, if there be any mercy to be shewed me by the king's gracious act of pardon, I humbly beg that I may have it.

L. C. J. None.

Coleman. If none, I do humbly submit; but I do humbly hope with submission, that those papers would not have been found treasonable papers.

L. C. J. Those letters of yours, Mr. Coleman, were since the act of pardon; your papers bear date 1674, 1675, and there hath been no act since. But as for what you say concerning Mr. Oates, you say it in vain now, Mr. Coleman, for the jury hath given in their verdict, and it is not now to be said, for after that rate we shall have no end of any man's trial; but for your satisfaction, Mr. Coleman, to the best of my remembrance, Mr. Oates was positive only as to the month of August, he thought it might be about the 21st day, or about Bartholomew fair time; but he was absolute in nothing but the month.

Coleman. He was punctual in all his other evidences, but in this he was not; and when I was examined at the council table, he said he knew little of me.

L. C. J. He charged you positively for having held conspiracy to poison the king; and that there was 10,000*l.* to be paid for it, and afterwards there was 5,000*l.* more to be added; and he positively charges you to be the person that amongst all the conspirators was reputed to pay the 5,000*l.*

Coleman. He said it after such a fashion.

L. C. J. He said it after such a fashion that sir Robert Southwell and sir Thomas Doleman satisfied us that he did the thing, and that plainly to his understanding; and what say you he said?

Coleman. That he did not know me.

L. C. J. Neither of them say so; that he said he did not know you, they deny it.

Coleman. He said so, upon my death.

L. C. J. It is in vain to dispute it further, there must be an end.

Crier, make O Yes! Our sovereign lord the king doth straitly charge and command all persons to keep silence while Judgment is given upon the prisoner convict, upon pain of imprisonment.

L. C. J. You are found guilty, Mr. Coleman, of high treason, and the crimes are several that you are found guilty of. You are found guilty of conspiring the death of the king; you are likewise found guilty of endeavouring to subvert the Protestant religion as it is by law established, and to bring in popery, and this by the aid and assistance of foreign powers. And I would not have you, Mr. Coleman, in your

Just apprehension of things, to go out of the world with a mistake, if I could help it; that is, I would not have you think, that, though you only seem to disavow the matter of the death of the king, that therefore you should think yourself an innocent man. You are not innocent, I am sure; for it is apparent by that which cannot deceive, that you are guilty of contriving and conspiring the destruction of the Protestant religion, and to bring in Popery, and that by the aid and assistance of foreign powers, and this no man can free you in the least from. And know, that if it should be true, that you would disavow, that you had not an actual hand in the contrivance of the king's death (which two witnesses have sworn positively against you): Yet he that will subvert the Protestant religion here, and bring in consequently a foreign authority, does an act in derogation of the crown, and in diminution of the king's title and sovereign power, and endeavours to bring a foreign dominion both over our consciences and estates. And if any man shall endeavour to subvert our religion to bring in that, though he did not actually contrive to do it by the death of the king, or it may be not by the death of any one man, yet whatsoever follows upon that contrivance, he is guilty of; insomuch it is greatly to be feared, that though you meant only to bring it in by the way of dissolving of parliaments, or by liberty of conscience, and such kind of innocent ways as you thought; yet if so be those means should not have proved effectual, and worse should have been taken (though by others of your confederates) for to go through with the work, as we have great reason to believe there would, you are guilty of all that blood that would have followed. But still you say you did not design that thing; but to tell you, he that doth a sinful and unlawful act, must answer, and is liable both to God and man, for all the consequences that attend it, therefore I say you ought not to think yourself innocent. It is possible you may be penitent, and nothing remains but that. And as I think in your church you allow of a thing called attrition, if you cannot with our church have contrition, which is a sorrow proceeding from love, pray make use of attrition, which is a sorrow arising from fear. For you may assure yourself, there are but a few moments betwixt you and a vast eternity where will be no dallying, no arts to be used, therefore think on all the good you can do in this little space of time that is left you; all is little enough to wipe off (besides your private and secret offences) even your public ones. I do know that confession is very much owned in your church, and you do well in it; but as your offence is public, so should your confession be; and it will do you more service than all your particular confessions. Were I in your case, there should be nothing at the bottom of my heart that I would not disclose. Perchance you may be deluded with the fond hopes of having your sentence respited. Trust not to it, Mr. Coleman. You may be flattered to stop your mouth, till they have stopped your breath, and I doubt you will find that to be the event. I think it becomes you as a man, and as a christian, to do all that is now in your power, since you cannot be white, to make yourself as clean as you can, and to fit yourself for another world, where you will see how vain all resolutions of obstinacy, of concealment, and all that sort of bravery which perhaps may be instilled by some men, will prove. They will not then serve to lessen, but they will add to your fault. It concerns us no farther than for your own good, and do as God shall direct you; for the truth is, there are persuasions and inducements in your church to such kind of resolutions and such kind of actions, which you are led into by false principles and false doctrines (and so you will find when you come once to experiment it, as shortly you will) that hardly the religion of a Turk would own. But when Christians by any violent bloody act attempt to propagate religion, they abuse both their disciples and religion too, and change that way that Christ himself taught us to follow him by. It was not by blood or violence; by no single man's undertaking to disturb and to alter governments; to make hurly-burlies, and all the mischiefs that attend such things as those are.

For a church to persuade men even to the committing of the highest violences under a pretence of doing God good service, looks not (in my opinion) like religion, but design; like an engine, not a holy institution; artificial as a clock, which follows not the sun but the setter; goes not according to the bible, but the priest, whose interpretations serve their particular ends, and those private advantages which true religion, would scorn, and natural religion itself would not endure. I have, Mr. Coleman, said thus much to you as you are a christian, and as I am one, and I do it out of great charity and compassion, and with great sense and sorrow that you should be misled to these great offences under pretence of religion. But seeing you have but a little time, I would have you make use of it to your best advantage; for I tell you, that though death may be talked of at a distance in a brave heroic way, yet when a man once comes to the minute, death is a very serious thing; then you will consider how trifling all plots and contrivances are, and to how little purpose is all your concealments. I only offer these things to your thoughts, and perhaps they may better go down at such a time as this is than at another; and if they have no effect upon you, I hope they will have some as to my own particular, in that I have done my good will. I do remember you once more, that in this matter you be not deluded with any fantastic hopes and expectations of a pardon, for the truth is, Mr. Coleman, you will be deceived; therefore set your heart at rest, for we are at this time in such disorders, and the people so continually alarmed either with secret murders, or some outrages and violences that are this day on foot, that though the king, who is full of mercy almost to a fault, yet if he should be inclined that way I verily believe both Houses would interpose between that and you. I speak this to slake off all vain hopes from you; for I tell you, I verily believe they would not you should have any twig to hold by to deceive you: so that now you may look upon it, there is nothing will save you, for you will assuredly die as now you live, and that very suddenly. In which I having discharged my conscience to you as a christian, I will now proceed to pronounce Sentence against you, and do my duty as a judge.

You shall return to prison, from thence to be drawn to the place of execution, where you shall be hanged by the neck, and be cut down alive, your bowels burnt before your face, and your quarters severed, and your body disposed of as the king thinks fit; and so the Lord have mercy upon your soul.

Coleman. My lord, I humbly thank your lordship, and I do admire your clarity, that you would be pleased to give me this admirable counsel, and I will follow it as well as I can, and I beg your lordship to hear me what I am going to say: Your lordship, most christian-like, hath observed wisely, that confession is extremely necessary to a dying man, and I do so too; but that confession your lordship I suppose means, is of a guilty evil conscience in any of these points that I am condemned for, 'Of maliciously contriving, &c. If I thought I had any such guilt, I should assuredly think myself damned now I am going out of the world by concealing them, in spite of all pardons or indulgences, or any act that the Pope or the Church of Rome could do for me, as I believe any one article of faith. Therefore pray hear the words of a dying man; I have made a resolution, I thank God, not to tell a lie, no not a single lie, not to save my life. I hope God will not so far leave me as to let me do it; and I do renounce all manner of mercy that God can shew me, if I have not told the House of Commons, or offered it to the House of Commons, all that I know in my whole heart toward this business; and I never in all my life either made any proposition, or received any proposition, or knew or heard directly or indirectly of any proposition towards the supplanting or invading the king's life, crown or dignity, or to make any invasion or disturbance to introduce any new government, or to bring in popery by any violence or force in the world; if I have, my lord, been mistaken in my method, as I will not say but I might have been; for if two men differ, one must be mistaken; therefore possibly I might be of an opinion, that popery might come in if liberty of conscience had been granted; and perhaps all Christians are bound to wish all people of that religion that they profess themselves, if they are in earnest: I will not dispute those ills that your lordship may imagine to be in the Church of Rome; if I thought there was any in them, I would be sure to be none of it. I have no design, my lord, at all in religion but to be saved; and I had no manner of invitation to invite me to the Church of Rome, no not one, but to be saved; if I am out of the way, I am out of the way, as to the next world as well as this; I have nothing but a sincere conscience, and I desire to follow it as I ought. I do confess I am guilty of many crimes, and I am afraid all of us are guilty in some measure, of some failings and infirmities; but in matters of this nature that I now stand condemned for, though I do not at all complain of the court; for I do confess I have had all the fair play imaginable, and I have nothing at all to say against it; but I say as to any one act of mine, so far as acts require intention to make them acts, as all human acts do, I am as innocent of any crime that I now stand charged as guilty of, as when I was first born.

L. C. J. That is not possible.

Coleman. With submission, I do not say innocent as to any crime in going against any act of parliament, then it is a crime to hear mass, or to do any act that they prohibit; but for intending and endeavouring to bring in that religion by the aid and assistance of the king of France, I never intended nor meant by that aid and assistance, any force in the world, but such aids and assistances as might procure us liberty of conscience. My lord, if in what I have said nobody believes me, I must be content; if any do believe me, then I have wiped off those scandalous thoughts and abominable crimes, that, &c. and then I have paid a little debt to truth.

L. C. J. One word more, and I have done. I am sorry, Mr. Coleman, that I have not charity enough to believe the words of a dying man; for I will tell you what sticks with me very much: I cannot be persuaded, and nobody can, but that your Correspondence and Negotiations did continue longer than the Letters that we have found, that is, after 1675. Now if you had come and shown us your Books and Letters, which would have spoke for themselves, I should have thought then that you had dealt plainly and sincerely, and it would have been a mighty motive to have believed the rest; for certainly your correspondence held even to the time of your apprehension, and you have not discovered so much as one paper, but what was found unknown to you, and against your will.

Coleman. Upon the words of a dying man, and upon the expectation I have of salvation, I tell your lordship, that there is not a book nor a paper in the world that I have laid aside voluntarily.

L. C. J. No, perhaps you have burnt them.

Coleman. Not by the living God.

L. C. J. I hope, Mr. Coleman, you will not say no manner of way.

Coleman. For my correspondence these two last years past, I have given an account of every letter; but those that were common letters, and those books that were in my house, what became of them I know not; they were common letters that I used to write every day, a common journal what past at home and abroad. My men they writ them out of that book.

L. C. J. What became of those letters?

Coleman. I had no letters about this business, but what I have declared to the House of Commons, that is, letters from St. Germans, which I owned to the House of Commons; and I had no methodical correspondence, and I never valued them nor regarded them, but as they came I destroyed them.

L. C. J. I remember the last letter that is given in evidence against you, discovers what mighty hopes there was, that the time was now come wherein that pestilent heresy, that hath domineered in this northern part of the world, should be extirpated; and that there never was greater hopes of it since our queen Mary's reign. Pray, Mr. Coleman, was that the concluding letter in this affair?

Coleman. Give me leave to say it upon the word of a dying man, I have not one letter, &c.

L. C. J. What though you burnt your letters, you may recollect the contents.

Coleman. I had none since—

L. C. J. Between God and your conscience be it, I have other apprehensions; and you deserve your Sentence upon you for your offences, that visibly appear out of your own papers, that you do not, and cannot deny.

Coleman. I am satisfied. But seeing my time is but short, may I not be permitted to have some immediate friends, and my poor wife to have her freedom to speak with me, and stay with me that little time that I have, that I might speak something to her in order to her living and my dying?

L. C. J. You say well, and it is a hard case to deny it; but I tell you what hardens my heart, the insolencies of your party (the Roman Catholics I mean) that they every day offer, which is indeed a proof of their Plot, that they are so bold and impudent, and such secret murders committed by them, as would harden any man's heart to do the common favours of justice and charity, that to mankind are usually done: they are so bold and insolent, that I think it is not to be endured in a Protestant kingdom; but for my own particular, I think it is a very hard thing for to deny a man the company of his wife, and his friends, so it be done with caution and prudence. Remember that the Plot is on foot, and I do not know what arts the priests have, and what tricks they use; and therefore have a care that no papers, nor any such thing, be sent from him.

Coleman. I do not design it, I am sure.

L. C. J. But for the company of his wife and his near friends; or any thing in that kind, that may be for his eternal good, and as much for his present satisfaction that he can receive now in the condition that he is in, let him have it; but do it with care and caution.

Capt. Richardson. What, for them to be private alone?

L. C. J. His wife, only she, God forbid else. Nor shall you be denied any Protestant minister.

Coleman. But shall not my cousin Coleman have liberty to come to me?

L. C. J. Yes, with Mr. Richardson.

Coleman. Or his servant; because it is a great trouble for him to attend always.

L. C. J. If it be his servant, or any he shall appoint, it is all one. Mr. Richardson, use him as reasonably as may be, considering the condition he is in.

Cler. Cr. Have a care of your prisoner.

On Tuesday the 3d of December following, Edward Coleman was drawn on a sledge from Newgate to Tyburn; and being come thither, he declared that he had been a Roman Catholic for many years, and that he thanked God he died in that religion, and he did not think that religion at all prejudicial to the king and government.

The Sheriff told him, if he had any thing to say by way of confession or contrition, he might proceed, otherwise it was not seasonable for him to go on with such like expressions. Being asked if he knew any thing of the murder of sir Edmund Godfrey, he declared upon the words of a dying man, he knew not any thing of it, for that he was a prisoner at that time. Then after some private prayers and ejaculations to himself, the sentence was executed.

He had been made to believe, that he should have a pardon, which he depended on with so much assurance, that a little before he was turned off, finding himself deceived, he was heard to say, 'There is no faith in man.'

245. The Trial of WILLIAM IRELAND, THOMAS PICKERING, and JOHN GROVE, at the Old Bailey, for High Treason: 30 CHARLES II. A. D. 1678.*

ON Tuesday the 17th day of December, 1678, Thomas White alias Whitebread, Wm. Ireland, John Fenwick, Thomas Pickering and John Grove, were brought from his majesty's gaol of Newgate to the Sessions-house at Justice-Hall in the Old Bailey, being there indicted for High Treason, for contriving and conspiring to murder the king, to receive their trial; and the Court proceeded thereupon as followeth:

The Court being sat, proclamation was made for attendance, thus:

Clerk of Crown. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O yes, O yes, O yes! All manner of persons that have any thing to do at this general sessions of the peace, sessions of Oyer and Terminer holden for the city of London, and gaol-delivery of Newgate, holden for the city of London and county of Middlesex, draw near and give your attendaunce, for now the Court will proceed to the pleas of the crown for the same city and county. God save the king.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O yes! All manner of persons are commanded to keep silence upon pain of imprisonment. Peace about the Court.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O yes! You good men of the county of Middlesex that are summoned to appear here this day, to enquire between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoners that are and shall be at the bar, answer to your names as you shall be called, every one at the first call, and save your issues.

The Jurors being called and the defaulters recorded, the Clerk of the Crown called for the prisoners to the bar, viz. Thomas White alias Whitebread, William Ireland, John Fenwick, Tho. Pickering and John Grove, and arraigned them thus:

Cl. of Cr. Thomas White alias Whitebread, hold up thy hand; Which he did. William Ireland, hold up thy hand: Which he did. John Fenwick, hold up thy hand: Which he did. Thomas Pickering, hold up thy hand: Which he did. John Grove, hold up thy hand: Which he did.

You stand indicted by the names of Thomas White alias Whitebread, late of the parish of St. Giles in the fields, in the county of Middlesex, clerk: William Ireland, late of the same parish and county, clerk: John Fenwick, late of the same parish and county, clerk: Thomas Pickering, late of the same parish and county, clerk: and John Grove, late of the same parish and county, gent. For that you five, as false traitors, &c. against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. How sayest thou, Thomas White alias Whitebread, art thou Guilty of this High Treason whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Whitebread. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Whitebread. By God and my Country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance. How sayest thou, William Ireland, art thou Guilty of the same High Treason, or Not Guilty?

Ireland. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Ireland. By God and my Country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance. How sayest thou, John Fenwick, art thou Guilty of the same High Treason, or Not Guilty?

Fenwick. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Fenwick. By God and my Country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance. How sayest thou, Thomas Pickering, art thou Guilty of the same High Treason, or Not Guilty?

Pickering. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Pickering. By God and my Country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance. How sayest thou, John Grove, art thou Guilty of the same High Treason, or Not Guilty?

Grove. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Grove. By God and my Country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance. You the prisoners at the bar, those men that you shall hear called and do personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your several lives and deaths; if therefore you or any of you will challenge them or any of them, your time is to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, before they be sworn. Sir Philip Matthews to the book.

* From a pamphlet, intitled: "The Trials of William Ireland, Thomas Pickering, and John Grove; for conspiring to Murder the King: who upon full evidence were found Guilty of High Treason, at the Sessions-House in the Old Bailey, December 17, 1678. And received Sentence accordingly. London, printed for Robert Pawlet at the Bible in Chancery-lane, near Fleet-street, 1678. December 17. 1678. I do appoint Robert Pawlet to print the Trials of William Ireland, Thomas Pickering, and John Grove: And that no other person presume to print the same. WILLIAM SCROOES."

Sir Philip Matthews. I desire sir William Roberts may be called first. Which was granted.

Cl. of Cr. Sir William Roberts to the book. Look upon the prisoners. You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoners at the bar, whom you shall have in your charge, according to your evidence. So help you God.

The same oath was administered to the rest, the prisoners challenging none, and their names in order were thus: Sir William Roberts, bt.; sir Philip Matthews, bt.; sir Charles Lee, kt.; Edward Wilford, esq.; John Foster, esq.; Joshua Galliard, esq.; John Byfield, esq.; Thomas Eglesfield, esq.; Tho. Johnson, esq.; John Pulford, esq.; Thomas Earnesby, esq.; Richard Wheeler, gent.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, count these. Sir William Roberts.

Crier. One, &c.

Cl. of Cr. Richard Wheeler.

Crier. Twelve good men and true, stand together and hear your evidence.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O yes! If any one can inform my Lords the king's Justices, the king's Serjeant, the king's Attorney, or this Inquest now to be taken between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoners at the bar, let them come forth and they shall be heard, for now the prisoners stand at the bar upon their deliverance: and all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence against any of the prisoners at the bar, let them come forth and give their evidence, or else they forfeit their recognizance. And all jurymen of Middlesex that have been summoned and have appeared, and are not sworn, may depart the court and take their ease.

Cl. of Cr. Make proclamation of silence.

Crier. O yes! All manner of persons are commanded to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment.

Cl. of Cr. Thomas White alias Whitebread, hold up thy hand: Which he did, and so of the rest. You that are sworn, look upon the prisoners, and hearken to their cause.

You shall understand, that they stand indicted by the names of Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, late of the parish of St. Giles in the Fields in the county of Middlesex, clerk; William Ireland, late of the same parish in the county aforesaid, clerk; John Fenwick, late of the same parish in the county aforesaid, clerk; Thomas Pickering, late of the same parish in the county aforesaid, clerk; and John Grove, late of the same parish in the county aforesaid, gentleman: For that they as false traitors of the most illustrious, serene, and most excellent prince, our sovereign lord Charles 2, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. their supreme and natural lord, not having the fear of God in their hearts, nor the duty of their allegiance any ways weighing, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, the cordial love, and true, due, and natural obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king towards our said sovereign lord the king should and of right ought to bear, altogether withdrawing, and endeavouring, and with their whole strength intending, the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom of England to disturb, and the true worship of God within this kingdom of England used, and by law established, to overthrow; and to move, stir up, and procure rebellion within this kingdom of England, and the cordial love, and true and due obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king toward our said sovereign lord the king should and of right ought to bear, wholly to withdraw, vanquish, and extinguish, and our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to bring and put, the 24th day of April, in the year of the reign of our said sovereign lord Charles 2, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the Faith, &c. the 30th, at the parish of St. Giles in the Fields aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, deceitfully, advisedly, and traitorously, they did propose, compass, imagine, and intend to stir up, move, and procure sedition and rebellion within this kingdom of England, and to procure and cause a miserable slaughter among the subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, and wholly to deprive, depose, throw down, and disinherit our said sovereign lord the king from his royal state, title, power, and government of this his kingdom of England, and him our said sovereign lord the king to put to death, and utterly to destroy, and the government of this kingdom of England, and the sincere religion and worship of God in the same kingdom, rightly and by the laws of the same kingdom established, for their will and pleasure to change and alter, and wholly to subvert and destroy the state of the whole kingdom, being in all parts thereof well instituted and ordered, and to levy war against our said sovereign lord the king within this his realm of England: And to fulfil and bring to pass these their most wicked treasons and traitorous designs and purposes aforesaid, they the said Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, William Ireland, John Fenwick, Thomas Pickering, and John Grove, and other false traitors unknown, the said 24th day of April, in the said 30th year of the reign of our said lord the king, with force and arms, &c. at the parish of St. Giles in the Fields aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, deceitfully, advisedly, devilishly, and traitorously did assemble, unite, and gather themselves together, and then and there falsely, maliciously, deceitfully, advisedly, devilishly, and traitorously they did consult and agree to put and bring our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction, and to alter and change the religion rightly and by the laws of the same kingdom established, to the superstition of the church of Rome; and the sooner to bring to pass and accomplish the same their most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes aforesaid, they the said Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, William Ireland, John Fenwick, Thomas Pickering, John Grove, and other false traitors of our said sovereign lord the king unknown, afterwards (to wit) the said 24th day of April, in the said 30th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king, at the said parish of St. Giles in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, deceitfully, advisedly, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously they did consult and agree, that they the said Thomas Pickering and John Grove should kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king: And that they the said Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, William Ireland, John Fenwick, and other false traitors unknown, should therefore say, celebrate, and perform a certain number of masses (then and there agreed on among them) for the good of the soul of the said Thomas Pickering, and should therefore pay to the said John Grove a certain sum of money (then and there also agreed on among them): And further, that the said Thomas Pickering and John Grove upon the agreement aforesaid, then and there falsely, deceitfully, advisedly, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously did undertake, and to the said Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, William Ireland, John Fenwick, and other false traitors of our said sovereign lord the king unknown, then and there falsely, deceitfully, advisedly, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously they did then and there promise, that they the said Thomas Pickering and John Grove our said sovereign lord the king would kill and murder: And further, that they the said Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, William Ireland, John Fenwick, Thomas Pickering, and John Grove, and other false traitors of our said sovereign lord the king unknown, afterwards to wit the said 24th day of April, in the said 30th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king, at the said parish of St. Giles in the fields in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, deceitfully, advisedly, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously, did severally plight their faith every one to other of them, and did then and there swear and promise upon the Sacrament, to conceal and not to divulge their said most wicked treasons, and traitorous compassings, consultations, and purposes aforesaid, so among them had, traitorously to kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king, and to introduce the Roman religion, to be used within this kingdom of England, and to alter and change the true reformed religion, rightly and by the laws of this kingdom of England in this same kingdom of England established; And further, that they the said Thomas Pickering and John Grove, in execution of their said traitorous agreement, afterwards, to wit, the said 24th day of April, in the said 30th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king, and divers other days and times afterwards at the said parish of St. Giles in the fields and in the said county of Middlesex, falsely, deceitfully, advisedly, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously, they did prepare and obtain to themselves, and had and did keep musquets, pistols, swords, daggers, and other offensive and cruel weapons and instruments, to kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king: And that they the said Thomas Pickering and John Grove afterwards, to wit, the said 24th day of April, in the said 30th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king, and divers days and times afterwards with force and arms, &c. at the said parish of St. Giles in the Fields in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, and in other places within the said county of Middlesex, falsely, deceitfully, advisedly, maliciously, and traitorously, did lie in wait, and endeavour to kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king; and further, that they the said Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, William Ireland, John Fenwick, and other false traitors unknown, afterwards, to wit, the said 24th day of April, in the said 30th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king, at the said parish of St. Giles in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, deceitfully, advisedly, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously, did prepare, persuade, excite, abet, comfort and counsel four other persons unknown, and subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, traitorously to kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king, against the duty of their allegiance, against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in that behalf made and provided.

Upon this Indictment they have been arraigned, and therunto have severally pleaded, Not Guilty, and for their trial have put themselves upon God and their country, which country you are.

Your charge therefore is to enquire, whether they or any of them be Guilty of the High-Treason whereof they stand indicted, or Not Guilty. If you find them or any of them Guilty, you are to enquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements, those you find guilty had at the time of the High-Treason committed, or at any time since. If you find them or any of them Not Guilty, you are to enquire whether they did fly for it: If you find that they or any of them fled for it, you are to enquire of their goods and chattels, as if you had found them Guilty. If you find them or any of them Not Guilty, nor that they nor any of them fled for it; say so, and no more, and bear your evidence.

Make Proclamation of Silence on both sides. Which was done.

Then sir Creswell Levinz, one of the king's learned counsel in the law, opened the Indictment thus:

Sir Creswell Levinz. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury: These prisoners at the bar, Thomas White alias Whitebread, William Ireland, John Fenwick, Thomas Pickering, and John Grove, do all stand indicted of High-Treason; for that whereas they, as false traitors, meaning and designing to disturb the peace of the kingdom, to levy war within the kingdom, to make miserable slaughter against the king's subjects, to subvert the religion established by the law of the land, to introduce the superstition of the church of Rome, and to bring to death and final destruction, and to murder and assassinate our sovereign lord the king, they did, to effect these things, the 24th of April last assemble themselves together, with many other false traitors yet unknown, in the parish of St. Giles in the Fields in the county of Middlesex, and there, being so assembled, the better to effect these designs did make agreements and conspire together; first, that Pickering and Grove should kill the king, and that White and the rest of the persons that stand indicted, with many other traitors, should say a great number of Masses for the soul of the said Pickering, I think 30,000; and they did further agree there, that Grove should have a great sum of money; and upon this agreement Grove and Pickering did undertake and promise they would do this fact, and did then and there take the Sacrament and an oath to one another upon the Sacrament, that they would conceal these their treasons, that they might the better effect them; and that in pursuance of this, Grove and Pickering did divers times lie in wait to murder the king, and did provide arms to do it: And the Indictment further sets forth, that White and Ireland, and Fenwick, and many other traitors yet unknown, did procure four other persons yet also unknown, for to kill the king, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute. These are the heads of those facts for which they stand indicted. They have all pleaded Not Guilty: If we prove them or any of them Guilty of these or any of these facts, according to the evidence you shall have, we hope you will find it.

Sir Samuel Baldwin, one of his majesty's Serjeants at law, opened the Charge as followeth:

Sir Samuel Baldwin. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, the persons here before you stand indicted of High-Treason; they are five in number, three of them are Jesuits, one is a priest, the fifth is a layman, persons fitly prepared for the work in hand.

Gentlemen, it is not unknown to most persons, nay to every one amongst us that hath the least observed the former times, how that ever since the reformation there hath been a design carried on to subvert the government, and destroy the Protestant religion established here in England; for during all the reign of queen Elizabeth several attempts were made by several Priests and Jesuits, that came from beyond the seas (though the laws were then severe against them), to destroy the queen and alter the religion established here in England, and so introduce Popery and the superstition of the Church of Rome.

But the conspirators from time to time, during all the queen's reign were disappointed, as Edmond Campion, * and several other Jesuits, who came over in that time, and were executed, and did suffer for their treasons according to law: At length, about the latter end of the queen's time, a Seminary for the English Jesuits was founded at Valladolid in Spain, and you know the employment such persons have.

And soon after the queen's death, in the beginning of the reign of king James several persons came over into England from this very seminary, who together with one Henry Garnet, † Superior of the Jesuits then in England, and divers others English papists, hatched that helish Gunpowder-Plot; whereby what was designed you all know; but as it fell out, these persons, as well as those in queen Elizabeth's time, were likewise disappointed, and for their execrable treasons in the 3d year of king James were executed at Tyburn and other places.

This is evident by the very act of parliament in 3 Jacobi; in the preamble whereof mention is made that Creswell and Tesmond, Jesuits, came from Valladolid in Spain to execute this Gunpowder-Treason with the popish party here in England.

And, gentlemen, after this treason, so miraculously discovered, was punished, one would not have thought that any future age would have been guilty of the like conspiracy; but it so falls out, that the mystery of Iniquity and Jesuitism still worketh, for there hath of late been a sort of cruel and bloody-minded persons who, in hopes to have better success than they had in former times, during the reigns of queen Elizabeth and king James, have set on foot as horrid a design as that of the Gunpowder-treason; I can resemble it to no other Plot, or design, or treason in any other time, and truly it does resemble that in many particulars: I may say, it doth at the least equal it, if not exceed it.

I shall mention two or three particulars in which this Plot doth resemble that.

1. That horrid design was to take away the life of the then king, to subvert the government, to introduce the popish religion, and to destroy the established Protestant religion in England; and so gentlemen, we think our proofs will make it out that in each of these particulars this design is the same that that was.

2. The great actors in that design were Priests and Jesuits that came from Valladolid in Spain, and other places beyond the seas. And the great actors in this Plot are priests and Jesuits, that are come from St. Omers and other places beyond the seas nearer home than Spain.

3. That plot was chiefly guided and managed by Henry Garnet superior and provincial of the Jesuits then in England; and the great actor in this design is Mr. Whitebread, superior and provincial of the Jesuits now in England; so that I say in these several particulars it does resemble the Gunpowder-Plot.

Gentlemen, In this plot, of which the prisoners now stand indicted, several persons have several parts: Some of these persons are employed to keep correspondence beyond the seas (of which more hath been said in another place, and so I shall not speak of it here): others were to procure and prepare aid and assistance here in England who were to be ready when there should be occasion to use it. But the great part that these persons (the prisoners at the bar) were to act in this conspiracy, was, to take away the life of our sovereign lord the King, on whose preservation the safety and welfare of three nations (and millions of men) doth depend. Now the facts for which the five prisoners stand indicted, I shall open thus:

1. They are here indicted for conspiring the death of his sacred majesty: they did agree to take away the king's life; and entering into such an agreement, they hired some persons amongst them to do it; and this agreement was made the 24th of April last 1678.

2. There is another fact they likewise stand indicted for: 'That they did endeavour and contrive to change and alter the religion established in the nation, and introduce popery in the room of it.' The manner how to effect this was thus, if my information be right; you shall hear that from the evidence. Mr. Whitebread being resident here in England, and Superior of the Jesuits, did in February last think fit (being impowered by authority from Rome) to give summons to the Jesuits abroad, at St. Omers, and other places beyond the seas, that they should come over here into England, to be ready at London, on the 24th of April, the day laid in the Indictment, and which is the day after St. George's day; and their design was (as will appear by the proof) to contrive how they may take away the life of the king: for if that were once done, they thought, in all other things, their design would easily be accomplished. After the Summons were out, they were so officious for the accomplishing of this great end, that between 40 and 50 Jesuits did appear here at London at the time (for thither they were summoned), and there the meeting was appointed to be. At the White Horse Tavern in the Strand they were to meet first; but being so great a number that they were likely to be taken notice of, if they came all together, it was so ordered, they should come but a few at a time and go off in small numbers and others should succeed them, till the whole number had been there. And there were directions given, and a course taken, that there should be some person to tell them whether they should go from thence. After they had met there at several times in the same day, they were appointed, and adjourned to be at several other places; some of them were appointed, to be at Mr. Whitebread's lodging, and that was in Wild-Street, at one Mr. Sanders's house; others were appointed to go to Mr. Ireland's lodging, which was in Russel-Street (and this Mr. Ireland was treasurer of the Society): and others were to meet at Mr. Fenwick's chamber in Drury-Lane; and he was at that time Procurator and Agent for that Society. Others were appointed to meet at Harcourt's lodging; and others at other places.

When they came there, they all agreed to the general design of the first meeting, which was To kill the king. Then there was a Paper, or some instrument to be subscribed. This was done, and the Sacrament was taken for the concealment of it. After that, Whitebread, Ireland, Fenwick, and others did agree that Mr. Grove and Mr. Pickering should be employed to assassinate the king. One of them (Mr. Grove) being a lay brother, was to have 1,500*l.* a great sum; the other, as a more suitable reward for his pains, was to have 30,000 masses said for his soul. Mr. Whitebread, Mr. Ireland, and Mr. Fenwick, were all privy to this design; and this was the 24th of April. In August after (they being appointed to kill the king, but it not taking effect, either their hearts misgave them, or they wanted opportunity) there was another meeting at the Savoy, where the witnesses will tell you, four Irish persons were hired for to kill the king. And this was ordered, in case the other design took not effect. There was fourscore pounds sent down to them to Windsor, where they were to have done the fact. After this, other persons were appointed to do the execution, and they were to take the king at his morning walk at New-Market.

These persons were all disappointed in their design. But you shall hear what was the Agreement how it was carried on, and what rewards were given to carry it on. We shall acquaint you likewise, that for the bottom of this design (when so many Jesuits should come over, when they should have so many consultations, and when they should resolve to kill the king) there could be no less than the altering of Religion, and introduction of Popery here in England. And that time, at the first meeting, they had ordered, That Mr. Cary a Jesuit, as their procurator and agent, should go to Rome, to act their concerns there. All which things and more will be made out to you by witnesses produced. There are likewise some other circumstances that will be material to confirm those witnesses. We shall produce to you a Letter written in February last, about that time that Mr. Whitebread sent over his summons for the Jesuits to appear here. This Letter was written by one Mr. Peters, a Jesuit now in custody; and now it is written to one Tunstal, a Jesuit, to give him notice, That he should be in London about the 21st of April, and be ready on the 24th of April: That he knew what the business was; but he did advise him, that he should conceal himself, lest the Plot (by observation) should be discovered. We shall likewise produce several other evideceit, to strengthen and confirm the witnesses: we shall first call our witnesses, and enter upon the proof.

Mr. Finch opened the Evidence thus :

Mr. Finch. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; before we call our Witnesses, I would beg leave once more to remind you of what hath already been opened unto you: the quality of the offenders themselves, and the nature of the offence they stand indicted of. For the offenders they are most of them Priests and Jesuits; three of them at the least are so; the other two are the accursed instruments of this design: For the offence, itself, 'tis High Treason.

And though it be High-Treason by the statute of 27 Eliz. for men of that profession to come into England; yet these men are not indicted upon that law, nor for that treason: this I take notice of to you, for the prisoners sake, that they should not fancy to themselves they suffered Martyrdom for their Religion, as some of them have vainly imagined in their case; and for your sakes too, that as at first, it was treason, repeated acts of treason in these men; and those proceeding from a principle of religion too, that justly occasioned the making that law: so here you might observe a pregnant instance of it in the prisoners at the bar. That whenever they had an opportunity, as now they thought they had, they have never failed to put those principles into practice.

So now, Gentlemen, as they are not indicted for being priests, I must desire you to lay that quite of the case, and only consider that they stand here accused for treason; such treason, as were they laymen only, they ought to die for it; though I cannot but observe, they were the sooner traitors for being priests.

The treason therefore they stand indicted of, is of the highest nature: It is a conspiracy to kill the king, and that too with circumstances so aggravating (if any thing can aggravate that offence which is the highest,) that nothing less than the total subversion of the government, and utter destruction of the Protestant Religion would serve their turns. And really, when you consider the root from whence this treason springs you will cease wondering that all this should be attempted and rather wonder that it was not done.

Mischiefs have often miscarried for want of wickedness enough; the horror of conscience or else the malice of the aggressor not being equal to the attempt, has sometimes prevented the execution of it. Here is no room for any thing of this kind: this treason proceeds from a principle of religion, from a sense that it is lawful; nay that they ought to do these things; and every neglect here is looked on as a piece of irreligion, a want of zeal; for which one of the prisoners did penance, as in the course of our evidence we shall prove unto you.

And when we consider, too, that this is carried on, not by the fury of two or three busy men over-zealous in the cause, but by the deliberate and steady counsels of the whole order, and that too under the obligations of secrecy, as high as Christian Religion can lay on them; you have great reason to wonder that it did not succeed. And yet after all this they have not been able to prevail. Not that we can brag of any human policy that did prevent it: No; all that the wit of man could do, these men had done: but it was the providence of God, it was his revelation: that providence that first enlightened his church, and has preserved it against all opposition heretofore, has once more disappointed their counsels, and preserved the king and this nation in the profession of that true religion these men have vainly attempted to destroy.

Gentlemen, I will not open to you the particulars of our Evidence; that I had rather should come from the witnesses themselves. I shall only in general tell you what will be the course of it. We shall prove unto you, That there was a summons for a consultation to be held by these men the 24th of April last, from the provincial Mr. Whitebread: That they had a caution given them, not to come too soon, nor appear much about town, till the consultation were over, lest occasion should be given to suspect the design: That accordingly a consultation was held, as they say, to send Cary, their procurator, to Rome; though we shall prove to you it was for other purposes: That they adjourned from their general assembly into lesser companies; where several persons did attend them to carry intelligence of their several resolutions: That at these several consults they did resolve the king was to be killed: That Pickering and Grove should do it; for which the one was to have 30,000 masses said for his soul; the other was to have 1,500*l*. That in prosecution of this design, they made several attempts to execute it: That they lay in wait for the king several times in St. James's Park, and other places: And that once in particular it had been done by Pickering, if it had not pleased God to have prevented it by an accident unforeseen: The flint of his pistol being loose, he durst not then attempt it, though he had an opportunity: For which neglect, we shall prove to you, he underwent the penance of 20 or 30 strokes. That when these men had failed, we shall prove to you they hired four ruffians to murder the king at Windsor, and after that at New-market. Thus they way-laid him in all his privacies and retirements, wherever they could think it most convenient to execute their design.

And this we shall prove by two witnesses; who though they should not speak to the same consultations, nor the same times, yet they are still two witnesses in law. For several witnessesses of several overt-acts are so many witnessesses to the treason: because the treason consists in the intention of the man, in the compassing and imagining the death of the king. The several overt-acts which declare that intention, are but as so many evidences of the treason. We will call our witnesses, and make out what has been opened to you.

Cl. of Cr. Mr. Oates, Lay your hand upon the book. The evidence you shall give for our sovereign lord the king, against Thomas White alias Whitebread, William Ireland, John Fenwick, Thomas Pickering, and John Grove, the prisoners at the bar, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God.

Mr. Serj. Baldwyn. Pray, Mr. Oates, will you declare to the court and the jury, what design there was for the killing of his majesty, and by whom.

Mr. Oates. My lord, in the month of December last, Mr. Thomas Whitebread did receive a patent from the general of the Jesuits at Rome to be provincial of the Order: after he had received this patent, he sent order to one George Conyers, a Jesuit at St. Omers, to preach upon St. Thomas of Canterbury's day; and by virtue of this order, George Conyers did preach against oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and did in his doctrine call them antichristian and devilish. My lord, in the month of January, this Mr. Whitebread did send several letters to St. Omers; in which letters there was contained intimation of his intent to proceed against the king's person to assassinate him; which letters were written to Richard Ashby. My lord, in the month of February, there comes an order from him as provincial, for several of the Jesuits to make their appearance at London, to be there at a consult to be held the 24th of April O. S.

L. C. J. (sir William Scroggs.) Where was Whitebread then?

Mr. Oates. He was then in London, my lord, as I suppose by the dating of his letters. My lord, from Mr. Whitebread after this summons, we received a second summons, which came the 5th of April, N. S., and upon the summons there were nine did appear at London, the Rector of Liege, sir Thomas Preston, the Rector of Ghent, whose name is Marsh, the Rector of Wotton, whose name is Williams, and one sir John Warner, and two or three more from St. Omers; and there was a special order given us, my lord, to keep ourselves close, but we should be suspected, and so our design disclosed. My lord, upon the 24th of April, O. S. we did appear in the consult. The consult was begun at the White-horse tavern in the Strand*, and there

* This was the perjury assigned in the Indictment on which, upon May 8th, 1683, Oates was convicted of perjury. See the Trial, infra. "I waited on the king [James 2d] in his barge from Whitehall to Somerset-house, where he went to visit the Queen Dowager. It was upon this day that the noted Dr. Oates was convicted of Perjury; it being proved that he was at St. Omers the 24th of April, 1678, when he swore he was at the White-horse tavern in the Strand, where Pickering, Grove, Ireland, and other Jesuits signed the death of king Charles the Second. This was a grateful hearing to the king, who thereupon observed, that indeed they met in several rooms; they came in by degrees; and as the new ones came on, the old ones, those that had been there before them, fell off. And there was one John Cary appointed to go procurator for Rome, and he was so appointed by the suffrages of the three prisoners at the bar, Whitebread, Ireland, and Fenwick. It was afterwards adjourned into several colloquies, or little meetings; one meeting was at Mrs. Sanders's house, that hats upon Wild-house; a second was at Mr. Ireland's; a third was at Mr. Harcourt's; a fourth was at Mr. Grove's; and other meeting or meetings there were, but I cannot give a good account of them. My lord, after they had thus met, and debated the state of religion, and the life of the king, they drew up this resolve; it was drawn up by one Mico, who was secretary to the society, and Socius, or companion to the provincial.

L. J. C. When was that done?

Mr. Oates. That day, my lord. The Resolve, my lord, was this, as near as I can remember the words: It is resolved, That Thomas Pickering and John Grove shall go on in their attempt to assassinate the king (whether they used the word assassinate, I cannot remember, but the meaning was, they should make an attempt upon his person), and that the reward of the one, that is Grove's, should be 1,500*l.*, and that Pickering's reward should be 30,000 masses. My lord, after this resolution was signed by Whitebread, it was signed by Fenwick and Ireland, and by all the four clubs: I saw them sign it, for I carried the instrument from one to another.

L. C. J. What was it they signed?

Oates. The resolve of the consult.

L. C. J. What, that which was drawn up by Mico?

Oates. Yes, my Lord, that which was drawn up by Mico.

Whitebread. Doth he say that he saw them sign it?—Oates. Yes, I did see them sign it.

Jury. We desire he may be asked where he saw them sign it.

Oates. Mr. Whitebread signed it at that part of the consult that was at his chamber, Ireland did sign it at that part of the consult that was at his chamber, Fenwick signed it at that part of the consult that was at his chamber.

there had been a meeting of the Jesuits that day, and that all the scholars of St. Omers knew of it; but that it was well Dr. Oates knew no better where it was to be, for, says his majesty, they met in St. James's, where I then lived; which if Oates had but known, he would have cut out a fine spot of work for me. The king then subjoined, that Oates being thus convicted, the Popish Plot was now dead; to which I answering, that it had been long since dead, and that now it would be buried; his majesty so well approved of the turn, that going with him afterwards to the Princess of Denmark's, I heard him repeat it to her." Sir John Kersey's Memoirs, p. 104.

Whitebread. Were you at all these places?

Oates. I went with it from place to place; but I mention no more now, but only these.

Whitebread. You were not at all these places, and saw them sign it there, were you?

Oates. Yes, I did see them sign it at all those places. My Lord, in the month of May, Mr. Whitebread came over as provincial from England to St. Omers, to begin his provincial visitation, and with him came Cary and his companion Mico. Cary left St. Omers to begin his journey to Rome: Whitebread, after he had given an account of what proceedings the catholics of England had made in order to disturb the peace of the kingdom, what moneys had been gathered, what suffrages dispersed, what means had been used; what noblemen had joined in this execrable plot; he did then (my Lord) order me to come for England.

L. C. J. Whitebread did?

Oates. Yes, my Lord, Whitebread did. And, my Lord, the business I was to come into England for, was to murder one Dr. Tongue, a Doctor in Divinity, who had written a Book called "The Jesuits Morals;" that is to say, translated them out of French into English. My lord, I came over into England on the 23rd of June, N. S.; I came out of St. Omers, that is, the 13th in the stile of England; on the 24th N. S., I took the packet-boat at Calais; the 25th N. S., I met with Mr. Fenwick at Dover; he was come down with certain youths, to send them to St. Omers, and had ordered their passage.—My lord, with Mr. Fenwick, and some other persons, we came to London in a coach; and six miles (as near as I remember it) on this side Canterbury, at a place called Holton, our coach was stopped by the searchers, and there they did examine a box that was in the coach directed for the hon. Richard Blundell, esq. This box, when they opened it, they found full of beads, crucifixes, images, and other sorts of trumpery, that I cannot give a good account of; it is he can give the best: Mr. Fenwick went by the name of one Thompson, and did personate one Thompson, as living near the Fountain-Tavern, at Charing-Cross; and did order the searchers to write to him there, as by the name of Thompson. When the box was seized, they being prohibited goods, Mr. Fenwick did say, that if they had searched his pockets, they had found such letters about him as might have cost him his life; but his letters did escape searching. We came that night to Sittinburgh, and lay there on Sunday the 26th, N. S., as near as I remember: and I think we stayed there till the afternoon: We took coach in the afternoon, and came as far as Dartford. On Monday morning we came into London; and (my lord) when we came into London, and had continued there some days (I now return to Mr. Whitebread), there came one Ashby to town; he had been some time rector of St. Omers, and was come to England sick of the gout, and was to go to the Bath to be cured. And he brought instructions with him from Whitebread; and the instructions contained in them these particulars: Instructions or Memorials, or what else they called them. 1. That 10,000*l.* should be proposed to sir George Wakeman for the killing of the king. 2. That care should be taken for the murder of the bishop of Hereford. 3. That care should be taken for the murder of Dr. Stillingfleet. 4. That though this proposal was made to sir George Wakeman of 10,000*l.* yet Pickering and Grove should go on still in their attempts. My lord, afterwards these were taken and copied out, and dispersed to the several conspirators in the kingdom, whose names I cannot call to mind. But Coleman made several copies, and dispersed them about: Then the 10,000*l.* was proposed to sir George Wakeman, but it was refused.

L. C. J. What, it was too little?

Oates. Yes, my lord, it was too little. Then Whitebread he writ from St. Omers, that in case 10,000*l.* would not do, fifteen should be proposed, and after that he had that proposed, he accepted of that.

L. C. J. Were you by when he accepted it?

Oates. No, my lord, I was not: But it appeared upon their entry-books, and it appeared by a letter from this gentleman, Mr. Whitebread, wherein he did shew a great deal of joy for sir George Wakeman's accepting of the 15,000*l.* My lord, after this it was agreed upon, that sir George Wakeman should have 15,000*l.*, and 5,000*l.* of it was paid by Coleman or his order. Thus the state of affairs stood till August. Then one Fogarthy, who is dead, came to a consult of the Jesuits with the Benedictines: Now at this consult the prisoner at the bar Fenwick was, he was one, and Harcourt was another: And in this consult there were four juffians recommended to them.

L. C. J. By whom?

Oates. By Fogarthy they were recommended, but accepted of by these consultors, and consented to by Fenwick. They were sent away, and the next day after fourscore pounds was sent them, the most part of it was gold, and Coleman was there and gave the messenger a guinea to expedite his errand. My lord, in the month of August there came other letters from Whitebread, wherein he did give an account of what care he had taken of the Scotch business; and he ordered one Moor and one Sanders, alias Brown, to go down to Scotland, and he did order the rector of London, then William Harcourt, to send them; and he did so send them the 6th of August, in the name of the provincial.

Whitebread. From whence, I pray?

Oates. From London, and they went to prosecute and carry on the design which Fenwick and Ireland had plotted, of a rebellion amongst the disaffected Scots against the governors appointed them by the king; and they sent down ministers to preach under the notion of Presbyterian ministers, in order to get the disaffected Scots to rise, by insinuating the sad condition they were likely to be in, by reason of episcopal tyranny (as they termed it.) And that they were resolved to dispose of the king, and they did intend to dispose of the Duke too, in case he did not appear vigorous in promoting the catholic religion (I speak their own words.)

L. C. J. Have you done with your evidence? What do you know of the prisoners at the bar? Name them all.

Oates. There is Whitebread, Ireland, Fenwick, Pickering, and Grove.

L. C. J. Are you sure Pickering and Grove accepted of the terms?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I was there.

L. C. J. Where was it?

Oates. At Mr. Whitebread's lodgings at Mrs. Saunders's house. As for Grove, indeed, he did attend at that time upon Fenwick at his chamber; but after the consult was over he came to Whitebread's lodgings, and did take the sacrament and the oaths of secrecy upon it, and did accept it, and agree to it.

L. C. J. Were you there when he took the sacrament?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I was.

L. C. J. Who gave you the sacrament?

Oates. It was a Jesuit, that goes by the name of one Barton.

Whitebread. My lord before I forget it, I desire to say this. He says that at such and such consults in April and May he was present, and carried the resolutions from one to another. There are above a hundred and a hundred, that can testify he was all that while at St. Omers. Pray tell me when I received the sacrament?

Oates. At the same time.

Whitebread. What day was that?

Oates. The 24th of April.

Whitebread. Was I there?

Oates. You were there.

Whitebread. I take God to witness I was not.

L. C. J. Mr. Whitebread, you shall have time to make your answer. But pray Mr. Oates, when was Mr. Carey dispatched away to Rome, and what was his errand?

Oates. My lord, I'll tell you; he was approved of to go to Rome the 24th of April; in the month of May or June, Whitebread brings Cary over to St. Omers, and one Micu his secretary or companion with him.

L. C. J. When was it?

Oates. In the month of May or June he was brought over by the provincial; then he went away on his journey, and at Paris received 20*l.* to bear his charges.

Finch. What do you know of any attempts to kill the king at St. James's Park?

Oates. I saw Pickering and Grove several times walking in the Park together with their scawed pistols, which were longer than ordinary pistols, and shorter than some carbines. They had silver bullets to shoot with, and Grove would have had the bullets to be champ, for fear that if he should shoot, if the bullets were round, the wound that might be given might be cured.

L. C. J. Did Grove intend to champ them?

Oates. He did say so.

L. C. J. Did he shew you the bullets?

Oates. I did see them:

Grove. When was this?

Oates. I saw the bullets in the month of May, and in the month of June.

Whitebread. Pray, where did you see them?

Oates. In Grove's possession.

Whitebread. At what time?

Oates. In the month of May.

Whitebread. Then was he actually himself at St. Omers. Was it in May or June?

Oates. The latter end of May and June. I saw them then twice, if not thrice. But Pickering's I saw in August.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Do you know any thing of Pickering's doing penance, and for what?

Oates. Yes, my lord, in the month of March last (for these persons have followed the king several years); but he at that time had not looked to the flint of his pistol, but it was loose, and he durst not venture to give fire. He had a fair opportunity, as Whitebread said; and because he mist it through his own negligence, he underwent penance, and had 20 or 30 strokes of discipline, and Grove was chidden for his carelessness.

L. C. J. That was in March last?

Oates. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. How do you know that?

Oates. By letters that I have seen from Mr. Whitebread; these I saw and read, and I know Whitebread's hand.

Mr. Serj. Baldwyn. What do you know of the ruffians that went down to Windsor? What success had they?

Oates. I can give no account of that, because in the beginning of September this gentleman that had been in England some time before, was come to London and the business had taken air, and one Beddingfield had written to him, that the thing was discovered, and that none but such a one could do it, naming me by a name that he knew I went by.

Whitebread. Whem was that, sir?

Oates. In the month of September last, I came to the provincial's chamber the 3rd of September; when I came I could not speak with him, for he was at supper; but when he had supped I was admitted in, and there he shewed me the letter that he had received from Beddingfield.

Whitebread. Where did you see it?

Oates. You read it to me when you chid me, and beat me, and abused me.

L. C. J. What did he chide you for?

Oates. He did charge me with very high language of being with the king, and with a minister, and discovering the matter. I was so unfortunate, that the gentleman who was with the king did wear the same coloured clothes that I did then wear: And he having given an account that the party wore such clothes, the suspicion was laid upon me: Now, my lord, I had not then been with the king, but another gentleman had been with him from me with the draughts of some papers concerning this business, which I had drawn up, and I was ready to appear when I should be called to justify them, only I did not think fit to appear immediately: And my lord, this Beddingfield, he had gotten into it that it was discovered, and writ the provincial word he thought it was by me; 'for,' said he, 'he hath been drawn in by some of his old acquaintance.' When he had received this letter, he asked me with what face I could look upon him, since I had betrayed them: So, my lord, I did profess a great deal of innocency, because I had not then been with the king; but he gave me very ill language and abused me, and I was afraid of a worse mischief from them; for I could not but conclude, that if they dealt so cruelly with those that only writ against them, I could scarce escape, of whom they had that jealousy, that I had betrayed them: And, my lord, though they could not prove that I had discovered it, yet upon the bare suspicion I was beaten, and affronted, and reviled, and commanded to go beyond sea again; nay, my lord, I had my lodgings assaulted, to have murdered me if they could.

Whitebread. By whom?

Oates. By Mr. Whitebread, and some of them.

Whitebread. Who beat you?

Oates. Mr. Whitebread did.

Mr. Serj. Baldwyn. Was it Pickering or Grove that had the flint of his pistol loose?

Oates. Pickering.

Pickering. My lord, I never shot off a pistol in all my life.

L. C. J. What say you as to the fourscore pounds?

Oates. My lord, I will speak to that; that was given to the four ruffians that were to kill the king at Windsor: now, my lord, that money I saw—

L. C. J. Where did you see it?

Oates. At Harcourt's chamber.

L. C. J. Where is that?

Oates. In Duke Street, near the arch.

L. C. J. Who was it given by?

Oates. William Harcourt.

L. C. J. Did you see the four fellows?

Oates. No, my lord, I never did, nor never knew their names.

L. C. J. Who was the money given to?

Oates. A messenger that was to carry it down to them.

L. C. J. Who was that messenger?

Oates. One of theirs that I do not know; and I durst not be too inquisitive, my lord, for fear of being suspected.

L. C. J. Who was by when the money was paid?

Oates. Coleman, that is executed; and, my lord, there was this Mr. Fenwick by, that is the prisoner at the bar.

Fenwick. When was this?

Oates. In the month of August.

Fenwick. Where?

Oates. At Harcourt's chamber.

Fenwick. I never saw you there in all my life: are you sure I was by when the money was there?

Oates. Yes, you were.

VOL. VII.

L. C. J. Mr. Fenwick, you shall have your time by and by to ask him any question: Mr. Oates, let me ask you once again, When there was the appointment made for Grove and Pickering to kill the king, who signed it?

Oates. At least forty signed it.

L. C. J. Did the other three sign it?

Oates. Yes, my lord, all of them.

L. C. J. Name them.

Oates. There was Whitebread, Fenwick, and Ireland.

L. C. J. And you say you went from place to place, and saw it signed?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. C. J. Were you attendant upon them?

Oates. My lord, I ever was since the year 1666.

L. C. J. At whose lodgings did you use to attend upon the consultation?

Oates. At the Provincial's chamber, Mr. Whitebread.

L. C. J. Where was it first signed?

Oates. At the Provincial's chamber.

Sir Cr. Levins. Who carried it from lodging to lodging?

Oates. I did.

L. C. J. When was it?

Oates. The 24th of April.

Mr. Just. Bertus. You say you carried the result from place to place, pray tell us what that result was?

Oates. They knew what it was, for they read it before they signed it.

Mr. Just. Atkins. But tell us the contents of it.

Oates. The contents of that resolve was this (I will tell you the substance, though I cannot tell you exactly the words): That Pickering and Grove should go on in their attempts to assassinate the person of the king; as near as I can remember it was so; that the former should have 30,000 masses and the latter 1,500*l.*; and the whole consult did consent to it, and signed the agreement that was made with them, and did resolve upon the king's death all in one resolve.

L. C. J. Where was this agreed upon? at the White-Horse tavern?

Oates. No, my lord. After they had agreed at the White-Horse, that Mr. Cary should go procurator to Rome, and some other small particulars, which I cannot now remember, they did adjourn from the White-Horse tavern, and met at several chambers, some at one place, and some at another.

L. C. J. But you say Mico did draw up the resolution, where was that?

Oates. At Mr. Whitebread's chamber, for he was Socius, and secretary to the Provincial.

L. C. J. Were Ireland and Fenwick present when Mico drew it up?

Oates. No, my lord, but they were at their own chambers; after it was drawn up there, and signed by Mr. Whitebread, and those of the consult in his chamber, it was carried to the several consults.

L. C. J. What, all the same day?

H

Oates. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. And you went along with it?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I did.

Mr. Just. Bertie. I only ask you, were all the five prisoners privy to it? or do you distinguish any of them, and which?

Oates. They were all privy to it.

Whit. My lord, we can prove—

L. C. J. You shall have time sufficient to make what defence you can, you shall be sure to have a fair trial, and be stopt of nothing that you will think fit to say for yourselves. Mr. Oates, were Pickering and Grove present?

Oates. Yes, my lord, Grove at Fenwick's chamber, and Pickering at the Provincial's chamber.

L. C. J. But they were not required to sign this, were they?

Oates. After that the whole consult had signed it, and Mass was preparing to be said for it, before Mass, they did sign and accept of it.

L. C. J. Where did they two do it?

Oates. At the Provincial's chamber.

L. C. J. What day was it?

Oates. That day, for they met all together at the Provincial's chamber to receive the Sacrament, and when Mass was going to be said, one said it was too late, for it was after twelve o'clock; but Mr. Whitebread said it was not afternoon till we had dined; and you know, Mr. Whitebread, that Masses have been said at one or two o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. Just. Atkins. How many persons did meet at that consult?

Oates. My lord, there were about forty or fifty, and after they had adjourned into several lesser companies, they met all together at Mr. Whitebread's chamber.

L. C. J. Where was that, and when?

Oates. That day, at Wild-House.

L. C. J. Where was it that they gave the Sacrament?

Oates. At a little chapel at Wild-House, Mr. Sanders's.

L. C. J. Did they accept it before they took the Sacrament?

Oates. Yes, Pickering and Grove did sign it before they took the Sacrament.

Mr. Justice Atkins. You tell us of an Oath of Secrecy that was taken, what was that Oath?

Oates. I cannot give an account of the form of the Oath, but it was an obligation of secrecy.

Mr. Justice Atkins. Did you see the Oath administered?—Oates. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. C. J. Who administered it?

Oates. Mr. Whitebread, he did give it unto me and to all the rest that were there, and Mico held the book; it was a mass-book, but they were words of his own invention, I believe, they were not written down.

L. C. J. Cannot you tell what they were?

Mr. Oates. No, my lord, I cannot tell, because I did not see them written down.

L. C. J. If you will ask this gentleman any thing more, you may.

Whitebread. My lord, I am in a very weak and doubtful condition as to my health, and therefore I should be very loth to speak any thing but what is true: we are to prove a negative, and I know it is much harder to prove a negative, than to assert an affirmative; it is not a very hard thing for a man to swear any thing, if he will venture his soul for it; but truly, I may boldly say, in the sight of Almighty God before whom I am to appear, there have not been three true words spoken by this witness.

L. C. J. Do you hear, if you could but satisfy us, that you have no dispensation to call God to witness a lie—

Whitebread. My lord, I do affirm it with all the protestations imaginable.

L. C. J. But if you have a religion that can give a dispensation for oaths, sacraments, protestations and falsehoods that are in the world, how can you expect we should believe you?

Whitebread. I know no such thing.

L. C. J. We shall see that presently, before we have done.

Oates. I have one thing more to say, my lord, that comes into my mind. This Whitebread received power from the see of Rome to grant out commissions to officers military. And, my lord, here are the seals of the office in court, which he hath sealed some hundreds of commissions with, which they call patents.

L. C. J. What were those commissions for? For an army?

Oates. Yes, my lord, for an army.

Whitebread. When were those commissions signed?

Oates. My lord, several of them were signed in the former provincial's time.

L. C. J. What, I warrant you, you are not provincial of the Jesuits, are you?

Whitebread. I cannot deny that, my lord.

L. C. J. Then there are more than three words he hath spoken are true.

Mr. Justice Atkins. I believe, Mr. Oates, that that army was intended for something, pray what was it for?

Oates. My lord, they were to rise upon the death of the king, and let the French king in upon us, and they had made it their business to prepare Ireland and Scotland for the receiving of a foreign invasion.

L. C. J. Who were those commissions sealed by?

Oates. My lord, the commissions of the great officers were sealed with the general's seal.

L. C. J. Who was that?

Oates. His name is Johannes Paulus de Oliva: His seal sealed the commissions for the generals, major-generals and great persons; but those seals that sealed the several commissions to several inferior officers, were in the custody of the provincial.

L. C. J. Can you name any one person that he hath sealed a commission to?

Oates. I can name one: To sir John Gage, which commission I delivered myself.

L. C. J. What, of Sussex?

Oates. Yes, of Sussex.

Mr. Justice Atkins. Who did you receive the commission from?

Oates. My lord, when he went over, he left a great many blank patents to be filled up, and he left one ready sealed for a commission to sir John Gage. This was delivered into my hands when he was absent, but it was signed by him, and delivered to me while he was in his visitation beyond the seas, but I dare swear it was his hand, as I shall answer it before God and the king.

Mr. Justice Atkins. Who had it you from?

Oates. From Mr. Ashby, but by Whitebread's appointment in his instructions, which I saw and read.

L. C. J. What was the commission for?

Oates. To be an officer in the army.

L. C. J. Did you see the instructions left for Ashby?

Oates. I did see them, and read them, and I did then, as I always did, give it as my judgment, that it was more safe to poison the king, than to pistol or stab him.

Mr. Justice Bertie. Was the commission which you delivered to sir John Gage, from Ashby or from Whitebread?

Oates. I had it from Ashby, but Whitebread, who was then beyond sea, had signed this commission before he went. My lord, I have something more yet to say, and that is as to Mr. Grove, that he did go about with one Smith to gather Peter-pence, which was either to carry on the design, or to send them to Rome. I saw the book wherein it was entered, and I heard him say that he had been gathering of it.

Grove. Where was this?

Oates. In Cockpit-alley, where you know I lodged.

Grove. Did I ever see you at your lodging?

Oates. You saw me at my own door.

L. C. J. Why, don't you know Mr. Oates?

Grove. My lord, I have seen him before.

L. C. J. Why this it is, ask a Papist a question, and you shall have a Jesuitical answer.

Oates. I will convince the Court that he does know me by some circumstances. My lord, in the month of Dec. last, by the provincial's order—

L. C. J. I would ask him first, whether he does know you or no. Do you know Mr. Oates?

Grove. I have seen him before.

L. C. J. Have you been often in his company?

Grove. No, my lord.

L. C. J. What do you call often? Have you been in his company seven or eight times? (for we must deal subtilly with such as you are) Have you been in his company ten times?

Grove. No.

L. C. J. What say you to three times?

Grove. Yes, I believe I have seen him twice or thrice.

L. C. J. Where? did you never see him at Whitebread's?

Grove. As I hope to be saved, and before the eternal God, I did never.

Oates. I will convince him and the court, that he does know me, and is well acquainted with me: In the month of December last I went to St. Omers, I went first to the then provincial's house, to take my leave of him, and there I met Mr. Grove, and he appointed to come to my lodging the next morning, near the Red Lion in Drury lane, at one Grigson's house, and he was so well acquainted with me then, that he had lent me eight shillings to hire the coach.

L. C. J. Did you lend him eight shillings?

Grove. I did, my lord, I do not deny it.

L. C. J. How came you to do it, when it seems, if you say true, he was a stranger to you?

Grove. I thought I should have it again.

L. C. J. What, of him?

Grove. Yes.

L. C. J. Did he desire you to lend him the eight shillings?

Grove. Yes, he did, my lord.

Oates. Then there is one time that he confesses he saw me.

L. C. J. Did you not know him before?

Grove. I had no acquaintance with him, I had seen him.

L. C. J. How came you then to lend money to one you had no more acquaintance with?

Grove. I knew I should go along with him to the coach, then I thought I should have it again.

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, were you going beyond sea then?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I was.

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, did you pay him that money?

Oates. No, my lord, I did not.

L. C. J. Did you ask him for the money, and had you it?

Grove. He did not pay it me.

L. C. J. How then were you sure you should have it?

Grove. He did order me to go to such-a-one for it.

L. C. J. Who was that?

Grove. Mr. Fenwick, I think.

L. C. J. Then Mr. Oates was known to you all, he was no such stranger to you as you would make us believe.

Oates. Thus he confesses three times he had seen me, once before he lent me the money, another time when he lent it, and the third time the next day. And I will put him in mind of another time, when he and I were in company, where one brought us a note of what was done in the House of Commons, turned into burlesque, for they used to turn all that was done at the council, or at the parliament, or at the courts in Westminster-hall, into burlesque, and then translated it into the French, and sent it to the French king, for him to laugh at too. But that by the way. Twice more he drank in my company, at the Red Posts in Wild-street, and once more when he owned to me, that he fired Southwark.

L. C. J. Now by the oath that you have taken, did he own to you that he had fired Southwark?

Oates. My lord, he did tell me that he with three Irishmen did fire Southwark, and that they had 1,000*l.* given them for it, whereof he had 400*l.* and the other 200*l.* a piece.

L. C. J. Now for Mr. Fenwick. Do you know Mr. Oates?

Fenwick. Yes, my lord, I do.

L. C. J. Were you well acquainted with him? speak plain.

Oates. He was my father-confessor, my lord.

L. C. J. Was he so? were you his confessor?

Fenwick. I believe he never made any confession in his life.

L. C. J. Yes, he hath made a very good one now. Were you of his acquaintance, Mr. Fenwick? speak home, and don't mince the matter.

Fenwick. My lord, I have seen him.

L. C. J. I wonder what you are made of: Ask a Protestant, an English one, a plain question, and he will scorn to come dallying with an evasive answer.

Fenw. My Lord, I have been several times in his company.

L. C. J. Did you pay 8*s.* for him?

Fenw. Yes, I believe I did.

L. C. J. How came you to do it?

Fenw. He was going to St. Omers.

L. C. J. Why, were you Treasurer for the Society?

Fenw. No, my Lord, I was not.

L. C. J. You never had your 8*s.* again, had you?

Fenw. It is upon my book, my Lord, if I ever had it.

L. C. J. Did Mr. Oates ever pay it again?

Fenw. No, sure, he was never so honest.

L. C. J. Who had you it of then?

Fenw. I am certain I had it not from him; he did not pay it.

L. C. J. How can you tell you had it then?

Fenw. I do suppose I had it again, but not of Mr. Oates.

L. C. J. Had you it of Ireland?

Fenw. I do not know who I had it of, my lord, nor certainly whether I had it.

L. C. J. Why did you not ask Mr. Oates for it?

Fenw. He was not able to pay it.

L. C. J. Why did you then lay it down for him?

Fenw. Because I was a fool.

L. C. J. That must be the conclusion always: when you cannot evade being proved knaves by answering directly, you will rather suffer yourselves to be called fools.

Fenw. My Lord, I have done more for him than that comes to; for he came once to me in a miserable poor condition, and said, I must turn again, and betake myself to the ministry to get bread, for I have eaten nothing these two days: and I then gave him five shillings to relieve his present necessity.

Oates. My Lord, I will answer to that; I was never in any such straits, I was ordered by the provincial to be taken care of by the Procurator.

Fenw. You brought no such order to me.

Oates. Yes, Mr. Fenwick, you know there was such an order, and I never received so little in my life as five shillings from you: I have received 20 and 30 and 40*s.* at a time, but never so little as five.

L. C. J. You are more charitable than you thought for.

Fenw. He told me he had not eaten a bit in two days.

Oates. I have indeed gone a whole day without eating, when I have been hurried about your trash; but I assure you, my lord, I never wanted for any thing among them.

L. C. J. Perhaps it was fasting-day.

L. C. Baron. My Lord, their fasting-days are none of the worst.

Oates. No, we commonly eat best of those days.

L. C. J. Have you any thing to ask him, any of you?

Whitebread. My Lord, will you be pleased to give me leave to speak for myself.

Just. Atkins. It is not your time yet to make your full defence, but if you will ask him any questions, you may.

Whitebread. I crave your mercy my Lord.

L. C. J. Will you ask him any questions?

Fenw. Did not you say that you were at my chamber the 24th of April, with the resolve of the consult?

Oates. That resolve I did then carry to your chamber.

Fenw. Then was he himself at St. Omers.

L. C. J. The difference of old stile, and new stile may perhaps make some alteration in that circumstance.

Whitebread. But, my Lord, he hath sworn he was present at several consultations in April and May, but from November till June he was constantly at St. Omers.

L. C. J. If you can make it out that he was at St. Omers all April and May, then what he hath said cannot be true.

Ireland. He himself hath confessed it that he was at St. Omers.

L. C. J. If you mean by confession, what stands upon the evidence he hath given, I will remember you what that was. He says he came to St. Omers—

Oates. Will your lordship give me leave to satisfy the court: in the month of December, or November, I went to St. Omers: I remained there all January, February, March, and some part of April: then I came over with the Fathers to the consult that was appointed the 24th of that month.

Fenw. Did you go back again? Oates. Yes.

Fenw. When was that?

Oates. In the month of May, presently after the consults were over.

Fenw. And we can prove by abundance of witnesses that he went not from St. Omers all that month.

L. C. J. You shall have what time you will to prove what you can; and if you can prove what you say, you were best fix it upon him; for he saith he was here at the consults in April and May; if you can prove otherwise, pray do.

Fenw. We can bring an authentic writing (if there be any such) from St. Omers, under the seal of the college, and testified by all in the college, that he was there all the while.

L. C. J. Mr. Fenwick, that will not do; for first, if it were in any other case besides this, it would be no evidence; but I know not what you cannot get from St. Omers, or what you will not call authentic.

Fenw. Does your lordship think there is no justice out of England?

L. C. J. It is not, nor cannot be evidence here.

Fenw. It shall be signed by the magistrates of the town.

L. C. J. What, there?

Fenw. Yes, there.

L. C. J. You must be tried by the laws of England, which sends no piece of fact out of the country to be tried.

Fenw. But the evidence of it may be brought hither.

L. C. J. Then you should have brought it. You shall have a fair trial; but we must not depart from the law or the way of trial, to serve your purposes. You must be tried according to the law of the land.

Just. Atkins. Such evidences as you speak of we would not allow against you; and therefore we must not allow it for you.

Whit. May this gentleman be put to this; to produce any two witnesses that saw him in town at that time?

Oates. I will give some circumstances and what tokens I have to prove my being here: Father Warner, sir Tho. Preston, Father Williams, and sir John Warner, they came hither with me from St. Omers; there was one Nevil, &c. I cannot reckon them all.

L. C. J. You have named enough.

Oates. But to convince them, there was a lad in the house that was got to the end of his Rhetorick; this lad was whipt and turned out of the house, and had lost all his money: Father Williams did re-imburse this lad in order to his bringing home, I think the lad's name was Hilsley, or some such name. And we came up to London together.

L. C. J. What say you to this circumstance?

Whit. My Lord, he knew that two such came to town, but he was not with them.

L. C. J. You are now very good at a negative, I see; how can you tell that?

Whit. My Lord, he could not come.

L. C. J. How can you tell he could not come?

Whit. I can tell it very well, for he had no order to come, nor did come.

L. C. J. How can you undertake to say that he did not come?

Whit. Because he had no order to come.

L. C. J. Is that all your reason? Where were you then?—Whit. I was here.

L. C. J. How do you know he was not here?

Whit. He had no orders to come.

L. C. J. Have you any other circumstance, Mr. Oates, to prove that you were here then?

Oates. My lord, when I came to London, I was ordered to keep very close, and I lay at Grove's house; let him deny it if he can, I will tell you who lay there then—

Grove. Did you ever lie at my house?

Oates. There lay a flaxen-haired gentleman, I forgot his name: but I will tell you who lay there besides; that is Strange, that was the late provincial.

L. C. J. Did Strange ever lie at your house?

Grove. Yes, my lord, he did.

L. C. J. Did he lie there in April or May?

Grove. No, he did not in either of them.

L. C. J. You will make that appear.

Grove. Yes, that I can by all the house.

L. C. J. Have you any more questions to ask him? If you have, do: If you can prove this upon him, that he was absent, and not in England in April or May, you have made a great defence for yourselves, and it shall be remembered for your advantage when it comes to your turn: in the mean time, if you have no more to say to him, call another witness. Let Mr. Oates sit down again, and have some refreshment.

Mr. Serj. Baldwin. We will now call Mr. Bedlow, my lord.

Then Mr. Bedlow was sworn.

Mr. Serj. Baldwin. Mr. Bedlow, pray do you tell my lord and the jury what you know of any design of killing the king and by whom.

Bedlow. My Lord, I have been five years almost employed by the society of Jesuits and the English monks in Paris to carry and bring letters between them from England and to England for the promoting of a design tending to the subversion of the government, and the extirpating of the Protestant Religion, to that degree (which was always concluded on in all their consults wherein I was) that they would not leave any member of any Heretic in England, that should survive to tell in the kingdom hereafter that there ever was any such religion in England as the Protestant Religion—

Here Whitebread would have interrupted him.

My lord, I am so well satisfied in their denials, that I cannot but believe they who can give a dispensation, and have received the sacrament to kill a king and destroy a whole kingdom, do not scruple to give a dispensation for a little lye to promote such a design, for so much as this expiates any lie or greater crime.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Pray, sir, will you be pleased to tell your whole knowledge concerning the prisoners at the bar.

Bedlow. The first letter I carried was from Mr. Harcourt, at his house next door to the arch in Duke-street. He hath been Procurator for the Jesuits about six years. He employed me first, and sent for me over, for I was then lieutenant in Flanders, and coming home to receive my pay that was due to me——

L. C. J. How long is it ago?

Bedlow. Michaelmas last was four years; when I came to Dunkirk I went to visit the English sunnery there, and the lady Abbess finding me very pliable and inclinable, made very much of me, and I did adhere to her. She kept me six weeks in the convent, and afterwards when I went away, recommended me to sir John Warner, as an instrument fit to be employed in the carrying of letters, or doing any thing that would promote the design against England. He kept me at St. Omers a fortnight and after sent me to Father Harcourt to be instructed in my employment. It was then winter; the next spring he sends me into England with divers letters, where by Mr. Harcourt I was employed to carry several letters to Morton and Doway, and other places: that summer I was sent into England without an answer: but afterwards, in 1676, which was the next summer, I was to carry another packet of letters to the monks at Paris, who sent it to other English Monks in France——

L. C. J. Who sent that packet of letters in 1676?

Bedlow. I had it from Mr. Harcourt, and it was written by Harcourt, Pritchard and Cary.

L. C. J. To whom?

Bedlow. To the English Monks in France, and in it there was a letter to La Chaise. Upon the receipt of these letters at Paris La Chaise had a consultation with the Monks and a French bishop or two about them; I did not then speak French enough to understand what it was they said, but it was interpreted to me by Mr. Stapleton an English Monk, who told me that it was a letter from my lord Bellasis and others of the Catholic religion, English gentlemen that were contrivers of the plot here, to satisfy them in what state things stood in England as to popery. I was sent back again with a packet of letters directed to Mr. Vaughan of Courtfield in Monmouthshire.

L. C. J. From whom was that?

Bedlow. From the English Monks at Paris. From that consultation I went to Pontbois, I there received other letters to carry into England, I had a course to open their letters, and read what was in them; and in those letters was contained, that the prayers of that house were for the prosperity of that design, and they would not fail to be at the consultation at _____ of Warwickshire gentlemen. I fell sick at Monmouth, and Mr. Vaughan sent to me a Jesuit to confess me; but I was well before he came, and so was not confessed by him. I now come to the latter times.

L. C. J. You must speak it over to the Jury, that they and the prisoners may hear you.

Bedlow. The 25th of May, 1677, which was last year, I was sent over with another packet of letters. I had no letters of consequence forward, and therefore did not call there at Wotton, but I called upon the lady Abbess at Dunkirk, and I went thence to Bruges and to Ghent, where I had some letters for the English nuns, which I delivered to them. When I came to Doway, I found there that the monks were gone, that was Sheldou, Stapleton, and Lathau, but the letters were directed to Paris, and therefore I made haste, and at Cambray I overtook them. And the letters were to give an account of the consultation held in the gallery at Somerset-house: All tending to the destruction of the Protestant religion, and killing the king; but I do not think fit to declare here who were the persons that were present at that consultation. At Cambray they were very joyful that there was so good a proceeding in England. At Paris when the letters were shewed, there was a letter written in a language which I did not understand, but, as I was told, in that letter they were charged in Paris by my lord Bellasis, that they did not proceed according to their promise to them in England; but, said Stapleton to me. My lord Bellasis nor the society in England need not to write thus to us, for we are not so backward but that we can lend men, and money, and arms too, and will upon occasion. From thence they sent me to Spain with a letter to an Irish Father: I did overtake him at Sa Mora. From thence I went with another letter to the rector of a College of Irish Jesuits in Salamanca. By their contrivance I was sent to St. Jago in Spain, where was another college of Irish Jesuits: there I staid till I had an answer to sir William Godolphin; and when I had the answer to that letter, I went for the letter from the rector at Salamanca. The Jesuits there told me, they would take care to send their own answer another way; And when they had made me that promise, I came away for England, and landed at Milford-Haven; All this reaches to none of those persons in particular; But what I now shall say shall be about them, only it was necessary I should speak of what I have said.

L. C. J. The meaning of all this is only to shew the Jury and satisfy them, that he was an agent for these men, and hath been employed by them for five years together, and he names you the particular places whether he hath been sent, to shew you the reasons of his knowledge in this matter, and upon what account he comes to be informed of this design.

Bedlow. Having received the news of that country, I did there take water, and landed again at Pensans, and when I came to London I gave the letter to Harcourt: what was in that packet I cannot particularly tell, for I was not so inquisitive as to look into the contents of it, but I know it was tending (as all the rest did) to the carrying on of this plot: Afterwards I was employed by Harcourt and Coleman to go to some parts of England to communicate the letters to some of the popish party.

L. C. J. Now turn to the Jury.

Bedlow. The Summer was past in the doing of that : In the beginning of August last there was a consultation and a close one at Harcourt's chamber, so as that they did not permit me to know any thing of it. I went out of town for a fortnight, and when I returned, I understood there had been such a meeting ; I charged them with their privacy in it, and asked what was the private design of that consultation ; they said it was something I should know in time : That it did not signify much at present, but in time I should know it : But then I understood by Pritchard, who was more my confidant than any of the rest, that it was a design to kill the king : That Pickering and Grove had undertaken it a great while, and that they had been endeavouring a long while to bring it to pass.

Fenwick. Where was this meeting, and when ?

Bedlow. Last August, at Harcourt's chamber.

Fenwick. Who were present there ?

Bedlow. Be pleased to give me leave to go on ; I will tell you by and by : Then I understood as I said, that it was to kill the king, but that Pickering and Grove failing of it, they had hired four ruffians that were to go to Windsor, and do it there and that if I would come the next day, I should hear from Coleman the effect ; When I came there I found Coleman was gone but Pritchard said there were some sent to Windsor, and that Coleman was going after them, and that he had given a messenger a guinea that was to carry the money to them. And he would presently be after them, for fear they should want opportunity to effect their design. Then I discoursed them, why they kept their design so long hid from me ? They said it was a resolve of the society, and an order of my lord Bellasis, that none should know it but the society, and those that were actors in it. I seemed satisfied with that answer at present. About the latter end of August, or the beginning of September, (but I believe it was the latter end of August) I came to Harcourt's chamber, and there was Ireland and Pritchard, and Pickering, and Grove.

L. C. J. What part of August was it ?

Bedlow. The latter end.

L. C. J. Do you say it positively, that it was the latter end of August.

Bedlow. My lord, it was in August ; I do not swear positively to a day.

L. C. J. But you say it was in August ?

Ireland. And that we were there present ?

Bedlow. You were there, and Grove, and Pickering.

Ireland. Did you see me before ?

Bedlow. You were present there, and Grove, and Pickering, and Pritchard, and Fogarthy, and Harcourt, and I.

L. C. J. What did you talk of there ?

Bedlow. That the ruffians missing of killing the king at Windsor, Pickering and Grove should go on, and that Conyers should be joined with them ; and that was to assassinate the king in his morning walks at Newmarket : and they had taken it so strongly upon them, that they were very eager upon it : And Grove was more forward than the rest : And said, since it could not be done clandestinely, it should be attempted openly. And that those that do fail, had the glory to die in a good cause. But (said he) if it be discovered, the discovery can never come to that height, but their party would be strong enough to bring it to pass.

L. C. J. And you swear Ireland was there ?

Bedlow. He was there, my Lord.

L. C. J. And heard all this ?

Bedlow. Yes, my Lord ; and so did Grove and Pickering, and the rest.

Ireland. My Lord, I never saw him before in my life.

L. C. J. What was the reward that you were to have for your pains in this business ?

Bedlow. My Lord, the reward that I was to have (as it was told me by Harcourt) was very considerable : I belonged to one particular part of the society. There are others ; and I presume, they each kept their particular messengers.

L. C. J. What was Grove to have ?

Bedlow. Grove was to have fifteen hundred pound, if he escaped, and to be a continual favourite, and respected as a great person by all the church.

L. C. J. What was Pickering to have ?

Bedlow. He was to have so many masses, I cannot presume to tell the number ; but they were to be as many, as at twelve pence a mass should come to that money : These masses were to be communicated to all the Jesuits beyond the seas, that when he had done it, he might be sent away immediately.

L. C. J. What can you say of any of the rest ?

Bedlow. My lord, I do not charge any more but them three.

L. C. J. What say you to Whitebread ?

Bedlow. They have said, that he was very active in the plot ; but I know it not.

L. C. J. That is not any evidence against him. What can you say, as to Fenwick ?

Bedlow. No more than I have said, as to Mr. Whitebread : I only know him by sight.

L. C. J. Then he charges only these three upon oath, Ireland, Pickering, and Grove.

Ireland. Do you know sir John Warner ?

Bedlow. I know Father Warner at St. Omers, and sir John Warner at Weston by St. Omers.

Ireland. He named sir John Warner to be at Paris.

Bedlow. It was Sheldon I spoke of (my lord) at Paris.

Ireland. At least you are certain, that I was present at that consultation.

Bedlow. Yes : I am certain, you were there.

Ireland. Can you produce any witness, that you ever spoke to me before in your life ?

Mr. Serj. Baldwyn. Do you know any thing of Mr. Whitebread's being present at any of the council ?

Bedlow. I do know, that Whitebread, and Fenwick both, have been several times at consultations; but I do not know what the particular resolves of those consultations were.

L. C. J. Did you ever hear them speak any thing in particular?

Bedlow. No, I have never heard them speak any thing in particular.

L. C. J. Where have you seen Fenwick?

Bedlow. I have seen Fenwick at Harcourt's chamber, and I have often heard him talked of; and it hath been told me, That nothing was done without Fenwick.

Whitebread. Are you sure you know us?

Bedlow. I do not say, you are the man that employed me: you are the man I was least acquainted with, of all the society; but I have seen you there.

Ireland. Can you bring any one that can testify it?

L. C. J. He must then have brought one of yourselves; and it may be, he cannot produce any such one.

Ireland. Nor no one else, except such a knight of the Post, as Mr. Oates.

L. C. J. You must be corrected for that, Mr. Ireland: You shall not come here to abuse the king's evidence. Nothing appears to us, that reflects upon Mr. Oates's testimony; and we must not suffer any such sort of language.

Mr. Just. Atk. Take off his credit as much as you can by proof, but you must not abuse him by ill language.

Mr. Finch. Can you tell the court and the jury, when it was that by agreement Grove should have the 1,500*l.*

Bedlow. He was to have it put into a friend's hands.

L. C. J. Do you know that friend's name?

Bedlow. No, my lord, I do not.

Mr. Finch. Do you know when that was to be delivered out to him?

Bedlow. As to the particular time of their agreement, I do not know it.

Mr. Finch. But this he says, That when the agreement was made, he was to have 1,500*l.*

L. C. J. And he says this, That Ireland was in August last, with Pickering and Grove, and others, at a consult; where he was also.

Ireland. But what if I prove I was not in London all August last, from the beginning to the end.

L. C. J. You heard them talk of this matter in August, at Harcourt's chamber, you say? What, did they talk of it as a matter they had agreed?

Bedlow. My lord, they brought it in, as being baulked in their design of killing the king at Windsor; and because that had not taken the effect they intended it, they should have Conyers joined to them, to do it at Newmarket.

Mr. Finch. Did they tell you when, and where the agreement was made?

L. C. J. No, he speaks not of that; but they talked of the failure at Windsor: And therefore they did conclude, that Conyers should be joined to them, to do it at Newmarket.—Bedlow. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Have you any more to say?

Bedlow. My lord, I would only say this; If I had any to prove what I say, they must be parties as well as these persons.

Ireland. My lord, I will prove, That I was not in town in August all the month, by twenty witnesses: I will bring those that saw me in Staffordshire, and spoke with me all August.

L. C. J. Have you any more to ask him?

Whitebread. No.

Serj. Baldwin. Swear Mr. William Bedlow. And he was sworn.

Ireland. He does say, That he was familiar with me, and several other persons here; and therefore, I desire he may specify the place, and the company.

William Bedlow. I do not say, there was a familiarity; for I was a stranger to that part of the society.

L. C. J. You must take him right, Mr. Ireland; he hath not said, that he was of your familiar acquaintance.

Bedlow. I have seen you often, sir.

Ireland. Where?

Bedlow. At Monsieur le Faire's.

Ireland. Where was that?

Bedlow. At Somerset-house.

Ireland. Was there any one present besides?

Bedlow. Yes, several other priests and Jesuits of Somerset-house.

Ireland. Name one.

Bedlow. Signior Ferrare.

Ireland. You say, you saw me and Ferrare together at Somerset-house, I suppose, if signior Ferrare may be brought hither—

Bedlow. My lord, Ferrare is a priest in orders; and without doubt is in this business.

L. C. J. If he did see you, he must see you in such company as you keep, they were priests and Jesuits, and of your own religion; and we know very well what answers we are like to be put off with by men of your own persuasion at this time of day.

Ireland. My lord, if no body's oath can be taken that is of another persuasion than the church of England, it is hard.

L. C. J. Pray mind you do not object ingeniously: for you say, This witness swears he saw me in such company, why does he not produce them to testify it? Why? he does not come prepared to produce them; if he should, we know well how you are concerned one for another at this time; and we can hardly expect they should make true answers. But notwithstanding, if you will produce this Father Ferrare, (he cannot be sworn because it is against the law, but) his testimony shall be heard, and let it go as far as it can.

Bedlow. If your lordship pleases, my lord, I would convince him that he does know me. Have you not been, sir, at Somerset-house?

Ireland. Yes, I have.

Bedlow. Do you know le Faire and Ferrare?

Ireland. Yes, but I never saw you in their company in Somersethouse in my life, above once or twice.

Bedlow. Yes, you have twice at le Faire's.

L. C. J. Where is that le Faire? You would do well to produce him?

Bedlow. My lord, he is gone away, and is gone against whom the king's proclamation is out.

L. C. J. You keep such company as run away, and then you require him to produce them, whom the king's proclamation cannot bring in.

Ireland. I keep none but honest company.

Bedlow. If your lordship pleases, I have one thing more that is very material to speak; at the same time that there was a discourse about these three gentlemen's being to destroy the king at Newmarket, at the same time there was a discourse of a design to kill several noble persons; and the particular parts assigned to every one. Knight was to kill the earl of Shaftsbury, Pritchard the duke of Buckingham, Oneile the earl of Ossory, Obrian the duke of Ormond.

L. C. J. Well, will you have any more of this?

Mr. Finch. You say, you saw Mr. Ireland say mass, where did you see him?

Bedlow. Not Mr. Ireland, but Mr. Fenwick, I have seen him say mass, and at Wild-house.

Oates. My lord, I did omit a consult wherein there was a design had of taking away the duke of Ormond's life, and of a rebellion that was to be raised in Ireland. My lord, in the month of January last, there came letters from archbishop Talbot to London, which letters were perused, by Fenwick, and Ireland, and Whitebread, and when they were perused, they were sent and communicated to the Fathers at St. Omers. The contents of those letters were thus, That the Catholics had a fair prospect of effecting their designs in the kingdom of Ireland. And this letter was inclosed in a letter signed by Whitebread, Ireland, Fenwick, and others, I name no man's name that is not here.

L. C. J. You saw the letter?

Oates. Yes, I did see it, and read it, wherein they did give thanks unto God, that he was pleased to prosper their designs so fairly in Ireland; and withal they did say, that they would not leave a stone unturned to root out that abominable heresy out of that kingdom. Now what that abominable heresy was, I have nothing but a conjecture.

L. C. J. We all know what that is well enough, there needs no proof of that.

Oates. In the month of August, Fenwick, a little before he went to St. Omers, on the 21st of August, (as I think it was) that week that Bartholomew-fair began on (as I take it) he was then going to fetch home the provincial, and to carry some students with him, and he went unto St. Omers the Monday following; but then there was a consult, and at that consult Fenwick did consent to the contrivance of the death of the duke of Ormond, and for the rebellion that was to be raised in Ireland after his death. And he did approve of the four Jesuits that were to kill my lord of Ormond, and did consent to send Fogarty down to the archbishop of Dublin, in case the four good Fathers did not hit the business. Mr. Whitebread, my lord, did consent when he came over, as appears by their entry-books. For there came a letter from him dated as from St. Omers, but I concluded it did not come from thence, because it paid but two-pence.

Whitebread. Who was it that writ that letter?

Oates. My lord, this letter was dated as the latter part of August, and dated as from St. Omers, but the post mark upon it was but two-pence, to be paid for it; so that I do conclude thence Mr. Whitebread was then at esquire Leigh's house in Boston that letter he did like the proposal that was made about killing the duke of Ormond in that consult, and the letter was signed with his own hand.

L. C. J. I would gladly see that letter.

Oates. If I could see it, I could know it.

L. C. J. You have not that letter?

Oates. No, but they kept a book wherein they registered all their resolutions, and there it was entered.

L. C. J. You upon your oath say, That he as superior of them did keep a book, wherein they registered all their consults?

Oates. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. You would do well to shew us your book, Mr. Whitebread.

Whitebread. We never kept any.

Oates. The consult did; for though the superior have an absolute power over the subject, yet they never do any thing of consequence without the consult. And this book was kept by the superior, and never opened but at the consult, and therein all the passages were registered.

L. C. J. Produce your book, and we shall see whether you cannot catch Mr. Oates in something or other.

Bedlow. My lord, that book I have seen, and therein all their consults are registered.

L. C. J. Was their books kept by them?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, all the consults did keep books, and Mr. Langhorn was the person that registered all into one.

L. C. J. If a hundred witnesses swear it, they will deny it. Well, will you have any more?

Mr. S. Baldwyn. My lord, we will now call Mr. James Bedlow, this gentleman's brother, to shew you, that these sort of persons did resort to him frequently.

L. C. J. Are you sworn, sir?

J. Bedlow. Yes, my lord, I am.

L. C. J. Then let me ask you one short question. Do you know Mr. Ireland?

J. Bedlow. No.

L. C. J. Do you know Pickering or Grove?

J. Bedlow. I have heard of them.

L. C. J. Did your brother know any thing of them?

J. Bedlow. As for the conspiracy of killing the king, I know nothing of it; but about his knowledge of Priests and Jesuits, and the converse he had beyond sea, that I can speak to. And I have very often heard these men's names named.

L. C. J. In what nature did he talk of them?

J. Bedlow. I know nothing of the Plot, and as for any Design I know not what my brother knew, but I have heard him talk of them.

L. C. J. How did he talk of them?

J. Bedlow. He mentioned them in his acquaintance, the Jesuits there did ask him questions about them.

L. C. J. And did it appear to you they were of his acquaintance?

J. Bedlow. But I understood nothing of the Plot or Design, by the oath I have taken.

L. C. J. But did he speak as if he knew any of them?

J. Bedlow. For any certain knowledge that my brother had of them I cannot speak, but I have often heard him talk of them as people I thought he knew.

Mr. Finch. Do you know, that when he came over from beyond sea, that his lodging was frequented by any, and by whom?

J. Bedlow. Yes, there were many priests and Jesuits came to him.

Mr. Finch. Did your brother receive any money from them?

J. Bedlow. Yes, my lord, I have fetched many score of pounds for my brother from them.

L. C. J. The use, gentlemen, that the king's council make of this evidence, is only to shew, That his brother Mr. Bedlow was conversant in their affairs, in that he hath received many a score of pounds in the managing of their business.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Pray, from whom had your brother that money?

J. Bedlow. I have proved that from the goldsmiths themselves that paid it, before the duke of Monmouth, my lord chancellor, and lord treasurer.

Mr. Finch. Have you received any considerable sum at a time?

J. Bedlow. Yes, I have.

Mr. Finch. How much?

J. Bedlow. Fifty or threescore pounds at a time.

Finch. Of whom?

J. Bedlow. Of Priests and Jesuits.

Finch. For whom?

J. Bedlow. For my brother.

L. C. J. Will you have any more evidence?

Mr. Serj. Baldwyn. Yes, my lord, the next evidence we produce, is concerning a letter; there was a letter written by one Mr. Peters, that is now a prisoner, to one Tonstall a Jesuit; and this letter does mention, That there was a meeting appointed by order of Whitebread to be at London.

L. C. J. What is that to them, and how come you by it?

Serj. Baldwyn. Peters is now in prison for things of this nature; and you have heard of one Harcourt, and out of his study this letter was taken.

W. Bedlow. My lord, may I not have liberty to withdraw? My head akes so extremely, I cannot endure it.

L. C. J. Mr. Bedlow, you may sit down, but we cannot part with you yet.

Ireland. I desire, my lord, that his brother may be asked, how long he had known me.

L. C. J. Can you recollect by the discourses you have heard, how long he might have known Ireland?

J. Bedlow. No, my lord, it was out of my way.

L. C. J. But did he talk of Ireland?

J. Bedlow. Yes, my lord, he did.

Ireland. As being where, in what place?

J. Bedlow. I cannot tell.

Ireland. He named one place three years ago, it was at Paris.

L. C. J. But he does not say that you were there, but that you were familiarly talked of there; so that the meaning is, they were acquainted with you: And this is only brought to shew, that it is not a new-taken-up thing by Bedlow, though you seemed never to have known any such man; yet he swears, saith he, I have heard such persons talked of as my brother's acquaintance.

Ireland. If his brother had talked of me three years ago, why then he must have known me three years ago.

L. C. J. I will ask him that question: How long is it since you knew him?

W. Bedlow. I have known him but since August this same last summer; but, my lord, I talkt five, and four years ago of several English Monks and Jesuits that were then at Rome, that I never knew in my life.

L. C. J. His answer then is this, saith his brother, I have heard him talk of them three years ago; I then asked Bedlow, how long he had known them? saith he, I did not know them three years ago, though I did talk of them three years ago; for we have talkt of many that we never saw in our lives: So it seems he had occasion to make use of your names frequently, and join them with those of some he knew better: But he never knew you 'till August last; but he did discourse of you three years ago, as known for such sort of persons.

Ireland. He must hear somebody speak of us, as being in some place or another.

W. Bedlow. I will satisfy you in that. We talk of some now in England, that are to be sent a year hence.

L. C. J. If you can produce but Harcourt and Le Faire, they will do you great service now.

W. Bedlow. My lord, as for example, Father Pritchard is confessor to such a gentleman in England now this year; a year hence we must send such a one hither, and he must go back. And we may talk of that person as in England, two years before.

L. C. J. You need not trouble yourselves about that. Mr. Ireland, you shall have a fair trial, but you will not have cunning or art enough to deceive the jury, nor will Mr. Whitebread have learning enough to baffle the court.

Then Mr. W. Bedlow and his Brother withdrew.

Serj. Baldwyn. My lord, The next evidence that we shall give, as I said, is a letter from one Peters to one Tonstall, and this we will bring home to Mr. Whitebread, for it is an invitation to be at the consult held at London the 24th of April; and it was written about that very time, to wit, the 3d of April. It was written from London, and it mentions, that Mr. Whitebread did fix the meeting at that time. We will tell you how we came by the letter. Mr. Harcourt, who is one of the principal persons here, and at whose house was the meeting you heard of, he himself is fled away, when they came to look after him upon the discovery that was made: And Mr. Bradley, who was the messenger to seize upon him, did according to direction search his study, and did there find this letter, which we conceive, my lord, to be very good evidence; this Harcourt being a party, and one at whose house the last meeting was, and others was. We do conceive a letter from one of that party, bearing date about the same time, concerning Mr. Whitebread's Summons, who was master of the Company, is very good evidence against them.

L. C. J. If you had found it in Mr. Whitebread's custody, you say something.

Just. Bertie. My brother puts it so: We find a letter directed to Mr. Whitebread, let the matter of it be what it will, it is found among Harcourt's papers.

Serj. Baldwyn. No, my Lord; we find a letter from one Mr. Peters now a prisoner directed to Mr. Tonstall concerning the consult summoned by Whitebread, and this we find in Harcourt's possession.

L. C. J. I cannot understand how this may affect Mr. Whitebread.

Mr. Finch. Pray, my Lord, if your lordship please, this is the use we make of this letter; we do not produce it as another evidence of this design, but to fortify that part of the evidence which hath already been given, That there was a consult summoned at that time, and to be held with all the privacy that could be, to prevent discovery. And this is the paper that we find in the custody of Harcourt, one of the conspirators, who is fled for it.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Finch, if you use it not against any particular person, but as an evidence in general that there was a plot amongst them, you say right enough; but it cannot be evidence against any one particular person of the prisoners at the bar.

Mr. Finch. My lord, it can affect no particular person; but we only use it in the general, and we pray it may be read.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the jury, before you hear the letter read, I would say this to you, Let them have fair play; whatsoever they mete unto others, we will shew them justice. They shall have as fair play upon their trials as any persons whatsoever. The thing that is offered to be given in evidence, is a letter written by one Peters a prisoner for this plot, and directed to one Tonstall a jesuit, and this is found in Harcourt's chamber, a priest that is fled, and one whom the king hath commanded to render himself by his proclamation; but he does not. Now in that letter there is a discourse of a design and plot on foot. This cannot be evidence to charge any one particular person of these; but only to satisfy you and all the world, that those letters and papers that are found amongst their own priests, do fortify the testimony of Mr. Oates, that there is a general plot: It is not applied to any particular person.

Oates. The day before the consult met, Mr. Whitebread did ask Mr. Peters whether he had summoned the consult according to his direction. Mr. Peters told him, Yes, he had writ into Warwickshire and Worcestershire.

Whitebread. When was this?

Oates. The day before the consult met.

Whitebread. Did you hear me ask Mr. Peters?

Oates. Yes, I did hear you, and I did hear him say he had done it. Now, my Lord, this letter that is found in Harcourt's study shews, that Mr. Whitebread had directed Mr. Peters in this consult.

Serj. Baldwyn. Pray swear sir Tho. Doleman to shew how he came by it. Which was done.

Serj. Baldwyn. Sir Thomas Doleman, what do you know of this letter?

Sir Tho. Doleman. This letter in my hand was taken amongst Harcourt's papers, in a great bag of paper; and searching them I did find this letter amongst the rest.

Then the letter was shewn to Mr. Oates.

L. C. J. Is that Mr. Peter's hand?

Oates. Yes, my lord, it is.

L. C. J. Were you acquainted with his hand?

Oates. Yes, my Lord, I have often read it in letters.

L. C. J. Do you know Tonstall?

Oates. My Lord, I do not know him by that name; If I did see him, perhaps I might I know men better by their faces.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Pray read it.

Cl. of the Cr. This is dated February 23, 1677. And superscribed thus, ("These for his honoured friend Mr. William Tonstall at Burton.")

"Honoured dear Sir,

"I have but time to convey these following particulars to you. First, I am to give you notice, that it hath seemed fitting to our Master Consult, Prov. &c. to fix the 21st day of April next Stylo veteri, for the meeting at London of our congregation, on which day all those that have a suffrage are to be present there, that they may be ready to give beginning to the same on the 24th, which is the next after St. George's-day. You are warned to have jus suffragii, and therefore it your occasions should not permit you to be pre'sent, you are to signify as much, to the end

'others in their ranks be ordered to supply
'your absence: Every one is minded also, not
'to hasten to London long before the time ap'pointed, nor to appear much about the town
'until the meeting be over, lest occasion should 'be given to suspect the design. Finally,
'secrecy, as to the time and place, is much re-
'commended to all those that receive summons,
'as it will appear of its own nature necessary.'

L. C. J. So it was very necessary, indeed.
Cl. of Cr. There is more of it my Lord.

*' Tertio pro domino solimo disco
' Ben. fact. Proo. Luniensis.*

'I am straitened for time, that I can only
'assure you, I shall be much glad of obliging
'you any ways, Sir, your servant

EDWARD PETRE,

"Pray my service where due, &c."

L. C. J. You know nothing of this letter,
Mr. Whitebread?

Whitebread No, my Lord, nothing at all.

L. C. J. Nor you, Mr. Ireland?

Ireland. It is none of my letter, my Lord.

L. C. J. Did you never hear of it before?

Ireland. Not that I know of in particular.

L. C. J. Well, have you done with the evidence for the king?

Serj. Baldwin. Pray, sir Thomas Doleman, will you tell my Lord, did Mr. Oates give in this testimony of the consult, to be the 24th of April, before this letter was found?

Sir T. Doleman. Mr. Oates gave in his information about this matter, to the king and council, four or five days before we found this letter.

Serj. Baldwin. You were speaking of the seals that were made use of to sign commissions, have you them in the Court?

Oates. Yes, my lord, they are in the Court, and they were taken out of the Provincial's chamber.

Whitebread. I confess they had the seals out of my chamber; but the taking of them was more than they had power to do.

Then the Seals were shewn to the Court and the Jury.

Mr. Finch. It hath been told you already, gentlemen, what use these seals were put unto;
to seal commissions to raise an army. And we have now done with our evidence for the king, until we hear what the prisoners say.

L. C. J. Before you come to make your defence, I will do that which I think in justice and honesty, and according to the duty of my place and my oath, I ought to do; that is, to say something to the jury, before the prisoners make their own defence. Here are five that stand indicted of high-treason; I must tell you this, That as to three of them, that is to say, Ireland, Pickering and Grove, both Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow have sworn the thing flat upon them: Mr. Oates his testimony is full against them all; but Mr. Bedlow does only agree with him to charge three, and that in this particular: saith he, I was present at Har-court's chamber when Ireland was there, and Pickering and Grove, where they discoursed of their defeat about their design against the king at Windsor; and there they came to a new agreement, to do it at New-Market. So that here is now, as the king's counsel did open it to you at the first, as there ought to be, two witnesses; so here are two, which though they speak as to a different circumstance of time, yet they prove one treasonable fact at several times: for if killing the king be the fact in question, and one proves they would do it by one thing, and another by another; and one in one place, and another in another; yet these are two witnesses to prove one fact, that is, the substance, which is, the killing of the king.

So that there are two witnesses against them three, expressly proving a confederacy to kill the king: for Ireland's being by, and consenting, was the same thing, and as much, as if he had been to do it with Grove and Pickering; for there are no accessories in treason. I do acknowledge, that Mr.
Oates hath given a very full and ample testimony, accompanied with all the circumstances of time and place, against them all, that may go far to weigh with you, all things considered, to believe there is a Plot;
yet I do not think that they have proved it against Whitebread and Fenwick by two witnesses: so that though the testimony be so full, as to satisfy a private conscience, yet we must go according to law too. It will be convenient, from what is already proved, to have them stay until more proof may come in: it is a great evidence that is against them; but it not being sufficient in point of law, we discharge you of them; it is not a legal proof to convict them by, whatsoever it may be to satisfy your consciences. Therefore remove Mr.
Fenwick and Mr. Whitebread from the bar, and let the other three say what they will for themselves.*

L. C. Baron. (William Montague, esq.)
(speaking to the gaoler,) you must understand they are no way acquitted; the evidence is so full against them by Mr. Oates's testimony, that there is no reason to acquit them. It is as flat, as by one witness can be; and the king hath sent forth a proclamation for further discovery; before the time therein prefixed be out, no question there will come in more evidence:
therefore keep them as strict as you can.

Then Whitebread and Fenwick were taken back to the gaol by the keeper.

L. C. J. Now, gentlemen, you shall have liberty to make your full defence.

Ireland. First, I shall endeavour to prove there are not two witnesses against me: for that which he says, of my being at Harcourt's chamber in August, is false; for I will prove

* See the account of their Trials, June 13,
1679, infra, and the Note thereto.

I was all August long out of town, for I was then in Staffordshire.

L. C. J. Call your witnesses.

Ireland. If there be any of them here.

L. C. J. Whoever comes to give evidence for you, shall go and come in safety; they shall not be trepanned for any thing of that, but they shall be heard.

Ireland. My lord, we are kept so strict, that we are not permitted to send for any body.

L. C. J. As soon as your sister came to me, I ordered she should have access to you, and that you should have pen, ink and paper, in order to your defence; therefore call those witnesses you have, to prove what you say.

Ireland. I can only say this, That last August upon the 3rd day I went down to Staffordshire with my lord Aston, and his lady, and his son, and sir John Southcot and his lady, and all these can testify that I went down with them. Here is Mr. John Aston in town, if he may be found, who was in my company all August in Staffordshire.

L. C. J. Will you call that gentleman? Crier, call him.

Crier. Mr. John Aston.

Ireland. It is an hundred to one if he be here; for I have not been permitted so much as to send a scrap of paper.

L. C. J. Your sister had leave to go to whom you thought fit, in your behalf. You said you would prove it. Why don't you?

Ireland. I do as much as I can do.

L. C. J. What, by saying so?

Ireland. Why, I do name them that can testify.

L. C. J. If naming them should serve, you must have a law made on purpose for you.

Ireland. Then there is no help for innocence.

Recorder. To save him that labour, the king's evidence will prove, that he was in town at that time.

Serj. Baldwyn. Swear Sarah Paine. Which was done.

Serj. Baldwyn. My lord, this person was Mr. Grove's maid.

L. C. J. I believe you know your maid, Mr. Grove, don't you? Look upon her, she was your servant.

Grove. Yes, my lord, she was so, she is not so now.

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Ireland?

Sarah Paine. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Do you know whether Mr. Ireland was in town in August last, or no?

S. Paine. I saw him at his own house about a week before I went with my lord Arlington to Windsor.

L. C. J. When was that?

S. Paine. That was about a week after the king was gone thither.

L. C. J. Sir Tho. Doleman, what day was it the king was gone thither?

Sir T. Doleman. About the 13th of August.

L. C. J. Thirteen and seven is twenty; then you went to Windsor about the 20th, it seems, and you say that eight days before you saw Mr. Ireland at his own house?

S. Paine. Yes, my lord, about eight or nine days before that, I did see him at the door of his own house, which was a Scrivener's in Fetter-Lane. He was going into his own lodging.

L. C. J. How long had you known him before that time?

S. Paine. My lord, I knew him, for he came often to our house, when I lived at Mr. Grove's; he was the man that broke open the packet of letters that my master carried about afterwards, and he sealed all the packets that went beyond the seas. And he opened them still when the answers returned back again.

Ireland. Now must all the people of my lodging come and witness that I was out of my lodging all August.

L. C. J. Call them.

Ireland. There is one Anne Ireland.

L. C. J. Crier, call her.

Crier. Anne Ireland: Here she is.

L. C. J. Come, mistress, what can you say concerning your brother's being out of town in August?

A. Ireland. My lord, on Saturday the 3rd of August he set out to go into Staffordshire.

L. C. J. How long did he continue there?

A. Ireland. Till it was a fortnight before Michaelmas.

L. C. J. How can you remember that it was just the 3rd of August?

A. Ireland. I remember it by a very good circumstance, because on the Wednesday before, my brother and my mother, and I, were invited out to dinner; we stayed there all night, and all Thursday night, and Friday night my brother came home, and on Saturday he set out for Staffordshire.

L. C. J. Where was it, maid, that you saw him?

S. Paine. I saw him going in at the door of their own house.

L. C. J. When was that?

S. Paine. About a week before I went with my lord chamberlain to Windsor, which was a week after the king went thither.

L. C. J. That must be about the 12th or 13th. Are you sure you saw him?

S. Paine. Yes, my lord, I am sure I saw him.

L. C. J. Do you know this maid, Mr. Ireland?

Ireland. I do not know her, my lord.

L. C. J. She knows you by a very good token. You used to break open the letters at her master's house, and to seal them.

S. Paine. He knows me very well, for I have carried several letters to him, that came from the carrier as well as those that came from beyond sea.

L. C. J. They will deny any thing in the world.

Ireland. I profess, I do not know her. Twenty people may come to me, and yet I not know them; and she having been Mr. Grove's servant, may have brought me letters, and yet I not remember her. But, my lord, here is my mother Eleanor Ireland, that can testify the same.

L. C. J. Call her then.

Eier. Eleanor Ireland.

E. Ireland. Here.

L. C. J. Can you tell when your son went out of town?

E. Ireland. He went out of town the 3rd of August, towards Staffordshire.

Ireland. My lord, there is Mr. Charles Gifford will prove that I was a week after the beginning of September, and the latter end of August in Staffordshire.

L. C. J. That will not do: for she says that she saw you in London about the 10th or 12th of August; and she makes it out by a circumstance, which is better evidence than if she had come and sworn the precise day wherein she saw him; for I should not have been satisfied, unless she had given me a good account why she did know it to be such a day. She does it by circumstances, by which we must calculate that she saw you about the 12th or 13th day. She went to my lord Arlington's at such a day, a week after the king went to Windsor, and that was about the 13th, and she saw you a week before she went to my lord Arlington's, which must be the 12th or 13th. You say you went out of town the 3rd of August; who can swear you did not come back again?

Ireland. All the house can testify I did not come to my lodging.

E. Ireland. He went out of town the 3rd of August, and did not return till a fortnight before Michaelmas.

L. C. J. Did you lie at his house?

E. Ireland. I did then, my lord.

L. C. J. What, all that while?

E. Ireland. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. So did your daughter too, did she?

E. Ireland. Yes, she did.

Ireland. There are others that did see me the latter end of August in Staffordshire.

L. C. J. And you would fain have cramped him up, between the 20th and 31st; and then, it is possible, you might be in Staffordshire.

Ireland. If I might have been permitted to send in for such witness as I would have had, I could have brought them.

Recorder. Why, have you not a note of what witnesses you are to call? Why don't you call them according to that note?

Ireland. I had that but this morning.

L. C. J. Why, did you not send for them before, to have them ready?

Recorder. It is his sister that brings that note of the witnesses that he should call, and now they are not here.

A. Ireland. There was one Engletrap, and one Harrison, had promised to be here, that went with him into Staffordshire.

Oates. My lord, whenever we had a mind to come to town, we commonly writ our letters, and let them come to town two days after us. So that we might prove by the writing of such letters, if any question did arise, that we could not be at such a place at such a time. And when we pretended to go into the country, we have gone and taken a chamber in the city, and have had frequent cabals at our chambers there. Mr. Ireland writ a letter as dated from St. Omers, when I took my leave of him at his own chamber, which was betwixt the 12th and 24th in London. He was there; and afterwards when I went to Fenwick's chamber he came thither; a fortnight or ten days at least, I am sure it was in August.

L. C. J. Here are three witness upon oath about this one thing: Here is Mr. Bedlow that swears the fact, upon which the question arises to be in August; that you deny, and say you were out of town then: he produces a maid here, and she swears that about that time which by calculation must be about the 11th or 12th, she saw you going into your own house. And here is a third witness, who swears he knows nothing of this matter of fact, but he knows you were in town then, and that he took his leave of you as going to St. Omers.

Oates. Whereas he says, that the beginning of September he was in Staffordshire, he was in town the 1st of September, or 2nd* for then I had of him twenty shillings.

Ireland. This is a most false lye; for I was then in Staffordshire. And the witnesses contradict themselves; for the one saith, he took his leave of me, as going to St. Omers the 12th; the other saith, it was the latter end of August I was at Harcourt's chamber.

L. C. J. He does not say you went, but you pretended to go.

A. Ireland. Here is one Harrison, that was a coachman that went with them.

L. C. J. Well, what say you, friend? Do you know Mr. Ireland?

Harrison. I never saw the man before that time in my life, but I met with him at St. Albans.

L. C. J. When?

Harrison. The 5th of August. There I met with him, and was in a journey with him to the 16th.

L. C. J. What day of the week was it?

Harrison. Of a Monday.

L. C. J. Did he come from London on that day?

Har. I cannot tell that. But there I met him.

L. C. J. What time?

Har. In the evening.

L. C. J. Whereabouts in St. Albans?

Har. At the Bull-inn where we lodged.

L. C. J. Mr. Ireland, you say you went on Saturday out of town, did you stay at St. Albans till Monday?

Ireland. No, I went to Standon that day, and lay there on Saturday and Sunday night; on Monday I went to St. Albans.

L. C. J. What from thence?

* This was the perjury assigned in the first count of the indictment upon which Oates was convicted, May 9th, 1685. See the trial infra.

Ireland. Yes my lord.

L. C. J. Why did you go thither? Was that in your way?

Ireland. I went thither for the company of sir John Southcot and his lady.

L. C. J. How did you know that they went thither?

Ireland. I understood they were to meet my lord Aston, and lady, there.

L. C. J. What, on Monday night?

Ireland. Yes my lord.

Har. From thence I went with him to Tixwel, to my lord Aston's house, there we were all with him.

L. C. J. Were you my lord Aston's coachman?

Har. No, my lord, I was servant to sir John Southcot.

L. C. J. How came you to go with them?

Har. Because my lord Aston is my lady Southcot's brother.

L. C. J. How long was you in his company?

Har. From the 5th of August to the 16th, and then I was with him at West-Chester.

Mr. Just. Atkins. You have not yet talked of being at West-Chester all this while.

Ireland. My lord I must talk of my journey by degrees.

L. C. J. Before you said you were all August in Staffordshire; come, you must find out some evasion for that.

Ireland. In Staffordshire, and thereabouts.

L. C. J. You witness, who do you live with?

Har. With sir John Southcot.

L. C. J. Who brought you hither?

Har. I came only by a messenger last night.

L. C. J. Was not sir John Southcot in that journey himself?

Har. Yes my lord, he was.

L. C. J. Then you might as well have sent to sir John Southcot himself to come.

Ireland. I did it of myself; I never did such a thing before, and did not understand the way of it.

Ireland. It was mere chance she did send for those she did.

L. C. J. But why should she not send for sir John himself?

Ireland. She did not know that sir John was there.

L. C. J. You were not denied to send for any witnesses, were you?

Ireland. I was expressly denied; they would not let me have one bit of paper.

L. C. J. Fellow, what town was that in Staffordshire? tell me quickly.

Har. It was Tixwell, by my Lord Aston's; there we made a stay for three or four days, then we went to Nantwich, and so to West-Chester.

L. C. J. Were not you at Wolverhampton with him?

Har. No, my Lord, I was not there, I left him at West-Chester.

Ireland. My Lord, I was at Wolverhampton with Mr. Charles Gifford, and here he is to attest it.

L. C. J. Well, Sir, what say you?

Gifford. My Lord, I saw him there a day or two after St. Bartholomew's day, there he continued till the 9th of September; the 7th of September I saw him there, and I can bring twenty and twenty more, that saw him there. Then, as he said, he was to go towards London, I came again thither on the 9th, and there I found him. And this is all I have to say.

Oates. My Lord, I do know that day in September I speak of by a particular circumstance.

Ireland. My Lord, there is one William Bowdrel, that will testify the same, if I might send for him.

L. C. J. Why han't you him here.

Ireland. She hath done what she can to bring as many as she could.

L. C. J. Have you any more witnesses to call.

Ireland. I cannot tell whether there be any more here, or no.

L. C. J. Mr. Grove, what say you for yourself?

Grove. Mr. Oates says he lay at my house; my Lord I have not been able to send for any witnesses, and therefore I know not whether there be any here. They could prove that he did not lie there. He says he saw me receive the Sacrament at Wild-house, but he never did; and if I had any witnesses here, I could prove it.

L. C. J. He tells it you with such and such circumstances, who lay there at that time.

Grove. He did never lie there.

L. C. J. Why, you make as if you never knew Mr. Oates.

Grove. My Lord, I have seen him, but he never lay at my house.

L. C. J. Mr. Pickering, what say you for yourself? You rely upon your masses.

Pickering. I never saw Mr. Oates, as I know of, in my life.

L. C. J. What say you to Bedlow? He tells you he was with you in Harcourt's chamber such a day.

Pickering. I will take my oath I was never in Mr. Bedlow's company in all my life.

L. C. J. I make no question but you will; and have a dispensation for it when you have done. Well, have you any witnesses to call?

Pickering. I have not had time to send for any.

L. C. J. You might have moved the court, when you came at first, and they would have given you an order to send for any.

Ireland. Methinks there should be some witnesses brought that know Mr. Oates, to attest his reputation; for I am told, there are those that can prove very ill things against him, they say he broke prison at Dover.

L. C. J. Why have you not your witnesses here to prove it?

Ireland. We could have had them, if we had time.

L. C. J. See what you ask now; you would have time, and the jury are ready to go together about their verdict.

Ireland. Why, we desire but a little time to make out our proof.

L. C. J. Only you must tie up the jury, and they must neither eat nor drink till they give in a verdict.

Ireland. Then we must confess, there is no justice for innocence.

L. C. J. Well, if you have any more to say, say it.

Ireland. My Lord, I have produced witnesses that prove what I have said.

L. C. J. I will tell you what you have proved, you have produced your sister and your mother and the servant of Southcot; they say you went out the 3rd of August, and he gives an account you came to St. Albans on the 5th, and then there is another gentleman, Mr. Gifford, who says he saw you at Wolverhampton till about a week in September. Mr. Oates hath gainsaid him in that, so you have one witness against Mr. Oates for that circumstance. It cannot be true what Mr. Oates says, if you were there all that time, and it cannot be true what Mr. Gifford says, if you were in London then. And against your two witnesses, and the coachman, there are three witnesses, that swear the contrary, Mr. Oates, Mr. Bedlow, and the maid; so that if she and the other two be to be believed, here are three upon oath against your three upon bare affirmation.

Ireland. I do desire time, that we may bring in more witnesses.

L. C. J. Come, you are better prepared than you seem to be. Call whom you have to call. Can you prove that against Mr. Oates which you speak of? If you can, call your witnesses, in God's name. But only to asperse, though it be the way of your church, it shall not be the way of trial amongst us. We know you can call Heretics, and ill names, fast enough.

Ireland. That Hilsley that he names can prove, if he were here, that Mr. Oates was all the while at St. Omers.

L. C. J. Will you have any more witnesses called? If you will, do it, and do not let us spend the time of the court thus.

Grove. Here is Mrs. York, that it my sister, will your lordship please to ask her, whether she saw that gentleman at my house?

L. C. J. What say you Mistress?

York. No, my lord, not I.

Mr. Just. Atk. Nor I neither; might not he be there for all that?

Oates. To satisfy the court, my lord, I was in another habit, and went by another name.

L. C. J. Look you, he did as you all do, disguise yourselves.

Ireland. Though we have no more witnesses, yet we have witnesses that there are more witnesses.

L. C. J. I know what your way of arguing is; that is very pretty; you have witnesses that can prove you have witnesses, and those witnesses can prove you have more witnesses, and so in infinitum. And thus you argue in every thing you do.

Ireland. We can go no further than we can go, and can give no answer to what we did not know would be proved against us.

L. C. J. Then look you, gentlemen——

Ireland. My lord, sir Denny Ashburnham promised to be here to testify what he can say concerning Mr. Oates.

L. C. J. Call him:

Crier. Sir Denny Ashburnham. Here he is, my lord.

L. C. J. Sir Denny, what can you say concerning Mr. Oates?

Sir D. Ashburnham. My lord, I received a letter this morning, which I transmitted to Mr. Attorney, and this letter was only to send to me a copy of an indictment against Mr. Oates of perjury: I did send it accordingly with my letter to Mr. Attorney. He hath seen the letter, and what the town says to me in it.

Att. Gen. (Sir William Jones.) I have seen it, there is nothing in it.

L. C. J. Do you know any thing of your own knowledge?

Sir D. Ashburnham. I do know Mr. Oates, and have known him a great while; I have known him from his cradle, and I do know that when he was a child, he was not a person of that credit that we could depend upon what he said.

L. C. J. What signifies that?

Sir D. Ashburnham. Will you please to hear me out, my lord? I have been also solicited by some of the prisoners who sent to me, hoping I could say something that would help them in this matter: Particularly last night one Mistress Ireland, sister to the prisoner at the bar, a gentlewoman I never saw before in my life, she came to me, and was pressing me hard, that I would appear here voluntarily to give evidence for the prisoner. I told her, No, I would not by any means in the world, nor could I say any thing, as I thought, that would advantage them; for I told her, though, perhaps, upon my knowledge of Mr. Oates in his youth, had this discovery come only upon Mr. Oates's testimony, I might have had some little doubt of it; but it was so corroborated with other circumstances that had convinced me, and I would not speak any thing against the king's witnesses, when I myself was satisfied with the truth of the thing: And I do think truly that nothing can be said against Mr. Oates to take off his credibility; but what I transmitted to Mr. Attorney, I had from the town of Hastings, for which I serve.

L. C. J. What was in that indictment?

Sir D. Ashburnham. It is set forth, that he did swear the peace against a man, and at his taking his oath did say, that there were some witnesses that would evidence such a point of fact, which, when they came, would not testify so much, and so was forsworn.

L. C. J. What was done upon that indictment?

Sir D. Ashburnham. They did not proceed upon it; but here is the letter and the copy of the indictment,

Mr. Serjeant Baldwin. My lord, we desire it may be read, and see what it is.

Att. Gen. It is only a certificate, pray let it be read.

L. C. J. I do not think it authentic evidence.

Att. Gen. But if I consent to it, it may be read.

L. C. J. If you will read it for the prisoners you may, you shall not read it against them. If there be any strain, it shall be in favour of the prisoners, and not against them.

Att. Gen. It is nothing against the prisoners, nor for them; but however, if your lordship be not satisfied it should be read, let it alone.

L. C. J. Truly, I do not think it is sufficient evidence, or fit to be read.

A. Ireland. I went to another, col. Shakesby, who was sick, and could not come, but could have attested much as to this.

L. C. J. Have you any more witnesses?

Ireland. I have none, nor I have not time to bring them in.

L. C. J. If you have none, what time could have brought them in? But you have called a gentleman that does come in, and truly he hath done you very great service; you would have had him testified against Mr. Oates; he saith he hath known him ever since he was a child, and that then he had not so much credit as now he hath: And had it been upon his single testimony that the discovery of the plot had depended, he should have doubted of it; but Mr. Oates's evidence, with the testimony of the fact itself, and all the concurring evidences which he produces to back his testimony, hath convinced him that he is true in his narrative.

Sir D. Ashburnham. Your lordship is right in what I have spoken.

L. C. J. Have you any more witnesses, or any thing more to say for yourselves?

Ireland. If I may produce on my own behalf pledges of my own loyalty, and that of my family—

L. C. J. Produce whom you will.

Ireland. Here is my sister and my mother can tell how our relations were plundered for siding with the king.

L. C. J. No, I will tell you why it was; it was for being papists, and you went to the king for shelter.

Ireland. I had an uncle that was killed in the king's service; besides, the Penderls and the Giffards that were instrumental for saving the king, after the fight at Worcester, are my near relations.

L. C. J. Why, all those are papists.

Pickering. My father, my lord, was killed in the king's party.

L. C. J. Why then do you fall off from your father's virtue?

Pickering. I have not time to produce witnesses on my own behalf.

Ireland. I do desire time to bring more witnesses.

VOL. VII.

Grove. As I have a soul to save, I know nothing of this matter charged upon me.

L. C. J. Well, have you any thing more to say?

Ireland. No, My Lord.

L. C. J. You of the king's counsel, will you sum up the evidence?

Mr. Serj. Baldwin. No, my lord, I leave it to your Lordship.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, make proclamation of silence.

Crier. O Yes! All manner of persons are commanded to keep silence upon pain of imprisonment.

Then the Lord Chief Justice directed the Jury thus:

L. C. J. Gentlemen, you of the jury! As to these three persons, Ireland, Pickering, Grove, (the other two you are discharged of) one of them, Ireland it seems, is a priest. I know not whether Pickering be or no; Grove is none, but these are the two men that should kill the king, and Ireland is a conspirator in that plot. They are all indicted for conspiring the king's death, and endeavouring to subvert the government, and destroy the Protestant Religion, and bring in popery. The main of the evidence hath gone upon that foul and black offence, endeavouring to kill the king. The utmost end was, without all question, to bring in Popery, and subvert the Protestant religion; and they thought this a good means to do it, by killing the king. That is the thing you have had the greatest evidence of. I will sum up the particulars, and leave them with you.—It is sworn by Mr. Oates expressly, That on the 24th of April last there was a consultation held of priests and jesuits. They are the men fit only for such a mischief, for I know there are abundance of honest gentlemen of that persuasion, who could never be drawn to do any of these things, unless they were seduced by their priests, that stick at nothing for their own end: he swears expressly, that the consult was begun at the White-Horse tavern in the Strand, that they there agreed to murder the king; that Pickering and Grove were the men that were to do it, who went afterwards and subscribed this holy league of theirs, and signed it every one at his own lodging, Whitebread at his, Ireland at his, and Fenwick at his, two of which are out of the case, but they are repeated to you only to shew you the order of the conspiracy. That afterwards Pickering and Grove did agree to the same, and they received the sacrament upon it as an oath, to make all sacred, and a seal, to make all secret.

Mr. Bedlow hath sworn as to that particular time of killing the king by Pickering and Grove though they were not to give over the design, but there were four that were sent to kill the king at Windsor. Mr. Oates swears there was an attempt by Pickering in March last, but the flint of the pistol happening to be loose, he durst not proceed, for which he was rewarded with penance. He swears there were four hired so do it; that fourscore pounds was provided for them. He saw the money: and swears he saw it delivered to the messenger to carry it down.

Ireland. At what time was that?

L. C. J. In August there was an attempt first by Pickering and Grove. They then not doing of it four other persons (Irishmen) were hired to do it, and 10,000*l.* proffered to sir George Wakeman to poison the king. Thus still they go on in their attempts, and, that being too little, 5,000*l.* more was added. This is to shew you the gross of the plot in general; and also the particular transactions of these two murderers Grove and Pickering, with the conspiracy of Ireland. Bedlow swears directly that in August last, these three and Harcourt, and Pritchard and Le Faire, being all together in a room, did discourse of the disappointment the four had met with in not killing the king at Windsor; and there the resolution was the old stagers should go on still, but they had one Conyers joined to them, and they were to kill the king then at Newmarket. He swears they did agree to do it; that Ireland was at it; and that all three did consent to that resolve. So that here are two witnesses that speak positively with all the circumstances of this attempt, of the two to kill the king, and the confederacy of Ireland, all along with them. Now, I must tell you, there are no accessaries, but all principals, in Treason. It may seem hard, perhaps, to convict men upon the testimony of their fellow-offenders, and if it had been possible to have brought other witnesses, it had been well: but, in things of this nature, you cannot expect that the witnesses should be absolutely spotless. You must take such evidence as the nature of the thing will afford, or you may have the king destroyed, and our religion too. For Jesuits are too subtle to subject themselves to too plain a proof, such as they cannot evade by equivocation, or a flat denial.

There is also a letter produced, which, speaking of the consult that was to be the 24th of April, proves that there was a conspiracy among them: And, although it is not evidence to convict any one man of them, yet it is evidence upon Mr. Oates's testimony to prove the general design. It is from one Petre to one of the confederates, and taken amongst Harcourt's papers, after Mr. Oates had given in his testimony; and therein it is mentioned, That the superior had taken care, that there should be a meeting the 24th of April, the day after Saint George's day, which is the very time Oates speaks of; and that they were not to come to town too soon, that the design might not be discovered. I would fain know what the signification of that clause may be. And then it goes farther, That it was to be kept secret, as the nature of the thing doth require; which shews plainly there was such a transaction on foot. But the reason I urge it for is, to shew you that it is a concurrent evidence with Mr. Oates, who had never seen this paper till three or four days after this information was given in, wherein he swears the time when this agitation was to be, and when they came to look upon the paper, it agrees with the time precisely. Now they do not write in this letter, that they intend to kill the king, but they write to exhort them to keep the design undiscovered, and by that you may guess what they mean.

What is said to all this by the prisoners, but denial? Ireland cannot deny but that he knew Mr. Oates, and had been in his company sometimes; five times, by circumstances, Mr. Oates hath proved, so that they were acquaintance; and it appears plainly, there was a familiarity between them. Ireland objects, that Bedlow charges him in August, when he was out of town all that time, and that therefore the testimony of one of the witnesses cannot be true. And, to prove this, he calls his mother; his sister, and sir John Southcot's man, and Mr. Gifford. His mother and sister say expressly, that he went out of town the 3rd of August, and the servant says, that he saw him at Saint Albans the 5th of August, and continued in his company to the 16th (so that as to that, there is a testimony both against Mr. Bedlow and against Mr. Oates); and Gifford comes and says, he saw him at the latter end of August and beginning of September at Wolverhampton; whereas Mr. Oates hath sworn, he saw him the 12th of August, and the 1st or 2nd of September, and tells it by a particular circumstance, wherein; I must tell you, it is impossible that both sides should be true. But if it should be a mistake only in point of time, it destroys not the evidence, unless you think it necessary to the substance of the thing. If you charge one in the month of August to have done such a fact, if he deny that he was in that place at that time, and proves it by witnesses, it may go to invalidate the credibility of a man's testimony, but it does not invalidate the truth of the thing itself, which may be true in substance, though the circumstance of time differ. And the question is, whether the thing be true?

Against this, the counsel of the king have three that swear it positively and expressly, That Ireland was here, here is a young maid that knew him very well, and was acquainted with him, and with his breaking up of letters; and she is one that was Grove's servant: She comes and tells you directly, That about that time, which, by computation, was about the 12th of August, she saw him go into his own house; which cannot be true, if that be true which is said on the other side; and she does swear it upon better circumstances than if she had barely pitched upon a day; for she must have satisfied me well, for what reason she could remember the day so positively, ere I should have believed her: But she does it, remembering her going to my lord Arlington's service, which was a week after the king went to Windsor; which is sworn to be about the 13th of August, and a week before her going it was that she saw Ireland at his own door. What arts they have of erasing this, I know not; for as they have turned their learning into subtlety, so they have their integrity top. The study of politics is their business and art, which they make use of upon all occasions; and I find them learned chiefly in cunning, and very subtle in their evasions. So that you see, without great difficulty, a man cannot have from them a plain answer to a plain question. But the fact against them is here expressly sworn by two witnesses; if you have any reason to disbelieve them, I must leave that to you. Sir D. Ashburnham, who is produced to discredit Mr. Oates, says, that when he was a child, there was little or no credit to be given to him, and if the matter had depended solely upon his testimony, those irregularities of his, when a boy, would have staggered his belief. But when the matter is so accompanied with so many other circumstances, which are material things, and cannot be evaded or denied, it is almost impossible for any man, either to make such a story, or not to believe it when it is told. I know not whether they can frame such a tale; I am sure never a Protestant ever did, and, I believe, never would invent such a one to take away their lives: Therefore it is left to your consideration what is sworn: The circumstances of swearing it by two witnesses, and what reasons you have to disbelieve them.

It is most plain the Plot is discovered, and that by these men; and that it is a Plot, and a villainous one, nothing is plainer. No man of common understanding, but must see there was a conspiracy to bring in Popery, and to destroy the Protestant religion; and we know their doctrines and practices too well, to believe they will stick at any thing that may effect those ends. They must excuse me, if I be plain with them; I would not asperse a profession of men, as the priests are, with hard words, if they were not very true, and if at this time it were not very necessary. If they had not murdered kings, I would not say they would have done ours. But when it hath been their practice so to do; when they have debauched man's understandings, overturned all morals, and destroyed all divinity, what shall I say of them? when their humility is such, that they tread upon the necks of emperors; their charity such, as to kill princes; and their vow of poverty such, as to covet kingdoms, what shall I judge of them? when they have licences to lie, and indulgences for falsehoods; nay, when they can make him a saint that dies in one, and then pray to him; as the carpenter first makes an image, and after worships it; and can then think to bring in that wooden religion of theirs amongst us in this nation, what shall I think of them? what shall I say to them? what shall I do with them?

If these can be a dispensation for the taking of any oath (and diverse instances may be given of it, that their church does license them to do so) it is a cheat upon men's souls, it perverts and breaks off all conversation amongst mankind; for how can we deal or converse in the world, when there is no sin, but can be indulged; no offence so big, but they can pardon it, and some of the blackest be accounted meritorious? what is there left for mankind to lean upon, if a sacrament will not bind them, unless it be to conceal their wickedness? If they shall take tests and sacraments, and all this under colour of religion be avoided, and signify nothing, what is become of all converse? How can we think obligations and promises between man and man should hold, if a covenant between God and man will not?

We have no such principles nor doctrines in our Church, we thank God. To use any pervariation in declaring of the truth, is abominable to natural reason, much more to true religion; and it is a strange Church that will allow a man to be a knave. It is possible some of that communion may be saved, but they can never hope to be so in such a course as this. I know they will say, That these are not their principles, nor these their practices, but they preach otherwise, they print otherwise, and their councils do determine otherwise.

Some hold, that the Pope in council is infallible; and ask any Popish Jesuit of them all, and he will say the Pope is infallible himself, in cathedra, or he is no right Jesuit. And if so, whatever their command is to be justified by their authority; so that if they give a dispensation to kill a king, that king is well killed. This is a religion that quite unbinds all piety, all morality, and all conversation, and to be abominated by all mankind.

They have some parts of the foundation, it is true; but they are adulterated, and mixed with horrid principles, and impious practices. They eat their God, they kill their king, and saint the murderer. They indulge all sorts of sins, and no human bonds can hold them.

They must pardon me if I seem sharp, for a Papist in England is not to be treated as a Protestant ought to be in Spain: And if ye ask me why? I will give you this reason: We have no such principles nor practices as they have. If I were in Spain, I should think myself a very ill Christian, should I offer to disturb the government of the place where I lived, that I may bring in my religion there. What have I to do to undermine the tranquillity and peace of a kingdom, because all that dwell in it are not of my particular persuasion?

They do not do so here, there is nothing can quench the thirst of a priest and a Jesuit, not the blood of men, not of any, if he can but propagate his religion, which in truth is but his interest.

They have not the principles that we have, therefore they are not to have that common obedience, which our principles and practices call for.

They are not to wonder, if they keep no faith, that they have none from others; and let them say what they will, that they do not own any such things as we charge upon them, and are like to go hard with them; for we can shew them out of their own writings and councils, that they do justify the power of the Pope in excommunicating kings, in deposing them for heresy, and absolving their subjects from their allegiance. And the claim of authority both of Pope and council, is the surest foundation they build upon.

I have said so much the more in this matter, because their actions are so very plain and open, and yet so pernicious; and it is a very great providence, that we, and our religion, are delivered from blood and oppression. I believe our religion would have stood, notwithstanding their attempts, and I would have them to know we are not afraid of them; nay, I think we should have maintained it, by destroying of them. We should have been all in blood, it is true, but the greatest effusion would have been on their side; and without it, how did they hope it should have been done? There are honest gentlemen, I believe hundreds, of that communion, who could not be openly won upon to engage in such a design. They will not tell them that the king shall be killed; but they will insinuate unto them, that he is but one man, and it he should die, it were fit they were in readiness to promote the Catholic religion; and when it comes to that, they know what to do. When they have got them to give money to provide arms, and be in readiness on their specious pretence, then the Jesuits will quickly find them work. One blow shall put them to exercise their arms; and when they have killed the king, the Catholic cause must be maintained.

But they have done themselves the mischief, and have brought misery upon their whole party, whom they have ensnared into the design, upon other pretences than what was really at the bottom. A Popish priest is a certain seducer, and nothing satisfies him; not the blood of kings, if it stands in the way of his ambition. And I hope they have not only undeceived some Protestants, whose charity might incline them to think them not so bad as they are; but I believe they have shaken their religion in their own party here, who will be ashamed in time that such actions should be put upon the score of religion.

I return now to the fact, which is proved by two witnesses, and by the concurrent evidence of the letter and the maid; and the matter is as plain and notorious as can be, That there was an intention of bringing in popery by a cruel and bloody way; for I believe they could never have prayed us into their religion. I leave it therefore to you to consider, whether you have not as much evidence from these two men, as can be expected in a case of this nature; and whether Mr. Oates be not rather justified by the testimony offered against him, than discredited. Let prudence and conscience direct your verdict, and you will be too hard for their art and cunning.

Gentlemen, If you think you shall be long, we will adjourn the Court till the afternoon, and take your verdict then.

Jury. No, my lord, we shall not be long.

Then an Officer was sworn to keep the Jury safe, according to law, and they withdrew to consider of their Verdict.

After a very short recess, the jury returned, and the Clerk of the crown spake to them thus:

Cl. of Cr. Gentlemen, answer to your names, Sir William Roberts.

Sir W. Roberts. Here. And so of the rest.

Cl. of Cr. Gentlemen, Are you all agreed in your verdict?

Omnes. Yes.

Cl. of Cr. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. The foreman.

Cl. of Cr. Set William Ireland to the bar. William Ireland, hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner. How say you, is he Guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. What goods and chattels, lands or tenements?

Foreman. None to our knowledge.

Cl. of Cr. Set Thomas Pickering to the bar. Tho. Pickering, hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner. How say you, is he Guilty of the same high-treason, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements?

Foreman. None to our knowledge.

Cl. of Cr. Set John Grove to the bar. John Grove, hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner. How say you, is he Guilty of the same high-treason, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements?

Foreman. None to our knowledge.

Cl. of Cr. Hearken to your verdict, as the Court hath recorded it. You say that William Ireland is Guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted. You say that Thomas Pickering is Guilty of the same high-treason. You say that John Grove is Guilty of the same high-treason. And for them you have found Guilty, you say, That they, nor any of them, had any goods or chattels, lands or tenements, at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since, to your knowledge. And so you say all.

Omnes. Yes.

L. C. J. You have done, gentlemen, like very good subjects, and very good Christians, that is to say, like very good Protestants; and now much good may their thirty thousand Masses do them.

Then the Court adjourned by Proclamation till four in the afternoon.

In the afternoon the same day.

About five of the clock Mr. Recorder and a sufficient number of the justices returned into the Court, the judges being departed home; and Proclamation was made for attendance, as in the morning.

Then the Clerk of the Crown called for the prisoners convicted of high-treason, and spoke to each of them thus:

Cl. of Cr. Set William Ireland to the bar. William Ireland, hold up thy hand. Thou standest convicted of high-treason; what canst thou say for thyself, why the Court should not give thee judgment to die according to law?

Ireland. My lord, I represented all along from the beginning, that we had not time to call in our witnesses to justify our innocence.

Recorder. If you have any thing to say in stay of judgment, you have all free liberty to say it.

Ireland. We had no time allowed us to bring in our witnesses, so that we could have none, but only those that came in by chance; and those things they have declared, though true, were not believed.

Recorder. These things, Mr. Ireland, you did not object before the jury gave their verdict; now they have given their verdict, and found you guilty, if you have any thing to say to the Court why they should not proceed to judgment according to that verdict, you may speak it; but for these things it is too late.

Ireland. My lord, I only have this to say, I desire more time to be heard again, and to call in my witnesses.

Recorder. Call the Executioner to do his office.

Ireland. There are testimonies, my lord, that I could produce of my loyalty, and my relations fidelity to the king.

Recorder. I believe, Mr. Ireland, it will be a shame to all your relations that have been loyal to the king, that you should be privy to the murder of that good king whom your relations so well served; and therefore if that be all that you have to say, it will signify nothing.

The Executioner not appearing, the sheriff of Middlesex was called to come into Court, and give attendance, upon pain of 40*l.* But the Executioner coming in, was, with a reproof from the Recorder for his negligence, commanded to tie him up, which he did.

Cl. of Cr. Set Thomas Pickering to the bar. Thomas Pickering, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same case with the prisoner last before thee; what canst thou say for thyself, why the Court should not give thee judgment to die according to law?

Recorder. What does he say for himself?

Capt. Richardson. He has nothing to say.

Recorder. Then tie him up.

Cl. of Cr. Set John Grove to the bar. John Grove, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same case with the prisoner last before thee, what canst thou say for thyself, why the Court should not give thee judgment to die according to law?

Grove. I am as innocent as the child unborn.

Cl. of Cr. Tie him up—Which was done.

Cl. of Cr. Criers on both sides, make Proclamations.

Criers. O yes! All manner of persons are commanded to keep silence whilst judgment is giving, upon pain of imprisonment: peace about the Court.

Recorder. Where is the keeper? Shew me the prisoners, William Ireland, Thomas Pickering, and John Grove.

Capt. Richardson. Those are the three.

Recorder. You, the prisoners at the bar, you have been arraigned for a very great offence, the greatest that can be committed against any authority upon earth, for high-treason against your king, with all the aggravations that possibly can attend so great a crime as that is; for you did not only strike at the life of the best of kings, but you intended the subversion of the best of religions. Whatever you may apprehend, yet all men that will lay their hopes of salvation upon any thing that is fit for a man to lay his hopes upon, which is upon the merits of a crucified Saviour, and not upon your Masses, tricks or trumperies, do abhor the thoughts of promoting their religion by unmassing kings, and murdering their subjects. And though we whom you call Heretics, abhor to own any such religion; yet we are not afraid to tell you, and all others who are ensnared into your principles, we will maintain the religion and the government as it is established, with our lives and fortunes. And it is fit that it should be known, that we who live under the government of so mild and pious a prince, and in a country where so good, so moderate a religion is established by law, will not be affrighted by all your murders, conspiracies and designs, from declaring, that they who dare kill kings, and massacre their subjects, are the highest violators, not only of the laws of the land, but of that great law which all good Christians and Protestants think themselves obliged to pay great reverence and obedience to, I mean the law of God Almighty himself.

Thus I speak to you, gentlemen, not vauntingly, it is against my nature to insult upon persons in your sad condition; God forgive you for what you have done, and I do heartily beg it, though you do not desire I should; for, poor men, you may believe that your interest in the world to come is secured to you by your Masses, but do not well consider that vast eternity you must ere long enter into, and that great tribunal you must appear before, where his Masses (speaking to Pickering) will not signify so many groats to him, nor not one farthing. And I must say it for the sake of those silly people whom you have imposed upon with such fallacies, that the Masses can no more save thee from a future damnation, than they do from a present condemnation.

I do not speak this to you, as intending thereby to inveigh against all persons that profess the Romish religion; for there are many that are of that persuasion, that do abhor those base principles of murdering kings and subverting governments. There are many honest gentlemen in England, I dare say, of that communion, whom none of the most impudent jesuits durst undertake to tempt into such designs;

these are only to be imposed upon silly men, not upon men of conscience and understanding. And I pray God, as was said lately by a learned gentleman whom we all know, that all Protestants may be as safe from the force of your daggers, as they are from those of your arguments; for I dare say, that you could sooner murder any man that understands the Protestant religion, than to persuade him to such villainies. And among those many things which prevailed with the honest gentlemen of the jury to convict you of this horrid crime, they could not but take notice, that you (speaking to Ireland) that do pretend to learning, did send into foreign parts that your fellow jesuits should take care publicly to preach, That the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, by which the common justice of the nation is preserved, signified nothing; which is a strong evidence of your design, not only to murder the king, but subvert the government; for surely the most probable way to do that, is to asperse those oaths by which all protestant subjects, those whom you call heretics, lie under an obligation of obedience to their prince. And I think it not unfit to tell you, that you had a great favour shewed to you to be tried only for the matters contained in this Indictment; for you that are priests must know, that there is a law in the land, that would have hanged you for your very residence here; for if any subject born in England shall take orders from the see of Rome, and afterwards come into England, and remain there 40 days, such, for that offence alone, are made traitors by act of parliament. But you are so far from being under any awe of that law or submission to it, that you dare not only come to live here in despite thereof, but endeavour what you can to overthrow both it, and the government itself. You dare conspire to murder the king; nay not only so, but you dare make your consults thereof public. You dare write your names to those consults. You dare solicit all your party to do the like, and make all the ties of religion and conscience (that to considering Christians are obligations of piety and charity) as engagements either to set your villainies, or to conceal them. We think no power can dispense with us, whom you call heretics, to falsify our oaths, much less to break our covenant with God in the Holy Sacrament. But you, instead of making that a tie and obligation to engage you to the remembrance of our Saviour, make it a snare and a gin to oblige your proselytes to the assassinating kings, and murdering their subjects. I am sorry with all my soul, that men who have had their education here, and the benefit of the good examples of others, should not only be led into such mischievous principles themselves, but to be of that confidence in their persuasion, as to dare to debauch others also. I am sorry also to hear a layman should with so much notice declare, That a bullet, if round and smooth, was not safe enough for him to execute his villainies by; but he must be sure, not only to set his poisonous invention on work about it, but he must add thereto his poisonous teeth; for fear if the bullet was smooth, it might light in some part where the wound might be cured. But such is the height of some mens malice, that they will put all the venoms and malice they can into their actions. I am sure this was so horrid a design, that nothing, but a conclave of devils in hell, or a college of such jesuits as yours on earth, could have thought upon.

This I remember to you for the sake of them that are to live, and for the charity I have for you who are to die: For the sake of them that are to live; for I hope when they hear, that men of your persuasion dare commit those outrageous crimes, and justify them by a principle of religion, they will not easily be seduced into your opinion: And out of charity to you that are to die, to persuade you to hearty repentance; for otherwise, I must tell you, thy 1,500*l.* (speaking to Grove) nor thy 30,000 Masses (speaking to Pickering) will avail but little. And I thought fit to say this also, that it may be known that you have had the full benefit of the laws established in England, and those the best of laws; for such is not the law of other nations: For if any protestant in any place where the Romish religion is profest, had been but thought guilty of such crimes, he had never come to the formality and justice of an arraignment, and to be tried by his peers, permitted to make his defence, and hear what could be said against him; but he had been hanged immediately, or perhaps suffered a worse death. But you are not only deboselen to the happy constitution of our laws, but to the more happy constitution of our religion. For such are the admirable documents of that religion we in England profess, that we dare not requite massacre for massacre, blood for blood. We disown and abhor all stabbing; and we are so far from neckoning that he shall be a saint in Heaven for assassinating a prince, and be prayed to in another world, that the Protestant is required to believe, that such as begin with murder, must end with damnation, if our blessed Lord and Saviour do not interpose; nothing that man can do, Papist or Protestant, can save any man in such a case. We dare not say that our religion will permit us to murder dissenters, much less to assassinate our king.

And having thus said, let me once more as a Christian, in the name of the great God of Heaven, beg of you for your own souls sake, be not satisfied or over-persuaded with any doctrine that you have preached to others, or imbibed from others; but believe, that no one can contrive the death of the king, or the overthrow of the government, but the great God of Heaven and earth will have an account of it. And all pardons, absolutions, and the dispensations that you who are priests can give to your lay-brother, or that any of your superiors may give to you, will not serve the turn.

I know not, but as I said, you may think I speak this to insult, I take the great God of Heaven to witness, that I speak it with charity to your souls, and with great sorrow and grief in my own heart, to see men that might have made themselves happy, draw upon themselves so great a ruin. But since you have been so fairly heard, so fairly tried and convicted, there is but little more to be said; for I must tell you, because it may not be thought that you had not free liberty to make your full defence, though that gentleman (speaking to Ireland) seemed to be surprized, he had a kind sister, that took care to bring his witnesses; I am so far from blaming her for it, that I do commend her, it was the effect of her good nature, and deserves commendation; but speak to this purpose, to shew that there was no surprize upon him, nor his life taken away by any such thing; for he had a greater favour shewed to him than is usually shewn to such offenders.

And having thus said to you myself, we do also require him whose duty it is to attend in such cases, nay, I do command him in the name of the court, that he attend upon you to give you all the comfortable assistance that he can for the advantage of your future state: And not only so, but we will certainly take care, that if you will have any others come to you they shall. I would not be mistaken, I do not mean any of your priests and Jesuits; but if you will have the assistance of any Protestant divines, they shall not be denied you. And I hope God Almighty will please to give you pardon in another world, though you have offended beyond hopes of any in this. I once more assure you, all I have said is in perfect charity. I pray God forgive you for what you have done. And so there remains now only for me to pronounce that sentence which by the law of the land the court is required to do against persons convicted of that offence which you are convicted of.

This court doth therefore award, "That you, the prisoners at the bar, be conveyed from hence to the place from whence you came, and from thence that you be drawn to the place of execution upon hurdles, that there you be severally hanged by the neck, that you be cut down alive, that your privy members be cut off, and your bowels taken out, and burnt in your view, that your heads be severed from your bodies, that your bodies be divided into quarters, and those quarters be disposed of at the king's pleasure: And the God of infinite mercy be merciful to your souls."

Then the prisoners were conveyed back to the Gaol by the keeper of the Gaol, according to custom; and the commission was called over, and the prisoners taken order for according to law. And the court adjourned by proclamation thus:

Cl. of Cr. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O Yes, O Yes, O Yes! All manner of persons that have any thing more to do at this general sessions of the peace holden for the city of London, may depart hence for this time, and give their attendance at the Guildhall, London, on Friday the 10th day of January next, at seven of the clock in the morning. And all manner of persons at this sessions of Oyer and Terminer, and gaol-delivery of Newgate, holden for the city of London and county of Middlesex, may depart hence for this time, and give their attendance here again on Wednesday, the 15th day of January, at seven of the clock in the morning. God save the king.

And then the court broke up.

On Friday the 24th of January following, William Ireland and John Grove were drawn from Newgate on a hurdle to Tyburn, where they were executed according to their sentence.

Mr. Ireland made this following Speech:

"We come hither, as on the last theatre of the world, and do therefore conceive we are obliged to speak. First then, we do confess, that we pardon all and every one whatsoever, that have any interest, concern, or hand in our death. Secondly, we do publicly profess and acknowledge, that we are here obliged, if we were guilty ourselves of any treason, to declare it; and that, if we knew any person faulty therein (although he were our father) we would detect and discover him; and as for ourselves, we would beg a thousand and a thousand pardons, both of God and man: But seeing we cannot be believed, we must beg leave to commit ourselves to the mercy of Almighty God, and hope to find pardon of him through Christ. As for my own part, having been twenty years in the Low Countries, and then coming over in June was twelvemonth, I had returned again, had not I been hindered by a fit of sickness. On the 3d of August last I took a journey into Staffordshire, and did not come back to town before the 14th of September, as many can witness: for a hundred and more saw me in Staffordshire; therefore, how I should in this time be acting here treasonable stratagems, I do not well know or understand."

Here Mr. Sheriff advertised the prisoner, he would do well to make better use of his time, than to spend it in such-like expressions, for nobody would believe him; not that they thought much of their time, for they would stay; but such kind of words did arraign the proceedings of the court, by which they were tried.

Wherefore Mr. Ireland concluded, and said; "I do here beg of God Almighty to shower down a thousand and a thousand blessings upon his majesty, on her sacred majesty, on the duke of York, and all the royal family, and also on the whole kingdom. As for those catholics that are here, we desire their prayers for a happy passage into a better world, and that he would be merciful to all christian souls. And as for all our enemies, we earnestly desire that God would pardon them again and again, for we pardon them heartily, from the bottom of our hearts; and so I beseech all good people to pray for us and with us."

Then Mr. Groves said ;

“ We are innocent ; we lose our lives wrongfully ; we pray to God to forgive them that are the causers of it.”

The execution of Thomas Pickering was respited for so long a time, that it occasioned an Address of the House of Commons, April 27, 1679, “ That his majesty would be pleased to order the execution of one Pickering a prisoner in Newgate, and of divers priests and Jesuits, who had been condemned by the judges at the Old Bailey and in the several circuits, but did remain as yet unexecuted, to the great emboldening of such offenders, in case they should escape without due punishment.” To which the king returned this answer : “ Gentlemen, I have always been tender in matters of blood, which my subjects have no reason to take exceptions at ; But this is a matter of great weight, I shall therefore consider of it, and return you an answer.”

May 25, the king sent a message to the House, by Lord Russel, to let them know, that he would comply with their request concerning Pickering, and that the law should pass upon him.

He was accordingly executed in pursuance of his sentence. Arriving at the place of execution, he appeared to the spectators (after a manner very unusual to persons in his condition) with a countenance not only calm, sweet, and serene, but even cheerful, smiling, and pleased ; solemnly protesting upon his salvation, he was innocent in thought, word, and deed, of all that was laid to his charge. Then heartily praying for his accusers and enemies, he said to the hangman ‘ Friend, do thy office ;’ and soon after left the world.

246. The Trial of the Lord CORNWALLIS, before the Lords* at Westminster, for the Murder of Robert Clerk : 30 CHARLES II. A. D. 1678.†

AFTER my Lord High Steward (lord Finch afterwards earl of Nottingham) was ascended to the High Chair of State, and sat down therein, the commission was delivered by the clerk of the crown in the Chancery, on his knees, to my lord, who delivered it to sir Thomas Fanshawe, clerk of the crown in the King's Bench office, and he received it kneeling. Then pro-

* This was a Trial in the Court of the Lord High Steward, as to which, and the distinction between it and the High Court of Parliament, or as Mr. Justice Foster styles it, “ The Court of our Lord the King in Parliament,” see the Case of Lord Delamere, A. D. 1686, infra; and of Earl Ferrers, A. D. 1760, infra; and Foster's Crown Law, 138. See also 4 Hattell's Precedents, 197. 277, and the Appendix, No. 3.

† This Case is thus reported in Jones's Rep. 54 : “ The lord C. having been indicted for the murder of Robert Clerk mentioned in the next preceding : The king for his trial constituted Henrice lord Finch, then High Chancellor of England, to be Lord High Steward, hac vice tantum. The trial was upon the 30th day of June after Trinity Term, in the 28th year of the king. The proceedings were such as are described by lord Coke in his Book of Pleas of the Crown, chap. Treason, of the Trial of Peers ; as to the summons of the peers triers, the Certiorari to the Lord Chief Justice for the indictment, and precept to the constable of the Tower of London, and other formalities there mentioned. The steward was attended from his house on the day of the trial quite to Westminster, by the judges in their coaches. Sir Edward Walker, then garter king at arms, going before him in his coat with the sergeants at arms : when he was at the great door of the hall he carried till the judges were alighted out of their coaches, and then the chief justices first, and the rest according to their seniority passed by him, and advanced into the court, which was a large tribunal erected for this purpose (the whole structure extended almost from the stairs leading to the courts of King's Bench and Chancery to the court of Common Pleas, but the court itself was not so large by much.) The cloth of state was placed aloft in the middle of both sides of it, but a little behind were built two small boxes ; on the right were the king, the queen, the duke and duchess ; the others were filled with persons of honour. The peers triers were seated on both sides the chair of state, but at the distance of about five paces from it, and a step lower on benches covered with green cloth, with which the whole court was likewise covered. At the peers feet sat the judges, some on one side and some on the other, their seats being of the same height with the floor of the court. In the middle was a place cut for the clerk of the crown of the King's Bench, and for his deputy, in the lower part. The king's council, viz. his senior serjeant, attorney and solicitor were placed. The prisoner was at the bar behind them, but raised about six feet, and directly over against the chair of state.

“ After the court was thus disposed, Chertoke, serjeant at arms, made proclamation three times, and command was made that all persons, except the lords the triers, and other peers of the realm, and the privy counsellors and the judges, should be uncovered. Then the clerk of the crown read the indictment, and arraigned the prisoner, who pleaded Not clamation was made by the Serjeant at Arms, who was Crier for the day.

Guilty, and put himself upon his peers, who were thirty-six, the greatest part of them of the most noble, of the greatest estate, and the wisest of the realm. Before any evidence was given, the Lord Steward made an elegant speech to the triers, and exhorted the prisoner to be of good courage, and without fear, and to summon all the faculties of his soul to his assistance. Then the evidence was first opened by the solicitor general, seconded by the attorney, and concluded by serjeant Maynard, the prisoner all the while behaving himself with humility, modesty and prudence. After the evidence was concluded, the lords went to consider and consult together, in the Court of Wards, as I believe, and during their absence biscuit and wine were distributed in the court. After two hours or more, the lords returned, and the Lord Treasurer, in the name of his fellows, prayed the advice of the Lord Steward and the Judges on this point, Whether a person's presence at and abetting of a manslaughter, committed by another, made him guilty, as it was in the case of murder. To which the Judges speaking, viz. those of the same side for themselves, and not altogether, all agreed that the law was the same in case of manslaughter as of murder. Then the lords went back, and in half an hour returned to give their verdict. And being seated in their places the Lord Steward spoke first to the youngest lord in this manner, My lord A. is my lord C. Guilty or not? and so to every one, ascending from the youngest to the first, and each answered in his order, Guilty or Not Guilty upon my honour. And six of them pronounced him Guilty of Manslaughter, and the rest Not Guilty. This being recorded, the Lord Steward broke the white rod (which was held before him during the whole trial) over his head, and then the court broke up.

“ B. G. having been indicted for the same murder of Robert Clerk, with the said lord C. surrendered himself in Michaelmas Term, 28 C. 2. and being brought to the King's-bench bar the same term, and arraigned, pleaded the king's pardon, which was read, he being on his knees. Then Twisden, justice, observed, that the pardon did not recite the indictment, and that he remembered it had been questioned, whether a pardon after indictment, without mentioning it, should be allowed. But he thought the pardon in this case was well enough, for it had these words, ‘ sive’ (the prisoner) ‘ fuit indictat’ sive non.’ Note this pardon was per verba of ‘ feloniam interfectionem ‘ quamcumq;’ with a ‘ Non obstante the statute of R. 2,’ &c. and was allowed by all the court, and the prisoner, after grave advice given him by the Lord Chief Justice and Twisden, discharged, and afterwards according to the custom he presented gloves to all the Judges.”

VOL. VII.

Serjeant. O yes, O yes, O yes! My Lord High Steward of England strictly chargeth and commandeth all manner of persons here present, upon pain of imprisonment, to keep silence, and give ear to his majesty's commission, To my Lord High Steward of England, to his grace directed.

The clerk of the crown, with his face to my Lord High Steward, reads it thus:

Clerk of the Crown. Charles Rex Carolus Secundus, &c.

All which time my lord and the peers stood up bare.

Serjeant. God save the king.

Cl. Cr. Make proclamation.

Serjeant. O yes! The king at arms, and the usher of the black rod, on their knees, deliver the white staff to my lord, who re-delivered it to the usher of the black rod, who held it up all the time before him.

Cl. Cr. Make proclamation.

Serjeant. O yes! My Lord High Steward of England strictly chargeth and commandeth all justices and commissioners, and all and every person and persons to whom any writ or precept hath been directed for the certifying of any indictment, or of any other record before my Lord High Steward of England, to certify and bring the same immediately, according to the tenor of the said writs and precepts unto them, or any of them directed, on pain and peril as shall fall thereon.

The lord chief justice of the King's-Bench returned his Certiorari, and the record of the Indictment by the grand jury of Middlesex, which was read by the clerk of the crown in hec verba.

Cl. Cr. Virtute, &c.

L. H. Stew. Call the constable of the Tower to return his precept and bring forth his prisoner.

Cl. Cr. Make proclamation.

Serjeant. O yes! Constable of the Tower of London, return the precept to thee directed, and bring forth the prisoner Charles lord Cornwallis, on pain and peril as will fall thereon.

The lord lieutenant of the Tower brought in the prisoner, on his left-hand, with the ax before him, borne by the deputy-lieutenant, which he held with the edge from him, and returned his precept in hec verba.

Cl. Cr. Virtute, &c.

L. H. Stew. Call the Serjeant at Arms to return his precept.

Cl. Cr. Make proclamation.

Serjeant. O yes! Roger Harfnet, esq. Serjeant at Arms to our sovereign lord the king, return the precept to thee directed, with the names of all the lords and noblemen of this realm, peers of Charles lord Cornwallis; by thee summoned, to be here this day, on pain and peril as will fall thereon.

He delivered his precept returned with a schedule annexed thus:

Cl. Cr. Virtute, &c. Make proclamation.

Serjeant. O yes! All marquises, earls, viscounts, and barons of this realm of England, peers of Charles lord Cornwallis, which by commandment of the Lord High Steward of England are summoned to appear this day, and to be present in Court, answer to your names, as you are called, every one upon pain and peril as will fall thereon.

Then the Pannel was called over; the number of peers summoned were 35, in order as followeth:

Thomas Earl of Danby, Lord High Treasurer of England, &c.

All that appeared, answered to the call, standing up bare.

Then my Lord High Steward made a speech to the prisoner at the bar thus:

Lord High Steward. "My lord Cornwallis, The violation of the king's peace, in the chief sanctuary of it, his own royal palace,* and in so high a manner as by the death of one of his subjects, is a matter that must be accounted for. And that it may be so, it hath pleased the king to command this high and honourable court to assemble, in order to a strict and impartial enquiry.

"The wisdom of the law hath therefore styled it the king's peace, because it is his authority that commands it, it is his justice that secures it, it is he on whom men do rely for the safety of their liberties and their lives; in him they trust that a severe account shall be taken of all the violences and injuries that are offered to them, and they that trust in the king can never be deceived.

"It is your lordship's great unhappiness at this time to stand prisoner at the bar, under the weight of no less a charge than an Indictment of murder; and it is not to be wondered at, if so great a misfortune as this be attended with some kind of confusion of face; when a man sees himself become a spectacle of misery in so great a presence, and before so noble and so illustrious an assembly. But be not yet dismayed, my lord, for all this; let not the fears and terrors of justice so amaze and surprise you, as to betray those succours that your reason would afford you, or to disarm you of those helps which good discretion may administer, and which are now extremely necessary.

"It is indeed a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of justice, where the law is the rule, and a severe and inflexible measure both of life and death. But yet it ought to be some comfort to your lordship, that you are now to be tried by my lords your peers; and that now you see the scales of justice are held by such noble hands, you may be confident they will put into them all the grains of allowance, either justice or honour will bear.

"Hearken therefore to your indictment with quietness and attention; observe what the witnesses say against you without interruption; and reserve what you have to say for yourself, till it shall come to your turn to make your defence, of which I shall be sure to give you notice; and when the time comes, assure yourself you shall be heard, not only with patience, but with candour too.

"And then what judgment severer my lords will give you, yourself will (and all the world) be forced to acknowledge the justice and equity of their judgment, and the righteousness of all their lordships proceedings."

Read the Indictment.

Cl. Cr. Charles Lord Cornwallis, Thou standest indicted in the County of Middlesex, by the name of, &c. How sayest thou, Charles lord Cornwallis, Art thou guilty of this felony and murder whereof thou standest indicted, or Not guilty?

Lord Corn. Not guilty.

Cl. Cr. How wilt thou be tried?

Ld. Corn. By God and my peers.

Then my Lord High Steward addressed himself to the Lords thus:

L. H. Stew. "My Lords, Your lordships have here a member before you of your noble body, exposed to the shame of a public arraignment, and (which to a man of honour is much less) to the hazard both of his life and estate. All that he hath, and ever hopes to have, his wealth, his fame, his posterity; all that is valuable to him in this world, entirely depends on your lordships judicature, who are now his peers, and on whom he doth freely put himself.

"My Lords, the privilege of this kind of trial and judicature, is a part of the true greatness of the English nobility: It is an eminent and an illustrious privilege. It is a solid point of honour and dignity. It is a privilege that no neighbour nation ever had, and a privilege this nation never was without.

"It is not a privilege created by the great Charter, but confessed and acknowledged by it. They look but a little way that find this in the steps of the Norman conquest; for it is to be found even in the footsteps of the Saxon Monarchy, when Godwin earl of Kent was tried by earls and barons. And it is no improbable conjecture of theirs, who do think the wisdom of this Constitution was taken from that law amongst the Romans, whereby it was made unlawful for any man to sit upon a senator, that was not himself of the same order; a privilege, that (as learned civilians tell us) continued with them during the reign of many of the Roman emperors. But, my Lords, as this is a privilege as ancient as Monarchy, so we have found by many old experiences, that it cannot be taken away without the dissolution of that government: Therefore this is one of those many ties by which the interest of nobility, as well as their duty, have obliged them to the service of the king.

"In the exercise of this privilege at this time; I know your lordships will weigh the fact with all the circumstances, whereby it is to receive its woe and its proper doom. Your lordships are too just to let pity make an abatement for the crime, and too wise to let rhetoric make any improvement of it: This only will be necessary to be observed by all your lordships, that the fouler the crime is, the clearer and the plainer ought the proof of it to be. There is no other good reason can be given,* why the law refuseth to allow the prisoner at the bar counsel in matter of fact, when his life is concerned, but only this, because the evidence by which he is condemned ought to be so very evident and so plain, that all the counsel in the world should not be able to answer upon it: Upon this ground it is, that the law hath trusted your lordships with the trial of your fellow peers; no trust can be more nobly lodged, nor so judicature had ever more true submission made to it: therefore it would be in me some want of respect to this august and noble assembly, should I go about to put your lordships in mind of your duty: no doubt you will observe the evidence carefully, weigh it diligently, and when that is done, it is impossible but the judgment you will give must be right and honourable and worthy of so wise and so great a body. Therefore I will not detain your lordships any longer from hearing the evidence that is ready to be offered unto you.

Cl. of Cr. Make Proclamation.

Serj. O yes! If any will give evidence for our sovereign lord the king, against Charles lord Cornwallis, prisoner at the bar, let him come forth and he shall be heard; for the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance.

The Indictment was again read to the peers.

Serjeant Maynard. May it please your grace, my Lord High Steward of England, and this great and noble assembly; the prisoner at the bar, Charles lord Cornwallis, standeth indicted of a great crime, that be, together with Charles Gerrard and Edward Bourne, not having in his heart the fear of God, but instigated by the suggestions of the Devil, the 18th of May last, did feloniously and of his malice forethought, assault one Robert Clerk in Whitehall, and that Mr. Gerrard took him up in his arms, flung him down, and broke his neck, of which he instantly died. To this he hath pleaded Not Guilty. It lies upon us who are counsel for the king, in this case to prosecute it, and prove it to you.

Mr. Attorney General, (sir William Jones), May it please your grace, my Lord High Steward of England, and my Lords summoned for the trial of the prisoner at the bar: This noble lord stands indicted for murder; an offence, my lord, which is the first and greatest that is forbidden by the second table, and an offence of that nature, that the law of God hath by a most presumptuous sentence condemned and decreed, that whose abedded man's blood by man shall his blood be shed. Whether this noble lord be guilty of it, remains upon your lordships to try, and I shall very shortly state the matter of fact, which we shall prove, and then let the evidence be offered to you. We do not pretend, my Lords, neither doth the Indictment lay it, that this great offence was committed by the hand of my lord Cornwallis.

For I know your lordships have observed the Indictment, by which it is alledged, that the hand of Mr. Gerrard did the fact: but, my Lords, if we shall make it out that my lord Cornwallis did concur to this act, and had in himself at that time an intent to be a murderer, then it will be declared by his grace, my Lord High Steward, and my Lords the judges, that though his hand did it not, yet he is equally guilty as if it had.

Now, to make out the charge against him, our evidence will be shortly thus:

On the 18th of May last, early in the morning, between the hours of one and two, came down two gentlemen with three footmen behind them, out of the gallery at Whitehall, by the stairs that lead down to the park: I call them two gentlemen, because it was not then discovered who they were, or of what quality; but your lordships will perceive, by the course of the evidence, they were my Lord Cornwallis and Mr. Gerrard, coming down at that unreasonable hour. The first question they asked the centinel (who watched at the foot of the stairs), was the hour of the night; and from him had account that it was so much.

The prisoner and Mr. Gerrard were somewhat distempred with drink,* and made him a reply that be lyed, with great oaths accompanying it. At that time they did no more but go by him into the park, where after they had continued by the space of an hour, back they returned to the stairs, and the centinel demanding, according to his duty, who came there? they answered him in very obscene and uncivil language, and threatened they would kill the centinel, who only did his duty in enquiring who came by him at that time of night. And we shall make it appear, they were in a kind of contention among themselves who should kill him; for as I am informed, (I know if it be not proved, your lordships will observe it) one desired, Pray let me kill him; and the other desired, Pray let me kill him; and threatened no less than to run him through.

My Lords, the centinel being of good resolution, was not affrighted from his place, but kept them off; and when they saw they could not win upon the centinel that way, one of them delivered away his sword, which he held in his hand not drawn, and then was pleased to come to the centinel, and desired to kiss him, and swore he would do that: but that the centinel did equally refuse; and then they did use the same threatnings again and seemed to be in a contention who should run him through. My Lords, after some time, being now come to the top of the stairs, and there staying, it happened there came to the stair-foot two youths, and these young men were, it seems, going to bed in their lodging, which was very near, and did make it their request to the centinel (one of them did) to call him up very early the next morning, because he was to go of a message out of the town. My Lord Cornwallis and Mr. Gerrard remaining on the top of the stair-case, being (as we said) in disorder (which is the strength of the king's evidence, if proved) both of them said, before they went thence they would kill some or other, which evidence will go a great way to shew the concern that noble Lord the prisoner at the bar, had in the business.

It happened as these boys were making their request to the centinel, my Lord and Mr. Gerrard took notice of it, and seemed to be concerned that they should command the king's soldiers, and bid the centinel shoot him, who told them he conceived the boy had done him no wrong in asking a civil kindness from him; they again called to shoot him, and they would bear him out; which he still refused to do, finding no reason for it: then one of the two took occasion to swear a great oath, 'he would kick his Arse to Hell;' to which the boy that asked the centinel made some reply; wherein the word 'Arse' was repeated: (Now whether they understood it as an interrogation, 'why kick my Arse to Hell?' as he intended it; or in a worse sense, 'kiss my Arse') one of the gentlemen in a rage came running down the stairs, and that boy that in truth spoke the word ran away, and the other poor innocent boy, trusting in his own innocency, remained there until the person came to him, and did on his knees (in a manner) desire not to be mistaken, he was not the person that used any ill words, and cried out, O my Lord, it was not I; indeed, my Lord it was not I; but such at that time, was the intemperance and wrath of the person, who in such a fury descended the stairs, that (whether with the blow or with the fall) the boy received his death. We find by our information of the evidence, that he who did the thing was in truth Mr. Gerrard, who is not yet taken; but whether my Lord, the prisoner at the bar, did not concur in it, and had not an intention to kill somebody, is the question left for your grace and these noble peers to decide. This is the nature of the fact; only I desire to observe, that it is true here was some distance between the place where my Lord Cornwallis stood, and the place where the boy was killed. Of what consequence that may be, I leave to your grace's and these noble lords consideration: It was the distance of the stairs; but I think, as every one knows, they are not so many, but what is done below may be easily seen at the top.

We shall now, without detaining your Lordships any longer, call the witnesses, and prove what hath been opened.

The Soldier proved the fact, as it was opened by Mr. Attorney General, except that part about both swearing they would kill one or other, which passage was heard but by one of them, and spoken but by one of the gentlemen.

They could not swear who were the persons; because of the darkness of the time.

The Boy who was the companion of him that was slain, and that used the words that caused the person to come down, swore them to be a repetition only by way of interrogation, 'why kick my Arse to Hell?'

Then Mr. Attorney desired to call my Lord Cornwallis's own two footmen, who had been indicted and acquitted at the king's-bench-bar.

L. H. Steward. My Lords the judges, is there any question, whether a person acquitted of an offence be a good witness against another charged with the same offence?

Judges. None at all: when he is acquitted he ought to be admitted.

Then the copy of the acquittal (proved by a clerk in the crown-office) was read, and then were sworn; who fixed it upon the person of Mr. Gerrard, and swore that my Lord Cornwallis was all the while upon the top of the stairs, but after the fact committed hasted away for fear of being knocked down by the soldiers: and there ended the king's evidence.

L. H. Stew. Now, my lord, is the time come for your defence. You hear what is charged on you. Pray speak what you have to say for yourself.

Then the Prisoner at the bar confessed himself to have been in the company that night, when this accident happened, which he hoped would be a warning to him to shun such disorders hereafter; but that he had no evil intention, and but one witness swore that both of them would have killed the centinel; that he was not conscious to himself, to have had a hand in, and therefore withdrew not himself it, but yielded himself to the coroner the next day, (which he proved by the coroner himself) and did therefore, in trust of his innocency, submit himself to the judgment of his grace and his peers.—Which being done,

Sir Francis Winington, the king's Solicitor General, summed up the evidence in this manner:

May it please your grace, my Lord High Steward of England, and my noble lords the peers of the prisoner at the bar: According to the duty of my place I am to repeat the king's evidence, and state it to your grace and these noble lords, and submit it to your great judgments, how far it will go for the proof of this crime; wherein I shall observe the duty of all honest men, which is to do nothing either to wrest any thing in disadvantage of the prisoner out of the king's evidence, to go farther than it ought, nor shall omit any thing that shall require your grace and the noble lords' justice; for we come to seek out the truth, and we question not but by this honourable trial it will be brought to light. But I beseech your favour to take notice, in the first place, what crime this noble lord stands accused of, and it is for murder; wherein our law takes notice, that murder is where a man unlawfully kills another under the king's peace, with malice forethought. Now that here is a murder committed, I dare with all humility aver. By whom? that is the question: For this Robert Clerk, the person killed, doth appear, by the course of the evidence, to have been doing his duty, attending the place his employment required; gave no offence to any whatsoever; but when the person came down and fell upon him, the poor youth cried, 'Indeed, my lord, it was not I;' yet, my lords, the hands of violence seized him, and killed him. Let us then see how the evidence brings it home to the noble lord, the prisoner at the bar; wherein I must confess we have no express evidence (nay, we have evidence to the contrary) that it was not his hand that did the fact actually; for it is by two witnesses, the footmen, sworn that it was Mr. Gerrard who came down and gave the unfortunate blow: but we have that which we think, with humble submission, may reach this noble lord: For I know your grace and my lords remember, that after they had been an hour in the park, both returning, did with horrid oaths swear they would kill the centinel; there the evidence fixeth it, not upon one only, but upon both: it was at that time so dark they could not be distinguished, but by the voice: The centinel hath given you an account how he performed his duty, and in what strait he was, he had much ado to save his own life, or to prevent killing them: But when they came upon the stairs, these two boys came there in order to desire the centinel to call one of them the next morning. Then one on the stairs (no man can tell who it was) with horrid execrations, asked, Will you command the king's soldiers? Shoot him, centinel, we will bear you out. But all this while it was dusk, no distinction of persons could be made; whereupon it will fall out to come to this case, If several persons intend to kill one, and happen to kill another, whether this be not murder in them? For the urging of this, as to the matter in law, I leave to him that comes after me. The centinel swears one of them did swear he would kill one or other; who it was took up that cruel resolution, is left to you to judge: but at that time they were both together upon the top of the stairs; and my lord doth not seem to give one title of evidence, that shews any endeavours of the prisoner at the bar to prevent the other, or disprove of his actions: If he had given an account of that, he had silenced justice; but when they were all together, he not endeavouring to stop his hand, it is as much in law as if he had struck the stroke.

The other soldiers give you a particular account to the same purpose.

The two last witnesses do bring it to the person of my lord, the prisoner at the bar, and Mr. Gerrard, who, they swore, came down the stairs, and his man followed him to the bottom, and there staid at some distance till the fact was done, and they all fled.

This I take to be the matter of fact faithfully proved before your grace, and the Lords the peers; and I would not trouble your grace longer, because I would not misreport any thing, whereby I might do wrong, either to the prisoner or the king's cause; and because I know your grace and the noble lords will distinguish and find out where the truth is. I must say, it is a great comfort to all the subjects of England, that crimes of this nature are so carefully presented, that whatsoever honours and dignities our gracious sovereign doth confer on any person, it doth not exempt him from the justice of the law: it is not only a comfort to this assembly, but to the whole nation, to see the king tender of his subjects persons and lives, in that he hath caused this strict course to be taken, where the enquiry hath gone from the grand jury of the county, until the bill came to this great tribunal; where I doubt not but your grace, and these noble lords, will give a righteous and just judgment.

Serjeant Maynard. May it please your grace, my Lord High Steward of England, and my noble lords the Peers:

I, according to the duty of my place, come now to conclude the charge on the king's behalf. Some things are fit to be observed upon the evidence, that may produce a question for the decision of the fact, of what nature it is. That a murder is committed, is upon evidence without all question; and not only the death of a man, here is a child slain without any provocation in the world given by him to that person that did it; and that did it too, notwithstanding the deprecations of the boy, affirming his own innocency, and that with as full circumstances as a Christian almost could a thing: these come from the king's palace-walk in the park; call the centinel rogue, and when he doth his duty, swear to murder him; with oaths that a Christian would blush at, and be afraid to hear: God damnne oftentimes reiterated; and he that saith that word, doth beg of God to hate him, and affirm that he doth hate God. The obscenity that they used I shall not mention again. These are the circumstances of the case; that all were guilty of much, is no doubt; but who of the murder, is the question. And I humbly conceive, it is manifest, that this noble lord was concerned in it. For it is not requisite to make a murder, that he who kills a man hath conceived a malice against him; for if I have a malice against any man, and the effect of that fall upon another, it is murder.

