The American Tract Society is ready to give a limited number of excellent libraries free of all expense except the cost of transportation to needy Sunday Schools, Mission Churches and Christian schools among the negroes and mountain whites.

This offer is made to cover only those cases in which the recipients are themselves unable to pay anything toward the cost of the books that they need.

Application for such libraries should be made at once to the General Secretary of the American Tract Society, Park avenue and Fortieth street, New York, N. Y.

Each applicant should state the reason why the church or school is unable to pay for the books needed, the number and ages of the scholars, and should also contain a guarantee for the payment of the transportation charges.

Happiness for the New Year

BY REV. AME VENNEMA, D.D.

There are three things which greatly disturb the peace of mind of many. Fortunately, these causes of their unhappiness are all covered by definite promises of God. And just in the degree that they trust Him to make good those promises, will they be relieved of anxiety and made happy.

The first of those disturbing causes relates to their temporal necessities. It is expressed in these words: "What shall we eat, what shall we drink, wherewith shall we be clothed?" These bodies of ours and of those dependent upon us—how shall they be provided for? Their wants are so many and so constant; the income is so slender and so uncertain; there is so little ahead for a rainy day or for the time of old age. Shall we not come to actual want?

Here is the promise—it is only one of many relating to the same thing: "The young lions do lack and suffer hunger: but they that trust in the Lord shall not want any good thing." That promise has been the only bank account of many a widow and aged one, and has never failed. God's care and support are as constant as your need. Your heavenly Father knows that you have need of all these things. Put yourself in His care. Lean back upon His promise. If you pass through the wilderness, go out each day to gather the manna which rains from the clouds. It will come some way, from somewhere. Not in armfuls or basketfuls, perhaps, but in daily rations. Sufficient unto the day is the provision thereof. Not in dainties and luxuries, but in plain, substantial, healthful diet. It is ours to plan and execute the best we know how; it is God's to do the rest.

The second cause for worry relates to the providences of life. So many things occur that are, oh! so hard to bear. Hard-earned money which it took years to lay by goes up in smoke in an hour, or by mistaken investment is as completely lost. A fair reputation, which it required a life time to build up, is ruthlessly assailed, and we do not know how extensively the confidence which others reposed in us is shaken. One dearly beloved is taken away, and, standing by the new-made grave, our bosom heaves with emotion and the heart is desolate and lonely. Sickness enters the home, and weeks and months are spent watching solicitously by the bedside of one whose life-tide, so recently in its flow, is slowly ebbing away.

Now, one of the best ways of making ourselves miserable is to let our imagination picture all the dreadful things that may come to us in the coming year; or, with reference to what has taken place in our experience, to think that we have been unkindly and unjustly treated; that every one else has fared better than we; that God seems to take delight in blocking our

The American Tract Society

- 1.—It is a GREAT MISSIONARY PUBLICATION SOCIETY, having printed and distributed at home and abroad the Gospel Truth in 178 languages or dialects, thereby multiplying many times the power of the missionary.
- 2.—Its UNION MISSIONARY COLPORTAGE reaches the dense population of the city and the scattered population of the country.
- 3.—Its WORK AMONG THE IMMIGRANTS is most successful. Its colporters are native foreigners speaking Christian Truth in the tongues of those to whom they are sent.
- 4.—By its GRANTS of cash, publications and electrotypes to missions and societies in the foreign field it enables them to print and circulate an undenominational Christian vernacular literature.

WHY IT SHOULD BE SUPPORTED

- 1.—Because the printed page finds tens of thousands who would never learn of Christ in any other way.
- 2.—Because through its publications many souls are converted both on the home and foreign fields.
- 3.—Because its volumes and tracts and periodicals develop the spiritual life of Christians.
- 4.—Because its publications counteract the influence of impure and evil literature.

HOW I CAN HELP IT

- 1.—By making an Annual offering.
- 2.—By speaking of its work to my friends.
- 3.—By asking God's blessing upon its work and workers.
- 4.—By increasing the circulation of its publications.

way and in piling peculiar burdens upon us, and to presume to say how wrong everything and everybody is and how things should be in order to be right. To give way to that kind of thinking is to excite rebellion in the heart and to make everything around us black.

Here is the promise: "All things work together for good to them that love God." Do you love God? Then accept the promise and trust Him to fulfil it. He can do it. He will do it. Just the experiences through which you pass are what you and all those affected by them need. "Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth. Therefore despise not the chastening of the Almighty."

Oh, for that sweet and tender, yet firm and unshaken trust in God, that will lead us to put ourselves into His hands in order that He may, by chastening and correction, so mold and fashion us that our characters shall unfold in beauty and our highest destiny shall be worked out. Oh, for a trust in God that will make us feel that what He orders is best, that He can make no mistake, that He does not put one single grain more of bitterness in our cup than is needed to make it medicinal and curative. Begin with God. Accept Him as your Lord! Then believe that all the occurrences of life are surrounded by Him and result in His glory and your good. That will contribute in no small degree to your happiness.

The third cause of unhappiness with many is their uncertainty with regard to the salvation of their souls. They have good reason to feel disquieted if they have not made their peace with God.

The relation of the soul to God is not a matter to be trifled with. It is of the first and greatest importance, deserving and demanding consideration and settlement. And it naturally comes up, when we pass out of one year into another, and are reminded of the flight of time and of the passing away of so many whom we knew and loved.

No question is settled finally until it is settled right. It is so with the salvation of the soul. But note! God would free us from all anxiety about this great matter. He has sent His Son into the world to live as our example and to die for our sins, thus making our salvation possible. Then He gave us a simple direction what to do to make our salvation sure, viz., to repent of sin and trust in Jesus Christ. No one can say, "I cannot do that," for God makes it possible for everyone who really wants to. Oh, what peace is ours when our sins are forgiven! Oh, what assurance we have that all is well when we have left this matter entirely in the hands of our great Advocate and Saviour and Judge.

Trust God to supply you with all things needful for the body! Trust God to bring good to you out of every experience of life. Trust God, above all, through Jesus Christ His Son, to work out for you a free and full salvation!

The Reason for "Child Labor Day"

The 22d, 23d and 24th of January, 1916, will be Child Labor Days, the National Child Labor Committee announces. Saturday will be observed by synagogues, Sunday by churches and Sunday Schools, and Monday by secular schools and clubs, and if last year's record means anything, at least 9,000 organizations all over this country may be expected to recognize the day.

But why? Why have a Child Labor Day? Surely America is agreed that child labor is not consistent with her ideals? The National Child Labor Committee, realizing that these questions will be asked, has issued the following explanatory statement: "Child Labor Day is a reminder. We have a strong sentiment in this country against the exploitation of children, but, perhaps for the very reason that our sentiment is strong—so strong as to make it hard to believe child labor can exist in America—we have never taken the decisive steps to end once for all the labor of children.

"If a fourteen-year age limit in factories and sixteen-year limit in mines were enforced throughout the country more than 50,000 children would immediately be eliminated from industry. That is, more than 50,000 children are at work in the United States contrary to the primary standards of child labor legislation. If the eight-hour day and no night work in factories were the law for children under sixteen, another 100,000 children would be affected. There are still States in the Union where children nine or ten years old may be found at work in the mills. There are still States where the child of twelve may work eleven hours a day. There are still States where the education of a child under fourteen is not compulsory.

"It is because these things are so and we in America are apt to forget them that we ask our friends to observe Child Labor Day and remind the country of child labor in the United States is a pressing issue."

Welcome Visitor

One of our subscribers in Winthrop, Maine, indicates her regard for this

"I enjoy each copy of the AMERICAN MESSANGER as it comes each month, and I feel badly to be without it."

Our Honor Roll

On our Honor Roll are inscribed the names of those into whose homes the AMERICAN MESSANGER has come for fifty years or more. To this Honor Roll we take great pleasure in adding the name of Miss Clark of Westhampton, Mass., who recently sent us six subscriptions, including her own renewal, and wrote:

"I have had the AMERICAN MESSANGER so many years, from my childhood up to my more than four score years of age, that it would be no small trial to be deprived of it."

Another name which must be added to our Honor Roll is that of R. N. Hodgman of Parma, Ohio, who has written the following delightful missive:

"DEAR AMERICAN MESSANGER:

"You have made your visits to our home since 1846. You have always been a welcome visitor. As a boy I think your pages were looked upon as sacred, standing next to the Bible as a guide to right living. I have copies still of your original four-page form. May God bless you in your ministry and helpfulness to godly living.

"Cordially yours,

"R. N. HODGMAN."

We are very glad to receive these pleasant greetings, and we will be pleased to receive messages from all other friends whose connection with the AMERICAN MESSANGER has dated back for fifty years or more, so that we may add their names to our Honor Roll.

College Students Work for Temperance

That students of today are not limiting their interest in public affairs merely to the academic side is shown by the activity of Ohio colleges in the recent State prohibition campaign.

At least 650 students at eighteen of the largest universities and colleges took active part in that great civic "drive" of anti-liquor sentiment. Sixteen of these colleges, reporting in detail, furnish the following specific data: Number of students engaged in prohibition work during the campaign, speaking, singing, canvassing, using stereopticons, serving without pay for their services, at least 650; of these 52 were young women. Speakers supplied to 243 meetings and singers to 172; number of teams sent out, two, three or four students each, 74; college men speakers at work, 175; singers, 189; women singers, 50; students engaged in canvassing of voters, at polls, etc., 388.

Sixteen colleges sent out an average of thirty-three students each into this laboratory of civic leadership. Their services counted greatly in the campaign. These colleges were: Adelbert (Western Reserve University), Ohio State, Oberlin, Ohio Wesleyan, Wooster, Denison, Otterbein, Ohio Northern, Defiance, Baldwin, Wallace, Heidelberg, Ashland, Hiram, Miami, Mount Union and Lane Theological Seminary.

Wooster scored a touchdown by the use of two stereopticons which were out practically every night for three weeks. Oberlin made a high record by sending out sixty-one different students, with the aid of a professor as coach. In Cleveland Western Reserve men did excellent service at the polls on election day and in the previous street meetings. At Defiance the young women furnished most of the thirty-five students who aided local committees.

The management of this student campaign was under the direction of the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association, its field secretaries and the Ohio State president of the association. The work was done with the co-operation of the National Anti-Saloon League and the local county and city federation committees.

GOD'S METHODS OF SURPRISE

BY

REV. EDGAR WHITAKER WORK, D.D.

Pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, New York

OD has many ways and methods of surprise for us. He does not tell us everything at once. Some things are withheld for a time until we are ready for them. His wonders are too great for complete unfolding to-day. There must be a to-morrow of surprise and revelation. If we only realized it, we are always on the edge of something new and wonderful in the divine Providence. The things that are not seen are vastly more spacious and wonderful than the things that are seen. That which God has prepared for us is far beyond our comprehension in weight of wonder and glory.

God loves to surprise us often with His unexpected resources. His mercies are new in the morning and fresh in the evening. There is no dullness in God's plans, nothing tiresome or humdrum in His ways of dealing with us. Always there is the old way of love and care, but ever there is something new. There is the opening of new doors, the finding of unsuspected ways, the discovery of undreamt-of resources. God has so much to show us, that a life-time does not suffice to learn the fulness of His possessions.

Is it not strange that we never grow tired of the changing seasons? Each season has a charm of its own. Spring fascinates us with its fresh beauty. Summer woos us by its richness and warmth of life and color. Autumn satisfies us with its glory and fruition. And when Winter comes back again, we know that its deadness is but a prelude to a new and bounteous life. The changing year has a thousand surprises. The new year is just as interesting, just as full of fascination and mystery as ever. Let us cross its threshold with the knowledge in our hearts that our Heavenly Father has great things in store for us, manifold surprises of His love to unfold to us, and many unexpected resources to reveal to us.

Nature is a bundle of surprises. Who of us ever tires of the miracle of growth, the mystery of bud and leaf and blossom and fruit? You cannot exhaust nature. She will have ever something new to show to you. You will go out to catch fish from nature's sea, and she will give you something greater than fish—some glimpse, it may be, of a vast and beautiful truth.

God is always challenging us by the surprises of nature, stirring our curiosity, stimulating our sense of wonder and developing our sentiment of reverence.

"O, little bulb, uncouth,
Ragged and rusty brown,
Have you some dew of youth?
Have you a crimson gown?
Plant me and see What I shall be—God's fine surprise
Before your eyes!"

The discoverer and the inventor live constantly in a world of surprise. They look for something and find it not. But often they find unexpected things, which are better than the expected things, even as the disciples fished all night on the Sea of Galilee and took nothing, but in the morning saw Jesus standing on the shore.

Saul, the son of Kish, went out to find his father's asses, and returned with the oil of consecration to the Kingdom upon his head. Columbus, the discoverer, sought a passage to the Indies in his westward voyage, but found a far greater, though unexpected, thing—a vast and unimagined continent, lying beneath the glow of the setting sun.

Nature's Surprises

It is most interesting to observe how men frequently stumble upon nature's secrets. God's surprises are so near and so ready for us; the partition between the known and the unknown is so thin! Dr. Young was one day watching some beautifully colored soap-bubbles blown from a common pipe. Suddenly his mind grasped the thought of "interferences," and later came the discovery of the diffraction of light. Many a man before Galileo's time had watched the swinging of a pendulum. But when Galileo one day in the cathedral of Pisa watched the swinging of a lamp that had just been replenished with oil, he was treated to a great surprise—he saw unexpectedly the actual principle of the pendulum.

Sir Samuel Brown, pondering upon the construction of a bridge for the river Tweed, walked in his garden one dewy autumn morning, and stopped to look at a delicate spider's web that was thrown across his path. Out of this came the principle of the suspension bridge, which sprang into the builder's mind out of the spider's delicate film. We call such a discovery accidental, but it is not to be forgotten that Brown was meditating as he walked in his garden.

Brunel learned from the ship-worm how to construct a tunnel under the Thames river. He saw how the ship-worm perforated the wood, first in one direction, then in another, until the archway was complete, and then daubed the roof and sides with a kind of varnish. This was his cue for the tunnel. The insensate worm became his teacher and led him deep into the mysteries of the building art. Galvani found that a frog's leg twitched when placed in contact with different metals, but he did not see in this the germ of the electric telegraph. That great surprise was reserved for other minds. Stothard was a diligent student of butterflies' wings, and out of his studies came the art of combining colors, which has made for us a new world of art and beauty.

Our trouble often is that we have no eye for unexpected things. We have an eye and a faith only for expected things. We demand nothing farther than what we can see. We go out to catch fish, and we dream of nothing further and deeper in the enterprise. We look for nothing beyond, we cherish no great expectations of larger and better results. We are fishermen—mere fishermen in the sea. That and nothing more, whereas we might be discoverers also, seers of truth, inventors of new ways of life and knowledge.

It is worth while now and again to fail utterly in catching fish, if only we can find unexpected truths and unlooked for glory behind our failure. All night long as they fished on the Sea of Galilee the disciples "took nothing," we are told, but when the day was breaking they saw Jesus. Let us not be so busy angling endlessly for the fish of the sea that we have no time to look away to yonder shore, and see the outline of a sacred truth or presence that will forever bless us. The chief business of life after all is not to catch fish, but to know God and Jesus Christ whom He has sent. Many a man needs to have the experience of taking nothing, so that he may be driven to look for higher values.

The Essence of the Divine Method

The essence of God's method of surprise lies in the fine art of substitution. To the disciples there came a heavenly compensation indeed. They caught no fish, but they found the Lord. Wonderful dawn it was that revealed to them the unexpected Presence! This wise principle of substitution is at work in human life at the very heart of things. If we do not find what we seek for, perhaps we may find what we have not consciously sought for—something better and more glorious. They who find merely what they are looking for only make a beginning at life. It is the unexpected resources of God that enrich us so wonderfully. It is God's methods of surprise that make the Christian life so fascinating, so superabundant in joy and gladness.

We forget that He is "able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think." We go about our every-day toil, as the disciples went about their fishing, with dull hearts and lack-lustre eyes. Our souls are not buoyed and strengthened as they ought to be by "great expectations." We are like the prophet's servant toiling seven times up to the top of the mountain to look for signs of promise in the sky. He had ceased to expect anything. Too often surprise, wonder and expectation die away in our souls. We forget the great word of the apostle John—"Beloved, now are we children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be."

There is more to come. Greater glory awaits us. Boundless possibilities belong to us. It is told of a poor cripple in London who was passionately fond of music, that one day he was seen going down Fleet street with a radiant face, after hearing one of the great symphonies. "You see what I am," he exclaimed to one who spoke to him, "but with this in my soul I can go down Fleet street like a god!"

Children of Great Expectations

Ought we not, all of us who are believers, to be children of great expectations? God's arm is not shortened. His store-house is not exhausted. His capacities are not limited. One reason why we take nothing is because we too often hug the shore. "Put out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught." This is the challenge that many of us need. We stay too much in shallow places. We have taken little because we have not let down our nets in the deep places of God's love and power. "Oh the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God!" Make the venture of faith out into the "unsearchable riches" of Christ.

We do not expect enough in the Christian life. We are dull and listless, while "an eternal weight of glory" is close to us. Lift up your eyes, O fishermen, and see the radiant dawn, and the more radiant Presence which it reveals. Even the commonest of human toil is transformed when the worker realizes that the Master is present.

Behold Jesus standing on the shore of the Sea of Galilee! God's gifts and surprises are very near. They are not far to seek. One need not travel to overtake them. But alas! our eyes are so often holden, as were the eyes of the disciples whom Jesus overtook on the way to Emmaus. Many of us need what was asked for Elisha's young man. "Jehovah, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see." "They seeing, see not," was our Lord's description of the spiritually blind. We see the boats and the sails, and the fishing-tackle and the close-locked sea about us, and we see our own failure to catch anything, but we do not see the Divine Presence, the real glory, the horses and the chariots of fire. We see material values and forces, but not spiritual powers and graces. We have eyes for wonderful things in men and books, but not for the "wondrous things" of God's law and gospel. "Open his eyes! Open his eyes, that he may see!"

God has many surprises awaiting us in the life of faith. It is our lack of faith that hinders the mighty works of God. When we walk by faith and not by sight, the way is crowded with the unexpected. The way of sight produces only the usual and the visible. The way of faith brings forth the wonderful and the invisible. "Faith is a conviction (or test) of things not seen." A heart that has faith enters a new world on journeys of exploration. The thrill of search and discovery becomes a joyous experience. Such a one learns to expect much of his Heavenly Father's Kingdom; to himself he says, "There is more beyond." Even darkness and mystery invite him, for he knows that God has hidden treasures in the darkness. He endures "as seeing Him who is invisible." There is no dullness in the Kingdom, no humdrum in the Christian life, where faith is strong. Out of strong faith scores of eager visions spring. One may be fishing in Galilee, taking much or taking nothing, but faith looks up and sees the glory of God close at hand. Faith transfigures even a common life, lifts the curtain of a larger world before our limited gaze, and sanctifies the Seen by the grace of the Unseen. God has no surprises for the soul that goes not out to Him in faith. But he who has a strong faith shall find life's facts and meanings coming back to him robed in light and splendor.

And what of the surprises of Providence? How often we discover that God is so much more wonderful than we had supposed. We seemed to be taking nothing, but God had arranged some unexpected substitution. We did not get fish, but we got something better. We failed to obtain wealth, but we grew in grace instead. We had many hard tasks imposed upon us, and often we wondered and almost failed in trust, but meantime patience had "its perfect work" within us, and other flowers of a well-disciplined life grew and blossomed on the toilsome way. Sorrows and losses came also, and more than once we stood stripped and bare as it seemed in our affliction. But no, we were not left alone, for God was with us in sorrow. His rewards were marvellous. The sting of sorrow passed not, the thorn remained; but his grace was sufficient for us. God's compensations to His sorrowing ones are the best of all His surprises. "After two days will He revive us: on the third day He will raise us up." If we trust Him God will bring us up out of the miry clay, and establish our goings. "Weeping may tarry for the night, but joy cometh in the morning." How often the things which happen unto us fall out "rather unto the progress of the gospel" in us, and even our bonds become "manifest in Christ." Trust God and He will bring "the peaceable fruits of righteousness" out of the blackest trouble.

The Wonderful Region of the Unexpected

And prayer!—what a realm of pleasant surprises this is! What a region of Unexpected is here! Only God requires us to have open eyes and great expectations when we enter this realm. "Hitherto ye have asked nothing." "Ask and ye shall receive." Nowhere are the losses so great to the soul through lack of expectation as in the realm of prayer. We look for so little. Our asking after all is so meagre. We crowd our petitions with temporalities, and lose sight of the wealth of blessings "in heavenly places in Christ Jesus." Our prayers are dull and lag-gard. They ought to leap and spring upward, like the joy of "leaping and climbing from rock to rock." God has a world of blessings for men. His resources have scarce begun to be drawn upon. "Seek and ye shall find."

Let your prayers be spiritually eager and strong. Let them mount as on wings. "Seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated on the right hand of God. Set your mind on the things that are above." You can afford to think less about the fishing and more about the Master of all fishermen.

The divine surprises in Christian service too—how sweet and wonderful they are. Philip was sent to a desert place, and found an inquiring spirit there. We toil and toil and seem to "take nothing;" then of a sudden God opens the gateway of the dawn, and we see Jesus standing on the shore, as the disciples saw Him that morning by the Sea of Galilee. Blessed are the souls that believe and the eyes that see.

New Year Aims

BY REV. A. MESSLER QUICK

*If we would make, by words and deeds,
The opening year a blessing
To aching hearts and world-wide needs,
Where want and woe are pressing;
If we would by our cheer impart
A thrill of love and gladness
To make each bowed and heavy heart
Forget its hours of sadness,
Our words must be with heart-throbs knit,
And have a deeper meaning,
Than hollow words that quickly flit,
Like weird and senseless dreaming.*

*And we ourselves, for larger yield,
More beautiful unfolding,
Must make the soul a well-tilled field,
And Heaven must have the moulding;
And life must be no empty dream,
No idle indecision,
But active as the mountain stream,
With Heaven our sweetest vision,
Thus New Year aims will not be vain,
Nor life have fruitless ending,
If life eternal we shall gain,
With efforts thither bending.*

Giving and Receiving

BY ANNE GUILBERT MAHON

We are all familiar with persons who seek only to receive and who are constantly on the lookout for their own happiness, their own prosperity and their own advancement. We call them "selfish." They are neither happy themselves nor do they make others happy. Their lives are one-sided and overbalanced, for they think only of what they receive.

There are not so many, perhaps, whose lives balance on the other side and who seek in every way how they may give, but we do know some who are so absorbed in doing for others and in giving out of their own full store that they never think of receiving the blessings which others might bring to them and which might be theirs for the receiving.

Conversation is said by someone to be "a fair system of give and take," but how often does it degenerate into all "give" on one side and all "take" on the other? The woman who chatters incessantly of her own affairs and her own experiences, never pausing to give her friend a chance to speak, loses much herself. There is so much she might receive if she only stopped a moment to allow her friend the same privilege which she is monopolizing, and treated conversation as a fair exchange of ideas and thoughts.

"You have an errand to everyone you meet, or he has an errand to you," said Dr. J. R. Miller.

Not always do we have the errand. Sometimes it is the other way. The person we meet may be sent to us specially. Let us not forget to open our hearts to receive the blessing which may be sent to us!

To reach the highest ideals our lives must be balanced between giving and receiving, between doing and resting. If we are giving out our ideas and thoughts all the time, we exhaust our supply without giving ourselves time to receive. Life must be divided into periods of rest and activity, of giving and receiving. We can give out only what we have within us; that is what we receive. If we do not give ourselves time to receive thoughts and ideas, we shall soon exhaust our supply and be forced to pause until we shall have received afresh.

Giving and receiving, working and playing, action and rest—these are essential laws of life, which make for a well-balanced, well-rounded, successful life. Let us see to it that our lives are well balanced, that we take time to receive as well as to give.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL IN LONDON

By Warren Graham Partridge, D.D.

EVERY traveler who visits the city of London spends some time in St. Paul's Cathedral to study this wonderful triumph of architecture, and to inspect the tombs and monuments of many who achieved fame in English history. It is one of England's most famous halls of fame. It vies with Westminster Abbey in this respect, and appeals most powerfully to the English imagination and patriotism, because so many of her illustrious military and naval heroes are buried here.

St. Paul's Cathedral is the largest and most magnificent of all the Protestant churches in England, and it is the most notable among English buildings in modern times. In the very heart of the commercial center of London, conspicuously situated on a slight eminence, stands this most prominent building in the world's metropolis.

It has been the privilege of the writer to spend much time in this historic building on several different visits to England. Some English scholars claim that in Pagan times a temple of Diana occupied the site of St. Paul's Cathedral. When they were digging the foundations of the present edifice there were found several cinerary urns and other vessels, and many authorities in England believe that these indicate that a church had been built on this spot by the Christians in the time of the Romans, and that this church had been demolished by the Pagan Saxons. It is believed to have been restored by Ethelbert, King of Kent, about 610 A.D. This building was burned down in 961, and rebuilt within a year. It was again destroyed by fire in 1087, but a new edifice was at once begun, although it was not finished for nearly two hundred years.

This church, old St. Paul's, was 590 feet in length and longer than any church building now standing in England. In 1315 a timber spire, covered with lead, and 460 feet high, was added to the edifice. In 1516 the spire was destroyed by a great fire, which also greatly damaged the entire building.

Near the Cathedral once stood the celebrated Cross of St. Paul's, where sermons were preached, Papal bulls promulgated, heretics made to recant, and witches to confess. Here also the Pope's condemnation of Luther was proclaimed, when the great Cardinal Wolsey was present.

In the reign of Charles the First an extensive restoration of the edifice was begun, and a beautiful portico was built. But the famous structure was destroyed in the Great Fire of 1666. Many illustrious persons had been buried here. It had been the scene of Wycliffe's trial for heresy in 1337 and the burning of John Wycliffe's New Testament in 1527.

The present edifice was designed by the famous Sir Christopher Wren. It was begun in 1675, and was opened for divine service in 1697. But it was not completed until the year 1710. The great architect, Sir Christopher Wren, received a salary of only $1,000.00 per year during its erection. The cost of the building was about $4,000,000.00, and was raised, for the most part, by a tax on coal. So it was built by the state, and the nation was taxed to pay the bills.

St. Paul's resembles St. Peter's in Rome, although it is smaller. But both churches are built in the form of a Latin cross. St. Paul's is 500 feet long, and 118 feet broad, and the transept is 250 feet long. The outer dome from the pavement to the top of the cross is 364 feet in height. The majestic dome is considered the finest in the world. In size, St. Paul's is the fifth largest church in Christendom.

In front of the church stands the statue of Queen Anne, with England, France, Ireland and America at her feet. There is a flight of twenty-three marble steps ascending to the portals. We heard the famous music produced by a fine peal of twelve bells hung in the north campanile tower. The other tower contains the largest bell in England, called "Great Paul," which weighs more than sixteen tons. The church is so hemmed in by streets and houses, that it is very difficult to gain an adequate conception of its vastness and majesty. The famous Lantern above the great dome supports an immense ball, surmounted by a cross; the ball and the cross, we were told, weigh 8,962 pounds. The ball is six feet in diameter and can hold ten or twelve people.

When we entered the Cathedral for the first time we found the interior very imposing from the vastness and beauty of its proportions. As we walked along the aisles of this national Temple of Fame we were profoundly impressed by the great number of monuments of celebrated Englishmen, chiefly naval and military heroes. For instance, here is the Crimean Cavalry Monument in memory of the officers and men of the British cavalry who fell in the Crimean war from 1854 to 1856. Here is also a costly monument in the form of a sarcophagus, the tomb of Major-General Charles George Gordon, killed at Khartoum, Egypt, in 1885. The monument to the Duke of Wellington is very striking. The bronze figure of Wellington rests upon a lofty sarcophagus, overshadowed by a rich marble canopy with twelve Corinthian columns. Above are colossal groups of Valor and Cowardice, Truth and Falsehood.

Here also we saw tombs and monuments of such celebrities as Sir Joshua Reynolds, General Napier, Admiral Lord Duncan, who defeated the Dutch in the naval battle of Camperdown; Henry Hallam, Dr. Samuel Johnson, Henry Hart Milman, Reginald Heber, John Howard, Admiral Earl Howe, Admiral Lord Collingwood, Turner, the celebrated painter; Admiral Lord Nelson, Marquis Cornwallis, General Sir John Moore, Sir Christopher Wren, Sir Arthur Sullivan and many others. The tombs we saw in the crypt, while the monuments adorn the interior of the Cathedral. In the crypt, which extends the whole length of the edifice, we saw the famous tablet on the wall over the tomb of the celebrated architect of St. Paul's, Sir Christopher Wren, bearing the inscription, "If thou seek his monument, look about thee."

It would be impossible in this brief article to describe adequately the splendors of the paintings, frescoes, statues, mosaics, marbles, stained glass windows, immense organ, stone carvings, gilding, and other decorations and ornamentations which enrich this great cathedral. But marble statues of the Church Fathers, and colored mosaics of the Apostles, Evangelists, Prophets, and frescoes and paintings of angels and Biblical scenes, all combine to make this one of the richest and most resplendent interiors in the world.

It was the writer's privilege on one visit to be present on a Sunday when the Lord Mayor of London appeared in state. The great Cathedral was packed with people, and the pomp and gay trappings of the Mayor and his gorgeous retinue reminded one of the magnificent pageants of the Middle Ages. The music was most inspiring, and the service was beautiful, as the vast congregation took part in the services.

We went one day into the wonderful Whispering Gallery, to reach which we were compelled to climb 260 stone steps. The gallery is famous for its remarkable echo. A friend uttered a slight whisper by the wall, on one side of the gallery, and it was distinctly audible to the writer, who held his ear near the wall on the opposite side of the gallery. This light whisper had traveled a distance of 108 feet directly across the gallery, or 160 feet round the semi-circle. Then we climbed up a flight of 118 steps to the Stone Gallery, which runs round the foot of the outer dome, enclosed by a stone parapet. From this gallery one has a commanding view of the city of London. But we climbed many more steps, and at last reached the dizzy height of the outer Golden Gallery, above the dome and at the foot of the Lantern, to which a winding staircase ascends in the inside of the roof. The ball of the lantern is forty-five feet higher. We had to stop here in our ascent, but we had climbed altogether 615 steps from the tessellated pavement of the Cathedral. The view of the city from the Golden Gallery is wonderful, and fully repays anyone for the long and hard ascent.

When one beholds the magnificence of this historic pile of architecture, and studies its tombs, monuments and art treasures, he can understand how this edifice appeals to the imagination, reverence and patriotism of the English people. Its destruction would be an irreparable loss not only to Great Britain, but to Christian civilization throughout the entire world.

The Gift That Abides

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

One of the greatest tragedies in life is that in which the chief part is played by a man who has given his life and energy to the accumulation of vast riches, and who has found at the end the vanity of it all; or in which the leading part is taken by a woman who has given all for the satisfaction of fine clothes and social position, and who has seen her admirers vanish in the twinkling of an eye. A man of the world of many centuries ago found it to be true that so far as worldly fame and power and possession are concerned, all is vanity. And yet how many millions to-day will not profit by the wisdom he gained after his long life of vain seeking!

Of silver and gold Peter had none for the crippled man, but such as he had he gave him. And what was it that he had? Simply the gift of full, free life. Only that! But what is there on the earth that can equal that gift?

The happiest woman I have ever known was one who had nothing of gold, but she did have a trusting life. Her life was "hid with Christ in God." Her prayers, though simple, were a very revelation of heaven. Was there any gift possible to her that could excel that gift of the love of God!

"If I had only known!" is the cry of thousands of men and women when death comes. "If I had only known that there is nothing in the world that counts but Christ!" A great theologian, dying, cried out, "I have but one passion: it is He, it is He!" He had found the secret of a happy life—and of a happy death.

WITH OUR MISSIONARY COLPORTERS

In the Puget Sound Country

Rev. Francis E. Smith is a colporter evangelist working under the direction of the American Tract Society in the Puget Sound Country. He has distributed a large quantity of Christian literature in this field, and has done most effective work in reaching the homes of the people who dwell in this region.

A recent report from him tells of his work in the island of San Juan, where he came into contact with the men employed in the salmon industry. He says:

"Recently I visited some of the islands in the San Juan group lying in the north end of the Puget Sound on the south side of the Gulf of Georgia.

"For seventeen years the island of San Juan was under military rule, the British and American soldiers both occupying the island in separate camps until the year 1872, when the arbitrators finally settled the boundary line in favor of the United States.

"Ministers of the Gospel have come and have gone, but to-day the religious life of the people seems to be at a low ebb.

"While on this island I preached five times, and promised to revisit the people again at some future time.

"By using my voice and the printed page of Gospel truth furnished by the American Tract Society I hope to win many souls to Christ in these out-of-the-way places."

Among the Slavs

For several years John Martinco has served as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Martinco has worked especially among the Slavic population and his ministry to the spiritual needs of these foreign-speaking people has been very effective and far-reaching. In a recent report he writes in part as follows:

"The last month I worked in Pittsburgh, Homestead, Braddock, Duquesne and vicinity, visiting from house to house. I had some striking experiences during the month.

"At Homestead, Pa., as soon as I entered one house the wife began to swear and to curse her husband. I asked her why she swore so much at her husband. She replied that it was because he had quit his work at the factory and had rented a pool room and since that time had done little else than to drink and to abuse her. I tried to pacify her, but it seemed impossible to quiet her. Then I asked her if she ever prayed for her husband, and she answered, 'Pray for him! No! I never did such a thing,' and then she began to use more profanity. But I said to her, 'You are really responsible yourself for your domestic trouble, for you do not speak to your husband in the right way.' Then I had a long talk with her, and finally she acknowledged her fault, and said she would try to do her duty toward her husband.

"In another home in Alleghany, a wife told me of the suffering she had to endure. Her husband very seldom gave her his pay, but would spend it in the saloon and then would beat her and the children. Her nineteen-year-old son ran away from home because he could not stand the bad treatment of his father, and she did not know where he had gone. Even the younger children were scattered, but the wife was powerless. She wept like a child as she told me her troubles. I told her that there was only One that could help her, and that was Almighty God, and urged her to pray to Him in the name of Jesus Christ. So she promised me that she would do this.

"At Hazelwood, a suburb of Pittsburgh, I had a conversation with two women, one of whom bought a Bible only a short time ago, and now she urged her friend to buy one, too. She said that she had never read anything like it before. Both of them were much impressed when I spoke to them from the third chapter of the Gospel of St. John. The result was that I disposed of another Bible and several tracts.

"I have had several other interesting experiences, but I must conclude this report. Please remember me and this work in your prayers."

Reaching All Classes

For many years Rev. Samuel Mueller has been circulating Christian literature among the people in the State of Oregon. His work as a missionary colporter brings him into contact with all kinds and conditions of people, and he shows great tact in adapting the Gospel message to the different individuals whom he meets. He writes:

"One day I met a man driving a flock of sheep on the road. I accosted him, and finding out that he was unsaved, I said to him, 'Whenever you see a sheep, remember that Jesus died as the Lamb of God upon the Cross to save your soul from death.'

"At Troutdale I distributed tracts among the Italian truck gardeners. At the depot in Vancouver I distributed tracts to the men working in a section gang, and also among the passengers on a train.

"At Yakolt I tried to give the Gospel message to two bartenders in a saloon. I found they were very hard to reach.

"Between Sandy and Bull Run I visited a camp of wood-choppers. I spoke to a middle-aged Austrian whom I met on the road. He took my words kindly, and said, 'You are the first man to speak to me about religion.'

"I distributed some Chinese tracts to the workers in three hop-yards, rented by Chinese. I noticed that one read his tract diligently for quite a while. What a happy sight it was for me!

"I visited some American and Swedish homesteaders living eighteen miles from Molalla up in the foothills of the Cascade Mountains at an elevation of 2,460 feet above the level of the sea. Not only did I enjoy the bracing air and beautiful landscape, but I rejoiced to meet some Christian people, who received me cordially, and said, 'We seldom have anybody visit us with such good admonition and advice as you have given us.' These encouraging words fully rewarded me for the long trip up the hills.

"I met two young men while crossing a bridge, and my conversation with them led to the question, 'Who will build a bridge for our souls over the last deep River of Death?' I pointed them to the Cross and the Crucified One and exalted Him as my personal Saviour and the Redeemer of my soul.

"At Canby I spoke with a fifteen-year-old boy who was laid up sick by a fall from a tree in which he came near breaking his neck. I pleaded with him very earnestly to accept Christ. His parents are very dear consecrated Christians and are anxious to see their son saved."

In Porto Rico

A missionary colporter in Porto Rico named Juan Sanchez is circulating Christian literature in the Spanish language among the people of that island. He writes:

"I have had the opportunity of visiting many families to whom I have preached the way of eternal life. In some places I held Gospel meetings in which many people heard with pleasure the message of the Gospel. Yet there is a good deal of fanaticism which constitutes a great obstacle to my work. There is also a good deal of spiritualism. There is much need of prayer and effort for the spiritual progress of this country, and we bespeak your help."

CASSANDRA'S CHRYSANTHEMUMS

By Lloyd Logan

HE twilight was sinking into darkness. The flickering fire cast its wavering shadows over the old familiar library furniture. A peculiar sadness permeated the very atmosphere. It was the end of a rainy day in the late spring. Even the fire seemed incongruous.

From the depths of an armchair Cassandra gazed into the glowing coals at a panorama of memory pictures. The stillness was broken only by the ticking of the great clock on the stairs and the echo vibrating through the long hall. A window rattled, just as it used to do, when she was a little girl.

It was a dear old house. For forty years it had been Cassandra's home. Her father had built it for his bride. It had imbedded her parents' personality. "Homes are as long in maturing as the people that live in them," someone has wisely observed. Most of the trees her father had planted, the shrubs, the flower-beds and the old-fashioned fountain expressed his idea of beauty.

A troupe of children, her brothers and sisters, had danced merrily through its winding halls and many rooms. As girls and boys they had had their parties; then they had grown into college men and women, and on holidays the old house was thronged with jolly college friends.

All of these experiences had been Cassandra's extreme delight and she had been the confidante of many desperate love affairs and various business ventures. By proxy, as it were, she had taken part in life's activities. For Cassandra, whisper it gently and softly, was a cripple. She could not walk very far, even with two crutches.

One by one these younger brothers and sisters had left for homes of their own, returning less and less frequently, as their families and individual responsibilities grew. A withering blast of loneliness swept over Cassandra's soul. Even time had quietly but surely erased the youthful beauty of her face, and touched the chestnut hair with gray.

She stifled a sob. There were faltering steps and voices in the hall.

"Yes, my dear wife," her father was saying, "the golden wedding was a fitting close to our life within these four walls. If it was not for Cassandra we would never leave its shelter and comfort."

"Yes," her mother's sigh pierced the inner recesses of Cassandra's heart more cruelly than a sword's point, because she must live and bear the wound. "But it seems to me that some other way might be arranged. Cassie loves the home, too. We are old people. Both of us are almost eighty. We at best have only a little time to wait."

"That is the reason, my dear, the very necessity for our selling now, while I am still capable of handling my affairs." There was the echo of the energy of years long past in the old man's voice.

"Little Cassie will never marry. She is our responsibility. We must sell this home and buy a house small enough, so that the income will support her. Poor little Cassie!"

The vibration of the tender sympathy, that had been her unfailing shield, sighed and sobbed through these words, "Poor little Cassie!"

"Poor little Cassie," her mother repeated.

Strange to say these words came as a shock to her of whom they were spoken. She shrank even further into the recesses of her chair.

Never in all her life had she heard them before. From the time that she was the tiniest child her father would say cheerily:

"I do not know what we would do without Cassandra. She is the life of the house, positively the hub of the wheel. The children are the spokes. I guess I am the rim," and then he would laugh, for this was a great joke. "But we would all go to pieces if it was not for Cassandra."

And she had believed it.

"You see Cassandra is a Leonard." Her parents were passing down the hall into the conservatory. Cassandra caught the glimmer of undaunted courage, leaned forward, and listened intently. "She could never be submerged," her father continued with pride. "She must be the queen of her own hearthstone. The spirit that dwells within the pitiful, misshapen, home, was made to rule. We must guard it as the secret of our lives and she must never know that she is the cause of our selling the old home."

She buried her face in her hands, and wept. "Poor little Cassie, pitiful, misshapen—the cause of selling the old home."

The words repeated themselves over and over. Except for her the old people would live out their lives amid the surroundings that had grown so dear, through long association. That the alternative was inevitable, was pure, poignant tragedy. To bear your own burdens may require fortitude; but to be a burden is unutterably crushing. Again she heard her father's voice. They were going up the stairs for the night.

"I have always been so proud of being old. I do not understand the shame that some people feel about the advancing years. It always seems to me that in retrospection I see a life full of events, with sorrows, troubles, difficulties, work, as well as happiness and success; I feel that I have done something to have successfully weathered the gale, and still to be able to say that it is worth while."

The sky was gray with the first appearance of the morning light, before Cassandra roused herself. Then she quietly went to her room. She had thrashed it all out, and a sense of serenity rested over her soul.

She attired herself in a fresh muslin dress. She gathered a bowl of early roses. These she was arranging on the breakfast table, when her father and mother came in.

Events followed in quick succession. The home was sold. A small house was bought in the suburbs. Only such furniture was retained as they needed for the small house. All of this required activity, and they had no time for unhappiness.

It was comparatively easy for Cassandra to determine that she would be happy in spite of adverse circumstances. She found that it was not the excitement of the crises that furnished the crucial test, but that it was the long, steady pull that would count.

The little house was small. It was hard for her to adjust herself to it. There was in all of the surroundings a desolation and lack of improvement, that made it apparent that the house had been uninhabited for a long time. Even the paths in the garden and lawn were overgrown with weeds.

With undaunted courage she braced herself. She was a human soul! The part that felt, and knew, and thought, was as much of an entity as if its home had been beautiful and redolent with health. She felt that she was of as much use and importance as any other human being, and had as much right to demand of happiness its quotient.

Just how this was to become a practical fact she could not fathom. With a smiling countenance she looked about her and determined to do the next thing possible. At least the spot on which she lived could be made beautiful.

Cassandra had never before aggressively taken the initiative. The lawn was cleared, weeded, and, seeing that it was well watered, there was enough grass to spread. The flower beds were put in order. Cassandra could not walk far. But she was capable of doing a great deal of work in one spot.

"Isn't it too late for summer flowers, daughter?" asked the father; "what do you think of planting?"

"I had thought of chrysanthemums. I will start them now for fall."

So the chrysanthemums grew. Whenever Cassandra's spirit flagged, she turned the drift of her thoughts into active work. No chrysanthemums ever had had the care and attention that those received.

In the fall they blossomed, and such blossoms, huge perfect specimens! To Cassandra they spoke personally. It pleased her fancy to think that these magnificent, nodding blooms, of white and yellow, symbolized the natural outcome of work and conquered tears.

It made her very happy. She smiled spontaneously. Her father smiled also, and a smile was reflected on her mother's face.

These chrysanthemums were the delight of Cassandra and the pride of her father. He was quite exultant as he displayed them to his friends. The little house was so attractive in its bower of blooms that on Sunday afternoon it became the rendezvous of the old-time friends. It was the wonder of the neighborhood. Passers-by would stop and exclaim:

"Notice that one! Did you ever see anything so fine as that?"

A little child in the neighborhood had died. Cassandra did not know the bereaved ones, but she sent an armful of the white chrysanthemums. There was enough to completely cover the poor, homely, little casket. The memory of those wonderful flowers glowed in the mother's heart for many a long year.

A golden wedding was the occasion for sending an enormous bunch of yellow chrysanthemums, arranged with long trailing sprays of asparagus fern and decorative golden rod. The golden rod was some of that which she had cultivated in a corner in which nothing else would grow.

So the flowers went into a varied assortment of homes, and for widely diversified occasions. Their fame went about and abroad in the land. The lovely personality of the giver seemed to lend an added charm, many persons whose names she did not even know spoke of her flowers and of her with love and respect.

All things pass away. The winter came and the chrysanthemums faded. But one day the door bell rang, and a large express package was brought into the room where Cassandra and her father and mother were sitting by the fire.

"My dear, this is for you," her father said, as he cut the twine. "What have you been sending for?"

Cassandra laughed. "They are books on the culture of chrysanthemums. I am taking a course. I thought that next year I would scientifically bring them to perfection."

HOW REVIVALS SHOULD BEGIN

By Rev. Howard W. Pope

THE story of the poor widow and her cruse of oil which is recorded in 2 Kings 4:1-7, presents a picture of the Christian Church at the present day. The natural hindrances to the growth and prosperity of the Church are many, but too often by compromises with the world the Church has been shorn of her strength, and has even lost the respect of humanity. In such a plight the Church is a poor, pitiable object. What can she do? What has she left? Nothing remains save her capacity to know God, and to be filled with the Holy Ghost. That is her hope and her only hope, for she is never so poor but that God has a few faithful souls who are still in open communion with Him, and through whom He can revive the Church, and win converts from the world.

Here then we see how revivals should begin. Gather together the empty vessels, and wait upon God for the filling of the Spirit. That is the way Paul began at Ephesus. As soon as he arrived and talked with the disciples, and especially as soon as he heard them pray, he knew that they were strangers to the Holy Spirit. By a few well-directed questions he brought out the confession that they had never heard that there was a Holy Spirit. Then he instructed them, and together they waited upon God until His power came upon those twelve men, and with these few Spirit-filled disciples Paul began a work which turned the city upside down, emptied the great temple of Diana of her worshipers, and threw the idol makers so completely out of business that they called a great mass meeting to see what could be done to stop the spread of Christianity.

I have read that a pleasure party was once sailing down the Niagara River just above the Falls. They were so far above the Rapids that no one thought of danger. The band was playing, the people were dancing, and all were having a gala time. Suddenly the pilot noticed that the steamer did not obey her rudder promptly. He saw at once that the current was stronger than he supposed, and he put the boat about immediately. But as he watched the trees on the bank, he saw to his surprise and horror that they were not making any headway. He summoned the captain at once and pointed out the danger. The captain's face turned pale as he ordered the firemen to crowd the furnace with coal. They did so, but still the steamer only held her own. Then the captain ordered the men to put on wood, and they smashed up boxes, barrels and furniture to increase the heat under the boiler. By this time the passengers had learned of the danger, and all were watching the banks anxiously to see if they made any headway. The flames roared and crackled, the engine worked furiously, but not a foot did the vessel gain, and all on board could easily see that unless something more could be done their doom was sealed.

Suddenly a clear voice was heard above the din, "Pour on oil! Pour on oil!" The captain recognized at once the value of the suggestion, and rolling a barrel of oil to the furnace they swashed in the head and in a moment the firemen were throwing buckets of oil on the furnace fires. Instantly a change was seen. The flames leaped and roared, the furnace became red hot, the vessel creaked and groaned under the strain of the mighty machinery, and in a few moments the anxious crowd saw that they were gaining on the current. The vessel and its precious cargo were saved, but no power on earth could have done it had it not been for the oil.

Even so the Church at times runs so near the danger point that she loses her power to resist the tides of worldliness, which are ever bearing her downward. Instead of being aggressive, she simply tries to hold her own, and even that is not accomplished. She not only has no conversions, but she is constantly losing the members she has. She resorts to worldly methods. Possibly she engages a preacher who attracts a crowd with sensational sermons, but when the crowd has gone the Church finds that nothing has been accomplished except to expose the people of God to ridicule and reproach.

What can a church do in such a condition? There is only one way to save it, and that is pour on the oil of God's grace. Gather together the few empty vessels that remain, and wait on God until He comes in mighty power and restores the Church to her rightful position in the community. It has been done again and again. It can be done, and, please God, it shall be done by many a poor and feeble church this year. Does your church need a revival, my dear reader? Here is one sure way by which it may be brought about.

This story of the widow's cruse of oil also illustrates the unusual way which God often employs to do His work. The usual way of obtaining oil is to plant a seed which in six or eight years grows into an olive tree, and begins to produce fruit. The roots draw from the earth and the leaves draw from the air the various elements which, combined in certain proportions, make the olives. The usual process of gathering these elements together by the tree requires several months, but in this instance God ordered the different elements of which the air and earth is full, to unite instantly in that little cruse which the widow held in her hand. The usual method requires several months, but it was just as easy for God to combine these elements in an instant as to follow the slow process of growth on the olive tree. The slow method is just as marvelous as the quick method, and both are wholly impossible to anyone but God. We think of the quick process as a miracle, and see nothing wonderful in the slow method because it is so common, but a moment's thought will show us that the one method is just as easy for God as the other.

Even so we think that the way for a person to be saved is to be born in a Christian home, to receive instruction in the Bible and to be taught to pray, and when he is old enough we look for his conversion. This is the usual way, but let us remember that God is not confined to the usual ways, but has an endless variety of methods of accomplishing the same object.

Recently several instances of conversion have come to my knowledge, each of which was entirely different from the other, and all of them unlike the usual way of conversion. One of them was the case of a young man who was lost in the Rocky Mountains with a party of men; what added to the danger was the fact that forest fires sprang up and surrounded them so that the searching parties sent out to hunt for them could not reach them. For seven days they had not a particle of food. Fortunately, they had some tea with them, and this was all the nourishment they had.

One night as they lay on the ground, one of the party asked this young man what he thought of the prospect. He shook his head and said that he saw little hope of ever getting out alive. Then the man inquired, "Have you any hope for the life to come?" "No, sir; I have not a particle of hope." The man said nothing more, but as the young fellow realized what it meant to die without Christ, there came into his heart a longing to be saved. He went into the woods a little and, kneeling down, he promised God that if He would spare his life he would devote it to God's service.

That night a heavy shower fell which extinguished the fires, and they were soon found by the searching party and brought into camp so weak that they could hardly walk. For two days they fed them on water in which a cracker had been dipped and soaked a little, giving them nothing stronger because they could not bear it. As soon as he reached home the young man went to his church prayer meeting and there stood up and confessed Christ, and to-day he is a preacher of the Gospel. Out of it came a revival.

Let us not be discouraged because we cannot get all the unsaved ones into a church to hear the Gospel, but let us remember that God has other ways we know not of, and pray on in hope everlasting.

Cassandra's Chrysanthemums

So with intelligence and care in the following spring the garden and much of the land were devoted to these flowers. Long beds containing many varieties bloomed in profusion. All this required constant effort. Cassandra felt the necessity and importance of her work. Her father aided her and was grateful, as he grew more feeble, that his work still counted for something. Many happy hours they spent together, working up and down the long beds.

Charitable institutions and churches received the flowers graciously, but individuals refused to accept them without remuneration. Strangers asked to be allowed to buy. Letters came from nearby towns. So, perforce, Cassandra was constrained to sell her chrysanthemums.

This added another avenue of interest. It laid the foundation of a future competence, which would have grown large quite rapidly, but there was always some little convenience or some added comfort for her father and mother that she wished to buy.

"You know, my dear," her father said, smiling, one bleak December day, when the ground was covered with snow. "I see your chrysanthemums blooming everywhere. They are reincarnated in mother's lounging robe and my choice books! Why, from the attic to the cellar, in some form or other, they are everywhere. I do not know what we would do without Cassandra, the chrysanthemum of our lives."

Cassandra gave with a glowing heart, filled with the wonder of it. For the glory of these fall flowers was greater than the modest violets of spring, or the many flowers of summer. She realized, as never before, that, "A garden is a mystical place of spiritual repose, stillness, peace, refreshment." She could say with the poet:

"We labor,

At the task of the deep-eyed dreamers, that the mighty dream come true

When the real and the ideal are welded forever, and then
In the last Rose-dawn's full flower, the Master shall pay his men."

Make This an Evangelistic Year

As we stand upon the threshold of the New Year, the question doubtless arises in our minds as to the character of the year that lies before us. We know not what the future has in store, but we ought to aim to make this year a better one than any that have preceded it. As Christian workers, especially, we ought to have a definite purpose before our minds, which will help us to accomplish larger and better results in the work of the Kingdom.

There are many directions in which we may turn our efforts for the advancement of the Kingdom, but perhaps there is no more fruitful line of activity than that of evangelistic work. Let us then seek to make this an evangelistic year. Let us bend our energies to the proclamation of the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ and unite our efforts in the endeavor to win souls to allegiance to Him who is the Captain of our salvation.

Some men are distinctly called to the work of evangelism, and the world owes much to those who have labored in this special field of Christian activity.

But while not all are called to be evangelists in the special sense of that word, yet every Christian is called upon to do evangelistic work. And the progress of the Kingdom depends, humanly speaking, upon the extent to which Christians everywhere engage in evangelistic service.

One of the religious magazines has proposed a "Win-One Campaign," to be carried on during the ten days immediately preceding the coming Easter Sunday, which falls this year on April 23, 1916.

It has been estimated that 4,000,000 souls would be led to Christ if every Church and Sunday School would participate in this united effort. It means simply direct, personal, evangelistic work of a kind that every Sunday School teacher and officer and every church member should be willing to undertake for the extension of the Kingdom.

But let us not wait until the ten days before Easter to begin this beneficent work. Let us start with the New Year to seek to win others to Christ. The evangelization of the world will be finally accomplished not by mass movements, but by the use of direct, personal, evangelistic methods, such as the Master Himself employed in winning His first disciples.

So let us strive to make this entire year an evangelistic year, and in so doing we may rest assured that we shall find it a fruitful and a blessed year not only in our own lives, but in the lives of those whom we are the means of bringing into the joy and light of the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Tracts for Free Distribution

The usefulness of tracts as an agency for effective Christian work has been established beyond question. Multitudes of pastors, evangelists, missionaries, personal workers, Sunday School teachers, mission workers and other Christian toilers have testified to the helpfulness of tracts in their work.

The American Tract Society is always ready to aid Christian workers, so far as its means will allow, by furnishing them with tracts suitable for their particular needs. Ordinarily the Society makes a grant of one-half the cost to all those who are engaged in regular Christian work—that is, for the sum of one dollar the Society will give any Christian worker two dollars' worth of tracts.

In special cases, however, where the recipient is unable to pay even a part of the cost, the Society will make a full grant of the entire value of the tracts.

As the Society is desirous of circulating a large number of tracts during the coming months, applications for grants will be gladly received, and all reasonable appeals will be answered, so far as the Society's resources will permit.

In applying for such grants, kindly specify the kind of tracts that are desired, the uses to which they are to be put, and specify whether a whole or a half grant is desired. If a whole grant is requested, please be sure to explain why the applicant is unable to pay any part of the cost.

It is urged that applications be made as promptly as possible, so that there may be an immediate and wide distribution of tract literature throughout the land. All applications should be addressed to the General Secretary, American Tract Society, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York.

Spanish and Portuguese Publications

In view of the interest that has been aroused in Christian work for Latin America, it may be stated that the American Tract Society has published and circulated in the Spanish and Portuguese languages a total of 536,873 volumes, and during the past fifteen years has printed and circulated tracts and leaflets in these same languages to the number of 810,241 copies.

Using these figures as a basis for average, it is estimated that since the Society began its work it has printed and circulated 5,398,319 copies of books, leaflets and tracts in the Spanish and Portuguese languages, the majority of these being in Spanish. In this total are included 126,000 copies of Spanish hymnals. Manzanas de Oro, the beautiful little weekly paper for the Spanish-speaking children, has reached a total circulation of 10,160,400 copies, and the number of its subscribers is increasing.

The grand total of the Society's publications in the Spanish and Portuguese languages thus amounts to 15,558,719 copies, their estimated value being $700,000.

A Good Suggestion for the Railroads

A vigorous letter has been addressed to the presidents of railroads operating in New York State by Mr. William H. Anderson, the State Superintendent of the New York Anti-Saloon League, urging that all the railroads adopt the temperance policy already adopted by one or two large railroads, and banish liquor from every train.

This is surely a good suggestion, and it is to be hoped that ere long every railroad throughout the land will commit itself to this policy, which is in line with the most advanced sentiment and which accords with the rule of practically all railroads, prohibiting their employes not only from using liquor themselves, but from frequenting places where liquor is sold.

"America for Christ"

This was the inspiring watchword of the annual meeting of the National Reform Association, recently held in Pittsburgh. The objects aimed at by the association are worthy of the consideration and active support of all Christian citizens, for they include the recognition of Jesus Christ as the Civil Ruler of this nation and of all nations, the promotion in our national life of such laws and such administration of law as will be in accord with the expressed will of the Supreme Ruler, the overthrow of the crimes and treasons of Mormonism, the suppression of the liquor and white slave traffics, the recognition of the Bible in the public schools, and the better observance of the Lord's Day.

What Is Consecration?

Mark 12:28-34.

T. Dec. 28. Consecrated youth. 1 Sam. 16:1-13.
W. Dec. 29. Consecrated manhood. Isa. 6:1-3.
T. Dec. 30. Consecrated service. Acts 13:1-5.
F. Dec. 31. A way set apart. Heb. 10:19-21.
S. Jan. 1. Consecrated time. Eph. 5:8-20.

Once each month during the New Year upon which we have entered we are to consider the subject of consecration.

The Meaning of Consecration

Doubtless our readers have studied the meaning of the word consecration over and over again. Yet its significance can never be fully comprehended, for it is one of those words whose meaning is exhaustless.

Consecration may be defined as a setting apart to sacred and holy uses. In this sense we may speak even of inanimate things as being consecrated to divine use. Thus the vessels in the Jewish temple were consecrated to God's service, and so to-day we speak of the consecration of a church building to the worship of the Almighty.

Consecration is a solemn dedication to the Lord. It is a giving to Jehovah of something that we prize and that we deem a fitting offering to the Most High.

Consecration means the whole-hearted devotion of ourselves and all our talents to the worship and service of God.

We ought, first of all, to consecrate ourselves to Christ, our Saviour and Lord. He rightfully claims our supreme allegiance. When we consecrate ourselves to Christ, we also yield ourselves to God our Heavenly Father, for Christ said, "I and my Father are one."

But one who has consecrated himself wholly to Christ will find that he bears a new relation to all things else. Consecration to Christ will inevitably lead us to the consecration of ourselves to the uplift of humanity, for our Master taught that service for others was an essential part of the Christian faith.

The Need for Consecration

This is to a large extent a superficial age, and what the world needs is consecrated lives to bring it to a realizing sense of the eternal verities.

The Christian Church needs consecrated men, women and children who shall lift it above the plane of trivial service and make it the strongest possible factor in the work of the redemption of the world.

Our country needs consecrated men and women to keep it true to the highest ideals and to lead it into the paths of highest service in the new internationalism, which will alone rescue it from the abyss of misery into which selfish aims and interests are threatening to plunge it.

Why Join the Church?

Ephesians 3:8-21.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Jan. 3. For its fellowship. Eph. 1:1-12.
T. Jan. 4. For its strength. Matt. 16:13-19.
W. Jan. 5. For its service. Matt. 20:20-28.
T. Jan. 6. For its testimony. Eph. 4:11-23.
F. Jan. 7. For its truth. 1 Tim. 3:14-16.
S. Jan. 8. For its ideals. Phil. 2:1-11.

This is a vital and important topic. Several excellent answers to the question, "Why join the church?" may be found in the Daily Bible Readings. Other helpful considerations will suggest themselves to those who will give this subject careful thought.

For the Master's Sake

The church is the body of Christ. He founded it and gave His life for it. Therefore we ought to join the church for the sake of the Master. If we really love Him, we ought also to love His church.

We ought to join the church in obedience to Christ's command, for certain of His commands can only be properly carried out by those who are united in the membership of His church. The administration of the sacraments which He enjoined and the evangelization of the world which He urged upon His disciples can only be accomplished successfully through the agency of a united body of believers.

For the Sake of the Church

We ought to join the church for its own sake. The Christian church is the most valuable asset which Christianity has to-day. It is the greatest factor for good that exists anywhere in the world. Such an institution deserves our support and should have our closest sympathy and co-operation.

Actual membership is the final test of our real attitude toward this noble and divinely blessed organization. For the sake of what the church has already done, for the sake of what it is doing now, and for the sake of what it may do in the years to come, we ought to throw in our lot with it and give to it our best talents and service.

For Our Brother's Sake

Let us think for a moment of what this world would be without the Christian church. Think of what the church is doing, not simply for its own members but for the benefit of humanity in general. Think of the wonderful charitable, benevolent and missionary work which it carries on and by which it ministers to both the physical and the spiritual needs of our brother man both at home and abroad. For our brother's sake, therefore, let us join the church, that we may thereby better minister to the needs of our neighbor and help in establishing a spirit of far-reaching brotherhood that shall benefit all mankind.

For Our Own Sake

We ought to join the church because we can be better Christians inside of the church than outside of it. We ought to join the church not only because of what we can give to it but because of what that church can give to us. We need the help, the comfort, the strength, the inspiration, the fellowship and the many other blessings that follow in the train of church membership.

How to Work with Others

Isaiah 41:1-7.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Jan. 10. Comparative offerings. Ex. 25:1-9.
T. Jan. 11. Building together. Neh. 4:1-18.
W. Jan. 12. Effect of envy. Num. 12:1-10.
T. Jan. 13. Mutual humility. Rom. 15:1-7.
F. Jan. 14. Mutual respect. 1 Pet. 5:1-7.
S. Jan. 15. Use your gift. Rom. 12:1-8.

This is an exceedingly practical topic. It bears on all phases of human life, for man is a social being and the measure of his success is usually found in his ability to work with others.

In the Home

In order to have a happy home it is absolutely essential that the different members of the family work harmoniously with each other. It is essential that each one learn to bear and to forbear. Consideration for each other's welfare must be the ruling principle, and love and unselfishness must be the controlling factors.

In Social Service

Social service is one of the distinguishing characteristics of this age. Effective social service calls for the largest possible measure of co-operation between those who are working for the attainment of high and noble ends.

To work well with others we must have confidence in each other. If we are called upon to be leaders, then we must be brave and courageous. If it falls to our lot to be simply followers, then let us follow with loyalty and devotion those who are selected as the leaders of the work in which we are engaged.

Co-operation is one of the great key-notes of success in all social service work, as it is in other fields of human endeavor. A daily newspaper, as some one has pointed out, is a wonderful example of the result of working together. So in accomplishing the uplift of humanity, which is the most important enterprise in which we can possibly engage, it is important for us to employ the principle of co-operation to the utmost.

In the Church

The secret of success in church work is found in working with others and with Christ.

There are often great difficulties to be overcome in mountain climbing, especially in regions where snow and ice abound. But the more difficult the ascent, the more closely do the mountaineers bind themselves together so that they may help each other over the hard places. So in church work the more closely we are bound together by the ties of Christian love, the more successfully shall we overcome the trials and difficulties that must be met in every church.

We cannot work effectively with others if we yield to the spirit of criticism and fault-finding. Idle gossip is very detrimental to the spirit of true fellowship that is essential to successful church work.

Amusement That Is Worth While

Ecclesiastes 3:1-15.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Jan. 17. Bodily exercise. 1 Tim. 4:7-11.
T. Jan. 18. Song. Jas. 5:13; Ps. 100.
W. Jan. 19. Orchestra. 1 Chron. 15:16, 28.
T. Jan. 20. Nature-study. Ps. 19:1-6.
F. Jan. 21. Literature. Eph. 3:1-13.
S. Jan. 22. Sociability. John 12:1-8.

This is a vital subject, especially for young people. Every Christian young man and young woman is entitled to enjoy the wholesome pleasures of life, but those amusements that are questionable or harmful should be avoided entirely.

Communion with Nature

One form of amusement that is surely worth while is found in communion with nature. There are many out-of-door sports that are both health giving and mentally uplifting. When we draw near to nature's heart we also come close to the heart of Nature's God. By cultivating an acquaintance with the birds, trees, plants and flowers in God's great out-of-doors, we secure a certain amount of physical exercise and we learn something of the wisdom and skill of the Creator of this universe.

Entering the World of Music

In the world of music we may find amusement that is of the choicest variety. The use of song is a means of recreation which appeals to all classes and conditions of people. Young and old alike may find in music a pastime of which they will never weary.

In this age we are most highly favored in the variety and the perfection of the musical instruments that are available for our use. The great composers of a century ago did not possess as fine a piano as may be found in some of the most modest homes of to-day. And the clever devices for the reproduction of music which are everywhere at hand to-day are the product of comparatively recent years.

Reading for Recreation

Pre-eminent among the worth-while amusements stands the privilege of reading. "Books are friends which every man may call his own," and in the enjoyment of these friends many people find their greatest delights.

In reading for recreation we will find it profitable to vary the kind of literature that we use. Let us read not only the best fiction but the best biographies, the best essays and the best histories. Sometimes young people are under a mistaken impression and fancy, for example, that essays are always dry reading. But there are essays, like those of Thomas B. Macaulay, that are as interesting as a romance; there are biographies that are more fascinating than any fiction, and there are histories that will rivet our closest attention, if only we turn to them with sympathetic interest.

Great Foreign Missionaries

2 Corinthians 8:16-23.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Jan. 24. Paul: traveler. 3 Cor. 11:16-33.
T. Jan. 25. Peter: pioneer. Acts 10:7-23.
W. Jan. 26. Barnabas: comforter. Acts 9:23-30.
T. Jan. 27. Titus: organizer. Tit. 1:5-16.
F. Jan. 28. John: conqueror. 1 John 3:11.
S. Jan. 29. Apollos: orator. Acts 18:24-28.

The topic here assigned for our study is a very broad one. The number of missionaries who have devoted themselves to the work in foreign lands is really legion, and to select from them those that we may call great is no easy task. Perhaps it will be helpful if we adopt a line of distinction laid down by Rev. C. C. Creegan, D.D., in his masterly book entitled, "Pioneer Missionaries of the Church," and focus our attention upon the men who have acted as the forerunners of the Gospel in heathen lands. (For the benefit of those who are interested it may be stated that Dr. Creegan's book is published by the American Tract Society, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, and will be sent postpaid, on receipt of 60 cents.)

Pioneers in China

Robert Morrison was the great pioneer missionary to China. He was born January 5, 1782, and died August 1, 1834. He went forth under the auspices of the London Missionary Society and arrived in Canton, China, on September 8, 1807. It was nearly seven years before he baptized his first convert, but during that time he had been busily engaged in the work of learning the Chinese language and in translating the Scriptures and other literary work.

Dr. Morrison spent twenty-seven years in his noble missionary work for China. Then he was called up higher, but the foundation which he laid has proved to be a substantial one, and much of the remarkable progress of Christianity in China may be traced to the indefatigable efforts of this heroic pioneer missionary.

Dr. Morrison was the first but not the only pioneer missionary to China, for there were other pioneer workers that followed close upon his footsteps, among whom may be mentioned Peter Parker, M.D., John Livingston Nevius, James Hudson Taylor and S. Wells Williams.

Pioneers in India

One of the early missionary pioneers in India was Rev. Christian Friedrich Schwartz, who went to India a generation before William Carey, and who has been called "The Apostle of the East."

Other pioneers in the missionary enterprise in India were Bishop Reginald Heber, Alexander Duff, John Murdoch, John Everett Clough and Henry Martyn.

Pioneers in Other Lands

Guido Fridolin Verbeck was a pioneer missionary to Japan, and others who helped to lay the foundation for the Christian church in that island empire were Samuel Rollins Brown and Colonel Jerome D. Davis.

Among the pioneer missionaries to Turkey were Cyrus Hamlin, the founder of Robert College; Crosby H. Wheeler, the founder of Euphrates College, and Elias Riggs, the great linguist and translator.

David Livingstone and Robert Moffat will ever be remembered as pioneer missionaries in Africa.

Our Little Folks

"The Children's Hour"

BY MRS. A. R. PERHAM

*How pleasant is the children's hour
At closing of the day,
When Mother lays aside her cares
And children leave their play.
For dearly they enjoy this hour
Of all the day the best,
And bed-time stories have a charm
Ere they retire to rest.*

*So closely to their mother's side
They come with happy look,
And listen as she reads to them
A story from some book.
The Christmas story which they love,
She often tells to them,
The story of the Christ-child, who Was born in Bethlehem.*

*What artist would aspire to paint
A scene than this more fair?
Happy the children who are blest
With such a Mother's care.
The loving words, the good-night kiss,
The prayer at Mother's knee,
In after years, with grateful heart,
May long remembered be.*

*O Mothers guard the children as
You would a tender flower,
And when your daily cares are o'er
Give them "The Children's Hour."
The good seed sown in early youth,
The right instruction given,
May well repay you for your care
And bring forth fruit for heaven.*

Getting a Good Start

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PRESTON PAPERS"

"I WISH that I knew just how to begin," said Hilda Montgomery, snapping the scissors together a bit vigorously in cutting the thread with which she was sewing some filmy lace on a doll's party dress of pink silk.

The junior class of girls in the Ross Avenue Church were spending the last Saturday forenoon before Christmas in the church parlor, making their own gifts for the tree that was to bear its fruit the next week for the members of the little mission church and Sunday-school for which Ross avenue members were sponsors; and the conversation had turned upon the first "theme" that Miss Preston had used in her "Story-Telling Week," ended some days ago. The theme had been "How to Make Your New Year's Wish for Happiness Come True."

"Why, don't you remember, Hilda, that she said the very first thing to do is to be happy yourself? Because you can't, surely, make a happy New Year for someone else if your own face is clouded," said Margaret Olney, holding up the last one of a set of table napkins that she was hemming, to see if her stitches were even and daintily small.

"Yes, indeed, I remember that; and I remember, too, that she also said that if that seemed too hard, for us just to try to keep sweet, smiling, and pleasant to everyone, no matter how we feel, until noon. Then begin fresh after lunch each day to take care of the afternoon and evening; but that doesn't help me much when I can't see just how I'm to be happy at all, with this big disappointment hanging over me like a cloud every day," and the voice weakened, the lips quivered, as the words came out brokenly, although the tears that welled up to the eyelashes were held bravely back.

The girls knew just what was on Hilda's mind, for she had been looking forward to spending the coming year in New York with her favorite uncle, known as "Montgomery Montgomery" in the directory, but as "Uncle Mont" in the family. His wife, Aunt Alice, was as popular as himself with the juveniles of the large family, who, with their elders, were scattered in the states of Ohio, Minnesota, Maine and Tennessee.

Hilda belonged to the Minnesota contingent; and she had had the promised visit so long in contemplation that when a telegram came to her mother from a relative in Maine, saying "Ade-laide has had a stroke. Come if you can," Hilda felt intuitively, as older people sometimes do in such cases, that her "dream castle" would tumble down now, perhaps never to be rebuilt. And her intuition had been so far verified; for her mother had left, almost at once, to be with her sick sister-in-law in Maine, and Hilda's trip to New York was given up, of course, as she could not be spared from home.

Unless you have had some great disappointment like Hilda's you can hardly have been really envious of Hilda's good fortune, had they not loved her so well. Besides, they, too, had a "disappointment" in hers—which was none the less keen because it was to have been only a "share" in her pleasure by way of her letters; for Hilda was a wonderful letter writer, and once a week the class was to send her a "round-robin" letter, and she was to send to the class a letter for all, detailing her adventures for the week; and all the letters—theirs and hers—were to be kept, and later bound, for other girls in interior towns to enjoy.

Try this plan yourself, even if you are not going away, just to see how much you can put into the every-day life that is worth writing about, and how much you can get out of it for the benefit of other people.

But, to get back to our story: None of the girls quite wanted to speak for a moment, for fear of the break in their own voices; and yet they did want to comfort Hilda, and that first theme in the "Story-Telling Week" had gripped their little hearts as the true, the good, the pure, the beautiful always sinks into a real girl's real heart—even when she "pretends" not to care, for fear someone will know the real depth of her real emotions. Girls—of all ages—like to

"Good!" said Margaret. "That's both bright and practical. Now let's 'get together' right there, at that point, and think of something that Hilda can do to forget her disappointment, and something that we can do to forget our own; and let us try to help each other!"

"Good!" came from Florence Adams, who had not spoken before. "Hilda can write all her letters, just as if she had taken her trip. We'll write our 'Round Robin' just the same. Then we can have both to send to our country cousins and 'shut in' friends, as we had planned; and maybe we shall find other simple ways of making other people happy and so make our New Year wishes begin to come true right away!"

And "it was so ordered." Do you want to know the result? I can tell you, of course; but I'd prefer to have each of you begin the New Year in some such way, and live out your own stories—making the result come out just as you want it to. Isn't it just grand that you can? I'll tell you a little, however: Hilda's mother didn't have to stay in Maine, all the year, as Hilda had feared she must!

The Sabbath Day

The Sabbath day is one of God's choicest gifts. The Christian Sabbath is the Lord's day, and we should use it for rest and worship.

God's commandment is, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Yet there are multitudes of people who neglect this holy day, and who use it for their own pleasures, instead of for the worship and service of God.

The Sabbath day will be a means of great blessing to us if we use it aright, but if we misuse it, God will surely show his displeasure with us for not honoring his holy day.

It is always right to do good on the Sabbath day. And besides going to church on the Lord's day we may visit the sick, comfort the sorrowing, help the distressed, and do many things to help others, and in doing such things we know that we are pleasing the Lord Jesus Christ, for he went about doing good on the Sabbath day.

Talking Shoes

Like the native Africans, the South Sea Islanders are very proud if they can get hold of a pair of European shoes. They are especially gratified if they acquire a pair that squeak, or, as the Africans call them, shoes that talk.

A story is told of a South Sea Islander, who came into church with shoes merrily a-squeak. He walked proudly to the front and removing the shoes, dropped them out of the window, so that his wife might also have the pleasure of coming in with "talking" shoes.

Sunshine Further On

The mountain's base is wrapped in gray
And chill and cheerless is the way,
As slow I tread the shadowed trail
That stretches upward still and pale.
But as I rise I see it glow
With what seemed mist and cloud below.
And soon I stand amid the dawn
Of warmth and sunshine—farther on.

O, soul, that beats the shadowed air
About the base of summits fair,
Be brave and patient. Mists obscure
The lower way, but hold secure
The higher path. For thou must rise
On toiling wings to clearer skies
And though the way seems dull and gray,
It lightens toward the summit day.
Thou, too, shall stand amid the dawn
That flowers in sunshine—farther on.

—THE YOUTH'S COMPANION.

realize what it meant to her; but suppose you just shut your eyes now and see the panorama as Hilda had seen it for days, weeks and months—each hour bringing it a little nearer. First, the trip itself in a parlor car by day and a sleeping car by night—for Uncle Mont never did anything "by halves"; and Hilda had never been in anything but a day coach, and that only twice in her life! Then, and perhaps this weighed more than even Hilda knew, she was to have an entire year away from school, with its home work, report cards, tests, and examinations; but, in their stead there were to be concerts, lectures, visits to art galleries, museums, the "zoo," places of wonder and of historic interest, the great stores, bridges, ferries, subways, "tubes," elevated, "Little Italy," and all the fairy-tale places and people of which she had ever heard or read about in New York!

Again, she was to go on short trips with Uncle Mont and Aunt Alice to Washington, Florida, perhaps to Boston, and all by way of the big, wonderful Atlantic Ocean!

I'm not surprised that she was disappointed; nor were the girls, who might hide some of their best emotions, as a rule.

Julia Fitzgerald was the first to speak, and she did it timidly: "You know, Hilda dear, that the second step toward having a Happy New Year, and toward making one for others, was said to be the doing of something to bring happiness to someone else."

"Yes," replied Hilda, "but that's traveling in a circle. I'm right where I started, because I don't know just how to begin; and I can't take the second step until I've taken the first one."

"Do you remember the first thing that we did in our school-garden, Hilda, to get the ground ready for our seeds?" asked Julia, suddenly.

"Why, yes," laughed Hilda, joyously; "we pulled up all those ugly burdocks and the wild-carrot. But I wish you'd help me in my problem of how to start the new year—so as to get the right answer, instead of going back to spring-garden work"; and Hilda wiped away a tear that would fall in spite of her.

"Why, I was just thinking that we might all manage our thought-gardens as we did our flower-and-vegetable gardens," answered Julia, seriously.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Manse for Hopedale Church

By J. L. Glover

HOPEDALE Church might have been called a church-let, so small was it in point of numbers, so poor as to funds and so insignificant as to the size of its house of worship. But in faith—the kind that moves mountains—it was strong.

A church which numbers among its members two such women as Mrs. Wentworth and Mary Hope need not despair, however poor in earthly things it may appear.

Mrs. Wentworth was the widow of the first pastor of the little church. Sixty years ago she had come to Hopedale as a bride, full of hope and plans for the work they were to do together. But before five years had passed, John Wentworth, having been faithful over a few things, was called up higher, and his young wife, thus early left a widow, made her home in Hopedale, filling her empty life with service.

The church owed more to her prayers than anyone knew, and the poor and sick, of whom there were some, even in green, pleasant little Hopedale, loved and blessed her name. A genial, gracious, charming old lady at eighty, she was still the leading spirit in the church, and nothing was ever done without her approval and co-operation.

She lived by herself, save for a faithful old servant, in a pretty cottage close to the church; and because there was no manse, and it was more convenient for her than anyone else, she had always provided board for the minister. She had plenty of room, and when the pastor was a married man with a large family, she said it kept her young to have the house full of life and noise; and when he was a young man, she said it was a rest to have it quiet for a while. Either way, she said, it did her good.

Just across the way from Mrs. Wentworth's cottage lived Dr. Hope and his daughter, Mary, who had kept house for her father ever since her mother's death when she was only eighteen years old. Mary was now twenty-five; a pale, slender girl, with quiet gray eyes and a mouth of wonderful sweetness. She and Mrs. Wentworth, two lonely women, were much to each other. To Mary, the old lady was like the mother she had so early lost; and Mrs. Wentworth had taken the girl to her heart, in that desolate time, almost as if she had been her own little daughter, another Mary, who had but paused a little while in this world, and then passed on to the next.

"I'm getting old, Mary," the old lady said, one day. "It begins to be almost too much for me to board the minister. If Mr. Raymond wasn't such a quiet man, giving no trouble at all, and his wife helping me about the house, I hardly see how I could manage it any longer. I must surely be growing old."

She laughed—a sweet, silvery laugh. She was a pretty old lady, with a soft, blush rose tint in her cheeks, and hair like spun silver framing a fair face with eyes as deeply blue as when she was a girl. Mary looked at her, startled at this confession of failing strength. It had never occurred to her that Mrs. Wentworth was old at all.

"Then Hopedale Church must have a manse," she said, decidedly. "We have needed one a long time, only you have spoiled us. Now it has to be done."

"Let us work for it, then, and pray while we work, child," returned the old lady.

When Mrs. Wentworth and Mary Hope made up their minds that a thing must be done, it generally came to pass. They prayed with fervor, and supplemented their prayers with such earnest work, that before long the enterprise of raising funds for the manse was fairly under way. The Ladies' Aid held meetings, and sewed, and had sales of fancy-work, and devised little entertainments of various kinds. Even the children caught the prevailing enthusiasm, and made candy and picked berries for sale, adding their pennies to the fund, which grew slowly, but surely.

In two years more the amount had grown to five hundred dollars, and the manse seemed almost in sight.

"If we had five hundred more, we could begin to build," said the trustees.

"We'll keep on working and praying, and it will come," returned Mrs. Wentworth, stimulating the workers with her faith that never faltered.

That fall, the old lady failed suddenly, and Mary gave up all her time and thoughts to her; and thus for a time the work for the manse fund languished a little. Finally Mrs. Wentworth died, on a soft, beautiful Indian Summer day, when the woods were brown and golden, and the sky was like a glorious gateway into Heaven. She passed quietly, painlessly away in Mary's arms, with Mary's name on her lips, mingled with words of prayer; and through her tears for her own loss, Mary Hope thanked God that the brave, patient soul had gone to meet her reward for long years of faithful service in the Master's name.

When all was over, and Mrs. Wentworth's affairs were settled, it was found that she had left her small property to Mary, consisting of a few hundred dollars and the pretty cottage by the church.

"So now you are a rich woman, I suppose you will be wanting an automobile, and a trip to Europe," said Dr. Hope, teasingly, to his daughter.

"If you will go with me, it would do you good," returned Mary, with her quiet smile, well knowing that no earthly consideration, short of absolute necessity, could drag her father out of Hopedale. "On no other condition, Dad."

Hopedale, which took a vivid and kindly interest in everybody's affairs, was much exercised to know what Mary would do with her legacy.

"The money she can put in the bank, of course, and have the interest to spend," said the neighbors, settling the matter for her, in true neighborly fashion. "But what will she do with the house? Rent it? Sell it? Live in it herself?"

"No; why should I, when I have a comfortable home with my father?" said Mary, quietly, when this solution came to her ears.

"But it is such a pity for a nice house like that to stand idle and shut up," ventured the inquisitive neighbor.

"I shall think of something," was all the satisfaction Mary gave.

But a thought was forming itself in her mind, taking shape gradually into a plan; and one moonlit night, as she and her father sat on their piazza, looking across the way to where Mary's house—Mrs. Wentworth's home of so many years, hallowed by such sacred memories—stood, white and fair and silent in the silver radiance, she told him of it.

Dr. Hope turned and looked at his daughter.

"Are you in earnest, Mary? Do you mean that you want to give that house and lot to the church for a manse? It means a good slice of your little property. Think well before you decide."

"I have," said Mary. "The money I shall put in the bank, as Mrs. Conway recommends," with a fleeting smile. "It will be pleasant to have something to give away, and to know that there is a little in case of a rainy day. But the house I should like to give to be the manse for our church. I could not bear to have it occupied by strangers; but I think she would like this, father." Her lips quivered.

"It shall be just as you wish," returned the doctor, gently. "Only be sure, child, before you decide finally. Take another night to sleep over it."

"I have decided," said Mary, but she took the night, as he advised, and did more than sleep over it. Morning found her quietly resolved, with a look of deep, solemn joy on her pale face.

The matter was then laid before the trustees; and in due time it was settled, and the Manse for Hopedale Church became an established fact. Mr. and Mrs. Raymond, the quiet couple, who gave no trouble and "helped about the house," lived on in it for a time; and when he was called to another and larger field, there came a young pastor with a sweet-faced wife and a group of rosy, happy little ones, who filled the quiet rooms with youth and brightness.

The little white-walled manse is the happiest of homes, and from it there flows out the spirit of love, and of work "while it is day."

"It is what she would have wished," said Mary to herself, looking across from her window, as she had formed the habit of doing, at the Manse of Hopedale Church; and to her sometimes, as she looks, it seems as though, could she only see a little more clearly through the "mists and vapors" of earth, she might discern among its dwellers a white-robed form which lingers lovingly there.

Do Not Be Discouraged

On a Clyde River steamboat, we are told, a gentleman was distributing tracts. Among those who received them was a Christian man, a resident of Glasgow, who made the remark that he used to give away tracts himself, but stopped doing so many years before, as he had become convinced that such work did not result in very much good; in fact, he thought the time spent in tract distribution was little better than wasted.

The other man, on hearing this, said that his own conversion had resulted from a tract that had been given him, when a lad of twelve on the street one wintry night. The person who gave him the leaflet also invited him into a gospel meeting. He accepted the invitation and heard words at the service that awakened him to serious thoughts. Later he turned to the tract, seeking knowledge as to how to become a Christian, and from it he learned the way to God.

The gentleman who had referred to tract distribution as a work of very little importance then asked the other when it was he received the tract, and before the conversation had proceeded much further, learned that it was from himself that the lad had received the leaflet that had been so fruitful in results. Thus did he realize that tract distribution is a work of importance, and that his criticism was far from justified.

Religious literature contains abundant proofs of the value of this kind of Christian work, and presents many instances where a tract was the means of the conversion not only of one person but of several, among whom were some who became efficient workers in making the gospel known to others. And the wonderful thing about such work is that no person is so poor that he cannot engage in it. It is work that all of us can help along.

We Give Thee Thanks

For the discipline of sorrow,
For the angel of distress,
For the unseen hands that draw us
Into greater blessedness;
For the lips that close in silence,
For the strong hands clasped in prayer,
For the strength of heart that suffers,
But sinks not in dull despair;
For the penitence and patience
That are meek beneath the rod,
And for hope's glad resurrection,
We give Thee thanks, O God!

For the hope that right shall triumph,
For the lifting of the race,
For the victories of justice,
For a coming day of grace,
For the lessons taught by failure
Learned in humbleness and pain,
For the call to lofty duties
That will come to us again,
For the hope that those who trust God
Never shall be put to shame,
For the faith that lives in home-land,
O God, we praise Thy name!

IN THE MISSION FIELDS

Korean Ancestor Worship

A very interesting picture was recently received by the American Tract Society, of which a reproduction is presented on this page.

This picture portrays a typical example of Korean ancestor worship. It shows us three sons who have prostrated themselves at the grave of their father. In accordance with the established ritual of their faith they have presented offerings and are worshipping on the anniversary of their father's death. In accordance with Korean custom they have removed their shoes, which may be seen in the picture upon close inspection. They are robed in full mourning costume, for in Korea white is the emblem of mourning.

Filial piety is a virtue, but superstitious practices such as those represented in this scene are greatly to be deprecated. It is to combat such superstition and to exalt the worship of the one true God that Christian missionaries have entered into the land of Korea.

One of the most effective agencies for the spiritual enlightenment of the people is the Korean Religious Tract Society, whose headquarters are in Seoul and whose efficient superintendent, Mr. Gerald Bonwick, has furnished the photograph from which the illustration has been taken. This Korean society is one of many that are aided by annual cash appropriations from the American Tract Society.

In South Africa

In a recent issue of The South African Pioneer Mr. Scott Searle, a missionary at Lutubeni, in Tembuland, tells of his work in the following words:

"The Lord's command is to preach the Word, instant in season, and out of season. If this injunction were only more fully obeyed there would be much more good done than there is in this dark and needy world.

"A woman, while passing here, met with a serious accident, which proved fatal. We seized the opportunity to point her to Jesus. The word was effectual, for she died trusting in the Lord.

"A young man was working here. We approached him about his soul. He was the son of Christian parents, but had never made any Christian profession. During some revival services he came out fully for Christ, but, sad to say, through some indiscretion he caught a severe cold on his lungs, and after a short illness passed away. On his death-bed he gave a bright testimony of his faith in his Saviour. If the above injunction had not been carried out, these precious souls would probably have been lost.

"We have been holding revival services here at Lutubeni and at the out-stations, Wilo and Putuma. At these three places there have been unmistakable signs of the Lord's working. I will merely mention one case from each place.

"At Lutubeni the greatest sinner of the neighborhood has been converted. My readers would be horrified if all the misdoings of this man were enumerated. For years he had been the devil's cat's-paw, but now I believe God has gripped him. To listen to his testimony and prayers is most encouraging.

"At Putuma an old woman, old also in sin and iniquity, came to Jesus to be made clean. Many years ago she was a Christian in Pondoland, but on coming to these parts she relapsed into heathenism. Later she was reclaimed, but again she forsook the way of righteousness. The difficulty with her was her unwillingness to make a clean cut with her heathen friends. Under our ministry she again came back to God, but, although she had repented, yet it was evident to all that she knew not the joy of sins forgiven. Like the people of whom Paul wrote, she was going about to establish her own righteousness. She was a stranger to the way of faith, but in the revival the veil was removed, and the heavy burden of her many sins rolled away.

"At Wilo we will not mention the case of a great sinner, but of a young woman who was a professing Christian, a church member who lived a consistent life, but was ignorant of the glorious teaching of justification by faith, the teaching which shook Europe under the mighty preaching of Luther. She did not even believe that one's sins could be forgiven this side of the grave. The Spirit of God worked, and she came right into the light; now she can give a clear testimony of her justification. We thank God for these cases, and for others also blessed during these services.

"Let me mention one case—a heathen woman, who has often attended morning prayers, as she has been constantly doing odd jobs for my wife. It was noticed that she listened attentively, and there did not appear on her face the hard, indifferent look characteristic of the heathen. When the revival came, some of the Christians were sent out to hold a meeting in her kraal. There, at the first opportunity, she knelt at the mercy-seat and gave herself to God. Yesterday we were surprised to see her in the church clothed as a Christian and in her right mind. We were also agreeably surprised as we listened to her prayer, in which she said that she believed God had accepted her."

Chinese Are Eager to Learn

Rev. G. P. Bostick, of Pochow, China, tells of a splendid Bible class consisting of seventy-five men and boys. He says: "There were over seventy-five men and boys registered, ranging in age from fourteen to sixty-three, and in education from those who knew a very few characters—being present for absorption purposes—to one man with a Lin Sung degree in the old days and also a graduate of a government normal school.

"Some of these walked over two hundred miles to attend this class. They were all furnished free lodging, tea, water and fuel, and for some of those not in the employment of the mission or churches, the actual cost of their food was also paid. Most of this expense is provided by the churches and missionaries of these interior stations.

"On the Sunday before this class closed we baptized fourteen, most of them living at Pochow, but several from the Pochow out-stations. These have been interested from one to ten years. Several of them were of the teacher class and three or four of them are students in our recently opened day schools. We feel deeply grateful for these additions and are encouraged to hope that some of them may prove very useful men."

A Genuine Conversion

Rev. H. C. Tucker, the Agent of the American Bible Society in Brazil, tells the following story of the conversion of a young Brazilian. He says:

"About three years ago a young man had occasion to call at the house of a believer who handed him a small tract entitled 'Evangelical Religion Before the Public.' At the same time he saw on the table in this gentleman's house a book entitled 'The Bible.' He began reading the tract and was impressed with the fact that it must deal with the real truth in matters of religion. He was at once interested to know something more of the Bible, from which there were many quotations in this tract. He read some passages from the Bible for the first time in his life and felt at once that this must indeed be the Truth of God. As he seemed interested, the gentleman told him that he could take this book with him if he wished. Up to this time he had had no contact with the Bible; this was the first time in his life; he had had no special interest in religion, except to attend the festivals and the processions, or when there were great displays or any merriment or fun-making. He now became interested in the Bible, and as he read the Word he received light and found peace with God.

"Shortly after, a missionary was induced to visit the community and this young man had occasion then to make public confession of his faith in Christ and at once became deeply interested in bringing others to the knowledge of the truth and to reading of the Word of God. His desire to do active service took direction in the work of organizing a small day school in which he could teach the children the truths of the Bible. Previous to his receiving the Bible he had learned to read and was thus able to do something as a teacher. He began at once to ask for other religious literature and became a subscriber to two evangelical papers. At the convention held during my visit to Castro he showed very great interest in the discussions of the Bible work and in the Sunday schools. Two of his brothers were induced to accompany him and take part in this convention. It was exceedingly interesting to see these three brothers as they sat side by side, taking in every word that was said and at the same time making record of all said, in their minds, as well as suggestions that they proposed to follow out on their return home.

"This young man asked me to buy for him a Portuguese dictionary, and handed me some money and asked me to send a small Bible and any other books and literature that might be helpful to him in enabling him to organize a Sunday school and carry forward Christ's work in his community. He frankly lamented his lack of education and preparation for service in the cause of Christ, but said he had resolved by the grace of God to do the very best he could. He and his brothers, and others in his community, have combined together their small offering and have bought a piece of ground and are proposing as soon as possible to put up a small church building. It was indeed refreshing to hear them tell their experiences and give expression to their great joy in finding peace and pardon through Jesus Christ.

"We are constantly running upon these interesting incidents of individuals who have been brought into the light and into the knowledge of Jesus Christ through the reading of God's Holy Word."

The Power of One Child's Life

May we not catch a spiritual glow from the simple story of a nine-year-old child, Gnanakanammal, of India, who had been a pupil in a mission school, "where she had learned Bible verses, Christian songs and how to pray." The child was taken ill, and while on her sick-bed she repeated verses and sang Christian hymns and urged her people to accept Christ. When the family recognized that the end was approaching they allowed the minister to come and baptize her. The impression made by this young life, dedicated to Christ, was so strong that after her little body was laid away forty members of the family, with relatives, renounced heathenism and accepted Christ. The girl's father, now known as Solomon Rangaswami, has stated that he will not rest until he has brought a hundred souls to Christ. Who can measure the power of one little child filled with God's Spirit?

Effects of Missions on the Eskimos

When the first Moravian missionaries in 1764 visited the Labrador coast, says a writer in the Christian Herald, no Eskimo-Rajak could be trusted within gunshot. Murderous bands would go for hundreds of miles in summer to the southern part of the coast, where under the cover of fog or night they would suddenly approach a lonely fishing schooner. If they found themselves in the majority, they would draw the dagger, secretly concealed in their left sleeve, and do their murderous work.

And to-day we have not only Christian congregations, but practically a Christian Eskimo nation.

A specially striking contrast between the Eskimo of old and of today is seen in the condition of the aged, the infirm and orphans. In olden times the relatives usually got rid of such, simply by abandoning them on some lonely island. Now the old and sick are mostly well cared for; an orphanage is not needed, either, as nearly anyone is ready to take an orphan into his house if near relatives are wanting.

A Union Christian Paper for Korea

At the last annual meeting of the Federal Council of Missions in Korea, after full discussion it was decided to begin a Union Christian paper for all Korea. The funds for starting it (4,000 yen) will be loaned from the Hymn Book fund. The Korean Religious Tract Society will manage the paper—thus insuring thorough business methods. Both the Methodists and Presbyterians felt that their denominational papers had not been accorded such a measure of success as to warrant continuing them. This new paper will be the only one (theological papers excepted) that will be published by the co-operating Missions. The new paper is to appear this January. With the strong committee in charge of it and its opportunity to fill a much-felt want it should soon become a power for good in Korea, thus furnishing an additional evidence of the unity that marks Korean Missions.

The Family Circle

The Mountain of "If"

By Jane Ellis Joy.

FATHER," said John Vaile, Jr., "I'm going to speak a piece at the New Year celebration to-morrow."

"Very nice," responded his father absent-mindedly, without taking his searching eyes from the business ledger that he was examining under the electric light. He had brought the book home for a final review.

Mrs. Vaile saw that her husband was preoccupied, and she quietly led the children into her own room, so that their prattle and play might not disturb their father.

John Vaile did not perceive that they had left the room. He only knew that his business was going from bad to worse; that the coming New Year would see him deluged with bills which he saw no way of meeting. When he realized, a few minutes later, that the eyes of neither wife nor children were upon him, he put down his pen and bowed his head over the book that recorded his losses and failures.

In imagination he saw himself informing his wife that housekeeping expenses would have to be cut down; that the pretty home that was partly paid for would have to be given up; that contemplated luxuries would have to be foregone. In the humiliating vision he heard acquaintances say: "If John Vaile had only had a little more 'push,' this wouldn't have happened." John felt no resentment at this depreciation of himself. He acknowledged that the criticism was justified.

He said to himself that he never should have branched out as he had done. The small success that he had enjoyed some ten years ago had naturally caused him to overrate his abilities. Those early results of his efforts he now attributed to luck—mere luck, and youthful enthusiasm.

If he were only younger, he believed he would begin all over again. The current was hard against him. If he could borrow sufficient money on easy terms, or if his creditors would accept notes, he thought he might weather it out. He recalled a number of friends who were doing well. If he had only had a college education, like Robert West, or if he possessed the personal magnetism of Charles Hart, he was sure he could take hold of something in their line. Confidence in one's self was a great asset. How he longed that he only had more of it!

He wished that he was only one to make friends more easily. He was painfully conscious that he didn't invariably make a good first impression. Men had to know him to trust him.

"If I'm a failure at thirty-five, where will I be at fifty?" he thought miserably. "I seem to be getting out of touch with modern methods. I'm like one fighting the battles of to-day with the weapons of yesterday. Between me and all that I would accomplish there rises the great Mountain of IF!"

The door leading to the hall opened, and a boy stepped into the room. "Father," asked John, Jr., in the high treble tone of a nine-year-old, "have you done your counting? Because, if you have, I want to tell you about my piece. I don't know it all yet."

"Oh, you don't know it yet!" repeated John Vaile, somewhat relieved. He was not in a mood to listen to a child's recitation.

"I don't know it quite well enough to say it off by heart," explained John, Jr. "I have to look over some of the verses. I'm surely going to get every line of it before I go to bed. But I can tell you now what it's about."

"Well, go ahead," said father, closing his ledger resignedly and folding his arms.

"It's the story of two workers in stone," began John, Jr. "Long ago they were building a temple. An artist started to carve a statue to stand at the front door. He began all right; but his tools got dull as he worked on the stone, and he broke the point off his best chisel. And what do you s'pose he did?"

"Sharpened them up again," guessed father.

"He ought to have done that, but he didn't. He just threw the tools away and said they were no good; he couldn't do nice work with a broken chisel. 'Twasn't then like it is now; there were no tool shops in that country. And the worst of it was, a war broke out and the men who made tools were kept busy making swords and things to fight with. The other men working on the temple went on building, and the temple was finished—all but this one statue. The king sent word to the stone-carver to finish the statue. The man said he would if he could get another chisel like the one he broke. But it appeared he couldn't get it."

"One day another stone-carver came along and stopped before the temple, looking at the unfinished statue. To the chief constructor, who happened along, he said: 'This unfinished statue spoils the appearance of the building.'

"Yes, it is a disgrace to the city," replied the chief constructor, "and the king is vexed about it. If the artist would only take up the work and finish it as well as he can with the tools to be had, it would look better than it does now. As it is, another artist could hardly do justice to the statue, not knowing the design."

"The chief constructor walked on, and the stone-carver stood studying the unfinished statue. He came the next day and studied some more, and by-and-by he felt that he knew what the other artist had intended to carve. 'I can finish it,' he thought to himself. He had no tools, and he was too poor to buy any; but he looked around among the weeds and grass near the temple door for the tools that the other man had thrown away. Fortunately, he found the old broken chisel, and with this he got to work. I guess he asked the chief constructor first, though the poetry doesn't say so. Well, he had to work pretty slowly, for fear of spoiling the figure on the stone. But he loved his work and was awfully careful, and after a while he finished the statue."

"Everyone said it was mighty fine. People came to look at it. Everybody was pleased, and the king was more delighted than anyone else, for he said that the stone-carver who had finished the statue was worthy of honor above all artists; because, not being able to get the best kind of tools, he had made very good use of the ones which he could get."

"That's a good story," said father. "If it sounds as well in verse as you tell it in prose, I'll be glad to hear the poetry to-morrow. Good-night, Johnny, and a happy New Year to you."

To himself John Vaile thought, as the door closed on the boy: "I'm not the first man to see the Mountain of IF. That mountain is an old institution. The stone-carver who threw away his chisel was discouraged by it. Perhaps, after all, I've been underrating my ability, just as he underrated the quality of his chisel."

Making the comparison, a quality long dormant in John Vaile stirred. It was as if the pressure that had held him captive to his fears had been withdrawn. In the little boy's story—that it was not so much the tool as the mind behind it that made for success—John Vaile saw his own mistaken attitude toward everyday things illuminated. Was this a lesson from heaven—a note of warning and encouragement?

Ah, that vague term, "faith!" Had it not a wider meaning than the one commonly given it? Did not faith in God include faith in one's own God-given powers of mind? Was it not a sort of treason to belittle one's own capacities? Napoleon had declared there were no Alps. Should not a nobler faith say there is no Mountain of IF?

Inspired by this thought, he rose and, parting the curtains, looked out. The snow that covered ground and shrubbery was a surprise, as he had not noticed the scattered flakes falling early in the evening. The world seemed new to him again.

His thoughts began running in new currents. Plans concerning his business long since abandoned as impractical were seen to be within the measure of attainment. Instead of being at the bottom of his resources, he saw that there lay within his reach many untouched opportunities.

The door opened quietly and Mrs. Vaile stepped in. "I'm sorry you had to be disturbed hearing Johnny's piece when you were so busy," she said. "Is the business in as bad condition as you feared?"

"No, my dear, not half as bad as I thought," said John Vaile cheerfully. "In fact there is every reason for believing that the New Year holds good things for us." As he spoke the clock struck twelve, and innumerable gongs and public bells announced that the old year was no more.

Significant Facts

The following interesting facts regarding the progress of the prohibition movement in all parts of the world have been compiled by the Temperance Society of the Methodist Church:

Absinthe has been prohibited in Belgium, in Switzerland, in Holland and in France.

King Haakon, of Norway, closed the breweries on the outbreak of war.

The people of Iceland have banished alcoholic beverages from their island.

The Czar has broken the second serfdom of Russia with his prohibition ukase.

Germany has prohibited spirits in military districts and cautions its troops against all alcoholic beverages.

Public men and patriots of Great Britain denounce the liquor traffic as the country's greatest foe.

Australasia and Canada have a prohibition movement of promising proportions.

Many royal houses of Europe now oppose social recognition of the drink habit.

Nineteen States in America have State-wide prohibition laws and other States are hastening toward the prohibition column.

Local option victories are won by the temperance forces in the proportion of three to one lost.

A majority of the House of Representatives of the United States voted to submit a constitutional amendment.

Five hundred and fifty daily newspapers have notified the Temperance Society of the Methodist Church that they now decline all liquor advertising.

An investigation reveals that the use of alcohol as a medicine is decreasing in more than nine-tenths of the hospitals of leading American cities.

THE VERY TIME

When Powerful Food Is Most Needed

The need of delicate yet nutritious food is never felt so keenly as when a convalescent gets a set back on account of weak stomach. Then is when Grape-Nuts shows its power, for it is a most scientific and easily digested food.

"About a year ago," writes a Kansas woman, "my little six-year-old niece left the invigorating and buoyant air of Kansas, where all her life she had enjoyed fairly good health, to live in Ohio. She naturally had a change of diet, and of course a change of water, and somehow she contracted typhoid fever.

"After a long siege her case seemed hopeless, doctors gave her up, and she was nothing but skin and bones, couldn't eat anything, and for weeks did not know even her father or mother. Her parents, in trying to get something delicate and nourishing that she could eat, finally hit upon Grape-Nuts food, and it turned out to be just the thing.

"She seemed to relish it, was soon conscious of her surroundings and began to gain strength so rapidly that in a short time she was as well, playful and robust as if she had never been ill.

"We all feel that Grape-Nuts was the predominating factor in saving the sweet little girl's life."

Crossing the Rubicon

BY FRANK B. M'ALLISTER.

THE historian Suetonius has related how, in one of his important campaigns, Caesar came to the banks of the river Rubicon, but delayed before crossing over. After he had revolved in his mind the importance of the step he was about to take he turned to those about him and said: "We may still retreat; but if we pass this little bridge, there is nothing left for us but to fight it out in arms."

While the general and his followers were hesitating, a decisive incident occurred. A person of noble mien and graceful aspect appeared close at hand sitting and playing on a pipe. Soon a number of soldiers gathered about him to listen, and among them were some trumpeters. Suddenly the musician snatched a trumpet from one of these, and, sounding the advance with a piercing blast, rushed down to the river and crossed to the other side. Caesar took the occurrence as a sign from heaven, exclaiming, "Let us go whither the omens of the gods and the iniquity of our enemies call us. The die is cast!"

So Caesar crossed, and with results that were important even to you and me. We know how he marched on Rome, how the empire was established, to be itself destroyed in time, that amid its ruins Christianity might arise and be spread throughout the known world along those famous roads that the imperial Roman government had established. It was surely an important decision that Caesar made by the banks of that little Italian river. Our lives are different because he crossed over.

Every day people are called to make decisions that, if not involving such tremendous historical consequences, are yet of vital importance to themselves and to a larger or smaller circle of friends. The prophet Ezekiel in his vision saw "multitudes in the valley of decision." The same multitudes are on our streets and in our homes to-day, only they are greater than those the prophet saw because the modern world is bigger than the world of yesterday.

Much sympathy should be given one halting between two opinions. A chronic inability to "make up one's mind" may prove as great a handicap as some actual physical defect of lung or limb. Even in the range of smaller concerns a choice between two alternatives may tax conscientious minds with a stress that matter-of-fact people never know. The young housewife, shopping in the rug department, may consume real mental energy as she finally chooses one pattern as over against another. Shall one spend a vacation here or there, shall one purchase this garment or that, shall we paper the front room in blue or in pink? Such problems as these are entering into the average day of the average man or woman to make the day complex.

In more important fields decision is correspondingly more difficult. There are choices that almost inevitably affect the happiness and the usefulness of the whole after life. With the constant possibility of wrong judgment and mistake, we must all admit that to be a solemn hour which binds one irrevocably to some life partner, which leads one to enter some particular business or profession, or to cast in his lot with some particular part of the country. Great sympathy and wise counsel are due the young man or the young woman who is deciding these weighty questions on which so much of future weal or woe depends.

In making any choice careful consideration of the pros and cons should be given. No wise person makes a great choice blindly or through impulse. Some minds there are that can marshal all the facts in the twinkling of an eye and choose their course as by a sort of divination. Other minds work more slowly and may even find it serviceable to write out in parallel columns the advantages and disadvantages of a given situation, that the weight of the opposing arguments may be more plainly apparent. It is no mark of weakness to take time to consider. Half of the world's unhappiness might have been spared if we dwellers in it had acted less in haste.

To count the cost and to measure our resources is a Christian duty. Jesus said: "Which of you, intending to build a tower, sitteth not down first, and counteth the cost, whether he have sufficient to finish it." Hesitation before a step of far-reaching importance may prove a grace of high degree. Of another military leader, Caesar's own equal in prowess, we read that "Joshua rose early in the morning, and came to Jordan, he and all the children of Israel, and lodged there before they passed over." It was a wise caution to learn first the strength and position of the wild tribes dwelling beyond Jordan before they passed over to the attack.

Let the novice in any craft or profession be careful to count the cost. Let him pause long enough to weigh his own powers in relation to the opportunities open before him, and the demands to be made upon him. Forethought will reduce the number of round pegs in square holes. It will do away with the haphazard method of choosing life pursuits, a kind of selection which, in the case of college men as well as of high school boys, is, as Dr. Richard Cabot has said, "infinitely unintelligent."

When decision is carefully made, it is generally better not to reconsider it. Continually to canvass our reasons, after the step is taken, is to bring confusion into the whole situation. After Caesar had crossed the Rubicon he did not sit down on the opposite bank wondering whether he had acted wisely. He pressed on with energy to meet his enemies. There is a time to stop balancing arguments and get to work. A cautious man is in the path of ultimate and large success, but a "double minded man is unstable in all his ways."

A Wonderful Instrumentality

In an American city a godly young woman placed a searching tract upon the dressing-case of her mistress, whose eyes fell upon it while preparing for a fashionable fete. Her attention was arrested, her heart was touched, deep conviction of soul took possession of her, and soon she was led to know Jesus through the pardoning of her sins. Though possessed of great wealth and worldly honors, being a leader in society, she laid them aside, became a humble Christian, and devoted her talents to the Lord, giving part of her time to tract work.

The circulation of tracts as a means of preaching the gospel is older than the art of printing. Wickliffe, the Reformer, was a great writer and distributor of tracts, employing his friends and pupils to multiply copies. Luther was a worker on the same line, but with the help, however, of the printing press, which came to his aid. Two hundred years after, Count Zinzendorf, another devoted German reformer, made extensive use of the printing press in the spreading of gospel tracts, etc. Toward the close of the eighteenth century Hannah More, from her own pen, produced the Repository Tracts which were so extensively used in her day. Still later on, Christians of various nations have been utilizing the facilities afforded by press, paper and ink for preaching the gospel by the printed page.

ner, was possessed with a burning desire for the salvation of others, and it is asserted that through his instrumentality over one hundred were brought "out of darkness into light." He was a faithful tract distributor, and was for years identified with the publication of tracts.

A professional diver, while at the bottom of the sea, along the coast, noticed an oyster holding a piece of printed paper between its closed shells. The diver secured the slip, and through the goggles of his headdress began to read. It was a gospel tract, and coming to him thus strangely, so impressed his heart that he said: "I can hold out against God's mercy no longer, since it pursues me thus." He became while at the bottom of the sea a penitent and, as he was assured, a forgiven man.

Tracts have advantages peculiar to themselves. Their very silence commands the notice of those to whom a verbal appeal might not be acceptable. They often confront the reader, too, unexpectedly.—A. H. GOTTSCHALL.

Peloubet's Select Notes.—This is the forty-second annual issue of a volume which many regard as indispensable for the study of the International Uniform Sunday School Lessons. It is prepared jointly by Rev. F. N. Peloubet, D.D., and Amos R. Wells, Litt.D., LL.D. The present volume deals with the lessons for the year 1916, which are selected from the Acts, Epistles and Revelation.

Each successive issue of this series shows an advance on the preceding, and the volume for 1916 compares favorably in this respect with all its predecessors. The results given have been gathered from a study of thousands of books, and the material is presented in the most scholarly manner. A broad view is taken of each lesson, and a successful effort is made to weave the entire series of lessons into one consecutive whole.

These Select Notes furnish a satisfactory basis for teaching the Uniform Lesson to all grades in the Sunday School. There are three fine maps in color and over one hundred and twenty-five pictures of great beauty and value in this volume.

No pastor, Sunday School superintendent, Bible class teacher or Christian worker who uses the International Uniform Lessons should fail to secure a copy of this invaluable commentary. (Cloth, 384 pages. Price, $1.00 net; $1.15 delivered. W. A. Wilde Company, 120 Boylston Street, Boston, Mass.)

The Sand-Table.—By Lillie A. Faris.

This book presents a novel and graphic method of object-teaching, particularly adapted to the needs of the Primary Department of the Sunday School. It presents a solution to the problem as to how to interest and instruct the children of tender years, whose undivided attention it is often so hard to secure. The authoress tells how to construct a sand-table, how to care for it and how to use it. Illustrations are given as to how best to tell a Bible story to the children by the aid of the sand-table, and useful suggestions are given as to map-making by the help of this unique device. (Cloth, 87 pages. Price, 60 cents, postpaid. The Standard Publishing Company, Cincinnati, O.)

Alleluia.—A Hymnal for use in Schools, in the Home, in Young People's Societies and in Devotional Meetings.

This is the latest addition to the admirable series of hymnals published by the Presbyterian Board of Publication. It contains over 300 hymns and tunes, together with several Orders of Service and Responsive Readings, adapted both for general use and for special occasions. This book presents an excellent selection of hymns for the purposes for which it has been designed. It is well printed in clear type and makes an attractive volume to the eye. An extensive Topical Index adds greatly to its value and usefulness. (Cloth, 316 pages. Single copies 40 cents, postpaid; $30.00 per hundred, carriage extra. Presbyterian Board of Publication Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia, Pa.)

Presbyterian Handbook.—Edited by Rev. W. H. Roberts, D.D.

This convenient little manual contains facts respecting the history, statistics and work of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., together with a list of the International Sunday School Lessons, Daily Bible Readings and Weekly Prayer Meeting Topics. (Paper, 112 pages. Price, single copy, five cents, postpaid. Presbyterian Board of Publication, Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia, Pa.)

Some Merits of the American Standard Bible.—By William M. Langdon.

This pamphlet emphasizes the advantage of the paragraph method of printing as used in the American Standard Revised Version of the Bible instead of the verse division of the Authorized or King James Version. It also points out the advantage of the use of the august name, "Jehovah," rather than the mere title "Lord," which is another distinctive feature of the American Standard Version. (Price, paper, 15 cents. For sale by Wm. M. Langdon, 50 Orange Street, Asheville, N. C.)

The Lure of Books

Books are an open door to a whole world of mental interests and delights. They constitute a treasure-island which all may visit and where all may obtain booty. Domains closed to one in the world as it really is may be frequented in fancy by one who cares to read.

America is the land of opportunity in this particular especially, that thousands of books are instantly available to the reader. It is possible for ambitious young people to work their way through college. It has been done thousands of times. But where circumstances positively prohibit going to college, the world of books makes self-education possible. Young people do not have to walk as far as Abraham Lincoln did to borrow a book nor do they have to read it by the light of a log fire. Facilities for reading are multiplying all the time. Libraries and reading rooms invite all to come and enjoy the pleasures of reading without money and without price.

What opportunities for travel the world of books offers! It is given to very few men to penetrate into the heart of Africa, or brave the terrors of the icy north, or scale the heights of the highest mountains, or visit the countries of the earth with all their objects of interest. But these possibilities, so remote to the average man, are brought nigh in the world of books. We remember that the great philosopher, Immanuel Kant, spent all of his eighty years in Königsberg, but he was an omnivorous reader of books of travel and the wide, wide world was familiar to him. He enjoyed the delights of traveling without traveling.

Through books we have access to all sorts and conditions of men. The world we live in may be strictly limited to our own station, but we may read ourselves into the most select society and gain admittance into the atmosphere of the great underworld. No region of human intercourse and action is unexplored. We may learn to know our fellowmen, their ways of thinking and living, their hopes, their fears, their sorrows and joys, their gifts and needs. It is a great privilege thus to be able to bring the distant near and to see elemental man in his close kinship to all mankind.

Vocational books enable a man to add to his equipment in his chosen occupation. All branches of human knowledge are brought to our doors in books. The same conflicts, emotional, moral, intellectual and spiritual, which we are called upon to face in the exigencies of human experience and along the common way of life, have been met by many before us and the story of their struggle is told in books for our profit and guidance. No individual taste need go unsatisfied in the world of books. There is nutriment for all our varied and complex needs. Information, instruction, inspiration, guidance, exhortation, warning, tears and laughter, life and death, all are found in books. The insistent demand of our common possession of books is that we read, read, read.

The average reader is entranced by fiction. Fortunately our best novels are on the right side of moral issues. Novels run a close second to actual life in demonstrating that the wages of sin is death. We always expect the wicked to be brought to account in fiction. Before we finish a story, we expect justice to crown virtue with happiness and villainy with punishment. Thus books become preachers, guiding us into the paths of righteousness. They lay down the principles of the moral world and reveal the folly of sin.

In our reading it is necessary to avoid monotony of diet. Novels afford pleasure, interest, reproof and incentive. But other branches of literature are even more charged with idealism and beauty of thought. Poetry, essays, biography, history, etc.—what helpful and nourishing comrades these are. Our reading must include these. And the greatest and best book of all, the Book, the blessed Scriptures—these, too, we must search. For if all other books are the voice of men, the Bible is the Word of God. At the last, we are poor, indeed, if we have not lived by every word that cometh out of the mouth of God.

A Devout Policeman

Mr. Kimura, a Japanese evangelist, has been holding successful meetings in a tent near the Parliament buildings in Tokyo. This holds 1,500 or more people. Large numbers of decisions for the Christian life are reported—in some cases fifty to one hundred in an evening. Among them has been a policeman sent to keep order. He subscribed from his meager income for twenty New Testaments for distribution among inquirers.

A Strange Race

The Dinkas of the Eastern Sudan, among whom an Australian mission has recently started operations, are a people of cattle herders. They have the habit of knocking out their two lower front teeth, which makes utterance indistinct and, so far, renders more difficult for the missionary the task of conversing with them in their own language. Another curious habit which distinguishes these blacks is that of standing for hours on one leg while watching their cattle.

The Way Is Short

I think we are too ready with complaint
In this fair world of God's. Had we no hope Indeed beyond the zenith and the slope
Of yon gray blank of sky, we might be faint
To muse upon eternity's constraint
Round our aspirant souls. But since the scope
Must widen early, is it well to droop,
For a few days consumed in loss and taint?
O pusillanimous heart, be comforted,
And, like a cheerful traveler, take the road,
Singing beside the hedge. What if the bread
Be bitter in thine inn, and thou unshod
To meet the flints! At least it may be said:
"Because the way is short, I thank thee, God!"

—ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

Be Alive

BY REV. JAMES MUDGE, D.D.

This is much the same as saying,
Don't die before your time; don't be dead while having a name to live. Some corpses stay altogether too long above the ground unburied; or, at least, some people have too close a resemblance to that unpleasant mass of motionless, nerveless tissue; they are moribund, if not worse. While not actually or literally defunct, they are fundamentally deficient in vitality; they are practically blind and deaf and dumb, eyeless, ear-less, voiceless and hopelessly somnolent.
We have all seen such, and it is not an agreeable sight. We must prefer to behold those who are wide-awake and alert, with abounding vigor and downright earnestness. It is these who achieve and arrive and enjoy. They revel in the happy things to the production of which they contribute. They are enterprising, enthusiastic, energetic.
They effervesce not unfrequently, and their neighbors experience a rejuvenes-cence by rubbing up against them. They are a good deal given to expressing themselves; their testimony, at fitting times, is not withheld. They take an interest in public affairs, and are not satisfied unless they feel that they have done their part in promoting progress and forwarding reform. They can be relied upon to be a factor in producing change for the better, and in fighting for the right.

Some people are half-alive—dead and alive, we designate them. Others are all alive—brisk, active, vivacious, assiduous. They have a dash, a spirit, a promptitude about them which makes them delightful to look upon and helpful to associate with. The former say:
"Let well enough alone: what answered for the fathers will answer for us;
there is a lion in the path; it will slay us." The latter say: "There is a lion in the path; we will slay it; we are fathers; those who went before us are our children, belonging to a younger day, with much less experience; nothing is well enough which can possibly be made better." The favorite Scripture of the former is: "Ask for the old paths, and walk therein." The latter prefer to quote: "Say not, what is the cause that the former days were better than these, for thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this."

Some are fully alive physically. The glow of health is on their cheek, power is in their arms, their step is firm, their glance high, their shout resounds. They know how to be well. They have learned the laws in this department, and found that it pays to keep them. They do their duty by their body, and they have their reward.

Some are fully alive mentally. They are keenly interested in the topics of the day and the books of the season.
They enjoy a good talk with people of intelligence, can hold their own in brisk conversation, can think a theme through, and produce a paper on it worthy of attention. Their information is exact and full, their intellectual capacity decidedly above the average, their pleasure in using their brains very manifest to every one.

Some are fully alive spiritually. They delight above all things in doing the will of God, and in benefiting their fellow men. With them to see an opportunity of usefulness or of improvement in goodness and righteousness is to seize it. They are quick to lay hold of such chances, and to make them. They plan to gain a little more of the spirit of Christ each day, and to fill up increasingly the measure of their privileges in religious growth. A high ideal of purity and of piety beckons them forward, and they cannot be content with mere ordinary attainments.

But how few there are who combine these three excellencies and are alive at all points, bringing the energy of their nature into play in every direction! How few are developed symmetrically! If in robust health and with a fair degree of mental vigor, they may astonish us with a total lack of interest in the things of the Spirit. Or if they have a considerable enlargement in the latter particular, their character may be very sadly marred, their usefulness depleted if not wholly destroyed, by ignorance and lack of common sense, or by a total disregard of the fundamental rules which control the matter of health.

Also to be noted in many quarters is a deplorable misapprehension of what constitutes true vitality. In physical matters some confound it with bustle and flurry, or with mere bigness and bulging muscles; whereas real strength is oftener indicated by quietness and repose and self-control. Many there are who needlessly expend every day an amount of nervous energy sufficient to prolong their lives not a little and impart a quality to their work now sadly lacking. There is much strength shown in sitting still. Verily our American manners need a larger infusion of self-restraint. The pushing and struggling, the running and rushing—what boots it all but to wear out the nerves the sooner and with smaller genuine accomplishment?

In mental matters it is not necessarily the sign of high and generous life to take up with every new idea, to adopt quickly whatever strange theory knocks for admission at the door of the mind or of society—to become, in short, a fadist. Nor does it show strength of intellect uniformly to resist innovation, unmindful of the truth that "new occasions teach new duties." Spiritually many make the sad mistake of confounding noise, vociferation and emotional demonstration with real power; nor can they understand that "in quietness and confidence shall be their strength," and "he that believeth shall not make haste."

Let us, then, be thoroughly and genuinely alive in body, mind and soul;
alive in thought, in business, in society, in church and in our individual spirituality! Electricity is in the air these days. Wake up! Keep moving! Push ahead! Do your best! Nearly all of us need to hear these salutations, and lay to heart these cogitations. If we think of them long enough, it may arouse us to a more sedulous activity, and produce within us a greater fulness of immortality. —EXCHANGE.

Ohio Gaining Ground

As a result of the last election Ohio remains speckled black and white on the prohibition map, with white predominating. The voters of the State—to be more exact, the voters of its two large cities—defeated the prohibition amendment to the State constitution by a majority of 40,000. The dries, however, are rejoicing over the marked advance in prohibition sentiment. A year ago State-wide prohibition was rejected by a majority of 84,000 (which is, it is well to remember, only five per cent. of the total vote); this year that majority was cut in two. Last year seventy of the eighty-eight counties voted dry; this year seventy-four. Cincinnati alone, it is said, keeps the State in the wet column. The brewers' "stability" measure, which would have prevented for six years a vote on any constitutional amendment which had been twice defeated, was lost.

Our Bridge

No man can meet the whole burden of man's sin. Only God Himself can do this. So God became man in Christ Jesus in order that he might do it. For the first and the only time in all history God and man were completely and uniquely one in Jesus. Because God became the Man Jesus, Jesus was and is God. This fact is the guarantee of the sufficiency of the atonement which the God-Man wrought for us by his death. His atonement would not have been sufficient had he been only a perfect man. As Bishop Moule has said,

"A Saviour not quite God is a bridge broken at the farther end." But, thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift, our Bridge reaches from the lowest depths of our hopeless sin to the heights of the very holiness of God himself.
Christ carries us from the uttermost to the uttermost, and keeps us safe every step of the way.

The Comfort of God's Word

The latest report of the Leper Society mentions a poor sufferer of Fusan who died full of faith in the life to come.
His poor body, covered with many fearful ulcers for years, had been wasted by the terrible disease so that he was indeed a pitiable object. Last year the leprosy attacked his eyes, and knowing that he would soon lose his sight he committed to memory as quickly as possible passages from the Bible. After his eyes were wasted away till but the empty sockets remained he still comforted himself by meditating upon the assurances of God's Word.

HARD TO DROP

But Many Drop It

A young Calif. wife talks about coffee:

"It was hard to drop Mocha and Java and give Postum a trial, but my nerves were so shattered that I was a nervous wreck and, of course, that means all kinds of ails.

"I did not want to acknowledge coffee caused the trouble, for I was very fond of it. At that time a friend came to live with us, and I noticed that after he had been with us a week he would not drink his coffee any more. I asked him the reason. He replied: 'I have not had a headache since I left off drinking coffee, some months ago, till last week, when I began again here at your table.
I don't see how anyone can like coffee, anyway, after drinking Postum!'

