The justice's wife was compassionate towards me, and desiring to speak privately with me, she used her best persuasions to me to comply with what was desired of me concerning the taking the oaths, for fear of further trouble or danger. I answered her with thanks, and told her, That I was sorry she had no better opinion of me, than to think I had profest such a faith and religion all my life-time, and now upon the trial could be moved with any fear or danger (which God forbid) I told her it was such a faith, that in it I deposed my soul, my confidence, heaven and eternal life, and therefore I never did, nor (by God's grace) never would fear to suffer for it what pleased God; For who could fear even death itself of the body whose life is momentary, for profession of that faith wherein he deposes the eternal life of his soul?

This answer satisfied both her and myself, for I was resolved to make a public profession of my faith and religion; upon which I returned to the justice, who thought fit I should go to another justice, who was sir John Packington, whither also he went with me.

When I came to sir John, he asked me who I was? I answered him, I was a gentleman sufficiently known for these 20 years in Worcestershire to all sorts of people. He asked me of what calling I was? I answered him, of none. He asked me what estate I had? I answered I was no landed-man. Then he asked me, If I would take the oaths? I answered, I understood them not. He replied, Will you take them, or will you not? I told him if he pleased to let me see them, I should return him my answer.

Now the reason why I desired to see the oaths, was, because I was resolved to make a public declaration of my faith, that they were against my conscience, and therefore by declaring publicly the reasons why I could not take them, it should be publicly known, that whatsoever I was to suffer for not taking them, was for no other cause but for my faith and religion, because I would not swear against my conscience.—For, would I have taken them, I had been there also freed.

When the oaths were brought to me, they told me I must read them out aloud, but I told them that because it was a public place, and many there present of several degrees, as well of the householders, as strangers, I feared least reading them aloud, some that heard me might think I swear what I read, and so might go and report they heard me take the oaths before the justices. But they declared they would not think so, so I read them over and over, which when I had done, I said aloud, God save the King; and then declared to both the justices, and all the rest in this manner.

I am ready to swear as followeth:

That I ever all my life-time have been, and now am, and ever will be to my last breath, as faithful a subject to the king, as any subject whatsoever, and as faithful as if I should take the oaths now offered by them to me an hundred times over; but as for taking these oaths offered me, I could not take them whatever I suffered, and the reason was, because I understood what an oath was, and the conditions which God has prescribed to us, before any could call him to witness lawfully in taking of any such oaths.

The Conditions which God has prescribed I told them were these.

Thou shalt swear the Lord liveth in truth, and in judgment, and in righteousness; so that in every oath, the life of God, the truth of God, the judgment of God and his righteousness, are included by all which we swear, and the oath we take is to have all these conditions, truth, judgment, and righteousness, Jerem. 4.—Therefore if I should take these oaths which are concerning damnable doctrines and heresies, I must call God to witness that I no more believe him to be a living God and true God, a just and righteous God, than I believe these things contained in the oaths to be true, just and righteous, to swear to which oaths I do not nor cannot in my conscience believe to be so. For, before I or any man else can understand the contents of these oaths to be true, as to call God to witness that I believe them to be as true, just and righteous, I must be able to define what is faith or heresy in these contents I swear to, and I must know the full extent of all cases of this nature that God has left to all temporal princes and their power; I must also understand the full extent of all cases of this nature of power spiritual which God hath left in his church in or over christian kingdoms of temporal monarchs, which power in these oaths I am to swear on the one side, and forswearing the other.

I told them I was not of capacity nor knowledge to set the confines to each power, or to determine or define the extent given by God to all in this nature, so as to swear and call God to witness I am as sure of it, as I am sure he is a living God, as I must do if I take these oaths, the extent of which I did not understand in my conscience to be so as to believe them; Therefore I could not nor would not swear to them. I having spoken these things, nobody said any more to me, but the justices going out of the hall made my mittimus and sentence for Worcester prison, because I would not take the oaths they tendered me.

I have been since called to the bar at the sessions, where I spake to the same effect before Judge Street, and the justices, as I had spoken before to sir John Packington, having first asked their leave to speak, which they gave me for a little time, and then bid me return to the prison.—But first they were urgent with me to answer positively, Ay or No, was I jesuitical priest, or was I not? To which I answered, It was an easy thing for me to say No, but by saying No, I might prejudice others, who have after being asked the same question, if they did not answer No, it might be an argument that they were guilty, if they did not deny it, as others before them had done.—Therefore I desired that what proof could be brought against me, might be produced against me, and I would answer for myself: But I desired I might not be urged to answer Ay or No, to any thing, before some witness or argument came against me; for, I told them in such cases, neither law of God nor man obliged any one (although he was guilty) to bear witness against himself without some proof were alledged against him, for, that was no less than to be his own executioner.

The judge answered there were witnesses would swear against me.

I answered, if witnesses could make out what they swear of me, then my life was at the king's mercy: But in the mean time I told them I remained guiltless, though I did not answer them to their questions Ay or No, because I told them that being my saying No in my own behalf would not be sufficient testimony to acquit me, therefore there was no reason why any man should be urged to say Ay to accuse one-self though he was guilty.

Upon this the judge sent me to prison again at Worcester, where now I am, which imprisonment, in these times especially, when none can send to their friends, nor friends come to them, is the best means to teach us how to put our confidence in God alone in all things; and then he will make his promise good, That all things shall be added to us, Luke 12, which chapter, if every one would read, and make good use of, a prison would be better than a palace; and a confinement for religion, and a good conscience-sake, more pleasant than all the liberties the world could afford. As for my own part, God give me his grace, and all faithful Christians their prayers, I am happy enough; and as for others, I beseech God that the evil example of those that swear against their consciences, may not be guides for the rest to follow, nor their deeds a rule to their actions. We all ought to follow the narrow way, though there be many difficulties in it: It is an easy thing to run the blind way of liberty, but God deliver us all from broad, sweet ways. We know what Job saith of libertines, They lead their lives in the goods of this world, and in a moment they descend into hell. But, as our Saviour saith, What doth it profit a man to gain the world, and lose his soul?

God gave Job a goodly increase for all the riches he took from him, and blest his latter end more than his beginning, and gave him 140 years of flourishing life for his short affliction, in which, his constancy and faith in God was tried; and our Saviour promiseth an hundred fold to all that leave goods, and every thing willingly for his sake. Who well considers this, will be content to leave both friends and fortunes, and freedom by imprisonment, for their faith and religion-sake, till such time as it shall please God and the king (in obedience to whose command they suffer) to release them. And in the mean time they will have this comfort, That they give a testimony they fear God, and honour the king; they fear God, because they choose rather to suffer persecution, than swear against their consciences; they honour the king, because they are willing to suffer the penalties he commands, and yet remain faithful subjects to him, whom God long preserve, with his parliament and people, in all happiness.

On Tuesday, April 15, 1679. I came before judge Atkins at Worcester, to have my cause tried at the Sessions, having been committed 5 months before to Worcester-Castle by two justices of the peace, sir John Packington, and Mr. Townson, because I refused the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and therefore was suspected to be a Jesuitical Priest.

The manner of my Trial was as followeth:

Four Witnesses were brought in against me; three of them were forced by warrant to come in, whether they would or no, from several towns, and were forced to speak all that they knew, had heard, or seen, concerning me; neither I, nor any of my friends knowing, that any would be compelled so to do, before the time of my trial was come. The fourth witness came of his own accord for lucre sake, who, the same day that I was first brought to Worcester prison, offered himself to swear before the mayor of the town, that I was a priest, before ever he came to see who I was.

The Testimony which he gave against me before the judge, was this:

He swore he had been at confession with me, and that he had received the Sacrament at my hands about 2 years before at his father's house, whilst he was a catholic; and after he became a protestant, he said I told him afterward he should turn back from whence he had fallen, else he would be damned.

The other three witnesses that were forced to come in against me, when they came before the grand jury, and were urged to take their oaths, to tell that which they never had known nor seen concerning my being a priest, they all unanimously declared, That they had nothing to say against me, and that they were by violence forced to appear there, and therefore they said they would never swear nor say any thing against me, for they knew nothing to accuse me of: which when the jury heard, they called for the gaoler to take the party that first denied to swear to prison, thinking by this violent way of proceeding so to affright them, that they should say something, out of which advantage should be taken against me; which the better to effect, they made them first lay their hands on the Bible, and then kiss it, which they did. Then the jury told them, that now they were to tell all the truth according as they were asked.—First they asked whether any of them had ever heard me read? One answered, yes, the Bible, and sometimes any other book. Then they asked, Whether they had ever seen me pray? It was answered, yes. Then they asked what cloaths I had on when I prayed? And whether I used to change my cloaths when I came to pray? In these and other like questions they sifted them, to get out any thing that might do me hurt.

But how charitable or Christian-like these proceedings of the jury were, let the world judge now, as God will hereafter; for, if this be a charitable way of proceeding among Christians, that our neighbours should by such strange violence, as by warrant and oath be brought against their wills from any part of England, to swear whatever they have seen, heard, or known of their neighbours, what horrid confusions and odiums must this make among all sorts of people both friends and foes? —But I do not blame those three witnesses, after they had been inconsiderately induced to lay their hands upon the Bible, and kiss it; I suppose they judged themselves bound to say what they did.

After this, when the jury had got out of them what they could, the four witnesses and I were called before the judge. The first witness that came to swear against me, as the custom is, repeated his testimony over again before the judge, and so did the other three that were forced; and when I heard how absurd and insignificant some of their testimonies were, I inconsiderately smiled, at which the judge being offended, I humbly begged his pardon, and told him I was sorry for it.—But forasmuch as laughing or smiling were passions of nature, over which no man had a free course or power, I hoped and beseeched him not to impute it to me; he told me he would not be displeas'd at me for it. Then he asking me, whether I was guilty, or not guilty of my accusations? and I answering, Not Guilty, he bad me shew it, by answering for myself; I told him I was ready to do it; but told him first, I had an humble petition to his lordship, which was, that I desired a full and free liberty without hindrance to answer to every objection, and plead for myself; I also desired he would reflect in my behalf, that as he was to be my judge, so he was to be my advocate. And forasmuch as all earthly judges were to imitate the heavenly judge, who as advocate ten thousand times mitigates the severity of a judge, whilst his hand of mercy is infinitely stretched forth beyond the hand of judgment. And therefore I begged of his lordship, that I might find the favour of an advocate from him, rather than the rigour of a judge, especially in those things which according to law may be advantageous or disadvantageous to me, which I understanding not how to make the best use of them, desired his lordship would vouchsafe to do it for me; which that the better he might be moved to do, I desired he would be pleas'd to consider that this my life and concerns were (in comparison of others greater) not so much considerable, I being but a private person, yet my little was to me much, because my little was my all; and my life to me were as much as Cæsar's or Solomon's were to them; and as great a gift from God to me, as theirs to them; and therefore God has laid as great an obligation on me to defend myself and my life, as he had on them for theirs, and also had given to every one a strict command not to impair or prejudice me in the least, no more than the greatest potentate. Therefore being I was now brought before him in a case, where the world as much as concerns me, lay at stake, and my life, and my credit, I did humbly beseech his lordship to proceed accordingly with me, as I presumed according to his prudence and worth he would. He assented to what I petitioned, and did bid me speak for myself.

In answer therefore to the first voluntary witness against me, I told his lordship it was true, I had been at such a night at his father's house, and accordingly, as I was desired by him, I staid all night.—But as for this witness, I was a stranger to him, and he to me, as he confess himself. Then the judge asked him, whether he knew me before or no? For he declared publicly, that he never knew me, nor saw me before or since, till he saw me at Worcester, and yet he said the next morning he made his confession to me, and I gave him the communion at mass as he supposed in my chamber; but he said that none of all the family was present at that time, only he and I alone; whereupon I desired the judge to consider what possible likelihood could be of the truth in this his affirmation, that I should come to a house where I was acquainted with them all, father, mother, and children, with all but this witness who as he declared knew me not, nor ever had seen me before, what likelihood is there I should say mass before him alone, hear his confession, and give him the sacrament, and so go away without any one of the family (with whom I was so well acquainted) hearing, seeing, or knowing the least of this that past between him and me. I therefore desired my lord to ask him, whether I spake of confession or communion? or what I said to him when I gave it him? or whether I told him I would give him the sacrament? which when the judge had asked him, he answered, that indeed I never had spoken to him either about confession or communion to come to either; neither did he know what I said to him, when I gave him bread like a wafer; but he of his own accord did desire me to hear his confession, and give him the wafer which he took.—Whereupon the judge asked how it came to pass that he, never having known nor seen me before, nor I spoke with him about confession or communion, how could he now tell who I was, or how could he desire such a thing of me who was a mere stranger to him, neither of us knowing any thing of one another's condition; sure, said the judge, we do not give the communion on such terms.—To which he answered, that his father had told him that if he would he might confess to me, and that I would give him the communion.—So although he had sworn before, that none in the house was witness or saw him confess or receive, yet rather than be confounded, he would bring his father into confusion, and accuse him as guilty of being the cause of what he did, which might be the ruin of his family.

But the judge taking no notice of what he had accused his father, spake to me, and told me, by this it might appear, that I had taken upon me what belonged to the priests office, by hearing his confession, and giving him the wafer. To which I replied, that with his leave, I would make it appear, that all which this witness had said against me, did not at all prove me to be a priest, or to have taken the office of a priest upon me: for all he said I had done, I might do it lawfully though no priest, so might other men that never were nor would be priests do the same, as many thousands had done and did do through the world. He asked me how I could prove that? I answered, as to his confession he spoke of, in the nature he declared it, it was only an act of charity for me to do as I did, and every christian's duty obliges every man to do the same that he said I had done for him, and the same was practised by all sects whatsoever, that never knew what belonged to priesthood; For, if our neighbour have any thing that perplexed his mind, there is no better way to ease it, than by speaking of it to any whom he supposed might know how to take away or mitigate his grievances by counsel or advice; And therefore this witness having understood something from his father, that might move him to confide in me, came of his own accord, as he said he did, to impart his mind to me, and therefore I should not have fulfilled christian duty, if I should have slighted his trouble, and not have given him leave to ease his mind to me, and, in the best way I could, endeavour to assist him, and divert his trouble, though I was a stranger, being that he of his own accord, as he said, came to me for that intent, and therefore I desired the judge to ask him, if it were otherwise than what I had told his lordship?

The judge replied that I went further; for, as he says, I give him the wafer or communion. I answered, that suppos I had given him the wafer or communion (which whether I did or no I was not certain) yet according to his own word, this could no way prove that I gave him the sacrament; for, let him speak if I told him it was so; or let him declare if I said any thing to him concerning the communion, or what I said; he could not say I did, only I gave him something; therefore I told the judge, that if he pleased to give me leave, I would tell his lordship what practice ever had been, and is constantly used in the catholic church throughout the world, in giving hallowed bread or water, which is nothing belonging to the communion or sacrament; for I told my lord, as there was holy water kept in all private houses, as well as in the chapels, and places of prayer, so there was also holy bread, and, sometimes of the same nature as the wafer or the communion, and of this as well as of the other sort of bread, was on Sundays, and other certain days not consecrated as the communion, but only blessed as holy water by the word and prayer, and so distributed to men, women, and little children, of two or three years old; and such like hallowed bread thousands of men, women and children, take, and may carry about them, and keep in their houses, and eat it at any time, and give it when, and to whom they would, to children, or others; and for my part, I have many times in my life taken it from others at any time; when I had it, or was in any private house where I found it, I have taken it to eat myself, and given it to any man, woman, or child, sometime they desiring it, sometime of my own accord I gave it, and so possibly I have given it to the man that witnesseth here against me; and if he know the contrary, but that it was as I said, I desire that he would speak: But he had nothing to say of me to the contrary.

I appealed to my lord to judge whether this testimony, or any other testimony this witness brought against me, were of any force or value to make me guilty in this matter, which no ways could be made out against me.

I proceeded therefore to answer his third accusation against me, which was, that I should have told him, that if he did not return to the faith from whence he had fallen, he would be damned. To this my answer to my lord was, that I had all my life time been so fearful of such rash judgment, that I do declare it in the presence of God, as I did before him, that I had rather dye, than presume to pronounce the sentence of damnation against any man; but I told his lordship, that if he pleased to give me leave, I would relate what I had said to him, and others, upon the like occasion, which the judge being willing to hear, I told him, that I being at this man's mother in law's house, who was of no religion, no more than this witness, and the mother desiring to hear what catholics held, and the reasons for which we believe such points of faith, I told her what we held, and shewed her the proofs for what we held in her own Bible, and when she made any difficulty whether such texts of scripture were to be understood as we understood them, or in any other sense, I shewed her out of the Protestant Practice of Piety, and out of the Protestant Common Prayer Book, that not only catholics, but all protestants understood them in such a sense; and she having those books by her, I turned those places to her to read in her own books, and so she did, and yet neither the Bible, nor Common Prayer Books, nor Practice of Piety could satisfy, or make her believe; whereupon I told her, that if she were a christian, she must believe something; for, as she believed, so she should be saved:—I told her also what the Bible declared to her, that without faith it was impossible to please God, and I bade her consider the text that saith, whatsoever is not of faith is sin; as also the text that saith, the just man liveth by faith, and desired her to read those words of our Saviour, where he saith he that believeth shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned; which she did read; and this witness being then present, and I saying the same then before him, I suppose, from this text, he accused me that I should say, he would be damned, because I repeated, and shewed them our Saviours words, as they appear in that place of Scripture.

I having thus answered all the testimonies this witness could bring in against me, I referred myself to his lordship, and all the bench to judge whether any thing this witness had said against me, would make me guilty: the judge said but little to it, but called for the next witness (who was father to this first) who was so much grieved at the proceedings of his ungracious son that he could not forbear to shed tears all the time that his son produced such accusations against me; so that he appeared more witness against his son's ungodliness, than a witness against me: yet the judge asked him many questions, whether he had ever heard, seen, or known any such or such things of or from me: to all which questions he answered no, he knew nothing against me; so that the judge seeing he shewed so much kindness, he asked him what he was? He answered, a catholic; whereupon the judge bade him go away, saying, he was too much my friend, and therefore he would not accept of him as a witness, but called the third. This witness was an old man, and very deaf, who was forced to come against me by a warrant, swore against his will: the judge asked him several questions, whether he heard me say any prayers; he answered, yes, but he could not well understand or hear what they were, because he was so deaf; he asked them whether they were English or Latin? he answered, he could not well tell, he thought it was both; and I think, it might be neither, for ought he could hear, he was so very deaf: then he asked him what cloaths I had on? he answered, he could not well tell; I had something on that was white, a surplice he thought; and the judge was willing to suppose this to be a priest's habit at mass, or when he gave the sacrament; but I told his lordship, that this could be no proof of any such matter, because, all over the world, among Catholics, such garments were worn by thousands in time of prayer, who never were, nor will be priests, as is well known to those that have been travellers: and I told his lordship, that if he pleased to call for them there may be several travellers, of several sects and opinions present in the hall, that would be sufficient witnesses as well of this, as of the holy bread and water, which the other witness as well as this old man said I had given them, which they suppose to be the sacrament; but the judge would call for none, but called for the fourth witness.—This witness was a young woman, who was also by violence forced to come and swear what she had heard, seen or known concerning me about the matter in question. The judge asked her whether I had taught her any thing, whether she had been at confession or communion, what I said to her, what penance I gave her; and he asked also the like questions of the old man, the former witness, to all which they were both very unwilling to answer; for which some of the rude people curst the old man for an old doating fellow, and were as much vexed at the young woman, because she was so dejected, that she could not speak, but looked like one that was half dead, as some of the people said in anger she was so. The judge perceiving in what condition she was, said aloud, What men are these priests that have such power over people, that they are not able to speak against them; he therefore bid them remember they were in the presence of God, and were bound in conscience to speak the truth of what they had heard or seen; so at last they owned that I had read in the bible, and other books to them, and that they had confessed what troubled them, and had received something like a wafer from me, and that they had believed what I had read to them; yet they both declared publicly, that I did not bid them come to confession, or take the wafer or bread; and when they took it that I did not tell them it was the sacrament, neither did they know whether it was or no: by all which it appeared according to the letter of the law, and in conscience, that none of these testimonies were of sufficient force to make me guilty. A man's life is not to be taken away upon surmises, or possibilities, that this might be the communion, as well as other holy bread. For the law requires, that it must be proved that there was an administration of the sacrament by one that had taken orders from a foreign power; of taking orders there was not the least accusation mentioned against me by any of the witnesses, much less could it be proved, no not so much that I pretended to give the sacrament any more than it might be holy water, or holy bread, as I desired my lord to consider; neither was it the wearing of a surplice that could prove I said mass; for priests never wear surplices at mass: and if a man's wearing a surplice at prayer, prove him a priest, then all the singing-boys in every Protestant Cathedral Church, and in all other churches in christendom, all those boys, though but of ten or twelve years of age, must be by consequence all popish priests; and all Jews who constantly in synagogues put on a white garment like a surplice, as I and all travellers have seen them do when we have gone to see them pray: all these Jews must be Romish Priests.—Out of all which it evidently appears that none of these testimonies the witnesses brought against me, were any way concluding according to justice to make me guilty of being a priest.

As for my reading the bible to them, or in satisfying them in what they doubted, or bidding them say their prayers, and particularly the Lord's prayer, which the last two witnesses told the judge I had done, and the like (he fearing to answer to all the questions he asked them) to these I answered, that I own I had done so; whereupon the judge said, that out of this it appeared, that I had taken upon me the priest's office. I told him, that with his leave I would shew how it did no ways follow; for, out of this it only followed, that I had done the duty of a good christian, and every man in the like circumstances is bound as a christian to do the like that I had done. I told him, that they, doubting of such things, and desiring me to shew them if such places were in the bible, or not, and desiring to know what I did believe of those points, and the reasons why I believed them, I turned to such places in the bible, and read it to them, and bid them read the same themselves, which they did, and so were satisfied. And I told my Lord, for what I had done I had the scripture warrant, and scripture command also to do it, and so had every christian command to do the like; for the scripture commands all to be ready to give an answer to every man concerning the reason of the hope which is within us, and this I had done to them, or to any other that had asked me as they did. But I told my Lord withal, that I knowing the statute of persuasion, had always so much regard to that, when any would discourse with me concerning my faith, or their's, I told them, that (being there was such a statute as the statute of persuasion) though I was bound to give them an account of my faith and hope, if for conscience sake they asked me, yet I told them I would not incur the penalty of that statute by using any force or persuasion against their consciences; for violent forcing of consciences was against the law of God; yet I told them what I did believe, and shewed them the places of scripture on which my faith was grounded, according as they desired me to do for them, and then I would leave it to God and their own consciences; and if they did not believe those texts, I had no more to say to them; and if they did believe them, they best knew before God and their consciences what they had to do; so that it was not my persuasion, but God and their souls salvation that was to determine them in the belief of what they read in the bible: and I bade them bear witness that I told them thus, if in case we should ever be called in question before any judge; and thus I have discoursed, as several would bear witness for me. I told his lordship this was true, and so did those witnesses; for, they declared publicly what I said was true, whereupon I did appeal to my lord, if I was not innocent in this point; and as for my bidding them say their prayers, or when they desired to ease their minds by declaring what troubled them, I desired to clear myself by asking my lord, with his leave, what nation or sect in the world ought not, and did not counsel and wish their neighbours in their troubles to ease themselves by prayer to God; and much more every good christian ought, when he understood that his brother had acted the prodigal son, offended his Heavenly Father, and therefore was troubled in conscience, ought, I say, to persuade him to return by repentance, and beg mercy of our Father which is in heaven: I having done no more but this, have only done a pious christian duty to my neighbours, which any man, though no priest, may and ought to do the same. I having pleaded these things for myself, the judge was pleased to tell me, I had a nimble tongue, and wit, and that by those discourses I strove to make the jury attend more to my pleading for myself, than to the witnesses arguments against me: to which I replied, I spoke nothing but truth, which I ought to do to defend myself against my enemies, therefore I hoped his lordship would not be offended: but if I have exceeded (as his lordship said I did) because I hindered him from speaking, I humbly craved his pardon, and hoped I should obtain it, being my concerns and reasons to plead, as I did, were of no less consequence than life and death.

But for all this the judge told the jury, that they were to consider the accusations of the witnesses against me, as having done such and such things which priests use to do; neither was it necessary that the witnesses should prove me to have taken orders from foreign power, and so to prove me positively to be a priest; for that (they not having seen me take orders) they could not do, but it was sufficient they had seen me do such things, by which it might be presumed it was so. Whereupon I answered, that there was never a proof yet alledged, that did or could make that appear or be sufficient to conclude me to be so, and therefore I was no more guilty than many thousands, of whom all these things alledged against me might be verified, who never were nor would be priests, as I had sufficiently shewed, why therefore should they be thought sufficient to conclude against me. I therefore desired the judge, before he sent out the jury, he would give me leave to speak a word or two to them. He answered no, he would not. I then desired his lordship would give me leave to speak again to him before them, ere they went out; to which he assented: I therefore desired his lordship to give me leave to ask this question of him, which the jury might hear. Suppose all the proofs which had been by all the witnesses brought against me, were to be alledged against the jury, or some of them, so that if the arguments were judged by them to be of force or concluding, some of those of the jury should lose part of their estates and credit, and being in some danger of their lives, who of all the jury on whom this peril were like to fall, would judge those arguments alledged against me, sufficient to condemn them to the loss of part of their estates, or part of their credit with some danger of their lives? I therefore desired it might be considered, that my all lay at stake, all my concerns in the world; credit and life not only in some danger, but certainly to be condemned, if those arguments brought in by them against me should be judged to be of force. Therefore I desired they would deal by me as if it were their own case; according as I had proposed it to them, and so I should give no further trouble in speaking, being it was not judged fit I should say any more (as I had desired) to the jury.

I had only one favour more to beg of the judge before they went out, which was, that his lordship would read a paper before them which I had ready, whereby I could prove, that the first and chiefest witness against me, which was Rogers, ought not in justice to be admitted as a competent witness against me, as the writing I offered the judge would shew; which writing I gave to the judge, and he read it over privately to himself, and seeing the hand of him that wrote it at the bottom, who offered to swear for me against Rogers, the judge asked where this witness for me was, and why I had him not ready? I answered he was hard by in the prison for debt, if he pleased to send for him; but the judge would not send for him. I then desired the judge that at least I or any else here present, might read my paper publicly, that all might know it was true, that I had such a sufficient witness for me against Rogers; but the judge neither would let me, nor any else read it openly, but however I made bold to tell publicly all the contents of the paper, which were word for word as the witness wrote it with his own hand and name at the bottom; thus—“Memorandum, That upon the 12th of December last past, or thereabouts, came three men to the castle of Worcester, and as they came up the stairs, Rogers desires one of them to call for one Mr. Johnson, and see if he would answer to that name or not; and entering into the room, he asked where was Mr. Johnson, and which was he, though he was at that time present in the room, and none else but one man and myself drinking at the door, and in my conscience knew him not.

(In witness to this I will lay down my oath.)
HENRY HOLLAND.”

By this it may appear, that if the judge would let my witness appear to have sworn, I might have cast Rogers, the chief witness against me; and why it was not granted, let all that hear it judge. However, I still continued to plead, that all proofs alledged against me were insufficient, which I can make appear even in the judge's own opinion, though I did not tell him so; for you must know, that before in his circuit, though witnesses swore against a gentleman (whom they would have proved a priest) that they saw him marry people and baptize, which are the actions of a priest, yet the judge declared, that because these actions might be done by such as were no priests, as well as by priests, as it appeared, because justices of the peace married people in Cromwell's time, and any man or woman might at some times christen children; therefore such common actions, as he declared, could not prove the accused gentleman to be a priest for doing them, and thereupon the judge freed him.

Whereupon I infer, That all the actions the witnesses swear they saw me do, as wearing a surplice, giving the water, exhorting to prayer, shewing points out of the Bible, hearing others grievances, which they of themselves declared to me, and the like, being these are things done as well by those that were no priests, as by priests; according to the judge's own opinion, these actions ought not to have been judged sufficient proofs against me, no more than such actions were judged sufficient against other gentlemen; although I did not alledge this to the judge, yet it was sufficient he knew it, and might, if he had pleased, done with me accordingly, though he did not, but sending the jury out, sent me from the bar.

I being afterward called again to the bar, and it being declared unto me, that the jury had found me guilty, the bill was read against me; and then I was asked what I had to say for myself, why I should not die, that I might speak before the sentence of death past against me. To which I answered, I only desired to know for what I was to die; for I have shewed that all things alledged against me heretofore, were insufficient to prove me a priest, or take away my life.

The judge answered, That the jury had found me guilty, and that now there was no more to be said concerning the proof, but that I was to be condemned as a priest.

To which I replied, That though the jury had found me Guilty, yet I was still innocent from any guilt of death, and with his lordship's permission I would prove it. He asked me how? I answered, thus; I had not been out of England, to take any orders from foreign power since the king's restoration to his crown, neither had I any opportunity to take any orders in England; therefore if I were a priest, I was so before his majesty came into England: but whatever I had done before the king came into England, cannot make me now Guilty, supposing I had transgressed the law before, because his majesty before his return; put out several proclamations, that none should ever be troubled for their religion, or conscience sake; and since his coming into England, he had done the same by several proclamations: and what was yet more, not long since, had set forth his declaration, that every one should freely practise his own religion of what sect or persuasion soever, which declaration, if I were a priest, I might safely rely on, as well as all others. To which the judge replied, where had I the seal to that declaration? I answered, I never questioned but that a subject might take his king's word declared in his public proclamation without his seal. The judge answered, However if I were a priest now in England, I was guilty. I replied, That supposing I had formerly taken orders before the king came to England, I could not altogether degrade myself, or be otherwise now, than what I was ordained then; therefore if I were a priest, I cannot now be guilty for it, because all that ever was done before the king's restoration, in what respect soever, was all forgiven and blotted out by the king's general pardon to all subjects, even to those who had a hand in the death of his royal Father, and so the Catholics for their religion were not excluded out of the general pardon; wherefore I told his lordship I was not guilty.

Whereupon he told me I was guilty, and presumed far to plead so resolutely, and with such confidence before him and all the Bench.

I craved his pardon for my fault, but desired his lordship to consider, that I was bid speak if I had any thing to say for myself, before the sentence of death past against me, and therefore I had reason to plead home, since this was the last time I was like to speak for my life in this world, which I hope his lordship and the bench would consider; but if notwithstanding so many proclamations, grants for liberty of conscience, and his majesty's general pardon to all who had relied on them, if all this would not secure me, but my believing those things had caused me to err, and my error must cause me to lose my life, I had no more to say.

So the judge sat down, and pronounced against me the sentence of death, That I should be drawn, hanged, and quartered, disbowelled, my intrails burnt, my head cut off, my body to be cut in four quarters, and my quarters to be at the king's disposal.

Which sentence being pronounced; I bowed, and said aloud, Thanks be to God, God save the king; and I beseech God to bless your lordship, and all this honourable Bench.

The judge replied, You have spoken very well, I do not intend you shall die, at least not for the present, until I know the king's further pleasure.

I was not, I thank God for it, troubled with any disturbing thoughts either against the judge for his sentence, nor the jury that gave in such a verdict, nor against any of the witnesses; for I was then of the same mind, as by God's grace I ever shall be, esteeming them all the best friends to me in all they did or said that ever I had in my life, or ever shall have, except upon the like occasion. And I was, I thank God, so present with myself, whilst the judge pronounced the sentence to deliver me to death, that without any concern for any thing in this world, I did actually at the same time offer myself and the world to God.

After the judge was gone from the bench to the other end of the hall, I stayed with the keeper in the hall, where several Protestant gentlemen, and others, who had heard my trial, came to me, though strangers, and told me how sorry they were for me. To whom, with thanks, I replied, that I was troubled they should grieve for me, or my condition, who was joyful for it myself; for I told them I had professed this faith and religion all my life-time, which I was as sure to be true, as I was sure of the truth of God's word on which it was grounded, and therefore in it I deposed my soul, and eternal life and happiness; and therefore should I fear to lose my temporal life for this faith, whereon my eternal life depends, I were worse than an infidel; and whosoever should prefer the life of their bodies before their faith, their religion, or conscience, they were worse than heathens. For my own part

I told them, I was as ready by God's grace to die to-morrow, as I had been to receive the sentence of death to day, and as willingly as if I had a grant of the greatest dukedom: so we sate talking half an hour, and I returned to the prison, there to remain, as long as it pleased God and the king, whom God long preserve in all happiness.

There was another objection which I forgot to put in, until I had finished the former writing, and it was an objection which the judge was pleased to put against me himself, and it was that I had changed my name, and went in several places by several names.

To which I answered, the reason was, because in Cromwell's time, in the great troubles, our family suffered much, my father was imprisoned and a fellow prisoner with sir Thomas Ashton, both confined together, which sir Thomas is now one of his majesty's admirals of the Fleet. And for my own part, I going beyond sea to travel, I changed my name; and then coming into England again before the king's restoration, I was glad to conceal myself, and go by several names, as many others of the king's loyal subjects did, the better to be able to do his majesty the best service I could, which according to my small ability, I did endeavour both before and since the king came into England, like a dutiful subject, and like the rest of our family who all endeavoured to serve his majesty: for I have two brothers served him, the one a volunteer at sea in sir William Reeves ship, which sir William was killed in the last engagement with the Dutch; and the other brother had a command under his royal highness the duke of York at land: therefore I hope the changing of my name on such an occasion as I did, could not be imputed as a guilt upon me, nor speak me other than a dutiful subject; which I could have made further appear before the bench, but I did not judge it convenient to say any more to the judge there in public. But before his lordship went out of Worcester, I presented him with a petition, to acquaint his lordship, that I having had the honour to kiss his majesty's hand, before his restoration, in the Low-Countries; as also I have had the honour to be one of those whom his majesty was pleased to grace with being entertained by us, his then best subjects; his majesty was pleased to make us a gracious promise, that when it should please God to restore him to his crown, we should not live so in banishment as then we did. Of this in my petition I did acquaint the judge, and beseeched him that he would be pleased, by declaring this to the king, to endeavour to obtain some gracious favour from his majesty for me, my condition now being such, that I could never have greater need to be partaker of his gracious promise and clemency.

The judge promised me he would make an address to his majesty for me in this behalf, which whether he hath done or no, I wish some body may put him in mind to do it for me. I do not here mention the place where in part-cular, nor the other persons to whom his majesty made that promise, if you remember, you know I did tell you, with several other particular circumstances, which I need not here make any further mention of.

The Last SPEECH of Mr. FRANCIS JOHNSON, Priest, of the order of St. Francis, who was executed (as a Priest only) at Worcester, upon the 22d of August, A. D. 1679. Which he spake, for the most part upon the ladder, immediately before his execution, (but being interrupted) and that which he did speak, being taken by an unskilful scribe, was printed by the halves, and so imperfect, that it was in some places nonsense. To correct that abuse this which he spake is published by a friend.

Almighty God, out of his infinite goodness to this world, through the merits of his Son Christ Jesus, ordained or made choice of three virtues whereby we must walk, which are these, viz. Faith, Hope, and Charity. First, by virtue of faith, we are to believe all things that are done in this world; Secondly, by virtue of Hope, we are to believe and hope for all things in another world. And the reason why Christians do believe this hope, is to bring and conduct them to salvation in the other world. And if we hope in God, we cannot but believe God: for with the mouth confession is made, but with the heart (and through faith) we must believe unto salvation; so that faith is not to be trodden under foot, or to be hid under a bushel, but to be set upon a candlestick, Luke 12. 'Whosoever doth confess me before men, him will I confess before the angels of God;' and therefore all are bound to believe that there is but one faith; and if but one faith, then but one christian faith. There is but one faith, one Lord, one baptism; if it be so, how can this stand with so many sectaries as there are? If there be but one faith, how can this be?

I believe the creed of St. Athanasius, (which is in your common prayer-book) there it is said, 'that whosoever will be saved, it is necessary before all things that he hold the Catholic faith; and that if he keep not that faith whole and undefiled, he shall perish everlastingly.' And as St. James saith, Jam. ii. 10. 'He that keepeth the whole law, and yet offendeth in one point is guilty of all;' so they that believe, must be all of the same faith. And that this ought to be done, I appeal to all the saints that are gone before, of whom it is said, 'that their faith was such, as by it they stopt the mouths of lions, they turned the edge of the sword, and caused the fire to cease that it should not burn; so they were oppressed they wandered about in sheeps-clothing and goats clothing,' Heb. xi. Therefore I say there must be an unity of faith.

I desire all Catholics to consider this, that it is better to be reviled by man now in this world, than be reviled by God in the world to come. Mat. xvi. it is said the Catholic church is built upon a rock. And Mat. xviii. he who will not believe the church let him be as a heathen and publican.

This faith must be established so in every one, because Christ said, He would send the Holy Ghost, and he will shew us, or them, what to do. This is the rule of faith: This faith was published at Rome. And St. Paul writing to the Christians there, rejoiceth that their faith was renowned in the whole world. 'Go ye therefore, baptizing all nations in the name of the Father.' And this is the faith I confess and believe in, and which I die for.

I come now to speak of the second virtue, which is hope. I hope I shall have such reward, that neither eye hath seen, nor ear heard, nor can it enter into the heart of man to conceive.' Those that have hope, shall be as Mount Sion, that shall not be removed; those that have firm hope, there is nothing can disturb them; as David saith, 'God is round about those that do hope in him, as the mountains are round about Hierusalem.'

I come to the third virtue, and that is charity. It is true, now this body of mine in this shipwreck is full of sin, but when that shipwreck is over, I shall come to inherit that rock that shall never fail. Now welcome shipwreck that makes the body suffer, but brings the soul to that haven which is joyful.

Now many there be that talk much of charity, few understand it, and fewer that practise it. This is the greatest virtue, 1 Cor. xiii. 'Though ye speak with tongues of men and angels, and have not charity, it availeth nothing.' So then we ought to have love and charity, or else it prevaileth nothing.

It is expected I should say something of the Plot. As to this, I shall declare two points of my faith.

First, I believe that all are bound to obey the king's laws.

Secondly, I do declare, that those that do break the law in word, or any action, or that do act any thing against his majesty's life, that is a sin unto damnation, as much as it was a sin in Judas to betray Christ.

An oath is a taking God to witness, and is as much as if he took his life and justice to stake. So that he who takes a false oath, is guilty of destroying the life of God and his justice, and of his own damnation. And if I were but guilty of this, I do declare, that all the sin of damnation would fall upon me, because I denied the truth, and so struck at God by my sin, in denying the truth; that is one damnation.

A second damnation is, that if any man know of an evil against his majesty, his kingdom and nation, and to hide and not discover it, he shall answer for those mischiefs that come thereby; so that a man would have made and committed as many sins, as there be men in England that had suffered.

A third damnation is to die in this lie and with this perjury in his mouth; whereby he loses heaven and all its enjoyments, and dies in greater sins than the devils themselves.

Fourthly, I should have been guilty of my own death; For that Judge Atkins offered me my life if I would confess what I knew of the Plot, which had I known, and not discovered, would have made me the cause of my own death, which would have been a fourth damnation.

I would have said more, but that I gave my speech to a friend to be printed.

Mr. Sheriff. I pray, Sir, speak on what you have to say, and none shall interrupt you.

Mr. Johnson. Now I have no more to do but to make my address to Almighty God, with all the powers of my soul, that I may have his mercy and pardon of my sins; and therefore I beg that all Catholics who join in union of this same faith, would make an address unto God for me, that we may receive pardon for our sins. I have nothing now but wishes left. I wish I may imitate David in his repentance, and 'that my eyes may run down with tears, 'because I have not kept God's law.' I wish with the prophet Jeremiah, that 'Rivers of 'waters may fall from my eyes, by reason of 'sin.' Lam. iii. 48.

But tears will not be proper for me at this time; I have kept myself from them, lest by shedding tears, some might say I was unwilling to die, or feared death: but instead of tears, I offer all the blood in my veins, and I wish every drop were an ocean, and I would offer it up to God. I wish I might become a man like David. I wish I had Mary Magdalen's penitential tears; I wish I had her arms to embrace the feet of mercy. I wish I had all the graces of saints and angels, I would offer them all to God for the remission of my sin. This is my desire, and this I wish for as much as is in me.

I offer first my life, and I beseech and desire of God to turn his face from my sins, but not from me. I offer up my life in satisfaction for my sins, and for the Catholic Cause. And I beg for those that be mine enemies in this my death, and I desire to have them forgiven, because I go to that world of happiness sooner than I should have gone. And I humbly beg pardon from God and the world: and this I beg for the merits and mercy of Jesus Christ.

I beseech God to bless his majesty, to give him a long life and a happy reign in this world, and in the world to come.

I beseech God to bless all my benefactors, and all my friends, and those that have been any way under my charge.

I beseech God to bless all Catholics and this nation, and his majesty's privy council, and grant that they may act no otherwise than what may be for the glory of God, who will bring to light and to judgment all both good and evil, Luke xii. So I beseech God that he will give them grace to serve him.

I beseech God to bless the parliament that is now in election, that they may determine nothing, but what they themselves do hope to be judged by at the last day.

I beseech God to bless all that suffer under this persecution, and to turn this our captivity into joy; that they who now sow in tears, may reap in joy.

I beseech God to accept the death of my body and to receive my soul.

I have no more to say.

Mr. Sheriff. I give you no interruption; but only whereas you said, that you died for the faith, that is not so, you do not die for that, but because you, being his majesty's subject, received orders from the Church of Rome beyond the seas, and came again into England, contrary to the law.

Mr. Johnson. That was pardoned by the king's act of grace.

Mr. Sheriff. That act pardoned only crimes committed before the making of it, but not those done since, as your continuance in England was.

Mr. Johnson. I am sorry if I have given offence in any thing I have said; my reason for it was, because when I was sent for to the judges upon Sunday night, Judge Atkins told me, I died not for being concerned in the Plot, but for being a priest.

Mr. Sheriff. No, but for your continuance in England against the law, being a priest.

Mr. Johnson. God receive my soul.

Mr. Sheriff. Sir, you may take your own time, and you shall have no interruption; Sir, will you be pleased to have your own time?

Jailor. Sir, pray give the sign when you please to be turned off.

Mr. Johnson. I will give you no sign, do it when you will.

And so he was executed.

Mr. Johnson was of an honourable family in Norfolk, born to an estate of some hundreds per annum, all which he left for the sake of religion. His third brother's son now enjoys the estate.

MR. JOHNSON'S SPEECH, which he delivered to his Friend to be printed (as he mentioned at the place of Execution.)

ADVERTISEMENT.—Mr. Johnson's Trial, and what he spoke at his Execution, being finished there came to the Printer's hands his Speech at large (of which his foregoing words are only the heads) as the Reader will see, and as Mr. Johnson also mentions, viz. (I would have said more, but that I gave my Speech to a friend to be printed) therefore his friend has now faithfully published it accordingly, being written by Mr. Johnson himself, as followeth:

God Almighty (honoured friends) having been pleased of his infinite mercy through the merits of our Saviour Jesus Christ, to bestow on all Christians the theological virtues of Faith, Hope and Charity, by virtue of faith all are to believe whatever God hath revealed to us in this world, and by hope all are to expect what he hath promised we shall receive in the world to come.

And because, where God bestows such a faith and hope, it is in order to bring all to a true charity and love of him; for who can have faith to believe an infinite goodness in which he hopes, but he must love that infinite goodness in whom he hopes, which bestows on him such gifts? Therefore all ought to honour God, and shew their love to him by a due profession, and a due practice of this faith, this hope and this charity, otherwise they cannot be saved, because, as St. Paul saith, "With the heart it is believed to righteousness, but with the mouth confession is made to salvation," Rom. x. 10.

For those that will not shew their faith, which is a light not to be hid under a bushel, but to be set in a candlestick, to give light to all, such can never have neither true hope for themselves, nor true charity towards God, or their neighbour, nor God to them, because our Saviour saith, Luke xii. "He that confesseth me before men, him will the Son of Man confess before the angels of God; but he that denieth me before men" (as those do that act or swear against their conscience) "him will the Son of Man deny before the angels of God."

And as all are bound to confess him, and his faith; so likewise all are obliged to own and profess that this faith can be but one only faith, as we are taught, Ephes. iv. where St. Paul declares, "There is one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God, even as you are called," saith he, "in one hope of your calling." This being most true, let every rational Christian, in his most retired thoughts, consider how this unity of faith, and this hope of our calling can stand with such multiplicity of sects and opinions, also divers one against the other, with which the nation now so abounds: For according to the text, a man may as well say, there are diversities of Gods, or diversities of Christs, as that there are diversities of faiths, because faith is nothing but the truth of one God, which truth or faith he hath revealed, which none can alter.

We are all therefore bound to believe alike, in one faith, and in one Holy Catholic Church, as our Creed teacheth us; we are all obliged to believe in one catholic faith, as the Creed of St. Athanasius in the Protestant Common Prayer Book declares, saying, "Whosoever will be saved, it is necessary before all things, that he believe in the catholic faith, which faith unless every one keep whole and undefiled, he shall without doubt perish everlastingly:" All and every one are to keep this faith whole, because as it is writ, St. Jam. ii. v. 10. "Whosoever keeps the whole law, and yet offends in one point is guilty of all."

All are to keep the whole faith, because our Saviour saith, Matt. xvi. 15. "Go ye into the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature:" All are to believe alike the whole faith of the Gospel, else they shall perish everlastingly; because our Saviour saith in the same place, v. 16. "He that believes shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." We all must keep the unity of the faith whole and undefiled, because our Saviour also saith, St. Matt. vi. 16.

"Heaven and earth shall pass, but one jot, or one tittle of the law shall in no wise pass, till all be fulfilled;" as well the law of faith, as the law of works.

In confirmation of this, I appeal to the faith, and works, and sufferings of all the saints from the beginning, who to keep their faith whole and entire, have made such profession and practice of it, and confirmed it by such works as are recorded in St. Paul, Heb. xi. where first he registers the faith and deeds of the believers in particular, and then in general, of what they did and suffered by virtue of their faith, as there you read; "By faith they stopped the mouths of lions; extinguished the force of the fire, repelled the edge of the sword; they were racked, they were tried by mockings and stripes; they were in chains and prisons, and they were stoned, they were hewed, they were tempted, they died in the slaughter of the sword, they were so persecuted and impoverished, that they were fain to go about in sheep-skins, and goat skins, needy, in distress, afflicted, wandering in deserts, in mountains, in dens, and caves of the earth."

Dear catholics now in your present persecution, think of this, and be willing to follow these examples, that you, as in the same place it followeth, being appointed, as they were by the testimony of your faith, may receive, ere long, those better things which God, as it is there writ, provides for you: Happy those that have this faith, but thrice more happy those that suffer these persecutions for faith's sake, because by this faith, as St. Paul saith, Gal. iii. 11. "The just man lives, and those that have not this faith, are dead to God," because, as it is written, Heb. xi. 6. "Without faith it is impossible to please God;" and yet though we have this faith, except we join, when God requires, our works of sufferings to this faith, both we and our faith are dead to God, because, as St. James saith, chap. ii. ver. 17. "Faith is to be shewed by works, because faith without works is dead." And he further shews us in his first chap. v. 25. "It is the works make a man happy, although there can be no good work without a firm faith in nothing doubting," as he saith, ver. 6.

Christian faith is a firm, established, and an infallible faith, because it is grounded upon a rock, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail, Matth. xvi. v. 18. This faith is as firmly established by such authority as God and his church, that he that will not own the authority, is as a heathen and a publican; God hath declared him so; and what the church binds on earth, God binds in Heaven. This church and faith is firmly established, because our Saviour hath promised, that the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of truth should, teach the believers all truth, remain with them for ever, shew them things to come to be believed, and should cause the believers to remember all things which Christ had already taught, which you read in John, xiv. and xvi. chap.

This faith is firmly established, because it was believed and published from the beginning, throughout the whole world, as St. Paul proclaims, Romans the first, where he speaks thus to all that be in Rome ; " Beloved of God, called to be saints ; first I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all, that your faith is published throughout the whole world." Finally, this faith is established and infallibly confirmed, that it can never decay till the world's end, because our Saviour hath promised to be with the believers unto the world's end ; Matth. xxviii. 19, 20. " Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, and behold I am with you always even to the end of the world." Thus much briefly concerning my Christian faith in which I truly believe in all points infallible, and in confirmation of which one only faith and Catholic Church, I will and do lay down my life ; and whosoever will as he ought consider the text that proves this faith and church of the living God, to be the pillar and ground of truth, as it is evident it is, 1 Tim. iii. 15, I question not but who I say considers this, will believe the same, our faith being assisted by our second divine virtue, which is our Christian hope.

This hope is that virtue which assures us, that for the reward of our faith, and the profession and due practice of it, as we ought, there are those heavenly gifts laid up for the Christian believers, which neither eye hath seen, nor ear hath heard, nor the heart of man can conceive or comprehend, as St. Paul declares ; this hope gives such confidence, that death cannot overcome it, because, as the prophet saith, " Although he shall kill me, yet I will hope in him." Why then shall any fear to die for his faith, having this hope ? It is for want of making due reflection and use of this hope that causes so many to be fearful to suffer, and makes them fly the field of persecution, and forsake the banners of their Christian faith, that all ought to fight under, and would still fight under, would they make use of the divine hope of God's promises, which are such, that as David saith, Psal. cxv. " That he that hopes or trusts in our Lord, shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but remain for ever." As the mountains, saith God by the mouth of David, are about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people ; that is, such as will place their hope in him, as the prophet did, and exhorts us to do the same, saying, Psal. cxxx. 5, 6. " My soul hath hoped in our Lord ; from the morning watch, even until night, let Israel hope in our Lord ;" that is, from the beginning of the day of our life, till the night of death ; as well in the morning of prosperity, as in the evening of adversity : because it is also writ, God is my hope for ever ; and whosoever can truly say with David, Psal. xxxi. 1. " In thee, O Lord, have I placed my hope," shall be assured of what there follows, not to be confounded for ever, because, as St. Paul saith, " Hope confoundeth not."

VOL. VII.

There is a contrary vice to this virtue, a worldly fear that brings all things to confusion ; it makes worldlings swear, and furswear, and perjure ; for which perjuries and false oaths, as the prophet saith, " Judgment springs up as hemlock in the furrows of the fields." And therefore Dr. Thorndick in his book of Just Weights and Measures, saith, " That co-action of oaths is the crying sin of this nation, to call down the wrath of God upon the kingdom."

What better remedy than to secure ourselves against all worldly fears, and these ensuing dangers, but by relying on the hope of future blessings, which God, if we fight and suffer for his sake, hath promised. God is the God of Hosts, and we fight under him, and if we trust in him we are happy, as David saith, Psal. lxxxiv. 5. " O Lord of Hosts, blessed is the man that trusts in thee, in whom to hope is to be secured ;" and therefore David also saith, Psal. xci. " He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wing shalt thou hope, especially if we fight for our faith ;" and therefore he adds in the same verse, " His truth shall be thy shield and buckler," if we will hope in him and his reward ; for if we hope for our great wages, we shall easily undergo our little work : As for example, if we hope to drink of the torrent of pleasure, as God hath promised we shall in his kingdom, who will fear to taste now of the chalice of some small persecution ? If we hope hereafter to be numbered amongst the sons of God, as he hath promised we shall, and have our lot among the saints : why should we now fear to be reviled of men, or be reputed ignominious, as our Saviour and his Apostles were ? If they have, so will they do you also ; the scholar is not above the master, nor the servant above his lord. If they called the master of the family Beelzebub, so will they do his servants ; therefore we must with the Apostles rejoice, as you read in the Acts they did, " because they were accounted worthy to suffer contumely and reproaches." If contumely and reproach seem so hard for us to undergo now for a good cause, as is our conscience before a few enemies, what contumely must those undergo who for now acting against their conscience, shall undergo at the great judgment before God, angels, saints, devils, and all the damned in hell ? If for our reproach now we hope that after a short sorrow, God will honour us so, as to wipe away with his own hand every tear from our eyes, as he promiseth in the Revelations he will ; and that henceforth " there shall be neither grief, nor labour, nor pain," or the like ; why should any now grieve either to see himself or others suffer ? It will not last, this tempest will soon be over, and if now in this storm the small vessel of my body suffer shipwreck, or some others, the like vessels, if our souls can but carry off our goods of Faith, Hope, and Charity, all is very well ; for as soon as the vessels of our bodies sink, our souls will come to shore at the Land of Promise, and we shall be secured in the rock which is Christ, and ever remain safe in the eternal hills, where neither winds nor waves of persecution can ever reach to assault us: then welcome shipwreck, that sinks the vessel of the body, to bring the passengers and their goods so happily to the haven, the Heaven of bliss.

Let us therefore weigh these things in a prudent balance, and see which scale is the heaviest, of present fears, or future hopes; of present sufferings, or future glories. Let us remember our Saviour's words to his Apostles, 'You are those that remained with me in my temptations or trials;' for which, said he, their reward was, he disposed the kingdom of heaven to them; partners in suffering, partners in glories: which if well considered, we shall say with St. Paul, 'The sufferings of this present time are not condign, or of equality to the future glory which shall be revealed in us;' and we shall with his joyful spirit say, 2 Cor. iv. 17. 'Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh in us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' It is a happy weight that lifts both sufferings and sufferers up as high as Heaven, to eternal crowns of which we are all assured of as a reward for our faith, if we will make good use of our christian hope; which that we may the better do, let us endeavour to help ourselves by the third and greatest virtue that follows our faith and hope, which is charity.

This is that greatest virtue of which all sorts of Christians speak much, understand little, and practise less; though without the practice of it, it is in vain for any to pretend to have a saving faith, or hope; For as St. Paul saith, 1 Cor. xiii. 'Though he speak with the tongues of men and angels, and have not charity, he is but as sounding brass;' and although he should know all mysteries, and have faith to remove mountains; and though he should have such hope, understand for reward, 'that he should give all to the poor, and deliver his body to burn, and yet not have charity, it profiteth nothing.' Charity, as he saith, ver. 7, 'suffereth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, beareth all things.'

Do all that pretend to charity do thus? If to speak with the tongues of angels without charity be nothing but vanity, what charity is there in those that speak with the tongues of detraction, scandal, slander, false-witness and perjuries against their neighbours? If those that give all to the poor may want charity, so that all which they give profits them nothing, what charity is there in those that take all from their neighbours, to force them to forsake their faith? If alms profit nothing without charity, can such injuries profit prosecutors, that take all away against charity? If a man may give his own body to burn, and yet be cold in charity, what charity is there to kill others bodies, take away their lives with ignominy and violence, because they will not kill their own souls, by acting against God and their conscience? If charity consist only in those that suffer all things, believe all things, hope all things, what charity is there in those who will make their neighbour suffer all things of persecution, because they believe and hope according to their conscience, and profess their faith and hope as they are bound before God upon their salvation so to do?

It is certain, that though men may pretend persecution of others for God's sake, to reduce others to him, yet it is evident that for any kingdom to persecute any, merely for conscience-sake, is against the law of God; and therefore whilst they would seem so zealously to keep the first command, of loving God above all, and force others to conform to their opinions, they break the second command, because they do not love their neighbour as themselves, because they persecute them, and so they dash one commandment against the other, and so crack both commandments together: For wheresoever the second command is broke, by not loving our neighbour as ourselves, the first is broke with it, because did they love God above all, they would do better by their neighbour.

But I do not come here to beat down others pretence to charity, but endeavour to advance charity in myself and others; and the way to do this, is not to reckon what others have not done according to charity, but to call to mind what others have done to raise charity towards God and their neighbours.

We read in holy writ, that Moses love was so to God and his neighbour, that to repurchase a peace and charity betwixt God and the people after they had offended, he desired that his own name should rather be blotted out of the book of life, than that the people's name should not be put in, by obtaining forgiveness; and therefore he saith to God, 'Either spare the people, or blot me out of the book which thou hast writ.'

How superlative a motive is this, to move Christians to a perfect charity towards their neighbours; well may a Christian be willing to lay down his temporal life for good example sake, rather than offend God, and scandalize others by deserting his faith; since others could be willing to hazard their eternal lives, to reduce their neighbours to God by charity.

The like examples of love to God and his neighbours, we have in St. Paul, in his manifold expressions both towards God and men; first to God, as Rom. viii. where he makes this proclamation, 'Who shall' saith he, 'separate us from the charity of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? As it is written, for thy sake we are killed all the day long, we are accounted as sheep to the slaughter.' He adds, 'I am certain that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.'

And for this charity in order to his neighbour, let what he suffered to serve them testify, as he relates, 2 Cor. xi. by being in labours and stripes, in prison, in death, in scourgings, in shipwrecks, being day and night in the bottom of the sea, in perils, in weariness, in painfulness, in hunger, in thirst, in fasting, in cold, and weariness, besides what he suffered through his care of all churches, ver. 28, 29, where he saith, 'Who is weak, and I am not weak? understand by compassion, as fellow-sufferer; Who is scandalized, and I burn not?' understand by zeal. Let those now consider this who never more rejoice than now, when they see their passive neighbours scandalized, and were never better content in their own apprehensions than now, when they behold us suffering though before God we are innocent. Were St. Paul on earth again, he would rather give himself for others, to ease them of their sufferings, according to his wonted charity express, 2 Cor. xii. 15. saying, 'I will very gladly spend and be spent for you;' and he would rejoice to suffer in charity for his neighbour, as he abundantly declares, Colos. ii. 4. saying, 'I rejoice in my sufferings for you,' and fill up that which is wanting of the passions or afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church, and this example is given for us to do the like, and therefore he saith, 1 Cor. iv. 9. 'We are made a spectacle to the world, to angels, and to men; and therefore God forbid but some of us, if we be Christian men, should endeavour to imitate some of his examples, though we cannot all; For he ascended to so superlative a degree of charity towards his neighbour, that he declares to the world, that he could be a cast-away himself to save others; for thus he saith, Rom. ix. 3. 'I could wish myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren.'

Christians do not then henceforth so easily ruin your neighbours, neither in their lives, nor estates, or credits, by persecutions and scandals, the scripture holds forth no such doctrine, nor gives any such examples, but, as you see, the contrary; but if our persecutors will not imitate these examples, let us that are persecuted and suffer endeavour to imitate them, by choosing rather to lose all we can call our own in this world, and life also, rather than to break charity to God and our neighbour, either by deuying or dissembling our faith, and scandalizing the church, or bearing false witness against ourselves, or our neighbours, to save our lives or fortunes, or enrich ourselves by false witness.

And if we will put in practice the virtues of faith, hope and charity I have spoke of, we ought to do it thus; what we profess by words, we must confirm by deeds and actions. Our profession of Catholic faith is this, I believe all divine revelations delivered to the prophets and apostles, proposed by the Catholic church in her general councils, or by her universal practice to be believed as an article of Catholic faith, knowing this to be our faith, the confirmation of this knowledge, or the practice of this by our deeds, is, as St. Paul teacheth, Ephes.

iii. 8. 'To esteem all worldly things as dirt, in respect of this eminent knowledge of Christ and his faith;' and therefore for my own part, I now being ready to leave all in the world, and my life in testimony of my Catholic faith, which I profess I desire and hope to manifest to all, I value my knowledge of Christ's faith, more than I value the universal world.

And as for my Christian hope I profess to have, the confirmation of it, or the practical part is to be fulfilled thus, being that we must, as St. Peter saith, 1 Pet. iii. 15. 'Be always ready to give an account to every one concerning the hope which is in us.' I have already by words expressed it, and by deed I express it thus; That whereas I do believe that God, as the scripture saith, kills, and brings to life again; carrieth down to the depth, and bringeth back again; so now I do by this my present execution, which I am now to undergo, willingly give my body to be mortified in death for my faith, hoping in God's infinite mercy he will restore my body and soul to eternal life; and I do willingly resign myself to be carried down to my grave, hoping by my Saviour's cross and passion, death and burial, he will raise me up again to a glorious resurrection.

And as for the confirmation of my charity, to shew by deeds, the love I owe to God and my neighbour, it hath pleased my Saviour by his own words to declare which is the best proof or practice of charity, where he saith, 'No man hath a greater charity, than he that lays down his life for his friend.' I therefore do willingly undergo this death I am to suffer now, to testify I love my friend, my neighbour as myself; whilst I undergo this death for myself and them, that seeing it is for the profession of my faith I die, they, whilst they live, may the more happily serve God in the same belief; and I testify, I love God above all, because I forsake the world and myself in death, rather than offend him by doing any thing against my conscience.

And forasmuch as for these many years I have had occasion by discoursing and reading the holy scriptures with others who desired to find out the true faith, I have by words declared what faith I did believe, and what faith they ought to believe; I now declare that for every point of faith that ever I believed myself, or read to others, or told them that they might believe as a point of faith; for all and every such points of faith, in confirmation of them, as well to myself as others, I here lay down my life; and omitting all other particular points, I believe obedience to our king to be a divine law, and that we are bound to obey his commands in temporal laws; and I believe it too a sin of damnation, for any subject of his to rebel against him, or his kingdom; and I believe it as certain a sin to damnation, for any subject to endeavour, either by thoughts, words, or deeds, to take away his life, or act any thing of that nature, either by himself, or any others, or other against his sacred majesty, as I believe it was a sin in Judas to damnation to betray Christ. And I do declare upon my salvation that I never did, nor do know any Catholic, that ever was or is the least guilty, either by thought, word, or deed, by any plot or otherwise, to have any design or concurrence to kill his sacred majesty, or rebel against his kingdom, whom God long preserve with his subjects in all happiness in this world, and crown him in the world to come with eternal glory.

And now it remains, that with all the powers and forces of my soul, I make my address to God for mercy ere I appear before him for judgment; and you, dear friends, here present, who believe in one holy Catholic Church, and Communion of Saints, be pleased in charity to make the same address to God with me, and for me, that we may obtain true sorrow and repentance for all our sins, and a merciful forgiveness; and first let us wish from the bottom of our hearts, that we could express and make good our sorrow, as David did, Psal. cxix. 'Whilst rivers of waters run down our eyes like his, because we have not kept according to our faith God's commands;' for which had we that fountain of tears which the prophet wished for, we ought spend it all; we ought with Jeremy, Lam. iii. 48. 49. to weep till our eyes, as his, failed, and as his eye with tears afflicted, as he saith his heart, so ought ours to do, because we have made so ill use of that faith, hope, and charity, which God hath bestowed upon us.

But forasmuch as tears now at this present, and in these circumstances of rash censuring times, tears, I say, from me, might seem to some, either the off-spring of fear to die, which God forbid I should have in so good a cause as my religion; or lest others might judge my tears might fall by reason of some other guilt, of which I am free and innocent, I have endeavoured to stop the course of tears, and instead of drops of water from my eyes, I will spend the drops of blood from every sorrowful vein of my heart, and my whole body, that God may please to wash away the sins of all my life past, and I wish each drop an ocean for myself and all the world, because I have nothing now left more than wishes, which I beseech thee, O gracious God, of thy mercy to accept of; and if you will vouchsafe to accept of wishes to supply the deeds, by wishes I offer up all that is good to you, that ever you gave to any since the world's creation; I offer up David's broken heart, together with my own, that so like him, after my repentance, I may become a man according to your own heart. I offer up the sighs of Magdalen, and wish I could make such use of them as she did to sob out my sins. I wish her repentant arms, that I may lay fast hold at the feet of thee my gracious God.

I wish I had the longanimity of all the holy confessors.

I wish I had the sufferings of all thy constant martyrs.

I wish I had the lamps of all thy sacred virgins, that I might offer all to thee that in them was pleasant in thy sight.

I wish I could offer up to thee, O God, the sacrifices of just Abel, Lot, Job, and all other sacrifices that ever did gratefully ascend up in thy sight; that thou being pleased by the sight of them, thou mightst look no more upon my sins: For if thou wilt observe iniquities, who shall endure? let therefore thy mercy hide thy face from my sins, but let not the rigor of thy justice cast me away from thy presence; cast me not away from thy face, and thy holy spirit take not from me, but turn away thy face from sin, and blot out all mine iniquities, and I will offer my body as a sacrifice to thee by death to appease thy just anger.

I own my sins, and I own your mercies. You gave me faith to know and believe what was the will of you my heavenly master, but I acknowledge my fault, that although I knew your will, I did not fulfil it, and therefore I ought to be beaten with many stripes, because you foretold me, that many are the stripes of a sinner; but be pleased, dear Lord, also to remember, that in the same place you promised that notwithstanding this, yet mercy should encompass him that hopes; you have given your divine hope, vouchsafe to let this hope defend me; and although I know I have not made good use of hope, and hope not well used, of which I am guilty, makes a sinner deter repentance, and so puts in danger to fall into presumption by long neglect, yet the last hour of calling being not yet past, and your mercy being above all your works, I hope and humbly beg to be partaker with those who were accepted at the last hour.

I humbly acknowledge with thanks, O gracious God, that you gave me charity as your livery, in which I always ought to have appeared in your sight, and never to have been divested of it; but how oft have I been spoiled, through my own fault, of this garment? how oft have I, by descending to Jericho, instead of going up to Jerusalem; how oft, I say, have I been robbed of this garment of charity? even as often as I have preferred any sublunary object, and the love of that before the love of you, and before your goodness, which is above all goodness, and the object of all beatitude.

Vouchsafe again, O gracious Lord, to restore in mercy to me this nuptial vestment, ere I dare appear at the supper of the Lamb. Make me, O heavenly Father, a penitential prodigal, and then I shall have put on me again this best robe of charity.

This I beg from the bottom of my soul for his dear sake, who was divested of his garments out of charity, that I might be invested in his charity, who also suffered his garments to be divided, that he might purchase grace, that we might never be divided from the unity of his faith and church, but rather willingly suffer for his sake the separation of our lives from our bodies, the separation of our bodies from our souls, and the separation of our bodies into its quarters, that we may the more perfectly by these sufferings and separations from ourselves be united to him.

Therefore in the faithful communion and perfect union of the sufferings of all saints that ever have been, or now are, or ever will be, in the union of the most sacred merits of the life, passions and death of God and man, my dear Redeemer and Saviour Christ, I offer myself willingly to what I am now to suffer, begging by all that is good in heaven and in earth, remissions of sins for myself and all the world, particularly for all that may appear to have been my enemies in the concern of my life, as witness, jury, judge, and others, whom I do not esteem as enemies, but as the best of friends; I heartily forgive them, and beg the best of blessings for them all, as being the cause of sending me sooner than otherwise I might have gone, to the happy state of hope for the other world. Whither, before I go, I humbly beg pardon of all in this world, for whatever in thoughts, words or deeds I have committed to offend them, or omitted to do for them, by which any thing might have been mended in them, or myself, I beseech God to bless them all.

I beseech God to bless also all my friends, spiritual and temporal; all benefactors; and all by whom I have received good or evil, by words, deeds, or desires.

I beseech God to bless all those of whom I ever had care or charge spiritually or temporally.

I beseech God bless his holy catholic church, and our chief bishop thereof, with all other bishops, priests and clergy.

I beseech God bless this nation, and unite all amongst themselves and to God, in true Faith, Hope and Charity.

I beseech God to bless his majesty's privy council, and make all the secrets of their hearts and their desires such, as that both Charles our king on earth, and God our great king in heaven and earth, may be served, pleased and honoured by them, that men and angels may rejoice at it now, and be public witness of it at the last great day, at the great and last council table, where 'every secret shall be laid open,' Luke 12, as Solomon saith, Eccles. ult. 'when God will bring into judgment every secret thing, whether it be good or evil.'

I beseech God to bless the parliament now elect, and be so present with them when they sit to judge and discuss the causes of this nation, they may imitate the assembly of those that are to sit upon the twelve thrones at the last great assembly, that they may now judge or determinate of things no otherwise than they hope or fear then to be judged themselves, and determined of to all eternity.

I beseech God to bless all that suffer in this persecution, and let the blessing exprest in the 136th Psalm light upon them speedily, that God turning their captivity, all mouths may be filled with joys, and tongues with singings. Convert, O Lord, our captivity, as streams in the south, that those who now sow in tears, may reap in joy; and for this temporal death; O blessed Trinity, give me eternal life; let my body die to the world for the love of thee, that my soul may live for ever, and love in thee my God and dear Redeemer, Amen. Sweet Jesus, Amen.

It appears from the following, that in the preceding month of July another priest had been executed at Chester.

"The Speech of Mr. WILLIAM PLESSINGTON, who was Executed at Chester (for being a Priest of the Church of Rome) July 19, 1679.

"Dear Countrymen; I am here to be executed, neither for theft, murder, nor any thing against the law of God, nor any fact or doctrine inconsistent with monarchy or civil government, I suppose several now present heard my trial the last Assizes, and can testify that nothing was laid to my charge but priest-hood, and I am sure that you will find that priest-hood is neither against the law of God nor monarchy, or civil government. If you will consult either the Old or New-Testament, (for it is the basis of religion) for no priest no religion, St. Paul tells us in Hebrews, the 7, and 12. The priest-hood being changed, there is made also of necessity a change of the law, and consequently the priest-hood being abolished, the law and religion is quite gone.—But I know it will be said, that a priest, ordained by authority derived from the See of Rome, is by the law of the nation to die as a traitor, but if that be so what must become of all the clergy-men of the Church of England, for the first protestant bishops had their ordination from those of the Church of Rome, or none at all, as appears by their own writers, so that ordination comes derivatively to those now living.—As in the primitive times, Christians were esteemed traitors; and suffered as such by national laws, so are the priests of the Roman Church, here esteemed and suffer as such. But as Christianity then was not against the law of God, monarchy, or civil policy, so now there is not any one point of the Roman Catholic faith, (of which faith I am) that is inconsistent therewith, as is evident by induction in each several point.—That the pope hath power to depose or give license to murder princes, is no point of our belief. And I protest in the sight of God and the court of heaven, that I am absolutely innocent of the Plot so much discoursed of, and abhor such bloody and damnable designs, and although it be 9 weeks since I was sentenced to die, there is not any thing of that laid to my charge, so that I may well take comfort in St. Peter's words, 1 Pet. 14, 15, 16. 'Let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil doer; or as a busy body in other men's matters, yet if any man suffer as a Christian let him not be ashamed or sorry.' I have deserved a worse death, for though I have been a faithful and true subject to my king, I have been a grievous sinner against God; thieves and robbers that rob on high-ways, would have served God in a greater perfection than I have done, had they received so many favours and graces from him as I have.—But as there was never sinner who truly repented and heartily called to Jesus for mercy, to whom he did not shew mercy; so I hope by the merits of his passion, he will have mercy on me, who am heartily sorry that ever I offended him.—Bear witness good hearers, that I profess that I undoubtedly and firmly believe all the Articles of the Roman Catholic faith, and for the truth of any of them, (by the assistance of God) I am willing to die, and I had rather die than doubt of any point of faith, taught by our holy mother the Roman Catholic Church.—In what condition Margaret Plat one of the chiefest witnesses against me was before, and after she was with me, let her nearest relations declare.—George Massey, another witness swore falsely, when he swore, I gave him the Sacrament, and said mass at the time and place he mentioned, and I verily think that he never spoke to me, or I to him, or saw each other but at the Assizes week; the third witness Robert Wood was suddenly killed, but of the dead why should I speak? These were all the witnesses against me, unless those that only declared what they heard from others. I heartily and freely forgive all that have been or are any way instrumental to my death, and heartily desire that those that are living may heartily repent.—God bless the king and the royal family, and grant his majesty a prosperous reign here and a crown of glory hereafter, God grant peace to the subjects, and that they live and die in true Faith, Hope, and Charity. That which remains is, that I recommend myself to the mercy of my Jesus by whose merits I hope for mercy, O Jesu be to me a Jesus.*

258. The Trial of THOMAS KNOX and JOHN LANE, at the King's Bench, for a Misdemeanor.* 31 CHARLES II. A. D. 1679.

On Tuesday the 25th day of November, 1679, at the King's bench-bar at Westminster, Thomas Knox and John Lane were tried for the misdemeanor and offence hereinafter in the Indictment expressed; which trial was in manner following.

Proclamation being made in usual manner for information, and the defendants called to their challenges, the jury were sworn, whose names follow.

Sir John Kirk, Thomas Harriot, Henry Johnson, Simon Middleton, Hugh Squire, Francis Dorrington, John Roberts, Rainsford Waterhouse, Thomas Earsby, Joseph Radcliffe, James Supple, Richard Cooper.

Who being numbered, the clerk of the crown charged them with the indictment thus:

Cl. of Cr. Gentlemen, You of the jury that are sworn, hearken to your charge; you shall understand that the defendants stand indicted by the oaths of twelve honest and lawful men of the county of Middlesex, by the names of Thomas Knox of the parish of St. Margaret's,

Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, labourer, and John Lane of the same parish and county, labourer, for that whereas Edward Coleman, William Ireland, and John Grove, and other false traitors against our sovereign lord Charles 2. by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. to the jurors aforesaid unknown, the 24th day of April, in the 30th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king, at the parish of St. Margaret's, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, traitorously amongst themselves had conspired, consulted, and agreed, to bring and put to death and destruction our said sovereign lord the king, and war against our said sovereign lord the king within this kingdom of England to stir up, and the religion in the said kingdom of England, rightly and by the laws of the said kingdom established, to the superstition of the Romish church to change and alter, and the government of the said kingdom of England to subvert; for which their said most wicked treasons, and traitorous conspiracies, consultations, and agreements, the said Edward Coleman, William Ireland, and John Grove, in due manner and according to the laws of this kingdom of England, were afterwards attainted, and underwent the pain of death for the same. And whereas William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, John lord Bellasis, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, William lord Petre, and sir Henry Titchbourn, bart. the 30th day of November; in the 30th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king aforesaid, at the parish of St. Margaret's Westminster, aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, of the treasons aforesaid were lawfully accused, and thereupon, according to due form of law, were committed to the Tower of London, being the prison of our said sovereign Lord the king, there safely to be kept to answer for the treasons aforesaid; whereupon they the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, John lord Bellasis, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, and William lord Petre, were in parliament impeached by the Commons in the same parliament assembled. And whereas Thomas earl of Danby afterwards to wit the said 30th day of November, in the 30th year aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, of certain treasons and other misdemeanors was lawfully accused, and thereupon, according to due form of law, was committed to the said Tower of London; there to be safely kept to answer for the treasons and misdemeanors aforesaid, of which said treasons and misdemeanors he the said Thomas earl of Danby is impeached in parliament, by the Commons in the same parliament assembled, that they the said Thomas Knox and John Lane, well knowing the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, John lord Bellasis, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, William lord Petre, and Thomas earl of Danby, to be accused of the treasons and misdemeanors aforesaid; and they the said Thomas Knox and John Lane, being devilishly affected towards our said sovereign lord the king, their supreme and natural lord, and devising, and with all their strength intending the peace and tranquility of this kingdom of England to disturb, and to hinder and stifle the discovery of the said treasons, by the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, John lord Bellasis, Henry lord Arundel, and William lord Petre, as aforesaid supposed to be committed, and, as much as in them lay to elude the due course of law, and the prosecution of Justice against the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, John lord Bellasis, sir Henry Tichbourn, and Thomas earl of Danby to retard, they the said Thomas Knox and John Lane, afterwards, to wit, the 30th day of April, in the 31st year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously and unlawfully did consult and agree among themselves, Titus Oates clerk, and William Bedlow gentleman, who informations of the treasons aforesaid had given, and whom they the said Thomas Knox and John Lane, the day and year aforesaid, well knew to have given information of the treasons aforesaid against them the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, John lord Bellasis, Henry lord Arundel, and William lord Petre, to scandalize and upon the trial of the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, John lord Bellasis, Henry lord Arundel, and William lord Petre, to represent them to be persons of evil conversation, and witnesses not deserving credit. And that he the said Thomas Knox afterwards, to wit, the said 30th day of April, in the 31st year aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, in the names, and with the consent and agreement of the said John Lane, and one William Osborn, to disgrace the information, of the said Titus Oates and William Bedlow, against them the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, John lord Bellasis, and Henry lord Arundel, for our said sovereign lord the king, to be given, falsely, maliciously, subtilly, and advisedly, did write and cause to be written three letters, and those letters, so written, falsely, craftily, unlawfully, and advisedly, did direct and cause to be delivered to himself the said Thomas Knox, by which said letters falsely, craftily, and deceitfully, it was declared, That they the said John Lane and William Osborn were greatly troubled in their consciences by reason of certain things which they well knew, and had concealed concerning the unjust contrivances of the said Titus Oates and William Bedlow, in accusing the said Thomas earl of Danby, to be guilty of the treasons and other misdemeanors aforesaid, and that the said Titus Oates was a person of a wicked and vicious life, and made an assault upon the said John Lane, and with the said John Lane to commit that detestable sin called sodomy before that time had endeavoured. And that he the said Thomas Knox, the sooner and more effectually to persuade the said John Lane and William Osborn falsely to accuse the said Titus Oates and William Bedlow, that they the said Titus Oates and William Bedlow unjustly, and against all truth, had accused the said Thomas earl of Danby, of the treasons and other misdemeanors aforesaid, and so to affirm against the evidence of our said sovereign lord the king, upon the trial of the said Thomas earl of Danby, for the treasons and other misdemeanors aforesaid, to be had afterwards, to wit, the said 30th day of April, in the 31st year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, advisedly, corruptly, and against the duty of his allegiance, unlawfully gave to the said John Lane and William Osborn, divers great sums of money, and also further falsely, advisedly, corruptly, and against the duty of his allegiance, the day and year aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, did promise unto the said John Lane and William Osborn, that they the said John Lane and William Osborn, within a certain time, by the said Thomas Knox to the said John Lane and William Osborn propounded, divers other great sums of money, and other great rewards therefore should have and receive, against the duty of their allegiance, to the great retarding, obstructing and suppressing of justice, in manifest contempt of the laws of this kingdom of England, to the evil and pernicious example of all others in the like case offending, and against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. To this indictment, the said Thomas Knox and John Lane, by their attorney, pleaded that they are Not Guilty, nor either of them is Guilty of the offence aforesaid, and further withal put themselves upon the country, and the king's attorney likewise. And your charge is to enquire if they are Guilty or Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Make an O yes.

Crier. O yes ! if any one will give evidence on the behalf of our sovereign lord the king, against Thomas Knox and John Lane, of the misdemeanors and offence whereof they stand indicted, let them come forth and give their evidence.

Mr. Trenchard. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, Thomas Knox and John Lane stand indicted for a great and high misdemeanor, and the indictment sets forth, that whereas Coleman, Ireland, Pickering, and Grove, and other false traitors did conspire to destroy the king, and change the religion established by law, to levy war against our sovereign lord the king, and to introduce popery, and for these treasons were convicted, attainted, and executed ; and further sets forth, that the lord Powis, lord Arundel of Wardor, and others, were accused of the said treasons, and were committed to the Tower, and afterwards were impeached for the same by the Commons in parliament assembled ; as also that Thomas earl of Danby was impeached of high-treason and other misdemeanors ; that the defendants knowing Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow had given information of these treasons, to stifle the evidence, and to scandalize them, did falsely conspire to represent them as wicked persons, and men of no credit. And the indictment further sets forth, that the defendant Knox, with the agreement of Lane, and one Osborn, did cause several letters to be writ, in which it was contrived to accuse the said Oates and Bedlow, that they had conspired falsely to accuse the said earl of Danby, and that Oates was a person of a vicious conversation, and had a design to attempt an assault upon the person of the said Lane, with an intention to commit that detestable sin of sodomy ; the better to effect which wicked designs, the said Knox gave several sums of money to Osborn and Lane, and had offered great rewards unto them. To this indictment they have pleaded Not Guilty, and you are to try whether they are Guilty or Not, of this misdemeanor.

Then sir John Maynard, the king's eldest serjeant at law, pursued the charge thus :

Serj. Maynard. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury ; this cause is of great consequence ; and, my lord, I desire the jury to observe, that their question this day is not to enquire whether the lords or the other persons accused and impeached in parliament are Guilty or Not ; but the question before them, is, Whether the persons that stand here indicted, are guilty of wicked and vile endeavours to discountenance and suppress the evidence, and scandalize their persons, who were to give evidence against these lords ; we are not to give evidence against the lords, but against these persons.

L. C. J. (Sir Wm. Scroggs) You are right, brother.

Serj. Maynard. Gentlemen, something I must observe to you, that is an iuducement to this matter : that there hath been an horrid and abominable conspiracy against the king, the nation, the religion, and the law, appears (my lord) by the proceedings in parliament, wherein the Lords and the Commons have several times jointly declared so, and I think, it is so public that no body will doubt there is such a thing ; who is guilty, that is another matter.

L. C. J. This court must take notice of that, because some have been tried, convicted, and condemned for it by this court.

Serj. Maynard. Your lordship says right. But my lord, the first discovery of this conspiracy came from a single person, one that stood single and discouraged a long time, and that there were endeavours to discourage his further discovery, that will appear. My lord, when it stood so, it happened that sir Edmundbury Godfrey had taken his examination, and these things will be material in the end of the cause.

Sir E. Godfrey having taken the examination of Oates, then the endeavour was to suppress this examination that he had taken, and that by no less a wickedness than the barbarous murder of that honest gentleman, whom you all knew ; and they not only took away his life, but they did strive to baffle and defame him, when he was dead, and that will appear too, and is public and known. My lord, all this while stood Oates single ; it fell out by the mercy of God, that a further discovery was made by Bedlow, he was examined, and it is publicly known, and public justice hath gone upon it.—The next attempt was to corrupt the testimony of Bedlow with bribes and rewards, and by other ways ; and the person that transacted it, Reading, is attainted of it, ' Scelere tutandum est scelus,' when men have invented and designed any great wickedness, they are forced to enter upon others to cover and conceal the former. My lord, it proceeded now, and comes to that which will be the question this day. Having gone all these ways, now they return again, to see if they can disgrace and baffle the evidence Oates and Bedlow had given, and the way to that is by disparaging and scandalizing them with foul offences, especially Dr. Oates ; and that was thus, (as we shall prove to your lordship) Lane had been a servant with Oates, and the other was one of the like condition, and he was tampered with to accuse Dr. Oates of that horrid sin of sodomy, and I think if he were such an one, little credit were to be given to such a man. This was the design they were to accomplish. And we shall prove to you, in order to it, there were letters written (and contrived by Knox indeed) written by Osborn who is not now before you, but a contrivance of them all. And, my lord, there must be a pretence ; for in truth these persons had been examined, and had charged him with this offence, but upon further examination they had renounced their discovery.

L. C. J. Had they all given evidence ? Or who did ?

Serj. Maynard. No, my lord, pardon me, I am not speaking of their Evidence, but only of their Examination before the Lords.

L. C. J. What was it that was there witnessed?

Serj. Maynard. Then they pretended this matter, That they were touched in conscience, and now they repent, and must discover the truth for the truth's sake, that themselves were false in making of the charge, and this my lord, must be furthered with bribes and rewards, as we shall prove to you. We shall make out the particulars by witnesses, and then we think we may leave it to your lordship and the jury to determine. In truth, my lord, it happens in this case as it did long ago, when the first discovery was of a like design, and as is told by the historian; 'Multi ob stultitiam non putabant, multi ob ignorantiam non videbant, multi ob pravitatem non credebant, et non credendo conjunctionem adjuvabant.'

Attorney General (sir Cr. Levins). May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury! I am of counsel for the king in this cause, whose suit it is. The evidence hath been opened fully by Mr. Serjeant. I shall only say this, that this is a counter-part of Mr. Reading's Case, only it seems in this to differ, that the counter-part exceeds the original; for, I think, that it is of a further extent than his was. It hath been told you, by Mr. Serjeant, and, I know, the Court will tell you that it matters not whether those persons that are accused of the Plot, and impeached for it, were guilty or not, it is sufficient that they are accused, and that by these persons. For any body to endeavour to suppress and withdraw the king's evidence, or to disgrace the king's evidence, that is not lawful, be the crime what it will; but it is a much greater crime in a case of this nature of High-Treason, where the life of the king, the government of the kingdom, the religion, and the true worship of God established in it, and the laws of the nation are in danger. Some of these persons are guilty, for Mr. Coleman, and several others, have been found guilty, and have been executed for it.—The design in this case that lies before you, gentlemen, to try, was to throw a disparagement upon the testimony of those persons by whose evidence those traitors were principally attainted and executed. This is, gentlemen, to affront the justice of the nation, and indeed to cast a disparagement upon it; and that sure is as great an offence as can be; the matter of the evidence hath been opened to you, I shall only acquaint your lordship and the jury, that it hath been designed a great while, and so long designed, that one of the persons here accused, Mr. Lane, one of Oates's servants, had the opportunity to get into his master's secrets, thereby the more effectually to betray him, and as it will appear by witnesses, did carry on the design till it was discovered, and by that discovery prevented, as to any success.

Mr. Recorder (sir George Jefferies). Your lordship is pleased to observe in the indictment that is now to be tried, there are but two persons that stand indicted, that is Lane and Knox. I presume the gentlemen that are on the other side for each of the prisoners (for I perceive those that are for the one, are not for the other) may expect that there should be proof made of what is laid as inducement in the indictment, and will not tend immediately to that which will be the question in this case: for there is recited in the indictment the conviction of Coleman in this place, and others in other places, for the high-treason the evidence whereof these persons are indicted for scandalizing, we have here the Records ready to prove it.

L. C. J. I suppose they will admit that.

Recorder. If they will not, we have that which will prove it.

Mr. Withins. My lord, we shall not stand upon that.

Sol. General (sir Fr. Winnington.) We are ready, if you do.

Serj. Maynard. And you will admit that Dr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow were witnesses upon those trials?

Mr. Withins. Yes, and gave evidence very considerable.

Recorder. Then, my lord, we must hint to you, that Lane, who is one of the persons taken notice of in the indictment, was a servant to Dr. Oates; Knox was not in his service, but Knox is a man that made use of Lane as a handle to the matter he had designed; therefore letters are prepared, but by whom? That we shall give you an account of was by the direction of Knox, though the letters that will be produced, are directed to Knox himself.

L. C. J. Your indictment says so.

Recorder. But we shall give you an account, that he was director of those letters himself; but as your lordship may observe, there are not only letters, but some accusations or informations. We shall prove to your lordship whose hand-writing they were, and who dictated those informations: for I think that Mr. Knox is pretended to have the most brains; and I believe Mr. Knox, in the consequence, will appear to have the most malice. And we shall prove in the next place, that inasmuch as it would be natural in the course of justice to ask whether these persons should not have money for the reward of such a business; we shall prove that there were treaties with Mr. Lane, and one Mr. Osborn who is not indicted, (but was likewise a servant to Dr. Oates, and had thereby an opportunity of deceiving him) that they had meetings; how guineas have been cunningly dropped down, which was to prevent, as I was acquainting your lordship, any such question that should be asked, what monies and rewards they were to have for this great discovery of any wickedness that Mr. Oates should be guilty of. Mr. Knox, he prepares them in this manner. At every meeting, when they were discoursing and pursuing this business, then by some unlucky accident or other, Mr. Knox he is to drop a guinea or two, according as Mr. Lane and the other person had occasion, or a desire to have it; but none were to be given, but as by accident, as if Knox holding his guineas in his hand, or in some other accidental way should drop them; and then Osborn and Lane were to pick them up in a kind of a jest only, as if Knox had accidentally let them fall; and they had as accidentally taken them up. How this came to be discovered, we must give you an account. Matters being thus prepared by the instigation of Knox, and transacted so far by Lane and Osborn, they thought it then fit to put their design in execution. Accordingly their informations are produced before a justice of peace, who finding the matters were improbable, (for I think they had some scrutiny before the Justice of Peace, and before the Lords' Committees of the Lords' House) one of them, gentlemen, though now he is pleased to say he is Not Guilty, yet at that time had a little more ingenuity, and did confess the whole matter, and how he was drawn in, and how far he was concerned, and how Mr. Knox had directed him, and the money and rewards he had received, and that besides, divers other sums of money had been promised, and great rewards offered in case this design had taken effect. We shall call our witnesses before your lordship, and give in evidence the informations that they had intended to offer; and if we shall prove the matters that have been opened to you, I believe the consequence of this case will appear as much to concern the government, as any that hath come to this bar.

Sir Fr. Winnington. My lord, if your lordship please, we shall now go to prove our case; the question was asked whether they would admit the several attainders of those persons that have been executed for this Plot. I now ask them, whether they will admit the several impeachments that are also mentioned in the indictment, both of the five lords in the Tower, and also of the lord Danby.

Mr. Withins and Mr. Scroggs. Yes, we do.

Justice Pemberton. All that they will allow.

Recorder. Then we begin with Mr. Radford. [Who was sworn.]

Att. Gen. What is your name, Sir?

Radford. Robert Radford.

Att. Gen. Come on, Mr. Radford, tell my lord and the jury what you know concerning this business, about Lane and Knox.

Radford. Sir, if it please your honour, R. Lane, father of John Lane, was a yeoman of the guard extraordinary, and I am one of his majesty's yeomen of the guard. As he was in waiting, he was telling me a story—

L. C. J. Richard was?

Radford. Yes, Richard the father was telling me that Dr. Oates did attempt his son many times to do such and such things to him, that was in the way of buggery; said I, Richard I am ashamed of you, that you should cherish your son in such things as these are; so I went away in anger, and told him, That if he were my son, I would correct him severely for it; and said no more, knowing him to be a lying fellow; and all the whole guard know him to be a lying fellow, and that there is no truth in him.

L. C. J. All who?

Radford. All the guard; and that is all I can say.

Justice Jones. When was this?

Radford. Above a twelvemonth ago. And I knew that he was a lying man, and I durst not speak of it, because I knew he was so, and was afraid he would have put it upon me.

L. C. J. What, he told you that his son told him so?

Radford. No, he told me only that his son was weary of Dr. Oates's service; and I told him that he was come away once before, and why did he go again? He said his son could not be quiet.

L. C. J. Did he say his son told him? The question is plain: Did he speak it of himself, and not that his son told him?

Radford. He said only that he had attempted his son.

Att. Gen. My lord, we will call Thomas Allen. [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. What is this man's name.

Att. Gen. Mr. Allen, my lord. What do you know of any application to bring this Lane into Oates's service? Tell your whole knowledge of the matter.

Allen. My lord, about the month of Dec. last, when he was gone out of Dr. Oates's service—

L. C. J. Who was gone out of Dr. Oates's service?

Allen. Lane; he desired me to intercede for him again and again, and accordingly he was admitted into his service again.

Att. Gen. Did you hear any discourse before this, of any attempt upon him?

Allen. How attempt?

Att. Gen. Did you ever hear of any complaints made by Lane against Dr. Oates?

L. C. J. Did you ever hear Lane complain that his master would be uncivil with him?

Allen. No, I remember nothing of that.

Recorder. Now, if your lordship please, we shall give your lordship an account, that when he was admitted again, he bragged he should get a great sum of money; and for that we call Mr. Samuel Oates. [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. Are you brother to Mr. Oates?

S. Oates. Yes, Sir.

Att. Gen. What do you know of any sum that this Mr. Lane did pretend to get, and on what account?

S. Oates. My lord, about a matter of a fortnight before he went away from my brother, I was in the withdrawing room—

L. C. J. How long is it ago since he went away?

S. Oates. It was in April last, as near as I can remember.

L. C. J. Well, go on, Sir.

S. Oates. So there were several servants in the room, and they were talking and laughing together; and he was wishing, said he, I wish I had 1,000*l.*; said some of them to him, What would you do with it? Said he, I would take it and fling it upon the ground, and tumble in it; says one of them, You may wish long enough before you have it; I question not, says he, but ere long to find a way to get 1,000*l.*

Recorder. Do you hear him, gentlemen? This was a fortnight before he went away.

S. Oates. I can only speak as to Osborn, as to the thing itself.

Att. Gen. Did you ever hear him say which way he did intend to get this 1,000*l.*?

S. Oates. No, I do not remember that; but upon these scandalous things coming out, I was considering what he had said, and how he behaved himself in his service, and upon recollection, I did think of this saying of his.

Justice Pemberton. Aye, he recollected it afterwards.

Mr. Williams. Speak those words over again, as near as you can remember.

[Then Mr. S. Oates repeated his evidence to the same effect.]

Sir Fr. Winnington. What is that of Osborn that you can say?

L. C. J. What does that signify to these defendants?

Sir Fr. Winnington. Although he is not a party that does defend this matter; yet it is all one entire act that they three were in combination to corrupt the king's evidence, and to stifle it; and though so far as it does relate to Osborn, it will not convict him being absent; yet it will enlighten the king's evidence about the Conspiracy, for he is mentioned in the indictment.

L. C. J. Well, if you think it material, you may ask what questions you will about it.

S. Oates. I was asking Osborn, a little after he was let out of the Gate-House, how he came to repent himself—

L. C. J. Who had repented himself?

S. Oates. Osborn:

L. C. J. Had Osborn repeated himself, of what?

S. Oates. Of what he had given an account of before the committee.

Justice Pemberton. Do you know any thing of that?

S. Oates. I know nothing but what they did say upon their examination.

L. C. J. Were you by and present at their examination?

S. Oates. I heard nothing but what they said for themselves; I was at some part of their examination.

Justice Pemberton. What did Knox and Lane say?

S. Oates. Osborn was a saying, that as we walked, said he, in the cloisters of the Abbey; where he did dictate what we were to do.

L. C. J. This is no evidence. Shall what Osborn says at one time and apart from the rest, be any evidence here?

Recorder. No, my lord, we offer it only as an evidence of the general conspiracy.

L. C. J. Osborn is a telling how Knox and Lane and he did conspire and contrive this business; is this evidence against these defendants? I ask my brother Maynard.

Serj. Maynard. My lord, if this were single clearly, it were no evidence; but if it fall out in the evidence, that we shall prove Osborn, Knox and Lane were all in the conspiracy, though it is not direct evidence to convict the other, yet it will enlighten that evidence we give against them.

L. C. J. Why did you not make Osborn a party?

Serj. Maynard. He is laid in the indictment to join with them, but he is run away.

Justice Pemberton. My brother intends it thus, that the business is so interwoven between them all, that to make it be understood, it is necessary to bring in something about Osborn.

Mr. Sanders. I pray they may bring something against them first.

L. C. J. Ay, the counsel say very well on the other side; first prove some fact against Knox and Lane, and then prove what you will afterwards.

Serj. Maynard. It is an inducement to it: but I beseech you, in all cases that are capital, are not the king's counsel at liberty to prove circumstances as well as the substance?

L. C. J. The court will direct it is no evidence against the now defendants, unless you prove the fact upon them.

Serj. Maynard. Unless we do bring it down to Knox and Lane afterwards, that they were guilty, it will not be any evidence, I know.

Mr. Holt. If it be not evidence, we conceive with submission to your lordship, it ought not to be heard.

L. C. J. Prove something first, brother, against the defendants, and then urge this.

Recorder. They need not labour it on the other side. We agree it is no evidence against the defendants, but only circumstantial as of the general conspiracy.

L. C. J. But pray how can it be circumstantial evidence, and yet no evidence? prove the conspiracy, or it signifies nothing.

Serj. Maynard. If it be circumstantial to make good the evidence of the fact, it will be material for us to urge it.

L. C. J. But first prove the fact.

Recorder. We shall now prove, if your lordship please, that Knox, who is one of the persons indicted, hath made his applications to others that had relation to Dr. Oates, to endeavour to persuade them to pick out something or other against Dr. Oates. Call Thurston and Ray.

Serj. Maynard. My lord, we shall first go to the substance of the evidence, and then the circumstantial things will be material, which before were not material.

L. C. J. Now you go right, brother.

Serj. Maynard. We shall go this way, to shew that Lane and Osborn did accuse Dr.

Oates; and after they had accused him; they were convicted in their own consciences, and did confess they had falsely accused him, and afterward did repent of that repentance; and that Knox had an hand in all this.

L. C. J. I think you have not opened that clear enough; before whom was that accusation?

Serj. Maynard. Before the lords, and sir W. Waller.

Recorder. For they were in the Gatehouse, and there they sent for Sir W. Waller to come to them, and there did confess the matter to him; whom we desire may be sworn. [Which was done accordingly.]

Sir W. Waller. My Lord, upon the 29th of April, during the sessions of parliament, there was a committee of lords appointed for the taking instructions about this Plot: being there attending upon the lords, this complaint of Mr. Oates was brought before them, of the horrid abuse of two of his servants. And the lords were pleased to order Mr. Warcup and myself to take their examinations.

L. C. J. What two servants were they?

Sir W. Waller. They did belong to Dr. Oates.

L. C. J. What were their names?

Sir W. Waller. Osborn and Lane.

L. C. J. What found you upon their examination?

Sir W. Waller. Upon the examination of Osborn and Lane, I did find they did agree together to a tittle.

L. C. J. Then tell us Lane's evidence first. If they agreed in a tittle, tell it us what it was.

Sir W. Waller. My lord, Mr. Lane did confess this.

L. C. J. What, upon his oath?

Sir W. Waller. Yes, upon his oath, my lord.

L. C. J. To you?

Sir W. Waller. Yes, my lord, that he had been induced by Mr. Knox to betray his master, and for to swear several things against him which Knox had drawn up and dictated to him. He did not write them himself, but Osborn writ them, and he did sign them. There were four letters that were brought before us; there were three or four memorials, as they called them, three or four informations, which were those papers that they carried to Mr. Cheyney to Chelsea.

L. C. J. Who carried them?

Sir W. Waller. Knox took Osborn and Lane with him, and carried them thither, as Lane swore. And when they came thither, and he was acquainted with the business, he looked upon it as so foul and notorious a thing, that he would not meddle with it; but he advised them that they should go (because Knox pretended the lord of Danby was much concerned in it) to some other Justice of Peace, or some of the Privy-Council that were friends of my lord of Danby.

L. C. J. Knox advised this, did he?

Sir W. Waller. No, they said Mr. Cheyney did. They went afterwards (and they did all confess it) to Mr. Dewy, and Mr. Dewy gave them the same answer, that he could not meddle with it. And after this Mr. Knox went and took several lodgings for them, fearing that Dr. Oates would hunt after them; and one lodging, amongst others, was, I think, the Three Flower-de-luces in White-Friers. And afterwards they removed to a place in the paved alley betwixt Lincoln's-Inn Fields and Chancery-Lane. During which time, Knox did bid them stand firm to what they were to do, and they should not want for a considerable reward, and have wherewithal to maintain them with their footmen, and live very well. And, my Lord, Lane did confess this, that he brought Mr. Osborn to Knox first into the Painted Chamber, and made them acquainted there. And, my Lord, there is one thing that I omitted; Mr. Lane did confess to me, that Mr. Knox did, at the One Tun Tavern I think it was, drop a guinea upon the table, and said, I will not give it you, because now I can safely swear that I never gave you any money; but be sure you stand fast to these informations, and to what I have dictated to you, and you may be sure you shall be well rewarded for your pains. And he told them this more, 'My lord-treasurer would never have surrendered himself to the black-rod, unless you had promised to stand fast to this Evidence;' that was, to swear to what evidence he had dictated to them.

L. C. J. Did Lane produce the informations, and those things that Knox tempted him to swear?

Sir W. Waller. My Lord, they were produced before us.

L. C. J. What were they? What was the substance of them?

Sir W. Waller. One part was to swear that Mr. Bedlow should come to Mr. Oates, and say to him, That my lord of Danby should offer him a considerable sum of money to go beyond sea.

L. C. J. To whom?

Sir W. Waller. To Bedlow. And that was only considerable as relating to Mr. Bedlow in any part of the examination: but as to Mr. Oates, they were to accuse him of having a design of abusing his body; for he sent to me—

L. C. J. Who did?

Sir W. Waller. Lane sent twice. Upon his first examination he did seem to be very shy; but upon the second, he sent one Rix to me, one of the yeomen of the guard, to let me know that he was troubled in his conscience at what he had unjustly done in charging Mr. Oates, and that he was desirous to discharge his conscience of the burden that lay on it, and to wave his own reputation, that he might acquit the innocent.

L. C. J. Why, where was the villainy done that he repented of?

Sir W. Waller. My Lord, it was in reference to his swearing against Dr. Oates.

L. C. J. Where, before the Lords?

Sir W. Waller. He was brought that very morning before the Lords; but notice being come that the king was come in, and the house was sitting, he was remanded, and afterwards sent Rix to me, to tell me, he was sensible of the injury he had done to Dr. Oates, and would make a confession of all.

L. C. J. Where had he done him injury?

Sir W. Waller. In reference to those abuses that he had offered to swear, and I think had sworn, but before whom I don't know; I suppose you will have an account of that by and by.

L. C. J. So then this is the substance of what you say as to Mr. Oates, That Lane sent to you and shewed you several papers and informations against the credit of Oates and Bedlow, and told you that Knox did tempt him to justify this and swear it; and that he went with them to a Justice of Peace in order to do it, but he did not care to meddle with it, and bid them apply themselves elsewhere, and afterwards they came to you; and whether it was sworn or no, you cannot tell, but you say he did confess he had wronged Mr. Oates in those scandals that he would have put upon him; and that this was by Knox's advice and direction?

Sir W. Waller. But there is this thing further: He said truly that Mr. Oates would be something hasty and passionate, but that he was very religious, and was very constant in sending his servants to prayers; and that what he had accused him of, it was an abominable falshood, and was done by the instigation of Knox, who had encouraged him to it by the promises of a great reward.

Justice Pemberton. And it was he that told you of the dropping of the guinea, was it not?

Sir W. Waller. My Lord, he did confess that himself, but he said he lent it.

Sir F. Winnington. Pray did Lane confess to you from whom this money and reward was to be had? for he was not a person that was likely to bestow so much money of his own. Was it from any of the conspirators? Or from whom, that the reward, and this money should come, upon your oath?

Sir W. Waller. I have examined them many times as to that, but could never learn any thing.

Just. Pemberton. Sir W. Waller, was Knox ever before you?

Sir W. Waller. Yes, my lord, I took his examination, and it was only to excuse himself, that he received the letters from them, which they said they writ out of trouble of conscience, and would have him to take their examinations and to go along with them before a justice of peace.

L. C. J. That was Knox's defence; said he, they came to me, and I did not go to them, but they desired me to go along with them to a justice of peace.

Justice Pemberton. Did you let him know what they had said to you?

Sir W. Waller. No, my lord, I kept that private: But there was one thing very material. That morning we took Knox's Examination, we were so long about it, that we could not dispatch it in the forenoon, and therefore ordered Lane to be brought before us in the afternoon; and then did Knox write a note, and sent it up by a woman that was a nurse there in the prison, and there was a paper conveyed through the door to him to this purpose, 'We paid our—'

L. C. J. Who writ that note?

Sir W. Waller. Knox did, and confessed it to me.

L. C. J. To whom was it conveyed?

Sir W. Waller. To Mr. Osborn from Knox; and it was, 'We always paid our club'—

Mr. Sanders. How do you know it was from Knox?

Sir W. Waller. He confessed it.

Mr. Sanders. Did he shew it you?

Sir W. Waller. No, I did not see the note, but he confessed it.

Justice Pemberton. Pray Mr. Sanders do not interrupt them, they are in their evidence.

Serjeant Maynard. They must do that, for that is the best part of their defence for ought I know.

Sir W. Waller. The words, my lord, were these, 'We always club'd, and you paid two shillings at the Sugar-loaf. Tear this.'

L. C. J. Why what could this be?

Sir W. Waller. Why, I will tell you, my lord, it was upon this account, that he should not gain-say what he had confessed and agreed to, that so they might not be in two stories.

Serjeant Maynard. My lord, Osborn and Lane had formerly accused, and given some informations against Dr. Oates; afterwards you see what happened before sir W. Waller, they renounce what they had done, and then, my lord, was Knox imprisoned, and thereupon he writes this note, 'We always club'd together, and you paid two shillings at such a place.' The circumstances will come out by and by. They met at several places, and we shall prove that Knox bore their charges, and paid for them, though by this note he would make it, that they bore their own charges.

Justice Pemberton. The succeeding evidence will open it.

Sir W. Waller. My lord, here is one thing more that I had forgot: Lane did confess, that for the preventing of any discovery of this horrid fact, it was agreed among them, that if any one should make a discovery of it, the other two should murder him.

Sol. Gen. We desire that the jury may observe that.

Sir W. Waller. He did likewise declare, that the lords in the Tower would not be wanting to acknowledge the kindness in disparaging the king's evidence.

Justice Pemberton. That was Lane and Osborn did confess that?

Sir W. Waller. Yes, both Lane and Osborn swore it positively.

Sir Fr. Winnington. If you have done as to Lane, pray acquaint my lord and the jury what you know of the confession of Knox upon his examination.

Sir W. Waller. Knox confessed not any thing, but stood stiff to it, that the papers and letters were written by them, and contrived by them.

Justice Pemberton. And that what he did was at their request?

Sir W. Waller. Yes, but the rest did both confess, that what was done was wholly by the contrivance of Knox.

L. C. J. Did you ask Knox if he had dropped a guinea?

Sir W. Waller. My lord, he confessed he had dropped a guinea, but it was only to lend them, and they promised to repay him; and that one morning he dropped ten shillings upon the bed, and they took it up.

L. C. J. Knox said he only lent it?

Sir W. Waller. Yes, but they positively swore both the one and the other.

Justice Pemberton. What said Knox to that?

Sir W. Waller. He lent them only.

L. C. J. Well, go on, Sir.

Sir W. Waller. And Lane did positively confess, that at all the places, and the several lodgings, and the treats and entertainments they had been at, they were all at Knox's charge, except twice, which might amount to about eighteen pence, and that he paid.

L. C. J. What said Knox to it?

Sir W. Waller. He denied all.

Justice Pemberton. As to the manner of it, what said Knox to the dropping of it?

Sir W. Waller. He confessed he dropped it, but only lent it them.

Sir Fr. Winnington. You say Lane was a servant to Dr. Oates, pray whose servant was Knox?

Sir W. Waller. He did belong to my lord Danblane. And moreover, Mr. Knox did confess to me, that the papers so drawn up and delivered into his hands, had been in the custody of my lord Latimore for a long time.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Did he so, I hope the jury will believe him then.

L. C. J. Sir W. Waller does swear, that Knox confessed that all those scandals raised against Dr. Oates, had been by his hands delivered into the hands of my lord Latimore, and were there for some time.

Sir W. W. Yes, my lord.

Sir Fr. Winnington. I did not well hear you, Sir, one thing you were saying in the beginning of your evidence, that these gentlemen spoke of my lord of Danby's not surrendering himself, pray let us hear that over again.

Sir W. Waller. Mr. Lane said this, that my lord of Danby would not have surrendered himself to the Black-rod, but that he did depend upon their standing to what informations they had given in.

L. C. J. Upon your oath Lane did say this?

Sir W. Waller. Yes, my lord.

Serjeant Maynard. My lord, now we will call another justice of peace, that took their Examinations, and we shall then particularly apply ourselves to Mr. Knox, that seems to make these excuses for himself. Call Mr. Justice Warcup. [Who was sworn.]

Warcup. I must beg the favour of the court, because my memory is bad, that I may refer to the Informations that were taken before me.

Just. Pemberton. You may look upon them for the refreshment of your memory.

Warcup. I answer to every part of this that hath my hand to it, I desire it may be read.

Recorder. No, that can't be, you must not read them, but only refresh your memory by them.

Warcup. This John Lane did confess he liv'd with Dr. Oates, and about the 7th of April he left him, and while he lived with him, he said, he sent his servants daily to prayer in the morning to the chapel, and left but one at home to dress him, and whilst he was with Dr. Oates, he was never charged by his master with the opening of any letters, and that the informations marked 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5.—

Williams. Pray, sir, acquaint the court as far as you can by your memory.

Warcup. Lane, before me denied all that he had said, that is, that what he had said before the lords was true, but that particular examination before sir W. Waller was by him alone.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Was he upon oath before you?

Warcup. Yes I find he was.

L. C. J. Did you examine him after sir William Waller, or before?

Warcup. To the best of my remembrance it was before.

Just. Jones. He was upon his oath here too?

Warcup. Yes, and I must acquaint you I find it at the bottom to be (Jurat.) He was brought before the Lords of the Committee for Examinations, and did there likewise at first swear the things in these notes contained, and did afterwards come to the said committee, and beg their pardon, and God's pardon for what he had sworn, for it was false.

L. C. J. Who did it?

Warcup. Lane did.

L. C. J. Did you hear him?

Warcup. Yes.

Just. Jones. Was he upon his oath the last time, when he said this to the committee?

Sir W. Waller. Yes, my lord, I was by too, I heard him.

L. C. J. So he swears backwards and forwards.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Such people used to do so.

Warcup. That particular of the Note, that Mr. Knox sent up by the nurse, I was by and did hear him confess it.

Sir W. Waller. But he did declare there to the committee, that it was his voluntary repentance, and that he was exceeding sensible of the abuses he had offered to Dr. Oates, in this design of accusing him in such a manner.

Just. Jones. What, before the lords?

Sir W. Waller. Yes, my lord.

Warcup. Mr. Knox did say he sent such a Note up to Osborne, and the words were, as I remember, 'We always club'd and you paid 'two shillings at the Sugar-loaf, Tear this.'

L. C. J. Look you, the use I see that would be made of this, is that Knox in a secret way should give intimation to this Osborne, that he should not own that he had been treated by him, or any money spent upon him, and this Note is the cunning way of insinuating that matter, as I understand it.

Warcup. I shall humbly acquaint your lordship with one thing further; Knox did confess that he had lain with these people in several private places, for there were warrants out for the apprehending them, upon the information given by Dr. Oates of this contrivance, that he had lain with them at White-Friers. and Charing-cross, and at other places.

Just. Pemberton. That he had obscured them when they were in danger.

Warcup. That he had lain with them at that time.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Pray, upon your oath, when he had told you he had lain with them in any private lodging—

Just. Pemberton. Did he say he had advised them where to lie?

Warcup. He said he had been with them, and advised them where to lie.

Just. Pemberton. Did he say he had taken lodgings for them?

Warcup. Yes, he did.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Your question, sir, hath prevented mine; but I would ask him a question further. Did he confess to you he paid for those lodgings?

Warcup. Truly, my lord, unless I read the information, I cannot tell.

Sir W. Waller. My lord, I perfectly remember this, That Knox did confess he had paid for their lodgings, but they were to pay him again; but both Osborne and Lane did positively swear he did pay for all, and several times at several taverns where he treated them, he bid them call for what they would and they should have it.

Sol. Gen. What do you know of being at the Sugar-loaf at any time?

Warcup. I tell you what I find here he confessed, that they complaining they knew not where conveniently to lodge, this examining told them he would endeavour to find them a lodging, and the very self-same day, he went by the direction of one of my lord Dunblane's servants, a coachman, to the Sugar-loaf in White-friers, and took lodgings as for himself and two of his friends, and lay there with them to the time of his going from the same lodging, which was five or six days.

Just. Pemberton. And he did it by the direction of my lord Dunblane's coachman?

Warcup. Yes, my lord, it is so in the information.

Serj. Maynard. Is that information true?

Warcup. Yes, my lord, I am sure he said it, or I should not have writ it down.

L. C. J. Mr. Warcup, had Lane recanted what he had said against Mr. Oates at that time when the lodgings were taken?

Warcup. My lord, it was before they came to the lords that they took these lodgings.

Just. Pemberton. Ay that is clear, it was before all came out.

Warcup. I was commanded by the House of Peers to give my warrant for the apprehending of them.

L. C. J. The lords sent to apprehend them upon the slander of Mr. Oates, and then he concealed them.

Recorder. My lord, sir W. Waller speaks of one Rix that was sent by Lane to him to make a discovery, this is the gentleman. [Who was sworn.]

Rix. May it please your lordship, there was one Osborne that was concerned with this Lane, who is since run away: Osborne came first upon the guard to me, and desired me to get him into service. He desired to come into my lord-treasurer's service, and what he desired of me was to frame him a petition to my lord-treasurer. We had no answer till two days after, and I being upon the guard with Dr. Oates, I did suppose I might get him into his service, I spoke to Dr. Oates, and he entertained him; and after he had entertained him a while, this Lane then being a servant with him, they both told me they were a going off now from Mr. Oates.

L. C. J. Who told you?

Rix. Lane and Osborne, and that they should get preferment; they were sworn brothers together, if one did go, the other would go. I asked them why they would go away? Oh, said he, I shall keep my man myself. Say you so, said I, I have been in town so long, and I could get no such preferment. Then they told me they should have 100*l.* a year, and 500*l.* in money.

Justice Pemberton. Who told you so?

Rix. Osborne and Lane both.

Justice Pemberton. What, 100*l.* a year, and 500*l.* a-piece.

Rix. Yes: so I asked them how, but they would not tell me, but said Osborne to me, for your preferring me to Mr. Oates, you shall be no loser. I met him another time, for Osborne came to desire me to lend him a cravat. Said he, I must come down to your house to-morrow morning to get a cravat, I desire I may have a good one, for I am to go before one of the greatest peers of the realm to dine with him: where, said I, to which end of the town? The other end of the town, said he to me: but, said I, why do you leave Mr. Oates? Oh, said he, let Mr. Oates look to himself, for I have enough against him. Then I smelt something of some design against Dr. Oates, and brought it before justice Warcup, and gave in my testimony, and upon further inquiry into it, the Lords ordered him to send out his warrant for the taking of those fellows; Knox, Lane, and

Osborne, which he assigned over to me; in a short time after they were taken, first Lane was taken, and in a day or two Osborne and Knox, and were examined and taxed with it. Osborne he made a confession before justice Warcup, and they desired me to see Knox and Lane, in prison, and I did see them in prison, and when they did come there, Knox said, Where is Osborne, why do not he come to prison as well as I? I am a better gentleman than he. Oh, said I, he hath confessed; so he was turned up into the prison. Said I to Mr. Lane, will you drink a pot of beer? said he, I do not much care if I do; and said he, Mr. Rix, if I have not gone too far against myself, if you will stand my friend, I will make an honest confession. Said I, I am glad there is so much grace in you, I will then do you all the good I can. Pray, said he, will you please to go and call sir Wm. Waller? Why not justice Warcup, said I, who was first concerned in this discovery? No, he would have only sir Wm. Waller. I came and found him in the Court of Requests, so I went with him to Smith's the tobacconist near the gate, and sent for Lane; the keeper brought him: I think this was about nine or ten in the morning, and from that time till about six at night he was in examination. I then went to Mr. Oates, and told him Lane had made an honest confession. I waited on sir Wm. Waller till the afternoon, and then he made an order, that he having made an honest confession, should have the enlargement of the prison, and not be confined, as others were, which he had. Lane sent for me the next day, I came down in a day or two after, and his sister was there with him, they were eating butter and radishes, and when I would have paid for the drink, Lane cried, No, by no means; for Knox hath sent me in 23s. the other day, and that will serve me, I hope, till I come out: but now, said he, I have made a confession, I believe I shall have no more money from him; and I desire you would speak for my enlargement. I came down to him another time, and he told me he had received a note, which note was put up from a gentleman in the street. "That if he would stand firm to his text, he should have 500*l.*; nay he should not want 1,000*l.*; but in case they would not stand firm to their text, the Lord Treasurer would never have come in; and if yet they did not stand firm, he would lose his head."

L. C. J. Who came that note from?

Sir W. Waller. He told me this, That there was such word brought to him by the nurse, and she told him, That a gentleman very well clad came to her, and desired her to speak to him to stand fast, and that Osborne and Knox would be sure to stand fast, and that they two should be too strong for the other, he being but a single evidence; and more than that, he should not want 1,000*l.* if he had occasion for it. I asked the nurse what the gentleman's name was, she told me, she had asked, but she would not tell her.

L. C. J. Where is this woman, this nurse?

Sir W. Waller. She was nurse to the gaol, and was turned out upon this discovery by the gaoler.

Justice Pemberton. You had this from Lane, sir Wm. Waller?

Sir W. Waller. Yes.

Rix. My lord, after this was done, Lane's father and mother told me this at my own house, that had it not been upon their son's account, my lord Treasurer would never have come in; and they told me that one Hest should come and tell them so: and Lane himself told me, he thanked God that now he had made an honest confession, that now his heart was very light; he had a burden upon him before, but now he had confessed, and his heart was light.

L. C. J. What did he confess?

Rix. He did confess, That my lord Treasurer would never have surrendered himself if he had thought they would not have stood firm, and if they did not stand firm he should lose his head.

Mr. Williams. You say Lane confessed this as of himself.

Rix. Yes, and afterwards his father and mother told me so, and he did say as of himself, that he had a note put under the door.

L. C. J. But from whom had he that note?

Rix. From a gentlewoman in the street, he told me so.

Justice Pemberton. What did he say as to Knox?

Rix. He told me he was set on by Knox, and he drew up all the writings for him; and Knox told him, if you come to be examined at such or such a thing, make a stop, and turn this way and that way.

Mr. Williams. Pray acquaint the court and the jury, Did Lane tell you how he was drawn into this, and who drew him in?

Rix. Knox was the man that drew up the writings, and promised him those rewards, he said.

Justice Pemberton. You say he told you that Knox promised them? How far Knox will be concerned in this evidence, will be considered afterwards.

Serj. Maynard. Now we come to Knox's own particular actings. What hath been said already, hath been out of other people's mouths, now we come to him himself, and we call Richard Slightam [Who was sworn.]

Att. Gen. Pray, Mr. Slightam, will you tell my lord and the jury, what you know of this Knox, what offers have been made you, by whom, and when, and for what?

Slightam. I was offered money to carry notes from the one to the other.

Sol. Gen. Why, what office had you there?

Slightam. I was a prisoner there myself, and under-gaoler too, and I was offered money to carry notes between the one and the other, that they might not betray one another.

Recorder. By whom?

Slightam. By Knox.

L. C. J. What did they offer you ?

Slightam. I had three half-crowns given me at one time by Knox, and he promised me he would give me a considerable sum.

L. C. J. But he did not name the sum ?

Slightam. No.

L. C. J. What did he desire you to do for that money ?

Slightam. He desired me to carry notes from the one to the other, that they might not betray one another.

Att. Gen. Between whom ? Name them.

Slightam. Knox, Lane, and Osborne.

L. C. J. What did you say, that they might not betray one another ? Why ?

Slightam. Yes, that they might not betray one another, for they were fearful that they should, because they could not speak together, to lay their stories together.

Att. Gen. And hark you, Sir. What messages did you carry between them ?

Slightam. None, I never carried any.

L. C. J. No, what had you your money for ?

Slightam. I told them of it below, and they would not let me carry any.

L. C. J. But you got your money ?

Slightam. Yes, I got some money.

Att. Gen. Knox you say gave you the three half-crowns. Did you speak with Lane and Osborne ?

Slightam. Lane I spoke with every day, and Lane said, he hoped that the lords would not put him in the pillory, for all he had sworn falsely.

L. C. J. What lords ?

Slightam. My lord Shaftesbury, and my Lord Privy Seal.

Mr. Smith. What did Knox say to you after Osborne had confessed ?

Slightam. That is nothing, said he, if we do but stand firm together, what Osborne hath given in evidence will signify nothing.

Mr. Smith. Why ?

Slightam. For two, he said, were better than one.

Sir Fr. Winnington. I think you say you had three half-crowns given you by Knox, pray who was the first that offered you money to carry the notes ?

Slightam. It was Knox.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Aye, he carried the purse.

Slightam. Yes, I suppose he did.

Justice Jones. They were both in the Gatehouse, prisoners at that time.

Slightam. Yes, so was I. But they were locked in several rooms, and none could come at them.

L. C. J. But you carried no note nor messages, upon your oath ?

Slightam. No.

Mr. Williams. Pray call Mr. Dewy. [Who was sworn.] Pray, Mr. Dewy, will you acquaint the Court and the Jury, what discourse you had with Knox, who he came from, what he came about, and what recommendations he brought with him, and from whom ?

Dewy. My lord, some time in the sitting of the last parliament that began in March, about ten o'clock at night a message was sent in to me that one would speak with me from my lord Latimer : I was either in bed, or going to bed ; and I did not think there was really any such message, because my lord Latimer did not know me, nor I him. They were very pressing to come in, inasmuch as my man could hardly keep them out. I told them there was nothing sure of so much haste, but what might be done to-morrow, or some other time : So I spoke not with them that night. Either the next day, or some short time after, as I remember, Mr. Knox came to me with another gentleman, and he brought papers in his hands ready written ; he told me that they were informations of one Lane and Osborne (as I remember those were the names he mentioned then and they were against Mr. Oates. Then I began to look upon it as something extraordinary, the parliament being then sitting, and the committee of each House having the examination of this business. Said I, Mr. Knox, you have been a justice of peace's clerk (for I knew him so) and you know it is very unusual to take informations against a person without the party's being present, if he may be had ; to cross-examine the witnesses upon interrogatories, as the case may be : And besides this looks as if it were to take informations against the king : which we never do upon oath. So I dismissed them, and directed them to the committee of secrecy of the House of Commons, for whom it was most proper. This is all I know of this business.

Mr. Williams. Did Mr. Knox tell you any thing that was contained in those examinations ?

Dewy. Yes, he did give me some information, that Osborne and Lane did repent of something, but I can't give you information particularly.

Mr. Williams. Pray tell the substance of it.

Dewy. I can't remember what the particulars were, but Lane and Osborne were the parties to be examined, and I shifted them off as well as I could.

L. C. J. Did they come along with Knox ?

Dewy. They were not in my room, but they were without, I believe.

L. C. J. And did he tell you at the same time that they had recanted ?

Dewy. Truly, my lord, I can't well remember ; but he said they repented of what they had falsely accused my Lord Treasurer of.

L. C. J. Did they say they had falsely accused Mr. Oates ?

Dewy. No, they did charge Mr. Oates with some crime ; and they did speak something of false accusing, I can't remember what.

L. C. J. Did not they say, Mr. Oates ?

Dewy. I remember it now ; it was as if Mr. Bedlow and Mr. Oates had made a conspiracy against my lord of Danby.

Sir Fr. Winnington. I think you say, you knew Mr. Knox a justice of peace's clerk :

Pray, Sir, you are an ingenuous man, from whom did he pretend to come to you?

Dewy. He came to me from my lord Latimer, as he said.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Did he say so, that the lord Latimer wished him to go to you?

Dewy. Yes; and I wondered at it, because I did not know my lord, nor my lord me.

Mr. Withins. When was this?

Dewy. It was the latter end of April or the beginning of May, as I take it; I do not very well remember: but the substance of it I remember was, that they had overheard Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow conspiring against my lord of Danby.

L. C. J. Mr. Dewy, can you remember whether they did come to give you information against Mr. Oates for abusing their bodies, or Oates and Bedlow's conspiracy against the earl of Danby?

Dewy. Truly, my lord, I can't be positive in it; for the parliament was then sitting, and I shifted them off.

Justice Pemberton. You never looked into the information at all?

Dewy. No, I did not, I thought it not proper for me.

Recorder. Call Henry Wiggins and his mother. [Who were both sworn.]

Att. Gen. Come on, Mr. Wiggins, what do you know of any endeavours of Knox or Lane, or any of these persons, to take off or scandalise Mr. Oates's or Mr. Bedlow's testimony?

L. C. J. What is this man's name?

Att. Gen. Henry Wiggins.

Wiggins. About the latter end of February last, Mr. Knox and I met at Charing Cross, and we went in and drank together; and he proposed several things to me; first he desired that I would get for him a copy of the papers my master had.

L. C. J. Who is your master?

Wiggins. Mr. Bedlow. And especially what concerned my Lord Treasurer; as also to take a journal of all my master's actions; and the names of the persons that came to him; for, said he, my lord hears that my lord of Shaftesbury and the duke of Buckingham do cabal with him against my lord. But if my lord could but find out his enemies, he would oppose them, and strive to baffle them. My lord, to encourage me to this, he told me he would carry me to his lord, though it were at midnight, to discourse with him.

L. C. J. What lord?

Wiggins. My Lord Treasurer: And he said he should give me encouragement to go on. Said I, Does my lord know of this? Yes, said he, I told my lord I had a friend lived with Mr. Bedlow, and he gave me encouragement to go on and treat with him. And he said moreover, my lord, Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow were two great rogues; that the king believed not a word they said; and as soon as he had heard all they could say, they should be hanged.

Mr. Williams. Pray did he propose any reward to you?

Wiggins. He told me his lord should give me encouragement.

L. C. J. What should you do?

Wiggins. He desired me to give my lord the papers, and then my lord should tell me what I should do about my master.

Sir Fr. Winnington. What did he say of Oates and Bedlow, Sir?

Wiggins. He said, That Oates and Bedlow were great rogues, and that the king knew them to be so; and when he had heard what they could say, he would hang them.

Mr. Williams. Pray upon your oath, did he offer you any money, or any reward?

Wiggins. He offered me not any particular sum, but he told me I should have satisfaction and reward, or any place in my lord's disposal I should be entertained into, if I went away upon this business.

Mr. Williams. Did he say any thing to you to invite you, or encourage you to swear against your master?

Wiggins. No, But he told me my lord should give me directions how to go on.

Recorder. What say you as to Lane and Osborne?

Wiggins. I did not know them at that time.

Recorder. What time after was it that you did know them?

Wiggins. I met with them a little while after, and they were discouraging all together, but I had no discourse with them.

Recorder. Did Knox at any time speak to you, to bring him into the company of Lane and Osborne?

Wiggins. No, Sir.

Recorder. This was the first time you met with him about this matter?

Wiggins. Yes, it was.

L. C. J. What did you promise Knox you would do?

Wiggins. I told him I would do him any service that lay in my power, but nothing that would be to my master's prejudice; and I was appointed by him to meet him at my Lord-Treasurer's.

L. C. J. And what other meetings had you besides?

Wiggins. I was but twice with him.

L. C. J. You never agreed to any thing?

Wiggins. I told it my master, and it was discovered soon after, so that the Lords came to hear it.

Att. Gen. Where is Mrs. Wiggins? What do you know of any endeavours to corrupt this evidence?

Mrs. Wiggins. I know no more than what my son knows; he first came to my house.

L. C. J. Who?

Mrs. Wiggins. Mr. Knox; and asking me where my son was, I told him he lived with Mr. Bedlow: and he said, he very much rejoiced at it, and desired to speak with him. I told him, No, he could not, for his master had so much employment for him, that it was very seldom I myself could get a sight of him. Said he, I have a little concern with him; and he living with Mr. Bedlow, may do my Lord-Treasurer great service, and doing my Lord-Treasurer service, he does his majesty service; for his majesty loves my Lord-Treasurer above all things in the world. And he would not be contradicted but he would see him. Then the next day I told him he should come, and we appointed to go to him, but he should not see him alone without me, I told him; he told me he desired it not. He came according to the appointment, and I carried him to Charing-Cross to an alehouse, and there sent a porter for my son, and he came: and the first thing he said to him, was, I am mighty joyful to know you live with Mr. Bedlow; you may do my lord great service: In what? says my son. In letting my lord know what company your master keeps, what lords they are that doily and hourly keep company with your master, and cabal against my lord. Said I, Mr. Knox, that is the way to bring my son's neck to the stake; that he shall never do. But, says he, I will tell him a way how he shall do himself no harm at all: and then he up and told him, he desired him to write him letters when he found any thing of secrecy and set no name to it; and if he came at twelve o'clock at night, he would let him into my Lord Treasurer's, and nobody should take notice of it: and he would have had him taken a coach to have gone to my lady Danby presently, to have an assurance from her mouth of encouragement, and that he should have any place in her lord's disposal.

L. C. J. Were you ever with my Lady Danby?

Mrs. Wiggins. No, we denied it; and it was discovered. And besides, my lord, I told him if he would lay down my son 1,000*l.* he should not do it; he should not betray his trust. And then he said, that the king knew Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow to be two great rogues; and when he had got what he could out of them, he would hang them.

Mr. Williams. Have you had any offers of late not to come here as a witness in this case?

Mrs. Wiggins. No, my Lord, but there have been persons three times at my house to know whether I were subpoenaed, yea, or no, as from Mr. Knox.

Mr. Williams. Did ever any body persuade you not to come to give evidence?

Mrs. Wiggins. No.

L. C. J. When was this you speak of?

Mrs. Wiggins. In February, the latter end.

Serj. Maynard. Mr. Dewy, who came in company with Mr. Knox to you?

Dewy. One Mr. Blyden.

Serj. Maynard. Who is that?

Dewy. Steward to my Lord of Danby I think.

Serj. Maynard. Here is Slightam again, my lord.

Att. Gen. What have you to say more?

Slightam. Mr. Lane told me they had many treats, and had had so much money, a guinea as I think he told me, to swear against Mr. Oates.

L. C. J. Who gave it him?

Slightam. Mr. Osborne, or Mr. Knox I can't tell which.

L. C. J. Where did Lane tell you so?

Slightam. In prison.

L. C. J. In what prison?

Slightam. In the Gate-house.

Mr. Williams. Call Mr. Palmer. Who was sworn. We call him to corroborate what that young man Wiggins hath said.

Palmer. What he hath told here, he discovered first to me, and I discovered to his master, that Mr. Knox would have had him to take a journal of his master's actions, and to give it him every day. My lord, I am one of the yeomen of the guard, and I waited upon Mr. Bedlow, and he desired me to help him to a clerk: and I helped him to Wiggins, this young man. He had not been there three weeks, or a very little time, when Knox came to him to tempt him; and being a stranger to his master he knew not how to discover it to him, and told me, such a thing is offered to me, but I am a stranger to my master, and I know not how to break it to him.

L. C. J. The use you make of this, is no more, but only to corroborate what he hath said, that he told it him while it was fresh, and that it is no new matter of his invention now.

Mr. Recorder. It is very right, my lord, that is the use we make of it. Call Thomas Dangerfield. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Williams. Pray, sir, give an account what you know concerning Mr. Knox and Mr. Lane, and what designs they have had against Mr. Oates, and who supported them and maintained them in it.

Dangerfield. My lord, all that I have to say in this case, is this: I do think it was in the month of June I was at my lord Castlemain's, and he asked me, if I had been employed in a business of Knox and Lane, that were prisoners at the Gate-house: I told him, Not. His lordship then wrote a letter to my lady Powis, and desired I might be employed in it. And she did tell me that it was a thing of material consequence, and that I should be furnished with money for the getting of Knox and Lane out. I took all opportunities for the doing of it that were necessary. I went to the Gate-house, made enquiry after Lane, and took care with his mother to relieve him, for I heard he was in an indigent condition at that time.

L. C. J. Did you give his mother the money?

Dangerfield. Yes my lord, 20*s.* and I had that money from Mrs. Cellier by my lady Powis's order. After that time there was one Mrs. Airy, who used to carry money to the Catholics in prison, she said that it was possible, as she had been informed from some of the priests in the Gate-house that some things might be had under the hands of Knox and Lane that would be very material against Mr. Oates: she said, she had been informed so. I then desired that Mrs. Airy, that pen and ink might be conveyed to them, that they might have the convenience of giving it under their hands, which she promised.

and they did convey pen and ink under the door to this Mr. Lane.

L. C. J. How do you know that?

Dangerfield. As Mrs. Airy told me. Then she came again, and withal told me, that it was Mr. Knox's desire that Lane should do something to signify to him, or satisfy him that he did stand fast; then Lane wrote a little note, and that note was to this effect. "I will die before I will comply with that villain Oates; and if any good people will do me the kindness to get me my liberty, I will do the Catholics the greatest service imaginable in discovering what I know about Mr. Oates. This I now write from the bottom of my heart, and shall die in it. So help me God."

L. C. J. How came you by the note?

Dangerfield. This note was written by Lane's own hand, and given from under the door to one Mr. Parsons a priest in the Gatehouse. This Parsons gave the note to Mrs. Airy, and she gave it to me.

L. C. J. Do you know Lane's hand?

Dangerfield. Yes, very well, as I shall shew you anon.

L. C. J. What became of the note?

Dangerfield. My lord, I do not know what became of the note, for the countess of Powis had it afterwards.

L. C. J. Do you believe it was of Lane's own writing?

Dangerfield. I am very well satisfied of it, my lord, according to the judgment I am capable to give of hands; indeed I was not acquainted with his hand then, but that was the first, to my knowledge, that ever I saw of it; but after I having parted with the note, and seeing some of his hand writing, upon recollection I can say I believe it was his own hand.

L. C. J. Did you ever see the note again?

Dangerfield. Never afterwards. And then my lord, my lady Powis was exceeding glad upon the hearing of it, and, as I was informed of it afterwards, she was the greatest part of the following day upon her knees giving God thanks for the great advantage and strength that was come to their cause.

L. C. J. What! for having a villain to come over, to her side that swore backwards and forwards?

Dangerfield. Afterwards I received money several times, and gave his mother more to furnish and relieve him. And several times afterwards I received money from Mrs. Celler by order of my lady Powis, for the doing of Lane's business, that is, for his liberty; and I had the papers from one Lawson an attorney that had been employed in the same business before: and, as I was informed by him, a motion or two was made at this bar for their liberty, but however he began to despair of it, and I was to undertake it; but withal he said, he was glad he was rid of it, for he had been often employed in the business of the Catholics, and it had impaired his credit very much, and very freely delivered the papers to me, which indeed were not many. After that, my lord, I retained

Mr. Sanders, as I think it was he, but there was a motion about it, and with great difficulty I did get Lane out upon common bail; and when I had done so, according to my lady Powis's order, I brought him to Powis-house; and then my lady Powis ordered, that he should go by the name of Johnson; because if any of the servants should talk of one Lane being in the house, it might come to Oates's ear, the house might be searched, and if he were found there, it might be prejudicial to the lords, and all their business. And then, my lord, Mr. Wood came a little after with the same command from his lord, and he had some order.

L. C. J. Who is Wood?

Dangerfield. That Wood is my lady Powis's gentleman; And he came and ordered that my lady Powis gave particular command to the porter of the house, in my hearing, that he should give order to all the servants, to have a particular eye and care that he did not go from the house, for they were very dubious of him, having made so many equivocations before; for they feared Mr. Oates might find him, or he might go voluntarily and make a discovery of himself, and so contradict all he had given an account of there. For, my lord, before this, as soon as ever Lane was gone out, they were very desirous to have what he had to say put in writing; but they had not opportunity then, but we let it alone to some other time. Then, my lord, soon after, about three weeks or a month after; I cannot be positive in the time, because I had a great deal of business upon my hands; but I suppose it was about three weeks or a month after, my lord Powis sent for me to the Tower, and told me he was informed that Mr. Oates was then making search after Lane, and if he found him at his house, it would be very prejudicial to their business; and he desired me to take care, and to send him out of the way, that Mr. Oates might not find him; which I did; and thinking of several places, I could not find any so convenient as Grays in Essex, by the waterside. I came to Lane, and told him that he should be furnished with money and necessaries for his journey, and in order to it, that very day I took him and gave him a pair of shoes and 10s. in his pocket, and sent him to Grays. I received two letters afterwards from this Lane, by which letters I am very well satisfied, that that note that he wrote before, that was given under the door, was his hand. So then I received a third letter (I think) my lord, and in the letter he told me that some person of Mr. Oates's acquaintance had been in that town and seen him, and he thought it was not material that he staid any longer there, and desired to be removed. So then I shewed my lady Powis the letter, and I suppose my lord Powis had an account of it also; but I cannot be positive in that, but I had order to remove Lane, and by my lady Powis's means I sent down one on horseback, and he discharged some debts Lane had contracted in the house, and sent him away to London; and after his return to London he continued three days more at my lord Powis's house; at which time, he says, he was forced to lie upon the chairs, for at that time were the St. Omers's witnesses removed from Mrs. Celier's, because they were afraid of being taken up by sir W. Waller, who was in search for them. So having some other business, I did not send him away presently, but I had particular order to send Lane into some other place; and I did advise with Mrs. Celier where to send him, and she said, I think it will be necessary to send him to Peterley, at one Mr. Waite's house in Buckinghamshire; for, said she, they are catholics, and will be sure to take a particular care of him: But I told her it would be too far, and I would think of some place nearer; and then I thought it would be necessary to send him to Tottenham, to the White-Hart; and there he stayed, I suppose, 4 or 5 days, or a week. This was after the trial of the 5 Jesuits, as I remember. My lord Powis sent to me, and told me; says he, I am in several doubts about this Lane, and if it should be known that he is coantenanced by me, or any of our people, it would not be well; so I leave him wholly to you, do what you will with him; but I advise you to send for him up to town, and give him 10s. a week to live upon. So when I was at leisure I sent for him again from Tottenham, and I told him; Mr. Lane, it will be very necessary that you do take some care for a livelihood about town; it is not safe nor advisable for you to be about Powis-house; and at that time I took care he should come there no more, and that if my lord Powis's servants should meet him, they should take no notice of him; which they did perform, I suppose, and as I was told. But before this, and before I sent Lane into the country the second time, as near as I can remember, Knox was at liberty. I had been endeavouring, as soon as I had got Lane out of the Gate-House, to get Knox out also; but I found I could not; and I left that. But I have been informed by Mr. Knox himself, that one Mr. Nevil, alias Paine, was furnished with money from the lords in the Tower, for the getting of Knox's liberty; and this Nevil himself did say, as Mr. Knox told me, that he did it by their order; and from this Knox, by Mrs. Celier's persuasion, I received several papers, which were informations against Oates; or at least, those papers that they had drawn up before they were in custody. These papers were sent by me to the Tower, and from thence to Mr. Nevil to enlarge upon, I suppose, as he thought fit; and after to my lord Castlemain, and afterwards they were sent to me by Mrs. Celier, who ordered me to draw up an affidavit according to those directions, and get Lane sworn to the same; which I did, and took Lane, and asked him, said I, Mr. Lane, here is an affidavit, can you swear it? Yes, said he, I can swear it, before I read it to him.

L. C. J. I believe so.

Dangerfield. Nay, said I, you know not what it is; so I read it to him; said I, Do you know this to be a truth? Yes, said he, I do know it to be all true: Said I, I will read it again to you, because you are to make oath of it, and I would not have you do any thing but what is safe; and then we went to sir James Butler, but he was not at home then, to have it sworn.

L. C. J. What was the purport of that affidavit?

Dangerfield. My lord, I cannot well remember the words, but it was about accusing Mr. Oates of Sodomy.

L. C. J. On whom?

Dangerfield. It was for attempting buggery on the body of this Lane.

L. C. J. That was the substance of it?

Dangerfield. Yes, my lord: And I did take this Lane to sir James Butler, and he did make affidavit that it was true: And it was left there before sir James Butler. I suppose the affidavit may be in court, or a copy of it. So, my lord, after that Lane being gone from Powis-house, and I having no manner of converse with him more; but only that every Saturday I took care he should have his money; sometimes I went to his mother's lodgings, and left it there for him; sometimes he would come to me for it. After this we were removed from Powis-house to Mrs. Celier's, but he was always certain of 10s. a week. Sometimes he would pretend that it was too little for him to live upon; and sometimes I would give him two, or three, or four shillings more of myself; but I had no order to do that from any body. This is all, my lord, I do know of Lane, as I remember.

Just. Jones. What do you know of Knox?

Mr. Dangerfield. Knox first delivered to me those papers that were sent first first to the Tower, afterwards to Nevil, and afterwards to my lord Castlemain, and re-delivered to me; and I did deliver them again to Knox, after they were enlarged upon: And I believe, after that, Knox had prevailed with Lane to write them in his own hand.

L. C. J. Why do you believe so?

Dangerfield. Because being writ in a fair hand, Knox told me when the papers were delivered, These are the main things that I am to work by, and these must be produced against Oates, and be writ over in a fairer hand; and by that, I believe he prevailed with Lane to write it in his own hand.

L. C. J. Whose hand were they in?

Dangerfield. It was a strange hand I knew not, and I do not believe it was Knox's hand, though indeed I cannot tell, I know it not.

Justice Jones. Did Knox ask you who had the perusal of those papers? And who had made additions to them?

Dangerfield. No; he took the papers, and took no notice of any addition or enlargement.

Justice Pemberton. Pray, Sir, tell the manner of the delivering of those papers.

Dangerfield. First, by Mrs. Celier's persuasion, Knox delivered me the papers which imported the whole matter of the charge against Mr. Oates. Those I sent to the Tower by Mrs.

Celier's hands; from thence they were sent to Nevil to be enlarged upon; from thence to my lord Castlemain, who was also to enlarge upon them; and from thence they were sent to Mrs. Celier again, and from her delivered to me, and I delivered them to Knox again. I found by his discourse, and every thing else, that Mr. Knox was desirous of my correspondence, but yet seemed as if he were shy of any body's taking notice of it. Said I to Mr. Knox, there is one Mrs. Downing that lives at Lambeth over the water, where Mr. Oates and Dr. Tongue, and several other persons used to meet, where I had been informed by some of the Catholics, by Parsons, my lady Powis, and several others, that Mr. Oates, Dr. Tongue, my lord of Danby, and others, did meet at the alms-houses there, where the Plot was contrived and furnished, for they pretended to me there was no such thing really. So, said I, if you will go with me, we will discourse with her about the matter, for I heard she talked very freely in several matters nearly concerning Mr. Oates, and my lord of Danby, and other persons. So, as I said, I told him, if you will go along with me, I have not been there yet, I will go and discourse with her, and put down what she says in writing. Then Mr. Knox, my brother, and myself, did go over to this Mrs. Downing, and had much discourse with her, where she did repeat many transactions that were very agreeable to the story that I had received from my lady Powis, and several other persons before. Knox did seem to be very well satisfied about it; and promised to take cognizance of it, and said, it was very material; but we did not put it down in writing. I did not, I know not what he did afterwards. We promised to come again another time, but I do not remember we did ever go afterwards. But Mr. Knox solicited me to go with him, and some business or other did still intervene. That is all that is remarkable of Mr. Knox, which I do remember at that time. But I do remember that after we were removed from Powis House, when I was at Mrs. Celier's, nay, I think both before and after, he was often treating with Mrs. Celier; but I know not what was their discourse, nor was I desirous to know. But Mr. Knox came then to me, and began to renew his correspondence; and withal told me, that he had some likelihood of bringing Osborne over to their party. Said he, I find he is gone again to his master, but he shall do his business (meaning, as I suppose, Mr. Oates) for he had, as I understood by him at that time, been tampering with Osborne, but he did tell me it was Osborne's voluntary act, that he did own it, and that he did go to Mr. Oates again only to do Mr. Knox service. My lord, some time after this, Knox came to me at Mrs. Celier's, and told me he had done the business; expressing the greatest joy that could be. What business, said I? Osborne is come over, said he, and I have had an account from the beginning to the end of all the transactions of his master Oates; and I have not only an account of it, but it is put into writing; and I took Osborne before a justice of peace, and he has made affidavit of it. When I heard this, I thought it would give great satisfaction to the lords in the Tower, and desired Mr. Knox to let me have a copy of that affidavit. He told me, No, he thought it would not be material to let me have a copy, for by that means it might become public, and be discovered. And, said he, I have some further design in this; Mr. Oates is going down to my lord Lovelace's in Oxfordshire, and Osborne is going with him, and he hath promised me to be a spy upon his master's actions, and to give me an account of all. And this will be material; but I do not think fit to let you have a copy of the affidavit at present. Some time after this, I told Mrs. Celier the story, who I suppose went to the Tower, and gave the lords an account of it. And the next time I had the honour to see my lady Powis, she was pleased to say, she liked it very well, but did not as I remember, say any thing of the copy; but being desirous to see what Osborne had sworn, and whether it were agreeable to Lane's affidavit, that I spake of before, I did desire Knox to let me see it, but he had it not about him at that time. Some time after that, as near as I can remember, I was at Proctor's Coffee-house at Charing-Cross, and Mr. Knox came thither, whether by my appointment or his, I cannot well tell; but there we met, and one Bedford was with me. At that same time Mr. Knox desired we would go into a back-room; and now, said he, I will give you satisfaction, and drew out of his pocket an affidavit; it was a sheet of paper, if not written of every side, I believe of three sides; it was very long; and he read it, my lord, and I did find by the contents of it, that it did imply the same thing that Lane had sworn before sir James Butler; that is, That Mr. Oates should attempt upon Lane's body, to commit Sodomy, or something very agreeable to it. I told him, Mr. Knox, said I, this is very material, this will do you a great deal of service. The term is coming on, you will do well to get an indictment drawn up against Mr. Oates. Said he, I will do his business, and will advise with persons able to instruct me in it; and I don't doubt but to carry on the business effectually. And to that purpose I desired him to let me have a copy of the affidavit; he promised me I should, and said he would bring it several times; and he came several times to my lodging, but did not bring it; but I having it read to me, and remembering the contents of it, the next time I saw my lady Powis, I gave her an account of it. Said she, this man is very diligent, and deserves to be encouraged; and, as I believe, gave the lords in the Tower an account of it too; for then she was lodged at the Tower with her lord, and so her ladyship told me. And, said she, do you know whether this man be in a condition to prosecute this business against Mr. Oates? Said she, I believe he is put upon this by my lord of Danby, and he, I believe, takes care of him to furnish him with money. Said I, I have endeavoured to trace him out in that thing, and by all his correspondents I could never find, but only by one, that Mr. Knox was ever acquainted or held correspondence with my lord of Danby, and that person is Mr. Netterville, who is a worthy gentleman of my acquaintance in the Pall-mall; and being in his chamber, Knox came in, and speaking merrily after his manner to him, said he, Knox, when were you at the Tower with my lord of Danby? Said he, I hold no correspondence with him. Yes, said Mr. Netterville, it is plain you do; and I believe a friend of mine saw you go in the other day: But Knox did positively deny it; that was all that ever I heard of his correspondence with my lord of Danby. After this, when her ladyship came to me to ask me what condition he was in to prosecute the trial; I told her, I believed his condition was very mean, and it would be very acceptable, if he might or could be furnished with money. Well, said she, I will take care of it, and give an account of it to my lord, and he shall be furnished. And in the mean time, if Mr. Knox wants money, be sure you take care and furnish him; but you need not let it be very considerable, till you see what is raised. Some time after this, Mr. Knox came to Mrs. Celier's house to ask for me, I was then in my chamber, but not ready; he came up to me, and told me, said he, Really I am very poor, I am going to pawn my sword; or something to that purpose; Can you lend me 5*l*. Really, Mr. Knox, said I, I will tell you, the affidavit that you read to me, I have given an account of it to my lady Powis, and I suppose some other persons of honour have had an account of it also; I am satisfied they are; and that the lords in the Tower will take care that money shall be raised for your prosecuting of Mr. Oates. He seemed to smile at this; But said he, if this should be known, it would be very prejudicial to the business, and spoil it; but yet however if you can furnish me with money at this time, you will do me a great kindness, for I have very great occasion. I told him, said I, I have not so much money by me; you come at an unseasonable time; though indeed I told him a lie; but I thought it not so safe to part with money without further order. Mr. Knox went away, and I gave an account of it to Mrs. Celier, who went either every day, or every other day to the Tower. I told her what Mr. Knox said, and I do believe (as she told me afterwards) she told my lady Powis of it, and Mrs. Celier seemed to be angry that I did not let him have the money, and ordered me that at what time soever after that Mr. Knox should come to me, I should let him have what money he wanted. Some time after this, Mr. Knox did come to me, and said his condition was very mean, and you told me, said he, that care should be taken by the lords in the Tower to furnish me with money. Said I, Mr. Knox, I can let you have 30 or 40*s*. if that will do you any kindness. I have no order for any sum at present; but as soon as it comes it must come to you through my hands; and it must pass as if I lent it you; and you shall give me a note for it to repay it, lest any thing should come to be discovered, and coming to Mr. Oates's hearing, should prejudice the business; though I had been too forward before in giving Mr. Knox an account that the lords in the Tower would contribute to this business. At that time, I went up stairs and fetched down 40*s*. and gave it him. He came afterwards, and would have borrowed more of me at other times, once or twice after that, but I did not furnish him, for I had received no order to furnish him any further. And this, my lord, is all the correspondence I had with him, and as near as I can remember, I have given nothing in but what is a very true account of the transaction.

Sir Fr. Win. My lord, I crave one question of him, if he have done. After the papers were corrected and written fair, and enlarged upon by the several persons, did you read them? And what were the contents of them?

Dangerfield. My lord, I did not read them, nor did I draw them, but I do believe that the contents were the same for substance with the affidavit that Lane made before sir James Butler.

Mr. Williams. Sir, you mention several sums of money that you paid to Knox, and paid to Lane; pray where had you this money?

Dangerfield. The 40*s*. that I gave to Knox, it was my own money; but if I must give an account where I had it, I believe it came originally from the Tower.

Mr. Williams. The 10*s*. a week, whence came that?

Dangerfield. Sometimes from the hands of my lady Powis; at other times from Mrs. Celier; sometimes from Mr. Wood; and sometimes from myself, and I placed it to account.

Serj. Maynard. If your lordship please, we will now proceed to another part of our evidence.

Mr. Williams. About what time were they to indict Mr. Oates? Was not this project on foot when the Presbyterian Plot was on foot?

Dangerfield. My lord I don't know what time; but it was by my advice to be done this term, and so did Nevil advise too.

Serj. Maynard. My lord, I would read some of the memorials or informations, that they were to swear against Dr. Oates concerning the business that you have heard.

L. C. J. Would you have them read, brother?

Serj. Maynard. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Who proves them?

Then the Justices of Peace swore them.

Just. Pemberton. Sir W. Waller, did he confess he left them with my lord Latimer?

Sir W. Waller. These are the papers, that were confessed to be carried to my lord Latimer.

Warcup. Osborne did swear, that the Informations marked 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, were all of his own hand writing, and were dictated by the said Knox.

Just. Pemberton. And he did confess, that these were the Informations that he had delivered to my lord Latimer.

Worcup. Yes, he did so.

Serj. Maynard. It will lie on his part to prove that they were true.

Just. Pemberton. Which will you have read, one, or all of them?

Serj. Maynard. One, or two, take Knox's first.

[Which was delivered to the Clerk of the Crown, who read it in hæc verba.]

[Numb. 1.] The INFORMATION of Thomas Knox, sworn before me this day of 1679.

“ This Informant doth upon his oath declare, That on the first of this present April, there came one William Osborne, to the Informant in the Painted Chamber in Westminster, and told to him the said Informant, that he had something of moment to reveal to him; and did also desire the Informant to go with him into the Abbey, and he would reveal it to him: Upon which the said Osborne and the Informant being together, the said Osborne did tell the Informant, that his conscience was mightily troubled, for that he found the Lord-Treasurer was maliciously prosecuted by Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow; for that he having been a servant to Mr. Oates, and had often heard Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow consult together, in Mr. Oates's Chamber in Whitehall, and resolve how they might contrive a way whereby to destroy my Lord-Treasurer: And that he had chosen to reveal this secret, and ease his conscience to the Informant, rather than to any one else, because he thought he would keep it secret, for his own sake, because he had already suffered by endeavouring to serve the said Lord-Treasurer; and thereupon the said Osborne shewed to the Informant some papers written, as he told the Informant, all in his own hand, and which were relating to the said Lord-Treasurer. Upon which the said Informant told the said Osborne, that he was no servant of the said Lord-Treasurer's, and did not therefore desire to meddle in it; and that particularly, because he had never spoke with the said Osborne before, and desired to be excused; upon which the said Osborne did press the Informant; and withal did tell him, that if he did not assist him in this affair, it was resolved both by him, and one Mr. Lane, that they would come in on the day of the said Lord Treasurer's Trial, and declare the truth concerning what they knew, concerning the malicious design of the said Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, against the said Lord-Treasurer; for that they could not rest for fear he should suffer innocently, whilst they could, with so good a conscience, as they thought, save him. And the said Osborne did withal declare, that the aforesaid Mr. Lane was resolved to speak to the Informant upon the aforesaid matter: And the said Lane did accordingly, upon the said 1st of April in the evening, meet the Informant, and shewed him some Papers, wherein he had taken several Memorials relating to his majesty, the queen, my Lord-Treasurer, and several other persons: And did withal declare to the Informant, that his conscience was so troubled to see the malicious proceedings of the said Mr. Oates and Bedlow against the said Lord-Treasurer, that he could not rest in his bed, until he had disburdened it, by telling the truth; and if he had not met with this Informant, he was resolved to declare it speedily to some one else; or come himself at the day of the said Lord-Treasurer's Trial, and there declare all that he knew relating to that affair. And did withal conjure the Informant, as also the said Osborne, to keep all they had told him secret; for if it should come to the ears of the said Mr. Oates and Bedlow, they would endeavour to poison or murder them, the said Osborne and Lane, the first time they should see them. Tmo. Knox.”

Then a second was offered to be read; but there appearing scandalous matter to be in it, reflecting on the king, the court thought not fit to suffer the same to be read through.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. My lord, I think it appears by the evidence sufficiently, how they did design to accuse Mr. Oates.

L. C. J. Ay, brother, come let us hear what they can say to it on the other side.

Mr. Withias. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; I am of counsel for the defendant Knox, and for Knox only.

Mr. Williams. Pray, Sir, hold; my lord, we have here two witnesses more, that will fortify Mr. Dangerfield in what he hath said. Call Susan Edwards, and Mrs. Blake.

Then Mrs. Blake appeared and was sworn.

Mr. Williams. Pray Mrs. Blake, what can you say of any reward Lane was to have, for accusing Mr. Oates? Or any promises were made to him?

Blake. All that I can say of Lane, is this; That Lane did say once to me, I am here; and I was Dr. Oates's man, and he would have bugged me: And he did make complaint for want of linen; and spoke to me to wash him some linen. Said he, Here I have no linen, neither will they let me have any; and his boy here will not stir to look for any, unless Willoughby speak to him. Then the boy was spoke to.

L. C. J. What is all this? What says the other woman?

Mr. Williams. He is called Willoughby sometimes, and sometimes Dangerfield; for he went by both names: But I ask you what money you know was given to him?

Blake. He told me, he was to be allowed 10s. a week.

L. C. J. This is only to strengthen his evidence.

Blake. He never said to me, from whom it was.

Then Mrs. Edwards was sworn.

Serj. Maynard. What do you say, Mistress?

Edwards. May it please you, I do not know Lane; I never saw him in my life, but only when he was sent for by Mrs. Celier, to get an Habeas Corpus for Willoughby, who was then in Newgate; and he did come the next day, and gave his answer to me.

L. C. J. She says nothing, but only he was desired to get an Habeas Corpus for Willoughby.

Sol. Gen. Yes, my lord, she is called to shew you, whether Lane had not money from Mrs. Celier.

Edwards. That was the first time I saw him, and the next morning I saw him again: And when he came to the door, he told his errand to me. He said, he could get no Habeas Corpus; for he was such a rogue, nobody would meddle nor make with him.

Dangerfield. I would fain have her asked this question, my lord, if you please: Did you ever see Mr. Knox at Mrs. Celier's house?

Edwards. If I see him, I can tell.

Then the defendant, Knox, was shewn to her.

Edwards. I cannot say, this is the man: I have heard much talk of Mr. Knox, and that he hath been there; but I cannot swear this is he.

Dangerfield. My Lord, if your lordship pleases, when Lane was first brought to me to the countess of Powis's house, he was very meanly equipaged, and the countess of Powis was informed of it, and did desire me to take some particular care to clothe him, and that I should put him into a disguise; but at that time I had a suit of clothes that were lined with blue, which I gave to him; and I also advised him to cut off his hair and to put on a peruke, which he did, and hath worn it ever since as I believe.

L. C. J. Well, let us hear what they say to it.

Mr. Withins. May it please your lordship, I am of counsel in this case for Mr. Knox; there are two persons here made defendants: as for Mr. Lane, I have nothing to do with him, nor to say for him; and his case hath made him appear to be a very evil man. But my Lord, I do observe that the indictment consists of two parts: the first is, that these two defendants did conspire together; and this was the 30th of April (and the proof comes to that time, for it will be material in our case) that they did maliciously and deceitfully combine and conspire against Titus Oates, clerk, and William Bedlow, gentleman, who had discovered this horrid Popish Plot, and whom they knew to have given informations of it, to take away their reputation, and make them witnesses of no belief, or credit; that is one part of the indictment. The other part is, that to further the same, Mr. Knox did cause two or three letters to be written, as from Osborne and Lane to him, purporting those aspersions to be laid upon Oates and Bedlow: for the last part of the indictment, the counsel for the king have not thought fit to proceed upon it, and they have not given an account of the letters; but for the first part, their conspiring to take off the reputation of Oates and Bedlow, is the only thing they have proceeded upon, as I conceive. I must needs say, my lord, that Mr. Knox, as well as Dr. Oates and Bedlow, have had a very great misfortune to meet with these men.

VOL. VII.

L. C. J. To meet with whom.

Mr. Withins. To meet with Osborne and Lane; for I do not here pretend to lay any aspersion, or make any reflections upon the credit or reputation of Dr. Oates or Mr. Bedlow. I think they have served the nation too well to be vilified here. But I shall say this, that as Osborne and Lane had a great design to disgrace and discredit Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, so they had a design to draw my client Mr. Knox in, to pursue their malice. I did shew you, that they did begin their evidence, as to time, in April, and they have laid it so in the indictment: we shall prove to your lordship and shew you, that before this, and before that Mr. Knox knew either Osborne or Lane, that they had drawn up this accusation against Mr. Oates, and read it to several witnesses, which we shall produce. And afterwards, when they came to advise how they should prosecute the same, they were advised first to go to Mr. Thewer: he told them that it was a dangerous thing to meddle about, and he would not involve himself, but bid them take care what they did in it. Upon this they apply themselves to my client Mr. Knox, he told them the same thing; it is a matter of great consequence, I desire not to meddle with it. Said they, will you not assist us in this business, when we only discover this to acquit our own consciences, who knew these things to be treating and contriving against the king and my lord of Danby? for my part, says one of them, I cannot leave the town till I have discovered it. Notwithstanding this, Mr. Knox would not undertake to meddle with it, but left them. They come to him the second time, and Mr. Knox being a young man, and it seems being a servant in the family, entered into a correspondence with them, to prosecute what they had designed to do. There is nothing appears (and this I would observe, if your lordship please) in the whole evidence, that Mr. Knox was to swear any thing against Dr. Oates or Mr. Bedlow (as I remember) but he was indeed engaged to carry on the prosecution, these witnesses informing him of it; and that it was a truth, I must observe to your lordship upon their evidence, they did insinuate, as if Mr. Knox had been at the charge of maintaining Lane: but I think, that Mr. Dangerfield hath pretty well cleared whence that maintenance came that he gave to Mr. Lane; that it came through none of the hands of my client, Mr. Knox.

L. C. J. No, Mr. Withins, he is not accused for giving him a constant maintenance, but for the money, the guineas and ten shillings. It is true, it was said it was to be paid again; but from him they had the money: and it appears, that he provided lodgings for them and paid for their lodgings.

Just. Pemberton. And pray observe this, that what Mr. Dangerfield speaks of, is of a time afterwards, after they had been taken and imprisoned, and confessed the matter.

Mr. Withins. But this you observe, I hope, my lord, from Mr. Dangerfield's evidence; that Knox was very poor, had not any thing to maintain himself with.

L. C. J. The sums indeed do not seem to be very great; a guinea, and 10s. in silver: but whatever it was, he gave it them, and took lodgings for them and paid for them.

Mr. Withins. I did intend to observe to your lordship, that it is a pretty strange thing, that there should be a design to corrupt persons to commit this foul and horrid offence; and nothing of a reward or corruption proved, but two guineas and 10s.

Just. Pemberton. What say you to the promises of 500l. and 100l. a year a-piece?

Mr. Withins. That was Lane's own evidence; Lane and Osborne might brag what they would of what they were to have, and from whom; but I believe not one in the court believed a word they said. For it does appear that Lane did forswear himself backwards and forwards as the wind blew. So that, as for what Lane hath said, it weighs not: but we shall call two witnesses, to whom Lane declared this matter in February and March, before the time that Knox was concerned: so that if we make it appear that the contrivance was theirs, and there was only a great deal of weakness and indiscretion in Mr. Knox to believe such idle persons against persons that had shewed themselves so considerable in this discovery; I hope it will not be thought such a crime in us, seeing there is nothing in it, but that a young man was led away; and only his folly and his indiscretion drew him in, not any malice or ill design.

Sir W. Waller. My lord, Mr. Knox did confess to me, that he did throw down a guinea, and then Lane and Osborne took it up; but they both positively swore, that he threw it down for this reason, that he might safely swear he never gave them it.

Mr. Saunders. All that they swear is not agreed to be true: my lord, if your lordship please, I am of counsel for the defendant Knox, and as to that part of the indictment that charges him with writing the letters, they do not proceed upon.

Serj. Maynard. Yes, we do, we proceed upon the whole—

L. C. J. They proceed upon the whole, but you may say, if you will, they give no proof of it.

Saunders. Then, as to that, with submission to your lordship's judgment, the defendant is to be found Not Guilty.

Justice Pemberton. You must observe, these are not several crimes, but one continued crime, and therefore the evidence must go to the whole.

L. C. J. You do well to observe it for your client; but if you require it of the counsel on the other side, it may be they will give you an answer, if you will undertake to affirm, that they have given no evidence as to that part of the indictment wherein it says, Mr. Knox contrived three letters to scandalize Mr. Oates.

Mr. Saunders. We submit it to the court whether they have or no. For the other part of the indictment, wherein it is charged, that he should maliciously contrive with Lane to lay a calumny and scandal upon Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow, the very point we are to answer to is this, Whether this were a malicious contrivance or no, and for that we shall give your lordship this evidence: that Knox was a young ignorant man, and drawn in by Lane and Osborne to patronize their mischief they intended against Oates and Bedlow; for, my lord, Mr. Knox was not acquainted with them, or had any thing to do with them, till that they had contrived this matter among themselves: for, my lord, we shall call you witnesses to prove, that before Knox had to do with them, they would have had another person to prosecute this business for them. And if we satisfy you that he was drawn in, I hope it will acquit us; notwithstanding I will observe to your lordship and the jury, whether Lane be guilty or not guilty does not affect us, if we were only drawn into the contrivance.

L. C. J. Wherever Lane's testimony stands singly against Knox, it is no evidence.

Justice Jones. But if he was not in the Plot at the beginning, but was drawn in, and did after proceed with them, as Dangerfield proves, I doubt it will not acquit him.

Justice Pemberton. Consider a little your case; you say here was a contrivance of two, that Knox was not in the beginning, but they offered it to others with whom it would not take. Why, let Knox come in when he will, if he does come into the contrivance, and takes the papers, and manages the business to fix these scandals, and encourage them to carry them on, Knox is as guilty as all the rest.

Mr. Saunders. But if these men come and tell him these things are true, and we can swear them, and so is drawn in, it takes away the malice of the contrivance.

L. C. J. This is the use the defendant Knox his counsel make of it: at first Knox was not acquainted with the matter; and when he did come to understand it, he thought it to be true, as they affirmed it was true, and, said they, we will go before a justice of peace and swear it: he was willing, there being a discovery of several conspiracies against his lord's life, as they said, he being his servant, he was willing to prosecute the business; and this is the use they make of it.

Justice Pemberton. Come, let us hear your witnesses.

Mr. Scroggs. Call Frances Lane and Mary Lane.

L. C. J. But I will tell you what; it will be necessary to clear yourselves, as well as you can, of those papers that were delivered by Knox to Dangerfield, and went about to the lords in the Tower, and afterward to Nevil, and by him amended, and after delivered to Knox again by Dangerfield: This does shew as if you were concerned in the whole affair, and in all the matter of the information, before it was cooked and after it was dressed. You must give some account of that, for that sticks strongly upon you.

Then Mrs. Frances Lane, and her daughter Mary Lane, were sworn.

Mr. Scroggs. Mrs. Lane, are not you mother to Lane the defendant?

F. Lane. Yes.

Mr. Withins. Pray will you give an account what your son said to you in February last?

Serjeant Muynard. We pray they may ask their questions in general.

Justice Pemberton. Do not you point her to a time.

L. C. J. Answer me: what hath your son said to you at any time concerning Oates?

F. Lane. He spoke it about March.

L. C. J. What did he say?

F. Lane. He used him uncivilly, he had no mind to stay with him.

L. C. J. What said you?

F. Lane. I desired him to stay longer.

L. C. J. How often did he tell you this?

F. Lane. Several times.

L. C. J. He had left his service once, had he not?

F. Lane. Yes.

L. C. J. Was it before or after he left his service?

F. Lane. Before and after too.

L. C. J. If he complained he had so used him before, why would he go to him again?

F. Lane. Because the times were hard, and I persuaded him.

L. C. J. Ay, but would you persuade him after such an abuse of your son as that?

F. Lane. I thought then he would not do so again.

Justice Jones. When was the first time he complained to you?

F. Lane. It was about Christmas.

Justice Jones. Was it before Christmas?

F. Lane. It was after.

Justice Pemberton. Consider here you bring Lane's mother to accuse him to excuse yourself.

L. C. J. But is this material?

Mr. Scroggs. It is material to our client Mr. Knox, who was drawn in here by a couple of rascals. We prove, that before this time which justice Warcup and sir Wm. Waller have in their informations, they offered the same discovery to others.

L. C. J. Call them and prove it, but you will never have the better name for calling them ill ones.

Mr. Scroggs. We lay all upon Lane and Osborne, who inveigled Knox.

Mr. Saunders. Pray, Mrs. Lane, tell the court and jury how and when your son came acquainted with Mr. Knox.

F. Lane. May it please you, my lord, Osborne brings a paper to our house, and would have had my son have read it, but he could not, so he read it himself; and there were some desperate things in it.

L. C. J. What were they?

F. Lane. I cannot tell, they were concerning the king and the queen and my lord treasurer.

L. C. J. When was this?

F. Lane. In March last, at our house, and I desired them they would not meddle with such things, for I said they were things beyond them. My son promised me he would not meddle with it, but let Osborne alone with it; but said I, pray go to one captain Thewer, he is a good civil man, and a man of understanding. So they did go as I directed them.

Justice Pemberton. Who went?

F. Lane. Osborne did.

Justice Pemberton. Who went with him? for you say they.

F. Lane. John Lane, my son.

L. C. J. Was there any thing particular in those papers concerning Mr. Oates being guilty of sodomy?

F. Lane. I cannot say in particular, it is a great while ago, but he went to captain Thewer, and he wished him, after he had read it, said he, don't meddle with any of these things, for it will be the worse for you.

L. C. J. As your son told you, you were not by.

F. Lane. Yes, they both told me so. With that says Mr. Osborne, I'll find out one Mr. Knox, who had been some acquaintance of Mr. Wiggins, Mr. Bedlow's clerk; and so, said he, I will ask Mr. Wiggins if he be acquainted with Mr. Knox.

L. C. J. Did your son at that time know Knox?

F. Lane. No, my lord, he had never seen him at that time; so my son went, and they found Mr. Wiggins and Mr. Knox walking in the abbey.

L. C. J. Was Lane with him then?

F. Lane. He went with Osborne, and came and told me, Knox would not meddle with them.

L. C. J. Who came and told you so?

F. Lane. Osborne came and told me so, and my son.

L. C. J. You were not by?

F. Lane. No, not I; but, said he, as he told me, I will go to him again; and afterwards he did meet him again, as he said, and delivered them to him.

Mr. Withins. Did you ever see Knox in your life?

F. Lane. I had never seen him then.

Mr. Withins. Did you ever hear your son say, he did know Knox before that time?

F. Lane. Never in my life.

Justice Pemberton. But you do not prove that they were not acquainted.

L. C. J. Do you believe Osborne said true; Mr. Saunders?

Mr. Saunders. Not when he spoke to sir W. Waller to accuse my client of the contrivance.

L. C. J. In that case, when it is against your client he did not, but in other cases he might; well, go on.

Mr. Withins. Which is Mary Lane?

Mary Lane. I am she, Sir, I can say no more than my mother hath said, I was by at the same time.

Mr. Saunders. Do you know when John Lane came acquainted with Knox? was it before April last, or after?

Justice Pemberton. How is it possible that any one can swear a negative?

Mr. Saunders. If we can't prove the negative, nor they the affirmative, it will be presumed they were not, because it is not known.

Justice Pemberton. Nor do you prove any informations before given to any one.

Mr. Saunders. Yes, to Thewer.

Mr. Withins. We will ask the daughter about that.

F. Lane. She can only prove it by hearing it, for she was sick.

Mr. Withins. Young Mrs. Lane, what was there in that paper that Osborne brought to your house?

M. Lane. There was concerning the king, and the queen, and my Lord Treasurer.

L. C. J. Was there any thing in it concerning Mr. Oates?

M. Lane. Yes, there was, concerning his beastliness.

Justice Pemberton. Who read it?

M. Lane. Osborne I did hear read it.

Mr. Saunders. Your brother was not acquainted with Knox then?

Justice Pemberton. How can they tell that? it is impossible.

L. C. J. The nature of the thing is such, that it can be proved no otherwise. But it seemed to them that they were of no acquaintance; it is hard to prove when an acquaintance begins.

Mr. Saunders. And further than this we cannot go in such a case; for that thing of the great sums of money, certainly it was as little a thing as could be; there was no more in the case than a guinea, and ten shillings, and three half crowns, as proved, and he was cheated of them, it seems, for they would not do the work.

Mr. Scroggs. It is an improbable thing that he should be so poor as to sell the handle of his sword, and yet be engaged in the management of such a plot, and not have money for it.

L. C. J. There is no great store of money appears to be given to Lane, but he was kept upon a mean maintenance.

Justice Jones. But it was not without expectation of a reward.

Justice Pemberton. He tells you the wages was to be paid when the work was done.

L. C. J. And when the roguery was discovered, they had no more money then.

Justice Pemberton. When the business came to be controverted thus, they had no reason to give it.

Mr. Saunders. Though Lane had maintenance, yet our client Knox was not taken such care of; still there was provision made for him, but none for us, because we were drawn in and did not contrive it.

Justice Pemberton. But remember, Mr. Saunders, by the same hand there were 40*s.* given at one time.

Mr. Withins. Well, my lord, we have done: we say, that we had no part in the malice of the contrivance, and therefore ought not to be punished with them.

L. C. J. Well, Mr. Holt, what say you for Lane?

Mr. Holt. My lord, I am assigned of counsel for the defendant Lane. I have no witnesses at all to examine, but only shall make some little observations upon the evidence that is given for the king. As for the indictment itself, though it is not several crimes, but one complicated crime; yet the evidence that is given is only to one part thereof; and therefore I submit it to your lordship, if the proof be proportionable to the charge, and whether the defendant ought not to be found Not Guilty. There hath been great mention made of the writing letters, yet it would be hard that the defendant should be found Guilty of such an offence, when the proof does not come up so high; that would introduce a severer punishment than the crime proved would justify.

Justice Pemberton. Pray, Mr. Holt, don't go away with that; I must set you right a little there: The crime that is laid is, To discountenance the king's evidence, and to make them that they should not be believed. The means are several, partly by casting of crimes upon them, partly by writing letters; that crime is another thing, and therefore if they do not find them Guilty of every one of the particular means, yet the crime must be found.

L. C. J. You are in the right thus far, Mr. Holt; they have laid the indictment, That they endeavouring to disparage the credit of Oates and Bedlow, have, for money's sake, and by promises and contrivances, and writing of letters, wherein was scandalous matter against Oates and Bedlow; they thereby did attempt to discredit them. Now say you, if this matter be not proved, that there was any scandalous matter concerning Oates and Bedlow, then the contrivance is not proved: but what though all the facts in the indictment are not proved, yet if there be enough to prove your contrivance to discredit them; and if you suppose the evidence true that is given, it rests, I think, plainly upon your client, and you cannot get off from it: but if there be not sufficient proof to maintain the indictment for the crime of endeavouring to discredit Oates and Bedlow, unless they prove the letters also, you say something; but there is the business that sticks on you, they have proved enough without that.

Mr. Holt. If the jury do not find them Not Guilty generally, may they not find them Not Guilty of writing the letters?

L. C. J. No: For if the other part of the evidence did not amount to a proof of a design of disparaging their testimony, you had a very strong objection of it: but if they lay five things, and they prove but one of them upon you; if that one serves to the disparaging of Oates and Bedlow, which is the substance of the indictment, that maintains the indictment.

Mr. Holt. It does so, my lord; but not the aggravations.

L. C. J. All that you say then is in mitigation of a fine; but if all be true that is proved upon your client, as I see no reason to doubt it, you will save but little by this defence.

Mr. Holt. My Lord, as to the matter, it all depends upon the credit of the witnesses, and credibility of the circumstance in themselves, and one with another. Some of the evidence is but very slight, and sure were but produced to spend time.

L. C. J. Indeed there was a great deal of it to little purpose: for ought I see, this trial needed not to have been above an hour.

Mr. Holt. As for his saying he should have 100*l.* a year, and the bettering of his fortune, it was but his vanity and extravagance.

L. C. J. Mr. Holt does argue as much for his client as the case will bear.

Mr. Holt. They have endeavoured to lay all upon us; now if so be we are affected with any severe evidence, I think the same evidence (to requite them) does affect them.

L. C. J. This is a kind of battle-royal, where every one hath two enemies to oppose.

Mr. Holt. Here is Mr. Dangerfield, he comes, and in his evidence tells you, That my lady Powis was so long upon her knees to thank God that her party was so much strengthened by the accession of Lane: My lord, I desire the quality of Mr. Lane may be taken notice of; a foot-man and a young rash fellow, one that both for age and quality could not be very considerable.

L. C. J. But two witnesses are better than one, Mr. Holt; do you remember that? Knox used that expression, If Lane do but keep firm, we shall be too hard for Osborne alone, for two witnesses are better than one; but by that he counted Lane worth something.

Mr. Holt. You must consider, what he was to swear, they could scarce get an evidence so proper for what they would have him swear.

L. C. J. Mr. Williams, what answer can you give to all the transactions that Mr. Dangerfield tells you of about Knox? Besides, take notice of this; you would have this to be a contrivance by Lane and Osborne, to be between themselves, and that your client must be a stranger to it; and when he comes to know it, he knows it only as a remorse of conscience that they tell him they have, and desire him to go with them before a justice of peace to swear it, and he hearing something that might affect his master the earl of Danby, and believing that all was true, did encourage that matter only for his master's service, and thought he did a good act in it. But your subsequent behaviour shews it was a conspiracy rather; for, first, your secret ways of sending your cunning notes, 'We all clubbed together, and you paid 2*s.* at the Sugar-loaf, tear this;' which shews, and does to my apprehension signify, as if he would never own that he spent any thing upon them, and that he was bountiful to them. And then the giving of money to the man to convey notes, that they might not betray one another; do not all these subsequent actions, especially those Dangerfield tells you of, and receiving the papers after they were enlarged upon, speak it a conspiracy? What can you say to all this?

Mr. Williams. My lord—

Justice Pemberton. Stay a little, and answer all together. Do but consider with yourself, those informations your client Mr. Knox did own he took, and before they were sworn, and carried them to my lord Latimer's lodging, and he himself owns that he took lodgings for them, and lay with them, and when the lords were in pursuit of them.

L. C. J. And then does he steal them from place to place, and takes lodgings for them, and pays for them.

Justice Jones. He brings one of them to make affidavit, and will keep it by him, is shy of showing it; afterwards does show it, this makes him a contriver too, as well as an executor.

Mr. Saunders. If your lordship please—

Justice Pemberton. Consider too the papers that were put in too of caution, that Knox and they should not be found in several tales; for Knox had been examined before they were: what was the meaning of those instructions?

L. C. J. If you have any witnesses to wipe yourselves clean from the matter of receiving the papers from Dangerfield, and taking lodgings for them when they were under that accusation, do.

Mr. Saunders. I have a word to answer upon the testimony of Mr. Dangerfield.

Justice Pemberton. Consider this, that he attempted another man upon the same account; your client did tempt Wiggins to do the same thing to his master.

Mr. Saunders. That was in February before, and all that he said was, that he would have had out of Mr. Bedlow's servant, what company his master kept, and what he did.

L. C. J. You do observe right.

Justice Pemberton. And to have betrayed his papers to him.

L. C. J. That does not reach this indictment indeed; but that thing that he would have tempted him to, was to have discovered, and to have a transcript of all the papers that concerned my lord of Danby; that he should watch his company, and know what lords were with him, that he might make his opposition as well as he could, and that he should have what place he did desire under my lord. It does not affect the case of the indictment, but it shews you are a tempter of men, and that you are a cautioner, that you would hire a man to betray his master's papers, which is not fair, let the master be who he will.

Justice Pemberton. It facilitates the belief of this.

L. C. J. Yes; Ay, ay, it is to make the jury more apt to credit what the evidence of this particular fact is.

Mr. Saunders. My lord, let me offer this word, and I submit: Mr. Dangerfield himself does swear, that Lane brought him a paper containing the same matter that he did falsly accuse Mr. Oates of, and he read it over three times to him, and then he swore it before sir James Butler. My lord, I will put my cause upon that point, Whether Mr. Dangerfield did not believe it to be true at that time.

Justice Jones. Your client is the more mischievous man, to contrive it so, as to make the thing to be believed when it was false.

L. C. J. The use of the argument he makes is this; that as Mr. Dangerfield might be deceived into a belief that the information was true, so might Mr. Knox as well when he saw one ready to swear it: but hath Dangerfield done those subsequent acts which he hath done in the confederacy, for which he is now indicted?

Mr. Saunders. He swears in his information, that they came to his hands from Lane and Osborne.

L. C. J. Well gentlemen, you of the king's council and of the jury, you need not any summing up of the evidence, I think the thing is evident.

Justice Pemberton. Gentlemen, it is a very clear case, as clear as the day; I think you need not go from the bar; but do as you will.

[Then the Jury laying their heads together, agreed without delay, and without moving from the bar.]

Cl. of Cr. Gentlemen, are you all agreed of your verdict.

Omnes. Yes.

Cl. of Cr. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Foreman.

Cl. of Cr. How say you, are the defendants guilty of the offence and misdemeanour whereof they stand indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty. [At which the people gave a great shout.]

Serjeant Maynard. My Lord, I pray the verdict may be recorded.

Justice Jones. Let it be so. Come, where are these two young fellows? Let us see if they can shew their faces now. [And they were brought into the middle of the court.]

Knox. Will your lordship give me leave to speak one word for myself?

Justice Jones. No, no, there is no speaking now; take them into your custody, Marshal.—Which was done, and the Court broke up.

They were afterwards sentenced: Thomas Knox to a fine of 200 marks, a year's imprisonment, and to find sureties for his good behaviour for three years. John Lane to a fine of 100 marks, to stand in the pillory for an hour, and to be imprisoned for one year.

† "The three lords, (Sunderland, Essex, and Halifax) and I," says sir William Temple, "thought of such acts of council as might express his majesty's care for suppressing Popery even in the intervals of parliament. We only disagreed in one point, which was the leaving some priests to the law upon the accusation of being priests only, as the House of Commons had desired, which I thought wholly unjust without giving them public warning by proclamation to be gone, or expect the penalties of law within such a time; since the connivances had lasted now through three kings reigns. Upon this point, lord Halifax and I had so sharp a debate at lord Sunderland's lodgings, that he told me if I would not concur in points which were so necessary for the people's satisfaction, he would tell every body I was a Papist. And upon his affirming that the Plot must be handled, as if it were true, whether were so or not, in those points that were generally believed by city or country, as wel,

And after the usual proclamation for attendance was made, the court proceeded in this manner :

as both Houses : I replied with some heat that the Plot was a matter long on foot before I came over into England ; that to understand it one must have been here to observe all the motions of it ; which not having done, I would have nothing to do with it." Memoirs, Part 3. The desire of the House of Commons referred to in this passage was expressed in an Address which was voted on the 16th of Nov, 1678, which will be found below.

So early as the year 1675, the Popish Priests resident in England had reason to apprehend that the 27th of Eliz. would be enforced against them. It appears by the Journal of the House of Commons, that

" November 8, 1675.

" Information being given to the House, of a very high insolence and violence committed upon M. de Luzancy, a convert of the Protestant religion, by one St. German, a Jesuit, and others, his confederates ; and a Narrative in writing being tendered, and read, giving a particular account of the whole matter :

" Resolved, &c. That a Committee be appointed to take the said Narrative, now read, into consideration, and to examine the matter and report it, with their opinions, to the House : and also to consider of such ways and means as they shall find necessary for securing and encouraging of converts to the Protestant religion, and to bring in a bill to that purpose ; and also to examine, what Priests or Jesuits have been of late years committed or convicted ; and by what warrants, and by whom procured, they have been released, reprieved, or pardoned ; and to report the whole matter to the House, with their opinions therein : and it is referred to lord Cavendish, and 32 other members, or any five of them ; and they are to meet this afternoon, at three o'clock, in the Speaker's chamber ; and to send for persons, papers, and records.

" Resolved, &c. That the Lord Chief Justice of England be desired forthwith to issue his warrant for the apprehending St. German, the Jesuit, and his confederates ; and for searching for, and apprehending, all priests and Jesuits whatsoever."

" On March 27, 1678, the House of Commons being informed, That mass is publicly said in several places within the county of Monmouth ; and that there is one Mr. Arnold at the door, ready to make the same out. A Paper, containing an information of several Popish Priests and Jesuits, and the persons that do countenance and support them, was delivered in to Mr. Speaker. Mr. Arnold was called in to the bar of the House ; and asked divers questions by Mr. Speaker, touching the matters contained in the Paper delivered in to

Cl. of Cr. Keeper, set David Joseph Kemish to the bar. [Which was done.] David Joseph Kemish, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.]

Mr. Speaker ; and also touching several other things ; and having given his answer, and being withdrawn, one captain Scudamore was called in to the bar ; and asked several questions, by Mr. Speaker, concerning one Elliot, a popish priest, formerly committed to gaol by the said captain Scudamore. And he having given his answer, and being withdrawn,

" Ordered, That the Thanks of this House be given to Mrs. Arnold and Mr. Scudamore, for their informations this day given to the House of the growth of popery.

" And Mr. Arnold and Mr. Scudamore being called in to the bar of the House, Mr. Speaker did, in a short and eloquent speech, give them the thanks of the House accordingly.

" And it was Resolved, That a Conference be desired with the Lords, concerning the danger the nation is in by the growth of popery, and for providing remedies to prevent the same.

" An Address of the 20th of February, 1670, touching the growth of Popery, with heads and reasons thereto, was read. Resolved, &c. That it be referred to a Committee to consider of the said Address and Heads ; and thereout, and upon the debates of the House, to prepare and draw up Reasons to be offered at the said Conference."

" On the 29th of April following, the House proceeded to the consideration of a report made by sir John Trevor : which was read by the clerk, and is as followeth :

" The first Head ;

" The Names of Popish Priests ; by whom kept ; the Chapels, and other places where mass is said, and resorted to, in the county of Monmouth.

" 1. John Arnold, of Llanvihangell, in the county of Monmouth, esq. late a justice of the peace there, by his examination saith, that he hath known Mr. David Lewis* for seven or eight years ; who hath been for all that time, and before, reputed a Jesuit, and Provincial of the Jesuits, in the county of Monmouth : That for several years past, he lived Llantarnam house, then in jointure to the lady Morgan ; which by her death, about two years since, came to sir Edward Morgan ; where the said David Lewis publicly said mass, as he hath been credibly informed by persons that were present thereat. He likewise says, That he hath seen the chapel, altar, and ornaments in the said house, for the celebration of mass : That the said David Lewis lives now near Llantarnam aforesaid ; and doth also, as he hath been informed, say mass at a popish chapel, near Mr. Gunter's house in Abergavenny town.

" 2. Charles Morgan, gentleman, by his examination upon oath, saith, That David Lewis,

* See his Case, supra, p. 250.

Thou standest indicted by the name of David Joseph Kemish, of the parish of St. Giles's in the fields, in the county of Middlesex, clerk; for that thou being born within the dominions a popish reputed priest, doth often frequent the house of one Mr. Thomas Gunter, of Aber-gavenny.

"3. William James, by his examination upon oath, saith, That he hath known David Lewis to be a popish priest this 16 years; and believes him to be the superior of all the Jesuits in North and South Wales: he and his wife have received the Sacrament of him; hath seen him administer it to above 100 persons; hath seen him christen several children, and marry several persons at a chapel in Llantarnam house, and at the houses of Andrew and Edward William: That a great number resort to Llantarnam to hear mass. Deposeth further, That he hath given several angels to the said David Lewis, to pray for the soul of his father-in-law, after he was dead: and that his father-in-law told him and his wife, that he was fain to give 50*l.* to the said David Lewis, to be disposed to pious uses; and that if he did not give it, he should neither have the sacrament, nor absolution. And he further saith, That he knoweth Wm. Cornelius, who hath officiated as clerk at mass to the said David Lewis, this 15 or 16 years; and that the said Wm. Cornelius was both a constable and churchwarden for the parish of Langatuck.

"4. Dorothy, the wife of Wm. James, deposeth, That she hath known David Lewis to be a popish priest these 20 years; hath seen him say mass at Llantarnun, and elsewhere; she and her husband having received the sacrament from him; and hath seen him administer it to several persons; and marry and christen several times: she knoweth, that one William Cornelius hath officiated as clerk to the said David Lewis, for 16 years past, and above.

"5. Mr. Arnold says, That he hath known captain Syliard four or five years: that he hath been informed by the minister of Lanarth, and others, That he is a Romish priest, and doth openly say mass in that parish; to which great numbers do resort: that most of the parish are papists.

"6. Thomas Watkins, vicar of Lanarth, upon his oath, deposeth, That one Syliard, a reputed popish priest, resides in the said parish.

"7. Mr. Charles Morgan, upon his oath, saith, That the said Mr. Syliard, a reputed popish priest, lives with Mrs. Jones, of Lanarth, widow.

"8. Mr. Arnold says, That Mr. Harris alias Price, is reputed to be a popish priest.

"9. Thomas Watkins, of Lanarth, upon his oath, deposeth, That Walter Harry alias Price, is a reputed popish priest; resideth in Clitha, a hamlet in Lanarth, in the house of Mrs. Christian Milburne: That there are above 80 reputed popish recusants, besides children and servants, in that parish: That he hath been informed, that the said Price says mass, mar-of our sovereign lord the king, and being a priest, made and ordained by authority derived from the see of Rome, after the feast of the Nativity of St. John Baptist, in the first year of ries and christens in the said parish; and has endeavoured to pervert several of the parish to the popish religion.

"10. Mr. Samuel Watkins, vicar of Lantilio-Gresseny and Penrose, in the county of Monmouth, upon his oath, says, That Mr. Walter Harries alias Price, and another Mr. Harries, say mass at William Pellen's house; and likewise do often christen.

"11. Mr. Aron Lewis, of Landigua, in the county of Monmouth, upon his oath, says, That several persons have informed him, that Walter Harries alias Price, is a popish priest, and had christened several of their children; and that the said Price said mass publicly; and that he lives in the house of Mrs. Catherine and Christian Milbourne.

"12. Alice, the wife of the said Mr. Aron Lewis, upon her oath, saith, That she knoweth the said Mr. Walter Price to be a popish priest; hath seen and heard him say mass 40 times; hath received the sacrament from him; hath seen him administer it to a hundred more; hath seen him often marry and christen; hath perverted several Protestants from the Church of England to the Church of Rome; as James Prichard and Catherine his wife, Charles Watkins and Margaret his wife, and the wife of William Arthur, and several others.—She further saith, that she hath seen above 100 at mass at one time, at Mrs. Christian Milborne's house; and that the crowd was so great, that the loft was forced to be propped, lest it should fall down under the weight: That she hath confessed her sins to the said Price; and that he gave her absolution.

"13. William Lewis, of Ragland, in the county of Monmouth, upon his oath, saith, That he hath seen Mr. Price, who doth, or lately did live at the house of Mrs. Milborne, say mass, and preach in Welch: That the said Price did earnestly endeavour to turn him from the Church of England to the Church of Rome; telling him, that he should never see the face of God, unless he would be of their way.

"14. Mr. Roger Seys, upon his oath, saith, That the said Walter Harry, alias Price, is a popish priest: And that he was present when it was proved before a justice of the peace, that the said Price had said mass.

"15. William James, upon his oath, saith, That he knoweth Walter Harries, alias Price, a popish priest; and hath seen him at mass; hath heard him say mass: And that he is entertained at Mrs. Milborne's house in Clitha.

"16. Mr. Arnold says, That he hath been very credibly informed, that one Dr. Pugh says mass publicly in the house of Mr. Thomas Rodnam of Blackbrook, both when Mr. Rodnam is at home, and when he is absent: That he hath been informed, that Walter James, esq. suffers one John Lloyd, a reputed priest, the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and before the 15th of November, in the 30th year of the reign of our sovereign lord the king that now is, The laws and statutes of this kingdom of England to say mass in his house at Treivor: That he hath seen a chapel at Llanvaire in the house of Turbervill Morgan esq.; and an altar and ornaments in it: And he hath been informed, that Thomas Lloyd, a popish priest, saith public mass, marries, christens, and buries in the said chapel.

" 17. Mr. Samuel Watkins, vicar of Llantilio-Gresseny, Penrose, upon his oath, saith, That Mr. Lloyd, a reputed popish priest, says mass at the house of Turbervill Morgan, esq., in his parish: That there are three other houses in his parish, where reputed popish priests are entertained, and say public mass: And that there are in the parishes of Llantilio-Gressing, and Penrose, sixscore popish recusants.

" 18. Mr. Arnold says, That he hath been informed by the minister and several witnesses that Mrs. Scudamore of Penrose, widow, suffers public mass to be said in her house; and that great numbers resort thither.

" 19. Mr. Samuel Watkins, vicar of Penrose, upon his oath, saith, That one Mr. Lloyd, a reputed popish priest, is entertained at the house of one Mrs. Winifred Scudamore: And that he hath seen him there, and a great number of popish recusants resorting thither upon Sundays and holidays, to hear mass, as he conceiveth; and he verily believes, all her children were christened by popish priests.

" 20. Mr. Arnold says, That he hath seen a public chapel near the house of Mr. Thomas Gunter, a papist convict in Abergavenny, adorned with the marks of the Jesuits on the outside: and is informed, that mass is said there by captain Evans, a reputed Jesuit, and by the aforesaid David Lewis; that very great numbers resort to the said chapel, and very often at church time: And he hath credibly heard, that 100 have gone out of the said chapel, when not 40 have gone out of the great church: And that the said chapel is situate in a public street of the said town; and doth front the said street.

" 21. Mr. Greenbaugh, vicar of Abergavenny, and Lantilio Bartholy in the county of Monmouth, upon his oath, saith, That on Sundays and holidays he hath seen great number of Roman catholics resort to the house of Thomas Gunter at Abergavenny: And that the said Gunter entertains one capt. Evans, whom he supposeth to be a popish priest: That there is the public marks of the Jesuits on the outside of the building; which is directly towards the parish church; and he is informed is their chapel: And that they have in that house all the formalities and ornaments unto a chapel belonging; with mass on Sundays, and other holidays. He deposeth, that there have been many marriages and christenings in both the said parishes, by popish priests: And further, that the not regarding nor the penalties in the same contained any ways fearing, the said 15th day of November, in the 30th year of the king aforesaid at the parish of St. Giles's in the said Thomas Gunter told him that in Oliver's time of severity he kept a priest, and would keep one now: That many times corps come to be interred, with the formalities of white crosses upon them; and, endeavouring to hinder the said superstition, he hath been often abused: That he hath informed John Arnold, esq., and other justices of the peace, of public mass said there; and other enormities of the papists.

" 22. William James aforesaid, upon his oath, deposeth, that he knoweth Philip Evans, commonly called captain Evans, a popish priest, entertained by Mr. Thomas Gunter, at his house in Abergavenny.

" 23. Mr. Arnold says, That the persons who commonly go under the names hereafter mentioned, do often change their names, and are called by other names; and are reputed to be itinerant priests in the counties of Hereford and Monmouth; and do usually officiate in ten miles compass; viz. Mr. Draycott, Mr. Elliot, captain Pugh, Dr. Pugh, Mr. Ryder, Mr. Morgan, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Williams, Mr. Parry, Mr. Jones, Mr. Harries who is said to be superintendent of the Combe, Mr. John Hall, Mr. Thomas Powell, Mr. Harries, alias Price, Mr. Thomas Andrews.

" 24. Tho. Watkins, vicar of Llanarth, upon his oath, deposeth, That Thomas Andrews a reputed popish priest, says mass very often at William Davie's house of Bettus, as he hath been informed.

" 25. Mr. Sam. Watkins, vicar of Lantilio-Gresseny, upon his oath deposeth, That Mr. Thomas Andrews, a reputed popish priest, is entertained at Mr. Anthony Powell's at Killough; where he hath seen him: And that he says public mass there: And that Mr. Hall a reputed popish priest, is entertained at Mr. James Prichard's house of Blean Llyman, where mass is publicly said: And he hath been informed, that another reputed popish priest, called Mr. Laurence Watkins, frequents the house of Mr. Walter Powell.

" 26. Mr. Roger Seys, upon his oath, deposeth, That he heard it proved before several justices of the peace of the county of Monmouth, that Mr. Lawrence Watkins was a popish priest, and did officiate at the house of Mr. Charles Scudamore, deceased: And further deposeth, That Thomas Powell, a reputed popish priest, liveth at the house of the lady Jones of Treowen, which is distant about a quarter of a mile from the parish church of Dingeston; to which church, as he is informed there do not resort above sixteen or twenty persons, or thereabouts; when there do resort to the house of the said lady Jones threescore or thereabouts; all which do pass and repass through the said church yard of Dingestow, at the time of divine service.

" 27. Mr. Charles Morgan, upon his oath, fields, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, traitorously, and as a false traitor of our sovereign lord the king, thou wast and didst remain and abide, against the form of the statute in this case made and provided, and against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. How sayest thou, David Joseph Kemish, Art thou Guilty of this High-Treason whereof thou standest indicted; or Not Guilty?

Kemish. Not Guilty.
Cl. of Cr. Culprit, how wilt thou be tried?
Kemish. By God and my country.

deposeth, That Mr. Williams, a reputed popish priest, frequenteth a house called Lantrothy.

"28. Mr. Arnold says, That he hath seen hundreds of papists meet on a high hill, called St. Michael's Mount, where is frequent meetings, eight or ten times in the year, as he is informed, Mass said, and sometimes sermons preached there.

"29. John Scudamore, of Kentchurch in the county of Hereford, esquire, saith, That he hath seen very great numbers of people at their devotion, on the top of a high hill in Monmouthshire, called St. Michael's Mount, where there is a ruinous chapel, and a stone with crosses upon it, which he took to be an altar: And he hath seen people with beads in their hands, kneeling, toward the said stone, both within and without the said chapel: And he hath seen them there several times himself. And he hath been informed they do constantly assemble there at several times of the year: And he hath been informed, that mass is often said there: And some papists have affirmed in his presence, that they have heard as good sermons preached there, as ever they heard in their lives.

"30. Mr. Arnold saith, that he knoweth, that Combe-house in Herefordshire, and several lands belonging to it, of a considerable value, is commonly reputed to be a convent of Jesuits: And he hath heard some of the papists themselves call it the college of the Combe: And he hath been informed, that there are commonly five or six Jesuits residing there: And there is a public chapel; and mass constantly said therein.

"31. Mr. Scudamore says, That at a house called the Combe, in the county of Hereford, several priests are maintained and kept there: And that it is commonly reported, that it is a house or college for that purpose.

"32. Wm. James of Langatuck, in the county of Monmouth, upon his oath deposeth, That he heard several of the popish priests say, That, if they could not live in those parts, they would repair to the Combe in Herefordshire: And believes the said Combe to be a convent; and that the lands thereunto belonging belongs to the priests; and that they do keep, or lately did keep husbandry there.

"33. Mr. Charles Morgan, upon his oath, deposeth, That Combe house in the county of Hereford, near the dwelling house of Harry Milburne, esq. a justice of the peace, is reputed to be a popish convent, where several popish reputed priests did lately inhabit; viz. Mr. James, Mr. Humphreys, Mr. Draycott, and Mr. Harries.

"Three worthy members of this house living in and near Herefordshire, informed the committee, That Combe house aforesaid, and the lands thereunto belonging, is commonly reputed to belong to the popish priests.

"The Second Head.

"The Names of the Justices of Peace and others, that are Papists or suspected Papists; and their proceedings in favour of Popish Priests and Popish Recusants.

"1. Mr. Arnold saith, That he knoweth sir Edward Morgan, of Llantarnan in the county of Monmouth, baronet; that he hath seen in his house of Llantarnan a popish chapel, with altar and ornaments therein for the celebration of mass; wherein mass is said, as he hath been informed by such as have been present thereat: That he hath heard the said sir Edward Morgan affirm himself to be a Roman Catholic: That he is yet continued in the commission of peace, and is reputed to be a deputy lieutenant.

"2. Mr. Arnold says, That, about ten years since, he knew William Jones, of Llanarth, esq.; that he was a justice of the peace, and deputy lieutenant of Monmouthshire; hath been informed by a worthy member of this house, that before and at the time of his death he was a papist: He hath heard some papists brag, that he died a papist; and that his son is now bred in a college of Jesuits in France, or elsewhere in foreign parts: He says, That he hath been informed, by the minister and others, that most of that parish are papists: He says, That though several warrants have issued from the justices, to have accounts of defaults for not coming to church; no returns could be had for these two years last past, the churchwardens and constables being papists.

"3. Mr. Thomas Watkins, vicar of the parish of Llanarth, upon his oath, says, That there are above fourscore reputed popish recusants within this parish, besides children and servants; three reputed popish priests residing and officiating there, to wit, one Syliard, who was lately tutor to Mr. Jones's two sons, who are now beyond seas, as he verily believes, one Walter Harries, residing at Mrs. Milborne's house at Clitha, a hamlet of Llanarth; and one Andrews, at Bettus.

"4. Mr. Charles Morgan, upon his oath, deposeth, That Mr. Syliard, a reputed popish priest, lives with Mrs. Jones of Llanarth, widow to Mr. William Jones of Llanarth, who was a justice of peace.

"5. Mr. John Greenhaugh, vicar of Abergavenny and Llantilio-Bartholy in the county of Monmouth, upon his oath, deposeth, That there is, or hath of late been, one Mr. Evans, a reputed popish priest, entertained at the house of Charles Proger, esq., in the said parish of Llantilio, who is a justice of peace; That he bath seen great numbers of men and women resort thither to mass, as he conceives.

“6. Mr. Arnold says, That he hath been informed, that Mass was very lately and publicly said at Llanthroby, a house belonging to Rowland Prichard, esq., now a justice of peace of Monmouthshire; where one Thomas Elliot a popish priest, formerly committed to Hereford gaol as such, doth officiate: That he informed the said Mr. Prichard of it; and that it was dangerous to him, and scandalous to religion, for him to suffer it: The said Mr. Prichard answered, That he had ten pounds rent extraordinary for it; and that would do him more good than the scandal could hurt him: That Mr. Prichard is nephew to Mr. Harry Milborne.

“7. Mr. Charles Morgan, upon his oath, deposeth, That he hath credibly heard, that Rowland Prichard, esq. hath ten pounds per annum more, for his house at Lantroby, for suffering one Mr. Williams, a reputed popish priest, to be there sometimes.

“8. Mr. Arnold says, That he knows Harry Milborne, esq. to be a justice of peace in four counties, whereof Monmouthshire is one: and that he the said Milborne, ever since he came into the commission of the peace for Monmouthshire, hath kept papists for his clerks, who received and kept all presentments: One of them called Bowyer, was indicted for treasonable words at Hereford assizes, of which the Herefordshire members can give a more perfect account; the other named Peter Roberts, a papist convict: the said Mr. Arnold says, and Henry Probart, esq. upon his oath, deposeth, that they both as justices of the peace of the county of Monmouth, on the 17th day of April, 1677, did often tender the oaths of allegiance and supremacy to the said Peter Roberts; which the said Roberts, with contempt, did refuse to take: that they both required the said Mr. Milborne, being then present, to join with them in the tender of the said oath, and in committing the said Roberts: which he refused: whereupon the said Mr. Arnold and Mr. Probart did by warrant and mittimus, commit the said Roberts to one Hugh Powell, one of the chief constables for the hundred of Skenfrith; to convey him to his majesty's gaol: whereupon the said Harry Milborne did lay violent hands upon the chief constable, and pushed him away, whilst the said Roberts made his escape; and bid the said Roberts begone: which he did accordingly; and though he was pursued, yet did escape.

“The said Mr. Arnold further says, That Kemish. I am not able to speak in my own defence, and I have had no time to prepare myself.

L. C. J. Captain, he shall speak softly to you, and you shall report it to the court again.

Captain Richardson. You may speak softly to me, and I will give an account what you say.

L. C. J. How will he be tried? ask him.

he had often heard the said Mr. Milbourne, at privy sessions, both discourage constables from presenting of popish recusants, and also declare, that it was contrary to law to present them at a privy sessions: And that the law of 1 Eliz. was not intended against papists. He also knoweth, that the said Mr. Milborne, at the end of last Easter or Midsummer sessions did procure an order, that neither the said Henry Probart, nor himself, should act as justices in the hundred of Skenfrith, though no justice lived in the said hundred, and they live both near to it: and that the said Mr. Milbourne obtained another order of the quarter sessions, to vacate that they had done at a privy sessions, where they had convicted above 300 papists; the copies of which orders were denied him by the clerk of the peace and his clerks: and he verily believes, that the reason of making both their orders was, because the said Mr. Probart and himself, did their duty faithfully, and did put the laws in execution against the papists.

“9. Mr. Arnold says, That he knoweth, and Mr. Charles Morgan by his oath deposeth, that most of the said Harry Milbourne's family and household, are papists.

“10. And Mr. Arnold says, That he was present when one Mr. Roger Seys did demand of Mr. Milbourne, a warrant to apprehend one Walter Price, whom the said Mr. Seys offered to prove to be a popish priest, kept in the house of Mrs. Catherine and Mrs. Christian Milborne, sisters to the said Mr. Milborne: which the said Mr. Milborne not only refused to grant, but threatened the said Mr. Seys for demanding the same. And lastly he saith, that he hath been credibly informed, that Mr. Milborne is a trustee of many of the papists in Hereford and Monmouthshires.

“11. Henry Probart, esq. upon his oath saith, That Mr. Arnold with himself and others, kept a privy sessions in Llantilio-Gresseny in the county of Monmouth, where the constables presented a great number of popish recusants; but at the next quarter sessions there was an order made, vacating all that was done at the said privy sessions; though very little or nothing was done there, but about the presentment of papists: and further, That he doth in his conscience believe, that the said Mr. Milborne was the main agent and instrument of making and obtaining the said order.

“12. John Scudamore, esq. justice of the peace of Herefordshire, says, That having desired one Mr. Harry Milborne, a justice of peace for that county, to join with him in issuing out warrants to levy 12d. a Sunday on popish Kemish. I would desire my trial might be deferred till I be in a condition to answer for myself.

L. C. J. What say you, brothers, I think his request is very reasonable; he appears not to recusants, he always refuseth so to do; affirming that the statute of 1 Eliz. was never intended against papists.—That he hath been credibly informed, That the greatest part of the family and household of the said Mr. Milburne, and great part of the parish within he lives, are papists: That he hath known two of Mr. Milburne's clerks, who received and kept all returns and presentments, and were both declared papists, the name of one being John Bowyer, who was tried at Hereford for treasonable words; the name of the other Peter Roberts, who is or was lately his clerk.

“13. Mr. Roger Seys and Mr. Lewis Price, upon their oaths severally depose, That they were present when John Arnold and Henry Probart, esqrs. did commit Peter Roberts, clerk to Mr. Milburne, for refusing to take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance: and that the said Mr. Milburne rescued the said Roberts out of the hands of the chief constable, who thereupon made his escape.

“The said Mr. Seys farther deposeth, That he, being churchwarden, did on the 17th day of April, 1677, demand a warrant from Mr. Milburne against Walter Harryes alias Price, a popish priest, who liveth with Mrs. Christian and Catherine Milburne, sisters to the said Milburne: which warrant Mr. Milburne refused to grant, but threatened him with opprobrious words, telling him, that he was a busy troublesome man, and that he would be upon his skirts.

“14. Lambert Miles, upon his oath, saith, That about the year 1675 or 1676, being petty constable of Llantilio-Gresseu, he went to Mr. Milburne, a justice of peace, with his presentment to be approved of and subscribed by the said Mr. Milburne; wherein several popish recusants were presented for not coming to church: That the said Mr. Milburne struck out, or caused to be struck out, several of their names; and the oath, that it was a true presentment, was omitted; he the said Miles refusing to take it, unless the names of the said popish recusants, struck out, as aforesaid, by Mr. Milburne, or his order, were inserted therein: That thereupon the said Lambert Miles never presented those struck out any more, nor swore to any presentment after, though he continued petty constable two years.

be in a condition of taking his trial now, and Mr. Attorney is willing he should be set aside till next sessions.

Att. Gen. (Sir Creswel Levins.) It is, I think, very fit, if your lordships please.

“16. Mr. Roger Seys, upon his oath, deposeth, That, he being churchwarden, Isaac Williams, one of the coroners of the county of Monmouth, did check him for putting the statute in execution against popish recusants for not coming to church; and told him, that it was pity to prosecute them, for they were honest people: And, by way of discourse, did hold many arguments with him, in vindication of the Romish religion.

“17. Mr. John Greenhaugh, vicar of Abergavenny, upon his oath, saith, That Mary the wife of Mr. Lewis Jones, was the only person in that town severely prosecuted for a Roman catholic, though there were many convict papists of greater ability in the town: And that it was done after her conformity and reconciliation to the church of England: And that her husband told him, that he had paid to the under-sheriff nine pounds ten shillings, notwithstanding his certificate, under his hand and seal, of her conformity.

“18. Mr. Scudamore says, That about five years since, he apprehended one Mr. Elliott, a popish priest, habited in his cope and other vests, in the act of the celebration of mass in a chapel in Herefordshire; wherein he observed an altar, lighted tapers, and several images: He asked the said Elliott, how he durst say mass so publicly, there being at mass above thirty persons, being there was a proclamation to the contrary: Mr. Elliott answered, That he knew of no proclamation; but demanded by what authority he took him, telling him that he should have no thanks for apprehending him. Mr. Scudamore saith, That he thereupon committed Elliott to the county gaol; and the next assizes caused a bill to be presented against him, which was found: But before his trial he was taken out of the gaol, and, as the under-sheriff informed him, he was moved to the Tower of London.

“19. It appeareth to the committee by the original records and papers produced before them, That the said John Scudamore did by his mittimus, dated the 17th of September 1671, commit the said Elliott, as a popish priest, to the county-gaol of Hereford, until he should be thence-delivered by due course of law: That by warrant counter-signed by Mr. secretary Trevor, dated the 24th of January following, directed to Marshal Briggs, esq. high-sheriff of the county of Hereford, the said Elliott was brought up to London; in order to his delivery over to the lieutenant of the Tower: That, by warrant counter-signed by Mr. secretary Trevor, dated the 15th of February following, directed to the lieutenant of the Tower, the said Elliott was committed to the said Tower until further order: And accordingly the said Mr. Elliott was delivered by the high-sheriff of Justice Dolben. He must plead first. Have you recorded his plea?

Cl. of Cr. Yes, it is recorded.

L. C. J. Why then look you, Capt. Richardson, you must take him back; the court does think fit, and Mr. Attorney does think fit, by reason of his extraordinary infirmity that it is not reasonable to try him now. And that the world may not say we are grown barbarous and inhuman, we are all contented

Hereford into the lieutenant of the Tower's custody. That, by warrant, counter-signed by Mr. secretary Trevor, dated the 4th of March following, the lieutenant of the Tower was commanded to enlarge and set at liberty the said William Elliott, first taking security from him to transport himself out of the realm into some parts beyond seas, within ten days next after such enlargement; and not to return into any of his majesty's dominions, without leave first obtained: That accordingly the said lieutenant took a bond, in his majesty's name, from the said Elliott, with two sureties in the sum of five hundred pounds; and thereupon set the said Elliott at liberty: That at the next assizes and general gaol delivery for the county of Hereford, the 24th of March following, the said William Elliott was indicted for being a seminary-priest; which indictment was found by the grand jury; and to which indictment John Marriott, John Cole, and Arthur Lister, were witnesses: who by their informations, taken upon oath, and produced to the committee by the clerk of assize, do severally depose, the apprehending of the said Elliott in the act of celebration of mass, as Mr. Scudamore hath set forth in his examination aforesaid.—The said Mr. Elliott, by his examination and confession, produced to the committee by the clerk of assize, and taken before sir Edward Harley, John Scudamore and William Gregory, esqrs., justices of the peace for the county of Hereford, says, That he was apprehended when he was at his private devotion; but confesseth, that there were then in the same room with him at devotion about six-and twenty persons: That he was habited in a surplice, with a vestment over it. And, being examined, whether he was a priest, or in orders from the church of Rome, he refused to answer thereunto; but said, Let it be proved against me; I will not accuse myself.

"20. It appeareth to the committee, by the information of Mr. Joseph Newton, clerk of the peace, of Northumberland, That William Fenwick, esq. is lately put into the commission of the peace for that county: That he, being one of the commissioners in the Dedimus, did offer to swear the said Mr. Fenwick: But the said Mr. Fenwick refused, and told the said clerk of the peace several times, That he would not take his oath, as justice of peace.—The said clerk of the peace further informed the committee, that he was employed by Mr. Neale, and others of that county, to procure them to be put into the commission of the peace: That, to effect it, he applied to the lord chancellor's servants: who answered, That if those he solicited for, were papists, or suspected to be such, that it could not be done: whereupon he desisted in his solicitation, "21. The knights for the county of Northumberland informed the committee, That, bearing that Mr. Fenwick was designed to be put into the commission of the peace, they both attended the duke of Newcastle, who is Custos of that county; and afterward attended the lord-chancellor; and informed both their lordships severally, That Mr. Fenwick was unfit to be put into the commission; for that he was a suspected papist, and would not act as a justice of the peace, if he were put in; That his wife died a profest papist; That his children were brought up in the Romish religion: and therefore they did desire both their lordships, severally, That Mr. Fenwick should not be put into the commission of the peace: That they likewise did desire their lordships, severally, that William Carnaby, esq. might be put into the commission of the peace; representing him to be a gentleman of estate, quality and loyalty in the county, professing the protestant religion, and every way qualified for that employment: But notwithstanding their applications and recommendation, Mr. Carnaby was refused to be put into the commission, and Mr. Fenwick was put into the commission; though they both informed their lordships severally, that Mr. Fenwick was formerly left out of the commission of the peace, because he was a papist, or a suspected papist.

"The Third Head.

"The Proceedings in the Exchequer against Recusants.

"It appeareth to the committee, that the lord-treasurer, the 25th of February 1674, issued his warrant to the treasurer's remembrancer, to issue commissions against Recusants, into all counties from whence any had been estreated; which were delivered to the judges to be recommended by them to the several commissioners in the several counties of their circuits.

"That the like warrant was issued the 22d day of July 1675, with commissioners' names, and instructions to them, to take and seize two third-parts of all the lands of Recusants; declaring his majesty's pleasure to refuse the twenty pounds a month, imposed on Recusants for not coming to church, and to accept of two third-parts of the lands of Recusants; directing the returns to be made with all speed; and writs of attendance and assistance to the several sheriffs, mayors, and officers, to attend the commissioners in the execution of the commissions: That, as estreats out of other countries came in, the like warrants issued: And those commissions were, by messengers of the Exchequer, delivered to the clerks of the peace of the several counties;

he should be set by. Therefore let him be returned back, and in the mean time you must take care that he have that reasonable looking to as is fit for a man in his condition to have.

L. C. Baron. Acquaint him with what the court says to you.

with a letter from the lord-treasurer, recommending the execution of the said commissions.

“That the lord-treasurer afterwards, by advice of his majesty’s counsel at law, the approbation of the chancellor, chief-baron, barons of the Exchequer, and of sir Charles Harbord, his majesty’s surveyor-general, altered the former course and issued his warrant the 14th of March 1676; thereby directing writs to be issued to the several sheriffs, to seize two thirds, as before, of the estates of Recusants.

“The 4th of July 1677, the like warrants issued, for writs to be made out, as well against all Recusants formerly, as then estreated; returnable in Michaelmas term following.

“It appeared to the committee, That no convictions are estreated out of some counties, as Chester, Northampton, Oxford, Rutland, nor any out of Wales: That in other counties there are no executions done, either upon the commissions or writs, as Derby, the city of York, Hertford, Leicester, Nottingham, Norfolk, and Northumberland.

“The sheriff of Hereford stands charged with the sum of 41*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* halfpenny half-farthing, for the lands of several Recusants, for one year and a half, ended at Michaelmas 1677. But the sheriff hath not finished his accounts: So that it did not appear to the committee, that any sum has been levied out of the Recusants estates in that county.

“It appeareth to the committee, That Rowland Prichard, esq. sheriff of the county of Monmouth, stood charged for the year ending at Michaelmas 1677, with nine seizures of the estates of Recusants; which amounted to 40*l.* that five of the nine were levied, which amounted to 4*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*

“That, upon his petition, because illeivable, he was discharged of the other four, amounting to 35*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* so that the sum that was answered into the Exchequer for that year, out of Recusants estates in that county was 4*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*

“It appeared then to the committee, That the persons upon whom the five seizures were executed, were Protestant Dissenters, and not Popish Recusants; and that the four others, whereof the sheriff was discharged, were Popish Recusants.

“The sum wherewith the sheriff of Monmouthshire stands charged for the year ending at Michaelmas 1677, being for two-and-twenty seizures, amounts to 61*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.* farthing half-farthing: But the sheriff not having finished his accounts, it could not appear to the committee what could be answered into the Exchequer.

Capt. Richardson. I will, my lord.
Att. Gen. Mylord, I desire that the judges may declare their opinion in it.

L. C. J. They have done so already, we do all consent to it; therefore take him, and go get him a bed.

“It appeared to the committee, That the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, for the year ending at Michaelmas, 1675, stand charged for the lands of Recusants with the sum of 100*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* of which there is answered into the Exchequer 8*s.* 4*d.* for the lands of John Coffin, Recusant: The rest are all discharged by plea and judgment of court.

“The same sheriff stands charged, for the year 1676, for the lands of Recusants, with the sum of 566*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* of which there is only answered into the Exchequer, the sum of 3*s.* 4*d.* for the lands of John Coffin, Recusant; the rest being all discharged by plea and judgment.

“The same sheriffs stand charged, for the year 1677, with the sum of 488*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* but their accounts are not finished: So that it could not appear to the committee how much would be answered into the Exchequer.

“It appeared to the committee, That the yearly revenue out of Recusants estates in England and Wales, paid into the Exchequer for the year 1675, amounted to 78*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* For the year 1676, it amounted to 535*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*

“That the present yearly revenue out of Recusants estates, now in charge before the clerk of the Pipe, is 3,408*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.* half-farthing: But how much thereof will be answered into the Exchequer, could not appear to the committee; the sheriffs for this year being not yet opposed upon their accounts.

On the 16th of November, in the same year, the House voted the following Address to the King:

“May it please your Majesty;
“We your majesty’s most loyal and dutiful subjects the Commons in Parliament assembled, having information, that Charles Mebaine hath continued in custody in the borough of Denbigh, in the county of Denbigh, since June last, upon violent suspicion of being a popish priest; and that William Lloyd now remains in gaol at Brecon, in the county of Brecon, upon a commitment for being a popish priest: and forasmuch as your majesty’s justice for the great sessions for the county of Denbigh, at the great sessions held for the said county in September last, did not try the said Charles Mebaine for the said offence: your majesty’s Protestant subjects being much disquieted, and popish recusants animated, by reason that delinquents of that kind are not brought to speedy justice, especially at this time of manifest danger to your majesty’s sacred person, government, and religion established by law, proceeding from the notorious conspiracies of popish priests, jesuits, and popish recusants: We, humbly apprehending it to be highly necessary, as some ease to the hearts of your majesty's good Protestant subjects, filled with present fears of popery, to have the laws speedily and effectually executed upon popish priests; do, with all humility, beseech your majesty, to grant one or more commissions of Oyer and Terminer, for the trial of the said Charles Me-haine and William Lloyd, according to the known and well-established laws of the kingdom.—And we do further most humbly beseech your majesty, That your majesty may be pleased to command your attorney-general, with all care and diligence to prepare the whole evidence against James Colker,* a Benedictine monk, and who assumes to himself the title of bishop of London, for his trial, at the next gaol-delivery for the county of Middlesex and city of London.—And we do further humbly beseech your majesty, That your majesty will graciously be pleased to issue forth your Proclamation, with a promise of a reward to any person that shall apprehend a popish priest or jesuit."

Cl. of Cr. Set William Russel, alias Napper, to the bar. Who was arraigned upon an indictment of the same form, only the day of the fact differing, which was laid to be the 27th of November, in 30 Car. 2. To which he likewise pleaded Not Guilty, and put himself upon the country.

And six days afterwards they resolved, That a bill be prepared for the more easy and speedy discovery of Popish Priests.

On 20th of May, 1679, the Commons ordered, That a Message should be sent to the Lords concerning the condemned Popish Priests sent for up to London from the several county gaols, by order of their lordships; and two days afterwards, "Sir Wm. Francklyn reports from the Committee appointed to draw up and prepare a Message to be sent to the Lords, concerning the popish priests condemned in the circuits, That the Committee had agreed upon a Message to be reported to the House: which he read in his place; and afterwards, delivered the same in at the clerk's table: where the same was twice read, and, upon the question agreed, and is as followeth; viz.

"The House of Commons having made an humble Address to his majesty, That he would please to give order to the judges to issue out their warrants for the executing the several popish priests condemned in the several circuits; and his majesty having been graciously pleased to signify to the House of Commons, That your Lordships have sent for them, in order, as he conceived, to some examinations; and the House of Commons being also informed, that the said priests have, by order from your Lordships, not only been brought

* This appears to be the person, of whom, under the name of James Corker, two trials on July 18, 1679, and January 17, 1680, are reported.

Cl. of Cr. Set Honry Starkey to the bar. Whose indictment was the same, only the time differing, which was the 26th of January 30 Car. 2. And he also pleaded Not Guilty, and put himself upon the country.

Cl. of Cr. Set William Marshal to the bar. Who being arraigned upon a like indictment; and the time mentioned to be the 15th of January 30 Car. 2. And being asked, Whether Guilty, or Not Guilty, answered thus:

Marshal. My lord, I do find by this indictment, That I am arraigned for the same crime for which I was tried before: I do humbly desire to know, whether, according to law, I can be tried twice for the same fact?

L. C. J. No, according to the law you cannot be tried twice for the same fact, nor are you; for before you were indicted for having an hand in the great conspiracy, for being a conspirator in the Plot, and now you are tried for being a priest, and abiding in England.

Marshal. I was tried before your lordship as a traitor.*

L. C. J. You were so.

Marshal. Now I am tried for a priest.

L. C. J. Which is another treason.

Marshal. If I am tried for a priest, I conceive I cannot be tried unless as a criminal priest: and I conceive I cannot be tried as a criminal priest, unless it be as a priest that hath had some attempt or design against the government.

L. C. J. Nay, you mistake there: there may be priests that have had no hand in the Plot; if you were acquitted for the Plot, yet you remain a priest still. Do you suppose then that every priest had a hand in the Plot?

Marshal. My lord, I humbly conceive, that priesthood, as priesthood, is no crime at all.

L. C. J. That is no crime at all.

Justice Dolben. Come, you must plead out of the several countries where they were condemned, but continued yet in Newgate, and other prisons, in or about the cities of London and Westminster; by reason whereof the execution of the sentence, pronounced upon them, is still delayed; do desire of your lordships, that the said priests may be forthwith remanded to the several counties where they were condemned, that so they may be executed according to the judgments passed upon them."

And on the 8th of January, 1681, the House appointed a Committee to enquire and examine what Popish Priests convicted are in Newgate and other gaols in the kingdom, and to enquire into their conditions and circumstances. It also appears from the Journals, that king Charles the Second did issue a Proclamation, offering a reward of 20l. for the apprehension of every Popish Priest, and that accordingly many besides those whose Trials are included in this Collection, were apprehended.

* See his Case, supra, p. 589.

without more ado; and you must not use any more speeches.

L. C. J. You must be governed in all things by the direction of the court.

Marshal. I do submit to the direction of this honourable Bench: but, my lord, give me leave to say, I suppose I am indicted upon 27 Eliz. Now if it be made appear, that according to that statute priesthood alone is not treason—

Justice Dolben. Then you must speak it afterwards, but now you must plead.

Marshal. But if it be at least made doubtful, then it becomes matter of law; and I have just occasion to insist upon it, and pray counsel.

Justice Dolben. You must plead to the indictment first.

Marshal. Why, can I ask counsel after plea pleaded?

L. C. J. Yes, you may, if matter of law arise, and you may have counsel as to that matter.

Justice Atkins. The court is of counsel for you in such a case.

L. C. Baron. But you must plead first.

Justice Pemberton. You cannot be heard at all till you have pleaded to the indictment.

L. C. J. Pray take the directions of the court.

Marshal. I have a great deal of reason to submit to this honourable court that hath been so full of mercy and clemency, and therefore I do answer, That I am Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. How wilt thou be tried?

Marshal. By the king and my country.

L. C. J. No, no, that will not do.

Marshal. By God and my country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance. Set Alexander Lumsden to the bar. Whose Indictment being of the same nature, only reciting the fact to be 11 Maii 31 Car. 2, he pleaded Not Guilty, and put himself upon the country.

Cl. of Cr. Set James Corker to the bar; who was also arraigned for the same treason, done upon the 24 October, 30 Car. 2. And being asked, Whether Guilty or Not Guilty, answered in these words.

Corker. My lord, I humbly beg the judgment of the court; I humbly conceive, my lord, I have been already tried and acquitted for this crime.*

L. C. J. Look you, that hath been overruled already in the case of Marshal just now, who is in the same condition: you are not now tried for the same fact for which you were tried before.

Corker. My lord, I suppose there is something particular in my case; I was expressly indicted as clerk, one that received orders from the See of Rome.

Justice Pemberton. His addition was Clerk, that is all.

L. C. J. But you were not charged in that indictment for this fact.

Corker. My lord, I pleaded to that indictment under that qualification of clerk.

L. C. J. So men do when they say in the indictment 'Labourer,' plead to it in that qualification; but if a man plead by the name of gent. the question is not whether he be a gent. or no, but whether he be guilty of the fact he is indicted for: and the question in your case was not whether you were clerk or were not clerk, but whether you had a hand in the Plot or no.

Justice Atkins. If the jury had found you a priest at that time, it had been a void finding, more than they were to enquire of.

Mr. Belwood. He was told so at that time, he was not tried for a priest.

Justice Ellis. After you have pleaded, then you may urge what you have to say.

Corker. Then I say, I am Not Guilty.—And he put himself upon the country.

Cl. of Cr. Set Lionel Anderson, alias Munsion, to the bar. Whose indictment was for being a priest, and abiding here the 28th Jan. 30 Car. 2. And he pleaded Not Guilty, and put himself upon the country.

Cl. of Cr. Set Charles Parria, alias Parry, to the bar. Whose indictment was of the same nature, for abiding here 30 Maii 31 Car. 2. And he also pleaded Not Guilty, and put himself upon the country.

Cl. of Cr. Set all the prisoners to the bar that are to be tried. William Russel, Henry Starkey, William Marshal, Alexander Lumsden, James Corker, Lionel Anderson, and Charles Parry.

Capt. Richardson. They are all on.

Russel. My lord, I have been confined, I have not had my liberty till within these two or three days.

L. C. J. What then?

Russel. I have not had my friends to come to me to advise me upon what account I was to be tried.

Capt. Richardson. He says, he wanted his friends to advise for what he was to be tried.

L. C. J. Why, he knows he is to be tried for a Popish Priest.

Capt. Richardson. Here is one says he is sick.

L. C. J. Who is that?

Capt. Richardson. It is Anderson.

Justice Pemberton. Then he must have a chair to sit down on.

L. C. J. We will try him first that is sick.

Then the prisoners were called to their challenges, and the jury of Middlesex appearing upon their summons, and none of them being excepted against, the twelve that were first called and sworn, were the gentlemen following: John Bradshaw, Lawrence Wood, Matthew Bateman, John Vyner, Francis Mayo, Martin James, Anthony Hall, Samuel Jewel, Richard Bealing, Thomas Hall, Richard Brownfield, Samuel Lynne. Then they were numbered, and proclamation for information in usual manner was made.

L. C. J. Come, begin with the sick man Anderson; and set away the rest.

* See his Case, sup. p. 589.

Cl. of Cr. Lionel Anderson, hold up thy hand. You that are sworn, look upon the prisoner and hearken to his cause. He stands indicted by the name of Lionel Anderson, &c. Upon this indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto hath pleaded Not Guilty; and for his trial hath put himself upon God and his country, which country you are. Your charge is to enquire, whether he be Guilty, &c.

Mr. Belwood. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; the prisoner at the bar, Lionel Anderson, alias Munson, stands indicted for high-treason; and it is alledged in the Indictment, That he being born within the king's dominions, and made a priest, and having received orders by pretended authority from the see of Rome, he did the 28th day of January last come into the kingdom of England, that is, as it is laid, in the parish of St. Giles in the Fields, in this county; and there he did abide contrary to the form of the statute. And this is laid to be traiterously done. To this he hath pleaded Not Guilty, and we are to prove it upon him by the king's evidence whom we are now to call.

Anderson. My lord, for my staying in the kingdom, I had the king's express command, and an order from the Council-Board: In the year 1671, they ordered Mr. Peter Welsh, and myself, with four or five others, who had in writing asserted his majesty's just rights over all his subjects, whether Protestant or Papist, against those so frequently imputed usurpations of the court of Rome. After this plot was discovered I came to the king, being afraid of being involved in the general calamity, and said to him, 'Sir, I desire to know what to do?'