I apply it thus: if it be a murder in Mr. Gerrard, if this noble lord partake with him in the design which made it so; to wit, the malice against the centinel; he is as guilty, as if his hand had been as much* upon him as was Mr. Gerrard's; as in that known case of the man that poisoned an apple with an intent to kill his wife, and she not knowing of the poison, gave some of it to her child, of which it died; though he had no design to kill the child, yet the malice he conceived against his wife supplied the defect of an express malice to make it murder; and he was hanged therefore. So if a man assault a master, in the presence of his servant, who defends his master, and is slain, though the other had no purpose to kill him, yet it is felony in him, for which he shall die; the law implying a malice. Then here was clearly a malice to the centinel; how near it comes to the boy will come in question afterwards. I find the objection made in my lord's case, that at the particular time where the fact was committed, my lord was not with Mr. Gerrard: but that will be no objection in the case; for if he did partake in the design of the other, I will answer it with the case of my lord Dacres† of the South, who, with some others, went unlawfully to steal deer, and the keeper coming, some fled, among whom my lord was one: the keeper was killed, my lord Dacres being at that time without the pales, a mile off from the place, and yet was found guilty of the murder, and lost both his lands and life for it. But here, my lord Cornwallis was present, for the witness swears the distance was not so great but it might be discerned. Now whether he was aiding or assisting, is the next thing in question. What occasion had they of malice, revenge, or injury to the centinel? They both swore they would kill him: had there been any excuse for the other, if one of them had killed the centinel? That could not be. Well, they did not kill the centinel, but at the same time take up a causeless offence against another, and kill him. I argue, that the malice against the soldier was diffusive to the boy; and one of the witnesses proves, that one of them swore he would kill somebody: now, no one speaks to any thing of my lord's reproving Mr. Gerrard. Thus stands the case before your grace and my lords: it is a case of blood, and it cries loud: how far this noble lord and prisoner at the bar is guilty thereof, you are to enquire, and without all doubt will give a clear verdict, according to justice and honour.

L. H. Steward. My lords, you have heard the evidence; if your lordships please to go and consider of it, you may.

Then the prisoner withdrew into his own apartment, with the lieutenant of the Tower. The lords went into a room behind the court of Chancery, and after a stay of two hours returned; and being all sat, the earl of Danby, Lord High Treasurer of England, who was the first of the jury, addressed himself to my Lord High Steward, and said:

Earl of Danby. My Lord High Steward, there is a question in law, of which some of my lords desire to receive satisfaction before they can give in their full verdict; and we desire to know of your grace, whether it be proper here to ask the question of your grace, or to propose it to the judges.

L. H. Stew. If your lordships doubt of any thing, whereon a question in law ariseth, the latter opinion, and the better for the prisoner is, that it must be stated in the presence of the prisoner, that he may know whether the question be truly put.* It hath sometimes been practised otherwise; and the peers have sent for the judges, and have asked their opinion in private, and have come back, and given their verdict, according to that opinion; and there is scarce a precedent of its being otherwise done, but there is a latter authority in print, that doth settle the point so as I tell you; and I do conceive it ought to be followed; and it being safer for the prisoner, my humble opinion to your lordship is, that he ought to be present at the stating† of the question.

Call the prisoner to the bar. Who being come, my lord spake thus to him:

L. H. Stew. My lord Cornwallis, My lords the peers, since they have withdrawn, have conceived a doubt, in some matter of law arising upon the matter of fact in your case; and they have that tender regard of a prisoner at the bar, that they will not suffer a case to be put up in his absence, lest it should chance to prejudice him, by being wrong stated; therefore, your lordship will do well to attend the question that is raised; and, my lords, will you please to propound your doubts?

Earl of Danby. It was taken notice of here, that by opening the matter by Mr. Solicitor,

* 3 Coke's Inst. fol. 489. Pasch. 26 Hen. 3, Lord Dacres's Case.

† It must certainly be in the presence of the prisoner, if you ask the judges' opinion. By lord Somers, Lord High Steward, in lord Warwick's Case, A. D. 1690, infra. So also in lord Stafford's Case, A. D. 1680, infra. Lord Finch (the Lord High Steward) says, "My Lords have directed that all the judges that assist them, and are here in your lordships' presence and hearing, should deliver their opinions," &c. So in Sacheverel's Case, A. D. 1710, infra, the Lords resolve, on debate, that a question should be put to the judges in the court below, where accordingly it was put and answered. But in Hastings's Case, A. D. 1787, infra, the questions were proposed to the judges and answered by them, not in Westminster-hall in the presence of the parties, but in the House of Lords, with the doors shut. Upon this subject, see the Report of a Committee of the House of Commons, April 30th, 1794, under the heads "Mode of putting the Questions," and "Publicity of the Judges' Opinions." See also the Protest of June 29, 1789. In lord Delamere's Case, A. D. 1686, infra, the judges were interrogated and made answer in open court.

* Sanders's Case in Plewden, fol. 473.

† Anno 25 H. 8, Coke, 3 Inst. fol. 211.

the matter of murder was explained to be meant by having a pre-pens'd malice, and in that case it was opened to us, that any persons then present, and that had in any sort contributed to the disorders, they were as equally guilty, as they whose hand had shed the blood of the person killed.

Now the doubt of some of my lords is, whether if it be found but man-slaughter, those are equally guilty (that are present, and have proved to contribute to the disturbance) of that crime, as they are in murder; because some of them have not the satisfaction that they are the same.

L. H. Steward. My lords the judges, I take it, the doubt proposed to you, is this; Whether or no, those that are present, and have contributed to the disorders, whereby such an accident doth ensue, as proves to be manslaughter, be as culpable, as he that doth the immediate fact, as it is in the case of murder?

After a little pause and conference, the Judges returned this answer:

Judges. We have had conference of this case, and our humble opinion is, If sundry persons be together, aiding and assisting to an action, wherein a manslaughter doth ensue, as in case of a sudden business without malice pre-pens'd, they are equally guilty of the manslaughter, as they are in the case of murder pre-pens'd.*

Earl of Danby. The Lords desire to withdraw once more. Which they did, and after a short space returned; and being called over, answered to their names; and all appearing, my Lord High Steward took their verdict seriatim, beginning at the puisne lord in the following order, they answering, standing bare, with their hands on their breasts.

L. H. Steward. My lord Duras, Is Charles lord Cornwallis guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Lord Duras. Not guilty.

The same question he demanded of each; who answered thus:

Lord Butler, Not guilty.

—, Not guilty.

Maynard, Not guilty of murder, but guilty of manslaughter.

Paget, Not guilty.

Berkly, Not guilty of murder, but guilty of manslaughter.

* See East's Pleas of the Crown, c. 5, s. 4, and s. 118.

Newport, Not guilty.

Hallifax, Not guilty.

Viscount Cambden, Not guilty.

Guilford, Not guilty.

Ailsbury, Not guilty of murder, but guilty of manslaughter.

Craven, Not guilty.

Bath, Not guilty.

Clarendon, Not guilty.

Sunderland, Not guilty.

Peterborough, Not guilty.

Devonshire, Not guilty.

Northampton, Not guilty.

Bridgwater, Not guilty.

Dorset, Not guilty.

Suffolk, Not guilty.

Bedford, Not guilty.

Derby, Not guilty.

Kent, Not guilty.

Oxford, Not guilty.

Arlington, Not guilty.

Brereton, Not guilty.

Lindsey, Not guilty of murder, but of manslaughter.

Dorchester, Not guilty.

Anglesey, Not guilty of murder, but of manslaughter.

Danby, Not guilty of murder, but of manslaughter.

Lord High Steward. Call the prisoner to the bar.

Then the prisoner came to the bar, and the deputy lieutenant of the Tower held the edge of the ax towards him, while my Lord High Steward spake thus unto him;

L. H. Steward. My Lord Cornwallis, you have been indicted for murder, pleaded Not Guilty, put yourself upon your peers; and your peers upon consideration of the whole matter have acquitted you, and found you Not Guilty, so you are to be discharged.

Cl. Cr. Make proclamation.

Serjeant. O Yes! My Lord High Steward of England willeth and commandeth all persons to depart hence, in God's peace, and the king's, for my lord high steward of England his grace doth dissolve this commission. God save the King.

At which words my Lord High Steward holding the white staff (which was delivered him by the usher of the black rod on his knees) in both hands over his head, snapt it in two, and the assembly broke up.

247. The Trial of ROBERT GREEN, HENRY BERRY, and LAWRENCE HILL,* at the King's-Bench, for the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey: 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679.

ON Wednesday the 5th of February, 1679, Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, were brought from his majesty's gaol of Newgate, to the bar of the court of King's-bench, to be arraigned for the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, upon an Indictment found by the grand jury for the county of Middlesex, on Monday the morrow of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary; and the court proceeded thus:

Mr. Justice Wild arraigned the prisoners.

Clerk of the Crown. Robert Green, hold up thy hand; Henry Berry, hold up thy hand; Lawrence Hill, hold up thy hand. Which they severally did.

You stand indicted by the names of Robert Green, late of the parish of St. Mary le Strand, in the county of Middlesex, labourer; Henry Berry, late of the same parish and county, labourer; and Lawrence Hill, late of the same parish and county, labourer; for that you three, together with ——— Girald, late of the same parish and county, clerk; Dominick Kelly, late of the same parish and county, clerk; and Phillibert Vernatt, late of the same parish and county, labourer, who are withdrawn: not having the fear of God before your eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, the 12th day of October, in the thirtieth year of the reign of our sovereign lord Charles the second, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. at the parish of St. Mary le Strand aforesaid, in and upon sir Edmundbury Godfrey, knight, in the peace of God, and of our said sovereign lord the king, then and there being, feloniously, voluntarily and of your malice aforethought, did make an assault; and that thou the aforesaid Robert Green, a certain linen handkerchief of the value of six-pence, about the neck of the said sir E. Godfrey, then and there feloniously, wilfully, and of thy malice aforethought, didst fold and fasten; and that thou the said Robert Green, with the handkerchief aforesaid, by thee the said Robert Green in and about the neck of the said sir Edmundbury Godfrey, in manner and form aforesaid, folded and fastened, then and there him the said sir Edmundbury Godfrey didst choke and strangle, of which said choking and strangling of him the said sir Edmundbury Godfrey, in manner and form aforesaid, he the said sir Edmundbury Godfrey then and there instantly died: and that you the said Henry Berry and Lawrence Hill, together with the said ——— Girald, Dominick Kelly, and Phillibert Vernatt, then and there feloniously, voluntarily, and of your malice aforethought, were present, aiding, abetting, comforting and maintaining the aforesaid Robert Green, the aforesaid sir Edmundbury Godfrey in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, voluntarily, and of his malice aforethought, to kill and murder; and so you the said Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, together with the said ——— Girald, Dominick Kelly, and Phillibert Vernatt, in manner and form aforesaid, the aforesaid sir Edmundbury Godfrey, feloniously, wilfully, and of your malice aforethought, did kill and murder, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.

How sayest thou, Robert Green, art thou Guilty of this felony and murder whereof thou standest indicted, and hast been now arraigned, or Not Guilty?

Green. Not Guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Green. By God and my country.

Cl. of the Cr. God send thee a good deliverance. How sayest thou, Henry Berry, art thou Guilty of the felony and murder whereof thou standest indicted, and hast been now arraigned, or Not Guilty?

Berry. Not Guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Berry. By God and my country.

Cl. of the Cr. God send thee a good deliverance. How sayest thou, Lawrence Hill, art thou Guilty of the felony and murder whereof thou standest indicted, and hast been arraigned, or Not Guilty?

Hill. Not Guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Hill. By God and my country.

Cl. of the Cr. God send thee a good deliverance.

Capt. Richardson. I desire to know when they must be brought up to be tried?

Mr. Just. Wild. Upon Friday next.

Cl. of the Cr. You shall have a rule to bring them up on Friday.

But on Thursday, the 6th of February, Mr. Attorney-General moved the court that it might be deferred till Monday, that the king's evidence might be the more ready; which was granted accordingly.

On Monday the 10th of February, 1679, the said Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, were brought again to the bar for their trial, which proceeded as followeth.

Cl. of the Cr. Make Proclamation.

Crier. O Yes!

Cl. of the Cr. Again, again.

Crier. O Yes, O Yes! our sovereign lord the king doth straightly charge and command all manner of persons to keep silence upon pain of imprisonment.

* See the Introduction to the Trials for the Popish Plot, vol. 6, p. 1424.

Cl. of the Cr. Make an O Yes.

Crier. O Yes! if any one can inform our sovereign lord the king, the king's serjeant at law, the king's attorney-general, or this inquest now to be taken of the felony and murder whereof Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, the prisoners at the bar, stand indicted, let them come forth and they shall be heard, for now the prisoners stand at the bar upon their delivery. And all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence against the prisoners at the bar, let them come forth and give their evidence, or else they forfeit their recognizance.

Cl. of the Cr. Robert Green, hold up thy hand; Henry Berry, hold up thy hand: Lawrence Hill, hold up thy hand. Which they severally did.

Those good men that you shall hear called, and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your several lives and deaths: if therefore you, or any of you, will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak unto them when they come to the book to be sworn, and before they are sworn. Crier, make an O Yes.

Crier. O Yes; you good men that are impanelled to enquire between our sovereign lord the king and Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, the prisoners at the bar, answer to your names, and save your issues.

Cl. of the Cr. Sir William Roberts.

Crier. Vous avez, Sir William Roberts.

Cl. of the Cr. Sir William Roberts to the book.

Crier. Sir William Roberts, look upon the Prisoners: you prisoners look upon the jury. You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make, between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoners at the bar, whom you shall have in charge, and a true verdict give according to your evidence. So help you God.

And the same oath was administered to the rest, and their names were as follow: Sir William Roberts, bart. Sir Richard Fisher, bart. Sir Michael Heneage, kt. Sir Thomas Bridges, kt. William Avery, Charles Humphreys, John Eastburn, Richard Gowre, Thomas Henslowe, John Sharpe, John Haynes, and Walter Moyle, esquires.

Cl. of the Cr. Crier, count these. Sir William Roberts.

Crier. One, &c.

Cl. of the Cr. Walter Moyle.

Crier. Twelve good men and true, stand together, and hear your evidence. Gentlemen, are you all sworn? and you that are not sworn, pray withdraw.

The standing-place for the jury being so thronged, that those who were sworn had not room to stand together, the Clerk of the Crown was ordered to make proclamation thus:

Cl. of the Cr. Crier, make Proclamation.

Crier. O Yes! my lords the king's justices do solemnly charge and command all persons that are not of the jury, to withdraw forthwith, upon pain of 100*l.* a man.

Cl. of the Cr. Robert Green, hold up thy hand; Henry Berry, hold up thy hand; Lawrence Hill, hold up thy hand. Which they severally did.

Gentlemen, you that are sworn, look upon the prisoners, and hearken to their charge: You shall understand, that they stand indicted by the names of Robert Green, late of the parish of St. Mary le Strand in the county of Middlesex, labourer; Henry Berry late of the same parish and county, labourer; and Lawrence Hill, late of the same parish and county, labourer; for that they, together with, &c. (as before) against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. Upon this indictment they have been arraigned, they have thereunto severally pleaded Not Guilty, and for their trials have severally put themselves upon God and their country, which country you are. Your charge is to enquire, whether the prisoners at the bar, Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, or any of them, are guilty of the felony and murder whereof they stand indicted, or not guilty; and for them which you shall find guilty, you shall enquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements, they had at the time of the felony committed, or at any time since. If you find them, or any of them, not guilty, you shall enquire, whether they, or any of them, that you find so not guilty, fled for the same; if you find that they or any of them fled for the same, you shall enquire of their goods and chattels, as if you had found them guilty: but if you find them, nor any of them, not guilty, nor that they did fly for it, say so, and no more, and hear your evidence. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O Yes! If any one will give evidence on behalf of our sovereign lord the king, against Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, the prisoners at the bar, let them come forth, and they shall be heard.

Mr. Serjeant Stringer. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of this jury, the prisoners at the bar, Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, stand indicted, for that they, with one Gerald a priest, one Kelly, and one Vernatt, did the twelfth of October last, at the parish of St. Mary le Strand in this county, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, assault the person of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, kt. and that the prisoner, Robert Green, did put about the neck of the said Sir Edmundbury a twisted handkerchief, and did with that twisted handkerchief so choke and strangle the said Sir Edmundbury, that he immediately died; and that the other prisoners, Henry Berry and Lawrence Hill, with the other persons, Gerald, Kelly, and Vernatt, were aiding and assisting the said Robert Green to murder the said Sir Edmundbury; and so the prisoners at the bar, with the said other persons, the said Sir Edmundbury Godfrey did kill and murder, against the king's peace, his crown and dignity. To this they have pleaded Not Guilty, and for their trial have put themselves upon their country, which country you are. If we prove them or any of them guilty, you are to find it so.

Attorney General (Sir William Jones). May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of this jury, the prisoners who stand now at the bar are indicted for murder. Murder, as it is the first, so it is the greatest crime that is prohibited in the Second Table. It is a crime of so deep a stain, that nothing can wash it away but the blood of the offender, and unless that be done, the land in which it is shed will continue polluted. My lord, as murder is always a very great crime, so the murder which is now to be tried before your lordship is, it may be, the most heinous and most barbarous that ever was committed. The murder was committed upon a gentleman, and upon a magistrate, and I wish he had not therefore been murdered, because he was a Protestant magistrate. My lord, I will not spend much of your time in making my observations before hand, because I must in this case crave leave to do it in the conclusion of the evidence. For I, that have made a strict examination into this matter, do find, that I shall better spend my time in making observations, and shewing how the witnesses do agree, after the evidence given, than before. Therefore, my lord, I shall at present only make a short narrative of the fact, to shew you the course of our evidence, that it may be the better understood and remembered by the jury. My lord, upon the discovery of the late horrid plot—

Lord Chief Justice (Sir William Scroggs.) And present Plot too, Mr. Attorney: but pray go on.

Att. Gen. If your lordship please, you may call it so, for it is to be feared they have not yet given it over: but upon the discovery of that Plot (call it late or present) sir Edmund-bury Godfrey (whom I suppose the jury all knew, and every man that lived thereabouts must needs remember to have been a very useful and active justice of the peace) had taken several examinations about this matter, and perhaps some more than now are extant; (but we have proof he had some) and was very industrious in finding out the principal actors in this plot, among whom, some priests and Jesuits foreseeing their own danger, and likewise the overthrow of a design which they had been so long in contriving, they had several consultations how to prevent the discovery. And as they are men who never stick at blood, but rather account it meritorious to shed it, though never so unjustly; when their interest may be profited by it, they did resolve to secure themselves and their design by taking away the life of this gentleman. In order thereunto they had several meetings, and the place of their meeting, you will find by the evidence, to be at the Plow-alehouse, and there they did consult how to take away the life of sir E. Godfrey. And they made several attempts to do it: one while they dogged him into the fields, another while they sent people to spy when he came abroad, that they might follow him into some dark alley, or other obscure or unfrequented place, and there dispatch him; and at last, after many attempts, they succeeded in that wicked one, when the murder was committed.

My lord, there are contained in this indictment six offenders, all principals; three of them, I think, are priests, or at least two of them are so; that is, Father Gerald an Irishman, Father Kelly likewise of the same nation, and one Vernatt, whether a priest or layman I know not. These priests (as they are always the first that contrive mischief, so they are always the first that fly punishment) have taken care for themselves, and run away, and left their blind followers, the prisoners at the bar, whom they had drawn into this bloody act, alone to answer for it.

The day when this murder was committed was Saturday the 13th of October last; and I must desire your lordship to take notice of the day, for upon that much of the evidence will depend. And we shall prove, that as they did before send several times to sir E. Godfrey's house to get intelligence of his going abroad, so this very day in the morning, Hill, one of the prisoners at the bar, came to his house upon pretence of business with him; and, as we guess, and have reason to believe, to learn whither he went that day: Green (another of the prisoners) had been there before on the same errand. And so much we shall prove to you by the people of the house. Sir E. Godfrey happened about noon, or some time in the afternoon of the same day (as we have it by the confession of one of the parties,) to be at an house near St. Clement's church, where these murderers had notice he was, and had prepared a trap for him as he came back. They had appointed men to watch him, and give them notice when he did come back; and whatever his business was at the house that he was in (for it cannot yet be known) he staid there till about seven or eight o'clock at night: and your lordship knows that at that time of the year it is then dark. He coming from about St. Clement's church towards his own house near Charing Cross, notice was given to the murderers of his approach near to Somerset-house. And thus they had had their bloody contrivance: some of them were appointed to meet him at the back-gate of Somerset-house, and to inform him that there was a quarrel in the yard, and he being a man always careful to keep the peace and punish them that broke it, they thought it a very apt means to train him into the yard. And when he came near the back-gate they did accordingly acquaint him that two of the queen's servants were fighting in the yard, and that they needed his presence to part and quiet them. He, at first, thought it might be but some ordinary idle scuffle, and was not willing to go down; but being very much importuned by them, down he went, through the back-gate into the yard, where were indeed two men scuffling together, but counterfeitedly; the one was Berry, the prisoner here; the other was Kelly, the priest that is run away. And when sir E. Godfrey was come, and within their reach, then, as it was before contrived, the fray of itself ended, and Berry goes to the lower water-gate, and Mr. Praunce (who was in that foul fact, but hath since repented, and hath made this discovery) to the upper-gate, to keep back any casual passengers for a little while, till such time as the murder was over.

My lord, things being thus prepared, whilst sir E. Godfrey stood still, or was returning, having no more to do there, after the scuffle was thus appeased, Green, one of the prisoners, coming behind him, puts a cravat, or a twisted linen cloth (which he had ready for the purpose) about his neck. And he, Hill, and those holy fathers Girald and Kelly (with great veneration be it spoken, for men of their order to stain their hands with the blood of an innocent gentleman, and that in so treacherous a manner,) all set upon him, and very manfully, being four upon one, and he altogether surprized, threw him down and strangled him. And this was done (as it is easy to imagine) without much noise; so that I doubt not but many that were near the place might be ignorant of it, and did not hear it.

My lord, though the thing was done with a great zeal, and a very good will to dispatch him, yet it so happened, that when Mr. Praunce came back from keeping sentinel at the gate, there was some life left in sir E. Godfrey; he did stir his feet, and thereby they perceived that he was not quite dead. But to make thorough work with him, Green (who begun, and was to give an accomplishment to this bloody fact) takes hold of his head and twists his neck round, and stamps upon his breast, the marks of which outrageous cruelty did plainly appear in his body after it was found.

My lord, after they had thus killed him, Girald the priest thought he was not yet dead enough, and was very willing to run him through with sir Edmond's own sword; but that was not liked by the rest, lest it might be discovered by a great effusion of blood in that place; and so they forbore it for that time. Having thus dispatched him, they removed him to the chamber of Hill, where they kept him some time, and after that to another chamber. I will not be particular herein, because the witness will give the best account of it. But after some time, (I desire it may be observed, it was on Monday night, two nights after the fact was committed) they brought him into another room and laid him there, with a cloke thrown over him. And I mention this last so particularly, because he then happened to be seen by another witness here present, who concurs as to his lying there dead, and that he saw him by the help of a dark lanthorn, of which, and other circumstances, I shall have occasion to make use hereafter.

My lord, after he had lain in Somerset-house some days, they thought it was high time to remove him, or rather to expose him: for having now killed him, they did endeavour to kill his reputation, and lay the blame of this foul murder upon this innocent gentleman, as if he had killed himself: and on Wednesday night, which by computation was the 18th of October, they carried him out of Somerset-house in this manner: Hill having late in the night procured a sedan, they made a shift, by bending the body to a fit posture, to crowd him into it; and Berry, one of the murderers, and porter of Somerset-house, was of all men most proper to help them out with privacy; and therefore it was agreed between them, that whenever a man should come before and make an hem, it should be a sign to Berry to open the gate. And, my lord, having put him into the sedan, Mr. Praunce and Girald first carried him out in it to Covent Garden, and there they rested (being something wearied with their burden) and two more supplied their rooms, and carried him to Long-acre. Then Girald and Praunce took him up again, and carried him to the Grecian church near Soho: and when they had him there, they got an horse ready and mounted him upon it, and Hill was set behind him to hold him up; by which means they carried him to the place where he was found; and there, to accomplish the last part of their design, which was to murder his reputation, after they had killed his body, they took his own sword and run him through, and left him in such a manner, as that (according to the weakness of their understanding) the world should conclude he had killed himself. In that condition was the gentleman found. I have but little more at present to trouble you with, and that shall be to shew you what the murderers did after they had committed this fact. They gave an account of it the next morning to Mr. Praunce, who went no further than the sedan west, which was to the Grecian church: and the priests were so far from any remorse, and had so little humanity, (I believe there is none can think they had much of divinity) that they did in a paper, set down a narrative of this heroic act: and I doubt not, but by this time it is sent to Rome, where it finds as great approbation, and causes as great joy, as their other acts of a like nature have heretofore done. Some days after the fact was done, and, to their everlasting honour, thus by themselves recorded, some of these priests had a meeting at the Queen's-head at Bow, and there was the paper produced and read; at which they were very merry, and were so loud, that some of the house overheard them; and do yet remember that they read, and were merry at, a paper which concerned sir E. Godfrey.

My lord, this will be the course of our evidence; and though your lordship and the jury will easily believe that most of these particulars must arise from one who was party to the fact, yet, my lord, I will undertake, before I have done, so to fortify stamp every particular the deliv'ers, with a concurrent proof of other testimony, and the things will so depend upon one another, and have such a connection, that little doubt will remain in any man's mind, that is come hither without prepossession, but that sir E. Godfrey was murdered at Somerset-house, and that the persons who stand now indicted for it were the murderers.

Recorder. (Sir George Jeffries.) My lord, if your lordship pleases, according as Mr. Attorney hath opened it, we desire we may call our witnesses; and first we will call Mr. Oates.

Crier. Mr. Oates, lay your hand on the book. The evidence you shall give for our sovereign lord the king, against Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, the prisoners at the bar, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. So help you God.

Solicitor General. (Sir Francis Winington.) Pray, Mr. Oates, will you give my lord and the jury an account what transactions there were between you and sir E. Godfrey; and that, my lord, is all we call him for.

Att. Gen. My lord, I call this gentleman to prove what examinations sir E. Godfrey had taken, and what was his own opinion of himself about them.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, I suppose the use you make of it is this, to shew, that that might be one of the motives to these persons to do this act, because he was forward in the discovery of their Plot.

Att. Gen. It is so, my lord; and that it was his opinion himself that he should have some mischief from them for it.

L. C. J. Come, Mr. Oates, pray tell your knowledge.

Oates. My Lord, upon the 6th of September last I did go before sir E. Godfrey, and there upon oath gave in several depositions, and after that I had made oath of those depositions, we took the record along with us home again. And on the 28th of September, after we had taken two or three copies of this record, we went before sir E. Godfrey again, and swore all the copies we had taken, and so made them records. My lord, after that, the business was made known to the council by myself, and upon Monday Mr. Godfrey came to me, which was, I think, the 30th of September, and did tell me, what affronts he had received from some great persons, (whose names I name not now) for being so zealous in this business. And, my lord, he told me, that others, who were well inclined to have the discovery made, did think that he had not been quick enough in the prosecution, but had been too remiss, and did threaten him, that they would complain to the parliament, which was to sit the 21st of October following. My Lord, that week before sir E. Godfrey was missing, he came to me, and told me, that several popish lords, some of whom are now in the Tower, had threatened him, and asked him what he had to do with it. My Lord, I shall name their names when time shall come. My Lord, this is all I can say: he was in a great fright, and told me, he went in fear of his life by the popish party, and that he had been dogged several days.

Att. Gen. Did he tell you that he was dogged?

Oates. Yes, he did; and I did then ask him, why he did not take his man with him; he said he was a poor weak fellow: I then asked him why he did not get a good brisk fellow to attend him? But he made no great matter of it; he said, he did not fear them, if they came fairly to work; but yet he was often threatened, and came sometimes to me to give him some encouragement; and I did give him what encouragement I could that he would suffer in a just cause, and the like; but he would often tell me he was in continual danger of being hurt by them.

Att. Gen. We desire Mr. Robinson may be sworn. Which was done accordingly.

Recorder. Pray sir, will you tell the court and the jury, what discourse you had with sir E. Godfrey, and what apprehensions he had concerning this business.

Tho. Robinson, esq. (Chief Prothonotary of the court of Common pleas.) My lord, sir E. Godfrey and I were of a very ancient acquaintance for above forty years; we were bred up together at Westminster-school, and continued in that acquaintance all along, except in the times of the war, and were for many years together in commission for the peace, both for this county and this city. We met at the quarter sessions for Westminster, the 7th of October, which was Monday, as I take it, and meeting there, we went, after the court was up, and dined with the head bailiff, as the custom is; where sir E. Godfrey and I did discourse several things about this Plot; I said to sir E. Godfrey, I understand you have taken several examinations about this Plot, that is now made public: truly, said he, I have; but I think I shall have little thanks for my pains, or some such words: saith he, I did it very unwillingly, and would fain have had it done by others. Why said I, you did but what was your duty to do, and it was a very good act: pray, sir, have you the examinations about you, will you please to let me see them? No, I have them not, said he; I delivered them to a person of quality; but as soon as I have them, you shall see them. But, said I, I should be very glad to understand, sir Edmundbury, that the depth of the matter were found out. I am afraid, said he, of that that it is not; but discoursing further, he said to me, 'Upon my conscience, I believe I shall be the first Martyr.' Why so? said I, are you afraid? No, said he, I do not fear them, if they come fairly, and I shall not part with my life tamely. Why do not you go with a man, said I, if you have that fear upon you? Why, said he, I do not love it, it is a clog to a man. But, said I, you should do well to keep a man; I observe you never go with one.

Att. Gen. But did he tell you, Sir, that he did believe he should be the first martyr?

Robinson. Yes, he did say, Upon his conscience, he did believe he should be the first martyr; and this is all I can say of this business.

Att. Gen. Then, if your lordship please, we will, in the next place, call Mr. Praunce, who was drawn in to be present at this business, and who knew of all the fact, and will give you an account of the whole matter.

Then Mr. Praunce was sworn.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, begin at the very beginning; the meetings you had at the Plough alehouse, and the sending to sir Edmundbury's house, and all the story.

L. C. J. Mr. Praunce, pray tell us the first motives that were used to you to do this thing, and the first time it was mentioned; who they were that first mentioned it, and where.

Praunce. My lord, it was about a fortnight or three weeks before he was murdered, we met several times at the Plough alehouse.

L. C. J. With whom?

Praunce. With Mr. Girald, Mr. Green and Mr. Kelly. Girald and Kelly did intice me in, and told me it was no sin.

Recorder. Girald and Kelly did?

Praunce. Yes, Girald and Kelly.

Recorder. What are they?

Praunce. Two priests: And they said, it was no sin, it was a charitable act: They said he was a busy man, and had done and would do a great deal of mischief, and it was a deed of charity to do it; and so they told the rest besides.

Att. Gen. Where was it they said thus?

Praunce. They said it at the Plough, and by the water-side.

Recorder. Well said. How long was it before he died?

Praunce. A week or a fortnight before he was murdered, and Green, Hill and Girald met there together.

Att. Gen. What discourse had you then?

Praunce. There they resolved, that the first that could meet with him should give notice to the rest to be ready; and so in the morning, when they went out on Saturday—

Att. Gen. But before you come to that, do you know of any dogging of him into the fields?

Praunce. Yes, it was before that, I heard them say they would, and had dogged him into the fields.

L. C. J. Who did you hear say so?

Praunce. Girald, Kelly and Green.

Att. Gen. That Green is one of the prisoners.

Recorder. Which way did they dog him? what fields?

Praunce. Red-lion-fields, and those by Holborn.

Att. Gen. Why did they not kill him there?

Praunce. Because they had not opportunity.

Att. Gen. Do you know of any sending to his house, or going to it?

Praunce. One time I do know of, and that was Saturday morning, Mr. Kelly came to give me notice, that they were gone abroad to dog him; and afterwards they told me, that Hill or Green did go to his house and ask for him, but the maid told him, he was not up, and then went away, and said he would call by and by.

Hill. What time was that in the morning?

Praunce. It was about 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning.

Hill. And had we been there before or after?

Praunce. You had been there before.

Recorder. Pray stay till such time as we have done with our evidence, you shall have all free liberty to ask him any question; but you must stay till we have done.

Praunce. As soon as they heard he was within, they came out and staid for his coming out, and dogged him.

L. C. J. Did all three of them go to his house?

Praunce. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Who was it did go?

Praunce. Only one, either Hill or Green.

L. C. J. How do you know that?

Praunce. They told me so themselves, for they came to give me notice.

L. C. J. Who told you so?

Praunce. It was Girald and Green both.

L. C. J. Did Green tell you that he had been there?

Praunce. He told me one of them, but I am not certain which. And so, my lord, after that, when he came out they dogged him that day up and down.

Mr. Justice Jones. Who dogged him?

Praunce. Girald, Green and Hill dogged him into St. Clement's; and about seven o'clock, Green came and gave me notice, that he was at St. Clement's, and I came to Somerset-house as fast as I could.

L. C. J. Where were you?

Praunce. At my own house.

L. C. J. How far did you live from Somerset-house?

Praunce. I lived in Princess-street, not far from Somerset-house.

Recorder. Who was it gave you notice?

Praunce. It was Green. He told me, that Girald and Kelly were watching him, and that he was at St. Clement's.

L. C. J. Where was he?

Praunce. At St. Clement's, my lord.

L. C. J. Where there?

Praunce. I was not there, they told me so, and no more; and about eight or nine o'clock, Hill came before, up the street, and gave us notice that we must be ready. And so, my lord, as soon as Hill had given us notice, he went up to the gate, and staid there till sir E. Godfrey came by, and then told him, there were two men a quarrelling, and desired him to come and try whether he could pacify them: he was very unwilling. But pray, Sir, saith Hill, you being a justice of the peace, may qualify them; and so he went down till he came to the bottom of the rails; and when he came to the bottom of the rails, Green twisted his handkerchief, and threw it about his neck, and threw him behind the rails, and there throttled him, and punched him, and then Girald would have thrust his sword through him; but the rest would not permit him, for fear it should discover them by the blood. And about a quarter of an hour after I came down, and found he was not quite dead; for I laid my hand upon him, and his legs tottered and shook, and then Green wrung his neck quite round.

Att. Gen. Who was it that took him by the neck?—Praunce. It was Green, my lord.

L. C. J. Did you see him?

Praunce. No, but he did tell me afterwards that he did it.

L. C. J. Who, Green himself?

Praunce. Yes, my lord, for he boasted of it.

Att. Gen. Pray what did he do to him besides?

Praunce. He punched him with his knee.

L. C. J. Did you see him do this? How do you know he did it?

Praunce. He and the rest told me so afterwards.

L. C. J. Where were you at that time the handkerchief was twisted about his neck?

Praunce. As soon as I came down I went towards the gate.

L. C. J. Who ordered you to stand at the gate?

Praunce. It was Hill.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. You watched the water-gate, who watched the stairs?

Praunce. That was Berry.

Recorder. Pray give an account what they did afterwards.

Praunce. Why, afterwards——

Att. Gen. Who told you that Green twisted his neck?

Praunce. All spoke of it.

Att. Gen. Did Hill?

Praunce. Yes, he and the rest.

Att. Gen. How came you to understand that he punched his breast?

Praunce. Green spoke of it himself, and so did the others.

Att. Gen. Who were about his body when you came down to the gate?

Praunce. All four.

Att. Gen. Name them.

Praunce. Hill, Green, Girald, and Kelly.

Att. Gen. Was Berry there?

Praunce. He came to them a while after.

Att. Gen. When?

Praunce. Before they carried him into the house.

Att. Gen. How can you tell that?

Praunce. Because he helped them to carry him in.

Sol. Gen. Where was Berry before they carried him into the house?

Praunce. He was about the stairs.

Recorder. Who was it that carried him up into the room?

Praunce. We all did.

Recorder. Pray name all that were in the company.

Praunce. There was Girald, Green, Hill, Kelly, Berry, and I.

Att. Gen. Who set their hands to it?

Praunce. We all did help; Hill went before and opened the door, and we carried him into the room.

Att. Gen. Whose room was that?

Praunce. It was a chamber of Hill's, in Dr. Godwin's house.

Recorder. Was Hill Godwin's man?

Praunce. Yes, he had been.

Mr. Justice Jones. Did Berry help to carry him in?

Praunce. Yes, Berry did.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Was there any discourse of a sword to be thrust through him at that time?

Praunce. Yes, Girald said he would thrust a sword through him; but they would not let him, for fear of discovery.

Att. Gen. What became of the body?

Praunce. It lay there till Monday night, and on Monday it was removed to Somerset House, and upon Monday night Hill did shew me it with a dark-lantern.

Att. Gen. Who were in the room then?

Praunce. Girald, and Hill, and Kelly, and all were there. And on Tuesday night it was brought back again: Mr. Hill would have carried him into his own lodging.

L. C. J. Whither did they carry him on Monday night?

Praunce. Into Somerset House.

Just. Wild. Is not Hill's chamber in Somerset House?

Serj. Stringer. Describe the room, Mr. Praunce, as well as you can.

Praunce. I am not certain of the room, and so cannot describe it.

Just. Wild. But was not Hill's chamber in Somerset House?

Praunce. It is in the lower part of the house, in a court.

Att. Gen. When you saw him in this room, pray what was thrown over him?

Praunce. There was something, I cannot tell what; for I durst not stay long there.

Just. Dolben. What light was there?

Praunce. Only a dark lantern.

Att. Gen. Who carried it?

Praunce. Hill carried it.

Just. Dolben. Are you sure you saw the body there?

Praunce. Yes, I am certain of it.

Att. Gen. What became of it after that?

Praunce. On Tuesday night it was carried to Hill's, the chamber where he was first brought after he was murdered; but there was somebody there, and so they could not carry it into the room, but they carried him into a room just over against; I think they were sir John Arundell's lodgings, I cannot tell. There it lay till Wednesday night, and about nine o'clock on Wednesday night they were removing the body into the room where it first lay; and I happened to come as they were removing it, and they were affrighted and run away: But I spoke, and Berry came back again, and got the body up into the room, and about 12 o'clock they carried it away in the sedan.

Att. Gen. Who brought the sedan?

Praunce. Hill did.

Att. Gen. Who put him into it?

Praunce. We all set our hands to it.

Att. Gen. Who carried him out first?

Praunce. I and Girald.

Att. Gen. Out of which gate.

Praunce. The upper gate of the upper court.

Att. Gen. How came you to have the gate opened?

Praunce. Berry opened it.

Att. Gen. How came he to open it?

Praunce. Somebody hem'd, and that was the sign.

Att. Gen. Who was it that carried the sedan first?—Praunce. I and Girald.

Att. Gen. Who went before?

Praunce. Green and Kelly.

Recorder. How far did you carry him?

Praunce. Into Covent Garden, and there we rested.

Att. Gen. And who took him up then?

Praunce. Green and Kelly.

Att. Gen. How far did they carry him?

Praunce. They carried him to Long-Acre. Then we took him up, and carried him to Soho church, and there Hill met us with an horse, and we helped the body up.

Att. Gen. Who was it that rid behind him?

Praunce. It was Hill.

Att. Gen. What did you do with your sedan?

Praunce. We set it in a new house till we came back again.

L. C. J. You say you saw him on horse-back?

Praunce. Yes my Lord, I did.

L. C. J. How, in what posture?

Praunce. Astride; his legs were forced open, and Hill held him up.

Hill. Did I hold him?

Praunce. Yes, you did.

L. C. J. Did the others go with him?

Praunce. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Who did go with him?

Praunce. Green, Hill, Girald and Kelly.

Att. Gen. Pray, will you tell my lord and the Jury, what account they gave you the next morning concerning the body, and how they had disposed of it.

Praunce. They told me—

L. C. J. Who told you?

Praunce. Hill, Kelly and Girald.

L. C. J. What did they tell you?

Praunce. First, that they had run him through with his own sword; then thrown him into a ditch, and laid his gloves and other things upon the bank.

Att. Gen. Pray tell now the story of your meeting at Bow. What was the house called you met at?

Praunce. It was the sign of the Queen's-Head.

Att. Gen. Who was it that did meet there?

Praunce. They were priests; I cannot so well remember their names, they are written down in this paper.

Recorder. Look on the paper yourself; you can read, I suppose?

Praunce. There was one Lusdn, a priest, I think.

Att. Gen. Where did he live?

Praunce. He was with Vernatt.

Att. Gen. What was the occasion of your meeting there?

Praunce. Vernatt told me it was only to be merry there.

Att. Gen. What was the man of the house his name?

Praunce. One Casshes.

Att. Gen. Did you dine there?

Praunce. Yes,

Att. Gen. What had you for dinner?

Praunce. We had a barrel of oysters, and a dish of fish: I bought the fish myself.

L. C. J. What day was it?

Praunce. The Friday after the Proclamation, that all the papists were to be gone out of town.

Recorder. Tell what company you had there, and what discourse.

Praunce. There was Mr. Vernatt, and I, and Mr. Girald, and that other priest, and one Mr. Dethicke.

Att. Gen. Who sent for him?

Praunce. Mr. Vernatt sent a note for him by a cobbler.

Att. Gen. Did he come upon that note?

Praunce. He came presently. And when he was come, then they read all the writing of the murder; for Mr. Vernatt should have been one at the doing of it, but something happened he could not.

Att. Gen. Mr. Vernatt was very sorrowful at the reading of it, was he not?

Praunce. If he was, it was because he was not there.

Att. Gen. How did he behave himself? Did he read it with any pleasure and delight?

Praunce. We were all very merry.

Att. Gen. What can you say about any body's over-hearing you?

Praunce. There was a drawer came and listened at the door, and I hearing the door a little rustle, went to the door, and caught him listening; and said I to him, sirrah, I could find in my heart to kick you down stairs; and away he went.

Just. Wild. Was Vernatt with you there that night he was murdered, the Saturday night?

Praunce. No; there was only the six I have named.

Just. Jones. You say that you met at the Plow the first night?

Praunce. Yes.

Just. Jones. And there you were told, that it was a very charitable act to kill sir E. Godfrey?

Praunce. Yes, I was so.

Just. Jones. Was it agreed there that he should be killed?

Praunce. It was agreed there; and the first that met him were to give notice to the rest.

Just. Jones. Who were there?

Praunce. Girald, Kelly, Green and I.

L. C. J. When came Hill and Berry into this cause? How came they acquainted with it?

Praunce. They were in it before I.

L. C. J. Who told you they were in it?

Praunce. Mr. Girald, my lord, told me so.

Just. Jones. Hill and Berry were not at the Plow, where did you first hear them speak of it?

Praunce. Girald and I have been at Berry's house divers times.

Just. Dolbea. But there were two meetings at the Plow, were there not?

Praunce. Yes, there were.

Just. Dolben. And Hill was at the last meeting, was he not?

Praunce. Yes, he was, my lord.

Att. Gen. Now I would ask you this question by the favour of the Court, was there any reward proposed by these priests for the doing of it?

Praunce. Girald and Vernatt did speak of a great reward that was to be given for it.

Att. Gen. Pray, how much?

Praunce. I do not remember what.

Att. Gen. Cannot you tell how much?

Praunce. There was to be a good reward from my lord Bellasis, as they said.

Justice Dolben. You had several meetings, you say: Did you there resolve what should be the way of doing it?

Praunce. Girald was resolved to kill him that night; and if he could not get him into a more convenient place, he would kill him with his own sword, in the street that leads to his own house.

Recorder. Who was that that resolved so?

Praunce. It was Girald.

Recorder. The priest; rather than that, was resolved to do that act of charity himself.

Att. Gen. I would now ask you a question; which though it does not prove the persons guilty, yet it gives a great strength to the evidence: Do you know Mr. Bedlow, Mr. Praunce?

Praunce. I do not know him.

Att. Gen. Had you ever any conference with him before you was committed to prison?

Praunce. Never in all my life.

Att. Gen. Were you ever in his company in your life before, that you know of?

Praunce. No, not that I remember.

Att. Gen. Well, you shall see how far he will agree with you.

Recorder. Now they may ask him any questions, if they please, for we have done with him.

L. C. J. Let them if they will.

Hill. My lord, in the first place, I humbly pray that Mr. Praunce's evidence may not stand good against me, as being perjured by his own confession.

L. C. J. How?

Hill. I suppose, my lord, it is not unknown to you that he made such an open confession before the king.

L. C. J. Look you, sir, I will tell you for that, I do not know that ever he made a confession to contradict what he had said upon his oath.—Hill. He was upon his oath before.

L. C. J. Yes, he had accused you upon oath; but afterwards, you say, he confessed that it was not true, but that confession that it was not true, was not upon oath: How is he then guilty of perjury?

Hill. My lord, if a man can swear a thing and after deny it, he is certainly perjured.

L. C. J. If a man hath great horrors of conscience upon him, and is full of fears, and the guilt of such a thing disorders his mind, so as to make him go back from what he had before discovered upon oath, you can't say that man is perjured, if he don't forswear it: But I believe no body did believe his denial, because his first discovery was so particular, that every man did think his general denial did only proceed from the disturbance of his mind. But have you any mind to ask him any questions?

Recorder. We can propose, that immediately after he retracted his recantation.

Justice Dolben. Try if you can trap him in any question.

Hill. Pray what hour was it that I went to sir Edmundbury Godfrey's?

Praunce. About nine or ten o'clock, I am not certain in the hour.

L. C. J. No, no, a man cannot be precise to an hour; but prove you what you can.

Hill. I have a great many witnesses, besides the justice of my cause, that I was not out of my house that day.

L. C. J. You shall be heard for that; but the present matter is, whether you will ask him any questions or no?

Hill. My lord, it is all false that he says, and I deny every word of it, and I hope it shall not be good against me.

L. C. J. Well, Mr. Berry, will you ask him any questions?

Berry. Mr. Praunce, who was in my house at that time you speak of?

Praunce. There was your wife there, and several other persons besides.

Berry. Who were they?

Praunce. There were divers people; it is an ale-house.

Berry. But who? Can you name any of them?

Praunce. There was Girald, and Kelly, and I.

L. C. J. Why, did you not ask know Mr. Praunce?

Berry. My lord, I knew him as he passed up and down in the house.

L. C. J. Why, what answer is that? what do you mean by his passing up and down in the house? did you never drink with him?

Berry. Drink with him, my lord? Yes.

L. C. J. Yes? why people don't use to drink as they go along.

Berry. It was in other company that came to my house, no acquaintance of mine.

L. C. J. Was not Mr. Praunce known by you all three? which of you can deny it? what say you, Hill?

Hill. My lord, I did know him.

L. C. J. What say you, Green?

Green. Yes, I did know him.

Att. Gen. But yet, my lord, we shall prove in the course of our evidence, that upon their examinations, they did deny they ever knew him; but because the prisoners give us this occasion, I desire Mr. Praunce may give an account of one thing. He was concerned in this very fact, and there was no other way to get any proof of it, than by the discovery of one among themselves. He was once of that religion, or else he had never been concerned in this thing. And your lordship will find that Mr. Praunce, while he was of that religion, and not sure of his pardon, was under some disturbances and fears, which prevailed with him to come before the king, and deny what he had sworn. But, my lord, which is very observable, this gentleman that had made that denial before the king, was so far convinced that he had done amiss in it, and so troubled that he had done it, that he desired captain Richardson (as soon as he returned back to prison) to carry him back to the king again; for he must go back and make good that confession which he at first had made; for it was every word true. And being for the king, we desire captain Richardson may be sworn.

Justice Wild. Can you tell where sir E. Godfrey was dogged?

Praunce. No, my lord, I cannot.

Justice Wild. You say they did tell you, that they dogged him up and down: Did not they tell you from whence they dogged him, when they killed him?

Praunce. No, they did not.

L. C. J. Mr. Richardson, were you by, when Mr. Praunce denied all that he had confessed?

Captain Richardson. My lord, upon the Sunday night before the prorogation of the last parliament, I received a letter from one of the lords of the council, to bring up Mr. Praunce before the lords of the committee for his examination. When I brought him thither I found Mr. Praunce was disturbed, and desired to speak with the king; and I carried him into the king's closet, where he fell down on his knees, and said, 'He was innocent, and they were all innocent;' and that was the substance of all he said. I then had him up to the council, where he said the same thing. The lords asked him, whether any body had been tampering with him? He answered, No. My lord, when I came home, I was no sooner got within the doors, but he begged of me, for God's sake, to go back to the king, and to acquaint him, not only that what he had now said, was false; but that all which he had sworn before, was truth. And if his majesty would send him a pardon, he would make a great discovery. And, my lord, more than that, he said, It was fear that made him recant; and he gave a full satisfaction, that it was only out of an apprehension that his life was not secure, that his trade would be lost among the Roman Catholics; and in case he had his pardon, and were saved, he should have been in danger of being murdered by them.

L. C. J. Now you have an account, Mr. Hill, how he came to deny, and how soon he recanted his denial.

Justice Jones. You are upon your oath, Mr. Praunce: Is this all true that he hath said?

Praunce. Yes, my lord, it is.

Recorder. How hath he behaved himself since that time?

Captain Richardson. As soberly as can be; since he had his pardon.

Att. Gen. Pray, since that time, have you had any discourse with him? And how did he carry himself?

Captain Richardson. Very soberly.

Att. Gen. Did he express any abhorrence of the practice of that church?

Captain Richardson. Yes, my lord, he did so.

Att. Gen. I hope it will make all people abhor and forsake them in time, if these be their practices. In the next place, my lord, we will call Mr. Bedlow, who, though he was not present at the murder, yet he saw the body after it was dead in Somerset-house, which goes to the matter as to the place; and he will give you some circumstances which will very much corroborate the testimony of Mr. Praunce.

Justice Wild. What time was it before they carried him in, after they had killed him?

L. C. J. Brother, I think they say, between eight and nine they decoyed him through the water-gate. Was it not so?

Praunce. Yes, my lord.

Justice Wild. How long had they killed him before they carried him into the room?

Praunce. About a quarter of an hour.

Justice Wild. Had he his sword about him?

Praunce. Yes, it was found run through him.

Justice Wild. Did sir E. Godfrey himself draw his sword?

Praunce. No, he was strangled by surprise, by getting a thing about his neck, and prevented him of drawing his sword.

L. C. J. They were persons that were ready prepared for him, they would not permit him to defend himself.

Serjeant Stringer. My lord, before Mr. Bedlow be sworn, I desire a little to open what we call him to. My lord, there were four priests that did design this murder; Le Faire and Welsh, and Gerald and Kelly, besides the other priests; and they treated with Mr. Bedlow for 4,000*l.* to undertake to kill a gentleman. My lord, he did promise to undertake it, but failing of his promise, afterwards Le Faire met him, and told him it was done; and told him he should have half that reward to help to carry him off; and withal, carried him into the room where the body was. And he will tell you that Praunce was in the room when he saw him; and though he never knew Praunce before, yet when he met him in the lobby of the Lords' House, he knew him again, and charged him as the man that committed this fact. And he will acquaint your lordship, that Le Faire saw the body likewise, and gave Mr. Bedlow an account of the murder, with the same circumstances that Praunce now relates it.

Then Mr. Bedlow was sworn.

Recorder. Mr. Bedlow, pray do you direct your discourse to the Jury.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, pray do you ask him your questions, that you may put him in that method you would have him take, to give his evidence.

Att. Gen. My lord, I would first ask him this question: What conference he had with any persons, priests or others, about murdering any body?

Bedlow. My lord, and the Jury, I have at other times, and in other places, proved what familiarity I have had with the priests and Jesuits; and if I have not satisfied the Court and others, about it, yet I have done my duty in endeavouring so to do. My lord, I have been several times treated with, not only about the plot, but by several persons about murdering of a gentleman. They never told me who it was that was to be murdered; but if I would undertake it, they, that is, Le Faire and Pritchard, and Mr. Kaines, and several other priests, who discoursed with me about it, would find out some to assist me, and my reward should be very considerable.

L. C. J. When was this?

Bedlow. It was in October last, about the beginning, or the latter end of September.

L. C. J. Well, Sir, go on.

Bedlow. I did adhere to them all along, for I had a mind to discover two years ago, but was prevented; and I only drilled them on, to know the party, that I might prevent them. But they would never discover the party.

Att. Gen. Pr'ythee come to this particular part of the story.

Bedlow. Afterwards they set me to insinuate myself into the acquaintance of sir E. Godfrey, not telling me they had a design upon him.

L. C. J. Who did?

Bedlow. Le Faire, and Pritchard, and Welsh.

L. C. J. Gerald was not one, was he?

Bedlow. No, my lord: But they told me, that afterwards they would have me introduce them into his acquaintance: And I had been, I think, six or seven days together with sir E. Godfrey, at his house; and had got much into his acquaintance.

Justice Wild. By what means did you get into his acquaintance?

Bedlow. Why, I pretended to get warrants for the good behaviour against persons, that there were none such.

L. C. J. Well, and what then?

Bedlow. This was the week before the Saturday that he was killed; and I was there every day but Saturday: On the Friday I went to the Greyhound tavern, and I sent my boy to see if sir E. Godfrey were at home: sir E. Godfrey was not at home then.

L. C. J. When was that?

Bedlow. The very day before he was killed: If he had been at home, I would have gone over to him, and would have desired him to go or to them.

L. C. J. Were the priests there?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, there was Pritchard, and Le Faire, and Welsh and Kaines, and another; five Jesuits: And, as I said, I sent my boy to see if he were at home, and he brought me word he was not; and if he had, I was to have gone to him, to have fetched him thither, that they might insinuate themselves into his acquaintance: And indeed they had tongue enough to wheedle themselves into any one's acquaintance: So he not being at home, we came into the city, two of the Jesuits and I.

Att. Gen. Which two?

Bedlow. Le Faire and Welsh. The next morning Le Faire came to my chamber, and I was not then within; but by accident, I met him, about four of the clock, in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields: We went to the Palgrave's-Head tavern; where falling into discourse, he told me there was a gentleman there that was to be put out of the way, that was the phrase he used, he did not really say murder him; for they do not count it murder.

L. C. J. No, no; they put it into softer terms.

Bedlow. They told me it was to be done to-night. I asked who it was; they said it was a very material man: For he had all the informations, that Mr. Oates and Dr. Tongue had given in; that several had been employed in the doing it; that several attempts had been made, and that they had missed several opportunities, and had not done it till then; but if he should not be taken out of the way, and the papers taken from him, the business would be so obstructed, and go near to be discovered, to that degree, that they would not be able to bring this design to pass, but must stay till another age before they should effect it. I asked him again, who it was; he said he would not tell me, but it was a very material man. I told him, that according to my promise, I would assist: but in such a case, I should need a great many men to be with me, he being so considerable a person. I asked him then, where the money was, that was formerly promised? He told me no worse a man was engaged in it, than my lord Bellasis, and Mr. Coleman had order to pay it.

Justice Jones. What was the reward?

Bedlow. Four thousand pounds.

L. C. J. Who was it that first named this gentleman to you to be sir Edmundbery Godfrey?

Bedlow. They never named him to me at all.

L. C. J. Let us know when you first knew it to be sir Edmundbery Godfrey?

Bedlow. I parted with him then, but came not according to my promise. I was to meet him at the cloisters at Somerset-house that night: but I knew their design was to murder somebody, and I would not come. I saw him no more till Monday night; then I met him in Red-Lion-Court, where he put up his cane to his nose, as who should say, I was to blame in not keeping my promise. And we went together to the Greyhound tavern in Fleet-street, where he charged me with my breach of promise. I told him I was taken up by other company, and unless they would tell me who it was I was to kill, I would have no hand in it: For I did not know but that it might be my own particular friend. And I would not murder any private person, unless I knew who it was, and for what reason. Well, says he, we will tell you more anon if you meet me to-night at Somerset-house, at nine o'clock. I did meet him exactly at that time in the cloisters, where we walked, and talked a great while. And then he took me into the middle of the court, and told me, you have done ill, that you did not help in this business; but if you will help to carry him off, you shall have half the reward. Why, said I, is he murdered? Yes, said he. May I not see him, said I? Yes, you may, said he; and so took me by the hand, and led me into the room through a dark entry. In the room were a great many, I cannot tell who they all were.

Att. Gen. How many were there?

Bedlow. There might stand a great many behind one another. I saw four or five.

Justice Jones. What kind of a light had they, Mr. Praunce?

Praunce. It was a middle sized lanthorn.

Justice Jones. Was it a small light, or a great light?

Bedlow. It was a small light.

Justice Jones. Had they no light but that lanthorn?

Bedlow. No: And they did not open it till I had had a turn about the room.

L. C. J. Did they discourse of carrying him away then?

Bedlow. Yes, they did.

L. C. J. Did you know him, when he lay dead there?

Bedlow. Yes, your lordship shall hear how I came to know him: One stepped to the body; and threw off the thing that lay upon him, and I went and looked upon him; and he had got about his neck such a kind of a fashioned cravat as this about my neck; and I went to try, and could not get my finger in betwixt: So I saw him, his bosom was all open, and I knew him presently; for those Jesuits that were there, were not those who had employed me to insinuate myself into his acquaintance; and so they thought I had not known him. I asked who it was, they said it was a man that belonged to a person of quality. I was mightily struck and daunted when I knew him: I would fain have persuaded them to have tied weights at his head and feet, and thrown him into the river; and afterwards I would have dragged for him, and took him up there. But they did not think that so safe: No (said they), we will put it upon himself, there are none but friends concerned. I asked Le Faire how they should get him out? They said, in a chair. Then, I asked them, which way they would get him into the chair, and out of the gate? They said the porter was to sit up to let them out.

Recorder. What porter?

Bedlow. The porter of the house.

Recorder. Who, Berry?

Bedlow. Yes: As for that Hill, or the old man, I do not know that I ever had any particular knowledge of them; but only I looked upon them as ill designing men, seeing them in the chapel.

L. C. J. Did you ever see ever a one of the three prisoners there at that time?

Bedlow. No, my lord: But I have such a remembrance of faces, that I could tell if I saw them again, any that I did see there, though the light was but small. They told me, They had strangled him; but how, I did not know. When they pressed me to help to carry him out, I then excused myself, and said, it was too early to carry him out yet; but about eleven or twelve o'clock would be a better time. And I assured them I would come again. Said Le Faire to me, Upon the agreement you took on Thursday, you will be at the carrying off of this man at night? I promised him I would. And he went away, and before there. I made what speed away I could, for I was very unsatisfied in myself; having so great a charge upon me, as the sacrament of the altar, which, after the discovery of the plot, was administered to me twice a week to console it. I could not tell how to discover it: I went then to Bristol, but very restless and disturbed in my mind; and being persuaded by what God was pleased to put into my mind, calling to remembrance that some murders had been already committed, and greater ones were daily intended, I was at last convinced and could no longer forbear discovery. I wrote to the secretary of it; and went to the parliament and gave in my information. And one day I met with Mr. Praunce in the lobby, and knew him, and apprehended him.

Att. Gen. I will ask you one question. Had you any discourse with Mr. Praunce between the time you saw him with the body, and the day he was apprehended?

Bedlow. No; I never saw him to this day, to have any converse with him.

Justice Wild. Did not you see Hill that night, when you were to have carried him away?

Bedlow. No, my lord.

Justice Wild. Nor Green, nor Berry?

Bedlow. Green I did see about the court, and Berry, I was told, was to open the gate that Monday night. But, my lord, when they found I did not come again, they desired that night, and kept it off longer, for fear I should come again to stop them.

Att. Gen. He did not refuse to help them, but promised to do it, and failed: And they finding that he had failed them, would not let the body lie where it was, for fear of discovery, but removed it back again.

Justice Dolben. What did Praunce say, when you first took notice of him?

Bedlow. I understood afterwards that he was taken upon suspicion, because at that time his maid had made a discovery, that he was about that time out of his lodgings. And while he was there in the constable's hands, Mr. Oates came by, and he desired to see him; and presently after I came thither, and the constable asked him, Mr. Praunce, will you see Mr. Bedlow? No, he said, he would not: Then he put his hat over his eyes, that I might not see his face, and kept it so. The press being great, and being desirous to be private myself, I spoke to the guard to put out all that had no business there, and they cried out, that all should avoid the room, but Mr. Bedlow and his friends. And when he was going out with the rest, he lifted up his hat, to see his way; and though before I did not mind him, yet I happened at his passing by me, to cast my eyes upon his face, and presently knew him, and cried, Oh! pray, sir, stay; you are one of my friends that must stay here. And I presently charged my guards to take charge of him. Saith the constable, he is my prisoner: Is he so? said I; then you have a very good prisoner, and pray look safe to him. And then when I went into the House of Lords I made out my charge against him.

Recorder. Now if the prisoners have any questions to ask Mr. Bedlow, they may have free liberty to do it.

Hill. I never saw him before in my life.

L. C. J. Do you know any of them?

Bedlow. I know Mr. Berry and Green very well.

L. C. J. Pray, Mr. Praunce; was the dark lantern at Hill's lodgings, or at the other place?

Praunce. At the other place.

L. C. J. Look you here, Mr. Praunce; they carried him to Hill's on Saturday night, and he lay there till Monday night: what time on Monday night was it that they removed him into Somerset-House?

Praunce. I was not there when they did remove him.

L. C. J. What time did you see him there?

Praunce. About nine or ten o'clock.

L. C. J. What time was it that you saw him there, Mr. Bedlow?

Bedlow. It was after nine, my Lord.

Praunce. They had then removed him to Somerset-House, and Mr. Hill asked what they intended to do with the body? They said, they would carry it out that night; but they did not

But there the dark lantern was, and on Tuesday night they removed him back again.

Att. Gen. Now, My Lord, if you please, we shall go on to call some witnesses that were not present at the murder; for direct evidence, as to that, came only out of the mouth of some that were concerned in it; but to corroborate, by concurrent circumstances, the testimony which hath been already given. And first we shall call the constable, to prove that he found Sir E. Godfrey in the fields, in the same manner which Mr. Praunce says they told him they left him.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, you promised you would prove, that when these persons were examined, they did deny before the House of Lords that they knew Praunce.

Att. Gen. My lord, in that we were mistaken; I understand now, it was only Berry denied that he did know Girald.

L. C. J. Why, did you never know Mr. Girald?

Berry. Never in my life.

L. C. J. Mr. Praunce, have not you seen Girald with Berry.

Praunce. Yes, I have, but they usually went by several names.

L. C. J. Did you ever see Girald in Hill's company?—Praunce. Yes, that I have.

L. C. J. Was there no centinel set that Monday night, that Saturday night, and that Wednesday night?

Praunce. My Lord, I am not certain, I took notice of none; if there were any, they were at Berry's house, and he opened the gate when we came out with the sedan.

Att. Gen. Mr. Berry, I suppose, could take order with the centinel, and give them some entertainment in his own lodge.

Then Mr. Brown the Constable was sworn.

Recorder. Pray, in what posture did you find sir E. Godfrey?

Brown. I found him my Lord, in a ditch, with his sword through him, and the end of it was two handfulls out of his back.

L. C. J. Was he bloody?

Brown. There was no blood at all, there was no blood in the ditch.

L. C. J. Was the sword sticking in his body?

Brown. Yes, my Lord, but there was no blood at all when it was taken out; they had run it into another place, but that happened to be against a rib, and so it could not go through; but there was no blood there.

Justice Jones. Were there any bruises on his breast?

Brown. He did look black about the breast.

Att. Gen. My Lord, I would ask whether his neck were broken?

Brown. Yes I suppose it was.

L. C. J. How do you know it?

Brown. It was very weak, and one might turn his head from one shoulder to the other.

L. C. J. Where was his stick and gloves?

Brown. They were on the bank-side.

L. C. J. Whose sword was it?

Brown. His servants said it was his own.

Att. Gen. Pray, had he any money in his pocket?

Brown. Yes; a great deal of gold and silver.

L. C. J. Ay, ay, for they count theft sin but not murder.

Justice Wild. They left that, to let men think he murdered himself.

L. C. J. Well, will you ask this witness any questions before he goes?

Capt. Richardson. They say they will ask him none.

Att. Gen. Then we desire to call the surgeons that viewed and opened the body, Mr. Skillard, and Mr. Cambridge. Both whom were sworn.

Att. Gen. We begin with Mr. Skillard: Pray, sir, inform my Lord and the Jury, did you see the body of sir E. Godfrey?

Skillard. Yes, I did view the body.

Att. Gen. When? What time did you see it?

Skillard. About twelve of the clock.

Att. Gen. What day of the week was it?

Skillard. On Friday, the next day after he was found.

Att. Gen. Did you observe his breast? How was it.

Skillard. His breast was all beaten with some obtruse weapon, either with the feet, or hands, or something.

Att. Gen. Did you observe his neck?

Skillard. Yes; it was distorted.

Att. Gen. How far?

Skillard. You might have taken the chin, and have set it upon either shoulder.

Att. Gen. Did you observe the wound?

Skillard. Yes, I did: it went in at one place and stopped at a rib, the other place it was quite through the body?

Att. Gen. Do you think he was killed by that wound?

Skillard. No; for then there would have been some evacuation of blood, which there was not. And besides, his bosom was open, and he had a flannel waistcoat and a shirt on; and neither those, nor any of his clothes were penetrated.

Att. Gen. But are you sure his neck had been broken?

Skillard. Yes, I am sure.

Att. Gen. Because some have been of opinion, that he hanged himself; and his relations, to save his estate, run him through; I would desire to ask the chirurgeon what he thinks of it.

Skillard. There was more done to his neck than an ordinary suffocation; the wound went through his very heart, and there would have appeared some blood, if it had been done quickly after his death.

Att. Gen. Did it appear by the view of the body that he was strangled or hanged?

Skillard. He was a lean man, and his muscles, if he had died of the wound, would have been turgid: And then again, all strangled people never swell, because there is a sudden deprivation of all the spirits, and a minding of the circulation of the blood.

Att. Gen. How long do you believe he might be dead before you saw him?

Skillard. I believe four or five days. And they might have kept him a week, and he never swelled at all, being a lean man. And when we ripped him up, he began for to putrify; we made two incisions to give it vent, and the liquor that was in his body did a little smell. The very lean flesh was so near turned into putrefaction, that it stuck to the instrument when we cut it.

Recorder. My lord, here is another chirurgeon, Mr. Cambridge. Pray, sir, are you sworn?

Cambridge. Yes, I am.

Recorder. When did you see the body of sir E. Godfrey?

Cambridge. Upon Friday, the very same day the gentleman did. I found his neck dislocated, and his breast very much beaten and bruised. And I found two punctures under his left pap, the one went against the rib, and the other quite through the body under the left pap.

Att. Gen. Do you believe that wound was the occasion of his death?

Cambridge. No; I believe it was given him after his death.

L. C. J. And his neck was broke?

Cambridge. His neck was dislocated, sir.

Att. Gen. Why, that is broken. Now my lord, we shall call sir E. Godfrey's maid, Elizabeth Curtis. Swear her. Which was done.

Recorder. Your lordship knows, that Mr. Praunce did say in the beginning, that they had been several times at his house, enquiring for him: Now we call this person to tell you what she knows about that.

Att. Gen. Elizabeth Curtis, look upon the prisoners, and tell my lord and the Jury whether you know any of them or no.

Eliz. Curtis. This man that I now hear called Green, my lord, was at my master's about a fortnight before he died.

L. C. J. What to do?

Eliz. Curtis. I do not know, but he asked for sir E. Godfrey.

L. C. J. What time of the day was it?

Eliz. Curtis. It was in the morning.

Att. Gen. What did he say?

Eliz. Curtis. He asked for sir E. Godfrey, and when he came to him, he said, Good morrow, sir, in English, and afterwards spoke to him in French, I could not understand him.

Recorder. I desire she may consider well; look upon him.

Eliz. Curtis. That is the man.

Green. Upon my soul, I never saw him in all my life.

Eliz. Curtis. He had a dark coloured periwig when he was there, and was about a quarter of an hour talking with my master.

Att. Gen. Are you sure this was the man?

Eliz. Curtis. Yes, I am; and that other man, Hill, was there that Saturday morning, and did speak with him before he went out.

L. C. J. That you will deny too?

Hill. Yes, I do.

L. C. J. How do you know he was there?

Eliz. Curtis. I was in the parlour at that time, making up the fire.

L. C. J. Had you ever seen him before that time?

Eliz. Curtis. No, never before that time. I went into the parlour to carry my master's breakfast, and brought a bunch of keys with me in, and there Hill was with him. And I went up stairs about some business, and came down again, wanting the keys, which I had left upon the table, and Hill was all that time with my master.

Sol. Gen. How do you know he was there?

Eliz. Curtis. I was in the parlour, and stirred up the fire, and he was there a good while.

Justice Jones. How long after did you see him again?

Eliz. Curtis. Not till I saw him in Newgate.

Justice Jones. How long was that afterwards?

Eliz. Curtis. A month ago. But it is not the man that brought the note to my master.

Att. Gen. What note?

Eliz. Curtis. A note that a man brought to my master that night before.

Att. Gen. What is become of that note?

Eliz. Curtis. My lord, I cannot tell, my master had it.

Att. Gen. Pr'ythee tell us the story of it.

Eliz. Curtis. There was a man came to my master's house, and asked if sir E. Godfrey were within. He said he had a letter for him; and shewed it me; it was tied up in a knot. I told him my master was within, but busy; but, said I, if you please, I will carry it in to him. He did so, and I gave it to my master; when I went out again, the man stayed and asked for an answer: I went in again, and told my master, that the man required an answer. Pr'ythee, said he, tell him, I don't know what to make of it.

Justice Wild. When was that?

Eliz. Curtis. On Friday night.

Justice Wild. When? The Friday night before he was murdered?

Eliz. Curtis. Yes.

Att. Gen. But you swear, that Hill was there the Saturday morning.

Eliz. Curtis. Yes, he was.

Sol. Gen. In what clothes was he then?

Eliz. Curtis. The same clothes that he hath now.

Justice Wild. Are you sure they are the same clothes? Eliz. Curtis. Yes.

Sol. Gen. Here is a great circumstance, my lord. I asked her what clothes he was in, when he came to sir E. Godfrey's? and she saith the same that he hath now.

L. C. J. Have you ever shifted your clothes?

Hill. No, indeed, I have not.

Eliz. Curtis. But for the man that brought the note, I cannot swear it is he.

Hill. But she did say, when she came to see me in Newgate, that she never saw me in my life; and, my lord, I hope I have sufficient witnesses to prove where I was that morning.

L. C. J. She says, she cannot swear you were the man that brought the note.

Hill. My lord, I desire she will tell me about what time it was I was there.

Eliz. Curtis. It was about 9 or 10 o'clock.

Att. Gen. That agrees with Mr. Praunce's exactly in point of time. Now, if your lordship please, we will proceed, and call Mr. Lancelot Stringer, and Mr. Viscent.

Recorder. My lord, we do call these witnesses to prove, that these men had meetings with Mr. Praunce at the Plow.

Then was Lancelot Stringer sworn.

Recorder. Pray tell my lord and the jury, whether you know Mr. Praunce.

L. Stringer. Yes, sir, I do.

Recorder. Have you seen him at the Plow at any time?—L. Stringer. Yes, sir, I have.

Recorder. In what company there? Was Mr. Green there?

L. Stringer. Yes, he was.

Recorder. Which was he? [He points to him.]

Recorder. And who else?

L. Stringer. There was that Hill.

Att. Gen. How often?

L. Stringer. Several times.

L. C. J. How long before sir E. Godfrey was murdered?

L. Stringer. I cannot tell, my lord.

L. C. J. Do you remember any other company was with him?

L. Stringer. Yes, there were several other company.

Recorder. Name them.

L. Stringer. There was Mr. Fitz-Gerald and Mr. Hill.

Att. Gen. And yet Hill saith, he never saw Gerald.

L. Stringer. And there was Kelly, he was another of them, and Praunce.

L. C. J. Did you know Vernatt?

L. Stringer. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. How now? What say you to it, Mr. Hill, and Mr. Green? Were you never at the Plow, drinking with Mr. Praunce?

Hill. Yes, my Lord, several times.

L. C. J. What say you, Mr. Green?

Green. I have drank with him there.

L. C. J. Do you know Gerald?

Hill. I know one Gerald.

Sol. Gen. Now will your lordship please to let me prove, that at the council he owned he knew Gerald and Kelly, and now it is proved he hath been in Kelly's company, he says he does not know Gerald.

Hill. My lord, That was a mistake, for I do know Kelly by sight; that is, I knew two men that used the chapel very much, and he was one of them.

L. C. J. But you, witnesses, say you have seen Gerald and them together?

L. Stringer. Yes, I have.

L. C. J. How many times?

L. Stringer. I cannot tell how many, my lord; several times.

L. C. J. Have you seen them twice together?

L. Stringer. Yes, I have.
Recorder. Now to settle it, I would ask him, with your lordship's favour, when he came to live with his master. You, young man, when did you come to live with your master at the Plow?

L. Stringer. Why, I have been with him two years.

Recorder. But when was it you came last to live at the Plow?

L. Stringer. In Bartholomew-tide last.

Recorder. It was but five weeks before Sir Edmundbury Godfrey was murdered.

L. C. J. Do you, Green, know Mr. Girald?
Green. Yes, I do.

Recorder. Then pray swear Mr. Vincent. Which was done.

Recorder. Come, pray sir, do you live at the Plow?

Vincent. Yes, Sir, I do.

Recorder. Then pray, do you tell my lord and the jury, if you know any of the prisoners at the bar, and which' of them.

Vincent. I know Mr. Green.

Recorder. Do you know any body else?

Vincent. Yes, I know Hill, and I know Berry.

Recorder. Have you seen these persons at your house?

Vincent. Yes, I have.

L. C. J. With whom?

Vincent. I can't tell every body with whom they were.

L. C. J. Were they there with Praunce?

Vincent. Yes, Sir.

L. C. J. Did you know one Girald?

Vincent. Yes, Sir.

L. C. J. Hath he been at your house?

Vincent. Yes, Sir, he hath.

L. C. J. Who was with him?

Vincent. I can't tell justly.

L. C. J. Did you know Kelly?

Vincent. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. Hath he been there?

Vincent. Yes, he hath.

L. C. J. In what company?

Vincent. With Praunce.

L. C. J. And with any of the prisoners?

Vincent. Yes, but I can't tell particularly with whom.

Att. Gen. Now, my lord, as these were meetings before the fact was committed, to consult how to do it; so we at the beginning told you of a meeting after it was done, and that it was at Bow. We shall therefore call some witnesses as to that; and they are Richard Cary, and William Evans. First swear Richard Cary. Which was done.

Recorder. Do you remember you were sent of a message from the Queen's-Head at Bow, and whither? Pray tell my lord and the Jury.

Cary. I remember it very well; there were three gentlemen that sent for me to the Queen's Head, and I being sent for did come; and when I came up stairs, they asked me if I knew Poplar; I said, I knew it very well.

Then they asked me, if I knew Mr. Dethick; I told them I thought I did. Then said they you must carry this letter to George Dethick, esq. at Poplar, and deliver it to his own hands, and to nobody else. Accordingly away I went and carried the letter; I went to the door, and asked if he were within; his man said he was above stairs, but they would call him to me; and calling him to me, Sir, said I, there are some gentlemen at the Queen's-head at Bow, that have sent me with a letter to you. So he looked upon the letter, and, saith he, go and tell them I will be with them presently. So, may it please you, my lord, I came again, and when I came, the gentlemen were there still. Well, said they, go and drink a glass of claret, which stood upon the table, and they gave me six-pence, and I went away.

Recorder. Pray look upon Mr. Praunce, can you remember whether that man was there?

Cary. There were three of them, and he looks like one.

Recorder. Mr. Praunce, do you remember this was the man you sent?

Praunce. Yes, my lord, this was the same man that was sent.

L. C. J. Well, call the other.

Then William Evans, the boy of the house at the Queen's-head, was sworn.

Recorder. Hark you, do you remember any company that was at your master's house two or three months ago?

W. Evans. Yes, I do.

Recorder. Do you remember that you heard them talk any thing there?

W. Evans. They pull'd out a paper, and read it.

L. C. J. You boy, do you know Mr. Dethick?

W. Evans. Yes, I do.

L. C. J. Was he there?

W. Evans. He did come to them, my lord.

Recorder. What had they to dinner there?

W. Evans. They had Rounders.

Recorder. Who bought them?

W. Evans. One of them, I can't tell who.

Recorder. What had they else?

W. Evans. A barrel of oysters.

Recorder. Pray give my Lord an account what you observed and heard.

W. Evans. Sir, I know nothing but that they pulled out a paper and read it, and named sir E. Godfrey's name. And while I was at the door, somebody threatened to kick me down stairs.

L. C. J. He saith just as Mr. Praunce said in every particular.

Att. Gen. Now if it please your lordship, we desire to call sir Robert Southwell, to prove what Mr. Praunce said before the council, and how particular he was; and did, to some of the Lords who were sent with him to Somerset-house, point out the places.

Sol. Gen. We call him to shew, that when Praunce was examined before the king, he was sent with some of the Lords, and sir Robert Southwell, to Somerset-House, where he pointed with his finger, and shewed the places where all was done; so we shall shew your lordship and the jury, how exact he was in every thing.

Then Sir Robert Southwell was sworn.

Recorder. Pray, Sir Robert, will you tell your knowledge?

Sir R. Southwell. My Lord I was upon the 24th of December waiting upon his majesty in council, and Mr. Praunce was sent for, to speak his knowledge concerning this murder, and he then gave a general account of things, which, because it did relate to that bench, and this corner, and that room, and that passage and that gallery, it was not understood by the board, and thereupon his majesty thought fit to appoint my lord duke of Monmouth, and the earl of Ossory, and Mr. Vice-Chamberlain to the queen, to go thither, and take the examination upon the place, and report it to the board: and I, being clerk of the council, though not in waiting at that time, and having taken notice of what Mr. Praunce had there deposed, I did wait upon those Lords, and took the examination upon the place. And what I did take upon the place, This was done here, and that there, I drew up into a report, and the report is signed by those two noble lords, and was read that afternoon at the board; and to that I refer myself.

Att. Gen. Pray, Sir Robert, Did he shew the particular places to those Lords.

Sir R. Southwell. Yes, he did. First, the bench whereon they were sitting when sir E. Godfrey was coming down; then the corner into which they drew him when they had strangled him; then the place where one Berry went to stay, which was at the stairs that lead to the upper court; then a little door at the end of the stables, which led up a pair of stairs, and at the head of the stairs a long dark entry, and at the top of those stairs, a door on the left hand, which being opened, shewed us eight steps, which lead up to the lodgings that were Mr. Godwin's; in which Hill was said to be inhabitant for seven years before. And as soon as we were gone two steps, there was a little closet or cabinet on the right hand, in which there was a bed, and there he shewed my Lords, This is the place where we handed him up first, and here we left him, said he, in the care of Hill for two nights.

Just. Wild. You were there, Sir Robert, upon the place, when he shewed them these things?

Sir R. Southwell. Yes, Sir, I was there.

Just. Wild. Was it answerable to what he had declared to the king and council?

Sir R. Southwell. Yes, it was answerable to all things he had said in the morning.

Just. Jones. And suitable to what he says now?

Sir R. Southwell. Yes, suitable to what he says now, but only now he says more than he said then. And as to what he says about the chambers of sir John Arundel, they could not be sir John's lodgings, for they were not capable of receiving a person of that quality.

Praunce. I said, I did believe they did belong to sir John Arundel.

L. C. J. They were lodgings, perhaps, that belonged to his servants, though not to him.

Att. Gen. Sir Robert, I desire to know, whether Mr. Praunce, when he shewed these places, and made these descriptions, did he do it with any hesitancy, or did he do it readily?

Sir Robert Southwell. Hitherto, my lord, he went directly, and positively, as if any body should walk to Westminster-hall door. But afterwards, when the lords did desire to know whither the body was carried, he said, it was into some room of the house by the garden; for this is an outer part of the house, which any body may do any thing in, without their knowledge that are within. And he undertook to lead them to the place as well as he could; and so away we went through the long dark entry that leads into the outer court of the great house; and crossing the quadrangle, he leads us to the Piazza, and down a pair of stairs, and so far, said he, I am sure I went; then, as soon as we were down stairs, there is a great square court, then he began to stagger, as if he did not know his way; but there was no way but to go on, however, and on he went, and coming cross the court, we came into several rooms; and going through them we came up stairs again, and so into several other rooms again. Sure, said he, we were here, but I can't tell, and he was in a distraction what room he saw the body in; but, said he, thus far I am certain I am right; which was according to the paper, and I refer myself to that.

Justice Wild. But you say, that what he had said to the lords in the council, was the same that he said when you were by upon the place? Sir Robert Southwell. Yes.

L. C. J. His doubtfulness of the room does assert and give credit to his testimony, and confirms it to any honest man in England. Here, saith he, I will not be positive, but having sworn the other things which he well remembered, positively, he is made the more credible for his doubtfulness of a thing which he does not remember, which a man that could swear any thing would not stick at.

Justice Jones. Besides, he was not there but by night, and all the light he had was a dark lantern.

Sol. Gen. Now, sir Robert, I would ask you one question, if you please. Do you remember that Hill was examined at the council about this matter?

Sir Robert Southwell. My lord, these are the notes that I took upon these men's examinations, if your lordship pleases they may be read.

Recorder. Sir Robert, we ask you but as to one particular thing, therefore if you please to look upon it, and refresh your memory, you may read it to yourself, and tell us only the substance. Which he did.

Sol. Gen. Now, sir, if you please, do you remember that Hill was there?

Sir Robert Southwell. Yes, I find he was examined.

Sol. Gen. Did not he deny there that he knew Kelly, but that he knew Girald?

Sir Robert Southwell. Yes, I do find it here set down, that he did deny he knew Kelly, but that he knew Girald.

Hill. I said I knew one Girald, but not that.

Recorder. But before the council he said he knew Girald, not one Girald.

L. C. J. This way of answering is like the examination that was taken lately amongst some of them. A person was asked when he saw such a priest? He denied that he had seen him in fourteen days. But then comes one and proves to his face, that he was with him in company all night, within a week and less. Ay, says he, that is true; but I said I had not seen him in fourteen days. And so they may take oaths to serve the king faithfully all the days of their lives, but in the nights they may murder him, and keep their oaths for all that.

Justice Dolben. I would know, whether the Girald you know be a priest or no?

Hill. He is not.

Justice Dolben. Then you do not know Girald the priest?—Hill. No I do not.

Recorder. Call Mr. Thomas Stringer. And he was sworn.

Recorder. Pray, Mr. Stringer, will you tell my Lord and the jury what it was that Mr. Berry said about any directions he had to keep all persons out of Somerset-house, about the 12th or 14th of October last?

T. Stringer. My Lord, Upon his examination before the Lords of the committee, Berry did say he had orders from the queen, or in the name of the queen, that he should suffer no strangers nor any persons of quality to come into Somerset-house.

Att. Gen. When was it he was to keep them out?

T. Stringer. The 12th, 13th and 14th of Oct. last.

Att. Gen. What, three days?

T. Stringer. Two or three days. And he said that the prince did come and he did refuse him, and sent him back again.

Recorder. Did he say he ever had any such directions before?

T. Stringer. No: He said he never before had any.

L. C. J. It was a very unlucky thing that he had it then.

Berry. The prince might have gone in if he would.

T. Stringer. You said you did refuse him, you had order to let none come in.

L. C. J. Had you any such order?

Berry. Yes my Lord, I had such an order from the queen's gentleman-usher.

L. C. J. Had you never had such before?

Berry. Yes, I have had before, since the queen came to Somerset-house.

L. C. J. Mr. Stringer swears you said you had not any before.

Berry. Yes I had.

L. C. J. Why did you deny it then?

Berry. I did not deny it; besides, there were several went in.

Recorder. We have proved, indeed, five or six did go in.

L. C. J. For how many days had you that order?—Berry. Two days.

L. C. J. Which two days?

Berry. The 11th and 12th, I think thereabouts.

Recorder. Did you say before the Lords, that you never had such orders before?

Berry. No, I did not.

L. C. J. Mr. Berry, When you were examined before the lords, did you not say you never had such orders before?

Berry. No, I did not say so, my lord, as I know of; for they did not examine me about that.

L. C. J. You said you would prove it under his own hand. Prove that.

Att. Gen. Mr. Stringer, did he write his name to his examination?

T. Stringer. Yes, he did to one examination. Att. Gen. Pray look upon that: is that his hand?

T. Stringer. This was read to him before he signed it, and then he did sign it.

Att. Gen. I would fain shew it to him, to see whether he would own it or no.

Berry. Yes, that is my hand.

Then the Clerk of the Crown read it.

Cl. of Cr. This is subscribed by Henry Berry. "The Information of Henry Berry, porter at the gate of Somerset-house; taken before the right hon. the Marquis of Winchester: This deponent saith, that about the 12th, 13th and 14th of October last, he had order to tell all persons of quality, that the queen was private, and that they were not to come in: and this deponent saith, the queen continued so private for two days."

L. C. J. Where is that part of the examination wherein he said, he never had any such order before?

T. Stringer. He did say so, but it is not in that that hath his hand to it.

Justice Wild. Pray, my lord, observe this is a kind of reflecting evidence, and I would have no more made of it than the thing will bear.

L. C. J. They only bring it, and make use of it against Berry as a pretence of his.

Justice Wild. But it is a very reflecting evidence.

Att. Gen. Surely there is no body here that offers it as such: We use it only to this purpose, to shew that Berry, who was a party to this murder, did use all the means that he could to keep it private; and endeavoured to prevent strangers coming in that night to discover it; and therefore pretended these orders.—If he had any such orders, I suppose he will prove them, we do not say he had them; but it is a great evidence, when he pretended to such privacy, that he and his fellows had something to do that was not fit to be known by every body.

Recorder. He may make use of any body's name, and pretend what he will; but I suppose he will prove it from the gentleman-usher if it be true.

Att. Gen. We have one witness more to call, my lord, and that is one Farr. Call Stephen Farr. Which was done, and he sworn.

Att. Gen. He is a neighbour to Berry, and will give your lordship an account what applications have been made to him, to tamper with him for money, to keep away, and not give evidence in this cause. Pray, sir, are you Mr. Berry's neighbour?

Farr. Yes, Sir, I am.

Att. Gen. Pray then tell what you know.

Farr. I know him very well, his wife hath been with me last week, and asked me if I knew what time he was with me on Wednesday the 16th of October. I desired time to recollect myself: and she called four or five times after, and I did recollect my memory and told her, that I was not with him all that Wednesday.

L. C. J. Why, this was reasonable, and fair enough to do.

Att. Gen. It was so, my lord; but pray had you no money offered to you?

Farr. No, Sir, none at all; and I told her I could not remember that I was with him that day.

Berry. But you may remember it very well when I came from the queen I came to you.

Farr. My Lord, I was out of town that Wednesday, from two o'clock in the afternoon till nine at night.

L. C. J. Well, well, this is nothing: the woman was willing, if she could, to have counterproved the evidence, and what she did was fair; she offered no money, nor did it in an indirect way.

Att. Gen. My lord, we have now done with our evidence for the king, and leave it till we hear what they say.

L. C. J. What do you say for yourselves? you shall have all the free liberty you will desire.

Hill. In the first place, I take God to be my witness, that I am wholly innocent, as to the matter that is charged upon me: and as to what is said that I dogged sir E. Godfrey, I can prove that I went into my lodging at eight o'clock, and did not stir out.

L. C. J. Come, call your witnesses.

Hill. Mary Tilden, Catharine Lee, Mrs. Broadstreet, and Daniel Gray.

L. C. J. Let them come in there.

Then Mary Tilden was first examined.

Att. Gen. This is Dr. Godwin's niece, and his housekeeper.

L. C. J. Well what do you ask her?

Hill. I desire to know what you can say about my being in my lodging, and not going out.

Mary Tilden. He hath lived in our family 7 or 8 years.

L. C. J. Your family, what is your family?

Mary Tilden. With my uncle.

L. C. J. Who is your uncle?

Mary Tilden. Dr. Godwin: we left him in the house always, when we were absent from it; he was always a trusty servant, never kept ill hours, always came home by eight o'clock at night.

Justice Dolben. Always! for how long?

Mary Tilden. Ever since we came over last into England.

Justice Dolben. When was that?

Mary Tilden. In April last.

L. C. J. Were you there that night sir E. Godfrey was killed?—Mary Tilden. I was.

L. C. J. What night was that?

Mary Tilden. I do not know, my lord, I heard of it in the town.

L. C. J. When did you first hear of it?

Mary Tilden. The Thursday that he was found.

J. C. J. Did you not hear of it on the Wednesday?

Mary Tilden. Yes I did.

L. C. J. Who could tell you the Wednesday before?

Mary Tilden. Why, my lord, in the town it was said he was missing from Saturday, and a Thursday he was found.

L. C. J. What can you say concerning Hill, that he was not out after eight o'clock that night?

Mary Tilden. He was a very good servant to my uncle, and never kept ill hours, but always came in by eight o'clock, or before.

Justice Dolben. Were you not out yourself that night?

Mary Tilden. No not I, never out after that hour.

L. C. J. Pray how can you give such an account of Mr. Hill, as if he was always in your company?

Mary Tilden. He came in to wait at table, and did not stir out afterwards.

L. C. J. Pray, what religion are you of? are you a papist?

Mary Tilden. I know not whether I came here to make a profession of my faith.

L. C. J. Are you a Roman Catholic?

Mary Tilden. Yes.

L. C. J. Have you a dispensation to eat suppers on Saturday nights?

Recorder. I hope you did not keep him company, after supper, all night.

Mary Tilden. No, I did not, but he came in to wait at table at supper.

L. C. J. I thought you had kept fasting on Saturday nights.

Mary Tilden. No, my lord, not on Saturday nights.

Justice Jones. How many dishes of meat had you to supper?

Mary Tilden. We had no meat, though we did not fast.

L. C. J. Can you speak positively as to this night, the Saturday that he was killed?

Mary Tilden. He was at home that night.

L. C. J. And where was he the Sunday?

Mary Tilden. He was at home.

L. C. J. And you are sure he was at home every night?

Mary Tilden. Yes, while we were in town.

L. C. J. Where was you all that Wednesday night you speak of?

Mary Tilden. I was at home in my lodging.

Justice Wild. How it is possible for you to say, that Hill, who was not your constant companion, did not go out afterwards?

Mary Tilden. No, he was not my constant companion.

Justice Wild. How then can you charge your memory that he was at home?

L. C. J. Come, you are to speak truth, though you are not upon your oath. Can you charge your memory to say that he came in constantly at eight o'clock at night?

Mary Tilden. Yes, I can, because I saw him come in constantly; and when he came in, I always sent my maid to bar the door.

L. C. J. Maid, can you say he was always at home at night?

Mary Tilden. I can say he never was abroad after eight at night.

Recorder. Why, you did not watch him till he went to bed, did you?

Mary Tilden. We were always up till eleven o'clock at night.

Att. Gen. Was he in your company all that while?

Mary Tilden. I beg your pardon: if your lordship saw the lodgings you would say it were impossible for any to go in or out, but that they must know it within. We were constant in our hours of going to supper; our doors were never opened after he came in to wait at supper.

L. C. J. You may say anything to a heretic, for a papist.

Justice Dolben. This is a mighty improbable business.

Justice Wild. Where was he a Wednesday night?—Mary Tilden. At home.

L. C. J. They have a general answer for all questions.

Justice Jones. Who kept the key of your lodgings?

Mary Tilden. The maid.

Justice Jones. Hath Hill never kept the key?

Mary Tilden. No, my lord, the maid.

Justice Jones. How do you know but that the maid might let him out?

Praunce. My lord, Mrs. Broadstreet said at first there was but one key; but before the duke of Monmouth she said there were six or seven keys.

L. C. J. Look you what tricks you put upon us to blind us: you come and tell us that he was every night at home by eight o'clock, and did not stir out, for there was but one lock, and the maid kept the key; and yet there were three or four keys to it.

Mary Tilden. There was but one key to that which kept the door fast.

L. C. J. Praunce, how many keys were there?

Praunce. She confessed there were four or five.

Justice Wild. What time was it that you carried him out of Somerset-House on Wednesday night?

Praunce. It was about ten or eleven. Hill went to fetch the horse.

Mary Tilden. We had never been out of our lodgings after eight o'clock, since we came to town.

Justice Jones. When were you out of town?

Mary Tilden. In October.

Justice Dolben. Nay, how mistress, you have spoiled all; for in October this business was done.

Justice Jones. You have undone the man, instead of saving him.

Mary Tilden. Why, my lord, I only mistook the month.

L. C. J. You woman [speaking to Mrs. Broadstreet], what month was it you were out of town?

Broadstreet. In September.

L. C. J. It is apparent you consider not what you say, or you come hither to say any thing will serve the turn.

Mary Tilden. No, I do not, for I was out of town in September, came to town the latter end of September.

L. C. J. You must remember what you said, that you came to England in April last, and from that time he was always within at eight o'clock at night.

Mary Tilden. Except that time we were out of town, which was in September, the summer-time. And it is impossible but if the body was in the house, as Praunce said it was, but I must see him, or some of us must. I used to go every day into that little room for something or other, and I must needs see him if he were there.

L. C. J. You told me just now you were not upon confession; and I tell you now so, you are not.

Then Mrs. Broadstreet was examined.

Justice Jones. Well, woman, what say you?

Broadstreet. We came to town upon a Monday, Michaelmas day was the Sunday following; and from that time neither he nor the maid used to be abroad after eight o'clock: we kept very good hours, and he always waited at supper, and never went abroad after he came in to wait at supper: and the lodging was so little, that nothing could be brought in but they must know that were within.

L. C. J. This is a lower room than the chamber, is it not?

Praunce. It is even with the dining-room, my lord.

L. C. J. What say you, sir Robert Southwell?

Sir R. Southwell. My lord, it is an extraordinary little place; as soon as you get up eight steps, there is a little square entry, and there is this room on the one hand, and the dining-room on the other. I think, there is a pair of stairs to go down at one corner of the entry, as I think, but the body was laid in a little square room at the head of the steps.

L. C. J. And must you go into the room to go to the dining-room?

Broadstreet. No, it is a distinct room; but the key was always in the door, and every day somebody went into it for something or another.

L. C. J. Will you undertake to say it was always in the door?

Broadstreet. Yes, it constantly was.

Justice Wild. For my own part, I will not judge you: but that his body should be carried there about nine o'clock at night a Saturday night, and remain there until Monday night, it is very suspicious, that if you were in the house, as you say you were, and used to go into that room every day, you must either hear it brought in, or see it.

Broadstreet. But we did neither, my lord.

Justice Dolben. It is well you are not indicted.

Broadstreet. Mr. Praunce, you know all these things to be false, Mr. Praunce.

Praunce. I lay nothing to your charge; but you said before the duke of Monmouth, that Hill was gone from his lodgings before that time.

L. C. J. What say you, sir Robert Southwell?

Sir R. Southwell. There arose a little quarrel between them, about the time that Mr. Hill did leave those lodgings. Praunce said it was a fortnight after; Hill said, when he was upon his examination, that the same Saturday night that sir E. Godfrey was missing, he was treating with his landlord, and from that time, to the time he went to his new house, it was about a week or a fortnight.

L. C. J. But he did pretend he was gone before?

Broadstreet. No, my lord, I did not.

L. C. J. Two witnesses upon oath swear it, and you said it yourself, and gave it under your hand.

Broadstreet. My lord?—

L. C. J. Nay, you will not bear, but you will talk; you say one thing now, and you set another under your hand.

Att. Gen. Have you not a brother that is in the Proclamation, one Broadstreet a priest?

Broadstreet. I have a brother, whose name is Broadstreet.

Att. Gen. Is he not a priest, and in the Proclamation?

Broadstreet. I hope I must not impeach my brother here. I said upon my oath, he came to town on Monday, and Michaelmas day was the Sunday following, and Lawrence Hill went away a fortnight after.

Sir R. Southwell. She swore then, two or three days after Michaelmas day.

L. C. J. You must know we can understand you through all your arts. It was not concenient for you at that time to say, that Mr. Hill went away about a fortnight after Michaelmas, for then the thing that was charged to be done, part of it in your house, would have been within the fortnight, for it was the 12th of October, but then you said only two or three days.

Sir R. Southwell. She did say, my lord, that about Michaelmas two or three or four days after he went away.

Broadstreet. I beg your pardon, I only said, I could not tell the time exactly.

L. C. J. Well, have you any more to say?

Mary Tilden. There was never a day but I went into that room for something or other, and if any body came to see me, there was so little space that the footmen were always forced to be in that room.

Justice Dolben. Were you there upon Sunday?

Mary Tilden. Yes, my lord, I was.

Justice Dolben. Well, I will say no more; call another witness.

Hill. Catharine Lee.

L. C. J. What can you say, maid?

Lee. My lord, I did never miss him out of the house at those hours.

L. C. J. May be you did not look for him.

Lee. I did go down every night to the door, to see if it were locked, and I went into the parlour to see that things were safe there.

L. C. J. You are a Roman Catholic, are you not?

Lee. Yes, I am.

Justice Dolben. Might not he go out of the house, and you never the wiser?

Lee. Yes, for I did not watch him continually.

Capt. Richardson. All that she says may be true by the place. The servants keep down a pair of stairs in the kitchen, and any one may come in, or go out, having so many keys, and they not know it that are below.

Lee. I went into the chamber every morning, as I went to market.

Justice Wild. Have a care what you say, and mind the question I ask you: were you there on the Sunday, in that room where they say sir E. Godfrey's body was laid?

Lee. I cannot say, that I was in that room, but I called in at the door every day, and I was the last up every night.

Justice Wild. I will say that for thee, thou hast spoke with more care than any of them all.

Then Daniel Gray was examined.

L. C. J. What can you say? What questions do you ask him?

Hill. I desire him to speak what he can say, where I was those five days that sir E. Godfrey was missing.

Gray. I kept my brother Hill company, from the 8th of October, till he took his house, which was about the 22nd or 23rd.

L. C. J. What time did you use to go to bed?

Gray. About 9 or 10 o'clock at night.

L. C. J. What time did he go?
Gray. When I did, but I did not see him go to bed.

L. C. J. Where did you lie?

Gray. At my own house.

L. C. J. And you went home about 8 or 9 at night to go to bed?

Gray. Yes, I did.

Just. Jones. You say he took his house the 8th of October, when did he go thither?

Gray. Yes, he took his house the 8th of October, but he did not go thither till the one or two and twentieth.

Just. Dolben. But you cannot tell what he did at night?

Gray. No, not I.

Just. Dolben. But you were in his company till 8 or 9 o'clock at night?

Gray. Yes, my lord, I was.

L. C. J. How far did you live off of him?

Gray. About a bow's shoot.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Hill, he does no service at all, for he says he left you about 8 or 9 o'clock at night, and he does not know what you did afterwards. Have you any more?

Hill. Robert How.

L. C. J. Come, what say you?

How. My lord, I met with Mr. Hill the 5th of October, he asked me whither I was going? I told him, home. I wish, said he, you would go a little back with me; I am about taking of an house, and I would have you view the repairs; accordingly we did go, and treated in the house about an agreement; for, said he, I will not agree with you (to the landlord) till we know what must be repaired. On Tuesday morning we met again, about 8 o'clock.

L. C. J. What day of the month was that?

How. The 8th. And a Wednesday about noon we began to work for him, to repair his house, and we wrought that week every day, and for 12 days and an half in all, and he was every day with us, looking after coals, or beer, or something. On Saturday the 12th of October, we dined together, and parted with him about 1 or 2 o'clock, and about 2 o'clock I went back again to my work, and he said he was going towards Covent-Garden in St. James's, but he came back again, and I was gone first; I asked my man whether he was gone, or no; he said, he was there, but did not stay.

L. C. J. What time was that?

How. A little before night.

L. C. J. What hour did your man say that he was there?

How. About an hour before they left work.

L. C. J. What time was that?

How. About four o'clock, I think it was.

L. C. J. Can you say where he was that night?

How. No, I cannot.

L. C. J. What religion are you of, are you not a protestant?

How. Yes, my lord, I think so.

Recorder. My lord asks you, are you a protestant?

How. I was never bred up in the protestant religion.

Praunce. He is a catholic, my lord, he was the queen's carpenter.

Just. Dolben. Nay, now you spoil all; you must do penance for this; what! deny your church?

Hill. What time was it on Saturday morning I was with you?

How. About nine o'clock.

L. C. J. How long did he stay?

How. From nine to two.

L. C. J. Are you sure it was nine?

How. No man can swear punctually to an hour.

L. C. J. What think you of ten?

How. It was thereabouts.

Recorder. If I am rightly informed by the clerks, he is outlawed for recusancy.

L. C. J. Is he so? Pray let us know that.

Harcourt. (One of the clerks of the Crown-Office.) My lord, I have made out several writs against him, for several years together, and could never get any of them returned.

Hill. He tells you, that I was with him from nine o'clock on Saturday morning, till one.

Just. Jones. But that is but as true as he is a protestant, and how true that is, you know.

Hill. Here is another witness; Mr. Cutler.

Tho. Cutler. Upon the 12th of October, Lawrence Hill did come into my house, about four or five o'clock in the evening, and he staid there till between seven or eight, and then his wife came for him and said some gentlewoman was ready for her supper, and so he went home; and I saw him no more, till the day after he was taken.

L. C. J. Look you here, he speaks only about seven or eight o'clock. Well, have you any thing more to say?

Hill. There is one Richard Laxinby.

Laxinby. My lord, I was with him on Saturday the 12th of October, at the door, about twelve o'clock.

L. C. J. And you dined with him and How?

Laxinby. Yes, Sir.

L. C. J. But you did not see him afterwards?

Laxinby. Yes, I did see him on Wednesday night, from five to seven at night.

L. C. J. What time was he carried out of Somerset-House?

Att. Gen. About eleven or twelve o'clock at night.

Laxinby. That is the last time I was with him.

L. C. J. Well, have you any more?

Hill. Here is one Mr. Archbold, my lord.

Archbold. My lord, I had occasion for a tailor, and I came to this man's house to seek for one Mr. Gray, that had formerly wrought for me.

L. C. J. When was that?

Archbold. That was on Monday night. And he having formerly wrought for me, I found him at this man's house; so Mr. Gray asked me, what news? I told him, very good news; for Praunce was taken for the murder of sir E.

Godfrey. Says Hill, I am glad of that; I wish they were all taken. I came the next day after, and they told me he was taken out of his bed, for the murder of sir E. Godfrey.

L. C. J. Was it that very night that you came, that he was taken?

Archbold. Yes, it was.

L. C. J. You said he spoke of it before you at 7 o'clock, and you left him about 9, and he was taken that night; what then?

Hill. Why, then I had time enough to make my escape, if I had thought myself Guilty.

L. C. J. As no doubt you would, if you had thought they would have been so nimble with you.

Archbold. He knew it the day before.

L. C. J. Well, have you any more to say?

Mrs. Hill. There is Mr. Ravenscroft, my lord.

L. C. J. What, that Ravenscroft that was sent away?

Mrs. Hill. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Then the marshal must send for him, if he be a witness for the prisoner. In the mean time, what can you say for yourself, Mr. Green?

Green. My lord, I would call my landlord and his wife.

L. C. J. What are their names?

Green. James Warrior, and his wife.

L. C. J. Call in Green's wife, and all her witnesses.

[Then Mrs. Hill, the Prisoner's wife, offered a Paper to the Court containing Observations upon the Indictment, which she desired them to read; but it was refused, and she bid to give it her husband.]

Then James Warrior was examined.

L. C. J. What say you to your landlord?

Green. I ask him no questions at all, but desire him to tell what he knows.

Warrior. I will say, that the 19th of Oct., he was at my house, half an hour after seven, and he was not out of my house till after ten.

L. C. J. How can you remember that day? What day of the week was it?

Warrior. It was a Saturday.

L. C. J. How do you remember it was so?

Warrior. I have recollected my memory.

L. C. J. By what?

Warrior. By my work, and every thing exactly.

L. C. J. When did you begin to recollect yourself?—Warrior. A pretty while ago.

L. C. J. How long after sir E. Godfrey was murdered?—Warrior. A month after.

L. C. J. What made you recollect yourself a month after?

Warrior. Because he was in prison in the Gate-house.

L. C. J. When was he taken up?

Warrior. He was taken up in Somerset-House, and not in my house.

L. C. J. But when did you recollect yourself?

Warrior. When he was in prison.

L. C. J. But I pray remember the time when you did recollect yourself, and the occasion that made you recollect yourself when he was taken up.

Warrior. I remember it very well, for he had been in my house but 14 days, before he was taken up.

Sir Thomas Stringer. He was not taken up for the murder of sir E. Godfrey, till the 24th of December.

Justice Wild. Pray, did you never think of this till he was in prison?

Warrior. It was when he was taken up.

L. C. J. But, pray, when you came to recollect yourself, how did you come to do it?

Warrior. I recollected it by my work.

L. C. J. But what gave you occasion to recollect yourself since he was in gaol?

Sir Tho. Stringer. My lord, he was put into gaol for refusing to take the oaths; but he was not at all charged with the death of sir E. Godfrey at that time.

L. C. J. When was he put in for the death of sir Edmundsbury?

Sir Tho. Stringer. The 24th of December.

L. C. J. Then there is all the remaining part of October, all November, and the former part of December, was past, how could you recollect yourself of the particular day?

Warrior. I called it to my mind by my work.

Captain Richardson. My lord, I will rectify this mistake: Since their arraignment, I went to them to know what witnesses they had, and Green told me of his landlord and landlady; I then asked them, if they could say any thing as to this particular day? and they said they could not do him any good at all.

Warrior. I did not then call it to memory.

L. C. J. When did you call it to memory?

Warrior. I did say I could not do it then presently, as I have done since, in five or six days.

L. C. J. How could you recollect it then?

Warrior. By the time he came into my house, which was a week before, and by the work that was done.

L. C. J. What could the work do as to this? Can you tell by that any thing that is done at any time? Where were you the 9th of Nov. last?

Warrior. Truly, I can't tell.

L. C. J. Why, how came you then to recollect what you did the 12th of October, when you did not know where you were the 9th of Nov.?

Warrior. I can tell a great many tokens, he was but 14 or 15 days in our house.

L. C. J. What did he do the 12th of October, that you remember so particularly that day?

Warrior. Sir, I remember other days besides that; but I say, I never knew the man out after nine o'clock, is my life.

L. C. J. Have you any body else? for this man, I can't tell what to make on't.

Green. Here is the man's wife to give evidence.

L. C. J. First consider what you say.

Mrs. Warrior. To tell you the truth, I thought the man was so clear of this fact, that I never troubled my head with it; but when captain Richardson came to my house, I told him, that he never was in our house by day-time, except being cushion-layer in the chapel, he used to come at half an hour after eleven, and many times he did desire me, because we were Protestants, to put in a little flesh meat with ours; sometimes he would sit down and eat his meat in the kitchen, and his wife with him; and his wife would say to him, It is a troublesome time, pray see that you come home betimes. I did not at all remember the day of the month at the first, nor the action; but my husband and I have since remembered. We were desired by them once to eat a fowl with them; and my husband did command me the Sunday after to invite them to dinner with us, and I went in the morning very early, I think, and bought a dozen of pigeons, and put them in a pye, and we had a loin of pork roasted; and when he was gone to the chapel on Saturday in the afternoon, his wife came to me, and said, my husband is not well, and when he comes home will ask for something of broth; and away she went to market, to buy something to make broth of. While she was at market, her husband came home, and asked where his wife was? Why, Mr. Green, said I, she is gone to market: what an old fool, said he, is this, to go out so late, such a night as this is! But said he, again I will go to the coffee-house, and drink a dish of coffee, and pray tell my wife so. In the mean time she returned, and by that time she had been above a little while, he came in again. And Mr. Green being there, my husband came in, and called to me, pr'ythee, sweetheart, what hast thou got for my supper? Pr'ythee, said I, sweetheart, thou art always calling for thy victuals when thou comest in. Then Mr. Green goes to the stairs, and calls to his wife, and bids her bring him down some victuals, and she brings down the bread and cheese, and he stayed there till it was nine o'clock; and then saith Mr. Green to his wife, Let us go up, for there is a fire.

L. C. J. What day was this, all this while?

Mrs. Warriar. Why, it was the Saturday fortnight after Michaelmas day.

L. C. J. Why might it not be that day three weeks?

Mrs. Warriar. It was that day he was missing.

Att. Gen. Why, there was no alarm taken of it a Sunday.

L. C. J. When did you begin to recollect what day it was, that they said he was missing?

Mrs. Warriar. On Friday morning our milkman came and told us that one Mr. Godfrey was found murdered; now I knew one of the Exchange of that name, and thought it might be he. And when we went up with him to his chamber, we sat there till the Tattoo beat.

L. C. J. All the thing is, how do you know it was this Saturday?

Mrs. Warriar. It was the Saturday fortnight after Michaelmas day.

Justice Dolben. Are you sure it was the Saturday fortnight after Michaelmas day?

Mrs. Warriar. Yes, we did look upon the almanack, and reckon it so.

Justice Dolben. Then that was the 19th of October.

L. C. J. Why, you told him, you could do him no good, and indeed you do not.

Justice Jones. You and your wife speak of the same time, do not you?

Warriar. Yes.

L. C. J. Have you any more, Green?

Capt. Richardson. There is the maid, let her come in.

L. C. J. What say you, maid?

Maid. I can say, that he came in the Saturday fortnight after quarter-day, pretty betimes.

L. C. J. Can you speak of any other time besides that Saturday fortnight?

Maid. I can tell he came in every night before nine o'clock.

Green. I can take my oath, I was never out of my lodging after nine o'clock.

Hill. My lord, here is Mr. Ravenscroft now.

L. C. J. Mr. Ravenscroft, what can you say?

Mr. Ravenscroft. What I can say, my lord, is this: this Lawrence Hill, I have known him 13 or 14 years, and he served my elder brother so long, very faithfully. Afterwards he lived with Dr. Godwin, towards the latter end of the two last years, and he married my mother's maid.

L. C. J. What religion are you of?

Mr. Ravenscroft. My father and mother were Protestants.

L. C. J. But you are a Papist, are you not?

Mr. Ravenscroft. I have not said I am a Papist, yet.

Justice Dolben. In the mean time, I say you are one.

Mr. Ravenscroft. Do you so? Then pray go to Southwark and see.

Att. Gen. My lord, I think he hath taken the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy.

L. C. J. Well, pray, Sir, go on with your story.

Mr. Ravenscroft. If it please you, upon a Saturday, a little before Christmas, there was somebody taken, I think it was one Mr. Praunce, for I never saw the man, neither do I know him at all; and it was reported that he was taken upon the death of sir E. Godfrey, and I was glad to hear it. My house was in the Savoy, and my father's house is in Holborn; and I used often to go and see my father, and coming home again, I went to see the maid at her new house, she had not been long there, and she was standing at the door of the house. I asked her what news? Says she, Here hath been a man here that tells us, that Praunce hath discovered several of the murderers of sir E. Godfrey; and they talk up and down strangely of it, and ask me whether my husband be acquainted with him? Then said I to her, Is he? She answered me, Very well, they have been often together; and so she told me the people did mutter, and talk of her husband. But, said I, what says your husband to it? Says she, He defies France and all his works. Said I, Where is your husband? Said she, He is within. I was very glad to hear it; for, said I, he living in Somerset-House, and being acquainted with France, I am glad to hear that your husband can be so courageous; so I went away, and came again thither the next morning, and found he was taken the night before. All that I say then, is, that it was a good evidence of his innocency, that when he had notice of it, he did not fly.

L. C. J. So then, your discourse was after Archbold had been there?

Ravenscroft. Archbold was there before me, and had spoken this in their company. I spake with her that night, and the next morning too; and all that I say is, if flight be a sign of guilt, as no doubt it is, Adam, ubi es? and courageousness is a sign of innocency, then this man is innocent.

L. C. J. But you say, she told you they were acquainted?

Ravenscroft. My lord, I have one thing more to say. Upon the occasion of these things, this woman hath been often with me, and hath desired to know of me what defence she should make, for I saw Hill's wife and Berry's wife were all simple people, without defence for themselves, and they did desire that I would examine and see some of the witnesses, and see how it was, and she had gotten me some papers, and I conferred them together, there are witnesses that will attest the copy.

Att. Gen. What is all this to the purpose? Only this gentleman hath a mind to shew that he can speak Latin.

Ravenscroft. I thank God I can speak Latin as well as any man in the Court.

L. C. J. Well, all this is nothing.

Ravenscroft. I declare it myself, if this man were guilty, rather than I would speak for him, if there wanted a hangman, I would do it myself.

L. C. J. Well, Berry, what have you to say?

Berry. I desire Nicholas Trollop, and Nicholas Wright, and Gabriel Haaket, and Elizabeth Wilks, and corporal Collet may be called.

Corporal William Collet first examined.

Berry. Did not you place a centinel on Wednesday night?

Collet. What Wednesday do you speak of, Sir?

Berry. That night the queen went from Somerset-House to White-hall.

Collet. Yes, this Nicholas Trollop I placed there first, the 16th of October.

L. C. J. How do you remember that?

Collet. Because I have been called to an account before, and have given good reasons for it. Our company was at Somerset-house when the king came from New-Market, and the queen went to White-hall. Afterwards we were bid to fetch our centinels off about three or four of the clock in the afternoon.

L. C. J. Did you leave any soldiers there?

Collet. No, we did not, all our company went to Whitehall.

Justice Dolben. Are you sure there were no soldiers that night there?

Collet. Yes, we were commanded with a party to go thither again that night.

L. C. J. What did you do then?

Collet. I placed the centinels by the Porter's order.

L. C. J. Who was that, Berry?

Collet. No, it was one that used to go about, and give orders where we should set them.

L. C. J. How did you place them?

Collet. This man I placed from seven to ten, then Nicholas Wright relieved him at ten, and stayed till one.

L. C. J. At what place?

Collet. To the Strand-ward.

Justice Wild. That was the gate they carried him out at.

L. C. J. Do you bear; whereabouts did you set the centinels? Within the gate?

Collet. Yes, within the wicket.

L. C. J. That way he was carried out?

Nich. Wright. There was no Sedan came out in my time.

Trollop. There was one came in, in my time, while I stand there.

L. C. J. Was it an empty Sedan?

Trollop. I suppose it was, but we had no order to keep any out.

Justice Wild. But you might know whether it was an empty sedan or no, by the going of it through the wicket.

Collet. There is an empty sedan that stands there every night.

Trollop. It was set down within the gate.

Justice Jones. If any sedan had gone out, you would not have staid them, would you?

Collet. No, my lord, we had no order to stop any.

Justice Dolben. How can you then be positive that no one did go out?

Trollop. None did go out again in my time.

Justice Dolben. Could not the porter open the gate, as well as you?

Collet. Yes, my lord, he could, but I should have seen him then: He did not open it in my time.

Justice Wild. Let me ask you but one question; did not you go to drink nor tippie all that time?

Trollop. No, nor walk a pike's length off the place of centry.

Justice Wild. Has not Berry an house there hard by?

Trollop. Yes, but I did not drink one drop.

Justice Dolben. How can you remember to particularly, so long ago?

Trollop. Why, I was twice before the committee.

Justice Dolben. But how long was it ago that you were questioned about this thing, after this night?

Trollop. A matter of a month or six weeks.

Collet. For we were examined before France was taken up.

L. C. J. You, Trollop, can you say whether it was the sedan that used to be within?

Trollop. No, I cannot, but it was brought in in my time, and did not go out again.

Then Gabriel Hasket was examined.

Berry. You stood there, Sir, from one to four.

Hasket. Yes, after the clock struck one, I was put centinel, and stood till four.

L. C. J. What night?

Hasket. That night the king came from New-Market, and the queen went from Somerset-House.

L. C. J. What day of the month was that?

Hasket. The 16th.

L. C. J. What day of the week?

Hasket. Wednesday.

L. C. J. Did you not drink at Berry's then?

Hasket. No, I did not.

L. C. J. Did you see Berry then?

Hasket. No, I did not.

L. C. J. He was gone before you came?

Berry. I was fast enough a-bed at that time.

L. C. J. Well, what say you more?

Berry. Here is my maid, Elizabeth Minshaw, to give her evidence where I was that night the queen went from Somerset-House.

Just. Jones. What can you say?

Minshaw. May it please you, my lord, my master was within doors and about the gate, when the queen went away.

L. C. J. Who is your master?

Minshaw. Mr. Berry. He was about the gates all the forenoon.

L. C. J. When was that?

Minshaw. The 16th of October, Wednesday. And as soon as the queen was gone, my master went out to bowls; and when he came home again, he said he had been at bowls.

L. C. J. What time did he come home?

Minshaw. It was dusky, and he was not absent all night an hour, till he went to bed.

Just. Wild. When did he go to bed?

Minshaw. My lord, I suppose he went to bed about 12 o'clock.

Just. Wild. They do not charge him with any thing, but what was done about the gate.

Just. Dolben. What time did you go to bed that night?

Minshaw. Why, I went to bed about 12 o'clock.

Just. Dolben. And you saw him no more that night?

Minshaw. No, my lord, but he must go through my room to go to bed at night, and therefore I suppose he was a-bed.

Mrs. Hill. I desire Mr. Praunce may swear why he did deny all this?

L. C. J. Stand up, Mr. Praunce; that gentleman does desire to know, what induced you to deny what you had said.

Praunce. It was because of my trade, my lord; and for fear of losing my employment from the queen, and the catholics, which was the most of my business, and because I had not my pardon.

VOL. VII.

Mrs. Hill, I desire he may swear whether he were not tortured?

Just. Dolben. Answer her; were you tortured to make this confession?

Praunce. No, my lord, captain Richardson hath used me as civilly as any man in England; all that time that I have been there, I have wanted for nothing.

L. C. J. See what he says; that he did not make this confession by any fortune; but he made his recantation through fear, and the thoughts of death, because he had no pardon; and fear that he might live in want, by the loss of the trade, prevailed with him to deny what he had confessed.

Mrs. Hill. It was reported about town, that he was tortured.

Just. Jones. No, it was no such thing; it was only the tortures of his conscience, for being an actor in so great a sin.

Mrs. Hill. There are several about the court, that heard him cry out: And he knows all these things to be as false as God is true; and you will see it declared hereafter, when it is too late.

L. C. J. Do you think he would swear three men out of their lives for nothing?

Mrs. Hill. I desire he may be sworn to that particular thing.

Justice Jones. He is upon his oath already, and swears all this upon his oath.

Mrs. Hill. Well, I am dissatisfied; my witnesses were not rightly examined, they were modest, and the Court laughed at them.

Berry. The centinels that were at the gate all night, let nothing out.

L. C. J. Why, you could open the gate yourself.

Berry. He says, he could have seen if the gate had been open, and that, as he saw, the gates were never opened.

Justice Dolben. Well, the Jury have heard all, and will consider of it.

Mrs. Hill. Here is another witness, my lord, Mr. Chevins.

L. C. J. Well, sir, What say you?

Chevins. I have nothing to say, but that I heard Mr. Praunce deny all.

L. C. J. Why, he does not deny that now. Well, have you any more?

Chevins. We have no more.

Attorney General. My lord, I must crave leave to speak a word or two; and the Evidence having been so very long, I shall be exceeding short. I intended when I began to open the evidence) to have made some observations after the evidence ended; to shew how each part of it did agree, and how the main was strengthened by concurrent circumstances. But, in truth, the king's evidence did fall out much better than I could expect, and the defence of the prisoners much weaker than I could foresee. So that, I think, the proof against the prisoners is so strong, and so little hath been alledged by them in their defence, that it would be but loss of time to do what I at first intended. Only I will observe, That Mr. Bedlow doth agree with Mr. Praunce as far forth as is possible; that is, in those parts of the fact, of which he pretends to have any knowledge. Yet had they never any communication one with another, as both have sworn. And your lordship will observe in how many particulars they do agree; namely, as to the dark-lantern, as to the covering of the body in the room; how they intended to carry the body out in a sedan, and the rest. So that if they had laid their heads together to contrive a story they could hardly have agreed in so many circumstances; and yet this they do, without discoursing with each other before-hand.

My lord I must likewise observe to you, that the servants of the Plow-alehouse concur as to meetings there: The maid agrees as to the prisoners coming to sir E. Godfrey's house, and to the time, viz. that Saturday morning; nay, to the very hours of nine or ten o'clock; that the constable's relation of the posture in which the body was found in the field, doth perfectly agree with the account that the murderers gave thereof to Mr. Praunce the next morning. The chirurgeons do agree with Mr. Praunce, as to the manner of sir E. Godfrey's being killed, the strangling, the bruising of his stomach, the twisting of his neck. And the witnesses from Bow make it out, that Dethick was sent for; that they had a dinner there. The boy proves that he overheard them reading something about sir E. Godfrey, and that they were very merry; and that for his listening he was threatened to be kicked down stairs.

So that, I think, there never was an evidence that was better fortified with circumstances than this: My lord, I shall be bold to say, here is certainly as much evidence as the matter is capable of. It is not to be expected, that they should call witnesses to be by, when they do such foul facts; so that none can swear directly the very fact, but such a one as was an actor in it. All circumstances relating to the fact, both before and after, are made out by concurrent testimony. And, my lord, I must observe, that this was a murder committed through zeal to a false religion, and that religion was a bond of secrecy. We all know, his majesty hath been graciously pleased, by his Proclamation, to propose a pardon, and a reward to the discoverers. And yet almost without effect: their zeal to their false religion was a greater obstacle, than the Proclamation was an incitement to the discovery. And I do believe, if Mr. Praunce had not had some inclination to change his religion, you had still been without so clear a discovery of this work of darkness, as now you have. I shall say no more, but conclude to the jury with that saying, that I remember in the Book of Judges (in the case of a murder too, though of another nature), Judges xix. 30. 'The people said there was no such deed done, nor seen, from the day that the children of Israel came out of Egypt.' And I may say there was never such a barbarous murder committed in England since the people of England were free from the yoke of the pope's tyranny; and, as it is said there, so say I now, 'Consider of it, take advice, and speak your minds.'

Mr. Solicitor General. My Lord, I would only make one observation to your lordship, which is this: I do not find they do in the least pretend to tax Mr. Praunce, that any person hath bribed him to give this evidence; nor that there was the least reward ever proposed to him to bear witness against them, nor so much as the hopes of that reward contained in the king's Proclamation; yet Mr. Praunce, if he had had a mind to bear false witness, might have laid hold of that opportunity; but so far was he from pretending to discover any thing, that he denied all when he was first apprehended. But after he was in hold, and likely to be brought to justice, and lying under the conviction of a guilty conscience, thwn, and not till then, does he discover it.

There is no objection in the world to be made, but since this discovery, Mr. Praunce hath retracted what he said before, but he gives you a very good account of it; the terrors of conscience he then lay under, the fears that he should not be pardoned, and the apprehensions he had from the threats on their side, and the danger of his utter ruin, put him upon that denial.

But, my Lord, he tells you likewise, That as soon as ever he was brought back to the prison, he owned all he had said at first, and desired he might be carried back again to testify the truth of what he had first sworn to. This, my lord, he gives you an account of, and the same account does the keeper of the prison give too. I have nothing to say more, but only just to observe the many circumstances whereby Mr. Praunce's testimony is fortified. Mr. Bedlow does agree with him in every circumstance, as far as his knowledge went: the maid of the house agrees with his testimony; that says, she saw Green at sir E. Godfrey's several times, though here he denies he knew him. That she saw Hill there that very morning her master was missed; that he talked with her master a quarter of an hour; that she knew him by a very good token; not only by his face, but also that he had the same clothes on then he hath now.

Mr. Praunce hath likewise told you of another circumstance, the meeting at the Plow-alehouse, where they laid the whole design of entrapping sir E. Godfrey; and herein he is fortified by the concurrent testimony of the master of the house, and his servant too, though they now deny that ever they had been in his company there; or that they so much as knew Girald; though when they were examined at the council-board, they said they knew Girald, but not Kelly; and now they are pressed with it here, Hill retreats to this, that he knows one Girald, but not Girald the priest.

My Lord, I think the matter is so fully and so plainly proved beyond exception, that there needs no repetition in the case: it is impossible that Mr. Praunce, a man of that mean capacity, should invent a story with so many circumstances, all so consistent, if there were not truth at the bottom of it. He shews you the particular places, from place to place, where they decoyed him in, and how they disposed of him, to the time they carried him out. And in each of these circumstances there is not the least improbability or cause to disbelieve him. It hath been already so fully repeated, and the plainness of the evidence is so convincing, that I need not make more observations upon it, but submit it to your lordship and the jury.

Then the Lord Chief Justice directed the Jury in this manner :

Look you, gentlemen of the jury, this is an inquisition for innocent blood that hath been shed, and your business is to see if you can find out the murderers. We would not add innocent blood to innocent blood: but on the other side, if you have received satisfaction so much as the nature of the thing can bear, then the land is defiled, unless this be satisfied. Now, for that I will urge the witness and testimony no further than it does appear; for you and we are all upon our oaths to do uprightly, neither to spare murderers, nor condemn the innocent.

In the first place, We began with Mr. Oates, and he told you, that he had some converse with sir E. Godfrey, and that he was threatened by some, and had no good will for his pains, in taking those examinations he had taken, and he was afraid his life was in danger. This he tells you was the discourse before-hand, and this is produced to lead you to consider what sort of persons they were, of whom he was likely to have these fears; for his fears did arise from his having done his part as a justice of peace, in taking the examinations upon oath.

For the testimony of the fact, they produce first Mr. Praunce, wherein you will do well to observe all the degrees that he goes by before the fact, and all the circumstances in the transaction of that affair, and the parties by whom it was to be enacted : First he tells you, how long it was before they could entice him to consent to such a villainy as this was to murder a man; he tells you by whom he was thus enticed, which makes the story more probable; that is, by Girald and Kelly (two priests); and he tells it you still more probably by their doctrine, that it was no sin; but it was rather an act of charity to kill a man that had done, and was like to do them mischief : So that if you consider the persons that preached to him, and the doctrine they taught, it carries a great shew and presumption of truth in itself. When they had met together at the Plow several times (which was denied by some of them, but is most manifestly proved by the master of the house and the boy), and the wished for time was come; for they were to watch the opportunity, and Mr. Praunce was to be at home, and they would call him to give his helping hand; he tells you, that Mr. Hill did go that morning; for though he talks of an errand before, yet to keep to that which was most pressing in the evidence, he went to sir Edmundbury's house. This he seems to deny; but the maid does swear it expressly upon him; and says, she came first to him, and went up stairs, and then came back again, and still he was there. And she swears positively she knows him by his face, and by the clothes he then had on, which are the same clothes he hath on now, and that is the man that was with her master; and this, which they cannot disprove, half proves the matter.

What had he to do at sir Godfrey's house? But that would be an hard puzzling question to be put to him: What did you there? And therefore he is to deny it; but the maid proves it upon him, as well as Praunce. So that I would have you consider how many witnesses you have to one thing or another, all conducing to this point.

You have first Mr. Oates, that tells you the discourse that passed between sir Edmundbury Godfrey and him; the maid tells you that both these men were there, one at one time, and the other at another; and you have Mr. Praunce, that knew the whole affair, who tells you so likewise, and that they were resolved to do the work that day, in so much, that if they could not do it, as they before contrived it (and sir Edmundbury Godfrey was sensible that he was dogged up and down), Girald did resolve to dogg him to his own door, and kill him in the lane that leads to his house; he would have run him through himself; and this Girald is one of those priests, whose church counts it no sin, but an act of charity to murder a christian, to propagate christianity.

When they had way-laid him, and watched his coming, from what place Mr. Praunce cannot tell; for he knows nothing but what they told him, and they only named in general, that he was lodged in St. Clement's; and thereupon one comes to acquaint him, that they would entice him in at the water-gate by Somerset-house; and they would do it with art enough, for they never want a contrivance for so charitable an act; And it was upon this pretence that there were two men a wrangling and fighting, and then he being a justice of the peace, was a person that would part the fray easily.

And it was a probable invention : For sir E. Godfrey was a man that was as willing to do all acts of justice as any one, and as little afraid to do it; for the witness tells you before, that he said, if they did do him a mischief, they must do it basely, for he did not fear the best of them upon fair play. Then when he was desired to get himself a man to follow him, he slighted the advice : And we all know, that he was a man of singular courage, and therefore it was the easier to lay a trap for him. Then saith Praunce, when he was got in, Berry and I were to have several posts, which we were to go to, I to one place, and Berry to another; and I staid, saith he, till Green threw the cravat about his neck, and was assisted by Girald and the rest that were there. And then, as soon as we could imagine the thing to be done,

Berry comes in, and Praunce comes back from his standing, and by some motions finds that he was alive, and that till Green twisted his neck round; which the Chirurgeons say was plainly a broken neck, and nothing of the wounds which were in his body were given him while he was alive.

When they had done this, he tells you, they carried him to Mr. Hill's chamber: Berry, Girald, Kelly and the rest, all helped him in, and there they leave him. Then Praunce goes away. This was on Saturday night. Then Praunce comes again on Monday night, and finds him removed to another chamber hard by, where he saw him by the light of a dark-lantheon, with something thrown over his face; and afterwards on Tuesday night following they did remove him back to Hill's lodgings, and there he lay till Wednesday night, when they carried him out.

Saith Praunce, I saw him that night: I was the man that helped to carry him out, for it was Praunce and Girald that carried him first, and it was Green and Kelly who went before, and took him up afterward. He tells you, they set him upon an horseback, and Hill behind him. They carried him out in a chair, which was a thing that used to come in and go out there, and so the less notice would be taken of it. I will observe to you afterwards, on the prisoners behalf, what is said for them to all this.

But as to Praunce, you see he hath given you an account from the top to the bottom, from the first transaction between them, from the time of his being called by them to help in the murder, and from his seeing the handkerchief twisted about his neck, his neck twisted round; how they disposed of his body at first; what removes they made, and when they carried him out, who were in company, who relieved them, and what became of him at last.

He says, he saw him set up before Hill on horseback, and they told him, they had thrown him into a ditch, and Girald had run him through with his own sword; and in that posture, and in that place the constable found him: The chirurgeons tell you that it was by the twisting of his neck, and the strangling, that he was killed, and not by the wounds; and the very bruising which Praunce speaks of, were found upon the view of the body. So that here is not any one thing that is not backed either in some particular circumstance or other; besides Mr. Praunce's testimony, who (alone) could give the narrative of the fact.

And it is no argument against Mr. Praunce in the world, that he should not be believed because he was a party, or because he after denied what he first said: First because you can have no body to discover such a fact, but only one that was privy to it: So that we can have no evidence, but what arises from a party to the crime. And in the next place, his denial after he had confessed it, to me, does not at all sound as an act of falshood, but fear. It is not a good argument to say, that he is not to be believed because he denied what he once said; for he tells you he had not his pardon, he was in great consternation; the horror of the fact itself, and the loss of his trade and livelihood was enough to do it. But how short was his denial, and how quick was his recantation! For he denied it before the king, not upon oath: He swore it upon oath, but he denies it upon his word only; but by that time he got home to Newgate, with captain Richardson, he fell down on his knees, and begged him for God's sake to carry him back to the king, for what I did say at first, said he, is true, and this denial is false. And here could be no tampering, no contrivance made use of; no, it is plain there could be no art used to make him retract from his first testimony. And these are the particulars, as to Praunce's evidence.

Then comes Mr. Bedlow, and tells you, that he was commanded by Le Faire, and the priests he was acquainted with to insinuate himself into the acquaintance of sir E. Godfrey; they did not tell him why; they themselves knew privately wherefore, and they did intend him as an instrument to do it, as appears afterward. He tells you, he got into his acquaintance, by pretending to go for warrants for the good behaviour and the peace, as he knew sir E. Godfrey was willing to have the peace kept; and he was with him every day almost, for a week or more.

Then the priests come a little nearer, and tampered with him to kill a man, an ill man for their turn, and that Mr. Bedlow should be very well rewarded, he should have 4,000*l.* to kill that gentleman; but still they kept the name secret. He promised them fair, but broke his word. Afterwards he meets this companion that he had most confidence in, and being taxed with his breach of promise, said he, I had business, I could not come. Well, said his companion, you should have been as good as your word; but the thing is done, the person is killed, and I would have you help to carry him away. He promises to do it, and to meet him at Somerset-house; accordingly he comes up on Monday in the evening, and about nine or ten of the clock at night Mr. Bedlow swears, that in his chamber that Praunce says he was laid in, he did see the body by the help of a dark-lantern; and his face was covered with a cloke or mantle, or some such thing thrown over him.

And these two men, viz. Mr. Praunce and Mr. Bedlow, as the council have observed, had not any confederacy together, for they both swear, that the never had any converse at all; and if it be so, then it is impossible for two men so to agree in a tale, with all circumstances, if they never conversed together, but it must be true.

It is hardly possible for any man to invent such a story; for Praunce it is, I believe. I find it is no hard thing for the priests to contrive such an action; but for two witnesses to agree in so many material circumstances with one another, that had never conversed together, is impossible.

. If all this had been a chimera, and not really so, then Praunce must be one of the notablest inventors in the world. And there must have been the mightiest chance in the world, that Mr. Bedlow and he should agree so in all things; and that the maid should swear, that Hill was there that morning; and that the constable should find the body, just as they told Praunce they had left him.

So that upon the matter, you have two witnesses almost in every thing: for Mr. Bedlow, seeing him in the place murdered, is a plain evidence that the thing was done; and all the other witnesses, speaking to circumstances both before and after, make the evidence plain, that these were the persons who did it. And I see nothing incoherent in all Mr. Praunce's testimony.

I would not urge this so, if I was not satisfied in my own conscience that the relation is true. In the prisoner's defence, there is but one thing that hath any sort of weight; for the young gentlewoman talking of his being constantly at home at eight o'clock, is nothing; for she says they always go to bed about nine o'clock, and they give no answer to this, but that it could not be done in their house but they must know of it; but do not shew how that must needs be; so that all their evidence is slight, and answers itself or else not possible to be true. All the testimony that is considerable in this matter, is that which Berry produces; and that is concerning the centinels who kept the guard that Wednesday night the body was carried out; and he says, there was no sedan carried out. And although this evidence be produced but by one of them, yet it is to the benefit of them all three; for if it were certain and infallibly true, that the centinels did so watch at the gate that no mortal could go out of the place, and if the darkness of the night might not hinder him from seeing what might go out, or that Mr. Berry's voice being known to him, he might not call to him, and so Mr. Berry might open the gate without any great caution, or more particular observation by the centinel, so that this might escape his observation or remembrance, and yet that the centinel be an honest man, and speak true, as he thinks, to his best remembrance, which I leave to your consideration. But there is one thing the other centinel tells you, that about eight or nine o'clock (for he went off at ten) there was a Sedan brought in, and he did not see it go out; and so says he that watched from ten to one; and this is the only thing which hath any colour in it, in behalf of the prisoners. But he that says there was no body went out, says also, that he never saw the sedan; but the centinel that was relieved, says, that he saw it go in. Now how far that single testimony of Nicholas Wright the centinel will weigh, who says that none went out, I leave with you, which may be mistaken, either by reason of the darkness of the night, or those other particulars I have observed to you.

But this is all that can overthrow the whole series of the evidence that hath been given by

Mr. Praunce, upon whom I find not the least reflection, except you will call that one, which to me, as it is circumstanced, is rather an argument for him than against him, viz. his going off from what he said. And what sir Robert Southwell says is regardable, that when he shewed them the place where he was strangled, the house to which he was first carried, he did it very readily and confidently, but was puzzled to find out the room where he was removed when he saw him by the dark lastborn, and would not positively assert where it was; which shews the integrity of the man, who would else have gone through without begging, for if all were a lie, why should he stick at one thing more than another, but have shewed some room or other? but when he was confident he appeared so, and when he was doubtful he appeared so, and so shewed himself an honest man.

These are the particular matters, and, as near as I can remember, all that hath been materially offered for the prisoners, against the king's evidence. For the testimony of the landlord, Warriar, and his wife, it is plainly spoken of another time, for it was the Saturday after the Thursday he was found, the 19th of October. So that they speak nothing but what is true, and yet nothing to the purpose; for the question is, of that which was done the 12th; but they speak of a time when the tragedy was passed, so that there is only the single evidence of one witness, the centinel, which must be opposed to all the concurring evidence given against them.

Berry. There was centinels placed at every one of the gates.

L. C. J. That is nothing, for we speak only of this gate, the great gate; but I will tell you what there is that does not arise from these witnesses, but from the nature of the thing they were about and the persons that transacted it, that gives credit to the testimonies of the witnesses, so as to incline any one to believe them as things stand at this day, in reference to the known design of the priests to subvert our religion, for they must justify one ill by another, and the mischief they have done will not be safe, unless they do more.

And for the priests being the preachers of murder, and your sin, that it is charity to kill any man that stands in their way; their doctrine will make you easily believe their practice, and their practice proves their doctrine. Such courses as these we have not known in England till it was brought out of their Catholic countries; what belongs to secret stranglings and poisonings, are strange to us, though common in Italy. But now your priests are come hither to be the pope's bravos, and to murder men for the honour of his holiness: and as they are inhuman so they are unmanly too; for sir E. Godfrey had not been afraid of two or three of your priests, if they would have dealt fairly with him.

Berry. He was a gentleman that I never spoke with in all my life.

L. C. J. You must say and believe, as you priest will have you, and in such actions as these as your priests suggest to you, so does the devil to your priests; if you are upon the matter necessitated to what they will have you think; for though your priests preach up freedom of will, yet they allow none to the understanding. They hold you may do good or evil, but will not suffer you to understand right and wrong, for you cannot be perfectly theirs, if you have any thing of your own to guide yourselves by.

I know that every body of that party is apt to say their priests own no such thing, but it is notoriously known to all the world, that they both print it, and practise it. What, shall any of you dispute the power of a pope? saith a Jesuit: or, of a pope and council? say the most moderate priests. Have you power to say how far you will be a papist, and how far not? you may as well bound the sea, and bid it go thus far, and no farther, as limit the pope's authority. I wonder any man should be of that persuasion, and yet keep his reason: much less turn from our religion to theirs, if he considers how they impose, and what mischiefs and blood you are involved in by your priests, that have alarmed the nation. For I will affirm, the greatest mischief the papists have received, come from their priests, who have such unworthy and unmanly ways of setting up their religion: What! Do they think it an act of charity to kill men; or is the Christian Religion or yours, to be promoted by such means as these? No, gentlemen, it is the fault of your doctrine, and it is a monstrous mistake in you, if you think that you have any power of your own whilst you continue in their persuasion.

I know some will ascribe all to conscience that guides them, and that even these mischiefs are but the effects of their religious obedience; but they are indeed the consequences of the blindness of their obedience. I wonder how any man can have the face, thus to disorder a whole nation, and yet pretend conscience for it. Let no man tell me, O, sir, we desire none of these mischiefs you talk of; what, not if religion requires it, or if the pope says it does? hath not the council of Lateran decreed that every popish prince ought to root out heresy upon pain of damnation? you must: can you go and tell the pope how far you will believe, or what you ought to do? You may as well tell me, that if he were once with us, and had the power he once had, he would leave us to ourselves and that if he had the same ability, he would not have the same tyranny.

And therefore all the Roman Catholic gentlemen in England would do very well to consider, how much it concerns christianity not to give offence; and if they cannot at this time live in a Protestant kingdom with security to their neighbours, but cause such fears and dangers, and that for conscience sake, let them keep their consciences but leave the kingdom. If they say, why should not we stay here, while we do no mischief? Alas, that is not in your power. You cannot be quiet in your own religion, unless you disturb ours; and therefore, if to shew your consciences you acquit the country, and let the inconveniencies light on yourselves only, I should then think you had zeal, though not according to knowledge; and not ascribe it to any plot, but to the simplicities of understanding.

But, in short, there is a monstrous evidence of the whole plot itself by this fact; for we can ascribe it to none, but such ends as these, that such a man must be killed; for it must be either because he knew something the priests would not have him to tell, or they must do it in defiance of justice, and in terror to all them that dare execute it upon them; which carries a great evidence in itself, and which I leave to your consideration; having remembered, as well as I could, the proofs against them, and all that is considerable for them. Add to this the condition that we are in at this time, and the eagerness of the pursuit that these priests make to gain the kingdom, that, for my own part, I must put it into my library, That God would deliver me from the delusion of Popery, and the tyranny of the Pope: For it is a yoke which we, who have known freedom, cannot endure, and a burden which none but that beast who was made for burden, will bear. So I leave it to your consideration upon the whole matter, whether the evidence of the fact does not satisfy your consciences, that these men are guilty. And I know you will do like honest men on both sides.

[Then the Jury withdrew to consider of their verdict, and after a short space returned again.]

Cl. of Cr. Gentlemen, answer to your names. Sir William Roberts.

Sir William Roberts. Here. And so the rest.

Cl. of Cr. Gentlemen, are you all agreed of your verdict?—Omnes. Yes.

Cl. of Cr. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Our foreman.

Cl. of Cr. Robert Green, hold up thy hand (which he did). Look upon the prisoner; how say you, is Robert Green guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements?

Foreman. None, to our knowledge.

Cl. of Cr. Henry Berry, hold up thy hand (which he did). Look upon the prisoner. How say you, is Henry Berry guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements?

Foreman. None, to our knowledge.

Cl. of Cr. Lawrence Hill, hold up thy hand (which he did). How say you, is Lawrence Hill guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. What goods or chattels, lands or tenements?

Foreman. None, to our knowledge.

Cl. of Cr. Hearken to your verdict, as the Court hath recorded it. You say that Robert Green is Guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted. You say that Henry Berry is Guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted. You say that Lawrence Hill is Guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted; and that neither they nor any of them, had any goods or chattels, lands or tenements, at the time of the felony committed, or at any time since, to your knowledge. And so you say all.

Omnes. Yes.

L. C. J. Gentlemen, you have found the same verdict that I would have found if I had been one with you; and if it were the last word I were to speak in this world, I should have pronounced them Guilty.

At which words the whole assembly gave a great shout of applause.

Att. Gen. Will your lordships please to give Judgment this evening? I know it is not usual the same day.

Justice Wild. My lord, I am ready.

L. C. J. No, brother, I am to sit at Nisi Prius this afternoon, and it is time we broke up the Court.

Cl. of Cr. Captain Richardson, you shall have a rule to bring them to-morrow. And then the Court broke up.

On Tuesday, the 11th of February, the Prisoners were brought again to the bar, in order to receive their Sentence; and the Court proceeded thus:

Recorder. My lord, as I was directed by Mr. Attorney, these prisoners being convicted of murder, I do, for the king, pray Judgment upon them; but I must first acquaint your lordship, that immediately after their conviction, one of the officers, a tipstaff, pretending it was his fee, took their clothes off their backs.

L. C. J. Who is that officer?

Recorder. One Ashby.

L. C. J. Call him. Why do you offer to meddle with these men's clothes?

Ashby. It hath been an ancient custom this 40 years, some of us have known it, that the marshal hath the upper garment of all prisoners tried at this bar.

L. C. J. (Speaking to a Clerk of the Crown Office). Is there any such custom, Mr. Waterhouse?

Waterhouse. No, my lord, not that I know of.

L. C. J. Here is Mr. Waterhouse, that hath known the practice of the Court this three-score years, says there is no such thing. Either restore them their clothes, or we will take some other course with you. Are they in your custody, pray?

Justice Dolben. I do not know that, my lord; I think they always plead in custody of the marshal.

Justice Wild. But this seems a very barbarous thing, to take their clothes off their backs.

Justice Dolben. It doth so, brother, and they must be restored.

L. C. J. Yes, ye, you must restore them.

Ashby. They shall be, my lord.

Recorder. I pray your Judgment.

L. C. J. Ask them what they can say to hinder Judgment.

Cl. of Cr. Robert Green, hold up thy hand (which he did). Thou hast been indicted of felony and murder, thou hast been thereupon arraigned, thou hast pleaded thereunto Not Guilty, and for thy trial thou hast put thyself upon God and thy Country, which Country hath found thee Guilty; what hast thou to say for thyself, why the Court should not proceed to give judgment of death upon thee, and award execution according to the law?

Captain Richardson. What have you to say for yourself?

Green. I declare to all the world, that I am as innocent of the thing charged upon me, as the child that is in the mother's womb. I die innocent, I do not care for death. I go to my Saviour, and I desire all that hear me to pray for me. I never saw the man to my knowledge, alive or dead.

Cl. of Cr. Henry Berry, hold up thy hand (which he did). Thou hast been indicted of felony and murder, &c. what canst thou say, &c.

Berry. I do declare, I am not guilty of any thing in the world of this.

L. C. J. We do not expect much from you, and it is no great matter; for your confession will do us little good, but only for yourselves. We regard it not otherwise, because the evidence was so plain, that all mankind is satisfied, there is no scruple in the thing; and we know you have either downright denials, or evasions, or equivocating terms for every thing; yet in plain-dealing, every one that heard your trial hath great satisfaction; and for my own particular, I have great satisfaction that you are every one of you guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Lawrence Hill, hold up thy hand (which he did). Thou hast been indicted of felony and murder, &c. what canst thou say, &c.

Hill. I have nothing to say for myself, but that God Almighty knows my innocence.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, make an O Yes.

Crier. O Yes! Our sovereign lord the king doth strictly charge and command all manner of persons to keep silence, whilst Judgment is giving upon the prisoners convicted, upon pain of imprisonment; peace about the Court.

Then Mr. Justice Wild, who, as second judge in that Court, pronounced the Sentence in all criminal matters, except High Treason, spoke to the prisoners thus:

Justice Wild. You that are the prisoners at the bar, you have all three been indicted for a detestable murder, and thereunto have pleaded Not Guilty; and put yourselves for your trial upon your country; and your country, upon a clear and pregnant evidence, I believe to the satisfaction of all good men, that were indifferent, have found you Guilty. I have little comfort to say any thing to you, because I observe your obstinacy at the bar; but it is so generally among you all, you will confess nothing to the death.

Green. God forbid, Sir.

Justice Wild. But though I am of another persuasion than you, and know you have no charity for me, yet I have charity for you. And if I shall say any thing, it is out of a zealous affection I have for your souls; God knows I speak it upon no other grounds; though the offence be horrid, yet I commiserate your persons.

For the nature of your offence, it is murder: 'He that sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God created he him.' So saith God to Noah, intimating and declaring thereby, that the intention of God Almighty, in the making of that law, was the preservation of mankind; and that he will not admit or suffer his image to be defaced or destroyed. If it shall be accounted treason against earthly princes to deface their images, is it not much more treason against the great God of heaven and earth, to deface his image, who is the 'King of kings, and Lord of lords?' The greatness of this sin struck such a damp and horror upon the soul of Cain, that it made him cry out, 'His punishment was greater than he could bear;' or, as our bibles have it in the margin, 'His iniquity was greater than could be forgiven; and it shall come to pass, that whosoever meeteth me, shall slay me:' being conscious to himself, that it was just and lawful, that whosoever did meet with him should slay him. And God himself doth set forth the heinousness of this offence, when he tells him, 'His brother's blood cried to him;' that is, cried unto God from the earth for vengeance. Blood, it is of a crying nature, and will never cease crying, till it find out the manslayer.

It is an offence so heinous in the eye of God, that he will not endure it in a beast; God saith, he will require it of a beast. And doth God require blood of a beast, a brutish creature void of all reason, and will he not require it much more of man, whom he hath endued with those two great faculties of reason and understanding? and certainly, if murder in general be enquired after, I may well say this of yours, there hath not been committed a more impudent and barbarous murder in this civilized nation, by one subject upon another. And observe how you did effect this murder, with baseness enough. See the baseness of it; as the devil was the father of lies, so he was a murderer from the beginning; and you first began your murder with an hellish, studied, and premeditated lie. Knowing that this gentleman was a person very vigorous in the execution of his place, that would omit no opportunity of doing his office; you pretend you have occasion for him, and by this means draw him into your snare; where what you do, you do cowardly and basely, first disarm him, then fall upon him, and murder him; as the prophet David saith of the ungodly man, 'first gets the righteous man in his net, and then ravisheth him.'

Had such a thing as this been acted by us Protestants in any Popish country in the world, I doubt there would scarce have been one of us left alive. They would not have taken this course that hath been taken with you, to admit us to a fair trial; no, they would have made their own hands their avengers: but, God be praised, we are of another religion, and of another persuasion. We leave vengeance to God, and, under him, to the magistrate 'who beareth not the sword in vain,' as you now find.

If I could abstract folly from wickedness, certainly it was one of the greatest pieces of folly and sottishness in the world; for what could be your end in it? did you think that all the magistrates in England were lodged in sir E. Godfrey? that, if he were taken out of the way, there were not men of spirit and courage, as faithful and diligent as he was? trouble not yourselves, nor let those of your persuasion trouble themselves, there are a numerous company of magistrates in this kingdom, that will do the same thing, and act in it, and execute their offices with the same courage.

And as to the manner of the murder: whom have you destroyed? a magistrate. For what? for the execution of his office. One that was a conservator of the peace; and whose study it was to preserve you in peace, on him you have violated the peace, and nothing less would satisfy you than his precious life; an affront to the law, to the magistrate, to the king, to the nation; yea, to God himself, upon whom an higher affront could hardly have been put. For the magistrate is God's ordinance; God hath set him up to avenge himself upon the wicked, and to reward the good; 'and he doth not bear,' as it is a sign by you he hath not born, 'the sword in vain.'

I might say much more concerning the heinousness of this offence; but had I the tongue of men and angels, I could not say enough to set out the horror of it. And now let me tell you, I do not speak this to insult and domineer over you; I praise God I am of another spirit; he knows I have another end in what I say, and my end is merely this, to persuade you from the foulness of your fact, to make a good use of it; that the horridness of your sin may make the greater and deeper impressions on your spirits; and so make your repentance more severe and efficacious. Had you as many years to live as you have hours, it were little enough to bewail this horrid offence. But on the other side, as that will be little enough, yet let me give you this comfort, you have time enough, if you make a good use of it, to make your peace with God.

Pray let me debort you from one thing; and that is this, do not be of the opinion of those wicked miscreants the Jesuits, that have put you upon this matter; for I have so much charity for you as to believe they made it a matter of religion to you, and justifiable upon that account. Do not think so, for the law of God is indispensable, and no power under heaven can license to murder. So that though the offence in them is abominable, yet in you it is an offence too, and an horrid one. And when you have considered it as such, I then desire you to take a right course to make your peace with God: for you must pass under another judgment than that of man, and that shortly; you must stand before the Judge of heaven and earth. And therefore, if by this means you can prevent that future judgment, you will have just cause to thank God that you had your punishment here on earth. Therefore let me advise you to spend every minute you have left, in a free acknowledgment of all your offences: for certainly some sin went before, or this had never come after. One sin does another, and makes way for the commission of another.

And what must you rely upon? not upon any trash or trumpery, not upon any merit of your own; there is but one Saviour and Mediator, the Lord Jesus Christ. And I would advise you, in the words of that great Cardinal, one that was one of the greatest men of your religion, Bellarmine I mean, who having made a scrutiny, which was the safest way for securing heaven, made the conclusion thus: 'To trust only upon the Lord Jesus Christ for life and salvation;' which I advise you to do.

I have now done what I intended to say to you; and what I have said, I spoke to deliver my own soul, and upon no other account. I now pronounce the judgment which the law hath appointed to pass upon such malefactors; and that is this:

"That you go from hence to the place from whence you came, and from thence to the place of execution, where you shall be severally hanged by the neck, till you are severally dead; and the Lord have mercy upon your souls."

Hill. I humbly beg one favour, that I may have the privilege to see my wife and children, and my brother, before I die, sometimes.

L. C. J. God forbid else.

Hill. Any day, I hope, my lord?

L. C. J. Captain Richardson, let them have the liberty of seeing their friends, but do it with care and caution.

Just. Wild. And I will say this more to you, if you will have any religious Protestant divines to come to you, they shall be sent to you, but none of your priests.

Hill. I desire only my relations.

Just. Wild. You shall have them, and we offer you the others.

VOL. VII.

Green. I have no relations that are catholics, but two, and they are not priests. God bless the king: and I desire all good people to pray for us.

L. C. J. Mr. Astry, let the rule be entred for their execution on Monday next.

Cl. of the Cr. Captain Richardson, you shall have the rule for their execution on Monday next.

Then the keeper carried away the prisoners to the gaol, to be reserved till their execution.

On Friday the 21st of February, the prisoners, Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, were executed according to the sentence pronounced against them; they all persisted to the last in denying the fact for which they suffered.

An Account of, together with, the Writing itself, that was found in the pocket of LAWRENCE HILL, at the time he and Green were executed, Friday, the 21st of February, 1678-9, for the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, knt.

It is very fit the world should have some account of what was said at the Execution of these men, and how they came to say what they did. Their Confession (as it is called) was a denial of the fact, which was penned and prepared in a very formal manner, and taken out of the pocket of Hill, who had neither pen, ink, nor paper, all the while he was in Newgate; yet, after he was dead, captain Richardson, the master of Newgate, saw the executioner take it out of his pocket; which is verbatim, as follows:

"I now come to the fatal place where I must end my life, and I hope with that courage that may become my innocence: I must now appear before the Great Judge, who knows all things, and judges rightly; and I hope it will be happy for me, a sinner, that I am thus wrongfully put to death. I call God, angels, and men, to witness, that I am wholly ignorant of the manner, cause, or time of the death of justice Godfrey; although, on that account, by the malice of wicked men, brought to this shameful death, which, I hope, will give me a speedy passage to eternal life: In this hope I die cheerfully because of my innocence, and the benefit of the precious wounds of my blessed Saviour, by whose merits I hope for salvation. I die a Roman Catholic, desiring all such to pray for me: And I beseech God, in his justice, to discover this horrid murder, with the contrivers thereof, that my innocence may appear. And though from my heart I forgive my accusers, yet I cite all such as have had a hand in this bloody contrivance, before the great tribunal of God's justice, to answer for the wrong they have done the innocent; and particularly the Lord Chief Justice, and the brothers of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, with jury, witnesses, and all their partakers. O Lord, bless and preserve his majesty, and be merciful to this poor nation, and lay no innocent blood to its charge. So I bid you all farewell in Jesus Christ, into whose hands I commend my spirit."

Then turning to some of the officers, he said: There is a report up and down, that I have confessed the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey to Dr. Lloyd; I do deny it.

This Paper was shewn to Hill's wife; and she being demanded whether it was her husband's hand-writing, affirmed it was not: And being further asked, whether she conveyed it to him, she protested she knew not how he came by it; and declared that she never saw it before.

Then Mr. Green said;

"I desire all your prayers: And as for sir Edmundbury Godfrey, I know not whether he be dead or alive; for in my days I never saw him with my eyes, as I know of; and if false people will swear against me, I cannot help it. I pray God to bless my king, and all good people."

Then captain Richardson told him, he had a fair trial, and wished him not to reflect on others, but to prepare himself for death: To which Mr. Green replied, I pray God Almighty to forgive them all: I never saw sir Edmundbury Godfrey, to my knowledge in my life.

Mr. Berry being a protestant of the church of England, was reprieved till the 28th of the same month, in hopes he would make some discoveries. Nevertheless, when he came to the gallows, he absolutely denied all knowledge or concurrence in the fact for which he died; as will be seen by the following Account of his Behaviour.

A Relation of Mr. BERRY's Behaviour and Discourse, from seven o'clock in the Morning, untill he was executed. Written so soon as I got Home.* GEORGE WILSON.

WHEN I came to him in Newgate, I found him upon his knees, at his prayers, with Dr. Patrick's Devotions in his hands. He told me he was glad I was come, and desired my assistance in prayer. After I had for some while prayed with him, which he did very fervently, I believe, for almost all the time he wept; we then rose up both together, and had some little discourse. I told him, that as the law had condemned him, so I could not but conclude him guilty; and therefore did assure him, that there was a strict tribunal after this life, before which we must all appear; and in particular for him, that there were but two or three hours before he must suffer death, and come to judgment; and therefore I did desire him, that he would reveal to me what he knew of the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, that God's justice might be glorified in his death; and that he would not go out of the world in his sin, unrepented of; which it must be, if he did not abhor it, and confess it. He answered me, He knew not any thing of the fact for which he was condemned: This was spoke with some asseveration. I hearing him give this answer, asked him, what were the particular things that were witnessed against him, for which he was condemned? As I did conjecture then, I thought he seemed to be unwilling to speak of this matter, nor did his words seem to come freely from him: But he told me, that Mr. Praunce* had accused him

* From a MS. in the library belonging to the church of St. Martin's in the Fields.

* An Account of the proceeding to sentence against MILES PRAUNCE, for wilful Perjury; who was sentenced in the court of King's-Bench, Westminster, upon a conviction by his own confession, on the 15th of June, 1686, in wilfully forswearing himself at the trials of Robert Green, Lawrence Hill, and Henry Berry, &c. in relation to the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey.

Miles Praunce, a silversmith, having been, the last Easter Term, arraigned upon an information of wilful perjury, exhibited against him in the court of King's Bench, for wilfully forswearing himself against Robert Green, Lawrence Hill, and Henry Berry, &c. in relation to their murdering sir Edmundbury Godfrey; and for which, upon his oath, &c. they were executed for the said murder at Tyburn; and he confessing himself guilty of the perjury specified in the same information, was, on Tuesday, the 15th of this instant June, again brought to the court of King's Bench, to receive his sentence. The Court having a while considered the heinousness of the crime, and putting him in mind of it, told him, It was well he was so sensible of his offence, it being so great a one, as to extend to the taking away the lives of innocent persons, which did aggravate it; though one that had before him been found guilty of two notorious perjuries in that court, continued obstinate to the last; and, for aught appears, has not hitherto shewn any remorse. Yet seeing he (meaning the prisoner) was sensible of his crime, and had confessed it, the Court had considered his condition, and would have some compassion on a true penitent. The sentence of the Court was, "That he should pay a fine of 100*l.* to the king: That he should appear before each court in Westminster-Hall, &c. with a paper upon his forehead, expressing his crime: That on Monday next he should stand at Westminster in the pillory, between the hours of 11 and 1, for the space of an hour; on Wednesday the like, before the Exchange; and on the following Monday, at Charing Cross: And he was likewise sentenced to be whipped from Newgate to Tyburn; and he to continue in prison until all was performed."

Praunce, upon the aforementioned exhortation, declared, That his last confession was the

for the assisting in carrying sir Edmundbury Godfrey, after he was murdered, into a room in Somerset-house: He said, He could not say he had never been in the room. Mr. Praunce spoke of, for he believed, one time or other, that he had been in all the rooms of the house; but that, to the best of his remembrance, he had never carried, in all his life, a two-penny weight into that room; but did acknowledge God's justice in his death, for changing his religion for interest sake. Hearing him thus positively to deny the fact, considering Dr. Lloyd had been with him two or three days before, I did not further press him, because I came to him only for to assist him in prayer: And therefore, after this little discourse, we went to prayers again, and before we had done, the Ordinary of Newgate came in, to whom I gave place.

He began to tell Mr. Berry, that he had found him of a more ingenuous temper than the rest were; and wondered who had been tampering with him, to make him persist in the denial of the murder, which if he would have confessed, there was once hopes of a pardon; but if he would at last confess it, he would endeavour what he could to have him saved: And told him also, that it was no argument, that others had foolishly thrown away their lives, that therefore he must do so too: therefore, says Mr. Ordinary, come tell me what is truth. Mr. Berry answered, You have been very pressing upon me; I cannot tell what you mean (and shewed his averseness again to speak of the murder.) I mean, says Mr. Ordinary, that thou wouldst tell me what is truth; and prithee come tell me what is truth? Truth, says Berry, is not to tell a lye; not to speak that a man does not know; and this is truth. Well, says Mr. Ordinary, come tell me what thou knowest of the murder, and do not damn thyself. Says Mr. Berry, But I think you would have me, by your thus pressing of me; for I did not know any thing of it, for a fortnight after truth; and that he was very sensible of, and sorry for what he had done; upon which the Court desired God to continue him so.

The Sentence passed, the keeper of the Gatehouse was ordered to take back his prisoner, which he accordingly did, conveying him to the Gatehouse prison, where he now (June 15, 1686), remains in custody.

it was done. Mr. Ordinary then told him, he would deceive himself if he thought that any absolution, or any indulgence, of either priest or pope, could save him, without true repentance. He said, he did not believe any such thing. Mr. Ordinary perceiving that this discourse did but disorder him, and had put him out of that composure and calmness he was in before, gave it over, and went to prayers, till the sheriff sent to him, to come away to execution. When we were coming out of his prison-chamber, Mr. Ordinary asked him, if he should go along with him to his execution: Mr. Berry begged heartily that he would not, but desired me to go along with him: Mr. Ordinary said, It was his place, and he would go. We both went, and got into the cart to him, at the place of execution: When he had prayed by himself a good while, Mr. Ordinary desired him to confess to the people his crime, which was seconded by others that stood by, saying, There was no repentance without public confession. Mr. Berry being thus pressed again, he declared (otherwise I believe he would not have said any thing, but have gone out of the world without speaking one word of his innocency, or the murder; for he seemed to be, both before and after, when pressed again to confess, to be averse to it) he was as innocent as the child that is new born. Presently the sheriff stopped him from saying any thing more, and told him, he was not to suffer him there to defame an honourable court, but if he had any other thing to say, he might: He answered, he did not blame either judge or jury, (and had before at first prayed, as for the king and queen and church, so for the magistrates, that God would protect them in their duty), but for his accusers, he must say they had done him wrong, for he was not guilty of that for which he suffered; but he prayed God to forgive them, and that his death might be the last innocent blood that might be shed in the land; and prayed that his might never cry for judgment. After which, Mr. Ordinary prayed for him, which was very uneasy to him, and he desired him not to do it. Then he desired me to pray for him; after which, I did not hear him say any thing, but left him praying: And when the cart was drawing from under him, he lifted up his hands towards heaven, and said, "As I am innocent, so receive my soul, O Lord Jesus."

248. The Trial of Mr. SAMUEL ATKINS, at the King's-Bench, for being accessory to the Murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey : 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679.

ON Saturday the 8th of February, 1679, Mr. Samuel Atkins was brought from Newgate to the bar of the Court of King's-Bench at Westminster, to be arraigned as accessory to the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, which was done in this manner :

Clerk of the Crown. Samuel Atkins, hold up thy hand (which he did). Thou standest indicted by the name of Samuel Atkins, late of the parish of St. Mary le Strand, in the county of Middlesex, gent. for that whereas on the morrow of the Purification of the blessed Virgin Mary, before our sovereign lord the king, at Westminster, by the oath of twelve jurors, good and lawful men of the said county, tried, sworn, and charged to enquire for our sovereign lord the king, and the body of the said county, Robert Green, late of the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, labourer; Henry Berry, late of the same parish and county, labourer; Lawrence Hill, late of the same parish and county, labourer; — Girald, late of the same parish and county, clerk; Dominick Kelly, late of the same parish and county, clerk; and Philibert Vernatt, late of the same parish and county, labourer; are indicted, for that they not having the fear of God before their eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, the 12th day of October, in the 30th year of the reign of our sovereign lord Charles 2, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. at the parish of St. Mary le Strand aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, in and upon sir Edmundbury Godfrey, kn. in the peace of God, and of our said sovereign lord the king, then and there being, feloniously, voluntarily, and of their malice aforethought, did make an assault; and that he the aforesaid Robert Green, a certain linen handkerchief, of the value of sixpence, about the neck of the said sir Edmundbury Godfrey, then and there feloniously, voluntarily, and of his malice aforethought, did fold and fasten; and that he the said Robert Green, with the handkerchief aforesaid, by him the said Robert Green on and about the neck of the said sir Edmundbury Godfrey, in manner and form aforesaid folded and fastened, then and there him the said sir Edmundbury Godfrey did choak and strangle; of which said choking and strangling of him, the said sir Edmundbury Godfrey in manner and form aforesaid, he the said sir Edmundbury Godfrey then and there instantly died; and that the said Henry Berry, Lawrence Hill, — Girald, Dominick Kelly, and Philibert Vernatt, then and there feloniously, voluntarily, and of their malice aforethought, were present, aiding, abetting, comforting, and maintaining the aforesaid Robert Green, the aforesaid sir Edmundbury Godfrey, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, voluntarily, and of his malice aforethought, to kill and murder; and so they the said Robert Green, Henry Berry, Lawrence Hill, — Girald, Dominick Kelly and Philibert Vernatt, in manner and form aforesaid, the aforesaid sir Edmundbury Godfrey, feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, did kill and murder, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. And that thou the said Samuel Atkins, at or upon the said 12th day of October, and divers days and times before, the said Robert Green, Henry Berry, Lawrence Hill, — Girald, Dominick Kelly, and Philibert Vernatt, the felony and murder aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, to commit feloniously, wilfully, and of thy malice aforethought, didst command, counsel and abet; and knowing the said Robert Green, Henry Berry, Lawrence Hill, — Girald, Dominick Kelly, and Philibert Vernatt, the felony and murder aforesaid, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously to have done and committed, at or upon the said 12th day of October, and divers days and times after, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, feloniously the said Robert Green, Henry Berry, Lawrence Hill, — Girald, Dominick Kelly, and Philibert Vernatt, didst harbour, comfort, and maintain, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. How sayest thou, Samuel Atkins, art thou Guilty as accessory to the said felony and murder whereof thou standest indicted, and hast been now arraigned, or Not Guilty?

S. Atkins. Not Guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. Culpit, how wilt thou be tried?—S. Atkins. By God and my country.

Cl. of the Cr. God send thee a good deliverance.

S. Atkins. My lord, I do humbly desire, that the several examinations taken concerning this business, may at my trial be brought into the Court.

L. C. J. (Sir William Scroggs) This is to be left to Mr. Attorney to do in it as he pleaseth; for he is to take care of the king's evidence.

S. Atkins. I only desire, my lord, that they may be brought in. Mr. Recorder had some of them taken before him.

Recorder (Sir George Jefferies.) To satisfy this gentleman, my lord, whatever examinations were taken before me shall be brought.

L. C. J. Why, Mr. Atkins, do you know nothing of this business, that you are so willing to have all the evidence brought in against you?

Atkins. My lord, I know nothing of it at all.

L. C. J. Are you a papist, Mr. Atkins?

S. Atkins. No, my Lord, I am not.

L. C. J. Were you never one?

S. Atkins. No, I never was one, nor I hope never shall be. When is it that your lordship pleaseth to have me tried, for I have lain these sixteen weeks in prison, and do earnestly desire my trial.

L. C. J. You shall be tried as soon as we can when Mr. Attorney thinketh fit. We must try the others on Monday, and if there be time afterwards you may be tried then: however, captain Richardson shall have a rule to bring you up then.

S. Atkins. I humbly thank your lordship.

Then he was carried back by the keeper, and accordingly on Monday following he was brought up; and after the trials of Green, Berry, and Hill, were over he was sent to the bar.

February 10, 1679.

L. C. J. Mr. Atkins, have you any bail ready?

S. Atkins. No, my Lord, I am prepared for my trial, if your lordship pleaseth, but not with bail.

L. C. J. Ay, but, Mr. Atkins, it is the latter end of the term, and many people's livelihoods lie at stake. We cannot lay aside all business for yours.

S. Atkins. My Lord, my life lies at stake, and I have been under severe imprisonment a long time. I humbly pray I may be tried; besides, I have many witnesses, who have remained in town on purpose to give evidence for me ever since the last term. I hope my trial will not take up much time.

Justice Dolben. If you have so many witnesses, it cannot be soon over.

S. Atkins. I have many ready, but hope I shall have occasion to use only a few.

L. C. J. Mr. Atkins, we cannot do it, you must be content; you shall be tried at the sessions. Pray how long is it to it?

Recorder. It is about three weeks my Lord.

L. C. J. That indeed will be too long, but in the mean time you shall be bailed.

S. Atkins. I submit, my Lord; I think I have bail here. [Mr. Atkins was here calling his bail.]

L. C. J. Come then, name them.

Captain Lloyd. My Lord, I am a witness on behalf of this gentleman, and cannot possibly be in England a fortnight hence.

S. Atkins. My Lord, this is a captain of one of the king's ships, and his occasions will indispensably call him away, and this is the case of several others of my witnesses.

L. C. J. Well, I do not know; if it be so, you shall be tried to-morrow; and so bring him up very early, [Speaking to Captain Richardson.]

And so Mr. Atkins went from the bar, and was brought up thither again on the morrow; being Tuesday, when his trial proceeded thus:

February 11, 1679.

Cl. of the Cr. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O Yes! If any one can inform our sovereign lord the king, the king's serjeant at law, the king's Attorney General, or this inquest now to be taken of Samuel Atkins the prisoner at the bar, his being accessory to the felony and murder whereof Robert Green, Henry Berry, Lawrence Hill, and others stand indicted, and as accessory of which said felony and murder the said Samuel Atkins stands indicted, and hath been arraigned, let them come forth, and they shall be heard, for now the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance.

Att. Gen. (Sir William Jones,) My Lord, I must inform your lordship, that there is another Indictment against Mr. Atkins as principal, which was preferred heretofore, but we have since thought fit to prefer another as accessory. Now to discharge him of the first, I desire he may be arraigned on that before his trial.

Cl. of the Cr. I did so intend to do, Mr. Attorney. Samuel Atkins, hold up thy hand, (which he did). Thou standest indicted by the name of Samuel Atkins, late of the parish of St. Clements Danes, in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, for that thou, together with —Welch, and—Le Faire, of the said parish and county, gentlemen, not having the fear of God before your eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, the twelfth day of October, in the thirtieth year of the reign of our sovereign Lord Charles 2, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France and Ireland King, defender of the faith, &c. with force and arms at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, in and upon sir Edmundbury Godfrey, knight, in the peace of God and of our said sovereign lord the king, then and there being feloniously, wilfully, and of your malice aforethought, did make an assault, and that thou the said Samuel Atkins, a certain linen cravat, of the value of one penny, about the neck of the said sir E. Godfrey then and there feloniously, wilfully and of thy malice aforethought, didst fold and fasten, and that thou the said Samuel Atkins with the said cravat, so by thee the said Samuel Atkins about the neck of the said sir E. Godfrey fastened and folded as aforesaid, then and there the said sir E. Godfrey, feloniously, wilfully, and of thy malice aforethought, didst choke and strangle; of which said choking and strangling of the said sir E. Godfrey by thee the said Samuel Atkins, in manner and form aforesaid done and committed, the said sir E. Godfrey, in the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, instantly died. and that the aforesaid—Welch,—Le Faire, feloniously, wilfully, of their malice aforethought, were then and there present, aiding, assisting, abetting, comforting and maintaining thee the said Samuel Atkins, the felony and murder aforesaid in manner and form aforesaid, to do and commit. And that so thou the said Samuel Atkins, with the aforesaid—Welch and—Le Faire, the said twelfth day of October at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, the said sir E. Godfrey, feloniously, wilfully, and of your malice aforethought, did kill and murder, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. How sayest thou, Samuel Atkins, art thou guilty of the felony and murder whereof thou standest indicted and hast been now arraigned, or, not Guilty?

S. Atkins. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

S. Atkins. By God and my country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance. Samuel Atkins, hold up thy hand (which he did). Those men that you shall hear called and shall personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king, and you, upon the trial of your life and your death. If therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn. Call the jury, Crier, and make an O yes.

Crier. O yes! You good men that are impannelled to inquire between our sovereign lord the king and Samuel Atkins the prisoner at the bar, answer to your names.

Cl. of Cr. Sir John Cutler.

Crier. Vous avez. Sir John Cutler, look upon the prisoner. You shall well and truly try, and true deliverance make between our sovereign lord the king and the prisoner at the bar, whom you shall have in your charge, and a true verdict give according to your evidence. So help you God. And so the rest were sworn. The names of the twelve were these: Sir John Cutler, Michael Arnold, James Partridge, Thomas Cassee, Thomas Gostwick, John Wells, Ambrose Arnold, Rainsford Waterhouse, John Searle, Richard Pagett, William Waite, Arthur Blyth.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, count these. Sir John Cutler.

Crier. One, &c.

Cl. of Cr. Arthur Blyth.

Crier. Twelve good men and true, stand together and hear your evidence; you that are sworn hearken to the record, you that are not sworn stand down.

Cl. of Cr. Samuel Atkins, hold up thy hand (which he did). You that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause. You shall understand that he stands indicted by the name of Samuel Atkins, late of the parish of St. Clement Dane in the county of Middlesex, gentleman; for that he, together with — Welsh, — Le Faire, &c. (prout in the second indictment mutatis mutandis) against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. Upon this Indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial doth put himself upon God and the country, which country you are. Your charge is to enquire whether he be guilty of this felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty. If you find him guilty, you are to inquire what goods and chattels, lands or tenements he had at the time of the felony and murder committed, or at any time since. If you find him not guilty, you are to inquire whether he did fly for the same; and if you find that he fled for it, you are to inquire of his goods and chattels, as if you had found him guilty; if you find him not guilty, nor that he did fly for it, say so and no more, and hear your evidence.

Att. Gen. My lord, I am informed by Mr. Ward of the Crown-office, the prosecutor's clerk, that they have not sued forth a venire facias upon this indictment as principal; and therefore the jury cannot inquire of that at all, but must be discharged of it. Our writ is only for the Indictment for being accessory.

Cl. of Cr. If you make the writ 'de quibusdam felonis et accessariis,' and seal it a-new (which may be done presently, the seal being it the hall), it will do for both.

L. C. J. Do so, then Mr. Ward, that both may be dispatched. [Which was done accordingly.]

Cl. of Cr. Samuel Atkins, hold up thy hand again (which he did). You of the jury, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause. You shall further understand, that he stands indicted by the name of Samuel Atkins, late of the parish of St. Mary le Strand, &c. (prout in the first indictment mutatis mutandis) against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereupon pleaded Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are. Your charge is to inquire whether he be guilty of this felony as accessory to the said Robert Green, &c. or not guilty. If you find him guilty, &c. (sicut antea.) Crier make proclamation.

Crier. O yes! If any man will give evidence on behalf of our sovereign lord the king against Samuel Atkins, the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth, and they shall be heard, for the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance; and all others that are bound by recognizance to give evidence against the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth and give their evidence, or else they forfeit their recognizance.

Serjeant Stringer. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, Samuel Atkins the prisoner at the bar stands indicted here of two facts by two indictments; the one as principal in this murder, the other as accessory. The first of which we shall lay aside, and of his being the murderer give no evidence; and so, gentlemen, you must find him not guilty of that. But as to the indictment as accessory, that sets forth, that whereas Robert Green, Henry Berry, Lawrence Hill, and others, on the 12th of October last, at the parish of St. Mary le Strand, in your county, did make an assault on the person of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and that Robert Green did throw about the neck of sir Edmundbury a linen handkerchief, and twisted and folded it about his neck, by which twisting and folding the said Green did strangle the said sir Edmundbury, of which strangling he instantly died: and we say, gentlemen, that the prisoner at the bar is indicted as one that was privy, knowing, consulting, and abetting to the commission of this murder, and that after the murder committed (for the acts are connected) he did receive, harbour, comfort, and maintain the murderers. To this he hath pleaded Not Guilty. If we prove him guilty, we doubt not you will find him so.

Att. Gen. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of this jury, Mr. Atkins the prisoner is indicted upon two indictments; the one is for being a principal in this murder, but upon that we can give no evidence, for that was preferred before we had that full and plain evidence, which now we have of this fact by the testimony of Mr. Praunce. And I must say thus much to Mr. Atkins, that he hath cause to bless God, that ever Mr. Praunce made this discovery; for I assure you, without that, there are those circumstances, probabilities, and presumptions, that he might have gone in great danger of being accounted a principal in the murder. But now, my lord, that matter being fully and plainly discovered by Mr. Praunce's testimony, that no man may bear a greater burden than he deserves, we acquit him as to that indictment, and now charge him only as accessory. And in that you will find the evidence to be such, as might give us just cause to prefer the first indictment.

For, my lord, we shall make it out, that Mr. Samuel Atkins did come to a gentleman of his own surname, one Mr. Charles Atkins (who I think was of kin to him, but whether he was, or not, is not material), and to him he did complain of the proceedings of sir E. Godfrey, that he was a man too active, and that he was in no sort to be permitted to live; for if he were, he would be very prejudicial to some he was concerned for. And at the same time he did inquire after some bold man, I think one Child particularly, who had been with that Charles Atkins aboard the fleet, whether he had behaved himself stoutly there; and finding him to be a resolute person, he desired Mr. Charles Atkins to send for him, and send him to him, and he would employ him; and afterwards Child owned to Mr. Atkins, that he had been there.

L. C. J. To which Mr. Atkins? To the prisoner?

Att. Gen. To Mr. Charles Atkins, who is the witness, Samuel Atkins is the prisoner. It was Samuel that complained to Charles of sir E. Godfrey; inquiring after the courage and resolution of Child, and ordered Charles to send him thither: and afterwards Child, as he said, went thither; and when he came back he did discourse with Charles Atkins, desiring him to join with them in the killing of a man, and did propose a great reward to him so to do.

This, my lord, was the discourse precedent to the fact. But now to shew to your lordship and the jury, that as the prisoner Samuel Atkins and he did design, the thing should be done, so he did pursue that design, and bear a part in it and was privy to it, and knew of it; we shall prove, that Mr. Bedlow, when he saw the body after it was murdered, which happened, as was proved to you yesterday, on the 12th of October last, found it removed from the place where by the testimony of Mr. Praunce he was first carried, into another room, and there by the help of a dark lantern several people then in the room saw him: Amongst whom, I say, Mr. Bedlow was one; and Mr. Praunce speaks to the same matter, and this was on the Monday night following. And I think we have a sufficient proof that Mr. Samuel Atkins was one in the room, that did see the body, and was consulting with them how to dispose of it: For we have this proof against him. Bedlow finding a young man there, whom he did not know, he went up to him, desiring to know his name; he tells him who he was, one Atkins, and describes himself by a particular circumstance to whom he had relation, and Mr. Bedlow will tell you so much, that though the light was not very great, yet it was enough to let him see the faces of those he took notice of, and that this prisoner was there. And if this be true, it will have the effect of proving him guilty as accessory, either before or after the fact.