"I said nothing, but at once ordered a package of Postum. That was five months ago, and we have drunk no coffee since, except on two occasions when we had company, and the result each time was that my husband could not sleep, but lay awake and tossed and talked half the night. We were convinced that coffee caused his suffering, so he returned to Postum, convinced that coffee was an enemy, instead of a friend, and he is troubled no more by insomnia.

"I have gained 8 pounds in weight, and my nerves have ceased to quiver.
It seems so easy now to quit coffee that caused our aches and ails and take up Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:
Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

The Call of the New Year

The call of the New Year is Build thee more stately mansions,

Oh, my soul;
As the swift seasons roll,
Leave thy low-vaulted past.

It is the part of wisdom to take from the past the best it has to give, transform it into the terms and uses of the present and then move on to the building of "more stately mansions."

Life holds many hazards, and the happenings of the future are so uncertain that we need to use the present with wise discrimination. Yet no fear need fill the heart of one who trusts the future to God's hands. He guides and controls and we can say under all circumstances, "That's best which God sends; 'twas His will; it is mine."

The thoughts of the New Year should not be thoughts of the ease of attainment, but rather of opportunities for service. With all our plans we must be willing to let God have the most prominent part. We must seek His will, obey His voice, follow His guidance, and trust His love.

Dr. Theodore Cuyler's favorite text for the New Year was: "Let thine eyes look right on and let thine eyelids look straight before thee." There is profit in looking backward, but there is more good in the forward look. It is wise to study the past until we see the mistakes we have made, but it shows more wisdom to look forward and concentrate our gaze upon the things that may be done in the future.

No plan for the New Year is complete without a purpose to pursue definite study of the Bible. To read the Bible daily, to read it through in course or to read it for its poetry, history and philosophy, or to read it to learn the lessons from the life of the Master will infuse into the soul strength of purpose, loftiness of ideal, and loving sympathy with the work of God in the world.

It will help us if we remember during the New Year that only as we give in this world do we get good. The study of the life of some great missionary, such as Verbeck, of Japan, will burn into the soul the truth that the only life worth living is the life of Christian love. This life may be spent on the foreign field, in home mission work, in your own home, or helping the poor and needy in your own community. But if it is a life lived because of love for Christ, and a life patterned after His life, and a life poured out for others as was His life, it will bring blessedness and joy and peace.

Set before you a high ideal, push toward it with unflinching purpose, put your faith in God, and claim His gracious promises.

A poor young man once saw on a scrap of newspaper the sentence, "Push with energy; plod with patience; endure with pluck, and you can do anything that God approves." The words had been written by the president of Walden University. With three nickels in his pocket he plodded to Walden University. He earned his first dollar cleaning up the cellar of a warehouse. He did it so well that he never lacked work, and graduated from college and seminary with credit. He had a goal, and pressed forward to it.

Full well I know my soul's true goal
Lies still, lies ever, there before me;
I could not turn me if I would,
Though clouds and darkness gather o'er me.
And, though I fail and though I die
Far from my goal, my crown unwon,
No meaner star can tempt the eye
That once has known the steadfast sun.

A Congenial Companion

A lady in Texas (Mrs. H. T. Shine of Itasca) has sent us this pleasant message:

"I enclose renewal subscription for the AMERICAN MESSENGER, as I see my time is about out. There are so many bright gems of thought in its columns, I love to linger in its atmosphere. It is a congenial companion. Send it on for another year."

American Tract Society

THIS SOCIETY was organized in 1825. Its work is interdenominational and international in scope, and is commended by all evangelical denominations.

It has published the Gospel messages in 178 languages, dialects and characters. It has been the pioneer for work among the foreign-speaking people in our country, and its missionary colporters are distributing Christian literature in thirty-three languages among the immigrants and making a home-to-home visitation among the spiritually destitute, both in the cities and rural districts, leaving all kinds of Christian literature, also the Bible or portions of the Scriptures.

Its publication of leaflets, volumes and periodicals from the Home Office total 791,142,050 copies. It has made foreign cash appropriations to the amount of $796,137.39, and grants of electrotypes to the value of $61,177.96, by means of which millions of copies of books and tracts have been published at mission stations abroad.

The gratuitous distribution of the past year is to the value of $15,439.05. The grand total of its gratuitous distribution has been to the value of $2,617,820.90, which is the equivalent of over four billion tract pages.

The total number of family visits that have been made by the Society's colporters during the last year is 202,877; the total number of volumes distributed by sale or grant is 59,431, making the total number of volumes that have been circulated by colporters in the last 73 years 17,326,937, and the total number of family visits that they have made during the same period 18,406,676.

Its work, ever widening, is dependent upon donations and legacies, and greatly needs increased offerings.

Let 1916 Be For You
A Bible Year—A Happy Year

Here We Tell You How To Take Part In The Contest

Grown-ups, Youngsters
Equal Enjoyment For All

The hundredth anniversary of the printing of Bibles in America is indeed a fitting time for the inauguration of a popular Bible movement such as the Bible Picture Contest.

Combining work and play, the Contest offers you a veritable pastime of absorbing interest at the same time that you are confronted with a stimulating problem, which you will have to solve, yet which you know you can solve. That is a modern principle of worth-while, enjoyable activity, endorsed by authorities. And once you have started in the Contest, your own satisfaction will be the highest authority of all.

Do you know your Bible? If you feel warranted in answering in the affirmative, you need not be told that there is no such thing as knowing the Bible too well. The Contest will please you all the more because of your familiarity with the subjects presented; and your insight into things Biblical should increase in depth. Further, the process of the Contest as such will be found by you a profitable mental exercise.

Don't you know your Bible as well as you might? Undoubtedly you are about to make a New Year's resolution to bring yourself nearer to the lasting fount of comfort and inspiration during the months of 1916. Let us help you keep that resolution! Let the Bible Picture Contest lead the way. You will be having real pleasure while taking part in the Contest, and you will be happy with the result.

Family circle and classroom can both derive advantage from the Bible Picture Contest. It teaches while it pleases, and pleases while it teaches. Instructors and parents can easily see what fine amusement the Contest will give the young folks, and what splendid entertainment they themselves will be afforded by it, while important facts and worthy thoughts are spontaneously assimilated.

Spread the news among your friends, young and old, whatever their tastes or occupation. They will all like the Contest. Everybody is eligible and there is room for all. Each contestant will acknowledge receiving unbounded benefit from the Bible Picture Contest itself, even though no reward is earned; yet you have a very good opportunity to achieve a considerable reward in addition to the pleasure of the Contest for 419 rewards will be given away for the best answers to the Pictures and, in the event of ties, each tying contestant will receive the full reward without diminution; so there may be even more winners than the numerous company of over four hundred. The result is in your own control all the time.

If you are glad to be in the Contest, think of the men, boys, girls and women who would also appreciate this novel feature. Pass on the good word. Tell everybody you know. Those you tell will thank you. We are doing our utmost to make the Contest interesting and naturally we should like to reach all the people who might be interested. Won't you lend a hand?

You yourself should not delay. Read on the right how the pictures are to be solved, and in the last column note the details regarding the obtaining of all the pictures, the list of eligible answers, etc. Let the Contest fill your spare quarter and half hours. The answers to the pictures are NOT to be sent in now. Wait until you have received all the pictures; then you will be asked to send in your complete set of answers for the whole series of pictures.

OBSERVE THIS OBJECT LESSON!

It was chosen purposely just because you might, at first sight, say it looks hard, for it does not represent any very famous historical incident, known to all. But, in this Bible Picture Contest, that fact makes no difference. Your minute knowledge is not up for examination. It is your observation that is being tested, your ability to "put two and two together," for you need only pick your answer, according to your own judgment, out of a given list.

In the case of this illustration you are invited to choose what is most suitable, from among the following quotations:

They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.—Psalm 124:5.

The soul of the sluggard desireth, and hath nothing; but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat.—Proverbs 13:11.

And I saw the seven angels which stood before God; and to them were given seven trumpets.—Revelation 8:2.

And the dove came into him in the evening and, lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf plucked off: so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth.—Genesis 8:2.

And when he sowed, some seeds fell by the wayside, and the fowls came and devoured them up.—Matthew 13:4.

And when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the hall, and were set down together, Peter sat down among them.—Luke 22:55.

Isn't that easy?

You do not have to search the entire Bible from cover to cover, for answers to each picture. A list of 2,000 verses has been set up as the standard of eligible Bible verses to be submitted as answers to the pictures. The Contest will consist of your choosing the most appropriate texts out of the selected 2,000 verses. That is fair.

You may use your own Bible or that of church or reading room. That goes without saying. You may freely obtain the standard references. However, we should not be surprised if you were soon wishing that someone had taken all the available Bible verses together, for ready reference in the Contest. In response to expected demand we are fortunately able to announce the offer (as explained below), of "Gems from the Bible," containing the answers to the pictures, and representing a uniquely valuable book that you should be glad to own.

The Bible Picture Contest consists of sixty pictures, two of which appear on the upper part of this page. Space will not permit the reproducing of all of them here. However, the pictures up to date will be given with "Gems from the Bible" and will in such cases be followed by all the pictures in due course.

The full Rules of the Contest are free on application (please send two-cent stamp, if you wish a copy), and in no way is expense required in the Contest. As we announced in the preliminary statement of our December issue, the Bible Picture Contest is backed by the well-known national weekly, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (Bible House, New York City).

Our motive in bringing this Contest to you is, we need scarcely say, to earn your good will, keep your interest and enlarge our circle of readers. So we undertake to have the complete Outfit sent to those persons who send us their subscriptions. The subscription may be new, or renewal (that is, to extend a present subscription for another year, no matter when the present one would naturally expire); and may be for yourself or for some other person, from whom you have solicited the subscription or to whom you present it as a gift. And, undoubtedly, in addition to receiving THE AMERICAN MESSENGER regularly during the Contest, you will desire THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Our offer is, therefore, to give the Bible Picture Contest OUTFIT with one yearly subscription for THE AMERICAN MESSENGER, and one yearly subscription for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, upon receipt of $2.10 for the combination. The two subscriptions may be for the same person or for different persons.

Gift Subscriptions

A number of friends have responded to the appeal for funds with which to provide gift subscriptions for those who are unable to pay the subscription price of the AMERICAN MESSENGER. One valued subscriber remitted the money to pay for sending the paper to frontier Christian workers, and as the result eight home missionaries in North Dakota are now enjoying the monthly visits of this paper, who otherwise would not have received it.

Other gift subscriptions have been sent to the sick in hospitals, to the poor, the aged and to various other needy ones.

But though there have been numerous responses to the appeal, nevertheless additional gifts for this purpose are still needed. A large amount of money could be wisely spent in furnishing gift subscriptions to those who are richly deserving of the paper, but who are themselves utterly unable to meet the cost. All contributions for this purpose will be gladly welcomed and will be applied to meet the neediest cases.

Please send all such subscriptions to the AMERICAN MESSENGER, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York City.

The Winning Christian Life.

BY REV. CHARLES H. MORGAN, PH.D.

There are two senses in which a Christian life may be a winning life. The first and major question with everyone who has yielded himself to Christ must be: Is my Christian life a winning life in the light of the consciousness, purpose and hopes of my own heart? Then the second and no less vital question remains: Is my Christian life a winning life in the eyes of my fellows, and in the light of its possible service in leading others to Christ and furthering the whole work of the kingdom?

I pray that I may be able in this brief article to take the gloriously winning lives of a few Christian workers and leaders of recent decades, and gather out of them three conclusions which may serve as guide-posts pointing us forward into the winning life.

First, nearly all the marvelously winning lives that have been mightily used by our Lord seem to be marked by crises, or points where they were suddenly uplifted by the transforming power of the Spirit of God into the more victorious and abundant life which they sought. There is something rhythmic, epochal, or even cataclysmic in the history of life, along with its periods of silent growth. Have you had your epochs of sublime new vision, your hours of tremendous self-searching, your days when faith rose on strong pinions and ranged the empyrean, your Gethsemanes when the soul wrestled before God in overwhelming sorrow and abasement, your "heavenly places" when the whole being was suffused with love divine?

F. B. Meyer has told us how he came to such a crisis when he was pastor of a church in an interior town in England, having what might be called prosperity, and yet feeling as if the ship of his life were just rolling in the trough of the wave. One of the athletic young men of Cambridge, coming back from missionary service in China, stood up in Mr. Meyer's pulpit in the joy and freedom of complete abandonment to the Divine good pleasure. His words, thrilling with victorious fulness of life, bore home to Mr. Meyer a sense of his spirit-poverty. Later, in contrite prayer, he seemed to be offering to Christ the ring with its keys to the chambers of his life, but he was reserving one little key to a cupboard by the back-stairs of his nature holding a trivial indulgence which he presumed to think was a matter of indifference. Then came the agonizing sense that Christ was going away, saying: "If you do not trust me with all, you do not trust me at all." Meyer at the very summit of his crisis held out the little key in his hand, saying: "Lord, I do not seem to have the strength to give it, but if you will come back and take it, it is yours." Christ came and took it, and it was not a month before the little cupboard and its contents were forever cleared away, and Mr. Meyer went forth to his many years of world-ranging service and power.

There were several remarkable points of crisis in the development of the spiritual life and soul-winning energy of Mr. Moody. One was, of course, his conversion. Another was the farewell prayer-meeting in Chicago of a consumptive young man and his Sunday-school class of disorderly girls, all of whom had been won to Jesus by the pleadings of the teacher in their homes. The pathetic, melting atmosphere of that meeting set Moody on fire, and made him a lifelong seeker of the unsaved. Again, when Henry Varley declared in England, "The world has yet to see what God will do with a man who is fully and wholly consecrated to him," Mr. Moody said humbly to himself, "I will try my best to be that man," and thus made it one of the great uplift points in his course. Once again, he found that two devoted women in Chicago were praying intensely that he might receive the power of the Spirit, and shortly afterward in New York, in answer to his own repeated cry, a marvelous baptism of the Spirit came upon him. He says: "I went to preaching again. The sermons were not different, and yet hundreds were converted. I have been growing younger ever since. I used to be very tired when preaching three times a week; now I can preach five times a day and never get tired at all." Similar crises can be seen in the progressive and winning power of the lives of Charles G. Finney, David Livingstone, Horace Bushnell, Frances Ridley Havergal, Bishop William Taylor and others.

Another and the very central guide-board toward the winning life which we may gather out of the experience of those who have greatly won is complete and, in the end, delighted embracing of the will of God. This is not mere submission to or acquiescence in God's will, but joyous and perfect oneness of heart with that will when the relationship attains completeness. Says Stephen Olin: "I rest in God. I am satisfied with Him. His will is mine. Mine is swallowed up in His." Horace Bushnell puts it as "the trusting of one's being to a Being, there to be rested, kept, guided, molded, governed and possessed forever." Miss Havergal says: "He has granted me fully to rejoice in His will." The last of Charles George Gordon's four great standards of his life was, "To follow in all things the will of God."

The third precious index pointing us to the winning life is likeness to Christ. Gladstone's most intense desire was that he "might grow into the image of his Redeemer." Moody said of Henry Drummond: "He was the most Christ-like man I ever knew." Shortly before his death Phillips Brooks, in writing to a young man, said: "These last years have had a peace and fulness which there did not use to be. I am sure it is a deeper knowledge and truer look of Christ. He is here. He knows me, and I know Him. It is not a figure of speech. It is the realest thing in the world." Likeness to Christ thus takes on a certain identification with Him. Charles G. Trumbull, editor of the Sunday School Times, used these words about the great change which recently came to him: "I had always known that Christ was my Saviour; but I had looked upon Him as an external Saviour. But now I know something better than that, that Jesus Christ is actually and literally within me; that he has constituted Himself my whole life, my very self."

Canada's Whitening Map

The vote for prohibition in Newfoundland was more than four times as large as the vote against it—24,965 for, 5,348 against. The law required that forty per cent. of the voters registered at the last election vote on the question. Of the fifteen electoral constituencies, eleven gave more than the required number of votes, and all others except two recorded large majorities in its favor. The election was held last November, but on account of stormy weather ballot boxes in the St. Barbe district could not be collected for some weeks—and it was this district which turned the tide for prohibition. The law becomes effective January 1, 1917.

Canada has set out to "make the map all white." Province-wide prohibition obtains in Prince Edward Island and in Alberta. In Nova Scotia it applies to all the province except the capital city, Halifax, which may outlaw the drink traffic by popular vote. Saskatchewan has a law abolishing liquor in all bars and clubs until after the war—then a vote of the people is to decide the question. The sale in shops is at present under control of the provincial government. In the other provinces a large proportion of territory is under prohibition through local option.

A Welcome Grant

The grant of a library, which was recently sent by the American Tract Society to a Sunday-school in South Carolina, has brought forth this acknowledgment:

"I was surprised and delighted yesterday to receive the package of fifteen beautiful books by express, and to-day there comes a letter to say they had been sent free of all charge, except that of transportation which we will gladly pay.

"I cannot express to you how much pleasure these books will give to our small community, both children and their elders. I think the selection is excellent and the volumes look delightful and promise much enjoyment for a long time to come.

"The Sunday-school wishes me to express to the American Tract Society our warmest thanks and appreciation of this generous gift."

Libraries Free

The American Tract Society is ready to give a limited number of excellent libraries free of all expense except the cost of transportation to needy Sunday-schools, mission churches and Christian schools among the negroes and mountain whites.

This offer is made to cover only those cases in which the recipients are themselves unable to pay anything toward the actual cost of the books that they urgently need.

Application for such libraries should be made at once to the General Secretary of the American Tract Society, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y.

Each applicant should state the reason why the church or school is unable to pay for the books needed, the number and ages of the scholars, and should also contain a guarantee for the payment of the transportation charges, if a library is sent.

Action of the Church Peace Union

Dr. Frederick Lynch, Secretary of the Church Peace Union, states that the union is unqualifiedly opposed to the present-day demand for increased armaments for the United States, and that the trustees have decided that not only should an appeal be made to the people to withstand such a demand, but that Congress should be asked to discover how the $250,000,000 now spent annually on our defenses may be more effectively expended, if it is true that neither the Army nor the Navy are in a state of efficiency, in spite of that enormous expenditure.

The stand of the Church Peace Union is outlined in a resolution calling upon men everywhere to renounce the policy of armed peace, which was passed at a meeting of the trustees held in New York City at the residence of the Right Rev. David H. Greer, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of New York. Bishop Greer is the president of the union. The resolutions follow:

"Whereas, The world is passing through an awful crisis, and men everywhere are sorely confused in their notions and bewildered in their judgments, and

"Whereas, It is the duty of God-fearing men to increase in the world the stock of good-will, and to devise means by which the recurrence of the present world tragedy may be rendered impossible, and

"Whereas, The United States, because of its position and power and traditions, is under bonds to do what it can toward the reshaping of the opinion of nations, and the molding of a new and nobler world policy, therefore be it

"Resolved, That we ask all the pastors and teachers and other religious leaders to bend their minds to the great task of creating and fostering a deeper spirit of racial sympathy and international good-will, and of exalting in men's hearts the divine ideals of human brotherhood, and be it

"Resolved, That we appeal to the American people to withstand the present demand for increased armament for the United States. We are already spending each year the enormous sum of $250,000,000 on the Army and Navy, and if neither of these is now efficient we would ask that Congress discover how the money of the people may be more effectively expended.

"Upon the hearts of the American people we would enroll the duty of national preparedness in mind and spirit, that we may worthily meet the crucial situation by which we are now confronted. Military preparedness having proved to be inadequate as a safeguard to the world's peace, we call upon men everywhere to renounce the policy of armed peace and to seek and follow a better way."

GEORGE ERNEST MERRIAM.

"THE TREASURES OF THE SNOW"

BY

REV. GEORGE ERNEST MERRIAM

Associate Minister of Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn, New York

In the North country the month of February is the period not only of snowstorms, but of accumulated snowbanks. It is the time for re-reading "Snow-bound." It is also the time for turning again the pages of the history of our country.

February is of interest to many as being the only month—though the shortest in the year—containing two national holidays. To all real patriots it is notable that both these days are set apart in memory of men whose birth month it is and who outrank all others in the national gallery of fame; each through loyal admirers claims the first place in the hearts of their countrymen; each stands out in the annals of the past, like a snow-crowned mountain summit, rugged, stern, almost awesome, rising above lesser peaks and dominating the landscape.

We can learn notable lessons from the lives of these two Greathearts of the past. We can also learn the mightier lessons, of time and eternity, from nature's strangest, most fascinating, yes, most miraculous, gift of the season, descending at this time of the year like manna from Heaven. We have therefore a double object lesson presented—one from biography and one from meteorology.

Thus the almost blinding glare of the snow suggests the effect upon the hero-worshipper of the immaculate shining characters of the two men we so greatly revere, making it difficult for the worshipper to see his hero's simple, practical, every-day humanity. Again, as there is a certain cold and chill in the presence of snow, so there was in our first President a reserve of manner, a stateliness of action, a calmness of speech that kept men at a distance; but as God never spread a warmer coverlet over the grasses and the wild flowers than that of the snow mantle, keeping the heart of sleeping nature pulsating till the Springtime, so beneath the Washingtonian dignity there was a deep and genuine sympathy for all mankind, for the Indian, the Negro and the alien, as well as for the neighbor in homespun.

What of the wider and more profound teachings of these winged messengers of the skies? In the epic of Job, Jehovah himself is represented as asking, "Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow?" It is a supreme challenge—for men of to-day as well as for the patriarch of old.

The treasures of the snow—not its beauties. The latter we all recognize—the delicate varied formations of the separate crystals, the brilliancy of the white garments woven over night for hillside and meadow land, the dazzling jewels that bedeck the forest trees to the topmost, endmost twigs, the ice palaces over rocks that before were hideous in their bareness. Oh, yes; but what of the treasures of the snow?

The treasures—not the pleasures of the snow. We have shared the latter—snowballing, skating, sliding, sleighing, with all their accompaniments. But what of the former?

The treasures of the snow—the word indicates mines to be worked, storehouses to be opened; marvels of material energy, laws of physics and perhaps of ethics as well, principles of philosophy and without a doubt, a new, though old, religion of hope. Have you entered into the treasures of the snow?

Consider the power of co-operation as taught by these fairy missives, these diamond discs, dropped from above. Tyndall, the great physicist, tells us somewhat of this concealed energy; listen!

"I have seen the wild stone avalanches of the Alps which smoke and thunder down the declivities with a vehemence almost sufficient to stun the observer. I have also seen the snow flakes descending so softly as not to hurt the fragile spangles of which they were composed; yet to produce from aqueous vapor a quantity of that tender material which a child could carry, demands an exertion of energy competent to gather up the shattered blocks of the largest stone avalanche I have ever seen and pitch them to twice the height from which they fell."

We brush the feathery whiteness from our coat sleeve as it falls, and before it reaches the ground it ceases to be. Yet an hour and the "baby blizzard" has become a giant which stops the locomotive as with a single hand. Business is blocked, armies are halted—even defeated.

So a Washington in Colonial days and a Lincoln in times of civil war, gathered together the atomic flakes of human patriotism, and, as with resistless hosts from the unseen, snowed under the opposing forces, or at least impeded the enemy's approach. Alas, that our Christian leaders seem unable to crystallize and organize the infinite forces of righteousness in the battle with unrighteousness. We stand ashamed in the presence alike of statesmen and of snowstorms.

Then, too, our apathy indicates a loss of enthusiasm. It is always warmer when the snow is falling in battalions, and there is always an esprit de corps that comes with the mere assembling of men and women for a common purpose.

Again, the white clad spokesmen of Winter tell of a purity, pristine but evanescent and easily lost. The saddest poem ever written was entitled "Beautiful Snow."

Supposedly autobiographic, it told of a human soul (maidenly and crystal fair) that had fallen from heaven to earth; alas! that was but half the tragic truth—"from heaven to hell!" How? Because, though "pure as a snowflake," her life had been trampled upon by the greed and lusts of men, till only the filth from their heels was seen, and the divine image was lost to sight in the slow accretions of that which was of the earth earthy. So you and I have seen the oft-repeated melodrama of the snow—white, matchless, beautiful, defiled and unrecognizable in the open sewers of life.

On the woodwork that framed the picture of a baby boy, the artist painted the words:

"What is so pure as the spirit of a little child, Fresh from God's hand and therefore undefiled."

Alas, how often, as the boy grows to manhood, he wanders into the far country, and there with his fellows comes under the sceptred blandishments of the modern Circe and, afterwards, finds his all too congenial though shameful abode, failing to distinguish a trough from a table and still calling his sty a palace, till Ulysses draws near.

God be thanked! there is an Ulysses. As he liberated the men of Ithica; as Washington released this land from a foreign yoke, as Lincoln brought a greater freedom—freedom from our own national wrongs and system of injustice, freedom from the slough of slavery; even so Christ comes to "save the lost"—to purify His people from their sins.

One of the religious editors has told of the water drop in the gutter longing for the purity of the overarching blue and, in answer to the inarticulate cry, came a whiteness of soul even beyond the knowledge of its heart for, lifted from its slimy prison by the sunlight magnet, it was wafted here and there in ever varying, ever more rarified altitudes, till at last it was gently laid upon some distant mountain crest—a spotless, perfect flake of snow. So the Sun of Righteousness shines upon our bemuddled souls “with healing in his wings” and transforms and regenerates when our longing permits Him to will it so.

Washington and Lincoln were worthy of the old Roman “toga virilis,” the robe of white, emblematic of unbesmirched, unselfish citizenship. And you and I—if we are worthy—may yet put on the Gospel “wedding garment.” But what an “if”—what if we are found without it! Is there no need of the prayer, “Wash me and I shall be whiter than snow.”

Hearken once more to these snowy harbingers from on high. For there is a note we do not like—most of us—to hear. It concerns the brevity of life. So perfect are the snowflakes, yet, in an instant perhaps, they are gone, or at most their lifetime is a single season.

How typical of man. His life is as a watch in the night, as a flood at its height, as a sleep, as grass that groweth up only to be cut down, as a tale that is told, or (according to a marginal reading) as a sigh. You may remember the inimitable summary of Joseph Cook:

“Man’s life means Tender teens,
Teachable twenties,
Tireless thirties,
Fiery forties,
Forcible fifties,
Serious sixties,
Sacred seventies,
Aching eighties,
Shortening breath,
Death,
The sod,
God.”

If we are thoughtful we cannot look at the falling snow without repeating once again and with a new emphasis, “Behold, now is the acceptable time; behold, now is the day of salvation.”

The youth of our land are taught to see in the great heroes of this month models whom they are to copy. Happy are they, and happy will their country be in them, if on the twelfth and on the twenty-second of February they are mindful of the manner in which these men used the hours of their youth, seizing upon the minutes as golden sands in the ever-onward flowing stream of time.

Let us, young and old alike, while the year is still in its waking hours, take as our motto Longfellow’s clarion verse:

Trust no Future, howe’er pleasant,
Let the dead Past bury its dead.
Act! Act in the living Present,
Heart within and God o’erhead.

But if the soft singers of this surpliced choir tell of the “shortness of the span of human life” they also hint that this life is not all. Rather, they tell us that Heaven is our goal. They seem to chorus, as they fall, the poet’s words, “trailing clouds of glory, do we come from God, who is our home.” Thus the snowflakes remind us whence we come and whither we go. We see them softly descending their Jacob’s ladder, or again, in dizzy whirl, hurtling downward as from the very battlements of Heaven. Then in the time of sudden thaw or of the spring freshet, they disappear, but we know that by combined waterways and pathways, by the stream, the sea and the sunbeam, they return to the aerial cloudlands where they were born. Not otherwise with us. Heaven-born, earth-loaned, as they, so we, too, muse be Heaven reclaimed.

He who told of God’s care for the sparrow, had He lived in our wintry latitude, surely would have dwelt upon the divine graciousness as evinced in the tempering of the wind, not merely to the shorn lamb, but to the water globules so that, in an instant of time they “are changed from glory to glory,” from the iridescent perfection of the rain drop to the pellucid perfection of the snow crystal with its spangled filaments, its varied symmetry, its frosted delicacy, its matchless grace and beauty. Through every icy particle, every one of these myriad and miraculous bits of congealed moisture, Christ says to us, “Shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith.” How can we look upon the fast falling flakes without thinking of the author of these words and His quiet, assured statement, “In my Father’s house are many mansions.”

There, not here, is Home. Who can describe it? None. Even John the Beloved Disciple can only hint with his marvelous metaphors, and the Apostle Paul must confess, “Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him.”

Nevertheless we may look forward to blessed associations with old-time acquaintances and friends and relatives, and with others known to us only through the medium of the printed page—Washington and Lincoln, Shakespeare and Homer, Galileo and Socrates, John and Paul, and many others of whom they are but the high representatives—and finally with Him, the friend that sticketh closer than a brother, known through the mystical experience of a Christian faith; for He will be waiting to receive us unto Himself that where He is, there we may be also.

A Wonderful Transformation

In a brief but blustering blizzard a commuter made his way homeward slowly and with difficulty. Passing through the Italian settlement at the foot of the mountain path, leading up to his home, he noted, even in the deepening darkness, a great change.

That very morning, although democratic in spirit and a true Christian at heart, he could not but feel a sense of irritation, of repulsion and almost of shame that (so close to his sequestered woodland home with its vistas, horizon wide and valley long) there should exist this community with its down-at-the-heel houses (rather shacks) and its much be-patched fences, with its gutters and even its roadway and door yards reeking with filth, pledging vermin and threatening disease. Now all was covered over with a white mantle as by the charity of God, and he found his heart stirred by a strange new sympathy and he wondered if they had wood to burn and food to eat.

The next afternoon, when at last the seemingly endless pathway was cut through to the street, what a change! To be sure, all the world was new—it was indeed a miracle world—but here the transformation was beyond words to paint. Hovel and hut, hedge-row and hodge-podge were gone and in their place, against a background of ice-clad trees and snow-mantled crags (a veritable fairy land) were massed miniature, but Aladdin-like palaces, minaretted mosques and crystal temples, telling so significantly not only of God in His heaven, but of God in His universe—even the worst of it—even where seemingly belittled and ruined by the carelessness of man.

The world was better because a Washington was born. It is better because Lincoln lived and loved and labored. Will it be better because we have had a part therein?

Will we give God a chance to do permanently through us—what every winter He does with the snowflakes—“make all things new?” This world would be not decadent, but resplendent, if we all filled our particular though infinitesimal niche or covered our assigned though minutest twig end—if we took our place with a multitude of others in clothing and changing individuals, and so society itself, with and through the magic of love—a love that forgets, forgives and regenerates.

Stringing the Beads

BY REV. C. A. S. DWIGHT, PH.D.

SUCCESS in life depends largely on what may be metaphorically described as finding a string for the beads. Human experience is made up of a multitude of items of knowledge, choice, affection and service. What we deal with most of the time is trifles, concerning which a famous artist once said to his pupil, “Perfection is made up of trifles, and perfection is no trifle.” The raw material of our daily experience comes to us, as it were, in the form of a handful of beads. Thrown promiscuously into a bowl these beads hardly interest us, but when strung on a cord, itself hardly visible, they begin to disclose their charm, and add beauty to the person. It is the string that lends order, arrangement, coherence and charm to the beads.

So in dealing with the varied experiences of our daily lives we need to find the string on which to thread these activities, thus binding them together into one whole of practical utility and moral beauty. This is what we mean by “organizing the life” and “unifying character.” In this distracting age, when all sorts of appeals to think this or to do that are made to us hourly, we need to find some working principle for selection, and to apply a supreme moral test to these claims and causes, or we shall be lost in a maze of perplexity and indecision, dissipating our energies on a mass of insignificant incidents.

The Strand of Christian Consecration

The one strong strand of systematizing purpose, which will provide an “order of the day” for every possible situation in life, is Christian consecration. This is the golden string on which should be threaded all the affairs, little and big, in which we have a right to be interested, and if there are any thoughts, feelings or actions which are not in harmony with that consecration, we have no business to be occupied with them. In consistency with this ruling passion to serve Christ in all that we do, we shall find, if we seek for them, many special purposes on which, using now one and again another design, we can string our thought and interest. A particular campaign of evangelism, a special course of study, the organizing of a Home Department, a term of teaching, a tour of visiting, or a plan for social service, may knit together our otherwise random efforts, lend proportion to our plans, supply the emphasis in the right place, and give definite, positive, and practical efficiency to our Christian consecration.

Not all kinds of beads require precisely the same kind of threading, nor will all lives be organized for Christ in the same way, but all alike should be mastered and unified by a high and heavenly purpose, and presented at last, like so many clustered jewels, as a precious offering to the King of kings.

Winter

BY GEORGE LAWRENCE ANDREWS

The flowers all are dead on the bare hills
Where summer’s fairest gold-eyed daisies stood,
While hushed in frozen silence are the rills,
And silence reigns in all the solemn wood.
Yet winter with its sere and frozen fields
Has charms that golden summer never knew;
For Beauty still her magic scepter wields,
And crystal blossoms hang where roses grew.
The frost-sprites carve bright emblems on the pane,
And whitened grass blades glisten everywhere;
A solemn peace envelops hill and plain,
And there is strength in winter’s frosty air.
Let others grieve for verdant summer gone,
But I sing winter’s praise till spring shall dawn.

Evangelistic Work at the Korean Industrial Exhibition

By Gerald Bonwick

FIVE years have passed since Korea became an integral part of the Japanese Empire. During that period many important improvements have been made in the system of government, in roads, railways and other transportation facilities, in educational matters as well as in industrial and agricultural methods.

To celebrate the five years of annexation and to afford an opportunity for demonstrating the progress that has been made, the Government recently held an exhibition in Seoul.

It was the first time that the people of Korea had seen anything of the kind, and large crowds came from all parts of the country to see this exhibition, which was held on quite an extensive scale. The popularity of the enterprise is attested by the fact that over three-quarters of a million people passed through the turnstiles during the two months of the exhibition.

The Christians of Korea felt that a unique opportunity was presented for preaching the Gospel, and they determined to organize an evangelistic campaign on a suitable scale. The Government authorities were most sympathetic and granted the use of the finest site in the city, located on the main road leading to the entrance to the exhibition.

Money was subscribed by the churches in all parts of Korea, a donation was sent by a friend in America and the missionaries themselves made substantial gifts toward the expenses. By the aid of these contributions the committee was enabled to put up the building, designed by the writer, a picture of which appears on the front page of this issue of the AMERICAN MESSENGER. This building contained three separate halls. The large "Union Evangelistic Hall" in the center was used for cinematograph services. The hall on the left was used for Japanese and the one on the right for Korean services. Each hall was provided with inquiry rooms, and the Korean Religious Tract Society and the Bible societies had prominent bookstalls in the front of the building. Verses of Scriptures in four languages, as well as international flags, helped to decorate the exterior, and large colored pictures with suitable texts served the same purpose within.

The cinematograph services ran daily and were an admirable means of preaching the Gospel through the eye. "The Life of St. Paul," "Belshazzar's Feast," "The Story of the First Christmas," and a number of Indian missionary films were most popular. Over eighty displays were given and 21,500 people attended these moving picture gatherings.

Continuous preaching services in the Korean language were held every day except at the hours when the cinematograph was running. Every church in Seoul and vicinity supplied workers and preachers in turn, each denomination being responsible for certain periods in rotation, and there were no failures to keep the appointments made. Scores of voluntary tract-distributors met the passers-by and personally invited and conducted them into these gospel services.

Daily services were held in Japanese, and, considering the small proportion of Japanese in the crowds outside, the results were good. The Rev. S. Kimura, who has been called the "Billy Sunday" of Japan, came specially from Japan to conduct services at this hall for three days.

The approximate attendances at all meetings during the campaign was 100,000 people. At the Korean services there were 73,500; at the cinematograph services 21,500 and at the Japanese services 5,000. During the campaign 11,627 names and addresses of inquirers who had been personally dealt with were registered and particulars were forwarded to the churches in all parts of the country. This may seem a large proportion of the attendances until it is remembered that almost all those attending were new to Christian teaching.

A missionary who has been in the thick of work writes: "It has been the greatest hand-to-hand evangelistic opportunity I have seen in years. In spite of the noise and tumult in the building, with crowds going and coming, man after man that I have talked with has come at once to the most earnest consideration of the question of his own soul. Over 200 names were taken during one day, but the effect upon the Christians of the city goes far beyond what those numbers tell. There were about fifteen men at my church last Sunday who had given in their names at the Campaign Hall. Two of the men with whom I talked in the hall are going home to establish churches in their own houses. One said he had attended church a couple of months in a southern province, but since moving to a non-Christian town he had lapsed. He will begin at once to hold services with an intimate friend to help him. The other was a man of good family from the far south. He said his house was the biggest in his town, and if a helper or pastor would come and stay there a week, he would let them use his house for a church, and become a Christian himself. I wrote to the missionary in charge of the district where he lives to look after him at once."

In acknowledging names and addresses of inquirers that had been forwarded to him, a missionary in the far south reports that some of these new believers had already called upon him before he had time to visit them, and are attending church services. Another missionary who is working in the north of Korea says: "A great impression has been made on the minds of the people in the country villages who have visited Seoul and the exhibition. To find a large tabernacle just outside the exhibition grounds, and services continually in progress without let or hindrance from the officials has given them a different opinion of the 'Jesus Doctrine' Church. Many of them had scarcely seen anything outside of their own village, and in many of these places the church consists of a very few people who meet together for worship in a Korean house."

Another missionary in Seoul says: "My wife has long been interested in a certain woman living close to our home, but she never dared to attend a Christian service because of opposition on the part of her husband. On the way to the exhibition one day the husband was laid hold of by a tract distributor, and, after a short conversation, he was induced to enter the Campaign Hall. There he was led to surrender to Christ, and on his return home he told the joyful news to his family. They all commenced to attend church together the following Sunday, and now the whole family are earnest believers and preparing for baptism."

And so the story might be continued with the records of many other acknowledged results of this campaign, but the full number influenced will never be known. It may be that hundreds who registered their names may never be found, but it is evident that thousands have been stirred up to a spirit of inquiry and faith, and we believe that church workers throughout Korea will find a great joy in helping them into the full light of the Gospel.

Responding to the Right Influence

BY WILLIAM NORRIS BURR

Thomas Wentworth Higginson once told a neighbor that her fears lest her younger sister should grow up ignorant were groundless. "There is a large and finely selected library in your house," he said. "She will not grow up ignorant. You see, she is exposed to books. She is certain to get something of what is in them."

Ah, that depends, Mr. Higginson! Suppose that younger sister turned her back upon that fine library and never opened one of those choice books. Suppose that she chose to give herself wholly to drudge work, or to trifling pleasures, or to a life of petty complainings, or to miserly earning and hoarding, and gave that "large and finely selected library" no place in her life—what then?

Many a man might receive the crown offered to him by angels hovering in the air just over his head, but never gets anything but a muck-rake, because he refuses to lift up his eyes from him muckraking and to reach upward for the proffered crown.

Jeroboam was privileged to know God, but he foolishly turned away from Him. Asa, on the other hand, "renewed the altar of Jehovah," and very soon large numbers from the northern kingdom were coming to join themselves to Judah when they saw that greater security and freedom were assured them there than in the territory of Israel. God was with Asa because Asa drew nigh to Him.

The pressure is strong upon some of us, perhaps, to be turning away from God. Some are saying that no man can hold a place in the business world of to-day and be true to the teachings of our Divine Lord and Master. A devout soul sends out, through the columns of one of the religious weeklies this prayer, which we might well make our own:

"Keep me from turning back!
My hand is on the plough, my faltering hand,
But all in front of me is untilled land,
The wilderness and solitary place,
The lonely desert and its interspace.
What harvest have I? Just this paltry grain,
These dwindling husks, a handful of dry corn,
These poor lean stalks! My courage is outworn—
Keep me from turning back!
The handles of my plough with tears are wet
The shares with rust are spoiled—and yet—and yet—
My God! My God! Keep me from turning back!"

Searching the Title

BY CORA S. DAY

"That's a fine old place," remarked Ben's college chum, Edward. Ben was taking him home from the station for a week-end visit at his pleasant village home.

"Yes, that's the old Denton place," Ben returned. "It is owned now by a man named Wright. He bought it this spring and fixed it all up in fine shape again, after it had been empty and neglected for years." He paused, then added: "A funny thing came up when he bought that place. Before the final settlement he had the title searched. You know, they look up all the court records of deeds and every transaction in which the property has figured for years back, to make sure of a clear title. They found that straight through the middle of the house ran a street, according to an old village plan. It had never been opened, yet there it was, a strip to which the Denton estate could neither claim nor give a title. They had to get a village ordinance drawn up and passed releasing all claim on the street right of way. Then they gave a clear title. It was worth the cost."

"I suppose so," agreed Edward. "They have to be careful. I was just wondering if we're as careful to read our title clear to mansions in the skies, as the old hymn puts it?"

"We ought to be," came the emphatic response, as the two young men turned in at the home gate.

In the State of Louisiana

Rev. J. J. Hawkins, a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society in Northern Louisiana, has sent the following description of his method of distributing Christian literature:

"I visit on an average from ten to twenty-five families weekly. Many are entirely destitute of books, excepting perhaps a New Testament, a spelling book, or some old volume about the care of domestic animals. I usually succeed in introducing some new books into each home, and so my visits make many homes richer in Christian literature than before.

"My visits also serve to make known various good books, and experience has shown that many, who have no money when I call for the first time, will buy later when I visit them again. There are so few books in the homes that if I can introduce a good book it usually has the field largely to itself."

In Arkansas and Alabama

Rev. George Whitefort, Superintendent of Colportage at the Southern Agency of the American Tract Society, presents two extracts from the reports of missionary colporters who are working in his field. One of these, who is scattering Christian literature in the State of Arkansas, writes:

"The books that I circulated this month went into the homes where there is very little literature of any kind. The children read any book that comes into their hands, for they have very little to read except as colporters carry it to their homes.

"When I am entertained by a family I leave a good book behind me as a gift or a reminder of my visit. Frequently I pray with families at whose homes I have stopped for a word of Christian exhortation and to whom I show the literature which I carry. Sometimes we have quite an interesting gathering, as there are frequently young men and women as well as boys and girls in the home, and all will be seated and listen with great respect to a Bible reading, and many will even kneel during prayer. In many cases I find that quite a number are church members and really devout Christians, who are much encouraged by my visit."

The other colporter, who is located in Central Alabama, writes:

"I find many 'moonlight schools,' which parents and children attend. They are taught by good people who are trying to promote intelligence by gathering all the people who desire instruction into night schools. Many learn to read in those schools, and even if not very intelligent scholars, yet they generally become interested in books and paper. The books that I carry are helpful to them."

In the Empire State

Rev. Samuel Goddard, who for many years has served as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society in the Empire State, has sent the following report of his recent labors:

"My field of labor during the past month has been confined to Buffalo, New York and four towns in the vicinity of that city. I have made about 4,220 visits and have circulated 213 books, 65 mottoes, 150 cards, 220 tracts and 475 papers, amounting in value to $100.34.

COLPORTER J. J. HAWKINS AT A HOME IN LOUISIANA

"Upon taking a review of the past year's work, I find that I have traveled some 750 miles and have canvassed twenty-five different towns and villages. I made 60,365 visits and held 62 religious meetings. I circulated by sale or grant Christian literature to a total value of $1,164.25.

"In the course of my work it has been my privilege to lead many a wayward and wandering one back to the fold of the Good Shepherd. I would like to mention two cases which go to prove the truth of God's promise that His Word shall not return unto him void. The first case was that of a poor woman upon whom I called, who had been compelled to separate from her husband on account of his drinking habits. She told me her trouble with tears streaming from her eyes. Leaving her, I sought out her husband, but was met by the bluff retort, 'Mind your own business!' I reasoned with him and he calmed down. Then I handed him the little book entitled 'Daily Food,' and also one of the tracts, 'Buy Your Own Cherries.' I begged him to read these, and to seek his dear wife and to comfort her. Afterwards I presented their case at the Throne of Grace in my prayers. Two months later I called again, and to my joy I found them happy and contented together. The poor woman, grasping my hand, exclaimed, 'O, sir, it was your kind words and the blessed tract that did it! May God bless you in your labor of love! I will always pray for you.'

"The other case was that of one of the young women at the Ingleside Home, who came to me after I had made an address there, and begged me to pray for her. I assured her that I would do so, and she said, 'Oh, if I can only be better! My young man has promised to marry me and give me a good home.' Three months afterward I called at a house in Buffalo. A woman opened the door, and when she saw me she exclaimed, 'Oh, it is the dear preacher!

Come in, and see my nice home!' I did so, and found it was indeed a very happy home. There was the open Bible and the cards and the tracts I had given to her. She told me that they had joined the church and her husband was a member of the Sunday School. And she added, 'It was that beautiful tract and the Scripture cards that you gave me that led me to the blessed Jesus!'

"I am now entering my seventh year in the service of the American Tract Society. Will you kindly remember your humble servant at the Throne of Grace, praying that strength may be granted unto me to continue my labors for the Dear Master."

From Salt Lake City

Rev. Henry W. Pratt has been serving for several years as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society in Utah and the adjoining States. In the course of his work he meets with both Mormons and non-Mormons. He has been very successful in carrying forward the distribution of Christian literature, which experience has shown to be one of the most effective antidotes to the errors of Mormonism and infidelity. In a recent report he writes:

"The month of December was spent in Northern Utah, almost entirely in Mormon communities. I met several people who were much pleased with the Christian literature I carried and who liked the class of books I showed for Christmas use. One lady to whom I delivered the books she had selected said, 'Whenever you come to our city always call with your books.' Another said, when I delivered the books to her, 'I had been hoping someone would come along who had some high grade books. I am familiar with the authors of a number of your books, and felt that I would do well to order some of them.'

"All such words are pleasing and encouraging. Of course, I met with several who would not even look at the books. This must be expected, and I have to come in contact with such every month.

"I helped out some poor people and two poor Sunday Schools by making them a grant of some books for Christmas. They had very little for the children.

"In looking back over the past year I think of the many experiences through which I have passed in my visits to the homes. I have prayed daily as I started out in the work that our Lord would open the way before me, open the doors of the homes, open the hearts of the people and open their purses so that I might circulate His Word among them. I have realized prompt answers to my prayers, for the Lord has led me, and has given me entrance to many homes. His Word is not spoken in vain. On these hard fields God does make the ground productive for the good seed. It takes divine grace to work, for the ground is so rocky and the impediments are great.

"With but very few exceptions the books and cards I circulated in December went to non-Mormons. I consider this a very fruitful work. The publications of the American Tract Society have never had a wider circulation among Mormons than in the few years just past. A large measure of this success I attribute to the character of the books, for I never hear adverse criticism of the Society's literature, but rather good words. The books appeal to the people and especially to the young people."

"WHEN THE HEART SEEMS EMPTY"

By L. D. Stearns

RS. WINNISTON replaced the coffee pot with an ominous click. Her brow was crossed by innumerable frowning lines; her hair drawn tightly back into a hard, uncompromising knot. "Judith Winniston," she announced decisively, "I said no. Will it make it either more or less if I repeat it a dozen times? Why is it that one no is never enough?"

"But, ma ——" two tears rolled down the small girl's cheeks, "I told——"

"Never mind what you told." Dr. Winniston's tone was sharp. "I wonder if every family chooses meal time for their bickering!"

Judith's sobs became suddenly audible. "I ha—a—ate—this—old—ho—o—me!" she wailed.

Ted, aged fifteen, grinned approvingly. He was still smarting under reproof. "A fellow doesn't hear a thing," he grumbled half under his breath, rising and starting toward the door, "except no, no, and don't, don't, from morning to night. It's a 'no, no, house,' all right, all right!"

The mother's frown grew deeper. "It's always the same," she said wearily. "I don't know what a body can do!"

With an impatient gesture, Dr. Winniston arose. "Go to your rooms," he ordered sharply, "both of you." Then, without so much as a glance at his wife, he closed the door with a bang and strode hurriedly through the hall. His face was dark. A second bang, a moment later, proclaimed the closing of the street door.

The house was still.

A flitting breeze rustled through the open window, touching gently the burning cheeks of the mother. Her head ached; also, a strange, tight ache was clutching somewhere in her throat. She glanced at the clock. "I must," she said slowly, "call on that new family to-day."

It might, she realized vaguely, mean a new patient, and Heaven knew they needed one badly enough! But even with the thought upon her, she did not move.

Unseeing, her eyes wandered across the table; her limbs felt like lead; a dull depression, against which she seemed to have been striving vainly for months, surged, unchecked, through every fiber of her being. Listlessly, she watched the woman across the way come out and walk leisurely to the gate with her husband. They chatted a moment; then, bending, he kissed her and walked whistling down the street.

Outside the screen a bird chirped merrily in the sunshine.

Reaching up, Mrs. Winniston wiped a tear from her cheek. Then she arose and began piling up the dishes as, book in hand, the new neighbor settled into the piazza hammock.

Mary Winniston's lips drew into a straight, tight line. Once, she also had loved to read; once, too, she had been loved. Mechanically she put down a plate and stood gazing out upon the lawn. Even the children never kissed her now!

Little flicks of light and shade glinted along the lawn. Half unconsciously, her eye noted them; half unconsciously, her ears heard the noon train rumble in and out, while her mind busied itself in long forgotten paths. For the life of her, she could not tell just where, or when the sun had changed to shadow; or whose the blame.

She thought of the nights she had sat sewing and mending into the wee small hours; she remembered how she had put aside her woman's desire for pretty things in order that Frank and the children might be supplied; she recalled the numberless evenings spent in helping the children with fractions, grammar and essays. And, remembering, she sighed. Then she glanced, half unconsciously, into the mirror. "I guess," she said, half aloud, "one can't expect to be loved, unless they're young."

The next moment, as in a strange, sharp flash, she saw herself standing by a sick bed on which her mother, with crown of snowy hair, lay scarcely breathing. Beside her a man, bowed with many years, held a thin hand in his big, furrowed one as the slow hours came and went. Youth, with both, was long past; but love, and a great, stern loyalty, such as is given few souls to know, touched the grim face of the man. It made not the slightest difference that the frail figure on the bed was unconscious of the vigil; hour after hour he sat on—wordless—unsleeping, merely waiting, lest the eyes should open and not find him there.

Drawing in a slow breath, Mrs. Winniston brushed a stray wisp of hair upward, with the back of her hand. "I guess," she reflected shakily, "some have it, and some don't. That's all. If I'm going to make that call, I'll have to hurry."

Rising, and stooping, she picked a paper from the floor, but as she started to fold it a chance word caught her eye, and sitting suddenly down again she read on: "When the heart seems empty, all you have to do is give the sweetness of yourself into the world. Life will do the rest. But you cannot give sweetness, and be sour. All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy, you know. Weary heart—rest and pray, and when you are rested, think."

With new resolution in her eyes she folded the paper and placed it on the stand; then she packed the dishes into the pan, brushed the crumbs from the table and lowered the shades. "I guess," she said, "that call can wait. For once, I'm going to rest."

Going to her room she slipped out of her dress and into a kimono. Then she stretched at full length upon the bed. Reaching out her arms she drew in a long, luxuriating breath. "I never imagined," said she, "anything could feel so good!" and her voice seemed to linger over the words; but the next instant she sat upright.

"Rest and pray, and when you are rested, think."

"I never have done things half way," she declared slowly, "and I'll not begin now. God knows, my heart is empty enough! If I'm going to try half the treatment there isn't the slightest reason why I shouldn't try it all."

It had been—she didn't know how long—since she had stopped to rest during the day; in fact, there had been few occasions during all her life. And—how often did she pray to her Heavenly Father?

She recalled, in a swift going-back of her mind, her childhood prayers; a few perfunctory words, since. Then came a blank; for years she had neglected even that.

In a half-shamed fashion she slipped to her knees, while a sort of silent awe enfolded her. Her lips seemed suddenly stiff. "God," she whispered, unknowing what to say. The next instant, all the ache of depressing loneliness and despondency swept suffocatingly across her. Her head dropped lower. "God," she said again—"Oh, God!" and even with the words something came, softly, and very sweetly, filling her soul.

Lower, and still lower, sank her head. All thought of time vanished. In the great silence of infinity she was face to face with God.

When she arose a few moments later the drawn look had left her face; a little touch of solemnity lingered about her eyes.

Crossing to the window she stood, as before, looking far outward; but this time her gaze was on the sky. "I don't believe," she said thoughtfully, "I ever prayed before." Then, turning, she went back to the bed.

"Rest and pray, and when you are rested, think."

The next half hour she lay with closed eyes. Over and over, keeping time to the tick, tick of the little clock on the stand the words she had read sounded in her brain, "Give the sweetness of yourself into the world—sweetness—sweetness—into the world! Life will take care of the rest!"

She arose, and a second time dropped to her knees. Then, definite resolution lighting her eyes, she crossed the hall and opened Judith's door.

The little girl lay stretched on the floor, gazing from the window with wet, rebellious eyes. Mrs. Winniston smiled. "Dear," said she—and something in her voice caused Judith to turn wondering eyes sharply upon her. "Mother's been resting. Now, I think I'll make a call, and I wonder if you couldn't do the dishes and mind the telephone?" Bending, she touched her lips lightly to one flushed cheek in an unwonted caress, and without waiting for an answer stepped backward and opened the door of the next room.

Ted was glowering by the window, and as in the flash of an eye her own childhood was with her once again. All at once she seemed to be facing life, not from her woman's standpoint, but from theirs—her children's. "I don't blame you a bit, Ted," she declared frankly, "for grumbling. The fact is, I've been too tired out lately to remember how to be nice. We're not going to have a no, no, house any more. I'm going to be—nice, after this, if you'll help. I'd like, Ted," a little wistfulness crept into her voice—suddenly, she remembered the sweetness of her mother's smile—"to be not only mother, but friend."

Long before she had finished speaking, the big boy was on his feet, and Judith's small, dimpled hand slipped caressingly into hers. "May I—kiss you?" she whispered shyly; and Ted, his boyish face aglow, bent and touched her cheek. "You don't need to be helped," he stammered. "Why, mother, you're a—a—a—brick!"

"Amen!" came in a muffled voice from the doorway.

Turning, Mary Winniston saw something in her husband's face that set her heart to beating like a girl's. But she only smiled, a little gravely. "I didn't hear you, Frank," she said, and Dr. Winniston answered, in a matter-of-fact tone, "So I judged. I forgot to take Lee Holt's bill." But he held out his hand, and slipping hers within it they went, like sweethearts, down the stairs, while in the wife's heart, set to a new tune, the words were sounding softly—"sweetness—sweetness—into the world!"

FOLLOWERS OF CHRIST

By William Thomas McElroy

AS the Divine Master during his life on earth went about through the land of Palestine, now and again He came upon someone in whom He perceived great possibilities of service, and in every such case His call was, "Follow Me." To the lowly and to the great, to the poor and to the rich, to the ignorant and to the wise, to the hard working fishermen on the sea of Galilee, and to Matthew, the rich publican, the call was the same, "Follow Me." And now and again it is recorded of those to whom the call came, "They left all and followed Him."

The Call That Comes To-day

The call that came to the disciples of old is the same call that comes to us to-day. Whatever our station in life, whether our talents be many or few, the same call from the Master comes to all—"Follow Me." The sad fact is that so many, like the rich young ruler whom Christ loved, refuse to obey the call, and miss the wonderful possibilities of a life of Christian service. They choose rather to ignore Christ than to lay up for themselves "treasures in Heaven," where glorious mansions are prepared for those who have given their hearts to Him and are willing to follow as nearly as they may in His steps.

It is true that literal obedience to this command of Christ is not always an easy obedience. The road that He trod was a difficult one—sorrowful, sacrificing and heart-breaking. And while it is not His desire that His followers should suffer, yet for their own good and the good of others suffering is oftentimes necessary. The road is a straight and narrow way, and one in which the Christian disciple must always be on guard against the temptations of sin and the evil devices of Satan.

One of the greatest difficulties is the difficulty of following constantly. So many are quite willing, or even anxious, to follow Christ, but they want to follow in their own way. They are not willing to follow in the way He has laid out for them, that is to follow in His steps. They want to go the way that seems best to themselves, relying on their own strength, doing as seems best in their own wisdom, instead of asking, "What would Jesus do?"

"I should like to do some definite work for Christ," said a church member recently to the minister who was pleading with him to employ his great ability in a certain form of Christian service, "but I feel that my life is not such that I can conscientiously endeavor to lead others."

Nor was this an unusual case. There are thousands upon thousands of men in the world to-day who have given practically the same excuse—to themselves, if to no one else. It is such followers as these—who are not willing to make an effort to follow constantly—that bring reproach upon the Church. They are ashamed to refuse to join the church perhaps, but they become church members and do nothing more. They think it too hard to give up cards, or the theater, or the dance, and yet knowing in their hearts that such things will go far toward destroying the influence of anything they might say, they cling to their worldliness and follow, as did the disciple on the night of Jesus' arrest, afar off—if indeed they can be considered as followers. What such as these need is to get the vision of whole-hearted Christian service; to go to the Throne of Grace in prayer that their hearts may be purged of sin and worldliness, and made to know the happiness of true consecration to Christ; they need to become real Christians instead of nominal Christians.

But even those who are really endeavoring to follow Christ find there are difficulties in the way. It is so easy to make mistakes, so easy to fall into temptation, so easy to overlook or neglect the opportunities of service. The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak, and it is only by constant watchfulness that we are enabled to follow closely. But, as in all other things, one step makes the next step easier, and we are enabled more and more to look away from the things of the world and to become daily more efficient servants in the vineyard of the Master.

Another difficulty of following is that perhaps after long continued effort and devotion to the cause, we are apparently getting no results. It is true that the more learning a man acquires the more does he realize how little he really knows. So it often is with the Christian life. We know something of the joy that it brings, but as we go forward we see so many places behind us where we might have done better, so many opportunities that we have overlooked, so much to be done and so few to do it that now and again we become discouraged. One of the bravest remarks ever made was that of a missionary who several years ago said to the board that was sending him out: "I am prepared to work ten years before I receive a single convert. Are you willing to back me up?" Ten years of whole-souled, untiring effort for a single convert! It is such men and women that bring honor to the Christian religion, but how few are those who are willing to so sacrifice themselves.

The Richest Reward

The greatest reward that comes from following Christ is in knowing the joy of a whole-hearted affection for one who has so loved us that He gave His life that we might have eternal life. It is a love that transcends all other love, something that is sacred, and yet something that we long for others to share with us. One of the distinctive marks of Christianity is that it is an unselfish religion, one that makes its possessor long to help others to the joy that he is himself experiencing.

How often do we find in the Word of God the word "joy" connected with the love and service of Christ. "These things have I spoken unto you," said Christ, "that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy may be full." Again He says, "These things I speak in the world, that they might have My joy fulfilled in themselves." And again, "Your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you."

These are but a few out of many examples that might be given. Those who have never experienced the joy of following may look upon the consecrated Christian as something of a fanatic, but when once a person has known this joy, when once he has given himself devotedly to the service of Christ, it is an enlistment for life. One may waver a little through fear, as Peter did; or may let passion or greed or hate obscure their love for a time, as David did; but the true follower comes back in sorrow and repentance and his love and service become even more consecrated than before.

Not the least joy of the follower of Christ is the joy of unselfish service to others. It is by such service that we show the strength and depth of our devotion. "It is yet to be seen," was the remark of the famous Dwight L. Moody, "what God can do with a man who is entirely devoted to Him." As we in our earthly relations find our greatest happiness in serving those we love, so in our Christian life our love for Christ is shown by our service. The greater our love the more constant and the more consecrated our service. "This is My commandment," said Christ, "that ye love one another as I have loved you." And in our endeavors to carry out His commandments it is inevitable that we shall seek to help each other and to help those who are in need, and thus in giving so much as a cup of water to His needy ones it is as though we had done it unto Him.

How beautiful are the lives of those who have grown old in the service of the King. They may have known sorrow, but it has served only to make them more sympathetic with the sorrows of others. They may have known trouble, but it has served only to teach them how to share and soften the troubles of others. They may have heavy burdens to bear, but they find joy in the thought that they are bearing them for the Master, and never are they so burdened that they cannot find a way to lighten the burden of others. Servants of the King, going about their Master's business, they are a blessing to the world and to mankind.

How great is the joy of those who know the promises of Christ to His followers and who can have the blessed assurance that they will be sharers in the fulfilment of these promises. The Word of God is veritably a "Book of Promises," promises that we cannot doubt will be carried out to the last letter. One writer has counted more than three thousand promises in the Bible. Here are a few of them: "In My Father's house are many mansions * * * I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto Myself." "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst." "I am the bread of life; he that cometh to Me shall never hunger." "If ye shall ask anything in My Name I will do it." "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

These are but a few out of many, for page after page might be filled with the promises that are so precious to the children of Light. Every reader will think at once of many that are not given here, many that are favorites, and on which we are basing our hopes for the eternal life. For the gifts of God are so boundless, so immeasurable, that one might spend a lifetime in enumerating them.

Therefore, of all persons, the Christian, the follower of Christ, is the most happy. And only as we are followers of Christ are our lives a source of joy to ourselves and a blessing to others.

The Battle Song of Truth

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

*What though the day be lost, and every warrior slain!
A million years are His to win the field again.
The triumph is to God, however long the strife;
For sin and death must yield to Him, the Lord of Life.*

*The planets are in league against the hosts of night;
The sun itself goes forth to battle for the right.
The ages fight for God! Shall we the contest yield?
Arise, ye sons of Truth, and sweep the hostile field!*

Foreign Mission Work Increasing

Many encouraging facts with regard to the progress of the Kingdom abroad were presented at the annual meeting of the Conference of Foreign Mission Boards held in Garden City, Long Island, last month.

It is also gratifying to notice that the gifts to foreign missions through the nearly two hundred foreign mission boards and societies of the United States and Canada increased during the past year by the sum of $1,625,379.

The offerings for religious, educational and medical missionary work in foreign lands through the organizations comprising the Foreign Missions Conference were reported as amounting to a grand total of $18,793,990.

During the year two of the leading boards, representing the Baptist and Protestant Episcopal churches, succeeded in wiping out large accumulated debts, while several others were successful in materially reducing their financial obligations. Only a few boards increased their debts, and these represent churches in the South, where the depression in the price of cotton has had some effect upon missionary giving.

The substantial gain in receipts in spite of the European war is a cause for rejoicing, and it is hoped that the results of the new year, upon which we have just entered, will be even more gratifying.

The Day of Prayer for Students

There has been some diversity as to the matter of date in the observance of the Day of Prayer for Students. The last Sunday of February has been designated, however, by several representative organizations, and it would be well if Christian people everywhere would unite in the observance of that day (February 27, 1916), as a Day of Prayer for the young people in educational institutions.

The young men and young women who are in the colleges and universities are destined to become the leaders of our nation in the years to come, and it is therefore most important that around them should be thrown the strongest possible Christian influences, so that they may be led to consecrate their lives to the Master. Soon these young people will be grappling with national responsibilities and world problems of the most vital significance. Let us pray that they may be fitted for the duties that await them in the great arena of life by the possession of a sterling Christian character and an unswerving devotion to the cause of Christ.

Social Service and Evangelism

In both the Presbyterian Church and the Methodist Church of Canada a successful effort has been made to link together the two great departments of activity known as Social Service and Christian Evangelism.

It is altogether proper that these two lines of Christian effort should be correlated, for the one is really incomplete without the other. Christian philanthropists have come to realize that the great schemes for the reformation of society will ultimately fail unless they are permeated by the spirit of evangelism.

As has been well said, "The soul of all improvement is the improvement of the soul." Efforts at reform with Christianity left out are like painting the outside of the pump in order to purify the water in the well. On the other hand, that is but a narrow view of the scope of evangelism which devotes itself solely to the saving of the individual while ignoring those abominations in civic life which make it practically impossible to reach great masses of humanity with the uplifting influence of the Gospel.

Evangelistic work should have as its aim not only the winning of the individual to Christ, but the promotion of personal, social and political purity, the advancement of the temperance cause, the institution of moral reforms of every kind and the enactment and enforcement of laws making for righteousness.

A Notable Jubilee

The fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Young Women's Christian Associations of the United States is to be observed during the present month.

The first Young Women's Christian Association in this country was organized in Boston, Mass., fifty years ago, when the ladies of Boston formed a society in behalf of self-supporting girls who came to the city to seek employment. The work soon broadened out along religious, educational and other lines. Women's Christian Associations soon sprang up in other cities, and now there are nearly a thousand city, county and student associations, with an enrollment of about 343,000 members.

The Young Women's Christian Association is to be congratulated upon the splendid showing which it has made. It is doing a noble work for the welfare of a vast number of young women. It has demonstrated its efficiency in a multitude of ways, and it deserves the heartiest support from Christian people everywhere.

Federal Censorship for Motion Pictures

In view of the possibilities for evil that inhere in moving pictures there is a general agreement among all the friends of good morals that some kind of supervision should be exercised over the character of the films that are presented to the public.

Excellent work has been done by the voluntary National Board of Censorship in New York, but it is felt by many that the time has now come when this matter should be put under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. Accordingly a bill to that effect has been introduced in Congress, and hearings on it are now being held by the House Committee on Education.

The proposed bill authorizes the President to establish a Motion Picture Commission of five persons to have such supervision over the motion picture interests as the Interstate Commerce Commission exercises over the great railroad interests. By refusing copyright and interstate commerce privileges the commission may suppress pictures depicting bull-fights or prize-fights, and all those that are obscene, immoral, inhuman, or of such a character that their exhibition would tend to impair the health or corrupt the morals of children or adults or incite to crime.

About a year ago this same proposed bill was reported favorably to the House of Representatives, but was not passed. Earnest efforts are now being made to induce Congress to pass this salutary measure and thus to provide for safeguarding the morals of the nation in a more effective way than can be done by depending upon merely local action.

Matthew 25:31-46.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Jan. 31. Faithful service. 2 Tim. 4:1-5.
T. Feb. 1. Faithful obedience. John 15:4-15.
W. Feb. 2. True to death. Rev. 2:8-10.
T. Feb. 3. Spiritual power. Acts 1:1-8.
F. Feb. 4. Conquering love. 1 Cor. 13:1-8.
S. Feb. 5. Force of goodness. Rom. 12:17-21.

This topic has been selected for Christian Endeavor Day. February second will mark the thirty-fifth anniversary of the organization of the first Christian Endeavor Society. What a mighty power for good it has become during these thirty-five years! And there is assuredly no reason why the next thirty-five years may not prove even more fruitful than the past has been.

Christian Endeavor Faithfulness

One reason why the Christian Endeavor Society has accomplished so much is because it has stood for fidelity in all things. Its members have been faithful to their duties and obligations, and the result of their fidelity is shown in the strength of the Society to-day.

Christian Endeavor exalts the ideal of fidelity. It teaches its members to be faithful to their pledge. It is not the making of a pledge but the keeping of it that counts. It is pleasant to note that Christian Endeavorers with rare exceptions have shown marked fidelity to the pledge which is the distinctive feature of their organization.

At times voices have been raised calling for a weakening or even a discarding of the Christian Endeavor pledge, but wiser counsels have prevailed, and the members of the Christian Endeavor Society to-day realize that this pledge is still and will ever be the greatest element of strength in the organization.

Christian Endeavorers have been faithful to the church. Fidelity to the church and to all its services is most strongly inculcated in the Christian Endeavor pledge, and pastors everywhere have found that the young people who have taken this pledge are usually the ones upon whom they can place the strongest reliance for help and co-operation in carrying forward the work of the church.

Christian Endeavor upholds the ideal of faithfulness to Christ. It is the aim of every Endeavorer to be true to Christ, and in this fidelity to the Master may be found the mainspring of the organization which has done so much during the past thirty-five years for the advancement of His Kingdom, both at home and abroad.

Christian Endeavor Power

Christian Endeavor has already shown its force as a means of evangelization. Both at home and in the foreign field Christian Endeavorers have been active and energetic in pushing forward evangelistic work. And there lies in the Christian Endeavor Society the possibility of still greater achievement along this important line of service.

In Christian Endeavor there is a great power for social service. The passage of Scripture chosen for use in connection with this topic plainly indicates some possible lines of social service. Christian Endeavor workers are helping to minister to the needs of the hungry, the sick, the poor and those who are in prison, realizing that in this way they are doing service for the Master.

Christian Endeavorers may be a power for peace. Peace—the peace that is founded upon righteousness—is the Christian ideal. And Christian Endeavorers throughout the world may do much to promote peace by insisting upon the observance of those principles of justice and uprightness which alone can form a secure and lasting basis for peace among men.

Hebrews 10:19-25.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Feb. 7. Penetrating influence. Matt. 5:13-16.
T. Feb. 8. Influence of giving. 2 Cor. 9:1-7.
W. Feb. 9. Home influence. 2 Tim. 1:5; 3:15-17.
T. Feb. 10. Influence of sacrifice. Acts 20:28-35.
F. Feb. 11. Revealing influences. John 14:1-9.
S. Feb. 12. Influence that abides. Heb. 11:1-6.

This topic is the second in the series dealing with the subject of consecration, which subject we are to consider once each month throughout the entire year.

The Greatest Asset of Personality

Influence is the greatest asset of personality, and the right use of influence is a most important subject for us to consider.

The Daily Bible readings give us some useful hints upon the subject of influence. Some very pertinent considerations are also suggested by the verses in the Epistle to the Hebrews which have been chosen for our special study.

The Influence of a Good Confession

An open confession of our allegiance to Christ is the first and the most important step in the consecration of our influence. A secret disciple cannot win others to the faith which he fails openly to acknowledge.

Who can measure the influence of the follower of Christ who makes an open confession of his faith in the Master, and who holds unflinchingly to the profession of that faith?

Let us remember in this connection that we confess Christ not only by what we say with our lips but by what we are and what we do in our lives. And if our lives fail to corroborate the confession that we make with our lips, then our influence will not count for the cause of Christ.

The Influence of Example

Example is mightier than precept. What we are, speaks far more emphatically than what we say. Actions speak louder than words. All these considerations remind us how potent is the force of example.

Jesus calls us to consecrate ourselves to Him so that our example may be an influence for good that will tell for time and for eternity.

No Christian should be satisfied unless he feels that his example is such as to benefit others and to stimulate them to a higher life.

The Influence of Association

Influence is exerted upon others through the association which we have with them. Christians should ever be careful to make only such associations as the Master would approve.

There is one association in which our influence should always be felt, and that is the assembly of those who love the Lord.

In these modern days, with the temptation to neglect church attendance which is presented by the attraction of automobiling and other pleasures, there is danger that the church of Christ may not receive the support to which it is entitled from every Christian. The exhortation of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews is therefore very timely, when he urges that we forsake not our assembling together.

The Immortality of Influence

Our influence, for good or for evil, is immortal. Some one has used this apt illustration: Plants are often started in a cold frame and then transferred to flowerpots; so often a noble character is started in one life and then flowers in another.

In view of the eternal character of our influence, how careful should we be to strive that the influence we exert may be such as to ennoble and uplift all with whom we come into contact!

How to Put the Bible Into Life

Psalm 119:105-112.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Feb. 14. Bible study. Psalm 1.
T. Feb. 15. Apply its precepts. John 13:17.
W. Feb. 16. Study its examples. 1 Cor. 10:1-13.
T. Feb. 17. Memorize it. Deut. 6:4-9.
F. Feb. 18. Utilize it. Matt. 4:1-11.
S. Feb. 19. Practise it. Jas. 1:22-27.

This is a most practical topic. As some one has well said, "The Bible was made for life, and life is made for the Bible; they correspond perfectly."

The Word in the Mind

The first step toward putting the Bible into the life is to get it into the mind. The way to do this is by reading the Bible. Daily Bible reading is an essential factor in Christian growth and development. To feed upon the divine Word is just as essential for the Christian as to nourish his body with food.

In reading the Bible the best results will be gained by adopting some regular system. A haphazard method of reading the Bible, while better than utterly neglecting it, falls far short of what is to be desired.

There are various helpful plans for Bible reading available, any one of which may be adopted to advantage. Some read the Bible in connection with the Christian Endeavor topic, some in connection with the Sunday School Lesson, and some in connection with the topics used in the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations. These plans are all excellent, but in addition, it is to be recommended that the Bible be read in course, that is in some method by which its entire contents will be covered in either one or two years.

The Word in the Heart

The next step toward putting the Bible into the life is to store it in the heart. This can be done by memorizing as many choice passages as possible. Young people, especially, should make an effort to lay up choice verses and selected chapters in their memories, for in youth it is far easier to commit Scripture to memory than in later years.

In memorizing Scripture a good plan is to take at least one verse a day and learn it by heart. If this plan is consistently followed it will result in a year's time in the acquisition of a considerable number of chapters.

The Word in Action

If the Bible is faithfully stored in the heart, it will assuredly make itself felt and known in the life. The Word that is hid in the heart will not remain concealed but will make itself evident in word and deed.

To read and to memorize the Bible is not enough—we must practice the Bible, that is, we must carry into action its precious teachings and precepts.

Bible verses stored in the mind and heart are like seeds planted in the ground, which sooner or later are bound to spring up into blossom and fruit.

The Word Multiplied

When the Bible has come into our own lives we should not rest content until we have succeeded in implanting the sacred Word in the hearts and lives of others. "Bible truths are like grafts," says Amos R. Wells; "they can be fixed in any evil life and they will cause it to bring forth good fruit."

Experience has shown that the best way to learn a science is by teaching it; so the best way to put the Bible into our own lives is by striving to put it into the lives of others.

It is more than a life task to put all of the Bible into our lives. But the more of the Bible we succeed in putting into our lives, the richer and sweeter will they become. There is nothing that we can put into our lives that will bring to us such a rich reward as the honey of God's Word.

Exterminate the Saloon

Habakkuk 2:1-14.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Feb. 21. It brings ruin. Prov. 22:29-35.
T. Feb. 22. It is anti-social. Luke 12:45.
W. Feb. 23. It breeds decay. Isa. 56:12.
T. Feb. 24. Build the city of God. Rev. 21:23-27.
F. Feb. 25. Resist the devil. 1 Pet. 5:8-11.
S. Feb. 26. Kill the menace. Exod. 21:28-36.

On the closing Sunday of this month of February, with which are associated the memories of two of the greatest patriots that our country ever produced, it is fitting that we should consider ways and means to exterminate what is undoubtedly the greatest foe to true patriotism.

A Political Curse

The saloon is unquestionably the greatest curse that exists in our political life. The influence of the liquor traffic is always to be found on the wrong side of every moral question, and its power is always strongly exerted against every move for civic betterment or real social uplift.

There is only one way to take the saloon out of politics, and that is to exterminate the saloon itself.

A Social Evil

There is no evil in society so great as the saloon evil. Where saloons exist, there drunkenness is sure to be found, and drunkenness is the prolific source of every kind of misery and crime. Under the influence of strong drink men and women will commit crimes, from which they would shrink in their sober moments. An intoxicated man knows no restraining influence; purity and impurity, honesty and dishonesty, kindness and cruelty—such distinctions are all blotted out for him, and woe to the one who stands between him and the attainment of his end.

The saloon is the open ally, or the secret accomplice, of every form of evil. The social evil, gambling, and all other vices flourish in connection with the saloon. Every gang of cut-throats usually has its headquarters in some saloon. Evil-doers of every kind find in the saloon a convenient resort.

A Foe to Religion

The saloon is the implacable enemy of all that is spiritual. Religion and drunkenness are irreconcilable. The saloon knows no respect for the Sabbath, and it is at constant enmity with the church. The prophet Habakkuk reproved the Chaldeans of old because they were addicted to wine, and every true ambassador of the Cross must likewise rebuke all who, at the present time, in any way countenance an alliance with the saloon.

There are some who say that in order to displace the saloon we must first provide some kind of substitute for it. But there is really no substitute for the saloon. What the saloon does is to substitute itself for the home, the church and every other beneficent institution from which it can draw people away. The only way to preserve the home, the church and the other institutions of society that are worth-while is to abolish the saloon.

Two lines of action are essential for the extermination of the saloon. One is personal and the other is political. Personal total abstinence on the part of the individual will aid in the destruction of the saloon, for the more numerous the army of abstainers the fewer will be the possible patrons for the saloon. The political line of action lies in the adoption of prohibition for the State and the nation. Many States have already adopted this policy, and the day is surely drawing near when throughout our nation the cause of temperance shall become victorious, and the saloon shall be forever exterminated.

Our Little Folks

Keeping Watch

*I'll keep a guard o'er all my words,
For once they're said, they fly like birds;*

My carrier doves—oh, may they be Kind, true and thoughtful when they're free!

And I must watch with care each thought,

*For they like children, can be taught
In faith and love and joy to grow—
'Twill make me happier I know.*

*And mother says if this I do,
That noble deeds will follow, too.
Where loving thoughts and words

There unkind deeds will not be found.*

"Fix Up Your Room"

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PRESTON PAPERS."

WHY are you so late, Tom?" asked Mrs. Pitt, as Tom came home an hour later than usual one bright afternoon.

"Oh, nothing much, only Miss Richmond kept me after school to clean up my desk, put the books in order and pick up the papers from the floor. Honestly, mother, she didn't scold—not a bit! But I just wish you could have seen the way she looked at me, and it all came when she was being specially nice to me, too! I was by the blackboard, putting away the erasers, when all of a sudden my nose began to bleed. Quick as a flash she gave me her handkerchief, and oh, it was so soft and white, and it smelt so good I just hated to use it; but I even more hated to have her see my mussy, dirty one! Well, presently my nose stopped bleeding, and I went back to my desk. But when school was over and all the rest of the boys had gone home she said—oh, so sweet and softlike, 'Tommy, I don't care to let you go yet—not quite yet—until we see if there's to be any more trouble with that nasal organ of yours. And, meanwhile, this will be a good time for you to put your desk and the floor underneath in good order.' And I did it, for I knew just what she meant, and she never says 'do' and then forgets to see that we do it, like Miss Maxwell. Oh, no! I wouldn't a bit wonder 'f she's there yet, watching that old desk, to see 'f I left it in perfect order! And her idea of perfect order isn't any cinch to live up to, I can just tell you! But she's so good that none o' the boys wants to displease her," and Tommy actually hung up his hat and put away the few school books that he had brought home.

"I'm sure that I'm more than much obliged to this new teacher of yours if she's given you even one impression that it's only decent to be both neat and orderly," said Mrs. Pitt. "I really believe I'd better invite her over to spend the day and show her over the house, including your room! She might be able to give you some pointers on its daily care and condition."

"Huh! Do you think I can't fix up my room without her?" asked Tommy, aggressively.

"Well, I'll try you once more," said Mrs. Pitt, blandly just a little too blandly for Tommy's peace of mind.

"But you know how long I've been trying to teach you some things."

"Well, I'm taught now all right, all right," said Tommy with more than usual decision. "And what's more, mother of mine, I'll make that stand for a permanent proposition. I'll tackle the job at 6.30 a. m. to-morrow, even if 'tis Saturday. And by noon you'd never believe but it had always been occupied by some young lady friend, of fairy-like taste and proportions," and smiles chased the gloom from Tom's face as sun-line chases darkness after rain, while he and his mother cheerfully sat down to supper by themselves, the rest of the family being off on a jaunt for the week.

As he took the things from the tops of his dresser and "chif," as he shortened the word, he carefully wiped them—a damp cloth for the china, glass, metal and wood, a dry one for the paper and pasteboard, and using a soft brush for those of velvet. You see that Tom was well provided for by a careful father, loving mother and thoughtful sisters, so that he ought to have been as neat as a new pin; but—well, he was a boy, big for his age, and much preferred all sorts of outdoor sports to any indoor work!

Then Tom began to clear out his closet, and oh, my! Such a sight! It makes me shudder to even think of it. Shoes, with mud dried on, until they out all his surplus—and that always means sacrifice.

His clothing was carried to the yard, shaken, brushed and fastened to the line to get sunned and aired—always good for things that have been shut in.

Then he washed the floor, room and closet, using a big cloth and a pail of hot water, and truth compels me to say that he had to refill the pail a good many times!

He washed the windows in warm suds, rinsing in hotter water, wiping with a clean cloth and polishing with soft newspapers.

With a damp cloth he wiped off shelves, hooks, doors and other wood-work and the outside of all his furniture. My, but things began to shine—and how proud he was that he could do it all without help, even to the remaking of his bed, putting on a white spread—which he used to hate—and hanging clean shades of white holland at the windows.

Well, he was more than repaid, when the whole family, returning that night while his room was yet in its pristine freshness, exclaimed over its attractiveness, even his dignified father saying: "It now looks like a room worthy of my son; and if he needs to be toned up to fit into its clean and orderly atmosphere I hope that he will be equally successful in that. 'Cleanliness is next to godliness' and 'Order is Heaven's first law,' my son."

But his richest reward came on Monday when Miss Preston, the School Superintendent, came to the schoolroom to talk with the class about "What Made Washington Great" and "Things About Lincoln That We May Well Imitate," because the lives of both these men had been under discussion in the history classes the week before, and Miss Preston had been invited to say to the classes what she had said to the teachers. Meanwhile Tom had had a very confidential talk with his teacher, Miss Richmond, telling her in high glee what he had done to his room and she in turn had told Miss Preston.

So, when Miss Preston had drawn from the class various statements as to Washington's neatness, orderliness and habits of doing things systematically and with forethought she added, "These habits helped make Washington great, just as they will help to make you successful in school, at home and in business. Look in your desks now and put them in neat order and see who will be ready for my inspection first." Tom's hand went up at once, for his desk was all in good order, and when Miss Preston looked at it she said: "Well done, Tom! You surely have learned the lesson of neatness and order, which are the secret of success in every well-ordered life."

LOOKING AFAR

True to his word Tom was "up and at it" bright and early the next morning. If you are a boy, you know pretty well what he found to carry out, to throw away or to clean up, sort, classify and put in the proper places; but so you may make your own room "spick and span," I'll tell you what he did with "what" and how he did it.

First, he opened both the doors and windows while he "unloaded" first the bed, then his chiffonier and dresser, carrying all the bedding to the back yard, where he hung it over the clothesline, fastening each piece broadside to the sun. He put the mattress on the back porch, to be beaten later, the grass still being dewy.

looked like some of the old relics that they've been digging out from the buried cities! Rubbers, with "leaks" all through them—but just splendid to be cut into strips as "foundations" for the best balls you ever saw. "Trumpery" all over the floor and shelves; shells, stones, bits of bark, nuts and other trophies of his long walks and short studies; an old aquarium (also homemade), whose tenants had long since been liberated—after one of Miss Preston's talks to the school on "Cruelty to Animals"; papers, books, cards, etc., helped to form a "conglom-er-ate" that was not exactly ge-o-log-ic-a-l; but he worked patiently and with the real spirit of sacrifice, for he meant to clean

Industry

Let us work on!
Truly and wisely; ever persevere;
Nor faint, nor fear;
True, prudent industry hath ever won.

Let us work on!
Work bravely; prove our faithfulness by deeds.
Sow wide the seeds (Of toil, if we would reap! Let us work on!

Let us work on!
Work through all barrenness, nor count the

No toil is lost;
Work prophesieth triumph: on! aye on!

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

The Flood Cloud's Silver Lining.

By Jean Mateer Beeman

FROM the midst of the fearful war, flood and famine conditions that existed for many months in the Province of Shantung, North China, there comes to us a bright story of heroism and devotion.

A blind young maiden lived alone with her father in a small mud hut on the outskirts of a village in the western part of the Province; her mother was dead and she herself had lost her sight only a few years previous, but she tried to the best of her ability to be an efficient little housekeeper and homemaker.

At the time of the dreadful floods about a year ago, her father carried her on his back through water in the house up to his shoulders. The night was dark and the clouds raining torrents, but he finally succeeded in getting his daughter to a grave—which in China consists of a huge mound of earth placed over the burial spot. Others were there ahead of them and had crowded to the higher portions, so that the blind girl was obliged to remain about half way up the mound. The water kept rising, first over her feet, then up to her knees, and still it rose a little higher—inches by inch.

Suddenly she felt a tugging at her garment and a kindly voice spoke to her out of the raging storm: "Come up on top, my friend. We were here early and secured a safe refuge, at least for the present."

"No, no!" protested Kwei Hiang. "It is very good of you, but I couldn't think of putting you in any danger on my account."

But strong young arms fairly lifted the blind maiden to the place of safety, in spite of her protests to the contrary.

"You stay here with mother, she will take good care of you. I'll go down to the seat your father is holding for me. Don't be afraid, little friend, we are all in the keeping of the loving Heavenly Father, Who will not allow any harm to befall us!"

With these comforting words of reassurance, An Whei, the Christian school girl, slid bravely down the mound to the spot vacated by her new acquaintance. Still it rained and the angry waters kept rising, until An Whei was barely able to keep her head above the torrent; but in her heart there was no fear, for she prayed and had faith that her petitions would be answered.

Then suddenly, as though a voice from the high heavens had commanded the storm to cease, the rain stopped, the waters began to subside, and shortly the bright stars gleamed from a clear blue sky overhead and the moon shone here and there between the drifting white clouds.

Just as soon as it was practicable the inhabitants, who had taken refuge upon the graves, made preparation to return to their ruined homes in the village.

In a brief conversation with the blind girl and her father, Widow Mu and her daughter, An Whei, learned of the straitened circumstances of their new friends. Their own home chanced to be situated upon a little hillside, and there was a great hope in their hearts that perhaps they had not fared quite as badly as some of their neighbors.

"You must come with us, Kwei Hiang, both you and your father. Even though we may have lost all our earthly possessions, mother and I are well and strong; we have a little savings laid by for my education, and all we have we shall gladly share with you!"

"It is too much to ask, An Whei!" replied the blind girl, with deep gratitude ringing in her words. "But since we have nothing, we shall gratefully accept your hospitality for the present, hoping that soon we shall be able to repay all we owe you."

It was indeed a strange and sad procession which slowly wended its way through the water-soaked fields and back into the village, where dire desolation and starvation greeted them on every hand. The Japanese soldiers, who were in the province fighting the Germans, had helped themselves liberally to all the grain and provisions which the people had stored away against just such emergencies, so there was now little or nothing left upon which the people could live until the next harvest.

"Oh, mother! See, see!" cried An Whei, almost beside herself with joy. "The courtyard is flooded, but the house has only a little water in it, and that is rapidly going down. Come quick, Kwei Hiang; get up here upon the bed while I try to find a bit of dry kindling which I hid over the beams in the ceiling, and I'll soon have a cup of hot tea for you and some millet gruel!"

Sure enough, the only Christian home in the village, because of its slightly elevated location, had been spared much of the damage sustained by the other houses. True, a part of their grain was water-soaked, and their furniture would never be as it was before, but An Whei had put several sacks of corn on top of the great boxes containing their clothing and bedding, all of which had been placed on the kang (or bed), which stood nearly three feet from the floor and was dry and clean and ready for immediate use.

The tears of thanksgiving streamed unchecked down the faces of the Widow Mu and her bright young daughter as they bustled about their home in the night watches and spared nothing in their efforts to make it warm and comfortable for their guests, as well as for others who crowded into their little rooms, seeking shelter and food and clothing, all of which was given gladly and unsparingly until they had provided for all within their means to serve.

Mrs. Mu, herself a graduate of a Christian High School for Girls, had also taken a three years' training at a mission hospital, and always kept on hand sufficient medical supplies to enable her to administer to the ailments of her neighbors. Such treatment was always given free of charge, her only request being that her patients listen quietly while she told them of the Great Physician.

The night of the flood the heathen people nodded their heads gravely and whispered in awe-stricken tones among themselves: "There must be something, after all, in this 'foreign devil's religion,' since its followers are spared so wonderfully, while we—who have burned incense at the altars of our idols—are homeless and penniless. It is time we investigated this 'Jesus doctrine!'"

The "investigation" was entered into very zealously, and it was not long before men, women and children began to study the new and better way, which brought to many of them such a joy and radiant happiness as they had never dreamed of in all the years they had worshipped at the shrines or in the temples.

When the roads became safe for traffic the long vacation came to an end, and a day was set for the opening of all the Government and mission schools of the Province of Shantung. An Whei, who was a senior at the Wei Hsien High School for Girls, returned to her studies, and with her went Mr. Sung and his blind daughter, who appeared before the session of the church for baptism and membership.

The missionaries were deeply interested in the newcomers and were astonished at the real knowledge the young girl displayed of the Bible stories and the earnestness and sweetness of her Christian life.

In vivid, glowing sentences Kwei Hiang told the foreigners of the unselfish act of heroism on the part of her friend, An Whei, the night of the great flood, and of the precious days and weeks of companionship which had followed in the home of the Widow Mu and her daughter, who demonstrated their religion in such a practical way that she and her father had been won heart and soul for the Master.

She concluded with these words: "I am so happy that I am blind. Before I lost my sight I was engaged to a man who was very cruel, and I believe he would surely have killed me after I lost my sight."

"But now I am engaged to a good young man, one of the flood victims, who has been studying at the home of Widow Mu. Soon he, too, will unite with the Christian church. In a short while we are to be married, and we shall strive to make a happy home together, where the true God will be worshipped day by day, and where we hope many now outside of the fold will be led from darkness to light!"

Mona and Her Shoes

They were beautiful new shoes, with dull black tops and shining toes. Mona's mother had bought them for her only three days before—and now they were lost. Mrs. Hull and Mona's Aunt Kate looked all around the room for them, and suddenly Mrs. Hull, with a very white face, said, "Kate, those shoes are not in the house."

Aunt Kate's eyes flashed as she answered, "No, but I think I know where they are. They are down in Simon Kline's shop."

In Kline's shop? Mona asked herself why her shoes were in Kline's shop. She knew the place—a little dark store with three gilt balls hanging in front. She put on her old shoes and said nothing more about the new ones, for the tears were running down her mother's cheeks. But after breakfast she went out to find those shoes. On the porch next door was her neighbor and best friend, Dora Mintur.

"Dora," she called, "come down to Kline's shop with me."

Dora came running over. "What are you going there for?" she asked.

"Why, Mr. Kline has my new shoes and I am going for them," and Mona gravely explained the situation. It was so serious that neither thought of asking the usual permission, and the two five-year-old tots were soon on their way down-town.

Mr. Kline was making the dust fly with a large feather brush when they entered, and the very first thing Mona's bright eyes saw was her shoes in a glass case among dozens of other small articles.

"Mr. Kline," she said, "those are my new shoes. I came to get them back."

Mr. Kline came up to the case. "Your shoes?" he said. "And you bring me the money?"

Mona was astonished. "Why, no," she gasped, "my mother paid for them when she bought them."

Mr. Kline looked perplexed. "I pay money for them," he said, slowly, "and—and I guess Mr. Ryan down at the corner has got the money."

"Come on, Nora," said Mona, and the two little girls flew out of the shop and down the street, to the great relief of the old second-hand dealer. He had known pleasant-faced John Hull for a long time, but of late he had noticed that the man was frequenting the new hotel on the corner. He had been really sorry to buy the pretty shoes from John the night before. "Ach, I see," he nodded to himself as he went on with his dusting.

"They keep money away from him, and he begins to sell things. Too bad!"

Mr. Ryan had been a popular groceryman in the town for a good many years, but longing to make money faster he had gone into the hotel business six months before. He prided himself on his clean, orderly house, and he was sitting on his porch this particular morning chatting with a traveling man as the little girls came up the steps.

"Why, here," he exclaimed, jumping up to meet them. "I am to have company this morning. Good morning, good morning!"

Mona shook hands with him gravely; and looking straight into his eyes she said, "Mr. Ryan, Mr. Kline has my new shoes, and he says you have the money for them. Will you please give it to me so that I can get them back again?"

Mr. Ryan stood some minutes without speaking; then his handsome, well-shaven face flushed scarlet. "Yes, Mona," he said, "I'll go with you to Mr. Kline and we'll get your shoes," and the big man walked up the street between the two small girls.

"It's a miserable business," he declared to the traveling man when he returned, "and if I must ruin my best friends and make brutes of them, I'll go out of it forever."

And he did go out of it. A week later this notice was put up where the bar had been. "This house is run on strictly temperance principles."

Can We Be Happy?

Methods by which happiness is sought are countless. One seeks it in the possession of yellow gold and shining jewels; another seeks the same thing by denying himself every luxury, and by withdrawing from human society. Another seeks happiness in human society and cares for nothing else. Each method is the extreme opposite of the other, yet each person is seeking the same thing—happiness.

It does not concern us so much now whether perfect happiness would result from perfect goodness; there is little doubt of that. It is not an ideal theory of happiness that concerns us, but happiness as it touches our lives today, and as it will touch them tomorrow, and the next day. You and I, with all our limitations and passions, with our ignorance and want of charity, how can we be happy?

Many times we want happiness without counting the cost of retaining it. We are often like the young man who admires the attractive uniform of the army general, but who laughs at the years of service that earned it. He wants the uniform of the general, but not his duties. So if we want happiness without the burden of its requirements, we are no better than this young man.

Victor Hugo wrote, "The supreme happiness of this life is in being convinced that you are loved for yourself alone." Be convinced that your fellow-men love you; be convinced that God loves you. Then you will be happy. But you cannot separate this happiness from your character, for the very fact of the existence of this love tends to produce character that will merit the love which it receives.

Wotton includes the following as elements of a happy life:

"His armor is his honest thought.

His passions are not his master.

His conscience is his strong retreat."

There are three degrees of happiness. The happiness that has its basis in material things, such as houses, lands, wealth; its appeal is to the physical nature. The happiness that has its basis in the family, and in one another; its appeal is to the social nature. The happiness that has its basis in God; its appeal is to the spiritual nature. Do not limit yourself to the first or the second, or to both of them. Include all three, for each has a rightful place in every life. These three elements of happiness complete God's design for the happiness of His creatures. To seek happiness through one and not the others is wrong. It is like using one of the senses, as the sense of sight, saying that it alone is sufficient. Whereas God wants us to use all, and thus to have complete happiness.

A Bible Woman of India

In Oriental countries it is found that the most effective way of reaching the native women with the Gospel message is by means of Christian workers of their own sex. Hence it is customary to employ native Christian women as Gospel workers, and these consecrated toilers are known as "Bible women."

Bible women do effective work in India. The picture that appears on this page shows an actual scene, in which a village Bible woman is instructing the group gathered around her in the way of eternal life.

The photograph from which the picture was taken was sent to the American Tract Society by Rev. Joseph Passmore, Secretary of the Christian Literature Society for India.

Hospital Evangelism

Dr. Lester H. Beals, a missionary of the American Board at Wai, India, tells the following interesting story of the effect of a stay of a Hindu patient in the hospital at Wai on the family of which he was a member. Dr. Beals says:

"Almost invariably one or more relatives accompany the patient and remain in the hospital as long as the patient does. This adds greatly to the scope of the evangelistic work. A few days ago our hospital pastor went out to a village eight or ten miles away over the mountain to call on a former patient who had become deeply interested in Christianity while in the hospital. They were good caste Hindus, and perhaps you can imagine the surprise of the pastor when the family of the patient invited him in to dinner with them. They all sat down and ate with the pastor—good caste Hindus eating with a Christian, an all but unthinkable event in these parts.

"The explanation was that not only had the patient been for about two months under the leavening influence of the hospital, but also his mother—who rules the home—and his wife—who will rule it after his mother is gone—were with him in the place where the pastor became their intimate friend, and where low caste and high caste have to live in close proximity and all but eat together. The old father, too, paid several visits to the hospital for a day or two at a time during those two months, and the whole family had breathed an atmosphere of which they had never dreamed before.

"This former patient brought in to sing to the pastor a class of village boys to whom he had taught a lot of Christian hymns that he himself had learned at the hospital. The pastor was very enthusiastic over the singing of this village boy choir. This patient has given up all idol worship now—declares openly that he will never have anything more to do with idols. Another former patient in that same village the pastor considers ready for baptism. This man also is a good caste Hindu. He gave up caste before he left the hospital, to the extent of eating freely with Christians. I certainly know of no such effective way of reaching this caste system among the common adult population as a hospital."

In West Africa

The American Presbyterian Mission at Elat in West Africa has been at work only nineteen years. Of the 7,500 admitted to the church last year 5,000 were brought to Christ by native workers. Every one of the 15,000 contributing to church work in this mission has envelopes and a card which is punched weekly for offerings and attendance. There are two catechism classes in the mission with 13,000 and 2,000 members, respectively, under instruction. The Elat church employs 107 evangelists and Bible readers; also teachers in 70 village schools with 4,000 pupils.

The United Evangelistic Campaign in Japan

A United Evangelistic Campaign is in progress in Japan. This campaign, planned to cover the whole of the Japanese Empire and to last for three years, is now in its last year. It has been both initiated and conducted by Japanese Christian leaders.

The editor of the Japan Evangelist says: "The results accomplished with comparatively meager resources in both men and money are nothing short of marvelous. When one considers how the distractions of the war and politics, the conflicting demands of various localities, the differences of theological and ecclesiastical conviction, have all been transcended one is compelled to recognize not only the vigor and resourcefulness of the Japanese Church but the mighty working of the Spirit of the living God."

Rev. E. N. Walne, Field Secretary of the Christian Literature Society of Japan, has summed up the general results of the campaign in these words:

"The methods of work used in the present National Evangelistic Campaign, the service on a big open space in front of our tents, the church being far too small. It was a wonderful sight to see the procession of Christians from different villages wending their way through the cornfields to our tent for service, singing as they came, each procession being headed by drums and cymbals. Some of the people had walked several miles; nevertheless when they arrived at our tents, instead of sitting down to rest after their journey, they stood round in rings, singing Psalms and hymns, their faces lit up with a wonderful joy. It was a grand service, or rather services, for they lasted all day and it was a Sunday that we missionaries will not easily forget. I took my stand underneath a tree and all around seated on the ground were the Christians and beyond them a very large gathering of Hindus and Mohammedans. We concluded our services with the Holy Communion. Towards evening the different processions, for they represented no less than nine villages, started on their way home, apparently not in the least tired after the day's services, for they went off singing as heartily as when they came."

A BIBLE WOMAN OF INDIA

and the results achieved, indicate that great progress has been made along many lines. While the weaknesses of the campaign which have been pointed out cannot be denied, it must be conceded that during the past year Christianity has asserted itself as a factor in the life of the nation as never before. The success of the campaign in Tokyo afforded ample proof of what could be accomplished by the united efforts of all the city churches, especially in the way of distributing literature and advertising. It was estimated that at least two-thirds of the people who attended the tent meetings were unbelievers. Most of the preaching in these meetings was thoroughly evangelical. Two hundred and fifteen letters of inquiry were received by the committee which had charge of the newspaper campaign. A large number of such letters, enclosing postage for reply, have also come to the office of the Christian Literature Society, not only from Tokyo but from all parts of the country where the society's tracts were distributed."

A Christian Pilgrimage in India

The Rev. R. Force-Jones describes a pilgrimage such as is dear to the hearts of Hindu Christians. It was held at Shikar in the Batala District. "We held

A New Chinese Concordance

Rev. Henry G. C. Hallock Ph.D., has been a missionary for twenty years in China, stationed for most of the time at Shanghai. For ten years of that time he, with a number of Chinese assistants, has been preparing the manuscript for a Chinese Concordance of the whole Bible. It has been ten years of hard and self-denying work, but at last the work is going through the press and will be in the hands of the people within a few days. It is being issued in three volumes of one thousand pages each and contains five million of Chinese characters. It contains nearly four hundred thousand direct or indirect references. It follows the Radical order of characters, and is the first Concordance in the language after what we know as the Word Plan, like Cruden's or Strong's. It will meet a long-felt need for a full, accurate and easily used Chinese Concordance of the whole Bible. It is just what Chinese preachers, teachers, helpers, Sunday school teachers, Bible women, Christian Endeavorers and all intelligent Chinese Christians need in their study of God's Word. Tens of thousands of dollars have been required for its preparation and printing.

Dr. Hallock is founder and now secretary and treasurer of the National Tract Society for China, and is issuing the Concordance at cost price, in order that it may be widely used. He says of it: "My one ambition and prayer has been and is to have it inexpensive—for the good of all—in the reach of all, and that God be glorified."

For twelve years he has issued a Chinese Christian Almanac, of which several millions have been sold. It is a booklet of nearly one hundred pages, printed in the Chinese character, and sells for what would be about two cents in American money. It is in use among the native Christians all over China. It displaces a Chinese Almanac that is full of pagan superstitions. Dr. Hallock has written many tracts in Chinese and not a few hymns, especially hymns for Sunday school use. He conducts a number of Sunday schools in the native districts of Shanghai.

A Wooden-Legged Hospital Convert

At Tsangchow, China, in the field of the London Missionary Society, there has arisen a Chinese worker who has been much used by the Lord in the past year or two. Mr. Arnold G. Bryson writes concerning this man, Wong Kwo-hsiang:

"The thousands of unevangelized villages have already made their appeal to his generous, sensitive nature, flaming with a passion to win men to his Saviour. He has already done great things in his first year of service, things that have put to shame men who have worn the armor for years, but whose poor allegiance pales before the undaunted faith and complete self-denial of this valiant knight of the Cross.

"Mr. Wong's wooden leg has made him at once a subject of engrossing interest to Christians and heathens alike. It provided him invariably with a peg for his discourse and a text for the story of his conversion. There are many tales that lose their lustre after much repetition, but this testimony of how God called Wong Kwo-hsiang, and sealed him for a life of service, while on the operating table of a mission hospital, like the story of what happened on the Damascus road, will never grow stale to some ears. If I have heard it once, I have heard it a full score of times, and in many varied circumstances, but never without an indescribable thrill of joy and thanksgiving.

"This is the gist of his addresses, delivered with intense earnestness and unconscious dramatic skill: More than twenty years ago a little boy was brought by his mother to the temple and, in fulfilment of a vow, devoted to the service of a celebrated god. Some time later, by a common trick practised upon the unsuspecting idol, the boy was withdrawn from the temple by relatives and restored to his home. The process was very simple: the head priest was handsomely bribed, the little fellow bundled over the wall, and to satisfy the properties a donkey left in his place! 'I was that boy,' continued the preacher. 'But for that subterfuge, I might to-day have been a priest in attendance upon the god. However, since I grew to manhood I have come to know the one true God, and the renegade priest stands before you today in the haunts of his childhood, as the messenger and servant of Him whom God sent to be the healer of all sinful men.'

In the Philippines

The wonderful educational work which the American Government has built up in the Philippines has brought into being a magnificent body of 9,000 English-speaking teachers of native Filipino stock. The fact that these are in touch with Anglo-American ideals and literature, rather than with Spanish, will have an enormous influence in bringing the Philippines into the channel of a reformed type of Christianity.

On St. Valentine's Day

By Grace Boteler Sanders

THE invalid chair was rolled nearer the window and two hungry gray eyes peered out at the snow-covered lawn and the gate swinging on its sagging hinges and on to the highway. The road was a series of snow-covered ridges and ruts, for yesterday, when the mud was soft, Chet Spore's lumber wagons, loaded down with logs, had passed on their way to the mill and left their impress upon the highway. During the night cold winds had come and frozen the ridges, and then the mud and ice had been covered with snow which was as fine as powdered sugar. Travel was almost impossible. No wonder folks stayed at home, for who would care to brave the piercing winds and the awful shaking which they must take if they journeyed over that road?

"There'll be nobody along to-day," soliloquized poor Miss Jennie, looking up and down the highway. "I most die of loneliness when there isn't anybody, and it's Valentine Day, too. O dear me! I wish I was a girl again."

It had been an unusually lonely morning. The rest of the family were in the kitchen, and Miss Jennie could smell soapuds and hear the rub-a-dub-dub of the washboard as it struck the sides of the metal tub in the cleansing process. But she could not help in the work, for she was a cripple.

Rheumatism had crippled her feet twenty-one years before, and after a while her hands and fingers had become so twisted and distorted that they bore no resemblance to fingers, and even refused to carry a bite of food to Jennie's mouth. Her neck had stiffened until she could not turn her head either to the right or the left. Her eyes had become dim. She could not read or crochet or sew. Truly life spent thus in an invalid chair for twenty-one long years was hard enough—but that was not all.

Her brother Louie had married a sour little woman, who was always scowling. Minnie grumbled when Jennie's company stayed for dinner and lingered after tea. "I've enough to do with three children and a mother-in-law and two men without caring for sick folks and entertaining company," said Minnie. "If they want their dinner let them stay at home."

The kind country people soon heard of Minnie's remarks. The callers who had thronged Jennie's room in the beginning of her illness dwindled until visitors were rare and she was obliged to sit all day alone in the invalid chair and think of the misery of the present, the joy of the past and the horror of the future.

"I can't see why I was left in the world when nobody wants me," groaned poor Jennie to herself, "and on Valentine's Day, too!" Her nieces and nephews were talking in the dining-room of the gifts which they expected to receive. Somehow the thought of St. Valentine's Day brought back pictures of a happy past.

It was on St. Valentine's Day twenty-five years ago that Jimmie Johnson's father had caught her when they were playing "Drop the handkerchief," and whispered in her ear, "I love you." He had walked home with her from school and talked of it all the way and had put his mother's ring on her finger. They were to have been married soon, but on that memorable sleigh ride, when the horses ran away and left Jennie unconscious in the snow the seeds of disease were sown and later King Rheumatism showed his power.

"I won't marry you so long as I limp," objected Jennie, and although Jim Johnson begged and said he did not mind about that Jennie repeated, "I'll never marry you until I am better."

She expected an improvement to come soon, but as the days grew longer, her affliction grew worse, and one spring day Jim Johnson married the young school teacher and took her to his home. No one knew that the invalid was thinking of love and marriage. How could she forget when she had once known love's fond dreams?

Jim Johnson's new wife soon became a constant visitor at the farmhouse. She brought young baby Jim to Jennie, first of all. When he was old enough to walk he ran away, and when his mother pursued him, he hid his face in Jennie's skirts and begged to stay.

When his mother was too busy to listen to stories of childish troubles, the invalid Jennie shared with him the sorrows and pleasures of his inmost soul. One day his mother died. He hardly felt his loss, for he still had his Aunt Jennie.

"I can't see what I am left for," repeated Jennie to herself, but there was no one to reply. It was almost noon when she saw the old flea-bitten horse drawing the mail wagon over the rutted road. Her small nephew ran to see and came back with his arms filled with bundles and letters. "Everything's for you, Aunt Jennie," he panted; "I never saw such a lot. Grandma, do come and see what Aunt Jennie's got!"

Minnie, wiping her sudsy hands, came with the children and their grandmother, and they all sat down to hear the reading of the letters. The first one was from Chet Spore himself, who often passed the house and to whom Jennie always spoke a kind word or sent a cheery greeting. It was dated from Tallahassee, Fla., and it ran thus:

"I was thinking about you yesterday, Miss Jennie, and I concluded to write and tell you that I'm doing fine, thanks to your kindness. I was getting pretty rough and was drinking some. I don't know that you knew it, but I was all out of sorts that rainy day when I stopped to see you. Things had gone wrong, and I'd made up my mind to go to town and get gloriously drunk. I remember I said to you, 'I don't see how you can stand it to sit here all day!'"

"Your answer fixed me. You said, 'The Lord is good enough to give me shelter and food and someone to care for me. Why should I complain?' I believe you knew what was in my thought, for you said, 'Chet, boy, you don't gain anything by sinning. Drink will take you to the gutter and to hell. God will forgive and help you to quit. Cut it out!'"

"I hadn't an idea of what a struggle it would be, but I did quit and all because of an angel in an invalid chair. Your valentine is in another package. I wish I could pay you for what you did for me."

Jennie's reverent voice interrupted, "And I was just murmuring because I thought I was useless."

"Here's your flowers, Aunt Jennie," cried her nephew, opening the box and thrusting two creamy magnolia blossoms with their waxy leaves under her nose. "Say, that's some valentine!"

Jennie was holding the flowers in her hand when her mother began to read the next letter.

"Dear Miss Jennie, I don't know what made me think of you unless it was because St. Valentine's Day is near. Perhaps you remember Veny Rose, who used to wash for your mother. I disappeared one night and it was rumored that I had gone just like my mother did. To tell the truth, I was preparing to run away with a married man. I remember telling you that it didn't matter what I did, that nobody cared for me and everybody thought me wicked and low. But you said, 'I care for you, Veny, and God cares, and no matter where you are, we are thinking of you.'

"It broke me all up. I thought afterward of how patient you were in all your affliction and how I, who had been given a strong body and good mind, was getting ready to be an outcast because things didn't go to suit me and I concluded to face about. So I went to the city and hired out as a house servant to one of God's angels. She took me to church and I was converted in a revival meeting in a great tabernacle. She sent me to night school and I was married from her house to a good Christian man, who does not look down upon me for the sins of my mother, but praises me for what I am. I owe it all to God and to you, dear sufferer in the invalid chair, for had it not been for your words and your faith, I would have been an outcast to-day. I am sending as your valentine my baby's picture. Her name is Jennie."

Minnie's sour face relaxed a bit as she looked at the photo of a dimpled babe. And then as other valentines there were bits of lace, paper and flowers, there were crocheted mats and pictures and fancy articles, and lastly there was a long, legal-looking envelope with the return address of a lawyer upon the back.

Minnie exclaimed when a deed dropped out. When she saw the document she burst into grateful tears. There was a letter with it which ran as follows:

"MY DEAR JENNIE:

"For the sake of old times and because you have saved my boy, I am sending this canceled mortgage as a slight token of my gratitude and esteem for what you have done. My son Jim says that had it not been for you he would have gone down on the launch Oriole last night with a party of drunken men who were drowned. He was on his way to join them yesterday, but concluded to stop and say good-bye to you. He tiptoed up on the step to frighten you as he often does, he said, but he saw that your head was bowed and your hands clasped. O my angel of the invalid chair, my boy heard you

HARMONY OF THE LIFE OF ST. PAUL ACCORDING TO THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES AND THE PAULINE EPISTLES.

By Rev. Frank J. Goodwin.

Invaluable for use on the Sunday-school lessons for 1916

This Harmony covers the life of St. Paul in a method most satisfactory to the student. The facts of the life of the great apostle are all there in chronological form without going into unnecessary detail. The book of Acts forms the basis, but included with it are all the historical and autobiographical allusions in the Epistles which conservative critics concede as necessary in order to make a complete record.

The text used is the Authorized Version, but the most radical changes in the Revised Version are indicated in the notes and indexes. The notes consider chiefly the arrangement of the passages in the text. Special attention has been given to Paul's companions and the chronology of the apostle's life. The other comments relate to Paul's speeches, the occasion of the writing of the Epistles, his trials and imprisonments, and such other matters as give an insight into his personal life and character.

There are eleven parts made up according to the important periods of Paul's life and work, with synopsis, index of passages and appendix.

This camera, called "THE PREMIO JR., MODEL B," is a well made, substantial and reliable camera in every respect.

Before leaving the factory, this camera has to stand the rigid tests which are applied to all cameras made by the Eastman Kodak Company, so as to guarantee that each camera will perform the work for which it is intended.

This camera loads and unloads in daylight with the Premo Film Pack of 12 exposures. It makes pictures 2 1/4 by 3 1/4 inches in size, and the negatives are of such quality that excellent enlargements can be made from them.

The instrument is fitted with an automatic shutter, which may be used for both time and snap-shot exposures, and it has the best grade of single achromatic lens that can be obtained. "Your old friend,

"JAMES JOHNSON."

Minnie was sobbing tempestuously. "I'm glad, so glad that I don't know what to do," she cried, falling at Jennie's feet and covering the poor twisted hands with kisses. "I've been nearly crazy lately and so has ma and Louie. I didn't care so much for myself, but when I thought of what would become of our angel of the invalid chair, when we were turned into the big road, I thought I'd lose my mind."

"What do you mean? Minnie, tell me," persisted Jennie's mild voice. "What has Jimmie sent?"

"It's the mortgage," replied Minnie; "we had to borrow money. Oh, it has been running these ten years. It was in Squire Hankin's hands, and we knew that hard old man would foreclose at the first chance. I went to him and so did Louie and begged him to wait and he said 'No.' But now Mr. Johnson has settled with him and sent you the canceled mortgage. O Jennie, what would we ever do without you? We'll try to be better to you than we have been in the past. Will you forgive us? We

NO "FRILLS"

Just a Statement About Food

Sometimes a good, healthy commercial traveler suffers from poorly selected food and is lucky if he learns that Grape-Nuts food will put him right.

A Cincinnati traveler writes: "About a year ago my stomach got in a bad way. I had a headache most of the time and suffered misery. For several months I ran down until I lost about 70 pounds in weight and finally had to give up a good position and go home. Any food that I might use seemed to nauseate me.

"My wife, hardly knowing what to do, one day brought home a package of Grape-Nuts food and coaxed me to try it. I told her it was no use, but finally to humor her I tried a little and they just struck my taste. It was the first food that I had eaten in nearly a year that did not cause any suffering.

"Well, to make a long story short, I began to improve and stuck to Grape-Nuts. I went up from 135 pounds in December to 194 pounds the following October.

"My brain is clear, blood all right and appetite too much for any man's pocket-book. In fact, I am thoroughly made over and owe it all to Grape-Nuts. I talk so much about what Grape-Nuts will do that some of the men on the road have nicknamed me 'Grape-Nuts,' but I stand today a healthy, rosy-cheeked man—a pretty good example of what the right kind of food will do.

"You can publish this if you want to. It is a true statement without any frills."

were so discouraged and blue. We weren't responsible."

"Will I forgive you?" Jennie's voice was awed but gloriously happy. "Will God forgive me, you had better say. I was just grieving because I was tied to an invalid chair, where I could do nothing for Him. What an ungrateful creature I am! I was wishing for a valentine," she laughed girlishly. "I wonder if anyone in the whole wide world had such a splendid one as I. Open the box of candy, Minnie, and give the children some. Put the flowers in a vase at my elbow and blow the horn for Louie. Shan't we have a praise meeting here right now?"

"We shall," laughed happy Minnie, putting the horn to her mouth and going to the door where she stood and blew two great blasts. "Poor Louie, I'm only too glad to send him word to come."

Louie came quickly at the summons, and together they kneeled down by the table and poured out their thanks to the Giver of all good.

Sunshine for All

"If we cannot all have a piazza, everyone may feel the sun," says an Italian proverb which is characteristic of that patient, cheerful race.

But after all, it is the exceptional life which has not in it much of the sunshine. There is always gloom for those who wish to dwell in shadow, but an effort of the will often carries one out of that morbid desire into the clearer, sunnier mood.

Difficulties and troubles, if bravely met, make strong men and women, but endless worry and anticipation of evil cannot fail to weaken the will and the character.

Laugh and be glad now, today. If you wait till you conquer your little world, you will never laugh and be glad. It is better to live in a castle in the air than in the dungeons we allow our low spirits and forebodings to build for us.

"Boys, We Don't Have to Come Back"

BY MILDRED WELCH.

The most dangerous point on the Atlantic Coast is the Life Saving Station at Cape Hatteras, commanded by Captain Pat Etheridge. He is a big, tall man with a splendid, strong body, keen eyes, kindly face and long, bushy beard. He has asked several times to be removed, for he is more than sixty years old, but the Government insists on keeping him at this station.

The peculiar danger of this post is that the wrecked vessels are not thrown up on the beach in easy reach of the Life Saving Station, but go to pieces on the Diamond Shoals ten miles out to sea and the crew must go that distance to save them.

Several years ago a vessel foundered on these shoals in a fearful storm. Her signals of distress were seen from the lighthouse and Captain Pat got ready the self-bailing lifeboat, which is fitted up with mast and sails as well as oars. Meanwhile the storm grew worse and the wind, which was off shore, grew more violent every moment. He ordered the crew to launch the boat—but they hesitated. They were men who had risked their lives in a hundred brave adventures but now they paused. They looked at the hungry sea running so high, and off to where the breakers thundered on the shoals and they listened to the roar of the storm. Then one of them spoke: "Captain Pat, it's no use with that wind. We can launch the boat and we can reach the ship, but we can never come back." There was silence, except for the wail of the storm growing louder, then Captain Pat said: "Boys, we don't have to come back."

The crew looked into the flashing eyes of their captain, they understood and as one man they launched the boat. They reached the wreck, took off the survivors and the wind changing a point or two, after nine hours of the most heroic toil, they got back to the station. The captain's words, "Boys, we don't have to come back," are repeated by men at all the Life Saving Stations on both our coasts wherever there are dangers to run, deeds to do and lives to save.

You would like to have done it, wouldn't you, boys? Not many can do a thing like that, but there is a hero's job waiting for you if you have the hero's spirit. The calling of the ministry doesn't sound as if it offered you that chance, does it? It seems rather dull and commonplace. Still it is the hero's job, for like every hero's work it means a life of service.

It may send a man to the home mission field in the great southwest where his hard work and his discomforts will far outnumber his pleasures—but did you ever hear of a hero in an easy place? It may send him to the twilight land of Africa, to the cold north or to the hopeless and wicked of our own cities. But suppose it does and you have to stick it out and you never come back to a life of pleasantness among friends, loved ones and easy goodness.

Boys, you don't have to come back! It will not matter, if only you have given your life in service to God and your fellow-men and joined the immortal band of the "unreturning brave."

—THE ROUND TABLE.

The Power of the Word

In 1860 the British fleet lay at Dalny on the Chinese coast and someone on board gave a Chinese Testament to a trading villager. For thirty years it lay unread. Then the wife of the man started to cut it up for use as wall paper. A Chinaman who was interested in accumulating merit by collecting printed paper protested against this dishonoring of the printed page and offered the woman unused paper in exchange for it. The bargain was struck, the stranger took the book, read it carefully, read it again, was finally converted, became himself a pastor and was followed into the church by friends and his whole family for four generations. His village has been transformed, there being two Christian schools there now, and some of the people evangelize the surrounding country.

Our Christian Duty

Some one has wisely said, "When we make out a note we acknowledge the receipt of a loan; but that does not do away with the necessity of paying interest. So when we join the church we acknowledge our dependence upon God; but for all that our entire life as Christians should be one of acknowledgment."

Another Opportunity

So many glowing words have been spoken in praise of our Calendar for 1916 entitled, "The Children's Hour," that we have decided to give our readers another opportunity to obtain it.

This lovely Calendar has been secured by special arrangement with the Osborne Company, one of the largest producers of Art Calendars in the world. It measures 11 x 17 inches, and is printed in a rich sepia. When the year is ended, the date pad may be detached, and the Calendar will make a beautiful subject for framing.

We will give the Calendar, postpaid, and one year's subscription to the American Messenger (either new or renewal) for 60 cents.

We will give the Calendar as a premium to any present subscriber who renews his or her own subscription for 1916, and sends one new subscription, remitting $1.00 in all; in case the new subscriber should also desire a Calendar, the sum of $1.10 must be remitted.

For every Canadian subscription 12 cents additional must be remitted and for every foreign subscription 24 cents, to cover the extra cost of postage.

We again remind our friends that it would be a material help to the welfare of this paper if each subscriber would forward at least one new subscription when sending the renewal.

All those who have not yet attended to the renewal of their subscriptions for the year 1916, are earnestly urged to send in their remittance at once, accompanied with an additional ten cents for "The Children's Hour" Calendar, if they desire to receive it.

"A Splendid Piece of Work"

BY SARAH N. M'CREERY.

LEVEN girls, with bright, sunshiny faces, were already on the Freeman porch when Margaret Hopkins came up the walk. She stopped on the first step and looked around in surprise. "Am I intruding or is it a party?" she asked Jessie Freeman, the daughter of the house.

"It is not a party and you are most welcome," was the smiling answer. "I almost thought a surprise had been planned for me when five girls had arrived. I just delight to have my friends drop in this way."

"It shows how popular you are, Jessie," remarked Beulah George. "You see each of us thought of spending the afternoon with you when we had a little leisure."

Jessie Freeman was popular. Her sweetness of disposition, her kindness, her helpful spirit and her unselfishness made everybody like her.

Margaret, reassured that the other girls had just "dropped in," as she had removed her hat and joined the circle. There was soon a hum of conversation, and the tongues kept pace with the busy needles and crochet-hooks. It was just five o'clock when a little maid, in a white cap and apron, appeared with a tray on which were dishes of ice cream.

"Why, Jessie Freeman, you have gone and ordered ice cream," said Blanche Acres, accusingly.

"I am not guilty," declared Jessie. "I think mother and Lydia are responsible for this."

When the ice cream was served the little maid brought in small cakes. "Why how lovely," exclaimed Jessie to Lydia. "You made those cakes just for us and we will show our appreciation by eating a lot of them. Lydia does make fine cake, girls," she told her guests.

The maid's face flushed with pleasure at the words of praise. She nodded her thanks, for she was too timid to speak in English before all those strange guests.

"What nationality is Lydia?" Florence Ward asked as soon as the girl had left the room.

"Bohemian. Her name is Lydia Stedry," was the reply.

"Well, where did you ever find a Bohemian girl in this town?" It was Pearl Starr who asked the question.

"Father found her at the railway station. She has been in America just two years. She went to Greggsville first because some friends from her own land live there; she found these friends had illness in the family, there was little demand for work, as one factory had failed and it was a small town; she could not be a burden on kind friends, so she drifted to this town. She stopped here because her money had given out; she had no place to go, and father saw her in the waiting-room all alone, crying as if her heart would break. She told her story to him, and as mother needed help he brought her home, and she has proved a jewel. She speaks English quite well and she is very bright. We have had her a year; she has learned to cook nicely and she takes pride in her work."

"Her eyes just haunt me," asserted Lucile Austin.

"Why," Jessie was surprised. "Her big eyes have such a lonesome, homesick, wistful look. Why, they remind me of a deer held at bay by dogs."

Beulah George laughed softly. "That's exactly like Lucile to see the look of—well not unhappiness exactly—nobody could be unhappy in the Freeman home—but the longing look. I expect the girl does get lonesome for people of her own kind."