L. C. J. Do, why?

Anderson. Good my lord hear me out. My Lord Privy-Seal brought me an order from the Council-board, and so it is recorded; and I think Dr. Oates will be so just to me, as to acknowledge that he hath seen it, and this is all that I have to say.

L. C. J. If you have an order from the council to protect you, you must apply yourself elsewhere? our business is to try the single issue, whether you have offended against the law.

Anderson. My lord, I that am but a poor little individuum, who am born with an innate and implicit obedience to my king, pray judge whether it lie in my power to dispute with him and his council, whether they can legally do this or no? Or that I ought to obey the king's command. My lord I am put upon a hard dilemma; if I (notwithstanding his majesty's command to the contrary) go out of the kingdom, then the severe imputation upon us is urged against me, That I have, with my religion, renounced my natural allegiance: And if I stay, then by the law (as you tell me) I forfeit my life.

Mr. Belwood. This is not a time for him now to insist on this matter.

L. C. J. Reserve yourself till the king's counsel have done, and the evidence given.

Mr. Justice Jones. Let him save his speech till such time as he comes to answer for himself.

L. C. J. Give him a chair if he be not able to stand.

Sir J. Keeling. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, Lionel Anderson, otherwise Munson, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted here, for that he being a subject born within the dominions of the king, hath taken orders from the see of Rome, and hath contrary to the law come into England, and staid here as a traitor: For this treason he is indicted, and the indictment is grounded upon the statute of the 27th Eliz. a statute made almost an hundred years since, and it was upon great occasion: For it tells you plainly, That these priests that had taken orders from the see of Rome, were not only busy in seducing and perverting the king's subjects to the Romish superstition; but they had made many attempts upon the government, raising sedition and rebellion, and levying war against their sovereign; which is evident from the preamble of the statute itself. And it is true, the lenity and mildness of our princes hath in a great measure let this statute lie asleep; they have not been willing to execute the severity of the law upon all occasions at all times: but the occasion being renewed at this time, for the remedying of which this statute was principally made (that is to say, raising seditions and commotions, and rebellion against the king, the particulars of which I shall not enlarge upon, it hath been notorious in this place) that is the reason of the present prosecution of these persons: Who have not been contented to enjoy the indulgence of our princes, (which hath been extended to them, notwithstanding all their former numerous affronts that they have given) but have raised new commotions, and made attempts upon the person of our king, and of our government, and that is the occasion upon which these persons come to be tried. It is not purely (though that is a main ingredient) that they are tried quatenus priests, but as ordained by the see of Rome, and coming into England and abiding here. For a priest, if he be ordained by the see of Rome, if he comes not here, can do no hurt; but it is his coming and abiding here, that makes him the subject of this punishment, and hath occasioned this man's prosecution. Now, my lord, we shall prove that this Anderson alias Munson, hath taken orders from the see of Rome, whose authority constituted him a priest, and this we shall prove by several instances and steps; and then we doubt not but you will take that care for the preservation of the government, and for the peace and quiet of the nation, which becomes you, and give a verdict according as your evidence shall lead you.

Serjeant Strode. My lord, we shall call our evidence. The fact is this, That this person being a subject of the king's, and having received orders from the see of Rome, that is, being a Romish priest, did come and abide here contrary to the statute; not that his priesthood is the crime, no it is his being a subject of the king's and owning an authority from abroad, and thereby denying the authority of his own sovereign. To prove this, we shall call Dr. Oates, Mr. Bedlow, Mr. Dangerfield, and Mr. Praunce. [Who were all sworn.] Set up Mr. Dangerfield first. Mr. Dangerfield, tell my lord and the jury what you know of the prisoner at the bar, Mr. Anderson.

Dangerfield. What I do know against him?

L. C. J. Yes, for being a priest?

Dangerfield. What, that particularly?

L. C. J. Yes, that particularly.

Dangerfield. My lord, about the latter end of May, or beginning of June, when I was a prisoner for debt in the King's-bench, this person took occasion to speak privately to me, and desired me to go into his room: He told me he had received a letter from my lady Powis, and that letter was burnt. But the next letter that came from my lady Powis, he would shew it me. And he did so; and the contents of the letter was, as near as I can remember, just thus: 'Sir, you must desire Willoughby to scour his kettle;' which was to confess and receive the sacrament to be true to the cause. A little after, that was Saturday, and I think it was the next day, being Sunday, I went into Mr. Anderson's alias Munson's chamber, and there I went to confession, and received absolution. And he sent me to another person to receive the sacrament, who was saying mass at that time. And when I had received the sacrament and returned to him again, he did tell me, That he, as a priest, did give me free toleration to go and be drunk, and drink with one Stroude: and I asked him, being something scrupulous in the matter, whether I might lawfully do it, having but just received the sacrament? he told me, Yes, he gave me authority so to do, being for the good of the cause.

L. C. J. Were you a Papist then?

Dangerfield. Yes, I was.

Just. Atkins. You went to confession to him, and received absolution?

Mr. Belwood. What was the good of the cause that he meant?

Serj. Storde. If you please, give an account of the whole thing.

Dangerfield. That was, as I was employed in a general affair for the Catholics: For I was to use my endeavour to bring over Stroude to be a witness for the lords in the Tower, concerning the plot, and to invalidate Mr. Bedlow's testimony.

Anderson. Here I am upon my life and death: all the world knows me, that hath heard of my name—

Just. Pemberton. Pray make no speeches, if you will ask any questions you may.

Anderson. No, I won't. Pray do not interrupt me; I perceive you have a pique against my life, and it may be I am as ready to give it, as you are to desire it; I wish that all the punishments of hell and damnation may come upon me, if ever I opened my mouth to this rogue for one farthing, or about any such business in the world.

L. C. J. You must not call him rogue in open court. Let us have that respect shewn us that is fitting, and so shall you have; but this language we must not suffer.

Anderson. In the first place, I will bring all the prisoners in the King's-bench prison to testify, That I desired to be removed to Newgate, for here was the greatest rogue come in that was in England.

Just. Pemberton. This must not be suffered.

L. C. J. If you will ask him any questions, you may.

Anderson. Well, come Mr. Dangerfield, in the first place, Who ever saw you with me? It is impossible but somebody must see you with me, if we were together, as you say.

Dangerfield. My lord, there is one Hill, that is now a prisoner in the king's-bench, that saw me several times go into his chamber.

L. C. J. Was there any body by when you confessed yourself to him?

Justice Dolben. Confessions used to be in secret.

Dangerfield. No, my lord, he was not in the chamber, neither was it reasonable he should, but he saw me go in often.

Anderson. Surely, Mr. Dangerfield, you and I could not be so well acquainted, but somebody or other must take notice, that we spoke together sometimes. Now if you can produce any one body that will testify it, I will be bound to be hanged, and say no more.

Justice Atkins. He is not bound to bring witnesses to this purpose. He swears the fact charged upon you positively.

Dangerfield. This Hill, my lord, that is in the King's-bench, hath made oath of it before Mr. Justice Foster.

Anderson. But, my lord, this one thing I have to say against this rogue; there is a statute, made since his majesty's happy restoration, which judges what shall be treason during his majesty's life: And after enumerating the crimes, directing that the offender 'shall be convicted by the oaths of two lawful,' adds 'and credible witnesses.' As if the prudence of our legislators, which brings good out of evil, and measures the subjects future safety by past practices, judges that clause necessary, 'and credible.'

L. C. J. Pray speak out, Sir, for I cannot hear you.

Anderson. My lord, I understand the meaning applicable to me thus, That since the statute does use the word 'credible' as well as legal, it does judge that both would be very necessary. Now that he is not a credible witness I can prove—

L. C. J. Why is he not credible? Certainly if he be legal he is credible.

Anderson. No, my lord, that does not follow. First the—Recorder. It is not his time to make this sort of defence.

Justice Dolben. He should have done it before the witness was sworn, if he would except against his testimony.

L. C. J. But why is he not a good witness, pray?

Anderson. My lord, a man pilloried twice, that hath broke prison once, and committed other heinous offences—

L. C. J. Where is the record of any of this?

Anderson. My lord, I'll tell you how I prove it. That worthy gentleman, colonel Mansel, whom this villain would have involved in—

L. C. J. You must not do thus, abuse persons with words, without proof.

Anderson. What, to prove it is day?

Justice Pemberton. He must not be suffered so to do.

Anderson. Why, here is capt. Richardson, [taking him at the same time by the shoulders] knows what I say to be true: Come, speak, you have been familiarly acquainted with that rogue, (pointing at Dangerfield.) [Captain Richardson laughing, I must not witness.] My lord, I will do thus no more; indulge a little to my innocency and infirmity.

Justice Pemberton. You do not seem to have so much infirmity upon you.

Anderson. My lord, I will produce that worthy gentleman, col. Mansel, whose innocent blood was designed to be shed by that villain; who stood qualified then (as he doth now) with that magnificent title of the king's evidence; but as soon as col. Mansel urged, that he was pilloried twice, &c. our worshipful king's evidence was clapped up, and col. Mansel left at liberty.

L. C. J. Have you that record here?

Anderson. I have not.

Sir John Keiling. We pray we may go on then.

Serj. Strode. Set up Dr. Oates. Dr. Oates, will you tell what you know of this matter?

Oates. My lord, he is a priest, I can in sincerity say it; I have heard him say mass myself.

L. C. J. Where?

Anderson. It is very true, I did it; but, my lord, I will shew you, mass is no proof of a priest: For, 1. The statute makes a difference between saying mass, and being a priest; in punishing priests with death; but saying of mass, with a pecuniary mulct of 200 marks, and a year's imprisonment.

Oates. He does execute the office of a priest, for I have been at confession with him as a priest, and have seen him consecrate the Sacrament, and I have seen his letters of orders as a priest?

L. C. J. Did he wear the habit of a priest?

Oates. Yes, at mass.

Mr. Belwood. Pray, Sir, are you sure you saw his orders as a priest?

Oates. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. Of what order is he?

Oates. A Dominican frier he is.

L. C. J. What can you say to that?

Anderson. I can say enough; but what can

I say against the king's evidence? your lordship sees this makes a very fine juggle, but there is no proof of it.

L. C. J. We can go no further than the evidence. He says, you are a Dominican frier: That he heard you say mass: That he saw you consecrate the Sacrament. And I am sure you allow none but a priest to do that.

Anderson. I understand by the laws of England, that I am tried upon a statute which makes priesthood a crime. Now I will ask Mr. Oates a question: Mr. Oates, can you prove, that I received orders from the see of Rome? You are to prove, by this statute, three things against me. I am tried upon a penal statute, which ought to be construed most in favour of the prisoner.

Just. Pemberton. Ask him any questions, if you will, but this is not your time for arguing.

L. C. J. Look you, we must do with you as we have done with others, and will do with the rest. If you mean that this statute should never have any effect, that is, that the priests shall not be convicted as such, unless we can produce witnesses that saw them take orders, then you have avoided all the statute; but if so be it be plainly proved, that you have done the acts of a priest, those that none are allowed of to do, or undertake to do, but a priest, is not this a satisfaction, and a plain one too, to yourself and all the world, that this issue, whether you are a priest or not a priest, is well proved in the affirmative?

Oates. My lord, I saw his letters of orders.

Anderson. My Lord Chief Justice, I would speak a little to what you say.

Just. Pemberton. Look you, sir, you must not have such liberty as this granted to you. You may, if you will, ask questions, but it is not your time to dispute.

Just. Jones. You must not invert the order of trials. When a witness is called, he must give his evidence. If you will ask him any questions, you may do it. But if you will observe any thing, you have time to do it when the king's witnesses are all heard.

Just. Atkins. Dr. Oates, the prisoner did not understand sure what you said. Did not he confess to you he had orders from Rome?

Oates. Yes, he did confess so.

L. C. J. You confessed it yourself.

Anderson. My lord, how comes it to pass, that I did not come here in a yellow coat, and was arraigned for a fool, and not for a traitor? If I am a priest, that I should tell him I was such an one.

L. C. J. Nay, I cannot tell, because you did not put it on. If you would ask him any questions, do.

Anderson. Yes, Whether you do know me to be an Englishman? And whether you saw me take orders from the see of Rome?

Oates. You said you were an Englishman, and a gentleman, and the son of an English gentleman.

L. C. J. Do you deny you are an Englishman?

Anderson. I am not, nor so man is to be tried upon a presumption; it is but a conceit in law, and penal laws are to be taken strictly, and in favour of the prisoner.

L. C. J. Methinks you speak very like an Englishman.

Mr. Bedlow. My lord, we call now Mr. Bedlow. You know the question, what it is, Sir, concerning the prisoner's being a priest.

Bedlow. He is a priest, and an Englishman, if his mother was honest, and he honestly born; for he is Mr. Anderson's son of Oxfordshire, a gentleman of 2 or 300*l.* a year; I know him and his father very well.

Anderson. My lord, could I but apprehend that I lay under so great a guilt, as to have been acquainted with so great a rogue as this fellow is, I would have been my own executioner, and not have expected my sentence at this bar.

L. C. J. Do you know him well?

Bedlow. Very well, both him and his father; his father is an Oxfordshire gentleman.

Anderson. Now I think I shall prove the rogue perjured: Is my Lord Chief Baron in the Court?

Court. Yes, he is.

Anderson. Why then my father has the honour to be well known to his lordship, who knows this to be false.

L. C. Baron (Wm. Montague, esq.). No, no, Mr. Bedlow, he is a gentleman's son of quality in Lincolnshire.

L. C. J. You are mistaken, you are mistaken, his father is a Lincolnshire gentleman.

Anderson. And yet this rogue is upon his oath; but indeed all his life is full of such mistakes.

Bedlow. I don't know, my Lord Privy-Seal's nephew told me so.

L. C. J. But what say you to him, as to his being a priest?

Bedlow. I have heard him say mass.

L. C. J. Did you ever receive the Sacrament from him?

Bedlow. Never. But I have seen him administer the Sacrament, and he was in a priest's habit.

L. C. J. Where?

Bedlow. I think it was at the Venetian Resident's; I am sure it was at some of the ambassador's houses.

Anderson. This matter is so unlikely, I know not what to say to it.

Just. Pemberton. Will you ask him any questions?

Anderson. Upon my salvation I never saw him before.

Just. Dolben. It is a strange thing, that you should take upon you to say upon your salvation you never saw him: How many might come into a room, and you not see them while you are at mass?

L. C. J. He might see you, though you did not see him: He might come in, and you not see him.

Just. Atkins. Is that any argument, or any thing to the purpose, or does that contradict the evidence? Does the minister, or ought he to know all his congregation whilst he is in preaching?

Anderson. I never saw him, I say. My lord, I'll give you but one argument, which is called Argumentum congruentie.

Just. Jones. Will you ask him any questions?

Anderson. To what purpose will it be for me to ask him?

Bedlow. When he was first taken I was not stirring; but while I was making ready they told me there was one suspected to be a priest. I heard him speak in the next room, and I knew his voice, and said, That is Mr. Anderson. I presently knew his tongue before I saw him.

L. C. J. You knew him very well then?

Bedlow. I never had any great converse with the man: When he was taken they asked me, If I knew any thing of this man about the Plot? I told them, No; but he was in orders from the Church of Rome, for I heard him say mass at such a place. He told me, said he, I have been in orders, but I revoked them, and turned protestant.

Mr. Bedlow. Set up Mr. Praunce. Pray, Sir, tell what you know.

Praunce. My lord, I have heard him say mass several times at Wild-House; and he hath given the sacrament there, and I have seen him take confessions—

L. C. J. How often?

Praunce. Several times.

L. C. J. Then you know him very well?

Praunce. Yes, very well.

Anderson. I never saw him in my life.

L. C. J. But he hath seen you.

Anderson. My lord chief justice, I will bring witnesses to prove, That I did never say mass at Wild-House, nor went to the chapel: For some, forsooth, would needs have me to have been excommunicated for writing for the king's temporal jurisdiction over all his subjects (independent of the pope) as appears by a Letter of the bishop of London on my behalf to sir Clement Armiger.

L. C. J. How long have you known him?

Praunce. Seven years.

L. C. J. How often have you seen him say mass?

Praunce. A dozen times.

Anderson. It may seem strange that I should have the impudence to deny what this worthy gentleman says. Mr. Praunce, dare you say you know me?

L. C. J. Why, were you never there?

Just. Jones. Well, well, will you ask him any questions?

Anderson. Who did I give the Sacrament to?

Praunce. A whole rail-full hath been at the Sacrament at a time; several people I have seen receive it from him.

L. C. J. Did he deliver the Sacrament to you?

Praunce. No, he did not, I commonly received at Somerset-House.

Serj. Strode. We have done, my lord.

Just. Jones. The king's counsel have done with their evidence, and now you may say what you will.

Anderson. My Lord Chief Justice, may I speak now?

L. C. J. Yes, you may.

Anderson. My lord, all the world knows me, and I am known to most of the dignified clergy in England: My lord bishop of London, and Dr. Lloyd, and the bishop of Durham sent to me to tell me, that if they knew of my trial they would be here. My lord, I have lain under an ill censure for scribbling and writing against the temporal power of the Church of Rome. I never said mass in any popish church, I am confident, these ten years; that I have said mass, I will not deny. I would not tell a lie to save my own life; nay, nor would I tell a lie to take away the life of the greatest villain upon earth; no, not that rogue [pointing to Dangerfield.] But, my lord, I protest there is not one word true that hath been sworn against me, but what Dr. Oates hath said concerning my saying mass. Oh! my lord, I would not deny it if I were to be hanged presently; and is not that a great evidence of my innocence and sincerity? But this does not prove that I am guilty of what I am accused for; for I am indicted upon a penal statute, and three things must be proved strictly to bring me within that law: First, that I am an Englishman—

L. C. J. It is proved you are an Oxfordshire man.

Anderson. No, my father is Lincolnshire, and my lord chief baron knows him.

L. C. Baron. I do know a gentleman of that name there.

Bedlow. I was told he was Oxfordshire.

Just. Dolben. He speaks himself to be an Englishman. All the world knows it by your speech.

Anderson. I know my father is so.

L. C. J. Why do you deny it yourself?

Anderson. It is one thing to deny it, and another thing to have it proved so: I am not to prove it, they are.

L. C. J. He says you are so.

Anderson. He talks like a parrot: These things are to be proved strictly; no man's life is to be taken away by presumption; which is but a conceit in law, and ought not to overthrow that maxim of law, that penal laws ought to be taken most strictly in favour of the prisoner: And I ought to be proved, ad literam, within the law; and that according to the statute made since his majesty's happy Restoration, by two lawful witnesses; and not only by two lawful, but by two credible witnesses too. I suppose the gentlemen of the jury being apprized of these my exceptions to these witnesses, notwithstanding give credit to them, whom perhaps they would not trust for 6*d.* in their shops, and make themselves their compurgators; and, as in waging law, do take it upon their conscience, that what these rogues say is true.

L. C. J. So they do.

Just. Dolben. If these things are not well proved nothing will be proved.

Just. Atkins. Have you any witnesses that you would call?

Just. Pemberton. If you will call any, you may.

Anderson. How shall I call them, when I did not know of my trial?

Mr. Recorder. (Sir George Jafferics.) If you will send for any witnesses the court will stay, if they be to any thing material.

Anderson. My lord, I have against this gentleman, Mr. Dangerfield, almost all the prisoners of the King's-Bench for witnesses.

L. C. J. Call them, and name them.

Anderson. Mr. Adderley, Mr. Fuller, who can say that I never drunk a pot of ale with this man while he was there.

L. C. J. Who would you send for?

Anderson. Those persons, to prove that I had a grudge and prejudice against this man, and that I desired to be removed to Newgate for that very reason.

Just. Dolben. But the question is, Whether you be a priest, or no? And you cannot send for any one that knows you, but will say, That he hath taken you for a priest all along.

Anderson. But still it is but a presumption, not a proof.

Just. Dolben. The jury is to be judge of that, how far that goes.

L. C. J. What do you expect for proof? Do you imagine there should be no proof to convict you upon that statute, unless we produce some witnesses that actually saw you take orders?

Anderson. Yes, I suppose so, my lord, because penal statutes are to be taken strictly.

L. C. J. Look you then, How vain would you make a statute of England, the laws of your country? How idle a thing were it to expect any possibility of proof, such as to convict a priest, if this be the interpretation of the law, That no man should be convicted by a jury upon this statute, but one against whom two witnesses should swear they saw him take orders? Where can we find such a witness?

Anderson. Admit that this law were thus evaded, yet there would be no inconvenience, and I would prove it to your lordship by authority: It was the opinion of all the Judges, delivered about 9 years ago to the king and council, upon a question about laws against the Romish recusants; they all agreed, That this law was only made in terrorem.

Just. Pemberton. Look you, Sir, you must not talk so, it is not to be permitted.

Just. Dolben. Will you go to arraign the judges here?

L. C. J. No, no; the king's counsel did very honestly and prudently upon that matter: For said sir John Keiling, It is very true, our kings have not, since this law was made, put the statute in execution unto rigour, 'till you yourselves occasioned it: But still the law was a good law, and absolutely necessary at its making, as necessary as the preservation of the queen's life, and the quiet of her dominions; and now it is become as necessary for the preservation of the protestant religion, which all your arts are employed to undermine; and more necessary again, for the preservation of our king's life, against which your contrivances are so bent.

Just. Pemberton. Do you think that you shall be heard here to dispute against the law, and say it was no matter for the law, it is a void law; and scandalize the judges, that they gave it for their opinion, that it was only in terrorum?

Anderson. No, I dispute for the law.

Just. Pemberton. You must employ your time otherwise, if you intend to be heard.

Anderson. Then this is that I require; I desire these things may be proved; First, That I am an Englishman, and then I took orders from Rome, and then that I abode here contrary to the statute, which things in this penal statute must be proved.

L. C. J. You have, upon the matter, proved the first yourself in your appeal to my lord chief baron, that he knew your father, who is a Lincolnshire man.

Anderson. I might be bred and born beyond sea, though my father was so.

L. C. J. If you will give no proof to the contrary, a little proof will serve the jury's turn, hearing you speak, and knowing your father was a Lincolnshire man.

Anderson. No negative can be sworn, they must prove the affirmative.

L. C. J. That will turn the proof upon you to the contrary.

Just. Atkins. A reasonable proof against you, with such probability, will put it upon you to disprove it.

Just. Pemberton. Look you, Mr. Anderson, if you have any witnesses to call for or send for, the court will give you leave to stand by a little and send for them; but if you continue to argue in this manner, the court will give their directions to the jury.

L. C. J. But, Mr. Anderson, the court will do you all the justice that can be expected. If you have any material witnesses to be sent for, the court will have patience till they come; but then you must be sure they are material witnesses, for we will not go to lose time upon a bare surmise. If it be only to prove this negative, that Mr. Dangerfield was never in your company in the King's-bench, it will signify nothing, for there are three witnesses without him.

Just. Pemberton. Have you any witnesses to prove that you were born beyond sea, or any thing that is material, we will stay for them.

Just. Ellis. There is nothing now in question but whether you be an Englishman and a priest; and if you can prove that you are not so, you say well. But I think you deny not now but that you are a priest, only you would have us prove that you are an Englishman. Your speech betrays you, and there is so much evidence against you, that I have not heard in any case as I know of. And all your witnesses will be to little purpose.

Anderson. Only this I desire to observe; That I have been a man always countenanced by the best of kings, and his privy-council; and if the parliament had not been dissolved, I had been protected by the parliament: Now, I say, if your lordships think me worthy of any consideration (as I have been a man that have given several testimonies of my loyalty, and obedience to the government) I desire your lordships would please to stay till you know the king's pleasure.

L. C. J. You know where you must apply yourself for that; we are barely upon our oaths, and so is the jury too, to try the fact, whether you be a priest; and this I will tell you, and I must say to you, I dare appeal to your own consciences, whether this issue, your being a Romish priest, is not as plainly and evidently proved to the satisfaction of all mankind, as any thing can be?

Anderson. But it is all by presumption still.

L. C. J. Well, gentlemen of the jury, the matter that he insists upon, are two things, First, says he, You have not proved me to be an Englishman, and yet at the same time he appeals to such as knew his father to be an English gentleman; and his language, his tongue betrays him. It is true, some kind of evidence is to be given, that he is an Englishman, he himself tells you, that he is born of English parents; but it is a foreign matter, that he should be born beyond sea. And if it were so really, then it comes on this side: if he can produce any witness, he says something; otherwise we leave it to you, whether you are not satisfied in your consciences, by hearing him speak, and understanding who his father was, that he is an Englishman. The next thing is for his being a priest: I do not know, nor can their be expected a plainer proof than this that hath been given, because he doth those acts which none but a priest amongst them does; he says mass, he consecrates the sacrament, he takes confession, he gives absolution, and all this proved by four witnesses.

Anderson. That the clerk does at mass, he gives absolution.

L. C. J. Does or can any but a priest absolve?

Oates. My lord the clerk, he that serves at mass at that time, gives pro forma absolution to the priest, without which, the priest cannot approach to the altar; after he hath made a general confession for the whole congregation, the clerk absolves the priest, that he may absolve the congregation.

L. C. J. Well, the fact is plain upon you; we must never expect to convict a priest upon this statute, if such proof is not sufficient.

Just. Dulben. He does acknowledge that Dr. Oates hath heard him say mass.

L. C. J. Go on to the next.

Mr. Belwood. The next we will try, shall be James Corker, [With whom the jury was charged, as with the other.] May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; James Corker, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted for high treason, for that being born within the king's dominions, and made a priest by authority from the see of Rome, did traitorously come and abide in England, contrary to the law. To this he hath pleaded not guilty.

L. C. J. Well, call your witnesses.

Serj. Strode. Dr. Oates, Mr. Bedlow, and Mr. Praunce. [Who were all sworn.] Dr. Oates, pray tell my lord, and these gentlemen, what you know of this Mr. Corker's being a priest.

Oates. My lord, he hath said mass at Somerset-house; and before the Proclamation and Declaration in 1674, made against the catholics, he was one of the queen's priests, he is a Benedictine monk, and he hath said mass at Somerset house; and I have heard him say mass at the Savoy.

L. C. J. In a priest's habit?

Oates. Yes, I have seen him in a monk's habit.

Corker. When?

L. C. J. Have you ever seen him give the sacrament?

Oates. Yes, I received the sacrament from him myself.

J. C. J. Where?

Oates. In the Savoy.

L. C. J. Did he consecrate the sacrament?

Oates. Not that that I received; I cannot say whether he did or no.

L. C. J. Do any administer the sacrament but priests?

Oates. They are in orders first. And it is against the laws of the church for any but priests, to do it.

L. C. J. None use to do it but priests, do they?

Oates. I cannot tell; but he that I took it from, I always took to be a priest: Besides, I saw his patent to be bishop of London; and they don't use to make them bishops before they be priests.

L. C. J. Did he shew it you?

Oates. I saw it.

Justice Atkins. From whom was that patent?

Oates. It was from the see of Rome.

Justice Atkins. Under what seal was it?

Oates. I can't tell that; but I remember that I saw the patent.

L. C. J. Well, will you ask him any thing?

Corker. When was it that you heard me say mass?

Oates. The first time that I heard him say mass, is near upon three years ago; and then I heard him say mass about the last winter was two years.

L. C. J. How often have you heard him say mass?

Oates. Several times; a dozen times I believe.

Corker. Was there any body with you when you heard me say mass?

Oates. I believe there was an whole church full at Somerset House.

Corker. Can you nominate any in particular?

Justice Atkins. How can he do that? He says there was an whole church full.

Justice Pemberton. Will you ask him any more questions?

Corker. No.

Serjeant Strode. Then set up Mr. Bedlow. Pray, Sir, will you tell my lord and the jury, what you know of Mr. Corker's being a priest.

Bedlow. I have seen him wear the habit of a Benedictine monk, before the suppressing of the convent in the Savoy; and I have seen him confessing several people in Somerset House.

L. C. J. And gave them absolution?

Bedlow. Yes.

L. C. J. Do they use to let them see when they confess?

Bedlow. They confess in public, but they speak so softly we cannot hear; but the whole chapel sometimes may be full of people confessing.

L. C. J. When was this?

Bedlow. About four or five years since, when Father Lathum was there.

L. C. J. Did you ever hear him say mass at Father Lathum's?

Bedlow. No, I never saw him say mass, but only confess.

L. C. J. Did you never see him deliver the Sacrament?

Bedlow. No, my lord.

Corker. When you saw me in my habit, was it when you came to Father Lathum's?

Bedlow. I judge so, it was several times, with several of them.

Corker. Can you nominate any one that saw me at the same time?

Bedlow. There were a whole chapel full of Catholics.

Justice Pemberton. That is no great matter whether he can or no.

Justice Atkins. It is an immaterial question, why do you ask it?

Bedlow. My lord, what I did was done so privately, that if I went but from Strand-bridge to the monks, I either took a boat and went by water, or a coach and went round about, to avoid suspicion.

Mr. Bedwood. Then set up Mr. Praunce. Pray, Sir, tell what you know of this.

Praunce. I have heard him say mass at Mr. Paston's in Duke-street.

L. C. J. How often?

Praunce. Never but once?

Corker. When, Sir?

Praunce. It may be two years ago.

Justice Atkins. That is another place too, Mr. Corker.

L. C. J. Have you any thing to ask him?

Corker. No, my lord.

L. C. J. What have you then to say for yourself?

Corker. My lord, this I have to say for myself, and I do protest it to be true: I never in my life did say mass or hear confessions at Somerset House.

J. C. J. What say you to Mr. Paston's?

Corker. No, nor at Mr. Paston's; nor ever was in the company of that man, nor ever saw him there in my life, to my knowledge.

L. C. J. That may be.

Corker. I likewise protest, that I never said mass in any public place since I was born.

L. C. J. It may be you count not Mr. Paston's a public place.

Corker. If it be a private place, then I should know who were in the company, and who were admitted there.

L. C. J. No, you were not two or three years ago so nice and cautious whom you admitted to see you in the exercise of what you call your religion; because the execution of the law was not so strict as now-a-days it is. And therefore it is very probable, and may very well be, that you were at Mr. Paston's house, and yet not know all the company.

Corker. But I say, I never did say mass there.

Justice Pemberton. Here are three witnesses against you, and do you think your bare word will be taken against their three oaths?

Recorder. What say you to the Savoy, Mr. Corker? I ask you, because I would know whether you can speak truth in anything.

Corker. I would not tell a lie, though I should thereby save my life: and I do again protest before God and the Court, I never in my life said mass or heard confessions at Somerset House chapel, nor at Mr. Paston's in Duke-street. And as to the Savoy, seeing I will be sincere, I shall only say, that as my denial will not clear me, so I beg I may not be my own accuser.

L. C. J. Here is one hath swore it.

Corker. It is only Oates, my lord.

L. C. J. Well gentlemen of the jury, you hear what is proved against him by three witnesses, that they heard him say mass and receive confessions, and deliver the Sacrament. They tell you what order he was of, and that they saw him do the acts of a priest.

Corker. I appeal to all the world that ever came to Somerset House, whether ever any one heard me say mass there.

L. C. J. Here is one hath.

Serj. Strode. We will try William Marshal next. [Who was charged upon the jury as the other.]

Mr. Belwood. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, William Marshal, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted for high treason. The offence is not for being a priest barely; but that he being born an Englishman, within the king's dominions, and having received orders from Rome, did, against the laws of the kingdom, come and abide here.

Serj. Strode. Swear Dr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow. [Which was done.] Dr. Oates, pray stand up.

L. C. J. What can you say to Mr. Marshal's being a priest?

Oates. I have heard him say mass in the Savoy, and I have seen him in that posture that the priests are in when they give absolution.

L. C. J. Have you seen him in a priest's habit any mass?

Oates. Yes, in his habit as a Benedictine monk.

Justice Jones. Did you ever see him give the Sacrament?

Oates. Yes, and consecrate the host.

Justice Jones. Well, have you any thing to ask him?

Marshal. When was this?

Oates. I have known him these three years to be a priest.

Marshal. That is a year longer than you knew me at the trial.

Oates. It is a great while since that trial.

L. C. J. Aye, that is a good while ago.

Marshal. But where, Mr. Oates, and when?

Oates. At the Savoy.

Marshal. When?

Oates. Within the compass of three years, several times.

Marshal. How does that afford me any occasion of defence? I can make no plea, unless be ascertains time.

Justice Pemberton. It is good evidence, without confining himself to precise time.

L. C. J. He says a dozen times within that compass.

Marshal. But why does he not name some particular time; for unless he name the time, how is it possible for us to disprove him?

L. C. J. He tells you many times in three years.

Marshal. But when?

L. C. J. Why, within three years.

Justice Dolben. What if he could tell you when?

Marshal. Let him name the day, then we could disprove him; and let him name the day, and if I do not disprove him I will be hang'd.

L. C. J. It is an improper question that you ask.

Just. Pemberton. He is not bound to name the day.

Oates. Well I will pitch upon a day now.

Marshal. When was it?

Oates. Several times last summer was twelve-month.

Marshal. What, before the Plot?

Oates. Several times in that summer before the Plot was discovered; and several times the winter before, when I came over from Spain.

Marshal. Did you hear me say mass before you went over to Spain?—Oates. Yes, I did.

Just. Dolben. Call another witness.

Mr. Belwood. Mr. Bedlow.

Serj. Strode. Pray will you tell what you know of Mr. Marshal.

Bedlow. I know a great deal of him.

L. C. J. What of his being a priest?

Bedlow. I have seen him in his habit of a Benedictine monk in the Savoy.

L. C. J. Have you heard him say mass?

Bedlow. No, my Lord, I have not; but he hath been preparing to go to take confessions.

L. C. J. Did he own himself to be a priest?

Bedlow. He was in the habit of a priest, but I never saw him execute any part of the office of a priest.

Just. Pemberton. Did you hear him declare, that he hath been going at any time to take confession.

Bedlow. The monks have said when he hath been gone, that he went to take confessions.

L. C. J. Upon your oath, have you ever heard him own himself to be a priest, or ever say that he was going to take confession?

Bedlow. No, my Lord; but I have seen him in a monk's habit, and within half an hour he was in a secular habit: for when they went abroad they took confessions in their secular habit.

L. C. J. How often have you seen him in a monk's habit?

Bedlow. I do not know whether it were more than once; and I asked then, Where is our Father going?

Justice Pemberton. And what said they to you?

Bedlow. He was going to take confessions.

Just. Dolben. Have not you yourself been confessed by Marshal?

Bedlow. No, my Lord.

L. C. J. What say you to him, will you ask him any questions?

Marshal. I do not, I think, need to ask this witness any questions.

L. C. J. That shall be observed for you, if it be to your advantage. If you have any thing to say for yourself, pray speak it.

Marshal. If there be but one witness, what need I make any defence?

L. C. J. What say you to Mr. Oates's testimony?

Marshal. As for Mr. Oates, if your lordship will but promise, that it shall not prejudice me, as to the point of having but one witness, I have much to say for myself: but I think I need not trouble your lordship with it.

Sir John Keiling. Were not you here when Marshal was tried for the plot?

Bedlow. Yes.

Just. Pemberton. You must not ask him any questions about that.

Marshal. My Lord, I say, if your lordship will but grant, that the witnesses may have free access, and go away safe—

Bedlow. I believe the court upon his trial, was satisfied that he was in orders, received from the church of Rome.

Sir John Keiling. Swear Mr. Praunce. [Which was done.] What did you hear him say at his last trial?

L. C. J. This is hard evidence truly.

Justice Jones. If he would do it voluntarily of himself, he might, we did not ask him the question.

Praunce. My Lord, I stood just by him when he stood at the bar, and I heard him say this to the other man, 'Mr. Corker, though we are 'priests, this does not reach us.'

VOL. VII.

L. C. J. But is this good evidence?

Praunce. I did hear him say he was a priest.

Just. Pemberton. We did all hear him say so, I believe.

Just. Atkins. I dare say none of the court asked him the question.

Marshal. My Lord, I was not asked, nor had any occasion, and certainly I should not pick an occasion to condemn myself: if I did it, I did it without occasion. Besides, my Lord, I humbly conceive, that there must be proof against a man, or his confession won't make him guilty.

Just. Pemberton. I would not have you too sure of that.

Marshal. Certainly if a man do confess at another time, without proof against him that will not do.

Just. Pemberton. I believe the jury will take your own confession.

L. C. J. Don't be over confident of that, for we have memories too as well as you.

Just. Pemberton. You are not belied by Mr. Praunce, I believe, Mr. Marshal.

Just. Ellis. If he have confessed it, that is sure proof enough.

Sir John Keiling. Swear Mr. Dugdalc. [Which was done.] You were at the last trial, Sir; I only ask of you, can you remember any thing of this?

Dugdalc. To the best of my remembrance, I heard him own that he was a priest.

Sir John Keiling. Then say what you can for yourself.

Marshal. My Lord, I have only one material witness against me. They say that I said so; if I did say so, I must say it to the court; and if it was to the court, it must be upon some question asked me.

L. C. J. You must not say so; I am afraid if you appeal to the court, it will do you no good.

Just. Dolben. It is plain that you are so free of your discourse, that you might say things that were not pertinent.

L. C. J. It is not proper for the court to give evidence; if we did, we should do you little service in this matter.

Marshal. I do believe I shall receive all justice from the court. And I have experienced it so already. Now as to the present testimony against me, I conceive that only Mr. Oates is a material witness; no one else swears that they ever saw me officiate or perform the duty of a priest. As for Mr. Oates, he says he heard me say mass several times the last summer before the plot. And Mr. Oates did say he was present in June, July, and August, Sir William Waller, though he was pleased to forget other things, yet did remember that, and did testify that he saw me in June, July, and August. Now then I humbly conceive, if he heard me say mass at any time in that summer, it must be in one of those three months. Was it in any one of them?

Oates. My lord, I came over in April from St. Omers, and I did, as I remember, hear him say mass one time before I went again, and heard him say it several times after, which was about the middle of June I think.

Marshal. Now I say, if this honourable court will but please to promise, that the witnesses that come hither shall come and go safe, I believe there are witnesses that may contradict Dr. Oates.

L. C. J. What can your witnesses prove? you must not make bargains with the court.

Just. Pemberton. Why should you suspect that your witnesses should not go free?

Marshal. Because some have received great abuses.

Just. Atkins. It was so said, but not made out.

Just. Pemberton. There was only one person that came here, and affirmed so, but he did not prove it.

Recorder. And the court did say that they should be punished that did it.

L. C. J. The witnesses none of them, that I know of, were abused.

Bedlow. It was only the king's witnesses that have been abused.

L. C. J. What can your witnesses prove?

Marshal. He came over the 24th of April, and I can prove that from the beginning of April, to the end of July, I was not within threescore miles of London.

Oates. As to his officiating as a priest, I cannot speak positively as to the time, but I think in last summer was twelvemonth.

Just. Dolben. He says, he thinks he did once in that time, but he is sure that he did see you several times that summer.

Marshal. But what part of the summer?

Oates. From the time of my coming over again, to the time of the discovery of the Plot.

L. C. J. When was it that you heard him first?

Oates. When I heard him first was in 1677, before I went into Spain: I went away in the month of April, and I am sure he said mass before I went into Spain; and when I came back again in the winter, I came in November, and staid in town about ten days, and then went to the Savoy, and heard him say mass.

Marshal. What November?

Oates. Before the summer I came out of Flanders.

L. C. J. He says he went into Spain in April, (77.)

Marshal. And he heard me say mass before he went over?—Oates. Yes.

Marshal. Pray look, my lord, Mr. Oates will confess himself, he was but newly reconciled to the church of Rome, a little while before he went.

Oates. I was reconciled to the church on Ash-Wednesday, and I went in April following.

Marshal. Where did you hear me say mass then?

Oates. In the Savoy, at that time, before I went into Spain.

Marshal. Do you pretend to have known the Savoy ever before your coming back again?

Oates. Yes, I do.

Just. Pemberton. He does swear it.

Marshal. So he does, but he cannot prove it. Mr. Oates came over in the company, as he says, of Mr. Thimbleby and Mr. Hitchcock, and by his means he did get to be commended to be received into the order of the Benedicines, and he was then sent to Mr. Pickering in order to it; Now, my lord, is it credible that Mr. Oates having no acquaintance with the Savoy before he had acquaintance with Mr. Hitchcock, which was when he came from Spain, should hear me say mass before we went thither?

Just. Pemberton. All this is but a story to the court.

L. C. J. What a wild inference do you make from this unintelligible business?

Marshal. Mr. Oates says so himself.

Just. Dolben. We all know you said mass so openly in the Savoy, that any people whatsoever might come, and you did not know who they were.

L. C. J. Though he was not one of your order, yet he might know you.

Marshal. To my knowledge there were never three masses said in the world at the Savoy.

Dolben. The world knows the contrary.

Marshal. Let Mr. Oates be positive in any thing, and we will disprove him.

Just. Pemberton. He hath gone as near it as is necessary; he tells you, after his reconciliation, before he went over into Spain.

Marshal. But I say, he could not be at the Savoy before he was acquainted there, and I can bring witnesses to prove, that I was not then at the Savoy; but I pray, my lord, will these witnesses do me any good?

L. C. J. What will they prove?

Marshal. That all the summer from the beginning of April to the end of summer, I was in the country, threescore miles from London.

Oates. I am not so positive in that, my lord, but as near as I remember, before I went into Spain again. Your lordships all know that I was not so positive as to any one time; but the summer before the plot broke out, I heard him say mass several times in the summer.

L. C. J. Now he is positive that he saw you say mass in the summer before the plot was discovered. The substance of his deposition was your saying mass, the time is not material: He tells of a many times within that compass.

Marshal. How shall I disprove that?

Recorder. He hath given you one particular time from Ash-Wednesday, when he was reconciled to Rome, till he went to Spain in April.

Marshal. If he names times, then I am able to disprove him: And he did name one, but when he saw me offer to prove by witnesses, that I was not then in town, he goes off from it.

Just. Pemberton. It is impossible for witnesses to be positive to a day, a week, or such a thing.

Just. Ellis. How is it possible to be so, unless it be a thing that he had taken such particular notice of, as to intend to swear to it, and give evidence about it afterwards? Now, I believe Dr. Oates at that time had no thoughts of giving evidence as to any such matter; but this he is positive in, that he did hear you say mass at the Savoy.

Marshal. My lord, if Mr. Oates had said he had seen me officiate at Somerset-House or Wild-house, it might have been something like; but at the Savoy it is known, that none are let in but friends, nor could Mr. Oates come in but upon a particular acquaintance.

L. C. J. How does that appear so?

Marshal. By those that live in the house.

Just. Pemberton. You must not spend the court's time in this manner of discourse: If you have any witnesses that you think in yourself are material, the court will suffer you to call them and pray call them presently.

Marshal. Here is the house-keeper herself that will witness that she never saw Mr. Oates there.

L. C. J. If the great Turk had come there with a pair of beads and a crucifix, you would have let him come in: But in the mean time, Mr. Oates, you have given him a pretty compass of time, whereby he hath an opportunity of disproving what you say: And you give him one particular short time; but can you give any time afterwards in the summer you speak of, within any month, or two, or three; because you say at several times?

Oates. I cannot be positive, but I will tell you one time was the Sunday before they held their conspiracy, which was, I verily believe, the Sunday before the 21st of August.

L. C. J. Do you believe it was in August?

Oates. Yes, I do, and confine myself to the month of August.

Marshal. Then call Ellen Rigby.

Oates. I was acquainted with Mr. Pickering soon after my being reconciled; and being acquainted with him, I went along with him several times to the Savoy.

Just. Pemberton. What do you talk of one Hitchcock, and I know not whom? he was acquainted with Pickering before.

Marshal. When, my lord?

L. C. J. Presently after he was reconciled.

Marshal. Well, but you pretend now, that since you came over here you were in the Savoy; Had you a key to get in?

L. C. J. He was reconciled on Ash Wednesday, he went in April to Spain.

Marshal. Here is Ellen Rigby.

L. C. J. Well, what would you have with her?

Marshal. I ask, Did she ever see Mr. Oates in the summer before last?

Just. Pemberton. Don't you lead your witness with such questions.

L. C. J. Do you know Mr. Oates?

Rigby. I have seen him when I saw him come to ask charity of Mr. Pickering.

L. C. J. How often?

Rigby. Twice or thrice.

L. C. J. What time in the summer?

Rigby. I cannot say; but I saw him in summer was twelvemonth.

Oates. Why then did not this woman, when she knew this evidence that would lay a blemish upon me, come and give it for Pickering, to have saved him?

Just. Dolben. Will you give me leave to ask this woman this question; Whether she ever heard you say mass?

Marshal. Ay, my lord, with all my heart; and if she says she hath, I will be hanged without any more ado.

Just. Dolben. Then you are sure your proselytes will say any thing you would have them?

Marshal. I myself am a perfect stranger to the Savoy in a manner.

Just. Pemberton. Is he not acquainted with the Savoy?

Rigby. Yes, he was there one month when Pickering was taken.

Marshal. Pray ask her whether ever, before Mr. Oates went over, she saw him in the Savoy?

L. C. J. You shall have your question asked; but do you think you can build upon that; if she did not see him, he did not see you? Did you ever see Dr. Oates there betwixt March and April, before he went over into Spain?

Rigby. No, there was nobody in the house but Mr. Pickering.

L. C. J. Was there never mass said in the house?

Rigby. Yes, while her majesty's servants were in the house.

L. C. J. But was there mass never said since in the house?

Rigby. Never since I came out of it, which was a twelvemonth ago.

Just. Pemberton. Was there not mass said in three or four years time there?

Rigby. Not in our house, I lived but in one house.

Marshal. I call her to know, whether Dr. Oates was there? And, my lord, here is that which I insist upon; That none is let in there to hear mass, but those that have some particular acquaintance and intimacy in the house.

L. C. J. She only speaks to one particular part of the house; she cannot but say mass was said in the other parts.

Rigby. There was no mass said there, that I know of.

L. C. J. Why, was there no mass said but in that particular house you lived in?

Rigby. I cannot say that.

L. C. J. But the question is, Whether ever you, Mr. Oates, saw him say mass in this woman's house?

Oates. I do not know that I ever saw this woman in all my life, before the trial.

Marshal. He came there under a disguised name.

L. C. J. He tells you he went along with Pickering.

Oates. Pickering served the mass.

L. C. J. Well, call your witnesses, if you have any other.

Marshal. I can prove that I was out of town the whole summer, from the beginning of April to the end of the summer: But if Mr. Oates will not stand to any time, I cannot be able to disprove him: But then I will only offer one or two things more.

L. C. J. When did you come to London? in August?

Marshal. I will tell you as near as I can to a day. I came in the middle of Bartholomew-fair, which begins the 24th of August.

L. C. J. So it was the latter end.

Just. Pemberton. Well, if you have any witnesses, call them, and do not spend the Court's time in vain.

Marshal. My lord, I have something very material, I think, to offer: The only material witness that is now against me, was a witness against me in my last trial: Now I do conceive, that I being found Not Guilty at the last trial, that witness ought to be looked upon as perjured: And I appeal to the Court, whether it were so or no.

Just. Atkins. That is a false collection, Mr. Marshal.

L. C. J. It is a strange inference you make: Do you think that every witness is perjured, because the jury do not find according to what he says? He is not perjured, for he may swear true, and the jury not believe him.

Marshal. I ground it, my lord, upon what my lord Jones said to the jury that sat upon Coleman; who at their going out told them, either they were to find him guilty, or bring in two men perjured. Thus it was his opinion, that the finding of the jury contrary to the evidence, did make them perjured; and there was none of the Court did oppose him.

Just. Jones. What then?

Marshal. And if this were the sense of the whole court, That a man must either be found Guilty, or the witnesses perjured; that is my case, and he is not to be believed.

L. C. J. See how unconsequentially you talk: The court might say, that you must believe these men perjured, if they swear a positive thing and you find it not: But if you make use of it thus, that therefore they are perjured if it is false, for they not so till they be convicted, upon record: And though the jury don't believe them, yet they may swear true.

Marshal. It is true.

L. C. J. Then you make no inference from it.

Marshal. My lord, I am before the same court that I was tried by before and before the selfsame judges, who know that upon my trial he was not believed, and therefore is perjured.

Just. Pemberton. You must consider that sometimes the jury will go against the direction of the court; but if the witness be not believed by them, that does not argue that he does not swear truth, or is perjured: I tell you my brother Jones might say, you must find this man guilty, or think these men perjured: many times a judge will say so, but the jury often find against the direction of the court; shall these men be perjured then presently?

Just. Jones. There were two positive witnesses as positive as could be in the world, and nothing at all to contradict them.

Recorder. Will you give the jury leave to believe you, Mr. Marshal? For you yourself said you were a priest.

Marshal. Yes, if I said so, I humbly desire the jury to take notice of it, that they are the self-same witnesses that brought such a positive testimony the last time; which if the jury had believed, they must of necessity have brought me in guilty; I would not spend the time of the court, but I would observe this; it was all sworn positively, that I did consent to the king's death and other things.

L. C. J. You had the better luck.

Marshal. Then they are not to be believed now.

L. C. J. This is to no purpose, neither is it to be suffered: For you break in contrary to all the laws of practice, if we suffer this as an argument, that because an evidence was not believed in one case, therefore he is perjured: And the jury gave in a verdict contrary to the witnesses, that therefore he is perjured in another case.

Marshal. This does invalidate the testimony sure of such a witness.

L. C. J. You have said it often enough, come pray conclude.

Just. Pemberton. No, Mr. Marshal, you must not be suffered, in these harangues to impeach the witnesses; if you have any thing material against Dr. Oates, or if you can shew any record of his conviction of perjury, it may be something.

Marshal. My lord, it is for my life, and it is the second time that I plead for my life, much beyond my expectation; and therefore I hope I may have the freedom to speak: And though I confess this jury is not obliged to proceed according to the verdict of the former jury; yet this jury, as well as that, is obliged to proceed according to the appearance of truth: And his being found false in his testimony the last time, should make him of no credit here.

Just. Dolben. It is not so, they are not to take notice of it unless you bring them a record of conviction.

Just. Pemberton. He gave a good evidence then no doubt of it, though they would not believe it.

Just. Atkins. Upon what grounds that jury went, is unknown to us.

Marshal. Then, my lord, another thing is this: The law does except against all witnesses who are strongly or rationally supposed to have a spite or malice against the prisoner, much more where there is a manifest sign that he hath a malice. Now I will endeavour to shew how it comes to my case: Mr. Oates accused me last time of treason, and that is the highest nature; if this had been true, he had shewn himself a good subject, and me disloyal: And the jury not believing him, I was found the good subject: Now he pursues his malice.

L. C. J. You shall not go on in this manner and make such notorious false inferences; that because it was not found according to his testimony, therefore he is perjured: The jury did not believe it, might not he speak true for all that? Hath not many a witness sworn true, yet the verdict gone against their evidence? And therefore you don't mind: Ye are all giddy headed, if you once get a thing into your heads, you can't get it out again.

Just. Atkins. If the jury did not believe it, a great many others did.

L. C. J. All you build upon is but a false conclusion; because the jury found you not guilty, therefore they found him perjured.

Marshal. My lord—

Just. Pemberton. Pray sir, if you will speak any thing that is material and modest, the court will admit of it; but if you only go to throw dirt upon the king's witnesses, men of good reputation, and men that have shewed themselves honest, and that have spoke truth all along; never a one of their testimonies but what is confirmed by another's; so that not one of them stands single, and for you to say they are ill men.

Marshal. My lord, I do not say they are ill men, I speak of matter of fact.

L. C. J. You conclude falsely; and if you did but mind it, you would never repeat it over and over again: That because the jury did not believe his evidence, therefore he is perjured: Do you suppose then that any other jury should never believe him?

Marshal. My lord, I reckon his evidence is not so good; and if I am found Not Guilty there must be malice in him to accuse me.

L. C. J. Look you, gentlemen, the single question is, whether he be a Romish priest or no? It is proved by Mr. Oates, that he hath several times heard him say mass, that he hath seen him deliver the sacrament, and seen him consecrate the host. He insisted upon it how often; Mr. Oates says, ten or a dozen times, in what time he cannot charge himself particularly with a month or two; but at last he did tell him positively, because Marshal said, how is it possible I can make my defence to generals, unless you fix some time? therefore, says he, I was reconciled to the church of Rome on Ash-Wednesday, and afterwards between that and April, when I went into Spain, I heard him say mass, that was once; but I heard him say in the summer several times: being asked what part? he says, I cannot say exactly, but I think in the month of August; if he had said any thing as to the particular time between Ash-Wednesday and his going into Spain, it had been something, but against that he makes no pretence, as to his saying mass in the Savoy that can contradict it. If he can still he shall call his witnesses that can prove he did not say mass between the Ash-Wednesday and the April he went into Spain: he does indeed say, that he was a great part of the summer in the country, in June and July to Bartholomew-fair, threescore miles off; but to that Mr. Oates says it was some time in August, and so he might be in the country till then, and yet say mass after; he might come to town the 26th, or 27th, or 28th, and he might be here in August: so you hear no evidence that contradicts, supposing it proved true, what he imagines his witnesses can say; the last time that he charges him to have said it in the summer, may be true according to his own word and confession when he came to town. Then there is Mr. Bedlow, he only tells you he saw him in a priest's habit, but he did not see him execute the office of a priest, but he looked upon him as a priest, called him father: and that is all that he charges him with; that is concurring evidence, and backs Mr. Oates, but alone perhaps it would be very weak. But they set up here Praunce, and he says directly that at the trial he did confess himself to be a priest; and he seems to deny it, and would appeal to the court; but his appealing to the court would not help him in that case. So I leave this to you upon this evidence; if you believe Mr. Oates, that swears he saw him before he went into Spain, and after, say mass with the concurring evidence of Mr. Bedlow, that saw him in his habit, and with the subsequent evidence of those two more that do swear that he did say so, you must find him Guilty: and a man's own confession is evidence against himself; and if Mr. Marshal will recollect himself, he would not be too positive in that point. If all these particulars satisfy your conscience, I say, that he is a Romish Priest, you must find him Guilty; if you are unsatisfied, you must acquit him.

Cl. of Cr. Set William Russel to the bar. William Russel, alias Napper, hold up thy hand; You that are sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his cause, &c.

Mr. Belwood. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, William Russel, alias Napper, stands indicted for High-Treason: the offence charged in the indictment, is, That being born within the kingdom of England, and having received orders from the see of Rome, he did come and abide here. To this he hath pleaded, Not Guilty.

Serj. Strada. Swear Dr. Oates, and Mr. Praunce. Dr. Oates, will you tell my lord and the Jury, what you know of Mr. Russel's being a priest?

Oates. My lord, this Russel went by the name of Napper, and is a Franciscan Frier, and I heard him say mass several times at Wild-house.

L. C. J. What, in his habit?

Oates. In priest's habit.

L. C. J. When was this?

Oates. The last summer before the Plot; I have heard him twenty times sing mass.

Justice Jones. Did you ever see him give the Sacrament?

Russel. Where pray was this?

Oates. At Wild-house.

Russel. What is his name ?

L. C. J. Oates.

Russel. I do not know him, I say, my lord.

L. C. J. Did he do it publicly ?

Oates. Yes, in the chapel.

Justice Jones. Did he give the Sacrament ?

Oates. I did receive the Sacrament from him.

Russel. Why first of all, I say I do not know him.

L. C. J. It may be so, more know Jack Pudding, than Jack Pudding knows.

Russel. Well, then, if one witness must stand I have no more to say.

L. C. J. Will you ask him any questions ?

Russel. He says he heard me a month ago.

L. C. J. No it was last summer was twelvemonth.—Russel. Then he must prove it.

Capt. Richardson. He does prove it, he swears it.

Russel. Well, I can make it appear, last summer was twelvemonth I was in the country.

Oates. And I heard him say mass, November, 1677, he was then one of the Chaplains of Wild-house.

Russel. Give me leave to recollect my memory.

Mr. Belwood. Set up Mr. Praunce. You hear the question : sir, is the prisoner at the bar a priest ?

Praunce. Yes, I have heard him say mass twenty times in his habit.

L. C. J. Did he give the Sacrament ?

Praunce. Yes, I saw him give the sacrament to several, and he did hear confessions ; he had a great many people about him.

Russel. When was this ?

Praunce. Two or three years ago.

Russel. Where ?

Praunce. At the Spanish Ambassador's at Wild-house.

Att. Gen. My Lord, here is sir William Waller, that took him, with his vestments and all his trinkets. [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. Come what say you, sir William ?

Sir W. Waller. That morning I took him, as soon as I came into the room, I asked him his name : he told me his name was Russel : I asked him, if he ever went by any other name ? He denied it for some time, but looking amongst some of his papers, I found some letters directed to him by the name of Napper ; and then he did confess his name was William Russel Napper. Searching among his clothes, I found some religious habits ; I asked him, if they were his, and he confessed and owned them to be his.

Russel. It was in my custody ; it was none of mine.

L. C. J. Why did you say so then ?

Russel. I kept it for another.

L. C. J. But you told him it was your own, What say you to that ?

Russel. I do not remember that.

Just. Dolben. Well, he swears it.

L. C. J. Here are two positive witnesses against you, what say you to it ? What say you to his saying, he hath heard you say mass twenty times ?

L. C. Baron. What say you to the saying mass at the time Dr. Oates speaks of ?

Russel. I believe he is mistaken as to the time and year : I was entered into the house in 1678.

Just. Pemberton. Then you think it was at another time.

Russel. He could not hear me at that time, for I was then in the country.

L. C. J. Have you any thing to say ? It shall be allowed you, it was at another time, but it seems it is true. Look you, gentlemen, you have a very plain business of it ; here are two witnesses that swear they saw him give absolution, deliver the sacrament, and heard him say mass, and one says twenty times : and sir W. Waller, who says, that he confest the priest's habit to be his own.

Russel. Consider my circumstances, and give me a little time ; I have not had any time to get my friends near me, or to prepare myself.

L. C. J. I do not see any good time would do you : I think the best use you can make of your time is to repent.

Oates. My Lord, the court here is pestered with papists ; here are a great many about here.

L. C. J. If they be witnesses, we cannot keep them out.

Bedlow. Some of them may be witnesses, but all are not ; and if they be, they come to catch advantages.

Just. Dolben. I don't understand why they should be turned out.

Justice Pemberton. Let them alone : be at quiet.

L. C. J. No, no, they will revile us, that they had not an open and a fair hearing ; we won't have it said, that we do any thing in huggermugger ; what we do is done openly and honestly.

Cl. of the Cr. Set Charles Parris, alias Parry, to the bar. Hold up thy hand : You that are sworn, &c.

Mr. Belwood. May it please your lordship and you gentlemen of the jury ; the offence for which the prisoner at the bar stands indicted, is High-Treason, the same offence for which the rest have been indicted—

L. C. J. Then call your witnesses.

Serj. Strode. Dr. Oates, and Mr. Praunce. [Who were sworn.]

L. C. J. What can you say against the prisoner, as to his being a priest ?

Oates. My Lord, he is a reputed priest, and hath said mass several times : I have heard him say mass at Wild-house, not in the public chapel, but in another room.

L. C. J. Where do you say ?

Oates. Once at Wild-house.

L. C. J. Where else ?

Oates. At Mr. Paston's.

L. C. J. When was this, winter or summer ?

Oates. Within the compass of a year, reckoning 1677 and 1678 ; it was on a Saturday one time, and twice at Mr. Paston's, and once or twice I cannot tell which, at the other place.

L. C. J. And in the priest's habit?

Oates. Yes, in the priest's habit.

L. C. J. And did you see him consecrate the host?—Oates. Yes.

L. C. J. And give the sacrament?

Oates. Yes.

Parry. My Lord, as to that he speaks of 1677, or 1678, what month of 1678 I desire to know.

Oates. I cannot confine myself to a month; I knew him to be a priest, but I was little acquainted with him, but he was a reputed priest.

Justice Jones. But you are sure this is the man?

Oates. Yes, this is the man.

Parry. Am I the man? What is my name?

Oates. You went by the name of Johnson.

L. C. J. Did you never go by that name of Johnson?

Parry. No, my Lord, but by this name of Parry; Parry is my name, and by that name I went, and never by any other name than Parry, whatever he says.

L. C. J. Why by that same name you are indicted, and you are the man that he saw.

Just. Pemberton. Will you ask him ever a question?

Parry. I have asked him already what I would ask him.

Sir John Keiling. Then set up Mr. Praunce.

L. C. J. What do you say as to Mr. Parry?

Praunce. I know he is a priest, and have heard him say mass at the Venetian Ambassador's, and at Mr. Paston's, and he went by the name of Johnson.

Recorder. Did you go by that name?

Parry. No, I never went in my life but by my own name, Parry; that is my name, whatever he says, and I am not ashamed of it.

L. C. J. How often?

Praunce. Once at Paston's, and two or three times at the Venetian ambassador's.

L. C. J. And you saw him give the sacrament?

Praunce. Yes.

L. C. J. In his habit?—Praunce. Yes.

Parry. At what time?

Praunce. I believe it might be half a year before the Plot; and I know you by another circumstance: you brought a chalice to my house, and it was whole, and you broke it, and told me, I must not touch it until it was broke, and so you defaced it.

L. C. J. That was an holy vessel, was it not?

Praunce. Yes; and he told me I must not touch it till it was broken in pieces.

L. C. J. If you had not been a priest, he had been as holy as you, and he might have touched it as well as you.

L. C. Baron. His breaking was to desecrate it.

Praunce. He bought some oil-boxes of me about that time.

Parry. I do not know this man.

Praunce. You were several times with me.

L. C. J. Why, have you forgot the chalice you brought to his house?

Parry. I have no reason to forget myself, for I never did any such thing, for I never bought or sold to him any chalice, or any such thing; and besides, suppose I had, that doth not argue that I am a priest.

L. C. J. No, but if he were so holy as to touch the chalice, he would be a priest. But there is no great stress laid upon that, but to shew you that he knows you, he did not mistake the man. The stress of the evidences lies, that he heard you say mass at the Venetian ambassador's, and at Paston's, and then Dr. Oates speaks of Wild-house.

Parry. I was never in my life at the Venetian ambassador's, nor at Mr. Paston's, nor at Wild-house.

L. C. J. Can you swear that he is the man? Bedlow. No.

L. C. J. Then set him aside.

Bedlow. I had order to send for two witnesses out of Mounmouthshire—

L. C. J. Here is proof enough.

Justice Pemberton. What have you to say for yourself?

Parry. I have this to say, and can shew it evidently, that is, I have witnesses to prove, that I never was at Wild-house to officiate in the years 1677 and 1678 before the Plot: and for these six or seven months that Mr. Praunce does alledge I was in London, I was in the country.

L. C. J. When?

Parry. Six or seven months before the Plot?

L. C. J. He did not confine himself precisely to any six or seven months.

Parry. My lord, I desired him to fix upon a month.

Justice Pemberton. He cannot do it.

L. C. J. If he can, let him; we will ask him the question; when was it that you saw him do thus?

Praunce. My lord, I am not certain what time it was, but about two, or two years and an half ago, I am not certain, it is impossible for me to remember it.

Justice Pemberton. You must take him in what he says; this he is sure of, he did hear you say mass and give the Sacrament, but as to the time, he believes it to be about this time, but he is not positive nor can be in it.

Parry. He only believes it now, because he knows I have witnesses for that time: he hath sworn it positively, it was six or seven months before the Plot, and I have witnesses to produce, can prove how long before the Plot I was in the country.

L. C. J. Call your witnesses.

Parry. Call Lanscroon and Jacob.

L. C. J. How long was it before the Plot, as near as you can tell the time, Mr. Oates?

Oates. I have heard so many priests, that I cannot possibly give an account of the day.

Parry. I desire to know of Mr. Oates, who was ambassador at Wild-house at that time when he says he heard me.

Recorder. Were you never at Paston's?

Parry. No.

Recorder. Not at the Venetian resident's?

Parry. No.

Recorder. Mr. Parry was not, but Mr. Johnson was.

Parry. I know not Mr. Johnson, my name is Parry; I hope it is not just I should be hang'd for another person.

Recorder. I mean Mr. Johnson, alias Parry.

L. C. J. Mr. Praunce, you are sure that is the man?

Praunce. Yes, and I heard him confess himself to be a priest.

Parry. It is false.

L. C. Baron. And this is the man that brought the chalice to you.

L. C. J. Why, did you never go with a chalice to this man, and break it?

Parry. My lord, I never bought any thing of him, nor sold any thing to him, nor had any converse with him.

Sir John Keiling. I do never wonder at their denying any thing. I would fain know whether he would not deny the sun shines now or no?

Parry. And then for the private room, what room of the house was it?

Praunce. I took him up in the middle of Cheapside, and therefore I must sure know him.

Parry. He did not know me, but only took me on suspicion at random, because I was in the company of a Roman Catholic.

Then the witness Lanscroon stood up.

L. C. J. What would you have this man asked?

Parry. About the year 1677 and 1678, wherein Mr. Oates alledges he heard me, let them answer to that, how long I was at Windsor? And whether I did not dwell constantly there?

L. C. J. Well, you hear the question. How long was he at Windsor?

Lanscroon. From what time do you ask?

Justice Pemberton. Nay, you must not be led into an answer. How long was he at Windsor?

Lanscroon. From Christmas 1677, to Allhallantide 1678.

Justice Ellis. And was he never at London all that time?

Lanscroon. No.

Justice Pemberton. How can you tell that?

Justice Atkins. Was he always in your sight all the time?

Lanscroon. Yes, he was there always.

Justice Atkins. Were you there always yourself?

Lanscroon. Yes.

L. C. J. What are you?

Lanscroon. A painter.

L. C. J. And was you and he always together at that time?

Lanscroon. Yes.

L. C. J. What in a room?

Lanscroon. Yes.

L. C. J. Can you affirm, that for a twelve-month together, you saw him every day?

Lanscroon. Yes.

Recorder. How many years ago do you speak of?

Lanscroon. From 1677 to 1678.

Recorder. I do not ask you that, but how many years ago it is?

L. C. J. When came he down to Windsor?

Lanscroon. Christmas (1677.)

L. C. J. The testimony of Mr. Oates goes to November, and he speaks of Christmas following.

Recorder. How many years ago was it, I ask?

Lanscroon. A year ago last Christmas.

Recorder. That is 1678 and 1679.

Justice Pemberton. Your witness is understood, Mr. Parry.

Then stood up the other witness Jacob.

L. C. J. What say you about Mr. Parry's being at Windsor?

Jacob. He was a gentleman that came along with me in the coach to Windsor.

L. C. J. When?

Jacob. Before Christmas (1677.)

L. C. J. How long before?

Jacob. Ten days. He came there to take air for his health, he was not well.

L. C. J. How long staid he there?

Jacob. He staid at Windsor till Allhallantide after, he staid there a year.

L. C. J. Did you see him there every day of that year?

Jacob. Yes.

L. C. J. Why, what reason had you to see him every day?

Jacob. He dined every day at our house.

L. C. J. Your house? What house?

Jacob. The painter's.

Justice Dolben. However, that is but from Christmas, and he speaks of November before.

L. C. J. Did he dine there all that time?

Jacob. Yes.

L. C. J. Did he dine there every Friday constantly?

Jacob. Yes.

L. C. J. Did he never keep a fast in all that time?

Jacob. No.

L. C. J. Did he dine a Wednesdays and Fridays?—Jacob. Yes.

L. C. J. There was one Good-Friday in that time.

Oates. Pray ask this witness if he never heard him say mass?

Justice Dolben. Then he must be sworn, and may be he will deny it.

L. C. J. Did he dine of Ash Wednesday and Good-Friday?

Jacob. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. So, he says you eat of Good-Friday and Ash Wednesday; the pope shall know it.

Recorder. What say you? Did he eat flesh upon those days?

Jacob. Yes, he did.

L. C. J. You can tell what he did eat, can you?

Recorder. Did he eat beef, or mutton?

Justice Dolben. Go, you talk like an idle boy.

L. C. J. He tells you, that you eat meat too, that is more.

Parry. My lord, we eat fish, and such things all Catholics do.

Recorder. Ay, the priests do, but their pupils do not, they will not allow it to them.

L. C. J. Well, have you done, have you any more witnesses.

Parry. I would ask Mr. Oates, and desire him to answer me to it, what did he depose against me before my lord Shaftsbury, viz. That he heard me say mass in Wild-Chapel, and there heard Mr. Collins's confession, and now he says, it was in a private room; now I have it to shew that I did not officiate there, nor frequent the house.

L. C. J. Who is that will prove that you did not come to the house?

Parry. The ambassador's servants.

L. C. J. I do not understand what you mean.

Parry. I am to ask of Mr. Oates, and desire he should answer to it, What he did depose before my lord Shaftsbury and the committee of lords, touching Mr. Collins?

L. C. J. He cannot remember, it may be.

Justice Pemberton. You must not ask such questions as these are, it does not refer to this matter.

Parry. He did give in, that I heard Mr. Collins's confession, I ask, why he does not give it in now?

L. C. J. That is a foreign matter, what have we to do with it now?

Justice Pemberton. If you will prove any thing against him, you may, but you may not ask such questions as that.

Parry. I have proved that I was in 1677, and 1678, in the country.

Justice Pemberton. They tell us of ten days before Christmas, and Mr. Oates speaks of November.

L. C. J. Look you, gentlemen of the jury, here are two witnesses against him, Mr. Oates and Mr. Praunce—

Parry. My lord, I have one thing I desire to be taken notice of, that is, this letter of the ambassador's, who upon the examination of all his family does testify and declare, that I did never officiate in any respect in his family.

L. C. J. It cannot be read.

Justice Pemberton. It is not any evidence.

Parry. How shall I clear myself, if the testimony of the ambassador and his whole family be not admitted?

Justice Atkins. It is a hard thing for you to clear yourself.

L. C. J. Why don't you bring them hither as your witnesses?

VOL. VII.

Recorder. Where is my lord ambassador, why does not he come hither?

Parry. He hath left the kingdom.

Recorder. Then you may boldly say any thing of him, and we cannot disprove you.

L. C. J. Is all his family gone with him;

Parry. There is but one remaining, I think he is here.

L. C. J. Call him.

Parry. Monsieur Rivier. [Who appeared and stood up.]

L. C. J. What do you ask him?

Parry. Do you know this hand, Sir.

L. C. J. It must not be read if he do.

Parry. He is one of the servants to my lord Egmund, and he lived in the house, and he knows that by his master's order all his domestics were examined, and all protested they neither knew nor saw me ever in Wild-house; all which I have under his hand and seal to shew.

L. C. J. It signifies nothing.

Justice Pemberton. Ask him any question, but don't tell him what he knows.

L. C. J. Why don't you ask him some questions? Why, you have not catechisms in your church, you don't know how to ask questions.

Parry. Ask him whether he ever heard me say mass at my lord ambassador's house?

L. C. J. It is to no purpose if he did not, here are some have.

Parry. Then, my lord, he knows that there was a strict examination at Wild-house by my lord's orders, whether I did frequent the house, and it was reported by them all I did not; and they must know if ever I did officiate there, for there is none admitted to say mass there, but by order.

Justice Pemberton. Look you, Sir, do you know that Mr. Parry ever said mass at Wild-house?

Rivier. No, my lord, I do not know it.

Justice Pemberton. It was in a private room, Dr. Oates says.

Rivier. I never saw him there.

Justice Pemberton. If you ask an hundred here, they would say the same thing.

L. C. J. Come, when matters are plain it is in vain to contend; here is the business, gentlemen, here are Mr. Oates and Mr. Praunce, two witnesses against Mr. Parry; Mr. Oates says, he hath heard him say mass, one time at one place, and twice or thrice at another. Mr. Praunce hath heard him often, and Mr. Praunce does tell you plainly, that he cannot err, that he is not mistaken in the man, for he came to his house with a chalice, and broke it there, and he knew him so well, that meeting him by chance, he took him up in the streets; so if you believe them, they swear it positively, and you must find it so.

Then the Lord Chief Justice went away.

Cl. of Cr. Set Henry Starkey to the bar. Hold up thy hand, &c.

Mr. Belwood. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, Henry Starkey stands indicted for the like offence with the other prisoners; that he having received orders from the see of Rome, came into England, and this is High-Treason: to this he hath pleaded Not Guilty; we will prove it upon him. Swear Dr. Oates and Mr. Praunce. [Which was done.] Serj. Strode. Pray, Sir, will you tell my lord and the gentlemen of the jury, what do you know of this Starkey's being a priest?

Oates. My lord, Mr. Starkey is a priest, and I once heard him say mass at Mr. Paston's.

L. C. B. When was that? How long was it ago?

Oates. It is about 3 years ago.

L. C. B. Did he give the sacrament then, or at any other time?

Oates. None received but himself.

Mr. Belwood. Was he in priest's habit?

Oates. Yes.

L. C. B. Did he receive the Sacrament, and consecrate the host?

Oates. Yes, in both kinds.

L. C. B. Will you ask him any questions?

Starkey. He tells me of priest's habits; what are they, Sir?

L. C. B. What habit had he on?

Oates. A thing about his neck, and a surplice, and a thing about his arm; he had a surplice girt about him.

Starkey. I know you not; and I perceive you neither know what a priest's habit is, nor the difference between his habit and his ornaments. A priest's habit is a cassock down to the ground, and a side cloke; the ornaments of a priest are not a surplice, (as Oates says) but an albe that falls to the ground, and other things besides that.

Justice Pemberton. You are well skilled in it, I see.

Starkey. And how did you know that I said mass? Did you know that I took orders? For if I took no orders, it was no mass; for it is the priest makes the mass, and not the mass the priest; and then if I were no priest, it could be no mass.

Justice Pemberton. That is a pretty argument indeed! Do any but priests say mass?

Starkey. I can bring an instance of a gentleman in this town, a private layman, who said mass about this town, and he was a Protestant, and at last he stole the chalice. (His name was Gardener.)

Justice Pemberton. He did well, did he not? Is that your use?

Starkey. Yes, with such priests as he.

L. C. B. It is a great evidence this arguing of yours, if he did not swear it, that you are a priest.

Starkey. I wonder that this gentleman should so well remember me, I don't know him.

Justice Pemberton. Do you think you know every one that hath seen you at mass?

Sir John Keiling. Set up Mr. Praunce. What say you, Sir, to this?

Praunce. My lord, I heard him say mass at my lady Somerset's in Lincoln's-inn-fields, and at Mr. Duncomb's, that taught school in Princes street.

Starkey. As I hope for mercy from Almighty God, I was never there in all my life, except Panty, her house in Gloucestershire.

Praunce. Did you know one Mr. Duncomb that is dead?

Starkey. Yes.

Praunce. Well, I heard you say mass at his house.

Starkey. My lord, I was never at Mr. Duncomb's in my life, but at 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and if I said mass there, it was over a pot of ale.

Praunce. I have heard him say he said mass in the king's army.

Starkey. I know neither of these two fellows.

Recorder. Come, I would fain see whether you priests and Jesuits can speak one word of truth or no: Come, Mr. Starkey, did you ever say mass in the army?

Starkey. I never did: but pray give me leave to speak; I appeared for the king, when he had not above 500 men in appearance for him; I am but a younger brother, (second brother to John Starkey of Darley in the county of Chester, esq.) and yet with an annuity of sevenscore pounds a year, which I bought, and other monies which I had, I spent above 4,000*l.* in the king's service, which I bled for before I had it, for I got it in another monarch's service; I lost my leg for him by a cannon-shot, and so spent my estate to that degree, that that day when I received my sentence of banishment, I had but three half crowns in the world, which were given me that same morning by two friends.

L. C. B. Mr. Starkey, you may urge this to the king, for his mercy and clemency, it is nothing to the point here before the jury to be tried. Whatsoever you have merited by your services, you must apply yourself to the king for his mercy, it is nothing here.

Starkey. Pray, my lord, give me leave to add something more: I was banished for 14 years into France, because I refused to take an engagement never to bear arms again for the king: I did discover to this king a plot designed against his life, state and government: I suffer to this day for it; and I delivered, into his own hand, 11 articles of high treason against the plotters and their abettors.

L. C. B. You may be a priest for all that.

Starkey. But, my lord, by the civil law it is a conclusion, that although a man be a traitor, and in the same plot, he is to be indemnified for discovering the conspiracy against his prince; much more for discovering another, that I was not a party in.

Justice Pemberton. We have nothing to do with that here, but whether you are a priest or not.

Starkey. That I must leave to the proof.

L. C. B. Well then, I'll tell you, gentlemen, this person is indicted for being a priest, and coming into England. For the point of his being a priest, you have heard two witnesses depose; and they both tell you, that they have heard him say mass, as great an evidence of it as can be, for none say mass but priests. Dr. Oates tells you at Mr. Paston's. Mr. Praunce says at Mr. Paston's, at my lady Somerset's, and one Mr. Duncomb's. If you believe this, you must find him Guilty.

Justice Atkins. And they speak too, to his receiving the Sacraments in both kinds.

Starkey. If I was there, sure there was somebody else besides myself, I did not say mass alone; produce but one witness for you, then I'll submit.

Cl. of Cr. Set Alexander Lumsden to the bar. Hold up thy hand, &c. Your charge is to enquire of him as of your first prisoner, and hear your evidence.

Mr. Belwood. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, Alexander Lumsden, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted for High Treason, for that he bring a priest, and receiving orders from Rome, did come here into England, and abide contrary to the statute.

Sir John Keiling. Swear Dr. Oates, Mr. Dugdale, and Mr. Praunce. [Which was done.]

L. C. B. Come, Dr. Oates, what say you to this man?

Oates. I heard him say mass, he is a Dominican friar, as I remember. I heard him say mass 20 times at Wild House.

L. C. B. And consecrate the host?

Oates. Yes, and I received the Sacrament from him.

L. C. B. And saw him take confession?

Oates. Yes.

Justice Pemberton. Will you ask him any questions?

Lumsden. What time was this, if it please you, Sir?

Oates. That summer that was before the Plot broke out. Mr. Lumsden knows me well enough.

L. C. B. Do you know him?

Lumsden. Truly I do not know that ever I saw him, or conversed with him in my life.

L. C. B. What say you, Mr. Dugdale?

Dugdale. My lord, I was at Whitehall that day Mr. Lumsden was taken; and by the opportunity of some friends I did go to him, but I did not know him, but by discourse he did confess himself a priest; I asked if he was a Franciscan, he said he was a Dominican.

Oates. He is procurator-general of the kingdom of Scotland.

Recorder. They have such a parcel of people, and such names for them.

Serj. Strode. Mr. Praunce, what do you know of Lumsden's being a priest?

Praunce. I know he is a priest, and have heard him say mass several times at Wild House.

L. C. B. Was he there in the habit?

Praunce. Yes, and consecrated the host.

L. C. B. How long since?

Praunce. Two years since, I heard him 20 times.

L. C. B. Do you know what countryman he is?

Praunce. An Irishman, I think.

Oates. No, he is a Scotchman, he will not deny it.

L. C. B. What countryman are you?

Lumsden. A Scotchman.

L. C. B. Of what part of Scotland?

Lumsden. Aberdeen.

L. C. B. Were you born there?

Lumsden. Yes.

L. C. B. You have no more to say, have you?

Lumsden. My lord, I am not here, I think, to be my own accuser, I humbly conceive so, and whatsoever is against me must be proved, not simply asserted: They ought to give proofs and reasons; but so it is, it is but a simple assertion what they say; I desire they may prove it.

L. C. B. No, they need not; it is sufficient if they prove it by such circumstances that the jury are satisfied and convinced that it is true; but it is not to be looked for, that no proof should be given against the priest, but by them that saw him receive orders.

Justice Atkins. It is impossible almost to prove that.

L. C. B. But if they prove the circumstances, that you have executed the office of a priest by saying mass, which none does but a priest, it is enough to guide them in their verdict.

Justice Ellis. And they have proved that which is next to a positive assertion.

L. C. Baron. That need not be.

Just. Ellis. But let us not lessen our proof neither.

Just. Pemberton. You must consider that the proof is certain; for they have sworn an assertive positive thing, which thing is enough to a jury to prove you a priest, because none others but priests may do such things in your church, as you have done: Therefore it is a good argument and evidence to conclude you a priest, from this evidence that hath been given.

Oates. I have heard him own himself a priest twenty times.

Lumsden. The exercise of the priestly function is but a penalty of 200 marks.

L. C. Baron. Ay, that is, if the king will go no higher: But you are prosecuted upon another law.

Just. Ellis. It is evidence, and a great evidence, that which hath been given; for we must go according to the nature of the thing: It is impossible the act of parliament should be put in execution, if they must prove they received orders from the see of Rome: But when they have proved those things done by any man, which none ought to do but a priest, it hath been in all times allowed to be a special evidence.

Just. Pemberton. It is a plain and sufficient evidence,

Just. Ellis. But if there were any need of it, and you would have any more, he hath confessed, upon the question asked him, Whether he was a Franciscan; No, he was a Dominican.

L. C. Baron. Have you done? Then gentlemen of the jury, you must not at this time of the day be insnared by that argument, That there must be a positive proof of this reception of orders from the church of Rome, because it hath been all along accounted, and is an undoubted proof for your satisfaction, if it appears he hath exercised the offices of the function, those offices that are not done but by priests: Now this hath been proved by two witnesses, and by the confession of the priest himself to Dr. Oates and Mr. Dugdale: So I must leave it upon the point of fact to you, whether it be not sufficient proof. But this case will differ from all the rest, and the court is very tender in the case of life, that it should be without all question what is determined; therefore as to your enquiry for him, it must go only whether he be a priest or no; for the others you must consider them as Englishmen, and enquire of them as such: He is a Scotchman, as he says, and they say so too: Now then there are some words in this statute, whereupon the court hath conceived a doubt, whether his case comes within them; which are the words about the king's dominions, which now are far more enlarged than were those of the queen when the statute was made; if then you find him a priest, you must find the other matter specially.

Just. Ellis. Look you, gentlemen, we are to be of counsel for the prisoner; and it being matter of law, we shall take time to advise upon it before we give our opinions in it: but for the matter of fact, I doubt not but you will find that he is a priest; and then the other matters that he was born at Aberdeen in Scotland, and the other matters you may find specially, there needs no more.

Recorder. Swear an officer to keep the jury.

Who after the recess of a quarter of an hour, returned into the Court, and having answered to their names, and appointed their foreman to give in their Verdict, he delivered it thus:

Cl. of Cr. Lionel Anderson, alias Munson, hold up thy hand; look upon the prisoner, how say you, is he guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. James Corker, hold up thy hand: How say you, is he guilty, &c.

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Is William Marshal guilty, &c.

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Is William Russel, alias Napper, guilty, &c.

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Is Charles Parry guilty, &c.

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Is Henry Starkey guilty, &c.

Foreman. Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Alexander Lumsden, hold up thy hand: look upon the prisoner; How say you, is he guilty of the high-treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. We find he is guilty of being a priest, and born at Aberdeen in Scotland,

Just. Ellis. Read the notes to them.

Cl. of Cr. You find that Alexander Lumsden is a Scotchman, of 58 years of age, born at Aberdeen in the kingdom of Scotland, being then under the dominions of king Charles the first, and now under the dominions of our present sovereign; and in the reign of the said king Charles the first, and that at the time in the Indictment mentioned, he was a priest in holy orders, by authority derived from the see of Rome, prout in the Indictment: And that he came and was remaining in England, prout in the Indictment. But whether upon the whole matter he be guilty of high-treason within this law or not, you do not know, and crave the opinion of the court.

Foreman. Yes.

Cl. of Cr. Then hearken to your Verdict, as the court hath recorded it: You say, &c.

Recorder. Call for the executioner.

Then the Judges went off from the Bench, and the Court proceeded to Judgment.

Cl. of Cr. Set Lionel Anderson, alias Munson, to the bar: Lionel Anderson, alias Munson, thou standest convicted of high-treason: What canst thou say for thyself, why judgment should not pass upon thee to die according to the law?

Anderson. I can say this, I would have gone out of England, but the king kept me here, telling me, I should not go; and I had a protection from the council-board: The bishop of London, when I was taken first, sent a letter to sir Clement Armiger, that neither I nor my books should be meddled with, that I had writteu for the king and the government, for which he conceived I might be excommunicated at Rome, and that I was then under a special protection of his majesty and council; and when I was again taken and put in custody of the horse-guard, the duke of Monmouth sent sir Thomas Armstrong to have me freed again: I begged of the king that I might go, said I, I will not expose the king to the worst of rabbles; but he told me, I should stay in England, and Mr. Peter Welsh and I had orders from the council, he one and I another, to stay.

Recorder. For that matter you may be assured, I promise it you faithfully and publicly that I will acquaint the king with what you say.

Anderson. I thank you, Sir.

Recorder. For this court hath nothing to do with that; the king is the proper judge of that matter, to determine his own pleasure as he thinks fit: Tie him up.

Anderson. Sir, I had no notice of my trial but this morning: I sent to my lord Bridgewater, to know when I should be tried, he told I should have ten days notice of it; now I have witnesses to disprove Mr. Praunce's testimony; for Mr. Oates, I own he hath heard me say mass; but for Mr. Bedlow's testimony, as I hope to see the face of my Almighty God, I know him not: when I was taken, said he to me, Mr. Anderson, let me see your protection, and I shewed it him; you have two names, said he, I do not know whether it be you or no. And then besides, these are not legal witnesses.

Recorder. Nay, that must not be allowed you to say: you have been fairly heard and tried; they were upon their oaths, and the jury, twelve men upon their oaths, without any exception made to them, they have convicted you; therefore this is to calumniate the proceedings of the court.

Anderson. I tell you this more; they are not the king's evidence properly; for they swear for themselves upon the account of benefit; if any priest be convicted, they are to have so much money.

Recorder. The court heard the evidence that was given, and if you will have it of the court, the court does really believe them, and so did the jury too.

Anderson. I am satisfied.

Recorder. Tie him up then.

Cl. of Cr. James Corker, hold up thy hand: You stand convicted of High-Treason; what can you say for yourself, &c.

Corker. Nothing, but that I refer myself to God, my just judge and Saviour.

Recorder. Tie him up.

Cl. of Cr. William Marshal, hold up thy hand: Thou art in the same condition, what sayest thou for thyself?

Marshal. I have very little more to say than what I have said already: I thought the law had not allowed any man to have been condemned upon the testimony of one witness, but required two: Now there was but one positive witness against me, the rest only said, I had confessed myself to be a priest; two of them did swear, they heard me confess it at my other trial; if it had been at this trial it had been another thing, and there had been some validity in the proof; but to say, they heard me confess it at another time, I humbly conceive according to the law, bears no force. I have this further to add, his majesty, some years ago, put forth a declaration under the Broad-Seal, for a toleration of religion, and liberty of conscience, whereby the Roman Catholics had the use of their religion in their private houses. Now I have been informed, that according to law, whatsoever is put forth under the Broad-Seal, must be recalled by something under the Broad-Seal, or it remains in force; which was never done as to this declaration, and then I lie under the protection of that declaration.

Recorder. As for the first part, it is plain, to the satisfaction of every body, that there hath been two sufficient witnesses, upon whose testimony you are convicted: for whether you were asked the question or not, yet if you will say you are a priest, that confession of yours is evidence against you, though you might possibly say so without being asked the question.

Marshal. Is it credible I should do so?

Recorder. Yes, the jury believed it so.

Oates. One of the jury stood by and heard the words.

Recorder. And now, because I will put it out of all doubt, it is not the business nor the duty of the court to give any evidence of any fact that they know of their own knowledge, unless they will be sworn for that purpose; for though they do know it in their own private consciences to be true; yet they are obliged to conceal their own knowledge, unless they will be sworn as witnesses. But now you are convicted, I must take the liberty to tell you, that at your last trial you did own yourself to be a priest, and I must put you in mind further of something which you may very well remember; when I detained you after your acquittal, and re-committed you when sir G. Wakeman was discharged, I did then tell you, you have owned yourselves to be priests, I was bound to take notice of that confession of yours, and therefore obliged to detain you; such a token as that is may perhaps bring it to your memory; but as it was hinted to you before, you are a voluninous talker, and abundance of things may drop out of your mouth, that you don't consider before they are past.

Marshal. It is for my life, and therefore I may be permitted to speak sure.

Recorder. That is as to the first point: and then as to the king's declaration, which was the other matter you insisted upon, I presume it does not stick with any body that knows the matter: but lest it should, I would say this to it: it is very well known in the first place (I do not go now to determine the law upon it, because you know what opinions and judgment is received afterwards) yet this I will adventure to say, That it was never the intention of that declaration that ever priests should come and reside here; but it was only intended for tender consciences, as the very letter of the declaration itself does shew, not to countenance priests and Jesuits, that have cast off all their allegiance to the king, and endeavour both to destroy him and his government.

Marshal. Pray Sir, will you give me leave to speak as to that? If so be the use of their religion were permitted to Roman Catholics, that religion not being to be practised without priests, it is to be supposed, that the priests are permitted.

Recorder. But if a man were to argue with you now in your own way; pray are there not priests in England, besides those priests that were born here? you know, of your own acquaintance there were several Roman catholic priests, not Englishmen born, that are constantly here, who can perform the offices.

Marshal. Nay, I don't know that; but this I know, if they be not born in England, or have lived in England, so as to know the tongue, Roman Catholics will be little the better for them, Recorder. Nay, I don't say much the better, but much the worse for their coming at them: and in case they would only use the English truth, I presume they would not have so many proselytes, but you gull them with stuff they understand not.

Marshal. Pray, Sir, give me leave a little, I have one word more: For all matters of treason, and treacherous conspiracy, I was freed before in this court; now I would observe what the best lawyers that ever were in England, have observed for me; that there is no crime in priesthood itself: For my lord Coke in his 5th Report, 39th leaf, commenting largely upon the statute of 27 Eliz. and enlarging upon the sense and meaning of that statute, and calling to mind who the men were that were formerly executed by force of that statute, and why, concludes thus: Hence it appears, that no man yet hath or can be executed for his function of priesthood, but because there was annexed to the priesthood treacherous designs and treacherous attempts. And the same lawyer in the 3d Institutes, 22d leaf, says, That in this statute of 27 Eliz. it was very wisely and justly done by the statute makers, to provide, that the judges should proceed in their judgments upon that matter, only according to what is expressed and specified in that statute. And those words were a sanctuary to the judges, and put in to prevent the shedding of guiltless blood. Now, if so be that so great a lawyer, in a discourse about priesthood and treachery, does thence conclude, That priesthood as priesthood is no crime, nor no function belonging to it hath any crime in it, well may I conclude so too: And indeed, if it had, then a great part of the world would be traitors; nay, it would bring in Christ himself, who was a priest, to be a traitor too: Therefore priesthood, as priesthood, hath no treason essentially linked to it. And when he says, that they must proceed according to what is specified, he does in the forementioned place shew, that it was not specified at all, that any that were executed, were for priesthood executed: And I am accused of nothing else in the world but bare priesthood as priesthood, without any design or treachery joined to it: And if, according to law, priesthood be not liable to condemnation, then I am not to be condemned.

Recorder. Now you have been heard.

Marshal. Yes, Sir, and I thank you for it.

Recorder. This long speech of yours will signify but little, when you consider the act of parliament upon which you are indicted. It is true, set that act of parliament out of the case, and then to be a priest is not High-Treason; nay, in case a man be born out of the king's dominions, and be a priest, and remain here, that is not High-Treason within this statute, because priesthood itself does not make the crime (God forbid any one should affirm it) but when all that is granted, when an act of parliament hath taken particular notice of the great mischiefs and inconveniences that have attended the government, and the continual danger that the supreme hath been in, by having persons which were born within the king's dominions (as you were) to wave their allegiance, and to acknowledge a supremacy in any foreign prince or prelate, as you all do, when you take orders from the See of Rome; the wisdom of the nation hath thought reasonable that such should be adjudged traitors: And this act of parliament, upon which you stand convicted, does plainly say, If any one born within the king's dominions will take orders from the See of Rome, and shall after reside here, he is guilty of High-Treason: And this is not only thought so by us that are here, but by all my lords the judges that were present at your trial; for God forbid we should condemn you for any thing as High-Treason, if you had not been within the compass of the act of parliament: And what is treason, the act of parliament particularly describes, which all hath been proved upon you; and because you are pleased to speak it to the court, and lay it on the consciences of the court, I discharge my conscience; the jury having convicted you for High-Treason, I am very ready to pass judgment upon you according to the law, and I will clear my conscience of that presently. Tie him up.

Cl. of Cr. William Russel, hold up thy hand, thou art in the same case, what canst thou say for thyself? &c.

Russel. I can say this, my lord, that in my conscience, I do not acknowledge myself guilty of what they accuse me for, but I must submit to the laws as they are made; but I do protest before Almighty God, and this whole court, that I am innocent of all that is laid upon me.

Recorder. Why, what were you never at Wild-house, and said mass there? I would fain hear, whether you in the state and condition you are in (though you jesuits have a thousand tricks and evasions) have confidence enough to say you never were, nor said mass there?

Russel. I ought not to accuse myself.

Recorder. You are convicted. But every thing that you say is but an evasion, and a trick to catch and ensnare the ignorant, but people of any sort of sense will not be gulled so.

Russel. For my witnesses, you are my witness, I have but one witness upon that business.

Recorder. The jury have believed them.

Russel. It is possible it may be so.

Recorder. Nay, it is beyond possible, it is true.

Russel. The witnesses that have deposed against me, for my part, I know them not.

Recorder. You have heard of Dr. Oates, Mr. Praunce, and of sir William Waller too. Tie him up.

Cl. of Cr. Charles Parris, alias Parry, hold up thy hand. You are in the same condition, what have you to say?

Parry. What have I to say for myself? I have this to say, That those that did depose against me, did not say one word of truth as to their allegations, I take God to witness for it; I am a dying man, and thank most heartily the court for what they are to pronounce against me, and I am as ready to suffer, as any man may be to have me to suffer, for it is God's glory and his cause. Then I insisted upon two parts, and complained, first, of sir William Turner, that being brought before him by Mr. Praunce, and shewing him my protection under an ambassador, and I professing myself a Frenchman, he slighted it, which I held to be a manifest breach against the laws of nations. Secondly, I was wronged by sir William Waller, when (in his examination of me with justice Warcup) in the Preas-yard, Newgate, he threatened me with irons, &c. if I did not take my oath I was not born in France. and I refusing, (which none could be compelled to) for it was my opponents part to prove the contrary; and who can prove me to be other than a Frenchman?

Recorder. Nobody can; we believe you to be an Englishman.

Parry. If I be a Frenchman, I am not subject to the penal laws.

Recorder. Why, nobody does. We believe you to be an Englishman.

Parry. And if it please you, they are to prove it.

Recorder. Well, that is over now. Tie him up.

Parry. I am not a subject, and as not a subject, am not under the penal laws.

Cl. of Cr. Set Henry Starkey to the bar. Henry Starkey, hold up thy hand. Thou art in the same condition with him that went last before thee, what canst thou say for thyself? &c.

Starkey. In the first place, Mr. Recorder, here is the man (pointing at Mr. Praunce) hath sworn two lies at one breath.

Recorder. I must not hear that, Mr. Starkey.

Starkey. Will you please to hear me, Sir?

Recorder. I will give you all the freedom you can lawfully desire in the world, but it must be that which will consist with my duty, and the reverence you owe the court. You shall not revile the king's evidence as long as I am here, by the help of God.

Starkey. If that it were true, that I had said mass at my lady Somerset's and Mr. Duncomb's, yet it is not sufficient to prove a man to be a priest, for any man may take the priest's garments, and do the ceremony and the office, because they are hundreds, perhaps thousands, that have suffered death for it. And so to do these acts, is not evidence of being a priest.

Recorder. Indeed, I don't understand what makes a Romish priest, nor do I desire it.

Starkey. But you will give me the letter of the law.

Recorder. And the jury hath found you a transgressor of the law.

Starkey. The letter of the law is this, That if any one of the Queen's subjects shall transport himself beyond the sea, and shall in a seminary take orders, by authority derived from the see of Rome, and shall return into England, and shall not present himself here to the ordinary, or else to such a certain number of justices of the peace within such a term, but shall seduce the king's liege people—

Recorder. No, that is another act.

Starkey. 'Then he shall be adjudged a traitor.' Now, Mr. Recorder, I come to this, as I told you before, I had discovered a plot to the king that was designed against his person, state and government, and did deliver into his hands eleven articles of Treason, which I had writ with my own hands; (and this he hath owned, and will own.) So, Mr. Recorder, upon this I was threatened my life and liberty by the plotters, That the king should not be gone 24 hours, but I should be imprisoned. When the king went what must I do? Must I stay there and hazard my life, or trust to the king's mercy? I was forced to come along with the king for protection. I came to Whitehall, and the king rose up and gave me his hand to kiss, and so did the duke of York, and told me I was welcome. I went to my Lord Chancellor Hyde, who when he saw me, embraced me in his arms, and said, thou art welcome, I am glad to see thee in England. I had occasion to speak with the bishop of London, Dr. Sheldon, about another person, and when I came to him he asked me, What is your name? My lord, said I, my name is Starkey, with that he catches me fast by the hand, and when he had done that, he took me in his arms, and told me, You are welcome. And Mr. Recorder, I do suffer to this day for the service I have done the king.

Recorder. Mr. Starkey, I can only say this to you, I do promise you faithfully, as I promised the other gentleman that went before, I'll tell the king what you alledge. He is the best able to give an account of it, and is the fittest judge of his own mercy. But I could recommend to you, Mr. Starkey, a thing that would be very acceptable, and then as far forth as it is modest for me to speak, I am pretty well assured, I might say, I could prevail for mercy to you, That is, as you did discover one plot before, so you would discover this hellish plot that is now on foot.

Starkey. Mr. Recorder, I have wished a hundred times, and wish now, that if there were any commissions, as is pretended, the first that had delivered one to me, should never have delivered a second; for I would either have brought him to justice, where he should receive his reward, or else I would have killed him in the place; tell the king, Mr. Recorder, that I say so.

Recorder. Well, the king is a fountain of mercy, and he is the best judge of the fit objects of it, I will, as I said, tell him what you say.

Starkey. If the king does not own what I told you, then count me the greatest knave that ever you spoke withal.

Recorder. You remain now under the com-viction of the law; what mercy the king, who is the fountain of mercy, as well as of justice, will extend to you, is in his own power.

Starkey. Mr. Recorder, I have here his majesty's gracious pardon of the 25th year of his reign.

Recorder. I allow that, but you have staid here since.

Starkey. Why then, Mr. Recorder, pray will you advise me what to have done? Nature teacheth all men to shun danger; for I was threatened with life, &c. if I staid in France: Whether should I stay there, or return to my native country with my king? Now, Mr. Recorder, I desire to know what you would have had me done?

Recorder. I shall acquaint the king, and will do you all the kindness I can with him. Tie him up.

Starkey. But how shall I do then, when I am lame? I want a leg, and I must use my stick.

Recorder. Then let him alone.

Starkey. But I pray, good Mr. Recorder, will you be pleased before you give sentence upon me, to acquaint the king with what I have to say for myself.

Recorder. No, I cannot do that, the king's pleasure is to be known afterwards. Set Lumsden aside, and set all the rest to the bar.

[Then Proclamation was made for silence, whilst judgment was giving.]

Recorder. You the prisoners at the bar; you have been severally accused, arraigned—

Starkey. Mr. Recorder, may I speak one word? I have presented this year, wherein at the 26th of this month I have been a prisoner, several petitions by my friends to the king, and desired to be transported; for my age and infirmities, and want of a leg, did not stand well with my being in England these troublesome times. The king, I am told, hath promised I should, but I see no fruits of those petitions. And pray consider this, that I should have been imprisoned if I stayed out of England, and now to be prosecuted in England in this manner, and to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, is very hard.

Recorder. Whether it be true or not, God knows, I shall acquaint the king with it. It only remains with me to take notice of it for that purpose. And for my part I am sorry with all my heart to see so many persons brought to receive the sentence of death by my mouth. But I must say this, you yourselves have been the occasion of it, and therefore must blame yourselves for it. You have had the benefit of the best laws, the law of England, which gives every subject the liberty to make a defence for himself, whenever he is accused of any crime; he hath the liberty to hear the witnesses what they say against him; to call any witnesses for him, and to make defence for himself. And not only so, but he hath likewise twelve men upon their oaths, that are his peers, against whom he hath the liberty to make a challenge without showing any reason, to a certain number; and if it shall appear that any of them have the least prejudice or malice against any persons that are to be tried for their lives, to a greater number. Such, and so great is the benefit of the laws of England, beyond all the laws of any other nation in the world. But all these forms having been passed, and a jury of men, against whom you made no exception, having found you guilty of the offences for which you were indicted, there remains now nothing more with the court, but to pass that judgment of death upon you, which the law requires, and which is the business that lies upon me now. But before I do that, for I know you may think it a presumption, or at least a needless and unnecessary thing for me to take upon me, and give any directions to you, the business of whose profession it hath been to give precepts: However I think it necessary for the satisfaction of some persons that are here present, that I should give them some account, why I think this law, and the putting it in execution at this time, is not unreasonable. For it is to be known, that every subject of this realm by his being born within the dominions of the king, does owe an immediate allegiance to the king, and is to take notice by the law, that there is not any person hath any superiority over him; for under God he is the supreme head and governor. And if any person born within the dominions of the king shall so far forget himself, and what he owes to the king by his birth, and that supremacy which he should maintain with his life and fortune, as to acknowledge any other foreign person to be supreme, and to have a power to depose the king, and dispose of his dominions (as every one does, that takes orders from the see of Rome) he cannot but be thought deserving of the greatest punishment. Wherefore the wisdom of our nation, the parliament, at the time when they made the law, found that the religion established (that religion which I hope in God will remain notwithstanding all the enemies it ever had or shall have) was invaded by such priests as you; they found the life of the queen at that time in great danger, by the attempts of those persons whom they had made their proselytes, into whom they had infused principles, that it was no crime for them to depose their queen, since they had the authority of their pope to justify the fact. And if once men can preach such doctrine, and also but prevail with their hearers to be of such a persuasion, if care were not taken, we shall soon see an end of all sort of government, and of our religion too. But inasmuch as these principles were not so visibly endeavoured to be put in practice till of late times, though you were not permitted, but connived at; yet that is no reason but the occasion of making the law being revived, the execution of the law should revive with it. I suppose it is not unknown to any of us, that there hath been an hellish plot against the life of the king, and so destroy our religion, I would to God I could say the Plot was at an end. For I must say, some of you, I fear, had too great an hand in it: and what a sort of monsters were prevailed upon to compass the same, by you that are priests and jesuits, who have wrought them up to such a belief, that murder in this world is a certain way to saintship in that which is to come. And though you seem to deny it, your practices are a proof of it beyond all contradiction, which is the reason that this law, which was a good law at the time of the making, and thought fit to be put in execution then, though it hath slept some time since, should now be put in execution against you, who have occasioned all those mischiefs to this nation in these latter times, which occasioned the making of the law. And one thing more I should say to that man, who pretends to merit by the good services he hath done for the public, that he should injoin a man to scour his kettle, as he calls it, to receive the Sacrament, and then give him a dispensation to be drunk, and make another so, to promote a damnable design, is such a power of priesthood, fit only for the Pope and hisimps to put in practice.—But say no more, in charity I am bound to compassionate your condition, which with all my soul I do, and heartily can say to you, I am sorry to see you in that misery. It was in your own power to have prevented it; but seeing you have made yourselves obnoxious to the law, the only thing required of me, is to pronounce the sentence that the law hath decreed: and therefore in the name of the Court I do pronounce this to be your Judgment—

Starkey. Mr. Recorder, give me leave to speak one word: if any one should have held to me that position, That it is lawful to depose and murder kings, I would have killed him in the place: tell the king, Mr. Recorder, I say so.

Anderson. It is my comfort, that no one of common sense can believe it.

Marshal. May I ask one question, Mr. Recorder, before you pronounce sentence?

Mr. Recorder. No, Mr. Marshal, you cannot speak now; but this is your Judgment, and the Court does award it: That you the several prisoners now at the bar, be conveyed from hence to the place from whence you came; and that you, and every of you, be conveyed from thence on hurdles to the place of execution, where every one of you are to be severally hanged by the neck; that you be severally cut down alive; that your privy-members be cut off, your bowels taken out and be burnt in your view; that your heads be severed from your bodies; that your bodies be divided into four quarters, which are to be disposed at the king's pleasure: and the God of infinite mercy have mercy upon your souls.

Parry. 'Te Deum laudamus; Te Dominum confitemur.'

Then the prisoners were carried away, and the Court adjourned the Sessions.

260. The Trial of JOHN TASBOROUGH and ANNE PRICE, at the King's-Bench, for Subornation of Perjury: 32 CHARLES II. A. D. 1680.

FIRST, Proclamation was made for information in usual form. Then the Defendants were called, and appearing, were by the clerk of the crown advised to look to their challenges. Then the jurors that were summoned to try the cause being called, and appearing, the twelve that were sworn, were these persons following, Thomas Harriot, Thomas Johnson, Charles Umbervile, Thomas Earsby, Richard Pagett, John Greene, Edward Wilford, Richard Bull, Joseph Radcliffe, Richard Cooper, James Supple, George Read.

Cl. of Cr. Gentlemen of the jury, you that are sworn, hearken to the record. The defendants John Tasborough and Anne Price, stand indicted by the oaths of 12 honest and lawful men of the county of Middlesex; which indictment sets forth,

"That whereas one Thomas White, alias Whitebread, William Harcourt, John Fenwick, John Gavan, alias Gawen, and Anthony Turner being popish recusants, and false traitors against our sovereign lord, Charles the second by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland king, defender of the faith &c. the 13th day of June, in the year of the reign of our sovereign lord the king that now is the 31st, at the sessions of Oyer and Terminer, and Gaol-delivery, then held in the Old-Bailey, in the parish of St. Sepulchres, in the ward of Farrington-without, London, for the city of London and county of Middlesex, were lawfully indicted for certain high-treasons, in the said indictment specified; and afterwards were severally tried by a jury of the said county, and then and there were attainted, as appears by the record thereof to the jurors aforesaid in evidence shewn. And whereas also one Richard Langhorn, esq. being a Popish recusant, the 14th day of June, in the year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king that now is the 31st aforesaid at the sessions of Oyer and Terminer, then held by adjournment at the Old-Bailey, in the parish and ward aforesaid, was lawfully indicted for divers high-treasons in the said indictment specified; and being afterwards tried by a jury of the county, was then and there thereof attainted, as appears by the record thereof to the jurors aforesaid in evidence shewn. And whereas one Stephen Dugdale, upon the several trials of the indictments aforesaid, was a witness produced and sworn on behalf of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, and then and there in lawful manner did give material evidence against the said William Harcourt, and the said several other traitors, to prove them guilty of the matters in the said indictment specified: the said defendants, John Tasborough and Anne Price, the premises aforesaid well knowing, and being persons devilishly affected towards our sovereign lord Charles the second, now king of England, &c. their supreme and natural lord, and devising, and with all their strength intending the peace and tranquillity of this kingdom to disturb, and to hinder and stife the farther discovery of the said treasons, and as much as in them lay, the due course of law to elude, and the prosecution of justice in that behalf to retard and obstruct; as also to cause and procure that it should be believed that the persons aforesaid, attainted, were unjustly attainted: The said Anne Price before the trial of the said William Harcourt, to wit the 10th day of June, in the year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king the 31st aforesaid, at the parish of St. Margaret Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, with force and arms, falsely, unlawfully, unjustly, corruptly, and against the duty of her allegiance, did solicit, suborn, and endeavour to persuade the said Stephen Dugdale, that he the aforesaid Stephen Dugdale should not be a witness nor give evidence against the said William Harcourt, upon the trial of the said William Harcourt for the treasons aforesaid: and that the said John Tasborough and Anne Price, afterwards to wit, the 12th day of October, in the year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king that now is, the 31st aforesaid, at the parish of St. Margaret Westminster aforesaid, with force and arms, falsely, unlawfully, unjustly, advisedly, corruptly, and against the duty of their allegiance, did solicit, suborn, and endeavour to persuade, and either of them did then and there, falsely, unlawfully, advisedly, corruptly, and against the duty of their allegiance, solicit, suborn, and endeavour to persuade the said Stephen Dugdale, that he the said Stephen Dugdale, should retract and deny all the evidence and information which he the said Stephen Dugdale as aforesaid, had given against the traitors and popish recusants aforesaid; the said John Tasborough and Anne Price then and there falsely, unlawfully, unjustly, and advisedly, corruptly promising, and either of them promising to the said Stephen Dugdale great sums of money and rewards, if he the said Stephen Dugdale would retract and deny all the evidence and information by the said Stephen Dugdale, against the traitors and popish recusants aforesaid, as aforesaid given, and would withdraw and absent himself the said Stephen Dugdale, in places unknown and beyond the sea: and that the said John Tasborough and Anne Price, their wicked devices, practices and intentions aforesaid to fulfil and accomplish, afterwards, to wit, the said 12th day of October, in the year of the reign of our said sovereign lord the king the 31st aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid in the county aforesaid by force and arms, falsely, unlawfully, unjustly, advisedly, and corruptly, and against the duty of their allegiance, did produce and shew and each of them did then and there produce and shew to the said Stephen Dugdale, a certain note in writing, the tenour of which note follows in these English words following: 'Being touched with a true remorse of conscience, and hearty sorrow for the great ill I did in coming in a witness against the Catholics, and there speaking things which in my own conscience I knew to be very far from the truth: I think myself bound in duty both to God and Man, and for the safety of my own soul, to make a true declaration how I was drawn into this wicked action. But being very well satisfied, that I shall create myself many powerful enemies, upon this account, I have retired myself to a place of safety, where I will with my own hand discover the great wrong that hath been done the Catholics, and hope it may gain belief. And likewise I protest before Almighty God, that I have no motive to induce me to this confession, but a true repentance for the mischiefs I have done, and hope God Almighty will forgive me.' And that the said John Tasborough and Anne Price, the day and year aforesaid, in the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, with force and arms, falsely, unlawfully, unjustly, advisedly, corruptly, and against the duty of their allegiance, the said Stephen Dugdale the aforesaid note in writing, so as aforesaid, to the said Stephen Dugdale produced and shewn to sign and subscribe, did solicit and endeavour to persuade, and each of them did solicit and endeavour to persuade, and then and there falsely, unlawfully, unjustly, advisedly and corruptly did promise, and each of them did promise to the said Stephen Dugdale, that if he the said Stephen Dugdale, the aforesaid note in writing would sign and subscribe, that then he the said Stephen Dugdale great and vast sums of money should have and receive; to the evil and pernicious example of all persons in the like case offending, and against the peace of our said sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, and against the duty of their allegiance.*

are to say so; if you find them Not Guilty, you are to say so, and no more, and hear your evidence. Crier, make an O Yes.

Crier. O Yes! If any one will give evidence on behalf of our sovereign lord the king, against the defendants John Tasborough and Anne Price, let them come forth and they shall be heard.

Mr. Belwood. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, the defendants, John Tasborough and Anne Price, stand indicted for subornation of perjury: and the indictment sets forth, that whereas Thomas Whitebread, William Harcourt, and others, were indicted, and that for treason, in conspiring the death of the king, and other treasons, and were legally tried, convicted, and attainted for the same; and that Richard Langhorn was likewise indicted and attainted for the same offence: and that upon these trials Mr. Dugdale was produced and examined as a witness for the king, and did depose materially against the said traitors: and the defendants knowing this, and contriving and designing to stifle the discovery of the treasons aforesaid, did before the trial of the said Harcourt solicit, suborn, and endeavour to persuade the said Mr. Dugdale not to be a witness, nor to give evidence upon the trial: and after the trial, did farther solicit him to retract and deny all the evidence he had given on that behalf, and promised him large rewards and great sums of money for it: and to accomplish this, they did incite him to withdraw and retire himself, and produced a note which he was to sign, and which hath been read to you, wherein he was to acknowledge that he was in an error, and had sworn falsely, and therefore had retired himself; and for this they promised him great rewards: and this offence is laid to be done falsely, advisedly, corruptly, and against the duty of their allegiance. To this the defendants have pleaded Not Guilty; if we shall prove the fact upon them, we hope you will find it.

Serj. Maynard. My lord, and you the gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel in this cause against the defendants. For the fact that is laid in the indictment, it consists of these particulars: 1. An attempt to prevent the evidence before it was given. And 2. When it was given, and the traitors were convicted and condemned, then to disguise that evidence, and the proceedings at law that hath been against the traitors; and this in favour of the Catholics. 3. The means they used to persuade him, which was by corrupt promises and engagements to him. And, 4. That they had prepared a note which hath been read to the jury; whereby he that had swore the truth, should publicly own to the world that he had sworn a lie: and that the Catholics had received great injury by him, and that he had withdrawn himself to make this discovery: and this is the substance of the charge upon these persons. This practice, my lord, is not new, it hath appeared here in several other instances: we remember what Reading did, and we have not forgotten what Knox and Lane did; and this is the third cause of that kind that hath come before you. Our evidence will be this: we shall produce Mr. Dugdale, the person against whom this design was laid, and he can testify all this matter. Now he was but a single person against these two tempters; and your lordship remembers what was said in the like case, two might convince one; and therefore he thought it safe to acquaint, and he did acquaint persons of public concern and authority with this attempt upon him; and he did not only this, but they met several times about it at the tavern, and there we shall prove what they did. Part of this hath been confessed, for this hath had another examination in another place: and the gentlewoman hath confessed, that she did offer him sums of money; for it we will call our witnesses. We shall not now aggravate the fault, that will come after the evidence given; but I think it is balliish enough if it be proved.

Attorney General (sir Creswel Levinz.) My lord, this case is of the same nature with those that Mr. Serjeant hath mentioned of Reading, and Knox and Lane; but it goes somewhat further: For this must be done in writing, and subscribed by the party, to be produced upon occasion, to defame all the evidence that had been given before: And the substance of the note is to recant all that he had said, and aver it to be false; and so all that have died upon that account, must have been supposed to have died very unjustly. This was the design of the matter: and it was not only in this case that these persons had been endeavouring things of this nature; for we can prove, if it be necessary, by another witness, that this gentlewoman hath been tampering to persuade him to retract his evidence against another person, one Mr. Parsons, a priest in custody; and to bring all about, she did presume upon Mr. Dugdale's old acquaintance with her: They had been fellow-servants in my lord Aston's family, and by that means were of ancient acquaintance; and she did presume upon these grounds, that she could withdraw him from all his evidences. And we shall prove, I think, by another witness which does fortify this testimony, that both these persons have already acknowledged this fact, and that they personated great persons in it; that is, they pretended to come in the name of very great persons, as you will hear, when they had nothing to do in the thing. They pretended to go to Windsor for pardon and assurances of protection, and they have acknowledged it; and it is in proof that they were never near that person: That is, Mrs. Price did pretend she should go down to Windsor and speak with the duke of York, for he was the person named, though it is acknowledged, and was in proof by her companion, that she never came near him, that is, by Mrs. Harris, of whom you will hear anon. And Mr. Tasborough did pretend the same thing to Mr. Dugdale, and did acknowledge it to the council, but denied that it was true. We shall call our witnesses, and prove the fact as it hath been opened.

Serj. Maynard. We will first prove the indictments that are recited, and call for the records of the convictions.

L. C. J. (sir William Scroggs). Sure they will admit that.

Serj. Maynard. We must offer our proof; if they will admit it, so.

L. C. J. What say the counsel for the defendants? do you admit the indictments and convictions?

Mr. Pollexfen. My lord, I cannot tell in this case; if we should not stand upon it that all the proofs be given, our client perhaps will take it ill. I pray therefore the evidence may be given according to law.

L. C. J. Well, if you stand upon it, they must prove it. Produce the Records.

Att. Gen. Give Mr. Clare his oath. [Who was sworn.]

Serj. Maynard. Put in the copy, Sir. [Which was done.]

Cl. of Cr. Come, Sir, is that a true copy?

Clare. Yes; I examined it.

L. C. J. Where?

Clare. With Mr. Adderley, the clerk of the peace of Middlesex; and this other with Mr. Tanner, clerk of the peace for London.

[Then the copy of the Record of the Conviction of Whitebread, &c. was begun to be read.]

L. C. J. Let them see it that are for the defendants.

Justice Dolben. Don't read it all; if they have any exception to it, let them make it: Give it over to them.

Mr. Pollexfen. Aye, my lord, let us see it. Pray, Sir, you say you examined this, is this a true copy?—Mr. Clare. Yes, it is.

[Then also the Conviction of Langhorn in London, was read.]

Justice Dolben. That is the Conviction at Newgate.

Justice Pemberton. Well, go on with the rest now.

L. C. J. Go on with the evidence. Justice Pemberton. Who do you begin with? who do you call first?

Mr. Belwood. Mr. Dugdale, my lord. [Who was sworn.]

Price. Stand nearer me, Mr. Dugdale.

Att. Gen. He stands near enough.

Serj. Maynard. He will be near enough you by and by, Mrs. Price.

L. C. J. Come, Mr. Dugdale, what say you against Mrs. Price and Mr. Tasborough?

Dugdale. My lord, Mrs. Price being an ancient acquaintance of mine (for she was my fellow-servant at my lord Aston's, may it please your lordship) I coming to town as a witness for the king, I did send for Mrs. Price as one of my ancient acquaintance; I think it was in January was twelvemonth.

L. C. J. Is she a papist?

Dugdale. Yes, I think she is now: we used to go to mass together in the country.

L. C. J. She was one, but is she?

Dugdale. I suppose she is one; we had familiarity together, but never till June last did she endeavour to take off my evidence.

L. C. J. When was it she first set upon you?

Dugdale. She began to tamper first the night before Harcourt's trial.

L. C. J. But she had been before with you in London?

Dugdale. Several times: For I sent to her presently after I came to town; but that was the first time she offered to take off my evidence. And she was then persuading me to be out of the way, and not to give any evidence against Mr. Harcourt, because he was her ghostly father.

L. C. J. Who was by?

Dugdale. There was nobody by, but one that was an acquaintance of mine that heard her.

L. C. J. What is his name?

Dugdale. Wright.

L. C. J. Then you two and Wright were together?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. What said you to her when she made that offer to you?

Dugdale. I told her I could not do it; for that I was to appear the next day, and was to give my evidence, or I must be forsworn: In any thing else I told her I would serve her; but that I could not do, because I should forswear myself; and I was sworn next morning. It continued two or three days, or a pretty while, before I saw her again.

L. C. J. She was angry for a while with you, was she?

Dugdale. She was afterwards well reconciled to me, and after she desired me that I would speak to your lordship, on behalf of one Mr. Parsons, a prisoner in the Gatehouse, that he might be bailed out; I told her I would; I know not whether I did or no certainly, I suppose I did speak to some of your lordship's servants; I do confess it was not done: but I was to go into the country, into Staffordshire, and just as I was going to take coach, she sent a messenger to me to speak with me before I went. I said I could not stay to speak with her that morning, but I would remember her business when I came to town again; I supposed it to be this about Mr. Parsons. I went into Staffordshire, and continued there about six or seven weeks; I was there at the assizes with your lordship. Now she had been several times at one Mr. Cross's (where we usually met) to enquire when I came to town, and did desire she might know when I came, for she had important business to communicate to me. I think this might be about the 11th of September last, my lord. When I came to town, I came to Mr. Cross's that very night, and they told me of this, That Mrs. Price had been there several times to request them, that whenever I came she might have notice. I denied it that night; I am very weary, said I, and therefore would not have her sent for. Within two or three days after, I came there again, and she was sent for: I cannot tell whether by my direction, or whether they sent for her of their own accord, they can best testify that; when she came to Mr. Cross's, the first thing after salutation from my journey, she asked me if I had spoken to your lordship about Mr. Parsons? I told her, No, not as yet; but I would go straight up to your lordship's house, and speak with you about it. No, said she, you need not now do that, for we have a greater work in hand; which work was this: She told me she was come from a great person, whom she did not then name, to tell me, that if I would retract my evidence (this was the short of it, there were more particulars) and go beyond seas, I should either be in the duke of York's court, or I should be supported by him.

L. C. J. Did she name the duke of York then?

Dugdale. Not the first time; she said she was come from a great person, but named him not: The second time she named him, when I desired to know who the great person was.

L. C. J. But what said she the first time, if you would retract, what then.

Dugdale. I was to have a thousand pounds paid into a merchant's hands, to be secured for me till I came back to give evidence for them. I was to take the Plot off from the catholics, and to lay it wholly upon the protestants. I was to swear against some persons, as Mr. Tasborough told me; that after I was got on ship-board, I was to do a great deal of more service, and come to swear against a great person, a person of considerable note, whom yet they did not name.

L. C. J. But before you depart from what Mrs. Price said to you, make an end of her discourse, when she told you, you should have a thousand pounds deposited into what merchant's hand you thought fit.

Dugdale. I think not that, but into a merchant's hand.

L. C. J. Well, what should you do for it?

Dugdale. I was to retract all my evidence, and to be no witness against them; but before I would much encourage this, I went to my lord that was then president of the council, my lord Shaftsbury.

L. C. J. Who was by when this discourse was? was the third person by you speak of?

Dugdale. There were others by afterward; but there was nobody but we two together, I think at that time: But I went to that noble lord my lord Shaftsbury, and acquainted him and Mr. Hambden and Mr. Charlton with it: For she threatened, that all the king's evidence would in a short time be hanged; and if I would come over to them, it should all be turned upon the Protestants. The duke had a wise counsel, and had contrived it so, that if I would come over to them, there would not be a papist that should suffer more: but their religion should be established in half a year, and all the witnesses brought to condign punishment. When I acquainted these persons I named with this, and communicated it to them, they thought fit I should go on a little with her to trepan her, to see what kind of Plot it was they were designing; and I did give encouragement; but not so far as to set my hand to any paper. But when it did come out, the contrivance they spoke of did prove Mr. Dangerfield's Plot, as appeared afterwards. So, as I was saying, I did encourage this to Mrs. Price, to see what I could get out of her; for I knew their Plots were dangerous and barbarous when I was amongst them; but I never designed to prosecute them at any bar, but only to know the depth of their contrivance. And these gentlemen thought it very fit I should have some evidence to testify for my innocency, if they should prosecute me: And I did get two persons, one Dr. Chamberlain and his clerk, who were to be in a private place to over-hear what was the communication between us; and when I had placed them, I asked Mrs. Price, whether I first began the tampering or she, she answered she did, and I reckoned up all the heads of our former treaties, though not the particulars.

L. C. J. When did Mr. Tasborough first appear in this matter?

Dugdale. My lord, he never appeared but twice, and it was about the 12th of October, I think, the first time. We appointed to meet at the Green-Lettice, that was with Mrs. Price, for I never saw the face of Mr. Tasborough before that time, and from thence we adjourned to the Phensaut in Fullers-rents.

L. C. J. There was the first time you met with Mr. Tasborough, you say?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. What discourse had you with him when you first met him?

Dugdale. My lord, when we came there, Mr. Tasborough was at first pleased to open the business to me, that Mrs. Price had acquainted him that I would come over to them. I sat a good while and said nothing, and when I did speak, I did rather give encouragement than speak against it.

L. C. J. What did he tell you?

Dugdale. He said, he was brought there to confirm what Mrs. Price had promised me.

L. C. J. Did he say so?

Dugdale. Yes, because I would not take it upon her word alone, but desired to have some other sufficient person: and she told me, he was an honest sufficient gentleman, and I might confide in him, and he said, what she had promised, should certainly be made good, and that he came likewise from the duke of York, as he said, to confirm those promises had been made me of his encouragement and protection.

L. C. J. Did he express particularly of what should be made good?

Dugdale. My lord, in general.

L. C. J. Did he mention the money that was to be paid into the merchant's hands?

Dugdale. In general words only, all would be made good.

L. C. J. Then he did not say, the money, but what had been said to you by her should be made good?

Dugdale. We had some particulars mentioned, but I cannot positively remember which.

Attorney General. I desire, my lord, the jury may take notice of this, that what she had promised, was, if he would retract his evidence.

Just. Dolben. Did he intimate that?

Dugdale. The second time when he came,—

L. C. J. But before you come to the second time, let us make an end of the first: Repeat what he told you, when he came to you. You say, he said I am informed by this gentleman, that you intend to come over to us; what then.

Dugdale. He told me a great many things for my encouragement; if I did come, that it was a very charitable act, and it was nothing but what was acted like a christian; and if I had done amiss, I might have pardon for it; and he did say, he was encouraged by more than the duke of York, that had taken my matter into consideration.

L. C. J. What was it in general words?

Dugdale. It was, if I would come over, and retract what evidence I had given. And he said whatever things had been promised me should be sure to be made good. Then my Lord, the second time we did adjourn till Tuesday following; and then we met (as I think) at the Six Cans in Holborn, and it was pretty late that time we met; so Mr. Tasborough and Mrs. Price did tell me it was the last time they were to come.

L. C. J. What, the second time of Tasborough's coming?

Dugdale. Yes, my Lord, and they offered me this note. I had the note before left with me to consider of it.

L. C. J. Who had given you the note?

Dugdale. Mrs. Price gave me the note.

L. C. J. Did Mr. Tasborough leave you before the note was given you? For look you, when he told you about retracting your evidence, and that this is nothing but what you may lawfully do, it is a charitable act—

Dugdale. That was the first time, my Lord.

L. C. J. Did he produce the note then?

Dugdale. He and she together did.

L. C. J. Who was it had it?

Dugdale. Mrs. Price had it from me, and produced it before Mr. Tasborough's face.

L. C. J. Did she give it to him to read?

Dugdale. Mr. Tasborough did read it, and reading it said, this is nothing but what you may lawfully do; there is no hurt in it.

L. C. J. And then he went away and left you and Mrs. Price together; what became of the note?

Dugdale. Then Mrs. Price after some importunity left the note with me, and I delivered it to Dr. Chamberlain to copy out. And Mr. Tasborough and Mrs. Price at the second meeting told me, that was the last time of meeting, and if I did not then sign it, it would be much to my prejudice; and that they should not be able to do any thing for my advantage, if I did not sign it before the Duke went into Scotland. He was then going and it would be much for my benefit if I signed it first; but Mr. Tasborough said, he could do me no more service except I did that.

L. C. J. He said, that that was the last time, and if you would do it, it would be for your advantage?

Dugdale. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. What said you then, did you produce the note again?

Dugdale. My Lord the note was delivered to Mrs. Price, and she brought it thither for me to sign it, and laid it upon the table, and pressed me to sign it.

L. C. J. I thought you had said she had given you the note?

Dugdale. Yes, but I gave it her again before we met the second time.

L. C. J. And who produced it then?

Dugdale. She again the second time. But my Lord, we have missed one thing about Mrs. Price. When she was persuading me, she made use of the duke of York's name, and said she would go down to Windsor to persuade the duke that I should have my pardon: accordingly she did go, as I believe; for she took coach at Charing-Cross, and as she said, did go to Windsor, and brought me word back again, that the duke did not seem to countenance it much, for fear he should be drawn into a præmunire himself; and then she told me the duke did wish her to acquaint the Spanish ambassador with it; and she did go and acquaint him with it, as she told me. I asked her when I should go to speak with the ambassador about it; she told me that the Spanish ambassador could not speak English; and it was not safe to trust an interpreter that they did not know; and so it was to be deferred a little longer; but she said, that he would protect me, and that all that she said that the duke had promised for my reward and for my safe going beyond sea, he would be ready to do it; and she told me, that the Spanish ambassador would write letters into Flanders. And so they made use of the duke of York's name; but I could never find by any thing nor can say, though they made use of the duke of York's name, that he did countenance any such thing, or ever knew of it.

L. C. J. How long was this before the duke went away?

Dugdale. It was about the twelfth or fourteenth of October. The duke went the beginning of November from hence.

L. C. J. Sir Thomas Doleman, do you know when the king came to town from Windsor?

Sir T. Doleman. No, I do not know.

Dugdale. It was before the duke went over into Flanders that the king was at Windsor. For the king and the duke of York came from Windsor, and then the duke went to Flanders again, and then she went, as she said, to Windsor, and came home either the day the duke came from Windsor, or the day after.

L. C. J. Her discourse when she went to Windsor, was before the duke went into Flanders?

Justice Pemberton. The second time you mean.

Dugdale. Yes, my Lord, the second time. For may it please your lordship, I do remember now, that the day when the duke of York came back again from Flanders, I think it was the twelfth of October, that was the time that I saw Mr. Tasborough first, and that was the time they produced the note, and I shah produce some witnesses to prove that he had discourse with me then.

L. C. J. I would only know the time when she told you she went to Windsor, to speak with the duke of York?

Dugdale. My Lord, to the best of my remembrance, and as I think, it was the day before the king come from Windsor, that she went down.

Just. Pemberton. He cannot swear to a day, it is hard to put him to that.

L. C. J. He is not asked to a day, but we would be at some certainty about the time, as near as we can.

Dugdale. My Lord, this I dare positively say, she went down of a Tuesday, and that was the day before the duke of York came from Windsor.

Justice Pemberton. He does give us the time as near as possibly he can.

Att. Gen. Have you a copy of the note, Mr. Dugdale?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord, I have.

Sergeant Meynard. Now we will prove that note.

Att. Gen. For the note itself, your lordship observes, Mrs. Price had the original back again, but your lordship hears Dr. Chamberlain took a copy of it, and he will prove it.

Then Dr. Chamberlain was sworn.

L. C. J. Did she shew you the note at the time that she went to the duke to Windsor?

Dugdale. The note was produced when the duke came from Flanders, the day I think he came, and that was in October.

L. C. J. When did Tasborough and she meet with you?

Dugdale. When the duke of York came back from Flanders.

L. C. J. When was that?

Dugdale. My lord, I think it was the 12th of October. Mrs. Price had appointed Mr. Tasborough to come to confirm what she had said before, which was the time that I saw him first.

L. C. J. When was that?

Dugdale. The very day the duke came from Flanders, as I think.

L. C. J. Well then, she talked to you of the duke of York, and going to Windsor, before ever you saw Tasborough.

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

Justice Pemberton. And so his evidence was.

L. C. J. So then here is the matter, that the jury may understand the evidence; she solicited him the first day before Harcourt's trial: Then the next was three or four days after the trial; and then she endeavoured to persuade you to retract your evidence, and go beyond sea.

Justice Pemberton. No, my lord, that was only to get the man bailed that was in the Gatehouse.

L. C. J. Did she not the second time propose that?

Dugdale. No, my lord, not till I came forth out of the country again.

L. C. J. Then you went into the country before the great matter was spoken to?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. And then she left word at the house, that she might know when you came, and when she met with you, she began to tamper with you, and said you should have 1,000*l.* paid into some merchant's hand, and be well looked upon, and after that she said she would go down to the duke to Windsor.

Justice Pemberton. But at that time she told him, he should have a place in the duke's court.

L. C. J. Did she produce the note the first time you saw Tasborough?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord, the note was produced the first time.

L. C. J. And Tasborough read it.

Dugdale. Yes, he read it.

L. C. J. And said you might lawfully do it?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. When was the second time?

Dugdale. It was within a few days after, about two or three days.

L. C. J. You are not asked to a day, was the note produced a second time?

Dugdale. Yes.

L. C. J. And then he was upon the same matter still, when you swear the note was produced the second time?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. And then he said, this is the last time we must offer it to you, if you do not do it now, I can do you no good.

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. But her discourse was before all this, that she would go down to Windsor and get your pardon?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

Justice Jones. Before your acquaintance with Tasborough?

Dugdale. Yes, before ever I saw him.

Justice Pemberton. Tasborough was to confute it.

Dugdale. Yes, for I made some scruples about it, for they said before the duke would believe me real, I must subscribe the note, which I would not do without further assurance. She promised a person of good sufficiency and quality should engage for the performance, and one Mr. Perkins, as she said, was to be sent for, and was sent for out of the country, and 3*l.* 10*s.* expended in sending for him. And I said to Mrs. Price when 1,000*l.* was proposed, Lord in heaven! that is too much money, 100*l.* is enough to serve me; said she, we must have a cure how we manage this matter; for she told me the duke of York stood upon a tickle point, and if it should be known the duke tampered with the king's witnesses, it would ruin him; but she said 1,000*l.* was prepared for me, if I would go beyond sea into Flanders, where I should be maintained and protected. But I objected my fear of the Inquisition in Spain, which I knew to be so cruel a thing, therefore I would not go beyond sea. Then she asked me if I would be contented with the protection of a protestant earl's house?

L. C. J. Did she tell you his name?

Dugdale. She asked me if I could not be content to be in a protestant earl's house, and not go beyond sea? but she named nobody.

L. C. J. When you said you were unwilling to go beyond sea, for fear of the Inquisition, she offered you the protection of a protestant earl's house, and you desired to know who it was, but she named nobody.

Justice Pemberton. And you say when Mr. Tasborough came to you, he told you, if you would retract your evidence, all the promises that had been made to you by her should be made good?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord, and without I would sign the note, the duke and the rest of the gentlemen could not be serviceable to me.

Justice Pemberton. And he pressed you to do it before the duke went into Scotland?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

Mr. Belwood. Pray, Mr. Dugdale, what discourse was between you and Mr. Tasborough concerning the trial of sir George Wake-man?

Dugdale. The last time, the second time we were together—

L. C. J. Then you were but twice with Tasborough?

Dugdale. No, my lord, but that second time, you may see, says he, what a progress hath been made by the acquitting of sir George Wakeman, even that the protestants themselves are at a stand about their belief whether there be a plot or no, and if you come over to us, it will overthrow all.

L. C. J. Had he any discourse with you about the Spanish ambassador?

Dugdale. My lord, I cannot tell whether he had or no, she had.

L. C. J. Did she say he would undertake the making good of the promises?

Dugdale. Said I, Mrs. Price, suppose I should come over to you, what would it advantage you? There is Mr. Oates, and Mr. Bedlow, and Mr. Praunce, when I am gone. Said she, Hang them rogues, so as we do but get you over, we do not care, we can quickly do their business.

Sol. Gen. And he said, this I observe by the way, That if he came over, all the king's evidence should be hanged, and the Plot turned upon the protestants.

Just. Pemberton. Yes, he did say so, that he was told by the gentlewoman, if he would come over, the Plot should be turned upon the protestants, and the king's evidence be hanged.

Mr. Scroggs. Mr. Tasborough did not say so.

Att. Gen. Is this a true copy of the note?

Just. Pemberton. But Mr. Tasborough persuaded him to sign the note, and Tasborough did say it was a good act, and confirmed and assured him that all should be made good to him that she had promised, and desired him to do it before the duke went, that he might be the abler to serve him with the duke.

Att. Gen. Mr. Dugdale, is this a true copy of the note?

Dugdale. I have read it so often, that I do believe it is a true copy: And here is the doctor and his clerk, who will swear it was a true copy, examined with the note.

Att. Gen. Swear Dr. Chamberlain and Cleave. [Which was done.] With what did you examine that copy?

Cleave. By the paper given me by Dr. Chamberlain.

Chamberlain. My lord, I received the paper from Mr. Dugdale, my lord, and gave him order to transcribe it.

L. C. J. And that is a true copy of the paper you had from Dr. Chamberlain?

Cleave. Yes, my lord, it is.

L. C. J. Mr. Dugdale, Did you deliver that very note that Mrs. Price delivered to you, to Dr. Chamberlain?

Dugdale. Yes, I did, and received it back again from him.

L. C. J. And you copied it out from that note Dr. Chamberlain had?

Cleave. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. What is your name, Sir?

Cleave. Cleave.

L. C. J. Read the note. [Which was read as in the Indictment.]

Just. Pemberton. Was this a copy of the Note delivered to you, that you were to sign?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord, it is a true copy: And if I may not be too troublesome, there is one thing more which comes into my mind that passed betwixt Mrs. Price and me: She was instructing me how I should be conveyed beyond sea, and she mentioned the way of the packet-boat that comes from Dover, and goes every Tuesday or Wednesday. I made a shew as if I was willing to do it, but the next time she came, said she, We have thought it not to be so safe as to go in a merchant-ship, which was the way we sent all our priests over.

L. C. J. When was this?

Dugdale. My lord, it was before the duke came home the second time, it was while he was in Flanders. And being desirous to know, I pressed her to tell me what became of Mr. Ewers, my ghostly father in the country: It was a long time ere she would tell me; but at last she told me that he was conveyed over in those yachts that carried the duke of York the first time over into Flanders.

Att. Gen. Then swear Wright. [Which was done.] Mr. Dugdale, is this the man that you mentioned concerning the discourse about Harcourt?

Dugdale. He hearkened, as he told me afterwards, but I did not then know it.

L. C. J. Well, what say you, were you present at any discourse between Mr. Dugdale and Mrs. Price, before Harcourt's trial?

Wright. My lord, I was walking to and fro in the room: Mrs. Price, that gentlewoman, was talking with Mr. Dugdale at the window, and I was very inquisitive, I did think it was upon the account of marriage, or some such business, and so hearkening, I did hear her say, That Father Harcourt had been very kind to her, and that she had visited him before he went to execution, and he bid her not be troubled, he died in a good cause; and upon this account I asked Mr. Dugdale afterwards what her design was, and he said it was to withdraw his evidence.

L. C. J. How often were you in the company of Mrs. Price and Mr. Dugdale? never but that one time?

Wright. Yes, a dozen times, I believe, I have been with them.

L. C. J. When was the first time that you heard them talk concerning Harcourt? they were always very private, were they not?

Wright. Yes.

L. C. J. Well, what did you hear the first time?

Wright. It was at the Horseshoe tavern in Chancery-Lane; and then the great matter that she did desire of him was, to be kind to Harcourt, for he had been her confessor: But afterwards I remember, when he was condemned, she said she had been with him, and he had bid her be of good cheer, for he died in a good cause.

L. C. J. Was this the time that you were at the Horseshoe tavern?

Wright. The first time I heard no discourse of Harcourt then.

L. C. J. When was this? And what said she when she spoke of Father Harcourt the first time?

Wright. It was to desire him to be kind to Father Harcourt, because he was her confessor. They spoke so softly I could hardly hear them.

L. C. J. Well, how do you know then?

Wright. I asked him when he came out, what it was, and he said it was to take off his evidence against Harcourt; and afterwards she said she had been to visit him.

L. C. J. What more did she say at that time?

Wright. I could not hear any more, my lord.

L. C. J. Then all that you did hear was, She said to him, pray be kind to Mr. Harcourt, for he is my confessor; and to that effect was all their whispering that you heard?

Wright. That is all I did hear her say at that time.

Just. Pemberton. But what did you hear Mr. Dugdale say at that time?

Wright. He said it was upon the account of taking off his evidence.

L. C. J. Well, what did you hear her say afterwards?

Wright. After she was saying she had been with him.

L. C. J. How long after?

Wright. I do not know, I cannot say to the time, for I never minded it, they sent for me sometimes at their pleasure; but she said she had been to visit Father Harcourt, who took her in his arms and said, Do not cry for me for I die in a good cause; and this I told Mr. Dugdale of again: And she did further say, If the king should command me to be burnt at a stake, I would do it, and so would any of the party. Then said Mr. Dugdale, While you give these kind expressions, yet you would cut off his head if you could: Said she, you are a rogue, and I am satisfied.

L. C. J. What, was it before the time that she said, pray be kind to Harcourt?

Serj. Maynard. We call this witness only in confirmation of Dugdale's testimony.

L. C. J. But brother, here is the matter; He says at the time that she told Dugdale he was a rogue, and she was satisfied; afterwards she came to tamper with him to do Harcourt's kindness.

Wright. She said many times, there were not four greater rogues between this and Hell-gate than the king's evidence.

L. C. J. What, was it before she talked of Harcourt?

Wright. Yes, a great while.

L. C. J. That is the thing, that she should say he was a great rogue, and yet afterwards tamper with him.

Serj. Maynard. There was some love betwixt them, and they did keep company together.

Sol. Gen. This is before she began to tamper with Mr. Dugdale; but that we call this witness to prove is, that she did afterwards tamper with him, as Mr. Dugdale tells you.

L. C. J. And the thing I say is, Would she go to tamper with one she had that opinion of? It is not impossible to be so, but it is not likely.

Sol. Gen. It is not impossible nor improbable at all, with submission; who should she tamper with but a rogue, or one that she thought would be so?

Justice Pemberton. She thought as all the other Catholics did, and did desire to withdraw him from his evidence against them.

Justice Dolben. And notwithstanding that she called him rogue; yet still the witness says, he thought there was matter of love between them.

Att. Gen. Then we will call you Cross, the man of the tavern.

Justice Pemberton. It was about a matter that concerned the whole Catholic party, and if you ask them they will call them all rogues: But afterwards they will begin to tamper one with one, and another with another.

Serj. Maynard. And they take the same method with every one of them.

Justice Jones. But this is that that is said in confirmation of Dugdale's evidence, that Dugdale did immediately after tell him, that her business was to get him to retract his evidence.

Justice Pemberton. And he overheard so much, that she desired of him to be kind to Harcourt, who was her ghostly Father.

Sol. Gen. Now, my lord, as we have produced one witness to confirm one part of Mr. Dugdale's evidence; now we shall produce another witness to prove the subsequent discourses, and her persuasion of him to retract and to sign the note. And for that we call Dr. Chamberlain.

Att. Gen. We will call Cross first to prove the meetings at the tavern, he is the man of the tavern. [Who was sworn.]

L. C. J. Come, ask your question now?

Mr. Belwood. Pray what can you say concerning Mrs. Price's discourses with Mr. Dugdale?

L. C. J. Do you know Mrs. Price here?

Cross. Yes, I do know her very well.

L. C. J. What say you then to her?

Cross. I never heard any discourse from them but what was common.

Justice Dolben. But they have been often there only them two, have they not?

Justice Pemberton. Did she ever come to your house?

Cross. She hath been there several times.

Att. Gen. I would ask you this question, Sir, Whether she used not to come there and send for Mr. Dugdale, when he hath not been there?

Cross. Yes, she hath been there often to enquire for him.

Att. Gen. What frequently?

Cross. Yes, a great many times.

Att. Gen. About what time of the year?

Cross. Last Summer, in June, July, and several months.

L. C. J. What say you to September and October?

Cross. I can't say the particular months, but she hath been there, and desired me to send for Mr. Dugdale, for she had earnest business with him.

Att. Gen. Was it presently after he came to town?

Cross. My lord, she sent for him before he went out of town, and after he came to town; before he went to the assizes, and since he came from the assizes.

Att. Gen. Pray did you ever hear them speak about a priest, one Parsons?

Cross. I have heard somewhat about Mr. Parsons, that Mrs. Price did speak to Mr. Dugdale, that he should not proceed further against him than he had done.

L. C. J. Did you hear her talk about Harcourt?

Cross. Yes, I have heard her speak something, but I do not know the particulars of it.

L. C. J. But you have heard her name Harcourt's name?

Cross. Yes, I have.

L. C. J. You do not pretend this man was by at the agreement?

Att. Gen. No, we do not: but only to prove they had frequent discourses together, and that she sent for him often about business.

L. C. J. And it is to the same purpose that the other was called for, only in confirmation.

Mr. Sanders. My lord, we pray he may be asked, whether Mr. Dugdale did not sometimes send for Mrs. Price?

Cross. Not upon his own account, as I know of; for I have told you she hath been there, and left word she must needs speak with him, and when he hath come she hath been sent for.

Mr. Sanders. Do you know she hath been sent for at any other time?

Cross. Not that I know of: But when he was in the country, she came to our house, and desired that whenever he came to town she might speak with him about earnest business, and she was sent for.

Mr. Scroggs. But he does not say any thing of Mrs. Tasborough.

L. C. J. No; he came only to the Pheasant, and that other place.

Att. Gen. Now, my lord, if your lordship please, Mr. Dugdale did mention a matter that some persons were by direction to stand by and hear their discourse; we have these persons here, who will tell you how it was, Dr. Chamberlain and his clerk.

Dr. Chamberlain. My lord, some time in September, Mr. Dugdale acquainted me, that there was a design to draw him off from his evidence, and he told me that the duke of York was named in it. I said, if it were so, it were a thing of great moment, and if it could be confirmed it were well. He told me, if I would come to his chamber some morning, Mrs. Price should be there, and I should hear the discourse; and accordingly I did come the 22d or 23d of September, and was there about an hour, and went into the closet with my clerk, and bid Mr. Dugdale speak with an indifferent voice, to see if I could hear what they said. He did so, and we did hear him. At length Mrs. Price came; the gentlewoman I had never seen, but he called her by that name, and she answered to it. They had several discourses, I could not overhear all, but the sum was, that the Spanish Ambassador was unwilling to treat with him, because it was dangerous, and he must make use of an interpreter, and that the duke of York would protect him, pardon him, and give him a thousand pound to maintain him; You know, says he, Mrs. Price, that I began not this intrigue with you, but you proposed it to me. She owned it, that she had proposed it to him.

L. C. J. Now how can you tell this is the gentlewoman?

Dr. Chamberlain. Nay, I don't know that, my lord.

Att. Gen. We don't pretend that, but will prove it by another witness by and by.

Dr. Chamberlain. It was about the 22d or 23d of September, a Monday morning as I remember.

Just. Jones. Was Tasborough there?

Dr. Chamberlain. No, my lord, none but them two.

L. C. J. Well, go on, sir.

Chamberlain. She did press Mr. Dugdale very much to go with her to the Gatehouse, he would willingly have excused it, but she pressed him so earnestly, telling him she would not go without him, that they went together, and he came up afterwards to me, where I had staid all the time.

L. C. J. Did you hear her say any thing what she would have him do for that 1,000l.

Dr. Chamberlain. I cannot tell truly any thing, but only to be gone.

Just. Pemberton. You could hear that?

Dr. Chamberlain. Yes, my lord, I did,

L. C. J. Whither?

Dr. Chamberlain. Nay, I don't remember that.

Serj. Maynard. This was before the note, my lord.

Dr. Chamberlain. Yes, my lord, for that was brought me afterwards.

Recorder. Call the other witness, Cleave.

L. C. J. How long was this before Harcourt's trial?

Dr. Chamberlain. I don't know that, my lord, it was in September.

Just. Pemberton. But the trial was long before that, soon after Trinity-term.

Sol. Gen. Pray, what did Mr. Dugdale say to her when she pressed him to be gone, did he not make any objection?

Dr. Chamberlain. Possibly he might, I did not hear all that was said.

Cleave. I was there the 22d of September.

L. C. J. In the closet with Dr. Chamberlain?

Cleave. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Had you ever seen Mrs. Price?

Cleave. No, never in my life that I know of.

L. C. J. What did you hear then?

Cleave. Before that Mrs. Price came, we shut up ourselves in the closet, and desired Mr. Dugdale to make a feigned discourse to see whether we could hear him, and he did so, and we heard indifferently well. We bid him to speak a little loud that we might be sure to hear him. We staid there almost half an hour before she came. Afterwards she came up, and Mr. Dugdale saluted her by the name of Mrs. Price, to which she answered. He asked her, when shall I go to the Spanish ambassador's? [This I heard distinctly; for I could see her body but not her face, she stood with her back to the door.] It is not convenient at present, said she, to go; for his interpreter is out of town. Then Mrs. Price was saying, if so be you will come over to the church of Roper, and take off your evidence, you shall have 1000l. secured to you: but how, said he? Said she, I will bring to you in a week's time a person of quality that shall secure and confirm it to you.

Dr. Chamberlain. That I heard too.

Cleave. That will be well, said Mr. Dugdale; I had rather do that way than any other. Said she, you shall have the duke of York's protection, and a pardon not only for your body, but for your soul.

Serj. Maynard. A large proffer!

Cleave. And afterwards said he, if I should come over again to the church, what signifies my going out of the way, when there is Dr. Oates and others to go on with the evidence? said she, we do not care so much for them, for the duke's eye is only upon you.

Justice Pemberton. Did you hear that, Dr. Chamberlain?

Dr. Chamberlain. No, my lord; the duke was named indeed, but I do not remember that particular. And she several times desired him to speak softly; and then Mr. Dugdale was so honest, that he repeated it over again, that if we had not heard him before, we might understand him.

L. C. J. Now prove this gentlewoman to be the person.

Cleave. She afterwards pressed him to go with her to the Gatehouse, which he seemed unwilling to do, but went; and we have a man here that stood below the stairs, that saw her come in and go out.

Serjeant Maynard. Call Holmes. [Who was sworn.] What can you say about this Mrs. Price?

L. C. J. Do you know Mrs. Price?

Holmes. Yes, That is the woman.

Mr. Belwood. Did you see her at Dr. Chamberlain's?

Holmes. I saw her at Mr. Dugdale's that morning that my master was there.

L. C. J. What time do you speak of?

Holmes. The 22d of September I went along with my master.

L. C. J. Who is your master?

Holmes. Dr. Chamberlain.

L. C. J. What day of the week was it?

Holmes. On a Monday morning between 8 and 9 o'clock.

Just. Dolben. That is the same time you speak of, is it not?

Chamberlain, and Cleave. Yes, my lord, he went along with us.

Holmes. This is the woman that came down with Mr. Dugdale; I took great notice of her, and know her very well again: There were some words spoke in the shop, but I don't know what they were.

L. C. J. Dr. Chamberlain, she went out of the chamber with him, did she not?

Chamberlain. Yes, my lord, she did.

L. C. J. How often have you seen her?

Holmes. I saw her go into the house, come out with Mr. Dugdale to go to the Gate-house, and when they came back again from Westminster, from the Gate-house.

L. C. J. How often have you seen her besides. You took notice of her when she came down stairs, and when she came back again?

Holmes. Yes.

L. C. J. And this is the woman upon your oath?

Holmes. Yes, upon my oath.

Just. Pemberton. She came down with Dugdale, and would have him go along with her to the Gate-house.

Att. Gen. My lord, we say that Mr. Dugdale did acquaint Mr. Hamden, and Mr. Charlton and my lord of Shaftsbury with the business? we desire Mr. Hamden and Mr. Charlton may be called, who promised to be here. [But they appeared not.]

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, here are the clerks of the council, they will all give your lordship an account that this woman and the gentleman did acknowledge this matter before the council, and there did deny what they had sworn at first.

L. C. J. Who do you swear first?

Att. Gen. Sir Robert Southwell. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. Come, sir Robert, what do you know?

Sir R. Southwell. My lord, she, this gentlewoman, Mrs. Price, was about the 23d of October examined before the council, and being examined, we were commanded to take notes, the several clerks of the council, and we did take notes, which were long, and, my lord, I must refer to those notes.

Justice Pemberton. Have you those notes?

Sir R. Southwell. Yes. It is hard for me to give my evidence, unless some particular question be asked me, because they are very long.

Att. Gen. Then I ask you, sir, this particular question, whether that gentlewoman did acknowledge the paper she is charged with?

Sir R. Southwell. My lord, I do remember Mrs. Price, when she was asked who it was that framed the paper for her (because it seemed to the lords as if it had been a thing so very well framed that it was beyond a woman's capacity to do it) Mrs. Price said that she studied it herself, and indited it herself, and one Mrs. Man as I think, writ it out for her; but she took it upon herself, that she had studied it (that particular word) and contrived it.

Att. Gen. What did Mr. Tasborough say?

Sir R. Southwell. My lord, I do also remember that Mr. Tasborough was cited before the council-board: and being asked about this paper—

L. C. J. Was it shewn him?

Sir R. Southwell. I verily believe it was; it was read to him. Mr. Tasborough did speak very cautiously, and as prudently as he could in the matter: he did not positively say he had pressed Mr. Dugdale to sign it; but did tell Mr. Dugdale, that unless he did sign it; he could not proceed to get him any favour, for that was to be the foundation to testify that he was a man of that sorrow that he had expressed himself to Mrs. Price?

L. C. J. Did he own that to Mr. Dugdale?

Sir R. Southwell. Yes; and he added, my lord, further (to do him justice in all he said) in case Mr. Dugdale had signed the paper, he would presently have carried it before a magistrate.

Att. Gen. I think we need not trouble your lordship any further at present; we leave it here till we hear what they say.

Mr. Sanders. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury; I am of counsel for Mrs. Price, that is one of the defendants in this Indictment; which, as hath been opened, does set forth, that she did contrive to suborn the king's evidence before the trials of those persons, and to suppress it; and afterwards to retract the evidence given, and go off from what before he had sworn, to disparage the justice of the realm, and to make it be believed that those persons who were condemned and executed for this conspiracy were innocent, and had wrong done them by him. Now for that matter, that which we have to offer for her is this: Mr. Dugdale and Mrs. Price were fellow-servants in my lord Aston's family, and there they did contract a more than ordinary familiarity; for in truth they did contract a marriage, and Mr. Dugdale did promise her marriage; but afterwards Mr. Dugdale having some other design, did desert her, and she came to London and lived here; but afterwards when he came up to London, he thought fit to renew his suit, and did not only send for her when he first came to London; but we have it in proof, that from time to time he had continually sent for her, and would not be quiet without her; and when she denied to come upon his sending in his own name, he sent in another woman's name, whom he knew to be an acquaintance of her's; and thus there continued all along a great intimacy between them, insomuch that several persons, and among them one of the king's witnesses, did observe they were speaking about marrying and did think they did intend to be married in a short time; my Lord, what discourse might pass between them I don't know: for ought I perceive she is proved to be a papist, and it is very like she would solicit one with whom she had that familiarity, for those of her own party as much she as could; but as far as I perceive by this evidence that hath been given, he under colour of kindness, and pretence that he would marry her, and sending for her from time to time, at last to rid his hands of her, hath put this upon her, that she should solicit to suborn him against his conscience to withdraw his evidence. She is a kind of weak sollicitrix for matter of judgment and reason; I know not what other prevalency she might have with him by any other thing, but for judgment I think——

L. C. J. If she penned that herself, as she did acknowledge and avow she did, she was a woman of good judgment certainly.

Mr. Sand. I perceive he was of good judgment to get rid of one he was weary of, by this means.
Just. Pemberton. Alas! Alas! This is such a design indeed of counterproving the king's evidence.

Mr. Sanders. Mr. Dugdale hath sworn, that this was her intrigue, and she first began with him: If Mrs. Price be admitted to swear, who is the defendant, as well as Mr. Dugdale, who is the prosecutor, she would tell you that Mr. Dugdale did contrive this matter himself.

Just. Pemberton. She would destroy his evidence that way, that's very well.

Just. Dolben. Dr. Chamberlain and his clerk both swear, That he told her, 'You know it was not I begun this intrigue, but you.'

Mr. Sanders. And if she had had but so much wit to have planted witnesses to have taken advantage of his words, she had counter-worked him.

Just. Pemberton. They will learn such ways soon enough of themselves, you need not teach them.

Mr. Sanders. If you please we will go on with our evidence, and call witnesses to prove that Mr. Dugdale had contracted himself to her in marriage; and this is a very unkind ill thing in him to serve us thus.

Just. Pemberton. Mr. Sanders, you ought to remember, Publica privatis, &c. A man should prefer the public good and safety of the nation before such a mistress as this is.

Just. Dolben. But hitherto the proof runs, that she sought him, and not he her.

Mr. Sanders. But they were contracted first.
Just. Dolben. And you hear what the master of the Horseshoe says about her leaving messages for him.

Just. Pemberton. He hath very good reason why he should not marry her, for what I can perceive.

L. C. J. It is much they should be contracted, when she told him he was a great rogue.

Mr. Sanders. It may be she might, I know not what cause he hath now to be displeased with her; but it may be she might be displeased with him then. But I beseech your lordship and the jury to observe, that though she did tell him he was a rogue, yet it was afterwards that she did solicit and suborn him.

Just. Pemberton. And therefore she thought plainly he was fitter for her purpose, because she took him for a rogue.

Mr. Sanders. But if she had a purpose to suborn him, she would not call him rogue to his face; that was not the way to insinuate into him. I desire sir John Nicholas may be sworn. [Which was done.]

L. C. J. What questions do you ask sir John?

Mr. Sanders. I desire, my Lord, sir John would tell us, whether Mr. Dugdale in his hearing did not own he was contracted to Mrs. Price?

Sir J. Nicholas. No, truly sir, that I know of.
Mr. Sanders. Pray, sir, will you please to recollect it; it was when Mr. Dugdale was before the council.

Sir J. Nicholas. Mr. Dugdale did then own some proposals of marriage, but nothing of a contract.

L. C. J. It is your women-witnesses are like to do that.

Mr. Sanders. That is all, sir, you remember?
Sir J. Nicholas. Yes.

Just. Pemberton. Have you put the best foot forwards, Mr. Sanders?

Mr. Sanders. Which is Mary Benwell? Swear Mary Benwell. [Which was done.] We will now prove he sent for us several times; we did not go after him so much. What do you know concerning Mr. Dugdale's sending for Mrs. Price?

Benwell. He sent for her to my house several times.

L. C. J. Did he lie at your house?

Benwell. No, my Lord, he did not.

L. C. J. Where is your house?

Benwell. In Brownlow-street.

L. C. J. What is it a public house?

Benwell. It is an alehouse, the Green-Lettice.

Just. Dolben. He told you so himself, that he did meet her at the Green-Lettice.

L. C. J. What was their discourse when they met?

Benwell. I know nothing of that, I did not hear him say any thing; but only he would come in and say, let your boy go for Mrs. Price.

L. C. J. When was this?

Benwell. The last time was Sunday seven-night before she was taken.

Recorder. (Sir George Jefferies.) She always came when she was sent for?

Benwell. Yes, if she was within.

Mr. Sanders. How often did he send for her?

Benwell. Above 20 times.

L. C. J. What great inference can you make from that? methinks it is as much against you as it is for you; for it proves there was a great familiarity and frequent meetings between them; if and it be so, it shews as if she had that great confidence in him, as to attempt upon, and attack him in this affair.

Just. Pemberton. Indeed Mr. Sanders, if you would have proved an inducement to Mr. Dugdale's evidence, you could not have proved it better, that she had great confidence in him; she had an opinion, and reckoned he was sure to her, and so had a greater influence over him than another.

Just. Jones. He sent for her to the Green-Lettice, she sent for him to the Horsehope; the master of the house swaareth that she sent for him 20 times, so they might send for one another 20 times a-piece.

Just. Dolben. And he never came to seek for her but when she had been there, and left word for him before.

Mr. Sanders. Now, my lord, if you please, we will go on to prove, That when she refused to come, he sent for her in another body's name.

L. C. J. What will that do? Or what does that prove?

Mr. Sanders. It is not probable then that she should solicit him: And just at the last here are some witnesses planted, and some words are taken from her mouth, that it was her intrigue all along.

Just. Pemberton. Mr. Sanders, you do not shew the time when those frequent sendings and comings were.

L. C. J. It shews that which they have proved, that she believed he was fond of her, and she was confident of him.

Just. Jones. I suppose Mr. Sanders means, and does drive at this, to shew that it was to drive on the intrigue on his part that these frequent messages were sent.

Then another Woman Witness was called and sworn.

Witness. My lord, at the time that the proclamation was for the banishing of all papists out of town, she came to me and said, If Mr. Dugdale come you ask for me do not offer to tell him where I am.

L. C. J. When was this?

Witness. Long before Easter Term, before the papists were banished out of town.

Just. Pemberton and Just. Jones. This was another part of the intrigue.

Witness. So Mr. Dugdale came to me, and asked me where Mrs. Price was? I told him I could not tell; but if you have any letters I will convey them by a messenger or some foot-boy to her.

Just. Jones. Did he send for her at any time in September?

Witness. The last time he sent for her was the Sunday was sennight before she was taken.

L. C. J. Did he frequently send for her a month or six weeks before that?

Witness. Yes, several times.

Mr. Sanders. Then swear Bridget Lee. [Which was done.]

Mr. Sanders. Pray, mistress, you that spoke last, did Mrs. Price ever deny herself to him, but that once when she left that word with you?

Witness. Never to me, my lord, but that time.

Mr. Sanders. Bridget Lee, pray tell my lord, whether Mrs. Price did deny herself, and the way he used to get her to him.

Lee. Mr. Dugdale came into this gentleman's house, and coming into the house I was in the passage; he asked me, sweetheart, let me speak with you; he desired me to tell him where Mrs. Price was; I told him I could not tell: I wish, said he, you would fetch her to me; no, said I, I would not do it for 5s. He clapped his hand into his pocket, and said he, I will give you 5s. No, said I, I will not do it if you would give me 5*l*. Let every tub stand upon its own bottom.

L. C. J. What did you mean by those words, Let every tub stand upon its own bottom?

Lee. I would not meddle nor make with any thing but my own concerns.

L. C. J. How long was this before the trial of Harcourt?

Lee. A quarter of a year before that.

L. C. J. It was before he went out of town, the circuit.

Lee. Yes, my lord, so it was.

Just. Pemberton. There had been no tampering then, this was before the tampering.

L. C. J. It is no matter when the tampering was, but when Mr. Dugdale sent for her, and she refused.

Mr. Sanders. I wonder what they did together all the time before, if they were not tampering.

L. C. J. They made love together.

Mr. Sanders. What was the occasion that she refused?

Witness. I understand that Mr. Dugdale did find I was fearful of myself; you may venture, said he, for I would not do her the least wrong, nor the least hair of her head should not perish.

L. C. J. This was long before he went into the country?

Witness. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Before the tampering?

Witness. Yes, my lord.

Mr. Sanders. Where is that other witness, Mrs. Holland? [Who was sworn.] What do you know of Mr. Dugdale's sending for Mrs. Price? I would know the last time, and where it was.

Holland. My lord, I do not know what place it was he sent for her to, nor the last time, but it was since Christmas.

L. C. J. Since Christmas?

Holland. No, before Christmas, but I do not remember the day.

L. C. J. How do you know that he sent for her?

Holland. I was told by the people so, That a messenger was come from him for her.

L. C. J. You did not see him.

Holland. No, I did not.

L. C. J. She says nothing to the purpose.

Holland. I know Mr. Dugdale was in her company one Sunday last Lent, and was there two hours.

Just. Jones. It is agreed of all sides they were acquaintance, and had great familiarity.

Just. Pemberton. Ay, or she would never have had the confidence to have attempted upon him in this manner.

L. C. J. Well, have you any more?

Mr. Sanders. Here is one more, that is Mrs. Sheldon.

L. C. J. What do you call her for?

Mr. Sanders. To prove that there was a note left to warn her to avoid Mr. Dugdale's company.

Just. Pemberton. Why did you not?

Mr. Sanders. It had been better for us if we had.

L. C. J. When was that note?

Mr. Sanders. Lately.

L. C. J. That will do no good.

Just. Pemberton. Come, call her however; they will say their witnesses were not heard else. [And she was called, but did not appear.]

L. C. J. Come, she is not here.

Mr. Sanders. Then, my lord, we offer this as evidence. That we had no design to suborn him to retract what he had said; the occasion of our being with him we have given you an account of.

Just. Pemberton. Why did you write your note then?

L. C. J. Mr. Sanders, what you have said amounts to nothing to avoid the evidence that hath been given for the king; for all your testimony says little more, than what he said at first; that we were fellow-servants, and well-acquainted; we made frequent visits, and when I came to town I went to see her, and she came to me: They had no discourse of this same matter of tampering till the day before Harcourt's trial; but sir Robert Southwell does say, she owned that she did study the note, which is the great business in the case: for if she prepared the note for him to sign, what can be said more?

Mr. Sanders. We can say no more but that Mr. Dugdale might dictate it.

L. C. J. No, she owned she dictated it, and got Mrs. Man to write it for her.

Mr. Sanders. I do not know, my lord—

L. C. J. But you may know, if you will; for sir Robert Southwell hath sworn, That she being examined at the council-board, the Lords of the Council had so good an opinion of the skill of it, that they asked her, who framed it for her? And she answered, she did it herself.

Just. Pemberton. Mr. Sanders, if you be not satisfied, here is another of the clerks of the council.

Sir J. Nicholas. All that sir R. Southwell hath said is true.

Sir T. Dolben. All that sir R. Southwell hath said, I can swear to every particular.

L. C. J. Well, what say you, Mr. Pollexfen?

Mr. Pollexfen. My lord, if you please to spare me a word for the other defendant Mr. Tasborough: There is in the indictment two things charged on the defendants; one, That they should persuade Mr. Dugdale not to give evidence against Harcourt: for that there is no manner of evidence against Mr. Tasborough, but he ought to be found Not Guilty for that part.

L. C. J. That is true, of that he must be acquitted.

Mr. Pollexfen. Then for the other part of the charge, That they should endeavour to persuade Mr. Dugdale to retract the evidence he had formerly given, for a sum of money, and other rewards: We do reckon, that as this evidence stands before your lordships, whatsoever is proved against Mrs. Price, will have no influence upon Mr. Tasborough; for although Dugdale and Price have had practices and designs amongst themselves, unless he be a party to them, if he have not a part in them they will not affect him: Then the next thing is, we must distinguish the evidence as it stands, or else it may not be by the jury so well understood how they are differenced one from another; for I would not mince the evidence, but let it stand as it is: and how far Mr. Tasborough is concerned in it, and how far may be done by him as an honest man in this matter, or how far it is an illegal act, will be to be determined by you. Now there is only two meetings that Mr. Dugdale hath had with Mr. Tasborough; and in the next place, there is no other witness to prove it but Dugdale himself, excepting only what sir R. Southwell says of the confession at the council, which, I think, will not be very much neither, as I shall shew when I come to that particular. Mr. Dugdale says, that at the first meeting, the 13th of Oct. at the Green-Lettice in Fuller's Rents, Mr. Tasborough did say unto him, that Mrs. Price had told him, Mr. Dugdale would retract his evidence, and he was come to confirm what she had said.

L. C. J. Nay, but what she had promised.

Mr. Pollexfen. Yes, what she had promised; and that he came from the duke, and that it was charitably done of him to retract; he goes no further: and that if he had done amiss he should be sorry for it. This is the evidence, as near as I can remember to repeat it.

L. C. J. Part of it.

Mr. Pollexfen. As to the first meeting—

Just. Pemberton. Look you, do not mistake, Mr. Pollexfen, but observe this: For Mr. Dugdale does swear he told him, If you will retract the evidence you have given, then all she hath promised shall be made good.

Mr. Pollexfen. That he came to confirm what she had promised. I would repeat it as right as I could, because, my lord, I hope, as this case stands, that notwithstanding all that hath been proved, yet Mr. Tasborough hath done nothing amiss. Then I come to the second meeting.

Just. Pemberton. At the first meeting the note was produced.

L. C. J. No, I think not.

Sir Dolben. Yes, my lord, it was.

L. C. J. Was it, Mr. Dugdale?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

Mr. Pollexfen. Yes, he does swear so, and that he read it, and pressed Mr. Dugdale to sign it; and that this was the last time, and it must be done before the duke went into Scotland, or something to that purpose. This, my lord, under favour, may all stand and be very true, and yet Mr. Tasborough not criminal, with submission. For if so be Mrs. Price were so far in her intercourse with Mr. Dugdale, that as appears by his own evidence he did seem to comply and treat, as if he were yielding, and to do what they would have him do, concerning his going beyond seas, or being kept in a Protestant lord's house, and she had such confidence as to tell him how the priests were sent away, and how he might be conveyed away: All this thus far comes to agree with what Mr. Tasborough says for his own defence: For Mr. Tasborough says, Mrs. Price did tell me, that Mr. Dugdale was sorry for what he had sworn, and would retract all the evidence he had formerly given. Thus he says: I'll apply it to our case anon: and this appears by Mr. Dugdale's own evidence: For when he does repeat what Mr. Tasborough told him, he says, That he said Mrs. Price told him of it, and he hath not told you, that he did contradict it for false.

Just. Pemberton. Pray consider; He tells you, that Tasborough said, that Mrs. Price had acquainted him with what propositions she had made of 1,000*l.* and that he was the man that was come to confirm the promises she had made.

L. C. J. That presses you, that is the truth of it: If that had not been in the case, perhaps you do not talk much out of the way. It is true, your observation is right.

Just. Pemberton. It is ingenious indeed, but it will not hold out.

L. C. J. When Tasborough comes into the company to be acquainted with Mr. Dugdale, at that time Mr. Dugdale had been advised to comply, or seem to do so to find out the plot and design, and what he could get out by it; and without question, to pursue that end, he did shew yieldingness, and as you observe, for ought Tasborough knew, he might be sincere: But was it a good way for him to tell him; there is the matter in effect he does tell him so; if you will retract your evidence, according to this note that was produced by her, and read by him, you shall have 1,000*l.* for your pains: Can you answer that?

Just. Pemberton. Or can you answer the other, That he should say, She hath acquainted me with what you propose; that is, That you would retract all, and go out of the way, and be no more an evidence; and if you would do that, that she hath acquainted me with her proposition, which I come to confirm, that she would give you 1,000*l.* What can be made of that?

Just. Dolben. And withal, formerly there was a discourse of some person of quality that should come to him; he desired that some such one should be a security for the money, and afterwards she brought Mr. Tasborough, and said, That was the gentleman she told him of.

Just. Pemberton. Come, Mr. Pollexfen, take this too: What had Mr. Tasborough to do to use the Duke of York's name? and to say, That he had authority from him to propose these things; which certainly is a very great wrong to so great a prince?

L. C. J. That needed not to a penitent person, that was sorry for what he had done.

Pollexfen. He does indeed say, That Mr.

Tasborough should be the man that should secure the money.

Sol. Gen. And there is one thing further, to take in all that Mr. Tasborough did likewise say to Mr. Dugdale; That there is no harm in doing this, that it is a very charitable act, and that he would do well in it.

L. C. J. But they answer that, by saying, Supposing it to be true, that Dugdale had remorse, then it would be a very good action; but to talk of 1,000*l.* to be given for it, there is the crime.

Mr. Pollexfen. Whether my answer will take with your lordship or no, I cannot tell; but the answer I would give is this; There are several things in that paper, as amongst the rest, That he should fall under great dislike and danger, and therefore was forced to hide and secure himself, for fear of those whom he should make his enemies by it, and that was terror enough to any man that should run into such a retraction. Therefore now he must live when he hath done this, and so we should apply the other part of the discourse, whatever money she had promised to take off his fears of want, and so his coming there was to make good that part of the paper, which says, he must be protected and maintained, and preserved, that he may see he hath a subsistence and provision for him, if he did deserve it. And, my lord, it will be greatly distinguishing in our case, and turn much upon this point, with submission, if I give or offer money to any man to swear a falsehood or retract the truth, it is a very great crime, and if we are guilty of that, undoubtedly our crime is very bad; but in order to the bringing of truth to discovery, and to have a retraction, not of a truth, but of a falsehood, and to preserve that witness from perishing, I may promise him protection and subsistence.

Serj. Maynard. Then you have found out a better way than the devil himself could have suggested to uphold subornation.

L. C. J. Upon my word, if that were a way that were allowable, then woe be to us, we should easily have all the witnesses tampered with by the temptation of 1,000*l.* reward. Do you think that is a good thing for a man to say, This thing was rashly said, if you will unsay it, you shall have such a reward? People would be apt to bite at such a bait, and we do not live in so virtuous an age, that 1,000*l.* will not tempt a man to unsay what he hath said at first, though what he hath said then was true.

Mr. Pollexfen. It were an unjust and un-fitting thing, if it were as you say.

Just. Pemberton. Nay, Mr. Pollexfen, consider these things must not be done by any one; their way, if they had been convinced of the truth, had been to have carried the complaint to a magistrate, and there to detect him by what he had said; not to corrupt him, and persist in it, by telling him if he would do so and so, he should have 1,000*l.* By this you let in all manner of temptations to witnesses, that we shall never know where we are.

L. C. J. Come, Mr. Dugdale, (because I will shew you all very fair play, I think very well of Mr. Dugdale.)

Just. Pemberton. He hath carried himself always well.

L. C. J. Yes truly, I know nothing to the contrary: And pray tell upon your oath, and tell the truth: Did Mr. Tasborough, when he read the note, ask of you, Is this true? Did he inquire of you, Whether or no you were really a convert, and, Whether your sorrow and repentance were true?

Dugdale. No, he never did.

L. C. J. Did he ask you, If you could do it with a safe conscience?

Dugdale. No, nothing of conscience was ever named in it.

L. C. J. Did he ask you, Whether it was true?

Dugdale. He never named truth or falsehood: It was only to get me over to retract what I had said.

Just. Pemberton. What is a temptation if this be not?

L. C. J. Truly I ask this question, That the world may see, we would find out the truth by all the ways we can; for if we had been solicitous with him, and asked him, Whether he could do this safely, and with a good conscience, and whether the matter of it were true, it would have gone a great way; but now I have asked Mr. Dugdale this upon his oath, and he says it was only to get him over to them.

Just. Pemberton. And then consider all that is said against Mrs. Price is turned upon you, except that of the contrivance to keep him from giving his evidence against Harcourt. A very subtle invention it was; but whether Mr. Tasborough was in the business of the note, in contriving it, I cannot tell, and it signifies nothing: But she having contrived as ill a note as can be penned, he is as much guilty; for he solicits as well as she, and countenances it so far, as to undertake farther, that the money and the bribes she had offered, should be paid and made good.

L. C. J. Mr. Dugdale, Mr. Tasborough talked with you of going away?

Dugdale. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Advised you to be gone?

Dugdale. Yes, he did: He told me I were best to absent myself for a while beyond sea, and should have convenient passage.

L. C. J. Did he mention the duke of York? What said he?

Dugdale. Yes, he said he had acquainted the duke, and the duke had given him orders to press that note home: for, said he, the duke will not believe you will be true, if you do not sign this note.

Justice Pemberton. It is never to be endured, that you should abuse so noble a prince.

L. C. J. Did you tell Mr. Tasborough then, If I come over, there is Oates, and Bedlow, and Fraunce still left?

Dugdale. I did say so to Mrs. Price, but never to him.

Justice Pemberton. You see then what he would have this note signed for, to strengthen the Catholic cause.

Mr. Thompson. My lord, will you please to spare me one word for Mr. Tasborough: I confess the evidence does seem by Mr. Dugdale to press us very hard, and particularly upon that matter of the money; but as Mrs. Price had managed the business, Mr. Tasborough might have been very innocent: but, my lord, we must make that defence for ourselves that we can in a case of this nature; and therefore it will be, I hope, no reflection to say; We must counterprove Mr. Dugdale, and disprove him as far as we can, to acquit ourselves. My lord, it is a very great crime that we are here charged with, and the crime being so heinous, ought to be well proved, and with unquestionable evidence; Mr. Tasborough, if he be guilty of what he is here accused of, is a very ill man; but men are not drawn up to great degrees of illness so soon as at the first act to attempt such heinous offences: and it is not probable, that at his first slip he should be guilty of a fault of so high a nature, and so very ill as this is. My lord, we shall call some persons that shall make it appear to your lordship, that after Mrs. Price had given us information of this repentance of Mr. Dugdale's, we did make application to a person of very great honour, no less than my Lord Privy Seal, that Mr. Dugdale might receive the discouragement which it was fitting he should in such a matter. My lord, we must call our witnesses, to prove Mr. Tasborough to be a man of a very good reputation, that he never did any such thing before; and I hope we shall give your lordship such an account of him, that the jury will have reason to believe, that Mr. Tasborough is not so guilty as he is represented, but was drawn into this matter, whatever it is. Pray call a witness to shew that Mr. Tasborough acquainted any lord of the privy council.

[Then my Lord Chief Justice went off the bench, to sit on Writs of Error in the Exchequer Chamber.]

Justice Pemberton. If Mr. Tasborough be drawn in, it is by Mrs. Price, but not by Mr. Dugdale.

Mr. Thompson. Is my Lord Privy Seal in Court?

Justice Jones. You know he is not here.

Justice Pemberton. You toss great names about, and make great noise with them, when you know they are not here.

Mr. Thompson. If he had not fallen ill, sure he would have been here. What say you, Mr. Tasborough?

Tasborough. My lord, I was to attend my Lord Privy Seal yesterday, and desired him to do me the honour to be here to-day, because I was to come to my trial: He told me he had business that would hinder him from coming; but, said he, if the Attorney General will inform himself of me, I am ready to testify, that you gave me information first of Mr. Dugdale's recantation, before it came before the council.

Justice Pemberton. We will do your client this right, Mr. Thompson, as to ask whether my Lord Privy Seal was at the council, and said so much then.

Mr. Scroggs. He was not that day, but we acquainted my Lord Privy Seal before that; but sir Robert Southwell does him this right, as to say, that he did declare, if Mr. Dugdale had signed that note, he would have gone with it immediately to a magistrate.

Justice Pemberton. How does that appear he said so?

Sir R. Southwell. My lord, he did further say, after he had said, that he would have carried it to a magistrate in that case, he did say, he had been once or twice with my Lord Privy Seal.

Justice Pemberton. Aye, he did say so; but there was no evidence but his allegation.

Justice Jones. Was my Lord Privy Seal at council at that time?

Sir R. Southwell. No, I think not, my lord.

Mr. Scroggs. It is a very strange thing we should be so forward to promise for Mrs. Price, if we had not thought Mr. Dugdale real.

Justice Pemberton. It is a sign you had a great inclination to the thing: well, call your witnesses.

Mr. Thompson. Call sir Richard Ashfield and alderman Barker.

Justice Dolben. It is a fine thing this to make a long brief with, to no purpose.

Mr. Scroggs. We have a swinging brief here indeed.

Justice Dolben. Aye, you come with a great brief, but no witnesses.

Mr. Thompson. If we do not call the witnesses named in our brief, our client will take it ill; if they do not appear, we can't help it.

Justice Pemberton. You have forgot what you moved the Court about Tempest.

Justice Dolben. But we have not forgotten, that about ten days ago you moved to put off this trial, because Mr. Tempest was your material witness; and being asked what he could prove, you said it was how you were brought acquainted with Mr. Dugdale:—but because the Court did not think fit to put off the trial, Mr. Attorney did say, he would see if he had been examined, and what he had deposed, and report it to us; and afterwards did so, and did consent here that at the trial you should make use of his examination if you pleased; but we do not see that you make any use at all of it.

Mr. Thompson. We that are of counsel must make use of our client's witnesses as we have them in our brief.

Serj. Maynard. We desire they should call their witnesses, and not name names.

Mr. Scroggs. We desire that examination may be read.

Att. Gen. Produce it then.

Mr. Thompson. We have it not.

Recorder. And we for the king do not use it as evidence.

Att. Gen. Come, if it be here you shall have it read, though I believe Mr. Tempest swears little to your purpose; for as I take it he says he does not know Mr. Dugdale at all.

Justice Dolben. But I told you that Mr. Tasborough puts you upon trifles.

Justice Pemberton. But whatsoever they put you upon, you should not trifle with us.

Mr. Thompson. Do you desire they should be read, Mr. Attorney?

Justice Pemberton. We can't read them without the consent of both parties. Do you consent to them first for whom they are produced?

Tasborough. I only desire to know by them how I came acquainted with Mrs. Price.

Justice Dolben. Well, you hear what Mr. Attorney says is in them; will you have them read?

Mr. Scroggs. It is to no purpose, then, if that be all.

Serj. Maynard. I desire to speak but a few words, and I am bound to speak them—

Justice Jones. Brother, they have more witnesses.

Mr. Pollexfen. These we shall now call are to this purpose, to prove Mr. Tasborough's reputation, that he is a very honest man.

Just. Dolben. I do not see but that he may be a fair-conditioned man in all other things.

Just. Pemberton. Look you, those that are in their dealings sometimes honest fair men, yet when they come to be of that religion, there they are debauched, and there they are brought to do as wicked things as can be, in favour, and to support that religion.

Then Alderman Barker was sworn.

Mr. Thompson. Do you know Mr. Tasborough?

Barker. Yes, I have known him several years.

Mr. Thompson. How long?

Barker. Fourteen or fifteen years.

Mr. Thompson. How have you looked upon him?

Barker. I have looked upon him as an honest peaceable man.

Just. Pemberton. You have known him to be a Catholic?

Barker. Yes, that I have.

Price. May I beg the favour of this honourable court, that I may speak for myself here?

Just. Dolben. Well, come Mrs. what will you say? But we must tell the Jury before hand it signifies nothing for evidence.

Price. I desire to speak the truth.

Just. Dolben. But they must not believe a word you say.

Price. Be pleased to give me leave to speak however.

Just. Jones. Well, go on.

Price. Sir, Mr. Dugdale does here accuse me of suborning him to retract his evidence. I do protest it is so far from it, that he importuned me, and solicited me to go to the Duke of York, and he told me if I would go, he would pay my coach-hire. Is it not so, Mr. Dugdale?

Just. Pemberton. You must not interrogate him.

Just. Dolben. The very first thing you have said hath discredited all you would say; for if Mr. Dugdale (as you say) had importuned you that you would do this thing for him, how comes it to pass that afterwards you should promise him a reward of 1,000*l.* and bring a gentleman to make it good.

Price. I assure you, my lord, I never did.

Just. Dolben. It is most apparent, Tashborough does not deny that.

Price. But that which is the real truth, that you say must not be believed.

Just. Pemberton. Did he solicit you to draw your Note?

Price. Yes he did, upon the word of a christian.

Just. Jones. You did confess that you did study it, and draw it yourself.

Price. I did so, but he importuned me to do it.

Just. Pemberton. How do you prove that?

Price. I desire to know by what words I took off his evidence at Harcourt's Trial.

Just. Dolben. You desired him to be kind, because he was your confessor.

Price. I desire to ask him the question, by what words it was.

Just. Jones. Well, you may ask him, but it is little to the purpose. Can you remember the words, or the effect of the words that she spoke to you in the behalf of Harcourt? The night before his trial, I think it was.

Dugdale. Yes, it was the night before, to desire me I would not be an evidence against him, in regard he was her ghostly father.

Price. You know you came to me, Mr. Dugdale, and told me you rid post to town.

Just. Pemberton. We must have no more of these interlocutory discourses.

Dugdale. Mrs. Price, I would not do you the least injury in the world.

Serj. Maynard. Mr. Justice Jones, I desire a word.

Just. Jones. If you will produce any witnesses, do.—Price. I desire I may speak for myself.

Just. Dolben. It is but reason she should speak for herself.

Just. Pemberton. But I hope if she ask unreasonable questions she is not to be heard.

Price. I only speak the truth.

Just. Dolben. But we must not take your evidence of it, produce your witnesses.

Just. Jones. If you have any to prove what you say, call them.

Price. Whether you will take my evidence or not, pray let me speak for myself.

Just. Dolben. We cannot believe you, nor must the jury believe you, I will tell you that before-hand.

Just. Pemberton. We tell you, you must not be heard. If you have any questions to ask, let your counsel propose them.

Just. Dolben. If you apply to the jury, you are not to tell the matter of fact, but to prove it to them by witnesses.

Price. I desire, however, I may be heard myself.

Just. Jones. If any thing hath been omitted by your counsel, which is material for your defence, and you have witnesses to prove it, they shall be called.

Just. Pemberton. Mrs. Price, you must know the course of the court, and the way of evidence is, we are not to hear the persons indicted make long speeches to the court, or to the jury, or come with great confidence to deny the thing that is proved against them; if you have any thing material to say, we will hear you by your counsel; you must not trouble us.

Price. My Lord, I have matter enough to say, but it cannot be heard.

Mr. Sanders. We desire Wright may be called again.

Just. Jones. To what purpose?

Price. To prove that you, Mr. Dugdale, would suborn him.

Dugdale. Call him, if you will, if you can prove any practices upon me.

Price. You have good practices we know: you are a man of excellent practices; you had need commend your practices. You know very well, Mr. Dugdale, that you told me you were perjured.

Recorder. It is not language fit for you to give.

Serj. Maynard. Is that liberty of speech fit to be given? She tells Mr. Dugdale that he said himself he was perjured.

Justice Pemberton. You are an impudent woman to talk so.

Justice Dolben. Your mouth must be stopped, if you can use your tongue no better.

Justice Jones. What would you ask him when he does come?

Price. I have told my counsel.

Mr. Sanders. She says she would ask him whether Mr. Dugdale did not offer him money to suborn him in this case. You are sworn already, Sir, are you not?

Wright. Yes.

Mr. Sanders. Then pray answer the court this question, Did Mr. Dugdale at any time offer you any money to take an oath, or give evidence?

Wright. Offer me money?

Mr. Sanders. Yes, you. Answer upon your oath.

Wright. No, my lord.

Mr. Sanders. Or any thing else did he offer?

Wright. No, my lord. He hath often sent to me to come, and when I did come, hath said, I am glad you are come, I will do you as great a kindness; but he did not know of my coming, because his messengers had not met with me.

Mr. Sanders. Did any one on his behalf offer you any thing?

Wright. No, I think not; if it was, I think it was in vain.

Mr. Sanders. But did he, or did he not?

Wright. No.

Recorder. If Mrs. Price hath any more such witnesses, she may call them.

Serj. Maynard. Sir, under your favour, here hath been a strange way of defence. Consider what a crime we are upon, and in what times we are. That there is a Plot of a very high and transcendant nature under question, that divers witnesses have been suborned, and persons tried in this place and convicted for it, it is undeniable. Now after trials for so high a crime in the most public way, here come Price and Tasborough; What to do? She indeed before, but both Tasborough and she afterwards, by rewards, and such temptations, endeavours to disgrace his evidence; but there is not only that, but the great thing looked after by their party, was, the issue of it; upon this all the king's evidence were to be hanged. What hath been said is only to make a jest, and make the company merry, that there was a contract of marriage between them; but what will be the consequence of that? He that spoke it, has unquestionably proved the probability of our charge, we have made it probable, and he hath proved it; and the inference drawn by them is, she certainly did not tempt him, because she had an interest in him, which concludes very naturally. But then for the other, Mr. Tasborough, alderman Barker comes in, and swears the gentleman is a very honest man; I hope he did hear the evidence, and then I wonder how he could swear it; but do we come to prove whether he be an honest man in his life? It is not at all our question; if we should have offered to have disparaged him in another way, we had not, I think, done our duty, and the court would justly have reproved us for it; but there is one thing, which if it had not been spoken, I would have held my peace: How is Tasborough concerned in the case? Divers have been questioned and executed for High-Treason, upon Mr. Dugdale's evidence; and after such an execution, what is Mr. Tasborough's duty? It hath been represented as if he had been persuaded by her, and drawn in that way, and he thinking that it was a falsity that had been sworn before, and that Mr. Dugdale repented of the injury he had done them, he should help to make this discovery. But what was he concerned? Did he go to a justice of peace, or any just way? Did he not contrive with the devil rather than the justice? 1,000*l.* must be paid to draw off a man, and corrupt him, to make him own himself perjured, is a truth that had been spoken. And this is not the first time that they have done it; for we remember the case of Reading very well. I shall say no more, but this, under favour, it is not well to say, That a man may persuade another to deny his testimony, that is nothing concerned in the case, in a case of this public nature especially, and for money too, that was never meant by the law, and I hope is not meant ever to be countenanced here. I hope the court will give that caution to all that hear it, as will discourage any attempts of this nature for the future. And that it shall not be enough to excuse it, for him to say he was persuaded, and thought his sorrow was real, and thereby to put the king's witnesses to prove that thing to be true that they had proved already. What had Mr. Tasborough to do, as if he were a judge of the proceedings of the court and witnesses? Nothing at all, under favour, but is a very ill man, and as such I hope shall be punished.

Justice Jones. Gentlemen, you of the jury; these two persons have been indicted for a very great offence. The indictment sets forth (that which we all know to be true) that Whitebread, and divers others, have been tried and condemned for a very execrable, hellish, Popish-Plot: That upon these indictments, Mr. Dugdale did give material evidence; but that, when some other of the conspirators were to be tried, and brought to punishment, these two persons did endeavour to make Mr. Dugdale absent himself, and retract his evidence. And not only so, when Harcourt was to be brought to his trial, (for whom it seems Mrs. Price had a particular kindness) but likewise it was endeavoured, he should be gone, and not give any further evidence at all, and he should have 1,000*l.* for a reward. This is the indictment.

The inducement to the indictment (that is, the trials of the conspirators) is all well known: And there have been copies of the records produced, which have been inspected and perused by the counsel on the defendants parts; and they cannot say, but that the records agree with the matter in that respect: So that there is nothing at all but the bare matter of fact that you are to enquire into.

I shall distinguish the persons: Mrs. Price, according to the evidence, hath gone through the whole charge of the indictment, and indeed, hath committed some further crimes than have been mentioned in the indictment.

First, it hath been proved to you by Mr. Dugdale, That she did not only desire kindness to Harcourt, who was her ghostly Father; but she did design, as much as in her lay, that he should not come in at all to give evidence against him: This is proved by Mr. Dugdale, and another person that was by, that did hear Mrs. Price say, She would have him be kind to Mr. Harcourt, because he was her ghostly Father: withal tells you, That immediately after Dugdale did tell him, that she did persuade him he should absent himself, and not give evidence against Harcourt.

She is likewise charged (as they are both) that she did treat with Mr. Dugdale for to retract all that he had said, to be gone, and to leave a paper behind him, which should signify, That there was trouble of mind upon him, and that he had done wrong in his testimony given against the Catholics: Therefore he would be gone, and leave a testimony of it in writing, when he was gone. And she provides for his security abroad, and he should have 1,000*l.* reward.

Dugdale is the person with whom the first treaty was: But because he know, and it was observed, that it was unsafe to deal with persons that was tampering with him in such a nature as this was, and upon a matter of this kind, he does acquaint persons of very great quality, as he swears, my lord of Shaftsbury, and two other persons: They do advise him that he should get some persons to be by when they should come to some further treaties concerning this business; and so that purpose he should hold up a correspondence, and condescend to a kind of agreement and compliance, that he might be able to have further testimony to confirm his evidence. Whereupon Dr. Chamberlain and his servant are placed in a closet in Mr. Dugdale's chamber, in such a place, that they might hear what was discoursed in the chamber; in comes Mrs. Price, they being in the closet. Mr. Dugdale and she discoursed about the business so loud, that Dr. Chamberlain and his servant (as both of them tell you) heard their discourse upon it: The question was asked and put to Mrs. Price: Mrs. Price, I hope you know you are the person that first moved this intrigue; it began from you, and not from me: And this was confessed by her. So that you have in confirmation of Mr. Dugdale, the testimony both of Dr. Chamberlain, and of his servant to that part of the charge against her. And withal, it is added, not only that he was to go beyond sea, to retract what evidence he had given; but likewise it was thought expedient he should come over again, and swear against all the rest of the evidence that had been given or should be given for the king. And when it was said by Mr. Dugdale, What will it avail you, if I do retract my evidence. There is Mr. Oates and Mr. Praunce to testify the same thing: She said, No matter for that, if we get you on our side, for the Catholic cause to be our friend, we shall be sure to baffle all they can say or do; and we shall not only save the Catholics, but turn the plot upon the heads of the Protestants, and all the king's witnesses shall be hanged. That you may remember was testified by some of the witnesses. Mrs. Price deals frequently with Mr. Dugdale to this purpose. Dugdale, that he might know (and it is very like with that honest intention, and no other, he did it) and that he might discover the bottom of this business, tells her, This is a thing of dangerous consequence, and it is fit that I have better security than your promise to this 1,000*l.* I will have some substantial person that shall come and confirm what you promise, and thereupon she tells him, he should have a substantial person brought, and he should have thanks from very great persons, naming the duke of York; for he it was, as they said, that would take care to protect him, and procure a pardon for him.

Now gentlemen, this is the evidence against Mrs. Price. In defence of this what doth she offer, but that she hath been acquainted with Mr. Dugdale, and there hath been great familiarity between them. If there had not been such a familiarity, would there have been such an intrigue? Is this a matter to be communicated to a stranger? If there were a doubt before, whether there were this contrivance, does not this give us a better assurance that it was so, because there was such an acquaintance between them?

Then, as to Mr. Tasborough: He indeed is not in the beginning of the design at all: There is no evidence against him for that part of the charge, that he should absent himself, and not give evidence against Harcourt. He comes not in at that time; nor can I perceive by Mr. Dugdale, that he had any acquaintance with him at all till the 12th of October; and he says he was but twice in his company.

Now, gentlemen, what does Mr. Tasborough do? First, Dugdale is told by Mrs. Price, That a man of quality should come to him, and confirm all the promises she had made him. Tasborough does come to him, and tells him, he hath had some discourse with Mrs. Price, what she had proposed; and he is now come to make good and confirm, that all shall be effected that she had proposed to him. Ay! but it is supposed, that Mr. Tasborough is a very honest man, and a conscientious man, and does come for nothing in the world, but to persuade Mr. Dugdale to do the office of a christian; it was a charitable thing of him, to take off the scandal that was upon the innocent. But you do not hear him charge it upon Mr. Dugdale's conscience, that he had given a false evidence against any of those persons, nor urge him much to repent. But he must be gone, he must give no more evidence against the catholics: And, what if he do comply with this desire? Then he tells him he shall have a reward: What reward? 1,000*l.*; which was made known before, and protection, and pardon, and security: And he comes to him in the duke of York's name, to enforce it the more strongly upon him, and make him do it; whereas, indeed, the duke of York (as he himself and Mrs. Price have since confessed) never knew any thing at all of the business.

Now, gentlemen, to move by honest christian means, any one that hath done an injury of any sort to repentance, and contrition, and recantation, that is a very good thing; but to do it with promise of a reward of 1,000*l.* can't be justified: what way is there to insinuate into any person an intention of doing a mischief; but such a way as this? will any one come to another, and say, forswear yourself; whereas you know such a thing to be true, swear it to be false, or retract the evidence you have given about it, and I will give you a 1,000*l.*? No, but serve the Catholic cause; a great many have suffered, and by your testimony; retract, begone, be secure, you shall have a certainty, that you shall be secure in another kingdom; or else you shall have it in a Protestant family; though neither that protestant, nor any protestant was named.

Is not this a bait to tempt a man to all the villainy in the world? If 1,000*l.* be offered, who can resist? Such people as these are will not easily resist such a temptation.

But Mr. Tasborough is a very honest man in his life and conversation; he produceth those that tell you his reputation is good, and the like.

There is no doubt of it, and if he had produced 30 witnesses, do you think he would produce any one that should speak against himself? He shooes out those certainly as would speak as much in his favour as they can; but if a man hath been an honest man in his conversation, may he not be enticed or seduced? especially when it will be told him, If you do this, you shall merit heaven, you shall be sainted and canonized, you do the greatest service in the world to the Catholic cause.

These temptations may work upon a man, perhaps, that is morally honest, when he is infatuated with this principle, That anything may be done for the Catholic cause; as it is a Catholic doctrine too often instilled into them, that any thing is become sanctified when it tends to that end; it is easy then to prevail upon them in things of this nature.

I should have told you (which I omitted before) one circumstance concerning matter of proof against Mrs. Price more than Tasborough: Two witnesses said they were in the closet, and heard a woman discourse, but neither of them did see her face; but afterwards it is proved by another, that he was desired to observe who came into or who went out of the house; and he swears he saw Mr. Dugdale and her come out of the house; that they went to the Gate-house, and he saw her come again from the Gate-house with Mr. Dugdale, and he is sure this is the person, And you remember that part of their discourse was of going to the Gate-house.

Justice Pemberton. They do not deny it neither.

Justice Jones. I don't see they do.

Justice Pemberton. It is a very strong and plain evidence as can be given.

Justice Jones. There is nothing can be said for Mrs. Price, little for Mr. Tasborough.

Justice Pemberton. I see nothing that can do him any good.

Justice Dolben. Come, gentlemen, lay your heads together and consider of the matter.

Which the Jury did at the bar: And being asked by the Clerk of Crown, whether they were agreed; they answered, Yes.

Cl. of Cr. Who shall say for you?

Omnes. Foreman.

Cl. of Cr. Do you find the defendants Guilty of the trespass and offence whereof they stand indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty.

Mr. Pollexfen. As to part only for Mr. Tasborough?

Foreman. Guilty of the Indictment.

Justice Jones. We all know he is not found Guilty of one part, and that must be considered at the setting of the fine.

Att. Gen. Mr. Tasborough hath been upon bail, but I suppose must not go upon bail now; we pray that he may be committed.

Justice Pemberton. They must both be committed; take them both.

Mr. Sanders. Mrs. Price is still in the Gate-house.

Justice Pemberton. We have her here now, she is in our custody.

Mr. Sanders. If you please, Sir, we desire she may be remanded back.

Justice Pemberton. No; they shall go both into the Marshal's custody.

Price. I beg your lordships I may go back to the Gate-house.

Justice Pemberton. What! These are not things to be trifled with.

Justice Dolben. No, we must not shew you any favour at all.

Justice Pemberton. No, we must have no favour for you that would destroy us all.

Then the Prisoners were taken into custody by the Marshal, to be kept till their judgment. Afterwards John Tasborough was fined 100*l.* and Anne Price 200*l.*

261. The Trial of BENJAMIN HARRIS, Bookseller, at Guildhall, for causing to be printed, and sold, a Libel, entitled, "An Appeal from the Country to the City, for the Preservation of his Majesty's Person, Liberty, Property, and the Protestant Religion:"* 32 CHARLES II. A. D. 1680.

MR. Recorder (sir George Jefferies); I hope, this being a matter to be tried in the city of London, persons coming here in great multitudes, come to blush, rather than to give encouragement to it; and if we can give your lordship, and this jury, satisfaction that this person is guilty of the offence, according as it is laid in the information, I hope that both you and all others that shall bear it, (for I perceive there is a great expectation this day from this cause) I hope, I say, you will abominate any man that shall offer at any such like thing. Indeed, we live in an age where all sorts of faction and rebellion is countenanced, magistrates reviled, and scandalized by some persons, who think they have authority so to do. It is just like such another kind of religion, which some have now of late taken up, that rather than they will be thought to turn fanatics, they will turn plain atheists, and others, who scorn to be either, downright rebels. This book is as base a piece as ever was contrived in hell, either by papists, or the blackest rebel that ever was: it seems to carry with it a fine character, and has a figure of all plausible obedience to the crown, to wit, "An Appeal, &c. for the preservation of his majesty's person, liberty, property, and the Protestant religion." But if any of you have seen it, I hope you will be so far from giving any countenance to it, as that you will, with me, think, it is so far from tending well to the government, that it is only designed to rake up all sedition and rebellion, and the very worst of all rebellion. I must confess, I would rather have believed that it was only the sake of lucre made him do what he did, for that would have somewhat extenuated his crime, if he had not read it first; but then to go and have it printed, and exposed to sale, &c. this is a great aggravation.—If the same sort of insinuation had been used towards any private tradesman, as hath been offered to the king and magistrates, I believe there is no man but would say, that ere this time he might have hid his head.—But dissemblances of pretences for the sake of the Protestant religion now-a-days in his shop will pass well enough, and persons can tell you there how far you may go from hence to Rome with safety; and after they have blackened their mouths with tobacco and smoke, and do not rail against the church and the government, they are looked upon straight as no Protestants.—But still as to this person, the farther to urge it, by way of aggravation upon him, he could vauntingly make his boasts, when it was put home to him, why he would venture to do such things, &c.? That he had above a thousand persons who would stand by him in whatsoever he did.

L. C. J. (Sir William Scroggs) There was hardly ever any book more pernicious to set us together by the ears than this, nor any thing a greater incendiary; one can hardly write a worse—Says he, "We in the country have done our parts in chusing, for the generality, good members to serve in parliament; but if (as our two last parliaments were) they must be dissolved, or prorogued, whenever they come to redress the grievances of the subject, we may be pitied, but not blamed. If the Plot takes effect, as in all probability it will) our parliaments are not then to be condemned, for that their not being suffered to sit occasioned it." So that here is a sly way of casting it upon the king himself. And if it be not downright treason, I am sure it is just upon the heels of it. It is a most abominable piece.

Then were called the Witnesses, to prove that the books were sold in his shop; and after they were all sworn, first of all Mrs. Grover, a printer's wife, stood up, who confessed she had half a dozen of them, but not of him; for he was either gone out, or not in the way, but she had them of his man.

Then stood up one Mary Darby, and she said, she had four of them.

After her, Mr. Benjamin Tooke, at the Shop in St. Paul's Church-yard, bookseller, was examined, who said he saw several quires of them in the shop. And being asked by Mr. Harris, How he knew they were all those books? He answered, that he turned over a great many of them, and found them all the same.

Recorder. My lord, he was so mighty zealous of this book, of so great importance, no doubt, to his party, that for fear he should be disappointed in time, he gave somewhat to hasten it.

Recorder. Call—the printer's man, and swear him. [Who stood up, and was sworn.]

Recorder. What did Mr. Harris give you, ha? Printer's Man. He laid me down six-pence.

L. C. J. And what, that was for hastening the book, was it not?

Printer's Man. I cannot tell, Sir, not I, but he gave me six-pence.

Recorder. And what did you do it in the day-time, was you not at it in the night?

Printer's Man. Yes, I was upon it in the night.

Recorder. Ay, it was a deed of darkness, and so fit for night-work.

Serj. Strode. My lord, if it can be made out to your lordship and this jury, that he designed maliciously to scandalize the king and the government by it, we must acquiesce; but that, my lord, he absolutely denies; but seeing it running up and down the town, he gets some of them, and suffers them to lie up and down in his shop, and this only as a common thing to get money, so that we suppose it may not lie within the information, because it does not intentionally scandalize the king and the government.

Mr. Williams. He in his trade sold this book, and that we admit; but, my lord, it is a material part of the information, that it was done with a malicious design, &c. and we do not take it so; but for the other matter we submit to it.

L. C. J. Then you do admit, that he did sell some of these books.

Mr. Williams. We do, my lord, that he did sell one.

Mr. Ollibear. My lord, this book was publicly sold in other booksellers shops before we had it, and so we thought in a way of trade, we might do the like; but as soon as ever we heard there was any thing ill in the book, we suppressed the selling of it.

Serj. Strode. They say, my lord, the printer had six-pence given him by Mr. Harris. Friend, does not he come, and give you some money at other times? Have you never had any of him before?

Printer's Man. No, sir. I never printed any thing for him before.

Serj. Strode. Was not this printed before you saw it?

Printer. Not to my knowledge.

Serj. Strode. Pray ask the first witness. Was not this in print before you saw it in his shop?

Groser. Yes, my lord.

Mr. Williams. My lord, he is a man of other principles, than to do such things.

L. C. J. There is scarce any but Smith, that is so factious a seller of books as Harris: all your domestic intelligences are so; for which, you know, you have forfeited your recognizance almost in every book.

A Neighbour was called by Mr. Williams, to give an account of Mr. Harris.

Neighbour. My lord, I have known him about a twelve-month; and I have always looked upon him to be a fair-conditioned, quiet, peaceable man: he is, and has been so reputed among his neighbours. And I have never seen any thing from him, but what was very quiet and peaceable.

Recorder. A bookseller that causes a factious book to be printed, or reprinted, if it was printed before, is a factious fellow.

L. C. J. You say right.

Mr. Goodhall (another neighbour of Mr. Harris's) said, upon his being asked, if he were acquainted with him? And, if he were wont to oppose, or to scandalize the king or government? That he never heard such a like thing of him.

Recorder. I presume that none of these do stand by him in any such thing: but he, being advertised of it, and being asked, why he would offer to expose to sale such a book as this? He answered and said, that he had a thousand persons that would stand by him. Call Robert Stevens.

L. C. J. What can you say?

R. Stevens. My lord, I have seen this book several times in his shop, and others too. And I have asked him, why he would so publicly vend them? (I did not indeed buy one of them myself, but I caused a man to buy one for me) and he said, He had several thousands to stand by him: and he is accounted an anabaptist. He said so before the master and wardens of the company; who questioned him, why he sold such scandalous things? And he said he had several thousands to stand by him.

Then spake the Lord Chief Justice to this purpose:

Because my brother shall be satisfied with the opinion of all the judges of England, what this offence is, which they would insinuate, as if the mere selling of such a book was no offence: it is not long since, that all the judges met, by the king's command; as they did some time before too: and they both times declared unanimously, that all persons that do write, or print, or sell any pamphlet, that is either scandalous to public, or private persons; such books may be seized, and the person punished by law: that all books, which are scandalous to the government may be seized; and all persons so exposing them, may be punished. And further, that all writers of news, though not scandalous, seditious, nor reflective upon the government or the state; yet if they are writ-ters (as there are few others) of false news, they are indictable and punishable upon that account.

So that your hopes of any thing of that kind will be vain; for all the judges have declared this offence, at the common-law, to be punishable in the seller, though in the way of his trade: the books may be seized, and the person punished.

As for this book, in particular; you can hardly read a more base, and pernicious book, to put us all into a flame: It gives you such incitements, and such base encouragements, with such reflections upon all sorts of persons, (for I have read it upon this account) that I think, there can scarce be a worse made. He would set up another man, that has no title to the crown: "For (says he) the greatest danger accruing to your persons, as well as to the whole kingdom, upon the king's untimely death, will proceed from a confusion, and want of some eminent and interested person, whom you may trust to lead you up against a French and popish army; For which purpose, no person is fitter than his grace the duke of Monmouth; as well for quality, courage, and conduct, as for that his life and fortune depends upon the same bottom with yours. He will stand by you; and therefore, you ought to stand by him. And remember the old rule is, he who hath the worst title, ever makes the best king; as being constrained by a gracious government, to supply what he wants in title: That instead of God and my right; his motto may be, God and my people." He says, "such a one would make a better king; for, as you see, the worse the title, the better the king. A king with a bad title, makes a better king, that he that hath a good one; for he shall be obliged to comply with, and will humour the people, for want of a title." A thing, which is the basest nature that can be: And yet this man must give money to hasten the printing of such a book; and he had several quires of them in his shop. Except the writer of it, there cannot be a worse man in the world; who, for trivial profit, will neglect the peace and quiet of his country, and set us all together by the ears for a groat. And, Mr. Harris, if you expect any thing in this world, of this kind of favour, you must find out the author; for he must be a rebellious, and villainous traitor: For, though he seems to inveigh against popery, it is only to be a rebel. And certainly, he has rejected all the laws of God, and all obedience that man requires; and profaned all holy-writ. He is somebody, whose fortune does not suits with his condition; and who, because he is not at ease and quiet himself, will let nobody else be so neither. [Speaking to the Jury, who presently withdrew.] You have nothing more to do, but to give your verdict: If there be any thing in law, let me know it because you go out.

Then one of the Jury asked my lord, if they might not have the book with them, which was there in the court, and it was answered in the negative.

Before the Jury went out, Mr. Harris would fain have spoke to them for himself, but it was not permitted him.

Then, after a little while tarrying, they returned to the bar. And being, as is usual, asked if they were agreed on their verdict, and who should speak for them; they answered, Yes; and appointed their foreman, who said he was Guilty of selling the book. At which there was a very great and clamorous shout.

Lord Chief Justice said, that was not their business, they were only to determine whether barely Guilty, or not Guilty.

The Recorder would have had them given their verdict by the poll, but they all unanimously cried out, they were all agreed, and then the foreman gave the verdict again, Guilty.

Mr. Recorder then prayed, he being for the king, that Mr. Harris might stand committed; Who was thereupon presently delivered to a tipstaff, to be carried to the King's-bench.

Mr. Harris earnestly beseeched his lordship that he might be sent to any other prison, and named Newgate three or four times, but it was not granted him: Thereupon he said, I hope God will give me patience to go through it.

Then my Lord Chief Justice spake to the Jury to this effect:

I am sorry you gave countenance to this cause so much, as to stir from the bar, when the evidence was so full, and when I told you plainly, not only my opinion, but likewise that of all the judges of England, that selling this book was an offence at the common law, for which they ought to be punished; And yet with your scruples, you give the party (with their halloos, and shoutings) to take advantage; though you did mean upon the matter the same thing then, you do now, yet you see, upon every little occasion, when a thing shall seem to thwart the government, how ready they are to send up their loud halloosings. It was not so prudently done as might have been done. We had need look about us, for if at such a time, and for such a base book, such clamorous noises shall be made, what shall become of us? Our lives and fortunes are at stake. Would I knew some of those shouters, I would make them know, I would punish them: I am incensed in the behalf of the government, and of all our lives and fortunes that such shall go unpunished.

Harris afterwards received Sentence in the court of King's bench, to pay 500*l.* * Fine; stand on the pillory an hour; and find sureties for his good behaviour for three years; and had it not been for Mr. Justice Pemberton, the Chief Justice would have added, that he should be publicly whipt.

See the Proceedings against the Judges, infra.

* It appears by the Commons Journal of December 21, 1680, that the House ordered an Address for the remission of this fine to be presented to the king. See, too, the Journal of December 8, 1680.

July, 1670, for divers high-treasons, at the sessions-house in the Old-Bailey, before sir James Edwards, then lord mayor of London, and the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, and others; the defendant, Francis Smith, published a scandalous libel relating to the late trials, which was intitled, "Some Observations upon the late Trial," &c. the words are particularly set forth in the information; to which the defendant pleads Not Guilty; but if we prove it upon him, you of the jury are to find for the king; and if you find he is Not Guilty, you are to say so and no more, &c.

Then Mr. Recorder spake to this effect.

Mr. Recorder. (Sir George Jefferies) My lord, I am of counsel against the defendant for the king, who stands informed against for a very great offence. The information particularly sets forth, That whereas some certain persons were indicted at the sessions-house in the Old-Bailey, before the then lord mayor, sir James Edwards, and other persons then in commission of Oyer and Terminer, and gaol-delivery for that place, and particularly my lord chief justice Scroggs, and after the trial was over and the persons thereupon acquitted, there was a book, which is mentioned in the information, printed and published, and it is a book that is known by the name of Tom Ticklefoot; a very abusive thing; but persons now begin to grow wonderful witty in the beginning of their books, in hopes to ensnare people to read them, and to prevail upon them so far as to make them believe there is somewhat extraordinary by the title. You see, malice finds out all the ways in the world to ensnare and gain upon the people, to so bad an age are we come.

But I confess, it is the second time ever since I had the fortune or happiness to know this city of London, that I have known such expectations as have been upon two catshes in this place: the first was but two days ago, the second is at this time; wherein is truly a sort of countenance, I am afraid, too much given by persons that dare pretend to be no other "popery and arbitrary designs in the mean while. On the other hand, give me leave to tell you, my lords, the king hath no reason to distrust his people. No man can go home and say, that if the king comply with his people, they will do nothing for him, but tear all up from him. We want a government, and we want a prince that we may trust even with the spending of half our annual revenues for some time, for the preservation of these nations.' In malum et perniciosissimum exemplum omnium alior' in tali casu delinquent', contra pacem dict' Dom' Regis, coronam, et dignitat' suas. sort of protestants, but can impudently outface all sort of governors. Now, as all persons ought to abhor and detest that damnable doctrine, That men hope to be saints in another world, because they may commit murders in this; so this ought too as much to be condemned by all protestants as the other, That men shall endeavour to rebel, and be factious in this world, that so they may be reckoned good subjects, the one are as far from being good saints, as the others from being good subjects. I take this occasion to speak all this before your lordship and this court, because I hope the city of London will never be corrupted by the base insinuations of some idle busy bodies in it; men, who cannot, or will not be pleased, because, forsooth, every thing does not go according to their mind and fancy; and though by no means they will allow the pope to be infallible, yet every factious fellow will expect, that every one should pay him the tribute, of infallible, as if he were the only fit person to give measures to government and governors.

When we come to have extraordinary cases and persons, extraordinary occasions ought to be taken, to inflict due and just punishments upon them. And when they shall dare to come to disparage great men that act by supreme authority, men that act by their consciences; and because they cannot be steered by the humours of these sort of people, therefore they must be looked upon as papists, or at least as bribed because they cannot comply with that base humour which some sort of persons have.

I take notice of this to your lordship, because one that is intrusted in as great a place for the welfare of this nation, as any whosoever, is extremely concerned in the affair of this day; I mean, the Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench; who being assisted with several other judges, as far forth as it did appear to him, did deliver the sense of the whole court; who, for acting according to his conscience, and as he ought to do, hath been libelled and reproached with as base a book as ever was written against any magistrate whatsoever: if such things as this shall be permitted, then there will be an end of your lordship's sitting here, or any where else, or of any other that shall act as a magistrate ought to act, and that shall not be afraid to do his duty. But such is the happiness of this city, in this Jury, that, I must confess, I receive so much the greater satisfaction that it comes before them; for as I know the men to be men of loyalty and affection to the government, and will be so just to him, that if they do not find him guilty of the matter of the information, they will acquit him: so, on the other side, they will not think themselves to be awed by a multitude, or enslaved by private insinuations, to debauch their consciences, either in respect to God above, or to the king his vicegerent here on earth; therefore observe your duty to both, that you may render to Cæsar the things that be Cæsar's, as well as to God the things that are God's.

Now as the king is God's vicegerent, so is every magistrate the king's vicegerent, in that particular.

I would not take up so much of your lordship's time, but that I see this is a matter of great expectation; and I know that every word is taken in short hand, to be commented upon as persons humours shall steer them. I do think, as being the Mouth of the City of London, it is my duty to speak thus much, that I hope, nay, I may dare confidently affirm, that the generality of the city of London, all good men, and men of abilities, &c. are for the king, and the government as it is now established by law. [At which there was a general henn through the court.]

Having said thus much against this person, Mr. Francis Smith, I must say, That if the way of common report were evidence enough to convict a man, he would be convicted without any more ado: but such is the happiness of our laws, that they expect testimony besides common fame. I would rather a great deal it might be a caution to Mr. Smith, if there had not been many before, and that he could not be convicted, and the evidence not plain in proof against him.

Well, he printed this book in the name of another person, one Mrs. Brewster: He sold several of them in quires to several people; and Brewster questioning wherefore he should put her name to this book: Truly, he said, he intended no harm to her, for he was resolved to save her harmless; and this we will prove to you; and likewise that several books have been taken in his shop; and he justifying himself in what he had done, and his further resolution to expose them still to sale. And if we shall prove this to you, there will be an end of all sort of justice, if in case that you, who are the only means of bringing men to justice, will not contribute to have justice executed where it ought to be: None can be legally punished, unless they be legally convicted; and I doubt not your honesty and loyalty, but that you will do your part by conviction, and by justice too. Against all libellers, I am sure, there is law enough, and every honest man will endeavour to have it put in execution against them, as far forth as it lies in his way: I hope the generality of those that are here, do come to shew an abhorrency against this person informed against, and not to give any countenance to such base actions.

Mr. Williams. (Counsel for the Defendant.) My lord, the libel is sufficiently infamous, we must needs own; and I do not come to justify the thing, neither Mr. Smith my client, nor any body else that should be guilty of it: The question is, Whether he be guilty of, &c. as it is laid in the information?

Recorder. Sir, do you admit the Record?

Just. Jones. If you do not admit it, you must call in your witnesses, and prove what you can.

Whereupon Robert Stevens, Anne Brewster, and Margaret Clark were called into Court, and stood up behind the Jury.

Mr. Williams. Sir, if you will give me leave, you shall hear what we will admit.

Recorder. Come, come, Sir, if you do not admit the Record, we will have none of your anticipations.

Mr. Williams. What call you your Speech but anticipation? My lord, the poor man, my client, is a languishing, sick and dying man, and one that is almost ruined; if any submission will serve the turn, he will give all the submission that is fit for a man to give: All that we say is this, that he did not order this to be printed, as it is laid in the information. But I think we may admit—

Mr. Fettiplace said (who was counsel on the same side), he had no such order given him by his client, as to admit the record.

Then they were just going on to swear the witnesses, but Mr. Just. Jones said, It would be very well if they would admit, &c. and the Defendant come to submission.

Recorder. Ay, that is your best way; for it would be a great means to testify, that your submission is really intended as a submission: But if it be to prepare us to think that you are innocent, then we will not have your submission. And I am for a sinner's repentance with all my heart.

Just. Jones. If your client be willing to submit, let the king have a verdict in law, and then he will find my Lord Chief Justice Scroggs full of pity and compassion; and if I can see any signs of repentance, I will promise you to intercede to my lord for him.

Mr. Williams. One that came from my client told me, that if he had offended, he would submit to any thing: And now here is his wife come.

Just. Jones. I would save him if I can, if he will throw himself into mercy. Well, what do you say, mistress, for your husband?

Mrs. Smith. My lord, my husband is very sick and weak, and is not able to come himself, or else he would have done it; but I asked Mr. Williams if it were not best to submit to the Court.

Just. Jones. Are you content to own it shall be so?

Mrs. Smith. I leave it to the gentlemen, my counsel; I shall acquiesce in what they think fitting.

Mr. Williams. Then I presume to admit the Record.

Just. Jones. Then you are to find for the king: [Speaking to the Jury.] It is the cause of the king, although only my Lord Chief Justice be concerned. It is a high scandal; a great scandal against a great officer and magistrate of the king. I will say nothing more to aggravate the offence at this time, because I would invite repentance in all persons that have offended in this or the like cases.

Then the Jury being asked, Whether they were agreed on their verdict, said, Yes; and choosing their foreman to speak for them, he gave the verdict, Guilty.

Just. Jones. Well, mistress, you have done very well; if, now, you for your husband came here to make a public acknowledgment of his guiltiness, hereafter he shall go, and ingenuously make submission to my lord; I know he is a person of that pity and compassion, that he loves no man's ruin, but delights rather in the universal welfare of all people: And I promise this, that I will be an intercessor to my lord in your husband's behalf.

Recorder. And as far forth as I can contribute to it, I will do the same.

He afterwards submitted to a small Fine. See the Proceedings against the Judges, infra.

The following curious particulars of Smith's character and history, and of this and other proceedings against him, are taken from a pamphlet, entitled,

“ An Account of the injurious Proceedings of Sir George Jeffreys, knt. late Recorder of London, against FRANCIS SMITH, Bookseller, with his arbitrary Carriage towards the Grand Jury, at Guildhall, Sept. 16, 1680; upon an Indictment then exhibited against the said Francis Smith, for publishing a pretended Libel, entitled ‘ An Act of Common Council for Retrenching the Expences of the Lord Mayor and ‘ Sheriffs of the City of London,’ &c. Together with an Abstract of very many former Losses, and public Sufferings sustained by him both in his Person and Estate. Humbly submitted to the Consideration of all true Englishmen. London: Printed for Francis Smith, at the Elephant and Castle, in Cornhill, near the Royal Exchange.”

To the Right Honourable, and my very good Lord, Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of Shaftesbury, &c.

“ My Lord; As unthankfulness is deservedly reckoned both by Christians and Heathens a sin of the deepest die, so nothing gives a greater lustre to noble personages than those acts of grace and goodness which they extend to their inferiors needing their help and succour.—And I having in many cases experienced your lordship's kindness towards me and my family; I cannot, without incurring the guilt of the former, but make my thankful acknowledgements to your honour as any occasion offers itself; and therefore could not omit this duty at this time, when I am making public an abstract of my sufferings; in many of which I have been much helped through your lordship's goodness, as may appear in this short Narrative.—And my good lord, I am under also deep obligations to your honour, not only upon my private and single account, but as I am a poor Protestant member of this languishing nation; being, with all Englishmen that are truly such, deeply obliged to your lordship's wisdom, courage and sedulity, for all the public benefits we enjoy or hope for, as is sufficiently manifest to all men, except those that are professed or secret enemies to their country, who have so industriously sought your lordship's destruction; whom God of his great mercy to yourself, and the whole Protestant people of England, preserve for a farther blessing; so prays he, who is in the deepest sense of your manifold favours, my lord, your most thankful, and humble Servant,

“ FRANCIS SMITH.”

To my ever to be esteemed, and just friends, Mr. William Yearth, Mr. Richard Hambroys, Mr. Samuel Lamott, Mr. Elias Best, Mr. Henry Stephens, Mr. Thomas Stephenson, Mr. Thomas Fox, Mr. John Beare, Mr. Nicholas Godwin, Mr. Wm. Meakins, Mr. Isaac Jackson, Mr. Henry Rogers, Mr. Francis Sowersby, Mr. John Barker, Mr. John Lloyd, Mr. William Hussey, and Mr. Wm. Brown, late Grand Jurors for the great City of London.

“ Worthy Citizens; When I call to mind the many grievous oppressions that have befallen me, by malicious informations, and unjust proceedings, whereof I present you here a short Narrative; and withal, how I have seen other men and their families, in a prosperous way of living, ruined, and brought to poverty, by either the inconsiderateness or cowardice of Jurors, who have hearkened more to the dictates of the Bench, than to the reason and nature of the case before them. I cannot but exceedingly admire the good providence of the Almighty towards me, in calling you to the office of Grand Inquest for the city of London, at that time when the Indictment, hereto annexed, was preferred against me; you, I say, whom neither subtle suggestions, wheedling speeches, nor loud and often-repeated reproaches and threats could work upon, to draw you aside from the true judgment of your own consciences. For no man can reasonably impute your verdict and constancy to any other cause: I am sure I had no previous acquaintance, or interest in any one of you, which might in the least bias your affections towards me. And the Indictment was drawn with so much slight and cunning, that if your wisdom and integrity had not prevented, in not finding the Bill, I could not but expect that any inferior jury would find me guilty, and I should have been delivered up to the fierce ambition of a male-content judge: so that I do, indeed, owe to you, next under God, the preservation of me and my family from bondage and misery: for which I and mine, shall be ever obliged to praise God; and so praying for all your prosperities, I heartily subscribe myself, your thankful Servant,

“ FRANCIS SMITH.”

The CASE of FRANCIS SMITH, Bookseller, &c.

In August, 1680, a small book was published, entitled, “ An Act of Common-Council,” formerly made, and not since repealed, for retrenching the expences of the lord mayor, and sheriffs; with Ten Reasons, for putting the said Act in present execution; for which publication, I was bound over to the sessions of peace held at Guild-hall, London, on the eighth day of September following; where one of the said books, (with this annexed bill of indictment,) was presented to the grand jury, held for the city of London.

“London, ss. Memorandum, that at a general quarter sessions of the peace, of our lord the king, held for the city of London, at the Guild-hall of the same city, and within the same city, on Wednesday, viz. the 8th day of September, in the 32d year of the reign of our lord Charles the second, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. Before Robert Clayton, knt. lord mayor of the city of London, sir Thomas Allen, knt. and bart. sir George Waterman, knt. alderman of the city aforesaid; and others their associates, justices of our said lord the king, for the keeping of the peace of the city aforesaid; also for the perpetrating, hearing and determinating divers felonies, transgressions, and other trespasses within the said city done. A certain bill of indictment, against one Francis Smith, late of London, bookseller; then and there exhibited, to William Yearth, Richard Humphreys, Samuel Lamott, Elias Best, Henry Stephens, Thomas Stephenson, Thomas Fox, John Beare, Nicholas Godwin, William Meakings, Isaac Jackson, Henry Rogers, Francis Sowersby, John Barker; John Lloyd, William Hussey, and William Browne, Jurors, then and there appearing, impannelled and sworn, to enquire for our said lord the king, and the body of the city aforesaid; by which returned jury, was thus endorsed (Ignoramus,) which said bill followeth in these words, viz.

London, ss. The Jurors for our lord the king upon their oaths, present, that Francis Smith, late of London, bookseller, being a man seditious and pernicious, plotting and intending the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom, to disturb, and discord, differences, and ill will, amongst the citizens, and inhabitants of the city of London, to stir up, provoke, and procure; also the mayor, aldermen and sheriffs of the city of London, now in being, and the mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of the city of London, for the time past, in great odium, contempt, and base account to bring; the same Francis Smith the 17th day of August, in the reign of our sovereign lord, Charles the Second, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. the 32nd, at London, viz. in the parish of St. Michael Cornhill in the ward of Cornhill, London, aforesaid, with force and arms, &c. unlawfully, wickedly, maliciously, scandalously, and seditiously, printed, and caused to be printed, a certain malicious, scandalous, and seditious book, of and concerning the expences of the lord mayors aldermen and sheriffs of the city aforesaid, in their houses, in the time of their several offices; instigated, “An act of Common-Council of the city of London, (made in the first and second years of the reign of Philip and Mary,) for retrenching of the expences of the Lord Mayor and sheriffs, &c. Published with additional reasons for putting the said act in present execution, and now offered to the consideration of all good citizens, by some well wishers of the present and future prosperity of the said city. Presented to my lord mayor, aldermen and sheriffs.” In which book by the said Francis Smith, then so as aforesaid; he published, printed, and caused to be printed; the same Francis Smith, then and there, viz. the day and year before mentioned, at the parish and ward aforesaid, mischievously, unlawfully, wickedly, maliciously, scandalously and seditiously printed, made known openly, and published, mischievously, malicious, scandalous, and seditious sentences, in these English words following, viz.

“Reader; As by the act you may observe, that our predecessors taking notice, that the extravagancies of mayors and sheriffs, caused (as they say;) almost all good citizens to fly, and refuse the service; so to prevent that mischief in the future, they limited them in their living to the method directed by this act. And if when little was spent besides the growth of our own country, beer and ale being then their drink, they thought it their wisdom to set bounds to luxurious profuseness, there is much more reason for it now, when debauchery is come to that height, that the fifth part of the charge of a shrievalty is in wine, the growth of another country. And when feasts, hardly heard of in former times, are risen to that excess, as would be scandalous to mention, as those called the Chequer and Spittle feasts; the first costing in wine betwixt 70 and 80*l.* and the latter, after the pretended service of God in hearing a sermon, costs above 300*l.* to each sheriff. And though much after this rate is the rest of the year spent; yet when the example of this act is urged for laying aside these sinful feasts, and reducing the rest unto this pattern, which is a wholesome law; some, who should see to the putting it in execution, will not bear of it; and possibly, because they would have others be as profuse as themselves have been, though there are these reasons for reformation herein.”

And these mischievous, malicious, and seditious sentences, in these English words following, viz.

“Because nothing can tend more to the advancement of any city or country, than the having wise and good magistrates; and that so long as the great expence of shrievalties continue, the city must, (as this act suggests,) have an eye to wealth, more than parts or virtue, in the choice of their sheriffs; and that such as their sheriffs are, such will the court of aldermen be: and therefore as necessary for the good government of this great city, the charge of shrievalties ought to be reduced to such an order and method, as may be an encouragement to men of more honesty than riches to serve the place.”

And these mischievous, malicious, scandalous, and seditious sentences, in these English words following, viz.