This will be the course of our evidence, our witnesses are not many, and therefore our proof will not be long. We shall now call them, and when they have done, submit it to your lordship and the jury; and first we call Mr. Charles Atkins.

Crier. Mr. Charles Atkins, lay your hand upon the book. The evidence which you shall give for our sovereign lord the king against Samuel Atkins, the prisoner at the bar, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; so help you God.

Recorder. My lord, this is Charles Atkins, whom we desire to begin withal. It was he that had the discourse first with Samuel Atkins about Child, and afterwards with Child about the murder. Pray, Sir, tell the discourse you had with Child, and the time when.

C. Atkins. My lord, it was much about the time that his majesty went to Newmarket.

L. C. J. That was in September, I think.

C. Atkins. No, my lord, it was in the beginning of October. I cannot speak to a day, I cannot very well tell that, but it was much about that time. I had been with sir John Williams about the same business that I came to speak with Mr. Atkins about (this gentleman whom I am forced to be witness against on the king's account; but otherwise I have a great regard for him), and coming there I asked the porter below stairs whether Mr. Atkins were in the house.

L. C. J. At what house was it?

C. Atkins. At Derby-house in Channel-row. He said, Yes. So I went up stairs, and found him there all alone in the study, where he generally writes near another study, where was the clerk that usually wrote with him, but he was alone; it was in the afternoon: And after I had spoken to him, I desired him that he would walk out into the other room. And at the window, which is next the door that is to the office, he and I stood talking together. After we had discoursed a little about the plot, he told me, that sir E. Godfrey had very much injured his master; and if he lived would be the ruin of him. And thereupon I have heard that his master was questioned in the House of Commons, asked him whether he were a parliament man, thinking that might be the occasion of their questioning him: No, said he. But then he went off from what we were then discoursing, and he desired me to be secret, and went on upon that account in several particulars, that I cannot now exactly remember. And as we were talking he broke off his discourse short, and asked me if I knew Mr. Child: What Child? said I, He that I used to meet at the Three Tobacco-Pipes? Said he, It is that Child that you recommended to me: For I had recommended such a one to him to be purser of a ship, by the means of one Owen. Said he, Is he a man that is stout, or to be trusted with a secret? Said I, As to his valour I know nothing of it, but he has a very good character. Then said he, When you see him send him to my master; but as for myself, I desire not to have him ask for me when he comes thither. I could not meet Child that night, but I did the next night; and so he said he would go thither. And afterwards I met him again, and he said he had been there, and falling into discourse, he would have engaged me to join in the murder of a man.

L. C. J. What did Child say to you? What is Mr. Atkins's master's name?

C. Atkins. Mr. Pepys.

L. C. J. What Mr. Pepys of the Navy?

C. Atkins. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Had Child been with him?

C. Atkins. My Lord, he told me so.

L. C. J. What did he say when he came from Mr. Pepys?

C. Atkins. He told me nothing of Mr. Pepys, but he would have engaged me to join in the murder of a man. I was then just coming from walking, and met him in Holborn-fields, near the Three Tobacco-Pipes, and he desired me to walk with him, which I was unwilling to do. He told me he had something private to say to me; I told him there was a shed in the back part of the house that was private enough; and thither we went; and I sat with my back to the house, and he with his to the garden. And as soon as the master of the house had brought a pot of ale, he fell into discourse, and told me he believed, that by reason of the necessity of my fortune, and the troubles I lay under, and my want of money, I would undertake a business that might relieve my wants. I replied, any thing that was honourable I would undertake, or that became a gentleman; but to rob on the highway, or any thing of that nature, that was base, I would not do it. He answered me that it was a thing of greater moment than that; he told me it was the killing of a man. I immediately utterly denied to join with him in it; he gave me eight or nine days to consider of it, and I should have a great reward, if I would join with them. I heard of him no more for a considerable while, and then I met him at the Three Cans or the Six Cans, Holborn, and renewing his discourse, he told me, if I would not agree with them to help to murder him, yet if I would conceal it, I should have 100*l.* brought to my chamber; but if I did reveal it, I should not outlive it.

L. C. J. This Child said?

C. Atkins. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Who were them were to be with you, captain Atkins, do you know?

C. Atkins. I do not know, my Lord, he did not tell me who they were.

L. C. J. Pray tell us again: What was the first discourse you had with Mr. Sam. Atkins?

C. Atkins. I came to borrow a little money of him, and it was at the great window in the great room above stairs, the very window next the office where the prisoner writes, and there he began his discourse. We were talking of this plot that was discovered, and something about Coleman, but the particulars I cannot remember, and then he fell into discourse about Sir Edmundbury Godfrey.

L. C. J. What discourse was it?

C. Atkins. That he had injured his master, and if he lived, he would ruin him. I asked him whether he was a member of the House of Commons, because I knew his master had been there questioned for his religion. No, said he; but then he went off from that, which he was then talking of, which was concerning the Plot and sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and asked, if I knew where there was a stout man, and particularly enquired about Child, and bid me send him to his master.

L. C. J. Did he fear Sir Edmundbury Godfrey would ruin his master, by discovering something about the Plot?

C. Atkins. I understood so.

L. C. J. Why, he did not say that his master knew of it, did he?

C. Atkins. No, not to me.

L. C. J. And what did he talk of killing any body?

C. Atkins. No, he did not mention it to me.

L. C. J. Then all that he said to you was, that Sir Edmundbury Godfrey had very much injured his master, and if he lived would ruin him; and then asked, if you knew a man that would be stout and secret, and bid you send him to his master, but not ask for him.

S. Atkins. Pray, Mr. Atkins, will you tell what time that discourse was?

C. Atkins. I cannot tell that exactly. It was two days before Sir John Williams went into the country. It was about the time of the duchess her going beyond sea.

S. Atkins. Was there no body by when we had that discourse?

C. Atkins. There was another in a study hard by, I cannot tell exactly who.

S. Atkins. Do you know his name when you bear it? Was it Mr. Lewis?

C. Atkins. I think it was so, I cannot exactly tell.

L. C. J. What day was it, as near as you can?

C. Atkins. I cannot say what day it was; it was about seven or eight days in October, as I can remember.

L. C. J. You say it was about the time of the Duchess her going over into Holland.

C. Atkins. I think so. I cannot positively remember.

Sol. Gen. Had you any reward offered to you for killing of a man?

C. Atkins. Yes, I had by Child.

S. Atkins. By whom was the reward to be paid?

C. Atkins. He did not tell me.

Att. Gen. Now, my lord, because it seems a strange thing, that Mr. Atkins, who says he is a Protestant, should be engaged in this business, we have a witness here to prove, that he hath been seen often at Somerset-house at Mass, and so he is a party concerned; for those that are of that party, it was their interest to cut him off. And that is this boy. [Pointing to a boy that was then brought in.]

L. C. J. How old are you, child?

Boy. About seventeen.

Just. Wild. Do you know what, if you swear false, will become of you?

Boy. I will not swear false.

Justice Wild. What, if you do swear false, will become of you?

Boy. I shall be damned.

Att. Gen. He is as like to speak truth as another.

S. Atkins. What religion are you of, boy?

Boy. A Protestant.

S. Atkins. Do you know me?

Boy. No.

Justice Wild. Sir, you are too bold with the witnesses.

L. C. J. Swear him.

Att. Gen. Pray hold. My Lord, this is a witness that Mr. Ward brings from below. I have him not in my brief. I desire, before they swear him, that he would give an account whether he knows the prisoner or no.

Boy. No I do not. [And so the boy was carried off, with some expressions of Mr. Attorney's displeasure to Mr. Ward for bringing him in.]

Recorder. My lord, I perceive it was a mistake; it was some body else. We will proceed to other evidence.

Sol. Gen. (Sir Francis Winnington.) We have hitherto gone upon the evidence to prove that Mr. Atkins sought out for a stout man, and when he had found one he thought was for his purpose, he bid him send him to his master. This stout man, Child, would have engaged the other witness in a murder; and it is very probable what that murder was, to wit, the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey; for we shall prove that the prisoner was aiding and assisting to carry off the body. And for this we call Mr. Bedlow.

Then Mr. Bedlow was sworn.

Recorder. Pray, sir, will you tell my lord and the jury, whether you were in the room where the body lay, and in what company you saw it?

Bedlow. Your lordship had an account yesterday, how Le Faire came to acquaint me, that such an one was murdered, and that they intended so and so to dispose of the body. When I came to meet him at Somerset-house, I asked him who were to be concerned in carrying him off. He told me, it was a gentleman, one Mr. Atkins. I thought it might have been this gentleman [pointing to captain Atkins] whom I had known several years since, and so I enquired no further, but remembered he told me so; and when I came into the room, there was a great many there and some of them their faces I did see, I asked a young gentleman whether his name was not Atkins, and he said Yes; then I asked him, if he were Mr. Pepys's clerk. He answered Yes, and added, I have seen you often at my master's house. There was a very little light, and the man was one I was not acquainted with, though I had been often at the house, but could never meet with him, and yet the man said, 'he had seen me often there.' So that it is hard for me to swear that this is he. And now I am upon one gentleman's life, I would not be guilty of a falsehood to take away another's. I do not remember that he was such a person as the prisoner is; as far as I can remember he had a more manly face than he hath, and a beard.

L. C. J. You do well to be cautious, Mr. Bedlow.

Justice Wild. Pray, what store of people were there?

Bedlow. I believe there were seven or eight. Some there were that I knew.

L. C. J. Who were those?

Bedlow. Le Faire and Praunce. I remember very well, I asked Mr. Atkins this question, are you Mr. Pepys's clerk? He said yes: I have seen you often at my master's house.

L. C. J. And that was all the discourse you had with him?

Bedlow. Yes, for I was but a very little while there.

L. C. J. But you cannot charge the prisoner to be him?

Bedlow. I do think he had a more manly face than the prisoner has, and a beard.

L. C. J. So you think it rather was not he, than it was he?

Bedlow. I cannot say it was he? nor I could not at first. I did not know but it might be some one that did assume his person to put me off.

Justice Wild. Mr. Bedlow, pray let me ask you one question. Did you never know of any design to murder Sir E. Godfrey, till Le Faire spoke to you to carry him off?

Bedlow. I knew not till I saw him murdered. They told me I should help to carry off the body of one that was murdered, but I could not imagine whom.

L. C. J. But you knew that they were to murder a man?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, but I knew not whom.

Justice Wild. But you were appointed to innuate yourself into sir E. Godfrey's acquaintance?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord.

Justice Wild. And upon what errands were you sent?

Bedlow. To take out warrants for the peace.

Justice Wild. And did you take out any?

Bedlow. Yes, against some persons, and there were none such.

Recorder. Now, if your lordship pleases, I desire Mr. Bedlow to let us know, whether he did ask the person that said he was Mr. Atkins any other questions?

Bedlow. No, I did not.

Recorder. How came you to ask him no other questions, but only whether he were Mr. Pepys's clerk?

Bedlow. Because I never heard of any of that name, but he and this gentleman [pointing to captain Atkins], whom I know very well, and I could not tell but it might be he.

L. C. J. Here is the thing. Le Faire told him one Atkins should help him to carry the body off; and when he came into the room, that person told him his name was Mr. Atkins, and then he asked if he were Mr. Pepys's clerk for he could not tell but that it was Charles Atkins.

Recorder. We have another reason, my lord, for the asking that question. Pray what discourse had you about any commission?

Bedlow. I had often been with captain Ford at Mr. Pepys's about his commission, and I had often desired to speak with Mr. Pepys or Mr. Atkins his clerk, but I could never find either of them at home; and therefore when I met that young gentleman there, I asked him whether he were Pepys's man and he said yes. I asked him if he knew me, and he told me yes. I had been often at his master's house with captain Ford, but I had never seen Mr. Atkins.

Recorder. What did he tell you besides?

Bedlow. That was all the discourse we had.

Sol. Gen. Did you ever hear of any other Atkins that lived with Mr. Pepys?

Bedlow. No, none at all. And the same testimony I give now, I gave at the first. And my lord, I could not be positive before the lords of the committee, and I cannot be positive now.

Att. Gen. Indeed he was never positive at the first. Now, my lord, if you please, we will call a witness to prove, that that day, when this was supposed to be done, Mr. Samuel Atkins had bespoke a dinner at Mount Horeb, but he had some other business, and did not come, and lost the price of a good dinner. Pray swear Thomas Walton. [Which was done.]

Recorder. Pray, sir, what can you say?

Walton. As to the body of the cause, I have nothing to say. I have not seen Mr. Atkins these two years; but there having been some friendship between us, I had a mind to see him, and sent a particular friend to desire him to appoint a meeting.

L. C. J. When?

Walton. At Mount Horeb.

Att. Gen. My lord doth not ask where, but when, at what time?

Walton. At two of the clock.

Att. Gen. What day?

Walton. The 19th of October.

L. C. J. How come you to remember the day?

Walton. I will tell you my reason, my lord. When I heard that this gentleman was in this unhappy affair, I said, How much better had it been for him to have been in my company, that I might have vouched for him? But you [pointing to the prisoner] did appoint, you know, sir, to meet me. And I took cognizance of this affair speaking to a particular friend.

L. C. J. How long after this?

Walton. When the tidings were, he was taken prisoner.

Att. Gen. A great while ago, my lord,

L. C. J. How long after sir E. Godfrey was murdered?

Att. Gen. About a fortnight.

L. C. J. Was there a dinner bespoke?

Walton. I bespoke one for him; he knew nothing of it.

Att. Gen. Did he appoint to be there that day?

Walton. Yes, he did. I think he will not deny it.

Att. Gen. Did you send a messenger to him?

Walton. Yes, I did.

Att. Gen. What answer had you?

Walton. He brought me word, he would come at two of the clock to me.

Att. Gen. Did you bespeak the dinner for him, and did you pay for it?

Walton. I never gave him any account what was to be for dinner.

Att. Gen. But let this evidence go as far as it will. This gentleman had a mind to meet him; sent a messenger to him to meet him; he appointed at two o'clock; and he bespoke a dinner for him, but he came not. Now we use it thus. I desire to know of him, when was the message sent? How long before that day? or was it the day before?

Walton. It was a week before.

Att. Gen. What day before?

Walton. It was a week before.

Att. Gen. Can you remember what day?

Walton. I do not, for I had no dissatisfaction because he did not come.

S. Atkins. Will your lordship give me leave to ask him one question? I own, sir, you sent to me by a school-fellow, about a week before, and desired me to appoint a day to meet you, and I appointed this day, and that for this reason; I knew my master would be then out of town, and so I thought I could conveniently meet you; but it being ten days before, I entirely forgot it; but can prove by several witnesses where I did dine that day, which I desire may be called. But now, my lord, this gentleman is upon his oath, who is a protestant, and was my school-master, I desire him to declare whether I was bred a protestant, or no; and whether my friends were so or no?

L. C. J. How was he bred, sir?

Walton. He was bred up in the protestant religion, my lord.

L. C. J. Were his father and mother protestants?

Walton. Yes, my lord, they were so, and I know them very well.

S. Atkins. Pray, sir, declare whether I was not only bred a protestant, but whether I was not so also when I left your school?

Walton. Yes, my lord, he was always a protestant, and a very zealous one too.

L. C. J. There is very much in that.

Justice Wild. Where is this Mount Horeb?
Recorder. It is in Pudding-lane, at one Mr. Appleby's.

L. C. J. Well, have you any thing more, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. No, my lord, I have no more to say, till I hear what defence the prisoner makes.

L. C. J. Then, Mr. Atkins, you have liberty to defend yourself.

S. Atkins. My lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, I hope I shall in my defence proceed very offensively towards God and towards this Court. First, towards God (before whom I am, in whose presence I must appear, and before whom I can protest my innocence as to what is charged upon me), in that I shall declare nothing but what is true: And towards this Court in the next place, because I intend to deliver myself with all the respect and submission to it that becomes a prisoner. My lord, this gentleman, Mr. Atkins who hath brought this accusation against me, is a man whom I have kept from perishing, I suppose he will own it himself; I petitioned, solicited for him, and was instrumental in getting him out of prison, for a fact which I shall by and by tell you. And though this, my lord, may seem against me, yet by and by—

L. C. J. Hold, you mistake, Mr. Atkins, he does you no mischief at all, for he saith no more than that he hath been discoursing with you about the plot, and you said sir Edmund-bury Godfrey had very much injured your master; and that you desired to know if he were acquainted with a stout man; and asked particularly of Mr. Child, and bid him send him to your master; and he said afterwards, he had been there, and would have engaged him to join in a murder. All which is nothing to the purpose.

S. Atkins. But I never had any such discourse with him my lord.

L. C. J. If you had, or had not, it is no matter: you need not labour your defence as to any thing he says.

S. Atkins. I protest before God Almighty, I know nothing of it.

Justice Dollen. But what say you to Mr.

Bedlow's testimony; Did you see the body of sir E. Godfrey at Somers-t: House?

S. Atkins. No my lord; I am so far from that, that in all my life I was never in the house.

L. C. J. Then call a couple of witnesses to prove where you were that Monday night, the 14th of October, and you need not trouble yourself any further.

S. Atkins. There is captain Vittles, and his whole company.

L. C. J. Can any of these say where you were the 14th of October? If they can, a couple of them is enough. Who is this?

Atkins. This is the captain, my lord.

L. C. J. What is your name?

Capt. Vittles. My name is Vittles.

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Atkins the prisoner?

Vittles. Yes, very well.

L. C. J. How long have you known him?

Vittles. These 14 years.

L. C. J. Can you tell where he was the 14th of October?

Vittles. I can tell by several circumstances, that your lordship shall understand, that I do remember the day.

L. C. J. Why, you cannot tell what day of the week it was?

Vittles. Yes, I can, it was of a Monday.

L. C. J. Where was he on a Monday?

Vittles. The king was pleased to command me to go to Antwerp, to carry over some officers of the king's to the garrison; I returned back the 6th of October, which was Sunday.

Justice Jones. How come you to remember the days so exactly?

L. C. J. Mariners are very exact and punctual; they keep accounts of every day, and have journals of all passages.

Vittles. Ay, my lord, and I have it here in my pocket: The 6th day I arrived at Greenwich, which was sabbath day, and that day I would not come ashore, but I let it alone while Monday, which was the 7th day; then my lord I went and appeared, and gave an account to the Secretary of what I had done, according to my instructions, to see whether he had any further service to command me. At present the Secretary told me, No; so I told him I would go down to the Yatch, and wait his majesty's commands; and there I staid till Thursday; and on Friday the Secretary, I think, was going out of town to Newmarket, and so I could receive no orders from him, but was to stay till he came back. On the Monday following I came up about eleven of the clock, and I met with Mr. Atkins at the office he had at his master's the Secretary's; said I, I am glad you are at home; and; said he, I am glad you are not gone, for there are a couple of gentlemen that desire to see a yatch, and if you will go down I will come down too, and bring down my friends by and by: Said I, I am glad I am in a way to serve you, and you shall be welcome to what I have. So I disappointed two or three friends that I had appointed to meet at Billingsgate, that I might get my boat ready. When I came aboard, I ordered my men to clean it, and I got ready some provisions, such as I had : But in the mean time my young lord Berkeley and his men came to see the yacht in the afternoon, where she lay then at Greenwich, over against the college ; and I being glad of such a gentleman's company, entertained him with a bottle or two of wine, and what the ship would afford, and when he went away, I fired five guns. And when he was gone, I was walking upon deck ; and I wonder, said I to my men who were with me, that Mr. Atkins doth not come ; he told me he would be here with some friends ; I will go a-shore if he does not come quickly. And so, if it shall like your honour, I stayed an hour longer ; and, said I, if he doth not come in half an hour, I will go a-shore and I was ready to go, when I saw a boat at a distance, and then said, I will stay for I believe that is the boat ; and it proved so. It was two of the clock when my lord went away, and it was then half an hour past four, or thereabouts. So when he came a-board his two friends came a-board with him, and went down into the cabin, and drank a glass of wine, such as we had ; and the wine being good and just come from beyond seas, we drank till seven of the clock, and I would not let them go. Then said he, I will not keep the boat upon charge here. No, you need not, said I, my boat shall see you a-shore. So he discharged the boat, which was, I say, about seven o'clock, and so about eight or nine o'clock we had drunk till we were a little warm ; and the wine drinking pretty fresh, and being with our friends, we did drink freely, till it was indeed unseasonable : I must beg your lordships pardon, but so it was ; and at half an hour past ten, I ordered my men to go off with the boat of four oars, that belonged to the yacht, and that would go much swifter than any other boats, and I put him into the boat very much fuddled. Now, my lord, away goes he, with four of my men (they are here), and I ordered them, pray, said I, put a-shore Mr. Atkins and his friends where they will go a-shore. So I went to sleep when he was gone ; and the next day in the morning, when the boat came aboard, said I, where did you put a-shore Mr. Atkins and the two gentlewomen ? At Billingsgate, said they. Why so, said I ? Which way would they get home ? for I knew Mr. Atkins was very much in drink. Why, said they, the tide was so strong at the bridge, that we could not get through with our boat. Now it flowed that same night till twelve minutes past ten ; so that it must be near half an hour past ten when they went away.

Justice Wild. What, it flowed there at past ten ?

Vittles. Yes, it did.

L. C. J. Mr. Bedlow, what time of the night was it that you were at Somerset-house ?

Bedlow. It was betwixt nine and ten.

L. C. J. He was on shipboard then.

Justice Wild. He was very sober, that you spoke withal, was not he ?

Bedlow. Yes, very sober, my lord.

L. C. J. Then call another witness, one of your men, and we have done.

Vittles. Give the word for the boatswain Tribbett.

L. C. J. Did the women pledge you captain ?

Vittles. Pledge me, my lord.

L. C. J. Ay, did they drink with you ?

Vittles. Ay, and drink to us too, my lord.

L. C. J. Those be your men that stand there ? [He, and several other of the ship's company were there.] Whither did you carry Mr. Atkins when your captain commanded you to set him ashore ?

Tribbett. To Billingsgate.

L. C. J. What time of night came you there ?

Tribbett. At half past eleven.

L. C. J. What time did you carry him from the yacht ?

Tribbett. It was about half an hour past ten o'clock.

L. C. J. What day of the week was it ?

Tribbett. It was on a Monday.

L. C. J. Well, you need not trouble yourselves any more.

Att. Gen. My lord, in this matter, it is in vain to contend in a fact that is plain. But I would desire (because some perhaps will make an ill use of it) that they would please to take notice, here is no disproving the king's evidence. For Mr. Bedlow did not at first, nor doth he now, charge him directly to be the man : so that whoever reports, That the king's evidence is disproved, will raise a very false rumour.

L. C. J. No, no ; it is so much otherwise, that for all he hath said herein, he is the more to be credited in his testimony ; and Mr. Atkins needed not to make any defence, but must have come off without any, upon what Mr. Bedlow says for him.

Att. Gen. So likewise for the first man, all that he says consists together, and may be true, and yet Mr. Atkins innocent.

L. C. J. So it may.

Att. Gen. I desire the company may not go away with a mistake, as if the king's evidence were disproved.

L. C. J. Not in a tittle.

Att. Gen. Then I have done, my lord.

L. C. J. No, I will tell you how it did arise. It arose from the jealousy of the murder of sir E. Godfrey, and persons were willing to lay hold on any opportunity to find it out. And Mr. Bedlow was told such a man should be his fellow to help him to carry away the body ; and hearing of such a name, thought it possible it might be such a one ; and he owning himself to bear that name, and to be Mr. Pepys's clerk, when he gave in his information, the people, who were put into such alarms as these, were very ready to catch at it. Therefore no body was to blame for pursuing Bedlow's evidence. He said nothing then, but what he says now, and that is nothing at all positive, which is all true, and yet Mr. Atkins doth appear to be a very innocent man in this matter.

Then the Jury consulted together at the bar, and agreed.

Cl. of the Cr. Gentlemen, are you all agreed on your verdict?

Omnes. Yes.

Cl. of the Cr. Who shall speak for you?

Omnes. Our Foreman.

Cl. of the Cr. Samuel Atkins, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] Look upon him. How say you; is he Guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. Did he fly for it?

Foreman. Not that we know of.

S. Atkins. God bless the king, and this honourable bench. [On his knees.]

Cl. of the Cr. Samuel Atkins, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] Look upon the prisoner. How say you, is he Guilty of the felony, as accessory to the murder, as he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. Did he fly for it?

Foreman. Not that we know of.

S. Atkins. God bless the king and this honourable bench. [On his knees.]

Cl. of the Cr. Then hearken to your verdict, as the Court hath recorded it. You say, that Samuel Atkins is not guilty of the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted; nor that he did fly for it. And you say that he is not guilty, as accessory to the felony and murder whereof he stands indicted, nor that he did fly for the same; and so you say all?

Omnes. Yes.

L. C. J. Mr. Atkins, I should have been very glad that the rest, who have been condemned, had been as innocent as you are; and I do assure you, I wish all mankind had been innocent. For, if any Protestant had been guilty of such a thing as this, it would have grieved me to the very heart, that any Protestant should do such things, as those priests provoke their proselytes to at this day.

Capt. Vittles. My lord, here is his schoolmaster will give your lordship an account how he was bred and brought up, and what a good conditioned young man he was.

L. C. J. Well, well, captain, go you and drink a bottle with him.

Then Mr. Atkins went from the bar.

249. The Trial of DAVID LEWIS, a Jesuit, (pretended Bishop of Llandaff), at Monmouth Assizes, for High Treason: 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679. [Written by Himself.]

THE 28th of March, 1679, the assizes began at Monmouth, sir Robert Atkins being sole judge. A grand jury of gentlemen was returned by the sheriff, and called, against several of whom Mr. Arnold and Mr. Price excepted, and so put by, as such they conceived might befieund me; a challenge not known before; for in the case between the marquis of Worcester, and the tenants of Wentwood, upon a riot, Henry Williams, esq. and others would have excepted against some of that grand-jury, the same judge Atkins then positively said, It was ridiculous and not usual to challenge out of a grand-jury. At last a jury was sworn, and an indictment drawn up against me, upon the statute of the 27th Eliz. and preferred to the grand-jury. That evening, being Friday, I was arraigned upon that bill, to which I pleaded Not guilty. The next day, about ten of the clock in the morning, the judge came from the Nisi prius side, and sat at the crown side, and I at the same time being brought to the bar, the crier made proclamation for silence, that a jury for life and death might be impannelled, and I made my challenges; presently a jury from the other bar was called, which was not usual, and I to challenge, the judge telling me, I might challenge without hindrance; by guess I challenged three; but out of that Nisi prius jury called to the crown bar, and that by Mr. Arnold's own suggestion, who had a strong influence upon the judge as being his kinsman, and sitting at his right hand, divers were excepted by Mr. Arnold; whereupon, to make up the jury, the judge commanded the high-sheriff to call in some, and he called many, and of those, still Mr. Arnold excepted, as either being of my neighbourhood, or acquaintance, for there being many in the country; the sheriff seeing so many of his calling excepted, he desired Mr. Arnold himself should call whom he pleased; whereat the judge checked the sheriff, and he said he was saucy: at last, with much difficulty, a jury was impannelled, a jury now contrived, of none but such as pleased Mr. Arnold, principal prosecutor against me, which was very hard, and an ignorant jury it was withal: the jury being impannelled, it was sworn, the indictment read, and witnesses called, thus:

Clerk of the Assizes. David Lewis, hold up thy hand. Here thou standest indicted of high-treason, by the name of David Lewis, for that thou, being a natural subject of the king of England, hast passed beyond seas, and hast taken orders from the Church and See of Rome, and hast returned back again into England, and continued upwards of forty days, contrary to the statute 27 Eliz. in that case made and provided, which by the said statute is high-treason. What hast thou to say for thyself? Art thou Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Prisoner. Not Guilty.

Clerk. By whom wilt thou be tried?

Prisoner. By God and my country.

Clerk. God send thee a good deliverance.

Clerk. Crier, call William Price, Dorothy James, Maney Trott, John James, Catharine Thomas. He calls them, and they all appear. Then says the clerk to the crier, swear them: and he sware them all.

Judge. (Sir Robert Atkins.) William Price, look on the prisoner, do you know him?

Price. Yes, my lord, I do know him.

Judge. What have you to say of him?

Price. My lord, about a year and a half ago I saw him at Mrs. Bartlet's house, at a place called Castle-Morton in Worcestershire, and there I heard him read Mass, I was at confession with him, and I received the Sacrament from him, according to that way.

Judge. Was there any altar, or any crucifixes or copes?

Price. Yes, my lord, that there were.

Judge. How many times did you see him?

Price. But that once, my lord.

Judge. Were you of that way then?

Price. Yes, my lord, upwards of 18 years.

Judge. What are you now?

Price. A Protestant, my lord.

Judge. Well, Mr. Lewis, what have you to say to this?

Prisoner. With your lordship's leave, I will answer all together.

Judge. Very good, you do well, it will be so much the shorter. Dorothy James, look on the prisoner, do you know him?

Dorothy. Yes, my lord.

Judge. What have you to say of him?

Dorothy. My lord, I saw him say Mass, take confessions, give the Sacrament, marry, christen, and heard him preach in the English and Welch.

Judge. Were there altars and crucifixes?

Dorothy. Yes, my lord, altars, crucifixes, chalice, and such other things belonging to that way.

Arnold. Did you see him give that they call Extreme Unction?

Dorothy. Yes, that I did, to my uncle, my father's brother.

Judge. Do you know what Extreme Unction is?

Dorothy. Yes, that I do, it is anointing sick people with oil, when they are dying.

Judge. It is right; that is another Sacrament of their church, grounding themselves upon these words of St. James, as I take it, 'If any be sick among you, let him be anointed.' But that was in the times of miracles only.

Arnold. Did he take upon him to free souls from purgatory?

Dorothy. Yes, that he did, and he had of me eight pounds in silver, and one piece of gold, to free my father's soul.

Prisoner. God is my witness, to my best knowledge, I never had one single piece of any money from her or her husband, upon any account whatsoever.

Judge. Have you any more to say?

Dorothy. No, my lord. [And with that she laughed at the bar.]

Judge. How now, woman! do you make a laughing-game of it? Carry yourself more modest, for the gentleman is for his life, and it is no jesting matter. Well, William James, look upon the prisoner. Do you know the prisoner? and what have you to say of him?

Wm. James. Yes, my lord, I do know him, and I have seen him read Mass many times, and take confessions, and give the Sacrament, and christen, and marry.

Judge. Have you any more to say?

Wm. James. No, my lord.

Judge. Mr. Trott, what have you to say of the prisoner? Did you ever hear him read Mass? Was he reputed commonly a Jesuit, or Popish priest?

Trott. Yes, my lord, he was commonly reputed so, and I heard him often read Mass; and I saw him marry Mr. Gunter's daughter to Mr. Body.

Judge. Were you then of that religion?

Trott. No, my lord, I was deluded by my wife out of the Protestant religion, and was a Papist during her life-time.

Judge. Are you of that religion still?

Trott. No, my lord. When I saw their wicked designs to kill my gracious king, I abhorred their traitorous proceedings, and left them, and am now a Protestant, in which I shall continue.

Judge. You do well.

Arnold. My lord, there is Mr. Roger Sayes, a very material witness.

Judge. Crier, swear him. Mr. Sayes, what have you to say against the prisoner?

Sayes. My lord, I was employed with others, on the 16th of November last, to go and search for him, and we found him, and took him, with several Popish things, which we carried away, &c.

Judge. Did you see him at Mass?

Sayes. No, my lord.

Judge. Then sit down. What have you to say, John James? What, are you dead, or afraid to be whipt? Look upon me, and speak out.

John James. He married me and my wife.

Judge. Is that all you know? Did you see him at Mass?

John James. I know no more.

Judge. Catharine Thomas, did you see him at Mass? Why do not you speak, woman? Speak, woman.

C. Thomas. Yes. I have no more to say, do what you please with me.

Arnold. My lord, there is one Cornelius in Court, I see him, who was clerk.

Judge. Crier, call him, swear him. Well, Cornelius, did you ever see the prisoner at Mass?

Cornelius. I am an ignorant fellow, I know not what Mass is.

Wm. James. My lord, he was his clerk.

Cornelius. No, I was his servant.

Judge. Well, sit down. Mr. Lewis, now what have you to say to all these witnesses, for yourself?

Prisoner. My lord, my Indictment was, That being a natural subject of the king of England, I was ordained beyond the seas, by a jurisdiction derived from the Sec of Rome, and returned back again into England, &c. contrary to the statute in that case made and provided, 27 Eliz. Under your lordship's favour, I conceive that there has not been here any one witness, who hath proved the Indictment, or any part thereof.

Judge. What then? Do you expect we shall search the Records at Rome, or should bring persons to prove, that they saw you ordained there? No, Sir; it is enough that you have exercised the function of a priest, in copes and vestments used in your church, and that you have read Mass, taken confessions, given absolutions, married, and christened; if all this will not make you a priest, what will? I have tried several Popish priests, but never met with so full a proof as this now.

Prisoner. All these things supposed proved, will not make me a priest, unless proved to be performed by me, as one ordained beyond the seas, by the jurisdiction derived from the See of Rome; for the very ministry of the Church of England take special confessions, and give formal absolutions; many, in case of necessity, christen, though no priests; and lately, the country knows it, one, no Popish priest, solemnly married a couple; neither can one prove to have seen me read Mass, unless it be proved first, that I was ordained beyond the seas, by a jurisdiction derived from the See of Rome; for, no such ordination, no priest; and, no priest, no Mass.

Judge. To disprove all these witnesses, by saying, it cannot be proved you were ordained beyond the seas, by a jurisdiction derived from the See of Rome, is as much as that saying, Bellarmine, thou liest.

Prisoner. My lord, were it proved that I read Mass, that were not treason in me, for I am informed, that it were but the forfeiture of 200 marks, by a statute of 29 Eliz.

Judge. It is true, who hears Mass, forfeits 100 marks. But he that uses to read it, commits treason: but these are the tricks of you all, yet all will not do: have you any thing else to say?

Prisoner. With your lordship's leave, now I desire to speak something to the evidence of every particular witness.

Judge. Speak then.

Prisoner. My lord, as to the first witness, Price; as I hope to be saved, to the best of my memory, I never saw him, till this very day before. I never knew or heard before now of that Mrs. Bartlet, or of that place Castle Morton; I never was in that place all my life-time; nay, I never was in Worcestershire, or in any house in Worcestershire, but twice, the last time whereof was about five years ago; and that was but at my inn in Worcester town, where, with a servant, I alighted, bespake my supper, went to the coffee-house, drank two dishes of coffee, read the Gazette, returned to my inn again, supped, went to bed, next morning bought some few books at the stationers, dined, took horse, returned home again: This is all the being I ever was in Worcestershire.

Judge. Look upon him, do you know him?

Price. Yes, my lord, he is the man.

Judge. Have you any more to say?

Prisoner. Yes, my lord. Mr. Trot was married to a kinswoman of mine, and she was a considerable fortune to him, which he having spent very idly, and she dying, he went to London, where finding an employment at Court, and there having done some unhandsome things, he was banished the court, and now lives upon the charity of gentlemen and friends for his bread; so that with good reason it may be believed, it is rather poverty and hope of gain, than any thing else, that brings him here to accuse me.

Judge. 'Paupertas ad turpia cogit.' Little gentleman, [he was a dwarf,] what can you say to this?

Trot. My lord, I was over with the king, and he commanded me to attend him at Whitehall on his Restoration, where I came when I returned, and I was received into his service, but was never banished the court, only I came away upon discontent, and still I may go there when I please: My lord, I am desirous to do my king and country good service, but I am in danger of my life amongst them, and must look to myself.

Judge. Ay, Mr. Trot, have a care of yourself, you do well. Mr. Lewis, have you any more to say for yourself?

Prisoner. My lord, Dorothy James and William James her husband, their evidence is grounded upon plain malice, and that malice thus grounded: They pretending I owed them money, they sued me in Chancery; but after a considerable charge at law, finding themselves not like so to prevail, then they fell to threatening me, that they would have me in hand, that they would make me repent, that she would never give over to prosecute against me, till she had washed her hands in my heart's blood, and made pottage of my head.

Judge. Can you prove that?

Prisoner. Yes, my lord, that I can.

Judge. Call your witnesses then.

Prisoner. Crier, call Richard Jones, Anne Williams, Anne James, and Cath. Cornelius.

Judge. What can you say, Richard Jones?

Richard Jones. I heard William James say, he would make Mr. Lewis repent.

Judge. Anne Williams, what can you say?

Anne Williams. I heard from several persons, that Dorothy James said to several persons, in and about Carlton, that she would wash her hands in Mr. Lewis's blood, and that she would have his head to make pottage of, as of a sheep's head.

Catharine Cornelius. My lord, and I heard the same.

Judge. Anne James, what can you say?

Anne James. I heard Dorothy James swear, that she would wash her hands in Mr. Lewis's heart's blood.

Judge. Where did you hear her say so?

Anne James. I heard her say so in her own house, at the fire-side, when I lived with her.

Judge. Well, Mr. Lewis, all this will not do, all will not excuse you from being a priest; or were you a hypocrite?

Prisoner. My lord, I am a native of this country.

Judge. What, of this country?

Prisoner. Yes, my lord, of this country; and those years I lived in this country, I lived with the reputation of an honest man, amongst all honest gentlemen and neighbours.

Judge. Well, Mr. Lewis, have you any more to say?

Prisoner. My lord, Mr. Sayes was sworn witness against me, I desire to ask him one question.

Judge. Do so.

Prisoner. Mr. Sayes, when you took me, was there a justice of peace with you, at taking of me?

Sayes. No.

Prisoner. My lord, with this opportunity I humbly beg leave to clear myself from a foul aspersion, wherewith I am calumniated over the whole nation, in a printed pamphlet, which pamphlet I can here produce; and wherein there is not one line of truth. For it says at the end of it, that I was taken by a justice of peace and others, in a place cunningly contrived under a clay-floor, which Mr. Sayes knows to be untrue; and whereas it alledges, That I cheated a poor woman of 30*l.* to redeem her father's soul out of purgatory, the pamphlet names neither the woman, nor her husband, nor her father, nor the place nor time, when nor where.

Judge. Does it not?

Prisoner. No, my lord; so that the whole pamphlet is one entire lie, devised by some foolish malice.

Judge. Mr. Lewis, I, for my part, do not believe it to be true. Have you any more to say?

Prisoner. No more, my lord.

Judge. Then withdraw and repose. Gentlemen of the Jury, here he stands indicted, &c. [And summed up the whole evidence.] If you believe what the witnesses swore, you must find the prisoner Guilty of High Treason; you have heard what was proved against him, therefore go together.

Prisoner. My lord, before the Jury go, I desire to speak something, which now occurs unto me, and is material against the evidence of Price.

Judge. Jury, stay.

Prisoner. This very morning that Price came to my chamber, with the gaoler (it seems it was to view me), he took a turn about the room, all the time eyeing me; at his going out, he was asked by the gaoler, whether I was the man he meant? and he answered, If I was he, I was much changed, and if I was he, I had black short curled hair.

Judge. Can you prove that?

Prisoner. Yes, my lord.

Judge. Where are your witnesses?

Prisoner. Crier, call Elizabeth Jones and Charles Edwards.

Judge. Woman, what can you say to this?

Eliz. Jones. My lord, Price this morning, after he had viewed the gentleman in his chamber, as he was going out he said, If he be the man, he is much changed, and hath black curled short hair; which is not so.

Judge. Charles Edwards, what can you say?

Edwards. I heard Price say the same words she relates.

Judge. Where is Price? Crier, call him. But he was not to be found, being gone out of the hall. (This was the trick of Coleman, to asperse the witnesses.)

[Here the Jury went out, and immediately returned again.]

Clerk. Are you agreed of your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. Foreman.

Clerk. David Lewis, hold up thy hand. Do you find the prisoner Guilty, or Not Guilty?

Jury. Guilty.

Judge. Have you any more to say?

Prisoner. No more, my lord.

Clerk. David Lewis, hold up thy hand.

Judge. Give me my cap. David Lewis, thou shalt be led from this place, to the place from whence thou camest, &c. [As usual in Cases of High Treason.] So the Lord have mercy on thy soul.

Then I made a bow to the Judge, and the Court arose.

Afterwards, August 27, 1679, he was executed according to the Sentence, at Uske in Monmouthshire, where he spake as follows:

“Here is a numerous assembly, I see; the great Saviour of the world save every soul of you all; I believe you are here met not only to see a fellow-native die, but also with expectation to hear a dying fellow-native speak. If you expected it not, at least I intended it, I hope the favour will not be denied me, it being a favour so freely granted to several late dying persons in London itself. I shall endeavour to speak inoffensively; I hope the same favour will not be denied me.

“Let none of you suffer as a murderer or a thief, but if as a Christian, let him not be ‘ashamed:’ Saint Peter’s words, 1 Peter iv. 15, 16. I hope by God’s holy spirit now whispered to my memory, and that to my abundant consolation; for I suffer not as a murderer, thief, or such-like malefactor, but as a Christian, and therefore am not ashamed.

“I distinguish two sorts of life on earth, life-moral and life-natural; life-moral is that by which we live with good repute in the esteem of other men of integrity; life-natural is that by which we breathe; in the first sort or kind, I thank God I have suffered lately, and exceedingly, when maliciously, falsely, and most injuriously, I was branded for a public cheat, in pamphlet, in ballad, on stage, and that in the head city of the kingdom, yea, and over the whole nation, to the huge and great detriment of my good name, which I always was as tender of, as the other I am now quitting.

The pamphletical story, believe my dying words, had no truth in it, neither to substance, nor circumstance of the thing; a story so false, that I could have easily defied the face that had attempted to justify it to my face; so sordid a business, a story so ridiculous, that I wonder how any sober Christian, at least who knew me, could as much as incline to believe so open an improbability; who that Protestant young man there mentioned was, I know not; who that Popish young woman; who the father dead a year and a half before; in what county, what parish, were all transacted, I know not, none of all these there particularized; and when in the face of the country at last Lent-assizes, I vindicated my innocency herein, to the satisfaction of the then Judge himself, why appeared not there then some one to make good the charge, and disable my defence? But none of this offered; a plain demonstration to all candid minds, the whole was a mere fiction of some malicious person against me: God forgive them or him, I heartily do. How forward my endeavours always have been to my power to relieve the poor, and not directly to defraud them, impartial neighbours that know me can tell you; besides this, during my nine months imprisonment, several foul and false aspersions were cast out against me, and that by those unto whom, for full thirty years, I had been charitably serviceable: God forgive them, I heartily do. Yet notwithstanding all these calumniation, I hope I still retain the character of an honest man amongst gentlemen of worth, with whom I conversed, and with all neighbours of honesty, with and amongst whom I lived.

And now I am parting with the other life by which I breathe, behold that within these few moments of time is to unbreathe me; but why thus sledged to this country Tyburn? Why this so untimely death of mine? Have patience, and I'll tell you; not for any plotting, I assure you; and what I shall now say, as to that, God is my witness, I shall speak without any equivocation, mental reservation, or palliation of truth whatsoever.

By all that is sacred in heaven and earth, I here solemnly protest, that I am as innocent from any plot whatever against his majesty's person or government, as the infant that left the mother's womb but yesterday; neither did I ever hear or know any thing directly or indirectly of any such plot, till public fame had spread it over the country between Michaelmas and All-Saints day last: This is true, as God shall judge and save my soul; neither was there any guilt of any such black crime found in me by Mr. Oates, Mr. Bedlow, Mr. Dugdale and Mr. Praunce, when by them I was strictly examined on that point, last May, in Newgate, London; nay, had I had the least knowledge or hint of such plot, I had been as zealously nimble in the discovery of it, as any the most loyal subject his majesty hath in his three kingdoms; wherefore, when I am dead and gone, if some malevolent give out, I lose my life for plotting, by charity strive to disengage him of his mistake; do that right to my dead ashes.

I was never taught that doctrine of king-killing; from my soul I detest and abhor it as execrable and directly opposite to the principles of the religion I profess; what that is, you shall know by and by; it being the positive definition of the council of Coustance, That it is damnable for any subject, or private person, or any subjects in council joined, to murder his or their lawful king or prince, or use any public or clandestine conspiracy against him, though the said king or prince were a Turk, apostate, persecutor, yea or a tyrant in government; Never tell me of Clement the murderer of Henry the 3d of France; never tell me of Ravillac, murderer of Henry the 4th of France, they did so, but wickedly they did so, and for it they were punished to severity, as malefactors; and for it, to this very day, are stigmatized by all Roman catholics, for very miscreants, and villains. I hope you will not charge the whole Roman catholic body with the villainies of some few desperadoes: By that rule, all christianity must be answerable for the treason of Judas; for my part, I always loved my king, I always honoured his person, and I daily prayed for his prosperity; and now, with all unfeigned cordiality, I say it, God bless my gracious king and lawful prince, Charles 2, King of England, and Prince of Wales, God bless him temporally and eternally, God preserve him from all his real enemies, God direct him in all his councils, that may tend to the greater glory of the same great God; and whatever late plot hath been, or is, the Father of lights bring it to light, the contrivers of it, and the actors in it, that such may be brought to their condign punishment, and innocence preserved.

But why again this untimely death? My religion is the Roman catholic religion, in it I have lived above this forty years, in it I now die; and so fixedly die, that if all the good things in this world were offered me to renounce it, all should not move me one hair's breadth from my Roman catholic faith; a Roman catholic I am, a Roman catholic priest I am, a Roman catholic priest of that religious order called the Society of Jesus I am; and I bless God who first called me; and I bless the hour in which I was first called both unto faith and function.

Please now to observe, I was condemned for reading mass, hearing confessions, administering the sacraments, anointing the sick, christening, marrying, preaching: As for reading the mass, it was the old, and still is, the accustomed and laudable liturgy of the holy church; and all the other acts, which are acts of religion, tending to the worship of God; and for this dying, I die for religion. Moreover know, that when last May I was in London under examination concerning the plot, a prime examinant told me, that to save my life and increase my fortunes, I must make some discovery of the plot, or conform; discover plot I could not, for I knew of none; conform I would not, because it was against my conscience; then by consequence I must die, and so now dying, I die for conscience and religion; and dying upon such good scores, as far as human frailty permits, I die with alacrity interior and exterior; from the abundance of the heart, let not only mouths, but faces also speak.

Here, methinks, I feel flesh and blood ready to burst into loud cries, tooth for tooth, eye for eye, blood for blood, life for life; No, crieth holy gospel, Forgive and you shall be forgiven; pray for those that persecute you; love your enemies; and I profess myself a child of the gospel, and the gospel I obey.

Whomever, present or absent, I have ever offended, I humbly desire, them to forgive me; as for my enemies, had I as many hearts as I have fingers, with all those hearts would I forgive my enemies, at leastwise, with all that single heart I have, I freely forgive them all, my neighbours that betrayed me, the persons that took me, the justices that committed me, the witnesses that proved against me, the jury that found me, the judge that condemned me, and others whoever, that out of malice or zeal, covertly or openly, have been contributive to my condemnation; but singularly and especially, I forgive my capital persecutor, who hath been so long thirsting after my blood; from my soul I forgive him, and wish his soul so well, that were it in my power, I would seat him a seraphim in heaven, and I pray for them in the language of glorious St. Stephen the protomartyr; Lord, lay not this sin unto them; or better ye, in the style of our great master, Christ himself, Father forgive them, they know not what they do.

And with reason I love them also; for though they have done themselves a vast soul-prejudice, yet they have done me an incomparable favour, which I shall eternally acknowledge; but chiefly I love them for his sake, who said, Love your enemies; and in testimony of my love I wish them, and it is the best of wishes, from the center of my soul, I wish them a good eternity. O eternity, eternity! How momentaneous are the glorious riches, and pleasures of this world! and how desirable art thou, endless eternity!

And for my said enemies attaining therunto I humbly beseech God to give them the grace of true repentance, before they and this world part.

Next to my enemies, give me leave to lift up my eyes, hands, and heart to heaven, and drop some few words of advice unto, and for my friends, as well those present as absent. Friends, fear God, honour your king, be firm in your faith, avoid mortal sin, by frequenting the sacraments of holy church, patiently bear your persecutions and afflictions, forgive your enemies, your sufferings are great; I say be firm in your faith to the end, yea, even to death, then shall ye heap unto yourselves celestial treasures in the heavenly Jerusalem, where no thief robbeth, no moth eateth, and no rust consumeth; and have that blessed saying of the blessed St. Peter, prince of the apostles, always in your memory, which I heartily recommend unto you, viz. Let none of you suffer as a murderer or a thief, but if as a christian let him not be ashamed, but glorify God in his name.

Now it is high time I make my addresses to heaven, and supplicate the divine goodness in my own behalf, by some few short and cordial ejaculations of prayer.

His prayers being ended, he was turned off.

250. The Trial of NATHANAEL READING,* esq. for a Trespass and Misdemeanor: 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679.

ON Wednesday the 16th of April, 1679, his majesty's Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer did meet at Westminster-hall, in the court of King's-bench, when and where the commission was read and proclamation for attendance being made, and the grand jury sworn, sir James Butler, her majesty's Attorney General, and chief commissioner that then appeared, gave them their Charge thus:

Gentlemen,

His majesty, upon the Address of the honourable House of Commons, hath been pleased to give order for this commission of Oyer and Ter-miner that hath been read, to issue out; and the court thereby hath authority to inquire of, hear and determine several other offences: yet, at this present, you shall have no other in charge than the particular offence recited in the Indictment in my hand. It is a crime of an unusual and rare nature: the indictment is against Nathanael Reading; it sets forth the plot against the king, the government and the religion established here by law, the horrid and pernicious mischiefs and consequences of it: it sets forth likewise, that several persons, (and names them) as Coleman, Ireland and Grove, were tried, condemned, and executed for the same: that several lords in the Tower do stand impeached in parliament of the said high-treason, and other high-crimes and misdemeanors; and this was well known to Mr. Reading, and that notwithstanding he hath so misbehaved himself, in endeavouring to lessen and stifle (as much as in him lay) the king's evidence, that if it had not been happily prevented might have been of most mischievous consequence. I shall not take upon me to recite the whole indictment to you, being very long, and not seen or perused by me till now; but you shall have the same along with you, it shall be read to you. Your duty is, to examine and consider of the evidence to be offered you, on the behalf of the king, for the proof of the charge against the offender: if you find it amount to a proof of what is laid therein, nay, I must tell you, if you have but probable evidence, you ought to find the bill, because your presentment and verdict is not a conviction, but in the nature of an accusation, in order to bring the prisoner to a fair trial: and if you do not find the bill, he shall never be brought to his trial; but if you (having probable evidence) find it, he shall receive his trial by the petty jury; and upon the merits, be either acquitted or convicted. This is as much as I think is fit for me to say to you at this time, upon this occasion. You may please to go together, and take the witnesses along with you.

[Then the Witnesses were sworn, and the Grand-Jury withdrew, and after the space of about half an hour, returned, finding it Billa Vera. After which the court adjourned to Thursday, the 24th day of April, at eight o'clock in the morning, in the same place.]

On which day the Commissioners here-undernamed being met, viz. sir Francis North, kt. L. C. Justice of his majesty's court of common-pleas, William Mountague, esq. L. C. Baron of his majesty's court of exchequer, sir William Wyld, kt. and bart. one of his majesty's justices of the king's-bench, sir Hugh Wyndham, kt. one of his majesty's justices of the common-pleas, sir Robert Atkins, kt. of the Bath, another of the justices of the common pleas, sir Edward Thurland, kt. one of the barons of the Exchequer, Vere Bertie, esq. another of the justices of the common-pleas, sir Thomas Jones kt. another of the justices of the king's-bench, sir Francis Brampton, kt. another of the barons of the exchequer, sir William Dolben kt. another of the justices of the king's-bench, sir William Jones, kt. his majesty's Attorney General, sir James Butler, kt. one of the King's Council, and the queen's Attorney, sir Philip Mathews, bart, sir Thomas Orby, kt. and bart, sir Thomas Byde, kt. sir William Bowles, kt. sir Thomas Stringer, serjeant at law, sir Charles Pitfield, kt. Thomas Robinson, Humphrey Wyrley, Thomas Haryot, and Richard Gower, esquires.

Proclamation was made for attendance, and the Grand Inquest being called, Sir Francis North, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, (the Lord Chief Justice being out of town) spoke to them thus :

Lord Chief Justice. You of the Grand Jury, This session is upon a particular occasion, and that which lay upon you was to find the bill; and that you have done, and we do not see any thing further for you to do, and therefore the court discharges you from any further attendance this session.

[Then Mr. Reading was sent for, and brought to the bar by captain Richardson, keeper of Newgate; and silence being proclaimed, the Clerk of the Crown read the Indictment to him.]

Cl. of the Cr. Mr. Reading, hearken to your Indictment.

" You stand indicted by the name of Nathanael Reading, late of the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, esq. That whereas Edward Coleman, William Ireland, and John Grove, and other (unknown) false traitors against our most serene lord king Charles 2, the 24th day of April, in the 30th year of his reign, at the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, had traitorously, among themselves, conspired, consulted, and agreed, our said most serene lord the king to bring and put to death and final destruction; and to move war against him our lord the king, within this realm of England, and the religion in the same kingdom rightly and by the laws of the same realm established to change and alter to the superstition of the Romish church, and the government of the same kingdom to subvert; for which certain most wicked treasons, and traitorous conspiracies, consultations, and agreements aforesaid, they, the said Coleman, Ireland, and Grove, in due manner, and according to the laws of this kingdom of England afterwards were attainted, and had therefore undergone the pains of death: and whereas William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, John lord Bellasis, Henry lord Arundel of Warden, William lord Petre, and sir Henry Tichburn, bart. the 30th day of November in the above said 30th year of the reign of our said lord the king, at the said parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the county aforesaid, were of the aforesaid treasons in a lawful manner accused, and thereupon, according to the due form of law, to the Tower of London (being the prison of our said lord the king) were committed, there safely to be kept, to answer the aforesaid treasons, whereof the same William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, John lord Bellasis, Henry lord Arundel, and William lord Petre in parliament, by the Commons in the same parliament assembled, are impeached: But you the said Nathanael Reading, the aforesaid premises sufficiently knowing, and being devilishly affected against our most serene lord the king, your supreme and natural lord, and devising, and with all your might intending, to disturb the peace and common tranquillity of this realm, and the government of the same kingdom, and the sincere religion of God in the same, rightly and by the laws of the said realm established, at your will and pleasure to change and alter; and the state of this kingdom, through all its parts well instituted and ordained, wholly to subvert; and to obstruct, hinder and stifle the discovery of the said treason, and as much as in you lay, the due course of law in that part to shift off, and retard in the prosecution of justice against the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, and sir Henry Tichburn: You, the said Nathanael Reading, the 29th day of March, in the 31st year of our said lord the king, at the said parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the county aforesaid, on the part of the aforesaid William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, and sir Henry Tichburn, falsely, advisedly, corruptly, and against the duty of your allegiance, did unlawfully solicit, suborn, and endeavour to persuade, one William Bedlow, (who, on the 29th day of March, in the said 31st year, in due manner did give information of the said treasons; and whom you, the said Reading, the day and year last above said, did well know the information of the said treasons as aforesaid to have given, on the part of our lord the king) upon the trial of the aforesaid William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, and sir Henry Tichburn, for the treasons aforesaid, to be had, to lessen and stifle, and to omit to give in evidence the full truth, according to his knowledge, of the aforesaid treasons, against them, the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, and sir Henry Tichburn, and to give such evidence, as you, the said Nathanael Reading, should direct; And you, the said Nathanael Reading, sooner and more effectually to persuade the aforesaid William Bedlow to lessen and stifle, and to omit to give in evidence the full truth, according to his knowledge, against the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, and sir Henry Tichburn, upon their trials, and to give such evidence as you, the aforesaid Nathanael Reading, would direct: You, the said Nathanael Reading, afterwards, on the said 29th day of March, in the 31st year above said, at the aforesaid parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the said county, falsely, advisedly, corruptly, and against the duty of your allegiance, unlawfully did give to the same William Bedlow, fifty-six pieces of coined gold of this kingdom, called guineas: and also falsely, advisedly, corruptly, unlawfully, and against the duty of your allegiance, the day and year abovesaid, at the aforesaid parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, in the said county of Middlesex, did promise to the said Bedlow, that he, the said Bedlow, within a certain time, by you, the aforesaid Nathanael Reading, to the said Bedlow proposed, should have and receive divers other great sums of money, and other great rewards, for lessening and stifling, and omitting to give in evidence the full truth, according to his knowledge, of the aforesaid treasons against the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, and sir Henry Tichburn, and for giving such evidence, as you, the said Nathanael Reading, to the said William Bedlow should direct, to the great hindrance, obstruction, and suppression of justice, in manifest contempt of the laws of this realm, to the evil and pernicious example of all others in the like case offending; and against the peace of our lord the king, his crown and dignity, &c."

How say you, Mr. Reading, art thou Guilty of this trespass and misdemeanour, or Not Guilty?

Reading. Not Guilty, in thought, word, or deed.

L. C. J. Not Guilty, is your plea?

Reading. Yes, my lord.

Cl. of the Cr. Crier, make proclamation. You good men of this county of Middlesex, summoned to appear here this day, to try the issue joined between our sovereign lord the king, and Nathanael Reading, answer to your names, and save your issues.

[Then the pannel was called over, and Proclamation for information in usual form was made.]

Cl. of the Cr. Mr. Reading, look to your challenges. Will your lordship please to have Sir John Cutler to be foreman?

L. C. J. Yes.

Reading. My Lord, I have a very great honour for this worthy person, Sir John Cutler; he is in commission of the peace, I do therefore humbly desire he may be excused at this time.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, you cannot challenge him peremptorily in this case, it not being for your life; and therefore you must shew cause if you have any. He is not in this Commission at all; and for his being in the Commission of the Peace, that signifies nothing, for we oftentimes in the circuits take them off the Bench to be Jurymen; but if you can shew any cause of challenge, it must be allowed you.

Reading. My Lord, I look upon myself indicted for Treason; (I desire God to give me strength, and I am sure of your lordship's patience) and I look upon the Indictment which hath been read to me, and upon which I have been arraigned, to be expressly treason; and I do humbly pray your lordship's judgment in it, whether it be so or not: For, my Lord, (if your lordship please) if it be so, as I understand my own innocence, so your lordship understands my charge better than I do. And God knows I have neither strength of body, nor presence of mind to manage my own defence; but my happiness is, that I am alive at this day, and am to be tried here before so honourable a bench. My lord, I have not had the advantage of any council to assist me, nor the benefit of any common friend, no, nor my wife to come to me. I have not been able to help myself through the great indisposition which I have been under, reduced to it by that barbarous and illegal usage which I have had: For (my lord) I hope I may say I am the first Englishman that in my circumstances hath ever been used as I have been;

and my hopes are, whatsoever becomes of me (the Lord's will be done,) I shall be the last that ever shall be so used. My Lord, upon the weakness of my own apprehension, I do take it, that it is as high treason, nay a greater treason, and that in the words of the indictment, than ever Mr. Coleman, or any of the others that have been executed, died for; or the Lords now in the Tower stand charged with; and therefore, my lord, I pray your direction in it, if it is but a misdemeanor (for truly what the crime is I know not;) but in construction of law, admitting the indictment true, the whole does contain in it the blackest treason: that ever villain was guilty of. If it is so in your lordship's judgment, whatever should become of it now, I may be indicted for it again; and should this indictment be found upon me, I am as certainly in the eye of the law a dead man, as through the mercy of God I am now alive: and (my lord) if it be so, I desire your lordship's judgment whether I may not be allowed a peremptory challenge.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, you speak in due time, for its pertinent to the matter of peremptory challenge, to consider whether this be an indictment of treason? for if it be, the law does allow in favour of your life a peremptory challenge to such a number; and I will tell you, your apprehensions have something in them: That the fact as it is laid in the indictment, might have been laid so as to have made an indictment of treason; and if you are guilty of this fact, and not indicted for treason, but only for a misdemeanor, it is favour to you, and that of which you cannot take advantage or complain of. I'll now shew you that this indictment is not an indictment of treason, nor can the judgment of treason be given upon you for it; and so thereby your life is not in danger. First, here is not the word proditorie, which is necessarily in all indictments of treason: next you must observe that all treasons are expressly particularized in the statute of 25 Ed. 3. And nothing is treason but what is contained in that act, as compassing the death of the king, levying war against the king, and other facts mentioned in that statute. Now if this fact had been here laid as an overt-act for the evidencing of the imagination of your heart in compassing the death of the king, and the destruction of the realm, there it had been an indictment of treason: but being there is no treason formally laid, nor the word (Proditorie) which is necessary in all indictments of treason, 'tis only a misdemeanor you stand charged with: which I must tell you is great ease and favour to you in such circumstances as we are now; and if it be so, you must shew cause if you challenge any juror.

Reading. If I may (with your lordship's favour) I am very highly disposed for the taking of the least favours that can be shewed me, with the deepest acknowledgment that an innocent man and one in distress can make: but (my lord) among the greatest of misfortunes, this I own as my happiness, that I am now on my trial before your lordship. But pray (my lord) may not I (having this favour shewed to me, and should it be only found a misdemeanor) afterwards be indicted for treason? And pray (my lord) does there want any one circumstance of the formality of an indictment for treason in this against me, but that one of Proditorie?

L. C. J. No, it is not laid that you did compass the death of the king.

Reading. Then (with your lordship's pardon) I do not understand it: for the indictment does set forth, 'That Coleman and others did conspire the death of the king, levying war, the altering of religion and subversion of the government; for which they justly suffered death.' And further, as to the several lords in the indictment mentioned, they are accused for the same treason; 'And justly, and according to law sent to the Tower, to answer what they stand justly impeached of by the Commons?' And it sets forth further; that I premissa predicta satis sciens, did so and so: were there no other expression, that my lord, is expressly treason, or no doubt misprision of treason; for, my lord, it does charge me that I am satis sciens particularly, sufficiently well apprized of those treasons they were executed for, these accused. And that I did not this out of the weakness of my own apprehension, but falsely, advisedly and maliciously. My happiness is, I shall have your great judgments to determine this matter for me.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, you exercise great elocution and eloquence; but if I do apprehend you aright, what you say is this: That the Indictment sets forth, that you satis sciens of those treasons did so and so, which will amount to a misprision of Treason. I must tell you, there is a difference between the knowledge of a treason that is secret, for the concealing of that, and endeavouring to stifle the evidence, is misprision of treason; but the knowing of a treason that is revealed and discovered is knowing no more than all the world knows; and not laid as a fault, but to aggravate the fault: afterwards charged. This discourse is nothing to the matter; if you would have our opinion, whether you may afterwards be questioned for Treason, it is that we are not to give you; answer the Indictment as now it is: You have favour enough that it is laid this way, and not the other. An Indictment of Treason or Misprision must not be laid so as that the crime must be collected out of the Matter of Fact only, but it must be formally laid. How you shall be prosecuted hereafter, must depend upon the justice of the kingdom. We sit here now to determine upon what matter lies before us, and so we cannot grant you a peremptory challenge in this case, which is only allowed in matters capital in favour of life.

Reading. My lord, I do desire to know whether this be treason or no, 'That being devilishly affected to the king my supreme and natural lord, and intending to levy war in the kingdom, and to change the government, and to alter the religion, and subvert the peace of England; whether that be not treason?

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, We will answer none of those questions: But this I will say to you, no judgment of treason can be given upon you upon this indictment; and though these acts (if formally laid) might have been treason, yet it not being so, we must proceed as it lies before us: And therefore if you have any particular cause to challenge sir John Cutler, shew it, and we will hear you.

Reading. My lord, I have this cause, I have been but a little time acquainted with this worthy gentleman; but, my lord, I have seen him in company with Mr. Bedlow, mine accuser, I know there is not a common intimacy and friendship between them: I am very certain, my lord, that sir John hath too much honour to do me wrong; but I do humbly desire that he may have his ease, and be excused at this time: not that I do distrust his justice, but for the reasons I have humbly offered.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Reading, your accusers are witnesses for the king, and are neither to gain nor lose by your trial; and therefore cannot be presumed to make any party for your conviction. And do you challenge a jurymen because he is supposed to know something of the matter? For that reason the juries are called from the neighbourhood, because they should not be wholly strangers to the fact. If you can shew that he hath already given his verdict by his discourse, and that you are already condemned in his opinion, that may be some cause of challenge; but that he hath discoursed with neighbours as others do, it may be he believes it, and may be he does not believe it, he is now to give his verdict upon what he hears upon oath.

Reading. My lord, I am very glad to see sir John Cutler here, for I did intend to have his evidence for me.

L. C. J. That you may have, though he be sworn.

Then the Jury were sworn, and their names were as followeth, viz. Sir John Cutler, Joshua Galliard, Edward Wilford, Thomas Henslow, Thomas Earsby, John Erle, Thomas Casse, Rainsford Waterhouse, Matthew Bateman, Walter Moyle, Richard Paget, and John Haynes, Esquires.

L. C. J. If sir John Cutler desires pen, ink and paper, or any other convenience, let him have it.

Cl. of the Cr. Gentlemen of the jury, hearken to the indictment. He stands indicted by the name of Nathanael Reading——

L. C. J. You need not open the Indictment, let the counsel do that.

Then Edward Ward, Esq. being of Counsel for the King in this Cause, opened the Indictment.

May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of this jury, Nathaniel Reading, esq. stands indicted for this offence: That whereas Edward Coleman, William Ireland, and John Grove, and other unknown persons, (traitors against our sovereign lord the king) the 24th day of April, in the 30th year of the king, did traitorously contrive the king's death, the subversion of the government of the kingdom, and the religion in the same kingdom by law established, to alter and change to the superstition of the Romish Church; for which treasons they have been in due manner attainted and executed: And it further lays, That whereas William earl of Powis, William lord viscount Stafford, John lord Bellasis, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, William lord Petre, and sir Henry Titchburn, baronet, were the 30th of November last, in a lawful manner, accused of those Treasons, and for them committed to the Tower; and thereof the said Lords were and stand impeached by the Commons in parliament: The said Mr. Reading well knowing of these things, and being devilishly affected to the king, his supreme and natural lord, and devising to disturb the peace of the kingdom, and the government and religion thereof rightly established, to change and alter; the state of the kingdom well instituted, to subvert; and to obstruct and stife the discovery of these treasons, and as much as in him lay to shift off and retard the course of law and prosecution of justice against the said lord Powis, lord Stafford, lord Petre, and sir Henry Titchburn; the said Mr. Reading, the 29th of March last past, at St. Margaret's Westminster, on the part of these three last mentioned lords, and sir Henry Titchburn, did falsely, corruptly, advisedly, and against his allegiance, unlawfully solicit, suborn, and endeavour to persuade one Mr. William Bedlow (who before had given information of these Treasons against the said persons, and whom Mr. Reading knew so to have done) to lessen, stife, and omit to give in evidence the full truth according to his knowledge of the said Treasons against the said three lords, and sir Henry Titchburn, upon their trial to be had, and to give such evidence as he the said Mr. Reading should direct; and to that purpose, falsely, corruptly, advisedly, and against the duty of his allegiance, unlawfully did give to Mr. Bedlow 56 guineas, and promised him, that within a certain time (by the said Reading proposed) he should have and receive divers other great sums of money and rewards, for lessening, stifing, and omitting to give in evidence the full truth, according to his knowledge of those treasons, against the said three Lords and sir Henry Titchburn; and for giving such evidence as he should direct: And this is laid to be to the hinderance and suppression of justice, in manifest contempt of the laws of this realm, to the evil example of others in the like case offending, and against the peace of our lord the king, his crown and dignity. To this Indictment Mr. Reading hath pleaded Not Guilty. If we prove the offences aforesaid against him, we doubt not but you will find him Guilty.

Sir Creswel Lewins one of the King's Learned Counsel in the Law, thus opened the charge.

May it please your lordships, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel for the king in this case: gentlemen, this indictment is not an indictment of high-treason, nor of misprision of treason; and truly the gentleman at the bar hath something wond'ring at the king's lenity to him; the fact in the indictment does indeed sound of another nature, than what it bears the name of; it does in this indictment carry the most moderate character that the fact will bear: it is only an indictment of trespass and misdemeanor, but it is a very high misdemeanor; it is to stifle the king's evidence, and that not in an ordinary case, but where it is attended with the greatest aggravations that can be in any case whatsoever. If a man should endeavour to stifle the evidence in an action betwixt party and party, in the courts of Westminster-hall, for a business of about 40s. those courts of justice would find a ready way to punish him. This is a crime of another nature, for it is set forth in the indictment, that Coleman, Ireland, and Grove had a traitorous design in hand, for the which they were executed, that is, the Plot; and when I have said that, I have said all, that implies all; you all know what was thereby designed. It is set forth in the indictment, that such lords, and sir Henry Titchburn, were privy to the Plot, and accused for it, and to prevent the evidence to be given against these lords, three of them, (for the bargain was only made for three, viz. my lord Stafford, my lord Powis, and my lord Petre; the rest were out of the bargain, and had not, it seems, found out the way of commerce now used by these persons) was this gentleman, Mr. Reading's business. It was to diminish and lessen the evidence that was to be given against them, who were charged and accused to be as highly guilty of the Plot as any that were executed for it. And when I have told you this, you will surely conclude it is an high offence, and an high misdemeanor: for if the life of the king, if the law of the land, if the religion established, if the settled government be valuable; if your own lives, your own liberties, and your own fortunes, have any consideration with you, this is a very high misdemeanor; for you must look upon these as all at stake: this plot, as it was laid, did reach to all: so that an endeavour to conceal the evidence that should discover, and thereby prevent the execution of so horrid a conspiracy, is a very heinous misdemeanor; and you will easily believe, that the gentleman at the bar, the prisoner whom you are to try, had reason to doubt within himself, why it should be called so small an offence as an high misdemeanor: but I will not, I need not aggravate this offence, and the rather because the gentleman that stands accused for it, is of a profession (for which I am sorry) which obliges him to know and understand all the aggravations of his own crime. I will not open the evidence, nor tell you what the witnesses will say, I had rather you should have it from themselves; but if I am rightly informed, you will have the matter fully proved; and therefore we will call the witnesses, and let them tell you what it is they have to say.

Mr. Ward. There are some things laid in this indictment, that are to be previously proved, in order to the charging of the prisoner; as the execution of Coleman, and the rest; and the impeachment of the lords. If Mr. Reading stands upon it, we have those here that will prove it.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, those public passages that are laid in the preamble of the Indictment, do you insist they should be proved first?

Reading. My lord, I am very willing to save your lordship's time.

L. C. J. Do you admit that Coleman and Ireland, &c. were executed for treason?

Reading. Yes, my lord, and very justly.

L. C. J. Do you admit that the lords in the Tower, are accused and impeached in parliament for this Plot?

Reading. Yes, my lord, I do.

L. C. J. Then you ease them of the reading those records.

Reading. And, my lord, I do further say, I do verily believe there never was a greater plot laid in hell than this. I have abhorred it in my thoughts, and have not only endeavoured to encourage the discovery, but always gave it as my counsel, that nothing that was true should be left out in the evidence. And I do, and will, save your lordship's time as much I can.

Sir Cr. Levins. Then, if your lordship please, we will call our witnesses, and prove the fact; and if there be any thing that Mr. Reading doubts of, we will prove it afterwards. Swear Mr. Bedlow. Which was done.

Mr. Ward. Mr. Bedlow, I shall only ask you the general question. Will you be pleased to tell my lords and the jury, what you know of this business? tell the whole story, what discourse and bargainings there have been between you and Mr. Reading, for the diminishing and lessening of your evidence.

Bedlow. My lord, Mr. Reading was altogether a stranger to me, till sir Trevor Williams brought me acquainted with him; he was always very just to me in whatsoever he did for me, and wherein he was employed by me. I found him very honest, in reference to my own concerns. And though Mr. Reading will bring a great many people, perhaps, that he hath pressed me to discover the whole of the Plot; I do confess, he did it in a very high measure in all public company, and that I would not be baulked in any point: and for the discovery and convicting, and executing, of those that had died about this Plot, he never denied but they suffered justly and lawfully enough: but in private counsels where we have been together, he hath spoken to me to be cautious. Indeed he hath never endeavoured to have me stifle the whole Plot, but only for some particular people that he solicited for; not but that he believed them guilty, as well as the rest; but he desired me that I would not be so hot against them. And after he had made me easy, (that was his word that he himself used) he would have had me made Mr. Dugdale easy too. At several times, when we have been together, his very expressions have been to me, Mr. Bedlow, Though there has been so damned a design on foot, and so terrible a one, yet it is not for your safety nor credit to run at the whole herd of men: For I was this day, or yesterday, he said, with my lord chief justice, and he told me, That at this rate that Mr. Bedlow accuses men, none are safe, for he runs at the whole herd; and seemed to me to intimate, that my lord chief justice was not pleased with my forwardness. And he told me likewise, You gain your point with the parliament, and with the king, and with the kingdom, if some suffer, as I believe you can do it, and not run at the whole herd; and it is an indifferent thing to you, so you make the parliament your friend, by proving there is a Plot, and the king your friend, in not charging all these lords, and you will make all the lords your friends, by your kindness to them. You shall take my instructions, I will never advise you any thing that is ill, but I will tell you how far you shall proceed. If you can fix any thing for them, you shall be sure to be well gratified.

L. C. J. Did he name any lords to you?

Bedlow. This was the beginning of the discourse, my lord; and I answered him, Mr. Reading, This is a very nice point, and I know them to be guilty of all the things I charge them with, and I can prove it. If your advice be so, I will consider of it. I think it was after the prorogation of the last parliament, and then my encouragement for discovery was not so great. But, said I, if any of them deny it to you, that they are guilty, then they must expect no kindness from me at all, for I will swear all that I can against them; but if they acknowledge that I do them a piece of service in not swearing too severely against them, then I will be ready to take your advice and instructions. He told me many times, that sir Henry Titchburn did think he had seen me in Paris, but he did not use this expression to me, That I charged him with bringing commissions over from Rome. I answered again, You may tell sir Henry Titchburn, if he denies any thing of the fact that I have sworn against him, he does me and himself a great injury. And to take him off as an innocent man, I cannot do it, I will never do it. But upon acknowledgment, I may do them some kindness. So likewise my lord Powis and Caryll. The gentlemen that he most solicited for, were, my lord Powis, my lord Petre, my lord Stafford, sir Henry Titchburn, Mr. Roper, Mr. Caryll, and one Mr. Corker a Jesuit. And likewise he made me easy, upon that day that Mr. Whitebread and Mr. Fenwick were upon their trials; for I have enough against them, because I could be no stranger to Whitebread and Fenwick, two such considerable men, being so much concerned as I was in their affairs. It was impossible I should be so much a stranger to them, as I said I was, but it was because Mr. Reading had then made me easy, and I intended to carry on the intrigue with him, till it could be handsomely discovered. But my lord chief justice asked me whether that was all I could say? And I told him, my lord, I have something more to say, when time and place require it, and when I can be safe in telling it; that is, when I had found out all that Mr. Reading intended to do, how far he would go, and then I thought it would be a proper time, when I could make out some such information as I now do; but I would not stifle that treaty that was between him and me, about the lords in the Tower, which I knew was of greater consequence than two old priests. After the dissolution of the parliament, he told me, We must see other times and other changes, and that the lords did not think themselves in so much danger as when the parliament was sitting. But at several places, the Palsgrave-Head Tavern, and others, we have had discourse to the like effect. He would very frequently come to me, and talk with me about it. Now I asked counsel of no man, for I have no need of it in my matter; it is not matter of law, but matter of fact, that I am to make out, therefore I had no need of his advice, but he would be at my bed-side very often in a morning, and before I was dressed, and then we used to discourse together about this business, and the manner and form how it should be done, and how well I should be rewarded if I got off those lords; that is, my lord Petre, my lord Powis, my lord Stafford, and sir Henry Titchburn; these were the four that made the promises: but Mr. Reading solicited for the other lords too; they did promise a noble reward, but I could never settle or fix what it should be, but I should have acknowledgments both in money and estate, from the lords, for shortening the evidence, and bringing them off from the charge of high-treason. We had several consultations about this. The Monday that my lord Danby was sent for by the Black Rod, Mr. Reading came to me in the Speaker's chamber, and told me, Mr. Bedlow, here is a great turn, my lord Treasurer is sent for by the Black Rod, and things are like to go quite another way. Well, said I, when were you with the lords in the Tower? Said he, I have not been there these two or three days, but said he, I intend to go to-morrow, and then I will bring you word what they say. And the next day, or the day following, he came to me, and told me, that the lords did think, that I was in great measure capable of serving them now; and they would have an account of what I could say against them, that so they might view it and correct it. Accordingly he did go, and appointed to meet the 28th of March. I omit several other times that we had consultations, and now come homeward to the business. I had then a command from the lords to inspect the papers of the Spanish ambassador at Wild-House, and I could not meet Mr. Reading according to promise, and I think the other witnesses will give you reasons better than I. This appointment was on Friday night; on Saturday morning, he, having missed of me the night before, came to my lodging, where I had placed Mr. Speke and my man ready against he came. None of all these conferences did I conceal, but revealed them to some of the members of the privy council, to the prince, and to my lord of Essex. As soon as ever I had discoursed with Mr. Reading about this matter, I did write it in the very words, as near as I could, and gave it to the prince, and my lord of Essex, and I think your lordships are very well satisfied that the prince and my lord knew it. And I told it to several others, as counsellor Smith, Mr. Kirby, and several others, who I was certain would be true to the secret, fearing that Mr. Reading had laid a trap to catch me with, and therefore I was very cautious, that no particular of consequence should be unknown to them. Indeed, my lord, I was very sorry to see Mr. Reading should do so, for I had a very great respect for him; and he did use to give me public advice in general, for the discovery of the Plot; only for some particular people he did solicit me that I would be a little easy, those he did solicit for. Upon the 29th of March, which was Saturday morning, when he came into the room, he asked me, is there nobody here can overhear us? I told him, no, there was not. Now I had planted that gentleman, Mr. Speke, behind my hangings, and made an hollow place in my bed, and therein laid my man, and covered him with the rug so smooth, that it did appear as if it were but newly made, and he could not perceive there was any body there; he would have spoke to me in the dining-room, but I excused it, telling him, That madam Greves, who lay in the next room, had over-heard several discourses that I had with some persons there, and therefore it would not be safe, but he had better go into my chamber (not that she could hear through the wall, but it was to bring him into my chamber); he commended my caution, and came in with me thither; and his first word; as I said, was, is there nobody that can over-hear? No, said I, it is my concern to look to that, that all be private: but, said I, what say the lords in the Tower? What says my lord Stafford, what do they intend to do? I must know speedily, for I am to give in my information to the Secret Committee of what I can say against them this night. And I can stay no longer, but must have their final answer, that I may know what to say when I come to the Secret Committee. Saith he, I will go and get their final answer, but pray put it off till Wednesday, if you can. Saith I, I cannot do that, put it off so long, but I will do what I can to put it off till Monday. Well, said he, on Monday you shall be sure to hear from me then, and I will have all things ready, as to what you have to say, and you shall have it from me. Accordingly I did stay till Monday, but the Committee of Secrecy knew it all this time; and when I met him on Monday, I had ordered the witnesses that were by to over-hear us, to be present at the delivery of the paper; accordingly they were there, and Mr. Reading did bring it in his own hand-writing.

Reading. What room was it you were in, pray, Sir?

Bedlow. In the Painted-chamber. And as he gave me the paper, pretending to put my hand in my pocket, I clapped it with my hand privately behind me thus, and Mr. Speke took it out of my hand, and he and my man went into my lord Privy-Seal's chamber, and there they read it, and had it three hours before I ever saw it. Well, said I, what will the lords do? Why, saith he, though I have not a full answer as to what they will do, yet you may expect a noble reward; and I have order to draw up blank deeds.

Reading. Who did you give that paper to, Sir?

Bedlow. To Mr. Speke; the rest will justify it, it is your own hand-writing. But saith he, I have order to draw blank deeds to be signed in ten days after their discharge. And you may be sure that they shall be signed. Mr. Reading, said I, this is but a verbal promise, and they may perhaps hereafter charge me, for all my bringing them off, and do me a great deal of injury. That cannot be, saith he, my soul and my life for it, I have taken their words, and, if there be any faith, honour and conscience in men, it shall be done: I dare answer for them. And, Mr. Bedlow, your safety doth most consist in it; for as they must never be false with you, so they must never be at enmity with you; for at last, if you charge them with corrupting of you, you will be able to ruin them, and it will not look ill upon you, so much as upon them: But, take my word for it, you shall have a noble and worthy acknowledgment. I have authority to draw blank deeds, both for sums and estates, which they will settle upon you, and likewise a speedy supply of money, as soon as they can get it in; for my lord Stafford said, he is now cutting down wood and selling it, and when he hath raised the money, you shall have it; but he protests, at present he hath not now money to defray the charges of his family; but I have order at any time to give you what you need for present occasions. And indeed accordingly I have had a great deal of money from him, several guineas. I had all I asked for, and many times gold I did not ask for; upon what terms, other witnesses will prove better than I hereafter. When we had done, said he, Let me see what papers you have, the copy of what you have accused the queen about, and the lords, that I may carry them to the lords, and have their answer. Said I, they are at my mother's. I must needs have them, said he. So, that I might give the witnesses leave to come out, I went with him to my mother's lodgings, and pretended to look for them, but found them not, for none but the Secret Committee knows what is in them. But when I had looked over my papers, said I, my brother, perhaps, hath got them away with him, I will go back to my lodgings and see. Oh! said he, you should make sure of such copies as you have, in some friend's hands, to secure them as well as the original. I told him, I should be sure of them at night; so he was satisfied: though I never intended he should have them, because there was business of so great consequence in them. When we came back again, we found Mr. Speke and my man in the chamber, writing. I asked Mr. Speke how long they had been there? He told me, as soon as I went out. Then said I to Mr. Speke, pray withdraw, for now I am to have Mr. Reading's instructions; if you will go before by water, I will meet you at Westminster by and by. Then I locked up the street door, and came back to Mr. Reading, and then to work we fell to write out those things that he and I did conclude upon.

Reading. You say that you and I were then alone, and your man gone away.

Bedlow. I said, that then you and I concluded upon what I should say, and what I should pitch upon they were to correct, according to what they thought would most conduce to their own safety. And when there were any words that seemed to urge any thing home upon them, then he would tell me what was law, and that, perhaps, would reach them, and then altered it. And the Monday after brought a copy to me, of his own hand-writing, far from the words that were set down in the paper that he and I concluded of together, and delivered it to me privately, and I delivered it to this gentleman, carrying it behind me thus, and he came after me and took it from me.

Sir C. Levinz. Mr. Bedlow, this, you say, was for the shortening of the evidence; how was it to be shortened?

Bedlow. To take off the whole charge of guilt, that I had sworn against them.

Sir C. Levinz. Did that, which you agreed upon to shorten, take off from the treason?

Bedlow. That which the witnesses had in writing did take off the charge of treason wholly.

Sir C. Levinz. Was it less than the information you had given in against them?

Bedlow. I told him, that it was not delivered into the Secret Committee, but indeed I had a great while before—

L. C. J. I will tell you what I apprehend he did say; if I mistake, he will set it right. He saith, When he came back with Mr. Reading, he found Mr. Speke and his man in the chamber together; he asked Mr. Speke how long he had been there, and how chanced he was up so soon? Mr. Speke said to him, I have been here ever since you went away. That, upon Mr. Bedlow's desire, he went away before him to Westminster, and they went together to consult, and great care was used, that they might not be hindered or surprized. Then Mr. Bedlow was to pen his testimony, and it was to be carried to the lords in the Tower, and they were to consider how to have it minced, that they might be out of danger. And Mr. Reading understanding the law, whenever Mr. Bedlow spoke plain, or dictated any thing that would come home to them, would tell him of it, and that Mr. Bedlow might correct and mitigate it himself. I understand you so, Mr. Bedlow.

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, it was so. And that paper, which he brought me back, was ten times shorter than that he had of mine, which was forty times shorter than what I had given in to the Secret Committee.

Mr. Ward. Mr. Bedlow hath fully proved the discourse and bargain between him and Mr. Reading, for the lessening of his evidence.

Bedlow. All Mr. Reading's words were, that I would so shorten and lessen the charge against them, that they might come off.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, if you have a mind to it, you have liberty to ask him any questions.

Reading. My lord, I humbly desire I may do it, when the evidence for the king is all given.

L. C. J. It is most proper to do it now.

Reading. With your lordship's favour, I have this reason for it, I do desire that the witnesses may be examined apart.

Justice Wild. Mr. Bedlow, pray let me ask you one question. I am upon the indictment, for the jury is charged upon that, and we must judge upon that, Was the agreement between you and him, that you should swear what he should direct you?

Bedlow. It was, to what he and the lords would direct.

Justice Wild. Did the lords correct your paper?

Bedlow. As he said, they have done it.

Justice Wild. Did he acknowledge it?

Bedlow. Yes, he did.

L. C. J. Mr. Bedlow, I don't understand that you were to have any conference with the lords, but you were to be shy of that, lest it should be discovered, but what conference you were to have was with Mr. Reading.

Bedlow. Yes, my Lord, and he was to give me an account what they would have me say.

Justice Jones. Shew him the paper, I suppose he will own his own hand.

L. C. J. Is that your hand, Sir?

Reading. My Lord, this is my hand, and this is that paper that I did deliver to Mr. Bedlow before Mr. Speke in the Painted-Chamber.

Ward. We desire it may be read, if your lordship think fit.

Justice Atkins. Methinks it should be material to read the paper that he gave to Reading first.

L. C. J. Have you it here, Mr. Bedlow?

Bedlow. No; he carried that paper to the lords, and brought me this again.

L. C. J. But had you never that other paper again?

Bedlow. No, I had not.

L. C. J. Did you ever take a copy of it?

Bedlow. No, I did not. But this is that corrected paper that I was to give in to the secret committee, and corrected by the Lords.

Sir C. Levins. We do prove it in fact, that he had before given further evidence, and by this agreement he did contract to give less.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, what do you say to Mr. Bedlow?

Reading. My Lord, if I have your lordship's direction that I may not examine my witnesses apart, I'll go on.

L. C. J. But what say you to the paper?

Reading. I do own the paper that was shewn to me, is my hand, and that I delivered it to Mr. Bedlow.

L. C. J. Then it must be read.

Sir C. Levins. My Lord, we don't desire it should be read, for we cannot shew the former paper, that did contain more; and therefore what will the reading of the latter, which contains less, signify?

L. C. J. If you do not desire to have it read, we won't read it.

Sir C. Levins. Mr. Bedlow's evidence is, that there was a paper much more large than this, and yet both those short of the information he had given in; now what will the reading of the one signify, without the other?

L. C. J. Do you consent to the reading of it?

Reading. My Lord, I would save your time, and make it plain.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, You must not come to make your defence yet, till the king's evidence is over.

Reading. My Lord, I do it to open his evidence, and for your information. My Lord, Mr. Bedlow charges me, that I did write in his chamber, when his man and Mr. Speke were gone, a paper that was much larger than the paper your lordships have before you; he does say that he did desire me to go with that to the lords, and that they did correct it in several places, and being so corrected, I did bring him this paper back; and delivered it to him in the Painted-chamber, before Mr. Speke. My Lord, I do pray your lordship's favour in it; when I had the king's directions for giving in to the secret committee, what information I had to give, I did deliver it into the chamber, where were Mr. Sacheverell and others, that very paper, which was written at his chamber. My Lord, I have sent to him several times, that he would deliver that to me in order to my own justification at my trial. I did desire likewise that some other papers which I did receive from Mr. Bedlow under his own hand, and which would be very material to my defence, might be brought to me, but I have not had the favour of an answer from Mr. Sacheverell, to this very hour. I do humbly desire that he may be sent to, for the delivery of them.

L. C. J. I do not know how we can send for them, if the committee will not deliver them.

Reading. Will your lordship give me leave to send to him?

L. C. J. But not by our direction, to bring them as by our command.

Reading. No, My Lord, but by my own indenture.

L. C. J. Do what you will, as from yourself; Mr. Reading, your wife was with me yesterday, and said, you could not get Subpoena's for your witnesses; and I sent for the clerk about it, and he told me, there never was any Subpoena's denied you, but you might have had them at any time. But what say you to this paper, you of the king's counsel?

Sir C. Levins. My Lord, we do not desire to have it read without the other.

L. C. J. Look you here, this paper must be read, for we would see whether there was a paper under your hand, expressing what evidence Mr. Bedlow was to give in this matter, and whether you did one way or other put any thing in writing which he should swear, to lessen his evidence. As for the other matter of tampering, we shall hear from others concerning it; but let us have this read, not for comparing it with the other paper, to shew the testimony is less in this than in the other, but as an evidence of the fact in itself; for we will expect a good account from you Mr. Reading, what you had to do to prescribe him his evidence in writing; therefore pray read the paper.

Then the Paper was read, in hæc verba :

Lord Stafford.

On discovery of the plot to me, I asked Harcourt and Le Faire how things were to be managed, they told me that his lordship was to be treasurer, and he, and Ireland, and Coleman, had money to defray all charges; I then said I never heard that his lordship was engaged before; they said he had not been long concerned, nor was he acquainted with the affair much; but that the money which was lodged with him was to be disposed of by him for the use of the church and the Catholics, and they had bound his lordship up by sacraments not to discover what the money lodged with him was to do till the time of using it, and then his lordship should know what great trust he had upon him for them; and till things were ripe he was not to be acquainted with the depth of the plot, for they knew he would never consent to the king's death till it was done. His lordship always promised to be ready to serve the church with his life and fortune.

Lord Powis.

That the Lady Abbess of Panthois told me, That his lordship had sent his daughters over to be educated in the monastery, but that his lordship's Lady had declared to her by letter, that she meant them as pledges according to her promise, to assure her that her Lord was real to carry on what he had promised concerning the introducing the Roman Catholic Religion into England. I brought over a letter from the Monks in Paris directed to his lordship, with several other letters to other popish gentlemen, tending to the death of the king, and subverting of the government; but what was in that letter, to his lordship I know not, for that I did not open it, as I had done the others, it being directed to a peer; but I believe it might be to the same effect, the Monks having informed me so at the delivering them to me; several other letters to the same effect (as the priests told me) I saw in the priests hands, directed to his lordship; but I never did read any of them, nor can I say that his lordship ever received any of them, but I saw them put into the post-house to send forwards, and I never saw his lordship at any consultation, neither did I ever hear his lordship named at any consultation where the killing of the king was mentioned or debated of: but I verily believe that his lordship was acquainted with the design of introducing popery, for that the lady Abbess and the Priests have several times told me so, or to that effect.

Lord Petre.

Mr. Tyrrel a Priest, and Madam Thimbleby his lordship's sister told me, that Mr. Thimbleby was gone to my Lord Petre's house to consult with him how to proceed in the managing of their business. Mr. Thimbleby having received letters from beyond sea in order to the introducing the Roman Catholic Religion into England, and that his lordship would not in any sort be persuaded to bring it in by force, but rather by policy; and though his lordship had truly engaged himself never to quit the design, yet she was sure he would not do it by foul means. I told her at her husband's house at Eruly, that where a design was to be carried on for so general a good, no particular way was to be pitched upon, but any thing, and all means was to be used to bring it to pass, rather than lose the design: to which she replied, that she believed and approved the same, but that she well knew his lordship's mind, that he would never agree to do it by force; but as he would not hinder it, should it go on by force, so he would further it by any other means whatsoever.

L. C. J. Here is an evidence indeed, but so minced, that it would have signified nothing as to the charge against them.

Bedlow. In the information that I gave in to the secret committee, there is ten sheets of paper in every evidence against every lord.

L. C. J. Now go to the other witnesses.

Ward. Pray swear Mr. Speke. Which was done.

Ward. Come, Mr. Speke, declare your evidence, and pray come over on this side.

L. C. J. I would have him stand on the other side, because Mr. Reading desires to examine them apart.

Speke. My lords, and you gentlemen of the jury, I should have been very loth and unwilling to have made myself so public as to have appeared here as a witness against Mr. Reading the prisoner at the bar, upon any other account than this: but at such a time as this, and in such an intrigue as this was, in which both the king and kingdom was concerned, I thought myself bound both in duty and allegiance to appear in what I have done and to testify the truth of what I know, for the preservation and defence of both; and therefore shall declare to you the treaty that was in my hearing the 29th of March last, between Mr. Bedlow and Mr. Reading now at the bar, and I shall not for the world attest any thing but what I heard discoursed between them, but will relate it to you in their own expressions, as near as possibly I can remember; and as to the matter and substance of what I shall declare to you to be discoursed between them, I will and can both positively swear.

But before I acquaint you thereof, I must beg leave to tell you, that I knew almost daily from Mr. Bedlow, for some considerable time before, what was in the treaty between him and Reading, and how they proceeded in this affair, and therefore could the better charge my memory with their discourse, and with the passages which passed between them, and Mr. Bedlow having himself told you that he acquainted two or three persons likewise of very great quality all along with this treaty between him and Mr. Reading, and with Mr. Reading's constant and almost daily consultation and advice to him upon this account, and with his large promises to him from these popish lords and other gentlemen accused and in custody upon the account of this horrid plot.

I shall not now tire your patience so much as to acquaint you with what I had from Mr. Bedlow from time to time, after Mr. Reading had been with him discoursing of this affair; but I shall be as short as I can in coming close to the point, and therefore shall only acquaint you with the matter and substance of what I myself heard discoursed between Mr. Reading and Mr. Bedlow the 29th of March last.

The 28th of March last, I met with Mr. Bedlow here at Westminster, who privately told me, that Mr. Reading had appointed to be with him in the evening about the old affair, and therefore desired me to come to his lodgings about seven o'clock, and there should be some private place found out for me advantageously to hear their discourse: I went to Mr. Bedlow's lodgings at Whitehall about the time he desired me to come; where I met with Mr. Reading, who was then just come, and asking Henry Wiggins whether his master was at home, who told him, that he was not; upon which Mr. Reading went away, and left word with this young man that he would come again presently, and desired him to acquaint his master with it as soon as he came home; I staid there with this young man a short time after Mr. Reading was gone, asking him whether he could tell where his master was, who told me he could not, but told me that there was some company at the King's-head tavern at Charing-Cross which staid there for him, and that his master would call there before he came home; upon which I immediately went to the King's-head Tavern, and asked whether Mr. Bedlow was there; but I understood that there was some company staying there, expecting to speak with Mr. Bedlow, but that he was not then come to them; upon which I went then to Man's coffee-house, and staid there a while, but had ordered one of the boys of the tavern to come and acquaint me as soon as Mr. Bedlow came; but finding that no one came from the tavern, after some time I went thither again, and understood that he had not been there, and that the company was gone which staid for him; and then I went back again to Mr. Bedlow's lodgings, where as soon as I came, this young man came out and told me, Mr. Reading was above, and staid there to speak with his master, on which I called him out to me, and told him I was desired by his master to come to be hid in some private place conveniently to hear the discourse between them, and therefore I contrived some way to get Mr. Reading out, that I might in the mean time convey myself into some private place, where I might be able to hear their discourse; whereupon I ordered this young man (whilst I was walking without at some distance) to go up and tell Mr. Reading that there was one which came from the King's head Tavern at Charing-Cross to acquaint him that his master was there with some company, and to tell Mr. Reading, that his master would not be able to get away from them, if he did not go to him; whereupon this young man went immediately to Mr. Reading and acquainted him with it according to my desire and direction, and then Mr. Reading went presently to the tavern, and in the mean time I got up into the bed-chamber, and placed myself between the hangings of the bed and the wall; but Mr. Reading finding not Mr. Bedlow at the tavern, went away home, and left word with this young man that he would be with his master by seven o'clock in the morning and ordered him to acquaint his master with it, that he might be up when he came; and as soon as Henry Wiggins returned back and acquainted me that Mr. Reading was gone home, and had left word with him that he would be with his master by seven o'clock in the morning, I went home, but left word with this young man, that I would be with his master by five or six o'clock in the morning, and desired him to acquaint his master with it. I got up the next morning by five o'clock, and went immediately down to Mr. Bedlow's lodgings.

Reading. Sir, you are pleased to say, that the 28th of March you was told, that I would be there about seven of the clock in the morning, and that you at first met me there, and that the appointment failing, then you came the next morning, which was the 29th.

L. C. J. I will tell you how I apprehend him: the first appointment was the 28th of March, which was on Friday, and then failing the other was the next morning which was the 29th.

Speke. As soon as I came to Mr. Bedlow's lodgings, I caused the centinel to knock hard at the door to raise them up; and in the mean time I went into King-street, expecting to have got into some coffee-house or other for to drink a dish of coffee, whilst they were rising, but it was so early that there was no coffee-house open; upon which I was forced to return back again to Mr. Bedlow's lodgings, and then this young man and maid were both got up, and did let me in, and I went up immediately to Mr. Bedlow, and raised him out of his bed; and somewhat before 7 o'clock we placed this young man upon the bed, with the rug only on him, and prepared a place for me on the inside of the bed, between the hangings of the bed and the wall.

L. C. J. You say he was on the bed, and you between the bed and the wall?

Speke. Yes, my lord, between the bed and the wall I was, and he on the bed; and as soon as ever I heard somebody knock at the door (the door being locked by Mr. Bedlow's order, to give me notice of his coming) I ran immediately into my station before he came up, and presently after the door was open, I heard Mr. Reading's voice as he was coming up stairs, (which I know almost as well as his person) as he was speaking to the maid, and afterwards to Mr. Bedlow, who met him either in the passage or at the stair-head, and then they come both into the bed-chamber, (where, I believe, Mr. Reading little thought any body was) though he was so cautious as to ask whether there was nobody there that could over-hear him; to which Mr. Bedlow replied, No, no, or some words to that effect. And then Mr. Bedlow began, and said to Mr. Reading, What say the lords in the Tower now? and what says my lord Stafford as to the estate in Gloucestershire? To which Mr. Reading then replied, and said, My lord has faithfully promised me to settle that estate upon you, and I have orders from my lord to draw up a blank deed in order to settle it on you; which deed my lord hath engaged me to sign and seal ten days after he shall be discharged, you bringing him off from this charge of High-Treason, by shortening and contradicting of your evidence. And Mr. Reading said, My lord Powis, my lord Petre, and sir Henry Tibburn, have faithfully engaged and promised me, that they will every one of them give you a very large and noble reward, which shall be suitable to the service you shall do them, by shortening and contradicting of your evidence against them, and in bringing them off likewise from this charge of High-Treason. To which Mr. Bedlow replied and said, I will not rely upon their promises only, but do expect to have something under their hands. To which Mr. Reading then replied and said, They do not think it fit and convenient for them to do that as yet, but you may safely and securely take my word, as I have done theirs, they having all so faithfully promised me to perform all I have told you from them. And Mr. Reading finding that Mr. Bedlow doubted their performances, according to their words, did moreover use these very expressions, and said, I will engage my life for it. To which Mr. Bedlow then replied, I will then take your word, as you have done theirs. And also told him, The Committee do press upon me to deliver in what I have to say against the lords, and therefore I desire I may have their answer speedily, that I may know what they intend to do, and what they do resolve upon, because I cannot well defer delivering in what I have to say against them any longer than this night, because I hear they come very speedily upon their trials. To which Mr. Reading then replied, That he was sure they could not be brought to their trials before Easter, telling Mr. Bedlow what the parliament must do first, and how they were to proceed in this case: That they must come down to be arraigned, and after that, they must have time to give in their answer, and after that, they must have time to prepare for their trials; and old him, that he might very well defer it till Wednesday; but Mr. Bedlow told him, that he could not defer it till Wednesday, but he would put it off till Monday, and longer he could not: And then Mr. Reading said, that he would go presently to the lords and acquaint them with what he said, and that he should not fail of having their answer by him on Monday, and that it should be ready for him to deliver it into the Committee that night. And after this dialogue was over between Mr. Reading and Mr. Bedlow, they went out into the dining-room, and there Mr. Reading stayed till Mr. Bedlow had quite dressed himself, and afterwards went out both together, and stayed away about half an hour; and when they returned, I and this young man were both together in the dining-room, and then Mr. Bedlow spoke to me as if I were but just come, asking me how long I had been there; I told him I just called on him as I was going to Westminster, or somewhat to that purpose, so that Mr. Reading might not any ways suspect my being there before-hand, to hear the dialogue which passed between them. Mr. Reading then called for a sheet of paper and pen and ink, and went into the bed-chamber, speaking and desiring Mr. Bedlow to follow him; but after Mr. Reading was gone into the bed-chamber, Mr. Bedlow came to me, as I was standing by the chimney, and whispered to me, that they were then just going to draw up what they had concluded on, that the lords might see it and correct it as they thought fit and that they might send him on Monday, in writing, what he should deliver into the Committee to swear against them; which I saw delivered by Mr. Reading; according to his promise, to Mr. Bedlow, on the Monday morning following, in the Painted-Chamber at Westminster, which paper was writ by Mr. Reading's own hand, Mr. Bedlow delivering it to me as soon as ever Mr. Reading left him; and then I and another gentleman of quality went up immediately into the room they call the Lord Privy-Seal's room, where the Committee of lords use to sit, and there Mr. Wharton and I read the paper so delivered, being writ by Mr. Reading's own hand.

Jury. Did you see Mr. Reading's face?

Mr. Speke. Ay, between the door and the wicket, but not in the room. On the Monday morning following, Mr. Bedlow desired that I would be here at Westminster before-hand, and he would come thither. And he told me they were to correct the Paper, and he was to bring it corrected, and, said he, pray follow me, and see the paper delivered.

Reading. What day was that he desired you?
Speke. It was upon Saturday, the 29th of March, that I overheard what was said, and it was upon the Monday morning following that I met with Mr. Bedlow, and he bid me go to Westminster before. And I did so, and when we met at Westminster I went after Mr. Bedlow at a distance: And in the middle of the Court of Requests he met with Mr. Reading, and they went together into the Painted Chamber, and I followed them at a distance; my eye was very much upon them, but I saw Mr. Reading was very cautious that I should not see the paper delivered; and indeed I was as shy as he, that he should not see that I took notice of it, but I did direct my eye somewhat carelessly that way, and at last I saw the paper delivered by Mr. Reading to Mr. Bedlow, and as Mr. Bedlow told you, I and another gentleman of quality went away to the Lord Privy-Seal's lodgings, where he opened the paper, and saw what was delivered to him, and read it: and this is all I have to say.

L. C. J. Shew him the paper. Is this that paper, that you saw him deliver to Mr. Bedlow?

Sir C. Levins. Look upon it, Sir, is that the paper?—Speke. Yes, my lord, certainly I take it so to be.

Just. Atkins. He hath owned it.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, if you would ask this gentleman any questions this is your proper time.

Reading. I hope your lordship will give me the favour to examine them apart.

Just. Wild. Mr. Reading, you do confess what Mr. Speke says to be true?

Reading. My Lord, I did deliver that very paper to Mr. Bedlow in the Painted Chamber in the Court of Requests before Mr. Speke, and it is every word of it of my own hand writing.

Just. Dolben. Did you see Mr. Reading in the room?

Speke. I did not see him, till he was between the wicket and the door.

Just. Wild. Mr. Speke, let me ask you one question; did not you know his voice?

Speke. I knew his voice almost as well as his person.

L. C. Baron. You are sure it was he?

Speke. Yes, I am very confident it was he.

L. C. J. And the discourse was, that he would have it put off till Wednesday, but Mr. Bedlow would not, but only put it off till Monday, and then they agreed upon a paper, an account of which Mr. Reading promised to give on the Monday following.

Speke. Yes, my Lord, it was so.

L. C. J. So that the fact does answer the discourse, for on the Monday following the paper was delivered.

Mr. Ward. Here is only one other evidence, and that is Mr. Bedlow's servant, that was put in the bed, as Mr. Bedlow tells you. Pray swear Henry Wiggins. Which was done.

Sir C. Levinz. Come on, young man, speak your knowledge of this matter.

Wiggins. My lord, what I have to say is this.

L. C. J. Speak out.

Wiggins. What I have to say, is only what Mr. Speke hath said before; and indeed he hath been so very plain, and so exact in all particulars, that I need say but little, and therefore shall be very short. My lord, on Saturday the 29th of March last, Mr. Reading came to my master's lodging between seven and eight in the morning. I was placed on the bed, with the rug only on me; and Mr. Speke was behind the bed, between the hangings of the bed and the wall. As soon as Mr. Reading came into the room, he asked my master, if there were nobody there that could hear them? My master said, No. Then my master asked, What says the lords in the Tower now? And, What says my lord Stafford, as to the estate in Gloucestershire? Saith he, my lord hath promised faithfully to settle it upon you; and has given me order to draw up blank deeds, which in ten days after his discharge, he will sign: And this was for the lessening the evidence. I think those were the words. And just then the rug troubling me, that I could not hear well, I put it off my head; and, my lord, I saw Mr. Reading stand by my master in the chamber. Saith he, my lord Powis, my lord Petre, and sir Henry Tichburn, have all promised you a suitable reward to the good service you shall do them, in bringing them off from their charge. Saith my master, I do not think fit to rely upon their promises only; but do expect something under their hands. No, said he, they do not think it convenient for them to do that, as yet; but you may safely take my word, as well as I have done theirs: And I will engage my life for it. (Which were the words Mr. Reading used.) Saith my master, The committee do press upon me to give in my evidence, and I cannot defer it any longer than this night. Saith Mr. Reading, They cannot come to their trial till Easter; because such and such things are to be done, (as Mr. Speke hath told you) before they can come to their trials, which cannot be done till then: And you may very well defer it till Wednesday. No, said my master, I cannot; but I will do what I can to defer it till Monday. Saith Mr. Reading, I will then go to the lords, and acquaint them with what you say; and bring you an answer from them on Monday morning. And that day, when he came to the Painted Chamber, I saw him deliver that paper to my master, and my master carrying it behind him; and I saw Mr. Speke take it from him; and Mr. Speke and another gentleman went afterwards together up into my Lord Privy Seal's room to read it.

Jury. How long was it ere you saw Mr. Reading, after the discourse in the room?

Wiggins. I got up presently after they were gone out, and I saw them together at the door; and as soon as they were gone, (as I told you) we both went out into the dining room, and went to write down what was said: And within half an hour, they came back again into the room. And saith my master to Mr. Speke, What makes you so early here? How long have you been here? Said he, I called upon you as I was going to Westminster. And then my master desired Mr. Speke to go before to Westminster: And Mr. Reading called for pen, ink, and paper; and went into the bed-chamber, speaking to my master to follow him: And so we went away.

Jury. You say, That you saw him there? and not only heard him talk, but saw him?

Wiggins. When he came into the room, the rug was over my head, and they spoke so softly that I could not hear him very well; but I put it off, without his perceiving me, and saw him then, and heard him plain: And when they went out again, I saw them both.

Speke. We opened the hangings, my lord, a little at the bottom, that he might not suspect any thing, and the curtains were but half drawn or a little more: So that, when he put off the rug, he might easily see him.

L. C. J. Have you any further evidence for the king?

Sir C. Levinz. My lord, if your lordship please, we shall trouble you with no further evidence: We have proved it by three witnesses.

L. C. J. Then, Mr. Reading, now is the time for you to make your defence: They have concluded, that are for the king.

Reading. My lord, I am very unwilling to spend any of your lordship's time in vain. There is one part of the indictment, which I do humbly take notice of to your lordship before-hand: they are so far from charging me to be of the plot, or knowing of the plot, that Mr. Bedlow hath declared the pressingness of my persuasions to him, from time to time, that he would be very full and positive, in charging any man according to his knowledge. Therefore I shall not spend any time, my lord, in speaking to that. I am obliged to Mr. Bedlow, that he hath done me so much right, in saying what he hath said of me about that: But I shall apply myself singly to what he hath given in evidence against me; and what hath been spoken to by Mr. Speke and his servant.

My lord, the indictment is, That I should endeavour to persuade to lessen his evidence against those lords, and sir Henry Tichburn; that is to say, my lord Powis, my lord Stafford, and my lord Petre: They prove nothing against me, as to the other. And my lord, because the indictment doth likewise set forth, that this was done on the behalf of these lords, and on their account, as it says, I shall humbly (before I go on to censure the evidence) give your lordship an account, upon what occasion it was, and how I went to see any of these lords, and sir Henry Tichburn here mentioned.

My lord, within a few days after the lords were sent to the Tower, Mr. Bulstrode, a gentleman of the privy-chamber to his majesty, did come to me from my lord Stafford; telling me, That my lord Stafford desired to be remembered to me, and to pray me to come to him.

My lord, I did tell that gentleman, That though I had a very great reverence for my lord, having known him long, and having been my client for several years; yet, considering how his circumstances then were, I should not venture to go to him, till I had acquainted some of the lords of the close committee with it, and had their leave.

Mr. Bulstrode said, I acted very prudently in it; And accordingly I did go, and acquainted the Prince, my Lord Treasurer, the marquis of Worcester and some other lords with it: And they told me, That my profession did privilege me to go; and God forbid, but that respect should be shewn him and the rest of the lords. Hereupon, my lord, I did go; and when I was there, I acquainted the Lieutenant of the Tower with it; who invited me to dinner with him: I did so, my lord, and my lord Stafford was there: And afterwards he did desire me to go to his quarters with him: And being there, he told me, That I was not ignorant of what he was charged with, and upon what account he was there: And he was pleased to say much concerning his own innocence. I told his lordship, I heartily wished it might appear he was as innocent as he said he was.

Then he desired me to move for his Habeas Corpus. I told him I thought it not reasonable yet to do it: I also told him, I would not at all admit myself to be of counsel for him, but for his innocence and as an innocent man; with this, that I did so expressly abhor and detest the crime that he was charged with, that though I were of counsel with him, or in the very highest degree of friendship imaginable, should I discover he was guilty of it, I would be so far from continuing of counsel for him, that I would come in as a witness against him.

My lord, upon these terms it was, that my lord took my advice, and he gave me my fee, which was two guineas.

My lord, afterwards I was desired by several of the lords to speak with sir Henry Goring, and sir John Gage, then prisoners in the Tower: And my lord, they did desire me, that I would move for their Habeas Corpus's; and, my lord, I did so. I was then sent to by my lord Brunel, and several other gentlemen in the King's-bench, prisoners upon this account: And, my lord, I did at this bar move for several of their Habeas Corpus's. And having the direction of the Court, that though they did not deny the granting of the writ; yet notwithstanding, no benefit should be had of that writ, unless Mr. Attorney being attended in it, should give consent to their being bailed. Accordingly my lord, Mr. Attorney did attend in it, and he was pleased to say, That he would not do any thing for the bailing of any, for all that the writ was granted, till he knew what their accusers charged them with. I then knew it was in vain to bring them up, till Mr. Attorney was satisfied.

Mr. Scroggs and I did go from Mr. Attorney to Mr. Bedlow and Mr. Oates: and the several persons for whom we were of counsel, being set down in a list, we did also set down our directions from Mr. Attorney about them; and did pray them to let us know what they had to charge any of them with. And if they were easy in their consenting to their being bailed, then we did go to Mr. Attorney to let him know it; and he being satisfied from their own mouths, did consent to the bailing of several of them.

My lord, this did occasion my discouraging several times with Mr. Bedlow and Mr. Oates, concerning the nature of the several charges, against the gentlemen they had accused. My lord, during the whole time of my being conversant with Mr. Bedlow (and he hath given your lordship an account how I came acquainted with him) though I did desire sir Trevor Williams might be here, and did send him a Subpœna, because I knew he was unwilling to come unless he were summoned; and I should be glad to see him here.

Bedlow. My lord, sir Trevor Williams is in the House of Commons; and ordered me to send for him, if there were occasion.

L. C. J. Then pray send for him, because Mr. Reading desires it. (Which was done). In the mean time, pray, Mr. Reading, will you go on in your defence. But all that hath been spoken, is not much to the purpose. I would have you apply yourself to the fact sworn, which is comprehensive of all the indictment; and that is, what happened in the chamber the 29th of March last: answer that fact.

Reading. I shall, my lord; but I desire Mr. Bulstrode may be examined to those points I have spoken to.

Bulstrode. My lord, I desire you would hear me, for he is very much mistaken in what he hath said concerning me: For he seems to say I came to him, which I did not do; but accidentally met him at Whitehall.

L. C. J. Look you, unless he calls you, you are not to be called by us, as a witness for the king.

Bulstrode. My lord, he served me with a Subpœna.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, would you have Mr. Bulstrode examined?

Reading. Yes, my lord, if you please; I did pray him to be here to that end.

L. C. J. In this case, though he be a witness for Mr. Reading, he must be sworn: Therefore swear Mr. Bulstrode. (Which was done). Well, what do you ask him?

Reading. My lord, all I do humbly desire is, That he will give your lordship an account whether he did not come unto me in the name of my lord Stafford?

Bulstrode. My lord, I happened one day to go see sir William Goring, who was my neighhour in the country: And as I was going out, I saw my lord Stafford walking: and saluting him, he asked me, Do you know one Mr. Reading, a lawyer? I asked him, What Reading? He answered, That used to be at the Parliament House. I said, I did. Then said he, Pray tell him when you see him, I would speak with him, and should be glad to see him: And in two or three days after, I met with him; and said I, Mr. Reading, my lord Stafford asked me if I knew you; and desired me to tell you, he would be glad to see you. My lord Stafford! said he; and seemed surprised at the name; and I repeated it to him: and this was all that past between me and him. And this was some time in Michaelmas term last.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Reading, we know that the acquaintance you had with Bedlow, and your going to the lords, was in Michaelmas term: the Habeas Corpus's and the matter of bailing was in Hilary term, which ended the 12th of February; and therefore the business between Mr. Attorney and you, must be during Hilary term. But this fact charged upon you in the indictment, and sworn by the witnesses, being on the 28th, 29th and 31st of March, that is a quite other thing: and therefore I would have you apply yourself to that.

Reading. My lord, I shall humbly observe your lordship's directions in that: But I desire to be heard in this other thing also, which was in Michaelmas term. I say, my lord, they were desiring of me to advise them, whether they should move in the House of Lords, whence most of the commitments were issued. For as to some, the charge was against them in the House of Commons, some in the House of Lords, some were generally committed by my Lord Chief Justice Scroggs; and according to the nature of the cases, so they did desire me that I would advise them how to address themselves, by one way or other, for procuring their liberty by bail or otherwise. And as to the writs obtained, and the bailing of several of them, it was in Hilary term, which was before the fact charged upon me. But I did give your lordship an account how it was, in order to have it appear naked before you; and then I should be in your lordship's judgment, which, I am sure, will be right. And I do say, my lord, that afterwards I met several times with my lord Powis and my lord Petre, at the Lieutenant of the Tower's house.

L. C. J. Here is now sir Trevor Williams; do you desire he should be sworn?

Reading. I do, my lord.

L. C. J. Then give him his oath. (Which was done).

Reading. My lord, with your lordship's favour, that which I desire sir Trevor Williams to give your lordship an account of, is this. Whether he was not pleased to bring Mr. Bedlow to my chamber, and to recommend me to him about his pardon?

Sir Tr. Williams. My lord, Mr. Reading was an acquaintance of mine; and upon what I knew, I had a great opinion of his knowledge in the law; and Mr. Bedlow was a countryman of mine, and I was very desirous he should have his pardon as perfect as could be: And in order to that, I recommended him to Mr. Reading, and desired him to be careful about it, And that is all that I can say.

L. C. J. What further questions would you ask him?

Reading. My lord, I desire to know of him, What advice he hath heard me give Mr. Bedlow in order to his dealing ingenuously, and my pressing of him to a full discovery of the plot.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, as to that, Mr. Bedlow hath already cleared it himself, that in all public discourses between you and him, you did carry it very plausibly; yet we will not preclude you from having your witnesses speak to that, if you will have them examined to it.

Reading. My lord, I will trouble sir Trevor Williams with no more questions.

L. C. J. You need not as to this point; Mr. Bedlow hath testified, that publicly you did advise him to make full discoveries, and spare no person.

Bedlow. I did say so at first, and I will do him justice, he did really and honestly I believe, give me that advice, as to all in public, and only spoke about those men he was concerned for, towards whom he would make me easy.

L. C. J. Pray, Mr. Reading, will you come to the fact?

Reading. My lord, at the time of my being examined before the committee, I did deliver some papers, which I had from Mr. Bedlow, and under his hand, and which do concern the evidence I am to give in my own defence: These I do beg the favour may be sent to me, to make use of them for myself, and I shall, as soon as the Court hath looked upon them, return them again.

Bedlow. There was a proposition about it, in the House of Commons; and the main paper, which, I suppose, Mr. Reading desires to produce, is in Mr. Clure's hand, to be produced, when called for, if the court think fit.

L. C. J. Have you it there, Mr. Clare?

Clare. Yes, my lord, I have.

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, when the prisoner calls for a paper, which he himself delivered in, I think it is but fair it should be produced.

Att. Gen. (sir William Jones). Yes, my lord, I do not oppose it.

Sir C. Levinz. My lord, Mr. Reading must understand, that this is no hinge from us, but he desires such a paper, which let him make what use of it he can.

Bedlow. I suppose it is about the protection for Prickman.

Reading. Mr. Bedlow, if you please to answer it by and by, when it is read, and let me open it myself.

L. C. J. Here is now Mr. Sacheverel; what have you to say to him?

Mr. Sacheverel. My lord, in the House of Commons we have received a letter from Mr.

Reading, by which he doth desire, for his own justification, to have some papers sent him, which were delivered to the Secret Committee; I suppose he means a paper about Mr. Prickman, and a letter concerning him, and likewise a paper that contained a state of the evidence against the lords, which he pretended Mr. Bedlow had dictated to him: that, I suppose, Mr. Clare hath; for the other two, the House of Commons hath ordered me to bring them here, that if he can use them, or any other, in his own defence, he may have free liberty so to do.

L. C. J. Is there any other thing you would have with Mr. Sacheverel?

Reading. Nothing, my lord; I humbly thank him for this favour, and the House too.

L. C. J. Mr. Sacheverel, these papers you have brought, shall be put into the hands of Mr. Clare, to carry to the Secret Committee, when the trial is over.

Justice Wild. Mr. Reading, pray spare me one word; you are a lawyer, and you know how to make your defence, speak ad idem, the thing you are charged with, the tampering with Bedlow to take off his evidence against those lords, or else you do nothing; for we are not about the plot in general, nor are you charged with it.

Reading. My lord, I shall do nothing else; I shall not give you the trouble of speaking to any thing else; my lord, Mr. Bedlow will give your lordship an account of the discourse that I had with him, at the time that I had been to wait upon my Lord Chief Justice Scroggs; I went to him upon this occasion, Mr. Bedlow desired me to go wait upon my Lord Chief Justice, to give him an account about the particular evidence he had given; I think it was against Mr. Coleman, and that he being with my Lord Chief Justice, my lord was pleased to treat him, not as he expected from him; whereupon he fell into great expressions of passion, and went down stairs, and said, It would never be well in England, till there was an honest man than the Lord Chief Justice. When he had told me this, I told him, at what rate his lordship had endeared himself to the whole nation, by his zeal against the plot; however, saith he, do me the kindness to beg my lord's pardon, and pray him to accept of this paper. My lord, I was extremely sorry, that Mr. Bedlow had so misbehaved himself; I had a great kindness for Mr. Bedlow, I have sufficiently testified it, and now sufficiently suffer for it: and in kindness to him, I went to wait upon my lord, and delivered him the paper; I told his lordship, that I was heartily sorry, that he had carried himself in such a manner towards his lordship, but I did desire his lordship to pass it by, for I did believe Mr. Bedlow was very sorry for it. My lord said, It was sufficiently known that he was not a man of passion, but that he pitied Mr. Bedlow, and desired he would be more careful and discreet for the time to come, for his own sake, and for the kingdom's; I returned to him, and gave him this account, and what was my lord's advice to him. My lord, when he had his pardon a drawing; and when he was asked by the king and my lord chancellor, who was his friend? who was his counsel? he was pleased to say, that I was his counsel, and his friend, recommended by sir Trevor Williams, as hath been proved; and when his majesty was pleased to ask him, what advice I had given him? he returned the king this answer; that I had bid him speak the truth with courage; to spare no man, where he could justly charge any man; and to trust God and his majesty for a reward. The king was pleased to say, the advice was honest; and bade him follow it. What I did in this matter, I did in friendship to him, because I had a great kindness for him: I have supplied him with several guineas, with a guinea or two, when he told me he has not had bread. He was pleased to tell me, that he was very sensible of the service I had done him. I appeal to him, whether ever I saw a penny of money from him in my life; he was pleased to tell me, that upon the receiving of the 500*l.* in the Proclamation, he would give me a third part, for that service I had done him, and would certainly repay me whatsoever I had lent him, and the fees that were due to me. And, my lord, upon this I did likewise tell him, that he had not carried himself well, that he had been a very great scandal, abroad and at home, and that he would not do himself right, till he had advised with Dr. Stillingfleet, Dr. Tillotson, and Dr. Lloyd. I did advise him to go to the chapel, and, upon conference with those worthy men, I desired him seriously to consider, how he could digest so many as thirty sacraments, which he had taken as obligations of secrecy; my lord, Mr. Wharton was at that time by, and he hath often heard me give him advice to this effect. Mr. Wharton undertook to go to Dr. Stillingfleet, but he desired to be excused; I did then pray him to go to Dr. Tillotson; Mr. Bedlow told me, it was no great matter, and so likewise for Dr. Lloyd. He told me, they were all mercenary men, that valued 10*s.* above any man's soul: and at this rate he was pleased to treat them. I told him, I was very sorry, and displeased to hear him to speak so ill of men of so great eminency in the world for learning and piety. My lord, in further discoursing with Mr. Bedlow, he told me he was overjoyed, that his majesty had been pleased to take off the confinement they were under, for they had not liberty to speak to one another; he, and Mr. Oates, and Mr. Dugdale; but when it was so granted, that they might now speak together, he told me, with exceeding rejoicing, that they could now lay their stories together. He did further tell me, that he had now by him several witnesses, that whatsoever he bid them swear, they would swear; and he did confess he had not done well in some things; particularly in charging Mr. Griffith. Now, my lord, that Mr. Griffith was steward to Mr. Sheldon.

L. C. J. Before you go on in this kind, Mr. Reading, I must tell you, it is not fair: here is oath made of such and such facts against you, and you talk of discourses between you and Mr. Bedlow; either produce Mr. Bedlow to say upon his oath what he hath told you, or else produce some other witnesses to prove it, if you think it material: do you think your word shall pass for truth, by telling this story? all this matter will be nothing in the case, unless you apply it to discredit the witnesses, therefore pray produce some proof, and we will hear it; if you will ask Mr. Bedlow any questions, whereby you may entrap him, and make him contradict himself; or if you will produce any other witnesses against him, do it; but you must not be suffered to go in such discourses as these, and spend time to no purpose.

Bedlow. My lord, if your lordship please to give me leave, I will answer him.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, I must tell you, I have as much patience as another man, and when you are charged with a crime, which you yourself know, and at first said, cannot be aggravated, I thought it fit you should have all fair liberty of speaking to defend yourself; I have had a great deal of patience to hear you already, and so have my brothers: I cannot say you have spoke unskilfully; I confess your defence is artificial, because it is nothing to the purpose: but, we must hold you to the point; if you can say any thing to disprove the fact of the 28th, 29th, and 31st of March, that is the whole matter that lies upon you; as to all other things, they signify nothing.

Reading. My lord, if I understand any thing in my own defence, I did look upon this as so material, as nothing more. My lord, when I did find this, I appeal to Mr. Bedlow, and ask him this question upon his oath, whether I did not desire him, as I had desired him before, to speak home, in what he knew for truth; that he would do well to remember, that this land groaned for the shedding of innocent blood; and whether I did not tell him, that if he should go on to add sin to sin, and charge any man unjustly, to take away his life, whether, instead of preserving the nation, by which he thought he might well deserve of it, he might not ruin it?

L. C. J. Do you desire that he should be asked that question?

Reading. My lord, I do.

L. C. J. Mr. Bedlow, you hear the question, pray answer it.

Bedlow. My lord, I do not deny, but that he hath publicly given me such advice, and hath charged me with doing of wrong, in particular, to Mr. Griffith; and I do acknowledge, that Mr. Griffith had a great deal of wrong; but, how was it? It was by the mistake of them that took him; the uncle was taken for the nephew, who was really concerned in the Plot, and that occasioned his trouble: and I told him I was very sorry for that.

Reading. Pray, Sir, did he give you a gold watch?

Bedlow. Yes, he did, and I told the committee and the prince of it presently.

Justice Wild. Mr. Bedlow, you received several sums of money from Mr. Reading, by the oath you have taken, were those lent to you, or did you take them to be given?

Bedlow. Whereas he says, That I told him I wanted bread, it was an unreasonable thing for me to say so, for I have five dishes of meat every day allowed me, and, how could I then want bread?

Justice Atkins. And you had good sums of money too given to you.

Justice Wild. But, as I understood you, you said, whenever you wanted money, he supplied you.

Bedlow. And sometimes gave me money when I did not ask it.

Justice Wild. But answer my question. Did he give you that money for the intent that you should lessen your evidence against the lords in the Tower?

Bedlow. This money that I received of Mr. Reading, he told me, that he had received orders from the lords, that I should have what money I came for; that at present I could not have any great sum, because they could not have money, for my lord Stafford, saith he, is selling his wood, and until that be come in, he hath not wherewithal to provide for his family, but I have order to let you have what you want.

Justice Wild. And he gave you money after that?—Bedlow. Yes, he did.

Justice Wild. And upon that occasion?

Bedlow. Yes, I thought so. And whereas he says, my lord, that I was to pay him the money again, I must confess he was to have 100*l.* a year of every 1,000*l.* a year of my reward.

Reading. By the oath you have taken, was that the reward?

Bedlow. Yes, by the oath I have taken, so it was agreed.

L. C. J. I never knew any man go about such a business as this without some invention to palliate it with; they do not use to go downright in suborning witnesses, and say, here is so much money for you, pray forswear yourself, or pray be a knave; but, pray remember that you speak nothing but the truth, and be cautious that you do not swear too much; and so it is all gilded with pretence of the desire of truth, but then they add, You shall have a very good reward for your care in it; but if this way should be allowed, to bribe witnesses to speak the truth, or upon colour of speaking nothing but the truth, I cannot tell what will be Subornation. For it is always done upon this pretence.

Justice Atkins. Mr. Reading, there fell something from your own mouth that was discouragement enough; you asked him how he could digest 30 Sacraments, which he received as obligations of secrecy, and advised him to go to Divines to receive satisfaction about it. That was a discouragement.

Reading. My lord, I did not mean it so; I did as a Christian, and a loyal subject, advise him not to shed innocent blood. Mr. Bedlow, you have brought me here to this bar, pray remember you and I must be at a greater.

Bedlow. I always remember it.

Reading. Pray, Sir, answer this question upon your oath. Did I ever directly or indirectly desire you to lessen any one syllable of your evidence you knew to be true?

Bedlow. I suppose there is no need to prove that, for there are two other witnesses have proved it already.

Reading. But pray, Sir, answer my question upon your oath.

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, I do upon my oath declare, That upon my bringing the lords off from the charge that was upon them, I was to have such a reward, and you told me, you had order to draw up blank deeds.

Justice Wild. Mr. Reading, pray hear me; he hath gone farther than that, and hath sworn that he did lessen his evidence against Whitebread and Fenwick upon your instigation, which is not indeed in the indictment.

Bedlow. I did then say at the Old-Bailey (because I would not spoil the design I had upon him, when my lord chief justice asked me, if that were all I could say). I told him it was all I could say at present, but in time and place convenient I could say more.

L. C. J. That is not the matter in question now here, but the other witnesses have sworn it sufficiently. The young lad swears expressly, that he remembers his master asked about the land in Gloucestershire, and you answered you had order to draw up a blank deed for the settlement: and as for the other lords, you told him, he should have a good reward suitable to the service he should do them. And you, as to that, make no kind of defence, but think we should forget it by your long discourse to other purpose.

Reading. I would not desire to spend your lordship's time in vain discourses. It lies purely on my negation, and his affirmation.

Justice Wild. No, no, it is not; here are two more, Mr. Speke and his man, that swear the same.

Reading. My lord, I come to that; and I take it for granted the law is this, that in cases of this nature, nay, of a much less nature, no man shall be accused but by lawful witnesses: and, my lord, I do insist upon it as law: so is my lord Lovelace's case, and 1 and 5 Ed. 6. If mine is not treason, yet it is a very heinous crime; and I am in your lordship's judgment, whether there is a possibility of having these, Mr. Bedlow, and the others, to be lawful witnesses. Mr. Speke, how worthy a gentleman soever he is, is one to whom I have done particular service, I have lent him money, and to this day have it not. That he should go, my lord, and place himself behind an hanging, and put a servant on a bed, to over-hear, and to eves-drop, which is the term of a crime in law; that such should pass for lawful witnesses, my lord, I hope it was never pretended to before, nor will be admitted against me: but, my lord, all my comfort is, that when I went to him, I did never propound such a thing to Mr. Bedlow since I was born. And God deal with me here, and in the next world, according to the integrity of my heart, and the truth of what I speak now. Yesterday sevennight, when I did not hope to see another Sunday, so spent I was with the barbarous usage I have received, I did desire Dr. Tillotson to give me the Sacrament, for I did not expect to live till the next morning. And I did pray him to remember, against the time when he and I were to meet before the great God, that what I was charged with in this indictment, is as expressly false, as ever any thing was sworn against an innocent man. I can but say this now, come life, come death, the will of his majesty and of your lordships be done. There never stood a more innocent man at this bar than I am of this fact I am charged with. And I do say, my lord, that having said this, I must, with your favour, proceed to tell you, that I desire Mr. Bedlow will be pleased but to give an answer to these two questions, and I have done. Pray, Sir, by the oath you have taken, did you lay in provisions of fire, coal, and billets behind the Palgrave's-head tavern, and hard by Charing-Cross, to burn the city of Westminster?

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, we must see justice done on all sides: if you offer to ask him any question upon his oath, to make him accuse himself, we must oppose it.

Justice Dolben. He hath his pardon, my lord, and it ought not to be objected against him, if so.

Reading. The pardon of the king doth remit the punishment, but it doth not hinder its being objected to invalidate his testimony.

L. C. J. It doth so far set him right, that you shall not make him calumniate himself.

Justice Wild. No, you should never object it against him to accuse himself.

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, we are in a court of law, and you are skilled in the law; you have no evidence to defend yourself by, and so you think your protestations must serve for evidence: when that will not serve your turn, you strive to lead us out of the way. Upon this question to Mr. Bedlow there lies this dilemma against you: either he hath his pardon for what you object against him, or he hath not: if he hath not his pardon, then he is in danger of death for the crime, and must not accuse himself; if he hath his pardon, it doth take away as well all calumny as liahleness to punishment, and sets him right against all objection. So, you know, after an act of general pardon, it is a scandal to reproach a man for that which he is thereby pardoned for. So that if he have not his pardon, his life is in danger; if he hath, neither his life nor name must suffer, and therefore such questions must not be asked him. But if you have any other questions that are pertinent to the business, propound them, and they shall be heard and answered.

Reading. My lord, I took the law to be, that no man should be accused but by lawful witnesses, which I took him not to be, though he hath his parlon.

L. C. J. I understand lawful witnesses, or accusers, to be such whose testimony is not taken away by the law; if a man stands so in court that he cannot be received to give evidence, he is no lawful witness; as if a man be convicted of perjury, he is not a lawful witness, because he cannot be heard at all. But every thing that lessens the credit of his testimony doth not make but that he is a lawful witness; for I take him to be a lawful witness as long as he can be heard at all. And, as for the eves-dropping which you from the term of law would infer a scandal upon Mr. Speke; I take it to be a thing that makes much for the credit of the gentleman. For he was not the man that did first detect you, you were detected before by Mr. Bedlow; and as it stood only upon his testimony, should you deny it, it was but your negation and his affirmation; and therefore it concerned him (being a deed of darkness in its own nature, when he engaged himself by his discourse as much as you) to have some of unquestionable integrity and credit to detect you further in it, and for his own vindication. And it is therefore a credit to Mr. Speke that he was thought such a person, whose credit was not to be suspected, and so was set to convict you. So that it is so far from detracting from his credit, that it shews him a man reputed to be of undoubted integrity.

Bedlow. I say this, my lord, we did design to propose it to another gentleman of quality, who had been before acquainted with the design in general, but we could not find him out to acquaint him with it.

Speke. As for what he says of money he lent me, I will acquaint your lordship how it was. There was a double return in the case of my brother's election for this parliament, and he and the other gentlemen that stood with him (for there were four returned) had gotten order for the hearing of their cause, and I had taken a copy out before, and paid 6s. 8d. for it or thereabouts, and afterwards Mr. Reading comes to my chamber and brings me another order, and I told him I had one already, and asked him what he paid for it, he told me 10s. Now I knew it was but 6s. 8d. for I had paid so before: said I, what need I have another? but I suppose my brother will pay you. I had before recommended him to my brother, to manage his business in parliament, and I did desire he might be of counsel for him. I knew what passed concerning the treaty between Mr. Bedlow and him daily; but because he should not suspect me, I did carry myself very fairly and friendly to him, and, as I said, I desired my brother to employ him, and let him be of his counsel; but my brother refused, and told me he would have nothing to do with him; for, said he, I hear an ill character of him. And the 10s. for the order is the money he speaks of.

L. C. J. Is that all the money he lent you?

Speke. Yes, that is all.

Justice Atkins. Mr. Reading, this I must say to you, your aspersion of these persons with being eves-droppers, is no aspersion at all. For it was necessary for Mr. Bedlow to take this course, and it was prudent for him to make use of unsuspected persons to have it understood by the mouth of more than one witness what your practices were. For if he had not done it, and it had been otherwise discovered, he had been in the same danger that you are in now.

Reading. My lord, I have done. Since Mr. Speke hath been pleased to give you an account of this matter, I desire I may ask him one question: Whether he did not come to me to be of the counsel with his brother?

L. C. J. He hath said so already.

Reading. Did not you bring this gentleman, your brother, to my chamber?

Speke. Yes, I did.

Reading. Did not you desire me to draw up his case?

Speke. Yes, I think I did.

Reading. I spent most of a whole morning in it: Pray did I ever receive a penny of money of you?

Speke. No. I spoke to my brother to employ you, but he said he had heard an ill character of you, and he would have nothing to do with you. And you asked ten shillings for an order which I had before for 6s. and 8d.

Reading. Here is this gentleman, Mr. Hayes, who had been a clerk there, and knows it to be ten shillings every order.

L. C. J. It is not at all pertinent to the business we are upon.

Reading. He hindered me from receiving a fee from the other side, and I am twenty shillings out of pocket, and yet am thus treated for my kindness. There were three orders I paid for.

Speke. There were more concerned than my brother: You delivered but one to me, I know not how many you delivered to the rest.

Wild. I am sorry you disgrace your profession by making so weak a defence. What say you to that which past on Saturday morning at Mr. Bedlow's?

Reading. Mr. Bedlow did desire me to go to the Lords in the Tower, to tell them that he was called upon to give in his evidence against them and that he could delay it no longer; and he bid me tell them, that is to say, my lord Stafford, my lord Powis, and my lord Petre, that if they did not assure him of a good reward, he would give in such an evidence against them as should take away their lives, and he had witness to do it, as well as he himself; but he bid me tell them, if they would give him a reward, he would put in such an evidence as would do them no hurt at all.

Justice Wild. This is directly against you, and within the words of the indictment; 'tis a contracting with him for a reward to lessen his evidence against the four lords. He told you, as you say, thus, and thus, and you agreed to do as he said.

Dobben. You do speak the truth plainly now.

Reading. My lord, I do say this, that what I have said is true; in the presence of God I speak it. The lords do know this, and the Lord of heaven doth know it, he proposed it first to me.

Justice Atkins. It is to no purpose to talk unless you can prove it.

L. C. J. Call your witnesses, and we will hear them. Will the jury give in their verdict upon your bare assertion? We have heard you a great while; if you will call any witnesses, do.

Sir James Butler. My lord, I desire Mr. Reading may be asked, whether 56 guineas were not brought by him to Mr. Bedlow, and paid to him for to lessen his evidence against the Lords.

Bedlow. I had sometimes two guineas, sometimes more, but not any such great sum at once, but I believe more, at several times; and he told me that he had order to supply me at any time with what I wanted.

L. C. J. Come, where are your witnesses, Mr. Reading?

Reading. Here is Mr. Palmer, my lord. [Who was sworn.] My lord, I desire this gentleman may give you an account what Mr. Bedlow did say to me concerning the borrowing of any money, upon the Tuesday morning before I was clapped up: The 30th of March, as I take it, in the morning.

Justice Atkins. That was Sunday.

Reading. It was on Tuesday, my lords, the day before he received the 500*l.* I believe it was the first or second of April. My lord, this gentleman was there in the room.

Palmer. My lord, Mr. Bedlow at that time had twenty shillings in his haud of his mother's, as he said: Mr. Reading came in, said he, Mr. Reading, all my money is gone, and I have no more than this, and this I have borrowed of my mother; with that Mr. Reading clapped his hand in his pocket, and gave him two guineas. God-a-mercy, saith Mr. Bedlow, you are an honest man, and my chief fountain.

Sir Cr. Levins. When was this money delivered?

Palmer. It was about three weeks ago.

Justice Wild. But he tells you, you were to have a sup out of this fountain.

L. C. J. He doth prove this (what use you will make of it I know not,) That on Tuesday three weeks ago, which we find to be the first of April, he saw twenty shillings in Mr. Bedlow's hand, and he said, This is all the money I have; and you clapped your hand into your pocket, and gave him two guineas, and he said, God-a-mercy, you are my chief fountain.

Justice Atkins. This was after you saw Mr. Bedlow was for your turn. This makes against you.

Reading. I desire he may be asked, whether he hath not heard Mr. Bedlow confess that he hath had money several times from me.

L. C. J. Mr. Bedlow hath confessed it.

Reading. I desire him to tell, whether Mr. Bedlow did not confess, that he did lay fuel behind the Palgrave-Head tavern to burn Westminster.

Bedlow. I acknowledge it; that was part of the treason I was guilty of, and for which the king pardoned me.

Reading. I desire to ask Mr. Bedlow's man one question; Whether your master, when I went along with him to fetch the privy-seal for the 500*l.*, did not desire me to lend him money for the privy-seal?

Wiggins. He said he had no money about him, and asked you if you had any, and desired you would lend him some; and then I said I had some, and so he said no more.

Reading. Was there any thing of the consideration spoken of?

Wiggins. I do not know that, I could not hear it. He spoke it in the open court, where there were a great many by.

Reading. I have several other witnesses, that will give you an account, that when he hath not had any money to pay a reckoning, he hath had it from me at several times; and the very day when he had got this money, the 500*l.*, and it was laid upon the table in the room, in the tavern where he was, he did then desire me to let him have a guinea for to pay the reckoning; and he would pay me in the afternoon.

Bedlow. I do not deny it, but that I have received several sums of money, for he always told me, I must trouble nobody else when I wanted money, but him.

Justice Atkins. They who have to deal with men of such art as you are of, must use some art with you.

Justice Wild. Did you ever promise to pay him back the money again?

Bedlow. No, my lord, but he was to have a hundred pounds a year out of every thousand pounds a year that I should have from them lords.

Reading. My lord, I do here declare, that I never had any more from the lords in the Tower, than thus: I had from my lord Stafford six guineas, and I do not know I had one more; I had never from my lord Bellasis more than two guineas; nor from my lord Petre than five, and that was at the time when I carried him the paper, which I will give your lordship an account of, by and by. I never spoke to my lord Arundel, though I met him often; nor with my lord Powis, than upon this account: Mr. Bedlow did desire me to go and tell the lords in the Tower, That if they did well reward him, he would make the charge he had against them very easy. My lord, I did tell him, This is an affair which I cannot in prudence deal in, for, said I, you are a designing man, and how you will deal with me afterwards I do not know. Said he, It is in your power, Mr. Reading, by this that I have said, to do me a mischief, because if you do discover what I have said to you, you will be believed, but if I should offer this against you, I shall never be believed. And with all the imprecations in the world I do curse myself, if I did directly or indirectly offer to persuade him to diminish his evidence, but he proposed it to me. But, said I, here is one Mr. Dugdale, and he may give evidence against my lord Stafford, though you do not, and what will you do as to him? Believe me, said he, that I deal intirely with you, by this token: Did not Dugdale come to you to desire you to draw up his evidence? And so he did, my lord, and told me he would be responsible for it. I told him I was unwilling to meddle with such an affair, but if he would come to my chamber I would give him what leisure I had, in order to the drawing up of his evidence into a method; but he never came. Mr. Bedlow told me, said he, Believe me in all the rest by this token, have a care of him, he is set on purpose to ensnare you. Saith he, Tell from me, he shall do him no harm, for he hath promised to say nothing against my lord Stafford, but what I will have him to say. I desire Mr. Bedlow will answer this upon his oath: Did I ever know one Nicholas Jordan till you acquainted me with him? Had not he some estate in Gloucestershire?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, I did tell Mr. Reading, that I would have such an estate settled upon me, of my lords, in Gloucestershire, and his words to me were these: That he had order to draw blank deeds for the conveying of that estate, which my lord would sign in ten days after his discharge.

Reading. He told me, that for the other witnesses, he would do well enough with them, and desired me to tell my lord Stafford, that he would do so and so, let him have but a reward; and believing of it, I went to the Tower, I asked my lord Stafford if he knew one Nicholas Jordan; he told me he did, he had been a tenant of some estate of his. Mr. Bedlow bid me ask him, whether he should not have a provision of money secured to him out of that farm. My lord, I told him I would acquaint his lordship with it. I did so, and my lord Stafford was pleased to tell me, that he would not give him sixpence; that he did value himself upon his own innocency, and the infamy of his accusers; that if he should offer to give him any thing, he should look upon it as the greatest part of his guilt. But, said he to me, Mr. Reading, this I must confess, you have been often with me, I am much indebted to you for fees for coming to me, if you will but write a letter to me, that you are not able to attend my business, and neglect other men's, at this rate of being paid; and that therefore I should not take it ill that you do not come to me any more, unless you may have an assurance of being satisfied and rewarded for it. And, saith he, thereupon I will write you this in answer, That I will give you the sum of 200*l.* to be paid to you within ten days after my acquittal; and, with he, I will give you this assurance too, that you shall have this 200*l.* secured to you, as soon as ever you shall desire it. My lord, this being the sum; but withal remember, saith he at the same time, I do here declare, and pray do not fail of remembering it, that I will not, directly nor indirectly, promise Mr. Bedlow sixpence. I went to my lord Powis, from whom I never saw sixpence in my life, and he did declare to me, that he would not for any thing in the world be guilty of the making him a promise of one sixpence (and this is certainly so); nevertheless, if Mr. Bedlow will not go on to do me a mischief, as hitherto he hath done, and shall not go on to charge me unjustly, when I am acquitted, he shall find that I will do what shall be like a gentleman; but I won't promise one farthing.

L. C. J. You have said enough, Mr. Reading.

Reading. My lord Petre said he would give never a farthing.

Justice Wild. This is against yourself.

Reading. I cannot help it, I did it to save innocent blood, God's will be done with mine, I think I was bound to do this, and I had sinned against God Almighty and my country if I had not done it. My lord, I did come back to Mr. Bedlow, and he did ask me if I had been with the lords in the Tower; I did tell him, Yes; and I did ask him whether there was any body in the bed by him. He asked me, What say the lords? I think I did tell him in very little different terms from what I have now told you, he it of what construction it will. And wherens he says, that there was a thousand pounds and writings to be drawn, I never opened my mouth to him of such a thing.

L. C. J. What say you to the estate in Gloucestershire?

Reading. That was only to secure the 200*l.* to me, 'pro consilio impenso et impendendo.' My lord, when that was done, Mr. Bedlow was pleased to tell me, for I must confess, he did desire me to give him an account, and I did come very late, as Mr. Speke says. I was in his chamber about an hour; it seems it was that time that this gentleman, as he says, was there, but Mr. Bedlow not being at home, I went away; and being to give him an account next morning, it seems this gentleman was there also, for he hath sworn it; when I came I gave him this account, and God knows it was no other; nor did I ever hear talk of any deeds drawing.

Speke. Did not you say, that the deed was to be signed in ten days?

Reading. I did tell him, that my lord would give me a letter, wherein he would promise me to secure the payment of 200*l.* within ten days after his acquittal.

Speke. I say what you said. You had orders to draw up a deed, from my lord of Stafford; which my lord had promised faithfully to seal within ten days after he was discharged.

Reading. It was only a deed for 200*l.* to be paid to me 'pro consilio impenso et impendendo;' and to be secured upon that estate in Gloucestershire.

Speke. Nay, I do not know; I heard no Latin there.

L. C. J. But what is that to Mr. Bedlow?

Justice Wild. Why should you discourse with Mr. Bedlow about your pension?

Reading. My lord Stafford did say, When you have the money, the 200*l.* do you dispose of it as you think fit.

L. C. J. This is nothing to the purpose, but an endeavour, by multiplicity of words, to make us forget what has been sworn. Answer the matter of the paper whereby the evidence was lessened.

Reading. My lord, upon this Mr. Bedlow was pleased to tell me (thus in answer: That he would take their lordships' words; and bid me go along with him, and he would go fetch that evidence that he had, and would put in such and such evidence, I should write, and he should dictate. I went along with him to York-buildings, where he said his mother lay: and there he said he had left his papers; but when he came there, they were not there, but he told me his memory should serve; and we went back to the chamber. And, my lord, it seems these gentlemen were there before, and Mr. Bedlow sent them away; and when they were gone, we went into a room together, where he did dictate to me every syllable I wrote. And when he had dictated, and I had writ it, I read it, and he read it again himself. And having perused it, he said, 'This is that which, I think, is kind to them; and this is that I can come off with well enough in saying it; for I can make it out afterwards, that it was by hearsay. And this, saith he, do you take along with you, and carry it to the lords, and let me have their answer. And this is that very paper that I did write in Mr. Bedlow's chamber by his directions, and dictated from his mouth.'

Justice Atkins. And you did carry it to the lords?

Reading. Yes, I did. And, my lord, when I had done this, I did ask him this question (I did not direct him any one syllable; but as he dictated, so I wrote): what he had to say against my lord Bellasis, and my lord Arundel? He told me, that though he was resolved to be kind to those lords, yet he was resolved the other should die. And he told me, That the 4,000*l.* and the 1,500*l.* that was to be paid to sir George Wakeman, was to be paid by my lord Bellasis. And, my lord, I began to write, and did write five or six lines here in this paper, and then left off. My lord, when I had done this, I went to the Tower the first opportunity; I did come to my lord Stafford, and I shewed him this. He told me, That he did find that Mr. Bedlow would now begin to be an honest man. My lord, afterwards I went to my lord Petre, and shewed it to him; and he did, at that time, my lord, give me five guineas; and before that I never saw a penny of his money in my life. I went to my lord Powis, and when I came, I found sir Henry Tichburn in the chamber; and it being late at night, and it being parliament-time, and I having persons that staid for me, I did desire to be excused: though sir Henry was pleased to walk out upon the leads, leaving my lord and me together, yet did not I shew him any one syllable of this paper, nor did I say any thing to him concerning it. My lord, I think it was upon the Monday morning that I came to Mr. Bedlow's: he was not within; I then came to the Painted Chamber, and I was going up to the House of Lords, and Mr. Bedlow met me in the Court of Requests, or the Painted Chamber, one of them, and this gentleman was with him. And there he asked me for a paper: I had writ it out before, and it is this very paper that is now with Mr. Clare. He did desire me, after I had been with the Lords, to deliver a copy of this to them to write it out: and I did so; and this is writ in the third person, the other was writ in the first person; and, I think, there is no other alteration in it. My lord, that which I did deliver to this gentleman Mr. Bedlow, before Mr. Speke, was in the first person, the other was in the third. What they did with it afterwards, I cannot tell. My lord, after this the 500*l.* was received, and he promised to pay me all the next morning, and prayed me that I would come to his chamber. But when I came I missed of him. His clerk told me, he was gone abroad. I came here to Westminster; and when I came there, I went up to the Speaker's chamber, to speak with my clients there: but when I came up, the door was fastened, and I was arrested. My lord, I have done; and let it be with me, or against me, this is what I said to the Committee of Secrecy; and I speak to your lordship under the greatest tie and obligation to speak truth, in the world, that this is all I know. And whereas Mr. Bedlow did tell your lordship, that this writing that I have drawn was not as he directed, but that I had carried it to the lords, and their lordships did correct it, and I brought it back again; that I did bring him another paper: that very copy which I writ out, in the chamber, in the third person, I have; and this that is produced against me, is the first person, and I desire your lordships to look upon it, and judge whether there be any correction, more than the alteration of the person.

[Then both the Papers were shewn to Mr. Bedlow.]

Bedlow. Your lordships may see both these papers are fair written, without interlining; but there were above forty interlineations in that paper that was written in my chamber.

L. C. J. This agrees with what you said before, that when you did put in any thing that was home, he would correct it, and say, this is treason, and this will charge them; and so mended it. And it was natural there should be two papers: that which was to be kept for the Lords, was in the third person, importing, that he saith so and so; and the other was in the first person, which was to be kept by Mr. Bedlow, for the helping of his memory, I heard so and so; that he might know how to observe his contract. But what say you to this, that the first paper was, as Mr. Bedlow says, corrected, and had many interlineations, and cannot, therefore, be the same with that you produced?

Reading. My lord, I hear it; I have but this thing to answer, let it avail me any thing or nothing. I speak it in the presence of God, (pray favour me) this paper is the very paper that I did write out; there is no other interlineation in it than what you see. It never went out of my hand, from the time of my writing it in Mr. Bedlow's chamber, till the time that I shewed it them in the Tower, and I did deliver it to Mr. Sacheverel.

Justice Wild. Ay, but there was another paper, there was a paper corrected according to your intention; and then you caused this paper to be wrote out, and it was never seen since.

Reading. No other, upon my word.

Justice Wild. But he swears it, and it is obvious to the least understanding here.

Reading. My lord, I have only this to say, That it is not true.

L. C. J. But it is very probable, and it is sworn to be true.

Reading. I can only say, It is not true.

Justice Wild. I have one thing to say to you: with what colour could you justify what you did to carry the king's evidence to the prisoners, if it were no more than that?

Reading. I have but this answer for that, I did not know it was a crime.

Justice Wild. There is no mean capacity but what knows that it is a crime.

Reading. I did look upon it as a crime if I had not done it, and 'Conscientia errans ligat,' it was a point of conscience to me to do it. I did think it a duty I owed to God; to prevent perjury; and a duty I owed to my country, to prevent innocent blood.

L. C. J. Will you impeach the justice of the kingdom in that manner? You are a man of the law, don't you know, that no man ought to be of counsel for a prisoner in felony or treason, till they are assigned? And for you to carry the king's evidence to the prisoner, as you yourself confess, how can you excuse it? And here are witnesses that heard you contract with him to lessen his evidence, and cui bono? Was not this out of favour to the lords in the Tower, to get them off? Now you by multiplying your discourse, instead of vindicating yourself have spoiled the matter, and confessed that which amounts to the whole charge.

Justice Atkins. And you confess you were to have two hundred pounds from my Lord Stafford, which you were to distribute as you thought fit?

Justice Jones. And you have confessed, Mr. Reading, that not only you have endeavoured to take off Mr. Bedlow, but Mr. Dugdale too; for it was you first started that point.

Reading. My Lord, I have no more. I did never desire him to speak one word less than the truth; but I did my endeavour to prevent perjury, and the shedding of innocent blood; and thus I did as a good christian. My Lord I did desire also to shew you this paper, but you were pleased to over-rule it, that it should not be read.

L. C. J. We think it not material; we over-rule it not, but by way of admittance that you say true.

Reading. Pray, will you see, is there any variance between the two papers?

L. C. J. There is only the addition of the words concerning my lord Bellasis; and that was to strike terror in him, to make him come into the bargain too.

Reading. I desire Mr. Bedlow would look upon this paper also: is this your writing, Sir?

Bedlow. Yes, it is.

Reading. Since your giving me this paper in your chamber, have you ever seen it till to-day?

Bedlow. No, I have not.

Reading. Then, my Lord, I pray this; there is one Prickman a merchant in town that is broke, he wrote to me for a protection, and I desired Mr. Bedlow that he would help him to a protection; he said he would, and spake to the prince, and others of the lords, but could not get one, for I called upon him to know his answer; but withal, told me, he had a better contrivance than any protection could be given him from a single lord, and that is this, that he would say, he was one of his witnesses, and that upon that account he would get him a protection from the committee of secrecy, and they would believe whatever he said to them. I told him I did not know of what signification that might be to my friend; he told me, yes, for he had given it to several already. I asked him, how he could justify it, if it were questioned? Oh, said he, let him say any thing, that he hath heard some body or other, in a coffee-house, call me rogue. My Lord, I never saw Mr. Prickman since; but saith, here, I will give you this business for the protecting of him; and he under-writ this, as from Mr. Treby; 'Pray, do not fail to come to me every hour, to receive what orders the committee shall send to you by me, that we may not neglect his majesty's special business; and if you do receive any let or hindrance, by any person whatsoever, send to me, and I will cause those people to be so severely punished, as so great a contempt does merit.' This was, my Lord, before my treating with the lords, in time, the 25th of March.

My Lord, when I did find he had got such tricks and ways, I did apprehend and resolve (pray give me your favour in the expression) not to do any prejudice to the king's evidence; for my Lord, I do think he is not an evidence for the king, that does go about, by any indirect means, to commit a crime. But, my Lord, I think he is a servant to the nation and does a very good piece of service to the king, that goes about the taking away the guilt of innocent blood.

L. C. J. Indeed, Mr. Reading, we must not suffer this: I told you before, that by such discourse you impeached the justice of the kingdom. If you had suspected Mr. Bedlow's honesty or truth, you should have gone to the king or council, or the secret committee (they are men of honour, and would have been as tender of mens lives, as you or any other man, but for you to do it of yourself, in this way, shews it is but for a plausible excuse to colour your corrupt dealing.

Bedlow. This protection was given us by the secret committee, for Mr. Prickman.

L. C. J. It does not appear but that Prickman might be a witness.

Reading. My Lord, I have but this, and I have done. At the time when I was taken, I have several witnesses to prove it, that I was resolved to give his majesty, or the secretaries, an account of it; and I did ask Mr. Bedlow for an account he had given against the queen; and I had the paper by me, at the same time when I was taken: and I have several witnesses by me, to prove that at that time——

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, this is nothing to the purpose; will you have done? unless you can speak to the fact you are charged with. The Court hath had a great deal of patience with you already.

Reading. I have done, my Lord.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the jury, your patience hath been very much exercised already by the long discourses Mr. Reading hath made; I shall therefore be short in my directions. He stands indicted for suborning Mr. Bedlow, in the evidence that he was to give, concerning the Lords in the Tower, that were impeached of treason by the House of Commons and Sir Henry Tichburn. This is the substance of the Indictment. There is an inducement in it concerning this horrid conspiracy, and the persons that have been executed for it, Coleman, Grove, and Ireland; but as to that, it is admitted by Mr. Reading, and it lies so much in every one's knowledge, that it should hardly need to be proved. So then the question remains only a question of fact, concerning subornation of perjury; which hath been fully proved to you, not only by Mr. Bedlow, who hath related the whole transaction, but also by Mr. Speke, who tells you that Mr. Bedlow did inform him how it went from time to time: and thereupon, to make the matter plain, and to suppress so abominable a practice, it was thought there was no better way to discover this deed of darkness, and to catch a knave, but to bring him into a secret place where he might speak freely, thinking there were no witnesses to testify against him; which was intended to have been done the evening of the 28th of March, which was Friday. But Mr. Reading and Mr. Bedlow not then meeting, the next morning at seven o'clock was appointed, when Mr. Reading did come and asked if nobody were there; of which being assured, he thought himself secure and secret. Then Mr. Bedlow asked him, what say the Lords in the Tower? What says my lord Stafford? Mr. Reading told him, that as to my lord Stafford, he should be sure of the estate in Gloucestershire, for my lord Stafford had ordered him to prepare a blank deed, which, within ten days after his discharge, should be perfected. And the rest of the lords did assure him, That after they were acquitted in proportion to the service he did them, in lessening of his evidence, he should have a very plentiful reward. Thereupon, there arose farther discourse. Saith Mr. Bedlow, I will not rely upon their promise, I will have something under their hands. No, saith Mr. Reading, that they think not convenient. Saith Mr. Bedlow, I must go and deliver in my testimony to the secret committee immediately, and therefore, Mr. Reading, the writing must be made presently, or nothing can be done. Why, saith Mr. Reading, cannot you put it off till Wednesday? No, I cannot, says he. Well then, said Mr. Reading, I will go speak with the lords in the Tower, and I will bring you their answer, and be with you on Monday morning. Afterwards when they went out of the house, Mr. Speke, and the other witness, came from the places where they were privately put, and they saw Mr. Reading going out. Mr. Reading and Mr. Bedlow, within half an hour, came back again to the house, and were private together. Upon Monday morning, Mr. Speke was to watch, and see the delivery of this paper, and he gives you a very rational and distinct account, (and he is not a man that the prisoner can any way impeach in his credit) he tells you, He saw him deliver the paper out of his hand to Mr. Bedlow, and Mr. Bedlow put it towards his pocket, but afterwards put it behind him, and he followed him, and took it out of his hand. And this paper is here, which contains the purport of the evidence to be given against the Lords in the Tower; but so minced, that it is all but hearsay, and nothing will touch them, as to the matters for which they are charged: Here you have the paper under his own hand

Now he comes to make his defence; and what hath he done? He hath made a very long discourse, but no defence at all to the matter of the indictment. He says nothing against the credit of the witnesses, but hath confessed, in effect, the whole matter that he was charged with; for what hath he to do, to carry the evidence to the lords in the Tower, and to go from one to another, to tell them thus and thus, and to receive promises from them of rewards, either in general or particular? He hath made confession of the whole of his charge in the Indictment; and without it, there is such undoubted testimony, nothing impeaching the witnesses, that I shall need to trouble you no further. Do you go together, and consider of it, and we will receive your verdict.

L. C. Baron. Gentlemen of the jury, it hath been so fully repeated by my Lord, that I shall not need to do any thing of that; but there is one little piece of the evidence, which I desire you would take notice of: Mr. Bedlow says, the paper given him upon Monday, in the Painted Chamber, which he carried behind him, and Mr. Speke took away, and which Mr. Reading brought him from the lords, did contain ten times much milder evidence than the paper dictated by him on the Saturday, and that paper was forty times less than that which he had given in to the secret Committee.

Just. Wild. [To sir John Cutler.] Sir John, What paper is that you have in your hand?

Sir John Cutler. It is only the names of the jury, my Lord.

L. C. J. You do well to take the names of the jury with you, if you withdraw, that you may know one another: But I suppose you will not be long out.

Just. Wild. I spoke it, because you are to have no papers with you, but what are under seal.

Then the jury withdrew, and after a short recess, return again to the bar, and being called by their names, severally answered.

Cl. of the Cr. Gentlemen, are you all agreed of your verdict?

Omnes. Yes.

Cl. of the Cr. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Our foreman.

Cl. of the Cr. How say you, is Nathanael Reading Guilty of the offence whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. This is your verdict; you say, that Nathanael Reading is Guilty of the offence whereof he stands indicted, and so you say all?

Just. Wild. It is a very good verdict.

L. C. J. It is a very good verdict, the matter lay in a small room, and I wonder how Mr. Reading could make it so long.

Just. Atkins. He was the greatest witness against himself.

L. C. J. You of the jury may take your ease.

Then the court adjourned till two of the clock, being then half an hour past one.

About half an hour after, the court returned again; and proclamation being made for attendance, the Lord Chief Justice spoke to the prisoner convicted then standing at the bar, thus:

L. C. J. Mr. Reading, you have been here upon your trial to-day, and you are convicted of a very great and heinous crime; there remains nothing now, but to receive the judgment of the law: and the rule of law is, that in all cases the court should consider 'quantitatem delicti, et qualitatem personæ,' and accordingly pronounce their judgment.

As to the quantity of the offence, you yourself did admit in the beginning of your defence that it was not capable of aggravation, but looks rather like treason than a misdemeanour; and so I shall not speak to that, for any flourishes would but sound in diminution of it.

Then we have nothing to consider, but the quality of the person; and of that there might be a great deal said, if we consider your person as a lawyer, one that should be a man of knowledge to be able to advise, a minister of justice to assist the court wherein he pleads; and ought to be a person of untainted fidelity, that he may keep his client's secrets; and for a lawyer to be convicted for such an offence, is that which aggravates it beyond all expression, and I think we can do no less to evidence the care we have of the king's people, than to shew that there shall be greater severity used against such persons offending; and it is a great credit and benefit to the profession, that the members of it for such offences shall be dealt with more severely, than we should deal in any other case: so far will we be from lessening it in this respect. For I would have no man of the profession of the law, that should do thus, be able afterwards to draw people to him to trust him with their business; but his offence should be publicly known to all the world, that men might know him, and not employ him. In one sense, it is true, he may be trusted with a secret, by the same reason that a known liar may be, because his word is never to be believed.

There is another thing that we regard in your person too; if you were a man of a great fortune, or a large estate, I do not see but we should set that, which might be called a Ransom, rather than a fine, in this case; but it not being so, we have taken it into our consideration to do it with measure; but we will supply that defect, by a punishment of another nature, according to the old saying, 'qui non habet in crumena laut in corpore.'

Therefore the judgment of the court is this, "That you be fined 1,000*l.* that you be imprisoned for the space of one year; and that upon Monday next, between the hours of eleven and twelve, you be set in the pillory, for the space of one hour, in Palace-yard in Westminster.

And I will tell you, your offence is so great and hath such a relation to that which the whole nation is concerned in, because it was an attempt to baffle the evidence of that conspiracy, which if it had not been, by the mercy of God, detected, God knows what might have befallen us all by this time; and still the parliament have it under their consideration, how to prevent any further mischief by it; and for you, in such a way as this, to do what you can to suppress the evidence, is such a crime, that we have reason to suspect, that the rage of the people will be so great against you, that it might endanger your life. Therefore we have taken care to give a charge to the sheriff, and the justices, that the peace might be kept; and that no ill consequences may happen to you, but only the shame and infamy, to which you are condemned; and which you do deserve as well as any man that ever was convicted.

Then the Court adjourned to Hicks's hall, upon Wednesday the 30th of April: and the keeper went away with his prisoner.

On the Monday following, the prisoner was set in the pillory, according to the Judgment of the court.

251. The Trial of THOMAS WHITE, alias WHITEBREAD*, Provincial of the Jesuits in England, WILLIAM HARCOURT, pretended Rector of London, JOHN FENWICK, Procurator for the Jesuits in England, JOHN GAVAN alias GAVEN, and ANTHONY TURNER,† all Jesuits and Priests, at the Old Bailey, for High-Treason: 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679.

ON Friday the 13th of June, 1679, at the sessions-house in the Old Bailey, the Court being met, at which all the judges of England were present; proclamation was made of silence and attention whilst the king's commission of Oyer and Terminer, and of gaol delivery were openly read; and after the usual proclamation of attendance upon the sessions, the court proceeded to call the juries impanelled, and to the trials of the prisoners, thus:

Clerk of the Crown. Set Thomas Whitebread, John Fenwick, William Harcourt, John Gavan, Anthony Turner and James Corker, to the bar.

Capt. Richardson. They are all on.

Cl. of the Cr. Thomas White, alias Whitebread, hold up thy hand; John Fenwick, hold up thy hand; William Harcourt, alias Harrison, hold up thy hand; John Gavan, hold up thy hand; Anthony Turner, hold up thy hand; James Corker, hold up thy hand; which they all severally did.

And James Corker presented a Petition to the Court, to this effect:

"That about eight months since, the petitioner was committed for refusing to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; that he had lately received notice to prepare himself for his trial, against this present day, but that the same was afterwards contradicted; and that yesterday a gentleman informed him from the Attorney General, that a bill was found against him of high-treason, and that he was to prepare himself for his trial thereupon accordingly; and forasmuch as the petitioner is altogether ignorant of the matters charged upon him in the same, and by reason thereof is absolutely surprized, and unprepared for his defence, and divers gaol deliveries having been held since his first commitment, and he never called to his trial; he doth humbly beseech their honours, that he may not be tried till the next sessions, and that in the mean time he may have copies of such informations as are given in against him."

Lord Chief Justice. (Sir William Scroggs.) Mr. Corker, have you really any witnesses, without whom you cannot make your defence?

Corker. No, my lord, I have none.

L. C. J. You do not understand my question? Do not you want any witnesses now, that you may have another time?

* See ante, p. 120.

† See Introduction to the Trials for the Popish Plot, ante, vol. 6, p. 1401.

Corker. I am a stranger to the things charged upon me.

L. C. J. Can you not tell, whether you have any witnesses or no? The matter is this, both for you and all the rest of you, that there may be no exception; you are upon the trial of your lives, and we upon our oaths, and therefore I speak it, if so be you have any witnesses because you pretend you are surprized, if you have really any, whereby you can make a better defence for yourselves than now, the court will incline to your request; but if you have not, then it is in vain to tarry.

Corker. My Lord, I verily believe I shall have witnesses.

L. C. J. As for the copy of the Indictment, it is never granted to any persons, and therefore must not be to you.

L. C. J. North. You must give us clear satisfaction, that you are real in your pretences; and must give us the names of your witnesses, where they live, and let us know what they can say for you, that we may be satisfied, for such a general allegation as this, any man living may make.

Recorder. (Sir George Jefferies) He was one of the ten that was appointed by the council to be tried.

L. C. J. Why, you had notice a week ago?

Corker. But it was contradicted the next day.

Capt. Richardson. I heard Mr. Clare say that he should be tried then.

Attorney General. (Sir William Jones.) He had notice together with the rest, but he was not in the first order of council for the trial of these persons; he sent to the clerk to know who were to be tried, and his name was left out; and so understood he was not to be tried. On Tuesday last I moved that he might be put into the order, and so he was, and now there is an order of council for it; but he had notice a week ago, as well as the rest.

Capt. Richardson. I gave them notice that all were to prepare for their trial as this day, and in order to that, I went to the council, to see what order was taken about it, and the clerk shewed me their names, amongst which Corker was left out; and I told him Corker had notice of trial, and therefore I desired I might have an order for him too; they told me, that there was no order taken about him.

Att. Gen. My Lord, I would have all the gentlemen have all the fair play in the world; therefore if he can satisfy your lordship, that he can have any witnesses that he hath not now, I am content the trial should stay to another time.

L. C. J. You shall bear the Indictment read, and there you will know what sort of treason it is you are charged with, and after that you will make your answer whether you have any witnesses.

Recorder. My lord, it will be necessary that I give your lordship an account of one thing. On Saturday night there came a gentlewoman to me, on the behalf of all the prisoners, and said there were some witnesses that she was under apprehension would not appear for the prisoners, unless they had some order; her name she told me, was Ireland, and she came in the name of all the prisoners, she said. I told her, if she would bring me a note of the witnesses names they did desire, they should have all the assistance the court could give them for the getting of their witnesses this day; but since that time I never heard of the gentlewoman, or from the prisoners.

L. C. J. Mr. Corker: you will do well to take notice what you are charged withal, and afterwards tell us, if there are any witnesses that can say any thing for your defence, at your trial for those matters.

Cl. of Cr. "You stand indicted by the names of Thomas White in the parish of St. Giles in the fields in the county of Middlesex, clerk, otherwise called Thomas Whitebread of the same parish and county, clerk; John Fenwick of the same parish and county, clerk, Wm. Harcourt of the same parish and county, clerk, otherwise called William Harrison of the same parish and county, clerk; John Gavan of the same parish and county, clerk; Anthony Turner of the same parish and county, clerk; and James Corker of the same parish and county, clerk: For that you, as false traitors against the most illustrious, most serene, and most excellent prince Charles the 2d, by the grace of God, of England Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the Faith, &c. your supreme and natural lord; not having the fear of God in your hearts, nor weighing the duty of your allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, the cordial love, true due and natural obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king towards him should, and of right ought to bear, wholly withdrawing; and devising, and with all your strength intending the peace and common tranquillity of this realm to disturb, and the true worship of God within this kingdom of England used, and by the law established, to overthrow, and the government of this realm to subvert, and sedition and rebellion within this kingdom of England to move, stir up and procure; and the cordial love, and true and due obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king towards him should and of right ought to bear, utterly to withdraw, put out, and extinguish, and our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to bring and put, on the 24th day of April, in the 30th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord king Charles the 2nd, at the parish of St. Giles in the fields, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid; You the said Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, John Fenwick, William Harcourt otherwise Harrison, John Gavan, Anthony Turner, and James Corker, with divers other false traitors, subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, to the jurors unknown, falsely, subtly, advisedly, maliciously, and traitorously, did purpose, compass, imagine, and intend sedition and rebellion within this kingdom of England to move, stir up, and procure, and a miserable slaughter among the subjects of our said sovereign lord the king to procure and cause, and our said sovereign lord the king, of his kingly state, title, power, and government of his said kingdom of England, utterly to deprive, depose, cast down and disinheret, and him our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to bring and put, and the government of this kingdom of England, and the sincere religion of God within the same, rightly, and by the laws of the same established at your will and pleasure to change and alter, and the state of this whole kingdom of England, through all its parts, well constituted and ordained, wholly to subvert and destroy, and war, within this kingdom of England, against our said sovereign lord the king, to levy: And to accomplish and fulfil your said most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes, you the said Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, John Fenwick, William Harcourt otherwise Harrison, John Gavan, Anthony Turner, and James Corker, and other false traitors against our said sovereign lord the king, to the jurors unknown, the said 24th day of April, with force and arms, &c. in the parish aforesaid, and county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, subtly, advisedly, devilishly, and traitorously, did assemble, unite, and gather yourselves together, and then and there, falsely, maliciously, subtly, advisedly, devilishly and traitorously, did consult, consent and agree, our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to bring and put, and the religion of this kingdom of England rightly, and by the laws of the same established, to the superstition of the Romish church to change and alter, and the government of this kingdom of England to subvert; and that one Thomas Pickering, and one John Grove should kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king; and that you the said Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, John Fenwick, William Harcourt otherwise Harrison, John Gavan, Anthony Turner, James Corker, and other false traitors against our said sovereign lord the king, to the jurors unknown, should therefore say, celebrate, and perform, a certain number of masses, then and there amongst yourselves agreed on, for the soul of the said Thomas Pickering, and for that cause should pay to the said John Grove a certain sum of money, then and there amongst yourselves agreed on; and that you the said Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, John Fenwick, William Harcourt otherwise Harrison,

John Gavan, Anthony Turner, and James Corker, and other false traitors to the jurors unknown, in further prosecution of the treasons and traitorous consultations and agreements aforesaid, afterwards the said 24th day of April at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, subtly, advisedly, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously, did, severally each to the other engage yourselves, and upon the sacrament traitorously swear and promise to conceal and not to divulge the said most wicked treasons, and traitorous compassings, consultations, and purposes aforesaid amongst yourselves had, traitorously to kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king, and to introduce the Romish religion within this kingdom of England, and the true reformed religion within this realm, rightly, and by the laws of the same established to alter and change: And that you the said Thomas White otherwise Whitebread, John Fenwick, William Harcourt alias Harrison, John Gavan, Anthony Turner, and James Corker, and other false traitors to the jurors unknown, in further prosecution of your said treasons and traitorous intentions and agreements aforesaid, afterwards the said 24th day of April, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, subtly, advisedly, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously, did prepare, persuade, excite, abet, comfort, and counsel, four other persons to the jurors unknown, subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, traitorously our said sovereign lord the king to kill and murder, against the duty of your allegiance, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided."

How sayest thou, Thomas White alias Whitebread, art thou guilty of this High-Treason whereof thou standest indicted, or not guilty?

Whitebread. My Lord, I desire to speak one word; I am advised by counsel, and I may and ought to represent it to this court, for not only my own life, but the lives of others of his majesty's subjects are concerned in it. That upon the 17th of December last I was tried upon the same indictment, the Jury was impanelled and called, I put myself into the hands of the Jury, and the evidence was brought in and examined, particularly against me, and was found insufficient, so that the Jury was dismissed without any verdict. I humbly submit myself to your lordships and this noble court, whether I may not have counsel in this point of law, to advise me, whether I may and ought to plead again the second time; for according to law, I am informed no man can be put in jeopardy of his life the second time, for the same cause.

L. C. J. You say well, Mr. Whitebread.

Whitebread. I speak it not for my sake only, but the sake of the whole nation no man should be tried twice for the same cause; by the same reason, a man may be tried 20 or 100 times.

L. C. J. You say well, it is observed, Mr.

Whitebread; but you must know, that you were not put in jeopardy of your life for the same thing, for first the jury were discharged of you; it is true, it was supposed when you were indicted, that there would be two witnesses against you, but that fell out otherwise, and the law of the land requiring two witnesses to prove you guilty of treason, it was thought reasonable, that you should not be put upon the jury at all, but you were discharged, and then you were in no jeopardy of your life.

Whitebread. Under favour, my lord, I was in jeopardy; for I was given in charge to the jury; and it is the case of Seyer, in 10. Eliz. he was indicted for a burglary committed the 1st of August, and pleaded to it; and afterwards another indictment was preferred, and all the judges did declare, that he could not be indicted a second time for the same fact because he was in jeopardy of his life again.

L. C. J. Surely, you were not in jeopardy, and I will shew you how you were not; suppose you had pleaded, and the jury were sworn.

Whitebread. They were so in my case.

L. C. J. It is true they were; but supposing that presently upon that some accident falls out, a witness is taken sick, and be feigned to be carried away; or for any reasonable cause, it should be thought fit by the court to discharge the jury of it, that they should not pass upon your life, are you in jeopardy then?

L. C. J. North. I would have you be satisfied with reason, and the course of law, that other mens' lives are under, as well as yours. The oath the jury take, is, that they shall 'well and truly try, and true deliverance make,' of such prisoners as they shall have in charge; the charge of the jury is not full, till the Court give them a charge at the last, after evidence had; and because there was a mistake in your case, that the evidence was not so full as might be, the jury, before ever they considered concerning you at all, they were discharged, and so you were not in jeopardy; and I in my experience know it to be often done, and it is the course of law, the clerks will tell you it is frequently done here and at other places; and this is not the same indictment, and it contains further matter, than that you pleaded to before. And then if you will make this plea good that you go upon, you must alledge a record, and shew some record to make it good, and that cannot be, because there is none, and so it will signify nothing to you, as you have pleaded it.

Whit. I desire the record may be viewed, it remains with you. I do only present this to your lordship and the Court, and desire I may have counsel.

L. C. J. No, not at all, there is no entry made of it.

Whit. I desire that counsel may advise me; for I am advised, that according to the law of the land, I ought not to plead again, and I hope your lordships will be of counsel for me.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Whitebread, there is no entry made upon it; and the reason is, because there was no trial; and there was no trial, because there was no condemnation or acquittal: if there had been, then you had said something.

* See ante, p. 130.

Whit. That which I ask is, whether I ought not to be condemned or acquitted.

L. C. J. No, it is only in the discretion of the Court. For if a man be indicted for murder, and some accident should happen, (when the witness come to prove it) that he should be taken ill, and so be carried away, should the murderer escape?

Whit. That is not my case; you may do as you please.

L. C. J. But we shew, that it is in the discretion of the Court to discharge the jury upon such accidents, and then the party is not in jeopardy.

Whit. I have only prayed your lordship's discretion in this.

L. C. J. You ought to plead, and must plead.

L. C. J. North. I suppose if any of my brethren are of another opinion, than what we have expressed, they would say so.

Court. We are all of your opinion.

L. C. J. All the judges of England are of the same opinion.

Recorder. It is the constant practice.

L. C. J. It is frequent in all places, it is no new thing.—Whit. My lord, I am satisfied.

Cl. of Cr. Thomas White alias Whitebread, art thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Whit. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Whit. By God and my country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance.

John Fenwick, art thou Guilty of the same high treason, or Not Guilty?

Fenwick. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Fenwick. By God and my country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance.

Fenwick. I was tried before with Mr. Whitebread, our case is the same; the only reason why (I presume) we were not proceeded against, was, because the second witness declared he had nothing to say against us, that was Mr. Bedlow, who said, as to Mr. Whitebread and Mr. Fenwick, I have nothing to say against them; if he had given the same evidence against us, as he had done against the rest, we had been condemned, and had suffered, and so I suppose we ought to have been discharged.

L. C. J. No, it was not reasonable you should be discharged: it remains in the discretion of the Court, not to let a man that is accused of a great and capital crime escape, if there be one witness that swears expressly: do you think it reasonable such a man should go scot-free, though there wanted two that the law requires? You were not in danger, your lives were not in jeopardy.

Fenwick. My lord, we were in the same danger with those three that suffered.

L. C. J. No, we never let the jury go together to consider whether you were Guilty, or Not Guilty; we did prevent your making your defence, because we thought it not a sufficient charge.

Cl. of Cr. William Harcourt alias Harrison, how sayest thou, art thou Guilty of the high-treason whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Harcourt. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Harcourt. By God and my country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance.

How sayest thou, John Gavan alias Gawan, art thou Guilty of the same high treason, or Not Guilty?—Gawan. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Gawan. By God and my country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance. How sayest thou, Anthony Turner, art thou Guilty of the same high treason, or Not Guilty?—Turner. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?

Turner. By God and my country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance.

L. C. J. Mr. Corker, you have heard the Indictment read, and what it consists of, a traitorous endeavour to subvert the government, to murder the king, to change the Protestant religion into Popery; if you have any witnesses that can be serviceable to you, as to these matters, name who they are, and where they live; if you cannot, you had as good take your trial now, as at another time.