"I know she does, for I have noticed her on the street sometimes, and she looks so lonely. Why, just think how you would feel to be the only person of your nationality in a town. Strange people, strange habits and customs, strange language, everything strange; why I think Lydia Stedry is so courageous to stand it; she's a heroine, that's what she is! I always think what I would like to do when I see her," Lucile's voice was low with earnestness.

"What?" the question was a chorus of voices.

"Perhaps Jessie and her mother would not like me to say it, but I always feel like I would like to help send Lydia to school. I have a cousin in Sparta—that's a large city—and there is a Bohemian quarter; this cousin teaches in a settlement school in that part of the city. I would like to send Lydia there. I wish we could do it, girls; it costs just fifty dollars a year, tuition, board and everything."

"Fifty dollars; how would we get fifty dollars?" queried Daisy Frank.

"We could earn it," was Lucile's calm answer. "We can begin now or wait until school closes."

There was silence in the little group for some minutes. "That would be a fine thing to do," it was Jessie who spoke. "If we could do that for Lydia, mother and I would be so pleased. We would lose a splendid helper, but we would enlarge the girl's outlook. However, it would take twelve of us a long time to earn fifty dollars. Yet we twelve girls don't have to do it alone. We can ask thirteen other girls of our own age to help. That would mean that we would each have to earn two dollars apiece. I know I can earn two dollars during summer vacation, if I have to take in washing to do it," Lucile ended with a laugh. "School will soon be out, and we would not need the money until the first of September, for Cousin Alice's school does not open until the middle of that month."

There was more discussion, and by the time the last cake had disappeared from the plate it was decided to raise money to place Lydia in surroundings that would be more congenial to her. When she came to gather up the plates, each girl looked at her with a new interest and a feeling of responsibility for her future. A list was soon made of the girls who should be asked to help in the undertaking, and a meeting was set for a week later.

On the next Saturday all the twenty-five girls were present. The final plans for the work were all made, and it was agreed to keep the object of the undertaking secret, so that it would be a complete surprise to the lonely girl. The decision was to have no further meetings until the third Saturday of August, when the money would be handed in. The meeting was to be held at the Freeman home, so Lydia could be told of her good fortune.

After school closed the days and weeks of vacation passed quickly, and the third Saturday of August found every girl in town interested in the "School Fund," as they called it. When the Freeman clock chimed the hour of three, Grace Lockwood was the only girl absent. Grace had the reputation of never being late at anything, but it was not until twenty minutes later that she appeared, hot and tired.

"I'm here," she announced, "and there's my two dollars." She tossed the money into Lucile's lap, because she was the originator of the plan. "I have found out how useless I am; I have had such a time making two dollars, because I have never really learned to do anything well. I made the last quarter by delivering groceries for 'John Holt and Sons.' I told them I just had to make another quarter, so they employed me for an hour this afternoon." Then everybody laughed at Grace's frank confession.

"That's a capital idea to tell how the money was made. Let's do it in as few words as possible, no speech to be longer than three minutes. Lay the money on the table as you tell how you earned it," suggested Jessie. "Grace was first. Lucile you next, then take turns in the order in which you are seated."

"Made and sold Boston brown bread," was Lucile's brief comment. Then came twenty-two other reports, which included all kinds of work from selling potato chips at forty cents a pound to scrubbing the kitchen floor and porches all summer.

"And we have the whole fifty dollars!" Lucile exclaimed as the last contribution was added to the pile on the table. "Some of you thought we might not succeed, but I knew we could not fail!"

"Let's tell Lydia right away," Helen Graves could scarcely wait, so anxious was she to see what the girl would say.

"Let's have Mrs. Freeman tell her," suggested Florence Ward.

Jessie called her mother and then went for Lydia. The girl came shrinking and almost startled, looking as if she expected to be accused of something. Slowly and carefully, so she could understand, Mrs. Freeman told her how the girls, her friends, had worked all summer to earn money to send her away so she would be among her own people and could attend school.

Lydia looked dazed. "My peoples," she repeated. "I sometime so—what you call sick, not outside sick, but here," she pointed to her heart. "Want to

As I listened to the reports and heard Lydia told what the money was for, I thought a better piece of missionary work had never been done in this town. I shall tell the ministers about it at our meeting on Monday. I feel prophetic on this occasion, and it would not surprise me a bit if Lydia would become a missionary among her own people as the outcome of this enterprise. I regard it as a splendid piece of work. When anybody does a thing to make life better, larger and sweeter for others, it is real missionary work."

Lucile had always wanted to do what she termed "real missionary work." The words caused her to say, "Oh!" aloud as the light of a new understanding and a new vision dawned in her face.

The Perfume of the Sick Room —Its Patience

BY MALCOLM JAMES MACLEOD.

The root meaning of the word "patience" is to suffer. It is the secret of suffering with fortitude. It is power, but power in restraint. "Stand therefore." It is playing the soldier in sorrow. Cicero, speaking of the death etiquette of a gladiator, asks, "What gladiator ever groans?" To be great it is not always necessary to be great in action. Sometimes greatness consists in being great in repose.

Usually we define this grace in negative terms. We call her "the angel that guards the couch of the invalid." But in the good Book patience is far from being a valetudinarian virtue; it is never a frail, drooping, languishing flower; indeed, quite the opposite. It is a healthy, hardy crocus rather, blooming oftentimes on most unpromising heights.

One cannot delve very deeply into the epistles of the New Testament without remarking what strong, virile company the word keeps: "Strengthened with all might unto all patience," "Patient continuance in well-doing," "The testing of your faith worketh patience," "Running the race with patience." This is not effeminate language. Patience is the whole man thinking, suffering, working; but, like nature, working quietly, smoothly.

Perhaps few things have done more harm to religion than some of the narrow views of sainthood that have obtained. And in the inventory of the wronged saintly virtues patience must be listed. Some have made it the synonym of calmness, but falsely. A man may be calm because he is asleep. Patience is heroic. It is the courage of the conqueror. "Patience," said Aristotle, "is so like fortitude that she must be her daughter." "Beware the fury of the patient man," says the old proverb. "Make us patient and enduring."

How often in Scripture the word is linked with hoping and waiting! "I waited patiently for the Lord," the Psalmist muses. "Your patience of hope," says the apostle. "If we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." The trouble to-day is, we do not dare to hope enough. We have fallen on a hopeless age. That is why we are so furiously and feverishly impatient. Hope is the great physician in the school of patience. One cannot but note how, when unbelief takes possession of the heart, patience is straightway slain.

"One moment in annihilation's waste,
One moment of the well of life to taste;
The stars are setting and the caravan Starts for the dawn of Nothing—oh, make haste."

I watch this queenly virtue sometimes in amiable wonder. Who does not stand in silent admiration before the patience of the scientist—the Audubons and Pallasys and Pasteurs. When Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood he delayed announcing it for twelve years. That is a fine thought of Emerson's when, speaking of this very thing, he reminds us how quiet and patient nature is and how she seems to lay her hand on us and say, "Why so hot, my little man?"

Then to be patient under injustice. To be misrepresented and yet to be unruffled. To listen to slander and still to make a prisoner of one's tongue. How it wins my praise! I follow Columbus on his great risk. I see him stake everything on the perilous venture. I hear the threats and the mutiny. I watch him through the slow, weary weeks of waiting. Truly, it is beautiful.

And I am attracted, too, most invitingly by the patience of the teacher. I admire the "patient continuance"; patience with the boy, patience with the mischievous boy, patience with the mercurial boy, and patience with the dull boy. "Why do you scold me, sir?" said the lad to the great Arnold. "I am doing my best." The patience that stops to gently unravel a whole skein of silk that has got mentally twisted; or the patience of the Christian sportsman untangling his line and renewing his bait, and waiting pluckily and serenely for months, or maybe years; the patience of a Judson sowing seed for almost a decade in India before he cut a single sheaf; or the patience of a Tyler in South Africa watching fifteen summers come and go before the first Zulu was won over to discipleship. What patient pioneers were Carey and Morrison and Chalmers and John Williams! Is it not altogether admirable and glorious?

Then, too, do we not sometimes need patience with God? How often we cry, "Why tarry the wheels of His chariot?" Ah, dear heart, "Tarry thou the Lord's leisure." He will meet thee in His own time at the trysting place. Be patient with your fellowmen, of course, but be patient also with thy God. Theodore Parker used to say, "The trouble is, God is not in a hurry and I am." Patience lays hold of the great things that really matter. She does not clutch nervously at the bubbles sailing past her, because she knows that the enduring things are not without, but within. The reason why men are impatient is not because their lives are so full, but because their hearts are so empty. "He that believeth shall not make haste."

But it is when we see patience in the sickroom that she wins my heart and wonder and applause. Here she is perfect. "Let patience have her perfect work." How comes it that as you come out of some sick chambers you feel as though you had been drinking from a spring of bitter waters; while in others it is as though there were odors wafted from the gardens of Beulah Land? Such sunshine, such sweetness, such peace, such uncomplainingness, such perfume! There is a morning freshness. "I will be as the dew unto Israel; he shall blossom as the lily. His branches shall spread and his beauty shall be as the olive tree and his smell as Lebanon."

I conducted the funeral of a young woman who had been an invalid from childhood. For twenty years she was a constant sufferer; the last two years her life was a veritable martyrdom. Deformed in body, and worn to a skeleton, yet never once did she murmur; giving half of her little income to other sufferers; sending every December to the poor fifty Christmas presents of little knick-knacks that she had made with her own hands; writing bright short stories for the magazines; never talking about her trouble; always smiling, always saying that if somebody had to suffer it was good that it was she—and then passing away at only thirty-three. Verily the rose opened its heart to the sting of the bee and gave up the nectar. Like the fabled nightingale, she sang with her breast against a thorn.

There is a famous drawing by Millais. It is the figure of a woman lashed to a pillar. The sea is pounding away at her feet and the tide is rising, and a ship, in full sail, is beating by, but paying no attention to her or her doom. Birds of prey are circling over her head. But she is indifferent to all. Her eyes are looking into the glory behind the golden gates. And this is the secret of her peace. I watch the great, patient Man Himself, going quietly about His work, resting in His Father. What patience with the disciples, with Peter and James and John, with Mary, with Pilate! What patience on the Cross! And, remember, it was for the joy that was set before Him that He endured.

The Battle for Temperance

The progress of temperance reform is an outstanding feature of our national life. Nineteen States have already outlawed the traffic in alcoholic liquors and several more will do so within a year. State after State is closing in on the traffic until probably twenty-four States, one-half of all the States in the Union, will be under State-wide prohibition in the near future.

Great as these victories are, they are but single battles, however, in the war whose area is nation-wide and whose objective is National Prohibition. This is the greatest single reform ever undertaken in this country. That it will be carried to a successful conclusion is conceded by practically everyone who keeps adequately informed concerning its movements.

The call of this reform comes to every person, clergyman or layman, whose moral sense is touched with the appeal for a citizenship saved from the liquor traffic—a traffic condemned by industry and science, outlawed by legislatures and electorates, and denounced by courts of justice, from the lowest to the highest.

One of the important factors in the campaign for 1916 will be the national convention of the Anti-Saloon League of America, which will be held in Indianapolis, Ind., from June 26 to 29, inclusive. All friends of the temperance cause are urged to co-operate in the effort to render this an epoch-making gathering.

A Mighty Man of God

Mr. F. S. Brockman has told the story of the life of Pastor Ting in a few short sentences which, in spite of their brevity, are big with meaning. The record is this: "Born in Shantung, the province which produced China's two greatest sages, Confucius and Mencius. Educated in Shantung Christian University. Pastor in Shantung in 1900 (Boxer year), when he was beaten with many stripes by the magistrate and left as dead; he still bears upon his body, like Paul, the marks of the Lord Jesus. For ten years evangelist at large in all China; thousands have been turned to Christianity by the power of his preaching and force of his wonderful life. In 1909, under the quiet influence of his message, 108 men out of 320 in the college department of the Shantung Christian University decided to enter the ministry. Since then, in his endeavor to meet the greatest Christian need in China to-day, he has led more than 500 young men to give their lives to the ministry."

A Korean Evangelistic Method

A special campaign of evangelism has been inaugurated in some of the fields attached to the Kwangju Mission Station in Korea. The following quotation describes the plan of one of the evangelists: "Every church in my field has made a large map of the church's territory and posted it up in front of the church, where all can see it every time they meet for worship. This map has all the villages within a radius of eight miles located, and those having believers living within them are marked with a cross, and those having no believers are marked with a zero. All have agreed to pray for those villages daily, and every time they meet for worship, and to work among them, trying to establish at least one Christian home in each village. About one hundred and fifty or two hundred have also pledged to select one heathen each, to pray and work for until he believes. A number of new believers have been won already by this new method."

Buddhism Not a Spent Force

Buddhism is not a spent force or dried-up stream in Japan yet. There are still in that land, in round numbers, 72,000 temples, 37,000 Buddhist halls and numerous small private shrines. The city of Kyoto, not many years ago, saw the erection of a temple that cost over $1,500,000. It is said that the massive pillars of this structure were raised to their places by long ropes made of the hair of devout Buddhist mothers and daughters.

PRESSED HARD Coffee's Weight on Old Age

When people realize the injurious effects of coffee and the better health that a change to Postum can bring, they are usually glad to lend their testimony for the benefit of others.

"My mother, since her early childhood, was an inveterate coffee drinker, had been troubled with her heart for a number of years and complained of that 'weak-all-over' feeling and sick stomach.

"Some time ago I was making a visit to a distant part of the country and took dinner with one of the merchants of the place. I noticed a somewhat unusual flavor of the 'coffee' and asked him concerning it. He replied that it was Postum.

"I was so pleased with it that I bought a package to carry home with me, and had wife prepare some for the next meal. The whole family liked it so well that we discontinued coffee and used Postum entirely.

"I had been very anxious concerning my mother's condition, but we noticed that after using Postum for a short time she felt much better, had little trouble with her heart, and no sick stomach; that the headaches were not so frequent, and her general condition much improved. This continued until she was well and hearty.

"I know Postum has benefited myself and the other members of the family, especially my mother, as she was a victim of long standing." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:
Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

Tracts for Free Distribution

The American Tract Society is al-ways ready to aid Christian workers, so far as its means will allow, by furnish-ing them with tracts suitable for their particular needs. Ordinarily the Soci-ety makes a grant of one-half the cost to all those who are engaged in regular Christian work—that is, for the sum of one dollar the Society will give any Christian worker two dollars' worth of tracts.

In special cases, however, where the recipient is unable to pay even a part of the cost, the Society will make a full grant of the entire value of the tracts.

As the Society is desirous of circulat-ing a large number of tracts during the coming months, applications for grants will be gladly received, and all reason-able appeals will be answered, so far as the Society's resources will permit.

In applying for such grants kindly specify the kind of tracts that are de-sired, the uses to which they are to be put, and specify whether a whole or a half grant is desired. If a whole grant is requested, please be sure to explain why the applicant cannot pay any part of the cost.

It is urged that applications be made as promptly as possible, so that there may be an immediate and wide distribu-tion of tract literature throughout the land. All applications should be ad-dressed to the General Secretary, Amer-ican Tract Society, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York.

An Appreciated Gift

A gift subscription of the AMERICAN MESSENGER brought forth the grateful acknowledgment from the grateful re-cipient, who has been a shut-in invalid for twelve years:

"DEAR KIND FRIENDS: My heart is full of love and praise to my blessed Jesus for the gift of His love and the sweet surprise of your very kind gift of the AMERICAN MESSENGER and the lovely calendar for the year 1916.

"Words fail to express my apprecia-tion of it. What a joy it will be to me every day of the year! It will be a sweet reminder of your kindness of the past years and will add a richer fra-grance to my room."

"A Comfort"

A subscriber to the AMERICAN MES-SENGER who lives in New York State writes:

"The paper is a comfort to me. I am sure I should miss it very much if I had to do without it. I have many trials, and often there is a poem or other words that are helpful."

Life Members and Directors

THE donation of $30 at one time constitutes a Life Member of the American Tract Society; the addition of $70, or the donation of $100 at one time, constitutes a Life Director. Life members may receive annually copies of the Society's own publications to the value of $1; Life Directors to the value of $2; if applied for within the Society's year, from April 1st to April 1st, in person or by written order. No individual can draw more than one annuity any year for himself. Colporters are not authorized to supply Life Members.

Form of Bequest

I GIVE and bequeath to the "AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY," instituted in the City of New York, May, 1825, the sum of dollars to be ap-plied to the charitable uses and purposes of said Society.

Three witnesses should state that the testator declared this to be his last will and testament, and that they signed at his request, and in his presence and the presence of each other.

American Tract Society

THIS SOCIETY was organized in 1825. Its work is interdenominational and international in scope, and is commended by all evangelical denominations.

It has published the Gospel messages in 178 languages, dialects and characters. It has been the pioneer for work among the foreign-speak-ing people in our country, and its missionary colporters are distributing Christian literature in thirty-three languages among the immigrants and making a home-to-home visitation among the spiritually destitute, both in the cities and rural districts, leaving all kinds of Christian literature, also the Bible or portions of the Scriptures.

Its publication of leaflets, volumes and peri-odicals from the Home Office total 791,142,950 copies. It has made foreign cash appropriations to the amount of $796,137.39, and grants of electrotypes to the value of $61,177.96, by means of which millions of copies of books and tracts have been published at mission stations abroad.

The gratuitous distribution of the past year is to the value of $15,439.05. The grand total of its gratuitous distribution has been to the value of $2,617,820.90, which is the equivalent of over four billion tract pages.

The total number of family visits that have been made by the Society's colporters during the last year is 202,877; the total number of volumes distributed by sale or grant is 59,431, making the total number of volumes that have been circulated by colporters in the last 73 years 17,326,937, and the total number of fam-ily visits that they have made during the same period 18,406,676.

Its work, ever widening, is dependent upon donations and legacies, and greatly needs in-creased offerings.

Instructive entertainment for spare moments—in the BIBLE PICTURE CONTEST

LET US TELL YOU HOW

EVERY MAN, WOMAN AND CHILD READING THIS ANNOUNCEMENT

CAN DERIVE UNLIMITED ENJOYMENT and compete to receive one of the 419 cash rewards.

$3,500 FIRST REWARD, $1,250
 Second—$625. Third—$350. Followed by $250, $150, $100, $75, $50, $20, and 410 additional rewards. 419 in all.

This illustration (on the left) represents in reduced size the seven-inch book known as "Gems from the Bible," which contains the official list of eligible answers (fitting texts) for the series of 60 pictures making up the Contest. The simplest way to submit the answers of your choice is in the paper covered booklet (about the same size as the "Gems" volume) known as Contest Reply Book shown in miniature here on the right.

PICK FITTING TEXTS, OUT OF A GIVEN LIST, TO MATCH 60 PICTURES

You see four pictures on this page. There will be sixty such in the Contest. About a dozen per month are being published. You can start right now on an equal footing with everybody else, by obtaining the pictures which have appeared to date, and the rest in due course, as we will explain; for no answers will be accepted until after the last picture has been published. So you have plenty of time to work out your answers for the pictures, a few at a time, and then submit your complete set at the end.

What is wanted is a Bible verse to describe a picture. That will constitute one answer. You may submit as many as five answers for one picture if you see fit. Then do likewise for every picture in the series, which will come to you consecutively numbered.

There are no hard pictures in this Contest. If you believe you recognize some of the pictures, very well; but, even if you don't, remember that selection is uniformly limited to a standard list of 2,000 Bible verses—"Gems from the Bible"; and all you need to do is to turn to this list and pick the appropriate answers. Observation and good judgment will win.

The Bible Picture Contest initiates with the well-known national weekly, the Christian Herald. If you have not already seen the full Rules, they will be sent free on application. The Contest is open to all, without obligation of any sort; yet you would no doubt be glad to subscribe to the Christian Herald as well as the American Messenger in connection with the Contest, and for that reason we make the following special offer:

The Contest pictures will be sent you free, together with the Rules, object lessons and all other needed information, at the same time as the book "Gems from the Bible," and also the "Reply Book"—this whole Outfit being a premium to you with combination yearly subscription to the American Messenger and the Christian Herald, all for $2.10. Either or both subscriptions can be new, renewal or extension; for yourself or any other person. Thus you will be fully equipped to enter the Contest, and should proceed to try to earn the first reward of $1,250. Do it now.

Address: The American Messenger, Park Avenue and 40th Street, New York City

You yourself may earn in this Contest the cash sum of TWELVE HUNDRED AND FIFTY DOLLARS.

THE BIBLE INSTITUTE OF LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY, NEW YORK.

PROVE THEM FOR YOURSELF

"I'm studying the Bible. What can I get to help me in this work?" The answer is given in The Christian Worker's Library of twelve selected titles. They are not books which because so recently written are wet with ink, and we did not intend that they should be. But they are books which have been "weathered" and have proved like good friends tried and found true. They will help you in Bible study and work, when you want help and where you need help this year, next year and as long as the books last. The books cover a wide range of subjects in both the Old and New Testaments. Just examine the titles.

THE ATONEMENT

By James Stalker, D.D.

It is hardly necessary to explain what the Atonement means. But it is a master subject and takes a master hand to treat it so that it is understood. Divided into three parts this book deals in a striking and scholarly manner with the New Testament situation, the Old Testament preparation and the modern justification. The book will work wonders in clearing up many of the questions on the subject.

AMONG THE HOLY PLACES

By James Kean, M.A., B.D.

The author takes the reader with him in his journeys and enables him to see in the most vivid manner the scenes visited. One can from this book obtain all the advantages of a personal visit to the places described and probably with still greater profit, for the reason that the author has the ability to see all that is worth seeing. Fully illustrated and with index.

BIBLICAL HISTORY AND GEOGRAPHY

By H. S. Osborn, LL.D.

Admirably adapted for use in Bible Classes. Dividing the Old Testament into six periods the author takes up chronologically the prominent events and historical points and defines them. Three chapters are given to the canonizing of the Scriptures and the origin of the Talmud. A description not generally obtainable of the places where the events occur is given in each case. A splendid perspective of events, time and places in all their original forms is thus presented. The New Testament is likewise analyzed. There is an excellent index and many colored maps.

COMPANION TO THE BIBLE

By E. P. Barrows, D.D.

This is a critical study of the books of the Bible in four parts. Part 1 treats of the evidences of revealed religion. Part 2 examines and classifies the books of the Old Testament. Part 3 examines and classifies the books of the New Testament. Part 4 takes up the principle of Biblical interpretation.

EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY

By Charles P. McIlvaine, D.D.

This is one of the standard works on the Evidences. The material as set forth in this volume proves clearly, decisively and conclusively a sufficient basis for faith in the divine origin, nature, methods and results of Christianity. After reading this book, a believer in God and His kingdom would become a stronger man with stronger beliefs. An unbeliever would turn from his unbelief to the earnest and continued following of Christ.

THE MASTER PREACHER

By Albert R. Bond, A.M., D.D.

Jesus was a teacher and a preacher with methods, a personality, themes and a success of His own. His methods and themes could be followed with success to-day if you only knew how. Dr. Bond knows how, has done it successfully, and presents in this book for your benefit practically every phase of Christ's methods. Its careful study will well repay any preacher.

THE LORD OF GLORY

By Benjamin B. Warfield, D.D., LL.D.

Here is presented the Godhead of Christ on evidence taken from the New Testament. It is an unanswerable plea based on the designations which the New Testament writers apply to Jesus when concurrently speaking of Him. When Dr. Warfield comes to the end no doubt remains that the marks of God were in the Master. Has index of designations, passages of Scripture and authors cited. As an aid to the study and preaching of this subject it is without equal.

THE TWO ST. JOHNS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

By James Stalker, D.D.

Did it ever occur to you to make a study of the two Johns in the New Testament? Dr. Stalker with his remarkably original method, clarity of style, comprehensiveness of view and suggestiveness of matter, contrasts the careers and characters of John the Evangelist and John the Baptist. Full information on a vitally interesting subject.

THE OLD-TIME RELIGION

By David James Burrell, D.D., LL.D.

There is not a dull sentence in this whole book, much less a dull page. Full of terseness and vigor, replete with sound thoughts, the book goes to the root of the Christian religion and tells why this religion is so solid and satisfactory. Young and old may read it with profit. Young ministers may well take it to heart.

STUDIES IN THE BOOK OF GENESIS

By H. B. Pratt

This is without doubt one of the best commentaries on the book of Genesis. There are so many doubtful points, overlapping events and apparently conflicting circumstances in the first book of Moses which need satisfactory explanations that this volume meets a demand of students of the Old Testament. It is especially valuable because the subject is handled by a man who has given a life to its study and research. The book makes an excellent companion volume to "Evidences of Christianity."

TRANSFIGURED

By Joseph Hamilton

What "Studies in the Book of Genesis" does to give light on a difficult subject in the Old Testament, "Transfigured" does to explain one of the most talked-of events in the New Testament. "Transfigured" is an unusual volume—a devout and common-sense study of this unparalleled scene. It treats of the unseen and eternal.

THE WONDROUS CROSS

By David James Burrell, D.D., LL.D.

We could not resist the temptation to have the twelfth and last volume of this library one of Dr. Burrell's. The Cross is such a vital factor in every life when properly understood that this book seemed more than appropriate to lend dignity to a library intended first of all for the Christian reader and student. It is most acceptable with its pointed truths and full of significance.

Our offer saves you one-half. These twelve handsome volumes will be delivered to your door for $7.50. The original selling price $15.00. The illustration gives but little idea of the beautiful appearance these books make. They will add dignity and strength to any library. Think of it. Twelve books, 4300 and more pages well printed on clear white paper, each book uniformly bound in one of the best library cloths—gold stamping, at the low price of $7.50. Good paper, good printing and good binding. A vast array of information on a multitude of subjects. A library for the Bible student, pastor, teacher and scholar. Send us your order today. Delay will mean loss of this opportunity.

DR. DAVID J. BURRELL

“PREPAREDNESS”—FOR WHAT?

BY

REV. DAVID JAMES BURRELL, D.D., LL.D.

Pastor of the Marble Collegiate Church, New York City

IN one of his discourses to the multitude, Jesus said: “What king, as he goeth to encounter another king in war, will not sit down first, and take counsel whether he is able with ten thousand to meet him that cometh against him with twenty thousand?”

This is a fair question. A king under such circumstances would naturally be in a strait betwixt two. The enemy draws near with a mobilized army of twenty thousand men. Not only the throne, but the presumably important principles on which it is founded; not only the government, but every man, woman and child whom it is under bonds to protect are in grave danger. What shall the king do? If unprepared, he must needs send an ambassador to humbly ask conditions of peace. If prepared, he will meet the invader, save his country and vindicate his divine commission by defending his own.

The question is one that presses upon us. One-half of the world is now engaged in war; the other half is facing the possibility of being involved in it. Preparedness is therefore the question of the hour. Preparedness for what? Are we to prepare for war in time of peace? Or for peace in time of war? It works both ways.

So far as our country is concerned, the question must be considered from the Christian point of view. For ours is a Christian nation, founded on the principles of the Christian religion and so understood from the beginning until now. This fact, established by frequent decisions in our highest courts of law has never been formally called in question except by unaccustomed foreigners—most of them fugitives from persecution in other lands—whom our Government has prematurely equipped with rights which they do not comprehend, privileges which they cannot appreciate and a civic franchise which they abuse to their own harm, like children permitted to play with edged tools.

The determining factor in the solution of the problem is, therefore, the teaching of Christ. What did the Master have to say about it?

To begin with, He indubitably taught the doctrine of personal non-resistance. “I say unto you that ye resist not him that is evil; but whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also.” (Matt. 5:39.) That is to say, there must be no revenge for private wrongs. It is plain, however, that this must not be so interpreted as to encourage a truckling spirit, or to overthrow government and courts of law. Our Lord Himself, when struck with a rod expostulated with the man who smote him. (John 18:23.) But there was no retaliatory spirit in Him; moreover, in this instance, no real good was to be gained by resenting the wrong.

When Peter drew his sword against the soldiers who laid hands on Jesus in the garden, He said, “Put up the sword into the sheath;” but this was because Peter was standing directly in the way of Christ’s purpose of redemption, for He said, “The cup which the Father hath given me shall I not drink it?” (John 18:11.) In other words, Peter was here fighting against God. If he had been waylaid by a band of ruffians and had drawn his sword in self-defense, does anyone suppose that Christ would have reproved him? To surrender one’s life, in such a case, without resistance would be suicidal, and suicide is self-murder. Or if Peter had drawn his sword to protect a child from brutal violence, would not Christ have praised him for it?

The attitude of Christ must not be construed as one of cowardly acquiescence in wrong. He who entered the Temple with a scourge of small cords and drove out the money changers was no craven. Such “‘umbleness” as that of Uriah Heep was an abomination to Him. He was the last man in the world to “bow the pregnant hinges of his knee that thrift might follow fawning.” His calm submission to personal injury was precisely that of which Milton speaks: “A lowly loftiness of mind which is exalted by its own humiliation.” He stooped to conquer, and He stooped like a man.

We must observe here that nations and individuals are not controlled by the same laws. In the nature of the case governments are vested with authority which individuals have not. They can do many things which are unlawful for their citizens to do.

This raises the question, What are governments for? They exist “by the consent of the governed.” But why this consent? How shall we account for the voluntary surrender of individual rights and privileges which is involved in such covenants? What is to be gained by it? The civic franchise. Mutual defense and protection. This is what governments are for, and this is why they are approved as “ordained of God.”

They are certainly not so “ordained” for selfish conquest or mere national glory. Listen to Paul as he speaks on Mars Hill: “God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell upon the face of the earth and hath determined the bounds of their habitation.” What measureless bloodshed would have been averted if only the nations had been willing to abide within their predetermined “bounds of habitation!”

The first business of a nation then is to protect its citizens. It is in consideration of such mutual defense against aggression of every sort that men agree to merge their individual rights in social compacts. The closing words of our Declaration of Independence are these: “For the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honor.” As to the purpose of that Declaration the opening words of our national Constitution are explicit: “We, the people of the United States, in order to secure a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution of the United States.”

This being so, the lives of those who went down on the Lusitania together with all exposed to a similar danger rest as a solemn responsibility upon our Executive. Otherwise the mutual compact has no value. It is important, of course, that our commercial interests should be protected; but all problems that express themselves in dollars and cents can safely await the solution of the more serious problems that involve the security of life. Here is no “hymn of hate.” We seek no mere avengement for the past; but as a nation we are under bonds to secure to the humblest of our citizens that protection of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness which is guaranteed in our national bill of rights.

The second business of a nation is to defend its own life. No passenger is safe on any vessel that is ill prepared to face the opposing winds. No government can protect its citizens unless it is in a position to defend itself; that is, to defend the underlying principles which constitute its life. The game of politics, carried on by demagogues with the cry, "What is the constitution among friends?" has in it the potency of national death. The service of statesmanship, on the other hand, by perpetuating the fundamental principles of our government, is calculated to prolong and perpetuate it.

There is no necessity of prognosticating an invasion from either the Atlantic or the Pacific in order to justify the policy of preparedness. The mere mention of a remote contingency is enough to warrant the safeguarding of our borders. Let sciolists discuss the right of self-defense; no man of reason doubts it. As well might one commit suicide to avoid the semblance of a quarrel with a lunatic, as for a nation to jeopardize its existence for fear of being thought belligerent toward a maddened foe.

When Governor Bradford, of Plymouth Colony, received from Canonicus, the king of the Narragansetts, a bundle of arrows wrapped in the skin of a rattlesnake—indicating a proposed massacre—he very properly answered by sending back the snake's skin stuffed with powder and balls—signifying that he was ready to meet it.

A man who, finding a burglar or ravisher in his apartment at night, will not defend himself and his household, is something less than human. By the same token, the people of Leyden were justified in resisting the Spanish siege. Let them hurl stones upon their enemies! Let them pour blazing pitch on their heads! Self-defense is the first law of nature. And this is certainly as true of nations as of men.

The Vaudois, the Huguenots, the derided "Beggars of Holland," and our revolutionary sires are held in universal honor for adventuring their all in defense of convictions which were dearer than life. "Better not be at all than not be noble." Lexington was a protest against an unjust stamp act. Our Revolutionary War was fought to vindicate the proposition that there can be "no taxation without representation." Shall the sword be drawn, then, to resist a paltry three pence on a pound of tea? Aye, when those three pence spell tyranny! Shall thousands die at Gettysburg for one black chattel? Yes, if Gettysburg rings the bells of freedom for ten million men! The life of a nation that does not stand for the principles which constitute its life is not worth living. When Nero fiddles with Galba's army at his gates, it is high time for Rome to die.

The third business of a nation is to champion the weak. For no nation liveth unto itself; its vine must needs grow over the wall. Americanism is good, but pan-Americanism is better. The Monroe Doctrine is the largest contribution ever made by any government to the welfare of the race, because it pledges us not only to self-defense, but to the protection of neighbor Republics which would otherwise be a helpless prey to every ambitious foe. Cuba, living next door, was wounded by Spain and left for dead on the Bloody Way. What could we do? Pass by on the other side for fear of a foreign entanglement, or take her under our wing by annexation? Neither one: "Loose her and let her go!" To-day her chains are off. This is the very essence of Christianity, expressing itself in terms of Christian government, as I understand it.

*"In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,
With a glory in His bosom that transfigures you and me;
As He died to make men holy, let us die to make men free;
His truth is marching on."*

There is a patriotism which speaks on this wise: "Our country right or wrong." There is a larger patriotism which regards our country as an agent of humanity, not only within its borders, but within the entire purview of its influence. The United States lost one of the most glorious opportunities of our history when we failed to intercede for Belgium. It is fine to be an American, but finer far to be—as an unhyphenated American—a citizen of the world-wide Commonwealth of Man.

It is this going out of patriotism that throws open our gates to the oppressed of all nations. "Liberty enlightening the World" is our noblest work of art. A Russian friend of mine on landing at the Battery went straight up to Cooper Institute where he heard a new-made citizen discourse on American Freedom; whereupon, as he tells me, he "wept two hours for joy!"

These are the functions of a Christian nation, and they all involve preparedness. Preparedness for war, if God sounds the tocsin; not otherwise. Preparedness for peace at any price, short of the sacrifice of national life and honor. "First pure; then peaceable." War is not the worst of evils; nor is death the darkest fate that can befall a man. As the Roman poet Horace said, "Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori." Blessed is he who lives for the truth's sake and stands ready to die for it.

But there is one thing more—vastly more— which a Christian nation like ours can do and is under bonds to do; and this involves no possibility of war; namely, it can stand for the world-wide propagation of the Gospel.

"Shall we whose souls are lighted
With wisdom from on high,
Shall we to souls benighted
The lamp of God deny?"

There is no militarism in this. It requires no dreadnoughts or vast armaments. The only preparedness needed is a willing mind on the part of those who are in personal covenant with Christ. Without that we shall fall immeasurably short of the beneficent purpose of Him who has "made and preserved us a nation." Here dreams of conquest are in order. The world for Christ! God grant that our country may be a fountain whose radiating streams shall flow forth, even to the remotest of the regions beyond, to make glad those who as yet dwell in darkness and the shadow of death, with no such privileges as ours; no light, no freedom, no humanity, no Christ! This is the peaceful mission of America to the world.

To this end our country lives, by the grace of God. And with this purpose in mind we pray for its perpetual life and usefulness:

"Our fathers' God, to thee,
Author of liberty,
To thee we sing;
Long may our land be bright
With freedom's holy light;
Protect us by Thy might,
Great God, our King!"

The Storm—and After

BY CORA S. DAY

As the war clouds lower and storm after storm of battle breaks over the nations, more than one timid heart questions the present and the future. Why does God permit such trouble upon earth? Let us go back to a certain olden time and place; a certain placid lake with a frail boat filled with men whose names we know well. One, leader of them all, sleeps, worn out by fatigue. It would seem as if then, if ever, nature would be held in leash and the slumber of that one unbroken. Yet a terrible tempest arose suddenly, and to save themselves the disciples aroused Him whose word stilled the storm.

God gives no man full wisdom or full knowledge of His reasons for the storms of life that come to all. But so far we may be sure, those who are in company with Jesus need fear no evil. He in His own good, wise time will still all our tempests and give us peace. "The winds and the waves obey His will," when He commands, "Peace, be still." So we may rest on the sure faith and hope that when the time is ripe He will speak peace to His war-stricken world.

Modern Heroes

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

THE heroes are not all dead. The material out of which martyrs are made is not exhausted. There is more heroism in the realm of religion to-day than ever before. There are millions of men and women who would gladly give up their lives rather than do dishonor to their Lord.

The general secretary of one of the missionary boards recently told the story of the return of a missionary to the home office from Turkey just after the horrible massacres in that country had begun. Many thousands of the Christian Armenians had already been slaughtered by the fiendish Turks, and the results of the many years' work of the missionaries seemed to have been wiped out. The missionaries were recalled to America. The general secretary told of the coming to the office of the board in Boston of this particular missionary, and of his declaration that he was willing to go back again to Turkey if the board so desired, or to go into any other field if that was their wish. The secretary said that every member of the board was stricken with self-reproach at the spirit of utter self-sacrifice shown by this devoted herald of the cross. Although his sacrifices of twenty years had been apparently made of no avail, yet he would return to that same dangerous field and continue the fight till death, if that were deemed the best thing to do.

This same speaker told of a letter that the office had received from one of its missionaries to China at the time of the Boxer massacre several years ago. This young man was about to go to his death and he wrote a message to the missionary leaders of the denomination in this country, saying that he was about to die, but that he wanted them to see to it that his little son be trained to take his place in the land of China when he should become of age.

Several years ago another of the missionary boards sent down to the Congo region in Africa one of its choicest young men. He had been a football hero, and was strong and fitted for the difficult task given him. He took out with him his newly-wedded wife, and at once began his pioneer mission work as carpenter, blacksmith, physician, teacher, preacher and governor. For he had to become all things to all men, since he was the only white man within a radius of a thousand miles. After three years his wife died, and she was buried there in the savage wilderness. He would not return to his native land even after this calamity, but said he would continue, and urged the home board to send helpers. But helpers could not be found who were willing to take up the African work. So this lone man worked on month after month. He resolved to make a journey into the surrounding country, doing what he could to bring the light into still other regions than that in which his chief work was being done. While out on this tour, much of it being through swamps and over rivers, he was drowned, and the sad message of his death came to the board from one of the workers. No message had ever brought so great a shock to the denomination which this young man served as this story of his tragic and heroic death. His three children are now in this country. The last word to come from this African worker was one of enthusiasm and hopefulness for the outlook for the Gospel in the dark continent to which he had devoted his life.

Surely such men as these of the twentieth century are worthy of having their names enrolled alongside the names of those of olden days who "had trials of mockings and scourgings, of bonds and imprisonment," who were "stoned," "sawn asunder" and "slain with the sword."

A GREAT BIBLE INSTITUTE

THE Bible Institute of Los Angeles, Cal., traces its origin to a young men's Bible class in the Immanuel Presbyterian Church, and a young women's Bible class, which met in a room in a department store. The young men's Bible class was organized by Rev. T. C. Horton, Bible Teacher of the Immanuel Presbyterian Church in the summer of 1906. It made rapid growth and assumed the name of "The Fishermen's Club," suggested by the words of Christ as recorded in Matthew 4:19, "Come ye after me, and I will make you fishers of men." The young women's class also increased rapidly in numbers, and in 1907 was named "The Lyceum Club." These two classes, wielding an influence that extended to every section of the city, and constantly growing in numbers and power, became the nucleus of the Bible Institute as it exists to-day.

In the fall of 1907 the co-operation of Rev. A. B. Prichard, pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, was secured, and some day classes were held in the lecture room of that church.

The next step in the development of the Bible Institute was the securing of a building. A structure was found on South Main street, which seemed to be the best available at that time. By making certain alterations an auditorium, a dining-room, a reception room, a class room and some small office rooms were provided. Thus a plant was provided, which met the immediate needs for the next few years.

The permanent organization of the Bible Institute was formed at a meeting held on February 25, 1908. The following officers were elected: President, Lyman Stewart; Vice-President, Rev. A. B. Prichard; Superintendent, Rev. T. C. Horton; Associate Superintendent, R. A. Hadden; Secretary, B. C. Atterbury; Treasurer, Leon V. Shaw.

A rapid development followed the installation of the Bible Institute in its own headquarters. Messrs. Horton, Hadden and Prichard formed the Faculty and took up the teaching work. From the beginning the Bible Institute has been evangelistic in character. Shop meetings which had been conducted under the auspices of the Church Federation were taken over by the Bible Institute. The Bible women's work was organized, the workers giving their whole time to visiting the homes and holding neighborhood Bible classes. A converted Jewess was found, specially qualified to work among her own people, and a work was commenced among the Jews. The Union Rescue Mission of the city had inaugurated a Spanish work, opening a mission for that purpose, but after a two years' trial decided it was wise to discontinue, and that mission was taken over by the Bible Institute. The work now assumed larger proportions and the Rev. J. H. Sammis was called to the Faculty. There was a great need for evangelistic work among the oil fields of California, and two men were engaged to give their whole time to this service. Many sections of the State were not reached by evangelists, and the Rev. J. R. Pratt, of New York, was called to the work, which was abundantly blessed of God. Extension classes were organized in the city and surrounding towns by Mr. Hadden, assisted by one of the resident pastors, Rev. W. Leon Tucker. The Fishermen's Club also had evangelists in the field.

With twenty-five workers giving their whole time to the work the Bible Institute made remarkable progress in the first three years of its existence, and in the summer of 1911 the Board of Directors decided upon an advance movement, and determined to secure the best available man in the country for Dean. After much prayer they were led to call Dr. Richard A. Torrey, whom Mr. Moody chose twenty-five years ago to be the first superintendent of the Bible Institute of Chicago, a position which he filled admirably for fifteen years until he resigned, after Mr. Moody's death, to take up the world-wide evangelistic campaigns that have made him known everywhere. Dr. Torrey accepted the call as a result of his deep conviction that the Pacific Coast was a most strategic point for large service, and entered upon his duties as Dean of the Faculty in January, 1912.

Under the leadership of Mr. Lyman Stewart, the President of the Bible Institute, and a most generous supporter of its work, a successful effort was now made to provide the permanent building needed to properly house the ever-enlarging activities of this growing enterprise. This effort culminated in the erection of the splendid building located at 536-558 South Hope street, a picture of which appears on the front cover of this issue of the AMERICAN MESSENGER.

With the completion of this edifice Los Angeles has added one more claim to its long list of superlatives. Representing an investment of a million and a half dollars and towering thirteen stories, this great structure is said to be the largest of its kind not only in the United States but in the world. The frontage of the building is two hundred and forty feet and the depth one hundred and sixty-five feet. A Spanish and Moorish touch is given to the architecture.

The great auditorium is the central edifice linking the two lofty pylons, which represent many-storied dormitories for men and women. The arches open with a vestibule one hundred and twelve feet long, thirty-four feet wide and thirty feet high. The auditorium with its balconies has a seating capacity of four thousand five hundred and sixty-four.

The basement under the men's dormitory is devoted to the business of the school, and under the women's dormitory is the printing plant. On the first floor of the north wing are the executive offices for the women students and the Biola Book Room. The dormitories contain a total of six hundred and eighty-three rooms comfortably furnished. In the upper floors are club and lounging rooms and in the basement a large cafeteria, with a seating capacity of five hundred persons.

The work of the Bible Institute is interdenominational. The Institute classes are for the training of men and women in the knowledge of the Bible for any field to which God may call them. There is no charge for tuition.

In its theological position the Bible Institute holds to the historic faith of the Church as expressed in the common creed of evangelical Christendom. It stands for the integrity of the Holy Scriptures and for their supernatural and plenary authority. It believes in the trinity of the Godhead, the deity of Christ, the personality of the Holy Spirit, the necessity of the New Birth, the resurrection of the body, the immortality of the spirit and the life everlasting of believers.

In its "Yokefellows' Hall" the Bible Institute maintains a mission for men, where hundreds of men are faithfully dealt with, street meetings are held and a Sunday School is conducted for bootblacks.

A Music course is offered at the Bible Institute which makes it possible to obtain a knowledge of gospel music from every standpoint. It is especially designed to thoroughly equip evangelistic singers, choir leaders, Sunday School workers, organists, pianists and music teachers.

The course includes the Theory of Music, Harmony, Composition, Sight Singing, Men's, Women's and Mixed Chorus work, Voice Placing, and Solo Singing, Conducting and Normal Training.

Many opportunities present themselves at the Missions, Churches and Sunday Schools of the city for practical application of all the theoretical work of the class room. Students are assigned regularly to these different places as a part of their school work. When confidence and ability are acquired, positions as choir leaders can generally be secured for such students, and there is continually a call for evangelistic singers who are really proficient.

As the whole aim of the Bible Institute is to turn out efficient Christian workers, not mere theorists, the instruction given in the different class rooms is at once translated into practise as a part of the training.

Students are required to attend and assist in missions, street meetings, tent meetings, to visit people in their homes, to conduct adult Bible classes and Sunday School classes, and to engage in various other forms of aggressive Christian work, and always with their eyes open for opportunities for personal work.

These assignments are made by the Superintendents, and every student is required to hand in each week a written report of their work.

A weekly report meeting is held at which the work of the preceding week is surveyed and difficulties discussed. This is one of the most helpful and inspirational hours of the week.

"The Mission of the Master"

Some months ago the story of "The Mission of the Master" was told in the columns of the AMERICAN MESSENGER by Rev. George Ernest Merriam. It will be remembered by those who read the story that it told of the plan to present to the churches of America a very remarkable painting by a very eminent artist. The painting is a portrait of "The Christ" entitled "The Master," which is regarded by many competent observers as one of the greatest of modern masterpieces. The artist is Darius Cobb, of Boston, whose historical paintings have a national renown, and who spent more than thirty years in completing his wonderful masterpiece.

It was Rev. C. F. Hill Crathern, of Worcester, Mass., who conceived the idea of exhibiting this painting by Darius Cobb throughout the land, and under his skilful leadership a tour of the country was made from Maine to California in which "The Mission of the Master" was attended by over a hundred thousand people.

The results of this effort have demonstrated the possibility of evangelism through art. Rev. Oliver Huckel, of Baltimore, Md., has declared that this Mission of the Master will be an untold blessing to the ages. Glowing tributes to the spiritual value of this artistic representation have been given by both press and pulpit in the various cities where "The Mission of the Master" has gone. The simple but impressive recital by the venerable artist of his motive and purpose which he gives at every exhibition under the title, "Why I Painted the Christ," and the sympathetic introduction given by Mr. Crathern, when he unveils the painting and presents the artist to the audience, have constituted a service at once educational, inspirational and deeply religious.

"The Mission of the Master" is still in progress and all who can possibly see this great painting should avail themselves of the opportunity thus offered for receiving a vital and uplifting spiritual impulse.

The Mexican Mission in Dallas, Texas

One of the important features of the work that is being carried on in the Southern and Southwestern States by the missionary colporters of the American Tract Society is the distribution of Christian literature in the Spanish language among the people of Latin-American origin who are found in that section of our country.

Several of the colporters in the Southern Agency are making special efforts to reach the Mexican population who have drifted over the border into the State of Texas, and the Rev. George Whitefort, Superintendent of that Agency, has recently sent us a photograph which illustrates one phase of that work. The picture that appears on this page has been reproduced from that photograph, which is explained by our missionary colporter, Rev. A. B. Carrero, in these words:

"In this picture are seen the children of our day school. In this school we teach the children in their own native tongue, which is Spanish. After they have gotten a good foundation in elementary work we send them to the American public schools in the city of Dallas.

"The preparation we give them enables them to advance fairly well, as they have obtained good ideas as to how to study, and they have learned how to read and write in Spanish. It, therefore, becomes quite easy for them to advance in the courses that they receive in the public schools, in which they readily acquire the English language.

"Without this preparation they do not succeed very well in the American schools, and sometimes when they come to the third grade they are discouraged and drop out because the studies seem very difficult to them.

"All of these scholars are Roman Catholic children, but they come to our Sunday School, study our Catechism and learn of Christ."

In the accompanying picture Rev. A. B. Carrero may be seen standing at the extreme left. He has been a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society for many years, and is also Pastor of the Presbyterian Mexican Mission of Dallas, Texas.

From Home to Home in Cuba

For several years Mr. Pedro Pozo has been circulating Christian literature in the Spanish language as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society in Cuba. He gives a report of his activities during a recent month in the following words:

"I spent the first week in the city of Havana, where I saw heartrending poverty and distress as the result of indolence, gambling and other vices. I held many conversations with the indifferent and the unbelieving. As I went from house to house many said to me, 'We have not the wherewithal with which to buy food and pay rent, and how can we buy books?' But here and there hearts were opened to hear my message, and I tried to leave at least a tract wherever it would be received.

"From Havana I went east to Jaruco, and visited the sugar mills of Loteria and Carmen. Going on to Santa Cruz and Canesa I held several services in the country districts, always trying to explain clearly some portion of the Scriptures. I was able to dispose of quite a number of the smaller books in this locality. At San Antonio I held a meeting with twenty-four persons present, to whom I read the Ninetieth Psalm and explained its sublime teaching. At the close of the service I sold several books and was cordially urged to repeat my visit.

"Thence I proceeded to Matanzas, where I labored for two days and then went on to Lemonar, visiting two sugar mills and circulating several volumes. At Juanacaro, San Francisco and Juneo I held services, at each of which at least a dozen or more persons were present.

"At Junilla I worked for one day and I spent four days in Cardenas and its environs, holding conversations on religious subject with the people in the homes and stores. In one place they said, 'Yes, the books you carry are good. Some other day we will buy, when you come back.' I answered, 'I do not know that I can return, nor whether I shall live to do so. Now is your opportunity.' Then they took a New Testament and a copy of 'The Heart of Man' in Spanish. They said to me, 'It surely takes patience to sell books, and we must believe that you labor in faith.' I replied, 'What I desire far more than that you should purchase books is that you look to Jesus as your only Saviour.'

"This brief narrative gives a fair idea of my work, as I come in contact with truth and falsehood and with light and darkness. May the Lord bless the distribution of the printed page of gospel truth to His own honor and glory!"

An Interesting Incident

Rev. Samuel Mueller, a missionary colporter who is scattering Christian literature in the Far West, tells the following incident:

"One morning I met a young Hebrew in the street car. I gave him a tract in the Hebrew language, which he read through with great interest. He said to me, 'Have you any more of these tracts? One is not enough.' I gave him two more, which he read through with the same intense interest. Before I left the car he thanked me with a radiant face, and said, 'That was good!' To see his joyful face was heavenly bread and water for my soul. I thought to myself, 'Will I be privileged to meet that dear son of Abraham in the new Jerusalem?'"

Winning Souls in Porto Rico

Juan Sanchez, a missionary colporter, who is circulating the Spanish publications of the American Tract Society in Porto Rico, writes:

"In one meeting which I held there was a man present who was unsaved and whose evil life was an obstacle to the progress of true religion in that place. I preached on the parable of the Prodigal Son, and in that sermon the man saw the picture of himself, and repented. He has a good deal of influence in the town and I am sure his conversion has meant much for the cause of Christ.

"I have had the privilege of preaching in many places to large congregations of people and God has manifested His power in the conversion of many souls. I had the opportunity of co-operating with the pastor of one important church in the city of Ponce. Through the agency of prayer and personal work we carried on a campaign in which eight souls were won for Christ.

"In one town of the Arecibo district the Spanish version of 'The Heart of Man' was instrumental in leading a family of twenty people to Christ. This little book is a great help in the work. I am also circulating the Spanish Commentaries on the Bible, written by Rev. Henry B. Pratt, among Bible students and Sunday School teachers. I have received strong testimony as to the efficiency of these books.

"I sold a copy of the Spanish translation of 'The Bible in Picture and Story' to one family and that opened the way for a missionary to bring that family to a Christian church."

"During the past month I have been laboring both in Ponce and in some other cities. At the opening of the month I preached in the suburb of a town in this district. This suburb was inhabited by the worst people of the town. The holding of an evangelistic meeting in such a place was a great surprise, and to my joy there was considerable interest shown.

"I visited also another town which was a stronghold of Romanism. There I preached in company with some other brethren in Christ. Some threats were made against us, especially when the people began coming to hear the preaching of the Gospel. But the Lord strengthened us, and we continued our preaching with favorable results for the extension of the Kingdom."

DOES NO ONE CARE?

By Allan Phillip

THE air was cold with a thick mist from the sea, while the glow of the fires in the ship-yards, reflected on the low hanging clouds, cast a lurid light through the mist which struggled with the glow of the street lamps, flickering in the gale that was blowing in from the dark sea.

"Good night, Fred!"

"Good night!"

So the two men parted as they passed from the dock gates at the end of another day's work.

It was a wild night and the two men turned each his own way to find pleasure now that the work of the day was over.

Tom Roaden's mind was filled with thoughts of the thrilling gatherings in the Town Hall, where a mission was being carried on that seemed to be stirring the whole town to its depths.

The hymns sung on the previous night had been ringing in his mind all the day, and the burning words of the speaker had echoed and re-echoed in his ears as he bent to his task and went to and from the works. He was impatient to be back in the hall amid the enthusiasm of the crowds, and to feel again the power of the speaker's message.

As he walked he turned to look after his friend and saw him pass into the open door of a saloon. It was Fred's place of pleasure for the evening.

"Poor fellow!" murmured Roaden to himself. "If he only knew the joy of the Lord and what it is to be a follower of Christ he would never want to go in there again!"

A little later Roaden was in the hall. Again the place was crowded, and the volume of sound, as a thousand voices joined in the old Gospel hymns, floated out into the stormy night and drowned the wild moaning of the wind.

The message of the evening was a call to work for our fellowmen—a summons to try to save the lost and to win others to Jesus Christ.

As Roaden listened he saw before him the picture of his friend Fred entering the public house, and he could not escape the thought that he must do something to save him from the ruin towards which he was hastening.

Why had he not invited him to the meeting that night? He felt uneasy. A sense of neglected duty lay as a burden upon his conscience, and, when the speaker appealed for all to rise who would undertake to speak to someone definitely on the morrow about their spiritual life, Roaden rose at once and made the promise.

On the following day he met his friend on the way to work and they walked together to the gates; but, somehow, all the way Roaden felt that he could not say what he intended. He was afraid of his friend—afraid he would be laughed at, or have questions put to him which he could not answer, and he was silent.

They separated at the gates, going to their respective places of labor, and Roaden worked that morning with the voice of conscience accusing him of cowardice and fear.

Dinner hour came and the two men met once more and sat together at their meal. Roaden watched his companion and thought he was ill at ease; some trouble seemed to be weighing heavily upon him. This was his opportunity to speak; but again it was as though a hand were laid upon his mouth—the hand of fear—and he could only speak of the work and the passing events of the day.

So the dinner hour passed and with it another opportunity.

They had not long resumed work when a great cry was raised, and Roaden, rushing to the spot, was just in time to see that a heavy crane had fallen on a group of workmen. With a terrific crash it had hurled itself to the ground killing some and injuring others who could not escape in time.

It was among those men that Fred Barrton worked, and as Roaden ran forward, he prayed that God would give him just one more chance of speaking to his friend, although all the time a voice was sounding in his ears, "Too late!"

It was not, however, too late, for his prayer was answered. Barrton had a miraculous escape and was only slightly injured. He was unable, however, to continue his work and was therefore conveyed to his home in a cab.

That evening, instead of going to the crowded mission hall, Roaden sat with his friend, taking a chair at the bedside and looking for an opportunity to speak of the deep things of life.

The sufferer awoke from a brief sleep and, seeing Roaden at his bedside, put out his hand and grasped the other by the hand and said, somewhat faintly:

"It's good of you to come, old fellow. What about your meeting at the hall?"

"How did you know I'd been there?" he asked.

"I knew it by the way you've been humming those tunes all day long."

"Why didn't you go, Fred?" said Roaden.

"Nobody asked me to," he replied. "And you know I'm not used to that sort of thing. The saloon's more in my line."

"Fred, why don't you make a new start in life and give up drink and all that sort of thing, and accept the Lord Jesus as your Saviour?"

The other looked at him silently for a moment and tears rose to his eyes as he answered:

"No one has ever asked me that before, mate. I've often worried myself about it, but I could not make head or tail of it, and no one seemed to care or to trouble about me; so I tried to forget it."

"Well, I've wanted to speak to you for a long time, Fred, but I kept putting it off because I didn't know just how you would take it."

"It's a wonder you're not too late!" said the sufferer. "When I saw that crane falling and knew I could not get out of the way I felt that my last chance had gone and, in less time than it takes to tell you, I wondered what lay before me and how I could face death and—and—you know what I mean."

"You wouldn't be afraid if you had taken Jesus Christ to be your Saviour, Fred."

"Tell me what it means," the other replied.

"Well, it just means that we have all sinned and it's only by accepting Christ as our Saviour that we can be pardoned."

"It sounds easy, but what becomes of all the wrong I've done? I tell you, mate, I've done some terrible things in my time and I don't know that I dare ask for them to be forgiven. I'd suffer for them if it would do any good, but to get rid of my sin for nothing seems too easy."

"That's just where the love of God comes in," said Roaden. "It is all without money and without price. He has borne the burden and paid the price and we are forgiven if we will accept Christ as our Saviour."

"I can't think of that, mate. I'll have to suffer for it yet, and to tell you the truth I'm afraid of what it means. I don't see that God is going to forgive so easily as that."

"Fred, if your little girl had disobeyed you, perhaps stolen something you valued, and had run away and broken your heart, and if she came back on such a night as this in the rain and the storm and stood crying at the door for you to let her in and asking you to forgive her, what do you think you would do?"

"Why I should just throw my arms around her—ah! I see it now!"

"Yes, Fred, that's just it. God loves us. We don't know how much; but God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on Him might not perish, but have everlasting life. That's all I've got to say about it, and if we forgive those we love, even when they break our hearts, God will forgive us if we come to Him and ask."

A wonderful light came into the face of the injured man as he said:

"Tom, you've made it so plain that I can see it all. I never knew before that God loved like that. Tom, I'll take it now. I'll take Him as my Saviour. I feel as if the burden had gone already, and when I get out again, I'll do my best to let others know about it. I believe there are hundreds who would do it, if only someone would tell them how."

When Fred Barrton was able to be at the works again, one thought seemed to rule his life. It was that God loved. He had never realized what it meant before, and it seemed so wonderful that he told everyone the secret that had changed his life.

Gradually a great change came over the men at the yards. One after another felt that God loved and cared for them. They gave up their swearing, and forgot the saloon, and into their hearts and lives and into their work there came a happiness they had never known before.

In this busy world there are thousands of men and women crushed by the burden of their daily toil, broken by misfortune, hardened by the cruelty of others, sinking deeper and deeper into sin, and all because they think that no one cares.

Though there be cruelty and unkindness among men there is always love in heaven. God loves, and we are all His children, even though we have gone far astray. He loves. He waits to pardon. It was for those who have wandered far from the truth that Jesus came to suffer and die. On the cross He bore the burden of our sins, and He has said: "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out."

The Things Needful

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

*I do not ask for power and place;
I ask for strength to bravely face
The daily test, and not give ear
To counselings of doubt and fear.*

*I ask for love that will not turn
From any human cry, nor spurn
The friendship of the humblest heart—
Thus would I know life's finest art!*

*I ask for faith that can not doubt
That God is good, though all about
My life's ambitions fall away.
These gifts, O Lord, give me to-day.*

A STUDY IN SMILES

By Philip Wendell Crannell

DISTINGUISHED philosopher in a very profound and systematic fashion has recently analyzed the subject of "Laughter," but people will continue to laugh or not to laugh just about as before. It may be that the writer's present effort to arrive at a classification of smiles may not cause two smiles to grow where only one grew before, but it is hoped that at least it will not lessen their number.

The analysis of the smile is even more important than that of the laugh. The laugh is more intense and vociferous, but the smile is more effective. Laughs may cheer, excite or exhilarate, but smiles win and mould. The laugh rarely goes as far as the smile. It stays with its maker, or upon the surface of the recipient. The smile penetrates.

How many different kinds of smiles there are! Some are involuntary and some voluntary; some are concerned only with the emotions of the one who smiles, and some find their end and aim and object in an effect to be produced on the person to whom the smile is directed. Smiles have all sorts of origins, all sorts of aims, and all sorts of flavors and spirits.

The smile of contempt or sarcasm is common enough, but it does not look well. It has been said that no child sneers. However that may be, we may well believe that no angel ever smiled sarcastically; that sort of smile is born of the pit; it has malevolence or sour self-aggrandizement in it. The smile of ridicule is assuredly not from heaven; for ridicule would give pain, and love assuredly never wants to do that.

Some smiles are purely caricatures; they are not smiles at all, but only look like them; they are mechanical or counterfeit smiles. When the sufferer from lockjaw is under the power of the resistless muscular contraction his face muscles draw his lips away from his teeth in that most fearful and pitiable of all grimaces, the risus sardonicus, or sardonic grin. We have often been misled by looking into a baby's face into thinking that the angels were whispering pleasant secrets into its ears, when in fact the source of the facial movement was quite otherwise, paregoric being indicated as needed in the case, rather than a celestial interpreter. The soul, as well as the body, has its risus sardonicus, which may mean the precise opposite of what it says.

When a mechanical or manufactured smile is overdone it is like the manufactured smile of poor Gymplaine in Victor Hugo's "The Man Who Laughs;" it is a grin. If unthinking, it is the grin mechanical, which let no one offer as a substitute for a smile, for having no depths nor heart it reaches none. If it embodies more of the involuntary, the excessive, or the distorted, it may be like Gymplaine's, the grin grotesque, which does not express, but misrepresents. If it is more voluntary and malevolent, it may be called the grin fiendish, as when one looks at a speaker, whom he would like to discomfit, or at least to flout, by the show of his countenance; but that is no proper expression for a human face. The grin is never, by any effort or by any chance, a genuine smile.

Automatic smiles are not unknown, nor are all of them wholly bad. Some of us would give, and ought to be willing to give, almost any price if, without any exercise of the will, whenever our faces settled into repose, there rested on them, not the broad smile of inanity sometimes seen which is cousin to "the loud laugh that speaks the vacant mind," but a smile underlying the surface like a solar light, which on even the slightest appropriate occasion bursts forth like the sun through a bright cloud. The automatism of mere mechanical habit, however, is no true congener of this kind of smile. Yet, even so, how much to be preferred is an automatic smile to an automatic frown!

Some really genuine smiles are very shallow. They are like the wrinkling of the surface of Tennyson's "little bitter pool upon the coast," soon stirred, soon stayed, and signifying little, while others spring from deep interior founts of cheer, good will and hope, which no outer air can freeze or chill. It is a variety of this sort that has been popularly called "the smile that won't come off," because, unlike beauty, it is not skin-deep, and is maintaining its own jovial or genial temperature by the power of abundant inward flame and fuel.

Between the smile assuring, so needed by our fellowmen, and the smile ingratiating, there is a clear cut difference, as to motive and sometimes as to method, but there is also a strong family affinity. The smile honestly assumed to win our way to others' hearts, or win them to our way, is entirely legitimate; in fact, it is highly praiseworthy, and its absence is really a sin. The mother whose small child had run a board out of the third-story window and was practising the "tight-rope act" on it, simply had to smile the youngster back into the house, or run the risk of startling it to destruction, but her smile redemptive would have lost its power if it had changed to tears or frowns or reproaches when she had got the child safely in. Parents whose children are in sober earnest "out of the ark," could learn the lesson that a denunciatory or a lachrymose mood offers no inducement to lure the vagrant feet into the door of hope.

There is a smile one greatly likes to see when it has a real basis of actual fact, and that is the smile assured. In times of stress we watch with eager eye some strong, balanced character to note what reflection the outer circumstances bring out upon his face (for curiously enough that kind of a reflection comes from within much more than from without). If in the howling of the storm the man on the steamer's bridge wears a smile we augur well either of the final promise of the weather, or of his sufficiency to meet the crisis. In the storms of life what untold strength we receive in that way. It would seem that our Master's deep seriousness in presence of the storm on Galilee must have been lighted up by this smile, assured and assuring, as He looked into His disciples' troubled eyes.

How beautiful it is when we are convinced that what beams out of those eyes, and plays around the mouth, is just pure, benevolent good will! Humor, hope and spiritual health we like, but how our hearts love to lean back on love! People who say Jesus never smiled have no imagination. Little children would never have come to Him if this were true. With the smile of love in His heart, how could Jesus keep it out of His face? And in the deep assurance of God's love and power, flowing out through Him, there was that which illumined, potentially at least, every human destiny with the glory of the eternal sunshine. He who knew how saddened is the heart under the shadow of sin could not have failed to flash into that darkness a beam from His own inner depths of light. This seeker after men whose supreme desire was to win some—would He fail to use that element of winsomeness, which is the best bait that can be used by the fisher of souls.

After spirit-filled Christian living, has the Christian worker any better asset than a loving smile? This straight shaft slays the black hosts of despair and suspicion, lights up the pathway of the darkened heart, draws the hungry soul with an appetite that cannot fail to respond, and under its genial ray triple barred gates of ice, or even of steel, are melted out of the way; its tonic doeth good like a medicine.

Only the smile must be genuine. It may be assumed, but the assumption must be simply a bringing of the outer appearance and expression into correspondence and conformity to the real climate of the soul. There must be some fact of heart power, or of divine purpose, or of inward longing and benevolence which makes the facial smile simply the outer surface of the soul-smile within. For as the glow in the stove must perforce reveal in zero weather whether it is anthracite or only a tallow candle behind red paper, so will this look on the human face. "Company smiles" find it difficult to endure the hard knocks of extremity, or even of daily life, but this "brick" is gold all through.

An unflinching faith in God, a child-like trust in His promises, a tenacious grip on the eternal facts of His love and grace and care, a sturdy optimism and faith in the possibilities of human nature, under God, and a deep love for humanity, engendered and maintained by the indwelling Christ, these are the roots, the great central fires, of that most heartening, most strengthening and most winning of all human expressions, the smile triumphant.

Comity

BY REV. A. MESSLER QUICK.

*Just a word of sweet surprise,
With a look from kindly eyes,
How it warms, and wins the soul!
Swift of pace to reach its goal,
Like the echo back it flies,
Wafting soft and sweet replies,
Just a word, with love aglow,
Deeper plows than mortals know.*

*Just a look, a beam of light,
Quickly puts distrust to flight,
Like the veil of gloom withdrawn,
By the rosy tints of dawn.
When the love-lit mirrored eye,
Beams its light where shadows lie,
Doubts and gloom soon speed their flight,
Just a look, a kindly light.*

*Just a smile of winning grace,
From a true, ingenuous face,
Is the richest, sweetest art
Life is able to impart.
By its soft bewitching tone,
Life is tempered like its own,
Always finds responsive place.*

*Just a tear at love's behest
For the sorrowing and distressed,
Like the dew's distilling art
Soothes and heals the troubled heart,
Trickles down to aching sores,
As the yearning soul implores;
Every tear with sweet design,
Has its source in Love Divine.*

The Panama Missionary Conference

The meetings of the Congress on Christian Work at Panama are in progress as this issue of the AMERICAN MESSENGER goes to press. The American Tract Society is represented in that gathering by its General Secretary, Rev. Judson Swift, D.D., and upon his return we shall secure an account of the proceedings of that important conference, which we hope to publish in the April issue of our paper.

This Congress on Christian Work in Latin America is one of the most epoch-making missionary assemblies ever held, and it is expected that as the result of its deliberations, evangelistic work in the hitherto "Neglected Continent" will be pushed with unprecedented vigor.

The Battle for Temperance

Public interest in the fight against the saloon now centers in the struggle that is taking place in New York State to enact the "Optional Prohibition Referendum Bill."

The object of this bill is to give the voters in every part of the State, whether dwelling in the city or the country, an opportunity to drive out the saloon. There are about ten millions of people in New York State. About two millions live in towns or townships where it is possible under the existing law to abolish the saloon, and under this law 485 out of 932 towns have voted entirely dry, thus giving an indication of what the people of the State as a whole would do with the liquor question, if they had a really fair chance. But the fact is that nearly eight millions of people, constituting almost four-fifths of the total population, are living in cities and under the existing legislation they cannot vote at all on the liquor question.

The Optional Prohibition Referendum Bill, which is being vigorously supported by the Anti-Saloon League, is designed to give the right of self-government on the liquor question to those now deprived of any option in this most vital matter.

It is claimed that there are only four States in the Union which have not passed any really advanced temperance legislation during the last ten years. These States are New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Nevada. It is to be hoped that the fight for the optional prohibition referendum bill may be crowned with success in New York, and that the other States named may enact similar legislation so that the saloon power which is so defiant in those sections of our land may be crushed. Temperance is destined to win in the battle that is now on, and the sooner the victory can be gained, the better will it be for the homes of our nation.

For the Welfare of the Children

There is a growing interest in the matter of protecting the children of our land from the evils of child labor. This was evidenced by the recent vote in Congress in favor of a bill designed to eliminate child labor so far as possible within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. Another evidence of this increased interest was shown in the proceedings of the twelfth annual conference on Child Labor which was held recently at Asheville, N. C., at which delegates were present from twenty States in the Union, and it is estimated that at least fifteen hundred people attended the meetings.

Another movement for the welfare of the children is shown in the designation of the first week in March as "Baby Week." Thousands of different communities have indicated their intention of observing this occasion, and all indications point to a nation-wide recognition of the claims of the little ones.

The Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor at Washington, D. C., is keenly alive to the importance of "Baby Week," and is issuing a series of valuable leaflets giving all possible information as to how to promote the welfare of the children in the days of infancy.

New Spanish and Portuguese Publications

In view of the pressing need for Christian literature in Latin America an earnest effort is being made by the American Tract Society to meet this exigency. As most of our readers know, the Society has been publishing evangelical literature in Spanish for many years, and the list of titles in the new catalog of its Spanish publications, which has just been issued, constitute the finest body of Christian literature in that language that can be procured anywhere in the world.

Excellent as is the material already on hand, the Society has realized the necessity of supplementing it by new publications suited to the immediate needs of the present day, and during the past few months it has issued four new books in the Spanish language, which have met with a very cordial reception.

El Mejor Camino (The Better Way) by Rev. Juan Orts Gonzalez, is a masterly treatise by a skilled theologian, who shows that the best way to find Christ and His Church is by means of the teachings of the evangelical faith and not by the medium of Romanism.

Compendio de la Historia del Antiguo Testamento (Syllabus of Old Testament History) is a translation by Miss Elise V. Lee, of the splendid volume written by Prof. Ira Maurice Price, Ph.D., LL.D., which has run through eight editions in its original form in English, and is now presented for the first time in Spanish.

Como Estudiar la Biblia (How to Study the Bible) is a translation into Spanish by Alfredo S. Rodriguez y Garcia of the suggestive treatise prepared by Dr. Richard A. Torrey, Dean of the Los Angeles Bible Institute, who is recognized as one of the ablest Bible scholars in the country.

Manual Normal (Teaching Manual) is the first volume in Spanish, so far as we know, which is devoted to the subject of "Teacher training." The book is made up of four parts, which deal respectively with the Bible, the Sunday School, the Teacher, and the Scholar. It has been prepared for the use of the teachers and pupils in Sunday Schools and for Bible Class students in colleges and universities. The authors of this volume are Messrs. D. A. Wilson, S. A. Neblett and A. L. Story. It has been approved by the National Sunday School Teachers' Association of Cuba.

Principios de Interpretação da Biblia (Principles of Biblical Interpretation) is a translation into Portuguese of the valuable work of Dr. E. P. Barrows. The translators are Rev. Dr. J. M. Kyle and Rev. Franklin do Nascimento, who have performed an inestimable service in putting Dr. Barrows' scholarly treatise within the reach of all Portuguese students of the Bible.

It is confidently hoped that these new publications in Spanish and Portuguese are but the precursors of a host of new books in those languages which shall minister to the spiritual needs of the people of Latin America. The American Tract Society looks to its friends and donors to render the largest possible support in the effort that it is making to bring the light of a pure Gospel into the lives of those who have been dwelling so long in the darkness of ignorance and superstition.

The Consecration of Strength

Psalm 29:1-11.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Feb. 28. Dedicated. Num. 6:1-5.
T. Feb. 29. Strength of youth. 1 Sam. 17:32-40.
W. Mar. 1. Strength for battle. 1 John 2:12-17.
T. Mar. 2. Full consecration. Rom. 12:1-3.
F. Mar. 3. Consecration of mind. Phil. 4:6-9.
S. Mar. 4. Strength to love. Mark 12:30.

This is the third time this year that the subject of consecration has come before us. We have considered the general question, "What is consecration?" We have also thought upon the "consecration of influence." The topic we are now to study comes with special force to young people, for youth is the time of strength.

A Religion of Strength

Christianity is a virile faith. The Psalm assigned for our study in connection with this topic presents Jehovah as mighty in strength. In the closing verse it is significantly stated, "Jehovah will give strength unto his people," and this constitutes a promise which all Christians may claim.

Elements of Strength

We may think of every human individual as possessing a body, a mind and a soul. To cultivate strength of body, mind and soul should be the aim of every man and woman, and to consecrate this triple strength to the service of God should be the purpose of every Christian.

Strength of body is a highly desirable asset in every human life. The Christian who has great physical strength will find manifold ways of devoting that strength to the service of the Master. The work of missions in both the home and the foreign field calls for strong physical endurance, and one way of using a splendid physique to the honor and glory of God is to devote oneself to the proclamation of the Gospel as a missionary of the Cross.

Strength of mind is a desirable quality. To be "strong-minded" is not always admirable, but to have strength of mind is a characteristic that may be wisely sought by every one. A strong mind, consecrated to the work of the Kingdom, may achieve great results. On the other hand, it is the weak-minded people who do incalculable harm to the cause of Christianity.

Strength of soul comes only by contact with the divine. There are many who are strong in body and vigorous in intellect, but they have no soul-strength, because they are not in touch with the Infinite. Yet there can be no well-rounded character without virility of soul.

Some Practical Hints

Strength must first be gained before it can be used. It is therefore a pertinent question to ask how we may secure strength of body, mind and soul.

We gain strength by exercise. Inaction tends to weakness, but activity brings vigor to all human powers. Athletic pursuits will result in a strong body; mental occupation will develop strength of mind, and the use of the divine means of grace will result in a soul imbued with power.

To know how to conserve our strength is perhaps as important as to know how to gain vigor. One way in which to increase our strength is by taking proper rest. Rest of body and mind is just as essential as is exercise, if we are to preserve unimpaired the strength which is our rightful possession.

We are not all endowed with the same measure of strength. But the essential thing for us to remember is that whatever our strength, it belongs unto God, and we are in honor bound to use all our powers of body, mind and soul for the advancement of His Kingdom and the upbuilding of His church. If we belong wholly to Christ, then may we say with the Apostle Paul, "When I am weak, then am I strong."

The Causes of Failure

Proverbs 10:1-32.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Mar. 6. Timidity. Ex. 3:10-14.
T. Mar. 7. Self-confidence. Josh. 7:1-5.
W. Mar. 8. Selfishness. Hag. 1:1-11.
T. Mar. 9. Materialism. Luke 16:1-13.
F. Mar. 10. Dishonesty. James 5:1-8.
S. Mar. 11. Drunkenness. 1 Kings 20:13-21.

The word failure is a relative word. To fail is not always a disgrace. Socrates failed to convince the Athenians of the truth of his teachings, and from one point of view his life might be called a failure; but in reality Socrates was one of the greatest men that antiquity ever produced. The kind of failure against which we are warned by our topic is that involving any moral delinquency.

Handicaps in Life.

There are some who have to struggle against heavy odds in the battle of life. Heredity and environment have much to do with shaping the course of every human destiny.

Yet it is not a sufficient excuse for failure even though the influence of both heredity and environment be unfavorable. No battle can be won without fighting, and the more unequal the odds, the greater the honor that belongs to the victor.

Some Causes for Moral Failure

The Bible Readings assigned in connection with this topic enumerate some of the prevailing causes for moral failure. Cowardice, self-confidence, selfishness, materialism, dishonesty and drunkenness—these are a few of the more common reasons for the moral shipwrecks that we see around us.

But this enumeration does not complete the list of causes for failure. Covetousness is a prolific source of failure. This vice has besmirched many a character, and has brought down in ruin and disgrace many a life. Many a trusted bank official has become an embezzler, because he coveted more than what rightfully belonged to him. Many a government official has become a robber of the people instead of their servant, because of the desire to appropriate that which was not his own.

Impatience is another frequent cause of failure. True success comes only as the result of long preparation, and the effort to grasp at great things without giving the preliminary effort that is needed to secure them properly must always result in disaster.

Indolence furnishes the explanation for a great many of the failures of life. Unremitting industry is the pre-requisite for lasting success. Work is the foundation stone for all true achievement, and the effort to succeed without giving the required amount of toil must needs result in a tottering structure that will inevitably collapse.

Remedies for Failure

It is important to avoid the known causes for failure. It is also desirable to know how the failures that we all make may be most satisfactorily remedied.

A sincere acknowledgment of wrongdoing is one of the first steps towards remedying a moral delinquency. Repentance for sin is one of the essential requirements for the divine pardon.

An earnest effort to make reparation is one of the surest ways to make good a past failure. Men who have failed in business have often redeemed their moral character by making full payment of their debts in after years, long after they had been freed from any legal obligation to make restitution.

From an earthly point of view the life of Jesus was a failure. But from the divine standpoint that life was the most sublime success that humanity has ever witnessed. The power of God will always redeem our lives from failure if we will entrust them to the care of our Heavenly Father.

Getting Power from Our Pledge

Psalm 25:1-14.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Mar. 13. Keeping covenant. Num. 30:1, 2.
T. Mar. 14. Israel's covenant. Ex. 34:28.
W. Mar. 15. Power through remembering. Num. 16:37-41.
T. Mar. 16. Power from devotion. Eph. 1:17-23.
F. Mar. 17. Power from service. 2 Tim. 2:1-15.
S. Mar. 18. Power from faithfulness. Luke 19:11-19.

It has been suggested that this be an Honorary Members' meeting. If this idea is carried out, some of the Honorary Members may be asked to give their experience as to how to secure power by means of the observance of the Christian Endeavor Pledge.

The Value of Pledges

The real value of any pledge lies in the added power which the keeping of that pledge confers. The intrinsic worth of any pledge lies not in the mere pledge itself but in the performance of the duties and obligations which that pledge requires. A pledge is a stimulus to the faithful execution of a promise which otherwise might be neglected or forgotten.

The Christian Endeavor Pledge

It has long been recognized that the Christian Endeavor Pledge is one of the best helps to the leading of a Christian life which any young man or woman can find. There is nothing in this pledge which any young Christian ought not to consider both a privilege and a duty, and it is an undeniable fact that the taking of the Christian Endeavor Pledge gives a stimulus to the Christian life of the average young person and imparts a power which otherwise would not be gained.

Power to Testify

The duty of taking part in every Christian Endeavor meeting which is enjoined in the pledge imparts to those who faithfully keep their pledge a power for giving Christian testimony that is most valuable. This age needs testimony of every kind to direct the minds and the hearts of people to Christ.

The word of spoken testimony, when backed up by a consistent Christian life, is a most valuable factor for the spread of the Kingdom. Those who have learned to testify for Christ in the Christian Endeavor meeting may be trusted to give expression to their loyalty at other times and on other occasions as the opportunity may occur.

Power to Serve

The Christian Endeavor Pledge furnishes a strong incentive for service. Those who promise to try to do whatever Christ would have them do are pledging themselves to render service of every kind, according to the necessity that may arise. Furthermore, there are some specific forms of service that are called for by the pledge which should result in making every Endeavorer a more faithful and efficient member of the Christian church.

Power to Persist

There is a great tendency to sporadic effort among Christian people. The making and the keeping of the Christian Endeavor Pledge tend to correct this tendency and to enable the young people to persist in their efforts for Christianity and the Church.

The secret of Christian achievement is found in patient continuance in well doing. The consciousness of having taken a pledge is a decided help to such patient continuance.

Fidelity to the pledge means victory at last. Someone has said, "Our pledge is a mountain to climb. If we fail at the first trial, the mountain is still there, and we try again."

The more faithfully we keep our pledge, the greater the power that we shall receive, and the more glorious will be our final triumph.

MARCH 26.

Great Home Missionaries

Luke 10:1-20.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Mar. 20. The man that said "No." Jonah 1:1-17.
T. Mar. 21. A shepherd-missionary. Amos 7:14-17.
W. Mar. 22. Philip. Acts. 8:26-40.
T. Mar. 23. Peter. Acts 10:9-20, 44-48.
F. Mar. 24. A nameless woman. John 4:27-42.
S. Mar. 25. Timothy. 1 Tim. 1:1-20.

When Jesus sent forth the seventy disciples to preach the coming of the Kingdom which He had come to establish, He was laying the foundation for home missionary work down through all the ages.

Every home missionary is a herald of Christ, and his business is to prepare the way for the Master.

Home missionary work is just as heroic as work in the foreign field. The annals of Christian home missions give us some illustrious examples of men and women who have hazarded their all for the sake of preaching the Gospel in their own home land.

Noble Home Missionaries

In his capital little book entitled, "The Endeavorer's Daily Companion," Prof. Amos R. Wells gives some striking instances of men who have rendered splendid service in the home mission field. He writes:

"William Duncan, a glorious home missionary, single-handed, civilized and Christianized the Metlakahla Indians of British Columbia, and built up with them a beautiful Christian community.

"Charles H. Cook, a consecrated city missionary in Chicago, was impressed with the feeling that he should go as a missionary to the wild tribe of Pima Indians in Arizona. He went without money, and in a marvelous way has won them to Christ, and made a civilized nation of them.

"Marcus Whitman, impressed with the great importance of Washington and Oregon, with splendid heroism led immigration thither, founded missions, and by a wonderful ride across the continent reached the city of Washington and persuaded the government not to surrender that vast territory to Great Britain.

"Joseph Ward, the great missionary to Dakota, founder of Yankton College, became the most influential man in the Territory.

"John M. Peck, a home missionary in Illinois in 1824, was a leader in the work of saving Illinois from slavery and preventing the adoption of that giant evil in the State constitution.

"The famous Iowa Band was a company of eleven consecrated young men who went together to that new territory, and labored faithfully all their lives to take it for Christ. Their arrival in Iowa in 1843 was the most notable home missionary event up to that time in the West.

"The Yale Dakota Band consisted of nine young men who went out to that Territory in 1880 and did valiant service."

The Standard of Greatness

Our topic speaks of "great" home missionaries, but it should be remembered that fame is not the true standard of real greatness. Many an obscure home missionary has rendered great service for the Kingdom, and in our thought we must not overlook the heroic wives of home missionaries—women whose names are seldom mentioned but the value of whose contribution towards the cause of home missions is beyond computation.

Our Little Folks

Marty-Jane's "Movies"

BY MINNIE L. UPTON.

"I DON'T it a shame, Dick, that Marty-Jane can't go with us this evening to see the 'movies'—all those lovely pictures of birds flying, and swimming, and everything, just as if we were looking at the real birds!"

"Course it's a shame, Dolly, and if 'twould help Marty-Jane's broken leg any I'd stay at home, even if 'movies' don't come to the Corners oftener than once in a long while."

"Oh, I know, Dick, Marty-Jane would feel dreadfully if we stayed at home. And, of course, the best thing we can do is to go, and come home with our minds so full of the pictures that we can make Marty-Jane just see them."

"That's the idea, Dolly!"

"You hurry with the chores, Dick, and I'll hurry with the supper dishes, so we'll have a little time to play dominoes with Marty-Jane before we start."

That is what Dick and Dolly did; and it was a very cheerful little nine-year-old sister who wayed to them from the window that evening as they drove off in Uncle Richard's big sleigh.

The "movie" birds were even more wonderful than Dick and Dolly had imagined them; and the man who showed the pictures loved birds so truly that they could have looked and listened for hours. He had carried his moving-picture machine to South America, the Arctic regions, and all parts of the world, just to take pictures of the little feathered creatures that he loved so well.

At last he said, "There is one more picture—the one I love best of all." All the people sat forward eagerly, expecting to see a more wonderful nest, or a longer tail, or a bigger beak, or more brilliant plumage than they had seen before. Then the picture flashed on the screen. And what do you think it was? You'd never guess. It was a snow-scene, with the big flakes falling, and the trees loaded with them, and the rail-fence almost covered, and an old farmhouse, with the snow drifted almost up to the window-sills, and before one window a stout post, capped with a wide firkin cover, and on the cover one, two, three—they kept coming, more than you could count—little birds such as Dick and Dolly had known all their lives—hopping, fluttering, eating—especially eating—oh, how they were eating! And at the window a sweet-faced little girl was flattening her small nose against the pane.

Everybody was still for a moment. Then the applause came. And such applause! Everybody realized, suddenly, that they had very dear little bird neighbors—just as charming and interesting as those in Europe, or Asia, or Africa.

Dolly nudged Dick. "Marty-Jane's 'movies,'" she whispered.

"Sure," nodded Dick. "And right away in the morning, too!"

Father thought it was a fine idea, and so did mother. So in the morning Marty-Jane was carried out into the dining-room and put in a big chair by father's big arms, and Dolly amused her while father and Dick worked like Trojans. It was snowing, but they didn't mind that. The ground was frozen too hard to dig a hole for the post; but they brought big stones from the garden wall after they had shoveled the snow all away right under Marty-Jane's window, and when they had heaped these about the post it stood as firmly as ever need be. The firkin-cover had already been nailed to the top, so they had only to "set the table" with the dainties that mother brought—corn, sunflower seed, squash seed, crumbs, and a big lump of suet nailed down so that it would not roll off when the guests pecked at it vigorously.

Two chickadees had been watching from the old birch by the garden gate, and father and Dick had hardly gotten into the house before down they came in great glee, calling "Chickadee! Chickadee-dee! Chickadee-dee-dee!"

Oh, but they were hungry, for the winter food supply in the woods and fields was running low, and most of what was left was covered by the snow. They had hardly settled on the table edge when "Whirr!" came a brisk little nuthatch. My! but he was glad to see those sunflower seeds!

When father brought Marty-Jane into the sitting-room it was almost time for Dick and Dolly to go to school; and she was thinking, "Oh, dear!" though she was bravely smiling. Then she caught sight of the bird table.

"Oh!" she breathed. Then she clapped her thin little hands and said it out loud, "Oh!" And Dolly hopped up and down and Dick shouted, "Marty-Jane's 'movies!' Marty-Jane's 'movies!'"

"HOW GOOD IT TASTES!"

Marty-Jane never tired of her "movies." And mother, too, had to stop in her work often to watch some new little "actor." Uncle Richard caught the enthusiasm; and the next time he went to the city he brought home a "Bird Book," with colored pictures of all the birds in their part of the country, and a little story about each one, telling which ones went South in the fall and when they came back North, which ones stayed to keep people cheered up all winter, and what kinds of nests they built, and when and where they built them, and what sort of eggs they laid in them, and what they liked to eat. Such an interesting little book! Uncle Richard gave it to Marty-Jane, but it seemed to be common property, and you never could tell which one you'd find reading it.

Late in the spring the post got shaky as the ground thawed. "We can't spare that," said father, "even if Marty-Jane is all well again." So he set the post deep and firm, and painted the cover green, and mother brought a wide shallow yellow bowl and set it in the middle. And every day it was filled with fresh water. And the winter guests, and a number of summer boarders, came there to take their bath, and a light lunch, all summer long. And so it goes, all the year round.

Pearl's Narcissus Bulbs

BY EDITH M. LARRABEE.

PEARL stood by the window gazing at her narcissus buds.

"It's too bad I couldn't have put all the bulbs in this dish," she declared for perhaps the fiftieth time since she had planted them. "They would have been so lovely all together."

She had saved her spending money in the fall and had bought the bulbs for the pretty bulb pan which Aunt Eleanor had given her on her birthday. It had troubled her from the first that the new dish held only four of the six large-sized bulbs, and that the other two must be placed in an old earthen flower pot. The plants had been brought from the cellar several weeks before and now they had buds nearly ready to open.

"They'll have yellow trumpets with white leaves around them," continued Pearl, who had studied the bulb catalogue carefully for the variety she wanted. "They'll be handsome anyway, but I'm sorry they couldn't all have been in this pretty pan."

She had made similar remarks every time that she watered her plants or whenever she looked at the eagerly of her dissatisfaction with the earthen flower pot. At least she would have beautiful blossoms and she had four bulbs in the pretty pan. The other little girl had only a buttercup in a cellar window.

Suddenly a new thought came to her. For a few moments she hesitated. Then she clasped the pot of precious bulbs in her arms and carried it into the other room.

"Here are some narcissus blossoms," she explained to the caller. "I want to give them to that little girl. You don't care, do you, mamma?"

Her mother looked up somewhat surprised.

"Certainly not, if you wish to," was her answer. "They are yours."

"This is very kind of you," the lady thanked Pearl. "I am sure the other little girl will appreciate them. How would you like to go with me to-morrow and carry them yourself?"

"Oh, that will be lovely!" Pearl exclaimed. Then she told the visitor about the earthen pot.

"I'm glad now there wasn't room in the bulb-dish for them all," she declared. "That must be why these bulbs were left out."

And when Pearl went the next day to visit the little girl who lived in a tenement she felt richly rewarded for the unselfish thought which had prompted her to share her pretty narcissus buds with one who was less fortunate than herself.

Queer Little Gypsies

We usually think of gypsies as bands of people who roam about from place to place rather aimlessly, staying as long as they can sell the things they make or tell fortunes, and moving when it is necessary to find more profitable places in which to stay.

What would you think if I were to tell you that there are birds that remind us very strongly of these very gypsies?

You know that when spring comes you look for certain birds such as black-birds, bluebirds, robins, etc., and they come at just about the same time each year. They also leave us at just about such a time in the late summer. There are, however, a few birds that we cannot depend upon at all. They seem to be notional, coming and going just when they see fit, and being very irregular.

The crossbills, linnets and pine grosbeaks are the gypsies that most attract us. They usually live in the far north where they find snow for a great part of the year either in the forests of spruce and pine, or still further north amid the beautiful white birches. They may come into our own northern states during any winter at some time during the season. Years ago it used to be said that if the Canadian crossbill or pine grosbeak came to make us a visit, it was a sure sign of a very cold winter.

Winning One

A North Dakota pastor told his Sunday-school boys of a church in Korea in which one condition of membership was that the applicant must first win at least one to Christ. A boy who listened to the story had already been accepted for church membership and was to be received the next Sabbath, but at the close of the meeting he went to his pastor and said that he was going to put that Korean spirit into operation and win someone else for the Christian life before entering the ranks of the church.

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

"Choose Your Partners"

By the Author of "Preston Papers"

CHOOSE your partners," cried the dancing master; and at these words Robert Elmer came smilingly toward Lucile Mitchell as she sat in the corner of the room in the dancing school which they both attended. Robert crooked his arm in the conventional way, but instead of accepting it, as had been her custom, Lucile moved a bit, to make room for Robert on the sofa beside her.

"Don't sit, Robert, if you really want to dance; but ask someone else. I'm not going to dance to-day," and she flushed slightly at his rising color, indicative in his case of rising temper.

"Not dance!" he exclaimed. "Why, what's the matter?"

"Nothing, Robert, except that yesterday was my birthday and I had a pretty serious letter from Uncle Barney, one that set me to thinking, and I've about made up my mind that I can spend my time and strength to some better purpose than in dancing."

"Do you mean it? Is that final?" he asked, somewhat icily.

"Yes, Robert," his manner giving added strength to her but half-formed resolution. "I love the exercise. To me it seems the very poetry of motion, and its effect on my nerves is extremely exhilarating. But I go home fagged from the lessons, and I have no right to do this."

"Then good-bye, Miss Prim. I've no further use for you. I'll find someone more to my taste, who will at least dance to please me," he replied, briefly.

Lucile was both surprised and hurt; surprised, because she had never seen this side of Robert's nature, and did not even dream of its existence; hurt, because he had deferred to her wishes for so long that a deviation from it was a "cut" from which she could not readily recover.

However, consoling herself with the thought: "It's better to know the worst side of him before it's too late to mend matters," Lucile watched the one set danced almost to a finish, then rose, a bit drearily, it must be confessed, and started for home. Now, more than she had dreamed, she missed Robert's manly attentions, so long given that they had unconsciously become a part of her every afternoon, or evening, or both.

He had been her regular escort for months, although she had not fully realized it until now; and, deciding not to call a taxi, as he had been accustomed to—opening the door for her, helping her in and out, showing all those little courtesies that are so dear to the feminine heart—she concluded to walk the short distance.

"How odd it seems! Almost like being a widow"; and her usually elastic step was less buoyant than usual.

"Hello, Lutie! Where's Bob?" was the greeting that fell upon her ears, and which jarred just a little, even though the salutation came from her favorite, but older, brother, Ernest.

"I suppose he's still at dancing school, but as I am not there myself I cannot state this as an absolute fact," she replied, a shade wearily, but with so obvious an attempt at hilarity that Ernest did not press her for the truth, but instead helped her up the long flight of steps that led into the front hall of their beautiful Riverside home, opened the door with his latch key, helped her divest herself of her wraps and drew her into his "den," off the library, and seated himself close, oh, how close and "brotherly," on the sofa beside her. She felt and appreciated his tender sympathy, but was not quite ready for words yet, so asked: "Won't you read 'Locksley Hall' to me, again?"

And then he knew and read; then, saying quietly: "I, too, have had my lesson; but, mayhap, it's been easier for me, because Elizabeth 'proved-up' when tested. She seems, now, like an ideal wife-to-be. Coming out from the dancing lesson last evening I asked her how much of a sacrifice it would be to 'cut' it all and lead a sufficiently simple life to give time for study of great questions and for some work for the general good. To my surprise, she said: 'Not one bit of sacrifice. I miss the Sunday School and church work that I used to do more than I can ever miss these conventional events and duties, and I would like to drop everything that interferes, not the dancing alone, but all similar things; and she promised, too, to be my wife.'"

"And I will be your Old Maid sister," half laughed and half sobbed Lucile, smiling through misty eyes, as the rainbow smiles after a storm.

"Not necessarily, Lutie. The good men, with domestic tastes, are not all dead yet," striking a pose and pointing to himself; "and it is just as easy to be attractive to them as to men of lighter weight. Besides, you are so young that your taste, as well as your entire character, may change for the better, and the man of your future vision may have to be of a much higher type and of broader standard."

And this proved to be a fact; for, with the knowledge that affection might be held in leash in its incipient stage, however difficult later, Lucile studied character in the young men of her set more closely than she had ever done before, and it was almost five years before she even allowed herself to become specially interested in any of them, and then it was a young business man of sterling qualities, but without money beyond his own ability to earn and increase it. But the marriage was happy, "Each for the other, and both for God," not only being the inscription inside her wedding ring, but the sentiment written into their very lives.

As the letter from Uncle Barney, that started Lucile's train of thought and Ernest's prompt action, may be as helpfully suggestive to others as it was to these two orphaned "children of the rich," I will quote some of its salient points.

"I note that you are enjoying the dancing lessons, which is quite natural to healthy youth; but, Lucile, dearest, beware the effects on mind and body. Does the exercise leave a 'clean taste' in your mouth? Is any part of it suggestive of evil, or is it purely a pleasing form of exercise? Does its practice inspire to good work or works? Or does it lessen your taste for things of common daily need, and for study of the higher life and better things?"

"Right here, too, Girlie, only daughter of my dear dead sister, I want to say just a few other things, which may or may not be timely, but which you will know come from the depths of your old uncle's heart and from a long and full experience.

"First of these concerns your future and your future partner—if you choose one. You may think, Lucile, that you have no choice in the matter; that 'Love goes where it is sent.' But in choosing your associates, you to a certain point do choose a possible future mate—one who may make or mar your entire future. So be careful in scanning the character of those with whom you are brought into contact, whether through social conventions, public work, or however.

"Again; while in no way negligent of the demands of the heart, be mindful, too, that the head has an equal right to be heard in all questions that relate to future happiness or possible misery; and 'Use your judgment,' as my good old father used to say—that being the purpose for which judgment is given to us.

"And bear in mind that it is easy to keep the emotions of the heart within guidance of the will at the outset; but that their control, even but a short time later, may be very difficult. It is easy to let affection run out, but hard to reel it in; so keep it wound up on its own spool until you are sure beyond a 'peradventure' that you want to say 'Yes, and thank you, sir'—if given the opportunity.

"Having found that 'possible He,' don't 'stick' on non-essentials, nor demand perfection—unless you can also offer it. Only a perfect man or woman should expect perfection in another here. Heaven is the home for all such. "Finally; remember that each must yield something of personality, some habits, some preferences. Neither should do it all; for that is equally harmful for each; and neither should ever yield a principle of Right. In this way 'Choose your partners'—and be 'happy ever after.'"

Joy in the Morning

BY PHILIP STAFFORD MOXOM, D.D.

A preacher friend of mine was asked one time why he preached. He replied: "To make people willing to live another week."

His parish was in the poorer part of a manufacturing city, and he was surrounded by people to whom life showed its seamy side. He rightly interpreted and fulfilled his office. His brave, strong words cheered many a drooping spirit, and roused to new endeavor men and women who were sinking under the burden of labor and care and unsatisfied desire.

In Pandora's Box, whence countless ills had escaped to plague mankind, Hope remained. All was not lost if the world still possessed hope. The old myth is full of meaning. It is the expectation of "joy in the morning" that makes our nights of sorrow and pain endurable.

It is the peculiar mission of the gospel to inspire hope, because the gospel is the revelation and pledge of God's good purpose toward humanity. This truth has often been obscured by narrow interpretations and faint-heartedness, but it is the great, sweet, divine truth which Jesus Christ embodied, and which the true preacher must perpetually utter so that weary, heavy-laden and discouraged men and women may have courage and strength "to live another week"—to fight another battle, to bear another load, to endure another grief.

But hope is not alone for the sad and despondent; it is also for the aspiring—for those who strive to do tasks worth doing, and make plans that reach far into the future, and who for the sake of these ends are willing to spend themselves without stint. The "morning joy" is the fruition of their dream and endeavor, and it is hope that keeps their purpose steady and tenacious.

It was said of Jesus that, "for the joy that was set before Him, He endured the cross, despising the shame." In this He is not singular, save in the heaviness of His cross and in the breadth and depth of the joy that He coveted—a joy that was to be His own, because it was to be also the possession of all whom He loved. How true to life and fact is this note of comment on the life of the Master! Of every brave and potent soul it is true that for the joy set before him he endures the cross.

We have a right to hope. Why? Because labor is meant to have result, aspiration is meant to have fulfilment, and patient endurance is meant to have reward. This is God's evident purpose. We have a right to hope also because evil and pain and weariness and disappointment are not finalities; they are not ends, but incidents and means. Nothing has a guaranty of perpetuity but that which is good. The good is the only really lasting thing, because that has in itself a divine reason of being.

But, more than this, we have a duty to hope. We often make false moral distinctions. We say: One must do right, and, One may hope. No; there is an obligation to hope if we believe in God. For, after all, hope springs out of trust. Faith in God is the basis of rational and enduring optimism.

However black and bitter our night, we must believe in the morning joy. It will come though it seem long delayed. There is no loss in God's wide and far-reaching economy. One of the last words that Jesus spoke to His disciples before His death was: "Believe in God, and believe in Me." It is as if he said: Sorrow will come; it is near at hand; but believe and hope; with the morning joy will come.

This is not mere pitiful and pious exhortation; it is the soundest and deepest philosophy of life. We are not born to be forever fooled by shadows. Life is itself a pledge of progress and attainment. The darkness is the germinating time of the seeds of joy. "Light is sown for the righteous," but sowing is a sort of burying. The grave of a seed is the matrix of a new and larger life.

Hope on, weary soul; toil is not in vain. Hope on, sorrowing one; grief is fleeting. Hope on, aspiring one; the dream foreshadows the divine and imperishable fact.

How often the morning brings to us, not merely a new lease of life, but new life itself. We sink down on a troubled pillow with dark cares brooding over us and with vague fears, magnifying dangers and ills; but at last sleep comes with its blessed unconsciousness, and then morning with its new vision, and gladness dawns with the rising sun. This experience is a parable of life. The night of sorrow will pass, though it be dark and long. The night of ignorance with its tormenting alarm will vanish. Even the night of sin with its misery and shame will depart; and, with the morning, joy will flood our souls with the sweet, new meanings of God-given triumphant life.

Temper in Control

BY REV. FRANK B. M'ALLISTER.

The steam that is let off never runs anything. It is steam repressed and controlled that speeds our trains and our ships. And so it is with temper. While some relief may be afforded to over-charged nerves by an occasional explosion the energy expended in anger is largely wasted.

There is an old Latin maxim to the effect that "anger is a brief madness." Surely the truth is as patent to-day as in olden times that a man who loses his temper loses himself. It is well to have a temper, but if one fails to keep it, we can only say that he is not in full possession of his faculties. One function of his personality has slipped from his control.

Habitual "sputtering" means weakness, while righteous indignation steadily directed to worthy ends means strength. Power in control is desirable in morals as well as in athletics. Says "Smokey Joe" Wood, crack pitcher: "The only secret I know anything about is that of control. It makes or unmakes every pitcher. I know many a pitcher who has more speed than I have, and of course, plenty of them have curves. But they are unable to make the ball break and pass the batter where they want it to."

A temper controlled and directed to worthy ends is a great possession. "Be ye angry and sin not," says the Scripture. One can be angry in a constructive helpful way. He may set his face against wrongs still allowed under the permits. To turn one's wrath steadily against these things is to play a noble part. The man of patience and of righteous purpose accomplishes something worth while when he gets angry. Every ounce of his energy is gathered and directed toward a good result. It is the moral steam controlled and made to hit a definite piston that sends this old world upward and onward.

IN THE MISSION FIELDS

In Old Umtali Land

A striking scene is presented to us in the picture that appears on this page. It not only illustrates the native method of preparing one of the staple articles of food, but it also shows us the style of dress and the kind of houses that are found among the people of Old Umtali Land.

Old Umtali Land is in Rhodesia. Rhodesia is a part of British Africa, of which Mr. W. T. Stead once wrote: "British Africa is the product of three forces—British conquest, British trade and British missions. And of the three forces the first counts for the least, and the last for the greatest factor in the expansion of Britain in Africa. British missionaries have been everywhere the pioneers of empire. The British frontier has advanced on the stepping-stones of missionary graves. Deduct the missionaries from the sum total of the forces which have colored the African map red from Table Mountain to the Zambezi, and the empire disappears. It was David Moffat, the missionary, who led the way into Central Africa from the South. It was his dauntless son-in-law, the missionary Livingstone, who pierced the heart of the Dark Continent in which he laid down his life; it was Moffat's successor, the missionary Mackenzie, who secured the open road from the Cape to the Zambezi along which Cecil Rhodes subsequently marched to empire."

The field in which Old Umtali is located is occupied by the East Central Africa Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States. Strenuous efforts are being made to civilize, educate and uplift the natives. The value of the printed page is not overlooked, and the Mission maintains a Press, which is aided in its work by an annual cash appropriation from the American Tract Society of New York.

A Strange Present

When a sorceress in Korea accepted an invitation to go to the Chai Ryung hospital for treatment of a serious illness she took to Mrs. A. A. Pieters a remarkable present, we are told. Determined to become a Christian, she packed up all the "tools" of her sorcery, though they filled an oxcart, and delivered them to the woman she had to come to trust. The gift included fans, cymbals, swords, bells, hats, dozens of garments, ancient Buddhistic and Shamanistic pictures and a huge drum.

A Missionary's Invented Language

"Gilbertese," the written language of the Gilbert Islands, is the work of one man, Dr. Hiram Bingham, who died some years ago after having devoted the greater part of his life to missionary work in those islands. When Dr. Bingham went out to the Gilbert group, many years ago, he soon found out that one of the chief difficulties before him in his mission was the fact that the islanders had no written language. Accordingly this ingenious missionary set about to supply the deficiency and to build a language, being obliged to collect his own vocabulary and construct his own grammar.

The good doctor experienced much difficulty in finding a Gilbertese equivalent for "prayer," a circumstance that led him into a ludicrous mistake. The word he did use meant "to practice incantations," a meaning precisely the opposite of what the missionary meant to convey. He had the New Testament about three-quarters translated when, by reason of ill health, he was compelled to return to this country. Ten years later, however, when he had gone back to the Gilbert Islands, he undertook the great task of translating the Old Testament into the new language. At that time he was quite advanced in years, and the work involved a direct translation from the Hebrew, with which the doctor was not very familiar. In 1890 he was enabled to read the proof of the last chapter of the last book of the Bible as done into Gilbertese.

Even this laborious task did not end the missionary's labors. He started to write a Gilbertese dictionary. When it was ready for publication a messenger to whom the work was intrusted for delivery to the printer lost the manuscript and the work had to be done all over again.

Whole-Hearted Devotion

Dr. W. R. Funk, writing on Sierra Leone for the United Brethren mission study course, states that the African people do not give a half-hearted assent to their religious beliefs, and gives as an illustration the following personal experience he had with an eighteen-year-old boy:

"One evening, after the service in the church at Freetown, during the conference, this boy came to me when I was out in the street, and said, 'Please, sir, may I walk at your side when you are alone?' For beauty of expression, this is hard to excel. I answered that I could not see him alone then, as there were many people about us, but that I could see him at the mission house the next day. He glided away in the darkness, and was prompt in coming the next day, and when I asked him what he wanted to say to me, he answered, 'I came to ask you how I can be a perfect Christian.' What a question! The deepest that the human mind can ask. After an hour of talk with him, he said, 'But you have changed me.' I told him I did not understand. 'Oh,' said he, 'you see when Doctor and Mrs. King put me in school I signed a contract that when I graduated I would spend seven years in missionary work, and now I want to change it.' I said, 'Do you want to break your contract?' 'Oh, no, but,' said the boy, 'I want to change it to read, instead of seven years, for life.'"

The Conversion of a Brahman

The British and Foreign Bible Society cites the following as an illustration of the strange power that the parable of the Prodigal Son exerts upon unregenerate hearts:

"Thirty years ago a Hindu schoolmaster gave a farthing copy of St. Luke in Hindi to a Brahman priest, who was in charge of a temple in the Central Provinces. The priest read the book with great interest until he reached the parable of the Prodigal Son. But the killing of the fatted calf aroused his anger—for in the eyes of a Hindu the cow is a sacred animal—and the book was cast aside. Later, he took up the Gospel again, and having carefully torn out the page telling about the fatted calf, he read it to the end. A Scottish missionary subsequently opened up work in that district, and, needing a 'munchi' (i. e., a teacher of language), engaged this priest for the purpose. They read the Bible together, and the truth entered the heart of the priest—with the result that he was baptized, in spite of the bitter opposition of his relatives and friends. The whole village rose in an uproar, and the new convert had to flee for his life. After a while he returned, and was eventually ordained pastor of the Christian church in the same village. Soon after his conversion he married a Christian girl, and he has a family of five grown-up sons and daughters, all of whom are now engaged in mission work."

A Hospital for Porto Rico

A hospital in Humacao, Porto Rico, is in process of erection by the American Missionary Association. It is an enterprise of great interest and promise. Disease is more prevalent in a tropical country like Porto Rico, as is well known, than in our temperate zone. Poverty during the old Spanish days was very common and exceedingly bitter. "Beggars' Day," on which hosts of sick and smitten people—men, women and children—gather on the corners of the streets, was a stated institution. Under American administration leper colonies have been organized and they and other diseased people have been segregated. This contributes, of course, to decreasing disease, but the conditions are still painful. The American Missionary Association is erecting a hospital which will be of great value, especially in the eastern part of the island.

A Wonderful Opportunity in Burma

Thirteen thousand converts have been baptized on the Kengtung field in the extreme east of Burma. About 4,500 of them are on the Chinese side of the line. With the exception of eight churches near the border, these converts have not been organized. When the first ingathering took place on this field eleven years ago, within a month groups came from across the China border, both of the Wa and Lahu tribes, begging the missionaries to come to them at once with the gospel. This same appeal has been sounding ever since. Native workers who have toured the section regularly report many villages where the entire population has expressed a desire to be baptized. In one of these, Ho Hko, whose 130 families all desire baptism, the teachers stayed a few days, and eighteen villages from the surrounding country sent in representatives saying their entire villages desired baptism at once. Rev. W. M. Young, in writing of this situation, says: "If we open this work on a proper basis and give them the gospel I have no doubt we will soon have more converts on this field to the north than we have in all Burma to-day."

Russians in America

New York City has 80,000; Scranton and vicinity, 46,000; Pittsburgh, 40,000; Newark, N. J., 25,000; Chicago, 30,000; Philadelphia, 13,000; Boston, about 5,000; Milwaukee, 5,000. There are probably about 50,000 more in various other centers. In both South and North Dakota and in California a considerable number of Russians are to be found in permanent settlements. This is one of the greatest missionary opportunities confronting the Church. If these Russians are left to themselves their Christian experience is likely to be arrested and a type of faith developed which cannot be assimilated into the American ideals.

A New Departure in Dressmaking

By Hilda Richmond

"M Y, but that's pretty!" said Mrs. Dorsey, striving to banish the heavy frown from her daughter's face. "I'll be the finest lady at the party, sure enough. I do think, Elizabeth, that you have the knack of doing things better than anyone I ever saw. And this lovely, rich material, I declare it almost makes me feel vain! I have such fine clothes and the best daughter in the world, so it's hard to be properly humble."

But Elizabeth did not smile. She gave a little twitch to the exquisite material and sighed deeply. "If we have to wear made-overs all the days of our lives," she said, somewhat impatiently, "I wish the original owners would take a little more care of the things. I could have made the prettiest little overdress of the lace that went with this gown, but Aunt Margaret had evidently come in contact with a nail or hook, for it was torn to tatters in two places and there was not enough."

"It couldn't be any prettier," said Mrs. Dorsey, smiling at the stylish looking lady in the mirror. "My dear, you ought to be proud of your ability."

"I am, mother, but just the same I'd like to put my scissors into brand new material some day. You know I dream of being a city dressmaker some day and there really isn't any inspiration in sponging and ripping and turning and contriving with old goods."

"But we couldn't afford such materials as these in new goods, dear."

"O well, as to that," said her daughter, ungraciously, "I'd love to have a pretty simple gingham or a cheap lawn some day. I know I could have them," she added hastily, "but this everlasting making over takes too much of my time. There comes Mrs. Young to tell me they've chosen me to take charge of the Mission Sewing School. People seem to think I have nothing to do. Maybe I'm selfish, but I'd like to have a little time to myself occasionally. I must say that the neighbors haven't been quite so bothersome lately as they used to be. They used to come running in here at all hours to get me to help contrive a ten-yard dress out of four yards and a half of material or some other impossible thing, but lately—How do you do, Mrs. Young? Walk right in! I'm fitting a dress for mother."

"How perfectly lovely!" panted the guest, dropping into a chair. "Is it for the party? Mrs. Dorsey, you are always the best dressed woman at every gathering in this town, but this time you'll outshine even yourself. My sister-in-law was showing me a dress when I was in the city last week that she gave a woman twenty-five dollars to make, but it wasn't half so stylish as this. Do you really look at the things in the magazines, Elizabeth, and then reproduce them?"

"I have to," said Elizabeth, bitterly. "I never have time to go any place to see new things. If I could be in the city once in a while, maybe it wouldn't be so hard to reproduce things. Seeing a gown and seeing a picture of it are two different things."

Mrs. Dorsey slipped out of the dress and ran down to see that the bread was not burning and the guest plunged into the business in hand at once. "We've decided to hire a teacher from the city for the Mission Sewing School. Elizabeth," she announced without preamble. "You have?" cried Elizabeth, unable to keep the amazement out of her voice.

"Why, I—that is—"

"Your name was the first mentioned," said Mrs. Young, who prided herself on her ability to speak right out, "and some of the ladies thought we'd best take you because then we wouldn't have to pay a salary, but finally they voted for a pay teacher from the city. You see, Elizabeth, we want somebody who is cheerful and happy and who will make the best of things. Without that kind of a person the whole thing would be a failure. You can't be beat at sewing, everyone will say that, but you say such bitter, pessimistic things. It's been hard enough, goodness knows, to persuade the factory girls to come to the night school at all, and I don't half believe any number of them will ever get to the meetings, but we must have a cheerful teacher."

Elizabeth bent over her sewing to hide the tears of anger in her eyes. "I was in favor of taking you in spite of that, for we can hardly afford to pay a girl from the city fifty dollars a month, but the rest outvoted me. Of course, I believe that the majority ought to rule, and I'll keep up my end of the expense somehow, but that fifty dollars would do a lot of good in other ways. Our society isn't so rich that we can afford to throw away that much each month. None of the rest would come and tell you, but I believe in speaking right out, and I said it was all on my way home so I'd drop in and tell you."

By this time Elizabeth was getting control of her tongue once more. "It's certainly very considerate of the ladies," she said, bitterly. "I didn't want the place and I'm glad I didn't get it, but it isn't very pleasant to be picked to pieces by a pack of women I've helped out of hundreds of difficulties with their sewing."

"That's just where they learned to know you so well, Elizabeth," explained the guest. "They said you were never thankful for the pretty things your aunt and cousins sent, and they were afraid you might sour the factory girls. Well, I must be going. Tell your mother goodbye for me."

The bread took more time than Mrs. Dorsey had expected and when she came back she was disappointed not to find Mrs. Young. "I wanted to hear about the meeting," she said. "I could not go this afternoon, but I depended upon Mrs. Young to tell me all about it. When do you have to begin the night school?"

"Never!"

"Didn't they start it? O, I'm so disappointed! You could help those factory girls so much."

"Yes, they are going to start it, but they will hire a teacher from the city. Mrs. Young said they decided I was too cranky, soured, pessimistic, grouchy and altogether unfit for the place. Even the fact that they expected me to work for nothing did not weigh sufficiently to induce them to have me. There! That's what people think of your wonderful daughter!"

"But you said you didn't want the place," said Mrs. Dorsey, weakly.

"I didn't, but they might have been decent about it."

Mrs. Dorsey was silent. There seemed to be nothing to say. "Mother, is it true?" burst out Elizabeth, suddenly. "Am I soured and fault-finding and ungrateful and—"

"My dear, don't you think you are a trifle discontented?" interrupted Mrs. Dorsey. "I know you have a great many things to vex you, but so does everyone. For example, these materials from Aunt Margaret and the girls. You think it is a great misfortune to have them, but ever since your father has been ill they have helped us wonderfully."

"But I don't like to accept charity. If I could go away to the city I could make enough to keep us all, only father won't hear of it. Here we merely exist and if I had a salary we could live."

Mrs. Dorsey had heard those statements over and over, so she did not try to argue. She merely changed the subject and asked Elizabeth to put aside her sewing and walk down to Mrs. Kent's at the edge of the town for two dozen fresh eggs, thinking the fresh air would put her into a better frame of mind. "The dear child sews too steadily and it gets on her nerves," said the loving mother, as she tidied up the sewing room a little. "I must contrive to get her out into the fresh air more."

For years Mr. Dorsey had been somewhat of an invalid and his ability to earn money had been sadly impaired, but the fact that they lived in a big, overgrown village where living was not very expensive enabled them to keep comfortable and out of debt, while Aunt Margaret Frisbie, Mrs. Dorsey's rich relative, kept them well supplied with beautiful and expensive clothes. Their friends really envied them sometimes as they appeared exquisitely clad at every village affair, thanks to Elizabeth's skill with her needle, and Mrs. Dorsey and the others were truly thankful for this piece of real good fortune, but Elizabeth rebelled with might and main even while she turned out the dainty and attractive clothes. She longed for a career and an establishment in a great city with elegant conveyances drawn up before her door and fine ladies going and coming to see her new creations. As it was, the only people coming and going were the kindly neighbors, who ran in with their making-over problems for help and paid her back in hot rolls when they baked or quinces from the bushes in the back yard or a big bouquet and the oft-repeated statement: "Elizabeth will make a good wife for somebody, and the young man who gets her will be fortunate." The only equipage ever seen before the door was Old Fan and the weather-beaten surrey coming to bring Mrs. Lake and her elaborate caps for Elizabeth to make artistic lavender bows to hide the bunchy sewing and lack of skill in the making.

The day after Mrs. Young had called and made her frank speech Elizabeth determined to watch her speech and see if the neighbors really were correct in their judgment. She was shocked to find that more than twenty-five times that first morning harsh, sarcastic or bitter words rose to her lips, and it was with difficulty that she kept them back. It frightened her, for she did not want to be disliked by young or old, and she resolutely set herself to conquer the habit. Elizabeth was only nineteen years of age and she supposed that it was an easy thing to do to conquer a habit which she felt sure she must have acquired lately, so it was not long before she dismissed the subject from her mind and plunged into the deep study necessary to evolve a school frock for tall Katherine from the remains of a severely plain tailored suit which short Helen Frisbie had grown tired of and had packed off with the last shipment of clothes.

"I—I beg your pardon," said a strange voice, as Elizabeth opened the door one dark evening and peered into the darkness. "Could you help me a little? I'm the new sewing teacher at the Mission Sewing School and I'm in trouble. I never dreamed the work was as hard as it is. The ladies wrote that they wanted a sewing teacher and I jumped at the chance. You see my mother has been ill and the doctor said she must get away from the noise of the city, so I thought out here I'd have a chance to take care of her. I must succeed."

"Come in," said Elizabeth, recovering her wits. "What is the trouble?"

"They want things made over," said the girl, wiping away a few tears. "I never dreamed it was that kind of work. I thought it was plain hemming and patching and such things when they said it was a class of beginners. Folks have told me you know all about making over, so I wondered if you'd help me. No, I can't sit down. Mother's all alone. You know we live in the

DAME NATURE HINTS When the Food Is Not Suited.

When Nature gives her signal that something is wrong it is apt to be with the food. The old Dame is always faithful and one should act at once.

To put off the change is to risk that which may be irreparable. An Arizona man says:

"For years I could not safely eat any breakfast. I tried various kinds of breakfast food, but they were all soft, starchy messes which gave me distressing headaches. I drank strong coffee, too, which appeared to benefit me at the time, but added to the headaches afterward.

"A friend persuaded me to quit coffee and the starchy breakfast foods, and use Postum and Grape-Nuts instead. I shall never regret taking his advice.

"The change it worked in me is wonderful. I now have no more of the distressing sensations in my stomach after eating, and I don't have headaches. I have gained 12 pounds in weight and feel better in every way.

"Grape-Nuts makes a delicious as well as a nutritious dish; and I find that Postum agrees perfectly—never produces dyspepsia symptoms."

A New Departure in Dress-making

rooms back of the hall where the school is held. I thought maybe you'd be willing to come down a little while to-morrow and show me something about making over."

For an instant Elizabeth had it on her tongue to refuse, but the light fell on such a shabby, dejected little figure that she had not the heart to refuse. "I'll go down with you to-night," she said. "My brother Jack is going to a school entertainment and he can stop for me on his way home. Wait till I get my wraps."

So that evening Elizabeth sat quietly in the back room and quickly cut and basted a half-dozen garments for the teacher to demonstrate to the class. The trimmings were skilfully arranged to eke out the materials and the goods turned and contrived to bring out every advantage.

"They actually warmed up and thawed out!" cried the scared little teacher when the session was over. "I believe they think I know something now. One of the girls basted up a waist and when it was tried on she said that it looked almost as good as if Elizabeth Dorsey had cut it. Thank you, ever and ever so much!"

That night when Elizabeth reached home she threw herself before the cheery fire in a comfortable chair and said cheerily, "Another job of making over, mother! That poor little teacher has never had a bit of experience except with unlimited supplies of pieces for patch work and remnants for doll clothes and the easiest kind of beginners' sewing. Her mother is ill and they are both discouraged. I think I'll have my hands full for a few weeks getting her started. There were only ten girls there this evening, and if more do not come the Dorcas Society will discontinue the school. That's what worries that little Helen Turner."

But with a few common sense directions and the fact that Elizabeth sat in the back room nightly to help and encourage her, Helen Turner lost the scared expression and actually began to feel that she could hold on. Each night a few more girls dropped in with new or old materials, and each night saw better and better work done. Elizabeth fairly longed to rush out and take charge of things herself, but that was out of the question, so she had to sit behind the scenes and cut and baste as if her fingers had wings and make no noise doing it all.

Of course, Helen soon heard of Elizabeth's ambitions, even to the desire to see a smart carriage before her door in the city or a stylish automobile, and for a wonder she did not tell Elizabeth that she was better off in the village, even though she knew that was true. She only smiled a wise little smile and slipped down to the post-office to buy an unusual number of stamps that very day, without saying a word to anyone but her mother as to why she had so many letters to mail.

A week later Elizabeth was on her knees fitting a delicate party frock to her little sister Mary's wriggling form when her mother ushered two strange ladies into the sewing room. Mary's ecstatic wriggling about and her little exclamations of delight over the pretty dress took up so much of Elizabeth's attention that she did not at first notice the strangers. As she rose stiffly from her knees she knew instinctively that they were city ladies.

"We came to see about getting you to make some clothes for us," said the younger lady. "My mother wants a black silk and I need a morning frock. Is this a sample of your work?" She touched the filmy dress on the now silent girl with appreciative fingers. "Child, you are a genius!"

Elizabeth could hardly wait to ask how they found out that she could sew, but the ladies only said quietly that a friend had told them. They seemed more anxious to talk over the dresses to be made than to tell how they found the dressmaker, and when they left each had given an order for two dresses.

Long after Elizabeth had established a very pleasant and lucrative dressmaking establishment in the big, old sewing room where she had spent so much time wishing she could go to the city, she still wondered exactly how it all came about.

"Well, Elizabeth, I'll tell you about it," said Helen one day as she took lessons in collar making from her friend and helper. "You made over all my ideas and made me over, too, so I thought I'd try my hand. I knew you couldn't leave home to work in the city, but there was no reason why the city could not come to you, so I wrote to Aunt Emily and told her to send her fashionable friends out here. It is only a short distance, you know, and they like to come. In short, I tried the making-over business on your plans and succeeded a little."