“No man hath reason to be expensive in his shrievalty; because though the court of aldermen hath a rule for supplying, (as any die,) their vacant places out of those that have served sheriffs, yet they make their election to depend upon the uncertain humour of their court, thereby frustrating (when they please) all compensation for the expence and drudgery of a shrievalty, as late appeared in their choice of sir Simon Lewis, one of their present sheriffs, rejecting sir Thomas Stamp, who had served the place several years before with good approbation, and was presented to them by the ward he lives in as a deserving person. And whereas each ward, when they want an alderman, do present two commoners to the court, for them to chuse one; the ward of Bassishaw, to the end that sir Thomas might unavoidably be chosen, joined the younger, (and not the elder) sheriff with him, not thinking that an old sheriff would be balked, to chuse one that had not served his year; and yet notwithstanding the court by their prerogative, passed by sir Thomas to the disappointing of the ward that sent him. And this example, is, (I suppose) a good reason for sheriffs in the future not to spend more in their shrievalties than is necessary, when their reward is so uncertain.”

And these mischievous, malicious, scandalous, and seditious sentences, in these English words following, viz.

“Debauchery in this expence is a sin before God, and were it known, would be a scandal in the sight of man; as appears, in that of 3,000*l.* expence in all manner of ways, above 500*l.* is in wine; when a lord, or gentleman that formerly lived at the rate of 10 or 12,000*l.* per annum, did not, as is well known (but thirty years ago) spend 100*l.* in wine.”

To the great scandal and contempt of our said lord the king, to the great reproach and scandal of the authority of the mayor, aldermen and sheriffs, of the city aforesaid; to the great disturbance of the peace of our said lord the king, to the evil example of others in the like case offending, and against the peace of the said lord the king, his crown and dignity, &c. (Ignoramus.) WAGSTAFFE.

The Grand Jury having taken this Sacred Oath, hereunto annexed, in these words:

“You shall diligently inquire, and true presentment make of all such things and matters, as shall be given you in charge, or shall come to your knowledge, concerning this present service: The king's council, your fellows, and your own, you shall well and truly keep secret; you shall present nothing for malice, or evil will that you hear to any person; neither shall you leave any thing unpresented, for favour nor affection, reward, or any hopes thereof; but in things that shall concern this present service, you shall present the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, ac‘cording to your best skill and knowledge, so help you God.’

The grand jury having taken this sacred oath judged themselves under a religious obligation, well to deliberate both upon the book and the indictment; and finding the book (to the best of their skill and knowledge,) of no other tendency, but to encourage such as were virtuous to take upon them the government of the city of London, with such good husbandry, and sober methods, as might neither dishonour God, by excess in feasting, nor yet ruin their own families.

And finding a bill of indictment brought against me at the same time, for publishing the said book; charging it with the odious names, of a malicious, scandalous, and seditious book, and myself as printer and publisher, with the like monstrous titles, of being a man pernicious, seditious, plotting and intending the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom, to disturb, and with force and arms, unlawfully, wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously, to print and publish the said book.

Did all with one unanimous voice agree, that they could not in their conscience bring it in any otherwise than Ignoramus, and so threw it out.

This sessions of peace being that day adjourned, till the 16th day of the same month. The jury then had the bill brought them in again, with their Ignoramus scraped out, as the jury since have declared; upon which they examined the officer (who was witness to the bill,) whether he would swear that he believed in his conscience Mr. Smith did print and publish this book, maliciously, and seditiously, with an intent to disturb the peace of our lord the king in this city, to which the officer replied, ‘He durst not swear that for his life;’ upon this they unanimously agreed to write Ignoramus again upon the bill, and so returned it.

Upon which sir George Jefferies, then recorder, was much enraged, and gave the jury many hard words, refusing to accept their verdict, and returned them again the third time, with the said bill. But they (in their conscience, seeing no reason to alter their verdict, returned the bill again, Ignoramus.

Upon which sir George Jefferies vilified and reproached the grand jury very shamefully in the open court; upbraiding them with calling the witness to repeat the evidence over again, and then commanded a clear bar, saying, God bless me from such jurymen, I will see the face of every one of them, and let others see them also; further adding, I will hear them repeat every man of them, their own sense of this bill, thus exposing them to all possible contempt.

The Bar being thus cleared, and the grand jury of substantial citizens thus exposed, as if they had been a pack of men, void of honesty and conscience.

Then the clerk of the peace according to sir George Jefferies command, calls every man by name, and asked them whether Francis Smith was Guilty of the bill brought before them against him, or Not Guilty? upon which every man, one by one, being seventeen in number, returned Ignoramus.

Upon this sir George Jefferies in a most arbitrary manner, told the Jury they were upon their oaths, and had gone contrary, which was their sin of perjury, blasphemously saying, It was impossible for God from heaven to pardon their perjury.

But the jury persisted in their verdict, and gave no reflection.

Sir George being thus enraged, that he could not bend the jury from their just and honest verdict, calls out in the court for Mr. Smith, the person indicted, to come in; upon which immediately I appeared to know sir George's pleasure; who replies, Mr. Smith, you have the countenance of an ingenious person, here are two persons that this Jury have brought in Ignoramus, besides yourself, and yet they are so ingenious as to confess the indictment against them; and for their ingenuity they shall find the grace and favour of this court, and I cannot think to fine them little enough, they shall be fined but twopence a piece for their ingenuity in confessing.

Well, come Mr. Smith, follow their examples; you see what they have done before your face; and let me tell you, we know who hath owned both printing and publishing this book formerly; and therefore now, show yourself as you seem to be, an ingenious person, and confess, and try the grace and favour of this court, and shame the jury that hath brought in a verdict contrary to plain evidence.

To this I replied; Sir, my ingenuity hath sufficiently experienced the reward of your severity already formerly, and besides, I know no law commands me to accuse myself, neither shall I; and the jury have done like true Englishmen, and worthy citizens; and blessed be God for such a just jury.

At my reply, sir George was greatly enraged, and although I had been three times quitted by the jury, yet he committed me again to the keepers of Newgate, saying, provide presently very good security, for I will assure you, I will have special security for you, and till then you shall stand committed: take him into custody: I was three hours thus detained in the custody of one or more of their keepers, and finding no remedy or relentings from him, was forced to give bail by two responsible citizens upon their oaths, as to their ability; and then bound us three in a great sum for my appearance at the next ensuing sessions of peace; and not content with that, he did bind me to my good behaviour also.

Meeting with such severity from sir George Jefferies, I thought it high time to be better prepared against the next sessions following; and therefore applied myself to the clerk of the peace, desiring a copy of the bill against me, that I might advise with some counsel learned upon it, (being now well satisfied sir George was resolved, if possible, to ruin me.) The clerk replied it was very large and would cost me eight-pence per sheet; but if I would have it, it should be copied out in two days time; when accordingly I came, his answer was, that sir George Jefferies the recorder had forbidden him to let me have a copy, and he durst not without sir George's order; and therefore advised me to go to sir George himself, and tell him that I had come to the clerk for a copy, and he durst not grant it without his order; having been forbid by him, after the said clerk had promised me.

Then I repaired to sir George day after day, at least ten times; and several of those times two neighbours with me; understanding it was by law my right to demand it, paying their price. One day I waited from ten till two o'clock, before I could have any answer from him, and then his clerk brought me word, for he would not speak with me himself, that his master was indisposed, and would speak with nobody of business that day. The next day I requested a neighbour to go on my behalf, the sessions approaching, and I ignorant of the charge against me, to whom sir George returned answer by his clerk, it was none of his business, and I must take the course the law directed, for a copy. Then I went to counsel, and was informed that no subject ought to be denied a copy of his indictment, paying for it.

Upon this I took my next opportunity at the sessions held for Newgate in the Old Bailey, and there made my appeal to the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, in the hearing of sir George Jefferies; complaining what hard measure I had received from him. Having waited above 80 times upon him and the clerk of the peace, in fruitless journies, for I could not obtain a copy of my indictment, having been thrice indicted, and as often acquitted.

The Judge told me in open Court, it was according to law, that I and every subject ought to have a copy of their indictment, though brought in Ignoramus; and the reason of the law was, that they might for wrong done them, seek their remedy. Sir George replied, 'His private house was not a court, and therefore he was not to meddle with ordering any such thing there,' (but here it is to be noted, his private house was a place fit to forbid me a copy, which is contrary to law, but not a fit place to do the right he is sworn to between king and subjects according to law;) having at last by the judge's order, obtained a copy no less than 17 sheets, charging me to be a man seditious and pernicious, plotting, and intending the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom of England to disturb, and with force and arms, unlawfully, wickedly, maliciously, scandalously and seditiously, to print and publish the Act aforesaid.

And all my crime, if any, is but re-printing an "Act of Common Council for retrenching the Expences of Mayors and Sheriffs, with the Addition of Ten Reasons, why it should be put in present Execution;" For the encouragement of virtuous men, to take upon them the government of the city of London, with such good husbandry and sober methods, as might neither dishonour God by excessive feasting, nor yet ruin their own families.

Which book, notwithstanding sir George Jefferies's opinion of it, hath met with a very general acceptance amongst sober citizens, of the best quality; and both himself and some others, could, if they please, witness the same; Yet divers such persons have wondered to them, and at them, for what they should be so much offended, or indeed why at all; much more so to harrass me with multiplied charges sessions after sessions, and with continued restraints, and bail upon bail; and above all, distracting my thoughts continually, and wasting my time from my shop and trade, to the impairing of my livelihood, through such frequent absence from my calling, to my damage, 90 times more than all the money I have been forced to expend.

And at last when (suitable to sir George's big words to me, and exacting such high bail for me, with his terrifying proceedings against the jury, to the amazement of the spectators, and grunting his ambitious humours in contempt, and to the violation of our good English laws,) I expected to have been brought to trial by the next impanelled jury the last sessions.

Sir George let fall the proceedings, and ordered me to be acquitted by proclamation; and when I applied myself since to him for reparation; his answer is, He knew not of any wrong or injury he had done me.

And when since for high misdemeanours he was summoned before the honourable committee of Parliament, he did so much forget himself and the great duty of a Recorder, as to say in the hearing of the grand jury, and myself being there present, to that honourable committee, upon his own defence, That he had not so much as read the book.

What not read the book, and yet permit and appoint me, after a grand jury of credible citizens had acquitted me, to be indicted twice in one day, and after the same grand jury had so acquitted me three times, to treat them rather like French slaves, than free-born Englishmen.

And because I would not follow his dictates, against law and reason, and my own conscience, to give that worthy jury all the lie, by saying I was guilty, to commit me into the custody of the keeper of Newgate, where I was under restraint above three hours; and after that would not discharge me, till I had given great bail; nor then neither, without binding me to my good behaviour till the next following sessions; And all this upon an implicit faith.

For the book he confessed he had not read, nor knew the contents of.

From such a Judge, and such a Recorder of London, and such Judgment, good Lord deliver me, and may every true citizen and right Englishman, say Amen.

Now having given this candid account of my trouble and charge, by reason of this fierce prosecution of me; for a matter wherein I was justified by my own conscience, many, if not all, ingenious men that considered it, and even by the grand jury of the great city of London, after so base and often repeated horrid treatments of them to the contrary; insomuch that if they had not been constant and resolute men, as well as honest, I had in all likelihood been ruined with my family.

I hope it may not be grievous to the reader, if I give some short account of many former sufferings, from men of like spirit with the Recorder, and the great damage which myself and family have incurred thereby; which I do the rather mention, because I have good grounds to believe my case is much mistaken by some, for want of true information.

[He then relates his sufferings under the imputation of being a disaffected person and a fanatic, in the year 1659, shortly after general Monk came to London; other sufferings in the next year, concerning a small book, called, "The Lord's Loud Call to England," and other small books; and farther sufferings upon false information that he was in Venner's rising: and after that he proceeds:]

In August, 1661, a certain book was printed and published, intitled, 'Mirabilis Annus,' or the year of Prodigies. Then did a person of quality yet living, give me great encouragement for its publication, as a book grateful to the authority, and of general caution to the nation, both to behold and consider the works of God, and also to tremble for fear of his judgments; but it so happened contrary to my expectation, that the very day it was published, one of his majesty's messengers came to my shop, with a warrant both to seize the book and my person, and carried me before the then Secretary of State, where after examination, I was committed to the Gatehouse prison by this warrant inserted.

It is his majesty's pleasure that you take into your custody the person of Francis Smith, Stationer, for having a hand in printing and compiling dangerous books, and that you keep him close prisoner till further order from his majesty, and for so doing, this shall be your warrant. Dated at the court at Whitehall this 15th day of August, 1661. EDW. NICHOLAS.

To the Keeper of the Gatehouse,
Westminster, or his Deputy.

This word in my warrant 'close prisoner,' proved a fatal word to me, as many still living can witness, for the keeper improved it to a little; there I was truly buried alive, it being a prison famous for oppression of poor prisoners, as many besides myself can notoriously witness.

For as soon as I was brought thither, a stern gaoler locked me up, and said, I must not see, nor have the liberty of any relations to visit me, without special order from the Secretary first obtained. This looked like cold entertainment to one unacquainted with such a condition. But this, and much more I found a truly performed, as promised, being locked up in a room, where I had neither chair nor stool to rest on, and yet ten shillings per week must be the price, and before I had been there three nights, 7*l.* 15*s.* was demanded for present fees. That is to say, five pounds to excuse me from wearing irons, ten shillings for my entrance week lodging, five shillings sheets, five shillings garnish money, the rest for turnkey fees; upon which I gave this answer, that I did not understand any just cause for imprisonment, much less to pay such fees, and for wearing of irons I would not pay five groats to be excused, if he could by law impose irons on me, I would wear them. Upon this many cruel endeavours were used, whereby to exact consent of these fees from me; and my afflicted wife not suffered to speak with me but in the presence of the keeper, after chargeable orders, for so much privilege first obtained, say many times orders denied for my friends admittance; in the presence of the keeper, and my window casements must be nailed up, that I should not have the benefit of that common air, which is every slave's birth-right. And when provision was sent for my necessary support, yet was that many times kept back and frequent fasts imposed upon me, and what was sent for my dinner at 12 o'clock, must be given me four or five hours after, which I usually breakfasted with, and should be sure to want beer or bread, so I was forced to devise a way by a bag and a string to be let down in the night at a window, to convey some necessary food to me. Things continued thus several weeks, in which time for receiving a note at the keyhole by an open prisoner, sent from my poor wife then sick and weary with grief, and successful travels at my release, I was taken out of this room, and locked up in a trap-door room, about 20 days, where I could hardly be heard with hallooing, it being a place for such as were condemned to die; to be usually secured in. At this time, above thirty pound was spent to attempt my release, but all ineffectual.

Then was application made to the judges of the King's Bench, Westminster, and I had three chargeable Habeas Corpus's before the cruel gaoler would obey to bring me to the bar, where upon my appearance, care was taken, that I carried in my hand the copy of my commitment, and presented it to the Lord Chief Justice Forster, who gave patient hearing to all my complaints, disclaiming the usage I had met with, and told the keeper, if it should happen before my legal release I should die by such usage, the keeper should be indicted for his life.

At this time to my great amazement, a new copy of commitment was produced in court, the contents whereof here followeth:

The prison of the Gatehouse, Westminster.

I Edward Broughton, knight, keeper of the prison of our lord the king of the Gatehouse Westminster in the county of Middlesex to the lord the king humbly certifieth, that before the coming of the writ to me directed to this schedule annexed, to wit, the fifteenth day of August in the year of the reign of our said lord the king that now is, &c. the 12th, Francis Smith in the said writ named, was taken at Westminster in the county of Middlesex, and there in the prison of our said lord the king of the Gatehouse aforesaid, under my custody detained by virtue of a certain warrant to medidrected. The tenor whereof followeth in these words:

"These are to will and require you in his majesty's name, to take into your custody, and safely keep the body of Francis Smith of London, stationer, for that traitorously and seditiously he compiled, printed, and published a treasonable and seditious book, intitled Several prodigies and apparitions seen in the heavens from August 1st 1660, to the latter end of May 1661, containing a collection of several former prodigies, mischievous events thereupon to princes and a forgery of divers late false and feigned prodigies and impostures of the same kind, prognosticating thereby the like events to his majesty, and thereby did traitorously and seditiously instill into the hearts of his majesty's good subjects, a superstitious belief thereof, and a dislike and hatred of his majesty's person and government, and prepared them to effect a damnable design for the destruction of his sacred majesty, and to introduce a change of the government established; and for so doing, this shall be your warrant; Given at our court at Whitehall the 15th day of August; 1661. Edward Nicholas, To the Keeper of the prison of the Gatehouse, Westminster or his Deputy. And this is the cause of the taking and detaining of the said Francis Smith in the prison of our lord the king, under my custody, whose body at the day and place in the said writ contained, I have ready as by the said writ is commanded me. EDWARD BROUGHTON, kn^t."

My counsel pleaded they knew nothing of that copy till now, and gave evidence that the copy I produced was taken from the clerk of the prison, for which he had 5*s.* upon which I was remanded back again to prison, till the next term following; and here it may be remembered as an addition to the habit of cruelty attending that prison; (the gaoler notwithstanding what the Lord Chief Justice Forster had said to him) forced me to go down into the dungeon for above 20 days because I could not raise him 7*l.* towards chamber rent at that instant. Then upon renewed complaints and counsel charge, obtained order to be taken out of the dungeon, and put up stairs into a chamber where I was again turned out within a week, at 8 o'clock at night, while my poor wife and two of my children were outing, and they at that time of the night in the depth of winter, forced to seek their lodging amongst strangers in Tothill street Westminster, and myself constrained to lie upon the bare boards in an open entry, where I continued the rest of my term till bailed out, being several weeks, sometimes lying on the ground; the rest in a hammock.

In this time I was sent for to Whitehall, and in the presence of a gentleman of quality yet living, and several others, was offered 100*l.* and present discharge, but to declare my knowledge (upon an imprecation) of the authors or printers of the aforesaid book. Yet rather than occasion hurt to any, gave myself up to their utmost displeasure; and had recourse to many chargeable Habeas Corpus's before I could obtain bail. By this imprisonment I lost my shop, and trade for two years, to above 300*l.* charge and damage, towards which I can truly say to this day, I never had directly or indirectly to the value of 20*l.* reparation from any person or persons whatsoever; though it hath been often suggested both by persons in authority and others, that compositors bore me out, which occasioned my bonds to be aggravated.

Since that time I have had ten chargeable restraints in the king's messengers hands at a noble a day, one of which in the months of July and August I was so often and daily harassed to and fro by Mr. L'Estrange's order between Whitehall and the messenger's-house where I was prisoner upon fruitless journeys, neither obtaining bail nor discharge for 19 days together, that brought me under such a fit of sickness with a fever as reduced me to be distracted to that degree that I was held in my bed by strength, the truth of which Mr. L'Estrange may very well remember, for he often both came and sent, I being in appearance never like to go abroad again, being so impaired that my taste, hearing, and memory are much weakened, to this day. The real charge and damage I sustained by this restraint and sickness, in my shop and trade 100*l.* will not repair.

The other nine restraints and tedious attendance upon his majesty's council, and secretaries, together with diet and lodging at messengers houses, with charges of council orders and messengers warrants and fees, cost me above 112*l.*

He then tells of his sufferings under the representation of being a disaffected person in the year 1665, and proceeds thus.

Immediately before that dreadful fire, that papists brought upon London, in 1666. One Mr. Lillycrop, a printer, and another, both servants to Mr. L'Estrange as his assistants in surveying the press, came to my shop and warehouse near Temple bar with their general warrant to seize unlicensed books, and took off Mr. Allen's, Mr. Bunyan's, and other, with a number of printed depositions against the papists, shewing their attempts and acts in the several fires, barely as unlicensed; through the prejudice, the licensers were pleased to take against the authors, constrained my printing them without licence, being books neither against church nor state; Nevertheless, they took as many as two porters could stand under, and carried them to Mr. L'Estrange's lodging, then at the king's wardrobe; Some of which with much difficulty and charge was obtained again; the rest it is supposed the fire took, so my real damage above 50*l.*

Upon that severe act against conventicles, in 1671, I had 140*l.* warrants against me, for being taken at several times at religious protestant meetings, upon which I lost my shop and trade above six months, being so eagerly pursued by one justice Sabbs and his informers, as forced me by night to remove my goods from place to place nine several times, to prevent seizure, which cost me and lost me above 150*l.*

Here be it remembered that from the meeting place where he took me, and others often, he also in an illegal manner brought workmen, and cart, and tore down, seized, and carried away a large gallery, with all the seats and forms in the said meeting, converting them to what use he pleased for himself, or his favourites; coming often also to enquire of the officers of the parish, where I dwell, why there was not a seizure made; threatening them with a penalty in the act, as persons negligent, and when it was replied my door was still kept lockt that they could not obtain entrance; and they had been with the Lord Chief Justice Keiling for advice, who told them unless they could lay felony, murder or treason to my charge, the law would not bear them out to break open the doors while shut against them, upon the penalty of the conventicle act, upon which, the said justice Sabbs replied, Can you not get some unhappy boys to go in at his windows and open the door, and then you may make seizure of his goods; thus the conservator of the peace prompts the civil officers to break the peace contrary to his oath, to oppress for filthy lucre sake.

Some time after, two persons came to me, to procure the printing of a certain book, entitled, That neither temporalities, nor tythes, is due to the bishops, prelates nor clergy, by any gospel rule, and that kings, princes, and lords temporal may justly take the temporalities and tythes from them, and dispose of them for the defence and benefit of the kingdom, and the relief of the poor, proved by the laws and practices of twenty kings of England, Judah, and France, and also by 130 authors besides, dedicated to the king's most excellent majesty: One of them affirming he had great encouragements not fit here to mention; upon which I readily complied, but before it was finished, I was discovered, taken into custody, by Mr. L'Estrange with a general warrant and carried to Lambeth house, to appear before the then bishop, but without hearing was diamist, and remanded to Whitehall, but never came to a hearing, yet harassed to and fro, and kept undischarged for twenty weeks, sometimes in custody, and sometimes at liberty, to my real charge and damage at least 60*l.*

About a book called The Appeal from the cabal at Whitehall, to the parliament at Westminster; and the book called The Serious Queries against the conventicle act, proving it to be against the laws of God, of nature, and of Magna Charta; for which I was committed into the custody of five of the king's messengers by the council board, to above 50*l.* charge and damage.

In December, 1673, one Mr. Ralph Carter, and Mr. Wickham, messengers, came to my shop near the Royal Exchange, with a warrant to fetch me to Whitehall, where immediately they promised me either discharge or dismissal upon bail to attend some urgent occasions then lay on me. But instead of bringing me to any hearing, conveyed me to a messenger's house, where I was detained three nights and three days; upon which perceiving their design to put me to charges, I contented myself without either bed, fire or food, excepting a couple of rolls privately obtained, and one pound of raisins of the sun, resolving that way to tire them out, either to accept my security for forth coming when authority pleased, or immediately be brought to hearing; at length I was constrained to threaten them, that if they kept me longer, I should call out at windows, and raise the streets upon them, for such illegal confinement; which at length after considerable contest for fees, I addressed myself to authority in this following petition.

To the right honourable the Earl of ARLINGTON, Principal Secretary of State: The Case and Complaint of FRANCIS SMITH.

Humbly sheweth; That on Tuesday the 2nd of this instant December, by virtue of a General Warrant from your honour, I was apprehended by Mr. Ralph Carter, messenger, and from that time detained as a close prisoner till Friday following in a messenger's house, denying me (notwithstanding my urgent and pressing occasions) to appear before your Lordship in order to my examination, which was to my damage 40*l.* and upwards.

That Mr. Carter denied me a copy of the warrant, or liberty with a keeper to appear at my shop to seal two bonds, and deliver several goods for Barbadoes, to the probable hazard of ruining my trade as well as credit; although my necessity was at that time so urgent that I offered Mr. Carter 1,000*l.* bail for my appearance before your honour; but he refused it, and confidently affirmed it was your honour's particular order I should be so detained.

That after your honour's favour was obtained for my appearance at Whitehall on Friday, and his majesty's gracious favour to discharge me upon bail, (notwithstanding Mr. Carter's great incivilities to me) I gave him 20*s.* for his fee, who nevertheless on Monday the 8th of December instant, came after me into the city, where he demanded seven nobles more, the which he said he would have; and there in a very insolent manner (with many menaces, too tedious here to insert) affirmed I was his prisoner still, and that he would force me down to Whitehall in a coach, if I would not give him his afore-said demands; saying, Let me see who dares take you out of my hands; And the better to obtain the same, (as I imagine) did falsely and maliciously pretend that I had spoken dangerous words against the king and government; supposing thereby to affright me, that I might comply with such his illegal demands.

That upon these proceedings I repaired to counsel learned, who advised, That I might bind Mr. Carter to his good behaviour and indict him; but your honour's complainant was not inclined to any such proceedings, till I had spread my complaint before your honour: In order to which, I repaired to Whitehall on Tuesday following, and was there assaulted, and attempted to be seized by Mr. Carter in the open court again and again; but I refusing to go with, or submit to him, was pursued by him from thence almost to Pallmall, and there again was violently assaulted, forced, and dragged to a prison-house, tearing my coat and cloak, which caused a great tumult; whereupon the people demanded of Mr. Carter, by what authority he used me with that violence and cruelty? Thereupon Mr. Carter produced your honour's warrant, which his majesty had most graciously discharged me from the Friday before; and after all this, I was by him forced again to Whitehall, to appear before your honour; but Mr. Carter afterwards pretending that your lordship was not at Whitehall, he constrained me from thence to an ale-house, and there detained me at least two hours; the said Mr. Carter still threatening my continuance as his prisoner, on the pretences before alleged; so that I was constrained to call for the master of the house, and desire him to send for the Lord Chief Justice's warrant, to bring us both before his lordship; upon this, Mr. Carter set me at liberty.

The premises considered, your complainant humbly beseecheth your honour, That Mr. Carter may make reasonable reparation, or be left to a due course at law.

And your petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

In Jan. following I had the second impression printing of a book intituled, 'A Treatise of Baptism, wherein that of Believers and that of Infants, is examined by the scripture;' written by Henry Danvers, esq.; to which was both the author's and my own name and sign. This book having passed the first impression under some countenance of Dr. Parker, and the licensed catalogue of books published every term, nevertheless one Mr. Mearn, Mr. Vere, two messengers, beadle and porter to the company of Stationers, entered my house without a civil officer, and searched every room as well as my warehouse, for the said book; Mr. Mearn having but newly before, in his uncharitable diligence, seized near two thousand sheets of the said book, pretending great zeal for the service of the church of England; but the reader may judge by what follows the contrary too manifest; for in his assisting the surveying of the presses about four months before, and finding the same book printing, he passed it with a joke.

About February 10, he the said Mr. Mearn being then warden, did with warden White and the beadle, come to the house of one Mr. Redman, a book-binder, and seized 500 of the said books, and carried them away; although the said Mr. Redman would have given security for their forth-coming until I was made acquainted, and authority should give a legal determination; but Mr. Mearn said he would have them into his own custody, and damask or spoil them, immediately upon hearing of which, I applied myself to the lord Arlington, then principal secretary of state, and to the late bishop of London, setting forth the usage I had met with, and requesting their lordships favour, That neither I nor my books might be condemned until a fair hearing, which was most readily granted. But before I could obtain a re-delivery of the said books, in April following I had sufficient intimation that this book (seized in pretended zeal to the service of the church) was re-printing for some of the same persons that had seized mine; upon which I repaired to one Mr. Downing's house, a printer in Bartholomew-close, where I found the sheet D. then printing; and in a short time after I learnt where a parcel of this stolen impression was binding: I then applied myself to Mr. Mearn, he being warden of the company, appealing to him of the injustice of this usage, viz. That he should be a chief actor against me, for printing a book (according to my belief The Mind of the holy scriptures for baptising believers.) And that now I both desired and expected he would seize and suppress this, being done by his favourites, if not with his connivance. He replied, he must first send for the barber and be trimmed, and that it was not a seasonable hour; although it was eight of the clock in the morning in the month of May. Thus finding my endeavours fruitless with him, and my own books still under restraint, my market lost, and and at least 40 or 50*l.* expended with continued absence from my shop and trade, in attendance and application to several persons of honour; from January till May, I was, as many know, constantly harassed to and fro; being a part of that time at Windsor, where the court then was: On the 5th of which month, one Mr. Randal Taylor and Mr. Thomas Sawbridge, that had both been very instrumental in the seizing and suppressing of my books, exposes to public sale from shop to shop, that stolen impression of the said books, subscribing it in parcels to many booksellers, with the author's name, and my name and sign to it; which stupendous way of proceeding, and adding oppression to the oppressed, was designed, if possible, to have ruined me and my family.

Upon this unjust and monstrous dealing, I applied myself with one of their books and one of mine, to several persons of quality, and among the rest, to the right honourable the earl of Shaftsbury, then lord high chancellor of England, who was pleased highly to resent such hard measure: contributing his favour until it came to his majesty's ear, who was graciously pleased to grant his order for restitution of my books. And I wish Mr. Mearn would remember, in order to his timely repentance and making me restitution, how highly ill several noble lords resented his procedures, when I complained in his hearing of his injurious practices at a committee of lords, where he appeared (the man of confidence) receiving such just reflections from the lords, the secretaries, the attorney and solicitor generals, as might have precautioned a man of modesty, though of no religion, never to have appeared any more in such unjust and malicious actions, as the sequel will discover.

Some little time after the present lord of London was invested, Mr. Mearn (as I have good ground to believe) did mis-inform his lordship touching me and my warehouse, (wanting till then an opportunity to improve the sore disgust he had taken at his majesty's gracious favour in restoring me those books Mr. Mearn had before seized, and declared if it cost him an hundred pounds out of his own purse, I should never have them again; not being capable to do me that injury in the late bishop's time, who told him what he did against me, was matter of malice apparently, for that such and such books, which the bishop then named, were by his connivance vended, and every way as unfit to be published as mine) thereby obtaining a council-warrant, suggesting I had a private warehouse wherein might be great numbers of the book called The Growth of Popery, and Advice to grand juries in order to the election of a new parliament, discovering the many grievances the nation groaned under by the mis-proceedings of the late long parliament: (now my warehouse, so suggested for private and dangerous, was in the open street at the Globe tavern near the Royal Exchange) nevertheless on a Saturday in July, 1678, while I was 16 miles off, came Mr. Mearn, with the then deputy-marshal of the King's-bench, and several others, to search my warehouse, (which but the week before, the same marshal, with Mr. L'Estrange and others, had searched, and found nothing criminal) and demanded of my son the key, or they would break open the door; but having ready entrance, found only the books which his majesty had graciously restored two or three years before, with several other innocent books; not one among them I dare appeal to his own conscience, reflecting upon church or state, more than barely that of baptism, respecting the time of administering: nevertheless, he sent for a cart and five porters, employing them to load the cart with above 200*l.* worth of several sorts of my books, and carried them to Stationers Hall; obtaining from the present lord of London, by false suggestions, an order for damasking or defacing them all: and so industrious was he, and Mr. Randal Taylor the beadle, (one of those that had some time before printed and published the stolen impression) that in two days from the seizure above 50*l.* worth was made good for nothing but to paste upon trunks or hat-cases.

Their seizure was made on a Saturday towards evening, and on Wednesday following, by the mediation of a person of honour that hath known me for 20 years, I made my appliby a member thereof, for a petition to his majesty to dissolve that (by some worthy patriots of their own accounted; and felt one great grievance of the nation,) the late long parliament. And the author of the said Speech was many weeks kept in the Gate-house for his intended good service. Were all the ruins and spoils that have been made upon booksellers, printers, and merchants in books, and haberdashers, printed here, it would contain a volume; Till therefore a further opportunity calls for it; I shall omit much more that might be here inserted; humbly praying God Almighty to continue this honourable sessions of parliament, from whom it is not doubted, (when from more weighty affairs they can condescend into the inspection of such grievances,) but they will both punish offenders, and make such provision, as learned men of great worth, may not subject their labour to the pleasure of an imprimatur, or censure of striplings to them; nor yet booksellers and printers wait the justice and favourable dispatch of a license, till their markets be over, as is notoriously known, and felt by too many witnesses.

Having thus given a short and true account of the sadness of my sufferings and damages, and also of the most that I have received in reparation, I hope I shall neither be looked upon as an unquiet and troublesome man, deserving those afflictions I have undergone; nor as one that by men of like unquiet spirits have at least my charges repaired: But that I may stand in the eyes of honest and unprejudiced persons, as a man who desires to preserve myself and family by my trade, as well as I may; (yet have met with hard dealings, great sufferings and losses, and these for the most part illegally and unjustly brought upon me, by the malice of ill men, which if I may obtain), I have the desired end of this Narrative, and subscribe myself a servant to all true Englishmen, while,

FRANCIS SMITH.

263. The Trial of JANE CURTIS, at Guildhall, for publishing the same Libel:* 32 CHARLES II. A. D. 1680.

Mr. Holt. MAY it please your lordship, and gentlemen of the jury, here is an information brought against Jane Curtis; and it sets forth, That the defendant did publish and put to sale a seditious libel against my Lord Chief Justice Scroggs: The defendant pleads Not Guilty; if we prove it upon her, you are to find for the king; and if not, you are to say so, and no more.

Mr. Williams said (who was a counsel for the defendant), he would admit the record: whereupon they proceeded no further to trial, but the woman being called, she said:

Mrs. Curtis. I was ignorant in the matter, and knew no such thing, my lord; my husband, an't please your lordship, was in the country a hundred miles off of me, in Lincolnshire.

Justice Jones. You did it ignorantly and simply, without any malice, and, I suppose, you are heartily sorry for it. You see your neighbour there, Mrs. Smith, hath shewed good discretion in the behalf of her husband; she has ingenuously declared, that he shall come and make submission, and if I find you as submissive, and as sorry for what you have done, I may do the like for you.

Mrs. Curtis. In any thing that I have done, I know not myself Guilty; and if I am, I beg your lordship's pardon with all my heart, my lord, or any body's else.

Justice Jones. I know you will find mercy from my Lord Chief Justice, and therefore go and make your submission.

Then the jury proceeded to give their verdict, and their foreman said, Guilty.

See the Proceedings against the Judges, infra.

* In an account which was published of this trial, this Jane Curtis is called wife of Langley Curtis, and the libel for the publication of which she was tried, is called, "A Satire upon Injustice, or Scroggs upon Scroggs."

264. The Trial of Sir THOMAS GASCOIGNE, bart. at the King's Bench, for High Treason: 32 CHARLES II. A. D. 1680.

January the 24th, 1680, Sir Thomas Gascoigne was brought to the bar to be arraigned.

Cl. of Cr. SIR Tho. Gascoigne, hold up thy hand.

Sir T. Gasc. I cannot bear.

Clerk. He says he cannot bear.

L. C. J. (sir Wm. Scroggs). Then somebody must repeat it that stands by him.

Recorder (sir George Jefferies). Do you hear what I say to you?

Sir T. Gasc. No, I cannot bear, I am very deaf.

[Then the Clerk of the Crown went down close to the bar, and went on thus:]

Cl. of Cr. Sir Thomas Gascoigne, hold up thy hand. [Which he did.] Thou standest indicted by the name of sir Thomas Gascoigne, late of the parish of Elmet, in the West-riding in the county of York, bart. for that thou, as a false traitor against our most illustrious and excellent prince king Charles the 2nd, thy natural lord, not having the fear of God in thy heart, nor weighing the duty of thy allegiance, but by the instigation of the devil moved and seduced, the cordial love, and true, due, and natural obedience which true and faithful subjects of our said lord the king should bear to him, and of right are bound to bear, wholly withdrawing, devising, and with all thy power intending to disturb the peace and common tranquillity of this realm, and to bring and put our said lord the king to death and final destruction; and the true worship of God in this kingdom, by law established and used, to alter unto the superstition of the Church of Rome, and to move and stir up war against our said lord the king in this realm, and to subvert the government of this kingdom; the 30th day of May, in the 31st year of our said lord the king's reign, at the parish of Barwick in Elmett in the said county of York, in the West-riding of the same county, with divers other false traitors unknown, didst traitorously compass, imagine,* and intend the

* See a Note in vol. 5, p. 972. To the quotation there inserted from Mr. Luders, the following passage should have been added:

"These words, at this day, do not convey the proper meaning of the original 'compasser ou imaginer.' But I have been afraid of offending those who would cry out against the change, in a form of words so long established, in this well-known article of national history, if I had given their true translation. I believe they would be justly rendered by the words 'attempt' or 'contrive.' Many passages contemporary with the statute, could be brought to shew that this was the meaning of the law-makers. The following have occurred to me, viz.

"In the Parliament Roll of the same 25th year (p. 237.) the Chief Justice in opening the Session, among the causes of summons, mentions the French king's assumption of the crown of France, which belonged to Edward the third. And that he 'ymaginant de notre dit Seigneur le Roy subdure et engier,' had broken the truce.

"In Stat. 36 Edw. 3, st. 2. for the king's general pardon, the Commons petition that they may not be impeached or charged 'par nul manere de colour imagination ou interpretation—'

"In 2 Parl. Ro. 332. No. 58, in a petition for the banishment of the Italian brokers in 50 Edw. 3, the charge against them is, that 'male Usure et touz les subtils ymaginations d'icell sont par eux compasses et meyntenuz.'

"In 11 Rich. 2, 3 Parl. Ro. 239, 240. Judge Belknap is accused by the archbishop of York, 'quil feust ymaginer et contrevour' of the commission and statute made in the former parliament. And Blake, one of the same party ('qui avoient compassé et purposé leurs fauces tresons') ymagina sur les ditz commission et estatut— Et outre ce il ymagina et compassa— with the aforesaid persons, &c. whose offences are called 'fauces tresons et death and final destruction of our said lord the king; and to change and alter, and wholly to subvert the ancient government of this realm; and to depose and wholly to deprive the king of the crown and government of this kingdom, and to root out the true Protestant religion. And to fulfil and accomplish the same most wicked treasons, and traitorous imaginations

'compassements, d'avoir murdré et destruits les ditz Seignurs.'—And inasmuch as the said offenders 'avoient conundance des ditz fauces purposes et compassementz de si haute treason,' &c.

"In 4 Hen. 5, 4 Parl. Ro. 104, the Commons represent, that certain religious houses that had run in debt upon bonds, which they could not discharge, 'compassantz et ymaginantz de deceivre et forbarre' their creditors, had applied for protections, &c.

"In the acts for attainting the earl of Lincoln and his party in Henry the 7th's reign, which are in English, the following are the phrases, viz. conspired and ymagined—ymagined and conspired—ymagynnyng compassyng and conspyryng the deth and deposition—traitorously ymagynnyng and compassyng the deth and destruction. See 6 Parl. Ro. 397, 502.

"Chaucer, who was contemporary with the statute, applies the phrase to felony, not to treason. But in his time there was little difference between them for our purpose: Each crime depending on a breach of the feudal alliance; the one implying treachery, the other not. The passage I allude to is in the Knight's Tale, in the description of paintings in the Temple of Mars:

"There saw I all the dark imagining
Of Felony, and all the compassing.

The Treason of the murdring in the bed.
The open war &c."

Dryden altered this treason to the 'assassinating Wife.' Here treason seems contrasted with open war.

"Du Cange and Carpentier do not assist us, upon the inquiry into the origin of the word 'imagine,' in our writers and records. What has occurred in my reading, would lead me to derive it from 'machinari,' not from 'imaginatio,' Glanville and Bracton and M. Paris use that verb, where those who came after them, writing in French, use 'ymaginer.' The old writ of Ne exeat regnum has, Machinatus est contra coronam. Ordericus Vitalis, writing at the end of the 11th century, has this expression, 'Dum plurimi Anglorum—machinarentur rebellionem.' Knighton, who was probably contemporary with Edward the third, writes 'qui ymaginati sunt ei prodicionem.' Joinville, Bracton's contemporary, has the following passage in French, of a rebellion in France, 'Advint que les Barons de France se assemberent a Corbeil, et machinerent entre eux d'ung commun consentement.'" See his Considerations, &c. p. 137.

and purposes, the said Gascoigne and other false traitors unknown, on the said 30th day of May, in the 31st year aforesaid, with force and arms, &c. at the parish of Barwick aforesaid, advisedly, devilishly, maliciously and traitorously did assemble, unite, and gather together themselves, and then and there did devilishly, advisedly, maliciously, craftily and traitorously consult and agree to bring our said lord the king to death and final destruction, and to depose and deprive him of his own crown and government, and to introduce and establish the religion of the Romish Church in this realm. And the sooner to fulfil and accomplish the same most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes, thóu the said Gascoigne, and other unknown traitors, then and there advisedly, maliciously and traitorously did further consult and agree to contribute, pay, and expend divers large sums of money to divers of the king's subjects and other persons unknown, to procure those persons unknown traitorously to kill our said lord the king, and to introduce the Romish religion into this realm. And that thou the said Gascoigne afterwards, to wit, on the said 30th day of May, in the 31st year aforesaid, at the parish aforesaid, didst falsely, advisedly, craftily, maliciously and traitorously solicit one Robert Bolron to kill our said lord the king; and then and there, with an intent sooner traitorously to encourage the said Bolron to undertake the killing and murdering of our said lord the king, offeredst therefore to give and pay the said Bolron 1,000*l.* of lawful money of England; against the duty of thy allegiance, against the peace of our said lord the king, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in such case made and provided. How sayest thou, sir Tho. Gascoigne, art thou Guilty of this high treason whereof thou standest indicted, and hast been now arraigned, or Not Guilty?

Sir T. Gasc. 'Gloria Patri, Filio, et Spiritui Sancto,' I am Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. Not Guilty, you must say.

Sir T. Gasc. Not Guilty; nor any of my family were ever guilty of any such thing: I hope I shall be tried fairly.

Cl. of Cr. How will you be tried?

Sir T. Gasc. By God and my country.

Cl. of Cr. God send thee a good deliverance.

Sir T. Gasc. I desire, that in order to my trial, I may have a jury of gentlemen, of persons of my own quality, and of my own country, that may be able to know something how I have lived hitherto; for I am above fourscore and five years old.

L. C. J. Tell him he shall have a good jury of gentlemen of his own country.

Sir T. Gasc. And besides, my lord, I desire to know when I shall be tried.

Att. Gen. (Sir Creswel Levinz.) Some time about the latter end of the term, as soon as I can get a jury up.

Sir T. Gasc. I do not know whether I can produce all my witnesses at that time, if there be not a longer time allowed me; for I have a great many witnesses to fetch up: these witnesses must be all here, or I cannot make my defence; and I know not how they shall be got hither in so little time.

L. C. J. Tell him he may have what witnesses he pleases, and the aid of this court to fetch them.

Just. Dolben. Name them who they are.

Mrs. Ravenscroft. My lord, some of his witnesses are at Paris.

Just. Dolben. Why, he will not be tried yet this fortnight.

Mrs. Ravenscroft. They will not have time to come over between this and that.

Just. Dolben. Mistress, he had reason to believe that he should be tried some time this term, for so the counsel ordered it; and therefore he should have got his witnesses ready.

Mrs. Ravenscroft. My lord, he did not know where they were till a week ago.

Just. Dolben. Look you, Mr. Attorney, here is a lady that is I suppose, some relation to this gentleman.

Mrs. Ravenscroft. He is my grandfather, my lord.

Just. Dolben. She says a fortnight's time will be too little to get his witnesses together for his defence, because some of the witnesses are beyond sea at Paris, she says.

Att. Gen. My lord, I am willing he should have as long time as the term will allow of: but sure that is long enough to get any witnesses from Paris.

L. C. J. What say you to sir Miles Stapleton? I see he is joined in the indictment.

Att. Gen. My lord, he is not come up yet.

L. C. J. Will you try the one without the other?

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord, if we cannot have both: he is in the hands of the messenger at York; we have writ down to know the state of his health to some of the justices of the peace, and the messenger returns word he is sick and cannot come: I have sent down an Habeas-Corpus to the messenger to bring him up; let him return a Languidus at his peril; that is all I can do.

L. C. J. Well, what day do you appoint for Sir Thomas's trial?

Att. Gen. Tuesday come fortnight I think will be a good day.

Just. Dolben. By that time, mistress, you may get your witnesses; you must send a messenger on purpose.

Mrs. Ravenscroft. But if the wind should be contrary, my lord, and they cannot be brought over?

Just. Dolben. It is not an usual thing to have winds long contrary between Dover and Calais.

Mrs. Ravenscroft. But if it do fall out that he wants a material witness at his trial, I hope his life will be considered.

Just. Dolben. He should have had them ready, he had warning before.

Mrs. Ravenscroft. We could do it no sooner because we knew not where they were.

Just. Dolben. He saith he hath a great many witnesses; are they all at Paris?

Att. Gen. There are a great many in town, we know, already.

Mrs. Ravenscroft. If we had known when exactly, we might have been more ready perhaps.

Att. Gen. But we could give no notice sooner, it is early in the term now. But there is time enough to get any witnesses.

L. C. J. Ay, you may send to Paris a great many times between this and that.

Mrs. Ravenscroft. What if the letter miscarry, my lord?

Just. Dolben. Why, you must send a special messenger.

Att. Gen. My lord, if you please, let it be Wednesday fortnight, the last day but one of the term; because I would give him as much time to provide himself as I can.

Just. Pemberton. Well, mistress, you must send a special messenger; we must not consult your conveniency; do it as well as you can, you have time enough.

Just. Dolben. Your grandfather is a man of an estate; he may very well, in this case, be at the charge of a special messenger.

Mrs. Ravenscroft. But what if the winds be contrary, must my grandfather's life be lost?

L. C. J. We must give you that favour we can by law, and you must be content; tell us at the trial what you have done.

Then the Lieutenant of the Tower was ordered to take the prisoner back and by the rule to bring him to the bar on Wednesday the 11th of February. On which day the prisoner being brought up, the Trial proceeded thus:

Att. Gen. My lord, here is an extraordinary matter: sir Thomas Gascoigne had a rule for some friend to assist him, by reason of the defect of his hearing; and now there are three of them that are got among the jury.

L. C. J. No, no, they must come in of the inside of the bar.

Att. Gen. Pray let him tell which he will make choice of; for he is by the rule to have but one.

Just. Pemberton. Tell him there can but one stay.

Counsel. He says one of them came out of the country, and knows the persons that are the witnesses, which he does not himself.

L. C. J. Well, let the other come in, let him have them both.

Counsel. He says, the principal man he depended upon is clapt up.

L. C. J. Well, we cannot help that.

Then way was made for the Jury to come up to the stand, and proclamation for information was made in usual manner.

Cl. of Court. Sir Thomas Gascoigne, hold up thy hand.

Sir T. Gasc. I cannot hear what is said.

Cl. of Cr. Those good men which were lately called, and have appeared, are to pass, &c.

L. C. J. Tell him the effect of it. If he will make any challenges to the Jury, he must speak to them before they are sworn.

Hobart. If you will challenge any of the jury, you must speak to them before they are sworn.

Sir T. Gasc. I cannot hear who is called.

L. C. J. Tell him who is called.

Cl. of Cr. Sir Thomas Hodson.

Hobart. This is sir Thomas Hodson, sir.

Sir T. Gasc. What must I say? Ay, or No?

Hobart. Do you except against him?

Sir T. Gasc. No.

[Who was sworn.

Cl. of Cr. Richard Beaumont, esq.

Hobart. Do you challenge him, Sir?

Sir T. Gasc. No.

Att. Gen. Pray, my lord, here is sir John Cutler in the pannel, one that lives in town, and is the foreman of the jury; I desire the Court to take notice of his not appearing in particular.

Cl. of Cr. John Gibson, esq.—The Prisoner challenged him.

Serj. Maynard. I perceive they skip a great many; pray call them as they are in the pannel, and record their non-appearance in Court.

Which was done accordingly; but their names that did not appear, for brevity sake, are omitted.

Cl. of Cr. Nicholas Maleverer, esq.

Att. Gen. We challenge him for the king. I perceive the best gentlemen stay at home.

Serj. Maynard. Yes, it is so small a business.

Cl. of Cr.—Beckwith, esq., challenged by the prisoner; Stephen Wilks, esq., sworn; Matthew Prince, esq., challenged by the prisoner; Thomas Gravar, esq., challenged by the prisoner; Jervas Rockley, esq., sworn; William Walker, esq., challenged by the prisoner; John Dimmocke, esq., challenged by the prisoner; Samuel Jenkinson, esq., challenged by the prisoner; Robert Leeke, esq., sworn; William Batt, esq., sworn; Richard Burton, esq., challenged by the prisoner; Robert Auby, esq., challenged by the prisoner; Charles Best, esq., sworn; Robert Long, esq., challenged by the prisoner; John Crosse, esq., sworn; Barton Allett, esq., sworn; William Milner, esq., sworn; John Oxley, esq., sworn; Francis Oxley, esq., sworn.

Cry. Twelve good men and true, stand together and hear your evidence.

Cl. of Cr. Sir Thomas Gascoigne, hold up thy hand. Gentlemen, you of the Jury that are sworn, look upon the prisoner and hearken to his charge. You shall understand, That he stands indicted by the name of sir Thomas Gascoigne, late of the parish of Elmest, &c. proud in the Indictment, mutatis mutandis. Upon this Indictment he hath been arraigned, and thereunto pleaded Not Guilty; and for his trial hath put himself upon his country, which country you are, &c.

Then Proclamation for Evidence was made, and — Dormer, esq. of counsel for the king in this cause, opened the Indictment thus :

Mr. Dormer. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, sir Thomas Gascoigne, baronet, the prisoner at the bar, stands indicted for High-Treason, in conspiring the murder of his majesty, the subverting of the government, and the introducing the Romish religion : And for the effecting these purposes, the Indictment sets forth, That the said sir Thomas Gascoigne, sir Miles Stapleton, and other false traitors, on the 30th of May last, at the parish of Elmet, in the west-riding of the county of York, did assemble together, and there resolved to put their treasons in execution. And the better to accomplish their said treasons and traitorous imaginations, they did agree to contribute several large sums of money to several of his majesty's subjects unknown, to introduce popery, to kill the king, and subvert the government : And that sir Thomas Gascoigne did solicit Robert Bolron to kill the king, and for that service he was to pay him 1,000*l.* To this he hath pleaded Not Guilty : If the king's evidence prove the charge of the Indictment, your duty is to find him Guilty.

Serj. Maynard. May it please your lordship and you gentlemen of the jury, you have heard the indictment, and it hath been opened to you. There can be no greater crime charged upon any, than that this gentleman is accused of. The design hath been to kill and murder the king, to change the religion and the government ; and to effect this, they make assemblies, they offer money ; and this my lord we shall prove. It is no new crime, divers have suffered for the like already ; and we shall not need to make any aggravations, for indeed it cannot be aggravated more than the plain matter itself is. We shall call our witnesses, and prove it directly upon him, even by two witnesses ; and we shall prove, that he held intelligence with one Preswicke a priest ; letters between him and that person are found in his custody, and we shall produce one of them wherein it doth appear, that there was intelligence between them, and consultations had about the oath of allegiance ; and that Pracid did write to him, that it was a damnable oath condemned by the Scorbonnists : And upon that point hangs the changing of religion ; for the oath of allegiance is the great touchstone to discover men's sincerity by, and the great bond to tie them to the government, and to the protestant religion. And we shall likewise prove another passage in a letter indorsed with the prisoner's own hand, wherein there is an expression to this purpose : " That if England be converted, (the priest writes this to him) then how a sum of 90*l.* was to be disposed : " Which was, as you shall hear, and we shall prove, in a nunnery. If England be converted, that clearly shews, what was their intention, not only to destroy the king, but the religion and the nation ; and so they were conspiring not only against his majesty, but against God. That an old gentleman that hath lived so long under the peace of this nation, and been so protected by the government, which hath been so indulgent to men of his persuasion, should be guilty of such a design, is a lamentable thing to think of ; that he should so offend the law, which hath been so mild in its execution against such men. We shall prove the proffer of the 1,000*l.* and so leave it with you.

Att. Gen. My lord, these two papers we shall use in confirmation of that evidence will be given by two witnesses, who I think will concur in the same thing ; that is, the conspiracy for killing the king, and for the carrying on of the plot. The papers the witnesses will expound to you ; the one is a letter, as Mr. Serjeant has opened it to you, to sir Thomas Gascoigne from a priest, wherein he does discourse about 90*l.* a year at Maunston, which sir Thomas has purchased to settle upon a nunnery called Dolebank in Yorkshire ; and therein it is said, " You will be well advised to put in a proviso into the former writing" (he meant for the settlement) " That if England be converted, the 90*l.* a year shall be bestowed at Heworth, or some other place in Yorkshire." Your lordship will bear by the witnesses, that there were several places designed for these nuns to inhabit, as Dolebank and other places ; and this letter will concur with their evidence, and they will prove, that this very place that they speak of, was designed for this purpose ; and so it appears by the papers taken in sir T. Gascoigne's custody. My lord, there is another letter which was mentioned, and which I believe may have a great influence in this cause, I am sure it may be likely to produce very bad effects ; which is that letter from the priest, wherein he decies the oath of the allegiance as a damnable thing condemned by the doctors at Sorbonne, and other priests from Rome. And this had its effect a little time before ; for it was about the time that a matter of 30 or 40 were convicted of a premonition in that county, for not taking the oath of allegiance, which they used to do before. And there will be some other concurring evidence in this cause, and is by some papers taken in sir T. Gascoigne's own hand ; they are almanacks, in which many of his own memorials are, several sums of money mentioned to be paid, and returned to priests at London : The witnesses will tell you it was returned for the design of the Plot. There happens to be 900*l.* returned to Mr. Corker, who is now in Newgate ; and some other sums to Harcourt, who is executed ; and some money is paid to him, though I think not much, about 25*l.* and several sums are mentioned and great sums returned to London by sir T. Gascoigne, in five or six years time, 5 or 6,000*l.* to what purpose I can't tell ; they will give you an account : I think he did live always in Yorkshire himself, never used to come to town ; and what occasion he might have of returning money, I don't know. We will call the two witnesses viâ voce, and then use the other evidence as we shall have occasion to confirm them. Call Mr. Bolron* and Mr. Mowbray. [Who were sworn.

* This Bolron, in 1680, published, under an Order of the House of Commons, a pamphlet, entitled, "The Papists' Bloody Oath of Secrecy and Litany of Intercession for England: With the Manner of taking the oath, upon their entering into any Grand Conspiracy against the Protestants. As it was taken in the Chapel belonging to Barnbow-Hall, the residence of sir Thomas Gascoigne, from William Rush-ton, a Popish Priest."

The Oath of Secrecy he gives as follows :

"THE OATH OF SECRECY.

"Given by William Rush-ton, to me Robert Bolron, Feb. 2, 1676-7.

"In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

"I, Robert Bolron, being in the presence of Almighty God, the blessed Mary ever Virgin, the blessed Michael the Archangel, the blessed St. John Baptist, the holy Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, and all the Saints in heaven, and to you my Ghostly Father; do declare, and in my heart believe, the Pope, Christ's vicar-general, to be the true and only head of Christ's church here on earth; and that by virtue of the keys of binding and loosing, given his Holiness by our Saviour Christ, he hath power to depose all heretical kings and princes, and cause them to be killed. Therefore, to the utmost of my power I will defend this doctrine and his Holiness's rights, against all usurpers whatever; especially against the now pretended king of England, in regard that he hath broke his vows with his Holiness's agents beyond seas, and not performed his promises, in bringing into England the Holy Roman Catholic Religion. I do renounce and disown any allegiance as due to the said pretended king of England, or obedience to any of his inferior officers and magistrates; but do believe the Protestant doctrine to be heretical and damnable, and that all are damned which do not forsake the same; and to the best of my power, will help his Holiness's agents here in England, to extirpate and root out the said Protestant doctrine, and to destroy the said pretended king of England, and all such of his subjects as will not adhere to the holy see of Rome, and the religion there professed. I further do promise and declare, That I will keep secret and private, and not divulge, directly nor indirectly, by word, writing, or circumstance, whatever shall be proposed, given in charge or discovered to me by you my Ghostly Father, or any other engaged in the promoting of this pious and holy design; and that I will be active, and not desist from the carrying of it on: And that no hopes of rewards, threats or punishments, shall make me discover the rest concerned in so pious a work;

Att. Gen. Mr. Bolron, tell my lord and the jury what you know of sir T. Gascoigne.

Mr. Bolron. I came to live with sir T. Gascoigne in 1674, as Steward of his coal-works; and in 1675, a little before Easter, being in the and, if discovered, shall never confess any accessories, with myself concerned in this design. All which I do swear by the blessed Trinity, and by the blessed Sacrament (which I now purpose to receive) to perform, and on my part, to keep inviolable: And do call all the angels and saints in heaven, to witness my real intension to keep this Oath. In testimony whereof, I do receive this most holy and blessed Sacrament of the Eucharist."

He afterwards says :

"Now having given an account of the Oath of Secrecy, next I will render you an account how the Jesuits and Popish priests do insinuate themselves into the hearts of those that they ensnare to engage in this damnable design; which particularly being exemplified in my own self, may serve as instructions how others were induced and encouraged to propagate their hellish principles. The relation is as followeth.

"About the latter end of January, 1676, Thomas Thwing a priest, and William Rush-ton, another Popish priest, who was my ghostly father, came to my house at Shippon Hall in Yorkshire, and did there examine me, how I was affected and did like the Romish religion, since I was of it, and, if there were any occasion, what would I do for the good of that religion? To whom I replied, that I was so well affected to the Romish religion, that I would venture my life and estate in the management of any design whatsoever, for the good of that religion. The priests then said, that they were glad to hear me in so good a humour, and did heartily wish that all the Catholics in England were of my mind; and further did tell me, that all England in a little time would be Roman Catholics; for that the duke of York, next heir to the crown, had renounced the Protestant religion: Therefore force was to be used, for the more speedy bringing him to the crown. But added, that, before I could be any further acquainted with the particulars of this design, I must first take the aforementioned Oath of Secrecy, which all good Catholics must take; for if any Catholics did refuse it, they could not be permitted to know of their designs and contrivances: For that sir Thomas Gascoigne, Thomas Gascoigne, esq. and other gentlemen, had taken the same, and engaged themselves, and given security for their respective performances.

"Then I told the said priests, That I would not deny to take it; for I would obey my ghostly father in all things. And Candlemas-day, 1676, I did accordingly go to Barnbow Hall, as was formerly agreed, where I did hear mass, and take the Oath of Secrecy from the hands of my ghostly father, to be private and keep secret the design of killing his sacred majesty, and the destruction of all such Protestants as would not be of the Romish religion; which Oath of Secrecy is before related, and is the true copy of the said Oath as I got it from the said Rushton accidentally, the very same day it was ministered unto me by him.

“ Before I did take the Oath of Secrecy, I did go to confession, where my ghostly father in my said confession did tell me, that I must believe, That it was a mortal sin to reveal what was told me by my ghostly father in my confession, and that I was certainly damned, if ever I did discover the concerns of this design, or taking the said Oath of Secrecy.

“ But after I had taken the said Oath of Secrecy, and was acquainted with the design, whenever I went to confession, my ghostly father would be sure to examine me, how I had kept my oath; upon which, if my father confessor did judge, that I had not so truly kept the same, as I ought to have done, then must I have taken the same Oath over again. Besides, my ghostly father did frequently teach me how to make use of equivocations and mental reservations.

“ First, how to defend myself against the Protestants, if I were asked by a stranger, whether Mr. Rushton were a priest? that then I might lawfully deny it, or upon oath before a magistrate, I might positively deny my knowledge of Rushton to be a Popish priest: but then I must privately to myself make use of this equivocation, That I did not see the said Rushton take his orders beyond sea; therefore could not swear him to be a priest. And then followed the benefit of absolution, for this or any other service done for the good of the Romish religion.

“ And indeed my penance in confession was once enjoined me by Father Rushton to lash myself with a cat-of-nine-tails, because I did not deny with asseverations, to one Mr. Burman, that he was no Popish priest; although I did not confess the same to Mr. Burman, yet he alledged, that I did it but faintly, and therefore that should be my penance.

“ Secondly, if reproached by the Protestants; That they of the Romish religion made no conscience to destroy those that were of contrary opinion to them; that then with imprecations I might lawfully deny the same; only making use of this reservation to myself, that I must deny any thing which is against the interest of the church.

“ Thirdly, that since the discovery of this Popish Plot, if I did at any time hear the Protestants discourse, that they of the Romish church did teach the murdering of kings and princes, and that the king was to have been murdered by the Papists, that then I must vindicate the Romish religion, arguing, that such doctrine the Papists held not, with reservation to myself, that I must not own such a design, unless effected, believing that Protestants, being heretics, had no power to, examine me, neither was I obliged to answer directly to the question.

“ The ceremonies, manner and form used in the taking of the said Oath of Secrecy, is thus:

“ At the chapel door, did sprinkle myself with holy water, and then went into the chapel, where, bowing towards the altar, I made the sign of the cross, and said, Sprinkle me with hyssop, and I shall be cleansed; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow; Then kneeling, I made the sign of the cross, and said, In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, Amen. After that, I said certain prayers used before confession; and at the conclusion, made again the sign of the cross; which being ended I went into the vestry, where, kneeling, I asked my ghostly father's blessing, as children usually do their parents. Then after that, I made again the sign of the cross, and then had the benefit of confession, and absolution from my sins, and then I went into the chapel, and said prayers before receiving the Sacrament.

“ But when mass was said, I did not communicate with the rest there present, although the Sacrament was consecrated for me; but, after the rest were gone, then William Rushton my ghostly father, called me to the altar, where bowing my body and kneeling, I made the sign of the cross; then I kissed the mass-book, and laid my right hand upon it, and so had the Oath of Secrecy given me by my ghostly father Rushton, repeating it after him. But at these words, In testimony whereof I do receive this most holy and blessed Sacrament of the Eucharist; Rushton put the Sacrament into my mouth, and said this little Latin prayer following:

“ Corpus Domini nostri Jesu Christi custodiat animam tuam in vitam eternam. Amen.

“ Then again I kissed the mass-book held in the priest's hand, but held my hand on the mass-book all the time I was taking the Oath aforesaid; and after that, rising, bowed my body to the altar in an humble manner, and so returned to my place again.

“ Now after I had taken the said Oath of Secrecy, Rushton went again into the vestry, to say his prayers on his breviary; but I continued still in the chapel to say my prayers used after the taking of the Sacrament. Then, after, Rushton my confessor came forth out of the vestry, he went towards his own chamber, whither I followed him; but sir Thomas Gascoigne hastily calling the said Rushton, he laid down his breviary in his closet, to which was no door, and is situate near his chamber; which said breviary I taking up, found therein the said Oath of Secrecy; of which Oath I had a sufficient time to take a true copy, and it is the real copy which is before recited; although when I took the copy of the said Oath, I never intended that any Protestant should have seen it.

“The same day were hallowed for myself two pistols, which were to be made use of, for the destruction of the Protestant party, if the Roman Catholic religion had prevailed in England.

“There were also swords, guns and pistols hallowed for Thomas Gascoigne, esq. and others engaged in the Popish Plot. And in the said month of February, I had an indulgence or pardon for 30,000 years, given me by the said Rushton my ghostly father, for my encouragement in my proceedings of being so zealous against his majesty and government; and the penance enjoined me was, to say every day a litany for the intercession and conversion of England; but if I did twice a day say the said Litany, then should I each day redeem a soul out of purgatory, but I have heard my ghostly father say, that some Catholics had their indulgencies for 50,000 years, others a plenary indulgence to encourage them to be firmer to this design. Such a plenary indulgence I did see in the hands of Mr. Mowbray, about the latter end of January, 1676-7.”

Then he gives the Litany of Intercession, and concludes thus:

“About the latter end of October, or the beginning of November, 1678, my occasions called me to Leeds Market, within four miles of my habitation, and a market that I frequently used: after my particular business was done, my curiosity led me to go, as usually I did, to a coffee-house; where amongst other news and reports, I heard that one sir Edmundbury Godfrey, a justice of peace at London, was missing, and that it was suspected and feared, that he was murdered or made away by the Papists.

“At my return home, I repaired to sir Thomas Gascoigne’s house at Barmbow, one quarter of a mile from my house, and there meeting his son Thomas Gascoigne, esq. I acquainted him with the news I heard at Leeds.

“Who thereupon took a letter out of his pocket directed to himself, which he shewed me; which letter was subscribed, ‘I. Corker,’ wherein he acquainted the esquire in words to this effect: That sir Edmundbury Godfrey had been a very busy man, and a great enemy to the Catholics; therefore they had procured him to be destroyed.

“And some few days after we had the same thing confirmed in print, viz. That he was murdered. Upon which my ghostly father William should be forfeited to the king. And Charles Ingleby said, it was best so to do, and then he told sir Thomas he would have the defeazance made ready, which he would draw with his own hands; but he bid him be sure to bring none

Rushton, sent for me, to come to mass at sir Thomas Gascoigne’s house; and at confession, did charge me to give out, That I heard, that sir Edmundbury Godfrey was a melancholy gentleman, and in a discontent went into the fields, and there murdered himself with his own sword.

“Which accordingly I did, as occasion offered, in all companies I happened into; but was contradicted by many; and by some, that it could not be, for that his neck was broke, which he could not do after he had murdered himself; nor be capable to do it, if his neck was broke before: And being thus run down in my assertions, I acquainted my said ghostly father William Rushton therewith, who told me he had received new instructions, which he shewed me in writing, and were to this effect:

“That sir Edmundbury Godfrey was a gentleman who had often attempted to destroy himself; that he did really hang himself in his own silk-girdle, in his chamber at the bed’s feet: which being discovered, two of his servants acquainted his brothers therewith; who, coming thither, contrived his taking down, and the carrying him to the place where he was found; where they run his corps through, on purpose to throw it on the Papists, thereby to save the estate to themselves, and from being forfeited to the king: And that the two servants had 50*l.* a-piece given them to keep it private. He also said that one of them, which was a maid-servant, did offer to discover this contrivance to his majesty and council, but that she was by them rejected: Nevertheless, for all this, at the same time Rushton did own to me, that he was murdered by the Papists, but by what hands he knew not; and further, he seemed much concerned that it was done; wishing it had never been done, because it would make the murder of the king the more difficult to be performed.

“ROBERT BOLRON.”

“An Abstract of the Accusation of ROBERT BOLRON and LAWRENCE MAYBURY, Servants, against their late Master, Sir THOMAS GASCOIGNE, kt. and bart. of Barmbow in Yorkshire, for High Treason: with his Trial and Acquittal, Feb. 11, 1680; ‘Fit error novissimus pejor priore.’ Printed for C. R. 1680.

Robert Bolron, of New-Castle-upon-Tyne, was bound apprentice to Mr. Deale, a jeweller in Pye-corner, London. He abandoned his master in a twelvemonth, and listed himself a foot-soldier in Timmouth-castle. He was with others thence put on board the Rainbow frigate, in the second war against the Dutch. He got ashore, and came in his yellow coat to sir but Protestant witnesses along with him to testify. And in 1675, I did go along with sir T. Gascoigne to sir William Ingleby's of Ripley, and there I did see him receive colourably 1,000*l*.

L. C. J. How do you know it was colourably?

Mr. Bolron. I did hear sir Thomas tell Charles Ingleby so.

Thomas Gascoigne's house, having acquaintance with Richard Pepper, one of his servants, and thence he went to Newcastle.

He sometime after much importuned the said Pepper to recommend him to sir Thomas's service, upon pretence of his having been used to look after coal mines near Newcastle; and by his means he was admitted to over-look a small colliery of sir Thomas's.

Lawrence Maybury, (being the son of a day-labouring forge-smith about Leeds and now of late a burn-bailiff) through the means of Francis Johnson (one of sir Thomas's tenants and neighbours) was preferred to be sir Thomas's foot-boy. The same Maybury being laid in a chamber, where was a secret place, in which the lady Tempest (sir Thomas's own daughter, upon her going to London about Midsummer 1675,) put a small little trunk, and in it some twenty pieces of gold, her wedding ring, and several little stone rings, medals, and other things, to the value of about sixty pounds, and he who was known to all the servants not to be worth a groat, and having but a small salary, being afterwards discovered to have gold, silver, a large wedding-ring, and other rings; and the lady Tempest returning about August and the trunk being gone, and these particulars talked of, he became vehemently suspected to be the thief. Howbeit her ladyship, not having certain proofs, did not prosecute him; but upon the 14th of January following sir Thomas turned him away, both for suspicion of the said theft, and for some insolent attempts upon his maids.

Maybury being discharged in January, cloaths himself finely, and sets up for a gentleman, goes to the dancing-school at York, intrudes into the company of some of the gentry, appears flush of money, and at the Sunday after Easter he called at Sir Thomas's, desiring to be admitted to prayers into the house, but was positively denied; others of the family (having within some weeks after the said Maybury's being gone) missed 100*l*. in a bag, besides other monies, out of the place where they kept their money. Finding himself much eyed and taken notice of by those who knew him, about May the spark comes to London; and not contented with the name of Maybury, as he used to write himself before, he now assumes the more honourable title of Mowbray, takes lodgings in Holborn, where he spent most part of that summer. He gives himself out also to be a great heir, borrows a gentleman's coach, courts a gentewoman of quality, having 1500*l*. to her portion; being refused, he writes verses (such as they were) against her. About which time, being in company with some gentlemen, into

L. C. J. When was that?

Bolron. The 7th or 8th of April; the deed bears the 8th of April 1675.

L. C. J. Was Charles Ingleby there at that time?

Bolron. Yes, when the deed was sealed; and he read it in the presence of the witnesses to be dated at that time.

whom he had insinuated himself, he fairly borrowed of them a sum of money, (about 70*l*.) giving them a bill of exchange on his pretended merchant in London for security; but the merchant being soon enquired of, had no advice, nor knew neither Maybury, nor any else concerned in the bill; which therefore being discovered to be a forgery, he leaves his residence above-said, pretending to go in all haste to Warwickshire to take possession of 400*l*. per annum just fallen to him; but in very few days after his old landlord found him in an obscure house near Smithfield, absconding for fear of those he had wronged: On the 24th of December he removes again, pretending to Bishopsgate-street; and in the beginning of February next ensuing, (having debauched and played away his money) as easily as he got it, he made such shift as to return to Leeds, but with a lighter purse, and far heavier heart than he parted from thence; and having formerly, by the charity of sir Thomas, improved his hand-writing, he now sets up a school for that purpose.

Bolron likewise being after some time more than suspected to be an ill man, his accounts of the colliery were inspected, and upon the perusal of them in February 1677-8, he was found to have received about 300*l*. for coals, and accounted for to sir Thomas but 60*l*. whereof much more was due. That he had defrauded sir Thomas very much in other pretended disbursements about the colliery; and that he had taken out of sir Thomas's chamber a book of accounts, whereby it appeared how he had wronged his master more particularly of other monies and dues, and that he returned many persons indebted for coals, who in truth had paid him: Hereupon sir Thomas resolved not only to part with him, but to punish him according to law; but upon his earnest beseeching sir Thomas to shew him mercy, he in compassion accepted of 12*l*. and two bonds for payment of 48*l*. principal more, and so about April 1678 let him go quietly and peaceably away; sir Thomas (like a good christian) being desirous he might amend, and do better in another service.

Mr. Thomas Gascoigne, sir Thomas's eldest son, having resolved, by reason of the troubles to those of his church, or in general to Catholic's, to go beyond seas, as many others did; took leave of sir Thomas in order thereunto at the end of March; and having obtained his majesty's passport on the 4th of April following, he went from London to Dover the 7th of that month, and letters were received from him in his way to Paris, (and as by a public testimonial since sent) he settled himself there the first of May following new stile, or 20 April old stile, and was not yet departed thence, as many witnesses now in England can testify. About a year after his the said Bolron's departure from sir Thomas, he being still indebted to sir Thomas, and also to others of the family, viz. to Mr. Thomas Gascoigne, and his sister the lady Tempest; and being now become insolent by his own ill government, he declares himself a Protestant, and accordingly takes the oaths at Pontefract sessions; being also called upon for the aforesaid payments, he earnestly pressed one of Mr. Thomas's servants, with whom he thought he was intimate, to assist him to steal a hundred pound from his master, or otherwise to acquaint him where his master's money lay, that he might do it himself; but not prevailing therein, he importuned him at least to steal from sir Thomas the bonds, for which he promised to reward him.

Just. Dollen. What, that 1,000*l.* was the consideration of the deed?

Bolron. Yes, it was. Sir Thomas Gascoigne did part thereby with all his estate for seven years, he allowing him 100*l.* a year for his maintenance, besides the 1,000*l.* at first paid. And this was done with that intent, for fear he should be discovered in the plot for killing the king—

Sir Thomas observing Bolron's declining condition, sent a servant for him, whereat Bolron seemed much concerned, and amongst other things told the messenger, that he had been reading the printed trials, and that he had learned T. O. his way of witnessing so exactly, that he did not doubt to hang any man whom he pleased; but upon the 29th of May he came to sir Thomas, to tender a mortgage of a poor house his father left him at Newcastle; which sir Thomas then slighted, having several others bound with him for the debt, the next day being the remarkable 30th of May last, (and on which day Bolron had laid the ground of his principal accusation;) sir Thomas stirred not from about home, and about six of the clock that evening one of sir Thomas's servants went to the house of Nicholas Shippen, not a quarter of a mile from Bolron's house, and there found Bolron, who said he had lain private there most part of that day for fear of the bailiffs; and moreover, that he would now keep himself concealed, and get into the coal-pit at Castleforth not far off, where he was sure the bailiffs should not find him.

Bolron having by his wife (who was formerly a servant in the family) gotten into one of sir Thomas's farms, and being in arrear of rent also, a declaration of Ejectment was ordered by sir Thomas to be delivered him, and on the 4th of June (following the abovesaid 30th of May) Bolron had notice thereof, about which time Bolron went to sir Thomas's house, and slept up to Mr. Rushton's chamber; but at his coming down seemed much in passion, and told one of sir Thomas's servants, that he had been with Mr. Rushton to borrow 5*l.* but was refused it,

L. C. J. How do you know that?

Bolron. I did hear sir Thomas Gascoigne and sir Miles Stapleton discourse of it, and he said it was for that end.

L. C. J. Where was that discourse?

Bolron. In sir T. Gascoigne's bed-chamber.

Just. Jones. When was that?

Bolron. It was in or about the discovery of the Plot.

and with a great oath vowed to be revenged on him, going away without speaking to sir Thomas.

Bolron having now resolved revenge, told his wife he would now pay sir Thomas all, by mortgaging his house at Newcastle, wherein she had her jointure, if she would give consent to it; she consenting at length, he brought her a writing to sign, purporting her consent, as he pretended, to her. He likewise pretended to sir Thomas's attorney, that he had gained his wife's consent to mortgage or sell the said house, and prayed him to prepare a deed of mortgage thereof to sir Thomas; and he did so, having persuaded sir Thomas to accept it; but it proved ineffectual.

Bolron being become more and more enraged, and having studied the several proclamations which had come forth since T. O. supposed discovery of the plot, goes to Broderton Tyndal, esq.; justice of the peace, and informs him several things against Rushton; and that Mrs. Mary Presseck, wife to sir Thomas's servant, had spoken several strange words concerning his majesty. Afterwards he gave his information to William Lowther, esq. another justice of the peace. After that he attended Mr. Lowther, Mr. Tiodal, and Mr. Francis White, esq.; a third neighbouring justice of the peace, and there likewise confirmed to them what he had said the two former days, and then desired four or five days to give them a further account.

Bolron attending them accordingly, requested that the former information he had given them might be returned to him; but it was told him, that the informations he had given them were sent up to London; and thereupon he resolved to follow them, and prayed them to lend him a little money for his journey, (for he was grown very low) and he said they gave him 8*s.* 6*d.* towards it, and Mr. Tyndal gave him a letter of directions and assistance to his brother in London; but another of them (a neighbour of sir Thomas's) gave him something more to make quicker expedition; but he perceiving that most of the justices would give little faith to his informations, they being made up of hearsays, contradictions, and improbabilities, and Mr. Thomas Gascoigne, whom he involved, being gone beyond sea near two months before the time hinted of the 30th of May; and that therefore they would issue out no warrants against any whom he had accused, but a servant, which otherwise (as the whole country knows) they would most readily have done, he resolved to mend his error when he came to

L. C. J. But you say you saw the deed sealed?

Bolron. Yes I was a witness to it.

L. C. J. And you saw the money paid?

Bolron. I and one Matthias Higgingil did help to count it.

Just. Jones. Were you a Protestant at that time?

London; and so by becoming a king's witness to be above all wants, and also be revenged on sir Thomas, and secured from him, and all other his creditors; and in order to those good ends, (he gave out in the country, he would go to Newcastle and sell his house) but instead thereof he hasted to London immediately.

At Ware upon the road he lost justice Tyn-dal's letter; but getting to the Green Dragon in Bishopsgate-street upon the 3rd of July following, he immediately acquainted the landlord with his errand, and by his directions goes in all haste to sir Robert Clayton, and the next day, viz. the 4th of July, he attended the right honourable the lord president Shaftsbury, and the lords of his majesty's privy council, and positively upon oath accuseth sir Thomas and others of consultations in relation to the king's death; for he swore that upon the 30th day of May, he being at sir Thomas's house, sir Thomas bade him go into the gallery, where Rushton, though he were so angry with him the said Bolron, as Bolron swore, for taking the oath of allegiance, that he was ready to have stricken him, nevertheless tempted him in express terms to kill the king; and that upon his refusing to do it, Rushton prayed him however to keep it secret. That waiting by sir Thomas's appointment till his return, sir Thomas about six of the clock that evening took him into his chamber, and having asked him what Rushton said to him, sir Thomas told him, That if he would undertake a design to help to kill the king, he would send him to his son Mr. Thomas Gascoigne, who should instruct him how to do it, and he should have 1,000*l.* reward; but refusing again to have any hand in blood, sir Thomas desired him of all love to keep it secret. Now as to the account the said Bolron then gave of sir Thomas his servants, he declared, that Maybury went away about suspicious of a trunk the lady Tempest had lost, with monies and jewels in it; for then he had not pitched on the said Maybury for his second witness, as afterwards in a month, or thereabouts, he did.

Their lordships presently sent away Bolron and a messenger into Yorkshire for sir Thomas; and in the mean time examined those persons in London, to whom Bolron had directed them where to find or hear of Mr. Thomas Gascoigne, son to sir Thomas mentioned in the abovesaid accusation, and when they saw him last. But their lordships soon found upon enquiry, that Mr. Gascoigne was then and long before gone beyond sea, having set forward for Dover, viz. on the 7th of April, and was so far from being seen since in town by them, that several letters had been received from him beyond sea by the Bolron. Yes, my Lord, I was at the time of the sealing the deed; but I did hear the discourse between sir Miles Stapleton and sir T. Gascoigne upon the discovery of the plot, when I was a papist.

L. C. J. When was the discourse you speak of with sir Miles Stapleton, do you say?

post, with the post mark on them, which caused strange reflections on this new evidence given by Bolron: and therefore these persons being separately examined by the lord president, were admonished to take great care what they answered, for that it was sworn (by Bolron and another) that Mr. Gascoigne was seen at London both the beginning and latter end of May by several; whereto it was replied by one of them under examination, That on that 30th of May he assisted in a cause or law-suit of sir Thomas's against one Mr. Nelthorp in London; and that his son's presence, if he were in London, had been necessary, and that if Mr. Thomas had been any where near, he would have appeared at it to have supplied his father's place at the said trial in Chancery: nay Bolron himself has since deposed, that one principal cause of Mr. Gascoigne's coming to town when he left the country, was this very law business with Mr. Nelthorp, how truly the effect hath shewn, as well as of the rest of those allegations.

The 7th of July sir Thomas was taken into custody, late at night, out of his house at Barn-bow, 14 miles from York, and Bolron caused a warrant to be served on his own wife and grand-mother, to testify before Mr. Lowther and Mr. Tindal what they knew of the things they had charged sir Thomas with; but they were very unwilling to go, and protested before God, that they never knew nor heard of any ill by the said sir Thomas, or any thing in the least ways concerning any wicked design against the king's person, the government, or religion of the nation. Whereupon the said Bolron being much enraged, swore and threatened, and then said, if they would go and testify what he had sworn against sir Thomas, he should get 500*l.* by it; but if they refused to do so, he should be utterly undone; after this Bolron was very melancholy, and being asked if his conscience did not trouble him for what he had sworn against sir Thomas, he declared, that if some persons would pass it by, he would not prosecute him any further. One of sir Thomas's servants went to Bolron's house that night about nine o'clock, and found Bolron's wife in bed crying extremely, complaining that her husband had lately made her set her hand to a writing, pretending to her that it only concerned her consent to part with her right to the house at Newcastle, which she willingly agreed to; but she now found it was a writing wherein her husband had accused sir Thomas, and several others, but had not found proper to produce it as yet.

The 18th of that month sir Thomas was examined at the council-board, and the day following he was committed to the Tower; now Bolron (who was also returned) considering that he had often named Mr. Corker, (a prisoner in Newgate) as a man he intimately knew, though in truth he had never seen him in his life; and thinking also that it was necessary he should be able to distinguish him at least from other men, (against the time he should be brought to charge him about the Plot, and about the monies returned to him) he came on the 22d of July last to the press-yard at Newgate, in another man's name, desiring the turn-key to bring Mr. Corker to him; Mr. Corker being informed that a stranger would speak with him, very prudently desired a gentleman then present to step down, and see who it was; the gentleman coming into the box, and asking before some Protestants that were by, who would speak with Mr. Corker? Bolron supposing him to be the man, called him Mr. Corker, and asked him how he did, pretending a particular knowledge of him, and several years acquaintance with him; whereat the gentleman following the humour, sate down by him, and drank with him; so that the familiarity encreasing, Bolron (among other things) told him he had several times heard him say mass; whereupon Mr. Corker being made acquainted with this pleasant passage, came down to the box likewise, and sate by Bolron, who knew him not in the least, but wholly applied himself to the other; all which the Protestants, and others present, have attested under their hands.

L. C. J. After the money paid?

Bolron. Yes, after the money paid: and he said to sir Miles Stapleton, he had done well to make over his estate.

The like accident happened to Bolron the last summer assizes at York; for there he demanded of Mr. Butler the gaoler a sight of his prisoners, (a method learned of the confraternity at London, to whom all prisons were open at their call) and having there thoroughly viewed and surveyed one Lambert, he at length saluted him by the name of one Osbaldestone; who answering that he was not the man, Bolron told him that he was, and that he would swear that he heard him say mass: whereon Mr. Butler replied, that he was a rash man, for that Lambert was a tradesman, as several could testify, and besides, Osbaldestone was 25 years elder.

At this time Bolron becoming more known in London, and familiar, was advertised by some of his new colleagues, and well-wishers, in plain language, that he had made a mighty false step in swearing on the 4th of July, that sir Thomas had said to him on the 30th of May last, that if he would assist to kill the king, he would send him to his son Thomas, who would instruct him how to do it, and that he should have 1,000*l.* reward; whereas in truth it was found that Mr. Thomas Gascoigne was gone to Paris

L. C. J. That is an abrupt thing for him to say; how did he begin the discourse?

Bolron. They were discoursing about the discovery of the Plot by Dr. Oates and Mr. Bedlow; and then sir T. Gascoigne said to sir Miles Stapleton, I have done well to make about eight weeks before that 30th of May, with his majesty's licence or passport, and had continued there ever since in much company. Bolron was extremely surprized in having so unluckily named Mr. Tho. Gascoigne to be his assistant to kill the king, at a time when he was not upon the land, nor of so many weeks before had been, and which his former deposition implied, and as he had assured the lords on oath, and they had found it different, Bolron was at a loss, but his brethren had bethought them of a salvo; he confided the point to others also, shews them copies of all, and it was resolved the redress should be by a second additional information (given in about the end of the said July) to reconcile the former, and to cover the artifice of it by a latter superfetation of such old and new things as might be proper, and seem natural; but it is plain, the drift of the said addition was to make sir Thomas have spoken to him in these different words from his former, viz. If thou wilt undertake to assist to kill the king, I will send thee to my son, (if in town) who, with the rest that are concerned, shall instruct thee how thou shalt assist in it, and thou shalt have 1,000*l.* reward. Having sworn thus in his second deposition, and composed the matter as he thought, the consult advised him to apply now to the greatest difficulty, which was to get a second witness, who might confirm what he had already sworn.

Therefore about the beginning of August he sets out for Yorkshire; and pretending he had many priests and others concerned in his Plot, he obtained monies and commissions to seize and secure all such papists as he found obnoxious; and under this pretence going to Leeds, he wonderfully caressed his old fellow-servant Maybury, informs him of the several proclamations, narratives, and other transactions at London, shews him how much the world was mended with him, tells him how easy it is, not only to get a pardon for any former felony, forgeries, &c. but to make ones fortunes for ever, and also to be revenged on all enemies. And that certainly the lady Tempest (daughter to sir Thomas Gascoigne) could not be deemed his friend, who had so defamed him, and blasted his reputation in her noise about her trunk, and the monies taken from the family, which in time might have a worse effect, and he suffer for it, when too late to repent the loss of this golden opportunity to destroy her and secure himself.

Maybury thus won in a few days, declares himself a witness, notwithstanding he had a few days before protested to several, (who were amazed at sir Thomas's charge) that he believed him to be most unjustly accused; nay Bolron was so pleased with his new conquest, that he over my estate to sir William Ingleby, to prevent a forfeiture.

L. C. J. What said sir Miles Stapleton?

Bolton. I do not know what he said very well.

L. C. J. You seemed but now, as if he had said he was in the Plot.

tells a young woman, (whom Maybury courted) that she might marry him now with satisfaction, for that he had engaged him, the said Maybury, in a business against sir Thomas, and that he should be well rewarded out of his estate, and come to great preferment. Methods and circumstances being now fully settled and agreed upon by them, Maybury goes to Mr. Tyndal and Lowther, justices of peace, and acquaints them in short of his business; whereupon the 16th of August the said Maybury informs them upon oath, (and as it appears in his narrative more at large) that sir Thomas Gascoigne and sir Miles Stapleton had made deeds of trust of their estates, and that about Michaelmas 1676, sir Thomas, his son Mr. Thomas, the lady Tempest, and Mr. Rushton, being in Barnbow dining room, he heard them holding several discourses concerning killing the king, and firing of London and York, &c. —That there was in the house one Dr. Stapleton, who coming from another room, and finding him at the door, went in, and in a low voice desired them to forbear their discourse, for there was one at the door.—And thereupon her ladyship called him in, and sent him down to entertain some strangers; and that he heard several discourses from sir Thomas and Rushton about a nunnery to be established at Dolebank, and of sir Thomas's selling 90l. per annum for maintaining it.

Whilst Maybury was hugging himself with Bolton, that this information would suddenly be at the council board, he found more than a fortnight passed, and no manner of notice taken of him, his impatience prompts him the last of that month to write to sir John Nicholas, that there were divers material circumstances relating to his discovery, which were not inserted in his first information before the justices, which should be declared when the council should command a full account from him. Upon this he had a summons by a messenger sent him on purpose, and a letter superscribed To Mr. Lawrence Mowbray, at his house in Yorkshire; and so repairing to London on the 2nd of October following, he informed justice Warcup by order of council upon oath, that he had not discovered all he knew of the horrid plot, for fear of Yorkshire papists, whom he was to detect: but now would do it, conceiving himself under the protection of the council, and hoping that they would intercede for his pardon.

There wanted not several of different conceptions, who (on occasion of the imperfect and defective management of this trial, by reason of the prisoner's being decayed, as well in mind as body) did speak and vote variously of Justice Jones. Did he own he was in the Plot?

Bolton. Yes.

L. C. J. When?

Bolton. At several times.

the success, so that some of the jury moved at it, did give out minutes of the trial, and the reasons which led them to their verdict, to many of their acquaintance, and in reality who conversed the prisoner more intimately did perceive he was become very incapable and unfit for such a performance, being doted with years, his sense decayed, and his mind dissolved and abstracted of late from conversation. The pamphlets of the age have made him since his trial a fugitive beyond seas; but his unsatiable prosecutors have him in fresh pursuit here on new pretences, and have wearied the Attorney General with search and exposition of the laws, to bind and fasten him on some new tetter; yet the old gentleman prays for them and the nation; his life is at the king's service, and his soul travelling to his Creator, who hath also witnessed for him, given him length of days on the land, a blessing promised of old to those who honour and obey their superiors, as he professes to have done, and hopes it will appear better when some of those persons come upon their last pillow, where God grant them his grace and true repentance. 'Magna est veritas et prævalēbit.'

AN ATTESTATION of a certain Intercourse had between ROBERT BOLTON, and Mr. THOMAS LANGHORN, (mistaken by Bolton for Mr. Ja. Corker) wherein is manifested the Falshood and Perjury of the said Bolton.

On the 22nd of July 1679, there came to the Press yard adjacent to Newgate two persons, the one called himself by the name of Baker, and the other called himself by the name of James. Baker declared he was the man who had accused Mrs. Praswite, and Mr. Thwing, and is now known to be Bolton. These persons told the Turnkey they came to speak with Mr. Corker: Hereupon they were led into a drinking room, and Mr. Corker was called; but he having experienced the falsified oaths of others who had never seen him, and happily reflecting these might be such, desired Mr. Thomas Langhorn, who was by chance there, to go down and see who they were; to which Mr. Tho. Langhorn did; and coming into the company of Bolton, this discourse followed. Mr. Langhorn said, Would you speak with me? Bolton answered, Your servant Mr. Corker. Mr. Langhorn said, Do you know me? Bolton answered, Yes, I know you well, you will not deny yourself to be Mr. Corker? Mr. Langhorn said, Deny myself? what are you? what is your name? Bolton answered, You know my wife well, and I know you well, and I have known you several years, and seen you in such and such places, (which places he named.)

Bolron. My Lord, in 1676, I did hear sir T. Gascoigne say to one Christopher Metcalfe, that he was resolved to send 3,000*l.* to the Jesuits in London for the carrying on of the design.

L. C. J. What time in 1676?

Bolron. The beginning of the year 1676.

L. C. J. To whom did he say so?

Bolron. To one Christopher Metcalfe.

L. C. J. Were you a papist then?

Bolron. Yes.

L. C. J. When came you first to be a papist?

Bolron. About Whitsuntide, 1675.

Just. Jones. You are a Protestant now?

Bolron. Yes my Lord, I am so.

L. C. J. When did you turn Protestant again?

Bolron. I turned Protestant upon the discovery of this business.

L. C. J. When?

Bolron. Either the beginning of May, or the latter end of June.

L. C. J. To whom did he speak it?

Bolron. To Christopher Metcalfe, who then lived in his house.

L. C. J. What said he?

Bolron. He said it was to send 3,000*l.* to the Jesuits in London, for the carrying on of this design.

L. C. J. Who was in the room besides?

Bolron. None but sir T. Gascoigne and Metcalfe.

L. C. J. Where is that Metcalfe?

Bolron. He is since dead, I think.

L. C. J. What discourse had they about the design?

Bolron. They were discoursing about it when I came in; and I remember he mentioned 300*l.* for Corker, 300*l.* for Harcourt, and 300*l.* for Cornwallis; and the rest by 300*l.* a-piece to other persons.

Att. Gen. What name did Cornwallis go by besides?

Bolron. Pracid, my Lord.

Att. Gen. That is the name that is to the letter.

Just. Pemberton. Well, what do you know more?

Bolron. My Lord, sir T. Gascoigne told this Christ. Metcalfe, that he would return it by 300*l.* at a time, to prevent suspicion, by the hands of Richard Phisick; and about the beginning of 1677, I did hear sir T. Gascoigne say, of bribe. Bolron answered No, I will take nothing by that name. This is the substance of this intercourse, and will be attested to be true, as it is here respectively set down.

Now notwithstanding this so often repeated confident asseveration of Bolron's intimate acquaintance and familiarity with Mr. Corker, seconded here by so many pretended circumstantial instances of known friendship with him; yet it is most certain, that he never knew or saw Mr. Corker, till this before mentioned intercourse at Newgate: As is palpably manifest, both in that he took Mr. Langhorn for Mr. Corker, and conversed with him as such in the very presence of Mr. Corker. And also in that Mr. Corker being brought to Bolron's face before the lords of his majesty's privy council on the 13th of this present October, he denied Mr. Corker to be the man that was shewn to him at Newgate. And after a long and full view had of Mr. Corker, he durst not positively affirm, that the person there present was he against whom he had any thing to say; but expressing himself doubtfully, desired time of deliberation in it.

These notorious undeniable contradictions, will it is hoped, convince judicious men, that no credit ought to be given, in a matter of no less than High-Treason, to an indigent wretch of a lost conscience, and condemned of falsehood by the testimony of his own mouth.

We under-written do respectively testify, That what is here said of the intercourse had between Mr. Bolron, and Mr. Thomas Langhorn, is true in the whole, and every part thereof. Witness our hands the 12th day of January, 1679.

Witnessed in the presence of E. Smith, Jonathan Grove, Francis Lees, Tho. Matchet, Books Bookey, Tho. Langhorn.

After some time spent in discourse to this and the like effect, Mr. Corker himself, together with an under clerk of the press yard, came into their company; but Bolron neither owning nor knowing Mr. Corker, the discourse continued, amongst other things, (Bolron still addressing himself to Mr. Langhorn) affirmed several times, That he knew him to be Mr. Corker, and confirmed it by often calling him Mr. Corker, and saying to him, I have seen you sometimes in the company of Mr. Hubbert, and sometimes in the company of Mr. Pepper, in the company of Mr. Haskit, and several others; I have seen you in London, and in the country in Yorkshire. Using further expressions of a long endeared familiarity with him. At length Mr. Corker, wearied with his impertinencies, going out of the room, Bolron enquired who that gentleman was? Soon after the turnkey coming by chance in, with wine and tobacco, Bolron in the presence of the said turnkey, Mr. Thomas Langhorn, and the said under clerk, called Mr. Langhorn by the name of Mr. Corker, and said he knew him; and being desired by Mr. Langhorn to tell what he knew of him he again positively affirmed, that he knew him; and added in the presence of the aforesaid witnesses these words, I know you to be a priest, and I have seen you say mass.

The under clerk admiring the impudence of Bolron, herein jestingly told him, that seeing he pretended so much friendship and acquaintance with Mr. Corker, he would do well to do him a kindness in not revealing what he knew; and if you do him a pennyworth of kindness, said the said clerk, Mr. Corker will give you a pound for it. Bolron answered, Ay, then something may be done. Mr. Langhorn, who all this while was supposed by the said Bolron to be Mr. Corker, replied, I will give nothing by way that he had returned it, and that if it had been a thousand times as much, he would be glad to spend it all in so good a cause.

L. C. J. Did he say he had returned all the 3,000*l.*?

Bolton. Yes.

L. C. J. Did he tell you how it was to be disposed of?

Bolton. It was to be disposed among the Jesuits for the carrying on of the design.

L. C. J. That was in the general; but this 900*l.* you speak of was to those three priests?

Bolton. Yes.

Just. Jones. You say he resolved to send 3,000*l.* to the Jesuits at London about this design: pray what was the design? What did they say about the Plot at that time?

Bolton. My Lord, at other times I have heard them say it was for killing the king.

L. C. J. What said Metcalfe to all this?

Bolton. He did allow of it, and thought it was the best way so to do. I have seen him return several sums by Richard Phisick.

Justice Dolben. Was Metcalfe a papist?

Bolton. Yes, and he died so, as I have heard.

L. C. J. Was you in the room when they first began the discourse?

Bolton. No, my lord, I came in when they were discoursing.

L. C. J. You came in when they were talking, you say; but they did not stop talking because you came in?

Bolton. No, my lord, because I knew of it; I was brought in by one Rushton, who was acquainted with the plot, to know of it, and therefore they did not stop me when I came in.

L. C. J. You say he said, I will return 3,000*l.* to the Jesuits in London: Did he say in what time he would send that 3,000*l.*?

Bolton. No, but in 1676 he said he would do it.

L. C. J. And it should be employed for carrying on of the design?

Bolton. Yes, those were the words.

L. C. J. And in 1677 you heard him talk with Metcalfe again? And then he said, If it had been a thousand times as much he would have sent it?

Bolton. Yes.

L. C. J. Was nobody there but he, sir T. Gascoigne, and you?

Bolton. Nobody else.

L. C. J. Then go on with your evidence.

Bolton. My lord, in 1677 several gentlemen did meet and assemble together at Barnbow-hall in the county of York, sir T. Gascoigne's house; and their resolution was this, That they would build a nunnery at Dolebank, in case that their design and plot of killing the king should take effect, and the Roman catholic religion be established in England; upon which account, the company there present did resolve they would lose their lives and estates to further it; And sir T. Gascoigne did conclude he would give 90*l.* a year for ever for the maintenance of this nunnery; upon which they all agreed, that after his death he should be canonized a saint.

L. C. J. Who were these gentlemen?

Bolton. Sir Miles Stapleton, Charles Ingleby, esq. Gascoigne, my lady Tempest, Thomas Thwing, sir Walter Vevasor, sir Francis Hungatt, and Robert Killingbeck, a Jesuit, and William Rushton a Romish priest.

Justice Pemberton. Is he dead?

Bolton. No, he is fled beyond sea.

L. C. J. Who else?

Bolton. These are the persons I can remember at present.

L. C. J. There was a woman there, you say?

Bolton. My lady Tempest, my lord, and one William Rushton, if you had not him before.

Justice Dolben. That was your confessor?

Bolton. Yes, and engaged me in the plot.

Justice Pemberton. What was your discourse? Pray tell that.

Bolton. The discourse was upon establishing a nunnery at Dolebank, in hopes that the plot of killing the king would take effect; the intention was to alter the government, and to introduce the Romish religion.

L. C. J. Who was it said this?

Bolton. It was spoken by sir T. Gascoigne, and the rest of the gentlemen.

L. C. J. In their discourse?

Bolton. Yes.

L. C. J. Did they speak of killing the king?

Bolton. Yes, my lord, sir Francis Hungatt said it several times.

L. C. J. How? Upon what account?

Bolton. They were mutually resolved, and they would talk that they would venture their lives and estates in hopes that the plot would take effect; and accordingly about Michaelmas 1677, or near upon, as I remember—

L. C. J. How long staid they there?

Bolton. About six or seven hours.

L. C. J. Were you with them in the room still?

Bolton. My lord, I was sometimes in the room, and sometimes out: What discourse I heard, I tell you; there was one Barloe—

L. C. J. What was that Barloe?

Bolton. I have had two orders of council for the seizing of him, and never could take him; he is a priest.

L. C. J. Was he by?

Bolton. He went with them to take possession of the nunnery.

L. C. J. Was he not in the house?

Bolton. No, not in the room at that time.

L. C. J. Was there any servant by in the room when this discourse was?

Bolton. No.

L. C. J. Well, go on.

Bolton. Accordingly sir T. Gascoigne did erect a nunnery about the year 1677, at Dolebank.

L. C. J. What, built it?

Bolton. He established it.

L. C. J. Who were the nuns?

Bolton. Mrs. Lashals was lady abess, Mrs. Beckwith and Mrs. Benningfield were her assistants, Elling Thwing, Eliz. Butcher, and others, were nuns, according as I heard sir T. Gascoigne say; and when they went by sir T. Gascoigne, when one Mary Root was taking horse, sir T. Gascoigne said of her, There goes an old maid and a young nun.

L. C. J. Whither were they going then?

Bolton. To take possession of the nunnery.

L. C. J. Was it a new built house?

Bolton. They called it a nunnery in hopes their plot would take effect.

L. C. J. Was it an old or a new built house?

Bolton. Nay, I never saw it.

L. C. J. Whereabouts was this house?

Bolton. It was near Ripley.

L. C. J. What was that Ripley his house?

Bolton. No, his house is at Barnbow.

L. C. J. Who did it belong to?

Bolton. They went thither till the business was done, and that was only till the king was killed, and afterwards they resolved to reside at Heworth.

L. C. J. How long staid they there?

Bolton. They lived in this place near a year and half.

L. C. J. Till the plot was discovered?

Bolton. Yes.

Justice Jones. How do you know they lived there?

Bolton. I have seen several times letters come from their hands.

Justice Jones. How do you know they came from thence?

Bolton. The letters were dated from Dolebank.

L. C. J. Did he let them lie open?

Bolton. Sometimes he did.

L. C. J. What was in them.

Bolton. I don't know any of the particulars, there was no great matter in them.

L. C. J. Who writ them?

Bolton. The name that I saw was Pracid, or from Mrs. Lashals.

Att. Gen. They, or some of them.

L. C. J. You do not know whose house it was?—Bolton. No, my lord, not I.

L. C. J. Where is Heworth-hall?

Bolton. Heworth-hall is about half a mile off of York.

Justice Dolben. Does not that belong to one Mr. Dawson?

Bolton. It did, but it was bought of him.

Att. Gen. What other place did you hear him mention?

Bolton. Broughton, my lord, but I never knew that any were there.

L. C. J. Nor at Heworth-hall?

Bolton. Yes, my lord, sometimes one and sometimes the other; some of them came to Heworth-hall, and some to Dolebank, but Dolebank was the place they did generally reside at: And then sir Thomas did establish 90*l.* a year, which was purchased of Mr. T. Malazerer, and Alver Aloftus enjoys it.

L. C. J. How much was it?

Bolton. 90*l.* a year.

L. C. J. Where does it lie?

Bolton. It lies at a place called Mawson, near sir T. Gascoigne's house.

L. C. J. Did he say he had sealed such a conveyance?

Justice Dolben. I suppose he bought it of Dawson.

Bolton. He bought it of Maleverer.

L. C. J. Is Maleverer a protestant?

Bolton. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Where is he?

Bolton. I can't tell.

Justice Jones. You did not see the conveyance of it yourself sealed?

Bolton. No, I refer to their words for that.

Justice Jones. To what purpose was it bought?

Bolton. To establish a nunnery.

Justice Pemberton. And they told him he should be canonized for a saint when he died.

Bolton. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Well, go on, then.

Bolton. My lord, about March last, to the best of my remembrance, sir T. Gascoigne and esquire Gascoigne being in their chamber together, I was reading a book called 'The Lives of the Saints,' and esquire Gascoigne told sir Thomas that he had been before the justices of the peace, and they had given to him and Mr. Middleton license to go up to London, which mentioned, that in consideration that there was a suit in law between James Nelthorp, esq. and sir T. Gascoigne, therefore it permitted the said T. Gascoigne, esq. and his man to travel peaceably to London. And I did hear the other copy read of Mr. Middleton's license to travel in the south, and for his occasion into the south parts was pretended to receive some rents there. But I did hear esquire Gascoigne say to sir Thomas, that he was resolved as soon as he came to London, and had done with Mr. Nelthorp, that he would fly into France, and so cheat the justices, for he was resolved not to come back to Yorkshire again, but he would commit the design in agitation into such hands as would do it, and would not fail, but he would not stay to see execution.

L. C. J. You heard him say so?

Bolton. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. What said sir Thomas?

Bolton. He commended his son's and Mr. Middleton's resolutions.

L. C. J. What room was it in?

Bolton. It was in sir Thomas's own chamber.

L. C. J. Were there any rooms near it?

Bolton. None that they could hear in, unless in the chamber within, I do not know whether any one was there or no.

L. C. J. Could they hear in no room that was near to them?

Bolton. Yes, in the chamber within.

L. C. J. Was there no servant there?

Bolton. Not as I know.

L. C. J. My reason is, because he must speak very loud to make his father hear him.

Bolton. Yes, he did, for I heard him in the chamber-window that I stood in against them, they were a little way off me.

L. C. J. Because, if any of the servants were near, methinks they must needs be very cautious how they spoke so loud to make sir T. Gascoigne hear.

Bolton. My lord, he was not so deaf then as they say he is, and he seems to be now. And esquire Gascoigne also, because he would be sure there should no damage come to him, caused all his goods to be sold off his ground, and Mr. Middleton sold his very household-goods.

L. C. J. He is a Papist too, is he not?

Bolton. Yes, he is so.

L. C. J. Was not he at the meeting with sir Miles Stapleton?

Bolton. Yes, Mr. Middleton was one.

L. C. J. You did not name him before.

Just. Pemberton. But he said a great many were there besides those he named.

Just. Dolben. Yes, he did so. Well, go on, Sir.

Bolton. My lord, last 30th of May, the day after holy Thursday, as I remember, being in sir T. Gascoigne's own chamber, sir Thomas bid me go into the gallery next to the priest's lodgings, and after a little time one William Rushton, my confessor, came to me, and asked me, if I was at the last Pontefract sessions? I told him, Yes, and that I had taken the oath of Allegiance, as others had done: Whereupon the said Rushton told me, that I and all the others were damned for so doing, if we kept the same; therefore he bid me be sure to come next Sunday to have absolution from him; for it was a damnable sin to take that oath, and he told me, he had power from the pope to absolve me; and he added, that few priests had that power that he had.

L. C. J. Did he make you confess that as a sin to him?

Bolton. No, my lord, for I did make the discovery soon after.

L. C. J. When was it you first turned Protestant?

Bolton. In June, my lord, after that.

L. C. J. Then you were not a Protestant at that time?

Bolton. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Were you a Papist when you took the oath of allegiance?

Bolton. Yes, my lord, I was.

L. C. J. Why would not you, then, go and be absolved according as your priest bid you?

Bolton. I thought I had done nothing that was evil, because several had taken oath with me, as you shall hear afterward.

L. C. J. Well, go on.

Bolton. I told him that several others had done it as well as I, that were papists, and they judged it lawful; whereupon he said, away, and told me I was a fool, and knew not how to judge of an oath.

L. C. J. So you were satisfied the papists might take the oath?

Bolton. My lord, I told him I thought it was no sin to take that oath, because it was an oath only to be true to my king and to my country; and I told him that Mr. Ellis, a priest to Mr. Vavasour, had written commentaries upon the oath, and justified the taking of it. Said he again, Mr. Ellis was a fool, and his superiors will call him to an account, and check him for his pains. But, said he, by taking the oath you have denied the power of the pope to absolve you from it; but I tell you he hath power to depose the king, and had done it: And, said he, you will merit Heaven if you will kill him.

L. C. J. Who spoke to you?

Bolton. Rushton, my lord, said it was a meritorious act to kill the king.

L. C. J. But did sir Thomas Gascoigne, or any of the company, wish you to do that thing?

Bolton. Not at that meeting; but afterwards sir Thomas did, my lord, if you will give me leave to go on.

L. C. J. What did he say?

Bolton. He told me he would assist me in the act.

L. C. J. Who?

Bolton. Rushton did. And he told me the pope had granted him the power, that I should have the benefit of absolution if I would do it. I desired him not to persuade me to do such a thing, for I would have no hand in it; then he quoted a certain place of Scripture to me, which was, 'Thou shalt bind their kings in fetters, and their princes in chains.' Whereupon he concluded, and made this exposition, that the pope, had deposed the king, and absolved all his subjects, and it was a meritorious act to kill the king. And that unless the king would turn Roman Catholic, the pope would give away his kingdoms to another.

L. C. J. Well, go on.

Bolton. Then I told him I would have no hand in that act and deed; whereupon he answered me again, You may hang me, if you please, for speaking these words. No, Sir, said I, I will do you no injury, if you do yourself none. So he bid me consider what he said, and come to him again, but I did not.

L. C. J. This was the 30th of May?

Bolton. Yes, and the same day as soon as I came down, I was told sir Thomas Gascoigne had left order with his servants that I should not depart the house till he came in, and I stayed there till about six of the clock.

L. C. J. Did not you live with him then?

Bolton. I lived a little way off the house.

L. C. J. How far?

Bolton. About a quarter of a mile.

L. C. J. Were you not his servant?

Bolton. No, my lord, not at that time.

Just. Jones. How long had you been gone out of his service before?

Bolton. I went out of his service about the beginning of July 1678.

Just. Pemberton. Did sir T. Gascoigne send you into this gallery?

Bolton. Yes, my lord.

Just. Pemberton. And there you found Rushton?

Bolton. My lord, he was not there when I came, but he came as it were from chapel.

L. C. J. You were his servant when all the gentlemen met at his house?

Bolton. Yes, my lord, I was.

L. C. J. When did you leave his service, say you?

Bolton. The 1st of July 1678.

L. C. J. And this was in May, 1678, was it not?

Bolton. No, in 1679, my lord, last May. My lord, I watched and stayed till he came in, and took him as he came in. I went up stairs with him, and when he came into his chamber he calls me to him, and asked me what discourse had passed between me and Rushton? I told him our discourse was concerning the oath of allegiance, and the lawfulness or unlawfulness of it. Then sir T. Gascoigne took me by the hand, and told me, Well, man, if thou wilt undertake a design that I and others have to kill the king, I will give thee 1,000*l.* and I will send thee to my son Thomas, if he be in town; but if he be not in town, he said he would give me such instructions that I should find the rest that were concerned in the business—

L. C. J. The rest, what?

Bolton. The rest that were in the Plot.

L. C. J. That you should know where to find them in London, you mean so?

Bolton. Yes, my lord, if he were gone beyond sea.

L. C. J. What said you to him?

Bolton. My lord, I told him I would have no hand in blood, and would not do such a wicked deed, and desired him to persuade me no more. Then he desired me of all love to keep secret what he had said. But afterwards I recollected that it was a very ill thing, and went immediately to the justices of the peace—

L. C. J. How soon did you go?

Bolton. Soon after.

L. C. J. To whom did you go?

Bolton. To Mr. Tindal, a justice of peace, and to Mr. Normanton.

L. C. J. Did you make an oath there?

Bolton. Yes, that sir Thomas promised me 1,000*l.*

L. C. J. And for what purpose?

Bolton. For killing the king.

L. C. J. Did you put that in the oath you made?

Bolton. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. What time was this after the discourse?

Bolton. It was about a week, or such a time.

L. C. J. Was it the next day?

Bolton. No.

L. C. J. Was it within a fortnight?

Bolton. Yes, I believe it was, my lord.

L. C. J. Was it not a month?

Bolton. No, it was not above a fortnight, for

vol. VII.

sir T. Gascoigne was apprehended in July or thereabouts, I believe, my lord.

L. C. J. But was that the first time that sir Thomas ever spake to you to kill the king, the 30th of May?

Bolton. Yes, my lord.

Justice Jones. You say you left sir Thomas's service in July, 1678?

Bolton. Yes, the first day of July.

L. C. J. How? Did you leave him in good friendship?

Bolton. Yes, my lord, in very good friendship.

Justice Jones. Were you in good correspondence?

Bolton. I always went to his house to hear-mats, and oftentimes was there.

L. C. J. How came you to leave his service?

Bolton. It was my own fault I left it.

L. C. J. Why, it might be no fault neither. But why did you leave it?

Bolton. My lord, it was because there was one Henry Addison and Bennet Johnson did seek to take my work and service out of my hands. Sir Thomas Gascoigne did desire me to let them come in and see what they could do, and that I should have my salary, and that I should gather in his debts; I was willing to be rid of it, and told him, they that looked after the pit should gather in the debts, for I conceived else it would be but a double charge to him.

Justice Dolben. This is only how he left sir Thomas's service; sir Thomas thought the other men could do it better than he, and so, said he, then let them do your whole work.

Justice Jones. But he says he did usually resort to the house after he had left his service, to hear mass.

Justice Dolben. They will ask him some questions, it may be.

L. C. J. Had you any estate of your own when you left sir Thomas's service?

Bolton. Yes, I had a farm I rented of sir T. Gascoigne.

L. C. J. What rent?

Bolton. 15*l.* and a mark a year, after I was married.

L. C. J. When were you married?

Bolton. In July 1675, but afterwards I was there, and did still service.

Att. Gen. I think you have some estate of your own besides that?

Bolton. Yes, I have 7*l.* a year.

Att. Gen. Well, will you for sir Thomas ask him any questions?

Babbington. No.

L. C. J. Mr. Bolton, Pray what did the justice say to you when you made this oath?

Bolton. My lord, thus: I was resolved to come to London, and make my confession here, and desired I might so do; whereupon one of the justices was unwilling, but at last they said I might do what I would.

L. C. J. You say, justice Tindal it was sworn before, what did he say when you made the oath?

Bolton. My lord, as I remember, he said, he must give the council an account of it, and perhaps he should not have an answer of it in a month after; so I thought it was better to come to London, and make a speedy dispatch of the business; for I did not know but the priests in the mean time might escape.

L. C. J. But did Mr. Tindal do nothing upon that oath that was made?

Bolton. Yes, he did make out his warrant for the apprehending of one.

L. C. J. Did he not make out a warrant for the apprehending of sir T. Gascoigne?

Bolton. My lord, I think they would have done it, but I desired I might come to the council.

Justice Pemberton. How long after came you there?

Bolton. As soon as I could get ready.

L. C. J. What time came you thither?

Bolton. My lord, I set out upon Monday, and came hither to London upon Wednesday.

L. C. J. Do you know what month it was in?—Bolton. In June it was, I think.

L. C. J. And who did you come and apply yourself so in London, when you came there?

Bolton. My lord, I had a letter directed from Mr. Justice Tindal to his brother Tindal in London, to carry me to the council. I chanced to lose this letter at Ware, and losing it there, I came to the Green Dragon in Bishops-gate street, I was acquainted with the man of the house, and having told him some of my business, he carried me before sir Robert Clayton, and then we went to my lord of Shaftesbury, president of the council, and presently got an order of the council about me.

L. C. J. How long was this after Dr. Oates's discovery? When did Oates and Bedlow make their discovery?

Justice Pemberton. This was a long time after, in May last.

Justice Jones. Did Mr. Tindal take your examination in writing?

Bolton. He took a short thing in writing.

Justice Jones. Did you set your hand to it?

Justice Pemberton. He resolved to go to the council, and tell them.

Bolton. I was not willing to tell the justices all, for I had a mind to go to the council.

Justice Jones. But you told them the great matter of all, sir Thomas's proffer to give you 1,000*l.* to kill the king?

Bolton. Yes.

Justice Jones. Had you a lease of your farm under sir T. Gascoigne?

Bolton. It was but a lease paroll.

Justice Jones. For how long?

Bolton. For 9 years.

Babbington. May I have leave to ask him any questions?

Court. Yes, yes, you may.

Mr. Babbington. You say you had a lease of the farm, a lease paroll?

Bolton. Yes, I had so.

Serj. Maynard. Counsel must not be allowed in matter of fact, my lord.

L. C. J. But brother, this man hath made a long narrative.

Serj. Maynard. Ay, and a shrewd one too.

L. C. J. His evidence is very great, and sir T. Gascoigne does not hear any one word.

Bolton. One thing more I would speak to. It was in September 1678, a little before the discovery of the Plot, I did hear sir Thomas Gascoigne say, and tell my lady Tempest, that he would send 150*l.* to Dolebank, in hopes the blow would be given shortly.

Serj. Maynard. That is the same word used by all the witnesses.

L. C. J. When was this?

Bolton. In September 1678; the Plot was not known by us to be discovered then as I know of.

L. C. J. Who did he speak it to?

Bolton. To his daughter, the lady Tempest.

L. C. J. What said she?

Bolton. She seemed to like it very well; I did not hear any thing to the contrary; and I heard a letter read afterwards from Cornwallis, that he had received it, but it was too little for the carrying on so great a design.

L. C. J. Who is Cornwallis?

Bolton. And it was for the naming the poor catholics when the blow should be given.

L. C. J. Is his daughter living?

Att. Gen. Yes, she is out under bail.

Recorder. My lord, I shall desire to ask but one question, which concerns the prisoner at the bar how long after the discourse that you had with the priest in the Gallery was it that sir T. Gascoigne spoke to you of the same thing?

Just. Pemberton. Mr. Recorder, if you ask him but one question, let it not be that which he hath answered before; he says the same day.

Mr. Hobart. I desire to ask him one question.

Just. Pemberton. No, tell sir Thomas first what he hath said, and see if he will ask him any questions.

Mr. Hobart. Sir Thomas, here is Mr. Bolton hath given evidence against you, will you ask him any questions?

Just. Pemberton. Read your minutes to him.

Then Mr. Hobart repeated the first part, about his coming to sir T. Gascoigne's service, and the Colliery conveyance.

Just. Jones. Ask him if he will ask any questions upon this part. Which he did.

Sir T. Gasc. No, it is no great matter at all, for it is true; when it was I cannot tell, there was something I did seal to sir William Lashby, and some money I had of him.

Then Mr. Hobart repeated his saying to Metcalfe, he would send 3,000*l.* to the priest in 1676.

Sir T. Gasc. How comes that? I deny that utterly.

Bolton. It is all true that I have said, by the oath that I have taken.

Sir T. Gasc. There is no such thing at all.

Mr. Hobart. He says it was returned by Mr. Phinwick.

Sir T. Gascoigne. This was a servant to me, and returned some money for me sometimes, but it was all for my children, my sons and my daughters, and my kinspeople, to whom I paid annuities; but it was a far greater sum of the whole than 3,000*l.* and for one great sum of 1,000*l.*, you know how it was disposed of.

Mr. Hobart. He says, that in the beginning of 1677, you said you had returned this 3,000*l.* to London, and if you had a thousand times as much, you would give it for so good cause.

Sir T. Gascoigne. I never said any such thing, never thought of any such thing in my life.

L. C. J. Now tell him of the meeting at Barnbow.

Mr. Hobart. He says, in the year 1677 there were several gentlemen met at your house at Barnbow.

L. C. J. Name them. [Which he did.]

Mr. Hobart. These were all altogether with you.

Sir T. Gascoigne. No such matter at all.

Mr. Hobart. And he said all those persons did discourse with you about establishing a nursery at Dolebank, and another at Heworth, and another at Broughton.

Sir T. Gascoigne. Not one word of all this is true.

L. C. J. Tell him what he said concerning killing the king.

Mr. Hobart. He says that the nursery was established at Dolebank, and such and such were nursed.

Sir T. Gascoigne. He may say what he will, but not one word of all this is true.

Just. Dolben. But you skip over the main thing, what the gentlemen resolved upon, at that meeting.

Mr. Hobart. He says, these gentlemen did resolve the business should go on for the killing of the king, and that they would venture their lives and estates for it.

Sir T. Gascoigne. I never heard of any such thing as killing the king. Sir, did I ever say any such thing?

Bolton. It was in your own dining-room, and in your own chamber.

Just. Pemberton. He did not say so, I think, about their meeting.

L. C. J. Yes, he says they all met at his house, and there they had discourse of killing the king. In what room was it?

Bolton. In the old dining-room.

Sir T. Gascoigne. I deny it utterly; there was no such thing: some persons might be at several times at my house, but no such meeting, nor words at all at one time or other.

Then Mr. Hobart told him of Mr. Gascoigne's and Mr. Middleton's licences to go to London, and intention to go to France.

Sir T. Gascoigne. It is very true, my son did go to London for that end.

Mr. Hobart. And so Mr. Middleton, upon pretence of receiving rent.

Sir T. Gascoigne. I cannot tell about Mr. Middleton.

Mr. Hobart. He says, your son would inmedially fly into France, and commit the design into other hands: and you said you approved of it: And this he heard you discourse very plainly.

Sir T. Gascoigne. But I plainly deny it all.

Mr. Hobart. He says you bid him go on (the 30th of May) to the gallery, to Mr. Rushton.

L. C. J. No, not to him, but when he was in the gallery, Rushton came to him.

Then Mr. Hobart repeated the discourse with Rushton about the Oath of Allegiance.

L. C. J. You need not tell him what Rushton said.

Just. Dolben. Yes, my Lord, it is convenient.

Bolton. For I told him our discourse about the Oath of Allegiance myself.

Then Hobart repeated sir Thomas's further discourse and proffer to him.

Sir T. Gascoigne. There is nothing of all this true: he might come there and talk with any body, for what I know, but I was not with him.

L. C. J. But ask him what he says to this, that he proffered him 1,000*l.* to kill the king. [Which he did.]

Sir T. Gascoigne. Where should you be paid it?

Bolton. I would not undertake the design.

Sir T. Gascoigne. Did you ever know I was master of 300*l.* together in my life?

Bolton. Yes.

L. C. J. Tell him he says he would not undertake it, and therefore it was in vain to appoint where.

Sir T. Gascoigne. I utterly deny it all, upon my life; that is even just like the rest, I never heard it before.

L. C. J. He puts it to you, whether ever you saw him have 300*l.* together?

Bolton. I have seen 500*l.* at a time in the house, and I have seen in Phisick's hand 700*l.* [Which was repeated to him.]

Sir T. Gascoigne. What Phisick might have of other men's monies I do not know, he never had so much money of mine.

Bolton. My Lord, sir T. Gascoigne, I believe had at that time at least 1,300*l.* a year of his own estate. [Which was repeated to him.]

Sir T. Gascoigne. I wish he would make it good.

Bolton. My Lord, it is true enough: I believe he hath settled some estate upon his son, about 600*l.* a year.

L. C. J. I can't tell what becomes of the papists estates, nor how the priests drain them, but there are men of very great estates among them, but they are greatly in debt.

Mr. Hobart. Will you ask Mr. Bolton any questions?

Just. Jones. You have not repeated to him one part of the evidence; that in September, 1678, he said to my lady Tempest, he would send 150*l.* to Dolebank, in hopes the blow would be given shortly. [Which was then repeated to him.]

Sir T. Gascoigne. I know no such thing at all; there is not one word of all this true.

Mr. Hobart. Will you ask him any questions, or no?

Sir T. Gascoigne. I know not what questions to ask, but where the money should be paid?

L. C. J. That can be no question, for the thing was never undertaken.

Att. Gen. Then pray, Mr. Mowbray, tell your knowledge.

Mr. Mowbray. My Lord, and you gentlemen of the jury, I came to sir T. Gascoigne's in the beginning of 1674.

L. C. J. Were you his servant?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, my Lord, but never an hired servant.

L. C. J. In what quality did you serve him?

Mr. Mowbray. In his chamber, my Lord, and continued with sir Thomas until 1676, in which time I did observe Mr. Thomas Addison, a priest, Fincham, a priest, Stapleton, a priest, Killingbeck, a priest, and Thwing, the elder and the younger, several times to visit and confer with Mr. William Rushton, sir T. Gascoigne's confessor.

L. C. J. Were you a papist then?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, I was.

L. C. J. Are you one now?

Mr. Mowbray. No.

L. C. J. Well go on then.

Mr. Mowbray. I being very diligent in attending Mr. Rushton at the altar, I became in great favour with him, and was permitted to be in the chamber when the priests were in private with him, and I heard them often talk and discourse of a design laid for setting the popish religion uppermost in England, and how like the same was to take effect in a short time.

L. C. J. Who did speak it?

Mr. Mowbray. The priests in private with Mr. Rushton: I speak now, my Lord, of the Plot in general; I come to sir T. Gascoigne anon.

L. C. J. When? In what year was this discourse?

Mr. Mowbray. In 1676.

L. C. J. Well, what said they?

Mr. Mowbray. Why they discoursed concerning the setting up the popish religion in England, and how like the same was to take effect, and succeed, in regard that most of the considerable papists in England had engaged to act for it; and if it could not be done by fair means, force must be used; and particularly declared, that London and York were to be fired.

L. C. J. In 1676?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes.

L. C. J. What? Would they fire it again?

Mr. Mowbray. And I heard them often say that the king in exile had promised them—

L. C. J. Did they say the city was to be fired a second time?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, to further their intentions.

Serj. Maynard. It was effected in Southwark.

Mr. Mowbray. And they did also declare, That the king, when he was in his exile, had promised the Jesuits beyond sea to establish their religion whenever he was restored; which they now despaired of, and therefore he was adjudged an heretic, and was to be killed.

L. C. J. Who did say this?

Mr. Mowbray. The Priests.

L. C. J. Who was the heretic?

Mr. Mowbray. The king. Also I did hear Mr. William Rushton tell Addison and the rest of the priests—

L. C. J. Do you know which of the priests said the king was to be killed?

Mr. Mowbray. It was Rushton: Rushton and Addison were together, and he did declare to Mr. Addison, that according to agreement, he had given the oath of secrecy and the Sacrament to sir T. Gascoigne, esq. Gascoigne his son, my lady Tempest his daughter, Mr. Stephen Tempest, and had communicated the whole design to them.

L. C. J. Were you by when he said this?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, in his chamber.

L. C. J. How long after the discourse of the priests was this?

Mr. Mowbray. My lord, he told them he had done it according to agreement before; and they did approve of it, and had severally engaged to be active, faithful and secret, and would do to the utmost of their powers, as far as their estates would permit, to establish the Roman Catholic religion in England: and about Michaelmas, 1676, there was another meeting of these priests, and others, where they declared, That the king was an heretic, and that the pope had excommunicated him, and all other heretics in England, Scotland and Ireland, and that force was to be made use of.

Justice Dolben. When was that, Sir?

Mr. Mowbray. About Michaelmas, 1676.

Justice Jones. You were his servant then?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, my lord: and then did Rushton produce a list of names of about 4 or 500, and he read them over, all of whom, he said, were engaged in the design; and he did read the names of sir T. Gascoigne, T. Gascoigne, esq. my lady Tempest, Mr. Varasor, sir Francis Hungutt, sir J. Savile, the two Townleys, Mr. Sherborne, and others.

L. C. J. Did you see this list?

Mr. Mowbray. I saw several subscriptions to it, and amongst the rest I saw sir T. Gascoigne's own hand.

L. C. J. Do you know it?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, very well.

L. C. J. And upon the oath you have taken, do you believe that was his hand to the list?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, my lord, I do believe it was his hand.

L. C. J. Did you know any other hands? Do not you know his son's hand?

Mr. Mowbray. No, nor any but sir Thos. Gascoigne's.

L. C. J. It was in several hands, was it not?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, it seemed to me to be so.

L. C. J. What did they subscribe to?

Justice Pemberton. This was in 1677?

Mr. Mowbray: No; it was about Michaelmas, 1676.

L. C. J. What was it for?

Mr. Mowbray. The title of it was, as I remember, "A List of them that are engaged in the design of killing the king, and promoting the Catholic Religion."

L. C. J. Was that writ on the top?

Justice Pemberton. They were words, I suppose, to that effect.

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, it was to that effect, my lord.

L. C. J. Was it mentioned in the List for "killing the king?"

Mr. Mowbray. Yes: and then they declared also, that the pope had given commission to put on the design, and prosecute it as quick as they could; and that he had given a plenary indulgence of 10,000 years for all those that should act, either in person or estate, for killing the king, and setting up the Romish religion in England, besides a pardon and other gratifications. And so much as to the Plot in general. Now, my lord, I come to the particulars as to the prisoner at the bar, sir T. Gascoigne. About Michaelmas, 1676, much about that time, there was sir T. Gascoigne and his son, my lady Tempest, and Rushton the priest together; where I heard them hold several discourses of this design about killing the king, and firing the cities of London and York; and sir T. Gascoigne did declare and assure Mr. Rushton, that he would not swerve from what he had said, but would keep to the oath of secrecy he had given him, and that he would do to the uttermost of his power for the killing of the king, and the establishment of popery.

L. C. J. Were you in the room?

Mr. Mowbray. I stood close at the door, where I heard very well, the door was not quite shut.

L. C. J. They did not know you were there?

Mr. Mowbray. No.

L. C. J. They would not trust you with it, then?

Mr. Mowbray. They did not know I was there. And they did unanimously conclude, That it was a meritorious undertaking, and for the good of the church, and they would all venture their lives and estates in it.

L. C. J. Rushton was there, was he not?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, Rushton was there; and Dr. Stapleton, a priest, coming from another door, and finding me at the door, went in and desired them to speak lower, for there was one at the door: whereupon my lady Tempest called me in, and ordered me to go below and entertain some strangers: so much for the particulars concerning sir T. Gascoigne.

Justice Pemberton. Was sir Miles Stapleton there at that time?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, he was there.

L. C. J. Where?

Mr. Mowbray. In an upper room.

L. C. J. Who were by?

Mr. Mowbray. Mr. Gascoigne, and the priest, and my lady Tempest.

L. C. J. This is all you say?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, so far as to the particulars of this matter.

Serj. Maynard. Have you any more to say?

Mr. Mowbray. No, no more but these particulars, unless some questions be asked.

Then Hobart began to repeat this evidence to sir T. Gascoigne, how he came to be his servant.

Sir T. Gasc. He came as a boy to me, without hiring.

Then Mr. Hobart repeated the priest's discourse at Rushton's.

Sir T. Gasc. I deny it all.

L. C. J. He was not present, this was discourse among themselves.

Then Hobart told him about the Oath of Secrecy and the Sacrament.

Sir T. Gasc. No, there is no such thing, there is not a word of it true.

L. C. J. Then tell him of the List. [Which was done.]

Sir T. Gasc. It is a most impudent lie.

Mr. Hobart. What say you to your hand being to that List?

Sir T. Gasc. Not one word of it.

Mr. Hobart. But he says it was your name to it.

Sir T. Gasc. He had a pair of spectacles on, sure, that could see any thing: was it a printed List, or a written one?

Mr. Mowbray. It was written, your name was put to it, with your own hand-writing. [Which was told him.]

Sir T. Gasc. He makes what he will.

Then Mr. Hobart repeated Rushton's declaring that he had given him the Sacrament of secrecy.

Sir T. Gasc. I will warrant you he hath gotten this oath of secrecy out of the news-books; for I never heard of it before: let me ask thee: didst thou ever hear of it before you came to London?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, sir Thomas, I did.

Mr. Hobart. But will you ask him any question?

Sir T. Gasc. No; it is all false he speaks, not a word of truth comes out of his mouth.

Serj. Maynard. My lord, we will now go on to another piece of our evidence.

Sir T. Gasc. I must leave it to the jury to take notice of their conversations and mine.

Serj. Maynard. Whereas he says he was never owner of 200l. together, we will produce his own almanack under his own hand.

L. C. J. Do it, and we will shew it him, and see what he says to it.

Sir T. Gasc. Why did not he discover it before?

Mr. Hobart. If your lordship please, sir Thomas desires he may be asked, Why he did not discover it before?

Mr. Mowbray. Because the papists did threaten me at such a rate, and I being a single person against them, durst not.

L. C. J. When did you first discover it?

Mr. Mowbray. It was about Michaelmas last: the papists did threaten me, that if I did discover it, they would take my life away.

L. C. J. When did you turn Protestant?

Mr. Mowbray. When the Plot broke out, then I took the oaths of allegiance and supremacy.

L. C. J. Why did not you discover it as soon as you turned Protestant?

Mr. Mowbray. My lord, I was not in a condition to make any friends, or come up to London upon such an account: besides, my lord, they did threaten me, and particularly after the Plot was come out, Addison did threaten me.

L. C. J. But this was a great while before the Plot broke out.

Justice Dolben. So long he continued a papist, and then he would not discover.

Mr. Mowbray. This Addison was often with me, and he flattered me, and made me continue a papist, lest I should discover it.

L. C. J. Where is he now?

Mr. Mowbray. He is fled.

L. C. J. What said Addison when you did turn Protestant?

Mr. Mowbray. He said if I did discover he would take away my life.

L. C. J. I wonder they did not give you the oath of secrecy.

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, my lord, I did receive it from Rushton's own hand.

L. C. J. When?

Mowbray. In 1676.

L. C. J. Who received it with you?

Mowbray. It was given to me after the communicants were gone from the chapel.

L. C. J. What was the oath?

Mowbray. He reserved the sacrament for me, and swore me by it, that I should be faithful and secret, and should not reveal any discourse I was privy to.

L. C. J. Reveal no discourse? What discourse did they mean?

Mowbray. Those discourses when the priests were in private with him.

Then sir T. Gascoigne's Almanack was produced.

Att. Gen. Who proves sir Thomas's hand? Is this sir T. Gascoigne's hand?

Bolton and Mowbray. Yes, it is his hand.

L. C. J. Show it him himself. [Which was done.]

Mr. Hobart. Is that your hand?

Sir T. Gasc. Yes, I think I saw it at the council table; this is my writing, and I will justify every word that is written there.

Att. Gen. Read that one place.

Clerk. The 15th to Peter for 100*l.* to Corker.

Att. Gen. If your lordship please, I desire he may be asked what that 100*l.* was for.

Mr. Hobart. Look you here, sir, did you order 100*l.* to be paid to Corker?

Sir T. Gasc. It may be I did.

Mr. Hobart. What was it for?

Sir T. Gasc. For the portion of a child I had.

Mr. Hobart. What child was that?

Sir T. Gasc. I know not who it was, Mary Appleby, I think.

Att. Gen. Pray ask him how it came to Corker's hands? Why it was returned to Corker?

Sir T. Gasc. I know not that, because we did not know where she lived, she was beyond sea.

Mr. Hobart. Where is she?

Sir T. Gasc. She is at Paris.

Att. Gen. Here is another book of his that does make mention of 900*l.* to Mr. Corker, upon an agreement between them.

L. C. J. Ask him how much money he might return to Corker from time to time. [Which was done.]

Sir T. Gasc. My lord, I do not know, we have been several years returning of money.

L. C. J. Hath he returned 8 or 900*l.* in all?

Sir T. Gasc. No, I do not think so much.

Att. Gen. Pray ask him how much was Mrs. Appleby's portion?

Sir T. Gasc. Indeed I cannot certainly say; but as the rents came in I was to pay several sums to several persons; it was 100*l.* a year to this Mary Appleby, it may be 2,000*l.* in all from first to last, but I shall satisfy you about that.

Att. Gen. Will you satisfy us anon why 900*l.* was paid in one year?

Then the book was shewn to sir Thomas, who owned it to be his hand.

L. C. J. Read it.

Clerk. "Q. Of Mr. Corker, what bills, for how much, and to whom directed, he hath received of me since the 21st of July, 1677, to June 1678, vid. the book p. 45. and the great book fol. 54. where you may find P. for 900*l.* and agree in this account, Corker, the 7th of August 1678."

Att. Gen. First he makes a Quere how much he returned, and then, says he, the 7th of August I and Corker agreed.

L. C. J. Let him read it himself. Which he did.

Mr. Hobart. What say you to that, that you sent so much money to Corker?

Justice Pemberton. You must understand he is one of the priests, and Bolton swears, that he intended to send 2,000*l.* and by 300*l.* a-piece, he reckons up 900*l.*

Sir T. Gasc. It was a great many years and several times.

L. C. J. Tell him it was between July 1677 and June 1678.

Sir T. Gasc. That does not appear.

Att. Gen. Yes, it does, by the book.

Just. Dolben. Then how came you to return 900*l.* in one year to Corker?

Serj. Maynard. And never had 900*l.* he says together.

Att. Gen. Then here is another passage in this book, if it please your lordship to have it read.

Clerk. Take Heworth of an easy rent of the widow—and purchase the reversion of Craddock—and in the interim Dawson.

Just. Dolben. Ask him what he did mean by taking of Heworth?

Sir T. Gasc. I took no house there.

Just. Dolben. But did he agree to buy the reversion of it?

Sir T. Gasc. It was for my niece Thwing; she was born in the house, and was very desirous to be in the house.

Just. Dolben. Ay; but why did he take the lease of the widow, during her jointure, and why buy the reversion?

Sir T. Gasc. I know no reason but my affection to her.

Att. Gen. Ask him who he did intend should live in the house?

Sir T. Gasc. Nay I do not know what they intended, my niece Thwing.

Justice Dolben. Did you intend to buy it for yourself?

Sir T. Gasc. No, I lent her the money.

Just. Dolben. Did you intend it for her?

Sir T. Gasc. I might do with it what I would.

Att. Gen. Ask him if his niece Thwing was a single woman, and was so have the whole house to herself?

Sir T. Gasc. She had her brother with her.

Mr. Hobart. He says Mrs. Ellen Thwing was a nun, Mrs. Lassels was to be lady Abbess, Mrs. Beckwith was her assistant, and Mrs. Cornwallis and others were nuns.

L. C. J. Ask him if Mrs. Lassels was not to be lady Abbess, and live there?

Sir T. Gasc. I know nothing of it.

Att. Gen. Ask him if there was not one Mrs. Bonningfield to be there?

Sir T. Gasc. No.

Bolton. Yes, she was to be there.

Just. Jones. Why, do you know any thing of her?

Att. Gen. She is in York gaol.

Bolton. No, she is gone from thence. My lord, Ellen Thwing was a nun, and I was sent far from beyond sea to instruct all them that should be made nuns; and this Father Cornwallis was father confessor to the nuns. He is now in York gaol, taken with two women.

Just. Jones. Ask him what he meant by that writing in the almanack?

Sir T. Gasc. I did write things here for a memorandum to help and assist my niece, and the poor children of my brother; and so the widow that was sir Walter Vavasor's sister, was to sell the house, and one Craddock meant to sell all the lordship, and the children were desirous to keep the house, and so they bought the house and one close, and all the rest was sold; so I writ it only that they should have the assistance of sir Walter Vavasor to have the house.

Just. Dolben. Pray ask him what he means by the words, 'in the interim Dawson.'

Sir T. Gasc. Nay, what do I know?

L. C. J. Ask if Mrs. Thwing were not a nun?

Sir T. Gasc. They did desire, if they could not get that house, that they might have another house.

Just. Dolben. And all this for Mrs. Thwing? Ask him if she was not beyond sea, and kept in a nursery.

Sir T. Gasc. Nay, I cannot tell what she was.

Att. Gen. Here is another note in this almanack, pray read it. It was first shewn to sir T. Gascoigne, who owned it to be his hand.

Clerk. "Mr. Harcourt, next house to the arch within Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, Mr. Parr's."

L. C. J. No question but he was acquainted with all the priests about the town, and had directions to write to them.

Just. Pemberton. He hath been priest-ridden by them, that is plain.

Recorder. Ask him what he means by the last mark there set under London?

Sir T. Gasc. I cannot tell what it is, it is a query.

Att. Gen. In the almanack there is a memorandum to acquaint Mr. Thwing with the whole design; what it was I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Ay, pray let us see that.

Att. Gen. This Thwing is a priest in Newgate at this time.

Clerk. "The 15th of April 1676. Memorandum. Acquaint Mr. Thomas Thwing with the whole design."

L. C. J. Now shew him that.

Sir T. Gasc. Look you, what is it you would have?

Mr. Hobart. What design was that?

Sir T. Gasc. It was my providing monies for him and his sister, that they should tell how to purchase the house.

Att. Gen. What, a priest, and a nun?

Just. Dolben. They had vowed contrary to that.

Just. Pemberton. Ask him whether Thwing be not a priest?

Mr. Hobart. Is not this Thwing a priest? Thomas Thwing?

Sir T. Gasc. No, it was Ferdinando Thwing, that is now dead.

Att. Gen. No, but this is Thomas Thwing: Is he a priest?

Sir T. Gasc. I do not know. What have I to do?

L. C. J. Then consider how likely it was; he was to purchase an house for a priest and a nun, for some such business as is sworn.

Mr. Hobart. He says no, my lord.

L. C. J. What is the meaning of it, then, that he should name the whole design?

Mr. Hobart. He says, it was the brothers and sisters that lived next door to him.

L. C. J. Ay, but it is said, acquaint Thomas Thwing with the whole design.

Mr. Hobart. He might acquaint Thomas Thwing with such his intention.

Att. Gen. We will now shew your lordship a letter, taken among the papers of sir Thomas Gascoigne, wherein is this proviso, talking of the settlement, "In the formal settlement, let this proviso be added, If England were converted, then to be disposed so and so.”

L. C. J. Mr. Bolton, How came you by that paper?

Bolton. I took this paper in sir T. Gascoigne’s chamber, with several others; I remember some had his hand to them, others had not, and some were signed Pracid, and some Cornwallis.

L. C. J. Is there any mark of his hand to that paper?

Att. Gen. Yes, there is a mark in this of sir Thomas’s own hand, the word (Yes) in the margin.

Clerk. ‘Dolebank, June 9th, 1678. Most honoured Sir, After most grateful acknowledgments of all your charitable favours, as to my own particular; I am also herewith to present most humble and heartiest thanks on behalf of your niece, and Mrs. Hastings here, who both would esteem it a great happiness to see you here, as also my lady, your honoured daughter, to whom we beseech our humble respects may be presented. I have sent the paper safely to good Mrs. Beddingfield, from whom shortly you will have religious acknowledgments. I told her that I supposed you would judge fitting to insert into the formal writing the proviso, viz. That if England be converted, then the whole 90*l.* per annum is to be applied here in Yorkshire, about or at Heworth, &c. The which doubtless, will be as acceptable unto her, and as much to God’s glory as possibly can be imagined. Now, dearest Sir, let me not be too much troublesome, save only to wish you from his divine majesty, for whose everlasting glories greater praise and honour you do this most pious action, the happy enjoyment of that glory everlasting. I would lastly advise you in God’s holy name, to complete the business by drawing the formal writing as soon as possible; and without making any material alteration from what you have already signed, save only the proviso above written. I should be glad to know concerning the receipt hereof, and when sir Miles and your son are likely to attend you to finish the business: As also when Mr. Pierpoint shall be arrived. These good religious are very desirous with your approbation (and Mrs. Beddingfield at my coming from her wished the same) to try for a removal to Mr. Dawson’s; the impediments here being essential, as the house incapable to receive more scholars, with many other inconveniencies also. Time permits no more, only we again express our earnest desires to see your honour here with my lady, as the greatest satisfaction we can desire: I remember you hinted to Mrs. Beddingfield not long since, that perhaps you might see her at Hammersmith; and how much easier you may come hither, we earnestly beseech you to take into consideration the purpose. Most honoured Sir, your honour’s most obliged faithful servant, Jo. PRACID.’

YES. }
 { teration from what you have already signed, save only the proviso above written. Most honoured Sir, your honour’s most obliged faithful servant, Jo. PRACID.’

L. C. J. I think it is pretty plain there was a design of erecting a nunnery.

Serj. Maynard. If England is converted, then the whole 90*l.* a year to be employed in Yorkshire about a rotten house, which would be much for God’s glory.

L. C. J. What other evidence have you?

Recorder. If your lordship please, we have another letter dated from York Castle, and the backside of the letter is indorsed by sir Tho. Gascoigne’s own hand, the time when he received it.

L. C. J. When was it?

Recorder. The last May, he dates it from York Castle, where he was in prison, and therein gives sir Thomas an account of the opinion of the doctors of Sorbonne about the taking the oath of allegiance.

L. C. J. No doubt all of them do not approve of it.

Just. Dolben. As I believe this same Pracid was the occasion of so many gentlemen refusing the oath of allegiance; I convicted above forty of them in that country for not taking of it.

Serj. Maynard. ‘Noscitur ex comite.’ You see if this be the effect of it, what reason we have to rid ourselves of these priests: One that dares write such a letter; and it is found in sir Thomas’s study.

Just. Pemberton. And sir Thomas’s own hand on the back of it.

Serj. Maynard. My lord, under favour, I do take it, that the debauching of men in the point of conscience, that they may not take the oath of allegiance, is to set them loose from the government, and loose from the king, and make them ready to arm when they have opportunity.

Just. Pemberton. No doubt of it, brother.

L. C. J. All the Jesuits say they may not take it, but some of the Sorbonnists say they may.

Just. Pemberton. But now you see they are against it.

L. C. J. Some will, and some will not allow it.

Just. Jones. They take or leave oaths, as it is convenient for them.

Then the letter being shewn to Mr. Mowbray, and the indorsement acknowledged to be sir Thomas’s hand, was read.

Clerk. ‘York Castle, May the 24th. Honoured and ever dearest sir; Longer time having passed since your last writing, it is fit to inform you how God’s holy providence disposes concerning us. All the out prisoners being called into the castle, (as you may have heard) Mrs. Hastings’ room was needed, and so she went into Castlegate to reside at the former lodging of one Mrs. Wait, (who is now in the gaol) where she remains with Mrs. Wait’s two children, and their maid-servant, teaching the children as formerly; also the Moor’s niece goes daily thither; and Mrs. Hastings lives without charge as to diet. and lodging, as I formerly told you; she spends all her time well, God be praised, and comes every morning about seven o'clock to serve God at the castle: But I and two others are much abridged of that happiness by her room being left by her here. My liberty of going abroad is restrained with the rest, none being as yet permitted the least since these last were forced to come in. Madam — was here the other day, and seemed somewhat timorous about Mrs. Hasting's teaching: But most in the castle persuaded her that it was most commendable and most secure, and so she rests satisfied: Mrs. Cornwallis is recovered of her ague, God be blessed: She desires her dutiful respects may be always presented unto you, and intends herself to write to you. Mrs. Wood and her companion are well, but dare not as yet walk in their own garden. All our now prisoners are cheerful, and each of us comforted, in hopes that God will make all catholics of one mind: For I have a letter from our Spr. [Mr. Record. That is superior] at London (who was the same day taken and carried to prison), wherein he declares, alledging authority, That the pretended oath of allegiance cannot be taken as it is worded; adding that three briefs have formerly been sent from the pope expressly prohibiting it; and in the third it is declared damnable to take it. And yesterday we had a letter communicated amongst us, sent by Mr. Middleton (now at Paris) to his friends here, containing the attestation of all the Sorbonne doctors against it; adding, that whosoever here in England give leave, they deceive people, and are contrary to the whole Catholic Church. There was also a meeting some years ago of all the superiors both secular and regular, wherein it was unanimously declared, that it could not be taken. Mr. Hutchinson (alias Berry) who has lately printed a pamphlet in defence of the oaths, has the other day declared himself protestant at St. Margaret's Westminster. And so I rest, Honoured sir, Your ever obliged, J. P.

Recorder. That is all, the other is private.

Att. Gen. If your lordship please, we shall now prove by some witaesses, that he hath returned great sums of money, because he said, he never had 200*l.* together; and for this we call Mr. Phiswick. (Who was sworn.) Come sir, were you a servant to sir T. Gascoigne?

Mr. Phiswick. Yes.

Att. Gen. For how long time?

Phiswick. For six years and upwards.

Att. Gen. In that six years time, what sums of money did you return to London?

Phiswick. It is abstracted in a note.

Att. Gen. Did you return all the sums in that note?

Phiswick. I refer myself to my almanack.

Att. Gen. Did you set down this account?

Phiswick. Yes, sir.

Att. Gen. Then thus, sir, pray what comes it to?

Phiswick. Those sums do come to 6,128*l.*

VOL. VII.

L. C. J. Whose money was that?

Phiswick. Part of it was sir Thomas's; part his son's, and part my lady Tempest's.

L. C. J. Can you tell how much in any one year you returned upon the account of sir Thomas?

Phiswick. Not unless I had my almanack.

L. C. J. It will be endless to look over the particulars.

Just. Pemberton. Can you make any estimate in six years how much you returned for sir Thomas himself?

Phiswick. No, not without my almanack, because I returned money for them all.

Att. Gen. My lady Tempest and Mr. Gascoigne, it hath been proved, were in all the discourses.

L. C. J. But that hath not any influence upon sir Thomas.

Phiswick. The esquire lived much in London.

Just. Dolben. What estate had he to live upon?

Phiswick. Betwixt 4 and 500*l.* a year.

Just. Pemberton. What estate had sir Thomas besides?

Mowbray. My lord, I believe it was 1,600*l.* a year, besides what Mr. Gascoigne had.

Just. Dolben. And what had my lady Tempest?

Phiswick. Three hundred pound a year.

Just. Dolben. But she lived in Yorkshire.

Phiswick. Yes.

Just. Dolben. So she needed little returns to London.

Just. Pemberton. But admit they had returned all, there was 500*l.* a year to be returned for sir Thomas.

Att. Gen. My lord, here is Mr. Mawson I think 2,500*l.* was received by him.

Phiswick. I paid in the country, at Leeds, money, that he paid here in town.

Att. Gen. Here is the 25*l.* paid to Harcourt, I would ask him whether it were the same Harcourt that was executed.

Just. Pemberton. I think not that material.

Att. Gen. My lord, if you please, we will shew you the examination taken before the council, that sir Thomas did own this Bolron had been his servant, and never unfaithful, but always took him to be, as he now found him, a fool.

Just. Dolben. If he object any thing, it will come in properly by way of reply.

Att. Gen. Then now we have done till we hear what the prisoner says to it.

L. C. J. Tell him they have done with their evidence against him; if he will have any witness examined, he must call them.

Hobart. The king's evidence have been all heard, and said as much as they can; the court asks you if you would call any witnesses, or say any thing for yourself? Have you any witnesses here?

Sir T. Gasc. Yes.

Hobart. Name them, Sir.

Justice Dolben. Ask what he will have done with them?

3 T

Justice Jones. Let him tell us to what purpose he will call them.

Sir T. Gasc. To examine them to the credit and demeanour of these men, and that there is no probability in their suggestions.

Hobart. Name them, Sir.

Sir T. Gasc. They are all in that note.

Mr. Babbington was first examined.

Justice Pemberton. Ask sir Thomas what he would have him asked.

Sir T. Gasc. Look you, sir, what do you know concerning the difference between Mr. Bolron and I?

L. C. J. Well, what say you to that question?

Babbington. My lord, I have not been employed in sir T. Gascoigne's business before the last winter.

Justice Dolben. What do you know then?

Babbington. About spring last sir T. Gascoigne was consulting with me about money Bolron owed him upon two bonds, and gave me directions to sue them. And likewise he was giving me directions to deliver declarations in ejectment for gaining the possession of his farm, because he did not pay his rent.

L. C. J. How much were the bonds for?

Babbington. I have them here, I think.

L. C. J. You need not look for them, you may tell us the sums.

Babbington. The one is for 28*l.*, the other 20*l.*, to the best of my remembrance. Mr. Bolron having notice of this, did desire he would accept of a conveyance of an house he had at Newcastle for satisfaction of his debt. Sir Thomas was unwilling to accept of it, but I did prevail with him to accept it, not in satisfaction, but as an additional security; and the deeds I have here that I drew for that end.

Justice Pemberton. What time was this?

Babbington. This was a little before last Trinity-term begun. I have taken a memorandum within a day or two, if your lordship will give me leave to look upon it.

Justice Dolben. Have you not had all this time to get your papers ready?

Babbington. My memory is very short, indeed. But now I see about the 3d or 4th of June, sir Thomas gave me orders to deliver declarations in ejectment.

Justice Dolben. When did he first bid you question him for monies upon the bonds?

Babbington. It was some time in May.

L. C. J. Did he tell you you must sue him?

Babbington. Yes.

L. C. J. What then did Bolron say?

Babbington. Bolron did then desire that sir Thomas would accept of security out of his house at Newcastle. Sir Thomas was very hard to be persuaded, but at length I did prevail with him, and I used this argument, that it was not to lend so much money upon that security, but his money was already out of his hands, and else desperate, and this was a further security, and that it would not lessen his other security, and upon these persuasions he did let me draw a deed to that purpose.

L. C. J. Was this some time in May?

Babbington. This discourse was in May.

L. C. J. Are you sure of it?

Babbington. The directions that I had for drawing the deed was in June, but the discourse with sir Thomas was in May, and I do perfectly remember it by a circumstance which I shall tell your lordship. After the deeds were drawn (for drawing of which I had a letter under Bolron's own hand, and if occasion be, I have the letter here to produce), I came from York, having been there, and appointed a day for the sealing of them. I came to the house where Bolron lived, and sir Thomas met me, and there I produced the deeds, and he of himself was very ready and willing to the sealing of them, but his wife, who was joined in the deeds with him, would not by any means seal, unless sir Thomas would deliver up the bonds he had taken for the money, but sir Thomas did utterly refuse to deliver up the bonds.

L. C. J. What time in June was this?

Babbington. A little before Whitsuntide.

L. C. J. What time was that?

Babbington. That was the 14th of June, as I remember, that I delivered the declaration; and the day before, which was the 13th, to the best of my remembrance; I had this communication and discourse about sealing the writings, which the wife refused to join in; but sir Thomas would only take it as an additional security, refusing to deliver up the bonds, but he would suspend further prosecution, and Bolron did then desire no longer time than a month for payment of the money. But his wife, though she were urged to seal the writings, would not be persuaded, but utterly denied it. After we had spent a great deal of time there, Bolron comes to me, and desires me to come another time, and he would persuade his wife to seal the deed, Nay, said I, it is not fit for me to come up and down unless it be to some purpose, and your wife will seal. Will! nay, says he, I will force her to it. My answer was this, If you take these courses, Mr. Bolron, I must by no means be concerned in the matter; for your wife must pass a fine, and we must examine her secretly, and if she tells me she does it by your force, I will not pass it if you would give 1,000*l.* After this, about a fortnight, he sent for me to come and his wife would seal.

L. C. J. By the way, are you a protestant?

Babbington. Yes, I am, Sir.

L. C. J. And always was?

Babbington. Yes.

Att. Gen. Yes, he is an attorney at large, I know him very well.

Babbington. This was a fortnight or three weeks after that, the latter end of June he sent for me to his house, and that his wife would be contented to seal. And this he desired might be done on the Tuesday, which was Leeds market-day, and I could not go. The next day I called upon him at Shippen-Hall; he was then within, and desired me to go up to Barm-bow to sir Thomas Gascoigne's with him: He said he should go within two or three days to Newcastle, for he had a chapman that would lay down the money, and take the security of the house, and he desired he might have the liberty to go thither to treat about it. I told him I did believe it would be no hard matter to persuade sir Thomas to that, for he would be very glad of it. I went up with him to Barm-bow, and as we went along, he asked me if sir Thomas did intend to sue him upon his bond? I told him I had directions so to do. He asked me likewise if he would turn him out of his farm? I told him, Yes, if he would not pay his rent; and the truth of it is, he did then deny he had received the declaration in ejectment: But my man afterwards made his affidavit of delivery, and had judgment upon it. Afterwards I went up to sir Thomas, and told him what Bolron desired, and he consented to it as readily as it could be asked; and in coming away he told Bolron, that in the management of his coal-pits he did neglect very much, and did go abroad, staying away two or three days together. To this Bolron made some excuse, and said it was for collecting his debts. Said sir Thomas, I know not what you are about, but if you do well for yourself, I am satisfied.

L. C. J. How long had he been from him, and left his service, then?

Babbington. I know not when he went, but this was in June last. After this we went back again, and in coming back he was very inquisitive to the same purpose; he was asking me—

L. C. J. You say he chid him, and told him he was not a good husband in his colliery.

Babbington. Yes; and as we came back he was inquisitive whether sir T. Gascoigne would sue him, and turn him out of his farm. I did then enter into the same expressions, and told him, if he did not pay, he must be sued.

L. C. J. You told me, sir Thomas had agreed to stay so long, when was this?

Babbington. My lord, this was after we had parted with sir Thomas.

L. C. J. After sir Thomas had promised him to stay so long time, then, said he, as you were coming home, do you think he will sue me, and turn me out of my farm?

Babbington. Yes, said I: Well, said he, then by God I will do that which I did not intend to do. What he meant by it I cannot tell; but this was a little before he came to London, which I judge to be the latter end of June; and this is all I have to say.

Then Obadiah Moor was called.

Just. Jones. Did you tell sir T. Gascoigne what he said, Then I will do what I never did intend to do?

Babbing. I did never tell him, my lord, for I looked upon it as an idle expression. And I will tell your lordship why; because this man that is now to be examined did tell me how that he was bound for him, and that Bolron, to encourage him to be bound, said, You need not fear, for if sir Thomas sues me, I will inform against him for keeping priests in his house; and I did look upon it as an idle expression.

Mr. Moor. My lord, in September last was twelve-month, Mr. Bolron did desire me to be bound with him to sir T. Gascoigne. Said I, I told him, Mr. Bolron, I have some small acquaintance with you but I have no reason to be bound with you. Said he, Do not fear; there is my brother Baker and Stepheu Thompson are to be bound as well as you. Said he, I will give you my counter security. That signifies nothing, said I. You need not fear any suits, said he; for if sir Thomas sues me, I will inform against him for keeping priests. Said I, When must this money be paid? Said he, At Candlemas next. So we went and were bound; the one bond was to be paid at Candlemas last, and the other in August. And after Candlemas he did not pay the money; and said I, Mr. Bolron, I do not like these bonds, you must make new bonds for my security. I was afraid of being sued, and I desired Mr. Babbington to bring a writ against him, which he did; and upon Holy-Thursday I had two bailiffs ready to arrest him, but he could not be found; and I had two likewise the Saturday before at his pits. Presently after he came up to London, and made an information; and on the 8th of August last I met him in Ferry-Bridge, and he came along with me; said he, Mr. Moor, you and I have often discoursed of sir T. Gascoigne, you may do me good, if you do not, pray do me no harm. You have been often at his house. With that, I asked him if he was concerned in the plot? For, said I, you have been often telling me, and sworn it, and denied it utterly, that he was no more concerned than any body else. But I did but equivocate then, said he, for I was a papist, and if I had told 1,000 lies, or killed 20 protestants, our priest would have forgiven me for it. And so coming to Farnborn, two miles from Ferry-Bridge, he plucked out 10s., and said, I have no more money in my pocket but this, but pray be kind, and do me no harm, for you know I have denied it all along.

Just. Jones. Hath he done so?

Moor. Yes, several times.

L. C. J. How came you to discourse with him, and question him about it?

Moor. Because there was a general discourse in the country, that there were few papists but what were concerned, and guilty of the Plot.

L. C. J. When was that discourse?

Moor. The latter end of September was twelve-month, when the Plot was first discovered. And he said, sir Thomas was no more concerned than the child that was to be born.

L. C. J. Had you any discourse with him about May last?

Moor. No, my lord; in August, as I told you, I had.

L. C. J. When was the last time that he told you, sir Thomas had not an hand in the Plot?

Moor. I cannot certainly remember, but I think it was in February, when I told him I would sue the bond, or have better security. It was a small time after Candlemas.

Just. Jones. What are you, a protestant or a papist?

Moor. A protestant, bred and born so.

Just. Pemberton. He would have sworn it no doubt at that time, for he was under an oath of secrecy.

L. C. J. But you say August was the first time that he discoursed to you that sir Thomas was in the Plot?

Moor. Yes.

Then Stephen Thompson was called.

Just. Dolben. Well, what do you know of this business?

Thompson. My lord, if you will give me leave to speak, I know a great deal of the unkindness betwixt sir Thomas and Mr. Bolron. He came down to me, he was sir T. Gascoigne's steward of his colliery, and sir Thomas liked not of his accounts, and turned him forth. There was a great deal of money owing to sir Thomas, and he came to sir Thomas to agree about it, and he desired me to be bound with him to sir Thomas: said I, Mr. Bolron, how shall I be secured? Said he, there is a great deal of money, of which I never gave sir Thomas any account, I will gather it in, and secure all; and so sir T. Gascoigne knew nothing of it. So bonds for 60*l.* were entered into to pay 28*l.* at Candlemas. So, sir, when Candlemas came, and he did not pay the money, I went up to him and asked him what he would do about this money, what course he would take to satisfy? Oh! never fear, said he. Why said I, hath he any hand in the Plot? If he hath let us know it; for he had made a great deal of his goods away, and then I thought I should not be secured. Oh, said he, he is sinless of it.

L. C. J. Who did make away his goods?

Mr. Thompson. Bolron did.

L. C. J. When was this?

Mr. Thompson. Candlemas last. For then I thought sir Thomas might sue me for the money, and I would fain have known if sir Thomas had any hand in the Plot, and I pressed him much to tell me. Then it passed on, and having a writ out against me, I durst not stir out myself, but I did send my man to him to know what he did intend to do about it: he told my man, Brother tell thy master he need not fear at all. Why, said my man, do you know he hath any hand in the Plot?

Just. Dolben. That is but what your man said.

Just. Pemberton. Is your man here?

Mr. Thompson. No.

Just. Dolben. Therefore you must not urge that he said to you, it is no evidence.

Thompson. On Thursday after I went up to him myself, and got him to go up to sir Thomas; and so when he came to sir Thomas, he would give him no time but a fortnight to pay the money; Bolron desired but three weeks time, and he would procure him his money; so away we came down. Said I, What do you intend to do in this case? Said he, If he do sue me, I will do him an ill turn; and soon after he went to London, and said, he would go to sell his land at Newcastle: and awhile after I went out to see if he were come again; and meeting him, it was when he was going to London again to carry on his design, said I, Robert Bolron, what do you say in this case? you now are going to leave the country, and how shall I be secured against sir Thomas? Do not question it, said he, for I am to receive on the king's account 30*l.*

L. C. J. Upon whose account?

Thompson. Upon the king's; concerning the taking sir T. Gascoigne.

B. Iron. But I never had a farthing of it.

Thompson. But, said he, I will not take it, for another bids me 60*l.* and I know what Oates and Bedlow had, and I won't abate a farthing of that.

L. C. J. When was this?

Thompson. It was after he had taken him; and on Holy Thursday he did say, If he did see him, he would do him an ill turn.

Then the Lord Chief Justice, being to sit at Nisi Prius at Guildhall, went off.

William Backhouse was next called.

Just. Jones. Let him ask Backhouse what he will.

Sir T. Gasc. I would ask him what threats he gave to his wife to swear against her conscience and promise of 500*l.* he should gain by it.

Backhouse. I served the warrant to carry the witness before 'squire Lowther and 'squire Tindall: I was charged the 7th of July last to help fetch the witnesses before the justices, and to take sir T. Gascoigne, I and two of my sons, and he opened the door his own self. When we had taken him, 'squire Lowther directed us to bring the witnesses before him, and we did so. When we came to Bolron's house, his wife was sick on bed, and I said that she must go before the Justice of Peace to swear against sir T. Gascoigne for High-Treason: she said she knew nothing against sir Thomas; but Bolron said she must go, or he would have her drawn at the cart's arse.

Then Hamsworth was called.

Justice Jones. What will he ask him?

Sir T. Gasc. I ask him about the threatening of his wife.

Hamsworth. May it please you, my lord, the same day that sir Tho. Gascoigne was taken Robert Bolron came to his wife, and told her she must go to 'squire Lowther to swear against sir T. Gascoigne: she fell a weeping, and would not go by no means; he threatened if she would not go, he would tie her to the horse's tail.

Just. Dolben. Did he tell her what she should swear?

Hamsworth. I did not hear him, only to swear against sir Thomas.

Just. Dolben. What she knew, was it?

Hampworth. Yes; and she said, she did not know any thing of misdemeanour of sir T. Gascoigne touching his sacred majesty, or the church government.

Justice Jones. Art thou sure she said those words?

Mowbray. My lord, he is a papist.

Hampworth. I am a Protestant.

Justice Pemberton. How long have you been a Protestant?

Hampworth. I was born so.

Just. Jones. Well thou hast added a few fine words that I dare say she never said.

Just. Pemberton. Were you never a papist?

Hampworth. Yes, I was.

Nicholas Shippon was called.

Mowbray. This man is a papist too.

Just. Dolben. Do you think he is not a witness, for all that?

Sir T. Gasc. What discourse he had May 30, the day after the race?

Just. Pemberton. Well ask him what you will: What do you say?

Shippon. Mr. Bolron was with me the 30th day of May.

Just. Dolben. What, May last?

Shippon. Yes, the day after Ascension-day: he came to my house about two o'clock in the afternoon, and staid at my house all that afternoon while an hour after sun-set before he went away; he came and brought a letter with him to carry to Newcastle, and it was sent away thither.

Just. Dolben. Are you sure it was the day after the Ascension-day? How if it should fall out another day?

Shippon. Yes, Ascension-day was the 29th of May; he came to me about two o'clock.

Serj. Maynard. Pray what reason had you to take notice of this?

Shippon. He came and brought a letter to me that was to go to Newcastle, and desired me that my little boy might carry it to a kinsman's house of mine; for he said, he was afraid of the bailiff, and did not care for stirring out; my wife brought him some meat and drink, and he said it was better than he had at home; and she said she was the more sorry things were no better with him.

Just. Dolben. But how came you to take notice that this fell out the 30th of May?

Shippon. The night before I met him coming from the race, which was the 29th of May, and he asked me if I saw any bailiffs waiting for him; and I said yes; and he said, it was well if he missed them; and he asked me, if I saw Bennet Johnson?

Just. Jones. How long was it you say he staid?

Shippon. He came about two o'clock, and staid till an hour and half after sun-set.

Serj. Maynard. What religion are you of, friend, let us know?

Just. Dolben. What say you to the truth of this, Bolron?

Bolron. My Lord, there is not a word of it true; for I was about two o'clock at sir Tho.

Gascoigne's; they were marking some sheep, and I was there most of the afternoon.

Just. Jones. Were you ever at his house at any other time to send any such letter?

Mr. Bolron. I never sent any such letter: Indeed that day I was a little of the afternoon at his house, but I staid there but half an hour; but I was most part of the afternoon at sir Tho. Gascoigne's seeing them inark sheep.

Then Roger Gregson was called.

Just. Jones. What do you say to him?

Sir T. Gasc. Let him speak his knowledge.

Serj. Maynard. I desire he may ask the question, for he only generally refers to them what they know.

Sir T. Gasc. What did he say to you about August last?

Gregson. My lord, I will tell you: We met about August last, Robert Bolron and I, about a week before Bartholomew-day: we had some discourse; he came from London a little before that, and I asked him how sir T. Gascoigne did.

Just. Dolben. Was he apprehended in August last?

Gregson. Yes, he was in the Tower. He said, well. I asked him how he would come off about the plot (as they call it)? said he, he may come off well enough, but it will cost him a great deal of money. I then did ask, how they came to fall out? and he said it was long of that rogue Addison, brother to the priest, who had called him to account, or else he never had done sir Thomas that injury; and I suppose that was the cause of it. And then we had some more discourse, and that discourse was this: he rides a little from me (he was on horseback) and came back again; said he, I can tell you, the king was at Windsor, and one of the privy-council made an attempt to stab the king, and the king made his escape, and now they will believe my informations the better.

Just. Pemberton. Go on.

Gregson. That is all I have to say.

Just. Jones. What are you, a Papist?

Gregson. No, I am no Papist, I deny it.

Serj. Maynard. Nor never was?

Gregson. Nor never was.

Then James Barlow was called.

Serj. Maynard. My lord, I conceive this man ought not to be heard, for he is under an accusation of the same crime; and we have had two orders of council to apprehend him.

Att. Gen. There was an order of council within this fortnight to send for him up in custody.

Just. Dolben. There is nothing upon record against him, and you may discredit his testimony, but you cannot refuse him; he is not to come upon his oath.

Mr. Sol. Gen. (Sir Francis Winnington.) Bolron swears too, that he was at the consultation.

Just. Dolben. Let us hear him what he says; we must leave it to the jury what to believe.

Serj. Maynard. They would question him about Mr. Bolron's cozening, which ought not to be.

Sol. Gen. This man hath sworn against him.

Mr. Hobart. Why did you not indict him, Sir?

Serj. Maynard. Sir, you ought not to prate here.

Just. Dolben. Come, I doubt you are a little too pragmatical.

Just. Jones. If you had any record of the indictment to shew against him, we would not examine him.

Mr. Hobart. Will you ask him any questions, sir?

Sir T. Gasc. You know, sir——

Serj. Maynard. That is not proper, he tells him what he knows.

Just. Pemberton. Look you, sir, we did not intend that you should come here to manage all as a counsel; it was said, he could not hear well, and so you were only to tell him what was said.

Sir Tho. Gasc. I would ask him what he does know concerning taking of money and stealing from me?

Just. Dolben. But that must not be asked. [Which Hobart told him.]

Sir Tho. Gasc. Then you must tell me what I must ask.

Just. Pemberton. Come, you have been pragmatical, sir, and made him a brief, and he cannot manage it without you.

Serj. Maynard. Did you write this brief? [Meaning a brief in Sir Tho. Gascoigne's hand.]

Mr. Hobart. No, an't please you, sir.

Then Mr. Ravenscroft offered to speak what this witness had told him.

Just. Dolben. Look you, Mr. Ravenscroft, if what he says tend any thing to his business, that sir T. Gascoigne comes to know of his stealing, and then turned him out of his service, it is material; but if you come to tell a story here of another man's knowledge, we cannot spend our time so.

Mr. Ravenscroft. It was not known but last night to me; and if you will not let me tell you what it is, how shall you know it?

Mrs. Ravenscroft. He is a chief witness for my grandfather, and I desire he may be heard, for he discovered it but last night to my husband.

Just. Dolben. If it tend any thing to this business, that sir Thomas turned him out of doors, and therefore this man bears him an ill will—

Just. Pemberton. We had as good hear Mr. Ravenscroft, however; but pray sir, make your story short.

Mr. Ravenscroft. He came to me and said these words; I have kept a secret a long while, in which I have done very ill—

Just. Pemberton. Then it does not tend at all to this affair; for you must not come to tell a story out of another man's mouth.

Just. Dolben. Pray sit still, sir, and be quiet.

Just. Jones. Indeed you must be satisfied.

Just. Pemberton. If you have any other witnesses, call them, and do not spend our time.

Just. Jones. For the jury must be told, that it is no evidence coming out of another man's mouth.

Just. Dolben. It is as if a man should come and say, I can say something to sir T. Gascoigne, when I know nothing but what another man told me.

Just. Jones. Ask sir Thomas if he would have this Barlow examined?—Sir T. Gasc. Yes.

Just. Pemberton. Then what questions will you ask him?

Sir T. Gasc. What conspiracy was had to take away a great deal of money from me; and how he concealed it, because he would not do him a mischief?

Just. Dolben. What is that to sir Thomas's life?

Mr. Ravenscroft. I cannot tell you by bare assertion, but if you will hear what I have to say, do. Last night, late at night, about nine o'clock, Barlow came to me; says he, Mr. Ravenscroft——

Just. Dolben. Come, do not tell us the preamble, but the story.

Mr. Ravenscroft. Said he, I have a thing that sticks upon my thoughts, which I doubt may endanger sir Thomas's life.

Just. Dolben. Well, was it about taking money?

Mr. Ravenscroft. Said he, If I am silent, I doubt it will cost sir Thomas's life. Then I asked him what it was? says he, Mr. Mowbray, who is a witness in this court, and I did just a little before his going away, combine, or rather he did seduce me—

Just. Pemberton. Was it about money?

Mr. Ravenscroft. Money is in the case.

Just. Dolben. He did conspire, what to do? Mr. Ravenscroft. If you will hear me, I will tell you.

Just. Jones. Pray do it quickly then.

Mr. Ravenscroft. Did combine to rob sir Thomas of a great sum of money; and whereas I held my tongue, thinking not to spill his blood, I see now if I do not tell the truth, I shall make good his credit, and so endanger sir Thomas's life.

Just. Dolben. Well, I will ask you, or any man alive now, two men combine to rob sir Thomas, whether one man be a competent witness against the credit of the other witness? He makes himself a rogue by combining, and you have made him a knave by his own confession.

Mr. Ravenscroft. I may perhaps err in that word; he did not say combine, but the other seduced him.

Just. Dolben. You have told a story to no purpose.

Just. Pemberton. You think it a fine thing to be a catholic, and to appear brisk for them.

Mr. Ravenscroft. Who says I am a catholic?

Then George Dixon appeared.

Sir T. Gasc. What do you know of any conspiracy of these people against me?

Dixon. My lord, I was at William Batley's in August last at ten o'clock, and Mr. Bolron and Mr. Mowbray came in, and called for a flaggon of drink; and when it was brought, they fell into a discourse together concerning sir T. Gascoigne and my lady Tempest. Says Mr. Mowbray, I know nothing of sir Thomas but that he is a very honest man.

Serj. Maynard. He was not bound to tell you what he knew.

Just. Jones. When was this, in August last?

Dixon. Yes; but, said he, if I knew any thing against my lady Tempest, I would discover it, for I would hang her if I could. And they sat down at Mr. Batley's house to consult what they should do.

Just. Pemberton. Before you?

Dixon. Yes, I heard every word.

Just. Jones. And what did they say?

Dixon. They said they would meet at Mr. Bolron's house; and if they would complete their business, they should be very well gratified.

Just. Dolben. Against whom?

Dixon. Against my lady and sir Thomas.

Just. Dolben. But you say, Mowbray said he knew nothing against sir Thomas Gascoigne?

Dixon. No; he said he knew no hurt by them.

Just. Dolben. How came they to say they would contrive their business.

Mr. Mowbray. What man is that, Mr. Bolron?

Bolron. I know him not, nor ever held any such discourse.

Mr. Mowbray. Nor I.

Just. Jones. How far do you live off one from another?

Dixon. I live at Leeds, Mr. Mowbray knows me.

Mr. Mowbray. I do not know that ever I saw you.

Dixon. He hath drunk with me.

Mr. Mowbray. I know him not, nor where he dwells.

Just. Dolben. What trade are you of?

Dixon. A cloth dresser by trade, but I keep a public house.

Just. Dolben. This discourse was at Leeds, was it not?

Dixon. Yes.

Just. Dolben. They say both they do not know you, nay, they swear it. And it is very like you were but very little acquainted, would they let you hear them talk thus?

Dixon. We were as well acquainted as can be, but that he will deny it.

Att. Gen. Pray what religion are you of?

Dixon. A protestant.

Att. Gen. How long have you been so?

Dixon. All the days of my life.

Att. Gen. I cannot but wonder at the strangeness of your acquaintance.

Mr. Mowbray. My lord, I have not drunk at that place which is near the old church at Leeds, not this two years.

Then William Batley was called.

Batley. And if it like your honour, these two gentlemen, Mr. Bolron and Mr. Mowbray, came to my house, and called for a pot of drink.

Att. Gen. Do you not know this man neither?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes, I do, but I was never three times in his company in my life.

Batley. I filled them a flaggon of ale, and when I had done I left them. They began to discourse of the plot, and sir Thomas Gascoigne, and Mr. Bolron—

Just. Dolben. At your house; where is your house?

Batley. My house is near the old church at Leeds.

Just. Dolben. Is that the same place the other man speaks of?

Batley. Yes. Says Mr. Bolron to him, Thou knowest that sir T. Gascoigne hath been very severe against thee and me, and now here is an opportunity offered us to take a revenge upon sir T. Gascoigne. Mowbray replied again, As for sir Thomas, he is a very honest man, and I know no hurt by him; but as to my lady Tempest, if I knew any thing against her I would hang her, for I would discover it. But thou knowest, says Bolron, that sir Thomas sues and troubles me, and if I do not make somewhat out against him, he will ruin me, and it must be done by two witnesses. To which Mr. Mowbray answered again, How shall we bring this business about? If thou wilt but come to my house, said he, I will put thee in a way to contrive it, and we shall have a considerable reward. And Mowbray told him he would come to him such a day.

Justice Dolben. Was that man that went out last, with you all the time they spake?

Dixon. Yes.

Justice Dolben. He does not say half so much as you do.

Justice Pemberton. Were you in the room?

Batley. No, I was at the stairs head.

Justice Pemberton. What did you stand there for?

Batley. I hearing them discourse of sir Thomas Gascoigne, hearkened what they did say.

Justice Dolben. The other man said he was in the room with them; were you in the room?

Batley. I stood upon the stairs.

Justice Jones. Were you in their company at all that day?

Batley. Yes, my lord, I carried up a flaggon of ale.

Justice Jones. Was the door left open?

Batley. Yes.

Justice Dolben. Would any man talk in such a place as this, that all the world may hear them, when they are contriving to take away a man's life?

Justice Pemberton. You were in the same room, Dixon, were you not?

Dixon. They were at the Grice head, and was at the foot.

Justice Jones. But the other says he was at the top of the stairs, the head of the stairs.

Dixon. We were at the stairs-foot, and they were in the room.

Batley. The table they sat at joined just upon the head of the stairs.

Justice Jones. Did you hear them down to the stairs-foot?

Dixon. We did stand there to hear them discourse.

Justice Dolben. Could you see them where you were?

Dixon. Yes, as fair as I see you.

Justice Dolben. Could they see you?

Batley. No, they could not.

Dixon. Yes, if they had looked down.

Justice Dolben. Why then I ask you, Do you think, if you stood in so open a place to be seen, and they had seen you, can you imagine that they would talk so about taking away sir T. Gascoigne's life?

Batley. I do imagine they did not know I was there, nor believe any one heard or saw.

Justice Pemberton. Do you know how they came there?

Batley. They said they came out of Leeds, and said one Mr. Legat was to come that way, who they were to speak with.

Justice Jones. I ask you if you were in the room under them?

Batley. And if it like your lordship, I stood at the stairs-foot.

Justice Jones. Just now you said it was the stairs-head.

Justice Pemberton. Did you say any thing to them about this?

Batley. No; I did not open my lips to them about it, but I told it to a friend about three or four weeks after.

Justice Jones. To whom?

Batley. To a neighbour of mine: I suppose it was told Mr. Babbington.

Justice Dolben. What say you, Mr. Babbington? How came you to know of this?

Mr. Babbington. When the commissioners of Oyer and Terminer were sitting at Leeds, there was one came and told me, George Dixon could afford me something that would be very advantageous for the benefit of sir T. Gascoigne.

Justice Dolben. Who was that man?

Mr. Babbington. Bennet Johnson, or Francis Johnson.

Justice Dolben. Was that the man you spoke to?

Batley. No, I spoke it to a smith, one Richard Loftus.

Mr. Babbington. I will tell you another person I heard it from, that was Mr. Bailiff of Leeds.

Justice Pemberton. Well, was this the common discourse of Leeds?

Justice Dolben. He says so. Was it then presently?

Mr. Babbington. The bailiff did not tell me so suddenly.

Justice Dolben. Would it not have been to your purpose to have brought the bailiff here?

Mr. Babbington. It was after the commission of Oyer and Terminer that I had it from him, which was in October.

Mr. Bolron. In the time of August I was not at Leeds, I was in Northumberland searching for priests, and in the bishoprick of Durham, all but a little of the first of it.

Then Mrs. Jefferson was called.

Justice Pemberton. What do you ask her?

Sir T. Gasc. Pray be pleased to speak to the conspiracy and combination against me.

Justice Jones. Whose combination? Come, mistress, what do you know?

Jefferson. I asked Mr. Mowbray one time what he knew concerning sir T. Gascoigne? And he said he knew nothing, but sir Thomas was a very honest gentleman for what he knew, and the best friend he had.

Justice Jones. Is that all you know?

Jefferson. He thought he was wrongfully accused.

Justice Pemberton. When was this? Was this after the time he was accused by Bolron?

Jefferson. It may be it might be, I think it was in August.

Justice Jones. In August last?

Jefferson. Yes.

Justice Dolben. But you must needs know (it was the talk of the country) when sir T. Gascoigne was sent for up to town; was it after that time?

Jefferson. Yes, I think it was.

Justice Jones. Then you say, you heard Mowbray say that sir T. Gascoigne was an honest gentleman, and he could say nothing against him.

Jefferson. Yes, ask him else.

Then Matthias Higgringil was called.

Justice Dolben. Was he one at the meeting?

Bolron. He was at the sealing the collusive conveyance.

Justice Jones. This Higgringil is a Protestant, is he not?

Bolron. I know not, I think so.

Justice Dolben. Come, sir, what say you in this matter?

Higgringil. To whom?

Justice Dolben. What can you say to the business about sir T. Gascoigne?

Sir T. Gasc. Speak to the threatenings to take away my life.

Higgringil. I have nothing to say to Bolron; but Mowbray on the 25th of September last, being at an alehouse, Mr. Legat and he were together, consulting how to disgrace sir Thomas, and take away his life; and he calls me out to speak with me; now, said he, I shall match them, for they have done what they could to disgrace me.

Justice Jones. How did he mean that?

Higgringil. I suppose he had taken away some money and gold, and they spoke of it, and that was to disgrace him.

Justice Dolben. Was it charged upon him?

Higgringil. It was suspected always he had taken it away.

Justice Dolben. But was there any such thing talked of in the country?

Justice Jones. What did he say to you?

Higgringil. He said, they did what they could to disgrace him, and take away his life, and he would requite them.

Justice Pemberton. Who, they?

Higgringil. Sir T. Gascoigne and my lady Tempest.

Justice Pemberton. Why? Did sir Thomas indict him?

Higgringil. No; but the noise was about the country.

Justice Dolben. When was this? In September last?

Higgringil. Yes.

Justice Dolben. What profession are you of, Higgringil?

Higgringil. An husbandman; I graze, and I farm a farm.

Justice Dolben. You know this man, do you not, Mr. Mowbray?

Mr. Mowbray. Yes; sir Thomas employs him, he is a kind of collector to him.

Mr. Ravenscroft. He is no papist.

Then Francis Johnson appeared.

Justice Dolben. Well, come, what do you know?

Johnson. He hath sustained great losses by him.

Justice Dolben. He! Who?

Johnson. Sir Thomas Gascoigne.

Justice Dolben. By whom?

Johnson. By Mr. Bolron.

Justice Dolben. What loss hath he received?

Johnson. The very first month he entered, he wronged him of Sl.

Justice Jones. How do you know that?

Johnson. I cast up the accompt myself.

Justice Jones. But he kept him two years after that?

Johnson. Yes, he did.

Mr. Bolron. My lord, I lost Sl. the first three weeks, and sir Thomas forgave me it, I do not deny it.

Justice Dolben. Do you know of any malice between them, and that he said he would do him any mischief?

Johnson. No.

Then Mr. Pebles, Clerk of the Peace in the county of York, was called.

Sir T. Gast. I would desire you to speak of the carriage of Mr. Bolron to you, sir, what you know.

Pebles. My lord, I was in York last assizes, and Mr. Bolron came to me into a room where I was with some gentlemen, and asked me how I did? and asked me if I did not know him? I told him I did not remember him: said he, I am the prosecutor against sir T. Gascoigne. So when he was sat down, after a little while he desired to discourse with me, and asked me, If a man was indicted as a traitor, whether it were fit to pay him money? I owe, said he, sir T. Gascoigne money, and I would know whether it be fit to pay it to him: said I, I think you may safely pay him his money before he be convicted, but then it is the king's in my opinion. Nay, said Bolron, he is sure to be convicted: then said I, I think it not safe to pay it, therefore I leave that to your own discretion, whether you will or no. A little after he desired to have my opinion concerning the two judges that came our circuit, for I am mightily abused by them, said he, they will not at all give me audience, I came from the king and council, and they slight me, and will not hear me speak: said I, I believe if you will go to them, they will hear you. I went to speak with them, and they sent some of their servants out to know what I would say to them; but I have writ a letter to them to tell them my mind. But said I, I cannot believe that any one will presume to carry such a letter; but for that I will leave it to you. So I came away from him, and after he follows me out, and desires to speak with me again: said he, I have something against you concerning this business in hand, I can do you a prejudice if I will: said I, God bless me I know nothing of it, and I do not at all intend to court your favour, I have no mind at all to that: said he, I will not do it; and he spoke as if he had no desire to do it; I would not court him, but came away and left him: he followed me to the street again, and said, will you help to apprehend a traitor? Who is it, said I? It is a gentlewoman, said he, a woman greatly concerned in the plot; you may apprehend her in the street, and it is the best time. Now the street was full, and I thought it a little unseasonable; so he looked after me, but I never offered to go from him: said I, was she in the plot? Yes, said he, she was to be the first lady mayorsse of York after the plot took effect, and the king was killed; but he did not lay hold upon her, so I parted with her. Then, said he, I can have no respect. Said I, I have nothing to do with you; I am clerk of the peace of the West-riding in this county, and am always ready to do my duty there; so away I went and left him. The next news I heard was, he had procured a warrant of the council against me; and he brings the warrant to a justice of peace, and that justice of peace told him there would be several justices of peace at Leeds within two or three days after, and then they would examine the business. I chanced to be in a room with some gentlemen, not knowing of the warrant that was out against me; and this gentleman that was the justice of peace called me into another room, and told me of this business: I admired at it, and told him I did know nothing of it, nor that I had disobliged him, unless it was because I did not give him the compliment and ceremony of my hat, nor give him money; neither did I know what information he had procured that warrant upon. He told me Mr. Mowbray and Mr. Bolron were in town; so I desired him to send for the other justices into the room, where he acquainted them with the matter and said he, if you will we will examine it to night; so they sent notice to Mr. Mowbray and Mr. Bolron, that they would examine the business that night at six o'clock, and they came; and he was asked what he had to say against me? He said I had taken money for keeping a man from taking the oath of allegiance, and they had witnesses to prove it—

Serj. Maynard. Must he be here admitted to make his own defence?

Justice Dolben. Brother, let him go on.

Pebles. The witness was called upon, and they asked him to that point, and he denied absolutely upon his oath that he gave me any money, and also swore he had taken the oath when it was tendered to him. Then my lord there was one Mr. Dunford an attorney was spoken of, as if he could prove something, but he was fourteen miles off, and they could not send for him, and so I begged they would appoint another time for hearing when he could be there; they appointed Monday following and ordered me to attend, and one of the justices of the peace undertook to give Dunford notice. Accordingly I came there, but there was no Mr. Bolron nor Mr. Mowbray; but I desired that Mr. Dunford might be examined upon his oath, and they did take his information in writing, and he swore he knew nothing of it, neither did he ever give me money upon such account.

Justice Dolben. You were not by when it was sworn?

Pebles. I saw the examination taken in writing.

Justice Pemberton. And you were discharged?

Pebles. Yes; for he could not make out any thing at all.

Just. Pemberton. It was well for you he could not make it out.

Pebles. They said they could prove it, and vouched these two persons, but both denied it upon their oaths.

Justice Dolben. Is that all you know?

Pebles. That is all I can say in particular, I have not a mind to speak against him in general, because he is the king's evidence.

Just. Dolben. You can say nothing of his repute?

Justice Pemberton. You were a stranger to him, you did not know him?

Sir T. Gase. I desire he may speak what reputation he had among the justices.

Pebles. I have no mind to reflect on the king's evidence; and if I did, it would seem as if I should speak in malice; he hath done me wrong, but I never did him any.

Justice Jones. But what is his reputation generally?

Pebles. Truly it is not very good in the country.

Justice Jones. Among whom?

Pebles. The grand jury and the gentlemen of the country.

Justice Jones. Is it a common fame in the country?

Pebles. Most people discourse ill of him.

Justice Dolben. Did he say he did not speak with the judges?

Bolron. No, my lord, I did not.

Justice Dolben. You did speak with us; indeed you would have had us allowed you a guard for your safety, which we could not do.

Mr. Bolron. Whereas he says I gave in a wrong information, this same Hunt when he came before them confessed he gave him 40s. but he would not swear for what it was.

Serj. Maynard. It is nothing to the purpose one thing or other that he hath said.

Justice Dolben. It is altogether uncertain; nobody knows what to make of it.

Then Hardwicke was called.

Sir T. Gase. Do you speak what threats Bolron hath used to his wife to swear against me.

Hardwicke. When the pursuivants came up to Barnbow, the chief constable ordered me to assist Mr. Bolron in execution of the warrant, and to carry the witnesses before a justice. We went to Robert Bolron's house to take the witnesses, and there was his wife, his brother, and his sister: We were to carry them before a justice, and they refused to go; his wife pretended to be sick and could not go, and they begged of us to excuse them.

Just. Dolben. Who do you call they?

Hardwicke. His wife, his brother and his sister: Bolron told them they must go, and William Backhouse and I ordered them by all means to go along with us; I suppose it was to testify what he had sworn.

Just. Jones. What were they to do, did he tell them?

Hardwicke. They were to go to tell what his testimony was above, as well as I understood the discourse.

Just. Dolben. We have had two persons to this purpose before. They say he would have his wife go, and she refused to go, and cried; but they do neither of them say he pressed her to speak any thing more than she knew, or against her knowledge.

Just. Pemberton. No, one of the witnesses said, he told her it was to speak her knowledge.

Then William Clow was examined.

Just. Dolben. Come, what say you?

Clow. The 22d of May last I had a writ against Bolron, and my man arrested him and brought him to my house.

Just. Dolben. At whose suit?

Clow. At the suit of one Higgringil that was servant to sir Thomas; and there I had him two days, and would not carry him to the goal, for he begged of me I would not; but then I told him I would keep him no longer there, for he had no money for lodging and diet; but he begged so hard of me that I would but tarry till Higgringil came, and then he did not care what they did with him; for he would make sir Thomas pay Higgringil his debt that he owed him, or he would play him such a trick as he little dreamt of.

Just. Dolben. When was this?

Claw. The 21st or 22d of May last, or thereabouts.

Just. Dolben. May last?

Claw. Yes. And so Higgringil came over, and they did agree, and he gave him a lease of an house he lived in, and Higgringil took the charge of both the debts upon him.

Then Hobart stood up.

Sir T. Gasc. Speak whether he pretended he writ a letter to the duke of Monmouth from Leeds.

Hobart. My lord, I have nothing to say to that.

Just. Jones. What can you say then?

Hobart. All that I can say is to the sums of money returned to town.

Just. Dolben. He did not mention that.

Hobart. If you please to let me declare what I know about the returning of the money.

Just. Pemberton. Pray speak what you know of your own knowledge.

Hobart. For most part of it, I know of the payment of it; and to whom; 1,800*l.* there was paid to Mr. Trumbal about the purchase, it was paid at Mr. Mawson's: I was a witness to the deed, and to the receipt.

Att. Gen. That is some, but what to the rest?

Hobart. 200*l.* was paid to a client of mine, 80*l.* was paid to one widow Cawson that was upon bond.

Just. Dolben. How much was paid to Mr. Corker?

Hobart. Several sums, above 300*l.* paid to Corker in 6 years time.

Just. Pemberton. Nay, in 4 years time.

Hobart. This 300*l.* and 300*l.* before I drew the receipt for; and commonly he ordered me when Mr. Corker came for it, that I should have a receipt from Mrs. Mary Appleby; and it came back signed by her, to whom sir Thomas was guardian.

Just. Dolben. And was all this money paid to Corker upon the account of this Appleby?

Hobart. It was mentioned in the receipt.

Just. Dolben. How much was she to have by the year?

Hobart. 100*l.* by the year, or 2 sometimes.

Just. Dolben. How came she to have 900*l.* in 4 years?

Hobart. My lord, I will tell you; for that there was a great arrear upon a suit between sir Thomas and Mr. Appleby, this Mrs. Appleby's father; and upon the hearing of the cause, my lord keeper Bridgman was pleased to order, that this money should be paid to sir Thomas for the use of the daughters; 200*l.* a year, that is 100*l.* a piece; and there was an arrear for 3 or 4 years during the suit, about 2 or 300*l.* it was: I drew a receipt for it, and sir Thomas being pressed for the money by Mrs. Appleby, who went beyond sea, he sent to Corker to get the money returned to her.

Just. Dolben. Ay, but you dance about the bush: Was there an arrear of 500*l.*?

Hobart. For 3 or 4 years, and Mrs. Ravenscroft was one of the sisters; her part was paid when she was married, but this gentlewoman's was paid beyond sea?

Just. Dolben. Were there arrears from sir Thomas to the gentlewoman beyond sea?

Hobart. Yes.

Just. Dolben. Are you sure there was?

Hobart. Yes, sir Thomas told me so.

Just. Pemberton. Who was to pay this money?

Hobart. Mr. Appleby, by order of my lord keeper.

Just. Jones. Sir Thomas was guardian, was the estate in Yorkshire?

Hobart. It did arise out of rents there.

Then one Culliford was called.

Just. Dolben. What say you? What do you know of this matter?

Culliford. This gentleman lodged at such a time at my house; the 4th of June 1677, he was at my house 7 weeks, and he was gone 3 weeks and returned again; he was 3 weeks away.

Just. Jones. What gentleman was this?

Culliford. Mr. Mowbray.

Just. Dolben. What is that to the purpose?

Just. Jones. How do you apply that?

Hobart. Mr. Mowbray hath said he sent a letter to the duke of Monmouth.

Just. Dolben. There hath been no mention made of any such thing: Have you any more witnesses?

Hobart. No.

Just. Dolben. Then ask sir Thomas what he hath to say for himself.

Hobart. Have you any thing to say to the court for yourself?

Sir T. Gasc. No, I refer myself to the judgment of the court.

Then a Woman Witness appeared.

Sir T. Gasc. What do you know concerning Mowbray, whether he was suspected of stealing when he was at my house?

Witness. Yes, he was, my lord; he would have given me 5*l.* to have gone away, and he did intend to have clapped me in prison, and to have laid it all upon me.

Just. Dolben. How do you know that?

Witness. He told me so.

Mr. Mowbray. This is a common woman, and not to be believed.

Serj. Maynard. My lord, we will reply but one short thing in matter of evidence. Much of this that hath been given by the defendant hath been to take off the credit of the witnesses; and for Bolron, they would suggest that he hath been dishonest to sir Thomas; but when sir Thomas himself was examined to that point before the council, he said he found him honest, but only accounted him a fool.

Just. Dolben. That is proper for you to do now, brother.

Serj. Maynard. And sir Thomas being examined about Rushton, he said he did not know such an one, and then afterwards he did say he knew one of that name. Here is sir John Nicholas, the clerk of the council. [Who was sworn.]

Att. Gen. Pray sir, do you know what sir T. Gascoigne said at the council-table.

Sir John Nicholas. He was asked whether he knew Bolron? He said, he knew him very well, he had been his servant till within this twelvemonth, or something more; but for his honesty, he had nothing to say to it, till of late that he had not behaved himself so well, in giving informations against him: But he did find him now, what he did always take him to be, a fool.

Just. Dolben. What did he say about Rushton?

Sir J. Nicholas. At first he did say, he did not know Rushton the priest; but after it was brought to his memory, he said he knew one of that name.

Att. Gen. It was taken down in the minutes; Sir John, look upon them.

Sir J. Nicholas. He denied at first that he knew Rushton the priest; and afterwards the next time he came to the council, he said he did deny it, because he was afraid of an old law against harbouring of priests.

Att. Gen. If your lordship please, we will now trouble you with a witness or two in answer to what Backhouse and Hardwicke have said as to Bolron's threatening of his wife. We will call the wife to give you an account of that.

Just. Dolben. They did not charge him, that they pressed her to swear falsely.

Just. Pemberton. That does not at all touch upon the witness.

Att. Gen. If the court be satisfied, we will trouble you with that no farther.

Just. Jones. I believe Backhouse did say, that this Bolron would have his wife go before the justice of peace; she said she knew nothing at all, yet he would have her go and testify her knowledge; and if she would not, he would have her dragged at the horse's tail.

Att. Gen. I think it is necessary to call a witness or two to that. First to call her herself. [Then Mrs. Bolron was sworn.]

Att. Gen. What did your husband threaten you to make you swear against sir T. Gascoigne?

Just. Dolben. Now you are upon your oath speak the truth.

Mrs. Bolron. No never in his life did he threaten me upon any such account.

Just. Dolben. Do you remember when the constable came down to have you go before squire Lowther?

Mrs. Bolron. Yes, my lord.

Just. Dolben. How chance you did not go with him?

Mrs. Bolron. I was unwilling to go then, because I could say little to the purpose.

Just. Dolben. Did he use any threats to you to make you swear against sir Thomas.

Mrs. Bolron. No my lord; but he would have me go, whether I said any thing or no.

Just. Dolben. Did he ever desire you to speak any thing you did not know?

Mrs. Bolron. No, my lord, never in his life.

Att. Gen. My lord, Mr. Bolron desires to have this woman, his grandmother, be asked whether he threatened his wife? [And she was sworn.]

Sol. Gen. She was by at that time.

Just. Dolben. Were you by at that time when the constable came to carry the witnesses before Mr. Lowther.

Mrs. Bolron Sen. Yes.

Just. Dolben. Hark you, did not you see the woman that went over there cry, and say she was unwilling to go?

Mrs. Bolron Sen. Her husband said she should go, though she said nothing.

Just. Dolben. But her husband did not press her to say any thing but what was truth?

Mrs. Bolron Sen. No, indeed did he not.

Just. Pemberton. And did not seem to stick before?

Att. Gen. What can you say to this honest man here, your son?

Just. Dolben. I will warrant she will say he is honest still.

Att. Gen. But here are a company of people would make him a dishonest man.

Mrs. Bolron Sen. Sir Thomas Gascoigne said he was as truthful a servant as ever he had in his life.

Just. Dolben. Did you hear him say so?

Mrs. Bolron Sen. I heard him say so in his own chamber.

Just. Dolben. When?

Mrs. Bolron Sen. After he was married; And besides, sir Thomas did say he would do any thing that he could for him, in relation he had been a true servant to him.

Just. Dolben. Call Mr. Phiswick again. (Who appeared.) Look ye, sir, you are a man that I see hath been trusted by all the family of the Gascoignes, and you know in what reputation he was.

Phiswick. Sir, while I was his fellow servant I knew no ill by him.

Just. Dolben. Was he accounted an honest man?

Phiswick. I can say nothing to the contrary. Serj. Maynard. Then my lord, to conclude, I desire to speak a word. On the one side here is an ancient gentleman's life in question, and that or his death are to be the issue of this cause; on the other side, here is the discovery of a plot upon which all our lives, our religion, and the life of our king depend. It did require your patience, and you have yielded it. Where lies the question? If these witnesses that have been examined be believed, there is no question but he is highly guilty of the Plot. The witnesses tell you, when there was no talk of the plot, there was a preparation of a false and fraudulent conveyance to be drawn by advice of counsel; and why was this made? Lest he should forfeit his estate. This is proved in the beginning. You find next a meeting of the priests, and there what they did does not coucern this gentleman at the bar, till he took notice of it, and then joined in it, and approved of it, and did declare it was a worthy plot, a meritorious plot for the good of the church, and at last particularly he would give 1,000*l.* to Bolron to destroy the king and murder him. The other witness agrees with him. And what is said against all this? They have called and examined I think 19 or 20 witnesses, three touching the threatening of his wife, but that falls out to be nothing; two alehouse-keepers that stood at the bottom of the stairs, and overheard their discourse; but you have all heard how they have contradicted one another, they had not agreed well enough together on their story. All that the rest do is meant thus, and so far they make something of it, that there should be a debt due from this Bolron to this gentleman, and so it were some contrivance as if he would do it by way of revenge; it does fall out many times that men do quarrel, but this is a business of another nature. They say that he should threaten he would serve him a trick, or there were some such words; but under favour, the question is, of the truth of his testimony; now it is not likely, that they knew what his testimony would be; and there is nothing against the other witness that concurs with him, but the fellows that were upon the stairs, that talk one of one part of the stairs, and the other of the other. The matter is clearly, Whether the witnesses be to be believed, or whether there be any thing sufficient offered to take off their testimony. You will be pleased to observe as to what was spoken about the money and the nunnery: We brought you a letter from the priest who was mentioned to be one of them at the meeting, Pracid, that writes and dates his letter from the place the witness speaks of, and there you will observe that in one of the letters it is expressed, If England be converted (there is the main of the Plot), for all I suppose goes to that purpose. Pray who thought of England's conversion at that time? What led them into that, but a consciousness of a design to convert England? My lord, another piece of a letter there is concerning the oath of allegiance, you have heard it read, and every body knows what the meaning of it is; it is the engine of the Jesuits, that if they can but draw men off from their fidelity to the king, whereof there is no testimony so great as the Oath of Allegiance, they need not use so much of equivocation; but that is an abominable thing, and not to be endured, to go take off the strength of that oath that hath been taken by men more honest than the rest, and not suffering the rest to take it at all: and it is a damnable thing that they should assert the king is an heretic, and the pope has deposed him, therefore it is meritorious to kill him: but you have heard the evidence fully, and it needs no aggravation.

Solicitor General. My lord, I think the evidence hath been already repeated by Mr. Serj. Maynard; and, my lord, I think there is nothing in this case, but only the credit of the witnesses; for if they be to be believed, there is an evidence as full as can be. I know your lordship observes how it is introduced, how they are fortified in some circumstances, which sir Thomas did at first deny. They tell you, that he had a pious intent to found a nunnery, and did proceed so far as to make a settlement; this was denied by sir T. Gascoigne, but hath been verified, and made out by his own books and letters writ to him, which were found in his own custody. This did sir T. Gascoigne do with an expectation of a sudden change; for the letters do declare, that England was to be converted, as they called it, and therefore they had settled their matters in order, and they thought fit to insert that proviso in the settlement, that if England should be converted, then the money was to be disposed so and so. But your lordship likewise observes, and you, gentlemen of the jury, what other correspondence sir Thomas Gascoigne had with one Coruwallis or Pracid a priest. He receives a letter which shews you what the principles of all the Catholics are, how far they have proceeded to take away even the oath of allegiance, and the consequence of that how far it will go, when they think themselves obliged in conscience to cast off fidelity to their prince; and what mischiefs may ensue no man knows, but we may in part imagine. You have already had sufficient discovery to make out the use of this instilled principle, and that is the design to kill the king; for this you hear what the evidence say. Mr. Bolron, one of them, is sent to the priest to be instructed by him; and by him was chid for offering to go against their principles to take the oath, and told him he was damned for so doing. And presently after he was examined by sir T. Gascoigne upon some discourse with him what Rushton had said, who had moved him likewise to kill the king, as he says. Sir T. Gascoigne knew to what purpose he sent him thither, not only to renounce the oath of allegiance, but to carry on the design which he had in hand, and did introduce, by laying aside the oath, and tells him he must engage in the design to kill the king. He examines him what the other had spoke to him of, and he said he knew it was more than bare chiding of him for taking the oath of allegiance; and he told him for his better encouragement to go on, that if he would undertake, he should have 1,000*l.* And this is the sum of Bolron's evidence, as to sir T. Gascoigne. What then says Mowbray, the second witness? He was so faithful a servant, and so diligent, that he was employed by Rushton the confessor to attend him at the altar, and being in service immediate about him, and he being by that means so dear to him, waited upon him in his chamber, and was privy to all the consultations held there. And he gives you an account how long this plot hath been in agitation, for they had been discoursing a good while of it; and resolved it should be done, if not by fair means, by foul, and tells you plainly by killing the king: and that he heard sir Thomas Gascoigne himself declare that it was a meritorious act to kill the king; and that as before he had the oath of secrecy given him by Rushton, so he did declare (which Mowbray standing at the door heard) that he would never swerve from the oath, but he would assist to the utmost of his power; and they that were with him said, they would stand by it with their lives and fortunes; and when my lady Tempest understood he was there, and was jealous of him, she bid him go down, and entertain the guests below stairs. So here is an evidence from two witnesses as full as can be in any case, that sir T. Gascoigne was privy to the conspiracy, and himself partaker of it, to kill the king. All that hath been said against them, is to vilify their reputation. As to Mowbray I hear but little, only there are two witnesses that touch him; and indeed if these witnesses were to be believed, they say a great deal; that is, they were in an alehouse together, and heard them conspire to take away the life of sir T. Gascoigne. Indeed Mowbray said, for sir T. Gascoigne, I know nothing but that he is a very honest gentleman, but for my lady Tempest, if I could hang her I would: that they should hear them contrive this together, and conspire how they should take away the lives of this gentleman, and the others. Indeed, if these men say true, it is a great matter to take off the credit of testimony; but you heard, gentlemen, how they did vary; for the one said, as I apprehended, at first he was in the room, afterwards he was below stairs. Ask the one, could you hear them? Yes. Could you see them? No; said the other, Yes. So that they were not well provided, as to that matter, nor had they consulted that point well, where they should agree to stand to overhear the matter. Now if that be likely, they should in the presence of two persons whom they did not know, and one of them they never saw, but in the court, declare and discourse of such a matter as this for the taking away the life of sir T. Gascoigne, then we have nothing to say to them, we must leave the credit of that to you; you will observe their variety in the story, and the improbability of the thing. But then for Mr. Bolron, the evidence against him is, that he is a very dishonest man, and that this is all out of malice to sir T. Gascoigne, because he would sue him upon his bonds. You observe how he does behave himself under that prosecution; all that he hath he is willing to part with for payment of his debt; he makes over his estate for satisfaction and security, and does as much as an honest man can do, all he had shall lie at stake: and as for sir T. Gascoigne himself, he hath no such opinion of him in point of dishonesty, for he declared he lived in his service without exception, and said before the council, he knew nothing of dishonesty by him, but only this information, and now he found him to be (what he always thought) a great fool. Now whether he thought him a fool for telling this story, or what else, you may explain the meaning of his expression; but as for any thing of dishonesty, there is nothing against Mr. Bolron. He was in debt, it is true, but what he had lay at stake for the payment of it, and as far as it would go sir Thomas might take it; but that for malice he should come to swear against him, there is nothing clearly made out. One witness says, indeed, that he should say, Does sir T. Gascoigne intend to sue me, then I will do what I did not intend to do. Whether that be a speech of malice or no, or rather does confirm the truth of his evidence, is left to your consideration: It shews rather, there was something that he had in his power to do before any prosecution from sir T. Gascoigne, or any occasion of his malice against him; it hath not the necessary import of a malicious speech, that he did intend not to do such a thing, and because he was succ'd did do it; that therefore is only truth, and no malice. For the other matter that is said against him, that he should endeavour to suborn his wife to swear falsely, that was by no means fully proved, but rather that matter hath been sufficiently cleared; that though she said she knew nothing, yet he would have her go, though she said nothing; and you hear what the evidence hath been for Mr. Bolron, that he never did press her to swear falsely, nor threaten her if she would not, but only desired her to declare her knowledge if she knew any thing, the truth, and nothing but the truth. These are all the objections made against the credit of the witnesses; and I think if their credit do stand, you cannot have a clearer evidence to convict any one than hath been given you to day; but that we leave to you, and submit these objections, whether they have any weight in them, and whether they have not been fully answered.

Serj. Maynard. And our evidence is given in all upon oath, and their's is not.

Just. Jones. Gentlemen, you of the Jury: The prisoner at the bar stands indicted for high treason, and for high treason of the highest nature, for conspiring to take away the life of the king, and for endeavouring to change the religion, the Protestant religion into Popery; that is, contriving to extirpate the religion of Protestantism here, and introduce Popery instead of it; and certainly greater crimes than these no man can be accused of. There have been produced, on the behalf of the king, two witnesses, Mr. Bolron and Mr. Mowbray, both of them servants to sir T. Gascoigne the prisoner, and therefore might very possibly and probably enough be privy to all they have said and testified in this case. It does appear by them both, that sir T. Gascoigne was a very early man in the Plot, if they say true. We heard nothing of it till the long vacation, 1678; but it seems sir T. Gascoigne was a plotter and conspirator in the year 1675 or 1676. And that he might be able to do this somewhat more safely, he contrives how he might convey away his estate to prevent the forfeiture; and he makes an assurance of it to sir William Ingelby, colourably, as the witnesses swear, for

1,000*l.* And it does appear likewise, as to the introduction of the Popish religion here, they began to settle a nunnery, and it was fit to do so against England should be converted; first, in such a place: but if it happened England were converted, then to be removed to another place. There was at this nunnery appointed an abess, an assistant and several nuns; and sir T. Gascoigne so well knew of this, that one of them that was appointed to be a nun, at the time of her taking horse, he said to her, 'There goes an old maid and a young nun.' And there are letters come from that very nunnery, and from the priest that was appointed to attend them as confessor, which have been read to you. And there is another preparation thought necessary to introduce this Plot, and that is, That all Papists might be seduced into an opinion that it was a dangerous thing to take the oath of allegiance, and that it was a damnable sin. For this purpose letters came from the doctors at Sorbonne, and they determine it to be so, lest any man of that religion should be so good a subject as to profess obedience to the king in temporals. Then the Plot goes on between sir Miles Stapleton, sir Francis Hungatt, sir Charles Vavasor, sir T. Gascoigne, Mt. Gascoigne, Middleton, Rushton, my lady Tempest, and a great company more; all met together and consulting in sir T. Gascoigne's house, in his great room, his old dining-room, to this purpose, not only to bring in their religion, but kill the king expressly (so says the witness). I think they had often talked of it before the witness in the priest's chamber; for he being then a Papist was privy to his master's design, and the rest of the confederates for killing the king, which was the only thing they desired to effect, as the best way to bring in their religion; and there was great reason to do it, they said too, for the king had not kept his word with them when he was in his exile; for they said, he had promised if he was restored to his kingdoms, he would restore the Popish religion; but now he was returned and had broke his promise and nothing more was to be done, the Pope having declared him an heretic, but to destroy him; and this was that which was agreed among them. The 30th of May last, after divers other consults had about it, the priest Rushton being at sir T. Gascoigne's house, Bolron is desired to go into the gallery, and there presently comes in Rushton, sir Thomas's priest; Bolron acquaints him that he had been at the sessions, and taken the oath of allegiance. As soon as ever he heard it, he cries out, He had committed a damnable sin, he must of necessity renounce it, and repent of it, and he could give him a pardon, for he had an extraordinary power, more authority than others, he could give him absolution if he did repent of it, and that no Catholic must by any means take the oath. A while after they had a discourse concerning killing the king; and the witness says indeed, he was not actually in the room, for he says he stood at the door, and heard all the discourse, till at last the lady Tempest, one of the conspirators, taking notice of his being there, sent him down stairs.

Justice Pemberton. That is Mowbray.

Mr. Mowbray. I was called into the room, and then sent down.

Justice Jones. It is true, brother, that was Mowbray: but as to Bolron's discourse with Rushton; when sir T. Gascoigne, who was not in the house at the time Bolron was with Rushton, but had given a charge he should not go before he spoke with him: when he did come home and spoke with him, he takes upon him to go on with the discourse concerning the Plot, and he swears positively that he offered he would give him 1,000*l.* and this he swears he should have paid him in London. This is expressly the testimony of Bolron. Now what says Mowbray? He tells you (though that is but introduction to make his evidence more probable) that there was great resort of priests to the prisoner's house. He tells you of the discourse and consultation the priests had in the house, and that it was expressly and precisely for killing the king. He tells you, that he did stand at the door and heard it, as I observed before; and he tells you too, which hath not been observed, that at that time there was produced a list of four or five hundred persons that had engaged in the design of killing the king: he did see the list, he did see sir T. Gascoigne's hand, which he very well knew and was acquainted with, and which might very well be, being his servant. So that here is not only a discourse and agreement by paroll, that he should be in the conspiracy; but if you believe him, he says, that here is actually the hand of sir Thomas to the engagement to do the villainy; and truly they that were of that persuasion at that time, might easily be induced to it. For it was agreed amongst them, that they should have a plenary indulgence of 10,000 years, and it was a meritorious act; and though sir Thomas perhaps was not so ready to contribute in all things, yet hearing of the meritoriousness of the act, and withal that he should be canonized for a saint for this piece of piety, he certainly might readily consent to it. Mr. Mowbray indeed was asked, Why he did not discover it sooner? He tells you why. He was in fear of the Papists; he was threatened; and very like he might be possessed with fear, and so might a man of greater constancy till the business was discovered; and therefore he did not talk of it in the country, but came up here, where it was more safe to discover it, and hath been here ever since. Besides this testimony of these witnesses, gentlemen, there are some papers produced, some that mention money that hath been conveyed by sir T. Gascoigne, in confirmation of the testimony of Bolron the first witness, who does swear that he heard sir Thomas say he would send 3,000*l.* to the Jesuits to go on and prosecute this Plot; and afterwards he did hear him say, he had sent the 3,000*l.* that he had promised. Now it does appear by sir Thomas's almanack, that he had sent several sums; his receiver Phiswick did speak of 6,000*l.* and he himself did give a touch towards it. Indeed Phiswick was a receiver for sir Thomas, and likewise for his son, and for the lady Tempest; but it is impossible, if they had sent all the money that ever they had; and considering too that the lady Tempest, as appears by the witnesses, lived in the country, that it could have amounted to near that sum of money; for she had 300*l.* a year, and the eldest son had but 400*l.* a year, how then could 6,000*l.* be returned for them in four years time? It is true, there is some answer given as to that 900*l.* by that witness Hobart, who says there was a suit, and 100*l.* a year decreed to be paid to Mrs. Appleby, sir Thomas's niece, for so many years, and he to take care of sending that to her: and though that was but 100*l.* a year, yet there was a decree, or some order, to pay the arrears with the other money, which made it up 900*l.*

The evidence for the king against the prisoner is but two witnesses, but they as positive and express as possibly can be. What then is said by the prisoner, or the witnesses, in his defence? There is one, that is Shippon, that gives some testimony against the very evidence, and the possibility of it to be true in one part of it: for Bolron, he tells you, that the 30th of May was the time when there was that consult held at sir T. Gascoigne's in the gallery with the priest, that he staid there till night, and that then sir Thomas talked with him, and made this proffer to him for the murder and destruction of the king. Here comes a witness, Shippon, and tells you, that that very 30th of May, Bolron was at his house at 2 o'clock, and staid an hour or two after sunset. If that were true that he were there all that time, it is not then true that he speaks of about sir T. Gascoigne; and it was impossible that he should be at the consult at that time when he says he was there, and afterwards spoke to sir T. Gascoigne. Now gentlemen, you have the king's witness upon his oath; he that testifies against him is barely upon his word, and he is a Papist too, for that he was asked, and he did confess himself so. I do not say that a Papist is no witness, a Papist is a witness, and he is a witness in a Papist cause, and for a Papist; but I must tell you, there is less credit to be given to a Papist in a cause of this nature, who can easily believe they may have indulgences and pardons enough for saving one from the gallows who is to be canonized for a Saint if the plot take effect. He hath only affirmed it who is a Papist, the other who is a Protestant swears what his evidence is.

Mr. Babbington, who was the first witness examined for the prisoner, he tells you there had been some debates and differences about rent and money that was owing by Bolron to the prisoner. He laboured and interceded often on his behalf; but at length not being able to prevail that he should not be sued, the witness swears, I will then do that which I did not intend to do. What he meant by it is doubtful, and it is an ambiguous speech; but to interpret it that he would swear falsely to take away a man's life, and so commit both murder and perjury, is hard to infer and conclude from such doubtful words. There are some witnesses that tell you—that is, Moor and others, that Bolron did say and swear that sir T. Gascoigne was never concerned in the plot: that might very well be, especially if you take the time when he did say this, he was a Papist a great while after sir Thomas had engaged himself in the plot; and while he was so, it is not unlike he would venture an oath to save any of the same persuasion and religion he himself was of. But whatsoever he said, it was not judicially, he was not bound to discover to him he spoke to; he is now upon his oath, and you have heard what an express testimony he gives. As to what is said concerning his wife, that he should endeavour to persuade her, contrary to her knowledge, to give testimony against sir T. Gascoigne, and therefore he is not to be believed here upon his own oath, who would have his wife forswear herself to fortify him; there is no such thing; and it does appear by the evidence of those that are sworn, that he was earnest, and would have his wife go and testify her knowledge; but did not infuse or intimate any thing to her she should say, whether she did know it or no: And to assure you that, you have the oath of the woman herself, who hath been present here, and tells you the same thing. Dixon he comes and says, in August last, Mowbray said he knew nothing of the prisoner, which may be answered by his fear; but concerning the two witnesses that Mr. Solicitor did take notice, he did tell you, and it is plain, how very improbable it was two persons should speak in the presence of strangers, and tell them they were about to take away the life of another person, the one of the lady Tempest, who had done him a displeasure, the other of sir T. Gascoigne; but Mowbray at that time said he knew nothing of sir T. Gascoigne; but, gentlemen, besides what was said before, this is improbable any such thing should be, and you hear the witnesses, at least one of them, that he never knew one of the two.

Mr. Bolron. I knew neither of them.

Just. Jones. I should be very loth to omit any thing on the witnesses side, or that hath been materially testified against them on the prisoner's. I did not conceive the evidence given by Mr. Pebles to come to any thing at all. There was a discourse between Bolron and him at last assizes; after some talk Bolron tells him he had something to say to him, and what was it? Bolron was told that he had discharged some persons that he ought not to do, (excused them for money that did not take the oath of allegiance as they ought to have done) and it seems he did it here, and so far he went as to bring witnesses before the justices of peace to prove it. And although they did not give evidence against Mr. Pebles in that very particular, yet certainly he thought they would have said something; but that does not argue at all, that because he did accuse Mr. Pebles (as he thought justly in that particular), therefore, that now he should falsely accuse sir Thomas in a matter that concerns his life so highly. There are some other things that were said by the witnesses that would tend towards the proving of some malice in the witnesses towards sir T. Gascoigne, and therefore they give in this evidence: One thing indeed was spoken by Hickeringil; that is, it was generally reported in the country, that Mowbray had taken away money from sir T. Gascoigne, and that Mowbray himself said, that as they had endeavoured to take away his fame and life, now he had found an opportunity to requite them. So saith the witness, but it is not very probable. I leave it with you upon the credit of the witnesses for the king, who have sworn it upon their oaths, and the others that go upon their words, and not their oaths, whether they have taken away the force and strength of the king's evidence, which is as full, express, and positive as can be by two witnesses.

Gentlemen, here is on the one side the life of an ancient gentleman before you; on the other side there is a conspiracy against the life of the king, who is the breath of our nostrils, and whom God long preserve. I know you being upon your oaths will take into your considerations both, and give a verdict according to the evidence you have heard.

Just. Dolben. I will tell you gentlemen, I cannot forbear saying one thing to you. There is some evidence that makes it a very improbable thing to be true what Mr. Bolron hath said; and yet Mr. Bolron having said it so positively, and Mowbray agreeing with it, probabilities must give way to positive proofs. I saw you did observe it when it was mentioned: and it is true, to me it seems improbable, that at the very same time that sir Tho. Gascoigne should sue him upon his bond, and take a course to turn him out of his house, that he should then be privy to such a conspiracy; it is improbable either that sir Thomas should offer him such a sum of money to kill the king, or if he had, that he should afterwards take that course at law against him. Now for that I say this to you, you are to give a verdict according to your evidence. They have such secret contrivances amongst themselves, (and he was a papist at that time) that where there are two men that positively tell you a thing that lies within their own knowledge, and swear it is true, it is scarce any improbability that should weigh against such an evidence.

Just. Pemberton. And, gentlemen, consider withal as to that; for truly my brother Dolben hath rightly minded you of that improbability, for it was no more: but then you must consider all the circumstances. It is indeed at the first blush improbable that a man would communicate so great a secret to another, if he did intend to sue him for money he owed him; but then it is likewise as improbable that he would provoke him by a suit if his life were in his hand; but consider the delivering of the lease of ejectment, and those things were the 13th of June.

Mr. Babbington. But I had sued him before my lord.

Just. Dolben. The 2d of June, he says.

Mr. Babbington. I had direction long before I did it.

Just. Pemberton. They threatened him the 2d, but they did not do it. But look you, gentlemen, consider this; I do not doubt but sir T. Gascoigne was sure that this man durst not discover any thing of this, for they had given him the sacrament and an oath of secrecy, which they look upon as a tie, among themselves, as long as they continue in that religion, not upon any account whatsoever to be undone; and they have such confidence in it, that they will trust their lives and every thing in a man's hand when they have given that oath. Alas! how could these people have the confidence to plot one with another, as they do, when they know their lives are in the hands of any one of all the rest, but upon this account? Do but swear them unto secrecy, and give them the sacrament of the mass upon it, and then they think such a one is proof enough against any thing in the world for that is damnation if they break it, as their priests tell them; but I doubt not but sir Thomas thought he had them as fast as can be upon that lock. But as to sir Thomas's evidence of those two men at Leeds, this is after the accusation of sir Thomas that they spake of; and can any man alive believe that they would go and plot to contrive the death of these two persons in the face of two strangers, after he was accused? It is so strange an evidence, that no man alive can believe it to be truth. Look you, gentlemen, persons that go to contrive such things as these are, go in secret, and hope they should never be discovered, but by one of themselves. Who would contrive when two be by? and, if they say true, might see them as well as hear them? though they did contradict one another in their evidence; the one said he was above, the other said he was below; the one said he might see them, the other not. Look you, gentlemen, I do see that they do lay some stress upon this, that he was his debtor, for that they seem to prove by their witnesses; but you must lay no great stress upon that at all, for the money were not quit if sir Thomas were found guilty; the money is due to the king then he saves nothing by it, his money must be paid; let the prisoner be found guilty, or not guilty it is all one to him. You must consider this case, gentlemen: if you believe these men are perjured men, and have gone and contrived a malicious design against a man's life, then God forbid they should be believed anyway: but it is a positive evidence; and it is not an evidence barely of itself, but introduced by a great many circumstances that went before; they tell you the whole affair that it does seem they have been privy to the affairs of these Jesuits all along, and sir Tho. Gascoigne's house hath it seems abounded with them; he hath been very beneficial to that sort of people, mighty charitable, as they call it, in superstition; and you must consider, that nothing can seem strange to them that will be ridden by priests; they put them upon all the immoralities and villainies that can be found out for the cause of religion, as they call it; nothing can seem strange that is testified against them. Therefore I must leave it to you, upon what you have heard, and upon their credit, whether you believe the witness or not.

Just. Jones. Ay, it is left upon their credit that are your own countrymen, better known to you than us.

Just. Dolben. Look you, sir Thomas Hodson, and the gentlemen of the jury, if you will come in again in any time we will stay in court, otherwise you must lie by it all night, for we can take no privy verdict in this case.

Just. Pemberton. Ay, we will stay and hear motions a little while.

Then the jury withdrew from the bar, and after half an hour returned again, and being called over gave their verdict thus:

Cl. of the Cr. Sir Thomas Gasoigne, hold up thy hand. Look upon the prisoner: How say you? Is he Guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty.

Cl. of the Cr. Did he fly for it?

Foreman. Not that we know of.

Then the Verdict was recorded, and the Court rose.

265. The Trial of ELIZABETH CELLIER, at the King's-Bench, for High Treason: 32 CHARLES II. A. D. 1680.

AFTER the Jury were sworn, the clerk of the crown read the Indictment, viz:

The jurors of our lord the king do present, that Elizabeth Cellier, wife of Peter Cellier, late of the parish of St. Clement Danes in the county of Middlesex, gent. stands indicted, for that she as a false traitress against our most illustrious and excellent prince, king Charles 2. her natural lord, not having God before her eyes, not weighing the duty of her allegiance; but by the instigation of the devil moved and seduced, and the cordial love and true due natural obedience which all faithful subjects of our said lord the king towards him should bear, and of right are bound to bear, utterly withdrawing, and devising, and with all her might intending the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom to disturb, and to bring and put our said lord the king to death and final destruction, and the true worship of God in this realm by the law established and used, to alter to the superstition of the church of Rome; to move and stir up war against the king in this kingdom, and to subvert the government of this realm; the 1st day of November, in the 31st year of the said king's reign, at the parish of St. Clement Dane aforesaid, when divers other false traitors unknown, traiterously did compass, imagine, and intend the killing, death and final destruction of our said lord the king, and to change, alter, and utterly to subvert the ancient government of this realm, and to depose, and wholly to deprive him the said king of his crown and government of this kingdom, and to extirpate the true religion within this realm established, and so fulfil and accomplish the same most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes, the same Elizabeth Cellier, and other false traitors unknown, the said 1st day of November, in the 31st year aforesaid, with force and arms, &c. at the parish of St. Clement Danes aforesaid, advisedly, devilishly, maliciously, and traiterously assembled, united, and gathered themselves together, and then and there devilishly, advisedly, maliciously, cunningly, and traiterously consulted and agreed to bring the said lord the king to death and final destruction, and to depose and deprive him of his crown and government, and so introduce and establish the Romish religion in this kingdom; and the sooner to fulfil and effect the same most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes, the said Elizabeth Cellier, and other unknown traitors, then and there did contribute, pay and expend divers great sums of money to several unknown persons, to procure them traiterously to kill the said king, and introduce the Romish religion in this realm; and for the better concealing of the treasons aforesaid, the said Elizabeth Cellier then and there did pay and expend to divers other persons unknown, divers other sums of money, falsely to impose the said treasons upon some other persons unknown, against the duty of her allegiance, and against the peace of our lord the king, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in such case made and provided, &c."

John Gadbury sworn.

L. C. J. (sir William Scroggs.) Mr. Gadbury, What do you know concerning this plot?

Gadbury. I know nothing of it, neither one way nor another.

L. C. J. Do you know of any contrivance of Mrs. Cellier's to kill the king?

Gadbury. No, rather the contrary.

L. C. J. Do you know of any attempts to change the government?

Gadbury. I will tell your lordship what I do know, if these gentlemen will not be too nimble for me. I have suffered a great deal of prejudice of late in relation to a plot, as if I had known of a plot; but God is my witness, I know of none, unless it were a plot to bring sir Robert Peyton over to the king's interest. That plot I had some concern in, and had some knowledge of Mrs. Cellier's concern in it; but she was so far from doing any thing against the king's interest, that she was willing to bring over with him the three gentlemen turned out of commission when sir Robert was. So that how she could be acting for the king and against the king at the same time, I do not understand.

L. C. J. Mr. Gadbury, you are a man of learning, pray will you give your testimony of the things that you know in relation to Mrs. Cellier.

Gadbury. Mrs. Cellier was not committed upon any accusation; therefore, I hoped she might have been tried without my testimony. But when I was in danger of my life, when I lay in the Gate-house, Mrs. Cellier was reported to be a third witness against me, and then I raked up every trifle; but if I had thought it treason, I would have discovered it before. And as to that particular business concerning Mr. Smith, that Smith some time since did come to me, being my old acquaintance, to ask my advice in his affairs; and he had an affair of so great moment, that it was necessary to ask my advice in it, which was to go to the lords in the Tower. I asked him, what to do? Smith he, I can say enough against Dr. Oates to serve them, and take off his evidence, and asked me if he should do it. By no means, Mr. Smith, said I. Mrs. Cellier afterwards told me this Smith and one Phillips were willing to tell some stories or other of Mr. Oates and Mr. Bedloe, and I told her this very story; saith she, You being acquainted with him, it is possible you may do some good upon him; and saith she, I had as lieve as 10 guineas that you could do it.

L. C. J. That is, when that you advised Mr. Smith not to meddle with any thing against Dr. Oates.

Gadbury. She said, she did not care if she had been at the charge of 10 guineas, if he would be honest and discover the truth. And, my lord, she did say she had heard Mr. Dangerfield talk of a Nonconformists Plot that would off the Popish Plot.