Corker. I not only have no witnesses ready, but there are substantial circumstances, which peradventure may arise, which may induce your lordship to believe me innocent; and therefore I humbly beg, I may stay some short time to consult with those that are better skilled in the law than I am:

L. C. J. What do you mean to have counsel assigned you?

Corker. My friends, my lord.

L. C. J. Every man knows his own case best; you have been bred a scholar, and so you cannot be so ignorant as other men are: You can tell whether you have any witnesses that you think are material for your defence.

Corker. That day of the 24th of April, spoken of in the indictment, I truly and really believe I was not in town that day; but I cannot positively prove it, because I heard not of it before.

L. C. J. Is there any body that can testify where you were that day? Can you name any one.

Corker. Yes, I believe I can name one, and that is one Alice Gatton, that is now 30 miles out of town at Tunbridge, who can prove where I did go about that time.

L. C. J. I'll tell you what, if my brothers will, this woman you suppose can say something for you, we will respite your trial for to-day, send somebody for her, and we will try you to-morrow.

L. C. J. North. Or any other witnesses; for as to this 24th day of April, it is known to all the world to have been the day of the consult; but because you pretend a surprise, I must tell you, that Mr. Attorney, sent you notice with the rest; but because you might be led into another opinion, that the council did not order it, you have the favour to be put off till to-morrow: Get your witnesses ready if you can.

L. C. J. If you have any other witnesses, or desire any order for their appearance, let us know it.

Corker. I desire I may have liberty to have my trial put off till Monday.

L. C. J. North. No, it cannot be. Monday is the essoign day, and the commission will be out.

L. C. J. Call the Jury.

Cl. of Cr. Thomas White alias Whitebread, hold up thy hand (and so as to the rest). You the prisoners at the bar, those men that you shall hear called or personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your several lives and deaths; if therefore you or any of you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak unto them as they come to the hook to be sworn, and before they be sworn. Call sir Philip Matthews.

Whitebread. We challenge him. My lord, that there may not be any further trouble, it is our general petition, that none of those that were for any of the former trials may be of this Jury, they having already passed their judgment upon the evidence they have heard.

L. C. J. You may challenge them. And therefore (speaking to the Clerk of the Crown) don't take any that were upon the last Jury for this cause.

Gasco. Nor any of the former Juries; we do this that we may avoid giving your lordship any further trouble, because if we should stay upon particulars we should too much trouble the Court.

L. C. J. North. Look you, I will tell you by the way, you have the liberty to challenge perpetually so many. All we can do, is to give direction to the Clerk; if he do not pursue it, we do not know them, we can't tell, you must look after that.

Recorder. You have the books wherein are notes of all their names, by you.

Then the Jury that were sworn were these twelve: Thomas Harriot, William Gulston, Allen Garroway, Richard Cheyney, John Roberts, Thomas Cash, Rainsford Waterhouse, Matthew Bateman, John Kaine, Richard White, Richard Bull and Thomas Cox.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, count these: Thomas Harriot.

Crier. One, &c.

Cl. of Cr. Thomas Cox.

Crier. Twelve good men and true, stand together and bear your evidence.

Then the usual Proclamation for information was made, and the Jurymen of Middlesex summoned and not sworn were dismissed till next morning, 8 o'clock.

Cl. of Cr. Thomas White alias Whitebread, hold up thy hand (and so to the rest). You gentlemen that are sworn, look upon the prisoners and hearken to their cause; they stand indicted by the names of Thomas White, &c. (put in the indictment scilicet mutandis) and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. Upon this indictment they have been arraigned, and thereunto have severally pleaded Not Guilty, and for their trials have put themselves upon God and their country, which country you are. Your charge is to enquire, whether they or any of them are Guilty of the High Treason whereof they stand indicted, or Not Guilty. If you find them or any of them Guilty, you are to enquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements they had at the time of the High Treason committed, or at any time since. If you find them or any of them, Not Guilty, you are to enquire whether they fled for it: If you find that they fled for it, you are to enquire of their goods and chattels, as if you had found them Guilty: If you had them Not Guilty, nor that they nor any of them fled for it, say so and no more, and hear your evidence.

Then Mr. Belwood, of counsel for the king in this cause, opened the indictment thus:

May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the Jury: the prisoners at the bar, Thomas White alias Whitebread, John Fenwick, William Harcourt alias Harrison, John Gavan and Anthony Turner, together with James Corker, stand indicted of High Treason. It is charged in the indictment, That the 24th of April, in the 30th year of the king that now is, these persons, with other traitors unknown, did purpose and conspire to stir up sedition and rebellion; to cause a miserable slaughter of the king's subjects; to depose the king of his government, and bring him to death; and to change the government and religion by laws established, and to levy war against the king. And it is further charged in the indictment, that pursuant to this intention of theirs, and the better to bring it to pass, they did assemble, consult, and agree, first to bring his majesty to death, to murder the king, and thereupon to change the religion established by law to the superstition of the Romish Church, and to subvert the whole government; and it was agreed, that Pickering and Grove should murder the king; and that therefore Whitebread, and the rest of the persons indicted, should say a number of masses for the soul of Pickering: And Grove, for this piece of service, was to have a sum of money. And the Indictment says further, That these persons did take the Sacrament to commit this treason with more secrecy; and that they did likewise prepare, excite, abet and counsel four other unknown persons to kill the king at Windsor. All these facts are said to be done advisedly, maliciously, traitorously, and devilishly, and against their allegiance to the king. To this they have pleaded Not Guilty; if the king's evidence prove it, you are to find it so.

And then Sir Creswel Levinz, one of the king's learned counsel in the law, opened the Charge thus:

May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the Jury: These prisoners at the bar are by persuasion Papists, by order and decree they are all priests. By the law of the land, viz. by a statute made the 27th of Eliz. they are all guilty of treason, for being priests, and they might be tried as such, and ought to die for it; but that is not the fact they are charged with, nor will they have the satisfaction to say that they suffer for their religion: No, they are charged with a treason of a blacker and darker nature. And though I must tell you, that it is now almost 100 years ago since that statute was made against priests coming into England, yet examples have been very rare, that any of this sort of men have died for their religion within that queen's time, or any of her successors; yet they have died upon worse accounts, and upon such accounts as they are now brought to this bar for. Such is the difference between their religion and ours, they have been suffered to live here under a law by which they ought to die. They kill the Protestants by thousands, without law or justice, witness their bloody doings at Mirendol, their massacre at Paris, their barbarous cruelty in Ireland, since the year 1640, and those in Piedmont, since 1650. But these are not the crimes they are charged with, they are not accused for their religion, but for the blackest and darkest treason that men can be charged with. They are charged with an endeavour to murder the king, under whose protection they lived. This murder of the king hath been carried on in the design of it, with all the malice and resolution that can be, from the first time that we can give you an account of it, which was the 24th of April, 1678, when these persons, and several others, did first assemble about other matters of their own, and among the rest to murder the king: There they came to a resolution that it should be done, and persons were appointed to do it; these were Grove and Pickering, who have been executed for it; they were to kill the king in St. James's park; but it pleased God that the flint of the pistol failed, to which we are more beholden than to them, that he escaped that time. They were not satisfied with that, but they sent down four butchers to murder him at Windsor, who being disappointed, they sent down others after that to murder him at Newmarket; and when all these failed, they had recourse to that treacherous and unmanly way of poisoning him, and hired one so to do; and they did not only intend to murder the king, but to make it good by force when they had done. They intended to raise an army; they had got commissions to several persons in the kingdom, to command these forces. They designed to raise 50,000 men to maintain the injustice, when they had done it. And that was not all; they had recourse to foreign assistance, and depended upon foreign succours, if they were not made good at home. Gentlemen, they have been disappointed in all these things; they had an intention further, as I find it in my brief, to make a general massacre of all Protestants here. A thing that they have done, and we have heard of it abroad, but thanks be to God, we never knew it experimentally at home. And I hope God that hath preserved us hitherto, will preserve us still.—The mercy these men have met with, in being suffered to live under the danger of the statute, by which they might have justly died, hath not prevailed upon or bettered them at all, but been turned into monstrous ingratitude, and made them more desperate than other people would have been. Gentlemen, when all this is opened, I must tell you, if these persons be innocent, God forbid they should suffer; but if they be guilty, surely they are not fit to live among men: And truly if they be guilty, they do not only deserve to die, but to die a more cruel and miserable death, than either the mercy of our prince, or the moderation of our laws hath provided for such offenders. I shall detain you no longer, but will call the witnesses, and then you shall judge whether they be guilty or not. And we begin with Mr. Oates.—Who was sworn.

Sir Creswel Levinz. Pray what can you say to these gentlemen? begin with Mr. Whitebread first.

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, apply your evidence as distinctly as you can to one person at first, unless where the matter will take in all, or more than one of them.

Oates. My lord, I have evidence I desire may be called in, I shall have occasion to use them.

Gavan. It may be inconvenient. He may instruct his witnesses.

L. C. J. North. No, he shall not, for we will take care of that: But name your witnesses.

Oates. There is sir Richard Barker, Mr. Walter a minister, Mrs. Mayo, Philip Page, Mr. William Smith, and one Mr. Clay, Mr. Butler, Mrs. Sarah Ives.

Justice Atkins. Take a note of their names, and send for them.

L. C. J. Now, Mr. Oates, go on with your evidence; and when there is occasion to make use of these persons they shall be called.

Oates. The prisoner at the bar, Mr. Whitebread, was made and constituted provincial, so as it was publicly known to us, in the month of December last was twelvemonth; and he did order by virtue of his authority, one Father George Conyers to preach in the sodality of the English seminary, on the holyday which they call St. Thomas of Canterbury, i. e. Thomas of Becket's day, in which there was order given that Mr. Conyers should preach and assert this doctrine: That the oaths of allegiance and supremacy were heretical, antichristian and devilish: accordingly, this order was executed, and the sermon preached. Mr. Whitebread in the month of January wrote letters (or at leastwise, in the beginning of February, I will pot-be positive as to the time, because it does not occur to my memory) to St. Omers, concerning the state of Ireland, of which he had an account from archbishop Talbot, who wrote him word, that there were several thousands of Irish that were ready to rise, when the blow should be given in England.

L. C. J. Was that in Whitebread's letter?

Oates. Yes, my lord, and Mr. Whitebread did say, He did hope it would not be long ere it was given. Now, my lord, by the word Blow, we did use to understand, and had instructions to understand the death and murder of the king; and in the month of January, I think it was, that he sent over two Jesuits into Ireland, to see how the state of affairs stood there: In the beginning of April they returned, of which we had an account from Mr. Whitebread, by letters, wherein there was mention of a consult to be held in the month of April, Old Stile, and May, New Stile; and according to the order there given, there met at that consult, the prisoners at the bar, Whitebread, Fenwick, Harcourt and Turner; and if it please your lordship, all these at that consult did sign a resolve, Mr. Whitebread at his chamber, which was at Wild-house, Mr. Fenwick at his lodgings in Drury-lane, and Mr. Harcourt who had some at his chamber in Duke-street. But, my lord, I am to premise this, before I go any further, That the consult was begun at the White-horse tavern in the Strand, and there they did agree to send Father Cary to be their procurator at Rome; and after some such things were done, they adjourned into several clubs or colloquies, or what you please to call them. One was at Mr. Whitebread's chamber, another at Ireland's chamber, that is executed, another at Harcourt's, and another at Fenwick's; now here was a resolve signed by these prisoners at the bar, in which—

L. C. J. That is four of them, Whitebread, Fenwick, Harcourt, and Turner.

Oates. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Was Gavan there?

Oates. I dare not, my lord, affect him with that, because I cannot be positive, but I will give you my evidence against him by and by. My lord, these four gentlemen, with the rest of their accomplices, did sign a resolve, which was this, 'That Pickering and Grove should go on in their attempts to dispatch the king; and this they did resolve upon, and gave it as their judgment, as a very excellent expedient. My lord, after this consult we did return (we were eight or ten that came over); and may it please your lordships, in the month of June, I think it was June, he came to Flanders, in order to visit his colleges, being provincial of the Jesuits of England: He did stay there, as near as I can remember, till the tenth of June, and enquiring of the Fathers how squares went in town, among other expressions he used, this was one, 'That he hoped to see the black fool's head at Whitehall laid fast enough; and that if his brother should appear to follow in his footsteps, his passport should be made too,' or to that purpose, 'he should be dispatched.' Upon the 13th of June, Old Stile, the 23d New Stile, I had orders to come for England; according to which order I came, and did take the Packet-boat, as near as I can remember, the 24th, which was the 14th Old Stile, and we landed at Dover, the 25th, very early in the morning; and when I was at Dover, I met with the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Fenwick, and he, myself, and some others, did take coach, and come as far as Canterbury; after we had eaten and drunk there, we came six miles further, where there was a box seized by the searchers of the town of Borton, and this box was brought up by Mr. Fenwick, and directed to one Blundel, and the superscription was, as near as I can remember, in these words, 'To the honourable Richard Blundel, esq. at London.' And this prisoner at the bar, Mr. Fenwick, did desire that the searchers would send it to him (it was full of beads and crucifixes, and such things) to the Fountain tavern near Charing-Cross, and write a letter to him, by the name of Mr. Thompson, as that was the name he usually went by, when he came to Dover, and he had then brought some students there, to send over to St. Omers.

L. C. J. When went Fenwick?

Oates. When I came to Dover, I met Fenwick, by the name of Thompson, going to send over the students, and Fenwick did say, If they had searched his pockets, as they had searched his box, they had found such letters, as would have cost him his life; for, saith he, they were about our concern in hand. Then we came up to London, and arrived at London the 17th of June, Old Stile, for we lay a part of the way at Sittenburn, in the morning, and in the afternoon we came to Dartford, and came to London, Monday noon, the 17th Old Stile. And in the month of July, there was one Richard Ashby, whose right name indeed is Thimbleby, but he went by the name of Ashby, and this gentleman did bring over instructions from the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Whitebread, who was abroad in Flanders, wherein he was to propose 10,000*l.* to sir George Wakeman, to poison the king; and several other instructions there were, of which I cannot now give you an account; and withal, that a blank commission should be filled up, and ordered for sir John Gage, to be a military officer in the army, and by that gentleman's own order I delivered that commission into sir John Gage's own hand, on a Sunday.

L. C. J. Where had you that commission from Whitebread?

Oates. It was signed and sealed by him, but it was a blank, and was to be filled up.

L. C. J. Where?

Oates. It was at Wild-house.

L. C. J. How was it filled up?

Oates. It was filled up by Mr. Whitebread's order, it was signed and sealed blank, and he ordered it to be filled up, and me to take that commission and carry it to sir John Gage.

Whitebread. Did I order you?

Oates. You ordered Ashby; I saw the letter, and knew it to be Whitebread's hand.

L. C. J. Was it before he went to St. Omers?

Oates. It was while he was at St. Omers.

Whitebread. What day was it? What hour?

Oates. It was in July.

Whitebread. What time of the month?

Oates. The beginning, or middle.

Whitebread. Are you sure it was in July?

Oates. I cannot be positive, but I think it to be in July; for Ashby went to the Bath the latter end of July, or the beginning of August, and it was before he went.

Whitebread. Who was present at the signing of this commission?

Oates. There was present at the filling up of this commission, Mr. Harcourt, Mr. Ashby, and Mr. Ireland.

Fenwick. Was not I there?

Oates. I think I filled it up. I will tell you when you were there presently. My lord, when Ashby went away, Fenwick went out of town, but returned again presently, to give an account how squares went, and really I cannot remember where he had been, but as near as I can, it was in Essex, I will not be positive in it; but, my lord, this same gentleman, Mr. Fenwick, with Mr. Harcourt, did advise Mr. Ashby, that as soon as he had been at the Bath, he should go and give an account to the people in Somersetshire, and there-away, his circuit would be short and very easy, and he did not question, but before he came up to town again, to have the gentleman at Whitehall dispatched, whom they called the Black Bastard; now I leave that to the jury to expound who the meant by it.

Fenwick. What time was that, Sir, pray? You must time things, or you do nothing at all.

Oates. It was the latter end of July, or the beginning of August, it was about the time of Ashby's going to the Bath.

Fenwick. Just now he said, it was the beginning or middle of July.

Oates. I will tell your lordship what I said, that this Ashby, or Thimbleby, came from St. Omers with those orders or instructions, either the beginning of July, or the middle of July.

Fenwick. I would not interrupt you, Mr. Oates, this was some time before Mr. Ashby went to the Bath, was it not?

Oates. It was about a day before.

L. C. J. He says a thing that is plain enough: Ashby came over about the beginning or middle of July, with instructions about the commission; and about the latter end of July or beginning of August, as he remembers, this advice was given.

Oates. And so we are arrived at the affairs in August, which reflects upon these gentlemen; but now I must speak a word to this gentleman, Mr. Gavan, the prisoner at the bar, whom when I saw come into the lobby, he had gotten on a perriwig; so there was one asked me, whether I knew him? I know him now, but truly then I did not well know him, because he was under that mask, and I could not say any thing against him then, because he being under an ill favoured perriwig, and being a man that I knew had a good head of hair of his own, I did not well understand the mystery of it, and so spared my evidence at that time from informing the council against him; but the prisoner at the bar came by the name of Gavan, and we used to call him by the name of Father Gavan: and this gentleman did in the month of June write letters——

Gavan. What year?

Oates. In the year 1678, and did give the Fathers at London an account how affairs stood in Staffordshire and Shropshire, and how diligent one Father Evers was to manage affairs in those countries.

Gavan. From whence were those letters sent?

Oates. There was only the day of the month, you know it is not the custom to date the place. When I saw the letter first, I did not know it was his hand, I took it upon report; but I will tell the jury, by and by, how I came to know it was his hand: as near as I can remember, it was in the month of July (it was July or August, this gentleman came to town, and I saw this gentleman at Mr. Ireland's chamber.

Gavan. What time of the month?

Oates. It was in July 1678, as near as I can guess.

Gavan. Upon my salvation, I am as innocent as a child unborn.

L. C. J. North. By this means you put out any witness in the world, by interrupting of them. When the witness hath done his testimony, you may ask him any questions, to ascertain the time or any thing, but you must not interrupt him till he hath done.

Oates. In the latter part of July, I think it was, but it was, as I remember, while Mr. Ashby was in town, I met him at Mr. Ireland's chamber, for he was a saying he would go see Father Ashby before he went out of town, and he gave such an account to Father Ireland, of the affairs in Staffordshire and Shropshire, as he had given in the letters before; but to prove his hand, he did draw a bill upon one sir William Andrews in Essex, for the payment of some money, of some little sucking priests, that were strolling up and down the country. I saw him write it, and it was the same hand with that letter.

Gavan. What did I write?

L. C. J. You drew a bill upon such a person, and he names him.

Oates. We are now come to August.

L. C. J. But you say he discoursed about the same things with Ireland, that he had wrote in the letter.—Oates. Yes, my lord.

Gavan. And what were those same things;

Oates. Why how the affairs stood in Staffordshire and Shropshire, how my lord Stafford was very diligent. I desire to be excused as to that, because it will diminish my evidence in another part of it: I will tell you part of what was then discoursed of.

Gava. My lord, he is sworn to speak all the truth.

L. C. J. You must speak the whole truth, as far as it concerns any of these persons.

Oates. He gave an account how prosperous things were in those countries, and did say, that there was at least two or three thousand pounds that would be ready in that country for the carrying on the design, I think it was three, but it was betwixt two and three. Now, my lord, we are arrived to our business in August; about the 13th of August, as near as I remember, but it was between the 8th and the 13th, therein I am positive, Ireland, who is executed, took his leave of us,* as if he were to go to St. Omers.

L. C. J. Where did he take his leave?

Oates. At his chamber in Russel Street. Ireland went out of town, and Fenwick, by that means, was to be treasurer and procurator to the society altogether. He had that employ afterward upon him during his absence, let Mr. Ireland go whither he would. And the 21st of August, which, as near as I remember, fell upon a Wednesday, Mr. Fenwick and Mr. Harcourt were met together at Wild-House, and some other Fathers, as Father Kaines, and one Father Blundell, and some other Fathers, whom I cannot remember.

Gava. Was I there, pray, Sir?

Oates. No, no, Sir; I am not to talk to you still, I am to speak to the Court.

L. C. J. North. We would recommend this to you, to name persons when you speak of them.

Oates. Where I have occasion I will name them, my lord. Mr. Fenwick and Harcourt were together at Wild-House, and Mr. Kaines, and Mr. Blundell, and, as near as I remember, Mr. Langworth was there, but I will not be positive. And there lay before them at Wild-House fourscore pounds, the most of that money was guinea, which was to be paid to the 4 Irish ruffians that were to murder the king at Windsor. After it was agreed that they should do it, and Coleman, who was executed, came thither, and gave the messenger a guinea to expedite the journey; we drew off from Wild-House, and went to Mr. Harcourt's chamber; and because Mr. Harcourt had there left his Papers that were to be sent down to Windsor, there he paid the messenger the money. And that gentleman was present there, Mr. Fenwick, and this is another part of August's business. No sooner was this messenger dispatched, but within a day after, or a day before, but it was a day after, as near as I can remember, there was a consult held at the Benedictine's convent, at which Mr. Fenwick was present, and Mr. Harcourt, and there they had some more Irish news from the Irish archbishop Talbot, who did give an account of the Irish affairs, how they did conspire the death of the duke of Ormond; and desired to know how affairs went in England, and desired some commissions might be sent over to some particular persons there to raise forces for the carrying on of the design, and some money to be transmitted to them. And Mr. Fenwick did bring the commissions from Wild-House (as near as I remember), but he did bring them with him, and sent them down by a special messenger to Chester, and some letters by the post. That of the post I know of my own knowledge, but that of the special messenger I had only from his own mouth. My lord, from the 24th of August, as near as I remember it fell of a Saturday, Bartholomew-day it was, but whether it fell of a Saturday I cannot be positive; but if the Court please to inform themselves of it by their Almanacks, they may.

L. C. J. There is no great matter in that, I suppose.

Oates. But this gentleman, Mr. Fenwick, did deliver me some money for my necessary incident charges, but did admonish me to procure some Masses to be said for a prosperous success upon the design. Upon the 25th day, I saw Mr. Fenwick in the afternoon at his chamber, and he was to go on the 26th day, the next day, to St. Omers, and to carry 8 or 10 students to go there to study humanity: And this is the account I have to give of Mr. Fenwick: For after I took my leave of him here, I saw him no more till he was apprehended.

L. C. J. This was about the 26th of August, was it not?

Oates. Yes, my lord, it was the 26th of August.

L. C. J. Well, go on, Sir.

Oates. The 1st or 2nd of September, we received a letter (in the beginning it was) from Mr. Whitebread, and this letter they did say was a foreign letter, and yet it paid but twopence, by which I did conclude that Mr. Whitebread was come into England, and lay somewhere privately, or was not yet come to town. On the 3rd of September I went to Mr. Whitebread's chamber, at night, but he being at supper, was not to be spoken with; but when he saw me the next morning, he did revile me, and strike me, and asked me with what face I could look upon him, seeing I had dealt so treacherously with them? Now, after that I had enquired in what respect? He answered, in the discovering of the business, for there was a gentleman that went to the king in this business, to whom I had communicated much of my information by Dr. Tongue. This gentleman had the same coloured clothes that I had, and so they not being able to give an account of the name of the person, gave only an account of the habit he was in, and therefore they charged me with it. After I had justified myself as well as I could, Mr. Whitebread did shew me a letter, which came from one Beddingfield, alias Benningfield, which did shew the Plot was discovered, and that they were like to be undone, if it had not been for the five letters that were sent down to Windsor and intercepted, which made all to be looked upon as counterfeit; after that, I justified myself as well as I could. He told me he would be friends with me, provided I would give an account of the party, and of the minister that went with him. And this is what I have to say against Mr. Whitebread, and the prisoners at the bar; but only this, because sir George Wakeman did not accept of 10,000*l.* that was proposed to him to poison the king, this gentleman offered that 5,000*l.* more should be added.

L. C. J. Which gentleman?

Oates. Mr. Whitebread. And 15,000*l.* was accepted, and when it was accepted, Whitebread did greatly rejoice that the money was accepted to poison the king.

Whitebread. Did I tell you so?

Oates. No, there was a letter told me so; but you were in Flanders then.

Sir Cr. Levinz. What have you to say against Mr. Turner?

Oates. I speak as to his being at the consult in April, and signing the resolve of the death of the king.

L. C. J. Was Mr. Gavan at that consult the 24th of April?

Oates. Mr. Gavan was summoned to that consult; but among 40 men I cannot particularly say he was there, but I saw his name signed as to the king's death, but I cannot say I saw his person.

L. C. J. Can you say you saw his handwriting?—Oates. I do believe it was his;

L. C. J. Did you ever see any writing of his, but when he signed the bill of exchange?

Oates. My lord, I never saw him write but that time. It was an ill pen, as it seemed, that he writ his name with to the consult, and I did not take so particular notice of the being of his name there, till we saw the instructions in July, and then I did look over the consult particularly.

L. C. J. But I say, did you ever see his handwriting before he writ the bill?

Oates. My lord, I never saw his hand but that time.

L. C. J. And that by your comparing, was like the hand of the letter about Staffordshire?

Oates. By that I proved the letter to be written from him. It was like it, and was all as one.

L. C. J. Was it like the hand that was to the consult?

Oates. That I cannot say.

L. C. J. I thought you had said he confessed the contents of the letter, when he came out of Staffordshire?

Oates. I do say this of Mr. Gavan, that he wrote such a letter, and when he came to town, he did give an account of all the passages that the letter did contain, which was concerning the raising of money in Staffordshire, and the parts he was concerned in: and this was the account he gave.

L. C. J. Dr. Oates, you positively say, that Whitebread, Fenwick, and Harcourt were there?

Oates. Yes, my lord, for Mr. Whitebread was provincial and president of the assembly.

Sir Cr. Levinz. And Turner was there?

Oates. Yes, he was.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Dr. Oates, what was that money raised for?

Oates. They said it was for the carrying on of the design.

L. C. J. And what design was that?

Oates. Our design. And that was the subversion of the government, and destruction of the king.

L. C. J. Now, if you please, you may ask him any question.

Gavan. Mr. Oates, you say you saw my name to a letter for the taking up of money: to whom was that letter writ?

Oates. There was a letter from you to Mr. Ireland. And he did receive it by the hands of Grove.

Gavan. Where was that money to be taken up?

Oates. My lord, I say, that letter was received by Grove, who is out of the way, and cannot prove it, and was delivered to Ireland.

L. C. J. I perceive your memory is not good.

Gavan. I perceive his memory is very good.

Oates. This letter did give an account of the business of Staffordshire, and the particulars of that Mr. Gavan did afterwards give an account of by word of mouth, and some other things not fit to be named.

Gavan. Pray, where was it, Sir, that I gave an account of it; in London, or in the country?

Oates. In London.

Gavan. In what month?

Oates. In July it was.

Gavan. What part of July?

Oates. It was when Mr. Ashby was in town, the beginning or middle.

Gavan. Just now, you said it was in the latter end.

Oates. My lord, I beg this favour, that if the prisoners at the bar ask any questions, they may be proposed to the Court, for they are nimble in their questions, and do a little abuse the evidence. They put things upon them that they never say.

Mr. Justice Pemberton. Propose your questions to the Bench, that you would have asked.

Gavan. I would do so, my lord, in whose honour I have more confidence, than in whatsoever Mr. Oates says or swears.

L. C. J. But he tells you who you drew your bill of exchange upon, and that was sir William Andrews.

L. C. J. North. Do not give the king's witnesses ill words.

L. C. J. Have you any more to ask, any of you?

Whitebread. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. See if you can catch him, he gives you a long and exact account as can be given by any man in England; and pray direct yourself, Mr. Whitebread, to the Court.

Whitebread. He says he was here in April, and at the consult; now I desire to know how long before that time were you and I acquainted?

Oates. Why, before that time I never saw Mr. Whitebread's face.

Whitebread. What employment were you to have, and what reward?

Oates. When I came away from St. Omers, I was to attend the motion of the Fathers at your chamber, and to carry the resolve from chamber to chamber, where the Fathers were respectively met.

Fenwick. Was not you at the White-Horse tavern?

Oates. Yes, I was there.

Fenwick. Did you dine there?

Oates. No, our stay was short there.

Fenwick. How long did you stay in town?

Oates. Truly, I cannot tell you exactly; but from the time I came into England, to the time I went out again, was under twenty days.

Fenwick. Who were they that came over with you? name the parties.

Oates. I will tell you who they were; but it is so long since, I cannot exactly remember.

Fenwick. You need not trouble your memory, you have them in your Narrative.

Oates. My lord, there was father Williams, the rector of Wotton, the rector of Liege, Sir John Warner, sir Thomas Preston, and some others.

Whitebread. Was not Mr. Nevil there?

Oates. I believe he was, it is like he might be there.

Whitebread. Was not sir Robert Brett there?

Oates. I believe he might.

Whitebread. You have said so in your Narrative.

L. C. J. Perhaps a man will venture to write more than he will swear; not that he does write what he does not believe, but that he knows he ought to be more cautious in his oath, than in his affirmation.

Fenwick. My lord, with your lordship's favour, it is upon oath.

L. C. J. North. Fenwick, you are in a court of law, and we must go according to the law; if you will prove any contradiction in him to his oath, you must bring the persons here that saw him take the oath; and you must not think to take a pamphlet for evidence.

Fenwick. It was sworn before a justice of peace, and will not, I suppose, be denied; and therefore he must make his evidence agree with it, being part of his Narrative.

Gavan. You speak of one thing in August, and of another in July; which month saw you me in?

Oates. I told you, I saw you in town in July, and when father Ashby or Thimbleby was in town; and you said you would go and see him.

Justice Pemberton. He says it was in July, and that is enough.

Gavan. What time is July?

Oates. It was towards the middle or latter end.

Gavan. Was it before Mr. Ashby went to the Bath?

Oates. It was so.

L. C. J. He says he saw you in town, when Ashby was in town, which was towards the latter end of July, or beginning of August. He cannot tell exactly whether, but positively he says before Mr. Ashby went to the Bath.

L. C. J. North. Well, to satisfy you, we will ask Mr. Oates the question again. Can you recollect whether it was the middle or latter end of July?

Oates. My lord, as near as I can remember, it was about the middle of July that Ashby came to town, and he did not stay in town above a fortnight; and it was whilst he was in town, and designed to go down to the Bath, that this gentleman came to town, and gave account of the particulars of that letter.

L. C. J. North. You may ask him any questions; but I would have you observe what account he gives, that about the middle of July, Ashby came to town, that he staid in town about a fortnight, as he believes, that during that time you came to town, and then was this discourse.

Oates. During that time I saw him in town, but I know not exactly when it was.

Gavan. My lord, I would ask him one question; the thing that is brought against me is this; he says Mr. Ashby came to town in the middle of July, that he staid in town a fortnight, that while he was there I came to town, and had such discourse: now, my lord, I desire to know, whether it was the first week, or last week, that Ashby was in town, that he saw me.

L. C. J. If he can answer it, let him.

Oates. My lord, I cannot.

L. C. J. He tells you, he cannot charge his memory with it.

Oates. No, my lord, nor will not.

L. C. J. Really, I believe there is scarce one in all this company, able to give an account of a particular time of a passage so long ago.

Gavan. No doubt he hath an excellent memory.

L. C. J. And if he had not some memorials of this he could not do it. And though he hath memorials of the most eminent passages, yet we cannot suppose he hath of all circumstances.

Gavan. But this is the substance; and your lordship may conceive that not without reason I urge it; for if Mr. Ashby came to town the beginning of July, and staid but a fortnight in town, and I came to town while he was here, it must be in one of the two last weeks. Now I would have it ascertained, because I may disprove it in one week or in the other.

L. C. J. It is true, you did not amiss in asking the question, if he were able to answer it; but if it be either, it is enough to prove you guilty.

Gavan. Pray, was it only one time, or divers that you saw me in London?

Oates. It was but one day, but, as near as I remember, I saw you twice that day; and I will tell it you by a particular circumstance, that I saw you in the afternoon when you were a little illish, and there was a cordial brought to you by an apothecary, that went by the name of Walpoole.

L. C. J. Here is memory refreshed by a circumstance, you see. Whither was it brought to him?

Oates. To Ireland's chamber.

Gavan. Who brought it, Sir?

L. C. J. An apothecary, he says, whose name was Walpoole.

Gavan. My lord, I never saw Walpoole in all my life.

L. C. J. I believe he is known well enough, such an one as Walpoole the apothecary. But ask what questions you will.

Oates. I cannot say whether it was Walpoole himself or his man, that brought it.

Gavan. I do as truly believe there is a God, an Heaven, and an Hell, as any one here does; as I hope for Salvation, as I hope to see God in Heaven, I never saw Mr. Oates before the day in January, when he says I had the periwig on, and he did not know me: and as for July, I call God to witness, I never saw him then.

L. C. J. You were in town in July?

Gavan. Upon my salvation, I was not in London.

L. C. J. You will prove that by and by.

Fenwick. I hope, my lord, we may ask him any questions in the Court, of our evidence, to make things clear?

L. C. J. Yes, you may.

Turner. Did you ever see me in all your life, before you saw me at Whitehall?

Oates. You were then in a disguised habit, and a nasty periwig, and I did not know you so well.

Turner. You, at Whitehall, was pleased to tell me, I went by another name.

Oates. I do not value names, but your person: you are the man.

L. C. J. You are the man, he says.

Turner. Did you see me at the consult?

Oates. I saw the man that speaks to me.

Turner. Who were there? and how many were present?

Oates. There were about forty or fifty.

L. C. J. When you have but one name apiece, then he can hit it right; but when you have so many names, then you are too hard for him.

Turner. Did you see me at the White-Horse?

Oates. That I will not say; for when they were in lesser clubs or colloquies, I was sure of better acquaintance with them.

Turner. Where was it you saw me?

Oates. At Mr. Fenwick's chamber.

Turner. At Whitehall, you said it was at Wild-house.

Oates. My Lord, because the chiefest part of the consult sat at Wild house, we called it all the consult at Wild-house.

L. C. J. I see your defence will be little else but captiousness, to disprove him in circumstances of time, place, persons, or numbers; now all these are but little matters to the substance: It is true, Mr. Whitebread, if you can prove you were not at that place at that time, it will do you great service. Have you any thing more to say to him?

L. C. J. North. I hope your witnesses are in readiness that you were speaking of, to fortify your testimony.

Oates. Yes, my Lord, they are, I desire they may be heard.

L. C. J. By and by, when occasion is.

Jury. My Lord, I desire he may be asked one question.

L. C. J. Mr. Garraway, what question would you ask him?

Jury. Where it was that he saw Mr. Turner at the consult?

Oates. I saw him at Fenwick's chamber, where he was a member of the consult; and being so, I saw him sign the resolve of the king's death.

L. C. J. Did you see him?

Oates. Yes, I did.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Then we desire Mr. Dugdale may be sworn (which was done). Come, Mr. Dugdale, pray will you tell my Lord and the jury what you know concerning Whitebread and Harcourt? first about Whitebread.

Dugdale. My Lord, I have very little acquaintance with the man, I have seen him at Tixall, with my old Lady Aston.

L. C. J. When?

Dugdale. I dare not speak the time, but appeal to him himself about the truth of it.

L. C. J. Is it years ago?

Dugdale. It is two or three years ago.

L. C. J. Well, what can you say against him?

Dugdale. Mr. Whitebread did write a letter that I saw under his own hand inclosed in a letter from Mr. Grove to Mr. Ewers, wherein he gave Mr. Ewers a caution, to choose those that were very trusty, it was no matter whether they were gentlemen or no, so they would be but stout and courageous: this was the purport of the letter, I cannot say the words exactly, but that he should choose those that were hardy and desperate to that purpose.

L. C. J. Pray where was it you saw that letter?

Dugdale. At Tixall.

L. C. J. How came you to see it?

Dugdale. Because all the letters were directed to me, that came to Mr. Ewers inclosed in Mr. Grove's letters: and so I intercepted the letter, and read it.

L. C. J. What was Mr. Ewers?

Dugdale. A Jesuit, my confessor; for I was entertained by Mr. Gavan to be in the conspiracy of the king's death, and so was I by several others.

L. C. J. You were not acquainted with Mr. Whitebread's hand, were you?

Dugdale. My Lord, I only came acquainted with Mr. Whitebread's hand, by seeing him write a letter at Tixall, which he delivered to me to send.

L. C. J. I pray let them understand you: you say that Mr. Whitebread did write a letter to Mr. Ewers, inclosed in one from Mr. Grove, wherein he advised that he should entertain lusty stout fellows, and no matter whether they were gentlemen, or to that effect: now I ask you, how you do know that was Whitebread's hand? or was it his name only that was to it?

Dugdale. My Lord, I saw his name at it.

L. C. J. When you saw that letter, had you seen his hand before?

Dugdale. Yes, My Lord, I saw it to another letter which I saw him write.

L. C. J. And that was like the hand in the letter to Ewers, was it?

Dugdale. Yes I do almost positively swear it was the same hand.

L. C. J. But what say you to Gavan and Ewers?

Dugdale. There were several consultations in Mr. Ewers' chamber, my own, and at Boscobel, and several other places. Mr. Gavan might be so ingenuous as to confess it.

L. C. Baron (William Montague, esq.) What were those consultations for?

Dugdale. For conspiring the king's death, and introducing of Popery. Mr. Gavan was chiefly made use of as a good orator and learned man, and a good scholar, to persuade people into the design; this I speak as to these persons.

L. C. J. Pray go on, Sir, for you shall have a full scope, for you never were a witness in any of the trials before: and you may take your own way, and you shall be heard, you shall not be interrupted; for what you say is very considerable.

Dugdale. One Meeting I think was in September last, it was at Tixall, and there was my Lord Stafford, and several others.

L. C. J. Was Gavan there?

Dugdale. Yes, Mr. Gavan was there; I suppose he will not deny it.

Mr. Justice Pemberton. Don't rely upon that, he will deny it, you may be sure; go on. You say he was there?

Dugdale. Yes, and that was to carry on the design: and I was by to hear. I think Mr. Ireland was in the country then; there was you (speaking to Mr. Gavan), Mr. Peters, Mr. Lawson, and Mr. Ewers, at this consult, and there was another, my Lord Stafford, and others that I cannot now name.

Gavan. What time?

Dugdale. It was in September, 1678.

Gavan. What day?

Dugdale. I think it was the 21st of September.

L. C. J. What was that consult and conspiracy about, in short?

Dugdale. It was for the introducing of popery, and taking away the life of the king, I being a person chosen out for that purpose, and was to be sent to London by Mr. Harcourt to be under the tuition of Mr. Parsons.

L. C. J. Pray who mentioned this? was that the first time that ever they discoursed of the death of the king?

Dugdale. No my lord, it was two years ago, but I speak of a shorter time.

L. C. J. Who began the discourse?

Dugdale. Mr. Gavan often discoursed of it, and encouraged me to it.

L. C. J. Who broke it first to you? who seemed the principal man?

Dugdale. Ewers and Gavan.

L. C. J. By the oath that you have taken, repent it once more, for this is new to us.

Gavan. It is so to me too upon my soul, for upon my conscience I never heard of it before.

L. C. J. It is a mighty confirmation of what was before discovered.

Dugdale. But I speak to Mr. Gavan, and appeal to him himself.

Gavan. Look upon me with confidence, if you can.

Lord Justice Pemberton. You must not threaten the king's witnesses.

Dugdale. Mr. Gavan, I desire you to inform the lords and all here present whether I was not under your tuition? And whether you knew any unjust action by me?

Gavan. You were never under my tuition.

L. C. J. Did you ever know him?

Gavan. Yes, my lord, he used to come sometimes where I was, and so we were acquainted; and I lived within eleven mile of Tixall, my lord Aston's, and having acquaintance in that family, Mr. Ewers, whom I know very well, I used to come there sometimes, but I never was in his chamber in my life. In what room of my Lord Aston's house was this discourse?

Dugdale. Some of it was in the little parlour, and some in Mr. Ewers's chamber.

Gavan. Were any present there? and who were they?

Dugdale. I have told you there was Mr. Ewers, and Mr. Lewson, and Mr. Petres, and some others; and for a further confirmation of this that Mr. Gavan may know that I had a great zeal for him, and that they did love me well, I gave them an estate, or else I believe they would not have trusted me so well as they did. I gave them 400*l.* to pray for my soul, and for the carrying on of this design; and when they told me they doubted they should want money, I promised them 100*l.* more for the carrying on the work. Upon which Mr. Gavan promised me that I should be canonized for a saint.

Mr. Justice Pemberton. Mr. Gavan himself?

Dugdale. Yes my lord.

Mr. Belwood. What do you know of any foreign assistance?

L. C. J. I would fain have all the world hear this; pray what was discoursed in the parlour in my lord Aston's house, and in Ewers's chamber?

Dugdale. It was about taking away the king's life, and introducing the Popish religion.

L. C. J. By the oath you have taken, was that their discourse?

Dugdale. Yes my lord, they were contriving how to kill the king and introduce popery.

Sir Cr. Levins. Pray, have you heard any discourse of an army, or about making a massacre?

Dugdale. It was spoken in my hearing, and there was some discourse why they should expect forces from beyond sea, and this gentleman said (meaning Mr. Gavan) though they beyond the seas had troubles enough upon themselves, yet if we could effect it, men and money would not be wanting. I will add nothing more than the truth in what I say.

L. C. J. You deliver your testimony like a sober modest man, upon my word.

Sir Cr. Levins. What say you as to a massacre?

Dugdale. My Lord, I have at some consultations heard speak of it, but the chief thing that they aimed at was, first, there was a letter that came out of Paris, and came through Mr. Harcourt's hands, and so came down into the country, to prove that it was the opinion of them at Paris, and St. Omers, to sing all this upon the Presbyterians, that is, the death of the king; that if any thing of that nature should happen, they should be ready to give the first alarm, and give out, that it was those still king-killing Presbyterians that had done the fact: and so they thought they should easily have brought in the Episcopal party into their company to revenge themselves of the Presbyterians.

L. C. J. It was pretty advice indeed to have it first laid on the Presbyterians, that they might get protestants to join and cut them off, and then their own throats should be cut.

Dugdale. And then, my lord, there was to be a massacre; and if any did escape that they could not be sure of were papists, they were to have an army to cut them off.

Mr. Belwood. Did he ever use any arguments to you, to prove the lawfulness of the design?

Dugdale. Yes my lord, he hath, and shewed me several examples for confirming me in it.

L. C. J. What for killing the king?

Dugdale. For the killing of any, to introduce their own religion.

Mr. Belwood. Pray, will you name some.

Dugdale. He endeavoured to prove it by Scripture, I cannot now call the text to mind; but it was to shew, how it was lawful and good to destroy any for the advantage of their religion, and then he shewed the example of Father Garnett;—how several of his reliques being beyond sea great miracles had been done by them.

L. C. J. And so now there is by St. Coleman too.

Sir Cr. Levins. What letters have you received from Mr. Harcourt.

Dugdale. I have received several packets of letters from several persons beyond seas, which were, by his instruction, communicated by Mr. Grove to Mr. Ewers, which letters did contain treason in them, for the introducing of popery, and killing and destroying the king.

L. C. J. How can you tell that?

Dugdale. Mr. Harcourt hath given it under his own hand, and I have intercepted the letters and read them.

L. C. J. You were acquainted with the hand?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. You read the letters?

Dugdale. Yes, my Lord, I did.

L. C. J. How many letters have you intercepted? Have you intercepted twenty?

Dugdale. Yes, a hundred, my Lord. Mr. Harcourt was the first that gave intelligence into the country (as I know of) of the death of sir Edmundbury Godfrey.

Sir Cr. Levins. Tell when it was given, and how.

Dugdale. I have made it out already upon oath, and I have witnesses to prove it.

Sir Cr. Levins. Pray, Sir, tell it now.

Dugdale. It was directed to Mr. Ewers, and it was three days before he was found, for it was received on the Monday, and he, as it is proved, was killed on the Saturday. The words were these, This very night sir Edmundbury Godfrey is dispatched. And I very much rejected Mr. Ewers for this action, and then told him, This will overthrow the design, or I will be hanged.

L. C. J. What day did you receive the letter?

Dugdale. I have proved I received it on a Monday.

L. C. J. But pray what date did it bear?

Dugdale. That letter must come by Saturday post, for it is said 'This night sir Edmundbury Godfrey is dispatched.'

L. C. J. He did not name any body, by whom?

Dugdale. No, but it said he was killed, and we knew by whom.

Mr. Just. Pemberton. And are you sure that was Mr. Harcourt's letter?

Dugdale. Yes; for he did usually sign his letters with two letters W. H. which stood either for Harcourt or Harrison.

Mr. Belwood. Did you acquaint any body with this, or did you conceal it?

Dugdale. I did go to an alehouse that is hard by my Lord's the next day, which was Tuesday, and there I asked, If they did not hear some news of a knight's being killed at London? And I have an evidence here, if your lordship please, I will call him, who, I desire, may testify the same thing.

L. C. J. Yes, by all means.

Sir Cr. Levins. Mr. Dugdale, Pray, will you give us some more account of the letter that came from Mr. Whitebread to Mr. Ewers.

Dugdale. I remember one particularly, but I cannot tell what number I have seen.

Sir Cr. Levins. Did you see more than that one?

Dugdale. I particularly remember that.

L. C. J. What was that one particularly?

Z

Harcourt. My Lord, I desire to ask him one question, When was the last time that you received any letters from me?

Dugdale. The last I received from you (to the best of my remembrance) was that about sir E. Godfrey, and it was in October.

Harcourt. I have not writ to that person this year and a half.

L. C. J. Let that man be called that proves this business of the death of sir Edmundbury, and the talk of it.

Dugdale. Mr. Harcourt, you know very well, that when Mr. Ireland was last in the country last year, you were to send him the answers that came by letters from St. Owers, and those were sent down to my lord Aston's, and I saw them, eight of those letters, I am sure. And I can prove it by one circumstance; two of them came relating to Mrs Edward Aston's death, from Paris; I intercepted them, and talking of it, that I could conjure, and tell the death of Mr. Edward Aston, before any of his friends knew of it. And Mr. Ireland writ a chiding letter about it, that he had not heard it sooner, and you sent down word, That you did write those letters, and yet you say you have not written to me of a twelvemonth, or more.

Harcourt. This gentleman does pretend to know my hand, and it is true, I have writ several letters for Mr. Ewers, and directed to him; but as to this time he speaks of, I have left off writing for divers years. He pretends to know me, and yet this gentleman before the Committee of Commons in parliament, which was yesterday was five weeks, as well as he knew my hand, came and said I was a gentleman he did not know. He came also to entrap me at the Gate-house before those gentlemen of the Committee of the House of Commons; but because he said he knew my hand so very well, and testifies those expressions in the letter, I must say this, I never did write any such letter, nor did I ever in my life seem to approve of any man's death or murder. But the thing is this, he pretends to know my hand and to prove it, the gentlemen desired me to write my own hand and my name, and he in the mean time did withdraw, and three of them did write their names, and afterwards they called him in again, and asked him which was Harcourt's hand, and he was not able to say which it was.

L. C. J. You write more hands, as well as have more names, and can counterfeit your hands, as well as change your names.

Mr. Just. Pemberton. You speak before your time, and your bare word goes for nothing.

L. C. J. But, Mr. Dugdale, where is your witness?

Harcourt. I do not know any thing of this.

L. C. J. But if he calls up a witness, of whom you can have no suspicion, that can testify, that at this time Mr. Dugdale spoke about the death of sir E. Godfrey, what will you say to that?

Harcourt. I believe there is no such thing at all.

Sir Cr. Levinz. My Lord, here is Mr.

Chetwya, pray swear him. (Which was done.)

L. C. J. Mr. Chetwya, Do you remember that Mr. Dugdale came to you any time last summer, and what time, and what discourse had you?

Chetwya. My Lord, if your lordship please, I was most part of the summer in the country, I came into Staffordshire about the 29th of August. My Lord, there is a gentleman, one Mr. Sanbidge, that is a kinsman of my lord Aston's, that was very well acquainted with the family where I was, which was half a mile off my Lord's, and used to come and play with me at tables. My Lord, at that very time in October he came to me, and there says he, do you hear nothing of a justice of peace in Westminster, where you live, that is killed? Or to that effect. No, said I, and I had letters yesterday, and heard nothing of it. Saith he, I was this morning at Elds, and there a girl of the house told me, Mr. Dugdale had been there, and reported that there was a justice of peace of Westminster was killed; but who he should be I never heard named, and on Saturday following my letters brought it down to me.

L. C. J. When was it that this was spoken?

Chetwya. It was Tuesday morning, (as I remember) and that by a very good circumstance, I went that day for Litchfield, and the Saturday after the news came to me to Litchfield, that sir Edmundbury was found murdered.

L. C. J. The jury would do well to observe this in point of time. Sir E. Godfrey was killed, as it was since proved, on Saturday, but on Monday he was missed, on Thursday he was found, and on Saturday the news was spread all over the country. Now, said he, the Tuesday before the news came down, which must be the Tuesday after the Saturday he was killed, one comes from the alehouse and asks, Do you not hear of a justice of peace at Westminster that is killed; for the wench at yonder alehouse says, Mr. Dugdale was here this morning and reported such a one was killed. So that it is most notorious, as any thing in the world can be, that this thing was known to them, before any of us knew what was become of him.

Mr. Just. Pemberton. How do you further know it to be upon Tuesday?

Chetwya. I know it to be that Tuesday, my Lord, very well, for we all went about such a time to my cousin's mother, to stay a week there, and after I returned back, and on Tuesday the 15th of October I went to the race to Litchfield, and stayed till Saturday there, and came thence to London, and was here the Wednesday, being the first day of the term. But I remember particularly the first information Mr. Dugdale gave in the country, came to my cousin's hands from the mayor of Stafford, and I happened to see him, I think it was Christmas day. It came inclosed in a letter. Upon the apprehension of Mr. Dugdale, I remember I met him, and he told me of it, and said he, the parliament did not sit that day: So he went to acquaint the Lord Lieutenant of the county, that is, the duke of Monmouth, with it, who carried it to the king. But when Mr. Dugdale was sent for, my cousin went down, and writ me a good character of him. As soon as ever Dugdale came to town, before he went to be examined by the council, as I remember I went with some gentlemen to speak with him, and said I to him, 'Can you say any thing about sir E. Godfrey's death?' Saith he, I remember such a letter came at such a time from Father Harcourt to Father Ewers, wherein were these words; This night sir E. Godfrey is dispatched. And said he, I remember I asked the question of Ewers, Is not this likely to spoil all the design? No, said he, he was a man that prosecuted persons that went to debauched houses, and it will be said to be some of them that did revenge themselves of him; or words to the same effect. This made me recollect the time I had the discourse with the gentlemen in the country. I happened to be out of town when the murderers of sir E. Godfrey were tried; as soon as I came to town, and found that the murderers of sir Edmundbury Godfrey were condemned, I was at a coffee-house enquiring how it was managed; some I found slighted it, others did not know what to make of it. Was not Mr. Dugdale there? said I. No, said they. Then I presume, said I, that a very material evidence was omitted. Upon this I went to Mr. Dugdale's chamber, and there, said I to him, What was the reason you were not produced as an evidence, at the trial of sir E. Godfrey's murderers? Said I, you told such a thing, and I hope you told truth, for I do not hear that you have ever contradicted it, that you saw a letter about the Monday after he was murdered. In my judgment it is very material, if you have sworn it, if your deposition be true, or else you did ill to report it. Said I, Pray let me see the copy of your deposition sworn before the council. He shewed it me, and there was not a syllable of it, that I could see, but afterwards appeared to be there.

L. C. J. That is not very material, if the thing itself be true.

Chetwya. But it is not being there, made me remember it.

Recorder. Pray set up Mr. Dugdale again. Now pray tell the contents of Mr. Whitebread's letter.

Dugdale. The contents of it was, to encourage Mr. Ewers to go on; to be careful whom he did intrust, that they should be such fellows as were desperate, hardy, courageous, and stout, or to that purpose; it was no matter whether they were gentlemen or no, so they were but courageous and desperate.

Just. Atkins. What were they to do?

Dugdale. For the killing of the king.

L. C. J. Was that in Whitebread's letter?

Dugdale. Mr. Whitebread did write those words, they were in the letter.

Whitebread. Was that very word in the letter, for killing the king?

Dugdale. It was, that they should be stout and courageous persons.

L. C. J. For what end?

Dugdale. It was for taking away the king's life.

L. C. J. I ask you, recollect yourself, was it by way of description of some design or plot, that those persons were to be chosen out? Or was it in downright words, 'for killing the king?'

Dugdale. To the best of my remembrance they were those very words.

L. C. J. It was much he would write such words in a letter.

Dugdale. I was one that was made choice of about it.

Justice Pemberton. Were you to be one?

Dugdale. Yes, I was.

Justice Pemberton. Mr. Gavan, you know who it was you entertained for this business, and you could trust them.

L. C. J. How were these letters conveyed? Were they sent by the ordinary post?

Dugdale. Yes, they were, and they trusted me with them, because being directed to me, if they were intercepted, I should be hanged, and they saved.

Justice Pemberton. Upon these letters, what were you entertained to do?

Dugdale. My Lord, I was entertained before by my Lord Stafford and Mr. Ewers.

Justice Pemberton. What to do?

Dugdale. To kill the king.

Whitebread. Pray, Sir, how came you to see these letters? Did you intercept them, and read them yourself?

Dugdale. I did intercept them, and open them of my own self.

Whitebread. Pray take notice of what he says, gentlemen.

Recorder. The jury do take notice.

L. C. Baron. Do you know any thing against Mr. Turner and Mr. Fenwick?

Dugdale. Mr. Ewers hath told me by word of mouth, that he was to carry on the design in Worcestershire, but I saw him with Mr. Ewers and Lewson, and others, when he was going to his brother Turner's then in Nottinghamshire, and they did consult and agree there in my hearing, to all that I have said before.

Turner. What did I assent to?

Dugdale. Why this design, you and Mr. Ewers and Lewson, and others agreed to what I said before.

Turner. Where was this?

Dugdale. At Tixall and other places.

Turner. In what month?

Dugdale. It was about two years ago, about the beginning of the business.

Turner. Where was it?

Dugdale. It was at Mr. Ewers's chamber. You know me very well.

Turner. I have not been in Staffordshire these four years.

L. C. J. Why don't you know him, Mr. Turner?

Turner. I do know I have been there a matter of three or four times in my whole life, but have not been there these four years.

Justice Windham. Have you any thing to say against Fenwick?

Dugdale. I don't know that I ever saw him before.

Recorder. But he speaks fully as to the other four.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Call Mr. Prance, and swear him. Which was done.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Come on, Mr. Prance. What can you say to Mr. Fenwick or any of the others?

Prance. Mr. Harcourt, I made him an image of our Lady about a year ago, and when I was receiving money for it, (it was to be sent into Maryland) you told me then that there was a design of killing the king.

L. C. J. Who told you?

Prance. Mr. Harcourt, that very time.

Sir Cr. Levinz. When was it?

Prance. It was when it was sent to Maryland, in the Portugal's country: you know it well, Mr. Harcourt.

Harcourt. I know nothing of it.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Pray let him alone, till we have done with him.

Harcourt. I desire but to know when it was.

Prance. When I received the money for the picture, it was a year ago.

Sir Cr. Levinz. What say you to Mr. Fenwick?

Prance. I was in Mr. Ireland's chamber in Russel-street, and there was Ireland, Fenwick, and Grove, and they were talking of 50,000 men that should be raised, and be in readiness to carry on the catholic cause, and settle the catholic religion. I asked who should govern them? They told me, my lord Bellasis, my lord Powis, and my lord Arundel.

L. C. J. Who told you so?

Prance. Mr. Fenwick.

L. C. J. How long ago?

Prance. About a fortnight Michaelmas last. Mr. Grove came to me two or three days afterwards, to buy two or three silver spoons to give away at a christening, and then I asked him, what office he should be in? He told me, he could not tell: But he told me, my lord Arundel, my lord Bellasis, my lord Petre, and my lord Powis had commissions for these things to give.

L. C. J. This Grove told you.

Prance. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. But what did Fenwick tell you?

Prance. He told me who were to govern the army, my lord Bellasis, my lord Powis, and my lord Arundel of Wardour.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Had he any discourse with you about trade?

Prance. He said, I should not fear trade, I should have church work enough.

Mr. Belwood. Pray speak that again.

Prance. I asked him, what shall we poor tradesmen do, if we have civil wars in England? O, said he, you need not fear having trade enough, you shall have church work, enough, to make images, chalices, and crucifixes, and vases, and such like things.

Mr. Belwood. If you will ask Mr. Prance any questions, pray do.

Fenwick. My lord, I am certain of this, that he never saw me at Mr. Ireland's chamber, in that company, nor did I ever speak of any such thing before him.

Prance. Mr. Ireland and he have been sitting together whole hours and consulting about some concern or other, mischief no doubt. My lord, I went to Mr. Fenwick's chamber, after my ghostly father was dead.

L. C. J. What was his name?

Prance. Father James. And he importuned me to come to confession to him; I told him, I was not yet very well satisfied who I should go to, to be my ghostly father.

Fenwick. When was this Mr. Prance?

Prance. Before Michaelmas, about a week or eight days.

L. C. J. Did not you know him, Mr. Fenwick?

Fenwick. Who, father James? yes, very well, and I know Mr. Prance, but not upon that account.

Prance. And I brought you a bell home, for the altar, at the same time.

Justice Pemberton. Who was it importuned you to have him for your confessor?

Prance. It was Mr. Fenwick; and I told him, when I did come to confession, I would come to him. And he enjoined me, once or twice, to say nothing of what I had heard said.

L. C. J. If Mr. Harcourt have any questions to ask him, let him.

Harcourt. Can you say that ever I spoke to you about any such business?

Prance. Yes, as sure as I stand in this place, and you in that. And one Thompson came with you, when you paid me for four candlesticks.

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Thompson?

Harcourt. Yes, I do.

L. C. J. Had you any candlesticks from Mr. Prance?

Harcourt. I had a great while ago.

Prance. He paid me 4*l.* that time for them.

Recorder. Call Mr. Bedlow. Who was sworn.

Sir Cr. Levinz. What can you say, as to any of the prisoners at the bar?

L. C. J. What can you say, as to Mr. Whitebread and Mr. Fenwick?

Bedlow. My lord, I do not question, but Mr. Whitebread and Mr. Fenwick will object against me, my refusing to give in evidence against them at the former trial; but I think that there are some upon your honourable bench, that can make my apology for not giving in all my evidence against them then; for it was not convenient, because it would have stopped a design I was then upon, and could not get off from, that was about Mr. Reading, whom I was then treating with, for Mr. Whitebread and Mr. Fenwick, as well as the lords in the Tower, and he told me, that he would depend upon my confidence and justice as to the lords, according as I did deal with these men; if I brought them off, he would believe, and the lords in the Tower would believe, that I would bring them off too. So that I did make an apology then in the Court, that I could not safely say all that I had to say at that time. Some of the justices, I believe, do remember it. and in that which I did give in against them, I did not say all, nor half, that I could have said.

Whitebread. Did you say any thing of that at the last trial?

Bedlow. I will answer that matter to the Court, but it is the measure they always take to intrap the witnesses; for now I am out of a country that will give me an indulgence and dispensation to speak exactly to a day, or an hour, as their St. Omer's witnesses have.

L. C. J. But what say you now to them?

Bedlow. I did then say, that I did see Mr. Whitebread, and he hath been in several consultations for the carrying on of the Plot; but then I did it with a caution, that I never heard of Mr. Whitebread, that he was so very much concerned; and indeed I had no reason to say so, because I heard him myself, and could not well speak from the hearsay of another. And as for Mr. Fenwick, I never heard him give in any answer, but I have seen Fenwick at the consult there.

L. C. J. Have they ever told you any thing concerning the killing of the king?

Bedlow. Whitebread told Coleman, at Mr. Harcourt's chamber, the manner of sending the four ruffians to Windsor, about September.

Harcourt. I never saw him twice in all my life before.

Mr. Belwood. Do you know of any reward those ruffians were to have?

Bedlow. Yes, I saw Harcourt take the money out of a cabinet, I think it was fourscore, or 100l.; the sum I do not well remember. Harcourt paid them the money, by Mr. Coleman's order, and gave the messenger a guinea from Mr. Coleman, to drink his health. Mr. Coleman was gone a little before I came in, and so I could not know that Coleman gave it, but he said so.

Sir Cr. Levinz. What was Pickering and Grove to have?

Bedlow. Grove was to have 1,500l. and a promise of the favour of the lords: 1,500l. was the sum appointed at Mr. Harcourt's chamber, and doubtless in several other places, but there I heard it from Mr. Whitebread, and Pritchard, and Le Faire, and Kaines; and Pickering was to have a number of masses, I cannot tell exactly how many, but they were so many, as at 12d. a mass would amount to be equal to Mr. Grove.

Mr. Belwood. Pray, sir, what was that for?

Bedlow. For killing the king. But Pickering had been disciplined before, and received a check from the superiors, because he had been negligent and slipped many opportunities. One time the flint of his pistol was loose, another time there was no powder in the pan, another time he had charged with all bullets, and no powder.

L. C. J. Did you see Harcourt deliver the guinea, for the expedition of the Windsor business?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, as from Coleman, to drink his health.

Mr. Belwood. Pray, was either Whitebread or Fenwick knowing of the agreement, when it was spoken of?

Bedlow. I have seen Fenwick at Harcourt's and Whitebread's chamber, when it was spoken of; they were all of one opinion, they had decreed it. I never saw Whitebread but twice at Harcourt's chamber, where one time was Harcourt himself, at another time was Pritchard, and Le Faire; and others; at which time sir George Wakeman's business was spoken of, and because he would not accept the 10,000l. 15,000l. was agreed to be given him; and upon sir George's trial, I shall let you know where he had the money too, but I desire to be excused at present. I shall speak it to-morrow.

L. C. J. What did they consult there?

Bedlow. They were consulting how it should be done; and what should be done, if they did not do it. Then Ireland proposed, that the most certain way was to do it at his morning walks in Newmarket; Fenwick was to go, and with him went Conyers; I heard seven or eight of them were to go.

L. C. Baron (Montague.) What say you to Turner?

Bedlow. Of Mr. Turner, I know nothing, but what I have heard others say.

L. C. B. What say you to Gavan?

Bedlow. I know nothing of him, but only I have heard Mr. Harcourt say he hath been a great manager of this business.

L. C. J. This is nothing to the purpose, what others say.

Bedlow. Mr. Harcourt is no stranger to my bringing of packets and portmanteaus over to him, from beyond the seas.

Harcourt. He never brought but one in all his life time.

Bedlow. What, did I never bring but one packet? Have not I brought divers and divers portmanteaus?

Harcourt. You never brought a portmanteau in your life.

Bedlow. I have brought divers.

Harcourt. You know I never saw you but twice in my life, before to-day, and when I met with you at the privy council.

Bedlow. My lord, the trials have been so put off, that I could never get all my witnesses together, but I have seven or eight of my witnesses that are out of town, that would make this very clear. My lord, there was never a packet of letters that I brought over to Mr. Harcourt, but did contain in it a design of the subversion of the government; and it must be more than two packets that I have brought over; for I have brought letters from Watton, and letters from St. Omers, and letters from Bruges, and from Paris, and from Valladolid and Salamanca; and all these letters contained in them the management of this plot, how far they had proceeded beyond sea, and answers how far they had proceeded in England, from him, and to them, to and again, from time to time, in carrying on the design of subverting the government, and altering the religion; wherein was given an account of the army and forces that were to be raised, both here, and beyond sea; what contributions were made, or expected, at home or abroad, all was lodged in Mr. Harcourt's hand, at leastwise an account of the greatest part. And I have been sent to Mr. Langborne with papers from Harcourt, about this affair, to register them; and of that I shall give you an account, upon Mr. Langborne's trial.

L. C. J. Well, now ask him what you will.

Whitebread. Sir, I desire to ask you one question.

Bedlow. I desire it may be asked the Court.

Whitebread. I desire to ask him whether he was a lieutenant in Flanders or no?

Bedlow. Yes, I was.

Whitebread. Of horse, or foot?

Bedlow. Of foot.

Whitebread. Take notice, there is no such officer of foot in all Flanders.

Bedlow. I was then in the regiment of the prince of Friesland.

Whitebread. There are no lieutenants in all the Flanders companies, only Captains and Alfaras's.

Bedlow. My lord, I had a commission, and I have a commission to be so, and I desire I may send for it.

L. C. J. It is no very material thing; as soon as it comes, they shall see your commission.

Harcourt. You say you have had papers from me, and been very familiar with me: Pray, how can this be, when, as I did declare before the lords in council, that was the third time I ever saw your face? The first time he came to me, he brought letters from Dunkirk, five years ago; when I opened them I found them directed to other persons, and to them I sent them, my name being only used in the outside cover; and it seems upon that confidence that he had in me at that time, not long after, he came to my chamber, and told me, He had lately become a Roman Catholic, and by that means had lost his friends, and that he then was in want, and, unless I did assist him, it would be very hard with him; though his father deserted him, yet he had some friends, whom he expected would do something for him, and then I will repay you.

L. C. J. When was this?

Harcourt. The second time that I ever saw him in my life, and this is four years since. Then said I, what will serve your turn? He told me 20s. which I lent to him; and I never saw his face afterwards, till I met him at the privy-council; and therefore, how should a man believe a word he says?

L. C. J. But how shall a man know, that what you say is true?

Bedlow. I will make it appear, at the trial of the lords, that I sent to him for 10*l.* and had it. I cannot now prove it, without bringing some witnesses that I have behind a curtain, and I will not discover them till then, they shall not know who they are.

Mr. Just. Windham. Will you ask him any questions?

Bedlow. My lord, I have not said the one-hundredth part of what I can say, honestly, and like a Christian, of Mr. Harcourt.

Harcourt. You may say what you will, but you will not speak truth.

Bedlow. Mr. Harcourt went with me to Mr. Coleman's, when I carried over the consult. There was the greatest part of the design, in that which I was to carry over to St. Omera, and that consult did I fetch from Mr. Coleman, and Mr. Harcourt was with me, and I had thanks from Mr. Coleman for my fidelity in the business, and expedition in bringing and carrying the packets. I was recommended to my lord Arundel by Mr. Harcourt, and was promised, by his lordship, all the friendship and favour imaginable, when the times were turned.

L. C. J. Why here, you see, he names several places and times, wherein he met with you.

Harcourt. Not one word of all this is true.

Bedlow. I desire you to ask Mr. Harcourt, my lord, Whether he was not in August, or Sept. last, in company with me and Le Faire?

Harcourt. Le Faire! I know no Le Faire.

Bedlow. Le Fevre, then.

Harcourt. Le Fevre, I believe I did see at that time, but not since.

Bedlow. Pritchard did recommend the care of me to him.

L. C. J. There, he names another time, when you and Pritchard were there together.

Bedlow. Pritchard was my confident, and my great friend, and told them, This is a person whose fidelity you have tried, in carrying over such and such letters, and therefore you may very well trust him, and take care of him: And so he recommended me, as one that was really fit to understand the bottom of the design. And Pritchard did tell me, before them, that the king's death was intended as a part of it; and he sent again another time to Mr. Harcourt, but it was about no material business; and Harcourt gave a Bill of Exchange to carry to what citizen I do not know, but to sir George Wakeman, to have 2,000*l.* by whose orders, as they said, your lordship shall know upon his trial, but I saw Harcourt give him the Bill of Exchange.

Mr. Just. Dolben. Who gave the Bill?

Bedlow. It was Harcourt, my lord.

Harcourt. Who was by, when this Bill was given?

Bedlow. Kaines, and sir William Anderson.

Harcourt. How was this Bill drawn?

Bedlow. It was drawn upon a citizen, and left in your hands.

Harcourt. I desire he may name the citizen, and, if he can, make it out; if he do, it will appear upon the merchant's books.

Bedlow. Sir George Wakeman received a Bill of Exchange from Mr. Harcourt, and he was told, Here is a Bill of Exchange for 2,000*l.* as part of a greater sum; to which sir George Wakeman answered, That 15,000*l.* was a small reward for the settling of religion, and preserving of the three kingdoms from ruin; but if it were not for such a woman, he would never undertake it, but for her he would do any thing. And after he had given sir George Wakeman the Bill, sir George Wakeman opened it, and read it, but I did not read the name that was to it.

Fenwick. My Lord, it seems not sufficient proof, that he saw a bill of exchange, unless he says from whom, and to whom, that it may be proved by the books, or otherwise.

L. C. J. You say well, Mr. Fenwick, if so be he had been the person concerned in the bill, that he were either one that drew it, or was to receive the money; then it was strange that he should not know the parties to it: but I must tell you, where he was not one nor the other, it was a collateral matter. Do people take notice of every particular bill of exchange that they see, which they are neither to pay nor receive?

Fenwick. But what reason does he give your lordship, or the jury, to believe there were such a bill, unless he does produce either the bill, or the person that paid it?

Bedlow. I did only see the bill out of Mr. Harcourt's hand, but it was read there only by sir George Wakeman.

L. C. J. Is it a pin matter, whether there was such a bill or no, or whether he had mentioned it or no?

Fenwick. But seeing he hath mentioned it, I say there is nothing of proof of it, but only his bare word.

L. C. J. Yes, there is his oath.

Sir Cr. Levins. And I desire the jury to take notice how unreasonable a thing it is that you ask. You would have Mr. Bedlow produce the bill of exchange, that was given to sir George Wakeman to receive the money.

Bedlow. I have only one word more. Sir George Wakeman received the bill of exchange from Mr. Harcourt, read it himself, folded it up, and went and received the money; and that the court will be pleased to see my commission, for now I have it here.

Which was read by my Lord Chief Justice North, and several others.

Sir Cr. Levins. We have only this one matter to trouble your lordship and the jury with. You perceive that hath been given, that the main matter begins at the consult of the 24th of April, when the consult was; now to fortify this evidence, we are now to produce a letter, that was written from one Petre, at St. Omers, a Jesuit, wherein is mention made, that he was to give notice, Mr. Whitebread had appointed a general meeting, just at that time, in London, at which they were to consult of very great matters; and they were to be very private in their coming to, and appearing about the town. And this letter was taken amongst Mr. Harcourt's papers, and to prove it, we call sir Thomas Doleman. [Who was sworn.]

Sir C. Levins. Pray, what can you say where this letter was found?

Sir Thomas Doleman. It was found amongst Mr. Harcourt's papers, in a bag of his papers that was committed to my care to search.

L. C. J. Cau you tell me what day you found it?

Sir Thomas Doleman. It was a matter of six or seven days after Mr. Oates had given his information of this plot to the council.

Harcourt. What paper is it?

Mr. Justice Atkins. Hear it first.

L. C. J. It is a letter found amongst your papers.

Harcourt. Who is it from?

L. C. J. It is from one Mr. Petre, do you know such a one?

Cl. of the Cr. It is subscribed, E. P.

Harcourt. Yes, my Lord, I do; I will deny nothing of the truth.

Then the letter was read, in hæc verba,

'Honoured Dear Sir,

'I have but time to convey these following particulars to you. First I am to give you notice, that it hath seemed fitting to our master consult, prov. &c. to fix the 21st of April next, Stilo veteri, for the meeting, at London, of our congregation; on which day, all those that have a suffrage, are to be present there, that they may be ready to give a beginning to the same on the 24th, which is the next day after St. George's day: you are warned to have jus suffragii, and therefore, if your occasions should not permit you to be present, you are to signify as much, to the end, others in their ranks, be ordered to supply your absence. Every one is minded, also, not to hasten to London long before the time appointed, nor to appear much about the town, till the meeting be over, lest occasion should be given to suspect the design. Finally, secrecy, as to the time and place, is much recommended to all those that receive summons, as it will appear of its own nature necessary. Tertio pro Domino Solono Disco. Benefact. Proo. Lunienis.

'I am straightened for time, that I can only assure you, I shall be much glad of obliging you any ways. Sir, your servant, EDWARD PETRE.'

L. C. J. Come, now, Mr. Harcourt, will you expound this letter to me, that speaks of this meeting and privacy?

Harcourt. Yes, my Lord; though it was not my Letter, yet I will tell you what the meaning of it was. That letter was writ to one, who had jus suffragii, a right to come and vote in our congregation, which, according to the constitution and orders of our society, is within the compass of three years, where they meet about the particular affairs of the society.

L. C. J. What was it about?

Harcourt. It was about choosing an officer; choosing a procurator to send to Rome; that was the chief point: and secrecy was a thing that was recommended to every one, as it was fit it should be, we living in a country where every one's eye was upon us, and we were an eye-sore to them, we ought to be cautious of meeting in such numbers, as might give an offence; and this was the only thing indeed.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Harcourt, you say well, but we are not to be altogether disciples of yours, so as to have no sense of our own, and to be imposed upon so weakly as this. Here is the thing, says the letter, I would not have you come too soon to London, nor appear too much in public, for fear of discovering a design which requires secrecy in its own nature. What, was that your design of choosing a procurator? Tell me but one thing that can bear the name of a design, which must have that secrecy in it, that people must not appear much about town, and that in its own nature requires such a thing.

Whitebread. My lord, the thing itself is evident; what was the design.

L. C. J. Come, Mr. Whitebread, you will do it better.

Whitebread. It is evident it was a design to choose an officer.

L. C. J. Why, good Mr. Whitebread, do any write after that manner? Were you to write to any one, or ask the jury, if they were to choose some collector for the receipt of some charitable money that should be employed for the relief of protestants in France: Do you think any man would say, Do not appear much in London before hand, nor come too soon, for fear of discovering the design, which in its own nature requires secrecy: will this endure the name of design?

Whitebread. First, it is a very hard thing to bring so many mens lives in danger, merely upon the interpretation of a word, which may as properly signify one thing as another. Is it not proper for me to say, I have a design to dine with such a man to-morrow, or the like?

L. C. J. It is true now, but hearken——

Whitebread. But that was the thing designed, to have a congregation for the choosing of an officer, and it was, I think, very properly said; and that it should be kept secret, was as prudent a thing as possibly could be. Was it not proper here, because our profession was not publicly permitted in this kingdom; and therefore that was the reason why secrecy was enjoined? and this, upon my salvation, was all that ever was intended or thought.

L. C. J. North. This now is the interpretation you put upon the letter, but we understand by the witnesses what was done at that meeting.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Whitebread, this letter, without question, hath been well studied by you all; and it requires it mightily.

Whitebread. It needs none.

L. C. J. This is not the natural exposition of the words of the letter, that you give, but a forced one; for first, there is a difference between saying, I do design to dine to-day, though it be a usual matter, but it is another thing, when I call a thing by the name of a design, accompanied with a requiring of secrecy in its own nature, and when I give advice that they must not appear in town too soon, nor too much about the town, for fear of discovering the design, which in its own nature requires secrecy: Must all this amount but to the choosing of an officer? You will never make one papist of all this company, if you make no better work of it.

Whitebread. My lord, I humbly desire your lordship would not strain a word which may be well enough said, whether it be properly said or no.

L. C. J. It is not one word alone, but it is the whole sense.

Whitebread. It is evident, there was just cause of secrecy, because of our profession.

L. C. J. Mr. Whitebread, It is not one word that is relied upon, for the business is pursued. It is not said, pray meet at such a time, but, Be careful you do not discover the design; if it had been only said so, it would have been a strain, to have made this construction of a single word, to make this that design; but as it is here, we make no such construction; it had been hard indeed to put that meaning upon it as you do, even then, for it is seldom so used, for no man writes after that manner; but, when it follows in a continued sense of so many lines, 'be sure you meet on the 24th of April, the day after St. George's day, but come not too soon to town, nor appear too much about the town for fear of discovering the design, which you know in its own nature does require secrecy;' can we make any such interpretation of it? If you have no better arguments than these, you must have people lose their understandings, or have a very blind obedience to yours, or it will never down. Ay; come, Mr. Gavan, how do you say is the meaning of this?

Gavan. For my part, I will assure your lordship, I was not there; but this is known to all the christian world, that there is such a meeting in Spain, France, Germany, &c. that wherever the Jesuits are, once in three years they have a meeting among themselves, for the settling of their affairs. Indeed the words have given your lordship an occasion to raise a difficulty, what the word 'design' should mean? which I do give this answer to: Your lordship's difficulty is, That the word 'design,' here, should be made use of to send one poor Jesuit to Rome. My lord, do but mark the end of the congregation, and you will say to us, that we might well use that word, because the word may import some great business of concernment; now what business of greater concernment for poor religious men to meet together about, than those things that may promote their better state in another world, and the regulation of what is amiss in their order. My lord, upon my conscience and salvation, this was the end of the congregation, to meet and see what is amiss in their order, who do their duties, and who not, who are irregular in their offices, and whose office is vacant, and to be supplied.

L. C. J. But must nobody come to town, nor appear too much about the town, for this?

Gavan: Therefore, my lord, as to the word design, it concerning the whole spiritual good of the whole body of the English Jesuits, it might well be used for the consultation of that body about all their good, temporal and spiritual, which was all concerned in it.

L. C. J. These are a many words, but to no purpose.

Gavan: Now, my lord, for the second thing that you object, your lordship remembers very well, that the continuation of the sense in so many lines, made the thing the more suspicious, that more was intended by it than so: Now this I shall be able to answer, if there can be given a particular reason why we should add that word of secrecy, to the other of design; having answered to the one part, we now give an answer to the other, and so to the whole. Now, my lord, because of the time, the parliament was then sitting, and that we might not offend the king and all civil magistrates (whom we honour from our hearts and souls), that word was used that it might be kept secret.

L. C. J. It was not out of love to the parliament, it was the nature of the thing required it, nor was it out of fear you had of them. I did never find, though you are as good at it as ever any I met with (for I never met with a priest that had much more understanding); but really you do not answer me. You are so far from scholars, and arguing like such, that you do not maintain the matter with common and rational understanding, but only heap up so many vain words, (like a rope of sand put together) which hath no natural coherence; for you cannot possibly make this reasonable, that people should have so much caution, that they should not come too long to town beforehand.

Gavan: Not to be taken notice of.

L. C. J. Not to appear in town when they come.

Gavan: Not to be taken notice of.

L. C. J. I say so, you cannot tell why all these cautions should be used, merely for choosing an officer.

Gavan: My lord, our lives depended upon it, if we were taken, being such men as we are.

L. C. J. You can make nothing of it, and you will find it an hard task to answer it; for if half the evidence that hath been given were not given, yet this letter of your own, which cannot be denied, is an unanswerable proof. It does monstrously confirm Mr. Oates's testimony to be undeniable, as to the meeting at the consult; for he, four or five days beforehand, comes and tells the council, the very day which, five or six days after, this letter makes good, which is found in Harcourt's custody. Then there was a consultation upon the day, the very day that Mr. Oates says, and what he calls a consultation, your own letter says is a design.

Gavan: It was a design of a congregation.

L. C. J. What sense is there in that? Will any man in England, or did any man in England ever say, take heed of discovering out design of going to church, or choosing a collector?

Gavan: There is reason for the one, and reason for the other too.

L. C. J. I would appeal to yourselves, and all here present, what the natural import of such a letter is, whether it does not carry a matter more than ordinary, whether its natural intendment doth not look at that? And the next thing is this: does any man write plainer than this, when they write of a thing that is of such a nature? Is not the danger too great to hazard that fact, which they call the nature of the thing, to intrust it in a letter? Is it not vain to put that in a letter, in words at length, which they to whom it is writ, know what the thing means? And if it should be further known than they would have it, the thing could never be done: and if you consider the person that writes, a jesuit, or a priest: are priests ever plain? And will you expect plainness here, when, in things of ten thousand times less moment, they do not write plainer? Is it not known, you have not a proselyte, that you do not keep under obligations as close as your confessions are? Have you not taken here, as it is sworn, a Sacrament of Secrecy? Is there a woman that you convert, but in the dark? Or a Papist made out of a priest's hole? Are not all your deeds under-ground? And do you work with any light, but that of a dark-lantern? This is plain, unless you give a better answer to this letter, the letter will hang about your necks.

L. C. J. North. Mr. Oates will tell you what the design was.

Mr. Justice Ellis. He can tell you what it was.

L. C. J. The letter speaks itself.

Oates. Mr. Gavan, and they, now, tell your lordship what this consult was for, but they denied this consult at first, when there was but one man to justify it. I justified it before Mr. Fenwick, who denied it at the council-board, though now they pawn their salvation upon the justification of it.

Fenwick. I never denied that there.

L. C. J. Come, have they any thing to say for themselves?

Bedlow. My lord, whereas, as Mr. Gavan says, that in obedience to the king and parliament they would have their consultations secret, and that they always desired to conceal themselves then; the time of sessions of parliament was the only time that I and others have been employed to fetch over more Jesuits than at any other particular time.

Oates. And there are more of them then in the Court of Requests, and in the Lobbies, bare-faced, and threatening the Protestants, than at any other time.

Bedlow. We used to fetch them against the parliament always; they were in less danger then, than at other times.

L. C. J. You could give a very good interpretation of the letter, I suppose, that Mr. Dugdale speaks of, that came from Whitebread, that he should be sure to entertain such as were hardy stout fellows; I suppose you can make all this to signify nothing more than a design for a game at cudgels.

Sir Cr. Levinz. If your lordship please, we must desire one letter more may be read. Your lordship hath been told of commissions for raising an army, here is a touch of them mentioned in this letter, found amongst Mr. Harcourt's letters too.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Harcourt, you had best attend; here is another letter found amongst your papers, concerning some commissions. You look ill to your letters; you are to blame, indeed, Mr. Harcourt.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Pray, sir Thomas Doleman, look upon that paper, and tell us how you came by it.

Sir T. Doleman. This letter in my hand I found amongst Mr. Harcourt's papers, about some two days after I found that other that was read before. Having heard Mr. Oates give in his information to the council, that there were several commissions given out to several persons, and finding some doubtful clauses and expressions in the letter, I did present this letter to the council, and made a mark upon it, 'enquire what is meant by the word 'patents.'

L. C. J. Pray let it be read, because we shall desire a little more of their interpretation.

Cl. of the Cr. It is signed Christopher Asder-ton, Hilton, February the 5th, 1667-8.

Oates. Hilton, that is Rome.

L. C. J. Mr. Harcourt, you understand, that by Hilton is meant Rome?

Harcourt. Yes, my lord, I do.

L. C. J. Well, then go on, and read it.

Cl. of Cr. 'Worthy Sir, I know not from whence it proceeds, but I perceive that both your letters and mine had bad fortune by the way, for my correspondents with you complain, they hear not from me; whereas I write constantly intire packets; and since the bills I received from yourself, for sir William Goring and for Mr. Ireland, from Mr. Shelly, I have not had one letter, but what I received this week, which, in part, made recompence for the former, for it brought me three of yours and one of Mr. Ireland's, for which I render you many humble thanks, and acknowledge the 15*l.* from my lord Castle-main, though Mr. Ireland made no mention of it in his. We are all here very glad of the promotion of Mr. Thomas Harcourt. When I writ that the patents were sent, although I guess for whom they were, yet I knew not for certain, because our patrons do not use to discover things or resolutions till they know they have effect. And therefore in these kind of matters I dare not be too hasty, lest some might say, A fool's bolt is soon shot.'

L. C. J. What is the meaning of these pa-tents?

Fenwick. This gentleman will tell you, my lord.

Whitebread. My lord, they were the patent for my being provincial.

L. C. J. How many patents had you?

Whitebread. But one, my lord.

L. C. J. Is that patents?

Whitebread. Liters Patentes.

L. C. J. Is it patent or patents?

Cl. of Cr. Patents.

L. C. J. Read those words again.

Cl. of Cr. 'We are all here very glad at the promotion of Mr. Thomas Harcourt. When I writ that the patents were sent, although I guess for whom they were, yet I knew not for certain, because our patrons do not use to discover things or resolutions, till they know they have effect.'

L. C. J. Now you have not interpreted well this, neither.

Sir Cr. Levinz. It is said, 'I knew not for certain who (they) were for;' but to make it clear, I would desire Mr. Whitebread to answer me one question, How long is it, Sir, since you were made provincial?

Whitebread. The 14th of January was twelve-month.

Sir Cr. Levinz. And this was dated the 5th of February, which was after your commission.

Whitebread. That may be, and they may know till then.

L. C. J. And as you expound these latter words of the letter, That the resolution of making you provincial was not discovered till the effect was known.

Whitebread. Because it is not known, whether the person that is nominated might not be excepted against; and it is Liters Patentes.

L. C. J. But here is but one person to answer the word Patents, and there should be more than one man.

Whitebread. Every patent is called Liters Patentes, though it be but for one person.

Recorder. They were in great doubt that you would refuse the place, I warrant.

Oates. He is bound on pain of damnation not to disobey his superiors; if they choose him to a place, he must take it upon him.

Whitebread. It is not the first, second, or hundredth time that one hath been appointed by the superior to a place, and hath refused it; and if I had known the hundredth part of what I do now, of the troubles of the place, I would never have accepted it.

Recorder. Ay, if you had known the difficulty of this design, you would never have engaged in it, especially if you had known what is come to pass.

Whitebread. No, Sir, I never had a hand in any such thing in all my life: this is coram Deo that I now speak, and as I am to appear before the great tribunal at the day of judgment, I know nothing of all this matter.

Oates. My lord, these patents, of which this letter makes mention, a great many of them came down in the months of April and May before.

L. C. J. Methinks he interprets them plainer than you do.

L. C. Baron. Now what have you to say every one of you for yourselves? Make your defence.

L. C. J. Mr. Whitebread, do you begin.

Oates. While the prisoners' evidence is calling in, I desire that my witnesses may be sworn.

Justice Pemberton. Mr. Oates, be quiet, there is no need of it yet, till they have made their defence.

L. C. J. But send for them, that they may be ready.

Whitebread. My lord, that which I have to say for myself is this: I thank God, my lord, I am not afraid of death; but I should be very loth to die unjustly, and I hope your lordship will consider, that every man's blood is dear to him, and is concerned for his own life to preserve it, he ought to be allowed liberty and freedom to preserve himself as much as he can. Life is a thing not to be thrown away, but charity to be looked after, and that there is such a thing as taking away men's lives by perjury, as well as by a knife or pistol, is without contradiction. Now whoever comes against a man for his life, I suppose he is to be looked upon not only by the prisoner, but also by the Jury and the Court, that he ought to be probatustis, and a man fit to be admitted to be a witness. Now I have something to offer, That Mr. Oates is not any such person. Your lordship was pleased to say, that he was the person who proved the design mentioned in the letter that was read. Now I hope your lordship will give me leave (and I hope I may do it without offence to this Court) to say that he is perjured in what he says.

L. C. J. You mean that his evidence is false, you may do it if you can.

Whitebread. He says he came over hither, and was here present the 24th of April with me, and I did appoint him to do such and such things, and discovered the whole business to him. Now I desire your lordship would be pleased to consider whether this were probable, and whether I had not been a very much mistaken man all this while, to trust a man with such a business, and whether I ought not rather to be sent to Bedlam than Newgate, for trusting such a man as he, whom by his own confession I never saw till that time. It is not rational that a man would trust him; and then, my lord, that this business should be discovered to him, a man that depended wholly upon us to live, and had no livelihood but what he had from us, who maintained him at St. Omers long, as well as the best man in the house.

L. C. J. Did you do it?

Whitebread. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. C. J. You should consider how in that you answer yourself.

Whitebread. I, that is, when I came to the office, and I and my predecessors. When I was superior I found him not a man fit for that purpose and design he pretended to. He was very zealous to be entertained amongst us, and therefore I desired him to absent himself.

L. C. J. Why was he not fit to be employed among you?

Whitebread. For several reasons of our own: First of all, it was doubtful whether he was a good Catholic: For he had oftentimes maintained several propositions that were not soundly Catholic: And then secondly, he led a very idle life, and he was not found a man we were obliged to accept of, and therefore we desired him to retire. And to that purpose we furnished him, gave him a good suit of clothes, and a periwig, and 4*l.* in his purse, and he promised me to pay me again when he had sold his library, which he said he had a very good one in London; but he never did. But that I should be so strangely overseen and mad, as at the first sight of such a man as this, to trust him with such a great intrigue as this was, and to write in such a plain strange manner, and send by post to Mr. Dugdale, as your lordship did and justly might wonder at, had been a madness. It was much that any man would write so plain of such a thing. But then my lord, the chief thing is this, That I hope your lordship will give us leave to produce our witnesses to prove, that he was not from St. Omers from the 10th of December till the 23d of June following, and never lay out of the house but one night from December till June.

L. C. J. Name your witnesses.

Whitebread. I desire first Mr. Hilsley may be called.

L. C. J. Call him; but I'll tell you what is strange. You say it is wonderful that you should trust a man you had so little opinion of his abilities or fidelity; but I wonder that you should maintain him after that.

Whitebread. No, my lord, we did not.

L. C. J. You say you did.

Whitebread. No, my lord, he pretends he was here in England sent over by us, but we will prove he was not.

L. C. J. But you maintained him abroad?

Whitebread. That was before.

L. C. J. Is it so great a wonder that you should take into your confidence and consultation that man, whom for a considerable time before you had maintained abroad?

Whitebread. But, my lord, I suppose there is some difference between charitable acts to a man in want and an scholar, and trusting him with such an intrigue as this.

Fewwick. Pray, my lord, be pleased to take notice, that this man's evidence all along is, that he saw such and such letters from such and such persons. They have no evidence but just that they saw such and such letters, and how is it possible that a man who was turned away from St. Omers for his misdemeanours, that I should shew him all my letters? Now, my lord, I have had a thousand letters taken from me, not any of these letters had any thing of treason in them, or soliciting of persons to come into England; let the letters be produced, and then your lordship will see what in in them. All the evidence that is given, comes but to this; there is but saying and swearing. I defy them all to give one probable reason to satisfy any reasonable uninterested man's judgment how this could be.

L. C. Baron. There can be no reason given why you should sign an instrument to kill the king.

L. C. J. You say there is nothing but saying and swearing, but you do not consider what you say in that matter. All the evidence and all the testimony in all trials is by swearing. A man comes and swears that he saw such a bond sealed, or heard such words spoken, this is saying and swearing; but it is that proof that we go by, and by which all mens' lives and fortunes are to be determined. But then say you, it is wonderful that since they say they saw such and such letters, they should not produce them; why? they did not belong to them: aye, but then say you, it is strange they should not find one letter in all these numerous papers that were taken that contains any traitorous matter; but, I say, it is forty times more a wonder that one should be taken, than for all the rest to be undiscovered. I suppose Mr. Harcourt, amongst those papers that he let be surprised, did not think that letter that hath been read to have been of such consequence, nor the sense of it to be so bad.

Fenwick. I dreamt no more of my apprehension, when I was taken, than the day of my death, it was so unexpected; nor what I should be accused of: I had no fear of it, no thought of it, so that I took nothing out of the way. They took 5 or 6,000*l.* bonds and bills, besides letters; methinks something of the effects of those letters might be produced, and some of the design appear. For God's sake, where are the commissions signed, and monies paid?

L. C. J. They talk of a patent. Mr. Whitebread construes it, that it is his commission; if so, does it lie in Oates or Bedlow's power to shew that commission? (this is just like that of the bill of exchange) neither does it in any of the letters.

Fenwick. Here is Mr. Hilsley, my lord.

Whitebread. My lord, we pray we may have the favour that they may be sworn.

L. C. J. North. By law they cannot.

L. C. J. In no capital case against the king can the witnesses for the prisoner be sworn; but I will say this to the Jury, that they are not sworn is because they cannot, but the Jury is to take great heed of what they say, and to be governed by it according to the credibility of the person and of the matter.

Gavan. My lord, if you please to give me leave, my lord Coke in his Institutes says expressly, That there is no positive law against it; his words are, there is not so much as scintilla juris against it.

L. C. J. North. We know that the constant usage and practice is so, and you cannot produce any man, that in any capital case had his witnesses sworn against the king.

L. C. J. My lord Coke says otherwise; That the evidence should be so plain that nothing could be answered to it; and therefore no evidence should be sworn against the king.

Gavan. My lord, those are the words of my lord Coke.

L. C. J. You argue against the known practice of all ages.

L. C. J. North. There was never any man in a capital cause, sworn against the king. The common law is the custom of the kingdom, and we are bound to know it, and must be all governed by it.

Whitebread. In Mr. Ireland's Trial, p. 36, 36, he says, he came over with sir John Warner, Father Williams and Mr. Hilsley, from St. Omers.

Justice Pemberton. Nay, you must not resort to the printed trials for evidence.

Fenwick. If we can prove him perjured at any time, I hope we may.

L. C. J. Suppose upon the taking of those printed trials they mistake, shall Mr. Oates therefore be thought guilty of perjury? If you have any thing to ask of your witnesses which you can apply to the evidence given now, you may.

Fenwick. Mr. Oates, did not you yourself own that you came over with Mr. Hilsley?

Oates. Ask me any question about what I have given to-day, and if the bench think it reasonable, I will answer it.

Fenwick. My lord, he did then affirm, that he came over with these persons, in which he is forsworn.

L. C. J. He is not convicted of perjury, and therefore that must not be urged.

Fenwick. My lord, we will prove by witnesses that were at the trial, that he did affirm so: and I do desire now to know of you, Mr. Oates whether ever you came over with Mr. Hilsley?

Oates. That which I said then, and that which I say now, is (because you should not puzzle yourselves), that one Mr. Hilsley did come over with us when we did.

Hilsley. My lord, I did not.

L. C. J. How can you tell?

Hilsley. I left him at St. Omers.

L. C. J. What say you, Mr. Oates?

Oates. It is true, Mr. Hilsley did leave me at St. Omers because he went out a Sunday morning, and I came out of the Monday morning, but I overtook him at Calais.

Hilsley. My lord, that is false, and I have a great many here that can prove it.

L. C. J. What religion are you of?

Hilsley. I am only to serve his majesty.

L. C. J. Are you not to serve God too?

Hilsley. I am first to serve God, and then his majesty.

Mr. Justice Pemberton. Are you a Catholic?

L. C. J. Are you a Roman Catholic?

Hilsley. Yes, my lord, I am.

Mr. Justice Pemberton. Be not ashamed of your religion, do not deny that; your provincial there can give you a dispensation for what you say.

Hilsley. I hope a Roman catholic may be a lawful witness?

L. C. J. Yes, I deny it not. This is that you say, you left him at St. Omers, you must call more witnesses to back him: master Oates says it is true, you left him at St. Omers but he overtook you at Calais.

Oates. This gentleman lost his money at Calais, and Father Williams did relieve him by my means.

L. C. J. What say you to that?

Hilsley. Why my lord, yes it is true, I did lose my money there, but it is nothing to the purpose, for I will affirm I was never in the ship with him in my life.

Oates. I desire he may be asked, whether he be in the degree of a priest, or not?

L. C. J. That would be a hard question to put to him to make him accuse himself. It would bring him into danger of treason.

Mr. Justice Pemberton. He is a boy very fit to make a Jesuit of.

L. C. J. How could he then come to know this?

Hilsley. I confess it is true, that Mr. Oates did never come over with me. And I have witnesses to prove, that they saw him there next day at St. Omers, and two or three several weeks after.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Mr. Oates hath another circumstance to prove it by.

Oates. He went from us by the way, and did not come up with us to London.

Hilsley. I know how he understood this: there was a gentleman that the witnesses will prove he was very familiar with, the second of May, that told him.

L. C. J. Is that gentleman here?

Hilsley. Here is one here to prove it.

L. C. J. And did he tell them how you lost your money?

Hilsley. Yes, my lord, I suppose so.

L. C. J. I speak seriously I do not understand how he could come by these things.

Parry. My lord, I can testify, if it were lawful for us to swear, and prove that he was at St. Omers that day, when he says he came over.

L. C. J. What is your name?

Parry. My name is William Parry.

L. C. J. What countryman are you?

Parry. I am a Flintshire man.

L. C. J. When was he at St. Omers?

Parry. He was there that 25th day, that day he says he came over.

L. C. J. Was he there all that day?

Parry. He did not stir thence all the day.

L. C. J. How can you tell that?

Parry. I dined with him; that day he went into the infirmary he did not go out of the college, he was sick.

Fenwick. Mr. Parry how long did Mr. Oates stay there at St. Omers?

Parry. He staid till after the 20th of June, I am sure; for on the 20th of June, I know he was present, by a very good circumstance, he was at an action of ours, a latin play.

Oates. My lord, as to this going into the infirmary at that, I deny it. My lord (if your lordships please), I will shew that this gentleman is not only a votary of the Jesuits, but hath been one of the sodality several years. And they have dispensations, and are bound by an implicit obedience to say what the Jesuits bid them, who are their superiors.

L. C. J. What say you to the 20th of June, the time he says you were there at the seeing of the play?

Oates. My lord, as to that 20th of June I was there, and there was an action at that time, for I was then returned thither from London.

Parry. I deny all that, for he never stirred out of the college.

L. C. J. Young man, in what quality were you there?

Parry. I was a student there, a poet.

L. C. J. How can you say he did not stir thence all the while?

Parry. I know by a particular thing; I dined and supped with him there; but when he was in the infirmary; but the particular passage was this, he did there fall out with a gentleman that was in the infirmary too.

L. C. J. When was that?

Parry. It was at the time that he says he came away.

L. C. J. When went he in?

Parry. The 25th of April, Old Stile, and staid a matter of three or four days.

Oates. Will you be pleased to take notice of this? He says that Hilsley left me at St. Omers when he came away, and that the next day he dined with me and that I went into the infirmary, which, he says, was the 25th of April, Old Stile. Now we will run to argue ad hominem; if this were the 25th of April, Old Stile, how did Mr. Williams meet with Mr. Hilsley at Calais; and restore him his money, when the 21th, Old Stile, Mr. Williams was at the consult in London?

L. C. J. When was it that you say Mr. Hilsley was at St. Omers?

Fenwick. Answer my Lord's question.

Parry. He went away the 24th of April, as I remember.

L. C. J. What, Old Stile?

Parry. Yes, Old Stile, according to the reckoning there.

Oates. But, my lord, upon the oath that I have taken, if he mean New Stile, all that this gentleman hath said about this is false, except that I was there the 20th of June.

L. C. J. Was it New Stile or Old Stile that you say Mr. Hilsley went away?

Recorder. He does not know New Stile from Old Stile.

Parry. He went the 24th, that is the Old Stile beyond sea.

Whitebread. I do desire he may answer; whether he does know that Mr. Oates was ever out of the house from the time he came in December till June, but one night.

Perry. No, he never was out but one night at Watton.

L. C. J. From what time to what time?

Perry. It was but two days and one night.

L. C. J. What time was it that he was there first?

Perry. He came thither in December.

L. C. J. And did he stay there all the while?

Perry. He did not stir from the college till the end of June; and never went out but a day or two, as I know of.

L. C. J. Not as you know of; but might not be go, and you not know of it?

Perry. I am sure of it.

L. C. J. How can you tell?

Perry. Not a Scholar goes from thence to England, but the whole college rings of it.

Gaves. And then, my Lord, when they go out, they go in secular clothes, that none must know when any person leaves the college.

Oates. My Lord, in such cases, though it is true in a general sense, yet it is but a general rule, and every general rule admits of its exceptions, and my case was a particular exception. I put on the habit of the house as soon as I did return from London, and did not appear as if I had gone out of the house, nor did I know that it was known that I had been out; for I did never appear in the college in a secular habit.

Whitebread. What his clothes were, does not change the place he sat in; he being ancienter than the boys, had a privilege to sit in a particular place, which must be known to all the house at dinner and supper. He was visible every day there.

L. C. J. I do believe it; and therefore he says, not only that he was reported to be there, but that he saw him there almost every day.

Then another Witness for the Prisoner stood up.

L. C. J. What say you, young lad?

Doddington. I say, my Lord—

L. C. J. Whence your name?

Doddington. Doddington.

Oates. Pray, my Lord, ask him if he went by that name at St. Omers?

Justice Pemberton. What was your name at St. Omers?

Doddington. My name was Hollis there.

L. C. J. How old are you?

Doddington. Eighteen years and an half.

L. C. J. What can you say? Where was Mr. Oates?

Doddington. He never went out of the college, but one night to Watton, till the end of June.

L. C. J. When came he into the College?

Doddington. A fortnight before Christmas. I did not mind the day; he says himself it was the 10th of December.

L. C. J. Was he there till June?

Doddington. Yes, he never went out till June but one night.

L. C. J. Where was that? At Watton?

Doddington. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. How do you know that?

Doddington. I only know that by what all the house said.

L. C. J. Did you see him every day, except that day?

Doddington. I cannot say I saw him every day, because he was in the infirmary once, and he was there that very day after Mr. Hilsley went away.

L. C. J. What day was it that Mr. Hilsley went away?

Doddington. The 24th of April New Style; and that day he fell sick, and went into the infirmary the next.

L. C. J. What day of the week was that?

Doddington. It was of a Sunday.

L. C. J. And when did you see Mr. Oates?

Doddington. On Monday or Tuesday, I am not certain.

L. C. J. How often did you see him from the 24th of April to June? Did you see him every other day?

Doddington. Yes, that I am sure of for every other day, I am not certain every day.

L. C. J. Are you positive?

Jury. We desire to know what time of the year he was in the infirmary.

Doddington. I discoursed with him in the infirmary two or three days after Mr. Hilsley went away.

L. C. J. But what time of the year was it?

Doddington. He was there first in winter, and then afterwards he was in at this time, which was in April.

L. C. J. Have you any more to say?

Doddington. I can say more, that I saw Mr. Oates the second of May, with one Blood or Burnaby, and I am sure I saw him in his company.

L. C. J. Where did you see him?

Doddington. I saw him walking in the garden with Mr. Burnaby.

Justice Pemberton. When did you come into England?

Doddington. I came over the 24th of April.

L. C. J. How long have you been in England?

Doddington. About two months.

Justice Pemberton. Why did you come over? Were you sent for upon this occasion?

Doddington. No, I was not.

Justice Pemberton. Why did you come over?

Doddington. I came over partly upon the king's proclamation.

L. C. J. What proclamation was that?

L. C. J. North. That those that were in the seminaries should come over again.

Doddington. And partly because I had not my health.

Fewsick. Mr. Gifford, what do you know about Mr. Oates's coming from St. Omers?

L. C. J. When came you from St. Omers?

Gifford. I came over about a month ago.

L. C. J. Upon what occasion?

Gifford. To justify that Mr. Oates was there all the while that he says he was here.

L. C. J. You speak like an honest man, there is no hurt in that.

Fenwick. We did send for him over.

L. C. J. When did you see Mr. Oates there?

Gifford. I saw him the 1st of May was twelvemonth with us, and the 31st of April.

L. C. J. And how long after that?

Gifford. I was in his company for a whole week after I am sure.

L. C. J. You say the 1st of May he was there, how can you tell?

Gifford. The 1st of May there came one Mr. Burnaby to the college, and he fell into acquaintance with him, and I saw him with him: He was with us an whole week at least every day after dinner: We have an hour always after dinner to recreate in, and this gentleman was there with us, and Mr. Burnaby; for Mr. Oates seeing us in the garden at first, put himself into our company, and kept with us.

L. C. J. Was he not in the infirmary?

Gifford. Not at that time, my lord.

L. C. J. When was he in the infirmary?

Gifford. The day after Hilsley went away.

L. C. J. Do you remember that?

Gifford. Yes, I do.

L. C. J. North. How long did he stay in the infirmary?

Perry. About three days.

L. C. J. And for how long together did you see him after Mr. Hilsley's departure?

Gifford. I can swear that I saw him at least till June, if I can believe my own eyes.

L. C. J. Your religion does not allow you to believe your own eyes.

Gifford. I can in my conscience say, I believe I did see him every day, or every other day.

L. C. J. Which do you say, did you see him every other day or every day?

Gifford. If I say, I saw him every other day, that is sufficient.

L. C. J. Do you know that he went out of the college at any time.

Gifford. Yes, he went for one night.

L. C. J. Whither?

Gifford. To a place called Watton.

L. C. J. What did he go thither for?

Gifford. For his relaxation.

L. C. J. How came you to take such particular notice of him, that he was there?

Gifford. It is impossible but we should see him, and take notice of him, for we dine all together in one room, and we could not but take notice of him, for he was at a distinct table by himself.

L. C. J. How many are there that dine in one room?

Gifford. One hundred and fifty.

L. C. J. How could you know him, when there were so many.

Gifford. He was at a distinct table by himself, between the boys and the religious.

Then stood up another, one Palmer.

L. C. J. Well, what do you ask him?

Fenwick. the same question as the rest.

L. C. J. When came you from St. Omers?

Palmer. I came two or three months ago.

L. C. J. Why did you come over?

Palmer. I had no mind to stay any longer.

L. C. J. Where does your father live?

Palmer. By Windsor.

L. C. J. When did you see master Oates?

Palmer. I saw him the first day of May, New Stile, and I know it for a particular reason; there were strangers dined at the college that day whereupon master Oates, and several other boys played at nine pins, in the afternoon, I saw them.

L. C. J. Why, you do not count all boys there, do you?

Palmer. All but those that are the religious.

L. C. J. Why you did not count master Oates a boy, did you?

Palmer. He was none of the religious: He sat indeed at a table by himself, but he went to school with the boys, and we called all the scholars boys.

L. C. J. How often did you see him?

Palmer. I will tell your lordship, I saw him the first of May, for that reason; the second of May I saw him with master Burnaby, a man that he had never seen in all his life before, and we wondered that he had so much impudence as to insinuate himself into his company.

L. C. J. What is he?

Palmer. He is a gentleman that is now in Flanders.

L. C. J. How do you know that Mr. Oates had no acquaintance with him before?

Palmer. Because I know he was in England, and came over while master Oates was actually at St. Omers.

L. C. J. But he might be of his acquaintance in England.

Palmer. I heard master Burnaby say, he never saw master Oates in all his life before. The second of May I saw him at the action, the fifth of May master Killimbeck went away, and I saw master Oates actually there then, and one master Poole went away; and I remember Oates was there for a particular reason; he was a kind of a weak man, something soft, not over-wise, and we were asking him, why he would go away by himself; and talking of it afterwards, says master Oates, (I will not say positively those were the words, but that was the sense.) 'He does not go alone, for there goes esq. Pool and esq. Fool together.' The 11th day we had an action, a play also, whereupon there was a particular place for the musicians to play in, where no one else was to sit; master Oates would sit there, and thereupon there was one master Watson quarrelled with him, and they had like to have fought.

L. C. J. This was the 11th of May?

Palmer. Yes, my lord, New Stile, and the other was the 5th.

L. C. J. But you saw him betwixt that time?

Palmer. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. C. J. And so for how long?

Palmer. I saw him at four o'clock in a morning, reading father Worsley's controversies, and so for several days together.

Fenwick. Did he go away before June.

Palmer. No he did never stir till June.

Sir Cr. Lewis. Did not you go sometime by the name of Sanders or Hill?

Palmer. No, only by the name of Thomas Palmer.

Sir Cr. Lewis. Hark you, sir, who maintained you at St. Omers; Do not you know one Mr. Caryl?

Palmer. No my father maintained me.

L. C. J. Who is your father?

Palmer. Sir Philip Palmer.

L. C. J. What country gentleman is he?

Palmer. Buckinghamshire.

Mr. Justice Pemberton. He is cup-bearer to the king.

Then stood up one master Car.

L. C. J. How long have you been from St. Omers?

Car. Two months.

L. C. J. What countryman are you?

Car. I was born at Brussels, to serve you.

L. C. J. Do you know master Oates?

Car. Yes, I did, very well.

L. C. J. Where?

Car. At Saint Omers.

L. C. J. When?

Car. I left Saint Omers seven months ago, and I came away in the month of November, after master Oates. My lord, I can prove that he was there in April and May: I went from Saint Omers to Brussels, and from Brussels I came straight to London.

L. C. J. But when did you see master Oates there?

Car. I can prove I saw him at Saint Omers, when he says he was in England, and that by this circumstance; master Pool, who was my music-master, was sick there, and master Oates was often with him.

L. C. J. Were you there all the time he was there?

Car. Yes, I was, till he went away.

L. C. J. When did he go away?

Car. Master Oates went away in the month of July.

L. C. J. Are you sure of that?

Car. Yes, my lord, I am.

L. C. J. Not in June?

Car. No, my lord, July.

L. C. J. Why, he differs from all the rest.

Car. My lord, I can prove he was at Saint Omers when he says he was in England.

L. C. J. Why, what month did he go away?

Car. My lord, I can prove that Mr. Oates was never absent from Saint Omer, till he went away for good and all.

L. C. J. When was that?

Car. He went after the Consult of the Jesuits, which he says was in England in April.

L. C. J. Come, come, answer me plainly, if you can, in what month Mr. Oates left Saint Omers?

Car. I say, Mr. Oates was never absent from Saint Omers, till the Consult of the Jesuits was over, which he hath confessed himself to be at.

L. C. J. When was that?

Car. Why, it was after May, 'tis no matter what the month was, whether June or July. (At which the people laughed.)

Car. What do you laugh at, Sirs? why, suppose I mistake the month, it is no matter.

L. C. J. Look you, we are now upon a question of time, and you cannot tell that a man is there at a certain time, unless you can prove the certain time when he came away.

Car. I can prove that he was there till after the Consult of the Jesuits. (And then the people laughed again.)

L. C. J. Aye, I believe you there, it is enough for you, but you have done a very great prejudice to those persons that you came for, for you come to prove the conclusion, but do not take notice of what mediums you are to use. Say you, if I can but prove that he was there till after the Consult of the Jesuits, that is the thing in question, and I need no more; but this is serving a turn only: pray can you tell me what month he came to St. Omers?

Car. Yes, he came thither in the month of December.

L. C. J. And when did he go away again?

Car. He was never absent from St. Omers, out of the view of the scholars except one night that he went to Watton, and one day when he was in the infirmary, but even at that time he was seen by some of the scholars.

L. C. J. Yet you cannot tell the time that he went away?

Car. He was never absent all the while.

Justice Windham. Do you know when the Consult of the Jesuits was? upon what day?

Car. He says he went away with Mr. Hilsley; but he did not, I can prove the contrary.

L. C. J. No, no, he says he followed him, and overtook him at Calais.

Car. That is false, and I can prove it by this circumstance: One Mr. Conquest was to go for England that day, and he came into the refectory, and told us a story of this Mr. Conquest's being unwilling to rise in the morning to go for England.

L. C. J. When did he tell that story?

Car. That day that he was to go for England.

L. C. J. How long was that after Mr. Hilsley went away?—Car. The day after.

Gaven. When was the time that Mr. Conquest went for England?

Car. In the month of May, as we count.

L. C. J. What time in the month of May?

Car. It was the 5th: And he says that Mr. Pool and Mr. Nevil were in England with him: but I can testify that they were not absent, for one of them was my music-master.

L. C. J. Was he there all May?

Car. Yes, that I can testify upon my oath.

L. C. J. And all June?

Car. Yes, my lord; but if I prove he was not in May in England it is sufficient.

L. C. J. Upon my word, you deserve a sharp penance, for running into that fault two or three times: You have done them no kindness in this matter.

Gavon. If your lordship will take advantage of every circumstance, young men may not remember the particular day of his going away.

L. C. J. But you hear how he delivers his evidence, it is as if he had been instructed, You must come and prove that Oates was not in England in April and May, and that will do our business; for he tells you, it is sufficient; but we will have it proved to satisfy us.

Cox. But why should I say more than I know?

L. C. J. You mean more than you are instructed about. I only ask you one short question, Do you know when Mr. Oates left St. Omers? Name the month.

Gavon. If you do not remember the time, say so.

Cox. My lord, I cannot remember it.

L. C. J. Then call another. Who stood up.

Oates. My lord, I desire they may be examined apart.

L. C. J. You need not trouble yourself about that. What is your name?

Billing. My name is Thomas Billing.

L. C. J. When came you from St. Omers?

Billing. I came three months ago, I think, my lord.

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Oates?

Billing. Yes, my lord, very well.

L. C. J. When did you see him at St. Omers?

Billing. My lord, I saw him when he came, the same day, or the day after.

L. C. J. When was that?

Billing. In December, my lord, the 10th of December.

L. C. J. And he staid there how long?

Billing. Till the latter end of June.

L. C. J. Was he never absent?

Billing. I can very well remember that he went to Watton in the Christmas. I was then in the Infirmary myself, and he and his companion came in there to see us, and said he had been at Watton.

L. C. J. But he was twice in the Infirmary, was he not?

Billing. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. When was the second time?

Billing. The second time was in April, I went in the week before Christmas: On St. Thomas of Canterbury's day I came out again.

L. C. J. But you say the second time was in April?

Billing. Yes.

L. C. J. How long was he there then?

Billing. Truly I was not with him then, but I think three or four days.

L. C. J. Were you in the College then?

Billing. Yes, my lord, I was.

L. C. J. Did you see him in the College from time to time?

Billing. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. How long?

Billing. For all the time that he staid.

L. C. J. How long was that?

Billing. That was from December, till the latter end of June.

L. C. J. Was he there all May?

vol. vii.

Billing. Yes, my lord. He says he was 8 days in England, but he could not be so, for he entered himself into the Sodality the 25th of March, and not long after his admission, he was put to read every Sunday morning at 6 o'clock. And after that he began once to read, he never was absent from that time till the time he went away.

L. C. J. Why, did he read when he was sick?

Billing. He was not sick upon the Sunday.

L. C. J. You say he was sick in April?

Billing. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. But he was not sick of a Sunday, in April?

Billing. He was only a little indisposed, and frequented the Infirmary in the day-time for a matter of three or four days.

L. C. J. Did he read at the time he was sick in the Infirmary?

Billing. He was not sick a whole week.

L. C. J. Did it reach to a Sunday?

Billing. No, my lord, that I remember.

L. C. J. How long did he continue there?

Billing. Till towards the latter end of June.

L. C. J. Did you see him once in two or three days?

Billing. Yes, my lord, I did, constantly. And upon the 2nd of May, I very particularly remember, looking out into the garden, I saw Mr. Blunt walking in the garden, and Mr. Oates with him: and observing him to be very intimately familiar with him, I asked some that were with me, Does this Sampson, for he went by that name in the College, says I, does Sampson know Dick Blunt? No, said they; and he wondered at his confidence, having no greater acquaintance; I saw him that day, walking in the garden with that Blunt.

L. C. J. That was the 2nd of May?

Billing. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. And he was constantly in this gentleman's company that day?

Billing. Yes; and moreover the same day this Sampson was walking with one John Rushton in the garden, and seeing me walk alone, Thomas, says he, have you never a companion? No, Sampson, said I: Well, said he, pry'thee come to us. So I was with him walking a little while, and then this Blunt and one Heary Howard were playing one with another, throwing stones at one another's shins. At which he was displeas'd, and said, if they would not be quiet, he would go and tell the rector. Howard was hasty, and spoke angrily to him, and said, if he would not be quiet, he would beat him: But Mr. Oates persisting, and daring of him, says he, What do you dare me? and comes up to him, and throws up Mr. Oates his heels. With that Mr. Oates looked very fretfully upon him, and withdrew himself into the Infirmary, as we thought, to speak to the rector. And by these particulars, and such as these, I remember to have seen him every day, one day with another, or every other day, at St. Omers, till he went away, which was in June.

Then stood up another, one Townley.

L. C. J. Come, Mr. Townley, do you know Mr. Oates?

Townley. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. When came you from St. Omers?

Townley. I came a week before Easter.

L. C. J. When saw you this same Mr. Oates at St. Omers?

Townley. I saw him in June.

L. C. J. When else?—Townley. In May.

L. C. J. When else?

Townley. In April.

L. C. J. Was he there in all April, all May, and all June?

Townley. No, not all June. He went away, as I take it, about the 10th of June.

L. C. J. Pray, how often did you see him? Did you see him every day?

Townley. I conversed with him every day. He was partly a scholar, and partly a father; and sat at a table by himself. He went to school as a scholar; it is true, indeed, he did not learn, as the rest of the boys did, but he went to school, as the boys did, and was at a table from the fathers, as the boys were, but apart and alone.

L. C. J. But how often did you see him? was it every other day?

Townley. Yes, I believe I did.

L. C. J. What, for all April, and all May?

Townley. Yes.

L. C. J. How came you to take such particular notice of it, that you can say, you saw him every other day?

Townley. If I constantly dine with one, or if he be at a single table alone, he cannot be absent, but I must take notice of it: And he was neither as a father nor a scholar, but betwixt both, and therefore the more to be taken notice of.

L. C. J. This then you say, he sitting by himself, and being distinct from all others, you might more easily observe his absence, than any other's. This is that you say?

Townley. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. You say well. Call another.

Then stood up one Fall.

L. C. J. When came you from St. Omers?

Fall. About two months ago.

L. C. J. When did you see Mr. Oates?

Fall. I saw him when I was in my syntax, and now I am in poetry.

L. C. J. What month did you see him in?

Fall. When he came first, as I remember, it was at Christmas.

L. C. J. Christmas last?

Fall. No, it was Christmas was twelvemonth, Christmas 1677.

L. C. J. How long did you see him there?

Fall. I saw him there from that time till June, only when he was at Watton.

L. C. J. Was he never sick?

Fall. I saw him in the infirmary myself.

L. C. J. How can you tell when a man is sick?

Fall. I do not pretend to that, but he was in the infirmary as a sick man.

L. C. J. How came you to take particular notice of it?

Fall. I took no particular notice, but I have recollected my memory.

L. C. J. Upon what occasion?

Fall. Upon this occasion.

L. C. J. How often did you see him?

Fall. I saw him every day.

L. C. J. How long have you been in the convent?

Fall. My lord, I have been there two years and a half.

Then stood up John Hall.

L. C. J. When came you from St. Omers?

Hall. In July, my lord.

L. C. J. How long have you been there?

Hall. Seven years, and upwards.

L. C. J. How long is it since you came from thence?

Hall. In July, in the year 1678.

L. C. J. And did you see Mr. Oates there then?

Hall. No, my lord.

L. C. J. When did you see him there, then?

Hall. I saw him there in April, May, and June.

L. C. J. What, all June?

Hall. No, my lord.

L. C. J. How long in June?

Hall. He went away about the 23rd of June?

L. C. J. How came you to take such particular notice Mr. Oates was there all this while?

Hall. I was a servant there.

L. C. J. In what way?

Hall. A refectorian, a butler.

L. C. J. Did you keep books of what meat and drink they had?

Hall. No; I laid their table, drew their beer, and laid the bread.

L. C. J. And did you serve Mr. Oates with bread and beer every day?

Hall. Yes, my lord, most days.

L. C. J. Did you serve the infirmary?

Hall. No, my lord.

L. C. J. But you say you served him every day?

Hall. Yes, my lord, the most of the time he remained there; I acknowledge he was in the infirmary.

L. C. J. How long?

Hall. Four or five days, or thereabouts.

L. C. J. Was he in the college in April?

Hall. Yes, my lord, all along.

L. C. J. And all May?

Hall. Yes, my lord, I saw him all May, I laid his table near the door, at a particular place where he always sat.

Jury. My lord, we desire to know what employment he is of now?

L. C. J. Hall, what made you come into England?

Hall. My lord, I had not my health there.

L. C. J. How long had you lived there?

Hall. Seven years, and upwards.

L. C. J. And when began you to be sick?
Hall. I had not my health at Christmas, in December 1677.

L. C. J. What employment have you here, for you had a good place there?

Hall. I live at home, with my father and my friends.

L. C. J. What is your father, where lives he?

Hall. He is a gentleman; he lives in Radnorshire.

L. C. J. When came you to London?

Hall. I came to England in July 1678.

L. C. J. But you say that your father is in Radnorshire, when came you here to London?

Hall. I have been here about a month. I was summoned up as a witness.

Then one Dallison was called, who did not appear; and one Mausket appearing, but speaking French, and no English, and an interpreter not being ready, he was for the present, by the consent of the prisoners, set aside. And then stood up one Cooke.

L. C. J. When came you from St. Omers?

Cooke. In January last.

L. C. J. And where have you been ever since?

Cooke. Here in town, my lord.

L. C. J. Does your father live here in town?

Cooke. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Does your friends live here?

Cooke. No, my lord.

L. C. J. You came over upon this occasion, did you?

Cooke. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. When did you see Mr. Oates there?

Cooke. I saw him in last June.

L. C. J. And was he there in July?

Cooke. No, my lord.

L. C. J. What time did he go away?

Cooke. The 23d, the eve of the feast of St. John Baptist.

L. C. J. How do you know?

Cooke. I made him some clothes.

L. C. J. Are you a taylor?

Cooke. Yes.

L. C. J. How often did you see him?

Cooke. Every day.

L. C. J. How came he to keep you company?

Cooke. I could not choose but see him, sometimes I saw him twenty times a day.

L. C. J. Where was he in April?

Cooke. He was there all April.

L. C. J. He might be absent one day, or so, and you see him not?

Cooke. He used to come twice a week to my shop for things.

L. C. J. Was he there all May?

Cooke. Yes.

L. C. J. You say you saw him every other day?—Cooke. Yes, my lord.

Sir Cr. Lewins. Why, Sir, there are 150 scholars there, how can you tell he was there so well?

Justice Pemberton. Can you tell every one that was there all that time?

Cooke. No, I cannot tell every one that was there, but he was particular enough.

L. C. J. Did you live in the town as a taylor, or in the college?

Cooke. In the college.

Mr. Belwood. Was Mr. Oates at Watton any part of the time?

Cooke. Yes, he was.

Mr. Belwood. What day? what month?

Cooke. I cannot justly say the day, but it was in April.

L. C. J. How long was he absent?

Cooke. Only one night, as it shall please you.

Justice Pemberton. Mark you, how came you to take notice that he was at Watton one night?

Cooke. It was talked of among all the scholars.

L. C. J. How can you remember what was said a year ago of one man?

Cooke. It was reported all over the house.

Gavan. In one place of his Narrative, he says he came over with sir John Warner and sir Thomas Preston.

L. C. J. North. That is nothing to the purpose. If you can contradict him in any thing that hath been sworn here, do.

Gavan. If we can prove him a perjured man at any time, we do our business.

L. C. J. You should have proved him a perjured man before: How can we prove one cause in another? and then too he had been provided to make his defence: Can he come prepared to make good every thing that he hath said in his life?

Oates. Can I come to make good my evidence against all I have done in my life?

L. C. J. Look you, if so be he hath forsworn himself in any former trial, if that would appear, you have all the reason to make use of it; but you have not taken the right way, you should have indicted him and tried him for perjury in the former trial, and then he could not have been heard at all in this.

Whitebread. We were all prisoners close shut up.

L. C. J. We know you have a party strong enough, and willing enough to convict him of perjury, if they could; but look you, gentlemen, here is the thing, if you can give such evidence as will satisfy the jury that he was absent all April and all May, you have said a great thing. His evidence will be quite contradicted.

Whitebread. He says he came over with sir Thomas Preston and sir John Warner, and others.

L. C. J. He says nothing of it now.

Oates. May it please you, my lord, I will answer it, if you please.

L. C. J. They desire to know who came over with you when you came over in April.

Oates. I will tell you, and to convince the court, that in neither of the trials I did contradict myself, I say, I did name some persons at one time that I did not name at another, because some mens names did occur to my mind at one time than did at another: There came over with me the rector of Liege, sir John Warner, Father Williams, Father March, Father Warner, sir Thomas Preston, and others.

L. C. J. This is dealing plainly with you.

Then stood up one Bartlett.

L. C. J. What countryman are you?

Bartlett. I am a Dutchman.

L. C. J. Can you speak English?

Bartlett. Yes, a little.

L. C. J. When came you from St. Omers?

Bartlett. I came from St. Omers the 23d of May, in the year 1678, New Style.

Gavan. My lord, this man is come over to testify, that Oates is perjured in a circumstance about sir John Warner.

L. C. J. He is to contradict Mr. Oates's testimony, for he says he came over with John Warner, and you say sir John did not come at that time.—Gavan. Yes.

L. C. J. Well, when did sir John Warner come over from St. Omers?

Bartlett. Whither?

L. C. J. Into England.

Bartlett. Sir John Warner hath not been in England all May, and all the month of April.

L. C. J. Where was he?

Bartlett. He was at Watton: I did see him there.

L. C. J. Were you there all that time?

Bartlett. Yes, I was.

L. C. J. North. Were you there all May?

Bartlett. Yes, I was.

L. C. J. When did you come over into England last?

Bartlett. The 23d of May.

L. C. J. How long have you been in England?

Bartlett. About five or six weeks.

L. C. J. What is your name?

Bartlett. My name is Bartlett.

L. C. J. But you say that you came over the 23d of May.

Bartlett. I did not come over till the latter end of June.

L. C. J. Just now you said, you came over the 23d of May.

Bartlett. No, my lord, I thought you asked the question when Mr. Oates came over.

Justice Pemberton. He says so, as your lordship says before.

L. C. J. How do you know when Mr. Oates came over.

Bartlett. I heard so beyond sea.

Then one Carlier, a foreigner, appearing, and not being able to speak English, Mr. Tisser the under sheriff of Middlesex was sworn truly to interpret his testimony.

L. C. J. Mr. Tisser, you are only to tell us what he says: Ask him when he came into England last.

Tisser. He says, my lord, it was between seven and eight weeks ago.

L. C. J. Ask him if he knows where sir John Warner was, last summer was a year ago.

Tisser. He says, my lord, he was in Watton for two years last past.

L. C. J. Ask him where he was all April was twelvemonth, and all May.

Tisser. My lord, he says, that the last Sunday in April sir John Warner was at his house at Watton.

L. C. J. And where was he all May?

Tisser. In the same house.

L. C. J. Ask him how he does know.

Tisser. My lord, he saith, that he was a gardener there.

L. C. J. It seems he says to the same effect as the last witness did. Call another. Who did stand up.

L. C. J. What is this man's name?

Gavan. His name is Charles Verron.

L. C. J. Does he speak any English?

Gavan. No, he does not.

L. C. J. Then, Mr. Tisser, ask him if he knows sir John Warner, and where he was April and May was twelvemonth.

Tisser. He says, my lord, that he was at Watton all April and May, and continued there till September.

L. C. J. Pray ask this man what quality he is of there.

Tisser. He goes along with a vessel between St. Omers and Watton, and that he knows it to be true.

L. C. J. Ask him if he did see him every day.

Tisser. He says, generally, my lord, daily.

L. C. J. Ask him what religion he is of.

Tisser. He says he is of the Roman religion.

Then stood up one Baitlee.

L. C. J. Ask him, Mr. Tisser, if he knows sir John Warner; and where he was all April and May was twelvemonth.

Tisser. He says the same, that he was at Watton all April and May.

L. C. J. Ask him how he can tell.

Tisser. He says he is a servant of the house.

L. C. J. And did he see him there daily?

Tisser. My lord, he says that he gave him directions to make a bastymen, that he is a mason, and that he did give him directions daily about it, and that he saw him every day.

L. C. J. Look you, Gentlemen of the Jury, he speaks to the same purpose that the three witnesses before spoke to; he says he is a mason, and that he built a bastymen there by direction from sir John Warner, and that sir John Warner came daily to give directions about it.

Then stood up one John Joseph.

L. C. J. Do you know sir Thomas Preston?

Joseph. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. When did you see him?

Joseph. In the months of April, May, and June.

L. C. J. Where was he then?

Joseph. He was at the English house at Liege

L. C. J. Did you see him there? How often did you see him there?

Joseph. I saw him there every day almost.

L. C. J. What occasion had you to see him? What were you there?

Joseph. I was porter of the gate.

L. C. J. And did you see him all the month of April?

Joseph. Every day, most commonly.

L. C. J. Did you see him once in a day or two?

Joseph. I did see him in April, May, and June.

L. C. J. That you might do; but did you see him every day?

Joseph. Every day most commonly, I cannot absolutely say, but two or three days in a week.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Pray do you know of any time that sir Thomas Prestou was absent from Liege?

Joseph. He was in the time of vacancy.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Was he not absent in April or May?

Joseph. No, my lord.

L. C. J. When are the vacancies?

Joseph. In August, my lord.

Then stood up one Peter Carpenter.

L. C. J. Do you know sir Tho. Preston?

Carpenter. Yes, my lord, very well.

L. C. J. Where did you know him?

Carpenter. I knew him at Liege.

L. C. J. How often did you see him there in April and May?

Carpenter. Every day I saw him there, all April and May.

L. C. J. What office had you there?

Carpenter. I was caterer.

Gavan. My lord, we have no more witnesses as to this point. But, my lord, my case is different from the others; Mr. Oates says he did not see me in the congregation, but he says, he afterwards saw my hand to the consult: Now, my lord, I have a witness to prove that I was at that time at Wolverhampton in Staffordshire. Nobody hath a right to sit in the congregation till he become a professed Jesuit, which at that time I was not.

L. C. J. He does not charge you to have been there, though he says he saw your hand to it.

Gavan. My lord, I was then in the country.

L. C. J. North. That will do you some, and yet but little service, if you can prove yourself at Wolverhampton at that time; but call your witnesses.

L. C. J. Mr. Gavan, he says he saw a letter of yours, giving an account how affairs stood in Staffordshire and Shropshire, and that afterwards in July, and before that gentleman, Mr. Ashby, went to the Bath, he heard you discourse of the same matter: And though he cannot charge his memory to say he saw you the 24th of April, yet, says he, I did see his hand to the consult; and being asked how he knew your hand, he says he knew it by your writing a bill of exchange in his presence.

Gavan. I could not sign the consult at London, and not be at London.

L. C. J. North. I believe in such a business you care not how many hands you have; but we will not prevent you calling your witnesses: You are upon your life, do not spend the time, call them quickly.

L. C. J. What do you call them to prove?

Gavan. To prove that I was at Wolverhampton the 24th and 25th of April.

L. C. J. Pray hear what he says himself. You say, sir, you saw his hand to the consult that was in April; pray, when was it that you saw it?

Oates. It was in June or July.

L. C. J. North. You might set your hand afterwards to it, if you were not there then.

L. C. J. You say you were then in Staffordshire, and might not you set your hand afterwards when you came to town? I will tell you, Mr. Gavan, in April they met, and had such a resolution; you were then in Staffordshire; might not you come to town in July following, and set your hand to what was agreed in April before? And you cannot contradict him, but by shewing that all June and July you were not here: For if you prove yourself never so much to have been at Wolverhampton in April, that will not serve the turn. You seem to make a very great defence of this: all that Mr. Oates says is, that the 24th of April he was present where there was a consult had about the death of the king, and divers persons set their hands to the resolve. Mr. Gavan afterwards was in town, and then, says he, I saw his hand set to the consult: I will not charge my memory to say he was present, but I will tell you why I believe it was his hand, because I saw him draw a bill of exchange, and that was just like the same hand.

Gavan. Ay, but, my lord, I was not here in April

L. C. J. But this proves, in effect, that you set your hand to the thing afterwards. And now if you shall prove yourself never so plainly not to have been there in April, you do not come to the thing: it is still a non liquet, whether you were here July, or no. And Mr. Oates does not positively charge you as to April. Well, call your witnesses, and prove what you will.

Catharine Winford was called, and appeared.

Gavan. I desire you would be pleased to ask her, where I was the 23rd of July?

Winford. My lord, I am very sure he was a sojourner at our house the most part of the summer, in June and July both: in July the 23rd he went away from my house, and took another lodging more convenient for that which he had to do.

L. C. J. Where? in what town was this?

Winford. At Wolverhampton in Staffordshire.

L. C. J. Was he never away from you all that time?

Winford. No; and then he went to another lodging in the town.

L. C. J. Do you say that he sojourned with you all June and July till the 23rd?

Winford. He sojourned with me longer; but I only name those months, because they are only in question.

L. C. J. Where did he go when he went from you?

Winford. He took another lodging in the town.

L. C. J. And did you see him then?

Winford. I saw him then every day, or every other day.

L. C. J. Are you a Roman Catholic?

Winford. Yes, my lord, I am so.

L. C. J. Call another.

Gavan. Call Mary Poole. [Who stood up.]

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Gavan?

Poole. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. How long have you known him?

Poole. This six or seven years.

L. C. J. Pray do you know where he was this time twelvemonth?

Poole. He was at Mrs. Winford's house at Wolverhampton.

L. C. J. How do you know?

Poole. I was a servant there in the house.

L. C. J. And where was he in April?

Poole. He was at my mistress's house.

L. C. J. And where was he in May?

Poole. My Lord, I believe he was there?

L. C. J. And why do you believe he was there?

Poole. Because I don't remember his going forth, till the latter end of July, and he was there in June too.

L. C. J. You answer readily, as to June and July, why did you stick at the month of May, more than the other months? for you know, when I asked you where he was in April, then you said he was at home; why do you doubt whether he was there in May, or no? pray tell us why it is not as certain to you that he was not there in May, as that he was there in June. Why do you doubt more of it?

Poole. I do not doubt but that he was there.

L. C. J. But why did you not answer then as readily to the one, as to the other?

Poole. My Lord, any one may mistake.

L. C. J. This you were not prepared for, and it was a question you did not come ready to answer: are you a Roman Catholic?

Poole. Yes, my Lord. [Here the people laughed.]

L. C. J. Look you, you must know there is no other use to be made of it, but only to shew, that protestants are so averse to popery in England, that they will not endure a Roman Catholic in England: but they are good evidence and competent witnesses, I must tell you that, and no man must deny it; for though you deny heaven to us, yet we will not deny heaven to you, nor witnesses; though you say heretics will be damned, yet we hope they will never, while they do not follow your practices. [At which the People gave a great shout.]

L. C. J. You must pardon the people's shouting; for you have turned their hearts so, that there is no living for a papist in England, I will maintain it. [And then the People shouted again.] You shall have all the justice that can be, and all the favour the law will allow.

Gavan. If there be but a place for us in heaven, I am contented; My Lord, I desire you will be pleased to ask this Mrs. Catharine Winford, whether she does not remember that I came from my Lord Aston's the Monday before.

L. C. J. Mrs. Winford, what say you? do you remember any passages about the time he left your house?

Winford. My Lord, I did not know directly and positively what I should come to answer, and therefore I cannot recollect myself.

L. C. J. Do you know that he went to any gentleman's house some time before he left your house?

Winford. Yes, my lord, he went often abroad.

L. C. J. To whose?

Winford. To my Lord Aston's.

L. C. J. How long before?

Winford. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. How long did he stay at my Lord's? Did he ever stay five or six days?

Winford. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. My meaning is this, in plain English, to ask you plainly, and you ought in conscience to speak the truth as much as if you were upon your oath; for you are in the presence of God who will judge you as severely for a falshood in this case, as in the other: I would ask you whether he could not possibly be absent, and make a step to London, and you be never the wiser?

Winford. My Lord, I am as confident as I can be of any thing in the world, of the contrary.

L. C. J. Might not he be in London the end of June or July, and you not know it, when he pretended to go to my lord Aston's?

Winford. I do not know, but I am very confident he did not.

L. C. J. But was he absent long enough to have done it? Can you charge your memory with that?

Winford. It was possible it might be so, but I am confident it was not, because I used to order my maid to get him his linen ready upon any journey, and he had none now.

Outs. My Lord, he took a chamber to go into the exercise; now, my Lord, he taking a chamber on purpose for this very thing, he might pretend that, and come to London the while, and they not know it, because he was shut up; for none are to come at them.

Winford. My Lord, I know not any such thing of him; but this is a rule amongst them, that when they are so shut up, if there be a necessary occasion to come to them about any particular business, as sending them linen, or so, they have admittance to them.

L. C. J. Were you employed upon any such extraordinary matter?

Winford. My Lord, I used to go and see him, and carry him his linen.

L. C. J. And can you charge your memory with that?

Winford. Yes, my Lord, I can.

L. C. J. When? the latter end of July?

Winford. Yes, my Lord, I often went to see him then, when he was gone from my house.

L. C. J. Where was he for all the former part of July, till those eight days?

Winford. He was at my own house.

L. C. J. When went he first into this reclude way?

Winford. He went from my house the 23rd of July?

L. C. J. Was he not close, when he was with you?

Winford. No, my Lord.

L. C. J. And the last eight days you had access to him?

Winford. Yes, I had.

L. C. J. I ask you, are these people shut up at a certain time, and there is no coming to them, upon any occasion?

Winford. My Lord, most of those days I did see him, indeed he was shut up, but upon any kind of business, as the carrying of linen, and sometimes a pair of gloves, and other things of his own, or sometimes to speak with him about business, we were admitted.

L. C. J. I see your confinements are not so great as you would make them to be, or he would have us think: I ask you once more, whether you can say, that during the months of June and July it was not possible for him to make a step to London, and you never the wiser?

Winford. I am very confident he did not, he was not absent long enough to do it.

Sir Cr. Levinz. You said just now, you could not say positively, but he might be absent for five or six days.

Winford. I do not believe he did; for he had no linen with him, which he used to have, when he went to London.

L. C. J. But, supposing he had no linen, might he not go to London, and you not know it?

Winford. I cannot tell whether he was absent, or no, long enough to do it.

Gavan. Pray, my lord, let me speak; as I live, an innocent man will be lost else. He says expressly, I was in town in July; and gives this argument for it, That Mr. Ashby was in town, and he met me with him.

L. C. J. No, no; Mr. Oates was not so positive: He says, it was either in June or July; but he rather thinks it was July. But, mistress, might not he, in the beginning of July, be absent so long, as a man might go to London, and return again; in the first three weeks of July, I mean?

Winford. My lord, I cannot charge my memory, because I did not know what I should be asked, and so could not recollect myself.

I only say I am confident of it, because he always told me, when he went such a journey, that I might make provision of linen to fit him for it.

L. C. J. Your reasons are weak; because he used to tell you, that you might get him linen: Men, upon extraordinary occasions, do extraordinary things; so that you are not to govern yourself by what he used to do, in his acquainting you, or you in providing his linen. This was no ordinary errand, and therefore I do not ask you whether he had linen from you, or no; but you are only to charge yourself with remembering whether he could not be absent long enough out of your sight, to have been such a journey?

Gavan. Pray, my lord, give me fair play. He does charge it expressly, and is precise to a day: He saith, I was here in July, after that Ashby was come to town, and before that he went out of town: And he says, That Ashby came to town in the middle of July, and went out of town about the latter end of July, or beginning of August. Now, my lord, I say this, he saying that Ashby came to town the middle of July, and staid there a fortnight, and then went to the Bath, and that I came to town while that he was there; if I prove that I was in Staffordshire from the 15th or 16th of July to the end of the month, then I shall clear myself evidently; for he does, in effect, charge me to be here, some time in that fortnight's time, and I prove, that all the latter part of July I was in the country.

L. C. J. He does not charge it to a day, but he says it was about a fortnight.

Oates. Mr. Ashby came to town in the beginning or middle of July; I rather think it was the middle, but I dare not, upon my oath, be positive as to the time; and in that time that Mr. Ashby staid in town, Mr. Gavan came to London: For I remember, he said he would go and see Father Ashby, who was then at Wild-House.

L. C. J. Prove where you were now, all July. Call your witnesses.

Gavan. I prove that I was at Wolverhampton, from the 23d, to the end of the month.

L. C. J. Call your witnesses to prove where you were the beginning, that can speak expressly to it.

Gavan. My lord, I have them not here.

L. C. J. Why then would you make us lose all this time?

Gavan. My lord, I will tell you; bear the words of an ingenious man: Being, as I was, innocent, not knowing what they intended to charge me with, I, in my mind, run over all that I could imagine I had at any time done, that they could lay hold on. If I had been guilty of any thing, my own conscience would have told me of it; and I should have provided to have given some answer to it: But being innocent, I was to ransack my memory, to sum up all the passages of my life; where I had been, what I had said, what I had done, that would give them any occasion of accusing me.

And because I did imagine they might think I was here the 24th of April, I brought witnesses for that; and because I did imagine that they might speak of some consults in April, I sent up for such witnesses, at my own charge, as could testify where I was then.

L. C. J. But you have not one protestant, that testifies for you.

Gavan. And now, my lord, I humbly cast myself upon the honour and justice of this honourable and just court; to which I submit myself, with all my heart and soul, having used all the remedies I can. I have cleared myself, as to the main day, the 24th of April, whereon all the pretended plot lies: And I will bring witnesses that shall swear, I was not in London in August; and if my eternal salvation lay upon it, I could aver, I was not in London: And I wish I may be made an example of justice before all the world (in the sight of God I speak it) if I be not the most innocent person in the world. And, my lord, seeing there is only his oath for it, and my denial, I have only one demand; I do not know, whether it be an extravagant one or no; if it be, I do not desire to have it granted.

L. C. J. What is that demand?

Gavan. You know, that in the beginning of the church (this learned and just Court must needs know that) that for 1,000 years together, it was a custom, and grew to a constant law, for the trial of persons accused of any capital offence, where there was only the accuser's oath, and the accused's denial, for the prisoner to put himself upon the trial of Ordeal, to evidence his own innocency.

L. C. J. North. We have no such law now.

L. C. J. You are very fanciful, Mr. Gavan; you believe that your cunning in asking such a thing, will take much with the auditory; but this is only an artificial varnish: You may do this with hopes of having it take with those that are Roman Catholics, who are so superstitious as to believe innocency upon such desires; but we have a plain way of understanding here in England, and that helped very much by the protestant religion: So that there is scarce any artifice big enough to impose upon us. You ask a thing that sounds much of a pretence to innocency, and that it would be mighty suffering, if you should miscarry, because you ask that you know you cannot have. Our eyes and our understandings are left us, though you do not leave their understandings to your proselytes: But you are mistaken, if you think to impose that upon us that you do upon them; and you do so impose upon them. But I will tell you, there is scarce any man with us that can be a papist: For you cannot deceive and gull us, as you have done all that you have perverted to your way.

Gavan. Is it any harm, my lord, to ask whether I might not be so tried?

L. C. J. North. Look you here, Mr. Gavan, the time is far spent; if you have any thing to say, we will hear you; if you have any witnesses, call them, and we will examine them:

But if not, the other prisoners must be admitted to make their defence, as well as you.

Gavan. All these six can prove, that I was at Wolverhampton the last week in July.

Then another Witness stood up for him.

Gavan. Where was I in July?

Witness. I cannot speak to all July; but, my lord, I can declare, that Mr. Gavan was in Staffordshire the last week of July, every day, I am confident.

L. C. J. Where was he, the first three weeks in July?

Witness. I cannot speak as to that; but in the last week in July, he came to an apartment of an house that I lived in.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Gavan, you see what this evidence is; she says, that you were in Staffordshire the last week in July, for you had an apartment in the house she lived in. Call another. [Who stood up.]

L. C. J. Where was Mr. Gavan in July last?

2 Witness. My lord, I saw him myself, at the latter end of July, for very many days; for he was in a room of the house that I lived in, I am sure, most of the last week.

L. C. J. Where was he the last fortnight?

2 Witness. I am confident I saw him all the last fortnight, but I cannot be positive.

L. C. J. Call another. [Who stood up.]

L. C. J. Where was Mr. Gavan in July?

3 Witness. My lord, I lived in the same town with him, and I do not remember that he was out all July, but the last week he was in our house.

L. C. J. Well, call another. [Who stood up.]

L. C. J. Where was Mr. Gavan in July last?

4 Witness. He was, in July last, the last week, in a part of our house.

L. C. J. So then he came home, from London, the 23d or 24th of July. Well, Mr. Gavan, have you any more witnesses, to any other purpose? For here are enough to this.

Gavan. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Mr. Whitebread, have you any witnesses to call?

Whitebread. My lord, I have only this, and I desire to be heard in this point, to prove that Mr. Oates was mistaken in his evidence that he gave at the last trial, against Mr. Ireland.

L. C. J. Look you, I must break in upon you; you have been told so often, all of you have been told it, and yet you are upon the former trials again. You are now upon your trial for your life; if you could have disproved any thing that he said at a former trial, you should have taken a legal way, and convicted him of perjury; but now to charge him with a printed paper, is not fair. You must speak to what he says now.

Whitebread. He says the same now. But all that I say is this, If he be not honest, he can be witness in no case. I suppose if any one can prove him not probus testis, his testimony is not to be received in any case.

L. C. J. But how will you prove that? Come on, I will teach you a little logic; if you will come to contradict a Witness, you ought to do it in a matter which is the present debate here; for if you would convict him of any thing that he said in Ireland's Trial, we must try Ireland's cause over again. But if you will say any thing against what he says now, do.

Whitebread. That which I would alledge is this, If he be convicted of perjury in one case, he is not to be believed in another.

L. C. J. You say right if he be convicted.

Whitebread. He is not only then an incompetent witness, for he cannot be said to be probus testis, but he is improbus. Now, this is that I can prove.

Just. Pemberton. Nay, you must shew it by a record.

L. C. J. You cannot have so little understanding; you that have been, and were to be, to great a man among them; had been provincial, and was to have been somewhat else. I have told you already, that to prove him to be a man that hath no faith in him, he must be convicted. You must have indicted him, and convicted him, of the thing wherein he did commit perjury, and then he had been prepared to justify himself. But shall you come now, and at this your trial, and prove what he said at Stayley's Trial, and Coleman's Trial, and Ireland's Trial? And must we examine what matters have received a verdict and a judgment there? For, consider what will be the consequence of it; if it should be false, you there arraign a verdict. You should have convicted him of the falsehood first.

Whitebread. I desire the jury to take notice, that he does not stick to the testimony that he gave then, for if he does, it was false.

L. C. J. They must not take notice of any thing that was done at a former trial, unless it be spoken of now.

L. C. J. North. Do not call any witnesses to prove what he said then, but to disprove what he hath said now.

L. C. J. It is a pretty hard matter to make a priest understand one, for what I see. If the witness shall not gain credit with the jury, that he came over with sir Thomas Preston, sir John Warner; if they are satisfied by those many witnesses 10 or 12, at least, that it is false, they ought not to believe him; but as to that testimony, they ought to believe your witnesses; but he is not presently guilty of perjury: For if they should not give credit to Mr. Oates, you must indict him, and another jury must pass upon him, before he is convicted: For it is one thing to be forsworn and perjured, and another thing to be proved so, and he is not proved to be so, but by a record for that purpose.

Harcourt. If so be our witnesses cannot be looked upon as good witnesses, then there can be no commerce abroad in any other country.

L. C. J. They are, no doubt, good witnesses, till they be proved otherwise; and they are left to the Jury to believe as they think fit.

Harcourt. Now here are divers things that are brought against myself, by Mr. Bedlow, Mr. Praunce, Mr. Oates, and Mr. Dugdale; if the witnesses that I bring, because they are Roman Catholics, are not good witnesses, then I am in a hard case.

VOL. VII.

L. C. J. North. Look then, you mistake the thing; those that are not witnesses, we do not hear at all; but our hearing them at all, proves that we look upon them as good witnesses. But when a man is a witness, he is either of more credit, or of less credit, according to the circumstances; and it is a proper question to ask them, whether they are Roman Catholics. But they are witnesses, without all question.

Harcourt. I say, my lord, these persons are known to be every one of them very bad and flagitious persons, and that every one of them have undertaken this course, merely to get a livelihood: they are men of desperate fortunes, they get a living by swearing fast, they find that the best trade.

L. C. J. North. If you have any other witnesses, we will hear them: if you have no other witnesses, then we must hear what the king's counsel reply, and then it will be your turn to say what you can in your defence.

Gavan. I have witnesses here: it is not indeed a positive evidence, but a negative evidence; and I have a brother and a sister in town, and upon my salvation I never came to town, but I came to their house.

L. C. J. That will signify nothing. Mr. Harcourt, have you any more witnesses? If you have them, pray call them.

Harcourt. It is in vain to call them, if they be not to be believed, because they are Roman Catholics.

Sir Cr. Levins. It is a mistake, we do not refuse any witnesses, because they are Roman Catholics.

L. C. J. No, we have not refused any one point yet.

L. C. J. North. If you have any more, pray call them, and do not spend the time.

L. C. J. Call a priest or two, if you will, we will hear them.

Harcourt. Mr. Oates did accuse me of paying fourscore pounds at my chamber, and he did say afterwards it was at Wild-House. I have persons to justify what was done at my own chamber; and he says Mr. Ireland was by; now here are witnesses to prove, that Mr. Ireland was in Staffordshire all the month of August, therefore he could not be present.

L. C. J. Does he say any such thing now?

Justice Pemberton. That was urged before; pray do not insist upon that, it hath received a trial.

L. C. J. I will tell you what he says, and I will ask him the question: Dr. Oates, it is supposed by your testimony, that Mr. Ireland and Mr. Harcourt were together, when this fourscore pounds was paid, for the villains that went to Windsor to murder the king?

Oates. I never said such a word.

Harcourt. Here it is in the trial.

L. C. J. I stand not by the printed trial, it is no record in law. In short, were Mr. Ireland and Mr. Harcourt together at that time?

Oates. No, they were not.

Gawen. He did then say, that he did receive of Mr. Ireland, the 2d of September, 20s. that he borrowed of him; now the 2d of September he was at Boecobel.

Oates. My lord, I was not positive as to the day; but as near as I remember, (those were the words I said) it was the 2d of September; but whether it was the 1st, 2d, 7th, 8th or 9th, I would not be positive in it.

Then the prisoners called Pendrel and his wife, and Gifford and his wife; and Gifford stood up.

Gifford. My lord, I was here the last sessions, where I did testify the seeing of Mr. Ireland in Staffordshire, on the 24th of August, Bartholomew-day, and the next day after; at which time Mr. Oates said that he saw him here in town. But Mr. Oates could not be particular in every thing; but at last he came to a circumstance, and averred, that the 1st or 2d of September he did receive 20s. of Mr. Ireland, in Harcourt's chamber; he said it was about the fast-day.

Oates. That was as near as I remembered.

Gifford. Here is in court at least six people that know it; I saw him several other of those days there; but these six people conversed with him every day.

Justice Pemberton. How do you know all that?

L. C. J. North. Come, come, you must not speak, as to what he said in Ireland's trial.

L. C. J. What time was it that Mr. Harcourt and Mr. Ireland conferred together about this same business?

Oates. My lord, I do not charge Ireland, but I charge Harcourt with being at Wild-House, and that there Coleman met him, and that there was the greatest part of the money, which was carried back to Harcourt's chamber, and given to the person that was to carry it down to Windsor; but Mr. Coleman was gone away before, and had left a guinea bebind him, which was given to the messenger for expedition.

L. C. J. I am mistaken, if you have not testified that Ireland was in town in August and September with Harcourt.

Oates. Ireland took his leave of London betwixt the 8th and the 12th of August, as to go to St. Omers.

L. C. J. Here is the matter, they must have right, though there be never so much time lost, and patience spent. Say they, we must prove and contradict men by such matters as we can; people may swear downright things, and it is impossible to contradict them; but we will call witnesses to prove those particulars that can be proved; say where Mr. Ireland was in August.

Oates. He took his leave of us in town in August, and that was between the 8th and 12th, at Harcourt's chamber.

L. C. J. What do you infer from Ireland's being there then?

Oates. I will tell you what I design in it: your lordship may perceive that I did methodise my evidence according to the time; for I said, this was our business in April, this in July, and now we come to the business of August, said I, we took our leaves of Mr. Ireland between the 8th and 12th. I said, in July Mr. Fenwick was out of town, but then, if your lordship remembers, I said, he was in town, and took his leave of Mr. Ireland, between the 8th and the 12th of August.

L. C. J. Was Mr. Ireland in Fenwick's company at that time in August?

Oates. Yes, my lord, he was when he took his leave.

L. C. J. Did they talk then of this business?

Oates. They took their leaves of one another, but as to what particular things of the Plot they spoke about, I do not remember.

L. C. J. Look you now, mind what he says, Ireland and Fenwick were together in August, between the 8th and the 12th; but being asked, Whether they were not on purpose to talk of the plot? He says, he does not remember the particulars.

Here the Lady Southcott, her son, and her daughter, were called.

L. C. J. Did you say, that Fenwick, there at the bar, had converse with Ireland in August, for the carrying on of the plot?

Oates. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. My rule is this, in doubtful cases, when men are upon their lives, I had rather bear what is impertinent, than not let them make a full defence.

L. C. J. North. I had rather hear things at a venture, than forbid things at a venture.

Lady Southcott stood up.

L. C. J. How long were you in Mr. Ireland's company?

Lady Southcott. From the 5th of August to the 16th.

L. C. J. What, every day?

Lady Southcott. Yes, every day.

Oates. My Lords, here is Sarah Pain, who before hath testified what she hath known in this matter. If your lordship please, I desire she may be called in readiness to speak to it.

L. C. J. Are you sure it was the 5th?

Lady Southcott. Yes, as sure as I can be of any thing.

Recorder. Dr. Oates, you had best keep your evidence entire till the last.

Then Sir John Southcott was called, and appeared.

L. C. J. Did you know Mr. Ireland?

Sir John Southcott. Yes, I did know him by face.

L. C. J. Where did you see him?

Sir John Southcott. I saw him the 5th of August, at St. Albans.

L. C. J. And did he travel along with you?

Sir John Southcott. Yes, he did travel along with us the 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th.

L. C. J. How many days did he travel along with you?

Sir John Southcott. He travelled along with us four days together, I am sure.

L. C. J. What from the 5th to the 9th?

Sir John Southcott. Yes, Sir.

L. C. J. Is this all that you can say?

Sir John Southcott. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. But we would know where he was afterwards. Did you see him after the 9th?

Sir John Southcott. My Lord, I saw him at St. Albans, and he went from thence to Northampton, and from thence to Coventry, and from thence to my lord Aston's, that is four days; and I saw him Thursday, I saw him Friday, Saturday, and Monday following. Tuesday I had occasion to go further into the country, and he went along with us; so I saw him Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday afterwards.

L. C. J. Why then you saw him at least twelve days?

Sir John Southcott. Yes.

L. C. J. Have you any more?

Then Mr. Edward Southcott stood up.

L. C. J. Were you here when Ireland was tried?

Sir John Southcott. No.

L. C. J. Did you see Mr. Ireland in August last?

Mr. Southcott. The 3d of August he came down to my lord Aston's at Stanmore, they said so; but I cannot swear he came that night; but I saw him very early the next morning; the 5th we went to St. Albans, and we kept on till we came to Tixall; and I was in his company from the 4th to the 16th.

L. C. J. Why, you hear what he says, He was in company with him every day from the 4th to the 16th.

Gavan. Call Mrs. Harewell, and her daughter, Mrs. Gifford and Mrs. Pendrell.

Then Mrs. Harewell stood up.

L. C. J. Did you see Mr. Ireland in August last?

Harewell. I saw Ireland in August last, the 17th day: He came then to my house at Wolverhampton, and there he continued every day, and lay in my house every night, till the 26th day.

Then young Mrs. Harewell stood up.

Harewell. Mr. Ireland came to our house in Staffordshire the 17th of August, and staid there till the 26th; I saw him every day, unless it was Friday, the day before Bartholomew-day, when he went to Lichfield and returned again.

Gavan. My Lord, there is a prisoner now in Newgate that can testify the same.

L. C. J. North. Would you ask your fellow if you be a thief? He is in for the same offence.

Gavan. My Lord, I desire to know, if a man be not convicted of the same offence, whether he be not a good witness?

L. C. J. North. If he stand charged of the same plot his evidence is of little weight.

Then Elizabeth Keiling stood up.

L. C. J. Did you see Mr. Ireland in August?

Keiling. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. C. J. Where did you see him?

Keiling. I saw him at Wolverhampton, there he was from Saturday the 17th, to Monday, and then I went to see my mother, and came back again on Thursday, and found him there, and there he was till the 26th.

Gavan. Call Mr. Pendrell and his wife.

Then Pendrell stood up.

L. C. J. When did you see Mr. Ireland?

Pendrell. I saw him the 2nd and 3d of September.

L. C. J. Where did you see him?

Pendrell. At Boscobel.

L. C. J. And what, did you see him in August?

Pendrell. No, my lord.

L. C. J. How do you know you saw him then?

Pendrell. My wife being paid for his diet, set down the day.

L. C. J. What, he came to sojourn with you, did he?

Pendrell. They were with me for their meals, and so my wife set it down.

L. C. J. Why, do you set down the day of the month when any one comes to you?

Pendrell. Yes, my lord, when we are paid for their diet, we do.

L. C. J. What, do you keep a public house?

Pendrell. I keep the Royal Oak.

L. C. J. Methinks, you should have a great deal of company, if you live there; and it is hard you should charge yourself to remember a particular person you did not know before.

Pendrell. My lord, he told me his name was Ireland, and several others did so too.

L. C. J. You had as good have let such trivial evidences as this alone. But go on.

Then Mrs. Pendrell stood up.

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Ireland?

Mrs. Pendrell. I did know by report it was he.

L. C. J. Where did you see him in August or September?

Mrs. Pendrell. At Boscobel, my lord.

L. C. J. Did you ever see him before that time?

Mrs. Pendrell. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Do you know it was the same man that suffered?

Mrs. Pendrell. I will take my oath of it.

L. C. J. How! when you never saw him before that time?

Mrs. Pendrell. I was in town when he died.

Then stood up Mrs. Gifford.

L. C. J. When did you see Mr. Ireland?

Gifford. My lord, Mr. Ireland came to Wolverhampton August 17th, and he staid there till the 26th, it was of a Munday, I remember it by several circumstances.

L. C. J. Did you know Mr. Ireland?

Gifford. I never saw him before.

L. C. J. Do you know it was the same that died?

Gifford. My lord, here was my brother in town, who saw him executed, and he did assure me he was the same: And I saw him again the 2nd of September, and the 7th of September again, and the 10th and 11th: my lord, he was the same man, I believe, because my brother told me so.

Mr. Gifford. I saw him in the country, and I saw him executed.

Then another Mrs. Gifford stood up.

Mrs. Gifford. I saw him at Pancrass fair in Staffordshire.

L. C. J. Was it the same man that was executed?

Mrs. Gifford. My lord, I cannot say that, I did not see him suffer; but my sister and I were at the window, and she shewed him to me, and said that was Mr. Ireland, and told me how long he had been in England.

L. C. J. How do you know that was the man that was executed? Did you see him tried here?

Mrs. Gifford. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. C. J. And that was the same man?

Mrs. Gifford. Yes, it was, my lord.

L. C. J. When was it your sister shewed you him?

Mrs. Gifford. I saw him upon the 7th of September.

Then stood up one Mr. Bedle.

L. C. J. When did you see Mr. Ireland?

Bedle. I saw him at a place called Mùllage in Staffordshire, the 2nd of September.

L. C. J. Are you a Roman Catholic?

Bedle. If I must make a confession of my faith, I will. But I saw him there, and they said it was Mr. Ireland the Jesuit.

L. C. J. Had you no acquaintance with him before?—Bedle. No.

L. C. J. How do you know it is the same man that suffered?

Bedle. I do not know that, but I suppose it was the same.

Turner. I am accused for being at Tixall at a consult in September, I desire to know who saw me there, for I have not been there these four years.

L. C. J. Mr. Dugdale say you there.

Turner. What witnesses besides?

L. C. J. None but he for that.

Recorder. Hath Mr. Fenwick any more witnesses to call.

Fenwick. My lord, I have not any.

Then was Captain Hill called.

Fenwick. My lord, he can prove something against Mr. Bedlow: He says, he lived in good repute; but the captain will tell you, he was in the Marshalsea, and lived a poor mean life, and all the time fed upon the basket.

L. C. J. North. He was guilty of the same treasons that you are guilty of, there is his fault.

L. C. J. No doubt he was a naughty man, he was with you in this plot.

Fenwick. I can prove by sir James Butler's clerk, that he cheated a cutler of a silver-hilted sword.

[Then sir James Butler's clerk was called; but he having more than one, and the person meant not being there, there could nothing be examined about that.]

L. C. J. North. He hath had the king's pardon for all that.

Fenwick. He was forced to run the country for a many cheats, and was forced to borrow 4 or 5s. to redeem his boots. My lord, does his pardon make him a good witness? then we will prove something since his pardon.

L. C. J. No doubt he was bad enough while he was with you.

Whitebread. My lord, I think I have a plain demonstration against Mr. Bedlow since his pardon; he did at my last trial say, that he had nothing to say against me, and now he comes and gives fresh evidence against me.

L. C. J. North. That is an objection that will not take away his evidence, but only goes to the lessening of the credit of it. He says he was in treaty with Mr. Reading about you, and the lords in the Tower; and to beget a confidence in him that the lords in the Tower should receive favour from him, and come off by his means, he was to be easy to you too, which made him lessen his evidence at that time. This is that he says, the weight of it must be left to the Jury. And he said at that time he had more to say at time and place convenient.

Whitebread. There is no such thing in the trial. He hath alledged great matters against me, therefore it is evident he did falsify his oath; for if he were to swear the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and he did not say the whole truth, he is perjured; if he did, he can say nothing against me now.

L. C. J. North. Mr. Whitebread, you have your objection, and it must be observed to the Jury. Your repeating of things signifies nothing.

Then Captain Hill stood up.

Fenwick. Pray, Sir, what do you know of Mr. Bedlow?

Justice Pemberton. But don't ask any thing before the pardon.

Hill. I knew him in the Marshalsea.

Fenwick. In what condition was he there, Sir?

Hill. He was a poor man, as I be, and lived upon the basket.

Harcourt. How long ago is it since you knew him there?

Hill. In May was twelvemonth.

L. C. J. That was long before his pardon. But he might be an honest man for all that, though he were as poor as you. Are you an honest man?

Hill. Yes, I think so.

L. C. J. And so might he be. Well, have you any more?

Prisoners. No.

Sir Cr. Levins. Gentlemen of the Jury, you have heard the prisoners, and they have had a great deal of time to make their defence; but the greatest part of their defence hath been to invalidate the testimony of Mr. Oates; and what is the evidence they have brought against him? They tell you first, That he did not come over in that company that he says he came over with. And whereas he hath sworn he was here the 24th of April, they have taken a great deal of pains by 15 or 16 witnesses to prove that he was all the time at St. Omers; and that sir John Warner, and sir Thomas Preston, who he tells you came over in company with him, never stirred from the places of their residence, that is Liege and Watton, all that time: but this, gentlemen, you must observe, that if Mr. Oates were out of the case, all these persons, except Mr. Turner, are proved guilty of the treason they are charged with; and yet I shall set up his testimony, and make him clear, notwithstanding whatsoever hath been alleged against him. Gentlemen, to take them in order, Mr. Whitebread hath Mr. Dugdale, Mr. Bedlow, and Mr. Praunce, to prove him guilty, let what will come of Mr. Oates, all of them speak to him.

L. C. J. Praunce, do you speak any thing against Mr. Whitebread?

Praunce. No.

Recorder. It was Fenwick and Harcourt.

Sir C. Levins. But there is Bedlow and Dugdale against Mr. Whitebread; and therefore, gentlemen, there are two have sworn against him, besides Oates; and there is two against Mr. Fenwick at least; nay, there are three, for besides Oates there is Bedlow and Praunce; as to Mr. Harcourt, there is Bedlow, Dugdale and Praunce, besides Mr. Oates; as to Mr. Gavan, there is Oates and Dugdale; indeed there is none but Oates and Dugdale against Turner; so that as to the three first, however, there are two witnesses besides Mr. Oates, that is, against Mr. Whitebread, Mr. Fenwick, and Mr. Harcourt. Now as for Mr. Oates's testimony, and what they have to say to him; in the first place, they have brought a young gentleman, Mr. Hilsley, and he says he did not come over with him, and there it is one against one, but Dr. Oates hath sworn it, and hath given you such convincing circumstances how he lost his money, &c. so that I leave it to you which of the two is in the right, and ought to be believed. But then, my lord, as to the rest of the witnesses, here are a great many brought over to prove that Mr. Oates was all the while at St. Omers; but I shall bring you a considerable number of witnesses to prove that Dr. Oates was then in London, and that all these persons are mistaken. They do all pitch upon the first of May to fix it upon a time wherein he says he was here in town: but, gentlemen, I hope you did observe, that as to other things and time that were not so necessary as to this matter, there they were pleased to mistake, and to differ one from another, to contradict one another; for some of them said he went away and left St. Omers the 10th day of June, others the 23d, others, which was the same Flemish gardener, that he staid till July. Truly half that variance in the time which is necessary would serve our turn, we are but for eight days time, that is, he was not above eight or ten days here; truly these gentlemen will be sure to speak punctually to all those eight days that hurt the prisoners, but they will vary thirty days at another time that hurts them not. Why may they not be mistaken as well with that portion of time, as they were in the other, wherein they so much differed one from another?—But I shall give you most infallible proof by and by, that Mr. Oates was in England at that time that he said he was in England. My lord, as to that of sir John Warner, truly we have sent for a witness, but we did not know of the objection before; they have now brought you the gardener, and he did say positively at first that sir John Warner was there all that while, but being asked again how he knew it, he said it was the talk of the country, and so some of the witnesses did speak to sir Thomas Preston. But then I did desire to know of these witnesses, whether these persons were never absent from these places or not, they told me they were absent for some time in the vacancy.

Gavan. That was in August.

Sir Cr. Levins. You are very good at expounding, I know, but what those vacancies were I am not certain; but being apt to mistake a little, they might mistake the time too, and they might extend their journey beyond their vacancy. Mr. Gavan he hath made a mighty defence, I must confess, endeavouring to prove that he was out of town all June and July, and in April and May before, and truly he hath brought some witnesses that have spoken very far from him as to those months, but I will desire you to observe, as I know you did, that the three last witnesses that knew him very well did affirm positively that he was there the last week in July, but being asked to the week before that, and the week before that, they could not be positive. And, under favour, by that evidence you will believe rather that he was not there, for if so be they could so positively remember for the last week, why should they not be as positive for the two weeks before? Why, these two weeks were enough to serve our turn, for it was towards the latter end of July that which Mr. Oates hath sworn upon Mr. Gavan, that he was in town, and talked of the same matters which he had written the letter about. And therefore it is much to be presumed, that because the witnesses will take upon them as to the last week, they are sure he was at Wolverhampton, but as to the two other weeks they could not be sure; that they speak with some conscience, and therefore it may be true that he was here. And the woman said she could not say but possibly he might make such a journey, and she never the wiser. So that under favour, gentlemen, all that which Mr. Gavan hath so industriously endeavoured to lay upon Mr. Oates, does shrink into a very slender evidence, and that it might well be he was at London at the time that Oates says, the three last witnesses speaking positively only to the last week in July.—Then truly, my lord, they are fixed upon another great matter to blemish Mr. Oates as to Mr. Ireland, a person that is dead and out of the way. Mr. Ireland hath been hanged upon that evidence, so far it was believed; but now after all this, will these gentlemen come to question the evidence that was given against Mr. Ireland. They have likewise, my lord, brought my lady Southcott, and some other persons, who give you an evidence concerning Mr. Ireland, that he should not be here at this time; but, gentlemen, under favour; Mr. Oates hath sworn before, and he hath now sworn it again, that Mr. Ireland was at that time in London, and, gentlemen, I will confirm him in that by another witness that did see him here in town at that time. And when you have two witnesses for the king upon their oaths come and testify it, I hope you will believe them, rather than other persons that testify only by hearsay. It was the matter then in issue, and had saved his life if it had been true; but though it be now settled, and none could think it would be again started, they would make that an objection; but by chance we have a witness still to give you satisfaction, that Mr. Ireland was in London at that time that Mr. Oates did swear him to be. We will begin with that witness about Ireland. And then we will call our witnesses to prove that Mr. Oates was in England, and did come over when he said he did. Call Sarah Paine. Who was sworn.

Sir Cr. Levins. What time did you see Mr. Ireland in London? did you see him in August last?

S. Paine. I saw him about seven or eight days before I came to my Lord Chamberlain, and that was about a week before the king went to Windsor.

L. C. J. Where did you see him?

S. Paine. At his own door in Russel-street.

L. C. J. Did you speak to him?

S. Paine. No, I know him very well, and saw him as I came by.

Sir Cr. Levins. Had not you carried many letters to him?—S. Paine. Yes, several letters.

Sir Cr. Levins. Where did you live before?

S. Paine. I lived at Mr. Grove's.

Sir Cr. Levins. Did not Mr. Ireland use to come there too?

S. Paine. Yes, he did often.

L. C. J. Was any one talking with Ireland then?

S. Paine. No.

Sir Cr. Levins. How long did you look upon him? Did you see him go in? did you see his face or his back?

S. Paine. I saw his face, and made him a curtsy.

L. C. J. This she said to Ireland's face.

Justice Dolben. Your evidence is, that Mr. Ireland went out of town the 5th of August, and she says she saw him about that time, which must be the 13th or 14th of August.

Gavan. How does she prove it? She does not say she spoke with him.

Justice Dolben. She swears it.

Sir Cr. Levins. Now we must prove what time the king went to Windsor.

L. C. J. Sir Thomas Doleman, what time in August did the king go to Windsor last summer?

Sir Tho. Doleman. I believe (I cannot charge my memory so well) it was the 13th, it was about the 13th or 13th.

L. C. J. Was my Lord Chamberlain there then?

S. Paine. My Lord Chamberlain went after the king.

L. C. J. And when do you say you saw Ireland?

S. Paine. I saw him seven or eight days before I went to my Lord Chamberlain's, which was before my lord went to Windsor, and that was a week after the king went thither.

Sir Cr. Levins. Now I will tell you what she says; she says she saw Ireland a week before she went to my Lord Chamberlain's, and she saw him go into Grove's house, where he did usually go for letters; she says she saw his face, and made him a curtsy; and that this was a week before she went to my Lord Chamberlain's, and that was a week after the king went to Windsor. Now the time that Mr. Oates pitches upon is between the 8th and 12th of August, which by computation is the time she speaks of.

Gavan. And our witnesses go from the 3rd of August to the 14th of September.

Sir Cr. Levins. Call sir Richard Barker, William Walker, Sarah Ives, &c.

William Walker was first sworn, and bid to stand up.

Sir Cr. Levins. Pray, Sir, do you know that Mr. Oates was in England the beginning of last summer? Pray tell your whole knowledge.

Walker. Yes, my lord, I will. I have known Mr. Titus Oates these seven years, and had not seen him above five years; but about two years ago I did meet him in Newgate-market, and then again in the latter end of the month of March 1678, or the beginning of April, I did see Mr. Oates in a disguise in a gray serge coat, and I think a gray hat, but I did not understand it, nor did I know him to be the man; and I was very much troubled that I could not recollect myself who he was, and I went to bed, and could not recollect who he was; but before I rose in the morning I did draw him within the scheme of my knowledge, that it was Titus Oates; and to confirm my judgment in that, I did go to a gentlewoman, whose name I did not know, but I went thither because it was the same place that I had seen him at a year before, to enquire what became of Mr. Oates, and how he did: and when I came to her (in the morning early, it was the next day after I had seen him in disguise) I enquired of the gentlewoman how Mr. Oates did, and she clapped her hand upon her counter, being a tradeswoman, 'O,' said she, 'he is 'an undone man?' 'Why so?' said I. Said she, 'He is turned to the church of Rome, and he absconds and hides himself, I know not where he is.' Then, in plain terms, said I, 'I saw him later than you, for I saw him yesterday, between nine and ten of the clock, it was at the upper end of St. Martin's-lane, near Leicester-house.'

Sir Cr. Levins. What time was this?

Walker. This was in April or March last was a twelvemonth.

L. C. J. Did you never see him more than then?

Walker. No, I knew his face so well, as I looked back upon him, and he looked back upon me, but it was with some kind of terror, and he did seem to abscond and hide himself.

L. C. J. When was this?

Walker. It was some time from the latter end of March to the middle of April.

L. C. J. Why did you skip the beginning of April?

Walker. I am not able to remember exactly the time; for why, I did never think to be called as a witness about it.

L. C. J. Did you speak to him?

Walker. No, my lord, I did not.

L. C. J. How long before had you spoke to him?

Walker. A year before, but in his canonical habit, and not before of five years.

L. C. J. North. You will not sure catch him upon a day.

L. C. J. But I will tell you what it does, it contradicts all that your boys, all your witnesses say: Though it does not go home exactly to the 24th of April, yet, if it be true, and we have no reason to believe it otherwise, it disproves all their evidence; for they charge him to have been at St. Omers all March, April, and May.

Sir Cr. Levins. Swear Sarah Ives. [Which was done.]

Oates. My lord, we bring Sarah Ives to prove that this same gentleman went to her to enquire of her about me.

L. C. J. Pray Mrs. what did that minister say to you, and when, concerning Mr. Oates?

Ives. Mr. Walker came to my shop, and asked me when I saw Mr. Oates; said I, I have not seen him since he went beyond sea. Then, said he, I have seen him later than you, for I was going to Leicester-fields, and at the end of St. Martin's lane I saw him in a disguise, and he looked wistly back upon me, and I upon him, and, said he, I am certain it was the man.

L. C. J. What time was this?

Ives. It was April was a twelvemonth.

L. C. J. What time in April, do you think?

Ives. I cannot say the day.

L. C. J. But what time of the month was it?

Ives. I do not know justly, I think it was the middle of April, or thereabouts.

L. C. J. Call another witness.

Sir Cr. Levins. Call Mrs. Mayo. [Who was sworn.]

Sir Cr. Levins. Well, what say you, when did you see Mr. Oates in England?

Mayo. I never saw his face till a week before Whitsontide, or a little after; there was a young man, a servant of sir Richard Barker's, that knew him a long time before; he came to me and said, Yonder is Mr. Oates hath changed his coat from a black to a white; what is he, said I, He was a minister, but he is either turned Quaker or Catholic. But, said I, he is not turned Quaker, for he wears a periwig, and he fell a laughing and jeering at him; said I, Why do you deride this gentleman, when he is a friend of sir Richard Barker's?

L. C. J. Where was Mr. Oates then?

Mayo. He was in the court-yard, and I was in the kitchen.

L. C. J. When was this?

Mayo. The week before Whitsontide.

L. C. J. In what month?

Mayo. It was in May.

L. C. J. Did you know him before then?

Mayo. No, I did not, but I had heard much of him in the family.

L. C. J. How soon did you see him again after that?

Mayo. About a week after he came and brought another with him, and walked into the garden, and seemed to be discontented that they did not shew such a countenance to him as they used to do in the house; for the gentlewomen had heard he was turned Jesuit, and therefore were very shy; that is, sir Richard's kinswomen, my lady's sisters' daughters.

L. C. J. Do you know Dr. Oates now?

Mayo. Very well, sir. Afterwards he came again and walked into the garden, and the young man I spoke of before, that is now dead, came again and took notice of him, of the strange garb he was in; he was in a room that looked into the garden, I saw him walking there and said he, Yonder is Oates again and hath brought another with him; he looked out of the window, and said he, Prithee look here, does not he look like a Jesuit? And he that was with him looked back, and if it had not been for that, and the young man's importunity, I had never taken notice of Mr. Oates. After when I heard he was come over and gave in his testimony about the Plot, I would needs go see him; but he spoke very slightly to me, and seemed to be offended with the family because they did scorn him. Said I, They had no reason to countenance you, because we all understood you were turned catholic. They did, said he, look very shy upon me. Why, said I, you must not be offended, for you know all the family are no friends to Jesuits, and I hope never will be so; but I hope, Mr. Oates, you will not forget eaten bread, because he used to be made very much of at sir Richard Barker's.

Sir Cr. Levins. Is that the man that you saw there?

Mayo. This is the man, if you will put me to my oath again I will swear it.

Sir Cr. Levins. When was this?

Mayo. It was the week before Whitsontide, it was in May, for Whitsontide fell in May.

Sir Cr. Levins. Then call Philip Page. Who was sworn.

Sir Cr. Levins. Do you know Dr. Oates?

Page. Yes, sir.

Sir Cr. Levins. How long have you known him?

Page. I have known him four or five years.

L. C. J. Pray did you see him in the year 1678, last year?—Page. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. At what time?

Page. About the beginning of May.

L. C. J. Where?

Page. At sir Richard Barker's.

L. C. J. Were you acquainted with him before?

Page. I had spoke with him before.

L. C. J. How do you know it was he? did you speak with him then?

Page. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. What habit was he in?

Page. He had a light coloured campaign coat. I asked him, where he had been so long a time, that we had not seen him, but he turned away from me, and gave me no account, but after he had been in the house made back again, and away he went, after he enquired for sir Richard.

L. C. J. How do you know it was in May, why might it not be in April?

Page. It was in the beginning of May, to the best of my knowledge.

L. C. J. By what material circumstances do you remember it was in the beginning of May? Is there any thing that puts it into your mind more particularly?

Page. My master had a patient at that time, that was sick of a fever.

L. C. J. Where? at sir Richard Barker's house?

Page. At Islington it was.

Jury. We desire to know what the patient's name was, for some of us know Islington very well.

Page. I have forgot the name.

Sir R. Barker. It was Aldram Milver's daughter.

L. C. J. It was about that time in May that you saw him?

Page. I did upon my oath, and I spoke with him, and took much notice of him, he had an old black hat on, that flapped, and a pair of Spanish-leather shoes.

Sir Cr. Levins. Call sir Richard Barker. Who was sworn.

L. C. J. Do you know Dr. Oates?

Sir R. Barker. Yes, my lord, I have known his father and him ever since he hath been a child; I saw him the last summer.

L. C. J. About what time?

Sir R. Barker. At that time that they have given in evidence, I have only this to say, I was abroad, as my business leads me often abroad into the country, but they told me, Mr. Oates came to my house in a disguise, and that they believed he was turned either Quaker or Papist.

L. C. J. When was this?

Sir R. Barker. It was, my lord, to the best of my remembrance, after Whitsontide that they told me, but they told me a story of him, how that he was in two several disguises, the one was a short hair, and then they thought he was turned Quaker, another time he had a long periwig, and then they thought he was turned Papist; and the first that told me, was this fellow here, that is a coachman of mine, who was mending something of his coach. It happened, my lord, upon the visiting of a gentleman, that I was very ill, in which time Mr. Oates was gone, and afterwards, when I was recovered again, he came to my house, to enquire concerning Dr. Tongue.