"But the best thing that ever happened was when Elizabeth made herself over," said Mrs. Dorsey, happily.

"I didn't do that," said Elizabeth, softly and reverently. "I tried it and made a sorry failure, but finally I learned enough to ask help from One who understood and He made me over. Sometimes I'm sorry I don't have to wrestle with the scanty materials and stained and torn garments that Aunt Margaret used to send, for I am sure that He could make it possible for me to enjoy even the hard things."

"I am sure of that," said Helen, happily, "but I like everything as it is, for now you have time to show others how to make-over, and that helps, too."

A Great Battle Line

BY GEORGE A. HENRY.

The reading world is becoming accustomed to long battle lines. There are battle lines in the present European war extending hundreds of miles. But the battle line in this country against the saloon is thousands of miles in length, extending, literally, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Gulf of Mexico to the international boundary.

Some of the great central States occupy critical positions in this line. Indiana, for example, where the liquor interests literally spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in their battle for the preservation of their saloons during 1915. During this period they succeeded in re-opening only twelve saloons in communities which had formerly voted dry, but in the same period of time the dry forces succeeded in closing a total of 120 saloons. This is a wonderful record when one considers the fact that this work has been done under city and township local option laws which were created in the interests of the brewers and distillers.

The city of Indianapolis is considering the possibility of calling a local option election. Friends of the dry cause point to the fact that if Minneapolis and Boston can come so near to closing their saloons as a result of local option elections, Indianapolis will stand a still better chance of going dry. Prominent men in that city claim that it can be voted dry by a majority of 20,000.

The National Convention of the Anti-Saloon League of America will be held in Indianapolis from June 26th to 29th, inclusive, 1916. Coming as this convention does, so soon after the national conventions of the great political parties, it will be one of the most momentous gatherings of temperance forces ever assembled in this country. Plans are now on foot to make it a great school of methods where the latest and most scientific word concerning the war against beverage alcohol will find utterance. Men of national and even international fame will be on the program. Recognized leaders in the fight against the saloon throughout this country will be there and will have prominent parts.

A GOOD CHANGE.
A Change of Food Works Wonders.

Wrong food and drink cause a lot of trouble in this world. To change is first aid when a person is ill, particularly from stomach and nervous troubles. As an illustration: A lady in Missouri was brought around to health again by leaving off coffee and some articles of food that did not agree with her.

She says: "For a number of years I suffered with stomach and bowel trouble which kept getting worse until I was ill most of the time. About four years ago I left off coffee and began using Postum. My stomach and bowels improved right along, but I was so reduced in flesh and so nervous that the least thing would overcome me.

"Then I changed my food and began using Grape-Nuts in addition to Postum. I lived on these two principally for about four months. Day by day I gained in flesh and strength until the nervous trouble had disappeared. I feel that I owe my health to Postum and Grape-Nuts.

"Husband was troubled for a long time with occasional cramps and slept badly. Finally I prevailed upon him to leave off coffee and take Postum. After he tried Postum for a few days he found that he could sleep and that his cramps disappeared. He never went back to coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms: Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c. and 25c. packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c. and 50c. tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

Sarah Blake's "Mania"

BY WILLIAM NORRIS BURR.

ARAH BLAKE never seemed to be quite satisfied with anything. No small portion of her life was spent "trying to fix things a little different," to use the words of Cousin Diantha Platt. "Either the furniture in some part of the house must be rearranged," Cousin Diantha went on to explain, "or the sleeves of her new waist must be ripped out and made over because the seams do not happen to come just so, or she must be sending her shoes, that she's worn for three months just as she bought 'em, down to the shop to have the top button on each one set in just a sixteenth of an inch, or she gets to asking Silas most every night if he don't think he'd better sleep in the house now when she knows he just loves—in man-fashion, of course—to sleep out on the upper balcony that they've curtained off on purpose for a summer sleeping porch for Silas, or she wishes she could exchange the shade of the electric reading-lamp for one that flares more at the bottom, or she thinks she'd better keep the table-cloths and napkins in the drawer where she's been keeping the sheets and pillow-cases for as much as four months, and find a place somehow for the sheets and pillow-cases in one of the dresser drawers in the back bedroom, or something or other—anything to be fixing things different. She isn't exactly a discontented mortal—Sarah isn't—for she's just as sweet as roses in June in her general disposition. But there seems to be some sort of a streak in her that just keeps her aching to be changing things around. She actually told me one day—that woman did—that she did wish Silas's name had been something besides Blake, because 'Blake' has an 'e' on the end of it, and she don't see how the spelling of it can ever be changed and still have it Blake. 'Now, if it had only been Brown, or Graham, or Dunn, or Hart, or Horn,' says she, 'we could have added a final "e" to it, or left off the "s" sometimes, just as we pleased, and it would have been the same name and still not have been so all-the-time-the-same, like Grandmother Haskell's parlor. I don't believe a new thing went into that parlor of Grandmother's for thirty years,' says she, 'and nothing was ever taken out and left out, either. Each chair had its place, and each picture on the walls its place, and each little glass or shell thing on the mantle its place. She was good at house-cleaning, Grandmother Haskell was,' so Sarah said, 'but everything had to go back into just exactly its place every time. I'd about as soon live in an empty house with nothing in it but four square, bare walls to look at,' says she, 'as to live in one that had everything in it always just so. I'd die of rigidity, or some other disease of that sort, in less than a year.' And I guess she would have. It ain't in her to put things down and let 'em stay put. And that's all right enough in some cases. But the trouble with her is, she carries it to such lengths that she's wearing herself all out, to say nothing of everybody around her. I think it's a sort of abnormal something-or-other she's got—some mania, mebbly, like kleptomania or dipsomania, only it isn't quite so downright wicked as those manias are. And I believe she could be cured of it, if just the right thing could be made to act on just the right nerve in her. It's a sickly nerve, or two or three of 'em, that's at the bottom of the whole thing, I verily believe. There's nothing like an unhealthy nerve, in my opinion, to make one restless and never quite satisfied with things as they are."

Cousin Diantha is always a welcome visitor at our house. Her volubility is sometimes a bit trying, or would be if we were not cordially inclined toward her because of her many virtues; but she is not a gossip. A more considerate woman it would be hard to find. She likes to talk, but she has a conscience when she is talking about people, and she lets her conscience and her discrimination work out for her the problem of a proper auditor. She always considers whom she is talking to when she discourses concerning the faults and foibles of other folks.

She came over one moonlight evening about a month after her outbreak concerning the mania of Sarah Blake, and in the seclusion of our west veranda she rehearsed another chapter of that good woman's story.

"You remember, I was telling you a while ago about the way Sarah Blake was getting into, of fidgetting around from morning till night trying to fix things a little different, don't you? Well, she's fixed things different for her and Silas now, and I'm sorry for her as I can be; but mebbly this was just what was needed, though, to help her to see what hard work she was making of life—which has a good deal of pull and tug in it for most of us, anyway, without adding on any that's unnecessary.

"I suspected that she had made a muss of things with her mania for having things different when I was telling you about her a month ago. And that's the reason I came out with it. For I didn't know but I might have to have a little of your help sometimes to furnish crumbs for her table.

"You know Silas is an easy-going sort of a man, and he thinks the-world-and-all of Sarah, and just laughs good-naturedly at her freakishness, and lets her do about as she pleases—which is a good thing in a husband provided the wife is pretty well balanced. But when the wife has a weak nerve or two in her, and has an easy-going husband, too, who don't firmly but kindly put on the brakes when things get headed toward the down-hill road, then there's likely to be a smash-up.

"And that's just what's happened with the Blakes. It seems that Silas had quite a bit of rainy-day money laid by that he's been saving up along, and he had it and a thousand dollars which his Uncle Silas Lathrop that he was named after left him, all in the Ashton Savings Bank.

"And Sarah took a notion one day some time ago, that that money had been in one place long enough. Now, Sarah ain't close-fisted nor very much of a money-grabber—I can say that for her. It was that mania nerve working in her just at a time when she happened to be thinking a little about that money in the Savings Bank—I'm sure of it. And so all at once nothing would do but that they must invest every cent of it in some pieces of property down in Braceville.

"Lots of folks has bought Braceville property and sold it in less than six months, some in less than a month, for a good deal more than they paid for it, and some's doubled their money,' she said to Silas. And then she went on to picture to him how foolish it was to be letting that money lie in the Savings Bank month after month and year after year, bringing in nothing but a paltry four-per-cent, when they might just as well be buying and selling and making with it, same's other people were doing. And if Silas didn't let her have her own way, same's he'd always done!

"That was five years ago; and they've got their Braceville property yet, and are likely to have it for five more years; and they'll be lucky if they sell it by that time for what they paid for it. And so instead of getting in their little four-per-cent regular as the sun, and having something, too, that they could draw on for bread and butter if they'd ever have to, they have been paying out for taxes and things and not getting in a cent on their investment.

"But that ain't all: neuritis has developed in Sarah's right arm and shoulder, and it's so painful sometimes that she just can't do a thing but set down and have a good cry. I couldn't help thinking when she told me, that in all probability it's the unnecessary part of her work that she's done for years that has brought on that neuritis; but that's neither here nor there—she's got it, and at times she's almost helpless with it.

"And then that ain't all: Silas ain't been feeling very well lately, and this morning Dr. Burchard hustled him off to the hospital for an operation for appendicitis. So there they are. The rainy day is on 'em, and their rainy-day money is all in town lots that don't sell, and they hav'n't a dollar hardly, of ready money, and nothing they can turn into money.

"Now I want you to take hold with me, Cousin Martin, and help them out for awhile until Silas can get around again and get to doing something. You and I are both a little forehanded, and we musn't let those good people suffer, though it's delicate business trying to help them much, for they are sensitive as the leaves on an aspen tree.

"I, for one, don't think it pays for anybody to get so bent on changing things around that she, or he, either, can't be happy if something stays put for awhile. It's clean Martha-foolishness, it seems to me, to be cumbered with much unnecessary serving. I know there's lots of sympathy expressed, in these hustle-or-you'll-never-get-there days, for busy, practical Martha—and she has my sympathy, too, for I'm sorry for her. But 'twas said in the olden time that 'twas Mary rather than Martha that chose the better part; and according to my notion that's right."

The Miff Tree

Once upon a time, so a fireside legend runs, a chorus of song birds began to make tuneful the roadside by which they were perched. It was only a post and rail fence that they had chosen as a choir loft, yet so inspiring and melodious was the volume of song which poured forth from their throats that the listener might have imagined himself to have been in one of the suburbs of Paradise, if not within the jasper walls. Yet suddenly, so the story runs, there came a serious marring of the harmony. Not by directly discordant notes, but by the silencing of certain of the songsters' tones. It came to some of them that the warbling of others was clearer, if not sweeter than their own; and not able to endure the thought of being outclassed by others they suddenly betook themselves to the "miff tree," which stood near-by, sullenly hiding their bills in their plumage instead of continuing to praise their Maker to the best of their ability.

We are glad this is only a folk-lore tale. We have yet to meet the person who has witnessed the exhibition of such a spirit among the feathery tribes. Would that we could say as much of mankind, made in the image of the Creator, redeemed by the priceless blood, refashioned into the same image by the Spirit of love! But who of us has not known those who refuse to serve unless there be a conspicuous recognition of their gifts?

It is said of Michael Angelo that he wore a miner's lamp on the front of his workman's cap that no shadow of himself might fall upon his work. If this precaution was needed in order to obtain the highest efficiency in the chiseling of marble, is it not even more necessary on the part of those who would help fashion immortal souls in the image of the Redeemer that the light of His love shine always with such brightness in the workman's face that no shadow of ourselves fall over and mar the work to which we have given our hearts and lives!

The Joy of Service

Some one has well said: "One of the joys that Christ gives his disciples is the joy of service. The brook that turns the mill wheel sings on its course; it is only the stagnant pool that has no song."

The Power of the Word

Mr. Oldfield, a missionary of the Christian and Missionary Alliance at Liuchow, South China, tells of selling a Gospel to a Chinese farmer nine years ago. The farmer took it home and read it, perhaps, but never attended to its teaching. It fell, however, into the hands of his hired laborer, who became immensely interested, reading and studying it night after night by the light of a peanut oil taper. By chance he learned that there was a missionary at a distant point of the province who could explain the Gospel to him more clearly. He determined to visit him, and with this in view began to save his cash. While others in the neighborhood were hoarding money to buy coffins in preparation for death he began to put by his money for a journey in search of life. After nine years of waiting he made the journey, found the missionary, received instruction and has been baptized.

A Winning Church

What is necessary that a church may be truly successful in the work of the Kingdom? To begin with, it must have profound faith in the eternal realities. A church that is not sure of itself cannot, in the very nature of the case, be an instrumentality of power in God's hands. The times of greatest achievement in the history of the Christian church were times of strong, rugged faith in God. Unless we believe something with all our hearts we shall not be able to conquer. The modern age has been characterized by Henry Van Dyke as "an age of doubt." Even the great fundamentals of the Christian faith have been called in question by many people; such fundamentals as the fatherhood of God, the divinity of Christ, the atonement of Christ, the resurrection of Christ and the life eternal. The spirit of doubt has permeated to a considerable degree the Church itself. A winning church must have a vital, intense faith in God, faith in His eternal fatherhood, faith in the Christ whom God has sent into this world as Redeemer, faith in the Cross of Calvary, faith in the ultimate triumph of righteousness, faith in the life immortal. When once the Church of Jesus Christ believes with all its soul it will be invincible. It will take the world for its Master. It will bring all nations at His feet.

There is also necessity for a comprehensive program of social redemption. We are organized not only for the purpose of leading individuals to Christ; we are concerned not only with saving persons; we are obligated to save society. The Church needs to-day a new social vision. It should formulate a program big enough to meet the world's needs. A study of modern human society reveals the absolute necessity of the Gospel of Jesus. It has many grievous wounds to be healed. Large sections of our population are aptly described as belonging to the "submerged tenth." Who can look upon the slum sections of a great city without a sinking of the heart? Who can contemplate the woes wrought by the liquor business without feeling that the demons of the pit have been let loose on earth? Consider the havoc wrought by moral uncleanness; consider the oppression of the poor by unscrupulous men of power. Human society desperately needs Jesus Christ. This is our day of opportunity. May the Church be blessed with social vision and with a social dynamic sufficient for its mighty task!

A winning church is characterized by a zealous evangelism. The supreme business of the Church is to win souls to Jesus Christ. That there is crying need for more enthusiasm in this essential work of the Church is very apparent. Still there are multitudes of men who can join in the sad complaint of the Psalmist, "No man cared for my soul." The average church member of to-day is doing practically nothing in the way of personal evangelism. We wonder sometimes what proportion of church members are praying for unsaved persons and are following up their prayers with practical endeavor. The Church will never Christianize human society until it is literally on fire with the passion for human souls, the passion which possessed the heart of Jesus Christ when He gave Himself to die on the cross of Calvary.

A winning church must also realize that it is not an end in itself, but a means to an end. Graham Taylor remarked a few years ago that "the business of a church is to build up the community, not to build itself up out of the community." Many a congregation is guilty of selfishness; its chief concern is with itself, with increasing its membership, building up its various departments and gaining for itself a great name. Such a church misses the chief end for which it exists. It is the business of a church to do the work of the Kingdom of God in the community. It should love the community more than itself. It should consider itself as a means toward building up community life—intellectual, social, moral, civic, spiritual. A church should conform to the law which Jesus laid down for the individual when He said, "He that loseth his life for My sake shall find it."

The ideal church is described by Paul in his letter to the Ephesians, the fifth chapter, where he says that "Christ loved the church and gave Himself up for it, that He might sanctify it, having cleansed it by the washing of water with the word, that He might present the church to Himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish."

Helped to Help Others

BY THE REV. C. H. WETHEREE.

If one be a true Christian, he has a desire, more or less strong, to somehow help other people. He cannot be contented to go along in life without any special efforts to be helpful to his fellows. A zealous Christian makes it a practice of asking God to help him to do some kind of good to those who are in need. This ought to be the ambition of all of us who claim to be Christians. We should have the high motive of thinking more of helping other people than we think of getting help from God solely for our own benefit. Too often we want God to help us, whether anyone else gets help from Him or does not. This is a low and very selfish motive.

It is certain that Paul was free from it. His ruling passion was that of earnestly seeking the help of God that he might thereby especially help many other people. He often asked Christians to pray that God would abundantly help him; but he never made such a request for the sole benefit of himself. He was all the while thinking more of what he might be enabled to do for others than he was of being personally profited. He never used God's help for the promotion of his own interests. We may be sure that he would not expect that God would confer power upon him if he had no desire to use the power for the high welfare of as many as he could serve. And God always did help him, because He knew that Paul would employ the help for the betterment of others.

When we ask God to help us, what is usually our main purpose? Is it to merely minister to our own relief, our own advancement, our own comfort? If we have no higher purpose, then we have no reason to expect large help from God. We should ask great help from God that we may greatly help all that we can serve.

A Vital Message

In an article recently published in the Christian Observer, Rev. J. Addison Smith, D.D., pays this tribute to the value of leaflets or tracts which may be enclosed in a letter to a friend. He writes:

"After the experience of years the writer is more and more impressed with the great value of letter-slips. The wonders they have wrought, the good they have achieved will never be fully known until all the records are in at the last great day. Some years ago, the writer had occasion to write a banker one thousand miles away, and as his custom was he enclosed a slip. In return that banker wrote a personal letter thanking the writer for sending the same, stating that it came at a most opportune hour when he needed the help it had to offer.

"We must remember that our noble business men who are battling to make an honest living amid our modern complex commercial life meet with hours that are dark and crucial. Ofttimes the 'immortal hope may burn low in the soul,' and they need inspiration and help, and a slip at the psychological moment may do them amazing good. Of this the writer is so convinced, that he pleads with all the redeemed never to seal a letter without a slip to inspire, or mark, or mellow, or sweeten and enrich the life. There are so many such slips published in our time. Some of them are wondrously suggestive, and, under God, are bound to uplift the life into higher and divine forms."

A large number of leaflets and tracts suitable for use as letter-slips are published by the American Tract Society, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y. A carefully arranged descriptive catalogue of these publications under the title of "Silent Evangelists," may be had for the asking.

American Tract Society

THIS SOCIETY was organized in 1825. Its work is interdenominational and international in scope, and is commended by all evangelical denominations.

It has published the Gospel messages in 178 languages, dialects and characters. It has been the pioneer for work among the foreign-speaking people in our country, and its missionary colporters are distributing Christian literature in thirty-three languages among the immigrants and making a home-to-home visitation among the spiritually destitute, both in the cities and rural districts, leaving all kinds of Christian literature, also the Bible or portions of the Scriptures.

Its publication of leaflets, volumes and periodicals from the Home Office total 791,142,050 copies. It has made foreign cash appropriations to the amount of $796,137.39, and grants of electrotypes to the value of $61,177.96, by means of which millions of copies of hooks and tracts have been published at mission stations abroad.

The gratuitous distribution of the past year is to the value of $15,439.05. The grand total of its gratuitous distribution has been to the value of $2,617,820.90, which is the equivalent of over four billion tract pages.

The total number of family visits that have been made by the Society's colporters during the last year is 202,877; the total number of volumes distributed by sale or grant is 59,431, making the total number of volumes that have been circulated by colporters in the last 73 years 17,326,937, and the total number of family visits that they have made during the same period 18,406,676.

Its work, ever widening, is dependent upon donations and legacies, and greatly needs increased offerings.

What a Tract Did

That girl did not lose her reward who handed a tract to a young man in a stage coach in England. He tore it up in fine pieces and threw it out of the window, but one little piece was blown back and alighted on his knee. He wet his thumb, and, taking it up, made out on one side the word "God." On the reverse side he made out only the word "eternity." These two words fastened themselves on his mind. Reaching the house of the young lady he was about to marry, on which mission he was bent, he said, as she met him at the door, "God.—Eternity." She thought he had lost his reason. A conversation soon led her to the same conviction which had seized his soul, and they both, on their knees, gave themselves to God before being married. Nothing done for God and souls in prayer is lost. This girl prayed earnestly as she handed the tract to this young man. Here was the secret. —EXCHANGE.

The True Gentleman

Over an English mantelpiece in an ancient manor may be found this striking delineation: "The true gentleman is God's servant, the world's master, and his own. Virtue is his business; study, his recreation; contentment, his rest; and happiness, his reward. God is his Father; Jesus Christ his Savior; the saints his brethren, and all that need him his friends. Devotion is his chaplain; chastity his chamberlain; sobriety his butler; temperance his cook; hospitality his housekeeper; providence his steward; charity his treasurer; piety his mistress of the house, and discretion his porter to lead in or out as most fit. Thus is his whole family made up of virtues and he is master of the house."

English Quakers and the War

BY REV. CHARLES S. MACFARLAND.

Ruskin once declared that humanity honored the soldier, "not because he goes forth to slay, but to be slain." The Quakers are, by virtue of the constitutional principles of their faith, prohibited from participating in war. But over against their conscientious objection to war arise instincts of patriotism, defense, and their consciences are thus between conflicting senses of duty. The issue has been met by one group of Friends in England in a manner that illustrates Ruskin's words

Philip J. Baker, twenty-five years of age (son of Hon. J. Allen Baker, M.P., President of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches), an Oxford man, former President of the Oxford Union, and a world-famous athlete, not only at Oxford but while also a student at Haverford College, with other virile young Quakers proposed the Friends' Ambulance Unit to solve this conflict of conscience and duty, his chief helpers being his wife and his brothers, Allen R. Baker, Joseph S. Baker, and Bevan B. Baker, with the well-known writer, George M. Trevelyan, who became commandant, with Philip Baker as adjutant, and Mrs. Baker as head matron of the hospital section.

The work of the Friends' Unit has become one of the institutions of the European War. It has secured the confidence and commendation of the Military Authorities of three countries, both in the field and at home. And it has gained its unique position among voluntary units by none of the usual social or influential channels. It has been assisted by no decorative or sensational personalities. It has hardly been mentioned in the Press.

It has won its position by the courage, tact and patience of its Officers in recognizing and seizing opportunities of service and in establishing cordial relationships with officials of all classes and of three races, and by the discipline, goodwill, self-abnegation, and unwearying work of its young men.

On their way to Dunkirk, to constitute the Belgian Unit, the first piece of work, crossing the Channel, was the manning of boats to save the crew of the torpedoed "Hermes" in October, 1914. At this time they numbered only forty-three workers, but they attended, redressed and assisted 1250 men the first five days and nights.

Their next point was Ypres, where they organized a second hospital, the method being to find and care for cases of the greatest need and neglect, and within a couple of months the staff grew to about 250 workers of all kinds for relief and restoration.

After the organization was established in what was left of Belgium and Northern France, the leaders moved on to Italy and organized the Italian Unit.

Many of them served entirely at their own expense as well as without pay.

In addition to the work of gathering up the wounded from the field and caring for them in the hospitals, provision is also made for religious service and spiritual ministrations.

The staff at Dunkirk now consists of about 500 trained men and 40 women. There is a large fleet of motor ambulances and two ambulance trains. There are seven hospitals. The newer Italian Unit is also assuming large proportions.

The Quakers of England have thus entered the war, not to take a single human life, but to save, and have vindicated their self-sacrificing sense of patriotic duty without violating their consciences or their religious faith.

It Will Outlast the Ivy

In a little down-east churchyard there is still growing a sprig of ivy taken from the yard of the historic church of God at Jamestown more than a hundred years ago and planted in the new ground, in memory of a dearly beloved minister.

There, through all these years, the bit of ivy has been twining itself about the tombstone of the man of God who once went in and out before the people. Wonderful that the ivy should last so long! Many a plant has sprung into life, flourished and gone back into the dust since the ivy was brought from Virginia.

But even that ivy will one day lose its power to climb up the stone over the resting place of the minister. Then will he be forgotten? Will his memory then fade into oblivion?

One day he spoke a kindly word to a soul that was in trouble. It was not on the Sabbath day. The minister may have been making the simple round of his parish. But the word he spoke that day will live on forever!

On another day he knelt by the side of a young man who had never known the way celestial. Never again did his feet turn away from the pathway to heaven! A new song was set ringing beyond the gates of glory, just because Peter Bours planted the word of hope in that young man's heart.

Ivy vines cease to clamber over the stony wall; their roots die down and are forgotten. But the loving, tender min-istrations of a consecrated heart live forever!

How men rejoice when the spade brings up out of the dust of ages some building that was once a part of the city of Antioch! Antioch? Why that makes us think of Paul, the great apostle. Who knows but that his voice once sounded through the now silent halls of these houses just now being lifted back into the sunlight? Wonderful, indeed, the thought!

And still years yet to be will send the sand drifting again over those walls. It must be so. Time laughs at man's best efforts to rear and to preserve costly structures of stone or of wood. But the things Paul said in Antioch will linger in memory forever and ever. It was a glad day when "the whole city" came to listen to the gracious words which fell from the lips of Paul and Barnabas, and "the people were glad, for the word of God was published throughout all the region."

This is the thing which will outlast the ivy vine—the Word of the Lord.

—KIND WORDS.

A Brave Struggle

Dr. W. W. Colborne, a volunteer medical missionary of the Church Missionary Society, who died in Hojo, Japan, in the year past, was one whose fighting was within as well as without, having been plagued during his whole missionary career with ill health. He worked in South China for six years, but sickness sent him home. Then he proceeded to the Hokkaido in 1897 and labored there until 1909, when he again went to pieces. The next year he took up the battle again, returned to Japan and worked among consumptives with much success, both spiritual and medical, until his death.

Dr. Colborne dedicated himself to the mission field as a consequence of impulses received at a Moody and Sankey meeting in London in the seventies of the last century. His missionary fire glowed strongly to the end. He was often seen in his wheel chair out on the sands of Hojo gathering the fisher folk about him, marking a cross on the sand with a few Japanese characters, and preaching the Gospel from these symbols.

THE RESURRECTION, BY JEAN-LÉON GÉRÔME

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY, NEW YORK.

CHRISTIAN PREPAREDNESS

"Behold, I send my messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee."—(Matt., 11:10.)

Just as a chain is no stronger than its weakest link, so the American nation cannot rely on mere statistics of soldiers and sailors under arms or in reserve, but must depend in the last analysis on the strength of personality in the individuals who make up the nation—on their intelligence, character, devotion.

More important than guns are the spirits of men and women.

The Puritans under Cromwell, in England, and the Pilgrim fathers, in New England, manifested wisdom that has won the sanction of history insofar as they looked for guidance to Him who of old protected Israel from their enemies and brought them to a promised land. And to-day the truth still shines forth in the words of the prophet, "Prepare your hearts unto the Lord; and he will deliver you out of the hands of the Philistines." (I. Sam., 7:3.)

Hark to the living word! Turn to the rock of ages, the book of books, the Holy Bible.

Let the words of the divine Messenger, referred to in the text from Matthew quoted at the head of this page, be your preparation for life.

But that is not enough.

How about your neighbor?

How about your friends, relatives, children?

Is the Bible to them the source of inspiration and joy that it should be?

In short, do you find room around you to spread the seed of thorough Bible contact? If so, we can help you accomplish that end, or you can help us to do it—put it whichever way you will; and the goal can be achieved in a new and unique yet effective manner, combining instructive benefit with absorbing pleasure. The means to which we refer is receiving enthusiastic indorsement on every side; it is none other than the Bible Picture Contest which The Christian Herald is conducting in combination with The American Messenger.

Bible Study Made Attractive and Yielding a Lasting Impression

ARE YOU A

Mother, Father, Minister, Teacher, Aunt, Uncle, Big Brother or Sister, Grandparent, Godparent?

How old is your girl, or your boy? If the answer is "nine" or "nineteen," or anywhere between, you are concerned in this discussion.

Granted that you have made provision for schooling, church attendance, Sunday School, good reading, moral training, social development, excellent home surroundings, and all that—

Yet the fact remains that Youth can't constantly be at these things. Young people must have recreation in plenty. Now, masters of pedagogy insist that we inject the element of entertainment into study, if we would get the best results with Youth. And behold, evolved a method whereby the routine study of the Bible and religion may be most refreshingly re-enforced in accordance with this pedagogical principle!

The Bible Picture Contest makes a tremendous appeal to the play instinct that is in youth—and in most of us. The serious worth of this Contest is proven in many ways, and its full educational value will be almost unconsciously obtained by every participant, young and old.

So, if there is a boy or girl in whom you are interested and whose mind you would have stored with Bible truths, by all means introduce that boy or girl quickly to our Bible Picture Contest.

What verse from the Bible fits this picture?

Banker, Farmer, Mill Hand, Housewife, School-mistress, Clerk, Storekeeper—Whoever you are

Whatever your occupation, education, training, tastes or age, we venture to assert that, when you know all about the Bible Picture Contest, you will agree it is the kind of home recreation to give perfect delight both to yourself and to the other members of your family as well as to your friends.

You will not be helped nor will you be hindered, essentially, in the Contest, by deep learning or special familiarity in Bible matters; yet you cannot fail to learn a good deal in the Contest. Its object is to test your powers of observation and common sense judgment. You are presented with a series of fascinating problems; and you will not rest until you have solved them. In the meanwhile the significance and force (sometimes in an unexpectedly new light) of a number of selected Bible texts will naturally and pleasurably—and seemingly without effort—lodge themselves in your mind and soul.

Consider, for example, the picture shown on the left. The modern setting is proof conclusive that no Bible scene is here represented. Yet the Contest requires that you match a Bible text to the illustration. In order to do that, you will come to perceive a fresh meaning in some possibly familiar quotation. You can find an appropriate answer in the available list of eligible Contest verses.

Everybody Is Eligible

You who read this announcement are invited without qualification or obligation of any sort to participate in the Bible Picture Contest.

The Contest consists of a series of pictures, to each of which you are to submit a Bible verse as an answer. As many as five answers are allowed for each picture. After the contestants have submitted their answers, a Committee of Judges will approve the best of those answers. The contestant's primary aim should be to submit the greatest number of correct answers for the pictures.

You are not required to search the whole Bible. The Contest is limited to a list of 2,000 selected Bible verses. As only such verses will be accepted, you know that you have only to look in that list in order to find every possible winning answer. Everybody is on an equal footing.

Some of the pictures have already appeared. The rest will soon be published. As no answers are to be submitted until all the pictures have appeared, nobody is ahead of you. If you haven't all the pictures to date, you can obtain them at one cent each, or entirely free as is explained further on.

The exclusive standard list of eligible answers can be located by you in your own Bible (as provided in the Rules, obtainable on application), or conveniently consulted in the handy little volume known as "Gems from the Bible," which practically constitutes the key to the Contest.

For the writing down and eventual submitting of the answers of your choice, there is a specially designed booklet known as Reply Book.

The Bible Picture Contest OUTFIT, consisting of Contest pictures, "Gems from the Bible" and Reply Book, is offered to you as a premium. See next column.

Now Is the Time to Enter

June 7, 1916, is the date before which no answers will be received by the Committee. So you have plenty of time in which to find suitable quotations in "Gems from the Bible" to correspond with the Contest pictures.

Utilize your spare quarter or half hours, of an evening. Don't delay too long, however. You may as well try earnestly to excel in the Bible Picture Contest. Therefore, take your time and thoughtfully select your answers. Don't leave it all to the last. Begin now.

While the chief reward of this Contest is obviously the spiritual profit that will accrue to all the contestants in the form of precious thoughts and happy phrases, retained almost involuntarily as a sequel to interested and stimulating activity, this delectable gain will be supplemented in at least 419 cases by the award of sums of money which can be devoted by the proud recipients to innumerable worthy aims.

The first reward is $1,250, the second is $625, the third is $350, the fourth is $250 the fifth is $150, then $100, $75, $50, $20 and four hundred and ten additional rewards. All are in cash. And in the event of ultimate ties, each tying contestant will receive the full reward tied for.

The Outfit, already mentioned ("Gems from the Bible," Contest pictures and Reply Book), should help you earn one of these rewards and add to your enjoyment throughout. We shall send the Outfit to any address, prepaid, and without further charge, as a premium with a subscription order for the American Messenger and the Christian Herald (weekly), each one year, at the total price of $2.10.

Either or both subscriptions can be new, renewal or extension, for yourself or any other person.

DR. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN

"RISEN WITH CHRIST"

BY REV. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, D.D.

It is a fine thing to have a high ideal in life, but it is not always easy to reach the ideal. For example, many of the teachings of Confucius were excellent. As a sage and leader of men he said many great things, but the ideals of Confucius only mock the people who consider them, because there is no strength given to them to attain unto the ideal. With the teachings of Christ the case is entirely different. Christ not only raises before us the ideal, but He gives us strength to reach it. Jesus plainly said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto Me." We ought as Christians to live resurrection lives. I cannot conceive of the son of the widow of Nain, after he had been raised from the dead, going back to worldly pursuits, nor can I imagine Lazarus, after he had been released from the bonds of death, living a life of inconsistency, and yet as Christians risen with Christ we are often impatient, unkind, unfair, and in so many ways inconsistent and unfaithful representatives of Jesus Christ.

A Telling Illustration

I have found in the New Testament a telling illustration of this great truth. It was in Bethany at the time of the Passover Feast when Jesus was present, and Lazarus also, "whom He had raised from the dead." The Passover was a great event in the history of Israel. Before the keeping of the feast the highways were made smooth and easy to travel. The night before the Passover every Jewish house was made clean, and when the last cleansing act had been performed every Jewish father is represented to have said something like this: "And now, if any leaven remains in this house, it is here against my will." The Passover lamb was slain. In the morning, by the sound of trumpets, the people were aroused; they all joined in singing one of the psalms, and then they enjoyed the feast together; when the day was ended they turned their faces homeward. When Jesus attended His first keeping of the feast in Jerusalem Joseph and Mary were with Him. They tarried for a little while in the city, and then started home. They had gone a day's journey when they missed Jesus. They searched for Him among their kinsfolk and acquaintances, and did not find Him. They went back to the city of Jerusalem again, and there they found Him questioning and answering the questions of the wise men. Every feast of the Passover from that one until the last one kept during His life was memorable.

The special Passover feast to which I am now referring was of particular interest to one of the homes in Bethany. Lazarus had previously sickened and died in that home. Jesus had visited the family in their sorrow, had gone out to the tomb, and had raised Lazarus from the dead. And now that they have the feast prior to the Passover, Jesus is again a guest in this home. There we see Mary, Martha and Lazarus, who had been dead—and Jesus. And that is a significant addition to the circle. No family circle is complete without this addition. It does not make any difference how beautiful your house is, it is not a real home until Jesus is there, because there are too many sorrows to meet without Him; too many storms to pass through without His presence; there is too much pain to endure without His healing touch. No home is complete until you can say, "This family circle includes the father, the mother; the children and Jesus." And no business is as it should be until you can add Jesus to it. It seems to me that it would greatly simplify all our industrial troubles to-day if we could find out whether or not Jesus could be taken in as a partner in the concern. There are some places of business in every city which would have to close if this test was applied. There are some great manufactories that could not run, because, if they put Jesus into the company, they would have to revise all their plans, and would have to change their principles. And so I say again that no business is really worth while until you can add Jesus and all His teaching to the company.

The special fact to which I have referred above is stated in the twelfth chapter of the Gospel of John. Great crowds of people had heard that Jesus was to be in that part of the country, and they had also heard of the sickness, death and resurrection of Lazarus. The part of the story which I am emphasizing reads as follows: "Much people of the Jews therefore knew that he was there, and they came not for Jesus' sake only, but that they might see Lazarus also, whom He had raised from the dead." (John 12:9.) It seems to me a very striking fact that the people came to Bethany not only that they might see Jesus, but also that they might see Lazarus, the man who they knew had passed away, had been placed in the tomb, and now by the power of Jesus had been raised from the dead. What a wonderful thing it would be now if someone who had passed away should suddenly return to us after having been on the other side of the River. But it was quite as wonderful in the days when Jesus lived and when Lazarus was thus called back after he had really died. I have imagined his old-time friends and neighbors coming forward to look at him. I can see them as they study every expression of his countenance and as they listen to every word that falls from his lips, for they had a right

We read in the Epistles of the New Testament that as believers we were crucified with Christ. It is also the clear statement of Scripture that as Christians we were buried with Christ in accordance with the plan and purpose of God, and in this same Holy Word it is suggested that we have risen with Christ.

It is a great encouragement to know that when once by faith we have accepted Christ as our Saviour God never again considers us apart from Him.

There is a reciprocal indwelling in Christian experience. When we are born again, Christ comes to live with us, and when we live as God would have us live we are dwelling in Him.

"So near, so very near to God,
Nearer I could not be;
For in the person of His Son,
I am as near as He.

"So dear, so very dear to God,
Dearer I could not be;
For in the person of his Son,
I am as dear as He."

When traveling in Southern waters we beheld the sponges floating in the sea, and we found that the sea was in the sponge, and the sponge was in the sea. Thus it is with Christ. He is in us and we are in Him. We put the iron rod in the fire and it becomes red hot. The fire is in the iron and the iron is in the fire. Thus it is with Christ and ourselves. It is not possible to find language strong enough to express the intimate relationship that exists between us and Christ as God has planned it.

If we have been crucified with Christ, then the question of sin is settled. God has stated in His Word, "The wages of sin is death." He has also said, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," but He does not forget to declare that "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." If we were buried with Christ, then death shall have no more dominion over us, and we may approach the end without fear.

If we are risen with Christ, then there is presented to us the ideal for Christian living, and we are plainly told just what is expected of us as the followers of Jesus Christ.

to believe that having been raised from the dead he would be an altogether different man in every respect.

Did it ever occur to you that Lazarus, as he stands there in the presence of his friends and neighbors after his resurrection, is a perfect illustration of every Christian of to-day who is living up to his privileges? There are three things that we should remember in connection with our Christian lives. The first is that, judicially, we were crucified with Christ; the second, that in the thought and plan of God we were buried with Christ, and the third is the glorious fact that by the power of God we were raised with Christ—so that it is literally true that everyone who is a true Christian is a resurrection Christian; that is, such an one has been raised from the death of sin into newness of life in Christ Jesus, and therefore St. Paul says, "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God."

If, when the people came to that Bethany home to see Jesus and Lazarus whom He had raised from the dead, they had found Lazarus impatient with Mary and harsh with Martha, or if they had heard him unkindly criticizing somebody in Bethany, or if they had found him in some way disloyal to Jesus, I think they would have looked at him in a strange, sharp sort of way, and then I think we might have heard them saying, "That is, indeed, a poor way for a man to live who has been raised from the dead. After such an experience as his, he ought certainly to be a different sort of man."

How would it be, do you suppose, if one should go into your home and mine and note the way we live? What do you think would be the judgment which they could honestly pass upon us? If one professes to be a Christian and then lives in his home in an inconsistent manner how faithless such a profession is to Christ!

What impression does your life make upon the one who rides with you on the car as you go to your business, or listens to you when you speak to your office boy, or take an unfair advantage of someone with whom you are trading? I ask these questions, because if we are resurrection Christians the smallest acts of our lives should show to all who come in contact with us that we not only have been with Jesus, but that in all things we are different because we have risen with Him.

Now, to go back to the story again of Lazarus and Jesus, it is to me most suggestive that the people seemed quite as anxious to see Lazarus as they were to see Jesus. I am quite sure that I have learned from this story how to fill the pews of a church. In the first place, of course, it goes without saying that we must have in the pulpit a minister with a positive message. Men have doubts enough of their own without having others suggested to them by the man in the pulpit. I am sure that people do not come to church to listen to essays or orations, or to hear sensational discussions of the topics of the day; I think they come to church with aching hearts, and weakened wills and bruised lives, after they have been saying all through the week, "Oh, that I knew where peace might be found!"

It is an inconceivable thing to me that, with the distress of humanity the same to-day as it has always been, so many of the churches should be so nearly empty; for the message of the church is the cure for all this; if we meet the primary condition of having a man in the pulpit whose message is positive—positive that Jesus Christ died, and lives, and is seated at the right hand of God, and has power to change lives. If the church is to be filled there is one sure way by means of which one could have a great crowd. Invite Jesus to come and occupy the pulpit. If one could only secure Him, the greatest building in the world could be filled many times over. People would come just to see Jesus. But, you say, that is an impossibility. Very well, if that is an impossibility, according to the teaching of this Bethany story which I am using, we may have an attraction which in the olden times was quite as great as Jesus. "And that they might see Lazarus also, whom Jesus raised from the dead." I will tell you how to get an empty church filled. Show the people a few specimens of conversion; just exhibit a little bit of the work which has been done. I know why so few people attend some of the churches. It is because there is there so little of that spiritual life which is always present when people are being born into the Kingdom. If one should be saved this week, and then it could be announced that the following Sunday night that man will tell how he was converted, the church would be packed. "Oh," but you say, "that is not according to our form." Well, change the form. If people cannot see Jesus, they want to see the man whom He has set free from the power of sin and raised from the dead.

I believe there is an increasing interest to-day in spiritual matters throughout the entire country. I am persuaded that many ministers are very eager that a spiritual blessing should come to themselves and to their people, but from observation I believe that the very greatest interest is being aroused among the laymen of the church. I have never known a time when Christian laymen seem to be more concerned regarding the interests of the Kingdom than at the present time, and with God's willingness to pour out His spirit upon us in the greatest possible measure, I am persuaded that if we should keep in mind the following suggestions a remarkable blessing would come to God's people everywhere.

Some Vital Suggestions

First, let us get clearly in our minds that we are risen with Christ, and therefore our lives must be lived in separation from the world. It is, however, always to be borne in mind that we are to be separated from sin and unto Christ; in giving up worldly things we take on that which is spiritual. Let us not make the fatal mistake of giving up one without taking on the other.

Second, there are certain helps which are within our reach, and by means of which we may come to be as God would have us. We ought to be more careful in the matter of Bible reading. It is a very great mistake to start the day without God's Word. One verse of Scripture a day would keep our hearts singing, and an ever-increasing familiarity with God's Word would save us from many a sad fall. We ought to be more faithful in the matter of prayer. The day which begins with prayer goes on to victory. The day beginning without prayer ends in defeat.

Third, we ought to be interested in seeking to win others to Christ. I have heard of the man who was traveling over the mountains without a guide. He knew that the way was dangerous, and that if he stumbled and fell it might possibly be to his death. Pushing his way up the mountains he did fall, and for a moment he gave up. Then his hand touched something hidden in the snow, and by intuition he knew it to be the body of another man. He began at once to attempt to save this life. He chafed the man's hands, rubbed his face, and as he continued to do this found himself all in a glow. He saved the man's life, and in doing so he saved his own.

I have never known of one who was faithful in the matter of personal work who drifted into worldliness or sin, but I have known many who neglected this form of service to make shipwreck of all that they held dear.

"If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God."

A Bit of Her Birthday

BY GAZELLE STEVENS SHARP

AN invalid sister of mine is compelled to spend much time away from home for change of climate or medical attendance. Often her homesickness is so great as almost to counterbalance the benefits obtained by the change, and while absent from home, she practically "lives on her mail."

Understanding this, not only her immediate family but also her loving neighbors and friends snatch many a moment from other pleasures or duties that she may have a cheery letter or some other pleasant reminder of home and friends.

One day in early spring as the invalid was feeling particularly depressed and her homesickness had become almost unendurable, the postman brought her a box of hothouse flowers—her favorite yellow roses predominating, and with them was a cheery letter from a dear, sunny neighbor living just across from her own little home which seemed so far away. "I send you a bit of my birthday," she wrote.

The thoughtfulness, the home news and the odor of the flowers she loved loved "came to her like a breath of Spring," so she told me months afterwards, and a train of pleasant memories was started which helped to beguile the tedium of many a lonely hour.

It seemed such a beautiful thing for this neighbor to do to send a sick friend a "bit of her birthday." The same sweet thought is a part of the Kindergarten plan, where birthdays are celebrated, not by receiving, but by giving, sharing and serving rather than by expecting special favors and attention.

Life would mean infinitely more and this old world would be a far happier place if we would but teach our children from infancy, and if we ourselves might even yet learn to say more often of cherished possessions, "This is mine and you may have it," the mine being emphatic merely to show that we have the right to bestow and it is our privilege to share.

Death Vanquished

BY REV. A. MESSLER QUICK

*Alleluia, Mighty Victor,
Of Thy conquests we will sing;
Praise to Thee that death is vanquished,
'Tis our joy in song to bring.
Choirs of heaven, with us be joyful,
Let your notes with rapture swell;
Sing of life, of life immortal,
Of the Saviour's triumph tell.*

*Nature, don your brightest mantle,
Rousing from your torpid dream;
Join our song in Easter gladness,
Blooming life your happy theme.
Sing with us of resurrection,
Of your triumph over death;
Woo the buds to fragrant blossoms,
By the warmth of vernal breath.*

*Alleluia! Alleluia!
Clouds of doubt are rolled away.
Monster Death, thy prey surrender,
Light and life have won the day!
Gates of darkness, swing wide open,
Heed the mandate from the skies!
Soar, ye ransomed, to the mansions
Christ hath made in Paradise!*

*Lord of Life, our Intercessor,
Plead for us, on high enthroned;
Through Thy death and resurrection
We have hope, through sins atoned.
When from sleep or death awaking,
May we see Thy glorious face,
And with all the ransomed legion,
Praise Thee for Thy wondrous grace.*

THE CONGRESS ON CHRISTIAN WORK IN LATIN AMERICA

By Judson Swift, D.D.

THE CONGRESS ON CHRISTIAN WORK IN LATIN AMERICA IN SESSION AT THE HOTEL TIVOLI, PANAMA.

THE much-talked of and written-about Panama Congress on Christian Work in Latin America has come and gone. Its influence and results will abide as the everlasting hills. There were between three and four hundred delegates present representing all the Republics of the Western Hemisphere, also Great Britain and Europe. The purpose was to consider the religious, moral and spiritual needs of Latin America, and to promote plans for bringing into service by means of co-operation the religious forces of the two continents. It was undoubtedly the greatest religious gathering ever held in the Western Hemisphere. The invitation was broad and far-reaching, including both Protestants and Catholics who were interested in the religious life of the South American republics. The delegates were representative men and women from the Mission Boards and the mission fields. Seldom, if ever, has so fine a body of Christian workers been brought together. Across their countenances was written consecration, high purpose and firm resolve.

Señor Le Fevre, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Panama, made the address of welcome. He was received with hearty applause, saying, among other things, "I desire to express the deep appreciation I feel for the honor you have conferred upon me by this kind reception. It is my desire to return this compliment in the most hearty manner, not because of the formalities of etiquette, but because I wish with all sincerity to contribute to the success of meetings like these which bring to my country elements of the highest civilization, to which all good citizens aspire."

Dr. John R. Mott, chairman of the Business Committee, whose strong personality was constantly manifest throughout the Congress, responded to the address of welcome. He spoke of the comprehensive and representative character of the Congress, and said, "We are looking at the whole of this great hemisphere; we are taking into account the whole need, the whole possibilities and the whole of our resources, and it is not too much to expect that from this date there will begin a new era in the Christianity of Latin America and North America as well." He also expected a more scientific method to emerge, and a profounder unity of the Christian forces in both continents. He further said, "What we need also in this day is what the French speak of in the present world war as grand strategy; that is, strategy which takes in the whole map; I mean the strategy that seeks to make the most of our comparatively meagre forces as we face a clamant and urgent need."

Dr. Robert E. Speer was elected chairman of the Congress. In his address on "Our Attitude and Spirit" he struck the keynote which was held throughout the Congress. As always, he was deeply spiritual in interpreting the purpose that had assembled the delegates. It was "to bring some sweet word from our dear Lord," a phrase uttered by a Filipino teacher when Dr. Speer and some of his traveling companions were expected to address a certain school in the Philippines. He said in part:

"As we come together in this congregation, it is with the assurance resting on sufficient evidence that we gather in unity of heart and with one single controlling aim. There is not one of us who has any other desire in his life than to do the will of God, and our one great longing is to see the Kingdom of God come in all of our American nations, and throughout the length and breadth of the world. Our attitude would be an imperfect one, and so far not truly a Christian one unless in all the days of this Congress we abide in Jesus Christ—here in our discussions, alone and wheresoever we may go."

Continuing, Dr. Speer said, "We may not evade the question of our attitude toward what we regard as error and falsehood. We must hate the false and love the true. We need to walk in love, and very tremulously. Moreover, we need a spirit of energy which 'works the works of Him while it is day,' and the spirit of expectation, which does not limit our faith in what our God can do. We must be stripped of all selfishness." He referred to the last birthday message of David Livingstone recorded in his diary, "Oh, divine love, I have not loved Thee deeply, richly, tenderly enough. We have not been equal to our work because we have been deficient in our love." At the close of this unusual address there came upon the audience the desire and experience of silent prayer.

The real work of the Congress was taken up on Friday morning, February 11. The commissions or reports presented for discussion were as follows: (1) Survey and Occupation, (2) Message and Method, (3) Education, (4) Literature, (5) Women's Work, (6) The Church in the Field, (7) The Home Base, (8) Co-operation and the Promotion of Unity.

The discussion of the report on "Survey and Occupation" brought into the full light the almost startling religious and moral needs of Latin America. It showed eighty millions of people long neglected so far as having received the plain and simple Gospel Message that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners! The moral resultant has been a minimum. The situation is set forth in the following words taken from the report:

"The decline of faith is proceeding co-extensively with modern education among both men and women of every social rank. The resident forces able to check indefinitely without arresting the spread of free learning are negligible. Several millions of savage or semi-civilized Indians are without any contact with vital Christianity or its representatives. Vastly larger numbers of neglected classes of population are in a state nominally Christian but relatively pagan. They remain grossly superstitious and in stagnation spiritually without the vital forces of Christianity visibly working among them for moral transformation and for social uplift. Thus far the Church, outside the limited evangelical Churches, maintains indifference toward movements for moral reform and openly or secretly opposes those calculated to further social justice."

Some of the most eloquent addresses were made by the missionaries from Latin America representing the Evangelical Mission Boards.

"Message and Method"

The report on "Message and Method" had to do with carrying the true Gospel to the many millions sitting in darkness. The discussions covered the distinctive aim in Christian work; how to reach the educated classes and the masses of the people; what should be the main trend of teaching and the tone of appeal of the Christian workers, etc.

Bishop W. F. Oldham, of New York City, clarified the situation by urging that the emphasis be placed upon Christ's redeeming love. He said, "I would bring to my hearers a Christ who is not only a God, but a God-man touched with the feeling of our infirmities and tempted in all things as we are. I would seek to be evangelical rather than Protestant, would trust the clear light of my positive, constructive Biblical statement to supplant the wrong idea because it is the function of light to shine away the darkness."

In speaking of the Roman Church the report frankly stated, "Its moral life is weak and its spiritual witness faint. At the present time it is giving the people neither the Bible nor the Gospel, nor the social uplift which they need. It is weighted with medievalism and other non-Christian accretions. Its propaganda has by no means issued in a Christian Latin America. Its emphasis is on dogma and ritual, while it is silent on the severe ethical demands of Christian character. It must bear the responsibility of what Lord Bryce calls Latin America's 'grave misfortune'—'absence of a religious foundation for thought and conduct.'"

The report on "Education" took under consideration government schools and universities and the schools and colleges established by the Evangelical Mission Boards, also the requirements of a theological education for students and candidates for the ministry; it asked how can higher efficiency in Christian education be realized; what is the greatest weakness in our education work from the point of view of its religious results, and so on.

The Question of Christian Literature

Commission Number Four discussed the all-important subject of a greatly increased supply of Christian literature; inquired what can be done to raise up able writers both among Latin Americans and missionaries; how best can there be prepared the suitable literature so urgently needed—first, for the educated classes who do not accept the Christian position; second, for less educated non-evangelicals; third, for the building up of evangelical Church members; and, fourth, for the training of ministers and other Christian workers.

It is pleasant to note that the work of the American Tract Society in this line of service was very generally appreciated. The fact that this Society has published a grand total of 14,748,588 copies of volumes, tracts and leaflets and periodicals, including 126,000 hymnals in the Spanish and Portuguese languages, at a total value of $633,546, is most encouraging.

A Committee on Christian Literature has been appointed by the larger Committee on Co-operation for Latin America, which will give serious consideration and seek by practical measures to greatly increase the output of Christian literature to meet the constantly increasing demand.

The Commission on Women's Work had under consideration the question, how may Christian ideals and the Christian spirit most profoundly and extensively influence home life; in what ways can the present methods of education of women in Latin America as conducted under the auspices of Missionary Agencies be improved so as to make them contribute more effectively, first, to the home and community; second, to national aspirations and ideals; and, third, to the developing Church?

"The Church in the Field"

Commission Number Six discussed the Church in the Field, setting forth the importance of establishing living Churches seeking to secure the open acceptance of Christ as a personal Saviour; what is meant by a self-supporting Church; the spiritual life of the Churches in the field; how can the Sunday Schools and Young People's Societies be made more effective as evangelical agencies.

The Commission on the Home Base dealt with the necessity and urgency of realizing the present situation in Latin America; how to meet the almost unprecedented needs; the vital secret of an adequate offering of our lives for missionary service in Latin America; how to influence the clergy at the Home Base to devote themselves with conviction and self-denial to promote the missionary task of the Churches in Latin America; how to increase the missionary gifts of individual Christians and also the Churches to supply the funds necessary to make the missionary work an ever-increasing success in Latin America.

A Marked Spirit of Christian Unity

The Eighth Commission had to do with the Co-operation and the Promotion of Unity. It was possibly never more deeply felt that a united Protestantism was necessary in order to make a solid impact upon those outside of the Evangelical Missions and Churches. Throughout the Congress denominationalism was without emphasis, the delegates feeling that they should engage in their work as Christians and ambassadors of Christ rather than as representatives of any particular denomination. One of the most impressive features of the Congress was the perfect unity with which all the discussions were carried forward, the one thought being, how can we as a united force realize the largest results in extending the Kingdom of Christ. A readiness to co-operate in educational work, in the providing of Christian literature and, indeed, in all phases of the work, was everywhere present.

The Evangelical Churches and Mission Stations throughout the Canal Zone and in Panama City were occupied by the delegates on the two Sundays that obtained during the sitting of the Congress.

The results and influence of the Congress will be emphasized and extended by the "Regional Conferences" held in Havana, Porto Rico, Lima, Santiago, Buenos Aires, Rio de Janeiro this spring and in Mexico City during the coming autumn.

In conclusion it should be stated that the Congress was most emphatically a working Congress; never did men and women assemble with a keener realization of the importance and greatness of the task they had in hand, nor give themselves to its performance with a greater self-abandonment and consecration. There was continually apparent the willingness to lose one's life for the sake of the Gospel.

It was also a Congress of Faith and Hope. Every member present was conscious of the quickening of his spiritual life and felt the assurance of final victory.

It was moreover a Congress of Deep and Earnest Prayer, also Spiritual Uplift. At every morning session the half-hour from 11 to 11.30 was spent in devotion, and some of the most spiritually minded of the delegates were asked to lead the devotional services. Again and again we seemed to be carried to the Upper Room, where the apostles of our Lord prayed and waited for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in all of His fulness and power. Passing out from these heavenly places, there seemed to be a feeling that no task was too large, no difficulties too great, to be performed and overcome, helpless ourselves, but able to "do all things through Christ which strengtheneth us."

The closing service on Saturday afternoon will never be forgotten by those who shared its blessings. Rev. Dr. George Alexander, of New York, preached the sermon. At the close followed a brief devotional service and over all came the hush of silent prayer. All were conscious that the Congress was ending; heart responded to heart in both interest and fellowship; a real halo of the Divine Presence filled the room. Never were a company of Christ's followers more conscious of the Divine leading and power. The final hand-shaking and messages of "God bless you and speed you on your way" were everywhere audible. Missionaries returned to their respective fields with a new and mighty inspiration; the secretaries and delegates from the various organizations which they represented began their homeward journey, thanking God for what their eyes had seen and their ears had heard.

The Call of To-day

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK

*It is easy to dream of the mighty deed
We shall do in the years to come;
We shall scan with care the great world's need,
And then, if we must, we will gladly bleed,
That wrong may be righted! But, brother, say,
Have you spoken a helpful word to-day?*

*It is easy to tell how our sad hearts burn
When we think of the great world's woe;
And we sigh as we say we would gladly turn
From fortune and fame; all joys we would spurn
To die for the helpless! But, brother, say,
Have you aided the needy who sought you to-day?*

*It is easy to speak of the far-away
With zest, and a swelling heart;
But oh! when a call comes to act to-day
Toward a fellow man in a tender way,
How we falter and fail! O brother, say,
Will you fruitlessly dream, and despise to-day?*

WITH OUR MISSIONARY COLPORTERS

Interesting the Children

Missionary colporters find that one good way of approach to the homes of the people among whom they are striving to circulate the message of Gospel truth is by winning the favor of the children. A capital illustration of this is given in the picture that appears on this page, in which we see Mr. Alexander Stanke-wicz, a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society, standing with the children whom he has formed into a singing class.

Mr. Stanke-wicz has been engaged in mis-sionary colportage for several years, and his efforts to spread the Gospel message among the foreign-speaking population of the State of Pennsylvania have met with considerable favor. He belongs to the Slavic race himself, and he has been particularly successful in his ministry to the spiritual needs of his own fel-low-countrymen.

The colporter who interests the children finds ready access to the homes of their par-ents, and so by training the children in the art of singing, Mr. Stanke-wicz is preparing to lead both these children and their parents to a sav-ing knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ.

A Year in the Puget Sound Country

Rev. Francis E. Smith, a colporter evangelist who is laboring under the auspices of the Amer-ican Tract Society, has sent the following nar-rative report of his work in the region around Puget Sound:

"This is the fourth annual narrative of my work as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society. Some people might think that colportage work would grow distasteful with the passing of the years, but I have found that this method of preaching the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ never becomes irksome to one who has a desire to spread the Good News in story and song. Indeed, the longer I con-tinue in the work the better satisfied I am, and the better I become acquainted with the books published by the American Tract Society the more I realize that I am publishing the Gospel by circulating them.

"My labors during the past year have taken me into seven counties of the great Puget Sound country, in which the land rises from sea level to the summit of what is the highest mountain in the United States with possibly a single exception. Tourists visit this mountain in large numbers during the summer season; in winter time it is buried deep under the snow. On a bright clear day this mountain may be seen nearly a hundred miles away. I myself have seen it at a distance of eighty miles.

"The attractions of this part of the country and its delightful climate bring people to us from every part of the globe. Settlers come from Asia, Africa, Europe, the islands of the sea, and from all parts of America. I meet peo-ple in every walk of life. On the same day I distribute books both in the homes of the wealthy and in the homes of the recently ar-rived settlers who are just getting a start in the wilderness. The need for introducing good reading is much the same in either case.

"All along the line I find a marked destitu-tion of good Christian literature. Everywhere I find a low grade of books creeping into the homes, and the only effective antidote appears to be the books distributed by the colporter.

COLPORTER ALEXANDER STANKEWICZ AND HIS SINGING CLASS.

"The books published by the American Tract Society are adapted to the needs of the average people. A short time ago I entered a home where the young daughter was beginning a Bible Study course in connection with her pub-lic school work. When she came home she would ask her mother questions about the Bible. Her mother bought one of our Bible Diction-aries, because it was a book her daughter could use. This lady has bought books from me for several years, and as I was leaving the house she said for me to come again, which I prom-ised to do next year, all being well.

"I have visited the homes of ranchers, fisher-men, lumbermen and pleasure seekers, all in one day. One finds almost every nationality rep-resented. When touched by the Gospel they are all one in Christ Jesus. As fine a specimen of young manhood as I have ever met was a young Chinese boy who was working in a fish cannery on San Juan Island. I have also met some splendid Christian men among the Japa-nese and the Hindus. Many of these people have learned to read and to speak the English language and are glad to talk about the things pertaining to the Kingdom of God.

"Altogether this has been a year of joy and gladnes to my soul. The opportunities of speak-ing a word for Jesus have been numerous. Pos-sibly the great European War has softened the hearts of the people and made them more pli-able and more willing to listen to the Gospel message. The work has been more precious to me than ever before, and I hope for good re-sults during this coming year."

Active Service in Pennsylvania

For over a dozen years Mr. John Martinco has served as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society. During that time he has circulated Christian literature to the value of many thousands of dollars. He has also been instrumental in winning many souls for the Master. In a recent report he writes:

"During the last year most of my time was spent in Pittsburgh and vicinity. I covered one hundred towns and villages, inhabited largely by people of foreign nationality who represented many different countries. During this same period I traveled about 4,000 miles by train, trolley, and on foot. I visited 5,195 families, held 118 Gospel meetings, and circu-lated Christian literature by sale and grant to the value of over $400.

"Besides my daily house-to-house work as a missionary colporter, I also taught a class in Sunday School and took part in other Chris-tian activities such as Christian Endeavor gath-erings and evangelistic street meetings, which are held every Sunday during the summer season.

"In my house-to-house work I always try to speak at least a few words about religion to every person with whom I come in contact, and some day I believe a harvest will be reaped as the result of these efforts.

"About six years ago I met a man in the town of Davidson, who bought some Christian literature from me. Afterward I lost all trace of him. But last month I visited the same town, and on entering a certain house I met this same man, who asked if I had any more Christian literature. Then he told me that after he had bought the first lot of books, he had gone to Europe and remained there for two years. Just before the war he returned to America and was very anxious to find some-one to supply him with the same kind of litera-ture as I had given him, but had not been able to find anyone to supply his wants. He was exceedingly glad to see me once more and took a good supply of Gospel literature.

"I have had many such experiences as those I have related. In olden times the Lord said, 'So shall my word be that goeth forth out of My mouth; it shall not return unto Me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it.' And I believe that the Word of God will per-form many miracles to-day."

"IF WE HAD FULNESS OF FAITH"

By Rev. James Mudge, D.D.

We would have profound peace, if we had fulness of faith. For inward disturbance comes from striving after the unattainable; while faith puts us into such harmony with God's plans that we do not strive and the inevitable is recognized as His beneficent will. Unrest arises from defeat and disappointment, but faith prevents us cherishing these thoughts by showing us clearly that the divine ordering of things is best, and hence a prompt acceptance of it is the only sensible course to take and the only way to happiness. Faith brings stillness of soul while the outward activity goes on unimpeded; it prevents perturbation of spirit, but not vigorous movements of the body; it produces tranquillity of mind without diminution of usefulness.

We would have joy and gladness all the time, if we had fulness of faith. Not but that pain would come in its due season, but its indispensable mission would be so clearly perceived that it would lose its sting and be turned into joy. In one sense there might indeed be "seas of trouble," but there would be such spiritual buoyancy as to make our destruction out of the question, and there would be such leaning on God as to take away all terror and remove all strain. Sadness and gloom cannot possibly occupy the same heart with perfect faith, for the latter brings "the hallowed bliss of our eternal home." Complaint or murmuring is not possible, no matter how heavy the chastening rod, to one who perceives the hand of the Father holding it.

We would have perpetual patience, if we possessed fulness of faith. We are impatient because we are unwilling to wait God's time. We see only a certain thing that we wish to have accomplished immediately. We fail to perceive that He is quietly moving toward the accomplishment of His plans and that His plans are wisest. Faith would remove this fume and fret, and steady us because we would understand that a thing is done quite soon enough when it is done in the divine order.

We would have light and guidance, if we had fulness of faith. For faith would roll the clouds away and dispel the darkness, opening windows in heaven through which the sun would continually shine. We stumble and go astray because we will not take God's hand or lean on the Almighty arm. He can make the night to be as bright as day, and will do this whenever the hand of faith reaches up to grasp the promises which cover all our need.

We would have stability if we had full faith. There would be no wavering nor wobbling nor flabby fluctuations. These come from our varying emotions. So long as we walk by feeling instead of faith we shall be unreliable, and neither God nor man will know where to find us. But faith "keeps the narrow way till life's last hour is fled." For God does not change, nor do His promises alter, and they who are firmly grounded in Him, looking not at the waves and winds, but only at their omnipotent Ruler, remain unmoved, unflinching and fixed, in spite of all adversaries.

Victory and success come to those who have fulness of faith. For faith is the victory, the weapon by which we overcome all foes, whether they be of the flesh, the world or the devil; it is the instrument that makes us more than conquerors. Valor is easily his whose eyes are so opened to the invisible hosts as to behold the overwhelming preponderance of force on his side. And he cannot fail in the conflict who knows how to link his weakness with infinite strength.

We would have no worry or anxiety, if we rested on fulness of faith, because trust is the antidote to care, dispelling it instantly and always. It is lack of confidence in the Higher Power that begets worry, which is the unhappy, uneasy feeling that everything depends on us and we are not competent or sufficient. Faith shows us the folly of this feeling, and turns our thoughts above, so that serenity takes the place of discomposure and calm succeeds to storm.

We would have no fear if we rejoiced in fullness of faith. Fearfulness and faithlessness are identical with each other. So faithfulness and fearlessness are essentially the same. The more of faith we have the less of fear there is always. Faith "will not shrink though pressed by every foe," nor "tremble on the brink of any earthly woe." Instead it shouts, "The Lord will provide," and finds this comprehensive promise an answer to all questions. Safe sheltered on the breast of its Almighty Friend, faith has a courage that is proof against all alarm.

We would have Christ dwelling in the heart if we cherished fulness of faith. For He dwells in the heart by faith, as St. Paul says. While He is ensconced within, making the heart His home, His tabernacle and His temple, our bliss is surely guaranteed, and all else that is of value. If Christ dwells there, we are filled with love, and in an important sense we incarnate Deity.

By abiding in faith we have God's continual presence, and all which that implies. Faith's especial province and office is to bring God close, to make Him real, to dispel the mists and fogs that conceal him, to reveal Him as the ever-nigh, to place Him behind and before us, leaving no spot and no moment unoccupied with Him. When that is the case, how swiftly "temptations lose their power." Immediately under the eye of the great Commander how bravely we can fight! With Him at our right hand the world seems very small, and difficulties disappear.

Why then should not all Christians have this faith? If the failure of faith robs us of all these inestimable blessings, privileges and glories, why should it ever fail? Why, indeed? There is no possible reason. To trust God and believe in Him is the most reasonable thing in the world. When Satan robs us of faith he triumphs at the very center of our spiritual life and enters the citadel of the soul. Why do we allow it?

How shall we help it? How shall we cultivate and strengthen our faith? Christ said, "Have faith in God," as though it were simply a matter of our choice, of our mental, moral and volitional action. And is not this the fact? Will power is the main thing! O well for him whose will is strong, if he knows how to put it to the noblest and most profitable ends. Happy he who says and keeps saying:

"I will not doubt though all my ships at sea
Come drifting home with broken masts and sails.
I will believe the Hand which never fails,
From seeming evil worketh good for me;
And though I weep because those sails are tattered,
Still will I cry while my best hopes are shattered,
I trust in Thee."

This is the ground to take, the only ground. We must summon up our utmost resolution, and recollect that doubt is the worst conceivable sin. We must present the firmest possible front against all temptations to distrust the Lord, resenting the suggestion and harboring this sentiment not for a second. We must practise faith at every opportunity, for thus only can it become strong. It grows feeble by disuse, but mighty by exercise. Our changeable weather gives a good chance for the exercise of faith almost every day. So do the thousand little unpleasantnesses that throng our pathway. Every one of them puts us to the test, for by faith we can see God in them all, and, accepting His will in these minute matters, we may become ready for the larger things which will prove easy in their turn.

"A faith that shines by night and day Will lighten every earthly load."

"Forgive us, Lord, our little faith;
And help us all, from morn till e'en,
Still to believe that lot the best
Which is, not that which might have been."

Wonderful Watchfulness

BY WARREN G. PARTRIDGE, D.D.

IT is said that the scientist and naturalist, Alexander Humboldt, in his researches in South America, made this discovery. He noticed that troops of wild horses displayed a wonderful faculty for watchfulness against their enemies, avoiding capture, both from wild animals and from savage beasts. The wild horses were constantly hunted both by men and ferocious beasts, yet they discovered the approach of their foes at great distances and made marvelous escapes. But at last the great naturalist discovered the secret. The wild horses in their flight across the country divide themselves into three groups, as regards the direction given to their ears. Those which lead the van direct their ears forward, those in the center turn their ears toward either side, and those in the rear turn their ears backward, so that the whole troop is made aware of danger threatening from any quarter. They travel hundreds of miles in this splendid order, and thus they are able to make wonderful escapes from their ever-present foes. They save themselves and each other by their watchfulness.

We should watch against the world, and the flesh, and the devil, for temptations lurk about us on every side. We have as many foes as the wild horses of South America. "The devil goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour."

Eternal vigilance is the price of soul-liberty. We must watch the enemies of our souls on every side, both for ourselves and for our friends and companions. "When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren," said the Master to Peter. We should remember that we are our "brother's keeper." By unceasing watchfulness we can save both ourselves and others.

Easter

BY ELIZABETH D. PRESTON

*With what sad hearts they rose that morn—
The faithful few who had not slept
Through all the watches of the night—
Who had but prayed and wept!*

*One more than Master, more than Friend
Had died upon the Cross in pain;
Fond hopes were killed, faith crushed to earth,
And loyal trust seemed vain.*

*But with the rising sun came joy,
Grief vanished with the shades of night;
The Lord of Life and Lord of Death Stood radiant in light!*

*No more for them could death be sad,
Nor down the ages carry gloom;
By every open grave stands Christ,
And empty every tomb!*

Our Easter Issue

We are glad to present to our readers this Easter issue, which is one of special interest both on account of the unusual character of its leading articles and because of the superb quality of the illustrations which are found on various pages throughout the paper.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman has given us a message that is particularly appropriate for the Eastertide, and his inspiring thoughts upon our relation to the Risen Christ will furnish abundant material for stimulating the Christian life of every believer.

Dr. Judson Swift, who was the delegate of the American Tract Society at the Congress on Christian Work in Latin America, has given us a magnificent report of that great gathering. His account of what was done in the interest of the advancement of the Kingdom of God among the Spanish and Portuguese-speaking peoples of the Western Hemisphere is a most informing and inspiring presentation, and everyone who reads his masterly report will secure a bird's-eye view of the Congress at Panama that will be of permanent value.

We cannot enumerate all the other features that make this Easter number one of special value, but it may be said that every page contains something of particular interest or timely application, and we bespeak for the entire issue the careful attention of all our readers.

A Memorial to the Late General Booth

Not only the rank and file of the Salvation Army but the Christian public at large are interested in the proposition to establish a worthy memorial to the late General William Booth, the founder and organizer of the Salvation Army.

General Booth was undoubtedly one of the most remarkable characters of the world. He had a real genius for the organization of humanity in the war against vice and for the uplifting of what would be ordinarily regarded as the most hopeless cases of immorality and crime.

For years the Salvation Army, which he established, was looked upon with ridicule, and in many cases it was bitterly opposed and even persecuted. But General Booth persisted in the development of his great idea, despite all opposition, and now the Salvation Army is rightly regarded as one of the most important forces at work for the uplift of humanity and the redemption of the race.

The Salvation Army has steadily enlarged the sphere of its operations until now it occupies fifty-nine different countries and colonies. It preaches the Gospel of Christ in thirty-four different languages, and publishes seventy-eight different periodicals whose aggregate circulation per issue is over a million copies. It has 9,004 corps and outposts, 996 social institutions, 523 day schools and ten naval and military homes.

In the service of the Salvation Army are 15,875 regular officers and cadets; there are 53,121 local junior and senior officers and 25,232 bandmen.

Social service activities of various kinds are maintained by the Salvation Army. It has established industrial institutions, labor bureaus, village banks, children's homes, rescue homes, maternity homes, inebriates' homes, shelters and poor men's hotels, and prison gate homes for discharged convicts.

The aim of the Salvation Army is to reach the "submerged tenth," to reclaim the outcast, to help the unfortunate, to lift up the fallen, to rescue the perishing and, above all else, to win men and women to Christ.

One of the great needs of the Salvation Army is for trained officers to carry forward its beneficent work. It is, therefore, proposed that the memorial to General Booth shall take the form of establishing and equipping two training colleges for Salvation Army officers, of which one shall be in New York City and the other in Chicago.

This is surely a worthy and desirable way in which to honor the memory of the man who gave his life to the establishment of a form of organized effort which has already resulted in large blessing to humanity, and in which there are the possibilities for still greater service in the years to come.

The good wishes of all Christian people will surely go toward the effort to establish this noble and enduring memorial to General Booth, and we shall hope for an early realization of the plans which have been made for the erection of these training colleges in the two important centers that have been named.

World-Wide Sunday School Activities

The World's Sunday School Association is pushing forward its work with great vigor. Missionaries at home and abroad are realizing as never before the need for systematic and scientific Bible School methods, and they find in the World's Association an efficient ally in all that pertains to that important branch of work.

An advance step has recently been taken in the management of the World's Sunday School Association by electing to its executive committee representatives of the various denominational Mission and Sunday School boards of the country.

In pursuance of this plan twelve members representing the Foreign Missions Conference have been appointed to serve on the executive committee of the World's Sunday School Association, together with six members selected from the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations, and it is expected that this new arrangement will result in materially strengthening the effectiveness of the World's Sunday School Association.

The National Missionary Campaign

Cheering reports have come from time to time concerning the progress of the National Missionary Campaign which has been carried on at scores of different centers throughout the length and breadth of our land.

In the great Northwestern States ten conventions were held between Duluth and Portland. These gatherings were remarkable for the enthusiasm manifested and for the large registration of delegates in attendance, sometimes under the most adverse conditions of wind and weather.

In several cases the churches could not hold the crowds that endeavored to attend the meetings. Deep earnestness prevailed at the sessions of the conventions, and in some cases whole cities were profoundly moved. The reports that have been received from other sections of our land where this great missionary campaign has been in progress are equally encouraging.

The culmination of the campaign will come during the present month, when the Men's National Missionary Congress will be held in the city of Washington, D. C.

Christian people everywhere should remember this coming gathering in their prayers, for a great opportunity will be there presented to make a lasting impression that will have world-wide results in the prosecution of the missionary enterprise.

The Consecration of Time

Psalm 90:1-17.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Mar. 27. Youthful days. Eccl. 12:1-7.
T. Mar. 28. Consecrated days. Eph. 5:14-21.
W. Mar. 29. A motto for every day. I. Sam. 21:8.
T. Mar. 30. A consecrated day. Mark 11:1-11.
F. Mar. 31. Time well used. John 9:1-7.
S. Apr. 1. Prayer-time. Acts. 10:1-8.

The Psalm chosen for the Scripture lesson in connection with this topic is an inspired commentary on the duty of consecrating all our time to the service of God.

We ought to consecrate all our time to God, because all time belongs unto Him. He is the Eternal One. Whether our days and years be few or many, they are but an infinitesimal fraction of the eternity which belongs unto Him, who is our Heavenly Father.

Watch the Moments

If our hours are to be well spent, we must be careful as to how we dispose of each flying moment, for it is by the wise use of minutes that we make good use of the hours.

We are complex beings, and some of our time must be spent for work, some for play, and some for rest. In order to utilize our time wisely we must try to apportion to each of our legitimate daily pursuits the amount of time that properly belongs to it.

A well-balanced disposition of our time will result in a well-balanced life. Work, play, and rest should each have their proper allotment of time.

Time for God

It is a sad fact that there are a multitude of people who find time for everything in this world except for the service of God. They are diligent in business, they take proper recreation, they care for their health, they are reasonably faithful to their family obligations and their ordinary civic duties. But they are utterly oblivious of their obligations to God, and they give no part of their time to worship or to Christian service.

All our time belongs to God, and a reasonable portion of it should be used for definite and explicit service for the Kingdom.

An Eternity of Bliss

It is an inspiring thought to remember that the right use of our time here and now will result in an eternity of bliss. Our earthly life is a probation, as it were, and if we yield our time unto God now, He will care for us throughout eternity.

Wasted time is sure to bring lasting regret. Time is like a precious jewel, and it should be treasured as a costly diadem. There are certain railroad trains, which run on so close and rapid a schedule that if once they fall behind they can never reach their destination at the scheduled time. So in human life we can never really "make up for lost time." We can only do to-day's duty in to-day's time. We can not possibly do two days' work in one day's time. As has been wisely said, "You will have other days, but you will never again have this day. It is your last chance at this special portion of time."

What My Denomination Expects from Its Young People

Psalm 84:1-12.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Apr. 3. Co-operation. I Cor. 12:1-12.
T. Apr. 4. Gifts. II Cor. 9:1-5.
W. Apr. 5. Earnest prayer. Ps. 122:1-9.
T. Apr. 6. Zealous service. I Tim. 2:1-13.
F. Apr. 7. Willing testimony. Acts 5:17-29.
S. Apr. 8. Clean lives. Eph. 4:1-15.

The Christian Endeavor Society from its first inception has always strongly emphasized the principle of denominational loyalty. The wording of this topic is such as to suggest a renewed emphasis upon this thought.

While each denomination lays particular emphasis upon some distinctive feature, yet there are many things which are equally emphasized by all the various denominations comprising what may be called the evangelical Protestant church. In other words, what the Presbyterian church expects from its young people is the same as what is expected from the young people of the Baptist, the Congregational, the Methodist and all the other evangelical churches.

Loyalty to Principle

Each denomination expects its young people to be loyal to the fundamental principles that underlie the formation and the history of that branch of the Christian Church. The strength of any human organization lies in the degree of its solidarity, and there is no solidarity so great as that imparted by a common adherence to vital principles.

Each denomination expects the active support of its young people in the prosecution of the local church work. This includes attendance at the services of the church, the maintenance of the mid-week prayer meeting, the support of the Sunday School and the carrying forward of the Young People's Society and other forms of local church effort.

Each denomination expects its young people to sustain its missionary work in the home and foreign lands, both by giving their financial support and by offering themselves as missionary volunteers to fill up the ranks of those who are on the firing line of the missionary enterprise.

The Power of Denominational Effort

The strength of each denomination is in proportion to the closeness of the union which binds together the individual churches of that denomination. This union may involve strong denominational control, such as is illustrated in the Presbyterian form of government, or it may consist simply in the spirit of denominational fellowship which forms the link that binds together the churches of the Congregational form of government. But in any case it is the degree of real spiritual unity that exists between the individual churches of a given denomination that determines the actual strength of that body. And each denomination depends upon its young people for the development of that spirit of union which shall make it a strong power for good.

The one great reason why each denomination should strive for strength is that by united effort the world may be won for Christ. Strong churches make a strong denomination, and a strong denomination may in turn aid many weak churches to become strong.

Good Prayer Meetings and How to Have Them Always

Acts 12:1-17.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Apr. 10. Regular attendance. Heb. 10:23-25.
T. Apr. 11. Home prayer. Dan. 6:4-14.
W. Apr. 12. Love for the church. Ps. 84:1-12.
T. Apr. 13. Using our gifts. I Cor. 12:13-25.
F. Apr. 14. Studying the Bible. Ps. 119:106-112.
S. Apr. 15. Interest in others. Luke 6:27-38.

This is a vital topic, not only for the Young People's Society, but also for every church that maintains a mid-week service. Our Scripture selection tells of a prayer meeting which may well serve as an example for us in these modern days, for it had a definite object and it brought forth the desired result in the release from prison of the Apostle Peter, for whose welfare the church had united in earnest petition.

A Good Prayer Meeting

There are many elements that enter into a good prayer meeting. In the first place, a prayer meeting—to be really successful—should be full of prayer—not mere formal petition, but heartfelt communion with God the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ our Lord.

Hearty singing contributes a great deal toward making a good prayer meeting. The music at such a meeting should not be regarded as merely incidental, but should have as careful attention and as competent leadership as in the Sunday services of the church.

Prompt participation on the part of the laity is an essential factor in securing a worth-while prayer meeting. When the meeting is thrown open there should be no delay in using the time to the best advantage. Many an otherwise good prayer meeting has been killed by a painful pause, and many a pastor has gone home after the meeting utterly discouraged by the failure of his people to respond to the call to witness for the Master.

Genuine personal testimony is a helpful element in the making of a good prayer meeting. Some churches have abandoned the effort to elicit any verbal expression from those who are present at the prayer meeting, and depend entirely upon the minister to do the talking. But there is a power in testimony, and this power should not be overlooked.

The Scriptures should play a large part in every prayer meeting. They are the bread of life, and spiritual enlightenment comes only to those who feed upon the divine Word.

The presence of the Holy Spirit is a most essential element for a good prayer meeting. Without this there can be no lasting benediction. And the presence of the Spirit can be had only through much prayer.

To have such a meeting as has been outlined requires definite planning on the part of the leader and those who take part. It involves regular attendance, and the consecrated loyalty that finds expression in the Christian Endeavor pledge.

Where there is sincere effort to have a good prayer meeting along the lines that have been indicated there we may be sure of the Master's presence, for He has said, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

The Lessons of Our Immortality

Romans 6:1-23.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Apr. 17. Life a pilgrimage. Heb. 11:8-10, 14-16.
T. Apr. 18. Life a preparation. I Pet. 1:13-25.
W. Apr. 19. Life a growth. II Cor. 3:18.
T. Apr. 20. Life a responsibility. II Cor. 5:5-10.
F. Apr. 21. Death a doorway. Phil. 1:15-26.
S. Apr. 22. Hope breeds patience. II Cor. 4:14-18.

The most precious thought which the Eastertide brings to our minds is the blessed assurance of immortality through our risen Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

The subject of our immortality teaches us many lessons, of which we may emphasize, first, the privilege of exultation. It is natural and right that we should exult in the blessed truth that Christ has brought immortality to light. What was the dim conjecture and the faint hope of past generations has become the assured certainty of those whose life is hid with Christ in God.

The fact of our immortality brings to us the lesson of renunciation of sin. This is the great truth which the Apostle Paul develops in such masterly style in the chapter which has been assigned for this topic. The idea of living in sin is incompatible with the thought of eternal life, and Paul therefore urges those who have accepted the Gospel to show that they are truly saved by renouncing the dominion of sin in all its forms.

The assurance of immortality brings to us a great inspiration toward a high and noble life. Indeed, there is no greater incentive to a pure and noble life than the consciousness that we are to live forever. If man is but an animal whose life is terminated by the dissolution of the body, then there is a great temptation for him to live a purely animal life—a life that is of the flesh, fleshy. But if man is an immortal soul, then there is the greatest incentive to him to live a life that is spiritual.

The truth of our immortality imposes upon us the solemn duty of preparation for that eternal life which is the free gift of God in Christ Jesus our Lord. It is a solemn and yet a joyful duty, for the Christian life is essentially a joyful one, and righteousness brings gladness in its train.

The one thing that we can carry from earth into heaven is character. When we pass from the life that now is into the life that is to be eternal, the only thing that we can possibly take with us is the character that we have formed. In the light of this truth, how vital it is that we seek to build up a character that will stand the test not only of time, but of eternity.

Using Sunday for This World and the Next

Isaiah 58:1-14.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Apr. 24. Sabbath rest. Jer. 17:19-27.
T. Apr. 25. The Sabbath a reminder. Deut. 5:12-15.
W. Apr. 26. Sabbath worship. Acts. 16:12-24.
T. Apr. 27. Sabbath work. John 5:1-9.
F. Apr. 28. Sabbath meditation. Rev. 1:9-20.
S. Apr. 29. Sabbath fellowship. John 20:19-29.

The poet Longfellow has beautifully said that the Sabbath is the golden clasp which binds together the volume of the week. Let us consider carefully how we may realize this poetic description and make the Sabbath indeed the crowning day of all the week.

For Worship and Meditation

The primary use of the Sabbath is for worship. It is the day set apart for the services of the sanctuary and for the observance of the divine ordinances of our Christian faith. We should be in touch with our Heavenly Father at all times and in all places, but the Sabbath is the time and the sanctuary is the place of special privilege in the matter of holding fellowship and communion with God.

We live in a rushing age, but each Sabbath comes to us with an invitation to pause and meditate on the goodness of God. We are missing our opportunity if we fail to set apart some hour during the Sabbath Day when we can sit quietly and think on the things which are unseen but eternal.

For Fellowship and Service

The Sabbath is given to us not only for worship and meditation, but also for fellowship and service. It is a day wherein we should cultivate spiritual friendships and yield ourselves to Christian service for our brother man.

The sweetest fellowships that earth offers are those which are found in the association of believers in the work of the Kingdom. Let us make the most of these opportunities to enjoy fellowships which while formed on earth may continue in Heaven.

Guarding the Sabbath

In connection with this topic it would be well to sound a note of warning against the neglect and misuse of the Sabbath which are so prevalent in many quarters. Eternal vigilance is the price of safety, both with reference to this and other great features of our Christian civilization.

It is a mistake to think that we may become wealthy by robbing God of the Sabbath. To attempt to work seven days a week is to act in violation of the divinely-ordered plan, and disaster is sure to follow. "We are not poorer, but richer," says Macaulay, "because we have through many ages rested from our labor one day in seven."

The beneficent result of faithful Sabbath observance is well stated by Chief Justice Hale in the following words: "I have found that a due observance of the Sabbath has ever had joined to it a blessing on the other part of my time."

The Prince's Visit

BY BEULAH RECTOR.

NOTHING but a piece of news could have traveled through the village so rapidly. Within twenty minutes not a person could be found who hadn't heard the Prince was coming.

The Prince had never before been to Woodland, but it was said that he liked to go into the homes of the villagers to see what they were doing.

"And he has been known to leave a reward where he was most pleased," said the Valley Woman. She it was who saw the Prince when he arrived. "But he's come in the plainest style, only one servant, and on foot; I'm goin' to save that bottle of elderberry juice father gave me for a treat and give the Prince lemonade instead," she told her friend who lived on the hill.

"We must make a good beginning," counseled the man who had been chosen to guide the Prince's party through the neighborhood, "and so we will go first to the Millionaire's."

How the Millionaire did bustle round, showing them the great house that stood whitely against the blue sky, the rose gardens and the splashy fountain! And all the while he babbled about the cost of everything.

"Oh—oh!" exclaimed the Prince as they returned to the drive in front of the house, and the Millionaire began saying good-by, "this is all, then!"

"All?" The rich man's brows went together. "All? Why, there isn't a soul in the village who has the seventh of what you have seen here. I've spent all my life accumulating this."

"Yes, I begin to see; it has taken all your time to make yourself and your family comfortable." And he left the Millionaire with one pucker in his forehead and another in his heart.

The Landscape Painter's house was the next stop on their way up the road. In his workshop Joe Potter sat before a wide canvas. The visitors halted when they saw the picture.

"This is going to a home for crippled city children. They've never seen country woods in autumn, and I'm trying to put into this all the beauty I can."

"No business head—that fellow," muttered the guide in an undertone. "He has been offered a thousand dollars for that picture, and he's giving it away to a lot of cripples."

But the Prince turned to the artist with a glad smile. "You are a good man, else you could not paint as you do. May you live to bring beauty into many lives."

And the Landscape Painter was left with a new glow in his heart.

As the party journeyed up the road they overheard the high voice of Widow Rowe. "It's lucky I didn't pay but fifty cents to a dollar on my husband's debts or what would I have to-day to show the Prince? I'll tell you—not a roof over our heads."

"No?" said the onion man, already regretting he had not bought his supply of Grandma Seaver, who surely needed the money much more. "Maybe it isn't just houses the Prince has come all this way to see."

They had bidden the Widow Rowe good-day. The guide jerked his thumb toward the left. "Sam Pratt's farm," he announced. "Great worker is Sam. Milks fourteen cows night and morning. Spends all his time right here, seven days a week. Never goes to church nor anywhere else."

Our Little Folks

Sam himself limped out, showed them his cattle, his sheep, the fat mowings and quiet apple orchards for which he had slaved fifty years.

"Fine place, ain't it?" queried the guide afterward.

The Prince sighed. "A splendid farm, and no more."

In the grocery store they interrupted the old Grand Army veteran who was telling a story to the little chap who sat at the counter.

"How do you make your living when you spend so much time with your customers?" the guide asked.

"Oh, well, maybe I don't make such a wonderful living," chuckled the grocer, rubbing his palms together, "but I it's not fit for a Prince. Her roof leaks and when there's a shower she fills her rain-barrel in the sitting-room. Her nephew was going to mend the roof, but he had to work early mornings and the hammering disturbed the Millionaire. And the house never's been painted, though Joe did get out his brushes and pails to do it. You can see 'em yet where he left 'em on the woodshed. But he had to paint early mornings and the light of his lantern shined in and woke up the Millionaire. So he quit."

"What does this Grandma do?" asked the Prince.

"Oh," panted a little girl who had scrambled up the hill behind them and

"Millionaire's place, Joe Potter's, Sam Pratt's farm, what the widow saved not payin' Orin Rowe's debts—"

Tears stood in Grandma's eyes. "Dear, dear! what a lazy old body you'll think I be, havin' so little to show. Now I did have some preserves—"

"But she gave them all away," the little girl whispered behind her chubby hand.

"And in the winter I made some rag rugs."

"And paid out the money from them for the minister's lame boy's operation," put in a neighbor when Grandma had gone from the room to get the refreshment that she had saved for this great day.

"I generally have spice cakes along of this shrub," explained Grandma as she filled the glasses.

"But she's been away two days, takin' care o' a sick baby, an' 'as 'ad no time at the cookin'," quietly remarked a little woman.

"Maybe you'd like seein' these?" Grandma called, opening the door of an old-fashioned cabinet and lifting out a child's pewter cup. "My Georgie's that died," she told them, "and these be some garnets he picked up in the sand under the eaves when he was a little baby."

The Prince's face wore a wonderfully gentle look as he turned toward the poor old woman and said:

"In all this day I have not seen such treasures as you have accumulated, Grandma. You are a rich woman, with rubies of unselfishness, pearls of kindness, and diamonds of well-spent days. Now I want you to leave this little village where you have lived so beautifully all your life, and this cold, leaky house, and come back with me to the royal family in the Castle of Service to Others."

As the Lilies Do.

Yes, leave it with Him; the lilies all do,
And they grow,
They grow in the rain, and they grow in the dew—

Yes, they grow;
They grow in the darkness, all hid in the night,
They grow in the sunshine, revealed by the light—
Still they grow.

They ask not your planting, they need not your care
As they grow.

Dropped down in the valley, the field, anywhere—
There they grow;

They grow in their beauty, arrayed in pure white;
They grow, clothed in glory, by heaven's own light—
Sweetly grow.

The grasses are clothed and the ravens are fed
From His store;
But you who are loved and guarded and led
How much more

Will He clothe you, and feed you, and give you His care!
Then leave it with Him; He has, everywhere,
Ample store.

Then leave it with Him; 'tis more dear to His heart,
You will know,

Than the lilies that bloom, or the flowers that start
Neath the snow.

Whatever you need, if you ask it in prayer,
You can leave it with Him, you are His care,
You, you know. —SELECTED.

A NATURAL BRIDGE.

do get a sight of comfort as I go along. Little chap's pretty lonesome," he said as the child left the store. "Mother died last week. I haven't forgot what that means," drawing the back of his hand across his eyes.

The Prince nodded, as though he well understood, and his smile was something the faithful old soldier often remembered.

"An' that's everywhere," said the guide.

"There?" The Prince pointed to an old gray place that looked as though it had seen all the varieties of weather for all the years.

"No, of course not," pouted the guide. "Only a poor old woman lives there. She hasn't anything to show you. And heard the question. "she waves her hand and smiles at us when we go to school—Jimmy and I. And gives us cookies, an' tells us 'bout the log-cabin that used to be where her house is."

Before they had time to knock, Grandma was in the doorway in a clean apron.

"Well, well, well; I've been a-waitin' and a-waitin'." She opened the door wide. "Come in. And here be some more folks that I cal'late's hankering to see you," straightening her glasses to look up the road. "Come in, neighbors; come in, all of you."

"Where you been to-day?" the little girl asked, following the party indoors and sitting down by the guide. "And what did you see?"

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

"Precious Jewel"

By Jean Mather Beeman

ONE Autumn afternoon there arrived at the Missionary Compound at Wei Hsien, Shantung, China, a very weary, sad-faced, terrified young Chinese girl of fifteen years.

Groping her way into one of the foreign homes, she told in faltering words the following story:

"I have come two hundred miles to study your 'Jesus Doctrine.' My husband has just died. He learned something about your faith, and it was his dying request that I come here to Wei Hsien to study at the Bible Training School taught by your Mrs. Lu. His last words to me were these: 'Gin Bao (Precious Jewel), as soon as I am buried, I want you to go at once to Wei Hsien and learn all you can about Christianity—then I want you to go forth to tell others the Good News.'"

The little widow wiped away the fast-falling tears with a large flowered handkerchief as she continued:

"It seemed such a very long way to come—and I was so afraid! But a neighbor of mine gave me a charm which she said would surely ward off all evil influences and protect me during the journey and all the time that I was here in the Compound among strangers. When the funeral expenses were all paid there was not anything left, but some good friends raised the money with which to hire a donkey for me—so here I am!"

Mrs. Lu Kwei Lan, the wonderful leader of the Bible Training School for Women at Wei Hsien, was immediately summoned. She gave a very cordial welcome to the tired little traveler, taking the girl to her own home for a hot supper and a good night's rest before she inquired further into her story.

However, Mrs. Lu's curiosity prompted her to inquire, as she and her guest lingered over their delicious tea-drinking:

"How does it come that you, a heathen girl, are called 'Gin Bao' (Precious Jewel)? That is a very unusual name!"

The maiden's face instantly brightened as she made reply:

"My parents called me simply 'Kou' (Enough) because I was the fourth girl in the family and they wished no more daughters. My husband called me that, too, until he began to study your religion. One day he heard a Christian Bible woman singing the beautiful hymn, 'Precious Jewels,' and immediately he decided that he would change my name and so he called me 'Gin Bao,' showing that he truly loved me, and it made me very glad!"

The days that followed were filled with new and strange experiences for the girl-widow, who for the first time in her life saw what the missionaries were really doing for the people of her Province.

Soon it became known that the "charm" was the cause of many mysterious whisperings in the Training School, and one day Mrs. Lu heard of it, when a young woman came to her, saying in a voice of horrified awe:

"'Full of Grace's Wife' is wearing a charm lent her by 'Precious Jewel' as a cure for some trifling illness!"

Going at once to visit the patient and to investigate the "charm," it was discovered that to an old American compass in a somewhat battered case was all the virtue attributed!

Naturally very bright and eager to learn, "Precious Jewel" put forth every effort in her book-work and her quietness grew steadily. She thoroughly enjoyed the delightful associations with the new students, and her spirit of helpfulness and her readiness to see and do anything wanted was very marked. Her growth spiritually and mentally was a great joy to Mrs. Lu, who had become devotedly attached to the young girl. One Sabbath morning in the Spring of the next year "Precious Jewel" united with the Wei Hsien Church, publicly confessing her faith in the Master and her desire to dedicate her life to His work.

Just as the second year in the Bible Training School came to an end, a Christian young man from a village about twenty miles west of Wei Hsien City, made inquiries through a "go-between" as to the possibility of winning Gin Bao as his bride. All the various preliminaries having been satisfactorily arranged, they were married at the Compound Church, the students of the Institute joining together in giving their favorite a great feast, long to be remembered by all who were present.

"Precious Jewel" and her husband, Mr. Wing, went to live in a village five miles nearer Wei Hsien, opening up a little dry goods shop, and immediately they began in the newly established home to gather in a number of inquirers, both men and women. From time to time there reached the Wei Hsien friends very glowing stories of "The church that is in their house" and of the earnestness and activity of both in spreading the sweet old Message of the Christ.

At the urgent invitation of "Precious Jewel," Mrs. Lu and one of the missionary ladies of Wei Hsien went to pay her a visit. When they reached the village a warm greeting awaited them! Their young hostess stood outside her door with a bright smile on her pretty face, and her husband from behind his shop-counter beamed all over his honest, rugged countenance!

After giving her guests a refreshing lunch, "Precious Jewel" took them to see the little "church" in their house. The front guest hall had been fitted up and set apart as a chapel; it was furnished with nice benches, and had a combined desk, lectern and pulpit, which stood at one side of the top of the building; in the center, behind narrow rails, stood a miniature Holy Table and along the top of the covering cloth were the Chinese characters for the words: "This do in remembrance of Me." Upon the front of the cloth was a cross of gold paper. The walls were adorned with various scrolls, presented at the church opening, and high up, over the table, was a red silk one, bearing in black velvet letters the words, "God is Love."

The whole place was so well cared for and so immaculately neat that her friends felt it was no mere place of assembly, but a veritable house of God, to its owners. The "Prophet's chamber" was equally attractive—a room in which it was a real pleasure to rest.

Next "Precious Jewel" led her guests out along the streets of the little village to visit some of those to whom she had already carried the Message of life, and of whom some had not only listened to it, but had accepted it, too, and their faces fairly shone with "the Peace which passeth all understanding."

In the evening quite a few of the villagers gathered in, most of whom "Precious Jewel" had taught regularly, with the result that they were able to answer well the questions put to them regarding their knowledge of the "Jesus Doctrine."

The Sunday services were generally conducted by Mr. Wing, who, as a voluntary worker, made himself responsible for them. Pastoral supervision and visits came from Wei Hsien whenever possible, and soon it is hoped that they may have a pastor all their own who will devote his entire time to work in the village.

When Mrs. Lu and the lady missionary were ready to start homeward toward Wei Hsien they were given a royal send-off, not only by their host and hostess, but every by the heathen people, who joined heartily in the friendly adieus.

The guests with very full hearts bade "Goodbye" to "Precious Jewel." They had been greatly strengthened and encouraged by all they had seen in that gracious Christian household. They realized that it was only a Divine power which had so transformed the shy, ignorant, terror-stricken girl-widow of a few years previous into the intelligent, efficient and radiantly happy Christian wife and earnest worker for the Master in the new home where God had placed her, and where she is daily influential in leading other lives from darkness to Light!

Why the Japanese Welcome the Sunday School

One of the movements fostered by the World's Sunday School Association is a campaign in one hundred of the cities of Japan to arouse pastors and Sunday School teachers to the importance of religious education. The Secretary of the National Sunday School Association of Japan, Rev. H. Kawasumi, reports a visitation of sixteen cities as a part of this program. In the town of Tsu they found an Episcopal minister who had five hundred students enrolled in his Sunday School as the result of three years' work. The Chief of Police told this minister that they had had many criminal children in Tsu, but the number had greatly decreased since the Sunday School had been started.

The reason for the great interest in the Sunday School, which is felt in Japan, is found in a significant statement made by Baron Shibusawa during his recent tour of America. The Baron said that for many years he had had a longing in his heart for something that would build up the moral character of the Japanese youth—a "Something" which seemed to be lacking; and that, as he had gone about through the land, he suddenly realized that the Sunday schools in Japan were securing exactly the results he had had in mind. "If this is what the Sunday School can accomplish," he said, "we will welcome the next World's Sunday School Convention to Tokyo."

The Easter Lily

By Helen M. Richardson.

*A sunbeam kissed a bud of green;
Its folded leaves uncurled,
And sent an Easter lily out
Into a frost-bound world.
Its subtle fragrance filled the air,
And people turned to see
The beauty of the perfect flower
The sunbeam had set free.*

*It gave its sweetness without stint
Or thought of a return;—
So much from e'en a simple flower
Our untrained hearts might learn.
The folded sweetness of a life
No one can truly know,
Unless, like Easter lily buds,
God's sunshine bids it grow.*

Testaments for Russian Soldiers

A recent cablegram from Petrograd to the Associated Press states that the Empress of Russia has sent a letter to John Kilburn, secretary of the National Bible Society, expressing thanks on behalf of Grand Duke Alexis, the nine-year-old heir apparent to the Russian throne, for a number of Testaments given by American Sunday School children to the Russian soldiers. The letter was prompted by an installment of 8,000 Testaments which, it says, will be sent to the army by the Empress' own supply train, in the name of the young Grand Duke. Thirty-three thousand Testaments have already been distributed among the Russian soldiers.

The World's Sunday School Association has collected—principally from the Sunday School children of America—over $21,000, which has been the means of supplying more than four hundred thousand Testaments among the soldiers of Europe. There is an increasing call for these Testaments. One soldier writes: "These books are precious to us in ordinary times, and are much more precious in critical moments as now."

Quakers on the War Path

The liquor traffickers have aroused a fighting spirit in the Quakers. These quiet, peaceful Friends object to the liberties taken with their name by the brewers and distillers, and they are back of a bill now before Congress prohibiting the use of that name in advertising. They will fight until "Quaker" whiskey and "Quaker" beer are eliminated from the list of poison drinks.

IN THE MISSION FIELDS

Burden Bearers of India

Some time ago Rev. A. C. Clayton, Secretary of the Tamil Publication Committee of the Christian Literature Society for India, sent an interesting photograph to the American Tract Society, which is reproduced on this page.

This picture shows us two Indian coolies, husband and wife, who, after the typical custom of India, are carrying bundles of considerable size upon their heads.

One interesting feature in the woman's apparel should not escape our notice. It is referred to by Mr. Clayton in these words:

"Every respectable Tamil woman wears jewels in her ear, and, as a rule, the wealthier her husband is the more jewels she puts into her ears as a visible proof of her prosperity. Even the women of the poorer classes have their ears bored for jewels, especially the lobe of the ear, where a large ornament called the 'Kammal' is worn.

"Sometimes, however, as in the case of the woman that appears in this picture, the woman may never gather enough money to buy the coveted 'Kammal.' In that case, she makes the best of things by rolling up a long strip of palm leaf like a watch spring and inserting that into the lobe of her ear where the 'Kammal' should be put, as may be seen in the picture. And so there is a Tamil proverb which runs, 'The ear with a strip of palm leaf in it is better than the ear that has no ornament at all'—which is another way of saying, 'Half a loaf is better than no bread.'"

Mr. Clayton goes on to compare the insufficient means provided by American Christians for the support of the missionary work in India with the strip of palm leaf used by the poor woman in place of the more costly ornament that is worn by her more fortunate sisters. The situation serves to remind him of another Tamil proverb, which reads, "The orphan must use the juice of the Iluppai tree for sugar." The juice of the Iluppai tree, says Mr. Clayton, is very insipid stuff, but the orphan must take what he can get. Sugar will not come his way, so he must be content with the sap of the jungle tree. Yet even the meager remittances that are received from the home field are "more cheering than the juice of the Iluppai tree," says this brave and devoted missionary, who is giving his life for the enlightenment of the heathen through the ministry of the gospel in the printed page.

The Mission Press in North Siam

A Mission Press is maintained among the Laos people at Chiang Mai, in North Siam. This Press has been aided for many years by cash appropriations from the American Tract Society. Rev. Dr. D. G. Collins has been the manager of this Press since it was first founded in 1892 and has sent the following report of the past year's work:

"We now have six presses, two of them being of the cylinder type. Throughout the year we have employed twenty-five men and five women.

"Many times during the year visitors have spoken of the new addition to the press building as being so light, cool and roomy; we certainly have appreciated it after our former years of cramped quarters.

"In Mission and Bible Society work we keep five men employed all the time setting Laos type, while we employ three and sometimes four setting Siamese and English.

"Two items are of special interest. Early in the year Second Epistle to the Corinthians was printed, which completed the New Testament in the Laos language. One of the first jobs that we did for the American Bible Society, twenty-five years ago, was to print the first edition of Matthew. Not since the press was established has the Mission ever been able to set a man apart for direct translation work. Our missionaries have had their hands more than full with evangelistic and medical work, so that translation work, of necessity, has had to take second place. We trust the work has been so well done and so thoroughly revised that from this time on very few changes in the text will be necessary.

"The other item of special interest is the publication of the Laos hymnal. This also was completed early in the year. We issued an edition of 1,000 copies with the music and 6,000 with words only. The book contains 369 hymns. A good many hundred copies have gone out during the year. With the whole Press has been supplying each station and missionary, free of cost, with tracts, small hymnals and leaflets as called for in our evangelistic work. We are grateful to the American Tract Society for its gift of $50 to help meet this additional expense. During the year a total of 192,118 copies of publications were printed, comprising 7,674,000 pages."

A Year's Work in China

The Rev. Hunter Corbett, D.D., of Chefoo, China, in sending in his report of the year's work, tells several interesting facts concerning the recent additions to the church. He writes:

"One of the men baptized was a military man aged sixty-four years. He had Chinese army for ten years. He was able to read well and had carefully studied the Bible and Christian books. He said there were several soldiers in the same camp with him who believe in their hearts in Jesus, but had not yet the grace and courage to profess conversion openly.

"Work at Chefoo Station Chapel and Museum has been carried on as follows: During six days each week this place is opened from 9 a. m. to 12 noon and from 2 p. m. to 5 p. m. Preachers take turns in preaching, not only in the front chapel, but also in the guest room, where many assemble after visiting the Museum. During the past five months, by actual count, 39,161 persons have heard the gospel preached there. During one holiday, when only women and small children were admitted to the Museum, 5,275 visited the place. Our Bible women and many others of the Christian women spent the day giving all a hearty welcome and doing all they could to make known Jesus and His power to save. Each was given a short printed prayer and tracts to take to their homes. During the entire year there has been fully 80,000 in attendance. Tracts have been given freely and many gospel portions and Christian books have been sold. It is hoped a great revival will soon bring many to a saving knowledge of the truth."

A Faithful Witness

A little over a year ago, in one of the counties of Korea, there was organized into a church a group of forty earnest Christian men and women. Among this number was a young woman by the name of Mary, the daughter of Peter Kim. At the time of her conversion she was eighteen years old. After the conversion of her parents she became possessed of a passion for spiritual truth and a hungering and thirsting after the grace of God and the cross of Christ. However, before she became a Christian she had been betrothed by her parents into a heathen home. This was a great disappointment to her, but she began to pray that God would lead her betrothed and all the members of his family to Christ. In October of last year she bade farewell to all the loved ones in her home and turned her face to the home of her future husband. She arrived on the day set for the ancestral worship in the home.

As she saw them arrange the ancestral tablet and the sacrifice to be offered to the departed spirits of the family she was deeply grieved, but receiving great courage, she stood up before the ancestral tablet and, facing this company of strangers, among whom was her husband, she began to exhort them to put away such heathen customs and to believe in her God. This was a great insult to this heathen company. They all became excited and cried out, "She is crazy." Their excitement soon turned into rage, and in a great uproar exclaimed, "If the King of heaven had not brought this daughter here we would have had a good time." The company broke up and, needless to say, there was no sacrifice that day. The guests all greatly repined over this affair.

This girl now faced a difficult and delicate situation, but God gave her grace and wisdom to meet it. She entered upon her duties as a wife and daughter-in-law in a beautiful Christian spirit and was obedient, faithful and unselfish to all the household. Not a day passed but what in the midst of all her work and changed surroundings she looked up to the Unseen and breathed a prayer that her husband and all the members of his family might soon become Christians.

Her prayers were soon answered. The family, being wonderfully touched by her life, soon sought her Christ, and now she, her husband and the other members of the family, nine in all, are living a united and happy life.

BURDEN BEARERS OF INDIA

of the New Testament and nine books of the Old Testament printed in Laos, the hymnal and three catechisms, besides a number of other works already printed, there is no good reason why our Christian people should not grow both in grace and knowledge.

"The native paper in the vernacular, with the Sabbath School helps, has been issued every month. Over 1,000 copies of this valuable paper go into the homes of our Laos Christian people. The Laos News (in English), with about 1,000 names on our mailing list, has been issued quarterly. No other new work of importance has been issued during the year, but 70,000 copies of old and new tracts have been printed. There is always a growing demand for our Christian tracts; in fact, many of those who are searching for light prefer a tract to a portion of Scripture, even though it be a child's catechism.

"As in previous years, this Mission been for a number of years at the head of the Chefoo police. When the revolution visited Chefoo three years ago this man came to us in the night saying there was a plot to take his life and he requested permission to sleep on the school premises. By paying a large sum of money to the leaders of the revolution he was permitted to resign his office and promised protection. He began studying the Scriptures and attended the church services. Last September he sent to inquire if the session of the church could not visit him in his home, as he wished to openly profess Jesus Christ and receive baptism, as he was unable to leave his room. He gave good evidence of faith and trust in Jesus and was received. He died soon afterward a peaceful death. His last words were pleading with his family to believe in Jesus and meet him in heaven. Another man received into the church was a soldier aged thirty years. He had been in the

Among the Beauty of the Lilies

By Grace Boteler Sanders

SINCE eight o'clock that morning there had been a stream of people pouring up the stairs and into the Court Room. There were negroes in tattered garments and white men in shabby clothes; there were women and children whose drawn faces told stories of lives of suffering, and there were present, too, sitting over against the wall, as far away as possible from the unfortunates, business men who had come as spectators—men with smiling and sarcastic faces, men in good clothes, with glittering watch chains and dazzling diamonds and pockets well filled with jingling coin.

Just as the great clock in the Court House tower rang out in sonorous tones the hour of nine the reporters took their chairs before a table in front; the prosecuting attorney seated himself; the policeman assumed an air of importance and the Judge, a tall young man with piercing black eyes, scanned his audience. He nodded to the row of business men sitting against the wall; so far as the others were concerned, his face might have been made of stone, for all he appeared to care. Then suddenly another man rose in the foreground and the would-be witnesses were all attention.

to unlock the grated door which separated the court room from the temporary jail. There was an echo of feet as he passed down the corridor and in a moment he returned with his first prisoner.

A murmur of surprise passed over the room. No one in that motley throng was connected with this girl. A quick survey of the astonished faces indicated that this prisoner who stood before the bar of justice was a stranger. She was a slim, young woman in a shabby black gown, but her face was dainty and delicate as a flower and she swayed as uncertainly before the wave of public opinion arrayed against her, as a flower sways when attacked by a March wind. There was a frightened look in her eyes, like that of a hunted deer, and she nervously brushed back the dark hair which lay over her high, white forehead. Her lips, which once had smiled, were compressed until they were but a scarlet line to relieve the whiteness of her face.

"Your name?" demanded the Judge. "State your case."

The girl swallowed several times and moistened her thin lips, but the words would not come. How could she speak? But again she heard the words, "Your name?" and the voice was terse and commanding.

"You may call me Clara Conover," she said, brokenly. "No, sir, I don't live here. I came from the country last fall and have been working here ever since. I lost my position a few weeks and so the landlady concluded she couldn't keep me any longer, since I was not sure of work. I started yesterday and walked all day. I did without my lunch, and when night came I was so discouraged and tired that I felt I couldn't walk another step. I went into the depot to rest a little while, but they saw I wasn't traveling and told me to move on. I'd never asked for charity," the girl's white throat swelled, "but I concluded I'd have to, just for one night," her eyes pleaded with her audience for clemency. "I didn't know the way to the Mission and there was no one to ask. I left the depot and started down the street. I didn't even know the way and I felt that, as tired as I was, I must not waste any steps. I saw a nice looking old man coming around the corner. He reminded me of my father." There was a sob in the confession. "I didn't think of any harm when I started to ask him the way, but the policeman was coming out of the saloon and saw me and he came up and accused me of all kinds of awful things," a red line spread from forehead to cheek, "and when the man would not accuse me the policeman took me to jail, anyway, for something I never thought of doing. Your honor, I am only a country girl who had no thought of evil. Oh, let me go home!"

The Judge looked expectantly to the officer, who stood listening. There was a sarcastic smile upon his face. He shrugged his shoulders. "If she hadn't done nothing I wouldn't have run her in, believe me," he swaggered. "She's pretty smooth, but not smooth enough to fool Paddy Ryan. I tell you she's an old offender."

The testimony of a by-stander came next and the outcome of the matter was that a sentence of thirty days' imprisonment and costs was imposed upon the prisoner. For a moment the girl stood speechless; then with a shriek and a spring she covered the distance between herself and the Judge and fell at his feet. "Oh, don't," she gasped. "Think of my mother! We're nice folks back home, the best in the country, though we're not rich. I was foolish to leave there, but I wanted finery"—a queer expression passed over the Judge's face—"and mother couldn't give it to me."

"Many a girl has gone on the rocks because of the same thing," remarked the Judge. "Spend your time in jail and repent. I believe you'll go home a better girl."

"I'm not a bad girl, I'm not, I'm not," shrieked the accused, but the policeman led her away, thrust her into a cell and the wheels of justice ground on.

For a long time the girl lay on the dirty floor of the cell, but after a while the Judge's mocking voice, the policeman's face and the rattle of the cars faded away and memory showed her a little white house among blossoming apple trees and a little white bedroom where she had every morning opened her eyes to glory in the sunshine, and a little mother whose hair was as white as her face and her life. Why had she left all this?

Spring birds were now beginning to sing there. Her mother was praying, possibly for her. Why was she here? When her father died and all the property had gone except the little home and a few acres, which were barely enough to keep mother and daughter, the girl fretted because she could not have silk dresses and a motor car and a summer trip to the seashore, like her more fortunate companions. She had begged and teased, and when all these things were ineffectual she concluded she would go to the city and make a fortune. And when her mother would not consent to that plan, the angered girl took matters in her own hands.

Early one morning, when the red sun was just opening its eyes, Eda crept away from the white bedroom and the white life, and when daylight came and her mother called she was on the Fast Flyer going farther and farther away. She had intended to write home as soon as she reached the city, but she was too ashamed. She thought she would wait until she made a success.

She planned how she would send her mother a splendid check and ask for forgiveness, but when her money was gone she found it hard to pay expenses, and when spring came and the clerks came out in pretty new garments she was given her discharge because she was so shabby. She asked the manager how she could "dress fine and live on five dollars per week," but the door was slammed in her face for her pains. It had ended thus. Thanksgiving and Christmas and New Year had gone. Unless someone interfered, she would spend Easter in a cell. Oh, the awfulness of it!

But who in that great city could know or care? The patrol wagon took Eda Harris with a crowd of others to the city jail and she was set to work. Her hands were busy during those trying days and her thoughts were busy, too, but it was not repentance of which she was thinking. It was of the injustice of it all and the awfulness of the thought that she could never go back home! How could she take a jail record, however innocent she might be, into that snow-white house?

One bright spring morning, when the sun was shining and the crocuses on the Court House lawn had opened their golden eyes, Eda Harris walked down the steps of the prison and out into God's outdoors. Spring was changing things even in the city. The parks were robed in green. Tulips and daisies nodded in the round beds. The big trees were covered with flowers and she thought hungrily of home and the creek bank where the early violets bloomed.

Drearily she walked down the street to the great stores which were filled with things. She stopped before the window of a department store, a pathetic figure in her shabby winter garments, but she was not looking at the dainty hats or gorgeous laces.

HEALTH AND INCOME

Both Kept Up on Scientific Food.

Good, sturdy health helps one a lot to make money. With the loss of health one's income is liable to shrink, if not entirely dwindle away.

When a young lady has to make her own living, good health is her best asset. "I am alone in the world," writes a Chicago girl, "dependent on my own efforts for my living. I am a clerk, and through close application to work and a boarding-house diet, I became nervous, and got so bad off it was almost impossible for me to keep up in the office.

"A friend suggested to me the idea of trying Grape-Nuts food, which I did, making it a large part of at least two meals a day.

"To-day I am free from dyspepsia and the ills of an overworked and improperly nourished brain and body. To Grape-Nuts I owe the recovery of my health, and the ability to retain my position and income." "There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

What would the above letter? A new one appeared from time to time. They were genuine, true, and full of human interest.

She was scanning memory's fond pictures of the beauties of the farm. Oh, how she longed for home! How differently Easter was celebrated here and there.

Last year and every year since she could remember, Eda Harris had carried a sheaf of lilies from her mother's garden to the little church on Easter Sunday. When she could scarcely lisp His name she had sung a song, "God Will Take Care of You." And she had believed it and rejoiced in it. But had He taken care of her? He had, but—again a song reminded, "It May Not Be My Way, It May Not Be Thy Way." He had cared for her, but He had allowed her to suffer for her sin. She must go home. She whirled abruptly and started across the street, and then an old stone church seemed to suddenly rise from the midst of the rush of the city.

The church had been there for many years, but Eda Harris had not noticed it. To her just now the open door seemed a haven of refuge, for, coming down the street, with heavy tread and swinging club, she saw the policeman with his sarcastic, evil face. Like a poor little bird fleeing from a hawk, she darted into the church door and up through the darkened aisles. Trembling, she sank into a pew and buried her hot face in the velvet cushions.

For a long time she lay there trembling. After a while she gained courage enough to open her eyes. She could not keep them closed, for the place was filled with the perfume of the lilies. Yes, she sighed blissfully. The dim light which burned over the altar showed her lilies—golden-hearted, such as were blooming even now in her mother's garden. There were palms and ferns all about them, but they were lilies just the same. She sat up and took a long breath. A girl stood by the organ.

MORE THAN EVER Increased Capacity for Work Since Leaving Off Coffee.

Many former coffee drinkers who have mental work to perform day after day, have found a better capacity and greater endurance by using Postum instead of coffee. An Illinois woman writes:

"I had drank coffee for about twenty years, and finally had what the doctor called 'coffee heart.' I was nervous and extremely despondent; had little mental or physical strength left; had kidney trouble and constipation.

"The first noticeable benefit which followed the change from coffee to Postum was the improved action of the kidneys and bowels. In two weeks my heart action was greatly improved and my nerves steadier.

"Then I became less despondent, and the desire to be active again showed proof of renewed physical and mental strength.

"I formerly did mental work and had to give it up on account of coffee, but since using Postum I am doing hard mental labor with less fatigue." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:

Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly, 30c and 50c tins.

Both forms are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

Eda saw her quite plainly, but the girl's eyes were fixed upon a window high up in the gallery where the risen Christ was pictured ascending and accompanied by a host of angels.

"Christ, the Lord, is risen to-day,
Sons of men and angels say;
Raise your joys and triumphs high,
Sing, ye heavens, and earth reply."

It was the same hymn—the very same which they had sung at home. Eda Harris began to sob. She sobbed until she could not control her voice, and just when she thought she could not stand her sorrow another moment a firm hand was laid upon her shoulder and a voice asked, "What are you doing here?"

Self-preservation was her first thought. She sprang to her feet and glared into the face of a kind-faced man in clerical garments.

"I wasn't doing anything—only listening," she replied, almost sullenly.

"Why were you crying? Don't think me interfering. I am your friend and wish to help you," was the response.

It was the first kind voice, the first sympathetic face which she had seen in many a day. "Sit down. I am pastor of this church. No one will annoy you," persisted the minister, gently laying his hand on her shoulder and looking into her eyes. "Sit down and tell me all."

Her story did not take long to tell. The minister's face grew very serious when she sketched the scene in the court room. But when she had finished, he looked at his watch. "You have done wrong, child, in leaving your dear mother and keeping her in ignorance as to your safety all this time," he said; "but pride often leads us into sin. Pride drove you away. We must be content with what we have. Pride kept you here. Pride, I fear, would have still kept you from home and mother and, eventually, God, if I had not found you. You must go home."

"I haven't any money, and even though I had, maybe mother wouldn't want me," she objected.

The minister smiled a slow, sweet smile. "There are few mothers who will not receive a penitent child," he said. "Mothers are like the Christ in that way. They are always calling their prodigals. Even though your sins had been as scarlet, your mother would have forgiven you at this Easter time. I have a fund which our girls have placed at my disposal. They call themselves the King's Daughters and are banded together to help just such cases as this."

Eda Harris was sitting up very straight, watching with starry eyes the minister's kind face. "We have just time to catch that evening train. Come, I will buy your ticket and see that you are started right, and when you get back to the country, my dear, give thanks to God who opened your eyes at this Easter time, and stay with your mother. Will you?"

"It will be like heaven to have the chance," sobbed Eda.

Later, when the evening train shot out from the city's grime, a young girl in a shabby black gown sat among the red cushions of the observation car. Her face was shining and her lips were smiling and she was singing under her breath.

The Easter sun had arisen when Eda Harris had reached the little house among the apple trees. She stopped to gather her sheaf of lilies, and then, with reverent feet, she sought her mother's chamber. Mother was kneeling by her bed. Her hair and her face were whiter than ever before, and as the girl waited there she heard the plaintive cry: "And, O God, if it is Thy will, send my child home today."

Eda Harris sank upon her knees. "Mother, I have sinned against heaven and against thee"—she began.

But there was time for no more. Her mother turned, looked, clasped her in her arms, then cried in reverent, worshipful tones: "Glory to God in the highest. My child who was lost is found. Come, let us go to the house of the Lord and praise Him for all his benefits."

On that Easter day Eda Harris sat by her mother in the old pew and worshipped with reverent heart among the lilies.

Keeping the Line Clear

BY JOHN L. PERHAM.

When taking a drive recently I noticed that the telephone men were busy cutting down both dead trees and young growing ones that were reaching up toward the wires, so that they might not interfere with the telephone service. The business of the telephone company is only begun when a line has been established connecting one town with another, for the line must be kept clear. All visible obstructions must be removed, and threatening ones must be anticipated and eliminated before they cause trouble and inconvenience.

There is a line of communication between earth and heaven. It has been established by the Triune God of the unseen world, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and it is for the use of all who will conform to the rules given in the inspired Book of instructions which is furnished to users of the line.

If the Christian allows some obstruction to interfere with his communication with the spiritual world, it is his own fault. The task of keeping the line clear has been left in his hands. Nevertheless he sometimes becomes negligent of his task and, finding that the line is not clear, he complains that the service is not good.

Whatever comes between the Christian and his God must be removed or the connection will be broken and repeated endeavors to establish communication will prove a failure.

Not long ago a man who is an official in the church said to me, "I cannot pray with liberty when a certain person is present; there seems to be something in the atmosphere that hinders me. I feel that that person is a hypocrite and my enemy, and perhaps he feels the same way toward me. There must be something wrong somewhere."

I could but admit that there surely must be some serious trouble. For one to acknowledge that the line by which he communicates with heaven is not clear, shows the need of something being done to remedy the existing conditions. If the other party shares the same feeling, then two fellow church members are allowing an unchristian attitude to develop which will continue to interfere with their free use of the system of communication given by the Lord until they set themselves to the task of keeping clear the line.