L. C. J. Did she say that she had heard Dangerfield say there was a Nonconformists Plot, and that he was to have a commission among them? And did she say, that she had heard him say, that he hoped under the colour of that the Popish Plot would go on? Or did she say it of her own accord, that she hoped that would carry on the Popish Plot?

Gadbury. My lord, I cannot remember particulars.

L. C. J. There is a great deal of difference between Dangerfield's saying it, and her saying it.

Gadbury. I have no reason to spare her: But I am unwilling to speak any thing that is contrary to truth, though she hath done me the greatest injury in the world.

L. C. J. How come you to talk of a Nonconformists Plot.

Gadbury. It was only common discourse, as it was at coffee houses.

Just. Raymond. Had you heard of it before she spake of it, that you say it was common.

Gadbury. No, not till she spake of it.

L. C. J. Did Mrs. Cellier tell you of any popish priests or Jesuits coming hither from beyond the seas?

Gadbury. Upon the going over of one Clay, I think she did say she heard there were some more coming over.

L. C. J. What to do?

Gadbury. God knows what.

L. C. J. Did she speak of any Plot or contrivance to kill the king.

Gadbury. No, she was always an enemy to Plots, or else I would not have kept her company.

L. C. J. Did she say there were, or that she heard there were several priests and Jesuits coming over.

Gadbury. My lord, I think she said she heard it. And I have said several times to her, the popish Plotters would be destroyed: But she answered, she was afraid the nation would be destroyed first.

L. C. J. Did she say she was afraid of it, or that the nation would be destroyed first? I ask you once more, we must try people according to their oaths. By the oath you have taken, when you said you thought the popish Plotters would be destroyed, what answer did she make?

Gadbury. She said she was afraid the nation would be so; because she said, abundance of the best of the nation went into other nations, to weaken our nation, and spend their money, and therefore she was afraid the nation would be destroyed before them.

L. C. J. What discourse had you with Mrs. Cellier passing through Westminster-Abbey?

Gadbury. My lord, my memory hath been exceedingly bruised; but I remember, my lord as I was going through the Abbey in a rainy afternoon, she said this Abbey was formerly filled with Benedictine monks, or something to that purpose; and, saith she, what if it should be so again?

L. C. J. Are you a protestant or a papist?

Gadbury. A Protestant, my lord.

L. C. J. He talks as like a papist as can be, was it, 'what if it should be filled?'

Gadbury. She said, what if it should be again?

L. C. J. What did you say to that?

Gadbury. I only smiled to hear a woman's discourse, my lord

L. C. J. You make all the company laugh: What did she say of the Temple?

Gadbury. That the Temple had been filled with friers too.

L. C. J. And what then? Did she talk of filling it again?

Gadbury. Saith she, this place was filled with Benedictine monks, and the Temple with friers.

L. C. J. This may do well enough: But what did she say else concerning the Temple?

Gadbury. Nothing, my lord.

Serj. Maynard said something to him here, which was not heard, but,

Mr. Gadbury replied, Mr. Serjeant, I was none of the tribe of forty-one.

Here Mr. Gadbury was going to read in his Paper; but the court told him that would not be allowed; but he might refresh his memory with it.

L. C. J. Now tell me what she said; Mr. Gadbury keep it in your hand.

Gadbury. My lord, she put it by way of interrogation to feel my pulse.

L. C. J. What did she else?

Gadbury. There was nothing but transient discourse, my lord.

L. C. J. We must ask you what the truth is, and you have looked upon your paper. Now consider what you say, and consider that you are upon a solemn occasion, and are to testify it in the presence of God Almighty. I would have you tell plainly what it is, and neither to make it more, nor stifle it.

Gadbury. It was only transient discourse.

L. C. J. Say what it was. Was it, 'This place was once filled with Benedictine monks?'

Gadbury. She said that the Abbey had been filled with Benedictine monks, as the Temple had with friers.

Just. Jones. Look upon your paper.

L. C. J. You have looked upon the paper, and pray tell us what she said. Did she say she hoped to see this place filled with Benedictines?

Gadbury. My lord, I do not remember that word 'hope.'

L. C. J. How long have you been acquainted with Mrs. Cellier?

Gadbury. Ten or a dozen years.

L. C. J. Did she never ask you any questions about the life of the king?

Gadbury. My lord, when the king was very ill at Windsor, and all the people were fearful that he would die, she did move the question to me.

L. C. J. What question?

Gadbury. To know, whether I thought his majesty would live or die? But it was her fear that he would die.

L. C. J. Had you seen the king?

Gadbury. No, my lord.

L. C. J. How then did she expect you should give her an answer? From your art?

Gadbury. From my art, my lord!

L. C. J. Did she desire you to consult your art, how long the king would live?

Gadbury. She did as I said.

L. C. J. What did you say to that?

Gadbury. I would not tell her, because he was my sovereign.

L. C. J. What answer did you make?

Gadbury. I told her I would not meddle with it.

L. C. J. She would have had you consult your art or scheme, or whatever it is, to know whether the king would live or die?

Gadbury. It was something of that.

L. C. J. And you said you would not meddle nor make with it?

Gadbury. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. She desired you to make a scheme?

Gadbury. No, my lord, I can't say she mentioned a scheme, but she asked the question.

Just. Raymond. What did she ask else?

Gadbury. Only that question.

L. C. J. How often do you believe she spake of it.

Gadbury. Never, my lord, but when he was ill. I will not baffle any thing that may conduce to the safety of the king and kingdom.

L. C. J. Indeed it is very conducive to the safety of the king and kingdom, if any go about to destroy him, and with evil intentions to ask how long he will live, and you ought in duty to God and your sovereign to declare it. Did she ever make any enquiries about the king's death more than what you have said?

Gadbury. No more, my lord; and then she was fearful he would die.

L. C. J. Did she say she would go to somebody else?

Gadbury. My lord, when she perceived me shy, she said, I see you are afraid of me, I will go to some other astrologer.

L. C. J. For what?

Gadbury. To satisfy her curiosity, as a great many do.

L. C. J. What curiosities did she ask besides this?

Gadbury. She would ask me sometimes about the condition of bodies, whether they would be prosperous in the world, and several other questions.

L. C. J. Were you nice in these curiosities?

Gadbury. Truly, my lord, I was shy of meddling with any thing, when I heard there was a talk about plots.

L. C. J. Was you nice to give her satisfaction according to her hopes concerning these things you call curiosities, questioning whether one should be well wed, how many children she should have, &c. Were you scrupulous in that?

Gadbury. I think I might not be nice in that very particular.

L. C. J. How came it, then, that she would go to another astrologer?

Gadbury. She asked me something about Mr. Dangerfield.

L. C. J. For what?

Gadbury. How to get him out of prison.

L. C. J. Pray how came she to say she would go to another astrologer? you were not shy to give her an answer to these questions?

Gadbury. It was something about Mr. Dangerfield, my lord, she asked me something about some deeds or papers which he was to search for, or seize, which concerned Mr. Bedlow.

L. C. J. She had better have gone to one of the clerks than to a conjurer for them. But why would she go to another astrologer?

Gadbury. Because I was shy.

L. C. J. You were not shy in these things about Bedlow. Did she not say, when you refused to meddle with the death of the king, that she would go to another astrologer?

Gadbury. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Did you any thing for her at that time?

Gadbury. My lord, I did calculate a scheme which since I found to be for Mr. Dangerfield, but I knew not for whom it was when I did it.

L. C. J. How! Can you apply one scheme to any body?

Gadbury. My lord, when Mrs. Cellier came to me, she gave me the time of a person's nativity, and I set the figure of the heavens to that sign, to know whether he were a person fit to be trusted, her husband being a French Merchant, to get in money.

L. C. J. For ought you know, Dangerfield was a woman, and the question was, whether Dangerfield was with child, and he happens to be a man. How did it fall out?

Gadbury. I have forgotten, my lord.

L. C. J. When did you know it was for Dangerfield?

Gadbury. My lord, never before I came before the king and council; neither did I know his name before, for he went by the name of Willoughby before.

L. C. J. What other discourse had you with her? Did she not at anytime talk of Mr. Dugdale?

Gadbury. She did say she had heard of some people that were to discourse with Mr. Dugdale; she had heard such a thing, but I do not know whether she knew any thing of it, or no.

L. C. J. What discourse had you about that?

Gadbury. She told me there was a woman to go down to Windsor to beg Mr. Dugdale's pardon, for he was penitent for what he had said in some trial or other.

L. C. J. Call another witness.

*Att. Gen. (Sir Creswel Levinz.) Mr. Dangerfield, pray give the court an account of what you know of Mrs. Cellier, the prisoner at the bar.

Mrs. Cellier. My lord, I except against that witness.

L. C. J. Why so? You must shew some reason, and then we will do you justice in God's name.

Mrs. Cellier. If I can prove he was whipped and transported, pilloried, perjured, &c. he is no witness. The last time I was upon my trial he threatened some of my witnesses, that if they would not swear as he would have them, he would kill them.

L. C. J. If you can shew any record whereby he is convicted of any thing that can by law take away his testimony, do it.

Mrs. Cellier. He has been indicted for burglary.

L. C. J. (To Mr. Dangerfield) Was you indicted for burglary?

Mr. Dangerfield. I will take it at their proof.

Ralph Briscoe, a witness for the defendant, sworn.

L. C. J. Do you know Dangerfield?

Briscoe. I remember one Thomas Dangerfield: I saw him burnt in the hand at the Old Bailey.

L. C. J. Is this the same man?

Briscoe. I do believe it is the same man; but I have not seen him these several years.

L. C. J. Let every body have their right, in God's name. Have you any more?

Mrs. Cellier. My lord, I can prove him perjured.

L. C. J. Have you any records to shew he was perjured? Is he convicted?

Mrs. Cellier. No.

L. C. J. Then you cannot do it.

Mrs. Cellier. My lord, I can prove him guilty of forgery.

L. C. J. If you do not produce the record, you do nothing.

Mr. Recorder. (Sir George Jefferies.) That which she calls forgery, is not that which the law calls forgery; it is counterfeiting Guineas.

L. C. J. Can you shew he forged any deeds? If you can prove that he hath committed forgery, and be not convicted, it is no error.

L. C. J. Have you your pardon? she hath proved the conviction of felony, prove your pardon.

Mrs. Cellier. I have the copies of several records here in court, which will be sworn to.

To which Mr. Dangerfield pleaded his majesty's most gracious pardon. To which Mrs. Cellier replied, That she had a copy of the said pardon in court, but it did not extend to some of the crimes for which he stood convicted; and then produced a record, wherein it did appear he was outlawed upon a felony. Upon which the court commanded Mr. Dangerfield to go and fetch his pardon; in the interim examining several of the king's witnesses.

Thomas Williamson sworn.

L. C. J. Did you ever see Dangerfield and Mrs. Cellier in company?

Williamson. No, my lord, but I have been employed for Mrs. Cellier in several businesses of charity to get prisoners out. When Mr. Dangerfield was in Newgate, she employed me to get him out.

L. C. J. Why was she so kind to Dangerfield?

Williamson. My lord, I don't know that; but she bid me get him out whosoever staid behind.

Justice Raymond. Why should she get him out? Did she tell you what she would do with him when she had him out?

Williamson. No, my lord.

Recorder. We bring him for a witness, that she had a great kindness for Dangerfield.

Margaret Jenkins sworn.

L. C. J. What discourse have you heard between Dangerfield and Cellier?

Jenkins. I never saw them together but twice. It is a year since I came from them.

L. C. J. When you saw them at dinner or supper together, what other company was there?

Jenkins. Her husband was with her one time.

L. C. J. What did they talk about?
Jenkins. They were talking about the prisoners that were condemned.

L. C. J. Where was it, at her house?

Jenkins. No, at my lady Powis's house.

L. C. J. How came you there?

Jenkins. I carried notes backwards and forwards.

L. C. J. Did you never hear no discourse about the Plot?—Jenkins. No.

Susan Edwards sworn.

Recorder. What intimacy have you known between Dangerfield and Mrs. Cellier?

L. C. J. Did you ever see them together?

Edwards. Yes, very often, my lord. She said, That the Popish Plot would turn to a Presbyterian Plot.

L. C. J. Who did she say that to? To Dangerfield?

Edwards. No, my lord; but I have heard him say those words, and that he would make it his interest it should be so.

L. C. J. What did you say to him, when he said he must turn rogue and discover all their Plots?

Edwards. I said, he would be no greater rogue than he was before.

L. C. J. You were pretty nimble with him.

Edwards. He thought he should be hanged.

L. C. J. For what?

Edwards. If he did not turn rogue he thought he should be hanged.

Edwards to Mrs. Cellier. You were very often together in your chamber.

Mrs. Cellier. Who gave you your clothes?

Edwards. Her husband was gone to church one morning, and he was with her in her chamber.

L. C. J. I can't see why you should prove this matter too far.

Recorder. Susan is a civil young woman.

Edwards. She said she would do my business for me, and I go in danger of my life.

Bennet Dowdal sworn.

L. C. J. What do you know of any intimacy between Dangerfield and Mrs. Cellier?

Dowdal. I have seen them together.

L. C. J. What did they talk about?

Dowdal. Mrs. Cellier proposed a match between Mrs. Mary Ayrey and I, and they used to talk of that when I was with them.

L. C. J. Did they talk of the Plot at any time?

Dowdal. No.

L. C. J. Did you ever hear them talk of the king?—Dowdal. No.

L. C. J. Have you any more?

Recorder. Not till Mr. Dangerfield comes.

L. C. J. to Mrs. Cellier. Have you any Record to shew he was put in the pillory?

Mrs. Cellier. Yes, my lord.

[Upon which the copy of a Record from Salisbury was read, of his standing on the pillory for uttering counterfeit guineas: As also a copy of a Record of an Outlawry for Felony.]

L. C. J. What say you to this outlawry?

Recorder. It is not the same person.

L. C. J. We ought to be very careful in these concerns, else we may do a work this day may make all the kingdom rue it. It is a sad thing that people of a vicious profligate life, both before they came to Newgate, and all along in their life-time, should be suffered to be witnesses to take away the life of a woman. I question whether he will come again or no, he hath been gone a great while. Such are fit to be employed to find out, but hard to be believed when they find out.

L. C. J. Captain Richardson, is this the man that broke Chelmsford gaol?

Capt. Richardson. My lord, I can say nothing to that, but he was brought by an Habeas Corpus from thence to me.

L. C. J. Was he burnt in the hand for felony?

Capt. Richardson. Yes, my lord, I believe he was.

L. C. J. He made me believe as though he would fly, I believe he is. We will not hood-wink ourselves against such a fellow as this, that is guilty of so notorious crimes. A man of modesty, after he hath been in the pillory, would not look a man in the face. It appears that after he hath been burnt in the hand, he hath been outlawed for felony, and so it doth appear by Record.

[After about half an hour's stay, Mr. Dangerfield returned and brought his Pardon; which was read, and the word Felony omitted; and instead of 'Utlagaria qualiacunq; pro felonis quibuscunq;' there was only inserted, 'Omnia maleficia et utlagaria qualiacunq;' which omission had made the Pardon defective, it being my Lord Chief Justice's opinion that the word 'Utlagaria' did only reach to Outlawries between party and party; by which his Evidence was wholly laid aside.*]

* In the second volume of Mr. Hargrave's Juridical Arguments and Collections, p. 321, is a very elaborate and learned argument on the effect of the king's pardon of perjury; in which the law respecting the king's power or prerogative of pardoning, is investigated with very great ability. Of the Case before us, Mr. Hargrave writes thus:

"Another authority is the opinion of lord keeper North, whilst Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, or rather of him and the other judges present. It appears in the trial of Mr. Nicholas Reading [ante p. 259, of this volume.] The trial was before Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer in April 1679. It was one of the trials on account of the Popish Plot, as it was stiled. Mr. Reading was indicted for corruptly endeavouring to persuade Wm. Bedlow, so notorious as one of the principal witnesses in that mysterious and unintelligible business, not to give evidence against lord Stafford and other Roman Catholics. After Bedlow's being for some time under examination, Mr. Read-

L. C. J. to Mr. Dangerfield. Such fellows as you are, sirrah, shall know we are not afraid of you. He produces us here a Pardon by the name of Thomas Dangerfield of Waltham, and says, his father and kinsman are both of that name and place. Will you have him sworn, whether his father or cousin Thomas were ever convicted of felony? It is notorious enough what a fellow this is, he was in Chelmsford gaol. I will shake all such fellows before I have done with them. Have you any more to say? are there any Waltham men here?

Dangerfield My lord, this is enough to discourage a man from ever entering into an honest principle.

L. C. J. What? Do you with all mischief that hell hath in you, think to brave it in a court of justice? I wonder at your impudence, that you dare look a court of justice in the face, after having been made appear so notorious a villain.

ing, to disqualify Bedlow from further testimony, asked him; whether he had not laid in provisions of fire to burn the city of Westminster. This question was objected to, because it was making Bedlow the accuser of himself. It was also objected to, because he had the king's pardon. To this latter objection, Mr. Reading answered, that though the king's pardon remitted the punishment, it did not hinder objecting to invalidate his testimony: and that, notwithstanding the pardon, he was not a lawful witness. But Mr. Reading was informed by lord North, that there was this dilemma against the question. If Bedlow had not a pardon he was in danger of death from answering the question. If he had a pardon, it took away as well all calumny, as liability to punishment; and so set him right against all. Accordingly Bedlow was held to be a lawful witness at all events; and his examination proceeded.

"The next authority I find is the opinion of the King's-bench, on the trial of Mrs. Cellier for high treason at the bar of that court in Trin. Term, 1680. Mrs. Cellier was one of those accused as a party to the Popish Plot in the latter stage of the disgraceful prosecutions on that account. Dangerfield, a man of the most infamous character, was adduced as a witness to prove the charge. But it was objected against his being received as witness, that he had been several times convicted of cheating, and had been set upon the pillory, and had been whipped: and when he would have produced a pardon of those offences, Mrs. Cellier produced against him a conviction of felony, upon which he had been burnt in the hand, and an outlawry for another felony; and both the conviction and the outlawry were out of the pardon; and his testimony was set aside. This is the account in sir Thomas Raymond's Reports, 369: and the court's refusal of Dangerfield as a witness appears also in the trial printed in the State Trials. But sir Thomas Raymond, who was a judge of the Justice Jones. Indeed, if he be the same man, he is not fit for a witness.

L. C. J. And that he is the same man is very notorious. Come, Mrs. Cellier, what have you more to say?

Mrs. Cellier. Enough, my lord.

L. C. J. You have said enough already. Come, gentlemen of the jury, this is a plain case; here is but one witness in a case of treason, and that not direct; therefore lay your heads together.

[Which being done, they returned her Not Guilty: Upon which the Clerk of the Crown bid her down on her knees; which she did, and cried, God bless the king and the duke of York.*]

L. C. J. Where is Dangerfield? Is he gone? Call him.

Who being come, the Court asked if he had bail for his good behaviour?

King's-bench at the time, adds what is not noticed in the printed trial, namely, that it was debated, whether, in case of conviction of a felony, a pardon would restore the person to be a good witness: and that Lord Chief Justice Scroggs and himself were of opinion against the pardon's restoring the credit. However, sir Thomas adds, that the judges Jones and Dolben were contra: and that, on considering lord Hobart's Report of the before-mentioned Case of Cuddington and Wilkins, he sir Thomas Raymond came over to their opinion. What also very much detracts from the weight of Scroggs's opinion is, that, though in the early trials for the Popish Plot he acted like a zealot in the cause of the prosecutions; yet having afterwards discovered the aversion of the king and courtiers to the prosecutions, he became a convert to their side of the question; and in the latter trials, one of which was that of Mrs. Cellier, he was as bitter and outrageous against the crown witnesses, as he had before been against the prisoners. Of such a judge the opinions deserve little attention. Whoever also reads the Trial of Colman in the State Trials, and the Trial of Mrs. Cellier in the same work, will, I presume, sufficiently see the justice of this censure; and will easily give credit to the severe character Mr. Roger North in his Examen, notwithstanding all his strong prejudices for the king and court, exhibits of Scroggs on the same account; and will not be surprized, that Scroggs's gross behaviour on the Trials for the Popish Plot should form one of the articles for which he was impeached by the Commons in January 1680-1."

This Case of Cellier is considered in other parts of Mr. Hargrave's learned argument. See p. 263, 268, of the volume above referred to. Some account of Scroggs will be found in a Note to the Proceedings against the latter in this same year, 1680, infra.

* See her Trial for a Libel in September following.

Dangerfield. No, my lord, but with the leave of the Court I will fetch some.

L. C. J. Let a tipstaff go with him, and return before the Court rises.

Dangerfield. My lord, that cannot be, for I can't return so soon.*

L. C. J. Then let him be committed. Which was accordingly done.

Of this woman's share in what is called the Meal-Tub Plot, Hume says nothing, nor does he say enough of that transaction itself to enable his readers to form any notion of it. He, indeed, says,

"The bottom of this affair it is difficult, and not very material, to discover. It only appears, that Dangerfield, under pretence of betraying the conspiracies of the Presbyterians, had been countenanced by some Catholics of condition, and had even been admitted to the duke's presence and the king's. And that under pretence of revealing new Popish Plots, he had obtained access to Shaftesbury and some of the popular leaders. Which side he intended to cheat, is uncertain; or whether he did not rather mean to cheat both: but he soon found, that the belief of the nation was much more open to a Popish than a Presbyterian Plot; and he resolved to strike in with the prevailing humour. Though no weight could be laid on his testimony, great clamour was raised; as if the Court, by way of retaliation, had intended to load the Presbyterians with the guilt of a false conspiracy."

Mr. Fox does not even mention it. Echard gives a long account of it, upon which Oldmixon criticises with his usual asperity. Rapin gives the outline of the story. Roger North writes largely concerning it. The best account of it with which I have met in any of the histories is that which Ralph hath composed from original documents and the narratives of preceding historians. I will therefore insert it, premising Burnet's short account and Roger Coke's observation that the Report which Attorney General sir William Jones (to whom the examination of the matter had been referred) made of it to the council, upon which they voted Mansel innocent and Dangerfield guilty, that this was a design of the papists to lay the plot to the dissenters charge and a further proof of the popish plot, was such a crime in Jones that he was soon after put out of his place and sir Robert Sawyer put in, who would not venture the loss of his place for such another report.

"A pretended Plot discovered called the Meal-Tub Plot.

tices of roguery, and in particular was a false coiner, undertook now to coin a plot for the ends of the papists. He was in jail for debt; and was in an ill intrigue with one Cellier a popish midwife, who had a great share of wit, and was abandoned to lewdness. She got him to be brought out of prison, and carried him to the countess of Powis, a zealous managing papist. He, after he had laid matters with her, as will afterwards appear, got into all companies, and mixed with the hottest men of the town, and studied to engage others with himself to swear, that they had been invited to accept of commissions, and that a new form of government was to be set up, and that the king and the royal family were to be sent away. He was carried with this story first to the duke, and then to the king, and had a weekly allowance of money, and was very kindly used by many of that side; so that a whisper run about town, that some extraordinary thing would quickly break out: And he having some correspondence with one col. Mansel, he made up a bundle of seditious but ill contrived letters, and laid them in a dark corner of his room: And then some searchers were sent from the custom house to look for some forbidden goods, which they heard were in Mansel's chamber. There were no goods found, but as it was laid they found that bundle of letters; and upon that a great noise was made of a discovery: but upon enquiry it appeared the letters were counterfeited, and the forger of them was suspected; so they searched into all Dangerfield's haunts, and in one of them they found a paper that contained the scheme of this whole fiction, which because it was found in a Meal-Tub came to be called the Meal-Tub Plot. Dangerfield was upon that clapped up, and he soon after confessed how the whole matter was laid and managed: In which it is very probable he mixed much of his own invention with truth, for he was a profligate liar. This was a great disgrace to the popish party, and the king suffered much by the countenance he had given him: The earls of Essex and Halifax were set down in the scheme to be sworn against with the rest." Burnet.

"Ralph's Account of the Meal-Tub Plot.

"One Dangerfield (who had been a companion with Bedlow upon the road, and in prison for debt) seeing his comrade in such plenty and esteem by his testimony against the papists in the plot, knew not better how to introduce himself be a witness, than by offering his service to the papists, that he might have some conversation with them to put a colour upon his testimony. And it happened, that the lady Powis made it her business to collect money for divers who were thrown into gaol on account of this plot, or the popish religion; where in Mrs. Cellier, the midwife, was her agent, who was a notable, pragmatical woman, and, by her profession, was acquainted with many great ladies at court. Mrs. Cellier, taking a liking to this Dangerfield, and his debt being but small, for which he was in gaol, recommended him to lady Powis's stock, and took him out, and he turned papist to boot, and promised to be very officious to serve the papists by soliciting for them, by taking notes at trials, and by going to coffee-houses and other fanatical clubs, and discovering designs. His forwardness begat great confidence in him, and he was carried to lady Powis to thank her for her charity, and gave her many assurances.

Dangerfield introduced to the Duke of York.

"I make no doubt but, all this while, he had some friends, among the contrary party, that were able to help him, and to let him pass amongst them, and be in some cabals for the entitling him to some credit. After a little time he comes big to Mrs. Cellier, with a discovery that the fanatics were hatching a rebellion, and that there was to be a sudden rising in arms, and that himself was to have a commission and be a captain; that new counsellors of state were appointed, and a model of an army made affecting the design; that, if he might find credit, he would discover it to the king, and be a spy upon them, and, in time, get so far into their councils, as to know where their treasonable papers lay, which he would reveal, that they might be seized; and at last he would get from them a commission, which he would produce to detect their villainies, and preserve the king. Mrs. Cellier knew not any fitter person to introduce him than my lady Powis, who, by reason of her nephew's marriage with the earl of Peterborough's daughter, might bring him to the said earl, in order to be brought to the duke, to whom he had a great mind to apply himself, and whose protection he desired.

The Duke passeth him to the King, and he to the Secretary.

"His passage was very easy to the duke; for these great persons (lord Peterborough and lady Powis) not imagining the villainies of the world, nor being used to business, were very greedy of it when it was offered, and thought to appear very serviceable to the king as well as the duke by it. But the duke, who had always lived regularly and carefully, as soon as the captain was brought to him (for so he would be called, saying, that he missed his employment among the fanatics: he knew the king would repair him by a commission of that quality at least; and the earl of Peterborough failed not to treat him in that style) gave him encouragement to serve the king, and told him he would inform the king of it, and he should suddenly know the king's pleasure. The captain was startled at this, and desired the king might not be acquainted with the business, until it was more ripe for discovery; but the duke professed he would retain no secret from the king, and bid him wait on the earl of Peterborough, and he should have an account of the king's pleasure. The captain was a little troubled at this; for he had a mind to transact with, and have frequent access to his royal highness, and expressed a discontent. But there was no remedy, and so he was to attend the king's pleasure; which was, that col. Halsey should carry him to secretary Coventry, to whom he should declare his business, and receive directions from him as there should be occasion.

He applies for money, and cut short by the Secretary.

"He was fain to play his game as well as he could, and desired once to be brought to the king, to whom he declared what confidence the earl of Shaftesbury had in him; and, to make it appear, he produced to the king two letters of sir Richard Bolstrode, directed to the earl (how he could come by them is very considerable, he said it was by accident, they lying in a loose drawer in the earl's house.) The king made no question but that he had been with the said earl, but would give him no other directions, but that he should wait upon the secretary, and follow his orders. Then he pretended want of money, and obtained (a) some (being in service of this importance; and indeed it is the only fit reward for spies) whereupon he transforms himself into a genteel habit, and presseth for more money. But the Secretary began to grow waspish, and told him all his discovery lay in his own talk; for there was no manner of concurrent testimony, nor any commissions or papers produced, whereof he had so often talked, and in plain terms told him, he had more money than he deserved.

Mansel searched, and papers found of the Captain's laying.

"Then he pressed for a warrant to search for papers, and would have had the duke procure it; but he, having been a means to put this affair into the management of the king's ministers, would not any way further concern himself in it. The captain then would have had the king command Mr. Secretary to grant him his warrant. But the king asking the Lord Chief Justice North, that casually stood by, it was told that, unless there was oath to ground a search, or some circumstances of pregnant suspicion, it could not be done. This answer being given, the captain saw there was no way to entrap these men that walk by rule; he must take some other course to bring himself fairly upon the stage, for the time of parliament was at hand, which was to be his harvest. Hereupon he gets a warrant of course to search for uncustomed goods; and searched colonel Mansel's chamber in such a way, as it was plain he took care that there should not want demonstration that the (b) papers were of his own laying, by the clear testimony of the constables and officers that were with him. These papers he brings to the Secretary's, who now thought him in earnest; and the earl of Essex put a great value on his discovery, saying he believed there was something in it, for Mansel had been his servant, and he was as ill a man as could be, and very like to engage in that kind.

Dangerfield committed for a coiner.

"The (c) — being of the privy council, and coming into Whitehall to a committee of council, perceived, at the council stairs, Doyly, an officer of the Mint, and this Dangerfield quarrelling; Doyly saying he was a coiner, and the captain saying he was employed about the king's business, and vouched Secretary Coventry, and this with great earnestness for some time, stopping his lordship's passage up stairs, and Doyly said he had proof against him. The lord — told him he would inform the Lords of it, and he was confident they would not permit any man to shelter himself in Whitehall from the law, especially in so great and so ignominious a crime; and so went up and sat in the committee, but did not interrupt the present business with a matter of such small consequence, as that quarrel was. But sir Thomas Doleman, a clerk of the council, came to his lordship, and told him Doyly had sent to put him in mind of the coiner that was below, and thereupon shewed a false guinea, and undertook to prove that piece was of that fellow's coining. Thereupon his lordship moved that a messenger, by their order, might seize him and put him into a justice of peace's hand, to be examined, and ordered according to law. The order was given, and the thing presently done, and secretary Coventry, coming afterwards, said, smiling, that his intelligencer was apprehended for a coiner, but was told, that his intelligencer must answer the law; and so the captain was carried away and committed.

Sent to Newgate for the abuse of Mansel, and came off by a Narrative of the Plot.

"Colonel Mansel complained of the abuse upon him, and, thereupon the captain was sent for to answer, and pretended to make a defence, but with so much affectation, and ridiculous confidence against the plainest proofs that ever were, that he was committed by this council for this false accusation of colonel Mansel, and forging the papers; and he was not wanting too, in his defence, to shew how he was admit-

Alop and Gooding promise to introduce me to lord Shaftsbury, to be employed as a spy, and to have the promise for a commission. That only the consent of sir J. P. D. B. sir W. W. sir R. P. was wanting to give the stroke; but if they would not comply, it should be done otherwise, as at the parliaments, &c.

A parchment was seen in the hands of captain England, by Bed. on Monday the 22nd of Sept. 79, which was written on in indented letters, These are to authorize, &c. and thirteen label-seals to it. This at Blood's Club. On the same night was a secret cabal held at Blood's house.

The next, being Tuesday night, was one at sir W. W.'s. Gooding told me, a corporal of his acquaintance, was going to be listed, to discipline men.

Friday the 19th of September, a person was ber to hide them in the meal tub. And she held a correspondence with him in Newgate; and so the mistress of secrets and intrigues was fast in the trap, and suffered by standing in the pillory, and the captain was not long in Newgate, but desired one day to be brought before sent from Blood's club to Huntingdon, about weighty business, and is not yet returned; which causes some fear of miscarriage.

Sept. 30th, the messenger returned from Huntingdon, who said, he had finished the business he went about, and that all that part of the country was in good readiness.

Saturday, the 5th of October, a cabal met at Waller's, to consult about the affairs of other counties; but particularly, for the present, the county of Dorset, Devon, and Cornwall; and, in order thereunto, two persons were sent away with great packets; and, in one of them, were divers papers, like printed warrants; and names and seals to the same; but the person who saw them could not come to read one: My Author is Alsop.

Monday, the 7th, a cabal met at Waller's, in order to the dispatch of divers persons into the North, and to York city, to a club there, at one Lee's house, a tallow-chandler. These go into some part of Scotland too, before they return; and yet are obliged to return before the 30th of this month. Sir W. W. promise to B. for a commission. Lord S. promise of a commission to, &c. Gooding's promise to me of the list of 5,000, &c.

Sept. 9. Brown produced a paper to the company; who all approved of it, but especially one Deany, who said, 'Cursed be the man, whose mind is not suitable to this paper.' One Mason, at the same place, said, after some discourse of affairs, That all, within twenty miles round London, were ready to strike, whosoever they should be commanded, and that against the king's interest too; and said, it was not the French king's pretended invasion should put them in fear of any army the king now had, or could raise. It is also resolved, that, when any commissions are given out for the raising an army for the king, that some of the faction shall privately put in for employs, in order to the better serving that party, by the corrupting his majesty's soldiers. Wit. Curtice.

Wednesday, the 15th of October, I was with lord S.

Saturday, 19, B. told me, sir W. W. said he had 300 horse at his command, to oppose an army that the D. and Lauderdale were going to raise in the North; and that, if they made not too much haste, he should have more."

But that the reader may be more fully satisfied of the matter of the informations given in to the king (says colonel Mansel, out of whose narrative this copy is taken) I shall give him the true copy of a letter sent by Mr. Willoughby to his majesty:

"Sir; May it please your most sacred ma-

—sir (e) Robert Clayton, then Lord Mayor, where he made affidavit of a long narrative, and was, from that time, taken to be one of the principal discoverers of the popish plot. He accused the lady Powis and the earl of Peterborough, and afterwards the Duke of York, of High-Treason. The king, seeing so long a narrative so soon produced, concluded it had been meditated and prepared long before; and that all his intercourse at court was only that he might be admitted into the presence of those persons whom he designed to accuse; and that it was but an introduction to his being a witness to accompany the rest.

How the Earl of Essex was concerned.

"But it happened that he had stood in the pillory, and could be no legal witness, and the king would, by no address or application, be induced to (f) capacitate him to testify. So all his projects failed, though he was as much caressed, and as much weight laid on his testi—jesty; On Friday, the 26th of this instant September, was seen by a person whom I employ, in the hand of one England, a paper, like a list of men's names; and a parchment, in the likeness of a commission, with 13 label-seals, and as many names thereon, and at the top was, in great indenture-letters (viz.) These are to authorise, &c.—I myself was informed, that a corporal, now in your majesty's foot-guards, was to be sent into the North, to discipline a considerable number of men. My author for this was one Gooding, a nonconformist parson.—Friday, the 26th, was a person sent with a packet, very considerable, (supposed to be so by my friend, who saw the outside thereof) to Huntingdon: The said person is not yet returned, nor to be heard of, which much amazes the gang he was sent by, and at present puts a stop to their party.—It was spoken publicly in a club, That all things were in a ready posture, and they only expect your majesty's command to make the onset; but, if that be not, it is designed at the sitting of the parliament, if your majesty answer not their expectation.—I have also discovered a great correspondence between the same party and the Dutch; and believe, at your majesty's return, to give a good account of the same by God's help: Till which time I shall use my utmost endeavour to make myself, —Your majesty's most faithful and obedient subject, WILLUGHBY."

(e) Ferguson asserts, "That, by this discovery, he made it most plainly appear, who set him on to frame this damnable piece of villainy; which so nettled the conspirators, that they knew not what to do; yet procured, that the mayor, instead of having thanks returned him for his service to king and country, met with a check at Whitehall, for meddling with what concerned him not." Growth of Popery part 2, p. 265.

(f) The Gazette, No. 1458, says, his majesty had granted him a pardon; but under what restrictions, is not explained.

mony by the anti-court party, but to no purpose. It was observed there was no man so eager as the earl of Essex, to prosecute the lady Powis, and to make use of him as well as colonel Mansel, who appeared to be of his side, to accuse and tax the court of a Sham Plot : which was wondered at, when he had been so forward to affirm that he believed there was reality in it.

"This Dangerfield was bred a clerk, being an attorney's son, and his father deeply engaged in the late times. He could write well, and was a handsome, proper young fellow, of a versatile wit ; so that if he should have been accepted to testify, by probability, he would have far outgone all the former witnesses."

"The turn here given to this affair, we see, is, That Dangerfield was a decoy for the exclusionists, and that they themselves were at the bottom of the very intrigue they afterwards so loudly clamoured against. On the other hand, according to bishop Burnet, he was a tool of the papists : and the great drift of the device was, to fasten a plot on those who had fastened a plot upon them : whence his lordship takes occasion to say

"This was a great disgrace to the popish party, and the king suffered much by the countenance he had given him."

"This is certain, that Dangerfield, rogue as he was known to be, was subsisted at Cellier's, at the expence of the countess of Powis : This lady herself owned at the council-board ; as also, that he had told her of treasonable papers laid at Westminster ; and that on the secretary's refusing to grant a warrant to search for them without an affidavit, Mrs. Cellier had, in her presence, given the advice of seizing them by custom-house officers. It is moreover certain, that the very Gazette, No. 1,458, sets forth, that three several persons, one no friend to Dangerfield, had acknowledged several circumstantial matters which strengthened his evidence : And as certain it is, that the earl of Castlemaine, the countess of Powis, and others, were committed on the credit that was given to it by the council. On the other hand it is certain, likewise, that Dangerfield confessed at the council board, that he had several times discoursed with the lord Shaftesbury : And if it is not equally certain, it is extremely probable that there was an understanding between them ; there being no other satisfactory way to account for his having those two letters from sir Richard Bulstrode to that lord, in his possession : So that the most natural conclusion that had been drawn upon the whole, is, That both parties were equally disposed by any means whatever, to ruin each other : And that Dangerfield, with all the dexterity of a master genius, applied himself to raise contributions from both. Agreeable to which, the Lord Chancellor observed to him, when before the council, "That he was a fine fellow, first to come to his majesty with one story, then to the lord Powis, and from him to lord Shaftesbury, discovering to one what discourse he held to another."

What Roger North says more immediately concerning this Trial is :

"It is pleasant to observe how that versatile rogue deluded the midwife Mrs. Cellier, and indeed several others of the Catholic party ; and much to that purpose we shall have from the madam herself. For, however dexterous the captain was at his pen, having published various sorts of narratives (which, by the way, is no small avails of a discoverer that has the selling the copies) trenching upon her honour, she was as good at that sport as himself, and, I think, outwrote him ; and though her person was untowardly handled, yet she has done right to her fame in deathless narrative ; whence we may gather, not only the history of her troubles, but be entertained as with a comedy. And, in the quality of such (which kind of writing they say shews best the manners of any age) I must needs recommend hers. It will be but just to take her own tale of herself, as I have done the captain's ; though I must prognosticate somewhat of the tragic also to succeed ; enough to feed the humour of a melancholy genius, in a lively representation of so much wickedness and fully as ramped in that age. As for the gentlewoman's veracity, it is to be said that she wrote when all the persons were living that were named or concerned in her narrative. Therefore it could be no profit to write what might be straight proved false ; and, in such a circumstance, folks are careful of what they affirm. She dealt in acts of charity, and stood much upon her credit with persons of quality and honour, on account of her profession, who would not countenance a liar in print. For which reasons I make no doubt of saying, that all she writes of her own dealing and knowledge, is most likely to be critically true ; and the rest she believed sincerely to be so, and, if she fails, it is out of female prejudice and fond credulity, as will appear. She was not disproved in anything, but reflected on sufficiently, and most of all by her former friend and admirer the captain ; and Miles Praunce hath a sting at her in print. But, whatever her religion and modesty might pretend to, she did not deserve to be put in a bag with such fellows as those were.

"She tells first of her having assumed the charitable post of relieving distressed prisoners, and procuring their liberties. These were, as must be presumed, Catholics, and committed mostly on account of the Plot. She tells us of strange cries she heard in the dungeon at Newgate, which she insinuates was Praunce examined by torture, and she says he ran stark mad in prison. She names a coachman tormented to own carrying the body of Godfrey out of town, where he lives, and may be heard to own it every day. She relates other strange cruelties and barbarities used in that cursed place. She found here this Willoughby, alias Dangerfield, fast by the heels for debt. First, she says, he begged to partake of her charity. His first service was to draw up articles, setting forth the crudelities of the prison, for which she gave him 2s. 6d.; those she presented to the judges; but nothing came of it.

“ His next employ was to sift one Strode, his fellow prisoner, to find out a subornation of the earl of Shaftsbury, who, as she presumed, was about to launch that Strode for a new Plot-evidence: and, upon application, Strode gave encouragement, pretending, by papers he had, to invalidate Bedlow. The captain's next work was to fish these papers from Strode, and, for that end, she sent him a narcotic. And she says that the papers were those that sir William Waller found in her house upon search. She adds some affidavits and testimonials about this Strode, to shew his engagements with Bedlow. Fellow padders, it seems. And one may guess he and Dangerfield were as well acquainted, and these papers were the joint imposture of both; but Strode, being of another regiment, kept out of this, and left it wholly to his fellow.

“ Now Dangerfield is out of prison, by Mrs. Cellier's charity, and, being a towardly young fellow, was constituted a waiter upon the jesuits at their trial; for which purpose he was put in good cloaths, and people wondered what double diligent fellow that was. He was set to scout and bring her in intelligence of factious designs, and she tells what she understood was intended, if the king had died at Windsor. So she encouraged him to trade on as a spy, and, at several times, he wrote those papers, which were found in her meal-tub, whereof the revelation is coming forwards. She carried him to the earl of Peterborough, and he to the duke. He gave his paper to the duke, and he sent it to the king, and the king to secretary Coventry. Dangerfield was ordered to go with colonel Halsall to the secretary's to be examined, and he had 40*l.* given him. Then he brought word, in good earnest, to Mrs. Cellier, of a Plot just breaking out, but it seems, in a drunken huff, he had made a quarrel, and swore he would go over to the Presbyterians; but this was hid from her. When he pretended the Plot-papers lodged at Mr. Mansel's, and could not get a warrant to search, she advised him to the custom-house way.

“ After that was over, he comes to her in a most lamentable condition, and tells her he should be committed to Newgate. Alack a day! they both wept; and she sets down the mournful dialogue betwixt them. He gave her his Plot-papers, great secrets! And she, as he must observe, put them in her meal-tub. And it was from this cleanly conveyance, the Meal-Tub-Plot had its denomination; which single word is all that the author of our Complete History affords of the whole matter. Then comes sir William Waller, the Middlesex justice, to search her house, and would have her straight to my lord Shaftsbury; but, at length, he took her parole, and let her alone at that time. But Willoughby sent to her from Newgate, for relief, in his great distress. She dispatched a servant, to whom he howled, and (to meet her credulous fancy) said he had been tortured. He would have his allowance made firm to him by writing. She sent him word he should have his provisions continued, with her motto, ‘ I never change,’ adding some short instructions. Then comes again the knight, with his myrmidons, ransacked her house, and, by a wonderful sagacity, found the papers in the Meal-tub; so she was sent to the Gate-house. After this, she was brought to the council to be examined, where she shew'd of her knees to the king, and begged she might not be tortured. The king said it could not be done by law. Then she sets down her examination, by way of dialogue, most divertingly. As, for instance, a certain lord, who spoke often, said nothing, without—put up your hood, madam. In the end, she was sent to Newgate, and there she was honoured with diverse visits from sir William Waller. She writes the conversation in dialogue, which is an excellent portrait to shew the method of working a witness; for it seems there was great hopes of bringing her to what was called confessing, or telling all. And, for that end, Dangerfield, in the same prison, was permitted to court her at a window some distance off. That is dialogue also, and a choice piece. He shew'd her gold, and moved her to become the king's evidence, and to swear against the duke of York, viz. that his royal highness gave her the original of the papers in the Meal-tub; and that his royal highness bid her set him to hide those that were found at Mansel's, and to kill the earl of Shaftsbury; telling her what vast advantages she should have from the lords, who were privy to all. The next day, he would have had her to own that the lord Peterborough gave her the papers, and that sir Allen Apsley (the duke's servant) paid her 1,000*l.* which was to pay her for killing the king and the earl of Shaftsbury, and for raising soldiers; and, at these passages, he would howl most hideously.

“ But, no good coming of this interview, the windows, (as upon a secret commerce discovered) were nailed up. Then she was examined again, and the dialogue no less comical; and her servants were brought to oppose her. She begged the favour of the earl of Shaftsbury to protect her from sir William Waller, and she says, that he said many good things to her. And sir William made her another visit, of which she gives the conversation as before; the sum of it was to make her a witness. She was again at the council, and was always urged to confess, and she was told that, otherwise, she should die for it. If these accounts of hers be true, as I see no reason to doubt them, there never was a woman more magnanimous and undaunted than she appeared to be.

“ She pressed hard to be tried, and, at length, in very good earnest, she was brought to the bar in April 1680, and charged upon an indictment of high treason, for consulting and expending money in a Plot to kill the king, and to raise war for introducing popery, and turning the Plot on others, and for hiring Dangerfield to kill the king, &c. There were two witnesses produced against her; one was Gadbury the astrologer, who, agreeable to his profession, courted secrets to credit the stars. He, as was said, had been in the same trap with the earl of Peterborough, but upon terms, to swear against Cellier, got his pardon; but when he came to, his memory was bruised, and he knew nothing at all. But then, as soon as Dangerfield advanced, the woman charged with fury upon him an whole battery of records, being convictions, outlawries and judgments, with Arser de main, pillory, prison breach; and what not of villainy, and almost every species of crime? Then by proof shewed so many ill things of him, as the court was soon satisfied to reject him for a witness. She proved that, when she sent first to him to get acquaintance with Strode, his answer was, that they had been long acquainted, having padded together, and that he cared for neither fire, sword, nor bell, nor what he said or swore, for he had studied to be a rogue ever since he was ten years old. But in this, she gave no very good character of herself that, after such a declaration, trusted him as she did. But I think a roguy planet reigned at that time; so common was it to encourage and trust the worst of them. In fine, the fellow was exploded with ignominy, and sent home to Newgate again, and the prisoner was acquitted."

266. The Trial of ROGER PALMER, esq. Earl of CASTLEMAINE, in the Kingdom of Ireland, at the King's-Bench, for High Treason: 32 CHARLES II. June 23, A. D. 1680.

ROGER PALMER, esq. having been arraigned of High Treason, and pleaded Not Guilty, was this day brought to his trial.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, make proclamation.

Crier. O yes! Our sovereign lord the king doth strictly charge and command all manner of persons to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment. O yes! If any one can inform our sovereign lord the king, the king's Serjeant at law, the king's Attorney General, or this inquest now to be taken of the High Treason whereof Roger Palmer, esq. earl of Castlemaine, in the kingdom of Ireland, stands indicted, let them come forth and they shall be heard; for the prisoner stands at the bar upon his deliverance.

Cl. of Cr. Crier, make an O yes.

Crier. O yes! You good men that are impannelled to enquire between our sovereign lord the king, and Roger Palmer, esq. earl of Castlemaine, within the kingdom of Ireland, answer to your names.

Cl. of Cr. Roger Palmer, esq. earl of Castlemaine, in the kingdom of Ireland, hold up thy hand: These good men that were lately called, and now here appear, are to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you upon your life or death; if you challenge any of them, you are to speak as they come to the book to be sworn, and before they are sworn. Sir John Cutler, kt. bart.; sir Reginald Foster, bart.; Henry Herriot; Richard Cheney; Thomas Johnson; John Roberts; Fr. Dorrington; Hugh Squire; Charles Good; John Pulford; Edw. Claxton, esquires; Fr. Maybew, gent.

Crier. O yes! Our sovereign lord the king doth strictly charge and command all manner of persons to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment.

Cl. of the Cr. Roger Palmer, esq. earl of Castlemaine, in the kingdom of Ireland, hold up your hand. You gentlemen of the jury that are now sworn, look upon the prisoner, and hearken to his charge. You shall understand that he stands indicted by the name of Roger Palmer, esq. earl of Castlemaine, in the kingdom of Ireland; for that he as a false traitor against our most illustrious and excellent prince and lord Charles the 2d, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, &c. and his natural lord; not having the fear of God before his eyes, nor weighing the duty of his allegiance, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, his cordial love, true, due and natural obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king ought to bear towards him, altogether withdrawing; and contriving, and with all his might intending to disturb the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom, and to bring and put our sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction, and alter the true worship of God within this kingdom established, to the superstition of the Romish church; and to stir up and move war against our said sovereign lord the king within this realm of England, and to subvert the government thereof; the 20th day of June, in the 30th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord Charles the 2nd, of England, Scotland, France and Ireland king, defender of the faith, &c. at the parish of St. Giles in the Fields, in the county of Middlesex, with divers other false traitors to the jurors unknown, did traitorously imagine and intend the killing, death and final destruction of our said lord the king, and to change and alter, and utterly subvert the ancient government of this kingdom, and to despoise and wholly to deprive our said lord the king of his crown and government of this realm of England, and to extirpate the true Protestant Religion: and to accomplish and fulfil the same most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes aforesaid, the said Roger Palmer, esq. earl of Castlemaine in the kingdom of Ireland, and other false traitors to the jurors unknown, the same 20th day of June, in the 30th year aforesaid, with force and arms, in the parish of St. Giles in the Fields aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, advisedly, devilishly, maliciously and traitorously did assemble, unite and gather themselves together, and then and there advisedly, devilishly, maliciously, subtilly, and traitorously did consult and agree to bring our said sovereign lord the king to death and final destruction, and to deprive him of his crown and government of England, and to introduce and establish the religion of the church of Rome, in this kingdom; and the sooner to fulfil and accomplish the same most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes aforesaid, he then and there did falsly, maliciously and traitorously promise divers great rewards, and did pay divers sums of money to several persons unknown; and then and there falsly and traitorously did write divers notes, to incite several other persons to accomplish the treasons aforesaid, against the life of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, and contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

Cl. of the Cr. Upon this Indictment he hath been arraigned, and hath pleaded thereunto Not Guilty; and for his trial he puts himself upon God and his country, which country you are. Your charge is to enquire, Whether he be Guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty? If you find him Guilty, you are to enquire what goods and chattels, lands and tenements he had at the time when the High-Treason was committed, or at any time since? If you find him Not Guilty, you are to say so, and no more: and hear your evidence.

Crier. O yes! If any one will give evidence on the behalf of our sovereign lord the king, against Roger Palmer, esq. earl of Castlemaine, in the kingdom of Ireland, let him come forth and he shall be heard; for the prisoner now stands at the bar upon his deliverance.

Mr. Bonithon. May it please you, my lord, and you gentlemen of the jury, the prisoner at the bar stands indicted for High-Treason; for that he intending to disturb the peace within this kingdom established, to destroy, and alter the government, and to bring the king to death and final destruction, and to alter our religion to the superstition of the church of Rome, did, on the 20th day of June, in the 30th year of the reign of our sovereign lord the king, consult and treat with several other persons, and that he with these persons did agree to destroy the king and alter the religion, and cause rebellion; and further to accomplish these treasons, he did promise and agree to pay several accounts, and deposit several sums of money, and did likewise write and publish several books. To this he hath pleaded Not Guilty; if we prove these things, you are to find him Guilty.

Att. Gen. (Sir Creswel Levinz.) May it please your lordship, my lord Castlemaine here stands indicted for High-Treason; that is, For designing to murder the king, and alter the government and law. And this is but a parcel of the Plot, which hath been carrying on a great while, and many persons tried for it, and some have suffered and been executed for it: and my lord, we will give your lordship evidence, That my Lord Castlemaine hath at several times conspired the death of the king, and he hath reproved persons for not doing it. And my lord hath been in consults among Jesuits, where these matters have been carried on, and this whole design hath been negotiated; and my lord Castlemaine hath been consenting and agreeing to all these matters. And my lord, when the trials were in hand, it did appear upon those trials there were many persons brought from St. Omers to be witnesses against Dr. Oates, to prove he was not in England at that time when he said in his depositions that he did consult with the Jesuits; and these persons my lord Castlemaine had the management and instruction of at that time: and all along at the Old-Bailey my lord Castlemaine was present there, and did countenance these persons, and was an intercessor for them. These are but branches and circumstances; what is material we will prove by witnesses.

Att. Gen. Come, Dr. Oates, pray tell what you know.

Prisoner. My Lord, I have a long time wished for this day; and your lordship may very well remember it. The reason why I have so much desired a trial is, because I thought it a means, and the best means, and the only means to shew to the world my innocency, and also to shew to the world how much I have been calumniated by this charge.

L. C. J. (Sir William Scroggs.) What have you to say? Have you any thing to say against Dr. Oates?

Prisoner. No, my lord; I only say this, Here I am a prisoner at the bar, and I have pleaded Not Guilty, and throw myself upon this court; and therefore I am very willing to hear what this man will say.

Dr. Oates. My lord, I humbly move the court, Whether or no I may use my own method?

L. C. J. Give your charge, we direct nothing.

Oates. My lord, in 1677, I was sent over into Spain by the Jesuits that were here in England; where I remained for several months, and transacted business for them, and, my lord, I returned from Spain in November, and brought several letters from some English fathers there; among which there was one directed for my lord Castlemaine. My lord, I did not deliver the letter to him; but, my lord, the contents of the letter was to this effect—

L. C. J. How came you to see the contents?

Oates. My lord, I was at the writing of the letter, and so I did see the contents of it.

L. C. J. Did the priests shew it you, or did you only see it yourself?

Oates. No, my lord; it was shewn me by them: And the contents of this letter were, "That the Fathers in Spain were very zealous to concur with the Fathers here in England in the design; which was the subversion of the government, altering the religion, and the destruction of the king."

L. C. J. Was that in the letter?

Oates. No, my lord, not in words at length.

L. C. J. What was, as far as you know, the very expression of the letter?

Oates. The word 'design,' my lord.

L. C. J. Only that, to promote the design?

Oates. Yes, my lord; and under that word we did comprehend all those things; that is, as we usually took it among one another.

L. C. J. Did you deliver this letter to my lord Castlemaine?

Oates. No, my lord, I did not deliver this letter; but when I went to St. Omers, we received an account from my lord Castlemaine of his receipt of this letter.

L. C. J. What did you do with it?

Oates. I left it with the provincial, my lord, who was then Mr. Strange.

L. C. J. Was it not given to you to give it to him?

Oates. It was given me to give the lord Castlemaine; but being then a stranger to him, I was willing to send one of his own messengers with it.

L. C. J. Where was my lord?

Oates. I cannot tell, my lord; I did not see him then; I went over to St. Omers in December 1677, or the latter end of November.

L. C. J. Where were you when you gave this letter to the provincial?

Oates. I was in London, my lord.

L. C. J. Where did you receive this letter?

Oates. In Spain, my lord, at Valladolid, of one Armstrong.

L. C. J. Who was it directed to?

Oates. To my lord Castlemaine; but I did not then know him, and so I gave it the provincial, my lord: I went over to St. Omers in the latter end of November, or the beginning of December 1677, and after I had been there some few days, there did arrive a packet from London to St. Omers, in which there was a letter from my lord Castlemaine.

L. C. J. To whom?

Oates. To the Fathers of the Society of St. Omers; in which my lord Castlemaine gave them an account of a letter that he had lately received from Spain.

L. C. J. How did you know the contents of this letter?

Oates. My lord, I was privy to their letters.

L. C. J. Was you acquainted with my lord Castlemaine's hand?

Oates. My lord, I will give an account of that: I did not know it then, but only as it was generally said amongst us.

L. C. J. How was it subscribed?

Oates. Castlemaine, my lord; and sometimes, my lord, he subscribed himself Palmer.

L. C. J. How many letters have you seen?

Oates. Several letters.

L. C. J. Was this the first?

Oates. This was the first, as near as I can remember. And, my lord, he gave an account in that letter; that he had received a letter from Spain, and was glad the Fathers in Spain had so good an opinion of his integrity in the cause.

L. C. J. Did he say from whom he had received it?

Oates. My lord, I cannot remember that; that he had received a letter, I am certain.

L. C. J. Do you know what the purport of the letter was?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I will give you a plain account. My lord, he wrote he had received a letter from Spain, and that he was glad the Fathers in Spain had so great confidence in his integrity. And, my lord, in March there came another letter from my lord Castlemaine; for my lord Castlemaine had left some things at Liege, wherein he did complain of the Fathers, that they made no more haste for to send his things to him; some odd things he had left there; and, my lord, he gave an account of a certain letter he received from the rector of Liege, whose advice he did not like: for the rector of Liege and the rector of Gant were mighty zealous that the secular clergy should be personally present in this affair.

L. C. J. Did he write so? I would have you say what he writ.

Oates. My lord, I have told you he gave an account, that he was unwilling to have the secular clergy engaged, because they were a loose sort of men, and of no principles, and therefore he thought them not fit to be trusted. My lord, in April there was a consult; I came over from St. Omers in April, some 3, or 4, or 5 days before the consult, I am not able to guess at the particular time, but it was near upon the consult. My lord, this consult was divided into several companies, after they had met at the White Horse Tavern, wherein they did some things that did relate to the order, as to send Father Cary to Rome. And after they had divided themselves into several companies, wherein they did agree in ordering the death of the king.

L. C. J. You were by?

Oates. My lord, I was employed by them to give an account of the sense of one company to another.

L. C. J. Were you by when they concluded the death of the king?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I was then present.

L. C. J. Did you sign among the rest?

Oates. My lord, I do not come here to accuse myself.

L. C. J. You are pardoned, if it be so.

Oates. My lord, I did consent. My lord, in this consult they met together, and an oath of secrecy was administered; my lord Castlemaine was there, too, within some few days after the consult; That is, the gentleman whom I accuse for treason, I say, did come, and enquired about the copies of some letters for to be sent up into Germany, and did desire, that an agreement between them and the monks might be made up, there being a difference between them, so that they might have the assistance of that order to carry on the design.

L. C. J. What gentleman was this?

Oates. It was the prisoner, my lord, at the bar.

L. C. J. Would the gentleman let you hear him say, that he desired assistance to carry on the design, and you are a stranger to him?

Oates. My lord, I do not think I was a stranger to him so much as he was a stranger to me; he knew I was their servant, and employed by them.

L. C. J. Would he say in your hearing, that he desired their assistance to carry on the design, and you did not know him?

Oates. My lord, I did not well know him at that time; and I brought several messages from the fathers, and from Mr. Langhorn, and gave them an account before him.

L. C. J. How often had you seen him?

Oates. That time he was there, my lord.

L. C. J. How many messages had you?

Oates. I will tell your lordship where I had been: I had been at Mr. Simmonds's, who was then confessor to the earl of Arundel, who is since turned protestant; confessor to him, as he pretended, and we looked upon him to be. And I had been at Father Cain's, who was in Turnmill street; and I had been, my lord, at Mr. Langhorn's in the Temple; and some other places which I do not now remember, it is so long since. So, my lord, I gave them an account of my business, and I did see that gentleman, but didn't know his name till, my lord, in June.

L. C. J. When was this?

Oates. This was, my lord, as near as I can remember, in May.

L. C. J. So you did not know his name till three weeks or a month after.

Oates. No, my lord, it was in the latter part of June.

Justice Jones. You saw him first in May?

Oates. Yes, my lord.

Justice Jones. And you did not see him till after the consult? I don't ask you whether he was there or no? But whether you saw him before the consult was signed?

Oates. No, my lord.

L. C. J. How did you come to know his name?

Oates. My lord, in June Mr. Langworth and I were going over Lincoln's-inn-fields, intending to go to the Fountain in Fuller's-rents, because there was a sort of drink that he loved, and we were to drink together, it was in the evening; and so in our way as we went, we met with my lord Castlemaine, whom Mr. Langworth did salute, and then we came back to Mr. Fenwick's chamber.

L. C. J. With whom did you come back?

Oates. With my lord Castlemaine.

L. C. J. Did you know his name?

Oates. Mr. Langworth told me it was the prisoner at the bar, my lord, and the prisoner at the bar was giving an account of some letters he had received out of the country; and Mr. Langworth was giving an account how forward the rector of Liege and the rector of Gaunt were in offering to have the secular clergy engaged with them; and some other discourse they had which I can't remember, but about the design.

L. C. J. What did they talk of at that time? You must, as near as you can, tell us what discourse they had.

Oates. I will give your lordship this, they were speaking of the transactions of the consult, and how unanimous the Fathers were in signing the consult.

L. C. J. Who were speaking of it?

Oates. Mr. Langworth and Mr. Fenwick, and my lord Castlemaine was present.

L. C. J. They did talk of it?

Oates. Yes.

L. C. J. Did they mention the particulars of that consult?

Oates. Yes.

L. C. J. What was that?

Oates. Laying aside the king.

L. C. J. And what else?

Oates. And bringing in the popish religion, the catholic religion, I speak their own words.

L. C. J. And this discourse they had in the hearing of my lord Castlemaine?

Oates. Yes; and my lord Castlemaine said, Now he should be revenged for the injuries done to him.

L. C. J. Go on.

Oates. I have nothing else to say of my lord Castlemaine that I can think of at present.

L. C. J. Now, my lord, you may ask him what questions you think fit.

Prisoner. Mr. Oates, repeat your journey again.

Oates. My lord, I say this, I went a ship-board in April, I returned from Valladolid in November, I arrived in London in November, and staid in London sometime, and then I went to St. Omers in November or December, New Stile or Old Stile; I staid at St. Omers; from thence I went to Watton; then, my lord, in the month of March we went to Liege, and returned back again; in the month of April we came hither, some time before the consult, and staid here some time after.

Pris. What time were you at Liege, pray, Sir?

Oates. In March 1677.

Just. Jones. The end of 1677?

Oates. No, my lord, we were at St. Omers again in March.

L. C. J. You returned in March 1677-8.

Oates. Yes, my lord, the stile does so alter.

Pris. That is before Lady-day.

Oates. Yes, my lord, it was before Lady-day, we arrived here in London in May or in April, and we staid here some few days.

Pris. When did you come over again, pray, Sir?

Oates. My lord it is now two years ago, or better, and I can't remember every particular time; my lord, we were here in May.

them: And the contents of this letter were, "That the Fathers in Spain were very zealous to concur with the Fathers here in England in the design; which was the subversion of the government, altering the religion, and the destruction of the king."

L. C. J. Was that in the letter?

Oates. No, my lord, not in words at length.

L. C. J. What was, as far as you know, the very expression of the letter?

Oates. The word 'design,' my lord.

L. C. J. Only that, to promote the design?

Oates. Yes, my lord; and under that word we did comprehend all those things; that is, as we usually took it among one another.

L. C. J. Did you deliver this letter to my lord Castlemaine?

Oates. No, my lord, I did not deliver this letter; but when I went to St. Omers, we received an account from my lord Castlemaine of his receipt of this letter.

L. C. J. What did you do with it?

Oates. I left it with the provincial, my lord, who was then Mr. Strange.

L. C. J. Was it not given to you to give it to him?

Oates. It was given me to give the lord Castlemaine; but being then a stranger to him, I was willing to send one of his own messengers with it.

L. C. J. Where was my lord?

Oates. I cannot tell, my lord; I did not see him then; I went over to St. Omers in December 1677, or the latter end of November.

L. C. J. Where were you when you gave this letter to the provincial?

Oates. I was in London, my lord.

L. C. J. Where did you receive this letter?

Oates. In Spain, my lord, at Valladolid, of one Armstrong.

L. C. J. Who was it directed to?

Oates. To my lord Castlemaine; but I did not then know him, and so I gave it the provincial, my lord: I went over to St. Omers in the latter end of November, or the beginning of December 1677, and after I had been there some few days, there did arrive a packet from London to St. Omers, in which there was a letter from my lord Castlemaine.

L. C. J. To whom?

Oates. To the Fathers of the Society of St. Omers; in which my lord Castlemaine gave them an account of a letter that he had lately received from Spain.

L. C. J. How did you know the contents of this letter?

Oates. My lord, I was privy to their letters.

L. C. J. Was you acquainted with my lord Castlemaine's hand?

Oates. My lord, I will give an account of that: I did not know it then, but only as it was generally said amongst us.

L. C. J. How was it subscribed?

Oates. Castlemaine, my lord; and sometimes, my lord, he subscribed himself Palmer.

L. C. J. How many letters have you seen?

Oates. Several letters.

L. C. J. Was this the first?

Oates. This was the first, as near as I can remember. And, my lord, he gave an account in that letter; that he had received a letter from Spain, and was glad the Fathers in Spain had so good an opinion of his integrity in the cause.

L. C. J. Did he say from whom he had received it?

Oates. My lord, I cannot remember that; that he had received a letter, I am certain.

L. C. J. Do you know what the purport of the letter was?

Oates. Yes, my lord, I will give you a plain account. My lord, he wrote he had received a letter from Spain, and that he was glad the Fathers in Spain had so great confidence in his integrity. And, my lord, in March there came another letter from my lord Castlemaine; for my lord Castlemaine had left some things at Liege, wherein he did complain of the Fathers, that they made us more haste for to send his things to him; some odd things he had left there; and, my lord, he gave an account of a certain letter he received from the rector of Liege, whose advice he did not like: for the rector of Liege and the rector of Gand were mighty zealous that the secular clergy should be personally present in this affair.

L. C. J. Did he write so? I would have you say what he writ.

Oates. My lord, I have told you he gave an account, that he was unwilling to have the secular clergy engaged, because they were a loose sort of men, and of no principles, and therefore he thought them not fit to be trusted. My lord, in April there was a consult; I came over from St. Omers in April, some 3, or 4, or 5 days before the consult, I am not able to guess at the particular time, but it was near upon the consult. Oates. My lord it is now two years ago, or better, and I can't remember every particular time; my lord, we were here in May.

Pris. I will ask him as many questions as I think reasonable; and when, my lord, I do desire time, and he cannot tell the times, he must tell me so.

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, answer my lord what questions he asks you.

Oates. I will tell my lord Castlemaine as near as I can remember, my lord.

Pris. Mr. Oates, when was it you came over?

Oates. Really it was some few days before the consult.

Pris. How many days do you think?

Oates. Really I cannot remember.

L. C. J. I suppose you have your memorials.—Oates. Really, my lord, no.

L. C. J. Have you any thing more to ask?

Pris. Yes, my lord, a great many questions. Were you present, Mr. Oates, pray, at that consult, when I consented to the king's death? was you by?

Oates. I was present at the consult; but I do not charge you to be at the consult.

L. C. J. He asks you where it was he agreed to it?

Oates. At Mr. Fenwick's chamber, I remember it was about seven or eight o'clock that we were going over Lincoln's-Inn-Fields.

L. C. J. How long might you be at Fenwick's?

Oates. It was about eleven or twelve o'clock I came away.

Pris. When you met me in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, was I in a coach or on foot, or was any body with me?

Oates. I cannot say whether your lordship had a man with you, or no:

L. C. J. Was there any body with him?

Oates. I did not take notice of that.

L. C. J. You were two hours together, pray let me ask you this question, What was your discourse about?

Oates. That was part of the discourse, my lord.

L. C. J. What? You have given us a very short account of it in four lines: you were two hours together, What was the main of your discourse about?

Oates. My lord, I will give you as plain as I can, the discourse at that time.

L. C. J. Pray let us know what the main of your discourse was about.

Oates. One part of their discourse was about the revenues of their colleges, and how they had suffered by the French taking St. Omers, and what losses they had sustained by reason of the change of government by the conquest; for the crown of Spain had entailed on the college of St. Omers five or six hundred a year, for the maintaining the foundation of their house, or foundation rent, and it was taken away by reason of the conquest that France had made over the Spanish dominions there; and they were consulting how they should write to father La Chaise to be an instrument to move the French king to restore this annuity, that was a settlement entailed upon it.

L. C. J. How came you into this discourse?
Oates. This was after the other discourse?

L. C. J. How came you to discourse this affair here in England?

Oates. I will tell your lordship as near as I can remember: when we met in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, Mr. Langworth recommended me to my lord Castlemaine, and bade me take notice of him. I cannot say this is my lord Castlemaine, but this is that man I saw.

L. C. J. Did he call him by his name?

Oates. He told him that I was such a one, and that I was serviceable to them. And upon our way as we went to Mr. Fenwick's chamber, he enquired into the causes of my coming over so soon again, for he said I went over but last month. Said he, How came it to pass he came over so soon again? saith he, We wanted him to do some business for us. And there were more particulars of the transactions of the consult mentioned to my lord Castlemaine.

L. C. J. How did they bring in the particulars of that design?

Oates. This is as near as I can remember.

L. C. J. How came they to talk of laying aside the king, and bringing in the Catholic religion?

Oates. My lord, after they had given an account of the transactions of the consult: this was one part of the consult.

L. C. J. Pray how came they to bring it in, in discourse?

Oates. My lord, they spake of the particulars of it.

L. C. J. I wonder what introduced the particulars: was it to acquaint him with those particulars?

Oates. My lord, I have nothing to say to that; they were things so generally talked of by those of the Jesuitical party, that whenever they met, they scarce did talk of any thing else but of that, and so they did at this time.

L. C. J. Pray tell me the whole discourse, as you can remember, that relates to this time.

Oates. My lord, I have told your lordship we met with my lord Castlemaine in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. I have told you, my lord, that we went to Mr. Fenwick's; I have told you, my lord, that after some discourse (how it was introduced I cannot be positive, but as I can remember) they were speaking of my going over and coming again so soon, my going from the consult to St. Omer's and returning again into England so soon, and so one word brought in another.

L. C. J. Did you know then that my lord Castlemaine had ever heard of this matter before?

Oates. My lord, I do not know; but I am morally certain as to myself; but I cannot swear he did.

Att. Gen. Did he speak of it to him as a stranger to it?

Oates. No.

Just. Jones. By the letter you speak of he knew before.

L. C. J. Answer my brother's question, was the letter you had been, before or after that discourse at Fenwick's?

Oates. My lord, that was after the consult.

L. C. J. Then you know he did know of the design?

Oates. My lord, I think not of the particulars of the design.

L. C. J. That is, he knew of this design for the main. When you talk of the design, you always mean the consult.

Oates. No, my lord, when we say the consult, we mean what was agreed on at that consult, not concerning these matters that were done six months before.

L. C. J. Mr. Oates, tell me, when you mention the design and the consult, do not you always mean the death of the king and the bringing in Popery?

Oates. Yes, my lord, but the terms are not convertible: for, my lord, when we say the consult, there was something else done, my lord, at that consult which had not an absolute relation to the design; and of that I will give your lordship one instance, as the sending Father Cary to Rome, which they did in some three years.

L. C. J. Some trivial matters concerning their own government, but the thing you talk of is the same consult and design.

Oates. When I speak of the word design, it was so taken among us, and so received by my lord Castlemaine.

L. C. J. How can you say it was so received by him?

Oates. Because he used the same word, and answered us according to our interpretation.

Justice Jones. My lord, he speaks of the design thus: there was a design for the killing of the king, there was a design of the priests and fathers for it; but saith he, 'Afterwards there was a general consultation,' and this design came to be formed by this general consult, which my lord Castlemaine, as he thinks, had no knowledge of till the time they met together in Lincoln's-Inn fields, and afterward went and discoursed about it.

L. C. J. It is very fair, that he doth not know that my lord Castlemaine had any knowledge before the consult of this business; but, he says, 'The Design upon which the consult was, that he might know, which was to destroy the king, and bring in popery.' And he says, my lord Castlemaine did understand this word design in that sense they did; because he answered their letters according to their interpretation of it. How do you know he understood the word design in its utmost capacity as you understood it?

Oates. When we have our words, we have our keys whereby we understand them. But I will answer this question to the satisfaction of the gentlemen of the jury. My lord, he hath many times spoken in his letters of introducing the Popish religion, and annexed it to the word design of promoting the Catholic religion here in England.

L. C. J. Now methinks you have brought the word design to something else than killing the king.

Oates. Yes, my lord, the subversion of religion and the government.

L. C. J. Did he put in government? Did he talk of bringing in the Catholic religion, and altering the government?

Oates. No, my lord, I won't say that.

L. C. J. When we are examining concerning men's lives, we must be careful of their words in such matters.

Oates. One part of my evidence I have omitted, your lordship did ask me how I came to know my lord Castlemaine's hand. My lord, sometimes we received letters from him subscribed Palmer, and sometimes subscribed Castlemaine, sometimes some other name which I may not remember, and they were generally received as from him. And I have seen, my lord, my lord Castlemaine write; for that night, as near as I remember, it was post-night.

L. C. J. At Fenwick's chamber?

Oates. At Fenwick's chamber, and my lord Castlemaine did write a letter, subscribed it and sealed it, and I was fain to go to the general post-house, it was so late.

Justice Jones. What, did he subscribe then?

Oates. No, my lord, I saw no more than the superscription.

L. C. J. Then you did not see his name to it?

Oates. No, my lord. My lord Castlemaine did ask, Why he had not answers to such and such letters? For several letters I had seen which were not of much moment.

L. C. J. I wish you had one that was of moment.

Oates. It cannot be expected, my lord, that I should have them.

L. C. J. My lord, ask him what you please.

Pris. You say, Mr. Oates, you received letters from me in Spain?

Oates. I never said so.

Pris. You saw letters in Spain from me?

Oates. Yes, I have seen letters in Spain that were from you.

Pris. Look you, Mr. Oates, pray let me ask you a question, you said this, That you did not know me when you met at the consult?

Oates. What consult?

Pris. At Fenwick's chamber.

Oates. I did not know you at Wild-house.

Pris. There you met me first?

Oates. There I met the prisoner at the bar.

L. C. J. He says he did not know you at Wild-house, but he came to know you by Langworth in Lincoln's Inn-Fields, and then you went together to Fenwick's chamber.

Pris. Mr. Oates, Did not you say, that at Wild-house you did not know me, nor I you?

L. C. J. He says he cannot tell whether you knew him or no, but he did not know you.

Pris. Was it familiar with you?

Oates. No, my lord.

Pris. Did I talk treason at Wild-house?

Oates. It was the discourse of the day, but I do not remember every particular of the discourse, but I remember what your opinion was concerning the rector of Liege and the rector of Gant.

Pris. Was there any thing about killing the king at Wild-house?

Oates. Really, my lord, I cannot remember, I won't charge it there, because I am upon my oath; though I morally believe, as to myself, that there was discourse bad enough there.

Pris. Mr. Oates, Pray will you hear me? Then the acquaintance I had with you was by Mr. Langworth, and then we went that night to Fenwick's chamber, and there we staid very long, and there we had all this discourse?

Oates. Yes.

Pris. Look, Mr. Oates, was there any body by besides Mr. Langworth and Mr. Fenwick?

Oates. Really, my lord, I do not remember any body was by, unless a maid might come to fill a cup of drink or so.

Pris. Mr. Oates, pray, Mr. Oates, did you and I ever meet together after that time?

Oates. Really, my lord, I cannot be exact in that.

Pris. Did you never see me nor discourse with me after that time?

Oates. I cannot recollect myself as to that, I cannot remember.

L. C. J. He does not remember that ever he was with you afterwards.

Pris. You do not know whether ever I discoursed with you afterwards?

Oates. I do not remember.

Pris. Very well, Mr. Oates; look you, sir, you do not remember that I ever had any discourse with you after that time; and no body was by but Mr. Fenwick and Mr. Langworth?

Oates. As I remember.

Pris. Was not there another priest there?

Oates. There is nobody occurs to my memory.

Pris. Mr. Oates, you brought me letters from Spain?

Oates. I brought a letter from Spain directed to you in 1677.

Pris. Was I in town or out of town?

Oates. I delivered it to the provincial.

Pris. You went over to Liege; did not you see me there?

Oates. No, my lord, I did not see you there, I only went to wait upon a gentleman that was a priest afterwards, that went to take orders.

Pris. Did you not see me at Liege?

Oates. No, my lord.

Pris. You were at Liege, did you stay there?

Oates. I lay there one night.

Att. Gen. Have you any thing to ask, my lord?

Pris. Presently, my lord.

Justice Jones. It is very reasonable, my lord should question you. You own him to be the lord Castlemaine: when was it you did first discover this business concerning my lord Castlemaine?

Oates. My lord, I did discover my lord Castlemaine to be in the Plot the last sessions of the long parliament, and I accused my lord Castlemaine this Trinity-term was 12 months, and my lord Castlemaine was committed: for when Mr. Dangerfield came in and accused my lord Castlemaine, I brought a charge a second time against my lord Castlemaine.

Justice Jones. Did you discover all this then?

Oates. I did charge him for having an hand in the design in general.

Justice Jones. To the parliament?

Oates. Yes, to the parliament.

Pris. You say, when I assented to the king's death in Fenwick's chamber, that I said I should now find a time to be revenged?

Oates. Pray, my lord, do not put me to mention such reflecting evidence.

Pris. When you were before the king, you did in pursuance of this speak of a divorce.

Oates. My lord, I will give evidence as to that, if that my lord comes to be indicted for his priesthood.

L. C. J. My lord may ask what questions he shall think fit.

Att. Gen. My lord says he has said it, and what he said in another place he is not to treat now of.

Pris. Suppose I can prove him an ill man in any place, is not that fit to be spoken of here? Since he hath brought the king upon the stage, and since he hath accused me before the king and your lordships of a divorce, I ask him whether he saw it?

Oates. I will tell your lordship what I said as to the divorce: I heard it discoursed of generally among the fathers beyond sea, and this was some other part of the discourse at Wild-House; and I heard my lord Castlemaine say that he had been at a great charge to carry on that business of the divorce.

Pris. At Wild-House?

Oates. At Wild-house. Now, my lord, I took no notice of it because it was not my business. But, my lord, after that there was a priest's chamber that was searched, and there was the whole Case stated; now what is become of the state of that Case, my lord, I cannot tell.

L. C. J. By whom was that Case stated?

Oates. There was a letter found, whereby my lord Castlemaine should have the matter

* The prisoner was the husband of Barbara Villiers, the first mistress to Charles the Second after his Restoration. Indeed according to Oldmixon (1 Hist. of England during the reigns of the Royal House of Stuart, 471) it was currently reported, that on the very night of the king's coming to London he took her from her husband.

In 1661 the husband was created baron Palmer and earl of Castlemaine in Ireland (of which honours, it has been said, that he was not very proud) and, in 1670, the wife was created baroness Non-such, countess of Southampton and duchess of Cleveland, in England. See the Proceedings in the House of Commons against lord Castlemaine, A. D. 1689.

directed in order to the carrying on the divorce that was to be between him and his wife Barbara.

Pris. Did not you tell the king that you saw the divorce in Strange's hand?

Oates. My lord, I will tell you this, I gave an account to the king that I saw in Strange's hand an account of a divorce that was between my lord Castlemaine and Barbara duchess of Cleveland.

Recorder (sir George Jefferies). My lord, if he ask too many questions that do not relate to this matter, it is impossible to give an account of every particular.

Pris. My lords, I humbly submit this case.

Recorder. Ask him what you said to such a man upon the 9th of August was twelve-month, must he give an account?

L. C. J. He must say he does not know.

Recorder. Indeed it is reasonable that my lord Castlemaine should ask him some questions, and that Mr. Oates should give him an account.

Att. Gen. My lord, will you give me leave to speak? If he may ask questions about such foreign matters as this, no man can justify himself.

L. C. J. This is not so mighty remote but use may be made of it.

Att. Gen. If he should ask whether he were such a day at such an house, and tell him yes, and mistake the day; any man may be caught thus.

Pris. How can a man be caught in the truth?

Att. Gen. My lord Castlemaine may, if he can, catch him in any thing he gives in evidence here.

Pris. My lord, if your lordship over-rule me, I will say no more. Mr. Attorney says I come to catch him, I confess I do.

Att. Gen. You should not ask him foreign questions.

L. C. J. He asks a plain question; why do you labour so much that he should not ask, whether he had seen the divorce? My lord Castlemaine I have asked the question for you whether or no he said he had seen the divorce? and he does not remember whether he said so or no.

Att. Gen. My lord, I think, with with your lordship's leave, that he is not bound to answer questions that are not to the evidence.

L. C. J. If so be he would come to make application, it may be well enough.

Att. Gen. I say it for the method of the evidence, my lord, that I would not have these excursions.

Pris. I desire your lordship that I may say out what I have to say. I say this, that no man in the world that speaks truth can be caught, neither will Mr. Attorney suffer me to catch him.

Att. Gen. I say you have liberty to catch him in any thing that doth belong to the evidence.

Pris. I come to shew you the fitness of it to this affair. He comes and tells you, among other consults, of Wild-house, and my meeting him in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, the recommendations of Mr. Langworth, and going to Fenwick's chamber, where we talked of altering the government, and my assenting to kill the king; and since you have brought the king upon the stage, I will refresh your memory a little; since you talk of revenging myself, look you if you did not mention a divorce to the king and also to my lord chief justice.

Att. Gen. My lord, you are under a mistake.

Pris. Pray give me leave, Mr. Attorney.

Att. Gen. You make such excursions into foreign matters.

Pris. Mr. Oates, you did say you saw a divorce. I ask you whether you saw a divorce, and where; or whether you said so?

L. C. J. He says, he does not remember he said so.

Oates. I do not remember whether I said so or no, my lord, I have it down, but indeed I did not set my thoughts a-work.

Att. Gen. He hath given you an answer that may satisfy you.

Just. Raymond. He hath papers wherein he hath entered Memorandums to refresh his memory. but these papers be hath not by him.

L. C. J. Then he may say, he hath not.

Att. Gen. That he hath already, my lord.

L. C. J. Have you any more to say?

Pris. I have, my lord, if you will give me leave to write down two words.

Pris. Mr. Oates, you told my lords the Judges that I did say, I was at great expence about a divorce?—Oates. Yes.

Pris. That is very well, Mr. Oates.

Att. Gen. Call Mr. Dangerfield.

Dr. Oates was going out of the court.

Pris. May Mr. Oates go out of the court?

Court. Yes, yes.

Oates. I will be within call, my lord.

Pris. I only submit it to your lordships, whether or no a witness may go out of the court?

Oates. I will stay then.

Att. Gen. Swear Mr. Dangerfield.

Pris. Pray stay.

L. C. J. Why so?

Pris. Here I am a prisoner, my lords, and submit it to your lordships, whether or no Mr. Dangerfield, who hath had the censure of this court, may be a witness? Whether or no counsel shall shew reasons to your lordship, whether he may speak or no?

Justice Jones. You must shew your exceptions that you have against him.

Pris. My exception is this: that he was convicted of felony, that he broke prison, and was outlawed upon it. Besides this, my lord, he is a stigmatick, hath stood in the pillory, and was burnt in the hand. Now I humbly beseech your lordships, that you will be pleased to hear what my counsel can say: and then, my lords, if you over-rule, I shall give place with all my heart.

L. C. J. I think it reasonable, if you desire counsel, that they should be allowed to speak.

Att. Gen. If your lordship please, when my lord's exceptions appear.

Justice Jones. What are your exceptions my lord?

Pris. That I told you beforehand: he is an outlawed person, he is convicted of felony.

Justice Jones. When was he outlawed?

Att. Gen. In the 27th year of the king, and we say he hath a pardon in the 30th year of the king.

L. C. J. How do you prove he was burnt in the hand, my lord?

Att. Gen. When was he burnt in the hand?

Pris. Call Briscoe.

Att. Gen. We bring a pardon unto that, and that will restore him.

[A Record produced.]

Att. Gen. That record we confess; shew the pardon, shew the pardon.

L. C. J. Now go to that for which he was burnt in the hand.

Att. Gen. Here is a pardon that extends to them all.

[The Pardon read: 'Decimus tertio die Januarii, Anno Regni, &c.']

L. C. J. This does not do it.

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord, it does.

L. C. J. Is that the Newgate pardon?

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. We have had it in the court.

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. And felony and outlawry is in it.

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. Where is that for which he was burnt in the hand?

Att. Gen. For that we give an answer; he was received to the benefit of his clergy; and he was burnt in the hand, and his pardon is after that too.

L. C. J. So it is.

Att. Gen. Then his pardon answers them all.

L. C. J. Now you see, my lord, you think Dangerfield ought not to be a witness, who hath gone through so many punishments, outlawed for felony, and burnt in the hand for felony: Mr. Attorney makes answer, We have a pardon, and by that he is restored, as he says, to be a witness again. If you desire counsel to speak to this point, Whether or no a man branded and burnt in the hand for felony, and afterwards is pardoned, is capable of being a witness? I see no reason to deny it you.

Att. Gen. If there be matter for counsel to speak, in that case we must submit, if your lordship make it a doubt.

L. C. J. I do for my own part: In this I am clear; if a man were convicted of perjury, that no pardon will make him a witness, because it is to do the subject wrong. A pardon does not make a man an honest man; it takes off reproaches; and the law is wise in that, the law will not suffer endless contumelies to be heaped upon men, nor to be called perjured rascals, and such things; it is only to prevent upbraiding language, which tends to the breach of the peace. But, in my opinion, if a man stands convicted in court for perjury, no pardon can ever make him a witness, and set him upright again. But that is a different case from this; we are upon this single case; Whether a man that is burnt in the hand for felony, whether a pardon can set him right or no? For this I make more doubtful than the other; for a man, may be, that hath committed a robbery, would be afraid to forswear himself; for though one is a great, the other is a greater sin, and that in the subject matter; which considered, I think it reasonable to allow my lord counsel to speak to that single point, That a person being burnt in the hand for felony, and afterwards pardoned, Whether he is capable of being a witness?

Pris. Then I do name Mr. Jones, Mr. Saunders, and Mr. Darnal.

L. C. J. Very well.

[Mr. Saunders was called, but was not in court.]

L. C. J. Are you prepared, Mr. Jones, to speak?

Jones. No, my lord.

Just. Jones. My lord, do you accept against that one particular.

Pris. I stand upon both, his being pilloried and burnt in the hand.

L. C. J. Will you admit that he stood in the pillory?

Att. Gen. I know nothing of it.

L. C. J. I will tell you, my lord, you will see whether it be necessary to protract this or no; for your council will hardly undertake to argue unprepared about this point; and if the trial should be adjourned, it would be very troublesome. I think it the duty of my place to discharge my conscience for you and against you, as the matter shall fall out; and if so be that you should insist upon it, and be capable of being a witness, supposing it so, yet I must say you may give in the evidence of every record of the conviction of any sort of crimes he hath been guilty of, and they shall be read. They say last day there were sixteen; if there were an hundred they should be read against him, and they shall all go to invalidate any credit that is to be given to any thing he shall swear.

Pris. My lord, I humbly submit myself to your lordship; sixteen we have, I bring but six, you shall have them, Mr. Attorney, when you please.

L. C. J. My lord, if you think it worth your while to put it to counsel to argue, Whether he may be a witness, or whether you think it may be as well for you, supposing he be a witness, the producing those things against him, or the records of those crimes that he hath been convicted of; whether that will be as well for you or no, I leave it to yourself to do as you think best.

Mr. Darnal. I conceive with submission to your lordship, that he cannot be a witness.

L. C. J. Are you prepared to speak to it now?

Mr. Darnal. My lord, I am ready to offer somewhat to your lordship, why I conceive he ought not to be sworn: but I desire first, that the pardon may be read, because many persons and offences are comprised in it.

L. C. J. It is a pardon for felonies and outcries of felony in general.

Mr. Darnal. If the persons and their offences are severally and sufficiently pardoned, then my lord, I will proceed unto the other point.

Just. Jones. The whole is good.

Mr. Darnal. Then, my lord, I conceive, notwithstanding this pardon, Mr. Dangerfield ought not to be sworn; and that no person attainted of felony (though pardoned) can be a witness. My lord, it hath been adjudged in 11 Hen. 4. quadagesimo. That a man attainted of felony (as Mr. Dangerfield is) though he be afterwards pardoned, cannot be sworn of a jury. My lord, the same question hath been resolved since, in nono Jacobi. It is reported in Mr. Brownlow's and Goldsborough's Reports, Feltricesimo quarto. And my lord Coke in Mr. Bulstrode's second Reports, 154. in Brown and Crashaw's Case, is of the same opinion. He says, A man attainted and pardoned cannot serve upon any inquest; and that by the same reason, the testimony of such a man for a witness is in all cases to be rejected.

L. C. J. Who says so?

Mr. Darnal. My lord Coke.

L. C. J. Men do not alight my lord Coke; where do you say that is?

Mr. Darnal. It is in Mr. Bulstrode's 2d Reports, in Brown and Crashaw's case, fol. 154.

Just. Jones. But you should have brought these books hither.

Mr. Darnal. I suppose, Sir, they may be had in the Hall. My lord Coke gives this reason for it in that case; he saith, not notwithstanding his pardon, he is not 'probus et legalis homo.'

Just. Jones. That pardon was before any judgment; it was a pardon of felony before any trial or judgment; but here is a conviction.

Mr. Darnal. My lord Coke puts the case there of a man attainted. And, my lord, in duodecimo Jacobi, it is reported in Brownlow's Reports, fol. 47.

Just. Raymond. Which of his reports?

Mr. Darnal. I know but of one set out in his name alone, the other (which is called the first part) is set out in his and Goldsborough's name. I have Mr. Brownlow's Reports here, and if your lordship please you may see it.

L. C. J. What is the page?

Mr. Darnal. 47, my lord; the case there reported is, The king pardoned a man attainted for giving a false verdict; yet he shall not be at another time inpanelled upon any jury; and the reason given there is, that though the punishment was pardoned, yet the guilt remained.

Just. Jones. That is a very short note, and not so much in the book as you have mentioned.

Mr. Darnal. I writ it word for word out of the Book, Sir, and I am sure there is so much in my book. My lord, in Mr. Just. Crooke's Elizabeth, fol. 686, in Shelburn's Case, it is held, that though the king may pardon Simony, yet he cannot enable a Simoniack to retain a living.

L. C. J. The act doth make him not capable.

Mr. Darnal. I conceive, Sir; it is upon the same reason, because the pardon cannot take away the guilt, though it may the punishment of the offence.

Just. Raymond. He cannot dispense with Simony, he cannot give a dispensation to take a living.

Mr. Darnal. My lord, upon these resolutions and the reason of them, I humbly submit it to your lordship, whether Mr. Dangerfield (having been attainted of felony, though he be since pardoned) can be a witness.

Att. Gen. My lord, with your lordship's favour, this is quite contrary to the constant and general opinion, and contrary to the constant practice: For, my lord, with your lordship's favour, when a man is pardoned for any crime, if a man cannot say he is a felon, or he is perjured, then he cannot be reckoned so to any intent or purpose whatsoever.

L. C. J. I told you before, it is consonant to all the reason and law in the world, that a pardon should stop men's mouths from reviling speeches that signify nothing; but it is one thing to say men shall not go reviling, that can have no consequent good, but which tends to the breach of the peace, and another thing to say he shall be liber.

Att. Gen. My lord, when the king gives him a pardon, it is as if he had never committed the offence.

L. C. J. He may be outlawed notwithstanding the king's pardon, and then it is not as if he had never committed the offence.

Just. Jones. It restores him to wage battel, and it makes him 'liber et legalis homo.' For if a man may wage battel, he is 'liber et legalis homo.'

Att. Gen. Then, my lord, if he be so, he shall be a witness: For, my lord, in the point of perjury, a man that after a conviction of perjury had a pardon, hath been admitted several times.

L. C. J. Was the exception taken, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. Yes, my lord, and he rejected before he had a pardon.

Just. Raymond. How many men have been witnesses that have been convicted of felonies, after the kings have pardoned them?

Recorder. I will not adventure to say that there hath been a particular objection made, and so that the court hath had the debate of it; but I will undertake to give your lordship several instances of men that have been convicted, and the judges sitting there knew them to be so convicted, and did not take notice of it.

Just. Raymond. I speak of Witherington particularly.

Recorder. He was a witness, though every man did know that Witherington was convicted. I beg your lordships leaves to speak it, that the Judges themselves did know that he was convicted and had received sentence of death.

Solicitor General. (Sir Francis Winnington.) The constant practice of the judges is a mighty conclusion.

L. C. J. What think you, Mr. Attorney, if a man be convicted of Felony, and afterwards bath a general pardon, is he a witness?

Att. Gen. Yes truly, my lord, it signifies the same thing, my lord, as to be a freeman again.

Just. Jones. He cannot be of a jury, if he be attainted of felony; and the reason is, because he is not 'probus et legalis homo;' and why he should not as well be of a jury as a witness I cannot understand.

Att. Gen. There is a great deal of difference, my lord; a great many men may be admitted to be witnesses, that cannot be admitted to be jurymen.

Just. Jones. Shew me any man that is excluded from a jury and admitted to be a witness, except in the case of kindred.

Att. Gen. An hundred.

L. C. J. Shew me any man who being of a jury was excluded, and yet made a witness.

Att. Gen. A villain was not admitted to be a jurymen, but a villain was always to be a witness, and that was a point of infamy.

L. C. J. What infamy was contained in being a villain?

Att. Gen. He was a criminal, he was not liber homo.

L. C. J. But though he be not a freeman, he may be an honest man.

Recorder. My lord Hobart says, A pardon takes away the guilt.

L. C. J. It takes away guilt so far as he shall never be questioned; but it does not set a man as if he had never offended. It cannot in reason be said, a man guilty of perjury is as innocent as if he had never been perjured.

Att. Gen. I say, if a man be pardoned, he is as if he were not guilty.

L. C. J. If I were in my lord Castlemaine's case, I would submit it; but when he hath given his testimony, my lord shall have liberty to give in the records against him of what crimes he hath committed.

Just. Jones. I do confess, indeed, that my lord Hale, in his little book "Of the Pleas of the Crown," saith, that a man that hath had the benefit of his clergy is restored to his credit.

Just. Raymond. If that case be allowed, it is a plain case; for there is no man can wage battel, but he that is 'liber et legalis homo.'

Recorder. A man broke prison, and therefore he could not wage battel; he replies, the king hath pardoned me that felony, and thereupon he is admitted to wage battel.

Just. Jones. Where there is no judgment given in the case, and the king doth pardon a man, that doth make a very great difference.

Recorder. In the case of Witherington, my lord chief justice did look upon the records, and afterwards said he was a good witness, and was admitted.

Pria. If you have law by you, I must consent.

L. C. J. Then you must consent.

Recorder. There are several persons who have had pardons after robberies, and we are forced to make use of some of these fellows.

L. C. J. Before conviction.

Recorder. No, after conviction, my lord, I have known a prisoner at the bar, when my lords the judges have been there, to be a witness; and if the court had made any doubt, it would have been a question before this time of day.

Att. Gen. My lord, if you please, Mr. Dangerfield may be sworn, if your lordship please.

L. C. J. My lord shall have the benefit of excepting against his credibility.

Then Mr. Just. Raymond went down to the Court of Common Pleas, to know their opinion.

Just. Jones. Have you any other witness in the mean time?

Att. Gen. No, my lord, he is a principal witness.

Sol. Gen. Besides the common practice, here is a book that says he shall wage battel.

Just. Jones. That is, when there is a pardon before conviction.

Sol. Gen. But here, my lord, he says the Reatum is taken away, and then it takes away his disabilities too. The difference can be nothing here before conviction, and after; because before conviction he is disabled from waging battel: So that that makes no difference before conviction, and other cases after conviction; and the disability is taken away by the pardon, and he is restored to be a freeman.

L. C. J. There is a disability upon presumption, though not upon conviction.

Sol. Gen. There is the same legal impediment in the one as in the other; but his credit is left to the breast of the jury.

Recorder. When a pardon comes, it takes away not only Penam, but Reatum; and the reason my lord Hobart gives is—

L. C. J. Nay, give your reason.

Recorder. For felony is 'contra Coronam et Dignitatem,' is a fault against the king; and when the king pardons it, it ceases. And in another place it is said, It pardons all disabilities incident to him.

Just. Jones. That is before conviction, still.

L. C. J. Does not my lord Coke tell you expressly, that the taking a pardon doth not prove any offence? You take a pardon, it ought not to be concluded that you are guilty; but the proper conclusion of a wise man is, that you would be safe. It cannot be thought that every man that hath a pardon in England is guilty of all those offences that are there pardoned.

Just. Jones. There is a difference between a general pardon, and a particular pardon: When a man doth accept of a special pardon, it must be intended that he hath some consciousness of guilt, or else he would not take it; but he that is included in a general pardon may be clear, because all men are included in it, unless some persons particularly excepted; and the difference is taken in that very point, from accepting a general and a special pardon.

L. C. J. That the acceptance of a general pardon doth not barely of itself intend men to be guilty of the crimes, is plain, and the reason is most apparent; for besides that men be safe, so there be times that give a reason why men should have a pardon, because no man knows when he is safe; perjury so abounds that no man can say he is safe, and that is a reason why men should be very willing to accept of pardons.

Cl. of Cr. Here is my lord Hale's Book about the Pleas of the Crown.

Recorder. He says, When the king hath discharged and pardoned him, he hath cleared the person of the crime and infamy.

Just. Jones. It is so, no doubt.

Sol. Gen. May we pass upon these authorities?

Just. Jones. Sir Francis, we are not willing to go about it till it be concluded; for that purpose we have desired my brother Raymond to know the Judges Opinions of the Common-Pleas.

Recorder. He doth expressly say, It hath restored him to his credit; and in Witherington's case he did call for the very records.

Att. Gen. If it restore him to his credit, I hope it shall not blemish him so much when he is sworn, that he shall not be believed.

L. C. J. We will not have any prepossession in that case, his crimes shall be all taken notice of; is it fit to have men guilty of all sorts of villainies, and not to observe it?

Just. Jones. In that very case my lord Hobart says, A man may say of a pardoned man, he was a felon, though he cannot say now he is a felon; and now what can be objected to this case?

Recorder. Things may be objected against a person, and his credit left to the jury; but the question now is, Whether he shall be a witness or no?

L. C. J. We have men grown so insolent, they behave themselves with that vile insolence, that now they take upon them to speak against whole societies of men: as if so be there were any thing in them that should render them better than their former lives or natures. Humility becomes penitents, and no wicked man is supposed to be a penitent that hath not that; but these carry it with that insolency, as if they were not concerned themselves, when God knows the best of them discover what they do, by being but parties themselves.

[Mr. Justice Raymond returned from the court of Common-Pleas.]

L. C. J. I will tell you what my brethren's opinions are; he hath put it to them on both accounts, That he was convicted of felony, and burnt in the hand for it; that he was outlawed for felony, and hath a general pardon. They say they are of opinion, That a general pardon would not restore him to be a witness after an outlawry for felony, because of the interest that the king's subjects have in him. But they say further, that where a man comes to be burnt in the hand, there they look upon that as a kind of a more general discharge than the pardon alone would amount to, if he had not been burnt in the hand. They say if he had been convicted of felony, and not burnt in the hand, the pardon would not have set him upright: but being convicted and burnt in the hand, they suppose he is a witness*.

Sol. Gen. Swear Mr. Dangerfield.

L. C. J. The very attainer is taken away, and so all is gone.

Att. Gen. Come, Mr. Dangerfield, are you sworn?

Dangerfield. Yes, sir.

Att. Gen. Pray tell what you know of my lord Castlemaine.

L. C. J. I perceive my brethren's opinions is, That if a man were convicted of perjury, if there be no burning in the hand in the case, that a pardon could not set him upright, because of the interest of the people in the thing.

Att. Gen. Come, Mr. Dangerfield, are you sworn?

Dangerfield. Yes, sir.

Att. Gen. Then pray say what you do know of my lord Castlemaine.

Dangerfield. About this time twelvemonth, my lady Powis sent me with a letter for the prisoner at the bar, my lord Castlemaine.

L. C. J. Don't you know him?

Dangerfield. Yes, my lord, this is the person. And, my lord, the contents of that letter I know not: but his lordship made me stay till he wrote an answer, and the contents of the answer, my lord, were to this effect: for I returned with the answer to the lady Powis, and she opened and read it while I was present.

L. C. J. Aloud?

Dangerfield. Aloud, my lord.

L. C. J. To you?

Dangerfield. To me.

L. C. J. Who was there?

Dangerfield. Mrs. Cellier was there besides. And the contents of this letter were, 'This person I like well, and though he be no scholar, he will serve to instruct the youths as he shall be directed.' By the youths were meant the St. Omers witnesses.

L. C. J. How do you know?

Dangerfield. Because I know my lord was employed for that purpose. I know his lordship did use to instruct the youths; and it was a common saying among them, when one of them was out of his part, they used to say, I must go to my lord Castlemaine.

* See the objection which was taken in this Case to Dangerfield's admissibility considered in different places in Mr. Hargrave's Argument on the effect of the king's pardon of perjury, cited in a note to Cellier's Case, ante, p. 1052.

L. C. J. What part?

Dangerfield. That which they were to say; and one of them did say, I am out of my lesson, I must go to my lord Castlemaine.

L. C. J. When did he say so?

Dangerfield. Before the trial, my lord; and my lord Castlemaine went along with them to the trial, and his lordship complained of some ill usage that the witnesses received there. His lordship was one of the persons that employed me to get Lane out of the Gate-house, my lord, and his lordship sent me to a solicitor of his, whose name was Mr. Lawson (the person is now in court), to take an account how far he had proceeded in this affair. I did take an account, and I proceeded in it afterwards, and got him discharged.

L. C. J. How came you into my lord's acquaintance?

Dangerfield. That was the first time, when my lady Powis sent me with that letter, my lord. A pretty while after this, in the month of July I went to wait upon his lordship at his house at Charing-Cross, the same place where I found his lordship before; and I was to take his advice about some letters that came from one Nevil alias Paine. Those letters and lists of names I shewed his lordship, and he gave his approbation of them, and desired good store of copies might be writ: for it was of consequence, and ought not to be neglected. And asked me, are there working persons employed in that business? and said he, encourage them, and I will pay my part. So my lord, after there were a great number of copies writ of these letters, I writ a letter to my lord Castlemaine to let his lordship know that the people had finished their work, and that there was something more to be done as a gratuity; and then his lordship in answer to this messenger (who is here also in court) with a letter his lordship sent 40s. for his part. And Mrs. Cellier told me she received 40s. and disposed of it to the use intended; now, my lord, the contents of these letters were to the same effect with those letters and loose papers which I conveyed into colonel Mansel's chamber; and these all tended to the promoting the sham Plot, my lord.

L. C. J. Pray tell me what was the subject of these letters; what was the substance of them?

Dangerfield. To the promoting the Sham-Plot, my lord.

L. C. J. That is a general nobody knows what to make of.

Dangerfield. I will give your lordship an account in particular: the contents of many of them were to this purpose.

L. C. J. Were they not all alike?

Dangerfield. The copies were the same, and there were so many originals to draw copies from.

L. C. J. Were not the originals all to the same purpose?

Dangerfield. Agreeable in point of sense.

L. C. J. Pray tell us the purpose of them?

Dangerfield. The purpose was, that so many letters should be conveyed into the houses of several persons of quality in this kingdom, that were called Presbyterians: For that was the notion, that all persons that were not the immediate promoters of the Catholic interest, lay under; because they looked upon that notion to be most obnoxious.

L. C. J. Who and where?

Dangerfield. In general, my lord.

L. C. J. In general, where?

Dangerfield. By my lady Powis, and the lords in the Tower.

L. C. J. Were you by when the lords in the Tower did agree to it?

Dangerfield. When my lord Petre and my lord Arundel did.

L. C. J. What did they agree to?

Dangerfield. My lord, the thing is this: after they received an account from one Mr. Paine, I brought a billet from that Paine; wherein was contained a ground or scheme of the Presbyterian-Plot; so from thence it derived it's first name, my lord: so that when I came to discourse with the lords in the Tower about it, they called it the Presbyterian-Plot; and Mrs. Cellier and the lady Powis said, this is a notion that will do the business, as it is most obnoxious, and as best to our purpose.

Just. Jones. How far was my lord Castlemaine concerned in this?

Dangerfield. I have not heard his lordship speak of it under that notion.

L. C. J. Pray let us hear what you can say against my lord Castlemaine.

Dangerfield. Now, my lord, some considerable time after I had gotten Lane out of prison, I was employed by several other persons, his lordship was one, and he sent me to his lordship's solicitor, that is now in court. A pretty while after this, and the letters and lists of names, containing matter to the same effect as I told you before, as those in Mansel's chamber, and all tending to the credit of the Sham-Plot, or the Presbyterian-Plot: Now, my lord, a pretty while after this, in August, as near as I can remember; about the middle of August, I went to wait upon his lordship the very next day after I had been treated withal in the Tower to kill the king, whom God preserve, my lord; and his lordship had a servant then in the room, and he sent his servant down stairs, and looked upon me with a very austere countenance: said he, why would you offer to refuse the business for which you were taken out of prison?

L. C. J. To you?

Dangerfield. To me, my lord.

L. C. J. Who was by?

Dangerfield. Nobody but his lordship, and myself; for he sent his servant out before: so he asked me, why I would offer to refuse the business I was taken out of prison for? I asked his lordship, what that was? said he, was not you at the Tower yesterday? yes, my lord, I was. Would your lordship have me kill the king, I suppose that is the business? Yes, that is, said he. Upon which my lord fell into such a fury, that I was forced rudely to leave the room, and went down stairs. I think at the same time his lordship was writing the compendium of the late plot; for there I saw some words in a paragraph that lay upon the table, which I afterwards saw in that book. There was ink set upon the table, and open in his lordship's hand. And his lordship did use in his discourse to call his majesty tyrant.

L. C. J. Have you heard him? in what company?

Dangerfield. In his familiar discourse. As to ask when his majesty will return from Windsor? says he, when the tyrant pleases. And I remember I heard his lordship mention the word tyrant to Mrs. Cellier at Powis-house.

Att. Gen. How came that discourse about killing the king? what was the occasion of that discourse?

L. C. J. Had you refused it to my lord?

Dangerfield. Yes, my lord, I refused.

L. C. J. What did you say to him?

Dangerfield. I said, Any body but my king, my lord.

L. C. J. He said, why did you refuse to do that for which you were taken out of prison? what is that, my lord? was not you at the Tower yesterday? why won't you do it? what is it, my lord? is it to kill the king? I suppose that it is, saith he, that your lordship intends. Yes, says he, that is it, why won't you do it? that is what he says.

Att. Gen. That is the evidence we give.

Just. Jones. You say he was very violent?

L. C. J. Was you ever in his company afterwards?

Dangerfield. No, not after that, my lord, that I know of.

L. C. J. What kind of fury did he shew you at that time?

Dangerfield. My lord, he was in a great rage, as his lordship is very choleric; he was bustling about, and I knew not what he intended to do, and I was unwilling to stand the test of his anger. His lordship seemed by his look to be meditating revenge.

L. C. J. How?

Dangerfield. I say this, after his lordship had sent his servant out of the room, said he, why would you offer to refuse the business for which you were taken out of prison? said he, were not you at the Tower yesterday? said I, yes, my lord, I was. Would you have me kill the king? is that the business? Yes, that it is, said my lord very angrily.

Pris. When did you go to the Tower? was this the next day after it?

Dangerfield. The next day after it.

Pris. Pray let me ask you one question. Did not I threaten to kill you, or have some of my servants kill you, if you came unto me again?

Dangerfield. One time his lordship saw me at my lady Powis's house and he shewed me a very particular favour. I speak it in the presence of Almighty God, nothing out of revenge, nor for any sort of interest.

Pris. Was I never angry with you but at that time?

Dangerfield. No, my lord, I know not of any other time that your lordship was angry.

L. C. J. Now, what say you, my lord?

Pris. The first thing I desire to do is, here are two gentlemen give in evidence against me, the one is Mr. Oates and the other Mr. Dangerfield. Mr. Oates says, That he in Spain did see several letters from me: That when he came over into England, he brought a letter from Spain to me, that that letter was given to the provincial, and the provincial (he supposes) gave it to me. Now, my lord, I only desire this, that the first thing that shall be done, is; that you will please to call Mr. Parker, who will shew you what a kind of man Mr. Oates is. And I am glad, since you say that Mr. Dangerfield is a good witness, that I can prove that every word he says is a lie. And so begin with Mr. Oates.

Pris. I would offer you a Record, a Record of some particular actions from Hastings.

L. C. J. Read the Record.

[The Record read.]

L. C. J. What use can you make of this?

Pris. My lord, the case is only this, my lord, I will tell you, here is Mr. Oates, this is only to shew what kind of man this Mr. Oates is. Mr. Oates he comes and accuses a man at Hastings for buggery, there he is indicted and comes to his trial, and then he is found innocent: Now, my lord, I sent for this Mr. Parker, to tell your lordship what kind of man this Mr. Oates was, and for that purpose shew the whole proceeding.

L. C. J. My lord, you shall have all the justice in the world; but we must have right done to the king's evidence. You have brought in a thing, whereby all you can make against Mr. Oates is this, that he was the prosecutor of a man for the crime of buggery, and is supposed to have taken his oath there, and notwithstanding the jury would not believe him, and found the man Not Guilty.

Pris. My lord, I come to shew you the motives how the jury came to clear him, that is, by proving this man was in another place at that time, and satisfied the court and jury, that he was from eleven o'clock or sooner, till eight or ten o'clock with them in company; where it was only the malice that was between Oates and Parker; and several witnesses that were in the place where he said the buggery was committed, said that he was not there; and the witnesses positively said they were with him, and all looked upon Mr. Oates as a detestable man, and sent him out of the Court.

L. C. J. Do you prove this by any but Parker?

Justice Raymond. This ought not to be admitted; for if it be, Mr. Oates stands here to answer all the faults that ever he committed.

L. C. J. Here is the case: Supposing it be true now, that Mr. Oates prosecuted a man for felony, and he gave testimony, supposing it should be so, and yet the jury acquitted him; what use can you make of it? You can make no inference; it is a thing we must allow all the juries in England: for there is witness generally given on both sides; and when there are for the plaintiff, the defendant's evidence are all perjured; and when for the defendant the plaintiff's evidence are perjured.

Pris. My lord, this is the inference. Thus much I make of it, that this Parker is innocent. Oates swears positively he did so, the other swears positively this man was not there; to shew the malice Oates had against him.

L. C. J. My lord, you can go no further than you have gone. The result of allis, that the jury found him Not Guilty; for what grounds no man can come to say, but the jury-men themselves. No man can tell what prevailed with the jury to find him Not Guilty, that is in their own consciences, and these are things that cannot be examined. His jury, notwithstanding Mr. Oates was the only prosecutor, they found him Not Guilty, and it amounts to nothing.

Pris. My lord, there is another thing: while this man was in prison, what does Oates do, but comes here to London, accuses the father, who was a considerable man in the town, a justice of the peace, and mayor the year before; accuses him because he should not assist his son; accuses him before the king of speaking scandalous words; then he gets him by a messenger brought up before the council: the king was present at the hearing, and there it was proved to the king, as the order of council shews, that he was an honest man, and so the council sent Oates away with the greatest contempt, and freed the other man.

L. C. J. Was this before the Plot was discovered?

Pris. Yes, my lord, in pursuance of it.

L. C. J. You said it was that he should not help his son, his son was not free.

Pris. No, he was in prison, my lord.

Recorder. My lord may think it hard if he hath not some competent liberty; but he must keep to the business. You say, that notwithstanding he hath the opinion of the Court, that the jury must take notice; then the jury must take notice it signifies nothing.

Pris. Very well. Having told you this, I desire you would be pleased to take notice, after Oates was thus forced to run away from Hastings, here it seems he was converted to be a Papist, by a person whom Mr. Oates hath since converted to be a Protestant; and you shall see what an account this gentleman will give of him.

L. C. J. What is his name?

Pris. Hutchinson.

L. C. J. What will you do against him?

Pris. Several things, my lord.

L. C. J. You must not do it: If you are able to disprove Mr. Oates in any of these particulars, you may do it. If you alledge testimony against the particular matter he hath sworn, you will do very well; but pray, my lord, keep to that.

Pris. I will, my lord; I will submit any thing to your lordship's commands; and therefore, my lord, I will tell you for what reason I sent for this man, to tell you how Mr. Oates went to Spain, and how he lived in Spain.

L. C. J. If you can shew the jury any reason why they should not believe his evidence, that will be very proper.

L. C. J. What is your name?

Hutchinson. My name is Hutchinson.

Pris. Mr. Hutchinson, pray say what you have to say, and not follow Mr. Oates's method: I only ask you this question, Sir, whether you did convert this man, that is, reconcile him to the Church of Rome?

Hutchinson. Yes, my lord, that I did.

L. C. J. You ought not to ask him such questions, you bring him in danger of his life; you are not to ask him such questions.

Recorder. Let us see the Statute-Book.

Cl. of Cr. It is High Treason.

L. C. J. You thought this had been meritorious now, and it is High Treason.

Recorder. This it is to abound in a man's own sense. We must beg your lordship's advice in this.

L. C. J. Are you a Protestant now?

Hutchinson. Yes, my lord.

Pris. He was a priest, and confesses his error.

L. C. J. Did you know Oates first in Spain?

Hutchinson. No, my lord, I knew him first here; and we were in company, and I told him he could not be a true priest, since he was of the Church of England.

Att. Gen. He offers such things as are not evidence.

L. C. J. Pray what do you know of his employment in Spain?

Hutchinson. I received letters from him when he was in Spain. He went over to study philosophy and divinity there, and I saw his recommendations to the rector of Liege.

L. C. J. Did you see him?

Hutchinson. Yes, my lord, I did see him before he made this disturbance.

L. C. J. What disturbance? Do you know? What discourse had you with him?

Hutchinson. I employed him in writing for me.

L. C. J. Writing what?

Hutchinson. In writing certain things against the corruption of the Church of Rome. He had 10s. I gave him, and this was before the discovery he made (as he pretends) of the Plot. And he told me he would suffer no more for conscience-sake: it is an hard thing, said he, Mr. Berry, for a man to want bread; upon which I gave him 10s.

L. C. J. He says, having been formerly with Mr. Oates, he employed him to transcribe many things for him; and Mr. Oates said to him, 'He was resolved no more to suffer for conscience sake. How, saith he, not so? Oh, but,

Mr. Berry, said he, it is a very sad thing to want bread.' And upon that, he says, he gave him 10s. for his pains in writing.

Hutchinson. And hereupon, my lord, in May was twelvemonth he sent for me, when I heard he had done some more mischief; and I went to him, my lord.

L. C. J. That was after the discovery?

Hutchinson. Yes, my lord, upon that he was very kind to me, and gave me 20s. Said he, Mr. Berry, you have been civil to me, and you shall never want any thing so long as I have it. Said I, Mr. Oates, are these things true that you swear against the jesuits? Said he, As I hope for salvation they are. And that was the truest word he spake these three years. Then, said I, Mr. Oates, answer me this only one thing. There are 120 persons that saw you every day, and dined and supped with you at St. Omers, and these you have recommended to me for virtuous people, and I know them to be so. He said, They are outlawed men.

L. C. J. What did Mr. Oates say more?

Hutchinson. He was with me frequently, my lord.

Recorder. He paid your Angel well when he gave you 20s.

Hutchinson. Mr. Oates, speak the truth: there is a God in heaven.

Oates. Shall I be allowed to satisfy the court as to this evidence? I will give the court a very good account.

L. C. J. The substance is this; that you were poor. Is it true that he gave you 10s.?

Oates. My lord, I believe I might not have much money among them.

L. C. J. And you said, You would suffer no more for conscience sake?

Oates. That is not so, my lord.

L. C. J. And, That it is an hard thing to want bread?

Oates. My lord, I never wanted bread.

Hutchinson. But you said so to me, Mr. Oates.

Att. Gen. Hark, Mr. Hutchinson—

Oates. To shew the invalidity of this evidence, my lord, the bishop of London hath turned him out of his living at Barkin.

L. C. J. What is that?

Oates. To shew that he is not fit to be trusted.

L. C. J. Why, you have never a living.

Oates. Yes, I have, my lord.

L. C. J. Where?

Oates. In Kent, my lord.

L. C. J. How long have you had it?

Oates. I was restored to it last summer.

Recorder. He says that he had discourse with him concerning his priesthood; whether Mr. Oates thought himself to be a good priest; that is, as he was made by the order of the Church of England?

Att. Gen. He says, He converted Mr. Oates to be a papist.

Oates. And I have a charge of high-treason against that man, for seducing me from my religion, my lord; I will swear he turned me to the Church of Rome, and I desire it may be recorded.

Dr. D. I have one thing to tell your lordship, the man is mad, he is distracted.

L. C. J. This doctor of divinity is a very honest man, he will tell you.

Dr. D. He was my curate at Barkin, and my lord of London having some information against the manner of his preaching, sent me word to Rippon he would provide me another curate; on Saturday last, dining with him, my lord told me he was distracted.

Recorder. His behaviour is a very concurrent testimony.

Justice Raymond. I appeal to my lord, if I did not tell him, as he came into the court, that he was a distracted man.

L. C. J. Call another witness.

Pris. Here is a gentleman was his school-fellow at Valladolid. I ask you, Mr. Armstrong, Whether you knew any thing of Mr. Oates there?

L. C. J. How long had he been there?

Armstrong. He was three months there before me.

L. C. J. How long was he there in all?

Armstrong. A matter of a month.

L. C. J. Was he not there four months.

Armstrong. Yes a matter of four months in all.

L. C. J. He says, he had been there three months before he came, and a month after he came; and that then he was but a common scholar.

Oates. My lord, I will satisfy the court when they question me.

L. C. J. In what would you satisfy us?

Oates. About being a scholar. I was ready to commence when they came; but being they were strangers in the town, not being town-scholars, and not undertaking philosophical dictates, the fathers did pray me to shew them the way to school; and I went with them two or three times.

L. C. J. Call another, my lord.

Pris. Mr. Palmer and Mr. Duddington.

L. C. J. Did you know Mr. Oates at St. Omers?

Palmer. Yes, my lord, and he was an ordinary scholar there, and dined and supped with us.

L. C. J. You said he dined at another table.

Palmer. Yes, my lord, he did dine at a table by himself, but it was at the same time.

Oates. Had I scholars commons? pray, my lord, ask them that.

Palmer. He had the same commons that we had; but they had a respect for him, as he was an ancienter man, and that was the reason that he had more freedom than the rest.

Pris. My lord, he says he came from St. Omers at the consult: Pray, Sir, who did you come along with? Did you come with Hilsley?

Oates. Hilsley came with me in the packet-boat.

Pris. Call Mr. Hilsley and Osborne. My lord, this gentleman—I would bring nothing to offend your lordship, or nothing that hath been old, if it had not some new inference from it; therefore, my lord, this is the reason that I sent for Mr. Hilsley. Mr. Hilsley, did you come with Mr. Oates in April in the packet-boat?—Hilsley. No, my lord.

Pris. You left him at St. Omers?

Hilsley. Yes, my lord.

Pris. Now, my lord, I have several witnesses to prove this. And pray, Mr. Osborne, tell my lord what he said to you.

Osborne. My lord, about the latter end of April I heard Mr. Hilsley was in town; I went to see him, and one time at a coffee-house about the Turnstile we fell in discourse.

L. C. J. My lord, you say you have two persons of quality: I will tell you, my lord, what you shall expect; I will not be for one, and not for the other; but be equal as near as I can. If he comes only to testify what Hilsley told him it signifies nothing.

Pris. I do depend upon Hilsley; but this is that Hilsley told him, that there was one Oates at St. Omers.

L. C. J. That is no evidence, nor can ladies of quality prove by their own experience what Mr. Hilsley affirms that Oates came not over with him.

Pris. My lord, they can tell; and one lady, a protestant, that talking with this gentleman before the plot—

L. C. J. This is only discourse what another man says; if Mr. Oates himself should have said so, then indeed it is proper: But to shew you this, it is impossible, supposing they speak truth; that is, if they do witness what they do not, that long before they heard of the name of Oates, this gentleman should tell them, one Oates was left at St. Omers; it signifies nothing.

Pris. Does not that confirm Mr. Hilsley's testimony?

L. C. J. No, indeed.

Pris. I only refer this to you, my lord; Hilsley says, in April he did leave Oates, and here are four or five witnesses that Hilsley told them so.

Justice Jones. All that my lord says, is this, that he did leave Mr. Oates at St. Omers. If it be objected, they are catholics, as they call them; says my lord, Hilsley did tell his story before there was any plot. Why should he tell them so? It is not in favour of that religion that he speaks; but the time of testifying such a thing shows he speaks true. This is all.

Pris. This is the inference; this is only to corroborate and shew you the credit of his testimony.

Justice Raymond. It may be a mistake, though, and it is of no more force than what he says now.

Att. Gen. They were all mistaken in that matter.

Oates. My lord, he did leave me at St. Omers, but I overtook him at Calais.

L. C. J. Will you swear it, Mr. Oates?

Oates. I say, upon my oath I did it.

L. C. J. It were a great matter, if you had any body to prove, that this gentleman came alone; but that is still but one man's testimony.

Pris. But here is confirmation to his evidence that he could not invent it.

Att. Gen. You had 16 once, but the contrary was proved and believed, and so it may be again.

Pris. Call Mr. Gregson and Mr. Rigby Mr. Gregson, were not you landlord to Mr. Oates, before the plot was discovered? How long before the plot did he lie at your house?

L. C. J. What time?

Gregson. A week before Easter, 1677.

Justice Raymond. When did he go away from you, sir?

Gregson. The Sunday after Easter-day.

Justice Raymond. When did you see him again?

Gregson. He came to me about All Saints.

Justice Raymond. The same year?

Gregson. Yes.

Oates. Who paid for my quarters? Pray ask him that, my lord.

Gregson. He paid for it himself.

Oates. Did not Mr. Fenwick pay for it?

Gregson. He did after you came from St. Omers.

Oates. My lord, when I came last from St. Omers, I went directly to his house.

Pris. Was not he in a poor condition?

Gregson. He was then indifferently poor.

Pris. My lord, this is only to prove his condition.

Oates. My lord, I had only what the Jesuits allowed me.

L. C. J. You had nothing but what they allowed you?

Oates. Nothing else, my lord.

Justice Jones. They allowed you a very scanty living.

Pris. Call Mr. Littcott. Mr. Littcott, do you know any thing about a divorce?

L. C. J. What should he know?

Pris. Pray, my lord, don't discourage me.

Justice Raymond. But you must not ask things that are not to the purpose.

Littcott. My lord, it was morally impossible there should be a divorce.

L. C. J. Was there any endeavour by my lord concerning it?

Littcott. There was no such design.

L. C. J. How was that? But pray mind, you will be morally not believed else: Do you know my lord used any endeavours, in order to obtain a divorce?

Recorder. That is all that he says, 'he never knew any thing.'

Pris. I only say this, my lord, Mr. Oates comes here and says, that he heard me say, that I did spend a great deal of money. Now if I satisfy the court that I never spent a farthing towards a divorce—

L. C. J. If he had said, your lordship laid out sums of money, then it had been an answer to that, if you could prove you had not.

Pris. You know I stand here accused for a great crime; pray give me leave.

Justice Raymond. If it were a matter of moment, we would.

Pris. Pray, my lord, hear me: Here is a man says, I spent a great deal of money about a divorce? I come to tell your lordship, that this very man, before your lordships, and also before the king, and if your lordships have forgot it, I will shew you witnesses that he spake it before the king, and before the house of commons, that I did actually sue out a divorce: Now I will shew, my lord, that I neither could, nor did go about it.

L. C. J. We are not to take notice of that now. If he did say a false thing before the House of Commons, we cannot take notice of it now; for we cannot go to try whether he said so, and whether that be true or false.

Pris. I humbly beg, my lord, if this man that is upon oath hath sworn before the king that he did actually see the divorce, and I prove that it was impossible that he should see the divorce, because it was impossible to get a divorce—

L. C. J. What then?

Just. Raymond. You must not be permitted to prove that, it is not pertinent to the question.

Pris. My lords, with humble submission to you, he hath told me this before your lordships, that I spent a great deal of money about a divorce.

L. C. J. My lord, you will be satisfied, when we have acquainted you what the ordinary proceedings of a court of justice are in matters of this nature: what is and what is not to be admitted. If you should come to prove Mr. Oates had falsely sworn a thing in another court, and five or six witnesses shall come and say it is not true; we are not to hearken to it. The reason is this: First, you must have him perjured, and we are not now to try, whether that thing sworn in another place be true or false: Because that is the way to accuse whom you please; and that may make a man a liar, that cannot imagine this will be put to him: And so no man's testimony that comes to be a witness, shall leave himself safe. And this is another case, if he swore in another place what is contradictory to what he says now; then it is proper. If you could prove that he had sworn in another place that he never saw you, it is very proper: But now to us he says, that he doth not remember whether ever he had seen a divorce, or that you had sued out a divorce. All that he remembers is, that you said you had expended a great deal of money about a divorce, and this is all he testifies here.

Pris. My lord, my evidence against Mr. Oates is this, that he waves what he said before, when I came to ask him, and says, I do not remember. Now, my lord, if he lies in one thing he may in another.

Just. Raymond. No man can remember all the things that ever he did in his life.

Pris. I have witnesses to appeal to, to witness every thing; and I represent it here to you, that I would with all my heart have indicted him of perjury, but for Mr. Attorney General: For I employed two to attend the clerk of the peace for copies of the indictment against Mr. Langhorn and Mr. Ireland; they did come to the clerk of the peace, saith the clerk of the peace I cannot do it without Mr. Attorney's authority. My lord, saith he, I would give them you with all my heart, but I must have leave from the table.

Att. Gen. No, my lord, I told you I would not give it you without you had an order from the king, and the council did not think fit to give it you.

Pris. I think this a little pertinent.

Just. Jones. How doth any thing that your lordship excepts against in this gentleman's testimony contradict itself? All that you accuse him of is, that Mr. Oates had said he heard you say, you had spent a great deal of money about a divorce.

Pris. I only shew, if you are pleased to hear it, that he reported to the king that he actually saw the divorce.

Just. Jones. That agrees well enough with what he says now.

Pris. He said so in your lordships hearing.

L. C. J. I do not remember it, if I did I would speak of it; I do not remember it, upon my word.

Just. Raymond. I protest I do not remember a word.

Just. Jones. In the court, did he say it?

Just. Raymond. Here we have all three that were present, I protest I do not remember it; but as to the business of the divorce, I might look upon it as impertinent, and so possibly might not mind what he said.

Pris. I only offer this to you; and if your lordships command me to desist, I will desist.

Oates. I desire my evidence to prove that I was in town.

Just. Raymond. Pray, Mr. Oates, you are an evidence, you must be governed by Mr. Attorney.

L. C. J. It would be very fit, Mr. Attorney, to prove that Mr. Oates did come over with Hilsley in the packet-boat.

Just. Raymond. Mr. Oates, I remember very well, gave an account of his coming over; said he, I did come over with such and such persons, and among the rest was Mr. Hilsley. This is only to prove that he was at the consult.

Att. Gen. We can prove it.

Records produced against Mr. Dangerfield.

L. C. J. Here is, that he was burnt in the hand, and outlawed for felony, pilloried for cheating, twice pilloried; and see whether he was whipped or no.

Sol. Gen. I know nothing of the pillory.

Just. Raymond. Here was a record of being burnt in the hand, and a record of putting away false guineas.

L. C. J. For that he was to stand in the pillory.

Cl. of Cr. Here is one record for another shilling gilt.

L. C. J. Was that in the pillory too?

Att. Gen. He was fined fifty pounds.

Cl. of Cr. Here are three in Salisbury for three several guineas, and he was adjudged to the pillory for them all.

Att. Gen. It was all at one heizes, my lord.

L. C. J. My brother tried him.

Cl. of Cr. He was tried before Mr. Just. Jones, and to stand in the pillory for all three.

L. C. J. What have you else to say?

Pris. Call Mrs. Cellier and Mr. Dowdal.

L. C. J. What is your name, sir?

Dowdal. My name is Bennet Dowdal.

L. C. J. What have you to say to him, my lord?

Pris. Mr. Dowdal, the case is this, Mr. Dangerfield tells me I was angry with him at such a time for a business at my house; was I not angry with him at Powis house for going to the lords in the Tower?

Att. Gen. Then he did go about it?

Dowdal. Mrs. Cellier spake to me to speak to Mr. Dangerfield not to be troubled at your anger.

Just. Raymond. When was this?

Dowdal. After the Jesuits died.

Pris. He proves this, That Mrs. Cellier spake to him to pacify Mr. Dangerfield, and Dangerfield did tell him I was angry with him for going in my name to the Lords.

Just. Raymond. He says no such thing, my lord.

L. C. J. You must not ask him what Mrs. Cellier said.

Cellier. This day twelve-month he and I had been employed in writing copies of some letters, and I sent him to my lord to know if he would go something towards the printing them, and he went from him to the lords in the Tower. In an hour and half after, my lord came to me very angry: Mrs. Cellier, said he, I thought you would not forfeit your discretion to send such a rascal to me; if you send him to me again, I will bid my servants kick him. And, said I to Mr. Dangerfield, you are not to note that; for he is a very good man, and may be angry one time and pleased another; and I would have sent him another time, and said he, pray, madam, do not send me thither, I would rather go an hundred miles of your errand.

L. C. J. Dangerfield, That discourse you had with my lord, was it before the Jesuits died, or after?

Dangerfield. What discourse?

L. C. J. When you discoursed about killing the king.

Dangerfield. No, my lord, two months after.

L. C. J. When was the time that these words were spoken?

Dangerfield. When his lordship was in that passion.

L. C. J. When was that?

Dangerfield. My lord, it was about the middle of August.

L. C. J. Was you ever in his company after?

Dangerfield. No, my lord, I saw him once at Powis house.

L. C. J. Had he ever been angry before?

Dangerfield. No, not till this time, my lord.

L. C. J. Here Mrs. Cellier witnesses, that this day twelve-month, my lord was extremely angry, insomuch, that when she would have had you go on an errand, you would not.

Dangerfield. My lord, that time I had been with my lord Castlemaine, I went home to Mrs. Cellier's house, which I did then call my home, and said I, my lord Castlemaine is most violently angry with me.

L. C. J. When was this?

Dangerfield. This was the latter end of August.

L. C. J. But she talks of this time twelve-month.

Dangerfield. It is no such thing, my lord.

Cellier. I said, pray carry this letter to my lord Castlemaine: Pray excuse me, said he, I had rather go an hundred miles than go by his door.

L. C. J. Whereas Dangerfield says, he had this discourse in August, Mrs. Cellier says in June or July; this day twelve-month particularly she gave him a letter, and he said, Pray excuse me, I would go an hundred miles for you; but I would not go into my lord's company again if I could help it.

Pris. My lord, Mr. Dowdal can tell it.

L. C. J. Did he acknowledge to you my lord's anger in the beginning of July?

Dowdal. It was within a week after the Jesuits died.

L. C. J. I do not know that.

Dowdal. It was about the 21st of June.

L. C. J. Here are two Witnesses, one say in June or the beginning of July; says Mrs. Cellier, this day twelve-month he came and told me, my lord was extremely angry with him. And she would afterwards have had him carried a letter: But he said, Pray excuse me, I would go an hundred miles, but he would not go again to him if he could help it. And Dowdal says, he told him about that time of my lord's anger with him.

Att. Gen. Hold your tongue, Mr. Dangerfield.

Just. Raymond. What Jesuits?

Dowdal. The five Jesuits.

Pris. If you please, my lords, I would only tell you this. My lords, you see that these two witnesses testify that I was angry with Mr. Dangerfield in June; my lords, I only say this to you, that when I was examined at the council before the king of this particular, my lord chancellor asked him the particulars of it, and he did confess this thing which I now prove. Now, my lords, I infer this, if I was so angry with him for offering to go to the Tower, when he went to the Tower in my name——

L. C. J. That they have said, that you were very angry.

Dowdal. Dangerfield told me so, that he was angry about his going to the Tower in my lord's name, unknown to him.

L. C. J. Here are two witnesses to prove that my lord was angry with him for going to the Tower in his name; and they both testify he was extremely high, and refused to carry a letter to my lord; and yet he says, in August following he had this discourse.

Pris. I have now only one thing to say what hath passed between Mr. Oates and Mr. Dangerfield.

L. C. J. Do it as near as you can.

Sol. Gen. We have some other evidence to answer this.

Att. Gen. If your lordship please, we will call two or three witnesses to prove the point. First, to prove this last thing, that we have been in my lord's company later than my lord speaks of.

L. C. J. He says August.

Att. Gen. We will prove after that time, that is the time that pinches us.

Pris. My lady Powis is in Court, will you hear her?

Lady Powis. My lord, I never did send a letter by Mr. Dangerfield to any body in my life, nor I never read a letter in Mr. Dangerfield's presence, nor never had him so much in my company to read a letter or any tittle to him.

L. C. J. I will tell you gentlemen, what he says; Mr. Dangerfield swears he carried a letter from my lady Powis to my lord Castlemaine, and there was an answer brought back, and that that answer of my lord Castlemaine's was read before him; and (you will do well to call Mrs. Cellier in again) my lady Powis doth deny that she ever sent a letter by him to my lord Castlemaine, or any body else, by him in her life; or that she ever communicated any letter to him: This is apt evidence, this is the truth of it; for it answers directly to what he says against my lord Castlemaine.

Sir Richard Barker.

L. C. J. What say you, sir Richard Barker, can you give an account of Oates? When was Mr. Oates in town? What time that you know of?

Sir R. Barker. My lord, I remember we were once upon this before your lordship.

L. C. J. In 1678?

Sir R. Barker. Yes, my lord; the evidence that I gave, my lord, was only this, that my servants told me that Mr. Oates had been at my house: It was before Whitsontide in May 1678.

L. C. J. Did you see him then? When was it you saw him?

Sir R. Barker. My lord, I saw him after.

L. C. J. How long after?

Sir R. Barker. My lord, it was about the latter end of June.

L. C. J. He says to his own knowledge he saw him in June.

Att. Gen. But we have his servants here too, Philip Page, and Cecily Mayo.

L. C. J. Do you hear, Mrs. Cellier, was there any letters sent by my lord Castlemaine to my lady Powis, that was read before you and Dangerfield?

VOL. VII.

Mrs. Cellier. No, my lord.

L. C. J. Here are two witnesses; my lady says there is no such thing, and Mrs. Cellier says it.

Pris. There is another thing, that is, the teaching the scholars at St. Omers; that I taught the scholars their lessons.

— Turner.

Sol. Gen. Pray inform my lord and the jury, what time it was you saw Mr. Dangerfield as my lord Castlemaine's.

L. C. J. What month can you charge yourself to say you saw Dangerfield in my lord Castlemaine's company.

Turner. I can't say just the time.

L. C. J. Might it be August?

Turner. I can't well tell, I think it might be about July.

Just. Raymond. Why do you think so?

L. C. J. You are not asked to accuse yourself in any thing, but when you saw them together.

Turner. I was coming down stairs, my lord.

Just. Raymond. You don't tell when it was.

L. C. J. Tell us whether you can tell or no: If you are doubtful, say you are doubtful; but speak the truth.

Turner. I can't be positive.

L. C. J. It might be in June, or July, or August; but you think July.

Turner. Yes, sir.

Sol. Gen. The sooner it is after that, the evidence is the better against it.

Att. Gen. Madam, I think your ladyship says you never sent a letter by Dangerfield?

Lady Powis. Yes, sir.

Att. Gen. Nor did you never receive any notes from him?

Lady Powis. I have received some notes from Mrs. Cellier, which were his writing.

L. C. J. But did you ever receive a letter from my lord Castlemaine?

Lady Powis. Never, my lord.

— Woodman.

Just. Raymond. What do you say, Mr. Attorney?

Att. Gen. Hark you, Woodman, were you sent with any letter?

Woodman. To whom?

Att. Gen. To my lord Castlemaine, or any body?

Woodman. I was sent with one letter, it was Mrs. Cellier's, my lord.

L. C. J. To whom?

Woodman. To my lord Castlemaine; as I remember, my lord, I took it from Mrs. Cellier's daughter.

Att. Gen. Did you ever receive any money of my lord Castlemaine?

Woodman. Yes, my lord.

L. C. J. What was it; How much was it?

Woodman. About three pounds, or thirty shillings, I believe.

L. C. J. How do you believe it?

Woodman. To the best of my thoughts it was.

4 B

Att. Gen. Was it for Dangerfield?

Woodman. My lord, I don't know that.

L. C. J. Have you any more?

Sol. Gen. My lord, I have this to say, to prove Dr. Oates was in London in April 1678.

L. C. J. He doth not deny but he might be here too.

Pris. I don't dispute it my lord, I have only this one word more. It is not of treason, but it is against my reputation; because this man, before your lordship, I think, has accused me of it; and I think, my lord, I shall give you very good satisfaction: That is, that the boys that came from St. Omers were not instructed and taught by me. Now, if you please, my lord, to give me leave to shew it, I have done. Look my lord, the thing that I can say, is this; Mr. Littcott—

Just. Raymond. You see he said it was morally impossible.

Pris. Pray, my lords—

Just. Raymond. I will undertake you will say it is time lost.

L. C. J. I will stay some time to observe to the jury what I have taken notice of, with all my heart, but I should be gone.

Pris. I have done, my lord, I would not say any thing to disgust anybody.

L. C. J. Gentlemen of the jury, I will deliver my observations in this cause as I would in any cause, to the best of my understanding, and I will make those observations that are as natural as I know how to do; and proper for you to take notice of. It is in vain to dispute what my lord stands indicted of: it is for attempting to murder the king, and change our government and our religion. To prove this there have been two witnesses only that are material, and that is Mr. Oates in the first place; and Mr. Oates his evidence, the sum of it is to be reduced—

L. C. J. Mr. Attorney, do you stand up to speak any thing?

Att. Gen. If your lordship pleases, we will sum up the evidence for the king, not to offend your lordship.

L. C. J. If you would be short, Mr. Attorney, we would not hinder you of any thing.

Att. Gen. I will be very short. If it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, my lord Castlemaine is here charged with high-treason. The proof that we have against him is by two witnesses, that is, Dr. Oates and Mr. Dangerfield. Mr. Oates he doth swear this, namely, that after the consult (for I will bring it in short) that after the consult that was for killing the king and altering the government, my lord Castlemaine being acquainted with it at Mr. Fenwick's chamber, did hope it good success, and that he should come to be revenged. Mr. Dangerfield he hath proved, That being treated with to kill the king, and having refused to do it, my lord Castlemaine was very angry with him for it, and said, 'Why won't you do that for which you were taken out of prison?' Here are two witnesses express. What is said against Mr. Oates signifies nothing.

As to Mr. Dangerfield, there are some exceptions, which we must confess to be true; but he is a witness, and, my lord, such matters are to be expected to be proved by such witnesses: for if a man will discover robberies, he must go to such persons as do such things; and if treasons, it must be among them that have been employed in such things. Though he were a dishonest man before, yet he may be honest now: he was never guilty of any treason but as he was employed among them. There are some witnesses brought to encounter him, and one is my lady Powis, who, as he says, sent him with a letter to my lord Castlemaine; but she says she did never send a letter by him; and others say, he would never come at my lord Castlemaine after he was angry, which was in June. Now for that, gentlemen, you do hear Turner say, That in July or August, for he cannot tell which, he thinks it might be July, he saw Dangerfield at my lord Castlemaine's so that that encounters that evidence.

L. C. J. If Mr. Attorney had not interrupted me, I would not have left out any thing of this nature, for I would be certainly careful where the king's life lies at stake: I would be sure to preserve my sovereign above all things; and therefore no man ought to think that I should be partial in a cause wherein our religion, and the life of the king and the government is in danger. But I must say on the other side, that there should be good competent proofs of these things against those accused, because their lives and fortunes, and honours, and all are at stake. And so, gentlemen, we shall discharge our consciences to the best of our understandings, and deal uprightly on both hands.

For the case it stands thus: It is truly observed by Mr. Attorney, that there are but two material witnesses to the charge of this indictment, that is to say, Mr. Oates and Mr. Dangerfield. Mr. Oates his testimony is in two things; the one close, the other more remote. That more remote is, that he had a letter to send to my lord Castlemaine, which he gave to the provincial to send it, and as he says, he saw a letter subscribed Castlemaine; and that afterwards by seeing him write a superscription, he could recollect the character so well, that he believed that to be his hand which he saw in Spain among the jesuits or the fathers, as they call them there, to whom they communicated that letter; wherein he mentioned the general design, that is, the bringing in popery, which is the bringing in the Catholic religion, as they call it. That is more remote. He says, there were letters passed between them, wherein my lord approved of some things, and disapproved of others, which related to the design; by which, says Mr. Oates, we meant the whole matter and transaction of killing the king; and that doth appear by that letter he saw of my lord Castlemaine's, for that annexes to design the advancing the Catholic religion. The first time he saw him he did not know who he was; and there, at Wild-house, he says, that my lord Castlemaine should drop out some words which were suspicions, and one thing, as if he understood something of this matter that they had in agitation.

But more particularly he says, that when he came to Fenwick's chamber, there was the great matter. They talked before but of the design in general, at Wild-house; but afterwards meeting in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, where he was told who he was, they went to Fenwick's chamber, where they fell a discoursing about several things that related to the concern, and at last they fell upon the matter in hand, and said, they were glad to see the fathers so unanimous in this matter: I asked about what matter? He said, the killing of the king and bringing in popery; to which, he says, that my lord should make answer, he wished them good success in their design, and that then he should be revenged. This is the substance of what Mr. Oates says; against whose testimony, I must tell you, there hath been but little. There is but little thrown upon Mr. Oates by way of disgrace and infamy; for that verdict that the jury found against his evidence, it is not material, for then every man must be accused when the jury does not go according to the testimony he gives. It is not to be denied, but there is something said against him in another particular, and that is his coming over from St. Omers; where he says that Mr. Hillsley came over with him in the packet-boat, but Mr. Hillsley denies it; Mr. Oates would have saved it, by saying he left him at St. Omers. It is true, says Mr. Oates, but I overtook him afterwards; but he says to the point, that he came not with him. Now, it is not to be denied on the other hand, but Mr. Oates might be here, and my lord of Castlemaine seems to admit it, and it is probable enough Mr. Oates might be here. This is all I remember in reference to Mr. Oates. You must weigh well with yourselves how probable or not probable what he does swear is. But I must tell the jury they are to weigh the natures of people among themselves, as they carry probability or not, or else the confidence of a swearer shall take away any man's life whatsoever. And to that Mr. Oates says first, I understand not how he should be so free, Mr. Oates being a stranger to him, when he knew not my lord, and doth not know whether my lord knew him or no. But he says, my lord must needs see the Jesuits trusted him, and that might make him more confident: that afterwards going to Fenwick's house, he spoke broader in plain English. They were talking of a design to kill the king and bring in the Catholic religion; and Mr. Oates says, he wished them good success in the design, and that then he should be revenged. How far this oath is to be taken or not, I must leave to your consideration.

The next is Mr. Dangerfield; for nothing infamous is proved against Mr. Oates. Dangerfield is a man of whom there is enough. You see what crimes there are; for it is the duty of every judge; and I cannot see how he can discharge his conscience, and the duty he owes to the government, in respect of his oath and place, if he doth not make those just observations to the jury which are done in all cases: that is to say, when men have contracted great crimes upon themselves, though by law they may be witnesses; yet it hath always been observed, and their credit left them to consider of. You see how many crimes they have produced, a matter of six great enormous crimes; and by them you will see how far you ought to consider his testimony. Had Mr. Dangerfield been guilty only of being concerned in the treason, and come in as a witness, I should have thought him a very competent witness, for that is Mr. Oates's case; but they prove crimes of another sort and nature, and whether the man of a sudden be become a saint by being become a witness, I leave that to you to consider, and how far you are satisfied in the main.

The next thing is the opposition to his testimony. He hath sworn that he carried a letter from my lady Powis to my lord Castlemaine, and an answer returned back from my lord to her, and that my lady Powis did read it in the presence of Mrs. Cellier and him. Of this my lady Powis hath been asked (it is true, they are not upon their oaths, but that is not their fault, the law will not allow it), and my lady Powis hath affirmed to it, as much as lay upon her to do, that she never sent a letter by Mr. Dangerfield to my lord Castlemaine, nor any body else. And whereas he says Mrs. Cellier was present, she says she knows of no such letter, nor was any read in her company. And this is a contradicting his evidence, supposing him to be a man otherwise untouched. And whereas Dangerfield says, that in August he was with my lord, and he said, how chance you would not do that thing for which you were brought out of prison? 'What? Would you have me kill the king?' Yes, saith he, that is it. And my lord speaking very angrily and very roughly, made him think it time to withdraw out of his company, and never come into his company more; and that this was the time of his anger, and no other time, my lord rather complimenting him, as he would say, with friendly salutations. But they produce witnesses against this. Says Mrs. Cellier, this day twelvemonth; and says t'other, about a week after the Jesuits were executed, which was about the beginning of July, saith she, I would have you carry a letter to my lord Castlemaine; saith he, I would not do that, I would go an hundred miles upon another errand, but I would not go to him. Another witness says, my lord was mighty angry with him, and told him the cause, because he went in his name to the lords in the Tower. First, this contradicts what he said, as if there had been no anger before. The next is, that it is very improbable that my lord should be angry with him so much, that my lord should be very angry with him for going in his name to the Tower, and afterwards for his refusing to kill the king; when he said, ‘Why did you not do that you came out of prison for? What, my lord, to kill the king? Yes, that.’ This is an argument in opposition to his testimony.

The next is a consideration for his testimony. Turner says, in answer to that, in July he takes it, but cannot charge himself whether June, or July, or August, but he himself thinks July, that he saw him at the lord Castlemaine’s house. And the king’s counsel would gather from that, there could not be such an unwillingness to go before that time, it being after the time they speak of that this man saw him there. Whether or no it was in June, or July, or August, is something uncertain. So that I have repeated, as near as I can, all that is substantial on either part; and I have, according to the best of my understanding, dealt fairly on both sides, and observed to you what hath been sworn against my lord, and what hath been said in contradiction to what they swear, and what appears upon record, as to Dangerfield.

There is a great deal of difference between Mr. Oates’s testimony and Mr. Dangerfield’s; for you may believe one, when you may perchance not believe another. There are not those things cast upon Mr. Oates that are upon Mr. Dangerfield. Now I must tell you, though they have produced two, if you believe but one, I think (if so be my brethren’s opinions be otherwise, I would be very willingly contradicted in this matter) if two witnesses are produced, both speaking materially to the thing, the one is believed, and the other not. Whether upon these two witnesses the jury can find a person guilty, or no? I am of opinion, it is but one witness, if you do not believe one; and I am sure one is not sufficient to find one guilty: And therefore if so be you are of another opinion, let us deal fairly and above-board, that it may appear we deal rightly between the king and his subjects, and so preserve men that are accused, and not guilty.

Just. Jones. I think, in the first place, my lord hath very faithfully delivered the evidence; and I do think it necessary, in a case of Treason, that there must be two witnesses believed by the jury.

Just. Raymond. I never heard any man question it. If the law says there must be two witnesses produced, it says they must be both believed.

L. C. J. Now you have our sense of it.

The Jury went from the bar, and returned.

Cl. of Cr. Are you all agreed of your verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Cl. of Cr. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. The foreman.

Cl. of Cr. Roger Palmer, esq.; earl of Castlemaine in the kingdom of Ireland, hold up thy hand, look upon the jury.

Cl. of Cr. Is Roger Palmer esq. earl of Castlemaine in the kingdom of Ireland, guilty of the High-Treason whereof he stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Jury. Not Guilty.

Cl. of Cr. This is your verdict, you say he is Not Guilty, so you say all?

Jury. Yes.

267. The Trial of HENRY CARR, or CARE, at the Guildhall of London, for a Libel: 32 CHARLES II. A. D. 1680.

AN information was filed in the Crown-office against Henry Carr, which sets forth, That a certain plot of a traitorous conspiracy was lately had within this kingdom of England, amongst divers false traitors of this kingdom of England, to put to death and murder our lord king Charles 2. and the government of this kingdom of England, and the sincere religion of God within this kingdom of England well and piously established, to destroy and subvert, and the Romish religion within this kingdom of England to introduce; and that also divers traitors for high-treason aforesaid, were lawfully convicted and attainted, and other persons, for high-treason, aforesaid, were by due course of law tried and acquitted. Nevertheless, one Henry Carr, of the parish of Sepulchres, London, gent. knowing well the premises, but minding, and maliciously intending the government of the kingdom of England, and the administration of justice in the same kingdom to scandalize, and to bring the same in contempt:

The 1st day of August, in the 31st year of our now lord the king, at the parish of Sepulchres, London, a certain false, scandalous and malicious book, intituled, “The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, or the History of Popery,” maliciously and unlawfully hath printed, and caused to be published: In which book is contained among other things, as followeth: There is lately found out by an experienced physician, an incomparable medicine, called “The Wonder-working Plaster,” truly Catholic in operation, somewhat of kin to the Jesuits Powder, but more effectual. The virtues of it are strange and various. It will make justice deaf as well as blind, takes out spots out of deepest treasons, more cleverly than Castile-soap does common stains. It alters a man’s constitution in two or three days, more than the virtuous transfusion of blood in seven years. Is a great alexipharmic, and helps poisons, and those that use them. It miraculously exalts and purifies the eye-sight, and makes people behold nothing but innocence in the blackest malefactors. It is a mighty cordial for a declining

' cause, stifles a plot as certainly as the itch is destroyed by butter and brimstone. In a word, it makes fools wise men, and wise men fools, and both of them knaves. The colour of this precious balm is bright and dazzling, and being applied privately to the fist in decent manner, and a competent dose, infallibly performs all the said cures, and many others not fit here to be mentioned.*

To the great contempt of our lord the king and his laws, to the great scandal of the government of our now lord the king, and the laws of this kingdom of England, and the administra-

* "The Weekly Pacquet of Advice from Rome, &c." was first published on Tuesday December the 3rd 1678, and the three next numbers appeared respectively on the 10th, 17th and 24th of that month. Then the day of publication was changed from Tuesday to Friday for the convenience of dispatching the paper into the country by the post accordingly; the 5th number was published on Friday, January the 3rd, 1679. The work was continued until Friday, May 28, 1680; when I conjecture it ceased in consequence of the prosecution out of which arose the trial before us. In the year 1679, the first 31 numbers were published in a volume with this title, "The Weekly Pacquet of Advice from Rome, or the History of Popery: A deduction of the usurpations of the Bishops of Rome, and the errors and superstitions by them from time to time brought into the church. In the process of which the Papists arguments are answered, their fallacies detected, their cruelties registered, their treasons and seditious principles observed, and the whole body of Papistry anatomised, performed by a single sheet, coming out every Friday, but with a continual connexion." To each being added, "The Popish Courant, or some occasional Joco-serious Reflections on Romish Popperies." In the next year, the 47 succeeding numbers were collected into the "Second volume of the Weekly Pacquets of Advice from Rome, or History of Popery, displaying the horrid lives of the several bishops of Rome down to the year of our lord one thousand, and the usurpations, errors, and superstitions from time to time introduced or advanced in the church. Wherein also divers of our most important controversies with the Papists are fairly stated and argued, their arguments solved, their objections answered, and the truth asserted, together with the Popish Courants, or, &c." Both volumes as well as the single numbers were published by Langley Curtis, on Ludgate Hill. [See the Case of Jane Curtis, in this Collection.]

The passage which is set forth in the information is part of the "Popish Courant," No. 4, of the 2d volume. In the argumentative part of the work there is much historical and controversial learning. In the other part the attempts at wit are but rarely successful; the jocularities are generally coarse and sometimes brutal. The whole is written with great acrimony.

tion of justice in the same kingdom; to the evil example of all others in such a case offending, and against the peace of our lord the king, his crown and dignity.

To which Information appeared in the Court of King's-Bench, Henry Carr, by his attorney, Benedict Brown, the 11th of February, and having heard the Information aforesaid, said that he was Not Guilty.

Issue being joined, it was tried by writ of Nisi Prius, at the Guild-hall, before the lord chief Justice Scroggs, upon the 2nd of July, 1680, where a jury was summoned, whose names are as followeth: Benj. Thorogood, Richard Blackbourne, Godfrey Richards, Leonard Bates, Phillip Harman, Francis Breerwood, Thomas Kemble, William Longman, John Debman, Lewis Wilson, Henry Loshoe, Thomas Salter, Jeremiah Gregory, Nich. Bondy, George Day, Nich. Dawes, Richard Blaney, Henry Avarie, Joseph Hall, William Bridges, Thomas Lee, Richard White, Randal Dod, Richard Bowater. Of all which only four appeared and were sworn, viz. Nicholas Bondy, Leonard Bates, Henry Avarie, Randal Dod. Whereupon a tales was prayed and granted, and then were sworn and added to the principal pannel, according to the form of the statute. Nicholas Caplin, Richard Cawtham, Arthur Young, William Yap, James Wood, Thomas Gilby, John Odensel, Emanuel Conyers.

After which the tour proceeded, and the Recorder began to open the offence, as follows.

Mr. Recorder. (Sir George Jefferies.) This person among others intending to scandalize the government, hath caused a book to be published, which I have here in my hand, called the Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome; there are some papers besides what are bound up together that are continued on, which, my lord, would not be amiss for us that are of the king's counsel to take notice of, not only for the jury's satisfaction, but likewise for the satisfaction of this great auditory, some whereof I know come to pick advantage, and to know whether or no rascals may have liberty to print what they please. Now all the judges of England having been met together, to know whether any person whatsoever may expose to the public knowledge any manner of intelligence, or any matter whatsoever that concerns the public, they gave it in as their resolution, that no person whatsoever could expose to the public knowledge any thing that concerned the affairs of the public, without licence from the king, or from such persons as he thought fit to entrust with that affair. But such is the age that we live in, that a man that hath wit enough to libel any man in the government, thinks he hath licence enough to expose that man to public knowledge also. And they do it under specious pretences, because they think that any man may be exposed to the public censure that they can either call a papist, or but popishly affected, and that man is either the one or the other, that is not agreeable to every rascally humour that some people affect. I acknowledge, my lord, that any man that will in a legal manner endeavour to suppress popery, ought to be encouraged in his endeavour, to the utmost; but if in case any man will be transported with zeal because he is of a party, and under pretence of endeavouring to suppress popery, should support a party, that man ought to be detected. The author of this Packet of Advice from Rome, or the publisher of it, Mr. Carr, that is now the defendant, he thinks he can scratch the itch of the age, and that he may libel any man concerned in the government, if he can but call him a papist, or popishly affected; let a man be never so honest let a man be never so much for the support of that religion that every honest man ought to support that is, the Protestant Religion, as it is established by law, without going to Rome or Amsterdam for assistance. I will not mention the persons that are concerned in it, but I will apply myself wholly to this matter, that it is the opinion of all the judges of England that it is the law of the land, that no person should offer to expose to public knowledge any thing that concerns the government, without the king's immediate licence. Now we are to try whether this person exposed this thing to public knowledge, and that is the matter, gentlemen, that you are to try. The other is the business of the court; we are to say whether if we prove the fact, this man is guilty of punishment, and no doubt the justice of the nation will punish him. But when I see so many swarm about me, I am willing to hear what proof there is.

Sir Fr. Winnington. I am of counsel for the defendant, I only offer it to your lordship, that the information may be proved.

L. C. J. Here are two things we are to keep to, the matter of proof according to the information, and accordingly are we to proceed as in common justice we find the case to be. I must say that for the prisoner, he has behaved himself with as much modesty as in duty and honesty he ought; but I find that Sir Fr. Winnington puts you upon proving.

Sir F. Withins. My Lord, we will prove it.

L. C. J. (Sir William Scroggs.) Let them that are not of the jury go forth, the jury is no more to be corrupted than the judge, Sir Francis Withins. We must be allowed the first part, that there was a plot.

L. C. J. The jury may take that upon their oaths, they know there was a plot the certainest of any thing of fact that ever came before me.

Mr. Stevens, Printer.

L. C. J. Did Mr. Carr own he writ this packet, had you any from him?

Printer. I had several from him.

L. C. J. Of whom else had you any?

Recorder. Besides Carr?

L. C. J. You are upon your oath; from whom ever had you any besides?

Printer. I do not remember that I had any from any body else.

L. C. J. You printed them, did you?

Printer. Yes, my lord, I did.

L. C. J. And you know of none from any else, but by him or his orders?

Printer. No, My lord.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Shew him the paper. Can you swear upon your oath, that Mr. Carr did send or deliver to you that very paper?

Printer. I cannot tell that any body else did send it.

L. C. J. We must do here, as we do in all cases: he saith, I had divers of these papers from him, I printed them, and I know of none that ever was but by him or his order.

Sir Fr. Winnington. He saith so, but, my lord, the information is to such a particular book entitled, "A Pacquet of Advice from Rome."

L. C. J. He says this in answer to it, I can't charge myself with this particular to say positively I had it from him: but this I can say, we had several from him, and I know of none else, but all were by him or his order.

Sir F. Winnington. Will your lordship give me leave to ask him one question? Can you swear that any that came from him contained the very matter in that book? Was it the matter or words?

Recorder. Do you believe it?

Sir F. Winnington. Good Mr. Recorder, let me alone. Can you say it is the very matter contained in that paper?

Printer. I can't say that.

L. C. J. It is not an easy matter for a man to remember the matter of a paper that is writ on all sides. He swears that they had several; and that they had none, though he printed them, from any but him or his order. This question sir Francis Winnington asks, Had you this particular paper from him? He cannot swear it was the same he had from him; but he does swear, all the Weekly Intelligences were from him or his order; he does not swear for the matter of this book, which no man will do: but he does swear that these papers were always by him or his orders, and that several were received from him.

Mr. Williams. I ask you upon your oath, he brought it to you in writing, did he not?

Printer. They came in writing.

Mr. Williams. Have you any of these papers to shew?

Printer. We did not regard them when they were printed.

L. C. J. His cause shall be tried very justly and very indifferently.

Mr. Williams. Had you ever a paper from Carr's hand or no?

Printer. We had few from his own hand.

Mr. Williams. Had you any?

Printer. I can't remember.

L. C. J. Had you any? You are upon your oath.—Printer. My Lord, I can't remember.

L. C. J. Had you one, or two?

Printer. Indeed my lord, I cannot remember, I cannot say upon my oath he ever brought one.

L. C. J. How then came you to say you had several from him?

Printer. Ay, my lord, from him, that is, by him, or his order.

L. C. J. Are you sure it was by his order?

Printer. I did conceive so, my lord.

L. C. J. Had he any money?

Printer. From me?

L. C. J. Had he any money from any body for printing any of these papers, as you can remember?

Printer. I do suppose so, I have heard he had.

L. C. J. Did you give him any?

Printer. No, my lord, I was not concerned. The publisher my lord was between him and me.

L. C. J. Who is that?

Printer. That is one Curtis.

L. C. J. Did Curtis pay him any money?

Printer. I never saw him pay him any, my lord.

L. C. J. Hath he owned at any time he had any money?

Printer. My lord, I never had any occasion for that question.

L. C. J. Have you talked with Carr?

Printer. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Now I shall have you: For I do believe you are an honest man. Did Carr ever own himself to you to be the author of this book, or any of these papers?

Printer. My lord, as I said in the other case, so I say in this, I had no occasion to dispute it, I took it for granted.

L. C. J. Have you ever heard him own it?

Printer. I have heard him deny it.

L. C. J. How did you come to take it for granted that he was the author, when he did once deny, but never owned it? Answer me that question, and thou shalt be a brave man.

Printer. My lord, there was never occasion for that discourse.

L. C. J. Look you sir, you must answer me in a way agreeable to common reason and understanding. Why did you say just now, you took it for granted that he was the author, and yet you say he hath denied it and never owned it? Why should you then believe he was the author?

Printer. I don't say, my lord, he never owned it.

L. C. J. What tricks we have in this world!

Recorder. I would ask the gentleman, I will not quarrel with him at all, if he thinks not in his own conscience he has reason to quarrel with himself. Did he ever own it to you?

Printer. I don't remember he ever owned it to me in so many words.

L. C. J. Did he treat with you in these circumstances as if he were the author?

Printer. Yes, my lord, I grant that.

Recorder. But do you swear it is so? We don't care for your granting: I ask you upon your oath, did you ever discourse him as the author of these papers?

Printer. I supposed him to be the author.

L. C. J. Did he deny it, or baulk when you discoursed him of this matter?

Printer. My lord, I must needs say as I said before, it was taken for granted.

Mr. Williams. You had it in writing, where are those writings?

Printer. We seldom regard those writings.

L. C. J. It is hard to find the author, it is not hard to find the printer: But one author found is better than twenty printers found.

Mr. Williams. My lord, I will ask this man a question. Upon your oath, who brought you that writing?

Printer. What writing?

Mr. Williams. That by which it was printed: who brought you that paper?

Printer. I don't remember particularly I had any of Mr. Carr himself.

Mr. Williams. Can you name the person that brought this paper, or any one person that brought any one paper?

Printer. There was a little boy.

Mr. Williams. Whose boy?

Printer. Mr. Carr's boy.

Recorder. Now it is out.

Mr. Williams. Name the boy.

Printer. I do not know his name.

Mr. Williams. Can you name another, can you name any body else?

Printer. Truly, sir, I don't remember any body else.

Mr. Williams. Now I will ask you one thing: Had you any directions for the printing this paper?

L. C. J. To what purpose was this written paper brought to you?

Printer. To be printed, my lord.

Mr. Williams. Who gave directions?

Printer. It was the publisher that chiefly directed me.

Mr. Williams. Who was that?

Printer. I have named him.

Mr. Williams. Name him again.

Printer. Curtis.

Mr. Williams. Did Carr never direct you to print this paper?

Printer. He did not deal immediately with me.

Recorder. When the little boy came, who did you take him to come from? From Mr. Carr, or Mr. Curtis?

Printer. From Mr. Carr.

L. C. J. He says he was Carr's boy, and that he came from him: this I speak to the jury; and I promise you this, if my life and fortune were at stake, I would be tried by this jury at the bar, and would do in this, as in all cases. Mr. Carr is looked upon as the author of this book; that it either came from him, or by his order, his boy (he can remember no body else) did bring it. This is now remaining only: are you sure Mr. Carr sent him? Saith he, we talked with Mr. Carr several times.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Thus it is, my lord, in the information, 'Maliciosè et illicitè imprimi causavit et publicavit.' Now I would only ask him a question, my lord, whether or no did

Mr. Carr own to you that he sent the boy to have it printed?—Printer. No, Sir, I think not.

L. C. J. That is the same question asked before. Did Mr. Carr ever own it as his, or no? Upon your oath, did Carr own this packet to be his, when you discoursed with him about it?

Printer. My lord, I humbly crave your leave to explain myself. I mean by the discourse I had, common conversation, as the drinking a glass of wine; but I know not that ever we discoursed upon this thing.

L. C. J. I mean so? When you talked about this matter, did you take it, by his discourse, for granted, that he was the man that published it?

Printer. I took it for granted, because I had it from him.

L. C. J. What say you to this? have you blamed Carr for writing too sharply in this book against the government?

Printer. My lord, I do confess I have.

L. C. J. What answer hath he made, when you blamed him for writing too sharply, as you thought? Did he deny that he did it?

Printer. I don't remember that.

L. C. J. What sort of answer did he make to excuse it? that he thought it not too sharp; or did he say, I care not.

Printer. My lord, I can't particularly say what answer he made.

L. C. J. When you blamed him, by the oath you have taken, upon that blame of yours, did he deny he wrote it?

Printer. No, my lord, I do not remember he did.

Mr. Williams. Did Carr at any time deny he was the author or publisher of it?

Printer. He hath at some times.

Mr. Williams. What did he deny?

Printer. That he was the author.

Mr. Williams. Of what book?

Printer. Of the Packet?

L. C. J. Did he deny he was the author of this particular book for this week, or deny it in general? Did he deny in general that he was the author of that book that is called, "The Packet of Advice?"

Printer. I have heard him say sometimes that he was not the author.

Recorder. And sometimes what?

Printer. I have heard him say some time or other, that he was not the author.

Recorder. And what else?

The Printer's Servant.

Mr. Williams. Are you acquainted with Carr?

Man. I never had any converse with him.

Mr. Williams. Do you know any thing of the Packet of Advice?

Man. I know we have had Packets from him; I fetched some from him.

Mr. Williams. What, from his hands?

Man. Yes.

Mr. Williams. What, from his own hands?

Man. Yes, in pieces, no whole sheets.

Printer. This is my servant, I am not always there.

Sir Fr. Winnington. My lord, I would ask this man a question. This printed paper that is put in the information, did he ever deliver that to you?

Man. I can't speak particularly to any one.

Recorder. But generally to all?

L. C. J. Have you done?

Mr. Williams. I ask you a question.

L. C. J. If you could, Mr. Williams, show me any author besides Mr. Carr, I would say something.

Mr. Williams. Who brought you this paper?

Man. Which paper?

Mr. Williams. I don't speak of this paper particularly. Did any bring any besides Carr?

Man. Yes, his boy.

Mr. Williams. Did any body else bring any from any place?

Man. Nobody else that I know of.

Mr. Williams. The packet he brought you, had it been printed before? I ask you upon your oath, was it printed before he brought it?

L. C. J. Did he bring papers to print that were never printed?

Man. They were never printed that I know of.

Mr. Williams. Did he bring any to print?

Man. I can't say he brought any.

Mr. Williams. Did Mr. Carr bring any?

Man. No, the boy.

Mr. Williams. Who directed you to print them? Did Carr direct you?

Man. I can't tell, I am a servant in the house.

L. C. J. I will assure you, a 'Non est Factum' can't pass at this rate.

Justice Jones. Who did you take to be the man that sent you all the packets?

Man. I very seldom took any, because I was not always in sight.

L. C. J. Who did you understand?

Man. I understood they came from Mr. Carr.

L. C. J. Have you any more? Read the words in the Information.

Clerk. Friday the 1st of August, 1679. "There is lately found out by an experienced physician, an incomparable medicament, called, The Wonder-Working Plaister; truly Catholic in operation; somewhat of kin to the Jesuits Powder, but more effectual. The virtues of it are strange and various. It makes justice deaf, as well as blind, and takes out spots of the deepest Treason more cleverly than Castile-Soap does common stains. It alters a man's constitution in two or three days, more than the Virtuosis Transfusion of Blood in seven years. It is a great alexiphermic, and helps poisons and those that use them. It miraculously exalts and purifies the eye-sight, and makes people behold nothing but innocency in the blackest malefactors. It is a mighty cordial for a declining cause; it stifles a plot as certainly as the itch is destroyed by butter and brimstone. In a word, it makes fools wise men, and wise men fools, and both of them knaves. The colour of this precious balm is bright and dazling, and being applied privately to the fist, in decent manner, and a competent dose, infallibly performs all the said cures, and many others not fit here to be mentioned. Probatum est."

Sir Fr. Winnington. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am counsel in this cause for the defendant: And the question is, whether or no we must take the Information as it lies? And truly, for the first part of it, whether there was a plot or no, I do not intend to make exceptions; for I believe there was one, and I do intend to take it as in the information. Gentlemen, we are to proceed now to this other question: which is, my lord, whether or no this defendant, that is, Carr, did 'falsly and maliciously,' and with 'design to scandalize the government,' cause to be printed and published this false libel that is in the information. Now truly, my lord, we that are for the defendant, say we are not guilty. My lord, we very well know how penal a thing it is for a man to be the author of a libel that relates to the scandal of the government. And, my lord, whether this defendant be guilty of this, or no, we must submit that to your lordship's and the jury's consideration. They have produced two witnesses, that is to say, the printer and his man. Now, my lord, there hath been going out for some time, A Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome; and I did ask the witnesses (for the information points at one paragraph, and puts the paragraph in hec verba)—I did ask him whether or no he did send, or whether the matter that be sent is that contained in this information. That he could not swear: but must be left in point of evidence, it being, we allow, a very penal matter. The second witness and the first witness likewise say, there was a boy: but whether that boy came by his master's direction, he does not know. I asked him if ever his master sent the boy; he does not know, he says, that he sent him. But the last witness says, divers were had from the hands of Carr; but whether it was the thing that is now complained of, there is the question, and that is in the dark: For, by your lordship's leave, I do not understand that ever this man was complained of to any public magistrate for writing this book; for it was thought he was a satirist against Popery, and thought to be very well liked on till this fault was found with it; and it may be very justly; whether or no we be guilty of this, is uncertain: For we know in the age we live in, there are too many shams put upon men; and who knows but that the Papists that might have an ill-will to this Mr. Carr, that hath been no friend to them, might shuffle in this paragraph, by that means to have justice come upon him? I would not contrive against common evidence, where a man is guilty to the public; but we know there are abundance of artifices in this age to abuse men. For this purpose I hope your lordship and the jury will expect that you should have positive evidence against him. Now granting your lordship should have conjectural evidence that he did cause it to be printed and published, that this man did write it, is, I say, very uncertain, for there is no positive evidence. What a man may have in his private thoughts of it, is not enough: But, whether 'secundum allegata et probata,' it shall be alledged and proved, that this man was the author of it. Now, my lord, I say, I must submit it to your lordship, I say, that as to the causing it to be printed, or the causing it to be published, or that this individual paragraph was writ by him in order to its being printed or published; my lord, I say, there is but remote and conjectural evidence, and an angry Papist might contrive this way to have an innocent Protestant found guilty.

VOL. VII.

People. Hem——

L. C. J. You see what a case we are in, gentlemen; you see what a sort of people we are got among. Go on sir Francis.

Sir Fr. Winnington. With your lordship's leave I have one thing to put to your lordship. The information says, 'falsè, illicitè et maliciosè.' I know there are some things that do unply malice in themselves. Truly, my lord, I am upon a tender point, and know not how to express myself. Laay, supposing it should fall out that this man writ this book, and he might have some little extravagancies in his head in writing, whether this man did it maliciously to scandalize the government, as the information says, is a question. Truly, my lord, there is many an indiscreet act a man may be guilty of, that cannot be called a malicious act; and that is the second thing. There must be evidence that this man did it maliciously, or that he did it with a design to scandalize the government. If you be of opinion that it is otherwise, that is in your lordship's breast; we are of the negative, and we say we can't prove a negative. But if you find him innocent I suppose there will be no cause to complain of him afterwards, for he had no malice in his heart.

Mr. Williams. My lord, it can never be supposed that a good man, and a good subject, should do an ill action. If he be a very good subject, if he be upon a square in every respect, a person that loves his king, and loves the government in church and in state; if he be such a person, he cannot be thought guilty. My lord we will prove him to be such a man, and I hope the gentlemen will believe us.

Call Mr. Sutton, Mr. Ayliffe, and Mr. Ambler.

Mr. Williams. Mr. Sutton, do you know Mr. Carr?

Sutton. I know him very well.

Mr. Williams. How long since have you known him?

Sutton. Two or three years.

Mr. Williams. Does he go to church or meeting?

Sutton. He hath been with me at church often.

4 C

Mr. Recorder. Does he receive the sacrament according to the manner of the church of England?

Sutton. I was never with him at the sacrament.

Mr. Williams. Is he one of them you call dissenters.

L. C. J. Did he ever discourse with you concerning this book?

Sutton. My lord, I have often spoken to him.

L. C. J. Has he disowned he was the author.

Sutton. He has sometimes.

L. C. J. How do you believe it was upon that discourse?

Sutton. I do not think he is able to write such a book.

L. C. J. That is not the question, answer me what I ask.

Sutton. It did seem something like his writing, methought.

L. C. J. Did it seem by his answer to your discourse with him?

Recorder. Pray tell us, did you look upon him to be the author?

L. C. J. By the discourse you had with him, how did it appear upon that discourse? Pray tell us plainly and clearly, how you do think, by the discourse you had with him concerning this pamphlet, whether he was the author or no?

Sutton. My lord, about a year, or a year and half since, I did ask him whether this book were licensed? He told me it was licensed by Mr. L'Estrange; but he did not tell me he was the author.

L. C. J. How did it seem by his discourse.

Sutton. I did apprehend he might write it.

Sir Fr. Winnington. My lord, but the question is, whether he wrote this paragraph.

Mr. Ambler.

Mr. Williams. Mr. Ambler, pray do you acquaint my lord, do you know Mr. Carr?

Ambler. Yes, sir.

L. C. J. How long have you known him?

Ambler. Three years.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Of what conversation is he, and how affected to the government?

Ambler. He went to church with me.

Sir Fr. Winnington. Do you look upon him as a man well affected to the government? Do you think he would maliciously write any thing to scandalize the government?

Just. Jones. How do we know how Mr. Ambler understands the government?

Recorder. Mr. Ambler, had you any discourse with him about the Packet of Advice?

Ambler. Never in my life.

Recorder. Did you ever hear of the book?

Ambler. Yes, sir.

Recorder. Upon your oath, did you look upon him to be the author?

Ambler. The common report was, that Mr. Carr was.

Mr. Ayliffe.

Mr. Williams. Mr. Ayliffe, do you know Mr. Carr?

Ayliffe. Yes, sir.

Mr. Williams. Is he a conformable man to the government in church and state? Does he go to hear common-prayer?

Ayliffe. I have seen him at church and divine service.

Recorder. Did he behave himself reverently there?

Ayliffe. Yes, Sir.

L. C. J. Do you think he writ this?

Ayliffe. My lord, I never asked him.

Sir Fr. Winnington. My lord, it seems he was accounted the author of the books; but whether of this particular one in the information, we conceive not proved.

Recorder. If we should not do right, we disclaim that service we owe to the crown, and that respect we owe to the government as honest men and as true protestants, and as much against papists as any man whatsoever. I shall endeavour to give the world satisfaction that this man is guilty of this offence. My lord, for any man to come and pretend that we must prove that a man is malicious; or because that a man writes against the papists, he must never therefore be convicted of malice, surely is a strange argument. And I wonder to hear any man that pretends to reason, men of sense, and conscience, and understanding, so out of their common sense and understanding, as to make that go as an argument. Gentlemen, the things themselves bespeak their malice. For so we in our common discourse, when we bring our common actions (of which you have heard a number), if in case any man call a man thief: we say he does falsely, maliciously, and scandalously call a man thief: If we prove he called him thief, the very thing does intimate he does it falsely, scandalously, and maliciously; therefore the thing itself is a sufficient indication of the malice and depravity of it. There is no man but may know in plain English what is the meaning of these words; it is as plain as can be in the world: We must debauch our understandings, and be as great Doltheads as they would make all men that will not be of their party, if we don't plainly see into the meaning of these words, that 'justice is to be bribed with money.' In the next place, gentlemen, we do not come and say, that the information lies against these very particular words; that is a mistake of the information. But the information is, That he did cause to be printed and published a book, in which among others there were such words as these; though if they had been the very words themselves, the very words have been proved. Now, There is no better proof under the heavens, than the proof we have offered. The printer himself, he comes here and says, That Carr did acknowledge himself the author, and he did generally publish the book; I appeal if you do not believe it. This they would now come and excuse; for they are glad to make a rascal of any of their party, if they can but save a man that is guilty. But things come out with much difficulty and much straitness; and I must say, if ever any thing were an instance of popery, then that man is one of the Jesuitedest fellows that ever was; for he does cant so like them, that a man can't tell how to govern himself. Who was it that should write these things? Truly, he had discoursed with him about the matter. Who sent the boy? Do you know? Truly I can't tell: And a wonderful great snuffing and canting before he comes to the business. Besides, what can there be more plain than the proof-pieces before the publishing? The other man says, that he was the man that fetched pieces from Carr's own hand, and that he always looked upon it that all did come from Carr.

Now every man that knows any thing of printing, knows this, that after it hath first taken the press, it is always carried back again to the author, to see whether it be done according to his mind; and after that it comes to the public view. And that this man, Carr, is the author, Mr. Sutton and the rest of his witnesses, if they speak according to conscience, they themselves looked upon this very man to be the author. Their own witnesses looked upon it so: It was not only the private-opinion of these men, but the general report of all. So that, my lord, had it not been necessary to the support of the government, I should have scarce troubled myself to give your lordship and the jury this trouble. But I must say, and I do believe, that there is no man whatsoever, that stands to have vices of this nature convicted and punished, but desires the protestant religion may be supported to the utmost, and that popery may be suppressed. But I say, whoever it is, that after this evidence, who is bound by his oath to go according to evidence, shall acquit this man, he must be a man of a humming conscience indeed.

Sir Fr. Withins. I shall hint one thing to your lordship in this case: That it is an unlikely thing that a papist should set out this Pacquet at this time. For then, my lord, how came it to pass that Mr. Carr had none came out that week; for his is a Weekly Intelligence? If Mr. Carr's had come out, and this likewise, there had been some pretence for this: But since there came out but one, that the papists set out this is unlikely. They have not pretended to bring in anybody else as the author; but their own witnesses say, and they themselves say, he was looked upon as the author. Those things that are done against the government, are never done in the face of the government.

L. C. J. Really, gentlemen, I thought not that this had been a cause of that moment that now I find it. For their very disturbance hath altered it from Mr. Carr's to a public concern. The noise which they make, this way that these people use, that with their shouts and noise attend the cause, hath quite spoiled it: As in the case of Harris.* But those people that did then attend him, leave following him in a gaol for 500*l.*, which may be 5*s.* a piece had discharged him of, if they had been as free of their purses as they are of their noises and acclamations: So that in truth they are only violent against the government whilst they can make shouts and noises, but if it comes once to deliver a man from a penal sum, they will let him rot in gaol. For so Harris sent to me, that his party had all forsaken him, and no man would give him any thing. And this is for those hummers, those brave fellows that seem to espouse a cause, and yet leave their party in distress. But let them go away with this, that they prove themselves hereby enemies to the government, and false to that interest and men that they seem to espouse; that come only here to affront a court of justice with their shouts and noises, and will not relieve their party: For this is the complaint of Harris, and the disparagement of all men that come to espouse it. This cause, the truth of it is, I did not look upon to be of this nature and moment, when it was opened. For though there are in this very paper upon which the information is grounded, words malicious and reflective enough; yet they were not so apparently appropriated, that a man might observe an extraordinary design in them. This I thought; but really the case is altered even by those men. For I will tell you, Harris is poor, and his keeping in prison is principally occasioned from the manner of the reception of his punishment, which he calls his pardon. And therefore these fellows, these hummers, let them all know, whenever they come to espouse a cause of public concern against the government, they spoil it; and when they are taken, then they ruin one another. And this is like to be so, for none will help them with a groat. And this is the misfortune of that unfortunate man Harris, that he hath no place of mercy left him from the king, because he was attended with such a rabble as these people are, that have made a noise here, and yet will give him no help or assistance when he wants it: And let them know, it hath turned this man's cause into a public cause, because here are people that do espouse it, and the government is hereby concerned much more than by any one action that this Carr could have done. I have said so much more of this, that I might shew you to what a sad case this is brought from what at first it was. For if it had passed without such a noise, as you see how they express themselves, I should not have thought much matter in it; and though you had convicted him, I should have thought a better sentence might have served the turn: but they have undone Carr, if you find him guilty; and so it is likely to prove, whenever there is popular attendance upon public causes that concern the government.

The present case it stands thus: Mr. Carr, here is an information brought against him for publishing a printed pamphlet called, The Pacquet of Advice from Rome, and in it there are recited some particulars, which were observed to you before, which was not well done;

* See ante, p. 939.

but yet not so insolently done as some perhaps do conceit. The question is, Whether he was the author or publisher of this: you hear he is thought the author, but say his counsel, it is not plain; and that is true. But it seems by their own witnesses, to any man's understanding, that they looked upon him as the author. But then, is he the author and publisher of this particular book? I had rather Mr. Carr, with all his faults about him, and his humours, should go away with applause, and have him found not guilty, than do him wrong in one circumstance; for I come to try causes according to the truth of fact; I come not to plead on one side nor another; not to condemn men that are innocent, nor to acquit them if they be guilty. Now it remains for you to consider what proofs you have, as to this particular book against which the information lies; and that is the printer himself, who is one of the best sorts of evidence that can be had: for you very well know that evidences of fact are to be expected according to the nature of the thing. That is, forgery is not to be proved so plainly, as to expect witnesses as you do at the sealing of a bond; for men do not call witnesses when they forge a thing. Therefore in things of that nature we are fain to retreat to such probable and conjectural evidence as the matter will bear. I believe some of you have been of juries at the Old Bailey, and that even for men's lives, you have very often not a direct proof of the fact, of the act, or of the actual killing; but yet you have such evidence by presumption, as seems reasonable to conscience. If there be a known case in men's lives, certainly that should govern in offences, and especially when offences are of a nature that reflect upon the Government. As for those words, illicitè, maliciousè, unlawful; for that I must recite what Mr. Recorder told you of at first, what all the judges of England have declared under their hands. The words I remember are these: When, by the king's command, we were to give in our opinion what was to be done in point of the regulation of the press; we did all subscribe, that to print or publish any newspapers or pamphlets of news whatsoever, is illegal; that it is a manifest intent to the breach of the peace, and they may be proceeded against by law for an illegal thing. Suppose now that this thing is not scandalous, what then? If there had been no reflection in this book at all, yet it is illicitè, and the author ought to be convicted for it. And that is for a public notice to all people, and especially printers and booksellers, that they ought to print no book or pamphlet of news whatsoever, without authority. So as he is to be convicted for it as a thing illicitè done, not having authority. And I will assure you, if you find any of those papers, I shall be more merciful in the consideration of their punishment, if it be inoffensive. But if so be they will undertake to print news foolishly, they ought to be punished, and shall be punished if they do it without authority, though there is nothing reflecting on the government as an unlawful thing. The reason is plain: so fond are men in these days, that when they will deny their children a penny for bread, they will lay it out for a pamphlet. And it did so swarm, and the temptations were so great, that no man could keep two-pence in his pocket because of the news. But still they never repented of laying out their money, till they found there was nothing against the government. This is not worth a farthing, there is nothing of treason in it, we will not give a farthing for it. Therefore this book, if it be made by him to be published, it is unlawful, whether it be malicious or not. Now for the matter, the subject matter. What, doth Carr think he hath too much wit to fool us that are to try the malice? It was silly writ, if he did not believe we understood it, and that were very intolerable in us; I hope I speak plain: That is, the sort of books that he writ; it must be with an intent people should know what reflections he made; and shall all mankind know, and shall they that try the cause not know it? If you find him guilty, and say what he is guilty of, we will judge whether the thing imports malice or no. Sir Francis Winnington hath told you there are some things that do necessarily imply malice in them. If this thing doth not imply it, then the judges will go according to sentence; if it doth, so that it concerns not you one farthing, whether malicious or not malicious, that is plain. Now, there remains only one thing, that is, Whether or no he was the publisher of this book? For that we have this evidence. The printer tells you, he was the person that they looked upon to be the author of this book, that he sent this book to be printed by his boy. The printer saith, that he often discoursed with him, and he took it for granted. His boy brought it. To what purpose? To be printed. The printer's servant says, they looked upon him as the author; and I have fetched sheet by sheet, several sheets from his own hand. I will do right in the case, be it what it will, let him escape or not. Say his counsel, Had you this particular paper from him? I urge this as clearly, as their own counsel have objected. For that you must consider, whether he is the author of the book. You must take evidence in this case, as you do all the year long; that is, in other cases, where you know there is an absolute certainty that the thing is so: for human frailty must be allowed; that is, you may be mistaken. For you do not swear, nor are you bound to swear here, that he was the publisher of this book; but if you find him guilty, you only swear you believe it so. God help juries, if so be in matter of fact they should promise otherwise. They cannot swear it. Now the question is, Whether you have evidence enough here to swear he was the publisher: for this is the main thing, to prove that he is so. Now the printer tells you that he knew the man; that he had frequent converse with him about it, and that he took it for granted. Now consider, when a man talks at this rate, he does not say he was, but that he took it for granted; he does not as much as say he is. They will own he writ several sheets of this book; then, why not all this book? Now we come to the more principal matter of fact, according to reason and the probable evidence of things. That this person is taken to be the author, and that it was his boy that brought these papers to be printed. If you cannot say he sent him, you can give no verdict while you live, if you expect that. The printer says, he had been often discoursing with him; that his boy brought them, and that he knew no other person in the world that had any pretensions to be the author, and if he were the author, no doubt but he is the publisher. Whether or no any body else had an hand in this, we do not know. If you are satisfied in your consciences that you believe he is not the author, you must acquit him. If you are satisfied it is not he, you must find him Not Guilty. So that as you are honest men and wise, as I believe you are; if you believe he was not the publisher of this pamphlet, that he did not send his boy to have it printed, but that he came of his own head, you must find him Not Guilty.

The Jury went from the bar, and nigh an hour after returned, and brought him in Guilty.

L. C. J. You have done like honest men.

Mr. Recorder. They have done like honest men.

268. The Trial of JOHN GILES, at the Old Bailey, for assaulting and attempting to murder John Arnold,* esq.: 32 CHARLES II. A. D. 1680.†

THE sessions began on Wednesday the 7th day of July 1680. The ninth day Mr. John Giles was brought to the bar to be tried; and there pretended that he had witnesses at Monmouth, who could testify very material things for him, and therefore prayed the court to put off his trial until the next sessions. Then the court asked him his witnesses names, and what they could say? Which he then declared to the court. Upon which Mr. Arnold, being present and prosecutor (Tam pro Domino Rege, quam pro seipso), the court asked his consent, and what he could say why the trial should not be put off; that so all the world might hereafter say, That Mr. Giles had all the favour that he could reasonably desire, and what the court could in justice shew him, and that no manner of excuse might be left him.

After which Mr. Arnold, in a very pertinent speech, declared part of the fact and also of the proceedings before his wounding, as it had occurred between him and Mr. Herbert; and of his favourable and just proceedings against Mr. Herbert, and also against John Giles, after the fact was committed; and declared that Giles had sufficient notice of his trial; but notwithstanding he did submit himself to the judgment of the court.

Thereupon the court advised a minute or two's space; it was ordered, That the court should be adjourned until the Wednesday following; by which time Mr. Giles might send to Monmouth, and have what witnesses brought up he could get.

And the day appointed being come, and the court being sat, proclamation was made according to custom. Then the following jury were called and sworn, viz. Christ. Plucknet, William Dodd, Anthony Nurse, John Barton, Nathan Godwin, George Wood, James Partridge, Lawrence, Wood, John Bradshaw, William Withers, Edward Proby, Rich. Bromfield. Who according to the form of law, were charged to enquire, Whether the prisoner were guilty of the following indictment upon which he had been arraigned, and had pleaded Not Guilty?

† From a pamphlet, intitled, "The Trial of John Giles, at the Sessions-House in the Old Bailey: Held by Adjournment from the 7th day of July, 1680, until the 14th day of the same month: The Adjournment being appointed as a purpose for the said Giles his Trial, for a barbarous and inhuman attempt, to assassinate and murder John Arnold, esq. one of the Justices of Peace for the county of Monmouth, and now a member of the honourable House of Commons, made public by virtue of an Order of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in parliament assembled: London, printed by Thomas James, for Randal Taylor, and by him sold at his house near Stationers Hall, 1681."

"By virtue of an order to me granted by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in parliament assembled, dated on Thursday the 28th of Oct. 1680; I do appoint Randal Taylor, near Stationers Hall, to print this Trial of Mr. John Giles, and that no other person or persons presume to print the same. *Jo. jurors unknown, forethought and had, intending one John Arnold, esq. a faithful subject to the king, and one of the justices of peace for the county of Monmouth, inhumanly to maim, wound, kill, and murder, the 15th of April, in the 32nd year of the reign of our sovereign lord Charles the 2nd, by the grace of God, king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. with the said malefactors unknown, at the parish of St. Dunstan in the West aforesaid in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, in and upon him the said John Arnold, then and there being in the peace of God and the king, unlawfully, voluntarily, and of his malice forethought, with force and arms; that is to say, with swords, staves, and knives, of design, and by lying in wait, did make an assault; and him the said John Arnold did then and there beat, wound, maim, and evilly entreat, and the throat and face of him the said John Arnold did grievously cut with a certain knife; also divers almost mortal wounds then and there to the said John Arnold; that is to say, one wound of the depth of seven inches in his body, between his belly and his left pap, two wounds upon his breast, and two wounds in his left arm with certain swords, did then and there give and impose, so that it was despaired of the said John Arnold's life, and other enormities then and there unto him did bring, to the great danger of the said John Arnold, and against the peace of our said lord the king, his crown and dignity.

Mr. Gibbs. Gentlemen, this is an indictment against John Giles, the prisoner at the bar, for assaulting and intending to dispatch and murder John Arnold, one of his majesty's justices of the peace, on the 15th day of April. This John Giles and several others did intend to kill Mr. Arnold, and set upon him in Jackanapes lane, threw him down, and endeavoured to thrust their swords into him; but finding no penetration there, they kneeled upon him, and with a knife endeavoured to cut his throat, and in one place made a very large gash, and cut his face; he endeavouring to keep them from his throat, they gave him a wound in his side seven inches deep, between his belly and left pap. They gave him several other wounds. To this he has pleaded Not Guilty.

Mr. Holt. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am counsel for the king, and the Indictment hath represented to you the most horrid, vile, and barbarous assault that has been almost ever committed, and that any man has heard of; and which I think scarce any thing in history can parallel. It was, gentlemen, in its nature most cruel, by the giving him so many wounds as are set forth in the Indictment; having first way-laid and surprized him near a place, and at such a time, as was convenient for the execution of their wicked design. This Mr. Arnold having occasion to go through Bell-Yard between the hours of 10 and 11 of the clock at night, at the end of Jackanapes-Lane, he was suddenly seized by two men, and by them hauled into the lane, where they gave him several wounds, and used him in a most barbarous manner. And this did not arise from any private difference or animosity that they could conceive against Mr. Arnold; but from a cause more general, that is, the prosecution of the horrid popish plot; against which Mr. Arnold, as became him, and according to the duty of his office, he being a justice of the peace, was a very zealous person. Gentlemen, in the first place we will call Mr. Arnold, who shall plainly prove that this prisoner at the bar was one of the three assassins; and he proves it by a miraculous providence: For just before they seized upon him a woman in Bell-Yard held out a candle, which gave Mr. Arnold an opportunity to see the prisoner at the bar, and did perfectly discern him. Gentlemen, though this is enough, considering the integrity and reputation of the person; yet we shall fortify his evidence by strong and undeniable circumstances, circumstances that do particularly relate to this matter. In the first place, gentlemen, the very day that this fact was done, this person, though he had a good sword by his side, yet he did enquire where he might buy a more convenient sword, and did desire to know where he might have a rapier, which was thought more convenient for this design; and the very next day after this fact, though Mr. Arnold's having armour on was a secret which no persons but Mr. Walcup, a justice of the peace, and Mr. Arnold himself knew; yet this same Giles could say, Arnold had armour on; and if Arnold had not had armour on, his business had been done. And after this fact was committed, this Giles goes into Gloucestershire, and being pursued by a guilty conscience, he durst not stay there, for he was afraid, as he said himself, of being apprehended for assassinating Mr. Arnold. After this, gentlemen, he came to one Darcy a cutler in Monmouthshire, with his sword which was broken, and desired him to mend his sword. How now, says he, how came this sword to be broken? Have you been fighting with the devil? No, says he, I have been fighting with damned Arnold. And at the very same time when these villains thought they had effected their bloody purpose, and gave Mr. Arnold his dispatch, one of them said to him, Now, villain, if thou hast any life in thee, pray for the soul of captain Evans; which Evans was a priest executed in Wales upon Mr. Arnold's prosecution, at whose execution this Giles was present, and dipped his handkerchief in his blood. Now, gentlemen, considering all this, which we will make plain to you by Mr. Arnold, and all these circumstances; I suppose you will have sufficient evidence to find him guilty.

Mr. Thompson. My lord, and you gentlemen of the jury, the Indictment has been opened, and the matter of it, that base attempt made upon Mr. Arnold, that was a justice of the peace in Monmouthshire, that is shewed in the Indictment. But I must crave your lordship's leave, that I may more particularly open this case. This is a case, gentlemen, of very great consequence, and though it more immediately concerns Mr. Arnold, yet it highly concerns every man present; you of the jury, and I; nay, every other freeman of England, which ought to be protected by the laws, must needs be concerned at so great a violation of them, and cannot but set our faces against such villainous and barbarous attempts as these, wherein there did not want the good-will of the actors to make it a most barbarous and bloody murder. In the course of our evidence, and the method we will take to proceed in, it will be necessary to do these three things. First of all, we shall acquaint you with that which we apprehend to be the reason and occasion of this horrid fact. Next we shall tell you what that fact was. And in the last place, enquire how far this defendant is guilty thereof.

For the first; give me leave to acquaint you with what we apprehend to be the true reason of this assassination. It is notorious to most men, but especially to the county of Monmouth, where Mr. Arnold was a justice of peace, how active and diligent, how faithful and vigorous a man he has been in the discharge of his duty to his king and country, in putting the laws in execution against the papists, and endeavouring to suppress popery: This was the ground of their malice, as you will find by the evidence, and by the several threats that he had before this act was done. But more particularly there was this occasion; there was one whom they called captain Evans, but indeed was Father Evans, a popish priest; this man in Monmouth was taken by Mr. Arnold, and was prosecuted according to law, and convicted. I mention this circumstance, because our evidence will refer to it, and that you will see out of the actors own mouths, if we may believe the actors in this bloody tragedy when they did the fact: This prosecution of Father captain Evans, was no small occasion of their villainy which they acted upon Mr. Arnold. These were the grounds of their malice, gentlemen, and what happened to Mr. Arnold was the effect. And I do the rather mention this particular, that you may know what sort of people these were that practised this villainy upon Mr. Arnold; for it will be a necessary circumstance in our proof against this prisoner at the bar, to shew that he is one of that bloody tribe.

Gentlemen, the next thing is to shew what this fact was, and how it happened. Mr. Arnold had a controversy with one Mr. Herbert, another justice of the peace in Monmouthshire: that cause between them was to be heard before the king and council the next day after this fact was committed: I mention Mr. Herbert, but I hope he is more a gentleman than to be concerned in such a villainy. We will not at this time give any evidence that relates to him: For truly I believe this could only be the contrivance of a Jesuit, and the practice of a bigotted papist. But thus it happened: Mr. Arnold going to attend his counsel upon this occasion, to prepare himself for this hearing that was to be before the king and council; in Bell-Yard there he is set upon, there he is wounded, there he is murdered, as these assassins thought. And this Mr. Arnold will prove to you when he comes to give his evidence. This to the fact.

Gentlemen, the next is now to consider how far this man at the bar is guilty of it; and for that, gentlemen, we will give you evidence of several sorts:

1. The positive proof of Mr. Arnold himself, who, as Mr. Holt has observed before, almost by a miracle, discovered the defendant's face; for a light accidentally coming out of one of the neighbouring houses, and the defendant looking at Mr. Arnold to see whether he was the man they wanted, immediately upon that he was assaulted and carried into Jackanapes-Lane, and was wounded in several places. This, gentlemen, is plain, and will be positively proved; and then when this man was taken up on suspicion, and was carried before a justice of the peace, and Mr. Arnold was sent for, though Mr. Arnold had no private intimation, no kind of knowledge before-hand of Giles's being taken; and there were several men stood besides this man, yet though he had never seen him before, but at the time when the fact was done, Mr. Arnold immediately charged him with the fact, and as soon as he heard him speak he knew his voice. This was so plain upon Giles, that he had not the power, though he might have had the confidence, at that time to deny it: But instead of a denial said, the matter could but amount to an assault and battery. In the next place we have evidence from the defendant's own mouth, which in a case of this nature ought to weigh as much as can be, and I think is as much as the nature of the thing is capable of. This man the very next day after Mr. Arnold had been thus assaulted, discoursing with one Phillips by name, and relating the business which happened to Mr. Arnold, and before he could know he had armour on, as we will prove from the circumstance of the time (what does Giles say?) says he, Damn him, rot him, Mr. Arnold, said he, had armour on. And this, gentlemen, could not be known by him at that time, if he had not been a party in this base attempt. And there is a circumstance that goes yet beyond this, which I would have you observe, that when Mr. Arnold was assassinated, when they made their attempt, in the very act were these words used, Damn him, rot him, he has armour on. These very words were spoken then, and upon that they fell to cut his throat. We have this circumstance more; he had broken his sword, and went to a cutler, one Darcy by name; this man was a papist, and says he, Where hast thou been, Giles, fighting with the devil? No, it was with damn'd Arnold. This we will prove to you: These are evidences that are positive.

and if ever any of the lords in the Tower should suffer, this nation should feel a bloodier war than ever it had done; by which you may see his bloody nature. Gentlemen, besides this we shall prove (according to their custom of shamming) that he, bas from time to time pretended as if Mr. Arnold had done this business himself, or some of his friends, to revive the plot. A very fine contrivance indeed! for a person to stab himself, and cut his own throat, to revive the plot. These things we will make out clearly to you: And I must tell you it is a notorious crime, such a fact as has no precedent: there is no remembrance in history, that I know of, of such barbarous attempts, except in the case of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, who was most barbarously murdered by this sort of men. And this case, gentlemen, differs from that only in this, that there they accomplished their villainy upon him: but the providence of God saved Mr. Arnold's life, and I hope to as good purpose: For as providence ordered that to confirm the truth of the popish plot; so this assassination of Mr. Arnold must convince all mankind (not concerned in the plot itself) that this damned Popish plot still continues, and that it is high time for all honest men, as much as in them lies, to endeavour to suppress it. You, gentlemen, will do your duty in finding this man guilty (if the evidence we give satisfies your consciences that he is so, else God forbid), and then I doubt not but the court will do their duty, in putting such an exemplary punishment upon this villain, that may deter the like barbarous and bloody attempts for the future.

Mr. Arnold sworn.

Mr. Thompson. Pray, Mr. Arnold, give an account of this business.

Mr. Arnold. My lord, I was ordered by the king and council to attend upon them the next day after this villainy befel me. I was upon the 15th day of April in my chamber in the afternoon, and my lord Chandos and several other persons came to my chamber, and one Evans, one of the messengers belonging to the council, came to give me notice that my hearing (which I was informed was to be at four in the afternoon) was ordered to be at ten in the morning, which was the reason I sent my servants out to give notice of this alteration to my witnesses and counsel. And though I had resolved not to stir out that night, I went out with the company to the Devil-tavern, where we were, and staid till about ten or past; and just as we were breaking up, I recollected that I had some business with Mr. Phillips, who is a counsellor at law, and lives near the end of Bell-yard. I desired the company to stay, and I would come to them in a moment. I went to the room where several servants were, and called to some of them to go with me; For several of my friends and neighbours being in town, I very often took their servants with me, when mine were busy or out of the way. As I went cross Fleet-street, I did see two men in campaign-cloaks follow me, and I thought them to be servants belonging to some of my company, who had followed me on my calling; and as I came into Bell-yard, one of them went faster than I went, and got before me, and turned and looked earnestly in my face, and I went by him, when a woman standing in a door about the middle of Bell-yard, with a caudle in her hand, I looked in his face, and that person was the prisoner at the bar; and when his companion or companions came up to him, I heard them laugh aloud; I took no notice, but went on, and went as far as to that house.

Mr. Recorder (Sir George Jefferies.) You knew him before, Mr. Arnold?

Mr. Arnold. I did not know him so well before as to know his face. At the kennel at the end of Jackanapes Lane, I looking down to find the kennel, a cloak was thrown over my head, then I found very rough hands upon my shoulders, and they ran me into Jackanapes-Lane, just cross the lane, against the opposite wall, and they run my head so hard I think they broke it; I drew my sword before, but before I could use it, I was struck, and immediately upon that, one of them struck me; then I apprehended what it was, but could not turn to make any defence. I received a second blow, and fell, and the first thing I was sensible of was a very sharp quick thrust in my side, and the point at that thrust ran into my belly; then I recovering began to make what defence I could. With a broad sword I was run through my arm, and with a small weapon I was run through in another place of my arm. I had several other wounds; one of them set his foot hard upon my breast, and kept me down, and he was, as I conceive, run into the leg by one of his companions, for I heard him say, 'Damme thou hast spoiled my leg.' They laughed all the while, and were exceeding merry. I had then on a pair of bodice of whalebone, notwithstanding which I had four or five wounds in my body through them, for they were not proof, but they imagined they were, finding their swords double sometimes, and then said one of them, 'Damme, he has armour on, cut his throat.' Immediately one kneeled down, and gave me several cuts in the lower part of the face, and I did what I could to defend myself, but they have given me some indelible marks, characters that will never be obliterated while I live, and I am afraid I shall never be myself again, by reason of the bruises in my head and breast. By a caudle in a window, I conceive in sir Thomas Baldwin's house, and some women in his yard, gave them the first disturbance, and a boy coming by with a link the same time, I both saw the face of the prisoner at the bar again, and remembered I saw him in the lane just before. They then pulled the cloak from off me, and I seeing the light, and being eased of the weight, I strained all my strength and cried out, and these some company came in; who are here to prove it; but seeing me all blood and dirt, they stood gazing on me a time, but at last took me up and carried me into the Sugar-loaf, and from thence I was carried to my lodging, where all the company I left came to me, and a surgeon was sent for, who is also here to prove his knowledge of the condition he found me in. And when they went away, they did not steal away as other malefactors used to do, but clapt their swords close to their bodies, and went away laughing aloud; but as they were going, one of them said these words, 'Now, you dog, pray for, or pray again for the soul of Captain Evans.' Captain Evans was a Jesuit, and was executed at Cardiffe for being a priest; and I have been informed by several persons of good quality, that when the under sheriff came to give him notice that he had a warrant for his speedy execution, the said Evans being in a game at tennis, said 'God damme, I will play out my set first.'

Recorder. Mr. Arnold, I would know one thing: Will you undertake to swear positively that this person was one of the persons who stept before you? Will you take it upon your oath, that that person, the prisoner at the bar, went before you?

Mr. Arnold. I will take it upon my oath, as far as a man can do, for one man, it is possible, may be like another both by his voice and his face; I can swear I believe he is the man.

Mr. Thompson. You are satisfied upon the first sight that you had of him in the country, that he was the man.

Mr. Arnold. Yes, sir, and he can tell you that by a very good token, for I had like to have run him through.

Recorder. We must not expect that there can be exact and positive proof; for men that commit offences of this impudent nature do not usually call witnesses to be present to see them done; therefore we would come as near as we can to circumstances, whereby a fact of such a nature is to be proved. Mr. Arnold, do you believe that the prisoner at the bar was one of the persons that went before you in Bell Yard?

Mr. Arnold. Upon my conscience I do believe he was the man.

Recorder. What o'clock was it?

Mr. Arnold. About 11 o'clock, or between 10 and 11.

Recorder. When the link came there, was there three? And do you believe by the light you had by the link, that that was one of the persons that were there?

Arnold. I saw his face and habit, and believe he was.

Recorder. What habit had he on?

Arnold. He had a grey cloak, a campaign cloak, and a coat, I think, lined with red. It is impossible to give an account of every particular under those circumstances I was in.

Recorder. It is not to be expected that a man under your circumstances should be extraordinary precise in circumstances; therefore it is asked you, that according to the best of your apprehension, you might acquaint the court with those circumstances that may be remembered by the jury, that they may see there be no injury done to the prisoner at the bar, but that right be done on both sides, and that in every circumstance.

Mr. Holt. Now, Sir, we will call Mr. Phillips, with whom he had this discourse the next day.

Recorder. Will the prisoner ask him any questions?

Pris. Truly Mr. Arnold knew me in Monmouthshire, and knew me as well as any man in the city.

Recorder. Did you not very well know him?

Arnold. It is very possible I might see him, and often at assizes and sessions, but not to know him; nor did ever know whether his name were Giles, or what it was. Your lordship sees many persons here, and often, and it is possible do not know them; he lives I think a dozen miles from me.

Pris. That is a wonder; if it please you, sir, my wife is a near relation to you, both by father and mother, and I have spoken with you in your chamber.

Arnold. It is possible she may, but I do not know it.

Stephen Phillips.

Mr. Holt. Pray, Mr. Phillips, give an account of what discourse you had with Giles the day after the business was done.

Phillips. We went to the tavern, and drank two or three bottles of wine, and we had some discourse concerning Mr. Arnold; it was about eight or nine in the evening the next day, some discourse happened concerning his miserable condition, and how he was hurt, and of that nature.

Recorder. How many was there in company?

Phillips. One or two more.

Recorder. What house?

Phillips. At the Crown tavern in New-street, in Covent Garden; and among the rest, Mr. Giles was talking of it, and said he, 'God damn him, God rot him, he had armour on;' the word was, 'God damn him,' or, 'God rot him, he had armour on, they say.'

Mr. Holt. What time of night was that?

Phillips. As near as I can remember, it was about eight or nine the next day in the evening.

Mr. Thomson. The very words that Arnold swears when they went to cut his throat.

Pris. My lord, if you please, there was Mr. Phillips and another; and I spake nothing but what I heard as news, that they had killed him if he had not had armour on.

Recorder. For that matter, Mr. Giles, you shall have your time, and you may call up other witnesses, but the gentleman positively swears you said these words; and, if so, I will assure you it does not look as if you were a-kin to him, or your wife either.

Walter Watkins.

Mr. Holt. Mr. Watkins, what did you hear that Giles should say in Gloucestershire about this business?

Mr. Thomson. What said he about this business of Mr. Arnold?

Watkins. My lord, all I can say is this: I being at the stating some accounts between Mr. John Giles and Mr. Richmond, I asked Mr. Giles for some horsehair to make a fishing line: Mr. Giles replied, That he had left very good hair for me at a farrier's in Gloucester; for he and Mr. Herbert Jones made such haste through the town of Gloucester, that they did not call for the horsehair. I asked Mr. Giles what was the occasion of his haste? said he, for fear we should be stopped in our journey, as suspected to be concerned in Mr. Arnold's business.

Recorder. What time was that?

Watkins. About the 5th of May.

George Richmond.

Mr. Holt. Mr. Richmond, what can you say concerning this thing?

Richmond. I desired Mr. Giles to meet me, that we might even our accounts; and upon the 5th of May last he met me, and I desired Mr. Watkins to be present as a witness.

Recorder. Where was it?

Richmond. At Uske. And as we were making up the account, said Mr. Watkins to Mr. Giles, Where is the horsehair you promised me to make fishing-lines? Giles replied, He left very good horsehair at a farrier's in Gloucester: and he asked him, Why he left it? He said, He made haste for fear of being taken and stopped for Mr. Arnold's business. I cannot say whether he called him esq. Arnold, or Mr. Arnold, or what; he seldom used to give him so good words.

Walter Powell.

Mr. Holt. What do you know concerning Giles his being at the cutler's?

Powell. If it please you, sir, I was at the cutler's.

Recorder. Name the time when and the place where.

Powell. The 5th of May, at a place called Uske in Monmouthshire, Mr. Giles and I, we came there; and Mr. Giles asked Peter Darcy, Whether he would mend him that sword or no? But Mr. Darcy had some business that he could not get time to mend it that morning, but would do it in the afternoon. Says Darcy, Where have you been? you have been hot at it. What, have you been fighting with the devil? No, said he, with damned Arnold.

Recorder. What did you say when the cutler asked him, whether he had been fighting with the devil? And he said again, No, not with the devil, but with damned Arnold?

Powell. Peter Darcy said he must not speak such words; and Giles's wife plucked him by the coat, and bid him hold his tongue.

Mr. Darnal. Who was by?

Powell. There was one Peter Darcy.

Mr. Darnal. Was one John Jones there?

Powell. I think there was another indeed by, the apprentice.

Recorder. There was the apprentice, but he does not know his name, and Darcy and Giles and his wife.

William Richmond.

Mr. Holt. What did you hear Giles say about the rapier?

W. Richmond. He asked me in the afternoon before Mr. Arnold was hurt, where he might buy a very good rapier: I told him I could not tell. He then had a good back-sword in the house.

Mr. Gibbs. Tell the court what acquaintance Giles had with Father Lewis the Jesuit, since executed.

W. Richmond. My lord, he told me he would go to the executioner, and persuade him not to execute Mr. Lewis, but I had the executioner locked up, and I would not suffer him; but I did see him very active at the execution, dipping cloths in Lewis's blood.

Mr. Thompson. What do you say as to his coming to his lodging?

W. Richmond. We went to several places that day, and at eight or nine, or between eight and nine, we came to the King's-Arms in St. Martin's Lane, and I left him at the kitchen fire, and went up into the chamber and drank a considerable quantity of drink; and as near as I can guess, it was between twelve and one o'clock before he came to his bed, for after I was going to bed, about one o'clock I heard John Giles come up the stairs, and bid me good night; he called at my door just as I was pulling off my breeches to go into bed.

Recorder. What time was this?

W. Richmond. As near as I can guess, it was between twelve and one, or very near one.

Recorder. At what house was it?

W. Richmond. The King's-Arms in St. Martin's Lane.

Recorder. What did you say when the maid was making the bed?

W. Richmond. I asked her who it was for? And she said, for a man that was not willing to lie with any body.

Recorder. What time did you come to the house?

W. Richmond. About nine.

Recorder. Did you stay in that house till that time?

W. Richmond. I lay in the house, sir.

Recorder. You were not out of the house the while?

W. Richmond. No, sir, I was not out of it. Recorder. And you are sure that you did not see him again till he came to your door going to bed?

W. Richmond. Yes, sir.

Recorder. What time was that?

W. Richmond. Nigh one.

Mr. Thompson. You see the contradiction between this, and what this fellow says upon his examination; where he says he was a-bed at nine o'clock.

Recorder. Where did you go at that time?

Richmond. We went to Long Lane, to our Philpot's, and she told us her husband was gone to exercise at the next church; I do not know the church's name, and there we went and looked upon the soldiers, but did not see him; we came back to his house again, and the gentleman gave us a tankard of beer or ale. And after that we went back, and we had a mind to make sport with a country-fellow we had with us, and went into Whetstone's-Park, from thence we went to the Helmet in Drury-lane.

Recorder. You went to Whetstone's Park, and what did you spend there?

W. Richmond. Six-pence, and he paid it.

Recorder. Whither did you go from thence?

W. Richmond. Into Drury-lane.

Recorder. How long did you stay in Drury-lane?

W. Richmond. It was not long, sir, about an hour.

Recorder. Where after that?

W. Richmond. From thence to the Peacock, and staid till eight or nine.

Recorder. Who did you meet withal between your going from the Helmet in Drury-lane to the Peacock?

W. Richmond. We met with one Powel and another, and one Elizabeth Edwards.

Recorder. What did you drink there?

W. Richmond. We did drink both ale and brandy.

Recorder. Well said: How long did you stay there?

W. Richmond. We staid there a pretty while, an hour or more, or two hours.

Recorder. What time of night was it that you went from thence?

W. Richmond. About eight or nine.

Recorder. And then you went to your lodgings?

W. Richmond. Yes.

Recorder. Did you drink at the King's-arms?

W. Richmond. No, we drank not all together.

Recorder. And there you staid till twelve or one o'clock.

W. Richmond. Yes.

Recorder. But can you remember, as near as you can guess, what time was it you saw this maid making of the bed?

W. Richmond. I cannot say positively, but I judge it was about twelve o'clock.

Mr. Thompson. As to that circumstance of his coming home at twelve at night, desire Mr. Arnold to give an account of his examination what time of night he came to his lodging.

Mr. Holt. Do you believe that is John Giles's hand?

Recorder. That is a copy.

Recorder. He did confess it before a justice of the peace, that he was at his lodging at ten o'clock: This I heard him say, and I believe he won't deny it; and I heard him own this examination, my man will prove it.

Giles. Deny it? Yes, I will deny it, there was no such word said: I did say, Mr. Arnold, I went to bed then.

Att. Gen. (Sir Creswel Leviaz.) The jury must take notice of this; that upon his examination he says, he came home by nine; which is before the thing was done: But by proof he did not come in till twelve, which was after the thing was done.

Holt. We will give you now, gentlemen, an account of this man's principles.

Recorder. This is the business: Richmond says, they came together to their lodging before night, but he left him at the kitchen fire, and went into another room to drink with some company; and this Mr. Richmond says, his bed was not made till twelve o'clock, and that he himself went to bed about one of the clock, and that he heard the prisoner at the bar, while he was pulling off his breeches, call to him, and therefore he took notice of that as a circumstance, that he does particularly remember he did not go to bed till that time; and he says he did not stir from that place after nine o'clock.

Mr. Thompson. There is a contradiction in that.

Recorder. There is no contradiction: The other witness says, that he came along with him at nine o'clock.

Mr. Thompson. I will tell you where this is a contradiction.

Att. Gen. He says he came to the house at nine o'clock, but he came not to bed till after one.

Recorder. The evidence does not go so far: Richmond says they came to the King's-Arms, and left him in the kitchen at nine o'clock, and he went into his chamber and staid up till one, and all that time he did not come to bed.

Mr. Thompson. So far it lies upon him to give an account where he was between nine and twelve.

Bridges.

Mr. Holt. Heark you, sir, have you had any discourse with Giles concerning the Plot, and concerning the lords in the Tower? And what did he say to you?

Mr. Bridges. I had some discourse with him concerning the papists; he that said that it was the best religion, and those that were not of that religion should be damned: I alledged against him, and told him the contrary: I thought not. Can it be such a religion, said I, that will act such things against the king and the government? Says he, if any says there is such a Plot against the king or the government, he is a rogue and a thief.

Mr. Holt. What did he say of the lords in the Tower?

Bridges. Nothing more.

Giles. How long ago was this?

Recorder. When was this?

Bridges. This was, my lord, about a twelve-month ago.

Mr. Thompson. Did he speak any thing to you further concerning the Plot?

Bridges. Not further.

Giles. My lord, I beseech you I may speak to this man. Do you hear, sir, were not these the words that I said when you charged me to be a papist, that I knew of no popish plot, and they that said I was a papist, or knew any thing of the Plot, were rogues or whores or worse?

Bridges. You said thus, that the papists were the best religion, and that those that were not of that religion were damned.

Giles. Have not you been a papist, sir?

Bridges. I am not now.

Giles. Will you say that I am a papist?

Bridges. I say you defended it so much, I thought you were. Said I, I wonder, it being such a good religion, that they would offer to act such a thing against the king and government. Said he, he that says this Plot is acted by the papists, is a rogue and a thief.

Giles. How long ago is this?

Bridges. A twelve-month ago; you remember it well enough; you remember when you sent for me to the George.

Walter Moor.

Mr. Holt. What discourse have you had with him concerning the Plot?

Mr. Thompson. What has he said about it?

Moor. He said, if the lords in the Tower were executed, there would be a greater war than ever was in England, and swore that if these lords were put to death, it would cost more blood than ever was spilt. And I asked him again, why they should not be put to death if they should deserve it? For if a poor man had done such a fault, he would be hanged out of the way presently. He said again, they did not deserve it, for there was no plot at all.

Giles. Pray, sir, who was with you when you say I said these words?

Moor. I was at George Taylor's house.

Giles. Did not you say that George Taylor discoursed this with you?

Mr. Thompson. Is this the man that spake it, upon your oath?

Moor. Yes, this was the man.

Giles. What did Taylor say to you? Do you think, my lord, I would say such a thing to such a man as this is?

Recorder. Do you hear, Mr. Giles, for that matter is not the question; the man has sworn it; except the jury know of their own knowledge that the man is perjured, he is not so as to me.

Moor. It is the first time that I ever took an oath.

Mr. Reynold.

Mr. Holt. Mr. Reynold, What have you heard Giles say concerning Mr. Arnold?

Reynold. Sir, I was in company with John Giles and another, and we had discourse concerning one Arnold, and John Giles said——

Recorder. What was that?

Reynold. I being in company with him, we fell in discourse about Justice Arnold, how he was wounded.

Recorder. Where was it?

Reynold. In Moumouthshire, at Langoone, the second day of May: John Giles answered us, that he could not see but he wounded himself.

Recorder. What day did you say?

Reynold. The second day of May.

Recorder. He did discourse the 5th day of May at Uske, I would fain know when he came through Gloucester.

Mr. Thompson. What did he say about Mr. Arnold?

Reynold. He thought that he wounded himself. Said his wife, how could he wound himself in his arms? Said he, it was himself, or some of his friends.

Recorder. Or some of his relations.

Reynold. Some of his friends.

Mr. Hobbs.

Mr. Thompson. Mr. Hobbs, Pray tell how you found Mr. Arnold when he was wounded.

Hobbs. I found Mr. Arnold bleeding.

Mr. Thompson. Tell what wounds they were.

Hobbs. Two in his arm, two others upon the face, another upon the throat, which bled very much; another two upon the breast, and one in the belly.

Mr. Thompson. What depth might that be?

Hobbs. Two inches and a half long.

Mr. Thompson. Where else?

Hobbs. There was another upon his breast.

Mr. Thompson. What depth?

Hobbs. They were not very deep, but there was one upon the belly six inches and an half; there were two through his arm, and a wound and several bruises in his head.

Mr. Thompson. This is likely to be a fine contrivance, that he should do it himself, as likely as that sir Edmundbury Godfrey put his own sword through his own body after his neck was broke. [A great shout given.]

Lord Mayor. Do you believe a man could wound himself so?

Hobbs. No, sir.

Recorder. I believe a man could do it, but I believe a man would not do it himself.

Fifteen or sixteen witnesses more for the king, that were attending in the court, were not examined, the court being in some haste and the king's counsel not pressing to have them examined, there being so full evidence: nor was there one word replied to the prisoner's witnesses, they being all either frivolous or contradictory.

Mr. Darnal. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury, I am of counsel for Giles, the prisoner at the bar, and I must needs say there has been a strong evidence given against him; and if I were sure he was concerned in this barbarous attempt upon Mr. Arnold, I would not open my mouth in this cause; but if my brief be true, I make no question but to satisfy your lordship and the jury, may and Mr. Arnold himself, that he had no hand in this bloody action.

And first, my lord, in answer to the evidence that hath been given, there have been sworn among others, Mr. Richmond, Mr. Phillips, and one Powel. First, as to Phillips's evidence, or what passed in discourse at the Crown tavern in Covent-Garden; we have a witness here who was present at the same time, that will give you an account of the whole discourse, and that there were no such words said by Giles in relation to Mr. Arnold, as Damn him, he had armour on; and as to the evidence given by Watkins, of what passed at Uske, about Mr. Herbert Jones's and the prisoner's making such speed through Gloucester, we have witnesses, here, my lord, that will satisfy your lordship and the jury, that when they came to Gloucester, though it was at the time of the general quarter sessions, yet they staid there four or five hours, at a public-house, without the least sign of their apprehension of any pursuit; which shews the improbability of any such discourse at Uske; and, my lord, as to the evidence of Powel of what was said in Darcy's the cutler's shop at Uske; we have, my lord, a witness here that was present at that time, who will give your lordship and the jury an account, that the words said then by the prisoner did much differ from what Mr. Powel swears; besides the improbability that any man should be so weak to publish himself guilty of such a crime as this in this manner; after his majesty's proclamation out, with the promise of so great a reward to any man that would make a discovery of this horrid action: so far, my lord, we shall answer the evidence that hath been given; but to satisfy your lordship and the jury, that it was impossible the prisoner at the bar could be concerned in this foul action, we shall prove to your lordship, that upon the 13th of April, upon the evening of which day this bloody attempt was made upon Mr. Arnold, the prisoner at the bar came first to town; and we shall prove that he came to town but at one o'clock that day. We shall prove further, if my brief be true, by five or six substantial witnesses, against whom there can be no exception, how and where he employed himself all that day, from the minute that he came to town: and that when he returned to his inn, about nine o'clock at night, the maid of the inn locked his chamber-door, after he was a-bed, and kept the key of the chamber all night. And, my lord, if all this be clearly proved, I make no doubt but your lordship and the jury, and all persons here, will be satisfied that the prisoner at the bar is not guilty of this indictment. My lord, we will first begin with Mr. Philpot.

Mr. Philpot.

Mr. Darnal. Mr. Philpot, pray do you acquaint my lord, and the jury, what discourse passed between you and Giles at the Crown tavern in Covent-Garden.

Philpot. We drank one bottle of claret, Mr. Phillips came in when the bottle was almost ended. But by and by some friends came in, and they asked him what news, sir? Said he, I hear of no news but a cruel assassination upon Mr. Arnold, but for my part I am sorry for it: but, said he, if any thing should be upon Mr. Arnold, it is a very strange thing.

Mr. Darnal. Were you there all the time, Sir?

Philpot. Yes, sir, all the time.

Darnal. And you heard no other discourse?

Philpot. No, he did not say 'damn him' nor 'sink him,' for I hate such company.

Mr. Holt. Mr. John Philpot, where do you live?—Philpot. In Long-Lane.

Mr. Holt. What sign do you live at?

Philpot. At the Crown.

Mr. Holt. What trade are you?

Philpot. A salesman.

Mr. Darnal. Now we will go on to the discourse at Uske, about their passing with such speed through Gloucester.

Recorder. Mr. Darnal, they do not pretend you were in great fear, but they say you said so. It is not the question, whether you did stay long at Gloucester, or no? But the question is, whether you told this man so? Because the man asked you, why you would leave the hair at the farmer's, in order to a fishing-line? Truly I was in great haste, for fear I should be taken up about the business of Mr. Arnold.

Mr. Darnal. It is very true, and therefore we bring this evidence to shew the improbability that we should say any such thing, when it was false, and especially when it was to accuse ourselves of a crime.

Herbert Jones. Mayor of Monmouth.

Mr. Darnal. Mr. Jones, pray give an account to the jury of your passing through Gloucester, and how long you staid there.

Jones. My lord, I came with the prisoner.

Recorder. What day did you come through Gloucester?

Jones. I cannot positively tell you the day: we went out of town upon Friday, we came to Gloucester either Wednesday or Friday, and there we went to the Old Bear in Gloucester; and there staid an hour before we went to dinner; it was a public time, the quarterly sessions, and several people came to us to hear the news; we told them, and were as sorry for it as any persons could be, and did confess it a very ill thing. We went from the Old Bear after we had dined to the New Bear, and drank several pints of cyder. I believe by the oath I have taken, we were several hours in the town.

Mr. Milbourn. Do you know Mr. Arnold is acquainted with Mr. Giles?

Jones. I do believe Mr. Arnold has great reason to be acquainted with Giles.

Mr. Thompson. Yes, now he has.

Mr. Milbourn. Was he chief constable?

Jones. Yes, he was; and certainly Mr. Arnold in reason would take notice of the chief constable.

Mr. Milbourn. Mr. Herbert Jones, I am informed that you know this gentleman goes to church and receives the Sacrament. Give an account what religion he is of.

Jones. Always a Protestant; I saw him at church within this half year.

Giles. I can shew a certificate of my going to church since I came to town.

Recorder. There are many people that go to church to serve their turn.

Giles. And, my lord, I have taken the oaths of allegiance and supremacy.

Mr. Thompson. An excellent protestant to discourse so of the Plot, I must needs say that.

John Jones, the Cutler's Apprentice.

Recorder. How old are you?

Jones. Between fifteen and sixteen.

Recorder. Hark you, do you know the danger of forswearing yourself?

Jones. Yes, Sir.

Recorder. What is it?

Jones. I am in danger of everlasting fire.

Recorder. Very well.

Mr. Darnal. My lord, this is the apprentice to the Cutler, in whose shop Powel says we had such discourse: Jones, pray tell my lord and the jury, whether you were by when one Walter Powel came into your master's shop, when he and Giles were talking about Giles's sword?

Jones. Sir, John Giles came in the morning and brought a sword, my master was not within; and he told me, give this sword to your master to be mended; so I took the sword and laid it up till my master came in: when he came in, I told my master of it; and when he came again, this Walter Powel was in the shop: said Giles to my master, Did you mend my sword? says he: says my master, Mr. Giles, How came your sword broke? Have you been fighting with the devil? No, says he, for I never met with Arnold.

People. Hiss 'm, hiss.

Recorder. It does not become the decency and gravity of a court of justice, to be humming and hissing when facts are trying of this great concernment.

Mr. Milburn. It was the common discourse there that Mr. Arnold had been assaulted.

Recorder. You have been in a great combat; have you been fighting with the devil? What did he say to that?

Jones. He never met with Arnold; my master asked him, Mr. Giles, Have you been in some battle or other? Have you been fighting with the devil? No, Sir, for I never met with Arnold.

Recorder. You did not bear his wife bid him hold his tongue?

Jones. No, sir.

Mr. Thompson. Did he tell you how he did break his sword?

Jones. No, sir.

Giles. My lord, here is Mr. Philpot can tell, that I was sitting down in a chair, and broke off a piece of the guard.

Mr. Thompson. You will do well to prove it, Sir.

Mr. Milburn. Was there any discourse in the country about Mr. Arnold?

Recorder. Did they not talk any thing about killing the devil?

Jones. No, sir.

Mr. Darnal. If your lordship pleases, we will call witnesses to give an account when we came to town, and where we were all that day; and we will call the maid that locked the chamber-door after we were in bed, on the same night when this fact was committed.

John Howel.

Mr. Darnal. John Howel, pray tell my lord and the jury when Giles came to town?

Howel. If it please you, my lord, I came to town, and John Giles together.

Recorder. What time of the day was it?

Howel. It was twelve o'clock.

Recorder. Who is thy master?

Howel. William Richmond.

Mr. Darnal. What time of the night was it, friend, when you heard him call to your master, and bid him good night?

Howel. About 11 or 12 o'clock.

Mr. Milburn. You say about nine you were at your lodging with him? Did your party company with him?

Howel. Yes, Sir, we did.

Mr. Thompson. Where did you go at that time?

Howel. We went into the chamber, and drank 2 pints of brandy.

Mr. Thompson. What time of night was that?

Recorder. After 2 pints of brandy, I wonder how he can remember any thing.

Ann Beron.

Mr. Milburn. Tell what time of the night Giles came in; where you were in his company; what time of night it was?

Recorder. Speak as loud as thou would'st do if thou were at home: When was this?

Ann. The Thursday after Easter.

Recorder. The Thursday in Easter-week, or the Thursday in the next week?

Ann. The Thursday in Easter-week; we were never out of company; when he came home to his lodging I believe it was near ten o'clock.

Recorder. Where was your lodging, at the King's-Arms?

Ann. At the King's-Arms.

Recorder. Good woman, did you go with him to Whetstone's-park?

Ann. No, not I.

Recorder. Were you with him at the Artillery-ground?

Ann. No, not I.

Recorder. Were you with him in Drury-lane?—Ann. No, not I.

Recorder. He did not go out of your company at all?

Ann. Yes, about ten o'clock.