L. C. J. When did you see him first?

Sir R. Barker. It was, my lord, to the best of my remembrance, the latter end of June, or beginning of July, upon my recovery.

L. C. J. By the oath that you have taken, I would ask you one question, Did not you see him till June?

Sir R. Barker. No, my lord; but my servants told me, they had seen him in May, before Whitsontide.

L. C. J. Did you see him in June?

Sir R. Barker. To the best of my remembrance, it was in June.

Then one Butler was sworn.

L. C. J. Come, do you know Dr. Oates?

Butler. Yes, very well.

L. C. J. How long have you known him?

Butler. I have known him these 3 years, before he went beyond sea.

L. C. J. Come, you are upon your oath, when did you see Dr. Oates, and where, the beginning of last summer?

Butler. I saw him the beginning of last May, at my master's house in Barbican.

L. C. J. Upon what occasion? What are you?

Butler. I am sir Richard Barker's coachman. And I was making clean my coach in the Gate-house, and in comes Dr. Oates, in May last was a twelvemonth, the beginning of May; with his hair cut off close cropt to his ears, in gray clothes, a gray coat like a shepherd's coat, a Yorkshire gray; he asked me whether Dr. Tongue was within? I told him, no: nevertheless he went into the house, and immediately came out again, and seemed to be very much discontented, but said nothing at all to me, but passed by me, and went away.

L. C. J. And did you know him at that time he spoke to you first?

Butler. Yes, my lord, because I knew him three years before.

L. C. J. Could you have then called him by his name?

Butler. Yes, my lord, I could.

L. C. J. You say he came to enquire for Dr. Tongue, and was discontented that he could not see him?

Butler. He said nothing to me when he came out, but passed away as one that was troubled.

L. C. J. Did you see him afterwards?

Butler. Six weeks after I saw him; and then he had a long black coat and a periwig on.

L. C. J. But are you sure it was the same man?

Butler. I am, upon my oath.

Justice Dolben. Did you tell your master of his being there the first time?

Butler. I did tell sir Richard Barker of him, as soon as I saw him.

L. C. J. Sir Richard, how soon did he tell you Oates was first there?

Sir R. Barker. It was soon after, my lord.

L. C. J. Was it in May that he told you he had seen him?

Sir R. Barker. He told me as soon as ever I came home, in May, as I remember.

L. C. J. Did he tell you Mr. Oates was there by name?

Sir R. Barker. Yes, my lord, he did: and when he told me what habit he was in, I wondered at it.

Oates. There are several, my lord, that did see me at that time; but they are gone into the country; and I cannot have them now ready: if you please now to call Mr. Smith the schoolmaster of Islington. Who was sworn.

Sir Cr. Levins. Do you know Dr. Oates?

Smith. Yes, very well.

Sir Cr. Levins. Pray, Sir, how long have you known him.

Smith. He was my scholar at Merchant-Taylors-school, where I was usher.

Sir Cr. Levins. When did you see him, the beginning of last summer?

Smith. I saw him in the beginning of last May, that is, 1678.

L. C. J. Where did you see him?

Smith. He dined with me at my house in Islington.

Justice Dolben. What, the boys at St. Omers now are gone?

L. C. J. Recollect yourself well: by the oath you have taken, did Dr. Oates in May was twelve-month dine with you?

Smith. Yes, my lord, he did; and it was the first Monday in May, as I remember.

Justice Dolben. And this you swear, directly and positively?

Smith. Yes, my lord, I do.

L. C. J. How long did he stay there?

Smith. He staid three or four hours after: and, may it please you, my lord, he was in a summer-suit, and a coloured ribbon, a green knot upon his shoulder.

VOL. VII.

L. C. J. What did you discourse about?

Smith. About his being in Spain and Flanders, and his travels.

L. C. J. Had you a long discourse with him?

Smith. Yes, I had.

L. C. J. Had you nothing about the times?

Smith. No, my lord, not a word.

L. C. J. Did you understand he had been turned Roman Catholic?

Smith. I did know it.

Jury. My lord, Did Mr. Smith see him any other time after that?

Smith. No, my lord, not in two months; to my remembrance, about the middle of August.

Sir Cr. Levins. Call one Clay: Who was sworn.

L. C. J. Do you know Dr. Oates?

Clay. Yes, my lord, I do.

L. C. J. How long have you known him?

Clay. Ever since April last was twelve-month.

L. C. J. Was that the first time of your acquaintance with him?

Clay. Yes, at Mr. Charles Howard's.

L. C. J. Where were you there with him?

Clay. He lived in one corner of Old Arundel House.

L. C. J. How came you acquainted with him?

Clay. Truly I met him accidentally, at Mr. Howard's house.

L. C. J. How came you to come there?

Clay. I was there to visit Mr. Howard, as a friend.

L. C. J. Were you acquainted with him?

Clay. Yes, I was with Mr. Howard, and there I saw Dr. Oates.

L. C. J. When did you see him the second time?

Clay. The second time I think I saw him there too.

L. C. J. When was that?

Clay. That was in May.

L. C. J. North. How long was that after?

Clay. I think the other was in April.

L. C. J. And did you see him in May?

Clay. I saw him in May too.

L. C. J. What time of the month was it?

Clay. I cannot exactly speak to that, but it was in that month as I remember, I am morally certain of it.

L. C. J. And when did you see him after May?

Clay. I can't tell whether I saw him after May or not.

L. C. J. Is that the same man that you saw at Mr. Howard's, either in April or May?

Clay. Yes, my lord, it is the same man.

Sir Cr. Levins. Then we have done with our Evidence.

L. C. J. Come, gentlemen, now what can you say to this? they have given you now their full Charge.

Oates. My lord, I have one thing more, I desire your lordship to take notice, this gentleman, Mr. Clay, is a priest in orders, as they say.

2 D

L. C. J. I will not ask him that question, but, Mr. Clay, are you a Papist?

Clay. Yes, my lord, I am so.

L. C. J. North. Come, what say you now, Mr. Whitebread, to this?

Whitebread. I have this to say; first, That at my last trial, when I pressed him to declare who had seen him, when he said he was here in towne, he could name nobody, not one. I know afterwards he was examined at the Committee, and then he could name nobody neither. He said he was there privately at Mr. Grove's, and we can prove that he never did lie there in his life. And then he said absolutely, he had not seen much company, he staid but six days. Now this good Doctor does say that he saw him here in the latter end of March, or the middle of April, whereas he himself says he came over with Hilsley, the 24th of April.

L. C. J. He was landed here April the 17th, and the witnesses say, it was the latter end of April or beginning of May.

Whitebread. Mr. Oates expressly said, he staid here but six days, when he came over to the Consult.

L. C. J. Why, does not all this stand together?

Whitebread. No, my lord, how could this stand together? his coming over the 17th, and his being here a great part in May, whereas he says he was but six days?

L. C. J. Perchance Dr. Oates may not be precise enough; but look you here, these witnesses do not speak so exactly to a day or two, or three, or four, or five, but to the latter end of April: now, why might they not see him the latter end of April and the beginning of May, and yet stand very well with Mr. Oates's testimony, who says he was landed here about the 17th of April, and staid here about six or seven days? How nice would you have them be in that case? which, because they are honest, they will not be.

L. C. J. North. You make your defences to depend upon an uncertainty of time, which no mortal man can ever remember; besides, pray observe this, That Mr. Oates stands a good witness, till you impeach him by a fry out of your own schools, and they go to the whole months of June, and April, and May; now these all speak in contradiction to other witnesses, and so Mr. Oates is still an upright and good witness.

Whitebread. They say they did see him there every day, or every other day.

L. C. J. But sure I can as well tell, who saw him but once in such a month, and dined with him then, as any that saw him never so often: but here are five witnesses upon you in this point.

Whitebread. The one was told by his man, the other by his boy.

L. C. J. The coachman, and the boy, and the maid, and Mr. Smith did see him.

Justice Pemberton. The divine did see him, and went and told the woman that he had seen him, pray remember that.

L. C. J. North. Now the Evidence is concluded, say what you will for yourselves; and then we will observe what you object, upon our direction to the Jury, according to our consciences.

Green. My lord, then I say this for myself, We commit ourselves to God Almighty. We must compare the number, though ours were not sworn, yet there were sixteen of them, boys, young men, that conversed with him every day, and these witnesses speak but of one or two particular days: One says he dined with him, and another saw him in a disguise; but, my lord, in these very witnesses there is an apparent contradiction, because out of his own mouth (ex ore tuo te judico) they are contradicted. He says he came over upon Sunday, with Hilsley, which was the 20th of April, as I think, and staid here only a matter of six days. One of the witnesses says he saw him the first Monday in May. What signify the witnesses, though upon oath, that they saw him in May? How can he come over the 20th of April, and stay but six days, and be seen here in May? Before these can be reconciled, one of them must be false; and then, my lord, besides that which I first said, there is the number of witnesses, they are nothing in comparison with the number of ours. And then, my lord, secondly, if we should grant, that a lesser number should serve the turn, because they are sworn for the king, because they swear for the safety of the king, (whom God preserve, whatsoever becomes of me) and the other speak not upon their oaths, yet, my lord, this does not destroy nor touch at all that evidence that is brought against him, about the rector of Liege, sir John Warner and sir Thomas Preston. And though it be granted, that all the others that spoke about Mr. Oates being at St. Omers be mistaken, and must not be believed, yet we have him still, by those six others, who have proved that he hath sworn false; and I hope we shall have fair play in the law, to make the best defence we can for our lives; and I humbly conceive, nobody must be convicted of High Treason by the law, but upon the evidence of two sufficient witnesses. Now I leave it to the conscience and honour of the court, whether he shall be believed and counted a sufficient witness, when there are so many that have proved him false in that one point? and then, besides all this, my lord, we have here sixteen, at least, Staffordshire witnesses, who give you an account of Mr. Ireland's being out of London, from the 3rd of August till the 14th of September; so that in these two things he hath been contradicted without any answer, for he says, the 12th of August he was with him, when they say he was in Staffordshire.

L. C. J. You have forgot the maid that saw him in London the 12th or 13th.

Green. No my lord, I have not. And this is it I answer to it, she is a witness that only says, she just saw him, but did not speak to him.

L. C. J. She made a curtesy to him.

Gaza. We are now talking of seeing Ireland in August, and we prove by sir John Southcott and all his family, who say they began their journey with him the 5th of August, and staid with him till the 19th, after the particular day that she speaks of, you find seven or eight of them swear that they saw him all the time. And therefore I would fain know, whether poor mens' lives shall be cast away upon such evidence as this? and then, my lord, for the other thing, I hope I have made a very good plea for myself concerning the matter of July; my witnesses could be positive as to the last week, but for the other weeks, though they could not be positive, they rather believed I was there, than not: But when it is urged, Why might not they give as good a testimony for the former weeks as for that? To this I answer fully, that there is a great and predominant reason why they should have a particular reason to swear, why I should be there the last week, rather than the other weeks, because I was then shut up in the spiritual exercise, and they had a particular reason to take notice of that. Then, my lord, I hope you will be pleased to mind this, by which I have made my plea good, that is, my lord, that Mr. Oates's testimony against me is this, Mr. Ashby came to town about the middle of July, and that he said there about a fortnight, and that in the time of that fortnight I came to town, and said I would go see Father Ashby, and had that discourse he speaks of; and so much for that. And then, my lord, I beseech you still to bear it in your mind, that I have been proved not to be in town at the time of the great Consult about the Plot; and indeed I was not capable of it, for I was not then professed, and there could none be of that congregation about the plot, but those that were professed. I could not be there in the congregation, by reason of my age. Mr. Harcourt here, and the rest, if you will ask them, will tell you it; they were there, but upon the word of a dying man, I was not there.

L. C. J. It is not positively said by Mr. Oates that you were.

Gaza. But then, my lord, he says my name was to it, which he saw in July; now I prove, that I was in Staffordshire the last week of July; and seeing I have witnesses to prove, that I was there till the 14th, and the last week, and it was after the 14th that he saw me, I hope my plea is good. Then, my lord, I ground my plea upon this, I have studied philosophy and other things, but I never studied the law, and so am very ignorant of it; but this is my case; I am accused by one witness concerning one fact, and by another concerning another; the one committed here at London, the other in Staffordshire; I desire, therefore, to know, whether the witness that swears the thing done in Staffordshire, and the other witness, that swears what was done in London, can be esteemed two witnesses, according to the law, to convict me of treason?

L. C. J. North. Yes, I will tell you, if it were a matter of doubt, it might be found especially, and be argued, but it is a matter that hath been already resolved in the case of sir Henry Vane at the King's-bench bar,* who was indicted for levying of war against the king; and there one witness proved the levying war in one county, and the other proved the levying of war in another county; and so, though they were but single witnesses of single facts, yet being both came up to the indictment, they were adjudged sufficient to maintain it. So it is in your case, here is one witness for the proving your hand to the paper which was for the murder of the king, and there is another witness of your discourse to the same purpose; the fact is your joining and conspiring to destroy the king, and to levy war against him, and both these are proved to the full of the indictment by these witnesses; and though they are to several particular facts, yet they are all overt acts of the same treason.

Gaza. My lord, I have a contrary opinion to that in sergeant Rolls.

L. C. J. North. But this is a known case, and the law is settled therein.

L. C. J. I will tell you what, you mistake in what you say, for there are two witnesses, Oates and Dugdale, who swear to the same fact, which is killing the king, altering the government, and bringing in popery: Oates says he saw your hand to the consult, for the murder of the king, for the raising of the army; and for the introducing of popery, which is a necessary consequence of change of government; Dugdale says he was with you in the parlour of my lord Aston's, where the discourse was between him and you, and others, about killing the king and altering religion. Are not these two witnesses to one and the same treason?

Gaza. No, my lord, I conceive not.

L. C. J. If I consult a way to kill the king here, and then I go into the country, and there I consult of it with another person, are not these two witnesses to the same treason? sure they are.

Gaza. Then, my lord, my second plea is this, If there be two witnesses, you will grant me this ground, that no man must be convicted but upon the evidence of two legal and credible witnesses, and upon clear evidence, as the statute since his majesty's happy restoration does declare. Now two things are required certainly to make a credible witness, and a clear evidence; as the witness must be credible, so it is as agreeable to reason that the evidence must be plain and clear, yea, as clear as the light of the sun at mid-day. Now, therefore, if I prove, that neither the witness is credible, such as the law requires, nor the evidence clear, such as the law looks upon as such, then I ought not to be convicted by this witness upon this evidence.

L. C. J. The jury are judges of that, and therefore there I leave it.

* See the fourth Resolution in his Case and the Note there, ante, vol. 6, p. 123.

L. C. J. North. You argue mighty subtly, but I will give you this answer; there must be two lawful witnesses, that is the law; a man cannot be impeached of treason but by two lawful witnesses; now if they be not convicted of perjury, and their testimony be not taken away, but they may be heard in a court of justice, they are lawful witnesses; now for their being credible witnesses, that is a matter that is left to the jury, but we must receive them as lawful witnesses till they be convict of a crime that takes away their testimony.

Gavan. Therefore because they are left to the jury I am satisfied, and I turn myself to you, gentlemen. You are to sit upon my life and my death: as for my own part, I can truly profess I am as innocent as the child unborn, and this gentleman Mr. Whitebread knows I was not capable of being at the consult, being not of age. Now I must leave myself to the jury, and will leave it to their judgments whether these two witnesses can be esteemed credible witnesses; for to make credible witnesses there is required honesty of life, and truth in their testimony, for no man can be a good witness that is not an honest man, nor that hath carried himself so that he is not to be believed. As to the honesty of Mr. Oates's life, you heard that he was disgusted by the Jesuits, esteemed not a person of that diligence or fidelity to be intrusted by them; he was turned out of St. Omers.

L. C. J. Does that prove any dishonesty in Mr. Oates?

Gavan. No, but I speak to his credibility.

L. C. J. Speak plain; how does it impeach Mr. Oates's evidence, that the Jesuits did not like him?

Gavan. It might be a ground of hatred and malice in him against them; and then, gentlemen, I desire you to consider that other thing, That we have proved him to speak false in his testimony about sir John Warner and sir Thomas Preston; and all the business of the 12th of August, concerning Mr. Ireland's being here the 12th of August, who by 16 witnesses, is proved to have been all the while in Staffordshire: and though he was not convicted of perjury before, which might have easily been done, as I have shewn to the whole world now, I appeal to the honour and conscience of the jury, whether all these proofs ought not to make this witness to be deemed an incredible witness. And pray, gentlemen, hear me this, and carry this away with you, as to the business of Ireland, between the 8th and 12th of August, how many do swear that he was in Staffordshire. I desire you but to compare that one woman that only saw him, and made a courtesy to him, as she says, with those 16 witnesses that conversed with him daily. Then as for the second testimony of the St. Omers witnesses, which you see is thwarted by some that do swear in the king's name to the contrary: Still I desire you to compare number with number: The others, though they do not swear, are ready to swear, and there are only three or four against sixteen of them, and there is an evident contradiction in what they say, and that proved out of his own mouth; for he says he came over the 20th of April with Mr. Hilsley, and staid only six days; they say he was here in May, and I desire these may be compared: for how could it be that he should be here in May, if he staid but six days? And then to make your verdict, and take their credit away, I would desire you to consider those witnesses that I have brought for myself, not being here, but in Wolverhampton; for being in Staffordshire as long as to the last week of July, it must fall within the time of his testimony. I have brought witnesses to prove upon oath, that from the 22d upward they saw me in Wolverhampton, and they do remember the particular instance that I was then at my spiritual exercise: and this is that I have to say as to Mr. Oates. As for Mr. Dugdale, I would desire you to reflect upon the whole story of his coming to discover this plot, and his being an informer about it. The truth is, I confess I have known him five or six years, whilst he lived at my lord Aston's, and I have divers times discoursed with him there at Mr. Ewers's chamber; but, as I hope to be saved, never any thing of treason in all my life. Now, it is well known, and there are those that can testify it, that in good truth Dugdale run away from my lord Aston's after he had lost 300*l.* of my lord's money.

L. C. J. If you can say any thing against Mr. Dugdale by witnesses that you can prove it, then you say well; but if you will tell a story out of one Lord's mouth, and another Lord's mouth, that is never to be endured; you shall never take away a man's testimony by hear-say, you must prove it.

Gavan. It is well known, if I prove Dugdale no credible witness, I play my own game. You know I have been a prisoner twenty weeks, and could not seek out witnesses. I asked it as soon as I knew of my trial, but it was denied me to send for witnesses to prove that Dugdale was in gaol for debt. If I had the Recorder's Warrant or the authority of this bench, I could send for them.

L. C. J. You must not fall upon persons without evidence; if you have witnesses to prove any thing, whom the jury will believe, call them.

Gavan. I do assure your lordship, as I hope to see the face of God, I am innocent of what is charged upon me. And God bless the king and this honourable court.

L. C. J. Though you do an hundred times bless the king and court and all, you must prove things if you will be believed. What say you, Mr. Whitebread?

Whitebread. My Lord, I have but one thing to say, and it is but a word: Your lordship was pleased to make an observation, and a good one it was, a letter which Mr. Dugdale says was written by me to Mr. Ewers, which he says he intercepted; he was, in the mean time, a trusty correspondent for his friend. In that letter he swears, there was expressly contained positive words of entertaining persons to kill the king, that only such as were hardy desperate and stout; but as your lordship well observed, that it was an improbable thing that a man who had his wits about him should write such plain expressions about such a matter; and upon that improbability I leave it to the Jury.

Justice Pemberton. Have you any thing to say, Mr. Fenwick?

Fenwick. I desire, my Lord, your lordship and the Jury to consider and observe the nature both of our witnesses, and of them that are brought against us. The one speak for the whole truth, that they saw him every day, or every other day; they daily conversed with him, eat and drank with him in the same house; the others, they say only, they saw him in one particular day; another another; and one of them says he saw him, but in a disguise. Now, my lord, whether it be likely that so many innocent children, brought up in a good virtuous life, should come here to forswear themselves, to contradict people that we know not what they are; and then, besides, we know that these people are of a poor, mean, beggarly condition, that intend to end that condition by such a pretence of discovery, and hope thereby to advance themselves. It is probable such people might be drawn in. Then also we shall prove that sir John Warner did not come over with him, nor Mr. Williams nor sir Thomas Preston: Then all his witness as to them is false, and he does not say he went back with these people; and this for the witnesses. Now suppose the witnesses were all equal, what does he prove against us three? Or what reason doth he give of his evidence? He says he saw such and such letters from Mr. Whitebread. Now is it possible that a man that had no credit at all with us, that we should be such fools as to trust him with such letters as those, then your lordships must hang us twice, once for fools, and then for knaves. Or is it possible that we should be such egregious fools that we should trust a man that was never esteemed of; was expelled the college? And for all his talk of Commissions and Letters, there is not one of those found; let him show any one commission, any money paid, or any order brought him, or any arms that were found; there are three quarters of a year now passed since the first discovery; certainly all this time could produce something: thousands of letters have been taken from us, some of those letters would have discovered this thing; certainly therefore we have better evidence than he hath, supposing them to be equal as to credibility in their original. Is it credible we should be so great rogues to contrive the king's death? Though he speaks of the writing being carried from chamber to chamber concerning this matter, he can never produce one paper signed by any one man's hand, nor can he produce any thing to attest his testimony. I leave this to your lordship's judgment whether this evidence be good; there is nothing appears in so much time, of any effect that is produced:

where were the armies? Where were the moneys paid? Where the commissions? Is it possible such a thing should be, and no sign of it for a whole year almost? There is no reason brought, amongst them all, but saying and swearing, and that I will stand by.

Whitebread. I thank God I don't look like a fighting man, nor I never did; but who can think that I should be so mad, when I had committed such a secret to him, to beat him as he says? It is strange that such a plot should be discovered wherein so many persons of quality, honour and reputation, are said to be concerned, and yet no footsteps of it appear; and none of them, as my Lord Arundel, my Lord Bellasis, should never divulge such a plot; I would fain know whether such a thing be probable, but I commend myself to God Almighty, and the Jury.

Harcourt. My Lord, I have only this to say; I have lived to this age, which is 70 years, and I never knew any man that could say I was accused of the thing in the world, for which I should be brought before any magistrate; and it is strange that after so many years I should come to be arraigned and condemned for a crime of the highest nature; and there is no reason brought against me nor any of the rest, for the proof of what is alledged, nor do they, who are the witnesses against us, deserve at all any credit. They only affirm such and such things without any reason to persuade you to believe them, and it is easy to say, and so it is to swear it. So that all I have to say is this, since a negative cannot be proved, I hope innocency will find some that shall defend it. I leave myself to the Bench, for the law is the defence of innocency. If they did bring any evidence besides that, which is downright positive swearing, without any reason or concurrent reason to confirm it, it were something.

Fenwick. And besides all this, to think how these men have lived before time is worth reflection and considering. As for Bedlow, he hath been a very ill man, the world knows it.

L. C. J. Have you proved it? Can you show any record of it?

Just. Pemberton. Turner, have you any thing to say? you have had your time.

Fenwick. You will find that 'Nemo repente fit nequissimus.' No man arrives at the highest degrees of impiety at first: Men grow extremely wicked by degrees. But let us see if they can blame our lives, or any thing that we have done at any time before; we prove, and all the world knows what they have been, and how scandalously they have lived.

Groom. Our witnesses are to be regarded for their number and for their innocency, especially since they give no reason nor convincing arguments for what they do affirm.

L. C. J. We would hear you, and we have heard you very long, but it must not be permitted you to go over the same things again and again.

L. C. B. Hath Turner any thing to say?

Turner. All that I have to say, my lord, is this, to ask whether it be reasonable that Bedlow and Oates should be looked upon as good witnesses, that these persons who have been such scandalous people should be admitted to an oath, who were debarred from the Sacrament; for according to the Church of England, no man that is publicly scandalous can be admitted to the Sacrament.

L. C. J. But you prove nothing.

Turner. I can prove it first by evidence of one Hastings.

L. C. J. Call him. [But he appeared not.]

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the Jury; Here hath been a very long evidence, and a very confused one; and you cannot expect, that it should be wholly repeated to you: For it is almost impossible for any one to remember it; neither would I if I could, because a great deal of it is impertinent, and vainly to be repeated: And besides, many things have been said over and over again, to no purpose. But I will observe to you, as well as I can, what Testimonies there are against each particular man of them; and that I do look upon to be very material. And I leave it to you, to judge and consider, how far the evidence is credible, and how far it is substantial.

Against Mr. Whitebread, you have the Testimony of three, Oates, Dugdale, and Bedlow: Against Mr. Fenwick, you have the Testimony of Oates, Bedlow and Praunce: Against Harcourt, you have Oates, Dugdale, Bedlow, and Praunce. You have against Gavan, Dugdale and Oates; and against Turner, Dugdale and Oates: So that, to the two last, you have two, three to the two first, and four to Harcourt.

Now, the matter that they have sworn, hath been all tending to one thing; the murder of the King, the advancing of Popery, and suppression of the Protestant religion: That is the thing that all the evidence does drive at.

For Dugdale, for aught we can perceive, he hath been upon the matter a stranger to Oates and Bedlow; and I do not find, that he had any correspondence with, or knowledge of them, at the time he charges Mr. Harcourt and Mr. Gavan. And he charges them with the very self same things, viz. the consulting the death of the king, and advancement of popery: And they have several instances of the facts, as their several consultations; how they met together, and where, or at what place. And Dugdale tells you of a letter that he found; wherein Whitebread gave charge for the entertainment of good stout fellows; No matter for gentlemen, so they were resolute. And so they have several mediums to prove one and the same thing.

Mr. Fenwick says to all this, Here is nothing against us, but talking and swearing: But for that, he hath been told (if it were possible for him to learn) that all Testimony is but talking and swearing. For all things, all mans lives and fortunes, are determined by an oath; and an oath is by talking, by kissing the book, and calling God to witness to the truth of what is said. That is the essence of an oath, and those are the ceremonies: The kissing the book, and speaking, is the accidental form; the substance is, calling God to witness. Therefore what a vain thing is it in Mr. Fenwick to seem to triumph, by saying, There is nothing against us but talking and swearing. There is nothing against them, but evidence and proof of men upon oath: And their reasons, the truth is, are very trifles. They defend their lives as they do their religion, with weak arguments, and fallacious reasons.

For that long business, that Mr. Gavan hath undertaken to say against Mr. Oates, and what they all insist upon, viz. the number of their witnesses, which were sixteen, amounts to this, to disprove Mr. Oates that it could not be true what he says, That he should be present here at a consult, the 24th of April, because they have brought 16 from St. Omers to prove, That he was there all April and May.

It is very true now, if that be so, it is impossible Oates can swear any truth: but whether that is to be believed, or no, is the question. Methinks they did not do well for themselves, when they bid you remember the nature of the evidence. They did well enough to bid you remember the number: For the number is more than what Oates is backed with on the other side; but the nature is of much less weight: Not only because they are not upon their oaths, for by law they may not be upon their oaths (and that must not be charged on them as a defect, seeing they would swear, I doubt not, if they might;) but because their Testimony is really to be believed much alike without an oath, as with one; because they are of a religion that can dispense with oaths, though false, for the sake of a good cause.

But, seeing they desire the nature of the men may be considered, you are to observe, that they are proselytes, and young striplings of their church; which does indeed, in one respect or other, abuse all her disciples, and keeps them in a blind obedience; to pursue and effect all her commands.

If the doctrines of that church were better; if such which are allowed by their chief authors, were but less bloody and inhuman; if they had ever put those that are so, into an Index Expurgatorius, that they might have been publicly disowned, and declared as the particular opinions of some ill men, which they did disavow; these men might have been then more worthy to be regarded. But when none of their popes have done this (who must have very strange foreheads, if they say they have) and such doctrines are still owned, there is much indeed to be observed from the nature of the evidence, the nature of the men, and their profession.

I must confess, I believe that they would deny their principles to be bloody or to be defended and allowed by any of their best authors, if at this time the fear of apparent falsehood did not deter them; but if to murder kings, or to depose them and absolve their subjects from their allegiance, for the advancement of religion, be a thing most impious, and void of religion, and makes religion worse than none; which doctrine yet they have owned, and their councils have owned, and we have proved it upon them, and out of them; I cannot tell what to say to these men, or their testimony; the nature of whom they desire to be considered.

But they were young boys, sent for hither on purpose to give this testimony; and it was not, indeed, a fault in the prisoners, at the bar, to send for what evidence they could, for themselves: but it is very doubtful and suspicious, to have such green and flexible minds thus employed; and I must leave it to you, to consider how far these young men, trained in such principles, may be prevailed on to speak what is not true.

And now, if the king's evidence, after this, stood alone, it were yet something; but when you have Mr. Oates' testimony, as to this great matter of his appearing in April, confirmed by seven or eight witnesses, that speak so expressly to it, how will they answer it! do they make sir Richard Barker a person of no value? do they so little esteem the minister, that says I know him though he was in disguise; and went and said it presently to a woman that he knew was acquainted with Oates? and asking her, when she saw Mr. Oates? and she saying, not a great while; he said, I saw him later than you; and says, he did know him: and this is confirmed still by sir Richard Barker, who tells you, that his men told him that he had been there. What should make them to acquaint their master so, if it were not so? or do you think it a thing maliciously prepared or invented to take away the lives of these men, that his men should tell him a story so long ago? if it be not true, to what purpose should they tell him so? and if it be true, it confirms the matter sworn against them.

There is he that was his companion, the Schoolmaster, that says, in the beginning of May was twelvemonth, Mr. Oates dined with him at his house, sat with him four hours, discoursed of his travels into Spain and St. Omers, and there is the man that is a papist, if not a priest, that swears he saw him twice, about the middle of April, at Mr. Charles Howard's Lodgings in Arundel House; so that here are seven witnesses, direct or circumstantial, to prove Mr. Oates to have been in London, in April and May, 1678.

But say they, This is but talking and swearing. Very fine! And the St. Omers youths is talking but not swearing. Ay! But then their numbers are not so many. That, gentlemen, I leave to you, for both cannot be true. The Testimony of Mr. Oates and the witnesses that he had to back himself withal, and to prove himself to be here, is inconsistent with what the young men say, that he was at St. Omers.

Now, if you observe, all these mens defence is in the circumstantial part of the evidence, in watching and catching at what day, what hour, and what month? How Mr. Oates reckoned false, so and so: if he came here about the 20th of April, how could they see him the 1st of May; and they think then, they have got such a mighty victory; but it is not so weighty an argument with protestants, after all their conceit, that is unanswerable, for here is the point, The matter of time is a thing that no man can so precisely charge his memory with, as that it should be too strictly the measure of your judgments about truth or falshood, by the mistake of seven or eight days. Examine yourselves, how often every day you do mistake things that have been transacted half a year ago, and err in point of time, taking one week for another, and one month for another; and though I must say, it is considerable, yet too great weight is not to be laid upon that.

As for that they insist upon so much, the coming over of sir Thomas Preston and sir John Warner, with Mr. Oates; it is true, three or four witnesses speak as to Sir John Warner, and some to sir Thomas Preston; and they say, they were both beyond sea when Mr. Oates came over, but if the sixteen be not to be believed in the first matter and if Mr. Oates does say true, notwithstanding all their evidence, that he was here such a time in April and May, then I will tell you what inference may naturally be; to wit, That they cannot want a witness to prove what they please; for I believe there is none of them all will make any bones of it.

I say gentlemen, if you are satisfied in your consciences, that the evidence on Mr. Oates his part, to that point (that is to say, seven witnesses ought to prevail with you, to believe he was here in those months (notwithstanding the sixteen witnesses, who say they saw him every day beyond sea, in April and May), their other evidence about his coming over with Preston and Warner will have no great weight: because the other is the great matter, by which they make the substance of their defence.

I am glad indeed to see a gentleman here, whose face I never saw before, and that is Mr. Dugdale. Upon my word he hath escaped well, for I find little said against him, very little either as to the matter or the manner of his Evidence. They would have made reflection on him for his poverty, but I hope that they, whose religion is to vow poverty, will never insist on that for any great objection against any.

L. C. J. North. Your lordship hath forgot that he said he gave away 3 or 400 pounds to them.

L. C. J. But I will challenge all the papists in England, to satisfy any man that hears me this day of one piece of evidence, which will turn every protestant's heart against the papists. If so be they murdered sir Edmundsbury Godfrey, the plot even by that, is in a great measure proved upon them by that base murder. And what can be a plainer proof of it, than the evidence of this day, which Mr. Dugdale produces? We had notice, saith he, on Monday night, that on the Saturday before it, sir E. Godfrey was killed; (which falls out to be that very Saturday he was first missing;) which notice was given in a letter writ by Harcourt to Ewers, another priest, that same Saturday night, wherein were these words, 'This night sir E. Godfrey is dispatched;' and I am sure, if this be true, then no man can say, but they murdered him.

Whitebread. It is not alledged against any of us.

L. C. J. It is in evidence of the plot in general, and to Harcourt in particular.

Harcourt. He never shews the letter that he says I writ.

L. C. J. He says that he used to peruse the letters, and that Ewers had this again, after he had perused it; he says also he has received at times, a hundred letters from you, and this among the rest. Now the question is, Whether it be true, or no? To make it out, he produces Mr. Chetwyn, whom I hope you will not deny to be a gentleman of one of the best families of his country, and of honest reputation; who says, That on the Tuesday following that Saturday sir E. Godfrey was missed, he and another were talking together in Staffordshire, and that the other person asked him, if he knew of the death of any justice of the peace at Westminster; and when he told him, he had heard of no such thing; No; said he, that is strange, you living sometimes about Westminster; for, said he, The wench at the alehouse says, That this morning Mr. Dugdale said to two other gentlemen, there was a justice of peace at Westminster killed; and Mr. Dugdale swears, that was sir E. Godfrey. Now, if Dugdale be fit to be believed, that he saw such a letter, as he must be if he be not a very great prophet, to be able to foretel this; or if the maid that said this did not invent it (a thing then impossible to be done), or Mr. Chetwyn feigned that he heard the man make his report from the maid; this thing could not come to pass, but by these men. Nay, if Mr. Dugdale could not do as great a miracle as any are in the Popish Legends, how could he tell, that it was done on the same night when it was done at London? or speak of it on the Monday night after, when it was not known in London till the Thursday following? This will stick, I assure you, sirs, upon all your party.

For my own part, this evidence of Mr. Dugdale's gives me the greatest satisfaction of any thing in the world in this matter; and whilst we rest satisfied in the murder of that man, and are morally certain you must do it, knowing of what principles you are, you cannot blame us, if, upon such manifest reasons, we lay it upon you.

And this is occasional evidence, which I, for my part, never heard before this day; nor can I be more, or better satisfied, than I am upon this point, viz. the testimony that I have received this afternoon, concerning the murder of sir E. Godfrey. As to the defences they have made, they are exceptions in point of time, but do not affect Mr. Dugdale; for they have hardly the confidence to deny the things he says to be true against them.

They fall foul, indeed, upon Mr. Oates: He appears to have been their agent; and whilst so, bad enough: but if he had not had a mind to have become a good man, he would not likely have done us that good that he hath done, in discovering the design you had engaged him in. Let any man judge, by your principles and practices, what you will not do for the promoting of the same.

For while this gentleman's blood lies upon you (and some have been executed for it), it must be yet farther told you, that in what you did do, you have given us a specimen of what you would do. We have a testimony, that for promoting your cause, you would not stick at the Protestants blood. You began with sir E. Godfrey, but who knows where you would have made an end! It was this one man you killed in his person, but in effigy the whole nation. It was in one man's blood your hands are embred; but your souls were dypt in the blood of us all. This was a handful only of what was to follow; and so long as we are convinced you killed him, we cannot but believe you would also kill the king. We cannot but believe you would make all of us away that stand in the way of your religion: a religion which, according to what it is, you would bring in upon us; by a conversion of us with blood; and by a baptism with fire. God keep our land from the one, and our city from the other!

To return: The Letter that is found in Harcourt's papers, does further confirm Mr. Oates in all the great and considerable matters that he says; that there was a Plot; that that plot was called by the name of a Design, which was to be kept close and secret: and this is an evidence that cannot lie. For that letter will never be got off, no more than the other letter, that Mr. Dugdale speaks of about sir E. Godfrey.

And thus I leave it to you, gentlemen: You have heard how many witnesses they have had for them, about 24 or 25, of one sort or another. You have heard what they apply their testimony unto, to convict Mr. Oates of falsehood in matter of time; which was their principal defence: that he was not here in April and May, and that he came not over with sir Thomas Preston, and sir John Warner, and that Ireland was not here all August. You have heard what witnesses Oates is backed withal, as to the time of his being here: and the maid says, she saw Ireland here in August.

However, though their defence depends but upon a point of time, I must tell you, it ought to be well considered, for it is indeed very considerable towards their defence; and God forbid but we should be equal to all men.

And so I have remembered, as well as I can, in this long and perplexed Evidence, that which seems to me most material, as to their charge or discharge; and that which they have made their greatest defence by the youths from St. Omers, to disprove Mr. Oates his being here, and Mr. Ireland's not being in London in August, which in truth is not the proper business of this day, but hath received a former verdict before; for if so be the jury before had not been satisfied of the truth of that, they could never have found Ireland guilty. So I leave it to you upon the whole matter. I can remember nothing besides. Go together, and consider of your verdict, according to your evidence.

L. C. J. North. Gentlemen, my lord hath repeated it so fully to you, that I shall not need to add any thing to it.

Then an officer was sworn to keep the Jury, who withdrew; and the judges also went off from the bench, leaving Mr. Recorder, and a competent number of commissioners there, to take the verdict; and about the space of a quarter of an hour, the jury returned, and answered to their names, and gave in their verdict thus:

Cl. of the Cr. Gentlemen, are you all agreed of your verdict?

Omnes. Yes.

Cl. of the Cr. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Foreman.

Cl. of the Cr. Thomas White alias Whitebread, hold up thy hand. You of the jury, look upon the prisoner: How say you? Is he Guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. What goods or chattels?

Foreman. None, to our knowledge: [And so severally of the rest.]

Which verdict being recorded, in usual form, Mr. Recorder spoke to the Jury thus:

Gentlemen, you of the Jury, There hath been a long evidence given against the prisoners at the bar: they were all indicted, arraigned, fairly tried, and fully heard for high-treason, depending upon several circumstances. They can none of them pretend to say (and I take the liberty to take notice of it, for the satisfaction of them, and all that are here present, and all the world), that not a person among the prisoners at the bar were either wanting to themselves to offer, or the court to them to hear any thing that they could say for themselves. But upon a long evidence, a full discussing the objections made against it, and a patient hearing of the defence they made, they are found guilty: and I do think, that every honest man will say, that they are unexceptionably found so; and that it is a just verdict you have given.

And then the Prisoners were carried back to Newgate,* and the court adjourned till eight next morning: when the court proceeded to the Trial of Richard Langhorn.

* See the Account of their Sentence and Execution at the end of the next Case.

252. The Trial of RICHARD LANGHORN, esq. at the Old Bailey, for High Treason: 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679.*

UPON Saturday the 14th of June, 1679, at the Sessions-house in the Old-Bailey, London, the Court, according to their adjournment the preceding day, met, and proceeded to the trial of Richard Langhorn, esq. in this manner:

Cl. of the Cr. Set Richard Langhorn to the bar. Richard Langhorn, hold up thy hand: (Which he did.) Thou standest indicted in London by the name of Richard Langhorn, late of London, esq.

“For that you Richard Langhorn the elder, as a false traitor of the most illustrious, serene, and excellent prince, Charles the second, by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, your supreme and natural lord, not having the fear of God in your heart, nor weighing the duty of your allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, the cordial love, and true, due, and natural obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, towards him do and ought to bear, altogether withdrawing, and deviating, and with all your strength, intending the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom to disturb, and the true worship of God within this kingdom used, and by law established, to overthrow, and sedition and rebellion within this kingdom to stir up and procure, and the true love, duty and obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said lord the king, towards him, do, and of right ought to bear, to withdraw, relinquish, and extinguish; on the 30th day of September, in the 30th year of his majesty's reign, at London, in the parish of St. Dunstan's in the West, in the ward of Farringdon without, London, aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, subtilly, and traitorously, with many other false traitors of our sovereign lord the king unknown, did purpose, compass, imagine, intend, consult and agree, to stir up sedition and rebellion within this kingdom of England, against our said sovereign lord the king, and a miserable slaughter amongst the subjects of our said lord the king, of his kingdoms of England, to procure and cause, and our said sovereign lord the king, from his kingly state, title, power, and government of his kingdom of England, totally to deprive, depose, and disinherit, and our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to bring and put, and the government of this kingdom to subvert and change, and the true worship of God in this kingdom by law established and used to alter, and the state of this kingdom in all the parts thereof well instituted, totally to subvert and destroy, and war within this kingdom of England to procure and levy, and the same most wicked treasons, traitorous imaginations, purposes, compassings, and agreements aforesaid, and to perfect and fulfil: you the said Richard Langhorn afterwards, to wit, the 30th day of September, in the 30th year aforesaid, and divers other times before, at London, &c. falsely, advisedly, maliciously, subtilly, and traitorously, did compass, contrive, and write two letters, to be sent to certain persons unknown at Rome, and at St. Omers, in parts beyond the seas, to procure the adherence, aid and assistance of the pope, and of the French king, and others, to you the said Richard Langhorn, and other false traitors unknown, the true worship of God within this kingdom of England, by law established and used, to the superstition of the Church of Rome to alter, and the government of this kingdom of England to subvert, and our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to bring and put; and that you the said Richard Langhorn, in further prosecution of the said treason, traitorous imaginations, intentions, and agreements aforesaid, on the day and year aforesaid, and the said other days and times before at London, &c. did compass, contrive, and write, two other Letters to be sent to Rome, in parts beyond the seas, to one Christopher Anderton, then rector at the English college at Rome aforesaid, and two other letters to be sent to St. Omers, in parts beyond the seas, to diverse persons unknown there residing, and by the said respective letters traitorously you did advise the said pope, and Christopher Anderton, and other persons unknown residing beyond the seas, of the ways and manner to be taken for accomplishing the said most wicked treasons, for altering the true worship of God in this kingdom established and used, to the superstition of the Church of Rome, and for subverting the government of this kingdom, and for the death and destruction of our said lord the king, and to the intent that the said Christopher Anderton, and others unknown, should give their aid, assistance, and adherence, and should procure other aid, assistance, and adherence, to you the said Richard Langhorn, and other false traitors unknown, to alter the true worship of God aforesaid, to the superstition of the Church of Rome, and to subvert the government of this kingdom of England, and to put our said sovereign lord the king to death; and that you the said Richard Langhorn afterwards, to wit, the day and year aforesaid, at London, &c. traitorously did deliver the letters aforesaid, to be sent to the said Christopher Anderton, and others, persons beyond the seas, to perfect the traitorous purposes aforesaid; and that you the said Richard Langhorn, further to fulfil and accomplish the same most wicked treasons, traitorous purposes, and the same most wicked treasons, traitorous imaginations, purposes, and compassings aforesaid, afterwards the said 30th day of September, in the 30th year aforesaid, at London, &c. five commissions in writing, made by authority derived from the See of Rome, for constituting military officers, for leading the forces to be levied in this kingdom against our said sovereign lord the king, for the altering the Protestant reformed religion to the use and superstition of the Church of Rome, and for subverting the government of this kingdom of England traitorously you did receive, and five other commissions in writing, made by authority derived from the See of Rome, for constituting civil officers for governing this kingdom after the most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations, purposes and compassings aforesaid were fulfilled and accomplished, then and there traitorously you did receive. And that you the said Langhorn, afterwards, to wit, the day and year aforesaid, at London, &c. the said several commissions so received, to divers false traitors of our sovereign lord the king unknown, falsely, knowingly, and traitorously, did distribute, give and dispose for constituting officers, as well military as civil to the traitorous purposes aforesaid. And that you the said Richard Langhorn, afterwards, on the day and year aforesaid, at London, &c. a commission to constitute and authorize you to be advocate-general of the army, to be levied in this kingdom, to war against our said sovereign lord the king, falsely, traitorously, and against the duty of your allegiance, from a certain person unknown, did receive and had; and the same commission then and there falsely, advisedly, and traitorously, did inspect and read, and in your custody keep; and to the same commission traitorously did give your consent, to the intent that you the said Richard Langhorn should have and execute the place and office of advocate-general of the army aforesaid, after the army aforesaid should be raised against our said sovereign lord the king, by you the said Richard Langhorn, and other false traitors unknown, in execution of the said traitorous compassings, imaginations, and agreements aforesaid. And that whereas William Ireland, John Grove, and Thomas Pickering, and other false traitors of our sovereign lord the king unknown, on the 24th day of April, in the 30th year aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex, did consult to bring and put our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction, and to change and alter religion in this kingdom of England, rightly and by law established to the superstition of the Church of Rome, at London, &c. had notice of that consultation; and the same consultation for the destruction of the king, and for the alteration of religion in this kingdom, rightly established, to the superstition of the Church of Rome, and the reasonable agreements had in that consultation, on the said 30th day of September, in the 30th year aforesaid, from our said sovereign lord the king, advisedly and traitorously did conceal, and to that consultation traitorously you did consent. And the said William Ireland, John Grove, and Thomas Pickering, on the day and year last aforesaid, at London, the treasons aforesaid to perpetrate and perfect, maliciously, subtilly, and traitorously, you did abet, counsel, maintain, and comfort. And that you the said Richard Langhorn, afterwards, to wit, the said 30th day of September, in the 30th year aforesaid, at London, &c. falsely, subtilly, and traitorously, you did move and solicit the Benedictine monks (unknown) to expend and pay the sum of 6,000*l.* to procure a person traitorously to kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king. And whereas Edward Coleman, and other false traitors of our said sovereign lord the king unknown, on the 29th of September, in the 30th year aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex, traitorously had conspired and consulted to procure rebellion and sedition, within this kingdom of England, against our said sovereign lord the king, and him from his kingly state and government of this his kingdom of England to deprive and disinherit, and to bring and put him to final death and destruction, and the government of this kingdom of England to alter, and the true religion in this kingdom of England, by law established, to alter and change. And whereas he the said Edward Coleman had traitorously written four letters to M. la Chaise, then counsellor of the French king, to procure the aid, assistance, and adherence of the French king, to perfect and accomplish the traitorous imaginations aforesaid, you the said Richard Langhorn afterwards, to wit, the said 30th day of September, in the 30th year aforesaid, at London, &c. well knowing the treasonable matters in the same letters contained, to the same letters did consent, and then and there falsely, subtilly, advisedly, maliciously, and traitorously, did abet, counsel, maintain, and comfort the said Edward Coleman, to perpetuate and accomplish the treason aforesaid, against the duty of your allegiance, against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in this case made and provided."

Cl. of the Cr. How sayest thou, Richard Langhorn, art thou guilty of this High-treason whereof thou standest indicted, or Not Guilty?

Langhorn. Not Guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. Colprit how wilt thou be tried?

Langhorn. By God and my country.

Cl. of the Cr. God send thee a good deliverance.

Then the Petty Jury impannelled for this Trial was called, the prisoner put to his challenges, but challenging none, the twelve sworn were these: Arthur Yong, Edward Beeker, Robert Twyford, William Yapp, John Kirkman, Peter Pickering, Thomas Bama, Francis Neeve, John Hall, George Sitwell, James Wood and Richard Cowtherne.

After which, Proclamation for information was made in the usual manner.

Cl. of the Cr. Richard Langhorn, hold up thy hand [Which he did]. You of the jury look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause: He stands indicted in London by the name of Richard Langhorn, late of London, esq. for that as a false traitor, &c. [put in the Indictment mutatis mutandis] and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided. Upon this Indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty; your charge is to enquire whether he be guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty. If you find him guilty, then you are to enquire what goods or chattels, lands or tenements, he had at the time of the High Treason committed, or at any time since. If you find him Not Guilty, you shall enquire whether he fled for it. If you find that he fled for it, you are to enquire of his goods and chattels, as if you had found him guilty. If you find him Not Guilty, nor that he did fly for it, say so and no more, and hear your evidence.

Then Roger Belwood, esq. of counsel for the king in this cause, opened the Indictment thus:

May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; The prisoner at the bar, Mr. Langhorn, stands indicted of High-Treason, and it is for conspiring, the murder of the king and endeavouring an alteration in the government in church and state. And the Indictment sets forth, that the 30th of August, in the 30th year of the king, he and other false traitors did agree to stir up sedition and rebellion in the kingdom, and to cause a great slaughter of his majesty's subjects; to introduce the superstition of the church of Rome, and depose and murder the king, and to alter the government in church and state. And it is there said, that to accomplish these evil designs he writ two letters to be sent to Rome and St. Omers; the effect of which letters was, to procure the assistance of the Pope and the French king, to alter the religion established by law in this kingdom to Romish superstition, to subvert the government, and to put the king to death; and that in further prosecution of these traitorous designs he writ two other letters to be sent to Rome, to one Christopher Anderton, rector of the English college, and a Jesuit; and two others to be sent to St. Omers; and in these letters he took upon him to advise the way and means by which these treasons might be effected, and that these several letters were sent and delivered by him, and received. The Indictment further sets forth, that in further prosecution of these traitorous imaginations of his, he did receive five several commissions in writing, by authority derived from the see of Rome; and those were for the making of military officers, to execute these treasons by force of arms, and that he did likewise receive five other commissions for constituting civil officers in this realm, after the treason was committed. And that amongst the rest he did receive for himself one commission to be Advocate General of the army that was to be raised. And the Indictment further charges upon the prisoner, that to accomplish these treasons, whereas Ireland, Pickering and Grove, and other false traitors, had consulted these treasons, which I before mentioned, Mr. Langhorn had notice of the treasons, and did consent to them, and abet them, and that he did solicit the Benedictine monks to advance 6,000*l.* for the murder of the king, for the alteration of religion, and for the subversion of the government in church and state. And further, whereas Mr. Coleman (who was executed for treason) had (with others) conspired the death of the king, and the introducing of popery, and had writ a letter to the French Confessor La Chaise, for aid and assistance, that the prisoner at the bar had notice of this, and that he did consent to it, and did abet it. This, gentlemen, is charged to be traitorously and devilishly done against the prisoner's allegiance, and the form of the statute. To this he hath pleaded Not Guilty; but if we prove these treasons, or any of them, you are to find him Guilty.

Then Sir Creswell Levinz, one of his Majesty's Learned Counsel in the law, opened the Charge thus:

May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; Mr. Langhorn is indicted for treason, for having a part in that general treason that you have heard several times before of, and some persons there were indicted, tried, and convicted yesterday, for that treason that Mr. Langhorn had an hand in: for the Indictment does set forth, that there were letters written by him to Rome to the same purpose, of which gentlemen you have heard so often, and will hear again.

This Treason was no less than to murder the king, to alter the religion, to overturn the law, to raise an army by force to effect all this, and in short to do all the mischief that men (if it be lawful to call such creatures men) could do. That there was, in order to this, a consultation held the 24th of April among the jesuits; and there it was resolved that the king should be killed, there were persons appointed to do it, that was Pickering and Grove, but they failed therein, and they prosecuted it at Windsor; but happening to fail, there also they followed him to Newmarket, and ordered that it should be done there: And when all this failed, they took another course, his majesty was to be poisoned; and as I said before, to make all this good, an army was to be raised of 50,000 men in England, to perfect this work; but if that would not do, they were to have forces from beyond sea to join with them: and Mr. Langhorn be writ letters to procure these forces, and he not only did so, but he found the effect of his letters, and received commissions from beyond sea, whereof one was for himself, to be Advocate-General of the army. All these things are laid to Mr. Langhorn's charge. But I will begin first, and shew you, before I come to the particular evidence against Mr. Langhorn, some evidence of the general Design; and therefore we will call some witnesses to do that in the first place, and then bring it down to Mr. Langhorn himself.—Call Mr. Dugdale and Mr. Praunce. (Who were both sworn, and Mr. Dugdale first stood up.) Come, Sir, what do you know of any design to murder the king? Speak what you know concerning the plot and conspiracy.

Dugdale. I was in several consultations for alteration of this present government, and for the introducing of popery, and for the murder of the king. I was a person in most of the consultations to the same purpose, and heard the very words used, and was hired to be instrumental in it, and was to have a sum of money to be one of them that should do it. I was to be an actor in it, and was to have a place appointed to do it.

Just Atkins. What were you hired to do?

Dugdale. I was to kill the king.

Sir Cr. Levinz. And who were the persons that put you upon it?

Dugdale. There was Mr. Ewers, Mr. Gavan, Mr. Luson, and Mr. Vavasor.

Sir Cr. Levinz. What were these men?

Dugdale. They are all jesuits.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Do you know of any army that was to be raised to effect it?

Dugdale. They always did speak of an army that was to be raised, but it was not actually to be done till the king was killed; that was the last conclusion: It was indeed first concluded on to raise an army, but the last consultation was, that there should no arms appear till the king was killed.

Sir Cr. Levinz. You do not know any thing of Mr. Langhorn in particular, do you?

Dugdale. No, I do not know any thing particular, I have heard of him.

L. C. J. North. Why, you brought him only to prove the general design.

Dugdale. There was a massacre to be, and then there should be an army, a pretty good considerable army, there was no certain number that I could hear of; but those that did escape the massacre should be cut off by the army.

L. C. J. North. Where were these consultations?

Dugdale. One was at Tixall, another was at Boscobel, at my lord Aston's, and Mr. Gerard's.

L. C. J. North. Where were these places?

Dugdale. In Staffordshire.

Just Atkins. Pray, who were to be massacred in the first place?

Dugdale. All protestants, and those we could not be sure to be papists.

Mr. Belwood. Pray, Sir, what do you know of any letter to be writ to Mr. Ewers, concerning sir Edmundbury Godfrey's death?

Dugdale. I do remember a letter that came to Mr. Ewers, from Mr. Harcourt, which did express, and begin thus, 'This very night sir Edmundbury Godfrey is dispatched'; with some other words of like import; and then I sent to

Mr. Ewers about it: and do you think this will carry on the design? I will be hanged if it don't spoil it: No, said he, he was a person that used to be very severe against debauched lewd persons, and so it will be laid, as if they had done it out of revenge.

L. C. J. North. What day of the week was that letter dated.

Dugdale. It was, as I can very well make it out, on Saturday.

L. C. J. North. And when was it received?

Dugdale. It was received on Monday night.

L. C. J. North. What were the contents of it, do you say?

Dugdale. It began thus, 'This very night sir Edmundbury Godfrey is dispatched.'

L. C. J. North. Who did it come from?

Dugdale. It came from Mr. Harcourt.

Sir Cr. Levins. They themselves know that he was not found here in London, till Thursday.

Dugdale. I could not hold, it run so much in my mind, but the next morning going to an ale-house hard by, I there spoke of it, and immediately it was carried to Mr. Chetwin, and he was here yesterday to make it out, that I so did.

L. C. J. North. But why did they kill him? Was it expressed why?

Dugdale. I had several times heard he was too much privy to their consultations.

L. C. J. North. That is, you mean, he had too much discovered to him.

Dugdale. And so they were afraid of Mr. Coleman too, that he carried things too high; and he was out of their favour for two years.

Sir Cr. Levins. Then call Mr. Praunce; Pray sir, what can you say?

Praunce. There was one Mr. Messenger, a gentleman of the horse to my lord Arundel of Wardour, who was employed by my lord and my lord Powis, and he was to kill the king, and to have a very good reward for the doing of it; And I was told so by my lord Butler: I afterwards met with this Messenger, and asked him what his reason was that he would kill the king. He told me, he was off of it now.

Sir Cr. Levins. But what was to be done after they should kill the king?

Praunce. Presently there should be an army of 50,000 men raised, to be governed by my lord Arundel, and my lord Powis, and them: I have heard Mr. Fenwick, and Mr. Ireland, and Grove, to speak of this at the same time together.

Sir Cr. Levins. What was that army to be raised for?

Praunce. To settle the catholic religion.

L. C. J. North. What was to become of other persons?

Praunce. They were to be killed and ruined all: So Fenwick told me.

L. C. J. North. Look you, Mr. Langhorn, these witnesses speak nothing to you in particular, but only that there was a conspiracy in general, to kill the king, and introduce popery: If you will ask them any question, you may.

Langhorn. No my lord, they not accusing me, I have nothing to say to them.

Praunce. I heard one Mr. Harcourt say, that the king was to be killed by several, before one Mr. Thompson, twice in his own chamber in Duke street. And I heard Fenwick say that Mr. Langhorn was to have a great hand in it.

Langhorn. Is that all you have to say as to me?

Praunce. It is all I know of.

Then the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs came in.

Sir Cr. Levins. Now, my lord, we will call the evidence, that shall prove the particular matters of the indictment, as of writing the letters beyond sea, of his receiving commissions, of his distributing them here to the several persons to whom they were directed; of his soliciting for the money, the 6000*l.* to be raised by the Benedictine monks, which was either for a particular purpose to poison the king, or to carry on the design in general. And first we call Dr. Oates. Who was sworn, and stood up.

Sir Cr. Levins. Sir, you hear what the matter is, as to Mr. Langhorn, be pleased to tell the court, whether you knew he writ any letters, and received any commissions; speak your whole knowledge.

Oates. I hope your lordship will be pleased to give me leave to use my own method.

L. C. J. Ay, ay, take your own way, Mr. Oates.

Oates. Then I begin thus; In April 1677, I went into the kingdom of Spain: In September following, the sons of Mr. Langhorn came into the kingdom of Spain: It was September, or sooner, but I will not be positive as to the time of their coming; the one was a scholar of the English college at Madrid, the other was a scholar of the English college at Valladolid. They came there to study philosophy, in order to their receiving of the priesthood. My lord, my occasions called me into England, in November following; and coming into England, Mr. Langhorn's sons did give me some letters to Mr. Langhorn their father; and as soon as I had rested myself for a day or two, after my journey, I came to Mr. Langhorn's house in Sheer-lane. Now Mr. Langhorn's wife, being a zealous protestant, I did whisper his foot-boy, or his servant-boy, in the ear, that he should go and whisper his master, Mr. Langhorn, and tell him there was one would speak with him from his sons. Mr. Langhorn, by his son, did desire me, to meet him at his chamber in the Temple, (in the Inner Temple-lane, it was I think) I know the chamber, however; and accordingly I did meet Mr. Langhorn that night, by the means of his half-brother, who is brother, I think, by the mother, and not by the father, his name is Smithson; and when I came into Mr. Langhorn's chamber, their chambers being directly opposite one to another, I was treated by Mr. Langhorn with a great deal of civility, and I delivered Mr. Langhorn the letters from his sons, and I told him, that I thought his sons would enter into the society: Mr. Langhorn was mightily pleased with the news, being himself a great votary for the society, that his sons would enter into it. Now, may it please your lordship, Mr. Langhorn did say, He thought if they did continue in the world, that is secular priests, they would suddenly have very great promotion in England; for he said, Things would not last long in this posture; that is, at that time he then spoke; I speak the words now, that he said then. And now, my lord, I was with Mr. Langhorn another time, while I was in England; but in the latter end of November, O. S., in the beginning of December N. S., I went to St. Omers, and there were letters that he delivered me (looking upon the Prisoner,) a packet to carry to St. Omers. And when the packet was opened, there was a letter signed 'Richard Langhorn,' in which he gave the Fathers at St. Omers great thanks, for the great care had of, and kindness they shewed to, his Sons, and that what they had been out of pocket for their Viaticum, in order to their journey into Spain, which was 20*l.* he promised them they should be repaid it; and in this letter he did expressly say, that he had written to Father La Chaise in order to our concerns; those were his words. Now, my lord, the letter that he writ to Father La Chaise I saw not, but only this letter I saw, which gave an account of that letter he had writ to Father La Chaise; and he said Mr. Coleman had been very large with him, and therefore it would not be necessary for him to trouble his reverence with any large epistles at that time. My lord, there was another letter, and I think that was in the month of March or April, I cannot be positive as to the particular time, but it was upon this remarkable circumstance: Mr. Langhorn had a son that had been in Rebellion, and had turned soldier, or some such thing in France, and this young gentleman came to St. Omers, being the place where he had been educated; and Mr. Langhorn, by the intercession of the Fathers there, did order him 5*l.*, to bring him over into England, upon promise of his son's submission, who had been very extravagant in several respects. In this letter, my lord, Mr. Langhorn did express his great care for the carrying on of the design of the Catholics, and several other expressions there were in it bad enough, which I cannot now call to mind, but they were to this effect: The parliament began to flag in promoting the protestant religion, and now they had a fair opportunity to begin and give the blow; what that blow was, I leave to the court and to the jury to expound.

L. C. J. But was that an expression in the letter?

Oates. It was, my lord: But it was a very large letter, I cannot give a particular account of every thing in it. My lord, in the month of April, or the beginning of May, your lordship remembers there was a consult that hath been sworn here in this Court, to which consult—

L. C. J. Pray speak it out.

Oates. There were several of us came over from St. Omers, and from other parts beyond the seas, to this consult, at which consult Mr. Langhorn was not present; but I had orders from the provincial, to give Mr. Langhorn an account of what Resolutions, and Passages, and Minutes passed at this consult; and thus I did as well as I could, and when I did so, Mr. Langhorn lift up his hands and his eyes, and prayed to God to give it good success. My lord, while I was at Mr. Langhorn's chamber, giving this account, I saw several parchments lying upon the table in his study.

L. C. J. You had best tell the effect of the account you gave Mr. Langhorn in his chamber, that you speak of.

Oates. My lord, I told him who went procurator to Rome, that was one Father Cary, I told him what was the resolve of the consult concerning the death of the king.

L. C. J. Did you so?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I did: I told Mr. Langhorn that several of the Fathers were to be admonished for their irregular living, as they termed it: And to this Mr. Langhorn did reply, as near as I can remember, that he found some of them did not live up to the rules of the Society.

L. C. J. Pray tell us more particularly, what you told him. And tell us as near as you can, as you told it him then, the business of the Plot upon the king.

Oates. I told him the Resolve of the Society, and of that consult, and what was that which was resolved, that Pickering and Grove should go on to attempt to assassinate the king's person, and what was to be their reward; the one was to have, that is Grove, 1,500*l.* and the other, that is Pickering, was to have 30,000 Musses: He lift up his hands and eyes when I told him this (and I told him more particularly than I can now remember), and he lift up his hands and eyes, and prayed God that it might have good success.

L. C. J. Did you tell him they had signed to this agreement?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I told him that they had all signed it.

Langhorn. When was this?

Oates. It was the latter end of April, or beginning of May.

Langhorn. How long after they had signed the consult?

Oates. A day or two after.

Langhorn. Dr. Oates, Do you know the day of the month? You have asserted the day of the month formerly, pray do it now.

Just. Pemberton. Let him go on, you shall ask him what questions you will, by and by.

Oates. My lord, I saw there a commission for my lord Arundel of Wardour, and another to my lord Powis; the one was to be Lord High Chancellor, and the other to be Lord High Treasurer; there was a commission for my lord Bellasis, to be General, another for my lord Petre, to be Lieutenant General; and there were other commissions, of which I cannot remember the particular names; but there was a commission for Coleman to be Secretary of State, and there was a commission for the prisoner at the bar to be Advocate of the army.

L. C. J. By what authority were those commissions?

Oates. They were by authority derived from the see of Rome, by virtue of a Breve from the Pope, directed to the General of the Society, and they were signed IXZ, and with the mark of the cross through the IHS, and they were signed "Johannes Paulus de Oliva."

L. C. J. North. That is the Jesuits' mark?

Oates. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. North. Where did you see those commissions?

Oates. In Mr. Langhorn's study of his chamber in the Temple.

L. C. J. Where? Did they lie open, that any one might see them?

Oates. They lay upon the corner of his desk, folded up.

L. C. J. How came you to see them?

Oates. My lord, if your lordship please, I will tell your lordship how I came to see them. We had notice they were come by a letter from one Father Anderton, and he called these commissions patents, and, if it please your lordship, I did ask Mr. Langhorn, whether he had received them? He told me, Yes: Then I asked him, whether he would do me the favour to let me see them? And because I had been privy to the Consults, and came to wait upon him by order of the provincial, he did let me see them.

L. C. J. And you saw them in his study, upon his desk?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I did. And particularly one more I can tell of, which his son was to deliver to a son of my lord Arundel of Wardour.

L. C. J. How many commissions were there?

Oates. I cannot say, about 7 or 8, I think, I did see, and looked over.

Justice Atkins. And you knew what they were?

Oates. Yes, for those that I saw, that I can remember.

L. C. J. What was my lord Powis to be?

Oates. Lord High Treasurer.

L. C. J. And what my lord Arundel?

Oates. Lord High Chancellor of England.

L. C. J. And what my lord Stafford?

Oates. As to my lord Stafford, I cannot give so good an account; but as I remember, he was to be a paymaster in the army, or some such office relating to the army.

L. C. J. North. What was the prisoner at the bar to be?

Oates. A Judge in the army, or an Advocate General, so they called him.

L. C. J. You saw most of these?

Oates. I saw several of them, most of them in his custody, I cannot say all: There was more than for these lords, for other inferior officers.

L. C. J. How many might there be of them, as near as you can guess?

Oates. I think he told me they were about fifty.

L. C. J. What number did you see?

Oates. I saw about half a dozen or eight.

L. C. J. Well, Sir, go on.

Oates. My lord, I am now to speak to your lordship concerning some letters that he wrote to Rome, and there was—

L. C. J. Had you any discourse with him concerning the matters of any of the commissions of my lord Bellasis and my lord Powis?

Oates. No, my lord; I had but little skill in military affairs, and therefore I said but little, and I cannot give you an account, word for word, what the discourse was, for it was out of my way. My lord; there were several letters which Mr. Langhorn writ to Father La Chaise, the answers to which I saw in April and May; whereupon the Fathers did desire they might have the originals of those copies: He gave me the originals to carry to the Fathers, I think it was that very day I had been with him in the afternoon; for I was with him in the morning; the Fathers did read the letters.

L. C. J. From whom came they?

Oates. From Father La Chaise, and from Father Anderton. And La Chaise, in his letter, did assure him of his stedfastness and constancy, to assist the Society for the carrying on the cause: and that they should not need doubt, but the French king would stand by them, or to that purpose. I cannot remember exactly the words, but it was to that effect.

L. C. J. But they were directed to Mr. Langhorn?

Oates. I cannot swear that directly, but he gave them me.

L. C. J. Who were La Chaise and Anderton?

Oates. The one was confessor to the French king, and the other rector of the College at Rome.

Justice Atkins. But you saw those in the prisoner's custody, you say?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. C. J. He gave them you to deliver to the Fathers, to Whitebread and the rest of them?

Oates. Yes, my lord, but I cannot say who they were directed to.

L. C. J. But pray repeat what was the substance of that letter.

Oates. My lord, as to the words of them, I dare not charge my memory; but it was to this purpose, that La Chaise would stand by the English Society, and assist them, and that they should not need to doubt the French king, or to that effect.

Mr. Belwood. Do you remember any letters that were writ by Mr. Coleman to La Chaise?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I remember several letters that Coleman writ, but Mr. Langhorn was not affected in them.

Mr. Belwood. Did he know of them?

Oates. He gave an account in his letter to the Society, That Coleman had writ letters to La Chaise, and was very large, and therefore he should not trouble his reverence with any long epistles.

Sir Cr. Levins. What do you know of any money that was to be raised by the Benedictine monks?

Oates. I had forgot that.

L. C. J. You say, that he said, they should not need to doubt the French, but he would stand by them with men and money: For what purpose, pray?

Oates. I'll tell you for what purpose it was: the words of the letter did alledge it to be for carrying on of the cause.

Justice Pemberton. You mean the Catholic cause?

Oates. So it was generally understood.

L. C. J. But for the other money, what say you?

Oates. Mr. Langhorn was employed as solicitor for the Jesuits, and did accompany some of the Society, Father Harcourt, Father Fenwick, Father Kaines and Father Langworth, and they went and did communicate the secret to the Benedictine monks, desiring them to stand by them with a sum of money for the carrying on the design: Now, upon Mr. Langhorn's soliciting them, and appearing for them, as I have heard, 6,000*l.* was promised and paid.

L. C. J. By whom promised and paid?

Oates. By the Benedictine monks.

L. C. J. To whom?—Oates. To the Society.

L. C. J. To what person?

Oates. That I cannot say; but it was said, Mr. Langhorn was to receive it.

L. C. J. Did you see the money paid?

Oates. No, I did not.

L. C. J. Did you hear Mr. Langhorn confess it was paid?

Oates. Mr. Langhorn did say in the month of July or August, I cannot be positive which, but thereabouts, when he was spoke to about it, that he would stir in it, and do the utmost of his power for the procuring of it. And another thing, I am sure Mr. Langhorn was very much disgusted, that sir George Wakeman was not contented with the 10,000*l.*

Sir Cr. Levins. What was the 6,000*l.* for?

Oates. It was for the general cause.

Sir Cr. Levins. For the murder of the king?

Oates. Yes, and the alteration of religion.

L. C. J. North. How did it appear that Mr. Langhorn was disgusted, that sir George Wakeman would not take the 10,000*l.*? and what was it for?

Oates. It was to poison the king. And he said, He was a covetous man; that was in a public concern; and that, being it was to carry on the cause, it was no matter if he did it for nothing: But he said he was a narrow-spirited, and a narrow-souled physician.

L. C. J. When was it that he said he would stir for the money?

Oates. It was in July, or in August.

Langhorn. My lord, may I ask him any question?

Justice Pemberton. Yes, yes, Mr. Langhorn, you may.

L. C. J. North. Pray, Mr. Oates, you saw such and such commissions from the superior of the Jesuits, that were signed 'Johannes Paulus de Oliva'; pray will you look upon this, and see whether you know it? [And a writing under the Jesuits seal was shewed him.]

Oates. This is the hand, the very hand, that was to the others, and they had put such a seal; and that is for Mr. Stapleton to be rector of St. Omers.

Sir Cr. Levins. Now, my lord, if you please, this was not one of those commissions that Mr. Langhorn did distribute to the persons that were to have them; no, he would let us have none of those; but is a commission of another nature, it is neither for an office civil or military, but ecclesiastical, and yet it is under the same hand and seal.

Langhorn. You say you came to me, the first time, in November; and you went to St. Omers, when, sir?

Oates. The latter end of November.

Langhorn. When arrived you at St. Omers?

Oates. I think it was the 10th December New Stile, I will not be positive.

L. C. J. All their defence lies in catches upon a point of time, in which no man living is able to be positive.

Oates. My lord, if the 26th of November fell upon a Monday, then it was on the 26th day that I set out for Dover in the coach, as near as I can remember, and I got to St. Omers a Friday morning following.

Langhorn. A Friday after, you say, you got to St. Omers?

Oates. About that time.

Langhorn. How long did you stay there?

Oates. Till April following I staid.

Langhorn. Without any moving from thence?

Oates. I only went to Paris, and after that, a night or two at Watton, and then came away in April. My lord, I desire, if your lordship pleases, that Mr. Langhorn may ask the court, and the court ask me; for I know the court will be so kind as to ask me such questions as are reasonable and proper for me to answer.

Justice Atkins. That indeed is the regular way, for prisoners should not ask the questions, but the court.

Langhorn. Very well, I shall observe the method, if your lordship please. I desire to know what time in April he came back for England.

Oates. I came about the middle of April, or latter end, I will not be so positive in that, and I was in England under twenty days.

Langhorn. Can you tell what day you came into England?

Oates. No, I cannot exactly, but I came in April, the middle or the latter end.

Langhorn. I desire to know who came with him?

Oates. My lord, there came a matter of nine or ten of us in all.

L. C. J. Name them.

Oates. There was Father Williams, and Father March, the rector of Liege, and sir John Warner.

Langhorn. What is the rector of Liege's name?

Oates. Warren, I think; I cannot tell names so exactly.

Langhorn. Go on, Sir, pray.

Oates. I cannot name any more.

Langhorn. You have named them all in the records of the Lords' House.

Oates. It is like I have. I refer you to that.

Langhorn. Did sir Thomas Preston come over with you?

Oates. Yes, he did.

Langhorn. Did Poole come over with you?

Oates. Yes.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Langhorn, we had all this matter spoken of yesterday, and there were witnesses that prove that sir John Warner and sir Thomas Preston were there.

Langhorn. I humbly conceive, that was upon an issue tried in another county, by another jury, and therefore I hope I do not amiss in urging what I can say for myself to this jury.

L. C. J. You are not debarred, I only told you of it. Was sir Robert Brett there?

Oates. Yes, I think he was, I am not confident of that. My lord, I own what Mr. Langhorn can bring to the Court upon record.

Langhorn. I only ask it, because he says so in the House of Lords.

Oates. If you can shew the record of what I said there, do.

Langhorn. I do not desire him to name them now, but to know whether he does now affirm the truth of what he swore in the House of Lords.

L. C. J. If you can produce, as you may, if you have been diligent, a copy of the record in the House of Lords, and have it sworn to be a true copy of the records, it will be evidence for you, and shall be read; but to put him to remember a record without book, must not be, it would be hard for him to undertake that.

Langhorn. I desire to know how he came from Dover; whether in a coach, or on horseback, to London?

Oates. Indeed the question is so sudden, that I cannot be positive, but as near as I remember, I came by coach.

Langhorn. I will give my reason why I ask this; because he hath formerly, upon a trial in the King's Bench, affirmed he came by coach, in the company of Mr. Hilsley.

Oates. No, I did never say so; but I came over in the packet-boat, in the company of Mr. Hilsley; but when we were come over, Mr. Hilsley went out of the way from us.

Langhorn. I desire to know where he lodged, when he came to town?

L. C. J. Where did you lodge the first night?

Oates. I did lie at Mr. Grove's house, when I came to London in April.

VOL. VII.

L. C. J. But the first night when you came from Dover, when you came into London in April?

Oates. My lord, I cannot say I lay there the first night; but my lodging was provided for me there.

L. C. J. You are to answer as well as you can; if you cannot remember it, say so. Do you say the first absolutely, or not?

Oates. My lord, I cannot remember the first night, but I lay several nights at Mr. Grove's.

Langhorn. Then I ask whether he did generally lie there during his stay.

Oates. I did lie there some nights.

L. C. J. How many times did you lie there?

Oates. I believe three or four nights. I won't be positive as to the number.

Langhorn. What day was the consult?

Oates. It was the 24th of April.

Langhorn. What day did you acquaint me with it?—Oates. A day or two after.

Langhorn. When did he return back to St. Omers?

L. C. J. When did you go back? about what time?

Oates. My lord, I think it was a week in May, I cannot be positive, but I think that was the outside.

L. C. J. They said, yesterday you affirmed you stayed but six days.

Oates. I do not say so, but I say under 30.

Mr. Justice Dolben. Come, have you any thing else to ask him?

Langhorn. Those letters that he speaks of, I desire to know whether he saw me write them?

L. C. J. Those letters you speak of, did you see him write them?

Oates. I did not see him write them, but I am sure they were his letters, because I know his hand.

L. C. J. How did you come to know his hand, since you did not see him write them?

Oates. I saw the letter whereby he ordered money to be paid, 5*l.* to his son. And I saw the money paid to his son by that order.

Langhorn. Do you know that La Chaise and Anderton writ to me?

Oates. I do not say that they writ to him, but he had letters subscribed by their names, and they were said by him to come from them, and they were to be communicated to the priests and Jesuits; and he delivered them to me to that end.

Langhorn. When you returned to St. Omers, how long did you stay there?

Oates. Till 23d June, New Stile, which is the 13th Old Stile.

Langhorn. I remember he professed himself a Roman Catholic, I see he is a minister; I desire to know of him when he left the Protestant Religion, and became a convert, as he called himself; call it what you will, when he left being a Protestant, and became a Papist, that is it I mean?

Oates. He does it for nothing but to quarrel.

L. C. J. When did you leave the church of England?

Oates. My Lord, if it be the pleasure of the bench to ask me this question—

L. C. J. You ought to answer it, though it be nothing to the purpose.

Oates. Then I answer it was either in February or March, 1677.

Langhorn. My Lord, I desire to know whether he had any benefice?

Oates. Yes, I was sometime Vicar of Bobbing—in Kent; But I suppose this is to make me accuse myself of something, whereby I might forfeit my living: for, my Lord, I have a right in point of equity still to that living, but only for going beyond sea without leave of my ordinary, I am not now Vicar of—Langhorn. When did you come to your Vicarage?

Oates. In 1678.

Langhorn. You became a Papist in 1677. I ask this question, whether he did leave his living before he turned Papist?

Oates. My Lord, I am not willing to answer that question.

L. C. J. When did you leave your living? Did you leave it before you went away?

Oates. It was not very long before; but the reason why I am not willing to tell is, When I left the parish, I left it in the charge of Mr. Thomas Turner, Vicar of Milton, and I did go near about Chichester, and served a sequestration there. The air was not a good air in that part of Kent, and I had not my health; and that was one reason, and for other reasons best known to myself.

Langhorn. After he became a papist, I desire to know whether he became a Jesuit? Were you in any order there?

L. C. J. Mr. Langhorn, it is not a proper question, we ought not to ask it him: You are a man of the law, and therefore you know it is not fair to ask any person a question about a criminal matter that may bring himself in danger.

Langhorn. I take him to be out of danger, he hath his pardon.

L. C. J. I don't know what his pardon is, nor how far it reaches, nor whether this be contained in it; but if Mr. Oates pleases to answer that question he may.

Justice Dolben. Though he hath his pardon, he may be in danger of ecclesiastical censure.

L. C. J. He says, he will not.

Langhorn. I will give you another reason why I ask it, because in one of his Narratives he seems to call himself so; he says 'There came over nine of us, all Jesuits;' I suppose him to be one of that order; this I took to be a ground why I might properly call him so.

L. C. J. Narratives are no evidence at all.

Langhorn. But that gave me an occasion to ask the question.

Oates. I cannot answer it, because it tends rather to raise a debate in the court, than conduces to the question, to acquit or condemn the prisoner.

Justice Pemberton. You are not bound to answer it.

L. C. J. He tells you, he is not bound by law to answer, and he refuses to answer.

Langhorn. I desire to know whether he ever saw me, or conversed with me, from the time he acquainted me with the consult, and saw the commissions in my chamber?

L. C. J. How often did you converse with Mr. Langhorn?

Oates. After I returned again in July and August, once or twice.

L. C. J. How often in April and May?

Oates. Twice, I think, about the time of the consult.

L. C. J. And when you came over again, how often?

Oates. Twice more, I think; twice or thrice.

L. C. J. So then, he hath been four or five times in your company?

Oates. He would not let me come to his house, for he used to say, his wife was but Auns-acc turned from a devil; and therefore he would not have me come thither.

Langhorn. I hope he will not go out of the court.

L. C. J. No, he will stay here, but you have done with him at present, have you not?

Langhorn. Yes, my lord, I have.

Sir Cr. Larinx. Swear Mr. Bedlow. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Mr. Bedlow, I ask you but one short question, because I would not interrupt you afterwards, that paper that you saw signed by the superior of the jezuits, where had you it?

Bedlow. I had it at Mr. Daniel Arthur's.

Langhorn. What is that?

L. C. J. It is an instrument signed and sealed, just as the things were which Mr. Oates says he saw in your chamber.

L. C. J. North. And besides you must take notice, that this was found a long time after Mr. Oates had given his testimony publicly, for his closet was not searched till a great while after.

L. C. J. It is to shew you what seals they used to have to their commissions. Mr. Oates describes several commissions that he saw in your study, so sealed and subscribed; and after the searching Mr. Arthur's study, being a papist, that commission is found there. Now though it be a thing of a private concern, a church matter, not relating to the matters in question, yet this very commission is so subscribed, and so signed and sealed, as Mr. Oates had described those to be before in your chamber.

Bedlow. Because it was exactly the hand and seal that I saw to the commissions in Paris, I did take particular notice of the paper, and brought it to the council.

L. C. J. Well, Sir, now go on with your evidence.

Bedlow. First, my lord, I will only ask this question of the court, whether a known Roman Catholic may take notes of the evidence in such a case?

L. C. J. Truly no, I think not.

Bedlow. There is an honourable lady in that gallery, the lady Marchioness of Winchester, that hath took notes all this trial.

L. C. J. She will do herself, nor nobody else any great hurt, by what she writes.

Bedlow. I only speak it for the information of the court.

L. C. J. A woman's notes will not signify much truly, no more than her tongue.

Bedlow. My lord, about three years since, I was sent by Mr. Harcourt and Mr. Coleman, to La Chaise, with some letters for the carrying on of this design. With these letters, Mr. Coleman asked me, if I could go with him as far as the Temple. I have no particular acquaintance with Mr. Langhorn, I was but twice at his chamber, once with Mr. Harcourt, and once with Mr. Coleman. I waited upon Mr. Coleman to Mr. Langhorn's chamber in the Temple: there did he register such letters as Mr. Coleman brought to him, and afterwards Mr. Coleman sealed them up, and gave them me to carry to La Chaise.

L. C. J. How do you say? When you went with Mr. Coleman to Mr. Langhorn's chamber, were the letters there?

Bedlow. The letters were writ first at Coleman's house, and brought open by Coleman to Mr. Langhorn, and he read them and registered them, and then Coleman sealed them up, and gave them me to carry away.

Langhorn. What letters were these?

L. C. J. Do you know what the effect of those letters were?

Bedlow. The letters were read, some of them, at the King's-Bench bar, at Coleman's trial: there was one of them writ by Mr. Harcourt, another by Mr. Coleman to La Chaise.

Just. Fens. What was the effect of them?

Bedlow. Only to let La Chaise know, that they waited only now for his answer, how far he had proceeded with the French king, for the sending of money; for they only wanted money, all other things were in readiness. That the Catholics of England were in safety, had made all places, and all offices, to be disposed of to Catholics, or such as they thought would be so; that all garrisons were either in their own hands, or ready to be put into them; and they had so fair an opportunity, (as I remember that was one of the expressions in the letter to father Stapleton) that they had so fair an opportunity, having a king so easy to believe what is dictated to him by our party, that if we slip this opportunity, we must despair of ever introducing popery into England; for having a king of England so easy, and the French king so powerful, they must not miss such an opportunity.

L. C. J. For what?

Bedlow. To send ever money for the carrying on of the cause, for they only wanted that, all else was in readiness: and the other letters were to the same effect, though in other words. That letter was in English, but the letters to La Chaise and the Nuncio were both in French.

L. C. J. But you understand French, do not you?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, I do.

L. C. J. Did he copy them out, while you were there by?

Bedlow. He registered them before me.

L. C. J. Did he write them into a book? and were you there all that time?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, I and Coleman walked in the chamber, whilst he went in and writ, as he did other things; for he registered all their accounts: there was not a penny of money either received or laid out, nor any thing done almost in relation to this concern, but he did keep a register of it: I cannot say, that ever he did talk any thing before me of the king's death particularly, but talked of the whole design. About a year and a half since, Mr. Harcourt sent another packet of letters by me to Mr. Langhorn to be registered; he looked strangely upon me, and received the letter, and sent an answer to Mr. Harcourt, that Mr. Williams (for I went then under the name of captain Williams) had delivered him such letters, and that he should have them again to-morrow, after he had copied them, and registered them. Mr. Harcourt read the letter of answer to me, and in the letter it was Mr. Williams. Said I to Mr. Harcourt, I thought I might have been registered by my right name, because when any thing should take effect and occasion serve, I resolved to bear my own name. Alas, says he, this does not signify any thing at all, for as for this register, it is not so considerable: there shall be a new register made, of things of weight and moment, this is only a blind register amongst ourselves. The two letters that I brought from Harcourt, there was one of them from sir William Godolphin, that I had brought before from Spain.

L. C. J. Who was that directed to?

Bedlow. To my lord Bellasis; and about three weeks after it was that I was sent to Mr. Langhorn to have it registered; the other was from the Irish college of Jesuits in Salamanca. The letter from the rector did specify, that they would have my lord Bellasis, and the rest of the lords that were concerned, and the rest of the party in England, to be in readiness, and to have this communicated with all expedition; for now they had provided in Spain, under the notion of pilgrims for St. Jago, some Irish cashiered soldiers, that had left their country, some for religion, and some for their crimes, and a great many lay-brothers, whom they procured and gathered together under the notion of pilgrims, to be ready to take shipping at the Groine, to land at Milford-Haven, there to meet my lord Powis, and an army that he was to raise in Wales to further this design. And these letters said they had almost brought it to a period, that they did only expect a return from England, to shew in what readiness they were here, that accordingly, they might proceed.

L. C. J. Did Mr. Langhorn see these letters?

Bedlow. He took these letters from me, and told me Mr. Harcourt should have them again, when he had transcribed them; and wrote a letter to Mr. Harcourt, that Mr. Williams had brought him such letters.

L. C. J. And he did transcribe them?

Bedlow. I suppose so, for he afterwards sent them back to Mr. Harcourt.

Justice Atkins. Was it a good large book that he registered them in?

Bedlow. I knew not what book he registered them in, not those letters.

Langhorn. It is a proper question, because he said I registered those letters before him.

Bedlow. I say, I saw him in his study transcribe Coleman's letter, whilst Coleman and I walked in his chamber.

L. C. J. Into what kind of book did he register that? had he more books than one, pray?

Bedlow. My lord, I cannot tell that, I judge it might be the same book. I saw the book then, it was a large parchment book; but I did not see it when Harcourt's letters were registered. When Coleman and I came thither, he went into his study, and left us in the chamber, I saw him transcribing the papers that lay before him: but when I brought those letters from Mr. Harcourt, I only delivered them sealed up, and his answer to Father Harcourt was, that Mr. Williams had brought him so many letters, and he should have them again as soon as he had transcribed them.

L. C. J. Mr. Langhorn, you would do well to shew us the book, and that would make the matter plain.

L. C. J. North. Could you see how far he had gone in the book, and what room there was left to write other letters?

Bedlow. It was a book at least three inches thick, and as near as I could guess he had gotten through two thirds of the book.

L. C. J. But you should shew us your book, Mr. Langhorn.

Langhorn. I say, my lord, if I had such a book, it must needs be found in my study; if I had it, it must be there, for I never removed it.

L. C. J. That was not a book fit to be left there.

Bedlow. My Lord, Pritchard did tell me that the commissions were come, and that Mr. Langhorn had them, and things, says he, are now in a readiness. Then said I, When shall I have my commission? said he, those that Mr. Langhorn hath are only for the general officers, you must have yours, said he, from my lord Bellasis.

Sir Cr. Lewins. Do you know any thing of any money that was to be raised by the Benedictine monks; 6,000*l.* or what other sum?

Bedlow. My lord, in May 1676, among the letters I carried to La Chaise, one of them was directed to Stapleton a Benedictine monk, to raise the money for England.

L. C. J. The money, what money?

Bedlow. The money they had promised to remit into England.

L. C. J. But did they name no sum?

Bedlow. No, my lord, for they had no particular promise, but only that they did make it their business to raise what they could.

L. C. J. And what was it? Do you know of any sum of money that was raised, and by whom?

Bedlow. La Chaise told me himself, that they had no reason to suspect him or his interest with the French king, for he had laid that sure enough. And that when he found a fit opportunity, the money was ready to be remitted into England, and that he had remitted some of it already to Mr. Coleman and Ireland.

L. C. J. You know not but by what La Chaise told you?—Bedlow. No.

L. C. J. He speaks what La Chaise told him that he would raise money, and that he had sent some to Mr. Coleman and Ireland.

Bedlow. Yes, and that the rest should follow when he found there was absolute occasion; but he would not part with his money till they had assurance of their being in readiness here and likely to further and carry on the design?

Mr. Justice Atkins. Mr. Bedlow, had you any discourse with the prisoner about any commissions?

Bedlow. No, My lord, it is at least a year and a half since I saw him.

L. C. J. Did he ever own any commissions he had?

Bedlow. No, Pritchard told me he had some.

L. C. J. You have seen the commissions, have you not?

Bedlow. No, I never saw any in Mr. Langhorn's hand.

L. C. J. Where did you see them then?

Bedlow. Sir Henry Tichborne did show me three commissions in Paris, signed by the general of the order, and sealed with the Jesuit seal, which made me take up this paper, which hath been shewn, though it were a thing indifferent, yet, because it was written with the same hand, and sealed with the same seal that the commissions were that I saw at Paris.

Mr. Belwood. Did Mr. Langhorn know any thing of the treason to murder the king, by Pickering and Grove?

Bedlow. That I do know only by report; but when Grove Pickering, and Conyers were going to New-Market, I was at Harcourt's chamber, and I had a design to go to Windsor to observe what they did; and I did ask Father Harcourt to give me leave to go see a friend of mine take shipping at Plymouth, to send some commendations by him to my friends in Italy; then says Father Harcourt, you cannot be spared, you must not go now, for we don't know what return those gentlemen will make of their journey, and what occasion there may be for you, if there should be any good effect of it: then, said I, I will go and write, and send it by a friend down to be sent into Italy: but, said he, you must stay a while till I come back again; I am going to Mr. Langhorn's chamber in the Temple, to take the minutes of what they have done this morning. That was the contrivance of sending down those people to Newmarket to assassinate the king.

Justice Atkins. That is no evidence against the prisoner, because it is by hear-say.

L. C. J. It is right, and the jury ought to take notice, that what another man said is no evidence against the prisoner, for nothing will be evidence against him, but what is of his own knowledge. But I desire, Mr. Bedlow, as well as you can you would repeat the effect of one of the most material letters Mr. Langhorn did transcribe.

Bedlow. Though I was not so exact a Frenchman, in the nicety of the tongue, yet I understood enough to learn the sense of those letters. The English Letter from Stapleton, which he transcribed; was to this effect: That Coleman and Harcourt, naming themselves We (that is, We and the Jesuits, and it was to the rector of the English monks in particular, but I missed of the rector, and Mr. Stapleton received it); I say, the effect of that letter was, they would have a certain answer from them—

Langhorn. When was it?

Bedlow. It was in 1676.

L. C. J. What was the effect, say you?

Bedlow. The effect was, that they would have a final answer from those religious at Doway and Paris, to know how far they had proceeded with the English religious, and all their friends beyond sea, in making collections, and remitting of money, for there was only money wanting; for the arms of the Catholics were all ready, and they had all a good mind to the business, their arms and hearts were ready, and the easiness of the king of England, and the strength of the power of France, made it an opportunity not to be neglected: That the garrisons were ready to be put into such hands as they could trust.

L. C. J. Was there such an expression in the letter, upon your oath, that they had such arms, and that the garrisons were ready to be put into their hands, and whose hands they were ready to be put into?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, there were such expressions, and they would have the garrisons only in such hands as they could trust.

L. C. J. And did he transcribe those letters?

Bedlow. He did transcribe those three while we were in his chamber.

Just. Pemberton. Was there any mention of exciting the French king, by power, to invade this kingdom?

Bedlow. There was in the French letter to M. La Chaise, which he transcribed too.

Langhorn. That was in French, he says.

L. C. J. I suppose you understand French too, or else you could not do what you did.

Langhorn. I understand law French.

L. C. J. Mr. Bedlow, did you never hear him discourse in French?

Bedlow. No, my lord.

Outs. I cannot write nor read French, but I can translate it.

Mr. Recorder. If you have any questions to ask him, you may ask him.

Langhorn. How many were the letters that then I transcribed?

Bedlow. There were three, my lord; one was to the English monks at Paris, another was to M. La Chaise, another to the Pope's Nuncio.

Langhorn. Were they long or short ones? I ask for this reason, because I observe that in the Narrative, Coleman's Letters are very long; of what length might they be?

Bedlow. They were the best part of half a sheet of paper, for Mr. Coleman writ a curious fine small hand, and would put a great deal of business into a little paper; the Pope's nuncio's letter was very short.

L. C. J. Did he transcribe them all before you went away?

Bedlow. Whilst we walked in his chamber, he registered them: We took a great many turns about in the chamber, and I saw the papers before him, and his book.

Langhorn. Did those letters express what the money was to be raised for, or did they leave it to be understood? My meaning, my lord, of my question is this, Whether Mr. Coleman writ to him to hasten the money, and said it was for such a particular use, or only in general.

L. C. J. He hath answered it already, but he will do it again.

Bedlow. My lord, though it was not expressed in the letter, but only we want nothing else from beyond sea, but your assistance; though it was not expressed in the letter to destroy the king and the Protestant religion, yet the fall of the discourse betwixt Mr. Coleman and Mr. Langhorn was to this effect: We only stay for money, when we have got that, we will put ourselves into a posture.

L. C. J. If you observed it, he said so before, when we asked him what the effect of those letters was, That all things were ready, it is a good opportunity now for the effecting of our design, having so easy a king to deal with, and your king having so powerful a treasury; do you but get the money of him, and we shall do well enough.

Bedlow. Though it was not specified in the letters what the money was for, yet in the discourse between Mr. Coleman and Mr. Langhorn it was worded so, that it was plain it was to destroy the government, and introduce popery.

Langhorn. My lord, ask whether this be all that he charges upon me?

Bedlow. I cannot say that, my lord, that this is all I have to say against him; things may occur to my memory hereafter, which do not now.

L. C. J. But at this time you remember no more, do you?—Bedlow. No.

Just. Atkins. But to my apprehension, what you said last was most material, that is, the discourse between him and Mr. Coleman, for that rivets the whole. When he said, that if we had but a return of this money, then we have made ourselves safe, or words to that effect; but it was to the full meaning of this, that the Protestant religion could not stand any longer here, having assistance from France,

L. C. J. So they consulted together after the letters were transcribed, did they?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord.

Oates. My lord, I omitted one thing that was very material in my evidence, which comes in my mind since. The congregation at Rome did contribute 800,000 crowns, to be sent into England, and Mr. Langhorn did enquire concerning that money, and had knowledge of the receipt of it in France, as Mr. Langhorn did say, in the month of July, or August.

L. C. J. Did he say it to you?

Oates. He did to Father Harcourt, Father Kaines, and Father Fenwick, that there were 800,000 crowns come to France.

L. C. J. What said he then concerning the 800,000 crowns?

Oates. He gave an account of the money's being lodged at Paris.

L. C. J. You hear what he says, that you gave an account of 800,000 crowns that were raised abroad, that it was lodged and received at Paris.

Bedlow. I recollect something more now, though I was not in Mr. Langhorn's chamber. I met with Father Kaines, one day, and said he, I must go and speak with one Mr. Langhorn, presently; and when he came out again, he brought a letter in his hand, and afterwards we went to a tobacco-shop in Wild-street; and there Father Kaines told me the effect of the letter. He told me it was a chiding letter from the Secretary de propaganda fide, cardinal Barbarino, who had sent a chiding letter to Mr. Langhorn, and the rest of the conspirators, for going on no faster, when they had so fair an opportunity.

L. C. J. Did you see the letter directed to Mr. Langhorn?

Bedlow. Father Kaines told me the effects of it, and he had the letter from Mr. Langhorn.

L. C. J. He told you so? well, but this evidence is as to the plot in general, but not to Mr. Langhorn in particular. But that which he charges you particularly with, is this, your transcribing the letters, wherein there was an expression made, of your being all in readiness as for arms and the garrisons; and your discourse afterwards with Mr. Coleman, in what a posture all things were for the destruction of the government, and the bringing in popery, and there wanted nothing but money, for the effecting the whole design. This is that he says.

Langhorn. My lord, I suppose he will not go out of the court, neither?

L. C. J. No, no, he will stay here.

Sir Cr. Levins. My lord, there is one witness that he had not ready here, when we began to give some account of the general plot, I pray he may be examined; his name is Buss. [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. What can you say of any design upon the king's life? What is your name?

Buss. My name is Thomas Buss.

L. C. J. What profession are you of?

Buss. I serve the duke of Monmouth.

L. C. J. In what capacity do you serve him?

Buss. I am his cook.

L. C. J. How long have you served him?

Buss. Thirteen years I have lived with him.

L. C. J. Well, what is it you have to say?

Buss. Being at Windsor, my lord, with an old acquaintance of mine, one Handkinson that was then newly come from Italy——

L. C. J. When was this?

Buss. In September last, within a week after the duke came from Flanders, and we were drinking together, for I had not seen him for many years before, and there was one Anthony was in the company, and said he, I am newly come from Italy, and I am going again, and I am come to take my leave of my friends. When do you go away, said I? I believe I go to-morrow, said he; but pray, said he to Anthony, have a special care of those four worthy gentlemen. What gentlemen, said I; Four worthy gentlemen, said he, that I brought over with me. What, said I, from Italy? No, said he, they are four worthy Irish gentlemen: They are very worthy persons, said he, have a special care of them, for they will do our business.

L. C. J. What said you to that?

Buss. Nothing; for I knew nothing of it, till I saw Coleman's trial, where it speaks of the four Irishmen that were to kill the king at Windsor, then I bethought me of it.

L. C. J. Would you not ask what that business was, or so?

Buss. No, I did not know at that time.

L. C. J. But no man in England but would have asked such a question.

Buss. No, he said they were strangers: but, said I, did you bring them out of Italy? No, saith he, they are four Irish gentlemen that I brought over with me, worthy persons.

L. C. J. And what religion was he of that said so?

Buss. He was a Catholic, one that brought all into a college, that did so here before he went.

Praunce. He belonged to the Benedictine monks, my lord, in the Savoy.

L. C. J. And what was he that he spoke of?

Buss. He was a Catholic too, he was servant to one that that belongs to the queen's chapel.

L. C. J. North. Did you understand what the business was they said they were to do?

Buss. Not till I read Mr. Coleman's trial, and then I did guess these were the persons that were to have killed the king at Windsor.

L. C. J. You saw them not, did you?

Buss. No; they were in charge of this Anthony, that is now in some place in the queen's chapel.

Justice Atkins. Did you speak to Anthony to have a care of them, or to you?

Buss. To Anthony, he was the person that was to take care of them.

L. C. J. Is Anthony a papist?

Buss Yes, a very strong papist, and we used to be often together; but now he is jealous, and will not come near me, to talk with me, as we used.

L. C. J. Now I understand the reason of it, why he did not ask the question; it was not likely he should, for it was not spoken to him, but he stood by, all the while the discourse was to Anthony, another man, and it was to him that he spoke, to have a care of the four Irishmen, for they would do their business. What did Anthony say?

Buss. He promised he would have as much care of them as of his own life.

L. C. J. Where is this Anthony to be found?

-Bedlow. My lord, Anthony is a Portuguese, and the queen's confessor's man.

L. C. J. When did you see him?

Bedlow. He was seen this morning, they call him signior Antonio.

L. C. J. North. You should have an order to take this same Anthony into custody, but in order to the finding him, let him go to my lord Ossory.

L. C. J. Mr. Tisser, we give you an order for the taking of this signior Antonio, you will find him at Somerset-House; for the doing of this, we do advise you to wait upon my lord Ossory, and tell him, that you have such an order, but that out of reverence to the queen, we have also ordered you to wait upon him, to desire him to send him.

L. C. J. North. What is become of this Handkinson?

Buss. He is abroad, beyond the seas, my lord, for he said he was come hither to take leave of his friends, and was to go the next morning into Surrey, and so away.

L. C. J. Well, what have you now to say, Mr. Langhorn?

Langhorn. I conceive this last witness says nothing to me.

L. C. J. North. He speaks only to the Plot in general, as the first witnesses did; but that which is upon you, is as to Mr. Oates, who speaks to every article of the indictment expressly; and Mr. Bedlow says he did not only see you transcribe and copy out that treasonable letter, but he carried other letters to you, which you promised to transcribe; and these are Overt-acts, that make you a party to the treason.

L. C. J. Besides your discourse with Coleman, after the letters were transcribed.

Langhorn. These two gentlemen were parties in this supposed crime; the two witnesses which do concern me, are Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, and they both of them clearly appear to have been in the same treason that I suppose they charge me with; I desire to know whether they have had their pardon or no?

L. C. J. I believe they have. Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, have you your pardons?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, I have three.

Oates. I have two pardons under the broad seal, but I don't know what is in them.

L. C. J. North. But make your objection how you will; whether they had, or whether they had not, they are witnesses.

Bedlow. I never gave any evidence, till I had my pardon.

Langhorn. I ask for this reason; I look upon your lordship and the court as my counsel, to advise me in the matters of law, whether these be good witnesses, or not?

L. C. J. We do tell you, that if we had not judged them to be witnesses, we would not have heard them.

Langhorn. They come under the same reason of law with an approver, having had their pardon; I don't say they are directly approvers but I conceive they come under the same reason of law with them; and then if the approver be pardoned, by the law the appellee ought to be discharged; and methinks by the same reason, these men having been Participes Criminis, and having got their pardons, ought not to be such substantial witnesses against the prisoner at the bar. But, my lord, I have one thing yet further to ask, I desire to know whether they have not received any rewards or gratifications, for the discovery they have made, and the service they have done? And whether they do not expect further rewards?

L. C. J. Is there any allowance to be made to you?

Oates. I have received a reward, by disbursing 6 or 700*l.* out of my pocket, and I don't know when I shall see it again.

Justice Pemberton. Mr. Langhorn does suppose that the witnesses are corrupted and bribed: Do you think, Mr. Langhorn, that the king will bribe his witnesses?

Langhorn. My lord, I only propose it as a question.

L. C. J. Would you answer that question yourself?

L. C. J. North. If you can suppose there was any subornation or corruption, call your witnesses and prove it; but for their receiving sustenance and maintenance from the king, that is but reasonable, and can be no objection. And you yourself know, that an approver, while he is in that service, hath a penny a day, which in ancient times was a great matter for livelihood and sustenance; so that any reward that they have, if you cannot prove it by contract or subornation, you cannot make an objection.

Langhorn. My lord, I am informed by a prisoner in the Gaol, that Mr. Bedlow hath received 500*l.*

L. C. J. If you can prove any thing, do; prove what you can.

Recorder. That 500*l.* was about a particular fact.

L. C. J. But pray, what is his name?

Langhorn. His name is Mr. Reading.

L. C. J. North. He is an infamous person, he hath stood in the pillory, we can't take him for a witness; but now I will tell you, for the 500*l.* it is a thing we all know of. It was a reward for a particular business, not relating to the plot.

but it was for the discovery of the murderers of sir Edmundbary Godfrey.

Justice Atkins. I think Mr. Praunce is here, that will give an account of that, for Bedlow discovered him.

Bedlow. I am so far from having any benefit by this discovery, that I am 700*l.* out of pocket.

Justice Eldys. You shall have the liberty to make what good defence you can for yourself, and prove what you can; you must not go this way to work.

L. C. J. It is pretty reasonable for us to give a public satisfaction to all the world, that we do nothing under hand, but that we do in this case, as in all other cases; any thing that is fit to be answered, they shall answer; and perchance in this case something more than can be strictly required of us. It is notorious enough, that Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow have been fed at the king's charge, and it cannot be objected against them, and need not to be winked at, for they were parties in the plot. And when they come to make the discovery, without which we should never have known the plot, for you know it is hard to discover any crime, forgery, or the like, but by one that hath been privy to it, and a guilty person; yet these men always have been, and are in law, witnesses, and it is just they should have a competency to maintain them, since they came for the public good to make such discoveries.

L. C. J. North. And that particular sum of money was paid to Mr. Bedlow, in pursuance of the king's proclamation, which we all know; which was all publicly done.

Langhorn. The reason why I press this was, because of the proclamation, which was to invite persons to come, touching the discovery of this plot; and to encourage them to it by a promise of reward. I think it may be reasonable enough, where any person that is charged with a crime doth absent, to propose a reward for the bringing him in. But I think it is hard, that when a prisoner is in custody, witnesses should be brought in against him by such means.

L. C. J. North. You do artificially go off from the point: answer the evidence that hath been given against you, and you shall be heard; but you labour very much, and trouble yourself to make answer to another matter that is not pertinent.

L. C. J. Does your defence consist wholly of this sort of matter, objecting the incompetency of the witnesses? Can you make no answer to the fact?

Langhorn. I must tell your lordship, my whole defence must run to disable the witnesses; for, my lord, I was committed to Newgate the 17th of October, and I have been kept there a close prisoner till this day was s'enight, or Friday the last week; I never conversed with any friend or any relation, nor knew any thing of news, but only with some few persons, sent by authority of the House of Commons, or the council. And I was never examined by any since I was committed. I never heard what was charged against me, and I could not foresee what these men could testify, because I was not confident whereupon they would proceed: therefore I can have no defence, unless it be by lessening their credit; it is impossible I should.

L. C. J. Do lessen it, if you can. If you have any witnesses to take off their credit, or contradict them, call them.

Justice Atkins. But I would say one thing to you. Mr. Langhorn, you seem to put a very ill construction upon the king's proclamation, as if it were to invite and encourage persons to come and swear about a plot, where there was none; it was to invite people to make a further discovery of a plot that lay close, and we could not fully discover, for the preservation of the king and kingdom, without such a means.

Langhorn. He did propose a reward.

Justice Atkins. Aye, in order to a further discovery of that plot which we had evidence of before.

Justice Pemberton. And so you would be close in all your accounts, and none should be rewarded that could make us any discovery of them, but presently their testimony must be gone. It is very fine! But the Court overrules it.

L. C. J. Mr. Langhorn, whatsoever you object of this kind, does fly in the face and reflect upon the integrity and wisdom of King, Lords, and Commons.

L. C. J. North. For it was done by the advice of all three.

L. C. J. If you will go on, and prove any thing, but pray don't spend our time to no purpose.

Langhorn. Call Parrey; and Townley, and Dodington, and the rest.

Oates. My lord, here are papists come into the Court with their swords on.

L. C. J. They will not draw them here.

Lord Mayor. It is well enough, it is well enough; Dr. Oates, you are safe enough here.

L. C. J. Who will you have first?

Langhorn. I would have Hilsley set up. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. What would you ask him?

Langhorn. Your lordship hath heard Dr. Oates affirm he came over, such a time, in the packet-boat with Mr. Hilsley; I desire to know whether that be true or no!

L. C. J. I can help you in that, for we had him and his companions here yesterday; but, however, we will hear them again, if you will have them. Do you know Mr. Oates?

Hilsley. I do, my lord, very well.

L. C. J. When did you come over from St. Omers?

Hilsley. I came over the 24th of April, New Style.

L. C. J. Did Mr. Oates come with you?

Hilsley. No, he did not.

Oates. No, my lord, he did leave me there, but I overtook him at Calais.

L. C. J. Look you there now, you did leave him there, but he overtook you at Calais. Did you leave him there?

Hilsley. I did leave him there.

L. C. J. Ay, but he overtook you, then, did he not?—Hilsley. No, he did not.

L. C. J. He answers as he did yesterday, that he did not come over with him. You lost your money, did you not?

Hilsley. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. How did you lose it? Did you lose it at play?

Hilsley. It is no matter how I lost it; I did not lose it at play.

Oates. I will tell the Court, if your lordship please, how he lost it; he lent a great deal of money to a gentleman, who went away with his money, and left him to pay the reckoning.

L. C. J. What say you to that?

Hilsley. That is very true, and I confess it; but what is all this? nothing to the matter. He was told this by somebody else. I never saw him, nor ever any man in the ship saw him come over with me.

L. C. J. I will tell you what, then; first, here is something now that you would not confess yesterday, nor indeed would you confess it now. I asked you how you lost your money; you see Mr. Oates can tell you how it was, tho' you won't tell us; so that, though this be a secret, he knows it; and how could he know this secret, unless he were there?

Hilsley. There is one that I met by the way, that did tell him this story.

Then one Gifford stood up.

L. C. J. Did you see Mr. Oates?

Gifford. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. What discourse had you with him concerning Hilsley?

Gifford. Why, he told us of his departure.

L. C. J. When?

Gifford. After he was gone away.

L. C. J. How long after?

Gifford. Three or four days.

L. C. J. What said he to you?

Gifford. He only told us he was gone.

L. C. J. What else said you of him?

Gifford. He only said he departed out of the college then.

L. C. J. What did you say to Mr. Oates about it?

Gifford. I don't remember what I said in particular.

L. C. J. Hilsley, call up the other person that you say told Mr. Oates.

Hilsley. He is not here, my Lord, but here is one that was in the company when he told it.

L. C. J. Who was by?

Gifford. Mr. Burnaby, who came thither the 1st of May.

L. C. J. Hearken to me: when you talked with Mr. Oates concerning Mr. Hilsley's being gone from the college, was there any body by?

Gifford. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Was Mr. Burnaby by, when Mr. Oates and you talked about Mr. Hilsley?

VOL. VII.

Then another Witness started up,

3d Witness. Yes, my Lord, there was Mr. Oates with me, and Mr. Burnaby put himself into our company in the garden, and he acquainted me with this story.

L. C. J. What said he?

3d Witness. He said he met this gentleman, and that this gentleman was cheated of his money.

L. C. J. How did he tell you he was cheated?

3d Witness. I don't know the occasion, but he said a fellow cheated him of the money.

L. C. J. Was that all he said?

3d Witness. Yes, my Lord, but I do not remember upon what occasion; he said he was cheated by a shirking fellow.

L. C. J. Did he name the place he met him at?

3d Witness. I don't know, my Lord, whether he mentioned it or no.

L. C. J. So that Mr. Oates names the place which he was never told; and unless he was there, how could he then tell it?

3d Witness. But this does not prove that I speak against my conscience, that does not argue.

L. C. J. Look you, the answer is this, Mr. Langhorn. You would charge Mr. Oates with falsity in saying he came over in the packet-boat with Hilsley; and you call up him, and he says, he did not come, but he left him at St. Omers; Mr. Oates comes and says, it is true he left me there but I overtook him at Calais; by this very token, said he, you were cheated of your money, by a person that you lent it to who went away, and left you to pay the reckoning. When I asked Mr. Hilsley, how he could tell if it were true that he was not with him, he answered, he was told it by another; but when I come to know what that other person said it was no more than this; he said, in Mr. Oates's hearing, Mr. Hilsley was cozened of his money, but did not say how, nor by whom nor where, Langhorn. Now, to prove that what Mr. Hilsley said is true, and that therefore Mr. Oates his knowledge must come by another hand, I desire that the witnesses may be asked, how long Mr. Oates was at St. Omers?

L. C. J. How long was Mr. Oates at St. Omers?

3d Witness. From December till June, he was there, except one particular day that he went to Watton.

L. C. J. And you saw him almost every day?

3d Witness. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. You have fifteen or sixteen witnesses that will say all this; but yet, if you will, we will call them.

L. C. J. When he went away, do you know that?

3d Witness. He went in June, I cannot certainly say the day.

L. C. J. Well, call another.

3d Witness. Pray, my lord, let me speak, if your lordship please to let me give you my reason, why I might see him; I saw him in the refectory; he had a little table by himself, distinct from the rest, and dining together in a public place, it was impossible but we should see his place empty, if he were gone; and I know the number of my own school, and can tell whether any one be absent.

L. C. J. What, because he sat at table by himself, therefore you think he was there all the while?

3d Witness. Certainly, if I may believe mine own eyes, I saw him there every day.

L. C. Baron. Were you there every day yourself?

3d Witness. Yes, my lord, I was, I did not miss one day, I had no infirmity.

Langhorn. My lord, Mr. Oates hath affirmed that there was with him, when he came over in April, sir Robert Brett.

L. C. J. He says only he believes so; he says positively, he came over in the company of sir John Warner, sir Thomas Preston, and he thinks also sir Robert Brett, but is not positive.

Langhorn. This he affirmed both in his Narrative, and upon oath in the Lords' House.

L. C. J. Shew any thing that he was sworn to here.

Justice Atkins. But what says this lad more? Let him speak, for he is very full of it.

3d Witness. The 1st day of May I saw him in the garden, with a lay-brother, at kittlepins, in the view of all the college.

Langhorn. Let us examine him as to persons, and then refer it to the Lords' Register.

L. C. J. Why, if you will prove something Mr. Oates hath sworn there, that you can contradict, first prove what he swore, and then contradict it.

Justice Pemberton. Pray take notice, you must not go oppose him in any thing of that oath, unless he hath sworn it here; whatsoever there be there, except he hath sworn the same here, it is in vain to object it, for he cannot be intended to have witness to make good what he swore there.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Let us hear what he does offer.

Langhorn. Under favour, Mr. Oates hath acknowledged what he swore there was true.

L. C. J. You are mistaken, Mr. Langhorn; indeed when you asked him that question, he said, as far as was concerned what he swore here, was true, and he is bound at this time to answer so more.

Langhorn. Then as to sir John Warner, I desire my witnesses may be examined.

L. C. J. I suppose they may be here, and say the same they did yesterday; that he did not stir from his house at Watton all April and May.

4th Witness. Yes, my lord, he lived there all that while.

L. C. J. What year?

4th Witness. In the year 1678.

L. C. J. That is the time that Mr. Oates says he came over with him. You saw him almost every day, did not you?

4th Witness. Yes, I did, only four days that I was absent, being sent by him to St. Omers, at a great feast.

L. C. J. And when you came back, you found him there?

4th Witness. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. You are his gardener, are you not?

4th Witness. Yes, I am.

L. C. J. Did you stay all those four days at St. Omers?

4th Witness. I was sent to the High Kirk, and carried some instruments for the music, and there I staid four days, and the last day of April, and the first, and second, and third, of May. And I saw Mr. Oates there in the house, and I saw him going into the refectory to dinner.

L. C. J. He says, that sir John Warner was at home all April and May, that he himself was absent but four days, that he left him there, and when he came back found him there; and that in the four days he was at St. Omers, he saw Mr. Oates, which was the last of April, the first, second, and third of May. You do not know when Mr. Oates went away?

4th Witness. No, my lord, not I.

Justice Pemberton. Was sir John Warner there all June?

4th Witness. My lord, I cannot tell that, I only speak to April and May.

L. C. J. Those are two months that fit him.

Justice Pemberton. Why, how came you not to remember that, as well as the other two, for that is since?

4th Witness. Because I took not so much notice of him in those times.

L. C. J. How came you to take more special notice of them two months, than of the other?

4th Witness. Because our rector did then come into England, and he took the charge of the house upon him in the rector's absence.

L. C. J. When did he come?

4th Witness. He came the 24th of April.

Justice Dolben. Pray who is your rector? What is his name?

4th Witness. Sir Francis Williams.

L. C. J. Where was sir John Warner in June and July?

4th Witness. I cannot tell.

Justice Pemberton. And where was he in August and September?

4th Witness. He went out of town, but where I am not certain.

L. C. J. You were gardener there then?

4th Witness. Yes, I was.

L. C. J. Why cannot you as well tell me, then, where he was in June and July, as in April and May? Answer me plainly.

4th Witness. I think he was there all that time, but I cannot be certain.

L. C. J. Why not so certain for those two months, as you are for the other?

4th Witness. Because I did not take so much notice.

L. C. J. How came you to take more notice of the one than the other? that he was there in April and May, rather than that he was there in July?

4th Witness. Because the question, my lord, that I came for, did not fall upon that time.

L. C. J. Now he hath answered plainly; when I asked the question, Why he did not take so much notice of those months, as he did of April and May? he answered me, Because the question did not fall upon those months; and that, without all question, is a plain and an honest answer.

Justice Dolben. Indeed he hath forgot his lesson; you should have given him better instructions.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Langhorn, if he be to be believed, and that he doth not speak falsely, or more than he knows, it is impossible that Oates's testimony and his can stand together; for he directly affirms, he saw Mr. Oates the last of April, the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd of May. Now Mr. Oates says he was here then; so these two cannot stand together. The question then is, Whether he be to be believed? and, Whether he does not come wilfully or prepared? The Jury have heard what a kind of testimony he gives, when the question was asked him, How he came to take notice of the months of April and May, more than of June and July? and why he was more sure sir John Warner was there at the one time, than at the other? Why, said he, because the question falls upon those former months, and not upon those of June or July. Now that does shake all that was said before, and looks as if he came on purpose, and prepared for those months: and now this, I am afraid, will go through all your St. Omers men.

L. C. J. North. Indeed, I doubt it will go a great way to shake all their testimony.

Sir Cr. Levinz. You, gardener, what do you say was your rector's name?

4th Witness. Sir Francis Williams.

Sir Cr. Levinz. And he came over in April or May, did he?

4th Witness. He came over the 24th of April.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Why, that is the time that Mr. Oates came over, and he was one of the persons that he said came over with him.

4th Witness. No, he came alone, only with a certain officer of the college.

Langhorn. Pray let Gifford be asked the same question about sir John Warner; for if he did come, as he saith, from Watton to St. Omers at that time, he must see him at St. Omers, for he was at St. Omers then. The question is about sir John Warner; if he were at Watton, or St. Omers, then he could not come over with Mr. Oates.

L. C. J. When did you see sir John Warner?

Gifford. I saw him about June, or thereabouts.

L. C. J. Where did you see him?

Gifford. I saw him there in St. Omers house.

L. C. J. When?

Gifford. In June or July, when he invited me over to Watton.

L. C. J. This man does not serve the turn, he does not know the month upon which the question runs.

5th Witness. The 1st of March there was a great feast, St. Fortunatus and Gordianus, and then I saw Mr. Oates 4 days, and he was there all the month of May.

L. C. J. Where was sir John Warner then?

5th Witness. I cannot tell; but at St. Omers I saw Mr. Poole and sir Robert Brett at that time.

L. C. J. Did Mr. Poole come over with you?

Oates. Yes, my Lord, he did.

L. C. J. Witness, when did Mr. Poole come over from St. Omers?

5th Witness. He came first to St. Omers with Mr. Whitebread, he was my master of music, and he taught me, and it was impossible he should be missing without my knowledge.

L. C. J. But he was gone to England long before that; and he could not be at England and at St. Omers at the same time.

5th Witness. You say right, he could not.

L. C. J. When came he from St. Omers?

5th Witness. In the month of June, or May.

L. C. J. Or April?

5th Witness. No, it was the month of June.

L. C. J. These are but collateral matters, Mr. Langhorn; for you to stand upon this, it spends time to no purpose; but the great question is, friend, whether you do not mistake the month?

5th Witness. Yes, yes (at which the people laughed); no, no, I do not mistake the month, I only speak the truth according to my knowledge.

L. C. J. How can you so precisely remember the month of May he was there; for when I asked you when he went away, you could hardly tell the month.

5th Witness. Yes, my Lord, Mr. Oates says, in the month of May he was in England; but I say I saw Mr. Poole then at St. Omers.

L. C. J. But the great question is, Whether you are to be believed? We know you answer the question positively; but my reason why I fear you are not to be believed, is, because you are so precise that Mr. Poole taught you all May; but I ask you once more, was it in June, or was it in May?

5th Witness. It was about June.

L. C. J. May is about June. Why, then, you cannot tell. Was it in June?

5th Witness. Yes, my Lord, it was; it was about June. And this is nothing but what I know; for I actually saw Mr. Oates there at that time.

L. C. J. I will tell you what, Mr. Langhorn, use your discretion, call whom you will, and we will hear them as long as you will; but we had 16 of them yesterday, that did all speak to the same purpose; but in answer to these 16 witnesses, Mr. Oates did produce, and he will produce again, six or seven witnesses, and one of them a papist, if not a priest, who do swear, that Mr. Oates was here in April and May; I will tell you beforehand, do as you will.

Then one Baille stood up, and being a foreigner, an Interpreter was called.

L. C. J. Where did you see sir John Warner in April and May?

Interpreter. He says he saw him actually at St. Omers.

L. C. J. What, all the month of May?

Interpreter. Yes, he says he conversed with him all the month of May.

L. C. J. And was he there all April, and conversed with him then?

Interpreter. Yes, he says every day, of both months. He says he saw him from the first Sunday in April to the 14th of May, and conversed with him.

L. C. J. Where did sir John Warner go the 14th of May?

Interpreter. My Lord, he says he went for one day only to St. Omers, and came back again.

L. C. J. Ask him how he knows this?

Interpreter. He says he was employed about a building by sir John Warner.

Then Carpenteir stood up.

L. C. J. When did you see Mr. Oates, and where?

Carpenteir. I speak as to sir Tho. Preston.

L. C. J. What say you as to sir Thomas Preston?

Carpenteir. I saw him at Liege.

L. C. J. When?

Carpenteir. All the months of March, April, May and June, he was still there.

L. C. J. When went he away?

Carpenteir. In the time of the vacancies.

L. C. J. When is that?

Carpenteir. That is from the beginning of August till the end of September.

L. C. J. When came he again?

Carpenteir. When they came to school again, and that was on the second or third of October.

Justice Dolben. Were you with him all that time?

Carpenteir. Yes, I was: He hath not been in England these three years.

L. C. J. How long have you been there?

Carpenteir. I have been there four years, and I never knew that he was absent, but in the time of the vacancies.

Justice Pemberton. Call another witness.

Then stood up another witness, who being a Dutchman, and not speaking English, an interpreter was called for him also.

L. C. J. Well, what comes he for?

Interpreter. He says he comes to testify, That sir John Warner was at Watton in April, and he says he saw him there from the 14th to the 25th of April.

L. C. J. And then to what time?

Interpreter. He says he was there till the 16th of May.

Justice Pemberton. Ask him where he was the beginning of April?

Interpreter. He says he was superior there in the house, and did govern.

L. C. J. Ask him where he was the latter end of May?

Interpreter. He says he was likewise in the house, save only one day, that he went to St. Omers.

L. C. J. Then he might have said, in short, he was there all April and May.

Justice Pemberton. Call another witness.

Langhorn. Call John Joseph. [Who stood up.]

Justice Pemberton. What do you ask him, Mr. Langhorn?

Joseph. That which I say is this, That sir Thomas Preston was at Liege in March, April, May, and June, 1678.

L. C. J. Did you see him every day in those months?

Joseph. That I cannot well tell.

L. C. J. Did you see him every other day?

Joseph. Yes, my lord, I believe I did once in two or three days.

L. C. J. Where was he in July?

Joseph. He was at Liege too: He was obliged to be so; but in the time of the vacancies in August, he was absent.

L. C. J. Then you say he was all those months, March, April, May, June, and July, there?

Joseph. Yes, my lord, those four months I am sure of it.

L. C. J. What became of him in August, when he went during the vacancies abroad? Do you know whither he went?

Sir Cr. Levinz. Do you know whether he went into England?

Joseph. I never heard that he was in England.

L. C. J. When did he return again?

Joseph. When they began school, and that is in the beginning of October.

Then another Witness stood up.

L. C. J. Well, what say you?

10th Witness. I can say that Mr. Oates never stirred out of the college at that time when he says he came to England; that is, he says he came upon Monday the 25th of April; but he did not, for that day he went into the infirmary, and he stayed at St. Omers all April and May.

L. C. J. And how much longer?

10th Witness. A great part of June.

L. C. J. Was he there the 20th of June?

10th Witness. I am sure he was, but how much longer I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Where was he in February and March?

10th Witness. He was there too; in January he lay out one night, and that was at Watton, but I am sure he did not come over the 24th of April, New Stile, as he says.

Recorder. Now he says, it is New Stile, not Old Stile, as he said yesterday.

Then another Witness stood up.

L. C. J. Well, what do you say?

11th Witness. Mr. Poole was sick, and I can remember when his nephew went to him into the infirmary, before he went away from the college, and he gave him good counsel, as he said, and I remember that Mr. Brett was sick at Watton, and did come home again on horseback, and I believe he did not stir out; and Mr. Poole was at St. Omers, I am sure I saw him once in two or three days all April and May. He went by the name of Killingbeck.

L. C. J. But he does not positively say he saw sir Robert Brett every day there; he says he believes he did.

11th Witness. He came into the school, and gave the boys questions to dispute of.

Mr. Recorder. Call the rest of your witnesses.

Then another Witness was called and stood up.

L. C. J. North. When did you see Mr. Oates at St. Omers?

12th Witness. I saw him almost every other day from the time he came till he went away.

L. C. J. When was the first time you saw him?

12th Witness. The beginning of December.

L. C. J. Did you see him in April there?

12th Witness. Yes, I saw him in April there at an action.

L. C. J. And did you see him in May there?

12th Witness. Yes I can testify I saw him the first day of May in the garden.

L. C. J. How long stayed he there?

12th Witness. Till June.

L. C. J. How came you to take such precise notice?

12th Witness. By his very place I could not but take notice if he were missing.

L. C. J. How can you say you saw him in the garden the 1st of May?

12th Witness. I will tell your lordship why, because there was a great feast and he plaid at nine pins in the garden, and I can tell what they played for.

L. C. J. What say you as to Mr. Nevil, and sir Robert Brett's being at St. Omers?

12th Witness. I did not take so much notice of sir Robert Brett; as for Nevil I think I saw him once in three days.

Justice Pemberton. And there is nothing said of him here.

Then another Witness stood up.

L. C. J. When did you see Mr. Oates first at St. Omers?

13th Witness. I first saw him in the month of December.

L. C. J. Did you see him in April and May?

13th Witness. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. C. J. Was he there all those months?

13th Witness. Yes, my lord, he was.

L. C. J. North. Was he there all the month of June?

13th Witness. He went away towards the latter end of June.

L. C. J. North. Yesterday you said the latter end of July. Call another witness.

Then another Witness stood up.

L. C. J. North. Come, you hear the question;

did you see Mr. Oates at St. Omers, in the month of April?

14th Witness. Yes, my lord, he was there all the month of April.

L. C. J. Was he there all the month of May?

14th Witness. Yes, my lord, he was.

Justice Pemberton. And a good part of June.

14th Witness. Yes, my lord.

Langhorn. What do you say as to Mr. Poole?

14th Witness. I saw Mr. Poole in the infirmary the third day of May.

L. C. J. North. How came you to take notice of it, so well as to remember it, that it was the third of May?

14th Witness. It was a festival day. And the feast we kept was the invention of the Holy Cross. We had the action the day before and some that were in the infirmary would have it acted over again to them, and we did so. My Lord, within one or two days after Mr. Hilsley went away, I discoursed with Mr. Oates, about half an hour; he came out within a day or two after out of the infirmary, and I saw him walking in the gallery. And again the 2d of May I saw him walking with one Mr. Burnaby, who arrived the day before, the first of May, and then I saw him the 3d, 4th and 5th, in this Burnaby's company; I saw him again, the 26th of May, with a band about his head in order to confirmation, for they always have a linen cloth bound about their head at such a time.

L. C. J. Call another. Who stood up, his name was ****.

L. C. J. What can you say?

*. All that I can say is this, that between the said month of December 1677, and June 1678, which is the time in question, Mr. Oates was never out of the college above one night, when he went to Watton in January; and this is certain, that from the time I saw him first, till the time he went away for altogether, there were not two days that passed away, wherein I did not see him, except in the month of March, and when he was in the infirmary the 24th of April, but then I heard that he was there—

L. C. J. Who did tell you so?

*. The man that keeps that part of the house; and coming into my office after my recovery out of a fit of sickness a week before Christmas or thereabouts, I saw Mr. Oates by this circumstance, the servitors of the house said they were glad to see me, and Mr. Oates being in the place at the refectory that was assigned to him, I asked who he was, and they told me such a one; but I had heard of his admission a few days before. Likewise Mr. Oates was there when Mr. Hilsley came from England, which was about the 24th of April, by this circumstance, that he was present in the refectory with some of the scholars. Mr. Richard Burnaby came to the college about a week after Mr. Hilsley went away, and Mr. Oates was actually there then, and we did very much wonder that he became acquainted with him so quickly after his arrival. I say Mr. Oates was actually there when Mr. Killinbeck and Mr. Conquest came for England about the 3d of May, by this circumstance, that I had some discourse with Mr. Oates, and some others of the scholars, that Mr. Conquest would by no means get out of his bed betimes that day he was to go away, being unwilling to leave the college. He was there the 26th of May by this circumstance, that the bishop dined there that day, and Mr. Oates was there confirmed that day. Mr. Oates was there also in June, my lord.

L. C. J. Yes, he was there in June, he does not deny it.

Mr. Justice Pemberton. And was he there all May?

. Yes, my lord, he was, and all April, except the time he was in the infirmary, which was three or four days.

Langhorn. What do you say as to Poole and Nevil?

. They were there all the whole time in question, and they were never absent any competent time to come to England, as he says.

L. C. J. North. We must not allow that, you must tell us what time they were there, that we may know it.

. They were there in March, April, May, June and July.

L. C. J. But did you see him every day from the beginning of Christmas, to the time he went away in June?

. Yes, except the time he was at Watton, and when he was in the Infirmary.

Recorder. But was not Mr. Oates twice in the Infirmary?

. He was I remember there on St. Thomas of Canterbury's day, and I remember he was there in April.

Sir Cr. Levins. I did hear you say something of somebody that was absent five or six days, was it you?

. I was sick in the month of March, and I was in the Infirmary till about the 12th or 14th day.

Sir Cr. Levins. And did you see him there all that time?

. I excepted that time, but I heard his voice once in that time, in the next room to the Infirmary, where I was, by this circumstance, he used to come to a table by himself, and it was near the door, and Nevil and Poole were there, as I said before.

Recorder. He speaks much more to the purpose to day, Mr. Langhorn, than he did yesterday.

L. C. J. North. And much louder.

Langhorn. I hope your lordship will take notice that he speaks likewise of the residence of Mr. Poole, sir Robert Brett, and Mr. Nevil.

L. C. J. Yes, I do: Call another witness.

Who stood up, and being a Foreigner, his Evidence was likewise interpreted.

L. C. J. Ask him what he says.

Interpreter. He says he saw Mr. Oates, he was there, and he remembers it till about the 25th of June.

L. C. J. Where did he see him?

Interpreter. He says it was either in the house, or in the garden.

L. C. J. North. When was that, that he was in the Infirmary?

Interpreter. He says, he was in the Infirmary towards the latter end of December, or the beginning of January.

L. C. J. Ask him what he says about Nevil and Poole.

Interpreter. He says they were there all June, and that Mr. Poole went away in the month of July; and he further says, that he being a waterman, he carried this same Williams and March in his boat the last Sunday in April.

L. C. J. North. Who is your next, Mr. Langhorn? Let him stand up. (Which he did.) When did you see Mr. Oates at St. Omers?

16th Witness. In the month of April, 1678.

L. C. J. And in May too was he?

16th Witness. Yes, he was.

L. C. J. Was Mr. Poole there all that time?

16th Witness. Yes, he was; and so was Mr. Nevil and Mr. Brett.

L. C. J. Where is Nevil now?

16th Witness. I believe I left him there.

L. C. J. What are these persons?

16th Witness. The one is a prefect, and I believe he is there still. In the month of May I made Mr. Killinbeck a suit of clothes, and Mr. Oates came into the shop, and asked me whose clothes they were? I said Mr. Killinbeck's; said he, How can that be? they are black; said I, they must be black, for he is in mourning.

Langhorn. Here is Mr. Grove's wife and his maid.

Then Mrs. Grove stood up.

L. C. J. What question would you ask of her?

Langhorn. Mr. Oates hath sworn, and given us several circumstances of his coming over, and being here at that which he calls the consult, and that he lay at Mr. Grove's three or four nights; I desire she may be asked that question, whether he did so or no?

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Oates, Mrs. Grove?

Grove. No, I never saw him.

L. C. J. Were there any lodgers lay at your house in April was twelvemonth?

Grove. Yes, my lord, there were.

L. C. J. Do you use to have lodgers that you do not know?

Grove. My house was full of lodgers at that time. I did not know them till they lay there.

Sir Cr. Levins. Why then, Mr. Oates might be there, and you not know him.

Grove. If he lay there, I must needs know him.

L. C. J. Why might not a man lie with any of your lodgers three or four nights, and you not know him?

Grove. Who should he lie withal, my lord?

Oates. I had a bed to myself when I lay there.

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, describe the chamber as well as you can.

Oates. It was a place taken out of another room, where two men were taken out that were committed to prison.

L. C. J. Were there any persons taken out of your house, and sent to prison?

Grove. Yes, my lord, there were.

L. C. J. In that very room he lay, out of which those persons were taken.

Grove. He did not.

Oates. Upon my oath, I did lie there three or four nights, more or less.

Sir Cr. Levins. You were in a disguise, Sir, at that time, were you not, and went by another name, and so the woman might not know you?

Oates. Yes, I did so.

L. C. J. You cannot make any great matter of this; she had some lodgers, and she knew them, but he went by a wrong name, and was in a disguise.

Langhorn. Mrs. Grove says, she knew all the lodgers that then lay there; pray ask her if she did not?

L. C. J. Do you remember who lodged in your house in April was a twelvemonth?

Grove. Yes, I do.

L. C. J. Name them.

Grove. Why, there was one pair of stairs, one Mr. Strange by name, and one Mrs. Fitzherbert, and above there lay my sister.

L. C. J. What, all the months of May and April?—Grove. Yes.

L. C. J. And not in June?

Grove. I am not demanded of June?

L. C. J. She answers exactly to them two months, what say you to March?

Grove. They were there in March.

L. C. J. Who lay in the room from whence the men were taken that were carried to prison?

Grove. There was one Master Crupper, and another young man that lay with him.

L. C. J. Why might not that be Mr. Oates?

Grove. He was one that was a prisoner by Mr. Oates's order. And Mrs. Fitzherbert lay there.

L. C. J. What, in that room whence the young men were taken out in April or May?

Grove. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Well, what say you to the other months, March, and June and July?

Grove. I was not to be examined further than the two months I spoke of before.

L. C. J. Look you, she says, that for April and May two gentlemen had the lodging that Mr. Oates says he lay in; but for any other time she was not to be examined. Well, have you any more witnesses?

Langhorn. Here is Mrs. Grove's maid. [Who stood up.]

L. C. J. Maid, can you tell who lay in Grove's house, in April and May was twelvemonth?—Maid. Yes, my lord, I can.

L. C. J. Who were they?

Maid. There was my mistress's brother and sister lay there.

Justice Pemberton. Do you know them all? what men lay there?

Maid. None but Master Strange, my lord.

L. C. J. Mrs. Grove said, that her house was full.

Maid. Indeed, my lord, there was her brother, Mr. York, and his wife.

L. C. J. But who is that Fitzherbert?

Maid. She is a gentlewoman.

L. C. J. Who lay there in March? and who lay there in July?

Maid. Master Strange and Mrs. Fitzherbert.

L. C. J. How long did they lie there?

Maid. In April, May, June, July and August.

L. C. J. She says they lay there in March, April, May, June, July and August, and her mistress said, they were there but a quarter of a year, only she said she was to be examined no further.

Langhorn. My lord, I desire to prove a copy of the Record in the Lords' House.

L. C. J. That is not to be given in evidence here.

Recorder. You know how far such a thing will be evidence, manage your own evidence well.

Langhorn. It is an extract out of the Journal of the House of Lords.

L. C. J. What particular do you pitch upon?

Langhorn. About those persons, who, he says, came over with him from St. Omers.

L. C. J. North. Do you think it reasonable, that any man should come to answer now, all that ever he hath sworn in his life? If you can shew any Record to contradict what he hath sworn here, shew it. Do you think he can come prepared to justify all he hath sworn in any other place?

Langhorn. He referred to that himself.

L. C. J. No, he does not.

Langhorn. But he hath said over and over, that sir John Warner came over with him, sir Thomas Preston, and Poole.

L. C. J. What should you urge that book for? Can you make any other proof?

Langhorn. I would have the persons called that took the Narrative of Ireland's Trial.

L. C. J. If you have any more witnesses, call them.

Langhorn. Won't your lordship allow me to prove by witnesses, what he affirmed, in relation to me, at another trial?

L. C. J. By no means, you must not meddle with that.

Langhorn. Pray, my lord, why not? I will prove the words spoken by a witness.

L. C. J. North. You must not; that is no evidence against you, nor can it be an evidence for you.

Langhorn. Then you take off the defence that I have, and make it as if I had never any.

Justice Atkins. That is not evidence in a civil cause, and therefore must not be evidence here.

Then came in my Lord of Castlemain.

L. C. J. What do you come for, sir? What is your name?

E. Castlemain. My name is Castlemain.

L. C. J. Are you my lord of Castlemain?

E. Castlemain. Yes, my lord, I am.

L. C. J. Does your lordship come as a witness for Mr. Langhorn? Mr. Langhorn, do you call my lord of Castlemain?

Langhorn. My lord, I do not know what he comes for, whether he comes for me, or not; perhaps he may.

E. Castlemain. My lord, I come to wait upon your lordship and the Court, to give you an account, that some of the witnesses that were summoned here for the prisoners, are so beaten and abused without, that they dare not come to give their evidence, for fear of being killed.

L. C. J. That is a thing that is not to be suffered; let us but see any person that dares but offer to meddle with them, and I'll assure you we will take care to see them punished, according as they do deserve.

L. C. J. North. It is a very unjustifiable thing, a thing that we will very severely punish, if they be hindered of free ingress and regress.

Justice Atkins. Indeed it is a very horrid thing that they should be so abused; they ought to have their liberty of coming and giving their evidence here, without any molestation.

E. Castlemain. I can assure your lordship, that one of them was so beaten and bruised, that we cannot tell but it may cost him his life.

L. C. J. Nay, we must look to such a thing as that; for it is by no means to be allowed of. If your lordship will but tell us who they are; let us but know them, and we will take care for the punishment of them; for we will shew ourselves just and fair, and give them all the fair play that can be.

Justice Pemberton. Mr. Langhorn, have you any more witnesses?

Langhorn. Call the woman that kept the White-horse tavern. [Who stood up.]

L. C. J. To what purpose do you call this woman?

Langhorn. I desire, my lord, to ask one question of Mr. Oates, touching the consult at the White-horse tavern in the Strand, how many persons met there?

Oates. Before that question be asked, I pray your lordship would ask her, When she came to the White-horse tavern, to keep it.

Witness. I do not keep it now.

L. C. J. When did you keep it?

Witness. I kept it in June, and I left it the beginning of July.

Oates. She does not come to the time.

L. C. J. Did you keep it all the year before that?

Witness. I kept it seven years before, till July last.

Langhorn. I would know of him, how many might be there at that time.

L. C. J. What number of persons do you say met at that consult?

Oates. That question, if it please your lordship, hath no reference to this trial, neither is it at all material; but because I have given the prisoners so much freedom, they impose upon me with questions.

L. C. J. It is a question they cannot expect a precise answer to from you; but yet I would have you give them as satisfactory an answer as you can, what number there might be there at a time.

Oates. My lord, I think there might be at the White-horse tavern, at a time, about 18 or 20.

L. C. J. Were they in one room, or in several rooms?

Oates. They were in two or three rooms.

Witness. Is this Mr. Oates, my lord?

L. C. J. Yes, that he is.

Witness. I never saw him in my house in my life.

L. C. J. Was there nobody never in your tavern, but who you knew? What! can you tell all the people that were ever in your tavern?

Witness. The most of my company were people that I knew.

L. C. J. What is your company?

Witness. Those that frequented my house.

L. C. J. Can you say who was in your house, April 24, 1678?

Witness. No, my lord, I will not undertake that, but I will give you as true an account as I can.

Langhorn. I will tell you why I ask this question. Mr. Oates did say, in his depositions before the Lords, there met fifty.

L. C. J. At several times in the day.

Langhorn. But this must all be in the morning.

L. C. J. Why so? Suppose there met, of that company, 20 in the morning, and then some went away and others came in their room, and so they did for divers times in the day, is not this properly said of me, that there might be about 50 at that consult?

Langhorn. He saith, in Coleman's trial, there met fifty, upon the 24th of April, and afterwards they adjourned into lesser colloquies.

Oates. I say, they met there the 24th day, but the consult was not dissolved till the 26th day at night.

L. C. J. North. You must go only upon what is sworn now. And we ask the question, upon your proposal, How many were there at a time? and he says about 18 or 20 at a time. Now if he proves there were 18 at one time, twenty at another time, and ten at another, that makes about fifty.

L. C. J. Good woman, is your house a little house?

Witness. It is a small inconsiderable house, there is not a room in it that will hold above a dozen. I never remembered so great a company was in my house at one time, but once, in all my seven years, and that was a Jury of the parish, and they could not be together, but were divided into three rooms.

Then there stood up a Stranger; who was sworn.

L. C. J. Well, sir, do you know the White-Horse Tavern in the Strand?

1st Witness. Yes, my Lord, I do very well.

L. C. J. Do you know the biggest room in the house?

1st Witness. Yes, I do, my Lord.

L. C. J. How many may dine there?

1st Witness. It may be 20 people. I have seen a dozen or 16 there often.

L. C. J. Did you know the tavern a year ago?

1st Witness. Yes, my Lord, this was a year ago.

[Then a second Witness stood up in the court, and said, That twenty-five or thirty might dine in one room that was backward, and another that was forward. And a third attested, That he was at a wedding, and there did dine about twenty in one room next the street.]

Mr. Recorder. If she make a Jury to be in three rooms, that is but four in a room.

Justice Pemberton. Those juries are sixteen generally, or more.

Langhorn. My Lord, I don't know this Tavern myself; but I thought it very considerable if they had not a room that would hold such a number as he spoke of, fifty.

L. C. J. But you see how unfortunately it happens. The matter had not been much, if it had been proved; but it is very unlucky, that these persons should be here in court, by whom the other is contradicted. It had been better it were never meddled with. That she should be so peremptory, in what standers-by know to be false, makes this contradiction in one thing to give a suspicion that all your witnesses may be false in all the rest.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Here is a gentleman of good quality, that saith, there have been fifty in a room.

Langhorn. My Lord, I hope neither the court nor the jury will reflect upon me for this.

L. C. J. No it cannot do that; but it reflects upon your evidence, especially this woman.

Langhorn. I have been a prisoner so long, and I know nothing but what friends and relations inform me.

L. C. J. The thing was reasonably offered, but it proves so unfortunate it will not hold. Have you any more Witnesses to call?

Langhorn. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. I pray call them.

Langhorn. My Lord, I desire I may examine them after the king's counsel have done.

Justice Pemberton. You may say what you will for your defence, but you must examine no new Witnesses then, Mr. Langhorn.

Langhorn. I must ask this gentleman a question or two, if the court think fit.

L. C. J. Propose them to the court; what is it you would have.

Langhorn. My Lord, it is in relation to a matter that happened at Ireland's trial, I know not whether it be proper, but the question I would ask is, Whether Ireland were here in August, or no?

L. C. J. He hath given you no occasion to ask this question at this trial: and is there any reason that we should examine him to such a thing? Do you think it reasonable, or according to law, that Mr. Oates should be examined, in your trial, concerning what he then said, of Ireland's being here in August, or not being here, when it is no part of his accusation that he brings against you? Can he be imagined to be prepared for such a justification, since he does not at all give any evidence of it here?

L. C. J. North. Since he gave not any occasion or use for such a proof now at this time it is not fit he should be examined about it: indeed yesterday he gave it in evidence, because it concerned a circumstance of time that related to the prisoners then to be tried.

L. C. J. It is true, as my Lord says, that it was yesterday proper, because he gave evidence that Fenwick and Ireland were here in August together. Now that did some way concern him, but you have no concern at all in it.

Justice Pemberton. That brought it in at that time, but this is a foreign matter, it cannot be here.

L. C. J. Have you any more witnesses, master Langhorn?

Langhorn. My Lord, Mr. Oates hath affirmed, when I asked him touching his receiving a reward, he said, he had his reward, for he had been out of purse six or seven hundred pounds; and it is my desire to examine a couple of witnesses touching the probability of that; for he was so very poor, before this happened, that it is impossible, without a purse being made for him, to lay out six or 700*l.*

L. C. J. Look you, here is the thing: He gives you an answer, to which he was not in the least bound, nor is it to be charged by you; he says he is out 700*l.* but that is not any evidence, nor is the Jury to take notice of it, nor is it to affect him. And would you have him give us an account how he came by that money?

Langhorn. My lord, I will tell you how far it concerns me; the proving of his indigency before this thing happened, will concern me thus far—

L. C. J. If you should prove this man in an indigent condition, what is that to the present purpose? it goes to no part of the evidence.

Langhorn. My lord, I ask the question for this reason; for certainly if he was so very indigent, it cannot be imagined in probability that any man would trust him with such a great sum, unless it were to give this evidence.

L. C. J. If you have any more witnesses, call them, and make an end of them; if not, then you may observe what you will to the court and jury, after the king's counsel hath done.

Justice Pemberton. But all your witnesses you must call now.

Langhorn. Doth your lordship debar me from using this copy of the Record of the House of Lords?

L. C. J. To what purpose would you have it read?

Langhorn. Because Bedlow therein says, that he had no person more to charge, either in the House or out of the House, than what he then charged.

L. C. J. What then?

Langhorn. I was not one of those persons, then he knew nothing against me.

L. C. J. It is but a memorial taken by a clerk, and do you think that his omission shall be conclusive to us?

Langhorn. It is the journal of the Lords House, my lord.

L. C. J. North. But can you think that can be used as evidence here? if you had an affidavit signed by the party, and had witnesses to prove that he did make such an oath, you say something.

Justice Pemberton. You cannot read that against his testimony, you understand that, being a lawyer. If you have any witnesses, call them, but you pick out collateral matters, and spend our time to no purpose.

L. C. J. Really, if it were a thing conducing to the point, I would very much stretch; but it being such a kind of thing as this is, he says he had nothing to say against any body else, and I was not named then: what is this to the fact you are charged with?

Justice Pemberton. Why, it may be, he did not remember it then, will you conclude him, that he should never remember it, or speak of it?

L. C. J. You see that now at these trials, he says sometimes, this is all I can remember at present, but by and by he recollects himself; would you hinder him from saying what he remembers?

L. C. J. North. Besides, upon an affidavit, or an answer in chancery, we never allow it, unless we have the party to prove that he took the oath.

Langhorn. I desire to know of Mr. Oates, whether he did distribute any of these commissions, and to whom? for he hath said I did.

Oates. That which I say, is this: Those commissions that I named, they were distributed, but the persons I do not know; I know the commissions were for those five persons, and in July or August he did say he had distributed them, but he said not to whom; only one, indeed, he sent by his son, to the eldest son of my lord Arundel of Wardour, to be commissary-general; and he came back, and said it was delivered.

Langhorn. You do not speak of any other.

Oates. I do not recollect that I know of any other.

Langhorn. I ask for this reason, because, in the Lords House, he hath charged me, that I sent my lord Arundel's commission, and that I sent it by my son, and that he saw a letter in my chamber, of the receipt of it.

Oates. My lord, there is some part of the evidence, that does reflect upon the Lords, which I charge not upon Mr. Langhorn, because I would not discover my evidences against the Lords. He goes now to expatiate upon the informations, but I hope the court will excuse me, because I reserve it for another trial.

Langhorn. I desire Mr. Lydcot may be asked, whether he did not hear Master Oates, at a former trial, say, (for so I find it in the Narrative) (it was at Coleman's trial) that he came to me the next day after the consult, and communicated it to me, and that he never saw me afterwards.

L. C. J. Do you know any testimony Master Oates gave concerning Master Langhorn?

Langhorn. You are not the person that took the trial, are you?

Lydcot. I know nothing of the business at all. I was at the trial, but I cannot particularly speak what was said there.

Langhorn. The persons that took the trial were summoned to be here. Call Mrs. Sylliard. (But she appeared not.) Call Mr. Blayney.

L. C. J. Here is Mr. Blayney, what would you ask him?

Langhorn. I would know of him, what Mr. Oates hath testified concerning me?

L. C. J. Do you know what Mr. Oates said concerning Mr. Langhorn?

Blayney. When, my lord?

L. C. J. Nay, I cannot tell.

Langhorn. At Coleman's trial, Sir.

Blayney. My lord, I was present at Coleman's trial, and I remember Mr. Oates did say something about Mr. Langhorn, but I have not my book here, I cannot tell what it was.

Langhorn. Here is the book, Sir, here is the Narrative.

Blayney. That was not printed by my copy, Sir.

Langhorn. Who were they that did take it?

Blayney. Of my own knowledge I do not know whose copy it was, but by hearsay.

L. C. J. It was taken as well as it could be taken, but you must not urge that which is but an historical narrative against him.

Mr. Just. Pemberton. Mr. Langhorn, do you think to convict a man by an History? To say a man is forsworn because he does not swear as that history says he did swear?

L. C. J. We will do you all the right, and give you all the fair play we can; but we are of opinion that it signifies nothing, that you can make no use of it.

Langhorn. If I can have no light, how can I imagine what they will charge me with?

L. C. J. Have you in any other case observed it? If a man be indicted of felony or treason, any capital crime, he is clapped up, and is not permitted to have a copy of the indictment, nor he cannot by law.

Langhorn. They know something of what they are accused for, they are confronted before a justice of peace.

Mr. Just. Pemberton. Why, I will suppose you had been examined, do you think your examination would have been evidence for you here?

[Then one Elizabeth Sylliard was called, but affirming, That she durst not speak unless the Court would promise her protection against the rabble; because some of the witnesses had been abused; which the Court not being able to do, otherwise than by promising to punish those that offered to meddle with her, if she brought them before them, she was, by Mr. Langhorn's consent, set aside, and not examined.]

Langhorn. She comes in relation to a point that happened at Reading's trial, where Mr. Bedlow did depose, That he did not say all he could have said against Mr. Whitebread and Mr. Fenwick, but that he did know more against them than he gave in evidence at their first trial.

Mr. Justice Pemberton. What is that to you?

Langhorn. That I take to be a kind of perjury in him; for they are sworn, To speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

L. C. J. Is this material in your case what he said about Whitebread and Fenwick?

Langhorn. It makes it material to make him uncreditable.

L. C. J. Mr. Whitebread made that objection, but he was answered; for he was told, That he could not tell all that he knew at that time, because he was in treaty with Mr. Reading about the lessening of his evidence against them, and the lords in the Tower, and the lords were to judge what measure they should have from him, by his kindness to Whitebread and Fenwick. If you have no more, the king's counsel will go on.

Sir Cr. Levins. My lord and gentlemen of the jury, you have heard the evidence that Mr. Langhorn hath given for the making of his defence, which hath been principally to reflect upon Mr. Oates; and he first calls Mr. Hilsley to prove, that whereas Mr. Oates did swear he came over with him, he affirms he did not; but it falls out, that Mr. Oates hath counterproved him by such a circumstance as does contradict him in what he says; for speaking of the loss of his money, Hilsley said somebody else had told him of it; but producing his witness for that, he only affirms, that Mr. Oates in his company was told, that Mr. Hilsley had lost his money, but not how nor where; but Mr. Oates gives you a particular circumstance, that he was cheated by a person he lent his money to, and that left him to pay the reckoning, which Mr. Hilsley does confess was true, and which he could not hear from the others, for the others did never know it. Gentlemen, they have brought you a great many other witnesses to prove, that Mr. Oates was not in England on the 24th of April, the time he says he was, and they all agree as to that time, though as to other times they are not so exact; but we shall give you as plain and as full an evidence that he was here at that time, as that you are there now, and shall very fully satisfy you in it. For that of sir John Warner, and sir Thomas Preston, they are matters that were transacted beyond sea; to be sure they did not come over by those names, no more did Mr. Oates himself; therefore it would be hard to find out these persons, or to give you so particular an account of them that were thus in disguises, and had changed their names; but truly if that were a matter done in England, it were far more easy for us to confront their testimony in that; for matters that are done here lie more ready for our proof, than those that are done beyond sea; for the last woman that he called, which was the woman about the White-Horse tavern, her evidence would have gone as publically for truth, if it had been a matter done in Flanders, as any thing could be in the world; but it happening to be near home, it hath the ill fortune to meet with a very sudden answer, which is a manifest proof how they stretch to help themselves, and in my opinion this contradiction overthrows all their evidence. Gentlemen, we will call our witnesses, and prove it as plainly as any thing can be in the world, that Mr. Oates was here at that time. First swear William Walker. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Oates?

Walker. Yes, Sir, I have known him 7 or 8 years.

L. C. J. When did you see him in England last year?

Walker. I saw him the latter end of March, 1678, or towards the middle of April following. I saw him then in a disguise, insomuch as that I knowing what he was, and what he had been, I could not a great while recollect the face of the man, and it was a great trouble to me, that having known him so many years, I should not then know him. I went home, but could not recollect myself that night; but before I rose again the next morning, I did recollect myself that it was Titus Oates, and I presently turned myself out of my bed, and went to a gentlewoman whose name I did not then well know, to enquire of her about it. After the salutation, said I, how does Mr. Oates? Said she, knocking her hand upon the counter, He is an undone man: Why, what is the matter, said I? He is turned, said she, to the Church of Rome: Do you know where he is, said I? No, said she, but he is lurking up and down the town, and only dares appear in the evenings. Well then, said I, I saw him later than you did; for I saw him between St. Martin's-Lane and Leicester-House yesterday, but he was in a disguise: and I told her what habit he was in.

L. C. J. What time was that?

Walker. It was about ten of the clock in the morning.

L. C. J. But what time of the year was it?

Walker. It was the latter end of March, or the middle of April.

Just. Pemberton. It was before the end of April.

Walker. Ay, ay, my lord.

L. C. J. And that contradicts all your witness; for they say, that he was there all March, and all April, and all May, nay from December to June.

Langhorn. He hath said, the latter end of March, or the middle of April, I would have him be as certain as he can.

L. C. J. He cannot be certain; for those things in point of time, you know and all mankind must agree, that a thing done a year ago that was of no greater importance at that time cannot so easily be remembered, or that he should take such special notice of the critical day. What man in the world does remember or take notice so as to charge himself in what week or what month such an accidental thing as this happened? But to satisfy Mr. Langhorn I ask you, can you speak any more particularly than you have done?

Walker. Because I would not be mistaken, or do any one any wrong, I do rather take an uncertain time than a certain, but I do think it was in the month of April, and towards the middle of the month; that is all I can say.

Langhorn. But how is he sure, since he is so uncertain in his memory, that this was 1678, and not 1677?

Walker. Because my lord, it was but a little more than a year since, and I am able to judge of the year as well as another.

L. C. J. Do you remember what you went about?

Walker. I was wont, about that time of the year, to receive money of my lord Thomas Howard, and upon that errand I came to town then.

L. C. J. But are you sure it was Mr. Oates that you saw?

Walker. Yes, my lord, for according to my apprehension I did know the face when I first saw it, but I could not recollect who it was till I had refreshed my memory, and the next morning I did so, and then concluded it was he.

Justice Dolben. How came you hither?

Walker. I was brought here for a witness.

Justice Dolben. Did you discover this to Mr. Oates or did Mr. Oates first come to you, to put you in mind of it?

Walker. I had discoursed with some persons about it, a while after the plot was discovered, and so I suppose it came by accident to him.

Then Mrs. Ives was sworn, and stood up.

L. C. J. Well mistress, what say you?

Ives. This is the gentleman that told me this business.

L. C. J. What did he tell you?

Ives. He asked me when I saw Titus Oates? I told him I had not seen him a long time, that he was gone beyond sea: He asked me, if I never saw nor heard from him since? I told him, No; but of late some of his friends had told me, that he was about the town, and that they had seen him, but they did not know the place where he lodged. Then, said he, I have seen him since you; for I was yesterday going in Leicester-fields, and going along I saw him, for he was in coloured clothes, and very much altered from what he had been.

L. C. J. When was this? How long was this ago?

Ives. It was about the middle of April was twelvemonth, and I remember it by a very good token; for his father Mr. Oates came then to my house to see me, and that is the first month that our new thin cheeses come in, and I did then ask him, if he would not come in and eat some new thin cheese; and when he was come in and sat down eating of cheese, and drinking a draught of drink, I was a saying to him, pray, sir, when did you see your son? Said he, I have not seen him of late, I heard from him a little while ago, but I have not seen him: Then said I, I can tell you news of him. Here was such a gentleman in my shop that says he met him in Leicester fields, but in a disguise, and he told me what habit he was in.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Set up Butler. [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. How long have you known Mr. Oates?

Butler. I have known him two or three years before he went to sea.

L. C. J. When did you see him last year?

Butler. When he came back, he came to my master's house the beginning of May last was twelvemonth.

L. C. J. Who is your master?

Butler. Sir Richard Barker, my lord.

L. C. J. What did he come there for?

Butler. He came to enquire for Dr. Tongue.

L. C. J. Did you know him?

Butler. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. Are you sure that is he?

Butler. This is the gentleman.

L. C. J. And what said he?

Butler. I was in the gate about my coach, and he comes in and asked me if Dr. Tongue was within. I told him, no; at present I did not know him, because he was in such a disguised habit; I knew him very well before, because he went in such a habit as he does now: but this is the man, and Titus Oates is his name. Said I, 'Mr. Oates, you are welcome into England again,' but he took no notice, but went forward into the house, but he made but a little stay there and came out again; it seems somebody had affronted him, and laughed at him, because he was more like a shepherd than a minister: his hair was cut and he had a gray coat on, and plain shoes, and a flapping hat; and so he went out of the gate, and would not take any notice of me, or what I said.

Langhorn. How does he know it was in 1678, and not in 1677? he says it was in the month of May was twelvemonth.

Butler. I know it by this circumstance: in February I went down into Lincolnshire, and I came up again the same month: sir Richard Barker was then sick and in the country, and there he was a great while; and when he came to town I did acquaint my master that Dr. Oates was there to enquire for Dr. Tongue, in the strangest habit that ever I saw man in my life.

L. C. J. How long after he had been there was it that you did tell your master?

Butler. It was as soon as my master came back, as soon as I saw him, it might be a week.

L. C. J. Was it about a week or a fortnight?

Butler. I do not know exactly.

Mr. Belwood. Then swear Cicily Mayo. (which was done.)

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Oates?

Mayo. I never saw his face before that time, nor had I taken notice of him then, but that there was a young man that lived with sir R. Barker who had a great acquaintance with him, and seeing him in that garb he called me to the window, and said, Mr. Oates is surely turned Quaker or Jesuit by the change of his habit: no, said I, he is no Quaker, for he hath got a periwig on.

L. C. J. Maid, when was this?

Mayo. This was before Whitsuntide.

L. C. J. Which Whitsuntide?

Mayo. Whitsuntide was twelvemonth.

L. C. J. How long before that was it?

Mayo. It was a matter of a fortnight before as I remember.

L. C. J. Are you sure you know him now?

Mayo. Yes, this is the man.

L. C. J. North. Did you tell your master of it?

Mayo. I was not so well acquainted with him as to speak to sir R. Barker about it, but the other servants, they told him.

Mr. Belwood. Set up Phillip Page. [Who was sworn.] Do you know Mr. Oates?

Page. Yes, my lord, I have known him these five years.

L. C. J. When did you see him?

Page. About May was twelvemonth.

L. C. J. Where?

Page. In sir R. Barker's house.

L. C. J. Are you sure this was the man?

Page. Yes, I am sure it was he.

Langhorn. What time in May was it?

Page. About the beginning of May.

L. C. J. And you take it upon your oath that you saw Mr. Oates the beginning of May was twelvemonth in sir R. Barker's house?

Page. Yes, My Lord, I do.

Justice Atkins. What is become of the boy that spoke to the woman about him?

Mayo. He is dead, my lord.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Then swear sir Richard Barker. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Do you know Dr. Oates, Sir?

Sir R. Barker. I have known him these many years, I have known him from a child.

L. C. J. Did you see him about a year ago?

Sir R. Barker. My lord, I did not see him then; I was out of town; but as the servants tell your lordship, so they told me, when I came home, that Mr. Oates had been there in a strange kind of habit, that he was either turned Quaker or Jesuit. I did very much admire at it, for I had seen his father but a little while before, and he told me nothing of it, I had a mind to have given him a living while he was in our church.

L. C. J. When did your servants tell you they saw him?

Sir R. Barker. They told me when I came home, which was in the latter end of Whitsun-week, or the beginning, as I remember.

L. C. J. Was it in Whitsuntide?

Sir R. Barker. It was about that time; they told me the odd kind of posture he was in, and that young fellow that they speak of, told me several passages of Mr. Oates. (He is now dead.)

L. C. J. But when did they speak of it to you?

Sir R. Barker. My lord, when I came home, two or three of them told me of it with great admiration, as they have told your lordship and the Court; and I said to one of them, 'What! did he leave no message?' They told me he enquired for Dr. Tongue, and asked for me, but that was all they told me.

L. C. J. Come, was it in May?

Sir R. Barker. Yes, my lord, it was in May was twelvemonth.

L. C. J. How do you know it was May was twelvemonth?

Sir R. Barker. It was last year about the beginning of May.

L. C. J. North. Nay, he tells you this, when you asked him the question, Whether he knew Mr. Oates? Yes, said he, I did know him formerly; and when he was of our church I did intend then to have given him a benefice.

Langhorn. Certainly his change, that is, his becoming a Roman Catholic, could not be a thing so strange that he should intend then to give him a benefice.

Justice Atkins. But hark you, Sir, I suppose you remember it by your own sickness very well?

Sir R. Barker. Yes, my lord, very well; I had a little distemper upon me, and Dr. Needham of the Charter-house came to see me; and I lay sick a matter of six or seven weeks, and the latter end of my sickness I continued taking of physic till I came to town.

L. C. J. But you are sure of the year by that?

Sir R. Barker. Yes, my lord; and yesterday I should have acquainted your lordship and the Court, that there are some persons not unknown to some of the bench, if not near allied to them, and that is sir William Tyrill's family, of Lincolnshire, his grandson, who had been at Cambridge and then came to visit me, though I happened not to be at home, they being my wife's relations; and it was before Whitsuntide, because he came to take the advantage of that season of the year: and he had conversed with Mr. Oates, but he is not in town at present; and there are two or three of the university that conversed with Mr. Oates at that time.

Justice Pemberton. Are they here?
 Sir R. Barker. I only tell it you for a circumstance.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Then set up Mr. Clay.
 [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Oates?

Clay. Yes, I know him very well.

L. C. J. How long have you known him.

Clay. Since last April was a twelvemonth.

L. C. J. Where did you see him then?

Clay. I saw him at Mr. Howard's, my lord.
L. C. J. What Howard? One of my lord of Norfolk's brothers?

Clay. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. What is his Christian name?

Clay. His name is Mr. Charles Howard, my lord.

L. C. J. Where was it?

Clay. In his house.

L. C. J. Where was his house?

Clay. It was part of Arundel house, it is now made a new street.

L. C. J. Did you speak with him there?

Clay. Yes, we saluted one another, and he said, Your servant, Sir. I am sure I saw him there.

L. C. J. How often did you see him in that house?—Clay. Twice.

L. C. J. In April and May?

Clay. Yes, in April, and in the beginning of May.

Langhorn. I ask you if you do remember any circumstance of it, to bring this to your memory?

L. C. J. By what token do you remember it, that it was April and May?

Clay. By this token, that Mr. Charles Howard told me he was one that was come from beyond the seas, from St. Omers; And, said he, he hath some thoughts of being a Jesuit, but I think I shall divert him from that.

L. C. J. How do you know that it was that month?

Clay. It was in the latter end of April, and the beginning of May.

Just. Dolben. Are you sure it was last year?

Clay. Yes, I am, it was in the year 1678.

Langhorn. Was it at dinner, or no?

Clay. No, no.

Langhorn. Did he dine there that day?

Clay. I did not see him at dinner, but I saw him there twice.

L. C. J. Are you a Roman Catholic?

Clay. Yes, I am of the church of Rome, but not of the court of Rome.

L. C. J. That is no new distinction.

L. C. J. North. No, they have the court of Rome distinct from the church, and particular favourites of it, as other princes have, and there are those that profess themselves of that religion, that won't acknowledge the exorbitant power that the pope claims.

Langhorn. Will your lordship please to ask him, whether he does remember that Mr. Oates did at that time play with Mr. Howard's son, and instruct him, and talk to him about his learning, and put questions to him?

L. C. J. Did he talk or put any questions to Mr. Howard's son about learning his book?

Clay. Not any thing that I heard.

Langhorn. Was Mr. Howard's son there?

Clay. No, not in the room, as I think, I cannot tell certainly, my memory is frail.

Then Mr. Smith was called and sworn.

L. C. J. How long have you known Dr. Oates?

Smith. I knew him before the Fire, he was my scholar at the school where I was usher.

Justice Pemberton. What time did you see him last year?

Smith. The beginning of May.

Justice Pemberton. How do you know that?

Smith. He came to see me, and dined with me.

L. C. J. Where?

Smith. At Islington, at my house there.

L. C. J. How long was he with you?

Smith. Three or four hours.

L. C. J. What time was it?

Smith. It was, as I take it, the first Monday in May, and I gave this reason for my remembrance, why it was in May, because we dined by the fire-side, being a little cold, of which we took particular notice.

L. C. J. And you wondered that you should dine by the fire-side in May?

Langhorn. Was it on a Monday in May?

Smith. It was on the first Monday in May, to the best of my remembrance.

L. C. J. Was there none of the family there besides?

Smith. Yes, there was my wife there.

L. C. J. Why did you not bring her to testify the same?

Oates. He cannot find his wife.

L. C. J. North. How long do you say was he with you?

Oates. Three or four hours.

L. C. J. What did you talk of?

Smith. We talked about his travels, about his journey into Spain, and to Valladolid, and Salamanca.

Justice Pemberton. Was he in a priest's habit, or in another habit?

Smith. My lord, he was in a cinnamon-coloured suit, trimmed with green ribbons.

Sir Cr. Levinz. We have done with our evidence, my lord.

L. C. J. Now, Mr. Langhorn, the king's counsel have done with their witnesses.

Langhorn. Pray call Mr. Charles Howard and his wife.

L. C. J. I do not think Mr. Charles Howard will appear.

L. C. J. North. I believe he does not think it safe to come here; we know upon what account.

But upon calling, after a while, he did appear and stood up.

L. C. J. Well, what have you to say to Mr. Howard?

Langhorn. The question that I would ask him is this: It hath been affirmed here by Mr.

Clay, that old gentleman, that about the end of April, or beginning of May last was a twelvemonth, he did meet Mr. Oates at Mr. Howard's house; I would know the truth of it.

L. C. J. Mr. Howard, you have heard the question, do you know Mr. Oates?

Howard. Yes, my Lord, very well.

L. C. J. How long have you known him?

Howard. Above two years.

L. C. J. When was he at your house?

Howard. My lord, he hath been at Arundel house about two years ago, and several times since.

L. C. J. Was he there about a year ago?

Howard. Thereabouts he was.

L. C. J. Do you think he was there about May was twelvemonth?

Howard. My lord, after July I remember he was there.

L. C. J. Was he there in May?

Howard. No, my lord, not to my remembrance.

Langhorn. Pray, Sir, when did your son die?

Howard. The 5th of May was two-year, 1677.

L. C. J. Why, how does that appear to be any thing in this case? he did not say that Mr. Howard's son was there.

Langhorn. He said he was in the house, but he could not tell whether he was in the room or no.

L. C. J. You asked him whether he talked any Latin, or asked him any questions; and he says, he cannot tell whether the son were there in the room or no.

L. C. J. North. He says 'About two year ago I remember he was at my house, and about a year ago,' which contradicts all your witness.

Langhorn. No, he says, 'About two years ago I remember he was there, and about a twelvemonth ago, after July;' but he cannot remember whether he was here in April and May was a twelvemonth.

Howard. Mr. Oates was in my lodging in April 1677, and then my child was alive, and dined together with him and Mr. Clay.

L. C. J. That is two years ago.

Howard. Yes, my lord, two years ago Mr. Oates was there with Mr. Clay, but not since.

L. C. J. Call Mr. Clay again to confront him in that.

Oates. I did not know Mr. Clay two years ago.

L. C. J. You are mistaken, I believe, for Mr. Clay does pretend that he did but just begin to know Mr. Oates in April was a twelvemonth, and so Oates swears too.

Just. Pemberton. And he says nothing whether you had a child died or no.

L. C. J. When was the time that you first knew Mr. Oates?

Clay. The latter end of April, last year.

L. C. J. Did you ever know him before that time?

Clay. I never did.

L. C. J. Do you remember that ever you dined with him?

Clay. I do not remember the day exactly, and I do not remember that ever I dined with him.

Just. Pemberton. But he is positive that he did not know him but a year ago.

L. C. J. Do you remember whether Howard's son was alive?

Clay. He had a son alive at that time.

Oates. He had one son indeed that died a year before Mr. Clay and I met there.

Howard. I speak of my eldest son, who died two years ago.

Clay. I never knew him.

L. C. J. Well, it is plain there was a mistake in it, he spoke of a son that was then, and is now alive, and you speak of your eldest son that died two years ago. Have you any more witnesses, Mr. Langhorn?

Langhorn. No, my lord, I have no more witnesses.

L. C. J. Well, would you say any thing? If you would, say what you have a mind to say.

Langhorn. My lord, I am charged here by two witnesses, the first is Mr. Oates; if I can prove any one point (in answer to that which he hath given in evidence) not to be true, then I conceive, my lord, he ought to be set aside: And I think it hath been clearly proved, That whereas he said sir Thomas Preston came over with him in April, it hath been clearly proved he was then at Liege; and whereas he hath affirmed, sir John Warner, Mr. Poole, and two or three more that were at St. Omers, came over with him, I had proved that not to be true, beyond any contradiction: Then, as to the witnesses about his own not coming over in April, Mr. Hilsley says he came not over with him in the packet-boat; and the others say that he was sick in the Infirmary, after Mr. Hilsley came away: These points being thus proved, I think there can be no credit given to what he says; for I can say, and I know it to be truth, that from November 1677, to this very day, I never saw him. I have been a close prisoner so long, and have had but one week's time to provide, and therefore must be fain to take such information as my friends and relations could pick up, to answer what he hath said in his Narratives, supposing he would have said the same here; therefore I am not able to make any better defence.

L. C. J. Did you never know Mr. Oates?

Langhorn. I have seen him once or twice.

L. C. J. When was that?

Langhorn. In Michaelmas-Term, 1677.

L. C. J. Upon what occasion?

Langhorn. He brought me a letter from one of my sons, my younger son in Spain, and then he told me he was going to St. Omers: he said he could not be settled in any of the colleges in Spain, and therefore he would go to St. Omers: and from that day I never saw him till I saw him in the court: I hope, truly, I have well proved that he was not here in England when he says he was, but that I must leave to the jury: but surely these boys cannot be supposed to have any design, or to be bribed by any reward, for I never saw the face of any of them till now.

L. C. J. North. They are all papists, and speak in a general cause.

Langhorn. If that be an objection against them I think it is hard if they are not to be believed because they are papists and friends; then the other, on the contrary, are not to be believed because they are enemies: I think it is clear that he did not lodge at Grove's house; and I think it is clear that he did not come over in the packet-boat with Mr. Hilsley, and that sir Thomas Preston did not come over with him, nor Warner, nor Poole; and if any of these points be clear for me, I think his testimony ought to be set aside. Now, as to what Bedlow says, in truth it is impossible for me to examine any witnesses, and that I think will be your lordship's opinion; it will not seem probable that one that was in my way of practice should become a clerk to register letters, and to keep accounts of any particular religious order, as he makes me to do; or, if I were, that I should admit Mr. Bedlow to be privy to those accounts; but that I must leave to the court; my lord, it is impossible to prove a negative: Mr. Bedlow is a person that I have no acquaintance with; truly I do not know that ever I saw him before this time in all my life; though it is possible I may have seen him, but I do not know that ever I did: now, that I should admit such a person to such a privacy in accounts of this nature, (if I were guilty of them) seems very improbable; but yet, as I said, it is impossible to prove a negative. If I had known what he would have charged upon me before, perhaps I might have made a better defence; and for those witnesses that I have had, they were prepared by such friends as thought they would be useful for me. These men have had time to get their witnesses together: I never saw one of mine till they came into the court. I hope, my lord, I shall find no disadvantage in my coming here upon the account of my religion, for that would seem as if you condemned me merely for that; I disclaim all principles of disloyalty; and I do assure your lordship, I do believe it is damnation to any one that shall go about to kill the king, or deprive him of his government; I shall leave the rest to your lordship and the jury.

L. C. J. Look you, gentlemen, you have had an account, in the first part of the evidence, in general, that there was a general design of bringing in Popery; and in order to that, as the best and quickest means to accomplish it, to destroy the king. And without doubt they were in the right, for that matter: to destroy the king, was the most effectual course to introduce popery they could take. Whether they would do it, or no, is not now any question; but, how much Mr. Langhorn, the prisoner at the bar, is concerned in it? And that depends upon the testimony of witnesses.

The testimony that Mr. Oates gives against him, amounts but to thus much: I cannot affirm, says he, that Mr. Langhorn was at the consult, on the 24th of April, at the Whitehorse tavern, where they signed the agreement to destroy the king: but this I can say, That the next day, or within a day or two, I went, by order from the Fathers, Whitebread and Harcourt, to Langhorn's chamber, and acquainted him with what they had agreed upon. And he swears, That Mr. Langhorn did lift up his hands and eyes, and pray to God to give them good success. He tells you further, that after some talk with him, about bringing in of popery, and destroying of the king, he had also discourse concerning several commissions; that he saw about seven or eight of them, and that he told him, he had more: one for my lord Bellasis, to be general, and one for himself to be advocate-general, with others; but those, he says, he saw and perused them: and though he does not know of the delivery of those several commissions, yet he does know of the delivery of one to his son, to be carried to my lord of Arundel's eldest son. and he does say, That Mr. Langhorn did tell him, he had sent it; and swears, that he had some discourse with him, concerning killing the king.

Bedlow, he comes, and swears, that he was there twice, and that he saw him transcribe letters; and that the effect of one of them was, that they were prepared with arms, and all things, but money. That the garrisons all were ready to be delivered up to them, but they staid only for this, and 6,000*l.* would do it, which the Benedictines were to raise. If that came, then there was nothing wanting. They had an easy king, whom they could destroy as they pleased; an army in readiness, every thing in good posture, and no time like this, to bring in popery: which discourse, he says, was before Mr. Coleman. Here is the effect then of those letters which by him were written into a book, and in which this Plot and this contrivance was mentioned. These were transcribed by Mr. Langhorn, says he, while Mr. Coleman and I walked in his chamber. I saw him write them. And he swears it.

Now the matter is this: if these two witnesses do swear true, then is this indictment of treason highly proved. For the contriving, to bring in popery, to levy war, and, to kill the king, (which, when he was acquainted withal, he lift up his hands and eyes, and begged of God to give it good success; and which Bedlow says, was the effect of the letters that he transcribed into the book) Mr. Langhorn himself will not deny to be high-treason: and when this is sworn here by two witnesses, he must either invalidate their testimony, or acknowledge it just, if you find him guilty of the indictment with which he is charged. Now the question is, what defence there is against it?

Mr. Langhorn says, If I can disprove a witness in any one material thing that he says, then will it take off from his credit in every thing he says. And first as to Mr. Oates; sith he, I did know him, I must confess, but I never saw him since the year 1677. The thing that Mr. Oates charges him with, is in April or May 1678; or thereabouts. And Mr. Langhorn says, he never saw him since 1677. Why, Mr. Oates, saith he, was not here in England; and produces a great many witnesses, that came from beyond sea, to testify, that Mr. Oates was there in April and May, and longer. And whereas Mr. Oates says, that there came over in his company with him, sir John Warner, sir Thomas Preston, Mr. Poole, and others; he proves by some witnesses, that Mr. Oates was there both months; and by others, that sir John Warner was at Watton, and sir Thomas Preston at Liege, and Poole at St. Omers, at the time that Mr. Oates says they came over with him: and this, says he, I hope will be plain evidence why you should not believe Mr. Oates; and the rather, because these witnesses are such, says he, as that I do not so much as know their faces; and you will not presume, that people to whom I am wholly a stranger, should come hither from St. Omers to testify a lie for me.

In answer to this, I say, it is no good argument for all that; for though I believe they are strangers to him, they are not strangers to the errand they came about. They came to defend all the Roman Catholics, whom we would hang here for a Plot; and they are sent over for that purpose, as far as their testimony can go. How far that is, though they are not upon their oaths, (for the law will not permit it) I must say to you, in favour of the prisoner at the bar, as I did to the jury yesterday, you must not take it, therefore, as if it were mere talk, and no more; nor reject them too much because they do not swear: They would swear, it is likely, if the law would allow it. Only one remark I must observe to you upon their own evidence: the St. Omers gardener (which is one of them) takes upon him to give a very exact account of Mr. Oates, in the months of April and May; but when I came to enquire, what he knew of him in the months of June and July; he tells you, those were not the months in question.

But on the other side, did not the principles of their religion so teach, and make us to know, that they will not stick at any wickedness to propagate it: did not the best and chiefest doctors of their church preach and print it: did not his holiness the pope allow it; and never condemn any one book in the world that hath asserted the lawfulness of deposing and killing kings, for separating from their religion: did not they teach and practise all sorts of equivocations, and that a lye does God good service, if it be for the propagation of the faith: were not these young boys capable of having this doctrine instilled into them; and, were not they bred up in colleges chiefly to serve that end; then Mr. Langhorn had said something. Neither are these things artlessly objected against them, for the doctrines of their church are so false and pernicious, so destructive and so bloody; and the way they take to come off from all vows, oaths, and Sacraments, by dispensations before-hand, or indulgence and pardons afterwards, is a thing still so much worse, that they are really unfit for human society. They should get their pope, if they would not have it thrown into their dish, and have it believed by us; I say, they should get the pope of Rome to decrie and anathematize such doctrines of deposing and killing kings, and discharging subjects from their allegiance: but that will never be; for his holiness the pope will keep himself where he is, and will part with nothing that he hath of advantage over any.

Look you, gentlemen, thus much I cannot omit, with a good conscience, to say, the profession, the doctrines, and the discipline of the church of Rome is such, that it does take away a great part of the faith that should be given to these witnesses; nevertheless we must be fair and should hear them, if we could not answer what they alledge, by evidence to the contrary. Mr. Oates, therefore, to justify himself, hath produced, I think, seven or eight witnesses, that do prove that he was here in the latter end of April, and beginning of May, which does contradict all their testimony, who do say, he was abroad all along from December to June, and that they saw him every other day.