The line between earth and heaven must be jealously guarded, for it is only by eternal vigilance that the liberty intended to be man's priceless blessing is retained.

Keep the line clear, dear reader. You not only need to use it yourself, but you will need to use it for others who have not yet become patrons of it.

Keep the line clear, as you value your own spiritual advancement and your ability to help others.

It is high time that the axe was laid at the root of whatever has become or threatens to become an obstruction on your prayer line, lest at some time of dire need you find that the connection has been severed through allowing some unchristian act or attribute of character to flourish at the expense of your Christian life and influence. Keep the line clear.

Wishbone and Backbone

"Don't carry your wishbone where your backbone ought to be," says a writer in a current magazine. A piece of excellent advice which we all need, is it not? How much time we waste in wishing that things were other than they are; that our environment were different from what it is; that we were physically or morally or spiritually stronger than we know ourselves to be! Is it too much to say that the two little words, "I wish," express the normal attitude of mind of a large number of people? I do not suggest that the exercise of will power can altogether change our environment or give us bodily health, but it might help to do both. It is of no use to ourselves or to others to spend our time and energy of soul in wishing that we and the world were better. It would be of a very great deal of use were we to exercise our will power in the matter; if, instead of saying, "I wish I were better," "I wish the world were better," we were to say, "I will be better, and I will do my part in making the world better, God helping me." If we, you and I, are to do any good work in our own souls or in the world, we must leave off saying, "I wish," and begin to say, "I will."

Missionary Work

If humanity is in need, to supply that need is missionary work.

If a cup of cold water, or a cup of hot tea, or a loaf of bread is borne to the suffering, that is missionary work.

If a kind word is spoken to one in sorrow, that is missionary work.

If a dime is given to one who is in penury, or a luncheon served to one who is famishing, that is missionary work.

If a burden is lifted from the shoulders of a neighbor in his weakness and carried upon one's own shoulders, that is missionary work.

If a call is made on one who is in trouble, or a prayer offered by the bedside of one in pain, that is missionary work.

If one goes out in the name of Jesus to tell of His great salvation, that is missionary work.

If another is sick, and unable to plow his field or reap his harvests and one perform a neighbor's duty toward him, that is missionary work.

If one lies bleeding on the field of battle, or suffering in a hospital, and you, in your sympathy, bring what help you can to alleviate that one's distress, that is missionary work.

If you have a book in your possession which might prove a blessing to a wayward friend, or to one needing instruction in right things, and you loan or give that book to such a person with the request that it be read, that is missionary work.

If you have a flower which you can give, and by giving it bring a smile of hopefulness, or kindle a happier desire in the soul of another, that is missionary work.

If there is a poor boy or girl anywhere who is longing for an education, and who is without means to gratify the desire of the heart, and you give what help you can, that is missionary work.

If you send one to stand in your place in the foreign field, or in the home field, to do Christ's work, that is missionary work.

If you desire to go to any spot in God's great universe where you can be of service to the Lord of us all and by God's grace bring that desire to its realization, that is missionary work.

If in your soul you desire to be of help to your fellow man, even though that desire may never be accomplished, even that desire, in God's sight will be counted unto you as missionary work.

If you train your own soul and make your life a lighthouse for Jesus, and shine for Him in the home, and on the farm, in the workshop, and the street, that is missionary work.

This old world is as full of opportunities for missionary service as the heavens are full of stars and he who will look up will see more than he can count.

Moonshine States

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue reports that 810,503 gallons of moonshine liquor were confiscated by government officials last year. Of this amount only 3,582 gallons were seized in prohibition States—in Arizona (which was a dry State only the latter half of the government's fiscal year), 2,146 gallons; Georgia, 1,209 gallons; North Carolina, 357; Tennessee, 12½; and in the prohibition States of Maine, Kansas, North Dakota, Oklahoma and West Virginia not one gallon. Nearly 807,000 gallons were seized in wet States, New York State contributing more than any State which was under prohibition the whole of the last fiscal year—June 30, 1914, to June 30, 1915.

The Beauty of Work

The beauty of work depends upon the way we meet it—whether we arm ourselves each morning to attack it as an enemy that must be vanquished before night comes, or whether we open our eyes to the sunrise to welcome it as an approaching friend who will keep us delightful company all day, and who will make us feel at evening that the day was well worth its fatigues.

The Keeping of the Soul

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER MACCOLL.

I SUPPOSE there is no subject on which it is quite so difficult to speak to a modern congregation as the keeping of the soul. To many minds it is at once suggestive of dreariness and distance. "Modern democracy," says an English writer, "offers the spectacle of a man running down a road followed at a more and more respectful distance by his own soul"—here is the soul conceived as a handicap in the race of life. "Did you not realize," said a candid friend to me the other Sunday, "that you were living in a different world from your congregation, talking about things they aren't interested in?" Poor preaching that! Or poor living! And yet the keeping of the soul is almost the only thing worth talking about in a Christian church, for it is the sum of all human values, the one priceless possession which if kept aright can never be destroyed and never be taken away. It is no selfish possession separating a man from the needs and struggles of his fellows, enabling him to sit and sing himself away to everlasting bliss, while they starve and suffer. And the soul is no mysterious germ of a future existence secreted somewhere in the recesses within. No, it is the man himself, the man separated from the garb he wears, from the house in which he lives, from the tools with which he works, from the toys with which he plays, the man as he lives with himself and with God. And how much the keeping of the soul means in this age—to be busy, alert and earnest every waking hour, but never burdened; to have large interests, great responsibilities, wide sympathies, exciting ambitions, but no fears, and no frets; to succeed, success after success, and be unelated and unspoiled, ever beholding summits far beyond the poor attainments of today; to fail and rise resolutely, eager for the next tussle; to suffer tortures with a smile; to lose everything that has been dearest and, never despairing, work on bravely and hope on confidently; at last to put aside calmly all that has constituted life here and do the day's work of dying without fear, with sorrow only for others, with eager anticipation of the marvels beyond. For one's self and for others is there anything quite so great as the keeping of the soul?

Now no small part of the good news which the Christian revelation brings us is that, if we are Christians, the keeping of the soul is not our business; it is God's. This is where we fail. We are like that Scotchman who, spoken to by his minister about his non-attendance at church, answered, "It's no that a'm growin' remiss; a'm jist tinkerin' awa wi' ma soul mase!" What uncomfortable hours of soul-tinkering some of us have—analyzing moods, dissecting motives, worrying over physical symptoms, arguing ourselves into calmness, despairing about our despair. But what does the Bible say?—"The Lord is thy keeper," "The Lord shall keep thy soul," "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee," "The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus," "I was just on the border of despair in 1845," writes George Bowen, the infidel who became the missionary, "till on the 4th of December I saw that all I had been seeking in myself I had in Christ."

But now is the keeping of the soul God's work alone? No; I wonder sometimes if there is anything in this world which God does alone. "We are His workmanship," says Paul, but he goes on, "created in Christ Jesus for good works"; and these good works "God afore prepared that we should walk in them." We are "workers together with Him." Of all the larger efforts and ideals of life the message that seems to come to us from the lips of God is that which came from the Almighty to Lot about the city which he sought to save, "I cannot do anything till thou be come thither."

So with the keeping of the soul. A verse in the letters of Peter makes our part very definite. "Commit," he says,

"the keeping of your souls to Him as well-doing as unto a faithful Creator." The first thing is to "commit" the keeping of our souls to our great Partner. The word means to deposit a valuable thing in trust. It is the word Paul used as he said farewell to the friends for whom he could do no more, "I commit you to God, and to the word of His grace." It is the word which was upon the lips of our Lord in his last human utterance, "Father, into Thy hands I commit My spirit." What a strength to be able to say of the spirit one is to bring to his life's work, of the perplexities and uncertainties that mark its course, of everything that lies beyond one's own power to achieve or to change—"I have given that up to God, it is in His hands who doeth all things well." This done, of course, we must cease to fret about that which has been committed. The old illustration of the packman who, given a lift by a carrier, rode with his heavy pack strapped over his shoulders, is a picture of much of our "committing"; we forget that God will carry us and our burdens too if we will but lay them cheerfully at His feet.

Then Peter gives us the ground of this confidence. "As unto a faithful Creator." Your soul is the handiwork of God. He knows it better far than you do. He has not made it and deserted it. Its struggle is His present thought and toil. How much the Bible has to say about the faithfulness of God. "The faithful God, which keepeth covenant." "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able." "The Lord is faithful, who shall establish you and guard you from all evil." "Faithful is he that calleth you; who will also do it." "There is one word on which I am resting more than any other," a mother wrote to me, bereft suddenly of her splendid husband, left with six children, "God is faithful." He has not forsaken you; He never will.

But we have one thing more to do. We must commit the keeping of our souls to God "in well-doing." God cannot keep a sullen, stubborn, selfish soul—it has never been committed to Him. The committing of the soul to God is not a speech one makes some day; it is a service one renders every day. In persistent loyalty to the work that seems often scarce worth doing, but is laid to your hand, in brave and cheerful acceptance of life's limitations and sufferings, in every struggle to be true, to be helpful, to be forgiving, in every effort to make life a richer, freer thing for others, you are committing the keeping of your soul to God in well-doing.

"No one could tell me where my soul might be; I searched for God, but God eluded me; I sought my brother, and I found all three."

Our Honor Roll

For some time past the AMERICAN MESSENGER has been gathering upon a Roll of Honor the names of those into whose homes this paper has been going for fifty years or more. To the list of names already published we are glad to add the name of Mrs. Swallow, a Massachusetts subscriber who writes:

"We find the AMERICAN MESSENGER very helpful. It has the true ring of the Gospel. My husband appreciates it it as much as I do. My mother took it more than fifty years ago, when I was young. The remarks on the Christian Endeavor Topics as printed on the Prayer Meeting page are good, and I have used them in our C. E. meetings on Sunday evenings.

"Since the year 1868 I have been a life director of the American Tract Society by virtue of a donation from Henry F. Durant, afterwards founder of Wellesley College."

We are very pleased to receive this letter from Mrs. Swallow. We should appreciate it as a favor if we might hear from others who have been receiving the AMERICAN MESSENGER for fifty years or more and whose names have not yet been placed upon our honor roll.

A Wonderful Chrysanthemum

A special train was used recently for taking a large chrysanthemum from Ardley, N. Y., to Cleveland for the annual exhibit of the Chrysanthemum Society of America. This plant, which resembles a huge mushroom in shape, measures seventeen feet across and is six feet high.

In order to get it into the exhibit building a door had to be removed and the partition opening enlarged. The owner of the plant, Mr. Lewisohn, had to consent to reduce his plant twelve inches before the railroad would handle it.

In Cleveland the plant received the same sort of attention that is accorded the head of the government on a tour. Crowds turned out, lining the sidewalks, to see this mass of flowers.

Its only rival in the world is one in the possession of the Emperor of Japan, which is six inches wider. The plant was placed on its side in a specially constructed frame and covered with glass. This was driven through the streets of Cleveland escorted by mounted police. The chrysanthemum is of the yellow variety, and had twelve hundred blossoms.

The Secret of Efficiency

BY REV. CLELAND B. M'AFEE, D.D.

Prayer and Bible study are two sides of one great fact—that God and man have business with each other. They can communicate, and certainly from man's side they need to communicate. In Bible study a man finds God speaking to him; in prayer, he speaks with God. They are the two sides to the conversation which must be carried on if the man is to keep in close relation with God. Bible study by itself is like the people of a congregation sitting silent, listening to the minister as he does all the talking. Prayer by itself is like a man talking to others without answer. The two together keep the man sure of God and give God the chance He seeks to make Himself known.

Efficient Christian service is service that does what service ought to do. It requires three traits in a marked degree—energy, persistency and wisdom. Energy is not merely nervous hurry, but poised power, and the poise is as important as the power. Bustling about is not Christian work.

One of the earliest signs of failure is a willingness to give up, the lack of persistency. The country is strewn with the wrecks of enterprises in religion over which men once threw up their hats and exulted. Bible classes, clubs, societies, and all such things are easy to start; plenty of people will give them an opening blessing. But the number that will hang on, that never know when they are defeated, is not a large one. They are the men of poised power and persistency. The Church needs them, as every institution of society needs them.

Even so, the need for wisdom is not less. Energy and persistency will not make up for lack of gumption. Common sense is an asset beyond description. It is wisdom at its simplest, but also at its highest value.

These three traits of efficient Christian service all grow out of relation to God, and prayer and Bible study are the outgoing and incoming currents of that relation. Both help to put things in their right proportions. They make petty things look petty and big things look big. They help to clear the air of dust, so that a thoughtful man can see what are the things that are worthy of his energy, that are worth his holding on to, and worth the expenditure of his wisdom.

No strong movement has ever appeared in the Church which was not rooted in both these exercises of religion. If a group of men want to get together in a church without being stirred to service, they must be careful to study something else beside the Bible and they must avoid prayer. No man can pray honestly and earnestly about anything without being driven to ask what he can do about it. And no man can study the Bible faithfully and persistently without knowing that there is something he can do about things that need to be done.

For both prayer and Bible study, time is needed, but it is time saved from fretting energy, from false starts that must be abandoned, and from foolish endeavors. There is an old motto: "If you want to know who is boss about here, just start something." It is a good test for a church. If you want to know who is really the head of that church, watch it while it starts something, and see what happens to the thing that is started. If it has passed fully under the Headship of Christ, it will start the things which in prayer and Bible study it has found needful and will maintain them in the full loyalty which both those habits form and enforce.

National Missionary Congress

The Men's National Missionary Congress, to be held in Washington, D. C., April 26 to 30, under the direction of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, will be one of the most momentous religious gatherings since the World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh in 1910. It will be the climax to the series of great conventions of the National Missionary Campaign now being held in the leading cities of the United States.

All the important foreign and home mission agencies are making preparations to participate actively in the Congress. Missionary leaders regard the gathering as a potential event. The assemblage will face new world conditions of opportunity and need and is expected to exert a profound influence on the missionary activities of the next ten years.

The arrangements for the Congress are being made by the Laymen's Missionary Movement. All the sessions will be held in the beautiful Memorial Continental Hall, Washington, opening Wednesday evening, April 26, and closing Sunday evening, April 30. The Congress will be a deliberative body, and the delegates, limited in number, have been allotted to the various Protestant religious denominations upon an equitable basis. Each denomination is selecting its own representatives and delegates are registering from every part of the United States.

Among the outstanding leaders of Christian activity and thought who have accepted invitations to speak at the Congress are: John R. Mott, Robert E. Speer, Dr. Shailer Mathews, Dr. W. D. MacKenzie, Bishop Francis J. McConnell, George Sherwood Eddy, Raymond Robins and Silas McBee.

Application for membership in the Congress should be made at once to the missionary agencies of the religious denominations or to the Laymen's Missionary Movement, 1 Madison Avenue, New York. American Tract Society

THIS SOCIETY was organized in 1825. Its work is interdenominational and international in scope, and is commended by all evangelical denominations.

It has published the Gospel messages in 178 languages, dialects and characters. It has been the pioneer for work among the foreign-speaking people in our country, and its missionary colporters are distributing Christian literature in thirty-three languages among the immigrants and making a home-to-home visitation among the spiritually destitute, both in the cities and rural districts, leaving all kinds of Christian literature, also the Bible or portions of the Scriptures.

Its publication of leaflets, volumes and periodicals from the Home Office total 791,142,050 copies. It has made foreign cash appropriations to the amount of $796,137.39, and grants of electrotypes to the value of $61,177.96, by means of which millions of copies of books and tracts have been published at missions stations abroad.

The gratuitous distribution of the past year is to the value of $15,439.05. The grand total of its gratuitous distribution has been to the value of $2,617,820.90, which is the equivalent of over four billion tract pages.

The total number of family visits that have been made by the Society's colporters during the last year is 202,877; the total number of volumes distributed by sale or grant is 59,431, making the total number of volumes that have been circulated by colporters in the last 73 years 17,326,937, and the total number of family visits that they have made during the same period 18,406,676.

Its work, ever widening, is dependent upon donations and legacies, and greatly needs increased offerings.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.

JUDSON SWIFT, D.D., General Secretary.

Remittances should be sent to Louis Tag, Treasurer, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y.

Life Members and Directors

THE donation of $30 at one time constitutes a Life Member of the American Tract Society; the addition of $70, or the donation of $100 at one time, constitutes a Life Director. Life members may receive annually copies of the Society's own publications to the value of $1; Life Directors to the value of $2; if applied for within the Society's year, from April 1st to April 1st, in person or by written order. No individual can draw more than one annuity year for himself. Colporters are not authorized to supply Life Members.

Form of Bequest

I GIVE and bequeath to the "AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY," instituted in the City of New York, May, 1825, the sum of dollars to be applied to the charitable uses and purposes of said Society.

Three witnesses should state that the testator declared this to be his last will and testament, and that they signed at his request, and in his presence and the presence of each other.

Gratefully Received

Within the past few months the American Tract Society has made many grants of books and tracts. A Christian worker in Hot Springs, Ark., thus acknowledges the receipt of one of these grants:

"I was so much delighted with the tracts you sent me. The people all say that these tracts are solid Gospel. I am so glad to have made the acquaintance of the American Tract Society, as your publications suit me better than any I have ever seen, because they are thoroughly undenominational."

A Pleasant Message

A lady who has long been a subscriber to the AMERICAN MESSENGER writes thus:

"This dear paper, which, like a noble and genuine Christian character, seems to grow riper, sweeter and more benignantly wise and lovely with every passing year, is a most welcome visitor in our little home nest."

Donations

DONATIONS for the missionary work of the American Tract Society may be sent to Louis Tag, Treasurer, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y.

HAVE YOU MADE A WILL?

If you have, did you remember the American Tract Society, and in proportion to the good it has been doing for nearly a century? If you have not made any bequest in behalf of the Tract Society, you are earnestly asked to add a codicil to your will to that effect. If you do so, you certainly will be happy in the thought that when you have been translated to your Heavenly home you will still be doing something to perpetuate and enlarge the great and important work of the American Tract Society. Please do not forget.

Wireless Telephony

The editor of one of the current magazines has this to say concerning a recent invention:

"Wireless telephony is a fact. It has been established in so amazing a fashion that it is hard to grasp the wonder of it, to express even a tithe of its potentialities. Sitting in his office in New York, Theodore N. Vail, president of the American Telephone & Telegraph Company, has carried on a conversation by 'wireless' with John J. Carty, the chief engineer of his corporation, who responded from Mare Island, in San Francisco Bay, a distance of 2,500 miles.

"Also a telephone message was transmitted by wireless from near Washington, D. C., to the Hawaiian Islands, a distance of 4,600 miles.

"This is the latest dazzling gift that Science has wrested from Nature's storehouse for the use of man. What does it mean? How is it going to affect us in our ordinary relations of life and in our endless struggle forward toward a fuller, more complete, and happier existence?

"All that it will mean one cannot venture to say, but there is one big, pregnant meaning that thrusts itself forward and seizes the imagination: Wireless telephony has removed forever earth's frontier; it has given a voice to the hitherto silent vastness of the Arctic and Antarctic; it has linked civilization with the remotest parts of the earth, the ocean wastes, the desert sands, the mountain peak, the jungle depth. Those hardy souls whose spirit urges them into Nature's most hidden fastnesses need never now be out of touch of the voices of their fellows to cheer them forward, share their discoveries, respond to their cries for aid. The inventors of wireless telephony declare they can send the human voice to places where no wire could ever reach—that the sailor in mid-ocean, the explorer in equatorial Africa, the adventurer on the Himalayan slopes can by the help of a comparatively simple apparatus, communicate with his fellows in the centers of civilization."

Let Go

A man on a dark night, rolling down a steep place, caught a bush growing out of the rocks and held on in the grimness of despair. His muscles strained, and his grip was maintained with frenzy. At length endurance reached its limit. In despair he let go and dropped just six inches. The kindly ground received him safely.

Some people worry and struggle, with nerves at the utmost tension, when all the time they only need to let go of all struggle and worry and tension to find they have God right under them, the same God who cares for even the sparrows.

Many who are straining away in fear and worry can increase their effectiveness for God and man at this moment. If they will only let go they will not drop even six inches. Instead, they will discover how firm the foundation is on which they stand.

—EAST AND WEST.

Living Up to Prohibition

Long lists might be given of breweries, distilleries and other liquor places, wholesale and retail, which have been transformed into centers of bigger and better business by prohibition. Empty buildings and jobless bartenders are conspicuous exceptions to the rule in the newly dry States. Drink factories and dramshops are being converted into industrial concerns which employ a greater number of men than did the alcoholic beverage traffic in its palmiest days.

For example, the Reymann brewery, Wheeling, W. Va., employed eighty-seven men; the packing plant which takes its place employs 136. Other breweries have become manufactories for soap, ice, milk products, soft drinks, and so forth.

One at least is being utilized as a "movie" studio, and one was bought and is being remodeled for a church. Distilleries have been turned into canneries and into plants for the production of necessities and luxuries for which under prohibition there will be increasing demand.

In buildings once occupied by saloons there may be seen to-day in these dry States, jewelry stores, groceries, men's and women's furnishing shops, confectioneries, restaurants, moving picture places—all doing a thriving business. Saloonkeepers are going into more reputable lines of trade, thus bringing more satisfaction and self-respect to themselves and more lasting happiness to their families.

Topics for the Easter Week of Prayer

A list of topics suitable for use during the Easter Week of Prayer, April 16-23, 1916, has been issued by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. These topics are also approved by the Evangelical Alliance of the United States. In a general way these topics follow the days of "His last week." Pastors and others who desire to secure these lists in quantities may obtain them at the rate of fifty cents per hundred from the Office of the Federal Council at 105 East 22d street, New York. GOOD THINGS FOR EASTER

"They touch the right spot" may seem a peculiar phrase to apply to Easter books, but it explains better than anything else we could say precisely what we mean. If a book dealing with the Easter subject strikes just the right chord and produces a resonance within you, it has given pleasure, it has impressed itself firmly, it has become part of you, and you respond to yourself and those around you in proportion as you are thrilled. The benefit accruing on both sides is evident. We simply could not help putting our "resonance producing" Easter books and booklets into a little six-page folder called "Easter Season 1916" because we wanted you to know more about them. When you know you will be interested. And the rest—well, that is entirely for you to say.

1916

This is what we will do.

Easter comes on April 23 and there is no time to lose. So we suggest that you send at once for this little folder and we will enclose with it a new Scripture post-card which we have just purchased in a limited quantity for the purpose.

The post-cards are the regulation size, delicately and artistically colored and each contains a verse of Scripture.

You must act at once in return for which we will send you one of these attractive Easter cards. We want you to see this

Easter folder of good things because we are sure you will agree with us that our books are of the "resonance producing" kind. They sure do touch the right spot.

The Y. M. C. A. Convention

The thirty-ninth international convention of the Young Men's Christian Associations of North America will assemble at Cleveland, Ohio, at 10:30 o'clock (Eastern time), Friday morning, May 12, 1916, and will continue in session until Tuesday afternoon, May 16th, 1916.

The convention will be a gathering of large significance to the entire religious and moral life of the continent. Leaders, not only from the United States and Canada, but from Europe and the Orient, who have earned the right to be heard because of their achievements or because of their wisdom and foresight, will take part in its deliberations.

The convention will determine the main lines of policy for the association movement for the years immediately before it. In order to do this, questions which are at the present time perplexing the most discerning leaders will challenge the united thought of the delegates, such as: how to dominate the material interests of the association movement by the spiritual objective and life; how to flood the movement with the evangelistic passion, and how to preserve its vitality and conquering power. The relation of the church to the young men of North America, the forces now tending most to disintegrate faith and character, and the untouched fields and latent forces among young men and boys will be discussed. The convention will also face the task and the opportunities of the association movement in the reconstruction of the Orient, Latin America, and Europe.

The convention affords the one opportunity within the next three years for the association leaders and members from all parts of North America and from all phases of the association work to take counsel together.

The convention will have unusual meaning for the railroad associations, because it will commemorate the founding of the first Railroad Association forty-four years ago in the city of Cleveland. The need which the student associations have long felt for a thorough consideration of student problems will be met by the student sectional conventions, while the convention as a whole will bring the student delegates into living contact with the entire movement and with one of the greatest opportunities for life service open to them. The problem of the administration of the City Association, its religious message and method of work, and its outreach of influence throughout the entire city, has become one of new and compelling urgency. It is expected that this convention will frankly face this problem and make real progress toward its solution.

The Straight Gate

A thousand gates are open all about us. We lift up our eyes and we find them everywhere. Some are closed awaiting the hand that yet shall swing them. Some are open, and from their portals, well-trodden paths lead into the hereafter. They lead invitingly into the lands of the good, the true, the beautiful; but they lead likewise to the walled-in terminals of temptation and sin and mortal overthrow.

We are in the midst of opportunities. Like the strands of a spider's web life's paths lead out and away and far beyond and all around. They are crossed and recrossed by pathways which other hands have builded and other feet have trodden; hard pathways they are, beaten down by those who have passed with silent footsteps into oblivion. Many gates lead to many paths, and the paths converge and diverge, and into the maze and tangle every one must pass, his future unknown, his destiny unwrought and in his hands an indeterminate day to work out his desires. Can he do it on the wrong road? Into this vast complexity we call life all must go. There is no holding back. Through the gates willingly or unwillingly, into confusions and reversions, unconsciously, irresistibly, inevitably we go, and there is no returning.

But whatever the possibilities that face us, whatever the opportunities that master us, this should be remembered

A Special Trial Subscription For Only Twenty-Five Cents

The Special Trial Subscription Offer made in our last issue has met with a very cordial response. A number of our friends have availed themselves of the opportunity thus presented, and in this way the AMERICAN MESSENGER is being introduced into many homes, into which it will undoubtedly bring its glad message for years to come.

In view of the reception thus accorded to our Special Trial Subscription Offer, we have decided to give all our friends another opportunity to introduce the AMERICAN MESSENGER into homes where it is not now received, at a merely nominal cost.

We will send the AMERICAN MESSENGER to any New Subscriber from May to December, 1916, for only twenty-five cents. That is, we will send the paper for eight months in return for a sum which represents but half of the regular price for a year's subscription.

as a cardinal truth: The straight gate leads to the straight path. Whatever roads may cross it, or intersect it, or lead into it or out of it, it bears persistently, heroically, straight ahead. And there is no questioning its terminal. The one gate leads to the one way that leads unto life eternal. We cannot afford to get onto the wrong road or miss the right road. The way may be narrow, but it is straight. It is no thoroughfare. Shadows may fall across it; but each shadow has its mission. Storms may break over it, the winds and the rains may assail it, but the bowed head will see diamonds in the mire where diamonds were never seen before. The stones of the street will be jasper and sapphire and amethyst. Opals will be washed up and rubies vie with emeralds. When God sends a storm to the outbound traveler on the narrow way He sends likewise His compensations. The straight gate leads to no storm where God has not swung His rainbow. He sends no shower where He has not planted a flower.

The straight gate saves from many a snare. He who swings it open in the name of Jesus finds there what is found nowhere else, the up-springing of an indestructible hope. Not on any of the highways nor on all that intersect the great circle of time will you find one Rose of Sharon or Lily of the Valley; nowhere the fountain of life. The ways of the world may be inviting; they may furnish little resistance to him who is on the downward way. The primrose path may beckon, the fragrance of untasted sweets may lure, and the heart may rejoice in the joy of the evanescent hour, yet every way is a descending way. But the path through the straight gate leads to the eternal stars. Its joys are worthy, and they are many, and they are true. If its hills are sometimes steep, they are worth climbing. If the Anakim are in the mountains, God will furnish a Caleb to drive them out.

Always the straight gate means endeavor. It is a well-beaten, oft-trodden, toilsome road, but a road whose encumbrances lead to victories, whose mysteries lead on to masteries. Joseph must reach the throne by way of the prison cell. Moses must fellowship with the desert before he can interpret the voice in the burning bush. The straight gate means a Red Sea, a Wilderness of Sin, a flooded Jordan. But it means also a cleft sea, a manna-filled desert, a riven river. The beauty of the mosaic lies in the variety of its colors. A picture all white is no picture; and a picture all black is worse. God gives variety that our lives may be complete. From the straight gate to the pearl gate the divine Spirit is leading, selecting the colors and shaping them into beautiful characters, and fitting us for a welcome at the terminal. The more we trust Him the finer will the picture be.—THE UNITED PRESBYTERIAN.

Human Touch

A visitor to a glass manufactory saw a man moulding clay into the great pots which were used in shaping the glass. Noticing that all the moulding was done by hand, he said to the workman, "Why do you not use a tool to aid you in shaping the clay?" The man replied: "There is no tool that can do this work. We have tried different ones, but somehow it needs the human touch." There is much of the Lord's work that likewise needs the "human touch." The Divine Hand would have been too glorious, too dazzling, too bright, if it had been reached out of heaven to help, to lift up and save, to wipe away tears, to heal heart wounds, to be laid in benediction on children's heads; and, therefore, God took a human form, that with a human hand He might touch the sinful and the sorrowing.

And now that Christ has gone away again into heaven, He does not reach out of the skies that glorified Hand, which burns with splendor, to do His work of love in this world, but uses our common hands, yours and mine, sending us to do in His name the gentle things He would have done for His little ones.

The Voice of the Flowers

BY W. H. JORDAN.

One day I said to the flowers, "Tell me who you are." What a confusion of happy voices. They all spoke at once. From mountain and valley, from river bank and dewy dell, from wayside and hillside, from jardinière and garden plot, from many lands and many climes, came sweet harmonies. And this was their message to me:

"Who are we? You must know us, for you see us everywhere, in the windows of the poor and the gardens of the rich, in the park and in the wild wood. A flowerless world would be like a sunless day or a starless night. You consciously or unconsciously feel our beauty and purity.

"We are rainbows of promise and cheer—products of the artist's brush when dipped in sunlight and shower—weapons of light and love, putting to flight the demons of darkness and woe. "We are heralds of beauty, for God looked on us and smiled.

"We are angels of mercy to whom you must give wings. We utter the unuttered thoughts of lovers, and the voice of the flowers rings true. Our coming tolls the knell of winter, for the resurrection of the flowers marks its final judgment day.

"We gladden the heart and fill the hands of romping children, and grace the bridal train with added beauty. We cover the marriage altar and fill the banquet hall with cheerful coloring, emblemed wreath and festooned thought.

"We enter the room of the sick and the dying.

"We speak the deepest language of your inmost soul, and with such speech call forth the deep love of other hearts. Our presence purifies and glorifies childhood, youth, and age.

"Upon the soldier's grave we keep alive sweet memories, and speak undying love and loyalty to God, to home, and to our country's flag. Ofttimes baptized with tears, we tell of hearts, which like the broken alabaster box, pour forth the sweetest ointment.

"We cover the casket of death. We veil the horror of the grave, and breathe the promise of the life that is beyond. The voice of the flowers rings true."—HERALD AND PRESBYTERIAN.

THE BEAUTY OF TIMELINESS

BY

REV. CHARLES CARROLL ALBERTSON, D.D.

Pastor of the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, New York

WE all know there is beauty in color and in combinations of colors. It is this which gives some flowers their chief attraction: the blush of the hawthorn; the blue of the wild violet, "rhyming with the sky"; the crimson of the rose; the yellow glory of the goldenrod, and the snow of the water-lily. Some gems are valuable chiefly because of their color. There are artists who refresh their color-sense by often looking at the liquid green of the emerald, the soft blue of the sapphire and the blazing fire of the opal.

That there is beauty in color and that such beauty has an educational value, Frederick Froebel knew, when he urged mothers to soothe their fretful children by the sight of many-colored balls. Excellent substitutes for Froebel's "gifts" we have in boxes of celluloid balls of various hues now sold in almost every notion store. A nervous child has been known to rest contentedly for hours, feasting his vision on these balls, drinking in, unconsciously, the beauty of color.

There is beauty in symmetry of form, whether it be in the human body, most perfectly illustrated in the sculptures of the Greeks, or in architecture, as in great cathedrals, like those of Milan, Strassburg, Rheims, and Cologne.

There is beauty in harmony of sound. We recognize it in the hum of insects, "the shrill complaining sweetness of the cricket," the ripple of water, the warbling of birds, the sighing of the wind among pines, and even in the hoarse thunder as it echoes among the cloudy caverns of the sky. We recognize it more plainly in the notes of musical instruments, and, most perfect of all, in the tones of the human voice.

There is beauty in motion. The motion of the fish in its element is full of grace. The ceaseless, stately rolling of the river toward the sea, and of the planets that move in majesty along their immeasurable orbits, are beautiful to the degree of sublimity.

It requires a finer eye, certainly a finer mind, to recognize beauty in order. What is more pleasing to see than the orderly array of a regiment of soldiers keeping step as one man to martial music, keeping step as one man even when the music has ceased? The child's eye is attracted by the colors of the uniform, the flashing arms and the waving plumes, but the mature mind sees beauty most of all in the orderliness of the arrangement. As the mind matures it acquires the power to see beauty in that which never before seemed attractive.

The beauty of orderliness has never entered some minds, and so they are still in the infancy of art. The highest ethical development of the soul is really only a continuance of esthetic development; that is, beauty of life, of love, of truth and of honor, is simply the projection into a higher realm of the same kind of beauty which, in lower realms, constitutes the artist's study and delight.

When humanity is full-grown, we shall perceive beauty that inheres only in the invisible. Here art ends and religion begins. Here religion becomes the highest art, the art spiritual and the art divine. He is an artist in the finest sense who perceives the beauty of holiness, the beauty of moral courage, the beauty of patience and sacrifice for high ends.

There is beauty in timeliness. A wise thinker of old affirmed, "Everything is beautiful in its time." Is this true? If it is, and if we could apprehend the truth of it, the world were veritably transfigured. It can not be denied that there is much in the world which does not seem beautiful. Flowers are beautiful, but how about weeds? Are they ever beautiful? When we discover their uses, they may be found quite as beautiful as flowers. Indeed, many of our flowers are simply cultivated weeds. It is almost incredible, but it is true, that the great chrysanthemums, twelve inches in diameter, have been developed from the wild chrysanthemum, no larger than a fingernail. The glorious asters of our autumn gardens are the lineal descendants of the wild asters of the New England hills which many pass in utter scorn.

Summer is beautiful, when June lays upon the brow of earth her crown of cloudless glory. But how about winter? Is winter beautiful when the north wind smites us with icy sabers and pelts us with arctic hail? Is it beautiful when trees are bare and stretch their leafless arms towards the bleak sky that has no tear-drop of pity, and only fitful gleams of cheer? Yes. Even winter is beautiful. Children and vigorous youth rejoice at the first snowfall. See the crowds at St. Moritz as happy as at any summer festival. Then think of the economy of winter. Snow has been rightly called "the poor man's fertilizer." The harvests of summer and autumn are greatly enriched by the elements that sink into the soil from the melting snows. The invisible dust of the atmosphere falls with the snow, and helps to make fruitful the impoverished soil.

Life is beautiful. Who can see children at play and not have his heart glow in the reflected joy of abundant living? There is beauty in life whether it be in the higher or lower orders. Such a man as Fabre has found in insect life material for half a century of joy-filled research. But is death beautiful? It seems almost never so. Yet, it may be so when we consider the possibility of its timeliness. Consider sleep. The beauty of sleep depends upon its timeliness. After a day's labor, when "silence is brooding like a gentle spirit o'er a calm and pulseless world," sleep is beautiful. But it is not so pleasant to see a man asleep in church, or to find a sentinel asleep at his post. Now suppose we find it is as natural to die as it is to sleep. The same wise man who said that everything is beautiful in its time, said also that there is a time to die. When is that? We may not know. How is it determined? That, too, is unknown. Do years determine the boundary of life? Some of us fulfil literally the scriptural prediction, "Thou shalt come to thy grave as a sheaf of corn fully ripe." Of such it may be said,

"Life's work well done,
Life's race well run,
Life's crown well won,
Now comes rest."

If ever death is beautiful, it is at such a time. It is like the setting of the sun which has illumined the day of labor. It is like the falling of a parent tree in the midst of the saplings it has sheltered and which it will enrich by its own death. It is as if the well-worn body had broken the husk and let the spirit free.

Sometimes the number of years apparently does not determine the boundary of life. Some children and youth die before they have fairly begun to live. If it is time to die when we reach our three-score years and ten, or four-score years and ten, what shall be said of those who die before they reach a single score? Is not such death unbeautiful? Let us not pronounce upon this question hastily. It may be that quite another matter determines the timeliness of death, namely: the accomplishment of the work God gave us to do. When that is done, it is our time to "go home." That did not seem a beautiful death when the youth of twenty fell in the forefront of the battle and was buried uncoffined in an unmarked grave. Yet the words of Ross to Siward in "Macbeth" have comforted the father of that soldier-boy:

"Your son, my lord, has paid a soldier's debt:
He only lived but till he was a man; the which, no sooner had his prowess confirmed
In the unshrinking station where he fought,
But like a man he died."

In a recent book of "free verse" the author pays a rare tribute to Anne Rutledge, Abraham Lincoln's sweetheart, whose early death plunged him into a long period of profound melancholy:

"Out of me, unworthy and unknown,
The vibrations of deathless music;
'With malice toward none, with charity for all.'
Out of me, the forgiveness of millions toward millions,
And the beneficent face of a nation
Shining with justice and truth.
I am Anne Rutledge who sleeps beneath these weeds,
Beloved in life of Abraham Lincoln,
Wedded to him, not through union,
But through separation.
Bloom forever, O Republic,
From the dust of my bosom!"

In the saying of that wise old Hebrew writer to which I have already alluded, there is one word which in some versions reads differently from the rendering that I have quoted. It means much more to say that "everything is beautiful in His time." Things are not always beautiful in our time, but they are in God's time. How differently our lives would read if we but had reference to His time. Jesus said to some of His impatient friends who had urged Him to manifest Himself to the world—by which they meant some form of physical manifestation—"My time is not yet come, but your time is always ready."

Jesus seems to have been the only man in history who was never in a hurry, who never suffered Himself to be pushed by events. His birth was in the beauty of timeliness. There was a timeliness in His departure; to have tarried longer in the sight of His disciples would have limited His power by localizing it. Better was an invisible Saviour, universally present, than a visible Saviour in Judea. "Where is Jesus now? we ask, and lo! from the open heavens through whose portals He passed to the throne of eternal Mediatorship there falls a voice, like a falling star, 'Now He is with His people everywhere until time's end.'"

Courage is one of the most beautiful of moral qualities. It requires courage to confess Christ in the face of a critical world. But there is a time to confess Him, and if we would serve Him in the beauty of holiness, we must serve Him in the beauty of timeliness. "It is good that a man bear the yoke in his youth." "They that seek me early shall find me." "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found."

Is there a time when He may not be found? Yes, for as the years pass, we lose moral power by inactivity. Religious capacity may be "extirpated by disuse." Augustine prayed, "Too late I loved Thee, Thou Ancient of Days, yet ever new." To us God speaks, "Today if ye will hear my voice." To us the Spirit speaks, "Behold I stand at the door and knock."

Dearest of All

Such joys round our daily path fall,
The bright golden sunshine and flowers so gay—
But mother is dearest of all.*

*In all the wide world not another we find
So gentle, so patient and sweet;
'Tis well that we keep one bright, happy day
Our mothers with gladness to greet.*

With patience she answers each call;
Come, give her the homage that well is her due,
For mother is dearest of all.*

At Our Doors

BY HOPE DARING

The Italians have a legend of an artist who desired to carve, from wood, a statue of the Madonna. Long had he studied and prayed to fit himself for the work. At last he felt that he was ready to begin. He had decided that the figure must be carved from sandalwood, and he went up and down the land seeking for a block of wood worthy to be used for his purpose. Again and again his hopes were dashed to the ground; never did he find that for which he sought. At last, despondent, sick at heart, he returned to his home. On his first night there, worn by his long journey, he slept soundly, and in his dreams an angel appeared.

"You have looked in the wrong place, O weary man," the angelic visitor declared. "The block of wood you seek is the oaken log that is at your door, ready for the kitchen fire. From that your masterpiece may be carved."

The artist woke in the gray dawn. At his door lay the log of oak and, as soon as it was light, he began work upon it. The statue he carved was not only the pride of his native town, but also the comfort and solace of many.

Many times the little drama of the artist is re-enacted in our own town. Sometimes you or I play the principal part. If we could have been fitted, by years of study, for a position as one of a college faculty, we should have laid a shaping hand upon many a young life. If we had been given a voice of strength and sweetness, and the means for its cultivation, we might have lifted the earth nearer heaven by our songs.

Yet all this time that we are cherishing these thoughts there are classes in our own Sunday School without competent teachers. There are lonely shut-ins on our own block, longing for cheer and companionship. Everywhere there are tired mothers, tempted youths, needy children, all lacking the things you and I can do. These are the opportunities at our own doors.

It is through service that we are privileged to co-operate with the forces for good in the world's onward progress. Service must be, at least in its beginnings, individual. It may be that the beginnings lie, for you and me, in the simplest, the most familiar events. Still, to make a harmonious whole, we must start at the beginning and go on logically. The future may widen. God may will it to be our privilege to do valiant work in the arena of great world movements.

The opportunities that are at your door and mine to-day may not be there to-morrow. Had the artist waited too long to obey the angel's command, the block of wood that came to be a Madonna might have gone to light the kitchen fire. A great sun-dial that long graced one of the Oxford college buildings bore a Latin inscription that translated ran, "The hours perish and are set down to our account." So we who long to serve man and God, who wish to live to a high purpose, may well heed the command to grasp the opportunities at our doors to-day.

Our Ascended Lord

BY EMMA YOUNGLOVE.

"I think, when I read that sweet story of old,
When Jesus was here among men,
How He called little children like lambs to His fold,
I should like to have been with them then."

MOST Christians never outgrow the longing expressed in this old Sunday-school song. We would esteem it a priceless privilege to look into the face of Jesus and feel the clasp of His hand, as the disciples did nineteen hundred years ago. Some of the world's greatest artists have attempted in some degree to meet this natural desire, and have given us their highest ideals of manly beauty in famous paintings of the Saviour.

But perhaps our conceptions of the ascended Christ are more spiritual than was possible while He trod the earth in human form. "It is expedient for you that I go away," He Himself said. Moreover, though absent in the flesh, He would not have His followers think of Him as dead or unreal, so He sent this message to the churches, "I am He that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore."

A few glimpses of Him after His ascension, assure us of His continued love and care. "We have a great high priest that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God." "For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are yet without sin." (Therefore we may come boldly to the throne of grace.) And again, "He is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."

Moreover, He who loves us will be our judge. "The Lord Jesus Christ," says Paul, "who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom."

And our ascended Lord is making ready for us a heavenly home. "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also."

The ascended Christ is the glorified heir of all things, "who being the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high: being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they." He is the Prince of Peace. He is King of Kings and Lord of Lords, crowned with glory and honor. To Him the Father saith, "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: a scepter of righteousness is the scepter of Thy kingdom."

And we may share this glory of our ascended Lord. "We are the children of God: and if children then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified together."

Life Triumphant

BY LOUIS M. GRICE.

*Bleak, devastating Winter now hath fled,
And glowing Spring with glory garbs the seas;
Gold buttercups emerge from violet seas;
The shy arbutus lifts its pearly head,
And myriad blossoms snowy petals shed,
As joyous zephyrs sing incessant glees
Among the murmuring boughs of flowering trees—
Hail! radiant resurrection of the dead!*

*This magic life that comes with power divine,
To burst the bonds of icy-fingered Death,
Arraying Nature in resplendent hues,
Gives token of God's wonderful design;
For to the seeking soul of man it saith,—
"At last shall Death its black dominion lose!"*

BIBLE PRESENTATION AT WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY

Address by Rev. Harlan G. Mendenhall, D.D.

A VERY impressive service was held in the Chapel of the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y., on Sunday morning, April 9, 1916, when the forty-sixth annual presentation of Bibles to the members of the graduating class was made by the American Tract Society. The entire cadet corps, numbering nearly six hundred men were present in full uniform. Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. H. Percy Silver, Chaplain of the Academy.

The Bibles were presented to the cadets on behalf of the American Tract Society by its General Secretary, Rev. Judson Swift, D.D.

The graduating class numbers one hundred and twenty-five men, and each cadet received a Bible in the version of his own choice. The majority selected the Authorized or King James Version, but others chose the American Revised, Spanish, French, German and Douai Versions.

Colonel C. P. Townsley, Superintendent of the Academy, and other officers were present at the service. Among the cadets who received Bibles was Señor Garcia y Larrosa, a native Filipino, who has taken the course at West Point under a special act of Congress.

The presentation address was delivered by Rev. Harlan G. Mendenhall, D.D., of New York City, who spoke with great forcefulness and appropriateness on "The West Point Spirit." We are glad to present to our readers a summary of his inspiring address.

"The West Point Spirit" Presentation Address

BY REV. HARLAN G. MENDENHALL, D.D.

DR. MENDENHALL

A letter from a United States Army officer stationed at Fort Slocum recently appeared in one of the metropolitan newspapers, in which he characterized the "West Point Spirit as the spirit that gets things done, no matter how great the difficulty or odds; the spirit of respect for lawful orders; and the spirit of unhesitating obedience." This characterization sets forth the efficiency of this institution and its influence on its students and on the country at large, and emphasizes the words I have selected for our thought from the Book to be given to the members of the graduating class: "The word of God is quick and powerful and sharper than any two-edged sword" (Hebrews 4:12).

The West Point spirit is the spirit that does things in the face of insurmountable obstacles. No task is too hard to undertake, no road too difficult over which to march, and no height too high to climb. This spirit is the same force that dominated Napoleon Bonaparte, who, when his officers stated it was impossible to march across the Alps, said, "There are no Alps."

The word of God is quick or alive, and it energizes with unconquerable power the life that it influences. It has in it a force that produces results.

Arrayed against the small band of Christian disciples who began the circulation of God's word were the authorities of the state. Men became martyrs for their faith in its truth. Its believers had to face fire, wild beasts, and suffering in most horrible forms; but these only inspired them with greater zeal. Slowly, quietly, but irresistibly the word of God moved against the army, the religion and the social influences of its day until it became the victor and then dominated the world.

Dead nations are the nations without the Bible. A group of native princes from Africa visited Queen Victoria after they had seen much of England, and one of them said to her, "Your Majesty, we have seen your great city, its big buildings, its ships, its bridges, its monuments, its banks, and its beautiful homes. Will you not give us the secret that we may make our country like the white man's land?" The Queen picked up a Bible on the table, and handing it to the African prince she said, "This is the secret of England's greatness and glory."

The man who made the Dark Continent his monument, dying on his knees with his Bible near at hand, was David Livingstone. He carried this book with him because it was the foundation upon which he had builded the new Africa.

The word of God gives an energy to individuals that brings success. It puts a pure mind into a pure body. It inspires with high ideals, lofty purposes and a holy devotion to the best things of life. It creates an atmosphere for people and for nations which transforms and lifts them up until their ideals touch the stars.

The West Point spirit has respect for law and order. We feel safe in times of danger, when that spirit dominates the situation.

The word of God is powerful to subdue the disorders of the world, to bring order out of chaos and peace out of war. Our great Captain laid down this law, to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's. Our Lord was no anarchist. He was the one man who stood for order amid the howling mobs of Jerusalem. Cool, calm and collected, "he faced a frowning world." He was conscious of the power which He possessed to overcome the world and eventually bring it to His feet. He transformed men, and these men transformed society. He brought peace where there was war, subdued the angry passions of men and established divine order in a world that was fighting to its death.

The West Point spirit stands for unhesitating obedience. That spirit is illustrated for us in the New Testament incident of the Roman captain who had such faith in Jesus that he believed that He could heal his servant at a distance, for he said, "I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me; and I say to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it."

Sharper than any two-edged sword is the word of God both for offense and defense. It commands and it has power to enforce its commands. "Go ye into all the world," said the Lord to His first disciples, and they went, never questioning their authority, never hesitating but obeying promptly. "Follow me," said the Lord on a prior occasion, "and I will make you fishers of men." And they straightway left their nets and followed Him, and did it immediately.

The word of God says, "Obey them that have the rule over you," and no democracy is safe until its citizens have learned the meaning of obedience. But this word also says, "We ought to obey God rather than man." This is the meaning of the transformed life, a life that has brought itself into fellowship with God and is willing to give obedience to His Son, who inspires us to go out and subdue the world to righteousness.

This word of God makes the body obey the soul. The power back of the man makes him a conqueror, and this power is divine. The flags that hang in this beautiful chapel are loved by us all, and wherever the starry flag goes, it means safety to its citizens.

Back of the Word is God, for it is God's word. His power is great enough to enable us to accomplish the tasks He has set for us. It is great enough to keep us from falling and to present us faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy.

The men who have given the spirit of life, order and obedience to this West Point Military Academy have unconsciously given to it the influence of the Bible. The Bible is presented to you to-day so that through its power and influence this same spirit may control and dominate your lives.

WITH OUR MISSIONARY COLPORTERS

At Cape Flattery

Rev. Francis E. Smith, a colporter evangelist of the American Tract Society in the State of Washington, meets all classes and conditions of people as he goes about distributing the Gospel message in the printed page. Recently he sent an interesting photograph which is reproduced on this page. The picture shows us the Cape Flattery Mission on Neah Bay. The Indian boys and girls who appear in this scene have the distinction of attending a Sunday School that is situated further west than any other Sunday School in the United States.

This Sunday School has been visited by Rev. Francis E. Smith, and he has preached the message of salvation to the Indian people who gather in this church.

At Ellis Island

The tide of immigration has greatly decreased on account of the conditions caused by the European war. Some immigrants, however, are still arriving at Ellis Island. Moreover, there are large number of detailed immigrants at that point, who have been refused admittance to this country, but who on account of the war cannot be sent back to their own native land.

Mr. Charles A. Carol, the missionary colporter stationed at Ellis Island under the auspices of the American Tract Society, is indefatigable in his ministry to the spiritual wants of the immigrants. He distributes the Gospel message by means of books and tracts printed in many different languages. In a recent report he tells these incidents of his work:

"An English woman who has been in the Dardanelles as a Red Cross nurse told me the story of an English soldier who was in a hard battle. When the day was ended, many of his companions were dead and many were wounded. The soldier was unharmed, but he found a bullet in the New Testament that he carried in his pocket.

"A woman who was on her way to join her husband was in great distress because she had lost her only child, who died in the Ellis Island Hospital. She did not seem to want to speak to anyone, but brooded continually over the loss of her little one. I gave her a tract and a copy of the New Testament, which comforted her.

"A young Pole, who came here by way of Denmark, was very glad to receive the Christian literature that I gave him."

In the Old Dominion State

For many years Rev. J. M. Carter has served as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society in the State of Virginia. He thus reports his recent labors:

"I have been serving on the firing line in missionary colportage, covering on foot a territory forty miles long. I find the need of Christian literature as great as ever. I distributed all the books and tracts that I had on hand, and doubtless I could have distributed five times as much in the same territory if I had had the material.

"In some of the homes where I stopped over night the people would listen most earnestly and attentively to God's Word, lest they might lose something that fell from the colporter's lips. And after I had gone to bed, I could hear them reading the books which I left out of my grip. In one case before I could get up from bed in the morning, the good man of the house came into my room, telling me of the consolation that he and his family had received from my visit and saying that he wanted a copy of every book I had. He said that the books gave him and his family the best satisfaction. I told him this is why the American Tract Society sends their missionary colporters into the homes, so that the people might see Jesus as He is revealed in His Word.

"This is why I so often say in my narrative report that on my field the people are thirsting for Christian literature. On my last trip I visited a little group of women who had banded themselves together for the purpose of improving the conditions of their neighborhood. It was indeed a treat for me to bring the message of Jesus to them and to encourage them to go forward, for it is none other than the Master's Will for us to make the world better for having lived in it.

"The women of this little band greatly need books in their work. Those that they were using I distributed to them about three years ago. One of the women said, 'This little band of women gathered here today is the outgrowth of your coming and distributing good, wholesome Christian literature among us some few years ago.'

"This statement was indeed encouraging to me, and it recalled this text to my mind, 'Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days.'"

In Cuba

Mr. Pedro Pozo, for many years a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society in the island of Cuba, thus relates some of his recent experiences:

"Some time ago I visited the sugar mills of Tinguaro and Reglita. At these places one finds himself in an atmosphere of utter indifference and immorality. They said to me, 'You are always after us with your books about the Bible.' 'Yes,' I replied, 'and until such books have found a place in your hearts and lives, all efforts at regeneration and reform will be in vain.' I said this, because some of them were socialists. After a long conversation two young men said to me, 'We like your books, for so many other books only leave us confused and perplexed.' I finally circulated a considerable number of books at this place. From there I went on to Colon, Manacas and Cascajal, holding several Gospel meetings.

"At one place on the road I met two men on horseback, to whom I offered my books. One of them held up his horse and I handed him a Bible, a book called 'The Words of Jesus' and another book called 'The Life of St. Paul.' The man looked at them and said, 'I am a priest. These books that you offer are well known to me and ought to be burned.' Then, giving spurs to his horse he left me before I could say another word to him.

"Passing on to Sancti Spiritus, I spent three days there, and then went down to Turnas and the coast region, where I held several meetings. I found the people very poor, but simple, well-disposed and receptive. I circulated several books among them, also two Bibles and two New Testaments. After this I went on to Guasimas and visited the sugar mills in that vicinity. Here I had long talks with travelers and the people generally. It is an important railroad centre, and as yet there is no Protestant mission there. One of the men bought 'El Padre Clemente,' and said, 'We meet you wherever we go. You seem to be always at work.'"

This report shows how zealously Mr. Pozo is working for the advancement of the Kingdom. Some one has well said of him, "This man is untiring in his efforts to make the Gospel known in Cuba."

WHEN THE SANDS RUN DOWN

By H. P. Holt

OLD DAVID FARRANT took the envelope containing his weekly wages. As he did so the foreman said in a voice that was not devoid of sympathy, "Mr. Mulholland wants to see you."

"Me!" exclaimed David, his hand trembling a little.

"Yes. He's in his office. Better go now and get it over."

David's vision seemed hazy as he turned away. A summons of that kind on pay day had grim significance. Usually the foreman gave the fateful message to employes whose services were no longer required, but the old man had served the firm faithfully and well for fifty years, and doubtless it was in consequence of this that the chief was undertaking the unpleasant duty personally.

There could be no other explanation. David Farrant's hand had lost its cunning in consequence of the weight of years, and before his hair had grown as white as it was now, a younger and more active man had taken his place. At times he had felt like the fifth wheel of a coach since the change, for he knew that authority was no longer his. The big Irishman who had stepped into his shoes was not unkind, and even consulted him at times. But David Farrant knew in his heart that his own day was over, and that O'Brien, though thirty years his junior, was more fitted for the responsibility.

The veteran stumbled on the steps of the chief's office. His sight was not as it had been a score of years—nay, twelve months ago.

"I want to have a little chat, David," said Mr. Mulholland. "There's a chair there."

"Thanks, Mr. Charles."

Unconsciously he addressed the chief as everyone had done forty years before when he was just beginning to grapple with the tentacles of his father's huge steel business.

"You're not looking well," said the chief.

David sat up squarely.

"Ay, I know what you mean," he replied. It was not his way to play with words. "One doesn't look like a three-year-old when there's three score and eight years behind one; but I'm as sound today as ever I was."

The chief moved uneasily in his chair, and his teeth were dug deeply into a cigar. The task before him was not a congenial one.

"Yes, but we cannot go on forever, you know," he said. "Already I find myself leaning to some extent on my son in business matters."

David held his head high.

"You want me to quit?"

Mr. Mulholland nodded.

"New blood, you know," he explained, knowing perfectly well how keenly the man must feel the position.

David turned his cap over and over for a few moments. The clang of mighty hammers was life to him. Almost half his waking hours since he was a boy had been spent in the works. Sometimes, vaguely, he had contemplated the time when his sands would have run down, but now that the moment had arrived it was more bitter than he had ever thought possible.

"Of course, if you say so, Mr. Charles," he said, keeping a stiff upper lip. "I'd be glad, all the same, if you'd try to save me some sort of a job, such as, maybe, night-watchman. I'm—I'm not finished, you know, sir, and it's the old woman I was thinking about."

"No, David. You must leave altogether," replied the chief; and a hard glitter came into the other man's eyes. "You have been with us far longer than anyone else, and my idea is to put you on a pension of two-thirds your present wage."

The glitter died out of David's eyes. He just nodded, but the chief knew what was in his heart. Men prefer to be silent when their voice would have tears in it.

"You can either have that or three thousand dollars down," went on Mr. Mulholland. "It comes to the same thing so far as I am concerned, but you must make the choice. Don't decide now. Let me know when you have settled which you think would suit you best."

The worker rose to his feet.

"God bless you, sir," he said; and impulsively he put out his hand which the chief gripped.

David Farrant had been a tower of strength to the firm in his younger days, and none knew it better than Mr. Mulholland.

* * * * *

The eyes of love, even in the December of life, are wonderfully keen, and Mrs. Farrant looked at her husband carefully when he returned home.

"Nothing wrong, Dave?" she asked, realizing full well there was something he had to tell but cared not about the telling.

"How would you like to go with me to Australia, Bess?" he replied, pulling at his shoe laces. A queer pain shot through the woman's frame.

"Have they—have they finished with you?" she asked in a voice that was not very firm.

"It's come at last," he said, "but Mr. Mulholland is showing good. I'm to have a pension or three thousand dollars down."

"I always thought he'd do something like that for you, Dave. We shan't be in want with that and what we've saved."

"No," he answered thoughtfully.

And in the next few moments there was silence but for the click of the old clock. David was thinking of their son who so long ago had emigrated to Australia, and from whom they had heard nothing for eight years. No word had ever reached them of the fate that had befallen him, and they rarely referred to the boy, as it only conjured up a vision of his lonely grave. David had more than once said he would like to go to the distant country some time to see if anyone knew what had happened.

"We could afford to go, and have plenty left for the rest of our days," the man added, without looking at his wife.

"But, Dave, we're too old," she replied softly, seeking to lessen the tug at his heart strings.

Her real thought was that he had no idea of the magnitude of the task he was setting himself. She had heard that Australia was such a large place that a man might spend a month going from one part of it to another, and Dick had never stayed in one place long.

"It was Allaguash, wasn't it, that he wrote from last?" he asked, as though the word were not branded on his brain. "I remember looking it up on the map. It's in the west, somewhere."

Finding a needle in a bundle of hay would be child's play to the search in Australia for the grave of Dick Farrant with weeds eight years old growing over it. The woman sighed.

"It's too far for me to go away and leave you," David said. "You'd come, wouldn't you?"

She passed her hand over her brow saying, "I don't see what good we could do, Dave." "Maybe, but we'd be easier in our minds afterwards."

"Ay, if we found any trace of Dick. But we've nothing to guide us, and I guess that if either of us get back safely we'd have cause to repent ever having left this country."

David sat thoughtfully for a few moments.

"You'd never stop me going, Bess?" he asked at last.

"If you feel the call as strong as that," she replied, "you'd better go, and I'll go, too. Perhaps we'll need one another."

The man's hand sought hers, and he stroked it gently. She had stood by him many a time in the hour of need, and he would rather have contemplated her as an escort than a regiment of soldiers. A faraway look had crept into his eyes. He seemed to be seeing straight through the walls, over thousands of miles of ocean waste.

"Then we'll be able to sail soon," he said slowly.

"Yes, in a few months, when the weather gets warmer," she replied.

There was yet hope that David might see the stupendous folly of his mission if the start were delayed long enough.

"Weather makes no difference," he pointed out. "You see, we've got to go to places where it's never cold, and they say it's always pretty hot in Australia. So you see," he added, stealing a quick glance at her, "it's all the same whatever time we start."

Mrs. Farrant dropped a stitch in her knitting, and bent over it to hide the tears that were so hard to keep back. David's whole being seemed wrapped up in the idea of the journey now that the long-sought opportunity had arrived. After all, it was no selfish desire on his part. She, too, would have worked day and night to provide the necessary money, had the project offered some glimmering of hope. But all their days they had kept to their own home, and neither of them knew much of the great outer world.

For some time the old man interested himself in nothing but lists of sailings, accommodation on steamers, routes, and fares. The shipping offices were all very polite in their correspondence, but among them they offered so many alternatives that it was a full week before he was able to arrive at a decision. Then, with a map spread on the table, he pointed out to his wife the seas they were to pass through and the ports their vessel would call at.

With a heart heavy as lead, Mrs. Farrant managed to make some display of enthusiasm, though uneasiness was apparent in her questions.

"I s'pose there aren't any natives—I mean wild ones—at any of these places?" she faltered.

"I never heard of it," said David, with a tinge of anxiety for her well-being. "You see, these ships are always running there, so it must be all right."

"I s'pose so," agreed his wife, more convinced than ever that they were to embark on a desperate and wasted adventure.

He looked up at her, and, eagerly scanning her face, put a hand on each of her shoulders.

"Are you afraid?" he asked bluntly, but there was no reproach in his voice.

If he had been convinced that she was, David would have folded up the map and put the matter right out of his mind, whatever it might have cost him in the silent watches of the nights to come.

"Me afraid!" she replied with a sad smile. "Have I ever been afraid while I had you? No, Dave, if you go to the end of the earth you can count on me to be there, too. We'll get through right enough, and who knows but what we'll get back just the same as we start?"

"You've only got to say the word, Bess," the man observed, "and I'll have no more to do with it."

"I've told you once, I can't say it any plainer."

David started studying the map again. Everything seemed to have been arranged. There were a few clothes they must get. The boat he had decided on was to sail in three weeks, and he was going to the shipping office the next day to book their passage. Mrs. Farrant slipped from his side.

The man's brows wrinkled. He was wondering how much money they ought to take with them and how it would be safest to carry it. Perhaps Bess had better sew it into the lining of his vest.

"I was just wondering—" he began, turning round.

She must have gone through into the bedroom. He followed, making no sound in his slippers, and then stood as if rooted to the ground. Bess was on her knees. Her voice, low, but full of poignant grief, came to his ears, and he caught the words:

"—if it is Thy will, and I will take care of him while Thou givest me strength. But is there no other way?"

Silently as a shadow David Farrant drew back, leaving his wife to commune with her Maker, before whom she had bared her heart.

"Ay, there is another way," he said aloud. "We're too old to be globe-trottin'. I must have been crazy to think of it."

The man slipped on his shoes. He would go for a walk and, on returning, would break the news gently that he had changed his mind. As he went out of the door the postman passed and gave him a letter.

David's frame shook. There was a difference in the writing, and yet it was unmistakable. The letter was addressed to her, but they had no secrets apart. With trembling fingers he tore the envelope open and read these lines:

"DEAR MOTHER—If all goes well, I shall be back with you a week after you get this. I meant to stop out here until I made my pile, and now I've done it. Tell dad there won't be need for him to do any more work, and I will see you have an easy time for the future, but will you bake me one of those cakes you used to make when I was a kid? Somehow now I'm thinking of home I got a great fancy for one. With love.—DICK."

"Bess, Bess," David cried, stumbling back into the house, torn between the desire to tell the news and to avoid giving her a shock, "there won't—p'r'aps there won't be any cause for us to go to Australia. I shouldn't wonder if, after all, Dick—"

"You mean—you mean you've had a letter," she said quickly, intuition leading her with a rush over the gap. The man put the sheet of paper into her hand, and she fumbled awkwardly for her glasses. All her fingers seemed to be thumbs, but in a moment she was reading her boy's message.

"It was the chocolate flavor he used to like," she said in a choking voice. "P'r'aps they didn't make them my way in Australy. I'll go and get the things now."

David drew the old woman's head down on to his shoulder. He did not take any notice of the tears that were running down her cheeks, for he had a lump in his throat, and his own eyes were wet.

THE BIBLE IN LITERATURE AND LIFE

By Kate Anderson

"You've seen the world—
The beauty and the wonder and the power, Changes, surprises—and God made it all!"

THE Bible has helped mankind to reach the highest levels of intellectual and moral achievement. It mixed the colors for Murillo's "Holy Family" and was the inspiration of Raphael's Sistine Madonna.

No picture is better known or more famous than Leonardo Da Vinci's "Last Supper." Only its mouldering remains are visible now on the wall of the refectory of a Dominican convent in Italy. But so many copies of the picture are extant that even after the lapse of centuries we know what the great original was like when its colors were fresh from the hand of the master.

In Michael Angelo's great paintings and sculptures we find Biblical history as the inspiration. The dead Christ on the knees of His mother, the famous statue of Moses, the paintings in the Sistine Chapel—all these attest the influence of the Scripture upon the mind and the heart of genius.

When we think of the French painter, Millet, there is a picture which rises at once before our mental vision. We see two figures in a prosaic potato field, their heads bowed in reverence to the chimes of the Angelus. Millet had power to see spiritual beauty in common things and humble people, and his artistic skill immortalized that beauty in "The Angelus."

The famous composer, Haydn, was the son of simple, pious, laboring people. He always attributed his facility in music to the Deity. While composing his great oratorio, "The Creation," he says that he knelt down every day and prayed God to strengthen him for his work. At the last performance of the great oratorio, Haydn was present. When the sublime passage, "And there was light!" was rendered, the composer arose, pointed upward and said, "It came from thence."

Biblical history also furnished the greatest of his themes to Handel composer of "The Messiah." He always felt as if this oratorio were too sacred to be used merely for making money, and allowed it to be given only for the benefit of the Foundling Hospital and other charitable institutions. Concerning the magnificent Hallelujah Chorus, Handel said: "I thought I saw all Heaven before me."

We find the influence of the Scriptures in Mendelssohn's work, especially in his "Hymn of Praise," in "Paul" and in the grand oratorio of "Elijah."

In this last composition the composer used words taken altogether from the Scriptures, for he said, "The Bible is always the best of all."

The pages of every nation's history declare the fact that it is the God-fearing rulers, the men that know the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount, who have always done the most for the elevation of their people.

Oliver Cromwell, the stern advocate of civil and religious liberty, created constitutional government for England. He drew his wisdom, sober-mindedness and magnanimity from the Bible; and though he ruled England with a rod of iron, yet his laws were humane and just.

William Ewart Gladstone, England's "grand old man," never ceased to uplift his voice on behalf of the victims of despotic cruelty in every part of the world. His passionate description of the conditions in the prisons of Naples startled and thrilled the whole civilized world.

It was the influence of a lifelong acquaintance with the Bible that secured Shaftesbury's legislation for factory operatives. Prince Bismarck used to read a psalm every night. Man of iron and blood though he was, his spirit could still find solace and inspiration in the pages of Scripture. Our own President Lincoln was an attentive and reverent reader of the Bible through his whole life.

It was the influence of the teachings of the Book of books that struck the shackles from the limbs of slaves in the United States; and it was the same resistless power which, working through William Wilberforce and his associates, secured the abolition of the slave trade in England and her colonies.

The Bible took John Howard, the great philanthropist, into the English prisons, that he might see with his own eyes the condition of the miserable inmates. He brought bill after bill before Parliament, wrote books on the subject, and finally succeeded in securing such legislation as made the jails and other houses of detention more suitable for human beings.

It was a Christian inspiration that took Florence Nightingale to nurse the wounded in the Crimea; and now that there is a terrible conflict waging in Europe, the spirit of that heroic woman is still to be found in those who are caring for the wounded there.

The noblest of the world's leaders in war have been God-fearing men who believed and loved the Scriptures. When George Washington and his soldiers, in their encampment at Valley Forge, were enduring the rigors of a severe winter, it was Washington's daily custom to go apart from his men and pray for the success of the American army.

While General Gordon was in Egypt, there was a white handkerchief to be seen fluttering beside the door of the commander's tent for one hour every day. It was a signal which none might disregard—General Gordon was at prayer within.

Innumerable Christian martyrs gave up their lives gladly, because, with an unfaltering reliance upon the promises of the Sacred Book, they believed that death was but the entrance to a radiant immortality.

St. Augustine, St. Bernard and St. Francis of Assisi are active forces in the world to-day. With the Bible as their guide, they devoted themselves to the service of others; and the world is the better to-day because they lived and labored centuries ago.

In literature we find that the Scriptures have influenced the writers of all ages. Milton's work teems with Biblical quotations, allusions and references. His "Paradise Lost" is based upon Old Testament history; and in "Paradise Regained" we are carried to the scene of Christ's temptation in the wilderness. John Bunyan, the inspired tinker of Elstow, wrote his "Pilgrim's Progress" with the Bible as its basis. This story of the Christian pilgrim is the delight of both youth and old age. Many people hold this book second only to the Bible.

Tennyson's "In Memoriam" breathes the spirit of the Master when He uttered those immortal words: "In my Father's house are many mansions . . . I go to prepare a place for you." Browning's work is charged with apt Biblical references and allusions.

So it is that the Scriptures have entered indissolubly into all literature and life. The Bible comes home to each of us, with its record of human frailties, its tragedy and its drama. Whoever knows this Book of Books may find medicine for his soul; he has access to the highest wisdom; his thirsty lips may drink of that fountain whose waters are forever springing up into everlasting life.

The Bible Society Centennial

A notable anniversary occurs this month in the centennial celebration of the organization of the American Bible Society.

The story of the founding of this beneficent agency is one of almost romantic interest, for it carries us back to the early days of our existence as a nation, and many of the men who took a prominent part in the organization of the American Bible Society were also prominent in the affairs of our country. Elias Bou-dinot, the first president of the society, had served as president of the National Congress in 1783, and in this capacity had signed the treaty of peace with Great Britain after the Revolutionary War. John Quincy Adams was one of the society's first vice-presidents, and among the other distinguished men who took an active part in its formation were Samuel J. Mills, Dr. Valentine Mott, Rev. Dr.

Nathaniel W. Taylor, Rev. Gardiner Spring,
Mr. Joseph C. Hornblower, Rev. Dr. Eliphalet Nott and James Fenimore Cooper.

The convention at which it was decided to organize the American Bible Society was held in the Garden Street Dutch Reformed Church on Wednesday, May 8, 1816. A committee was appointed to prepare the draft of a constitution for the society and also an address to the public. Two days later an adjourned meeting was held, at which the committee presented its draft of a constitution and an address to the public, both of which were approved and adopted. A board of thirty-six managers was elected in accordance with the provisions of the constitution, and on May 11, 1816, this board met in the City Hall, which had just been completed and chose these officers of the society: Hon. Elias Boudinot,
LL.D., of New Jersey, as president; Hon.
John Jay, LL.D., of New York, and twenty-two others as vice-presidents; Rev. J. M. Mason, D.D., as secretary for foreign correspondence; Rev. J. B. Romeyn, secretary for domestic correspondence, and Col. Richard Varick, treasurer.

A final step in the founding of the society was the holding of a ratification meeting in the "New City Hall," on Monday, May 13, 1816, in which gathering several persons of note took part, and various resolutions were adopted in support of the newly-founded organization.

The primary object in the founding of the American Bible Society was to provide an agency by which the Word of God might be carried all over our own land and especially into the far West. But the scope of the work soon became world-wide, and now the society prosecutes the work of Bible publication and distribution on five continents and in over 150 different languages. It has nine home agencies and twelve foreign agencies. It has nine printing centers scattered all over the world from the Bible House in New York to Bangkok, Siam. Its total issues up to date have been 109,962,214 volumes.

The officers and members of the American Bible Society are to be congratulated most heartily on the splendid showing that has been made during the one hundred years of its existence. The circulation of the Word of God without note or comment has been an inestimable service to the Church of Christ and has contributed immeasurably to the progress of the Kingdom.

The American Tract Society, which has now entered upon the last decade of the first hundred years of its own existence, extends most cordial greetings to its sister society upon this centennial occasion. Between the two societies there has always existed the most cordial relations, and they are linked together by many common ties. May the usefulness of the American Bible Society be increasingly multiplied and may its efforts to spread the Word of God be rewarded with ever enlarging success until the whole earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord.

Ninety-first Anniversary of the American Tract Society

The ninety-first anniversary of the American Tract Society will be held in the Marble Collegiate Church, Fifth avenue and Twenty-ninth street, New York City, on Wednesday,
May 10, 1916, at 4 p. m.

A report of the year's work will be presented by the General Secretary, Rev. Judson Swift, D.D., and officers for the coming year will be elected. Mr. William Phillips Hall, president of the society, will preside.

The evening session will begin at 8 o'clock, and will be addressed by Mr. Harry Wade
Hicks, General Secretary of the Missionary Education Movement, on "Outstanding Features of the Program of Christian Work in Latin America," and Rev. Henry J. Scudder, for eighteen years a missionary in India under the Foreign Mission Board of the Reformed Church in America, on "The Claims of India."

The National Exhibit of Religious Forces

Under the leadership of Mr. Guy B. St.
John, the National Exhibit of Religious Forces has been displayed in various cities of the West with encouraging results. The exhibit made a strong impression in Seattle and Tacoma, Wash., and the press reports stated that the American Tract Society's section of the exhibit proved of considerable interest.

The scope of this National Exhibit of Religious Forces has been broadened, and it has served to emphasize the need of social service and of applied Christianity, wherever it has gone. An added feature is the Palestine Pageant, which has served to present in realistic fashion scenes from the Holy Land.

An Ambassador's Tribute to Missions

Hon. Henry Morgenthau, the American Ambassador to Turkey, has had the opportunity of inspecting the work of the Christian missionaries in Turkey at close range under the most trying circumstances. He has thus expressed his judgment concerning the value of the missionary enterprise:

"A residence of over two years in Turkey has given me the best possible opportunity to see the work of the American missionaries and to know the workers intimately.

"Without hesitation I declare my high opinion of their keen insight into the real needs of the people of Turkey. The missionaries have the right idea. They go straight to the foundations and provide those intellectual, physical, moral and religious benefits upon which alone any true civilization can be built.
The missionaries are the devoted friends of the people of Turkey and they are my friends.
They are brave, intelligent and unselfish men and women. I have come to respect all and love many of them.

"As an American citizen I have been proud of them. As an American Ambassador to Turkey I have been delighted to help them."

Ambassador Morgenthau has shown his approval of Christian missions not only by his words of commendation, but by his active service in behalf of the important missionary interests that are centred in Turkey. At a clergymen's luncheon recently tendered to him in New York City under the auspices of the Clerical Conference of the New York Federation of Churches, the highest tributes were paid to his zeal and efficiency.

The Consecration of Talents

Matthew 25:14-30.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. May 1. The teaching talent. 1 Tim. 4:6-16.
T. May 2. The witnessing talent. 1 Cor. 9:16-27.
W. May 3. Varying talents. 1 Pet. 4:7-11.
T. May 4. Trade talents. Exod. 31:1-11.
F. May 5. Consecrated gold. 1 Tim. 6:17-21.
S. May 6. Entire consecration. 1 Thess. 5:23, 24.

In previous months during this year we have considered the consecration of influence, strength, and time. We come now to a very vital subject, which concerns every Christian, for it is the plain inference of the Master's parable that every one is entrusted with at least one talent.

Special Talents to be Used for God

Many men and women in this world are gifted with what may be called special talents. One has a talent for speaking, another a talent for music, another a talent for art, and so on. Some are gifted as teachers, some are skilful with the needle, some are adept in the use of languages, and some have a genius for mechanics. The variety of talents with which men and women are endowed is almost endless, but whatever the special talent that we possess, let us remember that it is our duty and privilege so to use it as to advance the Kingdom of God.

The Master calls to His service all kinds and conditions of men, and there is a place in His Kingdom for the wealthiest and the most cultured as well as for the poorest and humblest. The one condition is that we show our allegiance to Christ by the consecration of whatever talent we have.

Ordinary Talents Not to be Despised

The world is full of "one talent" men and women. Yet the possession of but a single talent is no excuse for inactivity in the Master's Kingdom. And no matter how ordinary or commonplace our talent may be, we are required to use it so as to honor our Lord and Maker.

The world's work would never be done unless the men of ordinary talent did their share. So in the Kingdom of God the great bulk of the work must be done by those to whom has been entrusted but a single talent.

The Penalty for Misusing Our Talents

The talents that we possess may be used for good or for evil. God calls us to use every talent to His honor and glory, but it is a solemn fact that the best of talents may be prostituted to the worst of ends. An orator may use his talent to exalt the good or "to make the worse appear the better reason." Music may be used in the worship of God or it may be employed in the gilded haunts of vice.

The misuse of the talents that God has given us brings its own punishment. Sorrow and remorse are the portion of those who use for wicked ends the God-given talents with which they might bring rich blessing into the lives of others.

Simply to fail to use our talent is a sin in the eyes of God. The man who buried his talent in the ground and thus neglected to put it to use was most severely condemned and doomed to punishment of unutterable woe.

"I have no talent for it," is often given as an excuse for not undertaking some form of Christian service. But, as has been well remarked, this is a valid reason for not undertaking a task only if we know what our talents are, and are using them faithfully and fully.

The Reward of Fidelity

The crowning truth in our lesson is the assurance of rich reward which is given to those who fully consecrate all their talents to the service of the Master. Those who are faithful in the use of a few things will be given the direction of many things, and they shall be privileged to enter into the eternal joy of their Lord.

What Does Christ Want Us to Do?

John 15:12-16

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. May 8. To follow Him. Matt. 4:18-23.
T. May 9. To love Him. John 21:15-17.
W. May 10. To witness for Him. Matt. 10:32, 33.
T. May 11. To love men. Gal. 5:13.
F. May 12. To shine. Matt. 5:14-16.
S. May 13. To serve Him. John 12:26.

It is suggested that this topic be used for a union meeting with the Junior Society. It is eminently suitable for this purpose, since the wording is such as to be understood by the youngest child, while the question which it raises is one that applies to both old and young alike.

To specify all the things that Christ wants us to do is not practicable within the limits of our space. We can set forth simply a few of the many things that the Master may rightfully expect of His followers.

The Supreme Requirement

The supreme duty of every human being is to love God. This is the first thing which Christ wants us to do. In loving God we also love Christ, for Christ and God are one. We cannot please God unless our hearts are filled with love to Him who first loved us.

If we love God, then it will not be hard for us to do what God wants us to do. Love is the mainspring of action, and if our hearts are full of devotion to Christ, then we shall take pleasure in doing the things that He wants.

Our Relation to Our Neighbor

Life consists largely in the adjustment of our relations to God and our fellow-man. Christ has made very plain what our relation should be to our fellow-man, for He said, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." This gives us a principle of action that covers the whole range of our duties to our brother man, and constitutes an acid test for all our relations to those about us.

If we adopt this as our rule of action we do not need a list of specific things which Christ would like to have us do, for love will constrain us to do the things that we ought to do for our neighbor, and to refrain from the things that we ought not to do.

Practical Christian Duties

There are a great many things that Christ would have us do, which are included under the heading of practical Christian duties. This means to visit the sick, to care for the widow and the orphan, to comfort the sorrowing, to succor the poor, to support the church, to sustain all good works, and to guard and cherish the home. It means numberless other ways of promoting the advance of the Kingdom of God which need not be enumerated here, but which will suggest themselves to us all, if we simply give the matter careful thought.

The Fruit of Our Labors

The most rewarding work in this world is to do the things that Christ wants us to do. Sometimes it may seem very hard to do the things that we know we ought to do, but there is no peace so satisfying as the peace that comes from the consciousness of having done our duty in accordance with the will of Christ.

If we do the things that Christ wants us to do, we may not accumulate earthly riches, we may not have the comforts and the luxuries of this world, but we will have something far better, and that is the Master's approval and the divine benediction that rests upon those who seek to do His will.

The Best Guide to Conduct

If the question is asked, how may we know definitely just what Christ wants us to do, the answer is this, that in the New Testament we may find just what He requires of us. The Bible is the best guide to conduct, because it is the revelation of the divine will.

The Blessings of Peace, and How to Get Them

John 14:27

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. May 15. Peace with God. Rom. 5:1-10.
T. May 16. Peace of God. Phil. 4:6, 7.
W. May 17. Peace with men. Heb. 12:14.
T. May 18. Peace and prosperity. Isa. 11:1-10.
F. May 19. War and waste. Joel 2:1-14.
S. May 20. Unselfishness the way. Matt. 20:25-28.

Our topic brings before us a large and an attractive theme. With the greater part of the world at war, the subject of peace has a vital significance for every country and especially for those nations that are still at peace.

In discussing our subject it is desirable for us to understand just what is meant by the word peace. Sometimes there is an ignoble significance attached to the word, as when we speak of a "peace-at-any-price" man. So let us understand that the peace of which we are now to study is a noble peace. It means the peace which goes hand in hand with righteousness, is entirely free from the taint of cowardice and is beyond reproach.

We may consider first the peace which belongs to the individual. This is the tranquility of soul that comes to the man or woman whose soul is in harmony with God. Then there is the peace which is a characteristic of every desirable community—that condition of friendliness between neighbors which makes life pleasant and comfortable for all those who dwell in any given locality. Again there is the peace which belongs to a nation which is free from internal disturbances or from external wars. Finally there is the world peace, of which we dream so fondly, but which at the present moment seems so far from actual realization.

The Benefits of Peace

Peace and prosperity usually go hand in hand. Peace allows the development and growth of what is best in life, while war brings death and destruction. Peace promotes commerce, it builds up industry, and it stimulates those arts and sciences which contribute to human comfort and happiness.

The blessings of peace are manifold and rich. Nevertheless there are perils in peace as well as in war. For peace sometimes enervates and weakens; sometimes it obscures the vision, and makes us feel that inaction is desirable, when in reality, what is needed is strong and vigorous assertion of the right.

The Promotion of Peace

Christ is the Prince of Peace, and His followers should do all in their power to promote peace. In the first place, they should follow the injunction of the Apostle to live peaceably as far as possible with all men. A Christian community should certainly be a peaceful community.

In the second place Christians should do all that they possibly can to maintain peace between the nations of the world. Opinions may vary as to the concrete steps which should be taken to attain this end. But surely there can be no question as to the fact that it is the duty of Christians to strive to promote and preserve peace between the nations of the world.

One way in which to promote peace is to cultivate what may be called the international spirit, that is the spirit which subordinates a selfish nationalism to the claims of an altruistic humanity that knows no distinction of race or country, the spirit that recognizes the fact that humanity is one, and that the man in India, China, Japan, or Russia is just as much our neighbor as the man who lives next door.

The best way to promote peace is by spreading the Gospel of Christ and by endeavoring to persuade men to live up to the teachings of Him who said, "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give to you."

How Missions Are Blessing the World

Ezekiel 47:1-12

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. May 22. Light-bringers. 2 Cor. 4:1-7.
T. May 23. Educational blessings. Prov. 22:17-29.
W. May 24. Changing lives. Acts 8:5-8.
T. May 25. Making men brothers. Eph. 2:11-22.
F. May 26. Planting spiritual ideals. Rom. 8:1-14.
S. May 27. Creating happy homes. Luke 10:38-42.

It is suggested that this topic be used for a foreign-missionary meeting. It would not be inappropriate, however, to include a consideration of the blessings which follow in the train of home missions as well as foreign missions. Indeed, the distinction between home and foreign missions is largely technical and oftentimes purely arbitrary, and it is only for the sake of convenience that it is worth while to make the distinction.

Uplifting Civilization

Missions are the greatest civilizing force in the world. Where missionaries go, there barbarity disappears. The heathen savage, when he becomes a Christian is no longer a savage, but a civilized being.

Therefore we may say that the introduction of Christianity brings with it whatever of blessing there is in our modern civilization.

The work of Christian missions promotes the spread of commerce, and brings to hitherto isolated peoples the comforts and luxuries which may be had only through the avenues of commerce.

Elevating the Standards of Living

Missions result in elevating the standards of living. Medical missions bring to ignorant and uncultured people new light on the subject of health, and give to dying races a new lease of life.

Educational missions bring enlightenment to those living in ignorance and superstition. Schools, academies, colleges and seminaries spring up where missionaries go, and tribes that have been unable to read or write are taught the mysteries of written language. In the case of some savage tribes it is necessary first to reduce the spoken language to writing before the natives can be taught how to read or write.

Industrial missions teach useful occupations to those who are living in idleness and who are ignorant of the modern methods of carrying on agriculture and other industrial pursuits.

Blessing the Home

The home is the pivotal point of all human civilization. Missionary work brings to the home a purifying, uplifting and ennobling influence, such as is unknown outside the pale of Christianity. The teachings of the Gospel of Christ strengthen the marriage tie, and promote between parent and child and brother and sister those relations which are most productive of true happiness.

The Spirit of True Liberty

Where Christian Missions go, there freedom flourishes. It has ever been the office of Christianity to break the fetters of the slave and to set the captive free. Slowly but surely the leaven of Christianity works its way, and it is safe to say that the freest of nations in the world are those that have most thoroughly assimilated the teachings of Christ.

We are living in a missionary age, and yet the progress of the missionary enterprise is far from what it ought to be. Let us seek for such a baptism of the Holy Spirit that we shall be set on fire with missionary zeal. Let us ask ourselves what is our personal duty in this matter, and then when we have received divine illumination let us consecrate ourselves and all that we have to the promotion of the missionary cause.

Our Little Folks

"Be Kind to Animals" Week

It has been suggested that the third week in May (May 15-21, 1916), be observed as a "Be Kind to Animals Week." This is a splendid idea, and we trust that all our little folks will remember this suggestion, and join with all the bands of mercy and humane societies in some special acts of kindness toward dumb animals during that week.

The Bible teaches us to be kind to animals, and we should do all in our power to make life pleasant for them.

There is really a great deal more pleasure to be had in treating animals kindly than in annoying and ill-treating them. The little boy, who appears in the picture before us is surely getting far more pleasure from his pet hen by treating her kindly than if he were chasing her all around and making her afraid to come anywhere near him.

Boys and girls, let us treat all the creatures that God has made with the utmost kindness, and we shall find that our kindness will be more than repaid. Dumb animals have a way of showing their appreciation of any kindness that they receive, and the more kindly they are handled, the more gentle and affectionate they become. And when once they become our friends, they are as staunch and true as any friends that we can make in this world.

Aunt Joan's Sunshine Recipe

BY HELEN M. RICHARDSON.

OH, how it did rain! Judith wondered if the drops could possibly come down faster if they tried. They came so fast now that they fairly ran into each other. And the street! why, it was a complete sheet of water.

But you couldn't wade to a party, even if it was only a block away. Judith swallowed a sob as she thought of the pretty blue dress that her mother had taken such pains to finish, but the sob burst its bounds.

"Come here, Girlie!"

The voice came from the low rocker beside the cheerful log fire, the place Aunt Joan loved when the days were a little cool—poor Aunt Joan who never walked about much because of her twisted foot.

Judith turned slowly and shuffled toward the rocker and Aunt Joan. Somehow, to-day she felt more like pouting than she did like smiling, as she knew Aunt Joan always liked to see her.

"How happy the flowers must be to-day," Aunt Joan said, drawing Judith gently to her.

"Huh! heeps happy, if they like to swim," was the petulant answer.

"But think how thirsty they must have been during all these long dry weeks. And how brave they have been, too! holding up their heads and smiling as brightly as if their poor roots had not for days and days been crying for water."

"Well, I know all about that, Aunt Joan, but one more day wouldn't have made so very much difference. And parties can't wait; they have to come off the day they are set." Judith had wriggled herself free from Aunt Joan's arm, and the smile that had started on her face didn't stay.

"But other parties come right along, Dear, and—I wonder how it would seem never to go to another party—to you, I mean."

"Oh, perfectly dreadful, Aunt Joan!" Judith's brow became a perfect network of wrinkles at the thought. Never to go to another party in all her life! "Why, Aunt Joan, I b'lieve I'd rather die! Do you s'p'ose anyone ever had to —not go to a party ever again, after having once been to one, I mean?"

Aunt Joan looked down at the little misshapen foot that peeped from beneath her own dress, and a shadow flitted across the face that usually was so sunny.

"I used to like to go to parties as well as you do, Judith, but I had to give it up when I was no older than you are."

"Oh, Aunt Joan, how dreadful it must have been for you," Judith replied in a pitying tone.

flowers up so that I'll have enough to carry to Julie Youngstrom. There isn't a flower in her yard—I noticed it as I passed by yesterday. Poor Julie! she has been sick so long, and she is so patient. If I hadn't been kept home from the party by the rain I never should have thought of it. I wonder if that is what Aunt Joan meant by 'making our own sunshine.' I really believe it's about as good as going to a party!" she suddenly exploded with a gleeful little laugh.

"What! has it stopped raining, already?" Aunt Joan queried.

"Why, I really haven't noticed, Auntie. I've been trying to find a way to make sunshine after your recipe, and I haven't been thinking much about the weather," Judith responded, with a happy smile.

THE PET HEN

"Just at first, Dear; but I soon discovered that we can all learn to make our own sunshine, if we try."

"Not when it's raining like this, I reckon," Judith asserted.

"Yes, even when it is raining like this. Didn't I tell you that the flowers were enjoying this downpour? The very things that are causing us unhappiness are often the ones that are making other people happy. And so I have learned to look about and see if I cannot find someone who is enjoying the very conditions I dislike; and I generally do."

Judith's face remained thoughtful even after she had returned to the window. Her mind had wandered from the rain-washed streets and the party which she had thus been prevented from attending.

"Perhaps this rain will freshen the Clara's Mistake

BY ROBERT LEE CAMPBELL.

OSusie, come here," exclaimed Clara, "and I will show you the funniest thing that you ever saw." And the little girl's peals of laughter rang throughout the big house.

But when Susie reached the window the sight which met her eyes was anything but funny. For what she saw was a very old man who was tottering under the heavy load he was carrying, and who was attempting to pick his way through the deep snow which had fallen the night before. He had a long white beard and the clothing which he wore was in strings and tatters.

Presently a gang of boys came by on their way to school, and when they saw the old man they began to pelt him with snowballs. Just then a snowball which was as hard as ice struck the old man and knocked his shabby hat from his head. A shout now went up from the boys and Clara danced about the room in high glee.

The old man was now forced to drop the heavy bag he was carrying in order to ward off the attack of the youngsters. But soon they renewed their attack with vigor and from her window Clara cheered them on. But Susie could stand the sight no longer. So seizing her cap she rushed out into the street and was soon chiding the boys for their mischief.

At the approach of the girl the boys checked their attack for a moment. But presently they began to pelt the old man as furiously as ever. Discovering that the boys were not going to heed her entreaties the girl now rushed in between them and the object of their attack. They now threatened to snowball her if she did not get out of the way, but upon discovering that the girl was determined to protect the old fellow they soon scampered away.

As soon as the boys were far enough away so they could not renew their attack upon the stranger, the little girl went for the old man's hat and when it was again placed upon his head she assisted him to shoulder his heavy burden. She then led the way to their own front gate and then up the path to the house.

When Clara discovered that the old man was actually coming into the house she ran to her mother's side and begged that the ragged old man be not allowed to enter. But just then Susie rushed into the room and said: "Oh mother, see this poor old man! He is cold and hungry and the boys have treated him so badly. We must give him something to eat and some warmer clothing."

But while the little girl had been speaking, the old man had been mysteriously removing his long white beard, so when Susie again looked around what was her surprise and delight to see that the poor old stranger had been mysteriously transformed into the very image of her own dear father. She now uttered a cry of delight and then sprang into his arms.

Mrs. Townsend had recognized the man almost as quickly as had her daughter and so she, too, rushed into his arms. And after a moment the man in his delight looked around for his other little girl, but she had ran away and hidden herself. She was so ashamed of her actions. For after she had been so rude to one whom she supposed to be a poor old stranger, how was she to face that man now even though he be her own dear father? But Mr. Townsend soon called her out from her hiding place and forgave her her rudeness. But he said that he was sorry to think that his own little girl would be so rude, even to a poor old stranger.

The heavy load which he had carried contained some beautiful and costly presents for Mrs. Townsend and the children. But although Clara's rude acts towards the supposed poor old man were now forgiven, do you suppose that she enjoyed those presents as did Susie?

The Lesson of the Flowers

Every flower has its own lesson to teach us, as someone has wisely said. The lily teaches us purity; the violet, modesty; the cactus, triumph over difficulties; the sweet pea, grace; the nasturtium, cheerfulness. If we want to learn the lesson of any flower we must do what Jesus says—"Consider."

OUR YOUNG PEOPLE

Out of the Depths

By John T. Faris, D.D.

IN a little room in the South lived two young men who were the despair of the friends of law and order. They had been given the best opportunity to advance, but they had despised it. Both had been sent to college, but one was dropped almost at once, while the other was sent home after a profligate career of four months. He was sent later to three other schools, but was expelled from all of them.

Finally both men became drunkards and gamblers, and were guilty of so many other immoralities that their names were not mentioned by many who had formerly been their friends.

But there were three people in the town who felt that the two young men were not beyond hope—a young student for the ministry, who was about to enter the theological seminary, and his two sisters.

The sisters were members of an Intercessory Circle, which had been organized by the student for the ministry. At one of their meetings lists of individuals in the town for whom daily prayer was to be offered were made by the girls. The names of the two young men were placed on these lists. Both young women made them subjects of prayer, while their brother united with them in the service of intercession.

Answer to the prayer was delayed, and personal appeals were fruitless.

One day the student for the ministry found one of the young men lying, drunk, on the baseball field. He took the man to his own home and kept him there till he came to himself; then he let him go, but not until he had said to him as much as he thought was wise. The young man would not encourage the friend who pleaded with him, but from that time it was apparent that he was glad someone was interested in him.

A few months later both the student for the ministry and the other young man had typhoid fever. Knowledge of their common affliction brought them near together.

When the student for the ministry was recovering he sent for the young man whom he had taken from the ball field and asked him to read aloud in the sick room. This the man was glad to do, for he had no work at the time; in fact, no one would have given him work, even if he had wanted to work.

The appeals made in the sick-room to the reckless reader seemed to be without result, and the message sent to the second fever patient seemed as useless. Within a short time both young men were, apparently, as reckless as ever.

Of course, there were many in the town who felt that the student was wasting his time on the young men. But he did not give up.

Two weeks before Christmas he went to see the man who had been sick and appealed to him to give up his bad habits and yield his heart to Christ. After listening to him for some time the young man said:

"I guess I might as well; you won't let me alone until I do."

Yet a week later the convert was among his former companions, planning with them for a great holiday spree. These plans were given up in response to the entreaty of his student friend.

Realizing that something more must be done, the student talked with his sisters about the young men. They made a plan. Knowing that both men could sing, they planned a quartet which should practise at the home of the three personal workers.

As they practised together there was opportunity for fervent appeals to live an earnest Christian life. These seemed to be effective, and the young men resolved to be Christians.

Then the brother went away and the two converts yielded to the entreaties and the sneers of their former companions and began to frequent a low pool room which was opened in the town just at that time.

The sisters prayed for the young men, and sent word to their brother of their new anxiety. The brother telegraphed one of the young men that he had the utmost faith in him, and wrote to the other a strong letter in which he reminded him that, having had a taste of the new life, he could not go back into the old careless ways.

Then the sisters sought the young men and talked with them. Again they announced their purpose to be Christians.

This time there was no going back. When the brother returned they were led by him to take part in a series of meetings conducted by the Young Men's Christian Association at a neighboring town. Both young men did earnest and effective personal work among the mill boys. This developed and strengthened them.

Later some of the men of the town went to different parts of the county to hold meetings for testimony. One of the young converts talked at each meeting on Bible study and prayer, which had become already a large part of his life. The other young man told of his former life and of his conversion, and spoke of the four great purposes in his life, one of which was to bring men to Christ.

Recently the latter young man, who has a brilliant mind in spite of his former abuse of his mental powers, went to a State educational institution as a teacher of history and mathematics. There he is proving a power for righteousness among the students, doing personal work among them wherever he can find an opening. He conducts chapel exercises in the school, and when the man at whose house he boards is absent, he asks the blessing at the table and conducts family worship.

The second young man left at about the same time for a large city five hundred miles from his home, where he found work, made himself known at a downtown mission and a near-by Sunday School, and began to do such work with individuals as had been blessed by God to his own salvation.

Learning to Omit

BY REV. JOHN EDWARD STONE.

We are constantly confronted by situations that demand of us the making of a choice. We have the privilege of choosing, but we must choose—we cannot have all things, some things must be omitted. Our first parents were not permitted to eat of every tree of the garden. So we must choose among life's fruits.

The greatness and complexity of life makes choosing a necessity. Many persons are like a child in a toy shop with money enough to purchase but one toy. To choose from the many becomes difficult. Life is big with possibilities—all things cannot be touched or possessed. All the professions are before the boy, but he cannot choose them all—he must confine himself to one. This is the day of specializing. Men see the necessity of choosing some one thing and focusing all their energies on that one thing. St. Paul was a specialist. "This one thing I do."

The necessity of choosing arises from the fact that some things are of more value to us than are others. We must learn to omit. One who is able to omit wisely has made much progress. Many good things must be omitted. At the Winona Bible conference several years ago we found the program for a certain hour included four simultaneous meetings presided over by specialists. All were good. It became necessary to omit three of those splendid meetings. A book agent recently pressed his claim by saying the book was a good one. "But," we replied, "there are many good books we cannot get." The principle applies to every sphere of life. Some good things must be omitted.

A man is known by what he omits. His omissions are revelations. What a man casts aside he counts of less value to him than something else. What a revelation if we omit the best things! Some persons omit the weighty things of life and choose the trivial things. The Scribes and Pharisees failed in this respect. They paid a tithe of mint and anise, and cummin, and omitted the weightier matters of the law. The times called for men of broad views, high purposes and noble aspirations, but they were busy looking after minute details. They were like the man who couldn't see the town for the houses. They made much of the letter which killeth and overlooked the spirit which giveth life.

There are those who omit the best things. Some deliberately choose to be amused with puffs and ruffles and bonds and stocks. One becoming busy with other things may omit the chief thing. In I Kings the story is told of a man whose chief business was to guard an important prisoner. Becoming busy with other things, the guard allowed the prisoner to escape. Trembling, the guard stood before his master and had to say, "While thy servant was busy here and there the man was gone."

Boswell once asked Dr. Johnson, "Pray, sir, did you ever play on any musical instrument?" Dr. Johnson replied, "No, sir; had I learned to fiddle, I should have done nothing else." An undue attention to small matters disqualifies us for a proper consideration of more important things.

We need to exercise the art of omission. We should omit the trivial. Some things which seem so important to us now will have but little value in years to come. We should omit all that leaves a mark or stain on life. Omit all that doesn't widen our horizon and enlarge our vision. Omit all that injures others. Life's business is not "to get on, but to get up." Omit sin. But do not omit the Christ. May the Lord enlarge our scope of vision that we may see and choose the larger and better things.

The Wall of Ingratitude

A rich girl who received many begging letters and was pursued by those who wanted help said after a year's experience: "I want to help the poor, but they are so ungrateful. I have not yet found a grateful person."

"How many grateful persons did Christ find?" asked the woman to whom she complained. "Yet He went on doing good and loving mankind. He did not let even the wall of ingratitude stand in His way."

Many Christians never get across that wall. They come to it, and it discourages them so about human nature that they stop loving others; it is not hard to stop, especially for the beginner in Christian love. But the disciple ought to follow the Master, and Christ never stopped for ingratitude. He went on and laid down His life for a world that sought to crucify Him; and that undying, illimitable love has drawn men irresistibly to Him.

A Word of Appreciation

A lady in Virginia writes to the Editor of this paper as follows:

"I wish to express my appreciation of the AMERICAN MESSENGER. I have found it a great comfort. I really don't know what I would do without it. I have been subscribing for it for the last five years, and it is a very welcome visitor in my home every month."

A Popular Camera as a Premium

This camera is called "THE PREMO JR., MODEL B"—it is a well made, substantial and reliable camera in every respect.

Before leaving the factory, this camera has to stand the rigid tests which are applied to all cameras made by the Eastman Kodak Company, so as to guarantee that each camera will perform the work for which it is intended.

This camera loads and unloads in daylight with the Premo Film Pack of 12 exposures. It makes pictures 2¼ by 3¼ inches in size, and the negatives are of such quality that excellent enlargements can be made from them.

The instrument is fitted with an automatic shutter, which may be used for both time and snap-shot exposures, and it has the best grade of single achromatic lens that can be obtained. It has two finders, one for vertical, the other for horizontal pictures; in fact, it is as well equipped a camera as could be wished for in the box type. It will produce first-class results in all ordinary amateur photographic work, such as snap-shots in good light, time exposures, home portraits, landscape and street photography, and the like.

This camera is unusually easy to load and operate. A complete book of instructions is included with each one, and even a school-boy who never had a camera in his hands before can make good pictures with the "MODEL B, PREMO JUNIOR" within half an hour after receiving the camera.

This is the time of year when nature presents many beautiful bits of scenery that one would like to preserve. Here a splendid opportunity is offered to obtain a perfect camera for just this purpose.

We will give the camera, with one Premo Film Pack of 12 exposures, for only Eight Yearly subscriptions to the AMERICAN MESSENGER at fifty Cents each, or we will give the camera and a pack of 12 films with a year's subscription to the paper for $2.40.

IN THE MISSION FIELDS

An Interesting Scene in Japan

The picture which appears on this page is reproduced from a photograph sent to the American Tract Society by Mr. George Braithwaite, Secretary of the Japan Book and Tract Society, whose headquarters are in Tokyo.

This picture is interesting because of the glimpse which it gives us into one of the beautiful pleasure resorts of Tokyo.

Hibiya Park is of comparatively recent origin, but it is one of the most popular recreation centers of the city of Tokyo. Among other attractions this park has a large aviary, and in the picture before us we see the people looking at the cranes, one of which is seen quite conspicuously by its white feathers at the left of the picture.

A still more interesting feature of this picture is the glimpse that it gives us of one of the missionary colporters of the Japan Book and Tract Society who is distributing Christian literature to the people, some of whom may be seen holding in their hands the books that they have received.

Books for the Kafirs

A foreign cash appropriation was recently sent by the American Tract Society to the South Africa General Mission, of which Rev. Andrew Murray, D.D., is President. In connection with this Mission there is an American Home Council, the President of which is Mr. William Phillips Hall.

A letter from Mrs. Emily Green tells how the cash appropriation was used for the advancement of the Kingdom among the Kafirs. Mrs. Green has directed her letter to the American Tract Society, and she says:

"I am writing on behalf of our people to thank you warmly for your generous gift, which enables us to start a lending library of Kafir books for the use of our Christian people. With the exception of the evangelists and one or two others, they have all been converted from heathenism within the last twenty years, and hardly one of them possesses any literature in the vernacular except a Bible and hymnbook.

"Not very long ago a young man, who is a cripple and often ailing, asked as he returned the Kafir Pilgrim's Progress which we had lent him, 'Have you no more Kafir books?' and we were so sorry to be obliged to say, 'No.' But now we are able to give him a different answer, thanks to your kindness.

"Unfortunately there are not many Kafir books to be bought, but perhaps you may be interested to hear what we have now purchased with your gift and the use we want to put them to. For the help of the preachers and some of the more advanced of the young people, we have one or two copies of Arthur's 'Tongues of Fire,' and a book of simple outlines of Christian doctrine called 'The Preacher's Friend,' as well as a selection of Wesley's Sermons. For more general use we have several copies of 'Pilgrim's Progress' and a small book called 'The Way of Life,' which is much liked and puts the way of salvation very clearly. Then we are buying several copies of 'Peep of Day' and a Kafir book of Old Testament Stories, fully illustrated, written by a veteran. These with a simple little book, 'The Angel's Message,' compiled by Dr. Stewart of Lovedale and a native helper, we intend to lend to Christian parents, encouraging them to read them to their little ones at home. Many of the Christian mothers cannot read, but there is nearly always in the Christian home a child who has learned to read at school, and it will be a very great step in advance if we can persuade the Christian parents to attend themselves to the religious education of the little ones, rather than trusting entirely to the missionaries and teachers.

"This is a line of work which I have long wished to undertake, but until your gift came it was not practicable. Our last purchase for the present has been a 'Health Reader.' We expect this book to work indirectly for the spiritual good of the people. It is written especially for the natives by Dr. MacVicar of the Lovedale Institute, and we feel strongly that simple teaching on the causes, prevention and cure of disease will do much, with God's blessing, to destroy the superstitions about disease and the lingering faith in witchcraft, which die hard in some, even of the Christians."

A Union Medical Mission College for China

The Board of Trustees of the Peking Union Medical College have organized and laid out comprehensive plans for the development in North China of a Christian medical college of a grade second to none anywhere in the world. This is but a part of the far-reaching plan of the Rockefeller China Medical Board to develop medical missions in China, the work being financed by the Rockefeller Foundation.

The trustees of the Peking Union Medical College consist of thirteen men, six of whom are appointed, one each, by the six co-operating missions with work in Peking, and seven appointed by the China Medical Board. Three of the missionary societies are English and three American, namely, the London Missionary Society, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the Medical Missionary Association of London, the Presbyterian and the Methodist Missionary Boards and the American Board. As the China Medical Board appointed John R. Mott as one of its seven members, direct missionary interests have seven out of thirteen votes, although other representatives of that Board have been from the beginning most emphatic in their declaration of purpose to make this medical college a vital missionary agency.

The Board is organized with Dr. Mott as chairman and Dr. J. L. Barton vice-chairman. Secretary North of the Methodist Board and Secretary Brown of the Presbyterian Board are members of the Executive Committee.

In an official declaration of the China Medical Board of principles under which the mission boards have appointed representatives upon the College Board, the following statement is made:

"The object of this college shall be to establish and conduct with the present plant, as a nucleus, a completely efficient medical college which shall work in cordial and sympathetic co-operation with the missionary societies and be a distinctive contribution to missionary endeavor."

In preparation for the medical college the China Medical Board has purchased from the London Missionary Society its entire medical and missionary plant in that section of the city of Peking and is now seeking to secure other adjacent properties. New buildings will be erected and preparation made for receiving the first regular class under the new administration in the fall of 1917. In the meantime, the 150 students now enrolled will be provided for partly in the present college and partly in other mission medical colleges in North China. As soon as the Board can secure the new head of the college, the other members of the staff will be engaged as rapidly as may be.

The plan includes the highest possible instruction in all departments of medicine under the best experts to be found in Europe and America. Close co-operative relations will be maintained between this great central plant and the mission hospitals in North China. It will represent to these and to the Chinese people and the government the best that can be achieved in modern medical science and practice.

A similar college is contemplated at Shanghai which will serve the Yangtze Valley and adjacent districts. This college is not yet under way, but negotiations are in progress.

While medical missions have exercised commanding influence in all mission countries and in none more so than in China, the fact remains that they have been most inadequately manned and miserably supported. It is a marvel that they have been as effective as they have been when we recall that in few hospitals have there been more than one Western physician and in many no Western trained nurse and that their allowances from home for supplies and equipment have been miserably meager. Besides, the physician in charge has seldom been able to give his entire time or strength to his medical work, but has been compelled to devote much attention to other mission matters.

The China Medical Board is undertaking to finance the second missionary physician for the hospitals in North China, while creating and maintaining the central medical plant which will surpass not only any and all missionary schools and plants, but any established anywhere in the East. Such an institution will become a powerful witness for the surpassing superiority of Christianity.

New Publications in India

Among the foreign mission stations that are aided by cash appropriations from the American Tract Society is the Punjab Mission of the Presbyterian Church. The literary work of this Mission is carried on at the Ludhiana Station, and Rev. E. M. Wherry, D.D., is in charge of this branch of its activities. In a recent letter to the General Secretary of the American Tract Society, Dr. Wherry writes:

"I am sending by this mail sample copies of five new books published by the aid of the American Tract Society in Persian Urdu. These are translations of the five books reported last year as having been published in the Punjabi language and the Gurmukhi character. They are entitled, 'Question Books on the Four Gospels and Acts.' They are intended to aid in the great work of giving Bible instruction to the multitude of the illiterate classes now crowding into the visible church in this province.

"A glance at the statistical sheet in the Punjab Mission Report for 1915, will show how imperative is the duty of teaching. But who are to teach? The missionaries can personally reach a very few. Even the Indian preachers and teachers are unable to overtake this clamant multitude. Every one who can read is being asked to volunteer in this service. These Question Books are guides to the uneducated readers among the people. Each question has a reference to the chapter and verse where the answer may be found. Experience has proven this form of instruction to be good. The American Tract Society has enabled us to put these Question Books into the hands of many in two languages, Urdu and Punjabi.

"The new edition of 45,000 copies of Best Tracts in Persian Urdu, published by the aid of the American Tract Society's appropriation have been a great boon to the evangelists. This edition (printed in 1915) is being rapidly exhausted and a new edition will have to be printed in the year 1916.

"On behalf of the Punjab Mission of the Presbyterian Church I thank you for the aid you have given us in producing this literature. I would ask the Society to aid us this year also.

"The war is making it difficult for the English Societies to undertake the work they have done heretofore. America is prospering and I rejoice in her liberality in providing for the destitute people of Belgium, Poland and Armenia. Her aid to the wounded and dying in connection with the Red Cross and other societies and especially for the work done through the missionary bodies in Persia and Turkey is most praiseworthy. And yet this war is opening the door to the Gospel all over the world. We have greater need for Christian literature to-day than ever before.

"The following publications are most urgently needed this year: (1) a new edition of Urdu Tracts; (2) a new edition of Punjabi leaflets; (3) Hymns and Songs in Punjabi (Gurmukhi); (4) A Scripture Catechism in Punjabi; (5) The Life of Our Lord in Scripture Language, illustrated."

A Faithful Preacher

A Korean preacher in Seoul was cast into prison because his son had committed an offense. He was put into a cell along with eighteen criminals and kept there for five months without opportunity to clear himself. When he came out at the end of five months the eighteen criminals were eighteen Christians. This remarkable instance of devotion, related by Dr. Heber Jones, one of the first missionaries to Korea, before the Presbyterian Board, is given not as a solitary, extraordinary specimen, but as a type of Korean Christianity.

Moving Out of Mugg Alley

By Anne Porter Johnson

“THERE goes Old Ben, shufflin’ along as usual!” exclaimed Jerry. “Say, Spotty,” bringing his companion to an abrupt stop, and waving his hand toward Old Ben, “take a good look, pard, take a good look. Let it soak plumb down, Spotty, plumb down. Got that picture? Ain’t Old Ben a beauty—ain’t he now? Don’t everybody love him? Um! Ain’t everybody a-tumblin’ over things to shake hands with him? Sure, see the cop beatin’ back the crowds! Ain’t he got loads of friends? H’m, no live ones, I guess! Don’t he wear fine clothes, and ain’t all the folks on the Avenue coixin’ him to make ’em visits? Not as I knows of. Ain’t his wax figure likely to get into the Art Palace? Well, he might make the Zoo! Got the picture, pard?”

“I got the picture, Jerry,” said Spotty. “Poor Old Ben!”

“You and me don’t want to end up like him, Spotty.” Jerry’s voice had dropped to a hoarse whisper.

“If we don’t want to end that way, I reckon we’d better not begin that way,” said Spotty.

The two boys were leaning against the lamp-post at the foot of Mugg Alley.

“The brick church up there and the pink lady has got me pretty well upset. Just to think of me worrying about Old Ben!” said Jerry.

“No use to get so worked up, Jerry,” cautioned Spotty. “It’s all right for folk up there that have money to think about being good like that, but you and me, pard, why we’re not that kind!”

“That’s a fact, Spotty! We’re not Good Work Proper Food Makes Marvelous Changes.

Providence is sometimes credited with directing the footsteps by so simple a way as the reading of a food advertisement.

A lady in Mo. writes, “I was compelled to retire from my school teaching because I was broken down with nervous prostration.

“I suffered agony in my back and was in a dreadful nervous condition, irritable, with a dull, heavy headache continually, had no appetite and could scarcely digest anything. I was unable to remember what I read and was, of course, unfit for my work.

“One day, as if by providence, I read the testimonial of a lady whose symptoms were much the same as mine and she told of how Grape-Nuts food had helped her, so I concluded to try it.

“I began with Grape-Nuts, a little fruit, and a cup of Postum. I steadily improved in both body and mind. Grape-Nuts has done more for me than all the medicine I have ever taken. I am now well again and able to do anything necessary in my work.

“My mind is clearer and my body stronger than ever before. “There’s a Reason.” Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

that kind. That’s what worries me. You’ve told the truth for once.”

“Well, don’t worry. Keep your nerve, Jerry. You’ll get over this spell.

“I’ve got nerve, Spotty. I’ve got nerve. You know that! But I ain’t got enough nerve to go down to the bakery on Saturday night and swipe a bun from the case, or a dime from the money-box, and then go up to the brick-church next day, and look the pink lady in the eye while she tells us what that book says. I can’t do that, pard. Them two things don’t hitch together.”

“You’ll be a saint yet, Jerry, if you don’t watch out.”

“If we keep on goin’ up to the brick,” went on Jerry, squinting an eye at Spotty, “We’ve got to cut out them capers, because I say to you now, that I won’t take up a seat in that class, pretendin’ to be on the square when I’m not, and have the pink lady’s shining eyes a-lookin’ plumb through my soul, whatever that is, and me hangin’ my head. I’m not used to hangin’ my head, Spotty.”

“The buns taste mighty good, Jerry, and the dimes come handy.”

“Ye-es,” admitted Jerry, “but you and me have to cut them out. Hear, Spotty? From this minute we get our buns and dimes straight or not at all.”

Spotty eyed Jerry with anxious solicitude for a moment. “When you go at a thing, Jerry, you plunge along like the fire engines. You knock everything out of your way—you cut straight through until you get there. First thing we know, we’ll be too good for Mugg Alley.”

Jerry pointed a straight fore-finger at Spotty. “That’s exactly what I’m figurin’ on, pard! I’m expectin’ to get out of Mugg Alley some day and the only thing I see to help us get out is that class up in the brick. It’s like this, Spotty, when a chap is put next to something that shows him things above him, he ought to have sense enough to stay next. When something good comes straight to you—well, like when Jakey knocks a ball your way, don’t you steady yourself and take it hot off the bat?”

Spotty mused a moment. Then he thrust out a grimy hand. “You’re right, Jerry. I—I just wanted to hear you argify the thing. I reckon we’re not much,” taking a glance at their clothes, “we’re not much but a couple of ragged slummies—that’s all we are, pard, but—

The challenging look in Jerry’s eyes brought Spotty to a pause. “The pink lady say it’s the inside—that our hearts and souls are the real things. She thinks more of a decent feller inside a bunch of rags than she does of a low-down chap inside a silk coat. We don’t have to be slummies inside because we’re slummies outside. Paste that in your hat, pard.”

“Our outside is fierce, Jerry!”

“I reckon it’ll be a lot harder to fix up inside than outside, Spotty.”

“Ye-es,” said Spotty. “I suppose there’s lots of things we could stop doing, if we only knew what they are, but the pink lady can pass them out fast enough to keep us always on the jump.”

“She don’t know some of the things we do, Spotty. She don’t know much about Mugg Alley chaps. Why, I nearly jumped off my seat when she began about that swipin’ business. ‘Jerry,’ she says, with that cute little curl peekin’ out behind her ear, and the fluffy bunch of white stuff noddin’ back and forth on her hat, ‘Jerry, is it wrong to steal?’—a-lookin’ at me so—so—well, just like she had a notion that I was one of the angels they sing about. Say, Spotty, I couldn’t say a word! My teeth stuck together, and I set there like a scared kid.”

“She got you by the neck that time, Jerry, she sure did,” chuckled Spotty. “I was watchin’ you out of the corner of my eye, and I thinks to myself, ‘Here’s where Jerry gets his knock-out.’ Just then you give a nod.”

“Now, Spotty, that’s the funny part. We’ve been doin’ little swipin’ stunts like buns and dimes—nothin’ much, but you know exactly what the pink lady would say—we’ve been doin’ them things, and never thought any thing about it. Nobody ever told us about good or bad, and as long as we could run faster than the cop, we didn’t care; but, Spotty, here’s what I can’t see through. The very second the pink lady looked at me in that kind of nice, shiny way she has when she looks at the chaps, like she thinks we’re doin’ the best we know, and when she says, ‘Jerry, is it wrong to steal?’—just that second, quick as a wink, the whole thing come over me, and I knew swipin’ wasn’t the straight thing. Right then I knew it wouldn’t square up with that book.”

“Some way, things seem different when you’re up to the brick,” broke in Spotty. “They look straight down here in Mugg Alley, but when you’re in front of the pink lady with your face washed and your hair combed, and she has that book in her hand, they’re as crooked as Gyp’s hind leg. You’re right, Jerry, we’re likely to get so upset we won’t know whether we’re decent chaps or just slummies.”

The two boys started up Mugg Alley. “Old Ben didn’t have the class up in the brick, or maybe he wouldn’t be what he is,” said Spotty, as he spied Old Ben on ahead. “He just had to go it all by himself, and I guess the wrong way ain’t hard to find. He told me about it the other day. Once when he was a young chap he come to two roads, like a forked stick that we make sling shots out of, and one road went to the right hand and one went to the left. Down the left road he found all kinds of things, hookey, swipin’, craps, lies, swear-words, and that kind of things, and he didn’t have nobody much to tell him, and so he got into the left road and he never got back. When you get a good start down that way, you go fast. That’s what he told me one day when I give him half of a bun I—I swiped from the bakery.”

“Spotty, I wish we could get Old Ben back and start him up that other road.”

“We better start ourselves first.”

“Start! Why, Spotty, we’ve started all right! We’re steppin’ mighty lively, seems to me. We don’t swipe, play craps, cheat, lie, swear—we’re done with all them things.”

“Since when?” gulped Spotty.

“Since about two minutes ago,” replied Jerry. “We’re goin’ along together, Spotty, straight up that right road, you and me. And, pard, I’d like to take Old Ben. He’s old—and—and—I surc would like to take Old Ben,” finished Jerry musingly.

They walked on slowly, Spotty waiting for Jerry’s next move.

“We have a pretty strong pull with Old Ben, pard, and maybe we’re the ones to get him back into the right road. I don’t see anybody else to do it,” said Jerry.

“Forget it, Jerry. Old Ben wouldn’t go,” declared Spotty.

“Maybe he’d like to, if he could. If you and me would be his body-guard, pard, keepin’ close, shovin’ him past the crap games, and Cominsky’s—well, if we don’t, who will? I bet he’d like to get back where the two roads forked, and start over again. Let’s go and talk to him.”

Old Ben gasped. “What’s that?”

“Spotty and me are on the square now. We’ve started up the right road, and we want you to go along. You’re a good ways down the wrong road, that’s a fact, Old Benny, but Spotty and me are goin’ to take you along with us, if you’ll go. By the looks of you, walkin’ ain’t none too good on the wrong road, anyways.”

Old Ben fumbled with his cap while he gazed at his body-guard. “You’re right, the wrong road is hard walkin’, boys. When you first starts it seems smooth—you slip along easy-like, and you think you’re havin’ a regular Fourth of July Hoorah, but afore you’re to the end, boys, afore you’re to the end—well, I’m dead tired of the wrong road, boys, but—“Say, now, Spotty and me come just in the nick of time, didn’t we? When you're dead tired of a thing is exactly the time to pass it up. Sure! Anybody knows that!"

"I'm mighty glad you chaps has started on the right road," said Old Ben. "Keep straight ahead, and don't stop to look down the other way. I'm glad you ain't goin' the road I took, but it's—boys, it's too late for Old—"

"Come along!" interrupted Jerry. "Spotty and me'll divide our supper with you, and after this you can bunk with us. You can have the cot. We sleep better on the floor anyway," winking at Spotty. "The cot's too soft for young chaps like us. Come on, we've got extra eatin's," went on Jerry, thinking fast. "Us three has a party tonight. You didn't know that, did you? Well, we're goin' to give a blow-out to celebrate our gettin' into the right road."

Jerry gave Spotty the sign and each took an arm of Old Ben. The man hesitated. "I ain't got the price boys."

Good Report

Doctor Proved Value of Postum.

Physicians know that good food and drink, properly selected, are of the utmost importance, not only for the relief of disease but to maintain health even when one is well.

A doctor writes, "I count it a pleasure to say a good word for Postum with which I have been enabled to relieve so many sufferers, and which I count, with its valued companion Grape-Nuts, one of the daily blessings."

"Coffee was banished from my own table some time ago and Postum used regularly in its place." (Coffee is injurious to many persons, because it contains the subtle, poisonous drug, caffeine.)

"I frequently find it necessary to instruct patients when they have taken Postum for the first time to be quite sure that it is properly made according to directions, then it has a clear, seal-brown color and a rich, snappy taste, as well as health giving qualities."

The above letter, received over ten years ago, is fully confirmed by a recent letter from the doctor, in which he says:

"It is a pleasure to render a good report covering a product of which I am so enthusiastic a friend.

"I am using in my home your Postum Cereal in both its forms. And, what is more, I am having it used in the families of several patients in which there are children, and all unite in endorsing the fine qualities of your admirable product."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:

Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c pkgs.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolved quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both forms are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's Reason" for Postum.

we'll make some headway, and we'll have the pink lady, and the class, and the book to keep us on the right track."

Old Ben straightened his cap and threw back his shoulders. "I'll go, boys. I'd like to get back where the two roads forked out, and start again, but I can't do that, I—can't do that now. But I'll go along with you up the right road the rest of the way, if you'll help me. Yes, I'll go, boys."

"All, right, come along," exclaimed Jerry, heartily. "Spotty and I'll do the very best we can for you, Old Benny," he added gently.

That night, after Old Ben was asleep on the cot, Jerry and Spotty had a long talk. The next day, all three moved out of Mugg Alley. "It's no place for Old Ben," said Jerry. "And it won't hurt us two out farther."

On the next Sabbath morning, the pink lady found a new scholar in her class—Old Ben.

Teaching the Boy How to Fight

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PRESTON PAPERS."

HERE'S one boy in my grade that I wish you could get hold of, Miss Preston," said Miss Jones, almost wistfully, as the School Superintendent closed her opening talk on "Getting at the Heart of the Boy" at her weekly conference of teachers. "It's Phil Hardy. He's bright enough, but both indifferent and lazy; and neither his parents nor I know what to do for or with him. But it's too bad to keep him in school, and not get him waked up."