Recorder. Woman, you must be mistaken; he came to town at twelve or one, and might be in thy company: But it is plain he went to a broker's in Long-lane, and so to the Artillery-ground at Cripplegate, for I guess it might be so; then they went to Whetstone's-park, and spent sixpence, and after that they went into Drury-lane.

Pris. My lord, she don't say she was with us all the while; but we came to an house where she was, and several other people our neighbours.

Recorder. She says you did go out some time: Now see whether I mistake you.

Ann. Yes, you do mistake me.

Recorder. He went out, did he?

Ann. Yes, he went out after he came into the city, he and some others, and then they came back to me again in 2 or 3 hours.

Recorder. Then you were two or three hours at dinner. Now I ask you, after they came back, was you with him all the while?

Ann. Yes, that I was.

Recorder. Where was it?

Ann. At the Peacock.

Recorder. That is the place in Drury-lane.

Ann. No, indeed, it is in Covent-garden.

Mr. Darnal. When did he go to bed? Do you know that, upon your oath?

Ann. We were in the inn between 9 and 10 o'clock, nearer 10 than 9, and I saw him sitting taking a pipe of tobacco.

Mr. Darnal. What time was that?

Ann. A little after 10, I believe.

Mr. Thompson. He sat there till he was called away to do his business.

Elizabeth Crook.

Mr. Darnal. Elizabeth Crook, pray do you tell my lord and the jury about what time Giles went to bed?

Crook. Indeed, Sir, he went to bed between 10 and 11.

Mr. Darnal. How long was it that he came to his lodging before that? Can you say how long he was in the house before he went to bed?

Crook. I asked him if I should take away his candle; he said he would put his candle out, but I might lock him in and take the key, but I did not do it.

Mr. Thompson. Did he go to bed as soon as he came in?

Crook. No, I think he did not.

Recorder. You made the bed, did not you?

Crook. I did.

Recorder. Upon your oath, what time of night was it?

Crook. I think it was nearer 11 than 10.

Recorder. Did you make the bed after he went into it? what time did you make the bed, upon your oath?

Crook. I made the bed about 10 o'clock.

Recorder. I ask you, Do you remember Richmond came in to you, and asked you any thing about making the bed? Do you remember he was in the chamber?

Crook. In whose chamber?

Recorder. Did Richmond come in when you were making the bed?

Crook. He was not there, as I knew of.

Richmond. Was not I in the chamber when you made the bed?

Crook. No, I don't remember you.

Richmond. My lord, when this maid went to make the bed, I went into the room after her, and had some discourse with her; we leaned together upon the window, and I told her I was in love with her; I told her if she liked of it, I would marry her the next morning; I did it to make merry, for indeed I am a married man.

Recorder. What time of night was it?

Richmond. About 12 o'clock.

Recorder. If you forget your other sweet-hearts, can you remember this? Do you remember now he was there?

Crook. I remember he was there.

Pris. Mr. Arnold, pray do not laugh at my witnesses, and make may games at them; it is not the part of a gentleman.

Richmond. And she told me that he should lie by himself, though the house was very full.

Recorder. Do you remember any such discourse?

Crook. I do remember that Mr. Richmond did come in.

King's-Counsel. What time of night was it that he was making love to you?

Crook. I think about 10 o'clock.

King's-Counsel. Time passed merrily away with you, then.

Richmond. It was 12 o'clock.

Crook. Why do you say so? Our house was all quiet presently after eleven.

Richmond. Why will you say so? Were not we singing and roaring together?

Recorder. Come, do not be angry, you were not angry when you were making love together.

Richmond. I am not angry indeed, Sir.

Edward James.

Mr. Milburn. Tell my lord what time of night Giles came into his lodging, and where it was?

James. It was in Easter-week he came in, and so we were drinking at the King's-Arms in St. Martin's-lane, and from dinner, and from 9 o'clock.

Recorder. How! You did not dine there, you dined at the Peacock.

James. Yes, we dined there, but from 9 o'clock we were there till 12.

Recorder. How do you know?

James. I was there with him.

Recorder. After 12 o'clock you say you left him?—James. Yes.

Recorder. Where did you leave him?

James. In the kitchen.

Recorder. Are you sure?

James. Yes, my lord, I am sure of it.

Recorder. I ask you, because I have an unhappy memory: You are sure it was 12 o'clock when you saw him in the kitchen, and here is a maid saw him go to bed at 11.

Recorder. Have you any more? You know the matter that was the occasion of the dispute the other day: I would not by any means, that in a cause of this public concern, there should be any pretence for any to say they were surprized; therefore call as many witnesses as you please.

Robin Gibbon.

Mr. Milburn. What can you say, when Mr. Giles came into his lodging?

Gibbon. It was about 10 o'clock. I gave his horse about half a peck of oats.

Mr. Milburn. Where?

Gibbon. At the King's-Arms in St. Martin's-lane.

Mr. Milburn. Do you know how long he staid before he went to bed?

Gibbon. No, Sir, I cannot tell.

Mr. Thompson. He speaks honestly, this man.

Recorder. Have you any more?

Giles. There is another, a translator, my counsel knows his name.

John Chadwick.

Recorder. What is your name, Sir?

Chadwick. John Chadwick.

Recorder. Go on.

Chadwick. I say, this John Giles was at my house between 8 and 9 o'clock.

Recorder. Where is your house?

Chadwick. My house is ———

Recorder. Can you say any more to it?

Chadwick. No.

Elizabeth Crook.

Recorder. What have you to say?

Crook. Sir, I went with Mr. Giles home, and it was between 9 and 10 o'clock, and I saw him in his lodging, and I saw him in the morning.

Recorder. Are you sure he went to bed when you made it?

Crook. It was between 10 and 11 o'clock.

Mr. Thompson. You see how they contradict one another.

Recorder. Is your name James?

James. Yes, Sir.

Recorder. You say, you are certain you left him in the kitchen at twelve?

James. Yes, Sir.

Recorder. But here is one that says he went to bed by eleven.

James. O Lord, no, Sir.

Mr. Holt. These are your own witnesses, Mr. Giles.

Mr. Thompson. You see how they contradict one another.

Peter Powell.

Powell. My lord, I met some of my countrymen about an hour before night.

Mr. Thompson. What day?

Powell. About Thursday, Sir.

Mr. Thompson. What week was it in?

Powell. I believe in Easter week, and I heard them say that Mr. Arnold was come to town, and Mr. Herbert and he was to have an hearing the next day.

Recorder. How long was you in his company?

Powell. I had been in my friend's company about an hour before he came, and we staid till near 9 or thereabouts, and then we parted, and I never saw him afterwards till last Monday was seven-night.

Roger How.

Recorder. What say you?

How. Mr. Giles was in my company, and staid till about 9 o'clock, or thereabouts, and then we went away, and I saw him no more for that night.

Recorder. Have you any more?

Giles. No.

Then Sir George Jefferies the Recorder gave directions to the Jury to this effect:

Gentlemen of the Jury, the evidence has been very long, and I know you have taken particular care to write down and take notice of all the circumstances that have been offered to you in this case: According to the best of my memory, I shall refresh yours with such of them as I apprehend to be most material in this cause; and if any thing happen to be omitted, others will supply it.

In the first place I am to take notice, and I think I am bound to do it in discharge of my own conscience, and of my duty to the court, that certainly, if the prisoner at the bar be guilty of the offence of which he now stands indicted, the punishment that we can inflict upon him, cannot be proportionable to the offence: For the offence is too great for any punishment that the law can inflict, for men are not presumed to be guilty of such actions as this; and therefore the law has not proportioned punishments to them, because it presumes no man to be guilty of so base and barbarous an action as this; and because it never could be presumed that any man would be guilty of such offences, therefore, the law has not provided punishment proportionable to them. But this is not your question, the question before you is, Whether this man be guilty or not guilty? That there was a popish plot, no man sure doubts at this time of day. Certainly there can be none here under so strange an insatiation, as in the least to doubt but that there was a plot, especially when so many persons, upon full and clear evidence and trials, have been convicted as instruments in that bloody tragedy. But you are not to make use of these things by way of evidence against the prisoner at the bar: But only in the general to premise some things by way of introduction to their particular evidence; and I must plainly tell you (for it is fit it should be mentioned), that if any villainy can come near that horrid murder of sir Edmund-bury Godfrey, this does; and I am sorry with all my heart, that within the government of the city of London, or so near it, there should be such a barbarous attempt as this made and concealed so long. It would not be strange to hear of such villainies committed in other Popish countries: But for the honour and credit of that religion which I hope we shall maintain with our lives, that is, the Protestant religion, I say in a Protestant country, where the Protestant religion is professed, I never heard of such a barbarous act committed before this one; because our principles of our religion will not allow us to commit such villainies by any dispensation whatsoever. Justice and truth, and righteousness, are the things that our religion teaches us. God Almighty, and our blessed Saviour Jesus Christ, by whom alone all mankind must be saved, have commanded the contrary.

Their religion may dispense with such villainous actions; but this I can say in vindication of ours, ours cannot do it; nay, it would be no religion if it could.

In the next place, gentlemen, all circumstances of time and place, of men and things, should be taken notice of; for dark cases must be made appear by circumstances: for as I hinted before, no body calls witnesses when they do such facts and works of darkness, the works of the devil, that is the father of all such works. I do not mean the devil, Mr. Arnold, but I mean they are the works of the devil: Beelzebub himself, the prince of devils, can be only an instrument and an agent in affairs of this nature.

Another thing that is fit to be taken notice of by you, is this, that by way of circumstance, whatever has been said one way or another, relating to the Plot, relating to the business of air Edmundbury Godfrey, is not to be taken notice of as evidence against the prisoner. You shall have a faithful account of what has been said by every witness, both for and against him; for right is to be done. Our law comes even to a proverb, "We must give the devil his due;" we must give every body right. You know that this business was deferred, that the prisoner at the bar might be left without all manner of excuse; for if innocent, all mankind would be glad to have him cleared; if guilty, every honest man would have him convicted. Now this being premised, the evidences against the prisoner are several, and I will, as far as I can, give you an account of them. And

First of all, It is not doubted but Mr. Arnold has behaved himself like an honest man, and as every honest man ought to do for the interest of his religion; for there is no man can do too much, if he does it legally, for the preservation of his religion; of that religion which he is bound to rely upon for the salvation of his immortal soul. Now, says Mr. Arnold, in the first place he gives an honest account of his being one night, one Thursday night in Easter week, at the Devil-Tavern, about nine or ten o'clock, with some friends, and he went out between ten and eleven o'clock, and his own servant not being there, he did intend to call some other servants by; but as it happened, he went away without them, and he perceived two men in campaign-cloaks follow him into Bell-yard. He does take it upon his oath, that about the middle of the lane, there happened to be a candle coming out, and one of these two, that he did so observe to dog him, having a campaign-cloak upon him, and likewise a coat lined with red, he did observe come before him; and he doth take it upon his oath, that he does believe the prisoner at the bar to be that very man that so came before him; he does say that he had a perfect sight of him, and he does say, that the reason why he should believe him to be the man, is, that he does remember his face, and knew his voice. He tells you likewise that there were persons cast a cloak over his head, ran him into Jackanapes-Lane, fell upon him, braised his head, and wounded him in several places; particularly he mentions, that there was at the same time said by one of them, 'Pray for the soul of captain Evans;' and at the same time, which is a wonderful circumstance, 'Damn the dog, he has got armour on, cut his throat.' He says that one man held him up by the chin, having several passes made at him, and he says he had something or other to preserve him; but notwithstanding that, he was run into the side; there were three men, he does tell you, and that one overtook him in Bell-yard, and he continues to swear it was the prisoner at the bar, according to the best of his understanding and conscience; he says it was he, and he discovered him by the sight of a candle. Besides this, which is a material circumstance, some other persons being brought to Mr. Arnold about it, Mr. Arnold did not tax them, but did positively tax that person to be one of the persons. But he tells you he suffered by passion, as I cannot blame any man for being in a passion at such a time. But his witnesses determine the thing, that that is the man, and he did positively say it, his memory being better settled than he could at first pretend to; but however, he gives that for another evidence, that he was not deceived in the person. This is the substance, as I remember, I would not do any injury to the prisoner, by repeating any thing that has not been said; nor would I do any injury to the evidence for the king, in omitting any thing that occurs to me. The next is one Phillips, and he tells you that the next day, being Friday, about six or seven o'clock at night, he happened to be in company with him at an house in Covent Garden, and having some discourse concerning Arnold, and concerning that bloody, base and foul attempt that was made upon him, and was so far from having the bowels of an Englishman, or any thing of Christianity in him, that he does say he broke out into this extravagant expression, 'Damn him, rot him, he had armour on: Damn him, rot him, he had armour on: I speak it twice over, because Mr. Arnold tells you that the persons during the fact was committing, said, 'Damme, cut his throat, he has armour on.' The next person comes and tells you, at a certain place in Monmouthshire, upon the 5th of May following, that he went with one of the Richmonds to this Giles, and had some discourse: Says he, 'How chance you have not been as good as your word, about providing me horses hair to make fishing lines, and you promised to leave it at the farrier's in Gloucester?' How chance it was not so? He immediately adds, ' We were in such extraordinary haste, because we thought we were pursued about the business of Arnold.' And that he gives as the reason why he did not stay at Gloucester. If in case it had not been so, why should he come and tell him he could not stay about the business of the hair, because he was like to be pursued about the business of Arnold? The next thing, gentlemen, is concerning one Powel; Powel, he tells you, that he being at one Darcy's house, a Roman Catholic, that is a sword cutler, that lives, I think, likewise at Uske: And it seems the prisoner at the bar came to him to have his sword mended. By the way, I should have told you that the prisoner at the bar, before the fact was done, did enquire at a place where he might have a good rapier: that was before the fact was done. The witness spake of it last, which was the occasion that I did not give it you in order. He asked where he might have a good rapier?

But now to come to Darcy: Darcy having been very familiar with him, enquired, wherefore, having had his sword so lately, he should have it to mend already? ' Have you,' said he, ' been fighting with the devil?' Immediately upon that he swears the prisoner returned, ' No, but with damned Arnold.' And upon that his wife plucked him by the coat, and bid him hold his tongue. I think that is the substance of what he swears. He says there were by at that time the prisoner at the bar, the apprentice to this Darcy, and a woman that is the prisoner's wife.

William Richmond, he comes and gives you a further account, that he being in his company, he tells you, they went to some place in the city to enquire after their friends, and afterwards went to the Artillery to see the exercise, then to Long-lane, from thence to Whetstone's park, and afterwards to Drury-lane; and that about nine o'clock at night they came to their inn, and he left Giles taking a pipe of tobacco in the kitchen, and went up into his chamber with some other people, drinking and making merry; and he does positively say, that between eleven and twelve o'clock at night, he saw the servant maid come up into the room, and did see she was making the bed; that he seemed to be a little surprised that any body should make a bed at that time of night, which occasioned him to go in to her, and ask her the question. The answer that he had was very material, that she said, ' There is a gentleman below that I must make this bed for, he does not desire to have any body lie with him.' That was the answer the maid gave. There was, he says, some little talk of love between him and the maid, and that he positively says was near upon twelve o'clock. He says that after this, he went into his own chamber, and continued in his own chamber till nine o'clock; and about one being pulling off his breeches, the prisoner at the bar came and knocked at his chamber-door, and spake to him, and that was near one o'clock at night. But it is plain, during that time, the prisoner was not in his chamber, if you believe him; nor indeed is there any account given of the prisoner from nine o'clock till near one, till he knocked at his door, as he was pulling off his breeches and going to bed. As to the answers that are given by the witnesses of the other side, I shall give you them when I descend to give the testimonies of the other side.

To give you yet this further testimony, say they, We do not only give you this testimony that he is guilty of this fact, but we do give you an account of him, that he is very likely to do such a thing; for he is an ill man in himself. As on the other side, no man can give a better testimony to himself in matters that are dark and obscure, than the testimony of his conversation, that he is upright in his conversation, and therefore cannot be thought guilty of so base an action: So they think they give a good evidence against him, and that he is an ill man in himself; and therefore because he is an ill man, he may be guilty of such a thing.

And to prove that, they call up these witnesses.

First of all, one Bridges comes and gives you an account, that discoursing with him concerning the papists, he damned the Plot, and said that all were rascals that were not papists; and if in case that the lords that were in the Tower should happen to suffer, it would be a bloody day, and it would make a bloodier work in England than ever was known: Which shews he is a bloody ill man. The prisoner asked him, If he were not a papist? It is likely he was a papist before, or he would not have trusted him so. And this is one circumstance to prove that he is an ill man, that he hath given out such and such expressions.

There is another, one Reynolds, who comes and gives you an account of his having some discourse with him afterwards about this business of Mr. Arnold, that the prisoner talked slightly of it, and said that he might do it himself.

This, gentlemen, I take in general to be the substance of what has been offered for the king. If there be any thing else that does not occur to my memory, if it doth to yours, you will do well to consider of it.

Say the counsel for the defendant, and that every man of the Long Robe ought to say, that if the person, which is the prisoner at the bar, were guilty of such a barbarous thing as this, no man would offer to open his mouth. And therefore they offer evidence for their client as they are instructed to offer to you, and you are to try whether their client be guilty.

Say they, You first call one Philips to give an account; and as to what Philips says about the business in Covent-Garden, about damn him, and rot him, they bring one that was there all the time, and says he, I was by all the time, and I heard no such words. So far was he from making any particular reflections upon Mr. Arnold, that he cried it was a very horrible, a very barbarous thing. Nay, says he, to give credit to this testimony of his, I never see an keep company with them that use such words, as damn him, and rot him, as he says.

The next witness is Mr. Herbert Jones; he comes and tells you, I went with him from London, I went with him to Gloucester, I staid at an inn called the Old-Bear, and staid and dined with him there. I went after that to the New-Bear, we went thither and drank cyder together; and this was very public: For several persons that lived in the town, came to us and enquired after the business of Arnold; and if in case we had been under any such jealousy as that was, we would not have staid so long, as, says he, we did. Say they on the other side, We do not say that you did not stay in Gloucester; but, say they, by way of objection against the prisoner at the bar, we say that you yourself, on the 5th of May, said, in answer to the person that came to ask you, Why you had not brought the hair, that he might go a fishing? You said, We durst not stay for fear of pursuit upon the account of Mr. Arnold. This you yourself said, and by saying so, you have contracted that guilt in point of circumstance, which is objected by us against you. This is the answer given to that that Mr. Jones says.

The next person that comes to give you an account is one John Jones, who is the apprentice: Says he, you bring a witness against me that I said such a thing at Uske, at Darcy's the sword-cutter's, and you say the apprentice was by: And he gives you this evidence: Says he, I was by at such a time as the man speaks of, and being by at that time, I do very well remember, that there was a discourse concerning some great conflict that Mr. Giles had been in, and that Giles's wife was by, and so was the other person that gave the evidence, that such a discourse there was of fighting with the devil; but now he inverts the saying of the other man, and says that he should say, He never met with Arnold the devil. The one answers, when the thing was asked him, Whether he had been fighting with the devil? No, not with the devil, but with Arnold; the other swears, He did not meet with the devil Arnold. He tells you likewise, his wife did not pull him by the clothes, and bid him hold his tongue.

The next witness is Powel; and he gives you an account that he came with him to town: He gives you an account how he staid with him, and came along with him till 9 o'clock at night; for he does not pretend to give you an account after nine.

Then comes Crook: And Crook, that is the maid servant, she says, I cannot positively tell you when he came in, but will positively say, that I made his bed about 10, and before 11 I asked him about his candle; he bid me lock the door, and he would put out the candle himself, and she went away and left the candle. And that is very material; for the time this fact was committed was between 10 and 11; this is what the maid says: Now there is this answer to what she swears. She first of all forget that ever Richmond, that speaks concerning the breeches and other circumstances, that ever he was there at all; but you hear he has refreshed her memory with a love story, that he was in the room, and she does agree in these very circumstances he speaks of; so that that gives credit to the testimony of Richmond, and puts a disparagement upon her testimony, since she could be so exceeding forgetful, as not to remember such a circumstance.

The next is an old woman: And she swears point blank she was with him most part of the day; and that she was with him at dinner, and was with him till nine of the clock at night, and then went to bed. And though she seemed to differ and blunder in some part of her testimony, because she knew nothing of his going into Long-Lane, and other places; however, she gives an account about the time of nine o'clock, that she left him in the kitchen, and then she went to bed.

The next witness is James: And James doth positively swear, that he was drinking with him in the kitchen till past twelve o'clock at night: but that cannot be true, if the wench that made the bed swear true; for she swears she made the bed before ten, and he went to bed before eleven; so that he could not be abed before eleven, if he swears true; and he could not be in the kitchen at twelve o'clock, if she swears true.

Gentlemen, Richmond's man he gives you no farther an account than what runs square to his master's testimony; that he left him at nine o'clock at night, and he heard him call at his master's chamber about twelve, and so they punctually agree. But he gives no manner of account where he was between nine and twelve, between which hours this fact was done.

Next, gentlemen, there have been some more witnesses called for the prisoner at the bar, who gave you an account where he was before such time as he came to his lodging. Now it is not denied on either side, but that he might be till within eight at that house they speak of; but the account that is desired to be given of this matter, is to know where he was between nine o'clock and twelve, when this fact was committed.

These gentlemen, according as it occurs to me are the substantial parts of evidence, both on the one side and the other. The matter therefore resolves it within this narrow compass: If upon what you have heard from Mr. Arnold, attended with the rest of the circumstances that you have heard sworn by the witnesses, you do believe the prisoner at the bar is guilty; for he might be at his lodging at nine o'clock, and he might be at his lodging at twelve or one, and he might do this fact. For it is certain it was not a sudden matter, for it was a thing done preparedly; and therefore you must not expect that men that are guilty of such barbarous designs as this, will lay their designs open. To be sure, whoever it was did this fact upon Mr. Arnold, they would do it so as to make themselves appear as innocent as could be. It is not a matter to be relied on, that because this man was innocent in St. Martin's lane, therefore he did not do this thing in Bell-yard.

There is another circumstance against the prisoner at the bar; that he should imagine, notwithstanding all this, that Mr. Arnold had wounded himself. But when he found that that was not very probable, that a man could wound himself so, by reason of several places that he received his wounds in; he would have it, that though he did not do it himself, yet some of his friends might. Indeed if he be guilty, some of his relations might do it, but certainly he was no friend that did it. It is against nature for any man to believe that any person should put himself to so much trouble; if he had a mind to dispatch himself, he might have done it with much more ease, and not have put himself to that trouble; for men, when they have a mind to do the business, they do not use to take such a deal of pains to stab themselves here and there.

Thus, gentlemen, the evidence being very long, and the circumstances very many, things may occur to you that do not at present to me. Yet I must tell you again, in a matter of public example, the proof ought to be very great, to convict a man of such an offence; but you must not expect it should be so clear, as in a matter of right between man and man, and of things that are done in the face of the sun. It was done in the dark: The devil that set them a-work, does fill them with cunning enough to keep this attempt as concealed as may be: And therefore circumstances of this nature must be wonderfully considered; an account of which Mr. Arnold himself gives you, and he does believe in his conscience the prisoner at the bar to be the man.

The Jury withdrew, and having debated together about half an hour, returned, and brought the prisoner in Guilty.

Which done the court adjourned till the Saturday following, the 17th of July.

At which time the court being sat, John Giles was brought to the bar; to whom the right worshipful sir George Jefferies delivered himself to this effect.

Recorder. You the prisoner at the bar, you have been indicted for a very vile offence; an offence in its nature that deserves a greater punishment than the law can inflict upon any such offences. There is a jury has convicted you of this crime, against whom, had you had any objection, you might have made your challenge. And now you stand convicted here, it is only the duty of the court to pronounce that judgment against you, which they think may be reasonable to inflict upon such an offender. For I must needs say, it was one of the basest and most barbarous actions that mankind could possibly be guilty of: an action of so much filth and baseness, that the law could not foresee any man could be guilty of, and therefore hath not made provision for a punishment proportionable to it. But inasmuch as we understand by Mr. Arnold you have a charge of children, therefore the court takes some consideration: Not that they think to extend any mercy to you for your own sake, but a regard they think they are bound to have for those that have not offended. But we ought to have care to let the world know, we do not intend only a punishment to the offender, but by that to terrify all other people from being guilty of such extraordinary villainies. And because they will have regard to your posterity, therefore they do not think fit to put so great a fine upon you as this fact does deserve. But on the other side, they have thought fit you should be made an example of and that you should suffer as great a corporal punishment as the law will allow. And therefore in the name of the court I do pronounce this to be your sentence: 'That you be put in the pillory towards Lincoln's-Inn-fields, as near the place where this barbarous fact was committed as may be: And there you are to stand from the hour of twelve till one, one day, at noon day. And on another day, from the hour of twelve to one, over-against Grays-Inn in Holborn. And another day, between the same hours just by the May-pole in the Strand. These three several days you are to stand in the pillory, and to have a paper put upon your hat whereby it shall be signified the offence of which you stand convicted. And next, to deter all others from committing the like, the court does think fit likewise to award, that you should pay to the king the sum of 500*l.* and that you be committed in execution, till such time as you pay that money. And because it is both to be a punishment to you, and a terror to all other such villains, you are to find sureties for your good behaviour during life.'

Sentence being pronounced, and the prisoner removed from the bar, Richard Cavanaugh was brought to the bar, and prayed to be discharged; But was by Mr. Arnold charged with threatening one Philip Staneright, one of the king's witnesses: For which reason, and for that also a new evidence was come in against the said Cavanaugh, with some farther charge relating to Mr. Arnold's business, the court thought fit, for want of bail, to continue him a prisoner.

Then Mr. Herbert appeared, and prayed to be discharged from his recognizance to appear at the Old-Bailey: But being accused by a woman for calling her Whore, Jade, and very ill names, and holding up his staff at her, and threatening to beat her for being a witness against his friend Giles; as also for taking away her horse as she was going to the mill; and the reason was, because she was to be a witness in London against Giles. But she being a married woman and none appearing that would be bound to prosecute him for it, he was not bound over to answer it, till another complaint came in against him, which was immediately made by Mr. Ballard, and another gentleman; who charged Mr. Herbert, that in Whitsun week last upon a discourse for choosing knights of the shire for Monmouth, and the saying of one in the company, that it was thought Mr. Arnold would stand for it; Mr. Herbert should make answer, I will circumcise the other side of his cheek first; or, he must have the other side of his cheek circumcised first. Upon which the court ordered he should not be discharged, but remain bound upon the former recognizance to appear there next sessions. And the Recorder gave him several sharp reprehensions for his malicious and unmanly words and proceedings: this being the second of the king's witnesses, and a woman that he had barbarously treated; still passionately giving the reason that they were witnesses against his friend John Giles, as it was proved on oath before the court by several witnesses.

Then sir Thomas Allen acquainted the court that a gentleman had informed him the day before, that Mr. Herbert told him, that Mr. Arnold wounded himself and cut his own throat; which the court looked upon as an high effect of a malicious ingratitude; Mr. Arnold having besought his majesty, when Mr. Herbert was in Newgate to have his release. Mr. Arnold replied, that Mr. Herbert had been more ungrateful to his majesty, who had graciously pardoned him greater offences, and lately; for he had spoken worse of his majesty's person and government, than he had done of him, as it had been proved before his majesty, and of which he believed his majesty was well satisfied. The Court told Mr. Herbert, he was a shame to all Englishmen; and bound him by recognizance to appear and answer this offence at the King's-Bench bar the first day of the next term.*

* 'In obedience to an Order shewed to me, made by the right honourable the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, I have perused these papers; and according to the best of my remembrance, upon the distance of time, they do contain the substance of what passed at the Trial of Giles.

'GEO. JEFFREYS.'

269. The Trial of THOMAS THWING and MARY PRESSICKS, at York Assizes, for High Treason: * 32 CHARLES II. A. D. 1680.

Clerk of Assize. THOMAS Thwing, late of Heworth, in the county of York, clerk, and Mary Pressicks, wife of Thomas Pressicks, late of the parish of Barwick in Elmet, gent. stand indicted; for that they, as false traitors against the most illustrious and most excellent prince, king Charles the second, that now is, their natural lord; God before their eyes not having, nor their due allegiance weighing, but by the instigation of the devil being seduced and moved, the cordial love, and true and natural obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said sovereign lord the king towards his said majesty ought to bear, altogether withdrawing; and imagining, and with all their strengths, intending the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom of England to disturb, and his said majesty that now is to death and final destruction to bring and put, and the true worship of God in this kingdom of England established and used, to alter to the superstition of the church of Rome, and war against his said majesty in this kingdom of England to move and raise, and the government of this kingdom of England to subvert; the 30th day of May, in the 31st year of his majesty's reign that now is, at the parish of Barwick in Elmet aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, with divers other false traitors to the jurors unknown, did traitorously compass, imagine and intend, and every of them did compass, imagine and intend the death and final destruction of his said majesty, and the ancient government of this realm of England to change, alter, and utterly subvert, and his said majesty of the crown and rule of this kingdom to depose and wholly to deprive, and the true Protestant religion to extirpate: And to effect and accomplish their said wicked treasons, and traitorous imaginations and purposes aforesaid, the said Thomas Thwing and Mary Pressicks, and other false traitors to the jurors unknown, the said 30th day of May, in the 31st year aforesaid, with force and arms at the parish of Barwick in Elmet aforesaid, advisedly, devilishly, maliciously, and traitorously did assemble and gather themselves together, and then and there did devilishly, advisedly, maliciously, subtilly, and traitorously consult and agree, and every of them did then and there traitorously consult and agree to bring to death and final destruction our said sovereign lord the king, and to depose and deprive him of his crown and rule aforesaid, and the religion of the church of Rome into this kingdom to introduce and establish: and the sooner to fulfill and effect the said wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes aforesaid, the said Thomas Thwing and Mary Pressicks, and other false traitors to the jurors unknown, did then and there pay and expend, and every of them did then and there pay and expend divers sums of money of divers other traitors to the jurors unknown, to carry on the treasons aforesaid; and then and there the said Thomas Thwing and Mary Pressicks did subscribe, and either of them did subscribe a certain note in writing for the payment of divers sums of money for making a contribution for completing their traitorous purposes aforesaid, against the duty of their allegiances, and against the king's peace, his crown and dignity, and also against the statute in that case made and provided.

To this indictment having pleaded Not Guilty, and put themselves upon their country for trial,

Upon the 29th of July, sir Thomas Daniel, high sheriff of the county, having returned many gentlemen for jurors; the Trial proceeded thus: After the Jury called, Thomas Thwing and Mary Pressicks being brought to the bar,

Clerk of Assise. Thomas Thwing, hold up thy hand. Mary Pressicks, hold up thy hand. Which being done,

Cl. of Assise. This understand ye, that these gentlemen that are now to be sworn, are returned by the sheriff of this county, to pass between our sovereign lord the king and you for your lives; therefore if you will challenge any of them, you are to challenge them as they come to be sworn, and before they be sworn.

Cl. of Assise. Sir David Fowles, bart.

Thwing. I challenge him.

And so as they were called challenged these 25 gentlemen following, viz. John Eastoft, William Bethell, Townes Driffeild, Will. Osbaldeston, esquires; Marm. Trueman, Robert Bell, Thomas Fletcher, Thomas Wood, Thomas Faireside, Roger Fretwell, Simon Warrener, Edward Carvil, John Coates, Hugh Savil, Nivian Collins, Thomas Green, Nath. Elliotson, Nathas. Harrison, John Tomlinson, Thomas Riccaby, John Ullithorne, Thomas Hincks, William Mastin, George Ellis, Thomas Whaley, Gentlemen.

In the calling of the Jury, after several challenges made and some of the Jury sworn, Thwing spoke thus:

Thwing. My lord, I shall willingly stand to the other jury.

Just. Dolben. What jury?

Thwing. My lady Tempest's jury.*

Just. Dolben. Oh, your servant; you either are very foolish, or take me to be so.

The Jury being sworn.

Cl. of Assise. Cryer, count these. Sir George Cook, bart. Tho. Worsley, Wm. Caley, Roger Lee, Johu Dixon, George Wray, Hen. Pinckney, John Blackstone, Will. Hardcastle, Nicholas Stone, Geo. Westorby, Charles Tucker, Gentlemen.

Cryer. Twelve good men and true, stand together and hear your evidence.

Cl. of Assise. Thomas Thwing, hold up thy hand, (which he did) Mary Pressicks, hold up thy hand, (which she did). Gentlemen, you of the jury that are sworn, look upon the prisoners, and hearken to their charge: You shall understand that they stand indicted by the names of Thomas Thwing, &c. and Mary Pressicks, &c. Prout in the indictment. Upon this indictment they have been arraigned, and thereunto pleaded Not Guilty; and for their trial have put themselves upon the country, which country you are, &c.

Then Proclamation was made for evidence, and the indictment being opened, and the treasons therein aggravated by the king's council; Mr. Baron Atkyns came into the court to assist in the Trial.

The Witnesses were called; Robert Bolron was first sworn.

Bolron. My lord, in 1674, I came to live with sir Thomas Gascoigne, and was steward of his coal pits; and in 1675 I turned papist; and about January, 1676, Mr. Thwing, Father Rushton, and several others came to my house at Shippon, and did there examine me how I stood affected to the Roman Catholic religion, and whether I was resolved to venture my life and estate in it, if there were any occasion; to which I agreed, and was resolved to obey my ghostly father in all things.

Mr. Justice Dolben taking notice of a gentleman near the prisoners, demanded, What is that gentleman? We are all beset; he was one of the jury yesterday.—He being removed, Bolron proceeded.

Bolron. Father Rushton my confessor gave me the Oath of Secrecy;† and in 1677, sir T. Gascoigne, sir Miles Stapleton, Mr. Thwing the prisoner, and several other persons, met at Barnbow-hall, sir T. Gascoigne's house; and there they agreed, That in hopes the plot of killing the king would take effect, they would erect a nunnery at Dolebank; but the real intention was to have it at Heworth, within a mile of York, after the king was killed; and to avoid suspicion, my lady Tempest told them she would let them have Broughton for the present. It was there agreed, that the king should be killed;‡ and Mr. Thwing said, that if they missed this opportunity, they should never have the like again, and the effecting of it would be very beneficial to the church of Rome.

Mr. Baron Atkyns. Repeat it in the same words.

Bolron. He said, if we miss this opportunity of killing the king, we shall never have the like again; and Mr. Thwing was to be the confessor of the nunnery for the present.

Baron Atkyns. Where were these words spoken?

Bolron. In the old dining-room.

Justice Dolben. Who were present?

Bolron. Sir Miles Stapleton, sir T. Gascoigne,

* See the Trial of sir Thomas Gascoigne, ante, p. 980.

† Note, That upon sir T. Gascoigne's Trial it appeared in his Almanack, that he had made this Memorial there with his own hand (viz: "The 15th of April 1676, memorand. acquaint Mr. T. Thwing with the whole design.")

* This lady Tempest was probably the daughter of sir Thomas Gascoigne. See his Case, ante, p. 980. No report of her Trial has been found.

my lady Tempest, Mr. Thwing, Mr. Rushton, and some others.

Justice Dolben. Was it agreed that the king should be killed?

Bolton. It was, my lord.

Baron Atkyns. Consider seriously, you speak in the presence of God, and of a great assembly; and that a person's life is at stake: Tell it again, what were the words.

Bolton. It was agreed that the king should be killed, and that it was for the good of the catholic religion; and I paid 10*l.* to Mr. Rushton in Mr. Thwing's presence, towards killing the king, and saw a list in Mr. Rushton's and Mr. Thwing's hands, of the names of several that engaged for promoting the Roman Catholic religion; which was to be by killing the king.

Baron Atkyns. Was it a List of those that were to kill the king?

Bolton. The List I saw was of money raised to kill the king.

Baron Atkyns. What was the title of that List?

Bolton. A List of the Names of the Actors and Contributors, engaged in the design of promoting the Roman Catholic religion, and also of establishing a Nunnery; which was raising money for the killing of the king. And besides the 10*l.* I paid towards it, I paid 5*l.* to have my soul prayed for. Thwing told me afterwards at my house, that in Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Derbyshire, 30,000*l.* was raised for the killing of the king; and that the List was sent beyond sea.

Justice Dolben. What can you say against the woman?

Bolton. Mrs. Presicks told me, That in 1678, presently after the plot was discovered, she being in London, did hear a woman cry after her, Stop the Papist, Stop the Plotter; but she got away, and afterwards durst not appear publicly in London. I had discourse with her at my house about the Plot; and she told me, That Father Harcourt was her confessor, and first engaged her in it; and that Pickering told her, that he was to have killed the king, and she said she was sorry she did not do it; and that Oates and Bellow were two rogues, and the Plot had not been discovered but for them, who were the cause of so much mischief. And she further told me, that the gun wherewith he was to have killed the king, was found with Pickering, and she did believe that was the cause of his losing his life: And she said, The king was an ass and not fit to govern; that what money the parliament gave him he spent upon whores and concubines.

Justice Dolben. Well, is this all you have against her?

Bolton. Yes, my lord.

Justice Dolben. He hath done; you may cross-examine him, if you will.

Thwing. Who was at your house when I was there?

Bolton. Father Rushton.

Thwing. How often was I there?

Bolton. Several times, I know not how often.

Thwing. When was it you accused me first of the plot?

Bolton. When I went to the council I accused him.

Thwing. He did not accuse me of the plot in several months.

Sir Tho. Stringer. Come, Mr. Mowbray, tell your knowledge.

Mr. Mowbray was sworn.

Mr. Mowbray. My lord, what I have to say is only against Mr. Thwing. At an assembly of divers priests at Barnbow-hall, amongst the rest there were Father Rushton and Mr. Thwing; and there they determined to kill the king.

Baron Atkyns. When was this?

Mowbray. This was near Michaelmas 1676, and they declared it was not only lawful, but meritorious to do it: They also declared, That London and York were to be fired; and that force was to be made use of against the king, and all other heretics that should oppose the advancement of their religion: And Mr. Thwing and Rushton declared, the king was an heretic, and excommunicated by the Pope, and had not kept his promise with the Jesuits to bring in their religion, and therefore deserved to be killed, and it was not only lawful but meritorious so to do.

Mr. Belwood, of council for the king. Was there not a List?

Mowbray. Yes, a List of those engaged in the design of killing the king, and of promoting the catholic religion: And it was declared the king should be killed, because he had not kept his promise made to the Jesuits when he was beyond sea.

Justice Dolben. Did the prisoner declare it?

Mowbray. Mr. Thwing declared it, and Rushton and he managed it.

Thwing. Who was there?

Mowbray. It was at Father Rushton's chamber that I saw you, and there was another Thwing there, and also Addison a priest.

Thwing. I went once or twice a year to Mr. Thomas Gascoigne's, and thought it my duty to wait on him; and that I might without offence do it, he being my uncle.

Just. Dolben. No, the offence is Plotting.

Sir T. Stringer. Mr. Thwing, do you know Rushton?

Thwing. Yes; but I had no great acquaintance with him.

Sir T. Stringer. Mr. Mowbray, how came you to be intrusted in so great a business?

Mowbray. I assisted Father Rushton at the altar at mass; and so came into great favour with him, and was permitted to be in his chamber when the priests were in private with him.

Sir T. Stringer. Mr. Mowbray, did you take an oath of secrecy?

Mowbray. Yes, I took it from Father Rushton.

Thwing. How long since did you change your religion?

Mowbray. Presently after the Plot broke out.

Thwing. Who were you examined before first of all?

Mowbray. Before Mr. Lowther, and Mr. Tindal.

Just. Dolben. Did you at the first accuse him?

Mowbray. I only charged sir T. Gascoigne, esq. Gascoigne, my lady Tenpest, sir Miles Stapleton, and Father Rushton in my first; and in my second deposition I accused Mr. Thwing, and that was before justice Warcup.

Bar. Atkyns. Did Thwing abscond at the first?

Mowbray. He was apprehended at the same time sir Thomas Gascoigne was apprehended, and at his house.

Just. Dolben. Well, what say you to Mary Pressicks?

Mowbray. My lord, I have nothing to say against her.

Just. Dolben. Mr. Thwing, you have heard the evidence, what do you say for yourself?

Thwing. I shall produce witnesses I was never with him at Barnbow: First, I shall shew he never mentioned me when he first mentioned the Plot; and he never said any thing against me, when he accused sir Thomas Gascoigne before Mr. Lowther and Mr. Tindal.

But Mr. Bonithen, of Counsel for the king, offering other witnesses for the king against Mrs. Pressicks, they were called, viz. Mrs. Bolron sen. Mrs. Bolron jun. and John Hutchinson.

Mrs. Bolron sen. sworn.

Just. Dolben. What do you know of Pressicks, the prisoner at the bar?

Mrs. Bolron sen. My lord, she said she knew of the Plot, and that Pickering was to have killed the king.

Mr. Bonithen. Do you mean shoot the king?

Mrs. Bolron sen. Yes, I do.

Just. Dolben. Where did she tell you this?

Mrs. Bolron sen. At Shippon, my lord.

Just. Dolben. At his house? [pointing to Mr. Bolron.]

Mrs. Bolron sen. Yes, and she said that she was very sorry that Pickering did not do it, and that he had done it if it had not been for Oates, and Bedloe.

Just. Dolben. Was this the very same time that Mr. Bolron speaks of?

Mrs. Bolron sen. Yes, my lord; and she said there would never be quiet in England until the Roman Catholics had got the upper hand, and there was not a protestant left in England: And she said, The king spent his money amongst his concubines, and his other women, so that he was not worthy to be king, and she hoped an army of catholics would be raised to set up popery.

Just. Dolben. That is, indeed, the principle of the papists, and according to it, within 40 years past they murdered 300,000 innocent protestants in Ireland. Did she say it often?

Mrs. Bolron sen. Yes, several times, more than once or twice.

Mrs. Bolron jun. was then sworn and examined.

Mrs. Bolron jun. I heard her say, There was a conspiracy carrying on about altering the government, and establishing the Roman Catholic religion.

Just. Dolben. Where heard you this?

Mrs. Bolron jun. In my husband's house.

Bar. Atkyns. And what were her hopes in the conspiracy?

Mrs. Bolron jun. My lord, I cannot tell.

Mrs. Pressicks. I ask Mr. Bolron when we had this discourse?

Mr. Bolron. At several times; about Candlemas 1678, and at Easter and Whitsuntide, and several times after the Plot was discovered, we discoursed it several times at the porch at my house.

Just. Dolben. Who was present?

Mr. Bolron. My grandmother.

Just. Dolben. Where was it, old woman, that you heard these words?

Mrs. Bolron sen. At Shippon, in the Hall-porch, my lord.

Mrs. Pressicks. Had we any discourse about sir Thomas?

Mrs. Bolron sen. None.

John Hutchinson was then sworn.

Just. Dolben. Do you know any thing concerning Mrs. Pressicks?

Hutchinson. May it please you, my lord, I came to Mr. Bolron's house, and Mrs. Pressicks asked me what news in our country, and what became of the papists? I told her some had given bond, and some were gone to prison: Then she said, We shall never be at peace until we are all of the Roman Catholic religion; for the king is an heretic, and spends more money upon his whores than upon his queen, and we shall never be at quiet until the duke of York is king.

Just. Dolben. What say you to this? You have seen him?

Mrs. Pressicks. I never saw him but twice there.

Just. Dolben. Where was she when she said this?

Hutchinson. She first talked with me in the kitchen, and at the ball door, as she was just going into the parlour: she told me, that we should never be at quiet until the duke of York was made king.

Just. Dolben. Mr. Bolron, when came she to your house?

Bolron. She came to our house about Christmas, and staid about six months there.

Just. Dolben. Six months in your house? Then you are well enough acquainted with her?

Bolron. Yes, my lord.

Just. Dolben. Did you charge Mr. Thwing before the justice?

Bolron. My lord, I gave justice Tindal only a short note, that sir T. Gascoigne promised me 1,000*l.* to kill the king: But what I had to say against Thwing, I gave to the king and council.

Thwing. My lord, this is malice to sir T. Gascoigne's family, to which I am related, it is out of revenge.

Just. Dolben. It was a family-quarrel then?

Thwing. Yes, my lord, this I can prove by several witnesses.

Just. Dolben. Call your witnesses then.

Thwing. Nathaniel Wilson.

Just. Dolben. Mr. Babington, why don't you appear? We know well enough that you are solicitor in the cause; call your witnesses.

Then Nathaniel Wilson was examined.

Just. Dolben. Come, what is it you have to say?

Wilson. I went to Bolron to look on a cow that he had gifted for his cousin Bargues, and desired to have the cow away, but he would not let me have her without paying for her gift; so I tendered him his money, and we went to talk in the house, and Bolron sent for a groat's worth of ale, and asked me if I could tell any thing of father Rushton, and I told him I could not; and he bid me keep his secrets, and he would give me more than I could addle, (that is, earn) in seven years: And he said, unless he could shed the blood of some of them, he should get nothing.

Just. Dolben. When was this?

Wilson. This was about next Michaelmas a twelve-month.

Just. Dolben. This is quite other than you told yesterday.

[Wilson was a witness the day before for the lady Tempest.]

Wilson. I had not time.

Thwing. I desire to know, whether Bolron named me to Mr. Lowther as a plotter.

Then Mr. Lowther was called.

Mr. Lowther. I do not remember that Mr. Bolron named Mr. Thwing to me when he was before me.

Just. Dolben. When did he come to make the discovery to you? Give an account of it?

Lowther. I think it was the 24th or 25th of June 1679, that he came to me; and he told me he had some secrets to impart to me: And he began to tell me a story of the Jesuits and priests, what they designed against the government, because the king did not keep his word with them when he was beyond sea: And then I called for my man and a bible to take his examination, and said Pray, friend, be very careful what you do, for here your own concern is at stake, as well as the lives and fortunes of the gentlemen you speak against; and upon that he began to be very fearful and timorous, and looked pale: Whereupon I asked him, what that fear was for? It is, said he, because I have concealed it so long; and if that were upon you, it may be you would be as fearful as I am. Then I was going to take his information, and he said, I have done it before to Mr. Tindal. Why came you to me, then? said I. He said,

VOL. VII.

Mr. Tindal desired it: Well, said I, Mr. Tindal and I are to meet to-morrow, and we will do it jointly.

Just. Dolben. Did he say he told you all he knew?

Lowther. He did not name Thwing, but said he would recollect more, and would go to London and give it in to the king and council: And then I said, why may not we take it here as well as trouble them at London?

Just. Dolben. It may be, he thought it better to do it there.

Mrs. Pressicks. He did not accuse me before Mr. Lowther.

Bolron. Yes, my lord, I did, and had a warrant to take her.

Lowther. She was taken the same day sir T. Gascoigne was taken.

Just. Dolben. We will be just between you.

Then the prisoners called Obadiah Moor.

Just. Dolben. Come, tell your knowledge in this business.

Moor. I say, that Mr. Bolron said, that sir T. Gascoigne was not concerned in the Plot, nor none of his family; and that he believed there was no Plot.

Just. Dolben. When was this?

Moor. This was about Candlemas was twelve months.

Just. Dolben. He was then a papist: But did he not tell you otherwise afterwards?

Moor. In August after he told me he had but equivocated with me in what he said before, and that there was a real Plot; and if he had sworn a thousand lies, he could have been forgiven them.

Then Stephen Thompson was called and examined.

Thompson. Mr. Bolron was servant to sir T. Gascoigne, and being in his debt, sir Thomas did arrest him, and he agreed with sir Thomas to give him 60*l.* and got me to be bound with him: And when the Plot came out, I thought Bolron being his servant, might know whether sir Thomas had any hand in it; and if so, that we were in no danger of being sued; and I enquired of Bolron, and he said, 'Sir Thomas was as sinless of it as the child that was unborn.' And on Holy Thursday I went to him, and got him out on the backside to sir Thomas's, and all along he told me, if he sued him he would do him a greater mischief: And I pleaded earnestly with sir Thomas not to sue the bond, and he said he would have his money, but would stay a fortnight; and I prevailed with him to give three weeks time, that Bolron might go to sell his house at Newcastle, and in that time he went to London and accused him of treason: And as to Mrs. Pressicks, I asked his grandmother what she could say against her, and she said, Alas, alas, I can say nothing to it, but Bolron said she must say so and so.

Just. Dolben. What mean you, friend, by so and so.

Thompson. It was about sir Edmundbury

Godfrey, and that the king was an whoremaster, and such things.

Then Zachary Thorpe was called and examined.

Thorpe. I met with Mr. Bolron in Long-acre before the last assizes, and asked him concerning sir T. Gascoigne my countryman, and he said he was cleared, but, God damn the jury they were rogues. Then he asked me if I had read Harris's Intelligence of that day, and I told him Yes; and he then asked me if I had seen his wife's name in it? He then told me, that he was going down to the assizes at York against my lady Tempest, and said, God damp me, I will ruin them; if one thing will not do't, another shall.

Just. Dolben. What are you? God damn me comes very nimbly out of your mouth.

Thorpe. I live at the White-hart in Charter-house-lane, with the gentleman of the house; I married his daughter.

Just. Dolben. And draw pots of ale, that is your trade? How comes Bolron to talk thus to you? Is he so mad a fellow to talk thus to every one? This is not likely that he should thus accuse himself to you: Your father in law is a poor ale-housekeeper?

Bar. Atkyns. Are not you a papist?

Thorpe. No my lord, a Protestant of the church of England.

Just. Dolben. Have you never been in Newgate? Your lane is full of such people, and your house suspected.

Thorpe. No, my lord.

Just. Dolben. Come, have you done?

Thorpe. Bolron came to my lodgings at the Plough on Holborn-hill before the last assizes, and told me, if I would swear that Peter Shipton knew no harm by Bolron, he would do any thing for me.

Just. Dolben. This is a fable, for Bolron bound Shipton over at the sessions before the last assizes.

Bolron. Yes, my lord, it was for scandalous words against his majesty.

Thorpe. He asked me what Shipton was. I answered, he is an honest man for aught that I know: I have taken his own bond, said Bolron, but I will have him from court to court, I will teach him to meddle with me.

Just. Dolben. How came he to speak to thee?

Thorpe. I know not why, but it was his discourse to me.

Bar. Atkyns. What acquaintance was there between you?

Thorpe. I have seen him several times in Yorkshire.

Just. Dolben. You live in Charterhouse-lane; How came you together in Long-acre?

Thorpe. I met him accidentally in the street.

Just. Dolben. It is a wonderful thing, that he should meet one in the street with whom he had very small acquaintance, and discover such things to him, as he did to you.

Then William Hardwick was examined.

Hardwick. I was to carry Mrs. Pressicks before Justice Lowther, and Bolron's wife said she was sorry for it, for she believed her to be an honest woman, and had been a good neighbour amongst them.

Baron Atkyns. Who was sorry?

Hardwick. Mrs. Bolron.

Baron Atkyns. What did Bolron himself say?

Hardwick. He said nothing to me, he was in another room with his grandmother.

[Justice Dolben taking notice of Thwing's speaking to Mr. Hobart, demanded what he said.]

Hobart. My lord, he asked me, whether Bolron did not say that sir T. Gascoigne offered him 1,000*l*. I only say that he swore at sir T. Gascoigne's trial.

Justice Dolben. How doth it appear what he swore there?

Bolron. I acquainted Mr. Lowther and Mr. Tindal with it.

Mary Walker was called.

Justice Dolben. Mary Walker, what do you say?

Walker. Robert Bolron came after Mr. Thwing was taken prisoner, to my mistress's.

Justice Dolben. Who is your mistress?

Walker. Mrs. Lassell; and he asked me if I knew Mr. Thwing to be a priest, and I told him, No, my lord; he told me that if I would swear that he was a priest, he would give me 10*l*. for he would be revenged of him for sir T. Gascoigne's cause; for he was near of kin to him, and he proffered me 10*l*. again.

Bolron. Where were you, you were not here yesterday?

Walker. I was in the Court yesterday.

Justice Dolben. Where spoke he this?

Walker. At Mrs. Lassell's.

Sir T. Stringer. My lord, he was then searching for priests at that house, and it is improbable that he should endeavour at that time to suborn Thwing's sister's servant.

Baron Atkyns. Is Mrs. Lassell of kin to Mr. Thwing?

Walker. Yes, my lord.

Justice Dolben. Who can believe he would come to Thwing's sister's house, to suborn her servant to be a witness against Mr. Thwing?

Walker. Yes, my lord, I have witness of it, both a man and a woman.

Justice Dolben. Where are they?

Walker. In town.

Justice Dolben. That makes it more improbable that he would offer you 10*l*. in the presence of two witnesses to swear that Mr. Thwing was a priest.

Sir T. Stringer. Let us ask her a question: Whether are you a Papist or no?

Walker. Yes, I am a Catholic.

Sir T. Stringer. Since it must be probable, that he would ask you such a thing, and knew you to be a Papist; is Thwing a priest or no?

Walker. No, marry, is he not.

Sir T. Stringer. Have you not heard him say mass?

Walker. No, if I were to die.

Justice Dolben. Indeed you are an excellent witness.

Mr. Legget, one of the King's Messengers, produced as a Witness by the Prisoners, was next examined.

Legget. In August last, Mr. Bolron told me, he would call his grandmother in, and examine her before me; and he then asked her, if she did not say, that she knew such and such things? And she said she could not tell, but if she did, it was true.

Baron Atkyns. What was it he asked her?

Legget. About Harcourt, and I know not what; I took little notice of it, it seemed to be a thing so idle, that I went away: And meeting me afterwards, said, You thought my grandmother knew nothing, but at the bar, when sir T. Gascoigne was tried, they said they never heard one swear a thing more plainly.

Justice Dolben. Legget, did not you desire money yesterday of the clerk of the assizes as a witness for the king?

Legget. Yes, my lord.

Justice Dolben. Did you so? You are a fine fellow.

Then one William Bacchus was examined.

Bacchus. All that I can say, is, That I served a warrant upon Mrs. Bolron to go before squire Lowther, and Bolron's wife and grandmother said, they could say nothing against sir T. Gascoigne, nor any of the family.

Justice Dolben. Well, they say nothing against them now, but what did she say against Mrs. Pressicks?

Bacchus. She said that Mary Pressicks should say that the king was an whoremaster, and maintained his whores better than he did the queen.

Cuthbert Hamsworth was then called.

Hamsworth being produced as a witness for sir T. Gascoigne, owned that he had been a Papist.

Hamsworth. My lord, Robert Bolron did swear revenge against my lady Tempest, for prosecuting a suit against him.

Justice Dolben. What is that to the matter in hand? Do you know that he swore revenge against Thwing and Pressicks?

Hamsworth. No, my lord.

Baron Atkyns (to the prisoners.) What have you more to say?

Thwing. My lord, he saith, I was at Barmbow Hall, 1677, I have witnesses to prove otherwise.

Baron Atkyns. Call them then.

George Twisley, Groom to Sir Thomas Gascoigne.

Twisley. Mr. Thwing was never at our house above a night or two in the year.

Justice Dolben. Whose house is yours?

Twisley. Sir T. Gascoigne's.

Justice Dolben. He was there but a night or two at a time?

Twisley. No, and please your lordship.

Justice Dolben. But was he there in 1677?

Twisley. About a year or two since, I saw him there.

Justice Dolben. But how often in a twelve-month's time?

Twisley. Not above once or twice.

Baron Atkyns. Did you never go out of your master's house in 1677?

Twisley. I have, my lord, but I was there both night and morning.

Baron Atkyns. How do you know but he might be there in the time that you were not there?

Bolron. And please your lordship, this man was but the groom.

Twisley. I was the groom, my lord, and took the horses.

Justice Dolben. But were you never absent?

Twisley. No, my lord, and he was not there above once or twice in the year.

Thwing. Ask him what company was then there?

Twisley. No company at all, my lord, when he was there.

Justice Dolben. Was not he there about Easter?

Twisley. No, not that I know of.

Justice Dolben. What time of the year was he there?

Twisley. About Michaelmas, not Easter.

Bar. Atkyns. How came you to take such particular notice at what time men come? Did you take an account of all the gentlemen that came to sir Thomas's house, how often there, and when they came?

Twisley. There were none that stayed any time when they came thither.

Bar. Atkyns. What time of the year was he there?

Twisley. It was a month before Michaelmas.

Just. Dolben. You bring witnesses to stretch things even to impossibilities.

Bolron. He was drunk, my lord, at Leeds the same night the consult was.

Sir Thomas Stringer. Will you speak truth before Almighty God?

Twisley. Yes.

Sir Thomas Stringer. Pray, then, are you a papist?

Twisley. No.

Sir Thomas Stringer. Were you never a papist?

Twisley. Yes.

Sir T. Stringer. Have you heard mass at sir Thomas Gascoigne's when you were a papist?

Twisley. No.

Sir T. Stringer. That is very strange, that you lived there and never heard mass, and yet were a papist.

Twisley. Yes, I heard mass in his house, but not by this man.

Sir T. Stringer. How long have you been turned protestant?

Twisley. About two years.

Thwing. Thomas Arcton. Did you ever see me at Barmbow-Hall?

Arcton. I have nothing for nor against him, I never saw him before in my life.

Thwing. Mr. Mowbray hath declared he never knew any thing of the plot.

Just. Dolben. To whom did he declare it?

Thwing. There is witness of it, my lord.

Just. Dolben. Call them.

Thwing. He accused not me of the plot.

Just. Dolben. He was no protestant then.

Thwing. I never knew any thing of the plot until I came from London.

Just. Dolben. Well, if you have any more witnesses, call them.

Thwing. Mr. Cooper.

Joseph Cooper. I have nothing to say in this business about this gentleman, it is concerning sir T. Gascoigne.

Thwing. Yes, he declared before these witnesses he knew nothing of the plot.

Cooper. We were coming from Atherton fair, and my father began to discourse with Mr. Mowbray, and asked him if he knew any thing of the plot that sir Thomas was called to London for; he said, he knew nothing of the plot, and he thought sir Thomas was guilty of no such thing; for, if he had, he should have known it as soon as Bolron, and he was a rogue and a knave for saying any such thing.

Just. Dolben. When was this?

Cooper. It was about this time twelvemonth.

Just. Dolben. Were you upon the road then?

Cooper. Yes.

Sir T. Stringer. Had Mowbray then made any discovery of the plot?

Cooper. Yes, that was the reason we asked him about it.

Just. Dolben. Yesterday (upon lady Tempest's trial) you said, that Mowbray had not then made any discovery.

Cooper. Yes, my lord, I mean Bolron.

Just. Dolben. Really, methinks, you that are priests should be more dextrous; my lady Tempest managed her business much better, and had her witnesses in more readiness.

Thwing. My lord, I call upon the witnesses and they will not come in, I cannot help it.

Edward Cooper, senior, was then called.

Edward Cooper. I know nothing; I met Mr. Mowbray coming from Atherton fair, and he said, he thought sir Thomas was not guilty of the plot.

Thwing. Mr. Mowbray declared for eight or ten months together in 1677, he knew nothing of the plot. Call Mr. Hobart.

Hobart. I know nothing of it.

Thwing. I am innocent, I know nothing, as I hope for salvation.

Then Isabel Heyward, a girl that lived with Bolron as a servant, was called.

Isabel Heyward. My master and mistress fell out about going to London, and she said, she would not go, and he said he would make her go; and she said, if he did, she would swear that what he had sworn against Mrs. Pressicks was out of malice.

Alice Dawson was next examined.

Alice Dawson. The day after New Year's-day was twelve-months, Mrs. Bolron said, she was sorry for nothing but that her husband had meddled with Mrs. Pressicks.

Then Mrs. Pressicks called for John Pepper.

Just. Dolben. What do you say to him, mistress?

Pressicks. I ask about my going to Parlington at Whitsuntide.

Just. Dolben. No, it was at Candlemas, and they said it was cold weather to sit in the hall-porch.

Pressicks. It was also said at Whitsuntide.

John Pepper. About Whitsun Monday, my lord, I went to Barmbow, and met there with Mr. Pressicks and Mrs. Pressicks; and he desired me to tarry and carry his wife to Mrs. Harrison's, at Parlington, and she and I went down to Shipton, and carried her from Bolron's on Whitsun-Monday, and staid till Thursday.

Just. Dolben. And what is all this to the purpose? She was, however, as it was sworn against her, at Shipton at Whitsuntide.

Pepper. This is all I can say, my lord.

Zachary Thorpe was again called by Thwing.

Thorpe. Bolron said, he was going to swear against my lady Tempest, and if one thing would not do, another should, and would have had me to give evidence against Shipton.

Mrs. Baynes (mother to Mr. Bolron) called.

Bar. Athyns. What do you say, Mrs. Baynes?

Mrs. Baynes. Indeed, my lord, I know nothing of this, I know not Thorpe, Shipton I know, and he told me; that if he had not fallen into my lord of Shrewsbury's service, he and Thorpe would have turned highwaymen.

Mr. Babbington called by Pressicks.

Just. Dolben. Can you say any thing for Mr. Pressicks?

Babbington. I can say nothing, but what I said yesterday concerning sir T. Gascoigne.

Just. Dolben. Can you say any thing for Pressicks?

Babbington. No, my lord; I can say nothing for Mrs. Pressicks; yes, thus much I must say, that when I came to have the writings sealed by Bolron, his wife refused to seal them without delivering up of the bonds. I told her, it would be an additional security to sir T. Gascoigne; he said he did believe, that Mr. Pressicks and his wife were his enemies, and that they did instigate sir Thomas to sue him.

Just. Dolben (to Thwing). Come, what have you more to say?

Thwing. I have no witnesses to call, but I hope it will be considered what kind of witnesses these are, what lives they have led; they bring me in amongst the rest, we are all of a family; I hope, my lord, you will consider that those ill men that will, may take away an honest man's life unjustly.

Just. Dolben. I hear nobody speak against their lives; and this I must tell you, till men be convicted of some crime that may disable them, you cannot take away their testimony.

Thwing. My lord, witnesses should be men of credit and reputation.

Just. Dolben. The jury is to consider of that.

Look you, gentlemen, these two prisoners stand indicted of high-treason, and it is for conspiring the death of the king, and other heinous crimes; as designing the subverting the government, and bringing in the popish religion. Now, the witnesses that have been produced against Mr. Thwing, are Bolron and Mowbray; and against Pressicks, Mr. Bolron, Mrs. Bolron sen. and jun. and one Hutchinson; and the evidence against Thwing is one thing, and against the woman quite another; there is no evidence against her but what they heard her say others were to do; there is no evidence of any action of hers, or that she was present at any consultation, nor acting any thing there, but that she said so and so. Now Mr. Bolron and his grandmother do both say, that she said Pickering was to have killed the king, and that she was sorry that he did not do it. That the gun with which he should have done it was found, and she was afraid that was the cause of his death; and they all say she said, that it would never be well with England, till the Catholics had got the upper hand, and the duke of York were king. Now I must tell you, that my opinion is, that a bare saying of this doth not amount to high-treason, unless you do believe from these words, that she knew otherwise than by hearsay, that Pickering was to have killed the king, and that she was privy and consenting to the design of killing the king, then she is guilty of treason; but if she only knew it by hearsay, the bare knowledge and concealing of it will make her guilty of misprision of treason; but knowing of it barely by report doth not make her guilty of high-treason. My brother will tell you his opinion herein. Now for Mr. Thwing, the evidence against him is very home, for they both swear against him, one to one meeting, and the other to another, that he was present at their consultation to kill the king, subvert the government, and to bring in the popish religion; that he did agree at the meeting to the killing of the king, they do both swear, and this they say was at sir T. Gascoigne's, and that at the several meetings there was a list produced; but Bolron saith, that the list when he was present was a list of those that were engaged towards the carrying on of the nunnery; that which the other speaks of, was a list of those that were engaged about the killing the king, about the whole design which was to be effected by killing the king, this he swears, that Thwing did produce this list; and Mowbray saith, that three or four priests were present at that time, and that Thwing said the king was an heretic, and excommunicated by the pope, and that it was not only lawful but meritorious to kill him. So that admitting this evidence be true, it is a full evidence of high-treason against him; here is an imagining the death of the king, and here is an overt-act, here is a setting hands to it; so that if this be true, Thwing is guilty of high-treason. Now against this they have produced many witnesses, and none of them doth go about to prove this impossible, but only improbable; but one that is a groom of sir T. Gascoigne's, who saith, he was but once or twice that year there, and not at Easter, but about Michaelmas: is that enough to answer the testimony of these two men, gentlemen? For a groom to take upon him to say two years after, who was at his master's house, and how often, and what time of the year, is to me a very strange thing; unless it were one that never used to come there: but this man, he saith, did use to come there—but that I must leave to you. The rest of the witnesses were the same that were examined yesterday. First, they insist concerning Mr. Lowther, they say, that when Mr. Bolron first went to Mr. Lowther, he said nothing of Mr. Thwing, but it appears, he said then, that afterwards he might remember more; then the man was under a great consternation, and told him the great and dangerous consequences of having so long concealed it, was the occasion of that disorder upon him; but he said he should remember more afterwards, and so he did: the rest of the witnesses do all go to this purpose, that either Bolron or Mowbray should tell them at one time or other, they did know nothing of the Plot, nor against sir T. Gascoigne; and some of them say, that it is out of malice to sir Thomas's family; for so Thwing would have it, he being his nephew, that the malice should reach to Mr. Thwing, that they would have it; and something to the same purpose they do offer against Mr. Mowbray. Now here is one Walker, that swears, that Bolron asked her if she knew Thwing to be a priest, and offered her 10*l*. to swear him a priest; she is a servant of one Mrs. Lassell, Mr. Thwing's sister, he came to Mrs. Lassell's, to search for priests; it is something strange, that he should offer to persuade her to swear against Thwing, who was a servant to his own sister, and at the time when he came to search for priests; the truth of it is, the thing doth depend purely upon the credit of witnesses. The king's witnesses are upon their oaths; but, on the other hand, the others are not on their oaths; but credit is to be given to what they say, if you consider their evidence, and do find a clearness in their testimony, which you must weigh; for certainly he that solemnly, in the presence of God, will say a false thing, will also dare to swear it; how far their principles will carry them I know not, I can see nothing but Bolron and Mowbray are good witnesses; I do not see but what they say is coherent, and that they speak the truth; and if you believe what they say to be true, then Thwing is guilty of high-treason: but if you do not believe what they say is true, but out of malice, you must acquit him. They do object the other juries did not believe Bolron and Mowbray; the case with the prisoners at the bar is not the same with theirs; but you are to give your verdict according to the evidence that you have heard, and according to your consciences.

Mr. Baron Atkyns. Gentlemen of the jury, I shall be very short. The crimes that are laid in this indictment, and charged upon these persons, are, the designing to take away the king's life; subverting the government, and introducing popery; you observe the nature of the evidence which hath been given against the prisoners. And first, I shall speak but one word concerning Mary Pressicks: I do fully agree with what my brother hath said; you do take notice, that the evidence that hath been given against her, hath been what came out of her own mouth; the witnesses are Mr. Bolron and his grandmother, and likewise one Hutchinson: Mr. Bolron saith she did tell him, that Harcourt was her confessor, and that he had engaged her in the Plot; she likewise told him, that Pickering was to kill the king, that the gun was found with him, and was the cause of his death: this is some evidence of high-treason, I must leave it to you of what weight it is, and how far by this you will conclude her privy to the Plot; it is true, were she an actor in it, it is plain she is guilty of high-treason. As to what Hutchinson said, that she told him we should never be at peace till we were all of the Roman Catholic religion, and the duke of York was made king, that will not amount to high-treason: this I take to be the sum of the evidence against her. Then as to Mr. Thwing, there are two witnesses that have sworn against him, that is Mr. Bolron and Mr. Mowbray: Bolron tells you, that in 1677, there came to him several priests; to his house at Shipton; and amongst the rest Thwing the prisoner, who asked him, how he stood affected to the Roman Catholic religion? And he then expressed his zeal for it, and they thought him a person fit to impart their secrets to: then he saith, that in 1677, there was a meeting at Barmbow-hall, which is sir T. Gascoigne's house, and at that meeting there were sir T. Gascoigne, esq. Gascoigne, sir Miles Stapleton, and amongst the rest this prisoner Thwing; and that there was a consult held at that time, and design of killing the king; and that this person did agree to it, and declared that if they should miss that opportunity, they should never have such another; and that it was for the good of the Roman Catholic religion. The next was Mowbray; and he saith to the same effect: that in 1676, Thwing and others declared they did design to kill the king, for he was a heretic, and excommunicated, and had not kept his word with the jesuits, and therefore they thought it not only lawful, but a meritorious act: and this is what both Bolron and Mowbray do testify, this they swear positively against the prisoner; if you believe what they have sworn to be true, I must declare that it will amount to high-treason. You are likewise to consider the evidence he hath produced for himself: the law, it is true, does not allow us to give them an oath; yet if they be persons of credit and honesty, it is evidence which you are to consider of. The prisoner hath called several witnesses: the first was Nat. Wilson; I shall not repeat what he saith, being of no import. Thwing saith, Mr. Bolron was before Mr. Lowther and Mr. Tindal, two justices of peace, who did take his oath; and then he said he did not accuse him of the Plot at that time, and by that would infer, that he would have said what he had against him, as well then as now, if he had any thing whereof to accuse him; but Bolron answers, he did declare to these two gentlemen, he was not able at that time to recollect his whole knowledge, but gave it in afterwards to the king and council. The next are Moor and Thorpe: the effect of their evidence is to strike at the reputation of Bolron, that it was an act of malice and revenge: for they say, that Bolron told them, that sir Thomas was innocent, and knew nothing of the Plot. Thorpe saith, he met with Bolron in Long-Acre, and that he told him, that though sir Thomas were quitted, he would ruin some of them. I say, these things, if true, are some evidence of a malicious prosecution: but it seems something improbable, that Bolron should so openly make a discovery of himself, when it appears he was not greatly acquainted with them, especially with Thorpe. There are several other witnesses that speak much to the same purpose. Gentlemen, in matters of fact, which depend upon the testimony of witnesses, the credit of the witnesses is greatly to be considered; if you believe what Bolron and Mowbray have both positively sworn, the treason is plain; you must take all the parts of your evidence together, you must weigh all the circumstances, you must, as I said before, consider the credit of the witnesses of the one side and of the other, and by these steps you will be the better guided in giving of your verdict. I must leave it to you, and I pray God direct you therein.

The Jury having withdrawn, after some consultation together, brought in their verdict, that Thomas Thwing was Guilty, and Mary Pressicks Not Guilty.

August the 2nd, 1680, Thomas Thwing being brought to the bar, the clerk spoke thus:

Clerk. Thomas Thwing, hold up thy hand: Thou hast been indicted, that thou as a false traitor did conspire the death of the king, &c. and thereof hast been found guilty: what canst thou say wherefore judgment of death should not be pronounced against thee?

Thwing. My lord, as I am now upon my life, I know nothing of these things, in the least, that these men have sworn against me: And on the other side, I say, that before sir T. Gascoigne had his trial, these men said nothing against me; so I hope your lordship will take it into consideration.

Justice Dolben. For your innocence, the gentlemen of the jury are judges of that, and they have found you guilty, so that it is not in my power either to acquit or condemn you; I am only to pass sentence according to that conviction. If you have any thing to say wherefore judgment should not be pronounced, I am ready to hear you.

Thwing. All that I can say is to declare my innocency, and that these men are of no credit and reputation. It is very hard I only should be guilty, and none of the rest, who were arraigned for the same crimes.

Justice Dolben. No, it is not impossible; it is possible you may be guilty, and the rest innocent.

Thwing. For my part, I told your lordship that I was but once or twice in a year at sir T. Gascoigne's, being my uncle, and I do protest I know nothing of the consult these men do charge me with.

Justice Dolben. You say one thing, they swear another, and for aught I know they are honest men; they are lawful men, and not convicted in the main; for I do believe there were many great and dangerous consults held at sir T. Gascoigne's by several persons, and that there have been many horrid and treasonable things acted there. You have been indicted for high-treason, the highest treason that ever any subject was guilty of, for attempting to kill the king, for resolving so to do upon deliberate advice and consultation; and this for no other end or purpose, but that you might have your religion set up, for that was your design, to change this religion here, and to settle popery in England; and the better to bring that to pass, you thought to take away the king's life, knowing you could not otherwise accomplish it. You are, I am satisfied, a priest of the Romish church; therefore all that I can say to you in reference to your future state you will not value, for you account me an heretic as you do the king, and I am content to be so esteemed in so good company, therefore I shall waive it. As you are a gentleman, I will give some respect to you, and will not pass sentence on you among the rest of the prisoners that are found guilty of felony and murder, but will do it by yourself.

The law doth command the court, and the court doth award, "That you be carried from hence to the place from whence you came, that is, the prison, and from thence you are to be drawn to the place of execution: you are there to be hanged by the neck, you are to be cut down before you are dead, and your entrails are to be taken out of your body, and thrown into the fire before your face, and your head is to be parted from your body, and your body separated in four quarters, and your head and your quarters are to be disposed according to the king's pleasure. And the Lord have mercy on your soul."

Thwing. "Innocens ego sum."

A reprieve being obtained for him, he remained condemned in the castle of York, till the 23d of October, when, according to the sentence, he was drawn, hanged and quartered at York, having first protested his innocence of all that was sworn against him, but gloried that he was a priest, and had performed the priestly function about 15 years; and desiring all true catholics, if any such were there, to pray for him; and begging God to bless and preserve the king, his queen, the duke of York, and all other good christians, he yielded himself to the executioner. He delivered in writing this following Speech:

"This sudden news of my execution (after my reprieve) coming so unexpectedly, made me fear I should have more severity shewed me than has been to others; and consequently, that I should not have my full liberty to declare my mind in the place of my execution; therefore I have briefly expressed myself in writing, as followeth:

"First, as I hope for salvation and benefit of the blood and passion of my blessed Saviour, I most sincerely protest, that what Rob. Bolton, and L. Mowbray swore against me, was absolutely false; for here, in the presence of the eternal God, I declare I never knew of any consult at Barnbow, the least prejudicial to the king or kingdom; nor was I ever at any such consult, or meeting, with sir T. Gascoigne, Mr. Gascoigne his son, sir Miles Stapleton, the lady Tempest, Mr. Ingleby, or any other, where any thing was treated, spoken, or written, about killing the king, or alteration of the government; nor did I ever see, or know of any List of names of persons mentioned, and sworn by them against me.

"Secondly, Upon my salvation I declare, that I never had been in my whole life-time guilty, even so much as in thought, of any treason against his majesty, or the kingdom; being directly contrary to the principles of our faith.

"Thirdly, That although I have, and do declare against the oath of allegiance, as it is worded, yet it is only by reason of some clauses therein contained, not pertaining to allegiance; and therefore if an oath, containing nothing but allegiance, had been legally tendered me, I should have thought it a sin to refuse it.

"Lastly, I acknowledge myself a priest, and to have (about 15 years) performed the priestly function; which I am so far from denying, that I thought it the greatest honour imaginable.

"Now, dear countrymen, having made this protestation in the most plain and serious terms I could, without all equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever; I appeal to the eternal judge, whether all good christians ought not rather to believe what is here in this manner sworn by me, in my present circumstances, than what was sworn by my accusers, whom, notwithstanding, I beg of God Almighty to forgive; as also the jury, and all others, who have in any kind, concurred to my death.

Then again professing his innocence, and praying for his king and country, he concluded with these seeming prophetic words.

"Though I know the affairs of the kingdom are in a bad posture, yet I hope they will be cleared ere long; and then the actors thereof will be more fully known."

270. The Trial of ELIZABETH CELLIER,* at the Old Bailey, for writing and publishing a Libel,† September 11th and 13th, 32 CHARLES II. A. D. 1680.

Clerk of the Crown. MRS. Cellier, look to your challenges; for the Jury that is to be sworn is to pass upon you.

Cellier. Am I for my life?

Cl. of Cr. No, but look to your challenges.

Lord Mayor. But if you challenge, you must give a reason for it, Mrs. Cellier.

Cl. of Cr. Swear John Ainger. [Which was done.]

Cl. of Cr. Swear Richard Boys.

Cellier. I challenge him.

Lord Mayor. Mrs. Cellier, you must shew a cause for your challenge.

Cellier. I did not know that, my lord.

Baron Weston. You can challenge none in this case without a cause.

Cellier. My lord, I did not know that: Then I agree he shall be sworn. [Which was done.]

Then the rest of the Jury, without any more challenges, were sworn; and they were all as follows: John Ainger, Richard Boys, John Stephens, Thomas Phelps, Gilbert Urwin, Edward Allanson, Richard Liveing, John Coggs, Henry Hogsdon, John Barnard, Edward Low, James Southern.

Then Proclamation was made in common form for Information; and the clerk charged the Jury thus:

Cl. of Cr. You gentlemen that are sworn, Elizabeth Cellier stands indicted by the name of Elizabeth Cellier, wife of Peter Cellier, of the parish of St. Clement-Danes, in the county of Middlesex, gent. For that she being of the Popish Religion, not having the fear of God before her eyes, but being moved and seduced by the instigation of the devil, falsely and maliciously endeavouring and intending our sovereign lord king Charles the 2nd that now is, and the government of this kingdom of England, as also the true Protestant Religion, within this kingdom of England by law established, to bring to hatred and contempt; and also to bring scandal and infamy upon divers persons produced as witnesses, that gave evidence on the part and behalf of our sovereign lord the king, against her the said Elizabeth Cellier, and other persons indicted of High-Treason; the 1st of September, in the 32nd year of our sovereign lord king Charles the 2nd that now is, at the parish of St. Clement-Danes, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, maliciously and seditiously did write and publish, and did cause to be writ, imprinted and published a scandalous Libel, intituled, 'Malice Defeated: Or, a brief Relation of the Accusation and Deliverance of Elizabeth Cellier: Wherein her Proceedings, both before and during her confinement, are particularly related, and the Mystery of the Meal-Tub * fully discovered: Together with an abstract of her Arraignment and Trial: Written by herself for the satisfaction of all lovers of undisguised truth.' In which said Libel are contained these false, feigned, scandalous words and figures following, to wit: 'I hope it will not seem strange to any honest and loyal person of what way or religion soever, that I being born and bred up under Protestant parents, should now openly profess myself of another church (meaning the church of Rome;) for my education being in those times, when my own parents and relations, for their constant and faithful affection to the king and royal family, were persecuted, the king himself murdered, the bishops and church destroyed, the whole loyal party, merely for being so, oppressed and ruined; and all, as was pretended by the authors of these villainies, for their being papists and idolaters, the constant character given by them to the king and his friends to make them odious, they assuming to themselves only the name of protestants, and making that the glorious title by which they pretended right to all things: These sorts of proceeding, as I grew in understanding, produced in me more and more horror of the party that committed them, and put me on enquiry into that religion to which they pretended the greatest antipathy; wherein, I thank God, my innate loyalty not only confirmed, but encouraged me. And let calamity say what it will, I never heard from any papists, as they call them, priest nor layman, but that they and I, and all true catholic's owe our lives to the defence of our lawful king, which our present sovereign Charles 2, is, whom God long and happily preserve so. These sorts of doctrines agreeing to my public morals, and no way, as ever I was taught, contradicting my private ones, commending at the same time to me charity and devotion; I without any scruple have hitherto followed, glorying to myself to be in communion with those who were the humble instruments of his majesty's happy preservation from the fatal battle at Worcester; and who, though poor, no temptation could invite to betray him to those who by a pretended protestant principle sought his innocent blood. These truths, I hope, may satisfy an indifferent person in my first change; nor can they wonder at my continuance therein, that notwithstanding the horrid crimes of treason and murder laid to the charge of some persons, considerable for their quality and fortunes in that party: For, when I reflected who were the witnesses, and what unlikely things they deposed, and observed that many of the chiefest sticklers for the Plot were those, or the sons of those, that acted the principal parts in the last tragedy, which history told me too had the prologue of a pretended Popish Plot; I say, these things made me doubtful of the whole; and the more I searched for truth, the more I doubted that the old enemies of the crown were again at work for its destruction. I being fully confirmed in this, thought it my duty through all sorts of hazards, to relieve the poor imprisoned catholics, who in great numbers were locked up in goals, starving for want of bread: And this I did some months before I ever saw the countess of Powis, or any of those honourable persons that were accused, or receiving of one penny of their money directly or indirectly, till about the latter end of January (1678.) And in another part of the said Libel are contained these false, feigned and scandalous words and figures following; to wit, About this time I went daily to the prisons to perform those offices of charity I was obliged to; and on Thursday, January the 9th (1678.) I dined in Newgate in the room called the Castle, on the master's side debtors, and about four in the afternoon I came down into the Lodge with five women, of which three were protestants, and we all heard terrible groans and squeaks, which came out of the dungeon called the Condemned Hole. I asked Harris the turnkey what doleful cry it was; he said it was a woman in labour. I bid him put us into the room to her, and we would help her. But he drove us away very rudely, both out of the lodge and from the door. We went behind the gate and there listened, and soon found that it was the voice of a strong man in torture, and heard as we thought between his groans the wailing up of some engine. These cries stopped the passengers under the gate, and we six went to the turner's shop without the gate, and stood there amazed with the horror and dread of what we heard; when one of the officers of the prison came out in great haste, seeming to run from the noise. One of us catched hold of him, saying, Oh! what are they doing in the prison? Officer. I dare not tell you, mistress. It is a man upon the rack: I'll lay my life on it. Officer. It is something like it. Cellier. Who is it, France? Officer. Pray, madam, do not ask me, for I dare not tell you. But it is that I am not able to bear any longer. Pray let me go. With that he ran away towards Holborn as fast as he could. We heard these groans perfectly to the end of the Old Bailey. They continued till near seven o'clock, and then a person in the habit of a minister, of middle stature, grey-haired, accompanied with two other men, went into the lodge. The prisoners were locked up, and the outward door of the lodge also, at which I set a person to stand, and observe what she could, and a prisoner loaded with irons was brought into the lodge, and examined a long time. And the prisoners that came down as low as they could, heard the person examined with great vehemency say often, I know nothing of it, I am innocent, he forced me to belie myself. What would you have me say? Will you murder me because I will not belie myself and others? Several other such like expressions they heard spoken as by one in great agony. About 4 o'clock next morning, the prisoners that lay in a place above the Hole heard the same cry again two hours, and on Saturday morning again; and about 8 o'clock that morning a person I employed to spy out the truth of that affair, did see the turnkeys carrying a bed into the Hole. She asked who it was for; they told her it was for France who was gone mad, and had tore his bed in pieces. That night the examiners came again, and after an hour's conference France was led away to the Press-Yard. This and many things of the like nature, made me very inquisitive to know what passed in the prison. Soon after this Francis Corral a coachman,

* Of her concern with the Meal-Tub Plot, see some accounts in the Report of her Case for High Treason, supra, p. 1043.

Sir William Temple calls the Meal-Tub Plot an intrigue, which he could never make any thing of nor thought worth his enquiry; and he says, that lords Essex and Halifax, upon the private examination of it, took such a distaste at finding themselves mentioned in it, and yet left out of the secret examinations about it, that their discontents grew open against the court, and lord Essex left the Treasury.

Sir William Williams, the Speaker, in pronouncing Sentence of Expulsion upon sir Robert Peyton, for "negotiating with the duke of York, by means of lord Peterborough, Mrs. Cellier and Gadbury, when they were turning the Popish Plot upon the Protestants, told him, "You have sat betwixt the Devil and the Witch—Mr. Gadbury and Mrs. Cellier." See 4 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1233.

‘ that had been put into Newgate upon suspicion of carrying away sir Edmundbury Godfrey’s body, and lay there thirteen weeks and three days in great misery, got out. I went to see him, and found him a sad spectacle, having the flesh worn away, and great holes in both his legs by the weight of his irons, and having been chained so long double, that he could not stand upright; he told me much of his hard and cruel usage, as that he had been squeezed and hasped into a thing like a trough, in a dungeon under ground; which put him to iexpressible torment, insomuch that he swooned, and that a person in the habit of a minister stood by all the while. That a duke beat him, pulled him by the hair, and set his drawn sword to his breast three times, and swore he would run him through; and another great lord laid down a heap of gold, and told him it was 500*l.* and that he should have it all, and be taken into the aforesaid duke’s house, if he would confess what they would have him; and one F. a vintner, that lives at the sign of the Half-Moon in Ch-si- by whose contrivance he was accused, took him aside, and bid him name some person, and say, they employed him to take up the dead body in Somerset-Yard, and gave him money for so doing; that if he would do this, both F. and he should have money enough. He also told me, that he was kept from Thursday till Sunday without victuals or drink, having his hands every night chained behind him, and being all this time locked to a staple which was driven into the floor, with a chain not above a yard long: That in this great extremity he was forced to drink his own water; and that the jailor beat his wife because she brought victuals, and prayed that he might have it, and threw milk on the ground, and hid her begone, and not look at him.’ And in another part of the said Libel, is contained, amongst other things, these false, feigned, and scandalous words and figures following, to wit, ‘ My arraignment (which in confidence of my own innocency, I continually pressed for) not but that I knew the danger, as to this life, of encountering the devil in the worst of his instruments, which are perjurers encouraged to that degree as that profligated wretch’ (meaning Thomas Dangerfield, produced as a witness against her for High Treason) ‘ was, and hath been since his being exposed to the world in his true colour, both at mine and another’s trial.’ And in another part of the said Libel are contained these false, feigned and scandalous words and figures following, ‘ Nor have I since received any thing towards my losses, or the least civility from any of them, whilst Dangerfield’ (meaning the said Thomas Dangerfield) ‘ when made a prisoner for apparent recorded rogueries, was visited by and from persons of considerable quality, with great sums of gold and silver, to encourage him in the new villainies he had undertaken, not against me alone, but persons in whose safety all good men, as well ‘ Protestants as others in the three kingdoms, are concerned.’ And in another part of the said Libel called, ‘ A Postscript to the impartial readers,’ are contained these false, feigned, and scandalous words following, to wit, ‘ And whensoever his majesty pleases to make it as safe and honourable, as it is apparent it hath been gainful and meritorious to do the contrary; there will not want witnesses to testify the truth of more than I have written, and persons that are above being made the hangman’s hounds for weekly pensions, or any other considerations whatsoever;’ to the evil and dangerous example of all others in the like case offending, and against the peace of our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity. Upon this indictment she hath been arraigned, and therunto hath pleaded, Not Guilty, and for her trial hath put herself upon the country, which country you are; so your issue is to try whether she be Guilty of this offence in manner and form wherein she stands indicted, or Not Guilty. If you find her Guilty, you are to say so; and if you find her Not Guilty, you are to say so, and no more, and hear your evidence.

Then Robert Dormer, esq. of Lincoln’s-Inn, opened the indictment thus:

Mr. Dormer. May it please your lordship, and you gentlemen of the jury: Elizabeth Cellier, the gentlewoman at the bar, the wife of Peter Cellier of the parish of St. Clement-Danes in the county of Middlesex, gentleman, stands indicted of being the author and publisher of a Libel, intituled, “Malice defeated, or a brief Relation of the Accusation and Deliverance of Elizabeth Cellier.” You have heard the indictment read, wherein some clauses of this Libel are recited in the words they were written, and in Mrs. Cellier’s own words, and in other words I will not undertake to repeat them to you.—Gentlemen, this is a Libel so complicated and general, that within this book are contained as many libels of several natures, and against different persons and orders of men, as there are paragraphs; his majesty, the Protestant religion, our laws, government, magistrates, counsellors of state; courts of judicature, the king’s evidence, and the public justice of this kingdom are all aspersed and defamed, by the virulency and malice of this woman’s pen.—She hath charged upon the principles of our religion, the murder of his late majesty, and the greatest impieties that ever were committed.—She accuseth all that have done their duties, or been active in the discovery of the present Popish Plot, to be enemies of the crown, and to be acting over again the tragedy of our late civil war.—She chargeth our laws with cruelties, as inhuman as they are false, in permitting prisoners to starve under their confinement, in admitting of racks and tortures to be used, and that for the worst purposes, thereby to extort perjuries and false evidences against the innocent; to which she would make persons of the best quality of our nobility, magistracy and clergy, privies and parties.—She libels the king's evidences under the characters of the devil's instruments, and the hangman's bounds; and defames his majesty's government, in saying, it is not safe to speak truth, but meritorious and gainful to do the contrary.—She will appear to you to be so criminal, that nothing can aggravate her offences, unless the impudence of the delinquent, who hath set her name to almost every page of this scandalous Libel; and since the indictment hath been depending, owned, published, and put a value on herself for being the author of so excellent a book.—To the indictment she hath pleaded Not Guilty; if the king's evidence prove the charge, you are to find her Guilty.

Baron Weston. Gentlemen, the charge is but this: First, she is charged with the setting forth this book; in the next place, there are several clauses in that book which she is particularly charged with. Now that which the evidence will prove, must be, first, that the book was owned by her, and published by her; and then, that these particulars charged in the indictment, were in the book; and then you will receive the directions of the Court, of what nature the proofs are. Go on to the evidence, that is your work, fall to your proof.

Mr. Dormer. My lord, we will call our witnesses. William Downing, John Penny, and Robert Stevens. Who appeared and weresworn.

Mr. Dormer. Will. Downing, Do you tell my lord and the jury what you know of the printing of this libel (shew him the libel), and who brought the sheets to the press.

Downing. My lord, about the 22d or 23d of August—

Baron Weston. Begin with Penny first. Pray what say you to that book?

Mr. Penny. My lord, I was bid to buy a book of that gentlewoman, and I did so. I asked for her by her name.

Bar. Weston. By what name?

Penny. Mrs. Cellier.

Bar. Weston. Is that the gentlewoman?

Penny. Yes, that is the gentlewoman. And she came out to me, and asked what my errand was? I told her it was to have a book: that you may have, said she, if you please. Madam, said I, what is the price? two shillings, said she. Cannot I have them cheaper, said I, no, said she, I sell them to shopkeepers for 18 shillings a dozen, and I must not sell them under here. With that she fetched me a book, and I gave her two shillings, and when she had done, she gave me another little paper.

Bar. Weston. That is not in issue, nor your question now. Did you ask her for the book she published and set out?

Penny. Yes; and she did acknowledge that was her book.

Bar. Weston. What! she did own the book she sold you to he hers?

Penny. This is the book I have in my hand, and I marked every sheet of it; and she told me there was another little sheet to be added to it; and if any gentleman pleased to send it into the country, that might be put up in a letter to send by the post.

Cellier. May I ask him a question?

Bar. Weston. Tell me your question, and I will ask it.

Cellier. I desire to know if I said any more, than, you may have a book, or there is a book. And who asked for a book?

Bar. Weston. Did she say any more than, you may have a book, or, this is the book that I have published?

Penny. When I got the book and paid for it, I turned about again and asked her if it was her own? she told me it was; and more than that, if occasion were, she could have put more in it.

Bar. Weston. Why, Mrs. Cellier, you did not deny this book yesterday; for you may remember when you did say you wanted your witnesses, and if you could but have time to bring them, you would prove the truth of it: we told you you had nothing to prove on this issue of Not Guilty, but that somebody else did publish the book, and you did not. You owned you writ it yourself every word with your own hand.

Cellier. My lord, if I was a foolish vain woman, and did seem to speak some vain words about myself which I did not understand the consequence of, I hope a word vainly spoke by me shall not be brought against me to convict me of a crime.

Bar. Weston. Mrs. Cellier, you do not seem so negligent about yourself, that we may not believe what you say of yourself.

Cellier. But vain foolish words spoke in that nature, I hope shall be no evidence against me.

Bar. Weston. But, however, it is proved against you.

Cellier. Did I say I writ it?

Penny. You told me that was your book.

Cellier. I told you? pray, my lord, put one question to him upon the oath he hath taken: did I say any more, than it was mine, and I sold it? not that I writ it, or was the author of it?

Bar. Weston. Mrs. Cellier, this is a book that is intitled with your name, and sold by yourself. Now in any one's judgment, this is both an owning of the book, and publishing of the book. When you sold it, you gave it out as your book, and it hath in the title page your name as the author of it.

Cellier. My lord, if I could have produced my witnesses, I could have made my defence; they have been at several places for them, they have been all about town, and several ways, at sir Joseph Sheldon's, and a great many other places, and can find none of them.

Bar. Weston. To what purpose should your witnesses come?

Cellier. I should wish them have made my defence.

Bar. Weston. If you would have said to us yesterday, that you had witnesses to prove that any one else writ the book, we would have put off the trial. But you said you writ it every word of it yourself and so owned the issue: But now you pretend you want witnesses; to what purpose would you have them come?

Cellier. It is not the honour of the bench, my lord, to give evidence; and I hope you will not take that advantage of my vain words.

Bar. Weston. It is the honour of the bench to repeat what you say; when you ask time to put off your trial, and the court gives you direction to what purpose witnesses may be used, and you renounce that, and take the fact upon yourself.

Cellier. But I hope that is no evidence.

Bar. Weston. It was spoke openly in the court, every body heard it.

Cellier. I am surprized, and have no witnesses.

Bar. Weston. It is easy to pretend that you want witnesses; but to what purpose would you have them?

Cellier. My lord, I hope you will please to remember he swears, I only said it was mine, not that I was the author.

Att. Gen. (Sir Creswell Levinz). If you sold it, that is a publishing in law, and is within the indictment.

Cellier. But he did not say I writ it.

Bar. Weston. Pray, Mrs. Cellier, do not trust yourself upon that: for he said, after he had it, he asked you, is this your book? you said, yes, it is my book; and if I had been aware, I could have put a great deal more in it than I have done.

Cellier. But I did not say I writ it.

Penny. You said, if it were to be writ again, you could put more in it.

Cellier. I said it was my book; and so it was, because it was in my possession; but not that I writ it. This is my fan, but it does not follow that I made it.

Bar. Weston. But the question was concerning the author of the book.

Cellier. He did ask me no such question. Did you ask me if I was the author?

Penny. No, I did not.

Bar. Weston. But what did you ask her?

Penny. I asked her, whether it were her book?

Bar. Weston. And did she own it?

Penny. Yes, she did.

Cellier. So it was mine in possession.

Bar. Weston. Did you mean by your question, Whether that book was her's in property or she were the author and publisher of it?

Penny. I would know whether it was her's or no.

Bar. Weston. But what was your intention in asking? Was it whether she, or any other person made it?

Penny. I don't know who made it, she told me it was her's.

Bar. Weston. But what was your meaning in it?

Penny. My intention was, for fear she should have given me some other book, to know whether it was writ by her or no.

Cellier. My lord, I am not to be judged by his meaning; but by his question and my answer.

Att. Gen. Did she tell you she sold more of them?

Penny. I turned about when I had the book and said I, can I have, if occasion be, any more? She said she had but four or five hundred left, and in a few days she should have more.

Att. Gen. You told us, she told you what she sold them for by the dozen.

Penny. Yes, 18s. the dozen to the shopkeepers.

Bar. Weston. Then set up Downing. [Which was done.] Pray look upon that book and the title of it. [Which he did.] Have you examined that book?

Mr. Downing. Sir, I printed part of it.

Bar. Weston. But have you examined that very pamphlet?

Downing. Yes, I know it very well.

Bar. Weston. Did you print part of it?

Downing. Yes, I did.

Bar. Weston. Who brought it to you to be printed?

Downing. Mrs. Cellier.

Bar. Weston. She herself?

Downing. My lord, about the 22d of August a messenger came to me from Mrs. Cellier, to tell me she had something to be printed; and she sent for me to her house, and I went to her house in Arundel-buildings. She told me she had a book to print, and it was her own case. I told her I was a stranger to her concerns; if there was nothing in it that was offensive, I would print it. She told me there was nothing but the truth, and I might safely do it. She said, she had been publicly and wrongfully abused, and was resolved to publish her case, and would make the world sensible of the wrong she had sustained. I was apt, upon the plainness of her discourse, to believe her; and so I agreed with her to have 10s. a ream for printing, and I was to print four ream of every sheet. And having printed half the book, the messenger found it a-printing at my house, and having thus found out the press, he carried it before the secretary sir Leoline Jenkins, who granted a warrant to bring us both before him; and having taken our examinations, we were bound to appear before the privy council, as soon as notice should be given us of it: And being discharged by the council, we were bound to appear the first day of next term in the King's bench; Since which time she hath printed the other half of her book at some other place. And whereas she promised to indemnify me from all trouble and charge, when I came to pay the clerk of the council his fees, she refused to pay them for me, and told me I had betrayed her; and so notwithstanding her promise, I was obliged to pay the fees myself at the council.

Mr. Dormer. Pray, sir, who was it corrected the sheets?

Downing. Sir, they were brought to her.

Mr. Dormer. Did she read them and correct them?

Downing. Yes, she looked over them.

Bar. Weston. Pray tell me how far it was you printed of the book?

Downing. It was to folio 22.

Bar. Weston. All the clauses in the indictment are contained in those pages.

Mr. Clare. All but the last in the postscript.

Bar. Weston. Have you read it over since?

Downing. So far, my lord, I did print.

Bar. Weston. You take it upon your oath, that to the 22d folio of that book that was given in evidence, was printed by you by her direction.

Downing. Yes, I do.

Bar. Weston. Then set up Stevens. [Which was done.]

Mr. Stevens. May it please your lordship, I saw this book a printing at Mr. Downing's, and reading some passages in it, I asked him, Mr. Downing, do you know what you do? He said it is a truth: Then I asked him who he did it for; he said he did it for Mrs. Cellier. I bid him have a care that he did no more than what he could justify; He desired me that I would not hurt him, and I was lothe to do a poor man wrong, but away I went to the secretary; but I asked him before, what was become of the sheets? He said he carried them to Mrs. Cellier; said I, did she bring you the copy? Said he, she sent it sometimes by one messenger, sometimes by another, for she sent several: And when I came to her, she did tell me it was her book, and that she kept a man to write it, and she dictated it to another that sat by her; and she often owned it was her book, and she the author of it.

Cellier. I never said so in my life.

Stevens. Mrs. Cellier, by the same token when you sent for bail you had occasion to write a note, and I saw you write it, and said, I now find it is none of your hand-writing; by the difference between the note and the copy: said she, I know that well enough; but I keep a man in the house to write it, and I dictated to him, and he wrote. And I have seen there one Grange and one Sing; but Grange hath come to me several times about her's and other business, and she did tell me, she did dictate the book to that man, and paid him for writing it. Says she, I am up very early every morning and preparing and dictating things for the press. She hath put out two sheets since, and this day at one o'clock she hath invited the Mercuries and the Hawkers to come and receive a new pamphlet.

Bar. Weston. Do you know her handwriting?

Stevens. I have not that note by me.

Bar. Weston. Did you see the copy?

Stevens. Some part of it I did see.

Bar. Weston. Was any part of it her hand-writing?

Stevens. No, I believe it was none of her hand.

Bar. Weston. Was it several hands?

Stevens. I saw but one part of the copy, and that was all of one hand, but not her's, I believe. She said she kept a man to write it, and she had several other things to write to be printed.

Bar. Weston. Did she ever before affirm herself to be the author of the book?

Stevens. She did (if it please you) before the secretary and before the council; and said she would answer it. And I have seen her likewise sell several of them several days.

Mr. Dormer. Did she deliver any of these books that you know of?

Stevens. I have seen her deliver them out several times before me myself, she can't deny it.

Bar. Weston. Compare the book with the indictment.

Mr. Dormer. Swear Mr. Fowler. [Which was done.]

Bar. Weston. What is that Fowler?

Mr. Dormer. Shew him the book, if you please. [Which was done.] Did you buy any of those books of Mrs. Cellier?

Fowler. I bought two of them. I went to her house, and told her I had a letter from a friend out of Oxfordshire, that desired me to buy two of her books.

Mr. Dormer. Is that the same in your hand?

Fowler. It is the same, as I believe. Some friends came to my house, and told me they had seen me notoriously in print; so I came to her and told her I had a letter out of Oxfordshire for a book or two of her's. Sir, says she, I will fetch you one presently; she comes again with them. Madam, says I, I believe you have forgotten me.

Cellier. I know you not; I never saw you in my life before.

Fowler. No, I believe not; but yet you could put me in your book.

Bar. Weston. Why, what is your name?

Fowler. My name is Fowler.

Bar. Weston. Where do you live.

Fowler. At the Half-Moon Tavern in Cheapside, when I am at home.

Cellier. Your name is not in the book.

Mr. Clare. There is one F. that keeps the Half-Moon tavern in Cheapside.

Bar. Weston. You swear you had two books of her?

Fowler. Yes. Madam says I, I see you am full of business; so I paid 4s. for them, and away I came.

Mr. Dormer. Then you had no discourse with her farther who was the author, had you?

Fowler. No, not a syllable farther. I had only occasion to get a couple of books; for some persons of quality had been at my house, and told me my name was in it, and were pleased to joke with me about it, as particularly Mr. Henry Killigrew came one day to my house and called me into the room, says he, you are notoriously in print, and knows to be company for a great duke, and great lords; you shall drink a glass of wine now with me, and so sell me the story; and thereupon I went to her house to buy a couple of books.

Att. Gen. You are the man meant by the (F.)

Fowler. I keep the Half-Moon in Cheapside.

Att. Gen. There is something supposed in this book to be done by you at your going to a man in prison, is that true?

Fowler. That I suppose is cleared by an oath from Corral the coachman; but withal, I gave my oath for it before my lord-mayor myself.

Att. Gen. Pray, for the satisfaction of people, tell us what you know of the matter.

Fowler. The substance of my oath before my lord-mayor was this: That I never was with any great people, as they tax me, in my life, with any great duke or lord: That I never did see any of the things that they say there, that the duke should draw his sword, and a lord proffer 500*l.* or I whisper to the coachman, That he should name some great persons, and then he and I should have money enough.

Bar. Weston. But I come nearer to you with a question, Mr. Fowler.

Fowler. Yes, my lord, if you please.

Bar. Weston. Was one Corral a coachman apprehended for carrying away the dead body of sir E. Godfrey, at your motion and accusation?

Fowler. As to that, I will tell you the occasion of all our discourse, if it may not be too tedious. Upon the death of sir E. Godfrey, a coachman was one day called to carry some gentlemen that were in my house; but they staying a little longer than ordinary, he went away, and, as they say, dropped them; thereupon another coachman was called, which was this Corral mentioned in this libel, and he went up to the gentlemen into the room, and they, to engage him to stay, secured his whip; he comes down and begs a pipe of tobacco of my wife in the bar: Ay, said she, thou lookest like a good honest fellow, and I believe thou hast no hand in the plot (a casual word that was passant at that time); whereupon he begins to tell her, it is very well for him, for he had escaped that danger: Four of them meeting him against St. Clement's church-wall, and swearing damn them he should stand, and do as they would have him; and he saw four, and he saw sir E. Godfrey's body in a sedan, and he shammed upon them that he could not carry him, for that the axletree of his coach was broke. I was in a room by the bar, and I overheard the fellow talk after this rate. I came out, and asked him, said I, Are you sure of this? Then he tells me the same story over again; wherefore I began to ask him, if he were master for himself, or drove for another; the fellow being sensible he had been too lavish in his discourse, pretends to light his pipe in haste, and to run out to see whether the seats of his coach were not stolen out, and I took a candle with me, and went after him to take the number of his coach: By that time I got to the door, he was driving away, though he had left his whip with the gentleman as security for his stay. I came in, set down the number of his coach in my book, and drew up the substance of their discourse that happened between my wife and him; and I was saying to my wife, I had a mind to stop this fellow at the gate; but it rained, and so I did not, only kept the number of his coach. The next day captain Richardson and the Secondary of the Compter were drinking a glass of wine at my house, where I told them the story, and they blamed me that I had not stopped him. Whereupon capt. Richardson took the number of his coach, and the next day sent his Janizaries abroad, and secured him, and kept him in custody for two or three days.

Baron Weston. When was this?

Fowler. Two or three days after the murder was publicly known of: I think it was Tuesday night that this fellow told me the story, to the best of my remembrance; and the next day I told the captain and the Secondary.

Baron Weston. Was that the next Tuesday after the murder, or the Tuesday seven night?

Fowler. It was the Tuesday seven-night after. They blamed me very much that I did not stop the fellow: I told them how the thing was, and the captain sent his people abroad, and took the coachman up by what marks I gave of him. The next day I was ordered to wait upon the lords at Wallingford-house, where was the duke of Buckingham, my lord Shaftesbury, the marquis of Winchester, two other lords, and major Wildman the secretary; whereby they examined me upon this thing, and what I have declared to your lordships, I declared then. And they brought the fellow in face to face; and there he does confess the whole matter, and made a great whining and clutter, that John Such-a-one, a coachman, and Mrs. Such-a-one, a strong-water woman, told him this, and that, and the other. The lords sent for two of the persons he named, and both of them being brought before them, the lords were very well satisfied, in that one of them keeps a victualling-house, and they were both of good reputation, they were satisfied it was only a sham, and that he only named them as the first persons that came into his mind. Getting nothing out of him, my lord duke of Buckingham told him, Sirrah, if you will confess, there shall be nothing of what the king hath promised but it shall be made good to you, you shall be sure of it, and you shall be protected. My lord Shaftesbury told him the same; but withal, if he would not confess, and tell him who set him on work, then nothing should be severe enough for him; or words to that effect.

Baron Weston. Upon this accusation was he sent to prison?

Fowler. He was re-ordered to prison, and there continued several months.

Baron Weston. Where? To what prison?

Fowler. To Newgate.

Baron Weston. Were you ever in Newgate, and saw him?

Fowler. Never, not I.

Baron Weston. Did you never see him but at this chamber with the lords, and at your own tavern?

Fowler. Never.

Baron Weston. And you never were in Newgate in your life with him?

Fowler. No, not I.

Baron Weston. Were you ever in Newgate with him with my lord duke of Buckingham, or my lord Shaftesbury, or any other lord?

Fowler. No.

Baron Weston. Or any other duke whatsoever?—Fowler. No.

Baron Weston. Or any lord or nobleman whatsoever?

Fowler. No, except four years ago with my lord Petre.

Baron Weston. There is no danger of him. But as to this affair, Were you ever with any?

Fowler. No.

Baron Weston. Did you see any sword drawn, or money offered?

Fowler. There was never a sword drawn, nor money offered.

Att. Gen. Did you ever see 500*l.* laid down upon a table?

Fowler. There was never any sword drawn, nor money laid down.

Baron Weston. He answers that very fully; for he says he was never in Newgate with any nobleman, but once with my lord Petre 4 years ago; and if he was with any nobleman, he is accused to be there in the presence of a duke, and another great earl; and that the duke drew his sword, and the other nobleman laid down a great deal of gold, which he said did amount to 500*l.* and told him it should be his, and that if he would accuse some other persons, they would maintain him; and then he did draw the fellow aside and tell him, Cannot you name somebody? Then you and I may have money enough. This is the accusation of the book: But now it is denied that ever he was in Newgate with any such persons, which is consequently a denial of the whole charge.

Cellier. I did not write that this was true, but I writ that the fellow told me so.

Baron Weston. We will see that in the book in the first place. We have examined this thing by the by, and though it is a little out of the way, yet it may be satisfactory: Read the book.

Cl. of Cr. "Malice defeated," &c.

Baron Weston. Compare it with the record, for she shall have a fair trial, by the grace of God.

Then the several Clauses recited in the Indictment were read over again by the Clerk out of the book, and compared by the judge with the record.

Baron Weston. These are the clauses in the book that are proved exactly upon you. Now I must tell you, because this book doth cast a very great infamy upon our religion, and on the whole government, it ought to be taken notice of: For in the first place, to contrive to get a man into prison, and by tortures to compel him even to commit perjury: Then to hale another man to prison, and have him thus barbarously used, as to have nobles to come to him, one with a sword drawn, another with money in his hand laying it down as a temptation, and to force him to discover what he was not willing to confess; and then to lay accusation upon the king that he makes it a thing of safety to be the hangman's hounds, and to be accusers for pensions; and shall aver, that when it is as free for her to speak truth, as it is meritorious for her to do otherwise, she will discover such and such things; is a slander that ought to receive a public rebuke: And to satisfy the world of the untruth of it, I would have you prove, if Prance be here and the coachman, what usage they received, to avert that public calumny that it cast upon the nation. For let Mrs. Cellier know, she hath insinuated, as though the murder of the late king was a sufficient ground to pervert her from protestantism, which avowed such practices: When all the world knows, that at that time there were protestants that were far better subjects, and more loyal, than ever any papist was in the world, and as great sufferers for their opposition to that dreadful villainy, nay, far more than the papists can boast of for their loyalty; whereas it is known there were villains under-hand all the while, and those that did encourage all that roguery, and set that faction on foot which brought things to that ill period they came to. Therefore you have set a fair outside upon a damnable lie. And that the arrantest rebellious rogues that ever lived under heaven, are great saints in comparison of protestants, no honest man will believe.

Cellier. I say, they called themselves protestants. I know the protestants were great sufferers for the king, and I myself felt it; our family, which were protestants, were several times stript and plundered for their loyalty. I grant all this.

Bar. Weston. Do you? Then you are an impudent lying woman or you had a villainous lying priest that instructed you to begin your book with such a base insinuation against the best of religions. But I have no more to say to that; for that is such a visible notorious falsity to the knowledge of all Englishmen, and people of understanding, that it needs no greater conviction than the particular knowledge of those men that lived in that time. Therefore for that lie, let it go upon the public infamy that attends on your party, who are notorious liars, and among whom falsehood does so much abound. Call Corral and Prance.

Att. Gen. We will give that satisfaction to the people: but the jury are to know that it does not at all concern the matter in issue, for when all that can be said by them is declared, I must say, in point of law, the publishing of a libel, though it be true, yet is a crime, and deserves punishment.

Bar. Weston. I told you so. But, Mr. Attorney, we are to set a fine; and to instruct us for the setting of the fine, it will be a satisfaction to the court to disprove the things she alleges, if you have the witnesses ready; but if you are not ready with your proof, let it alone.

Att. Gen. They are ordered to be here. I only speak that by the way. Swear Mr. Prance [Which was done.]

Bar. Weston. Mr. Prance, pray, were you tortured in prison?

Mr. Prance. No, I never saw any such thing in my life.

Bar. Weston. How were you used?

Prance. Very well; I had every thing that was fitting, captain Richardson did take great care of me.

Bar. Weston. The truth is, the very book itself implies a contradiction. It says there was one tortured in the prison, and the roarings that they heard were like the roarings of a strong man in torture: and yet presently after it says, that the prisoner comes up in irons and is examined. Now could any one having been so lately on the rack, be able to walk and come to be examined? Any man that knows what the nature of a rack is, knows also, that one that has been tortured there, would not be able to leave the irons upon his legs, nor be able to stir or walk; but that is a thing not used amongst us, it was some impudent lying priest durst venture to broach such a calumny.

Cellier. I do not say it was, but it was reported.

Mr. Prance. Dr. Lloyd was with me many times for half an hour together, and if any such thing had been, he would have seen it.

Then Francis Consal was called, but he did not appear.

Capt. Richardson. Corral they have got away; for I had him last night, and he was ordered to be here to day, but here is his wife. [Who was sworn.]

Bar. Weston. Good woman, were you ever with your husband in prison?

Mrs. Corral. I was not suffered to come near him when he was of the master's-side.

Bar. Weston. But when he was out of prison how did he tell you he was used? Did he tell you he was compelled to drink his own piss?

Mrs. Corral. Sunday morning it was before I saw him; nay, I did not see him then, but I was called to bring him victuals, or he would have starved; nay, they say he would be dead before I brought him. So I carried him bread and things, and I did not see him then till almost a fortnight after: and when I saw him he had great fetters on, and I was amazed at them. They put in some charcoal there to warm him, it being very cold; and, said I, Lord, what have you done? You have murdered somebody, sore? but they said, they put on those things to keep his legs warm.

Cellier. Were you ever beaten at any time for bringing your husband victuals?

Mrs. Corral. No indeed, I was never beaten, but they would not suffer me to see him on the master's-side.

Lord-Mayor. Her husband hath denied all upon oath before me.

Bar. Weston. Was he ever hurt with screws, or any such thing?

Cellier. Had he not holes in his legs?

Mrs. Corral. Yes, he had a great many; I did see holes in his legs.

Bar. Weston. Did you?

Mrs. Corral. I did see one, and I can bring them that brought salve to heal it.

Capt. Richardson. There is never an iron in the house that I keep, that weighs twelve pound.

Bar. Weston. They say you have irons called sheers, that weigh forty pound.

Capt. Richardson. If there be one, I will be hanged for it before I go hence.

Cellier. I hope I shall be allowed to make my defence, and call my witnesses.

Bar. Weston. Yes, to be sure.

Cellier. Did not you hear your husband tell me how heavily he was fettered and used? that he was chained to the floor, with a chain not above a yard long; and was forced to drink his own water?

Mrs. Corral. Madam, he is not sensible many times what he does say.

Cellier. But did not you hear him tell me so?

Mrs. Corral. I cannot remember.

Cellier. Did not you tell me, that capt. Richardson drove you away, and would not let you give victuals to your husband?

Bar. Weston. All this is but over and above, for the great matter that sticks upon your part is, the death of sir E. Godfrey, and you are pinched there with Prance's evidence; and so you would make the world believe that he was tortured into his confession, and was mad when he did it, that you may the better turn it off from your own party, on somebody else, on whom I do not know.

Cellier. Pray, my lord, hear me one word: as to your saying, I do it to defend a party, I profess I stand singly and alone; I have been so barbarously used by those you call that party, that the protestants have been abundantly more kind to me than they. And I would not tell the least lie to do them any good turn.

Bar. Weston. Then you are a happy woman indeed, that are beloved by both parties; you have not been serviceable alike to both, I am sure, but that is no great matter; if so be the protestants were so kind, you have requited them ill by such a base libel.

Cellier. I say nothing against them.

Bar. Weston. Can you say any thing that you did not make this pamphlet?

Cellier. My lord, I be not bound to accuse myself, I desire it may be proved.

Bar. Weston. I think it is fully proved.

Cellier. I cannot say any thing without my witnesses, I desire I may call them.

Bar. Weston. Call whom you will.

Cellier. I desire George Grange may be called. [Who was sworn.]

Bar. Weston. What can you say for Mrs. Cellier? Tell me what questions you will ask him.

Cellier. I desire to know whether I did not send him to find witnesses? Who he went for? What answers they returned? And where they be?

Bar. Weston. Well, what witnesses were you sent to look for?

Grange. I went to look for one Mrs. Sheldon that lives in sir Joseph Sheldon's house, and they told me she was in Essex. I went to the coach to send for her.

Bar. Weston. Why Scroggin looked for his knife on the house top.

Mr. Stevens. This man did see her sell these books.

Bar. Weston. Who did you look for besides?

Grange. One Mr. Curtis. And his wife said, she had not seen him since yesterday morning?

Bar. Weston. What were they to prove?

Grange. Truly, my lord, I do not know.

Mr. Dormer. By the oath you have taken, do you know she hath sold any of these books?

Grange. Yes, I do know that she hath sold some of them.

Lord Mayor. There, your own witness, Mrs. Cellier, proves it against you.

Bar. Weston. Who would you have else?

Cellier. I desire that Mary Smith may be called (which was done, but she appeared not then). I desire John Clarke may be sent for from the Gaol.

Capt. Richardson. He is in execution.

Bar. Weston. For what?

Capt. Richardson. For debt.

Bar. Weston. It is not out of the rules of the prison; you may bring him hither, and it is no escape.

Capt. Richardson. If your lordship orders it so, I will bring him.

Lord Mayor. She should have brought an Habeas Corpus, if she would have had him.

Att. Gen. He must bring him through some part, I suppose, that is not within the rules, and then it will be an escape.

Cellier. I pray an Habeas Corpus to fetch him.

Bar. Weston. You might have had one before.

Cellier. This is all because I had no time to prepare for my defence.

Bar. Weston. You might have moved the court for it; they granted you a copy of your indictment.

Cellier. I had it not till nine o'clock to day, and my counsel could not inspect it, nor speak a word with me about it.

Lord Mayor. At what time shall we have done, if we dally after this rate?

Baron Weston. Have you any blank Habeas Corpus?

Cl. of Peace. It could not be sealed, and besides, they should fetch it out of the crown-office.

VOL. VII.

Cellier. I desire to have him come, in order to the defence of something in my book.

Bar. Weston. What would he prove?

Cellier. That I have not belied the government.

Bar. Weston. In what?

Cellier. That he was sheered with long sheers, and unreasonable irons.

Mr. Collins. You cannot do yourself greater wrong than by such talk as this.

Lord Mayor. You are not indicted for your whole book, but for some part of it.

Cryer. Here is Mrs. Smith now. [Who was sworn.]

Cellier. What have you heard Corral the coachman say, about his usage in prison?

Mr. Dormer. I think that question is not to be admitted.

Bar. Weston. What is it you would have her asked?

Cellier. What she heard the coachman say for I only say he told me so.

Mr. Dormer. I am in your lordship's judgment, I think it is not evidence.

Att. Gen. She keeps the coachman away, and now will tell you what he said.

Bar. Weston. That is no evidence, for the coachman might have been here, if you had not sent him away.

Cellier. Let his wife speak that, because she can testify I did not send him away.

Capt. Richardson. She gave them money before, and told them she would maintain them.

Cellier. You are not an evidence against me, you are not sworn.

Capt. Richardson. But this that I say is sworn.

Bar. Weston. Call her.

Att. Gen. Ask her a proper question to the issue.

Cellier. I would know of her, whether I kept her husband away?

Att. Gen. It may be, you did it without her knowledge?

Cellier. Have I seen her husband without her knowledge?

Bar. Weston. Go on with your witnesses.

Cellier. I desire Mary Johnson may be called.

Bar. Weston. For what? what will she prove?

Cellier. That she was to see for witnesses in order to my defence.

Bar. Weston. But if they are not come, what signifies that?

Cellier. I have done then, my lord; for not having time to get my witnesses, I cannot make my defence so fully, as else I should have done: only I desire you to consider I am a poor ignorant woman, and have erred out of ignorance: I thought nothing, but that I might publish what others had said and told me; and so I have offended in ignorance if I have offended.

Bar. Weston. I do verily believe there are more wits than yours concerned in this book; though you bear the name, yet the book is not the effect of your wit only, but you acknowledge enough. And you are to take notice, that the king hath set out a proclamation, that no books shall be printed without a license.

Cellier. I never heard it. I was under close confinement when the king set it out.

Bar. Weston. No, I deny that; for you were enlarged the first day of Trinity-term, and the proclamation came out towards the end.

Att. Gen. She now does confess she knows of it, because she speaks of the time, and that was before her book was written.

Cellier. May not my counsel speak for me? I desire you would hear him.

Mr. Collins. I have nothing to say for her.

Bar. Weston. He says, he hath nothing to say for you.

Mr. Collins. And if you had said less for yourself, it had been better.

Bar. Weston. The question is but Guilty or Not Guilty? whether you published this libel or not? and if the matter of the indictment be proved, what can counsel say, except you can disprove the witnesses, that you did not the fact?

Cellier. Well, my lord, then I beseech you consider me, I am a woman, and deal with me in mercy, as well as justice.

Bar. Weston. Mrs. Cellier, I have not been apt to be a person that use any great severity towards any body, no not towards any of your party; but when I see so much malice as is comprized in your book, and have reason to suspect that this is not acted only by you, though you bear the name of it, but some of your wicked priests are the authors of it, as I am sure they are; then I think it is not severe, that you, who stand at the stake for all, must bear the blame of all. If you will tell us who it was that set you on work, and assisted you in this wicked business, that will be something towards the mitigation of your fine; but if you will take it on yourself, you must suffer the consequence.

Cellier. I beseech you, my lord, have some compassion; his majesty acknowledged before the council, that I had suffered for him; I ventured my life through a sea and an army to serve him; I lost my father and my brother both in a day for him; and if you have no compassion for me, have some commiseration for my loyal parents that lost their estates for him.

Bar. Weston. If you have done service for his majesty, and thereby deserved any thing of him, his majesty hath been so bountiful in the dispensation of his favour, that he would not fail to recompense you for it; but we are to proceed according to the rules of law.

Cellier. But pray have some mercy in your justice.

Bar. Weston. Gentlemen of the jury, this gentlewoman the prisoner stands indicted—

Jury. We have not heard one word that hath been said.

Bar. Weston. No! that is strange; I will acquaint you with as much of the evidence as falls under my information; it had been well if you had told us this before: the business is this, she stands indicted here for writing and publishing of a very scandalous libel. But pray did not you hear Penny prove that she sold it.

Jury. We heard the three first witnesses.

Att. Gen. There was the proof of the fact.

Baron Weston. The rest of the evidence was but a comparison of the clauses in the book with those in the indictment, which you are to have direction from the court in, that they do: She stands indicted for publishing a libel, and the title of the libel is, "Malice Defeated, or, a brief relation of the accusation and deliverance of Elizabeth Cellier." Now this libel branches itself out into several parts; the first whereof is a very fine insinuation, as though her leaving the protestant religion was, because those that murdered the king, and made that very great subversion that was made in the government by the late Long Parliament, and the army that succeeded them, were protestants—

Cellier. Pray, my lord, I say, called protestants.

Baron Weston. By your favour, she pretends it was by those that were called protestants; but if they were only those that were called protestants, and not protestants, what reason had she to go off from the protestant religion, to turn papist, when there was such a body of loyal protestants that did adhere to the loyal party? Therefore that was as villainous an insinuation as could be; as though the protestant religion did nourish and teach seditious principles, which in the consequence of them tended towards the subversion of the government and order, which certainly it does cherish in the highest degree of any religion in the world, and hath the most peaceable principles in matters of duty, both in subjection to our superiors, and of a charitable deportment of men one towards another: And the practice of those principles hath been seen amongst protestants, especially amongst the English protestants, as much as any nation in the world; this may be said of it to this day, for the reputation of the English nation, that there is more fidelity, honesty, and generous trust amongst them, than among all the nations of the world besides; so that if a man were to go out of England to any other part of the world, he might well use the words of Demosthenes, upon his going out of Athens, at his banishment; "Farewell, beloved city, I am going into a world where I shall not find such friends as I have had enemies here." Friends in other places will be no better than our enemies here; the carriage of Englishmen is so much beyond all others, except the Germans, who, I must confess, are famed for their honesty and integrity one to another; but if you take the French, the Italian, the Spaniard, or any sort of the Levantine people, they live like so many wolves, especially in those places where the popish religion is professed. Now after this insinuation, there is another part of the book recited in the indictment, There was an horrid barbarous murder

him, and would have him confess, that another nobleman laid down a sum of money, and said it was five hundred pounds, and told him, if he would confess, he should have it; and that Fowler took him aside; and bid him lay it upon somebody else, and then he and Fowler should have money enough. Fowler being examined, and upon his oath, tells you upon what account he did charge Corral; he tells you, he was never with Corral in the gaol in his life, and never was with him in the presence of any duke or nobleman but once in a room, where Corral was brought to be examined; and then there was the duke of Buckingham, the marquis of Winchester (who I never heard was a man of cruelty, or harsh nature), my lord Shaftsbury, and major Wildman, who was secretary; but there was no such cruel usage there; and he never was in the prison with such noblemen; and then the consequence is, that the whole story is false. Corral, it seems, my Lord-Mayor says, hath been examined to this point, and denies it all, and is kept out of the way, that he should not give it in evidence here: But if we had him here, it were no great matter; for if there were any thing of this nature true, they are to proceed in a legal way against them that make these transgressions of the law; she ought to have indicted the persons, for they are highly punishable for such extravagancies as these are. But there is nothing done in that kind; and instead of that, she hath defamed them all in a libel; and she is not contented to have done that neither, for she hath defamed the king highly in his government, and said, she could have written more. I pass over the business that concerns Dangerfield, wherein she complains that Dangerfield had more friends, and was visited more by persons of quality, when she had none came to her; every one is visited according to the interest they have in the world, and the friends they make: I have nothing to say to that, there is not so much in it; but come to that part wherein she scandalizes the king, which is this; she says, "Whenever his majesty shall please to make it as safe and honourable to speak the truth, as it is apparent it hath been gainful and meritorious to do the contrary, their villainy will not want witnesses to testify the truth of more than she had written."

So that she supposes, that the king, by the countenancing of lies, and giving pensions to liars, chokes the truth, and makes it dangerous for those that know the truth, to divulge it to the world; which is a very vile scandal upon the king and the government. These are the matters of the libel, and the things in proof have been sworn by three witnesses; one proves, that he went to her to buy one of her books, and he asked her for one, and she gave him a book which bears that title-page that you hear in the indictment, superscribed with her name, and she gives it as her book. Now she would evade it thus, that she gave it as her's, not as though she were the author, but as if it were her's only in property: but can any such thing be thought the meaning of her words? Or can there be any greater evidence that she is the author of the book, than her publishing of it with her name to it? But the fellow goes further, and tells you, when he had the book, he turned about, and asked her, if it were her book? Yes, she said, it was: and, said she, I could have writ a great deal more, if I would; so that her saying she could have writ more, implies, that she writ that; and (more) is a word of comparison which always supposes the positive proposition. The next is the printer, who tells you, that he printed the first 22 folios, within which the greatest part of this charge, except only that last about the king, is contained. He tells you, that she sent for him, and employed him to print it as her's; agreed with him for 10s. a ream for the printing, and that he did print the first 22 leaves at her request, and as employed by her: Fowler tells you, he bought two of the books of her; and these are the witnesses of the publication of this book. I must tell you this, the clauses in the libel are truly set down in the indictment, for I did examine them one by one. Now whether or no you can doubt she was the author of the book, when in a manner she did own it at the publication, by selling it as her's, I leave to you; though I must tell you plainly, I leave it as that which is to me under the notion of express evidence; but I must leave it to you as judges of the fact, and expect your verdict in the case.

Attorney General. There are three things in the indictment; 1. That she writ it; 2. That she caused it to be printed; and 3dly, That she caused it to be published. Now if you find any one of these, she is guilty of so much at least, though I think you have heard evidence enough for all. She told me it was her's and said, she could have put more in; and the selling the book is a publication. So that if you be not satisfied she was the author, yet if you are satisfied she caused it to be printed; or if you are not satisfied in that, yet if you are satisfied she caused it to be published, you are to find her guilty of so much.

Cellier. The printer does not say I writ it.

Att. Gen. But he does say you gave it him as your's, and to you the sheets were sent to be corrected.

Then the Jury desired they might have the book with them.

Mr. Clare. My lord, the jury wants the book that was sworn to.

Bar. Weston. They can have no papers without agreement, neither the books, nor any paper else.

Att. Gen. Not unless she will consent to it. Mrs. Cellier, will you consent that they shall have the book out with them? To which, after some pause, she answered, No.

Bar. Weston. Then they cannot have it by law.

Then the Jury withdrew for a little, and returned.

Cl. of Cr. How say you, is Elizabeth Cellier Guilty of the writing, printing, and publishing of the libel for which she stands indicted, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Guilty. (At which there was a great shout.) And the verdict was recorded.

Bar. Weston. She must stand committed to receive the judgment of the court.

Cellier. Will you give me leave to speak a word now?

Bar. Weston. I cannot give you any judgment, for by the custom of the city, that is to be done by the recorder or his deputy; and so, what you will say to the court, you must say to them; that will be on Monday when the sessions is done.

Cellier. What I would say is only this, that I am a woman, and wherein I offended, I offended out of ignorance, and did not know it was an offence; and if the offence be mine, let not others suffer for me. Have mercy in judgment; and consider: my loyal parents and relations, and the services they did his majesty; and let this fault be wiped out by that service and duty I and they paid him; or at least-wise, let the punishment of this offence be mitigated, in consideration that all my life, ever since I had the first use of reason, I have been a loyal subject.

Bar. Weston. These are things that will be considered on Monday, but we cannot take consideration of it now.

Cellier. I will go away then, and come again on Monday.

Bar. Weston. No, you are to be committed till then.

And so the keeper carried her back to Newgate; from whence on Monday the 13th of September, she was brought to the bar to receive her Judgment, which Mr. Recorder gave thus:

Mr. Recorder. (Sir George Jefferies.) Mrs. Cellier, the court doth think fit, for example sake, that a fine of 1,000*l.* be put upon you; that you be committed in execution till that thousand pounds be paid: and because a pecuniary mulct is not a sufficient recompence to justice, which you have offended, the Court doth likewise pronounce against you, That you be put on^e the pillory three several days, in three several public places: in the first place, in regard her braided ware received its first impression and vent at her own house, it is

* The King against Bowers.

By Holt, Chief Justice, to stand in the pillory, or on the pillory, is the same thing in judgment, and both signify to stand in the pillory: 2 Mod. Rep. 885. The judgment now is, that the offender shall "be set in and upon the pillory." And therefore if the undersheriff remit part of the judgment by only setting him upon the pillory, an attachment lies. Rex v. Beardmore, 2 Burr. 794.

thought fit that she stand (as near her own house as conveniently can be) between the hours of twelve and one, for an hour's space, at the May-pole, in the Strand, on the most notorious day; I think there is a market near that place, let it be on that day. At another time, that she stand in Covent-Garden on a public day the like space of time; a third time, that she stand at Charing-Cross on the most public day, for the space of an hour. And in the next place, that she find sureties for her good behaviour during her life; and in every place where she shall stand on the pillory, some parcels of her books shall, in her own view, be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, and a Paper of the cause to be put upon the pillory.

Then the Court charged the sheriff, That he take care in every place for a sufficient guard, that the peace may be kept; and she was returned to the gaol.

In the year 1682 was published "REFLECTIONS upon the Murder of Sir EDMUNDBURY GODFREY: The design of Thompson, Farwell, and Paine, to sham off that murder from the

* "Both the trebuchetum and the collistrigium," observes Mr. Barrington, Observations on Assisa Panis et Cerevisæ, "were intended 'magis ad ludibrium, et infamiam, quàm ad 'pœnam,' say the Glossaries. It may therefore well deserve the consideration of a judge, who inflicts the punishment of the pillory (as it becomes at present the great occasion of mobs and riots) whether it can be reconciled to the original intention of the law in this mode of punishment; as also if this riotous scene ends in the death of the criminal, whether he is not in some measure necessary, both to the riot and the murder." In what follows, there is something bordering upon the ludicrous: "The chief intention of setting a criminal in the pillory is, that he should become infamous, and known for such afterwards by the spectators. Can an offender, whose face is covered with rotten eggs and dirt, be distinguished, so as to prevent his gaining a new credit with those who have occasion afterwards to deal with him?" Mr. Barrington also says, "There hath been more than one instance of such a murder," [of a person suffering the punishment of the pillory]. within the last 20 years." See the Case of M Daniel and others, A. D. 1754, infra. Emlyn in the Preface to his edition of the State Trials [See in this Collection, vol. 1, pp. xxxvi, xxxvii.] observes upon the practicability, and upon the obligation on the officers of the law to protect persons in the pillory from injurious treatment, and inveighs against the neglect of affording such protection. Mr. Barrington (ubi sup. and observations on 18 Edw. 2.) has collected some curious particulars respecting the pillorium or collistrigium, and the trebuchetum. See also something concerning the pillory in a Note to lord Audley's Case, ante, vol. 3, p. 491.

Papists: The late endeavours to prove Stafford a martyr, and no traitor: And the particular kindnesses of the Observator and Heraclitus to the whole design. In a Dialogue. With a Dedication from Mrs. Cellier. London: Printed for A. B. and published by L. Curtiss, A. D. 1682."

DEDICATION

To the Counts of the Empire, &c.

My Lords; There has been a great hurly-burly about the death of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, public justice has made her report to Heaven, that he was murdered by the Papists; but the Papists scandalized at the wickedness of the action, would fain have made the world believe that he killed himself. My lords; it is well known, how far I have contributed my personal pains, before and since that my advice to bring this noble design to pass. But I think the devil owes us a shame, we have always the ill luck to meet either with fools or knaves: When it comes to the pinch, what we well contrive is defeated, by the ill management of our instruments. The Observator, indeed, did indifferent well; for he gave a sparing-blow at Praunce's reputation, and backed our friend Thompson in the very nick, the very morning before the trial. I chuckled again when I heard of the vintner's boys; they put me in mind of the St. Omers lads. But as for F. and P. and all their witnesses, it was money merely thrown away. But let us not despond, my lords, if one thing fails another will hit, and we shall hit it at last: In the mean time, it is my advice, that you keep up the Observator's spirits and double his salary. It will be a thorn in their sides that swore him at the queen's chapel, as long as he lives.

Facit Indignatio Dialogus, my Lords—And though the Heraclitic Cabal be of little moment, let it not sink: all helps, as the wren said: but above all (since you may have so many Protestant booksellers to do it) let the lord C.'s Vindication of the English Catholics, his Memento, and the lord Stafford's Memoirs be reprinted. Those gentlemen puzzled the people with their 'it's' and their 'ands' and 'how is it possibles,' at a strange rate. They had a brave design to persuade men out of their reason and their senses; and I am persuaded all that believe in the Observator, and Heraclitus, will believe in them. I beseech you, my lords, take these things into your considerations; for you have leisure enough, and believe that she will never forsake you, unless you forsake her, who is your lordships' most devoted Servant,

ELIZ. CELLIER.

DEPOSITIONS.

Whereas in a Narrative, or printed Book, or Libel called, Malice defeated, or a brief Relation or Accusation of the Deliverance of Elizabeth Cellier:

It is amongst other things in page the third and fourth of the said book written as followeth, viz. Soon after this, Francis Corral, a coachman, that had been put into Newgate upon suspicion of carrying away sir Edmond-bury Godfrey's body, and lay there thirteen weeks and three days in great misery, got out; I went to see him, and found him a sad spectacle, having the flesh worn away, and great holes in both his legs by the weight of his irons, and having been chained so long doubled, that he could not stand upright, he told me much of his hard and cruel usage, as that he had been squeezed and hasped in a thing like a trough, in a dungeon under ground; which put him to inexpressible torment, insomuch that he swooned, and that a person in the habit of a minister stood by all the while. That a duke beat him, and pulled him by the hair, and set his drawn sword to his breast three times, and swore he would run him through; and another great lord laid down a heap of gold, and told him it was 500*l*. and that he shall have it all, and be taken into the aforesaid duke's house if he would confess what they would have him, and one F. a vintner, that lives at the sign of the Half-moon in Ch.-si. by whose contrivance he was accused, took him aside, and bid him name some person, and say, they employed him to take up the dead body in Somerset-yard, and gave him money for so doing; that if he would do this, both F. and he, should have money enough. He also told me, that he was kept from Thursday to Sunday without victuals or drink, having his hands every night chained behind him, and being all this time locked to a staple which was driven into the floor, with a chain not above a yard long: that in this great extremity, was forced to drink his own water; and that the jaoler beat his wife, because she brought victuals, and prayed that he might have it, and threw milk on the ground, and not look at him &c. For the reader's farther satisfaction of his great and cruel suffering, I refer to the party himself now living in Gunpowder-Alley in Shoe-Lane, and well known by his misfortunes.

I Francis Corral of Gunpowder Alley in Shoe-lane, being the person before named, make oath that Mrs. Cellier was never with me in the prison of Newgate, and that I never told her there nor any where else that ever I was chained so long double that I could not stand upright, nor never told her that I had any hard or cruel usage there, nor that I was ever squeezed or hasped to a thing like a trough in a dungeon under ground which put me to torment, nor that I swooned, nor that a person in the habit of a minister stood by me at any time whilst in the prison, except when I went into the chapel to prayers; nor that any duke beat me, pulled me by the hair, or set his sword to my breast three times, or swore that he would run me through; nor that any great lord laid down a heap of gold, and told me it was 500*l*. and that I should have it all, and be taken into the aforesaid duke's house if I would confess what they would have me; nor that F. a vintner that lives at the sign of the Half-moon in Cheap-side did take me aside, and bid me name some person, and say they employed me to take up the body in Somerset-yard, and gave me money for so doing, that if I would do this, both F. and I should have money enough; nor did I ever tell her that I was kept from Thursday to Sunday without meat and drink; nor were my hands ever chained behind me; nor was I ever locked to a staple driven into a floor with a chain not above a yard long, but what she hath written in her said book or libel is notoriously false and untrue; but on the contrary, during the time of my imprisonment I was civilly treated by the keeper and his servants.

FRANCIS CORRAL.

Jur. 6. Sept. 1680. Coram me,

ROBERT CLAYTON Mayor.

I Margaret, the wife of the said Francis Corral, make oath, That the said Gaoler never beat me because I brought victuals and prayed that my husband might have it; nor threw any milk on the ground; nor bid me be gone and not look upon him. Neither do I know, or believe, that my husband had any hard usage from any of the keepers during his imprisonment; but on the contrary, was civilly treated by them.

This deponent farther maketh oath, That on Thursday last she went with her husband to Mrs. Cellier's house; and her husband asked her, what she meant by putting such a company of lies upon him in her book. She answered, She had a mind to do it, and that if some of them were lies all were not. He told her, that she would ruin him, and bring him to a prison as he was before. She answered, That if he were arrested, she would bail him; and if he were cast into prison, she would maintain both him and his family, for that she had got money enough, and that she would have me to a lord or lords that would secure him, and bid me cheer up my husband, for that neither I nor my family should want, and gave me then five shillings, and bid me cheer up my husband with that. Sig.

MARGARET CORRAL.

Jur. 6, Sept. 1680. Coram me,

ROBERT CLAYTON, Mayor.

I, Francis Corral, within named, further make oath, That on Thursday last, I went with my wife to Mrs. Cellier's house, and asked her what she meant by putting such a company of lies upon me in her book. She answered, that she had a mind to do it, and that if some of them were lies, all were not. I told her, she would ruin me, and bring me into a prison, as I was before. She told me, if I were arrested, that she would bail me; and if I were cast into prison, she would maintain me and my family; for that she got money enough, and that she would have me to a lord or lords that would secure me. And she bid my wife to cheer me up, for that neither I, nor my family should want, and gave my wife five shillings, and bid her cheer me up with that. FRANCIS CORRAL.

Jur. 6, die Sept. 1680. Coram me,

ROBERT CLAYTON, Mayor.

I, Matthias Fowler, living at the Half-Moon in Ch-si. vintner, make oath, That I never saw any duke or lord with Francis Corral, in this paper mentioned, in Newgate; nor did I ever see any duke beat him, or set a sword to his breast; nor did I ever see any lord lay down a heap of gold, and tell the said Corral it was 500*l.*, and the said Corral should have it, if he would swear what the duke and lord would have him. Nor did I ever take him aside, and bid him name some person, and say, they employed him the said Corral to take up the dead body of sir Edmundbury Godfrey's in Somerset-Yard, and gave him money for so doing, and that if he would do this, both he and I should have money enough. But that the same is notoriously false and untrue.

MATTHIAS FOWLER.

Jur. 8, die Sept. 1680. Coram me,

ROBERT CLAYTON, Mayor.

The Indictment in this Case was as follows :

Rex versus Cellier for a Libel.

In quo quidem libello continentur hæc falsa, ficta, et scandalosa verba, et figuræ sequentia: ss. 'I hope it will not seem strange to any honest and loyal person, of what way or religion soever, that I, being born and bred up under protestant parents, should now openly profess myself of another church (Ecclesiam Romanam, innuendo) for, education being in those times when my own parents and relations, for their constant and faithful affection to the king and royal family, were persecuted, the king himself murdered, the bishops and church destroyed, the whole loyal party, merely for being so, oppressed and ruined, and all, as was pretended by the authors of these villainies, for their being papists and idolaters, the constant character given by them to the king and his friends; and to make them odious, they assuming to themselves only the name of Protestants, making that the glorious title by which they pretended right to all things. These sort of proceedings, as I grew in understanding, produced in me more and more horror of the party that committed them, and put me on enquiring into that religion to which they pretend the greatest antipathy, wherein, I thank God, I found my innate loyalty not only confirmed, but encouraged; and, let calumny say what it will, I never heard from any papist, as they call them, priest or layman, but that they and I, and all true catholics, owe our lives to the defence of our lawful king, which our present sovereign Charles the second is, whom God long and happily preserve so. These sort of doctrines agreeing to my public morals, and no way, as ever I was taught, contradicting my private ones, commending at the same time to me charity and devotion, I without any scruple have hitherto followed, glorying myself to be in communion with those (papistas innuendo) who were the humble instruments of his majesty's happy preservation from the fatal battle at Worcester, and whom though poor, no temptation could invite to betray him to those, who by a pretended Protestant principle sought his innocent blood. These truths, I hope, may satisfy any innocent person in my present change; nor can they wonder at my continuance therein, notwithstanding the horrid crimes of treason and murder laid to the charge of some persons, considerable for their quality and fortunes, in that party: For when I reflected who were witnesses, and what unlikely things they deposed, and observed that many of the chiefest sticklers for the Plot were those, or the sons of those, that acted the principal part in the last tragedy, which history told me too had the prologue of a pretended popish Plot; I say, these things made me doubtful of the whole; and the more I searched for truth, the more I doubted that the old enemies of the crown were at work again for its destruction. I being fully confirmed in this, thought it my duty, through all sorts of hazards, to relieve the poor imprisoned catholics who in great numbers were locked up in gaols, starving for want of bread; and this I did some months before I ever saw the countess of Powis, or any of those honourable persons that were accused, or receiving one penny of their money, directly or indirectly, till about the latter end of January (1678) the prisoners increasing very much.' Et in alia parte ejusdem libelli (inter alia) continentur hæc falsa, ficta, et scandalosa verba, ss. 'About this time I went daily to the prisons, to perform those offices of charity I was obliged to; and on Thursday January 9, (1678.) I dined in Newgate, in the room called the Castle, on the master debtors side; and about four in the afternoon I came down into the Lodge, with five women, of which three were protestants; and we all heard terrible groans and squeaks, which came out of the dungeon called the Condemned Hole: I asked Harris the turnkey what doleful cry it was; he said it was a woman in labour; I bid him put us into the room to her, and we would help her; but he drove us away very rudely, both out of the lodge, and from the door. We went behind the gate, and there listened, and soon found that it was the voice of a strong man in torture, and heard, as we thought, between his groans, the winding up of some engine. These cries stopped the passengers under the gate; and we six went to the Turner's shop without the gate, and stood there, amazed with the horror and dread of what we heard; when one of the officers of the prison came out in great haste, seeming to run from the noise: One of us caught hold of him, saying, Oh! what are they doing in the prison? Officer. I dare not tell you, mistress. Cell. It is a man upon the rack, I will lay my life on it. Officer. It is something like it. Cellier. Who is it, Pounce? Officer. Pray, Madam, do not ask me, for I dare not tell you; but it is that I am not able to hear any longer; pray let me go. With that he ran away towards Holbourn as fast as he could. We heard these groans perfectly to the end of the Old-Bailey: They continued till near 7 of the clock; and then a person in the habit of a minister, of a middle stature, grey-haired, accompanied with two other men, went into the lodge; the prisoners were locked up, and the outward door of the lodge also, at which I set a person to stand and observe what she could; and a prisoner loaded with irons was brought into the lodge, and examined a long time; and the prisoners that came down as low as they could, heard the person examined, with great vehemency say often, I know nothing of it; I am innocent; he forced me to bely myself; what would you have me say? will you murder me because I will not bely myself and others? Several other such like expressions they heard spoken, as by one in great agony. About four of the clock the next morning the prisoners, that lay in a place about the Hole, heard the same cry again two hours, and on Saturday morning again; and about eight of the clock that morning, a person I employed to spy out the truth of this affair, did see the turnkeys carry a bed into the Hole: she asked who it was for; they told her it was for Pounce, who was gone mad, and had torn his bed in pieces. That night the examiners came again, and Pounce was led away to the Press-yard. This, and many things of like nature, made me very inquisitive to know what passed in the prison. Soon after this Francis Corral a

Scotchman, that had been put into Newgate upon suspicion of carrying away sir Edmund-bury Godfrey's body, and lay there 13 weeks and 3 days in great misery, got out: I went to see him, and found him a sad spectacle, having the flesh worn away, and great holes in both his legs, by the weight of his irons; and having been chained so long double, that he could not stand upright: He told me much of his hard and cruel usage, as that he had been squeezed and hasped into a thing like a trough in a dungeon under ground, which put him to inexpressible torment, insomuch that he swooned; and that a person in the habit of a minister stood by all the while; that a duke beat him, pulled him by the hair, and set a drawn sword to his breast three times, and swore he would run him through; and another great lord had laid down a heap of gold, and told him it was 500*l.*; that he should have it all, and be taken into the aforesaid duke's house, if he would confess what they would have him: And one F. a vintner, that lives at the sign of the Half-Moon in Ch—St—, by whose contrivance he was accused, took him aside, and bid him name some person, and say they employed him to take up the dead body in Somerset-yard, and gave him money for so doing; that if he would do this, both F. and he should have money enough. He also told me, that he was kept from Thursday till Sunday without victuals or drink, having his hands every night chained behind him; and being all this time locked to a staple, which was driven into the floor, with a chain not above a yard long; that in this great extremity he was forced to drink his own water; and that the gaoler beat his wife because she brought victuals, and prayed he might have it, and threw milk on the ground, and bid her be gone, and not look at him.' Et in altera parte ejusdem libelli continent' (inter al') hæc falsa, ficta et scandalosa verba sequentia: ss. 'My arraignment, which, in confidence of my own innocency, I continually pressed for; not but that I knew the danger, as to this life, of countering the devil in the worst of his instruments, which are perjurers encouraged to that degree, as that profligated wretch, quendam Thomam Dangerfield testem product' ex parte Dom. 271. Proceedings against the Five Popish Lords, viz. the Earl of POWIS, Lord Viscount STAFFORD, Lord PETRE, Lord ARUN-
DEL of WARDOUR, and Lord BELLASYSE, for High Treason:
Together with the Trial of Lord Viscount STAFFORD: 30
CHARLES II.—1 JAC. II. A. D. 1678—1685.

[Of these five Lords, only one (Stafford) was brought to trial. The Proceedings against the others are nevertheless interesting and instructive in many respects; it is therefore thought proper not to omit them: and as those Proceedings are intimately connected with the Trial of Lord Stafford, arose out of the same transaction, and upon one prosecution, the whole are incorporated into one article, in order to avoid the many repetitions or references which would be inevitable
if the Cases were separated.]

HOUSE OF LORDS, October 25, 1678.

THE lord viscount Stafford acquainted the House, That he was informed that there was a warrant issued out, from the Lord Chief Justice of England, to apprehend him; which he thought fit to acquaint their lordships with, and submitted himself to their lordships' judgment.

The Lord Chief Justice, being present, was commanded to give the House an account of the business:

Who said, That last night about 9 o'clock, he received a letter from the Speaker of the House of Commons, dated from the Speaker's chair, to come to the House of Commons about business of great concernment. Accordingly he attended the House of Commons; where the Speaker told him, That the House of Commons had received accusations of High Treason against Five Lords and some gentlemen, and desired him to issue out his warrants for their apprehension. The persons were, the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, the lord Arundel of Wardour, the lord Petre, and the lord Bellasis; and, upon this, he issued out his warrants for their apprehension; having taken the examination of Titus Oates upon oath:
That the earl of Powis and the lord Arundel were brought to him this morning, in custody; and he advised them to render themselves to the Gatehouse, where now they are.

Upon this, the examination of Oates was read; whereby it did appear, that the lord viscount Stafford was charged to be in a conspiracy of treason against the king.

The lord viscount Stafford denied the fact;
and after this withdrew.

And after a while the House was informed,
VOL. VII.

That his lordship would render himself to the Lord Chief Justice.

After some debate of this business, the further consideration was put off until to-morrow.

October 26.

The House being informed, That the lord
Bellasis having all his papers seized by virtue of the Lord Chief Justice's warrant, he desires that the said papers may be sealed up in a bag, and brought into this House. Which was ordered. And the like Order to be for all the lords who are apprehended by virtue of the warrant from the Lord Chief Justice.

The lord Petre, being in the House, took notice, That he heard of a warrant issued out against him by the Lord Chief Justice of England; and he desired to know the cause of it.
Hereupon the House directed the Lord Chancellor to acquaint his lordship what account the Lord Chief Justice gave the House yesterday, and upon what grounds he issued out his warrant for apprehending him and several other lords, for High Treason. His lordship withdrew himself; and the House made these Orders following:

"Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, that the gentleman usher of the black rod attending this House, do forthwith take the lord Petre into his custody, and carry him in safety to the Tower of London, for treason wherewith he is charged, there to remain till he shall be discharged by due course of law; and this to be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

"To sir Edward Carteret, gentleman usher of the black rod attending this House, his deputy and deputies."

“Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the constable of his majesty's Tower of London, or his deputy, do receive the body of the lord Petre, for treason wherewith he is charged, and keep him in safe custody within the said Tower, till he shall be discharged by due course of law; and this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

“To the constable of his majesty's Tower of London, his deputy and deputies, and every of them.”

October 29.

The House being informed, That the lord Bellasis, now a prisoner in the prison of the King's Bench, by warrant of the Lord Chief Justice of England, for treason, is so ill, that he cannot without danger be removed: It is ordered, That sir Charles Scarborough be, and is hereby, appointed to go and visit the said lord Bellasis, and give this House an account tomorrow morning in what condition of health he finds him.

Ordered, That his majesty be humbly desired from this House, that the lord Bellasis, now a prisoner in the prison of the King's Bench, by warrant of the Lord Chief Justice of England, for treason, being, as is informed, so ill that he cannot be removed, may have a guard set on him there; and that notice be taken of the names of all such persons as shall come to visit his lordship there.

October 30.

This day Dr. Scarborough gave the House an account: That he did visit the lord Bellasis this morning, and finds him in good health; and that his lordship is ready to be removed, as their lordships shall think fit.

Ordered, That the Lords with white staves do attend his majesty, humbly to desire him from this House, that the lord viscount de Stafford, and the lord Bellasis, and col. Koper and his son, and Mr. Ratcliffe, being prisoners in the prison of the King's Bench, by warrant of the Lord Chief Justice of England, for treason, may be removed, to remain prisoners in his majesty's Tower of London.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, October 30, 1678.

Mr. Sacheverell reports, from the committee which by Order of the House was appointed to take the examination of Mr. Coleman, That the committee went to Newgate: and laying before Mr. Coleman his present danger; and that he could have no hopes to escape it, but by a full and plain discovery of his whole knowledge of the conspiracy; Mr. Coleman without any particular questions put to him, said to the effect following:

heard of any such design or intention, either directly or indirectly: He totally denies, that he ever knew or heard of any commissions for raising an army, or any intent or design of raising an army, till of late that he heard so, when he was examined by the Lords: He utterly denies, that he ever designed or endeavoured to change the religion established in this kingdom, or to introduce Popery; but confesses, he did endeavour to have this parliament dissolved, and by that means to gain a liberty of conscience; which he thought this parliament would never grant: And said, He observed every sessions of parliament the growth of Popery complained of, notwithstanding all their endeavours against it; and believed the Catholic religion to be the true one, and the Protestant the false; and therefore only proposed a toleration, as concluding, that if the Catholic religion stood upon equal ground, it would prevail: And says, He did endeavour to get 300,000*l.* from France; hoping that thereby his majesty might be prevailed on to dissolve this parliament, rather than wait for an uncertain sum: And says, there was not three men in England acquainted with these designs, or with his correspondence; but that the duke of York was acquainted with them; and he believes he communicated them to my lord Arundel of Wardour: And said, He concluded it most probable to have money from France for dissolving this parliament; in regard the confederacy against France was chiefly supported and held together by the countenance and expectation they had from this parliament.

The first correspondence, he says, which he had in France, was by some letters of news, which he wrote to sir Wm. Throgmorton, about the time of the siege of Mاستrecht; any news being welcome at a siege; and by that way the correspondence between him and La Ferrier was introduced: and says, That upon the death of La Ferrier, which was about the time that the French king possessed himself of French Counte (which, he takes it, was the year after the siege of Mاستrecht) he sent a narrative to La Chaise, to give him an account of the transactions that had passed betwixt La Ferrier and him; but after that wrote not above three or four letters to La Chaise; and that then the correspondence betwixt them ceased.

He also said, That he had kept a correspondence with the pope's nuncio at Bruxells; which correspondence was first introduced by a proposition that Father Patrick brought from the nuncio there into England, of a great sum of money that should be given by the pope to the king of England, if the catholics here in England might have some favour, answerable to it: but the proposition being so confused that they did not understand it, he was sent by the duke of York to the nuncio at Bruxells, to understand the proposition.

And he says, When he came to Bruxells, the nuncio told him, He had no authority from the court of Rome to make any such proposition; but did it as a private person, and not by order from the court of Rome; but says, That the nuncio, being then to go to Rome, promised Mr. Coleman to do what service there he could in that business: but says, he hath not held any correspondence with the nuncio (this three or four years; nor with any other person, so as to manage an affair: that perhaps might touch upon the business in some letters.

He says, The cypher marked with the provincial's mark, was the cypher betwixt him and St. German; and that he always wrote to the provincial in plain words, and not in cypher; and that there was another cypher betwixt him and Blankart, who was secretary to M. Rovigney; but that was only upon small concerns, and not upon any thing of this nature.

And Mr. Coleman being then asked by the committee, whether he knew of any other sum of money that was proposed or treated on; he answered, that he believed there was money proposed, to keep the king of England from joining with the confederates against France; but does not know of any money paid.

Ordered, That Mr. Richardson, keeper of the prison of Newgate, be forthwith sent for to attend this house.

Mr. Secretary Williamson acquaints the house that in pursuance of the order of the house, the members of this house which are of his majesty's privy council, had attended his majesty: and that his majesty was pleased to signify, that all the papers and writings relating to the plot should be communicated to the house: and that orders were given pursuant to his majesty's command.

Ordered, That the papers relating to the plot now under examination, be delivered to the committee appointed to translate Mr. Coleman's letters: And that col. Birch, sir William Frackland, sir Cyril Wych, sir Tho. Mompesson, sir John Coventry, lord Clifford, Mr. Devereux, sir John Hanmer, sir John Reresby, sir John Waerden, sir Ed. Mansel, Mr. Hall, lord Allington, sir Rich. Temple, be added to the committee: And they are to meet this afternoon; and to sit de die in diem, until they shall have perfected the matters to them referred: And they are impowered to send for persons, papers, and records.

Mr. Richardson, Keeper of the prison of Newgate, being called in, to give an account, What persons have had any communication with Mr. Coleman, since his commitment; he acquainted the house, That there had not been any person admitted to come to, or converse with Mr. Coleman, since his imprisonment, except his servant, to know what he wanted, and his wife, by virtue of an order from the privy council: And that he himself was present whilst she was with him; and that she did not deliver him any thing; and that she was not permitted to discourse to him any thing of news, nor any thing relating to the plot now under examination, besides the committees appointed by each house of parliament to examine him.

HOUSE OF LORDS, October 31.

Whereas William lord Petre stands committed by this house to the Tower of London, for Treason, wherewith he is charged: It is this day ordered, That the constable of the said Tower, his deputy and deputies, do take care that the said lord Petre be kept close prisoner, and not suffered to come to the other prisoners, nor to have the use of pen, ink or paper, till further order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, November 1.

Resolved, &c. That this house would proceed by way of Impeachment against the lord Arundel of Wardour.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and draw up Articles of Impeachment against him.

HOUSE OF LORDS, November 8.

The Lord Treasurer reported, 'That himself and the other lords went yesterday, according to their lordships order, to examine some of the prisoners in the Tower. And the first they had before them was sir John Gage, who owns the examinations which was taken of him, by sir Thomas Stringer, to be upon oath; and that the paper which they shewed him (which was put into their hands by sir Thomas Stringer) was a copy of his said examination. But he denies that he was examined by the Lord Chief Justice; or that he ever received any letter or commission whatsoever from Mr. Oates; or that he knew any thing of any plot against his majesty's service, or against the government.

'Sir William Goring was before them next; who likewise denied any kind of knowledge of those things which he was accused of, or that he knew any such man as Mr. Oates.

'They then sent for the lord Arundel of Wardour; whom they first examined as to his being privy to Mr. Coleman's going to Brussels, to the pope's nuncio; and urged to him, 'That the letters to Coleman, from the nuncio, did give a caution, that none should be trusted with the business, but his royal highness and the lord Arundel.' Yet his lordship did absolutely deny that he knew any thing of the transaction between Coleman and the said nuncio, or of Coleman's errand into Flanders; but said, 'It was likely he took his leave of him before he went.'

'His lordship did own, Coleman was twice with him that day Coleman's papers were seized; that the first time they discoursed of indifferent matters; the last time (which was about six in the evening) Coleman spoke of his papers being seized; and that thereupon his lordship advised him to follow his papers, and render himself.

Being asked, his lordship further declared, 'He never saw Mr. Oates in his life; and that he never was at Mr. Langhorn's chamber but once, and never saw him but that time, and that he never did any business for him; and that he was so far from having any acquaintance with Mr. Langhorn's sons, that he did not know that Mr. Langhorn was married, until he lately asked the question.' And as for his lordship's receiving any patent, commission, or any power from foreigners, he saith, 'He never did, but hath a patent for count of the empire, and for the place of master of the horse to her late majesty the queen mother; and never had any other.'

"His lordship further declared, 'That he had never any thing to do with any Jesuit; but that he knows most of those that are in prison.'

"The lord Petre was the last that their lordships examined; and they acquainted his lordship with Mr. Oates's deposition against him, 'That he had received a commission for lieutenant General, from Mr. Oates, in Mr. Langhorn's chamber, in the presence of Mr. Langworth; and that Mr. Langworth gave his lordship joy thereupon.' All which his lordship did utterly deny; or that he knew Mr. Oates, or had ever seen him; or that he ever saw Mr. Langhorn, or was at his chamber, or knew where his chamber was.' His lordship did indeed acknowledge, 'That he knew Langworth; and that he had lately heard that Mr. Oates had been at his house; but that he never heard of his name until Michaelmas eve last, when his lordship's house was searched for Mr. Langworth.'

"And as for his offering any thing to persons that should change to the Romish religion; his lordship doth absolutely disown it: As also that ever he had any commerce with Mr. Coleman about any matter of business.

"This is the sum of what their lordships had to acquaint the house with; besides an humble supplication of the said lords, which they desired their lordships would acquaint the house with, in regard they cannot petition the house, being debarred from the use of pen, ink, and paper; which is, That this house would be pleased to remit their close imprisonment; and that they might be permitted to walk in the Tower, for their health, which is in danger by their present close restraint."

November 23.

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the lords committees appointed to examine persons and papers concerning the horrid design against his majesty's person and government be, and are hereby, empowered to peruse all the papers and writings of the earl of Powis, lord Arundel of Wardour, and lord Bellasis, prisoners in the Tower, which, being seized, are now in the custody of the clerk of the parliaments; and to give the House an account thereof.

November 26.

Upon report made by the earl of Essex, from the lords committees appointed to examine persons and papers for the discovery of the horrid design against his majesty's person and government, "That their lordships have perused all the papers and writings of the earl of Powis, now a prisoner in the Tower; which, being seized, were, by order of this house, brought and delivered into the custody of the clerk of the parliaments; and find not any papers or writings in the least relating to the said horrid design, they being papers merely of private concern:"

It is thereupon ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the said papers and writings may be delivered to the earl of Powis, or such person or persons as his lordship shall appoint to receive the same; and for so doing, this shall be a sufficient warrant.

December 5.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by Mr. Wharton, &c.

"That the Commons of England in parliament assembled, having received information of divers traiterous practices and designs of a great peer of this house, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, have commanded him to impeach the said Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, of treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors; and he did here, in their names, and in the names of all the Commons of England, impeach the said Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, of treason, and high crimes and misdemeanors.—They have further commanded him to acquaint your lordships, That they will in convenient time exhibit to your lordships the Articles of the Charge against him."

A Message was brought from the Commons, by Mr. Maynard and others:

"That the Commons of England in parliament assembled, having received information of divers traiterous practices and designs of a great peer of this house, William earl of Powis, have commanded him to impeach the said William earl of Powis of treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors; and he did here, in their names, and in the names of all the Commons of England, impeach the said William earl of Powis of treason, and high crimes and misdemeanors.—They have further commanded him to acquaint your lordships, That they will within convenient time exhibit to your lordships the articles of the charge against him."

A Message was brought from the Commons, by Mr. Thynn, &c.

"That the Commons of England in parliament assembled, having received information of divers traiterous practices and designs of a great peer of this house, John lord Bellasis, have commanded him to impeach the said John lord Bellasis of treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors; and he did here, in their names, and in the names of all the Commons of England, impeach the said John lord Bellasis of treason, and high crimes and misdemeanors.—They have further commanded him to acquaint your lordships, That they will within convenient time exhibit to your lordships the Articles of the Charge against him."

A Message was brought from the Commons, by sir Philip Warwick:

"That the Commons of England in parliament assembled, having received information of divers traitorous practices and designs of a great peer of this house, William lord Petre, have commanded him to impeach the said William lord Petre of treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors; and he did here, in their names, and in the names of all the Commons of England, impeach the said William lord Petre of treason, and high crimes and misdemeanors.—They have further commanded him to acquaint your lordships, That they will within convenient time exhibit to your lordships the Articles of the Charge against him."

A Message was brought from the Commons, by sir Scroupe How, &c.

"That the Commons of England in Parliament assembled, having received information of divers traitorous practices and designs of a great peer of this house, William lord viscount Stafford, have commanded him to impeach the said William lord viscount Stafford of treason, and other high crimes and misdemeanors; and he did here, in their names, and in the names of all the Commons of England, impeach the said William lord viscount Stafford, of treason, and high crimes and misdemeanors.—They have further commanded him to acquaint your lordships, That they will within convenient time exhibit to your lordships the articles of the charge against him."

Ordered, That these Impeachments be taken into consideration to-morrow; and all the Judges to be then present.

December 17.

Upon report made by the earl of Clarendon, from the lords committees for examining persons and papers concerning the horrid design against his majesty's person and government, "That their lordships have perused the papers and writings of the lord Arundel of Warder, which were seized, and by order of this house delivered into the custody of the clerk of the parliaments, and have taken out such of them as may be evidence, in order to the further discovery of the said horrid design; and desiring the directions of the house for the disposal of the remainder thereof:"

It is thereupon ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That all such of the lord Arundel of Warder's papers as are only of private concernment may be delivered, by the clerk of the parliaments, to such person or persons as the lord Arundell of Warder shall appoint to receive the same: And this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

December 26.

FRANCE'S EXAMINATION ABOUT THE PLOT.

The duke of Monmouth, by his majesty's command, communicated to the House, the examinations of Miles France and others, taken at the council table; which were read as followeth.

"December 24th 1678. Miles France a silversmith, being this day examined at large, touching the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and being upon oath interrogated what he knew concerning the Plot, made answer as followeth:

"That he was at Mr. Ireland's chamber, in Russel Street, some time before Michaelmas; and that, Fenwick and Grove being there present, Ireland said, 'That there would be 50,000 men in arms.' France asking, where they would be had, and what to do?' Ireland said, 'We must have them in a short time, to settle religion; or else all would be ruined.'

"That, soon after this, Grove came to his shop, to buy two silver spoons, for a christening where he was to be godfather. France asked him, 'What office he should have in the army?' He answered, 'He did not know.' But asking him, 'Who was to govern this army?' He said, 'The lord Powis, the lord Bellasis, lord Petre, and lord Arundel.'

"And further saith, that he was also told by Mr. Fenwick, 'That the lord Powis, lord Bellasis, and lord Arundel, were to command the army.'

"He further saith, that there came to his shop Mr. Le Fevre, to buy a second hand sword; and being asked by him, 'What he meant to do therewith?' He answered, 'He knew not what times they should have.' France replied, 'What then shall we poor tradesmen do?' He said, 'That when catholic religion was brought in, it would be better for tradesmen; and particularly there would be more church work for goldsmiths.'

"He further says, that one Mr. Moore, that belongs to the duke of Norfolk, was seen by him riding in the streets on a very brave horse; upon which occasion, meeting him afterwards in the court at Somerset house, and speaking of that brave horse, Moore wished that he had 10,000 of them; and hoped in a short time that they might have them, for the catholic cause.

"That one Lawrence (an apothecary in Drury-lane, over against the end of Queen's street), when the oaths were upon tendering, wished, 'That half the parliament were poisoned; for they would ruin them all.'

"He further said, that he hath heard one Mr. Messenger (that belongs to the lord Arundel), say, 'That he hoped to see the catholic religion flourish here before it be long. And as concerning the Plot, he has no more to say.'

December 28.

The earl of Essex acquainted the House, "That he had received an information out of the country, of very great concernment."

"Staff. s. The Information of STEPHEN DU-DALE gent. late servant to the lord Aston of Tixhall, concerning the Plot against our sovereign lord the king, as followeth:

"1. This informant saith, that presently, after one Howard, Almoner to the queen, went beyond the seas, he was told by George Hopson (servant to the said lord Aston), 'That there was a design then intended, for the reformation of the government to the Romish religion.'

"2. He informeth, that, in the beginning of September, 1678, he met in Tixall, nigh the lord's gates, the lord Stafford; who said to this informant, 'It was sad that they were troubled for that they could not say their prayers but in a hid manner: But suddenly there would be a reformation to the Romish religion; and if there was but a good success, they should enjoy their religion.' And, upon the 30th day of September last, the said lord Stafford told this informant, 'That there was a design in hand; and if this informant would undertake the design, he should have a good reward, and make himself famous.'

"3. Upon the aforesaid day, immediately after, this informant went into the chamber of Mr. Francis Vrie alias Evers (a Jesuit), in Tixall hall, and asked him, 'What the lord Stafford meant by those words?' And, after he had made him to swear secrecy upon his knees, he told, 'He might be a person employed in the work, and have a good reward, that would make him famous.' And then he told him, 'He must be instrumental, with others, in taking away the king's life; and that it should be done by shooting, or otherwise; and that this informant need not fear, for the pope had excommunicated the king; and that all that were excommunicated by him were heretics, and they might kill them, and be canonized for saints in so doing.'

"4. This informant saith, that the said Evers and Hopson both said, 'That the design was as well to kill the duke of Monmouth as the king.'

"5. That George North (nephew to Pickering, and servant to the lord Aston) lately told this informant, 'That they had taken his uncle (meaning Pickering), and put him into Newgate; and thought the king deserved such an execrable death as was intended him, because of his whoring and debauchery.'

"6. That Mr. Evers said, 'Mr. Bennyfield had a packet of letters delivered to him from the posthouse, which he feared the lord treasurer had notice of; and therefore he delivered them to the duke of York, and that the duke of York delivered them to the king; and that the king gave them to the treasurer after he had read them; but that the king did not believe them, and therefore it was happy, or else the Plot had been discovered.'

"7. That he had received many packets of letters for Evers; some of which this informant broke up, and found them to be and tend to the establishing of the Romish religion, &c.

"8. That he had received several sums of money himself, and knew of divers others that were employed to put forth money, which was and is for the Jesuits use.

"STEPHEN DUGDALE."
Taken upon oath, the 24th day of
December, 1678, before us,
THO. LANE. J. VERNON.

Ordered, That the earl of Bridgwater and earl of Essex, do immediately go to the Tower and examine the lord viscount Stafford upon this information; and return before the house rises.

December 28.

The earl of Bridgwater and the earl of Essex reported, "That according to the order of this house this morning, they have been with the lord viscount Stafford, in the Tower; and have examined his lordship; who said,

"That he spent some part of this last summer in the country in Shropshire and Staffordshire; some time in August he went to bathe; and from thence came to London about a week after Bartholomewtide; where he staid some days, and then went to Tixall, where he came at or near the 12th September.—His lordship knows Mr. Stephen Dugdale, who he takes to be the lord Aston's bailiff; but absolutely denies the having them, or at any time either before or after, had any discourse with him concerning a design of introducing the Roman religion, or any thing relating thereunto.—His lordship also owns to know Mr. Evers, who, as he believes, has lived two or three years in the lord Aston's house; but also denies the having had any discourse with the said Evers concerning the introducing of the Romish religion.—His lordship also knows George Hopson, who waits on the lord Aston in his chamber. North, he takes to be keeper there."

Their lordships further reported, "That the lord viscount Stafford had two desires to present to this House: One, that he may have as speedy a trial as may stand with their lordships conveniency. The other, that there may be a full House of Peers."

March 12, 1679.

The earl of Shaftsbury reported, "That the committee appointed yesterday, to consider in what state the impeachments in the last parliament now stand, have perused the journal of this house; and find that, the 5th day of December 1678, the impeachments against the five lords now prisoners in the Tower were brought from the House of Commons, which consisted of a general charge of Treason and other high crimes; the House of Commons declaring they would in convenient time exhibit the articles of their charge against them.

"The next day, this house appointed to go upon the consideration of these impeachments; and all the judges were appointed to be then present: But nothing was done thereon.

"The lords committees do also find, that an impeachment of high treason, and other high crimes, against Thomas earl of Danby, lord Treasurer, was brought from the House of Commons, the 23rd day of December, 1678; and the particular Articles then exhibited: and the Commons desired that he might be sequestered from his place in parliament, and committed to safe custody.

“That the Lord Treasurer desired copies of all papers and proceedings concerning this business: and that it was then resolved, upon the question, that the Lord Treasurer should not then withdraw.

“It further appears, that, on the 26th of December, 1678, the Lord Treasurer moved the House, for a copy of his charge, and that he might not lie long under it: whereupon it was moved, that the House would consider of the desire of the House of Commons, concerning his confinement.

“The debate was adjourned.

“It appears that this House, on the 27th of December resolved, That the Lord Treasurer should not now be confined; and ordered, that he should have a copy of the Articles, to which he was appointed to bring in his Answer before the third day of January; and that he might have counsel to assist him.”

Upon report made, by the earl of Shaftesbury, from the lords' committees for Examination of the late horrid Conspiracy, concerning the Impeachments brought up from the House of Commons in the last parliament, how they stand entered in the Journal of this House:

It is ordered, That it be, and is hereby, referred to the lords' committees for privileges to consider of the state of the said Impeachments, and all the incidents relating thereunto; and to report their opinion thereupon unto this House.

March 17.

Ordered, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in parliament assembled, that it be, and is hereby, referred to the lords' committees for privileges, to consider, “Whether petitions of appeal, which were presented to this House in the last parliament, be still in force to be proceeded on; as also to consider of the State of the Impeachments brought up from the House of Commons last parliament, and all the incidents relating thereunto;” and make report thereof unto the House.

March 18.

The earl of Essex reported, “That the lords' committees for privileges, in obedience to the order of this House, dated the 17th of this instant March, have considered of the matters referred to them, Whether petitions of appeals, which were presented to this house in the last parliament, be still in force to be proceeded on; as also to consider of the State of the Impeachments brought up from the House of Commons last parliament, and all the incidents relating thereunto, and make report thereof unto the house; and their lordships, upon perusal of the judgment of this house of the 29th of March, 1673, are of opinion, that, in all cases of appeals and writs of error, they continue, and are to be proceeded on, in statu quo, as they stood at the dissolution of the last parliament, without beginning de novo. The judgment and proceedings being large, are omitted to be repeated; the journal of this House being ready, wherein that judgment is entered.

“And, upon consideration had of the matter referred to their lordships concerning the State of the Impeachments brought up from the House of Commons the last parliament, and all the incidents relating thereunto, their lordships find, that the five lords who are in the Tower are upon general impeachment, and the other lord is impeached with special matter assigned: they refer the House to the report made 12 Martii instant, which states what is entered in the journal of the last parliament concerning this matter. And their lordships are of opinion, that the dissolution of the last parliament doth not alter the State of the Impeachments brought up by the Commons in that parliament.”

Ordered, That this report be taken into consideration to-morrow morning, the first business.

March 19.

The House took into consideration the report from the Lords Committees for privileges, “Whether petitions of appeal, which were presented the last parliament, be still in force, to be proceeded on; and concerning the state of impeachments brought up from the House of Commons the last parliament, and all the incidents relating thereunto.”

The House proceeded in the Debate aforesaid. And, after some time spent therein, it was desired, “That this question might be put, Whether to agree with the committee in this report?” Then this previous question was put, “Whether this question shall be now put?” And it was resolved in the affirmative. Then the main question was put, “Whether to agree with the committee in this report?” And it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House this day taking into consideration the Report made from the Lords Committees for privileges, “That, in pursuance of the order of the 17th instant, to them directed, for considering whether petitions of appeal, which were presented to this House in the last parliament, be still in force to be proceeded on, and for considering of the state of the impeachments brought up from the House of Commons the last parliament, and all the incidents relating thereunto; upon which the Lords Committees were of opinion, That, in all cases of appeals and writs of error, they continue, and are to be proceeded on, in statu quo, as they stood at the dissolution of the last parliament, without beginning de novo; and that the dissolution of the last parliament doth not alter the state of the impeachments brought up by the Commons in that parliament.”

After some time spent in consideration thereof;

It is Resolved, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in parliament assembled, That this House agrees with the Lords Committees in the port.

March 20.

The lord bishop of Bath and Wells reported from the Lords Committees for examining matters relating to the discovery of the late horrid Conspiracy, the Examination of Miles Prance, which was read as follows :

“ Midd. as. et Lib. Westm.

“ The Examination of MILES PRANCE, Silver-smith, taken upon oath, the 19th day of March, 1678, before the marquis of Winchester, one of his majesty's Justices of Peace for the said county and liberty.

“ This examinant saith, That he, and Mr. Maddison a barber in Holborne, and Mr. Staley, were drinking at the Cross Keys Tavern over-against Staley's house about a fortnight before the said Staley was taken; where, complaining of the great persecution that the papists lay under, and that if they did not take some speedy course to destroy their enemies, they should be ruined, the said Staley and Maddison resolved to kill the earl of Shaftesbury, as the ringleader of the mischief that they feared would fall upon them; Maddison saying, ‘ That he would engage three, (videlicet,) ‘ Adanson a watchmaker, Prosser a silversmith, ‘ and Bradshaw an upholsterer.’ And the said Maddison coming afterwards to the deponent's shop, shewed the deponent a pistol he had prepared for that purpose.

“ This deponent further saith, That meeting with Adanson at Pettie's, at The White Post in Vere Street, and discoursing of news, Adanson said, ‘ That they should all be undone, if ‘ they did not look about them; therefore they ‘ were resolved to kill the lord Shaftesbury; ‘ he also speaking the same thing to the deponent at The Gridiron in Holborne.

“ This deponent likewise saith, That Prosser told him, ‘ That he was undone; and he intended to kill the lord Shaftesbury; for he, with ‘ other of the Lords, intended to undo the lord ‘ Arundel, who was his very good customer.’ The said Prosser telling the deponent at another time, ‘ That he was to be an ensign under the ‘ said lord Arundel.’

“ This deponent also saith, That Bradshaw, in discourse with him, said, ‘ That he would ‘ make no more to kill a Protestant, than to ‘ kill a dog or a cat; and that he was resolved ‘ to kill some of the busy lords; but the first ‘ should be the lord Shaftesbury.’ And the said Prosser shewed the deponent a pistol at the same time.

“ This deponent further saith, That he the deponent, Mr. Messenger, Prosser, and Maddison, were at Bradlies, in Holborne, about five weeks before Staley was taken; where the said Messenger much complaining of the severity of the laws that were against the papists, and much fearing that they would be put in execution against them by some that were no lovers of them, and particularly the lord Shaftesbury, who did most busy himself about them, said, ‘ That there must be speedy course taken to prevent it.’

“ And this deponent saith, That, some time after this, the said Prosser told him, ‘ That the ‘ said Messenger was the person that promoted ‘ the killing the lord Shaftesbury.’

“ The deponent further saith, That Mr. Goseen told him, both in Covent Garden and in the deponent's shop, ‘ That the king and ‘ parliament would undo them; and if he ‘ were to kill a man, he would kill the king as ‘ soon as any man; and if he had him in France, ‘ he would have killed him before this.’

“ This deponent further saith, That, about six months since, he heard Mr. Mathews, the lord Petre's priest, say, ‘ That his lord and the ‘ lord Bellasis, with some other lords, would ‘ have a good army; and that he hoped the ‘ catholic religion would be settled in England.’

“ This deponent further saith, That, about a year since, he heard Mr. Singleton, a priest, say in the presence of Mr. Hall, ‘ That he ‘ hoped he should be settled in a parish church ‘ before a twelvemonth; and that he did not ‘ fear but that the catholic religion would reign ‘ in England; and that he would not make any ‘ more matter in stabbing 40 parliament men, ‘ than to eat his dinner.’

“ The deponent saith, That he hath also heard Mr. Byfleet and Dr. Guilding say, several times, ‘ That they turned divers people ‘ from the protestant religion to the catholic ‘ religion; and they hoped they should turn ‘ many more.’

“ The deponent also believes, that the said Hall knows where the said Singleton, Byfleet, and Guilding are; for that they used to be always at Hall's house, and the said Hall always received the money for the said Singleton, which was to be distributed for masses for the dead.

“ This deponent further saith, That Mr. Groves told him, ‘ That this was no plot, but a ‘ plot of the Protestants' own making.’ And when his uncle was condemned, he said, ‘ That ‘ they were all rogues that swore against him.’ The deponent then asking him, ‘ What he ‘ thought of the 5,000 men which he knew ‘ were to be raised?’ The said Groves replied, ‘ That might be in jest.’

“ The deponent further saith, That Mr. Ridley, a chirurgeon at the lord Baltimore's house in Wild-street, told him several times, ‘ That ‘ he hoped to be chirurgeon to the Catholic ‘ army in England; and that the lord Bellasis ‘ would much stand his friend in the concern.

“ This deponent further saith, That the lord Arundel of Warden's butler told him, ‘ That ‘ Mr. Messenger was to kill the king, and that ‘ he was to have a good reward if he saved his ‘ life; and if he were killed, the said reward ‘ should be distributed amongst such friends as ‘ he should appoint, by the lord Arundel, the ‘ earl Powis, and the rest of the lords that were ‘ in the same Plot.’

“ The deponent further saith, That, meeting with Mr. Messenger after that, he asked the said Messenger, ‘ Why he would kill the king? ’ The said Messenger answered, ‘ Who told you ‘ of it? ’ The deponent saying, ‘ Your butler ‘ told me; ’ the said Messenger replied, ‘ We ‘ are off that thing now; ’ therefore desired me not to speak of it to any body. Afterwards the said Butler came to the deponent’s shop, and told the deponent, ‘ That he had received great ‘ an. er, in that he had told the deponent of ‘ what Messenger was to attempt.’

“ This deponent further saith, That, somewhat above half a year since, he heard Mr. Wallston Paston say, ‘ That young sir Henry ‘ Beddingfield, of Oxborough Hall, in Norfolk, ‘ was to have a commission from my lord Arundel, for a troop of horse in the army to be ‘ raised by the Papists.’ MILES PRANCE.”
‘ Capt. et jurat. coram me, 19 Martii, 1678.’
WINCHESTER.

March 22.

The earl of Clarendon reported, from the Committee of Examinations, an Information of Miles Prance; which was read, as follows:

“ In the month of August, 1678, I having occasion to write to a friend in the country, but not well knowing how to send, I went to Mr. Paston, who lodged at one Bamber’s, a tailor, in Duke-street, who gave me an account where to send to him; and we immediately fell into discourse concerning the present posture of affairs, and he bid me, ‘ Not fear; for ‘ we should suddenly have better times; for, in ‘ the first place, he said, that the king was a ‘ great heretic; and that the lord Bellasis, and ‘ lord Arundel, and lord Powis, and lord Peters, would have a very good army for the ‘ deposing of the king, and the suppression of ‘ all the heretics; and then the Catholic religion should be established and flourish in this ‘ nation.’ He also said, ‘ That the above ‘ named lords had given out commissions already to some gentlemen in the country, ‘ whom he named to me; that was, to one Mr. ‘ Talbot of Longford, and to sir Henry Benni- ‘ feild of Oxberrow Hall, in Norfolk, and one ‘ Mr. Stoner, who lives within 4 or 5 miles of ‘ Kingston upon Thames.’

“ Also, about two years ago, one Townly, of Townly in Leacashire, came up to London with his two sons that he was carrying over to Doway. He also brought along with him his two brothers, to keep him company; and they took lodgings at one Ayrie’s house in Drury-Lane, where Phenwick lodged, and in a short time two of them went over to Doway with the two lads; and left the other here, who, in the absence of his brothers, declared very often to my wife’s brother and to Adamson, ‘ That, ‘ when his brothers came back again from ‘ Doway, they expected commissions from the ‘ above named lords, for the raising of men to ‘ carry on the Catholic cause.’ This my brother and Adamson often told me at Petrey’s in Vere-street, where we had a club very often of gone but Papists, MILES PRANCE.”

VOL. VII.

“ Also, about the time that the four lords were in the Tower, that is, the duke of Buckingham, my lord Shaftesbury, and lord Wharton, and lord Salisbury, that one Mr. Rightly came to me, and greatly rejoicing at their imprisonment; said, ‘ That now is the time for ‘ the promoting of Catholic religion, because ‘ of the difference that was amongst the lords; ‘ and that, if the duke of York did but follow ‘ the business closely, which the Catholics had ‘ ground to believe he would, they did not ‘ doubt but that it would be settled at that ‘ present juncture of time.’ MILES PRANCE.”

March 27.

The earl of Bridgewater acquainted the House, “ That, when he and the earl of Clarendon and the earl of Essex were at the Tower, the lord Bellasis and the lord viscount Stafford desired their lordships to represent their desires to his majesty, That they may have liberty for persons to come to them upon their occasions; and their lordships moving his majesty herein, he leaves it to this House to consider of it.”

Hereupon the House made this Order following:

“ It being represented to this House, That the lord viscount Stafford and the lord Bellasis, now prisoners in the Tower, do humbly desire that they may have the liberty of persons coming to them, for preparing themselves for their defence, and ordering their own affairs: Upon consideration had thereof, it is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the lord viscount Stafford and lord Bellasis, and the other Lords prisoners in the Tower, shall have the benefit of the access of such persons to them, or any of them, as may be useful to them for the purposes aforesaid, so as the said Lords do cause lists of the names of such persons as are from time to time so to be made use of by them respectively, to be forthwith brought into this House.”

April 1.

This day Benedict Prosser was brought to the bar; and Miles Prance, being called in, charged Prosser, “ That he came to his shop, and said, ‘ That he was undone; and that he did intend to kill the lord Shaftesbury, for he with other of the Lords did intend to undo the lord Arundel, who was his very good customer.’ And the said Prosser also told him, at Bradley’s in Holborn, ‘ That he was to be an ensign under the lord Arundel.’”

Miles Prance further said, “ That he and Mr. Messenger, and Prosser, and Mattison, were at Bradley’s in Holborn, about five weeks before Staley was taken; and Messenger much complaining of the severity of the laws that were against the catholics, and much fearing they would be put in execution against them by some that were not lovers of the catholics, and particularly the lord Shaftesbury, who did most busy himself about them, and therefore he said, ‘ That there must be speedy course taken to prevent it.’” and that, after their meeting at the Cross Keys, by Staley's, he met with Prosser at Bradley's, where he told him, That Messenger was the person that promoted the killing of the lord Shaftsbury."

Hereupon the House made the Order following:

"Whereas Benedict Prosser was this day brought to the bar by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod attending this House, and was there charged upon oath with matters amounting to high-treason: It is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the said Benedict Prosser be forthwith conveyed to the prison of Newgate, by the said gentleman usher or his deputy or deputies, there to remain in safe custody till he shall be discharged by due course of law; and that the keeper of Newgate take care that no person be admitted to the said Benedict Prosser except his wife, till further order; and this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

"To the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod attending this House, and to the keeper of Newgate, and their respective deputies, and every of them."

April 7.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons by the lord Russel and others; who was commanded, by the House of Commons, to bring up Articles of Impeachment of High-Treason, and other high crimes and offences, against William earl of Powys, William viscount Stafford, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, William lord Petre, and John lord Bellasis, now prisoners in the Tower of London.

The said Articles were read, as followeth:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT, of High Treason, and other high crimes and offences, against WILLIAM earl of POWYS, WILLIAM viscount STAFFORD, HENRY lord ARUNDEL of WARDOUR, WILLIAM lord PETRE and JOHN lord BELLASIS, now prisoners in the Tower of London.

"That, for many years now last past, there hath been contrived and carried on, by papists, a traitorous and execrable Conspiracy and Plot, within this kingdom of England and other places, to alter, change and subvert the ancient government and laws of this kingdom and nation, and to suppress the true religion therein established, and to extirpate and destroy the professors thereof; which said Plot and Conspiracy was contrived and carried on in divers places, and by several ways and means, and by a great number of persons of several qualities and degrees, who acted therein, and intended thereby to execute and accomplish the aforesaid wicked and traitorous designs and purposes.

"That the said William earl of Powys, William viscount Stafford, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, William lord Petre, and John lord Bellasis, together with Philip Howard, commonly called cardinal of Norfolk, Thomas White, alias Whitebread commonly called provincial of the Jesuits in England, Richard Strange, lately called provincial of the Jesuits in England, — Vincent commonly called the provincial of the Dominicans in England, James Corker, commonly called president of the Benedictines, sir John Warner, alias Clare, baronet, William Harcourt, John Keins, Nicholas Blundel, — Pole, Edward Mico, Thomas Bedingfield, alias Bonefeild, Basill Langworth, Charles Peters, Richard Peters, John Connyers, sir George Wakeman, Thomas Fenwick, Dominick Kelly, — Fitzgerrald, — Evers, sir Thomas Preston, William Lovell, Jesuits, lord Baltemore, John Carrell, John Townley, Richard Langhorn, William Fogarty, Thomas Penny, Mathew Medbourne, Edward Coleman, William Ireland, John Grove, Thomas Pickering, John Smith, and divers other Jesuits, priests, friars and other persons, as false traitors to his majesty and this kingdom, within the time aforesaid, have traiterously consulted, contrived, and acted, to and for the accomplishing of the said wicked pernicious, and traitorous designs; and, for that end, did most wickedly and traiterously agree, conspire, and resolve, to imprison, depose, and murder, his sacred majesty, and to deprive him of his royal state, crown and dignity; and, by malicious and advised speaking, writing and otherwise, declared such their purposes and intentions; also to subject this kingdom and nation to the pope and histyrannical government; and to seize and share amongst themselves the estates and inheritances of his majesty's Protestant subjects; and to erect and restore abbies, monasteries, and other convents and societies, which have been long since by the laws of this kingdom suppressed, for their superstition and idolatry; and to deliver up and restore to them the lands and possessions now vested in his majesty and his subjects by the laws and statutes of this realm; and also to found and erect new monasteries and convents, and to remove and deprive all Protestant bishops, and other ecclesiastical persons, from their offices, benefices, and preferments, and by this means to destroy his majesty's person, extirpate the Protestant religion, overthrow the rights, liberties, and properties of all his majesty's good subjects, subvert the lawful government of this kingdom, and subject the same to the tyranny of the see of Rome.

"That the said conspirators and their complices and confederates, traiterously had and held several meetings, assemblies, and consultations, wherein it was contrived and designed among them what means should be used, and what persons and instruments should be employed, to murder his majesty; and did then and there resolve to effect it by poisoning, shooting, stabbing, or some such like ways and means, and offered rewards and promises of advantage to several persons to execute the same; and hired and employed several wicked persons, to go to Windsor and other places, where his majesty did reside, to murder and destroy his majesty; which said persons, or some of them, accepted such rewards, and undertook the perpetrating thereof, and did actually go to the said places for that end and purpose.

“ That the said conspirators, the better to compass their traitorous designs, have consulted to raise, and have procured and raised, men, money, horses, arms, and ammunition, and also have made application to, and treated and corresponded with, the pope, his cardinals, nuncios, and agents, and with other foreign ministers and persons, to raise and obtain supplies of men, money, arms, and ammunition, therewith to make, levy, and raise war, rebellion, and tumults, within this kingdom, and to invade the same with foreign forces, and to surprize, seize, and destroy, his majesty's navy, forts, magazines, and places of strength, within this kingdom; whereupon the calamities of war, murders of innocent subjects, men, women, and children, burnings, rapines, devastations, and other dreadful miseries and mischiefs, must inevitably have ensued, and the ruin and destruction of this nation.

“ And the said conspirators have procured and accepted, and delivered out, several instruments, commissions, and powers, made or granted by or under the pope, or other unlawful and usurped authority, to raise and dispose of men, monies, arms, and other things necessary for their wicked and traitorous designs; and namely, a commission for the said Henry lord Arundell of Wardour, to be lord chancellor of England; another commission to the said William earl of Powys, to be lord treasurer of England; another commission to the said John lord Bellasis, to be general of the army to be raised; another commission to the said William lord Petre, to be lieutenant general of the said army; and a power for the said William viscount Stafford, to be paymaster of the army.

“ That, in order to encourage themselves in prosecuting their said wicked plots, conspiracies, and treasons, and to hide and hinder the discovery of the same, and to secure themselves from justice and punishment, the conspirators aforesaid, their complices and confederates, have used many wicked and diabolical practices; viz. they did cause their priests to administer to the said conspirators an oath of secrecy, together with their sacrament; and also did cause their said priests, upon confessions, to give their absolutions upon condition that they should conceal the said conspiracy; and when, about the month of September last, sir Edmond Godfrey, a justice of peace, had, according to the duty of his oath and office, taken several examinations and informations concerning the said conspiracy and plot, the said conspirators, or some of them, by advice, assent, counsel, and instigation of the rest, did incite and procure divers persons to lie in wait and pursue the said sir Edmond Godfrey divers days with intent to murder him, which at last was perpetrated and effected by them; for which said horrid crimes and offences, Robert Green, Henry Berry, and Lawrence Hill, have since been attainted, and Dominick Kelly, and ——— Gerald, and others, are fled for the same; after which murder, and before the body was found, or the murder known to any but the accomplices therein, the said persons falsely gave out that he was alive, and privately married; and, after the body found, dispersed a false and malicious report that he had murdered himself; which said murder was committed with design to stifle and suppress the evidence he had taken and had knowledge of, and discourage and deter magistrates and others from acting in further discovery of the said conspiracy and plot; for which end also the said sir Edmond Godfrey, while he was alive, was, by them, their accomplices and favourers, threatened and discouraged in his proceedings about the same; and, of their further malice, they have wickedly contrived, by many false suggestions, to lay the imputation and guilt of the aforesaid horrid and detestable crimes upon the protestants, that so thereby they might escape the punishments they have justly deserved, and expose the protestants to great scandal, and subject them to persecution and oppression in all kingdoms and countries where the Romish religion is received and professed.

“ All which treasons, crimes and offences, above-mentioned, were contrived, committed, perpetrated, acted and done, by the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundell of Wardour, and John lord Bellasis, and other the conspirators aforesaid, against our sovereign lord the king, his crown and dignity, and against the laws and statutes of this kingdom.

“ Of all which treasons, crimes, and offences, the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in parliament assembled, do, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England, impeach the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundell of Wardour, and John lord Bellasis, and every of them.

“ And the said Commons by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any other accusations or impeachments against the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundell of Wardour, and John lord Bellasis, and every of them, and also of replying to the answers which they and every of them shall make to the premises or any of them, or to any other accusation or impeachment which shall be by them exhibited (as the cause according to course and proceedings of parliament shall require), do pray, that the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundell of Wardour, and John lord Bellasis, and every of them, be put to answer all and every of the premises; and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, may be upon them and every of them had and used, as shall be agreeable to law and justice, and course of parliament."

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the Lords' committees for privileges do meet this afternoon, to consider of the method and progress of the proceedings to be had upon the Trials of the Lords now prisoners in the Tower, upon the impeachments brought up against them from the House of Commons; and that the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, Mr. Baron Thurland, and his majesty's Attorney General, do attend their lordships this afternoon, in the House of Peers.

April 8.

The earl of Shaftesbury reported, from the Lords' committees for privileges, to whom was referred to consider of the method and progress of the proceedings to be had upon the trials of the lords now prisoners in the Tower, upon the impeachments brought up against them from the House of Commons,

"That their lordships are of opinion, that the lords now prisoners in the Tower ought to be brought to the bar together, and kneel there; and then stand up, and hear the articles of the charge against them read.—That the said lords may have counsel, to plead for them in matter of law, but not in matter of fact.—That such counsel as the said lords shall name to the House, shall have free liberty of access to their lordships, in order to their trials.—That the said lords shall have free liberty of any person coming to them, so as the Lieutenant do give this House an account next morning of such persons as have been with them the day before, if the House do then sit; otherwise to give the said account to one of the secretaries of state, and after to the House at their next sitting.—That in regard that, in cases of impeachments in parliament, the Lord High Steward, or Lord Steward of the Household, being of right to supply the place of Speaker in the House of Peers, an humble address may be made to his majesty, That he will be pleased to appoint a Lord High Steward, to supply the place of Speaker of the House of Peers, during the time of the said trial."

This Report was read, and agreed to.

Whereas William earl of Powis, William lord viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundel of Warder, and John lord Bellasis, now prisoners in the Tower of London, are impeached of High Treason, &c. by the Commons in parliament assembled, who have brought into this House particular articles against them:

It is this day ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the Lieutenant of the said Tower be, and is hereby, required to bring the said earl of Powis, lord viscount Stafford, lord Petre, lord Arundell of Warder, and lord Bellasis, in safe custody, to the bar of this house to-morrow, at 10 of the clock in the forenoon, to hear the said articles wherewith they stand charged read unto them; and for so doing, this shall be his sufficient warrant.

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the earl of Bedford, earl of Bridgewater, and earl of Aylesbury do attend his majesty, humbly to desire him, from this House, "That in regard that, in cases of impeachments in parliament, the lord high steward, or lord steward of the household, being of right to supply the place of Speaker in the House of Peers, his majesty will be pleased to appoint a lord high steward to supply the place of Speaker of the House of Peers, during the time of the trials of the lords now prisoners in the Tower, upon their Impeachments."

Whereas William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundell of Warder, and John lord Bellasis, now prisoners in the Tower of London, being impeached by the House of Commons of high treason, they to make their respective defences upon their trials:

It is this day ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the said lords may have counsel to plead for them, in matter of law, but not in matter of fact; and that such counsel as the said lords shall name to this House shall have free liberty of access to their lordships, in order to their trials; as also any other persons to come to them, so as the lieutenant of the Tower do give this House an account next morning of such persons as have been with them respectively the day before, if the House do then sit; otherwise he is to give the said account to one of the secretaries of state, and after to the House at their next sitting.

The earl of Bedford reported, "That himself and the other lords, who were appointed to attend his majesty with the humble Address of this House, to desire his majesty, He would be pleased to appoint a Lord High Steward, to supply the place of Speaker of the House of Peers, during the time of the trials of the lords now prisoners in the Tower, upon their impeachments, had attended his majesty: And his majesty gives this answer, That he will speedily give order for a commission for a Lord High Steward, as is desired."

April 9.

The question being put, "Whether, when the lords come to the bar, the doors shall be left open?" It was resolved in the negative.

This day being appointed for William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundell of Warder, and John lord Bellasis, prisoners in the Tower, to be brought to the bar, to hear the Articles of Impeachment; of High-Treason, wherewith they are charged by the House of Commons, read unto them; the gentleman usher of the black rod was commanded to call for them in.

Upon which, the said earl of Powis, viscount

Stafford, lord Petre, and lord Arundell of Wardour, were brought to the bar, by the lieutenant of the Tower; where they kneeled, till the Lord Chancellor bid them stand up.

Then, by command of the house, the said Articles of Impeachment were read unto them.

After which, the Lord Chancellor asking them, what they had to say for themselves (letting them know that his majesty would appoint a Lord High Steward for their trials;) the said lords made several requests unto the House, in order to their answering the said charge, and making their defences upon their trials.

Which requests (the said lords being withdrawn) the House took into consideration.

And, after some time spent therein, the said lords were called to the bar again; and the Lord Chancellor did let their lordships know, "That the House had considered of their requests; and had ordered that the several indictments found against them, the said earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, lord Petre, lord Arundell of Wardour, and lord Bellasis, by the grand jury, shall be brought into this Court by Writ of Certiorari; and that their lordships may have copies of the said Articles of Impeachment; and shall have time given them, till Tuesday the 15th day of this instant April, to send in their respective answers thereunto, with further time to answer to any new Articles that shall be brought up against them; and shall have liberty to search and take out copies of Records and Journals, in order to their defence; and that their lordships shall have summons issued for such witnesses as they shall respectively send in the names of, to be by them made use of at their trials; which witnesses shall have the protection of this House, for their safe coming and going, during the time of the said trials; and that their lordships shall have those persons assigned to them for counsel, in order to their defences upon their trials, whom they have respectively named to this House; and lastly, that all the peers shall be summoned, to the end there may be a full House at the said trials."

Then, notice being taken by the House, that the lord Bellasis had not appeared at the bar; Thomas Plessington and Robert Dent, being sworn at the bar, attested, "That the lord Bellasis is at this present so ill and lame with the gout, that he is not able to stir out of his bed, nor to turn himself in his bed without help."

Which reasonable excuse the House allowing of; the said Thomas Plessington, on behalf of the lord Bellasis, desired, "That his lordship might have a copy of the Articles; and that counsel (whom he named) might be assigned to him."

Which, with the other requests made by the lords who appeared, were equally condescended to, for the lord Bellasis, as for the other four lords.

Then the House made the Order following:

"Whereas William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, and Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, have appeared this day at the bar, to hear the Articles read; whereby they, together with John lord Bellasis, are charged upon impeachment of high treason: It is ordered, That the said William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundel, and John lord Bellasis, shall stand committed to the Tower of London, there to be kept in safe custody, in order to their trials; having the same liberty of access of persons to them as they had before this day; and this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

"To the Lieutenant of the Tower of London, his deputy and deputies, and every of them."

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That his majesty's Writ of Certiorari be issued, returnable into the House of Peers in parliament assembled, for bringing into this court the several indictments, with all things thereunto belonging, whereby William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, and John lord Bellasis, are found guilty of high treason.

It is this day ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That Mr. Saunders and Mr. Holt, counsellors at law, be, and are hereby, assigned to be of counsel, with William earl of Powis, now prisoner in the Tower, in order to his defence upon his trial, upon the impeachment of the House of Commons, whereby he is charged with high treason; and that they, the said Saunders and Mr. Holt, may have free access to the said earl of Powis, from time to time, for that purpose.

William viscount Stafford; the like Order for Mr. Saunders, and Mr. Anthony Keck.

William lord Petre; the like Order for Serj. Raymond, Mr. Wallop, Mr. Saunders, and Mr. Bradbury.

Henry lord Arundel of Wardour; the like Order for Mr. Saunders, Mr. Pollexfen, and Mr. Holt.

John lord Bellasis; the like Order for sir Thomas Skipwith, and Mr. Saunders.

Forasmuch as several Peers are upon their trials for their lives, and that it is the duty of the whole body of the Peers to attend that service: It is therefore this day ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the Lord Chancellor do write letters to every Peer now absent, and able to travel without danger of life, forthwith to come to town, and remain here, attending the service of this House, until the said trials be over; intimating to them therein, "That, if they shall not attend the service of this House according to summons, this House will send a serjeant at arms, to bring them up in custody."

This House being moved, "That the lord Petre, prisoner in the Tower, who hath appeared at the bar this day, may have leave to see his lady, now lying-in."

It is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the said lord Petre, attended by the Lieutenant of the Tower, and such guards as he thinks fit, be, and is hereby, authorised and permitted to call and see his lady, now lying-in, in his return to the Tower.

April 12.

The House took into consideration, "Whether to revoke the Order made for the lords in the Tower to have liberty of having copies out of the Journals of this House, to be made use of for their defence at their trials."

The opinion of the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, Baron Thurland, and Mr. Attorney General, was required upon this case :

"Whether, in inferior courts, a prisoner that stands in question for his life may be denied copies of any entries upon Record for his defence?"

And their unanimous opinion is, "That no prisoner indicted for any capital offence in the King's Bench, can have a copy of the indictment, without order of the court.

"That such a prisoner cannot of right demand copies of informations of witnesses against him."

The House came to no resolution herein.

It is this day ordered, That Mr. Henry Lawson be, and is hereby, assigned to be solicitor for the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, lord Petre, lord Arundel of Wardour, and lord Bellasis, now prisoners in the Tower, upon their lordships request for that purpose, to look after and manage such matters as may concern them, or any of them, in order to their trials; and that the said Henry Lawson may, from time to time, till the said trials shall be over, have free liberty of access to their lordships, or any of them, for that purpose.

Ordered, That Mr. Thompson is assigned counsel for the lord Bellasis, and Mr. Hunt for the lord viscount Stafford.

April 15.

This day being appointed for the lords prisoners in the Tower to put in their Answers to the Articles of Impeachment of the House of Commons against them; which being called for, and not come :

It is ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the earl of Powis, lord viscount Stafford, lord Petre, and lord Arundel of Wardour, be brought to the bar of this House to-morrow morning, at eleven o'clock, by the Lieutenant of the Tower, to put in their respective Answers to the said Articles of Impeachment: And this shall be a sufficient warrant on that behalf.

It was moved, "That the lord Bellasis's Answer might be received now, in regard of his lordship's sickness."

Which the House received, and read, as followeth :

LORD BELLASIS'S ANSWER TO HIS IMPEACHMENT.

"The several Plea of John lord Bellasis, now prisoner in the Tower of London, to part, and his several Answer to the residue, of the Articles of Impeachment of High Treason, and other Crimes and Offences, exhibited to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, against the said Lord, and others therein named, whereof the said Lord stands impeached, by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England.

"The said lord, in the first place, and before all others, protesting his innocence of and from all the treasons, and other crimes and offences whatsoever, in the said articles contained, and no way acknowledging, confessing, granting, or admitting, all or any the clauses, articles, or matters, in the said articles of impeachment contained or specified, so far as the same any way concerns him, to be true, as in and by the same articles of impeachment is supposed; and humbly praying a favourable construction by this most honourable House of what the said lord shall humbly offer, by way of plea, to such part of the impeachment as is hereunder mentioned, and that the same may not be taken or construed as any subterfuge or evasion of the justice of this most honourable House, to which the said lord doth, with all humility, wholly submit himself; desiring above all things the trial of his cause by this most honourable House, so that he may be provided to make his just defence, for the clearing of his innocence from the great and heinous crimes charged upon him by the said impeachment: This being prayed, as also liberty to correct, amend, or explain, any thing in this his plea and answer contained, which may any way give this honourable House any occasion of offence; and, he hopeth, being granted; the said lord, as to that part of the impeachment which containeth the matter following; namely, 'That, for many years now last past, there hath been contrived and carried on, by Papists, a traitorous and execrable conspiracy and plot, within this kingdom of England and other places, to alter, change, and subvert, the ancient government and laws of this kingdom and nation, and to suppress the true religion therein established, and to extirpate and destroy the professors thereof; and that the said plot and conspiracy was contrived and carried on, in divers places, and by several ways and means, and by a great number of persons of several qualities and degrees, who acted therein, and intended thereby to execute and accomplish their aforesaid wicked and traitorous designs and purposes; that the said John lord Bellasis, and the other lords therein named, together with several other persons therein likewise named or mentioned, as false traitors to his said Impeachment are objected against him, yet it is no way possible for him, upon any trial thereof, to be prepared with his just and lawful defence, by witnesses, to prove himself absent and in another place at the time of such meeting or consultation to or for any the wicked designs and purposes in the said impeachment mentioned, as upon his trial may be suddenly objected against him, when he cannot by any care or foresight whatsoever have such witnesses ready as could disprove the same, if he were certainly charged for any traitorous act or crime at any time certainly alledged in the said impeachment; nor is the same charge in the said impeachment more certain as to the place of any such traitorous meeting or consultation laid down in the said impeachment, it being only alleged to be ‘at divers places within the realm of England and elsewhere;’ which, for the causes aforesaid, is likewise so utterly uncertain, that it deprives the said lord of his just defence upon his trial: The uncertainty likewise of the number of meetings or consultations to the wicked purposes in the impeachment mentioned, and the not shewing how many times the said lord met and consulted, and with whom in particular, doth likewise deprive him of all possibility of making his defence, or producing his witnesses; for that the said lord Bellasis, being wholly innocent, cannot suppose or imagine what meeting or consultation, either to raise men or money, for the carrying on of a traitorous design, or to any other wicked intent or purpose in the said impeachment mentioned, shall or may be objected against him upon his trial; and it is as much impossible for him to bring witnesses to prove all the meetings he hath had with others in his life-time, as it is for him to know, upon this general charge, what meeting or consultation may upon his trial be objected against him as a traitorous meeting, or consultation: and where it is in the said impeachment charged upon the said lord, ‘That he hath uttered treason, by malicious and advised speaking, writing, and otherwise declaring;’ that the said lord saith, that never any traitorous thought ever entered into his heart; and therefore he cannot possibly know or discover what words or writing he ever spoke, uttered, writ, or declared, which are now charged upon him as treason; there being no words or writing at all specified in the impeachment, whereby the said lord might know how to prepare his defence against them, or that this most honourable House might judge whether the same words or writing were in law treasonable or not.

“ All which uncertainties, and the imminent and apparent danger of the said lord’s being thereupon surprised in his trial of a cause of this consequence to the said lord, wherein his life, and honour more dear to him than his life, and all else that is dear to him in this world, are immediately concerned, being seriously weighed and considered by your lordships; he humbly prayeth, as by his counsel he is advised,

That your lordships will not put him to answer the said impeachment, as to the charges herein above recited, till the same be reduced to some competent certainty, that the same lord may know what to answer unto, and may be thereby enabled to make his just defence accordingly : All which notwithstanding, he humbly submits to your lordships grave judgments and considerations ; professing himself always ready and willing to do and submit to whatsoever your lordships in justice shall order and think fit. And as to all other the treasons, crimes, and offences whatsoever, contained, mentioned, or specified in the said impeachment ; the said lord, protesting that they are incertainly and insufficiently alledged, and therefore saving to himself the benefit of exception thereto, for answer thereto, saith, That he is not nor ever was, guilty of the said treasons, crimes, and offences, or of any or either of them, of which he stands charged by the said impeachment ; and, for his trial thereof, putteth himself upon and humbly submitteth to, the judgment of your lordships ; whose justice the said lord now deth, and always shall, rely upon, and therein acquiesce.

“ BELASTIA.”

Ordered, That this Answer be communicated to the House of Commons, with this intimation, That it be speedily returned.

April 16.

This House taking notice, with great dislike, of tumultuous concourse and noise of people, upon occasion of bringing the lords Prisoners in the Tower to Westminster :

It is this day ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the Lord Mayor of the city of London, and the justices of peace and head bailiff for the city of Westminster, and the justices of peace for the county of Surrey, be, and are hereby, required respectively, within their several jurisdictions and limits, to take care and order, in such manner as to them shall seem meet, that there be no such disorderly assembling of people, in the said cities of London or Westminster, borough of Southwark, or at, or near Lambeth, or in any part of any of the said places, at any time, and in particular at such times as the lords who are prisoners in the Tower shall be brought either by land or by water to Westminster, from henceforth, during the time of their respective trials.

This day being appointed for the four Lords prisoners in the Tower to put in their Answers to the Impeachment of the House of Commons against them :

The House ordered, that every lord singly should be brought to the bar, and kneel, and be demanded, ‘ Whether he had brought his ‘ Answer.’

EARL POWIS'S PLEA AND ANSWER.

The first was the earl of Powis ; who delivered in his Answer in writing ; which was made as followeth :

“ The several Plea of William earl of Powis now prisoner in the Tower of London, to part, and his several Answer to the residue, of the Articles of Impeachment of High Treason, and other high Crimes and Offences, exhibited to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, against the said earl and others therein named, whereof the said earl stands impeached, by the Knights Citizens and Burgesses, in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England.

“ The said earl, in the first place, and before all other, protesting his innocency of and from all the treasons, and other crimes and offences whatsoever, in the said articles contained, and no way acknowledging, confessing, granting, or admitting, all or any the clauses, articles, or matters, in the said Articles of Impeachment contained or specified (so far as the same any way concerns him) to be true, as in and by the same Articles of Impeachment is supposed ; and humbly praying a favourable construction by this most honourable House of what the said earl shall humbly offer by way of plea to such part of the impeachment as is hereunder mentioned, and that the same may not be taken or construed as any subterfuge or evasion of the justice of this most honourable House, to which the said earl doth with all humility submit himself ; desiring above all things the trial of his cause by this most honourable House, so that he may be provided to make his just defence for the clearing of his innocency from the great and heinous crimes charged upon him by the said Impeachment ; This being prayed, as also liberty to correct, amend, or explain, anything in this his plea and answer contained, which may any way give the most honourable House any occasion of offence ; and he hopeth, being granted ; the said earl, as to that part of the impeachment that containeth the matter following, namely, ‘ That, for many years now last past, there hath been contrived and carried on, by papists, a traiterous and execrable Conspiracy and Plot, within this kingdom of England and other places, to alter, change, and subvert, the ancient government and laws of this kingdom and nation, and to suppress the true religion therein established, and to extirpate and destroy the professors thereof ; and that the said Plot and Conspiracy was contrived and carried on in divers places, and by several ways and means, and by a great number of persons of several qualities and degrees who acted therein, and intended thereby to execute and accomplish their aforesaid wicked and traiterous designs and purposes ; that the said earl of Powis, and the other lords therein named, together with the several other persons therein likewise named or mentioned, as false traitors to his majesty and this kingdom, within the time aforesaid, have traiterously consulted, contrived, and acted, to and for the accomplishing the said wicked, pernicious and traitorous designs; and for that end did most wickedly and traitorously agree, conspire, and resolve, to imprison, depose, and murder, his sacred majesty, and to deprive him of his royal estate, crown, and dignity; and, by malicious and advised speaking, writing, and otherwise declaring such their purposes and intentions; and also to subject this kingdom and nation to the pope, and to his tyrannical government; and to seize and share amongst themselves the estates and inheritances of his majesty's Protestant subjects; and to erect and restore abbeys, monasteries, and other convents and societies, which have been long since by the laws of this kingdom suppressed, for their superstition and idolatry, and to deliver up and restore to them the lands and possessions now vested in his majesty and his subjects by the laws and statutes of this realm; and also to found and erect new monasteries and convents; and to remove and deprive all Protestant bishops, and other ecclesiastical persons, from their offices, benefices, and preferments; and by this means to destroy his majesty's person, to extirpate the Protestant religion, overthrow the rights, liberties, and properties, of all his majesty's good subjects, subvert the lawful government of this kingdom, and subject the same to the tyranny of the see of Rome; and that the said conspirators, and their complices and confederates, traitorously had and held several meetings, assemblies, and consultations, wherein it was contrived and designed amongst them, what means should be used, and what persons and instruments should be employed, to murder his majesty; and did then and there resolve to effect it, by poisoning, shooting, stabbing, or some such like ways and means; and also as to that part of the impeachment which chargeth, 'That the said earl of Powis, and the other persons in the said impeachment named the better to compass their traitorous designs, have consulted to raise men, money, horses, arms, and ammunition;' the said earl of Powis, saving to himself (and which he humbly prayeth may be reserved to him) the liberty of answering over, and denying all and singular the said crimes and offences so charged upon him, saith, and humbly offereth to this most honourable House, that the charge of those crimes and offences, so imposed upon him by the said impeachment, is so general and uncertain, that he cannot by any possibility give any direct answer thereto, nor make his just and lawful defence upon any trial of the same; for that the said charge hath no manner of certainty in point of time, it being laid only, 'for many years now last past a traitorous and execrable Plot and Conspiracy' hath been contrived and carried on; which may be for five, ten, twenty, or thirty, or more years past; whereby, though the said earl knoweth himself to be altogether innocent of any such horrid and detestable crimes, as by the said impeachment are objected against him, yet it is no way possible for him, upon any trial thereof, to be prepared with his just and lawful defence, by witnesses, to prove himself absent, and in another place, at the time of such meeting or consultation to or for any the wicked designs and purposes in the said impeachment mentioned, as upon his trial may be suddenly objected against him, when he cannot, by any care or foresight whatsoever, have such witnesses ready as could disprove the same, if he were certainly charged for any traitorous act or crime, at any time certainly alledged in the said impeachment; nor is the same charge in the said impeachment more certain as to the place of any such traitorous meeting or consultation laid down in the said impeachment, it being only alledged to be 'at divers places within the realm of England, and elsewhere;' which, for the causes aforesaid, is likewise so utterly uncertain, that it deprives the said earl of his just defence upon his trial: The uncertainty likewise of the number of meetings or consultations, to the wicked purposes in the impeachment mentioned; and the not shewing how many times the said earl met and consulted, and with whom in particular, doth likewise deprive him of all possibility of making his defence, or producing his witnesses; for that the said earl, being wholly innocent, cannot suppose or imagine what meeting or consultation, either to raise men or money, for the carrying on of a traitorous design, or to any other wicked intent or purpose in the said impeachment mentioned, shall or may be objected against him upon his trial; and it is as much impossible for him to bring witnesses to prove all the meetings he hath had with others in his lifetime, as it is for him to know, upon this general charge, what meeting or consultation may upon his trial be objected against him as a traitorous meeting or consultation: And where it is in the said impeachment charged upon the said earl, 'That he hath uttered treason, by malicious and advised speaking, writing, and otherwise declaring;' the said earl saith, That never any traitorous thought ever entered into his heart; and therefore he cannot possibly know or discover what words or writing he ever spoke, uttered, wrote, or declared, which are now charged upon him as treason, there being no words or writing at all specified in the impeachment, whereby the said earl might know how to prepare his defence against them, or that this most honourable House might judge whether the same words or writing were in law treasonable or not.

"All which uncertainties, and the imminent and apparent danger of the said earl's being thereupon surprised in his trial of a cause of this consequence to the said earl, wherein his life (and honour, more dear to him than his life), and all else that is dear to him in this world, are immediately concerned, being seriously weighed and considered by your lordships; he humbly prayeth, as by his counsel he is advised, That your lordships will not put him to answer the said impeachment, as to the charges herein above recited, till the same be reduced to some competent certainty, that the earl may know what to answer unto, and may be thereby enabled to make his just defence accordingly: All which notwithstanding, he humbly submitteth to your lordships grave judgments and considerations; professing himself always ready and willing to do and submit to whatsoever your lordships in justice shall order or think fit. And as to all other the treasons, crimes, and offences whatsoever, contained, mentioned, or specified in the said impeachment; the said earl, protesting that they are uncertainly and insufficiently alleged, and therefore saving to himself the benefit of exception thereunto, for answer thereto saith, That he is not, nor ever was, guilty of the said treasons, crimes, and offences, or of any or either of them, of which he stands charged by the said impeachment; and, for his trial thereof, putteth himself upon, and humbly submitteth to, the judgment of your lordships; whose justice the said earl now doth, and always shall, rely upon, and therein acquiesce.

Powis."

VISCOUNT STAFFORD'S PLEA AND ANSWER.

The lord viscount Stafford was brought in like manner, and delivered in his Answer; which was read as followeth:

"The several Plea of WILLIAM viscount of STAFFORD, now prisoner in the Tower of London, to part, and his several Answer to the Residue, of the Articles of Impeachment of High-Treason, and other high Crimes and Offences, exhibited to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, against the said viscount and others therein named, whereof the said viscount stands impeached, by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England.

"The said viscount, in the first place, and before all others, protesting his innocency of and from all the treasons, and other crimes and offences whatsoever, in the said Articles contained, and no way acknowledging, confessing, granting or admitting, all or any the clauses, articles, or matters, in the said Articles of Impeachment contained or specified (so far as the same may any way concern him) to be true, as in and by the same Articles of Impeachment is supposed; and humbly praying a favourable construction, by this most honourable House, of what the said viscount shall humbly offer, by way of plea, to such part of the Impeachment as is hereunder mentioned, and that the same may not be taken or construed as any subterfuge or evasion of the justice of this most honourable House, to which the said viscount doth, with all humility, wholly submit himself; desiring above all things the trial of his cause by this most honourable House, so that he may be provided to make his just defence, for the clearing of his innocency from the great and heinous crimes charged upon him by the said Impeachment: This being prayed, as also liberty to correct, amend, or explain, any thing in this his Plea and Answer contained, which may any way give this most honourable House any occasion of offence; and, he hopeth, being granted; the said viscount, as to that part of the Impeachment that containeth the matter following; namely, 'That, for many years now

' last past, there hath been contrived and carried on, by papists, a traitorous and execrable
' conspiracy and plot, within this kingdom of ' England and other places, to alter, change,
' and subvert, the ancient government and ' laws of this kingdom and nation, and to suppress the true religion therein established, and
' to extirpate and destroy the professors thereof; and that the said plot and conspiracy was
' contrived and carried on, in divers places,
' and by several ways and means, and by a
' great number of persons of several qualities
' and degrees, who acted therein, and intended thereby to execute and accomplish their ' aforesaid wicked and traitorous designs and
' purposes; that the said viscount of Stafford,
' and the other lords therein named, together
' with the several other persons therein likewise named or mentioned, as false traitors to ' his majesty and this kingdom, within the time
' aforesaid, have traitorously consulted, contrived, and acted, to and for the accomplishing the said wicked, pernicious, and traitorous
' designs; and, for that end, did most wickedly
' and traitorously agree, conspire, and resolve, to
' imprison, depose, and murder his sacred majesty, and to deprive him of his royal estate, crown,
' and dignity, and by malicious and advised speaking, writing, and otherwise declaring such their ' purposes and intentions; and also to subject
' this kingdom and nation to the pope, and to ' his tyrannical government; and to seize and
' share amongst themselves the estates and inheritance of his majesty's Protestant subjects; and to erect and restore abbies, monasteries,
' and other convents and societies, which have
' been long since, by the laws of this kingdom,
' suppressed for their superstition and idolatry,
' and to deliver up and restore to them the ' lands and possessions now vested in his majesty and his subjects by the laws and statutes
' of this realm; and also to found and erect
' new monasteries and convents; and to remove and deprive all Protestant bishops, and ' other ecclesiastical persons, from their offices, benefices, and preferments; and by
' this means to destroy his majesty's person,
' extirpate the Protestant religion, overthrow
' the rights, liberties and properties, of all his majesty's good subjects, subvert the lawful government of this kingdom, and subject the ' same to the tyranny of the see of Rome; and ' that the said conspirators, and their accomplices and confederates, traitorously had and
' held several meetings, assemblies and consultations, wherein it was contrived and designed

‘ amongst them, what means should be used, and what persons and instruments should be employed, to murder his majesty; and did then and there resolve to effect it, by poisoning, shooting, stabbing, or some such like ways and means;’ and also as to that part of the impeachment which chargeth, ‘ That the said viscount of Stafford, and the other persons in the said impeachment named, the better to compass their traitorous designs, have consulted to raise men, money, horses, arms, and ammunition;’ the said viscount of Stafford, saving to himself (and which he humbly prayeth may be reserved to him) the liberty of answering over and denying all and singular the said crimes and offences so charged upon him, saith, and humbly offereth to this most honourable House, That the charge of those crimes and offences, so imposed upon him by the said impeachment, is so general and uncertain, that he cannot by any possibility give any direct answer thereto, nor make his just and lawful defence upon any trial of the same; for that the said charge hath no manner of certainty in point of time, it being laid only, ‘ For many years now last past a traitorous and execrable Plot and Conspiracy hath been contrived and carried on;’ which may be for five, ten, twenty, or thirty, or more years past; whereby, though the said viscount knoweth himself to be altogether innocent of any such horrid and detestable crimes as by the said impeachment are objected against him, yet it is no way possible for him, upon any trial thereof, to be prepared with his just and lawful defence, by witnesses, to prove himself absent, and in another place, at the time of such meeting or consultation to or for any the wicked designs and purposes in the said impeachment mentioned, as upon his trial may be suddenly objected against him, when he cannot, by any care or foresight whatsoever, have such witnesses ready as could disprove the same, if he were certainly charged for any traitorous act or crime at any time certainly alledged in the said impeachment; nor is the said charge in the said impeachment more certain as to the place of any such traitorous meeting or consultation laid down in the said impeachment, it being only alledged to be, ‘ at divers places within the realm of England, and elsewhere;’ which, for the causes aforesaid, is likewise so utterly uncertain, that it deprives the said viscount of his just defence upon his trial: The uncertainty likewise of the number of meetings or consultations to the wicked purposes in the impeachment mentioned, and the not shewing how many times the said viscount met and consulted, and with whom in particular, doth likewise deprive him of all possibility of making his defence, or producing his witnesses; for that the said viscount, being wholly innocent, cannot suppose or imagine what meeting or consultation, either to raise men or money for the carrying on of a traitorous design, or to any other wicked intent or purpose in the said impeachment mentioned, shall or may be objected against him upon his trial; and it is as much impossible for him to bring witnesses to prove all the meetings he hath had with others in his life-time, as it is for him to know, upon this general charge, what meeting or consultation may upon his trial be objected against him as a traitorous meeting or consultation: And where it is in the said impeachment charged upon the said viscount, ‘ That he hath uttered treason, by malicious and advised speaking, writing, and otherwise declaring;’ the said viscount saith, That never any traitorous thought ever entered into his heart; and therefore he cannot possibly know or discover what words or writing he ever spoke, uttered, wrote, or declared, which are now charged upon him as treason; there being no words or writing at all specified in the impeachment, whereby the said viscount might know how to prepare his defence against them, or that this most honourable House might judge whether the same words or writing were in law treasonable or not.

“ All which uncertainties, and the imminent and apparent danger of the said viscount’s being thereupon surpris’d in his trial of a cause of this consequence to the said viscount, wherein his life (and honour, more dear to him than his life), and all else that is dear to him in this world, are immediately concerned, being seriously weigh’d and considered by your lordships; he humbly prayeth, as by his counsel he is advis’d, That your lordships will not put him to answer the said impeachment, as to the charges herein above recited, till the same be reduced to some competent certainty, that the viscount may know what to answer unto, and may be thereby enabled to make his just defence accordingly: All which notwithstanding, he humbly submitteth to your lordships grave judgments and considerations; professing himself always ready and willing to do and submit to whatsoever your lordships in justice shall order or think fit. And as to all other the treasons, crimes and offences whatsoever, contained, mentioned or specified in the said impeachment; the said viscount, protesting that they are uncertainly and insufficiently alledged, and therefore saving to himself the benefit of exception thereunto, for answer thereunto saith, That he is not, nor ever was, guilty of the said treasons, crimes, and offences, or of any or either of them, of which he stands charged by the said impeachment; and, for his trial thereof, putteth himself upon, and humbly submitteth to, the judgment of your lordships; whose justice the said viscount now doth, and always shall, rely upon, and therein acquiesce.

“ STAFFORD.”

LORD PETRE’S ANSWER.

The lord Petre was brought in the like manner, and delivered in his Answer; which was read, as followeth:

“ The humble Answer of WILLIAM LORD PETRE, now Prisoner in the Tower of London, to the Articles of Impeachment of High Treason, and other high Crimes and Offences, exhibited against him and others, by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, according to the direction of an order of this House, of the 9th of this instant April.

“ All advantages of exception to the said Articles of Impeachment to this defendant saved and reserved :

“ As to the first part of the said Articles, by which it is set forth, ‘ That, for many years ‘ now last past, there hath been contrived and ‘ carried on, by papists, a traitorous and execrable conspiracy and plot, within this kingdom of ‘ England and other places, to alter, change, and ‘ subvert, the ancient government and laws of ‘ this kingdom and nation, and to suppress the ‘ true religion therein established, and to extirpate and destroy the professors thereof ; which ‘ said plot and conspiracy was contrived and carried on, in divers places, and by several ways ‘ and means, and by a great number of persons ‘ of several qualities and degrees, who acted ‘ therein, and intended thereby to execute and ‘ accomplish their aforesaid wicked and traitorous designs and purposes ;’ this defendant saith, That he doth not know that all or any of the matters herein before recited are true, of his own knowledge ; nor any otherwise, but by the proofs heard and taken before both Houses of parliament, and by their votes thereupon, and likewise by the several indictments, trials, verdicts, and judgments, lately had and given in divers courts of record relating thereunto.— And this defendant further saith, That he is not guilty of all or any the matters by the said Articles of Impeachment charged against him ; and, for his trial thereupon, he humbly putteth himself upon God and his peers.

WILL. PETRE.”

LORD ARUNDEL OF WARDOUR'S PLEA AND ANSWER.

The lord Arundel of Wardour was brought in the like manner, and delivered in his answer ; which was read, as followeth :

“ The several Plea of Henry lord ARUNDEL of WARDOUR, now Prisoner in the Tower of London, to part, and his several Answer to the residue, of the Articles of Impeachment of High Treason, and other high Crimes and Offences, exhibited to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, against the said lord Arundel of Wardour, and others therein named, whereof the said lord stands impeached, by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England.