It is true, if we were certain that what these young men spake, were indeed so as they say, it is impossible for Mr. Oates's testimony to be believed. If I were satisfied, that really and truly Mr. Oates was not here, but was six months together there, and that he hath invented this story, and made this himself; I could no longer confide in the man nor find Mr. Langhorn guilty: yet is not the time really the substance of the thing, though he hath made it so now, because the consult was the 24th of April, at which he was present; and he did go, he says, to Mr. Langhorn, within a day or two after, to acquaint him with the resolution of it.

To this end hath Mr. Oates produced seven or eight witnesses that saw him, as they swear. He hath produced a minister, that says he saw him in a disguise, but having known him before recollected him to be the man. He hath produced a woman that agrees with that story; for she says, that he came and talked with her about it, and told her then, that he had seen Mr. Oates the day before, and gives you a token why it was about that time of the year. Now, if this be not a new matter, and new found out, this woman (if she swears true) does justify the other in what he did say a year ago, when they could never imagine that any great weight and moment should be laid upon that accident of his seeing Oates in the street. He hath produced to you the coachman of sir Richard Barker, that says, he knew him well when he came to his master's house. There he called him by his name, that asking for Dr. Tongue, but not finding him within, he went away presently; that he was in disguise; that they acquainted their master with it, as soon as he came home; and their master says, that so they did. And the person that then lived in the house, and now is dead, said to the maid, Yonder is Mr. Oates, I think he is either turned quaker; or priest; what a kind of habit he is got into! No, said the maid, he can't be a quaker, because he wears a periwig; but she says, he named him to her, Oates, and that this is the man, she knew him since. It is the same man that the young man spoke to her about.

He hath produced farther one of their own religion, one that is a papist still, and he says he saw him twice at Mr. Charles Howard's in Arandel-House. There was indeed some perplexity they would have put upon it, by reason of Mr. Howard's son being dead a year before; the witness says he did not know the son. A papist he confesses himself expressly to be, if not a priest; and I would not ask him the question, because it is not fair to make him accuse himself: but he does swear expressly, he saw Mr. Oates at Mr. Charles Howard's in April or May, which contradicts all their witnesses. He also produces a schoolmaster, that tells that he dined with him the beginning of May; and I remembered it, says he, very well, for we dined by the fire-side, which gave me occasion to wonder at it, in May, and remember it. He says, moreover, that he staid three or four hours with him, and talked of all his travels in Spain. Now must all these people be downright perjured; it can be no mistake but they are all falsely forsworn if there be not truth in it. And when here are seven or eight witnesses positively swearing against the affirmation of so many others, we leave the credit of both sides to you who are the judges of the fact.

There is indeed (and I will repeat it for you, for I would not miss any thing, as near as I can, that would make for the prisoner's advantage) there is a proof concerning sir John Warner, and Preston, and Poole, that they were there at the time, and there hath been no answer given to it: but I say still, it is the same thing; for if you do not believe those witnesses to speak true, that affirm that Oates was there all the time, but rather believe that he was here by seven or eight people that testify it, I say, if you cannot believe he was there, you will never change your mind for one circumstance.

Langhorn. They are not the same witnesses.

L. C. J. It is true, they are not; you have four or five witnesses that speak apart, but two of them do say, that they knew Oates also was there at the same time that they speak that sir John Warner was at home.

Langhorn. Not those two of Liege, my lord, about sir Thomas Preston.

L. C. J. No, they do not, for I leave it to you of the jury, upon the whole matter: there is little more to be said by me. If so he credit it to be given to these witnesses of Oates more than to the others, then you must find him guilty, and the rather, because I do a little suspect, they come over instructed, to say what they do. You find they apply themselves to the thing they came for; and not only the gardener but another could tell you (which hath a very great influence upon me; as to their credit) that the months of April and May were the months in question, and they were not to be examined any farther. So that it looks as if these young men were sent of an errand; and though you do not know them, Mr. Langhorn, and are innocent as to any tampering with them, yet I am afraid they are come to serve the Catholic cause, as they call it. For they are very well taught, and they keep to those months of April and May, of all the months in the year. Then they bring the woman of the White-Horse-tavern, where the consult of the 24th of April was; and what is the use they would make of her? Why, it is that Mr. Oates should make a story of fifty fathers being in her tavern at one time (but he insists now there was a matter of twenty) when there was not a room in her house that would hold ten: but you hear how she was answered, from testimony rising up in the court of themselves, that were acquainted with her house, and know, that forty people may dine in two of her rooms, and the king's counsel observed well, how chance itself hath put to silence this evidence. So that when matters are alledged to be done at home there is not so great a difficulty as in proving things that are done abroad.

I leave it to you, Sirs. Here is a gentleman that stands at the bar, upon his life, on the one hand: but if Mr. Oates says true, all our lives, and liberties, our king, and religion, are at the stake, on the other hand. God defend that innocent blood should be shed, and God defend us also from Popery, and from all popish plots, and from all the bloody principles of papists, which are very cruel, as we know by experience: and you cannot blame us to look to ourselves. For I must tell you, the Plot is proved as plain as the day, and that by Oates; and further, Oates's testimony is confirmed by that which can never be answered. For when he comes at his first testimony, and says, that upon the 24th of April, such a consult was summoned, and held, it falls out; that five days after a letter is found amongst Harcourt's Papers, (a principal person in the design), which does order the meeting upon the 24th of April, being the day after St. George's feast, and gives them a caution that they should not come too soon to town; that they should not appear too much in London, for fear of discovering the design, and of disclosing 'That, the nature of which requires secrecy.' Plainly than this is hardly to be writ from a Jesuit, especially in so dangerous a matter. And what can be answered to this letter, that is found in a priest's hands, four days after Mr. Oates had given in his information about it?

Put all this together, and if you be satisfied herein, you may judge the better, as to the particular business of Mr. Langhorn, how far the testimony of Oates and Bedlow affect him. You know what you do. And for Bedlow, it is true, what he says, that there is nothing to be said to his evidence, because no man can prove a negative; and he swears expressly, that he had this discourse with him, of these treasonable matters, killing the king, and altering religion. If this be so, and you are satisfied in that particular, (and that a man may very well be, as to the substance,) I do not see any considerable answer that is given. I say once more, there is the life of a gentleman at stake, and there are all our lives at the stake: Follow you your consciences; do wisely, do honestly, and consider what is to be done.

L. C. J. North. With my lord's leave, because there hath been mention made of this letter, which goes much in confirmation of Mr. Oates's testimony; it is in Court, but it hath not been produced at the bar, I desire it may, if your lordship please.

Sir Cr. Levinz. It is here in Court, my lord, we will give your lordship an account how we came by it. Swear sir Thomas Doleman, Which was done.

Sir Cr. Levinz. Sir Thomas, did you find the Paper amongst Mr. Harcourt's Papers?

Sir Thomas Doleman. I found this letter among the papers of Mr. Harcourt, that were committed to my search.

L. C. J. When did you find it, Sir?

Sir Thomas Doleman. It was some 5 or 6 days after Mr. Oates had given in his information to the king and council.

L. C. J. Do you mark it, Gentlemen? After Mr. Oates had told the council of the consult on the 24th of April, is this letter found.

L. C. J. North. It is in confirmation of Mr. Oates's testimony.

[Then the Letter was read, being the same with that in page 350 in the Trial of Whitebread, Harcourt, &c.]

L. C. J. This letter is only as to the Plot in general, and not to be applied to Mr. Langhorn in particular.

Langhorn. Mr. Oates might very well be able to speak of this meeting of this congregation, as they call it, before this letter was taken, it is easy to believe, because Mr. Oates being at St. Omers, I suppose the like letters of summons might come over to St. Omers, to fetch some of them over hither.

L. C. J. You say well; but if you have but the luck to give me an answer to a thing or two, you will have better fortune, and more skill than the priests. It is true, he might, perchance, know of the consult, if he were at St. Omers: But will you tell us what that design was? And what is the meaning of putting those words into the letter, That they should not come too soon to London, nor appear too much about town, for fear of discovering that design, which they knew required secrecy in its own nature?

Langhorn. My lord, I will tell you what I take to be the meaning of that letter. The design, was the holding of a congregation: There were divers of them, and it was like the meeting of a dean and chapter in a college, and he bids them not to come too long before the time, for they were certainly in very great danger to be taken.

L. C. J. What! at that time? What danger were they in then?

Langhorn. Yes, my lord, the parliament was then sitting.

L. C. J. But you know what indulgence there was to all papists at that time, if they would be but quiet. Well, but put it all together, they were to come to London, not too soon, nor to appear too much, because the parliament was sitting, for fear of discovering the design. What, was that only for Mr. Whitebread, and his fellows, to make an officer! Can it be answered by that?

Langhorn. Certainly, their holding of a congregation in England does require secrecy.

L. C. J. Gentlemen, here is the thing, this is only an evidence to the Plot in general, that there is a Plot, and you may make what reasonable use you think fit of it. It is not a particular evidence against Mr. Langhorn's particular person, only it shows there was a Plot, and you have heard what they say to him in particular about it. And I will tell you one thing more, which if Oates swears true, concerns you very much. He saith, they were a talking of the ten thousand pounds that sir George Wakeman was to have for poisoning the king, when their other attempts had failed, and that he would not take under 15,000*l.*: You, Mr. Langhorn, was very angry, and said it was a base, covetous thing in him; and it being such a public cause, it would have been no matter if he had done it for nothing. I have repeated as much as I can well remember, without any prejudice to Mr. Langhorn's testimony. And so I leave it with you.

[Then an officer was sworn to keep the jury, who withdrew to consider of their Verdict; and the Judges also went off from the Bench. The Lord Chief Justice telling the Auditory, that the day being so far spent, and the commission determining that night, because of the term, sir George Wakeman, and the rest, could not be tried till next sessions. And after a short space the Jury returned, and answering to their names, delivered in their Verdict.]

Clerk of the Crown. Gentlemen, Are you all agreed of your Verdict?

Omnes. Yes.

Cl. of Cr. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Foreman.

Cl. of Cr. Richard Langhorn, hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner: You of the Jury, how say you? Is he Guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. What goods or chattels?

away presently; that he was in disguise; that they acquainted their master with it, as soon as he came home; and their master says, that so they did. And the person that then lived in the house, and now is dead, said to the maid, Yonder is Mr. Oates, I think he is either turned quaker, or priest; what a kind of habit he is got into! No, said the maid, he can't be a quaker, because he wears a perwig; but she says, he named him to her, Oates, and that this is the man, she knew him since. It is the same man that the young man spoke to her about.

He hath produced farther one of their own religion, one that is a papist still, and he says he saw him twice at Mr. Charles Howard's in Arundel-House. There was indeed some perplexity they would have put upon it, by reason of Mr. Howard's son being dead a year before; the witness says he did not know the son. A papist he confesses himself expressly to be, if not a priest; and I would not ask him the question, because it is not fair to make him accuse himself: but he does swear expressly, he saw Mr. Oates at Mr. Charles Howard's in April or May, which contradicts all their witnesses. He also produces a schoolmaster, that tells that he dined with him the beginning of May: and I remembered it, says he, very well, for we dined by the fire-side, which gave me occasion to wonder at it, in May, and remember it. He says, moreover, that he staid three or four hours with him, and talked of all his travels in Spain. Now must all these people be downright perjured; it can be no mistake but they are all falsly forsworn if there be not truth in it. And when here are seven or eight witnesses positively swearing against the affirmation of so many others, we leave the credit of both sides to you who are the judges of the fact.

There is indeed (and I will repeat it for you, for I would not miss any thing, as near as I can, that would make for the prisoner's advantage) there is a proof concerning sir John Warner, and Preston, and Poole, that they were there at the time, and there hath been no answer given to it: but I say still, it is the same thing; for if you do not believe those witnesses to speak true, that affirm that Oates was there all the time, but rather believe that he was here by seven or eight people that testify it, I say, if you cannot believe he was there, you will never change your mind for one circumstance.

Langhorn. They are not the same witnesses.

L. C. J. It is true, they are not; you have four or five witnesses that speak apart, but two of them do say, that they knew Oates also was there at the same time that they speak that sir John Warner was at home.

Langhorn. Not those two of Liege, my lord, about sir Thomas Preston.

L. C. J. No, they do not, for I leave it to you of the jury, upon the whole matter: there is little more to be said by me. If so be credit is to be given to these witnesses of Oates more than to the others, then you must find him guilty, and the rather, because I do a little suspect, they come over instructed, to say what they do. You find they apply themselves to the thing they came for; and not only the gardener but another could tell you (which hath a very great influence upon me; as to their credit) that the months of April and May were the months in question, and they were not to be examined any farther. So that it looks as if these young men were sent of an errand; and though you do not know them, Mr. Langhorn, and are innocent as to any tampering with them, yet I am afraid they are come to serve the Catholic cause, as they call it. For they are very well taught, and they keep to those months of April and May, of all the months in the year. Then they bring the woman of the White-Horse-tavern, where the consult of the 24th of April was; and what is the use they would make of her? Why, it is that Mr. Oates should make a story of fifty fathers being in her tavern at one time (but he insists now there was a matter of twenty) when there was not a room in her house that would hold ten: but you hear how she was answered, from testimony rising up in the court of themselves, that were acquainted with her house, and know, that forty people may dine in two of her rooms, and the king's counsel observed well, how chance itself hath put to silence this evidence. So that when matters are alledged to be done at home there is not so great a difficulty as in proving things that are done abroad.

I leave it to you, Sirs. Here is a gentleman that stands at the bar, upon his life, on the one hand; but if Mr. Oates says true, all our lives, and liberties, our king, and religion, are at the stake, on the other hand. God defend that innocent blood should be shed, and God defend us also from Popery, and from all popish plots, and from all the bloody principles of papists, which are very cruel, as we know by experience; and you cannot blame us to look to ourselves. For I must tell you, the Plot is proved as plain as the day, and that by Oates; and farther, Oates's testimony is confirmed by that which can never be answered. For when he comes at his first testimony, and says, that upon the 24th of April, such a consult was summoned, and held, it falls out, that five days after a letter is found amongst Harcourt's Papers, (a principal person in the design), which does order the meeting upon the 24th of April, being the day after St. George's feast, and gives them a caution that they should not come too soon to town; that they should not appear too much in London, for fear of discovering the design, and of disclosing that the nature of which requires secrecy. Plainly than this is hardly to be writ from a Jesuit, especially in so dangerous a matter. And what can be answered to this letter, that is found in a priest's hands, four days after Mr. Oates had given in his information about it?

Put all this together, and if you be satisfied herein, you may judge the better, as to the particular business of Mr. Langhorn, how far the testimony of Oates and Bedlow affect him. You know what you do. And for Bedlow, it is true, what he says, that there is nothing to be said to his evidence, because no man can prove a negative; and he swears expressly, that he had this discourse with him, of these treasonable matters, killing the king, and altering religion. If this be so, and you are satisfied in that particular, (and that a man may very well be, as to the substance,) I do not see any considerable answer that is given. I say once more, there is the life of a gentleman at stake, and there are all our lives at the stake: Follow you your consciences; do wisely, do honestly, and consider what is to be done.

Clerk of the Crown. Gentlemen, Are you all agreed of your Verdict?

Omnes. Yes.

Cl. of Cr. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Foreman.

Cl. of Cr. Richard Langhorn, hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner: You of the Jury, how say you? Is he Guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. What goods or chattels?

Foreman. None, to our knowledge.

Cl. of Cr. Hearken to the verdict, as the Court hath recorded it; You say that Richard Langhorn is Guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stands indicted: but you say that he had no goods or chattels, lands or tenements, at the time of the High-Treason committed, or at any time since, to your knowledge. And so you say all?

Omnes. Yes.

Recorder. It is a verdict according to the justice of the evidence. (Upon which there was a very great shout.)

Then Mr. Recorder sent for the prisoners convicted before, to receive their Judgment; and they were brought to the bar, and the Court proceeded thus:

Cl. of Cr. Richard Langhorn, hold up thy hand: Thou standest convicted of High-Treason; what canst thou say for thyself, why the Court should not give judgment on thee to die, according to law?

Langhorn. I have nothing to say.

Cl. of Cr. Thomas White, otherwise Whitebread, hold up thy hand: Thou standest convicted, in Middlesex, of High-Treason; what canst thou say for thyself, why the Court should not give judgment on thee to die, according to law?

Whitebread. I can say nothing.

Cl. of Cr. John Fenwick, hold up thy hand: thou art in the same case with him that went last before thee; what canst thou say, &c.?

Fenwick. I have nothing more to say.

Cl. of Cr. William Harcourt, hold up thy hand: thou art in the same case with the two that went last before thee; what canst thou say, &c.?

Harcourt. I have nothing at all to say.

Cl. of Cr. John Gavan, hold up thy hand: thou art in the same case with the three that went last before thee; what canst thou say, &c.?

Gavan. I have nothing more to say, than I did say. God bless the king and the kingdom.

Cl. of Cr. Anthony Turner, hold up thy hand: thou art in the same case with the four that went last before thee; what canst thou say, &c.?

Turner. I have nothing to say.

Cl. of Cr. Then, Crier, make proclamation of silence while judgment is given, upon pain of imprisonment. (Which was done on both sides of the Court.)

Recorder (sir George Jefferies). You the prisoners at the bar: You have been severally arraigned, and now are severally convicted of High-Treason: and that attended with all the ill circumstances that can be possible to aggravate so high a crime. You attempted the life of the best of kings, who was full of mercy and compassion, even to you, under whom you might still have lived peaceably and quietly, had not your own malice and mischiefs prevented it. Nor were you satisfied with that alone; for you intended thereby to make way for the destruction of the greatest part of the kingdom, by a public massacre, by cutting the throats of all Protestants; for that also appears to be your design: to effect which, the nearest way and the best means you could think of, was first to kill the king. And this was to be done for the introducing of another religion, as you call it; which, as we think, we more properly call superstition; and so root out the best religion that is established among us by law. And I therefore call it the best of religions, even for your sakes; for had it not been for the sake of our religion, that teaches us not to make such requitals, as yours seems to teach you, you had not had that fair formal way of trial, and of being heard, as you now have been; but murder would have been returned to you, for the murder you intended to commit, both upon the king, and most of his people. What a strange sort of religion is that, whose doctrine seems to allow them to be the greatest saints in another world, that can be the most impudent sinners in this! murder, and the blackest of crimes here, are the best means among you, to get a man to be canonized a saint hereafter. Is it not strange that men professed in religion, that use all endeavours to gain proselytes for heaven, should so pervert the scripture (as I perceive some of you have done) and make that justify your impious designs of assassinating kings and murdering their subjects? what can be said to such a sort of people, the very foundation of whose religion is laid in blood? nay, lest you should not be able so easily to persuade them so cleverly to imbibe those bloody principles, you do absolve them from all the obligations that they remain under, of obedience to their sovereign; you do therefore from the pulpits publicly teach, that the oaths of allegiance and supremacy signify nothing. It is a strange religion, that applies every thing to these wicked and detestable purposes.

There is one gentleman that stands at the bar, whom I am very sorry to see, with all my heart, in this condition, because of some acquaintance I have had with him heretofore: to see a man who hath understanding in the law, and who hath arrived to so great an eminency in that profession, as that gentleman hath done, should not remember, that it is not only against the rules of all Christianity, but even against the rules of his profession, to attempt any injury against the person of the king. He knows, that it is against all the rules of law, to endeavour to introduce any foreign power into this land. So that you sinned both against your conscience, and your own certain knowledge. But your several crimes have been so fully proved against you, that truly, I think no person that stands by, can be in any doubt of the guilt: nor is there the least room for the most scrupulous man to doubt of the credibility of the witnesses that have been examined against you: and sure I am, you have been fully heard, and stand fairly convicted of those crimes you have been indicted for.

I rather mention these things to you, because I know not whether you will think it necessary to have any assistance, (I mean such assistance as by the law of the land is to be allowed to persons in your condition, of any Protestant divines, or of any other Protestants) to prepare you for another world. And though what hath been said proceeds from a layman, to you that are professed in religion, yet I hope it will not be thought amiss, it being intended for your advantage. Let that vast eternity that you are ere long to enter into, you are now on the brink of it; I say let that prevail with you to consider, that there is a God in heaven, who will call you to an account for every one of those private consultations, of which we can never come to any certain knowledge. Though you have put all those obligations of secrecy upon your party, which religion could tie them by; though you give them the Sacrament, not only to oblige them to do wicked acts, but to conceal them when they are done; yet remember there is a God in heaven, from whom you cannot keep them secret. All your ties and obligations, all the dispensations that you can give to your inferiors, or your superiors to you, will never dispense with that account you are to give to the great God of heaven.

Gentlemen, with great charity to your immortal souls, I desire you, for the love of God, and in the name of his son Jesus Christ, consider these things; for it will not be long ere you be summoned before another tribunal about them: and great and dreadful is the day of judgment, at which you and all men must appear.

And I hope all persons that stand by, will take notice, that it is not the principles of the Protestant religion, to murder any, let it be upon their own heads that profess it, for we abhor these things. And we hope these public testimonies of our religion, and this fair sort of trial, will not only confirm those that are Protestants now, but will prevail upon those whom they have inveigled into their persuasion, to desert such a religion, till such time as they alter their principles, from the bloodiness and inhumanity they are stained with, and which these men have instilled into all their proselytes. And this I thought fit to premise to you to great compassion and charity. And I pray God it may have that effect which I designed; that is, that it may put you in mind of that great immortality that you are to enter upon ere long. And thus having given you this hint, and the law having had its course upon you, you have been fairly tried, fully heard, and have nothing to say why that judgment should not be pronounced, which the law hath designed against such offenders: I am, therefore, in the name of the Court, to do the duty which the law requires of the Court; and I do, in the name of the Court, pronounce this to be your Sentence:

That you be conveyed from hence to the place from whence you came, and from thence you be drawn to the place of execution, upon hurdles; That you be there severally hanged by the neck; That you be cut down alive; That your privy members be cut off; That your bowels be taken out, and burnt in your view; That your heads be severed from your bodies; That your bodies be divided into four quarters, and your quarters to be at the king's dispose. And the God of infinite mercy be merciful to your souls.

After which there was a very great acclamation.

Whitebread. My lord, since we have not long to live, we desire we may have the benefit of the company of our friends, that they may be permitted to come at us.

Recorder. Yea, it is fit they should have the comfort of their friends and relations; and God forbid, but we should do all we can to make their passage as comfortable as may be. You must keep that decorum that becomes such as are in your condition. You know you are under the public notice of the world, therefore you must use the liberty that is granted to you with that moderation and prudence, that it is fit to use such a privilege with; for I shall not deny you any lawful favour.

Langhorn. Sir, there will be more people come to me than ordinary, in regard of their business, that I have had in my hands; I desire they may have the liberty to come to me.

Recorder. I would not deny Mr. Langhorn any thing that I could grant him: if it be any business that any person would have an account of, which you have been concerned in for them, they may be permitted to come to you.

Capt. Richardson. There is nobody to be in private with him, to say any thing but what I shall hear?

Langhorn. Yes, my lord, I hope my wife and children may.

Recorder. Yes, God forbid but he should have his wife and children with him.

Langhorn. Or any others, that come about business?

Recorder. Yes, captain, with the caution I have given you.

Then the Court adjourned for London, to Guildhall, the 14th of July, and for London and Middlesex, to the Old Bailey, the 16th of July next. And the Prisoners were carried back to the gaol.

On Friday, June 20, the five Jesuits were drawn upon three hurdles to the place of execution. In the first hurdle went Thomas Whitebread and William Harcourt; in the second, Anthony Turner and John Gavan; and in the third, John Fenwick. And being come to the place of execution they were all put into one cart. Then Gavan said, If God give us his grace, it is no matter where we die, at the gallows, or elsewhere. The Executioner fastening the halters, Gavan said, I hope you will be civil to dying men.

Executioner. I will be civil to you.

Gawan. I hope they will give us leave to speak.

*The Last Speech of THOMAS WHITEBREAD.

I suppose it is expected I should speak something to the matter I am condemned for, and brought hither to suffer; it is no less than the contriving and plotting his majesty's death, and

* These Speeches were published at the time, with an Introduction, as follows:

"The Last SPEECHES of the five notorious TRAITORS and Jesuits: viz. Thomas White alias Whitebread, Provincial of the Jesuits in England; William Harcourt alias Harrison, pretended Rector of London; John Gawan alias Gawan; Anthony Turner. And John Fenwick, Procurator for the Jesuits in England: who were justly executed at Tyburn, June 20, 1679, for conspiring the death of his sacred majesty, and the subversion of the government and Protestant religion.

"If the most ignorant of criminals, when condemned to die, and just ready to undergo the deserved punishment of their offences, are always uninitious to extenuate the enormity of their crimes, wonder not then, that they who have assumed to themselves the dignified orders of religion and sanctity, together with the perfections of noble learning; and under that notion and coverture, to establish themselves in the absolute dominion of the souls and consequently the bodies of men; break all the fences and impalements of divinity and morality, and being brought to suffer for their so doing, make it their business to impose upon the spectators of their last behaviour. Those people know that the last words of dying men bear a great sway amongst the living, and that the swanlike sentences of those that sing at their departure, being cunningly insinuated and politicly made use of, penetrate more deeply than can be imagined in the hearts of the credulous and unstable. Upon these grounds, and with these aims, those persons so lately condemned by national justice, and warranted to execution; like men infected with the pestilence, who through the particuler malice of that distemper labour to infect all persons that they come near, thought to have imposed their delusions upon the people, and by their ultimate farewells to the world, to have diffused the venom of their heresy through the veins of the whole nation. For could they but have purged away their crimes with the sweet hyssop of a fine speech, or blotted out the stains of their offences with an inveigling metaphor, then they thought they had done a great work: well knowing, that an opinion of martyrdom begets belief, and that belief is the mother of conversion. Thereby they had improved their happiness in conceit, and had shortened their journey to heaven by leaving purgatory on the left hand, as being such who had given a more deadly stroke, like Sampson, to their enemies, at their fall, than all the the alteration of the government of the church and state. You all either know, or ought to know, I am to make my appearance before the face of Almighty God, and with all imaginable certainty and evidence to receive a final judgment for all the thoughts, words, and actions of my whole life. So that I am not now upon terms to speak other than the truth; and therefore, in his most holy presence, and as I hope for mercy from his divine majesty, I do declare to you here present, and to the whole world, that I go out of the world as innocent and as free from any guilt of these things, laid to my charge in this matter, as I came into the world from my mother's womb: And that I do renounce from my heart, all manner of pardons, absolutions, dispensations for swearing, as occasions or interest may seem to require, which some have been pleased to lay to our charge, as matter of practice and doctrine; but is a thing so unjustifiable and unlawful, that I believe and ever did, that no power on earth can authorize me, or any body, so to do. As for those who have most falsely accused me (as time, either in this world or the next, will make appear), I do heartily forgive them, and beg of God to grant them his holy grace, that they may repent their unjust proceedings against me; otherwise they will, in conclusion, find they have done themselves more wrong than I have suffered from them; thought that has been a great deal. I pray God bless his majesty both temporally and eternally, which has been my daily prayer for him, and is all the harm that I ever intended or imagined against him. And I do, with this my last breath, in the sight of God declare, that I never did learn, or teach, nor believe, nor can, as a catholic, believe, that it is lawful, upon any occasion or pretence whatsoever, to design, or contrive the death of his majesty, or any hurt to his person; but on the contrary, all are bound to obey, defend, and preserve his sacred person, to the utmost of their power. And I do moreover declare, that this is the true and plain sense of my soul, in the sight of him who knows the secrets of my heart, and as I hope to see his blessed face, without any equivocation, or mental reservation. This is all I have years of their former lives ever gave them opportunity to do. But to prevent their intended mischief, and to advance an antidote against the spreading venom of clandestine transcripts conveyed from person to person, and consequently subject to those alterations, additions, and diminutions, as may be most advantageous to the interpreter, it may be presumed an act of prudence to divulge in season the most exact copies of these speeches which were intended for no good. An act the rather to be justified, in regard the best physicians always first describe the distemper at large, and then set down the prescription of the cure. Nor can it be unacceptable to good government, by lawful means to prevent the people from being deceived, where their deception may entice them to change and disobedience."

to say concerning the matter of my condemnation; that which remains for me now to do, is to recommend my soul into the hands of my blessed Redeemer, by whose only merits and passion I hope for salvation.

*The Last Speech of WILLIAM HARCOURT.

The words of dying persons have been always esteemed as of greatest authority; because uttered then, when shortly after they are to be cited before the high tribunal of Almighty God. This gives me hopes that mine may be looked upon as such; therefore I do here declare, in the presence of Almighty God, the whole court of heaven, and this numerous assembly, that as I ever hope, by the merits and passion of my Lord and sweet Saviour Jesus Christ, for eternal bliss, I am as innocent as the child unborn of any thing laid to my charge, and for which I am here to die.

Sheriff How. Or sir Edmundbury Godfrey's death?

Harcourt. Or sir Edmundbury Godfrey's death.

Sheriff How. Did you not write that letter concerning the dispatch of sir Edmundbury Godfrey?

Harcourt. No, Sir; these are the words of a dying man, I would not do it for a thousand worlds.

Sheriff How. How have you lived?

Harcourt. I have lived like a man of repute all my life, and never was before the face of a judge till my trial: No man can accuse me. I have, from my youth, been bred up in the education of my duty towards God and man.

Harcourt. And I do utterly abhor and detest that abominable false doctrine laid to our charge, that we can have licences to commit perjury, or any sin to advantage our cause, being expressly against the doctrine of St. Paul, saying, 'Non sunt facienda mala, ut eveniant bona; Evil is not to be done that good may come thereof. And therefore we hold it in all cases unlawful, to kill or murder any person whatsoever, much more our lawful king, now reigning, whose personal and temporal dominions we are ready to defend with our lives and fortunes, against any opponent whatsoever, none excepted. I forgive all that have contrived my death, and humbly beg pardon of Almighty God for them. And I ask pardon of all the world; I pray God bless his majesty, and grant him a prosperous reign. The like I wish to his royal consort, the best of queens. I humbly beg the prayers of all those who are in the communion of the Roman church, if any such be present.

The Last Speech of ANTHONY TURNER.

Being now, good people, very near my end, and summoned, by a violent death, to appear before God's tribunal, there to render an account of all my thoughts, words, and actions,

* In the report of the Speeches published at the time, he is called Harcourt alias Harrison.

before a just judge, I conceive I am bound in conscience to do myself that justice, as to declare upon oath my innocence from the horrid crime of treason, with which I am falsely accused: and I esteem it a duty I owe to christian charity, to publish to the world before my death, all that I know in this point, concerning those catholics I have conversed with since the first noise of the plot, deairing from the bottom of my heart that the whole truth may appear, that innocence may be cleared, to the great glory of God, and the peace and welfare of the king and country. As to myself, I call God to witness, that I was never in my whole life present at any consult or meeting of the Jesuits, where any oath of secrecy was taken, or the sacrament, as a bond of secrecy, either by me, or any one of them, to conceal any plot against his sacred majesty; nor was I ever present at any meeting or consult of theirs, whete any proposal was made, or resolve taken or signed either by me or any of them, for taking away the life of our dread sovereign; an impiety of such a nature, that had I been present at any such meeting, I should have been bound by the laws of God, and by the principles of my religion (and by God's grace would have acted accordingly) to have discovered such a devilish treason to the civil magistrate, to the end they might have been brought to condign punishment. I was so far, good people, from being in September last at a consult of the Jesuits at Tixall, in Mr. Ewers's chamber, that I vow to God, as I hope for salvation, I never was so much as once that year at Tixall, my lord Aston's house. It is true, I was at the congregation of the Jesuits, held on the 24th of April was (twelve month; but in that meeting, as I hope to be saved, we meddled not with state affairs, but only treated about the concerns of our province, which is usually done by us, without offence to temporal princes, every third year, all the world over.

Sheriff How. You do only justify yourselves here. We will not believe a word that you say. Spend your time in prayer, and we will not think your time too long.

Turner. I am, good people, as free from the treason I am accused of, as the child that is unborn; and being innocant, I never accused myself in confession of any thing that I am charged with. Certainly, if I had been conscious to myself of any guilt in this kind, I should not so frankly and freely, as I did, of my own accord, have prescanted myself before the king's most honourable privy council. As for those catholics which I have conversed with since the noise of the plot, I protest before God, in the words of a dying man, that I never heard any one of them, either priest or lay-man, express to me the least knowledge of any plot, that was then on foot amongst the catholics, against the king's most excellent majesty, for the advancing the catholic religion. I die a Roman Catholic, and humbly beg the prayers of such, for my happy passage into a better life. I have been of that religion above thirty years, and now give God Almighty infinite thanks for calling me by his holy grace to the knowledge of this truth, notwithstanding the prejudice of my former education. God of his infinite goodness bless the king, and all the royal family, and grant his majesty a prosperous reign here, and a crown of glory hereafter. God in his mercy forgive all those who have falsely accused me, and have had any hand in my death: I forgive them from the bottom of my heart, as I hope myself for forgiveness at the hands of God.

“O God who hast created me to a supernatural end, to serve thee in this life by grace, and enjoy thee in the next by glory, be pleased to grant by the merits of thy bitter death and passion, that after this wretched life shall be ended I may not fail of a full enjoyment of thee my last end and sovereign good. I humbly beg pardon for all the sins which I have committed against thy divine majesty, since the first instance I came to the use of reason to this very time; I am heartily sorry from the very bottom of my heart for having offended thee so good, so powerful, so wise, and so just a God, and purpose by the help of thy grace, never more to offend thee, my good God, whom I love above all things.

“O sweet Jesus, who hath suffered a most painful and ignominious death upon the cross for our salvation, apply, I beseech thee, unto me the merits of thy sacred passion, and sanctify unto me these sufferings of mine, which I humbly accept of for thy sake in union of the sufferings of thy sacred majesty, and in punishment and satisfaction of my sins.

“O my dear Saviour and Redeemer, I return thee immortal thanks for all thou hast pleased to do for me in the whole course of my life, and now in the hour of my death, with a firm belief of all things thou hast revealed, and a steadfast hope of obtaining everlasting bliss. I cheerfully cast myself into the arms of thy mercy, whose arms were stretched on the cross for my redemption. Sweet Jesus receive my Spirit.”

The Last Speech of JOHN GAVAN.

Dear beloved countrymen; I come now to the last scene of mortality, to the hour of my death, an hour which is the horizon between time and eternity, an hour which must either make me a star to shine for ever in the empire above, or a firebrand to burn everlastingly amongst the damned souls in hell below; an hour in which, if I deal sincerely, and with a hearty sorrow acknowledge my crimes, I may hope for mercy; but if I falsely deny them, I must expect nothing but eternal damnation; and therefore, what I shall say in this great hour I hope you will believe. And now in this hour, I do solemnly swear, protest and vow, by all that is sacred in heaven and on earth, and as I hope to see the face of God in glory, that I am as innocent as the child unborn of those treasonable crimes which Mr. Oates and Mr. Dugdale have sworn against me in my trial, and for which sentence of death was pronounced against me the day after my trial. And that you may be assured that what I say is true I do in the like manner protest, vow, and swear, as I hope to see the face of God in glory, that I do not, in what I say unto you, make use of any equivocation, or mental reservation, or material prolocution, or any such like way to palliate truth. Neither do I make use of any dispensations from the pope, or any body else: or of any oath of secrecy, or any absolution in confession; or out of confession, to deny the truth: but I speak in the plain sense which the words bear; and if I do speak in any other sense, to palliate or hide the truth, I wish with all my soul that God may exclude me from his heavenly glory and condemn me to the lowest place of hell-fire: And so much to that point.—And now dear country-men, in the second place, I do confess and own to the whole world, that I am a Roman catholic, and a priest, and one of that sort of priests called Jesuits; and now because they are so falsely charged for holding king-killing doctrine, I think it my duty to protest to you with my last dying words, that neither I in particular nor the Jesuits in general, hold any such opinion, but utterly abhor and detest it: And I assure you, that amongst the vast numbers of authors, which among the Jesuits have printed philosophy, divinity, cases, or sermons, there is not one, to the best of my knowledge, that allows of king-killing doctrine, or holds this position. That it is lawful for a private person to kill a king, although an heretic, although a Pagan, although a tyrant. There is, I say, not one Jesuit that holds this, except Mariana the Spanish Jesuit, and he defends it not absolutely, but only problematically, for which his book was called in, and that opinion expunged and censured. And is it not a sad thing, that for the rashness of one single man, while the rest cry out against him, and hold the contrary, that a whole religious order should be sentenced? But I have not time to discuss this point at large, and therefore I refer you all to a royal author, I mean the wise and victorious king Henry the 4th of France, the royal grandfather of our present gracious king, in a public oration which he pronounced, in defence of the Jesuits, amongst other things, declaring that he was very well satisfied with the Jesuits doctrine concerning kings, as being conformable to the best doctors on the church. But why do I relate the testimony of one single prince, when the whole catholic world is the Jesuits advocate? Therein chiefly Germany, France, Italy, Spain, and Flanders, trust the education of their youth to them in a very great measure, they trust their own souls to be governed by them, in the administration of the sacraments. And can you imagine so many great kings and princes, and so many wise states should do, or permit this to be done in their kingdoms, if the Jesuits were men of such damnable principles as they are now taken for in England?—In the third place, dear country-men, I do protest; that as I never in my life did machine or contrive either the deposition or death of the king, so now at my death, I do heartily desire of God to grant him a quiet and happy reign upon earth, and an everlasting crown in heaven. For the judges also, and the jury, and all those that were any ways concerned either in my trial, accusation, or condemnation, I do humbly ask pardon of God, to grant them both temporal and eternal happiness. And as for Mr. Oates and Mr. Dugdale, I call God to witness, they by false oaths have brought me to this untimely end. I heartily forgive them, because God commands me so to do; and I beg of God for his infinite mercy to grant them true sorrow and repentance in this world, that they may be capable of eternal happiness in the next. And having discharged my duty towards my self, and my own innocence towards my order, and its doctrine to my neighbour, and the world, I have nothing else to do now, my great God, but to cast my self into the arms of your mercy. I believe you are one divine essence and three divine persons; I believe the Second Person of the Trinity became man to redeem me; And I believe you are an eternal rewarder of the good, and an eternal chastiser of the bad. In fine, I believe all you have revealed for your own infinite veracity; I hope in you above all things for your infinite fidelity; and I love you above all things for your infinite beauty and goodness; and I am heartily sorry that ever I offended so great a God, with my whole heart: I am contented to undergo an ignominious death for the love of you, my dear Jesu, seeing you have been pleased to undergo an ignominious death for the love of me.

*The Last Speech of JOHN FENWICK.

Good people, I suppose you expect I should say something as to the crime I am condemned for, and either acknowledge my guilt, or assert my innocency. I do therefore declare be-

* It does indeed clearly seem, that the proceeding to try Whitebread and Fenwick for the same treason for which a former jury had been charged with them was illegal.

"Certainly now the jury is charged, they must give a verdict either of acquittal or conviction." [Per Powell, Justice, in Rookwood's Case, A. D. 1696, infra.]

"Whitebread's Case was indeed held to be an extraordinary case." [Per Powell, Justice, in the trial of Peter Cook, A. D. 1696, infra.]

"I know what has been usually thought of Whitebread's Case." [Per sir Thomas Trevor, Attorney General, in Rookwood's Case.]

"By the ancient law, if the jury sworn had been once particularly charged with a prisoner, as before is shewed, it was commonly held they must give up their verdict, and they could not be discharged before their verdict given up, and so is my lord Coke, P. C. cap. 47, p. 110, and this is the reason given, 22 E. 3. Coron. 449, why after the plea of not guilty, and the inquest charged, the prisoner cannot become fore God and the whole world, and call God to witness, that what I say is true, that I am innocent of what is laid to my charge of plotting the king's death, and endeavouring to subvert the government, and bring in a foreign power, as the child unborn: and that I know nothing an approver, because the inquest shall not be discharged; but the book at large, viz. 21 E. 3. 18. a. mentions not the charging of the inquest, but the plea of not guilty, and the jury at the bar, Co. Lit. 227. b. But yet the contrary course hath for a long time obtained at Newgate, and nothing is more ordinary, than after the jury sworn and charged with a prisoner, and evidence given, yet if it appears to the court, that some of the evidence is kept back, or taken off, or that there may be a fuller discovery, and the offence notorious, as murder or burglary, and that the evidence, though not sufficient to convict the prisoner, yet gives the court a great and strong suspicion of his guilt, the court may discharge the jury of the prisoner, and remit him to the gaol for farther evidence, and accordingly it hath been practised in most circuits of England, for otherwise many notorious murders and burglaries may pass unpunished by the acquittal of a person probably guilty, where the full evidence is not searched out or given." Hale's P. C. vol. 2, c. 51, p. 394.

"And so," adds the editor, "it was practised in Whitebread's case in treason. See State Trials. See also Kel. 47, 52. But the reason given for this practice, if it were law, (which yet without the prisoner's consent is unwarranted by ancient usage; vide 3 Co. Inst. 110. Co. Lit. 227. b. 1. And 103. Raym. 84.) seems to hold as strongly in behalf of the prisoner as of the king; and yet I do not find any instance, where a jury once sworn was ever discharged, because the prisoner's evidence was not ready; on the contrary, in lord Russell's Case, [See this Case, A. D. 1683, infra.] the court refused to put off the trial only till the afternoon of the same day, pretending they could not do it without the consent of the attorney general, although in that case the jury were not sworn, and the prisoner urged, that he had witnesses, who could not be in town till night, in which case it was certainly in the discretion of the court to put it off or not. It hath, however, been since holden for law, that a jury once charged in a capital case cannot be discharged till they have given their verdict, and the case of Whitebread was thought a very extraordinary one." [See lord Delamere's Case, A. D. 1685, infra, and Rookwood's Case, A. D. 1696, infra, and Cook's Case, A. D. 1696, infra.] Post. 16, 39, 76, 328."

Lord Hale farther says, "If after the jury sworn and departed from the bar, one of them, (viz. A.) wilfully goes out of town, whereby only eleven remain, these eleven cannot give any verdict without the twelfth, but the twelfth shall be fined for his contempt, and that jury may be discharged, and a new jury sworn, and of it, but what I have learnt from Mr. Oates and his companions, and what comes originally from them.

Sheriff How. If you can make a good conclusion to your own life, it will do well; consider if your letters did not agree with the evidence, that's another matter.

Fenwick. I assure you, I do renounce all treason from my very heart. I have always, and ever shall disown the opinion of such devilish practices as these are of king-killing. If I speak not the whole frame of my heart, I wish God may exclude me from his glory.

Sher. How. Those that murdered sir Edmund-bury Godfrey said as you do.

new evidence given, and the verdict taken of the new jury; and thus it was done by good advice at the gaol delivery at Hertford, August 15, Car. 1, in the Case of Hanscom the departing jurymen.

"And so it is usual at the gaol delivery at Newgate, if a jury be charged with several prisoners, and the court finds by probable circumstances that the jury is partial to one of the prisoners, the court may discharge the jury of that prisoner, and put him upon his trial by another jury; and this is used also in other circuits." Sed qu. de hoc.

"When the evidence on both sides is closed, and indeed when any evidence hath been given, the jury cannot be discharged, unless in cases of evident necessity, till they have given in their verdict; but they are to consider of it, and deliver it in with the same forms as upon civil causes; only they cannot, in a criminal case which touches life or member, give a privy verdict. See 1 Inst. 227: 3 Inst. 110: Post. 27: 2 Hal. P. C. 300: 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 47, s. 1, 2. But the judges may adjourn while the jury are withdrawn to confer, and return to receive the verdict in open court.

"On the State Trials for High Treason, at the Sessions-house in the Old Bailey, London, under a special commission in 1794, against Thomas Hardy, Horne Tooke, and several others, charged with having formed the destructive project of a convention of the people to overthrow the monarchy and the constitution, the jury on each prisoner were kept together in the custody of the sheriff or his bailiffs night and day, for several days successively, during the whole of the proceedings on each trial, and till they gave their verdicts. The court adjourned from evening till morning; and also once in the day for the purpose of refreshment, and from Saturday evening till Monday morning, when Sunday intervened. The sheriff was charged to see that no improper communication was had with the jury during these intervals. And the first jury having been sent several nights to an hotel in Covent Garden, at some distance from the court, a slight suspicion arising that they were not kept quite free from extraneous information, the subsequent juries were accommodated with beds, in rooms Fenwick. As for sir Edmund-bury Godfrey, I protest before God, I know nothing of it: I never saw the man in my life.

Sher. How. For my part, I am of opinion you had a hand in it.

Fenwick. Now that I am a dying man, do you think I would go and damn my soul?

Sher. How. I wish you all the good I can, but I will assure you, I believe never a word you say.

Fenwick. I pray for his majesty every day, and wish him all happiness with all my heart. Also I do with all my soul pardon all my accusers. If the judge or jury did any thing amiss, I pardon them with all my soul, and all persons di-nearly adjoining the court." [See, too, Stone's Case, A. D. 1795, infra.]

"A culprit was indicted for murder. The jury were sworn, and part of the evidence given, but before the trial was over, one of the jurymen was taken ill, went out of court, with the judge's leave, and presently after died. The judge, doubting whether he could swear another jury, discharged the eleven, and left the prisoner in gaol. The court was moved for a writ of Habeas Corpus, to bring up the prisoner that he might be discharged, having been once put upon his trial. This being a new case, the court said they would advise with the other judges upon it; and afterwards they all agreed that the prisoner might be tried at the next assizes, or the judge might have ordered a new jury to have been sworn immediately." Mich. 4, Geo. 3, Rex v. Gould, Burn's J. title Jurors, v. ad fin. Tomlins's Jacob's Law Dict. title Jury, v.

A jury sworn and charged in case of life or member, cannot be discharged by the court or any other, but they ought to give a verdict. Co. Lit. 227 b. See, too, Blackstone as quoted, supra, vol. 6, p. 1018, in a Note.

To speak it here once for all, if any person be indicted of treason, or of felony, or larceny, and plead not guilty, and thereupon a jury is returned, and sworn, their verdict must be heard, and they cannot be discharged, neither can the jurors in those cases give a privy verdict, but ought to give their verdict openly in court. Co. 3 Inst. 110.

It seems to have been anciently an uncontroverted rule, and hath been allowed even by those of the contrary opinion, to have been the general tradition of the law, that a jury sworn and charged in a capital case, cannot be discharged (without the prisoner's consent) till they have given a verdict. And notwithstanding some authorities to the contrary in the reign of king Charles the 2nd, this hath been holden for clear law both in the reign of king James the 2nd, and since the Revolution. Hawk. P. C. b. 2, c. 47, s. 1. And this was confirmed by lord Mansfield at the trial of lord George Gordon for high treason. But see this point argued at large, Foster 29, to 39, where it is said that in certain cases there may be an exception to this general rule.

rectly or indirectly. I am very willing and ready to suffer this death. I pray God pardon me my sins, and save my soul.—And as to what is said, and commonly believed, of Roman catholics, that they are not to be believed or trusted, because they can have dispensations for lying, perjury, killing kings, and other the most enormous crimes; I do utterly renounce all such pardons and dispensations, and withal declare, That it is a most wicked and malicious calumny cast upon catholics, who do all with all their hearts and souls, hate and detest all such wicked and damnable practices; and in the words of a dying man, and as I hope for mercy at the hands of God, before whom I must shortly appear and give an account of all my actions, I do again declare, that what I have said is true; and I hope christian charity will not let you think, that by the last act of my life, I would cast away my soul, by sealing up my last breath with a damnable lye.—Then they were at their private devotions for about an hour.

And Mr. Sheriff How spake to them; Pray aloud gentlemen, that we may join with you; we shall do you no hurt, if we do you no good. Are you ashamed of your prayers? Then he spake to Mr. Gavan, and said, It is reported you did preach at the Quakers meeting.

Gavan. To which he made answer, No, sir, I never preached there in my life.

After they had ended their devotions, the executioner pulled their caps over their faces, and went down and draw away the cart, and they were all hanged together until they were dead, and then cut down and quartered, and their bodies disposed of according to his majesty's command.

July 14 was appointed for the execution of Richard Langhorn. When he came down from his chamber to be put in the sledge, he had a written speech with him, but the Sheriff (telling him that he must use no papers at the gallows) took it away, so that he repeated there only so much of it as he could remember. When the hangman was putting the rope round his neck he took it and kissed it; and afterwards he said, I do not know, whether you will allow me liberty of speech or no; besides the noise of the people is so great, that I believe it is impossible to be heard.—I would gladly speak to Mr. Sheriff How, [who coming to him, he spake to him thus,] Mr. Sheriff, I having some doubt whether I should be suffered to speak in relation to my innocence and loyalty, I did for that reason prepare what I had to say in writing, and it is delivered into your hands, and therefore for the particular and precise words and expressions I do refer myself to that, and hope you will be so just to my memory that you will permit it to be seen.—I shall therefore make only a short preface, and I do declare in the presence of the eternal God, and as I hope to be saved by the merits and death of my dear Jesus, that I am not Guilty directly nor indirectly of any crime that was sworn against me: I do not speak this to arraign the court of justice, either judges or jury, but those men who did swear it; and the jury were at liberty to believe or not believe, as they pleased; and I do likewise say with the same averment, that I did never in any life see any commission, or patent, or any writing, or any other thing under the hand of Johannes Paulus di Oliva.

Sheriff. Nor under no other hand?

Langhorn. No, nor under any other hand, of any commission or patent for the raising of an army, or any thing else against the king.

Sheriff. What was the patent for? nothing?

Langhorn. I never saw any, nor do I believe there was any: and whereas I have read in a Narrative that I sent a commission by my son, to the Lord Arundel of Warder, and that I delivered another to the Lord Petre (or Peters) with my own hands, I take God to witness, that I never saw him in my life, or ever to my knowledge saw the face of that lord; nor did I send or know of any thing, that was sent to my lord Arundel of Warder of that nature.

Sheriff. Shorten your business, Mr. Langhorn, you and your party have so many ways to equivocate, and after absolution you may say any thing.

Langhorn. I refer myself to that paper I gave you, Mr. Sheriff.

Sheriff. I think it is not fit to be printed, but I will do you no wrong.

Langhorn. I do not think you will.

Sheriff. You have already printed a paper, or somebody for you.

Langhorn. Sir, I did not print it, it was done without any direction or permission of mine.

Then he spake so much of the speech as he could remember; the whole was as follows.

In regard I could not foresee whether I should be permitted to speak at my death, so as to make a public declaration of my innocency and loyalty, as a christian ought to do; considering likewise, that if it should be permitted unto me, it would be more advisable for me rather to prepare beforehand, and set down in writing the very words in which I should make my declaration, than to trust my memory with them; to the end that the same may be well considered of, and digested by me, and that all mistakes might be prevented, as far as may be: I say, in regard of this, I have in the present paper reduced what I have to declare, as to my innocency and loyalty. And it is in these following words:

I do solemnly and sincerely, in the presence of Almighty God, profess, testify and declare, as followeth; that is to say,

1. That I do, with my heart and soul, believe and own my most gracious sovereign lord, the king's majesty, king Charles the second, to be my true and lawful sovereign, prince, and king, in the same sense and latitude, to all intents and purposes, as in the oath commonly called The Oath of Allegiance, his majesty is expressed to be king of this realm of England.

2. That I do in my soul believe, that neither the pope, nor any prince, potentate, or foreign authority, nor the people of England, nor any authority out of this kingdom, or within the same, hath or have any right to dispossess his said majesty of the crown or government of England, or to depose him therefrom, for any cause or pretended cause whatsoever, or to give licence to me, or to any other of his said majesty's subjects whatsoever, to bear arms against his said majesty, or to take away his life, or to do him any bodily harm, or to disturb the government of this kingdom, as the same is now established by law, or to alter, or go about to alter the said government, or the religion now established in England by any way of force.

3. That I neither am, nor ever was at any time or times, guilty, so much as in my most secret thoughts, of any treason, or misprision of treason whatsoever.

4. That I did not in the month of November or at any other time or times whatsoever, say unto Mr. Oates, or unto any other person or persons whatsoever, in relation to my sons in Spain, or either of them, or in relation to any other person or persons whatsoever, that if they did continue in the world, (as secular priests, or otherwise) they should suddenly have great promotions in England, for that things would not last long in the posture wherein they then were; nor did I ever say any words to that or the like effect to any person or persons whatsoever.

5. That I did never in all my life-time write any letter or other thing whatsoever, unto, or receive any letter or other thing, from Father La Chaise, or any French Jesuit whatsoever; or from Father Anderton, or cardinal Barbarino, or any other cardinal; nor did I ever see any letter, or the copy of any letter or other paper, or other thing, written or purporting to be written unto the said La Chaise, or unto the said Father Anderton, or to the said cardinal Barbarino, by any person or persons whatsoever, other than the printed letters printed in the Narrative of the Trial of Mr. Edward Coleman, lately executed, which I never saw otherwise than in the said printed Narrative; nor did I ever hear any mention made by any person whatsoever of the name of La Chaise, or Father La Chaise, before I read the said printed Narrative.

6. That I did never in all my life-time make any entry or entries, into any book or books, or take, or make, or write, or cause to be written into any book or books, or otherwise, any letter or letters, or any copy or copies of any letter or letters, written by the said Edward Coleman, to any person or persons whatsoever.

7. That I did never in all my life-time enter or register into any book or books, paper or papers whatsoever, or take, or make, or write, or cause to be written any copy or copies of any act or acts, consult or consults, determination or determinations, order or orders, resolve or resolves, or other matter or thing, at any time made, determined, resolved, passed, decreed or agitated at any congregation or congregations, consult or consults, chapter or chapters, assembly or assemblies, of the society or order of the Jesuits, or of any other religious order whatsoever; nor did I ever see, read, or heard read, nor did any person or persons at any time whatsoever, ever communicate unto me any such act, consult, determination, order, resolve, matter or thing whatsoever.

8. That I did never in all my life-time, to my knowledge, belief, or remembrance, see or speak with Mr. Bedlow, who gave evidence against me at my trial, until I saw him in that Court wherein he gave evidence against me.

9. That after the month of November, which was in the year of our Lord 1677, I did never see or speak with Mr. Titus Oates before-named, until I saw him in the same Court where he gave evidence against me at my trial.

10. That I did never see, in all my life-time, to my knowledge, belief, or remembrance, any commission or commissions, patent or patents, grant or grants, order or orders, instrument or instruments, writing or writings, or other matter or thing whatsoever, under, or pretended to be under the hand and seal, or the hand or the seal of Johannes Paulus de Oliva, or any other general of the Jesuits whatsoever, other than the paper or instrument produced and shewed unto me in the said Court at my trial, which whether it was signed or sealed by the said de Oliva, I do not know.

11. That I did never in all my life-time write, or cause or procure to be written, any treasonable letter or letters whatsoever, or any thing which was or is treason or treasonable, in any letter or letters, book or books, paper or papers, or otherwise howsoever.

12. That I believe, that if I did know, or should know of any treason or treasonable design, that was or is intended, or should be intended against his said majesty, or the government of this his majesty's kingdom, or for the alteration by force, advice, or otherwise, of the said government, or of the religion now established in this kingdom, and should conceal and not discover the same unto his said majesty, or his said majesty's council or ministers, or some of them; that such concealment would be in me a sin unto death, and eternal damnation.

13. That I do believe, that it is no ways lawful for me to lye, or speak any thing which I know to be untrue; or to commit any sin, or do any evil, that good may come of it. And that it is not the power of any priest, or of the pope, or of God himself, to give me a licence to lye, or to speak any thing which I know to be untrue; because every such lye would be a sin against truth: And Almighty God, who is perfect truth, cannot give me a licence to commit a sin against his own essence.

And I do solemnly, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, That as I hope for Salvation, and expect any benefit by the blood and passion of my dearest Saviour Jesus Christ, I do make this declaration and protestation, and every part thereof, in the plain and ordinary sense of the words, wherein the same stands written, as they are commonly understood by English protestants, and the courts of justice of England, without any evasion or equivocation, or delusion, or mental reservation whatsoever: And without any dispensation, or pardon, or absolution already granted to me, for this or any other purpose, by the pope, or any other power, authority, or person whatsoever; or, without any hope, expectation or desire of any such dispensation; and without thinking or believing that I am or can be acquitted before God or man, or absolved of this declaration, or any part thereof, although the pope, or any other person or persons, or power or authority whatsoever should dispense with, or take upon him or them to dispense with, or annul the same, or declare that it was, or is, or ought to be null or void in part, or in the whole, from the beginning, or otherwise howsoever.

Having made this declaration and protestation in the most plain terms that I can possibly imagine, to express my sincere loyalty and innocency, and the clear intention of my soul, I leave it to the judgments of all good and charitable persons whether they will believe what is here in this manner affirmed and sworn by me in my present circumstances, or what is sworn by my accusers.

I do now farther declare, That I die a member (though an unworthy one) of that holy Catholic and Apostolic Church of Christ, mentioned in the three holy and public creeds, of which Church our Lord Jesus Christ is the invisible-head of influence, to illuminate, guide, protect, and govern it by his holy spirit and grace; and of which Church the bishop of Rome, as the successor of St. Peter, the prince of the Apostles, is the visible head of Government and Unity.

I take it to be clear, that my religion is the sole cause which moved my accusers to charge me with the crime, for which, upon their evidence, I am adjudged to die; and that my being of that religion, which I here profess, was the only ground which could give them any hope to be believed, or which could move my jury to believe the evidence of such men.

I have had not only a pardon, but also great advantages, as to preferments, and estates, offered unto me, since the judgment was against me, in case I would have forsaken my religion, and owned myself guilty of the crime charged against me, and charged the same crimes upon others: but blessed be my God, who by his grace hath preserved me from yielding to those temptations, and strengthened me rather to choose this death, than to stain my soul with sin, and to charge others, against truth, with crimes, of which I do not know that any person is guilty.

Having said what concerns me to say as to myself, I now humbly beseech God to bless the king's majesty with all temporal and eternal blessings, and to preserve him and his government from all treasons and traitors whatsoever; and that his majesty may never fall into such hands as his royal father of glorious memory fell into.

I also humbly beseech thee, O God, to give woe repentance and pardon to all my enemies, and most particularly to the said Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, and to all who have been any ways necessary to the taking away of my life, and the shedding of my innocent blood, or to the preventing the king's mercy from being extended unto me; and likewise to all those who rejoiced at the judgment given against me, or at the execution of the said judgment; and to all those who are or shall be so unchristianly uncharitable, as to disbelieve, and to refuse to give credit unto my now protestations.

And I beseech thee, O my God, to bless this whole nation, and not to lay the guilt of my blood unto the charge of this nation, or of any other particular person or persons of this nation. Unite all, O my God, unto thee and thy church, by true faith, hope, and charity, for thy mercy's sake.

And for all those who have shewed charity to me, I humbly beg, O my Jesus, that thou wilt reward them with all blessings, both temporal and eternal.

July 18, 1670.

R. LANGHORN.

The Lord preserve his majesty from all manner of treason, and preserve him from falling into such hands, as his royal father, of glorious memory, fell under; I pray God to forgive my enemies, as I freely do those that accused me, those that witnessed against me; and all others that either desired my blood, or rejoice at the shedding of it; and all persons that have any ways concerned themselves with me, I freely forgive them with all my soul, and beg my dear Jesus to forgive them, and all others. God Almighty bless you, and bless the whole nation, and the government, and preserve it from all evil and mischief that I am afraid is coming on it, for the shedding of innocent blood. Sweet Jesus, lay not my innocent blood to their charge. I shall say no more now publicly.

After which he asked the executioner, Whether the rope was right or no? He said, Yes; and he asked him, whether he did forgive him? To which Mr. Langhorn said, I freely do. I shall now recommend myself to God in private.

Sheriff. You may have liberty.

Writer. The Lord have mercy on your soul.

Lang. The Lord in Heaven reward your charity.

Cross himself, prayed again.

Blessed Jesus, into thy hands I recommend my soul and spirit, now at this instant take me into paradise; I am desirous to be with my Jesus; I am ready, and you need stay no longer for me.

Besides the above Speech, the following Articles were printed in the year in which Langhorn suffered, with this title:

MR. LANGHORN'S MEMOIRS,

With some MEDITATIONS and DEVOTIONS of his, during his Imprisonment; as also his PETITION to his Majesty, and his SPEECH at his Execution. All which were left by him, and written with his own Hand.

BEING adjudged to die by a public judg-mant, for the crime of High Treason, charged and sworn against me at my trial by two witnesses, namely Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow; and having both before my trial, and after the judgment given, declared my innocency to all with whom I have had the liberty to converse since my first imprisonment, I take it to be my duty to leave a testimony under my hand, for the farther justification of my innocency, and of the truth, against all those calumnies which have been, and may be laboured by ill men to be cast upon me; and the rather, because I do not know whether it will be allowed me to speak with freedom at my death; or if that should be permitted, yet I well know that what I may then say, may be misrepresented to the prejudice of truth.

I am not in the mean time ignorant, what prejudice I lie under, and how difficult it is for me to express myself in such words, as may gain belief with the world. But my design being only to satisfy good men, who accustom themselves to judge according to the rules of right reason; and as they would have others judge of them, I shall not much care for the censure of the multitude.

The crime which I am charged, is the most heinous of all crimes; but whether I am in truth guilty, can only lie within the knowledge of the great God, who is the searcher of all hearts, my own conscience, and the consciences of my before-named accusers. My God, I am sure, knows my innocency, and will acquit me at the great day of judgment. My conscience with great joy and peace bears me witness, that I am so perfectly innocent of the treason for which I stand condemned, that it invokes Almighty God to witness, that I was never in the whole course of my life guilty of so much as one disloyal thought against my sovereign lord king Charles the Second, whom I here own in the presence of God, to be my true and lawful king and sovereign, taking the words in the same sense in which they are taken and intended, in the oath commonly called, 'The Oath of Allegiance.'

As to all other persons who have judged, or shall take upon them to judge of me, whether I am guilty or not guilty of that crime, of which I here profess myself to be innocent, I am sure that according to reason they must disclaim to make any judgment upon science or strict knowledge; and must own, if that they can make no other judgment, than what must be grounded upon their belief, which can never have, or pretend to have any greater or higher certainty, than the motives of the credibility upon which it is built and grounded.

I do not, nor would I be taken to arraign the justice of the king, of the government, of the judges, before whom I was tried; or of the jury who gave the verdict, upon which judgment was given against me, whilst I pretend to examine the motives of credibility upon which a judgment of belief in this case is to be grounded. In the mean time I hope that neither his majesty, nor my lords the judges, nor my jury will take it ill, if I presume to say, that neither the judges, nor the juries of England do, or ever did claim to be guided in their proceedings in cases of this nature, by any spirit of infallibility. The lord Coke, in his Pleas of the Crown, reports a sad, but very true case of a person condemned and executed for the murder of a girl, who, after the execution of the party so condemned, was found to be living, and in perfect health. And I think it is well known to most men of our times, that even since his now majesty's happy restoration to his crown and dignities, there happened a more sad accident, where three persons, viz. the mother and two sons were condemned, executed, and hanged in chains, for the murder of a person, who was afterwards found to be living, and never to have been any ways assaulted, or hurt by those who were executed for his murder. Here then there were innocent persons condemned and executed by public verdicts and judgments; and what hath happened, may again happen; and yet the juries, the judges, the justice, the king and government no way blemished, they proceed, and must always be taken to proceed according to the rules of law and justice. But there was certainly great faults somewhere in those two notorious cases before-mentioned; as there is likewise in my case, supposing it to be true what I here affirm in the presence of God, to be true in relation to my innocency; notwithstanding the judgment given against me.

Having therefore disclaimed, as I here again do, all intentions of arraigning the justice of my king, my judges, or my jury, I will recommend to be considered the motives of which a right judgment grounded upon belief, is to be made by men not biased by passion or prejudice, touching my being guilty or innocent of that horrid crime, of which by judgment of law I stand condemned; which motives of credibility can only be truly and clearly known and represented, by a just, true, and sincere stating of my case, with all its circumstances, with as much brevity as it is capable of, which I here give as followeth:

The first news which I had, and the first mention which I ever heard of this plot and treason against his majesty, for which so many have been lately executed, and for which I stand condemned, was on the 29th of September last, when I heard several priests were taken, and in custody, being charged by one Mr. Oates for high treason. On Monday come seven-night after, being the 7th of October, I was myself seized on in my chamber in the Temple, by a messenger of the council, by virtue of a warrant under the hands of four privy counsellors, issued out against John Langhorn, esq. my name being Richard, I told the messenger that he could not seize me by virtue of that warrant. To which he answered, that he believed me the person intended, and would run the hazard; whereupon I submitted, and went with him to Newgate. And though upon my coming thither, I told the chief gaoler captain Richardson, that he could not justify the detaining of my person by virtue of that warrant; he not only told me, that he would run the hazard of it, but immediately made me a close prisoner, and continued me so with the utmost strictness, for about eight months. From hence it must in all reason be agreed, that there being a full week passed from the time wherein I heard of persons being committed for the plot, to the time of my being seized, I must be a perfect mad-man to appear publicly, and not to fly or conceal myself, if I were conscious of any the least imaginable guilt. And the same conclusion must necessarily follow upon my so quiet submitting myself upon a warrant made against one of another name, to one who had no title by his warrant to make me a prisoner. And it may reasonably also be conceived, that Mr. Oates, upon whose sole information (as I have since heard) that warrant was issued, was not so well acquainted with me as at my trial he swore himself to be, since he knew not my right christian name, of which scarce any persons were ignorant, who ever had any manner of conversation or business with me.

After Michaelmas term, having continued under the before mentioned close imprisonment for two months, without ever having been so much as examined or told what I was committed for; I considered that too long a silence on my part, might possibly be rather taken for a sullenness, than patience. And that there being a sessions then very near, it imported me to prevent, as far as I could, that I should not be surprized by a trial; and hurried from my close imprisonment to a bar, without being permitted to speak with any of my friends, or to prepare for my trial. Hereupon I addressed myself to the said captain Richardson to procure leave to address a petition to his majesty, and having leave, I did about the 10th day of December, deliver a petition to my said keeper, to be humbly presented by him to his majesty, there being no possibility for me to put the same into any other hand to be delivered. Whether this petition did ever come to his majesty, or not, I could not know with certainty, but I believe it did; the substance of it was to represent the miseries of my close imprisonment together, with my innocency, and total ignorance of all particular matters with which I could be charged; and to pray, that I might be admitted to an examination; and confronted with my accusers, as I conceive the law required, to the end I might justify myself before his majesty, and be discharged if there should appear no just cause for my being longer detained; or otherwise, that by knowing what was charged against me, I might be enabled to make my just defence at my trial; and might for that purpose have the liberty of the gaol, and of speaking freely with my friends, and of sending for such witnesses as I should have occasion to use for my just defence; and might not be surprized and hurried to a trial, without any possibility of being able to make any defence.

To this petition I could never obtain any answer; but about the 16th day of December, I was sent for down out of my chamber, into captain Richardson's house, where I found three noble lords of parliament, who professed to come to me in charity, as I believe they did. These noble lords, when I was brought into their presence, were pleased to tell me, that I stood charged with High-Treason (but of what in particular, they did not say) and that there was great and evident proof against me, which would most certainly take away my life. And that they had heard so good a character of me in the world, that they were moved in charity and compassion to come to me, to advise me to make a free and full confession of the plot and treason against his majesty and the government, with which I stood charged, and thereby save my life. And they were pleased to offer me to become my mediators for a pardon for the saving of my life, and of my estate in case I would make such confession. I was much amazed to hear of such a charge against me, when my conscience cleared me from all guilt of that nature, so much as in thought. I therefore asked their lordships whether from the character they had received of me in the world, they did believe me to be an honest man? To which it was answered by one of their lordships, that their answer to that question of mine was to be distinguishing, viz. That I had so good and unblemished a reputation in the world, that if I were to give evidence in any concern of 10 or 20,000*l.* he should value my evidence as highly as any man's evidence whatsoever; but that in this present case if I should swear my innocency or that I knew nothing of the plot or treason with which I was charged, his lordship would not believe one word that I should swear. This answer made me see, that it would be in vain for me to make any asseverations to their lordships of my innocency and ignorance of any plot designed against his majesty; wherefore omitting that, I humbly represented my condition to their lordships, as to my close imprisonment, and my never having been examined, so as to make me capable of making a just defence, by a foreknowledge of what was charged against me. And I told them, that although it was supposed by the law, that in criminal cases the affirmative was to be proved by the king's witnesses, and that a negative could not be proved; yet it was known by all, that there might in many cases such affirmatives be proved by the prisoner as to many circumstances, as might clearly prove the affirmative, sworn by the king's witnesses to be impossible to be true. And that for this reason, if I should be surprized by a sudden trial, without knowing what was charged against me, and the circumstances of the charge, and without having the liberty of the gaol, and of my friends coming freely to me, in order to my preparing for my trial, and for my just defence, it would be the same thing as to murder me. To all which one of the said lords replied (it was the earl of Shaftsbury) that he took this way of close imprisonment to be illegal, and that to be so surprized by a trial, would be the same thing as to cut my throat; and his lordship did thereupon tell me, that care should be taken, that I should have a just liberty and freedom in the goal for my friends to come to me, and should not be surprized by a trial, as I feared to be.

This promise of this noble lord gave me great comfort; but notwithstanding this, my close imprisonment continued. My opinion was, that I was forgotten; and therefore I did several times send to captain Richardson, to put their lordships in mind of it; and when that was without effect, I apprehended that captain Richardson neglected me. But I find since, that those lords must have been understood to have intended to move the House of Lords, in relation to the making good of that promise; and that by the dissolving of that parliament, (which happened shortly after, though unknown then to me) there was no possibility for the making of such motion.

My close imprisonment continuing in January or February following, my poor wife procured leave from his majesty to see me; but not otherwise, than in the presence of my keeper. Upon her coming, I bemoaned myself to her, that I was totally ignorant of what was charged against me; and had still a continuance of my fear that I should be surprized with a trial, without being able to make any defence. My wife, much troubled to hear this, could not give me any answer to remove my apprehension, because captain Richardson was present; but against the time of her next coming to me, she procured an Abstract to be made of the several Narratives of Mr. Colewan's and Mr. Ireland's trials; and when she came next, she endeavoured to give it to me, to the end I might from thence know what was at those trials given in evidence relating to me. But captain Richardson discovering her intention, took the paper, and though he told me he would restore it to her, he carried it to the privy council, and would not permit my wife to see me any more.

Upon the delivery of the beforementioned paper to the council, (which was on the 1st day of March) a most worthy friend of mine had licence from his majesty to come to me, to exhort me to confess my knowledge of the plot, to represent unto me my danger, if I refused; and to give me hopes of a free pardon, in case I complied therein. In truth he represented my condition to me so dismally, that had not Almighty God been very merciful unto me, his discourses would have been of sufficient force to have deprived me of my understanding. In short, he both told me I was to expect no mercy, without a discovery made by me of the plot, and that there was two or three express witnesses against me who had been believed already by several juries; and that it was unreasonable in me to expect, that other juries should not believe what former juries had believed. He added, that the whole people were so possessed of a full belief of the plot, from the testimony of those witnesses, and of such strange an abhorrence against all of my religion, that whatever could be said against me would be believed by every jury; and whatever I should pretend to give in evidence for my defence, would be disbelieved and rejected, though an angel should come from heaven to confirm it. To all which I gave answer, that my trust and reliance was in my God, and only in him, that I had no doubt but my God, who knew my innocence, would stand by me and assist me, and find some way for the justification of my innocence, which to him I did aver and declare in the presence of God, and by invoking his divine majesty, to testify the truth of what I so averred and declared, with all the solemnity that I could use, and that can be used by a Christian in any case of like nature. I told him that there must be two several persons perjured, or I must be safe; and I could not think that two persons could conspire in perjury, for the destroying of so inconsiderable a person as I knew myself to be. And I added, that in case my God should so far withdraw his grace from me, by abandoning me to a reprobate sense, as to leave me to submit to the temptation of charging other persons falsely with any crime or plot, by which I should endanger the lives of others, for the saving of my own life, I was totally ignorant how to frame a plot that should seem credible; and could not in possibility frame any thing that could agree with what was at the present affirmed by my accusers, I being totally ignorant of what they had affirmed.

After this person had left me, I was in the beginning of March, and about one or two days before the meeting of the now parliament, again sent for down into captain Richardson's house, where I found two most honourable lords of his majesty's council, who gave me the same exhortation and invitation, in order to a discovery of the plot, as I had received before from my other friend; with this great addition, that their lordships shewed me an order of council to secure me of my pardon, in case I should make such discovery; but with this condition, that I must make it then, or else the assurance of pardon, promised by that order, to be void.

My conscience being clear and innocent, I made the same answers to these noble lords, as I had done to the former person who had sent to me; whereupon, before their departure, they delivered into my hands that paper which my wife had formerly prepared for me, it being (as I found) the opinion of his majesty, and of the council, that I should have it.

Upon all these circumstances duly considered, I hope it will appear to every charitable judgment, that if I had been in the least measure conscious to myself of any treason, I must (as I have said before) be esteemed to have totally lost my understanding, and to have become a perfect lunatic, in refusing to discover what (in case I had been guilty) I could not but see would be proved against me, especially when my discovery was so fully secured, of producing me a pardon.

My close imprisonment continued until two or three days before Whitsunday, about which time it was allowed to some of my friends, to come to me with freedom, in order to my preparing for my trial, which was appointed to be at the end of Whitson week. By these friends, I had the printed Narrative brought to me of all the former trials relating to this plot, but I could have no light (otherwise than from them) of what would be charged again: t me in evidence.

I found it given in evidence by Mr. Oates at Mr. Coleman's trial, That he communicated the substance of a treasonable consult unto me, on the 25th of April 1678. The very next day (as he then swore) after the consult, and saw several commissions then in my chamber lying before me; and that after that time, he had never seen me. And I was glad to find that he had (as I conceive by what he then swore) lockt himself up by his oath to a time, and could not, without perjury, charge any thing against me as done after that time. And so far as I could make any judgment of what was deposed by Mr. Bedlow against me at Mr. Ireland's trial, touching my registering the consults of the Jesuits, I conceived it was only intended by him upon his hear-say. This was the whole (so far as I could gather from the printed Narrative) of what appeared to be charged. I did remember the name of Oates, having once by his hand received a letter; but I did not remember his person. And as for Mr. Bedlow, I did not remember ever at any time to have heard his name.

I found also from the said Narratives, That the Court had declared both those witnesses to be ill men. And as to Mr. Oates, I found that he had owned himself to have been first a Protestant, then a Roman Catholic; and now upon this charge laid by him upon me, and others, (of more value in the world by much, than my poor self) to profess himself again to be a Protestant. I also found, That upon comparing the several evidences which he had given against others, he had apparently contradicted himself, and affirmed several things which could not subsist to be all true, because they were contradictory one to the other. And as to Mr. Bedlow, I found by the Narrative of Mr. Reading's Trial, That he swore himself at that trial to be flatly perjured, when he gave evidence against Mr. Whitebread and Mr. Fenwick at Mr. Ireland's trial; for being then sworn to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth against the said Mr. Whitebread and Fenwick. And having then affirmed upon his said oath, That he was a stranger to them, and knew nothing to give in evidence against them, he did at the said trial of Mr. Reading, swear that it was impossible that he should be such a stranger to Mr. Whitebread and Mr. Fenwick, as he affirmed himself to be at their trials, when he was sworn to give evidence against them. I was also informed, (and there was a witness to prove the same) That when at one of the former trials witnesses were tendered, to prove that Mr. Bedlow was a very ill man, and that for that reason no credit was to be given to him. He answered in the Court publicly, That they might save their labour to prove how ill he had been, for he readily owned the worst things that could be said of him; but that having the king's pardon, he was safe. And as to both Mr. Oates, and Mr. Bedlow, I was informed from good hands:

1. That they had owned themselves (with what truth I will not undertake to say) Guilty of the same Treason that they now charged upon me and others; and this was evident, from what they swore at every trial.

2. That they had received their pardons more than once each of them.

3. That they had received great rewards for the evidences by them given against others in the same case.

4. That they expected greater and farther rewards for the evidence to be given against me, and others.

All which, I conceived, would render their evidence unfit to be credited by any jury, if not wholly invalid in law.

Having gained these lights, after my long imprisonment, I did with very great longing expect my trial, and with great joy went to it when the day came, (which was Saturday in Whitsun-week, being the 14th of June now past) though in my passage from the gaol to the Court, I found myself condemned by the multitude before my trial, which (I thank my God) put me in remembrance of what my blessed Jesus suffered, from the like vote of the people.

I shall forbear to repeat the particulars of my trial, because I will give no occasion to think, That I have any intention to arraign the justice of my king, or of the government, or of my judges, or jury; only I shall crave leave to observe these following particulars, viz.

I. That the two first witnesses which were sworn for the king, deposed nothing against me; those were Mr. Dugdale, and Mr. Prance.

II. That Mr. Oates, who was the third witness sworn for the king, and the first whose evidence charged me, deposed, That he had two several communications with me since the month of April 1678, namely, in July and August 1678, whereas at the trial of Mr. Coleman, he had expressly sworn, That after the month of April 1678, he had never seen me to his knowledge or remembrance.

III. That Mr. Bedlow deposed, That as he and Mr. Coleman were together walking in my chamber in the Temple, he saw me entering several treasonable letters into a book in my study; and that the said book was a great book, lying upon the desk in my study; Whereas every person who knows my said chamber, and the situation of my study, cannot but know, that it is impossible to look out of my chamber into my study, so as to see any one writing there, and that I never had at any time any desk in my study.

What passed farther at my trial I forbear to mention, for the reason before given, but refer to such Narrative of my Trial, as I hear is published in print; which if it be truly made, I thank the reporter for his justice; if untruly, I then beg of God to pardon the reporter's injustice. In the mean time I do here, in the presence of the Great God, who is the God of truth, and the searcher of all hearts, declare and protest:

1. That as to Mr. Bedlow, I do not know, remember or believe, that I ever saw him, or heard him speak, before that time that he appeared in the said Court, to give evidence against me at my said trial.

2. That I did never see or speak with Mr. Oates at any time since the month of November 1677, so that I can with great truth affirm, and do affirm, in the presence of the all-knowing God, That whatever was given in evidence against me by the said Bedlow, was utterly false and untrue. As likewise whatever was given against me in evidence by the said Oates, as spoken by himself, or by me, in the months of April, July and August, 1678, or at any other times after the month of November 1677. As also what was sworn in evidence against me by the said Oates, at his first coming to me in the month of November 1677, which related to my prejudice; and which I could have proved to be false by a very good witness, in case I could have foreseen, that Mr. Oates would have had the confidence to have given any thing in evidence against me, as pretended to have been spoken by me at that time. But Mr. Oates, at the trial of Mr. Coleman, gave a clear evidence of his skill in this kind of fencing, and of his great care and cunning, to prevent that no person, whose life he designs to take away by his evidence, shall ever be able to know what he intends to swear, or consequently to produce any witness to discover or disprove his perjuries: For being then upon his oath, and being interrogated what he had informed against Mr. Coleman before his majesty and the council at Mr. Coleman's examination there, before he was committed to Newgate, Mr. Oates did not blush to swear, That he did only at that time inform what he judged sufficient, whereupon to ground Mr. Coleman's commitment; and concealed what he had farther to say, lest he should by saying it, enable Mr. Coleman to produce witnesses as to the circumstances of time and place, to disprove what Mr. Oates should say against him, or to the like effect.

Add to all this, that which Mr. Oates answered at my trial, when interrogated by me, (and to my best remembrance Bedlow gave the like answer to the same question) what gratification or reward he had received, for his pretended discovery of this by him pretended plot, and for giving evidence against such as had been tried thereupon; and particularly, whether he had not received the sum of 500*l.* and did not expect to receive a farther gratification for his farther services therein? He boldly answered, That he was so far from having received any such sum, or any reward for his said services, that he was out of purse 750*l.* of his own monies, in the prosecution of the same. Which, how great an untruth that is, I refer to his majesty, and those who manage his majesty's monies and treasury; and to all who knew the most extreme poverty of these two persons, Oates and Bedlow, before they relieved their wants, and found the way to supply their necessities, by charging those persons with treason who have been executed, or remain still prisoners upon their accusations.

After the judgment was given against me, upon the verdict found upon the evidence of these two men, there were two persons came to me to the gaol, as sent by the earl of Shaftsbury, or his order, to propose something to me in charity, for the saving of my life. The first thing by them proposed to be done by me for that end, was a discovery to be made by me of the plot and treason for which I stood condemned. But when I had satisfied them so far, as to my solemn protestations made in the presence of God, were of force to satisfy them touching my innocency, and my total ignorance of any plot or treason ever at any time designed against his majesty, other than the late unparalleled treason and rebellion, which was before his majesty's happy restoration. They were pleased to propose farther, That it was well known, that I had been made use of as a counsel for the Jesuits, and in that capacity could not but know what estates they had in England, or at least a very great part of those estates; and that if I would freely make a discovery of such estates of that nature as should be of a considerable value, I should thereby obtain my pardon; the granting of which, upon such discovery, might be well justified to the parliament at their next meeting.

Having well weighed this latter proposal, and considered, that it would be a sin against truth to deny that I had a knowledge of such estates; and that all the scandal which could be taken by my discovery of them, could not be so great, as my denial would be offensive to God. And having no doubt, but that my frank and sincere discovering and owning what was within my knowledge, though to the displeasure of those who were to be concerned therein, would make it evident to all honest and judicious persons, that in case I knew any of the plot, or of any treason intended against his majesty, (the concealment of which by me would be a sin unto damnation) I would without difficulty discover the same, for the saving of my soul, as well as of my life, since I was ready to make a discovery of such estates, the concealment of which could be no sin against God or the king. I freely engaged myself to discover all that I knew touching such estates, for the service of his majesty; and the persons by whom the same was so proposed, went from me, with a resolution, to report my ready compliance therein unto his said lordship.

After this, I did by some friends prevail to have a report made to his majesty, of what had passed between those two persons and me, with which his majesty seemed (as I was informed) to be well satisfied, and directed, that I should send unto, and intrust his majesty with so much as I could remember (without having resort to writings) of those estates, which I with all readiness did: And I took that command from his majesty, to be an evident implied promise of a pardon, for the securing of my life. This engagement of mine, to make this discovery, occasioned a reprieve to be granted me for some days; but after the said reprieve granted, my lord of Shaftsbury was pleased to intimate unto me by one of the aforesaid persons, by whom it was first proposed unto me to make such discovery, that no pardon should be granted to me, without a full discovery made by me of the plot. And his lordship was also pleased to come to captain Richardson's house, and sending for me thither, to tell me to this effect, viz. That as my parts and reputation in the world had made me fit for employment, so I might rest secure, That in case I would make a full discovery of the plot, I should be put into as good a post, both as to honour and estate, as my own heart could wish; but if I failed to do that, no discovery of estates could or should procure my pardon. I laboured, what I could, by solemn protestations to satisfy his lordship of my innocency, and my total ignorance of any plot or treason whatsoever; and this I did so fully, (as I conceived) That in case Almighty God should have so far withdrawn his grace from me, as to leave me to a reprobate sense, and to permit against truth, to have pretended a knowledge of a plot, to the prejudice of any person, merely for the saving of my own poor life, and the obtaining those advantages with which I was tempted, I ought not in any measure to have been believed. But blessed be my God, who hath by his grace so far strengthened, as to enable me rather to choose and lose my life in innocency, and save my soul, than by falsities to lose my soul, and become guilty of the blood of others, against whom I could not with truth testify any thing of any crime.

After his said lordship had given me the temptation before-mentioned, I had several persons applied to me, with discourses tending wholly to make me despair of pardon, unless I would discover a plot; and to persuade me, that it was not honourable nor honest for me to discover any estates, which his majesty might seize on, in case I did not know, that the owners of the said estates were traitors. But I took all these discourses to signify no more than a repentance, for having proposed to me to make a discovery of estates: And therefore having sent such discovery unto his majesty, as I was able to make upon my memory; I laboured by my friends, and did obtain a farther reprieve, together with an order requiring to send into the council by a day limited, such discovery as I could make; and a license to have all my writings and papers in my chamber perused by such as I nominated, and according to such direction as I should give, for the better enabling me to perfect such discovery. This was conceived by me, and my friends, to be intended by his majesty, as an assurance of a pardon, it being to engage the whole council, as his majesty was pleased to engage himself before, when he commanded me to trust him; and it seemed evident, that this discovery required, must be a discovery of estates, otherwise the perusal of papers and writings had been to no purpose.

In obedience to the said last mentioned command, I applied with all diligence to compleat my discovery, my papers and writings were examined by my friends, and my discovery was perfected, and delivered in unto the council, at the precise day for that purpose limited, and it amounted to the value, as I computed the same, of between 20 and 30,000*l.* sterling, and was annexed to a petition, wherein I declared my innocency and ignorance of any treason or plot, and my sincere dealing as to my said discovery; and offered to submit myself to be examined upon interrogatories upon oath, or to undergo any trial of any test, for the giving satisfaction, that the discovery then by me made was compleat, and that I knew of no other lands belonging in any ways to the Jesuits, other than what I had then and there discovered; and likewise for the purging of myself touching any other matter, upon which it should be thought fit to examine me. And in my said discovery, I expressed every thing with such certainty as to the names of the estates, and the places where they lay, and the values, so far as I was able to give the same, and the persons (so far as I knew) concerned therein, that it was easy to seize the same immediately for the use of his majesty: So that I thereby did all that was in my power, in order to my giving a perfect obedience to the said commands of his majesty, and to what was thereby required from me. And my friends, as well as myself, had no doubt, but that as Almighty God requires no more from us, for the obtaining his pardon of our sins, and the salvation of our souls, than what his Divine Majesty knows to be possible for us to do on our parts; so the king's majesty, and his council, would require no more from me, for the saving of my poor life, and the obtaining of my pardon, than what was possible for me on my part to do. I also looked upon the public honour and faith to be now firmly engaged for the security of my life, and the granting of a pardon to me, I having fully performed my part, of that which was the condition. And it being clear, that when once my discovery was delivered in, and read in council, it ceased to be a secret, and that nothing therein contained, could afterwards remain as a thing undiscovered. It was likewise evident that by this act I had done (as I believed) more than any other single person now living, who is merely a layman, could do for the service of his majesty. And that if there were any such plot, as is affirmed by Oates and Bedlow, and that any person now charged therewith, had knowledge thereof, and should be required, as I had been, to discover what he knows for the saving of his life, he would hardly be induced to make such discovery, in case my life should be taken away, after my so free discovery of all that was within my knowledge to be discovered, was in obedience to so great a command delivered out of my hands. However I rested satisfied, that in case my life should be taken away for the crime for which I stand condemned, and after my obedience given to his majesty's commands, in making the said discovery, I should die with this great comfort, That I should have a double martyrdom. First, as dying perfectly innocent of the crime for which I should lose my life. And secondly, as choosing rather to die, than to sin against my God, and my neighbour, by charging others falsely, and becoming guilty of their blood, and of the ruin of their families, by accusing them of a crime, of which my own conscience must bear me witness, that I did never know them, or any of them Guilty; but on the contrary, believe them to be perfectly innocent. Whereas if I had on the other side denied myself to have known any thing of those estates, which I was required to discover, I must have sinned against the God of truth, by affirming a lye. And if confessing, that I had knowledge of such estates, I should rather have chosen to die, than to have made a discovery of such my knowledge for the saving of my life, I should have appeared, in some sort at least, guilty of my own blood, through my obstinacy.

Upon the delivering of this discovery, and the reading of it in the council, the lord viscount Halifax produced a letter written to him (as his lordship affirmed) from the earl of Roscommon from Brussels, in which letter the said Earl taking notice, that he had heard of my being reprieved, affirmed himself to be much satisfied, that my life should be saved; and gave this reason, that my life might be useful to the public, or to the like effect. These words were taken to my great disadvantage, and to import, as if the earl of Roscommon did know, that I was able to make a discovery of the plot. And though the words might well bear a more kind sense, and did not, without forcing, so much as incline to that unkind interpretation; yet upon the reading of that letter, my discovery was rejected, after having been publicly read, and ordered to be sent unto me by a clerk of the council, and notice to be given to me, that by an order of council, I was reprieved only until the 14th day of July; and that if before that day I did not make a discovery of the plot, I was to expect no farther mercy.

My friends were more astonished at this order than myself was, and being now in this condition, I presumed yet once more, to address a Petition, in which I prayed, that my life might be saved, though to be spent in banishment; and to the end that I might do all that in me lay, to express and declare my innocency, I did, to that Petition, annex this following Declaration, and Protestation, viz.

I do solemnly and sincerely in the presence of Almighty God, profess, testify, and declare, as followeth: That is to say,

I. That I do believe, and own my most gracious sovereign lord the king's majesty, king Charles 2, to be my true and lawful sovereign king, in the same sense and latitude, to all intents and purposes, as in the oath commonly called, 'the oath of allegiance,' his said majesty is expressed to be king of this realm of England.

II. That I do in my soul believe, that neither the pope, nor any prince, potentate, or foreign authority, nor the people of England, nor any authority out of this kingdom, or within the same, hath or have any right to dispossess his said majesty of the crown and government of England, or to depose him therefrom, for any cause, or pretended cause whatsoever; or to give licence to me, or to any other of his majesty's subjects whatsoever, to bear arms against his majesty, or to take away his life, or to do him any bodily harm; or to disturb the government of this kingdom, as it is now established by law; or to alter, or go about to alter the said government, or the religion now established in England, by any way of force.

III. That I neither am, nor ever was at any time guilty, so much as in my most secret thoughts, of any treason, or misprision of treason whatsoever.

IV. That I do believe, that if I did know, or should know of any treason, or reasonable design that was, or is intended, or should be intended against his said majesty, or the government of this his majesty's kingdom, or for the alteration by force, advice or otherwise, of the said government, or of the religion now established in this kingdom, and should conceal, and not discover the same to his said majesty, or his majesty's council or ministers, or some of them, that such concealment would be to me a sin unto death, and eternal damnation.

And I do solemnly, in the presence of God, profess, testify and declare, that as I hope for salvation, or expect any benefit by the blood and passion of Jesus Christ, I do make this declaration and every part thereof, in the plain and ordinary sense of the words, wherein the same stands written, as they are commonly understood by English Protestants, and the courts of justice of England, without any evasion, or equivocation, or delusion, or mental reservation whatsoever. And without any dispensation, or pardon, or absolution already granted to me, for this or any other purpose, by the Pope or any other authority or person whatsoever, or without any hope of any such dispensation. And without thinking or believing that I am, or can be acquitted before God or man, or absolved of this declaration; or any part thereof, although the Pope, or any other person or persons, or power whatsoever, should dispense with or annul the same, or declare that it was or is null or void from the beginning.

This, with my Petition, was presented to his majesty in council, on Thursday the 10th of July instant; and after the reading of my Petition, my said protestation and declaration was, as I am informed, begun to be read, but when the person that read the same, came to read that part of it in which I aver my innocency, he was not, as I am informed, permitted to read farther; and it was declared, That I was to expect no farther mercy, unless I would make a discovery of the plot, which, God is my witness. I cannot do, because I know nothing of it directly or indirectly.

And now having related all the particular circumstances of my case, so far as my memory can recollect them; and made such protestations and declarations as is before mentioned, I shall only recommend to be considered by all impartial judgments; those solemn and serious protestations which were made by those others, who have lost their lives already upon the evidence given against them by the same Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, and pray that it may be duly weighed, Whether the solemn oaths and protestations of sober men, made by them immediately before their respective deaths, and this protestation of mine before mentioned, made at a time, when my confession and discovery of a plot or treason against my king (in case I had been privy unto, or known such plot or treason) would not only have saved my life, and secured me a pardon; but would also have entitled me unto, and, in all probability, put me into the full possession of preferments and advantages, greater than I ever, I thank my God, coveted: Be not more considerable to move a belief of my innocency, than the evidence given against me by my accusers before-mentioned, to move a belief of my guilt? It is said, it is not upon the bare oaths of those two witnesses, but upon the verdict of the twelve jurors, that I am found Guilty. I am sure that every judicious person, who understands our proceedings in our law of England, in all cases of this nature, doth know and can answer, that the verdict of the 12 jurors is grounded wholly upon the evidence given by the witnesses. The jurors belief of the witnesses produced and sworn to give evidence against me, was the foundation of their verdict, and justifies them in law; and the verdict given by the jurors, doth in law justify the judgment given by the judges, for the taking away of my belief. And I beseech God that the same rule of law, may, at the great and terrible day of judgment, acquit as well the jurors, who gave that verdict, as the judges who gave that judgment, from all guilt of my blood. But I must again refer it to the consciences of all unbiassed, judicious and good men, whether in Christian charity, the motives of credibility founded upon such judgment, the verdict, which was solely grounded upon the evidence of Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, be of greater force to a good and charitable conscience to pronounce me Guilty, than the several other motives which I have here represented, will be found to pronounce me innocent?

It will no way concern me as to my own particular, whether the world shall adjudge me innocent, or not; it is sufficient for me, that my conscience doth with great joy and peace acquit me. And that the God of all truth, my dearest Jesus, who is truth itself, doth know me to be innocent. And that the consciences of those most unhappy men, Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, will at the last day, when the secrets of all hearts shall be made manifest, be compelled to the glory of God and their own shame, to proclaim me innocent. I beseech Almighty God to give those miserable men a true and sincere repentance for the sin which they have committed, and by which they have drawn upon themselves the guilt of my innocent blood.

I do here profess myself to die a member of the holy Catholic and Apostolic Church, of which, the bishop of Rome is the supreme visible head of government on earth, as the successor of the holy apostle St. Peter. And of which Church our blessed Lord Jesus is the supreme invisible head, of influence to guide, govern and direct the same by his Holy Spirit. And I do take my religion to be the sole cause of my being the object of the malice of my enemies, who are the causers of my death.

If what I here say be any ways disbelieved because of my religion, I humbly recommend it to the consideration of sober men, whether such disbelief upon this ground, be not,

1. To cast a reproach and blemish upon the honour and reputation of all our most pious ancestors, and our whole nation, who lived and died before the 20th year of king Henry 8, and who did all live and die in the same faith, and members of the same Church, of which by God's grace I am now a member, though unworthy.

2. To cast a like reproach upon all the princes, states and people of the world, who are members of the same Church.

3. To give a just occasion to the same princes, states and people, never to give credit to any thing affirmed or sworn by any English Protestant; and consequently,

4. To lay a foundation for the total destroying of all trade, as well as conversation, with all those princes, states and people.

We must learn to do unto others, as we would have others do unto us. And it is not a good answer to say, that this disbelief is only in relation to the Jesuits, and those who make use of them? For there is scarce any prince of this religion now living, who doth not make use of a Jesuit for his ghostly father; which will likewise be a clear evidence, that those princes (known to all the world not to be fools or madmen) have not an opinion, that the doctrines and principles of the Jesuits, are any ways pernicious and dangerous to government, as the pulpits of England repute them to be. And certainly if an English Protestant should in France, cast the two execrable murders of those two kings of that kingdom, who were killed by Clement and Ravillac, upon the Jesuits, or as an effect of any doctrine of our church, that church and that order, would with much greater ease clear themselves from such a reproach, than our English Protestants could clear themselves, in case the murder of queen Mary of Scotland (our king's great grandmother) or of our last most excellent prince king Charles the 1st, should be cast as a reproach upon the doctrines of the Protestant church of England, or of any other party professing Protestantcy, these murders being committed under the solemn species and formalities of public justice; when it is well known, that Clement and Ravillac were only two private villains, who were disowned by all the world. Nor do there want authors who call themselves, and are reputed to be Protestants, who, in their public writings, justify these two murders of queen Mary and king Charles 1. Nay, there may, peradventure, be found more authors, reputed Protestants, who justify the people to have a power to depose and take away the lives of kings, than there are found authors, reputed to be Catholics, who assert the Pope to have power to depose princes. Yet, God forbid, that I should call these positions or opinions, the doctrines of the church of England; I impute these actions to the passions of wicked and ambitious men; and these doctrines, to those only who write or own them; and certainly the same charity cannot, without sin, be denied to us by all sober judgments. But if this justice be denied unto me, and those of my religion, I beseech God to pardon such as are so uncharitable; and I do most heartily and from my soul, forgive those who want this charity, as I do the before-named Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, and all others who are any ways guilty of my death, or of my not obtaining my pardon, or of rejoicing at the shedding of my innocent blood; and all who have done me any injury whatsoever, Sweet Jesus forgive them, they know not what they do.

July 12, 1679. RICHARD LANGHORN.

The AFFECTIONS of my SOUL, after Judgment given against me in a Court of Justice, upon the Evidence of False Witnesses.

I.

It is told me I must die
 Ignominiously,
 By the hand of the executioner:
 O happy news!
 I see myself honoured with the livery of Jesus,
 I receive the judgment of death
 As an enemy to Cæsar,
 As designing the death of my king,
 And the depriving him of His crown,
 His government.

Whilst in the mean time
 My Jesus knows,
 My conscience rejoicing testifies,
 That I never yet harboured
 In my heart at any time,
 So much as one disloyal thought
 Against my king and sovereign.
 And the consciences
 Of my accusers must testify
 At the last and dreadful judgment,
 To the glory of my God,
 And the justification of truth,
 That I am perfectly innocent
 Of all and every the crimes,
 Of which they swore me guilty.

II.

It is told me I must die
 A death of dishonour in the Vain opinion of the world,
 O happy news!
 My Jesus calls me by this sentence,
 To bear his cross, and follow him.
 The judge declares my death necessary
 For the king, and for his people;
 The people shout and cry out,
 Crucify, crucify.
 He who was perfect innocency,
 Hath set before me his example,
 He opened not his mouth,
 He justified not himself,
 He forgave, and prayed for his enemies.
 O what happiness
 To be dignified with so many circumstances
 Of the death of Jesus!

III.

It is told me I must die,
 O sweet and happy news!
 Rejoice, O my soul,
 For thou hast no cause for fear,
 Thy Jesus hath died for thee;
 He hath paid a ransom for thee;
 He hath bought thee with his life;
 He hath satisfied for thy sins;
 He hath purchased Paradise for thee;
 He hath adopted thee his brother;
 He hath adopted thee the Son of his Father.
 He hath cleansed thee by his blood;
 He hath given thee his body for thy security;
 Upon his cross he declared thee son of his mother;
 And he now gives thee his cross to bear,
 As an evidence that thou art one of his.

IV.

It is told me I must die,
 O happy news!
 Be glad, O my soul,
 And rejoice in Jesus thy Saviour.
 If he intended thy perdition,
 Would he have laid down his life for thee?
 Would he have expected thee with so much patience,
 And given thee so long a time for penance?
 Would he have called thee with so much love,
 And illuminated thee with the lights of his spirit?

Would he have drawn thee with so great force,
 And favoured thee with so many graces?
 Would he have given thee so many good desires?
 Would he have set the Seal of the Predestinate upon thee,
 And dressed thee in his own livery?
 Would he have given thee his own cross,
 And given thee shoulders to bear it with patience?

V.

It is told me I must die,
 O happy news!
 Come on, my dearest soul,
 Behold thy Jesus calls thee,
 He prayed for thee upon his cross,
 There he extended his arms to receive thee;
 There he bowed down his head to kiss thee;
 There he cried out with a powerful voice,
 Father receive him, he is mine;
 There he opened his heart to give thee entrance;
 There he gave up his life, to purchase life for thee.

VI.

It is told me I must die,
 O blessed news!
 I must quit
 Earth for Heaven,
 My earthly prison for a liberty of joy;
 My banishment for my country prepared for me.
 I must pass
 From time, to eternity;
 From misery, to felicity;
 From change, to immutability;
 From death, to immortality.
 I must leave what I possess on earth,
 To possess my God;
 To enjoy my Jesus;
 To converse with angels and saints.
 I must go to fill
 My spirit with a plenitude of light;
 My will with a fulness of peace;
 My memory with a collection of all good;
 My senses with a satiety of pleasures.
 I must go where I shall find
 All things which I can desire,
 Nothing that I can fear.
 I shall no more want any good,
 God shall be unto me all in all,
 And my all to all eternity.

VII.

It is told me I must die,
 O happy news!
 I shall be freed from misery;
 I shall no more suffer pain;
 I shall no more be subject to sin;
 I shall no more be in danger of being damned.
 But from henceforth
 I shall see, and I shall live;
 I shall praise, and I shall bless;
 And this I shall always do,
 Without ever being weary
 Of doing what I always am to do.

VIII.

It is told me I must die,
 O what happiness!
 I am going
 To the place of my rest;
 To the land of the living;
 To the haven of security;
 To the kingdom of peace;
 To the palace of my God;
 To the nuptials of the Lamb;
 To sit at the table of my king;
 To feed on the bread of angels;
 To see what no eye hath seen;
 To hear what no ear hath heard;
 To enjoy what the heart of man cannot comprehend.

IX.

It is told me I must die,
 O news of joy!
 Let us go, my soul, I am content,
 I joyfully renounce this life,
 And render it back to him that gave it me;
 I remit my spirit into his hands;
 I recommend my soul and body to my Jesus;
 I accept this death most willingly,
 And offer it with the merits of Jesus,
 As a satisfaction for my many sins.
 I believe every thing that he hath revealed;
 I hope for every thing that he hath promised;
 I acknowledge and know my own nothingness;
 I give him all that I can call my own;
 I am willing to die
 For his glory,
 For his love,
 Out of gratitude for his favours,
 And to satisfy his justice.
 I am willing to die for him, as he died for me.
 I am willing to die,
 To see my Jesus,
 To love my Jesus,
 To bless my Jesus,
 And to sing his praises to all eternity.
 Come on, my soul, let us go and rejoice,
 He, who by his grace, hath enabled thee to know
 Thy own miseries,
 And his mercies.
 He who hath enabled thee
 To detest thyself,
 And to rely on him,
 Commands thee to shake off all fear;
 It is not for any thing in thee,
 That he enables thee to these acts,
 Or that he loves thee, and will save thee;
 He doth it because he is God,
 Perfect love, and perfect goodness.

X.

O Father of mercy,
 Behold thy child, who hath been a prodigal;
 Who, having wasted all his goods,
 And spent his time in vanity,
 Drawn by thy grace and love,
 Is now returning to thy house,
 And humbly begs for pardon at thy hands.
 Alas!
 I have lived as without reason,

Since first I had the use of reason ;
I have done nothing of myself but evil,
From the time that I first knew what good was,
I have sinned against Heaven, and against thee,
I deserve not the title of thy son,
Or to have admittance into thy house.
And though I am wholly innocent
Of the crime for which I am sentenced now to die,

Yet from thy hands I have deserved a death to
All eternity.

But thou hast made me know,
That thou canst not cease to be a Father,
For my having often ceased to comport myself
As thy child

Thou canst not lose thy goodness,
By my having often forgotten my gratitude ;
Thou canst not forget to be a Father of mercy,
By my having become a child of misery.

XI.

O my Father,
O thou the best of all Fathers,
Have pity on the most wretched of all thy children ;

I was lost, but by thy mercy am now found ?
I was dead, but by thy grace am now raised again ;

I was gone astray after vanity,
But am now ready to appear before thee.

O my Father,
Come now in mercy and receive thy child ;
Give him the kiss of peace ;
Remit unto him all his sins ;
Cloath him with thy nuptial robe ;
Receive him into thy house ;
Permit him to have a place at thy feast ;
And forgive all those who are guilty of his death.

XII.

O Jesu,
The comforter of the afflicted ;
The refuge of the oppressed ;
The redeemer of the captives ;
The hope of the distressed ;
Behold I address unto thee,
Who never drivest any from thee,
Who approach unto thee with Faith, Hope and Love.

My heart tells thee,
That it burns with a desire to see thee,
And that for that end it is impatient to die.
Come sweet Jesu,

Come quickly,
Draw my soul from this prison ;
Recal me from this banishment ;
Conduct me to my dear country ;
Behold the just expect me ;
My friends reach out their arms towards me.
O how beautiful are thy tabernacles !
O how admirable is thy palace !
O what content shall I have with thee !
What happiness in thy company !
I die with a desire to die.
Come blessed Jesus,
And receive my spirit,
Which languisheth to be with thee ;

Into thy hands, O Jesus,
I recommend my spirit.

Acts of Resignation, Thanksgiving, Faith,
Hope, and Love.

Blessed Jesus, who art the way, the truth,
And the life, behold I do most willingly
Take up and bear my cross, as thou hast
Commanded me, and do give thee most humble
Thanks, that thou art pleased to dignify
My death with so many circumstances of Thy most sacred passion, as thou art pleased
To bestow on it.

I firmly believe, O my Jesus, whatsoever
Thou hast proposed unto me by thy holy Catholic

And Apostolic church ; because thou hast spoken it,

Blessed be thy name, that by thy grace I have Lived in this faith, and that thou hast pleased
To think me worthy to die for it.

On thee, O my Jesus, I profess wholly and solely

To rely, and to hope in thee ; and in thy blood
With so much love shed for me, by which I

Firmly confide, that thou wilt save me,
Though most unworthy, I love thee, O my Jesus,

For thyself, and beg that thou wilt increase
That love in me ; I am sorry, O my God, from my

Heart and soul, that I have at any time sinned Against thee, and this, as I hope by thy grace, for

The love of thee.

Several Acts of my Soul, upon the last Words of our blessed Jesus.

I do from my heart, O my Jesus, pardon all my Enemies, and particularly those upon whose false

And untrue testimonies, I am adjudged to die
for

Crimes, of which thou, my Jesus knowest, and their

Consciences at the dreadful day of judgment
Must testify that I am wholly innocent, Father

Forgive them, they know not what they do.
Behold, O my Jesus, I am now coming unto thee,

Confirm it unto my soul by thy holy spirit, that
This day I shall be with thee in Paradise.

O Lamb of God, who upon thy cross didst adopt me

In the person of St. John, to be the son of thy Blessed mother, and before whose throne thy holy

Saints now offer the incense of prayer for thy Servants upon earth, mercifully receive those Prayers which are addressed to thee, for me the most

Unworthy of thy creatures.

O blessed Jesus, who upon thy cross wert pleased

To suffer an abandonment, to the end I might Not be abandoned by thy Father at my death.

Blessed be thy name, that thou art pleased to be now

With me by thy holy spirit, and not to forsake Me in this great time of trial.

O my dearest Jesus ! who upon thy cross didst suffer

Thirst, for the perfecting the work of my redemption.

Behold I now thirst to be with thee, blessed be Thy name that thou art pleased to give me this thirst.

O my Jesus, who upon thy cross didst consummate

Thy life for the love of me, blessed be thy Name, that thou permittest me to consummate My life for thee in thy service.

O my dearest Jesus, into thy hands I commend my spirit.

The several Circumstances of the Passion of our Lord accompanying my Death, by which he vouchsafes to grace me, a poor Sinner, and to refresh my memory, in relation to his blessed Merits.

1. To be judged by a public sentence.
2. To die the most ignominious of all deaths.

To the King's most Excellent Majesty. The Humble PETITION of RICHARD LANGHORN, a Prisoner condemned in the Gaol of Newgate.

Humbly sheweth ; That your majesty's petitioner, with all gratitude of heart and soul imaginable, humbly thanks your majesty for your mercy, in giving him life until Monday next.—That your petitioner is wholly ignorant of the substance of that letter mentioned in your majesty's order of council, of the 3d inst.

to have been written by the earl of Roscommon, as also of the grounds upon which it was written ; and therefore hopes that your majesty will not permit your petitioner's life to be taken away, before that be clearly understood.—That your petitioner having, in obedience to your majesty's particuler command, made a full, clear and sincere discovery of all those estates which your majesty commanded him to discover, humbly offers unto your majesty's merciful consideration, the protestation and declaration by your petitioner hereunto annexed ; by which he no way intends to reflect upon your majesty's justice, or the justice of the judges or jury by whom he was tried ; and humbly begs, that the same may not be interpreted to intend any such reflection. And that your majesty will please to consider, that it is not impossible for an innocent person to be condemned, since it is not many years past, that three persons were executed, and hanged in chains, being condemned for the murder of one, who appeared afterwards to be living ; and this without any just cause of reflection upon the justice of your majesty, or of their judges or jury.—That your petitioner humbly begs leave to hope, that when your majesty shall have considered his said Declaration, you will, out of the abundance of your natural inclinations to mercy, either vouchsafe to give him his pardon, so as to enable him to spend the remainder of his life, in the service of your majesty, and his country ; or at least, give him leave to live, though it be abroad, and in perpetual banishment, he having fully obeyed your majesty's commands, in discovering every thing within his knowledge, which hath been required to be by him discovered ; and the case of your petitioner being singular, as not having above any one witness to any one particular matter of fact given in evidence against him, as the judges can inform your majesty.

Your majesty's petitioner therefore humbly casts himself at your majesty's feet, humbly imploring your royal mercy ; and that you will be graciously pleased to give him his life, that he may spend it wholly in praying for your majesty's long and happy life, reign and government. And your petitioner, as in duty bound, shall daily pray for your most sacred majesty, &c.

R. LANGHORN.

The following, among other Articles concerning these People, were published at the Time :

THE main drift and scope of these so notorious malefactors speeches, was to wipe away the contamination of that guilt, which brought them all to be the public spectacles of condign punishment ; wherein they observe all the same method of appealing to Heaven, denying the doctrine and maxims of their order, and then praying for the king and themselves. All which oaths and protestations, had they been true, they might rather have been thought Apostates from their order, and detectors of the religion they so zealously professed upon the ladder, than valiant champions in the Romish militant church. Had they been such weak and pusillanimous combatants with death, as not strenuously to deny what they were so fairly convicted of ; they would have been deprived of those glorious crowns of martyrdom which were assured them by him, whom they call the only Lord of all the world, the only vice God, the only emperor, the only king, the most holy Pope. They thought it was much better to make but one skip from the cart to Jacob's ladder, and so to mount directly up to Heaven, than to be condemned with an ignominious load of truth, and penitent confessions of the facts they committed, to the whips and scourges of a tedious purgatory; else it would seem strange to the world, that in the midst of those solemn protestations which they made to that God, to whom their souls were taking such a speedy flight, as they pretended, should so boldly deny what so many grand seigniors of jesuitism have so stiffly maintained to all the world. Nor did this leash and brace of their disciples, shew themselves such mild receders from their principles, who durst so confidently adventure to beard the laws and statutes of a sovereign prince, within his own dominions; ipso facto; malefactors and rebels to his majesty, when they first set foot upon his shore.

As for their renouncing all equivocations and mental reservations, which is the ground upon which they all tread, that will signify nothing, when we consider the nature and quality of a true Jesuit, which is, tenaciously to hold and adhere to the dictates and positions of their superiors, as believing what they teach to be all inspiration. Now their heavenly doctrine is no more than this; that it is lawful for them, not only to deny and conceal the truth, but also piously and religiously to affirm, to swear by, and invoke God and their salvation to attest those things which they know to be assuredly untrue. Thus Toletus, both a Jesuit and Cardinal, l. 4, of his instructions to the priests, c. 21. If it be a secret crime concerning which any one is examined, he may make use of equivocation. As for example, if I be asked whether I did such a thing or no? I may answer, No: with this reservation to myself; I did not now do it.

Gregory de Valentia asserts the same: If the question, saith he, be not fit to be answered, though you be upon your oath, yet shall no perjury be committed, though the party swear contrary to the intent of the judge; such a one does neither lie, nor take the name of God in vain, when it is for his own preservation.

Andreas Eudemon Johannes is another of the same stamp.

Martin Azpilcueta, of Navarre, proves equivocation to be lawful, from the example of St. Francis, who being asked by certain officers, whether such a murderer did not run such a way? Put his hands into his sleeves, and cried, he did not pass this way: meaning, that he did not fly through his sleeves.

The fore-mentioned cardinal Toletus also affirms, That if a priest be asked by the magistrate, whether he saw such a one at any time? He may answer, No, for he did not see him that he should tell the magistrate; or he did not see him in a beatifical vision, or I did not see him at Venice, &c. Many more examples might be brought out of the same, and several other printed authors; neither are the equivocations of Tresham, Garnet, and others unknown to ourselves, as those of Richcome are in France, who affirmed, That he never heard the last deceased Henry, called tyrant by any of his subjects, though he had heard Henry Valois, the last murdered king often so reviled. So that it may be well said to be the Jesuits motto, Jura, perjura, secretum prodere noli.

Swear and forswear—

But the main secret to betray forbear.

Thus while they pretend to renounce and detest equivocation, mental reservations, and dispensations; reason itself must needs persuade us that men principled and educated by such instructors, are guarded with a good Salvo, for those very equivocations which they seemed to abjure.

No less, if not more apparent is the fallacy of their disowning and disavowing that dismal doctrine, of killing kings and princes.

To which purpose Gawen fell short in affirming, that only Mariana the Spaniard was the upholder of that dreadful opinion: witness the writings and approbations of Stapleton and Garnet; and the apology of Jacob Clements, in some part recited in the oration to the king of France, against the readmission of the Jesuits into that kingdom. Commolet and Guignardus, by whom that bloody act of Jacob Clements, who murdered Henry the 3rd of France, was called the gift of the Holy Ghost, as is averr'd in the forementioned oration to Henry the 4th. And who so wicked among us, saith the same oration, as not to see, that if Jacob Clements had not deeply drank of the Jesuits poison, he would ever have thought of killing his lord and master. The warlike prowess and renown of Henry the 4th, could not defend him from the treachery of a bejesuited enthusiast, who confessed that he had sucked all his king-killing malice from their diabolical oratory. And so far was Mariana from being the sole supporter of this doctrine, that Francis de Verone wrote in the defence of Chastell, who had stabbed Henry the 4th, and John Guret and John Hay were both banished out of France, for publicly teaching their disciples the vicious precepts of early treason.

Nor is there any thing more horrid among all the butcheries of the heathen sacrificers, than the ceremony, which the Jesuits use, at the consecration of the person and the dagger, which they design for a royal massacre. For the intended executioner is brought into a private room, where the dagger, carefully wrapt up in a fair linnen cloth, and sheathed in an ivory sheath enamel'd with several strange characters, with an Agnus Dei appendant, is at liberty to dazzle the murderer's eyes. Then the weapon being drawn, is sprinkled with holy water, adorned with a rosary of coral beads, and so delivered with these words. Chosen sou of God receive the sword of Jephtha, the sword of Sampson, the sword of David with which he cut off Goliath's head, &c. go and be prudently courageous. Then falling on their knees, they mumble forth this dismal exorcism; Cherubims and seraphims, ye thrones and powers, ye holy angels all descend, and fill this blessed vessel with perpetual glory; daily offer to him the crown of the blessed virgin Mary, the holy Patriarchs and Martyrs; For he is now your own, and no longer belongs to us. Then they bring him to the altar, and shewing him the picture of Jacob Clemeuts, Strengthen, O Lord, they cry, this thy arm the instrument of thy revenge. Let all the saints arise and give place to him. An invention of men worse than devils, enough to amaze heaven itself; which shews that the words of dying men are not always oracles, when they go about to palliate embodied villany. Nor was Mariana's book exploded, as Gawen says; but it is true that care was taken by the Jesuits to suppress both Mariana and others, for he was not alone, meerly out of necessity, and to divert the storm that threatened them from the court of France. And thus the world may see the folly of that vain compliment; That a whole order should suffer for the rashness of one man.

As little cause there is for us to believe, That the whole catholic world should be the Jesuits advocate. At least the whole catholic world has taken a very ill cause in hand, to defend an order that has so ill behaved itself as to be expelled out of France for murder; out of England for high treason; from Venice, almost in the sight of Rome itself, for their insufferable ambition, and designs of bloody revenge; out of Bohemia, for being common disturbers of the public peace; out of Moravia and Hungaria for the same cause; out of Transylvania, for being almost the ruin of that country; and out of the Low Countries for their continual misdemeanors; and lastly, this may be also added, that Ferdinand king of Sweden was expelled his kingdom, for endeavouring to obtain their readmission after they had been ejected by his subjects.

As for father Harcourt, let it not seem strange, for I find they were all alike in haste to reach heaven before sun-set, that he should pretend so much ignorance of the plot. For the reason is plain; he was resolved to visit St. Peter in the Jesuits livery, and to let them see he was true blue: while his own letter under his own hand, written into the country to give notice of sir Edmundsbury Godfrey's death, three hours after his murder; and publicly to be seen, puts a most cruel slur upon his late protested hatred of mental reservation and equivocation.

Now as for their prayers for their judges, and the discoverers of their treason, in my judgment they might have spared them. For why should they be so zealous to pray for them, when they would not so much as beg one tear from those that were not of their own profession? They were no prayers of charity, but rather the curses of their malice, while they laboured to scandal the justice of such most eminent judges, the impartiality of so sound a jury, and the fidelity of such witnesses, who having so highly merited of the whole nation, have rendered the sufferers more remarkable in their ends than in all the progress of their lives before.

AN ANSWER to the Reflections on the Five Jesuits Speeches; or, General Rules of Christian Charity. Together with the Speech of Henry IV. King of France in behalf of the Jesuits.

For purposes best known to the divine wisdom, God has been pleased to suffer amongst men, some who never had inclination to goodness, generosity, or any the least moral virtue: such true children of him who was a liar from the beginning, cannot endure any other man should be esteemed pious, just, or true; of such our blessed Saviour speaks Matt. 11. 18. These diabolical natures combat religion as their most mortal enemy, in what shape soever they meet it: if it appear in severe mortified devotion, then it is called by them madness, as of St. John Baptist, Behold a man that has a devil; if it comes drest in the charming shape of love and sociable conversation: then, as the blessed Jesus, beheld a drunkard and a wine bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners; such children of perdition, full of envy, malice and all ungodliness, are ever busy and taking more pains to serve the kingdom of darkness, and completing their full measure of wickedness, than the best of saints do to arrive at those blessed mansions prepared by their loving redeemer in the kingdom of the God of love: of this sort of spirit must be certainly be, who was author of the preamble and postscript printed with the Jesuits speeches: for were it likely that men should be so infatuated by the principles of any religion, as to die with expectation of reward from him they call the God of truth, when they invoked him with their last breath as witness to a lie, could it be possible, I say, that men should arrive at such madness. Yet ought poor limited and undiscerning men leave them to the judgment of the great, wise, just and all-seeing God to punish them as they deserve: but nothing is more certain than this truth, that the God of truth hates falsehood above all things; and therefore when provoked both by that, and the utmost contempt of his divine majesty, by being invoked to be a witness to a lie, he will above all crimes punish such contempts with his utmost vengeance: and is it possible, but that all men of all religions, who believe at all the immortality of the soul, should also believe this truth as certainly as they must believe there is a divinity, which gave their souls that immortality. Yet dares this uncharitable author, as if he were the great Searcher of Hearts, accuse five persons, pretending, as he says, to dignified orders of religion and sanctity, together with the perfections of noble learning, which usually betters men, to break through all the impalements of divinity and morality, and with a terrible lie to take their ultimate farewells, merely for the vanity of imposing a belief of martyrdom, and to insinuate their heresy into the credulous and unstable: Oh! most ridiculous conception, unlikely indeed to bear so great sway with the living as the last words would do of the most notorious malefactors, much less theirs who by a continued series of good life and modest behaviour had spent their time, (as they thought,) in their service of God, living some of them to a great age, without being accused of any crime against human society, until this the worst of crimes which was sworn against them, but that single one of designing the murder of God's Vicegerent their anointed king, if true, was enough to make black a continued life of virtue, longer than Methusalem; but they with their last breaths deny their guilt, and others upon the bible swear it, these are but four, and they were but five, those were persons who had dedicated themselves wholly to the service of God in the way they, at least, believed true; three of these are men by their own confessions guilty of many foul and notorious crimes, not yet giving the least testimony to the world of their conversions by a good life, all of them of indignant and desperate fortunes, which they have well amended by their pretended discoveries; which true or false, it concerns them as to their well being here to make good; the others can have no benefit by their attestation, (but if false) the eternal damnation of their souls; a bribe no man would be fond of. Now if this be seriously considered on both sides, will it not be enough to sway with the most partial standers by, at least to suspend his opinion of the truth until it shall be revealed either in this world or the next by the Almighty God, to whom they have on both sides appealed, and who alone sees truth through all disguises.

But not to suffer all the dirt to stick, the malicious pen of this author has thrown on their (at worst but doubtful) memories, we will slightly consider the strength of his arguments, avoiding all offences to the magistrate and the laws we live under, by whom supposing this (scarce probable) evidence against them true, they were most unjustly condemned.

His preamble and first paragraph of his Postscript, tends only to persuade us that these 5 dying men did hope by their damnable lyes to escape purgatory and leave it on their left hand and at once skip from the cart to Jacob's ladder mount directly up to heaven; which no man in his right wits can believe, except their accusers will swear they told them so, or that he would produce some authority from popish doctors, that should not only allow equivocation lawful but dying in a lye meritorious: for as for his calling them in the close of that paragraph ipso facto rebels and malefactors when they first arrived, that can be no proof against them, since the same argument holds against christianity itself propagated by the apostles and their followers contrary to the laws of nations then in force: and to which all persons pretending to make converts may readily reply in the words of the Apostle forbid by the Jews to preach any more in the name of Jesus, Whether it be better to obey God or man, judge ye.

I do not undertake to vindicate the religion these men died in, much less the opinions or extravagancies of some doctors of it, the laws forbidding the one; and the Romish Church itself the other; I will therefore only say it is no more just to tax the whole society with the herodox opinion of two or three men, than it would be to accuse Protestant Religion with king-killing principles, from the practices of some called so in the murder of K. Charles the first; and from the multitude of sermons and other discourses printed in commendation and vindication of that detestable villany: but because our author refers much to the oration made to Henry the fourth of France, I will only by way of reply, insert that great king's answer to it, mentioned by Mr. Gavau, which was in these words:

THE SPEECH OF HENRY IV. King of France in behalf of the Jesuits.

1. "The care you shew of me and my kingdom is grateful to me; albeit you seem not to have thoroughly weighed the things you demand, nor are you, as yet, so well acquainted with my thoughts, as I am with yours.

2. You deem the weal of my kingdom to consist in the proposition you have made; and you tell me it is a matter that deserves to be most carefully deliberated. And I tell you, you have said nothing which I have not most carefully weighed and most diligently examined by myself these eight or nine years.

3. You take yourselves for men of great understanding and experience in the common wealth. But believe me, I know as well as you all that hath been in controversy in this matter.

4. First of all you object to the Fathers of the society, the assembly of Poissy;* but without cause. For if there had been at that place others like many of them, the Catholic Cause would have had a more happy success. Therefore that which you turn to their dispraise, any just umpire will attribute to their virtue. But that which I most wonder at your judgments for, is, that so preposterously you condemn the society of ambition, whereas the Fathers of the society, with a constant submission, have ever refused all honour and preferment, as well ec-classical as political: and which is more, they bind themselves by vow not only not to aspire to honours, but even to refuse the same when they are freely offered unto them. Consider their whole course of life, and you shall find that all their ambition is to labour for to help all, and that without any pretence of interest or gain. They value not the expences of their own pains, so they may profit many.

* The Clergy held an assembly at Poissy anno 1561, in which the society was allowed of, and admitted, though not fully.

5. But you call to question the very name of the Society of Jesus, and for that you tax them. But see with what reason, for if they must be blamed for that holy name, what shall we say for those religious persons who take their name from the most blessed Trinity? and your daughters here at Paris; what will you think of them that call themselves Daughters of God? Finally how will you censure my knights, who are called of the Holy Ghost? Truly I do not more dislike them that take their name from Christ, than any other.

6. You object the divines of Sorbon condemned the Jesuits. I do not deny it. But they condemned them being innocent, unknown, and unheard. For this I call to witness, those very divines themselves, who now admit them, whom their predecessors banished, and honour them whom they contemned; nay they praise now and extoll those that were condemned, and stick not to take them for their directors, and masters, in all kind of learning.

7. You tell me Jesuits have hitherto remained in France only by connivance. Here I acknowledge, and reverence the divine providence, that hath reserved this honour for me, not yet achieved by others, that I should establish in this realm the Society of Jesus, which hitherto hath had no settled abode in France. My predecessors have received the society, I will patronize and preserve them.

8. Peradventure you will turn to the Jesuits discredit, that for which you ought to praise and honour them: the University of Paris earnestly and openly opposed them. And what, I pray, was the cause of this opposition? All was, that the Fathers did not only equal others in learning and industry, but also went far beyond them. A clear testimony of this is the great number of youths that frequented the Fathers Schools, where (together with learning) they learnt virtue. But to stop this opposition, I will make a decree that the universities of Paris shall no more oppose them. And this you will be glad of.

9. But you will tell me, that the ablest of your parliament got not their learning of the Jesuits, this I will not much gainsay. For the ablest of you, as they excel in learning so they exceed in years. These got their learning in foreign nations, before the society set foot in France. Others did not so, and so I am certain they think and speak otherwise. And what need they speak? the matter itself speaks. We ourselves saw how at the departure of the society out of France, all the muses seemed to depart. Our University was desert and mourned: those came seldom at it, who before in great numbers frequented the Fathers. Yea many departed the realm, and forsook their country to study in the Society's Schools; nor could your decrees or threats stop them.

10. You say the Fathers joined themselves to the League, that is not to be imputed to their fault, but to the iniquity of the times. But this I persuade myself, upon the assurance I have of the integrity of their consciences, that they will become such towards me, as it becometh them, who, mindful of benefits, desire to shew themselves most grateful.

11. Now some of you impose on the Fathers a new crime, and peradventure as yet unheard of, saying, that they draw to their order young men of the most forwardness and best dispositions. An unpardonable crime; yet I praise them and esteem them particularly for this that you condemn. Do not we, though in a different matter, do the selfsame? A captain that is to raise soldiers, does he not cull out the choicest, and leave the meanest and least hopeful? In your parliament, when you choose a new court, or fill up an old, do you prefer the unlearnedest, and least apt for business? If the Jesuits put unlearned masters in their schools, or in their churches ignorant preachers, would you not with reason blame them? What offence is it that the Jesuits should provide the fittest they can, both for church and schools.

12. That slander which concerns the Jesuits treasure, is as false as common. Go visit all the colleges in France, search all their treasures, sum altogether, and you will scarce find twelve, or at most 15,000 crowns. I know well how poor and slender furniture and provision was both at Lyons and Bourges. Nevertheless 30 or 40 persons were to be fed in each of those colleges; whereas their yearly revenues was scarcely sufficient for eight masters.

13. The vow of obedience with which they tie themselves to the pope doth not oblige them to be more faithful to externes, than to us. Neither is there in that vow any thing contrary to the oath which they will swear unto me. They will attempt nothing (I am sure) against their prince. That vow to the pope, bindeth them to go to barbarous and savage nations that they may reduce them to the Catholic church. The whole world testifieth that the remotest regions of the Indies, together with infinite heretics, have been by their pains and learned endeavours brought to Christ's fild. I remember I have often said, that if the labour of the Spanish Father be so profitable for Spain, why should not France with reason expect the same? Is that kingdom more fortunate and flourishing than this? Spain is loved by the Spaniards, and why should the French hate their native soil?

14. But as you are wont to say, those men seek to be admitted into provinces and kingdoms what way soever they can. Pray you is this an offence? It is the custom of all that follow the instinct of nature. I myself, by what means I could, sought to get my crown. Howsoever we cannot admire the Fathers constant patience whereby they go through so great and hard matters, and bear so many and so heavy crosses.

15. Neither do I esteem them the worse, for that they be so observant of their rules and constitutions. This is that whereby the society doth increase, flourish and better itself every day more and more. For this reason I thought not good to change any of their constitutions or rules, though I have made some change in others, which was not approved of all. But that is no matter.

16. The Fathers of the society hath many back friends, among some that seem holy and religious persons, who speak ill of them. This no wise man will wonder at. Our age is not come to that sanctity, that ignorance should cease to hate learning, or corruption of manners leave to envy integrity of life. It was so in times past, and so it is still. These moths always gnawing on learned works. No prosperity so circumspect, that can escape the tooth of malice, hatred and envy, always attended the highest things. I observed, when it was consulted about the recalling of the Jesuits into France, that two sorts of men did specially oppose themselves, heretics, and loose living church-men: the one was moved thereunto by their bad faith, the other by their bad life. But I am so far from being hereby moved to alter my intended purpose, that I am more confirmed in my resolution.

17. The Fathers of the society speak and think honourable of the pope, so they should, and so do I; I join with them, since I am certain that in averring and defending the pope's authority, they differ not from other Catholic divines.

18. Neither did their doctrine ever give occasion to clergymen to deny me tribute. Now is there any to be found whom these Fathers words or books animated to killing of kings. Whatsoever some have patched together to bring them to discredit, is all a fiction and mere fable. Thirty years and more are passed since the Fathers began to instruct the youth of France both in virtue and learning. Of these some have gone through with all their studies in their schools. Others have broke off, and applied themselves to physic or law. Tell me whether any of these ever learnt of their masters to lay hands upon kings, and to kill them? I tell you the Fathers are so clear, that they are content to appeal even to their enemies judgment. There are some pulpit-men, among the heretics, who were trained up in the Fathers schools: ask these men their judgment concerning the Jesuits lives and doctrine: but whose cause is so good as to desire to be tried by enemies? Yet I am sure in their case this has been done, the ministers have been asked their judgments of the Jesuits: and they have given no other answer, but, that the Jesuits lives cannot be reprehended, and for their doctrine, that it is in too clear a sun for to be questioned. Surely few can be found that will dare to stand to their enemies judgment, their security of conscience most needs be great, that fears not any adversaries verdict.

19. The confession of Barriere, who attempted against my person, doth not infringe that which I have said. For so far was any Jesuit from that fact (which you nevertheless affirm) that one of these Fathers of good credit advised me of it in time, and another of them deborted and deterred Barriere from his attempt, proposing to him God's heavy judgments due to such malefactors.

20. As for Catel, all imaginable torments were not able to wrest the least word against Varadius or any one Father of the society. If this be not so, why spared you the guilty? Why let you them go when you had them fast? Why punished you them not according to your laws and court?

21. But to grant you that that never was; suppose some one of the society had attempted against my person. Will you condemn all the apostles for one Judas? shall the punishment light on my head, for whatsoever any of the soldiers shall trespass in military license? I acknowledge the hand of God, whose will it was to have me pressed and bumbled at that time; the same hand raised me, and set me safe again. God's goodness and providence be thanked. I have learnt to forget and forgive injuries for God's sake, as I willingly do for that king who is greater than myself. And now I will be so far from remembering injuries done unto me, or revenging the same, that I will daily offer up prayers for my enemies. All of us have need of God's mercy, which is no ways better to be obtained, then by promptly and readily pardoning those who have offended us."

Now it is plain by this discourse, that this great and wise prince had well considered what he spoke of; and had he found their doctrine to be such as is pretended, he would have been too nearly concerned to have become their advocate and protector.

As for the pretended horrid ceremony for consecrating a person and dagger, designed for a royal massacre. I will only speak of it in the author's own words; that it is an invention of men worse than devils, a lie indeed of so impudent a nature, that it is enough to amaze heaven itself, to see how devils incarnate can out-do in unalike the spirits of everlasting darkness.

Let any impartial eye observe the countries our author sums up to banish the Jesuits; and besides that, he will find false causes assigned in most, if not all the examples; he does in his last overthrow all that he has said, for if Ferdinand king of Sweden was expelled his kingdom for endeavouring the re-admission of the Jesuits, then it is as plain that he did not believe they held tenets destructive to kings, as it is that these did who destroyed him, as much as in them lay by expelling him his kingdom for defending the Jesuits. Thus malice makes men blind: but above all, who can believe him, when he says Father Harcourt's letter about sir Edmondbury Godfrey's murder written three hours after it was done is so publicly to be seen, when any man that reads the trial may perceive it could not be produced; and if it were found since, and so public as he pretends, no doubt our author would have as well recited, as referred to it, for doing so would have been worth all he hath said.

As to their prayers for the judges and accusers, in my judgment they were more likely to proceed from charity than malice, let our good natured author be of another opinion if he pleases, but his reason for the contrary is none; for it is well known St. Stephen at his stoning did the same, and yet desired neither prayers nor tears of those that were not of his own profession; but it is true those prayers may become curses to the witnesses, if the deposition against them be as false, as it is evident some of what they have deposed to king and council hath been, as I could instance in the case of Don John, and divers other matters, if I were minded to disparage the king's witnesses, as they call them: but this I cannot forbear observing, that it may be justly said of some of them, as doctor Dun says of witches, that they confess things impossible. But leaving them to the great Judge of all things, I will only remind them of this truth, that if they betray innocent blood for gain, and make God's name contemptible, by invoking it to a falsehood; no equivocation, nor mental reservation, will shelter them from his dreadful vengeance which he in his due time will visit them with: and it is a thousand to one he will for terror to others and despair to themselves, make them the most miserable and contemptible wretches breathing in this world; but if they have sworn truth, let them give a lustre to it by amending their lives, that they and the nation they have saved by their discoveries may glory in one another, to the confusion and destruction not only of these, but all other its enemies.

But to conclude, I will desire but any reasonable man to consider the absurdity of their arguing, who pretend that not only these last five, but the eight others condemned by the same evidence, had dispensations to die with lies in their mouths: and that by the doctrine of equivocation and mental reservation, they and all other papists can say and swear any thing, when it is plain to all the world, that nothing but their fearing to swear falsely lays them liable to the laws against popery; can it be believed that men who forfeit peerage, offices of honour, trust, power and profit, lose two thirds of their estates, and make themselves more obnoxious to more severe laws than ever was in force against Christianity during the first ten persecutions, and all this because they will not swear against conscience, can have dispensations so convenient to their earthly well being, and make no use of them; nothing can be more contradictory to human reason than these calumnies, nor can any indifferent person chuse but see through such absurd contradictions. In fine there has thirteen men, of which one a Protestant, have died already by the accusation of these four witnesses, all have gone out of the world absolutely denying the matters they were accused of, any one of them might have secured a pardon by confessing his charge; they have been all of them of approved honest conversation in their several callings during the rest of their lives, and yet we must not believe one tittle of their last words spoke so plainly, (if false) to their destruction both here and hereafter; to their destruction, and not the least to their interest: yet on the contrary we are not so much as allowed to doubt the fidelity of their accusers, though men notorious for scandalous and wicked lives; men who from abject qualities assume to themselves by this means dignities, and pretend to honours and titles; and who from the extremest poverty and necessity are advanced to opulency and plenty for accusing persons of consoling with them about affairs of so high a nature as the alteration of kingdoms, and murdering the best of monarchs. Persons of such qualities and fortunes, as would with Job have disdained to set them with the dogs of their flock, who if they would have made use of such pitiful instruments, would certainly have taken care for their support, and not have seconded their imprudent election of such counsellors in matter of so great trust, with a second error of suffering them to want when they had trusted them, but would have provided for them as those we see do sufficiently, who now make use of their service; but though we may not call them perjured persons until convicted, which their protectors will easily prevent, by not permitting them to be indicted, yet nous can deny us the liberty of thinking that men will easily discern the difference between the dying and the living testimonies, let their pretences and lies be never so many; but to the God of truth we refer both causes, not doubting but in his good time all these secrets will be brought to light to his everlasting glory.

P. S. Since the former; there is come forth another paper, called 'An Answer to the Jesuits Speeches, by Esrael Tongue, D. D.' full fraught with labour and studied falsehoods, but so plainly malicious, that nobody who had not been a witness of the success of their ill spun improbable stories in their first pretended discoveries, could have had the least hope, these should have prevailed with one man, so contrary to the sentiments of human nature. No, we all too well know sophistry vanishes at the approach of infallible death, and that Dr. Tongue, and the more hardened impostor his companion in title and design, will find at the approach of that grim usher to their eternal abodes, no resolution but a good conscience can make them follow him smiling, this truth writ with an indelible character in every breast will save us a labour to answer his frivolous anatomizing those mens last words, delivered so cheerfully and heartily at their execution; only we may safely make reflection on the last paragraph of his impious and uncharitable paper, where he says, It is no more than they.

expected, a truth undeniable as to him and his companions, who cannot but be conscious to themselves whether the evidence given against them be true or false, and from that might well expect their denial, which no man else that believed them guilty did or could: But it is in vain to warn thinking people from making natural reflections on these mens dying words, until it be proved that they made it their practice to violate all laws human and divine, by better evidence than such as have been notoriously guilty of doing so, by a continued series of cheating, stealing, robberies, perjury and buggery, and all other unnatural crimes and uncleannesses sufficiently known, and above denial public to the whole world; but what truth can be expected from a low spirited wretch, who for a little money (of which he complains he has been couzened too) can be contented to debase his character of divise to be the zany or deputy devil to such mountebanks.

Annimadversions on the last Speeches of the five Jesuits, viz.

THOMAS WHITE alias WHITEBREAD, Provincial of the Jesuits in England; WILLIAM HARCOURT, Pretended Rector of London; JOHN FENWICK, Procurator for the Jesuits in England; JOHN GAVAN alias GAWEN, and ANTHONY TURNER; who were all executed at Tyburn for High Treason in conspiring the Death of the King, &c, June 20, 1679.

PROTESTANTS, who make conscience of their words, and count it a horrid crime to speak otherwise than they think when they are dying, may be ready to take the measures of others by themselves, and to judge those guiltless, who, when they are dying, assert their innocence with the highest asseverations. But they will see reason to judge otherwise, if they take notice how full and clear the evidence is by which these Jesuits were cast, and withal understand the principles of the persons executed, and their associates, which they were greatly concerned to put in practice, are such as destroy all confidence in their words living and dying. For by the common doctrine taught and received amongst them, they are furnished with expedients whereby they may deny what is most true, and affirm what is most false; and that with most solemn oaths or dreadful imprecations, and yet neither lie, nor be forsworn, nor any way sin in the least degree; and so may without any scruple endeavour to deceive others by the use of such falseness, as at other times, so even when they are dying. Their principal artifice, to waver others, is that which they call mental equivocation, not on account of the ambiguousness in the words, though they may make their advantage of this also; but because of a double sense in some proportion, partly expressed, and partly reserved in their minds; so that it is true in their own sense, but false in the sense of all that hear it. The use of it is allowed by all sorts of Papists, and particularly the Jesuits; it is much endeared to them, and more familiarly used by them than any other fraudulent arts, because the fraud herein is both more easy, and undiscernable, and innocent in their account, and the advantage of it admirable; there being nothing so false but it may be made true, nothing so true but it may be made false by this art. And therefore it is no wonder if they decline it not at trials in courts of judicature, no nor when they are dying and approaching the dreadful tribunal of the Judge of Heaven and Earth, though truth and sincerity be then, if ever, necessary. They have the confidence to plead the examples of God, of Christ, of the ancient saints recorded in scripture, in justification of it. But our Jesuits have more pertinent instances, those of the same principles, and in the like circumstances, to encourage them with oaths and asseverations to assert what could not be true, or deny what is not false, but by this device.

F. Garnet, predecessor of F. Whitebread both in his office and practices, being principal of the Jesuits, and chief promoter of the Powder plot,^(a) when after secret conference between him and Hall, another Jesuit in the Tower, he was asked before the Lords Commissioners, whether Hall and he had any conference together, and was desired not to equivocate; he swearing upon his salvation, reiterating it with so many horrid imprecations as wounded their hearts to bear, he denied again and again that he had any discourse; yet afterwards when he knew that the thing was known, and that Hall had confessed it, he cried the Lords' mercy, and said he had offended if equivocation did not help him.^(b) Another time being asked whether he did not swear upon the holy evangelists, that he had neither writ nor sent to the Jesuit Tesmond, which he knew to be false? He answered, That he swore so lawfully enough, not knowing then that his letters were intercepted, and thinking they could not have disproved him.

(b) Ibid. p. 300. Gunpowder-Treason, p. 194.

Tresham, (c) one of the chief undertakers in the Powder Plot, upon the examination did confess that F. Garnet was privy to the treason; but afterwards by the importunities of his wife, three or four hours before his death, he protested and took it upon his salvation, setting it down under his hand, That his former confession was false, and that he had not seen Garnet in sixteen years before, at the least; and so he died. His protestation and oath were not long after proved to be untrue; yea, and Garnet himself confessed that within that space he had seen him many times. Whereupon being demanded what he thought of Tresham's dying oath and protestation? He answered, It might be he meant to equivocate.

Hereupon Garnet thus resolves the case about the lawfulness of equivocating at point of death, as it was found in his papers communicated to Casaubon by king James: "If any one," says he, "shall enquire whether it be lawful to imitate Tresham's equivocating in the very article of death, upon some necessity, as to free a friend from danger? It is truly lawful," says he, "and we may prove it by an argument drawn from confessions; and since it is lawful for any one to use this in the course of his life, why may it not be used also by a dying man?" Casaubon, ibid. p. 202.

Hereby we see that these were their practices of old, and justified by their teachers as lawful even at the hour of death; therefore we should not be surprised, if we find our Jesuits use these arts in their last speeches; this is not new to them, nor unwarrantable either at public trials or executions.

But their principles are further considerable, of which take an account in some severals.

First, by their doctrine they may lawfully say what is false, making use of a mental reservation, by virtue of which that which is false in itself, will be true in their reserved sense; and therefore though it be gross untruth, as expressed, and they know it to be so, and use it with an intent to deceive others, yet they count it so lie, and therefore no sin, and so they need not fear to use it when they are passing out of the world. That it is no lie, they generally maintain. "If a man," saith P. raons, "use mental reservation, he doth not offend against the negative precept which forbiddeth to lie. It is freed from the nature of a lie, by the due and just reservation in the speaker's mind (d)," says he. "By understanding something in our minds," saith Navarr, "we may make that true which we affirm, though it be false; and that false which we deny, though it be true (e)." And Sanchez the Jesuit more fully: "If a man do swear that he did not do something which indeed he did do, understanding within himself some other thing else which he did not do, some other days than that wherein he did it, or any other addition that is true, this man does not indeed either lie or forswear (f);" producing many authors for it, and referring to divers others (g).

It seems mysterious, that the same thing should be both true and false; that he should speak what is false in itself, and in his own judgment, and that which tends to deceive others, and yet not lie. But they would clear it thus; A proposition formed in this case has two parts, one expressed and the other concealed; that which is expressed is false, but the part concealed being added to it, the entire proposition is true, e. g. F. W. did not design to kill the king, this is false; but adding some secret reserve, viz. king Harry, or king Charles before he was born, or in Scotland, and the whole is true. And by this device our Jesuits, though they as fully designed to kill Charles the 2nd, as ever Ravillac did Harry the 4th; yet they may deny it with all asseverations, and yet not lie at all (as they believe by virtue of this device): they may assert their innocence in terms which are false in the sense of all the world, yet by such a reserve all will be true in their own sense; and so in averring that which is most false, they persuade themselves they do no more lie, they do no more sin, than the child unborn.

And here let the world judge what regard is due to the words of those, though they be the words of dying men, whose doctrine assures the most guilty persons in the world, that if they persist in a false defence of their innocency, even unto death, yet by this method they teach them, it will be no lie, it will be no sin at all.

This may be enough to satisfy us concerning the common expressions wherein they all agree to disclaim all guilt. But there is something singular in F. Gavan's speech, which requires a particular consideration, and yet it may be grounded on the common principle. I cannot imagine how that which he protests with the last words of a dying man to vindicate his Society (for which I wish he were not more solicitous than for his soul) can be true without some fraudulent reserve, since it is very false in itself, that the Jesuits allow not the doctrine of king-killing, but detest and abhor it, or that none of them hold it lawful for a private person to kill a king, but only Marians. I suppose the principles of the Jesuit Sanctarellus are little more favourable to kings than those of Mariana, his book on that account being condemned and burnt by the parliament at Paris; yet it was printed at Rome, and approved by Mutius Vitelliscus, the general of the Jesuits. And when the chief of that order in France were examined, whether they did believe as their general did at Rome? or would do so if they were at Rome? It was answered by F. Cotten in the name of the rest, That they would change their judgments with the country, and would believe as they did at Rome, when there, though he ridiculously denied that they did believe so while they were in France.

However Mariana had many of the Jesuits who expressly owned his doctrine; Ribadeneira, Scribanus, under the name of Bonarscius, Becanus, Gretserus, do partly praise him, and partly defend his opinion. Another patron of the Jesuits says plainly in an English treatise, That they are enemies of that holy name of Jesus, that condemned Mariana for any such doctrine. And his book having been before printed at Toledo with the approbation of the superiors of the Society, there was a new edition of it at Mentz by the procurement of the Jesuits there. It is much if J. G. could make all these to be but one Mariana. And wherein does Emanuel Sa(g) come short of Mariana in that particular wherein the Jesuit would clear the Society? Or Becanus in his English controversies? Or Suarez? a Jesuit of such reputation, that his judgment alone is valued more than a thousand other authors, who expresses himself thus:

“When a king is deposed, then he is neither lawful king nor prince; and if therefore he endeavour to keep the kingdom under him by strength, then he is an usurper, no lawful king, having no true title to the crown; for that (A) after the decree of deposition, he is altogether deprived of his kingdom, so that he cannot with a just title possess, and so may be used as a tyrant or usurper, and by consequence may be slain by any private man.”

Here we have multitudes of Jesuits in one, allowing the killing of kings by any private man: for not only divers bishops, but the provincial Jesuits of Portugal and Germany, testify their approbation of his judgment; and a whole university declares, “That there is nothing in it but ought to be approved, every thing being according to their own opinion and judgment (i).” Add but one F. Campian, who may be instead of all. He declares, “That all the Jesuits spread far and wide through the whole world, have entered into a league to make away all heretical kings in any manner whatsoever: nor will they despair of effecting it, so long as any one Jesuit remains in the world (k).”

There is no room to alledge particular doctors, which might easily be multiplied. That which we charge the Jesuits with, in reference to the murdering of kings, may be reduced to two heads:

1. That the pope has power to depose kings for heresy especially.
2. That being deposed, any one may kill them, at least by the pope's order.

The former is the doctrine of their church, and not of particular doctors only; being established not only by the opinion of all sorts of their authors, but by the determination of popes, and the decrees of general councils; so that hence the famous Jesuit Lessius declares, that if the pope had not this power of deposing kings, the church which has taught it must of necessity err: and to hold that is heretical, and a more intolerable error, than any about the sacrament can be. And a greater than he, Cardinal Perrop, (in his Diverses Oeures, and Recueil General des Affaires du Clerge de France) declares it as the sense of the whole clergy of France (who of all the Romanists are accounted least favourable to the papal power), that all who maintain the contrary, are heretics and schismatics. (l)

For the latter, we have the declared sense of the whole body of the Jesuits in France (than whom, none of the society in any part of the world, were more favourable to kings) in an Apology for their doctrine on this subject, to Harry the 4th; yet there they declare in the words of Valentin, consonant to the doctrine of Aquinas, Cajetan, Sotus, Coveravius, Salonius, and others, That a Tyrant who has no just title, but usurps authority, may be killed by any one. (m) Now there is none of them who have the use of reason, will deny, but a king deposed by the pope, is such a tyrant, a mere usurper, without any just title; and therefore the Jesuits cannot deny, but it is their doctrine, that a king deposed by the pope, may be killed by any one.

Or if all the Jesuits in France will make no more than one Mariana, let us see if the Jesuits of other nations may possibly do it. Bomenicina tells us, that Valentia, Suarez, Lessius, Molina, Filliucius, concur with him and many others, in this assertion: Licetum est homini privato, occidere tyrannum qui absque ullo titulo usurpat, &c. It is lawful for a private man to kill such a tyrant as has no title, tom. 2. de Fastit. Disp. 2. q. 8, punct. 3. n. 2, et 3.

The premises considered, if F. G. understood them, either he intended to deceive the people with a downright lye, or with a gross untruth under the covert of a secret reservation; both are alike heinous to us, and this latter worse, because there is less fence against it: but in charity I incline to think he used the latter, because in such cases they count it sinless and innocent, and not to be declined at the point of death.

And two reserves he might make use of, one in reference to the word king; Jesuits are not for king-killing doctrine: for they will have kings first deposed by the pope, or by heresy, and then they are no kings, and so they may be killed by any men, and yet no king may be killed by any private person. All the kings of England, Sweden, Denmark, &c. may be killed one after another, by the Jesuits doctrine, and yet by that doctrine no king at all will be killed. Or he might use another reserve with respect to the words 'private persons,' understanding reservedly, persons that have no authority from the pope, or any under him. And this fraudulent reserve, F. Parsons might help him to who to avoid the charge, that they held a king condemned or deposed, may be killed by a private person; he denies that a private man as a private man, i. e. by private authority, can kill any prince. (n) And in this sense neither Grove, nor Patrick, nor any other who undertook this horrid murder can be counted private persons: for they did not undertake it by their own authority. And the meanest and most private persons in these three kingdoms, or any other nations, may assassinate the king, by the Jesuits doctrine, if they have the pope's authority for it, immediately or mediately: and yet by no means must the doctrine of the Jesuits be charged as allowing that private persons may kill kings; and the reason is, because the pope's executioners are no more private persons than the common hang-man (as the Jesuit gravely explains it) though he use but his ax once.

What he adds concerning Harry the fourth was sufficiently confuted by Chastell, first, and after by Ravillac, by the most effectual arguments that the society ever used. But my design is to shew the fraud, not the weakness of his discourse. Let the reader judge how true that is which he swears concerning his innocency, by the truth of what he protests concerning the Jesuits doctrine. Both require equal regard, both being the asseverations of a dying man; yet both might be true in his account by this artifice, how false soever in themselves, and so might innocently be asserted by a dying man.

As for their prayers for the king, I do not well understand them; they would have it thought, that they had no design to kill the king who can pray for his prosperous reign. But do they think that his majesty can truly prosper till he turn Roman Catholic? This they heartily wish, no doubt; whether they can pray, or no, I know not.

However, it need not seem strange if they should equivocate in their way of praying, since they allow of plain lyes in their public liturgies, which divers of their own authors express themselves sensible of. F. Garnet having composed some prayers for the good success of the Powder-Plot, and using them amongst his party, when he was charged with it, made use of such a plea as became such a Jesuit; he said that he made not those prayers with that meaning that the thing might fall out according to the mind of the conspirators, but rather cross to their desires, that so the safety of king and kingdom might be provided for: So that when he prayed for the ruin of king and kingdom, yet his meaning was, that they might be preserved and prosper: And so when our Jesuits pray for the king's prosperous reign, why may not their meaning be his utter destruction? for this is altogether as likely as the other. But there is no penetrating a Jesuit's meaning any where, no not in his prayers; for whatever the words thereof seem to be, the meaning may be quite contrary. So it was in F. Garnet's time, and the world is not much mended with the society since.

The forces of Charles the 5th. having taken the Pope prisoner, the Emperor orders that public prayers should be made for his holiness release. The world thought that he might have saved his prayers, and given him liberty, instead of begging it. To be sure, his majesty might well enough spare the Jesuits prayers, if they would forbear their plotting against him. But to proceed,

Secondly, They maintain, that when they may lawfully speak what is false, they may lawfully swear it; it is the common doctrine of the Romanists. F. Parsons assures us, "That all divines hold, that what may lawfully be said, may also be lawfully sworn." (o) And again says he, "It being a most certain principle, as well in reason as in divinity, that what a man may (by virtue of mental reservation) truly say, he may truly also swear." (p) So Lea(n) Sober reckoning cap. 5. num. 44. p. 322. vid. Suarez ubi supra, 12.

sus, "As oft as it is lawful to equivocate, it is lawful to use an oath, if it be needful, and some notable cause require it." (q) We heard Tho. Sanchez before, with the concurrence of many other authors, determining, That he who swears he did not do something which indeed he has done; yet by the help of some mental reservation, he neither lyes, nor is forsworn. (r) Add but Jo. Sauctius, who will make it needless to add any more; "That cause which does excuse a lye by a reserved equivocation, is sufficient also to excuse an oath." (s) And for this he allegeth many authorities. (t)

F. Garnet being one day by his judges convicted of many lies, when he was brought back to the Tower, there again he was examined whether he did not repent of this infamous art, and did seriously believe it lawful? Or only used it for that time, necessity pressing him? He instead of an answer, as his manner was, writ what follows with his own hand, and delivered it to the examiners: "This I acknowledge to be according to my opinion, and the opinion of all the schoolmen; and our reason is, for that in cases of lawful equivocation, the speech by equivocation being saved from a lye, the same speech may be without perjury confirmed by an oath, or by any other way, though it were by receiving the Sacrament." And subscribed it, "Harry Garnet." And Casaubon transcribed it out of the Jesuits own manuscript. Casaub. Epist. ad Front. Duc. p. 202.

This is their doctrine; where-by it appears, that if a person be accused or condemned for a design to murder his prince, though he designed it as much as any assassinate ever did, yet he may not only deny it, and yet not lye by virtue of a mental equivocation; but though he be as guilty, and his own conscience tells him he is as guilty, as any person that ever was condemned in the world; yet he may assert his innocency with oaths; and notwithstanding by this art, he may free himself from all guilt of perjury, and all other sin. As they will have him not to lye, though he assert that which is false; so they will not have him forsworn, though he swear that which is false, in the sense of all that hear him: And this quite destroys their credit, as to all their asseverations and oaths, how many and horrid soever they be, when they think themselves concerned to equivocate.

They would have it observed how confident they are in swearing themselves guiltless.

"I am not now upon terms to speak other than truth, and therefore in his most holy presence, and as I hope for mercy from his divine majesty, I do declare to you here present, and to the whole world, that I go out of the world as innocent, and as free from any guilt of these things laid to my charge in this matter, as I came into the world from my mother's womb." So Thomas Whitebread.

"I do here declare in the presence of Almighty God, and the whole court of heaven and this numerous assembly, that as I ever hope (by the merits and passion of my sweet Saviour) for eternal bliss. I am as innocent as the child unborn of any thing laid to my charge, and for which I am here to die." So William Harcourt.

"I do solemnly swear, protest, and vow by all that is sacred in heaven, and on earth, as I hope to see the face of God in glory, that I am as innocent as the child unborn of those treasonable crimes which Mr. O. and Mr. B. charge me withal." So Jo. Gavan.

"I call God to witness, that I was never in my whole life at any consult where any proposal was made, or resolve taken, or signed for taking away the life of our dread sovereign. [I am as free from the treason I am accused of, as the child unborn] I vow to God as I hope for salvation, &c." So Anthony Turner.

"I do declare before God and the whole world, and call God to witness, that what I say is true, that I am as innocent of what is laid to my charge of plotting the king's death, as the child unborn. [As I hope for mercy at the hands of God, before whom I must shortly appear, and give an account of all my actions] I do again declare, that what I have said is most true." So John Fenwick.

These are modest oaths; they might have advanced many strains higher, and outdone F. Garnet, who swore in such a tone, as well nigh made his judges tremble; and they might have repeated the most horrid oaths a hundred times for confirmation of what they know to be most false; yet by this artifice they might have done this without either lie or perjury, and with no less innocence "than the child in the mother's womb." Seriously such words in circumstances, would have been very significant from men whose principles allow of nothing but truth and sincerity; but from those whose doctrine bids defiance to both, they signify little, besides a warning to take heed lest we be deluded.

They that believe they may speak what is false in the sense of all that hear them, without either lie, or sin great or small; and also, that when they may speak what is false lawfully, they may as lawfully swear it, what credit can be given to their oaths, more than to their words? And what regard can be due to the words of those who declare it lawful to speak one thing and think another? and no less lawful when they are dying, than at any other time? Those that would be believed against such evidence as convicted these men, had need be persons of more than ordinary credit: But men of their principles are quite broke as to this, their credit is utterly blasted by their doctrine. They that count it lawful to deceive us, will do it when they are concerned. And they declare it as lawful to deceive us by equivocating at the point of death, as any time else; and as lawful to delude us with solemn oaths, as any other words; and have thereby taught us, that if we will not be deceived, we must not, as the case stands, believe a Jesuit, whether he says or swears, no not when he is dying.

I know not what use knights of the post may make of their doctrine; it is so very favourable to their practice, and assures it of so much secrecy and innocency, as no other doctrine in the world besides; and so may be a shrewd temptation to them to turn Roman catholics. If they can but secure their ears, their consciences by this popish device may be safe enough: for they may swear that which is false when occasion serves, and yet persuade themselves they swear nothing but what is true; and so after perjuries continued for many years, they may be "as innocent as when they were born."

Hereby it appears that the witnesses from St. Omers had no very hard task imposed upon them by their superiors: For if they had given their testimony upon oath, as they were very ready to do; and if what they testified were false, and they knew it to be so, yet by this artifice they had testified nothing but what was true; and so though they were false witnesses, yet no less innocent for all that, than any infants. Though it was as certain and evident that Mr. O. was at a consult at London, as that these gentlemen were in court at the trial; yet by this device, they might truly and innocently say and swear, that he was at the same time at St. Omers. Such is the virtue of this admirable art, that it makes that which is lying and perjury, both in itself, and in the sense of all the world besides, to be a most innocent and sinless thing, and no worse than a very true testimony. But suppose these innocent children (as J. F. calls them) were not capable of this subtilty, yet they might have come off like innocence another way, and yet have done the business which their superiors enjoined them; for they came only to secure these Jesuits, and other persons of quality, by their testimony; and if they should have given a false testimony on their behalf, there had been no great harm, since a false testimony for another is no crime but only that which is false and against him too, which is plain by the words of the commandment, Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour; it is no prohibition to bear false witness for him, as is gravely observed by one of the most eminent divines in the council of Trent, and confessor to Charles the fifth, who on this account will have "a false testimony excused when it is to hinder one from doing of injury." And another of their greater divines (u) "will not have him condemned, who to defend himself, makes use of witnesses, offering themselves freely to testify for him by false oaths." (w)

And for their further encouragement, their doctors determine, that in way of defence, and to weaken the credit of such as accuse them, they may without mortal guilt charge them with false crimes: (x) So Bannez, "It is only a venial fault to charge a false crime upon a witness unduly accusing us, when such a charge may serve to refute his testimony (y)."

To the same purpose Ledesma, Orella, besides many more in Diana, who says, "This opinion is probable enough (z)," (and that which is probable, is by their principles, lawful in practice, though it has no probability, but what the opinion of some grave doctors can give it). And Caramuell tells us, there are more than twenty doctors who assert, that "he who claps a false testimony upon any in his own defence, sins not mortally (a)."

We need not wonder therefore, that such endeavours have been used to procure false testimonies, and forge odious crimes to discredit the king's witnesses; nor to hear T. W. and J. G. charge them with false oaths and false accusations, when they knew that they were true; for if it be but a venial fault to do this, to secure the reputation of a particular person; it will be scarcely accounted any fault at all, when the honour of whole societies and religious orders, and of the Popish religion itself, is so much concerned, and stands in so great need of such a vindication.

But the argument whereby they would justify this doctrine is more remarkable; "Why will this be a sin," says my author, "if it be lawful in defence of one's reputation to kill another (b);" which is maintained by Sotus,

(u) "Testimonium falsum in favorem proximi non est mortale, neque adeo quando dicitur ut idem impediatur injuriam facere, quoniam neque hoc est contra ipsum." Præceptum Exod. 20. Bannez, Salonus, Arragon and others, with whom Diana concurs, affirming it to be their common doctrine. Amicus (c) the Jesuit thus delivers it :

“ It will be lawful for a clergyman or a religious person, to kill him who threatens to charge him or his religion with great crimes, when there is no other way of defence, as there seems to be none, if the accuser be ready to declare those crimes to great persons, unless he be killed.”

He that observes this, will not wonder if they did not scruple to murder sir E. Godfrey, or that some priests were so forward to be his executioners; nay, it threatens those who are no way so dangerous to them and their religion, as his discovery was like to prove, if they had not prevented it by this their sinless expedient, a most barbarous murder. However, Guimenius (d) produces very many doctors in justification of it; and Caramuel defends it as not only the doctrine of Amicus, but of Peter Navarr, Sairus, Gordonius, Sancius, &c. and as a consequence of it, resolves another case thus: If a religious man, yielding to the frailty of the flesh, do lie with a mean woman, who counting it an honour to have prostituted herself to so great a person, does divulge it, and so disparage him, he may on this account kill her (e).

So that no sorts of persons must escape with life, who have not a great regard of their honour, who both by their principles and practices, are the greatest dishonour to the Christian name, of any, that ever pretended to it.

But to proceed, M. Serra concurring with Bannez, two doctors of great reputation amongst them, having declared it “ lawful to kill him who goes to the judges to exhibit a false testimony,” &c. a little after determines, “ That the same will be lawful if one go to accuse one of a true, but secret crime, when by such accusation there is certain danger of death or disgrace.” But he adds, “ This is not to be publicly preached, because of the rudeness of the vulgar, as Soto advises; but after the fact, it may serve to quiet their consciences (f),” who have killed others upon such occasion; i. e. it may be made use of to keep them from repenting of their murders, persuading them that they are not sins to be repented of; they are lawful acts in the sense of the Roman doctors, or it may be meritorious, if they be heretics that are slain, and so they may be encouraged to repeat them as often as they see occasion. So that by their doctrine it is no sin to kill all the witnesses that bring in any evidence concerning this horrid plot, though their testimony should but endanger the life or reputation of one particular person; what murders will they not then think lawful to secure so many of all ranks and qualities as are engaged in this hellish conspiracy? The providence of God is to be adored and admired, and to this it must be ascribed, that the king's witnesses are not all murdered; conscience doth not, cannot restrain them from attempting it: for their principles have left them no conscience at all, as to these and many other horrid things; but their ill success in the murder of sir E. Godfrey may be some discouragement, God in mercy so over-ruling it, that what they made account would quite stifle all discovery of the plot, is become a most clear and pregnant evidence of it, as my Lord Chief Justice Scroggs (to whom the nation and the Protestant religion will owe honour while they have a being) well observes. But that others may not think their lives secure, who never appear against them as public witnesses, they teach, that private aspersions are counted a sufficient ground to murder men, though they be Papists (for Protestants may be lawfully murdered without the least shadow of a crime, but their religion). “ He who by whispers and detraction does endeavour to wrong or to blemish any one, if the infamy and disgrace cannot otherwise be avoided, it will be lawful to kill him,” so Peter Navarr (g); to the same effect Gaspar Hurtado declares it “ lawful to kill him, who by detraction may much endamage us, unless he be slain (h);” and Bannez adds, “ That this is true, although the defect which the detractor makes known be true, if it be secret, because then the discovery of such a defect is a great injury (i).” And therefore F. W. might well send instructions for the murdering several divines who had detected the errors of their doctrine, to the disparagement of their church; why might not he proceed in this way of vindication, when they count it not only lawful, but very compendious and most effectual? However hereby we may see, that their emissaries from St. Omers (who have led us a little out of the path, though not out of the way) have done but little of what they might have done lawfully, if their instructions had led them to it; though in truth they need no other instructions, not only to make swearing, but other feats lawful, than the common writings of their doctors. Let us now again come closer to our Jesuits.

Thirdly, they may use such mental reserves or equivocations, when they are urged by others not to use any, or when themselves profess and swear, that they use none. "So often as good cause occurs for which we may use ambiguous words or mental restrictions, the use of it is lawful, although he that interrogates do urge, that you will speak without ambiguity or restriction (k)," so Peter St. Joseph. "When one interrogates unreasonably by excluding equivocation, he that is interrogated may use equivocation, by adding some particle in his mind, by which the oath may be made true (l)," so Bonacina and others in him. "As often as it is lawful in his own defence to use any equivocations, it will be also lawful, though he that interrogates do urge that equivocation be excluded," so Sanchez (m), alleging for it Sotus and Arragon; and a little after he adds, "The same I affirm for the same reason, how much soever the judge urges who interrogates unreasonably, so far as to make the examinant swear, that he doth not make use of equivocations, and that he intends that which he saith without any equivocation. For he may also swear, understanding secretly that he doth it, as far as he is obliged to speak clearly, and expound himself, or by forming some other thought, which may make his answer true." F. Parsons speaks fully in his treatise of Equivocations, approved by Garnet provincial of the Jesuits and Blackwell the arch-priest * "If your incompetent judge shall further ask, whether you do not equivocate, you may answer no, but with another equivocation; if again suspecting you, he urges, whether this third time you do not equivocate, then the third time also say no, but with another secret equivocation, and so as often as he shall ask the like, likewise by equivocating say you do not equivocate." To this purpose his words are represented by (n) divers, and particularly by Dr. Bernes a Benedictine, who says, That by Parsons doctrine; "way being once given to equivocating, you may without end in infinitum equivocate by speaking false, and swearing false.(o)" But hear this great doctor once more with the approbation of the greatest popish divines then in England: "For further direction of the party examined, let him admit the oath with a secret intention of equivocation, and if he be more urged to swear without equivocating, let him swear that also, (viz. that he doth not equivocate) but with the aforesaid intention of equivocation."(p) The Jesuits in their speeches seem very much concerned, that they may be believed; but being conscious, that their doctrine of equivocation has justly bereaved them of all credit with those that are acquainted with it, they thought it necessary here to disclaim it with oaths and protestations; and so to give as much assurance, as those whose credit is so desperately cracked, can give, that they used no equivocation; Two of the five expressly swear it; "And I do moreover declare, that this is the true and plain sense of my soul in the sight of him who knows the secret of my heart, and as I hope to see his blessed face, without any equivocation, or mental reservation;" so T. W. "And that you may be assured, that what I say is true, I do in the like manner protest and swear, as I hope to see the face of God in glory, that I do not, in what I say unto you, make use of any equivocation or mental reservation," so J. G. They affirm, that they did never design nor contrive the death of his majesty, and I am confident it was as much their design to gain credit herein, as ever any thing was since they were designers; and therefore they swear it too; ay, but they know that the world understands by their common doctrine, that they judge it lawful to equivocate in solemn oaths, and if they do equivocate, in what terms soever their oaths be delivered, they swear quite another thing than their words and expressions do import, or those that heard them do understand, and so if we believe them, we are merely cheated; for what they speak, is not that they swear, though those that hear them take it to be so; but it is that which is spoken, together with something secret in the mind, added to it undiscernibly, whereby it becomes vastly different from what is expressed, or contrary to it; so that when we judging only by their words, do think, that they swear they had no intent to kill the king, that which they swear in their own sense may be their intention to kill him: So that there can no credit be given to their words or oaths, unless they can secure us that they do not equivocate. To secure us of this, they swear they do not equivocate; ay, but their writings, and those particularly which were calculated for them in such circumstances, assure us, that by their doctrine they may lawfully equivocate when they swear that they do not so; and that they may use equivocation when they are swearing against it; and that how often soever a man swears, he will use no equivocation; yet so often he may lawfully equivocate in swearing it. Thus their doctrine plainly bids us despair that we can ever be secured from their equivocating, and so long as we cannot be herein secured, we can have no ground to believe either their words or oaths; and if we will believe without ground, especially when we have just cause to think they have a design upon us, as unquestionably they had in those speeches, we shall in plain English shew ourselves no better than fools, and such as herein neither exercise true charity nor common reason.

Fourthly, By their doctrine they may lawfully use such mental reserve or equivocation, which in their account makes their speaking or swearing falsely to be innocent, either without any reasonable cause, or upon a slender occasion, much more when they apprehend weighty reason for it. Filliucius (g) enquires, "What sin it is to make use of equivocation without any reasonable cause?" And concludes that in rigour it is no lye, nor any perjury. F. Garnett when prisoner in the Tower, being required to declare his Judgment concerning this point, gave it in writing, and it is yet kept upon record; "Concerning equivocation, this is my opinion—(r) As often as there is occasion for necessary defence, or for avoiding some injury or damage, or obtaining some good, without the peril of any man, then equivocation is lawful." A man, says Diana, (s) may swear what is simply false, adding something in his mind to make it true, as often as there is just cause; now a just cause may be necessity, or profit, in respect of body, honour, or estate. "There is just cause," says Sanchez, (t) "for using equivocation, whenever it is necessary or profitable for the securing of bodily safety, or honour or outward enjoyments, &c." It is not unlawful, says Bonacina, (u) to equivocate as often as any inconvenience or injury is like to befall us, by speaking plainly. Or as they express it more generally, when a man is concerned to keep something secret; so Toledo, (x) equivocation may be used, especially when it is expedient to conceal a thing: So Sanchez, (y) alledging for it, Sylvester, Sotus, Ledesma, Navarr.

Now no person can be more highly concerned to keep a thing secret, than these men to conceal the plot; both for the dangerous consequences of their discovering it, and the great advantages they might expect by concealment; by insisting on their own innocence, and asserting it even unto death, they might expect vast advantages. The plot cannot be more effectually promoted, than by making us believe there is none; and it will hardly be believed that there is any conspiracy of this nature, wherein there is no Jesuit; and it may be concluded there is no Jesuit in it, if the principles of the society (such as these were) had no knowledge of it. Their denying all tends to make all, before taken for granted, to be again called in question, and to encourage those who are still carrying on the design to proceed vigorously, since they may still work under-ground, and not be discovered, no not by those that suffer for it. Also to make some weak-minded Protestants stagger who hear the confident words of these dying priests, but are not acquainted with their fraudulent arts, nor suspect any depth of Satan in so smooth language, and will hardly believe (knowing what their own religion teaches) that any Christian durst go out of the world with false oaths in his mouth; or that there can be any device, which will make such a horrid thing to be innocent. It tends also to weaken the credit of the witnesses, and disparage the justice of the nation; and occasion such alteration in the ministers thereof, as may be more for the security of the conspirators. It may also allay the spirit of the nation roused and appearing in some heat, against those who were before apprehended to be the contrivers of its utter ruin. It may also incense foreign princes both against us, and innocent Protestants under them, for proceeding against priests or papists as such, without any other crime, but what is pretended. In fine, hereby they might expect to die as Martyrs in the account of Papists, and as innocent persons in the judgment of others; whereas, if they had confessed all they were conscious to, it is like they might have been rather looked on as monsters, or incarnate devils. Such advantage they might expect, and more they might fancy than I can give account of, by defending their innocency to the last breath. But on the other hand, if they had confessed what they were charged with, they had gone near to have broke the neck of their own design, which seems dearer to them than all their concerns; and exposed the hopefullst plot that ever the society was big with, for the utter extirpation of the Protestants, and their religion, to apparent hazard of miscarrying. They had endangered their whole party engaged with them; the lords in the Tower, and other persons of eminency had been hereby prejudged, and in a manner half condemned before their trial. They had quite silenced those, who have yet the confidence to question the evidence of the king's witnesses. They had encouraged other of the conspirators to follow their leaders herein, and confess what they knew, and so a full discovery had been made of the plot; it had been quite dissected, and all the horrid wickedness in the bowels of it exposed to public view, and thereby popery itself in danger to be rendered odious to the world, and renounced by those that love the christian name, as utterly repugnant and most reproachful to christianity, and to be abhorred by mankind, as that which bids defiance to humanity itself. In short they had gone near hereby to have spoiled an expected martyrdom, if they had confessed themselves criminals; or at least to stain the glory of it, as F. Garnet did by confessing something, though no more that what was clearly proved against him, being not altogether so impudent as his successors, to out-face all evidence.

Now upon far less accounts than these, equivocation in words or oaths is in the judgment of their best casuists lawful at any time, the hour of death not excepted. Nor will it be any sin by the help of this art, to say or swear what is simply false, when there is occasion. Nay they count it not only lawful, but necessary in less urgent cases than this before us. And can any imagine our Jesuits to be so silly, so unreasonably scrupulous as not to venture on a few innocent oaths in the prospect of such advantages on one hand, and such dangers on the other hand, as did not only injure, but enforce them to it, and made it not only lawful, but necessary? Would they not have been decryed by their own party as fools and dastards, if they had not stood it out to the last, since those criminals are so accounted by them, who having denied the crimes they are guilty of at trial, yet confess all at execution? When it had been the business of so many years, when they had been at so great charge, and run so many hazards to advance an heroic design, would they let it fall rather than support it by lying and swearing a little, when in the judgment of their best doctors they might lawfully do both? What though it could not be done without false oaths, they knew very well they can easily make them true, by a sly, but harmless trick. There is not the greatest lie nor the falsest oath that ever was heard, but if it were in the mouth of a Jesuit, with one secret cast of his mind, he could make it as true as the gospel. Might not their sealots have accused them as traitors to the grand design and the Catholic interest, so much concerned in it, if they had exposed all their concerns to hazard by an open and free confession; when as they had a way to deny all forswear all that they knew themselves, or others were guilty of, without the least sin in the world? Instruct but the greatest malefactors in this art, and assure them that they may use it without sin, without any danger to their souls, and if ever you hear of any confession of crimes from them at the gallows more than from these Fathers, it will be a great wonder.

But it may be said, These persons that suffered were christians and teachers of others, and not without some apprehensions of death and judgment; and so it will be uncharitable to think, that they would so little regard their souls, as not by some confession to discharge their consciences, but pass into eternity without the least touch of repentance, if they had been guilty of the horrid crimes they stand charged with. I answer, The Papists have found out other rules for the ordering of themselves in life and death too, than the gospel prescribes and good christians will observe. But if they had been better christians than they are, they would have done no better, unless they had been of another judgment. For how can it be expected, that they should particularly confess themselves guilty of any crimes, when they did not think any thing they did for, to be a crime? What they are charged with may be reduced to three heads, a design to introduce popery, to massacre or destroy the Protestants of these kingdoms, and to kill the king. Now in their judgment, if we may discern it by their doctrine, no one of these is a sin. And can you wonder that they died impatient, when they saw nothing to be repented of? (1.) Could they count it a sin to restore the Popish religion in the three kingdoms; and establish it, by advancing a prince to the throne, who would count it his glory utterly to extinguish what they count heresy, both in these nations and other parts of the world? No sure, they look upon this as an heroic, a glorious design, more fit for a triumph than any remorse, and at the furthest distance from any thing criminal. (2.) Do they count it a sin to destroy and root out all whom they count Heretics, as they do count all those many hundred thousands in these three nations? This looks like a crime prodigiously bloody and barbarous; but this is so far from being a sin with them, that it is a necessary duty, and as much so as what God himself commands. For proof of this, I shall not alledge the opinion of particular doctors, but that which is of more weight and authority with them than hundreds of such testimonies; and that is a decree of a general council, the most numerous of any we meet with, viz. that of Lateran under Innocent the third. There* all secular lords and princes, higher and lower, are enjoined to root out all Heretics out of their territories; and if they neglect it, their dominions are to be seized on by Catholics, who exterminating the Heretics shall possess them without controul, and preserve them in the purity of the faith. This is one of those decrees, how sanguinary soever it be, which they will have all Catholics high and low to observe and obey as the precepts of God and Divine Constitutions. And they are not excused from this bloody obedience, but for want of power to execute it with safety to themselves, as Bellarmine (a) and others declare. And now at last, after so many years patience performe, they had power enough in their prospect. An army of 40 or 50,000 armed men ready to be levied, under officers whom the pope thought worthy of commissions for that service, backed also with Catholic assistance from abroad; might be thought sufficient to execute this merciful canon effectually. And as obedience herein is necessary, and such as in conscience Roman Catholics cannot decline; so it is meritorious (and how far is that from being sinful?) The reward of their merit who will engage throughly in this blessed work, for the utter exterminating of Heretics (Protestants) every where, is no less than pardon of all sins, and a greater measure of glory in Heaven. So that our papists may not only skip clear over purgatory, and jump up into Heaven immediately, but obtain a more glorious crown there, than others; by doing such barbarous execution upon Protestants. But this you may find more insisted on (b) elsewhere. (S.) Do they think it a sin to kill the king? They do not, they cannot think so, if they understand and believe their own doctrine. Their doctors assure them, it is no sin to kill a tyrant (c); and they will have our king, and others in his circumstances to be tyrants one way or other, either for want of just title, or upon the account of misgovernment, if not both ways.

When they deny him to have any title, as they always do upon supposition of the pope's deposing him, and sometimes without respect to any formal deposition, then their common doctrine carries it clear, and with a strong current, any private person may lawfully kill him: (d) It is asserted, that a tyrant, on the account of title, may be slain by any private person; so Aquinas, whom multitudes of their doctors follow: my author names near twenty a little before, many of them Jesuits.

If they grant that be ever had any good title to the crown (which some of them dare question and deny too in terms too intolerable to be mentioned) yet they will have him a tyrant on the account of misgovernment: for so (as they teach) is every heretical prince. Suarez describing these kind of tyrants, concludes thus: "Amongst Christians that prince is most of all to be reckoned amongst this sort of tyrants, who induces his subjects into heresy, or other kind of apostasy, or public schism;" (e) and others of them express themselves to the same purpose. Now of the killing of such a one thus this great Jesuit determines after Soto (f): "A king who is a tyrant in respect of misgovernment, may not be killed by whom you will; but after sentence is once passed, any one may be made his executioner (g)." After sentence is passed they say, but what kind of sentence they express not. That he may be lawfully killed by a private hand; they think it requisite that he be first deprived, and that must be done by sentence of the pope. But many of them determine, that when the crime is notorious (for example, when a prince is notoriously known to be a heretic) which is our case; there is no need of a declaratory sentence; the pope's constructive will, though he express it not, will serve instead of such a sentence, having the full power and virtue of it. So that when it may be supposed, that it is his holiness will to have a prince excommunicated or deposed (as it must be always presumed in case of notorious heresy) though he declare it not in any formal way, yet it is as good to all effects and purposes as a declaratory sentence of excommunication or deposition. Bannez a great doctor in their schools tells us, "This is the judgment of Felinus, and Cajetan, and the common doctrine of Aquinas's followers," (h) that subjects may shake off all allegiance to their prince, even "before the sentence declaratory of the judge;" and tells us, they prove it by what is now alledged, because "in this case the constructive will of the pope has always the force of a sentence." The Jesuits agree herein, if we may believe Father Parsons, who says, "It is universally concluded both by divines and lawyers, that every heretical prince is utterly deprived of all power and dignity, both by the law of God and man, and this before the sentence of the pope." (i) Their great Panormitan laid the ground of this conclusion long before, who determines, "That where a crime is notorious, there is no need of a declaratory sentence." (k) So that by their common doctrine, our king, (or any prince whose heresy is notorious) may be, or is deprived (and consequently may be lawfully killed by any one) before the pope has excommunicated him by name, or deprived him by any public declaratory sentence. And their practice is answerable. The wisdom of the Roman Court will have it so ordered, when the pope is in a capacity to make an open attempt upon a supposed heretical prince by force of arms, then he publishes a declaratory sentence, as he did against queen Elizabeth before the Spanish Invasion in 1588; but when a private murder is designed, it is not advisable to proceed so openly; the circumstances of the attempt require secrecy: and so in this case, either a sentence not published, or the presumptive will of the pope, or the general excommunication thundered against all heretical princes and persons every Maunday-Thursday, will be enough; and Guy Fawks was not much out, when he alledged that as a sufficient warrant to blow up both king and parliament.