"I agree with you," said Miss Preston quietly. "Have you mentioned your difficulty to Miss Richmond?" for Miss Jones was one of the older teachers in Miss Richmond's school.

"No, Miss Preston, not yet," flushing a brilliant scarlet; "but I will," she added a trifle reluctantly, for Miss Jones was a "native" teacher, and some years older than Miss Richmond, who had been "imported"—to the deep disgust of some of the teachers who had been born and bred in the town, and who had never been away from it.

Miss Jones had begun to take life easily when she was about thirty, believing that she knew about all that was required for her grade, and not having ambition to "go up higher"—and but little deep desire to perfect herself in her special work for the sake of bringing more information and a broader influence into the lives of those whom she taught.

Then along came Miss Preston, and her enthusiasm reached even to Miss Jones, who became infected with a laudable desire to do more, be more, and accomplish more, for and with her class; but when Miss Preston was given the superintendent's place, Miss Jones hoped—but without reason, as she had not prepared for it—to be elected principal, in Miss Preston's place; but Miss Richmond was elected instead. Hence, a slight reason for the lack of confidential "talks" about the boys in her class, with Miss Richmond, although she had always been free to discuss them with Miss Preston.

A few days later, while in the building, Miss Preston went into Miss Jones's room, and Phil Hardy was pointed out to her. After a look at his closely knit physique, ruddy face, and bright eyes, Miss Preston had "formed an opinion," as they say in the court-room; and after giving Miss Jones a hint, on the quiet, asked:

"Have you a boy in your grade, Miss Jones, who could go back to the office with me, and bring that stereoscope with the Rocky Mountain pictures for use in your fifth grade geography class?"

Great interest was manifested at once, and many of the boys hoped to be selected for the honor. Miss Jones hesitated, just a bit, and then said: "Perhaps Philip might go."

"Have you learned your lessons for the afternoon, Philip?" asked Miss Preston.

"No ma'am," was the frank answer, "but I will hurry back so as to get them before noon."

"All right, Philip. I will be ready and on the front steps, in five minutes. Meet me there, then," and turning lightly Miss Preston said, "Good morning" to the class, and the class responded in unison. After exchanging salutations with Miss Jones, she opened the door into the hall, and went up stairs, before going out on the steps, where she was soon joined by Phil.

They hurried along at a good clip, for Miss Preston was a fine pedestrian, and there was but little chance for conversation in the noisy street. Nor did they say much after reaching the office. Philip was boyishly shy, and Miss Preston too wise to expect to do much for him until he felt more "at home" with her. So she merely asked: "Will you ask your mother if she will allow you to come back with these after school, this afternoon, Philip? I want Mrs. Morgan's classes to have them to-morrow."

"Yes, Miss Preston. I'd love to bring them. May I take them to Mrs. Morgan's school to-morrow? I used to be in her school, before we moved," a bit wistfully.

"Why, yes; for aught I know now. Perhaps you can get here early enough to go there with me, at 9:30. Ask Miss Jones, this afternoon, if you may."

"Do I have to ask her?" almost defiantly.

"Yes. It wouldn't be polite of me to take away one of her class without her permission; and we must always keep on the lee side of the 'kind-and-polite' fence, Philip," smiling in the whole-hearted way that chased away the shadows from Philip's face.

"Now why doesn't he like Miss Jones?" Miss Preston argued to herself, after he had gone. "I must see more of them together," and she turned to her "Administration Book."

Philip was prompt in the afternoon, returning the geographical outfit in good order, and neatly packed in a box, with a handle for carrying it, inserted in the string that tied the box.

"Thank you, Philip," cheerily. "You seem to like to do errands."

"Yes, Miss Preston; and Miss Jones says I may go with you if I get to school on time and have a B plus in arithmetic!" radiantly.

"B plus? Surely you would never think of getting less than that, would you?" soberly, but with the kindest intonation of the voice.

"Miss Preston, I hardly ever get even a B—much less a plus!"

"Why not?" confidentially, as she put a big red apple in his hand, bisecting one just like it for herself, and beginning to eat it as she bade Philip do.

"I may be lazy; and I don't like to study anyway. I'd rather fight, like Jess Willard," with boyish confidence.

"But Jess Willard is giving his children a good education; and you can begin to fight right where you are. I like to see boys fight, if they do it right, and fight the right things," her eyes twinkling with fun as she saw that she had caught the boy with truly feminine "bait"—his own views and his own interests.

"How, when, and what?" munching the apple and almost smacking his lips over the pleasure of its rich juiciness.

"Well, one thing that you could fight, with profit to yourself and pleasure to all your friends, is your disposition to laziness—if you really are lazy. We are never really ready to fight others until we are complete masters of ourselves. Even Jess Willard says that a man must control his temper and his appetites, so as to be really sure of himself. Then, next, after you have had a really good fight against every bad habit, and whipped each one into obedience to you, you might try to master your difficulties, your studies, your likes and dislikes of every kind," and Miss Preston smiled most charmingly.

"How did you come to know so much about boys, Miss Preston, and what they like, and like to do?" asked Philip, as he wiped the last evidence of his "treat" from face and fingers with his handkerchief.

"Why, I was older sister to half a dozen brothers, whom I also taught before I began teaching in the public schools."

"I wish I had such a sister!" with boyish earnestness.

"And as my little brothers are all grown up, and have little boys of their own, I'll just love to be your big sister, Philip, and watch you fight your battles. What giant will you tackle first?" cordially.

"Guess I'd better begin on the lessons first, Miss Preston, and see if I can't battle well enough to get A on my report."

"All right, Philip. Will you let me see your report every week?"

"Yes, Miss Preston; and I'll put up a good fight too. Maybe I'll find I like Miss Jones by that time, too," heartily.

"She's fond of you, and she thinks you're very bright; so she'll be interested, too, in your fisticuffs with lessons and habits," laughing, as she bade him good afternoon.

How easily a boy may be won, even by his teacher, only the boys—and some teachers know; but if parents (especially mothers) and teachers could but recognize the fact that the fighting instinct is one of the most primitive instincts in the race, and one, too, that is absolutely essential to the preservation and development of man, they would gain much for the boys by teaching them how to utilize this instinct in the struggle for right principles and good habits, rather than in pounding the flesh of another. And once a boy's interest is so directed in the right channel, he becomes a champion for the good, the pure, the true, the beautiful, as ardent as he would otherwise be for displays of brute force—and his energy has been conserved for God and humanity.

An Orphan's Tribute to the Bible

Frank T. Bullen, the English author whose death occurred recently, and who stood in the forefront of writers of sea stories, both fictional and didactic, bore most interesting and remarkable testimony to the value of the Bible as a model of literary style, force of expression, and inspiration in description. When Bullen was only nine years old, the aunt with whom he lived died, and he was turned loose in the world, ragged and penniless. At the age of twelve years he went to sea as a cabin boy, and was so brutally treated by the captain that the crew of the ship threatened to mutiny.

For twenty years he followed a sea-faring career, but finally, while in desperate straits for money to support his family, he wrote an account of his life aboard ship, and submitted his manuscript to Kipling who in advising its publication, asked him where he acquired his literary art. Bullen's reply was, "From the Bible." That had been his "only university."

From the day of the death of the aunt who had taught him to read the Bible, and had read it to him, Bullen carried his Bible wherever he went, and when he quit the sea, and turned to the hope of authorship, he had read it through twenty-five times, with the admitted result that he rose to take place with the masters of the English language. Yes, an interesting and remarkable testimony.

Lost Opportunities

BY REV. R. L. WALTON.

MUCH precious time is utterly wasted by the business men of the Lord on railroad trains and steamboats while traveling. The usual way is this: In packing the suit case for a long trip the traveler puts in a liberal supply of reading material, and on the way to the station the latest newspaper is bought to add to this means of "passing away the time"—"killing time," many thoughtless people phrase it, and practice it.

So, it follows, we who travel much see literally thousands of men and women who have vowed to serve the Lord burning precious time and neglecting golden opportunities for service. Many who apparently sing "with grace in the heart to the Lord,"

"Take my life and let it be

sit for hours on some train or steamboat with entire forgetfulness of their vow and business for the King. Around and about them are those to whom a word in season would be a comfort and blessing and encouragement. Yes, we see servants of God of approved faith and piety utterly "killing time" when traveling, thus allowing many opportunities for winning souls to Jesus Christ to pass unnoticed and unimproved, for, sitting beside or near them are hungry souls waiting for some guiding hand to counsel to point them to Him who alone can aid and satisfy the human soul and bring it peace.

Truly "we pass this way but once," and in a short time on a train or steamboat one meets men and women never to be seen again and to whom he will never have a like opportunity of presenting the claims of the Gospel. And it is not true to say there is no need to do so. For, if all one meets on a particular trip are Christians, it is true "those who know it, seem hungering and thirsting like the rest," and it only needs a suggestion from some full soul to start a hallelujah meeting where men and women of kindred thoughts and impulses and longings come together. But should there be one whom we meet who is not a Christian then "that's my business for my King" to say to that one, "Oh, be ye reconciled to God."

The writer has traveled much and learned some years ago and "by many infallible proofs" in souls won that much and most valuable time is lost and opportunities disregarded by God's servants whose business it is to evangelize the world.

To engage an intelligent "Son of Abraham" in friendly discussion of the claims of Jesus the Messiah has been our delight for years, and, when entering a car we usually search for the Jew. We have reason to hope God has sometimes used these efforts to lift the veil which "lieth upon Israel's heart," of which Paul speaks.

Yes, the hours of travel which seem to many so wearisome to the flesh and are so much dreaded by most travelers are freighted with precious opportunities, and hosts of God's elect soldiers have found them so. We know men of God who could not sit still in a seat when traveling with others about them. The message of life must be delivered to some one, yes, to many never to be met again, and, of a large number, when the records are opened at the end of the long journey, will it be said, "He was born then," on some railroad train or steamboat, and that through having some fellow traveler tell the story of Jesus and His love.

Once, when idly standing on the station platform at Lexington, Ky., waiting for a train to arrive from Louisville with a friend, the writer saw Dr. W. H. Forsythe and a mutual friend approaching. When the latter joined me he said, "Do you see that man?" (meaning Dr. Forsythe, who was at that moment earnestly conversing with some other man whom he had seen standing alone as he and his friend entered the station.) "That's the fourth man he has talked with about his soul since we left the hotel."

We sing:
"Be this my one great business here
To make my calling sure."

This should not be true of God's servants. We should, like Paul, get far beyond this matter of personal salvation and give it no further concern, as it is a thing settled in Heaven and in our own hearts and minds. Our "one great business here" is to seek the lost and to bring them by God's help into saving knowledge of Jesus Christ. Our one vision should be to give every one we meet the invitation to know Christ as a personal Saviour and Master.

Many men fear giving offense by asking one who is a stranger if he is a Christian. After years of such a practice of presenting the claims of Christ to all sorts and conditions of persons we have yet to give offense to any. Of course it requires tact, but this grace of tact is easily acquired when we are taught of the Holy Spirit and doing His work. When He sent Philip on the road to Gaza to preach Jesus Christ to the Ethiopian the Holy Spirit told Philip what to say and how to say it. Just so has He used many thousands since Philip's day and so will He use us.

To quote again from Miss Havergal with the suggestion that the servants of God throughout the Kingdom make it their constant prayer, we close:

Lord, speak to me that I may speak
In living echoes of Thy tone;
As Thou hast sought, so let me seek Thy erring children lost and lone.

Oh, strengthen me that while I stand
Firm on the rock and strong in Thee,
I may stretch out a loving hand
To wrestlers with the troubled sea.

Oh teach me, Lord, that I may teach
The precious things Thou dost impart.
And wing my words that they may reach
The hidden depths of many a heart.

Oh give Thine own sweet rest to me,
That I may speak with soothing power
A word in season as from Thee,
To weary ones in needful hour.

Oh fill me with Thy fullness, Lord,
Until my very heart o'erflow
In kindling thought and glowing word,
Thy love to tell, Thy praise to show.

Oh use me, Lord, use even me
Just as Thou wilt and when and where Until Thy blessed face I see Thy rest, Thy joy, Thy glory share.

God at His Palace Gate

BY REV. G. B. F. HALLOCK, D.D.

It is related of a wise Eastern ruler that when he died he left word to his people that his son would be their king, and though they had never seen his face they would judge of his government by his acts. The people promised obedience. The influence of the new ruler was wise and kind, and like the beams of the sun, it strained out of the royal palace, bringing joy to every subject.

The people marveled, and said: "We see him not; how does he understand so well?"

They came to the palace gates, and said: "Let the king suffer us to see his face." The king came forth to them in his royal robes, and when they saw him they rejoiced, and said: "We know thy face." He had walked so often with them as their friend, showing love and kindness to all, that when they saw him in the palace his kingly robes did not disguise him. They knew him.

In the incarnation our King comes to the palace gate and lets us see His face. "The Word became flesh, and dwelt among us (and we beheld His glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father) full of grace and truth."

God was in the whole world before, ruling in love and wisdom. We did not recognize or know Him; but felt His power and received His grace. He was among us, as we might say, incognito. He was with us all the while, ruling and defending us, conquering all His and our enemies—our loving, wise and ever-mindful King. But in the incarnation of Christ He revealed Himself; He made Himself visible to us; He permitted us to realize who the one that had been our benefactor really was, and something of the depth of the love He felt.

The Soul's Wireless Telegraphy

BY WILLIAM C. MINIFIE, D.D.

Prayer is more than petition. It is communion. True prayer gives as well as receives. Like a summer flower it breathes out its fragrance while it drinks in the sunlight. Petition is only one element in prayer. The very soul of worship is fellowship with God. The original meaning of the word "worship" is to "kiss the hand forward." So that true prayer is literally to kiss the hand to God, as a little child might do to its father. Prayer is respiration as well as inspiration, and to be effective it must be continuous, as breathing must be continuous if the life of the body is to be sustained. The divine command is, "Pray without ceasing." This, of course, does not mean that we are always to be in a posture of prayer, for that would be impossible, but we are always to be in the spirit of prayer.

Keep the harp always in readiness, so that whenever Holy Desire, that heaven-born musician, turns to it he may find the strings in tune and be able to discourse sweet music in the ears of God. Let us form the sacred habit of sending wireless telegraphic messages to heaven all through the day, and if we do we shall not be without answers from the King. Prayer to be effective must be continuous. But to be continuous it requires the stimulus derived from regular seasons of devotion. The altar fire which is to burn through the long day and night must be rekindled every morning and evening. The watch that is to keep time through all the twenty-four hours must be wound up at stated intervals. The soul needs its meal times as well as the body. Our devotional life must have its reservoirs as well as its pipes. If uninterrupted communion with God is to be maintained it is essential that there be golden periods—short or long as the duties of the day must determine—when we withdraw ourselves from the noisy market place and drink again of that life-giving stream that has its source away up amid the everlasting hills.—THE WATCHMAN-EXAMINER.

A New Marathi Publication

A new publication in the Marathi language of India has been issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society, concerning which the Dnyanodaya, a weekly periodical in Bombay, makes the following comment:

"The Tract Society has performed a real service in publishing a Marathi edition of 'A Course for Village Sunday Schools,' by E. A. and E. M. Annett, the experts on religious education who have recently completed a helpful tour in Western India. This little book is designed to meet the needs of religious instruction in the village school, where we may hope to hold most of our pupils for a year or two only. The authors have planned a course of 52 lessons, each an interesting story and each contributing to a well-rounded apprehension of Christian life and ideals. The stories are grouped for the teacher under the heads of God, Sin, the Savior, Salvation, the Christian Life, the Future Life, but there is nothing of theological terminology in the stories themselves. They are planned from the viewpoint of the child and it is reasonable to hope that if handled by a teacher of ability and of religious feeling this course will have a lasting Christian impression on the minds of children."

A Rain Song

BY FRANK WALCOTT HUTT

No matter how the clouds may frown,
The rain a gay song patters down;
Before the wind it leads the way,
With many a cheery roundelay;
And, if you listen, you may hear
How e'en the rain doth bring good cheer.

No matter how the storm may shout,
The dancing rain-drops, I've no doubt,
Sing, in a merry undertone,
A little song that's all their own—
It's of the sunlight, bright and warm,
That shineth after every storm.

Her Mother's Work

BY A. MARIA CRAWFORD.

AS a Sunday School teacher, Aunt Mary, I am a complete failure, so I have come to you for inspiration." Louise Hale took off her modish blue coat and hat and sat down in a low chair facing the dear little old lady by the window who was busily making yards of pretty tating to trim the dainty garments of her three nieces. Louise was her favorite because she was more religiously inclined than the others.

Aunt Mary dropped her thread and shuttle in a basket on her sewing table and leaning over, took the girl's soft white hands in both her wrinkled ones. "You are not a failure, my dear. Now tell me all about it," she said comfortingly.

"You remember when I came to you for advice after the superintendent asked me to take a class of girls, don't you? I didn't feel competent, but you persuaded me to try. At first, Aunt Mary, I was flattered. The girls came regularly and seemed to take a great interest, but now they are beginning to drop out, one by one, and I realize that they only came at first because I was something new and they were curious about me."

"How many girls have you enrolled?" "Ten," said Louise, then added sadly, "yet there were only three of them present last Sunday. I have failed to hold their interest and I have tried so hard, Aunt Mary. I studied the lessons carefully and read everything on the subjects that I could find, but for some reason I don't seem to get on with the girls. I think they dislike my personality."

"Have you any foundation for such a belief?"

"Yes. I overheard two of them discussing what fine clothes and jewelry I wore."

"Jewelry?"

"Yes, my rings, pins and chains, I suppose."

"Do you wear all those things to Sunday School?"

"Yes, Aunt Mary. I thought pretty things would appeal to the girls, and I always wear a little jewelry, anyway."

"And what about your clothes?"

"I wear different dresses every Sunday just because I have them, and, as I said before, I thought pretty things would appeal to the children."

"Do they change their dresses every Sunday, too?"

"I've never noticed particularly. I don't suppose they do. I know that one child needs shoes. I couldn't help seeing the holes in the ones she wore last Sunday."

"Why don't you buy her a pair of shoes?"

"I—I never thought about doing anything material for any of them, Aunt Mary."

"Modern philanthropy teaches us to save the body first, then claim the soul. We feed the hungry and clothe the poor before we begin to talk about spiritual things. It is the reasonable way to get at the minds and hearts of the poor. We strengthen their bodies with nourishing food, warm clothes in winter and teach them the effect of sanitary conditions in their homes; then we can talk of salvation and find ready and understanding minds. Do you understand, my dear, how in this day and time we have grown to be broad-minded in everything? Charity dominates our attitude toward the unsaved poor. We put the body in healthy, normal condition, then the mind becomes healthy and normal, too, and a man is enabled to discriminate between good and evil, the false and the true."

"That's good logic, Aunt Mary. I am beginning to understand why I have failed. Today I bought a new dress that I don't need. I wanted it because it was pretty. The money I paid for it would have put shoes and stockings on Gladys Haynes. Her stockings were darned in a dozen places, I noticed on Sunday." The girl's eyes were full of tears and she dropped her head on Aunt Mary's knee. The wrinkled old hands smoothed the wavy brown hair.

"It isn't too late to begin all over again, little girl," she said softly. "Leave your jewelry at home, wear simple, plain clothes and think of those little girls as ten throbbing human bodies, alive and sensitive to your moulding hands, each of them with a beautiful soul to save. Enter into their childish joys and sorrows, put yourself on a level with them, win their confidence and friendship and then reach out and save those souls. Oh, my little girl, it is a wonderful thing to be young and capable, a standard bearer in the great movement of evangelizing the world."

Louise lifted a face tear-stained but radiant. "I do so want to be worth while. I want to lead a happy, helpful life, like mother did. I don't want her work to die because she is gone, but I want it to live on and on through me."

Aunt Mary kept patting the soft, white hand in her own. "That's the way to talk, my dear. You sanctify sorrow by entertaining such ideals."

"I am going right now and take Gladys Haynes to get shoes and stockings. What else could I do to make the children know that I love them in a very human way?"

"One little pupil of yours, Alice Nelson, lives near a friend of mine. She says that the child wants to learn to play the piano. Teach her yourself. Her parents are too poor to pay for lessons. Through music you can carry an uplift into a home that probably has very little of this world's cheer to brighten it."

"That would be doing just like mother used to do. O, dear, dear Aunt Mary, I want to do right, but I go about it in such awkward fashion. What would I do without you to comfort and advise me? I thought that it was enough to study my Sunday School lesson and go every week and teach it. It was a task. Now you have made it appear a great privilege. My little pupils are no longer ten wooden dolls which I must teach to say yes and no to certain questions. They are live, palpitating little bodies, looking to me for uplift and guidance. You have adjusted things for me, Aunt Mary."

"My church paper has just come, Louise. Here is a little stanza in it that I want you to read, then clip it out and carry it home with you."

And Louise, stooping over so that the last rays of the sun would fall on the paper, read:

"If I can stop one heart from breaking
I shall not live in vain;
If I can ease one life the aching
Or cool one pain,
Or help one fainting robin
Into his nest again,
I shall not live in vain."

A Highway Out of Egypt

BY REV. DAVID JAMES BURRELL, D.D.

A farmer with his eleven sons and their families, seventy souls in all, set out from Hebron, driving their sheep and cattle before them, to visit the twelfth son of the household, who by a singular chain of providences had come to be Viceroy of Egypt. On their arrival they were received with much consideration and assigned to the rich district of Goshen, to pasture their flocks. All went well until the death of Joseph; after which, one by one, their privileges were taken away and new burdens and impositions were put upon them.

At the end of the third century of their sojourn in Egypt they were an abject race of slaves. The spirit had wholly gone out of them. They were driven in gangs to the quarries and brick kilns by hard task-masters, and forced to make their tale of bricks without straw. A beaten, cringing, utterly dispirited and hopeless people, what could they do but send up their cry unto God?

This is an apologue of life. Sin is bondage. As matters go from bad to worse, the soul at length is fettered and manacled by force of habit as with adamant chains. And there is no hope until in utter helplessness the cry goes up to heaven: "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me?"

In the fullness of time, Moses came from the land of Midian with this message: "I met God at the burning bush, where he told me that your cry had come up into His ears. And, behold, He hath sent me to deliver you!" He stood at the threshold of the palace, and demanded of Pharaoh, "Thus saith the Lord, let my people go!" And on the night of the Passover they went forth under the blood-stained lintels of their doors, a horde of fugitive slaves, hurrying on to Pi-hahiroth, where they were driven to panic by the footfalls of the pursuing host. The Lord said: "Stand still and see My salvation!" And they passed through dryshod, while their pursuers were overwhelmed in the sea. At daybreak the song was raised, "Who is like unto Thee, O God; glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders!"

This is a parable of redemption. Here comes Christ with His message: "I am sent to seek and to save!" We stand at Calvary, like the Jews hemmed in by the mountains and the sea, and again the Voice is heard, "Stand still and see the salvation of your God!" In mortal anguish our divine Substitute bears our sins in His own body on the tree. His hands are stretched out and his lips parched with the fever of the death that should have been ours are saying: "Look and live! He that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and he that liveth and believeth in Me shall never die!"

Here is the highway out of Egypt. This is "the way the prophets went, the way that leads from banishment; the King's highway of holiness." It is so plain that all can see it; so easy that all can traverse it, and of such universal application that all have an equal interest in it.

Is it effective? Aye; "millions have reached that blest abode, and millions more are on the road." No case ever called in an earthly court was fortified by such an array of witnesses. Who shall number those who are prepared to testify? "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him and saved him out of all his trouble." In heaven there are ten thousand times ten thousand and thousands of thousands who join in singing: "Thou hast redeemed us out of every nation and kindred and people and tribe, and made us to be kings and priests unto God!"—THE PRESBYTERIAN.

Friday Happenings

Are you a good American and do you look on Friday as an unlucky day? You are not superstitious and are quite sure that one day is just like another as far as national significance is concerned? No doubt that is true, and yet the importance of Friday in American history, as it has been worked out, makes an almost convincing showing for itself. We have not forgotten that Columbus discovered the new world on Friday, Oct. 12, 1492. Did you know that he also set sail on the sixth day of the week, that he started on his return voyage on that day and that he reached Palos on another Friday? In addition to six vital points in the Columbus exploration, which were marked by Fridays, that day was carried over into our national experiences with England.

Cabot's commission from Henry VIII, bears the date of Friday. On that day of the week the Mayflower landed, and on a much earlier Friday the town of St. Augustine was founded. George Washington was born on Friday, and that day marked the seizing of Bunker Hill, the surrender of Burgoyne at Saratoga, the discovery of Arnold's treason and the surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown. This was in 1781, almost five long years after John Adams made the famous motion in the Continental Congress that "the United States are and ought to be independent." That declaration was made on Friday, the 7th of July, 1776, three days after the actual drawing up of the Declaration of Independence and six years after the Boston massacre, which precipitated the Revolution.

Bible Work in Japan

Probably no country in the world offers greater facilities for Bible work than Japan. "All over the empire," writes a Bible Society agent, "we visit the government schools and colleges, and offer the Bible for sale to teachers and students. In many schools we are allowed the use of one of the classrooms or libraries, where we display our books; as the students enter, we have excellent opportunities of speaking to them, and as a rule they purchase freely. To reach the student class with the Bible is one of the most important and most promising departments of our work."

"In banks and in government offices we often meet with good success. Even governors of prefectures receive us kindly when we call on them, permitting us to approach all the officials under their authority."

Roberts' Lightning Mixer

A Household Necessity — Rapid — Effective — Sanitary

The quickest and most effective mixer in the market. The working principle is a whirling dasher which, being forced up and down through the liquid, mixes, stirs, churns, whips, lightens and aerates the material, rendering it free from all solid matter and producing a smooth, thoroughly blended mixture, and does not spatter.

Will beat the whites of eggs to perfection in 30 seconds. Will whip cream, as you like it, in 1 to 3 minutes, according to density and temperature.

Indispensable for floats, custard, omelets and charlotte russe. Will mix the thickening for gravies in 10 seconds. Its sanitary qualities appeal especially to nurses and particular housekeepers.

The LIGHTNING MIXER is made of thick glass, and rust proof metal top and dasher. The size we offer holds one pint.

We will give the LIGHTNING MIXER for only 3 yearly subscriptions to the AMERICAN MESSENGER at 50 cents each, or we will give the MIXER and a year's subscription to the AMERICAN MESSENGER for $1.10.

American Tract Society

THIS SOCIETY was organized in 1825. Its work is interdenominational and international in scope, and is commended by all evangelical denominations.

It has published the Gospel messages in 178 languages, dialects and characters. It has been the pioneer for work among the foreign-speak- ing people in our country, and its missionary colporters are distributing Christian literature in thirty-three languages among the immigrants and making a home-to-home visitation among the spiritually destitute, both in the cities and rural districts, leaving all kinds of Christian literature, also the Bible or portions of the Scriptures.

Its publication of leaflets, volumes and peri- odicals from the Home Office total 791,142,050 copies. It has made foreign cash appropriations to the amount of $796,137.39, and grants of electrotypes to the value of $61,177.96, by means of which millions of copies of books and tracts have been published at mission stations abroad.

The gratuitous distribution of the past year is to the value of $15,439.05. The grand total of its gratuitous distribution has been to the value of $2,617,820.90, which is the equivalent of over four billion tract pages.

The total number of family visits that have been made by the Society's colporters during the last year is 202,877; the total number of volumes distributed by sale or grant is 59,431, making the total number of volumes that have been circulated by colporters in the last 73 years 17,326,937, and the total number of fam- ily visits that they have made during the same period 18,406,676.

Its work, ever widening, is dependent upon donations and legacies, and greatly needs in- creased offerings.

A friend writes as follows to the Gen- eral Secretary of the American Tract Society:

"I have your letter, and feel very much interested in your great work, and also enjoy the AMERICAN MES- Senger with its account of what you are doing. I have sustained serious losses myself, otherwise I would send you more, but I take great pleasure in en- closing check for $5.00 for your good work, and pray for God's blessing upon it."

Equal Opportunity

EVERYONE COMPETING in the Contest will have an equal opportunity to win. In the first place, the pictures have nothing to do with theological learning, and it is not presumed that those competing have any special knowledge of the Bible. They do not need any—for the quotations from which all must choose are designated for the use of everybody.

THE PICTURES ABOVE, for instance, are two of the regular Contest pictures. If you do not know any Bible quotations that might fit what is shown there, then you can glance over the list of quotations, and pick out some that do express the scene.

THIS IS BY FAR THE MOST pleasurable, most interesting, and from all standpoints the best home pastime we know of. We are certain you will enjoy it thoroughly.

DON'T DELAY, fill in the Entry Coupon to the left, get the complete OUTFIT, and start in the pastime at once.

PROVE THEM FOR YOURSELF

"I'm studying the Bible. What can I get to help me in this work?" The answer is given in The Christian Worker's Library of twelve selected titles. They are not books which because so recently written are wet with ink, and we did not intend that they should be. But they are books which have been "weathered" and have proved like good friends tried and found true. They will help you in Bible study and work, when you want help and where you need help this year, next year and as long as the books last. The books cover a wide range of subjects in both the Old and New Testaments. Just examine the titles.

THE ATONEMENT

By James Stalker, D.D.

The Atonement is a master subject and takes a master hand to treat it so that it is understood. Divided into three parts this book deals in a striking and scholarly manner with the New Testament situation, the Old Testament preparation and the modern justification. The book will work wonders in clearing up many of the questions on the subject.

AMONG THE HOLY PLACES

By James Kean, M.A., B.D.

The author takes the reader with him in his journey and enables him to see in the most vivid manner the scenes visited. One can from this book obtain all the advantages of a personal visit to the places described and probably with still greater profit, for the reason that the author has the ability to see all that is worth seeing. Fully illustrated and with index.

BIBLICAL HISTORY AND GEOGRAPHY

By H. S. Osborn, LL.D.

Admirably adapted for use in Bible Classes. Dividing the Old Testament into six periods the author takes up chronologically the prominent events and historical points and defines them. Three chapters are given to the canonizing of the Scriptures and the origin of the Talmud. A description not generally obtainable of the places where the events occur is given in each case. A splendid perspective of events, time and places in all their original forms is thus presented. The New Testament is likewise analyzed. There is an excellent index and many colored maps.

COMPANION TO THE BIBLE

By E. P. Barrows, D.D.

This is a critical study of the books of the Bible in four parts. Part 1 treats of the evidences of revealed religion. Part 2 examines and classifies the books of the Old Testament. Part 3 examines and classifies the books of the New Testament. Part 4 takes up the principle of Biblical interpretation.

EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY

By Charles P. McIlvaine, D.D.

This is one of the standard works on the Evidences. The material as set forth in this volume proves clearly, decisively and conclusively a sufficient basis for faith in the divine origin, nature, methods and results of Christianity. After reading this book, a believer in God and His kingdom would become a stronger man with stronger beliefs. An unbeliever would turn from his unbelief to the earnest and continued following of Christ.

THE MASTER PREACHER

By Albert R. Bond, A.M., D.D.

Jesus was a teacher and a preacher with methods, a personality, themes and a success of His own. His methods and themes could be followed with success to-day if you only knew how. Dr. Bond knows how, has done it successfully, and presents in this book for your benefit practically every phase of Christ's methods. Its careful study will well repay any preacher.

THE LORD OF GLORY

By Benjamin B. Warfield, D.D., LL.D.

Here is presented the Godhead of Christ on evidence taken from the New Testament. It is an unanswerable plea based on the designations which the New Testament writers apply to Jesus when concurrently speaking of Him. When Dr. Warfield comes to the end no doubt remains that Jesus Christ was indeed the "Lord of Glory." The book has index of designations, passages of Scripture and authors cited. As an aid to the study and preaching of this subject it is without equal.

THE TWO ST. JOHNS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

By James Stalker, D.D.

Did it ever occur to you to make a study of the two Johns in the New Testament? Dr. Stalker with his remarkably original method, clarity of style, comprehensiveness of view and suggestiveness of matter, contrasts the lives and characters of John the Evangelist and John the Baptist. Full information on a vitally interesting subject.

THE OLD-TIME RELIGION

By David James Burrell, D.D., LL.D.

There is not a dull sentence in this whole book, much less a dull page. Full of terseness and vigor, replete with sound thoughts, the book goes to the root of the Christian religion and tells why this religion is so solid and satisfactory. Young and old may read it with profit. Young ministers may well take it to heart.

STUDIES IN THE BOOK OF GENESIS

By H. B. Pratt

This is without doubt one of the best commentaries on the book of Genesis. There are so many doubtful points, overlapping events and apparently conflicting circumstances in the first book of Moses which need satisfactory explanations that this volume meets a demand of students of the Old Testament. It is especially valuable because the subject is handled by a man who has given a life to its study and research. The book makes an excellent companion volume to "Evidences of Christianity."

TRANSFIGURED

By Joseph Hamilton

What "Studies in the Book of Genesis" does to give light on a difficult subject in the Old Testament, "Transfigured" does to explain one of the most talked-of events in the New Testament. "Transfigured" is an unusual volume—a devout and common-sense study of this unparalleled scene. It treats of the unseen and eternal.

THE WONDROUS CROSS

By David James Burrell, D.D., LL.D.

We could not resist the temptation to have the twelfth and last volume of this library one of Dr. Burrell's. The Cross is such a vital factor in every life when properly understood that this book seemed more than appropriate to lend dignity to a library intended first of all for the Christian reader and student. It is most acceptable with its pointed truths full of significance.

Our offer saves you one-half. These twelve handsome volumes will be delivered to your door for $7.50. The original selling price was $15.00. The illustration gives but little idea of the beautiful appearance these books make. They will add dignity and strength to any library. Think of it. Twelve books, 4300 and more pages well printed on clear white paper, each book uniformly bound in one of the best library cloths, gold stamping, at the low price of $7.50. Graduation Day and After

upbuild and uplift

WHEN the school doors close behind the young graduates their education is only beginning. It is indeed "Commencement" with them. They have been learning during these school years to use books as tools, and only as they carry out and perfect that knowledge are they going to be well-developed men and women. For this reason let your "graduation gift" be one that shall further that end.

What better gift can you place in the hands of the young graduates as they leave the class-room than a book that is going to help carry on their education? And who will dissent when we say that the first book needed is a handy-volume Bible or Testament? Here is one that can be slipped readily into a young man's pocket or a young woman's suitcase and yet is a library in itself.

DR. WORK

UNSEARCHABLE RICHES

BY

REV. EDGAR WHITAKER WORK, D.D.

Pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, New York City

THE writer once had what was to him a thrilling experience in one of the great jewelry houses of the world. A friend long in the confidence of the firm had invited him to visit the house and see something of its wonders. Astonishment came at every step of the way. The brilliant show-cases and crowded shelves dazzled the eye.

But this was not all. The guide led the way to a basement room, where were immense steel safes. One glimpse through the open doors fairly staggered the mind. Nor was this all. "Let us go to the sub-cellar," said he. Here were piled hundreds of trunks and boxes owned by individuals, containing untold riches, household valuables and heirlooms. The greatest surprise was yet to come. Leading the way into a private room and calling an attendant our friend said, "Bring the jewels." Presently the attendant returned carrying a box which he deposited on a table in the room. When it was opened we beheld a group of wonderful jewels, including a diamond, an emerald and some rubies, all of priceless value.

"And this," I said to myself, "is like the Gospel. It is of priceless value to men. They can never state its real value, which is beyond computation."

This indeed was the thought of the Apostle Paul when he rejoiced that grace had been given to him to preach among the Gentiles the "unsearchable riches of Christ."

It is well to ponder that word for a little—unsearchable. It is no ordinary word, nor is it carelessly chosen. It was meant to convey the idea of the exceeding great wealth of Christ and His Gospel. Unsearchable riches! This means riches that cannot be fully searched out, riches which are so great that you cannot go to the end of them, you cannot take them all in. Literally it means riches that cannot be tracked by foot-prints. Do you see how startlingly vivid the word is? Suppose there is a rich property that you wish to investigate. Well, the surveyor has gone over the ground, has he not? All you need to do is to search out his marks, and follow his foot-prints. In other words the property can be tracked by foot-prints.

But the riches of the Gospel can never be fully explored. No one has gone to the heart of them and left foot-prints by the way. No spiritual surveyor has ever reduced them to a system of signs and marks. Christ's riches are untrackable, unsearchable. You cannot trace them to the end. You cannot search them out in their depth and fulness.

The riches of Christ are like a labyrinth or a maze. I remember going one day in California with some friends to see an ingeniously constructed labyrinth. It seemed very simple when first we entered it. But soon we began to realize how little we knew about it. We walked on and on with nothing to guide us, no marks, no foot-prints by which to trace our way. All the time we were in the midst of a great wealth of foliage, but we never seemed to come to the end. It was labyrinthine wealth.

This is what the Apostle Paul says about the wealth of Christ in the Gospel. It is labyrinthine; you cannot track it to its end. Unsearchable riches! No wonder the Apostle's heart burned when he thought of preaching such a Gospel. No wonder he marvelled that God had commissioned him to bring men to see and believe in the unsearchable riches of Christ. Who indeed is sufficient for these things? Who can search out the unsearchable, and comprehend the incomprehensible? Let us think of some of the unsearchable things of the Gospel.

There is first of all the very Person of Christ Himself. If you would lose yourself utterly, begin to try to track your way into the riches of His personality. Try to think out for yourself, as some have essayed to do, an explanation of Christ. Try to manufacture an intellectual formula that will fit this case. Try to establish a spiritual category in which He can be placed, a classification that is comprehensive enough to include all that you find in Him and at the same time comprehensible to your own mind.

It is plain that the New Testament writers, inspired though they were, found the subject of Christ's personality a staggering one for their minds. Take John's Gospel—he is trying to lead us into the labyrinthine wealth of Christ's person. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." "In Him was life, and the life was the light of men." "And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us * * * full of grace and truth." Such language does John use in trying to track his way into the unsearchable riches of the person of our dear Lord.

Listen to the Apostle Paul, who is also a great explorer of the unsearchable riches. No one among all the New Testament writers has given us greater thoughts to think about Christ. "The image of the invisible God, the first-born of all creation." "He is before all things and in him all things consist." "In him dwelleth all the fulness of the godhead bodily."

As if this were not enough, Paul says in another place that the light of the knowledge of the glory of God hath shined in the face of Jesus Christ!

But not even Paul's gifts of insight and expressions are sufficient to take us to the end of Christ's riches. He himself is always aware of heights that he could not reach, and depths that he could not fathom. Once thinking of the wonder of God's love and purpose in the Gospel, he broke out helplessly, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and the knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgments and his ways past tracing out!"

How true this is in our own experience of Christ. The riches of His nature are past finding out. There is even more and more. There is nothing lacking in Him. His wealth is exhaustless. The more we know of Him, the more we realize the boundlessness of His person. The better we know His character the more we find to astonish and inspire us. We feel just what the Apostle John said of Him, that he is "full of grace and truth."

There are other great characters, but all have something confining, and limiting about them. Only Christ exceeds our expectations and overleaps all the boundaries of our comprehension. The believer has never yet been found who has searched out all that Christ is to a true and active faith. One can lose himself in the wealth of Christ.

"Our garden is a labyrinth too,
Whose paths no clue can tell;
It spreads about us, ever new,
A wealth unsearchable."

How unsearchable are the riches of Christ's resources. The New Testament dwells upon this truth impressively. He is appointed "heir of all things." He upheld "all things by the word of His power." What a vista these scriptural sentences open up into the spiritual resources of our blessed Lord. No wonder a learned writer spoke of the pierced hands of Christ as having lifted the world off its hinges and having turned the currents of the world's life into new channels. He was but echoing the thought of scripture about the power and resource of Christ. "All authority hath been given into me in heaven and on earth." Not only on earth, but in heaven also!

The scripture everywhere is trying to give us glimpses into the resources of God in Christ. It begins in the prophecies, "Wonderful, Counsellor, the Prince of Peace." "The government shall be upon his shoulder." The climax is reached in such words as these:—"Wherefore also God highly exalted Him, and gave unto Him the name which is above every name, that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven; and things on earth, and things under the earth." Measure the riches of your Lord's resources, if you can, with a measuring-rod such as this!

It is a serious question whether the church and the world at large have ever begun to draw upon the resources of Christ. Oh, yes, our garden is a labyrinth! You can walk all your days in the midst of your Lord's limitless resources and never come to the end of them. "All authority is given unto me"—and this is the church's Lord and Master. "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." And this is the church's charter and commission. "Begotten again unto a living hope by resurrection from the dead." And this is the power that worketh in us.

Yes, "the riches of his glory" are bestowed upon us in the Gospel, the glory which is reflected out of that glory which He had with the Father before the world began. The "riches of God's purpose" too are in the Gospel, the eternal purpose which He purposed for the world through him. "The riches of his love" are there, too, the love whose breadth and length and depth and height are utterly beyond our knowledge. And the "riches of His power" are in the Gospel also, for though the cross be to some a stumbling block, it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth.

Oh, the unsearchable riches of Christ in His Gospel! Are they not enough for every believer's fullest needs? "My God shall fulfil every need of yours according to his riches in glory in Christ Jesus." Notice, it says, His riches in glory. For our Lord has gone back to the glory which He had with the Father before the world began. And there from the height and splendor of His glory He gives gifts unto men.

Why then should any of us ever suffer any feeling of poverty when the riches of Christ are so unsearchable? If we cannot track out His riches, we can nevertheless enjoy them. Who can trace all the glory and wonder of the mountains? Yet we can all enjoy and possess the mountains. We can even have the riches of the mountains in our souls, albeit we do not comprehend them fully. Is it not so also with the unsearchable riches of Christ? His whole wealth is for us. "All things are yours." "In Him ye are enriched in all things."

Is it pardon we need? It is Christ, "in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace." There is the measure of His giving—the riches of His grace. A subject once demurred at the splendor of his monarch's gift to him. "But I give like a king," was the ruler's reply. Is it grace and strength that you need? "My resources are boundless," says the Lord. "Hitherto have ye asked nothing in my name. Ask and ye shall receive."

Is it peace that you need? "He is our peace." "My peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you. Not as the world giveth, give I unto you."

Is it power that you require? "I can do all things through him that strengtheneth me." May He "grant you according to the riches of his glory to be strengthened with might by His spirit in the inner man." Unto whom else shall we go? He has the words of eternal life. Why turn to any other source of strength, when our all-powerful, all-resourceful Lord is near? Yes, the unsearchable riches of Christ are near! They are not far to seek. One need not travel long distances to obtain them. We never tire of hearing the oriental tale of the man who sold his property and traveled a long way off to find riches in the earth. The man who bought his property dugged in the earth and found "acres of diamonds."

Yes, Christ is near.

"So near, so near to God,
Nearer I cannot be,
For in the person of his Son,
I am as near as he."

How full of meaning then are all those invitations that bid us trust Him, and follow Him and walk with Him. The daily companionship of Christ is its own rich reward. Each hour we spend with Him we experience some new measure of His unsearchable riches. Every time we press closer to His side we find some new treasure of His love and power. Every moment that we spend at His feet as learners we enter more deeply into the wealth of His person and His resources.

Out of His unsearchable riches many surprises are certain to come. It will be as it was in the discovery of one of the rich fields in South Africa. A man was passing a house one day, and a playful boy threw a stone at him. In the same spirit the man took up the stone to toss it back. As he was about to do so, he glanced at it and caught the gleam of something bright. It was a diamond that had flashed out upon him, and soon men were rejoicing in the discovery of a wonderful diamond field.

You will be doing some common task, and suddenly the unsearchable riches of Christ will flash out upon you. You will be in the midst of a great trial or grief, and the light of God in the face of Jesus Christ will illumine your darkness. You will be facing some great difficulty or danger and the wealth of Christ's power will be with you in the crisis. You will be contending with some great temptation, and Christ will wonderfully strengthen you according to the riches of His might. You will even be in the midst of the world's poverty, yet you will know that you are rich—rich toward God, rich in the wealth of Christ.

No, we cannot track out the riches of Christ. We cannot come to the end of what He is, and what He has. There is more in Him than we can ask or think of. Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard. The Apostle Paul can only say—may ye "be strong to apprehend with all the saints what is the breadth and length and height and depth, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, that ye may be filled unto all the fulness of God." It is not necessary to comprehend. It is our privilege to be filled with His unsearchable riches.

Sail Onward

BY Z. I. DAVIS.

*Upon Old Ocean, wild and gray,
A gallant ship speeds on its way;
The winds blow east, the winds blow west,
To speed her o'er the foaming crest.*

*Sail on, stout-hearted captain brave,
Fresh courage gain through wind and wave.
The stars may guide your course at night,
Till morning brings the welcome light.*

*Heed not the stormy, wild sea mere,
But onward sail with purpose true;
Cease not the watch afar or far,
But breast the wave 'neath sun and star.*

*Let not your arm grow weak with fear,
Be brave and full of hope and cheer;
The Lord holds both the sea and land
Within the hollow of His Hand.*

*Life is an ocean, we must sail
With faith and hope, if we prevail;
The voyage o'er, and danger past;
What joy to anchor safe at last!*

The Child in the Pew

BY WILLIAM NORRIS BURR.

AN elderly man sat among his books reviewing the years of his life. Among the earliest pictures that he found hanging on Memory's wall was one to which his mind had reverted not infrequently since the shadows had begun to lengthen for him. He saw himself a boy in the old family pew on Sunday morning, thinking a boy's thoughts as the familiar figures of the townspeople appeared here and there around him in their accustomed places, and as the old-time service proceeded through reading and prayer, song and sermon. The face of the good man in the pulpit he had never forgotten, though he could not recall a word of any of the sermons he had heard from his lips. But "lasting impressions for good" had been made upon him, though the homiletics of the occasion had left no mark of which he was now conscious.

It was the singing of the stately old-time hymns that had chiefly caught his boyish interest. And one of those hymns seemed always to filter in among his memories whenever he recalled those days of early church going. It was the old hymn, beginning—

"To us a Child of Hope is born,
To us a Son is given,
The Wonderful, the Counsellor,
The Mighty God of Heaven."

He seldom heard that hymn sung now. Once while sojourning for a few weeks in a little valley that lies hidden among the lower slopes of certain western mountains he had been pleased to hear the pastor of the local church announce this hymn at the close of one of the morning services; and when he found it was set to the same old tune to which he used to hear it sung in the old boyhood days—a hymn tune very seldom found in church hymnals today—he felt constrained to join heartily in the singing, though in these later years the service of praise usually found him a silent, though deeply appreciative, worshipper.

"I shall be with you one more Sunday," he had said to the pastor at the close of the service that morning, "and I want to ask if we may not sing again next Sunday the same hymn with which the service closed today. That hymn, and the tune to which it is set in your hymnal, lie back at the very beginning of my church-going when I was just a little lad, unconsciously receiving my first religious impressions. It is almost the only feature of the church service of my very earliest church-going days that has left any deep impression, and I am sure I cannot tell why it is that that particular hymn has seemed to take hold of me as has no other one of the hymns of that day. But it is the one chief echo from that remote time. It has often come to me as an inspirer of faith during the years of my active life, helping me to keep my hold on things eternal at times when things temporal seemed 'pressing hard to draw me from the skies.'"

He recalled all this that day among his books, and his thought ran on:

"I wish parents and Sunday school teachers, and all who have the care of the little folks and the children a bit older grown, might not overlook the place of the church service among the agencies that contribute to the religious education of the child. Blessed is the man who can carry with him through a long life some stay to his faith received when he was a wide-eyed youngster just looking on, and taking on the impress of his surroundings—blest as has been that saintly old man who told me only the other day that the remembrance of a painted cross on the wall back of the pulpit in the old home church to which he went with his parents when a very small lad had often checked him in a moment of weakness when tempted to yield to the pressure of some questionable influence.

"Some are saying that the modern Sunday school is sufficient for the modern child; but I am sure the church service still has something for the children that is peculiarly its own gift."

IN HIS SERVICE

By Judson Swift, D.D.

HE past year has been one of the most extraordinary in the history of the human race. The tragic and titanic struggle throughout the whole of Europe has held the attention of the world. The foremost Christian leaders have watched with deep and prayerful interest the progress of the Kingdom of God. Will the sacrifice of billions of dollars and millions of human lives lead men to a fuller realization of their need of God in Christ, and also to a clearer and more positive statement of evangelical faith?

The Congress on Christian Work in Latin America, held at Panama, is an outstanding feature of the year. The Laymen's Missionary Campaign also marks an epoch in the history of Christian work and missionary effort.

The American Tract Society has and ever must have an important and vital relation to all the interests involved in the progress of the Kingdom of our Lord. Organized ninety-one years ago for the purpose of diffusing a knowledge of Christ as the Redeemer of sinners, it has been faithful to its mission.

A Great Variety of Publications

For the last fifty years the American Tract Society has been persistently and patiently pleading for a recognition of the necessity of a greatly increased supply of Christian literature for the mission fields of the world, and now rejoices in the recent awakening upon this subject. The Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Conference has appointed a Sub-Committee on Christian Literature, and the Co-operating Committee on Latin America has also appointed a Literature Committee.

The Tract Society's publications embrace almost every variety of religious literature. It is of the greatest importance that good literature should be printed and distributed to counteract the terrible influences of evil literature. The publications have included a large number of those needed at the Mission Stations in the vernacular for work in non-Christian lands, also for the vast number of foreigners in our midst. Among the publications of the past year there stand out prominently four volumes in Spanish entitled "A Syllabus of Old Testament History", "The Better Way", "How To Study The Bible", and "The Teaching Manual" for use in Sunday-school work, and one volume in Portuguese, "Principles of Biblical Interpretation". Not for many years has the Society published so many books for Latin America in a single year.

An attractive "Go-to-Church Stamp" in three colors has been issued, the first and only one of the kind, and 125,000 have been distributed; 50,000 tracts in the Russian language have been distributed among the Russian prisoners in Germany; 5,000 "Soldier's Text Books" in the Dutch language and 5,000 in the English language have been sent to the War Zone.

The new publications for the year total nineteen, of which thirteen are in English, four in Spanish, one in Portuguese, and one in the Dutch language. A total of 170,750 volumes has been issued during the year just closed, making the grand total of volumes issued 35,188,890. Of tracts 1,265,900 were issued during the year, making the grand total of tracts 461,929,642. The Society publishes four periodicals, THE AMERICAN MESSENGER, The Amerikanischer Botschafter, in German, Apples of Gold, and Manzanas De Oro, an illustrated paper in Spanish for the Spanish-speaking Sunday schools. The total of periodicals issued for the year reaches 2,061,000, making the grand total of periodicals 297,521,168. The grand total of publications issued by the Society during ninety-one years amounts to 794,639,700 copies.

Missionary Colportage

Missionary Colportage is the advance guard of the Gospel Message. The colporteur is, indeed, a traveling preacher. He is more than this, he belongs to the infantry of Christ's Army. He does not build trenches, but assaults and even takes the trenches of both infidelity and religious indifference, the two strongholds of Satan. The colporteur comes in contact with people in every walk in life. He distributes his tracts and volumes in the home. The children as well as the adults become interested; many find the way of salvation, become members of the Church and frequently whole communities are transformed. It is a sad fact, however, that 60,000,000 of our 100,000,000 population are not in attendance upon any church or Mission Station, and moreover, the usual evangelistic and missionary efforts put forth do not gain to any perceptible extent upon the non-Church-going. If these are ever reached, it must and will be by means of the printed page and its house-to-house distribution through missionary colporters. The following figures present a concrete example of the benefits of colportage. The total number of family visits made by the Society's colporters during the year is 206,167, the total number of volumes distributed, 55,517, and 6,355 meetings have been held and addressed by the colporters. The total volume circulation by colporters is 17,382,454, the total number of family visits, 18,612,843, and the total number of religious meetings, 592,303.

The Tract Society's colporteur has distributed to the immigrants at Ellis Island 124,488 tracts in over thirty languages and dialects. He has also conversed with thousands of the immigrants, urging them to accept Christ as their Saviour, has addressed words of comfort to the discouraged and afflicted, and also distributed several boxes of clothing to those in need.

Giving Freely

On one occasion Jesus said to his disciples that they should proclaim the Gospel message without money and without price. Gratuitous distribution has carried the "Good Tidings" to millions, tens of thousands of whom have become earnest Christians.

Requests for Gospel leaflets come from every part of the country, indeed, from beyond the seas. Their distribution reaches the inmates of the almshouses, the sailors in port and on the ocean, miners and lumbermen, the dwellers upon the ranches in the Far West, the inhabitants of rural districts where there are no Churches, also the poor and neglected ones in the tenement districts of our great cities.

Twenty-eight libraries have been granted

AN IMMIGRANT AT ELLIS ISLAND

during the year to Sunday schools and Mission Churches.

The total value of the Society's free distribution for the year reaches $16,684.99, making the grand total since the organization of the Society $2,634,505.89.

In Non-Christian Lands

The National Evangelistic Campaign in behalf of Japan shows a total of 914 meetings held with an attendance of over 160,000, of whom 5,000 enrolled themselves as inquirers. There has also been an increase in the circulation of the Scriptures, while the Japan Book and Tract Society of Japan, which is aided by the American Tract Society, reported that they had printed in the past year over 13,000,000 pages.

Missionary work in China has suffered to some extent on account of the war, but less than might have been expected. An Evangelistic Campaign has been conducted among the educated classes. The aggregate attendance was 117,605, the audience being composed principally of students and commercial classes. Over 10,600 men signed cards affirming that they would study Christianity, and govern their lives accordingly when convinced of its truths.

There is a growing interest in solving the problems of the Moslem world. The Mass Movement in India has continued, one denomination alone reporting that its Missions in the Northwest and South India baptized 30,000 converts during 1915, and that 40,000 were refused baptism because there was no opportunity for teaching them. There were also reported 150,000 inquirers in these Missions alone. The outlook is, therefore, most hopeful. The desolating influences of the war have been sorely experienced at various Mission Stations in Africa. There have, however, been many copies of the Scriptures distributed. Commissions have been appointed on Education, Language and Literature. In South Africa in spite of the effects of the war, and the serious depletion of the missionary staff, more than one thousand have been added to the roll of Church members, while the number of catechumens was increased by 3,359. Africa, notwithstanding the rapid progress of Mohammedanism, still continues to be a favorable soil for evangelical Christianity.

The American Tract Society through its foreign cash appropriations for the creation of Christian literature in the vernacular at the mission stations has been a strong right arm to the missionary. The white harvest fields throughout the world await the reapers, and Christian literature must have a large share in gathering the sheaves.

The Society's foreign cash appropriations for the past year amount to $3,319.00, making the total cash appropriations to foreign lands for the creation of Christian literature $799,456.00, and the total value of the grants of electrotypes $61,177.96, by means of which 5,667 different publications have been issued abroad in 178 different languages, dialects and characters.

Latin America

We are hearing much of Latin America and are likely to hear more in the next two or three years, and, indeed, until a much larger missionary work is established in the southern half of our hemisphere, where the people are in so great need of moral and spiritual uplift. The Congress on Religious Work in Latin America has awakened a widespread interest, which is steadily growing in intensity. It was in every respect a notable Congress. Never did men and women assemble with a keener realization of the importance of the task they had in hand, nor give themselves to its performance with a greater consecration.

One of the special needs emphasized in the Panama Congress was a greatly increased supply of Christian literature. In this work the American Tract Society has had a large part, and will no doubt render a service many times greater than it has in the past. It is earnestly hoped that Christian givers will make special and generous gifts in behalf of this most essential line of service. Christian literature is needed, first for the educated classes, who do not accept the Christian faith and standard; second, for the less educated non-evangelical; third, for the building up of evangelical Church members, and fourth, for the training of ministers and of Christian workers. The American Tract Society is ready and waiting to co-operate to the fullest possible extent in producing the needed literature.

Things Done

To recapitulate, it may be stated that publications have been issued in 178 languages and dialects, totalling 794,639,700 copies. In Spanish and Portuguese, 14,748,588 copies of volumes, tracts and periodicals, including 126,000 Spanish hymnals, have been issued, amounting in value to $633,546.00. During the past year 1,265,900 tracts have been published and 170,750 volumes have been printed. The total number of periodicals issued for the year is 2,061,000. The grand total value of gratuitous distribution reaches $2,634,505.89, equivalent to 5,269,010,000 pages of tracts. The total number of family visits made by colporters is 18,612,843; the total number of volumes distributed by them is 17,382,454, and they have addressed a total of 592,303 religious meetings. In foreign lands 5,667 titles of distinct publications have been issued by the aid of the Society's foreign cash appropriations which amount to $799,456. Electrotypes to the value of $61,177.96 have been granted to mission stations abroad, making the total sum expended for publishing Christian literature in foreign lands $860,633.96.

The Challenge of Opportunity

We seem, indeed, to have come upon the hour when God is laying bare the hidden riches of secret places, and giving birth to a new age, summoning the nations by most extraordinary means and through a mysterious Providence as well as by the most crushing and disastrous war in the history of mankind to a realization that material forces and triumphs are of little or no consequence, and have no power either to build, strengthen or perpetuate character and peoples. The hour hangs golden over all the world to proclaim the richness of Divine truth and grace for the redemption of man through faith in Christ, and the bringing in of humanity perfected, and the establishing of the Kingdom of God in the earth. The great lesson needing to be learned above all is the one taught by Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Men have changed and transgressed this lesson and law of life, continually gathering to themselves without abundantly giving to others. The world mission fields are calling for the world gospel of our Lord and Saviour. Hitherto this call has been meagrely answered and the nations of all continents have either not heard it to any extent or have not to any extent received it into their hearts and lives. The work needed throughout all lands and among all peoples cannot be wrought unless the professed followers of Christ enter the world-wide opportunity, and give the red blood of sacrifice and service to preach the Christ of God to perishing humanity. The real using up of one's self, the willingness to die and spend life's current for the purpose of giving the new life to the sin-dying, alone will suffice to meet the need that confronts us.

The printed page is among the most efficient agencies for carrying the Gospel Message to all peoples. Its power is marvelous, and its influence as wide as human intelligence. It can be multiplied indefinitely. It goes everywhere, giving to all and asking nothing in return. It speaks to the many, as well as to the individual, and to the one as easily as to the many. It goes into the home, also into the shop and banking house, into the mansion and cottage, to the crowded city and the sparsely settled countryside. Thousands and tens of thousands can testify that they found the way of salvation by means of the printed page, while countless others have been comforted and cheered.

The American Tract Society at this moment is in need of One Million Dollars; One-half Million to be used to multiply one-hundred-fold the printed page and missionary colportage for its distribution, and One-half Million to be used for literature in Latin America and in cash appropriations to be sent to foreign mission stations for the publication of Christian literature in the vernacular. Is the securing of this fund an impossible task? "Whatever ye shall ask in prayer believing, ye shall receive." "All things are possible to him that believeth."

A Sunshine Song

BY E. A. BRININSTOOL.

*Would you make some saddened heart
Just a little lighter?
Would you make some burdened life
Just a little brighter?
Drop a word of hope and cheer;
Set the echoes ringing,
With your notes of love and joy
As you go a-singing.*

*Would you cheer a lovely soul?
Shower it with gladness,
Fill each hour with smile and song,
Driving out the sadness.
Bear a message of sweet love
To the lowly places,
Till the gloom is all dispelled
From the careworn faces.*

*Would you smooth the rugged path
Down along life's highway?
Would you plant the rose of faith
In some lonely byway?
Just a deed of kindness done
Clears the path before us,
And the lilies of God's love
Bud and blossom o'er us.*

*Just a little word of cheer
Lightens every duty;
Just a smile will often show
Faces wreathed in beauty.
Scatter sunshine as you go,
Comfort the distressing,
And your rich reward shall be Heaven's choicest blessing.*

ROSES

By L. D. Stearns

OH, GLADYS!" There was an ecstatic thrill in the young voice and almost breathless awe in the young face. "What a beautiful, beautiful bush!"

The girl, spading about the roses, dropped her trowel. "Mercy me, Beth!" she exclaimed. "How you frightened me!" Reaching out, she touched an opening bud. "'Tis pretty, isn't it?" she nodded.

"Pretty!" The girl at the gate stepped inside and came slowly up the walk. "Pretty!" she repeated, in a half reproachful manner. Her eyes rested an instant on the neat little cottage in the background; the tall old elms at either side, and the fountain, sparkling in the sun. Then they returned to the bush, with its mass of fragrant bloom. "It's exquisite! superb!" she half whispered.

"Elegantissimo!" There was a teasing note in Gladys Wentworth's voice. "I always think of you as a quiet little thing," she continued reflectively, "until you happen to see a sunset, or a flower, or the sea, and begin to grow red and white, and sort of—of—ascend into another sphere."

The thin, rather pale face of the other flushed. "I know I'm silly," she nodded, and then, bending, pressed her cheek to an opening bud. "But, you see, I never owned a rosebush in all my life. It's sort of peering into an unexplored country when I see anyone weeding and spading and making them grow and bud and bloom."

Gladys laughed, a little uncomfortably. "Well," she declared, "I'd give you some roses, only it would spoil the beauty of the bush. I made up my mind last year, when Ardelle Wilson bragged so about hers, that I'd have one to beat it, if it took every second of my time to tend it. And I have. There's all of a dozen more blossoms on mine than on hers. I wouldn't spoil it for a farm."

She tipped her head reflectively to one side. "Sometimes," she said, "I've thought hers were a little deeper blush. But mine certainly has more blooms."

The flush on Beth Dillon's sensitive face changed to a vivid red. "Why, Gladys," she asserted, staunchly, "I'm sure Ardelle didn't mean to brag. And I know I didn't mean to beg! I wouldn't have you spoil your lovely bush for the world." A rarely sweet light touched her face. "The love of them's mine," she said softly, "so I really half own them, after all."

In the great square, just a stone's throw away, the old Academy stood, massive and strong. On the grounds, groups of girls flitted to and fro; some with books in their hands; some chattering and laughing as only school-girls can.

"We won't have many more Saturdays." Beth's voice held a little wistful note. Half unconsciously, she was wondering how it would really seem to own a rosebush. She remembered, years and years back, climbing dark, rickety stairs that led to the single room where she and her mother and Baby Tom made their home, shouting excitedly at every step, "Muvver! Muvver! Some day I'se going to buy a wose!"

But the day had never yet come.

Stooping, Gladys picked up her trowel. "What are you going to wear for graduation?" she inquired.

The red color faded slowly from Beth's face, leaving it very white. The clear grey eyes opened a little wider. One hand closed tightly. Then, for the second time, she bent and touched her cheek to the great red rose. "I'll have to get along without anything new," she answered slowly and distinctly. "If graduation wasn't so near, I'd have to leave school and go to work. It took every cent of mother's insurance to pay the funeral bills. I'm helping Mrs. Lane for my board until after it is over. But that's just a blind. She doesn't need me, and she's poor. She's an angel! The minute I'm through, and get to work, I'll pay her every cent it's cost. It's the only way I could stay."

"But," Gladys argued, "you sold your furniture." With the back of her hand she pushed back a bothersome curl. "You haven't even a white dress," she said shortly. "You told me so, at the picnic, last week."

Beth nodded. "The furniture didn't bring much," she announced, "and I paid the doctor out of it. Then, you know, Uncle Ned took little Tom. He'll need the rest for clothes in the next year or two. He's only ten, you see. Gladys! how you must love your home!"

The girl digging about the rosebush straightened. Her black eyes flashed. The soft velvet of her cheeks glowed an angry red. "Beth Dillon," she charged imperiously, throwing back her head, "you've no right to disgrace the Class!"

Beth's face grew a shade whiter. Her lips parted; but she did not speak.

For a tense minute the two girls stared into each other's eyes. Then with her head poised as high as Gladys' own and her eyes wide and bright, the white-faced girl walked slowly down the path and out of sight.

As she walked up the street, bright with the summer sun, her eyes smarted and her throat felt dry and hot. There was no hint, even, of color in her tragic young face. Every suffocating throb of her heart seemed to let in a fresh wave of bitterness.

At the corner she met a couple of her classmates.

"Hallo!" cried Ardelle Wilson, and her companion echoed the greeting.

Ardelle glanced closely at her. "Don't forget the club this afternoon," she warned. "You know, it means keeping our class interest and friendship for ten years, anyhow. Won't it be great when that yearly meeting rolls around?" Her eyes sparkled. "Which motto do you like best," she inquired, "'A Touch of Cheer,' or 'By Their Fruits'?"

Beth never remembered whether she answered, or not. The one thing of which she was conscious was that dull monotone in her brain, "Disgrace! Disgrace!"

Ardelle continued. "I think," she mused, "I like the last. If we remember that we're to be known by our fruit, just as a tree is known by its fruit, I think we'll be pretty sure to give cheer."

The two girls went chattering up the street, and Beth hurried on. At a little footpath, leading into a tangle of woods, she paused; then turned into it.

She forgot Mrs. Lane, dinner and everything else, but that word that stung, and stung, "Disgrace!"

When she was far in the depths of the wood, alone with the trees, the shrubs and the soft, scurrying things of the forest, she threw herself, face downward, on a great mound of soft green moss and sobbed as if her heart would break.

In a dull way she seemed to see Gladys' sunny curls and scornful, laughing face, side by side with Ardelle's winsome sweetness and dainty frocks, while before them her own thin, grave little face, big hungry eyes and plain, cheap calico gowns, with never a ribbon, never a frill, danced mockingly.

When, at length, she seemed to have no more tears left, she sat up. With trembling hands she pushed the dusky hair far back. "I suppose," she quivered, "they all think so. I suppose I just ought to give it up and drop out, now, at the very last."

A squirrel blinked his bright eyes, at her very feet. Then he set up on his haunches, chattering merrily.

A smile flicked tremulously over Beth's white face. Reaching forward, she touched him. They were never afraid of her, these furry, soft little things of the outer world.

Something of the tumult faded from her face. The grey eyes stilled into a steady determination. "I'm going on," she announced to herself deliberately. "Mother used always to say to remember it was the one thing to do—go on."

Rising, she took the path for home.

Mrs. Lane glanced up as she entered the house. "Ardelle Wilson just went up to your room," she nodded. "She said she had something to leave there."

A quick surprise touched Beth's face. Then she turned and went slowly up the stairs. She wondered what in the world Ardelle Wilson could have left there. Shy—plain—busy from morning to night—she had been left strangely alone.

As she reached her hand toward the knob a little flickering smile, that somehow seemed almost tears, touched her lips. She was thinking of the day her mother died. "Little girl," she had murmured, "God will give you something, by and by."

Pushing back the door, she stepped inside. A great mass of roses met her. Pink and white and red they lay in exquisite confusion on the bed.

With a short, quick breath she sprang forward; then paused.

Ardelle, with deft fingers, drew forth the most exquisite flower of them all. Her face was very sweet, her eyes very womanly. But her words were softly merry. She pressed it into the other's hand. "I just happened to remember you didn't have a garden, honey," said she. "We'll share. Every time I pick a rose, it seems as if two take its place; so help yourself whenever you choose."

Then, suddenly, she threw back her head. The merry note left her voice. "Beth Dillon," she declared, slowly and distinctly, "I've just left Gladys. I want you to know I'm proud of you. I'd like to be friends."

The face of the girl standing just inside the door went from white to red, then back to white again. Slowly the grey eyes dilated. Her nostrils quivered. Little beads of perspiration glistened on her upper lip. She took a single step forward, then, with a long, quivering breath, buried her face in the soft petals of the rose. "Oh!" she breathed, "you can't even guess what it means—that rose! and that word!"

Something in her voice sent a quick, warm glow through Ardelle Wilson—a glow that was mixed with a queer, almost solemn touch. In an intangible way she felt something she could neither express nor understand. "Mother says the only way to enjoy flowers, or anything else," she said, half nervously, "is to share them. I guess she's right."

Then she added, "I feel as if I'd just listened to the benediction," and, crossing over, she kissed the rapt face of the girl standing by the roses. "I picked every one there was," she whispered, "and I'm glad, so glad, Beth Dillon. For I know now what it means to enjoy flowers. There'll be others tomorrow."

The girl by the bedside did not answer. Her

"EXCEPT YE BECOME AS LITTLE CHILDREN"

By Pearl Howard Campbell

ONE of the most effective rebukes which Christ ever gave to His disciples came after that famous dispute as to who should be greatest in the kingdom of Heaven. And according to His usual method, Jesus made His meaning clearer by both precept and example. "Things seen are mightier than things heard," says Tennyson in Enoch Arden, voicing a world-old axiom of good teaching. If we study our Lord's methods, we shall find He invariably makes His appeal to eyes and mind at the same time.

It is easy to understand how the dispute arose. The twelve men who followed Jesus had the utmost diversity of temperament and character. There is John, the faithful and devoted disciple, of whom it is no exaggeration to say that he poured his soul into the chalice of his heart and held it to the Master's lips. John has come down to us through the ages as the apostle of love, yet the portraits of him in the New Testament reveal traces of pride and ambition, whose dross is transmuted later on into pure gold.

There is Peter, impetuous in his affections, timid in his resolutions, whose weakness and whose splendid greatness were known to Jesus from the very first. There is Thomas, the loving yet melancholy apostle whose honest doubts, so forcibly expressed, won, happily for us, one of the tenderest proofs that the dead do not change beyond recognition.

There is James, whose patient, self-reliant character shines forth so splendidly in his Epistles. As for the others, though we may limn them as our fancy pleases, we know beyond a doubt that they possessed strong characters, or they would not have withdrawn from the mass of their fellows and, as Peter says, "left all to follow Christ."

Therefore it is not hard to see how the dispute arose. They knew that they were coming shortly to the cross-roads of Christ's career and that some strange issue of the Messianic kingdom was at hand. Yet, instead of stimulating their self-denial, it awoke their covetousness. Where they should have been humble and affectionate, they were jealous and proud. What the kingdom was to be like they did not know, yet even the best of them thirsted for power.

On the road, perhaps mindful of the preference which had been shown to Peter, James and John, who alone beheld the Master transfigured on the Mount, they disputed among themselves as to which of them was the greatest. At the time Jesus takes no notice of the controversy. The moment when the lesson which He intends to teach can make its most forceful appeal has not yet come.

So vividly does Mark describe the incident that we can almost see it happening. It is quite possible that the Master had at first gone to welcome the disciples as they arrived, while they, full of the controversy, had at once addressed their question to Him in the antechamber, "Master, who is greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven?" and then He, reading their thoughts, put the searching counter-question as to what had been the subject of their dispute.

Leading the way into the house, Jesus sat down, not only to answer their question, but to teach them what they so greatly needed to know. And to illustrate this lesson by a symbol of exquisite tenderness and beauty, He called to Him a child and placed him in the midst of them. Was there ever a more striking object lesson? What more telling rebuke could He have given them? "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last of all."

Their weakness was to be their strength. He who would be great must possess the qualities of a child, its patience, obedience and love. The greatest service implies the most self-denial. And then the story says: "He took the child in His arms." The things the disciples counted great—teaching, preaching, working miracles—were, after all, of no more importance in the Father's eyes than the humblest service done for Christ's sake.

"Except ye become as little children"—the meaning compressed in this brief sentence after all these many centuries falls too often on deaf ears. Love that gives itself without hope of reward, faith that is as limitless as the ocean, are not these the characteristics of every normal child? How readily they believe the things we tell them. They never question the miraculous in religion. Their own lives are filled with marvel and mysteries, so they turn at once to a Saviour who could heal the sick and open blind eyes. They do not doubt His powers.

The question is sometimes asked: "At what age should religious training begin?" and the answer is: "Just as soon as the child can talk." Really, the religious training begins before, or should, as the child sees his elders at prayer. The baby lips that ask mother or father for things can just as easily be taught to lisp the evening petition to the Heavenly Father.

In an English magazine there appeared some years ago a little verse called the "White Pater-noster." I do not know the author, yet the prayer is so suitable for a child's lips that it deserves a wider circulation. This is the prayer:

"God is the Branch and I the flower,
Pray God grant me a quiet hour;
I go to sleep some rest to take,
The Lord only knows if I shall wake;
Sleep I ever, wake I never,
God receive my soul for ever."

Much of the training in the earlier years is given unconsciously. For that reason it makes the deeper impression on the mind that is like a wax tablet. No number of sermons about prayer can influence a child so much as the daily sight of its parents actually saying their prayers. Woe to the nation if it be true that the family altar is a thing of the past.

"Except ye become as little children." One cannot repeat these words without wondering if the Master's thoughts did not turn for a few moments to His own childhood, carefree and joyous as it must have been, though the surroundings of the home were very humble. After the visit to Jerusalem, there are no more references to His boyhood, yet here and there in the story of His later years glimpses of it shine forth. We know almost beyond a doubt that the prayer He uttered on the cross, "Father, into Thy hands I commend My Spirit," is one which He learned as a child and said each night as He fell asleep.

The other incident touching little children seems so natural an outgrowth of the former that it is impossible to separate them. The wonder is how the disciples could have been so slow and dull as to have needed it. Yet so full of unspeakable tenderness and sweetness is the story that we should have all been the losers if it were omitted from the Gospels. The disciples appear to have been indignant that a number of mere women and children should come obtruding on more important persons and interests. Indeed, it was incompatible with the dignity of a Rabbi that he should notice them. Yet Mark tells us that Jesus "was much displeased"—the only time this strong word is used of our Lord—not with the women for bringing the children, but with the disciples for attempting to forbid them.

Once more our Lord reminds them and us that of such is the Kingdom of Heaven. And, taking the little ones in His arms, He puts His hands upon them and blesses them, thus forever consecrating child life. Women were not honored, nor children loved in antiquity, any more than they are among the heathen nations at the present time.

Christianity is the one religion in all the world's history that has stood for the rights of children. In non-Christian lands they are still considered the slaves, the pets, the playthings and the absolute property of their fathers. Neither Greek science nor Roman law considered that the newly-born child was entitled to the privileges of humanity. The little life lay absolutely in the father's hands, and if he chose to dispose of it, it was no man's business. Even Pliny, the elder, defended infanticide as a necessary check on population. Almost the first work that the newly organized church began was the establishment of foundling hospitals and the change in the cruel laws regarding the rights of children. The baby hands stretched forth to Christ did not plead in vain.

"Except ye become as little children," said our Lord, and never was there greater need for considering the solemn warning in those words than now. The nation that forgets them and that exalts might at the expense of right is already weighed in the balance and found wanting.

Roses

lips were just a thread apart; her eyes—but they were beyond description.

Ardelle tip-toed to the door. "Good-by," she said, and, slipping out, closed it softly.

Kneeling, Beth reached out both arms and gathered the roses to her heart.

She was very still; very white. Something in her lonely, shy heart seemed to have burst into sudden life, and song. A little quivering thrill shook her. A single instant she closed her eyes, then, without another glance at the flowers, she crossed to the rickety little stand and, picking up a pencil, began to write.

That soft, sweet song in her heart! She must give it life!

It was a simple little tale; a quaint little fairy dream of loneliness, and dungeons, and despair; and then, at the last, a sudden breaking into light and love and beauty. But the girl's soul was shaken. Her path ahead blazed clear.

When it was finished she arose, strangely tired. A kind of solemn awe was in her eyes. Softly she gathered up the roses and carried them down the stairs. "Mrs. Lane loves flowers, too," she smiled.

She piled them, a glowing mass, into a great bowl and left them on the dining-room table. Then she returned to her room.

The manuscript of the little tale, that was later to carry its message of sweetness to thousands of souls, stared up at her.

Just a second she hesitated—hand outstretched. Then she shook her head. "Somehow," she whispered, "I don't want to read it. But I know—I know, now, why I was born." She crossed to the window, and stood looking up at the darkling sky. The first faint star came out. She drew in her breath. "And," she said slowly, reverently, "I'm going to share my roses, dear Mother in Heaven, however and wherever they bloom, always and forever."

Ninety-First Annual Meeting of the American Tract Society

The Ninety-first Annual Meeting of the American Tract Society was held in the Marble Collegiate Church, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-ninth Street, New York, N. Y., on Wednesday afternoon and evening, May 10, 1916. Mr.
William Phillips Hall, president of the Society, occupied the chair. Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. L. B. Chamberlain.

The minutes of the last annual meeting of the society were approved.

A general review of the operations of the Society during the past year was given in the reports presented by the treasurer, Mr. Louis Tag, and the general secretary, Rev. Judson
Swift, D.D.

The following resolution was then adopted:
Resolved, That the Annual Report, an abstract of which has been presented in the reports of its officers, be approved, and published under the direction of the Executive Committee.

A statement embodying a preamble and resolution was offered by Mr. Edward L. Suffern, as follows:

Fifty years ago there entered the service of this Society, a young man, or one who at that time might be called more properly a young boy. His position was inconspicuous and his duties subordinate, but into their performance he infused a zeal and a spirit of faithfulness which transformed his plain duties into opportunities of service.

As he advanced from lower to higher positions the same spirit was manifested and characterized all his work. The Society could not help but recognize his faithfulness, loyalty and integrity and his advancement testified to such recognition. Although he was called Assistant Treasurer, he filled for many years the office of Treasurer, and during the last three years he has borne the full title of his office.

The American Tract Society is glad to honor one who has served it so faithfully, and feels that whatever honor it can pay to Mr. Louis Tag is but small recognition of what he himself is, and of what he has done. On behalf of the Society the following resolution is presented:

Whereas, Mr. Louis Tag, the Treasurer of this Society, has been in its service for the long period of fifty years, during which time his record has been that of a devoted, faithful and loyal co-worker from the first day until now

Resolved, That the Society feels it cannot pass unnoticed such an unusual event, and that it wishes to express to Mr. Tag, its honored Treasurer, its sincere and high esteem for him, and appreciation of the service he has rendered, and to hope that all his days may witness the continual blessing of God and the joy of His presence.

Upon motion, the foregoing preamble and resolution were adopted by a unanimous vote.

On behalf of the committee appointed to present nominations for officers of the society, Rev. Harlan G. Mendenhall, D.D., its chairman, presented the following recommendation:

Recommended, That the Board of Managers for the coming year be the same as last year, as shown in the printed copy of the Ninetieth Annual Report of the Society, except that in place of Rev. Cortland Myers, D.D., Mr.
Thomas S. Bassford, Rev. David Wills, D.D.
(transferred to Distributing Committee), Rev.
Isaac W. Gowen, D.D. (transferred to Distributing Committee), Mr. Frank L. Brown (transferred to Finance Committee), and to fill vacancies now existing on the Board, the following be elected: Rev. Cornelius Woolfkin, D.D., Rev. Edgar Tilton, Jr., D.D., Rev. Wil- liam Dana Street, Rev. J. R. Mackay, D.D., Rev.
James H. Hoadley, D.D., Rev. Henry M.
Brown, D.D., and Mr. George T. Coxhead.

Motion was made, seconded and carried that the report of the Nominating Committee be received, and that the recording secretary be authorized to cast one ballot for the election of the Board of Managers, in accordance with the above recommendations.

Thereupon the recording secretary cast the ballot, and the president declared the Board of Managers elected in conformity with the recommendation of the Nominating Committee.

At this point a recess was taken, while the president and Board of Managers met in an adjoining room.

Upon the return of the president to the chair announcement was made that the Board of Managers had elected the following officers of the Society to serve for the ensuing year.

PRESIDENT, Mr. William Phillips Hall.

VICE-PRESIDENT, Rev. John Henry Jowett,
M.A., D.D.

HONORARY VICE-PRESIDENTS. The same as last year, as shown in the printed copy of the Ninetieth Annual Report of the Society, except that in place of Rev. J. B. Thomas, D.D., deceased, the following gentleman was elected:
Hon. John Wanamaker.

It was also reported that the Board of Managers had elected the following members of the Executive Committee:

On the Publishing Committee, for three years, from May, 1916, to May, 1919, Rev. David
James Burrell, D.D. and Rev. J. B. Hamilton,
D.D.; for two years, from May, 1916, to May, 1918, Rev. Frederick H. Knubel, D.D.; and for one year, from May, 1916, to May, 1917, Rev.
J. W. Kemp, D.D.

On the Distributing Committee, for three years, from May, 1916, to May, 1919, Rev.
David Wills, D.D. and Rev. Isaac W. Gowen,
D. D.; for one year, from May, 1916, to May,
1917, Rev. Robert Watson, D. D.

On the Finance Committee, for three years, from May, 1916, to May, 1919, Mr. Frank L.
Brown.

The following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the President appoint a Nominating Committee of three to present nominations for officers of the Society at the next annual meeting.

It was also voted to adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Ninety-first Anniversary of the American Tract Society be further celebrated by a Sermon to be preached by Rev.
Edgar Tilton, Jr., D.D., in the Reformed Church of Harlem, New York, on Sunday morning,
May 14, 1916, at eleven o'clock.

At the evening session devotional exercises were conducted by Dr. David James Burrell, pastor of the Marble Collegiate Church.

Mr. Harry Wade Hicks, General Secretary of the Missionary Education Movement, spoke on "Outstanding Features of the Program of Christian Work in Latin-America."

Rev. Henry J. Soudder, for eighteen years a missionary in India under the Foreign Mission Board, of the Reformed Church in America, spoke on "The Claims of India."

A closing prayer was offered by Rev. Isaac Pierson.

The meeting then adjourned.

Missionaries in Porto Rico Plead for Prohibition

A conference of delegates from all the Protestant Missions in Porto Rico recently passed a resolution asking for the prohibition of the liquor traffic in that island. Rev. A. G.
Axtel, of the American Missionary Association and president of the Blanche Kellogg Institute, in moving the adoption of the resolution, declared that the wretched condition of poverty which prevails so largely in Porto Rico is due in no small measure to the use of alcoholic liquors. It is said that every Porto Rican present at the conference voted in favor of the resolution which was cabled to the Chairman of the House Committee on Insular Affairs and the Chairman of the Senate Committee on the Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

The Consecration of Money

Job 27:1-23.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. May 29. Consecrated goods. Gen. 13:1-4.
T. May 30. Unconsecrated cash. Luke 16:19-31.
W. May 31. Giving to God. Exod. 35:4, 5, 21-26.
T. June 1. Systematic giving. 1 Cor. 16:1, 2.
F. June 2. Proportionate giving. Deut. 16:17.
S. June 3. Giving the best. 2 Cor. 8:5.

This topic brings before us a most important subject, the right understanding of which will have a most potent effect in promoting the welfare of the Kingdom of Christ.

What Money Is

Money is a word which has a wide range of meaning. In its narrowest significance it means simply a medium of exchange. But in its larger application it is practically synonymous with wealth, and it is this more comprehensive meaning to which we shall devote our careful attention. Money, looked at from this latter point of view, means all our valuable possessions. It includes everything that we own which has a money value. It includes houses and lands, stocks and bonds, mortgages and deeds, in short, everything that can be turned into cash.

How Money May Be Used

Money may be used in a great variety of ways. It may be employed in business, it may be spent for travel, it may be used for pleasure, and it may be given for benevolence. It may be invested in real estate, it may be deposited in a bank, or it may be hoarded in some secret hiding place. Money may be used wisely and well, or it may be expended recklessly and foolishly. It may be used for legitimate objects or it may be prostituted to vile and criminal purposes.

Money in itself is absolutely devoid of character, but it is a touchstone for human character, for nothing so quickly reveals the nature of a man or woman as the way in which money is used by that person.

"Money and the Kingdom"

Many years ago the late Dr. Josiah Strong wrote some trenchant truths about money in one chapter of his famous book entitled "Our Country." This chapter bore the heading, "Money and the Kingdom," and some of its telling paragraphs are as pertinent to the present time as when they were first written. He says:

"When the Scriptures and reason speak of God's ownership in us, they use the word in no accommodated sense. It means all that it can mean in a court of law. It means that God has a right to the service of his own. It means that since our possessions are His property, they should be used in His service—not a fraction of them, but the whole. Every dollar that belongs to God must serve Him. And it is not enough that we make a good use of our means. We are under the same obligations to make the best use of our money that we are to make a good use of it; and to make any use of it other than the best is a maladministration of trust. Here, then, is the principle always applicable, that of our entire possessions, every dollar, every cent, is to be employed in the way that will best honor God."

The Principle of Stewardship

The great principle that should control our use of money is the Christian principle of stewardship. This was the principle that Christ laid down in His parables and it is the only basis upon which Christians can satisfactorily adjust their relation to money matters.

What We Owe to Christ

Words cannot express all that Christ has done for us. Our debt to Him is immeasurable. Therefore we are under obligation to consecrate to Him all our money and to use it in such ways as will best advance the interests of his Kingdom.

The Will and the Way

Philippians 4:1-13.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. June 5. Will to follow. 1 Kings 18:21.
T. June 6. Will to serve. Josh. 24:14-21.
W. June 7. Will to submit. Luke 22:39-46.
T. June 8. Way to follow. Num. 14:11-24.
F. June 9. Way to serve. John 13:1-17.
S. June 10. Way to submit. Jas. 4:10-17.

The key verse of the Scripture selection assigned for this topic is this: "I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me" (Phil. 4:13). If the question is raised, "How may I secure the strength of will that I need to enable me to walk in the way that I ought to go?" the answer is found in these glowing words of the Apostle Paul.

What Should We Will to Do?

The Daily Bible Readings suggested for this topic give some hints as to the things that as Christians we ought to will to do.

In the first place we should follow Christ as closely as we possibly can. There are many professing Christians who follow the Master at a far distance. Though they bear the name of Christ, yet they seem ashamed to be seen in close company with Him. All such need a reinforcement of will that they may walk in more intimate communion with the Saviour.

In the second place we should make it our duty and our privilege to serve our fellowmen. A true Christian life finds most appropriate expression in service.

Again we should bring our wills into submission to God. This is sometimes a hard and difficult task. We are often like wayward children, who demand their own way, regardless of what is best for them. But God's Will is always best, and we should sink our wills in His.

Again, we should will to give more generously to the support of God's work. The call of the present age is for more self-denial and for greater consecration to the cause of the Master.

A will to work is a crying need in the life of many an enrolled Church member. There are many drones and too few active workers in most of the Christian churches of to-day.

What Is the Way in Which We Should Go?

Our Lord Jesus Christ once said, "I am the Way," and therefore we should look unto Him for guidance as to our walk in life.

We should walk in the way of service. This will often mean the way of sacrifice, for we must spend and be spent, in order to bring to others the knowledge of Him whom to know aright is life eternal.

It is a cheering thought to remember that the way of service and of sacrifice leads to the way of happiness. There is no joy so great as the joy of Christian service, and in sacrifice there is a compensating satisfaction which cannot be expressed in mere words.

The way of service and of sacrifice leads on to final victory and eternal glory. The Christian whose life is hid with Christ in God shares in the Master's triumph and His final exaltation.

Help for the Pilgrim

In order to walk in the way in which Christ would have us go and to will to do the things which He would have us do, we need divine help. Some simple means by which the Christian pilgrim may obtain help may be mentioned at this point.

Prayer will serve to strengthen our wills, so that we may rightly guide our thoughts and direct our actions.

The study of the Bible will throw a flood of light on the duties of life. It will give us many things to contemplate which are honorable, just, pure, lovely, and of good report.

Christian fellowship will aid us to choose the right course and to persevere in fighting the good fight of faith.

The Usefulness of Good Cheer

John 16:24-33.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. June 12. Rejoice! Deut. 26:1-11.
T. June 13. Cheer brings health. Prov. 17:22.
W. June 14. Cheer lightens burdens. Prov. 15:13-15.
T. June 15. Cheer brings hope. Acts 27:22-36.
F. June 16. Cheer brings confidence. John 14:1.
S. June 17. Joy imparted. Acts 2:25-28.

This topic is eminently practical. It brings before our minds the blessings that flow from Christian optimism, and should make us all apostles of that spirit of which the Master spoke when He said, "Be of good cheer."

An Antidote to Evil

Good cheer is the best antidote to trouble. "In this world ye have tribulation," said Jesus, but He quickly added, "Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world."

Good cheer is an antidote to evil thoughts. Vice and crime flee at the approach of one whose heart and life are full of good cheer.

In time of sorrow the spirit of good cheer comes as a ministering angel to bind up the hearts that are broken and to comfort those that mourn.

An Effective Reinforcement

In these days our minds often turn to military metaphors. Good cheer is an effective reinforcement to the soul that is beleaguered by evil. It constitutes a reserve of inestimable power to the man or woman who is battling against temptation. Good cheer is one of our strongest defenders against the assaults of the world, the flesh and the devil.

Good cheer is not only a help to ourselves but it imparts strength to others. There is nothing more contagious than the spirit of good cheer. A smile widens like a wave over the faces that see it.

An Unfailing Tonic

Better than any fabled elixir of life is the spirit of good cheer. As some one has wisely said, good cheer propagates itself; if you are cheerful one day, you are quite likely to be cheerful the next day.

The author of the Proverbs says, "A cheerful heart is a good medicine," and human experience has abundantly confirmed the truth of that inspired saying.

A sense of humor is one of the simple qualities of character that serve to develop the spirit of good cheer. Let us look for the bright side of things, and cultivate the disposition to smile, for this will help mightily in the maintenance of a cheerful spirit.

The Basis of Good Cheer

Let us always remember that good cheer must be based on reality. A hope that is founded merely upon pretense is vain. The real things of life are the things that are set forth in our most holy faith. The religion of Jesus Christ is the only sure basis for a lasting good cheer.

Good cheer is essentially one of the Christian graces. It is really one of the fruits of the Spirit. Faith in God and devotion to Christ beget in the heart of the believer a spirit of good cheer.

A Cluster of Quotations

"As plants without the sunshine grow white and feeble, so no Christian life can be vigorous without the sunshine of cheer."

"The cheer of nature is varied, partly sunshine, partly beautiful colors, partly form, partly fragrance, partly happy sounds; so God has many ways of producing cheer in the heart."

"Give us the man who sings at his work. Be his occupation what it may, he is superior to any of those who follow the same pursuit in silent sullenness."

"As there is only a little difference between no fire and a fire, merely the striking of a match, so there is usually some very little cause that will produce cheer in a life."

JUNE 25.

What Is the Purpose of Our Life on Earth?

Ephesians 2:1-10.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. June 19. A life with a purpose. John 18:33-40.
T. June 20. Purpose; to testify. John 1:6-12.
W. June 21. To serve men. Acts 13:36.
T. June 22. To do God's will. Heb. 10:36.
F. June 23. To become Christlike. Rom. 8:28-31.
S. June 24. To develop. Matt. 13:52.

The Apostle Paul describes the purpose of every Christian life in these words: "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God afore prepared that we should walk in them."

In the familiar language of the Westminster Catechism we are told that the chief end of man is "to glorify God and enjoy Him forever."

A Fine Building

There is a popular simile which compares a human life to a building. If we adopt this simile, we may say that the purpose of our life on earth is to erect a fine building, the foundation of which must be a noble character. Great patience is needed in building our lives, and the greatest care must be exercised in selecting the materials which shall enter into the structure. If we put wood, hay and stubble into our building, then our lives will not stand the test of fire. But if we put gold, silver and precious stones, then our work will be enduring, whatever the ordeal through which it may have to pass.

A Fruitful Tree

We may change the metaphor and regard our life as a tree. In this case our ideal should be to make our life like "the tree planted by the streams of water, that bringeth forth its fruit in its season."

Not long ago the writer attended the unveiling of a beautiful memorial church window dedicated to the memory of a most exemplary and faithful Christian worker. The devoted woman in whose honor this window was placed in the church to which so much of her thought and energy were given during her lifetime had been superintendent of the primary department, and had left her impress upon many young lives. Her Christian life had been like that of a fruitful tree, and most appropriately did the scene depicted in that memorial window show a beautiful tree planted by a stream of living water, while underneath were inscribed the words which have already been quoted from the First Psalm.

One great purpose in life which we should never lose sight of is to grow in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. The end of our living should be to develop those Christian traits of character that will show to others that we have been with Jesus and learned of Him.

Let us remember that time is required for growth in nature. So in the development of Christian character, time is required in order to attain to that likeness to Christ which He Himself has set as the goal of our efforts.

A Time of Preparation

It may be truly said that one great purpose of our life here on earth is to prepare for that life which we believe awaits us in the hereafter. If we are true Christians, our home here should be a foretaste of the heaven hereafter.

A successful life must be dominated by a definite purpose. An aimless, purposeless life will accomplish little or nothing for the Kingdom. Some one has well said that an archer aiming at a star shoots higher than one who aims merely at a tree. So the nobler our life purpose, the more effective for good will be our life.

Our Little Folks

Thoughts from a Rose

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PRESTON PAPERS."

SURELY you won't expect us to study, Mamma dear, while we're camping out! Whoever heard of any one studying in vacation time?" And with these words ten-year old Oliver Freeman looked almost dolefully at his twin sister Olive. I say "almost" dolefully, for Oliver was such a roly-poly, happy-go-lucky, contented little chap, that even the sight of the books, pads, pencils, pens and ink that Olive had brought at her mother's request to be packed in his suit-case could not entirely cloud his face.

"I hope that my twinnies can trust mother just a day or two longer to decide what is best to take with us and what to leave at home," said Mrs. Freeman, very softly and with affection in every syllable, as she rested from her work, to look with tender eyes at the boy and girl who had been so joyously helping for to-morrow's trip; "but, if not, why we can leave the 'study' materials right here."

"Oh, all right, Mamma!" said Oliver, his face breaking into a smile just as clouds part to show the face of the sun at a dark hour in an April day sometimes. "I'm sorry I spoke, but truly I have been awfully tired of books this term, and I never was before in my life. But put them in, and maybe we'll use 'em!"

"Maybe we will! And it may be that we'll be glad to do so," echoed his mother, as she handed to each child one more book to wrap in soft paper so as to prevent the rubbing of the bindings.

And true, enough, the twins were glad they had brought their books and study materials, when they came to the morning of the third day after their arrival in camp. There had been two days of uninterrupted sunshine, which were spent by the children in roaming through the woods, fishing in the bay, and doing the necessary errands for their camp, while the older ones helped the maid settle things for their six weeks' stay.

But on that third day it seemed as if all the clouds were conspiring to "leak," and the rain just poured down. If you have ever been in camp at such a time, you know how damp, dark and even dreary, the world seems. Just so it seemed to Oliver, when he came in with the gallon can, which had been filled with milk at the nearby farm, where they bought supplies. But he carried in his hand a big beautiful pink rosebud on a long stem with large green leaves, all dripping wet; and the very presence of the beautiful rosebud seemed to make the dull room bright; and when it had been put into the narrow, tall glass pitcher that had hitherto been used for cream for the table, its fragrance filled the room with sweetness.

"We will have our first vacation lesson, I think, right after breakfast," said Mrs. Freeman, as she poured the coffee for the older ones and the cocoa for the twins. "The rose will be our text-book, this time; but we shall need the pads and pencils, too."

"How lovely!" exclaimed Olive.

"It will be fun," admitted Oliver, graciously.

Certainly was a fascinating hour of study. And believing that Our Little Folks, who belong to the AMERICAN MESSENGER family and are scattered all over the world, will be interested in these "Lessons from a Rose," I am going to repeat them for you.

Mrs. Freeman, seated in her low chair, with the twins in front of her, each with pad and pencil in hand, said:

"As your first heading write these words: 'What I have observed in the rose,' and draw a line underneath that heading. Then half an inch from the left margin of your paper write the figure (1). Now, what do you first observe, Olive?"

"The rose is very beautiful," replied Olive, with great interest.

"Good!" exclaimed her mother. "You may write that for your first sentence, after your figure (1). Now, Oliver, what do you observe?"

"The rose is large and brightly colored, even in the rain," answered Oliver.

"Extra good! Write that down on your paper after your figure (1). Now each put down (2) and write out your next observation—just what you can see,

When the time for the "Lessons from a Rose" was over, this is what Olive had written under the heading: "What I observed in the rose":

- (1). The rose is very beautiful.
- (2). The rose leaves are green, and the petals are white, yellow, red or pink.
- (3). The rose never says, "I'm so homesick."
- (4). The blossoms are very sweet to the smell, even when they fall to pieces and get to be very dry.
- (5). I never saw a rose that did not have thorns on its stem.

Under this same heading Oliver had written.

- (1). The rose is large and brightly colored, even in the rain.
- (2). The rose keeps bright and sweet, and sweet but always making some one happy.

(2). We see its beauty first; but we love its sweetness next.

Under this heading Olive named these thoughts:

- (1). One rose can make many people happy, if they only see or smell it.
- (2). Children can make other people happy, by being as quiet and clean as the rose, even if they can not be as pretty; and they need not be "thorny," although God made thorns on the rose.
- (3). A cross child, who is pretty, is like a thorny rose, and hurts its friends.
- (4). A rose only lasts a short time, but it takes years for a child to grow—and it costs lots of money all the time.
- (5). Even when it has to go where it does not care to go, the rose does not talk back nor cry!

Now I think that both the twins did pretty well, in bringing out some beautiful thoughts about a rose. Supposing you try some day, and see what lessons you can gather from the flowers.

The Little Blue Spool

There was once a little blue shuttle in a great loom that was weaving beautiful silk cloth of many colors.

But one day a little shuttle, or spool, that carried a certain shade of blue thread, said to himself: "There isn't very much blue, that I can see, in this silk. I don't believe I'm of much use, and I'll just not work any more."

And he didn't. And when the silk was taken from the loom, it was found that the silk was ruined, for there were great gaps in it where the little spool should have run through.

We all have a part in the great loom of life; and, like the little blue spool that spoiled the beautiful silk, we each must do our share of work, or spoil the whole web.

The Finishing Touch

It was not a very pleasant face that Walter brought when he came to papa for the finishing touches to his dress.

"There, everything is on now," shouted Walter.

"Why, no, son!" said papa, soberly. "you haven't put everything on yet."

Walter carefully inspected his clothes from the tips of his small toes to the broad collar about his neck. He could find nothing wanting.

"You haven't put on your smile yet," said papa, with the tiny wrinkles beginning to creep about his own eyes. "Put it on, Walter, and I'll button it up for you."

And Walter began then and there to put it on. And now he never really calls himself dressed up for the day until he has put on a sunny face.

Have any young American smiles been forgotten in the morning, "getting ready?" If so, no amount of fresh collars and new neckties and gay hair ribbons can ever take their place. The only really safe way is to put the smile on the first thing. Besides, the other things will go on better if you do.

Some of the Smallest Things

The smallest bird of Europe, it is said, is the gold-crested wren, and of America the humming bird. The smallest quadruped in the world is the pigmy mouse of Siberia. One of the most diminutive plants is the Arctic raspberry, which is so small that a six-ounce bottle will hold it, branches and all.

touch, taste or smell. You shall have five minutes for this part of the lesson," and Mrs. Freeman laid her watch, open, on the table by her side, calling "Time!" at the end of the five minutes.

"Leave a little space, and below the last line you have written make another heading of these words: 'What the rose made me think,' underlining it as before, and numbering the thought sentences. I will give you six minutes for this," and she looked at the watch.

Lower bent the heads of the twins, as their pencils scratched hurriedly and their little faces flushed with delighted interest in a lesson where so much was left for them to "ferret out," as Oliver said, and "not at all like a dry lesson from a book," added Olive.

so making it pleasant for all those who see it.

(3). The rose has to be carried away from its home, sometimes.

(4). The petals are folded over each other while in bud, but they open out when the rose is in full bloom.

(5). The rose has a thorny stem, but the blossom is so sweet and beautiful that we forget the thorns.

(6). Roses are not all of the same height or color; but they all belong to the same family.

(7). It takes a lot of care besides the rains and sunshine to make a perfect rose.

The Family Circle

An Unexpected Gift

By Fannie Medbury Pendleton

ZEVIAH HANKIN stood leaning against her gate. One hand held a letter that fluttered tremulously. Her unseeing eyes stared out from her white face. Molly Avery, the little teacher, walking home after the last weary day of school, came upon Miss Zeviah, and wonder grew in her eyes.

She had never seen any strong emotion depicted upon Zeviah Hankin's face; all expression seemed to have been swallowed up by the tense, strained look that sprang from the long years of monotonous sewing, day after day, year after year, in the front room of the little house. One instinctively knew that Zeviah was a dressmaker, even if one gazed upon her face for the first time. Even on Sundays, it would take but a slight stretch of the imagination to believe that she had pins in her mouth, or that she was about to lay a pleat or pull out a basting. Now, Molly Avery saw with surprise that the lines left by the passing years had been broken up and by so strong an influence as almost to break down Miss Zeviah herself.

She paused for a moment, then the older woman reached out a trembling hand and touched her.

"It's come," she said brokenly. "I always felt it would, and that I should never know what to do with it."

"What has come?" questioned Molly gently.

Zeviah held out the letter. Molly glanced over it and then lifted a radiant face from which all the weariness had suddenly vanished.

"Oh, Miss Zeviah, I am so glad!" she cried. "It's just like a fairy story."

But the face of Zeviah Hankin was set in misery.

"Help me into the house, child. What shall I ever do with it? How in the world can I use it?"

In the front room, Miss Zeviah sat down blindly and covered her face with her hands. Molly knelt beside her and put an arm about her shaking shoulders.

"Dear Miss Zeviah," she said, "I don't understand. Why, if anybody had left me a fortune, I should be overjoyed. Is it the bereavement?"

Zeviah Hankin sat up stiffly and her thin jaws came together with a snap.

"Bereavement! I guess not! It was all father's once, and Uncle Joshua got it away from him, and we had to get along on short commons for years, and now, when it's too late to do father any good, the old wretch has died and left it to me. Grief! I guess not!"

Her face settled hopelessly into the old lines as her glance wandered about the cluttered-up room so suggestive of her struggle of years. Then she looked up, and there were defiant tears in her eyes.

"I'll tell you something, Molly Avery, and don't you ever dare tell a soul; but I hate to sew—I've always hated it; and I've sewed and sewed and sewed, and now I know I can't stop. It's been so long. Why, if anybody's shroud needed mending at the Judgment Day, I believe I should step right in and do the job. I can't think of anything else—I've sewed so long. Now there's that cushion—I hope I'm not crazy—but I hate that cushion and the old machine that's made my back ache so many years. I've an awful feeling that they are real and won't ever let go of me and let me be a woman. Oh, what shall I do—what shall I ever do!" Her voice trailed off into a wail.

"You will sit right here," said Molly calmly, although there was a little catch in her voice, "and I shall make you a good strong cup of tea, and then you will feel better. The shock has been trying, but after you have had your tea, we will talk about all the good times you are going to have and all the lovely things you are going to do; and of course you are not going to sew any more—unless it is to make pretty things for yourself."

Zeviah Hankin meekly drank her tea. Her eyes followed Molly as though she were afraid the girl might suddenly vanish. Presently she spoke:

"This is the last day of school, isn't it?"

"Yes." There was a thankful note in Molly's voice.

"Are you going to stay home this summer?"

"Yes," said Molly again. "I wanted to go to visit Annis, but I guess I can't quite manage it. It's a long journey."

"Well," Zeviah's tone was decisive, "you aren't needed at home and I want you to stay with me. You can tell your folks I'm not well and you are going to stay here and help me. I don't want anybody to know I'm rich—not just yet. It'll be all I can do to get used to it, myself, without them all lipping in. You go home and get what you need till tomorrow and come back. I must have you, child. You've got to help me not to sew. I tell you I won't sew—I won't."

Zeviah stood on her front porch and watched Molly out of sight. She sat there until it began to grow dark, then she stole into her front room and picked up the hated cushion.

The shadows were lengthening over the green fields as she crept stealthily out of her side gate and sped down the patch toward the creek. There had been a mill there years ago and the old dam still remained. The water was falling over it now in soft monotonous murmur. Miss Zeviah walked with one hand behind her. She could not look at the old cushion. Even now it seemed to burn her fingers.

She reached the dam and stepping out on one of the old timbers, she hurled the cushion from her. It was not heavy and she watched it bob along down the stream, until it was lost to sight around the turn.

There was a new look on her face as she turned away. The fear was gone and in its place were exultation and triumph.

"And there were at least fifty good pins in it," she murmured to herself in reckless joy; "perhaps sixty."

But, as she neared the house, something of the old weight returned, and her smile faded. She looked anxiously down the road.

"I hope she won't be long," she said to herself. "I do hope she will hurry."

Suddenly she dropped down upon the bottom step and stopped both ears with her fingers. It had seemed to her excited fancy that she could hear the sound of the old machine. There Molly found her when she came back, and leading her into the house, put her to bed like a child. It was late into the night before the girl left her and went out closing the doors carefully.

Molly went into the parlor that had served as a shop so many years. There was a large closet opening from it, and into this, she pushed the old machine. The sewing table followed, the basket of pieces and all evidences of Miss Zeviah's years of dressmaking. It was midnight before she climbed the stairs to the little room where she had slept before, and the room below was no longer a shop but a cosy and comfortable parlor.

The next morning all Roseboro knew that Zeviah Hankin was not well—the doctor feared a nervous breakdown—and that Molly Avery was staying with her.

"But can she afford to be sick?" It was the mother of Almira Steers who inquired. Almira's wedding was approaching; her sewing was not done and a new dressmaker must be found.

Molly looked her calmly in the eye.

"If you mean money," she said, "Miss Zeviah has something of her own, and she will do very well."

An Unexpected Gift

Molly had taken the helm, and Zeviah watched her with gratitude too deep for expression. They had always been fond of each other—these two. Perhaps it was because of Molly's tenderness for the woman who had missed so much of the wonder of life; perhaps it was also because Molly was all that Zeviah would have liked to be. Molly kept Zeviah from the necessity of meeting certain gossipy neighbors, from whose questions the little dressmaker shrank as if from a blow. She also carried home all the materials that belonged outside the house. No, Miss Zeviah would not sew all summer. She would rest. This fact was reluctantly accepted by the people of Roseboro.

The following day, when Zeviah entered her sitting-room, the look of intense relief on her face amply repaid Molly for her work of the evening before. Furthermore, after a talk with Judge Rayner, who called to see her on business one afternoon, Zeviah began to accept her changed lot with something of complacency. But Molly kept the key to the closet, for Zeviah still imagined she could hear the noise of the old machine. Under Molly's care the tense lines were growing less deep in Zeviah's face and the needed rest was doing her good. Judge Rayner stared at her in astonishment, when he came in.

"So it must be a conspiracy of three," he smiled, mopping the perspiration from his kindly face, "you and little Molly here and me. Well, if anybody can keep a secret, we can."

At the door he turned to Molly. "Keep her mind occupied," he said. "She has had a hard time and she needs to be amused. If anybody can do it, you can."

He went down the gravel walk. "Shades of Mars!" he chuckled to himself. "If Clitty Faxon and Sophronia Parkins and all the rest get hold of this, there will be a tongue-driving. I don't blame her for wanting to keep still a week or so till she gets her bearings a bit. But oh, how I would like to tell!"

In obedience to the Judge's hint there arrived in the house certain materials; and Zeviah, upon whom the old habit was too strong to allow her fingers to lie idle the whole time, worked with a different expression on her face.

"It does seem strange to be pulling out my own bastings. I haven't had hardly a new thing for years. Do you think it is too much?" she inquired anxiously as the girl was draping the soft folds of the gray crêpe de Chine.

"Not a bit," cried Molly. "I never saw you look so well. And nobody will suspect, for I told Mrs. Stebbins that a relative had made things a little easier for you, while you were not well."

"I've always been such a plain little grub," sighed Zeviah, looking at herself doubtfully in the long mirror.

"Well, you aren't any more," cried Molly jubilantly. "The butterfly stage has begun."

Zeviah's face settled into thoughtful lines.

"I almost believe that everybody has wings, if they only knew it," she said seriously. "It took the money to give me shock enough to find it out, after all my years of pinching and being narrow

I should like it if I could do something to make it easier for people to shake out theirs. Perhaps I can."

Many were the curious eyes that followed Zeviah and Molly as they walked up the aisle of the church the following Sunday. Mrs. Steers positively glared.

"She must have been sewing for herself," she told Almira, "and here you are going from pillar to post to get your clothes made in time for the wedding. It's a pretty case, and I don't care who knows I think so."

But there were those who were kindly pleased at the evident change in Zeviah. They looked at her with new eyes. She walked with her head up, even though her hand usually rested on Molly's arm; for the shock of the change, following upon the years of drudgery, had seemed to take much of the little dressmaker's strength. The change was subtle and indescribable. In the parlance of Roseboro, "It made talk."

And on this particular Sunday, so much interest was manifested in the transformed Zeviah with her gray gown and her violet hat, that the look of solid enjoyment and eager expectation on the face of Judge Rayner quite escaped notice.

The service began. As the notices were read some curiosity was excited by a request that the congregation remain after the benediction for a matter of business. Elder Stebbins looked a little surprised when he read this, but Judge Rayner did not.

After the ending of the service, the minister descended from the pulpit and Judge Rayner, going forward, had a word with him. Then the Judge turned toward the expectant faces of the members of the congregation.

"I do not need to remind you of one great need of this church—a need that we have worked hard to fill, but the fund for which we have been obliged to devote to repairs and other uses. I think there has undoubtedly been a feeling of discouragement, for it has seemed that we could not see our way to realize our hopes in this line. Now a wonderful thing has happened. I have had placed in my hands a sum sufficient to purchase a new pipe organ for our church." He paused and a murmur went round the church. Zeviah Hankin was watching him with frightened face.

"This matter was to be kept secret until next Sunday, when the giver expected to be absent from town; but I feel that she, who has shared the work and the burdens and the hopes of the church for so many years, should be present to share the joy that her gift will bring to us all. I ask that she allow me to give her name now, so that we may all rejoice together in the good that has come to us. I feel sure that she, who has proved so generous in the gift will not withhold this added pleasure to us all."

The Judge paused and looked down. His face was a little white, as though he was not quite sure that he had done right, but he held his head expectantly.

Every eye went to the Widow Eltinge who, of all the congregation could best afford such a gift. But upon her face was to be seen as much surprise as was reflected upon those of the others.

The minister spoke with a little break in his voice. He had been pastor over the little church for fifteen years and Roseboro was home to him.

"If it is the wish of the donor to remain unknown for a time, we can but bow to it, but I add my plea to that of the Judge that she should let us know whom we are to thank for this good gift."

Then Zeviah Hankin rose and faced them all. She was very white, and she kept her hand on Molly's shoulder.

"I—I wanted to do it," she said simply. "For many years I have sent out into the world the noise of a sewing machine. And now I thank God that it has been given to me to help to make music in the church."

A Good Rest Cure

It is found in a very old-fashioned book, but really it is quite modern and up to date, scientific, if you will. "Rest in the Lord," the formula reads. Have you ever tried it? We commend it highly. It will do you much more good than either the mountains or the seashore. You know the matter with you is not that you have been working too hard or are bearing too heavy a load of responsibility and duty.

The real trouble is that you are carrying around with you too many anxieties and worries about yourself and other people, and the whole world in general. If you could roll these off once in a while and get an unburdened, fresh, sane outlook upon life in general, and your own life in particular, the tension would leave you and you would find rest and refreshment right down in your very soul. The man who wrote that old recipe knew life to its very core and reality, and spoke out of an experience that sounded the very depths. God is the soul's rest, man's only true sanctuary.

The Reward of Service

The sweetest lives are those to duty wed,
Whose deeds, both great and small,
Are close-knit strands of an unbroken thread,
Where love ennobles all.
The world may sound no trumpets, ring no bells;
The book of life the shining record tells.

Thy love shall chant its own beatitudes
After its own life working. A child's kiss
Set on thy singing lips shall make thee glad;
A poor man served by thee shall make thee rich;
A sick man helped by thee shall make thee strong;
Thou shalt be served thyself by every sense
Of service which thou renderest.

—ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

Meal-Time Conscience
What Do the Children Drink?

There are times when mother or father feeds the youngsters something that they know children should not have. Perhaps it is some rich dessert but more often it is tea or coffee.

It is better to have some delicious, hot food-drink that you can take yourself and feed to your children, conscious that it will help and strengthen, but never hurt them.

A Yorkstate lady says: "I used coffee many years in spite of the conviction that it injured my nervous system and produced my nervous headaches. While visiting a friend I was served with Postum and I determined to get a package and try it myself. The result was all that could be desired—a delicious, finely flavored, richly colored beverage. Since I quit coffee, Postum has worked wonders for me.

"My husband, who had suffered from kidney trouble when drinking coffee, quit the coffee and took up Postum with me and since drinking Postum he has felt stronger and better, with no indication of kidney trouble.

"You may be sure I find it a great comfort to have a warm drink at meals that I can give my children, with a clear conscience that it will help and not hurt them as coffee or tea would."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms: Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c pkgs.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both forms are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

Life Members and Directors

THE donation of $30 at one time constitutes a Life Member of the American Tract Society; the addition of $70, or the donation of $100 at one time, constitutes a Life Director. Life members may receive annually copies of the Society's own publications to the value of $1; Life Directors to the value of $2; if applied for within the Society's year, from April 1st to April 1st, in person or by written order. No individual can draw more than one annuity any year for himself. Colporters are not authorized to supply Life Members.

Form of Bequest

I GIVE and bequeath to the "AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY," instituted in the City of New York, May, 1825, the sum of dollars to be applied to the charitable uses and purposes of said Society.

Three witnesses should state that the testator declares this to be his last will and testament, and that they signed at his request, and in his presence and the presence of each other.

To Our Subscribers

A RULING of the Post Office Department states that copies of the AMERICAN MESSENGER may not be mailed to persons whose subscriptions are in arrears for a period exceeding twelve months. In other words, the regulations of the Post Office Department compel us to remove from our regular mailing list the names of all who delay the payment of their subscriptions longer than twelve months. In view of this fact we urge upon all our friends the necessity of attending promptly to the renewal of their subscriptions. A glance at the address label on the wrapper of the paper will show at what date each subscription expires.

Donations

DONATIONS for the missionary work of the American Tract Society may be sent to Louis Tag, Treasurer, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y.

A Glowing Testimony

One who has long been a subscriber to the AMERICAN MESSENGER, in renewing her subscription for another year, writes:

"Thank you for continuing to send the AMERICAN MESSENGER, for I find so many helpful and comforting gems in it, as I grow older, and it helps and uplifts me on the way."

The Central American Mission

"In the providence and under the guidance of the Blessed Lord," says the Central American Bulletin, "the Central American Mission has passed its twenty-fifth milestone. Those who contend that faith missions as a rule cannot last will have to begin to revise their prophecies, for twenty-five years is a long time in these perilous times, and the Lord has preserved the lives of those four who organized this mission twenty-five years ago, although two of them are not now connected with its work. We feel sure the facts will justify us in saying that the year 1915 was the best year in the life of this mission, although one of the darkest years in the world's history.

"We make our boast in the Lord and give Him all the praise and thanksgiving for the salvation of more souls than in any other one year. We likewise make our boast in the Lord that the past year was one of the most bountiful in the supply of all needs, notwithstanding the horrible condition of the finances of the whole earth, and especially in the work of missions, where curtailment was the cry on every hand. But we desire in this connection to give all the glory to the Lord."

IN THE MISSION FIELDS

Mexican Readers of Manzanitas de Oro

Manzanitas de Oro is the title of a beautiful illustrated periodical published in the Spanish language by the American Tract Society for circulation in Latin America and other parts of the Spanish-speaking world. It is largely a counterpart of Apples of Gold, a Sunday school periodical in the English language, which has been published by the American Tract Society for the last forty-five years.

The treatment of the Sunday School Lesson in Manzanitas de Oro is prepared by Rev. J. Milton Greene, D.D., a well-known and very successful missionary in Havana, Cuba. The popularity of this paper is attested by the fact that it has now reached a circulation of 24,000 copies per week.

We are glad to present on this page a picture of some Mexican readers of Manzanitas de Oro, who reside in El Paso, Texas, and concerning whom Rev. S. S. Athans writes as follows:

"I am sending a picture representing a group of Mexican Sunday school children belonging to the Mexican Church of the Nazarene, in El Paso, of which I am pastor.

"These children are the happy readers of the splendid Sunday school paper, Manzanitas de Oro, and it seems that they could not get along without it.

"It may be interesting to the readers of the AMERICAN MESSENGER to know something about the beginning and the growth of this class. The girl sitting in the center of the picture is the teacher. She is only sixteen years old. She was converted in our church two years ago, and soon afterward she took an active part in the Sunday school. She is a very refined girl, intellectually bright and very devoted and humble. She began teaching with about fifteen children, and not long after her class increased to nearly sixty pupils."

A Chinese Daniel

The Missionary Herald relates an interesting occurrence in the career of Admiral Li Huo, a Christian officer in the Chinese service. Being a clean, honest, earnest man he naturally won the confidence of President Yuan Shih Kai and was advanced to an influential position. As a Christian he consistently declined attendance upon official heathen sacrifices and was excused by the President. But when it became necessary for Admiral Li and many others to take an oath of allegiance, the problem grew more serious. He and three other Christians felt that they could not swear by heathen gods in a heathen temple. Christians in government service gathered together to talk the matter over. The result was that Li decided not to yield, though he might lose position and even life by refusal. The others assented and went with him for an interview with President Yuan. Harassed with the Japanese crisis the President could not see them, but the Vice-President advised them to do as they felt best. "The President would not care."

But nothing escapes the attention of the keen man at the head of the Chinese government. There was an investigation. Admiral Li and the others were discharged, though the President confessed the government could ill afford to lose him. Then Mr. Ding and others aroused prominent Christians over the country to help the President to see his way clear to take them back. Again President Yuan showed his magnanimity by restoring Admiral Li on the ground that he had shown no disrespect or lack of allegiance and that the Constitution guaranteed religious freedom. Li and his three friends were allowed to choose a place in which to take the oath. The Admiral selected the Temple of Heaven, but Yuan objected that none but the Emperor or President should ascend to that altar for prayer. So it was agreed that the Admiral should read from the steps his pledge of allegiance to president and government. This was done, the Admiral sealing his oath with earnest prayer to the true God of heaven Whom he serves. It will mean much to Christians all over the land that one in so high a place should stand so bravely for his convictions.

A Pioneer in Burmah

Dr. John Marks, who recently passed away in England, was a pioneer mission worker in Burmah. The King of Burmah, Mindoon Min, honored him by sending his nine sons to him for education. This was done in a royal and truly Oriental fashion, for every day the boys rode to and from school on nine elephants, each with two umbrellas over his head, the whole procession being escorted by 400 soldiers.

A Modern Saul

There are two anti-Christian papers published in Madagascar, one French and the other Malagasy. The editor of the latter has been a Mr. Ravaonjanahary, an out-and-out militant agnostic. This paper, the Sun, is now without an editor, for Mr. R. has become a Christian and a member of the Congregational church at Faravohitra. It has cost him much, for he has a wife and five children and his former position was both secure and lucrative. Now instead of writing infidel tracts he is devoting his great abilities to preaching the Gospel. He is a brilliant French scholar, a speaker and writer of power, a man of genuine character, in short, a powerful accession to the mission force of Madagascar. This modern Saul become Paul is now speaking on "Why I am a Christian," in the Malagasy capital.

"Jesus Grass" in Japan

Mr. Garst, an American missionary, introduced the common white clover into Japan. This has spread widely throughout the country and a missionary reports having heard it characterized as "Jesus grass" in recognition of its mission origin.

Cause for a Praise Service

In spite of wars and rumors of wars, of threatened changes of administration, and of restrictions on trade and business, mission work in China goes steadily on. A recent letter from Miss Luella Miner, a missionary of the American Board in Peking, China, gives a glimpse of the progress made last year. She says:

"I have been working to-day on the statistics of our Peking station, with its outstations, and it makes me feel like having a praise service. What might we have accomplished if we had had the men and women to enter all of the doors of opportunity! In our regular schools we have had 1,088 pupils, and hundreds more have been instructed in Sunday schools, station classes, the Bible classes for university students, and the night school. Then the preaching bands, in their annual tour of the great country field, have reached tens of thousands in their lectures and with the gospel message. The band is just starting out for a month's work which will complete the circuit of the outstations.

"One new station has been opened between Peking and the Summer Palace, where the great macadamized road runs through a thriving town. We hope that American Indemnity College teachers and students, who are not far away, will support this work if sufficient interest can be aroused. Pupils have paid into our schools the equivalent of $3,670 (gold), and for the support of the church and its benevolences $890 more. It is these sums which enable us to enlarge our work, though the funds coming from America are not increased. We need especially now money for land and buildings, that room may be provided for work that will be almost self-supporting when it is once started. Our schools are getting in a fine class of pupils now, boys as well as girls. Several desirable pieces of property near us are now offered for sale. Oh, for a few tens of thousands out of the millions worse than wasted in Europe daily!"

A Japanese Northfield

The year nineteen hundred and fifteen saw the opening of the Japanese Northfield near Gotemba, a site with a magnificent panorama, including Fujisan. The Y. M. C. A. initiated the enterprise, but holds the grounds for the use of all Christian churches. Several buildings have already been constructed under the supervision of Mr. Vories, the missionary architect of the Omi Mission. Six delegates from Korea at the summer conference made a contribution of 200 yen to the cost of the plant.

Korean Sunday School Scholars

Recently a number of the older pupils in Taiden, Korea, were asked what the Sunday school had done for them, their replies showing clear understanding of the power of the gospel. One boy, of about ten, said that before going to Sunday school he had been in the habit of stealing cake from his father's shop, another that he had been used to lying, and still another confessed to having been very quarrelsome. Each said that a change had come through attendance on Sunday school, where he had learned about the Lord Jesus.

Many children have continued to attend in spite of serious opposition. One boy of twelve not only himself attended but brought ten others, of whom nearly all have continued. Later his father, through the influence of relatives, became bitterly opposed and forbade the boy's attendance. On his last Sunday the child gave a farewell to all the children, telling them that the reason he was ceasing to attend was his father's opposition, and urging all not only to continue themselves, but to bring others to "learn the good teaching of Jesus." He added that he desired all to pray that God would change his father's heart that he, too, might attend. Then said the boy, "I will pray," and before all the children he prayed most earnestly that God would bless the school and change his father's heart.