“ The said lord, in the first place, and before all others, protesting his innocency of and from all the treasons, and other crimes and offences whatsoever, in the said Articles contained ; and no way acknowledging, confessing, granting, or admitting, all or any the clauses, articles, or matters, in the said Articles of Impeachment contained or specified (so far as the same any way concerns him,) to be true, as in and by the same Articles of Impeachment is supposed ; and humbly praying a favourable construction, by this most honourable House, of what the said lord shall humbly offer by way of Plea to such part of the Impeachment as is hereunder mentioned, and that the same may not be taken or construed as any subterfuge or evasion of the justice of this honourable House, to which the said lord doth, with all humility, wholly submit himself ; desiring, above all things, the trial of his cause by this most honourable House, so that he may be provided to make his just defence, for the clearing of his innocency from the great and heinous crimes charged upon him by the said Impeachment : This being prayed, as also liberty to correct, amend, or explain any thing in this his Plea and Answer contained, which may any way give this most honourable House any occasion of offence ; and, he hopeth, being granted ; the said lord, as to that part of the Impeachment that containeth the matter following, namely, ‘ That, ‘ for many years now last past, there hath been ‘ contrived and carried on, by papists, a traitorous and execrable conspiracy and plot, within ‘ this kingdom of England and other places, to ‘ alter, change, and subvert, the ancient government and laws of this kingdom and nation, and ‘ to suppress the true religion therein established, ‘ and to extirpate and destroy the professors thereof ; and that the said plot and conspiracy ‘ was contrived and carried on, in divers places, ‘ and by several ways and means, and by a great ‘ number of persons of several qualities and degrees, who acted therein, and intended thereby ‘ to execute and accomplish their aforesaid ‘ wicked and traitorous designs and purposes ; ‘ that the said lord, and the other lords therein named, together with the several other persons ‘ therein likewise named or mentioned, as false ‘ traitors to his majesty and this kingdom, within ‘ the time aforesaid, have traitorously consulted, ‘ contrived, and acted, to and for the accomplishing the said wicked, pernicious, and traitorous ‘ designs ; and, for that end, did most wickedly ‘ and traitorously agree, conspire, and resolve, to ‘ imprison, depose, and murder his sacred majesty, and to deprive him of his royal estate, ‘ crown, and dignity ; and, by malicious and advised speaking, writing, and otherwise, declaring such their purposes and intentions ; and ‘ also to subject this kingdom and nation to the ‘ pope, and to his tyrannical government, and to seize and share amongst themselves the estates ‘ and inheritances of his majesty’s protestant subjects ; and to erect and restore abbies, monasteries, and other convents and societies, which ‘ have been long since, by the laws of this kingdom, suppressed, for their superstition and idolatry ; and to deliver up and restore to them ‘ the lands and possessions now vested in his majesty and his subjects by the laws and statutes ‘ of this realm ; and also to found and erect new ‘ monasteries and convents ; and to remove and deprive all protestant bishops, and other ecclesiastical persons, from their offices, benefices, and preferments; and by this means to destroy his majesty's person, extirpate the protestant religion, overthrow the rights, liberties, and properties of all his majesty's good subjects, subvert the lawful government of this kingdom, and subject the same to the tyranny of the see of Rome; and that the said conspirators, and their complices and confederates, traitorously had and held several meetings, assemblies, and consultations, wherein it was contrived and designed amongst them what means should be used, and what persons and instruments should be employed, to murder his majesty; and did then and there resolve to effect it, by poisoning, shooting, stabbing, or some such like ways and means; and also to that part of the impeachment which chargeth, 'That the said lord, and the other persons in the said impeachment named, the better to compass their traitorous designs, have consulted to raise men, money, horses, arms, and ammunition;' the said lord, saving to himself (and which he humbly prayeth may be reserved to him) the liberty of answering over and denying all and singular the said crimes and offences so charged upon him, saith, and humbly offereth to this most honourable House, That the charge of those crimes and offences, so imposed upon him by the said impeachment, is so general and uncertain, that he cannot by any possibility give any direct answer thereto, nor make his just and lawful defence upon any trial of the same, for that the said charge hath no manner of certainty in point of time; it being laid 'for many years now last past, a traitorous and execrable plot and conspiracy hath been contrived and carried on;' which may be for five, ten, twenty, or thirty, or more years past, whereby, though the said lord knoweth himself to be altogether innocent of any such horrid and detestable crimes as by the said impeachment are objected against him, yet it is no way possible for him, upon any trial thereof, to be prepared with his just and lawful defence, by witnesses, to prove himself absent, and in another place, at the time of such meeting or consultation to or for any the wicked designs and purposes in the said impeachment mentioned, as upon his trial may be suddenly objected against him, when he cannot, by any care or foresight whatsoever, have such witnesses ready as could disprove the same, if he were certainly charged for any traitorous act or crime, at any time certainly alledged in the said impeachment; nor is the same charge in the said impeachment more certain, as to the place of any such traitorous meeting or consultation laid down in the said impeachment, it being only alledged, to be 'at divers places, within the realm of England and elsewhere;' which, for the causes aforesaid, is likewise so utterly uncertain, that it deprives the said lord of his just defence upon his trial: The uncertainty likewise of the number of meetings or consultations to the wicked purposes in the impeachment mentioned, and the not shewing how many times the said lord met and consulted, and with whom in particular, doth likewise deprive him of all possibility of making his defence, or producing his witnesses; for that the said lord, being wholly innocent, cannot suppose or imagine what meeting or consultation, either to raise men or money, for the carrying on of a traitorous design, or to any other wicked intent or purpose in the said impeachment mentioned, shall or may be objected against him upon his trial; and it is as much impossible for him to bring witnesses to prove all the meetings he hath had with others in his life-time, as it is for him to know, upon this general charge, what meeting or consultation may, upon his trial, be objected against him as a traitorous meeting or consultation: And where it is in the said impeachment charged upon the said lord, 'that he hath uttered treason, by malicious and advised speaking, writing, and otherwise declaring;' the said lord saith, That never any traitorous thought ever entered into his heart; and therefore he cannot possibly know or discover what words or writing he ever spoke, uttered, wrote, or declared, which are now charged upon him as treason; there being no words or writing at all specified in the impeachment, whereby the said lord might know how to prepare his defence against them, or that this most honourable House might judge whether the same words or writing were in law treasonable or not.

"All which uncertainties, and the imminent and apparent danger of the said lord's being thereupon surprised in his trial of a cause of this consequence to the said lord, wherein his life (and honour, more dear to him than his life,) and all else that is dear to him in this world, are immediately concerned, being seriously weighed and considered by your lordships; he humbly prayeth, as by his counsel he is advised, That your lordships will not put him to answer the said impeachment, as to the charges herein above recited, till the same be reduced to some competent certainty, that the said lord may know what to answer unto, and may be thereby enabled to make his just defence accordingly: All which notwithstanding, he humbly submitteth to your lordships grave judgments and considerations; professing himself always ready and willing to do and submit to whatsoever your lordships in justice shall order or think fit. And as to all other the treasons, crimes, and offences whatsoever, contained, mentioned, or specified in the said impeachment; the said lord protesting that they are uncertainly and insufficiently alledged, and therefore saving to himself the benefit of exception thereunto, for answer thereto saith, That he is not, nor ever was, guilty of the said treasons, crimes, and offences, or of any or either of them, of which he stands charged by the said impeachment; and, for his trial thereof, putteth himself upon, and humbly submitteth to, the judgment of your lordships; whose justice the said lord now doth, and always shall, rely upon, and therein acquiesce. HEN. ARUNDEL."

April 24.

A Message was brought from the Commons, by Mr. Booth and others: to desire a Conference, concerning the Pleas and Answer of the Five Lords in the Tower, impeached by the House of Commons.

The Answer returned was: that the Lords have considered their Message, and will give them a Conference, as is desired; which the Lords appoint to be presently, in the Painted Chamber. The lord President, the lord Privy Seal, earl of Oxon, earl of Derby, earl of Huntingdon, earl of Bridgewater, earl of Northampton earl of Clarendon, viscount Newport, bishop of London, bishop of Durham, and the lord Wharton, are appointed reporters of this Conference.

The House was adjourned during pleasure, and the Lords went to the Conference; which being ended, the House was resumed.

And the Lord President reported the effect of the Conference; viz.

“That sir Francis Winnington managed the Conference; which, he told us, was desired concerning the Five Pleas, or Answers, or rather writings, of the Lords in the Tower.

“In the first place, he offers that my lord Bellasis cannot put in his Answer but personally at the bar; otherwise they account it as a nullity.

“That the several writings (for so he can only call them) of the Four Lords are argumentative and evasive; to which the Commons neither can nor ought to reply.

“That the Answer of my lord Petre is a legal Answer.

“That the lord Bellasis must put in his Answer, before the other lords can be proceeded with.

“Therefore the Commons demand of the Lords, That the Three Lords may be required to put in more perfect Answers; and that the lord Bellasis may be required forthwith to put in his Answer.

“As to what the impeached Lords complain of, the uncertainty of the time in their charge; the House of Commons have considered all precedents ancient and modern; and find them all to run in general terms, as this doth. But, because they would speed the matter, and avoid delays, the House of Commons do declare, That, in the trial of these Five Lords, they will give no evidence particularly beyond the space of seven years last past.”

After some debate; these lords following were appointed, to consider of the Objections made by the House of Commons this day at the Conference, concerning the Pleas and Answers of the Five Lords now prisoners in the Tower, to the Impeachments wherewith they are charged by the House of Commons, and to report to the House what they find concerning matters of this nature; L. President, L. Privy Seal. Marq. of Winton. Earls Derby, Huntingdon, Salisbury, Bridgewater, Chesterfield, Clarendon, Essex, Craven, Burlington; viscounts Fauconberg, Halifax, Newport; bishops of London, Durham, Rochester, Ely, Bath and Wells, Exon. Lords Berkeley, Wharton, Paget, Grey de Wark, Roberts, Howard de Eac. Byron, Colepeper, Lucas, Gerrard B. Delamer, Frescheville, Arundel, T.

Ordered, That the lord Bellasis is required to put in his Answer to-morrow morning, at this bar, personally.

April 25.

The lord Bellasis being brought to the bar, and kneeling, he was bid to stand up: was told, “That whereas he hath put in a Plea and Answer to the Impeachment of the House of Commons against him; the House of Commons have taken exceptions to his Plea and Answer, as argumentative and evasive, and to which the Commons cannot reply. The lords do not give any opinion one way or other in the case: but, if he think fit to mend his plea, he may; if he insist on it, he may. But the House expects such an Answer as he will abide by, and stand to.”

After this, he withdrew. And being called in again, he was told, “He could have but one Plea depending in court: and if he will stand by the plea he hath put in, he may; otherwise he may put in a new plea, and withdraw the former.”

Upon this, John lord Bellasis put in another Answer; and his former Answer was re-delivered him.

Whereas John lord Bellasis, prisoner in the Tower, for treason, and other high crimes, misdemeanors and offences, of which he stands impeached by the House of Commons, was this day brought to the bar, to put in his Answer to the said Impeachment; and there desired that Mr. Holt, counsellor atlaw, may be added to the counsel formerly assigned to him.

Ordered, That Mr. Holt be, and is hereby, assigned to be of counsel for the said lord Bellasis, in like manner, and for the like purposes, as the other counsel formerly desired on his lordship's behalf were assigned.

The said Answer was read, as follows:

LORD BELLASIS'S ANSWER.

“The humble Answer of John lord BELLASIS, now Prisoner in the Tower of London, to the Articles of Impeachment of high treason, and other high Crimes and Offences, exhibited against him the said lord Bellasis and others, to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, by the knights, citizens, and burgeses in Parliament assembled in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England.

“This defendant saving and reserving to himself all advantages and benefit of exception to the generality, uncertainty and other insufficiencies of the said Articles; of which he humbly prays that notice may be taken, and a just regard may be had by your lordships.—He saith, That he is not guilty of all or any of the matters by the said Articles of Impeachment charged against him, in manner and form as they are charged against him; and for his trial, he humbly putteth himself upon his peers.

“BELLASIS.”

A Message was sent to the House of Commons, by sir Timothy Baldwin and sir John Hoskyns: To communicate to them the Plea and Answer of Thomas earl of Danby, and the Answer of John lord Bellasis delivered in this day at the bar in person; with this desire, “That these original Answers may be returned with convenient speed.”

Ordered, That the lieutenant of the Tower of London be, and is hereby required to bring William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, and Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, now prisoners there, to the bar of this House, to-morrow, at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

April 26.

The earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, and lord Arundel of Wardour, being brought to this bar, and kneeling, and then bid stand up, were told, “That the House of Commons have taken Exceptions to their Pleas and Answers, as argumentative and evasive, and to which the Commons cannot reply. The Lords do not give any opinion, one way or other, in the case: but, if they think fit to mend their Pleas, they may; if they insist on them, they may: but the House expects such Answers as they will abide by, and stand to.” After this, they withdraw.

They are called in again; and told, “They can have but one Plea depending in court: and if they will stand by the Plea they have put in, they may; otherwise they may put in new Pleas, and withdraw the former.” After this, the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, and the lord Arundel of Wardour, put in other Answers; and the former Answers were re-delivered them.

Then the several Answers were read, as follows:

EARL POWIS'S ANSWER.

“The humble Answer of William earl of Powis, now Prisoner in the Tower of London, to the Articles of Impeachment of High Treason, and other high Crimes and Offences, exhibited against him the said Earl and others, to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England.

“This defendant saving and reserving to himself all advantage and benefit of exception to the generality, uncertainty, and other insufficiencies, of the said Articles; of which he humbly prays that notice may be taken, and a just regard may be had by your lordships:—He saith, That he is not guilty of all or any of the matters by the said Articles of Impeachment charged against him, in manner and form as they are charged against him; and, for his trial, he humbly putteth himself upon his peers.

“POWIS.”

VISCOUNT STAFFORD'S ANSWER.

“The humble Answer of William viscount of STAFFORD, now Prisoner in his Majesty's Tower of London, to the Impeachment of High Treason, and other high Crimes and Misdemeanors, exhibited against him and others, to the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament, by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and of the Commons of England.

“The said Viscount saving to himself all advantage and benefit of exceptions to the generality, uncertainty, and insufficiency of the said Impeachment; most humbly beseeching their lordships thereof to take due notice, and thereunto at all times to have a just regard:—He answereth and saith, That he is not guilty of all or any of the offences charged against him by the said Impeachment; and, for his trial, humbly and willingly putteth himself upon his peers; no ways doubting but, by the grace of God, and their lordships impartial justice, he shall make his innocence appear. All which he most humbly submitteth unto their lordships further consideration. “STAFFORD.”

LORD ARUNDEL OF WARDOUR'S ANSWER.

“The humble Answer of Henry lord ARUNDELL of WARDOUR, now Prisoner in the Tower of London, to the Articles of Impeachment of High Treason, and other high Crimes and Offences, exhibited against him the said lord Arundel and others, to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, by the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, in the name of themselves and of all the Commons of England.

“This defendant saving and reserving to himself all advantage and benefit of exception to the generality, uncertainty, and other insufficiencies of the said Articles; of which he humbly prays that notice may be taken, and a just regard may be had by your lordships:—He saith, That he is not guilty of all or any of the matters by the said Articles of Impeachment charged against him in manner and form as they are charged against him; and, for his trial, he humbly putteth himself upon his Peers. “HEN. ARUNDEL.”

A Message was sent to the House of Commons, by sir Miles Coke and sir John Hoskyns: To communicate to them the several Answers of the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, and the lord Arundel, given in this day, at this bar, by the lords in person.

April 29.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by sir John Trevor and other: To return the original pleas of the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, lord Petre, lord Arundel of Wardour, and lord Bellasis.

Upon reading the petition of William earl of Powis, William viscount of Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, and John lord Bellasis; shewing "That in order to their defence upon their trials, they have sent for, from beyond the seas, Christopher Towneley, Henry Hall, and Daniel Gifford, being very material witnesses; which witnesses are imprisoned upon suspicion of being priests, as in the petition is alleged; and praying, that they may be discharged from their imprisonment."

Ordered, That the warrants by which the said Christopher Townley, Henry Hall, and Daniel Gifford, were committed to prison, shall be brought before this House to-morrow.

Ordered, That neither the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, lord Petre, lord Arundel of Wardour, and lord Bellasis, being prisoners in the Tower, nor any of them, shall send for any person or persons from beyond the seas, to be used as witnesses upon their respective trials, unless they shall first give in the name or names of such person or persons, to be allowed of by this House.

This day the several Indictments, whereby William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, and John lord Bellasis, are found guilty of High-Treason, by the grand Jury, before the justices for the county of Midd. sitting at Westm. on the 3rd of December, 1678, were brought into this House, by virtue of his majesty's writs of Certiorari for that purpose issued.

May 1.

Ordered, That on Monday next this House will take into consideration, "whether the Lords spiritual are to vote in judicature, in cases of blood, or upon bills of attainder?"

May 6.

The House entered into consideration, "Whether the Lords spiritual are to vote in judicature in cases of blood, or upon bills of attainder?" After some debate; It is ordered, That this debate be resumed to-morrow morning.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by Mr. Treby and others: That the knights, citizens, and burgesses, in parliament assembled, having exhibited to this house Articles of Impeachment, of High-Treason and other high crimes and offences, against William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, and John lord Bellasis; to which the said lords have severally pleaded not guilty: He said, "He was commanded, by the said knights, citizens and burgesses, to acquaint their lordships, that they will and are ready to make good the said Articles and Charge against those lords."

After debate of this Message: This question was proposed, "Whether the five Lords in the Tower shall be brought to their Trials (upon the Impeachment against them) this day sevensnight?" This previous question was put, "Whether this question shall be now put?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Then the main question was put; viz. "Whether the Five Lords in the Tower, shall be brought to their trials (upon the impeachment against them) this day sevensnight?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Westminster Hall is appointed to be the place for hearing the earl of Danby to make good his Plea of his pardon before this House, with a Lord High Steward, and also for Trial of the Five Lords impeached in like manner:

Ordered, That the lords with white staves do attend his majesty, to let him know, from this House, "That they have appointed to hear the earl of Danby to make good his Plea of his pardon on the Articles of Impeachment against him on Saturday next, in Westminster Hall; and that the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, lord Petre, lord Arundel of Wardour, and the lord Bellasis, are to be brought to their Trials in Westminster Hall, upon the impeachments against them, on Tuesday next; and humbly to desire his majesty, that he will be pleased to appoint a high steward, for the purposes aforesaid, to continue during the said trials."

A Message was sent to the House of Commons by judge Atkins and judge Dolben: To acquaint them with the two orders made concerning the earl of Danby and the Five Lords in the Tower; and to let them know, that the lords have appointed an Address to be presented to his majesty, for naming a lord high steward, as well in the case of the earl of Danby, as for the Trials of the other Five Lords prisoners in the Tower; and that the same shall be in Westminster Hall.

May 7.

The lord viscount Newport reported, "That he waited on his majesty, with the desire of this House, that he would appoint a Lord High Steward, for the trials of the earl of Danby, and the Five Lords in the Tower; and his majesty returns this answer, that he will appoint a Lord High Steward by Saturday next."

The House resumed the debate, which was yesterday, "Whether the Lords spiritual are to vote in judicature in cases of blood, or upon bills of attainder." And, after a long debate, the question was proposed, "Whether this House shall be now adjourned till to-morrow morning?" Then, this previous question was put, "Whether this question shall be now put?" It was resolved in the affirmative. The main question being put, "Whether this House shall be now adjourned till to-morrow morning?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

May 8.

Ordered, That sir Bryan Broughton, sir

Thomas Whitgrave, Mr. Thomas Kennerley, Mr. Ralph Lawson, Mr. Thomas Abnell, Mr. William Pawlet, Nathaniel Caulkin, Elizabeth Eld, Ann Eld, Thomas Perry, James Jones, Mr. Ralph Phillips parson of Tixall, Mr. Sambecch, Mr. Thomas Astely, Mr. Goodard servant to the bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, Thomas Sayer, Mr. Richard Gerrard of Hillerson, John Proctor, Thomas Hollowes, John Pallet of Ridgley, Walter Collins of Stafford, Thomas Parker, Thomas Winter, John Menter, Anthony Landracy, William Parker, Anthony Cooke, James Baylie, John Joseph, Peter Carpenter, William Bradford, Elizabeth Silleyer, Edward Wood, John Minney, Thomas Andrewes, be, and are hereby, required to appear before the house of peers, in Westminster Hall, to give evidence of what they know, or can say on the behalf of William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, and John lord Bellasis, or any of them, in their making their defences upon their respective Trials, on Tuesday next, being the thirteenth day of this instant May, and such times after as the said Trials shall continue.

May 8, p. m.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by sir Christopher Musgrave: to desire a Conference, concerning the matter of their lordships last Message sent to them, concerning the Trials of the earl of Danby and the five Lords in the Tower. The question was put, "Whether to give a present Conference with the House of Commons, in the Painted Chamber?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

The answer returned was, That this House will give a Conference, as is desired; and appoint the same to be presently, in the Painted Chamber. These lords following were appointed to report this Conference: L. President, L. Privy Seal; D. of Newcastle; earls of Huntingdon, Clarendon, and Essex; viscounts Fauconberg, and Halifax, bishop of Rochester; Lords Grey, Howard de Esc. and Colepeper. The House was adjourned during pleasure, and the Lords went to the Conference; which being ended, the House was resumed.

Then the Lord President reported the effect of the Conference; which was, "That the Commons suppose your lordships do intend, in all the proceedings upon the impeachments now depending before your lordships, to follow the usual course and methods of parliament. And the Commons cannot apprehend what should induce your lordships to address to his majesty for a Lord High Steward, in order to the determining the validity of the pardon which hath been pleaded by the earl of Danby to the Impeachment of the Commons, as also for the Trial of the other Five Lords; because the Commons conceive the constitution of a High Steward is not necessary; but that judgment may be given in parliament, upon Impeachment, without a High Steward.

"There being several other matters contained in your lordships messages, touching the trial of the lords Impeachments, which, if not settled, may occasion several interruptions and delays in the proceedings; the House of Commons do therefore propose to your lordships, that a Committee of both Houses be nominated, to consider of the most proper ways and methods of proceedings upon impeachments of the House of Commons, according to the usage of parliament, that thereby those inconveniences may be avoided."

After a long debate, the question was put, "Whether to agree with the desire of the House of Commons at the Conference, to have a committee of both Houses, to consider of the manner of the Trials of the Lords?" It was resolved in the negative.

"Dissentientibus; Finch, C. Arlington, Huntingdon, Bedford, Clare, Essex, Clarendon, Newport, Strafforde, Delamer, R. Eure, Rockingham, Pagett, P. Wharton, J. Lovelace, Shaftesbury, Pr. Derby, Salisbury, Halifax, Grey.

May 10.

A Message was brought from the House of Commons, by Mr. Titus, &c. That the Commons pray a Conference with their lordships, upon the subject matter of the last Conference. The answer returned was: That this House agrees to a conference, as is desired; and appoints the same to be presently, in the Painted Chamber. These lords following were appointed to report this Conference: L. President, L. Privy Seal; Earls of Bedford, Huntingdon, Salisbury, Bridgewater, Clarendon, and Essex; Bishop of Bath & Wells, lord Berkely, viscounts Fauconberg and Halifax. The House was adjourned during pleasure, and the lords went to the Conference; which being ended, the House was resumed.

Then the earl of Salisbury reported the effect of the last Conference; viz. "That for answer to the last Conference, the managers of this Conference were commanded by the House of Commons to say to your lordships, that your lordships do not offer any answer or satisfaction to the Commons, in their necessary proposal amicably offered by way of supposition, that they might have been confirmed therein by answer from your lordships, that your lordships do intend, in all the proceedings upon the impeachments now depending before your lordships, to follow the usual course and methods of parliament.

"And further, that your lordships have not given the least answer or satisfaction to the Commons, concerning your lordships addressing to the king for a Lord High Steward, though the Commons proposed their desire of satisfaction in that matter in as cautious terms as could be, on purpose to avoid all disputes about judicature. The Commons, to avoid all interruptions and delays in the proceedings against the lords impeached, and the inconveniences that may arise thereby, having proposed to your lordships, that a committee of both Houses might be nominated, to consider of the most proper ways and methods of proceedings upon impeachments; your lordships, without any reason assigned (save only that you say, you do not think it conformable to the rules and order of the proceedings of this court) have refused to agree with the House of Commons in appointing such a committee, though not heretofore denied to the Commons, when asked upon the like occasion, and at this time desired purposely to avoid disputes and delays. And therefore the House of Commons have commanded us to acquaint your lordships, that, things standing thus upon your answer, they cannot proceed in the Trials of the Lords, before the methods of proceedings be adjusted between the two Houses."

After a long debate hereof: The question was put, "Whether a committee of this House shall be appointed to meet with a committee of the House of Commons to confer about the methods and forms of proceedings in order to the Trials of the lords?"

It was resolved in the negative.

The lord president reported, "That the committee of both Houses appointed to consider of propositions and circumstances in reference to the trials of the lords in the Tower, have met this morning, in the inner court of wards, and made an entrance into this business:—The committee of the House of Commons propose, that the Lords would consider of a longer time for the trials of the lords in the Tower.

"This proposition is agreed to be the last thing to be considered.

"The Commons also propose and desire to see the commission that is prepared for a lord high steward at these trials; and also the commissions in the earl of Pembroke's and lord Morley's cases."

"To this the Lords committees said, the high steward is but speaker pro tempore, and gives his voice as well as the other lords: This changeth not the nature of the court; and the Lords declared they have power enough to proceed to trial, though the king should not name an high-steward.

"This seemed to be satisfaction to the Commons; provided it were entered in the Lords Journals, which are records.

"The Commons also propose and desire to know, what resolution the Lords have taken concerning the bishops being, or not being, at the trials of these lords.—The Commons say, that, in the earl of Strafford's case, the Lords acquainted the Commons, that the bishops intended not to be at the trials.—The Commons think it necessary to know, whether the Lords intend any new forms in trials upon impeachments.—They conceive, all trials upon impeachments in parliament have been by the temporal lords only."

Ordered, That the trials of the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, lord Petre, lord Arundel of Wardour, and lord Bellasis now prisoners in the Tower, which were appointed to begin to morrow morning in Westminster hall, be, and are hereby, put off till further order; and that timely notice shall be given to the said lords of such further day as shall be appointed for that purpose.

Ordered, That the clerk of the crown do attend the lord chancellor this afternoon, with copies of the commission for the lord high steward, in order to the Trials of these lords.

It is declared and ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the office of a High Steward, upon trials of Peers upon impeachments, is not necessary to the House of Peers; but that the Lords may proceed in such trials if a high Steward be not appointed, according to their humble desire.

May 13.

The lord president reported, "That the committee of both Houses have met this morning; and discoursed in the first place in the matter of a Lord High Steward, and have perused former commissions for the office of High Steward; and propose from the committee, that the order being entered in the Journal of the House of Lords; viz. That an office of an High Steward, upon trials of Peers upon impeachments, is not necessary to the House of Peers; but that the Lords may proceed in such trials, if an High Steward be not appointed, according to their humble desire: There may be a commission for an High Steward to bear date after the said order, so as the words in the commissions perused may be thus changed; viz. instead of [ac pro eo quod Officium Senescalli Angliæ cujus Præsentia in hac parte requiritur, ut accepimus, jam vacat] may be inserted [ac pro eo quod proceres et Magnates in parlamento nostro assemblat. Nobis humiliter supplicaverunt, ut Senescallum Angliæ pro hac vice constituere dignaremur]."

His lordship further reported, "That, in the next place, the Commons proposed, that they might be satisfied in what they proposed yesterday concerning the bishops being present at the trials of the lords impeached.—To which the Lords making answer, That it belongs not to the Commons to be concerned in the constituting parts of the court upon such trials; but that the judgment of this matter belongs entirely to the Lords; and when they have judged it, the Commons cannot alter it, and therefore should not debate it.—Upon which, the Commons acknowledged, that judgment after trial is in the Lords; but their lordships are not to give judgment unless the Commons demand it.—And the Commons desire to know whether the lords will proceed in these trials as their lordships did anciently; for, if the bishops should sit upon these trials, and the Commons should not demand judgment, as being dissatisfied with their being there, it may be the Commons may proceed by bill.—To which the Lords made answer, That, after the evidence is fully heard, they are bound to give judgment of condemnation or acquittal.—But this being a matter of judicature, the Lords declared, that they would impose silence upon themselves, and debate it no further.—The Commons further desired to know, whether the bishops shall be allowed to vote upon the validity of the pardon of the earl of Danby; for they account that no preliminary, but the very essence of the trial."

Which report being ended; and the first part thereof, concerning the Lord High Steward, being agreed to; the House entered into debate concerning the second part thereof, in relation to the Lords the bishops. After a long debate thereof; The question was proposed, "Whether the lords spiritual have a right to stay in court, in capital cases, till such time as judgment of death comes to be pronounced?"

Then, this previous question being put, "Whether this question shall be now put?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Then the main question was put, (viz.) "Whether the lords spiritual have a right to stay in court, in capital cases, till such time as judgment of death comes to be pronounced?" Which was resolved in the affirmative.

"Dissentientibus, Derby, Winchester, Essex, Shaftsbury, Pr. Clare, Huntingdon, Herbert, Stamford, Manchester, Delamer, Mulgrave, Kent, P. Wharton, Howard, J. Lovelace, Rockingham, Bedford, Salisbury, North and Grey, Halifax, Grey."

May 16.

The Lord President reported, "That the Lords' committees have met the committee of the House of Commons this morning; who communicated to their lordships, That yesterday they reported to their House the resolution of the House of Peers, with the explanation of it, which the Lords had acquainted them with concerning the Lords spiritual.—Upon consideration whereof, their House gave them as an instruction to insist, That the Lords spiritual ought not to have any vote, in any of the proceedings upon the impeachments against the Lords in the Tower.—And the committee declared further, That they know not how to proceed in capital matters before a new court. To which the Lords answering, That they had no instructions, power, nor allowance, from the House, to debate concerning this matter; desired that if they had any other proposals to make, they would do it; and that the Lords were ready to debate them.—To this, the Commons answered, That they think it most proper that the propositions already made should be determined before they make any new ones."

After consideration had thereof; the question was put, "Whether Thursday next shall be appointed, to begin the Trials of the Five Lords who are prisoners in the Tower?" And it was resolved in the affirmative.

After which resolution passed, the Lords spiritual asked the leave of the House, that they might withdraw themselves from the Trials of the said lords, with the liberty of entering their usual Protestation.

Ordered, That this resolution of the House, and desire of the Lords spiritual, be communicated to the committee of the House of Commons, to-morrow morning.

May 17.

The Lord President reported, "That the Lords committees have met the committee of the House of Commons this morning, and gave them an account of the resolution of the Lords passed yesterday, concerning the trials of the Five Lords in the Tower, and also of the desire of the Lords spiritual, to withdraw themselves from the trials of those lords, reserving the liberty of entering their usual protestation; and delivered to them a signed copy of what is entered in the Journal of the House of Peers concerning this matter; which is all they had in command.

"To which the Commons answered, That the vote of the House of Commons, which they acquainted the Lords with yesterday, concerning the bishops, extends to the earl of Danby, as well as the said Five Lords; whereas the Lords' vote relates only to the Five Lords; And therefore they desired to know what answer the Lords give as to the earl of Danby.—They further objected, that they conceived that their vote was to the right of the thing; and that the bishops have no right to be at any one vote in any capital case; and they conceived the earl of Danby's case to be a capital case, as well as the cases of the other Five Lords; and that, if the bishops may have leave to withdraw, it implies a right, which if they have it is a new court, which the Commons cannot admit of.—The Lords did then let them know, there is no day yet appointed for the trial of the earl of Danby; and that the Lords spiritual will be absent at all the parts of the trials of the Five Lords; and that the protestation they now desire to enter will be the same as in the earl of Strafford's case. Then the Commons said, they could not proceed to treat of any other proposal, till such time as this business about the court be settled."

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the committee for privileges are hereby appointed further to search for and consider precedents and ways of proceeding on the trials and judicature of Peers; and to advise of directions and methods fit to be observed therein, for the preservation of order and regularity in the trials of the lords now appointed; and all circumstances usually occurring in such trials; and to report to this House on Monday next; and for this end to sit this afternoon.

May 19.

The Lord President reported, "That the Lords' committees have met this morning with the committee of the House of Commons; where the Commons acquainted the Lords, that they had reported to their House the vote of this House, and the desire of the Lords spiritual, which occasioned the House of Commons to give this further instruction to their committee; viz. To insist on the former vote of their House, that the Lords spiritual ought not to have any vote in the proceedings against the lords in the Tower; and when that matter shall be settled, and the method of proceedings adjusted, their House shall be then ready to proceed upon the trial of the pardon of the earl of Danby, against whom the House of Commons hath already demanded judgment; and afterwards to the trials of the Five Lords in the Tower. Upon which, the Lords told them, they had no authority to debate this matter.

"The Commons then further said, That the Lords' resolution, which was offered, was no answer to their proposition, which comprehended the earl of Danby as well as the Five Lords; and the Lords' answer relates only to the Five Lords: besides, the Lords' answer was doubtful; for it appears, that the bishops asked leave to be absent, but it appears not that it was granted; and if they may ask leave, and it be not granted, then consequently the bishops must sit in court at the trials. The Commons conceive, that the bishops absenting themselves by way of leave is a strong implication of a right asserted, which they cannot allow can ever be maintained; and think there is the same reason for the bishops being absent from the trial upon the pardon, as at the trial of the other Five Lords; and that the naming of a day for the trial of the Five Lords, before the trial of the pardon of the earl of Danby, against whom the Commons have already demanded judgment, is a putting that last, which they desired should be first.

"To which the Lords told them, They were not empowered to debate; but would report these matters to their House.

"The Commons hereupon replied, They are ready to go on; and that, for want of these trials, all public business stands still: but the Lords seem to lay the stop at the Commons' door, by naming a day, which they conceive ought not to have been appointed before the methods be considered; for the Lords have not answered the Commons in matter of right, which is necessary first to be adjusted; and they desire your resolution as to that matter; for they conceive they have no right: And the Lords may as well make the judges part of their court, as the bishops, in this point.

"The Commons will give no disturbance to the ancient judicature; for they own that to be sacred. And they conceive they have a right to know before what court they shall appear; and they hope the Lords will consider of their having appointed a day before the methods be considered, and will give them leave to wonder at it."

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That Edmund War-cupp, esq. one of the deputy lieutenants and justice of peace for the county of Middlesex, who, by Order of this House, hath searched the house of viscount Stafford, called or known by the name of Tarball, and seized some papers there, do forthwith transmit the said papers to the secret committee of the House of Commons; and for so doing, this shall be a sufficient warrant.

The Lord Privy Seal reported, "That the committee of privileges have met, and considered of the methods and rules to be observed at the trials of the Five Lords in the Tower; which are offered to the consideration of the House."

Ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That no lord of this House shall visit any of the lords now prisoners in the Tower, without leave of this House first had on that behalf.

May 20.

Ordered, That Tuesday next, being the 27th day of this instant May, be appointed for the Trial of the Five Lords now prisoners in the Tower; viz. William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, and John lord Bel-lasis.

Ordered, That this House will take into consideration the report made from the Lords' committees for privileges, concerning the methods of proceedings to be observed in order to the trials of the lords now prisoners in the Tower, to-morrow morning, the first business.

May 21.

Upon reading the Report made from the Lords' committees for privileges, concerning the methods of proceedings to be observed at the trials of the lords in the Tower: It is ordered, That the Lords' committees for perusal of the Journal Book be, and are hereby, appointed to make an abstract of so much thereof as is necessary to be communicated to the House of Commons; the rest to be for the use of the Lord Chancellor; and to report to this House to-morrow morning.

May 22.

The Lord Privy Seal reported, "That the Committee for the Journal Book, which was appointed to make an abstract out of the Report concerning the methods of proceedings to be observed at the trials of the lords in the Tower, of what is fit to be communicated to the House of Commons, and what is requisite to be for the direction of the Lord Chancellor, have met, and considered thereof, as follows:

"The Preface of the Report to stand; viz.

"The Lords Committees for Privileges, to whom it is referred to consider of precedents and ways of proceeding in the trials and judicature of the Peers, have perused the Journals of this House; in which the proceedings in order to the trials of the earl of Strafford and the earl of Pembroke are entered; and, upon consideration had thereof, have ordered to report, that the method of proceedings agreed to by the House of Peers on the 22nd of March, 1677, in order to the trial of the earl of Pen-broke, be observed in order to the trials of the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, lord Petre, lord Arundel of Wardour, and lord Bellasyse; save only that the attendance of the clerk of crown in the King's-bench is not to be required, nor any place to be prepared at the bar for the king's counsel; and that the additional rule for the going of the eldest sons of peers between the House of Peers above stairs and Westminster-hall, made the 9th of this instant May, be observed: Also,

"The Lord Chancellor is to observe rules and directions, which are already upon the Journals; of which he is to have an extract, and therefore not requisite to be entered again here.

"That which is proper to be communicated is as follows:

"That the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, lord Petre, lord Arundel of Wardour, and lord Bellasyse, and every of them, who are to be brought to their trial in Westminster-hall, shall have warrants for such witnesses as will not come without (affidavit being first made thereof), excepting such as are members of the House of Commons, and such persons as stand charged with the same treason as the said lords are charged with; and that such witnesses as any of the said lords at their respective trials shall produce for their defence shall not be examined upon oath in their case; but may be examined upon oath if the members of the House of Commons do desire it, on their behalf; and if the said lords, or any of them, do re-examine the said witnesses, it is to be upon the same oath.

"That the Lieutenant of the Tower is to return the warrant of this House.

"That the said Lords, being brought to the bar by the Lieutenant of the Tower, are to kneel until the Lord High Steward command them to arise; and then he is to let them know, 'That they are this day to answer to the accusation of high treason, wherewith they stand charged, in the name of the Commons now assembled in parliament, and in the name of all the Commons of England; and that this day they are to receive their trials for their lives.'

"That the whole Impeachment against them is to be read; and then their Answers: which being done, the Lord High Steward is to tell the Commons, 'That now they may go on with their evidence.'

"Then the Lord High Steward is to declare, 'That now the court is proceeding to hear the evidence;' and desire the Peers to give attention.

"If the said Lords shall demand counsel, the Lord High Steward is to let them know, 'That, during the time that the members of the Commons do manage their evidence in matter of fact, they (the said lords) are to use no counsel.'

"If any of the Peers, the members of the House of Commons that manage the evidence, or the prisoners, do desire to have any question asked; they must desire the Lord High Steward to ask the question.

"If any doubt doth arise at the trial, no debate is to be in the court, but the question suspended to be debated in this House.

"The Peers are to sit upon the trial but once a day, and not to sit past two o'clock.

"The members of the Commons to be set first, before the Peers come.

"None to be covered at the trial but the Peers.

"That a private place be made, to put offenders safely in.

"That the place between the prisoners and the woolsock be clear.

"That such peers, at the trial of the said lords, who at the instance of the Commons shall be admitted witnesses, are to be sworn at the clerk's table, and the Lord High Steward to administer the oath, and to deliver their evidence in their own places.

"Those witnesses that are commoners are to be sworn at the bar by the clerk, and are to deliver their evidence there.

"The Oath which is to be given to the witnesses is this:

"The Evidence which you shall give, in the Trial concerning the Five Lords prisoners at the bar, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth: So help you God, and the Contents of this Book."

"The said Five Lords may cross-examine witnesses, visa voce, at the bar.

"That notice be given to the lord mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs of the city of London, and likewise to the deputy lieutenants and justices of Middlesex, and the justices of the peace of the city of Westminster, to take care for the safe-guarding of the gates and places, thereby to prevent the concourse of people resorting to Westminster during the time of the trial of the said lords."

This Report was read, and agreed to; and it is ordered, That it be communicated to the committee of the House of Commons, by the lords committees at their next meeting.

A Message was sent to the House of Commons, to communicate to the Commons the Order of this House, for appointing Tuesday next for the trials of the Five Lords in the Tower.

Ordered, That the constable of his majesty's Tower in London, or, in his absence, the lieutenant thereof, be, and is hereby, required to bring William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundel de Wardour, and John lord Bellasis, now prisoners there, to the bar of this House, in Westminster-Hall, on Tuesday the 27th day of this instant May, at nine of the clock in the forenoon.

May 23.

The Lord President reported, "That the Lords committees have met this morning, with the committee of the House of Commons; and have delivered to them a copy of the methods of proceedings agreed on yesterday in order to the Trial of the Five Lords, and appointed to be communicated to them; their lordships hoping that therein all things were adjusted which are necessary to the said Trial.

“To which, the Commons desired to know, Whether the paper now delivered, be delivered as propositions to be debated, or as rules not to be altered, which if so, seems as if the Lords would pass by all that they have proposed; and till they have an answer to the more material propositions they have made, they can say nothing to the minute circumstances in this paper; and that the Lords are pleased by this paper to answer several things not asked, but not to answer what they do desire.

“Then the Lords did let them know, that their lordships are not instructed to debate, but shall acquaint the House with what they insist on; and that the Lords meet on great disadvantage, if they should not have liberty to propose, as well as the Commons; and conceive that there is no imposition put upon the Commons by this paper; but the Commons may make objections, and the Lords may debate them: And that the Lords expect not any present answer to the paper; but hope they will receive it as the Lords have received their propositions.

“To this the Commons replying, That Tuesday next, set for the said Trial, growing near, it will take up longer time to adjust these propositions than till Tuesday; and some material objections may be made against them: However, they shall receive this paper as propositions; to which they intend not to give any answer till they have an answer from the Lords to their former proposition concerning the Lords spiritual; and that they think it not to be according to the good correspondence that ought to be between the committees of both Houses, for the Lords to appoint a day of trial without adjusting the time with them, having formerly told them that that should be the last thing to be agreed on.

“The Commons further added, That they do not quit their former proposition, of the earl of Danby's being tried before the Five Lords; and desired to know, whether the lords intend to proceed to the trial of the Five Lords on Tuesday next, though the Commons consent not: And desired also, that the Lords would report, That the Commons desire to know, whether they may expect any answer to their former proposition, concerning the Bishops; without which, the meetings of the committees will be useless; and one meeting more may put a period to this committee.”

Upon consideration had of this Report, the House made these resolutions following: The question was put, “Whether it shall be an instruction to the lords committees, appointed to meet the committee of the House of Commons, to let them know, that their lordships are not empowered to give any other answer than what is already given, concerning the Lords spiritual?” And it was resolved in the affirmative.

“Dissentientibus, Buckingham, Shaftesbury, Pr. Derby, Winchester, Huntingdon, Bedford, Clare, Westmoreland, Stamford, Strafford, Herbert, F. Grey, Rochester, Say and Seale, R. Eure, Rockingham, Delamer, Pagett, Mulgrave, Howard, J. Lovelace, Burlington, North and Grey, P. Wharton.”

Ordered, To let the Commons know, that the paper delivered this day contains the Orders of the House of Lords, de bene esse, preparatory to the Trials; yet such, that if the Commons have any thing to object, or to offer to be added to them, the Lords will consider thereof, and do what shall be reasonable.

The question being put, “Whether it shall be an instruction to the Lords committees, appointed to meet with the committee of the House of Commons, to let them know, that there occur to the Lords difficulties in the case of the earl of Danby, which are not in the case of the other Five Lords; and that therefore the Lords have resolved to proceed first to the Trial of the Five Lords?” And it was resolved in the affirmative.

May 26.

The Lord President reported, “That on Saturday the Lords delivered to the Commons what was resolved and ordered the day before, touching the bishops being at the trial of the Five Lords; as also concerning the earl of Danby's trial; and likewise touching the paper containing the rules de bene esse to be observed by the Lords at the Trials; and told the Commons, that that was all they had in command to say.

“To which the Commons answered, That, since the Lords have not thought fit to give such satisfactory answers to the propositions formerly made by them as they required, they have received instructions from their House to give no answer to the propositions made by the Lords, till the Commons former propositions be answered.

“That the Lords committees met the committee of the House of Commons again this morning; where the Commons said, That they had received instruction this morning from their House, to propose to the Lords, Whether they be yet empowered to give any answer to the propositions already made by the Commons, touching the Lords spiritual, and the trial of the pardon of the earl of Danby; and to acquaint the Lords, that they cannot give any answer to the propositions made by their lordships preparatorily to the trial, until those matters be adjusted.”

“To which the Lords answered, They are not yet empowered.”

The messengers return with this answer: That the Commons will give a Free Conference, as is desired. The same Lords who managed the last Free Conference are appointed to manage this.

The House was adjourned, and the Lords went to the Conference; which being ended, the House was resumed.

Then the Lord President reported the effect of the Conference with the House of Commons; viz.

“The Commons have always desired, that a good correspondence may be preserved between the two Houses.

“There is now depending between your lordships and the Commons, a matter of the greatest weight; in the transaction of which, your lordships seem to apprehend some difficulty in the matters proposed by the Commons.

“To clear this, the Commons have desired this Conference; and by it, they hope to manifest to your lordships, that the propositions of the House of Commons, made by their committee, in relation to the Trial of the Lords in the Tower, have been only such as are well warranted by the laws of parliament and constitution of the government, and in no sort trench upon the judicature of the Peers; but are most necessary to be insisted upon, that the ancient rights of judicature in parliament may be maintained.

“The Commons readily acknowledge, that the crimes charged upon the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, lord Petre, lord Arundel of Wardour, and lord Bellasis, are of deep guilt, and call for speedy justice; but withal they hold any change in judicature in parliament, made without consent in full parliament, to be of pernicious consequence, both to his majesty and his subjects; and conceive themselves obliged to transmit to their posterity all the rights which of this kind they have received from their ancestors; and by putting your lordships in mind of the progress that has already been between the two Houses in relation to the proposition made by the Commons, and the reasonableness of the propositions themselves, they doubt not to make it appear, that their aim has been no other than to avoid such consequence, and to preserve that right; and that there is no delay of justice on their part; and, to that end, do offer to your lordships the ensuing reasons and narrative:

“That the Commons, in bringing the earl of Danby to justice, and in discovery of that execrable and traitorous conspiracy (of which the five Popish lords now stand impeached, and for which some of their wicked accomplices have already undergone the sentence of the law as traitors and murderers), have laboured under many great difficulties, is not unknown to your lordships.

“Nor is it less known to your lordships, that, upon the impeachment of the House of Commons against the earl of Danby, for High Treason, and other high crimes, misdemeanors, and offences, even the common justice of sequestering him from parliament, and forthwith committing him to safe custody was then required by the Commons, and denied by the House of Peers, though he then sat in their House, of which your lordships have been so sensible, that at a Free Conference, the 10th of April last, your lordships declared, ‘That it

‘was the right of the Commons, and well warranted by precedents of former ages, that; upon an impeachment of the Commons, a peer so impeached ought of right to be ordered to withdraw, and then to be committed.’ And had not that justice been denied to the Commons, a great part of this session of parliament, which hath been spent in framing and adjusting a bill for causing the earl of Danby to appear and answer that justice from which he was fled, had been saved, and had been employed for the preservation of his majesty’s person and the security of the nation, and in prosecution of the other five lords; neither had he had the opportunity of procuring for himself that illegal pardon, which bears date the 1st of March last past, and which he hath now pleaded in bar of his impeachment, nor of wasting so great a proportion of the treasure of the kingdom, as he hath done since the Commons exhibited their Articles of impeachment against him.

“After which time thus lost, by reason of the denial of that justice which of right belonged to the Commons upon their impeachment, the said bill being ready for the royal assent, the said earl then rendered himself, and, by your lordships order of the 16th of April last, was committed to the Tower; after which, he pleaded the said pardon; and, being pressed, did at length declare, he would rely upon and abide by that plea: Which pardon pleaded, being illegal and void, and so ought not to bar or preclude the Commons from having justice upon their impeachment; they did thereupon, with their Speaker, on the 5th of May instant, in the name of themselves and all the Commons of England, demand judgment against the said earl upon their impeachment; not doubting but that your lordships did intend, in all your proceedings upon the impeachment; to follow the usual course and methods of parliament.

“But the Commons were not a little surprised by the Message from your lordships, delivered on the 7th of May, thereby acquainting them, that as well the Lords spiritual as temporal had ordered, that the 10th of May instant should be the day for hearing the earl of Danby to make good his plea of pardon; and that, on the 13th of May, the other Five Lords impeached should be brought to their Trial; and that your lordships had addressed to his majesty, for naming of a Lord High Steward, as well in the case of the earl of Danby, as the other Five Lords.

“Upon consideration of this said Message the Commons found, that the admitting the Lords spiritual to exercise jurisdiction in these cases, was an alteration of the judicature in parliament, and which extended as well to the proceedings against the Five Lords, as the earl of Danby; and if a Lord High Steward should be necessary upon trials on impeachments of the Commons, the power of judicature in parliament upon impeachments might be defeated by suspending or denying a commission to constitute a Lord High Steward.

“ And that the said days of trial appointed by your lordships were so near to the time of your said Message, that these matters and the methods of proceedings upon the trials could not be adjusted by conference betwixt the two Houses before the days so nominated; and consequently the Commons could not then proceed to trial, unless the zeal which they had for speedy judgment against the earl of Danby (that so they might proceed to the Trial of the other Five Lords), should induce them at this juncture both to admit the enlargement of your lordships jurisdiction, and to sit down under these or any hardships (though with the hazard of all the Commons power of impeaching for time to come), rather than the Trial of the Five Lords should be deferred for some short time whilst these matters might be agreed on and settled.

“ For reconciling differences in these great and weighty matters, and for saving that time which would necessarily have been spent in debates at conferences betwixt the two Houses, and for expediting the Trials, without giving up the power of impeachments, or rendering them ineffectual; the Commons thought fit to propose to your lordships, that a committee of both Houses might be appointed for this purpose; at which committee (when agreed to by your lordships) it was first proposed, that the time of trial of the lords in the Tower should be put off till the other matters were adjusted; and it was then agreed, that the proposition as to time of trial should be the last thing considered; and the effect of this agreement stands reported upon your lordships books.

“ After which, the Commons communicated to your lordships, by your committee, a vote of theirs, viz. That the committee of the Commons should insist upon the former vote of their House, ‘ That the Lords spiritual ought not to have any vote in any proceedings against the lords in the Tower;’ and that, when that matter should be settled and the methods of proceedings adjusted, the Commons would then be ready to proceed upon the Trial of the Pardon of the earl of Danby, against whom they had before demanded judgment, and afterwards to the Trial of the other Five Lords, in the Tower; which vote extended, as well to the earl of Danby, as the other Five Lords; but the Commons have as yet received nothing from your lordships towards an answer of that vote, save that your lordships have acquainted them that the bishops have asked leave of the House of Peers that they might withdraw themselves from the Trial of the said Five Lords, with liberty of entering their usual protestation.

“ And though the Commons committee have almost daily declared to your lordships committee, that that was a necessary point of right to be settled before the trials, and offered to debate the same; your committee always answered, That they had not any power from your lordships either to confer upon, or to give any answer concerning, that matter.

“ And yet your lordships, without having given the Commons any satisfactory answer to the said vote, or permitting any conference or debate thereupon, and contrary to the said agreement, did on Thursday the 22d of May, send a message to the Commons, declaring that the Lords spiritual as well as temporal had ordered that the 27th of this instant May be appointed for the Trial of the Five Lords.

“ So that the Commons cannot but apprehend, that your lordships have not only departed from what was agreed on, and in effect laid aside that committee which was constituted for preserving a good understanding betwixt the two Houses, and better dispatch of the weighty affairs now depending in parliament; but must also needs conclude, from the said message and the vote of your lordships on the 14th of May, that the Lords spiritual have a right to stay and sit in court till the court proceeds to the vote of Guilty or Not Guilty; and from the Bishops asking leave (as appears by your lordships books two days after your said vote), that they might withdraw themselves from the Trial of the said Five Lords, with liberty of entering their usual protestation; and by their persisting still to go on and give their votes in proceedings upon the impeachments, that their desire of leave to withdraw at the said Trial is only an evasive answer to the beforementioned vote of the Commons, and chiefly intended as an argument for a right of judicature in proceedings upon impeachments, and as a reserve to judge upon the earl of Danby’s plea of a pardon; and upon these and other like impeachments, although no such power was ever claimed by their predecessors; but is utterly denied by the Commons. And the Commons are the rather induced to believe it so intended because the very asking leave to withdraw, seems to imply a right to be there, and that they cannot be absent without it. And because by this way they would have it in their power, whether or no, for the future, either in the earl of Danby’s case or any other, they will ever ask leave to be absent; and the temporal lords a like power of denying leave, if that should once be admitted necessary: the Commons therefore are obliged not to proceed to the Trial of any of the lords the 27th of this instant May, but to adhere to their aforesaid vote. and for their so doing, besides what hath been now and formerly by them said to your lordships, do offer you these reasons following:

“ 1. Because your lordships have received the earl of Danby’s plea of pardon, with a very long and unusual protestation; wherein he hath aspersed his majesty with false suggestions, as if his majesty had commanded or countenanced the crimes he stands charged with; and particularly, suppressing and discouraging the discovery of the Plot, and endeavouring to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical way of government; which remains as a scandal upon record against his majesty, tending to render his person and government odious to his people, against which it ought to be the first and principal care of both Houses to vindicate his majesty, by doing justice upon the said earl.

"2. The setting up a pardon to be a bar of an impeachment defeats the whole use and effect of impeachments. And should this point be admitted, or stand doubted, it would totally discourage the exhibiting any for the future; whereby the chief institution for the preservation of the government (and consequently the government itself) would be destroyed: And therefore the case of the said earl, which in consequence concerns all impeachments whatever, ought to be determined before that of the said Five Lords, which is but their particular case. And, without resorting to many authorities of greater antiquity, the Commons desire your lordships to take notice (with the same regard they do) of the declaration which that excellent prince king Charles I, of blessed memory, made in this behalf, in his Answer to the nineteen Propositions of both Houses of parliament; wherein, stating the several parts of this regulated monarchy, he says, "The King, the House of Lords, and the House of Commons, have each particular privileges;" and among those which belong to the king, He reckons power of pardoning; after the enumerating of which, and other his prerogatives, his majesty adds thus: "Again, that the prince may not make use of the high and perpetual power, to the hurt of those for whose good he hath it, and make use of the name of public necessity, for the gain of his private favourites and followers, to the detriment of his people, the House of Commons (an excellent conservator of liberty, &c.) is solely entrusted with the first propositions, concerning the levies of monies, and the impeaching of those, who, for their own ends, though countenanced by any surreptitiously-gotten command of the king, have violated that law which he is bound (when he knows it) to protect, and to the protection of which they were bound to advise him, at least not to serve him in the contrary; and the Lords, being trusted with a judicatory power, are an excellent skreen and bank between the prince and people, to assist each against any encroachments of the other, and by just judgments to preserve that law, which ought to be the rule of every one of the three, &c. Therefore the power legally placed in both Houses, is more than sufficient to prevent and restrain the power of tyranny, &c."

"3. Until the Commons of England have right done them against this plea of pardon, they may justly apprehend that the whole justice of the kingdom, in the case of the five Lords, may be obstructed and defeated by pardons of like nature.

"4. An Impeachment is virtually the voice of every particular subject of this kingdom, crying out against an oppression by which every member of that body is equally wounded; and it will prove a matter of ill consequence, that the universality of the people should have occasion ministered and continued to them, to be apprehensive of utmost danger from the crown, from whence they of right expect protection.

"5. The Commons exhibited Articles of Impeachment against the said earl, before any against the other five Lords, and demanded judgment upon those Articles; whereupon your lordships having appointed the Trial of the said Earl to be before that of the other five Lords: Now your lordships having since inverted that order, gives a great cause of doubt to the House of Commons, and raises a jealousy in the hearts of all the Commons of England, that, if they should proceed to the trial of the said Five Lords in the first place, not only justice will be obstructed in the case of those lords, but that they shall never have right done them in the matter of this plea of pardon, which is of so fatal consequence to the whole kingdom, and a new device to frustrate public justice in parliament.

"Which reasons and matters being duly weighed by your lordships; the Commons doubt not but your lordships will receive satisfaction concerning their propositions and proceedings; and will agree that the Commons ought not, nor can, without deserting their trust, depart from their former Vote, communicated to your lordships, That the Lords spiritual ought not to have any Vote in any proceedings against the lords in the Tower: And when that matter shall be settled, and the method of proceedings adjusted, the Commons shall then be ready to proceed upon the trial of the pardon of the earl of Danby (against whom they have already demanded justice,) and afterwards to the trial of the other five Lords in the Tower."

May 26, p. m.

The House took into consideration the Report of the Conference with the House of Commons this morning. And, for the more free debate, the House was adjourned during pleasure. The House was resumed. And, after a long debate,

This question was proposed, "Whether this debate shall be adjourned till 8 of the clock tomorrow morning?" Then this previous question was put, "Whether this question shall be now put?"

It was resolved in the affirmative. The main question was put; and it was resolved in the affirmative.

May 27.

The Narrative and Reasons delivered at the Conference yesterday with the House of Commons were again read. And, after a long debate, the Vote of this House, dated the 13th of May instant, and the explanation thereupon, dated the 14th instant, were read. And the question was put, "Whether to insist upon these Votes concerning the Lords spiritual?" And it was resolved in the affirmative.

HOUSE OF LORDS, October 23, 1680.

Ordered, That all such books, papers, and informations or depositions, relating to the late horrid Plot and Conspiracy, which have been by his majesty's order transmitted from his privy council board to this House, shall be perused by the lords committees for examination of matters relating to the said horrid Plot; whose lordships are hereby empowered to transmit to the House of Commons such of them as they shall judge necessary or useful for that House, in order to the trial of the Lords in the Tower; as also such other examinations as their lordships of the said Committee shall take relating thereunto.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Nov. 9, 1680.

Ordered, That the Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the two last parliaments, and to make a report of their proceedings, as well relating to the Popish Plot, as of the Impeachment against the Lords in the Tower, do present their report on Thursday morning next, in writing.

November 10.

Resolved, nem. con. That this House will proceed in the prosecution of the Lords in the Tower: And will forthwith begin with William viscount Stafford.

Ordered, That sir William Jones be added to the Committee, appointed to inspect the Journals of the two last parliaments, relating to the Popish Plot, and the impeachments of the Lords in the Tower: And the said Committee is to sit de die in diem.

November 12.

Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Lords to acquaint them with the Resolution of this House to proceed to the Trial of the Lords in the Tower; and forthwith begin with William viscount Stafford; and to desire their lordships to appoint a convenient day for the Trial of the said William viscount Stafford: And likewise to desire their lordships, That the Lords in the Tower may be confined, and kept from holding correspondence with one another, as persons impeached and committed for High-Treason by law ought to be: And that sir William Jones do go up with this Message to the Lords.

Sir Francis Winnington reported, and delivered in at the clerk's table, the abstracts of the proceedings of the two last parliaments, as well relating to the Popish Plot, as to the Impeachments against the Lords in the Tower.

Ordered, That the Report, now delivered in, be read to-morrow morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS, Nov. 12.

A Message was brought from the Commons, by sir William Jones and others:

To acquaint their lordships with their resolution to proceed to the Trial of the Lords in the Tower, and forthwith to begin with William viscount Stafford; and to desire their lordships to appoint a convenient day for the Trial of the said William viscount of Stafford. Also to desire the Lords in the Tower may be confined, and kept from holding correspondence with one another, as persons impeached and committed for High-Treason by law ought to be.

Hereupon the Lords made these ensuing Orders following:

"Ordered, That Tuesday the 30th day of this instant November be, and is hereby, appointed for the trial of William viscount of Stafford, now prisoner in the Tower, upon the impeachment of the House of Commons.

"Ordered, That the lieutenant of his majesty's Tower of London be, and is hereby, required to take care and order, That William earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, William lord Petre, Henry lord Arundel of Warder, and John lord Bellasis, prisoners under his charge for high treason, be so confined and kept from holding correspondence with one another, as persons impeached and committed for high treason by law ought to be."

The Answer returned by the messengers was: That the Lords have ordered, That the lords in the Tower shall not have any correspondence one with another. Also that the Lords have appointed, That Tuesday come fortnight is appointed for the trial of the lord viscount Stafford.

Ordered, That the lords with white staves do attend his majesty, to let him know from this House, "That they have appointed to have William viscount Stafford brought to his trial on Tuesday the 30th of this present November, in Westminster Hall, upon the Impeachment of the House of Commons against him;" and humbly to desire his majesty, "That he will be pleased to appoint a Lord High Steward for the purpose aforesaid, to continue during the said trial."

November 13.

The Lord Chamberlain reported, "That his majesty will appoint a Lord High Steward, for the trial of the lord viscount Stafford."

November 16.

Upon reading the humble Petition of William viscount of Stafford;

"Shewing; That he received, on Friday night last, an order, That his trial was by their lordships appointed to be on the 30th of this month. He doth most humbly beseech their lordships, to command all the peers that are absent to attend upon their lordships at his trial. He doth likewise most submissively shew unto their lordships, that Mr. Ralph Lawson is now detained at Rye, though an Habeas Corpus be sent, for to bring him to town, from the Court of King's Bench, which is not obeyed; and that he is so necessary for his lordship's trial, that he is no ways able to make his journey."

defence before their lordships without him; his lordship not knowing the names of several of his witnesses; and for other reasons belonging unto his trial. Likewise humbly sheweth, that he fears that he can no way have his witnesses so soon in town. Therefore, with submission, most humbly beseecheth their lordships, to grant him some days longer for his trial, and to grant him an order for his witnesses to appear; and to assign him Mr. Wallope, Mr. Saunders, and Mr. Hunt, to be of his counsel."

Hereupon the House made the following Orders:

"It appearing, by the petition of the lord viscount of Stafford, now a prisoner in the Tower, and shortly to come upon his trial upon the impeachment of the House of Commons, That Mr. Ralph Lawson, who is a person necessary for his lord's defence at his trial, is detained prisoner at Rye, and that an Habeas Corpus hath been issued for bringing him up, which hath not been obeyed: it is this day ordered, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in parliament assembled, That his majesty's writ of Habeas Corpus in due form be forthwith issued, for bringing up the said Ralph Lawson, in order to the service aforesaid."

"Upon reading of the petition of the lord viscount of Stafford, praying (among other things) that he may have an order for witnesses to be made use of in his lordship's defence upon his trial, now appointed: it is ordered, by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in parliament assembled, That the clerk of the parliaments shall issue out an order, or orders, for summoning such persons as the said viscount Stafford shall from time to time send in the names of, to be summoned as witnesses for the purpose aforesaid."

Ordered, That Mr. Wallop, Mr. Saunders, and Mr. Hunt, be, and are hereby, at the desire of the lord viscount Stafford, now prisoner in the Tower, assigned to be of counsel for his lordship, in order to his defence in matters of law upon his trial upon the Impeachment of the House of Commons, whereby he is charged with high treason; and that the said Mr. Wallop, Mr. Saunders, and Mr. Hunt, may have free access to the said viscount Stafford for that purpose.

Sir Timothy Baldwin delivered in the Information which he had taken of William Lewis, by order of this House; which Information was in the presence of the said William Lewis read; who acknowledged the same to be true.

The contents of which Information is as followeth:

"The Information of WILLIAM LEWIS, sworn before the House of Peers, this 13th of November, 1680.

"Who saith, That, coming out of sir John Morton's service, and being acquainted from his childhood with one Walter Jones, a priest, sometimes belonging to Wild-house, he applied himself to the said Jones, to help him to a service; who carried this informant to Grove's house, at the Golden Ball in York Street, in Covent Garden; which Grove was since executed. And this informant and Mr. Jones went to the Wind-mill Tavern, in Bridges Street, which was about the time when the last army for Flanders was upon raising, by the appointment of Grove; and thither he came also, and promised this informant all kindness in his power; desiring this informant to come to his house, which this informant often did. And after about four months intimate acquaintance with the said Grove, this informant told Mr. Jones, 'he had not been at confession a long time.' Upon which, he advised this informant to go to Mr. Harcourt, in Grove's house, where there was an altar up one pair of stairs. And, after this informant had made his confession to Mr. Harcourt, Grove told this informant, 'that if he would be ruled by him the said Grove, he this informant should be made for ever.' Whereunto this informant replied, 'It was possible he would.' And then the said Grove took up a pistol, which lay upon the left hand of the altar; and said, 'This is that which must do the business.' During which discourse, the said Harcourt, Fenwick, the said Jones, and Pickering, with others, who made up about the number of seven, turned their backs, as if they would not take notice of the discourse aforesaid; and then the said Grove told this informant, 'that he would not tell what the business was, until this informant had taken the Sacrament to be secret;' which this informant then took, the said Grove and Pickering taking the Sacrament at the same time. Which Sacrament being over, the altar, chalice, and other materials belonging to the service, were taken down; and so the persons aforesaid sat down about the table in the same room. And then Grove said to this informant, 'You have taken the Sacrament of secrecy; and so have we;' meaning himself and Pickering. This informant replied, 'Yes;' promising to be secret. Whereupon the said Grove further said, 'What I desire you to effect with me is, to kill the king; and you shall venture no further than I and Pickering.' This informant answered, 'Kill the king! for what?' Then all or most of the company then present answered, 'To kill the king, being a heretic, or any other heretic, to propagate the Roman Catholic religion, is no sin.' And then they proceeded to make great promises of large gratuities to this informant, so as he would venture therein as they did; and they did intimate 1,000*l.* at the least, and that the best persons in England would engage for it. And asked this informant, 'If he knew the lord Peters and the lord Stafford?' To which this informant answered, 'He did.' Then Grove scratched his head, seeming a little concerned at this informant's knowledge of those two lords. Then they asked, 'Whether this informant knew the lord Arundel, the lord Powis, and the lord Bellasis?' To which this informant answered, 'He did not.' And after some other discourse to the same effect, the company parted; and Grove desired this informant to send to him where he should meet him; and Jones did, after the meeting aforesaid, say, 'That Kelly was one of the number aforesaid.' The next day this informant sent to Grove, to come to him to a tavern near his own house; and thence went to the Plow Alehouse at Somerset Water Gate, where the said Jones met him. And this informant there told Grove, 'he had bought a horse, to go into the earl of Oxford's guards; and if he should omit his opportunity, and go along with him and miscarry, it would be to this informant's prejudice.' And thereupon the said Grove answered, 'that this informant need not fear any thing, but should be made a man for ever; for you shall have the best persons in England engage for what is promised unto you.' Whereto this informant replied, 'How shall I be sure of that? I have yet nothing but the bare word.' Whereupon the said Grove took a manual and his beads out of his pocket; and swore, 'a person of quality should come himself, and engage his honour that what was promised, should be performed;' and directed this informant 'the next day to meet him in Somerset House Chapel; and if that were not open, to walk about the coach houses, about nine in the morning;' which was in or about the month of May, 1678. being about three or four months before the Plot was discovered. And the said Grove then met this informant before the said coach houses, and took this informant with him to the said Plow Ale-house; saying, 'the person of quality would not come till the afternoon;' and desired this informant to meet him at four in that afternoon, in the same place; where he met this informant, and conducted him to the Piazza, or arched place, in the garden of Somerset House; and there was Harcourt, Fenwick, and Pickering, who walked with this informant and Grove about two hours; at which time a person came down the stairs, and asked, 'Which was the man?' To which Grove answered, 'This is he;' shewing this informant. Upon which, the said person, whom this informant knew to be the lord Arundel, though they pretended was the lord Bellasis; and the said lord Arundel took this informant from the company, and told this informant, 'that he was sensible that they had told this informant what he was to do.' Whereupon this informant asked his lordship, 'What he was to do?' Who replied in these words, 'You are to go along with Grove, to assassinate the king;' adding, 'you shall have 1,500*l.* paid you as soon as the business is effected; and if you will tarry in England, you shall have a commission in the Catholic army which is to be raised; otherwise you shall be safely transported into France, or where you please;' and thereupon gave this informant a guinea; and so my lord left this informant. And then Grove asked this informant, 'Whether he was satisfied?' And this informant answered, 'Yes;' and then repeated all the discourse that had passed between the said lord and this informant. Upon which, Harcourt told this informant, 'that if he did not like going into France, he should go to Florence, where the said lord Arundel had great interest.' And this informant saith, 'That the lord Arundel by means by this informant is squint-eyed, and hath a kind of a wart upon his nose. And this informant further saith, 'That as to what he gave the House of Peers an account of, as to Mrs. Elliot and Mr. Thompson, concerning some circumstances relating to the duke of York, and the five guineas received by Mr. Thompson's hand by this informant near St. James's House, this informant refers himself to the informations taken before Mr. Justice Rich. And further at present saith not.

November 23.

Ordered, That it be, and is hereby, referred to the lords commissaries for privileges, to advise and consider of what directions, rules, and methods, are fit to be observed, for preservation of order and regularity in the trial of the lord viscount Stafford, now to be tried, together with all such circumstances as occur in such trials, and make report unto the House.

November 26.

Ordered, That his majesty's surveyor general be, and is hereby, required to view the court and scaffolds prepared in Westminster hall, for the trial of the lord viscount Stafford, and see that they be strong and firm; and give this House an account thereof on Monday next, at nine of the clock.

Ordered, That the lord great chamberlain, or his deputy, be, and is hereby, desired to take care that the places in Westminster hall behind the lords, be kept for peeresses and their daughters, at their trial of the lord viscount Stafford.

November 27.

The House took into consideration the message brought yesterday from the House of Commons, "That this House would appoint a committee, to join with a committee of the House of Commons, for the adjusting the methods and circumstances in the trials of the lords in the Tower."

The question being put, "Whether a committee of this House shall be appointed, to meet with a committee of the House of Commons, to adjust the methods and circumstances of the trial of the lord viscount Stafford?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

Then the House named these Lords following, to be a committee to join with a committee of the House of Commons to adjust the methods and circumstances of the trial of the lord viscount Stafford.

E. of Salisbury, E. of Essex, E. of Aylesbury, the lord Wharton, and the lord Howard of Esc. Or any three of them; to meet this afternoon, at three of the clock, in the inner Court of Wards.

A message was sent to the House of Commons, by sir Timothy Baldwyn and sir Samuel Clarke:

To let them know, that the Lords have appointed a committee of five Lords, to meet with a committee of the Commons to adjust the methods and circumstances of the lord viscount Stafford's trial; and they have appointed the five Lords to meet this afternoon, at three of the clock in the inner Court of Wards.

The messengers return with this answer:

That the Commons will give a meeting as is desired.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, November 29.

Sir William Jones reports, from the committee appointed to meet with the committee of Lords, for the adjusting of methods and circumstances relating to the Trials of the Lords in the Tower, that the said committee did meet on Saturday last: And that the committee of lords being asked, by the committee of this House, whether their lordships had any propositions to make to the said committee, touching the methods and circumstances to be had in the Trials of the Lords in the Tower; their lordships made answer, that the Lords had sent down a paper to this House, containing several propositions; and that the Lords committees knew of no other propositions.

That their lordships being asked, Whether the commission of the Lord High-Steward were drawn in the same manner as that in the last parliament was drawn; and whether the clause 'cujus presentia in hac parte requiritur' were inserted; their lordships answered, that they could not give any account thereof; but that they would make report of the said proposition to the House of Peers; and would afterwards give answer to this committee therein.

That their lordships being asked, Whether they could give any assurance, that the lords spiritual would be absent at the trials, their lordships made answer, That they had no power from the House of Lords to give any account in that matter; but that their lordship would report the same to the House of Peers; and return an answer to the said committee the next meeting.

And further, that the said committees had agreed to meet again at twelve of the clock this day.

Ordered, That the said committee do meet the committee of lords, at 12 of the clock this day.

Sir William Jones reports from the committee appointed to meet with a committee of the lords, for adjusting the methods and circumstances relating to the trials of the Lords in the Tower, That the committee having met, their lordships returned an answer to several propositions made by the committee of this House as followeth; viz.

That, as to the question, Whether the commission of the lord high steward be the same now, as it was the last parliament; the Lords committees answered, that the commission differs not from that which passed in the last parliament, otherwise than in that the name of the lord Stafford is inserted in this commission, in the places where the names of the Five Popish Lords impeached were inserted in the former commission.

That, as touching the Lords spiritual, Whether they would be present at the trial of the lord Stafford; their lordships have returned assurance, that the Lords spiritual are not to be present at the trial.

That their lordships acquainted the said committee, that the prisoner is to be brought to-morrow morning at ten of the clock.

That the said committee, having acquainted the Lords committees with the vote of this House touching their coming as a committee to the Trial of the lord Stafford, made a proposal to the Lords committee, taking notice of one of the rules sent down from the Lords; viz.

"That, when the Commons should ask any question in the trial, They should apply themselves to the Lord High Steward." And that this committee made some exceptions thereunto, they taking the Lord High Steward not as a necessary part of the court, but only as the Speaker of the House of Lords; alleging, That, when the Commons speak to the court, they ought to say, "My Lords," not "My Lord, or Your Grace."

And that then the committees adjourned to 9 of the clock to-morrow morning.

Ordered, That the members of this House do sit together, without mingling with any other persons, in that place which is prepared for them, at the Trial of the lord Stafford: And Mr. Howard, captain of the women of the guards, is desired to take care therein.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed forthwith to view the scaffold erected in Westminster-hall for the said Trial: And they are empowered to send for such persons as they shall see occasion to make use of in this service.

The House being informed, from the committee appointed to prepare evidence against the Lords in the Tower, That a certain person inhabiting in Shrewsbury, being summoned to appear as a witness in the Trials of the popish Lords in the Tower, did refuse so to do; and that it was not convenient, that his name should as yet be publicly known.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue out his warrant to the serjeant at arms attending this House, to bring in custody the said person, to be named to Mr. Speaker from the said committee, for his warrant for that purpose.

November 30.

Ordered, That the serjeant at arms attending this House do go with his mace, and summon all the members of this House, that are in or about Westminster-hall, immediately to attend the service of the House.

HOUSE OF LORDS, November 30.

The earl of Essex reported from the committee of both Houses, "That yesterday their lordships agreed with the Commons, that the members of the House of Commons who are to manage the evidence against the lord viscount of Stafford, at his trial, should speak to the Lords as a House, and not to the Lord High Steward.

Upon which, it being moved, "That their lordships would consider, whether it be not fit to have his majesty's commission for a Lord High Steward read in this House, before an adjournment be made into Westminster Hall:" It was agreed to.

Then a Commission for appointing a Lord High Steward for the trial of the lord viscount of Stafford, was read (all the Peers standing up uncovered), as followeth:

CAROLUS R.

"BARKER."

Then the Lord Bishop of London, for himself and the rest of the Bishops, delivered in a Protestation; which they desired may be entered; which was read, as followeth:

"The Lords spiritual of the House of Peers desire the leave of this House, to be absent from the trial of the lord viscount Stafford; by protestation, saving to themselves and their successors all such rights in judicature as they have by law, and of right ought to have."

Then in regard of the age and weakness of the lord viscount Stafford, it was agreed, that his lordship should be permitted to have a stool or chair to sit on.

The House having taken into consideration the formalities to be observed in the proceedings at the trial of William lord viscount Stafford in Westminster-hall; agreed, That the serjeant at arms be continued in the House, to make proclamations which are to be made in the king's name.

Then the House was adjourned into Westminster-hall; whither the Lords went, in that order as they have directed; Garter king at arms calling them in their due places by a list.

The Trial of WILLIAM Viscount STAFFORD,* before the Lords at Westminster, on an Impeachment for High Treason, 32 Car. II. November 30, A. D. 1680,

THE FIRST DAY.

WILLIAM earl of Powis, William viscount Stafford, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, William lord Petre, and John lord Bellasis, having been formerly impeached in the House of Lords, of High Treason, and other high crimes and offences, by the House of Commons, in the name of themselves, and of all the Commons of England:

And the House of Commons having sent a Message to the Lords, to acquaint them with the

* "The other great business of this parliament was the Trial of the viscount of Stafford, who was the younger son of the old earl of Arundel, and so was uncle to the duke of Norfolk. He was a weak but a fair conditioned man: he was in ill terms with his nephew's family: and had been guilty of great vices in his youth, which had almost proved fatal to him: he married the heiress of the great family of the Staffords. He thought the king had not rewarded him for his former services as he had deserved: so he often voted against the court, and made great applications always to the earl of Shaftesbury. He was in no good terms with the duke; for the great consideration the court had of his nephew's family made him to be the most neglected: When Oates deposed first against him, he happened to be out of the way: and he kept out a day longer. But the day after he came in, and delivered himself: which, considering the feebleness of his temper, and the heat of that time, was thought a sign of innocence. Oates and Bedlow swore, he had a patent to be paymaster general to the army, Dugdale swore, that he offered him 500*l.* to kill the king. Bedlow had died the summer before at Bristol. It was in the time of the assizes: North, Lord Chief Justice of the common pleas, being there, he sent for him, and by oath confirmed all that he had sworn formerly, except that which related to the queen, and to the duke. He also denied upon oath, that any person had ever practised upon him, or corrupted him: His disowning some of the particulars which he had sworn had an appearance of sincerity, and gave much credit to his former depositions. I could never hear what sense he expressed of the other ill parts of his life, for he vanished soon out of all men's thoughts." Burnet.

Sir John Reresby thus mentions this case:

"Westminster-hall was the place, and I think it was the deepest solemnity I ever saw. Great were the expectations of the issue of this event, it being doubtful whether there were more who believed there was any plot by the papists in reality against the king's life, than not. He was impeached by the Commons, and being resolution of that House, to proceed to the Trial of those Lords, then in the Tower, and forthwith to begin with the said viscount Stafford, and to desire their lordships to appoint a convenient day for the Trial of the said viscount Stafford: Their lordships did thereupon appoint the 30th day of November 1680, for his Trial. And a place in Westminster-hall having been for that purpose erected, the same was as followeth: viz. Therein were both seats and wool-packs, correspondent in all points to those in the House of Lords; as also a state placed at the deemed to be weaker than the other Lords in the Tower, for the same crime, and less able to labour his defence, was purposely marked out to be the first brought on; but he deceived them so far as to plead his cause to a miracle. The three chief evidences against him, were Dr. Oates, Dugdale, and Turberville: the first swore that his lordship had brought him a commission signed by the pope, to be paymaster of the army to be raised against the king; and the second that he had offered him five hundred pounds to kill the king; and the third, that he had offered him a reward for the dreadful deed, but at a different time. And so positive seemingly were they in this and other dangerous evidence, that I, who sat and heard most of the trial, had not known what to think had the witnesses been but men of any the least credit; but indeed such were the incoherences, and indeed contradictions which seemed to me to arise towards the latter end, that considering them, and the very evil name of the people that swore against this lord, I was fully satisfied that all was untruth they laid to his charge. But the poor gentleman was condemned by a majority of 22. He heard his accusers and defended himself with great steadiness and resolution, and received his sentence with great courage and composure; nor did he stoop beneath the weight of his doom, till he submitted his head to the block, with his last breath protesting his innocence, and the cruel wrong he suffered. My lord Halifax was one that gave his voice for him; and the king, who heard all his trial, was extremely concerned at the rigour and abruptness of his fate."—"The unfortunate lord Stafford came to the House of Lords, and was admitted under a notion that he had some discovery, or confession to make, concerning the popish plot: but instead of that, he only protested his own innocence, and accused lord Shaftesbury of a correspondence with the papists, and of sending him to the duke of York, to desire him to use his interest with the king to dissolve the long parliament, as the best thing that could be done to favour the popish interest, and so he was remanded back again.—Lord Stafford was led upper end thereof, with a cabinet for the king, and whom his majesty should think fit to attend him there, on the right hand the state; and the like on the left hand, for the queen and her followers; as also galleries over head for ambassadors and others.

And to the end that the Commons might be fitted with seats upon this great occasion, there were erected for them on each side, divers benches, on several degrees, extending to the utmost walls of the Hall.

At the lower end the bar whereunto the prisoners were to be brought being placed, on the right hand thereof was a place raised about five foot, wherein the witnesses were to stand; and on the left hand a convenient room for those particular members of the House of Commons who were to manage the evidence.

And the right honourable Heneage lord Finch, Baron of Duventry, Lord High Chancellor of England, being by his majesty's special letters patent bearing date the 30th of November 1680, constituted Lord High Steward for that present occasion; upon Tuesday the said 30th of November, the Lord High Steward was honourably attended from his house in Queen street by all the judges of his majesty's courts in Westminster Hall, in their robes; as also by Garter principal king of arms, in his majesty's coat of arms, and the gentleman usher of the black-rod, unto whom his majesty had before delivered the white wand, to be carried before his lordship: and about nine of the clock in the morning set forward in his coach towards Westminster, sitting at the hinder end thereof, Garter and the gentleman who bore the great seal sitting both uncovered at the other end; one of the sergeants at arms, with his mace, being placed on the right side the coach, and the usher of the black rod, carrying the white wand, on the left side; the judges and his lordship's gentlemen in several coaches following after.

Being thus come to the stairs-foot, ascending to the House of Peers, the judges went up two and two together (the juniors first); next the Lord High Steward's gentlemen; after them to the scaffold on Tower-hill, where he persisted in the firmest denial of what was laid to his charge, and that in so cogent, convincing, and persuasive a manner, that all the beholders believed his words, and grieved his destiny." In other parts of his Memoirs Reseyby informs us, that on October 23, 1678, the king told him at the duchess of Portsmouth's lodgings, the Lord Treasurer also being present, that he took Oates's account of the tragedy of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, his getting admittance to the Jesuits College at St. Omers, &c. to be some artifice, and that he did not believe one word of the whole story; and that on the 31st of November following, the king farther told him, that Bedlow was a rogue, and that he was satisfied he had given some false evidence concerning the death of sir Edmundbury Godfrey.

the serjeant at arms with his mace, and the seal bearer; and lastly, the gentleman usher of the black rod, bearing the white wand; Garter principal king of arms going on his right hand.

Then his lordship alone, his train borne by one of his gentlemen. In this manner entering the House of Peers, he found all the Lords in their scarlet robes, also the Bishops in their rochets, and took his place upon the uppermost wool-sack.

This done, and prayers ended, his commission for Lord High Steward was read; and then the Bishops receded, and the Lords adjourned themselves into the new erected court in Westminster-hall.

All things being thus in readiness, and a large door-place broken through the upper end of Westminster-hall, into that room which was heretofore the Court of Wards:

Their lordships passed from their House first into the Painted Chamber, then through that called the Court of Requests; thence, turning on the left hand, into that called the Court of Wards; then entered at the door, so broke down as aforesaid, into Westminster-hall, and passed through a long gallery, placed between the King's-bench and Chancery Courts, into this new erected Court in Westminster-hall, and proceeded after this manner, viz.

First, the assistants to the clerk of the parliament.

Then the clerk of the crown in chancery, and clerk of the parliament; after them the masters in chancery two and two, and the king's attorney-general alone.

Then the Judges of all the courts in Westminster-hall, by two and two.

Next to them the noblemen's eldest sons.

After them four sergeants at arms, bearing their maces.

Next the gentleman-usher of the black-rod.

Then all the noblemen, according to their respective degrees, the juniors first, viz. barons, viscounts, earls.

Great officer, viz. Lord Chamberlain of the household.

Marquises, dukes.

Great officers, lord privy seal, lord president of the council.

Then four more sergeants at arms, bearing their maces.

After them, the gentleman carrying the great seal.

Then one of his majesty's gentlemen ushers, daily waiters, carrying the white wand; Garter principal king of arms, going on his right hand.

Then the Lord High Steward alone, having his train borne; and after him his highness Rupert duke of Cumberland, a prince of the blood.

This done, and the whole House of Peers having taken their places according to their degrees, the Commons being also seated on each side, and the managers in the rooms appointed for them; the Commons being all bare, the Lord High Steward, after obeisance made towards the state, took his place upon the uppermost wool-sack, and thereupon receiving the white wand from Garter and the gentleman taker upon their knees, delivered it to the usher of the black rod, who held it during the time of sitting there. Having so done, his lordship said, Crier, make proclamation of silence. Then the Crier, a serjeant at arms, made proclamation thus: All manner of persons are straitly commanded to keep silence upon pain of imprisonment. God save the king.

Lord High Steward. Make proclamation for the Lieutenant of the Tower to bring the prisoner to the bar.

Crier. O yes! O yes! O yes! Lieutenant of the Tower of London, bring forth thy prisoner William viscount Stafford, upon pain and peril shall fall thereon. God save the king.

Whereupon the Lieutenant of the Tower brought the prisoner to the bar.

Usher of the Black Rod. My lord Stafford must kneel; which he did.

L. H. S. Rise, my lord.

Then he arose and stood at the bar, and the Lord High Steward spake to him as followeth:

My lord viscount Stafford; the Commons of England assembled in parliament have impeached your lordship of High-Treason; and you are brought this day to the bar to be tried upon that impeachment: You are not tried upon the indictment of treason found by the grand jury, though there be that too in the case; but you are prosecuted and pursued by the loud and dreadful complaints of the Commons; and are to be tried upon the presentment which hath been made by the grand inquest of the whole nation.

In this so great and weighty cause, you are to be judged by the whole body of the House of Peers, the highest and the noblest court in this, or perhaps in any other part of the christian world.

Here you may be sure no false weights or measures ever will or can be found: Here the balance will be exactly kept, and all the grains of allowance, which your case will bear, will certainly be put into the scales.

But as it is impossible for my Lords to condemn the innocent, so it is equally impossible that they should clear the guilty.

If therefore you have been agitated by a restless zeal, to promote that which you call the Catholic cause; if this zeal have engaged you in such deep and black designs as you are charged with, and this charge shall be fully proved, then you must expect to reap what you have sown; for every work must and ought to receive the wages that are due to it.

Hear therefore with patience what shall be said against you, for you shall have full time and scope to answer it; and when you come to make your defence, you shall have a very fair and equal hearing.

In the mean time the best entrance upon this service will be to begin with the reading of the charge.

VOL. VII.

L. H. S. My lord, if your lordship find yourself infirm and unable to stand, your lordship may have a chair to ease yourself whilst your charge is reading. And a chair was brought accordingly, and his lordship sat thereon.

Clerk of the Parliament read the Charge.—
[Which see at p. 1285.]

L. H. S. Gentlemen of the House of Commons, be pleased to proceed.

Then Mr. Serj. Maynard, one of the Committee appointed to manage the Evidence, began as followeth:

My Lords;

May it please your Lordships; by command of the House of Commons, who have imposed upon us this task, we are here to prosecute this great charge against the prisoner, the lord at the bar. My lords, there are two parts that are in this great charge; there is a general, which is the subversion of the whole nation, the king himself to be murdered, the Protestant religion to be suppressed, war to be introduced, and those other things that are expressed in the articles. This general is charged in particular upon this lord; and, my lords, it was in consideration, how far it was fit to meddle with this general at this particular trial: for if this lord be guilty of such crimes, it will prove well enough that there was such a Plot. But, my Lords, withal we did consider when the first discovery of this Plot was made, how afterwards it took cold, how rumours were raised against it, how there were endeavours to suppress the belief of it; and therefore, my lords, we do conceive that it is fit we should first settle that, that there was a general Plot, a Plot of such a nature as the articles express.

Some objections we thought there might be raised, because it hath been so long in the world, some years now since the discovery of it, some persons, that is, some ten or eleven, prosecuted and attainted for it, and therefore that might have been satisfaction enough that such a Plot there was; besides, that there have been public declarations of the particulars of it to the world. But being now to proceed before your lordships in a judicial way, we did think fit, and we hope your lordships will approve of it, to spend some time in the proof of the general Plot, which we hope will be to the satisfaction of your lordships and the whole world; for we do not think that England only looks into this day's trial, but the whole world one way or other, the whole Christian world is concerned in it. My lords, after the publication of these things (which were not judicial) how far your lordships will believe them, as judges, we know not; we will prove it now, that their policies and contrivances may be laid open to the world. And first we offer it to your lordships, because we have made it part of the charge. And secondly, we shall do it, because we think your lordships are not obliged to believe things that are in print, till we prove them by witnesses judicially before you. But, the main reason why we do it, is, because we would touch upon those endeavours that have been used to make this seem as if it were a kind of State-Plot, I know not what to call it, a chimera, an imagination, and not a real thing. This they laboured many ways to effect, but we shall prove that it is a very real and a very true one.

When that Oates first made a discovery, it seems it had not that weight that we think now it will clearly have with your lordships; and had not the murder of sir E. Godfrey followed in the neck of it, the world as it was asleep, would have lain so; but that awaked us.

My Lords, it fell out in this case, as it did in another: When Cataline the traitor was a great way off Rome, and four other lords with him, Cassius, Cethegus, and others, five in all; it came to pass, that, as the great orator that was at that time said, 'Many were so ignorant that they would not think it; many were so unwise they would not believe it; some so ill that they would not favour it; and some so much worse that they did foster it; but all of them in not believing it, gave strength to the Conspiracy and the Treason.' And so it did here, for we look not upon ourselves as discharged from the treason when discovered, but when prevented.

My lords, another reason to induce us into the proof of the main plot is this: we do not look upon it as a particular offence, as if one lord was only to be questioned, and appear before your lordships judicially for it; he is indeed only before you at this time to receive his trial, and your judgment: but, my lords, This is a treason of a faction, and of a general party in the nation; it is not this or that lord, but a great number: it is not this or that lord that is mentioned in the Articles, but the Conspiracy is of a great faction. This do we think, and this makes us so earnest to press the general before your lordships, that we may give satisfaction to your lordships and the world what this Plot hath been, and how carried on every where.

My lords, the consequence of that is very great: for, my lords, if there were a general design, and a general plot, as clearly there was, some were to act in Spain, and some in France, some in other places, some in Ireland, Scotland, and England, and a great number of Jesuits (we have a matter of thirty in chase about this business); I say, my lords, if it be so, if one action be in one place, and another in another; yet if there be a common consent to accomplish this Plot, then what the one does is the act of all and the act of all is the act of every one.

My lords, the persons were many, and the places and times many they acted in, and the designs which they were to accomplish, and the means wherewith they were to accomplish them were many too. Great and wicked were their designs, to destroy our king, to take him out of the world; and why? Upon hopes of better times to them under him that should succeed him. Another part of the design was, to destroy, not this or that man that stood in their way, but the whole body of the Protestants here in England; not a murder, but a massacre and a slaughter of all whatsoever they were that came near them, and none were to escape; for if any meant to flee, they would be sure to cut them off: nay, not only to destroy our king, though that be the greatest offence that our law can take hold of, but to destroy our religion, and to destroy us because of our religion.

To accomplish this, that we may open the generals of it, arms were to be provided, men to be raised, an army was formed in effect; and who to lead, and who to command, and who to pay. But, my lords, not only were arms to be had here among ourselves, but a French aid must be fetched in; assistance from France must come too: intelligences and letters are written, and correspondencies had, and aids promised by the ministers from thence.

My lords, It is a strange thing that Englishmen should contrive to have an invasion of strangers upon their own country; and surely they are the worst bigots in the world that were so zealous to destroy their own nation: and they were not wise sure to think, that if the French did come in, they should continue great lords or great men; and yet thus it was in general. It is very strange that it should enter into the heart of any man to destroy so many persons. But, my lords, if we look upon what did encourage them, and what confirmed them in this design, and what they have published to the world about their religion, we shall not wonder at it; since they tell us it is lawful to kill a heretic king, and the king of England is an heretic, they say, and so declared, so that whosoever would kill him did a lawful and pious piece of service to God: nay, not only so, but a meritorious and glorious one too, for which they may be canonized for saints.

My lords, We find it is no new thing: look into all the nations where the pope hath any power or possibility of hope to gain a power, nothing hath been able to stand in their way, but they have broken through all the bonds of nature, and other obligations to attain their ends. Look into Spain, king Philip there removed his own son, by what means the story tells us; he was heir apparent, but he was a Protestant; and there also the father puts fire to his own daughter, because she was a Protestant; there a Spaniard goes from Spain into Germany to murder, and did murder his brother for no other cause but because he was a Protestant. Leave Spain and go into France; what massacres have been committed there under the colour of a marriage in queen Elizabeth's time! And before that, how many hundred Albigenes and Waldenses have been put to the sword for Religion! Come we to our own country, and look into England, what hath been done here, when queen Elizabeth had a successor of another religion, how many attempts were there made upon her person to bring that suc-gave in! When king James came to the crown let us remember the Gunpowder-Treason,* wherein all the nation was to be destroyed; King, Lords, and Commons together, and in parliament assembled, were then to be a sacrifice, a burnt offering, though they might call it a peace offering; for these gentlemen are for sacrifices of blood as peace offerings, to reconcile us to the pope. If this be made out, we think, their principles having produced these fruits in other ages, we may believe they would do so now.

What has been said as history of former times, is not offered as evidence of fact to the present case, but induces a probability that what hath been done by such persons may be done by them again. But, my Lords, we shall make it clear, and bring it home to this lord, that he hath had his head, his tongue, his hand, his heart, and his purse in this damnable and horrible contrivance and treason for the destroying of the king, the government, our religion and our nation. We shall bring it home to him; but my part is only to open the general conspiracy: and indeed, my lords, it is an heavy burden on my aged shoulders, considering that the winter of infirmity and age is growing so fast upon me.

My lords, The particulars concerning this noble lord, because the credit of it rests on the testimony only of one man, viz. Mr. Oates, whose testimony being taken by sir E. Godfrey, Justice of Peace, and kept in writing by him, then sir E. Godfrey was way laid, and murdered by men of the popish religion, thereby to suppress the Examination that he had taken. This startled and opened the eyes of the world to look about us for farther discovery, lest we should be led as 'Oxen to the slaughter, not knowing whither we went.' Afterward it pleased God to bring some of their religion and party to make further discovery: whereupon several Jesuits, guilty of the Plot, were therefore prosecuted and brought to judgment and death.

After the murder of Godfrey, several fables were spread abroad, as if he were slive and married, as was declared to several lords: others of the party reported he had murdered himself; but his body being found, it was hard for the party to invent or tell, whether he first strangled himself, and then run himself through, or first run himself through, and then strangled himself: that was a dilemma to disprove their fables touching Godfrey's murder.

It then fell out, that Mr. Bedlow came as a second discoverer, whose testimony concurred with Oates; and then there being two witnesses, as is necessary in case of treason, the design was to take off Bedlow, that there should remain but one, a single witness: in order to which, Reading † tempts Bedlow with rewards to lessen his former testimony, and qualifies that which he had deposed positively was but matter of hearsay; for which Reading, the instrument in that design and attempt, was indicted and convicted by three witnesses, and suffered according.

But then this attempt upon Bedlow failing, the next attempt was to take off Oates's testimony by charging him with an infamous offence: for which purpose one Knox is employed, who suborns Laue and Osborn, and they swore it against Oates; but on re-examination confess the subornation and falshood of their design and Knox and Lane are therefore indicted and found Guilty.—Thus, when the treason was discovered, the murder of an officer of justice is made the means to hide it; and then false and infamous stories set on foot of that officer to hide that murder, and perjury and subornation the means to blast the discoverers.—These wicked and ill practices we take to be a second proof of the Plot, both in general and particular, the records of which convictions are here before your lordships ready to be proved: for, cui bona, none would do such wicked practices, but to hide a greater sin; and worse designs if possible will be opened, and proved by one to whom that is particularly appointed.

My lords, We speak this that the world may receive satisfaction; we will let our Evidence be all open and public in the face of the sun, and shew, we go not about by private subornations, though there are endeavours to encounter us by such.

My lords, if we make out these things, here is matter enough for the satisfaction of the world, as to the general contrivance. But my lords, as you sit here as judges of this lord, the prisoner at the bar, we must bring it down to particular persons, and we shall do it even to him, that those things which were mentioned in general were his contrivance, at least wise, as a man highly, deeply guilty of conspiring the king's death; and in order to that, of raising an army, and the other things that have been opened.

My lords, I beseech you to pardon me, if I have troubled you too long: the particulars are many, I have had little help to prepare it from any body but myself: but I submit myself to your lordships, and hope that what is wanting in me, will be supplied by others that follow: and I also hope you will find no defect in our evidence at all, whatsoever may have been in the opening of it.

Then Sir Francis Winnington; another of the Committee appointed for the management of the Evidence, spoke as followeth:

My Lords,

I shall begin where Mr. Serjeant Maynard ended, and confine myself to this case, as it stands before you, and to open the particular evidence relating to the lord, the now prisoner at the bar.

My lords, I look upon the cause of this day to be the cause of the Protestant Religion; and I doubt not but that Plot, which has alarmed all Christendom, will be so clearly made out in this trial, that the most malicious of our enemies will henceforth want confidence to deny it.

That the religion of the papists does countenance and encourage the murdering of princes, the massacring of such as they mis-call heretics, and the committing of all sorts of impiety in order to promote their superstitious and idolatries, has been mentioned by the gentleman who spoke before me; and I should mispend time to say more of a truth so well known, in so great and so learned a presence: I will therefore directly apply myself to the business of the day, to represent to your lordships our evidence of the Plot in general, and of the guilt of this lord at the bar in particular.

In order to which, I shall crave your lordships leave that I may use this method. 1. To shew what advantageous opportunities the Papists had to enter into, and undertake this great and detestable Conspiracy. 2. To prove the reality of the Plot in general, which I look upon as a very easy undertaking. 3. To state the particular Evidence against the prisoner at the bar, by which he will appear to have been one of the principal conspirators in this horrid design to murder our sovereign, (whom God preserve) to extirpate the Protestant Religion, and to subvert totally the government and fundamental laws of this kingdom.

My lords, to shew what extraordinary advantages the papists had to enter upon this conspiracy, will very naturally lead us into our proof of it; and therefore I shall speak somewhat to that in the first place. It is not unknown to your lordships, or to any others who have in the least degree enquired into affairs, that his majesty has been so unhappy as that (unawares to him) some ministers, who have been papists at the bottom and others that have drove on their interest have crept into his councils, and thereby gave great opportunities to advance popery. It is most true, that as soon as these ill ministers were detected, and their ill designs discovered, his majesty did discharge them: but to the misfortune of the king and his people, as ill men have been recommended to succeed them, and came into their places.

In the next place, my lords, there did appear in some men too easy and favourable a disposition towards the papists. They were grown strangely moderate towards these old enemies of our church and state. New projects of reconciling us were set on foot, and books were written to distinguish the Church of Rome from the Court of Rome. One of those books, which was printed in the year before the discovery of the Plot, pretends, that there ought to be a difference made between papists of loyal and disloyal principles, This book, as it was written more artificially than the rest, and published in so critical and dangerous a juncture, deserves, and I doubt not in time will have, a particular consideration. It is easy to believe how great encouragement this must give to the Romanists, to see how very willing men were to meet them, and how freely the pen was drawn in their favour.

Another great encouragement, my lords, which the papists had, was, That by the means of those ministers who were secretly of their faction, whensoever his majesty was pleased to command the laws made against them in the reign of queen Elisabeth and king James to be put in due execution, his good intentions were frustrated, and the severity of those laws was turned upon the Protestant dissenters. This was a master-piece of Rome, not only to divert from themselves the edge of those laws which were designed against them, but to turn them upon the Protestants, and to make them useful to advance the Romish interest: and when they had thus divided and distracted us, then was the fairest time for them to attempt to destroy us utterly, and to make sharp their weapons in order to a massacre.

But, my lords, that which gave the papists the greatest encouragement to enter into this detestable conspiracy, was, that they had (to the great unhappiness of this kingdom, and the Protestant religion) the expectation and hopes of a popish successor. This was an opportunity not to be lost. They had abundant experience of his majesty's firmness in the Protestant religion, both during his exile, and since his happy Restoration, and how resolutely he had kept that promise which he made in his Letter from Breda, That neither the unkindness of some Protestants, nor the civilities of some papists, should in the least degree startle him, or make him swerve from his religion.

They therefore could have no hopes of arriving at their point, the re-establishment of their Church, whilst the king lived; and it was too great a hazard to expect his majesty's death by the course of nature: and therefore, like true papists, that would stick at no wickedness to accomplish their designs, they threw off all bonds of loyalty and allegiance, and resolved to destroy our sovereign, whose life was the only obstacle in their way. This was the last and most wicked part of their Plot, which, though it consisted of very many parts, yet this was the principal; and our Evidence against the lord at the bar will chiefly run to this part of the design.

I have only mentioned some of those encouragements which the world plainly saw the papists had, before the Plot was detected: but since the discovery, it has been abundantly proved, that it had been carrying on for many years, and that so universally, that it is a wonderful thing it appeared no sooner.

My lords, I come now to our Evidence: and though it may seem unnecessary to prove to your lordships a general Plot of the papists, who are so well satisfied of it already, and have more than once declared so to the world; yet because it is the most natural method for us, first to prove that there was a conspiracy, before we attempt to prove this lord to have been one of the conspirators, we shall beg your leave as to that particular. And as we shall be careful not to take up too much of your time, so we well know your lordships will allow us all the time necessary to give our evidence.

We have many records, things reduced to judgment, whereby the Plot is most undoubtedly proved, and which are legal evidences before your lordships: the attainders of several jesuits and priests, the attainder of Langhorn and of Coleman, whom I should have named in the first place. We have also the conviction of those that were prosecuted for the murder of sir E. Godfrey; and there is a conviction, though not for the murder, yet for cutting the throat of Mr. Arnold. It is true he is not dead, yet as to the public, I count him murdered by the papists, though he be alive in the world. My lords, we have convictions not only of treasons, murders, and cutting of throats, but of almost all other villainies whatsoever: as of attempts to suborn witnesses, and to scandalize the king's evidence; and to that we shall produce the records concerning Reading's attempt upon Bedlow; that concerning the suborning of Knox and Lane to swear huggery against Dr. Oates; and the conviction of Tashborough and Price to corrupt Dugdale, a principal witness as to this Plot.

I only mention these particulars, my lords; and certainly as you are a great Court of Record, you will take notice of them. It would be a hard thing, perhaps, to spend the time in reading all, since all of them are made known to the world already; but we shall in the course of our evidence produce them, and you may read such of them as you please. All the use we make of them, is for the proof of the general Plot, which is requisite to be done; for it will be hard to believe the prisoner guilty of the Plot, if there was no such Plot at all.

My lords, we shall make appear to you things which have not yet been brought into judgment. In the year 1676, we shall prove by a witness that was then abroad, and discoursed with Anderton, Champion, Green, and several other priests and jesuits, that they did acquaint him that there would be great alteration in England ere long; that the king was a heretic, and excommunicated, and might be destroyed; and this doctrine they continually and industriously preached. And they further said, if once the king were removed (who alone stood in the way), their religion must needs flourish; for this reason, as the witnesses will speak, that the duke of York was on their side.

My lords, We shall prove, that they had in England men no less industrious among them, some whereof have been executed: Gavan by name, who made it his business to go up and down in several counties of this kingdom, to prove by Scripture, councils, and examples, That it was a lawful undertaking to kill his majesty. These things I name, as necessary in order to introduce our particular evidence; I am unwilling to dwell longer upon this point of the general Plot. I shall produce the Records, and produce our several Witnesses, Mr. Oates and others, that will give you a full and plain account of it.

My lords, Having done with the general Plot, I come now to open the particular Evidence against my lord the prisoner at the bar. As to him, my lords, our evidence stands not upon conjectures, or upon mere probability, because this lord is (as we well know) a zealous papist, and hath owned himself so; but we have express particular proofs against his person. My lords, we have one witness to produce to your lordships, who will prove, that in September 1678, there was a consult of some priests and other conspirators, at Tixal in Staffordshire, my lord Aston's house, for killing of the king, where my lord Stafford was present. And by a discourse in the same month, we shall prove what reason this lord did give, why he and their party undertook the murdering of the king; because, he said, that he and many Catholic families had no recompence for their loyalty; but if any thing fell, it was disposed of to rebels and traitors. This he resented deeply; but above all, the obligation of his conscience, and of his religion, persuaded him to do it, and confirmed him in his resolution to go on in this horrid design.

My lords, We will go further, and prove, that this lord offered 500*l.* out of his own purse to carry on the Plot, and particularly this part of it, for killing the king. We shall produce to your lordships a witness to whom he made this offer, as looking upon him to be a faithful man, and having received so great a character of him from one Evers a priest, that he thought he might safely communicate the matter to him; and the argument he urged to persuade the witness, besides the 500*l.* which he said upon his application to Harcourt and Ireland they should pay him, was this, That others as well as he were employed in the same design; that it was the only way to establish the Romish religion in England; that he would lay an everlasting obligation upon all the persons of that persuasion, and that he should not only have his pardon, but be canonized for it.

My lords, This is the substance of the testimony of the first witness which we shall produce against my lord Stafford; and that is so express, as I think it can hardly be answered.

My lords, Our next witness says thus (for I shall but open the substance of what they say): in June or July, 1678, there were several letters from this lord at the bar to the jesuits in London, in which his lordship did declare his readiness to serve them in their great design: and in June (1678) the latter end of the month, my lord Stafford came to Mr. Fenwick's chamber in Drury-Lane (he went not then by the name of my lord Stafford, but by the name of Mr. Howard of Effingham), and there he did receive a commission from Fenwick to be paymaster-general of the army which was to be raised for the carrying on the plot. His lordship told them he was then going into the country, but he hoped he should soon hear from them, that they had done the business, at least that it would be done before his lordship did return. To which Fenwick made answer,

Your lordship must look after the business as well as other persons; and there will be need of some to countenance it in town: thereupon the lord, the prisoner at the bar, said, That they had been often deceived by this prince, and been patient with him, but they would bear no longer, but were now resolved to do the work without delay, for their patience was worn out. Several other particular circumstances the witness will acquaint your lordships withal, which I shall not take up your time with.

My lords, We have a third witness as considerable and particular as any of the rest, one that lived three years in the lady Powis's house, had his education there, and was persuaded by that lady, and by one Morgan a jesuit, to become a friar, and to that end was sent to Doway; but not liking to continue at Doway (he will tell you the reason why) he escaped to France, and at Paris came to his brother a Benedictine monk there, who advised him to go for England. But whilst he staid at Paris, this gentleman, by the means of his brother and other priests, grew into a great familiarity with my lord Stafford, who was then in France, and who at last came to have such a great confidence in him, that his lordship could not hold, but told him, that though he had obliged all his friends by going away from Doway, yet he had something to propose to him, which would be a means to reconcile him to his friends, and bring him into preferment, and into the friendship of all good Catholics, whom he would oblige by it. The gentleman was willing to embrace so happy an opportunity, and desired to know what it was could procure him so great a good. My lord Stafford, the prisoner at the bar, told him, It was a thing of very great importance; and after having required from him all possible obligations of secrecy, he told him plainly what great benefits would accrue to himself, and what advantage to the Catholic cause, if he would make himself and the nation happy, by undertaking to kill the king of England, who was an heretic, and consequently a rebel to God Almighty. My lord Stafford did believe the witness did embrace this proposal warmly, and therefore directed him to prepare to go for England, and to go before-hand from Paris to Diep, where he would meet him, and go over with him. But it seems my lord Stafford met with some diversion, for he did not keep his word with him in coming; and so this gentleman being disappointed, went over without him: but fearing to be called upon to the same service, he returned back again suddenly, and went into the French army.

My lords, we shall produce these witnesses against the lord at the bar; and when they have proved to your lordships what I have opened, any one who was not acquainted with the Popish party, would believe they would be at a loss how to acquit themselves from this charge. All manner of foul and indirect practices have been used by them to terrify, to corrupt, and to scandalize our witnesses; all manner of objections have been made to our evidence. If the witness does not come up to speak directly to every point, we are told, he says nothing at all; if he speaks directly, they cry, he is not to be believed. Thus they have a ready answer to every witness that has been or ever shall be produced, either that he says nothing material, or that nothing that he says ought to have any credit.

But we doubt not by this trial before your lordships, if we cannot stop their mouths, at least to convince all the world besides of the reality of this plot.—It will be no wonder if their confidence goes on still to frame evils. they are used to scandalize the government, and they cannot give it over. How often has his majesty under his great seal published and declared this conspiracy! How often has he pressed his parliaments to go on to bring the conspirators to punishment! And at the opening of this very parliament he says plainly, That he does not believe himself safe from their designs. Your lordships also have voted the unquestionable truth of the Plot, and so have the Commons; yet these men are so hardy as still to deny the plainest truth, so confirmed as this hath been.

Nay, my lords, their malice goes yet farther, for they have been so bold as to whisper up and down, and industriously to spread reports, before the Trial, as if this lord at the bar, and the rest who are impeached, should certainly be acquitted. We do hope to be able to detect the authors of this great scandal; and the Commons doubt not of your lordships concurrence to assist them in bringing them to their deserved punishment. This is sure the first time that ever any sort of men presumed to reflect upon the justice of this high and noble court. Your ancestors, my lords, did by their honour, courage and justice, preserve our ancestors; the advantages of which, we, who are descended from them, do now enjoy; and we shall never have occasion to doubt in the least, but that your lordships will tread in their steps. You have in your hands a great opportunity to make your zeal for truth and for the Protestant religion famous to posterity. No artifice or malice can create the least jealousy in us, that ever your lordships should shew any partiality or injustice to the Commons of England. To your judgment this cause is submitted; and when we have your judgment, we doubt not but we shall drive Popery out of this English world. My lords, we shall go on to the proof of our cause; and I hope this will be a happy day to us and the whole Protestant interest.

Then Mr. Treby, also one of the committee appointed for the management of the Evidence, spoke as followeth:

My lords; These two learned gentlemen have fully discharged their province. I shall proceed to call our witnesses to give their testimony. But before we produce them your lordships will be pleased to take notice, that our Evidence will consist of two parts, general and particular; the general, to shew the universal conspiracy; the particular, to shew what special part this noble lord, the prisoner at the bar had in it. And though in the first part my lord Stafford may not be particularly named, yet that Evidence will be pertinent and proper for us to give in this trial of my lord Stafford; for we charge him not with the private treason, wherein he with his immediate accomplices only might be concerned, but it is a treason of the Popish faction, or at least the principal and active Papists.

We lay it in our Articles of Impeachment, That there was an execrable Plot contrived and carried on by Papists, and that the conspirators acted in divers parts, and in divers places, beyond sea, as well as here. It was a treason that did bestride two lands: England indeed was the thing aimed at; the destruction of the religion, government, and liberty of England, was the end; but the means and instruments were not collected here only, but part of them were to be brought in from abroad. This is an enterprize too extensive to be entirely managed by a single nobleman: and though we look upon my lord Stafford as a great malefactor, yet we cannot think him so great a man, as to be able within his own sphere to compass this whole design. Should we not take this course of evidence, first to prove the general plot, it might be a great and just objection in my lord's mouth to say, "You charge me with a design of subverting the kingdom, how is that possible to be undertaken by me, and those I have had opportunity to converse and confederate with? A mighty part of the Catholic world had need to be engaged for such a purpose."

My lords, If this would be a material objection from this lord, then will it be requisite for us to obviate and prevent this objection, by shewing; first, that there was such a grand and universal design of Papists, in which this lord was to co-operate for his distinct share; though, perhaps, when we descend to our particular Evidence, it will appear, that his part hath been great, and managed with malice as great as any.

My lords, We shall begin with a witness, a gentleman whose education has given him the opportunity of knowing the inside of their affairs; and we presume he will give you a satisfactory account: his name is Mr. John Smith.

L. H. Steward. What do you call him to, gentlemen?

Mr. Treby. To the general plot, my lords.

Lord Stafford. May it please your lordships, I know not who he is, nor his name; I humbly beseech your lordships, that this witness, whoever he be, and all the rest that have any thing to witness against me, may look upon me face to face, according to the words of the statute. I humbly beseech your lordships to grant me this, which I take to be according to law; and that each may give his evidence alone, and that both against me, and for me, one may not know what the other says.

L. H. S. My lord, you shall have all the fair proceedings that can be.

L. Staff. The law says, my accusers must look me face to face. I desire to have the words read.

L. H. S. Your lordship may see him where he stands up.

Then Mr. Smith turned, and looked upon my lord Stafford.

L. Staff. I do see him, but I do not know him.

L. H. S. Swear him.

Clerk. The evidence that you shall give in the trial of William Viscount Stafford, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; so help you God, and the contents of this book.

L. H. S. Your lordship observes he is not brought as a particular witness against your lordship, but to prove the general design of your party.

L. Staff. 'Tis still concerning me.

L. H. S. Look upon my lord Stafford (which he did), and now tell your evidence.

Mr. Treby. This is Mr. Smith, my lords. And that which we would examine this witness to, is, the general design of the plot; what knowledge he hath had of it here or beyond sea; the gentleman is able to understand the general question.

Mr. Smith. My Lords, I remember very well when I went first into France, I came acquainted with Abbot Montague, Father Gascoigne, and several other Popish Priests and Jesuits, who often discoursed with me, and told me, if I would make myself a Catholic, I should have an employment amongst them there, and afterwards in England; for they did not doubt but the popish religion would come in very soon. Upon which I asked his lordship the Abbot one day, what reason he had to believe it? He told me two reasons: 1. that they did not doubt but to procure a toleration of religion, by which they should bring it in without noise; and, 2. that the gentry that went abroad did observe the novelty of their own religion, and the antiquity of theirs, and the advantages that were to be had by it. These reasons Abbot Montague gave me. There was one Father Bennet and others that told me, the chief reason was, their party was very strong in England, and in a few years they would bring it in, right or wrong. All this would not prevail upon me to turn papist, and I lived among them several years. At last I had a design to go to Rome; and as I went I had a design to go to Provence (and so into Italy), where there was one cardinal Orimaldi coming through the town, and the Jesuits having a great school there, I was curious to go to the school, and they were very desirous I should tarry for some time in the town: I did, and they made much of me, and told me much to the same substance, what assurances they had of their religion coming into England. At last they had a desire I should discourse with the Cardinal; which I did; and he made much of me, and he it was that perverted me to the Romish religion. Upon this, the Cardinal shewed me a pair of hangings that were in his house, which he said did belong to the Queen-mother, and were bought in Paris; and he told me he was acquainted with many of the nobility in England, and that he had great assurance the popish religion would prevail; and he told me there was but one in the way, and though that man was a good-natured man, yet they could not so far prevail upon him, but that to accomplish their designs they must take him out of the way. But at last I left this place, and went to Rome, where I lived some years in the English Jesuits' college there: and when I had lived there five years, I came to be prefect of several rooms there, which are the scholars lodgings and places of study. I have heard it there often disputed in their own college, both preached and privately exhorted, that the king of England was an heretic, and that there was no king really reigning, and whoever took him out of the way would do a meritorious action.*

L. H. S. Who was that that said so?

Mr. Treby. Name the persons.

Mr. Smith. Father Anderton; Rector of the college, who was a very good scholar; Father Mumford, and one Father Campion; but chiefly one Father Southwell, one of the chief of the Jesuits. And I doubting of the truth of that opinion, they did shew me several of their books there, and directed me to some passages of Mariana, Vasquez, and Bellarmine, which I have since published to the world, wherein they did assert it as a true doctrine, and as Christian doctrine, what the Fathers told me; and this was never condemned at Rome. Besides, my lords, when I was coming from Rome, with my faculty and license signed by Cardinal Barberino, who generally conducts, or causes to be conducted, all papists to take their leave of the pope; and before we came away (for there were five or six of us together) for a whole month these Fathers were exhorting of us, That we were not obliged to obey the king of England, and that in all private confessions we were to instruct all persons that we thought were capable of any design, that they should use all their endeavours for promoting the popish religion. I, coming into England, made my application to Dr. Perrot, who belonged to the Portugal ambassador, and was chief of the popish clergy in England. I was kept there some months to say mass in his chapel; and afterwards I was sent into the North, where there were abundance of Jesuits and Friars, to one Mr. Jenison's house; where knowing the principles of these people, I made it my business to rout these Jesuits away, especially out of Mr. Jenison's house, who had a kinsman of his own that was a Jesuit, and used to serve him in his house, and great complaint was made against me; and there was one Mr. Smith, otherwise Serjeant, in the North, who gave me intimation of it, and to whom I wrote to satisfy him and the clergy of the grounds and reasons why I routed them away; which, if he be in England now, he can justify. Upon this, I received a smart letter, as a kind of reprimand for my doing so; and he told me, that though they did agree with me in doctrine, yet they would endeavour what they could to bring in the popish religion, and taxed me sharply for appearing against it. I told him how the Jesuits perverted the duke of York; and that by that means they would be the chief men in England, though there were none of their order till Queen Elizabeth's time. Besides, my lords, in Rome I saw Coleman's Letters, and read them once a month, as I believe; wherein he gave us intelligence of several passages that happened in court; how the duke, and the queen, and the chief of the nobility were of their side; how they carried matters several times; the ways my lord Clifford did use, and sir Wm. Godolphin, to effect the work; and that they did not question but they should get my lord-treasurer Danby on their side too. This was in Coleman's Letters; and he had so much allowance for his intelligence. These letters of his I read several times in the college. My lords, afterwards, when I came from Rome, I saw abbot Montague again, and he said he was very glad to see me, and that I was a priest. Well, but, said I, what am I the better? Where is the employment you promised me when I should come into England? He said me I should have it very soon, and he was glad that I had not made myself a Jesuit; and he recommended me to Dr. Goffe, Confessor to the Queen-mother, who said he would do any thing in the world for me, and he did not doubt but he should get a preferment for me; which Dr. Goffe is now living. Truly when I came into England, I found all the popish clergy of England, that I discoursed with, of the same opinion, that they did not doubt but the Romish religion would soon come in. And besides, in the North there was gathering of money, in which I was ordered to be one of the chief men; but I was against it. I told them I would do nothing in it; I thought it was illegal to send any money beyond sea: they told me it was charity, only to repair the college at Doway. I told them it was strange that there should be so much money raised only to repair one college, which would serve three or four colleges; and I persuaded Mr. Jenison, and all other persons I had to do with, not to meddle with it. As to this raising of the money, I conceive it may be inferred, it was for some other private business, and I believe was for the carrying on the design. As for the gentleman at the bar, my lord Stafford, I know nothing of my own particular knowledge, but only this: There was one Thomas Smith, sir Edward Smith's brother, that lived at a place not far off the place where I lived, who was one that contributed in paying the money that was then collecting: He was the man that writ a letter up to my lord Stafford, to complain of two or three justices of the peace that were active against popery; upon which there was one that was turned out, that I think is now of the honourable House of Commons—

Mr. Treby. Name him.

Mr. Smith. Sir Henry Calverly. The other was not turned out. So I asked Smith, when I was lately in the country, about it; for I heard a rumour, that there was a letter of this Mr. Smith's found in my lord Stafford's chamber, and I was told it by a parliament-man, one colonel Tempest. So, said I to him, now you will be concerned in the Plot. No, said he, I care not for that letter, it will signify nothing: for my lord won't keep by him any thing of any moment. I asked him what he knew about my lord. He told me he writ another letter to my lord, to know whether he would make a conveyance of his estate away, and whether he apprehended they were in danger: and he told me his lordship's answer was, That several did so, but he would not; for he expected some sudden change or alteration. I asked him what change or alteration he understood by it. Sir, said he, what can be understood by it, but an alteration of the government and religion? I am sure, said he, my lord is so wise a man, that he would not write so without some ground. This is all I can say to the gentleman at the bar; and this is true, by the oath I have taken.

Mr. Treby. My lords, I observe Mr. Smith in the beginning of his testimony (speaking of the discourse he had at Rome) said, they told him there was one in the way; I presume it is not uneasy to conjecture who was that one.

L. H. S. It was surely the king.

Mr. Treby. But we would rather have it explained by himself.

Smith. Father Anderton and Father Southwell did say that the king was a good man, but he was not for their turn, and he was the only man that stood in the way.

Mr. Treby. Did they name the king?

Mr. Smith. Yes, it was the common discourse all over the country.

Mr. Treby. My lords, I desire Mr. Smith in the next place may give an account of the methods they were to use to accomplish this design, the firing of the city, and the rest.

Mr. Smith. As to the burning of London I, heard nothing beyond seas at all but this; it was discoursed that the papists did it, and the like, but they denied it, and they said it came accidentally in a baker's house: but this I have often heard them say, that it was no great matter if it had been all burnt.

L. H. S. Will you ask him any more questions yet?

Mr. Treby. No, we have done with him.

L. H. S. Have you concluded your evidence, sir?

Mr. Smith. Yes.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, will your lordship ask him any questions?

VOL. VII.

L. Stafford. I desire to know how long ago it was, my lord, since he was made a priest.

Sir F. Win. My lords, with your lordships leave, no man is bound to answer a question whereby he shall accuse himself; therefore under favour the question is somewhat harsh, and we demand your judgment in it.

L. H. S. What is the question your lordship would have asked him?

L. Staff. I will not ask it, since it is an offence; but did not he say he said mass? Pray how long ago was that?

L. H. S. I will ask him a question. Are not you a Protestant?

Mr. Smith. Yes, my lord.

L. H. S. How long have you been so?

Mr. Smith. I have been a Protestant near upon two years.

L. H. S. How long ago before were you perverted?

Mr. Smith. Some six or seven years.

L. H. S. That is nine years. That was, I suppose, about 1671.

Mr. Smith. I was always bred a Protestant, and was so abroad till I went towards Rome.

L. H. S. It is not criminal to have been a priest, if he have conformed.

L. Staff. I have no more to say to him.

L. H. S. Have you any more questions to ask him?

L. Staff. No; I never saw him before; he may be as honest a gentleman for aught I know as any one here.

Mr. Treby. Then, if your lordships have no more questions to ask him, he may withdraw. My lords, the next witness we produce is to the general still, and that is Mr. Stephen Dugdale.*

L. Staff. Is he only to speak to the general or to me?

Mr. Treby. To the general; we shall tell your lordship when we come to the particular.

Sir F. Win. My lords, with your lordships favour, we have opened our case, first, that we would go on with the general; while we are upon that head, we will only call those that speak to the general, but it may happen that one witness may speak to both; but we shall divide his testimony when we come to observe upon it.

Mr. Treby. My lords, I take leave to acquaint your lordships, that Mr. Dugdale hath but a low voice, and your lordships will not bear him without a command of silence: Which was done by proclamation, and Mr. Dugdale sworn.

Mr. Treby. Mr. Dugdale, take notice, we call you now only to the general part of the Plot, what discourses you have heard from priests in general concerning any part of the Plot; and you are not to give your particular evidence against this noble lord, my lord Stafford, till we call you thereunto.

L. H. S. What say you, sir?

* See the Introduction to the Trials for the Popish Plot, ante vol. 6. p. 1420, and Colledge's case A. D. 1681, infra.

Mr. Dugdale. About 15 or 16 years I have been acquainted, that there was a design carrying on for the bringing in the Romish religion. I have at several times, by the means of my ghostly father, that was Mr. Evers, been acquainted that there were several lords and several priests in several places in England that were to carry it on; that is, they were to have money and arms ready for those that wanted, against the death of the king. I have seen several letters which have come from Paris, Rome and St. Omers, all relating to this, to encourage Mr. Evers, and that he should go on to encourage the rest that were engaged. For that purpose I read some of them, and intercepted them, because they were all directed to me. Mr. Evers hath sent me upon messages, sometimes by letters, and sometimes by word of mouth, and all tended for the introducing of their religion, and that all should be ready with money and arms against the king's death: for I did hear nothing till of late about the killing of the king. In particular, there came one letter to Evers from my lord Stafford, to shew that things went on well beyond sea, and hoped they did so here. I saw another time some letters which were also transmitted to my hands by a messenger that came from Boscobel, which did come from Paris, and so to St. Omers, from whence they came to Harcourt, and Harcourt had delivered the letters to have the opinion of some lords; all which contained advice which they had received from Paris, which they counted extraordinary good. The purport of these letters were to shew there was no way could be more likely to do their work, than if any sudden death should happen to the king, then to throw it upon the Presbyterians, who had killed the old king, and were likeliest to be thought to have done this; and so they might easily get the Protestants, those of the church of England, to join with the papists against the Presbyterians, who would by that become odious and so should weaken the party, the more easily to accomplish their design. I have of late several times been in company with priests and other gentlemen in the country, when they have had consultations both for the introducing their own religion, and taking away the king's life, which they did always intend to be about November, December, or January 1678. It was late in the year; but all that year 1678 this was their consultation. I have been sent to the Jesuits, some of them, particularly to Mr. Vavasor and Mr. Gavan, for some monies, for there was a general collection, and there was the sum of 500*l.* at one time, which I received, and gave to Mr. Evers, and here turned it to London, for the carrying on this design, and for discharging an account of arms and things received from beyond sea. And it was agreed that my lord Aston, sir James Symmons, and others, should go in October 1678, to dispose of the arms which they had so received, some here, and some beyond sea, to the value, I heard say, of 30,000*l.* Moreover I did hear that they were to have men raised there, as well as here. So

I have heard from Mr. Evers, and Mr. Gavan and others, and I have been also by when it hath been discoursed that the king of France was acquainted with all these designs, and that he would furnish us with men, and should not be wanting with all other aid and assistance, if there should be any alteration, if the king should die or be taken away or to that purpose. I have been several times put upon to make foot-races, to draw people together, that they might the better have discourses together without suspicion, I was likewise put in trust by the Jesuits all the while the plot was carrying on, and particularly, for two years, all the letters relating to the plot came to my hand, some of which I opened, and some I kept in my own hands; and particularly I had one that came to my hands, which was about the death of sir E. Godfrey; for when I carried it to Mr. Evers, he said, there was one of our enemies taken out of the way: and it was contained in the letter This night sir E. Godfrey is dispatched; which by the date of it was the 18th of October 1678. I told him that that would prove a discouragement to us, and would be the ruin of all the design: he said, not so, it would rather prove otherwise; for he was one that was active in punishing lewd and debauched persons, and it would rather be put upon them than us, as done out of revenge.

Mr. Treby. Pray, sir, speak the particular time when that letter came into Staffordshire.

Mr. Dugdale. The 14th of October 1678, which was Munday.

Mr. Treby. The date of it pray tell us.

Mr. Dugdale. The 12th of October 1678.

Mr. Treby. The very night that it was done.

Mr. Dugd. Likewise when I did hear there was like to be an alteration in the government and having such fair promises, I was encouraged to it, and was very willing to contribute to the design; and I did then make over an estate which I had of four hundred pound value for that purpose and for the praying for my soul. And when my lord Aston and I should come to account, as there was money over and above due to me, I did likewise promise, because I saw money would be wanting I would give them a hundred pound more. There were several other gentlemen, as Mr. Hevingham, sir James Symons, my lord Aston, Mr. Draycott, Mr. Howard, and Mr. Gerard, who did to my knowledge contribute towards the carrying on of this charge, for defraying of money and raising arms, and paying for them. And I have seen letters from beyond sea, that have been to Mr. Evers, that all things have been ready as to the arms, and there only wanted orders how they should be disposed of; and I have been several times brought to the oath of secrecy for fear I should disclose it; and particularly that time that I went away from my lord Aston's, which was on a Monday morning, Mr. Evers gave it me, about the 18th or 19th of November 1678. And I did then promise by all the promises I could make, and upon the sacrament, in his chamber, that I would not disclose it; but having others to advise me in it, such as could better do it, that told me such oaths were better broken than kept: and thereupon I came to discover the thing, which I have done to the best of my knowledge. I am very loth to charge my memory in particular, about times, or how many were in company, but those that I am sure of; but there hath been in company at the consultation several times, Mr. Hevingham, Sir James Symons, Mr. Vavasor, Mr. Petre, Mr. Howard and my lord Aston himself; when there hath been a speech about the design for the introducing of religion, and for taking order about money to buy arms, and particularly when my lord Stafford was by about the death of the king, and that was about September 1678.

Mr. Treby. Mr. Dugdale, you speak of levying arms, and of the oath of secrecy that was given you: where there not other spiritual weapons used? Was there not an indulgence or such a thing?

Mr. Dugd. There was an indulgence about 1678, or thereabout, which came through Ireland's hands, transmitted from beyond sea, and so to Mr. Evers, and Mr. Gavan was put on to publish it, which he did one time at Boscobel. And it was likewise at all private chapels, that whoever was active for the introducing the Romish religion, or killing the king, should have a free pardon of all his sins.

Mr. Foley. Pray declare what arguments have been used by your priests to induce you to this design?

L. H. S. Raise your voice, that we may hear what you ask.

Mr. Foley. We would know what arguments have been used to persuade to this design?

Mr. Dugd. They have told me in their meetings, the king was an excommunicated heretic, and he was out of the pale of the church, therefore it was lawful to kill him, and it was no more than the killing of a dog.

Sir John Trevor. My lords, I desire to ask him one question farther, what he hath heard about a massacre that was intended?

L. H. S. Have you heard of any massacre that was to be?

Mr. Dugd. I have heard that about the time the king should be killed, several should be provided with arms, and such instruments, and rise all of a sudden at an hour's warning and so come in upon the protestants, and cut their throats; that was one proposal: and if any did escape, there should be an army to cut them off in their flight.

Mr. Treby. My lords, I desire to ask him one question farther, whether he ever knew or heard of Mr. Oates and Bedlow till the plot was detected?

Mr. Dugd. I have heard of them from priests, as messengers entrusted by them, but no otherwise.

L. H. S. When did you hear that?

Mr. Dugd. I have formerly declared it.

Mr. Treby. Ay when?

L. H. S. Before the discovery, or after?

Mr. Dugd. Before the discovery.

Mr. Treby. My lord, the reason of the question, and the use we make of it is this; we charge the papists with the conspiracy of a plot, and they charge our witnesses with a conspiracy to accuse: now it appears, that Mr. Dugdale had not any knowledge of the other witnesses and only had heard of them as persons concerned; so it could not possibly be a joint contrivance among them.

Sir John Trevor. My lords, I desire to ask this question, whether Mr. Dugdale hath seen any letters from Whitebread to Evers, and what instructions were in those letters to Evers about the persons to be concerned, and what kind of creatures he was to employ in this great design of theirs?

Mr. Dugd. I saw a letter from Whitebread, to give Mr. Evers a caution who he did employ or trust in the design; for he told him there had been good care taken therein hitherto; and it were no matter whether they were gentlemen of quality or not, so they were stout and trusty, or to that purpose.

L. H. S. What should they be trusty for?

Mr. Dugd. For the killing the king.

L. H. S. Was that said plainly in the letter?

Mr. Dugd. To the best of my remembrance, in those very words.

L. H. S. Was there no cypher or character?

Mr. Dugd. There was no cypher or character that I know of, nothing but two letters for his name.

Mr. Treby. My lords, I desire Mr. Dugdale may give an account of those papers he speaks of; what became of them, and tell us the reason why they were not produced?

Mr. Dugd. My lords, when I was by the instruction of Mr. Evers to take my flight, I conveyed all my papers, that either belonged to him or myself, for the carrying on of the plot, and carried them to an house not far remote from my lord Aston's, and by the help of two maids—

Mr. Treby. Name them.

Mr. Dugd. Elizabeth Eld, and Anne Eld. And they two did prepare a fire in the chamber for that purpose, and they assisted me to burn them: I was in a great consternation and great fear, in regard I must fly and abscond myself, and indeed I did it with tears in my eyes. And whilst we were burning of the papers, one of them spied a little paper-book, by chance, and she asked me, whether that should be burnt; I told her, No; burn not that, for there is no treason in it. With that one of them asked me. Is there any treason in the rest? And I put them off, to the best of my knowledge, and would not give them a direct answer.

Sir John Trevor. Why did you consent to burn them?

Mr. Dugd. Because I knew they would discover me, and others that were concerned in the plot.

Sir F. Winning. Your lordship will be pleased to observe, the burning of the letters was before he discovered the plot, or any thing.

Mr. Sacheverell. My lords, We desire he may be asked one question; he told your lordship of the letter that came into Staffordshire about the death of sir E. Godfrey, but he hath not told you the reason why he was to be taken away. We desire he will let your lordships know what reasons they gave for it.

Mr. Dugd. My lords, I was desirous to know how things went, being concerned as well as Mr. Evers; and I asked what the reason was they took away his life? Mr. Evers told me, that there was a message sent to Coleman, to desire him that he would not reveal what he knew concerning the plot or any thing of that nature.

Mr. Sacheverell. From whom was that message sent?

Mr. Dugd. From the duke of York. And Coleman did send word back again, What was it the nearer? for he had been so foolish as to reveal all to sir E. Godfrey, who had promised to keep it all as a secret. But upon the examination, of Oates, before sir E. Godfrey, as a justice of peace, he was afraid he would come in an evidence against him; and had shewn himself a little too eager, which made Coleman afraid he would witness against him. And the duke of York did send word back again, that if he would take care not to reveal but conceal it, he should not come in against him, or to that purpose: and the next news we heard was the letter that he was dispatched.

Mr. Foley. I desire he may give an account what assistance the pope gave for the carrying on of this design?

Mr. Dugd. I heard the pope had out of his revenue promised several sums of money for the carrying on this plot; and particularly that he would assist the poor distressed Irish with both men and money; and there should not be any thing wanting on his part.

L. H. S. Have you done with him, gentlemen?

Mr. Treby. Yes, I think we have with him, as the general.

L. Staff. I desire to ask him, then, what sums of money did the pope contribute to it?

L. H. S. What sums of money did the pope contribute to this design?

Mr. Dugd. I have heard of several sums in general that he was to contribute for the carrying on of the plot.

L. H. S. Did you hear of any sum certain?

Mr. Dugd. I do not know, but I think I heard sometimes of 10,000*l.*, or some such sum. I have been told by a servant that formerly belonged to my lord Stafford, That the pope's daily income was 24,000*l.* a day; and that if he would do as he had promised, he was able to do very much.

L. H. S. They told you so, you do not know it otherwise.

Mr. Treby. We have done then with him: We call Mr. Praunce next. [Who was sworn.]

Mr. Treby. My lords, I desire Mr. Praunce would give us an account of what discourse he had with one Mr. Singleton a priest, and when.

Mr. *Praunce. I went to one Mr. Singleton a priest, at one Hall's in the year 1678; and he told me, That he did not fear but in a little time to be a priest in a parish church; and that he would make no more to stab forty parliament men, than to eat his dinner, which he was at, at that very time.

L. H. S. Where was that?

Mr. Praunce. At one Hall's, a cook in Ivy-lane.

L. H. S. Will you ask him any questions, my lord?

L. Staff. No, my lord.

Mr. Treby. Then call Dr. Oates. [Who was sworn.]

L. H. S. Do you examine Mr. Oates upon the general plot, or the particular?

Mr. Treby. Only to the general now; and we desire him to take notice he is so to speak, and to confine himself to that at present.

Dr. Oates. My lords, in the year 1676, I was admitted into the service of the duke of Norfolk, as chaplain in his house, and there I came acquainted with one Bing, that was a priest in the house. And being acquainted with him, there came one Kemish very often to visit him, and one Singleton, who told me, that I should find that the protestant religion was upon its last legs, and that it would become me, and all men of my coat (for then I professed myself a minister of the church of England,) to hasten betimes home to the church of Rome. My lords, having had strong suspicions for some years before, of the great and apparent growth of popery; to satisfy my curiosity, I pretended some doubts in my mind. My lords, after some time had passed over, and I had had some conversation with these men, I found they were not men for my turn, because being regular men, they were not men that had any great degree of learning. Afterwards, my lords, I met with one Hutchinson; I found him a saint-like man, or one that was religious for religion sake; and him I found not for my turn neither: For, my lords, my design was to deal with their casuists; that is, those of the society. After that I had obtained the favour from him, to have some conference with one of the society, I found they were the men for my turn, because I found they were the cunning politic men, and the men that could satisfy me. After that I had some discourse with them, I pretended to be convinced by their arguments. And, my lords, after that I had thus acknowledged my conviction, I desired to be reconciled; and accordingly on Ash-Wednesday, 1676-7, I was reconciled. And soon after my reconciliation, Strange, who was then provincial of the society, did tell me much after this way: Mr. Oates,

* See the Sentence upon him for Perjury A. D. 1686, infra.

you are now reconciled to the church of Rome, and you must lay down your ministry, for your ordination is invalid, and you must look upon yourself as no more than a layman: Pray, says he, now, what course do you think to take? I told him, I did desire to be one of their society, and to be admitted a novice into their order. He said, it was a very honest request, and a very honest desire; and he said, he would take some time to consider of it, and he would take till the Saturday following. Saturday following I was sent for by one Feawick: I lodged then in Barbican, and Feawick came to me, and told me, the Fathers were met at Wild-house, and would speak with me; And he also told me they had granted my request, and I should be admitted. After I was admitted, they told me, I had some years upon me, and I could not undergo those burdens they put upon younger men; but what did I think of travelling, and going beyond sea to do their business? I did agree to it, and in April 1677, I went aboard one Luke Roch, master of the Bilbao-merchant, bound for Bilbao, having their letters of recommendation. After I arrived there, which was on a Sunday in May or June, I cannot tell which, I went the Friday following for Valladolid in Castile, and I got thither the Tuesday following; but by the way I opened certain letters, wherein was made mention of a disturbance designed in Scotland. And the letters did express what hopes they had to effect their design in England, for the carrying on (as they worded it) the catholic cause, and for the advancement of the interest of the bishop of Rome. My lords, after I had arrived at Valladolid, there were letters there got before me, which were dated, in May, wherein was expressed news, that the king was dispatched, which was the cause of great joy to the Fathers there; and afterwards letters dated in May too (but towards the latter end of May) came, that they were mistaken, and desired the Fathers there to stifle that news. My lords, there came letters dated in June, wherein they did give an account, That they had procured one Beddingfield to be confessor to the duke of York; which Beddingfield by his interest might prevail much with the Duke in order to this design. Letters came also in June from St. Omers, which gave them an account, that Father Beddingfield had assured them of the Duke's willingness to comply with them for the advancement of the catholic religion. My lords, after I had staid some time there, and had passed through the country for the business of the society, I found that in the court of Spain some ministers of that court had been very ready to advance money, which money was returned for England; and that the Father provincial of the Jesuits of Castile, by his care and industry, had advanced 10,000*l.*, which was promised to be paid in June following, within a twelvemonth after. My lords, in July I received letters out of England, wherein an account was given there, to the Fathers in Spain, that they were sending them a mission of twelve students, four whereof were to go to Madrid, and eight to Valladolid: The conductors of these twelve students were one Father Crosse, that was his true name, and one Father Mumford, whose true name was Armstrong. These missionaries arrived in December, where they had a sermon preached at their coming by this same Armstrong, wherein the oaths of allegiance and supremacy were declared to be antichristian, heretical, and devilish; in which the king's legitimacy was vilified and abused; and that his religion did entitle him to nothing but sudden death and destruction, in that he appeared an enemy both to God and man. These were the contents of that sermon, as near as I remember. My lords, after the meeting with several letters there, in July, August, and September, in the kingdom of Spain, it was ordered I should return for England, and in the month of November I came for England, at which time I had letters from the provincial of Castile, called by the name of Padre de Hieronimo de Cordoba, who did in his letter assure the provincial in England and the Fathers here, that the 10,000*l.* should be paid, as I said before, in June following. When I came for England, at London I was lodged at one Grigson's, that lived in Drury lane, near the sign of the Red Lion, and there I lay until I went to St. Omers; and by the provincial and consultors of the province I was ordered a maintenance, and it was paid to this man for entertaining of me. I went and brought these letters to this Strange, and there was Father Keins laying ill upon Strange's bed; and Keins was saying, he was mighty sorry for honest William (so they called the ruffian that was to kill the king), that he had missed in his enterprize. But, my lords, this I think good to tell your lordships, they were not so zealous for the destruction of the king, till the king had refused Coleman the dissolving of the long parliament. Then they were more intent upon it, though they had several times attempted it ever since the fire of London; but when Coleman was refused the dissolution of the long parliament, then were they more zealous for the destruction of the king: But the design for the introducing the popish religion, they have been carrying on some years before the fire, by those instruments, some of whom are yet alive. My lords, I left England in November O. S. and December N. S. for when I came to St. Omers, it was as near as I can remember, the 9th or 10th of December, according to the stile of the place. I carried with me a packet of letters from Strange the provincial, and other Fathers that were of the consult for the province of England, to the Fathers at St. Omers, wherein Strange did tell them, that they had great hopes of their design taking effect the next year, but as yet it would not be effected: He said, therefore, they at London thought fit to suspend it till they saw what the parliament would do. And he did in the same letter declare, That the parliament would be about a long bill that had been brought into the Commons house some sessions before, but he did not question but that the catholic party would evade that bill. And, my lords, in that year, some time after, we had a letter from our new provincial, whose true name was Whitebread, and his counterfeited name White. This Father writes to the Fathers at St. Omers, and therein he does order one Conyers to preach upon St. Thomas of Canterbury's day; and he did therein also tell them, that he would be as zealous for the carrying on of the design as his predecessor had been: And a sermon was accordingly preached at the Sodality church, wherein after he had commended the saint, whose day they celebrated, for his great virtues, declaring how unworthily he was sacrificed, he did inveigh against the tyranny, as he called it, of temporal princes, and particularly of the king of England; and when he came to speak of the oath of allegiance and supremacy, he declared, that he looked upon them as antichristian and devilish, and that it was fit to destroy all such as would countenance them. We have done with the year 1677, and we come now to January, 1678.

L. H. S. You speak of one Keins, who (laying upon Strange's bed) said he was sorry honest Will had missed his enterprize: You have not explained who that honest Will was; explain that.

Oates. It was Grove.

L. H. S. But about what did he say he was sorry for him?

Oates. That he had missed his design.

Mr. Foley. What was that missing of his design?

Oates. That he had not killed the king, my lords, in Jan. 1678.

L. H. S. You mean according to the foreign stile?

Oates. Yes, according to the foreign stile, my lords; we received letters out of Ireland, and there, my lords, we found by the contents of those letters, that they were as busy in Ireland as we were in England. We found there that the Talbots, and other persons, were very zealous in raising of forces, and were resolved to let in the French king, provided that the parliament should urge the king to break with France. My lords, likewise in January, as near as I can remember, Morgan was sent into Ireland as a visitor, which is something a better place than a provincial, but only it is, but temporary for the time he visits, and he returns in February or March, and gives us an account how ready the Irish were to vindicate their freedom and their religion from the oppression of the English, as they called it. My lords, in February some were employed to go into some parts of Germany, to Liege, and to some parts of Flanders, to see how the affairs there stood, and how their correspondences stood, to see whether there was not an interruption in the correspondences. My lords, upon their return they found that the fathers at Ghent were inclined to take into this business the secular clergy; but the fathers of St. Omers, together with the provincial, did refuse the motion, because the secular clergy were more cowardly, and sought themselves, and not the interest of the church, or to that purpose. My lords, in March we received letters, that there was a very shrewd attempt made upon the person of the king, and that the flint of Pickering's gun or pistol was loose, and his hand shaking, the king did then escape, for which he received a discipline, and the other a severe chiding.

L. H. S. You explain not the meaning of what you say; that was not honest Will, for he, you say, was Grove.

Oates. I mean Pickering received the discipline, and William was chid; for it was Pickering's flint that was loose. My lords, this was in March, and at the latter end of March there comes a letter from London, in which there was a summons to a consult here in London; and being summoned, there went over eight or nine from St. Omers, Liege, and Ghent, to this consult, and I did attend them in their journey.

L. H. S. When did that summons come?

Oates. The latter end of March, or the beginning of April, as I remember; they had notice of it in England before, but we had notice of it just when we were to come. I think it was in April, as near as I can remember; I cannot be certain in that, my lord. We did come to town in April, there the consult was held; it begun at the White-Horse tavern, where they did consult about some things of the Society, and afterwards they did adjourn into particular Societies, where they did debate and resolve on the death of the king, and that Grove should have 1,500*l.* for his pains, and the other being a religious man, should have 30,000 masses said for him. My lords, after staying in town a while we returned to Saint Omers; and after I had staid there some few days, the new provincial did begin to visit his province, and comes over to St. Omers, where after staying some six days, he goes over from thence to Wotton. But whilst he staid at St. Omers, I was ordered to go into England to attend the affairs here, and for to do some other services that they should employ me about. My lords, accordingly I did come over, and it was on the 23rd N. S. as near as I remember, I got to Calais; the 24th I got to Dover; on the 25th I got to Sittenburn, but between Dover and Sittenburn we had some boxes seized; For at Dover we met with Fenwick, who is since executed, who went by the name of Thompson, and carried a box with him; and a little on this side Canterbury it was seized by the custom-house officers, and several little trinkets in it, which were seized as French goods; and he did desire the searcher to stand his friend, and he would give him something for his pains, and told him where he should write to him in London. There was a subscription on the box to one Blundel, but he should write to him by the name of Thompson, at the Fountain tavern near Charing-cross. We arrived in town the 17th of June which is the 27th New Style; it was upon a Monday; and there were letters which did follow us, wherein were proposals made to sir George Wakeman for the poisoning of the king, and that the 10,000*l.* which the Spaniards had promised in January before, and was accordingly paid in London at the time, should be proposed to Wakeman to poison the king. I found that Coleman did look upon it as too little, and he thought 15,000*l.* should be given to him: I found that Langham thought it too much, and that he ought to do so great a piece of service for nothing, and told us he was a narrow spirited man, if he would not engage in such a thing. My lords, there was 5,000*l.* as the books told me, paid; but I did not then see it paid, because I was then ill, and not fit to stir abroad. My lords, we are now past June 1678. In July Father Ashby comes to town, who did revive the proposal to sir G. Wakeman; but being sick of the gout, he hastened down to the Bath; and when he came there, as soon as he began to be well, he was advised by the Fathers to see how the catholics stood affected in Somersetshire; for they had an account in March 1678, by letters from Berkshire, Oxfordshire, and Essex, that the catholics stood well affected; and sir William Andrews did secure that the people of Essex should stand to their points; and so several men did secure that they would have them in readiness. My lords, in August (I cannot remember every particular, but refer myself to the records of the House), about the 26th of August, I find that Fenwick went to St. Omers, and there he was to attend the provincial home, and to give the provincial an account of the proposal accepted by sir G. Wakeman; but in July (if your lordships please to give me leave to go back again) Strange comes to town, and falling into discourse about the fire of London, and the rebuilding of it, he very frankly told me how it was fired, and how many of those concerned were seized; and amongst the rest, told me, that the duke of York's guard, as by his order, did receive them, and were afterwards willing to discharge them; which I forgot to mention before; but upon review of my papers, I do find that it was told me his guard did release the prisoners that were suspected about the fire, and that all the order they had for it, they pretended was from the duke. But now, my lords, we return to August again. Upon the 3d of August, I find Ireland did pretend to go to St. Omers, and a letter came from him as directed from thence; but we find by his trial and other things since, that he went into Staffordshire; and about the 12th of August (as I remember) he was here in town. The latter part of July I communicated with Dr. Tongue, and gave him some particular account of affairs; I desired him to communicate it to some that might make it known to the king: The king had notice the 13th of August, or the 14th, as I remember; and by the 3d of September I was betrayed, and was exposed to the vengeance of those men whose contrivances

I had thus discovered. So my intelligence did cease wholly the 8th of September. Then was I forced to keep private; and upon my examination, what information I gave before the Lords and Commons, I refer myself to them.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, will you ask him any questions?

L. Staff. No, my lord; I am not at all concerned in his evidence.

L. H. S. You say you were betrayed: Can you tell how, or which way you were betrayed?

Oates. My lord, I will give this honourable house what light I can in it; but I desire then to be excused from my oath, for I cannot speak it of my own knowledge.

Sir J. Trevor. Then the next witness we desire may be called, is Mr. Bernard Dennis.

Mr. Serj. Maynard. This witness we call now, is to confirm what Dr. Oates hath said, that he was at Valladolid and other places in Spain; he will be short.

L. H. S. Call you Oates again?

Sir F. Win. No, my lord, we call Dennis to confirm what Dr. Oates hath said. He hath given your lordship an account that he was in Spain; we now produce one that saw him when he was there, and so confirms the evidence that was given by him.

Then Mr. Dennis was sworn.

Mr. Tracy. Mr. Dennis, Do you give their lordships an account of your discoursing with Dr. Oates in Spain, or any where else abroad, and where.

L. H. S. Stay a little; do you know Mr. Oates?

Dennis. Yes, my lord.

L. H. S. How long have you known him?

Dennis. I knew him in the year 1677.

L. H. S. Where?

Dennis. At Valladolid,

L. H. S. Did you see him there? Was he a student there?

Dennis. Yes, my lord.

L. H. S. Was he known by the name of Oates?

Dennis. Yes, my lord, he was.

Sir Fr. Win. My lord, we desire he may tell his knowledge of Mr. Oates, what conversation he had with him in Spain.

Dennis. My lords, I was in Spain, in the city of Victoria; and leaving the city of Victoria in the month of June, I took my course to Madrid, and passing through the city of Valladolid, going into the convent of Dominicans, there came an Irishman, a priest of Ireland, out of the city to see me; and there he told me there was a student of the Jesuits, by name Mr. Oates, an Englishman; and I understanding this, went into the college of the Jesuits to see Mr. Oates, and there had conversation with Mr. Oates; and in the conversation I had with him there, he told me that he was a vicar in Kent, and that he was chaplain to a great nobleman of England, by name Howard; and that he went out of England by the consent of the Jesuits in England, being converted by them to the Roman catholic faith, and that his going into Spain was to fit himself for the Society of the Jesuits. And understanding my resolution was to go to Madrid, he did desire me to carry a letter to the archbishop of Tuna, one James Lench an Irishman, who lived at Madrid. And further; he lent me four pieces of eight to defray my journey to Madrid, and desired me to pay the money to the procurator of the Jesuits at Madrid. And in carrying this letter to the archbishop, when I came there, I got a Dominican friar of Ireland, by name Humphrey Delphin, to go with me and see the archbishop at his lodging; and going in, I delivered him the letter in the presence of the Dominican, and he perused it in my presence, and in the presence of a priest that waited upon him; and finishing the contents of the letter, as I suppose, with a smiling countenance he turned about, and said, Sirs, the contents of this letter is, that Mr. Oates is desirous to receive the order of priesthood from me, or at my hands; and if it be so, it will be much in our way, and this man will be a fit man for our purpose: for, said he further, Dr. Oliver Plunket, * primate of Ireland, is resolved this year, or with the next convenience, to bring in a French power into Ireland, thereby to support the Roman Catholics in England and Ireland; and if it please God, I myself, without any delay, will go into Ireland to assist in that pious work. All this discourse between us and the archbishop, and between Oates and me, was in July 1677. And there I did speak and converse with Mr. Oates. All this I can testify for truth on the behalf of Mr. Oates, who was then a student in the college of Valladolid, and had no other name nor title.

Mr. Foley. I desire himself may tell your lordship what religion he is of.

L. H. S. What religion are you of?

Dennis. I am a Dominican friar, my lord.

L. H. S. Are you?

Dennis. My lords, I am.

L. H. S. At this time?

Dennis. Yes, my lords.

Serj. Maynard. He hath a pardon, my lords.

Mr. Treby. This hath been controverted, my lords, whether Mr. Oates ever was in Spain; we desire to make it out plain to the world, for the confirmation of his evidence; therefore we ask him again, Do you know the person of Mr. Oates?—Dennis. Yes, I do.

Mr. Treby. Is this person that gave evidence last before you, the same person you saw at Valladolid?

Dennis. Yes, it is.

Mr. Sacheverell. My lords, we desire to ask of him, why he had the four pieces of eight of Mr. Oates?

L. H. S. Why had you that money of Oates?

Dennis. For to defray my journey to Madrid.

L. H. S. Was that all you had?

Dennis. Yes, my lords.

Mr. Sachev. We pray he may be asked how he came to be so needy?

Dennis. My lords, I was not altogether needy; but it is very certain, religious persons, especially of my order, cannot carry any money about them but what is requisite for their journey, and that which may be removed from place to place.

Sir J. Trevor. I desire to ask him, did he see any more money that Dr. Oates had?

Dennis. I did see Dr. Oates in his chamber in the college at Valladolid, when he delivered me the four pieces of eight, to draw out a drawer of a table in his chamber, and out of the drawer he pulled a bag of money, which was a very considerable sum of money, and I am certain he did not want money there then.

Mr. Treby. My lords, I think we have done with him; if my lord please to ask him any question.

L. Staff. But only one question, for I never saw the man in my life. I desire he may be asked, whether he be still of the Romish religion.

Sir J. Trevor. My lords, We have not yet done with him; the question we would ask him is this, Whether he hath heard of any money that was gathered in Ireland for the support of this Plot?

L. H. S. The question asked of you, Have you heard of any money gathered in Ireland for the support of this Plot?

Dennis. I have both heard and seen of it.

L. H. S. When, and where?

Dennis. My lords, In the year 1668, I entered into the order of the Dominicans in Ireland; and in the same year there arrived at Dublin a Franciscan Friar, brother to the late earl of Carlingford; and arriving there, he made several collectors for the levying a competent sum of money out of every convent and religious house. My lords, the collectors were by name John Reynolds, alias Landy, and John Berne; and arriving at the county of Sligoe, in the month of May—

L. H. S. What year?

Dennis. 1668. And when the collectors came to the convent of our Friars in Sligoe, all the Friars gathered together into a room, and these collectors coming in did read their commission given them from one James Taaffe, as they said; and I was there personally present, though a novice; and upon reading their commissions, they said 40s. was to be paid by the Prior, and the Friars of that convent; and the provincial of the order of the Dominicans questioned the power of the said Reynolds and Berne, and so did the prior; and I asked why the money was levied? They gave answer, That that levy and several other levies was to encourage the French king, in whose kingdom were several bishops of Ireland, clergymen, and others, whose business it was to provoke the king to bring an army to invade Ireland, whenever time should serve.

L. H. S. Have you done with him now?

Mr. Treby. Yes.

L. H. S. Will your lordship ask him any questions?

L. Staff. My question is only, Whether he

* See his Case, A. D. 1681, infra.

profess himself of the Church of Rome, or a protestant?

Dennis. I am a Roman Catholic still, my lord.

L. H. S. Are you?

Dennis. I am, my lord.

L. Staff. Then I have no more to say.

Sir J. Trevor. Then we call Mr. Jenison.

[Who was sworn.]

Mr. Treby. Mr. Jenison, who have been among the papists, and you have had great confidence among them; pray declare what you know of their designs for the destruction of the protestant religion, or the means of doing it, whether by the murder of the king, or what other means, tell your whole knowledge.

Mr. Jenison. My lords in the beginning of the year 1678, I have heard Mr. Ireland and Mr. Thomas Jenison, both Jesuits, speak of a design they had to gain a toleration of conscience for their party in England; and the way then designed to get it was, by procuring a great sum of money from their party, and by bribing the then parliament. I have heard them likewise discourse of procuring the duke of York's succession; and that (they told me) was to be done, by procuring of commissions to be granted out to those of their party, to be ready to rise upon the death of the king. I likewise have heard their discourse of the necessity and usefulness to their party of the alteration of the government established, and that their religion could never flourish till that was done, and this kingdom altered according to the French model. In the month of June 1678, I was at Mr. Ireland's chamber; and there happening a discourse, that the Roman Catholic religion was like to come into England, Mr. Ireland did then say, there was but one who stood in the way, and that it was an easy thing to poison the king, and that sir George Wakeman might easily and opportunely do it. I asked Mr. Ireland, whether sir George Wakeman was the king's physician? His answer was, No, but he was the queen's, and so might have an opportunity to do it. In the month of August the same year, the day that I came from Windsor, I went to Mr. Ireland's chamber, and I found that he was newly come from Staffordshire, and was drawing off his boots on the frame of a table: he asked me whence I was come? I told him from Windsor: He enquired of me about the diversions of the court. I told him, I understood his majesty did take delight in hawking and fishing, but chiefly in fishing; and that he went accompanied only with two or three, early in the morning. Then Mr. Ireland replied, He were easily taken off or removed. To which I answered, God forbid; being surprized at that time: Oh, said he, I say not that it is lawful. Then there happened some interruption to our discourse, about Staffordshire; then we fell into a discourse of their religion that he said was suddenly to come into England: and he asked me if I would be one of those that would go to Windsor to assist to take off the king. I told him, No; then he told me he would remit the 20*l.* I owed him, if I would go to Windsor to be one of those that were to take off the king. My lords, I told him I would have no hand in any such matter, and that I would not for twenty times 20*l.* have any hand in the death of the king. Said he, Would you do nothing for the bringing in of our religion? I told him, I thought it would never come in by blood: I told him further, God forgive me, if the king were taken off so, well and good, but I would have nothing to do with it. He left not the discourse there, but asked me, if I knew any Irishmen that were stout and courageous. I told him, Yes, I did, and named captain Levallian, Mr. Karney, Mr. Broghall, and Mr. Wilson, all gentlemen of my acquaintance about Gray's Inn. When I named these, he asked me if I would go along with him to Windsor, to assist them in taking off the king. I told him, I did not think any man of estate would engage in such a matter; that I was heir to an estate, my brother being a priest, and that captain Levallian was heir to a very good estate, and therefore I did believe he would not do such a thing, unless the pique which he had to the king or religion might move him to it. My lords, he approved of these persons, and said, he knew the first two of them, Levallian and Karney; and he set down, as I remember, the other two names in writing. He told me he was going to the club, to Mr. Coleman, and Mr. Levallian, and Karney at that time, and then asked me for the money, the 20*l.* that I owed him. He told me, he wanted fourscore pounds, and he desired me that I would return it as soon as I came into the country. Now, my lords, the same day that I received this 20*l.* of Ireland, I went with Mr. Thomas Jenison, the jesuit, to Harcourt's chamber, to give the Fathers thanks for the loan of the money; and there Mr. Jenison falling into discourse on that common topic of their religion coming into England, he did then use that expression which Dr. Oates hath in his Narrative, 'If C. R. would not be R. C. he should not be long C. R.' And he did interpret it thus in Latin: 'Si Carolus Rex non esset Rex Catholicus, non foret diu Carolus Rex.*' And he did add, my lords, upon the discourse, that if the king were excommunicated or deposed, he was not longer king, and it was no sin, or no great sin to take him off; and if it were discovered who did it, two or three might perhaps suffer, but denying the fact, the matter soon would be blown over. My lords, about two months after the mustering the forces upon Howslow-Heath, Mr. Thomas Jenison did tell me he had a matter of great consequence to impart to me; that there was a design on foot so laid, as that it could not well be discovered, and that the greatest papists, the greatest Catholics in England, were in the design; that the queen and the duke were in it, and that several lords, by name my lord Bellasis, my lord Powis, my lord Arundel of Wardour, and others: I believe my lord Stafford was named, but I cannot be positive in that. At that time, my lords, I did wish I had had a commission in the new raised levies that were mustered on Hounslow-Heath. He told me he would procure me a commission from the duke of York, and that there was a new army to be raised to bring in the Catholic religion; but he did say he would tell me more particulars after my receiving the sacrament of secrecy; and I did understand by him, that that commission was not to be sent till the taking off the king was effected: But being I was surprised at it, he would not tell me the whole matter, but he desired me to come and receive the sacrament at sir Philip Tyrwhitt's in Bloomsbury, and then he would acquaint me with the whole affair. My lords, being in Berkshire about the month of December 1678, at Madam Hall's in Shintfield parish, one Mr. Cuffil a jesuit came into our company. It was about the trial of Coleman; and Mr. Cuffil did then say, that he thought Mr. Coleman was infatuated, upon the discovery of the plot, to give notice to Mr. Harcourt, Mr. Ireland, and Mr. Fenwick, and the other jesuits, to burn or secure their papers, and yet not to secure his own. My sister Hall was present at this discourse; and Mr. Cuffil did then further say, that Bellarmine did draw a sentence out of the scripture, to favour the Pope's authority of excommunicating, depriving, and deposing temporal princes; and the saying was this, 'Quod Papa habet eandem potestatem super Reges, quam Jehoiada habuit super Athaliam.' And that there were other corroborating testimonies among the fathers for it.

* See ante, vol. 6, p. 1456.

Mr. Ticey. My lords, we desire to ask him, whether ever he heard of Mr. Oates being in the Plot, or being thought trust-worthy among them.

Mr. Jen. Yes, my lords, I did.

L. H. S. When did you hear it, and of whom?

Mr. Jen. Of my brother Tho. Jenison the Jesuit.

L. H. S. When did he tell you so?

Mr. Jen. About the latter end of July, 1678, when there was a discourse of a design, and that the greatest Papists were in it, he said, Mr. Oates a parson newly come over to them, was in that design: I answered, I did wonder that he would trust a reconciled enemy. He answered, That being once reconciled, they were more zealous and trusty. I submitted to his opinion, and instanced in Dr. Godwyn and Dr. Bayley, that were Protestants, and afterwards came over to the Church of Rome.

Mr. Treby. We have done with him, my lord.

L. H. S. Will your lordship ask him any questions, my lord Stafford?

L. Staff. No, my lord.

Sir F. Win. My lords, I would only observe the time when he says his brother told him of the design, that it was about the time of the mustering the forces on Hounslow-heath; and that he was then told Mr. Oates was in the Plot: I only observe it now, for the end of the case in point of time.

L. H. S. He said it was in July.

Mr. Jen. It was two months after the mustering of the forces, about the latter end of July.

L. H. S. Before the discovery?

Mr. Jen. Yes.

L. H. S. Did you know Oates at that time?

Mr. Jen. No, my lords, I was not acquainted with him.

Sir J. Trevor. Did you not see him then?

Mr. Jen. Yes, I saw him at Ireland's chamber.

Sir J. Trevor. When was that?

Mr. Jen. The latter end of April, or the beginning of May.

L. H. S. You say you did not know him in July; how then can you say you saw him before?

Mr. Jen. I did not know him; I only saw him come into Ireland's chamber, and whisper for some time, two or three minutes, and then they told me that that was Mr. Oates, a parson newly come over to them, a brisk jolly man, and worthy my acquaintance.

L. H. S. Is this the same man you saw there?

Mr. Jen. My lords, I cannot remember his face, for he was gone out when I was told of him.

L. H. S. Why, you know Mr. Oates now?

Mr. Jen. Yes, I do.

L. H. S. Do you know him to be the same man that you saw then?

Mr. Jen. I can't tell that.

Sir J. Trevor. My lords, he says, Mr. Oates only came in for three or four minutes, and his back was towards him, and his brother told him when he was gone who it was.

Mr. Jen. I only knew his name from my brother.

Mr. Treby. And I presume your lordships will observe this was at the very time of the Jesuits consult.

Sir J. Trevor. We desire this gentleman may tell your lordships who his brother is, and what profession he is of.

Mr. Jen. My brother was a Jesuit brought up at St. Omers.

L. H. S. Your brother is dead, and died in Newgate?

Mr. Jen. Yes, he did so.

L. H. S. Pray recollect yourself again: when was it that you saw the man they called Oates at the Jesuit's chamber?

Mr. Jen. My lords, it was in the year 1678, the latter end of April, or the beginning of May. And I will tell you why I apprehend it to be that time. My brother being a priest, lived with sir Philip Tyrwhitt in Lincolnshire; and in that year, in Lent, he came to town with my lady and that family, and he and I used to dine together at the fish-ordinary at Pedley's. And about three weeks or a month after that time, when he came to town, I was at Mr. Ireland's chamber, and there was a gentleman, whom they told me was Oates.

L. H. S. This you say was the latter end of April, or beginning of May, 1678; for the time is material: Upon your oath you say it?

Mr. Jen. Yes, my lords, I do.

L. H. S. You say it was at Ireland's chamber?

Mr. Jen. Yes, my lords.

Sir F. Wis. My lords, will you give us leave to ask him one short question; because some of the gentlemen doubt of it, we would ask it again: What his brother was, whether he was a Jesuit or no?

Mr. Jen. I have heard him own it, my lords.

L. H. S. Whom do you call next, gentlemen?

Mr. Treby. If it please your lordships, we shall in the next place produce our evidences that are matters of Record; and we desire your lordships' advice and direction how we are to minister the same, whether your lordships will have them all read, or but a word of them, and let them be left with your lordships.

L. H. S. What Records are they?

Mr. Treby. They are the Records of the attainder of Coleman, Ireland, and the other conspirators.

L. H. S. The fact is so notorious that they were attainted and executed, that the reading of a word will serve the turn.

Sir J. Trevor. Then we desire they may be produced here, and the copies proved upon oath; and then we shall leave them upon your lordships table. And, my lords, we desire likewise at the same time, to save another trouble, there may be delivered in the convictions of Reading, Lane, Knox, and others.

Then Mr. Clare was sworn, and delivered in the Copies of the Records.

L. H. S. What Record is that?

Mr. Clare. It is the record of the attainder of Coleman for high treason.

L. H. S. Did you examine it?

Mr. Clare. I did examine it.

L. H. S. Is it a true copy?

Mr. Clare. To the best of my understanding, it is. Here is likewise a copy of the record of the conviction of Ireland, Pickering, and Grove, for high treason.

L. H. S. Is there judgment of attainder entered upon record?

Mr. Clare. Yes, my lords, there is judgment entered. Here is a copy of the indictment, conviction, and attainder of Whitebread, Fenwick, Harcourt, Gavan, and Turner for high treason. Here is a copy of the record of attainder of Richard Langhorn for high treason. Here is a copy of the attainder of Green, Berry, and Hill, for the murder of sir Edmundbury Godfrey. Here is a copy of the conviction of Mr. Nathaniel Reading, for endeavouring to suborn Mr. Bedlow to retract his evidence against some lords in the Tower, and sir Henry Tichborne.

L. H. S. What is the judgment there?

Mr. Clare. The judgment is entered upon it; and it is to pay 1,000*l.* fine, and to be put in and upon the pillory in the Palace-yard, Westminster, for an hour, with a paper upon his head, written in great letters, "For endeavouring subornation of perjury." Here is a copy of the record of the conviction of Tasborough and Price, for endeavouring to suborn Mr. Dugdale, and judgment entered upon it. And here is a copy of the record of conviction of Knox and Lane, for conspiring to asperse Dr. Oates and Mr. Bedloe. Here is the record of the conviction of John Giles, for barbarously attempting to assassinate John Arnold, esq. one of his majesty's justices of the peace; and the judgment entered thereupon is, To stand three times on the pillory, with a paper on his hat declaring his offence; to pay 500*l.* to the king, to lie in execution till the same be paid, and find sureties for his good behaviour during life.

L. H. S. Deliver them all in. And if my lords have occasion to doubt of any thing, being left in the court, they will be there ready to be used. (All which were then delivered in.)

Mr. Treby. My lords, we humbly desire that the record of Coleman may be read, because there is more of special matter in it than any of the rest, and your lordships may dispose of the others as you please.

L. H. S. Read the record of Coleman.

Then the Clerk read (in Latin) the record of the attainder of Edward Coleman, formerly executed for high-treason, by him committed in this horrid Popish Plot, which is in English as followeth.

Of the Term of St. Michael, to the 13th year of the reign of king Charles the Second, &c.

Middlesex.

At another time, to wit, on Wednesday next after eight days of St. Martin this same term, before our lord the king at Westminster, by the oath of twelve jurors, honest and lawful men of the county aforesaid, sworn and charged to enquire for our said lord the king and the body of the county aforesaid, it stands presented, That Edward Coleman, late of the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, gent. as a false traitor against the most illustrious, most serene, and most excellent prince, our lord Charles the second, by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. and his natural lord, not having the fear of God in his heart, nor weighing the duty of his allegiance, but by the instigation of the devil moved and seduced, the cordial love, and the true, due and natural obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said lord the king towards him our said lord the king ought and of right are bound to bear, utterly withdrawing; and devising, and with his whole strength intending the peace and common tranquillity of this kingdom of England to disturb, and the true worship of God within this kingdom of England practised, and by law established, to overthrow; and sedition and rebellion within this realm of England to move, stir up, and procure; and the cordial love, and true and due obedience, which true and faithful subjects of our said lord the king towards him our said lord the king should bear, and of right are bound to bear, utterly to withdraw, blot out, and extinguish, and our said lord the king to death and final destruction to bring and put; the 29th day of September, the 27th year of the reign of our lord Charles the second, by the grace of God, of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, king, defender of the faith, &c. at the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster, aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, subtly and traitorously proposed, compassed, imagined and intended sedition and rebellion within this realm of England to move, raise up and procure, and a miserable slaughter among the subjects of our said lord the king to procure and cause; and our said lord the king from his kingly state, title, power and government of this realm of England utterly to deprive, depose, deject and disinherit, and him our said lord the king to death and final destruction to bring and put; and the government of the same realm, and the sincere religion of God in this kingdom, rightly, and by the laws of this realm established, for his will and pleasure to change and alter, and the state of this whole kingdom in its universal parts well instituted and ordained, wholly to subvert and destroy, and war against our said lord the king within this realm of England to levy. And to accomplish and fulfil these his most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes aforesaid, the same Edward Coleman afterwards, to wit, the said 29th day of September, in the abovesaid 27th year of the reign of our said lord the king, at the parish of St. Margaret Westminster aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, subtly and traitorously devised, composed, and writ two letters to be sent to one M. la Chaise, then servant and confessor of Lewis the French king, to desire, procure and obtain to the said Edward Coleman, and other false traitors against our said sovereign lord the king, from the said French king, his aid, assistance and adherence, to alter the true religion in this kingdom then and still established, to the superstition of the Church of Rome, and to subvert the government of this kingdom of England: and afterwards, to wit, the said 29th day of September, in the abovesaid 27th year of the reign of our said lord, now king of England, &c. at the aforesaid parish of St. Margaret Westminster in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely and traitorously devised, composed and writ two other letters to be sent to one M. la Chaise, then servant and confessor of the said French king, to the intent that he the said M. la Chaise should intreat, procure and obtain to the said Edward Coleman, and other false traitors against our said sovereign lord the king, from the aforesaid French king, his aid, assistance and adherence to alter the true religion in this kingdom of England then and still established, to the superstition of the church of Rome, and to subvert the government of this kingdom of England; And that the aforesaid Edward Coleman, in further prosecution of his treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes aforesaid, afterwards, to wit, the same 29th day of September, in the abovesaid 27th year of the reign of our said now lord the king, the aforesaid several letters from the said parish of St. Margaret Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, subtly and traitorously did send into parts beyond the seas, there to be delivered to the said Monsieur La Chaise. And that the aforesaid Edward Coleman, afterwards to wit, the 1st day of December in the 27th year of the reign of our sovereign lord Charles the second, now king of England, &c. at the aforesaid parish of St. Margaret Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, one letter from the aforesaid Monsieur La Chaise (in answer to one of the said letters, so by him the said Edward Coleman writ, and to the said Monsieur La Chaise to be sent, first mentioned) falsely, subtly and traitorously received; and that letter so in answer received, the day and year last abovesaid, at the abovesaid parish of St. Margaret Westminster aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, subtly and traitorously did inspect and read over; and that the aforesaid Edward Coleman, the letter aforesaid so by him in answer received in his custody and possession the day and year last aforesaid, at the aforesaid parish of St. Margaret Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, subtly and traitorously detained, concealed and kept; by which said letter the said Monsieur La Chaise, the day and year last abovesaid, at the aforesaid parish of St. Margaret Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, signified and promised to the said Edward Coleman, to obtain for him the said Edward Coleman and other false traitors against our said lord the king, from the said French king, his aid, assistance and adherence. And that the aforesaid Edward Coleman afterwards, to wit, the 10th day of December in the abovesaid 27th year of the reign of our said sovereign lord Charles 2. now king of England, &c. at the parish of St. Margaret Westminster aforesaid, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, falsely, maliciously, subtly, and traitorously did relate and declare his traitorous designs and purposes aforesaid to one Monsieur Ruvigni (then envoy extraordinary from the French king to our said most serene king, at the parish aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, residing) to move and excite him the said envoy extraordinary with him the said Edward Coleman in his treasons aforesaid to partake: And the sooner to fulfil and compleat those his most wicked treasons and traitorous imaginations and purposes aforesaid, he the said Edward Coleman, afterwards, to wit, the 19th day of December, in the abovesaid 27th year of the reign of our said lord Charles the second now king of England, &c. at the aforesaid parish of St. Margaret Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, advisedly, maliciously, subtly and traitorously did devise, compose, and write three other letters to be sent to one sir William Throgmorton, kt. then a subject of our now lord the king, of this kingdom of England, and residing in France in parts beyond the seas, to solicit him the aforesaid Monsieur La Chaise to procure and obtain of the said French king his aid, assistance and adherence aforesaid. And those letters last mentioned, afterwards, to wit, the day and year last abovesaid, from the aforesaid parish of St. Margaret Westminster, in the county of Middlesex aforesaid, to the same sir William Throgmorton in France aforesaid, falsely and traitorously did send, and cause to be delivered, against the duty of his allegiance, and against the peace of our said now lord the king, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in such case made and provided. Wherefore it was commanded the sheriff of the county aforesaid, that he should not omit, &c. but that he should take him, if, &c. to answer, &c. And now, to wit, on Saturday next after eight days of St. Martin, this same term before our lord the king at Westminster, came the aforesaid Edward Coleman under the custody of William Richardson, Geur. keeper of the gaol of our said lord the king of Newgate by virtue of the king's Writ of Habeas Corpus ad subjiciend', &c. (into whose custody before then, for the cause aforesaid, he was committed) to the bar here brought in his proper person, who is committed to the marshal &c. and presently of the premises to him above imposed, being asked, how he will thereof be acquitted? saith, that he is in no wise thereof guilty, and thereof for good and evil doth put himself upon the country. Therefore let a jury thereupon come before our lord the king at Westminster on Wednesday next after fifteen days of St. Martin; and who, &c. to recognize, &c. because, &c. the same day is given to the said Edward Coleman, &c. under the custody of the said keeper of the gaol of our said lord the king, of Newgate aforesaid, in the mean time committed to be safely kept until, &c. At which Wednesday next after fifteen days of St. Martin, before our lord the king at Westminster, came the aforesaid Edward Coleman under custody of the aforesaid keeper of the king's gaol of Newgate aforesaid, by virtue of a writ of our lord the king of Habeas Corpus ad subjiciend', &c. to the bar here brought in his proper person, who is committed to the aforesaid keeper of the king's gaol of Newgate aforesaid. And the jurors of the jury aforesaid, by the sheriff of the county aforesaid hereunto impannelled, being called, came; who being chosen, tried, and sworn to speak the truth upon the premises, say upon their oaths, that the aforesaid Edward Coleman is guilty of the high treason aforesaid, in the indictment aforesaid specified in manner and form as by the said indictment above against him is supposed; and that the aforesaid Edward Coleman at the time of perpetration of the high-treason aforesaid, or at any time afterwards, had no goods, chattels, lands or tenements, to the knowledge of the jurors aforesaid. And the aforesaid Edward Coleman being asked if he hath any thing, or knows what to say for himself, why the court here ought not to proceed to judgment and execution of him upon the verdict aforesaid, saith nothing, but as before he had said: And hereupon instantly the attorney-general of our said lord the king, according to due form of law, demandeth against him the said Edward judgment and execution to be had upon the verdict aforesaid, for our lord the king. Whereupon all and singular the premises being viewed, and by the court here understood, it is considered, That the said Edward Coleman be led by the said keeper of the gaol of Newgate aforesaid, unto Newgate aforesaid, and from thence directly be drawn to the gallows of Tyburn, and upon those gallows there be hanged, and be cut down alive to the earth, and his entrails be taken out of his belly and be burned (he still living); and that the head of him be cut off, and the body of him be divided into four parts; and that those head and quarters be put where our lord the king will assign them, &c.

L. Staff. I do not hear one word he says; my lords.

L. H. S. My lord, This does not concern your lordship any further than as to the generality of the Plot.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we have now done with our Proofs for the first general head that we opened, which was to make it out, that there was a Plot in general. We now come to give our particular Evidence against this very lord; and before we do begin, we think fit to acquaint your lordships that our evidence will take up some time: for your lordships will have the patience to hear it out now, we will give it; but if your lordships will not sit so long till we can finish it, it may be some inconvenience to us to break off in the middle. And therefore we humbly offer it to your lordships consideration, whether you will hear it now, or no.

L. H. S. If it cannot be all given and heard now, it were better all should be given to-morrow.

Sir W. Jones. If your lordships please then, we will reserve it till to-morrow.

L. Staff. My lords, I would only have your directions, whether I shall answer this general first, or stay till all be said against me. That which I have to say to this general, will be very short.

L. H. S. My lord, you are to make all your answer entire, and that is best for you.

L. Staff. I am very well contented, that I may be better prepared for it.

L. H. S. Is it your lordships pleasure that we should adjourn into the parliament-chamber.

Lords. Ay, Ay.

L. H. S. Then this House is adjourned into the parliament-chamber.

And the Lords went away in the same order they came.

The Commons returned to their House, and

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and then the House adjourned to eight of the clock the next morning.

THE SECOND DAY.

Wednesday, December 1, 1680.

A Message was sent from the Lords, by sir Timothy Baldwyn, and sir Samuel Clark.

Mr. Speaker; The Lords have sent us to acquaint this House, that they intend to proceed to the Trial of William Viscount Stafford, at ten of the clock this morning, in Westminster-Hall.

Mr. Speaker left the chair, and the Commons came into Westminster-Hall in the new-erected court. And the managers appointed by the Commons went into the room prepared for them in that court, to proceed to the particular Evidence against William viscount Stafford.

About ten of the clock in the morning, the lords came into the said court in their former order; and proclamation being made of silence, and for the lieutenant of the Tower to bring his prisoner to the bar, they proceeded.

L. H. S. My lords expect you should go on with your evidence, and proceed in the trial of this noble lord.

L. Staff. My lords, if your lordships please, I humbly desire that my counsel may be near me for the arguing of what is fit to them to speak to, as to points of law; for points of fact I do not desire it.

L. H. S. My lord, you have an order for your counsel to attend, and they must and ought to attend.

Serj. Maynard. The counsel must not suggest any thing to him while the evidence is giving; they are not to be heard as to matter of fact.

L. H. S. It is not intended to make use of counsel as to matter of fact, but they may stand by.

Serj. Maynard. My lords, they may stand within hearing, but not within prompting.*

L. Staff. I assure you, if I had all the counsel in the world, I would not make use of them for any matter of fact.

Mr. Treby. My lords, will you please to order them to stand at a convenient distance, that they may not prompt the prisoner?

Sir W. Jones. My lords, I hope your lordships will consider, that a man in a capital cause ought not to have counsel to matter of fact. It is true, he may advise with his counsel; I deny it not; but for him in the face of the court to communicate with his counsel, and by them be told what he shall say, as to matters of fact, is that which (with submission) is not to be allowed. If your lordships order they shall be within hearing, I do not oppose it; but then I desire they may stand at that distance, that there may be no means of intercourse, unless points in law do rise.

* See the Note to the Case of Don Pantaleon Sa, ante, vol. 5, p. 466.

L. H. S. You were best make that exception when there is cause for it; in the mean time go on with your evidence.

Sir F. Win. We did perceive his counsel came up towards the bar, and very near him, and therefore we thought it our duty to speak before any inconvenience happened. This lord being accused of high-treason, the allowing of counsel is not a matter of discretion. If matters of law arise, all our books say, that counsel ought to be allowed: but we pray that there may be no counsel to advise him in matter of fact, nor till your lordships find some question of law to arise upon the evidence.

L. H. S. When there is cause, take the exception; but they do not as yet misbehave themselves.

Mr. Treby. My lords, We presume your lordships did, from the strength and clearness of yesterday's evidence, receive full satisfaction concerning the general Plot and Conspiracy of the Popish Party. It being an evidence apparently invincible, not out of the mouths of two or three witnesses only, but of twice that number, or more, credible persons. Upon which we doubt not but your lordships who hear, and strangers and unborn posterity when they shall hear, will justify this prosecution of the Commons, and will allow that this Impeachment is the proper voice of the nation crying out, as when the knife is at the throat. By the evidence already given, I say, it is manifest that there was a general grand design to destroy our religion, our king, and his Protestant subjects. And it is even impossible that this design, so big, could be conducted without the concurrence of such persons as this noble lord at the bar: it could not be carried on by less and lower men. And it were a wonder, that a person so fervently affected and addicted (as this lord is) to that party, should not be in at so general a design of the party. But this indeed is but presumptive evidence, which will induce a moral persuasion. We shall now produce such positive evidence as will make a judicial certainty; and will abundantly suffice to convince your lordships, and convict this lord. The particulars you will hear out of the mouths of the witnesses, whom we shall call; they will testify what share this lord had in (almost) all the parts and articles in our charge; contriving and contracting for the murder of the king, levying arms, &c. And first we call Mr. Dugdale.

L. Staff. My lords, I do conceive I have good ground to except against this man for a witness: for my own particular, I know myself as clear and free as any one here; but I will not except against him now, but reserve it against the time when I come to make my defence, and therefore admit him to be sworn, provided, my lords, that he look me full in the face.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, What is your exception against this man that he may not be a witness?

L. Staff. I do admit him to be sworn, I say nothing now against him.

Mr. Treby. He is sworn already.

L. H. S. You swore him to give evidence as to the general Plot; you did not swear him as to the particulars against my lord Stafford.

Sir John Trevor. We are content he shall be sworn again, we pray he may be sworn.

Sir W. Jones. It is true, my lords, we did divide the evidence into two parts, but his oath was not divided: if your lordships please, you may swear them all over again, if it may be any satisfaction, but I think it was never seen before.

Then Mr. Dugdale was sworn.

L. H. S. There is Mr. Dugdale; come, sir, what say you?

L. Staff. Really he is so changed I do not know him.

Mr. Dugd. My lord, I have witnesses to prove that you know me.

L. Staff. I beg your lordships that he may look me in the face, and give his evidence, as the law is.

Sir John Trevor. My lords, if this noble lord, the prisoner at the bar, will have this witness to look him continually in the face, the court will not hear half his evidence: we desire he may address himself, as the law is, to your lordships and the judges.

L. Staff. I desire the letter of the law, which says, my accuser shall come face to face.

Mr. Dugdale. My lords, I am willing to do as your lordships shall order.

L. H. S. My lord, you do see the witness, that is enough for face to face; and you make no legal exception against him, why he should not be heard.

L. Staff. Very well, my lord, I submit.

Dugd. My lords, I have for some years past, whilst I was a servant with my lord Aston, been acquainted and frequently had discourses with my lord Stafford, before we came to discourse any thing concerning the plot on foot. Lately in 1678, my lord coming down into the country, it was either in August or September, the latter end of August, or the beginning of September.

L. Staff. I beseech your lordships he may name the times.

L. H. S. My lord, if your lordship please, do not interrupt the witnesses; but wherein he is short, do you ask him the question when it comes to your turn, I will bring it to as much certainty as I can.

Dugd. There was a meeting at Tixal, where there were several present—

L. H. S. When?

Dugd. It was in September, or the latter end of August.

L. H. S. What year?

Dugd. 1678. My lords, I had by Mr. Evers's means admittance to hear, because of my encouragement, what the discourse was at that time. It was to debate and determine upon the former resolutions both beyond sea and at London before, both to take away the life of the king, and to introduce their religion, of which I was then one. My lord Stafford was there present, and did with the rest consent to it. Afterwards my lord Stafford being at one Mr. Abnett's of Stafford one Sunday morning in September, came to my lord Aston's house to mass: I met with my lord Stafford at some distance from the gate, and my lord speaking to me when he alighted off from his horse, told me it was a very sad thing they could not say their prayers but in an hidden manner, but here long we should have our religion established; which was much to my joy at that time. After that time my lord Stafford was sometimes at Stafford and sometimes at Tixal, I will not be positive as to a day, but I think it was about the middle of September. My lord Stafford sent for me to his lodging-chamber, as he had several times before sent for me; and said, he had had great commendations of me from Mr. Evers, that I was faithful and trusty.

L. Staff. My lords, I desire I may have pen, ink, and paper, allowed me.

L. H. S. Ay, God forbid you should be denied that: give my lord pen, ink, and paper. I hope your lordship hath one to assist you that takes notes for you; if you have not, you have lost a great deal of time already.

L. Staff. There was one all day yesterday, my lords; I desire he may speak his evidence over again.

L. H. S. Let him begin his evidence again, for my lord had not pen, ink, nor paper, which he ought to have to help his memory.

Dugd. I may miss as to the words, but the matter of fact I shall repeat: my lords, I have been frequently acquainted whilst I was a servant at my lord Aston's with my lord Stafford coming to my lord's house in the country, and my lord being several times where I came to that intimacy by Mr. Evers's means, that my lord would frequently discourse with me. About the latter end of August, or some day in September, my lord Stafford, my lord Aston, and several other gentlemen, were in a room in my lord Aston's house, and by the means of Mr. Evers I was admitted to hear for my encouragement; and there I heard them in that debate at that time fully determine a resolution upon all the debates that had been beyond sea and at London before, that it was the best way they could resolve on to take away the life of the king, as the speediest means to introduce their own religion. After some time my lord being at Stafford at Mr. Abnett's—

L. H. S. Was my lord Stafford at that meeting where they debated to kill the king?

Dugd. My lord was there.

L. H. S. Was he consenting to that resolution?

Dugd. Yes, I heard every one give their particular full assent.

(At which there was a great hum^o.)

* "Who can read, without horror, the account of that savage murmur of applause, which broke out upon one of the villains at the bar, swearing positively to Stafford's having proposed

L. H. S. What is the meaning of this? For the honour and dignity of public justice, let us not carry it as if we were in a theatre.

Dugd. My lords, some time in September, my lord Stafford being at Mr. Abnet's house in Stafford, came once upon a Sunday morning to hear mass: I meeting him at the outer gate of my lord Aston's house when he alighted off his horse, after some discourse he turned to me, and told me, It was a sad thing we could not say our prayers but in an hidden manner; but ere long, if things took effect, we should have the Romish religion established: and I at that time did seem to be, and really was as glad as any person could be. After some time I think it was about the 20th or 21st of September, my lord Stafford sent for me into his lodging-room, I think it was by his page, or him that waited upon him in his chamber; and he told me I must come to my lord; and I immediately went to his lordship, he was just then arising and dressing; he sent his man out, and told me, he had had a good account from Mr. Evers and other gentlemen, that I would be faithful and true to their intentions about the introducing their religion. He told me, he was likewise concerned himself, and that in a very high degree: and for taking away the life of the king, he offered me at that time for my charges and encouragement 500*l.* and that I should go in October after to London with him (my lord Stafford), and that I should be with him sometimes at London, and sometimes at an house of my lord Aston's, about 25 miles from London: and that I should be under the care of him in London and Mr. Ireland, and in the country of one Mr. Parsons that knew of the design. I did then shew as much resolution to be faithful to my lord as I could, and that I would betrise to what my lord then engaged me. I after went to Mr. Evers, and communicated to him what my lord Stafford said, and was something in admiration at my lord's offering me such a sum of money, for I doubted of my lord's ability to make good payment. He told me, that I need not fear it, for Mr. Harcourt and Mr. Ireland had money enough in their hands to defray that and other charges; and I should not want money for the carrying it on. My lords, I remember that at another time there was a meeting, wherein there was a debate about my going up, and other businesses; my lord Stafford was present, and there were several there besides, I did not know them all then; but in the first place they told me, I should be made equal with one captain Adderly that is since dead, and that I should have a reward in London. I understood that the duke of York, my lord Arundel, and my lord Bellasis, and others, were to give it me; the murder of the king? And how is this horror deepened, when we reflect, that in that odious cry were probably mingled the voices of men to whose memory every lover of the English constitution is bound to pay the tribute of gratitude and respect?" Fox's James the Second.

and speaking of the rewards to those that were engaged, they said, there would be land enough from the protestants to satisfy all that acted in the design. Another time my lord Stafford discoursing in the dining room in my lord Aston's house, did express his great zeal, and the reason why he was such an enemy against the king; he said, both he and my lord Astou had been great sufferers for the king, and for his father, and that my lord in particular, his grandfather or his father, had spent 30,000*l.* in the king's service, and had no recompence; that he had always shewed himself loyal to the king; but whenever there came any place of preferment to be disposed of, it was rather given to such as had been traitors and rebels to the old king, and likewise to the king himself, than to any that had been loyal. He said, this was his chief motive, if there were not religion in the case, which was of a higher nature, or to that purpose.

L. H. S. When was this last discourse?

Dugd. In September 1678, as near as I remember, for we had several discourses.

L. H. S. This was not the time you were at my lord's chamber?

Dugd. No, it was in my lord Aston's dining room.

L. H. S. No, nor when he sent for you to offer you the 500*l.*?

Dugd. No, not at that time, it was another time.

L. H. S. What month and year?

Dugd. September 1678, my lord.

Mr. Foley. I desire he may give your lordships an account what assurance he had of pardon, if he did succeed.

Dugd. I was told I need not fear; and particularly my lord Stafford told me, I should have a free pardon for it; and for the king had been excommunicated, and was likewise a traitor, and a rebel, and an enemy to Jesus Christ.

L. H. S. But how could you be pardoned? From whom were you to have that pardon?

Dugd. I was to be pardoned by the pope.

L. H. S. That was for your sins.

Dugd. Yes; I expected no other, if I had gone on.

Mr. Treby. Were you promised nothing else but a pardon from the pope?

Dugd. Yes, I was to be sainted.

Sir W. Jones. Will his lordship please to ask him any questions? We ask him no more.

Mr. Foley. Yes, I desire another question may be asked him: That he would give an account of the letters my lord Stafford writ to Evers, about the design.

L. H. S. What say you to that question?

Dugd. There came a letter to Evers from my lord Stafford; I know it to be my lord's hand: some might counterfeit his hand; but as near as a man can swear to the hand of another in a paper he did not see written, that was my lord's hand: That things went all well beyond sea, and so he did hope they did here, for the carrying on of the design: It was to this purpose expressly.

Mr. Treby. We have done, my lords, with him.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, will you ask him any questions?

L. Staff. My lords, I have divers questions to ask him, very many; but I humbly crave your lordships directions, if I ask him any questions now, whether I may not ask him some afterwards?

L. H. S. My lord, you may ask questions of the witnesses as often as you please, and whenever you find it useful to you: God forbid there should be any time to foreclose a man from asking a question that may save his life.

L. Staff. I pray he may be asked how long before this time he knew of the Plot.

L. H. S. How long have you known this Plot?

Dugd. In general, for the introducing of the Popish religion, and the encouragement to it by the duke of York's being successor, I have known it 15 or 16 years by the means of Mr. Evers.

L. Staff. My lords, I understand him, he says he knew the Plot 15 or 16 years ago; if I be not mistaken, he says so.

Dugd. My lords, if your lordships please to give me leave to explain myself further, it was not for taking away the life of the king, but for making ready against the king died, with men and arms.

L. Staff. My lords, he says in the latter end of August, or beginning of September, I told him such and such things; I desire he may name the day; that may be many days, and I may prove I was not there; and I can prove for all August, and a good while in September; therefore I desire he may name the day.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, I come thus near on purpose to serve your lordship, that you may not strain your voice too much; but I am not so happy as to apprehend what it is you say.

L. Staff. My lords, I say, he speaks of the latter end of August, or the beginning of September; which is too great a latitude, and I conceive more than ought to be given in such a matter of importance as this is to me; I desire he may name the day, for he may name days, perhaps, that I was not there.

L. H. S. Look you, Mr. Dugdale; my lord does desire, if you can, you would be a little more particular than about the latter end of August, or the beginning of September; if you can remember the day, tell it us.

Dugd. I cannot remember particular days, it being a thing I then took no account of; only this I do remember by a remarkable circumstance, that one time was either the 20th or 21st of September, 1678.

L. H. S. That was the time of your coming into his chamber, and his offering you 500l.?

Dugd. It was so; but other meetings I dare not charge to a day.

L. Staff. How then can I make my defence?

Dugd. I will stand to that time.

VOL. VII.

L. Staff. How, my lords, can I be able to give an account of it? I shall prove to your lordships, that he once said it was in August, now he says it was in August or September. I beseech you that he may positively stand to the month, if not to the day.

Dugd. I speak as near as I can.

L. Staff. But he says the 20th or 21st particularly.

Dugd. Thereabouts I am sure it was.

L. Staff. Look you, he will be positive in nothing.—Dugd. I will stand to that time.

L. Staff. If he swears false in one thing, I hope, upon proof of that, your lordships will believe he may be false in all. I pray he may be asked what hour of the day it was, whether it was morning or afternoon.

L. H. S. He is positive only to the 20th or 21st of September, the time when he says you called for him into your chamber, and offered him 500l. to kill the king: would your lordship ask him whether it were in the forenoon or the afternoon?

L. Staff. Yes, my lord, I would.

L. H. S. Was it in the forenoon or in the afternoon?

Dugd. It was in the forenoon; for I did formerly speak of that, he was dressing himself when I came in.

L. H. S. Then that is answered positively.

L. Staff. My lords, he says one Sunday morning I came to my lord Aston's to mass, I desire you would please to ask him, whether ever he saw Mr. Evers and me in his life alone together?

L. H. S. Have you seen my lord Stafford and Mr. Evers ever together alone?

Dugd. Several times I have seen them walking together in the garden, and in the walks, at my lord Aston's; and I have been with them myself when there hath been only them two besides.

L. H. S. That is answered fully; will your lordship ask him any thing else?

L. Staff. He says he was to go to London in October with me, I stand not upon that till I come to make my answer; but I take it, he says the 20th or 21st of September, when I offered him 500l. in my chamber, to kill the king, that he went presently to Evers to speak with him about it.

L. H. S. As doubting the payment of the money, and he told him, that Harcourt and Ireland^a would pay it.

L. Staff. Was it the same day? pray ask him, my lords.

Dugd. I do not say it was the same day, but it was the next time I could come to speak with him.

L. H. S. He tells you, it was as soon as he could speak with him.

L. Staff. He said before, it was presently after he went from me. I desire your lordships would take notice how he contradicts himself in every circumstance.

^a See their Case, ante, pp. 79, 311 of this vol.

L. H. S. What say you, did you go presently to Mr. Evers after my lord Stafford had made the offer, or was it the same day, or the next day?

Dugd. To the best of my remembrance, it was the same day; I can't say positively.

L. Staff. My lords, I have no other questions with Dugdale.

Sir J. Trevor. Then, my lords, we will call another witness.

L. H. S. Have you no more to say to Dugdale, my lord?

L. Staff. Not at present, till I come to make my defence.

L. H. S. God forbid, but you should have leave to say all that you can for yourself.

Mr. Treby. Then set up Dr. Oates. Do your lordships require that he should be sworn again?

L. Staff. I desire nothing, nor propose it, if he will declare upon his oath that he took yesterday.

L. H. S. Hark you, Dr. Oates, this is but a continuation of the proceedings yesterday; you are upon the same oath now that you were then, and what you say this morning will be taken to be upon the same oath.

Mr. Treby. Dr. Oates, upon the oath you have taken yesterday—

L. H. S. Pray swear him again. (Which was done.)

Mr. Treby. Dr. Oates, pray speak your knowledge of my lord Stafford's being engaged in the design.

Oates. I desire I may be left to my own method.

L. H. S. Go on in your own method.

Oates. My lords, in the year 1667, there were divers attempts upon the life of the king, as the Jesuits told me; and in the year 1674, there was an attempt upon the account of the king's withdrawing the indulgence in 1674 and 1675: in the year 1677, whilst I was in Spain, I met with several letters signed Stafford, wherein my lord Stafford did assure the Jesuits in Spain, that were of the Irish nation, how zealous he should appear in the promoting of the Catholic design. My lords, in the year 1677 I went to St. Omers, and I came there in December. My lords, in that year I being ordered to look over the papers, and put them in order, I found several letters signed Stafford; wherein my lord Stafford did intimate to the Fathers, that whereas there had been some difference betwixt him and the Society for several years, the business was reconciled by one Signior Con, who came over into England in the year 1676, to reconcile the great difference that was betwixt the Jesuits and the secular clergy, and between the Benedictine monks and the Jesuits. My lords, my lord Stafford, upon the persuasion of this Signior Con, as he does intimate in his letter, does assure the Jesuits of his fidelity and his zeal. My lords, in the year 1678, I found letters from my lord Stafford, wherein he does blame Mr. Coleman's openness, and his being too public in the great affair, and that Mr. Coleman was pleased to communicate several great secrets to men, of whose fidelity his lordship was not secure. My lords, in 1678, in the month of June, my lord Stafford, the prisoner at the bar, came to Mr. Fenwick, and there received a commission from him to pay an army that was to be raised for the promoting of the Catholic interest; and he did assure Mr. Fenwick that he was going down into Staffordshire, and there he did not question but he should have a good account how the Catholics stood affected; and he did not question but to give a good account how affairs stood in Staffordshire, Shropshire and Lancashire; and this commission to my lord Stafford was, as near as I can remember, to be pay-master-general of the army. My lords, among other discourses with my lord at the bar, he was discoursing about my lord duke of Norfolk, and my lord Arundel his son; and after several other passages, he (Fenwick) was asking of him how my lord Arundel came to have a Jesuit in his house. My lord Stafford did say, that my lord of Peterborough, his father-in-law, was instrumental in it, on purpose to oblige the duke of York; for my lord Arundel, as I have been told, kept Father Symonds in his house, who to my knowledge was a Jesuit. But, my lords, he came to Mr. Fenwick's (my lord Stafford did) by the name of Mr. Howard of Effingham.

L. H. S. Were you at Fenwick's when my lord Stafford came to his chamber?

Oates. Yes, my lord.

L. H. S. Look upon my lord Stafford, is that the same person?

Oates. It is the same gentleman that came there by the name of Howard of Effingham.

L. H. S. And he took the commission?

Oates. Yes, he did so.

L. H. S. And he promised to effect it?

Oates. Yes, and he said that he was then going down in the country, and he did not doubt but at his return Grove should do the business.

L. H. S. Who said so, Fenwick?

Oates. No, my lord Stafford. And says Fenwick to my lord Stafford again, Sir, it is fit that some should be here present, lest you fail of your expectation; or to that purpose. It is two years since, and I cannot remember the words, but my lord Stafford did say, he was of necessity to go into the country at that time. And there he did write a letter to St. Omers, in which he did excuse himself about a young man that was to be sent to the Jesuits college, whom he had taken care of another way. And he desired their excuse, but he would be as faithful to them as anybody, for all that. And the same hand that wrote that letter, by all the comparing I could make in my thoughts, wrote all the other letters that I saw at St. Omers, and in Spain. My lords, I saw my lord Stafford at Dr. Perrutt's I think verily it was in June or July 1678; it was before the rising of the parliament that sat that summer, and my lord Stafford was discoursing of a son he was to send over to Lisbon, and he went over by the name of Sir John Stafford. And after this discourse was over they fell into a discourse of the affairs in hand, and my lord was mighty glad there was so good a correspondence and concord, though, my lords, it was not very great; for the Jesuits had an irreconcilable quarrel with the rest of the clergy: but my lord did hope that their fair correspondence might tend highly to the advancing the Catholic cause. But, my lords, I have one thing more to speak as to the discourse at Fenwick's chamber; speaking of the king he said, he hath deceived us a great while, and we can bear no longer.

L. H. S. Who said so?

Oates. My lord Stafford, the gentlemen at the bar.

L. H. S. When was that? At Dr. Perrott's?

Oates. No, I speak of a passage at Fenwick's which I had forgot, my lords, this is all I can remember at present.

Mr. Foley. My lords, I desire he may give an account what letters my Lord Stafford sent to Fenwick and Ireland to pay money.

Oates. There was some money returned, but it was no great sum, and it was about private business: Mr. Morgan was to receive it: I chanced to have the money in my own keeping: Mr. Fenwick gave it me to pay to Mr. Morgan, and the letter in which the sum was mentioned did give them an account (for it was out of Staffordshire) that he found things stand in a very good state there. But I being not within, Mr. Morgan called on Mr. Fenwick for the money, which I returned to him when he had paid it.

L. Staff. My lords, I do, in the first place, desire to know where Mr. Fenwick lived.

L. H. S. Where did Mr. Fenwick live when you saw my lord at his chamber, and the commission delivered?

Oates. His lordship, I suppose, knows very well where he lived, he lived in Drury Lane.

L. Staff. I will submit to any thing, if ever I saw the man, or heard of him till the discovery of the Plot.

Oates. He came to him by the name of Thompson.

L. H. S. Your lordship does not observe; your lordship says that you never knew any Fenwick, but your lordship knew one Thompson, and that Thompson was Fenwick.

L. Staff. I did know one Thompson, but that Thompson I knew was an English merchant in Brussels, and not a Jesuit.

Oates. I cannot say what my lord knows, that he knew Fenwick to be a Jesuit, but he knew one Thompson, that was Fenwick the Jesuit.

L. Staff. I never heard of the name till this Plot.

Oates. But if your lordship please, I will give you a reason why I believe he knew him to be a Jesuit, because the Society was very often in their mouths in their discourses; which gives me a ground to believe he knew him to be what he was: But, my lord, he took his commission from him.

L. Staff. I desire he may be asked—

L. H. S. Good my lord, raise your voice, for I am come half way to hear you.

L. Staff. Pray, my lords, give me leave to ask him, whether Dr. Oates hath not said several times since I was first imprisoned, that he never saw me in his life. I think I was imprisoned the 21st of October 1678.

Oates. My lords; I never said any such thing.

L. Staff. I will willingly die, if ever I saw this doctor in my life.

Oates. I excuse my lord for that, for I was in another habit, and I went by another name, and your lordships do remember I came in another habit to make the first discovery.

L. Staff. My lord, I never saw his face nor know him, nor Fenwick, or Thompson, otherwise than one Thompson, a merchant at Brussels.

Oates. But my lords, I have one thing more to say of my lord Stafford; my lord Stafford went into France, I cannot say the year but I believe it is within the term of six or seven, but he went over to France; and it did appear by letters from him, that Signior Con was made choice of to heal the difference between the Regulars and the Seculars; and Signior Con did come over in the year 1676, and there did make a kind of a peace among them, which lasted whilst Con stayed here, and Con did bring over messages, to which my lord Stafford (if he tells any truth in his own letter) did return answers.

L. Staff. For the present, all I say to it is this, I never writ any one letter this 25 years, nor had any any correspondence with any Jesuit.

L. H. S. I beseech you, my lord, make me capable of serving your lordship, by letting me hear what you say.

L. Staff. My lord, I have a great cold, and can speak no louder; I desire to ask this witness no more questions at present, but I say, I never writ any letters to any priest this 25 years.

Mr. Foley. Then my lords, if my lord hath done, we will call another witness, and that is Mr. Edward Turberville.* (Who was sworn.)

* Of this man, Burnet says, "Another witness appeared against lord Stafford, one Turberville; who swore, that in the year 1675 the lord Stafford had taken much pains to persuade him to kill the king: he began the proposition to him at Paris; and sent him by the way of Dieppe over to England, telling him that he intended to follow by the same road: but he wrote afterwards to him that he was to go by Calais. But he said he never went to see him upon his coming to England. Turberville swore the year wrong at first: but upon recollection he went and corrected that error."

L. H. S. Look upon the prisoner. Do you know my lord Stafford?

Mr. Turberville. Yes, my lord.

L. H. S. Raise your voice, and speak deliberately.

Mr. Treby. Give an account of your knowledge, and use your own method.

Turberville. My lords, in the year 1675 I was persuaded by my lady Powis, and one Morgan that was confessor to the family, to go to Doway, in order to take upon me the frier's habit. When I came there, instead of religion, I found nothing but hypocrisy and villainy among them, and quickly grew weary of staying there, and with much difficulty I escaped thence to go for England: When I came into England, I did think that my friends would look unkindly upon me, because I refused to live in that way that they proposed to me to live in. I used all the means I could to have them reconciled, and

This at such a distance of time seemed to be no great matter: It seemed much stranger that after such discourses once begun he should never go near the lord Stafford; and that lord Stafford should never enquire after him. But there was a much more material objection to him. Turberville, upon discourse with some in St. Martin's parish, seemed inclined to change his religion: they brought him to Dr. Lloyd, then their minister: and he convinced him so fully that he changed upon it: and after that he came often to him, and was chiefly supported by him: for some months he was constantly at his table. Lloyd had pressed him to recollect all that he had heard among the papists relating to plots and designs against the king or the nation. He said that which all the converts at that time said often, that they had it among them that within a very little while their religion would be set up in England; and that some of them said, a great deal of blood would be shed before it could be brought about; but he protested that he knew no particulars. After some months dependance on Lloyd he withdrew entirely from him; and he saw him no more till he appeared now an evidence against lord Stafford: Lloyd was in great difficulties upon that occasion. It had been often declared, that the most solemn denials of witnesses before they make discoveries did not at all invalidate their evidence; and that it imported no more, but that they had been so long firm to their promise of revealing nothing: so that this negative evidence against Turberville could have done lord Stafford no service. On the other hand, considering the load that already lay on Lloyd on the account of Berry's business, and that his being a little before this time promoted to be bishop of St. Asaph was imputed to that, it was visible that his discovering this against Turberville would have aggravated those censures, and very much blasted him. In opposition to all this here was a justice to be done, and a service to truth, towards the saving a man's life: and the question was very hard to be determined. He advised made application to them, that since I could not bear with the life they would have had me lived in, they would contrive some way for me, being a younger brother, that I might live in the world, but they were so averse and inveterate against me, that they told me, instead of doing any thing for me, they would do me all the mischief and prejudice they could; and having lived all my time among them, I thought the world would receive a character of me from them who were my relations, as they would please to represent it. So having no hopes in England, I took a resolution to go into France, where I had a brother that was a Benedictine monk: And I hoped that he being in good repute amongst them, might be able to do me some service there. When I came to Paris, my brother used all the endeavours imaginable to get me to be of that order; but I having so ill a conceit and opinion of the order that I was with all his friends, and with myself in particular. The much greater number were of opinion that he ought to be silent. I said, my own behaviour in Staley's affair shewed what I would do if I was in that case: but his circumstances were very different: So I concurred with the rest as to him. He had another load on him: he had writ a book with very sincere intentions, but upon a very tender point: he proposed, that a discrimination should be made between the regular priests that were in a dependance and under directions from Rome, and the secular priests that would renounce the pope's deposing power and his infallibility: he thought this would raise heats among themselves, and draw censures from Rome on the seculars, which in conclusion might have very good effects. This was very plausibly writ, and designed with great sincerity: but angry men said, all this was intended only to take off so much from the apprehensions that the nation had of popery, and to give a milder idea of a great body among them: and as soon as it had that effect it was probable that all the missionaries would have leave given them to put on that disguise, and to take those discriminating tests till they had once prevailed; and then they would throw them off. Thus the most zealous man against popery that I ever yet knew, and the man of the most entire sincerity, was so heavily censured at this time, that it was not thought fit, nor indeed safe, for him to declare what he knew concerning Turberville."

Mr. Hargrave in his unpublished "Opinion and Argument," of which I propose at the end of this case to give some account, animadverts with much severity upon the conduct of bishop Lloyd, and more particularly upon that of bishop Burnet, in this transaction.

Burnet's contrast of his own behaviour on the case of Carstairs with that of Lloyd in the case of Turberville, seems to be exhibited with somewhat less of delicacy than might have been due to the friendship between the two bishops. See as Carstairs v. 6, pp. 1415, 1480, 1502, 1504.

in before, and thinking all the rest were the same, I was unwilling at all to enter into it. And after I staid there awhile, I resolved to come over into England. My brother used all the means he could for my accommodation, and recommended me to this noble lord, the prisoner at the bar, who lodged then at a corner-house in a street which, as I remember, bears the name of La Rue de Beaufort, where I was several times with him, in order to come over with him in the yacht for England. After I had been there for a fortnight with this lord, he understanding my condition, by my brother, and by the other fathers of that convent, and imagining I was a fit instrument to be employed on such an occasion, proposed to me a way, whereby, as he said, I might not only retrieve my reputation with my relations, but also make myself a very happy man: And after having exacted from me all the obligations of secrecy which I could give him, he at length told me in direct terms, it was to take away the life of the king of England, who was an heretic, and consequently a rebel against God Almighty. I looked upon it as an extraordinary attempt, and desired time to consider of it before I would undertake it. And I gave him this answer, I would give him my resolution at Dieppe, where we were to go on board for England. And when I came to take my leave of this noble lord at the bar, he was sitting upon the bench, and he was troubled with the gout in his foot at that time. And he told me he had some business to go to Versailles, and that he should not be in 6 or 7 days at Dieppe, where I was to wait for him. After a while, I received a letter at Dieppe from his lordship, wherein he writ me word, that he had altered his resolution, and would go by the way of Calais, and that I should hasten to wait on his lordship at London. I have one thing more to observe to your lordships: When I got passage from Dieppe, in a fisher-boat for England, I never came near my lord Stafford, because being not willing to undertake his proposal, I thought myself not safe, even from my own relations; and therefore I made my applications to the duke of Monmouth, and his grace was pleased by letter to recommend me into the French service, and by that means I avoided his lordship's further importunity.

L. H. S. You say, my lord did propose to you the killing of the king; did he plainly make the proposal in direct terms to kill the king?

Tur. Yes, he did, my lord.

L. H. S. What did he offer you to do it?

Tur. Nothing, for I would not accept of it. I told him it was a matter of great concernment, and I ought to consider of it; and I took time to think of it, and would give him my answer at Dieppe, which he came not to; and so there was an end of it.

L. H. S. What engagements of secrecy had you given my lord, before he opened himself so plainly to you?

Tur. I gave my lord my word and my promise, that I would not discover it to any person directly or indirectly; my lord had nothing of an oath from me.

L. H. S. Will you ask him any more questions, gentlemen?

Sir W. Jones. No, my lords.

L. H. S. Will your lordship ask him any questions, my lord Stafford?

L. Staff. My lord, I never saw the man before in my life. I will ask him one question, since he hath been pleased to swear against me.

Tur. My lords, I had no reason but the truth to do it; for I never received any injury from his lordship in my life.

L. Staff. It seems I had ill luck to chuse this man for an attempt to kill the king, who was such a coward he ran away from his colours, and was to have been shot to death.

Tur. Ask the duke of Monmouth what character he received of me.

L. Staff. He says, in the year 1675 he went from London to Douay, and staid some time there, and then came back to England; I beseech your lordships to ask him what time he went back to Paris.

L. H. S. What time was it you went back to Paris?

Tur. Truly, my lord, I cannot be punctual to a fortnight, but I believe it was the beginning of June.

L. H. S. What year?

Tur. 1675.

L. Staff. My lords, I would know who recommended him to me to go over with me into England?

L. H. S. Who recommended you to my lord Stafford to go into England?

Tur. My lords, it was Father Sberborn, who was then prior of the Benedictine monks in Paris, and Father Nelson, sub-prior of those monks, and my brother, who is a monk in the same convent.

L. H. S. He says, that there were three persons that recommended him to your lordship.

L. Staff. I never saw them in my life.

Tur. Your lordship, that says I was a coward, and run away from my colours, will say any thing.

Ld. Staff. I not only say it, but will prove it by two witnesses.

Tur. Do it if you can.

Ld. Staff. He says, in the beginning of June 1675 he went into France. I desire to know of him, when was it he spoke to me.

Tur. In November 1675.

Ld. Staff. He says in November.

Tur. Yes, my lord, about the beginning of November.

Ld. Staff. I beseech your lordship, where was it he spoke to me?

L. H. S. Turberville, where was it you spoke to my lord?

Tur. In Paris.

Ld. Staff. Whereabouts in Paris?

Tur. It was the corner house of the street, which street faces Luxenburgh-house; the prince of Conde lodges on the right hand in that street, I take it to be so, and you lodged at the corner house; I think the name of the street was La Rue de Beaufort.

Ld. Staff. Which if the prince of Conde did—I will say no more.

Tur. I cannot be upon my oath in such cases, but I think he does, I take it so.

Ld. Staff. He says he was with me a fortnight, what does he mean?

Tur. I came to my lord several times in the space of a fortnight.

Ld. Staff. I desire to know who brought him to me?

Tur. Father Sherborn, Father Nelson, and my brother Father Anthony Turberville; and sometimes I came alone.

L. H. S. He says, those three Fathers recommended him to your lordship, and he came himself several times.

Tur. Yes, my Lords, it is true.

Ld. Staff. I beseech your lordships, did he come directly to my chamber, or where?

Tur. Sometimes to my lord's chamber, and at other times I met him in a lower room.

Ld. Staff. It concerns me much, my lords; and though they be foolish questions, yet I hope your lordships will pardon me if I ask them. Where was this discourse about killing the king?

L. H. S. Was this discourse in the chamber, or in the lower room?—Tur. In the lower room.

Ld. Staff. He says, I think, that he hath been in my chamber.

L. H. S. Have you been in my lord's chamber as well as in the lower room?

Tur. Yes, my lord, I have.

Ld. Staff. What kind of room is it?

Tur. I can't remember that.

Ld. Staff. No, I dare swear you can't.

Tur. I cannot tell the particulars; what stools and chairs were in the room.

Ld. Staff. My lords, I have no more to say to him at present.

L. H. S. Mr. Turberville, how long have you been in England?

Tur. I cannot answer punctually; I have been in England near 4 years.

L. H. S. How came it to pass that you never discovered this sooner?

Tur. I had no faith to believe that I should be safe if I did it, but my brains might be knocked out; and that kept me off from doing that service which I might be better able to do, if I did defer it.

L. H. S. How come you to discover it now?

Tur. The king's Proclamation, and some friends that have persuaded me that I may do it with safety, who will give your lordships an account of it.

Ld. Staff. I desire he may attend when I make my defence.

Tur. Yes, I shall: but I am sorry his lordship hath so ill a memory as to what passed between us. I shall be very unwilling to do his lordship or any body else any injury, but I must tell the truth.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we shall call no more witnesses, unless my lord, the prisoner, give us an occasion. If he shall make any objections to any of our witnesses, I hope we shall have liberty to call witnesses to support them; but we give over at present, and expect his lordship's answer.

Ld. Staff. May it please your lordships, I beseech your lordships, before I say any thing, that I may know if they have any more witnesses to examine.

L. H. S. They say they will call no more evidence, unless your lordship's answer do give them occasion to fortify their witnesses you expect against.

*Lord Stafford. My lords, It is now about two years that I have had the misfortune to be accused of this detestable treason. I have been several times in these two years a close prisoner, that my wife and children were denied to come near me; and hardly a servant permitted to ask how I did, but at the door of my prison. My lords, this was a great and an heavy affliction to me; that truly I did not know how to bear it. It is true, I had that comfort, that I did hope I should soon come to my trial, and before your lordships make my innocency appear. In order to which, I did all could, having heard this Hall was provided for it: and I did expect in a very few days to clear myself before your lordships and all the world. When I had settled my mind, and did not foresee any greater affliction that could befall me, I had on a sudden, by some of my friends, a sad message sent me, That the House of Commons had impeached me of high treason. My lords, I looked upon the House of Commons then (as I do now) as the great representative body of the Commons of England; and I confess, my lords, to be accused by them was a load, especially being added to what lay before upon me, more especially to my weak body and weaker mind, that I was so afflicted with it, and have so continued, that I am scarce yet able to bear up under it: for I look upon the House of Commons as the great and worthy patriots of this kingdom; I ever held them so, and I hold them so still. My lords, these things being such great afflictions to me, and some other accidents, which I shall not trouble your lordships with telling you of, have so much disordered my sense and reason (which before was little), that I scarce know how to clear myself to your lordships as I ought to do; or which way to go about the doing of it; therefore I do with all humility beg your lordships pardon if I say any thing that may give an offence, or urge that which may not be to the purpose. All which I desire you would be pleased to attribute to the true cause, my want of understanding, not of innocency, or a desire to make it appear.

* Mr. Hargrave in his unpublished 'Opinion and Argument as to the Right of lady A. S. Howard to the new barony of Stafford, &c.' (p. 124. et seq.) has selected with very powerful effect some instances of lord Stafford's manner of defending himself.

My lords, these gentlemen the Managers of the House of Commons, who are great and able men, some I am sure, if not all of them very well read, and have understanding in the law, have set forth to your lordships treason in an horrid shape; but I confess, my lords, if they had made it never so much worse, it cannot be so horrid as I have often fancied it myself: For, my lords, I do, and did ever hold treason to be the greatest sin in the world, and I cannot use words enough to express it; and therefore I hope you will give me leave to clear myself of it, and I shall give you one notion of it, which I heard at your lordships bar some years ago, where you were pleased to hear several people of several persuasions give you some reason why liberty of conscience should be allowed them. And I remember one of them, an Anabaptist, I think, did tell you, That they held treason to be the sin of witchcraft, and so do I. And next to treason, I hold murder to be the worst sin. But the murder of the king I looked upon to be so above all others, that it is not to be expressed by words.

My Lords, I have heard very much of a thing that was named by these gentlemen of the House of Commons, and that very properly too, to wit, of the Gunpowder Treason. My lords, I was not born then, but some years after I heard very much discourse of it, and very various reports; and I made a particular enquiry, perhaps more than any one person did else, both of my father who was alive then, and my uncle, and others; and I am satisfied, and do clearly believe, by the evidence I have received, that that thing called the Gunpowder-Treason, was a wicked and horrid design (among the rest) of some of the Jesuits: and I think the malice of the Jesuits, or the wit of man, cannot offer an excuse for it, it was so execrable a thing. Besides, my lords, I was acquainted with one of them that was concerned in it, who had his pardon, and lived many years after: I discoursed with him about it, and he confessed it, and said, he was sorry for it then; and I here declare to your lordships, that I never heard any one of the Church of Rome speak a good word of it: it was so horrid a thing, that it cannot be expressed or excused. And God Almighty shewed his judgments upon them for their wickedness; for hardly any of the persons, or their posterity, are left, that were concerned in it, and even a very great family too, that had collaterally something to do in it, is in the male line extinct totally; and I do think God Almighty always shews his judgments upon such vile actions. I have been told, all those persons that were engaged in this wicked act, were all heartily sorry for it, and repented of it before they died, without which I am sure there is no salvation. And therefore I think it was not the interest of religion, but a private interest put them upon it.

My Lords, as to the doctrine of King-killing, and absolving persons from their allegiance, I cannot say the Church of Rome does not hold it; I never heard it did hold it; it may be it does, it may be not: I say not one thing or other; but, my lords, there was an English college of priests at Rheims, that translated the bible, and printed it with authority, according to their translation; and in their annotations upon the 14th chapter to the Romans, they do declare their dislike and detestation of that opinion. They say, all subjects ought to obey their kings, as the primitive Christians did the heathen princes of the empire; and the learned doctors of the college at Sorbonne, did upon an occasion administered to them about that opinion, declare the mistakes that were in it, and owned it to be a damnable principle. My lords, I have an authentic copy of that decree of the Sorbonnists, whether it be here or no, I cannot tell—Yes, here it is, which does declare that a damnable position; and there is lately come out a book, written by a priest of the Church of Rome, tried for his life for being in the Plot, but acquitted of that, in which he says, That that opinion of killing kings is damnable and heretical, and declared so by the council of Trent.

My Lords, this gives me occasion to believe that the Church of Rome holds it not. I do not say that it does not; but some particular persons do abhor it, which are great in that church, and which weighs far with me: but that which furthestmost of all confirms me in my ill opinion of it, is the words of our Saviour, when not only he commands us to give unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, but asserts our obedience to our governors in many other passages of the Holy Scripture; and what I find there, the whole world is not able to alter my opinion of. I do assure your lordships in the presence of Almighty God, that I do extremely admire when I hear of any thing like it; and I did read with great horror what I found the other day in the Gazette, of some imprudent people in Scotland, and of their wicked principles and practices.

My Lords, I do in the presence of Almighty God, who knows and sees all things, and of his angels which are continually about us, and of your lordships who are my peers and judges, solemnly profess and declare, that I hate and detest any such opinion, as I do damnation to myself. And I cannot be more desirous of salvation to myself, than I am cordial in hating this opinion.

My Lords, I know no person upon earth, nor all the persons in the world put together, nor all the power they have, can in the least absolve me of my allegiance. And I do acknowledge the king is my sovereign, and I ought to obey him as far as the law of the land obliges any subject of his to obey him: whether I have taken the oath of allegiance, I appeal to your lordships to be my witnesses; and if I did not take it a thousand times for my allegiance to the king, if required, I should think I deserved a thousand deaths, and all the torments in the world for refusing it.

My Lords, these gentlemen here did begin their Charge (serjeant Maynard, and sir Francis Winnington) with telling your lordships there was an horrid Design to murder the king, to alter the government, and introduce the popish religion. This, they say, was engaged in by the Roman Catholics; that all the Church of Rome were the contrivers of it; for they tell your lordships, the whole body hath been engaged in it, and they have given you many proofs by witnesses examined the first day, of a general Plot: what credit you will give to them, I leave to your lordships in the end of the case; but still they said it was the body of the Roman Catholics in England, or the papists, or what they call them, that were the plotters in this design. But I beseech your lordships, how am I concerned in it? for I must say to your lordships, they have not offered one proof that I am of that religion. So that though any of you should have seen me at the exercises of that religion, or otherwise know it of yourselves, yet if there be no proof judicially before you, you are not to take notice of it. I have heard, if a man be accused of a crime, and be to be tried, and no evidence come in; if every man of the jury were sure that the fact was done, yet they must go upon the evidence produced to them, and not upon their own knowledge. So then, no evidence being produced before your lordships, about my being a papist, you are not to take me for such a one. But, my lords, if I were of that church, and that were never so well proved too, I hope I have an advantage in it, that I have kept myself from being poisoned with so wicked a principle, or engaged with the rest in so ill a thing.

My Lords, I am here accused of having endeavoured to kill the king. I find by the law, upon reading sir Edward Coke, since my imprisonment, That all accusations of Treason ought to be accompanied with circumstances antecedent, concomitant, and subsequent; but I conceive, my Lords, there is no title of any such thing proved against me. The whole compass of my life, from my infancy, hath been clear otherwise. In the beginning of the late unhappy times, the late king, of happy and glorious memory, did me the honour to make me a peer; and thinking that my presence might rather prejudice him than serve him, my wife and I settled at Antwerp when the war begun, where I might have lived, though obscurely, yet safely; but I was not satisfied in my conscience to see my king in so much disorder, and I not endeavour to serve him what I could, to free him from his troubles. And I did come into England, and served his majesty faithfully and loyally, as long as he lived. And some of your lordships here know whether I did not wait upon the now king in his exile, from which he was happily restored; which shews I had no ill intention then.

My Lords, I hope this I have said does shew, that my life hath given no countenance to this accusation, but clear contrary to what these (I hope I may call them so, and I doubt not to prove them so) perjured villains say against me.

My Lords, after I had this misfortune to be thus accused, about a month or six weeks after, your lordships were pleased to send two members of this honourable body to me, (I do not see them at present here) to examine me about the Plot: (they were my lord of Bridgewater, and my lord of Essex) if they be here, I appeal to them what I did say. These two, after they had examined me, told me, they did believe and could almost assure me, that if I would confess my fault, and let them know the particulars of it, your lordships would intercede with the king for my pardon; but I then, as I ought, asserted my own innocence. Not long after, the king, out of his grace and goodness to me, sent six of the council to the Tower, to offer me, That though I was never so guilty, yet if I would confess, I should have my pardon. I did then consider with myself; I could not imagine what ground there was to believe your lordships could have evidence of what there was not, to bring me in guilty; and thereupon I was so far from being able to make a discovery, that I could not invent any thing that might save my life, if I would.

My lords, I was seven days in the country after I heard of the Plot; if I had known myself guilty, I should surely have run away. As I came to London, when I was at Litchfield, there met me two of my lords; they told me, and so did a gentleman of the House of Commons, how much there was in the Plot, which, if I had had a hand in it, would certainly make me fly for it. I have ever heard, when a man is accused or suspected of a crime, flight is a great sign of guilt; and that it is often asked of the jury, though there be no certain positive evidence of the fact, whether a man fled or no? As that is a sign of guilt, so remaining is a sign of innocence. If then after notice I come to town, and suffer myself to be taken; if after imprisonment and accusation, I refuse my pardon, and yet had been guilty, I ought to die for my folly as well as my crime.

My Lords, It is a great offence to commit treason, and a great addition to continue obstinate, when upon acknowledgment a man can save his life; nay, my lords, if I should have refused these offers, and yet known myself guilty, I had at the same time been guilty of one of the greatest sins in the world, as being the cause of my own death. And as I hold, next to treason, murder the greatest sin, so I hold of all murders self-murder to be the greatest; nay, I do not think any man living can pardon that sin of murder. And I do profess to your lordships, in the presence of Almighty God, that if I could immediately, by the death of this impudent fellow Dugdale, who hath done me so much wrong, make myself the greatest man in the world that is or ever was, I profess before God I would not. I cannot say my charity is so great, but that I should be glad to see him suffer those punishments the law can inflict upon him for his crimes; but his death I would not have. Blood is so great a crime, and I know every man is careful of giving his voice in the case of blood, I should be very cautious myself; and if I were a judge, I would rather save twenty guilty, than condemn one innocent. I bless God, I have not the least desire of the death of any man, and would not for all the world have innocent blood lie upon me.

I beg your lordships pardon that I have troubled you thus long: I shall now, as well as I can, apply myself to my particular defence. I do, my lords, before I can go on to it, desire I may have such Depositions as have been taken against me, and the liberty to look upon your Journal-Book when I have occasion. I do particularly desire the Depositions of Oates, upon which I was committed by my lord chief justice; the two Depositions of Stephen Dugdale, taken at Stafford before two justices of the peace, Mr. Lane and Mr. Vernon; I desire the Depositions taken before, I think it was Mr. Warcup and sir William Poultney, or some other two justices, which was made by Turberville; and then I shall compare their testimonies together, and I hope shall give you a clear account that they are perjured persons. How without these to go on to my just defence, I cannot well tell.

L. H. S. What do you say to it, gentlemen? You hear what my lord prays.

Sir F. Win. The witnesses are here, and have been heard viva voce: as we cannot use any of the depositions of which he speaks, so no more can they be used by him.

L. H. S. If I understand my lord aright, this is the thing he desires: says he, You have brought witnesses against me viva voce; they have been examined here, and they have been examined elsewhere, and their Depositions are upon record: I desire to confront what they have said here, with what they have said contrary in other places.

Serj. Mayn. If there be any thing expressed by my lord, wherein they have contradicted themselves, and produce that deposition, he may do that; but to desire to have all the depositions that have been made by our witnesses, is a strange request. When there is occasion to use them upon any particular point, he may produce them if he can.

L. H. S. Can you object why my lord should not have copies of any thing that is upon the Journal and Depositions that are sworn before a magistrate, which may be of use to him?

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we do not object against it; but, my lords, I think it is out of time to desire it. What was sworn, and is entered in your lordships Journal, was sworn above two years since. My lord, or any man else, might repair to them; they are matters of record, and for aught we know were never denied to any, especially if they desired it in the House; but after two years time, and after three weeks time given to prepare for this trial, when my lord could not but know what witnesses would be examined before your lordships; for him to come now and desire such and such depositions may be produced, which if by law he might be allowed to do, he might have done before, is to no other purpose, under favour, but to gain time, and cause our evidence to be forgotten; and therefore we most humbly pray it may not be admitted: My lords, I think it is an unusual thing. My lords the judges, are near your lordships, I suppose they will inform your lordships. If a man be tried at the assizes, for him to desire a copy of the informations remaining in court, by which he may except against the witnesses, is what the court does not use to grant. But if your lordships proceedings vary from the common proceedings of other courts, then I resort to what I said before, Whether your lordships will think this a proper time, when he might have had it in the parliament that was first dissolved, and then in the parliament that was last dissolved. Now to desire those copies at this time, is to put off the cause for that which perhaps he cannot be furnished with in a day or two.