But they have yet another way (though less taken notice of) to leave those whom they count heretical kings, without any title to their kingdoms; and so make them tyrants and usurpers, liable to be killed by any hand lawfully, without any declaratory sentence of the pope. Suarez (a) having declared that a prince deposed by the pope, becomes tyrannus sine titulo; tells us, this is more clear in an heretical king. For he, as soon as ever he is tainted with heresy, "ipso facto loses some way his propriety and title to the kingdom." And that which he minces, their authors generally assert without restriction, That heretics from the first day that they are so, lose all title to what they possess, even before any judicial sentence. Sanchez (b) produces above forty doctors for this, and himself saith, it is exceeding probable. And Suarez (c) after he hath named many of their more ancient authors of this judgment, tells us, It is the common doctrine of their modern writers. So that by this doctrine, so common amongst them, an heretical prince is deprived of all title to the kingdom he possesses, the very first day that he is an heretic, without expecting the sentence of pope or other judge. And this they will have extended to an heretic's children to the second generation, though they prove catholics. For though this seem severe, and it was more favourably determined in the Code, exempting catholic children from the punishment incurred by their parents; yet in the new canon law (as Suarez (d) tells us) it is otherwise decreed. And catholic children are declared to have no title, if their progenitors lost it by heresy. For this being spiritual treason, the punishment must be proportionable, and reach both the criminal and his heirs. Thus for example, king James being in their account an heretic, he lost all title to these crowns, both for himself and his children, and childrens children, whether they be Roman catholics or no. So that the duke of York can have no title, unless the pope will take off the attainder, and then revive the title for him, which hath been by their rules extinct in this royal family from generation to generation. This is the condition of protestants, and all whom they count heretics, they lose all propriety and title to their estates and possessions, for them and their heirs to the second generation: and princes are to expect no more favour herein than others. "For," say they, "in the crime of heresy, no regard is had of any special state, of any personal dignity or nobility: but in favour of the faith, noble and ignoble for heresy are equally punished." So Roias, Felinus, Carerius, Simancha, and Suarez (f) after them, who adds: "This is established upon the best reason; for in matters of faith, and such as pertain to the salvation of souls, there is no distinction betwixt Jew and Gentile, bond or free," as Paul to the Romans and to Philemon. Nay it proceeds with more force against kings.

"For heretical princes," saith Simancha, (g) "deserve more grievous punishment than private men." Therefore they who will have all other supposed heretics to lose all title to what they possess, before any sentence past, must in all reason conclude this of princes, being equally comprehended under their common law for confiscation. So that by this doctrine the kingdom of an heretical prince is confiscated, and his right to it extinct by his heresy, as soon as ever he is infected with it, before and without any sentence past against him: and if he or his children to the second generation do possess it, they invade what they have no right to, they are mere usurpers, and liable as tyrants sine titulo to be killed by a private hand, any one may be made their executioner.

Hereby it further appears with what truth J. G. asserts in the words of a dying man, that none of the society, besides Marianna, holds it lawful "for a private person to kill a king, although a heathen, or a pagan, or a tyrant." It is hereby evident, That not only the Jesuits, but other orders, will have it lawful for private persons to kill kings, when they can suppose them to be without title; but then they call those tyrants whom we count kings, and so they may kill all our kings successively, and yet swear (truly in their sense) that they never killed any king actually, nor ever designed or attempted to kill any one; because, forsooth, they assassinated none but tyrants, nor ever intended any other. And I do not doubt but if Marianna were alive, he would swear as readily as any other, that his book was not to defend or encourage the killing of any by private hands, save tyrants only. But then I question whether we can find any (excepting J. G. and excluding mental reserves) who will either swear or say, that there is any considerable difference betwixt Marianna, and the rest of the Jesuits, about the doctrine of king-killing. They are all for killing of tyrants by private persons; and he is for the killing of no other. But then both he and they are for the killing of heretical kings, for these they all count tyrants. But to proceed; upon this account their doctors say, That against such a prince no treason can be committed: for that is a violation of majesty, 'crimen læsæ majestatis,' whereas in such a prince there is no true majesty. (1) And by the help of this, might our dying priests protest and swear, that they were guilty of no treason, but as clear as the child unborn, of any treasonable crime, or of any plot against the king's most excellent majesty; and so they might all disclaim king-killing, or any design or contrivance of the king's death: For the doctors also declare, such a tyrant is not called prince or king; (n) and therefore if they should count it a sin to kill other kings, yet not ours, not any heretical prince, not any whom the pope has deposed, or which is all one, declared heretic, either formally or virtually. For they are no kings in the Roman stile, but tyrants. (n) Further, by this we may discern, upon what account they may disclaim with oaths, as these priests here do, the use of all pardons, absolutions, dispensations, or indulgences: For there is no occasion for these, but upon supposition of some sin, whereas they did not judge any thing wherewith they were charged to be sinful. And in fine, if these detestable crimes were no sins in their judgment, who could expect they should make any confession? If such horrid enormities may be consistent with the greatest innocency, why not any other wickedness whatsoever? And therefore whatever they were guilty of, it is no wonder if they should all swear, as one of them does, that he is the most innocent man in the whole world. They that offer violence to kings opposing the faith, and die on this most holy account, they are not to be judged traitors to king or country, but Martyrs of Christ, and deserve not punishment of God, but eternal rewards in heaven, Reynolds Rosmus, p. 638.

To conclude I have great reason to be confident that these speeches were contrived for the promoting of their grand plot, upon which their hearts were so much set (their catholic interest being so deeply concerned in it) that the thoughts of death could not divert them. Their design in that was to destroy us and our religion, and in order thereto, by these specious words they would deceive us; knowing well, that they might ruin us more easily, more suddenly, more unavoidably, if they could persuade us that no such thing is intended. If they find us so weak, so facile as to believe some fraudulent expressions, against so much rational evidence, and thereby gain this point upon us, their work is in a manner done; and they will do more at their death by putting out our eyes, than they could do in all their life. To prevent this, I have endeavoured to clear up to others two things, which to me are as clear as the day, and will be so, I doubt not, to those, who duly consider the premises. (1.) That by their doctrine, though they were as guilty as any malefactors that ever suffered, yet they might assert their innocency with all oaths and asseverations, and that truly and lawfully by the use of a secret reserve, or mental equivocation, which it will be no sin to use when they are dying, though then they protest that they use none. This is done in the three first propositions; and it is so plain in their writings, that I never expect any priests or Jesuits in England will disprove it. (2.) That they were as much concerned to maintain their pretended innocency, how guilty soever they were indeed; as they were for promoting their present horrid plot or their Catholic interest depending on it: and this is manifest by the last proposition. Now this being premised, let me only make this inquiry and I have done: whether any in reason, justice or charity, can against such evidence as the justice of the nation counted clear, pregnant and convincing, believe those, who thought they might very lawfully deceive us, when they were dying, and apprehended themselves most highly concerned to do it?

“He who is first in his own cause, seems just; but his neighbour comes, and searches him,” Prov. xviii. 17.

“It is not probable, that such who will perjure themselves, to calumniate Protestants, should be capable of giving any real testimonies for themselves.”

It being desired of me by a worthy divine, that I should publish what I said to Staley, who was condemned for treasonable speeches: likewise my discourses with the other twelve Jesuitical and popish conspirators, before their being drawn out to their execution: I could not (though with some reluctancy at first) but grant him his request; hoping that this narrative may be of public use and benefit to all, into whose hands it shall come; to acquaint them with the truth of what I spake to them, by way of advice, to prepare them for their approaching death? and that I may give some satisfaction, to such as are apt to be; staggered in the belief of their abominable crimes, because they frequently avowed their innocency. Which satisfaction I shall perform in order as they suffered.

I. MR. STALEY.

The first person executed, was Mr. Staley, who spoke treasonable words against his majesty, which expressly threatened to take away his sacred life. I did frequently, after the sentence of death was past on the said Staley, visit him in order to prepare him for his execution. In my first address to him, I told him, I came not to insult over him, but out of conscience to discharge the duty of my office: He received me, with great willingness, and said, He had great terror upon his conscience for the guilt of his many and great sins; yet utterly denied the speaking of those words for which he stood condemned. I told him that the readiest way to be free from those terrors, was to make an ingenuous penitent acknowledgment; and that for tongue-sins or secret heart-sins formerly indulged, God might justly desert him to ensnare himself by such treasonable words. He said, He never had any thought of mischief against the king's person. I replied, that words were the natural product of thoughts, and a frequent prologue to the most abominable actions. He persisted in denying, that he spoke any words tending to that sense; but when I told him, that his friend, who was drinking with him, could, or had deposed upon oath, that he spoke those very words: He replied, Nay, if my friend will swear so much, it is probable I might (in the heat and extravagancy of passion) utter them, though they never were intended in my heart. He had great remorse for the sinfulness of his life, and expressed some particulars which I shall not mention. I told him, if he expected any settlement of true serenity in conscience, that he must not seek it in adhering to the Romish religion; for false and loose principles can never produce solid and lasting comfort; then I undertook to convince him from the sacred scriptures, of the many absurdities which are maintained by Popish doctors, that it is a presumption not to doubt of salvation, and yet that a person may merit it, which is utterly inconsistent; for if any man doubt of his future happy estate, how can he merit it? and if he may merit it, what need he doubt, when by works of a self-righteousness, he can create a title, or may lay claim to eternal life? I judged it necessary, in order to the removing his terror in conscience, to inform him aright; that although it were impossible to fulfil the covenant of works, or to attain any perfection in this life; yet there is a foundation of hope, for degenerate mankind as restored to the image of God by Christ; whose satisfaction to divine justice, is of infinite value and virtue: so that Christ being the only mediator by redemption, it is blasphemy, and the highest sacrilege to constitute or invoke any saint or angel as a mediator of intercession. For this is equivalent to Christ's infinite satisfaction, as grounding the right of his intercession, especially considering, that mediatory intercession is only the representing and pleading the merit of infinite satisfaction. Upon this, he expressed an assent to what I had affirmed, by bowing his head; and applying his hand to his breast, he said, Sir, go on. Then I unfolded the nature and necessity of faith and repentance in order to the justification of a sinner; how they were the conditions of the covenant of grace, so required of us, for pardon of sin, and eternal life; as that they could not be extracted out of the power of free-will in man, but were the sole purchase of Christ's free love, who by his spirit, infusing the principle of faith and repentance, doth regenerate, and actually reconcile a sinner to God; and so redeem, or set him free from the slavery of his corrupt will, which he cannot shake off by any improvement of natural reason, or moral resolutions. I stated also the difference betwixt true saving faith and repentance, from that which is false: And that the office of faith, is not only to rely on the mercy of God, and merits of Christ, but also to give back the whole man, in an hearty resignation, to the conduct and government of Christ's word and spirit in all things. That saving repentance was not an act of mere attrition, which only effects a legal consternation in conscience, from the apprehension of guilt, and divine wrath: but true repentance is evangelical, wrought deep in the heart by sound contrition for sin as sin, chiefly for offending the holy God: so that it is the result of an holy filial ingenuity, and is encouraged by the hope of mercy, attended with an hatred of all sin, and a studious resolution to walk in all holy obedience. Here I told him, what an unsound dangerous opinion that was of the Romish doctors, who maintain attrition only with the receipt of the Eucharist, and the sacrament of absolution at the very point of death to be a sufficient passport for a comfortable exit out of the world, or ticket to claim salvation: after this, and some other discourse, he thanked me for my advice, and said, he was much benefited, supported, and comforted thereby: And desired me, as frequently as I could, to renew my visits to him; so I promised I would, and then I prayed with him; and he was very intentive, and much affected with what I prayed.

When I came again, he complained, that his heart was not so thoroughly contrite for sin as he desired; that he was much perplexed that he had no more assurance of a future happy state. I stated the nature of true saving faith, that it was an adherence to free grace of God in Christ, for pardon and eternal life, joined with an obedient self-resignation; and where this was wrought, the soul-state was safe, though assurance of God's love might be wanting. For this was not an essential privilege, absolutely necessary to salvation, but only a peculiar favour given to strict walking christians; and that only at some set times, in great extremity and need of such hidden manna. That it was rather of the nature of a rational short sensation, than the ground of settled comfort; which is the result of an heroic strain of faith, to trust in God, when he seems to reject and slay us; and that the Lord doth more esteem this resolute dependency, in the midst of seeming contradictions, than the most multiplied acts of external worship. Upon this he was somewhat more serene in his mind: and I told him, that in praying and seeking the Lord more fervently, comfort would gradually be obtained.

The next day he distrusted his heart, as to the truth of his faith and repentance, which I told him, was a good sign that he was in a hopeful way of making his peace with God. That he must wait in believing that he should obtain comfort promised to the penitent. He desired me to pray with him, and for him; and to prepare to speak somewhat of the sufferings of Christ, when I should next visit him. Accordingly, from that text, "I am crucified with Christ," I treated of many parts of his bitter passion, and of his soul-agonies, inferring matter not only of comfort from thence, but also of instruction, for our imitation and conformity. I left him afterward in a frame more willing and fit to die: and coming to him on the very morning he was to suffer, he told me, that "now he had more comfort, and an hope of his future happy state: yet renouncing all opinion of worth in his own tears, prayers, and humiliation." He was solicitous, if the executioner should deal with him according to the strictness of the sentence, lest feeling any pain (if cut down, and ripped up alive) he should curse, or use any unchristian word: which rather than to do, said he, I would bite my tongue in pieces; for I dread sin now, more than death. I told him, that I hoped the manner of his execution would be mitigated; however, that God would prevent sin in him at the time of his suffering, because he was so anxious as to distrust himself, and cautious to avoid all unbecoming words or gestures. After some farther discourse, I prayed with him, and he was much pleased with my attendance about him; yet he spared me from going with him to the place of execution for some reasons. I cannot say how he declared himself there, because I was not present: but upon my whole observation of his behaviour in prison, I do charitably judge, he was a real penitentiary. It was doubtful to some, whether he died in the Roman or Protestant religion; because, as I think, he did not at last declare himself either way: yet this I am sure of, that if he had solid and true comfort in dying, this could not proceed from such a sandy foundation as his old popish principles, but only from self-abhorrence in the sense of his great sinfulness, and the defectiveness of his best repentance and obedience, that he might build his hope on Christ, and his righteousness only, as the rock of eternal life.

II. MR. COLEMAN.

I come now to Coleman, of whom I can say very little, because he had an arrogant opinion of his own abilities; and out of an hope to be canonized for a saint, despised and rejected any assistance from me, either by discourse or prayer. I offered him both on the next day after the sentence of death passed upon him; but he returned me this answer (by the messenger I sent to him, to know if he would admit me) "That he had but a very short time to prepare himself for death, and would not be hindered in the loss of any part of it;" thanking me for my offer of visiting him, but desired me to forbear. I put a fair construction on the message brought me at the first; thinking he might be very busy at that time, about some extraordinary emergency, or indisposed to be visited; and therefore told the messenger, that I would attend on him on some other fit time. The officer told me, that Mr. Coleman would never admit me; and he inferred it from his manner of speaking that message which he sent by him; he observed his countenance and gestures in the delivery of it. So I totally desisted. Yet when he was brought down from his chamber in the Press-yard-side, to go to the sledge, I stayed him a little, saying, Mr. Coleman, you did not think well of admitting me, yet know, I have earnestly prayed that God would give you true and great repentance for your great crimes, stand not out in your denying of them. Some other words I used, to which he replied in short and quick tone, "Thank you, thank you." As I moved nearer with him towards the gate, he said, "Sir, I must beg your pardon." It being a strange word to drop from him, I asked him for what? He replied, "That I did not admit you; but truly, it was not in any contempt of your office; but when you sent to me, I was under some perplexed thoughts; and for other considerations, thought it not convenient." Then I told him, that I would pray for him as a dying man, which he took well, and so we parted.

III. MR. GROVE.

Mr. Grove was executed on Friday the 24th of January, 1678. I spake to him in the chapel these words (before he was carried down the stone-stairs unto the sledge:) Sir, I earnestly desire you, now that you are going to appear at the tribunal of Christ, that you would clear your conscience and speak the truth, that you may die in peace: and I do exhort you, that you would beg of God great repentance for your great sins. He replied, "That he did understand his duty." Yet I persisted, to exhort him not to trust to the merits of any saint or angel, but wholly to go out of himself, not grounding any confidence of his salvation on any prayers, tears, nor the deepest humiliation of his own heart. That even cardinal Bellarmine said, when dying, "It was safest to rely wholly and solely on the all-sufficient merits of the blessed Jesus." Mr. Grove replied, "That Thomas à Kempis had said the same." To which I replied, Do you consider of it, and act accordingly: for you must not hazard your soul's eternal welfare by any presumptuous mixing of your own good works with Christ's infinite satisfaction and merits. For the Apostle St. Paul saith, "If justification be of works, it is altogether of works; but if of free grace, it is altogether of grace."

So I took leave of Mr. Grove, desiring him to consider well of what I had said, praying that the Lord would in much mercy look upon his soul to pardon him, and fit him for his approaching death. Mr. Grove seemed to take in good part what was said to him. After which, he was conducted down to the sledge.

IV. MR. IRELAND.

Mr. Ireland was executed on the same day with Mr. Grove, to whom I had not time to say more than these few words; viz. Sir, I do earnestly beg of God to grant you mercy and pardon for your great sins. Trust alone in the righteousness and merits of Christ Jesus: compose yourself in your passage, and fix your heart upon the Lord, till you expire. Which words Mr. Ireland seemed to take kindly from me: and so we took leave of each other.

Here I cannot forbear to give some account of Mr. Ireland's perverting of a woman who was burnt in Smithfield for clipping his majesty's coin. This seduction of the said woman from the Protestant Religion, was before Mr. Ireland was apprehended for the late conspiracy. An officer in Newgate did assure me, when Ireland was committed for the plot, that he was able to take his oath, that Ireland perverted that woman some time before; for he well knew him upon a second review, but knew him not to be a Papist or priest at first; for he was admitted to her as friend. Ireland's stratagem in turning the woman to become a Papist, was thus discovered. Early on the morning on which she was executed, I asked her, what hope she had of a future happy state? she huffed at me, telling me, "I need not trouble myself about her, for she was sure of her salvation." I wondered at her confidence, but suspected not the grounds of her malapertness.

After I had exhorted and prayed with her at the place of execution, and was taking my farewell of her; she entreated me to give her some time to pray for herself, which she did: in her prayer she mixed these words, "Lord grant, that the offering up of my body to the flames may expiate the guilt of all my sins, and save my soul." I told her, when she had finished her prayer, that the foresaid expression smelt rank of Popery; and therefore asked what Religion she came to die in? She replied, "she was a Roman Catholic." I asked her, how long she had been such? She said, "that a good minister had told her, that if she died in the Protestant Religion, she was sure to be damned." And that he proved it by this scripture, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church." So that, he assured her, that the religion of the Romish Bishop, who was St. Peter's Successor, was the Rock there meant; and so there was no salvation to those who are separatists from that church, and the profession of it. I told her, that the priest had deceived her. For the Rock was not St. Peter's person, nor is verbal confession of Christ; for if so, where was the rock, and, what became of the Church, when St. Peter so shamefully denied his Lord thrice? But the only true Rock on which the Church is built, is the very person, offices and merits of Christ, the son of God, who was the object of St. Peter's Confession. She was attentive to what I said, and seemed somewhat sensible of her being deceived. Saying, "She was willing to be saved betwixt us both." But I told her, she must not halt betwixt two religions, so opposite to each other; and that it was very dangerous to die in the Roman persuasion. She told me, "She could not renounce it, in as much as the said priest had obliged her by the blessed sacrament, that she should never recant or depart from the Popish Religion, as the best and safest to die in." I convinced her with arguments to the contrary; yea, she herself was not credulous of their absurd affirming of the transubstantiation of the sacramental bread and wine, into the very body and blood of Christ: for she said, "She neither tasted any flesh or blood." She also declared, "That she had no good works of her own, which she durst trust to, as meritorious of heaven; but relied wholly and solely on Christ's Righteousness." Whereupon I told her, she denied the grand points of Popery; and therefore, was a Papist to get a pretended absolution or upon some design. But, fearing to die in the Romish opinions, she asked me, "If she should not be perjured, if she renounced them, having taken the sacrament, to persist in them?" I told her, that she must not cleave to an unlawful wicked oath; but beg repentance of God, that she so easily suffered herself to be seduced. I told her, that the Lord saith by the prophet, "That an oath must be taken in truth, righteousness, and judgment."

Now, she did not, neither could swear in truth, because it was to a false religion; nor in judgment, in wisdom and discretion, because she swore rashly and inconsiderately: therefore, this oath was void in its own nature; and it could not bind her, the matter of it being unlawful and wicked.

At last, being convinced of her error, she was willing to retract it: but I told her, that what she did, she must do willingly, and from a sincere penitent frame of heart. She said, "She could and would freely (out of conviction of her duty) renounce all Romish opinions and practices;" which she did openly, with an audible voice; affirming, That she died a true Protestant. So I took her by the hand, and prayed again with her, that God would pardon her former levity, and give her perseverance in the true faith, which she had so solemnly re-imbaced.

This was the first discovery of proselyting condemned malefactors at Newgate: to prevent which seduction, captain Richardson, since this came to his knowledge, is very watchful, and gives all his officers a charge to suffer none to come to condemned persons, but only such whom they know to be Protestant-Divines; and that always, an officer be present to hear what passes in discourse.

V. Mr. PICKERING.

I had discourse with him before his execution; but he would not permit me to pray with him, only desired my prayers at-home for him; which I promised him, and he thanked me. I was present at his execution, because he was hanged after three other ordinary malefactors. When he came out of the sledge into the cart, he had a great flushing in his face; I apprehended by his words and gesture, that he had elevated his artificial courage; or rather sunk himself into a sullenness, by taking cordial spirits: for he was unconcerned at the approach of his own death, and no way affected with his monstrous crime. With an impudent face, a lying tongue, and antic carriage, he denied what he was condemned for, and asserted his innocence. He was reproved by the sheriffs, for such impudent lying; having had a fair trial, and found guilty of the whole indictment charged upon him: yet so seared are the consciences of these grand traitors, and enemies to all order, and well-established government, as well as the true and pure religion, that they will hazard the eternal loss of their souls, as to a future happy state, rather than declare any remorse for their abominable designs and practices. Yea, they stick not to justify themselves, as if perjury could change the heinous nature of treason, and wash it into a perfect innocence.

Sir Richard How told Pickering, that he should have a considerable time to prepare for his instant death, if he would improve it well, and not misspend it in extravagant, and false pretences. He likewise called unto him, to put him in mind of praying for himself; alledging, that it was reported, that he was a priest, therefore he ought to be able to pray, in expressions, and with affections suitable to his present distress: Yet Pickering neither warned the people, to take heed of an ill man, nor confessed any sin to God, of which himself was guilty; but with a kind of rude smiling, denied himself to be a priest but only a religious brother. Sir Richard asked him, if he were ashamed of his religion, or that the people should hear him pray? For some of his fraternity, executed before, only muttered a few private Ave-maryes, or other Popish prayers, to themselves. Then Pickering repeated the Lord's-Prayer, and the Apostolical-Creed; and said no more as to any religious concerns. Then the ordinary, being in the cart with him, exhorted him to express himself more fully and pathetically in prayer, suitable to the distress of a dying man, which he refused to do. Then I asked him, that I might pray for him, because he might be uncomposed or indisposed himself: But he said, that he did not matter it; he had rather I should let it alone. So after a strange, unbecoming, stupid, and sullen behaviour of himself, when he desired no longer time, his face was vailed, and he was turned off: he hung about half an hour, and then was cut down and quartered.

VI. Mr. GREEN.

Green was one of the murderers of sir Edmondbury Godfrey. He was born in Ireland of a protestant father, (as himself said) but his mother being a papist and his father dying, she committed the son to his uncle (her brother) for education, in the popish religion. Green could neither read nor write, yet his uncle had so trained him up in the popish principles, that he was a fitter subject (when grown up) for popish priests to work upon, and make him an engine for their destructive practices. This appeared by their inveigling of him into the horrid murder of the said sir Edmond: Green had some time before been preferred to be chapel-keeper at Somerset-house. Hereupon the chief contrivers of that murder, took their opportunity to draw him in, to be an actor in that bloody tragedy. Green was very ready at hand for that purpose, and was the easier induced thereunto, because sir Edmond being one of his majesty's justices of the peace, was very active in discovering and committing popish priests to custody: his life was laid wait for several times, not only for the reason aforesaid, but chiefly because he had taken some examinations upon oath, concerning the late horrid popish conspiracy, which they thought (if sir Edmond were killed) would be lost, or not so valid in their credibility. But in this they were infatuated, for the murder of this worthy patriot confirmed the belief of the plot. The manner of contriving sir Edmond's death was thus. As he passed by Somerset-house, he was importuned by some of the complices in the murdering of him, to turn in at the gate, under pretence that there was a fray within the court; and that he being a justice of the peace, might (as he was bound) do a great good office in appeasing the scuffle. Sir Edmond went, in not mistrusting their design on him: But these cruel enemies to the Protestant religion, had no sooner got him into the back part of Somerset-house, but they jostled him into a private room, and there set upon him with their fury. The narrative is in print, and too tedious to relate. Therefore in sum, as to Green's part, who acted in that bloody tragedy, it was proved upon oath, that he strangled sir Edmond; and farther acted, in conveying his dead body to the place where it was afterwards found. Green being condemned to be hanged for this barbarous murder, I proffered myself (as Ordinary) to visit, and fit him for his approaching death. He accepted of it, and I went to him several days, to make him sensible of so great a crime. He stiffly denied it, as also did Hill and Berry to the last. I urged Green with various arguments, to adore the sovereignty of divine providence, which had thus wonderfully brought to light such a secret mystery of iniquity, hardly to be paralleled, in any age. Yet Green was very obstinate, in standing out to deny, that he knew any thing of this murder more or less, which I told him proceeded from some or all of these reasons following; either because he had taken an oath of secrecy, or counted it no sin, but rather a meritorious act, to destroy such a grand heretic as sir Edmond was accounted. Or had received a popish absolution from the guilt of that murder, and so looked upon himself as innocent as the child unborn. Or would not confess that horrid crime, to decline casting a great reproach upon the popish party. Yet however, I did not cease for many days to exhort him to unburthen his conscience of this particular guilt. I aggravated in many particulars, the heinousness of the sin of murder, especially of this, committed with such perfidious and cruel circumstances. Yet no arguments prevailed with him to acknowledge it.

I found him ignorant in the principles of the christian faith; therefore I took the more pains to inform him of the danger of dying in the Romish persuasion, which is grossly opposite, by the mixture of many absurd traditions, to the saving fundamentals of christianity. He said, that he did not believe many points of popery; viz. The power of priestly absolution nor the merits of good works to claim salvation by: Nor that it was lawful to pray to any saint or angel: And that no sin was venial in its own nature, though it were never so small. I much wondered, that he should say, he believed not any of these popish points; and yet, that he should wear a crucifix at his girdle. I desired him, not to put any religion in looking on it, nor in kissing of it. He said he put no confidence of salvation in it; only, It was a remembrance of his blessed Saviour. I told him, that Christ had left no such, nor any other memorials of himself, but only in the scriptures of sacred truth, and in the sacraments: That it is the office of the holy spirit, to bring every truth necessary for salvation, to our remembrance: And that Christ, his offices and merits, were only to be believed in; and were sufficient to put us in mind of our duty, and to quicken holy affections, in us.

I said moreover, That it was a more refined piece of idolatry, to conceive otherwise of God, in our thoughts, than as he had revealed himself by the scriptures of truth, in his infinite excellencies. And therefore to relieve us, in preventing any gross mistakes in our absurd imaginations of God, we were bound to fix our thoughts and conceptions in prayer, upon God in Christ, as incarnate; who is the only express image of the Deity; and not any corporeal, dishonourable misrepresentations of God, by the help of pictures or crucifixes.

I found also, that his Popish education had strongly prevailed on him, to adhere to the false and absurd dotages of the Romish church: for when I told him, That it was not safe to die in that religion; he replied, "That he was resolved to hold and persevere in it, because he had been bred up in it." I said, That could not be a solid argument; for then he might be as peremptory to die in a sinful state, because the principles of a corrupt nature were riveted in his heart, and were grown familiar to him by custom.

He was sometimes pettish; yet when the fit was off, he hearkened to my advice, and joined with me in prayer. I desired him not to mock God, either by any deliberate wandering in his thoughts, while I should pray; nor by saying any Ave Marias or Popish petitions secretly to himself. He promised me, he would not. He was troubled for his sinful course of life: Yet I told him, That was not repentance deep enough. David's heart was the centre of his remorse; and that not only his heinous crimes of murder and adultery were his burden, but the sense of his vile corrupt nature, which was the poisonous spring of all scandalous impieties. And that, as we are in our thanksgivings for divine mercies, to ascend to the free-grace of God, in giving Christ to redeem us, as the spring-head of all spiritual benefits; so, in a penitent confession of sin, we must likewise ascend to the guilt and defilement of original sin, whence all actual abominations flow. That this is a great relief to us, when we cannot make a distinct particular enumeration of our sins: And that no hypocrite can be truly humbled for the sin of his corrupt nature, nor for Gospel-unbelief, which is the direct damning sin, as being against the very remedy of our recovery from a state of sin and misery.

Every day, after suitable advices given to him, I prayed with him. He had not been grammared in that strange distinction, which most of those Popish malefactors had learned, That a Papist may lawfully desire a Protestant's prayers at home; yet that his joining in prayer, is an owning of their reputed heresy; whose breath is infectious, when poured out in the solemnity of praying mutually in each others' presence. Hill had learned this evasion, though Staley and Berry, as well as Green, had not. I believe, the true reason why all the other criminals denied me liberty to pray with them, was, lest I should touch too distinctly upon the right sore (which they palliated, yea denied) and so dreaded that trouble and perplexity, which might thereby be raised in their consciences.

I can give no further account of Green, but only this, That upon the day before his execution, he told me, That he had received much information by my discourses, and benefit by my prayers, in order to fit him for his death: He thanked me for my visits, but discharged me from farther attendance upon him; so I went not with him to the place of execution, to observe what end he made.

VII. Mr. HILL.

This Hill was one of the murderers of sir E. Godfrey. He was born and bred a Papist. He was not a shoemaker, as was reported; but the son of a shoemaker. He said, That he had been servant to a Reouant lady, and managed some of her concerns; and went over sea sometime, to give her an account thereof. That he had lately hired an house for himself to dwell in; but was not present at the aforesaid murder: Yes, that he knew nothing of it, more or less, neither before nor after. This he often averred with so many self-imprecations, that I was afraid to urge him for the present, to any farther acknowledgment; lest I might thereby give him an occasion to aggravate his sin, and seal up his damnation with greater obduration and impenitency. I unfolded to him, the wide difference betwixt the Protestant and Popish religion; and that the latter could not be a religion instituted by Christ, because it was founded in blood, and propagated by artifices of cruelty, injustice, violence, equivocations and perjuries: Yes, even by false appeals to the omniscient Judge of innocency, when crimes were juridically proved against the appellants.

I said, That this was the deepest policy of Papists, fetched from the conclave of hell: for such daring and atheistical appellants, are not only possessed with the spirit of lying, and strongly deluded, while living, to believe a false, absurd religion; but also do as strangely, out of an obstinate, impenitent heart, palliate bloody crimes with a flat denial of them, after conviction thereof by due process of law. Surely such a violation of the sentiments of conscience, must needs proceed from an atheistical denial of God's omniscient inspection, or a profane doubting of the future judgment. As if false appellants had not souls capable of damnation, or studied how to seal it up more firmly to themselves: but such studied evasion of their crimes, render them blacker and more horrid, while they would make credulous persons suspect their accusers to be perjured; which is a sin of that deep die and malignity, that it rarely admits of any repentance in the sinner, or pardon from God. Yet so hardened are some, that they will stand out in the denial of their crimes, though proved against them, to the last breath. They are not afraid to look the Almighty Judge in the face, with a lie in their mouth.

But then such frontless stupid sinners presume, they shall have this relief as a shield, to keep off their damnation; that their self-imprecation was for the promoting of a greater good; viz. That the Romish religion may not lie under the reproach of a blood-thirsty disposition, in its professing party; lest, being hindered its propagation, if this were credited, it should gradually become so abominable as to be rooted out.

Papists think, that they may lawfully, safely, yea commendably perjure themselves, to promote their false religion; especially, if in a transport of zeal, they imprecate themselves, that they may sit higher in the good opinion and implicit faith of their blinded proselytes. Such was Hill! Who was not more subtly moulded unto, than deeply confirmed in all Popish principles. Hence it was, that he would not admit of any information which might beget the least suspicion of their falsity: Yet this was very commendable in him, that when I exhorted him to take a strict review of his sins; that so, being deeply humbled for them, he might obtain some hopeful prospect of their pardon: He replied, "That he had endeavoured to search out whatever might provoke the Lord to desert him, and suffer him to fall under the fatal sentence pronounced upon him." He said, "He had been guilty of sins enough, for which he was thus severely punished." Among the rest, he instanced in this; "That he had wronged one in a twopenny matter; but he was now so troubled about it, that he had made restitution since his condemnation; although he was in extreme want of necessaries for his present subsistence." I commended this in him; but withal told him, That there was one crime committed by him, for which he could never make any satisfaction; viz. the murdering of sir Edmund: yet, that upon his true repentance, Christ's bloodshed was all-sufficient to wash away the stain and reproach of this most prodigious wickedness.

He still stood out in a peremptory denial, "That he knew any thing of it, more or less." And in the usual canting language, affirmed, "That he was as innocent of it, as the child unborn." Which words may admit of an equivocation: For the child unborn is innocent, as not being capable of committing or declaring the heinousness of such a crime: But though Hill was capacitated for it, with all imaginable principles of Jesuitical subtily; yet his deepest sophistry appeared, in pretending to be as innocent as the child unborn; viz. In this sense, innocent, as not able to declare his guiltiness of the said murder: for so he might be unable, in respect of an oath of secrecy, which was the seal of his impenitency. Or, he might think to evade the confession of it by this equivocation, viz. I am as innocent of the fact as there is truth in this, that the child unborn is here present, reserving this supplement of the assertion unto himself. And then it being unridled in plain English, it comes to thus much, "I am as innocent of the fact laid to my charge;" that is, there is as much truth in affirming this, as there is in the child's being present, which is yet unborn: For there is not truth in either.

I did fear, that some such equivocation might shroud itself under Hill's flat denial of the said murder: Therefore, I told him, that his ingenuity in confessing a pecuniary wrong, and making restitution, could not demonstrate any sound repentance, unless he took the shame of this murder upon himself, by a free confession of it. For a sincere penitentiary dares not conceal any sin, though of never so ignominious a nature. He replied, "That he had taken shame to himself, in confessing his doing wrong, and that he had violated the integrity, and peace of his conscience, for a very trifle: Therefore, I could not think, he denied the murder laid to his charge, that he might maintain his reputation." But to confute this plea: I knew a felon, who denied the robbery for which he was condemned; yet probably to insinuate into me a good opinion of him, he confessed that he once robbed a poor man going to market, but being afterwards troubled in his conscience for so doing, he enquired out where the person wronged lived, and sent him double restitution; "because happily," (said he) "the poor man losing of his market, might have gained as much as I sent him, by selling the provisions which he was carrying thither." Thus some will pretend to be ingenuous in confessing hidden crimes, and yet will stand out in denying such which are proved against them. This is but a counterfeit remorse.

On the day before Hill's execution, he discharged me of farther attendance, because he said, he would be in greater retirement, to fit himself for his death, now so nearly approaching: whereupon I took leave of him; and he prayed God to reward me for all my visits of him.

VIII. Mr. BERRY.

Berry the porter of Somerset-house, was one of the murderers of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and was executed some time after Hill and Green. He willingly admitted me to visit him for many days, sometimes twice in the same day. I found him dejected at the first, yet afterwards he was reduced to a more composed frame. I observed that he had some books in his chamber; of all which I took an inspection, and found no popish author among them. I told him, that I much approved of his care in the choice of those books, especially of the Bible, to be his associates and guides in his solitary confinement. Then I advised him, to search his heart-state God-ward, and to consider for what special sins God had deserted him, to fall into so shameful and notorious a crime, as the murder of sir E. Godfrey; who had demonstrated himself to be a worthy patriot of his country. He replied, that he knew nothing of it, neither before, nor after; and that he was no ways accessory to the guilt of it. I said, I could not give credit to him in that; for the crime was clearly proved against him. I did not much urge him to confess it, at that time, fearing I might provoke him to ha more shy of embracing any future visits or advice. I bent my discourse, to fit him for his approaching death; and from Scripture demonstrated, that immediately after the soul's expiration; every one is presented by angels good or evil, (according as their state is, in which they die) before the dreadful tribunal of Christ, the most impartial righteous judge of all men. And that of what nature the sentence which then passed was of, it was irrepeatable: Therefore he could not be too circumspect in trying his heart-frame, which is naturally deceitful; for if his faith and repentance, (the only qualifications and evidences of a future happy state) were not solidly built on Christ, as the rock of salvation, after his being adjudged, there could not be any retrieval of the sentence, though it were to the eternal banishment of his soul from the bliss-making vision, and fruition of the God of glory. This awakened him to some remorse for the sins of his life. I then proceeded to advise him, not to venture to die in the Romish persuasion; for this could not produce solid nor lasting tranquillity in any conscience, perplexed and defiled with the guilt of the least sin. In as much as papists build their hopes of future happiness on corrupt principles, viz. they mix the belief of the falsities of the Apostolical-Trent-council with the articles of the Apostolical creed; which can never cement into any consistency of truth, either in matters of faith, or practice. I did undertake to discover the notorious absurdity of some popish opinions; in doing which, he was not only very attentive, but said, he did not believe many things which the doctors of the Romish church teach, as necessary to be embraced for articles of the true faith.

I told him, I hoped that he was not stubborn in that heresy, having declared himself better informed. Yet he did not deny that he was a papist. After much discourse, I drew out a little Treatise of one Mr. Bradshaw's, which states in short, but very solid theses, or propositions, the true nature of justification by faith in Christ; and oppugns, yea, overthrows the popish doctrine of good works, as meritorious of salvation: I lent it Mr. Berry, who having read it, liked it, and said, He was much settled and confirmed in the belief of that sound and comfortable doctrine. He often admitted me to pray for, and with him; he was not afraid to be infected with the breath of an heretic, as Mr. Coleman and others of the fraternity in conspiracy were. I doubt not but wholesome counsel, and fervent prayer, wrought much on Mr. Berry, to bring him to some remorse for his sinfulness; for he gave an eminent signal of this in declaring that God had justly left him to fall under the sentence of so shameful a death, for his notorious dissimulation; which was this, viz. That he had for his private interest, and to supply some wants he was in, changed his protestant profession, and turned papist, against the dictates of his conscience, to get into employment by favour of that party. This he affirmed more wounded his conscience, than all the sins which he had committed in the whole course of his life. Yet still he was very shy and reserved, as unto any acknowledgment of the notorious murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey. But take notice, that a sincere conscience doth not content itself with the confession only of some particular sin, but is most free and ready to take the shame of every sin, especially of such a crime as wilful murder, clearly proved against him. And that none are such proper objects of God's just condemnation, as such, who to cover any one sin, though never so small, will study evasions, to deny, conceal, or extenuate it.

Thus to cover sin, is to add sin to sin. The obligation to punishment takes faster hold, the guilt remains incapable of being pardoned: the sin not content, rankles and festers in the conscience, haunts the sinner as an affrighting ghost, yea, the contagious poison spreads, till it grow so strong in the malignity of it, that it damns eternally.

This alarm (or awakening consideration) I gave to Berry, that I might excite him to an ingenuous confession of the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey; and beside, I told him, that there was this danger in not confessing a crime, that it hardens the heart insensibly, to an impudent and impenitent peremptory denial of it. And that this was the blackest mark of a reprobate. Afterward I prayed with him, and the Lord (who is the searcher of all hearts, and the just avenger of all lying and false appeals) would incline him to an hearty and free acknowledgment of this very crime; that he would grant him true and deep repentance, and strengthen his faith in the merit of Christ's blood, for expiation of so great guilt. Berry had a reprieve for some time to fit himself for death, and I hope he made good use and improvement of it. For when the morning came, wherein he was to be executed, I found him in a more penitent, melting frame than before. I prayed with him at his execution. I must do him this right, as to say, that he was in a very serious composed temper; for I have seldom heard any malefactor (at the public place of suffering) express himself in such suitable and heart-broken petitions for divine pardon, and receiving grace, as Berry did: he needed not a prayer book in his hand; his soul-agonies taught him to pray; nor did he let fall any thing, which smelt in the least of popish leaven: His prayer was fervent and very composed, though death stared him in the face; yet was he not under any consternation or dejection. He said not any thing, either in asserting his innocence as to the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, neither as to the religion he died in. He fixt his eye upward; and looked not upon the people, being very intentive on the great work he was about. I gave him a large time to prepare and fit himself to die: He made some secret ejaculations of his heart Heavenward: then taking a solemn farewell, I desired him to resign himself up to the mercies of God in the alone and all-sufficient merits of Christ, and so I went out of the cart; and after a little time of consideration with himself, the sentence of death was executed upon him.

AN ACCOUNT of the FIVE JESUITS, condemned to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, on Saturday the 14th of June, 1679, viz. Whitebread, Harcourt, Fenwick, Gawen, and Turner.

These five Jesuits having received the aforesaid sentence, for conspiring the death of the king, and the subversion of the Protestant Religion, I did on the Monday following (because the duty of my office as ordinary obliged me.) offer to them my assistance to prepare them for their execution; but they did not admit me to their chambers: Thereupon, I desisted from any farther offer to visit them. Yet upon the day of their execution I waited for an opportunity to speak with them before they were conducted to the sledges.

I. Mr. HARCOURT.

Mr. Harcourt was first brought down from his chamber, to be carried up to the chapel, where a door opens to convey them down the stairs more conveniently to the sledges.

I thus spake to Mr. Harcourt, Sir, you did not think fit to admit me to any discourse in your chamber, but now that you are upon the very borders of death and must be judged to an eternal state in happiness or misery, consider well how heinous the crime is for which you are to suffer death. Beg of God to give you true repentance unto life eternal, and do not stand out in the denying or extenuation of your crime.

Mr. Harcourt made me this slight answer, "That I needed not to trouble myself concerning him, for he knew his duty;" and so past away from me.

II. Mr. WHITEBREAD.

Then came Mr. Whitebread from his chamber; I said something of advice to him as a dying man, and told him withal, that I had earnestly prayed that God would give him repentance, in order to pardoning grace and salvation. This he resented with more calmness and modesty of spirit than Harcourt did, and put off his hat to me at parting.

III. Mr. FENWICK.

I had longer discourse with Fenwick in a little room alone by himself. I did address myself to him in more pathetic expressions, than to the two other, because I had more opportunity for it. In sum, I wished him to search his heart, because every man's by nature is as doubtful as it is corrupt. That he would pray to God to undeceive him, as to any false hopes of Heaven, and not build on any sandy foundation, by trusting to any humiliation for sin, or the merits of any saint or angel; and that he would not stand out in denying of his crime. That he would consider seriously of that sacred scripture in the twenty eighth of the Prov. of Solomon, the thirteenth verse, He who hides his sin shall not prosper in the attempting of it, but rather exposes himself to a curse. But whosoever confesses and forsakes his sin, shall obtain mercy. He said, that he had confest betwixt God and himself, and that was sufficient.

I told him, that in respect of the greater scandal he had given, and reproach he had brought upon religion, which obliges to all fidelity towards princes, and forbids the subversion of a lawful government, he ought to express great sorrow for, and detestation of such principles which destroy human society.

But he angrily replied, "What? do you undertake to instruct me, or others of my order, as if we were not men of reason and learning?" I told him, that I was bound to assist him as a dying man, and to put him in mind of seeking his soul's salvation, in a right way. And that, whereas he slighted my advice, he ought not to look upon any Protestant divine, to be like their novices, whom they train up in ignorance, as if it were the mother of devotion.

I said, that I stood amazed, that any man of his learning should so far forfeit the repute thereof and all the sentiments of a good conscience, as to adhere to principles so destructive to all order, equity, and government established by light of nature, even among savages.

He was not pleased with my discourse, yet I did assure him, I would not desist praying for him, while I could rationally think that he was alive, and within the reach or benefit of my prayers. And so we parted.

IV, V. Mr. GAWEN and Mr. TURNER.

I could not speak with Gawen or Turner till they were placed in the sledge. I spake but little to them, time, and the noise of the people thronging me, would not permit me to say much. Only I told Mr. Gawen, that now death stared him in the face and his judgment to an eternal state was very near; therefore I advised him not to palliate or extenuate his great crime, much less to deny it; for, he would hazard his salvation, if he went out of the world with a falsity in his mouth.

I told him I had and would continue to pray for him and his fellow-criminal in the sledge with him. So wishing them a penitential frame of heart, that they might obtain eternal life in Christ, upon the drawing away of the sledge, Mr. Gawen shewed a public signal of civility to me, and thanked me. He seemed much more cheerful than the rest. And I hope he had better grounds for it.

Mr. LANGHORN.

After sentence of death past upon the said unhappy gentleman, as being involved in the Jesuitical Conspiracy against the king and nation; I addressed myself in a visit to him, which he accepted. When I first came into his chamber, I told him, that I came not to upbraid a dying man, though of a contrary religion: that

I pitied him, as a condemned criminal: yet was more troubled, that he should espouse the Popish persuasions so far, as to suspend, or renounce rather, the sentiments of right reason, in embracing and adhering to so corrupt and absurd opinions. He answered me, "That he thought himself in a surer way for to attain salvation, than any of my opinion could set themselves in. For Protestants," said he, "follow the mistakes of their private judgments; and then cry them up, for the genuine interpretation of the Holy Scriptures. But we," said he, "who are Roman Catholics, have the conduct of an infallible guide, to interpret obscure ambiguities in the Scriptures: for no Scripture is of any private interpretation; otherwise, well-meaning persons may propose, and put off their fancies, for solid conclusions, drawn from the sacred Records of God's word." He said, "That therefore, there was great need of an external, supreme, infallible judge on earth; whose decision upon appeals, can only state and determine all controversies about matters of faith and practice." I replied, that the Divine Authority of God, as impressed upon the veracity of the Scriptures, was never separated from the same spirit, who did dictate them, as unto special guidance; so far, as not to desert sincere Christians, that should they fall into any damnable heresy. But I feared, that the Romish opinions were such, though they be imposed to be believed and obeyed, upon the score of the Pope's infallibility, equally with the sacred Scriptures. What blasphemy is this, for a sinful man to arrogate the title of Infallible, due only to God, the fountain and archetype of all truth! That the Father of lights, gave mankind the best and safest conduct of his own holy, infallible spirit, in matters aforesaid. And that the Scriptures, being exemplified from his essential purity and veracity, were not defective as human laws; which require an external judge and interpreter, distinct from themselves, in their original constitution. So that, in all things necessary to Salvation, the Scriptures were a perfect rule and standard, to dictate and determine matters of faith, and Christian obedience. Yet so arrogant is the pope, as to challenge an authority to himself, to give the Scriptures a sanction; yea, to over-rule them by his corrupt traditions, which he declares infallible. Thus he exautorates, and invalidates their divine original, and superintendency; as if they received all the life of their interpretation, from his authoritative dilucidation, as the moon doth her light from the sun. Hence it is, that when the pope enters into any council, he hath the Bible placed under his feet, while singly himself over-rules the council; and exalts his sole determination above the sacred records of truth. Hence it is, that under a pretence, that the Scriptures are obscure, and a dead letter in themselves, that they must be animated with his traditions, though never so absurd and contradictory to their divine authority, certainty, and perfection.

Also I said, That where the Scriptures were obscure in one place, they explained that ambiguity in another: so that, there was no need of any external judge. And that Protestant Divines did not give out their private sentiments, and interpretations of the Scriptures, for laws, to supersede the innate authority of the Scriptures; or to oblige Christians to an implicit faith and obedience, as the Pope doth; who over-rules the very Scriptures themselves: so that, no part of them is canonical, but only those books, which he declares to be such. Thus a sinful man judges that sacred law, by which himself, and all men must be judged; though he claim a power to pardon sin, and dispose of the eternal rewards of virtue, or vice; accordingly as himself pleases to determine the nature and circumstances of both. Hence I said, It proceeded, that the opinions of the Romish Church were so corrupt, as moulded and adapted to serve and promote the carnal interest of his ambition, and the licentiousness of his followers.

Then he asked me, Whether I did not think, that the Popish and Protestant religion might not be reducible into a coalition or unity? I answered, No; because they were so contrariant, that they could never cement, so as to yield a safe conduct to eternal life. Inasmuch, as Christ himself averred, That in vain do all such worship him, who teach for divine doctrines, the traditions of men: that whosoever adds or diminishes from Scriptural fundamentals, despises, and seeks to nullify the wisdom and authority of God himself. That Popish principles undermine, and subvert the all-sufficiency of Christ, in the execution of his offices. That as Socinians cannot be accounted Christians, who deny the divinity of Christ's person; so Romanists, who invalidate his offices, are Anti-Christian, in their spirits, and in their misbelief.

Therefore, there is no more hope, that two religions so opposite, should ever cement in one, according to the analogy of faith, prescribed by Christ; than that light and darkness should agree, or have fellowship.

Nor can there be any colour of right reason, for that distinction; that Popish traditions are rather beside the rule and dictates of the Scriptures, than directly contrary to them. For, whatever is not agreeable to the revealed, perfect will of God, either directly, or by natural consequence, or by right deduction, it is a sin. Consider, There is as little hope and comfort for that person, who falls into a river, by slipping betwixt, or beside the bridge; as for him, who directly casts himself into it. Both may be drowned irrecoverably. The one, out of the inadvertency, or mistake of a drunken giddiness: the other, out of the presumption of a sullen obstinacy. There are more ways which lead to death, than the direct stabbing of one's self. So, transgression on the right-hand, in a superstitious zeal, may ruin a man's soul, as certainly, as down-right atheism and prophaneness.

After these discourses, I asked Mr. Langborne, That I might pray with him? He answered me, No; yet, I desire your prayers at home. He said, That prayer in presence, was an Act of Communion; but it was unfit, to join with one, who was not a member of the Roman Church. I replied, That I thought, there was little or no difference in such distinct praying; however, it could not be any unlawful act. He would not admit me to pray with him: therefore, to root out such a scruple, I shall state now, more at large, what I then spake more succinctly. Is not prayer an universal duty, and a testification of Christian charity? Therefore, to limit it only to such, who are adopted into any faction, is to look on all others, as excommunicated from Christ, and the hope of salvation by him, as the only head; who influences the Universal Church, with the spirit of faith, unity, and concord.

Can any Papist think to receive benefit by prayer, himself being absent; who hath not so much charity, as to bear Protestants' presence, in praying together? What proud singularity is this? What inconveniency can happen, from a Protestant's joining with a Papist in prayer, if they do not mix their private opinions (which are fitter for a disputation) in the time of praying together? Such imprudence would turn prayer, which is the badge of Christian Communion, into an occasion of reproach; and imbitter each others spirits, to remain at a farther distance. To prevent such a mischief, let them consent, that they will keep close to Scripture-matter, and phrases in prayer; because in these, they are agreed. So shall they not grieve each other, by an uncharitable exagitating and venting of their private opinions. Yet I deny not, but that they ought to desire of God, that he would clear up to them his truth and ways more fully; and that, in whatever they dissent, by way of mistake about opinions foreign to the essential parts, and fundamentals of Christian Religion, they may come to a right understanding of each other; and may recede from any false mixtures, super-added to Christ's pure religion. Therefore, to deny any Protestant Divine, to pray with Popish persons condemned, when they cannot have the relief thereof, from any of their own persuasion; lest they should confirm them in their corrupt principles, or join wicked counsels, to diffuse their treasonable designs, by messages, to put Plots in execution, is a warrant to deny them the assistance of their own party. Yet they stick not, to grow sullen and insolent, in rejecting the prayers of Protestant Divines.

How careless of, and cruel to their own souls, are such, who will not by all lawful helps, secure and promote their souls everlasting blessedness! Is not this such a breach of charity, as to make void their own prayers for themselves? and to limit Christian Religion, only to the Roman Church, which is but a corner of the Christian world; and cannot be properly Catholic, unless it embrace an universal charity for all Christians, who profess the same Christ, and the same fundamentals of Christianity? But Protestants have not so departed from the Church of Rome, as to hate all persons of her society; but only, their corruptions in doctrine and practice. We deny not to them, the duties of common charity; or such requisite assistances at the time of extreme sickness, or death, which may safely consist with their not being confirmed in Popish principles, too deeply rooted in them already; and the consistency of the established government, in the English Church, and state. After these conferences with Mr. Langhorn, I asked him, whether he were the very person accused before the committee of parliament, in 1666; for being conscious, at least, of the conflagration of London, by treachery: because Mr. Richard Langhorn, counsellor at the Temple, is said in a deposition upon oath, to have cast out threatening words about the said conspiracy?—He answered me, That he was the person then accused; but knew no more of the firing of London, than he did of this Plot. But what he knew of this, is sufficiently demonstrated, by his being condemned, and executed for a well-wisher to it, and agent in it. I offered a second visit to him, on the Thursday before his execution; but he sent me thanks, and desired to be wholly retired to himself. So being in the country when he was executed, I cannot give any further account concerning him.

253. The Trial of Sir GEORGE WAKEMAN,* bart. WILLIAM MARSHAL, WILLIAM RUMLEY and, JAMES CORKER,† Benedictine Monks, at the Old Bailey, for High-Treason: 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679.

UPON Friday the 18th of July, 1679, at the Sessions House in the Old Bailey, London, the Court being met, and proclamation made for attendance, the trials proceeded thus:

Clerk of the Crown. Set sir George Wakeman, William Marshal and William Rumley to the bar. Sir George Wakeman, hold up thy hand. Which he did. And so of the other two.

* "Wakeman's trial came on next. Oates swore he saw him write a bill to Ashby the Jesuit, by which he knew his hand: and he saw another letter of his writ in the same hand, in which he directed Ashby, who was then going to the Bath, to use a milk diet and to be pumped at the Bath; and that in that letter he mentioned his zeal in the design of killing the king. He next repeated all the story he had sworn against the queen: Which he brought only to make it probable that Wakeman, who was her physician, was in it. To all this Wakeman objected, that at first Oates accused him only upon hear-say: and did solemnly protest he knew nothing against him: which was fully made out. So he said, all that Oates now swore against him must be a forgery not thought of at that time. He also proved by his own servant, and by the apothecary at the Bath, that Ashby's paper was not writ, but only dictated by him: for he happened to be very weary when he came for it, and his man wrote it out: and that of the milk diet was a plain indication of an ill laid forgery, since it was known that nothing was held more inconsistent with the Bath water than milk. Bedlow swore against him, that he saw him receive a bill of 2,000*l.* from Harcourt in part of a greater sum; and that Wakeman told him afterwards that he had received the money; and that Harcourt told him for what end it was given, for they intended the king should be killed, either by those they sent to Windsor, or by Wakeman's means: and if all other ways failed, they would take him off at Newmarket. Bedlow in the first giving his evidence deposed, that this was said by Harcourt when Wakeman was gone out of the room. But observing, by the questions that were put him, that this would not affect Wakeman, he swore afterwards, that he said it likewise in his hearing. Wakeman had nothing to set against all this, but that it seemed impossible that he could trust himself in such matters to such a person: and if Oates was set aside, he was but one witness. Three other Benedictine priests were tried with Wakeman. Oates swore, that they were in the plot of killing the king; that one of them, being their superior, had engaged to give 6,000*l.* towards the carrying it on. Bedlow swore

" You stand indicted by the names of sir George Wakeman, late of the parish of St. Giles in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, bart. William Marshal, of the same parish and county, gent. and William Rumley, of the same parish and county, gent.: For that you as false traitors against the most illustrious, serene and most excellent prince, Charles the Second, by somewhat circumstantial to the same purpose against two of them: but that did not rise up to be treason: and he had nothing to charge the third with. They proved, that another person had been their superior for several years; and that Oates was never once suffered to come within their house, which all their servants deposed. And they also proved, that when Oates came into their house the night after he made his discovery, and took Pickering out of his bed, and saw them, he said he had nothing to lay so their charge. They urged many other things to destroy the credit of the witnesses: and one of them made a long declamation in a high bombast strain, to shew what credit was due to the speeches of dying men. The eloquence was so forced and childish, that this did them more hurt than good. Scroggs summed up the evidence very favourably for the prisoners, far contrary to his former practice. The truth is, that this was looked on as the queen's trial, as well as Wakeman's. The prisoners were acquitted: and now the witnesses saw they were blasted. And they were enraged upon it; which they vented with much spite upon Scroggs. And there was in him matter enough to work on for such foul-mouthed people as they were. The queen got a man of great quality to be sent over ambassador from Portugal, not knowing how much she might stand in need of such a protection. He went next day with great state to thank Scroggs for his behaviour in this trial. If he meant well in this compliment, it was very unadvisedly done: For the Chief Justice was exposed to much censure by it. And therefore some thought it was a shew of civility done on design to ruin him. For how well pleased soever the Papists were with the success of this trial and with Scroggs's management, yet they could not be supposed to be so satisfied with him, as to forgive his behaviour in the former trials, which had been very indecently partial and violent." Burnet.

† In the following year, Marshal and Corker were, together with others, tried and convicted upon the stat. 27 Eliz. c. 2. See the trials of Anderson alias Munson and others, January 17, 1680: infra. See the stat. in Brommick's Case, Aug. 13, 1679, infra.

the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. your supreme and natural lord; the fear of God in your hearts not having, nor weighing the duty of your allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil; and the cordial love, true, due and natural obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king do and of right ought to bear towards him, our said sovereign lord the king, utterly withdrawing, and endeavouring and intending with all your strength, the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom of England to disturb, and the true worship of God within this kingdom of England used, and by the laws of the same established, to overthrow, and the government of this realm to subvert, and sedition and rebellion within this kingdom of England, to move, stir up and procure, and the cordial love, true, due and natural obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, ought and of right are bound to bear towards him, our said sovereign lord the king, wholly to withdraw, put out and extinguish, and him our said sovereign lord the king, to death and final destruction to bring and put, you the said sir George Wakeman, William Marshal and William Rumley, the 30th day of August, in the 30th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord king Charles the Second, at the parish of St. Giles in the Fields aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, subtilly, advisedly and traitorously did purpose, compass, imagine and intend, sedition and rebellion within this kingdom of England to move, stir up and procure, and miserable slaughter among the subjects of our said sovereign lord the king to cause and procure, and our said sovereign lord the king, from his royal state, title, power and government of his said kingdom of England, wholly to deprive, depose, cast down and disinherit, and him our said sovereign lord the king, to death and final destruction to bring and put, and the government of this kingdom of England, and the sincere religion of God, within the same rightly and by the laws of the same established, at your will and pleasure to change and alter; and the state of this whole kingdom of England, through all its parts well instituted and ordained, wholly to subvert and destroy; and war against our said sovereign lord the king, within this kingdom of England, to levy; and to accomplish and fulfil those your most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes, you the said sir George Wakeman, William Marshal and William Rumley, and other false traitors unknown, the aforesaid 30th day of August, with force and arms at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, maliciously, subtilly, advisedly and traitorously did assemble, unite and gather yourselves together; and then and there, falsely, maliciously, subtilly, advisedly, devilishly and traitorously did consult, consent and agree, our said sovereign lord the king, to death and final destruction to bring and put; and the religion within this kingdom of England rightly and by the laws of the same established, to change and alter to the superstition of the Church of Rome; and to move, procure and persuade them, the said William Marshal, William Rumley and other false traitors unknown, the agreement aforesaid to fulfil and accomplish, you the said sir George Wakeman, after, to wit, the said 30th day of August, in the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, to them the said William Marshal, William Rumley and other false traitors unknown, did traitorously promise to give your assistance, the government of this kingdom to subvert, and the true worship of God, in this realm rightly and by the laws thereof established and used, to the superstition of the Church of Rome to alter: And that you the said sir George Wakeman, then and there, falsely, maliciously, subtilly, advisedly, devilishly and traitorously, did undertake to kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king: And in further prosecution of the treasons, traitorous conspiracies, intentions and agreements aforesaid, you the said sir George Wakeman, the said 30th day of August, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, traitorously and against the duty of your allegiance, did receive and had (from a certain person unknown, pretending to be provincial of the Jesuits in England, and claiming authority for the granting commissions in that part from the see of Rome,) one commission to institute and authorise you the said sir George Wakeman to be physician-general of the army, to be raised for the waging war against our said sovereign lord the king within this kingdom of England, and the same commission then and there, falsely, advisedly, maliciously and traitorously did inspect and read over, and traitorously did keep in your possession, and to the same falsely, knowingly, advisedly and traitorously did consent and agree, with that intention, that you the said sir George Wakeman should have, receive and exercise the place and office of physician-general of the army aforesaid, when you the said sir George Wakeman, William Marshal, William Rumley and the said other false traitors unknown, should have performed and accomplished your treasons, compassings, imaginations, purposes and traitorous agreements aforesaid. And that you the said William Marshal and William Rumley, in further prosecution of your treasons, traitorous conspiracies, intentions and agreements aforesaid, the said 30th day of August, in the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, did falsely, subtilly and traitorously consult, conclude, consent and agree, that you the said William Marshal, William Rumley and other false traitors unknown, should pay the sum of 6,000*l.* towards furthering and consummating the traitorous agreements aforesaid, amongst the said false traitors had, our said sovereign lord the king to kill and murder, the true worship of God within this realm rightly and by the laws of the same established, to the superstition of the Church of Rome to alter, and the government of this kingdom of England to subvert, against the duty of your allegiance, against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in this case made and provided."

Cl. of the Cr. How sayest thou, sir George Wakeman, art thou guilty of this High-Treason whereof thou standest Indicted or Not Guilty? Sir G. Wakeman. Not Guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried? Sir G. Wakeman. By God and my country.

Cl. of the Cr. God send thee a good deliverance. [And so the other two.]

Cl. of the Cr. Set James Corker to the bar, (who was arraigned, and pleaded last sessions,) James Corker, hold up thy hand. You the prisoners at the bar, sir George Wakeman, William Runley, William Marshal, and James Corker, those men that you shall hear called and personally appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you, upon trial of your several lives and deaths; if therefore you or any of you will challenge them, or any of them, your time is to speak unto them as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn. Call Ralph Hawtrej, esq. who appeared, and there being no challenges the twelve that were sworn are as follows: Ralph Hawtrej of Rishipp, Henry Hawley of New-Brentford, Henry Hodges of Hanwell, Richard Downton of Isleworth, John Bathurst of Edmonton, Robert Hampton of Greenford, William Heyden of Greenford, John Baldwin of Hillingdon, Richard Dobbins of Harvile, William Avery of Enfield, Esquires. William Wayte of St. Clement Danea, gent. Richard White of Cripple-gate, gent.

Cl. of the Cr. Crier, count these. Ralph Hawtrej.

Crier. One, &c.

Cl. of the Cr. Richard White.

Crier. Twelve good men and true, stand together and hear your evidence.

Then the usual Proclamation for information was made, and the Prisoners being bid to hold up their hands, the Clerk of the Crown charged the Jury with them thus.

Cl. of the Cr. You of the Jury look upon the prisoners, and hearken to their cause. They stand indicted by the names of (prout in the Indictment mutatis mutandis) and against the form of the statute in this case made and provided: and he the said James Corker, stands indicted by the name of James Corker of the parish of St. Giles in the fields, in the county of Middlesex, clerk;

"For that he with Thomas White, John Fenwick, William Harcourt, John Gavan, and Anthony Turner, as a false traitor against the most illustrious, most serene, and most excellent prince, Charles the 2nd, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. his supreme and natural lord, not having the fear of God in his heart, nor weighing the duty of his allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, the cordial love, true, due, and natural obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, towards him should, and of right ought to bear, wholly withdrawing; and advising, and with all his strength, intending the peace and common tranquillity of this realm to disturb, and the true worship of God within this kingdom of England used, and by the law established, to overthrow, and the government of this realm to subvert, and sedition, and rebellion within this kingdom of England to move, stir up and procure, and the cordial love, and true and due obedience which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, towards him should, and of right ought to bear utterly to withdraw, put out, and extinguish, and our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to bring, and put, on the 24th day of April, in the 30th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord king Charles the 2nd at the parish of St. Giles in the fields, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid; he the said James Corker, together with the said Thomas White, John Fenwick, William Harcourt, John Gavan, and Anthony Turner, with divers other false traitors subjects of our said sovereign lord the king to the jurors unknown, falsly, subtilly, advisedly, maliciously, and traitorously, did purpose, compass, imagine, and intend sedition and rebellion within this kingdom of England, to move, stir up and procure, and a miserable slaughter among the subjects of our said sovereign lord the king to procure and cause, and our said sovereign lord the king, of his kingly state, title, power, and government of his kingdom of England, utterly to deprive, depose, cast down, and disinherit, and him our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to bring and put, and the government of this kingdom of England, and the sincere religion of God within the same, rightly, and by the laws of the same established, at his will and pleasure, to change and alter, and the state of this whole kingdom of England, through all its parts well instituted and ordained, wholly to subvert and destroy; and war, within this kingdom of England, against our said sovereign lord the king, to levy: and to accomplish and fulfil their said most wicked treasons, and traitorous imaginations and purposes, he the said James Corker, together with the said Thomas White, John Fenwick, William Harcourt, John Gavan, and Anthony Turner, and other false traitors against our said sovereign lord the king, to the jurors unknown, the said 24th day of April, with force and arms, &c. in the parish aforesaid, and county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, subtilly, advisedly, devilishly, and traitorously did assemble, unite, and gather together, and then and there, falsely, maliciously, subtilly, advisedly, devilishly, and traitorously did consult, consent, and agree, our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction to bring and put, and the religion of this kingdom of England, rightly, and by the laws of the same established, to the superstition of the Roman Church to change and alter, and the government of this kingdom of England to subvert; and that one Thomas Pickering, and one John Grove, should kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king; and that he the said James Corker, together with the said Thomas White, John Fenwick, William Harcourt, John Gavan, and Anthony Turner, and other false traitors, against our said sovereign lord the king, to the jurors unknown, should therefore say, celebrate, and perform, a certain number of masses, then and there amongst themselves agreed on, for the soul of the said Thomas Pickering, and for that cause should pay to the said John Grove a certain sum of money, then and there amongst themselves agreed on; and that he the said James Corker, together with the said Thomas White, John Fenwick, William Harcourt, John Gavan, and Anthony Turner, and other false traitors to the jurors unknown, in further prosecution of the treasons and traitorous consultations and agreements aforesaid, afterwards, the said 24th day of April, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, subtly, advisedly, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously, did severally each to the other engage themselves, and upon the sacrament traitorously did swear and promise, to conceal, and not to divulge the said most wicked treasons, and traitorous compassings, consultations, and purposes aforesaid amongst themselves had, traitorously to kill and murder our said sovereign lord the king, and to introduce the Romish religion within this kingdom of England, and the true Reformed religion within this realm, rightly, and by the laws of the same established, to alter and change. And that he the said James Corker, together with the said Thomas White, John Fenwick, William Harcourt, John Gavan, and Anthony Turner, and other false traitors to the jurors unknown, in further prosecution of their said treasons and traitorous intentions and agreement aforesaid, afterwards, the said 24th day of April, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, subtly, advisedly, maliciously, devilishly, and traitorously, did prepare, persuade, excite, abet, comfort and counsel four other persons to the jurors unknown, subjects of our said sovereign lord the king, traitorously our said sovereign lord the king to kill and murder, against the duty of his allegiance, against the peace of our sovereign the king, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in that case made and provided."

Upon these several Indictments they have been arraigned, and thereunto have severally pleaded Not Guilty, and for their trial put themselves on God and their country, which country you are. Your charge is to enquire, whether they be Guilty of the high-treason whereof they stand indicted, in manner and form as they stand indicted, or Not Guilty, &c.

Mr. Edward Ward. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; sir George Wakeman, bart. William Marshal, and William Rumley, the prisoners at the bar, stand indicted; for that they as false traitors against our sovereign lord king Charles the 2nd, their supreme and natural lord, not having the fear of God before their eyes, did traitorously endeavour and intend, with all their strength, the peace and tranquillity of this kingdom of England to disturb, and the worship of God in the same rightly, and by the laws of the same established, and the government of the kingdom in all its parts well instituted and ordered, to subvert and overthrow, and sedition and rebellion within the same to move and procure, and to bring and put the king to death and final destruction; and to that purpose the 30th of August, in the 30th year of the king that now is, they did falsely, maliciously, subtly, advisedly, and traitorously compass, imagine, intend, and devise, those things that I have enumerated to you; that is, sedition and rebellion in the kingdom to move, the peace and tranquillity of the same to disturb, the worship of God to overthrow, and the king from his royal state, title, power and government wholly to depose, and to put the king to death and final destruction, and the religion at their wills and pleasures to alter, and to introduce the Romish superstition, and war within the kingdom to levy against our sovereign lord the king. And to accomplish these treasons and purposes, they the prisoners at the bar, with other false traitors unknown, the day and year beforementioned, did assemble and meet together, and did then and there consent and agree to put the king to death and final destruction. And to persuade Marshal and Rumley to these treasons, the said sir George Wakeman promised his assistance; first, to subvert the government, and then to alter the religion to the Romish superstition, and traitorously undertook to kill the king: And he did receive for that purpose, from the pretended provincial of the Jesuits in England, who claimed an authority from the see of Rome, of granting out commissions, a commission which constituted him Physician-general of the army; which army was to be raised for the levying of war against the king, and the subversion of the government and religion: That he read this commission, that he kept it in his possession, that he consented to it, accepted it, and intended to execute the employment, when their designs were accomplished. The Indictment further sets forth, that Marshal and Rumley, and other false traitors agreed to pay the sum of 6,000*l.* for the carrying on and effecting of this treason; and this is laid, to be against the duty of their allegiance, against the king's peace, crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute. To this indictment they have pleaded not guilty; if we make out these crimes against them, or any of them, you are to find them guilty.

There is also another indicted, that is James

Corker; For that he is a false traitor against the king, and withdrawing his allegiance, and due and natural obedience, which he owed to him, as his sovereign, together with other persons there mentioned, White, Fenwick, Harcourt, Gavau, and Turner, did intend to overthrow the religion, to subvert the government, and to do all those treasons that I have here enumerated, and that they did the 24th of April, in the 30th year of this king, at the parish of St. Giles in the Fields, in your county, compass and imagine the king's death, levying of war, and those other things; and in order thereunto, they did contrive that Pickering and Grove should kill the king, and that Corker and the others should say masses for the soul of Pickering, and should pay Grove a sum of money. That to this they plighted their faith, and received the sacrament upon it; and that Corker and the others, the day and year aforesaid, traitorously persuaded, excited and abetted four other persons to murder the king. To this he hath pleaded Not Guilty; if we prove him Guilty of any of these things, we hope you will find it so.

Sir Robert Sawyer. My Lord, and you Gentlemen of the Jury; The prisoners at the bar with whom you are charged, stand indicted as principal actors and instruments of that late most catholic and bloody plot some time since discovered; and I hope, by the blessing of Almighty God in a great measure prevented. The design, gentlemen, was against the King and the Church; both Church and State were too little a sacrifice to be offered up to the universal supremacy of Rome. They well knew, gentlemen, that so long as God should preserve the life of our prince, and as long as those legal pales, wherewith the Church of England is encompassed, did but continue firm, neither the gates of hell nor Rome could prevail against it. And I wish that all Protestants were of the same mind.

I shall not enter now into any large discourse of it, nor trace the several steps of this Plot, which is so well known to all men of this nation at this day, but only touch upon those parts of it that do concern the prisoners now at the bar, unless they shall give me occasion to recur to any former passages. Gentlemen, we shall make proof to you, that the 24th of April, 1678, there was a very great consult of a numerous company of Jesuits here in London; and there was the foundation laid, or at least the execution was then determined of bringing this plot to its accomplishment. To this consult we shall make it appear, that the gentlemen at the bar were privy and consenting to it. The king must die, that is resolved on, and you have heard formerly of the several ways that it was to be acted; some persons were designed to shoot him, these have received their trial and condign punishment; then there was another set, and they were to stab him, and some of these have been brought to justice too; but then there was a third sort,

(for they did invent all the imaginable ways of death) and that was poisoning; and that will come principally before you at this time. And they had chosen out a very proper instrument for it, a gentleman whose experience rendered him able, and whose near relation to and dependence upon the royal family, gave him a great opportunity to commit that horrid crime. But, gentlemen, though his persuasion might go a great way, yet he would not do it gratis, and thereupon he must be hired for a great sum of money, not under 15,000*l.* and then he undertook that great employment.

We shall prove to you, that this was his bargain, that part of his wages he had received, for he would be sure of something in hand before the work were done. We shall make it appear, gentlemen, that he was privy also to the consult (for I apply myself at present peculiarly to him) and approved of it. And as a farther reward, besides that of money, he was to be preferred to be physician-general of the army that was then to be raised, that employment was designed for him; nay, he accepted of the commission, as we shall endeavour to prove to you.

We shall also prove, that the other gentlemen at the bar, the other malefactors that stand there, were privy to the great consult of the death of the king. That there was 6,000*l.* which was to be furnished by the Benedictine monks; for though the Jesuits were the great engineers, yet all the other orders were to contribute, and 6,000*l.* was to be furnished by them. And in the course of our evidence we shall give you several instances which will concern all these particular prisoners now at the bar; and one truly that there was such a design of poisoning, which is very remarkable, and that was from a very great engineer that hath suffered already, and that was Mr. Ireland; and wherein I must desire that you would observe another thing that falls out very materially, that though Mr. Ireland, at the time of his death, and all along, disowned that he was here in London in August, and with great asseverations did affirm it, it will appear by the course of our evidence that he was here in London then, and had frequently discoursed that it was an easy matter to take off the king by poison; and for that purpose do I mention it to you as an instance that poison was one of the great ways that they intended to murder the king by. And, gentlemen, you will collect from that evidence, what credit is fit to be given to the words of such dying men, and whether living witnesses that are upon their oaths, are not rather to be believed, than those whose concern it is for more reasons than one to persuade the people that they are innocent. And you will likewise collect that those who have lived in the sin of committing such horrid crimes as these are, will not stick to protect that same church (which they would propagate by those crimes) by denying the plainest truth. We will not trouble you any further with the opening of the evidence, because the witnesses are many, and their testimony various; but we shall call our witnesses, and let them tell it you themselves.

Mr. Ward. Call Dr. Oates, Mr. Bedlow, Mr. Dugdale, Mr. Jennison, and Mr. Praunce, (who were all sworn, and Mr. Dugdale set up.)

Sir Robert Sawyer. Gentlemen, we call first Mr. Dugdale to give you a general account of the plot, not so much for the proof of the things here charged particularly on the prisoners, as the general design.

Mr. Ward. Prny, Sir, speak your knowledge of what you know concerning the plot in general.

Dugdale. I have for these seven years known something of it, but nothing particularly til within these two years. About two years since it was communicated to me by Mr. Ewers, Mr. Gavan, Mr. Peters, Mr. Lewson, and some other priests, which I cannot now remember their names, and they did persuade me to be of the management of the business, for the carrying on of the design, for the introducing their religion, and for the killing of the king and the duke of Monmouth; both those two things were communicated to me, upon my oath, by Mr. Gavan, Mr. Ewers, Mr. Peters, Mr. Lewson, and my lord Stafford.

Mr. Justice Atkins. What, Mr. Gavan that was executed, do you mean?

Dugdale. Yes, he was the man, I have had several packets of letters which concerned the plot: all the letters that came from Mr. Harcourt, or from any others concerning the plot, were directed to me: I have had sometimes eight, sometimes nine, sometimes more letters at a time, but I never saw any, almost, but they all tended to the carrying on of this design.

L. C. J. (Sir W. Scroggs) Did they shew you these letters, or did you open them?

Dugdale. I did open several of them, a great many, and some of them that I could not handsomely seal up again, I kept.

L. C. J. They did not know you opened them?

Dugdale. No, they did not all the time.

L. C. J. To what purpose did they write?

Dugdale. My lord, they were to give instructions to Mr. Ewers how he should manage the affairs for carrying on the design, how he must go about for the raising of money, and for the engaging the gentlemen in the country, as particularly Mr. Gerard of Hilderson, and Mr. Howard of Horecross, and sir James Simons, and one gentleman that is dead, one captain Atherley, and several other gentlemen were engaged in it, to be officers when they had accomplished their business of killing the king.

Sir R. Sawyer. You say they were to be officers; what, were they to be military officers, or what?

Dugdale. Yes, they were to be military officers.

Sir R. Sawyer. Was there an army to be raised?

Dugdale. Yes, there was an army spoken of to be raised.

Sir R. Sawyer. By whom?

Dugdale. There was money ready in July last, for I saw acquittances that came from St. Omers that the money was paid. But then there was caution given to be sure not to make any rumour of arms or any thing, till the king was dispatched.

L. C. J. Did they write that in a letter?

Dugdale. They writ that in a letter directed to me.

L. C. J. To you?

Dugdale. Yes, to me.

L. C. J. Who writ that letter?

Dugdale. My lord, truly I cannot be certain at present who it was; but upon recollection I can, may be, remember who it was: but it contained that there should be caution given to all, to be sure that none should mention arms, or any thing, till the king was dispatched.

Sir R. Sawyer. From whence did that letter come?

Dugdale. From Mr. Harcourt, I am certain, and in Mr. Grove's packet; but I am not certain of the person that writ the letter, but I can recollect hereafter, perhaps, who it was.

L. C. J. Did it come from beyond sea, or London?

Dugdale. It came from London, but I suppose it came thither from beyond sea.

L. C. J. The letter came to you, you say; was it dated from any place, and what?

Dugdale. I am not certain whether it was; there was several letters that came from all parts, some from St. Omers, some from Paris, some from Rome.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray what do you know of any correspondence that was between your principal agents in Staffordshire, and those conspirators here at London?

Dugdale. Yes, there was a correspondence between them.

L. C. J. Between whom? Name them.

Dugdale. Betwixt Mr. Ewers, Mr. Gavan, and Mr. Vavator, these were in Staffordshire; and betwixt Mr. Ireland, Mr. Harcourt, Mr. Fenwick and Mr. Grove, these I know.

L. C. J. Where were these last?

Dugdale. In London these persons were, they did write constantly three times a week letters into Staffordshire about this business.

L. C. J. But pray was there any thing mentioned in any of these letters concerning killing the king?

Dugdale. Yes, there was.

L. C. J. Was there any thing plain of that in those letters?

Dugdale. There was in one from Mr. Whitebread.

L. C. J. What did that letter say?

Dugdale. There was one from him that did give a caution to Mr. Ewers, that he should be sure to choose no persons but such as were stout and hardy, or to that effect.

L. C. J. To do what?

Dugdale. To kill the king.

L. C. J. Was that expressed in the letter?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord, it was.

L. C. J. And did they write that they should choose hardy persons to kill the king? Was that the subject of it?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord, it was.

L. C. J. Did it come by the common post?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord, it did; but they had devised it so, that there was care taken they should not be discovered, they would set but two letters of their names to them, and they were directed all to me, so that I was to bear all the danger.

Sir R. Sawyer. How was the direction? Was it directed plainly to you on the out-side?

Dugdale. Yes, it was; and if it were discovered, I was sworn by Mr. Ewers to deny it, and then they could not be discovered.

Just. Atkins. Did they give you any oath to that purpose?

Dugdale. Yes, I was sworn ten times at least to secrecy, and promised it on the Sacrament.

Sir R. Sawyer. Besides what came in those letters, had you any discourse with any touching killing the king?

Dugdale. Yes.

Sir R. Sawyer. With whom?

Dugdale. With Mr. Gavan, Mr. Ewers, Mr. Lewson, and my lord Stafford.

L. C. J. And would they have persuaded you to have done it?

Dugdale. Yes, I was to have been employed as an actor in it, either to have taken his life away, by shooting, or by stabbing, or some way.

L. C. J. Did they propose it to you, and how, in what manner would they have you do it?

Dugdale. No, my lord, I was not told absolutely in what manner; but I was directed to come to London, and I should have instructions about it there.

L. C. J. Tell us again who they were that did solicit you?

Dugdale. Mr. Ewers, Mr. Gavan, Mr. Peters, Mr. Lewson, and my lord Stafford.

Just. Atkins. My lord Stafford you say?

Dugdale. Yes, I said so before, my lord.

L. C. J. They engaged you in the business in general, you say, and you were to have directions about it at London, that is that you say?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord, Mr. Ireland was to take care of me there.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, Sir, had you discourse of the several ways, what ways were to be taken?

Dugdale. I had no particular way mentioned, but I was told that it was easy to be done by shooting or stabbing.

L. C. J. Did you ever come to London upon that errand?

Dugdale. No, never.

L. C. J. When they had engaged you to do the thing, why did not they send you about it?

Dugdale. I was not to come till October.

L. C. J. When was it that you were engaged first?

Dugdale. I had particular intimation of the matter of the Plot about two years before, but I was not to come up till October.

L. C. J. Which October?

Dugdale. Last October.

L. C. J. Why, you were engaged a great while before, how chanced you were not to come up till October?

Dugdale. I was engaged a year and a half before, but it was not positively then said to me, that I was to be instrumental in killing the king, till that time, which was about July, when my lord Stafford came down, and I was to come up in October.

L. C. J. I thought you had said that you were engaged in it a year and half before.

Dugdale. That was only in the Plot in general.

L. C. J. Was there no time appointed for the killing the king then? When was it that you were first engaged to be an instrument to take away the king's life?

Dugdale. Two years ago I was spoke to about the Plot, but I was not particularly assigned till the last summer, and then I was appointed to come to London in October.

L. C. J. What said they then to you?

Dugdale. My lord Stafford did offer me 500*l.* he told me I should have that for a reward at present, and if things did go on, I should have a better reward when the thing was accomplished, but this was for my present encouragement.

L. C. J. When were you to have the money?

Dugdale. When I came to London.

L. C. J. And why did not you come to London then?

Dugdale. I was to come to London, and the Plot was broke out and discovered first.

Mr. Ward. Pray, do you know of any letters about the death of sir Edmundbury Godfrey?

Dugdale. Yes, there was a letter came down to my lord Aston's, it was directed to Mr. Ewers, and it contained in it, 'This very night sir Edmundbury Godfrey is dispatched;' those were the words of the letter.

L. C. J. What night was that?

Dugdale. I have well remembered it since, and it was Saturday night, which was about the 12th of October, or thereabouts, as I remember: it had those words, 'This very night sir Edmundbury Godfrey is dispatched;' and it went on with more things relating to the Plot, which I cannot particularly now remember; and I caught Mr. Ewers at the reading of it, and said I to him, 'Do you think this is the way to have the Design succeed? if this do not overthrow the Plot, I will be hanged.' 'Not so,' said he, 'be patient, and do not mistrust it, he was a man that was used to punish debauched persons, and it will rather reflect upon them than us.'

L. C. J. Did that letter come to your hands?

Dugdale. Yes, it did, but it was writ to Mr. Ewers.

Just. Atkins. What day did it come to you?

Dugdale. Upon Monday morning.

Just. Atkins. When was it writ?

Dugdale. It was writ the Saturday night before.

L. C. J. Did Mr. Ewers shew it you? or did you break open the letter?

Dugdale. Mr. Ewers shewed it me for an encouragement, that one of our enemies was taken out of the way.

Just. Wyndham. Did you report it to any body?

Dugdale. Yes, to the parson of the town, and a relation of my lord Aston's.

L. C. J. What was his name?

Dugdale. One Mr. Sandwich and Mr. Philips; said I, 'Do you not hear of a knight, a justice of Westminster, that is killed?' 'No,' said they, 'we hear nothing of it;' but it seems Mr. Sandwich went to dinner to—and there he did report it.

L. C. J. Why did they look upon sir E. Godfrey as such an enemy to them?

Dugdale. They had intrusted him before, but he began to be strict with Dr. Oates, searching and prying into all the whole concern, as Mr. Ewers told me (for I knew no more than he informed me of) so they thought good to take him off.

Sir R. Sawyer. Gentlemen, will you ask him any questions?

Corker. I would have been glad to have heard what he said, but I could not hear the tenth part.

Sir R. Sawyer. Gentlemen, there is nothing that does particularly reflect upon you at the bar, but is only to prove the general design of the Plot.

Sir George Wakeman. It is the worst made out that ever I think was trial.

Dugdale. If there be any more questions, that your lordship or the Court will be pleased to ask me, I will be sure to answer them.

L. C. J. I will tell you the effect of what he says, and that is this; he speaks in general, that there was a Plot to bring in Popery, and in order to that, the best way was to kill the king; and to that purpose, there were several letters sent weekly into Staffordshire, and very often directed by the cover to him, wherein were seven or eight several letters, as from Ireland, and Harcourt, and Grove, to people that were in Staffordshire; that is, to Ewers, and Lewson, and Vavasor; and many times they did write concerning the going on with this Plot of killing the king, that they must use great secrecy in it, and makes mention what officers they should have for an army to support that matter, when they had done; they engaged him particularly first, about two years ago, to be one in it, but more precisely in June or July last was twelve-month, and he should have gone, he says, in October after, up to London, in order to it; and there he should have directions from Ireland, how he should manage himself. And he gives you an account, that my lord Stafford promised him he should have 500*l.* as part of his reward, and when the work was done, he should be better gratified; and he says, he did intend to have gone up in October to this purpose, but the Plot broke out, and he was prevented.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, Mr. Dugdale, you have been formerly examined, did you hear any thing of a massacre? or of any particular persons to be murdered, besides the king and duke of Monmouth?

Dugdale. I do not remember any in particular, but they two; but in general, all protestants they intended to cut off.

Mr. Ward. All protestants?

Dugdale. Yes.

Just. Atkins. Pray, Sir, what did induce them to have so much confidence in you? Had you any such zeal for their religion?

Dugdale. Yes, insomuch that they thought I was a priest in the country.

Just. Atkins. Had you been free of your purse? did you give them any money?

Dugdale. Yes, I gave them for this, and for the praying for my soul, the sum of 400*l.* which was secured upon a deed of land; and I promised them another 100*l.* when they made moan for the want of money; and when Mr. Peters said if they did not make more haste with their contributions, they should be at a great loss: And Mr. Gavan promised me, I should be canonized for a saint.

L. C. J. When had you given the 400*l.*

Dugdale. I had given it them in money, it was upon a deed of land, which was conveyed to Mr. Gerrard, and was to be sold for the raising of that money.

Corker. Mr. Dugdale, you make mention of a certain letter sent from London here, from Mr. Harcourt; but not Mr. Harcourt's letter, in which letter you say it was mentioned that the king should be killed, and that an army should be raised, and some such matters of grand design. Sir, don't you know from whom that letter came, I ask you?

Dugdale. I cannot directly at present call to mind the person's name, I may by and by, perhaps.

Corker. Then, my lord, I appeal to the court and beg the judgment of the court, whether a letter of that vast concernment about killing the king, the destruction of the nation, and the raising of an army, should be sent from a man that he himself does not, nor can tell his name, nor the place this letter came from. That a man should be so mad to send by the common post a letter of such vast concern, and yet neither the party to whom, nor the party from whom it came, be remembered.

Dugdale. I can give you satisfaction, as to some letters I have received, and I can tell you in particular from whence they came. One came from Paris to St. Omers, and so from St. Omers to London, and from thence by a special messenger to Tixall in Staffordshire; and my lord Aston and Mr. Ewers read it one night in my sight, in the parlour.

Corker. Just now he said it was by a special messenger; before he said, the letters came by a common post.

Dugdale. I speak of another letter now, than those I spake of before.

L. C. J. He did, indeed, say before, that there was a letter as you repeat it, that had the importance of killing the king, but he could not particularly charge himself with the person that writ it, but, saith he, I can now remember another letter, that was sent by a special messenger, and he will tell you who that letter was writ by, and who it came from. From whom came it?

Corker. That was only to correct a former lie.

Dugdale. There was J. W. writ to it, and I suppose it was from sir John Warner.

L. C. J. Where was it dated? Whence did it come?

Dugd. There was one from Paris, it was first began at Paris where advice was first to be had, and assistance was promised, how it should be carried on, and they thought it was the best way, after they had killed the king, for the papists to give the first alarm, that it was those still king-killing presbyterians that had done that act, and that then the church of England men would be willing to join with the papists to cut them off.

L. C. J. This was the substance of the letter?

Dugdale. Yes, this was the substance of the letter. And the letters from London said, they thought it good advice, and there were several lords in England set their hands to it, acknowledging it as good advice: And in that very letter there was an army mentioned, that there should be an army ready to cut off those that should escape having their throats cut.

L. C. J. Who brought that letter?

Dugdale. I do not know who brought it from London to Boscobel, but there was a special messenger brought it thence to Tixall, and his name was Carrington.

L. C. J. You say there were several lords set their hands to it; what lords were they?

Dugdale. I have formerly mentioned them, there was my lord Stafford, my lord Bellasis, and my lord Arundel.

L. C. J. To what purpose did they set their hands to it?

Dugdale. That they approved it as good advice.

L. C. J. Then, gentlemen, this is that he says, here is a letter that was brought by one Carrington, to my lord Aston's, and the substance of the letter was to justify the killing of the king, by the raising of an army, and that this letter came from St. Omers, and that it had the letters J. W. subscribed to it, which was supposed to be sir John Warner, and that this letter was looked upon by some at London, and that they, as approving of it, set their hands to it as good advice, and then sent it down into the country.

Corker. Was the letter dated from St. Omers? Was St. Omers writ, in the inside, what say you? Speak.

Dugdale. There were three letters, I say, that came in that packet from St. Omers; one came from Paris, another from St. Omers, and another from London.

L. C. J. And all these in one cover?

Dugdale. Yes.

Sir G. Wakeman. How could the same cover cover all those letters?

Dugdale. All these letters were covered in Grove's packet.

L. C. J. Here is the matter; he supposes there was a letter writ, first at Paris, and that is then sent to St. Omers; and then there was a letter writ there, by sir John Warner, or some of them, and sent to London, perused in England by the lords, and all sent in one cover into Staffordshire.

Corker. Your lordship makes sense of it, but he made none but contradictions, and said he did not know whence it came, nor who writ it. You say, sir, you were one of those to kill the king? pray when were you to kill the king?

Dugdale. In October, I was to have done it, when I came up.

Corker. My lord, here is a plot and design driven on several ways, to murder the king. Dr. Oates in his Narrative,* as I perceive, gives us a description of several contrivances that were made use of to commit this murder. He in all his descriptions, tells us only, as I take it, of three ways of killing the king, the one by Grove and Pickering, another by the ruffians, I know not whom, a third was by poison; now Dr. Oates, in all his relations, makes not any mention of a fourth design to kill the king, or of any other plot or design at London to kill the king; but he says, if Grove and Pickering miscarried, it was to be done by the four ruffians, and they miscarrying, it was to be done by poison, now comes he with a thing that never was thought of before, that Oates never gives any relation of.

L. C. J. What then?

Corker. He, my lord, tells us, that this was to be done in October, when all the other things that were to be done were past; and what, should they design to kill the king in October, when it was to be done before in July or August?

L. C. J. Look you, the first part of your objection, wherein you say he names but three ways of killing the king, what do you infer from that? that because this gentleman says there was a fourth, there was not. Dr. Oates told you as much as he knew of the matter, but he does not undertake to give you an account of all the plot or plotters in this affair. If you make any reasonable objection against Mr. Dugdale's testimony, I will allow it, but these inferences I must not. That this is a strange story of Mr. Dugdale's, because it is not part of Oates's discovery, is that a reasonable objection? But then for the latter part, that Dr. Oates says the king was to have been killed in July or August, therefore what should they think of killing him in October, he tells you, that in June and July they did engage him in the general plot, and first then to be instrumental in killing the king, but he was not to be gone till October to London to do it.

* See vol. 6, p. 1428.

Coker. When the thing was done.

Just. Wyndham. No, no, because the thing was not done, or because it might miscarry by others, therefore he was to come then.

L. C. J. They could not tell when it would be done, or by what hand it would be done; therefore they were engaging as many as they could, provided the thing were not done.

Marshal. Amongst other things that seem to render his testimony suspected, there is one which is taken from the common practice of all men, in cases of like nature, for where there is danger in matters of concernment, men use to be very circumspect who they choose, and make choice of as few as possible; but now here is person after person, conspiring without end, and letters to this person, and to that person, and nothing is proved to be done upon it, so that here is the greatest confusion imaginable, an hundred of men, nay almost a whole nation are acquainted with it, when a few might serve the turn.

Sir R. Sawyer. Why do you say it was known to the whole nation, when it was so close a conspiracy?

L. C. J. North. You are at the bar; we do not object to what you say, as to the way of it, but as to the time that you deliver it in; it is the course, that you deliver your objections when the king's evidence is done; indeed, when the king's counsel have done what questions they have to ask of the witnesses, then you may ask them what questions you will, but for the observations that you would make by way of objection to the evidence, and as to their credit, you should reserve that to the last, when the king's evidence is done.

Prisoners. My lord we desire we may be allowed pen, ink and paper.

Mr. Recorder. (Sir George Jefferies.) Let them have it.

L. C. J. Indeed, there is one thing very considerable on your side, and it is fit there should be an account given of it. It is very strange, that a thing of that nature should be writ so plain, I mean the killing of the king, in a letter that should be sent by the common post; what say you to that?

Dugdale. Mr. Ewers did it for no other end in the world, but that they intended, if it should be discovered, all should be flung upon me, and I was sworn to deny it, and they were to go free.

L. C. J. What were the words of the letter?

Dugdale. In that of Mr. Whitebread's, it was contained downright plainly, 'he should choose such as were hardy, for the killing of the king.'

L. C. J. And how did that letter come?

Dugdale. By the common post.

Sir G. Wakeman. No man living can believe it.

Just. Pemberton. There was no mention of Ewers; on the outside, nor no name to it, was there?

Dugdale. No, none at all, my lord.

Just. Pemberton. No name to the letters?

Dugdale. Only the two first letters of their names.

Marshal. Would they, in such case, can any man think, be so mad as to venture their lives, and all, for they knew not what? Would the lords, whose names, he says, were subscribed to one of the letters, engage their lives and fortunes in the signing of a letter, wherein both were so much endangered, and commit it to such an hazard.

Rumley. Would they set their hands to such a letter, as they could not be certain into whose hands it might come? and he says, he does not know who it came from.

Just. Pemberton. Mr. Dugdale, was that letter by a common post, that the lords set their hands to?

Dugdale. No, it was by a special messenger.

L. C. J. Look you, gentlemen, the answer that he gives to your objection is this; You say it is strange, and indeed it is so, that such a design should be writ so plain in English, in a letter; but he says there was nobody in danger by it, but himself, for there was nobody could tell from whence it came, because only two letters of the name were subscribed; and, says he, it was directed to the only, and so I might have suffered, but Ewers name was not mentioned, to whom it was intended to go.

Rumley. Yet he says he does not certainly know who it came from.

Mr. Recorder. Gentlemen, you have your proper time for that, if you will make any remarks.

Justice Pemberton. Will you ask him any more questions? As for your arguments, you must not use them now.

L. C. J. North. But they have desired pen, ink, and paper; is it given to them?

Mr. Recorder. You must allow the prisoners pen, ink, and paper, if they desire it.

L. C. J. Ay, all of them, if they would have it. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Mr. Dugdale, this letter that came from Whitebread, it came with others, did it not?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord, it did.

L. C. J. The cover was directed to you, was it not?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord, it was.

L. C. J. Had the other letters particular directions to particular persons?

Dugdale. Every letter was directed to me.

L. C. J. What, besides the cover?

Dugdale. Yes, besides the cover.

L. C. J. Who were you to communicate them to?

Dugdale. They had a particular mark that they were known by, there was always a black cross upon them. I was to give them to Mr.

Ewers, and he was to communicate them to others concerned.

L. C. J. What was upon the other letters?

Dugdale. I had no letters but what I delivered to Ewers.

L. C. J. Was he the only man that they were delivered to?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. And he distributed them as he pleased, did he?

Dugdale. Yes.

L. C. J. Had you more marks than one?

Dugdale. No, my lord.

L. C. J. So you were only agent between Mr. Ewers and them, and none else?

Justice Wyndham. They were all directed to you, how did he know who they were to go to?

Dugdale. I was to deliver them to him, and he dispersed them to the several persons, and he rid constantly abroad about it.

L. C. J. Were there several marks to know who they were to?

Dugdale. My lord, he knew, by conversing with them, their several hands, and so could tell, by what was written, what was intended, and what the business was, and for whom.

Corker. There must have been several transactions, and a man must have received several letters, before he knows another's hand.

Justice Pemberton. Will you ask him any questions? you must not argue upon it yet.

Rumley. How many letters came to you, pray, from beyond sea?

Dugdale. An hundred, I believe, in two years time.

Rumley. From how many several persons? Methinks you should produce some of those letters.

Dugdale. There were letters from sir John Warner very often. I cannot remember all.

Rumley. Methinks you might be more ready in your evidence, than upon every turn to say, You cannot remember. Have you none of those letters?

Dugdale. I burnt those letters which I kept, before I intended to discover the Plot; but in a multitude of letters, it is hard to tell particulars, I tell you what I remember of them.

Corker. You make mention of killing the king, and raising an army, and these were specified in two letters. In those matters which concerned the raising of an army, were there only letters, no commissions sent, for the raising of forces? Did you never see any of the officers? Did you never communicate with any of them?

L. C. J. Did you see any commissions first?

Dugdale. No, I never did see any of them.

L. C. J. Did you ever talk with any that were intended to be officers?

Dugdale. Yes, I have.

L. C. J. Name them.

Dugdale. There was sir James Symons, and Mr. Howard, I have talked with them.

L. C. J. With them two?

Dugdale. And with one captain Adderley, that is dead.

Corker. Why, there are three officers towards the raising of several thousands of men.

Justice Pemberton. Look you, Mr. Corker, you must direct yourself to the court, and propose your questions here.

Corker. Mr. Dugdale tells us, that for the promoting of this design, that he gave 400*l.* and with the same breath says, he was to receive 500*l.* Methinks this is to do and undo.

Justice Dolben. Pray keep this arguing of yours till the last.

L. C. J. North. The court hath told you already, this is not proper for you. It is true, you must have liberty to ask questions, because there are some questions that else may be forgotten, and the opportunity will be lost: but when you have asked those questions, make your own observations upon them in private to yourselves, and afterwards it will be time for you to argue upon it to the jury, when the king's counsel shall have done their evidence: but now to make these inferences will do you little service, and cannot be permitted.

Dugdale. My lord, I desire to answer it now. It was my lord Stafford that promised me the money, and I went presently to know of Mr. Ewers what it meant, because I had given my money before, and my lord Stafford did not, I suppose, know any thing of it.

L. C. J. How long was it before that you gave the money?

Dugdale. It was two or three years before; at the beginning, when the Plot was first discovered to me, for the introducing of their religion.

Justice Atkins. He was a great zealot, but my lord Stafford did suppose the money might quicken him.

Dugdale. It was for my encouragement, and I should have a greater reward after.

Corker. He received the money, I suppose, when he was in prison for debt, rather than for any thing else.

L. C. J. North. You may observe that by and by.

L. C. J. Look you, this is what he hath said, it is all but in general, and he does not name any of you four: but here was a general contrivance, he says, to bring in popery. I am afraid that is too true; and as the best way to effect that, they resolved to kill the king; and I am afraid that is too true too; for it was indeed the likeliest way.

Then stood up Mr. Praunce.

Mr. Ward. Give the court an account, only in general, of what you know of any design that was at this time?

Praunce. It was a fortnight or three weeks before Michaelmas I went to one Mr. Ireland's chamber, in Russel-street, where was Mr. Fenwick and Mr. Grove, and there they were discoursing of 50,000 men that were to be raised, for the settling of the Roman Catholic religion, and I asked Mr. Fenwick, how that could be done? And he said, Very easily, in a short time. Then I asked him, What poor tradesmen should do? and he said, I need not fear, for I should have church-work enough, to make crucifixes, basons and candle sticks.

Justice Atkins. You are a working goldsmith?

Praunce. Yes. Then I asked, who should govern them? And he said, my lord Powis, my lord Stafford, my lord Arundel, my lord Bellasis and my lord Petre. Two or three days after that, Grove came to my shop to buy some spoons for a christening; and then I did ask him, what office he was to have? He said he did not know, but he said, that my lord Bellasis, my lord Powis, and my lord Petre, had commissions to govern the army. And after that, there was one Mr. Paston in Duke-street, I went to him, to know how I could direct a letter; and after a little time, we fell into discourse concerning the affairs of the times. He told me, the lords had given out commissions, one was to sir Henry Bennyfield in Norfolk, another was to Mr. Stoner in Oxfordshire, and another was to Mr. Talbot of Longford. He said that they had given commissions for to raise an army.

Mr. Ward. What was that army to do?

Praunce. It was to settle the Catholic Religion.

Mr. Ward. Did you hear any thing mentioned of killing the king?

Praunce. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. Who told you this that you speak of about the commissions?

Praunce. Mr. Paston, my Lord, in Duke-street.

L. C. J. Was he a priest?

Praunce. No, but he kept some in his house, and they said mass every morning.

L. C. J. Is he of any profession?

Praunce. He was a counsellor, but doth not practise now, he hath an estate of 5 or 600 a year.

L. C. J. Now go on, and say what he told you.

Praunce. He said, there were commissions given out to sir Henry Bennyfield and one Talbot of Longford.

L. C. J. When was it he told you this?

Praunce. It was in August last.

L. C. J. And did he say they had commissions sent to them?

Praunce. Yes, they had them in the country, where they were to raise their troops: I heard of more, but I only remembered those three.

Mr. Ward. Do you know one Messenger?

Praunce. Yes.

Mr. Ward. What discourse had you with him?

Praunce. My lord's butler told me——

L. C. J. Who told you?

Praunce. My lord's butler.

L. C. J. What lord?

Praunce. My lord Arundel. He waited then on one Sheldon, that was Almoner to the dutchess of York. He told me, That Mr. Messenger was to kill the king and he was to have a good reward for the same. Soon after I was going over Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and met with Mr. Messenger, and asked him; Why he would kill the king? He seemed to be surprised, and starting back said, Who told you that? Said I, your butler told me. Oh, said he, we are quite off of that now: but then I was going away, and he called me back, and asked me, if I would go and drink with him? No, said I, I cannot stay at this time. However, pray said he, keep counsel, for we are off that now.

Mr. Ward. Will you ask the witness any questions?

Corker. Yes, my lord. Those commissions you speak of, when were they sent; in August?

Praunce. No, I do not say so; but that Mr. Paston told me of them in August. I cannot tell the day.

Sir R. Sawyer. If you observe it, gentlemen, he only tells you what some of the priests and persons of your religion acquainted him with; not any thing particularly against you.

Mr. Ward. Then next we call Mr. Jennison. Who stood up.

Sir R. Sawyer. Mr. Jennison, pray give the court an account of what you know of any design in hand, or what discourse you had with any person about such a thing.

Jennison. Sir, in the month of June 1678, I was at Mr. Ireland's chamber.

Sir R. Sawyer. Where, sir?

Jennison. In Russel-street, next the White-Hart. And there arose a discourse about religion and some hopes there were, he said, that the Romish Religion should be publicly owned again in England; and when I came in, I remember Mr. Ireland did say there was only one in the way, that stopped the gap, and hindered the Catholic religion from flourishing in England again; and said, it was an easy matter to poison the king.

L. C. J. Who was by, pray, when he said so?

Jennison. His sister was by.

L. C. J. Name her, sir.

Jennison. Mrs. Anne Ireland.

L. C. J. Who else?

Jennison. None else.

L. C. J. Then there was only you, and Ireland, and his sister. And you say, that they were discoursing concerning their hopes of bringing in Religion, and Ireland said, there was but one in the way, and that it was not an hard matter to poison the king.

Jennison. Yes, my lord; and so I not knowing any thing at all of the plot, or imagining the design, did answer, Perhaps it may be done, but it would be a very horrid thing if it should. Then Mrs. Ireland did rebuke her brother, and asked him, Why he talked so? and then he answered with some salvo, or other, That he did not think it ought to be done. Then I pursued the discourse about religion, and told him, I thought it would never come in by violence, and that it was a great scandal to religion for the professors of it to propagate and promote it by any such ways: And then I put him in shire? He told me, very well, and that they would be glad to see me there. Then he asked me whence I came, and where I had been? I told him I had been at Windsor. He asked me, what news? How the court diverted themselves? I told him, I understood his majesty took great delight in hawking and fishing, and chiefly in fishing, and used to go out very early in the morning, accompanied only with three or four persons of quality.

L. C. J. Ay, they do say so, I know; were you a papist then?

Jennison. Yes, my lord, I was.

L. C. J. Are you one still?

Jennison. No, my lord.

Ward. Mr. Jennison, were you with him again at any time? and what time was it that you met him, as you remember?

Jennison. The 19th of August, after I came from Windsor.

L. C. J. Where did you see him?

Jennison. At his own chamber in Russel-street.

L. C. J. How do you so precisely remember the day, that it was the 19th of August?

Jennison. I remember it by this; the beginning of August I went to Tunbridge with Mr. Tonstall and another gentleman, and there I staid till the 14th, when I came to town, and staid two or three days, and on Saturday in the afternoon I went to Windsor to take my leave of Mr. Bowes, being to go down into the North; and there I staid all Sunday, and came back again on Monday morning, and came to town about twelve o'clock the 19th day, as I have considered it since it was, and a Monday.

L. C. J. And then you went to Ireland's chamber did you?

Jennison. Yes, then I went to Mr. Ireland's chamber.

L. C. J. By the oath you have taken, because it is very material, not to your cause, but it shews how fit it is that the world should know with what truth or falshood these men dare die, and this man did in particular. It was affirmed by him to the very last of his breath, that he was never here in London after the 3rd of August, till some time in September, but was all the while in Staffordshire; and they did at the last trial produce sir John Southcot, and his coachman, and his lady, and I know not how many other witnesses, to give an account where he was from the 3rd of August, all along till the middle of September; and they testified that they kept 16 days together in his company; and then they produced people in Cheshire to say, that they saw him there. Therefore I do now ask you upon your oath, are you sure that you saw Ireland here the 19th of August?

Jennison. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Do you swear that positively?

Jennison. Yes, my lord I do.

Sir R. Sawyer. He will tell you the discourse he had with him then.

Jennison. After that I came to Mr. Ireland's chamber, I understood he was newly come out of Staffordshire. And he pulled off his boots while I was there upon the frame of a table, or else upon a jack, I cannot positively tell which, but I believe it was on a frame of a table. I asked him how all our friends did in Staffordshire? He told me, very well, and that they would be glad to see me there. Then he asked me whence I came, and where I had been? I told him I had been at Windsor. He asked me, what news? How the court diverted themselves? I told him, I understood his majesty took great delight in hawking and fishing, and chiefly in fishing, and used to go out very early in the morning, accompanied only with three or four persons of quality.

L. C. J. Did he ask you what company he had? Or did you tell him of your own accord?

Jennison. No, I think I told him of my own accord, that the king went out very early, and had but little company with him. Lord, said he, I wonder the king should go so thinly guarded, he were easily taken off, I wonder he should go so open. Said I, God forbid, sure nobody would be so wicked; and then he qualified it by some expression; so that at that time I made no ill reflection upon it, till after the plot broke out, and then discoursing of it to my father and my sisters, I said, I wish it be not true, pray God there be nothing in this plot, because of the discourse that happened between Mr. Ireland and me. It is very suspicious, said I.

Sir R. Sawyer. At that time had you any discourse whence he came, and about his weariness?

Jennison. He said he came out of Staffordshire, and came post. I understood he came very early that morning. I told him that scholars, such as he, would rather choose to come upon an ambling horse, and that I was weary myself.

Sir R. Sawyer. Were you very well acquainted with Mr. Ireland that suffered?

Jennison. Yes, very well.

Sir R. Sawyer. Are you sure he was in London the 19th of August?

Jennison. Yes, and I talked with him then.

L. C. J. How long had you known him before?

Jennison. A year and a half.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray when did you go out of London to the north? What time did you go away?

Jennison. I went the 4th of September, as the coach-book will make it appear.

L. C. J. The evidence they gave was, that he did not come to town till the 13th of Sept. but he was gone the 4th it seems to the north, and that is before that time. Well, will you ask him any questions?

Corker. Mr. Ireland had been in Staffordshire? Had not he? for the 19th you say he came to town, I do not well remember, but the design of the ruffians of killing the king, about which Oates speaks, was before the 19th, at the consult of which Ireland was so grand an instrument.

L. C. J. That was in May, was it not?

Corker. No, that of the ruffians was in August, as he says.

Sir R. Sawyer. Will you ask him any questions? Look upon him; you see how creditable a witness he is.

Corker. Did you, pray Sir, leave your religion, and make this discovery before the pretended plot came out? When did you leave your religion?

Jennison. About three months ago.

L. C. J. He told you that as soon as the plot broke out, said he, I told my sisters and my father of it, and said, I pray God this plot have not more in it than we are aware of, for I had some discourse with Mr. Ireland, which I took no notice of then, because he qualified it at that time, and said it was not lawful, and did make nothing of it then, but now it runs much in my mind.

Corker. This he says, but this man did not leave his religion, nor make this discovery till it appeared advantageous to him so to do.

Recorder. It is an observation you make, but it had been well if you, and all of that persuasion, would have left it when you saw what it led to.

L. C. J. I know not what advantage you mean, nor do I see any colour you have to say so, for they say that this gentleman's father is one of 1,000*l.* a year, and he is his eldest son.

Corker. Are you your father's eldest son?

Recorder. There is an elder brother, my lord, but he is a priest.

L. C. J. Is your elder brother a priest?

Jennison. My lord, I do not know that, he is in Newgate about it.

L. C. J. It is reported that he is so?

Jennison. My lord, I don't know it of my own knowledge.

Corker. He does not know it, and therefore he is not the heir, and therefore the advantage of his estate is not such, but that he might lay hold of this discovery.

Sir R. Sawyer. I hope by and by, gentlemen, you will make a better defence than this.

Justice Pemberton. What you say should be by way of question proposed to the Court.

Recorder. But you take it upon your oath that you saw Ireland the 19th of August? Was that after you met with Mr. Bowes?

Jennison. I did not meet with Mr. Bowes.

Recorder. How long after you had left him was it?

Jennison. I did not see him there, I went to see him, but he was not there.

L. C. J. But he says precisely that the 19th of August he went to Mr. Ireland's chamber, where he saw him pluck off his boots, and talking as if he had come out of Staffordshire, post, so that indeed he was in Staffordshire, but not all that time he said he was.

Ward. Then pray call Mr. Bowes. Who was sworn?

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, Sir, will you give the Court an account, when you saw this gentleman, and about what time he went out of town?

Bowes. My lord, I saw him in August, the beginning, or about the middle of August, in Tunbridge, before my coming to town.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray when did he leave this town? when did he go out of town?

Bowes. I cannot point blank tell the time, but I could recollect myself, I believe, in a little time.

Sir R. Sawyer. Do you know of his going to Windsor?

Bowes. I did not see him there, but he writ a letter to me that he went thither to meet me there, but I saw him not till he came to town again.

L. C. J. Who is it you speak of?

Bowes. Mr. Jennison.

Sir R. Sawyer. What did he write you in that letter?

Bowes. Sir, the letter is here in Court, I don't remember the particulars.

Sir R. Sawyer. Is it here in Court?

Bowes. Yes, it is, I think.

Recorder. Shew it him, for it may refresh his memory about the time. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Is that the letter?

Bowes. This is the letter.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, when did you receive it?

Bowes. It was in December before Christmas, here is a gentleman that then saw it.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, Sir, will you please to look upon it, and then acquaint the court with some of the contents.

L. C. J. North. You are sure, Mr. Bowes, that Mr. Jennison was in town in August?

Bowes. He came then from Tunbridge.

L. C. J. That is all, we can make no more of it: Did he meet you at Windsor?

Bowes. No, my lord, I was gone to Windsor before, and when he came I was gone out of the town.

L. C. J. What time went you to Windsor?

Bowes. The 12th or 13th of August; it was on a Monday or a Tuesday after I came from Tunbridge.

Sir R. Sawyer. Then we shall call one witness more, and we shall prove by him (that is one Mr. Burnet) that the 17th of August he did meet Mr. Jennison going to Windsor. Pray call Mr. Burnet [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. Pray, Sir, do you know Mr. Jennison.

Burnet. I met him as I was coming from Windsor that day Dotchet's horse-race was.

L. C. J. What day was that?

Burnet. I cannot exactly remember the day.

L. C. J. What month was it?

Burnet. In August.

L. C. J. Was it the middle of August, or the latter end?

Burnet. It was about the middle of August.

L. C. J. This does not so much relate to you, but it is to give satisfaction to all the world, that what was asserted by Mr. Ireland all along, and at his death, and seems to be justified by so many witnesses as were produced on that account, to prove that he was not here in August is utterly untrue; for this gentleman, Mr. Jennison, swears he saw him here in town the 19th of August; and to prove that Mr. Jennison was here, here is Mr. Bowes and this other gentleman that come to fortify his testimony, who swears precisely, that the 19th of August he was at Mr. Ireland's chamber, where he saw him pluck off his boots, and talked as if he came post then from Staffordshire.

Corker. I suppose it will not be permitted us to make any argument upon this neither as yet.

L. C. J. No, no.

Sir R. Sawyer. But now, gentlemen, it will behove you to take notes, for we shall come home to you, and we begin with Dr. Oates. [Who stood up.]

Mr. Ward. Pray, Sir, will you tell your whole knowledge of this matter, and apply yourself as near as you can to every one of the prisoners at the bar?

Oates. My lord, in the month of July Mr. Ashby came to town sick, and being sick, and one of the society, the prisoner at the bar, sir George Wakeman, was his physician, and being his physician he did write him some instructions how he should order himself before he went, and at the Bath; That he should, in the first place, take a pint of milk in the morning, and a pint of milk at night, and should drink no morning's draughts but milk, and that he should have one hundred strokes at the bath, at the pump; I do not so well understand what that means, but I suppose the court doth; but these were the words of the instructions: In this letter sir George Wakeman did write, that the queen would assist him to poison the king, and this letter was brought by a messenger to Mr. Ashby. Within a day or two after I saw Mr. Ashby and sir George Wakeman, the prisoner at the bar (he was so called, but I had no acquaintance with him, but just the sight of him) I saw him sit in a writing posture, I saw him lay by his pen, rise up and go away, and the same hand that he left behind him in a paper where the ink was not dry, was the same hand that writ the letter to Mr. Ashby. And, my lord, in that time of converse, while he was writing this, Mr. Ashby did give him some instructions concerning the commission he had received of being physician to the army. Now, my lord, in some few days after there came a gentleman for some of the Fathers from Wild-House, that had the title either of sir Richard or sir Robert, but he was a middle statured man, and a brisk man, about the age of four or five and forty, and he came with commands from the queen for the Fathers to wait upon her at Somerset-House, and I did wait upon these Fathers, there was Father Harcourt, Father Kaines, Father Langworth, and Father Fenwick, and another Father, I cannot remember his name. And, may it please your lordship, we did attend at Somerset-House, and the Fathers went in to the queen, into a chamber where she was, and I waited in an anti-chamber, and I did hear a woman's voice which did say, that she would assist them in the propagation of the Catholic religion with her estate, and that she would not endure these violations of her bed any longer, and that she would assist sir George Wakeman in the poisoning of the king. Now, my lord, when they came out I desired that I might see the queen, and so when I came in I had, as I believe, from her a gracious smile. Now, if it pleases your lordship, while that I was within I heard the same voice speak thus to Father Harcourt, and asked him, whether he had received the last 1,000*l.* and it was the same tongue, as I can possibly guess, the same voice which I heard when I was without; and I saw no other woman there but the queen, and these were these Fathers. My lord, in that very month of July, sir G. Wakeman was proposed 10,000*l.* in the presence of Father Harcourt, and Father Fenwick, I think was there, and Father Ireland.

L. C. J. Were you there?

Oates. I was there.

L. C. J. Was this proposal made to sir G. Wakeman after this discourse you heard at Somerset-House?

Oates. My lord, I will not be positive whether it was before or after, but it was near that time this 10,000*l.* he did refuse.

L. C. J. But you say you heard the 10,000*l.* was proffered him; pray, who did propose it to him?—Oates. Ashby was to do it.

L. C. J. But who did it?

Oates. It was Ashby in the name of the provincial, from whom he had received instructions so to do.

L. C. J. But you say, in your hearing 10,000*l.* was offered him by Ashby.

Oates. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. What said he?

Oates. He refused it.

L. C. J. What words did he use?

Oates. He said it was too little.

L. C. J. What was the 10,000*l.* to be given for?—Oates. To poison the king.

L. C. J. Were those the words?

Oates. Yes, they were.

L. C. J. How did the discourse begin?

Oates. I will tell your lordship how: There was a meeting of the Fathers for this very purpose to treat with sir G. Wakeman before Ashby went to the Bath, and there being a meeting they did break this business to him; but what preamble they made to it I cannot remember. My lord, as for the other prisoners at the bar, Mr. Corker—

L. C. J. But before you go from this matter, you say you know not how they brought it in, but they brought it in some way, he was to meet them to that purpose, and there Ashby did tell him he should have 10,000*l.*; what answer made he to it?

Oates. He said it was too little for so great a work.

L. C. J. Is that all?

Oates. That is all that I remember.

L. C. J. Did he say what he would have?

Oates. I can't remember that, but he said that was too little.

L. C. J. Did he say he would have five more, or any other sum?

Oates. No, that was not then mentioned; but there were letters presently dispatched to Whitebread to tell him, that sir G. Wakeman had refused 10,000*l.* and then this same Whitebread did order the Fathers in London to propose five more, which proposal was made to sir G. Wakeman. This I speak but by hearsay, and it was accepted, and 5,000*l.* of it received in part, and sir G. Wakeman's name was subscribed to the Entry-book.

L. C. J. Did you see his name subscribed?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. C. J. Where?—Oates. To the Entry-book.

L. C. J. Where was that book kept?

Oates. It was the book that the Jesuits kept: it was then in our custody.

L. C. J. Whose custody?

Oates. The Fathers custody.

L. C. J. Whose particularly? and at whose chamber was it kept?

Oates. At Wild-house.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. Do you know who was the keeper of it?

Oates. I cannot positively say that, I suppose the secretary and the Fathers.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. And what did you see writ in that book?

Oates. That such a day, (which day I cannot remember) but such a day in August so much was proposed to sir G. Wakeman, and he accepted it, and received it: those were the words, or to that purpose.

L. C. J. Were those the words writ in the book?

Oates. Yes, or to that purpose.

L. C. J. Do you know whose hand writ that?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I can tell whose hand, it was Father Harcourt writ those words.

L. C. J. Sir G. Wakeman's hand was not to it, was it?

Oates. Yes, it was just underneath: Received so much money of Father Harcourt by the order of Edward Coleman: now there was the goldsmith's name to it, I cannot undertake to say who it was, but in my conscience I think it was Staley.*

L. C. J. How much was the money?

Oates. Five thousand pounds.

L. C. J. Was sir G. Wakeman's hand subscribed to that receipt?

Oates. Yes, it was.

L. C. J. Once more, what were the words in the book?

Oates. Memorandum. Such a day 15,000*l.* was proposed to sir G. Wakeman which he accepted. I tell you the purport, and the words as near as I can.

L. C. J. Was it said for what the money was proposed.

Oates. I will not be positive in that, I suppose it was.

L. C. J. But you say it was written such a day 15,000*l.* was proposed to sir G. Wakeman, and by him accepted?

Oates. Yes, my lord, and then underneath it the receipt was written, and this receipt was written thus, "Received in part of this "15,000*l.* 5,000*l.* of Father Harcourt by order "of Edward Coleman. Geo. Wakeman."

L. C. J. Was the receipt, which is said such a day, the same day with the other?

Oates. There was no other date to it.

L. C. J. Had the first a date to it?

Oates. Yes, my lord, it had.

L. C. J. What day was it?

Oates. It was in August?

Corker. What day in August?

Oates. I cannot tell.

Corker. About what time in August?

Oates. It might be betwixt the beginning and the middle.

L. C. J. But we will suppose for the present question a day: Suppose it was written the 10th of August, "There was proposed 15,000*l.* "to Sir G. Wakeman and by him accepted," and then comes afterwards this note, "Received "then 5,000*l.* in part of this 15,000*l.*" with his name to it. Was there any other date to that?

Oates. No, that was set down at the same day, "Received 5,000*l.* in part by the order of "Edward Coleman."

L. C. J. And then sir G. Wakeman's name was set to it at length, was it?

Oates. Yes, it was.

Sir G. Wakeman. Where was that received? In whose chamber?

Oates. I cannot say that.

L. C. J. Was there any place mentioned in the note where it should be received?

Oates. No, my lord. I was then sick of the stone, and was not at the payment of the money.

L. C. J. But did the note mention any name? Received of any body?

Oates. It was by order of Mr. Edward Coleman 5,000*l.* in part of this 15,000*l.*

Sir Geo. Wakeman. Does he say this was in the entry-book?

Oates. Yes, it was.

Sir Geo. Wakeman. Where was that kept?

Oates. Sometimes at Wild-House, sometimes Mr. Langhorn had the custody of it.

Sir Geo. Wakeman. I humbly beg of the Court that Mr. Staley may be sent for.

L. C. J. He only says he believes Mr. Staley paid it.

Sir Geo. Wakeman. Does he mention no place where it was received?

L. C. J. No.

Sir Geo. Wakeman. Nor no person it was paid to?

L. C. J. No, he says, All I saw is this, that in the entry-book sometimes kept at Wild-House, sometimes by Mr. Langhorn, there was written, 'This Day' (which was some day in

* See his Case, ante, vol. 6. p. 1593.

August) 'was proposed to sir G. W. 15,000*l.* and by him accepted,' and under that a line or two more, which contained, 'Then received 5,000*l.* by order of Edward Coleman, being part of this 15,000*l.* Geo. Wakeman.'

Sir Geo. Wakeman. Will your lordship please to give me leave to speak something now, I may forget it hereafter.

Mr. Ward. We have not done yet.

Just. Pemberton. Sir George, they have not yet done with this witness for the king.

L. C. J. North. Take a Memorandum of it in your paper.

Sir R. Sawyer. Pray, what do you know more of the prisoner at the bar, sir George Wakeman?

Oates. This is all I can recollect at present.

Sir R. Sawyer. Do you know any thing of any commission that he had?

Oates. I did urge that he received a commission to be physician-general of the army.

L. C. J. Did you see that commission?

Oates. Yes, I saw it in sir George Wakeman's hands.

L. C. J. Had you seen it before?

Oates. Yes, I had.

L. C. J. Where did you see it in his hand?

Oates. When he was writing at Mr. Ashby's.

L. C. J. What note was that he left behind him there?

Oates. It was an apothecary's bill, as I suppose.

L. C. J. What month was it that you saw the commission?

Oates. It was in July.

Mr. Ward. What do you know of his being privy to the consult in April?

Oates. I cannot speak any thing to that.

L. C. J. Did he write his name to that bill?

Oates. I cannot say that, my lord, it was finished, but I cannot be positive about the name.

L. C. J. But you say, that you believe that the name of George Wakeman was the same hand with that you saw when he writ the apothecary's bill?

Oates. It was, as near as I can guess, the same with that letter that was writ to Ashby, wherein he does direct him to take a pint of milk in the morning, and a pint of milk in the evening, and that he should have an hundred strokes at the Bath: And this hand was the same with that of the apothecary's bill.

L. C. J. You never saw sir George Wakeman write in your life, did you?

Oates. I saw him in a writing posture, and I saw him lay by the pen.

L. C. J. But you did not see him write?

Oates. No, my lord; but the gentleman that sat by him was lame of both his hands and could not write: And I saw him lay by the pen, and when he was gone away the ink was not dry.

L. C. J. You speak of that only to shew the likeness of the hand.

Sir Geo. Wakeman. Have you not said that you do not know my hand?

Oates. I have told the Court before how far

I have known your hand. I saw a letter, that I saw was signed and subscribed George Wakeman, and that was the same hand that was to the receipt, and to the apothecary's bill.

Sir Geo. Wakeman. Have you not said positively that you do not know it, and is not that matter on record?

Oates. I did see a letter subscribed George Wakeman, it is a fine genteel hand, and after I saw him in a writing posture, I saw him lay by the pen, the ink and paper was wet; I did not indeed see him write, but there was nobody in the room that could write, or in a writing posture but he, for the other gentleman was lame of both hands.

Sir Geo. Wakeman. But I pray give a positive answer to what I ask you; have you not said you do not know my hand?

Oates. I do not remember I have said so.

Just. Pemberton. But he says now he believes that hand that writ the letter to Ashby, and the bill that he saw green, when nobody was by that could write but you, were the same.

Sir G. Wakeman. Have not you said, before the king and council, that you never saw me in all your life, and that you did not know me?

Oates. My lord, you may be pleased to know, when I saw sir George Wakeman at the council I had been up two nights together, and the king was willing once to excuse me from staying any further examination, and being so ill and indisposed for want of rest, in respect both of my intellectuals, and every thing else, I might not charge him so home; but now I have a proper light whereby I may see a man's face, I can say more to him.

Sir Geo. Wakeman. This is just Coleman's Case, the light was in your eyes.

Oates. This is the same gentleman: I desire he may propose his questions to the Court.

L. C. J. This is his question, whether you did say before the king and council, you did not know sir George Wakeman?

Oates. I do not remember whether I did or did not. I saw one called sir G. Wakeman, and this is that man; but I will not say, this was the man that was before the council when I was there.

Just. Pemberton. Did you see the commission in this man's hand?

Oates. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. Did you know this gentleman before he was at the council?

Oates. I saw this gentleman with Mr. Ashby, and he cannot deny it.

Sir G. Wakeman. Cannot deny it! Yes. I hope you will be able to prove it. You said you never saw me in your life, before you saw me at the Council.

L. C. J. Did you ever see him more than once?

Oates. Yes, twice in Mr. Ashby's chamber.

L. C. J. What, two several days.

Oates. Yes, two several days.

Just. Pemberton. Where was it that you saw him when the writing you say was green that he left behind him?

Oates. It was at Mr. Ashby's chamber.
L. C. J. You never saw him before that, did you?

Oates. No.

L. C. J. How often after?

Oates. But once after that.

L. C. J. Was that at the council?

Oates. No.

L. C. J. Look you what he says, he never saw you but twice before he saw you at the Council.

Oates. I saw you when the 10,000*l.* was proposed to you.

Sir G. Wakeman. Where was that?

Oates. At Wild-House.

Sir G. Wakeman. Did Mr. Ashby lie there?

Oates. He did lie there, because the provincial was beyond sea, and he came up to London in order to go to the bath.

Sir G. Wakeman. What day was that proposal made to me?

Oates. It was before Mr. Ashby went to the Bath.

Sir G. Wakeman. In what month?

Oates. In the month of July.

Sir G. Wakeman. By whom? By Mr. Ashby?

Oates. Yes.

Sir G. Wakeman. In the presence of whom?

Oates. Father Harcourt, Father Ireland, and Father Fenwick.

Sir G. Wakeman. You will be sure to name those that can be neither witnesses for me nor against me.

L. C. J. Who can help that?

Oates. I reckon up such as you did keep company with.

L. C. J. Do you know when Mr. Ashby went to the bath?

Oates. The latter end of July, or the beginning of August, as I remember. And this was before he went: he stayed but fourteen or sixteen days, as I remember, in town.

L. C. J. He says he saw you but twice, once when you writ that note, and the second time when the proposal was made to you.

Sir G. Wakeman. And you know all these things, at that time when I was examined before the king and council? Turn this way and answer me.

Oates. I am not bound to answer that question.

L. C. J. But you must answer his questions, if they be lawful.

Sir G. Wakeman. I say, I ask him, whether he knew all these things before that time I was examined before the king and council?

L. C. J. That must needs be, for all these things were done before.

Sir G. Wakeman. Then I ask him this question, why did you say before the king and council, that you knew nothing of me, but concerning one letter that was writ from Mr. Ashby to Mr. Fenwick? I shall prove this upon you; but, my lord, let me observe this, can any one believe, that if such evidence had been given in to the king and council, against me, as he now speaks of, that I should not have been immediately taken into custody, but that I should have my liberty so long as I had?

L. C. J. I will tell you, Sir George, you will do very well and properly to call up your witnesses by and by, when you come to make your defence, and to prove what he said at the council-table. Pray, Dr. Oates, what was the reason you did not give the same evidence then you do now?

Oates. I can, by and by, give an answer to it, when it is proved by him what I did say. As to Mr. Corker, I say this, he had a patent from the See of Rome, to be bishop of London, and Mr. Corker was privy and consented to a proposal that was made by Langhorn to the Benedictine monks, whereof he is one. And these Benedictine monks did contribute 6,000*l.* to the society of the Jesuits, in order to be carrying on of this design. And Mr. Corker, though he did deny before some justices of the peace, that he did go out of the kingdom, yet he did go over to Lampspring in Germany, and staid there some short time, and he did write a letter, but whether it was dated from Lampspring in Germany, or no, I cannot tell, because there was only the date of the month, but not of the place from whence it came, but the latter end of August, it was, and therein he wrote, that he did consent to the proposal, for the raising of the said 6,000*l.* for he is president of the Benedictine monks, and therefore it was necessary that he should give the suffrage, and he had been with Father Le Chaise and the English monks in Paris, and had given an account what prospect of affairs he had in England, and how the design went on.

L. C. J. Was this in a letter?

Oates. Yes, it was.

L. C. J. To whom was that letter directed?

Oates. It was directed either to Father Hitchcot, or to Father Howard, then in London.

L. C. J. You saw the letter?

Oates. Yes, I saw the letter.

L. C. J. Were you acquainted with his hand writing?

Oates. I will shew you how far I might be acquainted with his hand. My Lord, this gentleman, as I think, went away in July, as near as I can remember, I will not be positive in the time he went over; but in the month of June I saw this gentleman with Mr. Fenwick, and he had given him an account either of some friend or kinsman of his at St. Omers, that had not had his pension paid, and Mr. Corker did give a note under his hand, to Mr. Fenwick, where to take up so much money, and the money was to be received of Mr. Langhorn.

L. C. J. How much was that money?

Oates. It was about 20 or 25*l.* and he subscribed his name to it, James Corker; for that is his name, though he is indicted, I know not how, by the name of Anthony: And I have summons to give evidence against Anthony Corker.

L. C. J. He is indicted by the name of James.

Oates. And then I saw his name to an exmination that was taken by sir Charles Harbord, and some other justices that were of the House of Commons that took the examination of this Corker, and it was the very same hand he usually writ, only it was not so fair, nor so well, in his examination. This is that I say against Mr. Corker.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. Shew him that hand there: Pray, Sir, look upon it, [Then a paper was shewn to him.]

Oates. This is the same hand.

Corker. Is that a copy of my examination before the justices?

L. C. J. It is the original.

Corker. I am glad it is there.

L. C. J. Shew it the prisoner.

Oates. Mr. Corker did use to bestow the queen's charity.

L. C. J. Is that your hand?

Corker. Yes my lord.

L. C. J. Shew him the other.

Corker. These are both my hand, as far as I can see.

Oates. That note he gave to Fenwick, for the receiving this money, was the same hand with this, and so was the letter that came, as we suppose, from Lampspring in Germany; but I cannot say it did so, wherein he did give consent to the raising and giving this 6000*l.* for the carrying on of the design.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. What was that you had more recollected?

Oates. He did dispose of the queen's charity (as it was so called) but Mr. Corker did say, it was to carry on the design; and this he did say in the month of June, when he was with Mr. Fenwick. Now, what he meant by that design, I leave to the jury to judge, only some parcels he had distributed, 2 or 3*s.* to some and 40*s.* to another, to some more, to others less: But a great part of it he did use for the carrying on of this design, and he said the queen had given him orders so to do.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. What do you know of his being privy to the consult of the 24th of April?

Oates. He did know of it, and I will tell your lordship how I know he knew of it. He did except against Pickering being chosen.

L. C. J. To do what?

Oates. To do that wicked thing to kill the king, for, said he, Pickering is commonly attendant upon the altar, and he thought it not so convenient, that he should be employed about that business, because he might miss an opportunity, by being at high mass, whereas another, a lay-man, might do it.

Sir Robert Sawyer. Were you present when the exception was made?

Oates. Yes, it was when the order was given about the money, to Fenwick.

L. C. J. At whose house was it?

Oates. At the Benedictine convent in the Savoy.

Sir Rob. Sawyer. Was it expressed at that time what Pickering was to do?

Oates. His being privy to the consult in April, I had it only from his own mouth, for he wondered that the Jesuits should employ Pickering in that business, when they might have a lay-man, who was more fit; he being a religious-man, and attending upon the altar, it was not so convenient.

L. C. J. Where was that 6,000*l.* to be raised?

Oates. Out of the Benedictines estates.

L. C. J. Was he their president?

Oates. Yes, he was.

Just. Ellys. Dr. Oates, was he against the thing, the doing of it at all, or against Pickering's doing of it only?

Oates. He was only against Pickering's doing of it. He would have had a lay-man employed in it.

Just. Pemberton. That is plain, for he did give consent that the 6,000*l.* should be raised for the carrying on the whole design.

Sir R. Sawyer. Do you know any thing besides that letter you have mentioned, which he writ to give his consent?

Oates. Nothing, but that because he had given his consent, the money was paid.

L. C. J. Do you know it was afterwards paid?

Oates. I believe that the money was paid, for our Fathers said that they had received it.

Recorder. What say you to the rest of the prisoners?

Oates. Mr. Marshal I do charge with the same, that is, that he was actually present at the Benedictine convent, when the 6,000*l.* was agreed to be contributed, but it was not to be paid till they had an answer from Mr. Corker.

Sir R. Sawyer. That letter you speak of, was an answer to it, I suppose?

Oates. Yes, my lord, it was so.

Sir R. Sawyer. What do you know of the consult, was he privy to that?

Oates. I will not be positive as to Mr. Marshal's being privy to the consult, I know that he was privy to Pickering's undertaking to kill the king.

Sir R. Sawyer. How do you know that?

Oates. Because he was of Corker's opinion that they had better take a lay-man.

Recorder. What say you to Rumley?

Oates. He is a Benedictine monk, or at least-wise a lay-brother. And he was privy to this consult, in which the 6,000*l.* was agreed to be paid and given, and I do judge he did consent to it, for he did pray God that it might have good success, and that the catholic cause might once again flourish in England.

L. C. J. North. He was there then, was he not?

Oates. Yes, he was there, but only as a servant, a lay-brother of that order.

L. C. J. North. Why, is he professed?

Oates. Yes, I think he is.

L. C. J. North. What time was this, Mr. Oates?

Oates. In August.

L. C. J. North. Was it the former part of August?

Oates. I cannot be positive, but I think it was.

Sir R. Sawyer. Can you say any thing more against the rest of the prisoners?

Oates. I do not recollect any thing more, at present.

Mr. Ward. Now, gentlemen, if you please to ask him any questions, you may.

Rumley. Were you there present?

Oates. Yes, I was.

Rumley. Was it in the month of August?

Oates. Yes, it was.

Sir R. Sawyer. Will any of you ask him any more questions?

Corker. He says I went in June to Lamp-spring, now I would ask Mr. Oates where Lamp-spring is?

Oates. We suppose it to be in Germany.

Corker. It is almost at the furthest end of Westphalia, and he says, that being there, I had discourse with la Chaise, and the English monks at Paris, about this design, I would fain make sense of this, if I could.

Oates. To satisfy Mr. Corker, I cannot say that he went to Lamp-spring, but only as he said himself; and they used to say they go to one place, when they go to another: as Ireland said he went to St. Omers when he went into Staffordshire.

Corker. Where, and when, did I give my consent to the design about murdering of the king, for you named the 24th of April?

Oates. This is that I say to the court, that the privy that Mr. Corker had of the consult of the 24th of April, was that I had out of his own mouth, in which he did declare, that he did think the Jesuits had not done well to make choice of one of their order to do that business, since he was to attend upon the altar, but it would have been well if they had made choice of some other layman to match Grove.

Corker. You tell me, I had a patent to be bishop of London.

Oates. I saw it in your own hand.

Corker. Who gave me that patent?

Oates. I did not enquire into that.

Corker. Did you hear me say, I accepted of it, and should be bishop of London?

Oates. I heard you say this, you hoped it would not be long ere you should exercise your episcopal function [At which the people laughed.] I now recollect something more. I remember Mr. Marshal was present when Father Hitchboot and Father Howard, and Conyers the Benedictine monk, were there present, about the laying of a wager, whether, or no, the king should eat any more Christmas pies, and this Benedictine monk, Conyers, did lay he should not, and another gentleman laid that he would, and this gentleman, Marshal, did go halves with Conyers, that he would not.

Marshal. I desire you would tell my lords the judges how long you have known me, and where you have seen me.

Oates. I have seen this gentleman several times, but had never any familiarity with him, but I have seen him officiate at the altar.

Marshal. How long have you known me?

Oates. First and last, two years; but the first time that I knew you, to hear you speak, was when Father Hitchboot and the rest were there.

Marshal. He says he hath known me these two years and yet never spake to me.

Oates. I knew him by sight.

Marshal. He looked upon me as a priest, it seems, he knew me to be engaged in this business, as he says, I wonder he should never converse with me.

Oates. There are a great many that I know by sight, whom I never did converse with.

L. C. J. What do you infer from that? It may be, you know some of the bench by sight, that you never spake to before, nor they to you.

Marshal. What day of the month was this consult?—Oates. It was in August.

Marshal. But what day of August?

Oates. It is a great privilege that I tell you the month. It was between the first and the middle of August.

L. C. J. He tells you it was the former part, but it lies in his breast, whether he will or no, to tell you the exact day.

Marshal. My lord, it is impossible to make a defence, if circumstances of time and place be not mentioned.

L. C. J. It is fit he should answer, if he can tell the time, but if he cannot, we cannot help it.

Marshal. But if he does not name the very day he may name the place.

L. C. J. He does name the place, it was at the Benedictine convent.

Marshal. Why cannot he as well remember the day?

Oates. If they will tell me when the feast of the Assumption is, which is a feast of their making, then I will give them a pretty near account when it was.

Marshal. The feast of the Assumption is the 15th of August.

Oates. My lord, it was either the day before or the day after.

Marshal. Now he hath avouched this positively.

Oates. Nay, I will not be positive.

Marshal. But you were so, that it was the day before, or the day after.

Oates. I appeal to the judges of the court.

L. C. J. If he will say it, let him, but people are not to be snapped up thus: Mr. Oates, you are upon your oath, and pray answer the question that is asked by the prisoner as positively as you can. If you can, say so, if you cannot, say so.

Oates. My lord, I do believe verily it was either the day before, or the day after.

L. C. J. Are you sure it was?

Oates. My lord, I do verily believe it.

Marshal. But what accusation is it of a thief or a murderer upon the highway, unless you tell the time exactly.

L. C. J. You see he will not answer positively.

Marshal. Mr. Oates, was I at any other consult besides this one?

Oates. Yes, you were, upon the 21st day of August, if it fell upon a Wednesday.

Marshal. What matter is it what day it fell on.

Oates. If it were a Wednesday, then the 21st of August you were at a consult, when we had letters from archbishop Talbot, wherein we had an account of the state of Ireland, how the Irish affairs did stand, but it did not pay an Irish letter's price, and therefore I suppose it came from this side of the water, though it was directed as if it came from Dublin. And this was read there, and there was in it a prayer, that a commission might be sent down, and there were some Jesuits and some Benedictines, amongst whom Marshal was one, and he did give his consent that the commission should be sent down.

L. C. J. What commissions were they?

Oates. For officers in the army that was to be raised there.

Marshal. Where was that letter read?

Oates. At the Benedictine convent.

Marshal. And this, you say, was the 21st of August?

L. C. J. And that was on a Wednesday, as the Almanack says.

Oates. There he agreed to send the commissions into Ireland for the appointing of officers, and did consent to the poisoning of the duke of Ormond.

Rumley. When was Pickering taken?

Oates. He was taken the night before, or Michaelmas-day in the morning.

Rumley. Were not you there, Mr. Oates?

Oates. Yes, I was.

L. C. J. Were you at all the consults?

Oates. No, I was sick, when sir George Wakeman was offered the 15,000*l.* and received the five.

L. C. J. What consults were you at?

Oates. I will answer to those consults that these persons are affected in; there was one consult about the beginning or middle of August, there was another the 21st of August, and then there was another consult wherein the 5,000*l.* was paid, or ordered to be paid, to Wakeman, and I was not there.

Rumley. Who was the messenger that took Pickering?

Oates. I do not know him.

L. C. J. Was the consult of sir George Wakeman after the 21st of August?

Oates. No, my lord.

Mr. Ward. Will you ask him any more questions?

Oates. My lord, I desire I may have leave to retire, because I am not well.

L. C. J. You must stay, Dr. Oates, till after their defence be over.

Recorder. If you desire to have any refreshment, you shall have it got for you.

Sir R. Sawyer. Then we call Mr. Bedlow next. [Who stood up.] Pray, Sir, speak your knowledge concerning the prisoners at the bar.

Bedlow. My lord, before I speak any thing to the prisoners, I desire there may be a difference between the clerks of the counsel and me decided, they have mistaken a word in my evidence, and put in New-Market, for Windsor.

L. C. J. What does that signify to the present business?

Bedlow. I desire it may not be brought against me in my evidences.

L. C. J. Then it is only for a caution beforehand.

Bedlow. The latter part of the last summer, it was, I think, about the beginning of August, sir George Wakeman was at Harcourt's chamber, I myself was there first, and when he came in, he fetched a turn or two about the room, seeming angry and discontented, and asked Harcourt if he had any thing for him? Then Harcourt asked him, how he did proceed? Said he, I do not know whether I shall or no; for what reason am I drilled on, in such a concern as this? Says Mr. Harcourt, Stay, sir George, you need not be so hasty as to blame us, for we are better provided for you than you think for. With that Harcourt went to his cabinet, and took out five or six papers, and brought a small bill, and asked sir George Wakeman; said he, sir George, how are you provided? Said sir George, I have been ready long since, but you have not been so punctual with me: but what have you there? Said Harcourt, I have a bill of 2,000*l.* From whom? said sir G. Wakeman. Then he named a gentleman, but I do not know him, nor cannot remember him. And said he, I came now from Whitehall, and received it from such an one, which he said was by the Queen's order, and that he had it from her. This bill is charged upon such a goldsmith, and named him, he dwelt somewhere about St. Dunstan's church, but I cannot remember his name, I will tell you by and by why I think he dwelt there. As soon as sir George had read it, It is well, said he, if it be accepted, I find more encouragement from my good lady and mistress, than from any of you all. They had some little more discourse, and sir George asked of Harcourt, who I was? Said he, it is a friend that hath been long engaged in our business, and is to do the next great work to yours. Well, said sir George, I will go and see if the bill be accepted, and you shall hear of me to-night; and accordingly he did go. I did not stay but a very little time after him, and therefore I collect he could not go far to get the bill accepted; for I did cross Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, and came down a lane by Temple-Bar, and between the Queen's-Head and Chancery-Lane end I met with sir George Wakeman: said I, Have you been with your bill already, and is it accepted? Yes, said he, it is accepted. And when is it to be paid? I am to go, said he, in the afternoon, to receive it.

L. C. J. Who said so?

Bedlow. Sir George Wakeman.

L. C. J. To whom?

Bedlow. To me. And seeing of him return from the city-ward again, I concluded it was not far off, and spoke to him as I tell you. Sir George and I were not very well acquainted, but I had known him five years, and upon that character Mr. Harcourt had given of me, I thought I might make bold with him, and when I asked him and accosted him with that short question, Is your bill accepted? he made me answer it was, and he was to receive it in the afternoon, and thought it not fit to dispute any thing with me.

L. C. J. You do not know what goldsmith it was upon?

Bedlow. It must be one that lives about St. Dunstan's church, or Fleet-Street, for he could not go far in that time.

L. C. J. Where was Harcourt's chamber?

Bedlow. In Duke-street, next the arch. Now I asked Harcourt afterwards, whether this was part of the 15,000*l.*? Said he, We have not adjusted that matter yet, but he received this only as a present supply. And he did in a short time after receive as much as made it up 4,000*l.* But I asked, whether it were for the old business? Yes, said he, it is for the same design, if we should fail of it by other means. (And so was the discourse to sir George Wake-man) if we should fail of it at Windsor, then this way is to be taken; and if this fail too, we will make sure of it at New-market.

L. C. J. What do you know of the other prisoners?

Bedlow. Mr. Corker I have seen with Kaines and Le Fevre, but never in their company but once, where being in the great court at Somerset-House, we walked out of the court into the piazza, and there we were speaking of our business. Kaines was saying to me, you brought such a letter, such a time, for me, and I have lost it; I do not know what to do for it. Said I, Do you remember the contents of it? Yes, said he, I do. Said I, You should take such letters in such a character as none could read but yourself, and then burn the letters themselves. Said he, I hope it will not come to light, for none will meddle with my papers, that can do me any hurt. I heard nothing from Mr. Corker, that did relate positively to the murder of the king, but Corker and Le Fevre were speaking in general, about the business, what letters they had received from beyond sea how to manage their affairs.

L. C. J. About what matter?

Bedlow. About the Plot, what letters they had received from beyond sea, and how forward they were in their proceedings here.

Corker. What did we talk about?

L. C. J. What was it about still?

Bedlow. It was about raising the army, and what interest he had with the people. It was in general, I come not to particulars.

Corker. Did Kaines, or I, or any of us, name any such thing as plot, design, or the like?

Bedlow. We were discoursing of the business in general, I do not take upon me to speak to particulars.

L. C. J. What was it about, say you?

Bedlow. About raising an army, what interest he had in the people, who had been sent into the country, what they had done, and the like.

Corker. Did you hear any word of killing, army, or design?

Bedlow. Yes, every one of those words were used. I do not take upon me to tell how the words were placed.

Mr. Ward. What say you to the rest?

L. C. J. When was this discourse?

Bedlow. July was twelvemonth.

Mr. Ward. What say you to Mr. Marshal?

Bedlow. Mr. Marshal hath reason to know me, and I suppose will not pretend to the contrary, for he cannot but remember that I knew him when I went to the Gatehouse. He hath carried several letters that have been brought from beyond sea, and others that have been writ in England, into the country, and I have been with him in Latham's chamber in the Savoy and Somerset-house, so long since as Latham was one of the queen's monks. He hath carried the same letters that I have brought from beyond the sea, three or four or more at a time, to communicate to the country gentlemen of the Catholic party, that were assistants to us, particularly to sir Francis Ratcliffe and others, I am sure he hath carried, and he knew what was the effect of those letters, and what were the answers to them; he read them as well as any of them, for I think he is of the same order, to the best of my knowledge, though I never saw him in his habit.

L. C. J. What was the import of the letters?

Bedlow. I never brought any one letter to the religious Fathers (and I have brought a great many) but what did import what I have now given in evidence, and did relate to the full substance of what I say now.

Sir R. Sawyer. Can you mention the particulars of any one letter that he knew the contents of?

Bedlow. I do mention one which I very well remember, and that was to sir F. Radcliff, and I remember it though it be long since, because I was well acquainted with sir F. Radcliff's son, and I brought commendations from his son to England.

Sir R. Sawyer. Well, sir, what was the contents of that letter?

Bedlow. It was a copy of the letter from La Chaise in Paris to the monks and Jesuits in England, in answer to the first letters that I brought over to them relating to the management of the design.

L. C. J. Was it mentioned in that letter what the design was?

Bedlow. In that which I carried over to La Chaise, it was, that all things were in readiness and the time now drawing near, for they did hope in a year or two, or in a little time they should be in a capacity to put this in practice, and they did not question but to subvert the oppression and tyranny the Catholics were under in England.

Sir R. Sawyer. Was Mr. Marshal acquainted with the contents?

Bedlow. He was one of them that used to examine the answers. It was written to him partly, for if he were not a member of their order, as I think he is, he was one of the club and consult that saw the contents of all letters. I have not seen him so often, as I have done the others, but I believe he hath been there as often, but he hath received to my remembrance twice letters to communicate into the country concerning the subversion of the government, and the introducing of popery.

Mr. Ward. What say you to Mr. Rumley?

Bedlow. I cannot be positive as to my own knowledge, but what Mr. Harcourt has said.

L. C. J. Do you know any thing of your own knowledge by him?

Bedlow. I have been told he hath communicated letters of this business into the country. And that he was one employed when any secret letters were sent.

L. C. J. So you cannot declare upon your oath, that you know that Mr. Rumley knew the contents of any letters relating to the plot?

Bedlow. No, my lord, I do not. I have a good remembrance of faces, but I do not remember his.

Sir G. Wakeman. What day was it that I had the discourse with Harcourt, and received the bill from him as you say?

Bedlow. You ask me a question as if I were in the state I was formerly in, when I might have an indulgence for telling a lie. No, I have no delight to damn my soul, to make you a martyr; but to satisfy you as well as I can I say, it was the beginning of August, or part of the beginning. I do not speak to a day.

Sir G. Wakeman. How do you know it was a bill of exchange for this money?

Bedlow. You did read it aloud.

Sir G. Wakeman. Had I any acquaintance with you?

Bedlow. No, but Mr. Harcourt told you who I was.

Sir G. Wakeman. And would I upon the first sight of a man discover to him what would endanger my life?

Bedlow. Ay, and a hundred times more, if Mr. Harcourt did but tell you I was his confident.

L. C. J. What were the contents of that note?

Bedlow. It was directed to a goldsmith, whose name I tell you I cannot remember.

Sir G. Wakeman. You are good at remembering some sir-names, why can't you remember this name as well?

Bedlow. I can remember names that do relate to any business, but only hearing this name by the by, I cannot remember it, for I did not then think it of such consequence.

Sir G. Wakeman. You do not know me?

Bedlow. Yes, I do.

Sir G. Wakeman. I call God to witness I never saw you before in my life, that I know of. You have a very remarkable face, and if a man had once seen you he must know you again.

L. C. J. Who subscribed that note?

Bedlow. I don't know, it was one of the queen's gentlemen that Harcourt had it from. And whereas sir George Wakeman says he does not know me, I did take physic of him at the Bath.

Sir G. Wakeman. When was I at the Bath?

Bedlow. It was some years since.

Sir G. Wakeman. I never was there but once, and that was a year and a half ago.

Bedlow. No, sir, it is more than that, for you were there when the queen was there.

L. C. J. How long is it ago that you were there, Sir George?

Sir G. Wakeman. It was about two years ago.

Bedlow. It is three years this summer.

L. C. J. Then that is well enough; for that is some years since.

Bedlow. I had acquaintance enough with him while he was there.

Sir G. Wakeman. I say this, my lord, if I had been acquainted with Mr. Bedlow, I should have known him to be a great rogue, which is but what he hath said of himself; and then I should not have thought it fit to have trusted such an one with such a great secret as this.

L. C. J. It may be he calls himself great rogue for that which you would have applauded him for, and canonized him too. It may be he thinks he was a rogue for going so far as he did; but perhaps you are of another opinion.

Bedlow. My lord, I could not count myself an honest man, that had consented to the death of the king and sir Edmundbury Godfrey.

Sir G. Wakeman. But though he gives you an account of such a bill delivered to me, yet neither he tells you the time, nor mentions the man upon whom it was drawn; here are all the marks of falsehood that can possibly be.

L. C. J. No, he does not mention the man upon whom it was drawn, nor from whom; nor can he say that ever you received it; but you were to receive it.

Sir G. Wakeman. How came he to omit that? but because I should have no plea for myself when I came to be accused of it.

Bedlow. Pray, sir George, do not press me to say more than I know. I do tell you all that I can say of myself.

Mr. Recorder. Have you any more questions to ask him?

Marshal. I ask you this question; First, Why will you damn your soul to send me to Heaven? Lay your hand upon your heart, and in the presence of God declare whether ever you saw me in your life, before you came to the Gatehouse? Whether ever you saw me in any part of the world whatsoever? And whereas you say now that I owned that I knew you there; it was so far from it, that all the company that were there, will say that you did not know me, and declared yourself a stranger to me.

Bedlow. No, sir, pardon me; you did not deny but that you had seen my face.

Marshal. No, all the company that were there will say that you owned yourself a stranger to me; you told me, Mr. Marshal, be not afraid; I will do you no hurt. But Mr. Bedlow, where have you seen me?

Bedlow. At the Benedictine Convent in the Savoy. And, my lord, the first word that I said, when I saw him, was, that this man's name is Marshal, and he carried such and such letters into the country, and sir William Waller can testify the same: (who standing upon the bench, was sworn.)

Mr. Recorder. Mr. Marshal, you had best to hearken to what sir William Waller says.

Sir W. Waller. My lord, I went to the prison to see Mr. Marshal, and Mr. Bedlow was there with me; Mr. Bedlow asked him if he did not know him, and called him by his name; he declared he had seen him before, but said he did not know him.

L. C. J. Did he call him by his name as if he knew him?

Sir W. Waller. Yes, my lord, he did.

L. C. J. Look you, Mr. Marshal, he says that you yourself owned that you had seen him before, though you were not of his acquaintance.

Marshal. What sir William Waller says I must oppose, though I am extremely sorry so to do. Sir William, you may please to remember that you came to me after Mr. Bedlow was gone.

Sir W. Waller. No, I was there with you before he came in.

Marshal. I believe those of the Gatehouse do remember that I spoke with Mr. Bedlow in private in an interior room; what you spoke was in the open hall there. You asked me whether Mr. Bedlow had not been there? I told you, yes; that was in the public place; whereas Mr. Bedlow talked with me only in a private room.

Sir W. Waller. My lord, what I have said is upon my oath, and it is nothing but the truth.

Marshal. And I am upon my life, therefore I am very sorry I must for the truth sake, and defence of my life, contradict what you say. What your worship and I spoke was in the public room; but what discourse Mr. Bedlow and I had, was in another private room.

L. C. J. Look you, sir William Waller, was you there when Mr. Bedlow was with him?

Sir W. Waller. I was, my lord.

L. C. J. Where?

Sir W. Waller. In the common room.

L. C. J. What did he say concerning Mr. Bedlow in the common room?

Sir W. Waller. Mr. Bedlow called him by his name, and asked if he knew him? He said he had seen his face, but did not know him.

L. C. J. Do you hear that, Mr. Marshal?

Marshal. Truly, my lord, it goes against my heart to speak any thing in opposition to what sir William Waller says, for I would not for all the world reflect or say any thing that should glance upon sir William Waller, as if he had taken a false oath; but all in the Gatehouse, may Mr. Bedlow himself knows, that he had discourse with me in a private room before sir William Waller came.

L. C. J. Mr. Bedlow, speak yourself; was sir William Waller there when you came to the Gatehouse?

Bedlow. My lord, I had an order from the council-board to go and see the prisoner, there was nobody that told me his name, nor that I knew, knew it; but I would not do it, I was so cautious, but in the hearing and company of a justice of the peace, and therefore I went away before they had called him down, and I went to see if the House of Commons were sitting; and when I came back, sir W. Waller was just coming thither, and so I went in with him, for I met him at the bottom of the stairs. We came into the common room, and there was Mr. Marshal with the keeper, and I was in no other room, but the common room. And sir Wm. Waller withdrew to the end of the room while I asked him some questions; and pray will you please to ask sir W. Waller whether I did not call him by his name as soon as I saw him?

Sir W. Waller. Yes, my lord, he did: He asked him if his name was not Marshal: and whether he did not know him: and he said he had seen his face, but had no acquaintance with him.

Marshal. Were not you with me first in that room which turns in on the right-hand from the common room?

Bedlow. I do not know any such room in the Gatehouse.

Marshal. There were your guards, Mr. Bedlow, and there were several others in the Gatehouse; they cannot but remember what room I was brought into: They cannot possibly but remember, that when sir William Waller came to me, he asked me whether Mr. Bedlow had been with me.

L. C. J. Look you, gentlemen, they have done, call what witnesses you will, and make your defence as well as you can.

Marshal. My lord, I did not think or imagine any such thing would be spoke of; or that there would need any attestation for it.

L. C. J. Look you, they have done; we will hear what your witnesses will say as long as you will:

Marshal. My lord, Mr. Bedlow seemed a perfect stranger to me when he came to the Gatehouse; and to encourage me, told me, "Mr. Marshal," says he, "do not fear, I will do you no hurt at all: Did not you send," said he, "to such an one, to have Mr. Bedlow questioned about such and such things?" Which I denied, and he did not seem by any word that he spoke, to have seen me before in his life.

L. C. J. He told sir Wm. Waller your name was Marshal, though you went by a wrong name, the name of Marsh.

Marshal. He might easily know my name, by those that took me.

L. C. J. But I tell you, you went by a wrong name then, Marsh.

Marshal. My lord, I am called promiscuously Marsh and Marshal. But Marshal is the name I own.

L. C. J. And that is the name he knew you by.

Marshal. I did not call myself Marsh when I was taken, but told my true name.

Bedlow. My lord, I did not hear of any name at all, but I said, This is Marshal, one of the Benedictine monks, as soon as I came in.

Marshal. Mr. Bedlow seemed to encourage me to hope, and bid me not fear; said he, You will have an honourable bench, and a good Jury. And this, they that were there can testify.

L. C. J. Call them: Call your witnesses.

Marshal. But my lord, I did not know any thing of this. And sir Wm. Waller's question that he asked me was, If Mr. Bedlow was with me?

L. C. J. You hear what he says.

Marshal. I am infinitely loth to say it, because he swears it; and you well know, Mr. Bedlow, you talked with your guards a-while, and then turned at last to me.

Bedlow. Yes, I did talk with my guards, but sir William Waller was in the room as well as I.

L. C. J. By what name were you committed?

Marshal. I had letters about me, writ to me by that name? and I thought it my duty to answer to that name that the letters did call me by.

L. C. J. Well, have you any witnesses?

Marshal. This is a surprise, I did not know of any such thing.

L. C. J. Have you any witnesses, sir George Wakeman?

Sir Geo. Wakeman. Yes, my lord, I have several.

Marshal. But, Mr. Bedlow, can you say you have seen me any where before you saw me at the Gatehouse?

Bedlow. Yes.

Marshal. Where?

Bedlow. At the Savoy.

Marshal. And any where else?

Bedlow. Yes, and at other places.

Marshal. Name one other place in the whole world, and I will be contented to die.

Bedlow. I will tell you why I cannot name any other place positively. I did carry the letters thither, there were the Consults about them, and there I used to converse with you most.

Marshal. Can you prove that ever you were in the Savoy in your life? And I will be hanged without any more to do. If you can prove it either by man, woman or child, I will go to the gallows, and will not say one word more.

Bedlow. My lord, I have other witnesses, but at present I cannot produce them: There are some in Kent, they are some of them in one country and some in another, I reserve them for another time, but there is oath made of it before the secret committees of the Lords and Commons.

L. C. J. How can he imagine that this should be put upon him: Therefore you may well believe that he hath never a witness present. It may be he hath none can prove he ever was at Westminster-hall in his life, for who could imagine such a question should be put to him?

Marshal. Having been there several times, I suppose he did not use to go alone; it is impossible, but if they had been with him often there, he might prove it; if he say true, sure some should attest it.

L. C. J. It is likely it should be so, but he hath them not here.

Justice Pemberton. Why, do you think he can bring witnesses for every act that he did in his life?

Marshal. If he have them not here, let him have time to produce them.

L. C. J. He hath a witness in Kent, would you have us keep up the Jury till he sends for his witness out of Kent.

Bedlow. There is my landlord, at whose house I lay so long, can testify it.

Marshal. Who is that?

Bedlow. Mr. Cott, a belt-maker in the New Exchange. He hath gone often with me when I have gone into the convent, and he hath gone round about, and his maid that used to carry the portmanteau, wherein I brought over the letters from beyond sea.

L. C. J. Can you name any one body that ever saw you in the Savoy?

Bedlow. I do name one; and besides, my lord, I lay in the Savoy half a year at one Woodroff's.

Marshal. Was that the place you saw me in?

Bedlow. No, nobody came there but monks and messengers.

Marshal. Was you there at the time when the Savoy was searched?

Bedlow. No, but I gave sir William Waller directions to search in the most material places of it.

Mr. Recorder. He says a material thing, if he be in the right, that he did give directions to sir William Waller to search in the most material places of the Savoy. We will ask that question of sir William whether he did or no.

Sir Wm. Waller. Both Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow did give me directions to search in the Savoy; they told me of such a particular room where Pickering lay, and where such a closet was, and many other things; and it was by their directions that I made the search.

L. C. J. Look you what sir William Waller says; he says that both Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow did describe several rooms to him in the Savoy, which it was impossible for them to make such a description, if they had not been there before.

Marshal. I desire to know when that description was given?

Sir Wm. Waller. Two or three days before I took Mr. Marshal.

Marshal. Mr. Oates made searches there before.

L. C. J. But we speak of Bedlow now.

Marshal. But Mr. Bedlow might have knowledge from him and others that were there.

L. C. J. Do you think he must needs go officiously to inform Bedlow of what he found, upon an imagination that such a question should fall out hereon? And if he received no information, how then could he describe the rooms without he knew them?

Marshal. May there not be several houses that I may give a description of, upon the hearsay of others, though I were never in them myself?

L. C. J. No, I know not very well how; and there is no reason you should imagine he received information from Oates.

Marshal. My lord, there is reason enough, because both do combine in the same accusation.

Bedlow. My lord, I gave sir William Waller directions to search in such a place, under such a bench in Pickering's apartment, where he found the gun that was to kill the king.

L. C. J. Well, call your witnesses, sir George.

Sir G. Wakeman. Call Mr. Chapman.

L. C. J. But before they begin, sir Robert Sawyer, we must do all the right to every one we can. I do not find, by the strictest observation that I have made, that Mr. Bedlow, who is the second witness, does say any great thing, any material thing against any one of them; but as for Rumley he says nothing at all. He says, in effect, against sir George Wakeman, no more than this, That he saw Harcourt give him a note for 2,000*l.* which he said was from the queen; upon which sir George said he was more beholden to his good lady and mistress, than to any of them all. The note he does not know who drew it, nor upon whom it was drawn; nor does he say what it was for, more than what Harcourt told him, which was in doubtful words, That it was about the old business; but Harcourt did not tell him this in the presence of sir George Wakeman, but he spoke to Harcourt about it. It is no more, than sir George Wakeman received from Harcourt the bill of exchange, he does not know upon whom, nor for what.

Sir Robert Sawyer. My lord, he says more, with submission; for he says this further, That there was a discourse about the business; and he did tell you, That sir George Wakeman should complain, that they had not done well with him, and asked why he was drilled on; but when the note was produced, he said, My matters are already prepared, but you are not so ready to perform your promises. Then said Harcourt, 'If you are ready for us, we are ready for you: And told him, If he did not do it, they would do it at New-market.'

L. C. J. What is all this? Pray Mr. Bedlow stand up again: We are now in the case of men's lives, and pray have a care that you say no more than what is true upon any man whatever. I would be loth to keep out Popery by that way they would bring it in, that is by blood or violence: I would have all things go very fair; Pray what, upon your oath, was the first part of sir G. Wakeman's discourse with Harcourt when they met?

L. C. J. North. Relate again your whole knowledge concerning sir G. Wakeman, and the Bill of Exchange, and the discourse after it, because we are now upon the consideration of it, what effect it will have upon him.

Bedlow. My lord, I was with Harcourt in the chamber, and sir George Wakeman came in, and walked a turn or two about the room, and seemed to be discontented. How do you, sir George? said Harcourt. Says sir George, For what am I drilled on thus in a concern of this importance? What is the matter with you sir George? said Harcourt. Why, is this a business to be slighted, said sir George, as I am? For I have no performance of your promises. Why, said Harcourt, what would you have? we are ready for you. Then said he, I am ready for you. And then Harcourt spoke merrily to him, Why are you so angry, sir George? And upon that he goes to his cabinet, and searching among his bags he found a little note among them, and gave it to sir George; saith he, There is a bill for you: I have been to-day at Whitehall, and received it by the queen's order, from such a gentleman: [whose name I cannot now remember;] and it is upon such a man for 2,000*l.* [but I cannot remember the goldsmith's name neither.] Well, said sir George, it is well somebody gives me encouragement; I have more encouragement from my good lady and mistress, than from any of you. Nay, said Harcourt, for encouragement, that you shall not want; for the rest shall be paid in due time.

Sir G. Wakeman. If the queen had given me 2,000*l.* for the service I had done her, was that any harm? I have deserved it, I am sure, for 9 years service.

Sir R. Sawyer. What other discourse had they then?

Bedlow. Said Harcourt, But sir George, this must be well followed, and closely observed, because so much depends upon it; for if we should miss to kill him at Windsor, or you miss in your way, we will do it at New-market.

L. C. J. Who said so?

Bedlow. Harcourt.

L. C. J. Did Harcourt say, before sir George's face, If we miss killing him at Windsor, and you miss your way, we will do it at New-Market?

Bedlow. Yes, he did say, If we miss killing him at Windsor, and you miss in your way (which we hope you will not) we will do it at New-market.

L. C. J. He says now quite another thing than he said before.

L. C. J. North.

Mr. Recorder.

Sir R. Sawyer.

} No, he said the same before.

L. C. J. What answer made sir George Wakeman?

Bedlow. Sir G. Wakeman said, If I find you ready, I will be ready in all things.

L. C. J. Was the word spoke of poisoning?

Bedlow. I have spoken that already. 'If we miss at Windsor, and you miss in your way;' I do not remember whether the word Poison was used; but I knew by what Mr. Harcourt and others had told me that Poison was meant by it.

L. C. J. Was all this one intire discourse?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord.

Then Sir George said privately to his fellow-prisoners, 'There is my business done.'

Sir R. Sawyer. Here is a positive proof of the receipt of money, which coupled with what Oates says, and the discourse that Mr. Bedlow tells you of, makes it out what it was for. This was paid in part, was it not, Sir?

Bedlow. The answer that Mr. Harcourt gave to sir George, was, That he should have the rest in due time.

L. C. J. But what say you to Marshal, but that he carried letters?

Sir G. Wakeman. Was there nobody present but you?

Bedlow. There was only Harcourt, you, and I.

L. C. J. But what say you to Corker?

Bedlow. Corker hath been in the company with Le Faire, talking of news, what encouragement they had by letters from beyond sea, as those they had from France; such and such letters speak that they are in readiness of money, men and arms; and if we are ready here, they are ready for us. This was usually the discourse, and all upon the same design. Now when we talked of this business, we did not say the word Plot, but we all know what was intended by it, that is the Plot.

L. C. J. And what said Corker?

Bedlow. He said it was well. He did know what readiness such and such persons were in, when the design was likely to take effect. I know not their names; we were talking of several persons several times, some in England, and some beyond sea.

L. C. J. What can you say to Marshal?

Bedlow. I do say, that he hath been to consult of the return of letters which were the answers to those I brought from beyond sea.

L. C. J. Did he know the contents of those letters?

Bedlow. Yes, my lord, he hath been in consultation what answer to make again.

L. C. J. And was all this about the Plot?

Bedlow. Yes, for the subverting the Protestant religion, and bringing in Popery, and raising of an army.

Marshal. Can you prove I knew any of those gentlemen the letters were carried to?

Bedlow. I name one, that was to sir Francis Radcliff.

Marshal. How does he know that I know sir Francis Radcliff?

L. C. J. Well, sir George, will you call your witnesses?

Sir G. Wakeman. Call Mr. Chapman.

[Which was done.] My Lord, there was a letter or note of directions from me to Mr. Ashby, and it is affirmed by Mr. Oates, that in that letter I should let Mr. Ashby know I did approve well of the proposals that were made to me to poison the king, and that the queen would assist me in it; and that in the same letter there were directions given what he should take, and how many strokes of the pump he should make use of, and several other things fit for a physician to direct his patient in. Now, my lord, I will prove by this gentleman Mr. Chapman, who is Mayor of Bath, that he received this very note from Mr. Ashby, that he read it from the beginning to the end of it; that there was no word in it, or mention of the king or queen in the whole letter, unless it be of the king or queen's bath. And, my lord, I think he hath a piece of this letter still, that part that was the physical part he tore off, and kept himself. Now it is none of my hand, I never writ a letter to Ashby upon any occasion whatsoever; and I will tell your lordship how it came to pass I did not write that letter; I hope by a providence, for I never but used to write my physical directions with my own hand. It happened that I came home late, and I was very ill; Ashby sent to me for his note, because he was to go out of town the next morning; being weary and indisposed, I laid me down on the couch, and sent for my man, who is an apothecary now, and is better able to write such a letter; I dictated the letter to him, all my family, and all that were by, can testify the same: he knows very well my hand, and hath part of it to produce; for when the queen was there, I made use of him for my apothecary, and those physical directions I sent down for the bath, I sent always to him. He is a very good witness as to my hand.

L. C. J. But you may speak of one letter, and Mr. Oates of another.

Sir G. Wakeman. Why, did I write two letters of directions? what need that? He says he saw a letter with my name subscribed to it.

L. C. J. Yes, it was so, and that you should be assisted by the queen to poison the king; and being asked how he did know that was your hand? he said, I did not see him write, but I saw him in the posture of writing; and when he went away, there was left on the table, and the ink was not dry, a physical bill, which was the same hand with that the letter was.

Sir G. Wakeman. Ay, my lord, but he does not call that a letter, but it was a physical bill, and not a letter; so that there was but one letter.

L. C. J. But there was a note of physical directions in the letter.

Oates. That letter was at least half a sheet of a side, close written, wherein were those passages that I mentioned; but I cannot give an account of all contained in it; but this, my lord, I remember, that he should take a pint of milk in the morning, and a pint of milk in the evening, and should have so many strokes at the bath; but this was several days before Ashby went to the bath, I believe at least ten. Presently after he came to town. And I say, that this letter that the court asks me how I prove it to be his hand, I prove it thus: I saw him write a bill to an apothecary for Mr. Ashby to take something when he was in town.

L. C. J. But was that business of being assisted to kill the king in the same letter that the physical directions were in?

Oates. Yes, my lord.

Sir G. Wakeman. Then it is the same letter.

L. C. J. How does that follow? might there not be two?

Sir G. Wakeman. There is only that part of it which is the physical prescriptions, he hath torn off the other part.

Then Mr. Chupman was examined.

Chapman. My Lord, the 17th of July last, Mr. Thimbleby came to the bath.

L. C. J. Who?

Chapman. Mr. Thimbleby; a man of about fourscore years of age, a very feeble and infirm man. As soon as he came to me, he told me that sir G. Wakeman recommended me to him, and desired me that I would provide a lodging for him as near the king and queen's bath as I could: I did so; and then he shewed me a letter from sir George, whereof this was the lower part of half a sheet of paper; there was full directions how to take the physic, and after the taking the bolus, to drink the waters so many days, and then to use the bath, and after that the pump, and after that he was to take a dose of pills after his bathing. I took off this latin bill that concerns me, my lord, and gave him the English part.

L. C. J. Did you read the English part?

Chapman. My Lord, my son read it as well as I, who should have come up, and testified the same, but that it is impossible for both my son and me to leave the shop and come together, because of my employment.

L. C. J. But in that letter there was nothing mentioned of killing the king, was there? nor of the queen?

Chapman. No, my Lord, not upon the word of a christian, except it were the king and queen's bath.

Then the Paper was shewn him.

L. C. J. Whose hand is that? do you believe it is sir George's hand?

Chapman. No, my lord: I have brought some of sir G. Wakeman's bills here.

L. C. J. Do you know whose hand it is?

Chapman. No, my Lord.

Just. Atkins. What name was subscribed to that letter?

Chapman. There is none subscribed to this paper.

L. C. J. Was there no name to it?

Chapman. I did not take notice of that.

L. C. J. But look, you, this cannot be that letter, because that letter Mr. Oates speaks of was of sir George's own hand, as he thinks by comparison, and his name subscribed to it.

Sir G. Wakeman. I never writ any other letter, but what was dictated to my man, and sent by Ashby to the bath. My Lord, he hath owned it himself before the House of Lords, that I writ but one letter, and I had my liberty before. Now it was told him there, that if he had mentioned that letter when I was examined before the council, I had been certainly taken into custody then, and should never have had my liberty so long. I had my liberty from the last of September, and could have gone to Constantinople in the time I had my liberty; and certainly I should have provided for myself if I had known myself guilty, seeing so many cast into prison upon that account.

Recorder. It is not probable that Mr. Ashby would communicate such a letter to this gentleman, that had such a design in it.

Sir G. Wakeman. But if any one can, let him prove that I had any other business with him than merely the business of a physician with his patient. My Lord, I have a physician in town, that will testify, that I was to meet him in consultations about Ashby.

L. C. J. The answer is no more than this, That you did write a letter, or there was a letter writ by your directions, to Ashby, which hath not any such matter in it as Oates speaks of; but this answers not Mr. Oates's testimony; it is true, the question will be upon Mr. Oates's credit, how far the jury will believe him: if Mr. Oates swears true, then you did write another letter, and this is not the letter, and there is no contradiction in your answer, to what he says, but Mr. Oates stands with the jury how far they will believe him.

Sir G. Wakeman. Gentlemen of the jury take notice, I never writ any letter but that.

L. C. J. How does that appear? if Mr. Oates swears true, you did write another letter.

Justice Atkins. Mr. Chapman, was there any mention of milk in that letter.

Chapman. No, my Lord. It is ridiculous to drink milk with the waters, it will make it curdle.

Oates. That is not the hand the letter I saw was in.

L. C. J. He says it is not the same hand.

Oates. It was another, a genteel hand.

Justice Pemberton. And there was no mention made of milk in it, the contents are not the same.

Sir G. Wakeman. The contents were the same but as for the milk, it is so ridiculous a thing, that never a physician in England, but will say it is perfect poison. I appeal to Mr. Chapman, who hath so long known the way there used, if any one prescribed milk to any one that took the waters.

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, was there, in the letter you saw, where mention is made of the strokes that were to be received from the pump, any mention of the milk to be taken?

Oates. The direction of the milk was for the time he staid in town.

Justice Atkins. The milk was to be used while he staid here, was it?

Oates. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Look you, there were two things that he should do, the one of them was to be done while he was here, that was milk, the other was to be done when at the bath, and that was the strokes.

Sir G. Wakeman. No, it is no such thing; for he went away two days after that letter was written.

Just. Pemberton. Mr. Chapman, is this part of the body of the letter?

Chapman. Yes, my lord, upon the word of a Christian; I tore it off myself.

Justice Ellys. If Dr. Oates swears true, it cannot be the same letter.

L. C. J. Your answer to it, which should make it probable, is, That it is ridiculous to prescribe milk. Now he says those were directions what he was to do before he went to the bath.

Sir Geo. Wakeman. Why should I repeat the number of the strokes twice, and write two letters about one thing?

Justice Pemberton. Is there any date upon that letter?—Chapman. No.

Justice Pemberton. Out of what part of the letter did you tear it?

Chapman. Off the bottom of it.

L. C. J. North. What, it was writ cross, was it?

Chapman. Yes, I believe so.

Justice Atkins. The truth of it is, This is no evidence, and ought not to be offered as such, for it is but a part of a thing, which we do not know what it was in the whole.

Chapman. I can give it upon my oath that there was nothing in it of the king or queen, except the king or queen's bath.

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, if I remember right, you say the directions that you saw were at the beginning of the letter.

Oates. He was very weak when he came to town, and his directions to him then were, That he should take a pint of milk in the morning, and that when he went to the bath he should have a hundred strokes, or thereabouts.

L. C. J. Was this in the beginning of the letter?

Oates. It was after a line or two that was compliments.

L. C. J. Was there any receipt for physic, in Latin, in it?

Oates. No, my lord, there was not: no, my lord, it was half a sheet of paper; it was full of itself to the bottom; this is not the letter, my lord.

Justice Pemberton. He says, this is neither the hand, nor the name subscribed, nor the contents of the letter; all these differ.

Sir G. Wakeman. I will tell you the reason why my name was not subscribed, I was sick, my man is here to witness, that he carried it himself, and delivered it to Ashby.

Justice Pemberton. But, sir George, you do not observe, that to the letter which he saw your name was subscribed.

Sir G. Wakeman. This then is that I desire may be taken notice of; it is not probable that I should write two letters for the same thing, and I never writ any other letter in my life.

L. C. J. This is that you say, and let it be taken notice of, That it is not probable that you should write two letters, for the same directions how he might use the bath.

Justice Pemberton. This might be writ to serve a turn very well.