A Strong Witness

Rev. Lewis Hodous, professor in the Union Theological School at Foochow City, sends the following report of the convincing testimony of a Chinese scholar to the power of Christ:

"The other day I met a scholar who was converted at one of the Eddy meetings in Foochow. I was holding a service in one of our smaller churches. This man happened to be in the neighborhood and attended church. After church we sat down with a company of young men in the reception room. This man began telling these young fellows about his religious experience.

"He said: 'I was a secretary in General Sung's yamen. General Sung was governor of Fukien after the revolution. I used to gamble. Even after the president sent down his proclamation against gambling I used to gamble. Since I became a Christian I have stopped gambling. Then I used to have a pretty strong temper. Little things used to irritate me and often I broke out with considerable violence. Christ has helped me to control my temper.

"Before I became a Christian my life was scattered and aimless. Now I have a purpose in life, and I am at peace with myself and with all men. I used to laugh at Christianity, but now I am happy to go to services and bear witness."

"This man is active in social service and is trying to help on the Christian cause. There are others just like him."

Bible Contest in Korea

More than fifty Bible classes are being held this season under direction of Mrs. W. L. Swallen, of Chosen, Korea. In one class three prizes were given for the best answers to sixty questions on the four gospels. The missionary noticed after the contest was over that the questions, posted on the wall, were being copied by women and girls and even by men.

Kindergarten Work in Japan

Fourteen of the graduates of the Kanazawa girls' school, whose "kindergarten" was one of the first planted in the empire, are now teachers in kindergartens, instructing two hundred children every day. Several parents of Kyoto kindergarten scholars were baptized last year. When one little girl went home she told her mother that she must pray to God and thank Him for the food before she ate. The mother tried to pay no attention to her child, but she insisted on being heard, and the mother at last consented. When she had finished, the child was still unsatisfied because she did not say "Amen" at the end. This was too much for the mother, who saw that if she was to continue as head of the household she must learn to pray. So she went at once to one of the preaching places, attended regularly and finally was baptized.

JULY, 1916

A PAGODA AND BELL TEMPLE AT ASAKASA, TOKYO, JAPAN

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY, NEW YORK.

"The Sunshine of Benson Grove"

BY STELLA TYLER JORDAN.

"NEXT STOP Benson Grove," called the brakeman as he opened the door to the Pullman car.

An elderly lady who had been making tating, opened her bag, dropping her shuttle and thread into it, collected her belongings and prepared to leave the car.

She had traveled for two days and was glad her journey was at an end. At last she had reached the town where John lived. Her belongings were soon ready, for Miss Martha Hawthorn, in her spinsterly way, always kept her things in readiness as though she expected at any moment to be called to another world to give an account of the way she had left them.

She settled back in her seat as the train slowed down. "Pretty village," she said to herself. Just then the porter came up to help her off and she followed him down the aisle.

"Hello, Aunt Martha!" called a cheery voice, and a gentleman greeted her affectionately as she alighted from the train.

She looked up into the jovial face of Dr. John Raleigh, who stood before her in all the splendid vigor of his manhood.

"Do you mean to tell me you are my little John," gasped the lady as the doctor stooped to kiss her.

"That's just who I am!" he declared, and with the same hearty laugh which she so well remembered, he soon whisked her away over the road to his home.

The place was what Aunt Martha might have expected; a large, well-kept house and grounds, and in the home were a dear little wife and two children.

"You are exactly as I had pictured you to be," exclaimed the old lady in response to Alice Raleigh's cordial welcome. "I knew John would pick out some one we would all love."

"Yes," remarked the doctor, coming up the stairs, "and I also picked out these two youngsters for you to love. Just the image of their dad, don't you think?"

When they were all seated in the great living-room, Eunice and Lawrence soon were in the arms of the aunt of whom they had heard so much.

The days passed very happily for Miss Hawthorn, who was delighted to be able to help some in the housework, since Mrs. Raleigh was accustomed to have a woman come in only a day each week to do the heavy cleaning; when there was nothing she could do about the house, she resorted to her tating, never content to be idle long.

When Sunday arrived, all drove to church, as Aunt Martha was anxious to attend religious service, never missing it at her own home. They went early enough to attend Sunday School, which the old lady enjoyed very much. As she watched the primary class go to their room, her face became instantly soft with sympathy, for the young teacher—a girl about eighteen years of age, was confined to a wheel chair, which she handled herself and quickly followed the children, whom she so dearly loved.

At the close of the lesson when the primary doors were opened, "Aunt Martha" again had a chance to study the face of the crippled teacher. As the children passed the wheel chair, they looked up with confidence into the sweet countenance of their beloved instructor, and each child received in return a radiant smile and a hearty handshake.

"Well," said Dr. Raleigh on the way home, "how did you enjoy the service, aunt?"

"Very much, indeed," she replied, "but it made my heart ache to watch the young primary teacher, she seems so loveable—I wonder why things like that happen when the girl could be so useful in the world!"

"Auntie, dear," interrupted Alice Raleigh, before her husband could speak. "Just wait until you know Hallie Bristol. She couldn't possibly be more useful than she is now—she is the sunshine of Benson Grove!"

"What can the poor girl do?" asked the old lady wonderingly.

"Do!" said the doctor earnestly. "She is doing all the time, I have my hands full to keep her from doing, for she needs to rest. Her ailment is not incurable, but she would gain a great deal faster if she would be content to live more quietly."

"Didn't you see our splendid large primary department?" asked Alice eagerly.

"Indeed I did—it certainly beats ours back home, even if we do live in a large city and have a congregation many times the size of yours."

"Well, Hallie has charge of the entire department. She teaches the lesson from her wheel chair and she can think of many things to amuse and instruct those children! She gets more out of the lesson, too, than any other two teachers put together. Then, when it comes to the young people, she is the center of the Christian Endeavor Society, always having some new idea, no matter what department is discussed. In fact, it seems as though the church just couldn't run without Hallie. You must get acquainted with her, auntie, she is such a darling—and her spare moments are filled with tating! So I know you would be great friends!"

During the next few months Hallie Bristol and Aunt Martha became real chums. The old lady would go and help the girl in her interesting plans for the betterment of the church and the community. One day each week was devoted to the teaching of embroidery, crocheting and tating, for there was no one else in Benson Grove who had the time or the inclination to teach these things and there were many who were only too glad of the opportunity to avail themselves of the instruction, given so willingly by the crippled girl and her new friend.

"Won't you come over Thursday afternoon, Aunt Martha?" urged the girl one day. "You will see something that will do your heart good. I can't tell you a thing about it—but come as early as you can."

At promptly one o'clock Thursday afternoon Aunt Martha, Alice Raleigh and the children arrived at the home of Hallie Bristol, taking with them an abundant supply of fragrant flowers. And they discovered, to the surprise of the old lady, that almost every child in the district was already there with baskets of the most exquisite blossoms of the season. What could it all mean?

"Is this a shower flower, Hallie?" inquired Aunt Martha, greatly mystified and very much interested.

"Yes, but not for me!" replied the girl smiling happily. "You see, there are many tenement houses in Grand Center, as well as several hospitals, and each week we gather here to make bouquets. The expressmen are very kind and take them to the city, where they are received by the ladies of the Women's Christian Temperance Union and distributed where they will do the most good."

What a wonderful afternoon it was! Young and old worked busily fashioning the dainty bouquets, to each of which was fastened a verse of scripture written by Hallie's own hand.

"They may not do much good," said Hallie, reflectively, "but one has plenty of time to think when one is sick."

Aunt Martha worked with a will until the last bouquet was tied and they were all piled into Alice Raleigh's car and taken to the express office.

Hallie Bristol warmly thanked each child for their efforts and read to them different letters she had received from those who had already been blessed and encouraged by the receipt of the lovely floral tokens of thoughtful remembrance.

"What gave you the idea, dear?" inquired Aunt Martha of Hallie, after the children had gone home. "It is a beautiful thing to do!"

"I spent many months in the hospital myself and used to long so for some one to bring me even one flower. I know what it means to be sick among strangers, far from one's home and dear ones, and upon my sick-bed I resolved that if ever I were able to go back to the busy, rushing world again, I would surely see that those who wanted flowers should have their heart's desire."

Religious Education in South America

All who are interested in religious education in South America will be glad to hear the report of the first tour made by Rev. George P. Howard, as Sunday-school secretary for that continent:

"My first visit was to Tandil, a flourishing city of about 10,000 inhabitants, situated to the south of Buenos Aires about a night's railway journey. The brethren of the Evangelical Union (an English Missionary Society) were holding their annual meeting at that time. They gave me two full days and evenings out of their program and we had a great time. They were eager for help. I had a hard time getting away from them, and had to promise to return soon for a second visit. I gave them several addresses on the modern Sunday-school; organized and led a model class, and led a Round Table discussion at which they brought up many of their problems. My exhibit trunk was a great feature.

"Great interest was awakened in teacher-training, and several classes were in process of formation when I left. I took orders for thirty copies of the new Spanish teacher-training book, 'The Normal Manual,' published by the American Tract Society. I have had a thorough examination of this book made by some of our leaders here on the field, and it has been found very satisfactory. The names of all who enroll in the teacher-training classes are to be sent to me. I will keep a record of them with the grades as they are examined, and at the end of the course, give them the World's Sunday School Association diploma. From a number of churches, requests have come that I visit them as soon as possible, and help them reorganize their Sunday-schools. Everything, therefore, looks promising. I only wish there were two or three of me!"

Moslem Young People Eager for Bible Study

In the center of the Nile Delta lies Tanta, a city of 70,000, largely Moslem. In one of the poorest quarters of this city a Sunday-school has been started for the children gathered from the streets. Rev. Stephen Trowbridge, Sunday-school secretary for work among Moslems, describes a recent visit to this school:

"The upper floor of a house has been rented, and we found every classroom full to overflowing with Mohammedan boys and girls. When this work first started, the children who came were of the poorest and could not read a line, but recently some very bright boys from the Government Schools have been attending. They also are Moslems, and as Sunday is one of the regular school days, they came directly from their classes to this Sunday-school. I saw a number of them with their Korans tightly clasped under their arms listening most intently to the lesson, which was from the Book of Acts. Some of the questions they answered with quick intelligence, although they know almost nothing about the Bible as yet."

"Another evidence of interest in Bible study," writes Mr. Trowbridge, "is found in the girls' college, Cairo, which is under the direction of the American Mission. Never in the history of the college has there been such a demand for the Bible. Moslem, Jew and Christian alike come saying, 'Please send for a Bible for me.' A new Syrian teacher said that the thing which impressed her most in this college is that, when she looks over the crowded room full of girls at Chapel time, she cannot tell from the earnest faces which are Moslem, Jewish or Christian, for all are equally attentive, eager and responsive. Pray that many of these dear girls may have the courage to declare themselves followers of Jesus!"

GEORGE ERNEST MERRIAM

CHRISTIAN PATRIOTISM

BY

REV. GEORGE ERNEST MERRIAM

WHEN Carlyle writes of hero worship, he bears witness to one of the oldest and deepest instincts of human kind. The demi-gods of Greece and of other nations testify to the same indisputable tendency.

One finds the act of breathing hardly less natural than homage to greatness. A common Mecca, in the thought of every people, comes into view with each recurring holiday. It is the Mecca of the soldier's grave. Silently but sincerely we kneel in the presence of unselfish sacrifice.

Such an hour comes to us on Memorial Day and again on Independence Day. Whether or no we actually enter God's Acre, or tread the paths of some national Arlington, or gather on some historic battlefield, we know we are on holy ground. We think much of the soldier dead, more of all they fought to win or save, and we should think most of the greater legacies and responsibilities bequeathed to us. In such a day we should be Janus-faced, looking to the past with gratitude as well as gratification, and looking to the future with a sense of consecration.

The last two years have demonstrated afresh what Shakespeare maintained, that on the field of blood men meet in hatred, "then act the tiger." Yet how we thrill as we read of the battle for right. How we glorify those who fall—as though we saw them climbing to celestial heights. Is it not that we see love in the midst of hatred—love of country, love that forgets self and ventures all for others? Is it not that we see the passions of men tried in the furnace of their own intensity until they flame forth into something like the passion of the Master—a suffering for the saving of the world?

It is told of a New England clergyman that one Sunday morning during the sermon he felt impelled to recite "The Charge of the Light Brigade." Obeying the impulse he shocked the officers of his church and was asked to resign his charge. Years after a stranger came to him, reminded him of the incident, said he was present at the service and added, "I was in that charge, as later I was in your own battle of Gettysburg, and when I heard you recite that poem I said to myself—'Then I too have done something worth while and I ought to be a man. Now I am a man, a Christian man.'" The clergyman's comment was, "I lost my pulpit, but I saved a soul."

The lever was patriotism. It seemed, both to the preacher and to his congregation to be national patriotism only and hence, out of place in a religious service. In reality it was an unconscious appeal to Christian patriotism as proven in the outcome. The fact is, you cannot separate the two. Christian patriotism is rooted in national patriotism which never flowers and fruits save in Christian patriotism.

The Charge of the Light Brigade fires the heart of every man—why? Because such a charge was enacted not at Balaklava alone but in other places, in other wars, by other men—yes, in our own history, and by our own men, again and again. Think of Stony Point and of the mad charge of "mad" Anthony Wayne! Think of Zagoni at Springfield, Missouri! Yes, and think of the brave Pickett and his men at Cemetery Ridge! For there was sublime heroism clothed in gray as well as in blue. Now why this courage? And why this sacrifice?

Was it not first of all for liberty—with law? This is pre-eminently a land of liberty. For the sake of liberty our Pilgrim Fathers fled from England and, buffeting the waves of a wintry sea, finally landed at Plymouth.

It was the spirit of liberty which instigated the Tea Party of Boston and inspired men from the stirring days of Concord and Lexington to the triumphant close at Yorktown. So also in the war of the Rebellion the underlying force was liberty—liberty not for self but for others—not for the citizen but for the slave. For this was the creed of the great Lincoln, "I believe this government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free."

But if a land of liberty so also America should be a land of law. Even the Mayflower had its constitution, written in a cabin but by men who could not be

"Cabined, cribbed, confined, bound in To saucy doubts and fears" and these men were succeeded by others with the same spirit. In the hands of all such law is safe.

But as all politicians are not statesmen, so all law givers are not patriots nor are all citizens law keepers. The ship of state safely launched by the law maker may be submersed by the law breaker. Political corruption seems to increase in proportion to the mushroom growth of statute law: perchance some of the mushrooms prove to be toadstools sprung out of grafting selfishness and therefore poisonous. We lift our eyes with reverent fervor toward even the bronze statue of the Goddess of Liberty but this is no excuse for running down and over the tug boats of municipal or federal ordinance that lie in our pathway. Lynch law is no law, it is anarchy. Dodging taxes or blinking at liquor legislation is even worse than desecrating the flag with advertisements or burning it in a symbolical melting pot. We may not condone the latter but what shall we say of the tricolor button on the lapel of the average self-seeking politician, or the stars and stripes borne at the head of the brewers' parade? All honor to the Maine women who ostracized visiting men "of good old families" from the metropolis of another state who persisted in "treating" the young men of the locality in the privacy of their own rooms and with smuggled liquors. They bring home to us the question—are we true—through and through—to our nation, its sacred liberty and its equally sacred law? Only so can we be patriots to the core.

Again we see, in this high courage and self-effacing sacrifice of the past, the burning desire to preserve the unity of the nation, and yet withal the individuality of the state and even of the citizen. Especially was this true in the Civil War. "Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable." This is more than the eloquence of a Webster—it is the heart-throb of a nation—its cry in the hour of second birth. States rights are not denied but qualified. It is not a question of Prussianism or tyranny in any form but of organism. Members of one body, the welfare of the whole demands healthy tissue and free circulation in each limb and at every joint. "Fremont and the Union" was the war shout of Zagoni's men, and you may be sure the cry was clarion like, a veritable crescendo-climax, with the ictus at the last, on the Union!

Right is our admiration for their courage! All honor to such a battle cry! Our love is fanned to a brighter blaze by their loyalty and their unquestioned patriotism! But remember this—there is a new vision among our prophets, a new song in the air, and a new banner in the making. Even our country is to be—in years to come—only as a state when the world shall become a nation. We are beginning to mount to the highest altitudes, to climb the last crags of the Matterhorn, to see the universal horizon, and to feel a thrill that is of heaven more than of earth. It is a high vantage point, but there is a danger.

You may remember the experience of George Adam Smith. On such an Alpine pinnacle, exultant in the final triumph of the ascent, forgetful alike of past difficulties and present dangers, he leaped to his feet—only to be seized by his guides, pulled backwards and downwards with the warning, "On your knees, man, on your knees! You are safe here only on your knees!"

Our nation to-day stands on the crest of history's loftiest mountain. She stands and looks and seems about to exclaim—and, oh, that she might realize it, she needs to kneel and pray. Only so will she be safe from—not Japan and not Germany and not Mexico, but—herself. It is a time not for ambition but for humility, not for emulation but for amelioration, and not for fear but for faith, hope and love. No longer should we ask merely, "What is best for us?"—but rather—"What is best for mankind?"

What we need is not a new military spirit but the old spirit of the missionary and, if need be, of the martyr. More of the spirit of the Hague?—Yes,—but why dodge the true nomenclature? We want more of the spirit of the Kingdom of God. We need to believe that the new Jerusalem is—coming down from heaven to earth. Its temple and creed, its wisdom and light, should be ours—the light of the Lamb—the sacrificial lamb. Only so shall we learn that "The light that shines farthest, Shines brightest at home."

Note that the patriotism we honor and would perpetuate always breathes forth the spirit of song and of service. The day of war is a time of woe. Yet it is also, always a time of song. Never could heroism persist in such a gas-laden atmosphere, were it not for the inspiration of national music. It may be the Marseillaise hymn, or the Watch on the Rhine, or The Campbells Are Coming, or God Save the King—the men who sing and those who listen are carried through the very shadow of the valley of death and to the very doors of a spiritual banqueting hall where they hear the answering refrain of an unseen, celestial chorus. Ask our own bronze-buttoned braves to tell you the meaning of Dixie, John Brown's Body, Marching Through Georgia, The Star Spangled Banner and the Battle Hymn of the Republic. Nay. But we need not ask them: our own hearts thrill as we lift our voices in these, or other songs—as we sing Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean, or America with the unconscious accent on the very first word "My Country."

But song should be linked with service. In the after years the sweetest echoes will linger above the trenches where the toil was the hardest, the most monotonous, and seemingly of the earth most earthy. And our boys need to learn, and our girls, our women and our men as well, that there is a patriotism of the rule and of the tool, of the book and of the ballot. It should be the teaching of the church as well as of the school for, though church and state are forever separate, the creed of the one is indirectly the need of the other. There is a scarlet thread of religious symbolism even in the bank note currency of the government, and McKinley, the soldier as well as statesman, never displayed a truer insight into the welfare of the nation than when he framed the patriot sentiment—"He who serves the Master best, serves man best; and he who serves truth, serves civilization."

We honor the soldier, hero of days that shall never fade—yes, we love him—for something more than what he did. We ever think of what he dared. He enlisted, marched, worked, fought, in the face of danger, disease and death. It was true of the Minute Man, the Green Mountain Boys, the Sons of Liberty in days of revolution. It was true, equally, of those in blue, and those in gray, in days of evolution—when a new and united nation came out of the old and much divided confederation of states. Yes and the world over, in all ages, you will find them.

The patriot excels the soldier. Soldier or no, he looks beyond and above any question of reward: he even overlooks it in his thought of duty. He is found not alone in the camp or at the capitol. He is lodged in the life-saving station as well as on the death-dealing field of blood. He is enrolled in the fire department of the great city and daily contends against a monster more terrible than any fire-belching dragon of childhood's book of myth and fairy lore. He is called a scientist and, under the name of Guyon, gives his life in the struggle against unseen but irresistible microbes. Not he alone but she—the soldier's mother: the Spartan type sending forth her son armored by her own hands and bidding him to return with his shield or on it; or again our own type, not withholding her first born or her seventh born from the righteous arena, in the hour of the nation's crisis, yet raising her child to be primarily not a soldier but a citizen and to meet a citizen's opportunities and responsibilities.

So one cannot divorce the national hero from the Christian patriot. They are joined in indissoluble wedlock. Let us honor the brave. Let us reverence patriotism. Let our vestal virgins guard its sacred fire. As Columbus took possession of these shores in the name not merely of Spanish royalty but of Deity itself, let us remember that this country still belongs to God. It is His nation. His hand has led us on. In His guidance is our only safety.

We love our country's flag—the red, the white and the blue: the blue, the background of the eternal stars, the color of the firmament, significant of unchanging constancy; the red, the color of blood, the most precious thing in all the world, the richest offering ever laid on the altars of time, telling of utter sacrifice for country, loved ones and God, and the white, the blending of all tones and tints in one, emblem of purity, color of the Roman toga virilis, the robe of citizenship and, in the political candidate (of that older day), the sign and symbol of immaculate character.

God grant that our national standard may ever inspire in us the entire loyalty, the voluntary sacrifice, in life and if need be in death, and the unselfish citizenship, which are blazoned forth in the red, white and blue.

The Abiding Word

BY ARTHUR WALLACE PEACH

*With quiet faith that like a torch
Burns down the many years,
To light our path when eyes grow dim
With age or dusk of tears,*

*To point us to the upper heights
Whereon the heart may wait
The certain dawn that morning brings
With hope and cheer elate,*

*The words He spoke come down to us
By centuries undimmed,
And clearer grown as songs become Whose strains are often hymned.*

*The simple phrases glow and gleam
On pages of the past,
And they on future leaves returned Shall gleam unto the last!*

Hiving Experience

BY REV. S. B. DUNN, D.D.

ENTERPRISING apiarists in the valley of the Nile River it is said, when the banks are abloom, are accustomed to embark beehives on float-barges which glide down stream with the current, anchoring at intervals, letting loose their swarms to gather their golden store, the barges sinking deeper at every stop until fully laden, when they return to their original anchorage and turn their wealth into real gold.

Now, is there not such a thing as hiving experience? And were it not a wise pursuit? Life may be a honey-barge. Age should make the sage. True progress is self-enrichment. A rare wealth is sweetness.

Experience Must be Sought and Won

One sure thing is this, that experience can not be inherited nor transmitted like a bank-account or real estate. It must be self-sought and won. As the great bard of human nature sings:

"A man may lend his store of gold or silver ore,
But wisdom, none can borrow, none can lend."

One can profit, of course, by the experience of another, as George Stephenson profited by the experience of James Watt. "Happy," says an old Saxon proverb of King Alfred's time, "is he who learns by the whippings got by another."

But a tabloid of experience is assuredly worth a whole car-load of canned counsel and cellar-lore.

So Turner felt. Before painting his "Snow Storm" he had himself lashed to a ship's mast for four long hours during a blinding snow storm. And Patrick Henry once said: "I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is, the lamp of experience. The best guarantee of the future is the experience of the past."

When did David get the inspiration of the Twenty-Third Psalm? From experience. And Paul his Eighth Chapter of Romans? From experience. Dante, his Divine Comedy? Bunyan, his Immortal Dream? Milton, his Mighty Epic? All are the result of hived experience. When Paul in Romans 5:4, speaks of "experience," he means, proof by experiment, as a metal tested for pureness before being approved. The man worth while is the man who has stood the fire-test.

Faraday used to say that he could never fully grasp the result of a scientific discovery until after he had seen actual demonstration by experiment.

The Real Test

The real proof of Christian verities, is not found in musty manuscripts—in Paley's Evidences, or Butler's Analogy, or forensic disputation, but in experience. Bee and flower are merely major and minor premises in the syllogism, but the conclusion is the honey of experience.

Theology is one thing, religion is quite another. Religion is life. It is a poor way to study botany from a fossil fern-leaf, or anatomy from a mummy of an ancient Pharaoh. Christian life is an experience as modern as this morning's sunrise and as fresh and freshening as this morning's dew. It is hived honey.

Experience in religion is really a quality of life. It is like tone in a Stradivarius violin. It is like flavor in fruit. It cannot be made; it comes with time and culture.

The fairest, rarest vision of earth is a saint of God—one who has made his Nile-voyage and hived his load.

"The aged Christian stands upon the shore
Of Time, a storehouse of experience,
Fill'd with the treasures of rich, heavenly lore;
I love to sit and hear him draw from thence Sweet recollections of his journey past,
A journey crowned with blessings to the last!"

DR. TILTON

The American Tract Society, the Church's Evangelist

A Sermon in Commemoration of the Ninety-first Anniversary of the American Tract Society

BY

REV. EDGAR TILTON, Jr., D.D.

Pastor of the Reformed Church of Harlem, New York.

RECENTLY New York City witnessed a demonstration which gave tangible expression to great national ideals. It exhibited the fact of the essential unity of the American people. It indicated a spirit of patriotism. It suggested the only method, namely, that of preparedness, by which safety and security could be granted to the Republic. However it amazes us when we consider that in this period of the world's civilization and in a peace-loving land such a demonstration should be considered necessary.

At the Marble Collegiate Church, on the occasion of the ninety-first anniversary of the American Tract Society, the following statement was made: "In the year 1816 when the American Bible Society was organized and in 1825 when the American Tract Society came into existence, the world was at peace. To-day, after all these years of Bible and tract distribution, with all the religious work appertaining thereto, the world is at war."

This fact not only fills us with amazement but it also tortures our very souls. We believe implicitly that God is in His world, that He loves His children and that He has blessed the Christian work of the century. But this terrible fact is also forcefully pressed upon us, namely, that sin is manifesting itself in the world as it never has before, that men are more cruel than they ever were, that greed and lust of power never grasped so tenaciously the hearts of people as they do to-day. It is impossible to estimate the power and influence of the combined forces of evil in this twentieth century. As we think of it all, amazement, horror, humiliation and, I had almost said, despair, fill our souls. And along with these conditions comes to Christian people the urgent call for help. Can there be such a response as shall mean the amelioration of these dreadful conditions? The people are walking in darkness. Shall they see that great Light which shines upon the land of the shadow?

Hear the call of the prophet to the church of the olden time! "Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O, Zion!" (Isaiah 52:1). It is a call to the church at a time like the present; and there is urgent need for such an appeal, for although her strength and power are ever manifested, in how many instances the church, instead of conquering the world, is conquered by the world and is held firmly in its soft and unrelaxing grasp. Instead of pushing her influence forward, the subtle influences of the world, alas, enervate her?

What do we mean by the Church putting on strength? Let us answer this question by answering another question, namely: What do we mean by a man putting on strength? A man has strength when he has faith, when he shows that he is satisfied that he is standing upon a rock. A man has strength when he has determination and fixed resolve. A man has strength when he has sympathy, when his heart overflows with love and he is forgetful of self. A man has strength when he has courage. Thus comes the call to the church: "Put on thy strength!" Put on these characteristic elements of your life as a church; grasp all these elements of power and the enemy will be subdued; vice, blindness and worldliness will fall away.

When I use the word "Church," I have in mind not alone the visibly organized body which bears that name. I am thinking of the vast body of believers who are engaged in Christian work both inside and outside of church organization. When I refer to the efforts that are put forth by the church, I have in mind all Christian work carried forward for the glory of God, for the advancement of His kingdom and for the good of mankind. The Young Men's Christian Association and Young Women's Christian Association are doing the work of the church; the Salvation Army is doing the work of the church; the American Bible Society is doing the work of the church; the Lord's Day Alliance is doing the work of the church, and the American Tract Society is doing the work of the church.

These and kindred bodies are not the church in the sense that they are organized strictly in accordance with ecclesiastical law, holding services, administering the sacraments and performing those well defined duties which are attached to our customary view of what constitutes a church organization. But they all contribute largely toward that power and influence in the world, known and recognized as flowing forth from the Divine Life which is inherent in the great Body of which Jesus Christ is the glorious and ever-living Head.

And of all these various societies doing the work of the church such as I have named, I know of none that is engaged in a more important enterprise than that one which is trying to reach men for Christ through the printed page, the American Tract Society.

The American Tract Society is the Church's Evangelist. If there is any Christian organization which deserves that name, and carries on the work of an evangelist it is this society. An evangelist is not a preacher with a local parish; he is one who goes from place to place, holding special services with a view to religious revivals, and doing a work which the local church itself cannot do.

Such an evangelist is the American Tract Society which, through the printed page, goes throughout all the world carrying the message of truth in every language and in every variety of religious literature. The church needs evangelists. The world needs evangelists. Some of the greatest Christian work ever accomplished has been accomplished through evangelists. We all are familiar with the life stories of Whitfield, Finney and Dwight L. Moody. Just at present the evangelist who seems to be moving this country is Billy Sunday. Such men as these we do not think of as presiding over a local church; they belong to the larger parish of the world. Through them thousands are claimed for Christ, who without the labors of the evangelist could not be reached. The story of the American Tract Society, the church's evangelist, is a long one of thousands reached through a Gospel on a printed page carried everywhere.

A great deal has been said and written about the power of the printed page; and that there is no more efficient agency for carrying out the Lord's command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to the whole creation," may be readily believed.

The people of to-day are a reading people. To be convinced of this it is not necessary to visit our libraries and public reading rooms, our publishing houses or book shops. While riding in any public conveyance we may observe this fact, as also how people's intellectual tastes differ, as evidenced by the variety of literature at hand. I remember riding on a suburban car some time ago where twenty-one of the twenty-five passengers were interested in reading matter varying from the illustrated advertisement of Doctor Quack's "cure all" to the Darwinian theory of the development of man. The conductor himself, as opportunity offered, studied the pages of a New Testament in the original Greek. We are such a reading people and are so eager to learn what is going on in the world, that a morning and evening edition of a newspaper cannot satisfy us. We must have three or four "extras" between nine in the morning and four in the afternoon to keep pace with our desire. This applies to all classes of people, and foreigners who have made their homes here seem just as intent on the news which the newspapers in their own languages bring them.

One day while riding in a subway train, I made note of the twelve persons who sat opposite me reading their newspapers. Two were reading papers printed in English, three in Yiddish, two in Greek, two in Italian, two in German and one in Arabic. I thought at the time of the American Tract Society which prints tracts in all of these languages, and of its opportunity here in New York City to reach the foreigner.

New York contains the greatest aggregation of foreign-speaking people of any city in the world; it has been called "The Melting Pot." There is one block where forty languages are spoken by the people living on it. There is one public school where thirty-six languages are spoken by the children attending it. On the news-stands may be found newspapers representing thirteen different languages. Most of these foreign people were at least nominally religious in their home lands, but many have drifted from church, synagogue and home, and, alas, many are to-day atheists, anarchists, gangsters, gunmen and murderers. These drifting people are a positive menace to the civic, church and home life of the city, but they also present a great opportunity. It has been demonstrated again and again that they can be reached by the Gospel, for they listen eagerly to the preaching and singing on the streets;

they receive and read literature with avidity; many of them accept the message, and great transformations have taken place in their lives. What a field there is here for the American Tract Society! And then multiply this one field by thousands. Yes, all over the world there are similar opportunities which are seized, and it is only financial ability that limits the extent to which these opportunities are used.

One of the most unfortunate facts to be considered in connection with our reading age is that there are so many harmful papers, pamphlets and books within the reach of all. I refer to what may be called the unclean publications of the press, ministering to depraved tastes of the reader and ever developing those tastes to still lower degrees of baseness. I do not believe that we fully realize the extent of the demoralization of public sentiment in this respect.

The evil effect of this unwholesome literature must be counteracted, and how better can it be done than by circulating clean literature? There is no mightier servant of the church than its evangelist, the American Tract Society, which places before the people extracts from the religious classics of the ages as well as an ever growing list of publications based upon the life and experience of our present day civilization. Powerful appeals to the conscience are thus made through expositions of Scripture, interesting religious stories, attractive biographies and helpful books and tracts of all kinds.

The work of the church? Yes! And there is no better, no more aggressive work for the Master than this. I make an appeal to you to place this Society on your benevolent schedule; when you give to it, realize that you are giving to the work of the church, and join with all God's servants in singing the inspiring and encouraging song:

"Like a mighty army moves the church of God.
Brothers, we are treading where the saints have trod;
We are not divided; all one body we,
One in hope and doctrine, one in charity."

Rejecting Their Best Friend

BY WARREN G. PARTRIDGE, D.D.

A friend once told me this incident: A noble and hard-working father, after a long life of strenuous toil and saving, built a new house for his family. His two sons decided to fit up a room for themselves in the old house, which was near by. They arranged the room very handsomely; but often they entertained their young men friends, until very late at night. These young fellows whom they invited, were fast young fellows.

One night their old father went to make his sons a visit, for they had invited him many times to visit them in their new quarters and to see their handsome room. But that night when they heard him coming they blew out the light, hid their wicked companions, and barred the door. The father knocked on the door, but they sat silent, and would not let him in. The old father knocked many times, and then returned to his home broken-hearted, for he had seen the light, and heard voices inside.

The Master said, "Behold I stand at the door and knock; if any man open the door, I will come to him and sup with him, and he with Me." Christ stands and knocks at the door of the heart of every human being. He comes as the best friend in all the world. He comes with eternal life as a free gift. If we refuse to open the door of our heart, we reject Him. We appear to the world to despise Him. We betray Him when we stubbornly refuse to own Him before the world. "He is despised and rejected of men." Multitudes to-day treat the loving Redeemer in this way. Many to-day, who are in Christian families, slam the door in His face, and keep Him standing outside, and many not only reject Him, but they even betray Him.

GOD'S FOUNTAIN OF POWER

By Edgar L. Vincent

AND I bought the field of Hamameel, my uncle's son, that was in Anathoth, and weighed him the money, even seventeen shekels of silver."

Then Jeremiah, in his wonderful book of prophecy, tells us how he "subscribed the evidence and sealed it and took witnesses, and weighed the money in the balances," thus making sure to himself the piece of land away in the homeland.

But where was the prophet when this important transaction was consummated? Surely he must have been in a prosperous state. The future could not have seemed anything but bright to him, otherwise why should he be investing in land and making preparations for many years of life yet to come? "Take these evidences," was the message, "and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days." So Jeremiah must have been looking far down the vista of the years, to an old age full of peace among the "fields and vineyards" of Anathoth. Then, we ask once more, where was Jeremiah when this vision of the peaceful days yet to be came to him?

Deep in a dungeon in the city of Jerusalem, he lay as a prisoner because he had been bold enough to foretell the ruin which was to come upon Israel in punishment for the sins of the people! His prediction had come true; the people were everywhere in flight; the sons of the king had been slain before his eyes, and the eyes of the king himself had been put out so that he never saw the gates of Babylon, to which he was sent a miserable captive, bound hand and foot; the Holy City lay in desolation, even the Temple having yielded its beauty to the remorseless flames.

Sitting in the midst of all this wreck and ruin, with four blank walls between him and liberty, the brave old prophet bargains for the bit of land back home, sure that God's word would come true and the day of restoration with its sunrise glory once more light up his broken country! Sublime confidence! Faith most radiant in its beauty! Unswerving trust in the divine leading of the hand of God! Surely, it is worth while to ask, "Where is the fountain of such faith and how can it be made ours?"

We do not know how old Jeremiah was when he began to feel the stirrings within his heart that later called him out to as grand a service as ever was given to mortal man. We may be quite sure that it was away up at Anathoth, a little village a few miles north of Jerusalem. We would like to know more of the boyhood home of the prophet. It must have been beautiful, for the place lay on a gentle height looking away down over the fertile plains, with the hills of Benjamin ranged round about. And it must have been a godly home, for the father was a priest of Jehovah. And it was here, while he was still a boy, that Jeremiah first heard the voice of God speaking to him, assuring him that he had been ordained to be a prophet to the nations.

Think how he must have held his breath when a commission like that was placed before him! Like the sensitive youth he was, Jeremiah shrank from a service so fraught with possible greatness, bringing him into prominence everywhere before the people and king. No wonder he pleaded his inability to measure up to a destiny so high! Hear him as he cries:

"Ah, Lord God! behold, I cannot speak; for I am a child!"

As he stood away up at the head waters of faith, how unlike that humble cry was from the confidence which shone so brightly in the darkness of the dungeon in Jerusalem! Like a trickling spring it was a dim prophecy only, of the mighty river by-and-by! How can it be that the gentle, wavering sapling will ever become the oak, whipped by the storms of a hundred years, and yet springing back with its head high in the heavens the moment the wind dies down! Yet this is not a hard question to answer! The boy was standing at God's fountain of power, ready to receive, with his ear open to hear and his heart receptive to the divine wooing! How tenderly God deals with "the child"! Listen!

"Say not, I am a child; for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee! . . . Be not afraid of their faces: for I am with thee to deliver thee, saith the Lord! . . . Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth!"

Could the boy by any means fancy all that was wrapped up in the tremendous power revealed to him in the added assurance, "See, I have this day set thee over the nations, and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, and to build, and to plant!" What wonder that a promise of power like this should have changed Jeremiah into a man of iron, so that neither the knee-deep mire of the prison which waited him, nor any of the bitter things that came to him in the forty years during which he stood like a rock as God's messenger, could shake him! But it all came true! For seventy years the shadow lay over Israel, and then came the call of the silver trumpet, heralding the dawning of a new day, a day when the people of Jehovah should come back again, gathered out of the lands of exile to their beloved sanctuary! The springs of God's power had become the river!

Do there not come to us all days when the weakness of Jeremiah's boyhood seems to paralyze us? It may be we have seen the need of a greater service; the longing to be used more mightily may have stirred in our souls; we may have been trying to catch the vision, to hear the whisperings of God calling us to go out and tell the story of the Christ and the redemption which comes from sin through the shedding of His precious blood; but we stand trembling in the presence of the vision, uncertain whether we may not have been mistaken, after all.

And then, too, men pluck at our garments and do their best to pull us back, saying: "Do not yield to the appeal! It is not for you! Even if you were sure, it would all come to nought! There is no real meaning in the Gospel of Jesus Christ! See what it has wrought in two thousand years! Failure, battling against walls of granite, with only feathers for battering rams, time and strength and heart's blood all wasted!"

But this is the time when we must creep up still nearer to the heart of God, where all the clamor and the clatter of men will be shut out and we can hear the sure message which is coming to us: "Go; speak, be not afraid; I am with thee!" And now we, too, are at the springs of God's great power. Doubt and discouragement disappear; weakness takes wings and flees away; the glory and the beauty and the power of the pure life, as it is in our Lord and Master, sweep into our souls, and we go bravely out to challenge the world, the flesh and the devil to stand out of our way! For we are now, indeed, a host bound to conquer in the name of the Lord.

THROUGH THE EYES OF FAITH

By Felicia Buttz Clark

JOHN MEREDITH stood up and looked at the picture on the easel. The north light came through the high windows of his studio, but even this light had no coldness in it. It was tinged with the glow and warmth of Italy, for this studio was in a narrow street in Rome where artists centered and from which some of the greatest masterpieces the modern world has ever seen had come forth to win fame and fortune for the painter.

There were many studios in these old palaces where for the last three hundred years one generation after another had lived and died.

In the hours when he laid down his palette and brush, when the sun had set over Monte Carlo, John Meredith liked to imagine cavaliers and ladies who had gone up and down the wide marble staircase, now grimy and dusty. He heard the clash of swords and the murmur of sweet voices, saw the shimmer of silks and flashing of jewels in rooms now deserted. For he was an artist possessed of an imagination which was at once a torture and delight. He often wondered whether many men in the world enjoyed as much as he did, revelling in the color and fascination of this marvellous land of beauty, the Paradise of the painter; at the same time, he wondered whether other men suffered as he did, as he was suffering at this minute.

On the canvas was a representation of our Lord. He stood in a field of Madonna lilies, stately, pure, with spotless chalices and golden hearts. They were all around Him, pressing against His garments; one of them was so close to Him that it touched His long, slender hand. There was the faint glow of sunlight, the blue sky above, the translucent air—the atmosphere of the Orient. So far, all was perfect.

But the artist was dissatisfied. What was lacking? Christ's face was lovely in its features, benignant in expression, and His figure was not so much majestic as graceful. It was a finished, refined picture of the Lord, but it failed in something. John Meredith felt this with all his sensitive soul. What was it?

The door opened softly and a young woman entered.

"Still busy, John? Get out into the sunshine. It's a perfect day. What a pity to spend it here! And you look so tired. You work too hard. What is the matter dear?"

"It isn't that, Lois. Work never tires me. It's because the picture isn't right. Can you tell me what is the matter with it?"

He looked anxiously at his young wife, who had braved poverty and had come with him to this strange country that they might fight the battle of life together. It had been ideal, this winter in Rome—together—but John Meredith knew that on this picture, which was to be presented to the city from which he had come as a partial recompense for a municipal scholarship conferred upon him, hung his reputation. It meant more to him than money; it meant a name.

John Meredith had been a poor boy, had been left an orphan, and had early developed an extraordinary gift in painting. It so happened that a certain rich man, a lover of art, having a desire to aid young and gifted men, had left in his will a sum of money, the interest to be used to send such applicants as might be deemed worthy, for two years abroad. In return these artists were to present to the city gallery a painting or statue.

Why John Meredith, an avowed unbeliever, had chosen to picture the Saviour of the world, risen from the dead, his wife had not been able to fathom. He said that Christ was the most typically perfect man who ever lived. Yet, he was painting Him not as a man, but as God, the Risen Redeemer.

"I can't see what is the matter with it, Lois."

"It is a beautiful picture," his wife said, looking at the canvas critically, her fair head on one side, "but John—"

"O, say it. You may as well," he answered impatiently. He had worked very hard and his nerves were on edge. "Tell the worst."

"It isn't Christ," Lois said slowly, her cheeks scarlet with excitement. O, how long, how long she had prayed for this moment when she could speak to John from her heart! "It is just a man and you are painting God."

"O, I see that well enough. But why can't I paint Him as God?"

"Because—you do not know the Lord," she responded.

Feeling that she had said enough, Lois went out softly, went up to the little bedroom built over part of the high studio and knelt down beside the white iron bed.

"God! God!" she prayed, "help him to know Thee! Help him, Lord."

John Meredith picked up his brush again and tried to alter the picture. The handsome gilt frame, made by a skilled Italian worker in Florentine carvings, lay ready, near by. He wanted to send the painting away soon. It was already overdue.

"I can't work!" he exclaimed pettishly. "Why did Lois come in here to upset me? I don't interfere with her religion. She might leave me alone. She's right, though; an artist cannot put into his work what he does not feel in his soul. It's a failure. There's no doubt about it. I'll have to begin all over again."

Going to the foot of the stairs, he called to his wife.

"Lois, would you mind if I went off on a long walk? It seems selfish, for I know that you are not strong enough to go with me, but I am very nervous. Perhaps, if I could get into the mountains—"

"Go, dearest. I shan't mind a bit. There's a lot of sewing that I have to do. You'll be back for supper?"

"Oh, yes."

He ran up to kiss her goodbye.

She looked more like a young girl than ever, sitting in the sunshine, bending her head, on which her hair clustered in golden curls, over some tiny little garments on which she was sewing.

"Don't tire yourself, little girl," he whispered, holding her very close to him in a warm embrace. "Forgive me if I was cross."

"You are tired," she replied. "Go, darling, and take a brisk walk in this lovely air. I shall have Gigi and the 'gatto' to keep me company."

"Gigi" was the canary hanging in a cage among the ivy branches that had climbed up to the window, and the "gatto" was a big gray cat, who had settled herself there after Lois had given her a saucer of milk. Gigi's little throat was almost bursting with song now, and the cat lay at Lois's feet, purring softly.

"I'll not be late," said John, running down the stone steps and out into the sunshine of one of those glorious days which make Italy a garden spot in the world.

There was a garden around the old palace; it had thick boxwood borders, and roses like small trees; pansies were there and violets growing in thick clusters. John picked a few and placed them in his buttonhole. He glanced back at the gray walls which sheltered Lois; then he went on through the narrow street, threading his way between carts full of vegetables and fruit, chattering women and gray donkeys to a large square flanked by hotels. Handsome motor cars glided by, on their way to Villa Borghese, where the tall umbrella pines grew. There were many tourists of all nationalities, one could hear almost every language spoken here in old Rome, for the city was crowded.

John mounted a tram-car and was soon well across the city, out of the broad gateway of St. John, near the Church of San Giovanni Laterano where the statues of the Twelve Apostles surmounted a high portico. In the center of the Apostles stood the figure of Christ, His hand outstretched as if blessing the people who were so occupied with their daily occupations and cares, that they forgot Him.

John scowled a little. The sight of this statue brought back the words of Lois: "It isn't Christ. It's just a man and you are painting God."

It was just this in Lois that irritated him a little, an intangible something that kept them apart: he could not be one with her in soul.

"Painting God." If she had said painting the gods, that was easy. He had made wonderful pictures of the god Pan, leaning against the gnarled trunk of an olive-tree, beneath the faint green shade, playing with his reed; he had pictured the goddess Venus rising from the foamy waves and riding in her shell—it had not been difficult; but he could not paint Christ as God, risen from the dead. Why not? Was it because the heathen gods of Greece and Rome were like beings with men, with similar passions and weaknesses? He could understand them, while Christ must be pictured as divine, the soul must comprehend Him and he could not; no, he was ready to acknowledge that he could not comprehend.

His mind was full of these thoughts as the car bore him swiftly out upon the Via Appia Nuova and on toward the fields where great splashes of orange and pink and blue blossoms varied the monotony of a brown stretch of land, dotted with mediaeval towers. A long line of arches marked where the Claudian aqueduct crossed the Campagna. Many of its arches, having withstood the storms and winds of centuries, were partially broken down.

Meredith alighted from the yellow car at the end of the line, and tramped off toward the hills where the Sabines had lived two thousand years before. The air was crisp. Some snow still lay on the mountains, although spring had already come in Rome.

He sat down at the base of the aqueduct and ate some bread and fruit and cheese that he had bought of a woman. She had been wrinkled and old, but she smiled at him as he laid down a silver franc.

"God be with you, Signore," she said.

The words stayed in his mind. On the slope of the hills, where the sun was hot, there were olive groves. Some brown sheep were grazing there, watched by a boy, bare-legged, with crisp black hair and laughing eyes. Meredith threw himself on the ground, full length, where he could look away to Rome, faintly seen beneath a golden haze. He was a minister's son who had wandered away from the pure, simple faith of his father and mother.

As he gazed across the flat Campagna he remembered how his father had longed to see Rome, the city where Paul had taught and died. One remark that his father had made when questioned about his faith in Christ had clung to his memory, as such things often do in the minds of youth. "Paul's faith is my faith. What he believed, I can believe."

Paul's faith! What had it been?

Before the Apostle was taken forth to death he had written: "For I am ready to be offered and the day of my departure is at hand. I have kept the faith." And to the Galatians he had written: "But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world."

John Meredith knew these passages well.

Paul's faith—!

The bees hummed drowsily around his head. The boy had driven his sheep further away. St. Peter's dome shone clearly now, rising high above the towers of Rome. The sun was setting. He must go back to Lois, dear little wife:

In the hours of quiet thought, John Meredith had found something which he had missed, his lost faith. Like his father, he could say: "What Paul believed, I can believe." "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

In the shadows of early evening, the young artist entered Rome. The lights were burning on the streets, crowds were sitting in front of the cafés, enjoying the cool breezes blowing in from the sea, or standing in the Piazzas, listening to the music of the municipal bands. He was in a hurry to get home to Lois; she must have been lonely in the little room above the studio; a new sense of what she was to him came to his mind more keenly than ever. He wanted to tell her that he had found his faith again, that the words of the humble woman who sat at her little stand outside the gates of Rome, selling fruit and cheese, had become a part of his life and God was with him.

As he entered the narrow street where so many artists and sculptors lived, he saw an auto in front of the door—a doctor's auto. A frightened feeling made him turn faint; could it be for Lois? Springing up the steps quickly, he entered and found strangers there. Kind hands led him into the studio and a woman's voice spoke soothing words, but he did not understand. He wanted Lois. O, why had he left her alone that day?

How he passed through the hours of that night he never fully understood. He heard himself praying, using new forms of petition and pouring out his soul to God whom he had not known before.

Suddenly, about midnight, he seized the brush and palette and worked like a man who is inspired. Fra Angelico the Blessed worked thus when he painted his pictures of our Lord in the Monastery of St. Mark in Florence. "It is the love of Jesus which impels me," the monk said, and painted the face of Christ, kneeling before the canvas.

At dawn, the nurse came to John Meredith, bringing in her arms his first-born son.

"It is another miracle of God," she said, for she was one of the saints of earth.

A few weeks later, when the roses were in full bloom, and clambered riotously over the old gray wall, Lois sat in an easy-chair out on a small balcony, opening from the studio, holding in her arms a soft warm bundle of love.

John had kept his painting mysteriously covered ever since that night when he had worked so rapidly. Now, he removed the cloth and looked at it a moment.

"Lois, dear" he said, "could you come in here a moment? I will carry the baby. Here, lean on me."

He led her to a seat in front of the picture and stood by her, suppressed excitement in his face and tone, as he said: "Tell me what you think of it."

It was the same general scene, the same sky, the stately, spotless lilies pressing around the figure of a man who walked through their serried ranks. But what a difference there was in the face! Perfectly featured, gentle, but with ineffable sweetness, dignity and power in its expression.

Lois held out her hand to her husband.

"It is the Lord Christ!" she said, "Not a man, but God!"

"Paul's faith—" he replied, as he stooped to kiss her, "has become my faith. I have learned to know Christ. Lois, let us not send away this picture. I will paint another one. This shall always hang in our home; perhaps others may see in it the God-Man and feel something of His beauty and power."

Walking with God

BY REV. CHARLES A. S. DWIGHT, PH.D.

THE Bible has a great deal to say about walking with God. In different forms that phrase occurs again and again in the Scriptures, which give some concrete instances of men who signally walked with God such as Enoch, the grand man of a simple age, and Noah, who had faith that the flood would come, and did not lose faith when at last afloat upon its broadening billows. The simile is a most simple one, especially suitable to a pastoral people, but does it fit our age? How can men to-day, who run and rush, find time to walk with God? Yet here is the real test of character—not in mounting up with wings as eagles, or running without weariness, but in walking, in the right direction, with the right Person, without fainting.

Certainly none will ever walk with God unless their aims are bent to the measure of His plans, for "Shall two walk together, except they have agreed?" What men in this modern age need to feel is the oneness of their life with the Great Life, and, in the phrase of the mystics, to "practise the presence of God." Walking with the Lord means to have a lively sense of His interest in us as we carry out the routine of daily duty for His sake. We can have God with us on our way to school, to the store, to the shopping district, to the office, or to the railroad station, for when we are going where we should go, we are "walking with God."

It is possible, if only we have the right spirit, to be an Enoch in a complex age, or a loving and beloved John in a time of wars and persecutions. The great Jehovah seeks our fellowship, and, if only our eye be single to His glory, we will, like Abraham of old, win the title of "friend of God." Life is not life unless it be a walk by faith, and a growing intimacy with "the Great Companion."

A Hymn for Independence Day

BY EUGENE C. DOLSON.

*Though years on years have rolled away
Since our first Independence Day,
Beyond the range of ways outworn
Our ship of state is onward borne,
Breasting the billows, strong and free—
For this, O Lord, be thanks to Thee.*

*Thanks for Thy greatest gift and best—
That we are one from east to west,
United in a common cause,
Guarded by just and equal laws;
Not struggling, rival peoples we,
But one in league from sea to sea.*

*O Thou, who through the long years gone
Hast guided us in safety on,
Whate'er the future course may be,
Keep us right-hearted, true to Thee,
With strength and purpose to fulfill Our mission and to serve Thee still!*

"Singleness of Heart"

BY WILLIAM NORRIS BURR

THEY were enjoying an after-dinner chat—James Morrison, of the firm of Morrison & Bradley, wholesale hardware merchants, and his guest, Prof. John Compton, of the Agricultural College. Both men were rated as among the very successful ones in their chosen avocations, and both were earnest Christian men, devoted to the interests of the churches of which they were members.

"We are pastorless down here just now," remarked Mr. Morrison, "and somehow our church doesn't seem to be a very easy one to satisfy. You don't know of a man up in your part of the State, do you, who can manage the affairs of a church like ours—preach to us acceptably and make us all toe the line of duty? Something like six hundred members we have, I believe."

"Well, it depends upon your dominant demand—there's a difference in churches, you know," replied Prof. Compton, in his quick, good-natured way. "I know of a church that has held on to one pastor for twenty years, and they are hoping they can keep him for twenty years longer. I know of another church that would probably begin to tire of that same man in less than two years."

"I don't know that our church is fortunate enough to possess a 'dominant demand' of any sort," smiled Mr. Morrison, dubiously. "We are a mixed lot, and we seem to be demanding a man who is an A No. One preacher, pastor, business man, young people's man, able to attract the younger children—also all the religious floaters in the town—able to converse intelligently with any man on that man's specialty, a 'spiritual man,' a 'Bible man,' a humorist, a thoughtful student of modern philosophy, a brilliant after-dinner speaker, a man who can repair his own automobile, raise his own garden truck, tear down the old furnace in the church basement and set up the new one, and always have clean hands as well as a pure heart, only his hands must not be soft in the palms. A few callouses are indispensable."

"I see." Prof. Compton looked up with a responsive smile. "As the old jingle has it, you are 'many men of many minds.' Now perhaps it is well for your church that this is the case, for if you were all people of one mind something that is mightily important might be overlooked. But it seems to me there ought to be something that would make it possible for a company of people of varied tastes and thought-habits to get along beautifully together, and to unite on a leader who may not be able to fit himself fully into the particular likings of each one of them. I suppose those early Christians, to whose numbers the Lord added daily, were not all men and women of one mould exactly, but they were of one heart if not of one mind. They not only "took their food with gladness and singleness of heart, but 'gladness and singleness of heart' seems to have characterized their whole life just at that time, and I suspect the 'singleness of heart' was the secret of no small part of the 'gladness.' It is quite possible for people who do not 'think just alike' to be in pretty close touch 'at heart'—many-minded, single-hearted. There may be diversities of taste, but the same Spirit."

"You've gone deep enough to strike something worth while!" exclaimed the merchant, who was in the habit of looking below the surface in the management of business affairs. "No one man can be found who will fit fully into the tastes of all our people; for some of them care a great deal more for their pastor's social qualifications, for example, than do some of the rest of us; but the Lord will no doubt send us one that will fit into all our hearts, if we are heart folks. And that is what Christians are supposed to be—surely it is!"

Citizenship Sunday

The Sunday preceding the Fourth of July has usually been the occasion for an effort on the part of the pulpit to stimulate the sentiment of Christian patriotism. The request, therefore, which has been made that July 2d be set aside as Citizenship Sunday will meet with sympathetic attention, and throughout our land the pulpits will doubtless ring with fervent appeals to the Christian manhood and womanhood of our country to rise to a fuller appreciation of the meaning of our American citizenship.

Assuredly there never was a time in the history of our country when it was more important to impress upon the minds and hearts of all citizens the inestimable privilege which we enjoy in living under the flag of a free republic and possessing the rights and prerogatives which are attached to our citizenship in this land of liberty.

Americanism is the word of the hour, and it stands for something that is inexpressibly precious to all those who have the spirit of true patriotism in their hearts.

One of the greatest problems which our nation faces is the question how to thoroughly Americanize the vast number of foreigners who have come in past years to our shores, and who still dwell among us as aliens in spirit, divided in their allegiance and uncertain as to their real nationality.

Citizenship Sunday affords an opportunity to help in the solution of this problem. It is hoped that every pastor will preach on this Sunday on the subject of good citizenship, and will show every hearer that to be a true Christian he must be a good citizen.

There are many of course who do not attend the church services, but an effort should be made to reach these with a message on the printed page which will show them that loyalty to our country and unswerving devotion to her best interests are demanded from every man, woman and child in our land.

Aid for Mission Stations Abroad

Some months ago the American Tract Society remitted to mission stations abroad cash appropriations amounting to a total of $3,319. These appropriations were forwarded to some thirty-five different points, and already many grateful letters of acknowledgment have been received which tell how these and similar appropriations sent in former years are being used for the advancement of the Kingdom. We present a few extracts from these letters, which we are sure will be of interest:

Rev. J. Smith, Secretary of the Bombay Tract and Book Society of India, writes:

"I beg leave to enclose our receipt for draft just received. We have recently held our annual meeting, and while we have not reached the high water mark reached in the year 1914, yet we have done twice as much as in any other year since 1900!

"We are, I believe, on the eve of a federation of all the Tract and Literature Societies of India. We feel that we have quite outgrown our present condition, and it is felt that the time is ripe all over India for a mighty advance.

"We are having the most astonishing orders from non-Christians for devotional books by writers like Thomas á Kempis, Spurgeon, Muller and others. Books of Gospel lyrics and song are being sold by the thousand. We ourselves published last year an edition of 10,000 hymnbooks. To-day I gave a contract for 10,000 more, as nearly all the last edition are sold.

"We have done a good year's work, but our income has not been equal to our expenditure. In fact in the case of Marathi literature, the more we sell, the greater is our monetary loss, as everything is sold at less than cost!"

Rev. F. W. Jarry, Secretary to the Orissa Conference has sent this message:

"On behalf of the Orissa Conference, I would thank the American Tract Society for its generous gift. We do appreciate this grant immensely, for it helps us to print tracts that can be read and that are being used of God in this land of India to lead men into the Kingdom of God."

Our Diploma and Medal of Award

Our readers will remember that a striking exhibit of its work was made by the American Tract Society at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition held in San Francisco, Cal., last year. This exhibit was a part of the Religious Exhibit arranged by Mr. G. B. St. John under the general auspices of the Federal Council of Churches in America.

It gives us great satisfaction to announce that a Diploma and Bronze Medal of Award have been received by the American Tract Society in recognition of its exhibit. A facsimile reproduction of the Medal of Award is shown above.

The same exhibit to which this award was made is now being shown in various cities of our country under the auspices of the Traveling Exhibit of National Religious Forces, of which Mr. St. John is the Director.

Fighting for Temperance

One of the prominent features in many of the religious assemblies recently held in our land was the strong position taken in regard to the subject of temperance. For example, the Methodist Episcopal General Conference, representing over 4,000,000 communicants, unanimously adopted a report which declared for the submission of a National Prohibition Amendment to the States, for the prohibition of all inter-state commerce in liquor, and for legislation forbidding the use of the mails both to liquor shipments and to advertisements of alcoholic beverages. The same Conference also encouraged all wise and effective local movements against the liquor traffic as a step toward ultimate general prohibition.

This action is typical of the attitude of the general Christian public toward the liquor evil, and is an earnest of the near approach of the time when the battle for temperance shall be crowned with final victory.

Soldier's Text Books for Russian Prisoners

Through the coöperation of one of its generous donors the American Tract Society has recently been enabled to make a foreign cash appropriation for the publication in the Russian language of "The Soldier's Text Book," by Dr. J. R. Macduff. This will be circulated among the Russian soldiers who are prisoners in Germany through the agency of the International Young Men's Christian Association.

How to Make Ours an Ideal Nation

I Peter 2:1-10.

S. July 1. National worship. Joel 2:21-32.

On Independence Day it is the usual custom to glorify our nation, and if we listened without discrimination to the glowing tributes that are paid by enthusiastic and eloquent orators, it might be thought that the United States was already an ideal nation. Our topic serves to remind us that this is by no means the case, and as Christian patriots, it is our duty to consider some of the ways in which we may help to make our country a really ideal nation.

A Clean Nation

An ideal nation is a holy nation, and in order to be holy our country must first become clean. There are many unclean spots in our national life. The liquor evil is one of these unclean spots, and it behooves all true patriots to aid the campaign which has for its slogan the cry, "A saloonless nation by 1920."

Impurity is another blighting spot in our national life. Let us aid the effort to establish a single standard of purity for both men and women. Impurity is like a cancer gnawing at the vitals of the home life. Let us guard the family from this insidious danger by teaching the blessing of a life of purity for both sexes.

An Honest Nation

An ideal nation must first be true. Honesty is a prime requisite for a virtuous life. Let us insist upon honesty in the individual, in the community and in the nation. Let us require that men and women be honest and true in every sphere of life—political, social, commercial and religious.

A Christian Nation

In order to be an ideal nation our country must be made a Christian nation. Our country has had many glorious privileges and rich blessings. The words of Peter seem particularly appropriate to our situation: "Ye are an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession, that ye may show forth the excellencies of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light."

There is a great deal to be done in order to win our country to Christ. Many millions of our population are utterly indifferent to Christianity. Yet let us not be discouraged by the greatness of the task that confronts us. With the help of God our country must be and it finally shall be won to a saving knowledge of Him who is the ideal of all eternity, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

The Consecration of Purpose

Acts 11:19-23.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. July 3. A sound purpose. 2 Tim. 2:15.
T. July 4. Worth striving for. Luke 13:23-30.
W. July 5. Supreme purpose. Phil. 3:13, 14.
T. July 6. Spiritual or material— which? Matt. 4:8-11.
F. July 7. Purpose to build. 2 Sam. 7:1-19.
S. July 8. Peace in good purposes. Ps. 112:1-19.

Having considered during past months the consecration of our influence, our strength, our time, our talents and our money, we come now to the consecration of our purpose.

The Scripture basis for this topic is found in the words that are written concerning the mission of Barnabas to the churches, who "exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord."

The consecration of purpose involves the use of our will power. It follows, therefore, that as Christians we should cultivate our will power, so that we may rightly direct our energies toward the attainment of the high purposes that befit a Christian life.

Weakness of the will is a serious handicap to success in social, commercial or political life. It is also a serious drawback in the struggle for the attainment of that which is best in the moral and spiritual life.

We may cultivate our will power by forming the habit of making decisions promptly. Let us compel ourselves to make a choice when different alternatives of action are presented to us, and let us seek divine wisdom so that we may make the right choice.

The Supreme Purpose of Life

While there are many different purposes that we may rightfully seek to fulfill, we should have a controlling and dominating purpose, that shall reign supreme in our lives and hearts. Such a purpose has never been more beautifully expressed than in the words written by the Apostle Paul concerning his own plan of action: "One thing I do, forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, I press toward the goal unto the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

These words of the Apostle reveal a consecration of purpose that may well serve as an ideal for all Christians. Let us notice that the purpose which Paul ever set before him was to preach Christ and Him crucified. This was the one thing to which he devoted all his energies and which he followed after with unswerving fidelity through all his apostolic career.

A Life of Consecration

The consecration of our purposes will result in consecrated lives. God calls us to yield our wills to Him, and if we give ourselves wholly to Him, then our whole purpose in life will be to serve and honor Him in all that we do and say and think.

Let us beware of a divided purpose. We cannot serve two masters. We must consecrate ourselves wholly to Christ and bring into conformity with His requirements our every word and deed and thought.

It is important to have a purpose in life. It is still more important that we have the right purpose. It is of supreme importance that we choose the best purpose as our controlling force. Let us make it the purpose of our lives to serve the Lord Jesus Christ with an undivided and whole-hearted allegiance.

Purity, Temperance and Strength

Daniel 1:8-20.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. July 10. Pure hearts. Matt. 5:8.
T. July 11. Cleanse yourselves. 2 Cor. 6:14-18; 7:1.
W. July 12. Self-control. Rom. 6:12-23.
T. July 13. A temperate tongue. Jas. 3:1-13.
F. July 14. Silent strength. John 19:1-12.
S. July 15. Source of strength. Isa. 40:25-31.

"Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God," said the Master in one of His beatitudes, and these words indicate the richness of the reward that awaits the men and women in whose lives purity is the guiding and controlling principle.

Elsewhere in His teaching our Master emphasized the truth that the heart is the fountain head of purity. Therefore, if our lives are to be pure, we must control our imaginations and rule our thoughts so that they shall be free from vicious and impure suggestions. It is true that none of us can equal the matchless purity of heart and life that characterized our Lord. But by His divine help, we may grow more and more pure until we approximate that purity of heart that characterizes those to whom is vouchsafed the vision of God Himself.

Temperance in All Things

Self control in regard to the use of strong drink is a most vital and important matter. Modern science is showing us that the best attitude for us to adopt on that subject is to abstain entirely from the use of liquor in any way, shape or form. As Prof. Wells has aptly put it: "Keeping an automobile engine absolutely free from grit—that is total abstinence; putting in only a little grit—that is moderate drinking."

But let us remember that we need to exercise self-control in everything. We may be immoderate in indulging in pleasure, we may be gluttonous in eating, we may over-study or over-work or exceed the limits of moderation in a thousand and one things. Against all such excesses let us set our faces like a flint, and by the use of self-control let us have well-ordered lives that shall be examples of temperance in all things.

Towers of Strength

Lives in which purity and temperance are the dominant principles are towers of strength. They are the lives which constitute the foundation of the nation and assure the perpetuity of the home.

The inspired writer of the Book of Proverbs tells us, "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

The secret of all true strength is found in union with Him who will give us power to rule our spirits and to overcome every temptation through faith in His name.

Enthusiasm: Its Value; How to Cultivate It

Isaiah 12:1-6

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. July 17. Its steady power. Acts 4:15-22.
T. July 18. Love's hot heart. Acts 18:25-28.
W. July 19. Enthusiastic about good. Phil. 1:3-11.
T. July 20. Prayer feeds enthusiasm. 2 Thess. 1:11-12.
F. July 21. Enthusiasm through work. Luke 10:17-24.
S. July 22. Witness with enthusiasm. Luke 8:33-39.

The twelfth chapter of the prophecy of Isaiah is a beautiful thanksgiving hymn, an appropriate utterance for the restored Israelites. This chapter comes as a climax to the preceding chapter, which gives a vision of everlasting deliverance under Messiah's reign.

When we study this hymn of thanksgiving, we see that it is full of the spirit of enthusiasm. It rises in an ascending strain until it calls upon the redeemed to "cry aloud and shout" in the exuberance of their joy.

The root meaning of the word enthusiasm is full of suggestion. It comes from the two Greek words which mean "God within," and it suggests the thought that true enthusiasm comes from divine inspiration.

Enthusiasm is a real asset in any undertaking. Indeed it may be truly said that no great enterprise was ever accomplished without enthusiasm.

Enthusiasm is valuable because it gives expression to great emotions. It stimulates high and lofty purposes and it quickens noble aspirations.

Mere noise does not constitute enthusiasm; indeed noise is sometimes used in order to hide the absence of any real enthusiasm.

Real enthusiasm, however, is never silent. It finds expression in song and makes vocal the confidence which it feels. Enthusiasm is contagious because it makes itself known in unmistakable fashion.

How Enthusiasm Grows

In order to cultivate enthusiasm we must be sincere. In the realm of the spiritual life enthusiasm has been rightly defined as "the enjoyment of our religion, and it is of value because it proves our religion to be genuine; for false religion is never enjoyed."

Enthusiasm grows by feeding on the realities and essential verities of life. The most lasting enthusiasm is the enthusiasm that is connected with the things which though not seen are eternal.

As we think over the names of those who have accomplished great things for the progress of the Kingdom we see that they have been men and women of enthusiasm. Paul, Peter, James, John and the other Apostles were full of enthusiasm. Ignatius, Chrysostom, Augustine, Cyprian and the other Church fathers were men of enthusiastic spirit. Luther, Zwingli, Knox and the other reformers were living examples of glowing enthusiasm.

Christian Enthusiasm

True Christian enthusiasm is not dependent upon mere outward circumstances. A Christian's enthusiasm, it has been truly said, rises highest in times of trial and opposition. The reason for this is that the Christian's enthusiasm is the result of the presence of Christ within.

How Missions are Blessing Our Nation

Luke 19:41-48.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. July 24. An educational blessing. Prov. 8:1-18.
T. July 25. A spiritual blessing. Heb. 8:8-13.
W. July 26. Elevating morals. 1 Thess. 2:1-12.
T. July 27. Making men diligent. Col. 3:17-25.
F. July 28. Encouraging generosity. Luke 12:32-34.
S. July 29. Making better homes. Tit. 2:1-10.

In our topic the word Missions may be taken in its broadest sense, including both the home and foreign fields.

Missions are blessing our country at home by bringing to all parts of our land the saving message of the Gospel, which results in redeemed lives and transformed communities.

Missions are blessing our cities by reaching the degraded and the fallen who live in the slums, by ministering to the poor and the needy and by caring for the sick.

Missions are blessing our country by evangelizing the foreigners who have come to our shores with little or no knowledge of true religion.

Missions are blessing our country by uplifting the once down-trodden negro race and by educating the mountain highlanders and other specially needy classes of our population.

Widening Our Horizon

By sending missionaries abroad we are broadening our horizon. A narrow horizon is apt to cramp and dwarf the mind, but an outlook as wide as the world broadens us so that we can see things in their true proportions.

William Carey was only a cobbler, but he had a map of the world on his shop wall, and it gave him as broad a vision as was ever possessed by any far-seeing statesman.

Missions abroad add to our opportunities of doing good. By the agency of missionary effort we are enabled to share with other lands the blessings of the Christian civilization that we enjoy ourselves.

"Trade follows the flag," it is said.

It should also be said that often the first flag to wave in the advance of Christian civilization is the banner of the Cross, carried forward into unexplored regions by missionary pioneers just as Livingstone carried the banner of Christ into the hitherto unknown wilds of Africa.

Stimulating Our Heroism

The missionary enterprise is one that should stir us to heroic effort both at home and abroad. It takes men and women of heroic mold to perform the service that is required both in the home and at the foreign mission stations. It also calls for heroic self-sacrifice to stay on the home base and furnish the support that is needed to prosecute the missionary task as it ought to be carried on.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan says, "Service for God and humanity never becomes dynamic and saving until it becomes sacrificial."

Our Little Folks

Her Neighbor's Garden

BY A. MARIA CRAWFORD.

HOPE that you are tired, Marjorie May, after digging in your garden all morning," said Lucile as she paused for a moment beside her small sister who was resting on the porch steps. "It is too hot to do anything but our usual tasks, and here you spend a whole lovely morning, planting seeds and digging around plants when you know this place is to be sold and the landlord told father we had to move by the first of next month."

Marjorie May's face brightened. "But just think how pleased the people moving in will be when they see their gar-

"Well, when people do something for me, it will be time enough then to do something nice for them in return," was the rejoinder.

"But somebody has to be the first to start doing that something nice, Lucile."

"You talk just like mother does, you funny Marjorie May. Why, don't you know that mother is old-fashioned, and that doing neighborly things like planting a garden for everybody around here to enjoy, has gone out of style?" Lucile laughed. "You need not even know who your next door neighbors are unless you really want to know. The high cost of living has reduced neighborly courtesies. It is all one can do to bake cakes and pies for their own family without considering the poor little woman cried and begged mother to teach her to be a nice house-keeper and a good cook. So when she was well, she began to follow mother's example and now she is happier than she ever was in all her life. I have heard her say so several times."

"Well," interrupted Lucile, "I think that when people are too lazy to clean up and try to cook good meals, nobody ought to do a thing to help them. It seems that we are getting away from our subject. You are silly to blister your hands working for total strangers. Come, let's dress up and go visiting or run over to Mabel's and have a game of tennis."

"No, thank you. I am going to begin transplanting lettuce and tomatoes right away. Playing tennis is not as good exercise as farming and not half as much fun to me."

So the sisters parted and presently Marjorie May put on her broad brimmed hat again and went out happily to her garden.

It was when they were all gathered around the supper table that night that Marjorie May's father startled them with a bit of exciting news.

"Mr. Maynard sold this place to-day. The new tenants or owners, I judge, will want to take possession at once."

"And that means we will have to move before the first of the month!" exclaimed Lucile. Then without waiting for an answer, she looked at Marjorie May. "What did I tell you about wearing out your perfectly good back and blistering your hands beautifying somebody else's garden? With all your work, what will you have to show for it? A lot of strangers gobbling up the peas, radishes and onions that you planted with such care."

"What a happy surprise will be waiting for them, Lucile! They will not only be getting this nice house but a beautiful garden as well and I have loved to work in it. I think that we have been fortunate to stay here during the spring. Perhaps where we move, there won't be any garden to dig and I have enjoyed this one so much."

Marjorie May's mother was smiling and looking so happy even with the prospect of moving before her that her husband asked her what was the matter.

"I have a surprise—a happy surprise for all of you. We are going to stay right here and we won't have to pay rent any more."

There were eager questions from every side. "How?" "Why?" "Oh, mother, really?"

"My farmer brother, Sam, who was here a few weeks ago, bought the place and has given it to us for a home." There were tears in the fine blue eyes as she looked across the table at the man with whom she had journeyed for so many years. How they had planned and saved for a home and always something had kept them back, sickness or educating and caring for the children. "Sam was so pleased over Marjorie May's garden plot and her interest in growing things that he said he wanted to give us the place for a home. He gave the house to me but he insisted that the garden must belong to Marjorie May." She took a narrow slip of paper from an envelope beside her plate. "He has sent a check to pay for spading up and getting more of the yard under cultivation. So you can have potatoes and late beans along with the china asters and chrysanthemums that you dreamed about, Marjorie May. You see, little girl, while you worked so unselfishly, making a beautiful garden for somebody else to enjoy, you were planting it all for us."

How Peggy and Betty Celebrated Independence Day.

BY HELEN M. RICHARDSON.

"I'M going to wear my white dress," said Peggy.

"And I'll wear mine!" agreed Betty. "I'll wear my red sash and blue hair ribbon," Peggy went on to say.

"And I'll wear my blue sash and red hair ribbon," Betty asserted.

"Won't it be fun," both said together.

Then two little girls giggled and squeezed each other's hands. One ran up the street, and one skipped down. Nobody had heard the conversation except an inquisitive gray squirrel on a tree overhead, and a plump robin-red-breast on the fence. They wouldn't divulge the secret because they couldn't talk.

And so it happened that on Fourth of July morning Peggy seated herself at the breakfast table in her white dress, red sash and blue hair ribbon. And Betty appeared at about the same time, in a house not far away, in a white dress, and a blue sash, and a red ribbon tying her dark curls.

"Good morning, little Goddess of Liberty," Peggy's father said, bowing politely.

"Good morning, Papa," Peggy replied with a demure courtesy.

In a house three blocks away Betty's big brother Dick lifted her aloft as she entered the breakfast room and called her his little Fourth of July girl.

By and by Peggy and Betty met in Betty's yard. A large American flag was flying from the house-top. This was Brother Dick's surprise to the two little Fourth of July maidens.

Then, after a while, when the sun grew hot, Betty's mother set a little round table on the broad veranda; and on it were some of Grandmother Parker's blue-and-white saucers filled with pink ice-cream. It was not as red as the stripes on the flag, or as Peggy's sash, or Betty's hair ribbon. But, my! didn't it taste good! and didn't these two little girls feel patriotic while they were eating it!

This was Mother Parker's surprise.

After the feast was over, there was a loud chug-chugging out in the garage; and out rolled an automobile all decorated with flags, in which these happy children had a most delightful ride.

This was Father Parker's surprise.

Of course Peggy felt as if just dressing up was not quite all her part. But pretty soon the automobile chug-chugged up her own drive-way, and they were all invited in to dinner, and had some more pink ice-cream in Peggy's grandmother's blue-and-white dishes.

This was a surprise that Peggy's father and mother had prepared. For when little girls begin the day by surprising other people into patriotism, it is no more than fair for these same people to turn about and surprise them.

"What a happy Fourth of July this has been!" said Peggy as she took off her red sash and blue hair ribbon and neatly folded them.

"Oh," sighed Betty, sleepily, as she took off her blue sash and red hair ribbons and folded them, just as Peggy had done, "how I wish it was going to be Fourth of July again tomorrow!"

Then two happy, tired little children cuddled down in their beds and the birds sang them to sleep. I imagine that one of the birds may have been the same robin that first heard their secret.

BLOWING BUBBLES.

den! The peas are up pretty high and the radishes and onions will be ready to pull soon. And flowers, Lucile! All the rose and geranium cuttings that Mrs. Barton gave me last fall are growing beautifully and the sweet peas are peeping up two or three inches high."

"You are just wasting time," insisted the older girl. "The people who move in here will probably let your garden plot go to waste in a few weeks. I think that you are foolish to work for somebody you don't even know."

"Perhaps," argued Marjorie May, smiling, "I am selfish about it, after all. I love to work in the earth, to plant seeds and watch them grow into beautiful plants! Even when we move away, I can walk by here and see my garden and know that I made that little bit of beauty in the world. It won't be much, of course, but it will help."

folks who live all around them. I believe that mother gives away dollars and dollars' worth of rolls, pies and cakes every month of the year."

"But think of the pleasure it gives mother, Lucile! Beside that, our neighbors send us things too."

"Yes, but they never send nice trays like mother does and you know it."

"It is because they don't know how, not because they don't want to send as lovely things as mother makes. For instance, take dear little Mrs. Simpson's case! Mother has set her a wonderful example. When she first moved near us, she was not a bit interested in her cottage. She hated to cook and wouldn't even try to learn. But when she had the grippe last winter and mother went over there and cleaned up for her and carried meals and Mr. Simpson talked about mother's good things to eat, that

The Family Circle

A Gala Fourth of July

By Cora S. Day

IT seems too bad to have a stormy day like this come along just now," said Aunt Lucy sympathetically. "I wish it could be nice and bright every day while you are here with us. You need all the fresh air and sunshine you can get—and deserve them too, Johnny."

She always called him by the childish nickname, and though he had grown so tall that he could look down upon her head now covered with gray hair, Aunt Lucy and Uncle James had always thought a great deal of John, and rejoiced with his own home folks when he did well in school and later in business. They were quite as sorry as the home folks could be, too, when he met with the accident that broke his arm and bruised and battered him up so thoroughly that he was in the hospital for weeks; and now, when he was able to be out and about, they had insisted upon his coming to their home in this little seashore summer resort to regain his lost strength, and stay over "the glorious Fourth."

It was a modest little home; not one of the summer kind, but one where they stayed all the year round and paid close attention to the small grocery business which they carried on in the "store front" of their house. It was on a side street in a semi-business section and did a fairly good trade for its size.

Here John was made welcome and comfortable; and for several days he did little but eat and sleep and lie on the beach in the sand, basking in the sun or seeking the shelter of a huge beach sun shade when it grew too warm to be comfortable. Already he felt new life and health coming in place of the wearisome weakness that had followed his long illness.

"I'm beginning to feel like a husky loafer already," he put it, this rainy morning. "I want to go into the store and help sell things, Uncle James, if you'll have me about in your way. It will keep me from playing out in the rain, you know, or getting underfoot here in the house."

"All right, young man," Uncle James replied promptly. "I'm extra busy for an hour or two this morning, putting up a lot of orders that came in too late yesterday to deliver. If you want to help get them out it will be a lot of help to me."

So John busied himself making neat packages of various groceries for the first half of the morning. Then he did one of the oddest things he ever had done.

A farm wagon, drawn by a mule and driven by a dusky old negro, stopped in front of the store as John stood in the doorway for a moment watching the delivery wagon drive away with its load. The old farmer hailed him.

"Mornin', boss! Want some wata-milyuns for your store?" Theyse fine—but I ain't sold moh'n half de load an' I'se got to git home right soon. I'll give you a bargain if you'll help me out, boss."

John was on the point of refusing. He knew his uncle handled little or no green stuff, the local markets supplying that line. Then an idea came. What if he bought them and sold them himself, and made a little profit out of this enforced "pleasure trip?"

"How many have you?" he asked, going out to the curb and standing under the shelter of the dripping awning.

"Jes' fifty, boss. Take 'em at five cents apiece, to git 'em off my hands," came the offer. John put his hand in his pocket.

"Here you are, pile them right there along the curb," he said, and handed the pleased ducky the money. In a few minutes John was in possession of his stock and Uncle James, smilingly teasing him over his "reckless speculation," was helping him sort the melons into three grades. Before they were all arranged in the five, ten and fifteen cent piles, a customer came out of the store and added one to her purchases. Some one else saw the sale and took one.

"They look nicer and fresher than those over in the market," said the purchaser, and a passerby, hearing the words, ordered two of the best sent home.

"Wagon's going that way this afternoon. I'll send them for you," Uncle James said, as he left John and went in to attend to regular store business.

It was surprising how fast that stock of melons vanished. When the sun came out in the middle of the afternoon the last one was just being carried off by a purchaser, and John had the rest of the day to rest and count his profits: which he found were over three dollars. He laughed boyishly as he showed his handful of money to his aunt and uncle.

"If that fellow comes along again, I'm going to try it all over," he declared. "It was more fun than loafing all the time. I'm afraid I can't pose very successfully as an invalid when I'm getting hungry for work already, eh?"

"Bless your heart, Johnny," Aunt Lucy said. "It's just like you to be making the best of your misfortunes. You did it when you were a little chap and fell down and skinned your bare knees. Instead of crying and making a fuss you jumped up and laughed, a little shakily, and said: 'It'll soon be well, won't it, Auntie?' I do believe the Lord has a special blessing for folks who take what He sends them in an uncomplaining spirit."

"Of course, Aunt Lucy," John replied with a twinkle that contradicted his grave tone. "They get a lot more fun and a lot less misery out of life than the grouchy ones," and he laughed off her fond praise.

The next morning the negro farmer appeared with a full hundred melons, mindful of the previous quick sale.

"I wouldn't let anybody have these yere melons a cent less than a dime apiece, if I hadn't such a big crop," he declared earnestly. "'Sides, boss, de Fourth is a-comin' and' I wants the money outen dese milyuns for the chil-lun's treat."

John laughed and took the load. He wanted the money out of the "milyuns" for a "treat," too. It came fast. By night his stock was sold out, for the fame of his watermelons had spread in the neighborhood.

"They are so nice, and nearer home than the regular market," more than one pleased customer said.

Several more loads of watermelons passed through John's hands in the days that followed. He spent his mornings in brisk and profitable trade and a part of the afternoons in well earned rest. Then, just a few days before "the Fourth," when his earnings reached a certain coveted sum, he spread out on the store counter one afternoon a brave array of coins and bills.

"Twenty-five dollars," he said proudly. "Not so bad for the sick-a-bed laddie, eh?" Deftly he divided the money into two piles. One he pushed toward his surprised uncle.

"Rent for the use of your sidewalk," he laughed. As Uncle John would have refused and protested, he added: "Please I want you and Aunt Lucy to have that. This half is for mother and father—to come down and spend the Fourth with us, and go home with me. May they—may I send for them? We'll spend this extra money giving them, and Aunt Lucy a good time. I feel somehow as if the Lord would like me to use it, through those I love best, as a sort of thank offering for His goodness in making me strong and well so soon again."

Uncle John could not but fall in with the plan after that, and was glad to do it. So it came about that the Fourth was a gala day indeed for five happy people, as they spent it together listening to patriotic music and speeches, watching the parade and exercises and enjoying each other's society. Four of those people—father, mother, aunt, uncle—felt sure that the country held no truer patriot than the smiling, happy lad with them. For a boy who honors his parents and his God is the stuff of which the most loyal patriots are made.

It's largely a question of right eating—right food. For sound health one must cut out rich, indigestible foods and choose those that are known to contain the elements that build sturdy bodies and keen brains.

Grape-Nuts

ts a wonderfully balanced food, made from whole wheat and barley. It contains all the nutriment of the grain, including the mineral phosphates, indispensable in Nature's plan for body and brain building.

Grape-Nut is a concentrated food, easy to digest. It is economical, has delicious flavor, comes ready to eat, and has helped thousands in the winning class.

A Word in Season

BY EVA DE MARSH.

SHE is a woman of strong character." Thus spoke one of a friend. It was only a word in season, but that word came to the ears of the woman of whom it was spoken, and it transformed a life. The woman did not know she was strong. True, she had battled against odds and won out, but that seemed the only thing to do; now, she knew she might march on to greater victories.

Strength of character is something both inherent and acquired. Circumstances alone can bring its highest development, and there is nothing like another's confidence in our ability to do and dare to bring it out. Unexpressed, that confidence counts for naught.

The School of Hard Knocks seems a cruel one, yet only there can we truly learn the stuff of which we are made. Therein one must choose essentials alone, therein must one have principles and abide by them. One who is the sport of vacillating impulses or the slave of public opinion must sooner or later succumb.

Strength of character betokens tenacity of purpose, but tenacity of purpose unsupported by good common sense becomes mere "pigheadedness." The one who has a purpose and wisely and tenaciously holds to it is the man to whom the world trusts her mightiest tasks and upon whom she bestows her richest blessings.

The strong man can, if need be, stand alone. No weak blusterer is he. Calm and self-possessed, he goes his way and, instinctively, men trust him. Many men have no minds of their own, or are afraid to use those that they have. Not so the strong man. Surely he leads where few dare to follow. Because he wants them, and knows he can get them, many things are his. Wisely and well he lives his life, and "other men grow stronger and nobler thereby."

Now and then a strong man forgets "noblesse oblige" and comes to believe that "might makes right." Beating down all opposition, trampling weakness under foot, he rises to wealth, power, fame, and men say he is great. But is he? No; strong as he is, he has prostituted his strength, and a greater than he shall rise triumphantly above the petty achievements of his genius. "Truth lies in being, not seeming."

Only a word in season! Why be so chary of them? Why watch, from a distance, men's struggles, admire their efforts, yet refrain from telling them of our admiration and sympathy? To all of us come times when it is good to know we have a reputation to live up to. "A woman of strong character!" How many times, I wonder, has that woman dared where she would not have ventured, had no trust been placed in her? How many times has she grown strong even while weakness fought for supremacy?

Yonder goes a man! Every one knows he is on the wrong track, yet no one utters a word of warning. Only a word in season and he had been saved—but no one spoke it. Oh, Timidity and Cowardly Indifference, in thy name how many crimes are committed!

Strength of character betokens moral stamina, and moral stamina produces moral courage. Public opinion must be respected. To defy it takes a brave man and a strong one. "A dead fish," it is said, "can swim downstream, but it takes a live one to go against the current." Ridicule has downed many a man who had right on his side.

Some people never mind their own business quite so much as they do their neighbors, and some are so afraid of being thought meddling that they never take the initiative. Little men interfere where they do not belong; big ones intervene wherever duty points the way. If a man be "down and out," they help him to his feet and help him to stay there. If business, society, the church, or the nation, needs them, let them but hear the call and they are there, ready for service.

Only a word in season and a life was changed. Only a word in season and petty strife and turmoil ceased. Only a word in season and courage rose high in some one's breast. Only a word in season and a heart was made glad. Only a word in season and a soul was saved. Who shall speak that word? Shall you? Shall I?

A Message to Every Housewife

BY HELEN M. RICHARDSON.

IF you wish to keep your husband sane and good-natured after a day of stress and trial in shop or office, do not greet him with a history of your own grievances before he has had a chance to remove his coat or don his slippers.

His annoyances have probably matched yours, or even possibly exceeded them, and to have yours added to the burden is like overloading a horse that is about to stumble.

Besides, the smile with which you constrain yourself to welcome him may and probably will, help to clear your own mental atmosphere to the degree of forgetfulness of the petty trials the day has brought you; and involuntarily you will soon find yourself rehearsing to him the pleasant instead of the disagreeable happenings.

Habits are tenacious; and when once acquired they stick closer than burrs. A smile of welcome is a tonic that everyone can give; and as by giving we receive, the same tonic invariably reacts upon our own well being.

If you assure your husband that you have had a pleasant day, when he comes home tired and possibly a trifle discouraged by the day's strenuous activities, before you are aware of the fact all the enjoyable happenings will instantly present themselves, and you will have to rummage your brain for the disagreeable thing you were planning to rehearse as soon as he crossed the threshold.

And he—why, he will immediately follow your lead. The weary lines that had been gathering will broaden into smiles as by a touch of magic, and gaining courage from your mental attitude he will begin to wonder why he had allowed such trivial things to disturb him when such a cheery little wife awaited his home-coming.

Instead of telling him how Jack has misbehaved all day, try to recall some cute remark the little fellow has made, and let the unpleasant happenings go unrehearsed.

To be tactful is to be helpful, and the woman who has succeeded in cultivating the habit of repression, and of steeping herself, so to speak, in an atmosphere of cheerful adaptability to the needs of others, is the woman who will seldom have occasion to complain that her husband is neglectful or unsympathetic; for, unconsciously he will find himself adopting her ways. Cheerfulness is contagious. You never enter a home where the wife and mother conceals her woes and grievances behind a mask of graceful courtesy that you do not find the whole household striving to adopt her attitude.

I have in mind a man whose wife's face seems to be his mirror. If he sees joy and gladness there, his own invariably reflects it. Although of a nervous temperament this man has been kept wholesomely sane and companionable by a wife who has learned that a smile and a cheery word are the most effective panacea for a tired man when he enters the sanctuary of his home.

Only Wraiths

"I am afraid to tell you," said a young business woman, "lest you should think I was boasting, of the reason why the year just closed has been both so happy and so successful to me."

But when her old friend pressed her for the story, the girl told of the one resolution she had made at the very beginning of the successful year.

"There were just four words in it, 'The hard thing first,' but it took all my courage and strength of mind to live up to it. You know, Mrs. Jackson, I have always been timid about trying new things, or facing new people, and my position often left me free to put off the difficult work on the excuse of more urgent trifles. But last year I determined to nerve myself each morning to tackle the hard things first—and, lo and behold, most of them proved to be easy!"

The older friend looked tenderly at the eager, steady-eyed, trusty friend, as she answered: "There is a Scotch proverb that just fits your case, dear: 'A regiment of armed men always stands between you and the thing you ought to do. Go straight to it, and they turn into mist and vanish away.'"

A determined charge upon the seemingly impossible duty will prove that the difficulties in the way are mere wraiths of the mist. So let us take courage, go forward, and conquer. —EXCHANGE.

To-morrow and To-day

To-morrow wealth may fly away, or turn to ashes gray;

But not the wealth of noble deeds and duty done to-day;

To-morrow fame's bright flowered crown may wither on the strand;

But not the laurel wreath of love, wrought by the helping hand.

To-morrow, when the ears are dull that long to hear your voice,

The loving words you spoke to-day will bid your heart rejoice;

To-morrow, when from silent lips the smile shall disappear,

You will be glad if through to-day they smiled when you were near.

Life Members and Directors

THE donation of $30 at one time constitutes a Life Member of the American Tract Society; the addition of $70, or the donation of $100 at one time, constitutes a Life Director. Life members may receive annually copies of the Society's own publications to the value of $1; Life Directors to the value of $2; if applied for within the Society's year, from April 1st to April 1st, in person or by written order. No individual can draw more than one annuity any year for himself. Colporters are not authorized to supply Life Members.

Form of Bequest

I GIVE and bequeath to the "AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY," instituted in the City of New York, May, 1825, the sum of dollars to be applied to the charitable uses and purposes of said Society.

Three witnesses should state that the testator declares this to be his last will and testament, and that they signed at his request, and in his presence and the presence of each other.

To Our Subscribers

A RULING of the Post Office Department states that copies of the AMERICAN MESSENGER may not be mailed to persons whose subscriptions are in arrears for a period exceeding twelve months. In other words, the regulations of the Post Office Department compel us to remove from our regular mailing list the names of all who delay the payment of their subscriptions longer than twelve months. In view of this fact we urge upon all our friends the necessity of attending promptly to the renewal of their subscriptions. A glance at the address label on the wrapper of the paper will show at what date each subscription expires.

The Bible in the Tibetan Language

The Moravian Himalayan Mission reports the completion of the translation of the Bible into the Tibetan language. The New Testament has long been in use, but missionaries are never satisfied until they have all the written Word ready to put into the hands of the people. The complete Bible has also been translated and is being printed in the Nepali language. Nepal is an independent kingdom in the Himalayas, that belongs to the Indian Empire. It has a population of about 5,000,000, but no Christian mission has been allowed to settle within its border. About a hundred years ago the Serampore Mission translated and printed portions of the New Testament. In 1902 the complete New Testament was printed, and now the whole Bible will be sent out to speak its own message in the land that is closed to the heralds of the Cross.

A Strong Organization

The present membership in the Young Men's Christian Association is 620,799; the annual expenses have grown to $12,924,701; the number of Associations owning buildings is 759, and the value of these buildings has reached the enormous figure of over $77,483,448.

The Foreign Department of the International Committee which was organized in 1889 with a secretary in Tokyo and another in Madras, has now 180 trained American secretaries stationed at important student and commercial centres in China, Japan, Korea, India, Mexico, South America, Russia and other foreign lands. This work is carried on at an annual expenditure of more than $460,000. It has raised up seventy-five buildings in the foreign field and has trained 200 secretaries from those countries to help carry on the work.

The Printed Preacher

The "Printed Preacher" has no fixed place of preaching, for the world is his parish; and while he is powerless in himself, he is ready to be sent wherever there is an opening for his message, and he will deliver it on the spot. It is all the same to him whether it is in the poorest slum or a stately mansion, by the bedside or the seaside, in town or in the country, by camp-fire or in barracks, in store or in stable, by road or by rail. If only there is even one to listen—no matter where—he is always ready.

Some "Platform Preachers" have a very decided preference for rich and fashionable audiences, whilst some are only "at home" with intellectual hearers, who can appreciate a brilliant discourse, logical and entertaining. Others, again, prefer speaking to the poor and less learned, being more approachable, less critical; while there are those who have no such choice, so long as their congregation is a large one.

Our "Printed Preacher" has no particular preference. He is bound to no special society; makes choice of no particular class, creed or shade of opinion; and as to the question of numbers, few or many, it does not affect him.

Then some "Platform Preachers" are timid, especially in speaking to individuals. Not so with our "Printed Preacher"—his unassuming fearlessness impresses you as being a most desirable quality in any witness for God. For example, he would be as ready to look a member of the royal family in the face and tell him of another crowned Head, as to tell the poorest beggar in the gutter of One who is "rich unto all that call upon Him." He certainly would as fearlessly tell a popular modern theologian of the serious consequences of preaching "any other gospel" than the one brought from heaven by the Holy Spirit, as tell a contrite sinner of the cleansing blood of Jesus Christ, the Son of God; or, tell him that "there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth."

Then, again, some "Platform Preachers" occasionally consider themselves "off duty." Our "Printed Preacher"—never. Indeed more, he knows no "time limit"—"in season, out of season," he is always ready—midday, midnight, matters not; it is never too early, nor too late, for his services. "Always abounding in the work of the Lord" might well be said of him. "Patient continuance" characterizes his work. Unfailing readiness, untiring constancy, may justly be claimed for him. He will patiently repeat the same address the same day, as often as anyone can possibly find time to listen.

Some "Platform Preachers" feel greatly annoyed when the patience of one of their hearers gets exhausted by the length of a discourse and leaves before it is half finished. Our "Printed Preacher" takes no offense at such slight. If only a few words are listened to, and even if these be opposed by bitter expression of unmerited anger, he will never answer back.

Should it strike you further that his message might be a comfort or a timely warning, to some friend or loved one over the seas, thousands of miles away, you will find this preacher instantly ready to be sent, no matter where! Nor will the expense of sending him be any impediment, for one or two of the smallest copper coins of the realm will be sufficient to cover the cost of his journey, even if it be to the other side of the globe; and on such errands he waits not to be accredited by any human organization. He is as ready to be made use of by a little girl of nine or ten as by the greatest potentate or richest millionaire.

No preacher on earth has to-day such an "open door" as this "Printed Preacher"—obtaining an entrance, and a hearing, where none other can.

American Tract Society

THIS SOCIETY was organized in 1825. Its work is interdenominational and international in scope, and is commended by all evangelical denominations.

It has published the Gospel messages in 178 languages, dialects and characters. It has been the pioneer for work among the foreign-speaking people in our country, and its missionary colporters are distributing Christian literature in thirty-three languages among the immigrants and making a home-to-home visitation among the spiritually destitute, both in the cities and rural districts, leaving all kinds of Christian literature, also the Bible or portions of the Scriptures.

Its publication of leaflets, volumes and periodicals from the Home Office total 794,639,700 copies. It has made foreign cash appropriations to the amount of $799,456.39, and grants of electrotypes to the value of $61,177.96, by means of which millions of copies of books and tracts have been published at mission stations abroad.

The gratuitous distribution of the past year is to the value of $16,684.99. The grand total of its gratuitous distribution has been to the value of $2,634,505.89, which is the equivalent of 5,269,010,000 tract pages.

The total number of family visits that have been made by the Society's colporters during the last year is 206,167; the total number of volumes distributed by sale or grant is 55,517, making the total number of volumes that have been circulated by colporters in the last 74 years 17,382,454, and the total number of family visits that they have made during the same period 18,612,843.

Its work, ever widening, is dependent upon donations and legacies, and greatly needs increased offerings.

IN THE MISSION FIELDS

Evangelizing Japan

On the front cover page of this issue of the AMERICAN MESSENGER there is presented a typical scene in Japan. In that picture we see a bell temple, which reminds us of the fact that heathen superstition is still rife in that far-away land, and calls us to increased exertions in order that Japan may be evangelized.

On this page we have another picture, which shows us one of the agencies that are at work for the evangelization of Japan. Here we see an interior view of the rooms of the Japan Book and Tract Society, an organization founded by the concerted efforts of the American Tract Society and the Religious Tract Society of London and now doing a most vital and important work for the spread of the Gospel message in Japan by the medium of the printed page.

The last annual report of the Japan Book and Tract Society presents some interesting statements concerning the work. It shows the publication of 1,642,600 copies of books, tracts, and cards, which aggregate over 13,000,000 pages. Four of the books issued were new publications, viz., "Daily Light," "Knots Untied," an abridgment of a valuable book by Bishop Ryle, "Little Pillows," by Miss F. R. Havergal, and "Christ in All the Scriptures," by Miss A. M. Hodgkin.

A Fund for Publishing Fresh Books is maintained by the Japan Book and Tract Society, but it is greatly depleted, as indicated by the following statement written by Mr. George Braithwaite, the Secretary-Treasurer:

"We have several books ready for the printer, and the publishers abroad have also given us full permission to publish translations of a number of others, but our work is sadly handicapped by shortage of funds. The call for new books is louder than ever. The results of some conscription examinations held here recently, showed that out of 10,813 Japanese young men examined, there were only three amongst those mentally and physically sound who could not read and write. A well known missionary of much experience writing us recently says, 'I wish I knew of more really good, strong, literary books of high tone, suitable for the people who are now reading all sorts of novels and translations of novels. The danger here is a very serious one now—the young people are reading Bernard Shaw, Ibsen, Maeterlinck, and many translations of French, Italian, and Russian novels of a thrilling, romantic kind.'

"Gifts towards this fund would therefore greatly cheer our hearts and would be a permanent help to the Japan Book and Tract Society's work, as the rule that our books be sold slightly above cost, enables us to use the proceeds from the sale of a book, either to print another edition of the same work, or if it seems better, to publish some other which appears likely to be more fruitful. We earnestly trust therefore that the Lord of the harvest may put it in the hearts of some of His stewards to send us help for this purpose."

The Conversion of a Village Headman

Rev. E. Price, of the South Africa General Mission, gives this account of the conversion of a village chief in Africa. He writes:

"Nsitu, a village headman, is a Christian, who has met with severe opposition from the District Headman and from his own household. He has given up his second wife and is striving to serve the Lord Jesus with a perfect heart. In a conversation I had with him some time ago he gave me the story of his conversion, which is as follows: 'The words that brought conviction to my heart are these, "Lekami Zoipa"—Cease from sin. These words entered my heart with great force. It was the first time I was brought to see that I was a sinner and that I needed to be saved from my sin. I longed to be able to cease from sinning. I was shown the way to the Cross of Christ, Who alone could wash away my sin, and give me peace and joy. I understood very little at the time, but Jesus revealed His Word. I was led little by little to give up one sin after another and to change my whole life and outlook. As I began to know Him more and more, and was shown more clearly what He required of me, the light broke, and I was willing to follow Him where He should lead. About this time my wife wanted me to build her a house in her father's village on the Zambesi river. I refused to do this and told her that seeing I had become a Christian I could not have two wives, then sent her home to her father. My first wife at times was given to have dealings with evil spirits. I told her that we cannot have two gods in this house, and gathered all her charms, etc., etc., and threw them away, telling her they must all go. She was very much upset and angry with me, but I was firm."

Planning for Living Epistles

Rev. Frank C. Laubach's enthusiastic study of the American Board's field in the Philippine Archipelago—the large southern island of Mindanao—has developed a scheme for educating the teachers and leaders of the coming Filipinos which meets with enthusiastic approval of men on the ground. Mr. Laubach writes:

"This is the thing which I have brought to the attention of several educators and governors and which they consider meets the need of Mindanao exactly.

"It is a central school for the training of the men and women we need to Christianize and civilize—the wild people and the Moros. What do we want of the young men who will do this? 1. They will be thorough Bible students. 2. They will have the passion for service. 3. They will be models and leaders in their communities. 4. They will live ideals of purity, cleanliness, thrift, efficiency, and intelligence—and monogamy.

"Of course, there are more things, but to get to the point: We propose a school which can accommodate young married couples. I hasten to state why: 1. People in the tropics have a notorious lack of originality. They cannot be taught one thing and be expected to apply it in new conditions. If we expect the young man and his wife to go back and live ideal, healthy, cleanly, efficient married lives in the mountains, we have got to give them their start as married folk living ideally for a period of a year or two or three, and then they will never get away from it.

"2. We have had and have heard of some very unhappy experiences with young evangelists whose wives did not have the vision and were a severe handicap to them. We propose to make efficient workers out of the wives.

"3. The most important thing we can do is to teach by example, living all-round Christian lives at home and in one's work. The wives will take to the tribe to which they go ideals of Christian child-raising. They will carry the best in hygiene, in housekeeping, in cooking. The men will carry the Christian ideal of equality of women—tremendous in its influence here, where women are all slaves.

"All of the highlands of Mindanao will some day be famous for agriculture, and it is the only industry worth teaching the people. Our young men will be taught to farm efficiently, and will return to their home towns, take up land, and support themselves by means of agriculture. They will be taught to organize their towns for the best disposal of their products and for all purposes of agriculture, as has been done effectively in Ceylon (Willis, 'Agriculture in the Tropics').

"This will be the source of income for our young couples, and will be the means of enabling them to assume the leadership in their communities which is so extraordinarily necessary for doing effectual work in teaching Christianity among the tribes of Mindanao."

A Living Book

An old man in Korea had purchased St. Matthew's and St. Mark's Gospels, and read them with interest. One day, when he was out in the fields, his house caught fire, and was completely destroyed. On his return, he found that nothing had been saved except the two Gospels, which a member of his family had rescued, not knowing what they were. This impressed him very much; he read them with deeper interest, and finally decided to become a Christian. At first his neighbors despised him for reading the Christian books, but gradually they have come back to him as friends. Today, in that village, there are more than eighty believers. The work began by the reading of the two Gospels. The man was converted solely through reading the Scriptures and the teaching of the Holy Spirit, as he had not met a preacher or any Christian teacher until after he was a believer. Surely God's Word is life-giving.

Among the Eskimos

There is a lone missionary at work among the Eskimos of Baffin Land, the Rev. A. L. Fleming, who did not hear of the outbreak of the European war until August 11, 1915, more than a year after the event. Last year he traveled 1,300 miles by sledge and dog team, meeting practically every Eskimo in the Hudson Strait. Mr. Fleming has recently been among the Eskimos along the Fox Channel, probably the first white man ever in the region.

The Power of God Unto Salvation

The Gospel redeems the Japanese drunkard as it does the Bowery "down and out." Dr. Christopher Noss writes in the Japan Evangelist:

"I have baptized a retired teacher who has long borne the name of Nominuke Sensei, 'Toper Schoolmaster.' His face still bears the marks of alcohol, but there is no doubt of his sound conversion. I asked him what first attracted him to the Gospel and he speaks of a hospital somewhere and a Christian lying beside him. You will find some such incident back of every real conversion."

Then there is Mori Kiyochi, who came to Doctor Noss with tears, confessing that he had become a drunkard and that only Christ could save him. Dr. Noss continues:

"We talked and prayed. Soon afterwards in the presence of his astonished colleagues at the public school he broke his drinking vessel and entered upon a struggle that lasted months. The following spring vacation he walked fifty miles to Wakamatsu and was baptized. Gradually he regained his health and is now entirely cured. He showed such zeal in evangelizing his countrymen that only a suggestion was needed to make him enter the Theological Seminary at Sendai, where he is making good.

"We go down to the river to Tonosu, the home of Mr. Mori. A year ago we met a relative of his, a lantern maker named Mori Sakuji, who followed us about and in the presence of all the villagers confessed himself a wretched drunkard and begged us to pray Christ for his salvation. I was told that he had often tried to break his chain. Once he had some visiting cards printed and passed them around among his friends. They read: 'Mori Sakuji, member of the Temperance Society.' This only made the villagers despise him the more heartily the next time he went on a spree. He has, however, been sober ever since he boldly made that appeal to Christ, and his transformation is a wonder to the community. He says that he has not hankered after drink once since that day. He wrote the date, October 6, 1914, on a piece of white paper and posted it up on the wall of his home. When visitors inquire what it means he tells them it was on that day that he was saved by Christ."

Evangelizing the Aborigines

The great movement among the aborigines in South West China started among the Miaos and swept large numbers of them into the Church. These Miaos were serfs and their new attitude toward life and man and God displeased their overlords, the Nossus. Hence a bitter persecution. To overcome this opposition the missionary leaders, Mr. Adam and Mr. Pollard, felt it best to engage in evangelizing the Nossus also. The results have been beyond all expectations. When started, the work among the Nossus grew of its own momentum, since those who were converted spread the Gospel among their fellows. At present there are possibly 10,000 Miao adherents to Christianity and an equal number amongst the Nossus. The work however, has grown so fast that it has been impossible to keep close track of it. While Nossus and Miaos are distinct from each other, both are also distinct from the Chinese.

IMAGINATION

*O, for a grain of imagination,
Give us men; but pray equip them
With imagination!*

IMAGINE long rows, row topping row, of perfectly selected books on all the live present day subjects by vigorous writers who know of what they speak, volumes of poems by both American and English masters of rhythm, all the best and latest fiction judiciously marshalled, not more than two of a kind—vying each with the other in attracting attention and welcoming a chance to be taken up and read.

Imagine these books all carefully arranged in proper order under their respective heads of theology and religion, psychology, devotion, travel, history, poetry, fiction and so on interminably, not to mention gift-books, reference works, standard sets and general book supplies. Continue the process to include one copy at least of every kind and style of Bible published; both Old and New Testaments, separate and combined. It does your soul good to walk into such a bookstore filled with real books of the right order.

When you have a mind picture of all these wonders, then glance at the illustration above, and you will begin to possess an idea of our bookstore.

You have not yet heard how our customers browse about, taking solid comfort, enjoying every moment, examining a volume here and a volume there. Nor have we mentioned how courteous and polite our salesforce is. You get all this, however, when you come to us for a book either personally or by mail. The rows of books are all there so that we can hand you or send you immediately what you ask for, all topically arranged for easy accessibility. The smile and the service are included when your order or inquiry is received. Even then we are not satisfied until you are.

Our catalog gives some idea—yours for the asking. Any worth-while book you hear of or see described, we have. Make us your book dealer, exclusively

Standing On the Promises

BY REV. I. MENCH CHAMBERS, D.D.

FOR the sustaining certainties of life we are forced to stand upon either the philosophy of earth or a revelation from Heaven. The test of the better foundation is experience. Better than the individual experience is the composite experience of the ages. The formulas of men have always had a varying note. They change with the age, the need and viewpoint of fluctuating necessity. The philosophy of one age is practically obsolete in another. As Peter asked of Jesus, "To whom else can we go?"

"If there be a Rock of Ages where can I find it?" is the question of the soul. Every serious, thoughtful person hungers after the truth. The rationalist teaches that God has not given a positive and direct revelation, but that all truth is the summing up by man of the personal God-consciousness of the race.

If this be the final conclusion of man's search for soul enlightenment and rest, then we are still left to guess, and there is no certain affirmation which passes beyond the realm of doubt. The majority of us cannot stand satisfied on such an hypothesis. The instincts of man's spiritual being deny the deduction. The insistent call of the soul after God implies an answer through a "revelation," and we believe that that revelation was made in the coming and presence of Jesus Christ. In and through Him, God has spoken directly to the world. His was an eternal and all adequate message of life to life. The Apostle Peter speaking of Christ's presence with men as the Son of God and Saviour, adds: "Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises; that by these ye might be partakers of the Divine nature."

The greatest affirmation known is contained in the revealed promises of God to man. They are in the Holy Word coming to us by divine inspiration.

These promises are great and precious for two reasons. First, they are based upon the absolute integrity of the God-head. Second, they contain the provisions for the universal need of the soul. His word is "Yea and Amen," final and absolute. God cannot deny Himself. What He has guaranteed, He will perform to the end of time.

The end of the Divine promises provides for both our temporal and spiritual needs, and has in view the introduction of our spirit into the Divine nature. All His promises imply exhaustless supply and unbounded provision. All things in here in God, and in Jesus Christ all things become ours.

His promises are two-fold, that is unconditional and conditional. Unconditionally God has promised that seed time and harvest shall not fail, and that

He will pour out His spirit upon all flesh. These with others are God's statement of determination without condition. On the other hand He has given promises which are conditional. Their reception is dependent upon human obedience. "If ye abide in Me, and My words abide in you." "Bring the tithe into the storehouse and prove Me herewith and see." The blessing is conditioned upon man's compliance with the Divine will.

Then there is the ageless character of God's promises. No one generation can exhaust their supply. They do not become obsolete by the draft of the ages. A new generation bows before the same altar and seeks help from the same Father. The river of Life never runs dry.

It is our great privilege to stand upon these divine promises and put them to the test. Thus is our life enriched. "Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in Him, and He shall bring it to pass. Acknowledge Him in all thy ways and He shall direct thy steps."

"I will not leave you comfortless"; here is a promise for troubled days. "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." What an inducement for struggle and sacrifice! Here we are never sure of winning out. Life often spells unexpected defeat to our best plans and hopes. How many souls must leave this life uncrowned! There the broken shall be mended. There the lost shall be found. There God himself shall wipe all tears away. There we shall see Jesus and be like Him. Where do you find such promises except in the blessed Word of inspiration?

Life would be a dark and dreary road without the sustaining power and virtue of the Divine promises.

Those who are of the church triumphant have put these promises to the test and won the victory. Those of us in the church militant must heed them and discover in our experience their merit. In so doing, we shall come into deeper peace, and find always the sure undergirding of God's presence and sustaining grace.

"How gentle God's commands,
How kind His precepts are!
Come, cast your burdens on the Lord,
And trust His constant care,

"His goodness stands approved,
Unchanged from day to day;
I'll drop my burden at His feet,
And bear a song away."

What a Blind Man Taught

We have read of a blind man who was walking and tapping as he went. Asked why he did that he replied, "Thus I discover the crossings and rough places in my path." Commenting on the incident an editorial writer says:

"This blind man had learned a lesson that multitudes of people with eyes are slow to get: Always ready for what may come. That man did not know just where the crossing was. He knew that it was somewhere near and he fortified himself against a possible shock. It is said of great statesmen that they are never surprised. They have learned to look with the utmost care upon all sides of every question. In fact, they spend most of their lives in the future rather than in the present. When the future is provided for, in all its possibilities, the present is easy.

"So it is with an experienced lawyer. He does his best to forecast all the arguments that the opposing counsel can possibly make against him, and he has his answers ready for them before they are made.

"This is the real philosophy of life, in its practical aspect; so to forecast the possibilities of our deeds that we may choose only such actions as have honorable and delectable consequences.

"This philosophy of life includes eternity as well as time. A man that knows how to live may not think of death very much. Indeed, he ought not to; but he is ready for the call at any time. He is not accumulating a lot of evil deeds that will take time for repentance when this mortal life draws near its close. He is 'confessed up' and 'prayed up' at all times. He has made his peace with God, and he makes his peace with God every day. So he is ready."

WILL YOU HELP?

The publishers of the American Messenger would like to double the circulation of this paper during the coming months, and a special effort is now being made toward this end. Our readers realize the value of the paper, and from the many testimonials received we know that it is highly appreciated.

The importance of having good reading matter in every home cannot be emphasized too strongly. It is as essential to provide material for the culture of the mind and soul as it is necessary to furnish food for the body, and to select the right kind of mental and spiritual nourishment demands perhaps greater care and attention than to supply suitable provision for the needs of the body.

This splendid undenominational, inspiring and evangelical monthly for over seventy-three years has been esteemed one of the most useful of religious periodicals, and is one of the cheapest as well as one of the best papers published. We believe it to be the finest illustrated religious monthly published at the low price of only 50 cents a year for a single subscription or 30 cents in clubs of five or more.

The usefulness of this paper may be enlarged by increasing its circulation, and this can be done through voluntary effort. Scores of pastors who have felt its power for good in their charges have secured some one to canvass their congregations and secure large lists of subscribers, and hundreds of other pastors would find it an advantage to do likewise.

We ask the pastor, Sunday-school teacher, or Christian worker who reads these words to try the experiment and see if his own work is not greatly aided by this monthly messenger of truth.

We plead for the wide increase of the circulation of the American Messenger in order that it may displace trashy literature, may help parents in training their children for Christ, may awaken the impenitent to the claims of the Crucified, may comfort stricken mourners and may cooperate with the pastor in every good work, and thus bring glory to God.

There are many churches where, with a little effort, a club of twenty subscribers could be formed, and the entire cost would be only $6.00. And in a great many other churches forty people could easily be induced to subscribe and the cost would be only $12.00. Will some of our readers who are desirous of doing Christian work kindly exert themselves in this way, and thus help to double both the subscription list of this paper and its usefulness in the homes of our nation? This is a most practical form of Missionary Work.

DR. DAVID J. BURRELL

An Old Time Idyl of Married Life

BY

REV. DAVID JAMES BURRELL, D.D., LL.D.

Pastor of the Marble Collegiate Church, New York City

IN THE year 33 A. D. a company of pilgrims came up from Pontus to Jerusalem to attend the Feast of Pentecost. Tradition says that these two tent-makers, Aquila and Priscilla his wife, were among them.

While in Jerusalem they probably witnessed the effusion of the Spirit and heard the address of Peter setting forth the saving power of the Cross and the perpetual influence of the risen Christ. It was with such impressions upon their minds that they returned from the Feast; and doubtless, as years passed, they spake often one with another of this Gospel of life.

In the year 55 they were in Corinth, pursuing their trade (Acts 18:1-3). It chanced that, at this time, a journeyman tent-maker, weak-eyed and stoop-shouldered—who was also a philosopher and dialectician and an itinerant preacher of the Gospel—while seeking work at Antioch, found his way to Aquila's shop; and this man, while plying his needle, related to his fellow-workmen the wonderful story of his conversion and explained the Good News. It was the same Gospel which Aquila and Priscilla had heard twenty-two years before at the Feast in Jerusalem. They welcomed it gladly, and were known thenceforth as followers of Christ.

A year later they were making tents at Ephesus (Acts 18:24-26). A learned Jew of Alexandria, named Apollos, came to the city and, being eloquent and mighty in the Scriptures, "was teaching diligently of the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John." In other words, he perceived that the times were out of joint and anticipated the coming of the Kingdom; but the larger truths of the Gospel were as yet unknown to him. In some manner he came under the influence of Aquila and Priscilla, and "they expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly." This appears to have been the first Theological Seminary of the Christian Church; primitive, indeed, yet it may be doubted whether in all the world there was another institution of learning where the truth was more profoundly or comprehensively taught. Not Zeno's Painted Porch, nor Plato's Academy, nor Gamaliel's school at Jerusalem could have so well equipped Apollos for his destined work as an evangelist.

As the years passed the tent-makers drifted to Philippi (I Cor. 16:19), where mention is made of "the Church in their house." This probably means no more than that, at stated times, the followers of Christ met and worshipped together at their family altar; nevertheless the domestic circle is thus invested with a peculiar sanctity, as the germ of that great organism which we call the Church. On being driven from Philippi by persecution they betook themselves to Rome (Romans 16:3-5), where again mention is made of "the Church in their house." A strange contrast this to St. Peter's in Rome to-day! That humble conventicle in the tent-maker's house had no tiaraed Pope, no imposing College of Cardinals, no elaborate paraphernalia of worship; yet great was God's blessing upon it.

The last mention of Aquila and Priscilla finds them back at Ephesus in the year 66 (II Tim. 4:19). There is a tradition that on the 8th of July—the day set apart for them in the martyrology of the Roman Church—the faithful couple were led out beyond the walls and beheaded. It is easy to fill in the details of the pathetic picture; each looking at the other with loving eyes as they murmured, "Farewell; fear not!" There was a flash of the blade, and they were at home with God.

We have here a beautiful idyl of domestic life. Aquila and Priscilla were bound together by a happy chain of many links.

First, they were united by a Divine Ordinance. For, as the marriage ceremony puts it, this union was "ordained of God in the time of man's innocency." God said, "It is not good for man to be alone"; wherefore he made woman to be his helpmeet. The generic man or social unit is not one but two in one; as it is written, "Male and female created He them and blessed them and called their name Adam" (Gen. 5:2). And the approval of Christ was put upon this primal ordinance when He said, "For this cause shall a man leave father and mother and shall cleave unto his wife; and they twain shall be one flesh" (Matthew 19:5).

Second, they were bound together by a Social Convention. By the agreement of all civilized communities this union is accepted as the basis of social order and happiness. A Scotch girl to whom her minister had said, "Janet, it is a very serious thing to be married," answered without hesitation, "Aye, minister, I ken it is a serious thing to be married; but it is a far mair serious thing no to be." The humor of this canny lass was quite eclipsed by her philosophy. There is, indeed, such a thing as "single blessedness."

The happy and useful lives of many unmarried men and women are in evidence; but these are the exception and not the rule. The usual path of happiness is wide enough for two. It has been truly said that "wedlock halves our sorrows and doubles our joys."

Third, they were knit together by the Mutual Attraction of Love. There is no place in the divine economy for a "marriage of convenience." It is a perversion of the order of nature and a travesty on the ordinance of God. You may carpet your floors with softest velvet, cover your walls with richest tapestries, fill the atmosphere with music of harp and dulcimer and spread your table with all rare and delicate viands; but if love be wanting, your home will be no better than a lodge in a garden of cucumbers. On the other hand, the nearest approach to heaven is "love in a cottage." The hail may rattle on the roof, the snow sift under the eaves, the grate be cold and the larder empty; the wolf may howl at the door, the King of Terrors himself stand beckoning at the threshold, but if love abide within, all's well.

Love is better than beauty or wit;
Love is better than gold;
For love is not found in the marketplace,
Love is not bought and sold.

Fourth, they were bound by a common Industrial Interest. It would appear that they shared the duties of their workshop. It is much to say that they were not ashamed of manual toil, which was regarded in those days as the business of slaves. They seem to have been partners in the pursuit of their craft. And, singularly, the order of their names varies—now Aquila and Priscilla, and again Priscilla and Aquila—suggesting that there was no strife for pre-eminence in their business any more than in their domestic life. It reminds us of what Jeremy Taylor said: "When God created woman He made her not out of Adam's head, as if she were to rule over him; nor out of his feet, as if he were to rule over her; but from his side, close by his heart, because they were to agree happily in mutual love."

Fifth, they were united by a Common Faith. One of the conditions of ideal happiness is to be "joined in the Lord." It has been wisely said by Paul, "Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers." This is an old-fashioned precept, but its wisdom is abundantly certified. It is obvious that when husband and wife are at odds concerning the fundamental facts of religion they are not united as one. A Christian thinks more of his religion than of anything else; it is his meat and drink; it is the very air he breathes; he lives for Christ, and should be willing to die for Him. How, under such circumstances, can one be happily joined to another who is wholly averse to such considerations or quite indifferent to them? The advice of Paul to couples thus matched but not mated is found in I Corinthians, 7:12-17, and is worthy of most serious consideration. But an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. A duet of musical instruments is impossible except as they are keyed to the same pitch. There are many who, failing to remember this, have married in haste to repent at leisure.

Sixth, they stood with each other in the active Service of Christ. There was a family altar in their home. They studied the Scriptures together. They opened their doors to "neighborhood meetings." Though not in "holy orders," they found time, busy people as they were, to instruct truth-seekers in "the Way of God." Blessed are such Christian homes! Such was the humble cottage at Alloway which Robert Burns never forgot:

The cheerfu' supper done, wi' serious face,
They, round the ingle, form a circle wide;
The sire turns o'er, wi' patriarchal grace,
The big ha'-Bible, ance his father's pride;
His bonnet reverently laid aside,
His lyart haffets wearing thin an' bare;
Those strains that once did sweet in Zion glide,
He wales a portion with judicious care;
And "Let us worship God!" he says with solemn air.

Finally, the happy pair were bound by a Vow of Lifelong Fidelity. Man cannot put asunder what God thus joins together. A true marriage is as endless as the wedding ring. Divorce is possible only where wedlock is an empty farce. There may be foolish disagreements, but there can be no unreconcilable quarrels between a man and woman whose hands are clasped across the flowing brook of heavenly consent.

Oh, foul fa' the hands that wad loose sic bands
And the heart that wad part sic love;
But there is nae hand can loose my band
But the finger o' Him above.

Come here to me, thou lass o' my love,
Come here and kneel wi' me:
The morn is fu' o' the presence o' God,
And I canna pray without thee.

The Book maun be ta'en when the carle comes hame
Wi' the holy psalmodie;
And thou maun speak o' me to thy God,
And I will speak o' thee.

In all the world there is nothing finer than the simple beauty of such lives; and, blessed be God, they are being lived all about us. The literary fame of Charles Kingsley is, to my mind, as nothing in comparison with the sweetness of character to which his sorrowing wife bore witness: "The outside world must judge him as an author, a preacher, a member of society, but those only who lived with him in the intimacy of every-day life at home can tell what he was as a man. Over the real romance of his life and over the tenderest, loveliest passages in his private letters a veil must be thrown, but it will not be lifting it too far to say that if in the highest, closest of earthly relationships a love that never failed—pure, patient, passionate—for six-and-thirty years, a love which never stooped from its own lofty level to a hasty word, an impatient gesture or a selfish act, in sickness or in health, in sunshine or in storm, by day or by night, could prove that the age of chivalry has not passed away forever, then Charles Kingsley fulfilled the ideal of a 'most true and perfect knight' to the one woman blest with that love in time and to eternity. To eternity; for such love is eternal, and he is not dead. He himself, the man, the lover, husband, father, friend—he still lives in God, who is not the God of the dead but of the living."