Sir F. Win. I would add but one word, if your lordship please to give me leave. My lords, you have the learned Judges near you, who will inform you, whether ever, when a man was accused of a capital offence, and the Evidence against him had been fully heard by the court and by himself, he was admitted to require from the prosecutors the copies of examinations formerly taken before other persons. Does my lord intend to have time to peruse those examinations, and to have the copies of them, that he may consult in private with his counsel to find out exceptions, and with his witnesses to make them good? My lords, I must say, that in my short experience (and I have attended a considerable time upon the greatest court for trial of offenders), I never heard such a thing asked by a prisoner, either at the bar of the King's-bench, or at the assizes. I speak with all the tenderness imaginable, because we are in a matter of blood, and God forbid but the lord at the bar should have true and equal justice done him! but if I take my lord right, this seems but an artifice to delay the trial, of which it is our duty to be very cautious. Indeed I have seen the judges, upon trial of a criminal, call for the Depositions or Informations from the clerk, or the justice of the peace who took them, and caused them to be read; but for a prisoner to call for examinations at the bar from the prosecutors, et ex debita justitia, to demand them, is a thing, which, as it never has been, so I think will not be admitted at this time, especially when we are now almost at the end of the cause. And with all modesty and submission to your lordships, I look upon it as a very strange and unreasonable demand.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, what is the reason your lordship had not all this while copies of the Journal, which is that you now ask?

L. Staff. I shall not undertake that I am able to give your lordships a reason for it, because I think, wherein I have been mistaken as to point of time, your lordships will not tie me up to that. But this gentleman that spoke last is not acquainted with me, and does not know me; for I have no desire to go back, or to put off this trial: But if it cannot be done to day, I am as guilty to-morrow as I am to day; and I desire no more than what he says hath been done in the like cases. I do desire, my lord, the Informations and Depositions of Dugdale, Oates and Turberville may be produced and read, and I will make observations upon them in my defence. I desire those affidavits may be brought.

L. H. S. Affidavits taken when and where?

L. Staff. Of Dr. Oates, that was read in your lordships house; I heard it.

L. H. S. Let us understand your lordship's demands, that when my lords are withdrawn, I may know what questions to put to them, and acquaint them with your desires: The one is the Journal of the Lords House, which is always before their lordships, and you might have had copies long since. The next thing you ask is an affidavit of Dugdale; if this affidavit is entered into the Journal, that supplies your demands; if it be not entered there, where shall we find it?

L. Staff. I do not know.

L. H. S. Does your lordship think all this matter must stay till we can find a loose affidavit, that we know not where it is filed?

L. Staff. I know it was before the council, and I believe my accusers have it; I desire the gentlemen of the House of Commons may produce it.

Sir J. Trevor. I have seen none, nor have none.

L. Staff. The one was taken the 24th of December this time two year, and the other the 29th.

L. H. S. My lord, Will your lordship give me leave to tell you, you ought to be provided with some particular exception, and not to make your demand in general. If your lordship will say, Dugdale did swear such and such things, which are contrary to what he now affirms, we know what to make of it; but to hunt after an affidavit that we know not where to find, to pick up something out of it, that I do not understand.

L. Staff. I appeal to my lord Essex, and my lord Bridgewater, whether they did not examine me the first time upon one or two affidavits of Dugdale.

L. H. S. Suppose it be not to be found, my lord?

L. Staff. Then I must have patience, and submit.

L. H. S. Can you tell wherein he swore quite blank contrary to what he swears now?

L. Staff. My lord, I conceive it was never denied before; but your lordships may do what you please.

L. H. S. Well, my lord, let us go on to the next. The affidavits of Dugdale, if they be entered on the Journal, may be ready; if not, then I shall acquaint their lordships, and they will direct what is fit in the case.

L. Staff. Then there is the affidavit of Oates before my lord chief justice, upon which I was committed; the next day, which was Friday, it was read in your lordships house.

L. H. S. I believe that it is entered upon the Journal, and so will be ready to be used.

L. Staff. I do hope to make it evidently appear thereby, that he is forsworn. I desire two affidavits more, that were taken before the justices of the peace of Middlesex, who examined Mr. Turberville twice.

L. H. S. What justices of the peace?

L. Staff. Mr. Warcup, sir William Pountney, and sir Thomas Stringer. I desire I may not be misunderstood; I do not desire to have them to instruct my counsel, or advise with them upon them, but I cannot make my defence without them.

L. H. S. Those are voluntary extrajudicial affidavits, that no body is bound to keep.

L. Staff. They were spoken of in the votes of the House of Commons.

L. H. S. What say you, gentlemen, to it?

Sir F. Win. My lords, because my lord at the bar is pleased to insinuate, as if we know where those affidavits are which he desires to desire, and because your lordship was pleased to say, that the Commons in parliament are the grand-jury of the kingdom, I desire to say one thing, That certainly it will not be required from us to produce and publish the several facts and circumstances that induced us to impeach him, if it shall be demanded by the prisoner at the bar.

L. H. S. I wish you would answer the question, and not argue upon it whether those affidavits of Turberville may not be produced; for it is my lord's exception against your witness, that he swears several ways; and by those affidavits of Turberville, he intends to disprove him in what he hath said to-day.

Sir F. Win. My lords, The House of Commons never administer an oath; and therefore it is not to be said to us, but my lord Stafford must go to the particular offices where they are to be found.

L. H. S. I do not ask you where my lord should find them, but whether if they can be found, you can object any thing why they should not be produced and read?

Serj. Mays. When they are produced, we will give answer.

L. Staff. My lords, I am informed this is the substance of the affidavit, That Turberville did swear before two justices of peace, whether they be of the House of Commons, or no, I cannot tell, That he spake with me at Doway, and in Paris, in the years 1673 and 1676, and now he says 1672 and 1675, I am informed, my Lords: and I appeal to the House of Commons, they are all persons of honour and worth, (if my information be mistaken, I beg their pardon and yours for it) whether he did not mend it after he had sworn it.

L. H. S. Are these all you do demand?

L. Staff. Yes, my lords. Whether this was true or no, I do not know; it is what I have been told; I appeal to the House of Commons, (who are all worthy persons, I do not believe I have an enemy among them,) they know whether I speak true or no.

L. H. S. When will your lordship be ready to make your defence?

L. Staff. As soon as ever I have them, I will not stay a minute, a moment, an instant; I desire not to shew my counsel, nor any one, for my trial is a thing that I have long desired; therefore I would not be mistaken, as if I would put off the cause. I am innocent, and shall be so while I live, and hope I shall make it appear so. I beg, if this be a matter of law, whether I may have them or not, that my counsel be heard to it.

L. H. S. This is a matter of fact.

L. Staff. I insist upon it as things without which I cannot make my defence: I am innocent, and I suppose not one of the House of Commons, nor one of your lordships, will debar me of that by which I may make my innocency appear.

L. H. S. You cannot know my Lords pleasure till they are withdrawn.

Sir W. Jones. Before your lordships withdraw, I hope you will please to hear us a few words, which we think may be for the service of this court. My lords, what evidence is before your lordships, it is in your lordships pleasure what of that you shall please to communicate to my lord Stafford; but for this evidence he speaks of, as remaining in our hands, and which he takes upon himself to appeal to us for, admits of another consideration. My lords, if we were conscious of any thing in these Affidavits that were for my lord's advantage, and knew where they were, we would readily produce them; but for myself, I must answer, and I think my companions will say so too, that we do not know where these affidavits are, nor of any variation in those affidavits from what is now sworn; but whatever they were, they were taken for the information of the House of Commons, who are the prosecutors in this cause, and who are no judges. Now, if my lord will bring any witness that will say this witness of ours did before a justice of peace depose so and so, and says the contrary now, there might be then just reasons to look after these affidavits, and to have them produced; but upon a bare imagination that there is a variance, where in truth there is none, and the truth may otherwise be known; to desire that these affidavits that never were before you should be produced, whether such a suggestion is to be admitted, I humbly submit to your lordships consideration.

L. Staff. My lords, if these gentlemen that are the managers for the House of Commons will aver to your lordships, that there is no variation in them, I will submit to them, and be quiet; if they will say it was not debated in the House, whether he should amend or no.

L. H. S. Look you, he puts it upon you so for gentlemen, that if you will take it upon you to aver that there is no variation between those affidavits upon which you grounded your Impeachment, and the evidence you have given upon the trial of your impeachment, he will not give you the trouble.

L. Staff. I beseech you, let me say one word: My lords, I have been thus long a prisoner; I was as far from being proceeded against now, as any of the rest of the lords in the Tower, till Turberville came in with his discovery; and I believe I am now called the sooner (which I am glad of, and I gave the gentlemen thanks for it) upon the affidavit of Turberville; I desire that affidavit. And though it be true, the House of Commons give no oath, yet they appointed two members of the House, that were justices of the peace of Middlesex, to take it upon oath, and he desired the next day to amend it; and I put myself upon them, whether this be not true.

L. H. S. What say you, Sir, to it?

Sir W. Jones. My lord, I cannot answer, because I do not hear.

L. Staff. My lords, I say this, I do observe that Mr. Turberville (whose face I never saw in my life that I know of, till to-day, nor never spoke a word to him, and I shall prove that no servant that ever I had see him) did depose (for the purpose) to-day, that he was in the years 1673 and 1676, in such and such places, and that he did speak with me at Doway and Paris; and to-morrow recollecting his Notes, he found he was mistaken in his affidavit that he had made before, and desired to mend it, and brought it to the years 1672 and 1675: There was some debate in the House about it, whether they should permit him to mend it: I appeal to all the gentlemen whether it were not so.

L. H. S. Your labour is to have two affidavits; that you do presume will do your business in order to the finding out a variety of time of his being at Doway or at Paris: That which does press your lordship we know in Turberville's evidence is, That at Paris, in the room below your lodging, you encouraged him to kill the king, and you were to have met him at Diep to know his mind, but you came not, and he went away; if you have it in the affidavit quite contrary to this, you say somewhat.

L. Staff. My lords, I beseech you, it presses me and every man in England, not to be run down by a fellow that forswears himself: for him to swear one thing to-day, and another thing to-morrow, is perjury.

L. H. S. What say you to it, gentlemen?

Sir W. Jones. What was done in the House of Commons, it does not become any of us that are members to disclose: but I have heard, and will admit it, that in the Depositions the witness made before a justice of the peace, there was a year put down, which he going home, and upon sight of letters and papers finding it to be mistaken, he comes the next day, and desires to alter it: If this be for my lord's service, we shall grant it.

L. H. S. What say you, my lord, now?

L. Staff. I do say, my lord, I am informed by what I have heard cursorily, (for I have not seen one of the House of Commons before the day of my trial) that though in his second Deposition he named the years 1672 and 1673, yet I can prove him perjured as to what he hath sworn here to day.

L. H. S. Since it is insisted upon, gentlemen, that there is a variety in the last deposition from what he swore at first, what can you say why he should not have the avail of his Exception?

Sir W. Jones. My lords, whether your lordships will think fit to consider by what ways and means the House of Commons informed themselves in order to Impeachments, I submit to you; and for those things that still remain in the hands of the Commons, I suppose you will be pleased to consider how you can send for them to inform you: We would not be mistaken in the matter; let not any one that hears us think that we are conscious there is the least variation; nay, we are confident, if the thing were produced, it would turn to my lord's prejudice; but what is done in this case may be a precedent for the future, and therefore we cannot, without resorting to the House, consent to deliver any thing the House took for their information. Therefore if your lordships stand upon it, and incline to have it done, we must resort to the House to ask their leave, whether we shall do it or no.

L. H. S. I cannot tell what my lords will incline to do; but I desire, when you are gone back, you will consider how far it will make the matter easy to my lord.

Sir Wm. Jones. My lords, we can give no answer to that till we have attended our House.

Ser. Maynard. I desire your lordships to consider what a piece of cunning he hath put upon both Houses, to pass by his vilifying our witnesses, which I may say was not comely. But if he makes any question, it must be put to the Houses upon supposition to be a question, and so he would bring things to this issue to put off the cause for to day. He ought to put that which might probably be something of a question. Let him instance in particulars, and make out his evidence, not feign things to put off the cause; for aught I see it is to no other end, and it is a jesuitical trick, I think.

L. Staff. I Rign nothing; I have been told this that I speak here, and I desire it may be proved.

L. H. S. If you are bound up so that you cannot consent, I cannot help it.

Serj. Maynard. Let him put the fact, my lords, and not suppose and imagine things, and then raise questions.

L. H. S. It is usual in these cases for the gentlemen of the house of Commons to stay till the lords are withdrawn, and expect their lordships resolution; perhaps they may so order it that you need not go back.

Sir W. Jones. I desire before your lordships withdraw, that it may be taken notice of by your lordships, that for the variation of the year, we do admit it. My lord is not pleased to mention any other particular matter of the affidavit, but only says in general, that it is contrary to what he says to day: If my lord would tell us wherein, perhaps we should admit it, or answer it, or take it into further consideration. But to make so general an allegation, and give your lordships no particular account, we submit whether such a suggestion ought to be regarded.

L. H. S. Is there any further variation; besides the variation of the year?

L. Staff. I cannot say there is, my lord, I do not know it; but I do really believe in my conscience there is, from what I have heard; but however, I insist upon it, and demand your judgment.

Sir Fr. Win. My lords, I humbly desire one word as to the objection that hath been made, that he hath prayed your lordships to grant him the sight of such and such papers. The nature of this cause, my lords, we know is such, that there was never the like number of papers known, as to the general plot; and my lord that is the prisoner at the bar, may as well demand to-morrow such a particular paper, and the next day another, that he hath heard of in the general plot; and where will the end of this be? So that if the thing be granted upon the variation of the time that it was immediately rectified, and he cannot produce any grounds that may satisfy your lordships why he should have that paper, you may as well suffer him to demand any other paper after, and so never end the cause.

L. H. S. Your lordship hath been told, and you shall find it, that you shall have as fair and equal an hearing as is possible, and nothing shall be denied you that is just and reasonable to save your life, or make your defence. But pray, my lord, for so much as is upon the Journal, which you may resort unto, you may easily know what answer my lords will give to that; but for this other thing, if it be only the variety you alledge of the time and the year, and you do desire it to look for other exceptions, and you pray the help of the Lords to see such a paper, that you may make enquiry after other varieties, do you think they are to help you to find out exceptions to the witnesses?

L. Staff. I do not desire their lordships to help me to find out Exceptions; but I have told your lordships of one Exception to the Affidavit, which these gentlemen acknowledge to be true; and the other Affidavit is, that he swears I spoke to him at Doway in the year 1672 or 1673, which I can disprove; and then I say, he swearing several things false he is no credible witness.

L. H. S. It is admitted to your lordship that he did mistake the time.

L. Staff. It is admitted that he said he spoke to me at Doway.

L. H. S. How very easy a matter were it to expedite this process, by allowing the prisoner his demand in this particular!

Sir W. Jones. I never saw it, and a great many of the managers say they never saw it.

L. Staff. These gentlemen say, I did it to put off the cause. I am far from it; for though I am in a condition very unfit to manage my defence, faint and weak with speaking so long and hardly able to speak any more, yet I desire to finish this night; and if I see it now, it will be enough, I shall not desire to have a copy to advise with my counsel or any body else.

L. H. S. Pray, gentlemen of the House of Commons, will you observe, my lord, as weary as he is, would make an end of the matter presently, if you would but send for the Affidavit.

Mr. Foley. My lords, it is not in our hands here; if the House of Commons will order it, it may be done; we cannot order it ourselves.

Mr. Poole. My lords, this is a paper that does properly belong to the House; and I do think that none of us here that are managers for this Trial, will undertake it shall be delivered, without resorting to the House for their opinion: for though I do verily believe, and am fully persuaded, that what this noble lord at the bar does object, will not appear to be so; for I think there is not any thing of my lord Stafford's speaking with this witness at Doway mentioned therein; yet how far the precedents of this may reach in other case, I think is worthy the consideration of the House. And we cannot presume to offer any thing in it to your lordships, until you be pleased to give us leave to go and resort thither.

Then the Lords withdrew, and after an hour and an half's space returned, and Proclamation was made for silence.

L. H. S. My lord viscount Stafford, my Lords have considered of the demands you made, and my Lords, upon the debate of the reasons of your demands, are come to this Resolution: your lordship did demand in the first place, that you might have a sight of the Journal, and have the Papers lodged in the House of Peers: my Lords take notice that this demand which your lordship now makes, is a demand that was granted you long ago, about two years since; you have an Order entered upon the Books, that your lordship should have copies of every thing in that House; and if your lordship have not taken out copies, and if any thing is missing to your lordship that is yet there extant, it is your lordships fault. However, my lords will commaund their Journals to be brought hither, that your lordship may make that use of them that may be of most profit to you. For the other demand touching the Affidavit supposed to be taken from Turberville by the justices of the peace, that my lords, upon consideration had, do find that there is no obligation at all upon them as a court, to concern themselves in that matter. And therefore my lords have made no Order in that point, but your lordship must come provided as well as you can, and the court can do no more to help you in it. For the rest, my Lords did take notice that your lordship said before they were withdrawn, that you found yourself very faint and weary, and that you were much spent in discourse and tired with what already you have done. My Lords are extremely willing to give your lordship all the favour and accommodation possible, for the recollecting yourself; therefore my lords will not now put you upon it, to go on to make your Defence, but will give you time till to-morrow.

L. Staff. I humbly give your lordships thanks for your kindness and favour to me; but here I profess, and call Almighty God to witness, rather than I would have it thought I am willing to put it off, I would have sunk down dead as the bar. But, my lords, there was another demand that I made: Your lordships say, I shall have copies of all the Journals, and that you cannot help me to the Affidavit of Turberville. I submit to it without saying one word more: But I desire that I may have brought hither to-morrow the Journals, and other Papers in the Lords house; but I desire also the two Affidavits of Dugdale, taken the one on the 24th, the other the 29th of December following, which Depositions were taken before Mr. Lane and Mr. Vernon, in Stafford town when Dugdale was in prison.

L. H. S. Look you, my lord, this is all under the same rule: What evidence soever there is before the Court of Peers, that you shall have; whatsoever evidence is not in that court, you ought to come provided of: The Court is not to stay, nor to help you to evidence.

L. Staff. My lord, I beg your pardon, Dugdale made an Affidavit then, and says the clean contrary now; I desire nothing but justice, and I am sure I shall have all justice from your lordships.

L. H. S. Produce it; alledge what you will for yourself, it shall be heard.

L. Staff. How then shall I be able to make my Defence if I have not those Papers, which I humbly conceive by the law ought to be brought? These gentlemen of the House of Commons say, that I could not have Turberville's Affidavit, because it was in the House, and they could not give it without consent of the House; but this was examined before a justice of peace, and returned to the council: Sure I shall have that. I was examined by my lord of Essex, and my lord of Bridgewater, upon that Affidavit twice, I think, therefore, that is material and necessary; and I know your lordships would not have me come to defend myself without weapons.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, I do beseech your lordship to be a little better informed in your own business. You have leave to make use of the Journal, and all papers that are entered there; the clerks say, Dugdale's Oath is entered there.

L. Staff. Is the 24th of December there?

Clerk. It is there.

L. H. S. Pray, my lord, do not put the Court upon interrogatories, but come provided as well as you can.

L. Staff. If it be entered on the Journal-Book, I desire not the original, I am very well satisfied.

L. H. S. Will you be ready to go on to-morrow, my lord?

L. Staff. I will with all my heart.

L. H. S. It is too late, Gentlemen, to go on to-night; we must adjourn till to-morrow.

L. Staff. My lords, I had so much to write last night, that I had very little sleep; I desire I may not come till 10.

L. H. S. My lord, I am not able to hear you; I take as much pains to come near you as I can.

L. Staff. I had a great deal to write last night, I say, and I want some sleep; I desire I may not come till 10.

L. H. S. Will you be ready by 10 o'clock to-morrow.

L. Staff. I will be ready by ten.

L. H. S. I will move my lords when they are withdrawn, to adjourn till 10 to-morrow. But, my lord Stafford, I do not know how your lordship is provided, or how you look after your own business. If you have not had copies of the Journal all this while, it is you are in the fault. A great deal of it is in print, you may send your Solicitor to the clerk of the parliament, and take copies of what you have need of. I give you notice of it, that if you come unprovided, you may know it is your own fault.

L. Staff. I do acknowledge I have copies of the Journal-Book, I think of all; but I do not find any thing of Dugdale's second Deposition there.

L. H. S. Here is that of the 24th of December, that you ask after; send your Solicitor, and then you shall have a copy out of the Journal of it.

L. Staff. I assure your lordship I will be ready to-morrow, if I can get these copies.

L. H. S. My lords will give you as much ease, and all the accommodations that are fit.

L. Staff. Then to-morrow I will be ready by 10 o'clock if your lordships please; only I would desire your lordships to take notice, that these gentlemen of the House of Commons do acknowledge that Turberville swore one day to one year, and the next day to another.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, you say you can be ready to-morrow at 10 o'clock; are you sure you can be ready then?

L. Staff. I say, my lords, this, I shall not be so ready as I shall be next day; but I assure your lordships, I will rather sink down in the place where I am, if you think fit, than put off the trial.

L. H. S. Look you, gentlemen of the House of Commons, in a case of this consequence, and of this vital importance to a man as this is, where is the inconvenience if there should be a day's respite, and the Court should adjourn till Friday, if my Lords be moved in it? I make no direction, but what inconvenience will be in it? Will it not be every way as well?

Sir W. Jones. My lords, your lordships do not expect from us to give our consent to put off the trial.

L. H. S. I ask only, what inconvenience it is?

Sir W. Jones. Your lordships are the judges, and will do as you find it reasonable; but this I say, it is very unusual, and scarce to be pre- cedented, that when the prosecutors have given an evidence, the prisoner should have time, a further considerable time, to give his Answer to it. The prisoner knows before-hand the general scope and drift of the evidence; therefore for him to have time till to-morrow, is a favour; but to have more than that, even a whole day to intervene, is very unusual.

L. H. S. If that be all, and the matter depend upon what is usual, I do venture with my lords leave to inform you, that my lord of Straf- ford had two days time after the prosecution, to give his answer to what was said against him.

Sir W. Jones. That was an evidence of 23 Articles, this but upon two heads; and that was after a long examination of many days.

L. Staff. My lords, I had prepared myself for my trial as well as I could, and writan down a few things that I intended to say; and I profess before God, as I am a man, and as I am a Christian, of all I intended to say: I have in a manner made use of very few words, but as to what I had to say upon evidence, I was forced to lay all aside, because I wanted these papers. I have not eaten to-day, and being forced to lay aside all that I had writen, I shall need a whole day to write; however, I submit myself to your lordships in that matter.

L. H. S. My lord, if it will be equal to your lordship, and your lordship will be as ready to-morrow as another day, this Court will be more ready.

L. Staff. I assure your lordships, if your lordships do give me another day, I will not debate with my counsel any one thing upon the papers I have asked.

L. H. S. Pray, my lord, will you be pleased to make your demand to my lords, who are your judges, by what time you will be content to be foreclosed.

L. Staff. My lords, if you will give me till Friday, I shall be ready to give my evidence, and I will bring witnesses sufficient, I hope, to prove my innocency.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we do not presume at all to offer our consent to what time the Court shall be adjourned—

L. H. S. No, we do not ask your consent.

Sir W. Jones. And I hope your lordships will not ask the prisoner's consent, nor do it by his direction.

L. H. S. 'De morte hominis non est cunctatio longa.'

Sir W. Jones. But we must desire your lordships, as we are entrusted by the House of Commons to manage this Trial, to take notice, that as we do not expect your lordships should take the measures from our desires, much less do we expect you should do it at the only instance of the prisoner. It is a great advantage to this lord to stave his own time, when he will please to answer our Evidence. We do know very well, that in this case there have been attempts to suborn witnesses, and that we shall prove in due time, and attempts to destroy witnesses too; so that there hath been too much time lost already, and I think to-morrow is a very convenient time for him to make his answer. And I must observe to your lordships, that the prisoner hath gained his end of not making his Answer this day, by raising an objection, which in my thoughts carried no great weight in it; though when it was made, your lordships were pleased to adjourn upon it: But seeing he hath got his point of deferring the making answer till to-morrow, there can be no reason he should gain a further day, since the Depositions may be ready by to-morrow as well as by the next day. And therefore we desire your lordships will be pleased to go on in the trial to-morrow.

L. H. S. You shall know their lordships pleasure when they are withdrawn. Is it your lordships pleasure that we should adjourn?

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. This House is adjourned into the Parliament-Chamber.

So the Lords withdrew in their order, and the Commons went back to their House, and Mr. Speaker resumed the chair.

A Message was sent from the Lords by sir Timothy Baldwyn, and sir Samuel Clark.

"Mr. Speaker, the Lords have sent us to acquaint this House, that they have ordered the prisoner, William viscount Stafford to be brought to the bar in Westminster-hall, to-morrow morning at ten o'clock."

And then the Commons adjourned to eight o'clock next morning.

THE THIRD DAY.

Thursday, December 2, 1680.

At the hour of ten in the morning, the Lords adjourned into Westminster-hall, and returned in their former order into the Court there erected; and Mr. Speaker having left the chair, the Commons were seated as before. The Court being sat, proclamation for silence was made, and the Lieutenant of the Tower commanded to bring his prisoner to the bar; which being done, the Lord High Steward spake to him as followeth:

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, this is the time appointed to hear what your lordship hath to say in your defence, and to call your witnesses.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, yesterday my lord viscount Stafford was pleased to make mention of an Affidavit of Mr. Turberville, taken before two justices of the peace, wherein he was pleased to say there was some amendment made; and so indeed we did then acknowledge there was. But he had a desire to see it, notwithstanding our acknowledgement, because he was informed that that which Turberville swore then, differed from what Turberville swore yesterday. My lords, at that time we had not the Affidavit; nor was it proper for us to produce it, for indeed it remained in the Justice of Peace's hands that took it: But now that his lordship may have full satisfaction, and not only his lordship, but also all that are present at this Trial, I do inform his lordship, that the Affidavit is in the hands of a member of the House of Commons, sir William Poultney by name; and if his lordship please, he may have it produced, and make what use he can of it.

L. H. S. It is extreme honourably and worthily done of the House of Commons; and my lord hath no manner of exception left him.

L. Staff. My Lords, if I shall have occasion to use it, I shall call for it; but I would first say something to your lordships: My lords, I first give your lordships thanks for granting me the liberty to come so late to-day; I have had a little sleep upon it. Your lordships heard yesterday, when you had Dr. Oates at the bar, the first thing that he said, as I remember, was to desire you would be pleased to leave him to his own method: I beg of your lordships the same favour, that I may begin with the one or the other witnesses, or with matter of law, as I please.

L. H. S. God forbid but you should take your own method in your defence.

L. Staff. In order to which, I desire first Mr. Turberville may come to the bar.

L. H. S. Do you call Turberville, my lord?

L. Staff. Yes, my lord, I do.

L. H. S. He is there, what say you to him.

L. Staff. My lords, I will ask him but one question, and I hope I shall have occasion to ask him no more: When was the last time that he spoke with me?

L. H. S. Mr. Turberville, I think I hear right, I do not know: My lord Stafford asks, when was the last time you spoke with his lordship?

Mr. Tur. It was in November, 1675.

L. Staff. I have very much to say against his evidence; but I hope your lordships will not think him any evidence at all against me, or any body else. But I desire your judgment, whether I be not within the compass of the time limited by the statute.

Serj. Mayn. Express yourself, my lord, for we do not understand you.

L. Staff. I cannot say more than I do: The time which the statute limits, is six months, but this is five years; I desire this statute may be read.

L. H. S. What statute, my lord?

L. Staff. The statute of the 13th of this king.

L. H. S. If your lordship pleases you shall have it read: But your lordship does not observe, you are prosecuted and impeached of High-Treason upon the statute of the 25th Edw. 3. not upon the statute of the 13th of this king, made for the safety of the king's person, which limits the prosecution of some offences to be within six months; but the prosecution for treason may be at any time.

L. Staff. Does your lordship say it may be at any time?

L. H. S. Yes, my lord.

L. Staff. This truly does very much surprise me, though I am wholly ignorant in matters of law. My lords, I have ever heard that no man can be prosecuted by that statute, but within so many days, in one part of it in thirty days, in another six months; and I desire your lordships that the statute may be read.

L. H. S. If your lordships please the statute shall be read; if your lordship desires the clause of the statute of the 13th of this king, which limits the prosecution to be within six months, that shall be read. But I conceive your lordship is not accused upon that statute.

L. Staff. I beseech your lordships I may know whether I am prosecuted upon the statute of the 13th of this king, or upon what other statute.

L. H. S. What say the worthy gentlemen of the House of Commons: Is my lord prosecuted upon the statute of the 13th of this king?

Serj. Maynard. Not at all, my lord; he is not prosecuted upon that statute, but upon the common law, and the 25th of Edw. 3. which was only declarative of the common law.

L. Staff. This is a point of law.

Sir W. Jones. What is the point of law?

L. Staff. Whether I can be prosecuted after so many days.

L. H. S. The law is very clear. If you were prosecuted upon the 13th of this king for any less offence than treason, you could not be prosecuted after six months; but if you be prosecuted for treason either upon the 25th of Edw. 3. or the 13th of Car. 2. there is no time limited, and God forbid there should.

L. Staff. I beseech your lordships judgment whether there be not a statute, I think it is in the reign of Edward 6. that sets the time, after which no man shall be prosecuted for any thing of treason. I desire a quarter of an hour's time to look into the statute.

L. H. S. What say you, gentlemen?

L. Staff. Pray my lord, let me read the statute of Edward 6.

Serj. Maynard. We know not of any such statute.

L. Staff. I will not say there is, but I will say I cannot read if there be not.

L. H. S. Pray, gentlemen of the House of Commons, my lord does suppose he has some kind of objection in law to make, which he cannot make out of himself; will it be amiss to let his counsel make and propose the question for him?

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we rather would have my lord propose the objection; for your lordships know till a matter of law is proposed, he cannot be admitted to have counsel. If he desires time to recollect himself about the objection, we can't oppose it. But we desire that he may propose the objection; and after, if it be any doubt in matter of law, your lordships will assign him counsel to be heard to speak to it.

Sir F. Win. This would be a way for a prisoner to have the advantage of counsel, when they ought not to be allowed it; for it is but to say, he hath some doubt which he cannot propose himself, and so let in his counsel to make objections for him. If any question of law do arise, and that question is stated, you will allow the prisoner counsel to argue it: But at this rate he may make the like pretences in every part of his defence, and so obtain that counsel shall manage his whole defence for him.

L. H. S. I suppose my lord does intend an objection as to the time of the prosecution, but he does not know how to make it. He supposes, he is prosecuted after the six months, which he thinks is the time limited for the prosecution. But I pray, my lord Stafford, will your lordship take time to recollect yourself, and make an objection fit for counsel to be heard upon, and you shall have it.

L. Staff. I beseech you I may have the statute-book with me, for I have none myself, my lord.

Sir W. Jones. With all our hearts, we do not oppose it.

Then my lord withdrew into the room provided for him, and within a quarter of an hour returned.

L. H. S. Say, my lord.

L. Staff. My lords, I do confess I have been very much mistaken ever since I was first committed to the Tower: For I did conceive that they would have proceeded, as I thought I was impeached, upon the statute of the 13th of this king. I humbly desire your lordships judgment, whether I ought or no to be prosecuted upon that statute?

L. H. S. The gentlemen have told you already: They prosecuted you upon the statute of 25 Ed. 3. and upon the common law.

L. Staff. And they lay aside that statute.

L. H. S. What statute?

L. Staff. The 13th of this king.

L. H. S. What say you, gentlemen, once more?

Sir Fr. Win. My lords, we have declared already to his lordship; and if my lord had looked well upon the Articles of Impeachment, he could not have put that question, but would have found himself impeached for treason at the common law, declared by the 25th Edw. 3.

Ld. Staff. So then they lay that aside of the 13th of this king?

Serjeant Maynard. We do not mention any statute, but we mention the crime; and that crime is against the common law, declared by the statute, to wit, the attempting the king's death, and the subversion of the government.

Ld. Staff. My lords, there is no doubt but the attempting the king's death is a great and heinous crime; but, my lords, I do not find that in the Impeachment, there is any overt-act at all. And whether I shall answer to a treason not proved by any overt-act sworn by two witnesses, I submit to your lordships. But, my lord, because your lordships and the House of Commons may not think that I propose these things out of a desire of delay: if your lordships please, it may be saved to me, with all other points of law; I will go on to my proofs.

L. H. S. Yes, all these things shall be saved to you; pray let us hear your evidence.

Ld. Staff. Since your lordships have granted me that, be pleased to give me leave to go to my evidence; and I begin with Stephen Dugdale.

L. H. S. Set up Dugdale.

Ld. Staff. Will your lordships please I may have pen, ink, and paper?

L. H. S. By all means, my lord. [Which was given him.]

Ld. Staff. May it please your lordships, Stephen Dugdale said, if I understand him right (and I ask him again), that he knew something of the plot 15 or 16 years ago.

L. H. S. What say you, Mr. Dugdale, you hear the question? Did not you say you knew of the plot 15 or 16 years ago?

Dugdale. I did say it, and did explain my meaning in it. I did say there was among us such a preparation to be made against the king's death, of arms and money, that neither should be wanting.

Ld. Staff. I beseech your lordship to ask what proportion of arms was to be provided.

L. H. S. What proportion of arms was to be provided?

Dugdale. I never heard it nominated how many absolutely. I have heard of some numbers. I heard of late of 30,000 that were to be raised beyond sea: What the whole number in England was, I have forgot; but I think I have heard Mr. Gavan, and some of the priests say, That if there was occasion they should have at least 300,000 to assist them, that was of men; and I suppose they had arms as well as men.

Ld. Staff. My lords, if this were true which he says Mr. Gavan said, that they were 300,000, I desire to know what men he meant, what religion they must be of.

L. H. S. What religion were they of that were to come in and help?

Dugdale. He did not name them at that time; but I understood them, and so I apprehend the company would, that they were Roman catholics.

Ld. Staff. It is a strange thing that there should be 300,000 catholics raised, when there are not 30,000 in England that can bear arms.

L. H. S. Good my lord, they might come from beyond sea, and so they might be so many Roman Catholics, though there were not so many in England.

Serjeant Meyns. And he says not they were Roman Catholics, but he heard so.

Mr. Trosby. There might be so many Roman Catholics, and such as should be with them.

Ld. Staff. Did he hear 15 or 16 years ago that I was to be among them?

L. H. S. Answer that question: Did you hear then that my lord Stafford was to be one among them?

Dugdale. I cannot remember that I did, my lord.

Ld. Staff. Then, my Lords, I make this use of it: He tells you of a plot 16 years ago, that 300,000 men in arms were ready against the king's death—

Dugdale. I did not say so, my lords, I desire understood aright—

Ld. Staff. You say you heard so.

Dugdale. I speak as to the number of men, what I heard at the consults and meetings within these two years.

Ld. Staff. But I speak of 16 years ago, what number of men was there to be raised?

Dugdale. My lords, it was a general word that was amongst us, That we must be provided against that time, against the death of the king, but no number at all.

L. Staff. This my Lords, under the favour, I conceive does not concern me. He tells you there was such a thing; it might be so, or it might not be so; I am not concerned in it, then it is out of doors as to what concerns me, I conceive; if the gentlemen conceive otherwise, they will say so. Then my lords, the next thing is, How long ago it is since I first spake to him about this Plot? And I beseech your lordship he may mention time and place.

L. H. S. You hear the question, Mr. Dugdale.

Dugd. The first time, to my best remembrance—

L. Staff. I beseech you, my lords, let us have no remembrance, but let him swear positively.

L. H. S. There is no mortal man can swear otherwise than according to his remembrance.

L. Staff. When a man's life and honour, and all he hath is at stake, and indeed in consequence, every man in England is concerned, if they swear not positively, but still say, As I remember; who can make a defence?

L. H. S. Mr. Dugdale, Go on, and say, as near as you can, and be as particular as you can upon your oath.

Dugd. That which I can positively affirm, is, It was about August or September 1678.

L. Staff. He said, yesterday it was in the latter end of August, or the beginning of September, which are two months. I beseech you what does he mean by the latter end of August? How long before the end of August?

L. H. S. How long was it before the last day in August?

Dugd. My lords, I will not be positive; but it was either in one month or the other: I did not keep a Diary, or else I would give your lordships satisfaction.

L. Staff. I beseech your lordships he may positively say, whether in August, or not in August; or whether in September, or not in September.

Dugd. I dare not venture to swear that, I dare not do it.

L. Staff. Then saving my exceptions to the uncertainty of that afterwards, I would ask him, what day was it in September that I spoke to him.

Dugd. I remember one was either the 20th or 21st of September, 1678.

L. Staff. My lords, he says the 20th or 21st; does he say that was the first time he spoke with me?

Sir J. Trevor. No, no.

L. Staff. I beseech you, my lords, they may not answer the questions, but the witnesses; they cry, no, no.

L. H. S. My lord, you shall certainly have an answer to all the questions you will ask.

L. Staff. But when I ask, they answer for them; I would know whether that is the course or no?

L. H. S. Do not disquiet yourself for any thing that is said about you; you shall have a fair hearing.

L. Staff. But, my lords, I cannot but be disquieted when I hear these learned gentlemen make answers to my questions for the witnesses.

L. H. S. Mr. Dugdale, was the 20th or the 21st of September, you speak of, the first time that you spoke to my lord Stafford.

Dugd. No, my lords, it was not.

L. Staff. Pray, my lords, what day was it then I spoke first to him?

L. H. S. What was the day you first spoke to my lord?

Dugd. Truly, my lords, I cannot remember so well as to tell you.

L. H. S. Do you remember when my lord came to Tixall?

Dugd. I remember one Sunday in particular; but I cannot tell what day of the month it was.

L. H. S. Do you remember my lord Stafford at Tixall, in company with my lord Aston and Father Evers?—Dugd. Yes, I do.

L. H. S. Do you remember that any discourse passed between them?

Dugd. Yes, I do.

L. H. S. Was that before or after the 21st of September.

Dugd. Both before and after.

L. Staff. My lords, He says there was a consult at Tixall, where such and such were present, and the king's death determined; I ask when was that?

Dugd. That was in September, I cannot say positively the day; but in September, or the latter end of August.

L. Staff. My lords, I must acquiesce and submit to your lordships to do what you please; but if he does not name times nor places, how can I make my defence? I desire he may say positively within five days of the one or of the other; and, my lords, I will put it upon that, if he say five days before the end of August, or five days in the beginning of September, which one would think is space enough, that is ten days time.

L. H. S. My lords, do observe how far Mr. Dugdale goes, and that he is no further positive than he does express himself.

L. Staff. I beseech your lordships, I press this, because, it concerns me very much, that he may be positive within five days or under.

L. H. S. Can you remember whether it were within five days of the one or of the other?

Dugd. Truly, my lords, I cannot be positive; if I had not made a particular remark upon that of the 20th or the 21st, I could not have remembered that; for I did not then intend to reveal the plot, or else I could have given you satisfaction in that.

L. H. S. My lord, your lordship hath an answer to it; he cannot speak more positively to it than he does.

L. Staff. I beseech you, then, how is it possible I can make my defence?

Dugd. My lords, I kept no Journal; if I had, I would be more positive.

L. Staff. He says it was the latter end of August, or the beginning of September; I desire he will say, whether it was the last week in August, or the first week in September?

L. H. S. He answers he cannot tell; your lordship must make what advantage you can of that answer.

L. Staff. I can make no advantage of it, unless he does speak positively to the time. My lords, I beseech you I may know what is the end of August and the beginning of September?

L. H. S. My lord, I hear you not.

L. Staff. If a man says the beginning of June I was at such a place, how many days is the beginning, and how many days the end of a month? How much time will your lordships understand the meaning of that to be? I am concerned extremely in the point of time; for it is that which the whole business depends upon, I mean as to this man.

L. H. S. My lord, go on with your evidence; I know not how to give you an answer, what judgment my lords will make of it, or how much they will understand by it, till they are withdrawn: They observe how much your lordship insists upon it, and will hear what the worthy gentlemen of the House of Commons will answer to it.

L. Staff. My lords, my whole business with this fellow is concerned in a positive answer to this question; I give him, I think, reasonable time to confine himself to.

L. H. S. What say you to the 20th or 21st of September, my lord?

L. Staff. My lords, I shall give a clear answer to that anon; but I am extremely concerned in this, to know whether it was in August or September.

L. H. S. My lord, if your lordship be concerned never so much at that, the witness can swear no more than he can swear. He says about the latter end of August or the beginning of September; will your lordship stand still for that?

L. Staff. Well then, I will go on as well as I can: As for the matter of the 20th or 21st of September, I beseech your lordships I may ask Dugdale one question, Whether at the Trial of sir George Wakeman or the Five Jesuits, he did not say the consult was in August; if he deny it, I shall prove it.

L. H. S. Mr. Dugdale, My lord asks, whether at the trial of Wakeman, or the Five Jesuits, you did not say it was in August?

Dugd. My lords, I did name there was a consult at Boscobel in August, but I do not remember that I did name my lord Stafford in any consult in August positively; but, as I say now, the latter end of August, or the beginning of September. But I did name that there was a consult at Boscobel in August 1678.

L. Staff. My lords, He did say I was at the consult in August.

Dugd. I did not say my lord Stafford was there, I do not charge him in it; and if any such thing was printed, I have wrong done me.

L. Staff. Then he says he had nothing to do with me till the latter end of August, or the beginning of September. My lords, I beseech your lordships to ask him, whether in sir George Wakeman's trial he did not say, he was to receive orders from me in June or July, when I came into the country.

L. H. S. Did not you say at sir George Wakeman's trial, that you were to receive orders from my lord Stafford in June or July, when he came into the country?

Dugd. My lord, I submit to your lordship, and the rest of my lords here, whether when that question was asked by my lord Stafford, I did not say, That the first time I entered into correspondency with the Consulters, they told me, my lord was to come down then, and I should receive orders from him. I had heard of my lord Stafford before, but not to enter into any consults with him, till he came down the latter end of that summer.

L. Staff. I beseech your lordships pardon me; I desire him to answer positively, whether at the trial of sir George Wakeman, he did not say he was to receive orders from me in June or July, when I came into the country.

L. H. S. Did you say so at sir George Wakeman's trial?

Dugd. I believe I did say so; for I had it from others, and not my lord Stafford himself.

L. Staff. My lords, in June or July I was not in the country.

L. H. S. He says you were to come down, that you did come down.

L. Staff. If you will let him do thus, there is no man safe: I shall begin the tragedy, and millions will follow. He swore at the trial of sir George Wakeman, or that of those other persons, That there was a consult at my lord Aston's at Tixall, where I was one, in August.

Dugd. My lords, I did not swear so; but in August or September, or one of them, as now I swear.

L. Staff. I shall prove it by the book, and witnesses that were there.

Dugd. Then they did me wrong by printing it; for I never said of your lordship otherwise than I do now.

L. Staff. I desire my witnesses may be called to prove it, for I conceive it is very material. My lords, does he deny it?

Dugd. I do say there was a consult at Tixall in August; but I did not charge your lordship positively to be there then, nor with any more than I do now.

L. Staff. I think you did, and I have witnesses to prove it. And it is impossible for any man living to defend himself, if persons shall swear as they suppose, think, or remember. I tell your lordships I was not there all the month of August.

L. H. S. Does your lordship intend to call any witnesses?

L. Staff. My Lords, I thought I had more witnesses than I have. But I have two here, if your lordships will hear them, that he did swear I was at Tixall in August.

L. H. S. Who are they?

L. Staff. My daughter Winchester, for one, and a lady that is my kinswoman for another.

L. H. S. Let them stand up, they are not to be sworn. You do not except against them, gentlemen?

Sir W. Jones. No, let him prove what he can.

L. Marchioness of Winchester. He did swear that he was to receive his orders from——

L. H. S. Madam, your ladyship is not upon your oath; but you are under all the obligations of truth and honour in the world.

L. March. Winch. My lords, by the grace of God, I will not speak an untrue word.

Sir W. Jones. We desire to know this lady's name.

L. Staff. It is my daughter Winchester.

L. March. Winch. This Stephen Dugdale did say at the trial of sir George Wakeman, That he was to receive orders from my lord in June or July, when he was to come down; and that my lord was at a consult at Tixall in August.

L. H. S. Did he say positively in August, or in August and September?

L. March. Winch. No, he did not name September.

Dugd. My lords, I might say my lord was to come down then; but not that ever I said he was there, but as now.

L. H. S. But she says you did not name September.

L. Staff. Here is another lady.

Sir W. Jones. Who is she, my lord?

L. Staff. Mrs. Howard, daughter to sir George Blount, and married to Mr. Howard, a kinsman of mine; she is now a widow.

Mrs. Howard. My lords, at the trial of sir George Wakeman, Dugdale was asked to be positive in the month my lord Stafford came down; and he said, he came down in June or July; but he said the consult was in August, wherein my lord Stafford was.

L. H. S. That lady likewise says the same, That you would not be positive as to June or July; but as to August, you were positive that my lord was there.

Dugd. No, my lords, I only said, In August there was a consult; and in June or July my lord was to come down.

Mrs. Howard. I do assure you we came to that trial on purpose to observe every word he said about my lord Stafford, and we have kept it in our memories ever since.

L. H. S. What do you say, Mr. Dugdale, to it?

Dugd. I suppose there was a great many more at that trial than those two worthy ladies; and I suppose some of them may remember I said no more than I do now. I said then, my lord was to come down at that time, and so I said several times, but not positively, that he was there till the end of August, or the beginning of September.

L. Staff. My lords, I do positively aver, here are two witnesses that say, he swore I was there at the consult in August. Now it concerns me to prove that I was not there in August; since he said absolutely I was there in August; and I assure you I can prove I was not there all the whole month. In the beginning of August I come from London, from my own house; on Tuesday or Wednesday the 6th of August, I went to my lord Bellasis's, and that night I went to George Porter's; the next night I went onwards towards Bath; when I was there I went over and staid with my noble lord the marquis of Worcester; there I staid two or three days, and I went thence to another place hard by there; and then I came back again to Bath, and went back again afterwards to my lord's house; and the 1st or 2nd of September, I went from my lord's house to London. Then if this be acknowledged I need say no more; if not, I will prove it by sufficient witnesses: so then I was not there the whole month of August; and the beginning of September he says he spoke with me. I was not there till the 19th of September. Now I beseech your lordships, how that could possibly be the beginning of September. I submit to you, Whether then he be a witness fit to be heard, that shall swear positively what hath no colour of truth in it, I also leave to you. And if they object I was not where I say I was in August, I will prove it. And for the 20th and 21st of September, I do own something of that, and I shall prove to your lordship what it was.

L. H. S. Call what witnesses you please, my lord.

L. Staff. My daughter proves when I went out of town.

L. March. Winch. My lords, it was on a Tuesday my father went to my lord Bellasis's, he dined there, and then went on to George Porter's.

L. Staff. That I was at Bath I shall call witnesses.

L. H. S. My lord, you should prove when you first came to Tixall, my lord Aston's.

L. Staff. Will that satisfy your lordship?

L. H. S. Me! It is not me you are to satisfy, but my Lords, and the gentlemen of the House of Commons.

L. Staff. Then I do owe to your lordships, I came the first time the 19th of September to Tixall.

L. H. S. That was the first day you were there?

L. Staff. That year, my lord, it was.

Sir W. Jones. Prove it.

L. Staff. Does he deny that, my lords?

L. H. S. Do you deny that my lord came first to Tixall the 19th of September, or do you know he was there before?

Dugd. My lords, I have positively spoke to no day, but only to the 21st or 20th of Sept.

L. Staff. Where is my lord marquis of Worcester's servant?

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, it will be best for your lordship to produce all the witnesses you have, and not to leave any thing undone that you can prove.

L. Staff. But I beseech your lordships I may ask one question: If I shall name any of the House of Peers as my witnesses, does that exempt them from being judges?

L. H. S. No, my lord. If your lordship have any witnesses among any of my lords here, they may very well testify for you, and yet remain still in the capacities of your judges; for my lord of Strafford had a great many witnesses that were peers.

Sir J. Trevor. We do not oppose it, my lords.

L. H. S. My lord, call your witnesses.

L. Staff. There is no place appointed for them, and therefore I could not have them ready here; I have sent for them; I have a throng of them.

L. H. S. They will open the way, and we will stay for them.

L. Staff. My lords, I desire, that as yesterday, when the witnesses were sworn against me, mine did not hear what they said, so I desire when my witnesses come, theirs may not be present.

L. H. S. My lord, with your lordship's pardon, it was not well done that your witnesses were not there; but if witnesses be to confront one another, shall they not hear what one another say?

L. Staff. My lords, I am so clear in every thing, I will dispute no little matters.

Then my Lord's Witness stood up.

L. H. S. What is this man's name you call now, my lord?

L. Staff. Indeed, my lord, I don't know.

Witness. My name is Bonny, my lords.

L. H. S. Does your lordship call this man?

L. Staff. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. You are not upon your oath, but you are to look that a strict account will be taken of what you say.

Mr. Foley. My lords, we desire to know where this witness lives?

Bonny. I live in Exeter-Street, by Exeter-Exchange.

L. Staff. I declare it I know him not, but I am told he can witness for me.

L. H. S. Your Christian name?

Bonny. Thomas.

L. H. S. What profession are you of?

Bonny. I live as clerk of the kitchen to my lord marquis of Worcester.

Mr. Foley. What religion are you of?

Bonny. A Protestant, one of the Church of England.

L. Staff. My lords, I humbly move your lordships, when I asked Mr. Smith the 1st day, where he was made a priest? The gentleman said, he was not bound to answer any thing against himself that might make him criminal. I desire that the question may not be put to my witnesses what religion they are of?

L. H. S. The gentlemen will not offer to ask any question that may make a man accuse himself; but my lord, a papist or not a papist is not so penal as a priest or no priest.

Mr. Foley. To acknowledge a man's self a papist, is not to make him a criminal.

L. H. S. What does your lordship call this witness for?

L. Staff. To prove when I was at my lord marquis of Worcester's?

L. H. S. What say you? when was my lord Stafford at my lord marquis of Worcester's?

Bonny. In August 1678.

L. H. S. Do you remember it perfectly?

Bonny. Very well.

L. H. S. What day of August?

Bonny. The 17th of August, which my lord marquis keeps as his wedding-day every year, and the gentlemen of the country are invited thither. My lord Stafford was then at Bath, and my lord marquis was pleased to send his coach for him, to be present there that day; there he staid that day and the next day, and then returned on Monday. And in the same month, the 31st of August, my lord came again from Bath to Badminton, my lord marquis of Worcester's, and upon the Monday after returned for London.

L. H. S. That was the beginning of September?

Bonny. Yes, the 2d he went to London.

L. H. S. Will you ask him, gentlemen, any questions?

Managers. No, my lords.

L. H. S. Call another witness then. (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. What is this man's name?

Witness. Thomas.

L. H. S. Thomas what?

Witness. Thomas White.

L. H. S. Where do you live?

White. I live with my lord marquis of Worcester at Badminton.

L. H. S. What do you say?

White. My lords—

Lord Marquis of Worcester. My lord Steward, I have only this to say, my lord Stafford desired that his witnesses might not be asked what religion they were of; but I desire all my servants may be asked, for I keep none but Protestants.

L. H. S. What religion are you of?

White. A Protestant.

L. Staff. My lords, I did not require it for them, I know my lord keeps none but Protestants; but I asked it for others of my witnesses, that may come, and be startled at it.

L. H. S. What say you, when was my lord Stafford at my lord marquis of Worcester's house?

White. The 17th of August 1678; I fetched him from Bath, being my lord's wedding-day.

L. H. S. You fetched him.

White. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. What place do you serve my lord marquis in?

White. As coachman.

L. H. S. Was he there afterwards?

White. Yes, he was, but I cannot remember the day; only this being a remarkable day, I can remember it.

L. H. S. Did you carry my lord from thence towards London?

White. Yes, I did.

L. H. S. When was that?

White. The second of September, to the best of my remembrance.

L. H. S. Gentlemen, will you ask him any questions.

Managers. No.

L. Staff. I think this is so clear, I shall not need to trouble your lordships further with more witnesses.

L. H. S. Call whom you please, my lord, and as many as you think fit, they shall be heard.

L. Staff. One more then, my lords. (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. Richard Bevan.

L. H. S. Who do you live with?

Bevan. I am groom to my lord marquis of Worcester.

L. H. S. What religion are you of?

Bevan. A Protestant.

L. H. S. Do you remember when my lord Stafford was at the marquis of Worcester's house?

Bevan. Yes, I do.

L. H. S. What time was it?

Bevan. The 17th of August.

L. H. S. Do you remember any other day?

Bevan. No, my lord; but he was there that day.

L. H. S. Will you ask him any questions?

Managers. No, my lords.

L. Staff. My lords, if your lordships please, I desire my lord marquis of Worcester may tell your lordships whether his men have said true or no?

Marq. of Worcester. My lords, I do remember, that my lord Stafford was pleased to do me the honour to come upon my wedding-day from the Bath, and dine with me, as most persons of quality that are of my acquaintance, and happen to be at the Bath at that time, are pleased to do; and as most of the gentlemen of the country, within such a distance, do also. (And that day is the 17th of August). I think he was there once or twice after, from the bath, but I cannot tell precisely the days; but that particular day I remember, because it was my wedding-day.

L. H. S. Can your lordship remember when my lord Stafford went to London?

Marq. of Worcest. Truly I cannot tell that, my lords.

L. H. S. Did you not after that lend my lord your coach?

Marq. of Worcest. Yes, I did, to carry him as far as Sandy-lane, on the road to London; but the particular day I remember not: but one of the persons examined (who was then my clerk of the kitchen) must needs know, because he books every day who is in the house, and therefore I believe what he has said is true.

L. Staff. Stephen Dugdale, I desire, may come again. I conceive I have made it plain to your lordships, that Dugdale did swear, that in August there was a consult at my lord Aston's where I was; and I conceive it is also clear that in August I was not there; and then if it were the beginning of September, that could not be neither; for I came not down to Tixall till the 13th. I beseech you to ask him when I offered him the 500*l.* to kill the king, I think he says it was the 20th or 21st.

L. H. S. What was the time my lord offered you the 500*l.*

Mr. Dugd. It was about that time, the 20th or 21st of September, to my remembrance.

L. Staff. He said positively before, it was one of those two days; I beseech your lordship to ask him where it was.

L. H. S. Where was that offer made?

Mr. Dugd. In my lord's lodging chamber at Tixall.

L. Staff. Then one question more, I desire your lordship to ask him, what day the race was at Etching-hill between sir John Crew's man and Lazingby?

Mr. Dugd. If it please your lordship, I do conceive it was about that time.

L. Staff. I pray he may answer positively, for, if you please, I will tell you how it was. It is very true, the 20th of September this fellow was in my chamber, and I shall trouble your lordships with some little discourse about it, and my reasons why: first, permit me to let you know, that this fellow did serve my lord Aston in the quality of a bailiff. And I never thought him to be an honest man, he was a mean servant, and when the other servants waited but will the second course came in, he staid till the coachman and the groom went to dinner, and eat with them. I profess before God it is true as that the sun shines, I have often and often, I cannot tell how many times, when I have been very dry at my lord's table, and seen him by me, not called for drink; I did detest him as so mean a knave, that I often refused to take drink at his hands: And now for me to offer this fellow 500*l.*—

L. H. S. I think your lordship says he was bailiff to my lord Aston?

L. Staff. But I knew him to be an arrant knave, and a great gamester at races and such things.

L. H. S. My lord, would you have offered 500*l.* to an honest man to kill the king?

Serj. Mayn. You said you never saw him.

L. Staff. I said I had seen him, but now I did not know him by his perriwig.

L. H. S. Did you not know him, my lord?

L. Staff. No, my lords, I profess I did not.

L. H. S. Why, your lordship was agoing to shew that the race at Etching-hill was upon the 20th of September; and your lordship confesses, that he did speak with you on the 20th of September in your chamber; and Dugdale says, this day was the very offer made him of 500*l.* to kill the king. What do you say, Dugdale, were you at the race.

Mr. Dugd. Yes, I was with my lord at the race.

L. H. S. Did my lord speak with you before he went, or after?—Mr. Dugd. Before.

L. H. S. That morning in his chamber?

Mr. Dugd. Yes, it was that very morning, before he went to the race.

L. Staff. I do own, my lord, thus far; he was in my chamber that morning; but, my lord, I can prove what I say to you: My lords, the 20th of September in the morning, I was in my bed, and there comes a servant of mine that hath served me twelve or fourteen years, and he comes in to me, and says, Yonder is Stephen Dugdale, very desirous to go to this race. It seems he says he went along with me to this race.

Mr. Dugd. I say I went either before or after, or when you went to the race, for I was with you at the race.

L. H. S. Whether he went with you or no, is not the point, but whether he was in your chamber at that time.

L. Staff. It is the point; for he said just now, he went with me, as I apprehended him. But I tell your lordships, my servant came and told me, Stephen Dugdale desires that you would ask my lord Aston leave that he may go before to the race; my lord is angry with him already for his meddling in races, and he dare not ask himself. My lords, I was a little concerned in the race, for I had betted some money; and I thought with myself, should I ask my lord Aston leave for him to go, my lord will not deny me, but perhaps will take it ill to be asked, so I was not over-willing to do it. But I bid my servant call him in, and when he came, I asked him some foolish questions about the race, as who he thought would win, and the like; but I told him, I would get leave of my lord for him. My lords, I did go to my lord Aston, and told him, my lord, I am sending my servant before to the place of the race, but I am afraid he does not well know the way, shall Stephen Dugdale go along with him? My lord gave him leave to go. But, my lords, I dressed me, and did not speak one title more to this Dugdale, but he went before, and I was hardly or but just drest when he was gone.

L. H. S. I pray, my lord, was your lordship at no time alone with him in your chamber?

L. Staff. No, never since I was born, never in all my life.

L. H. S. No, my lord?

L. Staff. He says my servants used to come for him, I profess it is all false.

L. H. S. What say you to that, Mr. Dugdale?

Mr. Dugd. My lords, I was in my chamber, and busy when my lord sent for me that morning, and it was either by his page, or one that waits on him in his chamber; I went to my lord, and the page was in the chamber, and he ordered him to go out.

L. Staff. I declare and aver to your lordships he was in the hall, or the next room, and desired to come in.

L. H. S. Where is the page?

L. Staff. This fellow was but a poor boy, found at the door, then he was a thresher, and now a witness for the king.

Then my Lord Stafford's Man stood up.

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. My name is Nicholas Furnese.

L. H. S. Do you remember the day of the race at Etching-hill?

Furnese. Yes, I do, my lords.

L. H. S. Do you remember Dugdale was in your lord's chamber that morning.

Furnese. Yes, I do.

L. H. S. Do you remember whether your lord did bid you go out or no?

Furnese. No, he did not.

L. H. S. Were you there all the while Dugdale was there?

Furnese. Yes, my lords, I was.

L. Staff. Pray, my lords, ask him, whether I sent for Dugdale, or he desired to speak to me?

L. H. S. Did my lord send for Dugdale, or did he come to you to speak to my lord for him?

Furnese. No, Dugdale spoke to me first.

L. H. S. What did he say to you, pray?

Furnese. My lords about eight or nine in the morning, I came to go to my lord's chamber, and I came through my lord Aston's hall; and coming through, I met Mr. Dugdale coming to me, and said, he had one favour to desire of me. He said, he would fain go to the race; but, said he, I do not know how to go, for my lord is very angry with me, and, if I should ask him, he would be worse, for he is displeas'd that I have meddled so far in these matters already; therefore I desire some means may be used that I may go, and I desire that you would speak to my lord to get leave for me to go; for Mr. Fox is there, and hath a great deal of money in his hands, and divers people will give money to bett, and so it will be a great loss and prejudice to me not to go. So I did promise him, my lords, and I went into my lord's chamber, and told him; and when I had spok'd to my lord, my lord bid him come in.

And when he came in, my lord asked him several questions about the race: My lord asked him what hopes he had, for he said a great deal of money was laid by several people; he replied, he could win, but he wanted money to bett: Says my lord, I will bett 20*l.* for Staffordshire sake, though I were sure to lose. And then after some discourse to that purpose, my lord told him, he would speak to his lord. After my lord was dressed, he went out of his chamber, and went to my lord Aston, to ask him leave for Dugdale; and my lord bid me make myself ready to go to the race. About nine or ten I was ready to go, and coming down the back-stairs my lord met me: Go, says he, to Etching-hill, and see what betts there are, and take Stephen Dugdale with you to shew you the way; for I have asked his lord leave for him to go. So Stephen Dugdale went along with me to the stable, and took out his horse; mine was not ready; but I overtook him in half a mile, and it was eleven o'clock e're we were at Ridgely. I asked him some questions about one Mr. Gerard; and I think about twelve we were at the race, and I staid till one with him and Mr. Fox, who was a party concern'd in the race, and there were several betts laid. I was watchful when my lord should come, lest he should want me; so I left them, and went to the room where my lord was to dine; and when I went to my lord, I left him betting. About two, the lords and gentlemen all went to dinner (that were there), and when we had half dined, betwixt two and three, Dugdale came in, and we asked him how the wagers went; he said, he would bett gold to silver, if he had it, but he had betted away all his money, I knew not how much. So there was a gentleman that was servant to my lord Aston, one George Hobson by name, he lent him two guineas and odd money, and I lent him some 40 or 50 shillings out of my own pocket, which I told him, I would not lend, unless he would give it me at the hill again, before the race begun, because I was fearful my lord should go to Stafford again from my lord Aston's that night. About four or five I went up to the race, and demanded my money, and he paid it me before the race begun, and after the race was done, I lost him. My lord went home, and I waited on him. This was about five or six, and about the midway towards my lord Aston's house, he went into the coach, and I got on horseback, and we got home about six or seven, as I suppose. But at night after supper I enquired for Dugdale, how he took his losings, and how he did after it: They told me, he was gone to bed, so I saw him no more that night. The next morning, my lord bid me come betimes, for he would go to Stafford that morning, where we dined, at Mr. Abden's, and from thence took our way to go to my lord's own house.

L. Staff. Now, my lords, if you please to ask this boy, whether I bid him go and call Dugdale to me, and leave him there?

L. H. S. My lord Stafford did bid you, Mr. Furnese, go and dress yourself, and make you ready for the race; did you not leave Dugdale behind you in the chamber when you went to dress yourself?

Furness. No, my lord, Dugdale was gone thence; and my lord was gone too, before me, to my lord Aston's.

L. H. S. I still ask you the question (you are upon an obligation very great, as much as if you were upon your oath), Whether you were in my lord's chamber before Dugdale came in, and staid till after he went out?

L. Staff. And whether I bid him go out or no?

L. H. S. Were you there before Dugdale went in?

Furness. He went along with me in; I conducted him in.

L. H. S. Did you stay all the while Dugdale was there?

Furness. As near as I remember, I staid there all the while.

L. Staff. Ask him positively.

Furness. Yes, my lords, I was there all the while Dugdale staid; but I cannot say positively how long it was.

L. H. S. Mr Dugdale, you are upon your oath; he says he came in along with you, and you went out of the chamber before him, and he was there all the while you were there.

Mr. Dugd. My lords, I am not positive which of my lord's servants it was that came for me; but one it was. But when I came into the chamber to my lord, my lord was getting up, and he charged them both to go forth, and the room was clear, and I saw nobody.

L. Staff. My lords, ask my man.

Furness. My lord never bid me go forth that day, nor any else in my life, when any was in the room.

Mr. Dugd. My lords, if it please your lordships, Mr. Furness was pleased to say, I would bett gold to silver; but in that he was mistaken, for the odds were quite six to four against us.

L. H. S. Well, we are not upon the race now, or the wagers laid there. But, gentlemen of the House of Commons, will you ask this man any questions?

Sir William Jones. No, my lords, we have none to ask.

Sir Tho. Lee. We desire to know where he lives now, what countryman he is, and what religion he is of.

L. H. S. Whom do you serve now?

Furness. My lord Stafford.

L. H. S. Do you live with him still?

Furness. Yes, I do, and have done this 14 years.

L. H. S. What countryman are you?

Furness. A Dutch-man.

L. H. S. Where born?

Furness. At Brussels.

Sir F. Winstanley. We would ask him what persuasion or religion he is of?

L. H. S. You may be sure of what answer you shall have.

Furness. I am a Roman Catholic.

L. Staff. That is as good as a Jew.

Mr. Treby. The question is not intended for any harm, not with any purpose to criminate him; it is only in regard of his credit in this matter.

L. H. S. Call another witness, my lord.

L. Staff. Where is George Leigh? (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. How old are you?

Leigh. I am about 15 or 16.

L. Staff. My lords, I believe he is 18 or 19.

Treby. Whose servant is he?

L. Staff. He is my servant; he hath served me 7 or 8 years.

L. H. S. What does your lordship call him for?

L. Staff. To tell you whether I bid my servants to go out when Dugdale came in, and whether ever he saw Dugdale and I alone.

L. H. S. George Leigh, how long have you lived with my lord Stafford?

Leigh. Seven years the 10th of June last.

L. H. S. Why then you were but 9 years old when you came to him?

Leigh. No, my lords, I think I was not.

L. H. S. Do you remember when my lord Stafford was at Tixall?

Leigh. I do not remember the month very well.

L. H. S. Do you remember the time of the race at Etching-Hill?

Leigh. I do not remember the day; but I was at it.

L. H. S. Did Mr. Dugdale come into your lord's chamber that morning?

Leigh. I do not remember he was there that very morning.

L. Staff. Be pleased to ask him whether ever I bid him go out of my chamber when Dugdale was there.

L. H. S. Did you ever see Dugdale any other morning in your lord's chamber?

Leigh. My lords, I think not; I am not certain: He was there one morning, and it was about a race; but I am not certain what race it was, whether it was two boys ran, or two men.

L. H. S. Did your lord bid you go out of his chamber?

Leigh. No, my lords.

L. Staff. Dugdale says I often sent him for him; pray ask him that question.

L. H. S. My lord, this boy does not remember that Dugdale at all was at your chamber that time of the race at Etching-hill; so that it is not material to the thing in question.

L. Staff. Yes, my lords, Dugdale told your lordships yesterday that I sent this boy often for him.

L. H. S. Did ever this boy come for you?

Dugdale. Yes, he hath, I am sure, come to my chamber for me to go to my lord.

L. H. S. Were you sent for by my lord more than once?

Dugdale. Yes, several times.

L. H. S. Before or after the race?

Dugdale. Both before the race, and after the race.

L. H. S. By whom were you sent for?

Dugdale. Sometimes by the gentleman that was last examined, and sometimes by this boy.

L. H. S. Did you ever come from my lord Stafford to bid Dugdale come to him?

Leigh. My lords, I do not remember that ever I did.

L. H. S. It is an hard thing to remember so long.

L. Staff. If ever he came once to me, and was alone with me, I will be content to acknowledge all this to be true. Pray ask the other man if ever I sent him for him.

L. H. S. He did testify before, that he came with him that day to your lordship's chamber.

L. Staff. That day, my lords: But he says, other days I sent for him.

L. H. S. Call Furness again. (Who stood up.) Furness, did my lord Stafford ever send you for Dugdale, either before or after the race?

Furness. Never, my lords, to his chamber.

L. H. S. Did he ever in his life send you to Mr. Dugdale, to speak with him, as you remember?

Furness. Never, my lords.

L. Staff. He was, my lords, such a fellow, I could not endure he should come near me; such an impudent lying fellow.

L. H. S. Have you any more witnesses, my lord?

L. Staff. Yes, a great many.

L. H. S. Call them all, I pray.

L. Staff. My lords, I hope you think I would not be so great and imprudent a fool to employ such a fellow as this, who not long after run away from my lord Aston's.

L. H. S. Who did?

L. Staff. Stephen Dugdale. And for that, if you please, I would call some witnesses.

L. H. S. Call Furness again. (Who stood up.) Did you ever see Dugdale and my lord Stafford together?

Furness. Never in my life.

L. H. S. Why, you saw them together that morning you brought him to the chamber. (Then the Auditory laughed.)

Furness. Never alone.

L. Staff. I did not think I was in a cock-pit, or a play-house. But if your lordships please to let me call my witnesses, to prove that Dugdale ran away from my lord Aston, I shall call for that Thomas Sawyer. (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. Sawyer.

L. H. S. Your christian name?

Witness. Thomas.

L. H. S. Who do you live withal?

Sawyer. My lord Aston.

L. H. S. Where do you live?

Sawyer. At Tixall.

L. H. S. Are you my lord Aston's servant?

Sawyer. Yes.

L. H. S. How long have you been so?

Sawyer. Six years and ever since Michaelmas.

L. H. S. What have you to say?

Sawyer. As to Dugdale's reputation, I have this to say, How that he went from my lord Aston's for debt, and was taken by the watch at Heywood.

L. H. S. When was that?

Sawyer. The latter end of November, or the beginning of December.

L. H. S. What year?

Sawyer. (1678.)

L. H. S. Then the family broke up?

Sawyer. And coming thither, and being taken by the watch, he was brought by the justices to Tixall; and after the justices had been with my lord, their resolution was to carry him to the gaol. So coming to Tixall, where Dugdale was at an ale-house, he desired me to go to my lord, and desire him that he would own him as his servant, for he was so much in debt, that he should else be undone for ever. In the mean time Mr. Philips the parson of the town, had been with my lord, (for Dugdale had desired him to go to him also) and he asking me whither I was going; said I, I am going to my lord from Dugdale to desire him to own him as his servant. Said he, I have been with my lord just now, and he said, he will not own him as his servant; it was his own act and deed. So Mr. Philips and I came back to him, and told him. So he sat down in the chair, and then rose up again, and swore, He would be revenged of my lord Aston, if ever it lay in his power.

L. H. S. You never heard him say he would be revenged of my lord Stafford, did you?

Sawyer. No, of my lord Aston. Then another time, being at Stafford, he owed me 20*l.*, and he was under the serjeant's hands; and then he promised me from time to time he would pay me, and did not keep his word. This was three or four days before he began to peach. He bid me come such a day, and he would pay me part of the money; and when I came thither, he told me that it was reported that he should be a peacher; and that there was a speech, how that he should have 200*l.* for informing that there were fourteen priests in the country: But he takes a glass of drink, and, Thomas, says he, by God, I wish this may be my damnation and my poison, if I know of any plot, or any priests.

L. H. S. Was not he a papist then?

Sawyer. I cannot absolutely tell that, whether he was or no.

L. H. S. Do you know one Father Evers?

Sawyer. My lords, I have seen him.

L. H. S. Hath he never been at Tixall?

Sawyer. Yes, my lords, I have seen him there.

L. H. S. And have not you seen Dugdale in his company?

Sawyer. Yes, I have.

L. H. S. Did not you at Tixall think Dugdale a stout able fellow?

Sawyer. No, he never was accounted to be so.

L. H. S. Then I ask you, if you thought him an honest man, or a rich man?

Sawyer. No, truly, my lords: For I will tell you more than that : My lord Aston employed him to be his bailiff, and receive his rents, and to pay workmen their wages, which he received every Saturday. And my lord Aston did account with him, where he did set his hand to receive the poor workmen's wages according to their bills, when they had not been paid some of them whole years, and half years, and quarters. And they came and cried to my lord, that they were not paid. And thereupon Dugdale did say, that one of them had demanded more of my lord than was his due; for he said he had reckoned such a day with him, and paid him so much money; which man said he was not that day at Tixall: And so he hindered him of part of his money.

L. H. S. Did you ever know that Dugdale did forswear himself?

Sawyer. That I do not know, my lords, I did hear he was concerned in a race, about which there was a trial and a dispute which had won. This I have heard by report.

Sir Fran. Winstington. Speak your own knowledge, not reports.

L. H. S. I ask you, do you remember the day when my lord Stafford came to Tixall?

Sawyer. He came on the 12th day of the month.

L. H. S. What, September?

Sawyer. Yes, the 12th of September.

L. H. S. Did you ever see Dugdale in the company of my lord Stafford, while he was at Tixall?

Sawyer. No, never in the house; but at the race, he hath come into the parlour.

Mr. Treby. You had discourse with Dugdale: You say he took a glass and drank, and wished it might be his poison. Was not Father Evers that time at my lord Aston's?

Sawyer. Not that I know of, my lords.

Mr. Treby. Was he not commonly there?

Sawyer. Yes.

Mr. Treby. If he were, Mr. Dugdale must know it; and how then could he take a glass, and wish it were poison, if he knew where any priest was; since it was apparent he knew where that priest was? It is most improbable Mr. Dugdale should say thus!

Sawyer. My lords, this was three or four days ere he confessed any thing he knew of his knowledge.

Mr. Treby. What persuasion of religion are you?—Sawyer. Of the church of England.

Serj. Mayn. Pray, my lords, ask him one question; he says Dugdale went away from my lord Aston's, was not there a speech of a plot (at that time) that was discovered?

Sawyer. Yes, that I heard.

Sir Fr. Win. My lords, I would ask him one question more: Was there no discourse of the death of a justice of the peace that was said to be killed in London about that time?

Sawyer. To my best remembrance, as I heard, there was.

Mr. Dugd. My lords, if your lordships please that I should call witnesses to confront him now, or afterwards?

Sir W. Jones. Not now; stay till your time comes.

L. Staff. Then call Philips. (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. What is your name, Sir?

Witness. Ralph Philips.

L. H. S. What are you, a clergyman?

Philips. Yes.

L. H. S. Are you beneficed?

Philips. Yes, my lord.

L. H. S. Where?

Philips. At Tixall, my lord.

L. H. S. You are a person that knows the obligation that lies upon you to give a true testimony; what can you say of Mr. Dugdale?

Philips. My lords, I have very little to say concerning Stephen Dugdale as to any thing of the plot, but in reference to what he should relate concerning Mr. Sambidge and me in the narrative which he deposed upon the Trial of sir George Wakeman: he said then he did receive a letter concerning the death of sir E. Godfrey, which was dated the 12th of October as I remember; and that he did communicate the letter to Mr. Sambidge and me immediately the next Tuesday: whereas I will assure you, my lords, I never heard neither by letter nor word of mouth from him nor any other, till it was publicly known.

L. H. S. You did not live in my lord Aston's house, did you?

Philips. No, my lords.

Sir W. Jones. We know not what he says, we desire to understand what he means.

L. H. S. He takes notice that Dugdale at the Trial of sir George Wakeman did depose touching a letter dated the 12th of October, which should come down to Tixall, intimating the death of sir E. Godfrey, and that he did communicate that with the parson of Tixall and another, which parson comes now to say, he did communicate no such matter to him.

Sir W. Jones. We desire to ask him whether he was present at that Trial, and heard him say so?

Philips. I was not present at the Trial, but if the Narrative of the Trial be truth, he did say so.

L. H. S. So then, you only come to disprove what is printed that Dugdale should say.

Philips. Then I leave it to your judgments, whether what he said in the Narrative of that Trial do concur with the truth.

L. Staff. I desire then to ask him whether Dugdale did not run away from my lord Aston's and would have him go to my lord to own him for his servant.

L. H. S. What do you know of Dugdale's running away?

Philips. I knew nothing at all of that, my lords.

L. Staff. Whether he did speak to him to own him for his servant when he was in the justice's hands?

L. H. S. Can you say any thing touching the credit of Dugdale?

Philips. I have nothing to say concerning Dugdale's credit.

L. H. S. Did you know him?

Philips. Yes, ever since I came to Tixall.

L. H. S. How long is that?

Philips. About 14 years.

L. H. S. What reputation had he in the country? Was he looked upon as one that would perjure himself?

Philips. I never knew any thing of that.

L. H. S. Was he thought a stout man?

Philips. He was in good repute, with some, and indifferent with others.

L. H. S. Will you call any more witnesses, my lord?

L. Staff. I would only ask him one question; whether he did go to my lord Aston from Dugdale to know if he would own him for his servant?

L. H. S. What say you, sir; did you?

Philips. Yes my lords, he knows very well I did; he did request me to go to him. My lord Aston I was loth to go to, because I had no familiarity with him, nor interest in him; but he did request and urge me so much, that I did go by much motives and persuasion from him, and I did speak to my lord: so I told him the message I had was from Mr. Dugdale, who would request of my lord that he would own him for his servant; for if he did not, he knew not what to do with himself: but if he did, he might be free from the gaol and from the oaths, and escape the troubles that were upon him. So my lord replied to me, It is his own act and deed, and I have nothing to do with him, and let the justices do what they will with him; which were sir Walter Bagott, and Mr. Kinnersley.

Mr. Foley. We desire to know whether he heard any discourse about a plot at that time or no?

Philips. Truly, my lords, I heard a talk of a Plot, but not at that time.

Mr. Foley. My lords, I desire to know if he took Mr. Dugdale for a person that might be in the plot, if there was any such thing?

Philips. I cannot tell how to answer that, it is a hard question; I am not so intimately acquainted with persons whose secrets are not reposed in me.

L. Staff. The next witness I desire may be (with the leave of the gentlemen of the House of Commons) Sir Walter Bagott; I did desire him to be here.

Sir W. Jones. There he is, we do not oppose it.

L. H. S. Is it your lordships pleasure that sir Walter Bagott be heard in his place?

Lords. Yes.

Sir Walter Bagott.

L. H. S. What would you ask sir Walter, my lord?

L. Staff. My lords, I desire to ask sir Walter Bagott, whether he did not apprehend Dugdale, and upon what account it was?

L. H. S. Sir Walter Bagott, my lord desires to know of you, whether you did apprehend Dugdale, and upon what account?

Sir W. Bagott. My lords, Mr. Dugdale was taken at an unseasonable time of night, and brought me the next morning by the watch, as the other witnesses have told your lordships. And I took him away to Stafford, where there were several other justices of the peace; there were offered him the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, which he took. After the taking of these oaths, we told him, that he was a likely man to know something of the plot, and it was a very proper time for him to discover it to us that were justices; he at that time did deny the knowledge of it; that is all I can say.

L. Staff. I desire sir Walter Bagott may be asked, whether he did not go to my lord Aston to see whether he would own Dugdale for his servant?

L. H. S. Did you ask my lord Aston to own him for his servant?

Sir W. Bagott. Yes, I did: for my lord's house being in the way to Stafford, whither I was going, I called upon him to know if Mr. Dugdale were his servant: he told me he was no servant of his, and he would not receive him: upon which I and another justice of the peace that was with me, took him to Stafford. The occasion of our meeting there, was to summon in the militia, upon an alarm of the papists being risen in Derbyshire.

L. Staff. I make this use of it, my Lords, that my lord Aston would not receive him: and if my lord Aston had known he had been in the plot, and could have discovered him, he would not have disobliged him.

L. H. S. Nay, he says more than that, which you don't hear; he says, when they examined him, they gave him the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and then told him he would do well to discover his knowledge of the Plot, and then he did not know any thing he knew; nay, he denied it.

Mr. Foley. Did he deny the knowing of it?

Sir W. Bagott. Yes he did then.

Sir F. Win. He was not resolved to discover at that time.

Serj. Mayn. We desire sir Walter Bagott may be asked whether he examined him upon his oath or no?

Sir W. Bagott. No, I did not.

Serj. Mayn. But had they then just given him the oaths of allegiance and supremacy?

Sir W. Bagott. Yes, my lords, we gave him those oaths, and those only.

L. Staff. Then Mr. Kinnersley, if you please. (Who stood up.) Be pleased to ask this worthy gentleman what he knows about Dugdale's going from my lord Aston.

L. H. S. First let us know this gentleman.

L. Staff. His name is Kinnersley.

Mr. Kin. What questions would your lordship ask me?

L. Staff. What you know about Dugdale's going from my lord Aston.

L. H. S. Mr. Kinnersley, we must know your christian name:

Kin. Thomas.

L. H. S. Do you know Mr. Dugdale?

Kin. My lords, I was not acquainted with Mr Dugdale till sir Brian Broughton, sir Walter Bagott, and I and others gave him the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, the latter end of November, or the beginning of December; I did not take notice exactly of the time.

L. H. S. What year?

Kin. 1678.

L. H. S. Well sir, go on.

Kin. When he had taken the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, I asked him if he knew any treason or conspiracy against the king, telling him it was a reasonable time to declare it. He told me he knew of none. This is all I know, and all the discourse that I remember, we had with Mr. Dugdale.

Serj. Maya. Pray why did you ask him that question?

Kin. The plot was then newly broken out.

Serj. Maya. Why did you ask him so particularly?

Mr. Treby. Why did you think Mr. Dugdale concerned in it.

Kin. Because we heard he was a papist, and my lord Aston's servant.

L. Staff. Then I desire sir Thomas Whitgrave may be examined. (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. What say you to sir Thomas Whitgrave, my lord?

L. Staff. Will your lordships please to ask sir Tho. Whitgrave whether he did not examine Dugdale about the Plot, and what he said at that time.

Sir Tho. Whitgrave. My lords, I came to Stafford the latter end of November, or the beginning of December, I am not certain which; but I think it was this time two years. The deputy-lieutenants met about the militia of the county. They told me that Mr. Dugdale was in town, and was under an arrest: The occasion of his coming to town was his refusal of the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, which he hath since taken. I proposed to them the sending for him, for I thought this was a fit opportunity to get something of him about the Plot. They seemed to approve of what I said; but withal, I told them it was not good to send for him till the evening late, that the people of the town might not take notice of his coming. At night we did send for him, and the gentlemen desired that I would examine him at the end of the table: so I called him up, and told him, I was sorry he was fallen into that misfortune to be arrested, and that Mr. Mayor had not dealt well with him or us to take that advantage of him; that now he had taken the oaths, I looked upon him as one of us, and would do him any kindness I could. He said, truly, for his part, he was born a protestant, and of protestant parents; and it was his misfortune to fall into the houses of papists, but he never liked their religion. I then told him, sir, you may do yourself a kindness, serve God and oblige your king and country: I am very confident you know of this horrid Plot; pray do not stuff your conscience with any oath of secrecy, but let it come out. Many, I told him, strained their consciences to serve their intetests; but you may clear your conscience, and at the same time promote your true interest. He replied as he hoped to be saved, he knew nothing of it. And this is as much as I know of the matter.

L. H. S. Do you ask him any questions, gentlemen?

Manag. No my lord.

L. Staff. My lords, I shall humbly move your lordships now, that you will please to take notice, this fellow Dugdale, hath endeavoured to persuade people to swear against me falsely, and offered them money for it. In order to the proof of which, I desire your lordships would call John Morral, Samuel Holt, and William Robinson.

(Then Robinson stood up.)

L. Staff. This man I never saw before in my life.

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. Robinson.

L. H. S. What is your christian name?

Robinson. William.

L. H. S. Where do you live?

Robins. In Worcestershire now.

L. H. S. With whom?

Robins. With myself now.

L. H. S. Do you know Dugdale?

Sir F. Wis. We desire he may give you an account of what profession he is of.

Robins. An upholsterer.

Sir F. Wis. How long hath he lived in Worcestershire, and in what place there?

Robins. I have lived half a year in Worcestershire, half a mile beyond Worcester.

Sir F. Wis. And whether he follows that trade or profession, now or no?

Robins. No, I do not follow it now.

Sir F. Wis. What do you live upon, and how?

Robins. I live of myself now.

L. H. S. How is that?

Robins. Of my own money.

Mr. Hampden. We desire to know whether this man was a servant to my lady Gerard, or no.—Robins. Never.

Mr. Hampd. Or to my lord Gerard of Gerard's Brumley?

Robins. Never, not a hired servant, my lords.

Mr. Foley. Were you a volunteer servant, or what were you?

Mr. Treby. Did you work at any time there for my lord or lady Gerard?

Robins. No.

L. H. S. How came you to live there?

Robins. I went over from a cocking out of Cheshire.

L. H. S. How long were you there?

Robins. Three weeks or a month.

L. H. S. What was your employment there?

Robins. Nothing at all: I followed no employment.

Mr. Treby. What kind of servant were you then?

L. H. S. Come, do you know Dugdale?

Robins. Yes.

L. H. S. How long have you known him?

Robins. I have known him about five years.

L. H. S. What say you to him?

Robins. I say, I met Mr. Dugdale about Midsommer was twelve-month, in London, about Charing-Cross, and he carried me to the Harp and Ball, and gave me beer and mum, and such as the house did afford, and treated me; and asked me what made me so dejected and cast down. I told him I was not well; I was poorer than I used to be. He told me again, I should not want any money that he had; and if I would please to be ruled by him, and do what he would have me, he would furnish me with money. And he took his handkerchief out of his pocket, and bid me, if I wanted, take money there. I took none; but told him, I would not meddle nor make with any thing that night. Then he told me he could furnish me with money, and put me in a way to get money, if I would come in as an evidence against my lord Stafford.

L. Staff. Be pleased to ask him, for I never saw the man before, nor heard of him till last week, what he should say against me, and whether he knew me or not?

L. H. S. Did he tell you what you should say against my lord Stafford?

Robin. Nothing at all, my lords.

L. Staff. Did he say any thing or nothing? Or, did he ask whether he knew me or not?

L. H. S. Did you tell him you knew my lord Stafford?

Robin. No, if it please you, I told him I did not know him.

L. H. S. And after you said you did not know him, he offered you money to swear against him, did he?

Robin. Yes, my lords, he did so, to come in as an evidence against him.

L. Staff. Will your lordships please to ask how much money there was in the handkerchief?

L. H. S. How much money was in the handkerchief?

Robin. I believe there might be eight, or nine, or ten pounds.

L. H. S. Did he offer you all the money, or bid you take some?

Robin. He bid me take some.

L. H. S. Did he make any agreement with you for what you should take?

Robin. No, not at all, my lords.

Mr. Foley. Did you see Dugdale any more, or was there an end of it then?

Robin. No, I saw him no more.

L. H. S. Will you ask him any more questions?

Sir W. Jones. We shall have occasion to speak of him (we desire him not to go away) when our time comes.

Then another Witness stood up.

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. John Morrall.

L. H. S. What are you?—Morrall. A barber.

L. H. S. Where do you live?

Morrall. At Ridgeley.

L. H. S. Where is that?

Morrall. In Staffordshire, within six miles of Stafford.

L. H. S. What do you ask him?

L. Staff. Whether Dugdale did not persuade him to swear against some of the Lords in the Tower?

L. H. S. Do you know Dugdale?

Morrall. Yes, my Lords, I have known him 12 or 13 years.

L. H. S. What can you say against him?

Morrall. My Lords, this Mr. Dugdale, the 6th of August last was twelvemonth, sent for me to the White Horse in Ridgeley, and there, when I came to him, he told me I knew as much of the plot as he. I told him I was innocent of the thing. He swore God damn him, that I knew as much as he. Then I told him, if he knew no more than I did, he knew no more than my Lord Mayor's great horse did. Then he took me aside: Come, says he, you are a poor man, and live poorly, I can put you in a way whereby you may live gallantly; I will give you 50*l.* in hand, if so be you will do so and so, and 50*l.* more when the thing is done.

L. H. S. What do you mean by so and so?

Morrall. To swear against Mr. Howard, sir James Symons, and several other gentlemen of the country.

L. H. S. Did he offer you any money to swear against my lord Stafford?

Morrall. No, I did not hear him mention any thing of him.

L. H. S. But he offered you money to swear against Symons and Howard?

Morrall. Yes, my lord; and Herbert Aston, my lord Aston's kinsman.

L. H. S. What were you to swear?

Morrall. That they were at such a meeting at Mr. Herbert Aston's, upon the conspiracy of the plot.

L. H. S. Will you ask him any thing?

Man. No, set him by.

Then another Witness stood up.

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. Samuel Holt.

L. H. S. What profession are you of?

L. Staff. Pray, my Lords, ask him whether Dugdale would persuade him to swear that which he knew not.

L. H. S. What profession are you of?

Holt. A Protestant of the Church of England.

L. H. S. What trade?

Holt. A blacksmith.

L. H. S. Where do you live?

Holt. At Tixall.

L. H. S. Are you my lord Aston's servant?

Holt. No, my Lords.

L. H. S. What say you?

Holt. My Lords, He sent a man and a horse for me to Stafford, to the Star.

L. H. S. Who did?

Holt. Mr. Dugdale did. And there I waited upon him a good while. At length he came and told me he must speak with me privately; so he told me, if I would swear that Walter Moore carried Evers away, he would give me 40*l.* And he bid me not to be afraid to swear, for fear of my lord Aston; for he would hire me on horse, and get me to London, and place me that where I got one shilling I should get five.

L. H. S. Did you know Evers?

Holt. Yes, my lords, I have seen him.

L. H. S. Do you know when he went away from Tixall?

Holt. No, my lords.

L. H. S. What else can you say?

Holt. Nothing else.

L. H. S. Will you ask him any questions, gentlemen?

Man. No.

L. Staff. The next thing I go upon is, that Stephen Dugdale, at the trial of the five Jesuits, swore, that he acquainted Sambidge with the letter about the death of sir Edmundbury Godfrey, the Monday or Tuesday after, which Mr. Sambidge denies. And in order to that, I call Mr. Sambidge; but if your lordships please, I shall first prove that he swore it then. Where is Mr. Lydcott? (Who stood up.) I desire to ask him whether Dugdale did swear at the trial of the five Jesuits, that he acquainted Mr. Sambidge with the letter about the death of sir E. Godfrey.

L. H. S. You, fellow!

Witness. My lord.

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. John Lydcott.

L. H. S. How do you live?

Lydcott. I am a fellow of King's-college, in Cambridge.

L. H. S. What do you come to say?

Lyd. I do not know, my lords, what my lord will ask me.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, before you enter into the examination of this man, we desire to ask him a question or two.

Serj. Mayn. Whose servant are you, or were you lately?

Lyd. I am a fellow of King's-college.

Serj. Mayn. But whom did you serve lately? were you never secretary to a lord?

Lyd. Yes, I was.

Serj. Mayn. To what lord?

Lyd. To my lord Castlemaine, sir.

L. H. S. What religion are you of?

Lyd. Of the Church of England, and always was; nay, I cannot say always, for I was bred upon your oath, and as penal to you: by whose direction did you go?

L. Staff. I ask whether you did not hear Mr. Dugdale swear at the trial of the five Jesuits?

Serj. Mayn. I desire one favour, my lords; my lord Stafford asks questions to lead the witnesses; pray let him ask his questions more generally,

L. H. S. You say you are a Protestant?

Lyd. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. When did you last receive the sacrament?

Lyd. When I was last at Cambridge—No, not so; for it is not above a year ago that I was there.

L. H. S. When did you receive the sacrament?

Lyd. I do not exactly remember, my lords.

L. H. S. My lord, I would be glad to know what is the question your lordship calls him for, that your lordship may not ask the question, but by me.

L. Staff. I desire to know (for my part I know not what his answer will be) whether he did hear, at the trial of the five Jesuits, Dugdale swear he had communicated the news of sir E. Godfrey's death, which was on the Saturday, and on the Tuesday after to any people, and to whom.

L. H. S. Were you at the trial of the five Jesuits?

Lyd. Yes, I was.

L. H. S. Did you hear Dugdale swear there, and give his testimony?

Lyd. Yes, I did.

L. H. S. Do you remember what Dugdale swore then?

Lyd. Very well.

L. H. S. What was it?

Lyd. My lords, Mr. Dugdale spoke of a letter that came down to my lord Aston on the Monday, and he imparted it on Tuesday after, at an alehouse, to one Mr. Sambidge, and Mr. Philips: this was also at sir G. Wakeman's trial, which I took notice of more particularly, because I had occasion to take some notes there.

L. H. S. What use do you make of this, my lord?

L. Staff. If that be allowed to be so, then I will call no more witnesses; otherwise I have more.

L. H. S. Call them all.

L. Staff. Then call Mr. Charles Gifford.

Serj. Mayn. Pray, my lords, give me leave to ask this young scholar one question before he goes. By whose commendation or means did you come into that college?

Lyd. By election from Eton.

Serj. Mayn. Who promoted you?

Lyd. One Mr. Doyley, now senior fellow of King's-college; it was his election.

Sir F. Win. My lords, I would ask him one question. He says he went to take notes; by whose direction did he go to take notes at sir G. Wakeman's trial?

Lyd. It was for my own curiosity.

L. H. S. Friend, it is all one as if you were upon your oath, and as penal to you: by whose direction did you go?

Lyd. It was partly my own curiosity, and partly to see what evidence was against my lord; for my lord Castlemaine thought himself concerned as well as others, and therefore desired me to go.

Sir F. Win. Now it is out.

Sir W. Jones. It was done like a secretary.

L. H. S. Had you ever that curiosity before?

Lyd. Yes, I will assure your lordships, I had a great curiosity to hear it.

L. H. S. Were you at any other trial?

Lyd. Yes, at the five Jesuits trial, and Langhorn's.

Then another witness stood up.

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. Charles Gifford.

Ld. Staff. Ask him whether he did not hear at the trial of the five Jesuits, or sir G. Wakeman, Dugdale say, that he did communicate that letter to some people, I name not who, the Tuesday after.

L. H. S. Were you at the trial of the five Jesuits?

Gifford. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. Did you take notes?

Gifford. Yes, my lords, I was summoned there as an evidence; I had occasion of being there, both at the five Jesuits trial, and Wakeman's, and Langhorn's.

L. H. S. You took notes, you say?

Gifford. Yes, I did.

L. H. S. What do you remember that Mr. Dugdale did then swear?

Gifford. I remember at the five Jesuits Trial, he did swear he received a letter sent to Evers, which he intercepted, and it spoke of the death of a justice of peace; and he returned answer to Evers again, He would be hanged if it did not spoil the business. And he said farther, he could not hold, but went to an alehouse and there he did impart it. But then he did say there was one that could testify and make out what he said: Upon which he called Mr. Chetwyn, who deposed much to the same purpose. And then at sir G. Wakeman's Trial he did positively declare, that he spoke of it at an alehouse to a minister, parson Philips, and my lord Aston's kinsman.

L. H. S. What is his name?

Giff. Mr. Sambidge.

Ld. Staff. Well, my Lords, I have no more to say to him: But I conceive by this it is plain that Dugdale did then say, he had communicated it to Mr. Philips and Mr. Sambidge. I shall call Mr. Sambidge to give you an account.

Mr. Sambidge stood up.

Ld. Staff. Be pleased to ask him whether he did hear Mr. Dugdale say on the Tuesday, that sir E. Godfrey was murdered the Saturday before.

L. H. S. You hear the question, answer it.

Samb. Who must I speak to?

Ld. Staff. He is very deaf, and very old, my Lords.

Then the Black Rod was sent to be near him, to put the question to him.

Black Rod. What would you have him asked, my Lord?

Ld. Staff. Whether Mr. Dugdale did tell him on the Tuesday, that sir E. Godfrey was murdered the Saturday before?

Black Rod. Did Mr. Dugdale tell you of the Tuesday, that sir E. Godfrey was murdered the Saturday before?

Samb. No, my Lords, he never told me any such thing, I take it upon my salvation. I never heard it till Friday or Saturday he was found at Bury-hill.

Ld. Staff. Ask him if he were with Dugdale at the alehouse the Tuesday before.

Samb. Dugdale never spoke any such thing to me.

L. H. S. Were not you with him at the alehouse?

Samb. No.

L. H. S. Not on Monday?

Samb. No.

L. H. S. Nor on Tuesday?

Samb. No.

L. H. S. Nor Wednesday?

Samb. Not as I know of.

Sir W. Jones. We shall prove he was.

Ld. Staff. Pray ask him what reputation Dugdale hath in the country.

Samb. Oh, the wickedest man that ever lived upon the face of the earth! I know great part of it myself; and a hundred and a hundred of people will say as much.

L. H. S. What religion are you of?

Samb. I was never a papist in my life, nor ever a fanatic.

L. H. S. What do you know of Dugdale in particular, that is ill?

Samb. Yes, my Lords, I will tell you; he was a very abusive man, especially to the clergy, and most especially to Mr. Philips, with whom I boarded. My lord Aston that is dead, came and told me of it. Said I, you are misinformed, for this Dugdale is a knave and a rogue, and all the country rings of him for his wickedness. Upon which, he cites me into Litchfield court for defaming him; and he entertains all the proctors, that I could not get one to put in my answer: But before the day came, he discharged the court, and never appeared; for we had that against him that he durst not appear.

L. H. S. What particulars do you know?

Samb. He said the clergy of England was a lewd clergy, and a pack of rogues.

L. H. S. Gentlemen of the House of Commons, will you ask him any questions?

Manag. No.

L. H. S. Hath my lord no more to say to him?

Ld. Staff. No, my Lords.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, go on: Hath your lordship done with Dugdale, or have you any more witnesses?

Ld. Staff. No, my Lords; I have a great deal more to say to him.

L. H. S. Go on then.

Ld. Staff. My Lords, I conceive by this, it is proved to your lordships, that Dugdale did at that trial declare, he had acquainted Mr. Sambidge and Mr. Philips with the letter about the death of sir E. Godfrey, the Tuesday after he was murdered. And I conceive I have proved to your lordships, by their denying it, that he did not tell them so; and so he is forsworn in that. I should now have humbly desired your lordships, that you will please to call William Day; but upon asking the question, I find he is not yet come to town, and so I shall not trouble your lordships with him: I desire that Thomas Sawyer may be called again. Who stood up.

Ld. Staff. Pray be pleased to ask him, whether he did not hear Dugdale wish he might be damned if he knew any thing of the plot.

L. H. S. He said that before.

Ld. Staff. Then I beg your lordships pardon, I shall not call him again.

L. H. S. Go on, my lord.

L. Staff. My lords, there are a great many other witnesses which I could call; but it is to no purpose, and so I shall call no more as to Dugdale. I conceive upon the whole matter, his reputation and credit are gone; for he is forsworn before the justices of peace, in that he said there was no Plot, and wished he might be damned if he knew of any Plot. I conceive it is also proved, that upon the 30th of September, when he says, I did communicate with him about the king's death, he was only then with me upon his own desire, and my servants were by: there was nothing discoursed of but about the foot-race. And likewise, as to what he swore in August, that I was at such a meeting at Tixall, he is forsworn, for I was not there; and so I hope that witness is laid aside; no creature will give any credit to him, neither your lordships nor the House of Commons.

L. H. S. Have you done with Mr. Dugdale?

L. Staff. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. Whom will you proceed against next?

L. Staff. Dr. Oates.

L. H. S. Call Dr. Oates.

L. Staff. Only give me leave to say one thing, my lords, that you were pleased to say, I should have copies of the two depositions of the 24th and 29th of December: and I had one to enquire, but cannot find that of the 29th. (Then Dr. Oates stood up.)

L. H. S. What say you to Dr. Oates, my lord?

L. Staff. This Dr. Oates, if your lordships please, I desire may be asked, when was the first time he ever saw me in his life.

L. H. S. When was the first time, Dr. Oates, you saw my lord Stafford?

Oates. My lords, the first time I saw this gentleman at the bar, was, as near as I remember, at Mr. Fenwick's.

L. H. S. That was in Drury-Lane?

Oates. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. When was that?

Oates. That was, as near as I remember, in June.

L. H. S. Was it that time the commission you spoke of was delivered?

Oates. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. Did you see that commission?

Oates. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. Did you read it?

Oates. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. From whom was it?

Oates. I cannot be positive as to that; but, as near as I remember, it was signed as the rest was signed.

L. H. S. How was that?

Oates. Johannes Paulus Oliva.

L. H. S. You read it?

Oates. Yes, I did, my lords.

L. H. S. It was a commission to be paymaster of the army, was it not?

Oates. Yes, it was.

L. H. S. And it was delivered to my lord?

Oates. Yes, it was.

L. H. S. By the name of Mr. Howard of Eppingham?

Oates. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. What says your lordship to this?

L. Staff. What is it possible for me to say against this? I declare to your lordships, in the presence of God, I never saw the man in my life. I never went by any name, since I had the honour of being a peer, but by the name of Stafford. I never heard of Mr. Fenwick the jesuit, nor by the name of Thompson, till this Plot was discovered and he taken. This you may believe, or not, if you please; but this is as true as I am alive. My lords, I desire I may have out of the Journals the Deposition on which I was committed.

L. H. S. Turn to the Journal.

L. Staff. It was read, as I remember, Friday October 25, 1678.

Then the Clerk turned to the Journal and read,

“ October 25, 1678.

Clerk. “ The lord viscount Stafford acquainted the House, That he was informed that there was a warrant issued out from the lord chief justice of England to apprehend him, which he thought fit to acquaint their lordships with, and submitted himself to their lordships judgment.

“ The Lord Chief Justice being present, was commanded to give the House an account of the business; who said, That last night, about nine o'clock, he received a letter from the Speaker of the House of Commons, dated from the Speaker's chair, to come to the House of Commons about business of great concernment. Accordingly he attended the House of Commons, where the Speaker told him, That the House of Commons had received Accusations of high-treason against five lords, and some gentlemen, and desired him to issue out his warrants for their apprehension. The persons were, the earl of Powis, viscount Stafford, the lord Arundel of Wardour, the lord Petres, and the lord Bellasis. And upon this he issued out his warrants for their apprehension, having taken the Examination of Titus Oates upon oath. That the earl of Powis and the lord Arundel were brought to him this morning in custody; and he advised them to render themselves to the Gatehouse, where now they are.

“ Upon this the Examination of Oates was read, whereby it did appear, that the lord viscount Stafford was charged to be in a conspiracy of treason against the king.

“ The lord viscount Stafford denied the fact, and after this withdrew. And after a while the House was informed that his lordship would render himself to the lord chief justice.”

L. H. S. This is all that is in the Journal.

L. Staff. Then, my lords, if your lordships please to remember, all of you that were there, that I was accused by Dr. Oates, whose depositions I desire to see, taken before my lord chief justice, that he had seen letters of mine written to Fenwick, Harcourt, and some others, three or four jesuits, in which I was consenting to the Plot; that I had sent my son to Lisbon, yet I would be as kind to the jesuits as before, though there was some difference between us. These Affidavits I desire to see, which, as I take it, were read before your lordships that day.

L. H. S. The affidavit was taken by my lord chief justice in the House of Commons, where he did attend them upon their summons: I know not if the original were read in the House of Lords, or the copy; but it seems it is not entered into the Lords Journal; but your lordship had an order to take copies of all things you would have demanded; and if you would not, I cannot tell what to say to it.

L. Staff. Truly I could not take a copy, because I did not know where it was. I desire my lord chief justice may be asked where it is; that is all I desire, and I will then go on.

L. H. S. I think Dr. Oates does say at this time that he had seen letters of your lordship's offering your correspondence and assistance.

L. Staff. If Dr. Oates will own he said no more than is in that affidavit, I am content.

L. H. S. Have you any copy of your own examination, Dr. Oates?

Dr. Oates. Yes, my lords, I think I have it here.

L. H. S. Marry, that is very well; produce it then. Do you oppose it, gentlemen?

Manag. No, we agree; we desire the truth may come out.

Then Dr. Oates looking among his Papers, drew out one, and offered it to the Court.

L. H. S. Is that a true copy of your first examination?

Dr. Oates. My lords, I will not swear it, but it was given me for a true copy.

L. H. S. By whom was it given you?

Dr. Oates. I cannot remember now, it is two years ago.

Sir W. Jones. Unless we know whence it comes, or what authority it hath, we cannot consent it should be read.

L. H. S. Had you it from my lord chief justice, or any servant of his?

Dr. Oates. I cannot tell whether sir Charles Harbord gave it me, or no.

Sir F. Win. My lords, sir Charles Harbord might be of the Committee of Examinations;

VOL. VII.

but the examination for which my lord asked, was not in the committee nor before the House; my lord chief justice retired out of the House, et virtute officii took it. Now it was very fair in Mr. Oates to produce it; but yet in point of evidence, if he will not swear it to be a true copy, or give an account how he came by it, we cannot allow it to be read.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, it is you that want this paper, you desire to have the benefit of the examination that was taken of Mr. Oates, and therefore you must produce a copy of it.

L. Staff. My lords, I could never get it.

L. H. S. It is not entered in our Journal, nor is it to be traced; we know not where it is: You have had time enough to look after it. You are now offered by Oates himself a copy that was given him for a true copy, though he cannot swear by whom. Are you content that shall be read, if the gentlemen will admit it?

L. Staff. By what I guess of Dr. Oates, (I know him not) he would not give in a copy of an examination unless it were true; if it be true, I know not what should hinder the reading of it: But as far as concerns me, I desire it may be read.

L. H. S. You do consent, and will you, gentlemen, permit it?

Serj. Mays. We do not know whence it comes; we cannot admit it unless Oates says it is true.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, it hath been long in the Doctor's possession, he hath read it over, he cannot say it is a true copy; but I desire to ask him whether all in that writing be true, and whether he did swear what is in that writing.

L. H. S. If your lordships please thus, and you gentlemen of the House of Commons, the best way to have an answer to this question is, that it may be read de bene esse.

Sir F. Win. Pray, my lords, let him read it over to himself privately, and then let us know whether he can swear the same things that are in that paper.

(Which Dr. Oates began to do.)

Dr. Oates. Your lordships ask only as to my lord Stafford?

L. H. S. My lord desires no more; but pray read it over all, and give your answer to all; for that question, may be, will be asked in other cases, and it is fit you should be provided for it. (Which he did.)

L. H. S. What say you, Doctor?

Oates. My lords, I do verily believe I did swear the contents of that paper.

L. Staff. My lords, I do not oppose the reading of that paper; but I have here a copy of something in the Journal, and do not stand upon my memory; but I think upon the viewing of it now, there is something in the copies of the Journal.

Clerks. We cannot find it.

L. Staff. Then read this paper.

L. H. S. Will you have this copy of the examination read, or not?

L. Staff. Yes, my lords.

Clerk. "The Examination of Titus Oates clerk, taken before us"—

L. H. S. When was that?

Clerk. The 24th of October, 1678.

L. H. S. That was read the 25th, the next day, in the House of Lords.

"The Examination of TITUS OATES, clerk, taken by us this 24th of October, 1678.

This Examinant saith, That in the month of May last, this examinant saw a patent under the seal of the father-general of the society of Jesus at Rome, called Johannes Paulus Oliva, at the chamber of Mr. Langhorn, wherein it was expressed, That by virtue of a Breve from the Pope, he did constitute the lord Arundel of Wardour Lord High Chancellor of England, which patent was sent to the lord Arundel of Wardour by a messenger, who was the son of Mr. Langhorn. And this examinant saith, That he saw a letter subscribed by the lord Arundel of Wardour, as he believes, wherein the lord Arundel did acknowledge the receipt of the said patent, and accepted of the same, and promised to answer the expectation of the society.

This examinant saith, That in June last he saw the like patent, wherein the lord Powis was constituted Lord Treasurer of England, which patent was carried by one Parsons, secretary to the lord Powis, from one Sanders's house in Wild Street, to be delivered to the lord Powis; and at the delivery of the patent 300*l.* was paid by Parsons to Fenwick and Ireland, to carry on the design of the Jesuits, which was to raise a rebellion in the three kingdoms, and to destroy the king.

In the month of July this Examinant saw a letter subscribed Powis, and directed to Fenwick, wherein his lordship did acknowledge the receipt of the said patent, and did accept of the same, and said he had three hundred men and horse ready for the design, and that his lordship would venture his life and fortune in the affair.

In the month of August last this examinant saw a letter directed to Mr. Langhorn by the outside, but within to the Society of the Jesuits, wherein sir W. Godolphin acknowledged he had received the like patent to be Lord Privy Seal, and had accepted thereof; and in July 1677, this examinant saw the same in the hands of the archbishop of Tuam, at Madrid in Spain.

This Examinant saith, That in July last Mr. Coleman acknowledged and confessed to Fenwick, in this Examinant's presence, that he had received the like patent to be secretary of state, and that it was a good exchange.

This Examinant saith, That in May, June, July, and August last, this Examinant saw several letters signed Stafford, whereby it appeared that the lord Stafford was in this conspiracy against his majesty, and that he had returned several sums of money to the Jesuits to carry on the design; the letters were directed to Fenwick and Ireland; and in August last this Examinant saw another letter, directed to the same persons, signed Stafford, wherein my lord writ, that although he had sent his son to Lisbon, yet he would be never the worse friend to the Jesuits; and this examinant conceiveth the reason of that letter was, because there was then a difference between the English college at Lisbon and the Jesuits. In July last this Examinant saw in the hands of Fenwick, a commission directed to the lord Bellasis, from the person aforesaid, to be lord general of the army to be raised in England against his majesty; and in July this examinant saw a letter from my lord, directed to Fenwick, wherein his lordship acknowledged the receipt of the commission, and thanked the society for the same, and that he accepted the same, and would do what in him lay to answer their expectations.

In May last this Examinant saw a patent in the hands of Mr. Langhorn, to make my lord Petres lieutenant general of the army; and in June last this Examinant did hear my lord Petres, in the presence of Mr. Langworth his confessor, acknowledge the receipt of the same, and that he accepted thereof, and his confessor wished him much joy thereof."

L. Staff. My lords, If this be owned for truth that he swore, then I proceed upon the evidence of that.

L. H. S. Without allowing it to be a true copy, Dr. Oates at the bar does swear what is said there is true.

L. Staff. Then he says there, he saw letters signed by me to Fenwick and others: I do humbly desire to know whether that be evidence or no, that a man says he saw letters, and does not say he knew them to be my hand, nor what the letters were in particular; nothing that he did prove of it. I must appeal to your lordships, to all my lords, to my Lord High-Steward, and the rest that were of the council at that time, Whether Dr. Oates did not positively name some, and left me out at the council-table? And whether Dr. Oates did not say there was no lord concerned in the Plot, and whether some of my lords did not say so, and told some other lords of it, from whom I had it? And in order to this, I desire sir Philip Lloyd may be examined; and if he did not know of my being in it, then he hath since forsworn himself.

L. H. S. My lord, I know not where you are, nor what you are about: Are you objecting against Oates upon any evidence out of the Journal?

L. Staff. My lords, I go upon this that hath been read.

L. H. S. Pray, my lord, produce your witnesses that did hear him say any thing, and take your advantage of it.

L. Staff. I call sir Philip Lloyd.

L. H. S. Where is sir Philip Lloyd?

L. Staff. My lords, I do not know; I think he is here, I hope he will come.

[Then he appeared amongst the Members of the House of Commons, and was called to the bar amongst the other Witnesses, and stood up.]

L. H. S. What does your lordship ask sir Philip Lloyd?

L. Staff. Whether he was not by when Dr. Oates was asked, if there were any lords concerned in the Plot, and he said, No; and whether he did not tell me so a day or two before I was committed, in the Prince's lodgings?

L. H. S. What say you, sir Philip Lloyd, did you ever hear Dr. Oates deny upon his oath, that ever he heard of any lords that were concerned in the Plot?

Sir P. Lloyd. My lords, truly I cannot remember any such thing: If my lord put me in mind of any particular circumstance or time, I may recollect it; I must confess I think I have heard such a thing rumoured; but I am so unfortunate I cannot remember anything positively of it.

L. Staff. He did tell me so, I am sure.

Sir P. Lloyd. Truly, my lords, I would be glad to remember any thing to justify the truth; but I cannot remember this.

L. Staff. But whether it were so or no, your lordships that were of the council can tell.

L. H. S. My lord, I do not know. Your lordship cannot be refused, if you press it, to ask any of the lords of the council, if they remember any such thing that did pass there; but if I were there or in the council, I deal plainly with your lordship, I cannot say that there was any such thing said.

L. Staff. If there be any here that were there besides, I desire they may be asked.

L. H. S. If your lordship will call upon any other of my lords that were there, they will tell you.

L. Staff. I do not know who were there, I cannot call them.

L. H. S. You may ask any of the lords of the council, who were there that time Dr. Oates was examined.

Marq. of Worcester. My lords, I was not at the council then; but I heard it, not there indeed, but as a general report abroad.

L. Staff. I desire my Lord Privy-Seal may tell what he knows of it.

Lord Privy-Seal. What is it your lordship would know of me?

L. Staff. Whether Oates did not say he had no more to accuse?

L. Privy-Seal. Where, my lord?

L. Staff. At the Council-Table.

L. Privy-Seal. It is a very hard thing for me to charge my memory with all the questions at an examination; we use to refer to the examinations themselves: I have seen some examinations, I wish all were so, wherein the questions are put down as well as the answer; and I cannot charge my memory that he said he had no more to accuse.

L. Staff. I desire, then, all the lords of the council that are here to say, whether or no he was not asked this question particularly by my Lord Chancellor, (and I desire particularly his lordship would say whether he cannot remember it) Whether he had any thing to say against some lords? And he answered, They were to know of it, but God forbid he should accuse them.

L. H. S. When should that be?

L. Staff. My lords, I cannot say the day, for I was not in town. But I desire to ask, whether you did not ask him upon the first discovery of the Plot, whether he had any thing to say against some lords?

L. H. S. Do you desire to know whether I asked him this question, If he had any thing to say against some lords?

L. Staff. I do not say positively your lordship, but whether that question was not asked him?

L. H. S. Certainly I should never ask any such question of any man alive. I might ask in general of any lord, but not of some.

L. Staff. Some or other lords it was.

L. H. S. I do not remember it; and it is impossible for any man living to remember what questions he did ask two or three years ago upon an examination.

L. Staff. I desire I may have leave to ask the earl of Berkley a question.

L. H. S. What is it you would ask him?

L. Staff. My lords, I humbly ask his lordship, whether he did not hear Dr. Oates say, after he had accused some persons before the council, that he had no more to accuse?

E. of Berkley. My lords, I had the honour to be of the privy-council about the time of the discovery of the Plot; but I do not remember that I heard Dr. Oates say any such thing there.

L. Staff. Or in the House of Lords; for I may mistake. And therefore I desire my lord of Berkley would declare what he heard Dr. Oates say before the House of Lords.

E. of Berkley. Yes, my lords; in the Lords House I will tell your lordships what I remember. My Lord Chancellor, to the best of my remembrance, did ask Dr. Oates, at the bar of the House, this question—My lords desire to know, if you can accuse any other person or persons, of what quality soever, and you are encouraged by their lordships to accuse them: His answer was—My lords, I have no more to accuse in relation to England, but in relation to Ireland I have.

L. H. S. That was after he had accused your lordship, my lord Stafford.

Sir W. Jones. We pray, my lords, we may have the favour to ask that very honourable lord, at what time, Dr. Oates said this, for the satisfaction of those that are present.

Earl of Berkley. My lords, It was after Dr. Oates had accused my lord Stafford, but before he had accused the queen.

L. Staff. I beseech you, my Lords, to mark it, (and I am very glad of it) he said he had no more to accuse in relation to England, and yet after that he accused the queen.

L. H. S. My lord, Then the best account of it will be on the journal; the question and answer is entered there.

October 31, 1678, p. 22.

“Titus Oates being at the bar, is directed to proceed in giving an account of the commissions given to several lords and other persons for offices civil and military. Upon which he proceeded in a particular Narrative thereof, with some circumstances tending to make out the truth thereof, and was then commanded to withdraw, but stay without. Then upon consideration had hereof, the lord chancellor, by directions of the House, caused him to be called in again, and told him, that the Lords expect not his entering into particular circumstances, but if there be particular persons concerned, of what quality soever they be, the House expected he should name them: but he named none but those he had mentioned in his Narrative, nor could name no other person."

L. Staff. Then my lords, he said, he knew no persons more than he had discovered; and after, did he not accuse the queen, and several others? If he said true, then he knew no body more; if not, he is forsworn.

Sir W. Jones. Pray prove he did accuse the queen.

L. Staff. He did so in the council, and he is clearly perjured in that, and so not to be believed. And I say besides, after that Dr. Oates had consulted with himself, and possibly with some others, what his Narrative should be, and what he should accuse persons of and did only accuse me of seeing some letters signed Stafford, and now he comes to give evidence, he knows more of my having a commission. After this rate, it may be he may know a great deal more to-morrow, when he hath invented it; And it is a great sign he did not know of any more, if he did know of that; for I never had any correspondence with the Jesuits, nor any business transacted with them these 24 or 25 years. Indeed at Ghent the English Jesuits were desired to do a little thing for me, and they refused it me; it was to send over a man that was to be a witness in a suit I had beyond sea: And I never writ one letter to a Jesuit since, nor he to me, that I know of, nor never had to do with them, that I know of. I never heard of Fenwick's name, nor Harcourt's till I heard of the Plot; nor of Johnson nor Thompson, Jesuits: And if any can prove it, I will acknowledge myself guilty of all that is said against me. And for that Dr. Oates at first said, he only saw letters of mine, and after comes and accuses me of a commission, I appeal to your lordships if there can be any truth or belief in him. I cannot say more than what I have said already, and I do challenge Dr. Oates, at the day of judgment, to say, if ever he saw me in his life till I was committed; or if I did ever go by any name but that of Stafford, I will be content to die immediately. If I had gone by the name of Howard, I need not be ashamed of it: for it is a name good enough to be owned. I know there is a worthy gentleman that bears the name of Howard of Effingham, but I never did. If your lordships please to let me ask Mr. Dugdale one question.

L. H. S. Call Dugdale again. (Who appeared) What say you to him, my lord?

L. Staff. I desire to ask Dugdale whether he did not, in his Depositions before Mr. Lane and Mr. Vernon, swear, that the 20th of October I offered him 500*l.* to kill the king?

Dugd. No, September.

L. Staff. Ay, September.

Dugd. Yes, I think I did make that Deposition before captain Lane. I am certain I did that my lord Stafford the 20th or 21st of September offered me 500*l.*

L. Staff. Then did he not say presently upon this, he went to Mr. Evers's chamber?

L. H. S. He says so now.

Dugd. My lords, I am not certain it was the same day; it was as soon as I could have opportunity, it was presently after.

L. Staff. Did he not say he told Evers what I said to him, and he did not understand the meaning of it?

Dugd. I did say so to Mr. Evers: I did ask Mr. Evers what my lord Stafford's meaning was, whether his intention was true or no, to do as he said, and whether my lord was in that condition, as to be able to perform his promise; for I feared payment of the money; and he told me, Harcourt and the rest of the Jesuits would furnish it.

L. H. S. So he said yesterday.

L. Staff. Then ask him if he did not say, the beginning of September I met him at Tixall, and I spake to him about such a business.

Dugd. My lords, I did say, to the best of my remembrance, it was about that time, the latter end of August, or the beginning of September, I would not be positive, nor could not, to five days.

L. Staff. No, I think not to 5,000. Then I asked him this question, whether he did not presently upon that, when I told him about the design, go to Mr. Evers, and asked what it meant.

L. H. S. He said so but now, he went to Evers and asked what you meant.

L. Staff. I beseech you I may be understood whether he did not say in the beginning of September, which was before the 20th or 21st, in the Journal.

L. H. S. Is it in the Journal?

L. Staff. Yes.

L. H. S. Why then read it.

December 23, 1678.

The earl of Essex acquainted the House, that he had received an information out of the country of very great concernment which was read as followeth:

Staffordsh.

December 24, 1678.

The Information of Stephen Dugdale, gent. late servant to the lord Aston of Tixall, concerning the Plot against our sovereign lord the king, as followeth:

1. This informant saith, that presently after one Howard, almoner to the queen, went beyond the seas, he was told by George Hobson, (servant to the said lord Aston) that there was a design then intended for the reformation of the government of the Romish religion.

2. He informeth, That in the beginning of September, 1678, he met in Tixall, nigh the lord's gates, the lord Stafford, who said to this Informant, it was sad that they were troubled, for that they could not say their prayers but in a hid manner, but suddenly there would be a reformation to the Romish religion; and if there was but a good success, they should enjoy their religion. And upon the 20th day of September last, the said lord Stafford told this informant that there was a design in hand, and if this informant would undertake the design, he should have a good reward, and make himself famous.

3. Upon the aforesaid day, immediately after, this informant went into the chamber of Mr. Francis Urie, alias Evers (a Jesuit), in Tixall-hall, and asked him what the lord Stafford meant by those words; and after he had made him to swear secrecy upon his knees, he told him he might be a person employed in the work, and have a good reward that would make him famous: and then he told him he must be instrumental with others in taking away the king's life; and that it should be done by shooting or otherwise. And that this informant need not to fear, for the pope had excommunicated the king, and that all that were excommunicated by him were heretics, and they might kill them, and be canonized for saints in so doing.

4. This informant saith, that the said Evers and Hobson both said, that the design was as well to kill the duke of Monmouth as the king.

5. That George North (nephew to Pickering, and servant to the lord Aston,) lately told this informant, that they had taken his uncle, (meaning Pickering) and put him into Newgate; and thought the king deserved such an execrable death as was intended him, because of his whoring and debauchery.

6. That Mr. Evers said, Mr. Bennyfield had a packet of letters delivered to him from the Posthouse, which he feared the Lord-treasurer had notice of, and therefore he delivered them to the duke of York, and the duke delivered them to the king, and that the king gave them to the treasurer, after he had read them; but that the king did not believe them, and therefore it was happy, or else the plot had been discovered.

7. That he had received many packets of letters for Evers, some of which this informant broke up, and found them to be and tend to the establishment of the Romish religion, &c.

8. That he had received several sums of money himself, and knew of divers others that were employed to put forth money, which was and is for the Jesuits use.

STEPHEN DUGDALE.

Taken upon oath the 24th day of

December 1678, before us,

Tho. Lane. J. Vernon.

L. Staff. My lords, I find by this here, that presently after one Howard, almoner to the queen, went over, George Hobson, servant to my lord Aston, told Dugdale there was a design to reform the government, &c. I beseech your lordships I may ask him, how long after he went over this discourse was.

Dugd. I do not say I knew George Hobson before he came to be a servant to my lord Aston, which was in 1678, but that this was only a discourse to me, that the plot had been so long carrying on.

L. Staff. He says upon his oath, presently after the almoner went over, he told him so. Now the almoner went over three years before that, when the proclamation came out to banish the queen's servants for being Papists.

Dugd. I heard it there; I never knew George Hobson before he came to be a servant to my lord Aston, but I did not tell it as a discourse at that time, or that it was more than what I had from him, that there was such a design so long before.

L. Staff. He says, presently after the almoner went over, in his oath; which was, I think, in 1672 or 73, or rather in 1675, about the end of 1674, as I remember. And he says presently, three years after; is that presently? Even now the end of August was the beginning of September, and how long that was we cannot tell, and now three years is presently after.

Sir W. Jones. He is telling of another's discourse with him.

L. H. S. My lord, you must observe that Dugdale says, that he did hear it from Hobson after he came to my lord Astor's service.

L. Staff. But he says, presently after the almoner went over; and it is impossible; for he did not say it till three years after, and so there is no truth in him.

Dugd. My lords, it was, that Hobson told me, that presently after the Almoner Howard went over, there was such a design carrying on.

L. H. S. You distinguish not, and therefore do not comprehend. It is one thing if Dugdale had said, that presently after there was such a design, Hobson told him so.

L. Staff. I beseech you, it is said, that presently after the almoner went over, Hobson told him so.

L. H. S. But it is not that presently after he heard the discourse; but George Hobson told him, that presently after the almoner went over, there was such a design.

L. Staff. It is said he was told presently after.

(Then the Information was read again.)

L. H. S. Do you know when Howard the almoner went over?

Dugd. No, my lords; but by report I heard when he went: But I do not make that part of my oath, for I cannot absolutely remember it.

L. H. S. My lord, you must not make a strain to make a mistake.

L. Staff. God's life! is three years a strain?

Dugd. I never did mean so, nor never did intend so, for I never knew him till he came to my lord Aston's; but he told me then this discourse.

L. H. S. My lord, this is only a question of grammar, how it can be construed.

L. Staff. My lords, I beg your pardon; it is to my little reason a question of sense, and it is plain to me it can have no other sense; but I submit it to your lordships, whether this be not the true construction.

L. H. S. Go on, my lord, with your evidence, notice will be taken of your objection; you shall see what they say to it; if they do not give it an answer, it will have its weight.

Sir W. Jones. We will give that an answer in due time.

L. Staff. Then the next he says, I talked with him at my lord Aston's the beginning of September, where he met with me at Tixall at the gate, and I said, it was sad we could not say our prayers, but in private. Truly, my Lords, I cannot say I did not say this to him; but if I did say it, I do not remember it, or that I ever thought so much; for I was so much of a contrary opinion, that I thought those of that religion said their prayers too openly, and have chid them for it. And why should I speak it to him, whom I did not know what religion or what profession he might be of? And presently after I spoke of these things, he says, he went to know what the design was, and then Mr. Evers told him of the plot, and yet yesterday he said he knew it sixteen years ago. How can all this be true? And besides it seems I could have no great power with him to persuade him, for it seems he mistrusted my ability to pay; and he had reason, for I should hardly have parted with 500*l.* in the condition I was then in, to any one; but I have no more to say to him now. There is a third witness, one Turberville, I desire to ask him a question.

L. H. S. Call Turberville. (Who stood up.)

L. Staff. I desire to know what time he came to serve my lady Molineux (for it is in the beginning of the Information in the House of Commons, that he came in the year 1673), and how long he staid with her.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, if your lordship please, there was an offer made to you, that those Affidavits should be produced, if you desired to see them.

L. Staff. I think I shall have no occasion as yet; it may be I may by and by: but I desire to ask him this question first, Whether he did say he came in 1673 into my lady Mary Molineux's service, and staid with her about three years?

L. H. S. Did he swear in the year 1673 he came?

L. Staff. It is so in his Narrative in print.

L. H. S. Do you own that Narrative in print for true?

Mr. Tur. No, my lords.

L. H. S. How can you challenge him, then, with a Narrative he does not own?

L. Staff. Then what can a man do, if he must not go according to what is printed?

Mr. Tur. There is a mistake in the printing of it, there is a mistake of 1673 for 1675.

L. Staff. I now desire that Affidavit may be produced.

L. H. S. Pray let him have the benefit that was offered him of the Affidavit.

Mr. Tur. Besides, I declared I could not be positive to a year; I own any thing else in it.

L. Staff. Then my lords, if I shall have fellows that will not swear to months nor to years I beg of your lordships to know whether these be legal witnesses.

Manag. The Affidavit is in the custody of sir W. Poulteney, a member of our house.

Sir W. Poulteney. My lords, I have the Affidavit; if you please, I shall give you an account what I did upon it, and sir Thomas Stringer, another justice of peace. My lords, after that Mr. Turberville had given his Evidence to the House of Commons, viva voce, he tendered to them this Information that I have in my hand. The House of Commons, after it had been read, thought it might be convenient to have it sworn to before two Justices of Peace. Whereupon sir Tho. Stringer and myself withdrew into the Speaker's chamber. Mr. Turberville came to us, we read over the information to him again, and after we had read it over it was signed, and he swore it. In this Information when we then took it, he declared there, That he came to my lord Powis in the year 1673, and came into England 1676. After we had sworn him, we carried this Information into the House again. The next morning, my lords, he came to me (I being one of the justices that had sworn him) and told me, that searching among his papers the last night for a letter, which he said he had received from my lord Stafford, sent to Diep; though he could not find the letter he looked for, yet he found that precise time that he went to live with my lord Powis was 1672, and the precise time of his coming into England was 1675. And he desired me to acquaint the House of Commons with it, that this circumstance in time might be altered. Whereupon, my lords, I did acquaint the House of Commons with it how he was mistaken in that point of a circumstance of time; and that he came of his own accord, and desired me to move the House in it. I moved the House, and they did direct we should withdraw again, and take his information again, and that he should amend it. He amended it, and made the 73, 72; and 76, 75; and then afterwards we swore him to it again de novo: and this is the matter of fact concerning the Affidavit.

L. H. S. Sir William Poulteney, did Mr. Turberville correct the mistake himself first, or was it found altered by others?

Sir W. Poulteney. My lords, he came to me, for I did not know any thing of it, that he was mistaken; but he came to me the next morning as soon as ever I came to the House, before indeed I entered into the House, and told me of the mistake; and told me the reasons how he came to recollect himself, and find out the mistake.

L. H. S. Mr. Turberville, I would ask you the question, how you came to be informed that you had mistaken yourself?

Mr. Tur. My lords, I will tell you: I was searching for a letter I received from my lord Stafford, and missing that, I found my discharge I had from the French army, wherein I saw a mistake as to the time, and that I have to produce.

L. H. S. I ask you again by the oath you have taken, did you correct it of yourself, or by information from any other?

Mr. Tur. By the oath I have taken, I did correct it of myself, and no body moved it to me.

Serj. Mayn. It was but a circumstance of time.

Sir F. Win. And corrected by himself the very next morning, my Lords.

L. Staff. He does acknowledge he did swear himself once and did make himself an honest man the next day, when he was a perjured villain the day before. And now he tells your lordships, that he was searching for a letter that I sent to him, but he cannot find it.

Mr. Tur. No, my Lords, I thought I had it, but I cannot find it.

L. Staff. No, I will swear thou canst not. But then he does say that he had a discharge from the French army.

Mr. Tur. Yes, it is here, my lord.

L. H. S. Is that the paper of your discharge?

Mr. Tur. Yes, it is. It is worn out a little and torn, but the seal is preserved: I did not know that ever I should have occasion to make use of it; but my lord challenging me for a coward, and a deserter of my colours—

L. Staff. I believe so still, for I have heard so.

L. H. S. Your honour is not in question, Mr. Turberville.

Mr. Tur. The title is a little torn; and if your lordships please, I will read it: (which he did, being in French, and is rendered in English in these words:

“This certifieth all to whom it shall appertain, that I have given an absolute discharge to the Sieur Turberville, a cavalier of my company, after having served the space of six months with all honour and fidelity. Therefore I desire those that are to be desired, to treat him civilly, and let him pass and repass, and without doing him any injury, or giving him any hindrance; but on the contrary, to afford him all aid and assistance where it shall be necessary, promising the like upon all occasions that shall require it. In confirmation of which, I have for him signed this present discharge, and there-to put the seal of my arms, to serve him in case he shall need it. Made at the camp before Aire this 4th of August, 1676. SRELDON.”

L. H. S. What is the date of that discharge, Turberville?

Mr. Tur. It is in August 1676.

L. Staff. May I see it, my Lords?

L. H. S. Yes. Deliver it to my lord. (Which was done, and he looked upon it)

L. Staff. The thing looks like truth, but there is no proof of it.

Mr. Tur. The seal is a little broke, but the name remains perfect.

L. Staff. He says there is a dismissal from the army in 1676; how will that rectify his mistake about 1673? I understand not that.

Then the Court called for the Paper: and it was looked upon by the duke of Monmouth, and some other lords.

L. H. S. My lord, this paper hath been looked upon; the hand is well known by those that should know it.

L. Staff. I do not say the contrary.

L. H. S. Whereabouts are you now, my lord, then?

L. Staff. I am extremely faint and weary, that I am sure of. This gentleman told you yesterday, that he spoke with me several times in France, and that he was conversant with me for a fortnight together; that he visited me, and I proposed the killing of the king to him; and that he refused to give me an answer then, but told me he would give it me at Diep: This he said yesterday, as I remember. And afterwards, when he was gone down, he came up again, and desired to put your lordships in mind of a particular circumstance which he said he did remember, That when he came to me, I had the gout, and was in a lower room of the house, in such a street, which faced Luxembourg house, all which I stand not upon; and that the prince of Conde lived in the same street, on the left-hand he said first, after on the right-hand, and after he knew not where; and that I did lodge in the same street.

Mr. Tur. I did say, I believed the prince of Conde lived there, but I was not positive.

L. Staff. No; but first he swears a thing, and then only believes it. Be pleased to call my servants, to know if ever I had my foot ill of the gout in my life.

Mr. Tur. Your lordship told me it was the gout.

L. Staff. If ever I put my foot on a stool, or was lame there, I will own all that he says. But when a man swears his evidence, and goes down from the place, and then invents, and comes up again to tell new stories, who shall believe such a man?

Mr. Tur. I never went from the bar.

L. Staff. I do say, you went down, and had given all your evidence, and came up again, and told this circumstance. I have not been lame, not one moment, these 40 years: and yet this fellow, this impudent fellow, to say, that I was lame, and put my foot upon a stool! He does not, my Lords, swear positively in any thing but this, and this I can easily disprove him in.

L. H. S. What say you to this particular, Turberville? Had my lord Stafford never the gout while he was in France?

Mr. Tur. He told me it was the gout, my Lords: He had a great lameness, he could not go from one place to another. Here are several people to give testimony that my lord was lame within less time than he says.

Mr. Foley. Hold, hold, Turberville, you must not give that evidence now.

L. Staff. Call Nicholas Furnese again.

L. H. S. What do you call him for?

L. Staff. Ask whether ever he saw Mr. Turberville with me in France?

L. H. S. Were you with my lord Stafford all the while he was in France?

Furnese. Yes, my Lords.

L. H. S. Did you never see Turberville there?

Furn. No.

L. H. S. Pray, did you never see Father Anthony Turberville there?

Furn. No, my Lords, I never heard of his name.

L. Staff. Was I ever one moment lame while I was in France?

Furn. Not that I remember.

L. H. S. How long was my lord there?

Furn. About three months.

L. H. S. What time of the year?

Furn. At Paris in October and November, in December at Rohan, in January we came over into England.

L. Staff. Ask him if ever I put my foot upon a cushion or upon a stool for lameness.

L. H. S. Mr. Turberville, did you ever see Furnese when you were in France?

Tur. This man, my Lords?

L. H. S. Yes.

Tur. No, not that I remember.

L. H. S. In what quality did you serve my lord in France, Furnese?

Furn. My Lords, I waited on him in his chamber.

L. H. S. Do you remember any other servant of my lord's that you did see there?

Tur. Truly, my Lords, I do not remember, I might forget him.

L. Staff. So I believe thou dost me too.

Tur. Your lordship that could call me coward, may say any thing.

L. Staff. You shall be as valiant as Hector, if you will. Pray call my other boy. (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. You little boy, Were you all the while with my lord that he was in France?

Leigh. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. Did you ever see Turberville there?

Leigh. No, my lords, not that I know of?

L. H. S. Had my lord the gout in France?

Leigh. No; nor never had since I have been with him.

L. H. S. That is six years.

Leigh. Seven years almost, my lords.

L. H. S. Are you sure of that?

Leigh. I am sure of it.

L. Staff. Now, my lords, Mr. Turberville says, I writ him a letter to Diep, which letter he cannot find; I beseech you, what were the contents of the letter?

L. H. S. What were the contents of the letter my lord sent you?

Tur. The contents of the letter were, That I should not stay at Diep in expectation of him, for he had appointed a yacht to come to Calais; but I should make what haste I could to London, and there I should meet with him.

L. Staff. I desire to ask, whether I sent him word that count Gramont came over with me.

Tur. Yes, my lords, to the best of my remembrance.

L. Staff. I shall now bring witnesses that I did not come by Calais, but by Diep, and count Gramont came not with me.

L. H. S. Mr. Turberville, which way came you, from Diep, or from Calais?

Tur. From Diep, my Lords.

L. Staff. And I came from Diep too.

L. H. S. My lord came that way too, he says.

Tur. I know not of that, he sent me word otherwise.

L. Staff. I shall now prove what I say. Pray call Mr. Wyborne. (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. What do you ask him, my lord?

L. Staff. Whether he did not see me at Diep, and embark from thence for England?

Mr. Wyborne. My lords, I will give you an account as well as I can. In 1675, in December, I had occasion to go over into France upon my own concerns; and enquiring where there was a conveniency to go over, I heard that a yacht was sending to Diep for my lord Stafford, and Mr. Henry Sidney, his majesty's envoy extraordinary now in Holland: I took that occasion, and we weighed anchor on Friday the 24th of December: and it being foul weather, and we being tossed long upon the sea, we did not come to an anchor before Diep till the Sunday was se'night at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, which was January the 5th. Then I came with the captain immediately on shore, to enquire for my lord and Mr. Sidney; I enquired for my lord, and they told me he was at Rohan, expecting to hear of the arrival of the yacht: Upon which the captain desired me to write a letter to my lord, and I did so; upon sight of which letter, he came to Diep on Tuesday in the afternoon, which was, as I take it, the 4th of January, and we were at the Bastille there then together when he came that evening. And the next day I went on my own occasions to Paris, and my lord and Mr. Sidney did come over together in the yacht.

L. Staff. If you please, I will call my two servants again to this matter.

L. H. S. Call them, my lord.

Then Furnese and Leigh stood up.

L. H. S. Which way came my lord Stafford out of France into England, by Diep or Calais?

Furn. By Diep.

L. H. S. What say you, boy? Which way came my lord?

Leigh. By Diep, my lords.

L. H. S. You came with him?

Leigh. Yes, we did.

L. H. S. My lord, the question is not, whether you came by Calais or no, but whether you writ a letter to him to Diep, that you would go by Calais.

L. Staff. He swore yesterday that I did come by Calais.

L. H. S. Do you say my lord came by Calais?

Tur. My lords, I had a letter from his lordship, which he wrote to me, that he would come by Calais.

L. Staff. He did not name the letter yesterday, nor is it in the Information.

L. H. S. Read the Affidavit.

THE INFORMATION OF EDWARD TURBERVILLE, of Sker, in the county of Glamorgan, gent.

Who saith, That being a younger brother, about the year 1672, he became gentleman-usher to the lady Mary Molineux, daughter to the earl of Powis, and by that means lived in the house of the said earl above three years; and by serving and assisting at mass there, grew intimate with William Morgan, confessor to the said earl and his family, who was a Jesuit, and rector over all the Jesuits in North Wales, Shropshire, and Staffordshire. And he during the three years time often heard the said Morgan tell the said earl and his lady, That the kingdom was in a high fever, and that nothing but bloodletting could restore it to health, and then the Catholic religion would flourish. Whereunto the said earl many times replied, It was not yet time, but he doubted not but such means should be used in due time; or words to that effect. And he heard the lady Powis tell the said Morgan and others, publicly and privately, That when religion should be restored in England, which she doubted not but would be in a very short time, she would persuade her husband to give 300*l.* per annum, for a foundation to maintain a nunnery. And this informant was persuaded by the lady Powis, and the said Morgan, to become a friar; the said lady encouraging this informant thereunto, by saying, That if he would follow his studies, and make himself capable, she questioned not but he might shortly be made a bishop by her interest in England; because upon restoration of the Catholic religion, there would want people fit to make bishops, and to do the business of the church. And thereupon she gave this informant 10*l.* to carry him to Doway, where this informant entered the monastery, and continued about three weeks, and with much difficulty made his escape thence, and returned for England; for which the said earl and his lady, and all the rest that encouraged him to go to the monastery, became his utter enemies, threatening to take away his life, and to get his brother to disinherit him: Which last is compassed against him. And Father Cudworth, who was then guardian of the friars at Doway, some days before his escape thence, told this informant, That if he should not persevere with them, he should lose his life and friends:

ROL. VII.

And further added, That this king should not last long, and that his successor should be wholly for their purpose. And Father Cross, provincial of the friars, told this informant, That had he been at Doway when this informant made his escape thence, he should never have come to England. And this informant finding himself friendless, and in danger in England, went to Paris, where one of his brothers is a Benedictine monk, who persuaded this informant to return for England; and in order thereunto, about the latter end of November, 1675, he was introduced into the acquaintance of the lord Stafford that he might go for England with his lordship, and three weeks he attended his lordship, and had great access and freedom with his lordship, who gave him great assurances of his favour and interest to restore him to his relations esteem again: And said, That he had a piece of service to propose to this informant, that would not only retrieve his reputation with his own relations, but also oblige both them and their party to make him happy as long as he lived. And this informant being desirous to embrace so happy an opportunity, was very inquisitive after the means; but the said lord Stafford being somewhat difficult to repose so great a trust as he was to communicate to him, exacted all the obligations and promises of secrecy, which this informant gave his lordship in the most solemn manner he could invent. Then his lordship laboured to make this informant sensible of all the advantages that should accrue to this informant, and the Catholic cause; and then told this informant in direct terms, That he might make himself and the nation happy, by taking away the life of the king of England, who was an heretic, and consequently a rebel against God Almighty. Of which this informant desired his lordship to give him time to consider, and told his lordship that he would give him his answer at Diep, where his lordship intended to ship for England, and to take this informant with him; but this informant going before to Diep, the lord Stafford went with count Gramont by Calais, and sent this informant orders to go for England, and to attend his lordship at London: But this informant did not attend his lordship at London, but went into the French service, and so avoided the lord Stafford's further importunities in that affair. And this informant further saith, That one Remige, a Frenchwoman, and vehement Papist, who married this informant's brother, lived with the lady Powis all the time this informant resided there and some years since, and was the great confidant of the said lady; and the said Remige was for the most part taken with her ladyship into Morgan's chamber, when the consults were held there, where he hath often seen Father Gavan, Father Towers, Father Evans, Father Sylliard, Roberts, White, Owens, Barry, and the earl of Castlemaine, and other Priests and Jesuits, meet and shut themselves up in the said Morgan's chamber, sometimes for an hour, sometimes for two hours, more or less; and at the breaking up of the said consultations, have broke out into an extacy of joy, saying, They hoped ere long the Catholic religion would be established in England, and that they did not doubt to bring about their design, notwithstanding they had met with one great disappointment, which was the peace struck up with Holland; saying, That if the army at Black-heath had been sent into Holland to assist the French king, when he was with his army near Amsterdam, Holland had certainly been conquered, and then the French king would have been able to assist us with an army to establish religion in England. Which expressions, with many others, importing their confidence to set up the Romish religion, they frequently communicated to this informant. And the said Morgan went several times into Ireland, to London, and several other parts of England, as this informant hath just cause to believe, to give and take measures for carrying on the design: And the said Remige and her husband having first clandestinely sold their estate, and fled into France about May or June last, for fear of discovery; this informant by many circumstances being assured that the said Mrs. Remige was privy to all or most of the transactions of the Plot. And he saith, That about May last was two years, he was present at mass with the lord Powis in Vere-street, when the earl of Castlemaine did say mass in his priestly habit, after the rites and ceremonies of the Church of Rome.

EDWARD TURBERVILLE.

Sworn the 9th day of November, 1680, before Thomas Stringer, William Poultney, and Edmund Waroupp.

L. H. S. My Lord; this affidavit is to the purpose to which you call for it; this does say, that your lordship did go by the way of Calais, it does absolutely so.

L. Staff. Now, whether he be forsworn or no, your lordships may judge by these three witnesses.

Mr. Tur. My Lords, That which I grounded my belief of his going to Calais upon, and so consequently that affidavit, was the letter which I received from my lord; which I have looked for, but cannot find.

L. H. S. This affidavit does not say you went from Calais to England, but you went with count Gramont to Calais.

Ld. Staff. I conceive, my Lords, this affidavit and his narrative are word for word the same, only that amendment of 1672 for 1673, upon which I observed before he was forsworn once. I cannot tell what to say, if this man can be believed. And count Gramont came to Diep too. But besides, my Lords, in this affidavit he does not say he believed so by the latter, though now he speaks of one.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, was count Gramont in your lordship's company when you came to Diep?

Ld. Staff. No, my Lords, he was in England before me a month; but, my Lords, I cannot deny but I had one recommended to come over with me, that pretended himself to be a French count, but the man was as arrant a rascal as this that swears against me; and that was one that called himself count de Biennes, whom all the world knows to be a cheat.

L. H. S. Call your other witnesses, my lord.

Ld. Staff. Where is John Minhead? (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. Who do you belong to?

Minhead. My lord Powis.

Ld. Staff. My Lords, Mr. Turberville, he says, by the persuasion of my lady Powis went to Doway, and he staid in the monastery three weeks, and not liking that life, he came away (this may be true, I say nothing to it); but that which I take exception at, is this; he says, for this the earl of Powis and his lady, when he came back from Doway, were very angry with him, and so were all his relations, and he stood in fear of his life from them. Surely when Mr. Turberville knew he was in such danger, he would not have come near them: pray ask this gentleman, whether he was at my lord Powis's, and how he was entertained.

L. H. S. Do you know Turberville?

Minh. Yes, my Lords.

L. H. S. Have you seen him at my lord Powis's?

Minh. Yes, my Lords.

L. H. S. How was he received there?

Minh. Very well, my Lords.

L. H. S. When was that?

Minh. In the year 1675.

L. H. S. Was that before or after he came back to England?

Minh. It was after he came from Doway.

L. H. S. What countryman are you?

Minh. A Frenchman.

L. H. S. What religion are you of?

Minh. A Roman Catholic.

Ld. Staff. Pray ask him whether he lay in my lord's house?

Minh. Yes, my Lords, he lay with me in my lodgings.

Ld. Staff. And yet he says he was afraid of his life.

L. H. S. Did my lord know he lay there?

Minh. Yes, he must needs, because he came through the room to go to bed.

Ld. Staff. May it please your lordships, he says he was threatened that he should have his brother disinherited him, and which afterwards was compassed. Now I shall shew that this is impossible, for he had no inheritance to lose, nor was to have none; for his brother, who is elder than he (this man being by a second venter), hath children, as I shall make appear by another of his brothers, who is here. And this not being settled upon him, who was by the second venter, could not come to him; but, for want of issue of that brother, must go to the uncle. So he swears he was disinherited of an estate, when he was to have no estate, nor could have. Call Mr. John Turberville; (Who appeared). My Lords, I desire you to ask him, whether he knew that upon his coming back to England he was ill used?

J. Tur. I never knew any unkindness from any elder brother to him.

L. H. S. Are you his brother?

J. Tur. Yes, my lords, by the father, not by the mother.

L. H. S. Well, what can you say?

J. Tur. I never heard any thing when he returned from Doway, that he was ill received by my lord Powis; but in a few days after my brother and sister came to town, we went to Bloomsbury, and there we met together: And my brother complaining that he was unfortunate, in that he had undertaken what he could not perform in going beyond sea, and now wanted a livelihood; my eldest brother told him, he had done as far as his ability, he could do no more, it was his own choice, and he had no more to say.

Ld. Staff. Had he any money from his relations?

J. Tur. He made intercession by friends to my sister, and she told me, that she gave him 7*l.* to bear his charges to Paris, with that proviso, that he would never trouble them more.

L. H. S. But they were not angry with him?

J. Tur. Here he is, he cannot say they ever gave him an angry word in their days; I am sure I never did.

L. H. S. Did you forbid him the house?

J. Tur. No.

Ed. Tur. These are people that take not the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and therefore are not fit to be witnesses.

Ld. Staff. Now your lordships see what a villain he is.

Serjeant Maynard. You must give good words, my lord, for none but good words are given you.

Ld. Staff. I must call them villains, or myself traitor.

L. H. S. You say they gave him 7*l.* upon condition they should never see him more.

J. Tur. I did not say, my sister said upon condition she would give him 7*l.* he would never trouble us more: It was his declaration.

Ld. Staff. One thing I would ask Mr. Turberville more, and that is about this man's being disinherited: Whether he could, or whether he was heir to an estate or not?

L. H. S. What say you to it?

J. Tur. By all the information of our relations, the estate was made by my grandfather to my father for life, and after my father's life, to my mother; and after my mother's life, to my eldest brother, and the heirs male of his body; and for want of such, afterwards to me, and the heirs male of my body; and in case I had none, then to my father's brother, and his heirs male; and if he had no heirs male, then after that to the right heirs of the grandfather. This was before my time.

L. H. S. Well, then, that remainder to the right heirs might come to him; and so there was some estate for him to lose, and that remainder might be docked by the tenant in tail. I would ask, was there any recovery suffered to bar that entail?

J. Tur. Yes, I think there was one upon my brother's marriage.

L. H. S. Mr. Turberville, were you told you should be disinherited?

E. Tur. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. Who told you so?

E. Tur. My eldest brother.

L. H. S. What did he tell you?

E. Tur. He told me it should not come to me.

L. H. S. How should it come to you?

E. Tur. I am not so good a lawyer as to tell that, whether it could or no; but I thought by succession.

L. Staff. Then he says he came to serve my lady Mollinex in 1672; it may be it is so as he says, I do not know it of my own knowledge; but I pray he may answer, whether it was in 1671, or 1672.

E. Tur. In January or February, 1671.

Mr. Treby. That is in the beginning of the year 1672, according to the almanack.

L. Staff. My lords, for the present I do not remember any thing more—Oh, yes, my lords, he says he was at such a time at my lord Powis's, when my lord Castlemaine was at Powis-Castle, which must be either in the year 1672, 1673, or 1674. Now I desire you would ask Mr. Lydcot, whether my lord Castlemaine was there, or could be there in any of those years (Then Lydcot stood up).

L. H. S. What do you ask him, my lord?

L. Staff. I desire to ask him, whether in the year 1672, 1673, or 1674, which are the years Turberville says he was at my lord Powis's at Powis-Castle, whether my lord Castlemaine was at Powis-Castle, or could be there at that time.

L. H. S. Was my lord Castlemaine there in any of those years?

Lydcot. My lords, I can prove he was not, as much as I am capable of proving a negative. I was with him in the years, 1672, 1673, and 1674.

L. H. S. Where?

Lydcot. He was in England in 1673; I was with him all the while, and I am sure since I knew him he was never in Wales, and I was never absent from him since I knew him (which is nine years), not four months in all: I have travelled with him, and been abroad with him.

L. H. S. Turberville, when do you say my lord Castlemaine was at Powis-Castle?

Tur. I think it was in the year 1673.

L. H. S. By what token do you remember him there?

Tur. He was arguing with my lord Powis about religion, and several times he did so: I believe it was in the year 1673.

L. H. S. What say you to that?

Lydcot. I can assure your lordships he was not there then; I was always with him that year: he had many times a design to go there, but he could not but put it off; and the last time he was there, I can prove it was 15 years ago.

L. H. S. I desire to know of you this, friend; can you take it upon you to affirm upon the faith of a Christian, that you were never from my lord Castlemaine all the year 1673?

Lyd. I can give an account to half a week where he was; and when I was absent from him, it was beyond sea, and all that while I kept correspondence with him every post, and received letters from him constantly once a week, dated from Liege; this was in the time of my absence.

L. H. S. Were you at Liege when my lord was in England, or were you with him all the time he was in England?

Lyd. My lords, I was with him all the time he was in England, and was never absent from him all that compass of time, but when he sent me into England from Liege.

L. H. S. Then he was at Liege himself?

Lyd. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. Was that in the year 1673?

Lyd. Yes, my lords, I was then in England. But, my lords, I can give you a whole account, for my lord and I never made any journies, but I put them down.

L. H. S. You say you can give a particular account of the whole year 1673, even to the compass of four days in that year at most.

Lyd. No, my lord, I do not say so; but I say I can give an account of the whole time I have been with him within four months.

L. H. S. Were any of these four months within the year 1673?

Lyd. No: I was with him all the year 1673.

L. H. S. Will you take it upon you to say, That every day in 1673 you were with my lord?

Lyd. Every day, my lords.

L. H. S. Every week?

Lyd. Yes, I do not think but that I was. My lord did me the honour to make me as it were his companion.

Serj. Maynard. No, you do yourself the honour to make yourself his companion; he made you his servant.

L. H. S. Come, where are your notes you pretend to speak by? your Diary, or your Journal? Let us hear a whole account of the year 1673; for you come to testify as if you could give an account of every day.

Lyd. I did not think any question of this nature would come on the stage; there is my lord's steward can give a very good account of this by his account-books, which are all ready to be produced; he can tell where my lord was, by laying out such and such monies. And it is as hard thing to give a testimony after so many years, of a thing that we thought not would ever be a question.

L. H. S. Let us see your notes.

Lyd. My lords, I will read it to your lordships.

L. H. S. When was this written?

Lyd. I took this out of another book.

L. H. S. When?

Lyd. Lately, since Mr. Turberville's Narrative came out.

Sir W. Jones. Oh, I desire that may be observed.

L. Staff. If your lordships please, I desire that he may bring his books, Oh, Oh! will not condemn me, but law and justice: I am not to be run down with Oh, Oh! or what such impudent villains as these say.

L. H. S. Read what you have there.

Lyd. From Liege we set forth to Paris, January 1, 1672, where we staid three weeks, and arrived thence at London, January 24; there we staid till May 1673, and from thence we went to Liege again in June, and from Liege we set forth to London in August, and returned October the 3d, 1673.

L. H. S. Were you all the while between August and October in London?

Lyd. I am morally certain, that I did not go from my lord all that time.

L. H. S. Where were you after October?

Lyd. Which October, if your lordship please?

L. H. S. October, 1673.

Lyd. At Liege; for we returned to Liege at October the 3d, and then after this my lord sent me into England. I left him at Liege, and from thence I set out for England; and in January I returned to Liege, which was the greatest part of time that I was ever absent from him.

L. H. S. And was he at Liege, are you sure, all that time from October to January?

Lyd. Yes, except he flew: for I sent letters by the foreign post every week. And his account-books will speak it.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we desire to ask him one question, (since he can give so exact an account) whether my lord Castlemaine was in England, 1672; and how much of that year?

Lyd. Yes.

Sir W. Jones. How many months of the year 1672, was he in England?

Lyd. I read it before. We arrived from Liege to London, January 24th, 1672, and staid at London till May, 1673.

L. H. S. But where was my lord all the year 1672?

Lyd. Pray, my lords, do you mean New-Stile or Old Stile?

L. H. S. When I speak of his being at London, I mean the stile of the country.

Sir W. Jones. Then, under favour, he speaks of the latter part of the year: I desire to know, whether my lord, for all the former part of the year was in England?

L. H. S. Where was my lord in December 1672, and in November before that, and in all the year up backwards?

Lyd. My lords, I have told you the whole year.

L. H. S. But where was my lord from January 1671, to January 1672?

Lyd. In 1671, June the 19th, New-Stile, we came to London, and returned in September to Liege; from Liege we set forth to Paris, January 1, 1672; and arrived at London, January 24.

L. H. S. He runs past the time.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we ask him a plain question, but he does not answer it; he slips over the time that we desire your lordships to ask him about.

L. Staff. I beseech your lordships that it may be made plain, that there may nothing be said afterwards that it was not plain.

Lyd. Sir, do you propose any thing to me, and I will answer it.

Sir W. Jones. Answer not us, answer my lords.

Lyd. I desire any body may peruse my notes, if they please.

L. H. S. Pray, Sir, answer the question, which in very short terms is this, where my lord Castlemain was all the whole year 1672?

Lyd. Well, my lords, I will; I can but read it over again. From Liege we set forth to Paris, January 1, 1672.

L. H. S. Are you not a rare fellow now!

Lyd. My lords, I understand it according to the stile of that country when I am there, and of this place when I am here.

L. H. S. Answer me according to our stile.

Lyd. This that I have written here, in the book out of which I took it, hath been written ever since that time; and I did not think I should ever be called to account about it.

L. H. S. Begin January the 1st, 1671.

Lyd. We went from Liege to Paris, where we staid about a week, or such a time, and we arrived at London January the 24th, that is the Old-Style, and staid at London till May the 8th, 1673.

L. H. S. That is impossible, for you escape a year and an half together.

Lyd. My lord was here in England in Jan.

L. H. S. You begin very gravely with January, Stilo veteri, that you came from Liege; and so January the 24th, Stilo veteri, you came to London.

Lyd. When I speak of any stile, I understand it according to the stile of the country.

L. H. S. But in your account, what is become of all the time from January, 1671, to January, 1672; say and swear, if you can, where my lord was all that time.

Lyd. He must be in London.

L. H. S. Can you take it upon your oath, that my lord was in London from January 1671, O. S. to May 1673, Q. S.?

Lyd. I cannot know how to count better than I have done.

L. Staff. Mr. Turberville says, my lord Castlemaine was in 1673 at Powis-Castle; I beseech your lordships this man may be asked, and that without any interruption, where my lord was that year.

Sir W. Jones. With your lordships favour I must desire your lordships to ask Mr. Turberville whether he did say positively the year 1673; for if my ears and my notes do not fail me, he said, as he remembered; and that is the reason why we ask about the year 1673.

Mr. Thr. My lords, I do not say positively, nor cannot, which year it was.

Lyd. My lords, I do stand upon it, that he was in London January, 1672, and went away May 1673.

L. H. S. What becomes of the mean time, between January, 1671, and May 1673?

Lyd. My lords, I explain myself as well as I can.

L. H. S. My Lord Stafford, will you call any more witnesses?

L. Staff. Yes, my lord.

L. H. S. Call them then.

Earl of Shaftesbury. My Lord High Steward, I desire my lord Stafford may be asked how many witnesses my lord hath more, for it now grows late.

L. H. S. My lord, I desire to know how many witnesses you have more?

L. Staff. Three or four; I cannot tell how many.

Lords. Adjourn, adjourn.

L. H. S. Is it your lordships pleasure that we do adjourn?

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. Then this House is adjourned into the parliament-chamber.

Then the Lords returned in their former order to their House, and the Commons went back to their House.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and a Message from the Lords was sent by sir Timothy Baldwin and sir Samuel Clarke.

Mr. Speaker; The Lords have sent us to acquaint this House, that they have ordered the prisoner, William viscount Stafford, to be brought again to his trial at the bar in Westminster-Hall, to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

THE FOURTH DAY.

Friday, December 3, 1680.

About the hour of ten in the morning the Lords adjourned into Westminster-hall and returned in their former order into the court there erected; and Mr. Speaker having left the chair the Commons were seated as before mentioned.

The court being sat, Proclamation for silence was made, and the lieutenant of the Tower commanded to bring his prisoner to the bar; which being done the Lord-High-Steward spake to the prisoner as followeth.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, your lordship's defence took up yesterday. All the day was employed in hearing your lordship's witnesses to impeach the credit of the testimony that hath been given against you. Your lordship hath excepted against Dugdale, because you were not at Tixall, as he says you were, neither the latter end of August, nor the beginning of September, till the 12th; and when you were there, you never sent for him to your chamber, but your man upon his own desire, brought him: And when he came there, the business was to desire you to get leave that he might go to the race; and there was no opportunity of private discourse, because your men were in the room all the while; that Dogdale hath often said he knew nothing of the Plot; that he swore falsely, when he said he told of the letter about the death of sir Edmundbury Godfrey before it was known he was killed, and when he said that Hobson told him presently after the almoner went over, which was three years before Hobson came to my lord Aston's service. Your lordship hath likewise objected, that he hath corrupted persons to swear falsely against you and others, as Robinson the upholsterer against your lordship, Morrell the barber against sir James Symonds, and Holt the blacksmith to swear that one Moor carried away Evers. Your lordship hath endeavoured to discredit Oates, by his saying he knew nothing of any other persons that were concerned in the Plot, and after accusing the queen. Your lordship hath impeached the credit of Turberville, by proving that you came home by Diep, and not by Calais, as he says you did; that you had never the gout while you were in France, nor, as your page says, for these seven years; that my lord Castlemaine was not at my lord Powis's in the year 1673, and there you left off. This I take is the sum of what your lordship says; if I do you any wrong, your lordship will put me in mind of it.

L. Staff. I thank your lordship, you have done it with great equity and truth.

L. H. S. Then go on.

L. Staff. The next witness that I call is one John Porter. (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. John Porter.

L. H. S. What profession are you of?

Porter. A butler.

L. H. S. To whom?

Porter. To my lord Powis.

L. Staff. My lords, I desire your lordships would ask him what Mr. Turberville said about the Plot.

L. H. S. I will ask him all the questions your lordship desires I should ask him.

Mr. Foley. We desire to know what religion he is of.

L. Staff. I desire your lordship would ask him that question, and not the managers.

L. H. S. They will tell me their questions, my lord, and I will ask them.

L. Staff. They ask him, my lords, and not you.

L. H. S. What religion are you of?

Porter. A church-of England man, my Lords.

Serj. Maynard. The popish church of England, I believe.

L. Staff. Pray my lords, let not this be; when my witness says he is of the church of England, they cry he is of the popish church of England.

Serj. Maynard. Pray, good my lord, we are silent when you ask him proper questions, and make no remarks; we do not speak it to the court; we may say what we will among ourselves, I hope.

L. Staff. I may ask impertinent questions, because I do not understand so well as these gentlemen. But I pray they may not deal thus with me.

L. H. S. My lord, you shall ask what questions you please.

L. Staff. Pray ask him what Mr. Turberville said to him about the knowledge of the Plot.

L. H. S. What did Turberville say to you about his knowing of the Plot?

Porter. About a year since, when I served my lord Powis as butler there, he was used to come and see me; it was not at my lord's house, but he sent for me to a victualling house—

L. H. S. That was last year?

Porter. Yes.

L. H. S. What time of the year?

Porter. It was about twelve months ago, I cannot say positively the time.

L. H. S. Was it in winter or summer?

Porter. He hath been both, I can't be positive which; I believe he hath been there forty times.

L. H. S. In the year 1680 or 1679?

Porter. In the year 1679.

L. H. S. What did he say?

Porter. He came there and asked me how my lord Powis did; and said, he was extremely troubled that he was in that affliction, for he did verily believe, that neither he nor the rest of the lords were in the Plot; and the witnesses that swore against him, he believed were perjured, and could not believe any thing of it.

L. H. S. Have you any more to say?

Porter. Yes, my lords; I told him, if there were such a thing as a Plot, he having been beyond sea, must certainly know of it. He told me, as he hoped for salvation, he knew nothing of it, neither directly, nor indirectly, against the king's sacred person, nor the subversion of the government. And he further said, Although I am a little low at present, and my friends will not look upon me, yet I hope God Almighty will never leave me so much, as to let me swear against innocent persons, and forswear and damn myself.

L. H. S. Where was this said to you?

Porter. At the Ship alehouse in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields one time, another time at the King's-Head Tavern in the Strand, and another time at the Golden-Ball in the Strand.

L. H. S. Was any body by, besides yourself?

Porter. Not at that time; but there is a gentleman in court, that can testify that he said such things at other times.

L. H. S. What sly you to this, Turberville?

Mr. Tur. I say it is all false: But if your lordships please, I will tell you what I said once, I did conceive my lord Powis was the least concerned of any, I thought; and I hoped it would prove so. I can take all the oaths in the world, I said no more.

L. H. S. What else do you know?

Porter. Only such things as these he hath often said.

Earl of Shaftsbury. Pray, my lords, ask him how came Turberville to talk of witnesses about the Plot?

L. H. S. Upon what occasion came Turberville to talk of these matters?

Porter. It was only voluntary of himself; it was speaking of my lord Powis, and the rest of the Lords in the Tower.

E. of Staff. My lords, I mean of his own being a witness.

L. H. S. How came Turberville to say, he hoped God Almighty would never forsake him so far, as to let him swear against innocent persons? He was never called to be a witness.

Porter. But, my lord, some of his friends did say they were fearful of him, in regard he was reduced to poverty; his friends were fearful.

L. H. S. Who were fearful?

Porter. His brother and sister, Mr. Turberville and his wife.

L. H. S. Did he take notice to you that they were afraid he would come in?

Porter. Yes, Mr. Turberville did tell me himself, that they heard he would come in.

L. H. S. Have you said all that you have to say?

Porter. My lords, that is all I have to say.

L. H. S. Then call another, my lord.

L. Staff. Where is Mr. Yalden? (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. Yalden.

L. H. S. Your christian name?

Yalden. John.

L. H. S. What is your profession?

Yalden. A barrister at law.

L. H. S. How long have you been called to the bar?

Yalden. I was called to the bar last Trinity-Term was twelve months.

L. H. S. What house are you of?

Yalden. Grays-Inn.

L. H. S. Are you a practiser?

Yalden. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. What religion are you of?

Yalden. Of the Church of England.

L. H. S. Well, what can you say?

Yalden. I am summoned to appear by order of this House; and I desire to know of my lord what he is pleased to examine me about.

L. Staff. What Mr. Turberville hath said in his hearing about the Plot?

L. H. S. What discourse hath passed between you and Turberville about the Plot?

Yalden. My lords, in February or March last I was walking in Grays-Inn walks with Mr. Turberville, and Mr. Powell, and he dined with me a day or two after; and there Mr. Turberville and I were talking of the distractions of the times, how trade was ruined, how the whole kingdom was out of order; and he, a little touched at some things, cried out, 'God damn me, now there is no trade good, but that of a discoverer; but the devil take the duke of York, Monmouth, Plot, and all, for I know nothing of it.'

L. H. S. That is odd, that he should say it was a good trade to be a discoverer; and at the same time say, he knew nothing of the Plot.

Yalden. This I understood to be his meaning; he cursed himself and them, because he knew nothing of the Plot to discover; for he would have got money by it, (as I understood) as well as others.

Tur. My lords, Mr. Yalden did declare yesterday, he was summoned in by my lord Stafford the last night, and that he had nothing to say but what was by hear-say.

Yalden. My lord, I do declare here what I say is true. And yesterday Mr. Powell gave me a caution to take heed what I did, and swore by-God, it would else be the worse for me.

L. H. S. Who did?

Yalden. Mr. Powell.

L. H. S. Who is that?

Yalden. Mr. Turberville's friend. And I said, I do not appear here as a voluntary evidence, but by an order of the House of Lords. I do not know what weight my evidence may have; for I can say nothing but what I heard him say, and so perhaps it will be taken but for an hear-say.

Tur. You said you know nothing but by hear-say.

L. H. S. Will you ask him any questions, gentlemen?

Manag. No, my lords.

L. Staff. My lords, I shall not trouble your lordships with any more witnesses as to these points; I have here a copy of the warrant for the yacht to go to Dieppe: And if there be any question whether I did come over from Dieppe at Christmas 1675, if you please the book may be searched.

L. H. S. My lord, it is all lost, for I hear not one word!

L. Staff. I say, my lords, if it be fit to trouble your lordships with it, I can prove that I did come over in the yacht from Dieppe at Christmas 1675; here is the copy of the warrant for it to go for me. And whether you will have it proved that I did come over thence, I submit to you.

L. H. S. I suppose that is fully proved, that you did come by Dieppe.

Manag. We do not deny it.

L. H. S. You do not stand upon it, gentlemen, do you?

Manag. No, no, my lords.

L. H. S. It is admitted to you, my lord.

L. Staff. My lords, when I went from your lordships bar last night, I had no thoughts of examining any witnesses, but what I had already done: But, my lords, since I was here, there hath something happened, about which I desire Dr. Oates may be called again (I shall give you my reason why I move it afterward) upon something I heard yesternight.

L. H. S. Call Dr. Oates again. (Who appeared and stood up.)

L. H. S. My lord, what does your lordship call him for?

L. Staff. He did say, that he being a minister of the Church of England, did seemingly go over to the Church of Rome, or some such words; I desire he may answer that first.

L. H. S. What say you?

Oates. Yes, I did say I did but seemingly go over.

L. Staff. I desire to know, whether he was really a papist, or did but pretend.

Oates. I did only pretend; I was not really one, I declare it.

L. H. S. What do you make of that?

L. Staff. I desire to know how long Dr. Oates was in Spain.

Oates. My lords, I came into Spain in May, and I came home again in November.

L. H. S. That is six months.

L. Staff. He is called Dr. Oates: I beseech your lordships to ask him, whether he were a doctor made at the Universities here or abroad.

Oates. My Lords, if your lordships please, any matter that is before your lordships, I will answer to it; but I hope your lordships will not call me to account for all the actions of my life; whatever evidence is before your lordships I will justify.

L. H. S. The doctor hath never taken it upon his oath, that he was a doctor, and why do you ask it?

L. Staff. He is called a doctor, and I would know whether he did never declare upon his oath, that he took the degree at Salamanca?

Oates. My Lords, I am not ashamed of any thing I have said or done; I own what is entered as my oath before your lordships, and am ready to answer it; but I am not bound to say what does not at all concern this business.

L. Staff. I say, my Lords, it is entered upon your lordships books, that he did swear at the council, he was at Madrid with Don John of Austria; I would know of him whether he did so.

Oates. My Lords, I would have my lord to propose the question to the Court of Peers.

L. H. S. Have you sworn any thing of Don John of Austria?

Oates. My Lords, I refer myself to the Council-book.

L. Staff. I beseech your lordships, I may have that book.

L. H. S. I believe it is in the Narrative; turn to the Journal, you have that mentioned there. [To which the Clerk turned, but it could not be found.]

L. H. S. If you will not acknowledge it, we must stay till the book be brought.

Oates. My Lords, if your lordships please, I will repeat, as well as I can, what was said at the council table; but I had rather the council book were fetched, because I am upon my oath: But, my Lords, I always thought the council book is no record upon any man.

L. Staff. I desire it may be produced, or he own that he said so.

L. H. S. What you said at the council table, you said upon your oath, and it is lawful to lay it before you.

Oates. But if your lordships please, as to what was said at the council table, if my lord will bring any one viva voce to swear what was said by me there, that will make something.

L. H. S. That may be material, as he says, that your lordship should bring somebody to swear he said so, for the clerks may mistake him.

L. Staff. If your lordship please that the book may be sent for, I will make it out.

Sir W. Jones. It could not be read if it were here.

L. H. S. If the clerks will swear what is in the books, it may.

Sir W. Jones. But whether the clerks will take that upon them or no, may be a question.

L. H. S. Go on in the mean time.

L. Staff. I cannot conclude with him without it.

L. H. S. Where is the council-book? For the clerks inform me it is not in their custody; but the gentlemen of the House of Commons have been attended with the book, and other papers relating to it.

L. Staff. In the mean time, give me leave to say something, though perhaps it may be nothing to the purpose: Mr. Yalden was just now going down, and Turberville threatened to lay him by the heels.

L. H. S. If he did so, it is a misdemeanor, and he must be punished for it. Call Yalden and Turberville.

L. H. S. Mr. Turberville, have you dared or threatened Yalden the witness, to lay him by the heels?

Tur. I did not speak any such words to him; Mr. Dugdale was just by me all the while.

L. Staff. I tell you but what he said, and what I can prove by witness; pray call Yalden.

Tur. This gentleman, captain Scudamore, stood by me too.

L. H. S. But I ask you upon this misdemeanor, whether you threatened Yalden to lay him by the heels?

Tur. My Lords, I stood by Mr. Dugdale till he was gone down.

L. H. S. How could he lay him by the heels? By what authority could he do it?

Tur. I did not speak such a word, upon my oath.

L. Staff. Ask Yalden; I am told he did.

L. H. S. I am afraid you are misinformed, my lord; for he could not do it, it is not in his power.

L. Staff. He threatened he would gaul him; but if you will not examine it, I submit to you.

Oates. My Lords, Yalden, it seems, calls us a pack of rogues, that give evidence for the king; and here are witnesses of it. (Yalden stood up.)

L. H. S. Yalden, were you threatened by Turberville?

Yalden. Yes, I will tell you how I was threatened, my lords: Mr. Turberville pulled me by the arm, when I had given my evidence, and asked me if I knew him, and bid me take care.

L. H. S. Do you call that threatening?

Yalden. My Lords, I did not make this complaint, nor did I desire it should be made; but speaking this in the room, somebody carried it to my lord.

Tur. My lords, now he hath done, let me speak, I pray: Mr. Yalden did say in the hearing of captain Scudamore, who is here, he had got a great many clients here; but you, says he, have got nothing but a pack of rogues.

Yalden. That is a mistake.

L. H. S. This is fine work. But, gentlemen, will you call captain Scudamore now, or will you stay till afterwards?

Sir F. Winnington. My Lords, Mr. Turberville desires it may be now, and we do also desire it upon this occasion; Captain Scudamore is a man of quality, and will give you a true account. We did not think to have interposed in my lord Stafford's evidence; but he having impeached our witnesses of a misdemeanor, we conceive it fittest to clear it at this time.

Then Captain Scudamore was sworn.

L. H. S. Mr. Scudamore, what are you called for? Can you say any thing that happened between Turberville and Yalden?

Capt. Scudamore. The gentleman that is here, that said he was one of Gray's-Inn, I do not know his name—

L. H. S. It is Yalden.

Scudamore. I heard a gentleman ask him if he came there to get clients, and he said, I know nothing among you but roguery.

L. Staff. Whereabouts did this gentleman stand?

Scudamore. In the passage.

Tur. Here are five or six more that heard him say so.

Yalden. That which I said, was this, That I might come hither for practice, but I did not come hither for roguery.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, until such time as the council-book comes, which may be sent for, will your lordship proceed to something else?

L. Wharton. My lord Steward, I humbly conceive, that it was resolved in the Lords House, the day before yesterday, that no book should be sent for out of the court; and it was done upon the judgment of all the judges of England.

Yalden. My Lords, they will not permit me to go down.

L. H. S. There is a strange quarrel between your witnesses, and an affectation of complaining one of another: Let Mr. Yalden go down.

Sir W. Jones. My Lords, I would only acquaint your lordships, that the council-book, that my lord does make mention of, was in the hands of our clerk, we did not know of it when it was first discoursed of; but now understanding that here it is, we desire it may be delivered in to any body that hath occasion for it.

L. H. S. Hand it in. (Which was done).

VOL. VII.

L. H. S. What day does your lordship speak of?

L. Staff. The 28th, 29th, or 30th of September.

Clerk. Then this is not the book, for this is for January.

L. Staff. My Lords, is it your lordships pleasure I may have pen, ink, and paper allowed me?

L. H. S. Yes, yes; give my lord pen, ink, and paper. (Which they did).

Then the Lord High Steward looked upon the Council-book.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, in this council-book, as far as we can inform ourselves by the table of it, there is nothing at all of it, it must be the council-book in September.

Sir W. Jones. We have no other book but that.

L. H. S. Why did not your lordship send all this while to the council-table for any thing that was material, but give the court the trouble to be interrupted upon your enquiries?

L. Staff. My Lords, you may do what you please, I did not know any such thing would have needed to be urged, I have proof enough without the book: The use I should have made of it, is this, I do appeal to some of your lordships (you that were of the council) I do appeal to which of you that were by, whether Dr. Oates did not say at the council-table, he had been at Madrid, he went from Valladolid to Madrid, and there did preach something at the Jesuits College at Madrid (what it was I cannot tell) when Don John of Austria was by.

L. H. S. If any of my lords of the council do remember it, they may testify.

L. Privy-Seal. My lords, I shall tell your lordships as much as I remember of it; Dr. Oates was examined about his journey into Spain, and (amongst the rest) some question happened to be asked, whether he had seen Don John of Austria; he said he had seen one that was called so; that he knew him not, but he was pointed to one that they said was Don John of Austria: that I heard.

L. Staff. My lord, I thank you.

L. H. S. You hear what is said, Dr. Oates. Oates. My lords, suppose I did say so, I think there is no crime in it.

L. H. S. It is not objected against you as a crime, but as a mistake in your oath, there was no such man there.

L. Privy-Seal. My lords, I would not be misunderstood in the evidence I give; I did not say that Oates said he knew him, but that he knew him not, and only was told such a man was he.

Oates. It was made apparent that I did not know him, because I mistook his person.

L. Staff. I do stand upon it, That upon his oath (and I have reason to believe he said so, because I am so informed) he said it was Don John of Austria.

L. Privy-Seal. No my lord, Dr. Oates said,

He was a tall lean man, and it seems he was a little fat man.

L. Staff. If any man would shew him a man to counterfeit Don John of Austria, he would not shew him a lean man for a fat.

L. H. S. Go on, my lord.

L. Staff. I shall now put your lordships in mind that he swore, but my memory is bad, and my eyes much worse, that he saw me receive a commission, and it seems he saw what it was too: Now it is strange, that amongst so many commissions that were given, none should be extant; I desire him to shew the commission he saw me receive.

L. H. S. Would your lordship have him shew the commission which he saw you receive?

L. Staff. I do not believe he can shew my commission; for I am sure there was none: I desire him to shew any one of my letters he talks of. He says, he came over, feigning to be a Papist, when he was not, and that they shewed him presently all my letters; and now he is come to discover the Plot, I ask him, did he keep any one of my letters?

L. H. S. Have you any of my lord's letters by you?

Oates. My lords, I could not keep any letters sent to the fathers; I had a sight of them, but none of them to my particular use.

L. Staff. Does he know my hand? Did he ever see it in his life?

Oates. Yes, I do know his hand, I believe I have a letter of my lord's by me, but not about me, it is of no concern; I am sure I have one of my lord Arundel's.

L. Staff. But he says he hath a letter of mine; let him shew one of my letters.

Oates. He writes a mixed hand, I think it is but an indifferent one.

L. Staff. So many commissions, and so many letters as are spoken of, and not one to be found or produced!

L. H. S. Can you send for the letter?

Oates. My lords, I am not certain of that.

L. H. S. Where did you see my lord write?

Oates. At Fenwick's, my lords, when I carried the letter to the post.

L. Staff. How often hath he seen me at Fenwick's?

Oates. My lords, not above twice, if twice.

L. Staff. My lords, I cannot say I did not see him there; but I can say I don't know the place, nor that ever I was there.

Oates. My lords, will his lordship say I never saw him at Dr. Perrot's?

L. Staff. Who?

Oates. My lord Stafford.

L. Staff. Where did he live?

Oates. In Duke-street, going into Lincoln's-Inn-Fields: He is the arch-priest of the seculars, that is, the principal of the secular clergy; and he hath the care of the English college for the sending of scholars to the college. Mr. Fisher, my lord Stafford, and Dr. Perrot were discoursing together about sending his son thither, and Mr. Fisher would have one sent with him, that was Dr. Perrot's man.

L. Staff. I do profess before God, I was never at Dr. Perrot's in my whole life!

L. H. S. Did not you send your son abroad?

L. Staff. No, my lords, not I.

L. H. S. Had he a servant at Dr. Perrot's to attend him?

Oates. No, my lords, not that I know of, I cannot say he had not.

L. Staff. I tell you positively, as I am a Christian, my lords, I did not send my son to Lisbon, he went against my will. I told him I had an aversion to it, but said, I will not lay my commands on you not to go; but he would go, I could not help it: I told him, Do you mean to go into the college? He would not tell me.

L. H. S. Pray, my lord, does not your lordship know Dr. Perrot?

L. Staff. Yes, my lords, I do.

L. H. S. Were you never with him at his house in Duke-street?

L. Staff. No, my lords, never in my life; nor saw that Fisher he speaks of, ever in my life.

Oates. My lord, it is against the rules of that house, that any be admitted of that house (if their parents be Catholics) without consent of their parents.

L. Staff. If he be admitted there, I know it not.

Oates. He lives there.

L. Staff. But I protest before God, my lords, I asked him that question, Will you go to the college? No, says he, I will go to lie at the bishop's house: But as for Dr. Perrot, I never was at his lodgings in my life, and I never knew where he lay; he hath been with me sometimes, but I knew not that he was a doctor. But, my lords, I desire I may not be run down by these fellows, who do not speak a word true, not one tittle. My lords, I have witnesses in whose house Fenwick lay. Call them, and ask them if ever they knew me there in their lives.

L. H. S. What kind of man was he?

Oates. My lords, he is an ancient man, he wears his own hair.

L. H. S. Is he a tall man or a low man?

Oates. A lusty man.

L. Staff. Truly, my lords, I never was at his house since I was born.

Oates. My lords, I'll tell your lordships a circumstance; That summer Don Francisco de Melos, the ambassador here, was sick, and I think he died of the sickness, Dr. Perrot was his father confessor; I was waiting for Dr. Perrot some time, for he promised to meet me at his lodgings, and this gentleman, the prisoner at the bar, did come in there.

L. Staff. Where?

Oates. Into Dr. Perrot's lodging. Dr. Perrot had a kinsman there that waited on him; and when my lord he came in, he was in haste to speak with Dr. Perrot, and he offered me half a crown to fetch Dr. Perrot to him, and I made him this reply, I was no porter.

L. Staff. If ever I saw this man in my life since I was born, or heard of his name till the Plot, then I will confess myself guilty of all. Indeed, when first I heard of the Plot (they said) there was one Mr. Oates discovered it, but I did not know any such man.

Oates. I went by another name, and went in another habit; and my lord Stafford, though his memory be bad, yet it can't be so bad, but that he must remember something of me.

L. Staff. I don't remember you, I never saw your face in my life.

L. H. S. You would have given him half a crown to have fetched Dr. Perrot.

L. Staff. It seems then at that time, I took him for a poor fellow, that I should offer him a shilling or two.

Oates. It is like I was, but I refused your half-crown, and told you I was no porter.

L. Staff. My lords, I shall give you evidence that he was a poor fellow, since he gives me occasion to prove it; nay, that he was so poor, that he was brought down to accept of 6d. I will prove it by the party that gave it, now he puts me upon it. But, my lords, this Dr. Oates says he saw some of my letters, I desire to know what was in them; did he take any notes? What was in them?

L. H. S. Did you, when you had a sight of these letters at St. Omers, take any notes out of them?

Oates. What notes I did take, if I did take any, I have not now in being; but I do not remember that I did take any. Besides, my lords, we could keep no papers by us, but what we communicated to our superiors, and therefore it was still their care to look after their papers themselves; and in that circumstance of time, if they had known I had taken notes out of their papers, it would have been prejudicial to me, and endangered my life.

Ld. Staff. My Lords, I do infer this one thing further, upon what this Dr. Oates tells you; he did seemingly profess himself of the catholic religion, and I do stand upon it, that hereupon he is no competent witness in that which he offers against me: For he being of the church of England, (for I think he professes himself so, and wears that habit) I say, any man let him be who he will in the world, church of England man or other, that shall pretend himself to be a papist, for what end soever it may be that he so pretends, and dissembles with God Almighty, which he must do to a great height in receiving the sacrament, which is by your lordships and the House of Commons declared to be gross idolatry, is not easily to be esteemed a witness. I appeal to your lordships, to the House of Commons, and every body, whether such a fellow, that will abhor his religion, let him do it for any ends in the world, be a man to be credited; and especially engaging in such a way, to such an height, in that which his conscience tells him is idolatrous, is not a perjured fellow, and no competent witness? No christian, but a devil, and a witness for the devil. And I appeal to the whole christian world, if a protestant of the church of England should come to be a servant to a catholic, and pretend himself a papist, and were not so, whether he were fit to be countenanced: As it did once happen to me at Brussels, before the king came in, one that was a protestant came to be my footman, and he professed himself afterwards to be a catholic; and when I found he was not so, I told him what a villain he was, and he ought to be punished severely. I detest such dissembling with God; and I think by the laws of God and man, and the holy scriptures, such a perjured man is no witness. I am sorry I have troubled your lordships so long; but now if you please to give me leave, my Lords, I will give you my reasons why I called him now: When I did remember how he had dissembled with God Almighty, as I said before, I did consider with myself, sure this Dr. Oates must have been, ever since he hath returned, of a very severe, strict, and sober life; for a man that hath so dissembled with God, ought to shew himself of an exemplary, peaceful, pious, civil life, to testify the truth and reality of his repentance. But last night when I came home, and was sitting by the fire-side, extremely weary, my daughter here comes in, and asks me if I had heard what had passed between Dr. Oates and the lieutenant; how he called the lieutenant rascal and gaoler: Sure then, said I to myself, this is not the quiet, civil, sober man, that such-a-one that hath lived as he hath done, ought to be. And this is the reason I speak of it, that he should call him vile names, gaoler and rascal; it did not become a man of his coat to do it: whether it was so or no, I do not know; but Mr. Lieutenant, I suppose, will satisfy your lordship.

L. H. S. What did Oates say to you, Mr. Lieutenant.

Lieutenant. My Lords, I was desiring Mr. Oates, that he would keep the people down, because there was a great crowd; and seeing a great many people come in, he told me they were witnesses that were to come in: Said I, I believe half of these are not witnesses; and the door opening so often, I could keep this place in no order; so I desired they would stand away that were not witnesses; Why, says he, you are but a gaoler. Then I told him, if it were not for his coat, and I were out of this place, I would break his head. Then he called me rascal.

L. Staff. My Lord Steward, I desire to know whether this be a witness fit to be believed against any man.

L. H. S. Mr. Oates, this does not become you; it is very ill manners in you.

Oates. My Lords, the lieutenant of the Tower hath the law; and I refer myself to the law, if I have done him any wrong.

Serj. Maynard. It did not become Mr. Lieutenant of the Tower to tell him he would break his head.

Lieutenant. Why? If a man out of the court, or in any other habit, should tell me I was a gnor, I think I should not deserve to be the king's lieutenant, if I did not break his head.

Serj. Maynard. Pray tell the court so. But yet, under favour, you ought not to threaten him for a word to break his head.

Ld. Staff. My Lords, I do say this to your lordships, a man that hath dissembled with God Almighty in so high a nature, as he acknowledges himself to have done, ought to be a man of a very severe life afterwards, and not so passionate and choleric, as it seems this fellow is.

L. H. S. Will your lordship proceed?

Ld. Staff. For this man truly I shall say no more; I think I have said enough to make him appear a person not fit to be believed. I would only ask Stephen Dugdale a question, if you please, it is but a little, I will not hold you long. I only ask, and if he deny it I will prove it, whether he was not a prisoner at Stafford for debt, when he made the first affidavit?

L. H. S. Were you a prisoner for debt at Stafford, when you made your first affidavit?

Dugd. In the serjeant's hands I was, my Lords.

Ld. Staff. For a very great debt, my Lords, some hundreds of pounds, and he was a fellow not worth a groat. And, my Lords, Dr. Oates says I offered him half-a-crown, and he refused it: I call Ellen Rigby to prove he was so poor he begged for six-pence.

Oates. I will save my lord the trouble of proving any such thing. My lord Stafford says I was a poor man, and had not six-pence in my pocket: I can make it appear to the House of Lords, that some time since I came in upon this discovery, I have not had two-pence in my pocket, and sometimes I have not had 6 pence; but a man's poverty is no objection against his honesty.

Ld. Staff. Where is Ellen Rigby, to prove whether she did not give him six-pence? But then, my Lords, pray ask him, whether he did not swear at a former trial, he had spent 6 or 700*l.* more than he got?

L. H. S. Did you say at a former trial, you were 5 or 600*l.* out of purse?

Oates. My Lords, I will satisfy this house what I said: What folks write after me, I am not to justify. But, my Lords, I had a friend of mine presented me with 100*l.* I name not his name, but if that be questioned, he is a Peer of this House, and will justify it: I had 100*l.* for my Narrative; I had 100*l.* for taking some Jesuits, which is 300*l.* I had for some other copies that I printed, a matter of 50 or 60*l.* And now I can make it appear, that as to those sums which I received in gross, I have spent them all, and more, in this service: for I have none of the money now by me.

L. Staff. He makes out but 360*l.* and he swore he was out 700*l.* but he does not swear one true tittle, nor is any whit to be believed.

Oates. If you expect I should prove it, I can prove it now.

Managers. Be quiet, Dr. Oates, we will do you right anon.

L. Staff. My lords, I do not know for the present that I have any thing else to trouble your lordships with. I remember these gentlemen, when I asked them if they had any more evidence to give in, said, no, unless I should give them some occasion: and now I desire your lordships, if they bring any new evidence, that I may have time to answer to it.

L. H. S. God forbid but you should have liberty to answer any objection.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, before we go about to sum up our evidence, we shall have occasion to call some witnesses, and that will be to fortify what our witnesses have said, to discover what kind of witnesses have been made use of against them, and to falsify what my lord's witnesses have said in some particulars. These will be the three heads for which we desire to call witnesses. And because, my lords, we will not trouble you with making one entire Narration of what they can say, or to what purpose we call them before they come, desire the favour that we may acquaint your lordships with it, still as we call them; for that we think will be the way more clearly to be understood. My lords, we shall begin to make good by other witnesses, some things said by Mr. Dugdale (for he was our first witness, and therefore in order of time we will begin with him.) My lords, the prisoner at the bar was pleased to object—

L. Staff. My lords, I would not interrupt him; but I would ask whether they are more than two heads that he proceeds upon to fortify their own evidence, and to falsify mine.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, I think we may comprehend all under those two heads. But, my lords, you observe, one great matter my lord did insist upon yesterday, was this, that he, it is true, hath seen Mr. Dugdale at my lord Aston's; (though by the way I must say this, my lord at the first did not seem to know him)—

L. Staff. I did not know him in his perriwig.

L. H. S. Do not interrupt them, my lord, for they must have the same liberty that you had, to go on without interruption.

Sir W. Jones. We must have the same freedom my lord had. I will do his lordship that right, he did afterwards recollect himself and say, his perriwig had made that alteration in him, that he did not know him. But my lord was also pleased to say yesterday, that though he did not know him, yet he looked upon him as so mean and inconsiderable a fellow, that he did purposely avoid all discourse with him; and that sometimes when he was a-dry at my lord Aston's, he would not speak to him to help him, nor to call one to help him to drink. My lord was pleased yesterday also to deny that ever he had any converse with him, but only that one time, when indeed Mr. Dugdale did desire to make use of my lord, that by his interposition he might have leave to go to the foot-race. My lords, your lordships very well perceive we are now going about to prove a matter mostly arising within my lord Aston's family; and what witnesses we shall have from thence, your lordships may easily imagine will not be very favourable to us: And if we have not many to this point, your lordships will take into consideration, that those who can give the fullest proof here, must be those of the family, and the religion of the family. But, my lords, we will call one or two that I believe will give you satisfaction that my lord, the prisoner, was no such stranger to Mr. Dugdale; that they have been seen together, and alone together: and that is the first thing we desire to call witnesses to. Call Mr. Ansell and William Hanson.

Mr. Hanson was sworn.

L. H. S. Where do you live? whose servant are you?

Hanson. At Wilnal in Staffordshire.

L. H. S. What do you ask him?

Sir W. Jones. I desire, if you be satisfied where he lives, that he will tell you, whether he hath been at my lord Aston's, and seen my lord Stafford there?

L. H. S. Have you seen my lord Stafford at my lord Aston's?

Hanson. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. When?

Hanson. A little above two years ago.

L. Staff. Be pleased he may name the time positively.

Sir W. Jones. My lord Stafford is not so well versed in prosecutions of this nature, as to know that he is not to interrupt us while we are examining our witnesses.

L. H. S. My lord, your lordship received no interruption, nor must give none.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we desire this witness may be asked, whether or no he hath seen Mr. Dugdale and my lord Stafford at any time together?

L. H. S. What say you?

Hanson. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. When, and where?

Hanson. I cannot justly tell the time.

L. H. S. Can you tell the place?

Hanson. Yes, at my lord Aston's.

L. H. S. Whereabout?

Hanson. In my lord Aston's parlour.

L. H. S. And were they alone?

Hanson. Mr. Dugdale fetched me to my lord Stafford.

L. H. S. And was nobody in the parlour when Dugdale fetched you to my lord?

Hanson. No, my lords, I think there was not.

L. Staff. He thinks there was not.

Hanson. There was not to my best remembrance.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, will you be pleased to ask him the occasion why Dugdale fetched him to him?

Hanson. My lord had a mind to have a boy.

L. H. S. What was the occasion that Dugdale did come to fetch you to my lord Stafford in the parlour?

Hanson. To bring the boy, my lords, young

Hawkins. Mr. Dugdale fetched me and the boy to him; it was a boy that my lord would have to live with him.

Sir W. Jones. Can you tell what time of the year it was? whether winter or summer, as near as you can?

L. H. S. Ay, what time of the year was it?

Hanson. Indeed, my lords, I cannot tell.

Sir W. Jones. I desire to ask him, whether when he went away he left them together?

L. H. S. Did you leave them together?

Hans. To my best remembrance, my lords, I did. The boy and I went away together, and we left them at my lord Aston's parlour door.

Sir W. Jones. Call James Ansell.

L. H. S. Nay, if you have done with him, my lord Stafford may ask him any question.

L. Staff. My lords, I shall tell you how this thing is: There was a report that this Hawkins was a very good running footboy; and this was spoken of at my lord Aston's at dinner or supper, I don't know which, may several times about that time; It was when my lord of Danby was treasurer, and his son, my lord Dunblain, was much for foot matches, and I had a mind to have a footboy to make a match with him; and I believe Dugdale at dinner or supper did say that he was a good running lad, and I might desire to see him, and Dugdale did bring him to me I believe into my lord Aston's parlour; but there was at least six or seven in the room besides.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, was this at that time when your lordship was at Tixall the 12th of September?

L. Staff. Pray, my lords, I desire to ask him that question; I would know what year it was.

L. H. S. He says it was above two years ago.

L. Staff. I profess I believe it was one or two years before I was taxed with this Plot. I did never think I should be questioned about this, or I could easily have brought witnesses, that were by at that time. It is true, he did come to me; but pray what time of day was it?

Hans. In the morning, I think it was.

L. Staff. I profess to God, it was after supper; as I hope to be saved, it was as we were going to bed, to the best of my remembrance.

Sir W. Jones. Did you come into the parlour after supper?

Hans. I am not sure what time it was.

Sir W. Jones. If his lordship please to ask him any more questions; if not, we will call another. — James Ansell. (Who was sworn.)

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. James Ansell.

L. H. S. Where do you live?

Ansell. At Heywood in Staffordshire.

L. H. S. Did you live with my lord Aston?

Ansell. I have been at my lord's house at Tixall.

L. H. S. But you are not of the family?

Ansell. No.

L. H. S. How far is Heywood from Tixall?

Ansell. A mile.

L. H. S. Have you seen my lord Stafford at Tixall?

Ansell. I have seen a man they called my lord Stafford. I did not know him, but as they told me.

L. H. S. Did you ever see Dugdale in the company of a man they called my lord Stafford?

Ansell. Two years ago I was at Tixall, and there I saw one, that they said was my lord Stafford, walking with Mr. Dugdale, whom I did know.

L. H. S. Where was it?

Ansell. In the court at Tixall, walking together.

L. H. S. Were they alone? Was there no body else in company?

Ansell. None that I saw; there might be more in company, but I saw no more.

Sir W. Jones. Pray my lords, ask how long ago this was.

Ansell. About a summer was two years.

Sir W. Jones. If his lordship will ask him any questions now we have done, he may; otherwise we will call another.

L. Staff. My lords, I have recollected myself as well as I can in so short a time, and all I can say, is, some of my servants were by, I suppose; and I do assure your lordships, the other business was above three years ago: so the other does not know what he does say.

L. H. S. Will you ask him any questions?

L. Staff. Pray ask him how long he saw me in the court with Dugdale.

L. H. S. How long was it?

Ansell. I cannot tell: I did but walk through the court. I came to speak with Mr. Dugdale, and he was with my lord.

L. Staff. Did he hear us discourse, any word we said?

Ansell. No, I did not.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, if you please, before Ansell go away, we would ask him a question to another point; and that is, for what reason Dugdale was secured, whether he went away for debt or no.

L. H. S. Do you know wherefore Dugdale was secured, or why he went from my lord Aston's?

Ansell. I can't tell why he went away; whether for fear of the Plot, or no I can't tell.

Sir W. Jones. What discourse was between you and Dugdale about it?

Ansell. Where? There was a discourse at Stafford when he was there.

Sir W. Jones. But before he went away?

Ansell. I came to my lord Aston's one day, and told Mr. Dugdale I heard say he was concerned in the Plot; for I told him I was amongst some people, and they say you are concerned in the Plot. And this was about a fortnight after the news was hot in our country.

L. H. S. What said he?

Ansell. He laughed at it, and said, God blast him if he knew any thing of it.

L. Staff. So he denied it then?

Sir W. Jones. Pray, sir, at that time did he say he knew any thing about my lord Aston, and why my lord Aston did use him ill.

[Then my lord Stafford objected Mr. Dug-dale was too near the witness, and desired he might go down: and it was ordered accordingly.]

Sir F. Win. My lords, we would ask this man what he does know of Dugdale concealing himself after he had heard of the discourse about the Plot.

Ansell. I know not that, my lords; he was fearful of coming in company; what his discourse was, I do not know.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, now, if it please your lordships, we will go to another particular. Your lordships will please to remember, that yesterday there were two witnesses called by my lord Stafford, that is, Sambidge and Philips. Sambidge was the old gentleman that was deaf, and a little passionate too, because he was once summoned to Litchfield court; Mr. Philips was the minister of Tixall: And both these did testify, That whereas Mr. Dugdale had sworn as a former trial, that he did give notice before them of the death of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey upon Monday, which, as I take it, was the 14th of October, there was no such notice given in their presence. Mr. Dugdale did affirm they were by, and that he gave notice before them and others. This was made use of by my lord to invalidate the testimony of Mr. Dugdale, that he should go and affirm at a former trial, that he did give notice of the death of sir Edmundbury Godfrey within two days after he was killed, before any one knew of it; and Dugdale must needs know it from the Jesuits; and both of these gentlemen being now in court, do deny that they heard of it at that time. My lords, we shall prove to you here, that he did give notice of it at that time, and that they were both present: For Mr. Sambidge, it is not so strange he should not observe it; he was very deaf, and he could hardly hear yesterday; and as he was deaf, so he was very passionate. As for Mr. Philips, I cannot say that as to him, but perhaps he cannot at that distance of time remember; but we will prove by undeniable witnesses, the notice was given that Monday, and that these persons were by when it was given.

Sir F. Win. This witness we use to another purpose besides this; but we will ask him only to this now.

L. Staff. I desire the witnesses may stand by themselves.

L. H. S. Let them take care that there be but one witness at a time, and that nobody approach them while they are giving their testimony.

Sir W. Jones. We did not make the like desire as to my lord's witnesses.

L. Staff. In troth, you might with all my heart, if you would.

Sir W. Jones. It may be so; but we did not fear them so much. Swear William Goldsmith. (Which was done)

Sir W. Jones. I would begin with James Ansell. Who appeared, and stood up again.)

Sir F. Win. If your lordships please, we would ask him what he knows of a discourse about the justice of peace's death; to tell the time, and what it was that was said? We only ask general questions.

L. H. S. What discourse did you hear of the murder of a justice of peace, and when?

Ansell. My lords, I heard it at Tixall.

L. H. S. When did you hear it first?

Ansell. The 14th of October.

L. H. S. Who did you hear it from?

Ansell. From Mr. Dugdale.

L. H. S. The letter was dated the 12th. Where did you hear of it?

Ansell. It was at one Eld's house, an ale-house in Tixall.

L. H. S. Where?

Ansell. At an ale-house hard by my lord's.

L. H. S. Who was by?

Ansell. When that was spoken, there was I, and William Hanson, and Mr. Sambidge, and Mr. Philips.

L. H. S. Did Dugdale speak with them at that time?

Ansell. Yes, he was with them at that time, but he spoke with me at the parlour; for he sent for me into the parlour.

L. H. S. Then at the same time he spake it to you, and they were in the house?

Ansell. Yes, he came from them to me into the parlour, and went to them again.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, I hear him speak to the day of the month; if you please to ask him if he can tell what day of the week it was?

Ansell. It was on a Monday.

L. H. S. That is right, the letter was dated on Saturday the 12th of October.

Sir F. Win. I would ask him, whether afterwards he came into the room where Mr. Philips the parson was?

Ansell. Yes.

Sir F. Win. Was there any discourse, after you came in, about the death of a justice of peace?

Ansell. I cannot tell that.

L. H. S. Will you please to ask him any thing, my lord?

L. Staff. Indeed, my lords, he says nothing concerning me; therefore I say only this, I desire to know, if he can tell, what time of the day it was?

Ansell. It was the forenoon.

Sir W. Jones. Then call William Hanson again. (Who appeared.)

Sir F. Win. We call him to the same question. Do you declare to my lords what you know of Mr. Dugdale's acquainting you with the death of a justice of peace, and when it was.

Hanson. I heard Mr. Dugdale say at old Eld's house at Tixall, There was a justice of peace murdered that lived at Westminster.

L. H. S. When did he tell you so?

Hanson. The day that I went to run the race, the 13th of October.

Sir F. Win. Can you remember what day of the week it was?

Hanson. It was on Monday.

L. H. S. Was it the forenoon or afternoon?

Hanson. The forenoon.

L. H. S. What company was in the house when he told you of it?

Hans. Old Mr. Sambidge, and Mr. Philips the parson of Tixall.

L. H. S. Were they in the house at that time?

Hans. Yes.

L. H. S. Were they by when the discourse was?

Hans. Mr. Sambidge was going to drink a bottle of ale, as he said, at my lord's Bowling-Green; and for a while he sits down, and presently Mr. Philips comes in and sits down, and Mr. Dugdale came out of the parlour into the room where we were come: said I, What news? Said he, they say there is a Justice of Peace murdered at Westminster.

Sir F. Win. Was Philips in the room?

Hans. Yes, he hath forgot it, but he was there.

L. H. S. Did Philips hear it?

Hans. He might have heard it if he would.

L. H. S. Had you any discourse with Philips about this since?

Hans. No, my lords.

Sir F. Win. He is positive both as to the day of the month, and as to the week, and that both of them were present.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we shall prove to you now, that the post which comes out of London on Saturday, comes to this place on Monday morning; and those which come out of Tuesday come there on Thursday morning; and the post which goes out of London on Thursday, comes to this place on Saturday morning.

L. Staff. He says the post comes such and such days, I own it, and in the morning too.

Sir W. Jones. Then I go on, my Lords, to another point, which will be a farther confirmation of the matter. For, my lords, we will prove to you, and that by men of quality, that the noise of the murder was in that country, the Wednesday and Thursday following the murder. Your lordships please to observe, sir E. Godfrey was killed the 12th of October; he was found the Thursday following, which was (as I take it) the 16th or 17th of October. We will prove now, that the noise and knowledge of the murder was in the country about Tixall, before he was found here near London. Now we only bring this as a confirmation of this matter, that it was revealed at the ale-house, and so it went about the country. And for this we call Edward Birch, esq. and John Turton, esq.

Sir F. Win. Before we examine them, I would state the time. Sir E. Godfrey was missing on Saturday, which was the 12th of October; his murder was not discovered till Thursday. We call these persons to a double purpose; the one to fortify what our witnesses have said; and the other to shew, that this man was dispatched by these men's confederates, because they knew it so soon; which could not have been, but that they were in the conspiracy themselves.

L. Staff. I desire only that he may say whether he means me among the rest?

Sir F. Win. My lord, I will do you no wrong, I speak of those at Tixall.

(Then Mr. Birch was sworn.)

L. H. S. When did you hear of the death of sir E. Godfrey, Mr. Birch?

Birch. My lords, I did not hear any thing of the death of sir E. Godfrey, till the Saturday post; but, I presume, that which these gentlemen call me for, is this: I did hear before Thursday, I think Tuesday was the first day, that there was a Justice of Peace of Middlesex killed, and it was thought the papists murdered him; and this on Tuesday and Wednesday was all over the country, that is, Tuesday after his death. For I will tell your lordships how I came to take notice of it; for hearing such a report in the country, I did not so much as take notice of it; but being at the King's-bench bar, at the Trial of Green, Berry, and Hill, for the murder of sir E. Godfrey, I found upon the evidence, that the body was not found till the Thursday after he was killed; that made me recollect myself as to what I had heard in the country: and as I stood at the bar, I told several gentlemen that I did perfectly remember before Thursday it was discoursed of in the country by several gentlemen where I lived.

Sir W. Jones. Call John Turton, esq.

Sir F. Win. Some of my lords here I perceive desire he should be asked a more particular question.

L. H. S. I desire to ask him this: you heard of it, you say, on Tuesday, that a Justice of Peace of Middlesex was killed; I desire to know who you heard it from?

Birch. Truly, my lords, I cannot tell: for I will tell your lordships, I have some certain days that I constantly appoint to be at home in, when people come about business to me. Among these people, several came that asked me what news I had from London. I told them, I had received a letter or two by the post, and I shewed them those letters, there was little or nothing in them. Thereupon they asked me, if I did not hear of a Justice of Middlesex that was killed? No, said I: how come you to hear it? Says one, I come through Cank, (which is within half a mile of mine own house,) and as I came through, there came a person from Heywood, that said, it is all the news about Tixall and Heywood, and that part of the country. And this was said to me in my own house.

Sir F. Win. How far is Heywood from Tixall?

Birch. About a mile.

Sir F. Win. Now, my lords, I would ask Mr. Turton to the same business.

(Mr. Turton was sworn.)

L. H. S. Mr. Turton, pray hear: When did you first hear in Staffordshire of the death of a Justice of Peace of Middlesex?

Turton. My lords, there are two races in that country, at a place near Lichfield, and they are about the middle of October; the one that year was the 15th, the other the 18th.

The one the Tuesday, and the other the Friday. I was at both of them: and one of the days, which I cannot be positive in, there was one Mr. Whitehall, a Justice of Peace in Staffordshire, called me from the company, and desired me to speak with me by myself. Said he, do you hear any news? No, said I. Do you hear nothing, said he, of a Justice of Peace that is murdered? (I then had not heard of sir E. Godfrey's being missing) No. Says he, don't you hear he is murdered? Do you know him? Yes, said I: how do you hear it? Says he, it is a report about us. But I did not then believe it: but the next post-day, which was Monday, I did hear it. It was either Tuesday or Friday, one of those days.

Sir W. Jones. If it were either one or the other, it is as strange, and the evidence as strong; for his body was not found till Thursday.

Sir F. Win. And will your lordships please to observe, that by that time the report had got the name of Godfrey too, when at the same time we in London did not know what was become of him.

Turton. He asked me if I knew sir E. Godfrey: said he, I hear he was an active Justice of the Peace against the papists; and he made this inference, we had need have a care what we do, for we shall be all sacrificed.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, will your lordships be pleased to observe, that yesterday there were some witnesses called to disparage Mr. Dugdale; and the first man, as I can remember, was a very substantial gentleman, called Mr. Robinson: I think he was not able to give an account of his employment, but he was a gentleman, that lived upon his money; I remember those were his words. My lords, we shall call (without telling you what they will say) some witnesses to prove the condition of this gentleman, what reputation he is of, and what is his conversation. And we first call my lady Gerard.

L. Staff. My lords, pray give me leave to say one word——But it is no great matter, it is not worth the speaking.

L. H. S. What can you say, my lord?

L. Staff. It was only a thought of my own, not worth troubling your lordships with.

(Then the Lady Gerard appeared, and was sworn.)

L. H. S. Does your ladyship know one William Robinson?

Lady Gerard. No, my lords.

Sir W. Jones. He hath several names, we desire he may be called.

L. H. S. Call Robinson the upholsterer.

(He was called; but appeared not.)

Sir W. Jones. I perceive we mistake one lady for another. We desire Mr. Booth, a member of the House of Commons, may be sworn. (Which was done in his place.)

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, send for Robinson your witness.

L. Staff. I believe he is here; but if he be not, one that belongs to me I have sent to see for him: whether he be a good or bad witness, I do not know personally.

Sir W. Jones. Mr. Booth knows him very well, he saw him yesterday, and so we may venture to ask him the question.

L. H. S. Did you see Robinson the witness yesterday?

Mr. Booth. Yes, my lords, I did.

L. H. S. Do you know him?

Mr. Booth. My lords, I do know him very well, though I have not seen him often: for indeed, my lords, he behaved himself so the first time that I saw him, that I believe I shall never forget him. My lords, I am better acquainted with his character than his person, though I know the man very well; and truly the first time that ever I was in his company, he gave me no encouragement ever to desire it again; for, if you please, I will tell you how I came to know him. He told your lordships that he came into Cheshire at a cocking; it was at that time that I saw him: for upon the Sunday after the cocking, I was invited to a neighbour's, about two miles from home. We were set down to dinner, and we had not sat long, but this man comes into the room where we were; there was an empty place at the lower end of the table, and he sits him down, and began a discourse to ridicule the Lord's day, in such a manner as I never heard the like. And the rest of his discourse was full of a great deal of contempt of God Almighty, and all that was sacred. All his discourse at dinner was very profane. It was not in mine own house; and because it was not taken notice of by the master of the house, and he coming under the protection of a young gentleman, I did not what else I should; for I should have made him hold his tongue, or have used it to better purpose: the whole of his discourse was so atheistical and profane, that I never heard the like in my life. When dinner was done, he used a great many enticements to draw the company into play, by asking what would they say, if they should see such and such things to be done? And at length he pulls out a great many dice out of his pocket, and behaves himself in that manner, as people do that would draw in others to play; and they that had better skill in it than I, said that they were all false. When I saw this, I desired him to leave our room, or to forbear; for, said I, if this be the entertainment of the day, I must leave the company: then they commanded him to desist. This is all that I do know of my own knowledge: but I shall acquaint you what I believe; for I have heard it from very considerable persons, whom I dare credit: for the man run much in my mind, because I never saw so ill a man in my life. Coming home, I was speaking to some of my family; says I, Yonder I met with the strangest fellow that I ever saw in my days, he is fitter to be hanged than any thing else. Oh, Sir, said they, there is such a fellow hath cheated I know not how many at the town where the cocking was. The next day, I think it was, or shortly after, I had occasion to go to that town; and many people came and complained to me of his cheats, to a very great degree. They asked me, what they should do? Said I, You have nothing to do but indict him for a cheat. Why, said they, will you take no course with him? Said I, What course can I take? I am turned out of the commission of the peace, else I know enough to bind him to his good behaviour. After this, I had occasion to go into Lancashire, and there I found he was better known than trusted. There were very loud complaints against him, and some would have given 20*l.* to meet with him. I heard afterwards he went into Staffordshire, and he changed his name wherever he went; but he soon discovered himself, and all thereabouts he goes for a notorious cheat. This is all I can say of him.

L. Staff. My lords, Be pleased to give me leave to say one word. I assure you, if I had thought this man had been such a fellow as now he proves, I would not have brought him before you. I never knew what he was in my life, nor heard of his name till Saturday last.

L. H. S. It may be so, my lord: but your lordship must take notice, this is the man that gave the most important evidence, that Dugdale should corrupt him to swear against you for money.

L. Staff. Give me leave to observe upon that, my lords, That if Dugdale knew him to be a cheating fellow, he might think him the liker to take money to forswear himself.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, We shall not reply now, but observe anon, how this cheating fellow comes to swear for my lord at this time. But we desire an honourable peer of this House may give some account of him, and that is the noble lord the earl of Macclesfield; I think he may be known to your lordships.

(Then the Earl of Macclesfield stood up.)

L. H. S. Pardon me, my good lord, my lord must be sworn.*

Earl of Macc. Before I am sworn, I would know of your lordships, whether I should be sworn or no? for your lordship shall not make me be sworn, unless my lords say I should.

L. H. S. I should not offer it, if there were any colour of doubt in it.

(Then my Lord was sworn.)

E. of Macc. My lords, I have nothing to say against this man, but what he said to me, and before a justice of peace too; for I did take this man when he had run away from my lord Gerard. He had cheated many of his servants. I caught him on the way running to play his tricks somewhere else, and I intercepted him; but though I was a justice of peace there, yet because it was in a manner my own case, I would not commit him, till I had carried him before another justice of peace. So the man comes up to me; says he, my lord, have you a mind to have your son-in-law bubbled? I have been only teaching him how to avoid being cheated; I acknowledge myself to be a cheat, and I would teach him to avoid them. I am going now into Staffordshire, and that was all I intended to his lordship: I am a rogue I confess. And upon this a justice of peace comes in, and while they were examining of him, we bid some that were by to search him, and they found in his pocket false dice; and truly the justice nor I did not know whether they were true or false. Says he, You do not know what to do with these, but I do. This is all I can say; but in all the three counties of Staffordshire, Cheshire, and Lancashire, there are several men that I see here, that know his life better than I do; for it is his common practice. And I believe, my lords, the judges must know him; for it was his common practice at all assizes and great meetings to play these pranks.

* See the Note to vol. 2, p. 772. The Countess of Shrewsbury's Case. So in Lord Macclesfield's Case, A. D. 1723, post. the Bishop of Oxford gave his testimony upon oath, as did Lord Stormont in the Case of Mr. Hastings, A. D. 1789, post. See also Blackst. Comm. B. 1. Ch. 12. (vol. 1, p. 402, 15th ed.) and Mr. Christian's Note on the passage.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we will not trouble your lordships any further as to Robinson; if he were here, perhaps my lady would know him; but having two such witnesses, I think we need not trouble ourselves nor you any more about him.

L. H. S. Have you done with my lady Gerard?

Sir W. Jones. Yes, and we beg her pardon for this trouble. My lords, your lordships will be pleased to remember, there was one Holt was produced as a witness by my lord Stafford; and your lordship, when you look on your notes, will remember he testified to this purpose: that Dugdale sent an horse for him to Stafford town; which horse brought him to the Star Inn, and there Dugdale did offer him 40*l.* to swear, That one Mr. Moor carried away Evers the jesuit. My lord, we will call some witnesses to this Mr. Holt; you will find him to be something a-kin to Mr. Robinson, and, as we suppose, of nothing a better reputation than he. The witnesses will give you an account of his pranks. Call Sampson Rawlins, and Lander. (Rawlins stood up, and was sworn.)

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. Sampson Rawlins.

L. H. S. What you ask him?

Sir W. Jones. We desire to ask him if he knows Samuel Holt the black-smith?

L. H. S. Do you know Holt?

Rawlins. Yes.

Sir F. Win. Acquaint my lords what reputation he is of, where he lives, and what he is.

Rawl. He is counted to be a very lewd, loose fellow.

L. H. S. Why so?

Sir W. Jones. What hath he done?

Rawl. He is counted a drunken, lewd fellow.

Sir W. Jones. Is he of an ill reputation in the country where he lives?

Rawl. Yes, he is so.

L. H. S. For what?

Rawl. It is said in the town he keeps another man's wife.

Sir W. Jones. Is there any other fault he hath?

Rawl. He said there were none but rogues would take Mr. Dugdale's part; whereas I never knew any harm by Mr. Dugdale, and I have known him this 14 or 15 years: I dealt with him, I was a taylor to the family, and he ever paid me very honestly and well.

Sir W. Jones. Have you heard of Mr. Holt any other ill thing besides what you speak of?

Rawl. He broke open my lord Aston's wine-cellar, and stole several bottles of wine; wherefore my lord Aston bid Mr. Dugdale send him to the gaol: but he carried favour with Mr. Dugdale, and so kept in with him, that he afterwards begged for him of my lord to forgive him; and now he comes to evidence against Mr. Dugdale, that was his sure stedfast friend, and saved him from the gaol.

L. Staff. I would ask this witness a question—

Rawl. And because I took Mr. Dugdale's part, saying, he was an honest man (and he was so to me, and all others, as far as ever I heard) he met me, and would have murdered me.

L. H. S. When was this?

Rawl. Since last term, when I was up here, and likewise Sawyer took a pot, and would have donged my brains out.

Sir F. Win. My lords, I think this man was summoned as a witness, to attend at my lord Aston's trial. What occasion brought you to London at that time?

Rawl. I was subpoenaed up. And when I came home to my wife and children, they grossly abused me, and said I was a rogue, because I came up upon his majesty's service.

L. Staff. Pray, my lords, ask him whether Holt was my lord Aston's servant or no.

L. H. S. Was Holt a servant to my lord Aston?

Rawl. He was a smith hard by his gate, and he worked to the family.

L. H. S. Were you subpoenaed up to the trial of my lord Aston?

Rawl. Yes.

L. H. S. And it was for coming to that trial he offered to murder you?

Rawl. Yes, I have several witnesses of it. And by the blow that Thomas Sawyer gave me, for a good while I could not lay my head on the pillow.

Sir W. Jones. Call Thomas Lander. (But he did not appear, being gone away sick.)

Sir W. Jones. Because we would not lose your lordships time, seeing the man we call for is gone away sick, we will call a witness as to another of my lord's witnesses, John Moral. Call Thomas Thorne. (Who was sworn.)

Sir F. Win. My lords, if that other man come by-and-by, we hope your lordships will give us leave to ask him a question to the point which we are now gone over. But my lord Stafford did produce one John Morral, a barber that lived at Ridgely, who said, that money was offered him to swear against sir James Symons, and Mr. Howard, and others. We call this witness to give your lordships an account what this Morral is, and how he hath behaved himself in this business.

Sir W. Jones. What do you say about John Morral? Do you know him?—Thorne. Yes.

L. H. S. What do you know of him?

Thorne. I know he is a man that used to come often to my lord Aston's to Tixall; to trim him, he is a poor fellow that walks up and down the country, and hath little or nothing to live on.

L. H. S. Is he poor and needy?

Thorne. Yes, he hath been sued for money, and I have been contributory to keep him out of prison.

Sir W. Jones. I ask you in general, is he of a good or bad reputation?

Thorne. Indifferent.

Sir W. Jones. It is modestly said. My lords, your lordships have heard what kind of witness has been brought against us: For two of them, you have had particular matters; for a third, our witness speaks modestly, that he is a man of indifferent reputation. But now, my lords, we must prove what endeavours have been used to get other witnesses against our witnesses; and for that, I desire to call one Simon Wright, to tell your lordships what hath been offered him to swear against Dugdale, and by whom. (Wright stood up and was sworn.)

Mr. Foley. My lords, we desire this witness would give your lordships some account what endeavours have been used by offers of money, or otherwise, to make him swear against Dugdale, and by whom.

L. H. S. Hath any body endeavoured to persuade you to swear against Dugdale?

Wright. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. Tell your whole story, who it was, and what was offered you?

Wright. The first time I was employed was presently after the murder of sir E. Godfrey; and it was by one Mr. Plessington, that was in custody about that matter: And he sent me one Sunday morning to the marquis of Winchester's, to desire him to consider what a charge he lay at; and my lord did send him word, he could not expect to be discharged so soon. The Tuesday after he was discharged; and afterwards coming unto me, I told him I was glad he had so good friends to get out so soon. He told me, were I in the same condition, I should have as good, or better. Whereupon Mr. Plessington and I were as good friends as any about the town. I was his barber, and barber to Mr. Dugdale, and we were all great cronies. And Plessington told me, if I could find a way to take off his evidence, or destroy him, I should have 700*l*. I went to enquire out where I might have a security for the money, and Mr. Reeves, an apothecary in Chancery-Lane, did proffer me his note, and so did Mr. Dewy the scrivener: but I did not, nor had the money. And several times, particularly at the trial of Mrs. Price and Mr. Tasborough, they would have had me sworn quite blank. That he would have hired me to have sworn against them. And afterwards they would have had me own I was forsworn, and they would get me a pardon.

L. H. S. What had you sworn?

Wright. What I heard Mrs. Price say at the Horse-shoe, in Chancery-Lane, as to the blasting of Dugdale, as may be seen in the trial.

L. H. S. Who offered you that 700*l*?

Wright. My lord Bellasis's steward.

L. H. S. What is his name?

Wright. Plessington.

Sir F. Win. My lords, I think he says he was to swear against Mr. Dugdale; I desire he would explain himself more particularly, and tell who it was that offered the money to swear against Dugdale.

Wright. Mr. Plessington, my lords. And since the trial of Mrs. Price, they did persuade me to write a paper for the blasting the reputation of Dugdale, and to shake his credit by it. And that they carried to Mr. Drayton and sir James Symons, and they being satisfied, would have me write again to those gentlemen, and they framed a letter for me to write. And thereupon Mr. Longiore (I know the gentleman if I see him again) told me that sir James Symons was better able to perform, than Dugdale was to promise; and if I would stand by it, I should be a happy man.

L. H. S. What had you said in that paper?

Wright. I had said according as they directed me, That Mr. Dugdale would have given me money to swear against sir James Symons and Mr. Gerard.

L. H. S. Did you swear that?

Wright. No, I did not, but I was to have done it.

L. H. S. How came it to pass you did not agree with them?

Wright. My lords, I have had 4*l*. in hand, and that I had by reason poverty came upon me. And my lord Bellasis's steward came and lay with me, and spent 90*s*. upon me; but finding that I was not absolutely true to them, nor like to go through, they distrusted me: and I borrowed an horse of capt. Chetwin, and got down into the country, where I have been since July last, till I was fetched up by a messenger to come and give evidence for the king. And there I received a letter from my lord Ascou's agent, That if I would call at Stafford, and come up with my lord's witnesses, they would bear my charges up to London. I have the letter in my pocket.

L. Staff. If it please you, he may shew the letter. (Which he did.)

Clerk. "This for Simon Wright, a barber, at _____ Deliver with care. Subscribed, Your loving friend Abnett."

' Simon Wright ; I have just now received a letter from the lord Stafford, wherein my lord mentioned Wright to be one of his witnesses, and desired me forthwith to give Wright notice, that if possible, he should be at London on the Saturday night next, his trial being to be on the Tuesday after ; therefore if he pleased to come to him, he should give him money to bear his charges up, and he should come up with my lord's witnesses. ABRETT. (This is the substance of the letter as it was taken.)

Sir W. Jones. I presume your lordships will be pleased to take notice, he was intended a witness for my lord ; and it was supposed then that he was able to say something, but he was not produced by my lord yesterday.

L. Staff. Pray, my lords, give me leave, as to this witness ; I desire, if you please, I may have time to prove something against this man till to-morrow : I have enough against him.

Serj. Maynard. You will find another witness, I suppose, by that time.

L. Staff. No, I will not find him, I have him already ; I have enough against this fellow.

L. H. S. You shall have time to say what you will, my lord.

Serj. Maynard. I would my lord would name his witness.

L. Staff. I will name him to you, since you ask it, it is Dodd ; he knows what I mean well enough.

Wright. I do not know him, my lord, I assure you.

Sir W. Jones. My Lords, we will go on now to another matter. My lord Stafford was pleased to object, that Mr. Dugdale did talk much of letters and proceedings, but was able to shew none of them. My lords, we will give an account how that comes about : Mr. Dugdale, as in part hath been proved already, was apprehensive of being accused for the plot : nay, I think we shall prove he was afraid he had been in the proclamation against those traitors and jesuits that were fled. We shall prove, that Mr. Dugdale, to secure himself, and his then friends (for he was not then come over to make any discovery) did burn a great many letters and papers that did relate to those proceedings, and did not leave any thing remaining ; hoping thereby to prevent a discovery. We will call witnesses that were by when it was done, and I think that will be some answer to this objection. Call Elizabeth Eld, and Anne Eld.

Elizabeth Eld sworn.

Sir F. Win. My Lords, if your lordships please, we would ask her this general question ; What she knows of Mr. Dugdale's burning a great many letters and papers, at what place, and about what time ?

Elizabeth Eld. I cannot possibly say to the time ; I burnt some writings for him when he went away, he desired me to burn them, he did not tell me what writings they were. He said, 3 times were troublesome, and if he should be sick upon the road where he was going he would not have all his papers seen ; but he desired me to burn them. And I took and burnt them all but one book ; and my sister asked if that book should be burnt : he said, No, there was nothing of treason in it. I asked him if there were any thing of treason in the others ; and he said, Do you think there was ?

Sir W. Jones. How long was this before he went away ?

Elix. Eld. That morning when he went away.

Sir W. Jones. How many papers were there ?

Elix. Eld. I cannot say how many.

Sir W. Jones. I do not ask you the number, but the quantity, was there a bushel ?

E. Eld. I cannot say ; they were rolled up, and put in his pockets and his breeches.

L. H. S. Were they parchments or papers ?

E. Eld. They were papers.

L. H. S. Were they letters ?

E. Eld. I did not see what they were, but they were wrapt up together ; they might be the accounts of the house, for what I know.

Sir F. Win. But she says, as I take it, that Mr. Dugdale said there was treason in them.

E. Eld. No, he said, Did I think there was ? He said it was no matter for burning that little book, there was no treason in that ; and when I asked him if there was any in the others, he said, Do you think there was ?

L. H. S. Was it one or two bundles ?

E. Eld. There were several bundles, they were not tied up, but taken in handfuls and thrown into the fire.

Mr. Foley. If my lord Stafford will ask her no question, we will call up another.

E. Eld. My Lords, I did see Mr. Dugdale take a glass of cyder, and I heard him say, and wish it might be his damnation, and he might sink in the place where he stood, if he knew any thing of the plot.

Sir W. Jones. I pray what religion are you of ? I don't ask you to disparage you.

E. Eld. A Roman Catholic.

L. H. S. When was it that he said that ?

E. Eld. When he was in Staffordshire.

Anne Eld was then sworn.

Mr. Foley. Tell my lords what you know of any papers that were burnt by Mr. Dugdale, or by his direction, and at what time.

A. Eld. Mr. Dugdale came to my father's house over night, and the next morning (before he went away) he brought a great many papers he had in his breeches, and in his pockets, bundled together, and he desired us to burn them in the flame of a candle.

L. H. S. Why did he desire you to burn them ?

A. Eld. He said, the times were troublesome, and being to travel, he was to go to divers places, and if he were taken, people would think him a plotter, having all those papers about him.

L. H. S. Did he burn the book at that time ?

A. Eld. No.

L. H. S. Why not ?

A. Eld. I found that book, and asked him, if that should be burnt ; he said, No, lay that by, it might do good seven years hence, there is no treason in it. Says my sister to him, Is there any treason in the rest ? Says he, Do you think there is ? That was all.

Sir W. Jones. Not to trouble you longer, my Lords, upon this, your lordships will be pleased to remember, yesterday my lord Stafford was pleased to offer by way of evidence, as if Mr. Dugdale was a man of an ill reputation in these particulars, That he had defrauded my lord Aston, that he was a mean man, run in arrear to my lord ; and that being in necessity, he became a fit instrument to give false evidence. We shall shew, That Mr. Dugdale was a man of estate ; that both before, and since he came away from my lord Aston, he hath made it his business to desire my lord to come to account ; that he hath pressed him, and that he does believe, and hath reason to believe that there is money coming from my lord Aston to him, and that a considerable sum. Now, my lords, if we shall make it appear, that he hath made it his business to come to account with my lord, I hope it will not be supposed that he is afraid of it, or so needy, or so mean. For this we call Michael Noble and Stephen Colledge.

Michael Noble sworn.

Sir John Trevor. What do you know of Mr. Dugdale, and my lord Aston ?