Sir G. Wakeman. Then I will tell you the reason why my name is not to it, and so I satisfy you about it as much as I can; I was very ill after I had dictated that letter to him, and went immediately to bed. It was not writ very fair, or something was left out, which he interlined, and so he transcribed it again, in his own chamber, and I was then asleep, and so did not put my name to it, and he went away two hours in the morning before I awoke.

Justice Atkins. Who wrote the letter? Was the letter you tore off in the man's name, or in sir George's name?

Chapman. I know not who wrote it.

Justice Atkins. Was it said to be, By my master's directions? What were the contents of the letter?

Chapman. It was only thus, "As soon as you come to the bath, after resting a day, in the first place take your bolus, and after drink the waters." Which he did, for six days together.

Oates. My lord, I would answer to this: this was not the letter, for therein he only told him what he should do before he went to the bath, and how many strokes he should receive; besides, my lord, there was not one syllable of the bolus in the letter, or what bath he was to go into; but when he came there, he was to receive so many strokes of the pump.

Sir G. Wakeman. Nor one syllable of the milk in it neither?

Oates. Yes, there was; he did take milk, night and morning, for I attended upon him.

Sir G. Wakeman. My lord, you see this witness is a Protestant.

Justice Pemberton. Mr. Oates, you say that the letter that you saw was written ten days before he went to the bath?

Oates. Yes, it not more.

Sir G. Wakeman. Why should I tell him of an hundred strokes so long before he went to the bath?

L. C. J. You might mention it to give him satisfaction. Well, have you any more?

Sir G. Wakeman. Yes, my lord, Call Hunt. [Who stood up.]

L. C. J. What do you call him to, sir George?

Sir G. Wakeman. This is my man. What do you know concerning a letter of directions that was sent to Mr. Ashby? Give an account of it.

Hunt. If it please your honour, my master was out late, and coming home, I told him, Mr. Ashby had sent for some directions for the bath; and being weary and indisposed, (for it was late, and he was not well) said he, 'I cannot write myself, do you take my pen and ink, and write;' I did take the pen and ink, and write; and when I had written, something was false in it; 'Pray,' said he, 'correct that: I did so, and interlined it, and when my master was in bed I writ it over again, and the next morning, before he was awake, I carried it to Mr. Ashby myself, and there were only directions in it what to do at the bath.'

L. C. J. When was Mr. Ashby to go to the bath? How soon after?

Hunt. He was to go the next morning.

L. C. J. If what Mr. Oates swears, be true, this letter that he saw was ten days before, so what he speaks is another thing.

Sir G. Wakeman. I never writ any such letter in my life, and I hope the jury will take notice of it.

Justice Atkins. Do you know any thing of Mr. Ashby's drinking milk while he was here?

Hunt. No, but he was saying he was advised by a friend of his to drink milk.

L. C. J. When, at the bath?

Hunt. No, when he was in town.

L. C. J. When he was in town? that is consistent with Mr. Oates's testimony.

Sir G. Wakeman. My lord, there is a physician that was in consultation with me about Mr. Ashby, I think it of great consequence to shew that I came to him about no treasonable affair, I vow to Almighty God I did not.

L. C. J. If you have any more witnesses, call them.

Sir G. Wakeman. Call Elizabeth Henningham [Who stood up.]

L. C. J. Sir George, What do you ask her?

Henningham. I was present, my lord, at the writing of the letter. His servant writ, and he dictated to him, every word of the letter I saw, but there was no such thing in it.

L. C. J. I am very confident that this is true that you say, but it is not to the thing that Mr. Oates speaks of, and charges you withal: that you did write such a letter as these people mention, and there was nothing in it but like a physician's directions to his patient, I do believe, and this was just when he was going to the bath? but Mr. Oates tells you (if he says true) that this letter he speaks of, to which sir G. Wakeman was subscribed, was ten days before he went to the bath; and that there was no mention of any bolus in that, but the direction was in the first part how he was to use himself, while he staid in town to drink milk, and when he came to the bath, to use the pump, so that this your witnesses say, and you urge, is true, but not pertinent.

Sir Geo. Wakeman. I say, my lord, it is not probable that I should write directions so long before he went.

Henningham. My lord, he said himself he wanted directions to go to the Bath, in my own bearing.

Justice Pemberton. Yes, he might, and indeed he did so, for the first contained none, but how he should behave himself while he was here.

L. C. J. Have you any more witnesses? Pray call them:

Sir Geo. Wakeman. My lord, I have this to say, as I told you before, that I had my liberty for twenty-four days after my examination before the council. Mr. Oates called at the bar of the House of Commons, and there gave an account of this very Letter that he mentions now, I say it was at the bar of the House of Commons. And thereupon the Commons sent an Address to the House of Lords, with astonishment that I was not under confinement; and thereupon Mr. Oates was called to the bar of the House of Lords, and was commanded to give an account what it was he knew concerning me, that should create such an astonishment in the House of Commons: He told them of this Letter, and my Lord Chancellor said to him, Do you know it was sir G. Wakeman's hand? No, said he: How do you know it was his Letter then? I know it only by this, said he, it was subscribed, 'George Wakeman.' If he had such proof as he says he hath now, if he had seen me writing, and came into the room where the paper I writ was yet wet, whether he would not have mentioned it there when he was examined about the knowledge of my hand.

L. C. J. Call your witnesses: But what say you, Mr. Oates, yourself to it?

Oates. My lord, sir G. Wakeman had his liberty because I was so weak, by reason of being up two nights together, one whereof was so very wet, and being hot, wet, and cold, all in a few hours time, so that I thought it would have cost me my life; not being used to such hard services, I did not charge sir George so fully: Though it may be objected to this court, that I was bound to speak the whole truth; and so I did, as opportunity and health would give me leave. And as to the Letter, and what I said about it in the Lords' House, sir George is mistaken. He says here that I said I knew his hand no otherwise, but by seeing sir George Wakeman subscribed to it.

Sir G. Wakeman. I will prove it by the Record.

Oates. Now, my lord; I humbly desire that he may propose his questions to the court: and I desire to know, whether I did say, I did not know it any other ways but by its being signed G. Wakeman.

Sir G. Wakeman. Pray, my lord, be pleased to give me leave—

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, did you mention in the House of Lords, whether you knew his hand or no?

Oates. My lord, I cannot call to mind what I then said, I did say, I saw such a letter, signed George Wakeman; but if he will bring the record, and one that shall swear those were the words, I will leave it to the jury. But this, my lord, I would add, if you will give me leave; the words I did say as near as I can remember, were these, when they asked me, how I knew sir G. Wakeman's hand? I said, I saw such a letter signed George Wakeman. Now, my lord, upon this information, they did think fit to take sir G. Wakeman up and scure him; and now I come face to face, and am not only to satisfy judges, but a jury, I shew you what reasons I have to believe it, and what they may have, that it was his hand: For I say, I saw him in a writing posture, I saw him lay by the pen, I saw him withdraw from the paper, I saw none but another gentleman there, that was lame of both his hands, and the ink was net dry, and it was the same hand with the letter.

Sir G. Wakeman. Was my name to that note?

Oates. No, I will not swear that; but the character of the hand was the same, if I may judge of writing.

L. C. J. North. Look you, sir George, you spoke of witnesses you would call to prove what he swore in the House of Lords; if you can call any witnesses for that, do.

Sir G. Wakeman. Call sir Philip Lloyd: I hope your lordship will please to allow me, at least, this advantage (I know not whether it is an advantage) that the record of the House of Lords may be made use of as a record here. If I prove it by the record, it will be a good evidence.

L. C. J. Have you that record here?

Sir G. Wakeman. I have a copy of that record, and a witness that will swear it.

Then Sir Philip Lloyd appeared, and stood up.

L. C. J. What do you ask sir Philip Lloyd?

Sir G. Wakeman. I desire to know of sir Philip Lloyd, what Mr. Oates said of me before his majesty and the council, the last day of September; Sir, you were there present, and sent by the king to me, and commanded to bring me in to the council.

Sir Philip Lloyd. I will, my lord, as well as I can, recollect and tell you, as near as I can, what Mr. Oates did then accuse him of. It was upon the 31st of September, Mr. Oates did then say he had seen a letter, to the best of his remembrance, from Mr. White to Mr. Fenwick at St. Omers, in which letter he writ word, that sir G. Wakeman had undertaken the poisoning of the king, and was to have 15,000*l.* for it; of which 5,000*l.* had been paid him by the hands of Coleman. Sir G. Wakeman, upon this, was called in, and told of this accusation; he utterly denied all, and did indeed carry himself as if he were not concerned at the accusation, but did tell the king and council, he hoped he should have reparation and satisfaction for the injury done to his honour. His carriage was not well liked of by the king and council, and being a matter of such consequence as this was, they were willing to know further of it; and because they thought this evidence was not proof enough to give them occasion to commit him, being only out of the letter of a third person, thereupon they called in Mr. Oates again, and my Lord Chancellor desired Mr. Oates to tell him, if he knew nothing personally of sir G. Wakeman, because they were in a matter of moment, and desired sufficient proof, whereupon to ground a commitment; Mr. Oates, when he did come in again, and was asked the question, did lift up his hands (for I must tell the truth, let it be what it will) and said, No, God forbid that I should say any thing against sir G. Wakeman, for I know nothing more against him. And I refer myself to the whole council, whether it was not so.

Oates. I remember not one word of all this.

Sir G. Wakeman. My lord, this is a Protestant witness too.

Oates. My lord, give me leave to make an answer: when I did report this letter, the council did ask me whether or no sir George was any ways concerned in this letter? I replied, I had it by report, that sir George had received 5,000*l.* of this money. My lord, the council did not press me, to my knowledge; I will not be positive; but if the council did press me, and I did make that answer, I do appeal to the whole board, whether or no I was in a condition to make any answer at all, when, by reason of my being hurried up and down, and sitting up, I was scarce compos mentis.

L. C. J. What, must we be amused with I know not what, for being up but two nights? You were not able to give an answer; that when they call and send for Mr. Oates again to give a positive charge, and then you tell us a story so remote: what, was Mr. Oates just so spent, that he could not say, I have seen a letter under sir George Wakeman's own hand?

Oates. My lord, I did, to the best of my remembrance, make mention of that letter that sir George Wakeman writ, before the board. I say, to the best of my skill and knowledge; but I will not be positive in it.

L. C. J. You have heard what sir Philip Lloyd says.

Just. Dolben. What say you, did Mr. Oates make any mention of this letter?

Sir P. Lloyd. Truly, my lord, I can't remember that there was any such letter mentioned. I tell you what I do remember; and afterwards because he came and gave this deposition before the Lords and Commons, that he found such a letter upon the table from sir George to Ashby, indeed I did very much wonder at it, and it made me reflect upon that other passage at the council, of his denying to accuse sir George further, and it hath been in my mind ever since.

L. C. J. And you do declare, that when the lords of the council asked him, whether he knew any thing more particularly against sir G. Wakeman, he did lift up his hands and said, 'No, God forbid I should charge him any further, I know no more against him.'

Sir P. Lloyd. Yes, my lord, so it was.

Oates. My lord, I believe sir Philip Lloyd is mistaken; but however I was so weak, and the king and council were so sensible of it, that the king himself had like to have sent me away once or twice before, because he found I was so weak.

L. C. J. It did not require such a deal of strength to say, 'I saw a letter under sir George's own hand.'

L. C. J. North. Well, it must be left to the jury: If you have any more witnesses call them.

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, sir G. Wakeman urged it right that he should not have been permitted to have his liberty so long, if you had charged him home then.

Sir G. Wakeman. Call Mr. Lydcot.

Oates. To speak the truth, they were such a council as would commit nobody.

Recorder. That was not well said.

Sir G. Wakeman. He reflects on the king and all the council.

L. C. J. You have taken a great confidence, I know not by what authority, to say any thing of any body. But this is naturally true, that when the council were offended at the carriage of sir G. Wakeman at the board, and therefore sent for Mr. Oates again, doubting in themselves, whether what they had would be sufficient to commit him; for indeed it was only a wild thing, of what was mentioned in a letter of a third person's, that sir George had accepted of 15,000*l.* and received the five; therefore, said they, we will know of Mr. Oates some more particulars, and sent for him in again, and asked him, 'Do you know any thing of your own knowledge? If he had come in then and said, 'Yes, I have seen a letter subscribed under sir G. Wakeman's hand,' would not they have committed him? surely they would. And now the council's not committing him, is an argument that they had not sufficient evidence, and Oates did omit at that time to charge him with this letter.

Then Mr. Lydcot stood up.

Sir G. Wakeman. Mr. Lydcot, have you a copy of the Lords records?

Lydcot. Yes, it is.

Sir G. Wakeman. Pray, what did Mr. Oates say to my lord chancellor in the House of Lords?

L. C. J. You must have that which is proper evidence: You shall have all the fair dealing that can be, and all that can be admitted for your defence shall be.

Sir G. Wakeman. My lord I humbly thank you I find it.

L. C. J. Ay, but this is now what the clerk writes down as minutes. It is an hard construction to make this evidence. Were you present when Mr. Oates was there and said this?

Lydcot. No, my lord, all I say, is this, this is a copy of the record in the Lords House.

L. C. J. Did Mr. Oates set his hand to that record.

Lydcot. Yes, in some places. It is Titus Oates set in diverse places as his hand to examinations.

L. C. J. But is Mr. Oates's own hand set to the record?

Lydcot. I know nothing of that.

L. C. J. This is the objection. It will be hard that if a clerk takes the depositions of Oates or any one else, and takes them as near as he can, but he never subscribes it, and you prove only it is a copy of what the clerk wrote, that cannot be allowed as evidence.

Lydcot. It is a copy in most places of what is under Mr. Relf's own hand.

L. C. J. But you can't swear the clerk write true?

Lydcot. No, that I can't.

L. C. J. It may be an entry of what the House of Lords did upon the examination: That is not evidence here.

Just. Pemberton. If you can produce any one that heard Mr. Oates give in his information, you say well.

Sir G. W. I believe there is a difference between the entry-book and the book of records; and I hope you will look upon the book of the House of Lords as the highest evidence, beyond any verbal averment. My life is in your hands, I ask you whether it be not so, or no?

L. C. J. North. If there be a record in any court of record, that such a man appeared in court, it is an evidence that he was in court, and a record for it; but when there is an examination in a court of record, these not passing the examination of that court, but being taken by the clerks, we always in evidence expect there should be somebody to prove, that such an examination was sworn and subscribed to.

L. C. J. Have you any witnesses here, that were by, and heard what Mr. Oates did then depose, and can testify what Mr. Oates said when he was called in, and particularly what answer he made to that single question of my Lord Chancellor's how he came to know it was your hand?

Sir G. W. I can bring none but these records or the lords themselves, and I can't expect it from them. And that which they call a record, I am not able to judge whether it be a record or no.

L. C. J. Were there not others called with him into the Lords House?

Sir G. W. No, there was none but the lords themselves.

L. C. J. You should have had the clerks here that made the entry, or saw him set his hand to the examination.

L. C. J. North. This is nothing, but, as he says, a transcript out of the Journal.

Lydcot. I believe it is written most under Mr. Relf's own hand. There is a great deal of it that contains the whole narrative that Oates gave in.

L. C. J. North. You desire to give in evidence what Mr. Oates said at the bar of the House of Lords to what my lord chancellor asked him; if you have any witnesses that can prove it, they shall be heard.

Sir G. W. My lord, I have no witnesses, only the record.

L. C. J. This is only a copy of a narrative.

Sir G. W. If you will not allow it to be a record, I cannot help it.

Recorder. This is no part of the record of the House of Lords, it cannot be allowed.

L. C. J. Well, have you any other witnesses to any thing else?

Sir G. W. I desire you would examine sir Philip Lloyd once more. [Who was called, but answered not.]

Recorder. He is gone out of the Court.

L. C. J. Well, what say the rest? Mr. Corker, have you any witnesses in the first place?—Corker. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Mr. Marshal, have you any witnesses, answer that first, before you enter upon your defence; you shall be heard afterwards.

Then Sir Philip Lloyd came into Court again.

Recorder. Sir George, here is sir Philip Lloyd here now, what would you ask him?

Sir G. W. Sir Philip Lloyd, I desire to know concerning the last examination of Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, before the council; (you were there present, as I am informed) pray will you tell what you know.

Sir P. Lloyd. To what point, Sir?

Sir G. W. To their whole evidence.

Sir P. Lloyd. I suppose what they have given in lately, they have acquainted the bench with already. It was some day this very month, but I would know what it is sir George would have me speak to?

L. C. J. What was there relating to sir G. Wakeman?

L. C. J. North. But pray consider; whether it be a question fit to be asked of the clerk of the council what was done in council without leave of the board. I do not think he is bound to answer the question.

Just. Pemberton. Sir George, if you would ask him to any one particular question, it were something.

Sir G. W. I have done with him; I hope he will excuse me, I have put him to this trouble.

L. C. J. Then Mr. Marshal, have you any witnesses?

Marshal. I cannot say I have any direct positive witnesses.

L. C. J. Think not that you shall be concluded, we are not in haste, you shall have time, to say what you will; but if you would use any witnesses, call them.

Marshal. For the present I shall have no use of any.

L. C. J. Well, Mr. Rumley, have you any witnesses?

Rumley. I think I have.

L. C. J. I cannot tell of any need you have of any, for there is but one witness against you.

Corker. But he desires that his witnesses may be heard, it is but short.

Sir R. Sawyer. There is no need of it, Mr. Rumley, we cannot insist on it against you, you must be acquitted.

Recorder. Will he have his witnesses called? If he will, he shall, though there is no need of it.

Rumley. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Then, sir Robert Sawyer, would you say any thing more for the king, before the prisoners make their defence?

Sir R. Sawyer. My lord, there is one thing which I would have answered, that is, the variance between what Mr. Oates said before the council, and what he says now, upon the testimony of sir Philip Lloyd, who says, that he gave no testimony of this letter under sir G. Wakeman's hand; but being asked, whether he knew any thing of his own knowledge, he said, he had only met with a letter from White to Fenwick, wherein it was said, so much was proposed to, and accepted by sir G. Wakeman: And that he should then declare that he could say more; and lifting up his hands, affirm with a protestation he knew no more. Gentlemen, We hope to give you satisfaction in this matter, for it was after a long and tedious examination; and we shall prove to you that he was in great confusion, being almost tired out with examination, which is not impossible to happen to any man, though of the strongest constitution and memory, after two nights waking, and continual hurrying up and down. We shall call sir Thomas Doleman to prove, that he was under great confusion, and that the king and council were so sensible of it, that some of them would have had him gone away a great while before he did go away. Swear sir T. Doleman. [Which was done.]

Sir R. Sawyer. You hear what hath been objected and said by sir Philip Lloyd, will you tell your knowledge of this matter?

Sir T. Doleman. My lord, Mr. Oates did appear before the king and council, I think on the Saturday, before which was Michaelmas-eve. The council sat long that morning, the council sat again in the afternoon, and Mr. Oates was employed that night, I think, to search after some Jesuits, who were then taken, and that was the work of that night. The council, I think, sat again Sunday in the afternoon, Mr. Oates was then examined, the council sat long, and at night he was sent abroad again to search the lodgings of several priests, and to find out their papers, which he did seize upon, and one of the nights in that season was a very wet night; he went either with a messenger, or with a guard upon him. On Monday morning the council sat again, and he was further examined, and went abroad; and Monday night Mr. Oates was in as feeble and weak a condition as ever I saw man in my life; and was very willing to have been dismissed for that time; for he seemed to be in very great weakness and order, so that I believe he was scarce able to give a good answer.

Sir R. Sawyer. Was that the time that Lloyd speaks of?

Sir T. Doleman. I think it was Monday night.

Sir G. W. I received it tuesday, by a letter from a

Sir T. Dokeman. You were called in on Monday night, the night before the king went to New-Market.

Sir G. W. I appeared upon Sunday, and was dismissed by sir Philip Lloyd, who came out and let me know that the king said, he would have the hearing of it himself, the next day.

Sir T. Dokeman. Then, Sir, you were called in, and you gave your answer; and the whole council was amazed at the manner of it: For you did not, in my opinion, or in the opinion of several others, deny it so positively as one that was innocent could, but used many great expressions of your own great fidelity and loyalty to the king, and of your family and the services they had paid the crown, and did require satisfaction and reparation for the injury done to your honour.

Sir G. Wakeman. My lord, I will give you a brief account of it; I leave it to you, whether I behaved myself ill or no; I confess, I think I might have behaved myself more submissively; there was nothing of duty wanting in my mind, but I will give you an account of what I said, verbatim. My Lord Chancellor told me, that I was accused of the blackest of crimes; that I had undertaken to poison the king. I asked him who was my accuser, he pointed to Mr. Oates, and told me Mr. Oates was my accuser. Says I, Mr. Oates, do you know me? Did you ever see me before? Mr. Oates said, No. Why then, said I, how come you to be my accuser? Said he, I will tell you: I was at St. Omers, where there was a consult of the Jesuits, at which Mr. Ashby the rector of the college at St. Omers did preside; and in that consult it was debated who was the fittest person for that horrid undertaking of poisoning the king, and unanimously it was agreed upon at that consult, that you were, sir G. Wakeman by name: And now he says it was debated here in England. Then, my lord, (said I, to my Lord Chancellor) here is no proof, therefore I hope there is no need of any defence. Said he, There is no smoke, but there is some fire. My lord, said I, if you understand by that, there can be no accusation without some guilt, I should be sorry I should not understand both sacred and prophane history better than to think so. Then he pressed me to know what I could say for myself. Said I, my lord, I come of a loyal family, my father had suffered very much, to the value of 18,000*l.* and more for the royal family. My brother raised a troop of horse for the king, and served him from the beginning of the war to the end. He was major to the marquis of Worcester, at Worcester fight, and lost his life by the wounds he received in the king's service. As for my own part, said I, I travelled very young, and came over when Ireton was Lord Mayor, and both by my religion and my name, was suspected to be a favourer of the royal party, and therefore was imprisoned, and did not come out till I had given great security: and the second time I was committed, was, when I entered into a plot, the only plot I was guilty of, I conspired with Captain Lucy and several others to attempt something for his majesty's Restoration, when few durst appear for him. I was seized on in my bed; there were several arms found in my apothecary's cellar, and we were both committed to prison; and we should both have suffered death certainly, if his majesty's happy Restoration had not prevented it. When my lord pressed me still to say what I could say for myself, as to what was charged on me; I told him, my lord, I am under the most foul and false accusation that ever innocent gentleman was, and I expect reparation; and upon that they were offended, and I was hid to withdraw. And I added this beside, my lord, that there was not a family in England that was so much instrumental in his majesty's Restoration, as that family was; that Col. Charles Gifford was my near kinsman, so was Col. Carlos; and that the Pendrels were menial servants to the family; and I hope they deserve some favour.

L. C. J. What have you to say, sir George, in your present defence here? Make what observations you will now, upon the testimony hath been given against you.

Sir G. Wakeman. My lord, I say this, if it had been allowed me to make use of the Records of the House of Lords, it would have made all things so evident and clear as nothing can be more; for then, when he was called to that bar, to give an account what he had declared to the House of Commons concerning me, he gave an account of this letter.

Justice Pemberton. Sir George, you must not make mention any more of these things, that could not be given in evidence.

Sir G. Wakeman. Then, my lord, I have no more to say.

L. C. J. What say you, Mr. Corker?

Corker. My lord, I hope the Court will not require that I should bring any particular evidence in confutation of what is here alledged against me; for before I came to this bar, I did not know any particular accusation that was against me; and therefore I could not be ready to answer it and make my defence, or bring particular witnesses to evidence and show my innocency. Besides, my lord, it is a known general maxim, That a positive assertion is as easy to be made, as to prove a negative, is oftentimes hard, if not impossible. Men may easily devise crimes and frame accusations against innocent men in such a manner, that the contrary cannot possibly be demonstrated. No mortal man can tell where he was, and what he did and said every day and hour of his whole life. Therefore I think it is not only positive bare swearing, but it is probable swearing, that must render a man guilty of a crime. Otherwise, my lord, it would be lawful and in the power of Oates and his companions here, to hang, by turns, upon bare oath, all the innocent men in the whole nation, though never so innocent, and that for crimes never so ridiculous.

lous and absurd. And I say this further, he that swears against another, first, ought to be himself a credible witness; and then, secondly, strengthened by probable circumstances; circumstances that bring along with them some probable evidence distinct from the witnesses themselves: Otherwise, I think that the party accused, without any proof of his side, ought to remain in the possession of his own innocency. Now, I think, my lord, there will be never any one of these two necessary conditions to be found in the evidence against me; for, first, the witnesses against me, are persons that are, or at least formerly have been, of scandalous lives.

L. C. J. You should prove it, before you say it. You shall have all things allowed you that are fit; but you must not heap up contumelies upon men unproved, or call men names, when you have proved nothing against them. If you can prove any thing, of God's name do it; prove them as fully as you can.

Corker. I do only say this, They have been reported and owned by themselves, as men that have been of scandalous lives.

L. C. J. If the jury know it of their own knowledge, I leave it to them; but you have proved nothing.

Corker. Well, my lord, but then, in the next place, neither will the positive oaths of men formerly infamous, be any convincing arguments of our guilt: And then next, as to the other circumstances that should render me guilty, Mr. Oates does not here make me guilty alone of this grand conspiracy; but he involves the nobility, gentry, and the whole body of the Catholics in this treason. Now, my lord, I refer it to the judgment of the Court, whether so many persons as he names, and those of such eminent quality, and of such considerable estates in their countries, persons settled under so good a king, in so peaceable a kingdom; so quiet in condition; men of good and virtuous lives and unblemished conversations, before this hour, should hazard their honours, their lives, their families, their bodies, their souls, their all in such a design!

L. C. J. What is this to your case?

Corker. My lord, if this be not probable, I hope I am free of the Plot.

L. C. J. But what is this to your case? Pray hear; you are now making a speech against Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, That they do accuse people of great honour and quality; he hath given no accusation against any as yet, that you are to take notice of. You ought to make use of nothing as an argument to the jury, but of the evidence that hath been given to the jury. If you can make use of any thing that Mr. Oates or Mr. Bedlow hath said here to contradict them, or invalidate their testimony, you have said well. But to talk of such a story, of accusing noblemen, and such like, when there is nothing of that before you; you must first prove what you will infer from.

Corker. My lord, this I take to be of very great honour to myself, that since the truth of this evidence does depend upon the certainty of the Plot, and this pretended conspiracy against his sacred majesty; if there be no such plot and conspiracy, and if, by circumstances, I can render it improbable, I hope the jury will take it into consideration.

L. C. J. Ay, ay, I am of that opinion, if thou canst but satisfy us and the jury, that there is no Plot, thou shalt be quitted by my consent.

Corker. I will, my lord, shew you the improbability of it.

L. C. J. Ay, do but give us one probable argument, (you being a learned man, and a priest) why we should believe, there is no Plot.

Corker. My lord, I would have endeavoured to have shewn you the improbability of it, but yet I would not urge it, because it may not be so grateful to your lordship. But to me, it is not probable, that so many honourable and virtuous persons should be involved in a Plot so dangerous, so horrid and detestable in itself; wherein, my lord, as he says, so many thousands of people, and even a whole nation, were to be overwhelmed: of which, if a discovery had been made by any person, it would have prevented the utter ruin of so many millions. It is not rational or probable, that such vast whole armies should be raised, and foreign nations concerned in the Plot. All which, notwithstanding all the evidence that can be made out of this Plot, is but only their positive swearing.

L. C. J. Just now you made your objection, that it was a strange thing that such a design should be communicated to so many; now you make it a wonder why so few should know it, only Oates and Bedlow. Your argument before was, that it was a wonderful thing, that so great a concern should be communicated to any one, and now you wonder more, that none should know it but they two.

Corker. Therefore, my lord, I from thence argue thus, that since there is no other evidence, nor further proof of it, than from Mr. Oates, and Mr. Bedlow, I infer there is no such thing at all.

L. C. J. Yes, as for your army, there is more than so: Do you remember what Mr. Dugdale and what Mr. Praunce say?

Corker. Yes, my lord, considering these persons, what they are, their vile oaths, and the encouragement they have met with, by such endearments and caresses, as they have found, their credit is not much to be weighed. Now, my lord, I apply to the accusation that is against myself.

L. C. J. Ay, ay, that is your best way, for it would have been an hard task for you to prove, that there was no Plot. We were in great expectation what arguments you would bring us for it.

Sir G. Wakeman. My lord, will you give me leave to observe one thing more to your lordship and the Court? Mr. Oates does mention in his Narrative, of at least thirty or forty pages, and all this upon oath, (so he saith in the end of his Narrative) but I would observe, that there is not a letter dated in France, or in the Low-Countries, or received here, but he swears positively as to the date of it, and reception of it; but now, when he comes to mention any thing wherein a man's life is concerned, he will not tie up himself to a month.

L. C. J. Yès, he does, and to part of a month. He tells you, it was the beginning, or middle, or latter end; and he speaks punctually as to the 21st of August.

Sir G. Wakeman. But in all his whole Narrative, he speaks to a day.

Recorder. As my lord says, he speaks punctually to the 21st of August. And as to the letters, he took the date of them in his memorial.

Corker. My lord, I would only take notice, that at the first, Mr. Oates thought to take advantage of some words of mine, at my examination; he told you, that I had gone into France, but that I denied it when I was examined before the justice of peace. My lord, I deny all this; for the justice of peace examined me where I had lived——

L. C. J. We have nothing of this matter here before us.

Just. Pemberton. You are to answer what he says now.

Corker. It is what Mr. Oates says now, for I knew nothing of it till now. Now, my lord, as to that, I say, I did not deny it before the justice of peace that examined me; for I told him, I lived with a certain lady 13 years, till she died; and during that time, I never was beyond the sea but once, which was 5 years since, for the cure of a quartane ague that I had, and I went over to France; otherwise, during all that time that I was with my lady, I did not go beyond sea. Upon this, the justice began to ask me other questions; whereupon, my lord, I recollected myself, and said, Sir, I told you I had not been beyond sea during the time I had been with my lady, but that time, 5 years since; but my lady being dead, I went over last summer in August to perfect the cure of that ague; for I had it 7 years, spring and fall. And this I told him of myself, without asking. The last summer I went over, and there I staid till 2 days before September; therefore I did commit no mistakes in what I said, or used any cloke to cover it. Now, my lord, he says, I went to Lampspring, which is in the farther end of Germany.

L. C. J. He says, you said so.

Corker. Pray ask him how he knows it? he says by my letters: Sure if this man were privy to those great conspiracies which he charges me to be a partner in, it is not probable but that I should tell him where I went; and then if I did tell him so, I must go thither and back again in six weeks time, which was morally impossible to do, to go thither, and to return; for I was but six weeks out of town.

L. C. J. How you argue, Sir! He says, you told him, you went to Lampspring: Say you, Certainly I would tell him true, because he was engaged with me in conspiracies; but this cannot be true, because of the length of the way. Is this a way of arguing? May not you tell him, you go to one place, and indeed go to another?

Corker. What reason or motive had I to tell him a lie?

L. C. J. It is a hard matter for us to give an account of Jesuits answers, even one to another.

Corker. I am not a Jesuit, I will not say the least untruth to save my life. Then as to my being president, as he calls it, of the congregation; all the congregation, and all that know us, know that Stapleton (formerly chaplain to the queen) is and hath been for 12 years, president of that order. And I am confident that all catholics, and most of the Court, do likewise know it to be true, and by consequence, it is likewise untrue, that there was an agreement made by the Jesuits and Benedictine monks, when I was at Paris, to which I was not privy, but could not go on till I was acquainted with it, and consented to it. Now, my lord, if I be not president of that order, that must be a sham and a story.

L. C. J. You say that, prove who is.

Corker. Mr. Stapleton was, as it is well known.

L. C. J. Call who you will to prove it, if you can.

Corker. Here is one of the lay-brothers of the order.

L. C. J. Who is that?

Corker. Mr. Rumley here.

L. C. J. He cannot be a witness for you, or against you, at this trial.

Corker. My lord, since I did not know of it before, I could not bring any body.

L. C. J. You put it upon yourselves.

Corker. My Lord, I say then I was never at any consult where any such sum of money was proposed or agreed, nor was it requisite or necessary that I should be so much privy to it, for I was not superior of the order, nor president of it, by reason of which my consent should be necessary, or any such letter be writ to me, or any such received from me. And then, my lord, secondly, I must take notice again; he accuses me of being bishop of London, and that I did consent to this agreement of paying so many thousand pounds; if I were guilty of this, and likewise of contriving the king's death, and especially consenting to Pickering's murder of the king, when that Pickering was taken, I should have been taken too, or I knowing myself guilty, should have fled.

L. C. J. You excepted against Pickering, and thought him not a convenient man, because he was one of your order.

Corker. I hope he does not positively say I consented to the king's death; he says indeed I knew something of it; now I was near him when he was taken. All the officers that came to take Mr. Pickering, came to my chamber. Mr. Oates says he was there at the taking of Pickering; if I were guilty of all these things, being superior and master to this Pickering, it is a strange thing that he should neither know me, nor own me, nor accuse me, nor take me, nor apprehend me, until almost a month after; all which time I had my liberty; but then taking notice of my going down there, and having further information of me that I had lodged there, he took me into his catalogue of bishops, and he came to take me. But if I had been guilty, of these heinous things, there is no reason but they should have apprehended and taken me when Pickering and Grove, and Ireland, and sir G. Wakeman were taken.

L. C. J. I will tell you what for that: If you were now arraigned for being a priest, you might well make use of that argument, that when they took Pickering and Grove, if they knew you have been a priest, they should have taken you too, and yet for all that you were a priest, you could not have denied it. But would it have been an argument, because you were not then taken, you were not so? So you might be in the Plot, and not be taken, and it is no argument from your not being taken, that you were not.

Corker. I say, my lord, if he came to discover the plotters, it had been his duty to have taken me before, if I had been one in the Plot.

L. C. J. So it had been his duty to have taken you as a priest.

Corker. But I was, as he says, equal in the same crime with Pickering, and therefore he should have taken me, when he took him.

L. C. J. Have you any thing more?

Corker. Besides, my lord, I find he undertook to tell the names of all those that were engaged in this conspiracy, but among them all, my name is not, therefore it is a new invention of his.

L. C. J. That is not said here, you go off from what is said here.

L. C. J. North. Can you prove that? then first do it, and then make your observations upon it, if you can prove what he said before the lords by witnesses; but otherwise you must not discourse upon what you have not proved.

L. C. J. Here is nothing of that before this jury.

Corker. I cannot prove it otherwise than by the record. I desire it may be looked upon, and I refer it to the consideration of the jury, whether if he did say he did not know any thing else of any man whatsoever, but what he had then declared, and I am not there accused; whether this accusation be now to be believed?

L. C. J. That hath been answered already.

Just. Dolben. But it is not proved by them.

Corker. I leave it to the jury whether they will believe it or no.

L. C. J. You say well, if you refer it to the jury, let them consider it.

Corker. I say, they ought to take it into their consideration, they are not rashly to give a verdict against me; and, gentlemen, I believe I may refer it to your consciences, whether you do not know what I say to be true in this business?

L. C. J. Mr. Marshal, what say you to it?

Marshal. Truly, my lord, what I have to say for myself is this. About a month ago I was told the time of my trial was at hand, and being then full of good hope, I did endeavour to provide for it, and I had a great confidence, my lord, that it would succeed: but truly upon the ill success of the late trials, either my hope or my heart failed me, and I did resolve to cast myself upon God and his Providence, and however my silence might have been interpreted, I did resolve, with silence and submission, to resign up myself to whatsoever your lordship and the worthy jury should be pleased to decree upon me. But, my lord, since your lordship is pleased to fling forth some encouragement, and to hang out the white flag of hope, for your lordship hath been pleased to use many gracious expressions, and so, my lord, upon this, I shall, contrary to my former determination, now endeavour to make defence for my life as well as I can: But, my lord, not being so well able to do it, or of so quick capacity as that learned and wise counsel which we have here of counsel for us, to wit, the honourable bench of judges: for, when enquiring, why, by law, we were allowed no counsel? I was told, that the whole bench of judges were always of counsel for the prisoner; and indeed they look upon it as an obligation upon them, as far as truth and justice will permit them, to plead for us. Now, my lord with an humble heart, I would suggest some heads of defence to this learned, wise, and honourable counsel, and leave it to them to manage my cause for me, according to truth and justice, which they are better able to do for me than I for myself. My lord, I have, I thank God, no spleen, nor hatred in my heart, against the worst of my enemies, nor shall be desirous of revenge, I leave them and their proceedings to God; neither am I willing to charge Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow with worse than the necessity of my defence will occasion me to say of them. Now, my lord, the best of men may be mistaken in a person, and if I prove Mr. Oates is mistaken in the person in me, then I charge Mr. Oates with no great crime, and yet make my own Defence. Now, my lord, I offer these things for that defence, and I hope your lordship will appear my great advocate, and what I suggest in a few heads, you will, I hope, put it into a method, and manage it better than I can myself. My lord, when I was first brought before Mr. Oates, as truly all that were with me do know, I carried myself with a great deal of courage and confidence, for I was certain that he did not know me, and I did believe it would be only my trouble of going thither and coming back again.

L. C. J. To go whither?

Marshal. To Westminster, And pray take notice of this: when I was first apprehended, I was never sought for, nor named as a traitor in this business; but coming accidentally into an house to ask for one, where they were ac-ually searching, though I saw the constable at the door, and lights in the house, yet I went in and asked, if such an one was within? I think this confidence will not rationally suppose me Guilty, the House being under suspicion.

L. C. J. Here is no proof of all this.

Marshal. All that were there know it: sir William Waller, which took me, knows it.

L. C. J. Sir William Waller, is this so?

Sir Wm. Waller. My lord, when I came to search the house, I placed one at the door, and him I ordered to let whoever would come in, but no person whatsoever go out. When I was searching, this person comes and knocks at the door, but did not know, I suppose, of any person searching in the house; for when the door was opened, and he let in, and understood it, he presently endeavoured to get away again.

Marshal. By your favour, my lord, I am very loath to contradict what sir W. Waller says in any thing, I would willingly believe him a just person, that would say nothing but the truth: but God Almighty is my witness that I never knocked, the door was open, and I came in of my own accord, both in at the first and the second door. This the constable will testify.

L. C. J. And you would not have gone away again if you could, would you?

Marshal. I will give you better proof of it: while they were searching in an interior room (and this is well known by them all that were there) I was in an outward room by myself, this sir W. Waller knows, and when they came back and found me there, the constable and the rest wondered I was not gone. I was left alone by the door, by myself; the outward door I found open, and there is another door which leads out into an alley, which any man can open in three minutes time, and I know how to do it. Now I could not learn it since I was taken, for I have not been permitted to go abroad, but been under close confinement. But if it be worth the while, and you will give me leave to go there, I can shew you how it is opened in less time than I can speak three words.

L. C. J. Would you have the jury stay here while you go and shew us the door? If you have any witnesses to prove it, call them. Come, to the purpose, man.

Marshal. My lord, I say, if it were worth the while, that it might be made appear, that if I would go away, I could, but I did not get away, but stayed with a great deal of confidence, my lord; therefore I urge this to the point, that Mr. Oates is mistaken. After I had been there a while before Mr. Oates, sir Wm. Waller wished me to withdraw, and after I had been absent a while and came back again, sir Wm. Waller wished me to pluck off my periwig, and turn my back to him and Mr. Oates; I did not then well understand the meaning of it. But afterwards sir Wm. Waller, out of his great civility, came to see near the Gate-house, and brought with him two very worthy persons, sir Philip Matthews and sir John Cutler. Sir P. Matthews upon discourse hearing me declare that Mr. Oates was a perfect stranger to me, said, That Mr. Oates, in testimony that he knew me, had given such a certain mark behind in my head. I told sir P. Matthews, if he pleased to pluck off my periwig, he should see whether there was any such mark or no; but he being an extraordinary civil person, told me, he would not give me the trouble, I desire Mr. Oates to declare now beforehand, what that mark was behind my head, and if there be such a mark, it is some evidence that his testimony is true; but if there be no such, then it will appear to this honourable court and the jury, that he did not know me, but was mistaken in the man.

L. C. J. I suppose he does not know you so much by the mark behind your head, as by that in your forehead.

Marshal. But why did he then speak of the mark behind my head?

Recorder. How does that appear, that he did give such a mark?

Sir W. Waller. I shall give your lordship a short account what was done: when I brought him to Mr. Oates, I did desire indeed to see his periwig off, to see if there were any appearance of a shaven crown. After that I had done that, I caused him to withdraw till I had taken Mr. Oates's examination upon oath, and after I had taken that, I desired him to come in again, and I read it to him, and taxed him with it, to which he gave a general denial to every particular, and thereupon I committed him to the Gate-house.

L. C. J. What is this to the business of the mark?

Sir W. Waller. I do not know of any mark; but this I do know, that as soon as ever he came in, Mr. Oates called him by his name.

Marshal. I desire sir Philip Matthews may be called.

Recorder. He is not here: what would you have with him?

Marshal. To ask, if he did not know in particular, that the mark was such a spot behind my head? Hath he not been here to-day?

Recorder. I cannot tell that.

L. C. J. But he called you by your name, before ever you plucked off your periwig; so saith sir William Waller.

Marshal. That which I was to shew, if I could, and truly all my defence lies upon it, is, that Mr. Oates is a perfect stranger to me, and consequently hath nothing against me. Now if Mr. Oates did give a false mark to know me by, and there is no such mark, I think it is a proof that he is mistaken.

L. C. J. Sir W. Waller says the contrary, he called you by your name, and there was no mark mentioned; but if you will suppose what you please, you may conclude what you list.

Marshal. Sir W. Waller plucked off my periwig, and bid me turn my back to him.

L. C. J. That was to see whether you were shaved, or no.

Marshal. Sir W. Waller had not so little knowledge, as to think that the priests go shaven here in England, where it is death for them, if they be discovered. Besides, my lord, it was put in the common news-books which were dispersed abroad in the country, that it was a white lock behind. Well, if there be any thing of favour or inclination to mercy in the court, I shall find it; but if there be none, it will not succeed, though I spoke ten thousand times over; nay, though it were spoken by the tongue of men or angels it would do me no good; therefore I inforce it again to the jury to take notice of, that there was a particular mark given.

L. C. J. That you have not proved.

Marshal. My lord, I would beseech you to take notice of what every man knows, and it is against reason to believe, that sir W. Waller, knowing the world so well as he is supposed to do, should think we went with shaven crowns in England.

L. C. J. And therefore Dr. Oates must look for another mark, must he; how does that appear?

Marshal. All England know, that those who go over to any seminary or cloister, never come over again to England till their hair be grown out, that it may be no mark or testimony that they are such persons.

L. C. J. Do you think all mankind knows that?

Marshal. All that is rational does.

L. C. J. Well, you hear what sir W. Waller says.

Marshal. I always looked upon sir W. Waller as a very learned upright person, and did rely upon what he should testify for my defence, and he knows when Dr. Oates brought in his first testimony against me, I did beg that what he said should be written down by him. Said sir W. Waller, it shall not be written down, but I will promise you to remember what he says. Now I hope sir W. Waller, as an honest and worthy gentleman, will keep his word, and I desire him to do it, as he will answer it before God at the Great Tribunal.

L. C. J. Ask him what you will. You adjure him, and yet you won't ask him.

Marshal. Now my lord, I will tell you how Mr. Oates came to know my name (which is another proof that he is a stranger to me.) When I came first in, I asked Mr. Oates if he knew me? and looking seriously upon me, he asked me what my name was? Now we knowing no more of a man's thoughts but what his words discover, it may seem by that very question that Mr. Oates was a perfect stranger to me. Now when I told him my name was Marshal, he was pleased to answer, you are called Marsh. But my lord, I should consider that which hath been before offered to your lordship, but that I do not much insist upon, that if Mr. Oates had a commission to search for priests and traitors, he was as well bound to tell you I was a priest as a traitor; that is an argument for me, I say. If he had a commission to apprehend priests, I conceive, if he knew us to be priests, he should by force of such a commission have seized upon us.

L. C. J. He needed no commission to do that, he did search to find out traitors.

Marshal. He heard us particularly named, looks upon us, goes away, denies that he knows us, gives us leave to sleep out our sleep, and if we would be gone. Therefore it is without any likelihood or probability that he had any thing to say against us.

L. C. J. You have not proved one word of all this.

Marshal. He owned it himself, that he had searched the Savoy for traitors, and did not take us. I speak this out of his own mouth, therefore it is incredible, and I hope the jury will take notice of it: he was searching for traitors, and knowing me to be a notorious traitor as he would have me to be, that he should find me in bed, have his majesty's officers with him, and not seize upon me.

Justice Pemberton. It does not appear to us, you have not proved it.

L. C. J. Sir William Waller, did he say first, do you know me? and then Oates ask his name?

Sir Wm. Waller. I speak solemnly, as in the presence of God, there was not one word of all this.

Corker. I beseech you, may I speak one word?

L. C. J. Have you done, Mr. Marshal?

Marshal. Truly my lord, I am astonished. I protest and confess before God I am astonished. There is Mr. Gill the constable who owned this, and promised to be here to attest it, for there was a dispute about it between Dr. Oates and me: for said I presently, if you took me in bed and knew me to be a traitor, why did you not seize me? he answered me again expressly, before sir Wm. Waller, I had no commission then to seize you: but said I, you acknowledge I was then a conspirator, and such your commission was to seize. You might have declared to the officers you knew me to be a traitor, and have bid them take charge of me: it is impossible that you should so well know it and not do it, sure.

L. C. J. Was there any such thing as this, sir Wm. Waller.

Sir Wm. Waller. Really, my lord, I do not remember any thing of it.

L. C. J. Mr. Marshal, call your witnesses.

Marshal. Is Mr. Gill the constable here? he owned it. I think I had as good make an end, I may leave it here, for what I shall say I find will be to little purpose.

L. C. J. You do not prove what you affirm.

Marshal. My lord, I do not go as Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow do, who bring no circumstance of probability or likelihood; they only say they were such a time amongst such and such persons, and such and such things were agreed, but shew no probability of it. But I instance in such things as do carry a probability in themselves, and I name those that were by.

L. C. J. And have no proof of it in the world. And what you call sir Wm. Waller for, he says the contrary; there was no such thing.

Marshal. I say, my lord, what he says is to my great astonishment. Do you remember, sir Wm. Waller, this, that Mr. Oates said there when he was asked if he saw me last summer, I saw you not only in August, but in June and July?

Sir Wm. Waller. I remember something of that.

Marshal. I humbly thank you, sir, for acknowledging that.

L. C. J. What use do you make of that?

Marshal. I shall make use of that. The dispute was so eminent betwixt us that it was impossible to forget it.

L. C. J. Well, have you done, Mr. Marshal?

Marshal. No, my lord, though I had as good hold my peace. I could not have witnesses to disprove Mr. Oates in particulars of time and place, because I could not foresee what time or place he would name. My Lord, I had witnesses here at the time of my last trial to prove and swear, if they might be admitted, that I was here neither in June, nor July, or August, but spent some months at a place called Farnborough in Warwickshire.

L. C. J. Can you prove this?

Marshal. I can prove that I had such as would have proved it then. Now, my lord, this is that I say, if the court be inclined to any favour or mercy: life being a thing of such concern, I hope some little stop may be allowed to have some time to bring such people; but if there be no inclination to mercy, it would be the same thing if the proof were here.

L. C. J. The court will do you all justice here, and that is their mercy.

Marshal. I am confident I shall have great justice done me, I would not have said one word in my defence if I did not believe so. I took heart by what your lordship had said, and I have already done that which I thought most material for it. I have urged first the false mark that he gave to know me by. And then his taking me in bed and disowning to know me. Besides Mr. Oates hath been positive in his testimony about the 21st of August, I could not now have witnesses to disprove that, because I knew it not before, but I can have several witnesses to prove, that I had then witnesses to prove it, sufficient witnesses from Farnborough, who were sure and certain that I was that very day there, and would instance in some particular reasons why I was there that day. And then these witnesses will swear that I was never from thence for three months at any distance, but twice at a neighbour's house, and they can tell the places where I was then.

L. C. J. You come and tell us what other folks could tell, why have you not them here? can the jury take notice of this?

Marshal. I hope you will not throw away my life, when in three days time I could bring witnesses to prove it.

L. C. J. Then we must throw away the lives of the jury, for they must be kept fasting all those days till they give in their verdict? for they must be shut up till then.

Marshal. My lord, with your leave, there have been those that have been upon their trials, and sent back to prison before the jury have given a verdict, and after tried again.

L. C. J. North. Ay, if they be discharged quite of you.

L. C. J. I tell you the jury must be kept together close till they give their verdict.

Marshal. The jury was not kept up when Mr. Whitebread and Mr. Fenwick were tried, and they were afterwards tried again.

L. C. J. The jury were wholly discharged of them.

Marshal. If you have any regard of my life, you may discharge them of me.

L. C. J. Truly this is as reasonable as any thing you have offered.

Marshal. If your lordship believe what I say is true, you throw away my life unless you grant me this time. I should be a very infamous man if I did not prove it then.

L. C. J. If the jury believe it, I am satisfied.

Marshal. My Lord, I should then come full of shame, if I did not prove what I say; therefore I hope the court will allow me time to prove what I affirm that that particular day, and that the day before, and the day after I was in the country, and stirred not. And then as to the day before the Assumption which he charges upon me and the day after, I can bring witnesses to prove I was those three days at another house almost 50 miles off London; so there is nothing in all that is said against me by Mr. Oates which comes to be determinative and positive in his testimony but I can disprove it if time be allowed me, but if that cannot, I can bring such proof as can testify, that I had before those that could evidence it.

Corker. I told your lordship, I think, that the constables and other persons that came there to take Pickering, said they knew nothing of me, and had nothing to say to me. Your lordship tells me, this I ought to prove. I must confess I could not expect that, when there were so many, an hundred people at least, that all those people coming in I should be put to prove it. But here is a servant that was in the house then, that will tell you the same, that will attest they said they had nothing to say to me.

Justice Pemberton. Call any of your witnesses that you have.

Justice Dolben. Mr. Corker, you remember that the last time you were here at the bar, you desired time because you had not your witnesses; it is now above a month ago, and therefore you have no reason to say your witnesses are not ready. Let us see them, that we may see you did not abuse us.

Recorder. Who were the persons that were then at Tunbridge?

Corker. I tell you sincerely, my Lord, I did not know what they would say, but then I did take notice when my accusation was read against me, that there was a time mentioned of the 24th of April, that I conspired the killing of the king. Now I could prove the contrary of that I thought, for I remember, and so my friends know very well, that I always in the spring time I go once or twice most commonly about 30 miles out of town, to take the air. So my Lord, from that observation I did really believe I was actually there at that time; and from this belief I did then tell your lordship, that I thought I could bring witnesses that would prove I was at that place then. According to your lordship's order I sent for the gentlewoman that kept the house, and she coming up I asked her, Mistress, said I, can you tell when I was at Tunbridge; said she, I believe you were there about or near April; but that is not the thing, said I, I ask you, can you positively say that it was either before or after the 24th, can you give me any determinate circumstance of it. She could not swear, nor durst, what day I was there exactly; then, said I, go back again; for I resolved to die in my innocency without proof, rather than my witnesses should speak what was false or doubtful.

Marshal. I desire that one Thomas Sumner may be called. He was the man that went down to fetch up the witnesses from Farnborough.

Recorder. What is your witness, Mr. Corker?

Corker. My Witness's name is Ellen Rigby. [who stood up.]

L. C. J. What is it you ask her?

Corker. I desire she may be asked, whether she knows that I was in the house when the search was in the Savoy, when Mr. Pickering was taken? and whether they then charged me or said I was the person that they had nothing at all to do with?

Marshal. And me the same.

L. C. J. Do you hear the question?

Corker. Was not I in the Savoy when Pickering was taken?

Marshal. And I?

Rigby. Yes, you were both in bed then.

Corker. Are you ready to swear it if my Lord will permit you?

Rigby. Yes. And the company that came in never asked for you, but when they saw you, said they had nothing to do with you.

L. C. J. Who said so?

Rigby. The company that came and searched the house for Pickering.

L. C. J. Was Mr. Oates there?

Rigby. Yes, my Lord, Mr. Oates was there.

L. C. J. Did he say that he had nothing to say to them?

Rigby. Several of them did say so, and he among them. They asked me who were in the house? I told them several. They said they had nothing to do with any but Mr. Pickering.

L. C. J. North. Who did you tell were in the house?

Rigby. I told them there was Pickering, Marsh, Heckett, Corker, Smaydon the porter and his wife, two children, &c.

Corker. Now it is incredible he should search for traitors, and as he says knew us to be such and should not ask for us: nay, when he saw us, leave us there, and never bid the officer secure us.

Just. Pemberton. Who did ask you the question?

Rigby. There were five or six, Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow.

Corker. I desire to know this of you, Have you not heard all along that Mr. Stapleton is President of the Benedictines, and how long he hath been so, for she was housekeeper?

Marshal. Who is President of the Benedictines?

Rigby. Mr. Stapleton.

Corker. How long hath he been so?

Rigby. Four years and a quarter, for any thing I know to the contrary.

L. C. J. In his absence, who was?

Rigby. I know not who.

L. C. J. Did not Corker officiate?

Rigby. Never in his life.

L. C. J. Do you know who did?

Rigby. I can tell he did not.

Corker. Pray ask her if she knows of any consult of the Jesuits in the Benedictine convent?

L. C. J. How should she know that? was she one?

Corker. Because there can none come to the house, but she must entertain them; there was no other servant at all but she.

Marshal. Now, my lord, since she is here, let her see Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow; ask her whether ever she saw them in the house in her life.

Rigby. I saw Mr. Oates in the house; he came a begging to Mr. Pickering for charity.

L. C. J. What was the time?

Rigby. This summer was twelvemonth; And Mr. Pickering bid me shut the door, and never let that man come in again.

Marshal. That was in the very heat of the Plot the very nick of time when he was employed to carry on the conspiracy, as he says; and that then we should suffer him to be in such necessity; and sent away with a flea in his ear, when he could gain such advantages by discovering us: Is it likely that we should trust him with the whole Plot, and yet suffer him to want? I appeal to your lordship and the jury whether that be probable?

Then Sumner appeared and stood.

L. C. J. What say you to him?

Marshal. I desire he may be asked, whether he does not know that here were witnesses to testify I was then at Farnborough.

L. C. J. This is not a question to be asked what another body can swear.

Marshal. He was sent down, my lord, to fetch the witnesses up.

L. C. J. Well, to satisfy you, we will ask the question, though it be improper: Were you sent down for witnesses?

Sumner. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Why did not they come?

Sumner. They did come.

L. C. J. Why are they not here? The last sessions was adjourned particularly to a certain day, and you knew when you were to be tried.

Recorder. For this very reason, that all might take notice of it, it was adjourned to the 16th day at this place.

Marshal. Your lordship does suppose we have a better purse than we have: Would you have them leave their employments, and come up, and be at great charges? it is not in the capacity of every one to endure it.

L. C. J. What would you have us do in this case?

Marshal. What is but reasonable. Give me but three or four days time, and I can have my witnesses up.

Just. Dolben. I pray ask them whether they were not told of the time of their trial?

L. C. J. Why did not you send for them before, when you knew what day it was to be?

Just. Dolben. You knew us much before as you do now. If you did not, what did you send for them up for then, more than now?

Corker. There was no certainty at all of the time when we should be tried. We were told it was near, but not the very day; some said the 13th, some the 14th, some the 16th, some not at all.

Recorder. You must not say so; for notice was publicly given here that it should not be till the 16th, and the sessions was adjourned till then.

Marshal. I was told it would be two or three days after last term. I confess God Almighty hath been pleased to give me a long imprisonment to prepare for my last close. I do not fear death, though it should appear in far more frightful shapes, than that we may be like to suffer. So, my lord, it is not so much concernment for my own life, as for honour and justice of the court, that I plead for a respite to have witnesses that may positively and particularly disprove the testimony of Mr. Oates. And all the world will think it an hard case when I do attest and call to witness such as have a great probability to prove what I say to be true; when I can have such a numerous train of witnesses to prove that I was that particular day threescore miles out of London, and would positively swear it, if permitted. It will be hard, and will, I fear, draw an heavy censure upon this honourable court, if some time be not allowed.

L. C. J. It cannot be allowed you, for then we must tie up the jury, and make them fast all the time.

Marshal. You may discharge them of me.

L. C. J. We cannot do it now.

Just. Pemberton. There is no reason for it now, for you had time for your witnesses before. What do you come here to make a great harangue about witnesses which you had, and did not bring them.

L. C. J. Did you know they would come to prove, to any day?

Marshal. I know they could prove such a day.

L. C. J. Why then were they not here?

Marshal. Pray, my lord, give me leave. I hope I shall not speak more than is reasonable and just, and then I care not how it succeeds. Every judge is as much obliged to follow his conscience, as any formality in law.

L. C. J. Pray teach your own disciples, don't teach us: You come and talk here what regard we are to have to our own consciences, as if we did not know that better than any papist or priest in the world.

Marshal. I suppose that, and it is rational too. And I do suppose that this bench is infinitely just and merciful; and upon that supposition I plead. Then if there be great reason to believe that I can disprove Mr. Oates in his positive testimony, then there is great reason to believe that I can save my life. And if there be reason to believe that I can save my life, I suppose there will be more regard to this than to any formality of law. Be pleased to ask him whether he were not to fetch witnesses that could attest this.

L. C. J. What can you say?

Sumner. I went down into the country for witnesses.

L. C. J. Why did you not bring them up against this time?

Sumner. I had no order for this time.

Marshal. We did not know when we should be tried.

Cl. of the Peace. My lord, I did tell the messenger when the sessions was.

L. C. J. Did the officers here acquaint you when the sessions was?

Sumner. I had order from capt. Richardson at first, I did ask leave to go down to fetch his witnesses; says capt. Richardson, you have order to do what he shall direct, to provide him his witnesses; that was for the last, not for this.

L. C. J. How far were the witnesses off?

Sumner. Threescore miles.

L. C. J. Why, you have had notice long enough of your trials, to get up witnesses threescore miles.

Recorder. Capt. Richardson, Did not you tell the prisoners when their trials would be?

Justice Dolben. They had all notice of the sessions by the adjournment, and should have provided for it.

Capt. Richardson. Ever since the last sessions they have all of them had the permission of any people to come to them in order to the preparing for their trials.

L. C. J. As when?

Capt. Richardson. As for this sessions.

L. C. J. First you did know that the sessions did begin on Wednesday; if you had prepared yourselves against Wednesday, you had been delayed but for two days.

Marshal. But how could I prepare witnesses for that which I did not know would be testified against me?

L. C. J. Why did you prepare them for the last trial? why had you not the same witnesses you had then?

Marshal. Because it was upon somewhat he had said upon my taking, that he saw me in June and July, I did provide witnesses for it.

Justice Pemberton. He holds to the very day he said first, and this is but plain trifling.

L. C. J. Truly, if the merit of your cause be no better than such weak assertions, your defence is but very poor.

Marshal. But that I humbly offer, is this, whether you will believe I can have such witnesses, and therefore stay till they be sent for.

Justice Dolben. We have no reason to believe you.

Justice Wyndham. We have no reason to believe you, when you have had time to prove it, and have not got them.

L. C. J. Why were they not here now?

Marshal. My lord, I do give you a double reason. Then, my lord, I offer this, that my name is in no list, paper, nor narrative that ever was put forth; and if I had been guilty, as he says, would not he have named me amongst the other conspirators?

L. C. J. No, I think he should not, it would have given you notice, and too much opportunity to have gone away.

Marshal. He gave me leave, when he left me in my bed.

L. C. J. But yet for all that it does not prove your innocency. All people that are guilty, do not run away for it, for you have abundance of priest-holes, and hiding-places. Well, have you any more witnesses? if you have, call them.

Corker. Call Alice Broadhead [but she did not presently appear;] then I desire Mrs. Eliz. Sheldon may be called; [Who being in the gallery, answered and came down.]

Marshal. I do desire to know whether she knows who is president of the Benedictine Monks?

L. C. J. Who is president of the Benedictines, mistress?

Sheldon. Mr. Stapleton.

L. C. J. How many years hath he been?

Sheldon. A great many years, my lord, to my knowledge.

L. C. J. How many?

Sheldon. Four or five years.

Recorder. Where is Dr. Oates? call him.

L. C. J. But if he were absent did not Mr. Corker officiate in his place?

Sheldon. Never, my lord.

Corker. Mr. Stapleton was actually at Paris when I was there, and therefore I could not officiate in his stead; there is another that can testify the same, that is Alice Broadhead, [Who appeared then.] Pray ask her the same question.

L. C. J. Who is president of the Benedictines?

Broadhead. Mr. Stapleton, I have known him for many years, and there hath not been for a great many years any other.

Corker. Then I do desire that I may observe this, That Mr. Oates doth seem to accuse me positively of nothing, but only of consenting to the Benedictines contribution of 6,000*l.* which he says they could not do without my leave, because I was their president; but I have brought three witnesses which say, and are ready to swear, that Mr. Stapleton is president, was so these many years, and I never was so in my life.

Recorder. Here is Dr. Oates again now. [But he was not examined.]

L. C. J. Have you done now, all three?

Sir G. W. I say, my lord, I find that it was imputed to me, at least as a sin of omission, that when I was before the council, I did not sufficiently detest, and abominate, and abhor this crime that is laid to my charge. I now detest, abhor, and abominate the fact charged on me. I call God to witness I never was in any consultation about it in my life, I never received any bill for any money upon this account, nor did ever receive any money.

L. C. J. Had not you 2,000*l.*?

Sir G. W. No, my lord, I wish I may never enter into the kingdom of Heaven, if I received one farthing for any such thing.

Corker. He says, that I was employed in distributing monies; and I profess before God, I never distributed any money upon such account; all that I had was an annual annuity which I gave amongst the poor. I protest before God, I never in my life did deliver or hold it as a matter of faith or commendable doctrine, that it was lawful for the promoting of the Catholic religion, to murder the king, or destroy my country. And I renounce and detest it from the bottom of my soul. And this is all can be expected from a good Christian upon that account; and I hope the jury will have no prejudice against me for that; and neither Pope or any breathing upon earth can dispense with me from that obligation.

Marshal. And if no door can be opened for a merciful sentence upon any consideration offered by the living; at the loud cries of the dying, I hope there may; and all the earnest vows, and all those solemn protestations of innocency by such as were lately executed for the crimes we stand here charged with, left behind them as sacred testimonies of their loyalty and unviolated faith to the king. And I beg leave to put before the eyes of this honourable court, and this whole assembly, this landskip of horror, wherein may be seen those caves of darkness, those baths of glowing sulphur, such men must be eternally judged to be condemned unto, if what they then spoke had not the characters of the fairest truth found instamped upon it. Now if a right survey be taken of this landskip, and it be well observed what these men so solemnly signed and sealed to with their last breath, it must be confessed they either conspired finally to damn their own souls, or were not conspirators against the king, nor were they guilty of what was charged upon them. Present content, where the enjoyment is like to continue, works with a strong influence upon human nature, and chains it fast to the present world. But, my lord, with the approach of death, reformation of conscience does offer to advance, and we do observe those who have lived a very ill life, frequently to make a good end; but, my lord, it is a thing scarce ever heard of or known, that those who have lived all their lives well, should die ill. Nor can such as were looked upon while they lived as persons of much integrity, great candor of spirit, and unquestionable truth in all their attestations, dying, should become prophane to blasphemy, become irreligious even to sacrilege, and false even to the worst of atheism. My lord, this cannot readily be believed, or easily imagined; nor will be, though it be possible; and yet all that will not believe this, must own an innocency where guilt is so strongly supposed. And if there be great cause to doubt whether those that were lately executed, and were supposed to be leaders in this conspiracy, were guilty upon the consideration of those solemn dying protestations they have made to the contrary; I humbly conceive it may be much more rationally doubted, whether others brought in only by the by, as I am, as a letter-carrier, and only as marginal-notes to the great conspirators, may not wholly be innocent. Now, my lord, if no credit be to be given to the protestations of men dying, that have ever been judged sober and just; how can faith be reposed in the testimony of such living persons as know no God nor goodness? And if the reputed just man at the very point of death can be judged rationally false in his protestations, though death be in his eyes, and hell threatening to inguiph him; may not he, my lord, who hath owned himself a villain in print, be thought false in his testimony, while preferment tickles him, rewards march before him, and ambition beckons to him, which he greedily follows, though God and conscience tell him it is unjust?—England is become now a mournful theatre, upon which such a tragedy is acted, as turns the eyes of all Europe toward it; and the blood which hath been already spilt, hath found a channel to convey it even to the remotest parts of the world. And though it inspires different breasts with different resentments, yet it may speak a language that none who are friends of England will be willing to understand. Our present transactions here, are the present discourse and entertainment of foreign nations; and without all doubt will be chronicled and subjected to the censure of ensuing ages. Now, my lord, I have great reason to believe, that not any one of those honourable persons that now sit judges over us, would be willing to have their names writ in any characters, but those of a just moderation, of a profound integrity, of an impartial justice, and of a gracious clemency. And though we would not be all thought to be well-wishers to the Roman Catholic religion, yet we would be all thought friends to religion; and though we exclaim against idolatry and new principles of faith, yet we all stand up for old Christianity; whereas if the testimony of living impiety be applauded and admitted of, and the cries of dying-honesty scoffed at and rejected, what will become of old Christianity? And if any voice, cry, or protestation of dying men may pass for truth, and obtain belief, where is now our new conspiracy? The question now seems to come to this, the belief of Christianity now in Roman Catholics, and the appearance of their innocency, are so fast linked together by those solemn vows and protestations of their innocency, made by the late executed persons, that no man can take up arms against the latter, but must proclaim war against the former. Nor can our innocency bleed, but our Christianity must needs by the same dart be wounded. Nor can any tutelary hand stretch itself forth—

L. C. J. North. You speak ad faciendum populum, and should not be interrupted, but only I think you lash out a little too much.

Marshal. I speak this to add the testimony and solemn vows of the dying, to what we say living for our own defence. And I desired they may be put in both together, and weighed in the scales of an impartial judgment. Now, my lord, I say, the question seems not so much whether Roman Catholics are conspirators, as whether indeed they be Christians. Nor is it the great doubt now whether they designed to kill the king, but whether they believe there is a God. For whoever grants this last, the belief of a God, of a Heaven, and an Hell, and considers what asseverations they made at their death, what solemn protestations they insisted upon, does with the self-same breath proclaim them innocent.

Justice Pemberton. But Mr. Marshal, will you go on to affront the Court in this manner, to vouch for the truth of their speeches, which they made at the gallows, and affirm them innocent after they have been found guilty, and executed according to law?

Marshal. My lord, I do not avouch them innocent, I only desire there may be consideration had, and that the words of such dying men may be thought of. If they did believe a God and a judgment-seat that they were going to, could they be innocent and Christians too?

L. C. J. I was loth to interrupt you because you are upon your lives, and because it is fit you should have as much indulgence as can be allowed. Your defence hath been very mean, I tell you beforehand; your cause looked much better before you spoke a word in your own defence, so wisely have you managed it.

Recorder. But really for your particular part, Mr. Marshal, you abound too much in your flowers of rhetoric, which are all to no purpose.

Marshal. I hope it would be no offence to insist—

L. C. J. But I will tell you, and I will be heard as well as you, Sir; because of the protestations of these men, which you make so much a stir about. If you had a religion that deserved the name of a religion, if you were not made up of equivocation and lying, if you had not indulgences and dispensations for it, if to kill kings might not be meritorious, if this were not printed and owned, if your popes and all your great men had not avowed this, you had said something; but if you can have absolutions either for money, or because you have advanced the Catholic cause as you call it, and can be made saints as Coleman is supposed to be, there is an end of all your arguments. There is a God, you say, and you think we shall go to that God because he hath given us the power, we can let ourselves in and turn the key upon heretics. So that if they kill a king, and do all the wickedness they can devise, they shall go to heaven at last; for you have a trick, either you can directly pardon the killing of a king, or if you excommunicate him he is no king, and so you may kill him if it be for the advancement of religion. But it will be in vain for you or any priest in England to deny this, because we know you print it and publicly own it, and nobody was ever yet punished for any such doctrine as this. Therefore all your doings being accompanied with such equivocations and arts as your religion is made up of, it is not any of your rhetoric can make you be believed. I do believe it is possible for an atheist to be a papist, but it is hardly possible for a knowing Christian to be a Christian and a Papist. It is hardly possible for any man of understanding, setting aside the prejudices of education, to be a Papist and a true Christian, because your doctrines do contradict the foundations of Christianity. Your doctrine is a doctrine of blood and cruelty, Christ's doctrine is a law of mercy, simplicity, gentleness, meekness and obedience; but you have nothing but all the pride that ever a pope can usurp over princes: and you are filled with pride, and mad till you come again into the possession of the tyranny which you once exercised here: inasmuch that it is strange to me, but that princes abroad think you more conducing to their politic interest, else sure they could not endure such spiritual tyranny to lord it over their souls and their dominions. Therefore never brag of your religion, for it is a foul one, and so contrary to Christ; that it is easier to believe any thing, than to believe an understanding man may be a Papist. Well, Sir, if you have any more to say, speak it. You have provoked me to this: and indeed I ought to do it, because you have so much reflected on the justice of the Court: but if you have any thing to say in your defence; speak it, or to your own particular case. As for your religion, we know what it is, and what merciful men you are: and if we look into the bottom of you, we know what you were ever since queen Mary's days: and if we look into the Gunpowder Treason, we know how honest you are in your oaths, and what truth there is in your words, and that to blow up King, Lords and Commons, is with you a merciful act, and a sign of a candid religion; but that is all a story with you; for it is easier for you to believe, that a saint, after her head is cut off, did go 3 miles with her head in her hand, to the place where she would be buried, than that there was a Gunpowder Treason. [At which the people gave a shout.]

L. C. J. North. You must not meddle any more with the speeches of those that died.

Marshal. I did not intend, my lord, to call any thing of justice in question.

L. C. J. What, do you think we will be imposed upon in this manner? Perhaps you have tricks enough to gull your own party, but you have not to deceive Protestants; they can look through all your arts; nay, I never saw such men of weak parts, as your priests generally are; so that I wonder you should have any disciples but silly women, or men without learning.

Marshal. If we were guilty of this conspiracy, we should gull only ourselves.

L. C. J. Go you on with one harangue, I warrant you I will give you another; you shall not be hindered to say any thing that is pertinent; but this is not at all so. We have a bench of aldermen have more wit than your conclave, and a Lord Mayor that is as infallible as your Pope. Have you any thing more to say for yourselves?

Marshal. It is not proper to contradict your lordship, but it is a wonder you should know our religion better than ourselves; for I know not of any such doctrines owned amongst us.

L. C. J. No! then I believe you have not read your own books; I suppose that your business is not now to read, but to seduce silly women or weaker men. What, don't you publish them all over the world? Is there any Index expurgatorius, into which you have put these doctrines? Surely you know not any thing, if you know not this.

L. C. J. North. If you have any thing more to say in the proper defence of your trial, pray speak it now.

Corker. As to those damnable doctrines, we profess ourselves innocent of them. I desire that the Jury may not go upon such a prejudice, that I entertain such principles of religion, as matters of my faith. They are horrid crimes, I protest against them, and own them not. I desire the jury to take notice of it.

Marshal. I have this further to offer to your lordship, that Mr. Bedlow owned before the Lords that he knew no more to be guilty than he had declared, and amongst all those I am not named; and this was a month or six weeks before I was taken.

Justice Pemberton. There is no such thing at all proved here, or given in evidence, and therefore why do you insist upon it?

Marshal. In this I appeal to the knowledge of your lordship: and if you know it, I hope you will be pleased to acquaint the jury with it.

L. C. J. I do not know for my own particular, what answer was made; I was not in the House, nor do I know it.

Judgs. None of us know it.

Marshal. I desire the worthy jury to take notice, that among all the persons named, there is no such name mentioned as mine.

Justice Pemberton. There is no such thing proved here.

Marshal. They deny all the Lords' Records.

L. C. J. Well, have you done? Look you, gentlemen of the jury.

Marshal. I desire but one word: These things I have insisted upon as far as I can for myself; but the main matter I relied upon was, that Mr. Oates did not know me, neither as to my calling, conversation, words nor actions. He can bring no person, man nor woman, that ever saw him in my company, nor took notice of our meeting together, nor Bedlow neither; he can name no place where he saw me, none but the Savoy, against which no proof can be found. And then at the searching of the house, I desire the jury to take notice, that at that time he disowned us, and said he did not know us. A sufficient rational cause cannot be given why, he should say now he knows me, and did not then take me.

Justice Pemberton. You have said all this before.

Marshal. Then, my lord, for a conclusion, I have been told, and I will only desire the jury to take notice of it, that every jury that finds a man guilty of death, upon the testimony of witnesses that come in against him, do take it solemnly upon their consciences, that what such witnesses swear is true.

L. C. J. That they believe they swear true: For we have no infallibility with us: It is one thing to say it is true, and another thing to say we believe it is true. Look you, the jury may give a verdict that is false, and yet go according to their consciences. Do you understand that, priest?

Justice Pemberton. You need not teach the jury what they are to do.

Marshal. But considering in case an oath be false, and the jury have reason to doubt what the prisoners say in their own defence, upon what they hear or have learned of their own knowledge, if they find such doubt grounded upon that double matter, then they are in great danger to bring the fault to their own doors, and make the crime of perjury their own.

Justice Pemberton. What, do you go over things again and again?

L. C. J. All this signifies but little; if you had Popery here, you would get but little by it. We should hardly part with our Peter Pence for all your speeches. We all know what things are, it is not a parcel of words patched thus together, will do your business.

Marshal. I wish all thoughts were as opened as ours are.

L. C. J. Look you, gentlemen of the jury, here are four prisoners; as to one of them, that is Rumley, the truth of it is, there is but one witness against him, and by the law there ought to be two; so I cannot say, but you ought to discharge him: we do not find that there is testimony sufficient, according to the law, to condemn him, and therefore you ought to acquit him. As to the rest, here is sir George Wakeman, Mr. Corker, and Mr. Marshal; there hath been two sorts of evidences given, I will repeat them as well as I can, and as short as I can. There hath been a general evidence, and a particular evidence: there was a general evidence given by Mr. Dugdale, of the Plot in general, and by Mr. Praunce, and something of intimation by Mr. Jennison. These of Dugdale, Praunce, and Jennison, do not mention so much as the names of the three gentlemen that are upon their lives; but I will tell you why it was necessary, and answers a great objection that they seem to make: for you are to believe men, say they, and to believe men upon probable circumstances, something to guide you besides the positiveness of an oath; and that is well enough said: Now here is something besides, and that is the Plot; that there was a conspiracy to introduce popery, by the likeliest means, which was to kill the king; and that such people as these men were to do it. Now that there was such a general design to do it, is a circumstantial evidence, (as to these men I call it so.) And these are circumstances which may answer the objection they make, when they say, You are not to give credit to positive oaths without any thing to govern you by; for you have this to govern you by, besides the oath, that there was a Plot.

The testimony of Mr. Jennison does go more particularly to the business of Ireland, which I would observe, by the way, for the sake of that gentleman that stands so much upon the innocency of those men, and would have them to be believed upon their own assertions, because he says they dare not die with a lye in their mouths. I believe it is notorious enough, Mr. Jennison that comes here is a man of quality, and one against whom there is no objection, and he is justified by one or two more. He says, he saw Mr. Ireland the 19th of August, when he, to his death, took upon him to aver he was then in Staffordshire, and brought several of his own religion, who would outface it to the court, that he kept them company so many days, and was in the country all the while. There was a maid, before this, that came and testified that she saw Ireland, and saw him at his own door, in August, but this gentleman comes and proves it upon him more particularly, and tells you when, the day of the week, and of the month, that he was with him at his own lodging, that night he came from Windsor, that he was pulling off his boots, and pretended to come post from Staffordshire, and so that he was in Staffordshire is true, because he came thence post, but he hath always constantly denied that he was here, and that may serve for the integrity even of their dying oaths. And you are not going, according to your own doctrine, so immediately to Hell, I hope you suppose a purgatory, where you may be purged from such peccadillos as this of dying with a lye in your mouths.

As for the testimony of the particular evidence, first, against sir George Wakeman, Mr. Oates says he saw a letter subscribed George Wakeman; and it was writ to Mr. Ashby, and therein, among other expressions, was this particular, That the queen would assist him to kill the king. He was asked, How he knew it was his hand? He said, He had never seen his hand before, but afterwards he saw him writing, (as he thinks, writing,) in a writing posture, and there he looked upon that paper when he was gone from it, while it was wet, and that character, to his thinking, was just the character of the letter. Now I must observe this to you. First, Supposing it to be true, yet it is somewhat hard, for a man that had never known a man's hand in his life, to see a hand to-day, and some time after to come and see his hand to a bill of physic, and to recollect the character so much backward, as to know, this is that, or that man's hand that I saw before. It is one thing to know hands we are used to, but it is another thing, if we see a hand we never saw before in our lives, and then by reflection at another time, and by comparison of hands to say this is the same, that is hard; but that is supposing it to be true. Sir George Wakeman, as all people will that are accused, does deny the fact, and says there was no such thing. Against him besides, he says he saw, in a book that the Jesuit priests kept among them of their transactions and affairs, he saw, in Harcourt's chamber, a book, wherein was written, this day, (and there was a certain day in August named, but he cannot tell what day,) this day agreed with sir G. W. for 15,000*l.* to which he consented. And under was written, Received 5,000*l.* part of 15,000*l.* by order of Mr. Coleman. George Wakeman. This he says he saw, and he believes that to be the very same hand he saw before, so it is by a comparison of hands. He does not charge sir George Wakeman, to the best of my memory, with any positive things of his own knowledge, more than as I tell you of this matter.

Sir R. Sawyer. Yes, my lord, he says he saw his commission.

L. C. J. Indeed he does say, he saw a commission in his hands, to be physician-general of the army that was to be raised. And that he denied 10,000*l.* and would have 15. The truth I leave with you, gentlemen. Look you, gentlemen, we will show ourselves what we ought to do, let them be as they will; we would not, to prevent all their Plots, (let them be as big as they can make them) shed one drop of innocent blood, therefore I would have you, in all these gentlemen's cases, consider seriously, and weigh truly the circumstances, and the probability of things charged upon them. There is an additional evidence against sir George Wakeman, by Bedlow: he says he saw him have a note for 2,000*l.* which was said came from the queen, there were discourses of doubtful words, but whether they be plain enough to satisfy your consciences, when men are upon their lives, I leave to you. That sir George Wakeman should say, Are you ready for me? Why am I drilled on thus, in a matter of this concern? This he would have to imply the poisoning of the king; but there is but one thing that sounds any thing plain to the matter, and that was this, said he, If they miss (speaking of killing the king) if they miss at Windsor, and you miss your way, then it shall be done at New-Market. This he did swear directly, and then sir George Wakeman replied, He would be ready. Now if you believe this, then there are two witnesses against sir George Wakeman, for the matter of the bill alone would do nothing, but when he says he saw such a bill, it must be for something; and if he did say so, if they miss killing him at Windsor, and you miss your way, we will do it at New-Market; and he replied, I will be ready, the thing is made plain; I leave it to you; and this is all the evidence against sir George Wakeman, as I remember: I hope my brothers, if they remember more, will repeat it to you. I cannot undertake to repeat every word; I remember so much as is material, and my brothers I hope will help me out, in what they have better observed.

As to Mr. Corker, Oates says, that he saw a letter under his hand, that is, his name, I suppose was to it, wherein he consented to the raising the 6,000*l.* which was to be raised out of the Benedictine estates, and was in order to the carrying on of this Plot. I do not find that he does prove that he did know Mr. Corker's hand. And he says of him further, he was their president, and so it was necessary to have his consent for the raising the 6,000*l.* and particularly he says, that he did except against Pickering's being designed for the murdering of the king; for, said he, He is a man that waits at the altar, and methinks you should choose some fitter person. For that, says Mr. Corker, which he says, that I was president; I was not president; and he makes it necessary for me to set my hand, because I being president, it was supposed it could not be done without me: and Dr. Oates does intend such a thing by his enforcing of it too: but he does produce to you two or three witnesses, that do say, Mr. Stapleton hath been president for four or five years; and said he, If I were not president, what needs all this ado about my consent? So he contradicts him in that particular, that he was not president, and it is not only a bare immaterial thing, because his being president made his hand more necessary to the raising the 6,000*l.* And for that matter of his saying, that he did except against Pickering, and they might have chose another, he does not charge him to be actually at the consultation, but he says he knew of it, because he said Pickering was not a fit man to do it. And he said, they had better choose a layman. He proves no fact, but only these words. And Mr. Bedlow he speaks against him, and what he says is rather less than what Oates says. For it is, that he talked with La Fevre the priest about the Plot in general words. It may be, he was talking with some body else, and yet he could hear that they talked together in general about it. That is all against him.

Against Mr. Marshal, it is rather less than against Corker, that is, that he did consent to the 6,000*l.* that should be raised among the Benedictines, he being a Benedictine too, and that he took exceptions against Pickering, as Corker did, that it was not convenient to employ him in killing the king. And this is that Oates says, and that he was a carrier of letters up and down, and a factor that way. And Bedlow says, that he knew that he carried letters, and was at the consult where they were read and answered, and when they asked him, Where? He said, At the Benedictine convent in the Savoy. And names in particular, a letter to sir Francis Radcliff, and that there was a discourse concerning the plot, in his hearing.

They say for themselves, they cannot answer any more than by circumstances, it is a very strange thing, if Dr. Oates knew this of us, why did not he take us before? And says sir George Wakeman, Why did not he accuse me of this letter that he talks of, before the king and council? He makes an answer (which to me indeed is a very faint one) at if he were so weak and tired, that he could not speak any word farther. When the council asked sir George Wakeman what he had to say for himself, and he behaved himself ruggedly, they call for Oates again, What, said they, 'do you know any thing of 'your own knowledge?' No, said he, God forbid; I know nothing more; as sir Philip Lloyd says, and as the matter speaks: For if he had charged him that he had seen that letter, the lords would infallibly have committed him. If he had but said, I saw a letter with his name to it, which by the character I believe was his, because I saw his writing elsewhere: And it is wonderful to me; I do not know, if a man be never so faint, could not he say, I saw a letter under his hand, as well as, I knew nothing more of him? There are as few words in one, as in the other. If he had said, I beg your lordships or his majesty's pardon, I am so weak I cannot recollect myself, it had been something; but to make a great protestation that he knew nothing of him. This is that that is said by sir Philip Lloyd, on his behalf.

These other gentlemen say, that Oates did not know them, and the woman does say, that she did tell them, when they came to search, that Corker and Marshal were there, and Dr. Oates and they said, they had nothing to do with any but Pickering. They make answer now and say, that they had no commission to take any but him. But it is strange indeed, if they were there, and they did see them, that they did not apprehend them. For what defence they make about what talk was had at the Gate-house, it is all contradicted by sir William Waller. And indeed, if it were possible, they have almost undone themselves in their own defences, by making weak observations, and insisting upon trivial things; improper for the Court to hear, and impertinent for them to urge. But I deal faithfully with you, I will discharge my own conscience to you. It lies upon the oaths of these two men. Though there was a Plot in general proved, yet that does not affect these men in particular, but was only used to answer that objection, that it should not be believed upon positive swearing, hand over head, without something else. Here was something else, the Plot in general, and their being priests, is another circumstance to me, who are mad to bring in popery, and would do any thing to get their tyranny again established amongst us. And there is more than probable evidence of that I assure you.

Sir Tho. Doleman did indeed say Mr. Oates was very weak, so that he was in great confusion, and scarce able to stand; weigh it with you how it will, but to me it is no answer. I tell you plainly, I think a man could not be so weak but he could have said, he saw a letter under his hand. It was as short as he could make an answer, and it is strange that he should go and make protestation that he knew nothing. And so I pray you weigh it well. Let us not be so amazed and frightened with the noise of Plots, as to take away any man's life without any reasonable evidence. If you are satisfied with the oaths of these two men; so, I have observed to you what objections they make for themselves, and those objections are material: What sir George Wakeman says about his not accusing him before the council, and what these men say that he did not apprehend them. And it is very strange, they should have so little knowledge, and so little acquaintance with Oates and Bedlow, and so great a matter as they speak should be true. And it is well enough observed, that he was a begging there; it is very much that such a man should know of such a great design on foot, and they should use him in that manner. These are the things that I remember, worthy of your consideration. These men's bloods are at stake, and your souls and mine, and our oaths and consciences are at stake; and therefore never care what the world says, follow your consciences; if you are satisfied these men swear true, you will do well to find them guilty, and they deserve to die for it: If you are unsatisfied, upon these things put together, and they do weigh with you, that they have not said true, you will do well to acquit them.

Bedlow. My lord, my evidence is not right summed up.

L. C. J. I know not by what authority this man speaks.

Cl. of Cr. Make way for the jury there; who keeps the jury?

[Then an officer was sworn to keep the jury: The judges went off the bench, leaving Mr. Recorder and some justices to take the Verdict. And after about an hour's space the jury returned, and the foreman coming up to the table, spoke thus to Mr. Recorder.]

Foreman. Sir, the gentlemen of the jury desire to know, whether they may not find the prisoners guilty of misprision of treason?

Recorder. No, you must either convict them of high-treason, or acquit them.

Foreman. Then take a Verdict.

Cl. of Cr. Gentlemen, answer to your names, Ralph Hawtrej.

Hawtrej. Here, &c.

Cl. of Cr. Gentlemen, are you all agreed of your Verdict?

Omnes. Yes.

Cl. of Cr. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Our foreman.

Cl. of Cr. Sir George Wakeman, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] Look upon the prisoner. How say you, is he guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

Capt. Richardson. Down on your knees.

Sir G. Wakeman. God bless the king and the honourable bench.

And in like manner were the other three acquitted. After the Verdict was recorded, the Court adjourned 'till 5 in the afternoon.

Some Observations upon the late Trials of Sir GEORGE WAKEMAN, CORKER, and MARSHAL, &c. By Tom Ticklefoot, the Tabourer, late Clerk to Justice Clodpate.

THE Reader may perhaps wonder why I should waver the employment of clerking to a Westminster Justice, who seldom are of the wisest, and turn mistress; but upon serious thought she will respect me for my integrity, and give greater faith to what I shall offer now; for to say the truth, the methods of my former life were so villainous, in order to my calling, as I could no longer dispense with them; for I was forced to inform my master's worship of all the bawdy-houses within his district, which by that means were all set under contribution, and out of their compositions for enormities I had poundage, which was all my subsistence, for his worship engrossed all the warrant-revenue to himself; so I grew of late melancholy, through the failing of trade, the private misses driving all before them, that public sinners are now of all people the most miserable; so I retired some time before my master's death: in which retirement, as barbers have nothing to do, learn to play on the cittern, I got a stroke upon the pipe and tabor, by which means I now live very comfortably; yet willing to give the world a taste of my old office of clerkship, I have made these following observations:

The first part of the trial was spent in the examination of Dugdale, Praunce, and Jennison, to prove the Plot, so to obviate the common objection that it was unreasonable to believe two men against so many, upon bare testimony, without other circumstantial evidence, that was done with such notoriety, as satisfied all unprejudiced persons: among other things it was proved, by an undeniable witness, Mr. Jennison, corroborated with notable circumstances, that Ireland died with a lye in his mouth; as by consequence sir John Southcot and his lady live with the same veracity, which my old master would have made another kind of use on than was made: then were some fine harangues about it, to answer some objections; yet nothing was reduced to practice in the case during that part of the trial, in which the prisoners were but remotely concerned. It may be observed, that Corker fell into great undecencies of passion against the witness Dugdale; an argument of guilt, my old master would have said; yet no inferences nor reproofs upon it. Now I have given a short, yet true account of what was but preliminary to Wakeman's, and their trials, I shall go on. Doctor Oates proved that Wakeman refused 10,000*l.* as too little for poisoning the king; which he termed so great a work, and afterwards did undertake it for five thousand more, as it was written down in the entry-book, kept sometimes at Wild-house, sometimes at Langhorn's chamber. And further, as appeared by the said entry-book, there were 5,000*l.* paid in part, and a receipt subscribed George Wakeman, which by a comparison of hands, was sworn to be sir George's hand; which sir George shifted off by the help of an apothecary, as he thought well enough; yet granting the apothecary to say true, which is questionable too, for they are often slippery chapmen, especially considering former relations, and future hopes; and Oates to swear true, which no wise man will dispute, there might be two letters, which sir George would slur off, from the improbability of writing two letters to one thing, and gravely bids the jury take notice that he writ but one letter; he might with the same modesty have advised them not to believe a word against him; yet little notice taken.

The improbability of writing two letters to one thing, seemed to weigh something with the Lord Chief Justice; though not so with Justice Pemberton, who said, It might be so, to serve a turn very well.

It was proved likewise by Dr. Oates, that Wakeman had a commission to be physician-general to the new army; which my Lord Chief Justice had like to have forgotten.

Amongst other matters, Bedlow deposed, That sir George Wakeman came into Harcourt's chamber in a chafe, and told him, he knew not whether he should go on or no. Harcourt went to his cabinet, and took out a bill, and asked sir George if he was ready? Sir George said he was, and had been long since, but they were not punctual with him; but what have you there? a bill for 2,000*l.* at your service, replies Harcourt. Which bill sir George accepted, and afterwards told Bedlow, that the goldsmith had allowed of it, and would pay him in the afternoon. When Wakeman objected, it was not likely he should discover so great a secret upon so small an acquaintance; Bedlow replied, he would have a hundred times more, if Harcourt had but told him he was his confidant, as he had done then. Wakeman rambled out into a passion, and swore that he never saw him in all his life: yet Bedlow made it out by circumstances, that he had taken physic of him at the bath; and that acquaintance he did not deny, but called him rogue, &c. Before the prisoner called his witnesses, it may be observed, that the Lord Chief Justice said, that Bedlow, the second witness, said no material thing against Wakeman, but only some circumstantial about a 2,000*l.* bill; but had not said for what, only some things about the queen, his lady and mistress.

Sir Robert Sawyer replied, under favour, and began to sum up Bedlow's evidence; so the Lord Chief Justice seemed not pleased, and answered, What is all this? Call Mr. Bedlow again. To whom he made a godly speech about innocent blood, and bade him give his evidence anew; who gave what is above said. Sir George replied, What if the queen had given me 2,000*l.* for my service done her, is that any harm? I have deserved it, I am sure, for nine years service; yet a little before he made a protestation before God, he never saw Bedlow; a likely matter, as if an absolute stranger should come to the knowledge of such a money-circumstance, and agree in the sum too. Bedlow went on, and swore, that Harcourt said to sir George, This must be well followed, and closely observed; because much depends upon it: For if we should miss to kill him at Windsor, or you miss in your way, then we will do it at Newmarket. The Lord Chief Justice made Bedlow repeat the words again; which he did, only interposing [which we hope you will not.] The Lord Chief Justice replied very modestly, he says now quite another thing; but was contradicted by the Lord Chief Justice North, the Recorder, and sir Robert Sawyer, and submitted to it most christianly. Then Bedlow went on, and swore, that sir G. Wakeman, in his hearing, declared his consent; and that it was one entire discourse: Upon which the knight, as well he might, said to the prisoners, Then is my business done; and he had been a true prophet, if either wit or honesty had exercised a due dominion over the jury. Now if my old master Clodpate had been on the bench, he would have hung hard upon that expression, as also upon sir George's allowing of 2,000*l.* to be paid for wages; he would have swaggered it, and have said, This is not to be said to us that know the methods of the Court, never to pay so much wages at a time, they always instance such sums; you might, however, have brought some other authority besides yourself, which can deserve no credit here, when it is clear by all circumstances you invoke God to witness to a lye, about your never seeing Bedlow, within these ten minutes.

1679.—and others, for High Treason. [690

Against Corker, Oates deposed, That he saw his patent from Rome to be bishop of London; that he was privy, and did consent to Langhorn's proposal to the Benedictine monks, to advance 6,000*l.* towards carrying on his design, his consent being necessary, because he was president; and that Corker should say farther, that he carried on the design under the disguise of bestowing the queen's charity; and that he did except against Pickering, being chosen to kill the king, being that a mere layman was more proper. Mr. Marshal was charged with the same thing, and that Marshal went half with Conyers, who laid a wager that the king would eat no more Christmas pies.

Bedlow deposed further against Corker, That he had heard him discourse about raising an army, but nothing positively to the murder of the king. Bedlow accused Marshal much about that rate; but Marshal not being shy of his lip-labour, fell to impertinent questioning him about his knowing him; but was confuted (but not at all ashamed in his lies) by sir William Waller, who was sworn in the case; but Marshal, with a company of soft words, would have persuaded sir William that he forswore himself; the priest surely loved to hear himself prattle, to spend so much time in the wasting of his credit, about a thing which was not of a farthing concern, true or false: Then he asked Bedlow, whether he had ever seen him before he was taken? Who said, at the Savoy. Then with an unheard of impudence he replied, He would be content to be hanged, if Bedlow could prove that he was ever at the Savoy. Bedlow, though he had none by to prove that, as perhaps he would have been in the same case if he had been to have proved himself ever to have been in Westminster Hall, as the Lord Chief Justice intimated; yet he did it by a sufficient circumstance, when he gave sir William Waller directions where to search for the gun that was to have killed the king; which was found accordingly. This is now the substance of what the prisoners, Wakeman, Corker, and Marshal, were charged with: The other, Rumley, had but one witness against him; so went off on course. Sir George now called his witnesses; the chief was Chapman the apothecary, of which I have given a former account. Then was his man Hunt, and Elizabeth Hennaingham, called, who talked at the apothecary's rate; so that Oates was not at all contradicted by them, but they might both say true, and that the Chief Justice told them. Then sir Philip Lloyd was called upon by sir G. Wakeman, to adjust what Dr. Oates should say at the Council-table; who said but not upon oath, that when sir George was called in before the council, and told of his accusation, he utterly denied all, and did indeed carry himself, as if he were not concerned at the accusation. Then Oates was called in, to tell what he knew further; for as yet he had given but a hearsay evidence (as my old master used to term it), he replied with lift up hands, God forbid (for I must tell truth, says sir Philip Lloyd, let it be what it will) that I should say any thing against sir George Wakeman; for I know nothing more against him. Oates replied, He knew nothing at all of this. Sir George triumphed, and cried, This is a protestant witness. Now had old justice Clodpate, my old master, been upon the bench, he would have taken up the knight, and told him, he had given a very officious testimony; for he was to tell only what Oates said at that time, and not to pretend to skill in physiognomy; for he was not mealy mouthed, but would upon occasion have talked his mind to knights, or any body, and would have said further, It appears to me, and may appear to any body else, that this knight has as great a kindness for sir George as for truth, and have bidden the jury observed accordingly; he would not have left there neither, for he would have said, Admit sir Philip says true, and that is as kind to him as can be, what would sir George infer, That Mr. Oates is now tied up in his evidence? By no means, for the case is no more than if a man be brought before a justice of peace for stealing a cow, and that witness makes a solemn protestation, that he knows no more against him: yet afterwards, upon his arraignment, swears to a horse too; in another bill of Indictment, the former asseveration is attested by his worship's clerk, quere, whether that will quit him for the horse, or ought to be so much as heard in a Court? Besides, here has been a late judged case, Whitebread and Fenwick's, the jury was withdrawn for want of full evidence, afterwards one of the short evidences came to swear houte, and was admitted, the prisoners found Guilty, and executed accordingly; if that was right, as no question it was, because practised, as I have been informed, it must be much more in the right now to admit of Oates's further testimony, for the council-table is no court of Record, as this is.

Sir Thomas Doleman was called in for Oates; who said, that Oates at that time was in great disorder and confusion, and as feeble as ever he saw any body in his life, so as he believed he could not give any body a good answer; and further said, that Wakeman was called in, and gave his answer, at which the council was amazed; for he did not in his opinion deny it so positively as one that was innocent could, but shuffled matters off with expressions of the great loyalty and services to the crown of himself and family, and required reparation for injury done. It seems sir Philip and sir Thomas had different sentiments about sir George's mien. When sir Thomas Doleman had done, sir George, unbidden, fell into a repetition of what he had said at the council table in his defence; which resolved only into a telling what a good subject he had been for the king, what work his brother made at Worcester, how his father lost 18,000*l.* estate for the king, how he was in a plot for the king, was taken at his apothecary's, some arms found in the cellar, carried to prison, and in much danger of being hanged; and how his family was mighty instrumental in the saving of the king, as colonel Gifford, his cousin Carlos; and that the Pendrels were menial servants to the family.

Then Corker was called; who began with a florid discourse reflecting upon the witnesses, that they had been men of scandalous lives, and that there was no Plot; which he flourished off as well as he could, but not to any reasonable satisfaction; then he came to trifling about going to Lamspring in Westphalia, and such other small matters; but at last he said, he was not president of the Benedictines; which was material, had it been well proved, for it obviated Mr. Oates his accusation of consenting to the 6,000*l.* as president. Then Marshal was called to say for himself; who made a great pother about a white spot under his periwig, and sir William Waller's ordering him to put it off; and many inferences he would have made; and then made a great stir about witnesses that could have come within three days, and many other things to no purpose. Then Corker called his witness, Nell Rigby, to prove that he was in the Savoy when Pickering was taken; and that Oates and Bedlow did know so much; She likewise averred, that Stapleton was president of the Benedictines, and Corker never officiated as such; and that she saw Mr. Oates once in the house, who came a begging to Mr. Pickering for charity, and that was in the midst of the Plot, as was made out by circumstance; from whence Marshal inferred, It was not likely they should trust him with any thing of that nature, and suffer him to want. This now must be a new contrivance, for it would have been set up before in Pickering's Trial, had there been any thing of truth in it. I now wonder that none from the bench set upon that bitch-fox, to run down her testimony; for allow that to be true, the Plot is non-suit, Scmel insanivimus omnes; my old master would have clawed the three-penny baggage, and told her her own, and likewise have broke her credit with the jury, by the circumstances, that it was never before offered; a thing that they could not be so careless in, had the thing been true. Now Mrs. Sheldon was called to prove Stapleton president of the Benedictines; who accordingly did so. Then Alice Broadhead did the same.

Then Dr. Oates was called again, but never examined; he is wise that can tell why, without somebody was afraid he should have cleared the point, as it was formerly in another case about Mr. Howard's son.

Then the court asked them, if they had done all three? Sir George Wakeman fell to a detesting, forswearing, and abominating the plot, and that he never had a farthing for any such thing; Corker much at that rate; and Marshal made an haraугue, that, had it not been for my Lord Chief Justice North, I believe would have lasted till now; it was all full of protestations of the innocence of the executed persons, which were fully answered by the Chief Justice Scroggs; who after some little trifling velitations with the priests, summed up the evidence. In the first he proved, by Mr. Jennison, as has been hinted before, that Ireland died with a lye in his mouth.

Now a man would wonder what he should urge that for, unless to infer, That if dying men in their last breath would lye, why should living persons be believed under their circumstances? Especially when a jury is free by the law to do what they will without blemish in the case.

Then the Chief Justice goes on, and sums up Oates his evidence against Wakeman; which his lordship, leaving or forgetting all the material points, makes only circumstantial: till sir Robert Sawyer put him in mind of his commission, seen by Oates, to be a physician to the new army; and then his lordship goes on, and allows that, as likewise that he refused 10,000*l.* and would have 15,000*l.* to do the work; but with an unusual sweetness leaves the truth with the jury, and then falls most religiously into a declaration against shedding innocent blood: which he did so pathetically, as no man would judge him to be the son of a father who, as moderns say, was not very scrupulous in that point.

Then he goes on to Mr. Bedlow's evidence; and though he sums it up a little short, yet he makes him a second witness against Wakeman if the jury will believe him. Now considering these [I]f's were never put before, why the devil should they now, would old Clodpate have said; and so say I, Tom Tickle-foot.

And then the Chief Justice prays the bench in aid, if he had forgotten any thing material.

Then his lordship was pleased to say, the evidence against Corker was not full, so as to prove any fact, but only some words; and that he was not president of the Benedictines, his lordship affirmed from the testimony of three flingstinks, without any manner of hint to the jury that they were not upon their oaths. The charge against Marshal, his lordship said, was rather less than against Corker; and so accordingly lightened it, as became him.

Then he comes to sir Philip Lloyd's testimony, which he laid as great a stress upon as it would naturally bear; and, so as to invalidate any further testimony against sir George Wakeman, his lordship was pleased to name sir Thomas Doleman's evidence, but with so little respect, as he might have as decently let it alone: And to invalidate Oates his testimony further, he takes notice that he was begging, without intimation to the jury of any probability of the matter, which must utterly destroy Mr. Oates for the future; for nobody that believes that, can believe any thing he says of the Plot. And then, after a pious exhortation to the jury to take care of innocent blood, he concludes, telling them, that if they believe Oates and Bed-low, they may do well to find the prisoners guilty; otherwise not.

Bedlow charged the Chief Justice, for not summing up his evidence right; who only replied, he knew not by what authority this man speaks. I shall only make this observation upon his lordship: In all former trials he went on without the least hesitation, or running the same over again, as he did not in this; especially about the concern of innocent blood: but, by all that is good, it was my old master Clodpate's disease, peace be with him! always to sham up an evidence when any body had been with him the morning before.

About an hour after the jury returned, and brought them in Not Guilty; but, according to their abundance of want of understanding, enquired whether they might not bring them in guilty of misprision, or no? Now could such a thing come into their politic pates, had they understood what the word meant? For that implies a knowing of, but not-consenting to, a treason. Now there was no manner of colour for such a thing; for the evidence was full, if they believed them, as to absolute treason; if not, why would they think of any thing but acquittal? But it may be they knew not the force of the word, which led them into that error; I am sure that is their best plea; otherwise they must yield themselves to be great betrayers of their nation, and lay under a damned suspicion of being foully practised upon; especially if that be true that runs about in coffee-houses, That a gentleman that went out amongst them had a sealed paper of fifty guineas thrust into his hand.

They say in the north, That a jury consists of eleven fools and a knave: Now those of the south, as being more refined wits, are of a nobler consistence, as having more of the knave in them; for had they had a mind to have examined matters, and not barely to have acquiesced in outward appearance, they might have considered, that Oates and Bedlow did not swear by practice, like the boys of St. Omers, from this circumstance, That Rumley had but one witness against him. Now had hanging, and not truth, been the designed matter, how easy a thing had it been for captain Bedlow to have agreed with Dr. Oates, and made up two witnesses against Rumley, is obvious to every considering capacity, and might have played such a prank formerly to have served a turn, when they were listed amongst the pope's mamelukes.

It is no small wonder, I confess to Tom Ticklefoot, that nobody from the bench nor bar hinted that circumstance; my old master Clodpate would have been hanged before he would have missed such a barn door.

I am more particular in this, to the end that circumstance of their not combining, may induce juries for the future to look upon them as men that swear only according to the dictates of truth, notwithstanding the sham tale of the doctor's begging at Pickering's.

To the foregoing Pamphlet, there was published the following Answer:

The TICKLER TICKLED; or, the Observator upon the late Trials of Sir GEORGE WAKEMAN, &c. observed. By MARGERY MASON, Spinster. London: Printed for A. Brewster, 1679.

LET nobody wonder at this attempt, as an argument of overweening, when so many of our sex are become statists; but I being nothing concerned at other ladies actions, will only give the reader, as introductory to my observations, a short account of my own life. I was placed with a beautiful lady of great quality about court, as superintendant of her Limbeck, Preserving-pans, and Washes; by which means, I became the chief confident, as being privy to all her intrigues. My lady past off her youthful years pleasurably enough both to herself and me; for the fresh lovers that flocked daily (to whom my lady was never hard hearted) were free of their money, both to herself and servants; but when my lady became a little superannuated, and was forced to send ambassadors to her former idolaters, the case, (as to money) came to be quite altered; so we lived upon the spoil, but yet pretty even and even; but her ladyship at last came to give boots, then there was no longer abiding for me; so I thought fit to retire whilst I had some money and beauty left; so accordingly did, into Chancery-lane, turned sempstress: where ————— shop I keep for countenance

But ————— is my sustenance. Chaucer.

And now having a little knack in book learning, I diverted myself this dead vacation time with reading and comparing the late trials, with the observations of captain Ticklefoot, (for why not captain Ticklefoot as well as captain Bedlow?) They indeed are too unmannerly upon the chief magistrate, for it lays matters too open; they are likewise so rude upon the ladies that came to attest the truth, as it is not at all suitable to the generosity of a chevalier, for to treat a lady of Mrs. Ellen Rigby's quality, with the name of bitch-fox, and three-penny baggage, is not at all urbane. There were some indecencies about the other gentlewomen, which are not worth our confutation; so now I will modestly, as becomes our sex, examine the whole matter.

The detractors indeed do say, which I cannot help, if I was to be hanged, that my Lord Chief-Justice's carriage did not seem even, as not at all quadrating with the former trials. The only way to judge whether the detractors be rogues or no, is to lay down matters fairly, as they were transacted in Wakeman's trial, and compare them with parallel cases in the trials of the convicted persons. But before I fall into the main business, I must have the other sling at captain Ticklefoot, who is too severe in reflecting upon a descent there; I suppose he hath some British blood in him, and had a knight to his ancestor, or is akin to somebody that is akin to a lord, he would have had more wit else, than to have objected against any body what is not in his power to help, he might have remembered that worthy saying of Cicero, I had rather be the first than the last of my family; as likewise the brave achievements of that great man, how he ran down a plot in his consulship, backed by so many of the Patricians, and chief nobility, nay, Caesar himself was not free; it was so backed as the rebels were able, upon discovery, to dispute the matter by arms: yet that mushroom orator, that man of no images, by his own proper virtue brought it to light, and the traitors to punishment, notwithstanding that great abetting. Or, he might have remembered, had he read authors, what that great capt. Caius Marius said in his oration to the people of Rome, when he stood candidate for general in the Jugurthian wars, when his want of nobility was objected against him: 'Nobilitatem certe peperisse melius est, quam acceptam coru-

'pisse;' (for Padge hath a smack at Latin, but let them English't that will.) And I think my Lord-Chief-Justice has done his part as to every thing till of late; and whether well or no, now, is to be enquired into by circumstances. In the trials of Whitebread and his fellows, when the sixteen witnesses were brought over from St. Omers, to prove Oates in a lie about the time of the consult, his lordship, I must confess, animadverted very sarcastically upon them, by saying, their testimony was alike to be believed, though not upon oath, as if they had been sworn, because they are of a religion that can dispense with oaths, though false, for the sake of a good cause. And then reflecting upon the nature of the men, he goes on very floridly, and tells the jury, That they are pro-selites, and young striplings of their church, which does indeed, in one respect or other, abuse all her disciples, and keep them in a blind obedience to pursue and effect all her commands: And then going on, says of the witnesses, That they were young boys sent for hither on purpose to give this testimony; and though it be no fault in the prisoners to send for what evidence they could; but it is very doubtful and suspicious to have such green and flexible minds thus employed; and I must leave it to you; meaning the jury, to consider how far these young men, trained in such principles, may be prevailed on to speak what is not true.

And then, after his lordship had done what became him by running down the school-boy's evidence, he makes this as a natural inference, "That they cannot want witness to prove what they please; for I believe there is none of them all will make any bones of it."

It cannot be said, I must confess, that there was any such pains taken to run down the credit of the gentlewomen that came to invalidate Oates's testimony, upon the account of their religion, or of their sex, very prevailable upon to speak what often is not true; for the first was never so much as hinted, nor so much neither as that they were not upon their oaths, which there was great care taken for in the St. Omers' boys. I must confess, my lord's treating Mr. Oates about the witness Nell Rigby, is a wonder to me; for his words are so plain, that they imply he has lied all this while, and is to be believed no more. "It is well observed," says he, "that he was a begging there;" viz. at Pickering's, formerly executed. "It is very much that such a man should know of such a design on foot, and they use him on that manner;" and concludes, "that that amongst other things was worthy consideration." My lord was pleased to gallant Mrs. Sheldon and Alice Broadhead at the same rate, by allowing their tale, though it was in the negative, that Mr. Corker did never officiate as the president of the Benedictines, which made Dr. Oates's evidence ineffectual. I must not forget, amongst all, my lord's great compliment to the city, which it may be pleased some as much as the verdict did please others; "We have a bench of aldermen," says he, "have more wit than the conclave, and a Lord Mayor that is as infallible as the Pope." Now if all these things put together deserve another name than fair practice, I, poor Madge, cannot help it.

P. S. But to come to the point; here are three men indicted for no less than high treason (for Rumley is to be omitted, the proof against him being justly allowed to be imperfect) one, for having undertaken, for a base reward of money, to have poisoned a great monarch, his lawful prince and sovereign; a king, and consequently, by virtue of his office, sacred in his person, as being elevated to the high dignity of a God upon earth by the affirmative of never-erring scripture itself: a crime so enormous, so void, to set religion aside, of those common dictates of heathenish morality, that it was never so remarkably violated till Judas and the murderers of his father taught the way: A crime to have been committed against a majesty so mild, so tender of enforcing conscience, so indulgent, that he frequently dispensed with the rigor of his own laws, to mitigate their punishment; interposing in hopes of reclaiming them, between them and the violent prosecution of an incensed parliament. And yet, for all this, mercy itself must be assassinated or poisoned. What can we think, but that men, who dare attempt such ungodly massacres upon the holy person of a God upon earth, would not stick for double the sum, to poison their Creator himself, at the instigation of the devil, his great adversary, were it within the verge of their prostituted recipes? But happy the gentleman was under the bonds of confession. And then, "Better that all the kings of the earth should perish, than that the seat of confession should be broken;" as Binetus the Jesuit told the learned Casaubon.* Or else the assertion of that other Jesuit prevailed with him, who averred to the same Casaubon in France, "That if Christ were again upon earth, in a condition subject to death, and any one should tell him that he had a design to kill him, that he would suffer Christ to be murdered, rather than reveal the confession †." Since then the crime was so considerable, and the consequences of its being perpetrated, must have proved so fatal to the nation, it cannot well be thought that an under-sheriff alone was a fit person to be the sole judge of the probity and judgment of a jury that was to pass their verdict upon a fact of so much weight, and so dreadful to the very thoughts of his majesty's subjects in the issue of the success.

As for the other two, though their crimes were not absolutely so great, yet were they heinous enough; they were both privy to the conspiracy, allowed it, fostered and encouraged it; and were the raisers and contributors of very large sums towards the carrying it on.

As for the proof of the indictments, it was certainly as bright as summer sunshine; it is to be feared, too bright to dazzle the eyes of so many mens' understandings. Then for the defences of the prisoners, they were publicly allowed to have been very mean, and that their cause looked much better before they were heard: which the jury, had they not been adders, might have heard; for it was spoken loud enough. For what signified all their procrastinated endeavours to shelter themselves under the scandals and reproaches which they threw upon the king's evidence? A trick they had all used, though not with the same success; and that is one thing that reason professes herself to be puzzled at: For what had the king's evidence done to render them more flagitious than they were the former sessions? why to be less credited than before? they had been as deep in the Plot as themselves, it is true; but they had reclaimed themselves from their disloyalty, and by a seasonable discovery, had ruined the villainous architecture of their treachery; for which they had received the king's pardon; and so being recti in curia, were not to be canvassed by the foul mouths of those that laid hold of every rotten bough to save themselves. And it was a hard case that they should stand there as at a stake, rather to be baited than examined: but suppose them guilty of the luxuriant misdemeanours of the age, what law is there in any nation that we know of, that excludes an adulterer, an atheist, a fornicator, or a drunkard, a proud or a covetour man from giving his testimony, either in criminal or civil causes? A man may love wine or a mistress, be vain in his discourse, cherish his avarice or his ambition, yet loath conspiracy, disloyalty to his prince and treachery to his country. Vicious men are seldom guilty of accumulated vice; but setting aside the particular inclination of nature, are in other things morally just and honest, religiously giving to Cæsar that which is Cæsar's, and abominating the foot-steps of seemingly pious and sober villainy.

To reproach their need and exigency, was as little to their advantage: For who, can any man think, would do the drudgery of a Plot, carry letters and portmanteaus from place to place, run from post to pillar, and be at the beck of inferior superiority, but they who had not their fat benevolences and rewards to support them? Surely they would not have had the lords in the Tower have run upon their errands. Neither could there be a greater symptom of urging necessity, than for a man to accept of money to murder his prince. Why did not they, that boast so much sobriety and sanctity, make the discovery themselves, and put by these flagitious witnesses from having the hand? Very fine indeed!

“Clodius accusat Mæchos——”

As if any but they who had been as flagitious as themselves, could have ever discovered their designs! would they have had the Protestants divined them? would they have had an angel from heaven have come on purpose to disclose them? or else would they have had the evil spirit of Brutus to have risen a third time? no certainly, they would not have had it revealed at all: but because these persons did reveal it, therefore they must be flagitious. Fulvia and Sempronius, that revealed the conspiracy of Cataline, were both courtesans, and yet they that read the story, will not find, that either Cicero the consul, or the Roman senate gave the less credit to them for that. The Allobroges at that time were suppliants and petitioners, and yet their information past. Thus far upon the supposition that they had been men of a loose life or necessitous; but here was no such thing: there was not any one of their accusations or reflections that they could prove against them. So that reason, in the second place, admires why there was so much freedom allowed their lavish tongues; or that men should be so much moped in their senses, to be carried away with such a slight stream of false and proofless suggestions.

Such answers as these were not so remote from the quick apprehensions of men of business, but that they might easily have been produced to defend the reputation of the king's evidence, from the batteries of men in despair, that verily believed their business had been done, and therefore cared not what they said. Certainly some gentle constellation reigned that day, more tender-hearted than moist St. Swithin, or the weeping Pleiades; or else mercy and compassion themselves had some particular pique against truth, and were resolved to put an affront upon her. But alas! Clemency had no hand in it.—The witnesses were hirelings and impostors.—But now, Lassa Crudelitas began to grow penitent, and to cry Peccavi for her former severity, which will certainly be the construction of them that hereafter shall go to play the Causinus's with our story.

The next plea of the prisoners was, That the evidence were strangers to them; and that they had started a new charge; of which they declared themselves utterly ignorant before the council. A very strange thing, that the question should be all of a sudden, whether familiarity should be necessary for the conviction of such secret and grand delinquents? This was rather an argument of the truth. For what motive can any rational man propose, that should induce persons unacquainted with the prisoners, and consequently, such as could not be thought to have received any personal injuries from them, out of a prepense and studied malice to seek their blood? Hopes of reward.—But that is a scandal that blasphemes the integrity of that authority which gave the testimonies countenance to prosecute: that impeaches both the parliament and council, as if they were the rewarders of people to take away the lives of the innocent. They saw that apparently there was a plot, and that there was a design to take away the king's life, and had as much reason to believe the information of clandestine poisoning, as the private pistolling. But these witnesses did know the prisoners, and had seen them in the company of the conspirators, had heard them discourse together of the design itself, had seen the acquittance for receipt of the money, and that by all the circumstances of the discourse, the money could be paid upon no other account, than to poison the king, which was the thing at that time intended, and the thing then only spoken of. And this was certainly and most unanswerably a knowledge sufficient of the persons, without any necessity that the king's evidence should be any farther, or more intimately acquainted with him. If a man sees a thief break a house, it is not to be conceived, that the witness should be constrained to go and drink a pot of ale, and enter into a strict league of friendship with the felon, before he can accuse him of the felony.

As to the other objection, That the charge of the king's evidence was not so ample before the lords of the council, as the bar of Oyer and Terminer; the answer of the king's evidence was very fair and probable; and the reasons of his omission, were credibly balanced in his behalf, as the averment against him. He was sworn to be in a most weak and feeble condition, being tired by public and eminent service: And how far the weaknesses of the body may disorder the faculties of the mind, is not unknown to vulgar experience.

It was enough he charged him at the bar, charged him home, and backed his charge with a reserve of Circumstances sufficiently convincing; and therefore there was no necessity to aggravate and prosecute such a prime objection to such an egregious height, as if it had been done on purpose to throw disgrace and shame upon desert, to make way for unseasonable and untoward compassion.

This is not the judgment of a few, but the general murmur and complaint, the general voice of the people; for they are making their queries in every coffee-house, and cry, Why should one man be hanged for paying 5,000*l.* upon a treasonable account, and another man be acquitted for receiving the same 5,000*l.*, upon account of the same treason? Why the same witnesses should condemn the one for the payment, and be rejected.

As to the receipt, seeing they swear as positively to the one as the other, why the memory of man should fail at one particular juncture so remarkably, as to leave out or forget the most material points of the king's evidence? Why the bare allegations for the criminals should be so lugged and caressed, and an oath of spotless credit for the king, looked upon as a mere intruder, and passed by with as little respect? What necessity or provocation was given by the king's evidence to be publicly upbraided with beggary, upon the slighter tittle tattle of an idle thing in petticoats; How there came to be so much courtship used toward Corker's two misses, that their tale should be so courteously allowed that had neither head nor tail? Why matters should be so ill managed, that the king's witnesses should have occasion to complain, that his evidence was not rightly summed up? And wherefore for such a requisite piece of unmannerliness, he should be so severely checked and frowned upon.

Lastly, What was the meaning of so many foreign visits, which, upon what account soever they were, were then neither prudently nor warily admitted at that time?

Now though the people ask these questions, yet; they say, that many of them can answer themselves; or at least, that there are certain Davids among them, that can unfold all these mysteries: but they are so surly, that they cry, They will take their own time; and so they must, if there be no other remedy.

But what have these acquitted offenders got by this excuse? It is true, they are acquitted at the bar of common trial, and so have saved their lives; but they are still as guilty as ever, before the tribunal of reason: so that, although they are let loose again into the world, yet it is with that indelible mark of Cain, which at length they will carry to their graves, after they have only led a miserable life, rejected from the society of all good men, that are lovers of their prince and country.

The Lord Chief-Justice SCROGGS'S SPEECH in the King's-Bench, the first Day of this present Michaelmas-Term, 1679, occasioned by many libellous Pamphlets which are published against Law, to the Scandal of the Government, and Public Justice. Together with what was declared at the same time on the same Occasion, in open Court, by Mr. Justice JONES, and Mr. Justice DOLBEN.

I HAVE bound over this man, Richard Radley, to his good behaviour, and to appear here this day, for saying false and scandalous words of me, which are sworn to by two several affidavits; viz.

"William Lewis maketh oath, That on the 7th day of August, 1679, there being a difference between Robert Raylett and Richard Radley, we heard the said Richard Radley say to him the said Raylett, If you think to have the money you have overthrown me in, go to Weal-hall to my lord Scroggs; for he has received monee enough of Dr. Wake-man for his acquittal. "WM.-LEWIS."

"Robert Raylett maketh oath, That there was a Trial at the last Essex Assizes between him and one Richard Radley, where he recovered 38*l.*; and he happening to be at work on the 7th day of August, 1679, over-against the house of the said Richard Radley, the said Richard Radley told him, If you expect the money you have overthrown me in, you may go to Weal-hall; for there is monee enough come in now. "ROB. RAYLETT."

Jurat. 4to die Septem.

1679, coram me,

WM. SCROGGS.

First, I would have all men know, that I am not so revengeful in my nature, nor so nettled with this aspersion, but that I could have passed by this and more; but that the many scandalous libels that are abroad, and which reflect upon public justice, as well as upon my private self, make it the duty of my place to defend one, and the duty I owe to my reputation to vindicate the other.

And having this opportunity, I think this the properest place for both. If once our courts of justice come to be awed or swayed by vulgar noise, and if judges and juries should manage themselves so as would best comply with the humour of times, it is falsely said, that men are tried for their lives or fortunes; they live by chance, and enjoy what they have as the wind blows, and with the same certainty: the giddy multitude have constancy, who condemn or acquit always before the trial, and without proof.

Such a base, fearful compliance made Felix, willing to please the people, leave Paul bound; who was apt to tremble, but not to follow his conscience. The people ought to be pleased with public justice, and not justice seek to please the people. Justice should flow like a mighty stream; and if the rabble, like an unruly wind, blow against it, it may make it rough, but the stream will keep its course. Neither, for my part, do I think we live in so corrupted an age, that no man can with safety be just and follow his conscience: if it be otherwise, we must hazard our safety to preserve our integrity.

And to speak more particularly as to sir George Wakeman's Trial, which I am neither afraid nor ashamed to mention, I know that all honest and understanding men in the kingdom (speaking generally) are thoroughly satisfied with the impartial proceedings of that trial, taking it as it is printed; which was done without the perusal of one line by me, or any friend of mine. Though, by the way, I wonder by what authority that arbitrary power was assumed, to forbid any friend of mine the seeing of it, before it was put out. However, as it is, I will appeal to all sober and understanding men, and to the long robe more especially, who are the best and properest judges in such cases, as to the fairness and equality of that trial.

For those hireling scribblers that traduce it, who write to eat, and lie for bread, I intend to meet with them another way, for they are only safe whilst they can be secret; but so are vermin, so long only as they can hide themselves. And let their brokers, those printers and booksellers by whom they vend their false and braded ware, look to it; some will be found, and they shall know that the law wants not power to punish a libellous and licentious press, nor I a resolution to execute it.

And this is all the answer is fit to be given (besides a whip) to those hackney-writers, and dull observers, that go as they are hired or spurred, and perform as they are fed, who never were taught.

If there be any sober and good men that are misled by false reports, or by subtilly deceived into any misapprehensions concerning that trial, or myself; I should account it the highest pride, and the most scornful thing in the world, if I did not endeavour to undeceive them.

To such men therefore I do solemnly declare here, in the seat of justice, where I would no more lie or equivocate than I would to God at the Holy Altar. I followed my conscience, according to the best of my understanding, in all that trial, without fear, favour, or reward, without the gift of one shilling, or the value of it directly or indirectly, and without any promise or expectation whatsoever.

This I say to honest men, that know me not, if any that do know me needed this, they should not have had it, for they use me ill; he that knows me and doubts, so long thinks it an even wager, whether I am the greatest villain in the world or not; one that would sell the life of the king, my religion, and country, to papists for money: and he that says great places have great temptations, has a little, if not a false heart himself; for no temptation is big enough for a sin of this magnitude.

I would not have the papists now make any false conclusions from what I say, That because I reprove the insolence of some men's tongues and pens, concerning this trial, they should thence infer they have not had, or at least cannot expect fair play, because some foolish men cry out of their acquittal, and think there is no justice where there is no execution. They have had fair trials, and some that have suffered have had the ingenuity to confess it; and they shall still be tried according to the evidence, and the probability and credibility it carries with it.— But this I must say, he that thinks there is no Plot, is blind with prejudice, or wilfully shuts his eyes. The priests and Jesuits had a design to root out the Protestant religion, and bring in popery, and that is directly to overthrow the government; and to effect this, that they would kill the king. Were there no more, their doctrine and practices go very far to prove it; and he that says the contrary is as much out, as where in a printed pamphlet he too confidently asserts, that in all their papers that were searched, there was not one ill letter found, or any thing that was suspicious. Coleman's letters, and the letter found amongst Harcourt's papers, will never be answered; not by saying, that a meeting so exactly appointed, with all cautions imaginable (as not to appear too much about the town, for fear of discovering the design, which in its own nature requires secrecy), that this was only a meeting to choose an officer.— And yet to affirm, that this is not so much as suspicious at least, is a confidence, that the ingenuity of a jesuit only will undertake to own.

However, in the mean time, the extravagant boldness of mens pens and tongues is not to be endured, but shall be severely punished: for if once causes come to be tried with complacency to popular opinions, and shall be insolently censured if they go otherwise, all public causes shall receive the doom as the multitude happen to be possessed; and at length every cause shall become public, if they will but espouse it; at every sessions the judges shall be arraigned, the jury condemned, and the verdicts over-awed to comply with popular noise, and undecent shouts.

There are a sort of men, I doubt, that too much approve and countenance such vulgar ways, and count it art and stratagem, that embrace all sorts of informations, true or false, likely or impossible, nay, though never so silly and ridiculous, they refuse none: so shall all addresses be made to them and they be looked on as the only patrons of religion and government, though they should have but little of the one, and would maintain the other only so far as their own share in it comes to.

These, Sir Politics, (if such there are) deceive themselves as much as they do others, and are not what they imagine themselves to be, with understanding and honest men; no not with those they think they gull neither, for they use them to serve their purposes as they think they serve others, and if ever time shall serve it will prove so.

Let us pursue the discovery of the Plot, in God's name, and not baulk any thing, where there is danger of suspicion upon reasonable grounds; but not so over-do it, as to shew our zeal: we will not pretend to find what is not, nor stretch one thing beyond what it will bear, to reach another: nor count him a turn-coat, and not to be trusted, that will not betray his conscience and understanding, that will not countenance unreasonable boldness, nor believe incredible things, lest we fall into what we justly condemn in the Papists, cruelty, and vain credulity: such courses cannot be the result of honest intentions, but shrewdly to be suspected rather a disguise, in pursuing one villainy to commit another. For my own part, without any other meaning or reservation whatsoever, I freely and heartily declare, I will never be a Papist nor a rebel; but will, to my power, suppress Popery as an open enemy, and faction as a secret one.

No act of oblivion ought to make us to forget by what ways, our late troubles began, when the apprentices and porters mutinied for justice, in their own sense. And though I am morally certain, that no such effect will follow as did then, yet the like insolence ought not to be suffered for the example past and to come.

The city of London, I mean the lord mayor and aldermen, and generally all men of value and worth there, I think in my conscience, are at this day as loyal and religiously disposed to defend the king and the government, and maintain the true Protestant religion to their utmost as any former age whatsoever can shew; and I know the king thinks so too, and is therefore really and heartily as kind to them. And therefore, though our jealousies may be many our fears need not be so: for whosoever they are that design disturbances, and public dissensions, for private ends, will find they are rather troublesome than dangerous: and the greatest mischief they will be able to effect, will be upon themselves. In short, it is the proper business of this court and our duty that sit judges here, to take care to prevent and punish the mischiefs of the press.

For if men can, with any safety, write and print whatever they please, the Papists will be sure to put in for their share too: So that what between them, and the factious, and the mercenaries that write for him that hires, and for what they are hired, we shall be infected with the French disease in government, and be overrun with lies and libels; which agrees neither with Englishmen's honesty, nor courage, who were wont to scorn to say what they durst not own.

Mr. Justice JONES.

We have a particular case here before us, in a matter of scandal against a great judge, the greatest judge in the kingdom, in criminal causes; and it is a great and an high charge upon him. And certainly there was never any age, I think, more licentious than this, in aspersing governors, scattering of libels and scandalous speeches against those that are in authority; and, without all doubt, it doth become this Court to shew their zeal in suppressing it.

I am old enough to remember (and, perhaps, feel the smart of it yet) the beginning of the late rebellion (for a rebellion it was, and deserves no other name.) I know it had the fore-runner of such libels, and scandals against the government, as this is; and it followed almost to the subversion of the happiness of the kingdom. As for the trial hinted at in this affidavit, I was not present at it myself, I was detained by my usual infirmity, so that I could not attend that service; nor indeed have I read the relation of it in print, so considerably as to give a judgment upon it: But I am very confident, (upon my knowledge of the integrity of my lord, and the rest of my lords the judges that were there, for there were all the chief judges, and almost all my brothers) that that trial was managed with exact justice, and perfect integrity, by them.

And therefore I do think it very fit, that this person be proceeded against by an information, that he may be made a public example to all such as shall presume to scandalize the government, and the governors, with any false aspersions or accusations.

Mr. Justice DOLBEN.

I am of that mind, truly; and am very glad we have lit upon one of the divulgers of these scandals. I was present at that trial, and, for my part, I think the scandal to my lord chief justice was a scandal to us all that were there; for if he had misbehaved himself in such a manner as some have reported, we had been strange people to sit still and say nothing, or not interpose to rectify wherein he did amiss: And therefore I desire this man may be proceeded against, for an example to others.

May 29, 1680, this Richard Radley was convicted of speaking scandalous words against the lord chief justice Scroggs, and fined 200*l*.

254. The Trial of CHARLES KERNE, at Hereford Assizes, for High Treason, being a Romish Priest :* 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679.

ON Monday the 4th day of August, Charles Kerne was brought to the bar, and being arraigned, he pleaded Not Guilty to the Indictment: Then the Court (after the usual formalities performed) proceeded to the trial as followeth.

Cl. of Arr. Gentlemen of the jury, Look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause. You shall understand that he stands indicted by the name of Charles Kerne, late of the parish of Weobly in the county of Hereford, gent. For that he being born within the kingdom of England, the 29th day of April, in the 31st year of the reign of our sovereign lord king Charles the 2nd, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. Then being a seminary priest, made, professed, and ordained by the authority and jurisdiction challenged, pretended, and derived from the see of Rome, the said 29th day of April, in the year aforesaid, within this kingdom of England (viz.) at Weobly aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, traitorously did come, was, and did remain, against the form of the statute in that case made and provided; and against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.

Upon this Indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto pleaded Not Guilty; and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are. Your charge is to enquire whether he be guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty: If you find him Guilty, you are to enquire what lands, goods or tenements he had at the time of the treason committed, or at any time since; if you find him Not Guilty, you are to enquire whether he did flee for the same: If you find he did flee for the same, you are to enquire what lands, tenements or goods he had at the time of such flight, or at any time since; if you find him Not Guilty, nor that he did flee for the same, you are to say so, and no more; and hear your evidence.

Cl. of Arr. Call Edward Biddolph. [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. (Sir Wm. Scroggs) Give the jury pen, ink, and paper.

L. C. J. Biddolph, do you know Mr. Kerne?

Biddolph. I do not know him now: I did know such a man about 6 years ago; I have seen him once or twice at Mr. Somerset's at Bollingham, about 6 years ago.

L. C. J. How long is it ago since you saw him last?

Biddolph. About a year.

L. C. J. Had you any discourse with him?

Biddolph. No, I never had any.

L. C. J. Look on the prisoner, can you say that is the man?

Biddolph. No, my lord, I cannot.

L. C. J. Can you say you ever saw or knew him?

Biddolph. I cannot.

L. C. J. Set him down. Call another witness.

Cl. of Arr. Swear Margaret Edwards. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Kerne?

Edwards. Yes, my lord, I do.

L. C. J. How long have you known him?

Edwards. Five or six years.

L. C. J. Where did you know him?

Edwards. At Sarnsfield, at Mrs. Monington's.

L. C. J. Were you a servant there?

Edwards. No, I went thither about business.

L. C. J. Where did you first see him?

Edwards. At Mr. Wigmore's of Lucton.

L. C. J. Had you any discourse with him there?

Edwards. No.

L. C. J. How came you to see him at Mrs. Monington's?

Edwards. My lord, one James Harris's wife being very sick, I was desired by him to go to Mrs. Anne Monington to seek some remedy for her: He desired me the rather, for that she being a papist, and I of the same religion, be believed for that reason she would be the more kind to her.

L. C. J. Were you a papist then?

Edwards. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Well, what said Mrs. Monington to you?

Edwards. My lord, she told me she was glad that they had sent me, for that she did not care to discourse the distempers of a woman to a man.

L. C. J. Well, go on.

Edwards. My lord, after she had discoursed to me concerning the sick woman, she desired me to go with her, which I did; and she brought me into the chapel, where I saw Mr. Kerne in his robes.

L. C. J. Were there any more in the room besides him?

Edwards. Yes, my lord, 4 or 5: He was in his robes and surplice, and was at the altar, and gave the Sacrament to the rest, but I did not receive it.

L. C. J. What did you see him do?

Edwards. I saw him give the Sacrament.

L. C. J. What did he say?

Edwards. He said Corpus Christi, or some such words.

L. C. J. Did you see him deliver the wafers?

Edwards. Yes, my lord.

* See the Case of David Lewis, supra, p. 250, and the Cases of Brommich, of Atkins, and of Johnson, in this same year 1679; and of Anderson alias Munson and others, in the following year, infra. The Stat. 27 Eliz. ch. 2, is set forth in Brommich's Case.

L. C. J. To how many?

Edwards. To four.

L. C. J. You swear positively to four: did they confess to him?

Edwards. Yes, I believe they did.

L. C. J. Did you ever see him since?

Edwards. No, my lord, I never saw him between that and this.

L. C. J. Did you ever receive the Sacrament before, and of whom?

Edwards. Yes, I received several times: the first time was of Mr. Duffres, next of Mr. Kemble, then of Mr. Rowenhill, Mr. Standish, Mr. Morgan, Mr. Trindal; I have received from Mr. Draycot at Mr. Berrington's; I have received at Mr. Blount's; but the last time was from Mr. Jennings at Mr. Wigmore's house.

Pris. My lord, I desire she may be asked whether she came to Mrs. Monington's of her own accord, or was sent for physic?

Edwards. I was sent.

Pris. Did the man send you, or his wife?

Edwards. The man.

Pris. Have a care what you say, Harris's wife is here to trepan you.

L. C. J. Give good words; you begin to triumph too soon. Woman, was it Harris or his wife sent you?

Edwards. It was Harris himself that desired me to go, because I might have more favour, being a papist.

Pris. Where did that Harris live?

Edwards. At Leinpsster.

Pris. I am satisfied, it was a mistake, I thought it had been Harris of Lowton she had meant.

L. C. J. Will you ask her any thing else?

Pris. I desire to know the time when she saw me at Mrs. Monington's?

Edwards. It was in last May was twelvemonth, the 29th day, to the best of my memory.

L. C. J. Do you take it to be certain, or do you believe it only that it was that day?

Edwards. My lord, I am certain it was that very day; for the woman died that day, and that day is writ on the grave-stone.

Pris. I desire to know of her whether she was ever asked upon her oath, whether she was ever at Mrs. Monington's since that time?

Edwards. I was not there since, nor ever asked the question, to the best of my knowledge.

L. C. J. What a question is that?

Pris. It is very remarkable, for she was asked by a juryman last assizes, it was not upon the trial, but before the grand jury, and she denied then that she was ever at Mrs. Monington's in her life.

Edwards. I have been there above 20 times.

Pris. Call Roger Hyet.

L. C. J. By and by your defence will be proper, in the mean time, what will you ask her more?

Pris. I desire to ask her what discourse she had with Mary Jones, the other witness, for she has been instructing her what to say; and that they may be examined asunder. [Which was granted.]

L. C. J. What discourse had you with the other woman?

Edwards. My lord, she told me that she had never in all her life been before a judge or justice of peace; and that she was afraid of coming before one, for she did not know how to behave herself.

L. C. J. Did you tell her what she should say?

Edwards. No, my lord.

L. C. J. What did you say to her?

Edwards. I told her, that she would hear her name called, and then she must answer: and I bid her have a care that she spoke what she knew, and no more or less than the truth.

L. C. J. Did she tell you what she could say?

Edwards. She did.

L. C. J. What?

Edwards. That she lived at Mr. Somerset's, where Mr. Kerne usually was, and that several people used to come thither, and go up stairs into the chamber; and she went once to hearken, and she heard Mr. Kerne say something in Latin, which she said was mass.

Pris. Here is a material question to ask this witness. I desire to know where this woman saw me first?

Edwards. At Mr. Wigmore's of Lucton, as they told me it was him, for I did not know his name.

Pris. I would know if the man she saw at Mrs. Monington's, was the same person she saw at Lucton?

Edwards. To the best of my knowledge it was.

Pris. I never was at Lucton in all my life.

L. C. J. Call the other woman: you shall now see how these women agree.

Cl. of Arr. Call Mary Jones. Crier, swear her. [Which was done.]

Pris. I desire they may be examined apart.

L. C. J. Let the other woman go out.

L. C. J. When was the first time you saw Margaret Edwards?

Jones. Yesterday, and again to-day.

L. C. J. Did she tell you and instruct you what you should say against the prisoner?

Jones. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Did you tell her what you could say against him?

Jones. No.

L. C. J. Did not you tell her that you lived at Mr. Somerset's, and that several people used to come thither and go up stairs into the chamber, and that once you went up to hearken, and heard Mr. Kerne say mass?

Jones. She did say so to me, but I did not answer her any thing.

L. C. J. Did she ask where you saw Mr. Kerne?—Jones. Yes.

L. C. J. Where, at Bollingham?

Jones. I did tell her that I saw him at Bollingham, and that I heard him say somewhat aloud, I think it was Latin.

L. C. J. How you answer: I asked you but just now, whether you told her that you saw Mr. Kerne at Mr. Somerset's house, and that you went up to hearken, and heard him say somewhat in Latin? And you then said you did not, and now you say you did.

Jones. She spoke to me first about it, and I did but answer.

L. C. J. What, did she ask you what you could say against Mr. Kerne?—Jones. Yes.

L. C. J. And what did you tell her you could say?

Jones. I told her, that one Sunday morning several people came to Bollingham, out of the town and out of the country, and went up after him, and he said somewhat aloud that I did not understand.

L. C. J. Did you not tell Margaret Edwards that you heard him say mass?

Jones. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Call Margaret Edwards again. Margaret Edwards, Did Mary Jones tell you that she heard Mr. Kerne say Mass?

Edwards. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Now, Mary Jones, what say you? Did not you tell her that you heard the prisoner say mass?

Jones. No, I am sure I did not: for I never heard the word before, nor do not know what it means.

L. C. J. The one witness says she did not name mass, for she did not understand what it was; the other says she did; so they contradict one another in that.

L. C. J. Mary Jones, when did you see Mr. Kerne?

Jones. Seven or eight years ago.

L. C. J. Where?

Jones. At Mr. Somerset's at Bollingham, he lived there half a year.

L. C. J. What did you see him do?

Jones. One Sunday morning I was busy a washing the rooms, and I saw several people follow him into the chamber.

L. C. J. Did you see him do any thing?

Jones. No, I heard him say somewhat aloud which I did not understand.

L. C. J. How near were you to him?

Jones. There was only a wall between.

L. C. J. Did you ever see him give a wafer, marry, or christen?

Jones. No, my lord: there was a child christened in the house.

L. C. J. Who christened it?

Jones. I cannot tell: there was no one there but my master and mistress, Mr. Lachet and his wife, and Mr. Kerne: I was in the next room, and I heard words spoken by the voice of Mr. Kerne.

L. C. J. What can you say more?

Jones. I washed a surplice.

L. C. J. Whose was it, the prisoner's?

Jones. I cannot tell, because I did not see it on his back.

Pris. How could you know a voice?

Jones. Very easily, there was but a wall between.

Pris. Was there no room between?

Jones. No, there was not.

L. C. J. The woman speaks sensibly: if you have done asking questions, you had best call your witnesses.—Pris. Call Mr. Hyet.

L. C. J. Mr. Hyet, you cannot be sworn, but you must speak the truth as much as if you were: well, what can you say?

Hyet. I asked Margaret Edwards if she had been at Mrs. Monington's? she said she had; I asked her if she knew Mr. Kerne? She said, she did not.

L. C. J. Was she upon her oath when you asked her this?

Hyet. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Have you any more witnesses?

Pris. Call Mr. Weston's maid.

L. C. J. What can you say?

West. M. I saw those two women talking together, and that woman instructed the other what she should say.

L. C. J. What say you to this?

Edwards and Jones. My Lord, we did not.

L. C. J. Look you, they both deny it on their oaths.

L. C. J. How often between the first time and the 29th of May was twelvemonth, did you see Mr. Kerne?

Edwards. Twice or thrice in Weobly.

L. C. J. What can you say for yourself?

Pris. My Lord, I am very happy that I receive my trial before your Lordship.

L. C. J. Come, setting aside your apologies, tell what you have to say; if you have any more witnesses, call them.

Pris. My Lord, here are several witnesses who will prove that that woman was never at Mrs. Monington's.

L. C. J. That is very improbable; but call whom you will.

Pris. My Lord, here is Mrs. Monington, the person she pretends shewed her up, will swear she never saw the woman in her life; and upon my salvation I never saw either of them before.

L. C. J. Mrs. Monington, the law will not allow you to be sworn, but I presume that a person of your quality will speak the truth, as much as if you were upon your oath. Do you know Margaret Edwards?

Mon. My Lord, I do not.

L. C. J. Woman, tell Mrs. Monington from whom you came.

Edwards. I came from James Harris of Lempster.

L. C. J. Mrs. Monington, do you know James Harris of Lempster?

Mon. My Lord, I do not.

L. C. J. Do you remember that about May was twelvemonth this woman came to you for physic for a woman that was sick?

Mon. A great many people come to me on that errand, so that it is impossible for me to remember any particular person.

L. C. J. Did you ever take up that woman to hear mass?

Mon. That I am sure I did not, for I never took up any stranger in my life.

L. C. J. Did Mrs. Monington know you by face or by name?

Edwards. I had been at the house several times, but this time I was carried up to Mrs. Monington by Mary Lewis her maid; Mrs. Monington told me that she was very glad that I was sent, for she said she would not give the man so just an account, because he was a man.

L. C. J. Mrs. Monington, do you remember this?

Món. This is frequent.

Edwards. Then she told me that I must put a plaister of diapalma to the woman's back, and give her a drink with malt with raisins, &c.

Mon. As for the plaister, it is possible I may prescribe it, but the drink is no receipt of mine.

Edwards. My Lord, the maid when I came in was making a cheese in the dairy, and I asked for Mrs. Monington, and she told me she was within, and straightway brought me up to her: Mrs. Monington in a little time fell into discourse with me about religion; and understanding what I was, desired me to go into the chamber with her.

L. C. J. What kind of chapel was it?

Edwards. I will give an account of it as well as I can remember. When we came up stairs we turned in at a door on the right hand; the altar stood just before the door; it was richly adorned, the altar-cloth was white, and a fine crucifix on the altar.

Mon. What were the cushions of?

Edwards. As I remember they were needlework.

L. C. J. What was the chapel adorned with?

Edwards. With abundance of pictures: I think the window was on the left hand of the altar.

Mon. She has failed in the first description, for we go not off the stairs into the chapel, as she says; neither is it adorned in the manner as she says it is, nor is there any needlework. Here is a maid that I deliver all my medicines to, that perhaps can give a better account whether this woman were at my house, than I can.

L. C. J. Call the maid. You wait on Mrs. Monington: did you ever see that woman?

Maid. No.

L. C. J. I will shew you how you shall remember her; she came to Mrs. Monington on the behalf of one Harris's wife, and asked if she were within, and you carried her to your mistress.

Edwards. My Lord, I was there several times besides this, for I carried the child, Mr. Thomas Monington, thither several times.

L. C. J. Do you remember this?

Mon. I do not remember that she ever brought the child to me, but another.

Edwards. My Lord, I always lay with him, and tended him, and carried him abroad.

L. C. J. If you have any thing more to say, speak. What say you for yourself?

Pris. I hope your lordship will sum up the evidence.

L. C. J. That I will: I will tell the jury all I can remember on both sides; I will not shed innocent blood, neither will I help the guilty; for I, by the duty of my place, am counsel for the prisoner in all things fit and legal.

Pris. I desire the statute may be read.

L. C. J. Let it be read. What statute do you mean, that of 27 Eliz.?

Pris. Yes, my Lord. [Then the statute was read.]

Pris. Now, Gentlemen, I desire you to take into consideration, whether my blood shall be drawn by the evidence of a woman that says she saw give me a wafer; or on that evidence of the other, who says she heard me read she knows not what through a wall: my lord, it is an oppression that statutes should be construed otherwise than they are intended. I hope, my Lord, that the statute will not take hold of a man for saying mass, for many say masses that are not in orders.

L. C. J. It is one of the greatest evidences to prove a man to be a priest that can be; for we cannot think of bringing witnesses who saw you take orders: Do any say mass but priests? Is it lawful for any one but a priest to say mass?

Pris. That of bread and wine they do not, but the other they do.

L. C. J. Do any bury or christen but priests?

Pris. Yes they do in extremis; and, my lord, I do acknowledge that I read prayers sometimes, and sometimes others did. And I desire your lordship and the jury will take notice, that I have taken the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy.

L. C. J. Is that all you have to say?

Pris. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Then gentlemen of the jury, The matter you are to try is, whether Charles Kerne, the prisoner at the bar, be a popish priest: An Englishman I suppose he does not deny himself to be; the question is then if he be a Romish priest? If so he is guilty of high-treason by the statute of 27 Eliz. This was a law made for the preservation of the queen, for the preservation of our religion, and for the preservation of all Protestants. The witnesses are Margaret Edwards and Mary Jones. Margaret says, the first time that she saw the prisoner was at Mr. Wigmore's, who told her it was Mr. Kerne; and she says that she hath seen him several times since; twice or thrice at Weobly, and the last time was the 29th of May was twelvemonth, at Mrs. Monington's, where she saw him deliver the wafer, which is the sacrament, to four persons that were there, but she herself did not receive it; and then she gives you an account of the reason of her coming then to Mrs. Monington's, which was at the request of one Harris, whose wife was sick, to seek some remedy from Mrs. Monington for the sick woman: She tells you how the maid brought her up to her mistress, how she acquainted her with her errand, what advice Mrs. Monington gave her for the sick woman, and how that Mrs. Monington understanding what religion she was of, took her into the chapel whereof she gives you a description. It is very probable she may go on such an errand, yet Mrs. Monington not know her, but Mrs. Monington cannot positively say, but believes she was never there: Mr. Kerne, I suppose, will not deny but that he who gives the wafer is a priest.

Pris. There is blessed bread which others may give.

L. C. J. When you give such bread, do you not say, Accipi Corpus Christi?

Pris. We use no such words. [But it appeared, upon his own repeating of the Latin words they used upon the giving the sacrament, that those were part of the words.]

L. C. J. The prisoner made an offer to prove some disagreement between the witnesses; it is true, they did differ in some small things, as the saying the word mass, but from hence can no great matter be inferred against the evidence; so here is one positive evidence.

There must indeed be two witnesses; now the question will be about the second woman's testimony. She says she knew Mr. Kerne about eight years ago, when she lived at Mr. Somerset's, and that Mr. Kerne lived in the house about half a year: She tells you that she hath seen several persons come thither; and amongst the rest, she says, that one Sunday morning several persons came thither; and went up with Mr. Kerne, and that she was so curious as to bearken, and did hear Mr. Kerne say something in an unknown tongue: Kerne objects that she could not know it was his voice; but for that, I think men are easily distinguished by their voices; but that I must leave to your consideration.

But now the main question will be, what it was she heard him say? Mr. Kerne says, that in times of straitness, persons that are not priests may read prayers, and so perhaps he may be then reading the collects

But then again: She says there was a child christened in the house, and no one there but Mr. Somerset and his wife, Mr. Lachet and his wife, and Mr. Kerne to do it: She did not see him christen it, and it is true likewise what he says, that in their church they allow others, as midwives, to christen in extremis; not that he confesses he did christen.

L. C. J. Call Mary Jones again. Mary Jones, was it a sickly child?

Jones. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Then that is answered: So that if you believe that he did christen the child, there are two witnesses against him: I must leave it with you as a tender point on both sides; I would not shed innocent blood, neither would I willingly let a popish priest escape. There is one positive witness, and if you believe upon the woman's hearing his voice, that he did say mass, or did christen, for I must confess she says she did not see him christen, then you must find him guilty: So I leave it to you upon the whole matter.

The Jury returned, and were called over.

William Barret, &c.

Cl. of Arr. Jailor, set up Charles Kerne. Gentlemen, Are you agreed of your verdict?
Jury. Yes.

Cl. Who shall say for you?

Jury. The Foreman.

Cl. Look upon the prisoner: What say you, is Charles Kerne guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or not guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

255. The Trial of ANDREW BROMMICH, at Stafford Assizes, for High Treason, being a Romish Priest: 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679.*

The Court being sat, they proceeded to the Trial thus.

THE Lord Chief Justice having the night before charged the sheriff to return a good jury, and the court being sat, he enquired of him if he had observed his directions; the sheriff acquainted his lordship, that since he had impannelled the said jury, he had heard that one Allen, of in the said county, being then returned to serve on the said jury, had said in discourse with some of his fellows, that nothing was done against the popish priests above, and therefore he would do nothing

* Published in 1679, under the following Order: "I do appoint Robert Pawlet to print the Trials of Andrew Brommich, William Atkins and Charles Kerne, and that no other person presume to print the same. WILLIAM SCAOGGS."

In the same year was also published: "The Trial and Condemnation of two Popish Priests, Andrew Brommich and William Atkins, for High Treason, at Stafford Assizes, August 16, 1679, with an Account of the Notable Equivocation of some Witnesses of the Romish Church there produced. And the Reason thereof from their own Authors. Mr. Stephen Dugdale, one of the Grand Evidences of the Popish Plot, being there present. London, printed for John Amery, at the Peacock in Fleet-street, 1679.

"Were there no other evidence of a Popish Plot lately, I wish I could not say still carried on, for subverting the established government and religion of these kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, the only remaining bulwark of the Protestant interest throughout the world; The unusual resort and numerous swarms of Jesuit priests, and other Romish lo-against them here, nor find them guilty; whereupon his lordship called for the said Allen and one Randal Calclough, one of his fellow jurymen, and another witness upon oath, who proceeds from their outlandish seminaries of Rome, Valladolid, Saint Omers, Doway and Rhemes (those constant nurseries, and for about 100 years continued rendezvous of rebellion and treason, ever since Allen, afterwards a cardinal, laid the first platform at Doway in the year 1568) that have of late come into England; might be a sufficient proof that they had some more than ordinary design in hand. For though by the statute of the 27th Elizabeth, on most just and necessary reasons, viz. Their disowning her majesty's right to the crown, and justifying her deposal by the Pope, and that all her subjects were discharged from their allegiance, and all obedience to her, &c. It was made capital for any of those seminarists to come into these kingdoms; so that their first setting a step on English ground was by law High Treason, yet such is their confidence, that well knowing the premises, they duly came over in great numbers, and as if they had a public indulgence, did not stick continually to pervert and seduce his majesty's subjects to the idolatries and superstitious of the Romish Church. Yet had this been all and managed with any modest colourable pretence of conscience, it might possibly have been borne with by our most gracious sovereign, the best and most merciful of princes, without exacting the severity of those laws; but when these very men so obnoxious before to just punishment, have so far abused his majesty's lenity and compassionate good nature, as to contrive and vigorously promote horrid designs against his sacred life, and what is yet more dear to him, the true Protestant religion, as it is most apparent they lately have done, it cannot but be thought high time to restrain their insolence, by putting in execution those wholesome laws, which their continual treasonable practices have not only justified, but rendered absolutely necessary for the preservation of his life and crown.

"In pursuance hereof, in such a juncture of affairs, the honourable judges of assize had particular order to give in charge the strict prosecution of all Jesuits and Popish priests that might be discovered in their respective circuits; and it is wonderful, considering the subtle disguises and caution of that sort of men, and the secrecy of their seduced followers, who as strictly conceal their priests, as those do their confessions, that so many should be discovered.

"At the assizes of Stafford there were no fewer than nine persons charged as Popish priests, whereof two, viz. George Hopson and Robert Peters, as being it is said obnoxious to an indictment of another nature, are to be removed to London, the writs for that purpose being now in the sheriff's hands: five others suspected on violent presumptions to be Jesuits, are ordered to remain in custody till the next assizes; the evidence against them that appears for the present, not being full enough, according to the mercifulness of our English laws, to proceed against them to a legal conviction: though it is credibly reported and reasonably believed there will, before that time, come in sufficient and demonstrable proof.

"The other two, viz. Andrew Brommich late of Perry-bar, and William Atkins of Wolverhampton in this county of Stafford (for the multitude of Papists roosting there, commonly called Little Roine) did now come to their trials. The first was a young lusty brisk fellow, lately come from beyond the seas, and as he pretended (according to the usual arts of that tribe who are never to seek for an excuse) a merchant heretofore in France and Portugal: which may pass well enough under the favour of a Catholic figure. For no doubt he had good store of Roman commodities to vend amongst his silly Popish chapmen, as consecrated beads, crucifixes, Agnus Dei's, pardons, indulgences, and such like trumpery, with not a little sedition, rebellion and treason into the bargain. The first and most material witness to prove him a priest, was one Anne Robinson, who about a year ago was a Papist, and then seduced to that religion by a wheedling priest, who is since fled; but upon consideration of the horrid plot carried on by those of that religion, and the charitable pains of some Protestant divines, she hath been reduced again to the Church of England. The evidence she gave against him, was to this effect:

"That about Christmas last he said mass, and she received the Eucharist or Sacrament from him in a wafer, in a private Popish conventicle, six or seven being then in company; and before that time twice at one Mr. Purcell's, and twice at one Mr. Birch's.

"But most observable it was, that there being two others, known Papists, summoned in for evidence, and whom she swore positively to have received the Sacrament, and heard him say mass the same times with her; they notwithstanding, according to the common principles and practices of their fraudulent religion, which teaches them to dispense with truth, or the most sacred oath, to save a priest from danger, did foully equivocate in their evidence, and denied that they knew him; but the contrary was proved upon them, and thereupon, and other concurrent evidence and irrefragable circumstances, the jury was satisfied, and brought him in Guilty.

"But lest any affronted Papist should say, or weak Protestant think, that I wrong the Popish Church in asserting, that they teach, a person may lawfully deny the truth, or affirm a lie, though upon oath, to secure one of their priests, I shall here make it good from their own approved authors, and then leave the indifferent reader to judge what account is to be made of these mens' perjury, or the late impudent lies of the novices from St. Omers against Dr. Oates's testimony. Our first proof shall be taken from no less than a whole Popish college, viz that of Rhemes, who in their annotations on their English translation of the New Testament, upon Acts 23, verse 12, lay down this doctrine in these express words; 'If thou be put to an oath to accuse Catholics for serving God as they ought to do, or to utter any innocent man to God's enemies, and his, thou oughtest first to refuse such unlawful oaths: but if thou have not constancy and courage so to do, yet know thou, that such oaths bind not at all in conscience and law of God, but may, and must be broken under pain of damnation.'

"Secondly, to shew you how you shall shift and deny the truth in such cases, I shall cite another document of theirs, in a book entitled, 'A Treatise tending to Pacification,' printed permissu superiorum, in the year 1607; and said to be written by their famous Jesuit, Parsons. Page 426, he thus instructs his Catholics; 'Our doctors say and maintain, that when the judge is not lawful [so with them is every Protestant judge, especially when he meddles with their priests] or that he inquireth of secrets which appertain not to his jurisdiction, then any witness may refuse to answer, yea, though he hath first sworn to answer directly, may use a refuge, that is to say, he may deny all in form, or use doubtful or equivocal words, and other such manner of ordinary evasions, which if they prevail not, then he may deny and say, 'Nihil scio, nihil vidi, nihil audivi,' I know nothing of the matter, I have seen nothing, I have heard nothing, reserving [Pray observe the horrid cheat, how to baulk an oath, and stifle conscience in a Roman Catholic way] in his mind the other part (of the intended equivocating sentence) that he knoweth nothing, hath seen nothing, nor heard nothing within that unjust examination he is bound to answer.'

"The same author, p. 435, asserting and justifying the use of equivocation, recites with approbation this case, put by one Sotus, one of their Popish doctors: 'If,' saith he, 'I having seen Peter kill John, and being afterwards examined upon the same unjustly,' (and we guess how far that will extend in a Catholic sense) 'whether I may say I know nothing thereof?' To which he giveth this answer;

Crier. O yes! If any one can inform my lords the king's justices, the king's serjeant, the king's attorney, or this inquest now to be taken, of any treasons, murders, felonies, or other misdemeanors, committed or done by the prisoner at the bar, let them come forth and they shall be heard.

Cl. of Arr. Andrew Brommich, hold up thy hand. These good men that were lately called and have now appeared, are those which must pass between our sovereign lord the king and you upon your life or death: If you will chal-

'Respondetur quod jure possum respondere, Nescio; quia jure intelligitur, nescio, ut dicam; aut nescio eo modo quo jure debeam dicere?' 'I affirm, that I may rightly answer, that I know nothing thereof, that is, I know it not to declare it; or I know it not in such a manner, as by law I ought to utter the same.'

"An hundred such instances might be given from their own approved pens; and who can think but the private instructions of their little Father-Confessors are agreeable to these rules of their great doctors; and therefore it is no wonder if these two well disciplined papists denied upon their oaths, that they knew this their ghostly Father Mr. Brommich, that is they did not know him in their sense to be guilty of treason, or to have taken orders at Jerusalem, or any thing else that they should please to have reserved in their fallacious minds. As for the other person indicted, Mr. Atkins, the evidence was very full and home that they heard him say mass and prayers in an unknown tongue, that they saw him administer the sacrament in a wafer after the manner of the church of Rome; and one of the witnesses swore directly, that he himself had been at confession with him, and received absolution from him; so that he was likewise brought in guilty: and the court proceeded to pronounce sentence of death against them, according to law. But by order, their execution is respited, till his majesty be further informed, and shall declare his gracious pleasure therein.

"There were likewise these assizes, tried one Mr. Kerne, a seminary priest at Hereford, and one William Jones of the same quality at Monmouth. But against each of these there being but one positive witness, as to saying mass in their vestments, administering the sacrament, &c. and the rest of the evidence only circumstantial, neither of them were brought in guilty.

"And hereby the whole world may take notice of, and admire the clemency of his majesty, the tenderness of his laws, and the moderation of his Protestant subjects; and how little reason papists at home, or their brethren abroad, have to complain of any hardship used towards them in England, when after such obstinacy in repeated treasons, and contempt of his majesty's proclamations, commanding them away, and the unparalleled provocation of their conspiracy, yet still they are proceeded against with all kind of equity, and allowed the utmost lenge any of them you must speak as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

The Prisoner challenging none, the Jury was sworn, ut ante,

Cl. of Arr. Gentlemen of the jury, look upon the prisoner and hearken to his cause. You shall understand that he stands indicted by the name of Andrew Brommich, late of Perry Barr in the county of Stafford gent. for that he being born within the kingdom of England, the thirteenth day of January, in the thirtieth year of the reign of our sovereign lord king Charles 2, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, &c. then being a seminary priest made, professed and ordained by the authority and jurisdiction challenged, pretended and derived from the see of Rome, the said thirteenth day of January in the year aforesaid, within this kingdom of England, viz. At Perry Barr aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, traitrously did come, was and did remain, against the form of the statute in that case made and provided, and against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.

Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned and hath pleaded thereunto Not Guilty, and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are: your charge is to enquire whether he be Guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty: if you find him Guilty, you are to enquire what lands, goods, or tenements he had at the time of the treason committed, or at any time since: if you find him Not Guilty; you are to enquire whether he did fly for the same, and what lands, goods or tenements he had at the same time of such flight, or at any time since; if you find him Not Guilty, nor that he did fly for the same, you are to say so and no more, and hear your evidence.

privileges of law; and even those that happen to be convicted, oft-times after condemnation enjoy their lives, by the mercy of that prince whom their merciless faction would of late so injuriously and ungratefully have murdered.

“What rigours and severities would other nations, and the Roman Catholics beyond the seas, have exercised upon such an occasion? Had the poor French hugonots, after all the infringements of their liberties, and daily oppressions, happened thus to have violated their loyalty, they must not have expected the formalities of law to convict them; nor the patience of authority to hear them, nor the indulgence of majesty to relieve them. A general massacre, promiscuous destruction, and exquisite tortures had been the least they could have hoped for from the incensed rabble, and their barbarous tyrannic hands, who have formerly in a base perfidious manner, slaughtered so many thousands of them, without the least presence either of justice or provocation.”

VOL. VII.

Cl. of Arr. Crier call Ann Robinson. [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. (Sir William Scroggs.) Ann Robinson, what can you say against Andrew Brommich?

A. Rob. My lord, I can say that I received the sacrament of him according to the church of Rome in a wafer.

L. C. J. When? How long ago?

A. Rob. About Christmas last.

L. C. J. What company was there? how many were there in company?

A. Rob. My lord, I cannot positively tell how many, but I believe there were about seven or eight.

L. C. J. Did they all receive at the same time?

A. Rob. Yes, my lord, they did all receive at that time.

L. C. J. Are you a papist?

A. Rob. No, my lord.

L. C. J. How long were you a papist?

A. Rob. Several years.

L. C. J. Who first seduced you?

A. Rob. My lord, I cannot tell his name.

L. C. J. Did you ever receive the sacrament according to their way, of Mr. Brommich, before the time you speak of?

A. Rob. Yes.

L. C. J. How often?

A. Rob. Four times, my lord; twice at Mr. Birch's and twice at Mr. Pursal's.

L. C. J. How came you to give her the sacrament? [to the Prisoner.]

Pris. My lord, I never did.

L. C. J. Why, she has sworn you gave it her several times, once in particular at Christmas last, and four times more, twice at Mr. Birch's, and twice at Mr. Pursal's.

Pris. My lord, I cannot help it. I desire your lordship will take notice of one thing, that I have taken the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and have not refused any thing which might testify my loyalty.

L. C. J. That will not serve your turn, you priests have tricks to evade that.

Pris. Besides, my lord, I never absconded.

L. C. J. You never absconded? what is that to giving the woman the sacrament several times?

Pris. My lord, I desire she may prove it.

L. C. J. She does so.

Pris. My lord, I humbly conceive it was no sacrament unless I were a priest.

L. C. J. What an argument is that? You expect we should prove you a priest by witness which saw you take orders; but we know so much of your religion, that none undertake to give the sacrament in a wafer, or say mass, but a priest; and you gave the sacrament to that woman in a wafer, therefore you are a priest.

Cl. of Arr. Crier, call another witness; swear Jeffrey Robinson.

L. C. J. What can you say to Mr. Brommich?

Jeof. Rob. I can say nothing against him.

3 A

L. C. J. Did you ever hear him say mass?

Jeof. Rob. I cannot tell, I have heard him say something in an unknown tongue; but I know not what it was.

L. C. J. Was it Latin that he said?

Jeof. Rob. I cannot tell: I am no scholar.

L. C. J. Had he a surplice on?

Jeof. Rob. Yes, my lord, he had.

L. C. J. Robinson, are you a Papist?

Jeof. Rob. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. I thought so, it is so hard to get the truth out of you.

Cl. of Arr. Crier, swear Jane Robinson.

L. C. J. Come, what can you say? Did you ever see Brommich give the sacrament?

Jane Rob. Not to my knowledge.

L. C. J. Did you ever hear him say mass?

Jane Rob. I never saw him do any thing; for I only went up and said my prayers, I took no notice of any thing.

L. C. J. Did not you see Brommich there?

Jane Rob. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Why, don't you know him?

Jane Rob. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Your husband knows him. You Jeffrey Robinson, do not you know Mr. Brommich?

Jeof. Rob. Not I, my lord.

L. C. J. That is right like a papist. Did you not but just now say you heard him say something in an unknown tongue, and saw him in a surplice, and yet now you do not know him? you have no more conscience than what your priests allow you. But though your priests can persuade you to take false oaths, I would not have you think they can protect you from the punishment due to them here or hereafter.

An. Rob. My lord, they both took the sacrament with me at the same time from him.

L. C. J. Look you there, was ever the like impudence seen? Come friend, consider you are upon your oath, and do not bring yourself into the snare of a pillory. Come Robinson, I ask you by the oath you have taken, did you ever receive the sacrament with Ann Robinson at the time she speaks of at Mr. Pursal's?

Jeof. Rob. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. How hard the truth is to be gotten out of you! But within this country, which abounds so with priests and swarms with papists, that you get popery here like the itch; if they but rub upon you, you catch it.

Jane Rob. My lord, he is a weak man.

L. C. J. Who gave it you?

Jeof. Rob. I do not know.

L. C. J. He will say no more than his wife and the priest will give him leave.

L. C. J. Look you gentlemen of the jury, here are two papists that are witnesses; you are to consider how far they tell the truth, and how far they conceal it, how they tell their tale so as to serve a turn: For here you see the man said at first he heard him say somewhat in an unknown tongue, and that he saw him in a surplice; after that he denies he knows him, but now you see by this woman the truth is come out; he hath confessed and owned he received the sacrament at Pursal's with her. We cannot expect more positive evidence from such people. Come read the statute.

Anno 27 Eliz. cap. 2.*

“Whereas divers persons, called or professed Jesuits, seminary priests, and other priests, which have been, and from time to time are made in the parts beyond the seas, by or according to the order and rites of the Romish church, have of late comen and been sent, and daily do come and are sent into this realm of England, and other the queen's majesty's dominions, of purpose (as it hath appeared) as well by sundry of their own examinations and confessions, as divers other manifest means and proofs, not only to withdraw her highness's subjects from their due obedience to her majesty, but also to stir up and move sedition, rebellion and open hostility within the same her highness's realms and dominions, to the great endangering of the safety of her most royal person, and to the utter ruin, desolation and overthrow of the whole realm, if the same be not the sooner by some good means foreseen and prevented.

“For reformation whereof be it ordained, established and enacted by the Queen's most excellent majesty, and the Lords spiritual and temporal, and the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same Parliament, That all and every Jesuits, seminary priests, and other priests whatsoever, made or ordained out of the realm of England, or other her highnesses dominions, or within any of her majesty's realms or dominions, by any authority, power or jurisdiction, derived, challenged, or pretended from the See of Rome since the feast of the nativity of St. John Baptist, in the first year of her highnesses reign, shall within forty days next after the end of this present session of parliament depart out of this realm of England, and out of all other her highnesses realms and dominions, if the wind, weather, and passage shall serve for the same, or else so soon after the end of the said forty days as the wind, weather and passage shall so serve.

“And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it shall not be lawful to, or for any Jesuit, seminary priest, or other such priest, deacon, or religious, or ecclesiastical person whatsoever, being born within this realm, or any other her highnesses dominions, and heretofore since the said feast of the nativity of St. John Baptist in the first year of her majesty's reign made, ordained or professed or hereafter to be made, ordained or professed by any authority or jurisdiction derived, challenged or pretended from the See of Rome, by, or of what name, title or degree soever the same shall be called or known, to come into, be or remain in any part of this realm or any other her highnesses dominions, after the end of the same forty days, other than in such special cases, and upon such special occasions only, and for such time only as is expressed in this act. And if he do, that then every such offence shall be taken and adjudged to be High Treason, and every person so offending shall for his offence be adjudged a traitor, and shall suffer loss, and forfeit as in case of High Treason.

* This statute, says Mr. East, seems to be provisionally repealed by the 4th sec. of the stat. 31 Geo. 3. c. 32. in respect of such as take the oath of allegiance, abjuration, and declaration therein mentioned. Mr. Burke observes with great severity upon this statute in his most eloquent speech delivered at Bristol in the year 1780.

“And every person which after the end of the same forty days, and after such time of departure, as is before limited and appointed, shall wittingly and willingly receive, relieve, comfort, aid or maintain any such Jesuit, seminary priest, or other priest, deacon or religious, or ecclesiastical person as is aforesaid, being at liberty, or out of hold, knowing him to be a jesuit, seminary priest, or other such priest, deacon or religious, or ecclesiastical person as is aforesaid, shall also for such offence be adjudged a felon without benefit of clergy, and suffer death, loss, and forfeit, as in case of one attainted of felony.”

L. C. J. Come, what have you more to say?

Pris. I desire that there may be notice taken what Robinson and his wife said upon their examinations before the justice of peace.

L. C. J. We are to take notice only of what they say here.

Pris. Mylord, they said here they did not know me.

L. C. J. No: Did not Robinson say he heard you say something in an unknown tongue; that he then saw you in a surplice? Did we talk of any one but you? Come Jesuit, with your learning, you shall not think to baffle us; I have of late had occasion to converse with your most learned priests, and never yet saw one that had either learning or honesty.

L. C. J. Have you any witnesses? Have you any more to say?—Pris. No.

L. C. J. Then gentlemen of the jury, the question you are to try, is, whether Andrew Brommich be a popish priest or not: To prove that he is, here is a woman, one Ann Robinson, that swears she received the Sacrament of him in a wafer once at Christmas last, and twice at Mr. Birch's, and twice at Mr. Pursal's, and that he gave it to several others at the same time. There needs not much to persuade you that he who gives the Sacrament is a priest, for in their church they allow no one but a priest to give the Sacrament, so there is one express evidence against him. And now I must satisfy you in one thing, that you are to give a verdict not that he is a priest, but that you believe him in your conscience upon the whole evidence to be a priest. To make you do this, here is one positive evidence.

The other man, when I came to examine him whether he ever heard the prisoners say Mass; he answered, that he heard him say something in an unknown tongue, and that he was in a surplice. This is as much as we could expect from one of their own religion, who dare say no more than their priests will give them leave to do. So gentlemen I must leave it to you, whether or know you will not believe the testimony of this real positive witness, and the circumstantial evidence of the other man: For you see in what dangers we are; I leave it upon your consciences, whether you will let priests escape, who are the very pests and dangers of Church and State; you had better be rid of one priest than three felons; so gentlemen, I leave it to you.

The jury having staid some time, returned to the court to give their verdict.

Cl. of Arr. Gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed on your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Arr. Who shall say it for you?

Jury. The foreman.

Cl. of Arr. Gaoler, set up Andrew Brommich to the bar.

Gentlemen, do you find Andrew Brommich Guilty of the High Treason he hath been arraigned of, or Not Guilty?

Jury. Guilty.

L. C. J. Gentlemen, you have found a good verdict, and if I had been one of you, I should have found the same myself.

Afterwards he received the usual sentence as in High Treason.

256. The Trial of WILLIAM ATKINS, at Stafford Assizes, for High Treason, being a Romish Priest: 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679.

Cl. of Arr. GAOLER, set up William Atkins to the bar: Crier, make proclamation.

The Jury were called and sworn.

Cl. of Arr. Gentlemen of the jury, look on the prisoner and hearken to his cause. You shall understand that he stands indicted by the name of William Atkins, late of Wolverhampton in the county of Stafford, gent. for that he being born within the kingdom of England, the 5th day of December, in the 30th year of the reign of our sovereign lord king Charles the 2nd, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland king, defender of the faith, &c. Then being a seminary priest, made, professed, and ordained by the authority and jurisdiction challenged, pretended, and derived from the See of Rome; the said fifth day of December in the year aforesaid, within this kingdom of England, viz. at Wolverhampton aforsaid in the county aforsaid, traiterously did come, was, and did remain, against the form of the statute in that case made and provided; and against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity.

Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto pleaded Not Guilty; and for his trial he hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are. Your charge is, to enquire whether he be Guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty: if you find him Guilty, you are to enquire what lands, goods or tenements he had at the time of the high-treason committed, or at any time since; if you find him Not Guilty, you are to enquire whether he did fly for the same; if you find he did fly for the same, you are to enquire what lands, goods or tenements he had at the time of such flight, or at any time since; if you find him Not Guilty, nor that he did fly for the same, you are to say so and no more and hear your evidence.

Cl. of Arr. Crier, call the witnesses; call William Jackson, Francis Wilden, Jo. Jarvis, &c. Swear Jackson. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Come, friend, what can you say concerning Atkins the prisoner being a priest?

Jackson. My lord, I can say nothing at all, I was there when he was apprehended, and bound over to prosecute him.

Cl. of Arr. Crier, Swear Francis Wilden. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. What can you say concerning Atkins being a priest?

Wilden. My lord, I have seen him at prayers.

L. C. J. Was he in a surplice then?

Wilden. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Did you ever hear him say mass?

Wilden. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. In what language were his prayers?

Wilden. In an unknown tongue.

L. C. J. Were they in Latin?

Wilden. I cannot tell, my lord; I am not a scholar good enough to know.

L. C. J. Are you a papist?

Wilden. I have been a Protestant since Christmas.

L. C. J. It is the principle of a Protestant to tell downright truth, and the principle of a papist is to equivocate; come speak truth, and your conscience will be lighter: did you ever see Atkins deliver the Sacrament in a wafer, according to the manner and way of the Church of Rome?

Wilden. My lord, I never received it of him myself, but I have seen him give it to others.

L. C. J. Where?

Wilden. At Mrs. Stanford's, at Wolverhampton.

L. C. J. To how many?

Wilden. To seven or eight at a time.

L. C. J. Was he in a surplice then?

Wilden. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. I do not know whether the prisoner can hear what the witness says; it is fit he should know. [The prisoner being told, he replied, he knew not the witness.]

Cl. of Arr. Swear John Jarvis.

Crier. My lord, he refuseth to be sworn.

L. C. J. Jarvis, why will you not be sworn?

Jarvis. My lord, I was troubled with a vision the last night.

L. C. J. You mistake, friend, old men dream dreams, it is young men see visions, and you are an old man: speak the truth, and I will warrant you, you will not be troubled with visions any more; this is a trick of the priests. Swear him, Crier. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Come, Jarvis, what can you say?

Jarvis. My lord, he is a man that hath relieved me and my children oftentimes when I was in want.

L. C. J. Did you ever hear him say mass?

Jarvis. My lord, I am an ignorant man; I cannot tell; I have heard him say somewhat in an unknown tongue.

L. C. J. Did you ever confess to him?

Jarvis. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. C. J. Did you ever receive the Sacrament of him according to the manner of the Church of Rome?

Jarvis. Yes, my lord, I have; I must speak the truth.

L. C. J. How often?

Jarvis. A great many times.

L. C. J. And had he not his priest's habit on when he gave it you?

Jarvis. Yes, my lord, he had.

Cl. of Arr. Crier, call Joan Wright. [Who was called, but did not appear.]

Call Henry Brown. [Who appeared and was sworn.]

L. C. J. Come, Mr. Brown, what can you say against the prisoner? Did you ever receive the Sacrament of him, or hear him say mass?

Brown. My lord, I was almost turned from the Protestant religion to that of the Church of Rome; but I never went further than confession, and that was to this man, and then I left them.

L. C. J. Indeed you were the wiser.

Cl. of Arr. Crier, call Tho. Dudley. [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. What can you say against the prisoner?

Dudley. I was a little given that way, and have been at confession with one Atkins, and have seen him perform several rites of the Church of Rome, at Well-head, at Ham.

L. C. J. Do you believe this to be the man?

Dudley. Yes, my lord, I do.

L. C. J. Have you any more to say?

Dudley. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Read the statute. [Which was done.] Have you witnesses, Atkins, or any thing to say for yourself?

Pris. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Look you gentlemen of the jury, Here is as full and as positive an evidence as can be against the prisoner: the two first witnesses, Wilden and Jarvis, are positive. Wilden swears he heard him say his prayers in an unknown tongue; and further says, that he gave the Sacrament to seven or eight according to the manner of the Church of Rome in a water, at Mrs. Stamford's house in Wolverhampton. Jarvis, the other witness, swears that he hath been at confession with him, and hath oftentimes received the Sacrament of him. Here are two other honest men, that speak very full as to circumstances; so that in the whole you cannot have a more clear evidence: and, gentlemen, I must tell you, it is to these sorts of men we owe all the troubles and hazards we are in, the fear of the king's life, the subversion of our government, and the less of our religion. It is notorious by what they have done, that they are departed from the meekness and simplicity of Christ's doctrine, and would bring in a religion of blood and tyranny amongst us. As if God Almighty were some omnipotent mischief, that delighted and would be served with the sacrifices of human blood. I need not say more to you, the matter's plain; I think you need not stir from the bar, but do as you will.

The Jury having considered of the Evidence some time, gave in their Verdict.

Cl. of Arr. Gentlemen of the jury, are you agreed of your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Arr. Who shall say for you?

Jury. The foreman.

Cl. of Arr. Gaoler, set up William Atkins. [Which was done.] Gentlemen of the jury look on the prisoner. What say you, Is he Guilty of the High-treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Jury. Guilty.

Cl. of Arr. What lands, goods or tenements had he?

Jury. None to our knowledge.

Cl. of Arr. Look to him, Gaoler, he is found Guilty of high-treason.

He received the sentence usual in cases of high-treason.

257. The Trial of FRANCIS JOHNSON, a Franciscan, at Worcester, for High Treason: 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679. [Written by Himself.*]

I BEING at London on All Saints-day, when the proclamation came forth to command all Catholics to depart from thence by the Friday following, I obeyed, and came to a friend's house in Worcestershire, not intending to stay there; but the king's second proclamation being presently published, That no Catholics should walk above five miles without being stopt, and carried before a justice to have the oaths tendered, I asked counsel of the wisest I could, both of Protestants (whereof one was a lawyer) and another a constable, as also of Catholics, Whether that proclamation did so strongly oblige, that it permitted me no longer to go further? They all concluded it was not secure to go, so I resolved to obey, and stay where I was, and with good reason.

First, Because all Catholics are obliged to obey the king's commands in all things that are not against our religion and conscience, and his commands in this nature are against neither.

Secondly, Should I have disobeyed, and have been taken, in penalty I should have suffered, which would not have been so directly for my conscience and religion sake, as for disobeying the king's command; because in case I should be taken by staying there in obedience to the proclamation, and be carried before the justices to have the oaths offered, whatever I was to suffer for refusing them, I should have this double comfort before God, and the king; before the king, because I rather chose to stay there, than remove against his command; before God, because I rather chose to go to prison, than to remove from his law, by taking the oaths against my conscience—Therefore I was taken and put in prison.

The Manner of my being taken was as followeth:

The Sheriff's deputy came to the house where I was with six or eight men, to arrest a gentleman in the house for debt: The officers coming into the house in the morning, and not finding the person they came for, broke down all the doors, and among the rest mine, before I was out of bed, and by a mistake arrested me, instead of the other gentleman; and although the deputy, coming into my chamber, looking on me, told them they were deceived, for I was not the man they came for; yet other soldiers coming into my chamber, one of them said he knew me: It seems he had been a servant in the house seven years before, therefore he said he would have me to the justices, and bid his companions secure me, and so they did, and would not let me go out of their sight, until they carried me before the justice; And this they did, without either constable, or warrant, law or justice.

When I came before the justice of peace, I told him the occasion that had brought me to him; and if I would have taken the oaths, I had been presently freed: But I told them that persuaded me to take the oaths, That it was against the faith and religion I professed, and against my conscience, and I would never ef-