Noble. My lords, I can say little or nothing as to Mr. Dugdale, for that I have never been acquainted with him, but since the plot, and he came to be an evidence ; but Mr. Dugdale desired me to assist him as much as I could, to make up his accounts with my lord Aston. And we were twice at the Tower, one time we spoke with my lord with great difficulty ; another time we could not see him. There were three books of account, two my lord would let us see, but the third, wherein all the discharges were, as Mr. Dugdale said, he would never let us see, that is all I can say.

(Then Stephen Colledge* was sworn.)

L. H. S. What is your name ?

Witness. Stephen Colledge.

Sir W. Jones. Declare to my lords what you know concerning Mr. Dugdale's pressing my lord Aston to account with him.

Mr. Colledge. In January last I went along with Mr. Dugdale, at his request, to the Tower, with one Mr. Noble a barrister of the Temple, and one Mr. Buson of Lyons-Inn, in order to the making up accounts between Mr. Dugdale and my lord Aston ; for he told me he was going thither for that end. When we came thither, we met with one captain Hawley, who belongs to the lieutenant of the Tower, and we desired him to go to my lord Aston, and tell him Mr. Dugdale was there, in order to make up his accounts with him. He went, and brings an answer back again, that my lord was not at leisure to speak with Mr. Dugdale then, nor none of us from him. And Mr. Hawley said he was then going up with the lords to nine pins. Mr. Dugdale said, he was very ill used, for he had been several times there before, and he could not be admitted to speak with him. He hath a little book, says he, (meaning my lord) wherein there is an account made up under his own hand, of almost two or three hundred pounds ; which sum I cannot say, but one of them I am certain of, which he hath denied several times that he had it, (but I can prove that he hath it :) If he will be pleased to produce that book, we need not be a quarter of an hour in making up the account. He did speak of some other sums he had to place to account, but so much was made up already. But captain Hawley saying he would not speak with him, nor any of us from him, I did take the liberty to say to captain Hawley, that it was hard his lordship and his party should abuse Mr. Dugdale at that rate, to make him his debtor ; for now I understand by what Mr. Dugdale said, my lord was his debtor : And said I, if I can persuade Mr. Dugdale, he shall publish his case, for the protestant interest suffered by it, that he should be made a debtor to my lord when he was not so. And I believe captain Hawley told my lord Aston what I did say ; for when he came back again from my lord Aston, he said, my lord did acknowledge he had that book, and it was ready to be produced, but he would stay till a counsellor of his came out of the country, and till he had spoke with the lieutenant ; for he would not speak with Mr. Dugdale unless the lieutenant were by, and in three or four days time he would send for him : But I never heard that he sent for him ever since. If it please your lordships, I have one thing more that I remember : There was a young man that belonged to my lord Aston's family, that heard Mr. Dugdale was at captain Hawley's chamber, and came to see him, and paid a very great respect to him, and would stand here to him though Mr. Dugdale desired him to put on his hat several times. Some of us asked him, whether Mr. Dugdale was thought to be such a knave, when he lived with his lord, as they would have made him since. No, said he, Mr. Dugdale was as honest a gentleman as ever lived in our family, I remember my lord Aston's man said this to us then.

L. Staff. My lords, will you be pleased to give me leave ; if I speak impertinently, I am under your correction ; I conceive I shall have something to answer to this, but I would first know whether I may desire of your lordships, that I may have my lord Aston here to give an account of this matter.

Sir W. Jones. If he were here he could not be heard, being a person accused for the same offence.

* See the Trial of Stephen Colledge, A. D. 1681, infra.

L. H. S. My lord, he stands indicted for the same treason, and cannot be a witness.

L. Staff. I beg your pardon, my lords.

(Nicholas Boson was sworn.)

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. Nicholas Boson.

Sir W. Jones. Declare to my lords what you know concerning Mr. Dugdale's pressing my lord Aston to come to an account.

Boson. In January last, I met with Mr. Dugdale, and one Mr. Noble and one Mr. Colledge. And Mr. Dugdale desired us to go down with him to the Tower. He said he had an order of the council to pass his accounts with my lord Aston; and when we came there, we enquired for captain Hawley, and desired him that he would acquaint my lord Aston, that he was there to account with him. Captain Hawley went up to my lord Aston, and brought word back again, my lord was not at leisure, or would not speak with him, or to that effect; whereupon Mr. Dugdale said, it was very hard that he should be aspersed to owe my lord money, and he would not come to account with him. For my lord Aston had a book or books in his custody which he would stand by, and they would determine the business between them; that my lord Aston was almost two hundred pounds in his debt. And pray, says he, captain Hawley, do me the favour to go to my lord Aston again, and desire him that he will be pleased to produce that book or books. If I owe my lord any money, I am ready to pay him. And if he owe me any, I hope his lordship will do the like by me; as I am sure he does 200*l*. Captain Hawley went away, and brought this answer, that his lordship would send for him in some short time, as soon as a counsellor did come out of the country, whom he had entrusted with the books; and that was one Birch, as near as I remember.

Sir W. Jones. We have done with this witness. And because we desire to conclude as to Mr. Dugdale, we shall call some persons of quality as to his reputation, my lord having gone about to make L. n a man of no reputation.

Boson. I can speak too about the boy that came in.

Sir W. Jones. There is no need of that now: We shall trouble you no further, Sir. Your lordships will be pleased to observe, That Mr. Philips, the minister, that was one of my lord Stafford's witnesses, did say, Mr. Dugdale was a man of whom many spoke well, and some indifferently, and perhaps that is the case of most good men; for scarce any are so good that all speak well of them: But that many should speak well, and some indifferently of him, may be the lot of a very good man. We shall call some witnesses, and begin with Mr. Whitby a justice of the peace, that will tell you he hath known Mr. Dugdale long, and what reputation he is of.

Thomas Whitby, esq. sworn.

Sir John Trevor. My Lords, we desire your lordships would be pleased to ask him what reputation and credit Mr. Dugdale was in, in my lord Aston's service.

Whitby. My Lords, I have known Mr. Dugdale to be a servant to my lord Aston this nine or ten years; he was steward to him, and there was no other person between my lord and him; he received my lord's rents and debts for him, exchanged his lands for him in forty places; I exchanged some land with my lord myself, and he was the man that did it. He was very hard for my lord's advantage, and did what he could for my lord's profit.

Sir John Trevor. What do you know more as to his dealing?

Mr. Whitby. He was a person that was next to my lord, and did rule and govern the rest of the family. All the servants were under him.

Sir John Trevor. Was he looked upon to be an honest man in his dealings?

Mr. Whitby. As to what I had to deal with him, he was an honest man, I never heard to the contrary. I have heard some tradesmen complain that he hath put them off without money, would not pay them what my lord owed them.

L. Staff. I desire that Mr. Whitby may be here when I shall have occasion to say something to him.

Sir W. Jones. That will be, I hope, by and by, for we have almost done. Call Mr. William Southall. (Who was sworn.)

L. H. S. What is your name.

Witness. William Southall.

Mr. Foley. Give my Lords an account how long you have known Dugdale, and what you know of him.

Southall. My Lords, I have known Mr. Stephen Dugdale about eight years.

Mr. Foley. How hath he behaved himself? What reputation hath he borne?

Mr. Southall. Truly he hath always had a good repute, not only with my lord's tenants but also with the workmen, and those people that had dependance on the family; and truly I never heard any ill report of him, but only what is spoken of now of late.

Sir F. Winnington. Were you very well acquainted with him?

Southall. Yes, but never had any business with him. Several discourses I have had with him about the popish religion.

Sir John Trevor. My Lords, I only observe this, This gentleman is coroner of the county, and hath a general knowledge of the county, and must know most men there.

Sir F. Winnington. You are a coroner of the county of Stafford, Sir, I think.

Southall. Yes, I am one of them.

Mr. Foley. What was he in my lord's house?

Southall. Bailiff, and a kind of governor, providing wheat, and paying workmen; most of the things of the family went through his hands.

Sir F. Winnington. My Lords, This gentleman is a coroner of the county, and can speak materially to other particulars besides this of Dugdale's reputation; for he was a person who was present when he made his first discovery of this plot, and was very instrumental in prevailing with him to do it. He will give your lordships an account of the whole business, and I would rather he himself should relate all the progress of it, than take upon me to recite any of the passages.

Mr. Southall. There was, the latter end of November (1678,) a report that Mr. Dugdale was gone away from my lord Aston's suddenly and strangely; and it was the common report in the country that he was in the plot, and was fled for it. In the beginning of December I went through a town called Great Heywood, a mile and a half from Tixall, where my lord Aston and Mr. Dugdale dwelt. I called at Mr. Thomas Whitby's house, the gentleman that was up here lately, and he was telling me, Dugdale was come again, and apprehended by the watch at Heywood upon suspicion. He told me further, he would make no confession of the plot, though he had been under examination before sir Walter Bagott, Mr. Kinnersley, and I think he said sir Thomas Whitgrave. But he told me divers passages by which we both suspected he might be concerned and know of the plot. We thought so from the various reports and rumours we had heard in the country, and from those great grounds of suspicion that were given us. As I returned from Heywood, I resolved I would speak with Dugdale the first opportunity, for I had a strong persuasion I could prevail with him to make a discovery of the plot: But before I did speak with him, there was one Goldsmith my kinsman, had some difference fallen out between him and Mr. Ansell, and Mr. Dugdale, touching a deed, the deciding of which they had referred to Mr. Dugdale. And he desired me to go to Mr. Dugdale to Stafford with him; I was very glad of the opportunity. Ansell was to bring one Hanson, Mr. Goldsmith was to bring me, and Mr. Dugdale was to bring one Mr. Gerard, that was concerned in the pre-mortgage, that we might all have discourse together. I promised to meet them at the time appointed; and accordingly the 23d of December, two days before Christmas-day, I came to the place in Stafford, where Dugdale was, about ten o'clock in the morning, where they met according to their promise. We had not been in the house longer than a quarter of an hour, but the king's business, which I thought was a business of greater weight than any particular business, did stick much upon me; and I resolved before I spoke to the particular business about which we all met, I would first speak to Mr. Dugdale to put that in an execution which I had resolved. After a short space of time, I desired Mr. Dugdale that I might speak with him in a chamber privately between him and me; he told me, if I would go into the next chamber to his, he would come to me. Accordingly I went, and staid a short space of time, and Mr. Dugdale came to me. I desired him to make the door to, which he did, and I began thus with him.

Mr. Dugdale, said I, for some years last past, since I came to be acquainted with you, I have always had a good esteem of you, and you a good report in the country where you live; and now there is an opportunity put into your hands to serve his majesty and his Protestant subjects, if (as an honest man ought) you will discharge your duty. Mr. Dugdale replied, Sir, what do you mean? why said I, I mean this in a few words, here is a plot discovered in London, and if it be in London, I conceive it hath been in part acted at Tixall; and if there, of necessity, you having such a government and rule over that house, it is impossible but you must know it. He looked upon me very earnestly, and gave me a smile, but answered me not. I replied to him again thus; said I, There is a natural allegiance which every subject owes to his sovereign; and by that it is required, that if any subjects know of any plot or any conspiracy against his person and government, they ought in conscience to discover it; therefore, Mr. Dugdale, said I, discharge a good conscience, and tell what you know, for it is commonly suspected you are concerned in the plot. He answered, I have taken the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. When and where? said I. Before his majesty's justices of the peace at Stafford, said he. Then, said I, there is not only that natural allegiance which every subject owes to his prince, but the oath of Almighty God lies upon your conscience; therefore discharge a good conscience, and tell your knowledge. He stood pausing a little while, and by and by, said he, If I should make any discovery, how should I be secured of my life? You need not question that, said I, nor his majesty's gracious pardon, which he hath promised in his proclamation. Have you seen the proclamation? Yes, said he. Said I, you have but a short time, a day or two to discover in, for this is the 23rd, and as I do conceive, you ought to discover before the 25th. He stood pausing a while about the time; said I, You need not question his majesty's gracious promise, and to encourage you thereto, there is not only an assurance of pardon, but a promise of reward of two hundred pounds. Said he, if I do discover any thing of my knowledge, I matter not, nor desire (I do not know which it was) his majesty's money, so I may be secured of my life.

Upon this, my lords, said I, Sir, you need not question his majesty's gracious promise, my life for yours if you have not his pardon; but I will take special care about it, for I will send up a letter to London, directed to some of the lords, (which I accordingly did) and I will also speak to captain Lane, who is a worthy gentleman, to interpose in it too. Then, said he, I will make a discovery of the plot. Then, my lords, he told me first some particular passages relating to this lord at the bar, and also concerning Mr. Evers and Mr. Petres, now in custody, and some other particulars: I wished him that he would speak no more at that time. And when I parted with him, forthwith I consulted with myself what I ought to do in point of law: I knew, I must discover that a further discovery might be made of what had passed between us. Then I went to Mr. Freke, who was either mayor or justice of peace in Stafford, and told him he must come with me to serjeant Parry's. He asked me what to do. I told him, when he came, he should know; he accordingly came, and took short notes of a further discovery, and Mr. Freke he certified it up to Mr. Chetwyn, who was then at London. Upon the day following, the 24th, I rose and went to one Mr. Vernon, one of his majesty's justices of the peace, and told him what had happened, and he sent for captain Lane, another of his majesty's justices of the peace, and they took an examination of him. I have done, my lords, with reference to his discovery, and the time.

L. H. S. Do you remember what he mentioned of my lord Stafford? What he said of him?

Mr. Southall. Truly, my lords, I can only tell what he said at the first examination: He told me, the first time my lord Stafford spoke with him was at Tixall Hall, nigh to the Gatehouse, betwixt the gate and the hall. My lord was going into the hall, and my lord Stafford told him it was a very hard thing, or to that purpose, that they could not say their prayers but in private, and after told him the same day or night 'one, that they had some work to do, and he might or must be instrumental in it. This was the effect of what he told me passed the first time. Another time I think he told me he was to have 500*l.* to kill the king.

L. H. S. When did he tell you so?

Mr. Southall. Not till captain Lane examined him, which was the second time he was examined; which was about the 24th.

L. H. S. Did he swear that before Vernon and Lane?

Mr. Southall. Yes, he did, I could give your lordships a breviat of what he swore then.

L. Staff. I desire he may give that breviat.

Mr. Southall. I took some notes of what he swore then.

L. H. S. Have you them by you, or about you?

Mr. Southall. Yes, my lords, I have.

L. H. S. Produce them.

Mr. Southall. I took this upon some paper I had in my pocket, and is the substance of what he swore. (Which he delivered to the Clerk.)

Clerk. "December the 24th, 1678, Mr. Dugdale informeth, That in September last, he met in Tixall the lord Stafford, nigh to the gates, who said, That it was sad they were troubled they could not say their prayers, but in a hid manner; but suddenly there would be a reformation to the Romish religion, and if there be a good success we shall enjoy our freedom. And that upon the 20th day of September, 1678, the said lord Stafford told this informant, That there was a design in hand, and if he would undertake in it, he should have a good reward, &c. and make himself famous. The same day this informant went up into Mr.

Francis Evers's chamber, to know what my lord Stafford meant by his words; and he first made him swear secrecy upon his knees, and then told him, That he might be a person employed, and have a good reward, and make himself famous, if he would stand instrumental with others in taking away the king's life, by shooting, or otherwise; and need not fear, for that the pope had excommunicated the king, and that all that were excommunicated by him were heretics, and they might kill them, and be canonized for saints in so doing. And that the design was to kill the duke of Monmouth as well as the king.

"December the 29th, 1678, this informant saith, That since the 30th day of September last, the said lord Stafford did promise him 500*l.* as to the carrying on of the Plot, and that Mr. Evers should give him instructions about the same. And that the lord Stafford told him, he did not doubt of his fidelity, for Mr. Evers had given him a good character to be trusty. And that the lord Stafford told this informant, That there was a design to take away the life of the king, and the life of the duke of Monmouth, and that several others were to be employed in the design besides this informant. And that this had been thoroughly considered of to be the fittest way for the establishing of the Romish religion. And that at the said time, the said lord Stafford laid his hand upon his head, and prayed God to keep him in his good mind, and to be faithful to what he had entrusted him in, &c.

"And this informant further saith, That he doubting of the lord Stafford's payment, the said Mr. Evers promised him the making good of my lord Stafford's promise, &c.

"And further saith, That he saw a letter directed from my lord Stafford to Mr. Evers, and he read the same, and knows it to be my lord Stafford's writing; and that therein was written, that things went on well beyond the seas, for the carrying on the design, and so he hoped it did do here in England, &c."

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we will examine no further as to Mr. Dugdale, but will conclude with this witness, and I think he speaks fully to him. The next witness we called was Dr. Oates, and your lordships have been pleased to observe, That what exceptions have been made against him, have not been so much by witnesses produced, as by opposing one part of his testimony to another, what he swore at one time to what he swore at another: To which we shall give an answer when we come to sum up our evidence; for there will be no need of witnesses to what is objected against Mr. Oates, but only of observations. But as to the third witness Turberville, we have something to answer of witness, and something by way of making observation. We will first call our witnesses.

[Then Mr. Southall desired his Paper again, which the Court told him he should have a copy of from the Clerk.]

Sir W. Jones. And our first witness is to this purpose : It was objected against Mr. Turberville

L. H. S. Have you done with Dugdale ? You have forgot to give an answer to the objection about the point of time when Hobson told him of the design.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, that will be when we come to make our observations ; we shall not answer that by witnesses ; when we come to sum up our evidence, I doubt not but we shall give a sufficient answer to that objection. But to go on with what is to be answered by testimony, your lordships will be pleased to remember, that Turberville did inform your lordships, That he had some converse with my lord Stafford at Paris, being introduced by some of the fathers. My lords, we shall call a gentleman that happened to be there at that time, that will tell you, though he did not know my lord Stafford, yet he knew that Turberville did converse much with an English lord in that place where my lord does acknowledge his lodging to be. He will give you some further account how Turberville went to Diep in expectation of my lord, and how he had a message from the lord, though he did not know my lord Stafford. He will give you a further account how Mr. Turberville was earnest with him to go to Calais, and then told him, he might go over with my lord at that time. The use we make of these particulars we will forbear to mention till we sum up our evidence. We desire to examine Mr. Thomas Mort. (Who was sworn.)

Sir W. Jones. We desire to ask Mr. Mort, whether he knew Mr. Turberville at Paris, and at what time.

L. H. S. What say you, Sir ?

Mort. Yes, my lords, I knew him, it is now five years past since we were in Paris. He and I had been intimately acquainted before, we lived in the same family. I was several times in company with him, and many times in his brother's company, which was a monk, and I heard him say his brother had an intention he should be of the same order. And some time after that he altered his resolution, and designed for England, and I had such a design too to go from Paris, where I was an apprentice. And being acquainted with him, I resolved to go over with him, and he told me, his brother the monk had introduced him into the favour of a lord ; as I take it, it was my lord Stafford, as well as I can remember. And that there was a vessel to come to Diep, a yacht, and we should go thither to go over with my lord. And Mr. Turberville told me, we must make as much haste as might be, for it were better to be there a day or two too soon, than too late. We went to Diep, and when we came there, the vessel was not come. And when we had been there a fortnight, or thereabouts, we were put to a great deal of inconvenience, by reason of our long stay there : And, I think, if I mistake not, I or some of the company said, Cursed is he that relies or depends on a broken staff ; aluding, as I believe, to my lord Stafford's name.

VOL. VII.

Mr. Turberville told me, if we did go to Calais, we might go over with my lord ; but how or by what means he understood the vessel would be there, and my lord go that way, I know not. But we did not go thither, we had another opportunity ; there was a small vessel, whether a fish-boat or a coal-vessel I cannot tell, a very little one it was, but we took the opportunity, and came over in it.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we shall make use of it in due time ; we only call him now to prove his converse with a lord at Paris.

L. H. S. Did you ever see Turberville at a lord's house in Paris ?

Mort. No, my lords, not that I can remember ; but I think, as near as I remember, I will not be positive, I walked about Luxemburgh-House while he went, as he said, to the place where the lord lodged. I was thereabouts till he came.

L. Staff. In what street was it ?

Mort. Indeed I cannot tell.

Sir W. Jones. This man is very cautious.

L. H. S. Can you tell the lord's name ?

Mort. I do not remember his title, but I think it was my lord Stafford.

Sir W. Jones. Pray who were you servant to ? Who were you under.

Mort. My lord Powis. I served as a Page to him, when Mr. Turberville was gentleman-usher to the young lady, one of his daughters, since married to my lord Mollineux.

Sir W. Jones. Will my lord please to ask him any questions ? If not, we will go on.

L. Staff. No, not at present.

Sir W. Jones. Well then, my lords, we desire to call one Mr. Powell, a gentleman of Gray's-inn, to tell you when he first heard Mr. Turberville speak of this evidence he hath now given.

(Mr. Powell was sworn.)

Sir W. Jones. Pray will you give an account what discourse you had with Mr. Turberville about the Plot, and when.

Powell. About this time was twelve month we discoursed about it, and he told me, that he had much to say in relation to the Plot ; but truly he did not name any particulars to me at that time.

Sir W. Jones. Where was this, we desire to ask him.

Powell. It was at the King's head tavern in Holborn.

Sir W. Jones. Are you sure it was a year ago ?

Powell. It was about this time twelvemonth.

Sir W. Jones. What was the reason he did not think fit then to reveal it ? Did he tell the reason ?

Powell. I think he gave me a reason, that he was something cautious, because he feared he might disoblige his brother at that time.

Sir W. Jones. Did he give you any further reason ?

Powell. I think he said he was afraid he should not have encouragement enough, for he said some of the witnesses had been discouraged and he was afraid he should be so too.

5 B

Sir W. Jones. Now we shall call a few witnesses to Mr. Turberville's reputation, which have known him a good while. Mr. Hobby.

L. H. S. Was this time that Mr. Powell speaks of, that he did discourse with him, before or after that of Yalden?

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we do not know of any discourse with Yalden; nay, we believe none such was. The witness speaks of a year since.

L. H. S. What time does Yalden speak of?

Sir W. Jones. February or March last, and this was a year ago.

L. H. S. This was then before that certainly.

Sir W. Jones. We desire that Mr. Arnold, a member of the House of Commons, may be sworn. (Which was done in his place.)

Sir W. Jones. Do you know Mr. Turberville?

Arnold. My lords, I do know him very well, and I have known him these two years; He came recommended to me from his grace my lord duke of Buckingham. My lords, presently after the breaking out of the Plot, he was sent down into our country by the lords of your lordships house that were of the committee, and a particular recommendation from the duke of Buckingham to me, to give him direction and assistance to find out a priest, one Charles Pritchard, and I think also if I mistake not, one Morgan, my lord Powis's priest. I spoke with him before he went, I sent letters down with him, I spoke with him afterwards: He hath been in my family some time; he hath behaved himself very well there, and in several other sober families nearly related to me. I have not heard a better character of any man from all sorts of people, than of him, in my life.

Sir W. Jones. Did he tell you any thing of the Plot, sir?

Arnold. My lords, I did several times find by him, that he knew much; having conversed both in France and here with Jesuits and priests. I pressed him oftentimes to discover his knowledge, and to come in to the council; but he gave me such answers why he did not, that I could not answer.

Sir W. Jones. What were they, sir? Pray tell us.

Arnold. That the witnesses that were come in, were in danger of their lives; that they were discouraged, that they were discountenanced? and as long as the duke of York had that power in the council that he had, and my lady Powis's brother had that power over these countries where he lived, (which his lordship is often pleased to call his province) he durst not do it for his life.

Sir W. Jones. Do you know Mr. Turberville, and how long have you known him?

(Then Mr. Hobby was sworn.)

Hobby. My lords, I have known Mr. Turberville near four years.

L. H. S. What account can you give of Hobby. My lords, my first acquaintance with him, was at my brother's house in Glamorgan-shire. When I came there, my brother shewed him me, and told me he was a very worthy man, but his friends had cast him off because he would not take orders in the Romish church. He lived at my brother's above a year; and when he came thence, my brother writ a letter of recommendation to my father to receive him there, and do him all the kindness he could. He came to my father's and staid there near half a year, or thereabouts, I cannot tell to a month or so. Since I have known him often in this town, and been in his company: and I never knew, nor heard but that he behaved himself like a worthy honest gentleman: But as to any thing of the Plot, I know nothing.

Sir W. Jones. We ask you not to that: Where is Mr. Matthews?

(Then Mr. Matthews, a divine, was sworn.)

Sir W. Jones. Mr. Matthews, pray tell my lords whether you know Mr. Turberville, and how long you have known him?

Matthews. Yes, my lords, I have known Mr. Edward Turberville for about four years last past.

L. H. S. Go on, what do you know of him?

Matthews. My lords, he lived some time in my neighbourhood; I never knew him guilty of an ill action at all but, a person of a very fair reputation: He acknowledged himself a Roman catholic, and was pleased to give me the liberty to talk to him. I found him inclinable to hearken to me, and to those reasons I offered to him; and I found he had a mind to quit that religion, being convinced by the arguments I gave him; and at several times he hath since told me, those were some of the great motives of his coming over from the Romish to the Protestant communion.

L. H. S. What were the motives?

Matthews. One was the hazard I told him of, in his living in the Roman Communion, as to salvation; another was the excellency of the doctrines of our church, its principles and practices.

L. H. S. Did he acknowledge to you, he knew any thing of the Plot?

Matthews. No, not a syllable of it.

Sir W. Jones. We do not call him to that purpose.

(Then another Witness was sworn.)

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. William Seys.

Sir W. Jones. Pray will you acquaint my lords, what you know of Mr. Turberville.

S. ys. I have been acquainted with him these two or three years, and I never knew him guilty of any ill action in my life. I never heard of any body that could asperse him; but he hath behaved himself like a very honest civil gentleman.

Sir W. Jones. Where were you acquainted with him?

S. ys. Here in London.

(Then Capt. Scudamore stood up again.)

Sir W. Jones. He was sworn before, we desire he may speak to Mr. Turberville's reputation.

Capt. Scudamore. My lords, I have known Mr. Turberville for these three quarters of a year, I have been acquainted with him in London; he hath been much at my house, and all that while I saw nothing in him, but that he is a very honest gentleman.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, I think we have but one matter more, which we should have mentioned before, but that our witness was not come; but I hope we shall have the favour of some honourable lords that do know the thing; and I think there are many more that can prove it. My lord Stafford, who is very ancient, it may be, may not remember matters exactly; I blame him not; oblivion is the great infirmity of old age. He was pleased to say yesterday, he had so good health, that he had not been lame, I think he said for these forty years; but at last his page said, for the last seven years: and I shall confine our proof to that time. My lords, I think there are some honourable lords here, that have seen this noble lord, that says he was not lame in so many years, very near about the time that he was confined and imprisoned, go lame and come lame to the house, and ease himself by holding up his leg sometimes. My Lords I do not say, the circumstance is very material, but only to shew my lord may forget himself, which I shall impute to his old age.

L. Staff. I will acknowledge it, if your lordships please; I did say I had not been lame with the gout so long, no more I have not. I was troubled with the Sciatica many years, but it is above eight or nine years since that; and I took so much opium, that that, and my going to the Bath, cured me. I have often come lame to the house, out of weariness and old age; but if ever I put my foot upon a stool for the gout, or was ever so lame as to put my foot upon a cushion to ease it, I will admit what he speaks to: I will acknowledge thus much to save time.

Sir W. Jones. Seeing my lord is pleased to go off from it, I will call no witnesses to it.

L. Staff. I go off from nothing, I was lame three or four years when the king came in: I went to the Bath, and afterwards into Germany; and what with opium, and the Bath, I was cured, and have not been lame these eight or nine years. I have not had the gout in my foot for these many years, and I never was so lame to put my foot on a stool, to my remembrance.

Sir W. Jones. I do not think we shall need to trouble your lordships more with this matter; that my lord was lame some time, he is pleased to confess; one witness says, that he put his foot upon a cushion; my lord doth not acknowledge that.

L. Staff. I was never lame at Paris.

Sir W. Jones. That a man that is lame does sometimes ease his foot, is no hard consequence, I think.

L. Staff. I deny I was lame then; I walked about the streets of Paris, I desire I may not be misunderstood, Sir W. Jones. I must then desire, under his lordship's favour, if he will not acknowledge it to be within seven years, that we may prove it, and falsify his witness, the page.

L. Staff. I have gone with a stick to the House, I acknowledge it, and been lame with weariness.

Sir F. Winnington. The objection went to the credit of our witness, and therefore we desire to answer it: my lord was not lame, as he says, for so many years; but if we prove that within less time my lord hath been lame, it will take off that objection from our witness. And we desire a noble lord or two of this House may testify what they know. And first the earl of Stamford; (who was sworn.)

Earl of Stamford. My lords, I think I have not had the honour to sit in this House much above seven years, but long since that time I have seen my lord Stafford come lame into the House of Peers, and that is all I can say.

L. Staff. I have come lame with a stick to the House, I say.

Sir F. Winnington. My lords, we desire that noble lord, my lord Lovelace, may be sworn; (which was done.)

Lord Lovelace. My lords, the account that I can give your lordships, is this; I cannot ascertain any time, but I am sure, and I do declare it upon my honour, and the oath I have taken, that I have seen my lord Stafford lame in the House of Lords within less than these seven years.

L. Staff. If he goes home to the Tower, he may see me lame, but never put my foot upon a stool.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, your lordships will be pleased to remember, we did call a witness, one Thomas Launder, and the account we had of him was, he was gone sick from the bar, he was very sick indeed; but being just now brought, we desire he may be heard, though it be out of time: we call him to the reputation of Holt.

(Thomas Launder was sworn.)

Sir John Trevor. Do you declare to my lords, whether you know Samuel Holt?

Launder. Yes, my lords, I do.

L. H. S. What do you know of him?

Launder. He is a smith, my lord.

L. H. S. What reputation is he of?

Launder. Indifferent, my lord.

Sir W. Jones. What do you mean by that, good or bad? speak plainly.

Launder. A drunken sot, a man that will drink, and rant, and tear the ground, and sing two or three days or a week together, and lose his time.

Sir F. Win. I would ask this man, whether he was summoned as a witness upon any trial in relation to the Plot?

L. H. S. Were you ever summoned as a witness about the Plot?

Launder. My lords, I was summoned concerning my lord Aston's trial, and I came up with my lord Aston's people as an evidence.

Sir W. Jones. Had you any offer of money, and what sum?—Launder. Yes, my lords.

Sir F. Win. Acquaint my lords with it.

L. H. S. Who offered it you? and when? and for what?

Sir W. Jones. For what was that money offered you?

Launder. The money was not absolutely offered me, but I was to have an horse to ride on, and money in my pocket, if I could take off James Ansell, Dugdale's evidence.

L. H. S. Who came and offered it to you?

Launder. I was sent for by Mr. Fox to Tixall-Hall, and there was my old lord's brother for one, and Mr. Thomas Aston, that is, this young lord's brother, and Mr. Francis Aston, who is my lord's eldest son, were in a room together, and this Thomas Sawyer that was here, and more were in the room when they promised all these things.

L. H. S. If you would do what?

Launder. If I would take my oath, that this James Ansell was a perjured rogue.

L. H. S. Did all they make you this promise?

Launder. Yes, my lords.

Mr. Foley. It was a consult together about taking off the evidence.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we have done with our witnesses; if my lord Stafford please to conclude, we are ready to do so too.

L. Staff. What should I conclude? about those witnesses you have now brought in?

Sir W. Jones. Your lordship may please to conclude your evidence, we are ready to conclude on our part.

L. Staff. These new witnesses, must I say what I can say against them presently? I cannot do it, I know very few of them.

L. H. S. Have you any witnesses here, my lord?

L. Staff. I cannot possibly have any; for I did not know, nor guess these people would be brought against me: they are persons I know nothing of. Ansell I have seen four or five times, I may have seen the rest, but I do not know them to be able to give an account of them.

L. H. S. If you have any witnesses here to support the credit of your own witnesses that have been impeached, you may call them.

L. Staff. I have none, my lords.

L. H. S. Will your lordship recapitulate the material parts of your defence, that the process may be closed?

L. Staff. I am very unready for it, my lords. Let me ask Mr. Whitby a question, if I must have no more time.

(Mr. Whitby stood up.)

L. H. S. There he is; what would your lordship have with him?

L. Staff. I do not know the gentleman.

Whitby. Nor I your lordship.

L. Staff. I ask him upon the oath he hath taken, I know he will speak truth, whether he did not some years ago tell my lord Aston that is dead, this lord's father, That Dugdale was a knave and persuaded him to turn him away, (I say not it is true, but I have heard so) and desired him to tell his son so, that he might quit himself of him?

L. H. S. What say you, Mr. Whitby?

Whitby. My lords, about three or four years ago my lord Aston that is dead (I believe it may be two years last April) sent for me to dine with him; and when I came thither, he told me, says he, Mr. Whitby I have sent to you to acquaint you with a thing, but I do not believe it before I tell it you. What is it? said I. Said he, Stephen Dugdale hath acquainted me, that you have employed persons upon the water to destroy my water; said I, my lord I never endeavoured it. He said, he did believe me. Then I told my lord; said I, Mr. Dugdale is a dishonour to the family, upon this account, because many times people come for money, and he will not let them have it, but puts them off, and makes them complain. Says my lord, my son is now at Standall, but I will tell him as soon as he comes home; and if you will bring the persons that have waited so long for their money and made so many journies, you shall hear what he will say to it. Within a while my lord Aston that now is, came down, and I went thither to see what became of it. And I went to the Bowling-green where my lord and his son were; but my old lord said nothing to me of it nor his son neither. Within a few days my old lord Aston's gentleman came down to my house, (one Mr. Ashley) said I, I wonder whether my lord Aston hath acquainted his son with what I told him. Says he, he hath, but it signifies nothing; for he will hear nothing against Mr. Dugdale. This I speak upon my oath it is true.

L. H. S. Your lordship sees what this gentleman's opinion was of Dugdale then, he would hear nothing against him. Will your lordship conclude?

L. Staff. My lords, I am mighty unready, and know not which way to turn myself, upon those new things they have brought; for I knew nothing of it, nor expected any such thing. But will you be pleased that I may call Simon Wright again? (Who stood up.)

L. H. S. What would your lordship have with him?

L. Staff. I have nothing to say to him, but to desire him to see this letter, whether it be of his own writing or no.

L. H. S. Look upon that paper, shew it him: (Which was done.)

L. H. S. Is it your hand?

Wright. This is my hand. It is part of that I was hired to do. There is another of a great deal more consequence than that.

L. H. S. Deliver it in, and read it.

Clerk. "June the 14th, 1680. Sir, I can, I bless God, with a safe conscience declare upon my oath that Mr. Dugdale hath been unkind to me in taking his opportunity of my poverty, by a reason of a private meeting of us two by his appointment, he did that time proffer if I would swear against you, and Mr. Gerard, he would protect me as one of the king's evidence, and I should not want money; and in the hall at Westminster he said, if I did discover it that day at Mrs. Price's Trial, he would set me in the pillory. This I have owned to his face, and shall not go back from this and more, neither for fear nor favour. So I rest as you shall find by your Servant,

"SIR. WRIGHT."

L. H. S. Is this your hand?

Wright. Yes, my lords; this I was advised your word for word to write.

L. H. S. Who penned this for you? Did you pen it yourself?

Wright. No, my lords, they penned it, and a great while I would not set my hand to it; but Jermin Drayton said I need not fear, I was not to swear against the king.

L. H. S. Who is that?

Wright. He is butler to Mr. Heveningham.

L. Staff. See what you have under his hand; I have no more to say to him.

Wright. But by their persuasion at last I did write it, and a great deal more than that.

Sir W. Jones. I desire to ask Mr. Wright whether they would have had him swore this?

L. H. S. Were you desired to swear this?

Wright. No, my lords, they never put me to swear it; for they told me I was not to swear against the king: But if I would be so kind to make an affidavit before a justice of peace, I might then go where I would into the country, and I should have money to bear my charges.

Sir W. Jones. Who would have had you swear it before a justice of peace?

Wright. Jermin Drayton, and Mr. Longmore; where he is I cannot tell, but he told me that sir James Symons was better able to perform than Dugdale was to promise.

Serj. Maynard. The same thing that was done by Reading, he was convicted for it, and stood in the pillory.

Sir W. Jones. We desire to know, whether he was ever with sir James Symons himself, and what he offered?

Wright. I was once with him at the King's bench; I dined there: after I had written the paper that was read, he gave me 20s. and said, he hoped I would not go off from what I had said; and he hoped I was sensible his gratuity would not be wanting, and was sorry he had not occasion to use me.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we have done with him; I only observe, that my lord Stafford was pleased to produce this paper? He was master of it, and had had it in his keeping.

Sir F. Win. Wright says, there is another paper of more consequence; I wish his lordship would produce that also.

L. Staff. I did not know of this till just now it was delivered into my hands. Did you see Mr. Longmore before this letter was writ?

Wright. Both before and after, to the best of my remembrance, and at the time when sir James's trial should have been, at the sign of the Crown in King-street in Bloomsbury.

L. H. S. My lord, will you conclude?

L. Staff. My lords, I desire your lordships pardon; I do not know how really to go about it to-night. I will obey your commands, though I fall down at the bar. I protest before God, I was all night so ill of the cramp, that I had no repose. If you will have me go on, I will, if you will give me but a little time to recollect myself.

L. H. S. God forbid, when your lordship is to speak upon so great a concern, and a matter of that importance as this is to you, you should be put at the end of the day, and in the midst of all your thoughts, to sum up your evidence. I do believe, if you do desire time till to-morrow, my lords will give it you: and if you would have me move my lords in it, I will.

L. Staff. One word, I beseech your lordships—

Sir W. Jones. We do not oppose it.

L. Staff. My lords, I desire one thing; I am very ignorant in this matter, and do not understand it; I would desire your lordships directions to know in what method I must proceed.

L. H. S. Your lordship is to proceed thus, if you please: Your lordship is to recollect and recapitulate all the proofs you have made; and you are to enforce them as well as you can, and make such observations upon them as are for your own advantage; and this your lordship must do for the fact. If there remain a doubt in law which you may have occasion to move, counsel may be demanded; and if it be considerable and worthy of debate, you may have counsel heard to speak to it. But the process is closed, no more witnesses are to be heard: there remains only observations upon the fact or law to be made.

L. Staff. Are no more witnesses to be heard?

L. H. S. No, I think not: it is agreed on both sides all is done: But my lord, I would not have your lordship to understand me so, that if so be you have yet any material evidence, that you think it does concern you to produce, and you have it ready to-morrow, before you sum up the evidence; I believe then, if you move my lords, they will let it be heard: Otherwise I think here is an end of witnesses.

L. Staff. I desire the paper I gave in, may be returned me.

L. H. S. But in order to this, my lord, if your lordship does think you shall use or produce any other witnesses, it would be of importance that you would name them now.

L. Staff. Truly, my lords, I will go hunt for none; and I think I shall have none: only one thing I must beg your pardon in; which is the only thing I must have witnesses to, to answer what they have said, that my lord Aston would not come to account. My witnesses are very near me. Mr. Lieutenant, some in the Tower, and one Mr. Birch.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, bring those tomorrow that you name to-night.

L. Staff. If you please that I may have that paper, Wright's letter.

E. of Shaftesb. My Lord Steward, I desire that letter may be kept.

L. Staff. It is a paper that was given me, and I would return it: if you will not allow me it, I cannot help it.

L. H. S. It is desired it may remain where it is: But your lordship may have a copy if you please attested by the clerk. Is it your lordships pleasure to adjourn?

Lords. Ay, Ay.

L. H. S. This House is adjourned into the Parliament-Chamber.

[Then the Lords withdrew in their order, and the Committee of Commons returned to their House, where Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair.]

A Message was sent from the Lords by sir Timothy Baldwin and sir Samuel Clark:

Mr. Speaker; The Lords have sent us to acquaint this House, That they have ordered William viscount Stafford to be brought again to his trial at the bar in Westminster-Hall, tomorrow morning at ten of the clock.

THE FIFTH DAY.

Saturday, December 4, 1680.

About the hour of ten in the morning, the Lords adjourned into Westminster-Hall, going thither in their former order into the Court there erected; and Mr. Speaker having left the chair, the Commons were seated as before. The Court being sat, proclamation for silence was made, and the lieutenant of the Tower commanded to bring his prisoner to the bar; which being done, the Lord High Steward began as followeth.

L. H. S. What says your lordship, my lord Stafford? My lords are prepared to hear what your lordship can say in the summing up of your defence.

L. Staff. My lords, I must needs say to your lordships, That you have given me favour and time all that I could demand. But I am a very unfortunate man in many things, unfortunate in being brought hither upon this account; and truly, my lords, I am very unfortunate, that I had not yesterday, before I went away, the names of some very material witnesses, and some that I did not know of, till within this half quarter of an hour: I humbly-offer this to your lordships consideration as the state of my case. It is true, my lords, I acknowledge I was bound up yesterday to Mr. Lieutenant, and some others that I named; but I humbly tell your lordship this, That I am informed of some material witnesses more this morning.

L. H. S. Are the witnesses you speak of, any of the witnesses you named last night?

L. Staff. No, my lords; it is one of my lords, a peer of this house.

L. H. S. How many more have you?

L. Staff. Five or six.

L. H. S. To what point?

L. Staff. To discredit the witnesses that have been brought against me; both some of those that have discredited mine, and some that have sworn against me particularly.

L. H. S. There is no end of this way of proceeding.

L. Staff. My lords, I profess to your lordships, in the presence of God, I do it not for delay, nor did I know of them then.

L. H. S. What say you to it, gentlemen?

Sir W. Jones. My lords, I am afraid this proceeding at this rate will never have an end. If his lordship have any witnesses to any material part of his Defence, though he hath bound himself up, I should not be against hearing of them. But if his new witnesses are only to the reputation of our witnesses, then perhaps we must have some other witnesses brought to discredit his; and we not knowing who these new witnesses of his would be, may need perhaps another day to bring testimony against them, so that I know not when the matter can have an end. Your lordships know, there is a rule in the civil law, 'In testem, testes, et in box, sed non datur ultra:' And I hope beyond that you will not go. Truly, for my own part, I did not expect any other witnesses, but those he was pleased to name last night, in relation to the matters of account; if he please to call them, we shall hear them: But for any other, considering it would prolong the trial to another day, and this cause hath had four days already for hearing, we hope they shall not be admitted.

L. Staff. My lords, I profess to your lordships, if I were alone concerned in it, I should not have moved it; but when I consider my wife and family are concerned, I hold myself bound by the duty I owe to God and them, to propose this to your lordships; I am pressed to it by my wife just now, since the House came in. I protest before God, for myself, I can look death in the face without being afraid; but when I consider in what condition I shall leave my wife and family, it moves me. (Then he wept.) I am not concerned at it for my own part, for I know I am innocent, but, I cannot forbear tears when I consider them; it is not for myself, I take God Almighty to witness, that I weep; I could be content to speak a few words to your lordships, and submit to your judgment, and take my death, if you decree me to it, and not defer it till Monday. But I cannot forbear shewing my grief when I consider my wife and children.

L. H. S. Pray, gentlemen, consider, whether it be not a saving of time, to let my lord examine his witnesses; else my lords must withdraw to consider of his desire. It is true, in the practice of Chancery we do examine to the credit of witnesses, and to their credit, but no further; but what my lords will do in this case, I know not till they are withdrawn.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we have that opinion of our own proofs, and are so desirous of an end of these proceedings, that rather than we will give your lordships the trouble to withdraw, if my lord will please now to tell us the number and names of his witnesses, we shall not oppose their being heard.

Sir F. Win. If your lordships please, one word further: We know well of what concern this is to my lord, and nobody desires to have him cramped in his evidence. The objection did lie fair on our side, it looking like a designed delay; and yet we are willing to comply, with this reservation, that if there should be any such witnesses produced now, as may require an answer, that we may not be foreclosed of advising with one another about it.

L. H. S. No, by no means. My lord Stafford, your desire is consented to upon these terms, That your lordship will now name the persons and number of the witnesses you will call.

Mr. Hampden. And the points to which you will call them.

L. Staff. I humbly thank your lordships for the favour, but it is an impossibility for me to do it; If your lordships will give me a quarter of an hour's time, I will name them; I cannot name some of them; one is my lord Ferrers, another is one Dr. Taylor, Dr. Watson, Dr. Elliot, and one William Dale.

L. H. S. Now to what points will your lordship call these witnesses?

L. Staff. My lord Ferrers is to speak his knowledge of Southall the coroner, and that is as to Dugdale; my lord knows that person. Dr. Watson, and they are to invalidate the testimony of Dr. Oates: And there is another man's name, I forget what it is.

Sir W. Jones. To what point is he to be a witness?

L. Staff. It is to Dr. Oates, and the evidence against me.

Serj. Maynard. So there will be pretences made every moment of some new witness to put off this cause.

L. Staff. Under your lordship's favour, I scorn to make any delay. If you think this may not be material, or not fit to be done, I will quit it.

L. H. S. Go on, my lord.

L. Staff. Will your lordships be pleased to begin with my lord Ferrers? [Who stood up in his place.]

L. H. S. My lord Ferrers, your lordship is called upon by my lord Stafford, and you being a witness for the prisoner, and against the king, your lordship is not to be sworn.

Lord Ferrers. My lords, what I have to say concerning that person my lord named, Southall, is only upon hearsay, and upon the reputation he hath in the country; for I have no acquaintance with him, nor do know him at all: But the reputation that hath been given me of him in the country is, That he hath been a very active man in the late times against the king, and is counted to be a very pernicious man against the government.

L. Staff. Call Dr. Taylor.

Servant. I know not where he is, he can't be found at present.

L. Staff. Then call William Dale in the mean time. My lords, this same Southall I never heard of; the other man that drew up the Affidavit, that is Feake, I know; he was named by Southall to join with him in the examination; I can't tell what he was, I can prove that he is an attorney, that he was mayor of Stafford, and proclaimed the king Traitor.

L. H. S. Who was that?

L. Staff. One that drew up the Affidavit of Dugdale, Feake mentioned by Southall.

L. H. S. Who is your next witness, my lord?

L. Staff. One William Dale. [Who being called, appeared.]

L. H. S. What is your name?

Witness. William Dale.

L. H. S. What do you say?

L. Staff. About Dugdale, my lords, what he knows about his offering him any money.

Sir W. Jones. We desire to know where he lives.

Dale. Dugdale never offered me any money.

L. H. S. Where do you live?

Dale. At Oweley-bridge.

L. Staff. Pray ask him whether Dugdale persuaded him to swear against my lord Aston something he knew not.

L. H. S. Did Dugdale ever hire you to swear against my lord Aston?

Dale. No, he never hired me.

L. H. S. Do you know that he ever hired any body else to swear false?

Dale. I do not, my lords.

L. Staff. My lords, I most humbly thank your lordships for your favour in giving me the liberty of examining these other witnesses; I shall trouble you no further, nor give no more evidence; only one witness, my lords, I shall trouble you no further, and that is Mr. Lieutenant of the Tower, to this point, whether my lord Aston did refuse to come to account with Dugdale.

L. H. S. Come, Mr. Lieutenant, do you know any thing about accounts between my lord Aston and Mr. Dugdale?

Lieutenant. My lords, last summer was twelve-month Dugdale came to the Tower, but my lord Aston would not speak with him, unless I were by; to they brought him to my lodging, and he shewed me the books of accounts: I told them I did not understand accounts, but if they would have me be by, I would get somebody to be present that did, and have them adjusted. Mr. Dugdale said he would come another time, but from that time to this I never heard of him.

L. Staff. My Lords, I shall not trouble you with any more witnesses. My lords, I have now done my evidence. I shall, as well as my weak memory and old age will give me leave, sum it up, something (as well as I can) of this evidence given against me, and for me. Truly, my lords, I am able to do it very imperfectly for want of understanding, and truly for want of sleep; but I do not doubt, but that according to the law, as I am informed it is, since I can have no counsel in matter of fact, or to advise me in any thing of that nature, yet I am also informed by the law, your lordships who are my judges, are my counsel. And I do not doubt but your lordships, when you take it into consideration, will supply any defects which I shall commit, which I believe will be many. I shall spend your lordship's time as little as I can; though these gentlemen of the House of Commons believe I desire to protract it, yet I profess before God I do not. And I declare before them all, and your lordships, I am so satisfied of my own innocency, that I would never beg a moment's time of delay; and I know your lordships will take care of the life of the meanest subject: and though I have had the honour to sit among your lordships as a peer, yet I ask not for your favour, but with your justice too: I shall therefore sum up my defence as well as I can. For the first witness, Dugdale, he swore I was at a consult at Tixall in the end of August or the beginning of September; I have sufficiently proved that in all August I was not there, nor till the 12th of September. I have proved that his first oath was, I was there in August, and a man that will swear false in one thing is not to be credited in any. I have made it appear to your lordships, that upon the 20th of September when he says he was in my chamber, and I sent the page to call him, that that is false; it was only he desired he might come to me to get leave that he might go to the race, my lord Aston being angry with him for it. This I conceive is proved sufficiently by two witnesses, my man and my boy, and this I think I have proved as positively as can be done. My lords, it is true, it is objected against me, that I had said Dugdale was never seen alone with me in my life, it is true; and it is true Assell swears he brought a footman to me, but he swears it was in the morning, when it was at supper, and does not say that he was alone with me. My lords, Dugdale swore that he told Mr. Phillips and Mr. Sumbidge of the death of sir Edmundbury Godfrey on the Monday, some swore he said it was on the Tuesday, but they deny that ever he told it them; and so he is forsworn in that. And, my lords, whether he be a man of any great credit, I think I have proved enough to your lordships. It is proved by two witnesses, Holt and Morral, that he offered them money to swear, as likewise he did to another, one Robinson; whom I do believe, by the information that was given of him, to be a wicked ill man, and not to be credited; but being so, my lords, he was the fitter for Dugdale's turn. And yet he had so much conscience, though he was a poor and needy fellow, he would not swear a man's life away for money. The other two are without exception, the one they say is an idle fellow, and the other a man but of an indifferent reputation; how far that would move with your lordships, I submit it to you. I suppose it is also clear by my witnesses, that Dugdale is a man of no reputation, having forsworn himself in several particulars; and I submit the credit of all he says to your lordships upon that.

The next witness, my lords, is Mr. Oates, whether he be a doctor or no, I know it not, he would not own it here; he, my lords, swears that he saw a commission delivered to me to be paymaster of an army to be raised, God knows when, I never heard when, or where, I suppose it was in the clouds, for I never knew where else. Mr. Oates all along before swore only that he believed I was in the Plot, now he swears that I was in it, at Mr. Fenwick's chamber, a man I never saw in my life, nor heard of till this discovery. And that he saw letters subscribed by my name; but that, my lords, I conceive is no evidence at all, for he never saw me write, nor does know my hand, nor does he pretend to know me then: and when he had told your lordships he had a letter of mine, he pretended to look for it, and then said he had lost it, that is, never had it. But besides, my lords, his evidence now does not agree with his former: for I do appeal to your lordships that were in the House then, that he swore the first time, he only saw my name to letters; afterwards he swore (that is, some days after he had ended all his evidence, and knew no more than he had put down then, afterwards he remembers what he knew not before and swears) a commission he saw delivered to me: so his memory encreases as he hath time to invent, and perhaps by another time it might be much more. But, my lords, I think that one particular, his swearing before your lordships, as it is entered in your Journal, that he had no more to say against any body, and afterwards naming the queen, and now to me to have a commission, I conceive, is perfect perjury. My lords, Mr. Oates told your lordships, that he had never been a Papist in his heart, but ever feigned it; truly my lords, I cannot possibly give over that point, that a man that feigns himself to be a Papist, or any thing that in the opinion of Protestants is so wicked a thing as that, is fit to be believed, if he shall not heartily repeat himself, and own it to God and man as an ill thing to dissemble so. But yesterday he with a smiling countenance, and as it were with a derision, owns that which must be a very great offence to God Almighty, to pretend to be of an idolatrous church. I appeal to your lordships whether he be a fit witness, I conceive he cannot be thought a Christian, nor to believe in God. I know many wicked and infamous persons have done many wicked things, and yet have been witnesses; but never did any wicked man own a wicked thing, that he might have concealed, with boasting of it, that ever was credited in any thing: for if he had said I do acknowledge I did dissemble with God and my own conscience, but I ask God forgiveness, it was for a good end, and a good intention, it hath been something, (though that could not have atoned for so ill a thing) but shewing no repentance, but rather an impudent affronting of God Almighty, I think he is not a fit witness, I appeal to your lordships and the whole Christian world if he be. I cannot believe your lordships will condemn me for an opinion which I will go to my death with, and it stands upon me so to do.

The last witness, my lords, is Turberville, and he says, in the year 1675 he often discoursed alone with me for a fortnight together at Paris. My servants he owns he never saw them, and how he could come for a fortnight together, and not see my servants, I refer it to your lordships' consideration whether it be possible. For I will tell your lordships, when I had been a few days at Paris, my landlord came one day to me and said, You do not do well to suffer any body to come to you without your man be by; for there came yesterday a Frenchman to speak with you, and I do not know him, and he went up strait to your chamber without any body with him; it is a dangerous thing, said he, for I know that Frenchmen and people have come up, and been alone with persons, and put a pistol to them and made them deliver their money for fear of their lives; therefore, pray, said he, do it no more. From that time, which was a few days after I came to Paris, the latter end of October or the beginning of November, no Christian soul was permitted to come to me without my servants; how then could he come to me for a fortnight together, and none of my servants see him? My lords, this gentleman very civilly the next day after he had made an affidavit against me, would needs mend it; and sir William Poulteny did acknowledge that he made an affidavit one day, that he came to my lord Powis's in the year 1673, and the next day amended it to 1672. Now I humbly conceive, my lords, a man that swears one thing to-day, which he forswears to-morrow, is not to be believed: and the truth of it is, as his brothers prove to your lordships, he came to my lord Powis's in the year 1671, and so he forswears himself in every thing, and is in no wise to be believed. He swears to your lordships I writ a letter to him to acquaint him that I would go by Calais, and not by Diep; but I have proved I went by Diep, and I assure your lordships I have not been at Calais, I think, these 12 or 14 years. I conceive these things are very manifest and clear proofs against him that he hath not sworn one true word. He swears that my lord Powis, my lady Powis, and his friends, persuaded him to go to Doway to be a frier, but not liking it, he came over again, and was in danger of his life by them; but the evidence is sufficiently strong in proof that he afterwards was at my lord Powis's and was well received, that he lay in the house, and was not in the least injured by them. And for his other relations, his brother proves he was not ill used by them. They gave him seven pound to be gone, and trouble them no more. He says, I said he was a coward; and I will tell you why I said so, because a captain, that is now out of England, told his sister so, who told me so; but that is not very material. My lords, there is one witness more, John Porter, that swears to your lordships this one thing, That this Turberville swore to him at such an ale-house, he knew nothing of the Plot. And then, my lords, there is Mr. Yalden, and he is a gentleman of reputation, he said in his company, there was no trade good but that of a discoverer; God damn the duke of York, Monmouth, Plot and all, for I know nothing of it. Truly, my lords, whether he got money by it or no, is known since he hath been a discoverer, telling what he knew not so many months ago; and therefore I submit it to your lordships what he is.

My lords, these people that swear against me, there is not one of them a person of any quality or condition; and whether they have not rather sworn for money than the truth, by things that are known, and need no proof, I shall observe when I come to it to argue that point in law, whether a man that swears for gain is a credible witness, or no?

My lords, I have, as well as I can, summed up that little evidence that was given against me: I cannot do it better in so short a time; for indeed I had but a very short time last night, and I have not slept; I had the cramp so much in extremity, that my next neighbour heard me roaring out. My lords, I submit myself to your lordships, and doubt not but that the matters charged upon me will appear to your lordships sufficiently answered. And I beseech your lordships well to consider that one thing against Dr. Oates, his dissembling with God Almighty, and his impudent owning of it. This I do insist upon; and I protest before God Almighty, if I were a judge, I would not hang a dog upon such evidence. My lords, I have many points in law to offer to your lordships, and when you please I should do it, I will name them to you.

L. H. S. Name them, my lord; if you have any doubts in law, propound them.

Lord Lovelace. My lords, I would not interrupt my lord, but I think indeed it is no interruption, since his lordship broke off, and was going on to another point. But I think I see one of the impudentest things that ever was done in a court of justice; whilst we are trying a person here for a popish plot, I do see a protest papist standing in the body of your House, and that is sir Barnard Gascoigne. (Who thereupon went out of the court.)

L. Staff. My lords, I do conceive I have cleared myself to your lordships of what I am accused of. My lords, the course of my whole life hath been otherwise; I defy any creature in the world to say, that I ever used one disobedient or disloyal word of the king, or did any such act. I waited on the king that now is, in the unhappy war that is passed, when I was in a low condition enough as to fortune, and my wife and family were thereby reduced to great straits, for my wife and children lived some five or six years upon some plate and jewels that we had; whereas if I would have come, and been at London, and joined with that party, I could have saved my estate, and lived quietly as others did. But my conscience told me, I ought to wait upon the king, and offer him my personal service, when I could do him no other. I have shown how the witnesses have forsworn themselves; I shall now, if your lordships please, desire your opinion in some points of law. And though perhaps I may uame to your lordships many things that are impertinent, or not to the purpose, I beg your lordships pardon, it is out of the weakness of my understanding; and I hope you will not think ill, neither your lordships nor the House of Commons, if I should, through ignorance, move things impertinent. The first point of law is this:

First, I conceive there is no example or precedent for it, that proceedings criminal ever did continue from parliament to parliament, and this is continued to three.

L. H. & S. Speak out, my lord, and go on.

L. Staff. Secondly, my lords, I do not question the power of the House of Commons in the least; but, my lords, I know they impeach when they find grounds for it without dispute: But I question whether any man, by the known laws of this kingdom, in capital cases, can be proceeded on, but by indictment first found by the Grand Jury, and not by impeachment by any person, or other body of men.

L. H. & S. Say on, my lord.

L. Staff. Thirdly, my lords, I conceive there are many defects in the indictment or the impeachment, (indictment there is none.) There is no overt-act alledged in the indictment or impeachment, I know not well what it is called. And, my lords, by the act of parliament in 1 H. 4. c. 10. nothing from thenceforth is to be treason, but according to the statute of 25 Ed. 3. which includes an overt-act.

Fourthly, My lords, I desire that I may prove that by law they are not competent witnesses, for they swear for money. But, my lords, I forgot one thing to say to your lordships as to the evidence, that these gentlemen did endeavour to prove (I do not speak whether they did or not) a general plot of the papists; whether they did or not, I am not concerned in it, for I say, they have not proved me a papist, which I submit to your lordships; and though any man may know me so in his private knowledge, yet they having not given any proof of it, it is not to affect me.

Fifthly, There is one point of law more, That no man can be condemned for treason, as I conceive, by one witness; and there are not two witnesses to any one point. These are the points of law; I humbly beg your lordships pardon for the trouble, and desire your opinion in them.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, before we make answer to what my lord hath said, I do humbly desire, That for the objection which he hath made against Mr. Southall, proveyed by a noble lord of this House (though I must observe it was not of his own knowledge, but by hearsay, and that matter of hearsay contrary to the act of oblivion) to the end there may be no doubt remain of Mr. Southall's credit, that a noble lord of this House, and a gentleman of the House of Commons (who both know Mr. Southall) may be heard to his reputation.

Sir F. Winnington. Lord Ferrers knew him not himself, but my lord Brook and Mr. Gower will give a better account of him.

(The lord Brook was sworn.)

Lord Brook. My lord, what I have to say concerning this Mr. Southall is, That he hath been often employed both by my brother and my mother; and they have so good an opinion of him that they employ him still; and therefore we take him for an honest man, and an able man, or he would not be so much trusted and employed: And I take him to be a very good churchman; for if he was not, I would not employ him.

L. H. & S. An honest man, an able, and a good churchman, your lordship says?

Lord Brook. He receives the sacrament four times a year.

Sir W. Jones. Then swear Mr. William Leveson Gower, a member of the House of Commons; (which was done in his place.)

Mr. L. Gower. My Lords, I have been near seven years of Staffordshire, but did not know Mr. Southall till this popish plot was discovered. After that I came acquainted with him (being a justice of the peace in that county) in court, where I found him to be the most zealous prosecutor of the papists in that country, no man like him. I likewise found several popish priests had by his means been apprehended and imprisoned, and one of them since convicted, who by the way still remains unexecuted in Stafford gaol. What opinion some may have heard or had of him formerly, I cannot tell; but this I know, that he hath more than once come to desire my assistance, that he might prosecute the papists the most effectual way upon the statutes made for that purpose, and that he did complain to me that he had not met with good usage elsewhere. My lords, I take opinion to be grounded upon principles; and I do observe that those of this country who do believe this popish plot, and know Mr. Southall, and are principled for the preservation of the king, the protestant religion, and the government, do at this time speak well of him, and those who are not so principled speak otherwise. My lords, I was surprised when I heard my name mentioned upon this occasion: I have told your lordships all the matter of fact that upon the sudden occurs to me, (with my own opinion, which I offer with all submission;) and had I had notice, I might possibly have recollected more, which I would freely have declared to your lordships, but this is all that I can now say.

L. Staff. My lords, if your lordships please, I would say one word, if you will give me leave; I am very ignorant, and beg your lordships pardon for troubling of you: I humbly desire to know, whether after the points of law are argued, I may speak something, not concerning the evidence of the plot, but concerning myself.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, we shall not oppose the saying any thing he can for himself; but we must conclude, and have the last word.

L. H. S. My lord, the gentlemen that are for the House of Commons must conclude. My lords will give you all the favour they can, but they must have the last word.

L. Staff. I do not oppose it.

L. H. S. Therefore you will do well to say all you have to say together. For the points of law, my lords will give no judgment till the Commons have answered them, and they I suppose will first sum up the whole proofs; then you may say what you have to say, for they must make an end. Gentlemen, will you speak first to the law?

Sir W. Jones. No, my lords, first to the fact.

L. H. S. Go on then.

Then Sir William Jones, one of the committee appointed to manage the evidence, began to sum up the same as followeth:

May it please your lordships; We have now done our evidence as to Matter of Fact; and that which I have in charge at this time, is to remind your lordships of our Proofs; to answer the objections that have been made against them; and to make some observations upon the whole.

My lords, The members of the House of Commons that were appointed for the service of the management of this trial, those of them I mean who began the first day, made a division of our evidence into two parts; the one that which concerned the plot in general, and the other what related to this lord in particular.

My lords, as to the Plot in general, we did call six witnesses; I know some of your lordships have taken notes, and you have their names: They were Smith, Dugdale, Prance, Oates, Dennis, and Jenison.

My lords, because I will save as much of your time as I can, I will not take upon me to repeat what each witness said as to the plot in general; but when I come to the evidence which immediately concerns my lord, I must beg your favour that I may be more particular. I will say thus much for the proofs of the plot in general, that there was by those witnesses so much fully proved, that made it most apparent that there was a general design amongst the Roman catholics to introduce their false religion into this kingdom, that the Jesuits had several meetings to that end, that they endeavoured to do it by several ways, by raising of arms, by collecting of monies, and by designing against the king's life; nay, they had so far advanced their designs, and were in so much readiness, as they thought it time to appoint officers not only for their army, but for the civil government, as if the work were already accomplished.

Your lordships were told by one of the witnesses of a Lord-Chancellor, and of a Lord-Treasurer, (lords now in the Tower yet to be tried;) and you were told also of officers for the military part, a general, a lieutenant-general, and this lord at the bar to be paymaster of the army.

I shall, my Lords, desire to take notice to your lordships, that this design, though it was to be finally acted by other hands, yet it was first contrived, and afterwards carried on by the Priests and Jesuits. You will find them preparing for it, by making sermons to justify that doctrine (which I confess this noble lord denies) of the lawfulness of killing kings. You will find the priests and jesuits, in their discourses as well as sermons, urging and encouraging their disciples and votaries, to go on with their design of killing our king, and giving that common reason for it, that he was a heretic, and it were meritorious to take him out of the way.

My lords, I take notice of these particulars in the general plot, because it may give great light to, and add much to the confirmation of the particular evidence. And my Lords, (I think) I may take leave to say that the plot in general hath been now sufficiently proved. And if we consider what hath been proved at former trials (upon which many of the offenders and traitors have been executed) what hath been published in print; and above all Coleman's letters, written with his own hand, and for that reason impossible to be falsified; we may justly conclude, that there is not a man in England, of any understanding, but must be fully convinced of the truth of the Plot in general. I shall spare to mention the resolutions and declarations of two parliaments, and of both Houses in those two parliaments, without (as I remember) one dissenting voice, expressing their full satisfaction of the reality of the Plot; so that I think now none remain that do pretend not to believe it, but two sorts of persons; the one, those that were conspirators in it; and the other, those that wished it had succeeded, and desire it may so still.

But, my lords, I will be the shorter on this part; for perhaps it will be objected, you have offered a fair proof of a general Plot, here are records, votes of both houses, papers and evidences printed, and witnesses in voce to prove it; but what is all this to my lord Stafford? My lords, it goes a great way to him; I do not say to be a convincing evidence, but to make the particular evidence against him highly credible.

Your lordships cannot imagine, that there are such a store of lords and great men amongst that party (though there be too many) that they should have great choice for great offices. Your lordships hear how the other great offices were disposed of, and truly I think the merit of this lord amongst that party might very well entitle him to an office as great as this of Treasurer of War, or Pay-master to the Army. But what is the evidence of the general Plot (may some still say) to my lord Stafford? What do you mention the raising an army? What do you mention the collecting of money? What do you mention the providing of arms for? Yes, my lords, they are very useful, for they give a fair introduction to prove against this lord, that he was to have this office. If it be proved by other witnesses than those who swore directly against this lord, that there were arms provided, that there was an army to be raised, and the rest; it proves at least, that there was occasion for such an officer as the particular witness proves my lord to be.

My lords, for the other matter that relates to the consultations of the Priests and Jesuits and their sermons and discourses, I desire your lordships to observe that also; which if you do your lordships will easily perceive what a great influence even that matter hath upon the particular evidence, and how credible it renders the testimony of the particular witnesses. Your lordships will find, when my lord was at Tixall (as Dugdale gives you an account) there was Evers the Jesuit, and other priests still at my lord's elbow, and egging him on to this business. Your lordships will find where Oates speaks of him, it is at Fenwick's chamber, who was a Jesuit, giving him ghostly counsel. Your lordships will find, that at Paris where Mr. Tuberville speaks of him, there were Father Sherborne, Father Nelson, and Father Anthony Turberville. Still the priests are about my lord; and when my lord is among them, or but newly come from them, then he utters the treason of killing the king. And doubtless this traiterous purpose of his did arise from their counsels: so that though our witnesses speak of my lord's discourses at several times about killing the king, yet they make them flow from one and the same fountain, the instigation of the Priests and Jesuits.

But now, my lords, to come to the particular evidence, I think I may say, if ever evidence was convincing, this is so. We have brought three witnesses which speak each of them that which is sufficient to prove my lord guilty; and they speak of overt-acts too, as I shall observe anon.

His lordship was pleased at the beginning of our evidence to desire that the witnesses might look him in the face; and for that he cited two statutes, I suppose he intended the statutes of 1 and 5 of Edw. VI. which statutes, or at least one of them, do say, that there shall be in case of High-Treason, two witnesses to accuse, and those two witnesses brought face to face at the time of Trial: and my lord hath had the benefit of those laws; he hath had two, nay three witnesses to prove him guilty, brought face to face before your lordships; and if these three, or any two of them deserve to be credited, my lord in this case is guilty of High-Treason. My lords, I must beg the favour of looking upon my paper of notes; for the truth is, the witnesses are so many, and the proceeding hath held so long, that is impossible for my weak memory to retain all that was said.

My lords, the first witness we began withal was Dugdale*; and I know your lordships did take notice what he swore: but it will be my duty to remind your lordships, that he tells you, That he had heard of a general design of making preparations to be ready against the king's death, and this for several years past. But as to the matter of hastening the death of the king, that was but a late counsel. He tells you, I think, that about the latter end of August, or the beginning of September, 1678, Evers and other Jesuits were at Tixall, that there was a consult then about the king's death; and that (by the means of Evers, who was a very great man among them, but since fled, and is mentioned in the impeachment) he was admitted to that consult, and heard particularly what every man said; and he does take upon him to say, That at that time the matter of taking away the king's life was propounded, and that my lord, the prisoner at the bar, did consent to it.

My lords, he tells you further, That upon a Sunday-morning my lord came from Stafford to Tixall to mass: My lord was pleased to observe, that we do not prove him a Papist; but we prove my lord came to mass, and that, I think, is one good proof of his being a Papist. Besides Dugdale swears my lord did then complain, That they had not the free exercise of their religion; that they could not say their prayers openly: What were they? Not the prayers of Protestants, not those contained in the liturgy of our church. He could not complain of any restraint as to them; but complain he did, that they had not the free exercise of their religion; but he did hope, if things succeeded well, in a short time it would be otherwise. This is particularly sworn by Dugdale.

My lords, his lordship was very much unsatisfied, that Dugdale was not particular in point of time; he did talk of some matters to be in August or September, but could not fix to any day. But your lordships will remember, that as to one particular, and which mainly concerns his lordship to answer, he comes to a day, or within a day; for he swears positively, That upon the 20th or 21st of September he was sent for to my lord's chamber, the servants were put out; that there my lord did propose to him, in express terms, the matter of killing of the king: He would have him be an actor in it, and he offered him a reward of 500L to perform it. For this, which is the most material part of his particular evidence against my lord, he is certain it was either on the 20th or 21st of September; and he tells your lordships how he comes to remember the time, by a good token, by the foot race that was then to be run; and I do not perceive that my lord does deny, but rather acknowledge that Dugdale was in his chamber at that time. It is true he does deny some other circumstances which I shall answer anon. And here I do think Dugdale undertakes to swear to that which will amount to an overt-act, and a damnable one too, that is the offering 500*l.* to kill the king.

But Dugdale (it seems) was not willing to depend upon the promises of my lord for so much money, his lordship had not that credit with him; he repairs to Evers, and desires to be satisfied from him, whether he might rely upon my lord for so much money? Evers told him he might be sure to have the money; and that there was enough in Harcourt's and other mens' hands for the carrying on that blessed design; and that he should have it thence. I might, my lords, remember to your lordships, how Dugdale does particularly swear concerning another discourse he had afterwards with my lord; That my lord complained of the great losses that had been sustained by him and his friends for the king; how, in particular, my lord Aston's father had lost 30,000*l.* and what resentments my lord had of it. He said, That places of profit were rather bestowed upon those that deserted the king, and were rebels and traitors, than on those that did him faithful service: And what does he conclude from thence? he is very angry with the king, and does say, that next to the cause of religion (which was the strongest motive with him to take away the king's life) the king's ingratitude to his loyal subjects, was that which did most offend him.

I shall not trouble your lordships with other particular matters which were to serve as encouragements to the design; as that there was to be a pardon from the Pope; That my lord did write a letter to Evers, which was shewn to Dugdale, wherein he says, That things did succeed very well abroad, and he hoped they would do so at home. I shall only observe, that Dugdale's evidence, as to my lord's damnable design of killing the king, is positive and full. And if this be to be believed (as I hope we shall shew there is no reason but it should be) then here surely is one sufficient witness to prove my lord guilty of the highest treason.

My lords, the next witness we call for against my lord, was Dr. Oates; and I think Dr. Oates is not only positive, but he is positive in that which most certainly will amount to an overt-act; nay, I think to more overt-acts than one. The doctor tells your lordships, That having been at St. Omers and in Spain, he saw several letters that were subscribed Stafford; he did not then know my lord's hand, but he saw the letters, and he tells you the effect of those letters. And I remember in one of them there is this expression, That my lord (the prisoner at the bar) does give assurance to the Fathers, that he is very zealous and ready to do them service.

Dr. Oates tells you, my lords, That afterwards coming into England, my lord Stafford did write a letter, I think it was to his son; but sure I am, the Doctor said, he had the carriage of it to the post-house; That he saw my lord write it; he read the superscription, and he swears, that the hand which writ that letter, was the hand which subscribed to all the former. And so then joining the one to the other, it amounts to as good an evidence as if he had known my lord's hand from the beginning.

But that which comes home to my lord, is that which Dr. Oates saw, and that which Dr. Oates heard; and they are these particulars which I now mention.

First, he saw a commission directed to my lord to be paymaster of the army, he saw it delivered to my lord's own hand, and my lord accepted it. Dr. Oates read the commission, and he tells you by whom it was signed, Johannes Paulus Oliva, a person substituted by the Pope to issue out commissions. He tells you the contents of it, and of this he swears he was an ocular witness.

He tells you of another matter he heard my lord say, as considerable as the other, That when my lord had received the commission, my lord declared, that he was to go down into Staffordshire and Lancashire, where he was to put things in readiness. What were those things? He had now a commission, by virtue of which, in Lancashire and the other places, he was to prepare and gather monies for that army which he was to pay. So much Dr. Oates doth swear he heard from my lord's own mouth.

But there is one thing further, which I had almost forgot. He doth swear, that my lord was privy to, and approved of, the matter of killing the king; for he doth swear he did hear my lord say at that time, 'He hoped before he returned, honest William' (who was Grove that was executed for this attempt) 'would have done the business.' And what that business was, every man who hath heard of Grove's treason, must needs understand.

There is but one thing more that I remember of Dr. Oates's testimony. Your lordships that have a better advantage to write than we, who are crowded together, may have taken notes of more; but this one thing I do observe: Dr. Oates doth expressly swear, That my lord bore a very ill mind towards his majesty; for my lord did, in his hearing, complain, 'That the king had deceived them a great while, and that they would bear with him no longer, he should deceive them no more.'

My lords, our third witness was Mr. Turberville, who doth give you an account, That he being first sent to Doway, and intended to be entered there in one of the societies, (he was sent by my lord Powis and my lady Powis, and some of his relations of that religion, for that purpose) he did not like the company, he was not pleased with the exercises of that religion, and that with much difficulty he escaped thence and came for England. But finding he was not well looked upon here, nor well received by his relations, he went over to France: That being at Paris, he came into the company of the three Fathers I named before, Father Sherborne, Father Nelson, and Father Turberville; the last whereof, he tells you, was his own brother: That by the means of these priests he was brought acquainted with my lord Stafford ; and doubtless they were able to make him intimately acquainted with my lord. And it did prove so, for he tells you, after some time, that in a lower room of my lord's lodging, my lord proposed to him the business of killing the king. That he did not at all like it, was very unwilling to undertake it, but my lord bid him consider of it, and that he should give him his answer at Diep, having enjoined him secrecy ; but my lord after sent him word he would go by Calais : and the witness afterwards went into England, and from thence into the French army. And this is the substance of what Turberville deposesh.

And, my lords, I think it will not be doubted by any man that will consider these three mens testimonies, but that here are two witnesses, if not more, to prove my lord guilty of treason.

But my lord has been pleased against them to make several objections ; some have been by witnesses which he hath produced to encounter the proofs that we have offered ; and some of them have been by observations that he hath made upon what hath been said by our witnesses and his. I will keep to order as much as I can, and not confound the order and method of his defence.

The witnesses he first brought were against Dugdale, and of them his lordship was pleased to begin with his daughter, the lady Marchioness of Winchester, and his niece Mrs. Howard. Your lordships, I presume, are pleased to observe what they were called to. They did testify that being at Wakeman's trial, they did hear Dugdale swear (says my lady marchioness of Winchester) that my lord Stafford was to come down into Staffordshire in June or July, and Mr. Dugdale was then to receive orders from my lord ; and he swore (as she was pleased to say) that there was a consult in August at Tixall, and my lord Stafford was there present. Mrs. Howard (for I put them together) was pleased to say that she was present at that trial, and there Dugdale swore that my lord Stafford did come down in June or July, and that my lord was at the consult in August.

My lords, I will not make objections neither to the religion of these ladies, nor to their relation to my lord, though those be matters that are to be considered. But that which I shall observe to your lordships, is this, that they do not agree one with another : For my lady Winchester says Dugdale did swear that my lord was to come down in June or July, and Mrs. Howard says, that he swore he did come down then. Now there is a great difference betwixt swearing an intention that a man was to come down, and swearing the very act that he did come down at that time. By which your lordships may observe, how hard a matter it is for witnesses that are present at a trial (especially at a trial which did not directly, though it might in consequence concern another person of their relation) to take notice exactly of things.

And truly, my lords, these ladies being of that religion, might have so much concern upon them for sir George Wakeman the popish physician, and in him for other their friends of that party, that they might not have so much liberty of thought, as to observe exactly all circumstances sworn to by the witnesses ; and therefore it is no great matter if they are mistaken in them. But I believe if any one do consult the print (though it be no evidence, nor offered as such) he will find no such thing was at that time sworn ; for it is not so printed, and those that took notes did not understand it so.

My lords, the next witness my lord is pleased to bring, is his servant Furnese ; and what is it that he testifieth ? He saith, that he was with my lord the whole time that Dugdale was in my lord's chamber ; and he doth not remember that ever Dugdale was there but once, and he doth not remember that ever my lord bid him go out of the room.

My lords, it is a very hard matter for a man to come thus in the negative, to remember how often Dugdale was there, especially there being no more occasion to take notice of it then, than here appears to be, and that after so long a time. And it is a very hard matter for a servant to gain credit, by saying his master never bid him go out of the room in his life. These things may be done or said, and yet escape the memory of a servant of more age, and of less inclination to favour his master, than this person appears to be of and to have. Therefore I think there will be but a very small matter made of what he said, no force at all in it ; and I believe your lordships will give very little regard to it ; but rather believe those witnesses that swear positively, that they have seen him with my lord, and speak to a familiarity at that time between them.

This, young man Furnese, was my lord's servant, and of his religion ; and it is considerable, whether we have not reason to be afraid that more than ordinary practice has been used to prepare evidence on my lord's behalf, which I shall have occasion to speak to when I come to the other witnesses.

His next witness, my lords, was his boy, George Leigh, who is 15 years of age now, and was eight years old when he came to my lord seven years ago. And he attests the same thing, and to the same purpose with the other. And I think I may leave him with the same answer, for we are nothing more concerned with him than we were with the other. Only one thing I would observe, to shew that his memory was imperfect ; he doth not remember that Dugdale was with my lord at all that day, which my lord himself doth acknowledge he was, and the other witness agrees ; so that there cannot be any great weight laid upon what he saith.

My lord's next witness was Thomas Sawyer, and he is one of my lord Aston's servants, that I desire to observe of him first. And what does he say ? He saith, that Dugdale went away for debt. The contrary to which was apparently proved ; for we, by our witnesses, made it manifest, that Dugdale went away for the matter of the Plot; the fear and dread he was in upon that score, and the circumstance of his being apprehended by the watch at night in his flight, and how he was put to take the oaths, do manifestly prove this. But he says another thing, which I desire may have no weight with your lordships, that Dugdale should threaten, that because my lord Aston would not own him for his servant, he would be revenged of him. Truly, if my lord Aston were here to be tried it would have some weight. But to think, if it were true, that he had so sworn, that therefore he would be so wicked as to do mischief to another man, that he would be revenged of every man of that religion, or of every man that came to my lord Aston's house; that cannot be imagined. So I cannot see what great stress, my lords, the prisoner can lay upon it, as to the present trial, which concerns my lord Stafford.

But, my lords, I desire to observe, that he says further that when Dugdale went away there was a discourse of a plot (this he helps out Dugdale in :) And that there was a discourse of the killing of a justice of peace. So that certainly it does shew, that Dugdale was apprehensive of the Plot. And as to that which he is pleased to say, that Dugdale should deny his knowledge of the Plot, and take drink and with execrations forswear it; it shall be no manner of objection at all. For I shall have occasion to shew hereafter, that Dugdale at that time was very far from revealing the Plot he had been so long engaged in; he was in apprehension of the danger of his own life, and Southall tells you how and when he revealed it, and by what inducements he was prevailed upon to do it.

The next witness my lord called, was Philips, the minister of Tixall; and truly all that I can accuse him of, is want of memory, and that is no fault in a man, that perhaps is very studious and careful in his employment, as I hope he is. He tells you, that whereas Dugdale swore at a former trial, that he acquainted Mr. Philips with the death of a justice of peace of Westminster on the Monday, that he did not acquaint him with it; that is, he does not remember it, for no man that swears a negative, can swear more. But whether Mr. Philips's evidence be of any consequence to us, we submit to your lordships consideration; when we oppose to his want of memory, two witnesses that swear he was by when this news was told: And we are told likewise, as a confirmation of that, by two gentlemen of quality, that the report of such a thing was spread abroad all over that country, before it was possible for it to come by the way of ordinary intelligence. Whether, therefore, what Mr. Philips testifies, proceeds from any other cause than want of memory in Mr. Philips, I must leave to your lordships consideration.

But this I would observe to your lordships, that when Mr. Philips was asked by my lord, whether or no Dugdale were a person likely to perjure himself, he could not say so? Nay, being asked of what reputation he was of? he said, by some he was very well spoken of, by some but indifferently; but I do not remember that he said he was ill spoken of by any. So I think Mr. Philips has rather advanced than prejudiced Mr. Dugdale's reputation and credit.

My lords, I think I may lightly pass over the three justices of peace that were brought to give an account of Dugdale's behaviour before them, and not mention them distinctly because they swear all to the same purpose. That Mr. Dugdale was apprehended upon suspicion of the Plot, that he took the oaths, that he was invited and urged by them to make a discovery of the Plot, which he then denied to have any knowledge of: For all this will be answered, when we come to remind your lordships of Mr. Southall's testimony.

His lordship was pleased, in the next place, to offer to prove Dugdale an ill man, by endeavouring to suborn witnesses: And in the first place he called Robinson, who testified a very unlikely thing, that Mr. Dugdale should call him in the street, and bring him to an house, and offer him money to swear against my lord Stafford; which money he had in an handkerchief, but did not tell him what particulars he should swear to: Nay and this after he had told him he could swear nothing. And it does not appear, that Dugdale had any manner of knowledge of him, or that this gentleman, Robinson, had any knowledge of my lord Stafford; So that it was a very rash and presumptuous thing, that Dugdale should attempt a man that he knew not; and a very imprudent thing, that he should suborn a witness to swear against a man that the witness to be suborned did not know. But I shall say no more of him, because I think upon the account that has been given of him by a noble earl of this House, and an honourable member of the House of Commons, if he had said things in themselves probable, he is not in the least to be believed.

My lord's next witness upon the same head of subornation, was one Murrel, a poor barber; and what says he? he testifies that Mr. Dugdale did offer him 50*l.* to swear against sir James Symons and some others. My lords, whether this be probable or no, we must leave to your lordships. We have called witnesses that prove him a man of no reputation, one that runs up and down the country, a kind of vagabond, and I think (upon the endeavours that have been proved to have been used as to others), it is no very hard matter to bring a man of his condition to say as much as he hath done.

The next witness is Samuel Holt, the blacksmith; and he tells such a story, that if it were true, would be some disparagement to Dugdale: And what is that? he says, that Dugdale sent a man and horse for him, to bring him to the Star in Stafford; and there offered him 40*l.* to swear that one Moore carried away Evers. My lords, how this story comes in, I cannot imagine; why Mr. Dugdale should bear any ill-will to Moore, or what should induce him to intice this man to swear against Moore, or what else was in it, it doth not appear. But no matter what it was for; we prove against this man, by two witnesses, Rawlins and Lander; by the first, that he is a man of ill reputation, very zealous to support the Plot, and cry down Mr. Dugdale, saying, that he was a rogue, and all they were rogues that took part with him. And by the other witness Lander, that Holt did make an assault upon him, and would have killed him for being ready to appear against my lord Aston at his intended trial: So that he is a man that has more zeal than honesty: zeal in no good matter, namely, to hinder the truth from coming out against my lord Aston; and therefore we have little reason to wonder, nay, all the reason in the world to believe, that he says that which is untrue about Mr. Dugdale.

My lords, there was another witness, Mr. Lydcott, that said, he was a fellow of King's-college in Cambridge. He has offered no proofs that he was so; and truly it is very improbable he should be so: for I hope fellowships in the university, especially in one of the chief colleges (as this is) are bestowed upon more deserving, and less suspicious persons than he appears to be: A man that owns himself the continual companion and secretary of one so famous in the Popish party as my lord Castlemain is: a man that pretends he was never out of his company; and a man that owns, that two years since, he was taking of notes at a trial for this plot, not only for his own curiosity, but for the service of his lord, who was concerned in the accusation: that this man should be a fellow of King's-college, seems strange, and till it be better proved, will hardly be believed, nor will he deserve any credit. It is true, he doth acknowledge himself a protestant, and to be of the church of England, and educated, as he says, a Presbyterian; but when he was asked, when he received the sacrament last? I do not remember he gave your lordships any answer.

This witness says, that he was at the trial of the five Jesuits; and there Dugdale did swear, that he gave notice to Mr. Philips and Mr. Sambidge of sir Edmundbury Godfrey's death: and this they would make to be a great fault in Dugdale, because neither Philips nor Sambidge remember it. Now whether Dugdale swore true in that or no, does not depend upon Dugdale's own credit alone; but you have heard other witnesses have made it appear, that he did swear true: so that we need not say any thing more to this witness; nor to Gifford, who testifies to the same purpose; because that point, as to the report of the death of the justice of peace, is by other witnesses clearly proved.

And as to Mr. Sambidge, I do not wonder much, that he should say he did not hear it, because he could hardly hear what was said to him by the court, or any of the officers set near him on purpose. But my lords, I desire your lordships to take notice, that he was a very angry witness; he said, he had formerly had a controversy with Dugdale, that Dugdale had cited him into Litchfield-court, and had there a suit against him for a defamation; and he said that against Dugdale, which, unless better proved, must needs make Sambidge much respected: he said, that Dugdale was the wickedest man on earth, but what proof he offered of that, or whether he did instance in any one particular, I leave to your lordships memories.

My lords, there is another proof relating to Mr. Dugdale, not out of the mouth of a witness, but out of a paper, which I desire to give an answer to. It was an objection the prisoner at the bar was pleased to make to Dugdale's information, taken the 24th December, 1678, before the justices in the country, wherein he had said to this purpose; Presently after one Howard, almoner to the queen, went over, he was told by George Hobson, that there was a design, &c. This, saith my lord, is most impossible to be true: for you say, that immediately after the almoner was gone away, Hobson told you this, whereas Hobson went away with the almoner; and he came not to live with my lord Aston till many years afterwards.

This my lord is pleased to offer as a fabrication of Dugdale's testimony; but, my lords, I do desire to observe, that this is an information taken before two justices of peace in the country; and if you look upon it, you will see it was written by a country clerk, and not very skillfully done. It is rather short notes of an examination, than a complete examination. And your lordships will please likewise to observe, that there is not really an expression that is clear one way or the other, but capable of two senses; that is to say, either it may import Hobson told him there was a design ever since the almoner Howard went away; or it may import, Hobson told him presently after the almoner went away, there was a design. Read but the words with a different comma, and it makes the sense one way or the other. Now it is plain; Dugdale could not intend that Hobson told him so soon as the almoner went away, because Hobson went away with the almoner. And it was better to his purpose, that Hobson should tell him so after his return than before, for that shews the design had been long a carrying on.

Therefore it being a doubtful expression, that may refer either to the time he told it him, or to the matter he told him of; and being taken in the latter sense, the objection faileth; I think this matter can have no weight at all in it to falsify a positive testimony.

My lords, The next witness we did call, and which was objected against by my lord, was Dr. Oates; and truly I must observe, that his lordship was not pleased to call any one witness materially to falsify Dr. Oates's testimony; and I must likewise observe, that Dr. Oates is, in the material part of his evidence, supported by other evidence.

When Dr. Oates gave evidence at former trials, it was the common discourse of the men of that religion, that Dr. Oates had never been in Spain, nor had ever any credit with the priests or jessita, but was a mean contemptible person, and that all he said was improbable. But now your lordships have heard that Dr. Oates, even by the testimony of Dennis a popish priest, (that is so to this day) was in Spain, was, according to what he saith, brought up in the college of the jesuits; that he was in such esteem there, that the archbishop of Tuam commended him very much in the presence of Deans, and spoke of what expectation there was of him. So that Dennis the priest doth support Dr. Oates in some parts of his evidence. I do not speak of that part of it which concerns this particular lord, but of his testimony touching the general Plot.

There is another thing wherein Dr. Oates is supported by another witness, and that is the esteem and intimacy he had with the jesuits. For Mr. Jenison swears, that Dr. Oates was a man in esteem among them, that he was at Ireland's chamber, and had discourse with Ireland, and did appear to be frequently employed by them. And I take these two witnesses to be a great support to Dr. Oates, as to the general matters which be evidenceth of the Plot.

What now doth my lord object against Dr. Oates? He called no witnesses against him, but only an honourable earl of this House, I think I may name him, the earl of Berkeley: and that which his lordship was pleased to testify against him, was;

Obj. That being examined at the House of Lords after he had given a long evidence against many persons, he was asked this question, Whether there were any more persons of quality he could speak against, or could accuse? and he said, No.

Ans. First, your lordships will be pleased to observe, that this was after he had accused my lord Stafford; my lord was secured in the Tower long before that upon Dr. Oates's testimony, and so he could not exclude this lord. But that which it is brought for (I suppose) is to make him a person of no credit; for after he had said this, he proceeded to an accusation of the queen. My lords, I humbly conceive this may receive a very fair answer. For,

First, my lords, I appeal to your lordships memories (for, I think, the matter was before you all, or at leastwise before some of your lordships), that the accusation which Dr. Oates made of the queen was not positive, nor of his own certain knowledge; but words which he heard spoken in a room in which he was not himself, but coming in afterwards, he saw the queen was there. So it was not positive, but circumstantial proof, and questionable whether what he testified would amount to the proof of one witness.

And I must observe in the second place, it might not be so clear to Dr. Oates, whether the queen were a person capable of an accusation, so as to be proceeded criminally against; the king and the queen are to some purposes but one person in law. It is true, some queens have been tried for treason; but whether Dr. Oates understood that she might be brought to a trial, may be a question.

But that which I rely upon as an answer, and which I desire may be considered, is, that Dr. Oates had given an account of a great many persons, and a great many things he had sworn against several persons, some of which were executed, some to be tried; and his Narrative against them, and of the whole Plot, consisted of a great number of particulars. Here is a question comes to the doctor on a sudden, 'Have you any more to say, or can you speak against any other?' It is possible a man that had said so much, and of so many, might not upon an instant recollect whether he had said all, or against all that he could say: nay, it is easily to be imagined he could not on a sudden comprehend all he had said or could say. Therefore that the answer of a man to such a question, put suddenly to him, having so much in his mind, and having said so much, should be taken so very strictly, and to hold him as perjured, because he did not at that instant time remember this particular of the queen, I think it a severe construction.

His lordship is pleased further to object against Dr. Oates, that he is of no credit: Why? Because he went to be of the Romish religion, and so was of that religion which is idolatry: I suppose his lordship will not call that religion idolatry another time, and in another place: but it serves his lordship upon this particular occasion, to call it so. But suppose Dr. Oates did, out of levity, or for want of being well grounded in his own, turn to another religion, he is not the first man that hath done so: there have been men of great fame in our church, and of great learning too, that have changed their religion more than once. I think he that knew that famous man Mr. Chillingworth, could not but know he was first a Protestant, and afterwards a papist, and afterwards a Protestant again: so that unless my lord could accuse the Doctor of some great crime or immorality, it will be hard, that the matter of changing his religion should hurt his testimony. I am sure, it was happy for us he did change; without that we had not had the first knowledge of the Plot, nor of many particulars which he could not come to know but by occasion of that change.

My lord was pleased to object, that the Doctor was a man subject to passion; and he brought in the lieutenant of the Tower, to speak of some hot words that passed between them. My lords, I will allow the Doctor to be a man of passion; nay, if my lord please, a man that is not of the deepest reach; but your lordships will observe, that passionate men are not often malicious; and that a man who is not of a deep judgment, could never have contrived and invented a Narrative, consisting of so many particulars, and they so coherent, if they were false. And if his Narrative be not true, he must be endued with more subtilty and wicked policy, than upon trial we can find in him. So that what my lord hath objected as to his infirmities, is no diminution to the truth of what he says, but rather a confirmation of it.

My lords, The last witnesses whom my lord endeavoured to impeach is Mr. Turberville; and against him my lord thinks he hath a great advantage: but, my lords, by that time I have reminded your lordships of what hath been already said, and what was before proved in answer to my lord's objections against him, Mr. Turberville will stand as clear in this court, as any of the former witnesses.

Your lordships will be pleased to take notice, That Mr. Turberville was at the beginning, when he came to the House of Commons, a little uncertain as to matter of time: for when he had made in his affidavit, the times to be 1673 and 1676, he craved leave to alter it to 1672 and 1675. Surely, my lords, this will be far from being any imputation to Mr. Turberville; because, first he gives the reason, how he came afterwards to understand the time better, by viewing his papers and letters; he likewise gives you an account, and so did sir William Poultony, when he did this, the next morning, before any man in the world had questioned him upon it. So that it shews the man's care and conscience both, when he is so careful, even in matters of the smallest moment, to set things right.

There is no man that knows the practice of the court of Chancery, but knows, that for a man to mend his answer after it is sworn in a point of time, or other circumstance, is no disparagement to him: nay, to do it, before the other party did except or take notice of it, is no objection, but rather a reputation to him: and your lordships will be pleased to take notice, that one of the times rectified, is of seven or eight years, the other of four years standing. And I do not think the worse of a witness that is not positive in a time, when that time is so far elapsed.

The next matter is, That this man was never with my lord: how was that proved, for it is a negative? Why, my lord is pleased to call his own servants, Furnese, and the boy Leigh; and what say they? They never saw any such man. My lords, I desire your lordships to observe, That Mr. Turberville was introduced by greater confidants than either of these servants. Mr. Turberville came in the company of the priests, and you hear the boy deny that he knew Anthony Turberville, but not that he knew father Turberville; nor doth my lord himself deny it, nor doth either master or man deny my lord's correspondency with the other two fathers. And it might be very easy for Mr. Turberville to come in the company of the priests, and the boy not take particular notice of him. And it is as little an objection what my lord says that Turberville himself said he did not know the boy: how many are there that come to the houses of another, and unless they lodge there, or dine there often, do not remember the servants of the house? And it is no greater an objection to say, the servants did not know him: the priests they knew him; they were his guides; they were the likeliest to gain him admittance, not only into my lord's house, but into my lord's heart.

My lords, your lordships will be pleased likewise to observe, they have also gone about in very little matters to disprove Mr. Turberville; as that whereas he says, he was not well used by my lord Powis and his lady, when he returned from Doway, that he was very well used: and as one witness (I think Minehead) says, he was permitted to lie in a room near my lord's chamber. My lords, Mr. Turberville does not pretend to say, that my lord Powis shut him out of doors; but what reproaches or unkind words might pass between them in private, Minehead might not hear: so that to say, that he lay in my lord's house, is no answer to this matter. And for the other witness (his brother) that speaks of his kindred's being kind to him, that, under favour, does not at all disprove him; for, what was the kindness? His brother and sister were so kind as to give him 7*l.* never to see him more; a great matter, when a younger brother lies upon a family, that the trouble of his stay there is redeemed at the price of 7*l.* This was a very great kindness, a kindness indeed that one would scarce deny to a stranger, if in poverty. I mention the least matters I can remember, because I would have nothing stick with your lordships.

Then secretary Lydcott (the fellow of King's College) was called again; but indeed, my lords, he was so out in his arithmetic, so mistaken in the year, and used the New-Style (the Romish) so much more than ours, that it makes me suspect he is not so great a protestant as he pretends to be. He promised us his book, which he was not then prepared to produce; but because we do not hear of him, nor of his book since, we say no more of him.

My lords, John Porter, my lord Powis's butler, comes next, and what does he tell your lordships? Why, that Mr. Turberville came not to Powis house, (it seems he did not appear there) but that he came to a viewalling house hard by; and he telling Turberville he must know something of the Plot, he denied that he knew any thing. To the same purpose, or rather to less, and more improbably, does Yalden (the gentleman of Grays-Inn, as he calls himself) testify, who says, that walking in Gray's-Inn walks, he had a discourse with Turberville; and that he then swore, there was no trade good now but that of a discoverer; and damned himself because he could make no discovery. Truly, my lords, this looks in itself to be something prepared for the purpose: It is not probable, that a man that should use those horrid oaths, and should have such a mind to be a discoverer, should disable himself ever to be so by swearing he knew nothing.

But I will not only answer that matter, with saying it is improbable; but I shall desire your lordships to remember, that Mr. Powel, a gentleman of the same house, and of good reputation, does swear, that Turberville did acquaint him, that he could discover a considerable matter; and this was above a year since. And Mr. Arnold, a member of the House of Commons, does confirm it, that he did several times acquaint him, that he could make an important discovery; and gave him several reasons why he thought not fit to do it at that time, because of the dangers which might arise from some great men; and therefore till he had a more convenient opportunity, he would not discover. But as soon as the parliament sat, very early he did begin to discover: So that I shall oppose the testimony of Mr. Powel and Mr. Arnold, to the testimony of my lord Powis's butler and Mr. Yalden; the latter of whom speaks so improbably, and of a discourse half a year ago; whereas Mr. Powel speaks of what Mr. Turberville said above a year since, and Mr. Arnold of a longer time.

My lords, it hath been sometimes objected, that Mr. Turberville was a stranger to my lord; and it was too great a trust to commit to a stranger, too great a secret for a stranger to be acquainted with: My lord's design of the king's death was too great a matter to lodge with one, with whom my lord had no more acquaintance than he had with Turberville.

Your lordships will be pleased to observe who they were that did introduce him, and who probably gave the best character of him; they were the three priests: "And I do not wonder when these priests had brought my lord up to such a purpose, that they should prevail with his lordship to give credit to, and deal with a man that was not very unlike in his circumstances to attempt such a business: For your lordships will observe, he was a man that was very stout; for against my lord's reflection upon him as to cowardice in deserting the army, Mr. Turberville hath produced the certificate of his dismission, which gives him a very good character. Besides, he was a man indigent; and therefore I think there could not be a fitter man chosen for the purpose, if he had been so void of all grace as to undertake it; and that priests having gotten a man so qualified, as they thought him, were not likely to let slip such an opportunity.

But, my lords, to come to that which is the sum of the business, and which my lord lays more weight on than all the rest; and that is the affidavit which Mr. Turberville swore before the justices of the peace (which was, in effect, what he informed the House of Commons), and in that affidavit, besides his alteration of times (which I have spoken to already) it is objected, that he does say that which is manifestly untrue: For he says my lord came by the way of Calais, with count Gramont; neither of which my lord did do.

My lords, I will not mention the master of the yacht, nor the witnesses from the Admiralty, which make out, that my lord came from Dieppe, and not from Calais. Nor do I deny that my lord came by himself, and not with count Gramont; and therefore it is most certainly true, that what Turberville swore, as to those two particulars, was not true. Yet if your lordships please to observe the circumstances, though what he swore herein was not true, it will appear a very innocent mistake.

For in Turberville's Affidavit he tells your lordships, That he came away without my lord to Dieppe, and came from Dieppe to England before my lord Stafford left Paris. Mr. Turberville tells you afterwards my lord came from Calais with count Gramont: Mr. Turberville could not possibly be thought to speak this of his own knowledge, because he does in the same Affidavit tell you too, that he came away before my lord, and had not his passage with him. So that, my lords, I desire you would observe, it could be no design of his to affirm this of his own knowledge: For if it were, he took a very ill course to disclose in the same Affidavit that he was absent, and so could not speak of his own knowledge. And, my lords, suppose a man did swear such a man and he were in such company, and that he came home and left the man there, and that afterwards the man said such and such things in that company; what should I say of this oath? I might well say the words of his oath were not proper, or that he was unwary in expressing himself; but I could not say, nor would any man justly be able to say, he had a design to make the world believe he heard him say so, because he swears in the same breath, he came away before the words were spoken. If Mr. Turberville had understood how strict and nice a man ought to be in expressing himself in an Affidavit, he would have said, (as he had been told) my lord came to Calais; and that count Gramont came with him, as he understood. It is true, he hath not put in those words; but I beseech you, when the matter itself will bear it, nay, when it is most apparent, that Mr. Turberville could have no other meaning than to relate what he was informed by others, and what he could not know himself; what corruption, what obliquity can there be in this oath? All that can be said, is, it was not cautiously worded; but it does certainly disclose so much in itself, that every one that hears it must say, That he did not take upon himself to swear it as of his own knowledge, because he tells you he was not there; so that it was rather want of knowledge how to express himself properly, than any corruption in his oath, of surswearing himself.

But, says my lord, how should he come to know this? Why Mr. Turberville said, he had a letter whereby he knew my lord would come by the way of Calais: But where is that letter? Is it necessary to keep, or does any man almost keep letters of no greater concernment than this, that my lord writ him word how he would go by the way of Calais, and this after five years, and after he was in the wars, and where I have heard he was taken prisoner? To be sure, he was much tumbled up and down from place to place. And under all these circumstances might not such a letter be lost? But, my lords, I beseech you, are there not some proofs that look much this way, made out by another witness? Does not Mr. Mort tell you something of this nature? First, he agrees as to the matter of an English lord lying about such a street in Paris, he tells you he was with Mr. Turberville, and that he himself walked about Luxemburgh-house whilst Mr. Turberville went to speak with that English lord: He does say, he believes his name was my lord Stafford, but he is not positive; and the times which he speaks of do agree with what Mr. Turberville deposes. And there is one thing, which, though I should not mention upon any other occasion, because it was but a foolish joke, yet I shall crave leave to speak of it now. He tells you, That one day, while they were at Diep in expectation of my lord's coming, and hearing that he went another way, they had this piece of minute wit upon it, 'Cursed is he that relies upon a broken Staff.' Whereby, he thinks, was meant the name of Stafford. So then, I beseech you, if Mort say true, are not here footsteps, and a foundation whereon to ground a belief, that there was a correspondence between Turberville and my lord; and that Mr. Turberville had an information, that my lord would come by the way of Calais? And one thing more Mort says, That Turberville told him, if he would make haste to Calais, he might go over with my lord. And here I would observe, how should Mr. Turberville come to know that my lord went that way? And how should he tell Mort that he might go over with my lord from Calais, unless he had received some such information? Therefore, my lords, taking into consideration what is confirmed by Mort, and taking into consideration the whole scope of the affidavit, I cannot see that there can be any material objection against Mr. Turberville for saying, that my lord came by Calais in the company of count Gramont.

My Lords, I have done now with the witnesses, and I told you, as I went along, (because I would not trouble you with a double repetition) what evidence we have given in contradiction to those witnesses which my lord hath brought in order to defame our witnesses.

But, my lords, I am to acquaint you, That besides these particular answers, your lordships have had men of very great credit brought to testify the reputation of Mr. Dugdale and Mr. Turberville. As to Mr. Dugdale, we have brought men that have known him a great while; one hath sworn what opinion even my lord Aston himself had of him: For it seems he, lived with so much credit there, that he would not believe any ill of him. You have heard from other witnesses how he did behave himself. It was objected sometimes, tradesmen were not paid; but what then? can a man pay without money? I believe there are some lords here, whose stewards are very honest men, and yet the tradesmen such lords deal with are not always readily paid.

He was, as you observe, believed to be in the plot, and my lord's servants say he seemed much troubled about it; he went away upon that account, and was so much concerned, that he burnt his papers, which I make use of for two purposes. The one to shew that he did apprehend he was in great danger; the other to shew what was the reason why the letters and papers he speaks of are not now produced; because he looked upon himself, and them who were then his friends, to be in such danger by them, that he burnt them.

My lords, I know your lordships will take notice, that there hath been a very good account given you, how it was that Dugdale came to be prevailed upon to make a discovery of the plot; it was with great difficulty; there were indeed persuasions used by some of his friends to bring him to it. The justices, as they themselves have sworn, endeavoured the same thing, but all without success. Then the coroner, Mr. Southall, (who though he was no great, yet seems to be a very understanding man) takes him in hand, and he had the good fortune to succeed. I call it good, not only for Mr. Dugdale, but for the nation. I shall not trouble your lordships with the particulars of the arguments Mr. Southall used to him, but it is plain (if you believe Mr. Southall, whose credit is now supported by an honourable lord, and by a member of the House of Commons) that Dugdale did at the first time that he did make a discovery, depose as much in substance against this lord, as now he does. And from thence I desire to make one observation, and that is this:

It was impossible it could be a contrivance among the witnesses themselves to depose the same crimes against this lord; for Dr. Oates never knew Mr. Dugdale, till Dugdale was brought up, which was long after Dr. Oates's accusation of this lord; nor could Dugdale know what evidence Oates had given here, for Dugdale was a close prisoner in Stafford gaol before Oates accused this lord, and long after. And yet the first evidence Dugdale gives against this lord, doth in substance concur with that given by Dr. Oates. So that since there could be no intercourse nor conference between them, but as much distance as from the prison doors in Stafford to London, there could be no contrivance between them, for both of them to accuse this lord of the same matters. And this I desire may be looked upon by your lordships as a matter of great weight to support the credit of the whole evidence. And Dugdale does seem to be a person of an unquestionable credit, and every one that hears him must observe, he does give his evidence with great modesty; and all probability of truth.

There is another thing, my lords, that I would pray your lordships to observe, These witnesses, Mr. Dugdale and Dr. Oates, do give such an evidence as is impossible to be given, unless it were true; for other witnesses when they are put out of the road, and asked questions they did not expect, are commonly to seek, and most pump for an answer, and then answer with great difficulty and wariness. But these two witnesses do not only answer with readiness when you ask them any questions, but what is contained in every new answer doth add a further probability and confirmation to what they said before. And I must needs say of them, I think it were impossible for any men in the world to contrive a story of so many particulars, and so consistent in every part of it, and yet the same should be false; and which is more, after so many trials, not one material circumstance of what they say contradicted by any solid proof.

My lords, There may be other particulars which I may have forgotten; I know not whether I observed that my lord objected that we do not prove him a papist: I hinted something before about his coming to mass to my lord Aston's at Tixall, which is one sort of proof of his being of the Romish religion. Besides his perpetual conversation with that party, and his endeavours to promote their religion and designs, all which have been fully proved: I think also my lord deserted the House of Peers, for that he would not take the test appointed by the late act; your lordships best know whether he did so or no. But, my lords, let him, if he will, be a Protestant for this time; let that be supposed: If he were a Protestant, and should be guilty of the offences proved upon him, he would not deserve more favour from your lordships.

My lord hath been likewise pleased in further proof of his innocency to alledge, that after the Plot was discovered, he had seven posts time to have escaped, and yet never fled. My lords, It is true he might have fled, so might Coleman too; that Coleman that left so fatal an evidence against himself and all his party under his own hand, and for that had reason to believe himself very guilty: And so might the Jesuits have escaped too, but that they had hopes the oath of secrecy, and the means they had used to conceal their damnable designs, would have been a sufficient security against revealing it. They had that opinion of their priests, and of the fidelity and constancy of those that had been seduced by them, and recommended by them, that they apprehended nothing less than a discovery. And these other persons that were executed, did all stay about the town after the Plot was discovered, as well as this lord staid in the country.

My lord did very much complain, that our witnesses were not positive in point of time: I think Dugdale was positive enough as to the time of the offer of 500*l.* but for other matters, he would not confine himself to a month: He talked of the latter end of one month, and the beginning of another, I think he is the more to be believed; for I conceive, unless a witness hath some notorious circumstance in his memory to satisfy him about the certainty of the time (such as was that of the foot-race, as to the time of the offer of 500*l.*) it is rather a mark of presumption than of sincerity for a witness to be too positive as to the time. And is there so great a distance between the latter end of one month, and the beginning of another, that a witness need be positive as to the very day? But, says my lord, You talk of the beginning; it was the 12th of September ere I came thither. Does not every man count, that till the middle of a month it is the beginning of a month? Sure in common speech it is so. Therefore I look upon that as a matter scarce worth the mentioning; I am sure, not worth the serious answering.

But, my lords, I must observe thus much, That what my lord complains of as a fault in our witnesses, his own witnesses are guilty of. For I appeal to your lordships, when they came to speak of times, whether they did not talk at a distance of a month or months, and sometimes of years, and were less certain in point of time than ours.

But, says my lord (for I am still answering his objections, and you must take them as I find them), here is mention made by Dr. Oates of letters, of many letters; shew me some of those letters: Shew me the letter you carried to the post-house. My lords, were those letters written to Dr. Oates? Did they belong to him? Or is it possible that my lord's letter delivered by the Doctor to the Post-house, should now be shewn by the Doctor, or that the letters writ to the Superior of the Society of the Jesuits, should be produced by one that was a novice of that society? Does Dr. Oates talk of one letter written to himself? You will then, I suppose, see no reason to expect those letters should be produced by him that were not written to him, and the custody whereof belonged to others.

My lords, I must observe to you, that there have been great endeavours used to invalidate our testimony; we have had witnesses called against witnesses, and my lord hath had that advantage to do it, which perhaps was never given in any case before, and which I hope will never be again. The evidence hath been printed and published to the world, before it hath been given. I say not that it was not necessary in this case, which was a national cause, and the cause of our religion; but I do say, it would not be fit to be done in other cases; for the notifying of the evidence is the way to have it falsified and corrupted.

But notwithstanding all these advantages, my lords, I appeal to your lordships memories, what considerable contradiction hath been given. It is true, some witnesses to that end have been brought before your lordships, but those witnesses have been rendered incredible by more credible persons; and I would desire your lordships to observe, that though my lord hath failed of proving any subornation in our witnesses, yet we have proved much subornation endeavoured by his agents.

Your lordships have the record against Reading before you; and what reference that hath to the lords in the Tower, every one does remember, and my lord is mentioned in that record. And I might likewise mention the bustness of Collier, and what therein related to the lords in the Tower. And I will name but two witnesses more, that have been attempted upon in this nature: There was Wright the barber; all the applications were made to him that could be; money given, letters writ, insinuations that he was not to swear, he was but to write, and that was easily done; or if he would be so kind to swear it, he should never come into open court, only go before a justice of peace; so that your lordships will observe by what steps and degrees men were endeavoured to be suborned. And then Launder tells you what was offered to him to perjure himself, how he was brought to Tixall, and what endeavours were used to make him swear against our witnesses.

These things are plain, both by records and particular proofs upon oath. But, my lords, lest we should want proof of all, this very lord (I pity him for it) hath been so unfortunate as to bring that paper out of his pocket, which Wright says he had money to frame, and was to swear to. It seems my lord had the command of it, it seems to have been prepared for such a good time as this, and the producing of this paper is as full a confirmation of this point, as can in reason be expected.

My lords, I have been, I fear, too long already; and yet, I fear, I have omitted as many particulars as I have mentioned.

My lords, the evidence is so strong, that I think it admits of no doubt; and the offences proved against my lord and the rest of his party are so foul, that they need no aggravation. The offences are against the king, against his sacred life, against the Protestant religion, nay, against all Protestants; for it was for the extirpation of all Protestants out of these three nations. I mean not of every one that is now so, but of every one that would have continued so, every one amongst us (if these designs had been accomplished) must either have turned his religion, or turned out of his country, or have been burned in it.

It is a design that appears with so dreadful a countenance to your lordships, to this great assembly, and to the whole nation, that it needs not any words I can use to make you apprehend it. If the matter be fully proved (as I see no reason to doubt but that it is), I am sure your lordships will do that justice to your king and country, as to give judgment against these offenders, which will not only be a security to us against them, but a terror to all others against committing the like offences.

L. Stafford. I beg your lordships to know, whether you will give me leave to speak a word? And, my lords, I shall not speak any thing but as to a mistake sir William Jones hath made in two or three things. Pray, my lords, may I put you in mind of them?

Sir W. Jones. If there be any mistake, pray tell us what it is.

L. Staff. First, my lords, he did omit telling you that Mr. Turberville's brother did say he came in 1671 to my lord Powis's. Secondly, he says, I have proved myself a Papist, because I have not taken the test: My lords, the test was since I was in the Tower, and whether I will take it or not, I do not yet know, till it be offered me. The third is this, that this letter was in my pocket, which I produced to you: My lords, I knew nothing what was in it, it was given into my hand as I stood here at the bar. Fourthly, he said, Hobson did go out of England with the almshouse; he did not so. Another thing he says, that I said Oates was an infamous person, because he went to a church that I said was idolatrous; I only said, it was so adjudged by act of parliament. I find, my lords, these things he is mistaken in; and that, my lords, made me very willing to put you in mind of them.

L. H. S. Gentlemen, I would ask you, whether you take any notice of the points in law?

Sir Fr. Winnington. After the fact is stated, my lords, we shall.

[Then Mr. Powle, also one of the Committee appointed to manage the Evidence, proceeded further in summing up the same:]

Mr. Powle. My lords, the learned person that spake last, hath left very little for me to say in the summing up of this evidence: But because this noble lord hath been pleased to alledge several reasons, from whence he would infer at least a great improbability, that he should be guilty of the treasons whereof he stands accused, I shall crave your lordships patience, that I may give three or four words in answer to those particulars.

My lords, in the first place, this noble lord was pleased to begin, and afterwards to continue his defence, with making protestations of his own innocency: We very well know your lordships sit now in the seat of justice, and whatsoever credit or regard your lordships please to give to the protestations of a peer in another case, your lordships will proceed here only according to your proofs and your evidence (secundum allegata et probata), and therefore all we shall say to this, is, that we hope our proofs are so clear and evident, as will leave no room to your lordships to believe this noble lord's protestations.—In the next place, my lord is pleased to alledge, and withal to lay some weight upon it, the voluntary surrendering of himself to justice; and he laid it down as a rule, that as flight is an argument of guilt, so the surrendering of a man's self to the trial of the law, is an argument of innocency.

My lords, we admit the rule generally to be true, but in some particular cases it may be otherwise; for a man that is not very confident of his own innocency, may yet be very confident of the strength of his party; and whether the consideration of the circumstances of affairs, as they then stood, and the power and prevalency of the Popish party at that time, might not reasonably create such a confidence in this noble lord, we must leave to your lordships judgment.

My lords, we do conceive, that those persons who contrived sir Edmundbury Godfrey's murder, had so great confidence in the favour and protection of some of their party, that they thought themselves able to outface justice. And we verily believe they intended it as an example, to deter all men from meddling so much as with the taking an examination concerning this horrid Plot.

My lords, I desire to be understood aright in this: I lay nothing of the death of sir Edmundbury Godfrey to the charge of this noble lord; I only use it as an argument of the presumption of the Popish party at that time.

My lords, in the next place, my lord Stafford did observe from my lord Coke, that in the trials of treasons we ought very much to guide our judgments by the nature and circumstances of the fact (the concomitants and subsequents, as he termed them) with reference to the person accused, whether they were likely to induce or deter him from such an attempt; and here he was pleased to raise some arguments from the whole course of his life, and did desire your lordships to consider those circumstances therein, that might make it improbable or impossible that he should commit a treason of this nature.

He desired also your lordships to remember, that he was descended from an honourable family, and that his ancestors were very worthy and very deserving persons, and such as had often ventured their lives in defence of their country: and here he did likewise mention his own services to the last king, and our present sovereign in the late wars.

It is not my part, nor will I derogate any thing from the merits of this noble lord, much less from the honour of his family: But in answer to this, we shall desire your lordships to consider, that this noble lord (however he is pleased to disown it at present) is notoriously known to be a Roman Catholic (as they call themselves), and such we conceive we have sufficiently proved him to be, in the course of our evidence: And so there is nothing in the world so much as a misguided conscience, that can engage the best of men into the worst of actions; so we think the principles of that religion are such, as are more likely to pervert men from their duty and allegiances, than any other religion or persuasion whatsoever.

And if the zeal of this noble lord did engage him to endeavour the establishment of that religion in this kingdom, we may easily believe that his reason did suggest to him the means by which it must be effected, which could be no other but blood and confusion.

My lords, the last thing I shall take notice of, is, what my lord Stafford was pleased to say in general, as to the doctrine of killing and deposing princes, which his lordship was pleased to call a private opinion, and not the doctrine of the Church of Rome.

But by the way, my lords, give me leave to observe, that this noble lord did upon this occasion fully own (and I much commend his ingenuity in it) the reality of the Gunpowder-Treason, since we know how much that party have endeavoured to render it incredible: and as length of time hath so fully manifested the particulars of that execrable design, that it hath brought such as are of that persuasion to confess the truth of it; so we hope this day's trial will convince both the age we live in, and all posterity, of the truth and reality of this present conspiracy. But to go on with that point from which I did digress: I am not, I confess, much versed in the canons and councils of the Church of Rome; but, my lords, this I know, the most famous and celebrated writers of that Church, especially of the Society of the Jesuits, have publicly avowed and maintained this doctrine. And we know in all times, when there hath been occasion to put it in practice, it hath never failed to have been attempted; and we likewise know, that the Church of Rome and the Pope have always avowed the acts when they have been done. From all which we may very reasonably conclude, that it is the doctrine of that Church so to do.

But my lord is pleased to say, and I admit it for truth, That a great many private writers do hold to the contrary; I believe it to be so, but I do also believe, that it is the policy and artifice of the church of Rome, to leave this point of doctrine in some measure undetermined, that so they may make use of it as the occasion serves; for if it succeeds, then it is owned and justified; if it miscarry, then the doctrine is but a private opinion, and the plot but the practice of particular persons that are either desperate or discontented. And I am fully of opinion, that this horrid conspiracy which is brought this day to judgment before your lordships, wants nothing but success to canonize it. My lords, as to what concerns the evidence, it hath been so fully stated to you, and the objections that were raised to invalidate it, so well answered, that I will not trouble your lordships with any repetition of what has been said already: All we have further to desire, is, That your lordships will please to take our evidence into your consideration, and to do thereupon what shall be agreeable to justice.

Serjeant Maynard. My lords, as to the matter of fact I shall say nothing but only this, (and I wish it may be spoken with gratitude to Almighty God) that the discovery of this plot is rather the work of God than man. It was first his act, in prevailing upon Oates to make the discovery; and when he stood single almost, what came to support his credit but the letters of Coleman? which were like a tally to what Oates had said, for what Oates informs is in a great part made good by his letters. Then when Godfrey was murdered, how came that discovery out, but by the voluntary confession of one engaged in the whole plot; I mean Bedloe? So that though these men had engaged themselves by wicked oaths, yet their own consciences witnessing against them in themselves, they could not forbear coming in to testify against themselves. I shall say no more, than that we ought to acknowledge the hand of God in the discovery with great thankfulness; for it is he, and he alone, that out of his own grace and goodness hath done it, and thereby preserved the life of our prince to us, and in him us too.

But as to the matter in law: My lord has been pleased to mention first this, That there is no overt-act. I wonder that my lord should be so much mistaken. When it is charged in the articles, and proved to his face he received a commission, is not that an overt-act? He is charged in the Articles of Impeachment with contriving the death of the king, and being at several meetings and consults about the king's death, and hiring persons to kill the king; and are these no overt-acts? Therefore, as to that, my lord is mistaken.

My lords, another exception that is taken, is, That there is no indictment. I conceive that an impeachment of the House of Commons is more than an indictment. And there cannot be any doubt of that, the impeachments of the House of Commons having always been received and proceeded on by your lordships.

But that which is most insisted upon, is, That this charge that is made against this lord, was presented in another parliament. It is true, but under favour, what is once upon record in parliament, may at any time afterwards be proceeded upon.* It is a sudden objection, but I conceive it hath been done: However, in a case of this nature, when the life of the king, when our own lives, and our nation, and our religion lies at stake, if there were not a precedent, I hope you would make a precedent. But under favour, reason is for it, the charge is before you, the proof is made, and we pray you will judge according as the evidence hath been.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, as to these matters of law, I think they are of so little difficulty, that my lord will not desire to have counsel assigned him; I am sure his counsel will not desire to speak to them.—For this last matter which Mr. Serjeant spoke of, and which was first named by the prisoner, I desire your lordships to consider what it is. Says my lord the prisoner, there was an impeachment begun in the Long Parliament, and this is now the third parliament in which I am brought to my trial. It is very true, there was a general impeachment in the Long Parliament, the particular one was in the last, and this lord was pleased to plead in the last. It may be he was not so well advised then as he is now.—But, my lords, how can this be a doubt, when your lordship have received, and have sent it down to the Commons, and it is there entered in their book, as the law and constitution of parliament, that not only impeachments, but all judicial proceedings continue from parliament to parliament, in the same state that they were in at the rising of the last parliament.—This is now become the law of the House, and it is under favour, being so, the law of the kingdom; and you having thus declared it, and sent it to the Commons, I hope the Commons had very good reason to proceed upon this impeachment at this time.—The next matter is concerning the overt-acts; I think there are sufficient overt-acts in proof, and sufficient in the impeachment. Will any man deny that the receiving a commission to be paymaster of an army is an overt-act? Will any deny, that the sending for the witness, and offering him money in order to hire him to kill the king, is an overt-act? And (which answers to all) will any man deny that the meeting and consulting of several men together, about killing the king, and changing the government, is an overt-act?—My lords, these are all overt-acts; and I cannot but think it was without advice of my lord's counsel that he made these objections: for indeed these several overt-acts are laid in the impeachment as fully as they are made out in proof.—My lords, There is another objection that my lord is pleased to make, and that is, that there is but one witness to a particular fact.

L. H. S. Ay, what say you to that?

Sir W. Jones. That, my lords, is of little weight, with submission; for our impeachments, and our proofs run to this, that my lord had a design and intention to destroy the king: This was to be done by force, and this was to be done by secret assassination. Now if several witnesses come and prove each a distinct act, under this head of killing the king, it is so many proofs or witnesses to the treason.—For, my lords, if a man shall intend to kill the king, and shall buy a knife in one county at one time, and send for a man out of another county at another time, whom he shall hire to kill the king, and these distinct acts proved by several witnesses; if they concur to the same general treason, they are all but parts of that, and so are so many witnesses to the whole. And so I am sure it was resolved in the case of others of the conspirators in the Old-Bailey, and before that in the case of sir Henry Vane.* But, my lords, in this case here is first a proof that he accepted a commission, which I do not use as an act for the levying of war only, but as a design to change the government, and destroy the king. Here is meeting and consulting how to do this wicked work, I mean to kill the king; that is another overt-act. Here is offering money to one of the witnesses for that end; that is a third overt-act. And there is attempting another of them, though not with money, yet with promises of reward in general: that is another overt-act: All which are to this end, the killing of the king. And I am sure of it, your lordships cannot but receive satisfaction from my lords the judges, that it hath always been so held, that though there need two witnesses to prove treason, yet there needs no more than one to one act, and another to another, if the several acts fall under the same head of treason.

Sir F. Winnington. My lords, I crave your patience but for a word or two, and this noble lord will have little reason to say his objections in point of law are of any weight. I confess he had said a great thing, if it were true, that the articles of impeachment did not alledge an overt-act; for then indeed they had been apparently defective: But, under his pardon, that is not a point of law, but a point of fact. Let us therefore resort to the articles themselves: In the second article it is alledged, that he, with the rest, did most wickedly and traitorously agree, conspire and resolve to imprison, depose and murder his sacred majesty, and to deprive him of his regal state and government. And then the same article alledges farther, that they did contrive and consult to effect the murder of the king, by shooting, by poisoning, and by stabbing. All these particulars are expressed: so that when my lord said the articles were therein defective, all we can say, is, that he was misinformed.

My lords, there was another exception taken, That this is the impeachment of another parliament. I must not now repeat how this point was agreed by both Houses at a conference; but it was then declared, upon search of precedents in all ages, That it was the law of parliaments, which is the law of the land, that if once an impeachment by the House of Commons were lodged in the House of Lords, though that parliament were dissolved, the impeachment remained in the same state. It was the cause of the Commons of England, who only change their representatives in a new parliament.

It has been also objected, that this prosecution ought to have been upon an Indictment: As if an accusation of the House of Commons, who are the grand inquest of the nation, were not as effectual to bring offenders to justice, as the finding of a particular jury.

My lords, I should wonder to hear this objection made, were not my lord to be easily excused for his knowing the law no better. None who know any thing in the law, would have urged such a thing; his counsel, I dare say, did not suggest this matter to him.

It is true, my lords, when a peer comes to be tried by way of commission, or in parliament when it is not at the prosecution of the Commons, there an indictment is first found in the proper county, and brought up before the peers by Certiorari, and upon that they proceed; but whether the party be a peer or commoner, if he be impeached for many crimes, surely no one can deny, but that by the constant usage of parliaments the Lords have proceeded to trial, and have given judgment thereupon without an indictment found: So that this exception will be of no force at all.

As for the remaining objection, That there are not two witnesses to prove any one overt-act, the king's person would be in no manner of safety, if that doctrine should be once allowed. Conspiring to kill the king is the treason laid in the impeachment, and the several overt-acts are so many several evidences of that treason. Words themselves, if they signify an intention to do an act, and express something to be done in futuro, are a sufficient overt-act, and a legal evidence of treason, then we prove by another witness, not words of encouragement only, but offers of money, and they are both to the same kind of treason, though not to the same act, and at the same time. And if there must be two witnesses to every single act, the king of England is not only in a far worse condition than any other prince, but than any one of his own subjects. Treasons may be committed every day with impunity, and unless the traitors be as great fools as villains, he shall never be safe from them, nor capable of punishing them.

I must say it, and I say it with commiseration to the condition of this noble lord, that his exceptions in law are as weak as the answers he has given to our evidence. We hope no doubt in law remains with you, and that we have given your lordships full satisfaction of the reality of the plot, and a convincing evidence of the great share which my lord Stafford had in it; and we humbly pray your lordships justice.

L. H. S. You do not take notice of one thing that my lord Stafford said this morning; that is, That the witnesses are not competent witnesses, because they swore for money, and that is fit to be spoken unto; not for the weight of the objection, so much as for the satisfaction of the auditory.

Sir F. Winnington. My lords, I had taken a note of that, but forgot to mention it. If my lord at the bar will say they have taken money to swear, that is purely a matter of fact which he ought to prove; and that which is said and not proved, ought to go for nothing: Let him prove his case to be so, and then we will give him an answer.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, If your lordship can prove that they have had money to swear, your lordship argues that which will be material; but if it were only money to maintain them, that sure will amount to no objection.

L. Staff. My lords, I submit it to your lordships, whether Dr. Oates and the rest have not had great sums of money, besides their charges 10*l.* per week a-piece. But I desire your lordships to consider, and I appeal to many of your lordships, whether it has not been said that there was a defect in Coleman's and Langhorn's Trials, that they did not plead that; and if they had pleaded it, they must have been acquitted: I will name nobody, but I appeal to your lordships, whether some of you have not said so. But I desire your lordships to admit me to plead by my counsel; if not, I submit it to you. I confess here is a piece of law that I never heard of before, that the House of Commons, and your lordships at a conference, have adjudged it to be the law of parliaments, That impeachments shall continue from parliament to parliament. If you will please to hear my counsel for me, so; if not, I submit.

L. H. S. What would you, or can you prove?

L. Staff. My lords, those things that I have given in to your lordships, I desire my counsel may be heard to.

L. H. S. Gentlemen, What can you object why he should not have counsel to argue his objections in law?

Sir W. Jones. My lords, I do think under favour, if a prisoner in a capital cause do desire counsel, he must not only alledge matter of law to introduce that desire; but that which he doth alledge must be also a matter of some doubt to the court: For if he do alledge matter which in itself is not disputable, he shall have no counsel allowed him. If your lordships are not satisfied that it is the law of your House, that proceedings upon impeachments do continue from parliament to parliament, we cannot answer that, it lies in your lordships breasts; it is not what we are to argue, because it is a matter that concerns the law and rules of parliaments. Is there, my lords, any doubt of any other point that is urged? Is there any doubt of this thing, whether if one witness speak to one point of fact, and another to another, upon the same sort of treason, but that these be two such witnesses as the law requires? I pray then, my lords, consider the consequence of that doubt: A man shall talk with twenty persons about a design to kill the king, in one and the same room, one after another, by taking them into a corner singly; and if ten, or all twenty come to prove it, here is but one witness to each discourse. This would be a matter of dangerous consequence, but I hope will remain no manner of doubt with you, nor is it fit to be argued.

As to the hiring of witnesses to swear, I think that can be no point of law till it be so proved in fact. Doth his lordship think, that when his majesty, out of his grace and bounty, allows a maintenance to his witnesses, that this is an objection to their testimony? Doth not every man allow his witnesses a maintenance, and yet it never was thought a thing to take away their evidence? It may be every one doth not give so large an allowance as the king, because his dignity is not so great. But can it be an objection to the House of Commons? Have we that are the prosecutors maintained them? If his majesty has been bountiful to his witnesses, what is that to this cause of the Commons? If my lord can prove any thing of bribery in us, as he has proved for us against himself, it may be an objection. But till that fact be proved, I hope there is no ground for a question in law; and if there be no doubt in law, I hope there will be no need of counsel.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, What are the points you would have counsel to?

L. Staff. To all of them, my lords.

L. H. S. Would you have counsel to the first point, to argue what the law of parliaments is concerning the continuance of impeachments from parliament to parliament?

L. Staff. My lords, if you will declare the law to be as these gentlemen say, I must acquiesce.

L. H. S. Pardon me, my lord, I do not declare the law, but ask you whether you would have counsel to argue that point?

L. Staff. My lords, I do say there is no example of it: I know there have been impeachments, but no examples of impeachments continued from parliament to parliament.

L. H. S. Then in the next place, for I shall propose your objections to their lordships by-and-by, and desire their judgment in them, do you desire to argue by your counsel, that every overt-act ought to be proved by two witnesses?

L. Staff. I do, my lords; I desire my counsel may be heard to all the points I mentioned to your lordships.

L. H. S. Have you counsel ready to speak to these points now?

L. Staff. Yes, my lords.

L. H. S. Are they prepared to speak to them now?

L. Staff. They are, my lords.

L. H. S. If they be so, what hurt will there be in hearing of them?

Sir W. Jones. My lords, Whether you will hear an argument from counsel about the Law of Parliaments, I hope you will please well to consider.

Sir F. Win. My lords, We in the House of Commons do never suffer any counsel to tell us what is the course of our house, and the Law of Parliaments: † If your lordship think fit to allow it, it is in your own power; but we who are entrusted with the management of this cause by the House of Commons, have no direction to consent to such a thing.

* In a Treatise "On the King's Power of granting Pardons in cases of Impeachment," written by lord Finch (the Lord High Steward for this Trial of lord Stafford) afterwards earl of Nottingham, which treatise was published in 1791, with evidence of its authenticity, is the following passage: "It is a mistake to say that impeachments depend from parliament to parliament."—In the Advertisement prefixed to the treatise so published in the year 1791, expressions are used which appear to intimate that in this Trial of lord Stafford, the Lord High Steward had delivered an opinion that Impeachments were not abated by dissolution of parliament. I do not perceive in this report of the trial any declaration of such opinion. It rather appears that previously to the Protestation of the Managers against "An Argument from counsel about the Law of Parliaments," the Lord High Steward was inclined to permit lord Stafford's counsel to argue the point.

† See the Case of Shirley and Fagg, ante, vol. 6, p. 1121.

L. H. S. We will hear counsel, to save time upon that point, whether in proof of a Treason for killing the king, every overt-act ought to be proved by two witnesses.

Sir W. Jones. If your lordships make a doubt of it.

Sir F. Win. And if the prisoner desire it.

Serj. Maynard. My lords, we shall not oppose it; but I shall wonder if any counsel do maintain it.

L. H. S. Are your counsel ready to speak to that point?

L. Staff. Here they are, my lords.

[Mr. Wallop of the Middle-Temple, Mr. Saunders of the same society, and Mr. Hunt of Gray's-Inn appeared by the prisoner at the bar as his counsel.]

Mr. Wallop. May it please your lordships, we are here commanded by your lordships to attend, that if any matter of law do arise upon a case proved, agreed, and judged by your lordships debatable, then in due time we are to conform ourselves to your lordships command, and argue those points for my lord the prisoner at the bar. But if your lordships do think that the points urged by my lord are not debatable in law, I have so high an opinion of your lordships judgment, and such a mean opinion of my own talent, that I shall not undertake to argue extempore in this great assembly, in a cause of so high a nature.

L. H. S. Look you, sir, you are of my lord's counsel.

Mr. Wallop. I am, my lords; and by the order of your lordships do attend here.

L. H. S. If you think it is an arguable point, you will have the judgment of my lords afterwards. Will you argue it now?

Mr. Wallop. My lords, I always thought, if a point be stirred in any court, and thought disputable, it should be stated and agreed before it be argued.

L. H. S. You are to argue for my lord, and to know the judgment of the court afterwards: Would you know our opinions before-hand?

Mr. Wallop. We would know what it is we are to argue, if your lordships please.

L. H. S. Why, if you are provided for it, you are to maintain, that by law every overt-act ought to be proved by two witnesses; if you are prepared, speak to it, and my Lords will hear you.

Mr. Wallop. It is true, my lords, there have been some public resolutions concerning that point, therefore I shall be the wariest what I say, in that: but, my lords, it is a matter that has been thought of great import one way or other; but I do profess at this time I am not able to undertake a solemn argument upon that point.

L. Staff. My lords, I am so far from delaying this cause, that I desire it may be argued now,

L. H. S. Then you are not ready to speak to it?

Mr. Wallop. No, my lords, I am not for my own part at present; for it is impossible we should foresee what would be the point: and to apply myself to study an unforeseen case before it be agreed, stated, and judged worthy of argument, cannot be expected from us. I have always observed it in the King's-Bench, if the prisoner urge any thing, and the court think it debatable, they first agree and state the case, then assign counsel, whom they do not urge to deliver an opinion presently, but give them time to prepare for it.

L. H. S. Mr. Wallop, it is not believed that this point is moved, but by your advice that are of my lord's counsel, and you should be ready to maintain the advice you give; therefore, if you are so, speak. You have the protection of the court for the counsel you give in matter of law, and whatever advice you give, you should maintain by the law.

Mr. Wallop. Truly, my lords, it is a point that has, as I said before, received some settlement; but whether ever in this court, or no, I cannot tell. Therefore I did discharge my thoughts of providing any argument, till your lordships should have determined whether you will take the point upon the resolution in the courts below to be finally settled and determined.

Sir W. Jones. So then it is agreed to be settled in the ordinary courts.

L. Staff. I desire also it may be argued, whether words are an overt-act?

Sir F. Win. It seems the law is with us in case of a commoner; but whether it be so for a lord, is the question.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, how comes it to pass that your lordship came prepared with objections, but not with counsel ready to argue them?

L. Staff. Mr. Wallop has given you an answer, I must stand by that.

L. H. S. Is it your lordships pleasure that we adjourn?

Lords. Ay, Ay.

L. H. S. This House is adjourned into the Parliament Chamber.

Then the Lords returned to their House in their order, and the committee of Commons staid in their places to attend their resolutions.

In an hour's time, the Lords returned, and my Lord High Steward being seated upon the Wool-pack, silence was proclaimed.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, my lords, since they have been withdrawn, have considered of one point, of that point, chiefly which your lordship did move, touching the necessity of two witnesses to every overt-act as evidence of High-Treason, that is the point you have desired counsel to speak to, and that is the point your counsel desired to know whether it was a doubtful or debatable point before they would argue it; and hereupon my lords did withdraw to consider it. And my lords have directed, That all the judges that assist them, and are here in your lordship's presence and hearing,* should deliver their Opinions, whether it be doubtful and disputable or no.

[Then all the Judges consulted privately together, and afterwards gave in their Opinions seriatim, beginning with the Lord Chief-Justice North, the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs being absent.]

L. C. J. North. My lords, I do here deliver my opinion, and am clear in it, That if there be several overt-acts or facts which are evidences of the same treason, if there be one witness to prove one such overt-act at one time, and another witness to prove another overt-act at another time, both the acts being evidences of the same treason, these are two sufficient witnesses of that treason, and will maintain an indictment or an impeachment of treason. I never knew any doubt made of it in any inferior court of justice, and I have known it often resolved. †

L. C. B. Montague. My lords, where over treason is to be proved, to every overt-act, two witnesses, as I conceive, are not required. If so be, there are two witnesses to several overt-acts, conducing to a proof of the same treason, I think they are witnesses in the judgment of the law, such as the statute requires.

Mr. Justice Windham. I am of the same opinion with my lord chief justice North, and my lord chief-baron, That if there be several overt-acts, done at several times, tending to the same treason, these several acts, being severally proved by several credible witnesses, though but by one witness at each time to each act, the said several acts, being evidences of the same treason, these are sufficient witnesses of that treason so proved, and will maintain an indictment, or, as I conceive, an impeachment.

Mr. Just. Jones. My lords, if several witnesses speak to the same kind of treason, although they speak to several overt-acts, and give evidence of several times, the one of them speaking to one time, and the other to another time, yet keeping still to the same kind of treason, they are such two witnesses as are required by the statute of Edward III. and this I take to be the constant opinion of the courts below.

Just. Dalben. My lords, I am of the same opinion, and I know it hath been many times so resolved: I have been present when Sentence hath passed upon persons by whom the same case hath been urged, and it hath been so resolved. And it hath been moved in Westminster-hall, and that was the constant opinion of the judges there; particularly in the case of sir Henry Vane.* It was upon solemn debates resolved, and divers times it hath been held, That the same treason may be proved by two witnesses to several overt-acts, though one speak of words or actions that were spoken or done at one time and in one place, and another speak of words or actions at another time and in another place; these are two good witnesses in treason within the intent of the law; and if the law were otherwise, it were scarce possible to convict any man of treason, and therefore I take it to be very clear.

* See the Speech of the same Lord Steward in answer to a question propounded to him by lord Danby in the case of lord Cornwallis, and the Note to that speech; ante, vol. 6.

† See Love's Case, a. n. 1651, ante, vol. 5, p. 45. The sixth point resolved preparatorily to the Trials of the Regicides, a. d. 1660, ante, vol. 5, p. 917. East's Pleas of the Crown, ch. 2. a. 63, 64, 66, and the cases there cited.

Just. Raymond. I am of the same opinion, That where several circumstances are brought to prove the same treason, one witness to each of the several circumstances is sufficient; and this, I conceive, hath been always the opinion of the judges.

Baron Atkins. My lords, I am of the same opinion. That there must be two witnesses in the case of treason, is a matter without question; but there are several overt-acts that may contribute to the effecting of that treason. If a man designs to kill the king, and buys powder at one place at one time, and a pistol at another place at another time, and promises a reward to one to assist him to do the thing at a third place and a third time; these are several overt-acts: But if the law requires that each be proved by two witnesses, I do not well see how any man can be convicted of treason. In the case of sir Henry Vane, and others, this very question was started, but was not thought worthy of debate: If it should be otherwise, it would touch the judgments which have been given upon this kind of proof; and what would the consequence of that be, but that those persons who were executed upon those judgments have suffered illegally? and therefore I am of opinion, that it is not requisite there should be two witnesses to every overt-act.

Baron Gregory. My lords, I am of the same opinion; it is treason to conspire the death of the king: Now each of the witnesses is a witness to prove that treason; the one says, he offered him such a reward, in such a place; that is one witness to prove that he conspired the death of the king; and another says, that he offered him such a reward in another place; that is another witness that he conspired the death of the king. For the party is not indicted upon one particular overt-act, but he is indicted for treason, in conspiring the death of the king; and each of the witnesses being to prove that, though they speak to several acts, they are good witnesses according to the law.

Baron Weston. My lords, I am of the same opinion with my learned brethren who have spoke before him.

Just. Charles. My lords, I am of the same opinion; and I think truly it would be the easiest matter for a man to commit treason, and escape without questioning, if it should be otherwise. But this is the first time that I have heard it hath been made a question, that to the same treason there must be two witnesses to every overt-act. It hath been adjudged always according to the law, that to prove treason there must be two witnesses, but to an overt-act there needs but one.

* See vol. 6, p. 119.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, by the uniform opinion of all my lords the judges, there is no colour to doubt the law in that point which you desire to argue; so that as to that point you must rest satisfied, you are not to have counsel to speak to it: for the rest, I have no commission yet from my lords to say any thing.

L. Staff. Will your lordship give me leave to say one thing to what I have heard? I would answer, if I might, only to one Judge; I think they call him judge Atkins.

L. H. S. Your lordship may say what you please.

L. Staff. My lords, I hear a strange position, I never heard the like before in my life; and it is what he said: if I am in the wrong, I beg your lordships pardon, and his too. He told your lordships the reason why the law should be so, was because else a great many of those persons that have already been executed, must have been acknowledged unjustly cut off and put to death; that is an argument I hope will not weigh with your lordships or any body; for it is better that a thousand persons that are guilty should escape than that one innocent person should die*; much more then, that it should not

* "All presumptive evidence of felony" says Blackstone, (Comm. Book 4. chap. 27. vol. 4. p. 358) "should be admitted cautiously; for the law holds, that it is better that ten guilty persons escape, than that one innocent suffer." This maxim is contested in the "Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy" of the late archdeacon Paley (see vol. 2. p. 310, of that work) but it has just now (June A. D. 1810) been vindicated by sir Samuel Romilly with admirable clearness and strength of argument and with equal power of eloquence. The objections of Paley are fairly and fully stated, and answered, as follows:

"The maxim that it is 'better for ten guilty persons to escape than for one innocent man to suffer,' is mentioned with approbation by Mr. Justice Blackstone, but is contested by Dr. Paley. 'If by better,' he says, 'be meant that it is more for the public advantage, the proposition I think cannot be maintained. The security of civil life, which is essential to the value and enjoyment of every blessing it contains, and the interruption of which is followed by universal misery and confusion, is protected chiefly by the dread of punishment.' By the dread of punishment, it is true, but of punishment as a consequence of guilt, not of punishment falling indiscriminately on those who have not, and on those who have, provoked it by their crimes. The security of civil life is undoubtedly the first object of all penal laws; but by nothing can that security be more grievously interrupted than by the innocent suffering for the crimes of the guilty. It should seem from the animadversions of Dr. Paley, that he imagined that those who have adopted this maxim, treat the escape of ten guilty persons as a trivial ill, whereas, they deem it an evil of very great magnitude, but yet one less destructive of the security and happiness of the community, than that one innocent man should be put to death with the forms and solemnities of justice.

L. H. S. Look you, my lord, where many reasons are given, it is easy to make a reply to be declared, that such a judgment was not well given.

"The misfortune," continues Dr. Paley, 'of an individual, for such may the sufferings, or even the death of an innocent person be called, when they are occasioned by an evil intention, cannot be placed in competition with this object.' He here speaks of the sufferings and privations endured by the victim, as if they were the only evils resulting from the punishment of the innocent. He overlooks entirely the mischiefs which arise from the consideration that the most perfect innocence, and the most implicit submission to the laws cannot afford security to those who possess the one, and practise the other: He leaves altogether out of his consideration that disrespect for the tribunals which is the necessary consequence of so terrible a failure in the administration of justice: He does not reflect how much the effect of example must be weakened by men being taught from what they have themselves witnessed, that the wretch, whom they see consigned to punishment, may be in the highest degree unfortunate, and in no degree guilty. He does not take into his account the hopes which the punishment of an innocent man ever affords to the guilty, by placing in so striking a point of view, the fallibility of our tribunals; and by shewing how uncertain it is that punishment will be the consequence of guilt. Could the escape of ten of the most desperate criminals have ever produced as much mischief to society, as did the public execution of Calas, of D'Anglade, or of Lebrun? The state of insecurity in which men were placed by some of these fatal errors in the administration of justice in France, is strongly exemplified by the saying of a man of considerable eminence in that country, who declared, that if he were accused of stealing the towers of Notre Dame, he would consult his safety by flight rather than risque the event of a trial, though the crime imputed to him was manifestly impossible.

"Dr. Paley goes on to observe, 'That courts of justice should not be deterred from the application of their own rules of adjudication, by every suspicion of danger, or by the mere possibility of confounding the innocent with the guilty.' And in this observation every body must agree with him. If courts of justice were never to inflict punishment where there was a possibility of the accused being innocent, no punishment would in any case be inflicted, one of the least among many; that was one reason given, but the true reason is this: If the law were otherwise, there would be great safety in conspiring the death of the king.

In those instances in which the proof of guilt seems to be most complete, the utmost that can be truly affirmed of it is, that it amounts to a very high probability: no truth, that depends upon human testimony, can ever be properly said to be demonstrated. Human witnesses may utter a falsehood, or may be deceived. Even where there have been a number of concurrent and unconnected circumstances, which have appeared inexplicable upon any hypothesis but that of the accused being guilty, it has yet sometimes been made evident that he was innocent. Nay, in some instances where men have borne evidence against themselves, and have made a spontaneous confession of the crimes imputed to them, not only they were not, but they could not be guilty, the crimes confessed being impossible. With the wisest laws, and the most perfect administration of them, the innocent may sometimes be doomed to suffer the fate of the guilty, for it were vain to hope, that from any human institution, all error can be excluded. Yet these are considerations which are calculated very strongly to impress upon courts of justice, not indeed that they should be deterred from the application of their own rules of adjudication, but that they should use the utmost care and circumspection in the application of those rules; that in a state of things where they are so liable to error, they cannot be too anxious to guard against it, and that if it be a great public evil, as it undoubtedly is, that the guilty should escape, it is a public evil of much greater magnitude, that the innocent should suffer. It should be recollected too, that the object of penal laws, is the protection and security of the innocent; that the punishment of the guilty is resorted to only as the means of attaining that object. When, therefore, the guilty escape, the law has merely failed of its intended effect; it has done no good, indeed, but it has done no harm. But when the innocent become the victims of the law, the law is not merely inefficient, it does not merely fail of accomplishing its intended object, it injures the persons it was meant to protect, it creates the very evil it was to cure, and destroys the security it was made to preserve.

“They ought rather,” continues Paley, “to reflect, that he who falls by a mistaken sentence, may be considered as falling for his country, whilst he suffers under the operation of those rules, by the general effect and tendency of which the welfare of the community is maintained and upheld.” Nothing is more easy than thus to philosophize and act the patriot for others, and to arm ourselves with topics of consolation, and reasons for enduring with fortitude the evils to which, not ourselves, but others are exposed. I doubt, however, very much, whether this is attended with any salu-

L. Staff. My lords, I say nothing further as to the rest, but this stuck with me. I am sorry to hear a Judge should say any such thing; and though I am in such a weak and disturbed con-

tary effects. Instead of endeavouring thus to extenuate and to reconcile to the minds of those who sit in judgment upon their fellow-creatures so terrible a calamity as a mistake in judicature to the injury of the innocent, it would surely be a wiser part to set before their eyes all the consequences of so fatal an error in their strong but real colours. To represent to them, that of all the evils which can befall a virtuous man, the very greatest is to be condemned and to suffer a public punishment as if he were guilty. To see all his hopes and expectations frustrated; all the prospects in which he is indulging, and the pursuits which he is following, for the benefit, perhaps, of those who are dearer to him than himself, brought to a sudden close; to be torn from the midst of his family; to witness the affliction they suffer; and to anticipate the still deeper affliction that awaits them: not to have even the sad consolation of being pitied; to see himself branded with public ignominy; to leave a name which will excite only horror or disgust; to think that the children he leaves behind him, must, when they recal their father's memory, hang down their heads with shame; to know that even if at some distant time it should chance that the truth should be made evident, and that justice should be done to his name, still that his blood will have been shed uselessly for mankind, that his melancholy story will serve wherever it is told, only to excite alarm in the bosoms of the best members of society, and to encourage the speculations for evading the law, in which wicked men may indulge.

“Let us represent to ourselves the judges who condemned Calas to die, apologizing for their conduct with the reasoning of Paley. Admitting that it was a great misfortune to the individual, but insisting that it was none to the public, and that even to the individual the misfortune was greatly alleviated by the reflection, that his example would tend to deter parents in future from embroiling their hands in the blood of their children, and that in his instance the sufferings of the innocent would prevent the crimes of those who had a propensity to guilt. With what horror and disgust would not every well formed mind shrink from such a defence!”

“When we are weighing the evil of the punishment of one innocent man against that of the impunity of ten who are guilty, we ought to reflect, that the suffering of the innocent is generally attended in the particular instance with the escape of the guilty. Instances have, indeed, occurred like that which I have already mentioned of Calas, where a man has been offered up as a sacrifice to the laws, though the laws had never been violated: where the tribunals have committed the double mistake of supposing a crime where none had been committed, and of finding a criminal where none

L. H. S. Is it your lordships pleasure that we should adjourn?

Lords. Ay, ay.

could exist. These, however, are very gross, and therefore very rare examples of judicial error. In most cases the crime is ascertained, and to discover the author of it is all that remains for investigation; and in every such case, if there follow an erroneous conviction, a twofold evil must be incurred, the escape of the guilty, as well as the suffering of the innocent. Perhaps amidst the crowd of those who are gazing upon the supposed criminal, when he is led out to execution, may be lurking the real murderer, who, while he contemplates the fate of the wretch before him, reflects with scorn upon the imbecility of the law, and becomes more hardened, and derives more confidence in the dangerous career upon which he has entered." Observations on the Criminal Law of England, &c. by sir Samuel Romilly, Note D.

* I will insert the following passage from Mrs. Macaulay respecting this trial, because it furnishes a lively specimen of the flippancy and other qualities which characterise her work, and because it is in some respects superior to the matter which ordinarily flows from her pen.

"Humanity was again disgraced by the clamours and outrage of the people during the trial of this unfortunate nobleman: he was more than once thrown into confusion on the occasion; yet, on the fifth day, notwithstanding the fatigues and mortifications he had undergone, he so far recovered himself as to sum up the whole case, as to fact and argument, in a manner calculated even to soften the obdurate temper of party, and to bring conviction to every mind not strongly tinctured with prejudice. After pleading his age, his want of endowments, his exhausted spirits and strength in his long trial, in consideration of which he hoped their lordships, who were both his judges and counsel, would pardon the many defects which he must needs commit; he recapitulated the whole evidence, as well, he said, as his weak memory and discomposed condition would permit; he reminded the lords of the several instances wherein he had proved the witnesses forsworn; he recounted the various contradictions; he made observations on the moral impossibilities, and absurdities, as to divers parts of their evidence; and inferred from thence, that those who will forswear themselves in one thing, are not to be credited in any. He insisted on the infamy of the witnesses, and the wickedness of their lives; he inculcated their former beggary, compared to the encou-

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair.

A Message was sent from the Lords by sir Timothy Baldwin and sir Samuel Clarke.

Mr. Speaker. The Lords have sent us to acquaint this House, that they have ordered William viscount Stafford to be brought again to the bar in Westminster-hall, on Monday-morning next at ten of the clock.

After which, the House of Commons adjourned to eight of the clock on Monday morning.

agement, carresses, applause, and allurements of gain, which they had found in their new employment: he alleged their subornation to make good their forgeries, and their bare oaths, without any corroborating circumstance, but what depended on the same oaths: he represented, that during a course of forty years he had, through many difficulties and losses, still maintained his loyalty; and was it credible that now, in his old age, easy in his circumstances, but dispirited by infirmities, he should belie the past tenor of his life, and engage in hazardous undertakings against his royal master, from whom he had never received other than kind treatment. Having thus summed up his defence, the prisoner proceeded to propose certain points, or doubts, in law, which occurred in his case, concerning the manner of the impeachment, and the continuance of it from parliament to parliament. Whether the indictment contained an overt-act necessary to a conviction of treason? Whether men, who swear for money ought to be credited or admitted as witnesses? Whether the Plot was as yet legally proved? And whether, there being but one particular witness to any one particular point, such an evidence be sufficient in law?

"The unequal contest in which the prisoner was engaged, the unexpected manner in which he had acquitted himself, his great age, his long confinement, and the present harrassed state of his mind, were circumstances of commiseration which held in suspense the resentments of party, the incentives of policy, and the zeal of bigotry, and for a while softened the whole assembly into a generous sympathy, when sir William Jones resumed the evidence against the prisoner with such force, art, and address, that all the baneful passions were again inflamed, and a violent indignation succeeded the momentary tenderness. It is an avowed truth, that the consciences of lawyers are governed by rules peculiar to themselves, and entirely opposite to the ideas which prevail with honest men of other professions; a circumstance which, though of a very important nature, has little weight with courts of judicature; every judgment is directed by the bench or the bar, and the triumph gained by sir William Jones is a striking instance amongst a variety of others, which disgrace our annals, that trials at law are often mere mockery of justice; and that the depriving an individual, pleading for his life, of the advantage of having the last word with the court, is in reality, the depriving

THE SIXTH DAY.

Monday, December 6th, 1680.

About the hour of eleven in the morning, the Lords being adjourned into Westminster-hall, going thither in their former order into the court there erected; and Mr. Speaker having left the chair, the committee of Commons were seated as before.

The court being sat, proclamation for silence was made, and the lieutenant commanded to bring his prisoner to the bar; which being done, the Lord High-Steward began.

him of every advantage naturally attendant on that much boasted part of the English constitution, the trial by juries and peers.

“On the following point of law, whether two witnesses were required to every overt act, the Lords called upon the Judges for their opinion, and the whole Bench, led by the Lord Chief Justice North, gave it against the prisoner; and declared, that if there be several overt-acts, which are evidences of the same treason, though proved by different witnesses, it is sufficient to maintain an indictment or impeachment. Whether the judges, in giving this opinion, were actuated by motives very imprudently acknowledged by baron Atkins, in the course of the trial, viz. that the evidence of one witness to one overt-act, ought to be deemed sufficient in the prisoner's case, because if it was not, it would prove that those persons who had already suffered, had suffered illegally; or whether, with greater probability, they were desirous of making the crown more formidable, by adding to the great advantages which it already had in trials of treason, certain it is, that the Lords, in giving way to this decision, destroyed all the useful and benign purposes of the act of the 25th of Edward 3d, and subjected the life and property of every imprudent man to the vengeance of the court. All the other objections were over-ruled by the Lords, and on the seventh day from the commencement of the trial, the Commons attended in their places, the court, by a majority of twenty-four voices, gave sentence against the prisoner, who received the fatal verdict with becoming resignation—“God's holy name be praised!” was the only exclamation he uttered; but when he was told by the High Steward, that the peers would intercede with the king for remitting the more cruel, and what is termed the most ignominious parts of his sentence, hanging and quartering, nature for one moment prevailed, and a burst of tears shewed the lively sense he had of the injustice of the sentence: however, he excused the weakness, by politely saying, that he was moved by their lordships goodness, not by any terror of that fate which he was to suffer.

“Undoubtedly, more from a jealousy of the exertion of the prerogative, than from any personal rancour, the sheriffs Bethel and Cornish, who were suspected of entertaining Republican principles, started a doubt of the king's power

L. H. S. Read my lord Stafford's Petition.

To the Right Hon. the Lords in Parliament assembled, the humble Petition of William viscount Stafford.

“Humbly shewing unto your lordships; That he hath some things to offer unto your lordships in order to clear himself, which he hopeth to do. Your petitioner doth therefore, with all humility, most humbly beseech your lordships to give him leave to offer some things unto your lordships consideration, And your petitioner shall ever pray, &c. “STAFFORD.”

of exercising this small act of lenity; and lord Russell, a man eminent for his virtue and humanity, actuated by the same zeal for preserving popular privileges, seconded, in the lower House, the scruple of the sheriffs: however, as the peers had pronounced it superfluous, the Commons acquiesced and returned an answer, That they were content that the sheriffs should execute William late viscount Stafford, by severing his head from his body.

“As Stafford had been treated with great neglect by the Court, had often been in opposition, and was formerly connected with lord Shaftesbury in schemes for the dissolution of the first parliament, it might be supposed that on these reasons he would have found more favour with the Commons than any [other] of the Five Lords who had been accused of the conspiracy, and that he would have been at least the last victim; but the party, confiding in that pusillanimity which commonly attends old age and mean parts, expected that the hopes of a pardon would produce some discoveries which would ascertain, beyond a doubt, the reality of the Plot, and more particularly affect the duke of York. And Stafford, having let fall, that he had somewhat to communicate which might support the Exclusion Bill, provided it would be the means of saving his life, he was called before the House of Peers, where he discovered many schemes which had been laid by himself and others, for procuring a toleration to the Papists; but on his naming the earl of Shaftesbury among those who were concerned in these schemes, he was in a great hurry ordered to withdraw; a period was put to the examination, and Stafford now prepared himself for death with an intrepidity which even innocence and integrity, unassisted by a natural firmness of mind, or an especial support from divine mercy, cannot always command. When going to execution, he called for a cloak to defend him from the rigour of the season, and said, “Perhaps I may shake with cold, but I trust in God, not with fear.” Of all those thousands of people which a savage curiosity had brought together on this awful occasion, not a face appeared more serene or cheerful than was the countenance of the prisoner; who, when mounted on the scaffold, continued with reiterated asseverations to make protestations of his innocence: he solemnly disavowed all those immoral prin-

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, my lords have been willing, upon your petition, to come and hear what that is that your lordship hath to offer: And they would know whether it be a matter of fact, or matter of law. For your lordships must know, that as to witnesses the process is closed.

L. Staff. I do not pretend any more witnessses, my lords.

L. H. S. Then, my lord, what is it that you would say?

L. Staff. My lords I did yesterday receive an order from your lordships; and upon that and some other things that I have to trouble ciples which, on the authority of the practice of the Church of Rome, at different times have, without distinction, been ascribed to the whole body of the Papists; he mentioned the witnessses with a becoming charity: "And he hoped," he said, "that the time was now approaching, that truth would be brought to light; and that the world would be acquainted with his innocence, and what injury he had sustained." That fury and rage of the populace which had appeared at Stafford's trial and condemnation, was now melted into tenderness and fruitless tears: they assented to these protestations, which he frequently repeated, of his innocence, by respectful bows and expressions which manifested their belief and their compassion: "We believe you, my lord; God bless you, my lord." The Executioner also, affected with the general sympathy, three times lifted up the axe before he could execute the fatal office; and a deep sigh accompanied the stroke which put a final end to the cares and the sufferings of the prisoner. The multitude, struck with pity and remorse, beheld, in mournful silence, the bleeding head exposed at the four corners of the scaffold, with the usual warning cry of, "This is the head of a traitor." And thus by a sudden revolution in the minds of the populace; the fate of this once hated popish conspirator, was more solemnly lamented than that of any one of the Protestant or Patriot martyrs, who had suffered from the first period of the monarchy to the present times.

"It is worthy observation, that in the division of the peers, four of lord Stafford's own family, viz. the earls of Carlisle, Berkshire, and Suffolk, and the lord Howard of Escrick, condemned him, whilst he was absolved by the lords Lucas and Holles, who were eminent for their zeal against popery; that the ministry were equally divided on this point, as on the Bill of Exclusion; that the king's great favorite and confident, the duke of Lauderdale, was on the rigorous side of the question; with the Lord Privy-Seal, Anglesea; the Lord President, Radnor; and the Lord High Steward, Nottingham; who, moreover, declared his faith in the Plot in the strongest terms; that the duchess of Portsmouth, in the rage of her disappointment, on the ill success of the Exclusion Bill, attended the trial, dealing sweet-meats and smiles among his prosecutors; and that the king, who had refused to withdraw his countenance from that odious minister, Lauderdale, on the repeated instances of his Scotch subjects, and the repeated addresses of the English parliament, should, without a struggle, or any seeming reluctance, deliver up a faithful subject to the mistaken prejudices of a party, at the same time that he declared to his intimates, that he did not believe one word of the Plot, or that any conspiracy of any kind had been formed against him.

"If the execution of Stafford gratified the resentment of the exclusionists, it tended very much to weaken their authority with the people: as there is nothing more variable than the sentiments of the multitude, so there are no extremes so opposite that they will not, in their turns, embrace. Their natural passions, untamed by cultivation, are easily roused to the highest point of frenzy; and the transition from the extreme of hatred to the extreme of sympathy, is often as sudden as the effects are violent. The leaders of the popular party, not aware of this circumstance, had surfeited, by their too frequent executions, the eager appetite of the people, whose belief is always more founded on humour than rational conviction. After the first execution, every blood-letting, according to Burnet, lowered the heat of the nation into a mortal coldness; and the affecting scene of Stafford's sufferings, by exciting a general commiseration, turned so strongly the tide of prejudice, that the prelatical party, who now made no scruple to avow, that they thought the church was in less danger from the Papists than from the Presbyterians, on account of the greater popularity of the latter, were successful in the circulating the opinion, that there never had been any plot or conspiracy among the Papists; that the whole was the forgery of the Presbyterians; and that it was done with the design of ruining the church and monarchy. The venal pen of sir Roger l'Estrange was employed to prove that moral impossibility of sir Edmundbury Godfrey's having been his own murderer, and some of the most virulent of the party made no scruple to lay it to the charge of those who were the warmest prosecutors of the Plot, which, it must be acknowledged, was carried on by such violent and unjust proceedings, as can admit of no excuse or palliation, and which served as examples to take away as many innocent lives, among the Protestants, as had suffered among the Papists."

Something like the speech of lord Stafford, about his shaking, is reported to have occurred at the execution of M. Bailly, at Paris. "Tu as peur Bailly," said a by-stander, who observed him to shiver, "Non," replied the prisoner, "mais j'ai froid."

The reason assigned for the opinion in favour of the sufficiency of one witness to one overt-act, and another to another overt-act of the same species of treason, viz. "otherwise your lordships with, I did petition for this favour which I humbly thank your lordships for granting. If I be impertinent, I shall beg your lordships pardon, and I hope you will be pleased to consider my weakness at all times, especially in this condition I am now in; but I hope by your lordships favour to be in a happier one quickly. For the matters of proof, I shall offer not a tittle; but, my lords, this Order which I received does say, That the Lords assembled in parliament have ordered, that my counsel shall not be heard touching the Continuance of Impeachments from Parliament to Parliament: But I hope, my lords, you will please, without offence, to let me offer to your lordships my own conceptions about it; which I shall do as briefly as I can.

My lords, I do not conceive by this Order, that your lordships say it does or does not continue; you have given no judgment, as I know of, in it; when you have, I shall acquiesce: But I hope your lordships will resolve that it does not. And, my lords, my reasons for it are two: The first is, because one of the managers for the House of Commons, as I take it, Sir W. Jones, said these words, and your lordships may remember them, 'That if there were no such precedent, your lordships would no government could be safe if traitors had but craft equal to their villainy," (see Fost. 237) does not seem to be satisfactory. Considerations of that kind are indeed intitled to very great influence in regulating the proceedings of legislators as to what laws should be enacted, but they are wholly impertinent to the construction of laws which have been already enacted. This construction of the stat. 1 E. 6. c. 12. and 5 and 6 Ed. 6. c. 11, appears not to have been established till this case of lord Stafford. (See Foster, 236, 237). Nevertheless, it seems to be the legitimate and fair construction of those statutes, and in no respect to impugn that most wholesome rule which is stated by lord Bacon. (Maxims, Regula 12). 'Penal Statutes shall not be construed by equity.'

As to the king's power of altering the execution of a sentence, lord Bacon says, "In treason it hath been an ancient use and favour from the kings of this realm to pardon the execution of hanging, drawing, and quartering, and to make warrant for their beheading." Preparation toward the Union of the Laws of England and Scotland, vol. 3, of his works, p. 498, 4to ed. of 1778.

"In felony, the corporal punishment is by hanging, and it is doubtful whether the king may turn it into beheading in the case of a peer or other person of dignity, because in treason the striking off the head is part of the judgment, and so the king pardoneth the rest; but in felony, it is no part of the judgment, and the king cannot alter the execution of law, yet precedents have been both ways." Preparation towards the Union of the Laws of England and Scotland, vol. 3, of his works, p. 501.

'make a precedent?' Whether you will or no, that I must submit to your lordships; but then there is none yet. The next thing is, my lords, this, Whether an Impeachment be to be prosecuted in parliament without an Indictment? This, my lords, I humbly hope your lordships are resolved it ought not. For I see not how truly, my lords, it can be; by the little reading which I have had in the law, I never found any man prosecuted in a legal way, but by an indictment. I may be mistaken, and I beg your lordships pardon for troubling you with my mistakes; but I never read of any that were prosecuted upon an Impeachment? so then, the legal usual word being Indictment, I hope your lordships will not alter the form; for I hope you will keep that great maxim of your noble ancestors, 'Nolumus Leges Angliæ mutare': And whether this be a change of the law or no, I submit it to your lordships.

A third thing is this; Your lordships do not think fit that my counsel shall plead to that point, Whether words do amount to an overt-act; for hearing my counsel to that likewise I do not pretend: But I hope your lordships will give me leave to say this, I never heard that words did amount to an overt-act: if your lordships judge otherwise, I submit; but till then, I hope it shall not conclude me.

There are some other points which I did offer to your lordships, and I humbly beseech you to know, whether my counsel shall be heard to them. It is true, one of them, which was, Whether two witnesses in several places did amount to a legal testimony or no, your lordships did not declare one way or another: If you say you acquiesce in the opinion of the judges, I must submit; but till judgment is given, I beseech your lordships to give me leave to tell you my weak thought about it. I did not hear what the Judges said all of them, but as I apprehend, they were all of one opinion; It is true, one of them that spoke last, I think it was judge Atkins, did say it did amount to a legal testimony because else those juries that have found some guilty upon the same short evidence should be perjured; but if this were not so, then upon the same grounds, under your lordships favour those juries that acquitted some upon such testimony were perjured: But I must believe it to be otherwise till your lordships have declared it as your opinion; for that reason will not hold; for the same reason will be for the perjuring the one, as for the perjuring the other. And the same juries, for the most part, tried those that were found guilty, and those that were acquitted.

L. H. S. Is this all your lordship will please to say?

L. Staff. No, my lords, if you would give me leave, I would trouble you a little farther; if it were an offence I would not say a word. My lords, I do conceive I am not concerned in the general Plot of the papists; for I am not proved to be so, and whatsoever I may be in myself, as I conceive, or whatsoever there is of hearsay, I hope your lordships will not go upon that, but upon what is proved 'secundum allegata et probata,' and that Common Fame will condemn no man; if it do, then no man is safe; but I must say, there is not one word of proof offered that I am a papist.

I hope, my lords, I have cleared myself to your lordships, and made my innocency appear, by making appear the perjury of the witnesses, and the falsehood of those things they said against me. Against Dugdale I have proved it by two of his own witnesses; the one was Eld, the woman that swore for him, That he took up a glass of cyder and wished that it might be his poison if he knew any thing of the Plot; the other was Whitby, who says, he had given my lord Aston's father warning long ago what a knave he was. So it is clear. For Dr. Oates I hope from his contradictions against himself as well as Dugdale, who does contradict himself, at one time August, at another time the latter end of August or the beginning of September: and I hope your lordships will give no credit to Oates's testimony; for he said before your lordships he had declared all he knew, (it is true, I was then accused, but not for having a commission, as he now swears) and afterwards he accused the queen; so here is Oates against Oates, and Dugdale against Dugdale: and for Turbervile, I have proved by his affidavit, first he swears one thing and then another; and the truth of it is, his brother proved him false in his last oath, that it was 1671, and not 1672.

My lords, It is not my part to make any question, nor do I, whether a Plot or no Plot; for I am not concerned in it: if what I shall say now be impertinent, I humbly beg your lordships pardon. My lords, I have been by the most of my friends, at least every one that came to me, particularly by my wife and daughter that is near me, persuaded to tell all that I knew, and I do here in the presence of God Almighty declare what I know to be true.

L. H. S. What says my lord? Speak out.

L. Staff. My lords, I do believe since the Reformation from the Church of Rome to (what it is now established) the Church of England, those of that religion have had several wicked and ill designs and Plots: I do believe they had a design in queen Elizabeth's time, Babington's Plot,* (that is a long time ago) how far it was to take away the queen's life I cannot tell, but a Plot it was; and I do believe there was another in her time, called earl of Westmoreland's Plot, wherein there was a rebellion in the North, for which some fled and some were executed, that was a very ill design: as for those poisonings of her saddle, and the like, I take them to be but stories.

In king James's time, in the first year of his reign, there was a wicked Plot composed by actors, some of one religion, some of another; there was my lord Grey, my lord Cobham, my lord Brooke, and other such, they were condemned all of them; some fled, as Markham and Bainham: those lords and sir Walter Raleigh were reprimed and kept long in the Tower. But sir Walter Raleigh was afterwards upon that same judgment beheaded, and the lords died in the Tower.

My lords, next to that was the execrable treason that I spoke of at first, the Gunpowder Treason:† And I protest before Almighty God, I did from my infancy detest and abhor those men, that were engaged in it; and I do think, and always did think the wit of man nor the devil's malice cannot invent an excuse for it. For the men concerned, they all acknowledged it, confessed it, and begged pardon of the king, and God, and all good men for it; that is all I shall say to that now.

My lords, since his majesty's happy restoration, I do conceive, and I think I may safely say it, (for you all know it) he was gracious and good to all Dissenters, particularly to them of the Romish Church; they had connivance and indulgence in their private houses; and I declare to your lordships, I did then say to some that were too open in their worship, that they did play foul in taking more liberty upon them than was fitting for them to do, and that brought the misfortune upon me which I will not name.

My lords, It was not long ago that your lordships at your own bar did allow all the Dissenters from the Church of England to give some reasons to your lordships why those laws that were against them should be repealed, as well Protestant Dissenters as those of the Church of Rome, and why they should have some kind of toleration; among whom you did permit those of the Romish religion to appear too, I forget their names. And I remember particularly one of the sorts of them, an Anabaptist I think, did urge for a reason, that which is a great truth, that they held rebellion to be the sin of witchcraft; I believe it is as bad as any sin can be.

My lords, that came to nothing at that time; but, my lords, I believe that after that, all of all religions had meetings among themselves to endeavour to get that toleration which they proposed humbly to your lordships; there I will never deny, my lords, that my opinion was, and is, that this kingdom can never be happy till an act of parliament pass to this effect; it was my opinion then, and I did endeavour it all I could, that the dissenting Protestants might have a comprehension, and the other a toleration: I acknowledge it to be my intention, and I think it was no ill one; for if that be a true copy of the Comuons votes which is in print, there is some such thing desiguing there as a comprehension; and I was of opinion, that it were sufficient that such as were of the Church of Rome might by act of parliament serve God in their own houses, and privately in their own way, not in public, and that for it they should pay something to the king out of their estates, but truly not much; command that justice should be delayed or denied, yet, however, the judges shall not obey it, but proceed. So I hope there is no pretence of delay on my part, and the benefit of that statute shall not be denied me. And that statute of the Great Charter, which cost so many of your ancestors their lives to maintain, I hope you will never go from. Now your lordships' noble ancestors, amongst other things, took great care that justice should be denied or delayed to none, and this I desire you to take into consideration.

I am in your lordships judgment either to be acquitted or condemned. I hope your lordships will, and I know you will, lay your hands upon your hearts, consult your consciences and your honours; and then you will do what is just and equitable, I doubt not.

My lords, Mr. Oates said I came by the name of Mr. Howard of Ethingham, but that I did in my letters sign 'Stafford;' surely, my lords, if I was ashamed to own my person, I should have been as much ashamed to have owned my name. He says, he saw me take a commission, and whether that be an overt-act, your lordships are to determine. Upon the whole matter, I conceive, there is nothing proved against me but words, nor pretended to, but only by Oates. And whether you will credit a man that so dissembles with God, as I have told you, I appeal to your lordships, and beg you to consider of it.

That these Witnesses have sworn for money, if you send to the Exchequer-Office, and see what money they have received, you will find by the great sums that it is so; and then I hope you will not allow them to be heard, nor credit any that swear for gain. I had a suit in Westminster-Hall, that had like to have gone expressly against me, only because one of my witnesses was to gain 8*l.* if the suit went for me. But pray consider how much these men have had. And for the point, that there are not two witnesses, I beseech your lordships give me leave to put you in mind, That not many years ago, you passed an Act against Frauds and Perjuries, wherein you were so careful to preserve men's estates, that you required three witnesses to prove a will of goods or lands above 100*l.* and will you allow but one witness to take away a man's life for words? Though your lordships will never commit treason, yet no man can preserve himself from the misfortune that happens to me, of being falsely accused.

It is true, my lords, the Managers have given an Answer to the business of the money, by saying, The king may give as liberally as he pleases; but to give so great sums, whereby men poor before, are now become rich, I think will be an objection against their credit.

My lords, I have said what I do think convenient, though I think much more might be said by an abler man to your lordships, for the clearing of himself. I hope I have done it, nay, I am confident I have; and this I have done for the memory of that great and blessed king, who first made me a peer, that it may not be said he did me the honour forty years ago to call me up to this dignity, and I should fly in the face of his son in so horrible a manner as these men would make me. I do owe it to the honour of my father and mother, who, I think I may safely say, were both honourable and worthy persons: My father was a learned man, and a wise man, as I may appeal to some of your lordships who knew him well; I say, I owe it to their memory, and to the honour of the family from whence I sprung, which all the world knows what it is. And I should be an infamous man to dishonour them so much, as to bear their name, and commit treason. My lords, I owe it to my wife, who hath been a very kind wife to me as ever man had: She is heiress at law to the great estate of that great and unfortunat man Stafford, duke of Buckingham, who was cut off in the reign of King Henry the 8th, and all his estate, if it were not for that Attainder, would have come to her.

I may be impertinent in telling your lordships what it was; but I do not over say it, when I reckon it would have been at this day 20,000*l.* a year, for it was 17,000*l.* a year in those days penny-rent, besides other emoluments. This is an extravagant thing to say, but it is true; something thereof does remain to her, which I now enjoy. I owe it to all my children, especially to my eldest son, who is a young man, and I may say, of far better parts and hopes than his father, and whom, I hope, will serve his country. I owe it to all my friends and relations, for I would not have it said after my death, my wife was the widow of a traitor. I owe it to all these, but above all, I owe it to God Almighty; that when I come to be judged by Him, I may give a good account of what he hath entrusted me with, that I may not appear as an infamous man who knows he hath a body, but not his own, and yet should throw it and his soul away together. And if I should have committed this execrable treason, I should have been guilty of my own murder: 1st, In the committing a crime worthy of death; and then in not confessing, to save my life. I hold murder an extraordinary crime, the worst next to treason: And I know, if I should not prevent my death by confessing all I knew, I should have been guilty of self-murder, the worst of murders. I know your lordships will lay to heart, what an execrable thing murder is, and the blood of innocents; and I hope there is none of the House of Commons, but after this evidence will clear me. I am sure none of them would have me punished for that I am not guilty of. I do not blame these gentlemen of the House of Commons for prosecuting, nor the first for impeaching; for they had without all doubt, reasons great enough for it upon what evidence they had before them, before they knew what the witnesses were. I know your lordships will not in the least point vary from justice, or the law of the land, and I desire you to lay the whole matter to your hearts; I have not the least suspicion of the partiality of any man in the house; nay, I profess, if I had an enemy, and he were not here, I would beg of you that he might come. I have cleared myself before your lordships, and I hope I shall not be run down by the wicked rabble; which, where it will end, God knows. It began in the late times against my lord of Strafford,* and so continued till it ended in that most execrable fact, one of them, that ever was done. A wicked beginning it was, and it had a wicked end. For since our Saviour's death and murder by the Jews, never was so execrable a murder in the world; and whoever had an hand in it, without an extraordinary repentance, can have no thoughts of salvation. I never could serve the king, it is true, but in my desires; and I never deserted him in thought, word, or deed, to my knowledge, in my life; much less did I ever contrive or consent to his death. I do in the presence of God, angels, your lordships, and all men, declare, I do know no more of the Plot, or any such thing, than any one here does. That those of the Romish religion had meetings, I believe, to obtain those ends that I spake of before: Coleman went too far; how far he was criminal in it, I cannot tell. Meetings, I say, there were, but I was never at one of them, nor do I know what was done there. I do leave it to your lordships to do justice, as I know you will, and with all submission I resign myself up to you.

L. H. S. Have you done, my lord?

L. Staff. If your lordships will not allow me counsel to argue those points, I have done.

L. H. S. What say you, gentlemen of the House of Commons?

Serjeant Maynard. My lords, something that my lord hath spoken hath been resolved against him, that is, about two witnesses to each overt-act; some things are not to be disputed about the law and course of parliaments; some things were not to be said now, because he had said them before. My lords, we had concluded our evidence, and he is pleased to take up the time with repeating what was said before.—For the other matters that my lord is pleased to discourse of, all he says is but his obligations, and how unreasonable it were for him to do it; the question is, Whether he hath done it or no? If he hath, his obligations are an aggravation of his crime, not an excuse. His relations, his family, and other things are nothing before your lordships now in point of judgment, nor is there any thing new said to-day, that was not said before.

Sir W. Jones. My lords, I should not add one word farther, were it not that this noble lord is pleased upon his memory, or rather without, to say something of me; and that was, That speaking of the continuance of proceedings, I should say, 'If your lordships had no precedent, I hope you would make one.' My lords, I do appeal to your lordships memory, whether I said any thing like it; I utterly deny it, nor was there any occasion for it. For there was no need of urging precedents, when your lordships, upon a conference with the Commons, did declare it to be the law of proceedings in parliaments, and did then fortify it with many arguments. I know, my lord's memory is not very good; I am sure in this he is very much mistaken.

My lord hath been pleased to complain he hath received much disturbance, and that the noise and shouts have been so great, that they have occasioned some distraction in him. My lords, I am sure his lordship cannot mean us; for I appeal to your lordships, and all that have heard this trial, whether he hath received the least disturbance or interruption from us, or whether we have not treated him with that respect that becomes his dignity, and the discretion that ought to be in the managers of the House of Commons. But I must needs say, that his lordship hath received distraction from those friends or counsel of his that put those many papers into his hand; for he hath read one after another that do contain the same matter over and over again. These, I confess, were sufficient to distract him, or any other that should make use of them. His lordship hath been pleased to go off from the matter of law, to the matter of fact; and backward and forward, so that it is impossible to follow him: And as to the matter of fact, we shall decline to follow him; for though we have not given his lordship any disturbance, yet we submit to your judgment, whether it be regular or according to the course of proceedings, when his lordship hath summed up his evidence, and we that are the prosecutors have concluded ours, he should begin that work again; which, if it should be admitted, we were to reply, and he might rejoin upon us, and so there would be no end of proceedings.—And, my lords, I hope, though this lord hath had the favour to do it, yet it shall not for the future be brought into example, for it will make trials endless.

My lords, for the matter of law, there is nothing that deserves an answer; for though the law does admit the prisoner counsel in matters of law, yet it must be in things doubtful; and if there be any thing of that in our case, I submit it to your lordships, I am sure, I have heard nothing new but what hath been overruled already, unless it be a matter of law which rises upon the matter of fact, and that not proved, to wit, the corruption of witnesses. The last day, all was said by his lordship he could say, and all said by us that we thought fit to say; and now to begin the same matter again, I think ought not to be admitted. We shall not follow his lordship in that way of proceedings, and hope it shall never fall into example.

Sir F. Winnington. My lords, I have only one word to say to your lordships, and that is in relation to the proceedings of the Commons in this cause; for if the cause had not been of an extraordinary nature, we should have stood upon it, that the prisoner ought not, after the prosecutors had concluded, to have taken a liberty of reading and repeating what he had said over and over again. We know, my lords, there are a sort of men in the world, who are willing to lay hold of any pretences to cavil at our proceedings; and therefore we have let my lord take all this liberty, that so his party might have no colour of complaint. His lordship was pleased to say the last day, that he had not a witness more to produce, nor a reason to give, as I understood him; and therefore he must own that we have been very tender to him in all our proceedings. One thing my lord insinuates to day, which I cannot forbear taking notice of as if we had delayed him: which is without cause; we had used all diligence in preparing ourselves, and were soon ready when the king was pleased to let the parliament sit, and therefore it can be no imputation on us; and truly, if my lord considers the weight of the evidence, I fear he will think his trial comes soon enough now.

* See vol. 3, p. 1382, of this Collection.

L. Staff. My lords, I desire to be rightly understood in one thing, and it is only this; I did not say the House of Commons shouted at me, but the rabble.

L. H. S. Is it your lordships pleasure to adjourn?

Lords. Ay, ay.

L. H. S. Then this House is adjourned to the Parliament Chamber.

[Then the Lords withdrew in their former order, and the Committee of Commons went back to their House.]

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and a message was sent from the Lords by sir Timothy Baldwin, and sir Samuel Clarke.

Mr. Speaker; The Lords have commanded us to acquaint this House, that they have appointed William viscount Stafford to be brought to the bar in Westminster-hall to-morrow morning at ten of the clock to receive judgment.

The Commons adjourned to eight of the clock the next morning.

THE SEVENTH DAY.

Tuesday, December the 7th, 1680.

About the hour of eleven, the Lords adjourned into Westminster-hall, going thither in their former order into the court there erected; and Mr. Speaker having left the chair, the Committee of Commons were seated as before.

The Lords being sat, proclamation was made for silence; and the Lord-High-Steward being seated on the woolpack, with Garter principal King of Arms, the Usher of the Black Rod, nine maces attending him, with all the rest of the solemnity, as was at first expressed, took the votes of the peers upon the evidence, beginning at the puisne baron, and so upwards, in this order; the lord Stafford being (as the law requires) absent.

L. H. S. My lords, I am an humble suitor to your lordships, That you will give me leave to collect your votes as I sit, for I am not able to stand. (Which being granted, the Lord-High-Steward proceeded.)

L. H. S. My lord Butler of Weston, Is William lord viscount Stafford Guilty of the Treason whereof he stands impeached, or Not Guilty?

L. H. S. My lords, upon telling your Votes I find there are 31 of my lords that think the prisoner Not Guilty, and 55 that have found him Guilty. Serjeant make proclamation for the lieutenant of the Tower to bring his prisoner to the bar. [Which was done, and his lordship came to the bar.]

* See what he said when called as a witness by Oates on his Trial for perjury, A. D. 1685, infra.

VOL. VII.

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, I have but heavy tidings for you; your lordship hath been impeached of High-Treason, you have pleaded Not Guilty; my lords have heard your defence, and have considered of the evidence, and their lordships do find you Guilty of the Treason whereof you are impeached.

L. Staff. God's holy name be praised, my lords, for it.

L. H. S. What can your lordship say for yourself, why judgment of death should not be given upon you according to the law?

L. Staff. My lords, I have but very little to say; I confess I am surprized at it, for I did not expect it; but God's will be done, and your lordships, I will not murmur at it: God forgive those that have sworn falsely against me. My lords, I conceive I have something to say for respite of judgment: I have been at many trials in my life, but I never saw any trial where the party tried did not hold up his hand, which I was never asked to do: I thought it had been a very material point in the law, that by the holding up of the hand he might be known to be the person. I have read lately, since I had the misfortune to be thus accused, sir Edward Coke upon the Pleas of the Crown; and he says, That misnomer, the not giving a man his right name, or addition, is likewise a just cause to arrest the judgment. There is likewise another question, how far it may be valued I know not; I submit it, as I do all, to your lordships. Though I am tried upon the act of the 25th of Edward 3. yet there is nothing more in that act, than what is included in the act of the 13th of this king; and I humbly conceive, my lords, by that act, and the last proviso in it, a peer that is accused and found guilty of the crimes therein mentioned, is to lose his seat in parliament; those are the words; and since it is so put down in the act, it is so to be understood, and that is all the punishment. And I humbly demand your lordships judgment upon these points, whether it be so or no?

L. H. S. Has your lordship any more to say?

L. Staff. No, my lords, I submit to your lordships, and desire your judgment in these points.

Then the Lords adjourned into the parliament-chamber, and the committee of the Commons returned to their own house; and their Speaker having resumed the chair, the whole body of the House went with their Speaker to the bar of the House of Lords, to demand Judgment of High-Treason against William viscount Stafford, upon the impeachment of the Commons of England, in parliament, in the name of the Commons in parliament, and of all the Commons of England.

The Commons, with their Speaker, went back to their House.

Then the Lords took into consideration what Judgment was to be given upon William viscount Stafford, and it was moved that he might be beheaded. After some debate, the Judges were asked, whether if any other judgment than the usual judgment for High-Treason were given upon him, it would attain his blood? The judges were of opinion, that the judgment for High-Treason appointed by law, is to be drawn, hanged, and quartered; and in the notice and proceedings below they can take no notice of any judgment for High-Treason but that.

Then sir Creswell Levinz, the king's Attorney General, desired to be heard on his majesty's behalf, which the House gave leave for him to be; who said, he knew no other judgment by law for High-Treason, but drawing, hanging and quartering; if any other judgment were given, it would be prejudicial to his majesty, and be a question in the inferior courts as to his attainer of High-Treason.

Whereupon their lordships ordered, That the Lord High Steward do pronounce the ordinary Judgment of death upon the lord viscount Stafford, as the law hath appointed in cases of High-Treason.

And a Message was sent to the House of Commons from their lordships, by sir Timothy Baldwin and sir Samuel Clark:

Mr. Speaker; We are commanded by the Lords, to acquaint this House, That their lordships are going presently into Westminster-Hall, to give judgment against William viscount Stafford. [Mr. Speaker left the chair]

The committee of Commons appointed for the management of the evidence against the prisoner, with the rest of the Commons, went into Westminster-Hall, to the court there erected; to be present when the Lords gave judgment of High-Treason against him upon the impeachment of the Commons of England. After a short time their lordships were adjourned into Westminster-Hall, coming in their former order into the court there erected; where being seated, and the Lord High Steward being on the wool sack, attended by Garter principal king of arms, the usher of the black rod, eight of the serjeants at arms kneeling with their maces, the ninth making proclamation for silence; which being done, the Lord High Steward gave Judgment upon the prisoner as followeth:*

Lord High Steward. "My lord Stafford; That which your lordship hath said in arrest of judgment hath been found by my lords, upon due consideration had of it, to be of no moment at all. It is no essential part of any trial, that the prisoner should hold up his hand at the bar; there is no Record ever made of it when it is done; the only use of it is to shew the Court who the prisoner is, and when that is apparent, the Court does often proceed against him, though he refuse to hold up his hand at the bar; therefore the omission of that ceremony, in this case, is no legal exception, as all the judges have declared.

* "December 7, 1680. Ordered by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the thanks of this House be given to the Lord High Steward, for his speech this day to the lord viscount of Stafford in Westminster Hall, at what time his lordship pronounced the judgment of this House against him. And his lordship is hereby desired to print and publish the same. Jo. Brown, Cleric Parliamentor."

"And as to the provisos in the statute of the 13th year of this king, their lordships do find that they are in no sort applicable to this case, forasmuch as the proceedings against your lordship are not grounded upon that statute, but upon the statute of 25 Edw. 3. And yet if the proceedings had been upon the latter statute, the provisos therein could have done your lordship no service at all.

"My part therefore which remains, is a very sad one: For I never yet gave sentence of death upon any man, and am extremely sorry that I must begin with your lordship.

"Who would have thought that a person of your quality, of so noble an extraction, of so considerable estate and fortune, so eminent a sufferer in the late ill times, so interested in the preservation of the government, so much obliged to the moderation of it, and so personally obliged to the king and his royal father for their particular favours to you, should ever have entered into so infernal a conspiracy as to contrive the murder of the king, the ruin of the state, the subversion of religion, and, as much as in you lay, the destruction of all the souls and bodies in three Christian nations?

"And yet the impeachment of the House of Commons amounts to no less a Charge, and of this Charge their Lordships have found you Guilty.

"That there hath been a general and desperate conspiracy of the Papists, and that the death of the king hath been all along one chief part of the conspirators' design, is now apparent beyond all possibility of doubting.

"What was the meaning of all those treatises which were published about two years since against the oath of allegiance, in a time when no man dreamt of such a controversy? What was the meaning of Father Conyers's sermon upon the same subject, but only because there was a demonstration of zeal, as they call it, intended against the person of the king? Which the scruples arising from that oath did somewhat hinder.

"To what purpose were all the correspondencies with foreign nations? The collections of money among the Fathers abroad and at home? What was the meaning of their governing themselves here by such advices as came frequently from Paris and St. Omers? And how shall we expound that letter which came from Ireland, to assure the Fathers here, that all things were in a readiness there too, as soon as the blow should be given?

"Does any man now begin to doubt how London came to be burnt? Or by what ways

* "Lord Nottingham, when he gave Judgment, delivered it with one of the best speeches and means poor Justice Godfrey fell? And is it not apparent by these instances, that such is the frantic zeal of some bigotted Papists, that they resolve, no means to advance the Catholic cause shall be left unattempted, though it be by fire and sword?

“My lord, as the Plot in general is most manifest, so your lordship’s part in it hath been too too plain. What you did at Paris, and continued to do at Tixall in Staffordshire, shews a settled purpose of mind against the king; and what you said at London touching honest Will, shews you were acquainted with that conspiracy against the king’s life which was carrying on here too: And in all this there was a great degree of malice; for your lordship at one time called the king heretic and traitor to God; and at another time you reviled him for misplacing his bounty, and rewarding none but traitors and rebels.

“And thus you see that which the wise man forewarned you of, is come upon you: ‘Curse not the king, no, not in thy heart: For the birds of the air shall reveal, and that which hath wings will declare the matter.’

“Three things I shall presume to recommend to your lordship’s consideration. In the first place, your lordship now sees how it hath pleased God to leave you so far to yourself, that you are fallen into the snare, and into the pit, into that very pit which you were digging for others. Consider therefore, that God Almighty never yet left any man, who did not first leave him.

“In the next place, think a little better of it than hitherto you have done, what kind of religion that is, in which the blind guides have been able to lead you into so much ruin and destruction as is now like to befall you.

“In the last place, I pray your lordship to consider, That true repentance is never too late. A devout penitential sorrow, joined with an humble and hearty confession, is of mighty power and efficacy both with God and man.

“There have been some of late who have refused to give God the glory of his justice by acknowledging the crimes for which they were condemned; nay, who have been taught to believe, that it is a mortal sin to confess that crime in public, for which they have been absolved in private, and so have not dared to give God that glory which otherwise they would have done.

“God forbid your lordship should rest upon forms; God forbid your lordship should be found among the number of those poor mistaken souls, whom the first thing that undeceives is death itself.

“Perhaps your lordship may not much esteem the prayers of those whom you have long been taught to miscall heretics; but whether he had ever made. But he committed one great indecency in it: for he said, Who can doubt any longer that London was burned by Papists, though there was not one word in the whole Trial relating to that matter.” Burnet.

you do or no, I am to assure your lordship, That all my Lords here, even they that have condemned you, will never cease to pray for you, that the end of your life may be Christian and pious, how tragical soever the means are that must bring you thither.

“And now, my lord, this is the last time that I can call you my lord; for the next words I am to speak will attain you. The Judgment of the Law is, and this Court doth award, That

“You go to the place from whence you came; from thence you must be drawn upon a hurdle to the place of execution: When you come there, you must be hanged up by the neck, but not till you are dead; for you must be cut down alive, your privy-members must be cut off, and your bowels ript up before your face, and thrown into the fire. Then your head must be severed from your body, and your body divided into four quarters; and these must be at the disposal of the king. And God Almighty be merciful to your soul.”

Prisoner. My lords, I humbly beseech you give me leave to speak a few words; I do give your lordships hearty thanks for all your favours to me. I do here, in the presence of God Almighty declare, I have no malice in my heart to them that have condemned me; I know not who they are, nor desire to know; I forgive them all, and beseech your lordships all to pray for me. My lords, I have one humble request to make to your lordships, and that is, my lords, That the little short time I have to live a prisoner, I may not be a close prisoner as I have been of late, but that Mr. Lieutenant may have an Order that my wife and children and friends may come at me. I do humbly beg this favour of your lordships, which I hope you will be pleased to give me.*

L. H. S. My lord Stafford, I believe I may, with my lords leave, tell you one thing further, That my lords, as they proceed with rigour of justice, so they proceed with all the mercy and compassion that may be; and therefore my lords will be humble suitors to the king, that he will remit all the punishment but the taking off your head.

Prisoner, (weeping). My lords, your justice does not make me cry, but your goodness.

* Macpherson, in what he calls (see the Introduction to lord Clarendon’s Case, vol. 6, p. 291, of this Work,) “The Life of James the Second, written by himself,” (p. 110.) says, “Carlisle and Escrio had voted Stafford their kinsman Guilty, yet moved to change his sentence to perpetual banishment. This being rejected they desired to see him under pretence of carrying the bishop of London and Dr. Burnet to him. They only wanted to get something out of him against the duke of York: but the Lords would not allow them to see him alone, without a Recorder present, so their project was disappointed.”

Then the Lord High Steward broke his staff, and the Lords adjourned into the Parliament Chamber, and the Commons returned to their House, and the prisoner with the axe borne before him with the edge towards him (it being carried contrarily during his trial) was sent back to the Tower.*

* Burnet tells us, that lord Stafford behaved himself during the whole time, and at the receiving his Sentence, with much more constancy than was expected from him. And he thus proceeds: "Within two days after he sent a message to the Lords, desiring that the bishop of London [Compton, one of the SEVEN; see their Case, A. D. 1688, infra.]" and I might be appointed to come to him. We waited on him. His design seemed to be only to possess us with an opinion of his innocence, of which he made very solemn protestations. He heard us speak of the points in difference between us and the Church of Rome with great temper and attention. At parting he desired me to come back to him next day; for he had a mind to be more particular with me. When I came to him, he repeated the protestations of his innocence; and said, he was confident the villainy of the witnesses would soon appear: he did not doubt I should see it in less than a year. I pressed him in several points of religion; and urged several things, which he said he had never heard before. He said, these things on another occasion would have made some impression upon him; but he had now little time, therefore he would lose none in controversy; so I let that discourse fall. I talked to him of those preparations for death in which all Christians agree: he entertained these very seriously. He had a mind to live, if it was possible: he said, he could discover nothing with relation to the king's life, protesting that there was not so much as an intimation about it that had ever past among them. But he added, that he could discover many other things, that were more material than any thing that was yet known, and for which the duke would never forgive him; and of these, if that might save his life, he would make a full discovery. I stopped him when he was going on to particulars; for I would not be a confident in any thing in which the public safety was concerned. He knew best the importance of those secrets; and so he could only judge, whether it would be of that value as to prevail with the two Houses to interpose with the king for his pardon. He seemed to think it would be of great use, chiefly to support what they were then driving on with relation to the duke. He desired me to speak to lord Essex, lord Russel, and sir William Jones. I brought him their answer the next day; which was, that if he did discover all he knew concerning the Papists' designs, and more particularly concerning the duke, they would endeavour that it should not be insisted on, that he must confess those particulars for which he was judged. He asked me, what if he should

His majesty afterward ordered the Lord High-Chancellor to issue out under the great seal of England the following writs for executing the said late viscount Stafford; the first being to the lieutenant of the Tower, to deliver him on the 29th of December 1680, between nine and eleven o'clock in the forenoon, same some who had now great credit, but had once engaged to serve their designs: I said, nothing could be more acceptable than the discovering such disguised Papists, or false Protestants: yet upon this I charged him solemnly not to think of redeeming his own life by accusing any other falsely, but to tell the truth, and all the truth, as far as the common safety was concerned in it. As we were discoursing of these matters, the earl of Carlisle came in. In his hearing, by lord Stafford's leave, I went over all that had passed between us, and did again solemnly adjure him to say nothing but the truth. Upon this he desired the earl of Carlisle to carry a message from him to the House of Lords, that whensoever they would send for him he would discover all that he knew: upon that he was immediately sent for. And he began with a long relation of their first consultations after the Restoration about the methods of bringing in their religion, which they all agreed could only be brought about by a toleration. He told them of the earl of Bristol's project; and went on to tell who had undertaken to procure the toleration for them: and then he named the earl of Shaftsbury. When he named him he was ordered to withdraw: and the Lords would hear no more from him. It was also given out, that in this I was a tool of lord Halifax's to bring him thither to blast lord Shaftsbury. He was sent back to the Tower: and then he composed himself in the best way he could to suffer, which he did with a constant and undisturbed mind: he supped and slept well the night before his execution, and died without any shew of fear or disorder. He denied all that the witnesses had sworn against him. And this was the end of the Plot. I was very unjustly censured on both hands. The earl of Shaftsbury railed so at me that I went no more near him. And the duke was made believe, that I had persuaded lord Stafford to charge him, and to discover all he knew against him: which was the beginning of the implacable hatred he showed on many occasions against me. Thus the innocentest and best meant parts of a man's life may be misunderstood, and highly censured."

It is certainly worthy of attention, that in the course of this effort to save his life, lord Stafford did not confess any of, according to Burnet's expression, "those particulars for which he was judged." If he had made such a confession, it might yet leave many minds unconvinced of his guilt. In bad times, it is not surprising confessions of uncommitted crimes should be made for the purpose of obtaining mitigation of punishment. there are anecdotes that the bribes were not received by him—but by his servants, and that he was either totally ignorant of them, or at worst so otherwise blameable than by not exerting himself to prevent the practice, and that his confession proceeded merely from an apprehension of exasperating government, and aggravating his own punishment by a denial. Pliny relates an anecdote of this sort: ‘ Conscensus est (sc. Licinianus) quidem incestum. Sed incertum utrum quis vereretur; an quia graviora metuebat, si negasset. There were two Writs to the Sheriffs, both alike verbatim, one delivered in London, the other in Middlesex.

Whereupon the Sheriffs doubting whether that was a sufficient authority for them to execute the prisoner by beheading only, the sentence of death being otherwise given, petitioned the Lords in parliament to take the premises into consideration, and to make such Order as should be agreeable to right and justice, as by the following Petition appears.

‘ To the Right Honourable the Lords Temporal in Parliament assembled; the humble Petition of Sliugsby Bethel, esq.; and Henry Cornish, esq.; sheriffs of London and Middlesex:

‘ Sheweth; That your petitioners have received a writ under the great seal of England, reciting, that judgment had been given by your lordships against William viscount Stafford, for High-Treason, and divers other crimes and offences, upon the Impeachment of the Commons in Parliament assembled, and commanding your Petitioners to cause the said viscount Stafford's head to be severed from his body upon the 29th day of this instant Dec., notwithstanding any judgment, law, ordinance, or command to the contrary :

'That your Petitioners have not as yet received any command from your lordships for executing the said judgment. May it therefore please your lordships to take the premises into consideration, and to make such order therein, as shall be agreeable to right and justice. And your Petitioners shall pray, &c.'

Upon which the Lords did declare as followeth :

December 21, 1680.

'Upon application from the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, making some scruples concerning the execution of the late lord viscount Stafford, which were found by this House to be unnecessary, this House do declare, That the king's writ ought to be obeyed.'

The said sheriffs likewise made application to the House of Commons upon the aforesaid matter, who made the following resolve :

December 23, 1680.

'Resolved, &c. That this House is content that the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex do execute William late viscount Stafford, by severing his head from his body only.'

Accordingly, on the Wednesday following, being the 29th of December, between nine and ten in the forenoon, the two sheriffs, with a considerable number of gentlemen on horseback, went to the Tower-gate, and there demanded William Howard, late viscount Stafford; when a gentleman belonging to the Lieutenant of the Tower, told the Sheriffs, That the Lieutenant would wait on them presently, and bring the prisoner to the bars: To which the sheriffs answered, That they must preserve the privileges and bounds of the city: An officer replied, 'Sir, We were ordered to draw up two companies from the gate to the bar, and there you are to receive the prisoners.'

Sheriffs. Gentlemen, we will preserve the liberties of the city: And we are come at the gate to demand the prisoner; whether the Lieutenant will deliver him or no, we demand

* For the debates in the House of Commons concerning the king's power to vary the execution, see 4 Cobbett's Parl. Hist. 1261. Mr. Fox speaking of the fatality as it were, with which in the transactions relative to the Popish Plot men's minds were divested of all their wonted sentiments of justice and humanity; observes, that "even after the condemnation of Stafford, lord Russel himself, whose character is wholly (this instance excepted) free from the stain of rancour or cruelty stickled for the severer mode of executing the sentence, in a manner which his fear of the king's establishing a precedent of pardoning in cases of impeachment, (for this no doubt was his motive) cannot satisfactorily excuse." him. And accordingly, he was delivered to the sheriffs between the gates and the bars.

Before the prisoner came, several people were upon the scaffold, among which were two appointed to write. The leadsmen came up with two blocks, one old, one new, in a bag; also the axe covered with a cloth. The new block being taken out, was covered over with black, and laid upon a piece of black bays, about two yards and a half long, upon which the prisoner was to stretch himself. Then the coffin was brought up, being coloured with two letters, W. S. 1680. Then the prisoner came upon the scaffold, and asked for the executioner; upon his appearing, he asked him, If he had received money for the cloaths? being answered, No, his man took out a purse of 5*l.*, which the headsmen objected against, and the prisoner gave him two guineas more. After a short pause, he stepped to one side of the scaffold, and taking a Paper out of his pocket, read it as his Speech, [Which came out the very same day, before two of the clock, in print, as his Speech] and was as follows :

"By the permission of Almighty God, I am this day brought hither to suffer death, as if I were guilty of high-treason. I do most truly, in the presence of the eternal, omnipotent, and all-knowing God, protest, upon my salvation, That I am as innocent as it is possible for any man to be, so much as in a thought, of the crimes laid to my charge.

"I acknowledge it to be a particular grace and favour of the Holy Trinity, to have given me this long time to prepare myself for eternity. I have not made so good use of that grace as I ought to have done, partly by my not having so well recollected myself as I might have done, and partly, because not only my friends, but my wife and children have for several days been forbidden to see me, but in the presence of one of my warders. This hath been a great trouble and distraction unto me, but I hope God of his infinite mercy will pardon my defects, and accept of my good intentions.

"Since my long imprisonment, I have considered often, what could be the original cause of my being thus accused, since I knew myself not culpable, so much as in a thought; and I cannot believe it to be upon any other account than my being of the church of Rome. I have no reason to be ashamed of my religion, for it teacheth nothing but the right worship of God, obedience to the king, and due subordination to the temporal laws of the kingdom. And I do submit to all articles of faith believed and taught in the Catholic church, believing them to be most consonant to the word of God. And whereas it hath so much and often been objected, That the church holds that sovereign princes, excommunicated by the pope, may, by their subjects, be deposed or murdered: As to the murder of princes, I have been taught as a matter of faith in the Catholic church, that such doctrine is diabolical, horrid, detestable, and contrary to the law of God, nature, and nations; and as such, from my heart I renounce and abominate it. As for the doctrine of deposing princes, I know some divines of the catholic church hold it; but as able and learned as they have writ against it: But it was not pretended to be the doctrine of the church, that is, any point of catholic faith: Wherefore I do here in my conscience declare, that it is my true and real judgment, that the same doctrine of deposing kings, is contrary to the fundamental laws of this kingdom, injurious to sovereign power, and consequently would be in me or any other of his majesty's subjects, impious and damnable. I believe and profess, that there is one God, one Saviour, one Holy Catholic Church, of which, through the mercy, grace, and goodness of God, I die a member.

"To my great and unspeakable grief, I have offended God in many things, by many great offences; but I give him most humble thanks, not in any of those crimes of which I was accused.

"All the members of either House having liberty to propose in the House what they think fit for the good of the kingdom; accordingly, I proposed what I thought fit; the House is judge of the fitness or unfitness of it; and I think I never said any thing that was unfitting there, or contrary to the law and use of parliament; for certainly if I had, the Lords would (as they might) have punished me: so am not culpable before God or man.

"It is much reported of indulgencies, dispensations, and pardons, to murder, rebel, lie, forswear, and commit such other crimes held and given in the church; I do here profess, in the presence of God, I never learnt, believed, or practised any such thing, but the contrary; and I speak this without any equivocation or reservation whatsoever: and certainly, were I guilty, either myself, or knew of any one that were guilty whosoever that were so, of any of those crimes of which I am accused, I were not only the greatest fool imaginable, but a perfect mad-man, and as wicked as any of those that so falsely have accused me, if I should not discover any ill design I knew in any kind, and so upon discovery save my life, I have so often had so fair occasions proposed unto me, and so am guilty of self-murder, which is a most grievous and heinous sin; and though I was at last impeached at the Lords bar, yet I have great grounds to believe, that I was first brought to trial, on the belief, that to save my life, I would make some great discovery; and truly so I would, had I known any such thing of any ill design, or illegal dangerous Plot, either of myself, or any other person whatsoever, without any exception. But had I a thousand lives, I would lose them all, rather than falsely accuse either myself or any other whatsoever. And, if I had known of any treason, and should thus deny it, as I do now upon my salvation at this time, I should have no hope of salvation, which now I have, through the merits of Christ Jesus.

"I do beseech God to bless his majesty, who is my lawful king and sovereign, whom I was always, by all laws human and divine, bound to obey; and I am sure that no power on earth, either singly, or altogether, can legally allow me, or any body else, to lift up a hand against him or his legal authority. I do hold, that the constitution of the government of this kingdom is the only way to continue peace and quietness, which God long continue.

"Next to treason, I hold murder in abhorrence, and have ever done and do; and I do sincerely profess, that if I could at this time free myself immediately, and establish what religion I would, and what government I would, and make myself as great as I could wish, and all by the death of one of these fellows, that by their perjuries have brought me to the place where I am, I so much abhor to be the cause of any man's death, that I would not any way be the cause of their murder; how much less would I endeavour the assassination of his majesty, whom I hold to be as gracious a king as ever this, or any other nation had, and under whom the people may enjoy their liberties, as much as ever any did? And if it please God to grant him life and happiness, according as I have always wished and prayed for, I am morally persuaded, that he, and all his dominions, will be as happy and prosperous as ever people were, which I beseech God grant.

"I do most humbly ask pardon of the Almighty and All-merciful God, for all the great offences I have committed against his divine majesty; and I know he would not have the death and confusion of a sinner, but that he may repent and live; in that assurance I hope, knowing he never despiseth a contrite heart; and though I have not so feeling a contrition as I would, yet I have it as well as I can, and I doubt not but that God will accept of the good-will.

"I do desire that all people will forgive me any injury that I have done them in any thing, either wilfully or by chance; and I do heartily forgive all people in this world that have injured me; I forgive even those perjured men, that so falsely have brought me hither by their perjuries.

"I do now upon my death and salvation aver, That I never spoke one word either to Oates or Turberville, or, to my knowledge, ever saw them until my trial; and for Dugdale, I never spoke unto him of any thing, but about a foot-boy, or foot-man, or foot-race; and never was then alone with him: all the punishment that I wish them, is, that they may repent and acknowledge the wrong that they have done me; then it will appear how innocent I am: God forgive them! I have a great confidence that it will please Almighty God, and that he will, in a short time, bring truth to light; then you, and all the world, will see and know what injury they have done me.

"I hope that I have made it appear that I have some conscience; for if I had none, certainly I would have saved my life, by acknowledging myself guilty; which I could have done, though I know I am not in the least guilty. And I having some conscience, make very ill use of it, for I throw myself into eternal pain, by thus plainly and constantly denying at my death, the knowledge of what I am accused of in the least.

"I have said thus much in discharge of my conscience, and do aver, upon my salvation, what I have said to be really true.

"I shall say little of my trial; and whether it were all according to the known law, I am too much a party to say much of it: if it were not so, God forgive him or them that were the cause of it.

"My judges were all persons of honour, who were all as much bound to judge rightly, as if they had been upon oath upon what was legally proved; and not to vote but according as in their consciences they were satisfied; and if any of them did otherwise, upon any account whatsoever, I beseech God forgive them, I do heartily.

"I shall end with my hearty prayers for the happiness of his majesty, that he may enjoy all happiness in this world and the world to come, and govern his people according to the laws of God; and that the people may be sensible what a blessing God hath so miraculously given them, and obey him as they ought. I ask pardon with a prostrate heart of Almighty God, for all the great offences that I have committed against his divine majesty, and hope, through the merits and passion of Christ Jesus, to obtain everlasting happiness, into whose hands I commit my spirit, asking pardon of every person that I have done any wrong unto; I do freely forgive all that have any ways wronged me; I do, with all the devotion and repentance that I can, humbly invoke the mercy of our blessed Saviour.

"I beseech God not to revenge my innocent blood upon the nation, or on those that were the cause of it, with my last breath. I do with my last breath truly assert my innocency, and hope the omnipotent, all-seeing, just God will deal with me accordingly."

His Speech being ended, he delivered several copies signed with his own hand, to Mr. Sheriff Cornish, and other gentlemen about him; one whereof, wrote with his own hand, he sent to the king. He then desired he might have liberty to pray in his own way, which being granted, he kneeled down by the block, and taking out of his pocket another paper, he read a Latin prayer; which done, he gave the paper to Mr. Sheriff Bethel, and then spoke to the people about the scaffold to this effect; "God bless you, gentlemen; God preserve his majesty; he is as good a prince as ever governed you: obey him as faithfully as I have done, and God bless you all, gentlemen." Then a minister applied himself, and said, "Sir, do you disown the indulgencies of the Romish Church?" To which he answered with great passion, "Sir, What have you to do with my religion? However, I do say, that the Church of Rome allows no indulgences for murder, lying, &c. and whatever I have said is true."

Minister. Have you received no absolution?

Ans. I have received none at all.

Minister. You said that you never saw those witnesses?

Ans. I never saw any of them but Dugdale, and that was at a time when I spoke to him about a foot-boy.

Then turning about to his friends, he distributed among them his watch, two rings off his fingers, his staff, and his crucifix from off his neck; and his gentleman stripping him of his coat and peruke, put on his head a silk cap; and having accommodated his hair, shirt and waistcoat for the execution, he laid down his neck on the block and stretched himself.

The Executioner being demanded by the Sheriffs, Whether he had any sign, he answered, No. Whereupon the prisoner rose up, and asked, What they wanted: to which it was answered, What sign will you give?

Ans. No sign at all: take your own time; God's will be done.

Whereupon the Executioner said, "I hope you forgive me;" he made answer, "I do." Then lying down again, the executioner at one blow severed his head from his body, save only a small part of the skin and wind-pipe, which was immediately cut off with a knife. After which, the headsman holding up the head in his hand, carried it about the scaffold, shewing it to the people, and saying, "Here is the head of a Traitor. The corpse with the lead were put into a coffin, and conveyed to the Tower, where they were interred.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, December 30, 1680.

Ordered, That the Committee appointed to prepare Evidence against the Lords in the Tower, do look into the Evidence against the Four Popish Lords in the Tower; and do report their opinions to the House, in order to the further directions and proceedings of the House against them.

January 5, 1681.

The House being informed, That one Bowyer was, upon intimation given by the Committee appointed to prepare Evidence against the Popish Lords in the Tower, taken into custody:

Ordered, That the said Bowyer be delivered into the hands of the serjeant at arms attending this House; and that he be brought to the bar of this House to-morrow morning at ten of the clock, in order to his examination.

HOUSE OF LORDS, May 21, 1685.

The House being made acquainted, That these Lords who were committed by this House to the Tower, upon Impeachments of Treason from the House of Commons, have entered into recognizances, to appear before this House the first day of the next parliament, which is this day; and that the said lords are attending accordingly: the earl of Powis, earl of Danby, the lord Arundel of Warder, and the lord Bellasis, were called to the bar, and made their personal appearance; and then were commanded to withdraw.

Which being done, a Petition was presented, from the earl of Powis, the lord Arundel, and the lord Bellasis; and another Petition from the earl of Danby; which the House received, and commanded to be read, as follow:

"To the right hon. the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled. The humble Petition of the right hon. William earl of Powis, Henry lord Arundel of Warder, and John lord Bellasis.

"Humbly sheweth; That your Petitioners, by several commitments of high treason, were sent prisoners to the Tower of London, in or about the month of October, in the year of our Lord 1678, upon the single testimony of Titus Oates, who, upon several trials, stands now detected and convicted of perjury, in those very matters upon which he most maliciously framed his accusation against your Petitioners.—That your Petitioners are and were always innocent of those detestable treasons laid to their charges, and of all traitorous designs and conspiracies whatsoever.—That they hope your lordships are fully satisfied of their innocence; notwithstanding they continue still under the same imprisonment, without any prospect of enlargement but from your lordships justice.—Wherefore, forasmuch as it lies in the power of your lordships to grant them a speedy enlargement, they humbly pray your lordships would be pleased to order that your Petitioners may be forthwith discharged, and in such manner as the innocency and honour of your Petitioners may be vindicated to posterity. And they shall ever pray, &c. POWIS, HEN. ARUNDEL, BELLASIS."

Next, was read the earl of Danby's Petition.

"To the right hon. the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled. The humble Petition of Thomas earl of Danby.

"Most humbly sheweth; That your Petitioner hath been detained a prisoner almost five years in the Tower of London, videlicet, from the 16th of April, 1679, to the 12th of February, 1683-4, upon an Impeachment brought against your Petitioner, on bare suggestions of crimes, without any oath or affidavit whatsoever made against your Petitioner.—That your Petitioner did often, during that time, endeavour to have procured bail, to appear and answer before your lordships to any crime which should be objected against him; but could never obtain the same, until the 12th of February, 1683-4, at which time he was bailed to appear before your lordships the first day of the sitting of the next parliament, as may appear by the recognizance which (as your Petitioner is informed) is now brought up to your lordships by the lord chief justice of the King's Bench.—That, in pursuance of the said recognizance, your Petitioner doth now present himself before your lordships; humbly praying, that your lordships will be pleased to take into your considerations the case of your Petitioner (who has the honour to be one of the members of your House), and to grant him a speedy relief against his long and tedious imprisonment, either by trial, or by such other ways as your lordships shall judge most convenient; and that in the mean time your lordships will be pleased, either to order the continuation of the said bail under which your Petitioner now stands, or to direct such other bail as your lordships shall think fit. And your Petitioner shall pray, &c. DANBY."

The House hereupon made the ensuing Order: "Upon reading the Petition of William earl of Powis, Henry lord Arundel of Warder, and John lord Bellasis; as also the Petition of Thomas earl of Danby; shewing, that they have been prisoners several years, and are now ready to make their appearance; they were called in, and made their personal appearance at the bar: It is thereupon ordered, by the Lords spiritual and temporal in parliament assembled, That the appearance of the said earl of Powis, lord Arundel of Warder, lord Bellasis, and earl of Danby, be, and is hereby, recorded; and that the said earl of Powis, lord Arundel, lord Bellasis, and earl of Danby, do attend until this House, upon their several cases, shall take further order."

May 22.

Upon consideration of the cases of the earl of Powis, lord Arundel of Wardour, the lord Bellasis, and the earl of Danby, contained in their petitions: after some debate; This question was proposed; "Whether the order of the 19th of March, 1678-9, shall be reversed and annulled, as to impeachments?" The question being put, "Whether this question shall be now put?" It was resolved in the affirmative. Then, the question was put, "Whether the order of the 19th of March, 1678-9, shall be reversed and annulled, as to impeachments?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

"Dissentiente, JOHN EARL OF RADNOR."

The earl of Anglesey, before the putting of the abovesaid question, desired the putting of the House to enter his dissent, if the question were carried in the affirmative; which was granted.

Several other Lords desired leave to enter their Dissents:

"According to the right of peers to enter their Dissent and Protestation against any vote propounded and resolved upon any question in parliament, we do enter our Dissent and Protestation to the abovesaid vote or resolution; for these reasons, among many others: 1. Because it doth, as we conceive, extrajudicially, and without a particular cause before us, endeavour an alteration in a judicial rule and order of the House in the highest point of their power and judicature. 2. Because it shakes and lays aside an order made and renewed upon long consideration, debate, report of committees, precedents, and former resolutions, without permitting the same to be read, though called for by many of the peers, against weighty reasons, as we conceive, appearing for the same, and contrary to the practice of former times. 3. Because it is inherent in every court of judicature, to assert and preserve the former rules of proceedings before them, which therefore must be steady and certain; especially in this high court; that the subject and all persons concerned may know how to apply themselves for justice: the very Chancery, King's-bench, &c. have their settled rules and standing orders, from which there is no variation. ANGLESEY. CLARE. STAMFORD."

May 27.

A Bill was offered to the House, by the king's allowance, and signed by his majesty; which was received, and read the first time. It was entitled, "An Act for reversing of the lord viscount Stafford's Attainder*."

* In the year 1800, certain proceedings were instituted on behalf of lady Anastasia Stafford Howard, and sir William Jerningham, in respect of their interests in two baronies of Stafford: and recourse was had to the advice of Mr. Hargrave, who upon the occasion employed the acuteness of his sagacity, the unweariedness of his diligence, and the copiousness of his learning, with that high degree of zeal and power, by which his professional exertions are so eminently characterised. He composed a very full and learned disquisition, of which a few copies were printed, with the title of, "Opinion and Argument of Mr. Hargrave, as to the Right of Lady Anastasia Stafford Howard, to the New Barony of Stafford, under the Letters Patent of 16th of King Charles the First, notwithstanding the Attainder of her Ancestor, Lord Viscount Stafford, in 1680, for Treason, in being concerned in the alledged Popish Plot: Including Remarks on the Origin and Progress of that memorable Accusation, and on his Lordship's Trial and Execution, made with a view to assist an Application for obtaining an Act of Parliament to reverse such Attainder. [Written in the year 1800.]" Through the kindness of lord Erskine and Mr. Hargrave, I possess a copy of this work, which it is to be hoped the learned author will, at a proper time, communicate to the world. A very brief exhibition of the topics discussed in it, will suffice to shew the interesting and important nature of its contents.

Mr. Hargrave first considers, Whether a barony be such a tenement* within the statute

* It is said, the reason of a certain place from whence to take the title, was to make an estate-tail within the statute De Donis, which

June 1.

This House being moved, on the behalf of several peers of this House, which were bail for the appearance of William earl of Powis, Thomas earl of Dauby, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, John lord Bellasis, and Richard earl of Tyrone in the kingdom of Ireland, in this

De Donis, that a grant of it to a man and his wife, as joint-tenants in special tail, is good. And as to this, he expresses his opinion in the affirmative. He then proceeds to examine whether, upon supposition that such a grant is good, the attainder of lord Stafford would, independently of the statutes of 26 Hen. 8, c. 13, and 5 and 6 Edw. 6, c. 11, be a forfeiture of the barony of Stafford, as against his wife the cograntee in joint-tenancy (who survived him), and as against her issue by his lordship. And as to this he delivers his opinion, 1. That under the operation of the law of forfeiture, upon estates of inheritance, previously to the statute De Donis, that attainder would not be such a forfeiture, independently of the statutes 26 H. 8, and 5 and 6 Edw. 6: but 2dly, That if the case were otherwise, the statute De Donis would unquestionably prevent that attainder from operating such forfeiture. He next enquires whether those two statutes of 26 H. 8, c. 13, and 5 and 6 Edw. 6, c. 11, so extend the laws of forfeiture, as to superinduce such forfeiture of the barony as against lady Stafford and her issue by lord Stafford. And in the prosecution of this enquiry, he makes two questions: First, Whether the two statutes of 26 Hen. 8, and of 5 and 6 Edw. 6, extend the pre-existing law of forfeiture of inheritances for high treason, in cases of joint tenancy: and Secondly, Whether the enactment for forfeiture of inheritance in the two statutes of 26 H. 8, and 5 and 6 Edw. 6, apply to cases of attainder of high treason, on an impeachment by the House of Commons. He resolves in the negative both these questions; and as to the former of them he thinks it more especially clear, that those statutes cannot properly be construed to deprive a wife of her rights of survivorship, in the particular case of a joint inheritance constituted in husband and wife after marriage.

Mr. Hargrave afterwards notices other grounds, which might be taken in favour of the claims of lady Anastasia S. Howard and sir W. Jerningham: 1st. As to the distinction between an ordinary hereditament which is alienaextends only to limitations which concern lands and tenements, and therefore without naming some place, a limitation of an honour to one and the heirs males of his body, would be a fee-simple conditional at common law, and if so would be forfeited by attainder of felony, as an estate-tail of a baronship, which is not created of any place. See 12 Co. 81. 12 Mod. 57. But see also Cruise on Dignities, ch. 4, s. 1—6, s. 72, 73, 74.

House, upon the first day of the meeting of this parliament, which recognizances were entered into in his majesty's court of King's Bench, and returned by Certiorari into this House; as also for the discharge of the said earl of Powis, earl of Danby, lord Arundel, lord Bellasis, and ble by fine, and a title of honour which is not so alienable.*

2. As to the operation of the peculiar words 'respective' and 'respectively,' both of which are used, and the former of which is very frequently repeated in the grant by Charles the First, of the barony of Stafford to husband and wife in special tail.

But into these he does not enter.

3. As to apparent error on the record of the attainder of lord Stafford.

This last ground consists of two parts, (exclusive of Mr. Hargrave's doubts concerning an attainder on an impeachment, tried after dissolution of the parliament in which it was made), of which one is that according to the recital of the judgment of attainder [See this recital in the warrant of execution, p. 1562.] the judgment against lord Stafford was neither By the King, nor By the King and Lords, nor even with the least mention of or reference to him, but By the Lords, and Them only: and the other is that the judgment by the Lords is not By the Lords Temporal and Spiritual, or By the Lords generally, but exclusively By the Lords Temporal.

Upon these two points Mr. Hargrave does not pronounce any definite opinion: nor does he engage in the ancillary disquisitions, into the nature of the judicature of parliament; the regality of the crown in that respect; the nature of that judicature in the particular case of an impeachment by the Commons; the extent of the regality of the King in parliament; the share of the Spiritual Lords in the judicative functions of the Upper House. He contents himself with the recital of two ancient cases, to shew that neither of the two errors which he suggests are without precedent. Mr. Hargrave next adverts to the consideration, whether there is any such limitation of time for petitions of error to the king in parliament, as might make it too late to proceed for the reversal of the attainder of lord Stafford in that way: and he concludes with a very able critical review of the history of the Popish Plot; including many important details illustrative of the proceedings against lord Stafford, together with a display of the illustrious descents of that lord and of his wife.

From the short account, which I have thus given of Mr. Hargrave's "Opinion and Argument," every lawyer will immediately perceive, how extremely interesting and how highly valuable must be such a work, executed by such a master.

earl of Tyrone: It is ordered, That the said William earl of Powis, Thomas earl of Danby, Henry lord Arundel of Wardour, John lord Bellasis, and Richard earl of Tyrone, as also all persons, peers or others, that were bail for the appearance of the said lords upon the said recognizances, be, and are hereby, discharged.

June 3.

The House was put into a committee, to proceed in the consideration of the Bill for reversing the attainder of the lord viscount Stafford. The House was resumed.

The earl of Bridgewater reported, "That the committee of the whole House were in further consideration of the Bill for reversing the attainder of the lord viscount Stafford, and were reading of records, which would take up some time; but the committee understanding there was a message from the House of Commons of great concern, were willing the House might be resumed, to receive the said message; and then desired the House would appoint another time for the House to be put into a committee again."

The House ordered, the committee of the House should sit again, after the receiving of the message.

The House was again adjourned into a committee, to proceed in consideration of the business which was debated before the message.

The House was resumed. And the earl of Bridgewater reported "That the committee of the whole House have considered the bill for reversing the attainder of the lord viscount Stafford; and have made some alterations in the title, a considerable amendment in the preamble, and a small amendment in the enacting clause. The opinion of the committee is, That the bill do pass with the said amendments." The amendments were read twice; and the House agreed to the said amendments. Then the question was put, "Whether this bill with the amendments, shall be engrossed?" It was resolved in the affirmative.

The earl of Anglesea and some lords desired leave, before the question was put, to enter their dissents, if the question were carried in the affirmative.

"1. Because the assertion in the bill, of its being now manifest that the viscount Stafford died innocent, and that the testimony on which he was convicted was false, which are the sole grounds and reasons given to support the bill, are destitute of all proof, warrant, or matter of record before us. 2. That the record of the King's-bench, read at the committee concerning the conviction, last term, of one of the witnesses for perjury, in collateral points of proof, of no affinity to the lord Stafford's trial, and given several years before, it is conceived, can be no ground to invalidate the testimony upon which the said viscount was convicted: which could never legally be by one witness, and was, in fact, by the judgment of his peers on the evidence of at least three. 3. It is conceived, the said judgment in the King's bench, and the whole proceedings was unprecedented, illegal, and unwarranted, highly derogatory to the honour, judicature, and authority of this court, who have power to question and punish perjuries of witnesses before them, and ought not to be imposed upon by the judgments of inferior courts, or their attainders of a peer invalidated by implication; and the popish plot, so condemned, pursued, and punished by his late majesty and four parliaments, after public solemn devotion through the whole kingdom, by authority of church and state, to be eluded, to the arraignment and scandal of the government and only to the restoring of the family of one popish lord; and all this being without any matter judicially appearing before us to induce the same, and the records of that Trial not suffered to be read for information of the truth before the passing of the bill.—Lastly, For many other weighty reasons offered and given by divers peers in two days debate of this bill, both in the committee and the House. ANGLIENSIS."

June 4.

The Bill was read the third time. The question being put, "Whether this bill shall pass?" It was resolved in the affirmative. Several lords desired leave to enter their Dissents to this question:

"Dissentiente, RADNOR."

"I, Anglessey, protest against this bill's passing, for the same reasons entered the day before.

"I protest against this bill, because the preamble was not amended, and so defect in point of law alledged as a reason for the reversal of the attainder. CLARE, STAMFORD, R. EURE."

In the House of Commons the Bill was read a first time on the 5th of June, a second time on the next day, and ordered to be committed on the 18th of June, but I have not met with any mention of further proceeding upon it. On the 4th of August the House adjourned to the 9th of November, when they met and sat till the 20th, they were then prorogued, and during the remainder of king James's Reign, Parliament never met to do business.

Notwithstanding what Barnet says of bishop Lloyd's report concerning the apparent sincerity of Praunce, [See vol. 6, p. 1494,] who was a principal witness against lord Stafford, it appears that he was upon his own confession convicted of perjury in wilfully forswearing himself at the trials of Robert Green, Lawrence Hill, and Henry Berry, &c. in relation to the murder of sir Edmondbury Godfrey, see p. 228, of this Volume. Mr. Hargrave caused to be taken a copy of the record of Praunce's conviction, and very obligingly would have communicated it for insertion in this place: but it had been mislaid, and his search for it was unsuccessful.