The life of Aquila and Priscilla was crowned with a most happy end. Not even the headsman could put them asunder. They suffered martyrdom on the same day, closing their eyes before a howling mob to open them in the presence of the King of heaven!

THE TIME ELEMENT IN PRAYER

By Rev. Howard W. Pope

WHEN Mr. George Müller was in this country a friend asked him how long he had ever prayed continuously for any object. Taking a little book from his pocket, he said, "When I was converted I was a wild boy in college. My conversion broke the friendship between my room-mate and myself, for he said he would have 'nothing to do with such a fanatic.' I wrote his name in this book and promised God that I would pray for him each day until he was converted, or until I died. I prayed five years with no apparent result. Ten years went by with no change. I continued on for fifteen years, and for twenty years, and still he was an unbeliever. I did not yet give up, but prayed twenty-five years, each day mentioning his name at the throne of grace, and then came a letter saying, 'I have found the Saviour.' Then," said Mr. Müller, "I checked off this petition as answered. In this same book I have other names that I have prayed for five, ten and fifteen years, and scores of names against which there is a cross, showing that the requests have been granted."

Here, then, was a man who made a business of prayer and who kept a record of his prayers in a business-like way. When he had a matter to present to God's attention he first found a promise on which to base his appeal, always making sure, if possible, that it was according to God's will. Then he recorded his petition in a book and watched and waited for the answer. Is it any wonder that this man's faith grew rapidly, and that he became the most notable, and possibly the most successful, man of prayer in modern times?

We see by this illustration why many prayers fail; they are rambling appeals, so vague and indefinite that even the petitioner can hardly remember what he prayed for when he rises from his knees. No record is made of them, and no surprise is felt if the answer does not come. And so the solemn farce goes on year after year.

It is said that in battle it takes a hundred pounds of lead to kill a man, because ninety-nine pounds and fifteen ounces of it is wasted in wild firing which aims at nothing and hits no one. On the other hand, the sharpshooter wastes no ammunition, but picks his man and makes every bullet tell. So, if we would pray for fewer objects, more carefully selected, and then make a record of our prayers and watch for the answer, we should not waste so much breath and we would obtain more results.

Some requests are answered very quickly. A lady was once giving an address on narcotics. At the close a young man said to her, "I do not think it is wrong for me to use tobacco."

"Are you a Christian?" she asked.

"Yes," was the reply.

"Have you ever asked God for His opinion?"

"No."

"Well, if you are a Christian, I suppose you are willing to leave the matter to His decision. Let us kneel right down here and ask Him. I will pray first, and then you follow."

The young man could not consistently refuse. He knelt with her, and at the close of her prayer, he began to pray himself. He had not uttered three sentences, before he sprang to his feet, saying, "I see it. It is not right. I will give it up at once."

In this case prayer was answered immediately, but in many cases, the answer is long delayed.

Delay in answering prayer often proves a great blessing to us. In some cases it tests the strength of our desire, and shows us that we did not care very much about the object after all, just as a request for an education which is soon dropped, shows the parent that the boy was not sufficiently in earnest to appreciate the privilege if he had it. In other cases delay leads us to examine our motives, and we find that they are purely or partially selfish, and we withdraw the request of our own accord. Possibly the delay opens our eyes to some secret sin, and leads us to abandon it, for it is a scriptural truth, "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me." Sometimes we find that our heart is not fully consecrated, and we are led to take an advance step. And in every case, delayed answers keep us waiting long at the feet of Jesus, and thereby compel us to become better acquainted with Him, and unconsciously we learn something of His patience and faith and humility. Some one has said that prayers which are soon answered are like coasting vessels which soon return, but are laden with coal and lumber; while others, like ships from Africa or India, are longer on the way, but bring back a richer cargo of gold and gems.

Then too, we should remember that God answers prayers largely through natural laws, and these work slowly. God does not force a man's will, but woos him by love and persuasion. Man is a creature of growth, and it takes time and change and oftentimes losses and bereavements and old age, to soften his heart and show him his need of a Saviour. Consider how many influences wrought upon you before you yielded; how many appeals were made, how many times the still small voice whispered before you answered "Yes." Consider all this and you will not wonder that it takes time for God to answer prayer which involves the change of a human will from disobedience to obedience. Give Him time and do not be like foolish children, anxious to pick the apple before it is ripe.

The Whole Horizon

BY JULIA H. JOHNSTON.

"How can you endure this dreary view?"

A compassionate visitor asked the question of a shut-in who dwelt in a tiny home, high up, on a bleak and barren spot. The reply came instantly, in cheerful and courageous tones:

"Why, don't you see that I have the whole horizon? Think how much that is worth."

Truly, if this patient sufferer could make so much of her sky-line, we who are spared her pain and disability, should appreciate our horizons, in spite of any hampering conditions that seem to shut us in.

One advantage of the horizon-view is, that one must look away, and far off to see it. No one discovers its beauty and breadth by gazing at dreary alleys, uncompromising roofs, and brick walls. That which lifts the thoughts from these surroundings, forcing the vision beyond, is in itself a blessing.

No one is really shut in, who has God's horizon in sight. That fair impalpable, but uplifting and enlarging vision, broadens the narrowest earthly view. No eye sees beyond it, for it is a kindly veil which hides the future. If our imperfect sight could pierce the veil too soon, how distorted would be the view, and how misunderstood the vision.

Well it is that the beautiful horizon bounds our daily lives, with sufficient revelation of love and light, yet with veiling mystery that hides what would not help. Let not the vision stop short with smoky chimneys and muddy streets that may be near, when beyond all sordid things there stretches the wide expanse of the heavenly horizon.

RADIANCY IN RELIGION

By Rev. James Mudge, D.D.

THIS radiancy divine, this ecstasy and exuberance of living, is surely very much needed. We see it but seldom. What a change it would make in this poor world were it more common. What a different impression would outsiders get as to the attractiveness and richness of the Christian's salvation were each believer to show continually a victorious front, a smiling face, a brow manifestly anointed with "the oil of gladness."

It seems to us clear that such is the Lord's intention concerning His people, and they are living below their privilege so far as they have not thus attained. He tells them that they are to be "exceedingly glad" and to "leap for joy" even when evil entreated, that they are to have "always all sufficiency in everything," to "bless the Lord at all times," to have "his praise continually in their mouth," "his peace guarding their hearts and thoughts," and victory with them always.

Many other such phrases there be which denote His will concerning us. Are we so to discount them and diminish their force as to draw from them all their power and beauty? Or are we to take them at their face value and claim them as a birthright? The latter would seem to be much the better way. It points toward a charming hilarity, a winsome buoyancy that would certainly commend itself to great multitudes in this sad and heavily burdened world which seeks so painfully to be merry in ways that miscarry. "Be not drunken with wine wherein is riot," says the apostle, "but be filled with the Spirit." The collocation is exceedingly suggestive. That elation and exhilaration which the wine-bibber seeks through the channel of his stomach, and whose reaction plunges him deeper into dolefulness, may be truly and healthfully secured by the fulness of the Spirit of God which supplies an enlivenment that does not disappoint.

Yes, the Spirit-filled life is the life ecstatic, the life triumphant, the life radiant, redolent and regnant. Such a one has a contagion of cheerfulness about him that is wonderfully fine. His countenance beams, his eye sparkles, his cheeks glow, his whole frame emits effulgence. He is so full of happiness that he has to pour it forth on every side and by every outlet, in the sound of his voice, the words of his lips and the movements of his body. A marvellous piece of good news is perpetually sounding in his ear. A wonderful fortune has come to him, a fortune compared with which all earthly wealth is the merest bubble and bauble. All things are his—all things that he can possibly need; a guarantee has been given him by infinite power that every want shall be met so long as he lives and not a single good thing shall ever be lacking in his case. He is a multi-millionaire for riches, a king for power and position; a multi-millionaire without the crushing cares and problems which embitter the mind and shorten the days; a king without the empty pomp which holds no panacea for grief or the pageantry which is only a prelude to panic fear.

Radiant Christians have an enthusiastic attachment to Jesus, a fondness for His society and for serving Him, that turns duty into delight! Christ is to them the clearest, nearest, dearest person in the universe, the One they most enjoy talking with or talking about, the One they most fear to offend and most rejoice to please. "In Him all their wants are supplied; his love makes their heaven below." The task is transfigured, the drudgery goes; in place of weariness is buoyancy; life is elastic. Instead of toiling, groaning, and struggling there is singing, for not merely a glimpse of Jesus has come, but He abides and reveals all His wealth of love.

Radiant Christians are not dependent on circumstances for their happiness. The conditions around them affect their peace but very little. They draw exhilaration from such deep springs that the changes of the surface have no real power to affect them. They have a glorious independence, a real freedom, a splendid liberty that monarchs might envy. They have no need or inclination to resort to questionable diversions or worldly amusements, or to seek among the gay and giddy that which they have failed to find in religion. Their religion thoroughly satisfies every part of their nature and leaves no vacancy to be filled by frivolity. Their very faces show that they live on the borderland of the celestial country where the white-robed throngs are often met and the Lord himself is a constant benediction. They are supremely, solidly, strictly loyal in every utterance and breath to Him whom their souls adore. Their obedience is not a matter of calculation and their contributions are not grudgingly given. Severe resignation is turned into holy hilarity and religious revelry. Nothing is too small to be of importance in this glad serving. Nothing is too hard to be welcomed for the sake of Him who sends or appoints it or brings it. Loyalty of this high order has no room for complaint and knows not the meaning of compromise. In spite of difficulties it presses on. In the face of dangers it simply laughs. It asks but one question "What would Jesus have me do?" and receiving an answer it goes gladly and exultantly to do it.

How great a thing it is to be thoroughly happy in the Christian journey, to have sunshine all the way—the sunshine of God's presence and the hallowed light of His love. Here is the true abiding place of the soul. To tarry even for a time anywhere else is loss, leanness, and lack of health. We may, if we will, walk perpetually in that Beulah land where "shines undimmed one blissful day," and inhabit that delightful country close on the border of Paradise in full view of the celestial city.

There is such a thing as cloudless communion with God, no barrier of sin being interposed to cast a shadow on the soul. There is a close companionship with Jesus which "makes life with bliss replete." There is a fellowship so dear that no foes or woes can make the heart afraid or disturb the serenity of its rest. The "path illumined by His smile grows brighter day by day," and they who run in it are not weary, they who walk in it are not faint. The summer lasts all the year because He whose presence disperses all gloom and whose voice is sweeter than any music is always nigh to banish the night.

Let no one question the possibility of all this radiancy. There are many witnesses to its possession, not as many as there should be but still quite enough to drive away legitimate or reasonable doubt. To the devout and resolute soul bent on proving the utmost reaches of Christian attainment, these glories are wide open. Is there anything that better pays for endeavor, anything that yields more solid satisfaction or gives richer returns for outlay of effort? Most certainly not. It is the wonder of wonders that so few dedicate themselves to this pursuit, and register a fixed resolve that this heavenly blessedness shall be theirs. They who do, evince highest wisdom and marvelous good sense. They who do not, make a mistake whose lamentable consequences will follow them through all eternity. Why not be red-hot for God? Why not have a passionate piety? Why not let Christ have all there is of us so exhaustively and absolutely that there can never by any possibility arise a question concerning the glad doing or bearing of His will in every event of life, everything being accounted a God-send, every event a Providence? Why not? If we adopt this program, in God's name, with His almighty power behind us, we shall make our life a truly splendid success wholly irrespective of worldly position, earthly riches, or temporal circumstances.

"The Soul's Sincere Desire"

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

AMONG the Moslems it is impossible to think of prayer without bodily movement. The prayer is not in the attitude of the heart toward God, but consists in the mere bending of the body in the attitude of supplication.

The story is told of a Moslem lad who was afflicted with tuberculosis of the knee. An operation was proposed which might enable the boy to walk again with some ease, but which would not make it possible for him to bend the knee. The father objected to the operation, saying that it would be of no advantage for his son to walk if he could not also pray. And how could he pray without bending his knee!

It is a characteristic of the Christian religion that it places the emphasis upon the heart. What a rebuke Christ gave the formal scribes and Pharisees: "This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, but their heart is far from me." "In vain they do worship me," He said.

"Prayer is the soul's sincere desire, unuttered or expressed," writes a modern poet. In this statement there are three great words, expressing three great thoughts: "Soul" is one of them; prayer must be of the soul, of the very inner being. "Desire" is another; there is nothing formal about desire; it is a living active thing; so must prayer be. "Sincere" is the third; there must be no pretense about true prayer; it must be without hypocrisy. The poet makes little of the fact that prayer is expressed or unuttered; those are incidents.

There are Christians with whom prayer is not an act; it is a state of being. With such Christians religion is not something to be put on and taken off; it is their life, their heart.

Perfect prayer rests upon faith that is absolute. There is no uncertainty about it. The Christian who has realized fully the meaning of religion says with unswerving faith, "The Lord is my Shepherd." Such an one never uses the potential or subjunctive moods; only the indicative.

An old negress, although making only a precarious living, and that by hard labor, was a happy Christian. A friend, taunting her about her constant good nature and cheerfulness, said: "Why, Auntie, you are all right now, but suppose you should be sick, or lose your employment, or—" "Stop!" replied the old woman. "I never s'poses. The Lord is my Shepherd; and I know I shall not want. Better give them s'poses up and trust the Lord."

There was much truth in the attitude of the old colored woman. Her life, after all, was being lived in the atmosphere of trust, of prayer. Without refined words to express her feeling, yet she uttered with her very life prayer that excels the most refined words of the sentimentalist. Her prayer was of the soul; it was a real desire; it was sincere.

WITH OUR MISSIONARY COLPORTERS

Visiting the Ranches

One of the special features of missionary colportage is the effort which is made by the colporters to reach the lonely and out-of-the-way places, where people are beyond the reach of any Christian church.

Rev. Francis E. Smith, a colporter evangelist, who has been working for several years under the auspices of the American Tract Society, makes it a point to visit the ranches in the State of Washington. He carries with him a generous supply of Christian literature, and this he distributes to the best possible advantage among the people who live in these unfrequented places.

Recently Mr. Smith sent a photograph of a typical ranch scene near Olulla, Wash., of which a reproduction appears on this page. The ranch is located among the hills of Kitsap County. It is known as the Bradshaw place. The Douglas fir trees make a conspicuous feature of the landscape as seen in the picture.

This is only one of many similar ranches which have been visited by Mr. Smith in his assiduous labors as a missionary colporter. Wherever he goes he carries with him the Gospel message in the printed page, and hundreds of homes have been brightened by the good news of salvation through Christ which has come through the medium of the Christian literature circulated by this faithful and consecrated worker.

At Ellis Island

Mr. Charles A. Carol, who has been distributing Christian literature among the immigrants at Ellis Island in New York Harbor, tells of some features of his work during the past year in the following words:

"I look back over the past year with gratitude to God, for I can see His gracious ways in my life and work among the immigrants at Ellis Island.

"It has been my privilege to spread the knowledge of the Gospel by means of the printed page among thousands of immigrants who have come to this land of freedom seeking to find occupation. In this time of bloodshed abroad many look to this country as the Israelites looked to the 'cities of refuge' in olden times. Not all who have come to the gateway at Ellis Island, however, have been able to gain admittance to this country. Many have been detained, some for only a few days, while others have had to tarry for weeks and months. In cases where the immigrants are unable to pass the physical, intellectual and moral tests required by the United States Government, they are ordered to return to the land from which they came.

"My work as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society has taken me among all classes of immigrants, including those that are detained for further examination or for deportation as well as those in the hospital.

"Although immigration has almost ceased from Germany, Austro-Hungary and Russia, yet a few have managed to leave those countries and have come to America on various lines of steam ships.

"The present immigration is chiefly from Italy, Greece, Great Britain, Spain, Portugal, Holland and the Scandinavian countries. The largest number of immigrants came from Italy and Greece. During the Society's year a total of 98,850 immigrants arrived on 530 different steamships.

"I tried to meet as many of these immigrants as possible, and offered them Christian books and tracts in their own language. Many of the immigrants were illiterate and could not avail themselves of the proffered literature, but in the majority of cases they accepted the books and tracts gladly, and many asked me to give them more.

"During the year I was able to distribute 115,953 books, booklets and tracts and 8,535 periodicals, making a grand total of 124,488 publications.

"The Home Missions Council has taken an active interest in the work at Ellis Island, and appointed various committees for the betterment of the conditions. It was my privilege to serve on three of these committees.

"Religious services have been held among the immigrants from time to time. We are hoping that eventually such services may be held regularly and continuously."

A Year's Work in Porto Rico

For several years Fernando Muniz has served as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society in the island of Porto Rico. He gives a summary of his work for the past twelve months as follows:

"I have carried the message of the Gospel to thousands of families by means of evangelical literature in the Spanish language and have circulated a large number of the Society's books. And I am sure our Heavenly Father will gather fruit from my labors for His Kingdom, for I have made known Jesus Christ as the Saviour by means of this evangelical literature.

"I have preached in every place that I have visited with my books, and even at times when I have not had the literature at hand I have presented the matter of salvation through Christ.

"I have made trips to various places and among different people, visiting hundreds of homes, in which I have offered evangelical literature. I have placed a large number of books in homes where they had never before received the Gospel. In cases where the people were interested in the books but without money to buy, I have given a book or a leaflet so as to maintain their interest.

"I have worked among many classes of people and many different faiths. I have met with great persecution from religious fanatics, but this has had no effect in deterring me from my mission in presenting the true Gospel.

"The literature which I have carried to many people has given them their first knowledge of true evangelical religion, and it has been a great stimulus for many to come to the throne of our Heavenly Father. I trust that in the days to come He will greatly bless the work of the American Tract Society and aid it to fulfill its mission."

During the past year Mr. Muniz held 185 Gospel meetings, made 9,485 family visits and circulated Spanish evangelical literature to the value of $437.12.

In Pittsburg and Vicinity

Mr. John Martinco, for many years a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society in the State of Pennsylvania, writes:

"During the past month I visited homes in Pittsburgh, Connellsville, and Greensburg. I was pleasantly surprised when I entered one house, where only a few weeks ago I was quite roughly treated, for this time they welcomed me without a single word of mockery. All the people seemed glad to see me, and they asked me many questions about religion. After a long and earnest conversation I induced them to take a Bible and an English Pictorial Bible History. The very woman that previously ordered me out of the house now bought a book for her son. I could mention similar experiences, but this one will serve to illustrate the kind of work in which I am engaged."

The Reconciliation

By Sara Ward Stockwell

EBEN LANDER met the minister in the post-office. They came out together and walked down the main street of the old town, unmindful of the biting, cold wind, in their joy in being together. The minister and Eben Lander had been boys together in this same town, and had not seen each other since the day ten years before, when John Willard had gone to a distant city to study for the ministry. Now the latter had come back to hold special meetings for a season among the scenes of his boyhood.

They left the main street of the town, and were walking along a country road, when they met an old man, toiling with bent shoulders against the wind. After one glance at each other the old man and Eben hastily looked in other directions and passed each other with the air of those who are well acquainted, but who choose to ignore each other. The old man quickened his steps and walked more erectly as he passed, while the young man's blue eyes flashed scornful indifference.

"Isn't that man your father?" asked the minister in amazement, when the old man was some yards behind them.

"You have a good memory, John," said Eben. "He is my father, but he doesn't own me now. He cast me off because I married Louisa Pennell. You remember her, don't you? There never was any girl but Louisa for me. If I hadn't married her, I'd never married anybody. Just because her father had once taken advantage of him in a business deal my father laid it up against the whole family. After mother died I told father I wanted to marry Louisa, and, though he had never seen the girl, he was set against it, and said he'd disown me if I married her. Well, I married her, and he disowned me, but I've never been sorry I did it."

"I must turn back now," said the minister, as they neared Eben's farm. "I haven't time to come in this afternoon. You know we are going to hold a series of meetings in the old First Church. I hope you and your wife can come."

"I don't know. I'm not much of a church-going man. Louisa goes once in a while. But I'll see. Perhaps we will come. Good-by and good luck to you, John, as we used to say."

"Good-by and God bless you," returned the minister.

Eben did go to the meetings. He went first to hear his old friend preach. Then he took Louisa that she might hear him, and after that they both went whenever it was possible, because they could not stay away.

John Willard knew how to reach the hearts of the people of his boyhood town and rouse them from their religious apathy. After a few nights the Old First Church was crowded to the doors until there was not even standing room. They began to hold afternoon meetings, and many of the stores were closed that the clerks might attend them. The farmers came from miles around, bringing their families, and there was much settling of old scores and paying of old debts. But old Mr. Lander never came to the meetings, and refused angrily to discuss the subject of revivals with any one.

At length the time came when the meetings were drawing to a close. Louisa had been numbered among the converts, but Eben had refused to take such a stand. One day John Willard came to Eben's home and pleaded earnestly with him to join the church. This Eben refused to do on account of his estrangement with his father. The minister urged a reconciliation.

"How can I be reconciled with him?" queried Eben. "I can't tell him I'm sorry I married Louisa, because I'm not."

"You might at least speak to him respectfully when you meet him."

"Well," said Eben, after a moment's reflection, "it will be a hard thing to do after we've been cutting each other for five years, but I'll do it, John."

Eben met his father the following afternoon, when old Mr. Lander was returning from the village, and Eben was on his way to one of the afternoon meetings. When they were face to face, Eben raised his hat and said, "Good afternoon." Mr. Lander stared at his son for an instant; then with a lifting of his head and an angry glance from beneath his shaggy, gray brows, he passed him without a word.

Eben flushed hotly, but by the time he had reached the old First Church he was calm again, and even compassionate.

"After all," he said to himself, "he is an old man, and he must be mighty lonesome, living by himself. I'll go on speaking to him, whether he speaks to me or not. He will have to give in some day."

So Eben went on speaking to his father, but the old man remained obdurate. After a while he ceased to take any notice of his son's greeting, passing him with his eyes fixed on some distant object.

John Willard went away when the meetings were over, but he had promised to come back by the first Sunday in May, when the new converts were to unite with the church.

About the middle of March for a whole week Eben did not meet his father. He began to feel uneasy about him. His father's farm was not far from his own. From a window of the second story of his house he watched from time to time to see if he could see his father working about the place. He saw him, one morning, come out of the back door and slowly make his way to the barn, and, after a short time, return to the house. All the next day, though both he and Louisa watched anxiously for him, they saw no sign of the old man's presence about the place.

* * * * *

Within the old farmhouse, on a lounge in the kitchen, Mr. Lander was lying, with closed eyes and a blanket drawn up to his chin. The shades were pulled down, and a lamp was burning, charging the room with a disagreeable odor, though it was already daylight and a rising sun was forcing its rays through the shaded windows. On the table there were the remains of a meal partaken some days before and several medicine bottles. Presently Mr. Lander opened his eyes and looked about the disorderly room. He half rose from the lounge, then with a groan dropped back upon it. At that instant there was a light knock at the door. Half stumbling in his weakness, he went to the door and opened it. A young woman stood there, with a large shawl thrown over her head, framing an attractive face, with gray eyes and a resolute little chin.

"Good morning, Mr. Lander," she said. "I am one of your neighbors. I hadn't seen you around for a day or two and, as a light was burning here in the night, I was afraid you were sick. So I thought I'd come over this morning and see how you were."

He invited her in and again dropped on the lounge.

"Yes, I guess I am sick. I've been ailing for a week, and don't seem to get any better."

"I've brought you some hot beef tea," the young woman said, smiling at him in such a friendly way that the old man began to feel cheered.

She took a steaming bowl from beneath her shawl and set it on the table. Then she took off the shawl, revealing a trim, little figure, clad in a pretty house dress. She found her way to the pantry and brought a tray and a spoon. Mr. Lander obediently drank the beef tea.

"That's good," he said, as he set down the bowl. "That braces me up some. I guess I've got the grippe. Head feels queer, and my bones ache. I haven't got any strength at all."

"Just lie down and cover up, and I will fix things up a little," said the young woman.

She put out the light and opened the windows. She cleared off the table, swept, dusted and put things in order. Then she closed the windows and put fresh coal on the fire.

"Now you will be more comfortable," she said. "I must go home now, but I'll come again this afternoon to see how you are. Don't you think I had better send for the doctor?"

"Well, I guess you'd better. I've been trying my own remedies long enough."

"Is there anything more I can do for you?" she asked.

"There is one thing more, though I don't know as you can do it. I'm worried about the creatures in the barn. Do you think you could give them something to eat and water them?"

"Why, of course," she replied, and she put the shawl over her head and went out.

Mr. Lander half raised himself on the lounge and watched her from the window as she entered the barn, and presently came out again, and disappeared up the road.

"I don't know who she is," he said, lying down again and closing his eyes with a relieved sigh, "but she sure has been an angel of mercy this morning."

For a week Mr. Lander took the doctor's medicine and received the daily kind ministrations of the young woman. By that time he was considerably better, but for several weeks he kept to the lounge, too weak to get up and do his usual work. The young woman continued to come and go. He rarely talked with her and never asked her any questions, but he looked for her coming every morning as he did for the rising of the sun. One day, when she asked him how he was, he replied that he was tolerably comfortable, and wouldn't mind being on the sick list considerable longer with her to look after him, if it weren't for the ploughing. He had always made it a point, he said, to get his ploughing done early, and he had generally been ahead of all the farmers round about, but he guessed likely this year he would be behind all the rest. "I have always done it myself," he said, "since Eben went away. He used to do it for me, before he went and married old Jake Pennell's daughter."

When the young woman came again she brought with her a boy about three years old. Mr. Lander coaxed the boy to him, and soon they were talking and laughing together like old friends. When the young woman was going that day she said, somewhat nervously, "You need not worry about the ploughing, Mr. Lander. I saw your son yesterday and he inquired about you. I told him you were getting along very well, but that you were anxious about the farm work, and he said he would do your ploughing."

Mr. Lander looked at her in amazement, but before he had opportunity to say a word she and the child were gone. He remained on the lounge that afternoon until it grew dark, with his eyes fixed abstractedly on the red coals in the grate. At length he roused himself, lighted a lamp, and set on the table his supper which the young woman had brought and placed in the oven to keep warm.

The young woman did not come for several days after that, and Mr. Lander missed her sorely. But it gave him a long time in which to think things over uninterruptedly, and his thoughts had taken a new turn since her last visit. She came again, late one afternoon, bringing something for his supper and the news that the ploughing was finished. During her short visit Mr. Lander seemed to have something on his mind which he found it difficult to put into words. When she was getting ready to leave he said, with apparent effort:

"Do you know what sort of a woman my son's wife is?"

"I think she has made your son a good wife," replied the young woman. "At least I have heard your son say so," she added, with a curious little smile.

Mr. Lander sighed heavily. "I've been thinking lately," he said, "that I ought to forgive my son for marrying that girl. I'd like to see Eben and have a talk with him. When you see him again will you tell him so?"

The next day was clear and balmy, the first spring weather of the season. Mr. Lander stood before an open window and listened with keen pleasure to the chirping of the sparrows. A man was coming down the road. As he neared the house Mr. Lander suddenly closed the window and went to the door and threw it open. Eben entered, holding out his hand, and saying in a hearty voice, "How are you, Father?"

"Better," said Mr. Lander, with emphasis. "A great deal better."

Then father and son sat down in the old farmhouse kitchen and had a long talk. Presently there was a knock at the door, and the young woman and the child came in. Eben rose quickly.

"This is Louisa, my wife, Father," he said, "and this is our little boy."

For an instant Mr. Lander looked at them both in astonishment. Then he broke into a relieved, hearty laugh.

"So you are Eben's wife," he said to the young woman. "Well, all I can say is, I'm clean beat!"

When they at length rose to go, Mr. Lander protested vigorously. "I want you all to make yourselves at home and stay to dinner, if," he said, with a twinkle in his eye, "Louisa will consent to be housekeeper and cook."

Later Mr. Lander sat in his arm chair and with pleasure and satisfaction watched "his children," Eben, sitting near the window, and Louisa, busy at the kitchen table, making an apple pie, while the little grandson, sitting on the floor, was playing with some toys that had once been his father's. Presently Mr. Lander turned to his son with a puzzled expression on his face.

"I've been wondering what put it in your head to make up with the old man, Eben. You were as stubborn and high and mighty as I was before this winter. What made you do it?"

"I think it was the meetings, Father, and John Willard's preaching."

Mr. Lander looked conscience-stricken. "I was mighty pig-headed about those meetings," he said. "Wouldn't go to one and didn't want to hear about them. Wish I had heard John Willard. His preaching must have been the right sort."

On that first Sunday in May among those who stood before the altar of the old First Church to be united with the church were Eben Lander and Louisa, and old Mr. Lander himself. "For," he told a neighbor, on his way home from church that morning, "it didn't take me long to decide what I was going to do when I saw what religion had done for my boy and girl. My only regret," he added, "is that I didn't become a Christian years ago. It would have saved a lot of trouble."

"Our Absent Ones"

BY GEORGE LAWRENCE ANDREWS.

*We miss them when twilight comes stealing
Along the paths that once we trod;
With tear-dimmed eyes and tender feeling
Our stricken souls cry out to God.*

*Our prayers seem so unavailing,
Life's trials hard to understand;
But God's great love is still unavailing,
And we can trust His guiding hand.*

*Our loved ones go, our cries unheeding;
Our prayers can not bring them back.
But why our grief and all our pleading?
In God's courts they have all we lack.*

*We miss them, but let us be cheerful.
They gain what soon we shall attain;
They are the blest, the glad, unfeared,
Beyond all sorrow and all pain.*

A Flashlight on a Threshing Floor

BY EDGAR L. VINCENT.

JUST for one single instant God turns the flashlight of sacred history on a threshing-floor, but the scene is one never to be forgotten.

Out in the foreground stands Araunah, perhaps a king of the Jebusites, at any rate, a kingly man in his dealings with one who was in the very direst of straits. Busy with his oxen, stamping out the year's crop of grain, the Jebusite on looking up sees King David of Israel coming, not alone, but with his servants. Wondering and full of deference, the man of the threshing-floor goes out and bows the knee to David.

It is a time of bitterness with King David. He is in disgrace in the sight of God. Spurred on by pride, he has made an accounting of the people, in direct contradiction to the word of the Lord; and for three days a pestilence has raged through Israel, wiping out seventy thousand men. Nor would the awful plague have been stayed there, had not the great heart of God had pity on the people and laid His hand on that of the destroying angel, no doubt in response to the cry of the penitent king.

Quickly the command comes to David, through the mouth of the seer Gad: "Go up; rear an altar unto the Lord in the threshing-floor of Araunah, the Jebusite!"

Now here the two men are, the sore-hearted David and the great-hearted king of the Jebusites. The need is placed before Araunah and without an instant's hesitation he says, "Yes, take my threshing-floor. Do more. Take the oxen for your sacrifice. You will need wood, too, so take the threshing instruments and all the rest that you need. And may the Lord, thy God, accept thee!"

What a grand, whole-hearted, manly thing that was! We cannot but honor this heathen man and give him the best there is in our souls of respect.

And I wonder what you and I would have done had we been in David's place that day? Would we not have said, "This is fine! Here is a chance to get something we can give to God's service without the cost of a cent! Why not take it? Araunah offers it like a prince. Why not save the money? God will accept it and the plague will be stayed!"

How glad we are that David was a bigger man than that! If such an unworthy thought came into his mind, he put it aside so quickly that God's flashlight never caught a single bit of it. All God saw was the strong, true king, made himself again through chastening. Listen now to David!

"It is good of you, Araunah, to make this generous offer. I appreciate it; and yet, I cannot cheat God and myself that way! I will surely buy it of thee at a price. I will not offer burnt offerings unto the Lord my God of that which doth cost me nothing!"

So the money is counted out, fifty shekels for the threshing-floor and the oxen.

How often are we tempted to give God a sacrifice that is no sacrifice, but a threshing-floor gained without cost! Oh, the shreds of time, the ravelings of service, the very dust of the days as they wing themselves away into eternity, the poor costless things we do offer up on our altars to the one who has given us all, down to the very breath we breathe! It certainly is pitiful how thin and meagre a service we yield to Jehovah.

It cost God the choicest thing he had, even the Son of His heart, to bring salvation to the world. When Jesus came away from heaven, God and the angels must have stood in the doorway waving Him a last fond good-bye; but He set His face bravely toward the earth, knowing that there were to be bitter nights out in the cold, with no place to lay His head, days of sorrow and reproach, with Calvary at the end of the road, and He never faltered until He had purchased redemption for us all.

Why, then, should we withhold aught from Him? Why not give and give and give, realizing that only so shall we ever be rich toward God? Why not?

What Is Your Capacity?

BY REV. C. A. S. DWIGHT, PH. D.

On the homely but useful freight cars that run to and fro over the continent is to be read the inscription, in addition to data regarding running gear, brakes, et cetera, the inscription, "Capacity so many thousand pounds." The purpose of this lettering is to inform station-agents and freight handlers, by one quick glance, the precise amount of load that any one car will carry. It is useful to determine this question of capacity with reference to more things than freight cars. Every parent and teacher in effect raises this question with regard to every child under their care: How much can the little one understand, what is its present stage of mentality, what are the possibilities of its moral development?

This question of capacity each individual, when he has come to mature years, must determine for himself. The so-called self-made man makes a careful estimate of his own powers, tries them out with practice, learns by experience to do better, and constantly enlarges the range of his activities. What everyone needs to realize is that "capacity" is not a fixed quantity but an elastic achievement. Like the loaves of bread in the hands of the Master, it is increased in the very breaking and application of it.

We are all of us capable of far larger things than any to which we have already attained, or of which we have even dreamed. It is probable that, however heavily laden any of us may be at this present moment, we are all capable of bearing far heavier burdens and responsibilities than have yet been laid upon us. This thought should not render us discontented with any of our present tasks or duties, but should encourage us to a more efficient use of our powers so that, if a call comes to move forward, we can rise to a still higher plane of mental and moral efficiency. Whether or not we ourselves thus take account of stock, the world will constantly and sternly demand of us an answer to this question, "What is your capacity?" This question cannot be evaded, it must be answered. Even though we refuse an answer, nevertheless we are making one, for our measure is quietly being taken day by day by those around us. Our supreme effort, then, should be constantly to develop in power of thought, practical ability to grasp and solve problems, and willingness to carry heavy loads of responsibility—in other words, to increase our mental and moral scope, that is to enlarge our capacity.

Editorial Notes

For Our Soldier Boys

The American Tract Society is endeavoring to supply every United States soldier on the Mexican border with Christian literature. It is sending out tracts and booklets particularly appropriate for the use of the men at the front, and is distributing them through the agency of the Chaplains of the different regiments and the Secretaries of the Army and Navy Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association.

A special set of tracts has been selected by Rev. Dr. Judson Swift, General Secretary of the Society, and it is proposed to place these tracts in the hands of every one of our soldier boys who have answered their country's call. The first consignment of these tracts has already been shipped, and other shipments will be made as soon as the various Chaplains have notified the Society of their regimental headquarters.

The booklet that the Tract Society is most desirous of getting into the hands of the men is called "The Soldier's Text Book." In this tiny red-covered volume, which contains forty-six pages, there is a text with brief comments for every morning and evening of the month, together with prayers suitable for the use of wounded and dying soldiers. The last chapter of the booklet is devoted to important sanitary directions.

This "Soldier's Text Book" proved very helpful in the Spanish-American War, and the Society issued about half a million copies at that time.

Among the leaflets which the Society is sending to the Mexican border are "The Converted Soldier," "Pivot Battles in Life," "I Wish I Had," and "Sunny Jim's First Aid Package," the last named tract having been written by George A. Reeder, one of the Secretaries of the Army and Navy Branch of the Y. M. C. A.

In discussing this effort which the Tract Society is making to furnish good reading for the men of the National Guard, Dr. Swift said, "The boy who leaves a good home to go out with his regiment must be prepared to meet enemies worse than guns. The soldier will not run so great a danger of being shot as he will of meeting evil and immoral influences. We want to help them with our Christian literature."

The first Chaplain to ask for aid from the Tract Society for the soldiers on the Mexican border was Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, Chaplain of the Twenty-third Regiment of Brooklyn, N. Y., who told Dr. Swift over the telephone just before starting for the front that as soon as his regiment was settled he would send for a full supply of tracts and Soldier's Text Books, and would attend to their distribution himself.

Special donations for this vital and important work will be gratefully received by the Tract Society, and all money contributed for this purpose will be used in the most efficient way possible to promote the spiritual welfare of our soldier boys.

A Highly-Valued Spanish Hymnal

There have been many favorable notices of the new Spanish hymnal which was recently issued by the American Tract Society under the title, "El Nuevo Himmario Evangélico." The latest review of this book appeared in El Abogado Cristiano (The Christian Advocate), which is a weekly religious periodical published in Mexico City.

Nearly two pages are devoted to this appreciative review, which bears the signature of P. Flores Valderrama, and we can but briefly summarize what he has said.

The book is warmly commended by the reviewer, first, because of the excellent selection of hymns which it presents. Second, the book is commended because it has retained so many of the older hymns which are good, and has preserved with the words the tunes to which they are usually sung. The combination of familiar words with unfamiliar music has always been a detriment to the successful use of a new hymnal, and this fault has been carefully avoided in "El Nuevo Himmario Evangélico." Third, this new hymnal has corrected the grammatical, rhetorical and theological blemishes which have disfigured former hymnals. Fourth, the use of the work of authors of different nationalities is specifically commended, and it is shown that the compositions of the hymnologists of Mexico are included as well as those of Spain and other Spanish-speaking countries. Finally, the book is commended because of its comparative brevity, which has been secured by including only the best hymns out of the many thousands which were taken under consideration.

In conclusion, the reviewer writes: "Permit us to extend our heartiest congratulations to one and all of those workers who have had a share in the compilation of 'El Nuevo Himmario Evangélico,' while we fervently pray that their work may be signally blessed of God to the edification of all our brethren in the faith and to the salvation of many sinners."

Conditions in China

A recent letter from Rev. Harold J. Howden, the General Secretary of the West China Religious Tract Society, whose headquarters are at Chungking, reveals the unsettled conditions that have prevailed during the past months in various parts of China. It also shows what unexpected fields of usefulness may be found for the Gospel message in the printed page. The letter is directed to Rev. Judson Swift, D.D., General Secretary of the American Tract Society, and it runs in part as follows:

"The Treasurer of the West China Religious Tract Society has already acknowledged your Society's most opportune and generous appropriation of $100.00 gold.

"We are devoutly thankful for this help, and it has been a delight to inform our fellow missionaries in this vast area of Western China that the free grants of tracts made possible by your appropriation are not to have any further check for some time to come. The requests for these tracts are now coming in every day, and I trust our scattered distributors will keep us busy sending the grants forth.

"You will have observed by this time that China is once more in the throes of incipient revolution, and in this particular province there is not merely a revolt against the Peking central authority, but there are rival factions composed of the candidates for the local government.

"A considerable amount of fighting has taken place already between Northerners and local troops, both sides being occasionally harassed by strong robber bands.

"The West China Religious Tract Society has distributed books and tracts among the wounded soldiers, of whom there are about one thousand in the four military and the two missionary hospitals of Chungking.

"Our circulation of Christian literature up to the close of the past year was excellent, but naturally these disturbances have prevented missionaries from itinerating as freely as they would like, and not a few of our doctors and other workers have been engaged in the Red Cross work.

"We are sure that this brief account of our conditions will help you to think of our peculiar difficulties, and will stimulate your prayers on behalf of our missionary work."

The Consecration of Friendship

Ecclesiastes 4:9-10.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. July 31. Make friends. Prov. 18:24.
T. Aug. 1. Keep friends. Prov. 27:19-19.
W. Aug. 2. Friend in need. Luke 10:30-37.
T. Aug. 3. Winning our friends. John 1:40-51.
F. Aug. 4. A royal friend. 2 Sam. 9:1-13.
S. Aug. 5. Befriending the friendless. John 5:1-8.

The Scripture basis for this topic is found in the words: "Two are better than one, because they have a good reward for their labor. For if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow; but woe to him that is alone when he falleth, and hath not another to lift him up."

Friendship is one of God's choicest gifts to humanity. It is one of those things unseen and yet most real in human life. Friendship is found on mutual esteem, sympathy and love. "A three-fold cord is not quickly broken," and a friendship founded upon these three elements will not easily be dissolved.

True friendship is reciprocal in its nature. "It takes two to make a quarrel," is the old proverb, and it is equally true that it takes two to make a real friendship. Friendship cannot be one-sided and continue to exist. It cannot be cold and calculating. There must be a warmth of feeling and an enthusiasm of love.

We consecrate our friendship when we permeate it with the spirit of Jesus Christ. As Christians we ought to enter into no friendship into which we cannot invite the Master to enter with us.

Every friendship is consecrated that is hallowed by the presence of our Lord. The highest friendships are those between human souls who feel that in Jesus they have a mutual Friend.

The Blessing of True Friendship

Friendship is a blessing in itself, and it brings many other blessings in its train. Friendship brings us encouragement. The consciousness that friends are marking our progress and will sympathize in our success is a strong stimulus to effort and an ever-present source of encouragement.

Friendship brings us comfort. When we are in the midst of sorrow we turn naturally to our friends, not always for the spoken word of sympathy, but for that delicate appreciation of our sore need which a friend who is tender and true will show more by action than by word.

Friendship brings us hope, joy, peace and every blessing that can come from the union of two souls in one of the highest sentiments possible to humanity.

Our Best Friend

Precious as are our earthly friendships, there is one friendship that is consecrated by divine love and which far exceeds all other ties. Our best friend is the Lord Jesus Christ. He is the "one above all others who well deserves the name of friend." He is the friend "that sticketh closer than a brother."

Jesus was a friend to His disciples. He said to them, "I have called you friends, for all things that I have heard of My Father I have made known unto you." For three years He was their constant companion, giving them counsel, such as no other friend could give, and imparting truth which none other had to give.

Jesus is the friend of all His disciples and the friend of all humanity. His friendship embodies in divine perfection all the noblest elements that are found in any human friendship.

In the friendship of Jesus we find the crowning illustration of the consecration of friendship.

The friendship of Jesus is wonderfully helpful. There is no other help like the help which Jesus gives, help for the duties of daily life, daily strength for daily needs; help for all our spiritual needs; help at all times and under all the circumstances of life; and, best of all, help in the Valley of the Shadow of Death, when there is no One else to bring us safely to our heavenly home.

True Beauty, and How to Get It

Proverbs 31:10-31.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Aug. 7. Physical beauty. Ps. 39:1-11.
T. Aug. 8. Fair face, false heart. 2 Sam. 14:25-33.
W. Aug. 9. Beauty of meekness. 2 Sam. 16:9-14.
T. Aug. 10. Beauty of holiness. Eph. 5:24-33.
F. Aug. 11. Beauty of goodness. Gen. 50:15-21.
S. Aug. 12. Beauty of friendship. Philemon 1-25.

Beauty is not easily defined. According to the Standard Dictionary, it is "that quality of objects, as in nature, art, or mind, that appeals to and gratifies the esthetic nature or faculty; the perfection of form or shaping, physical or spiritual, resulting from the harmonious combination of diverse elements in unity." As some one has truly said, "The domain of beauty is more extensive than the domain of the physical world exposed to our view; it has no bounds but those of entire nature, and of the soul and genius of man." Indeed, it may be truly affirmed that the domain of beauty includes not only earth but heaven; it comprises both the human and the divine sphere of the universe.

In the Scripture portion assigned in connection with this topic we have as it were the portrait of a beautiful life. This description of a virtuous woman is a wonderful piece of literature, and it should receive our most careful and thoughtful attention. It shows, as some one has said, that the robes of heaven are made of the characters that we form on earth, and reveals the fact that our eternal beauty is being fashioned now beneath the faces of flesh.

What Is True Beauty?

It is evident, from the implications of our topic, that there is a beauty which is not true. Such is the beauty that is but skin-deep. The fair face that hides a false heart is not true beauty. That which is truly beautiful involves both the physical and spiritual. Indeed, we may truly say that the highest form of beauty is that which is purely spiritual. The most beautiful person is not the one that is fairest of form, but the one whose character is most beautiful. A beautiful face is not pleasing if behind it there is an ugly soul, while a beautiful spirit will irradiate a very homely face and make it lovely, in the best sense of that word.

How to Become Beautiful

There are so-called "beauty shops," where the effort is made to produce physical attractiveness. In such shops the means employed are mechanical and external. But beauty of character is not secured by any external aid. It is by the cultivation of the spirit and by communion with Him who is the source of all true beauty.

Prof. Amos R. Wells has aptly said, "We become beautiful through living with what is beautiful, just as objects become fragrant that remain near what is fragrant." We live with what is beautiful by abiding in the presence of Jesus as our Friend and Saviour.

It should ever be the aim of Christians to make the world more beautiful by bringing beauty into other lives besides their own. The only way to make a life truly beautiful is to implant in that life the beauty of Him who is altogether lovely. Christians should be like mirrors, always reflecting into the lives and hearts of others the eternal beauty of the Living Christ.

"The Most Beautiful Thing in the World"

There is a charming book which seems to throw a flood of light upon our topic. It is called "The Most Beautiful Thing in the World," by Fletcher Harper Swift, and it tells the story of the search by a king for the most beautiful thing—a search which led him into strange experiences, but which was at last rewarded with success. (This book is published by the American Tract Society, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, and will be sent by mail on receipt of 54 cents.)

Growth: Body, Mind, Spirit

Luke 2:40-52.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Aug. 14. Growing in the temple. 1 Sam. 2:18-19-26.
T. Aug. 15. Silent growth. Luke 1:67-80.
W. Aug. 16. Growing aright. Acts 17:10-15.
T. Aug. 17. The carnal mind. Rom. 7:14-25; 8:5-8.
F. Aug. 18. The spiritual mind. 1 Cor. 2:9-10.
S. Aug. 19. Grow in graciousness. 2 Pet. 1:1-9.

The subject of growth is an appropriate one for us to consider at this mid-summer season, when all nature about us is illustrating that wonderful process.

The wording of our topic suggests the threefold nature of man, manifesting itself in body, mind and spirit. It is true that students of metaphysics have long been divided into two groups, one of which under the name of dichotomists holds to the dual nature of man as consisting simply of body and spirit. But the view of the trichotomists, which is expressed in the wording of our topic, has always seemed to the writer to be the more satisfactory view, and in any case this threefold distinction is a most convenient classification for the study of human growth.

Physical Growth

In every normal human being the condition of the body is fundamental. "A healthful mind in a healthful body" is the ideal held forth in the old Latin maxim. And the plain implication is that if the body is not healthful the mind also is not likely to be healthful.

Christian young men and young women are under divine obligation to care for their physical growth. The matter of health is vital, and to neglect the needs of the body is contrary to the divine plan. Young people should be alert to avoid everything that tends to physical deterioration. Let it be always remembered that our bodies are temples of God, and as such should be kept pure and free from all defilement.

Mental Development

Of vital importance in the growth of a well-rounded Christian life is the development of the mind. We live in an age which offers wonderful facilities to all young people, and there is little or no excuse for an undeveloped mind.

Christian young people should realize that the service of the Kingdom demands the utmost keenness of mind. In the Master's vineyard there is a wide field for the exercise of the most vigorous mentality. Christianity in its varied spheres of activity calls for consecrated intellectual power and for the most skillful use of our brains.

Spiritual Culture

The crowning feature of growth is seen in spiritual culture. In the cultivation of the spirit we rise to the plane of that which is divine and eternal.

Let us emphasize the fact that without spiritual culture no human life is complete. The man or woman who has neglected the culture of the soul has omitted that which is of greatest importance, and to such a one it must be said, "One thing thou lackest."

Let us consider for a moment a few of the means of spiritual culture. God's Word is the food upon which our souls must be nourished, if, like the boy Jesus, we are to advance in favor with God and men.

Prayer is the channel of supply whereby we are enabled to draw upon the divine resources and thus to add to our spiritual growth.

Christian fellowship is a wonderful aid to the successful culture of our spiritual nature, and the Church is the most effective agency by which we may enjoy the spiritual fellowship which we need to promote soul growth.

Christian service furnishes the means of spiritual exercise, whereby our souls may grow strong. No matter how humble the ministrations which we give if we serve with consecration and devotion our souls will find in this service a source of ever-increasing growth.

Carelessness versus Thoughtfulness

Hebrews 2:1-7.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Aug. 21. Spiritual indifference. Matt. 25:1-13.
T. Aug. 22. No interest. Acts 18:12-17.
W. Aug. 23. Dead in materialism. Matt. 22:1-14.
T. Aug. 24. Consider! Matt. 6:26-34.
F. Aug. 25. Learn! Prov. 6:6-11.
S. Aug. 26. Meditate! Ps. 119:15-99, 148.

"Carelessness versus thoughtfulness" might also be expressed in these words: "Earnestness versus heedlessness." This topic is a good one for young people to consider, since youth is naturally careless, heedless and impulsive.

Thoughtful in Speech

Young Christians should aim to be thoughtful in speech. Words heedlessly spoken often leave behind them wounds that rankle as if they had been inflicted by a barbed arrow. Hasty words are easily spoken, but they may do mischief that can never be undone.

Let us think when we speak, and since our words are apt to be the reflection of our inmost thoughts, let us think on those things that are lovely, so that our words may be pleasant to be heard.

Thoughtful in Action

Let us think before we act. Too often young people act first and think afterwards, and the sad part of this procedure is that all the thinking in the world cannot undo the evil that may be caused by a thoughtless act.

Thoughtfulness in action does not necessarily mean that we must always be slow in what we do. Sometimes in this life we must think and act quickly, but we should never act without thought.

The Evil of Carelessness

We can hardly exaggerate the evil that flows from carelessness in our words and actions. Prof. Amos R. Wells uses this telling illustration: "Sometimes a mountain avalanche is so delicately poised that the vibration of a voice will bring it down. Many an avalanche of sorrow has been brought down upon men by a hasty word."

Carelessness in word and action may result in the shipwreck not only of one but of many lives. And it is a solemn thought that such heedlessness may bring eternal ruin to immortal souls.

If thoughtfulness is so important an asset in the conduct of human affairs, the practical question arises, How may we become thoughtful?

A sense of responsibility will tend to make us thoughtful, and if we have taken upon ourselves the obligations of the Christian Endeavor Pledge or the vows of church membership, these solemn promises should make us thoughtful in our words and actions.

It will help us to be thoughtful, if we will remember that every human life is really a part of God's great plan, and that no matter how humble our lives may be they are needed to complete the mosaic of the divine design.

The Reward of Thoughtfulness

Thoughtfulness even in little things brings a rich and lasting reward. This is illustrated by the blessing pronounced by Jesus upon the one who gives only a cup of cold water, but who gives it in a thoughtful spirit, mindful of the Master Himself.

The reward that follows thoughtfulness in matters of larger moment is measured only by eternity. The salvation of an immortal soul may result from some thoughtful word or action. Perhaps through some thoughtful word or deed an entire community may be awakened to its spiritual needs, or a whole nation may be stirred to its depths, and thus a blessing may be brought to myriads of human souls.

In unselfishness lies the key to thoughtfulness. One who is truly unselfish will always be thoughtful and considerate of others. If we have the spirit of Jesus, then we shall be thoughtful in word and action, for we shall love our neighbor as ourselves.

Our Little Folks

Big Weeds

BY MABEL S. MERRILL.

THE sun shone hot in the corner of the field where Rena Maylie was doing her morning task of weeding. On the other side of the fence at the end of the field she could see a pink dress flitting along the path.

"It's that new girl that's come to board all summer at Graham's," Rena said to herself. "Margaret Way, her name is. I think that's a stuck-up sort of name—sounds as if you were trying to show off. Her brother is Kenneth. And they don't have a single bit of work to do from morning till night."

Rena tugged at a big weed till it came out of the ground so suddenly that she toppled over backwards. When she picked herself up, the girl in the pink dress was looking at her curiously over the fence.

"What are you doing?" asked the newcomer.

"Pulling weeds out of the corn," returned Rena in a tone that said, "What a stupid question!"

"I don't see any corn," persisted Margaret.

"Well, there's corn enough here, only it's pretty well buried up. There's nobody to do any hoeing except Grandpa Maylie, and the weeds get ahead of him. If I go first down a row like this and pull out all the big ones, he can get it done a good deal faster." Rena glanced back at the old man who was toiling away in the sun down the long rows.

"I wish you didn't have it to do," Margaret spoke in what Rena thought was a superior tone. "Then you could go to the picnic at Silver Moon Lake. We're all going in automobiles and we shall have dinner outdoors, and trips on the water in the 'White Lily'—that's the little steamer that goes up and down the lake."

"She's telling me that just to make me feel horrid because I can't go, too," thought the weeder, grappling a big ragweed with both hands.

"You would like it, wouldn't you?" asked Margaret.

"Of course I should!" answered Rena so sharply that Margaret said no more.

The pink dress had vanished when Rena looked up again. "Selfish thing!" she muttered, "That what she is!" Then she sat still between the rows and began to look ashamed.

"No," she declared after awhile, "I haven't any right to say that. 'Tisn't her fault that she can go off and have a good time when I can't."

Rena bent over her work again and was pulling away bravely when a boy came tumbling over the fence. It was Kenneth Way in a pair of borrowed overalls which covered his clean blue suit from ankle to chin. Behind him came Margaret, her pink skirt pinned up under a great gingham apron and her lace-trimmed sleeves caught to her shoulders with safety pins.

"We're going to help you," she announced. "When we came to think about it, it seemed real mean to go off having fun when you had all this work to do. We are going to be such near neighbors all summer, you see, it will be lot nicer if we can do things together."

Rena could not say much as they worked their way down the weedy rows. That dreadful word she had used in her thoughts about Margaret would keep sounding in her ears. "Selfish! I called her selfish, and she has given up the picnic to help me and brought Kenneth with her!"

So many pairs of hands made light work. In due time the last row was done, and Grandpa Maylie stood looking at the heaps of weeds.

"Mostly ragweed and pigweed," he said. "They're a pair of big weeds—those two. They'll choke out 'most anything between 'em. The ragweed's the toughest. I always think it's like envy, with its great stout roots and its branches poking themselves in where they've no business to be. Looks as if they thought nobody else ought to have a comfortable time if they can."

"And what is the pigweed like, Mr. Maylie?" asked Kenneth, poking over a heap of them.

"Well, I guess that's selfishness, as you might think from its name. When it's

He stopped at sight of the children. "Oh, here you are, young ones. What's this about a picnic at Silver Moon Lake? I'm going right down that way and I'll take you along. Yes, Rena, your mother said you could go when I stopped at the house just now."

"The picnic lasts all day; we shall only lose an hour or two of the fun," exclaimed Margaret, as they went humming down the road.

"Say, girls," cried Kenneth, "don't you suppose that poor little corn feels better, now it's got a chance to breathe?"

"I do, anyway," announced Rena. "I wonder if most things that want to do any growing—people and all, you know—don't have to keep a sharp lookout for those big weeds!"

IN THE HAMMOCK.

small, it pulls up middling easy, but leave it in the hill awhile and it'll be a tree, pretty near, before you know it. Then where's your corn? Life's all squeezed out of it and you don't get any good crop in the fall."

"Isn't that as plain as day!" cried Margaret, and she looked so bright-eyed and knowing over it that Rena stared at her thoughtfully. Had Margaret had to pull up a big weed of selfishness when she gave up the picnic—she and Kenneth—for the sake of helping a neighbor?

They went down to the brook beside the road and scrubbed faces and hands clean in the running water. The girls laid aside the big aprons and Kenneth jumped out of his overalls and lunged them on the fence. They looked quite tidy enough for a picnic when Dr. Loring came down the road in his swift light car.

Out of Grandma's Story Box

BY HELEN M. RICHARDSON.

"I WISH you'd tell us a story, Grandma," Rachel said as she and Ashley stood at the window, one rainy afternoon.

"My story box seems to be rather empty, just now. I think you must have heard every one in it—except—perhaps—"

"That's the very one we want to hear, Grandma, I know it is. I like 'except' stories, they are always the best," Rachel broke in, giving her grandmother's hand an encouraging squeeze.

"When I was a little girl," Grandmother began, "I lived in a prairie town. Trees were not common there, so of course there were no tree-nesting birds. One day, however, there appeared a little traveler. He came all alone on a lumber train, and he was first seen climbing a telegraph pole."

"Why, Grandma, what a funny thing to do!" giggled Rachel.

"Well, you see, this little traveler was not used to a treeless country, and the pole being the only thing in sight that at all resembled a tree he decided to climb up and investigate. He had a very long bill, (I think I will have to say right here that this stranger in a strange land was a bird), so he began to play a tattoo on this bare pole just as he had been in the habit of doing among the leafy trees of his home country," Grandma explained.

"I'll bet it was a woodpecker," Ashley broke in, in his usual impulsive fashion.

"Yes, it was a woodpecker, and it had traveled a thousand miles in a freight car loaded with poles. The little fellow had probably found an abundance of food during his long journey, for the poles were doubtless full of fine fat worms. Possibly a knowledge that they were in the wood led him to the car, and he got so busy eating that he did not notice when the door was closed and he was a prisoner in the dark, speeding away from home and bird friends.

"But at last he was free; and he chirped a cheery good-morning to the people who gathered around the tall pole on which he had taken refuge. You see, they were as astonished at the sight of Mr. Woodpecker, as he was at the strange faces peering up at him. But he continued industriously to tap, tap, tap upon the bare pole, to see, I suppose, if there were any worm shops in this strange place where he could procure his breakfast.

"He stayed around about a week, poor homesick little bird, and then one day we missed him, and we never saw him again. I remember how sorry I felt, until my mother convinced me that the bird must have been as lonesome as I would have been in a strange country, among strange people, and was probably on his way back to his home again."

"But do you suppose he could find it, Grandma,—all that long way without anyone to guide him?" Rachel asked with an earnest look upon her face.

"God gives birds instincts that guide them thousands of miles over seas, every year, and why would not the instinct of this little woodpecker just as surely guide it back to its native forests?" Grandmother answered.

"After a while I ceased to grieve, believing this to be true. But for several years I never saw a freight car unloading poles that I did not stop to see if it possibly contained a bird passenger," she said with a smile.

"I like your story box, Grandma, even if it is almost empty," said Rachel.

"And I don't believe it ever will be wholly empty," Ashley wisely remarked.

Toward the Sun

It is said that the sweetest side of any fruit or vegetable is the side which grows toward the sun. There is no doubt that the sun has a great deal to do with the beauty and flavor of the fruits which are the delight of man. In this casual observation, as in so many facts from nature, rests a beautiful spiritual lesson for us all. What the sun is to the natural world, that, and much more, is Christ to the world of spiritual things. As the sun influences the fruits and vegetables of the earth, giving them beauty and lusciousness, so Christ sheds an influence over the lives of many and gives them beauty of character and purity of heart. And as the sweetest side of a fruit or vegetable is the side toward the sun, so the best side of man is the side toward Christ.

The Family Circle

The Light from Within

By Cora S. Day

IT was raining as Marjorie Brown walked down the station down the almost deserted street in the early dusk. Not a brisk summer shower with its promise of being done soon, but a slow, dismal rain that was half fog, blotting all outlines into vague shapes. The street was heavily shaded with huge old maples that met over the roadway. The yard into which Marjorie turned after a ten minutes' walk, was half filled with evergreens grown too large for the landscape effects for which they had been intended.

The house was unlighted yet, save for the kitchen and dining room windows. Even these looked dim and dispirited through the gloom of the storm. Yet Marjorie found courage to laugh under her breath.

"Same old place! How do the boarders ever stand it?" she thought. Then in swift repentance for the feeling, she continued. "But oh, I'm thankful for it and Aunt Hannah, just as they are."

She ran lightly up the steps. Lightly indeed, for in spite of her laugh and the brisk run, the girl was but a thin little wisp of a creature, whose pale face told of recent illness. She had to stand a minute at the door to catch her breath.

"I'm not so strong as I thought," was her mental confession. "But a few weeks here will remedy that, I'm sure."

She did not ring or knock. The door stood open, the screen was unfastened, and she went straight through the long central hallway to the kitchen. A tall angular woman looked up from her work at a table, where she was dishing out some sort of dessert. "How do you do, Aunt Hannah?" Marjorie said, smilingly. The woman nodded and gave the tired girlish face a keen glance.

"I'm well, thank goodness. I looked for you earlier. You look as if it was about time you came down here for a rest and something fit to eat," was her terse but not unkindly spoken reply. Marjorie knew of old that Aunt Hannah's kind heart made up for any lack of gracious speech.

"It is time," she agreed. "If I had stood behind that counter another day, the doctor said, I might—" she stopped short—"But I didn't—and here I am, ready to help you all I can in return for your kindness in having me come."

Aunt Hannah arranged the dishes she had filled swiftly on a tray and a stout girl appeared and bore them away to the dining room.

"Never mind about my kindness, child. When you get a little strength and color and weight, it will be time enough to talk about what you'll do to help me. You'll be able to save me a lot of steps after awhile," she said in her hurried voice. "I'm sorry you didn't come before you broke down entirely. You'd have saved time and strength and doctor's bills. Run up to your old room and come down as soon as you can for supper. The boarders are about through, so you and me and Sally will eat together."

Marjorie tugged her suitcase up to a familiar room—the one she had occupied many times in her life. But most of those visits had been when she came as a little girl with her mother. Then Aunt Hannah had a family of her own in the big house. Now times were changed for both. Marjorie was a lone little shopgirl, too poor to often afford the fare for even vacation visits. Instead of her own folks, Aunt Hannah now had only the stout girl and a half dozen elderly, semi-invalid boarders. She made a specialty of elderly semi-invalids of moderate means. Her house was not fine enough for rich folks, or gay enough for young folks. So it became a natural haven for folks like itself—growing old, neither rich nor poverty-stricken and with no very bright or cheerful outlook before them.

For awhile Marjorie did little but eat, sleep and rest, under her Aunt's directions. The arrangement between them had been that the girl should come to the quiet country house to grow well and strong; and that as soon as she was able she should work for her board. Only on that basis would Marjorie agree to come, when Aunt Hannah snatched time from among her busy days to visit the sick girl in the distant city hospital. Marjorie's slender savings had vanished before she consented to go to the hospital free ward. Penniless, she still refused to "sponge" upon Aunt Hannah, who also found it necessary to work hard for her living.

It was the very first morning that she was allowed to get up early, and sweep the front porches and steps, before the elderly boarders were supposed to be stirring, that she met the newest arrival. The lady had arrived the evening before, so late that Marjorie was abed and asleep. She looked up now from the lower step to see a short, plump, smiling woman come out on the porch. A pair of twinkling brown eyes met hers, and the most cheerful voice she had heard for days said:

"Good morning, little housemaid. Where did you come from? And am I breaking rules getting out so early? I like the morning freshness." She stood at the porch edge smiling down at the trim little figure below her.

"Oh, no, there's no rule about it," Marjorie laughed. "Most of the folks like to sleep late. I am getting this sweeping done before they come down to sit on the porch."

"But I thought last night that you were stout and rosy," the woman said in mock perplexity. Marjorie laughed again and explained. Indeed, before she knew it she was explaining who she was, where she came from and all about it, while the plump little lady nodded and smiled and listened sympathetically. When the story was told Marjorie took her broom and went away to attend to other duties, and saw little of the newcomer for the rest of the morning.

As the days passed, however, the newest boarder managed to see a good deal of her; and unknown to Marjorie there was a purpose behind every question and every conversation that Mrs. Palmer, the pleasant little lady, contrived. The girl went about her gradually increasing duties just her natural, willing, cheery self, all unsuspecting of being closely studied by the stranger, and Mrs. Palmer got in quite a way of nodding her head in secret satisfaction. For what her observant eyes saw was a girl who, in spite of poverty, hardship, loneliness and illness, had kept her childlike faith in God undimmed, and her soul serene and happy in that faith; a girl who in the midst of gloomy, depressing, un congenial surroundings and people was the one ray of human sunshine to a lot of dull, ailing people; a girl who did a great deal of work in a quiet unobtrusive way that made it seem little; yet who always had time for a smile, a cheery word or a merry laugh, for the often low-spirited boarder folks. Not one of them but soon learned to love her and to watch for and brighten at her coming.

"Yes, she's a good, cheerful little soul," Aunt Hannah found time to acknowledge one day when Mrs. Palmer was drawing her out on the subject of her niece. "Somehow, since she came things move along easier and seem brighter all round. I guess it's her way and her smile—though she's got little enough to smile over, to my notion. She's a brave little piece, for she never let me suspect how hard things were with her in town until she broke down completely. I'd have had her with me long ago if I'd known. I'll keep her here now, though, if I can. No need of her being wasted behind a counter when she is of real good to me here, and can thrive on her work, if it is hard."

"She wouldn't be wasted anywhere," Mrs. Palmer responded. "She is one of the sort who make themselves valuable wherever they are."

She proved her own staunch faith in her words the next day, when she found Marjorie alone and not busy; and made her the offer that had been ripening for weeks.

"I want you to come home with me. You shall be my companion—such a one as I might have made of a dear, bright daughter like you if the Lord had given me one. You shall have a salary, or an allowance if you will call it so, that will make your store wages and your work here for your board, look absurd. You are worth a great deal, do you know it? And with me you shall have more fitting recompense. For Marjorie dear, I am what the world calls a wealthy woman. I came here through a misunderstanding. I was tired and wanted a quiet, comfortable, pleasant place of retreat for a few weeks, where no one knew me and I could be free from all the cares and responsibilities of my life. It is assuredly quiet here, and plainly comfortable. But I would not have endured the dullness and gloom a day if you had not been here to brighten it for me—and for all in this unsmiling house.

"Now I am going home and I want you to go with me. I can give you all you want of the pleasures of travel, of art, of books and of music; but I have learned to know you too well to use these as bait. I know that you will be more attracted and more interested in going with me to enter into my real business in life. That business is the King's business that you are already engaged in here. I use the money that He has entrusted to me, as you use the sweet, brave spirit that He has given you, to help poor needy folk to be a little better and happier. I need some one, more and more, to help me intimately and confidentially with this charitable work. I want you, Marjorie. Will you come?"

Wisely, Marjorie recognized the call to wider usefulness. Thankfully she accepted it and the opening for better things for herself. Gladly she planned, first of all, for the lightening of Aunt Hannah's labors through Mrs. Palmer's influence, in sending her enough profitable boarders to warrant a full staff of efficient helpers. Under brightening financial skies, Aunt Hannah learned to smile instead of to sigh. A coat of fresh paint for the house outside, new decorations and draperies inside and a vigorous pruning of the evergreens and overgrown shrubbery did wonders in brightening up the surroundings. But Aunt Hannah agreed with Mrs. Palmer that the real brightening had come first from within—straight from the heart of a thin little wisp of a girl who through all the cloudy days had held fast her serene faith in God.

His Son's Career

BY HOPE DARING.

"Is Mr. Brainard here?"

As the man who had halted before the cashier's window of the bank asked that question, Horace Brainard turned, for a sharp look at him. The next moment the bank president was hurrying forward.

"William Darrow! Now what good fortune brought you here, dear old friend?"

Darrow, a lawyer from a far western city, explained that he had been to New York on business for his firm. "I found that I could make the change to a Chicago train here, and have an hour to spend with you."

Horace Brainard led the way to his private office, giving orders that he was not to be disturbed. "Only an hour, William? And I could talk to you for a week. Tell me how it is with you and yours."

A smile curved the lawyer's lips. He spoke of his family. His three daughters were all happily married. "And I'm a grandfather three times, Horace. All boys, too. Now what of yourself and Duncan?"

Even at the mention of his only son's name, the banker's face softened. "Did you know Duncan was at Seaton, our old college? Of course, he is to come in the bank with me, and some wondered at my sending him to a denominational college, but I'm loyal to Seaton. This is his junior year. After graduating he is to attend a business college. Then, William, I am going to begin to slip out from under the load."

"You have prospered? I hear you are a rich man."

Mr. Brainard nodded. "God has prospered me. I have proved that a man can live a consistent Christian life in business. Had I not, I would not have chosen it for Duncan's career."

"But we do not choose our children's career," William Darrow reminded his friend with the whimsical smile of olden days. "What would you have done if Duncan had chosen otherwise?"

"I — Why, I taught him from early boyhood that he was to work with me." "Then it was your choice rather than his?"

A frown—one of perplexity rather than annoyance—furrowed the man's brow. "Oh, Duncan and I think alike. I wish you could see him. He's a Brainard, and yet in some ways he is like his mother. If only she could have lived to see him grow up! I say, William, when the boy graduates, you must come back to Seaton. It will be the thirtieth anniversary of our own graduation."

"How I'd like to do that! Tell me of the college."

The two friends talked on eagerly. At the close of the hour, Mr. Brainard telephoned for his car and took Darrow to the station.

The next day, on returning from his noon lunch, Horace Brainard entered his private office. Five minutes later, with no warning knock, the door opened, and a young man stepped into the room.

"Hello, father! Now you are surprised."

"Duncan! Why, what brought you home? Anything wrong?"

"Nothing wrong, father. Something has happened to me, though, something so wonderful that my heart sings with joy. I wanted to talk it over with you, so Dr. Howard gave me permission to run up on the eleven o'clock train."

He drew a chair close to his father's side. Horace Brainard leaned back, looking with fond pride into his son's face.

"Well, what is it that makes your heart sing? Not a love affair?"

Duncan laughed. "Not that, father. Nothing serious in that line yet."

"It will come in time, boy, and I pray God may give you the happiness he did me. But I want you to wait until your education is finished and you are settled in business."

The young man's face grew grave. He leaned forward, to lay one hand upon that of Horace Brainard. "Father, God has called me to preach his gospel. And I have heeded the call."

"What? What do you mean, Duncan? No, do not repeat the words; I understood them. But I'll not listen to it. It's nonsense."

"Not that, father! That is not your attitude towards the Christian ministry."

"Not towards the ministry, but towards my son entering it. Why, Duncan, all your life I have looked forward to the time when you should, after working a few years with me, take my place here. It will be a goodly heritage that I will leave you, boy, more than you have thought."

"Father, there is no mistake. I must preach the gospel."

They talked for a half hour, both faces pale and drawn. Duncan told how, for months, he had struggled against the desire to enter the ministry. But the call had come again and again.

"I know it is hard for you, father, but I must do it. You would not have me refuse to do God's will?"

"I would have you show common sense. In the path I have planned for you, success is sure. I doubt if you will ever make a public speaker. And—and, boy, I need you."

"But God has called me."

Just then there came a knock at the door. The office boy reported the arrival of a trio of the leading men of the state. Hastily the elder Brainard explained that they had come for an important conference.

"It's all right, father; I'll have to hustle to catch my train back to Seaton. When you've had time to think it over, I'll come up again. Goodby, and remember that I love you."

Horace Brainard met his business associates with his usual calmness. The conference lasted all the afternoon; never once did the banker fail in his clear, comprehensive grasp of business affairs, in his tact and politeness. He played the part of host at an early hotel dinner, saw his guests to their train, then returned to his private office at the bank.

Turning on a single light he sat down before his desk. Suddenly he was conscious of a great weariness; that afternoon's restraint had taxed his power of resistance. Vaguely, at first, he attempted to reconstruct his scheme of life, trying to think of his business future without Duncan at his side. As it all came home to him, there swept over the man a wave of fierce rebellion.

"I'll not have it," he muttered. "Duncan is my son; all his life I have planned my existence for his good. He shall listen to me!"

"God has called me." The man started; it was as if the words came from one of the shadowy corners of the room.

Horace Brainard drew a long breath. What was it his dying wife had said to him, after she had kissed, for the last time, the rose-flushed, wondering face of their little son? She had said, "You will teach him so that one day he will come to me, Horace?"

Called of God! All men were that, but to only a comparative few came the call to stand in the sacred desk and preach the gospel to sinning and suffering humanity. Why did he—Duncan's father—refuse? Did he put gold before God's will?

Horace Brainard slipped to his knees. He cried unto God for vision and for the strength to do what he saw was his duty.

It was not shut in by four walls that father and son met again. The next morning, when Duncan Brainard left the house where he roomed, on his way to breakfast, he came face to face with his father. The young man held out both hands.

"It's all right, father! I knew it would be."

"All right, my boy," was the cheery answer. "I am ready to help you respond to the call by which you have been honored."

Duncan put his arm through that of the older man. "I have never fully realized what the relationship of the Father and Son typified until this morning," he said quietly.

IN THE MISSION FIELDS

The Italian Tract Society

The headquarters of the Italian Tract Society are in Florence, Italy. The last annual report of this Society states that during the sixty years of its existence it has published 6,102,880 copies of books and tracts, 2,000,000 Gospel Almanacs, and 2,773,400 Scripture Portions.

During the past year the Society has published a new Commentary by Prof. Dr. H. Bosio on the Epistles of Paul to the Galatians and Thessalonians. It has also issued the second part of the Waldensian Liturgy, the second edition of the Commentary on St. Luke by Dr. R. G. Stewart, and many tracts.

Evangelical Christian literature has been distributed by this Society among the soldiers concentrated in Rome, Turin, Milan and on the Italian boundaries as well as in the war zone itself.

The Bible Van continued its beneficent work in various localities, and the colporteur in charge has reported many encouraging features of this branch of effort.

The interesting picture that appears on this page shows us a scene in Naples Harbor, where Colporteur F. Aceto of the Italian Tract Society is distributing Christian literature among his fellow-countrymen in that port.

For many years the American Tract Society has aided the Italian Tract Society by cash appropriations, which have been used for the maintenance and extension of the Society's work under the direction of its efficient and enthusiastic Secretary, Rev. Odoardo Jalla.

Reaching the Young Men in Cairo

The illustrated lecture has been found by Rev. Stephen Trowbridge, a World's Sunday-School secretary, to be one of the best methods of reaching the people of Egypt, and especially the Moslems. Recently, Mr. Trowbridge gave lectures for the young men in Cairo on the following subjects: "The New Era in Asia," in which he followed Dr. Mott in his travels; "The Life of David Livingstone;" and "The Greatest Life in History," in which he showed scenes from the ministry of Jesus of Nazareth.

On the evening of the last lecture, over 550 men were in attendance, and the striking thing was that nearly half of them were Mohammedan boys and young men from the government schools who came in response to invitations. Mr. Trowbridge writes: "Boys from certain schools came in a body and it made one's heart beat fast to see these large groups crowding up for seats and then to be able to speak to them for nearly an hour on the meaning of the life of Christ."

A Christian Statesman

China is the land of surprises. A third of the high officials of that land are Christians, while less than one-quarter of one per cent. of the people are Christ's followers. A young man with a brilliant record, of whom China is proud, is sent to be her foremost representative to the land which is China's greatest friend. The Record of Christian Work reports that "the new Chinese ambassador to the United States, Mr. Koo, is a graduate of Columbia University and was an officer of the Christian Association, when a student there. His secretary, Mr. Wei, was educated at Amherst and Columbia. He has been president of the Chinese Students' Christian Association of North America."

Ambassador Koo, with many other leaders of his race, believes that the economic and spiritual salvation of China, and of all Asia, is dependent on Christianity. His reception in the United States was of marked friendliness and confidence. China may expect her ambassador's presentations to be received with the same cordial sympathy as in the past.

Chinese Women as Bible Class Leaders

The women of China, following in the steps of their American sisters, are training for leadership in the Adult Bible Class work of their country. During the past year, five Bible Training Conferences have been held in China as an outgrowth of the evangelistic forward movement inaugurated by Dr. Mott and Dr. Eddy. It is interesting to note that no women were in attendance at the first two of these conferences, which were held in Kuling and Moukden, while the last three, held in Swatow, Canton and Foochow, were all attended by women. Now, two Bible Conferences, one in Kuling and one in North China, are being held especially for women. American methods of Sunday-school organization are taught in these conferences, as these methods are found to be especially adapted to the Chinese. The women, who are trained in these conferences, will, in their turn, organize classes which will be centers of service for other women.

Careful "follow-up" work is planned for each of these Bible conferences. The Swatow Conference will have eleven "follow-up" meetings, the Canton Conference, fourteen, while the Foochow Sunday-School Union, with the various Chinese Sunday-school secretaries employed by the several denominations, will be able efficiently to follow up the good conference held there.

Sunday School Advance in the Philippines

"A large majority of the student body in the Philippines are without faith in their old system, and are out on a sea of religious unbelief searching for an anchorage." This statement is made by Rev. J. L. McLaughlin, who is making an earnest effort to inject the Bible into the lives of the young people of the Islands.

Fifteen years ago not one Filipino had even been inside of a Sunday-School; today the Islands have a Sunday-School enrollment of nearly 60,000, and the movement is only just beginning. The great problem is to make of the Filipinos a united people, and in the attainment of this end the Sunday-school is second to none, especially in the public schools. It is only that all could unite upon the child, as this does not require a conference to create or discuss.

"The different tribal representatives have gathered at the Sunday-School conventions held throughout the Islands," said Mr. McLaughlin, "and our souls were cheered and thrilled as we sensed the disappearing of the old jealousies and felt the awakening of that newer spirit of Christian love and fraternity, the like of which has never before been in the Philippine Islands."

The opportunities for Sunday-school work are just opening up in the Islands; they are to be practically unlimited. Every other agency being put forth by our government at such tremendous expense and labor may fail but the Sunday-School project will win. Should it, through lack of support or any other means fail of its mission, every effort of the government is bound to lose out. In the raising of the Filipino people to Christian self-consciousness, the Sunday-School work is the biggest and most hopeful proposition in the whole Philippine Islands.

The Reading Room at Foochow, China

One of the most important features of the work of the North Fukien Religious Tract Society is the maintenance of a Reading Room in Foochow City.

The work at the Reading Room is carried on under the direction of Rev. W. L. Beard and a committee of three Chinese pastors, who report as follows:

"In order that the Reading Room might be more attractive and comfortable, and more convenient for those making use of it in the evening, electric light was installed at the beginning of the year; and new seats were added so that meetings and lectures might be held there. Twelve such meetings have been held during the past year, with an attendance of from thirty to one hundred.

"The main purpose of the Room is to furnish a clean, quiet resort for the reading public, where they can in comfort read the various newspapers and magazines which are provided for their information and delectation. The chief opportunity of the catechist in charge is not preaching, but it is to quietly get acquainted with the men who make use of the room, and, by personal endeavor, influence them for Christianity.

"Thirty-eight different kinds of papers have been on the file during the year. Of these, seven are religious papers. The average daily attendance at the Room has been 70 to 80, or a total of 24,000 for the year. Of these readers, there were 163 different individuals, and 50 of them are regular attendants, the others have come in occasionally or have just dropped in once or twice, probably when on a visit to Foochow.

"There is a library of 224 volumes for Chinese readers and this has been used by ten or more frequently.

"Several of those who have availed themselves of the Reading Room have been directly influenced towards Christianity, and Letters of Commendation, introducing them to the churches, have been written in eleven cases."

The Value of the Christian Scriptures

The following interesting statement comes from far-off Siam. It is the testimony of Nai Soot, a native preacher of the Gospel in that country, and was sent through an agent of the American Bible Society:

"I consider that the Christian Scriptures are of the greatest value (or profit) to me in the following seven ways:

- "1. They let me know of a Saviour.
- "2. They show me a way of salvation (lit., a gap or opening).
- "3. They let me understand the mind (will, or disposition, lit., 'water of heart') of God.

- "4. They let me know rules of conduct (which are) according to God's will (or mind, as above).

- "5. They show me God's love, mercy and pity.

- "6. They comfort my heart and cause increase of devotion to God, giving me increased peace and joy in Him. The verses which comfort me most, which I like better than any others are John 3:16 and I John 1:7.

- "7. They are of value in showing me my faults and sins. If I did not trust (or rely upon) the Christian Scriptures, I should not realize my sinfulness. Even if others teach one, saying, 'You have this or that sin,' one is apt not to believe and apt to be angry in one's heart because one does not think it true. But when one meditates upon the matter as it appears in the Word of God, it is clear one has much sin.

"The Christian Scriptures might be likened to a mirror of the heart. The manner of its use is nearly the same as that of a face mirror. When anyone doubts if his face is clean, he takes the mirror and looks to see how his face is dirty and then takes soap and water to wash it clean. In the same way, when anyone doubts that he has sinned and his heart is defiled, he should take this glass and consider in order that he may behold his sinfulness. Or one might compare (the Scriptures) to a searchlight. All warships have searchlights which they use to search for their foes, for searchlights are very powerful and show up enemy vessels, large or small. In like manner, when we read or consider what appears in the Scriptures our smallest sin becomes visible, so that we may call the Scriptures a searchlight. And I believe that these Scriptures will surely be of value (or profit) to other people as they have been to me."

Tract Distribution in China

A missionary in North China thus describes the result of her efforts to circulate the Gospel message on the printed page:

"I have distributed hundreds of tracts and leaflets while traveling on the cars this year and have had the satisfaction of seeing dozens of people in a single crowded car reading the books at once.

"One day in a crowded car, I was working my way slowly among the people and handing out the leaflets. A man in the further end of the car, as I was nearing him, spoke up and said, 'This must be one of the "Jesus Religion" folks, for no one else does such things.' He turned out to be a military official."

PRESERVING THE EDGE

IT ALWAYS seemed a little inconsistent to us to have a system of schooling under which nine months of the year were spent in learning and three months in the summer were given over to forgetting.

School time and the return to study are not dreaded by your boy and your girl if their minds are kept up to pitch throughout the summer vacation. The proper pitch can be attained and maintained only when good reading is within their reach and systematically indulged in. An hour's reading each day prepares them for Fall, helps you, helps their teacher, reduces loss of time in again getting school-accustomed, and prevents restlessness both now and then. Systematic reading makes better play, harder work, stronger brains, healthier bodies. It makes for system, and PRESERVES THE KEEN EDGE.

The Joy of Christ

BY JAMES E. C. SAWYER, D.D., LL.D.

HE cross is the emblem of the Christian life. The real disciple of Christ denies himself, takes up his cross and follows him. Those who are truly His wear like him a crown of thorns, are pierced with His sorrows, are crucified with Him. The triumphant in heaven are those who have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Those who have denominated Christianity the religion of sorrow have appropriately named it. Jesus was full of feeling. His sympathy for the sorrowing was perfect. The cup of loneliness and grief and shame He drained to the dregs. Gethsemane and Calvary stand as perfect symbols of extremest agony and complete self-sacrifice. The author of our salvation was made perfect through suffering. There was never grief like His. All the sorrows of humanity He made His own.

Yet supreme joy also was His—the joy of perfect and limitlessly fruitful self-sacrifice; the joy of a nature that was complete and absolutely harmonious; the joy of love that was capable of complete self-surrender, and was infinitely redemptive. "For the joy that was set before him" he took upon Him our nature and made eternal redemption for our sins. Only infinite love is capable of supreme sorrow, the love that is an ocean of joy. There is no suffering that is as deep and so tender as that of love, and there is no joy like that of love that is supremely redemptive.

The joy of Christ He gives to those who are truly His. On the evening of His institution of the Lord's Supper, just before His mysterious agony and loneliness, He communicated to His disciples the secret of His joy: "As the Father hath loved me, so have I loved you: abide in my love. If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love. These things have I spoken unto you that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." This great gift of joy He prefaced by saying: "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit." This spirit of obedience to the Father's will is the power of fruitful service, and in loving service we share the secret and taste the fullness of Christ's joy.

Our sphere of service may be obscure, but the smallest duty is divine. No loving service was too menial for Christ. He girded Himself with a towel and washed the feet of His disciples. The day laborer, the obscure and overtaxed accountant, the poor wife and mother burdened with countless petty cares and duties, the intellectual genius cramped to every that seems menial and unfruitful, the patient Sunday-school teacher who toils on in the face of many discouragements, may all taste the joy of Christ. The fellowship of those who do the will of the Father is a wide one. Those who are "diligent in business" are not denied the privilege of being "fervent in spirit." Those who in any way seek to bear the burdens of others "fulfill the law of Christ" and share his joy. There is no work so small, no task so mean, no calling so obscure, that loving fidelity will not glorify it. The true church is the fellowship of all who do the will of the Father in the loving service of humanity. This is the errand on which Christ sends us. In doing it we share His joy.

The Christian ideal is not simply contemplative. It is one that wakes the soul, and makes it grow. The inspiring poets of the last half of the nineteenth century were not content with reverie and the rapture of quiet contemplation—they called to action. They were moved by spiritual forces. Thus sings Arthur Hugh Clough:

"Go from the east to the west, as the sun and the stars direct thee,
Go with the girdle of man, go and encompass the earth;
Not for the gain of the gold, the getting, the hoarding, the having,
But for the joy of the Lord, but for the duty to do."

Browning summoned to battle the realization of ideals. His verse is militant. He was ever a fighter. He felt "the need of a world of men." He was a tremendous preacher. Tennyson, with faith in the "One far-off divine event

To which the whole creation moves," looked forward to the flower and fruit of "the crowning race," that shall be "no longer half-akin to brute."

The joy of Christ is the union of faith and hope and love; it is the joy of self-sacrifice; it is the triumphant splendor of an absorbing, tireless, fruitful enthusiasm for humanity.

The joy of Christ illuminates life's obscurest places, and exalts its humblest tasks. In all our service we have His companionship, His sympathy, His strength. He gives to every one his part in the great work of redeeming and renewing the world. His strength is made perfect in our weakness. His joy girds us with gladness as we bend beneath the burdens borne for others. The spirit of Christian service is manifold in its manifestations, taking deep hold as it does of all social and political as well as religious problems; but it is everywhere and always inspired by the vision, the example, the self-sacrifice, the joy and enthusiasm of Jesus.

PITTSBURGH CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Never Say It

"It is none of my business! Everybody must look out for himself."

The words are often on the lips of men, young men, as well as those who are older, when they see one of their number setting his feet in the path that leads into the dark.

"It does not concern me. None of my relatives drink. They never go into a saloon. Why should I work against drink?"

So a man said, and in a little while a message was placed in his hands, stating that his wife and only little one had been killed by a train driven by a drunken engineer. Then he knew how that kind of sin did concern him.

Draw up a chain and link follows link—all come when one comes. Every act of mankind is a link in a great chain. Not one single thing we do but has its effect upon all society. We think no thought, we do no deed that leaves the world just as it was before.

Your chum is neglecting his work. You have seen him in the doorway of places you never would set foot into. The red is coming into his eye. He is no longer as faithful to the right as he used to be. His church life is a minus quantity. He never reads the little book mother put into his trunk when he went away from home.

"But I cannot help it."

Did you say that? Then do not be surprised if some day you feel the touch of pain or sorrow or loss not of your own doing, but because your friend went the downward path.

What can you do when you find that one you love seems likely to slip and fall? Make it your business, now, to warn him of the danger he is in. Tell him that not only his own life, his own soul are trembling in the balance, but those of many who know him and are linked to him.

"It does not concern me!" Never say it; say, rather, all things interest me; all things are working either for my welfare or for my trouble. That makes us all links in the chain which lifts humanity.—KIND WORDS.

A Special Request

It is the desire of The American Tract Society to add a great many new names during the coming four months to the subscription list of the AMERICAN MESSENGER.

This excellent family paper ranks as one of the very best religious periodicals for the price at which it is offered, and it should be found in every household.

We ask our many friends to cooperate with us in increasing the usefulness of this paper by sending us the names and addresses of those of their friends and acquaintances who, in their judgment, might appreciate a sample copy of this periodical for examination. We believe that there are many who would be glad to have the paper come to them regularly, if they were acquainted with it, and we therefore ask you to introduce the AMERICAN MESSENGER to them in the way suggested.

As we propose to print an extra large edition of the October issue, please do not hesitate to send a large list of names. We will appreciate it and thank you very much. Should you prefer, we will send you a package containing several copies of the special October issue, so that you may hand them to friends, accompanying each copy of the paper by a word of commendation. We believe that many of our readers would prefer to do this rather than send a list of names. Please state the number of copies that you can use to advantage.

During the month of October many of your friends will be making their selection of reading matter for the coming year, and doubtless they will be glad that you have called their attention to the AMERICAN MESSENGER. If the subscriptions are handed to you, it will give you an opportunity to secure one or more of the beautiful premiums which will be offered in the October issue. Many of our friends in the past have secured choice Christmas gifts in this way. ADDRESS—

Helping the Helpless

Childlike love and sympathy is what the world needs today—the kind that makes men sympathetic and humane. We get our best lessons and examples of this from the child. This was called to mind some time ago in Caldwell, Idaho, in a little incident from real life. Tom Badley, the six-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. O. V. Badley, was the hero and Robin Redbreast was the other principal actor in the play.

Tom was enjoying a frolic near his home when a robin fluttered out of the grass with a broken wing. Tom saw the misery and distress of the bird as it fluttered for freedom, and the sight touched his tender heart. He went to the house and procured food for it. Then his mother heard him at the telephone. "Is this Doctor Gue's office?"

When he got the ear of the doctor, with a sobbing voice he continued, "I found a poor robin with a broken wing and it hurts him awful bad; will you help me fix it up?"

"Sure," said the doctor, "bring it down."

Tom carefully wrapped his patient in a cloth and tenderly carried it a mile to the doctor's office, where he and the doctor fixed the pinion the best they could. Then Tom, with his little heart full of gladness and gratitude, took his dumb friend home and cared for him in the bird hospital he had established.

"BLESSED BE WORK"

BY

REV. CHARLES CARROLL ALBERTSON, D.D.

Pastor of the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, New York

REV. WILLIAM C. GANNETT'S little book entitled, "Blessed Be Drudgery" has had a deservedly wide circulation. It is not easy to add anything to the wisdom of that essay. If any of us are tempted to be done with common tasks just because they have ceased to be interesting; if we resent the necessity which makes us "slaves of toil"; if we fancy life were easier with no drudgery, Mr. Gannett's beautiful prose-poem is a sovereign prescription for our mental ailment.

Not all labor is drudgery. And yet it may be irksome by its very severity. "Twenty years at hard labor" was the sentence pronounced by a judge, and the prisoner said, "I thank you for the saving clause 'hard labor.'" The curse of prison life, so say all who have known its terrors, is enforced unemployment. So, before we complain of the severity of our tasks, we should reflect how much more wearisome would be no tasks at all. An English poet, speaking of the inhabitants of "The Castle of Indolence," says,

Their only labor was to kill the time,
And labor dire it was, and weary woe."

Mill-stones that have no grain to grind wear themselves out. It is so of human minds. The curse of the world is not labor, but unemployed leisure. The idle rich are as miserable as the idle poor, and both are in a pitiable case. It is not alone that the mind finds relief in labor, but there is a sweet satisfaction in the knowledge that we are not helpless and not mere consumers of the goods of life. That French monarch who provided that his consort should have a dairy and do her own butter-making was working out, even if in an ineffectual way, the only sane method of securing satisfaction.

Among the earliest instincts of childhood is the impulse to "make something." Happy the child whose faculties of construction are wisely guided! The public school is not complete without the kindergarten at the beginning of the course and the vocational school at the end. The eye and hand need training for the occupations of industry. Tom may be dull and stupid in mathematics, but he is brilliant when he gets a hammer and nails and a few boards. Mary does not make much progress in grammar, but how she revels in the opportunity to weave a lamp-mat or to hem-stitch a table-cloth!

Blessed be the moral discipline of labor. To learn the value of truth, of genuineness, of reliability; to apprehend the beauty and worth of constancy, and to grasp the principle of what John Ruskin called "the sanctity of the straight line"—there is no exercise so beneficent as well directed work. To mould a shapely pot of clay, to mend a broken lock, to make a substantial table, to weave a serviceable rug, or to cut and fit an acceptable garment teaches, if the worker be at all amenable to the influence of idealism, much more effectively than by mere moral maxims, the importance of obedience to law, the absolute indispensability of conforming to fixed rules of conduct.

In the Day's Work

BY JULIA E. ABBOTT.

*It's all in the day's work, dear,
When to gray the gold tints turn;
A bit of the Master's lesson,
And He knows what we need to learn.
When the path is overshadowed,
And we walk with weary feet,
'Tis a minor chord in the music
To make the life song sweet.*

*It's all in the day's work, dear,
When the threads will tangle so;
A pattern that is given
The Master's love to show;
And it may be in the evening
When the twilight shadows fall,
He will find the thread of patience
Most beautiful of all.*

*It's all in the day's work, dear:
The trial and the pain;
Perhaps it may count a deal more
Than things we thought were gain;
It is best—the lesson given—
Though we may not understand;
It's all in the day's work, dear,
By the Master's wisdom planned.*

*It's all in the day's work, dear:
Let us say, "Thy will be done";
So the path shall lead us heavenward,
Where the crown of life is won;
And above the mist of the valley
Where we linger a little space,
On the hills of fadeless glory
We shall see the Master's face.*

The practice of agriculture under proper direction, is not only the best teacher of certain branches of botany and chemistry, but is the most irresistible commentary on the uniformity of law, and the morality of the universe. It is by no accident that so many of the great moralists have been children of the soil.

The blessedness of work is not only in the mental and moral discipline it affords, but in the social relationships it encourages. There is a free masonry of labor. The blacksmith is brother to the carpenter, the miner close kin to the mariner. Trade-unionism is founded upon the community of interest among all workingmen. The modern democratic state is strong in the cohesive force of its industrial brotherhoods.

A friend of mine has just finished building a spacious and beautiful residence. For more than a year laborers were employed in erecting and adorning the house. Architects, stone-masons, carpenters, cabinet-makers, plasterers, painters, plumbers, organ-builders, decorators, and various other artificers, to the number of nearly fifty, had their part in the creation of that stately house. There was a genuine family feeling among most of them. The humblest laborer was proud that he had some share in the erection of that home. And the owner himself was not unmindful that these were all his benefactors as well as his servants. They gave him more than could be paid for with mere money. So he decided the first reception he gave in the new house should be in honor of its creators. The workmen were all invited to bring their wives. A master musician "proved" the organ. There was a delicious supper and before the company separated the host addressed the men who had helped in any way to build the house, thanked them for their fidelity to their work and their thoughtfulness of his interests. It is known that some of those workmen have since their experience on that "job," cultivated a much more friendly attitude towards their fellow-workmen, and since that reception, have demonstrated a much more loyal spirit towards their employers.

Employers and employes—are they not one, after all? The employe of today may be an employer tomorrow. The employer of one man is the employe of another. And over us all, as said a wise man in Persia long ago, is "the eye of Him to whom both master and servant are accountable, to whom both high and low are bound as servants are to masters, and as masters to their sovereign Lord."

ESSENTIALS TO CHRISTIAN EFFICIENCY

By William Thomas McElroy

EFFICIENCY is a word that is being more widely used to-day than in any other period of the world's history. In the business world, in the professions, in the Church, in education, in practically every line of human endeavor, men and women are striving to secure greater efficiency; they are making an effort to find the best methods of work and then to make these methods show the greatest results.

Those who do not strive to make both their methods and themselves efficient are being rapidly left behind in the onward march of the world. The individual must make his labors count for more in a given length of time than did the labors of his ancestors or he is relentlessly pushed aside to make room for those who are more efficient. The business man, the lawyer, the doctor, even the preacher, must take advantage of the new time-saving and labor-saving inventions of the age if he would keep abreast of the times and keep his head above water in the great whirlpool of progress that is surging all about him.

The Great Question of the Age

If the question of efficiency, therefore, is the great question of the age, like all other fundamental or basic questions or movements, it must have a very important bearing on the life of the professing Christian. If the cry is for efficiency in business and in all other lines of human effort in material things, why not in spiritual things as well? Certainly there is no lack of the need for efficiency in Christian effort. In almost every magazine one picks up there is a criticism of some line of Christian effort; and books of this sort have become so numerous that the novelist is not abreast of the age in popular estimation if he has not offered a theory of some kind for curing one or more of the thousand and one ailments from which the Church is supposed to be suffering.

The Real Business of a Christian

But while it is true that the great bulk of this criticism is unfounded or unnecessary, or is based on false premises, it is equally true that there is a compelling need among Christians for a movement that will apply methods or means of efficiency to their Christian efforts as they do to their efforts in business or profession. The world needs efficient Christians quite as much as it needs efficient doctors, lawyers, tradesmen, bankers and farmers. For when all is said, our real business in life is serving the Lord, though like William Carey, the famous missionary, it may be necessary for us to cobble shoes to make a living.

To those who are seeking to make themselves efficient in Christian service the question, "What are the essentials to Christian efficiency?" is a pertinent and timely one. If I am to make my life count for most in the Kingdom of God, what are the things that are necessary? To answer such a question in all its phases would require volumes, but there are a few things that are basic and fundamental in the efficient Christian life and indispensable to the true follower of Christ. One of these essentials is

A Spirit of Consecration

No person can expect to accomplish much for Christ without consecration to Him. Without consecration the minister of the Gospel is a miserable failure in spiritual things. Without consecration the Sunday school teacher or the church officer or the mission worker cannot expect results. Without consecration our words of admonition or advice sound empty and are valueless; and without consecration we cannot hope for answered prayer or for the power of the Holy Spirit in our lives.

I do not know that the word consecration, in the meaning that is here given it, is used in the Scriptures, but all of Scripture is permeated with the idea. It was this that the Apostle Paul had in mind when he wrote, "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God" (Romans 12: 1, 2). And it was on no less a theme than consecration that the Master Himself preached to the multitudes when he enunciated and expounded those compelling principles of human conduct that we find in that wonderful passage known to every Bible student as the Sermon on the Mount.

Christ demands the full allegiance of His followers. And he who would be a true follower must consecrate time, talents, money, self—all that he is and that he has—to His service.

Another great essential to Christian efficiency is

Bible Study

The Word of God is the great Text Book of the Christian life; and while a person may be a nominal Christian and neglect the study of this Book, spiritually such a one will be like a ship that has lost its rudder, tossed hither and thither by the waves; or like a clock that has lost its hands—still running, but of little value; or like a telegraph wire that has become detached from the battery—a good wire, but useless.

No person can hope for power and effectiveness in the advancement of the Kingdom of God except as he applies himself to the study of the Bible. This study should be daily, for only by daily study can one secure a daily renewal of power. It should be earnest and thoughtful, for only by earnest and thoughtful study can it be best understood. It should be diligent and thorough, otherwise we will fail to get all from it that is possible. And it should be prayerful, for by prayer we enlist the instruction of the Holy Spirit in our study and secure His blessing on our efforts.

Many of the great minds of the world have expressed their confidence in the results that will come from a daily, earnest, diligent, prayerful study of the Word. Dr. W. W. Moore, who in his little volume entitled "The Indispensable Book" quotes testimonies to the power of the Bible from perhaps a hundred famous men, says: "It is important to remind ourselves afresh of the indispensableness of the Bible to everything that constitutes our true prosperity and success—its indispensableness to our intellectual culture, to the conservation of our national ideals, to the promotion of sound morality and true benevolence, and to the development of our spiritual life."

Another essential to the life of Christian efficiency is Personal Work

The Christian Church seems only now to be awaking to the necessity and the value of personal work; and this awaking is nowhere showing itself more markedly than in the Every Member Canvass which is spreading so rapidly, and with such notable results, in some quarters, and in the One-Win-One Campaign that has taken hold in other sections of the country.

In principle the two movements are practically the same, the central idea being to get every member of every church to work in an effort to win at least one person to Christ in a stipulated period varying from two weeks to one year. The churches of St. Louis tried the plan a year or so ago with wonderful results. Memphis, Tennessee, and Atlanta, Georgia, also achieved notable successes. In March, 1916, Louisville, Kentucky, conducted such a campaign, the results being large and encouraging.

Other cities are taking up the idea with avidity, and if a prophecy may be risked, it is not too much to hope that in the idea lies the germ of a religious awakening such as the continent of North America has never before witnessed. Men are beginning to realize—quite as if it were a new thing and not one that had been preached to them all these years—that they have a real personal responsibility for the souls of the unsaved men with whom they come in contact day after day in the ordinary occupations of life.

The personal touch method was the method used very largely by our Saviour during His life on earth. It was the way in which He called His Apostles—one by one. It was the way He taught Nicodemus. It was the way He won the woman at the well. What other recommendation is needed?

This does not mean that less preaching is needed; rather, if there is any difference, it calls for more. But the number of preachers in the world is comparatively small, and at best they can preach but three or four or five times a week. Those who occupy the pews are many, and they can do personal work seven days a week. They can not do as much as the preacher, of course, for that is his sole business, but they can do a vastly larger amount than has ever been done. When pulpit and pew thus become united, what glorious results may be expected in the ushering in of the Kingdom of God!

A fourth essential to the efficient Christian life is

The Habit of Prayer

We have named prayer last, but in practice it must come first. On prayer depend all the other essentials—consecration, Bible study, and personal work. Prayerless Christianity is a contradiction in terms. From prayer we gain power, faith, knowledge, tact, love, skill, hope, trust and all the graces that make the consecrated Christian life a life of beauty and helpfulness in the eyes of both God and man.

Prayer is a power that is possible to every person, man or woman, young or old, learned or unlearned, strong or weak, rich or poor, timid or bold. That it is a power is the testimony of every one who has tried it. "I am very sure of this," says S. D. Gordon, "that prayer changes things." And thousands of others of God's saints have given similar testimony.

There are three kinds of prayer: communion, petition, and intercession. "Communion and petition," says Mr. Gordon, "store the life with the power of God; intercession lets it out on behalf of others."

These, then, are the cardinal principles of the efficient Christian life: Consecration, Bible study, personal work, and prayer. They are essentials, and no life without them can be complete. Certainly no life without any one of them can be a vital power in the Kingdom of God.

THE MAN ON THE SHELF

By William Norris Burr

He found him out the other day. We had known for some time that he had come to The Shelf, but we had not known that it was a shelf in Mother Hubbard's bare cupboard to which he had been forced to retire. No matter what it was that prompted the probing process which resulted in the disclosure. Suspicions once aroused, I pressed him to the point where

"Emboldened by despair he stood at bay,"

—Dryden's words, which may be made fairly applicable to his case by a considerable trimming of the "despair"—and by continuing the pressure I squeezed the acknowledgment of the following facts from his reluctant lips.

He is a minister of the gospel—or, rather, he was one. For a goodly number of years his name has had a place in the Year-Book of his denomination in the "List of Ordained Ministers." It is still there. But whereas it was formerly followed by a page number indicating that he could be found somewhere out in the field in active service, now the date of his ordination has taken the place of the page number, indicating that he is "without charge." Sometimes in Conference or Association reports the names of ministers of the gospel in such cases are followed by the letters "W. C."

To the untutored mind of the ordinary observer "W. C." may have no meaning at all; or these cabalistic capitals may be to such minds suggestive of the dignity of an honorary degree! But since forcing the confidence of The Man on the Shelf we have been stirred by the discovery that to him and to his comrades in retirement—and to their wives!—"W. C." may stand for "— several ills that visit earth, Brought forth at night, with a sinister birth," to quote crusty Ben Jonson. Question the pocket-books of these veterans concerning the significance of "W. C." and those worn old receptacles might truthfully respond "Without Cash." Walk with the "retired" ones past some great city market-place or little corner grocery—alas! that they so often walk past these places bearing no "deal box to carry groceries in," (Goldsmith)—and it might be revealed that to them "W. C." means "Without Credit."

If whispers from the Shelf could reach our dull ears bringing answer to our querying why retired ministers and their wives should sometimes be emphasizing their retirement by "living so unto themselves, refusing to take any part in the social functions of the church," it might be found that to them "W. C." means "Without Clothes" suitable for such occasions. Could the old bank-books be examined—relics of former days when these good people ministered and were somewhat ministered unto—the Book of Back Dates might reveal that to these servants of the church "W. C." means "Without Checks." "Without Charge" may often be equivalent to all sorts of conditions that break into smithers the fond dream of "freedom from responsibilities," "a time now for leisurely reading and reflection," and "a peaceful facing of the westerling sun."

But why should he be "without charge?" Is there not some quiet corner somewhere in which a little flock may be found needing such shepherding as he is still able to render? In my simplicity I put these questions to The Man on the Shelf. With a sad smile playing about the corners of his mouth—I had often come upon the "sad smile" in the "best sellers," but that day I came face to face with the real thing, and I was led to wonder, afterward, at the way of the world that so readily flings its doubloons into the coffers of the men who paint that smile on the faces of story-book personages, that same world meanwhile pricking the same sort of smile on the countenances of flesh-and-blood men of worthier service by giving grudgingly, if at all, to the treasuries that supply their need—with a sad smile he answered: "My place has always been in the quiet corners, and now even those secluded places seem to have outgrown me."

"You are still able to preach, are you not?" I asked.

"Yes, most of the time, no doubt—in my way—though health is much broken," was the reply. "But perhaps I have never had what my favorite essayist, A. C. Benson, calls 'the art of impressive statement,' nor 'the subtler charm of originality which enables one to present old truths in a new and arresting light.' And now that the vigor and the nerve of youth and middle age are no longer mine I have nothing left that even the quiet corner folk seem to desire. The passion for 'some new thing' has found its way well into the out-of-the-way places in this restless age—and in this I rejoice, for have I not been preaching all through the years of my active service an unfolding gospel, a 'more excellent ministry' of the church as the years come and go? Why should I regret that neither my old manna, nor my manner, nor my manuscript satisfies the new generation? In a developing society it is inevitable that the 'little systems' of one generation, having had 'their day,' should 'cease to be,' and that men once in the harness should come to the shelf. Jonathan Edwards thrilled the auditors of his day so that they held to the backs of the pews before them in their eagerness to catch his message, and he delivered his sermon with manuscript and tallow dip held close to his near-sighted eyes. But he couldn't do that now. Both tallow dips and manuscripts have gone out of fashion—had their day and ceased to be. Pardon the trace of facetiousness. A strain of humor in a man helps to make shelf-life tolerable."

A line from Browning flashed through my mind:

"You are a sermon, though your sermon's naught."

But I kept it to myself.

I ventured to pry still further into the affairs of The Man on the Shelf: "You were able, I trust, during your term of active service, to lay aside something for your support in the years after retirement?"

He had been looking me straight in the eye, after the manner of the unashamed; but at this thrust of mine his gaze sought the floor.

"Yes, a meager amount. But"—the "sad smile" appeared again; and with that he was silent.

"Is it not adequate to your present needs?" I further probed.

"It is not available just now," he replied.

"Ah, an unwise investment?" I asked.

"A bag with holes, the holes due largely to a sudden change of temperature caused by this unforeseen war," he replied—another dash of facetiousness, relieving the extreme seriousness of the case.

A captious Imp began to whisper: "Just what might be expected of a preacher! These mild-minded, visionary fellows are easily caught by any scheme printed in bond or bank-note style."

I gave the Imp a rap on the knuckles that sent him to the further corner of his kennel quaking like a whipped monkey.

"Be it known unto you that shrewd business men as well as visionary preachers are often caught in an investment collapse!" I thundered, in tones which the Imp well understood but which did not reach the ears of The Man on the Shelf.

To him I suggested: "There is the Ministerial Relief Society. Have you applied there for such aid as might be secured from that quarter?"

I did not get an immediate answer. The man seemed to be choking back something that was bubbling for utterance but which he seemed desirous of first bringing well under control. At last he said:

"Perhaps approaching senility breeds senseless sensitiveness, but I cannot bring myself to 'apply for aid' to a relief society so long as we can keep soul and body together without doing so. In that, as you see, we have thus far succeeded—no matter how—honorably, however, I assure you. May I say to you something I have never mentioned to any other person? The thought of applying to a relief society for aid gives me a beggarly feeling. Am I super-sensitive? An army chaplain filling out his application for the pension that is considered due him from the government for services rendered is not subjected to the humiliation of seeking aid from a relief society. Do not understand that as a fling at the church. I am not willing to seem to be censuring the church for being less considerate than is the Federal Government. In all sincerity I have been singing from my early youth, and still sing, 'I love 'thy church, O God!'

and so far as circumstances permit I shall be true to the pledge that follows:

'For her my tears shall fall,
For her my prayers ascend,
To her my cares and toils be given
Till toils and cares shall end.'

I should as soon speak the word of censure of my mother as of the church. But perhaps mother made some mistakes. Her head may not always have caught her heart's cue. And so I think it is but an inadvertence that the Protestant church has failed to invest with the dignity of a well-earned wage the benefit which it may be able to provide for its employes who have come to the time of their retirement. I should be willing to make application for a pension that should be considered my due for services rendered; but to apply for aid from a relief society—I confess to you there is something in me that shrinks at the thought of it. Could you do it?"

Not much was said after that. When at last I left the veteran trying to face courageously on the Shelf the years that remain to him, I was impressed by an apparent purpose in his part to give no quarter to Self-Pity—though, as Benson says, "it is not wrong to be attacked by self-pity any more than it is wrong to have a cold in the head—both are the result of some sort of disorganization of the frame. What is wrong, in both cases, is to allow oneself to be incapacitated by it." It was certainly not Self-Pity that lodged with the Man on the Shelf. Rather, I think of him as one who in his lack looks daily to his God and bravely cries:

"I do not pray that Thou
Keep me from any wound,
Though I fall low from thrust and blow,
Forced fighting to the ground;
But give me wit to hide
My hurt from all men's sight,
And for my need, the while I bleed,
Lord, grant me strength to fight."

WITH OUR MISSIONARY COLPORTERS

Among the Mormons

Rev. Henry W. Pratt has served for many years as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society. His special field of labor has been among the Mormons, but he has also been able to minister to the spiritual needs of many non-Mormons. Some time ago he carried on a good work among the miners located in the mining town of Helper, Utah, of which we have an excellent view in the picture before us. In a recent report Mr. Pratt writes:

"I returned on the first of the month from a trip to Idaho. It was a hard trip, physically, mentally and spiritually, and I was reminded of my Scripture motto, 'Endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.' The message, 'We are praying for you,' that comes to me from the Tract Society from time to time, is an inspiring one, and I know that the prayers are answered, for I am helped in my work, and my Leader goes before me, and I follow Him.

"Often as I stand at the door of a home I have to say, 'I am not a book agent nor a commercial man, but a missionary,' and usually these words procure an entrance for me.

"The high cost of living has resulted in some diminution of sales. The Mormons usually have large families. They are a pleasure-seeking people. Amusements form a part of their religious exercises, especially dancing, which they say is taught in the Bible! Moving picture shows in every town take many dimes and quarters, and this is true not only of Mormon but of non-Mormon communities as well.

"The first town I visited last month was Arco, Idaho. There I found a Mormon temple and a Baptist church. The people were cordial. The Baptist pastor and his family bought a book and appreciated my call. A lady of the Christian Science faith bought one book, a Mormon lady another book, and I succeeded in placing a number of Scripture cards in the homes. Arco is only a small farming community, but it is growing.

"In the town of Roberts I had my best call upon a Swedish lady of the Mormon faith. She was very pleased with the books and cards that I carried, and bought quite a number of them. She is a pronounced Mormon. She has seventeen children, and I visited several of them who were married, in their own homes. The mother invited me to call when I came to town again.

"The next place I visited was Du Bois, Idaho. This is a small town with no church organization, though occasionally a minister comes there from another place. I disposed of several books and Scripture cards and had some good visits in the homes. This town is quite off from the main thoroughfare, and is seldom visited by Christian workers, so I was quite welcome.

"In the State of Utah I visited Midvale, a smelter town near Salt Lake, inhabited chiefly by Mormons, with a good many foreigners including Italians, Greeks, Austrians, and Scandinavians. In one of the Mormon homes I visited the father bought a Bible Story Book.

"In another town I met a Mr. Brown, who told me that he and his daughter were life members of the American Tract Society.

"In closing I thank you for your interest in your worker in this field. May the Lord bless and prosper the Tract Society's work everywhere."

MINERS' HOMES IN HELPER, UTAH

Reaching the Foreign-Born

Miss Sara E. Stambaugh, a missionary colporter who is working in the State of Pennsylvania, writes:

"The Lord has given me the privilege of talking with many foreign children concerning their salvation, and I have given them tracts.

"Lately I have become acquainted with a Jewish family who listen attentively to what I say and ask questions about our faith. I expect some day to see fruit from this effort.

"Five or six times I have addressed public meetings, and have made about twenty calls. All the books that I have sold have been attentively read, and I know that good is being accomplished. I thoroughly believe in good reading and hope to help many more people not only to believe in it but to get it and read it as I do.

"The Lord has graciously supplied all my need and marvelously kept me, and I am trusting Him to use me more and more."

In Pennsylvania

Mr. John Martinco is carrying the story of the Gospel in the printed page to the foreigners living in and near Pittsburgh, Pa. He writes:

"In some places I had the privilege of speaking about our blessed Redeemer where no one else would have the courage to visit the people except the liquor agents. Certainly the latter reap a rich harvest, especially at one particular locality where I expected to dispose of a good deal of Christian literature, but to my great surprise I found that there was no desire for literature but only for liquor. Indeed in several houses I was told to throw away my books and rather sell whisky, which the people said they would buy, but they would take no books. And they really meant what they said. I never saw so many empty beer bottles in all my life as I saw there. Every yard was full of bottles and there were many even on the street. And yet the people all claimed to be Christian—either Greek or Roman Catholic!

"Who is responsible for all this? Not the poor, ignorant people, but their leaders. And American Christians, too, are to blame, for we have in our power to destroy the liquor business which is the greatest enemy of all human kind, if we only unite together under the banner of our Master Jesus Christ."

Appreciated Literature

An incident related by Mr. William F. Mellott, a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society in the State of Ohio, shows how much the Christian literature issued by the Society is appreciated by the people who receive it. Mr. Mellott writes:

"My work seems to grow more interesting each year. I am now working in territory where I worked some years ago. There seems to be vital interest in good literature. For example, a few days ago I stepped upon the porch of a home I had previously visited. The lady of the house happened to be coming to the door as I came up.

"'Why, how do you do!' was her cordial greeting. 'Aren't you the young man who was circulating books in this neighborhood a couple of years ago?'

"'I came through here two years ago,' I replied.

"'Have you the temperance book, To the Third Generation?' she asked.

"'I have,' was my answer.

"'Well,' she replied, 'I have been wishing you would come back here. I have been trying to get that book for over a year.'

"This is simply one of the many signs of interest manifested by people who have learned of the excellent literature published by the American Tract Society."

Exchanged for a Day

By L. D. Stearns

MR. DRAYTON still kept her seat at the breakfast table, although several moments had passed since the slamming of the hall door announced the departure of the last of the Drayton brood. Usually, she was at her work long before that event.

The warm sun streamed royally through the shining glass of the three windows. The curtains, of daintiest net, were spick and span from yesterday's wash. The bit of yellow fluff in the gilded cage, by the South window, poured forth a perfect flood of melody. And below, a tangle of pinks nodded fragrantly in the morning breeze. But Mrs. Drayton, unseeing and unhearing, sat staring blankly at the dishes waiting to be gathered up and washed.

Her hair, plentifully strewn with gray, was pushed far back from a high forehead. Her face sagged tiredly. A frown gathered slowly between her eyes. "I declare," said she, "I thought, yesterday, I had my hands full. And now Emeline's got to have a new dress. Goodness knows how I'll manage! I don't."

The door clicked. Next minute, her sister, Bess Willett, came swinging gracefully in.

The newcomer was a couple of years older than Mrs. Drayton, but in the glossy mass above her unruffled brow not a grey thread was visible. Her skin was fresh and fair; her cheeks pink; her eyes bright.

She crossed to the window and snapped a white finger and thumb at the bit of gold. "That's glorious, Lady Bird," declared she. For a second, her quick glance appeared to take in every corner of the room. Then it rested on her sister. "Tired, Trix?" she inquired sympathetically.

Mrs. Drayton pushed back her chair. "I don't know," she declared slowly, "what it means not to be tired. I don't know what it means to feel as you look. I don't know what it means to be glad, as you're glad. But I do know what it means to wish it was—over."

Her gaze wandered outward to where, in the distance, marble slabs gleamed white in the morning sun. "It's a good place for resting," said she defiantly, "in the churchyard. I wish I were going there, this instant. You ought to thank God, Bess Willett, that you knew enough to stay free. Love's all right when you're twenty, and have sparkles in your eyes and roses in your cheeks. But it takes it a very short time to cool, when they're gone." Two tears dropped slowly to the faded wrapper.

The other woman appeared not to notice. She thrust a slender finger between the gilded bars of the cage. The sunshine rested on the dusky mass of her hair like a halo. "Then," protested she lightly, "why not keep the sparkles and the roses? We don't any of us get much, Trix, without paying for it, you know. And sometimes, when we're holding out what we think is full measure of payment—running over, even,—it isn't the kind that's required, after all. It's too much like a man going in to purchase diamonds, and instead of finding out the price he throws down a handful of coppers and expects the most exquisite stone of the lot." Then, with seeming irrelevance: "Why didn't you rest up yesterday, instead of washing those curtains? I was noticing only the other day how well they'd kept."

Rising, Mrs. Drayton began piling up the plates. "Bess Willett," she announced decisively, "I'm tired to death of all this talk about giving cheer, and smiles, and happiness, and such stuff. When a body's tired to death there isn't much heart back of their smiling. And when no one cares whether you smile, or not, there isn't a great welling fountain of joy inside to make you feel like smiling. It's well enough for you, without a care on earth, to smile. Why, you look twenty years younger than I. There's nothing to keep you from smiling."

For a moment, the eyes of the woman opposite reached out—out, to the horizon's edge; something wavered and darkened in their depths and for a moment, the full lips tightened. Then, with a slow turning of her head, the smile returned to her eyes. Crossing to the table, she took a plate from her sister's hand. "Trix," said she eagerly, "let's exchange lives today. You take my place; I'll take yours."

Beatrice Drayton laughed mirthlessly. "I guess," retorted she, "you don't know what you're talking about."

"Indeed, I do!" Bess Willett sat down, and resting both hands on the snowy cloth she let her gaze wander slowly over the table. "Back on the farm," she said, "I used to do housework. Remember? I'll keep this house, and no one shall starve, or pine away for lack of sympathy or appreciation. But," she nodded emphatically, "John will find his own paper and Emmy will blacken her own boots, if they happen to need it, and Milly will hunt up her fresh handkerchief, or go without. And they'll love their Aunt Bess every whit as well as if she turned herself inside out for 'em."

"I've got to start a new dress for Emmy." The mother's tone was tense.

"Emmy's pink one," quoth Aunt Bess, "is plenty good enough for a fifteen-year-old girl to wear to a party."

Into Mrs. Drayton's cheeks swept a sudden flame. "My girl isn't going to be ashamed of her dress," said she hotly, "not while her mother's got eyes to see and fingers to hold a needle."

"Now! Now!" Reaching out, her sister pushed her into a chair. "There are two ways of looking at a thing," declared she earnestly. "I tell you, Trix, there's a world in the art of elimination. Now," with her eyes wandering critically about the room, "suppose we do away with those curtains; discard half the pictures and the vases, and the plants; take all that silver, that's not in use, off the sideboard, and—" her voice deepened, "in this way the mother of this home will gain an hour or two a week, right there, in which to tone up her soul!"

"But, Bess,—"

"Not a but! You go over to my apartment, Trix, and follow my schedule for today to a tee. At ten, I'm due at Winn's to be fitted for a new gown. You'll do, as well as I; we can wear each other's dresses to a dot—always could. I planned wearing that new undersuit of lawn you'll find on my bed; and when you take your bath, use plenty of those lavender salts in the water. They're delightfully refreshing. Then, put on that new challis and you're me. Get lunch on my ticket at Wolvene's; go home—my home—and rest for an hour then read up and make notes on the 'Late Trend of Literature.' You'll find any number of books of reference on the table."

"Me?"

"Why not? You used to love literature even better than I." Her sister's voice was cool, with a little thread of loving raillery. "Then, from four to five, take in the Woman's Meeting at City Hall. You'll be in your element, Trix. You've just forgotten—that's all. But it will come rushing back like a flood,—how to get into the swing of things,—if you give yourself a chance. Go along, and—" in a soft aside, "God be with you!"

Protesting, but submitting at length, Mrs. Drayton went forth into the morning sunshine.

In her sister's quiet apartment a sudden repose seemed slowly to wrap itself about her. An exquisite vase, in which a single rose drooped gracefully, was the only piece of bric-a-brac the room possessed. The couch, piled high with cushions, subtly suggested rest.

As she began the preparations for the bath, her face was curiously grim. "It's no wonder," said she aloud, "that Bess looks so young. She hasn't a care in the world. It's no wonder the children adore her."

Leaning forward, she gazed steadily into the glass. A dull pain darkened her eyes. The words that had floated up from the garden last night, when the children were talking, sounded freshly in her ears. "Dell Maynard's going to ask her mother to come into school tomorrow. Mercy! I hope Ma won't come!" Emmy's shrill treble announced; and Milly's clear voice had answered: "I suppose it's awful, but honest, Emmy, I did hate to go into church with mother last Sunday. Her clothes look so old-fashioned, don't you know?"

Turning, she remarked stoically, "I knew before they didn't care anything about me, so what's the use of moping? Even John never so much as gives me a smile. I wonder how it would seem to be kissed!" As though it were a shame to so much as think of such an occurrence the blood rushed hotly to her cheeks. In sudden confusion her hand shook, and the bottle of lavender salts she was tipping lurched jerkily. Three times the amount she had intended to use spilled into the bathtub. "I guess," she observed tersely, "Bess'd say that was a generous amount!"

The faint perfume rising from the water seemed intangibly to waft her into another world, and presently as she robed her body in Bess's dainty garments an almost forgotten thrill touched her. Then the telephone rang. "It's Miss Dane," came over the wire. "I wonder, would you like Miss Denton's hour for a shampoo? She's just given it up. It's from one to two o'clock."

A moment, Mrs. Drayton considered. That was the hour Bess had scheduled for rest. "Yes," she replied, at length, "I'll come."

"I haven't had a shampoo for years," she murmured, turning from the telephone. "And how I love it!" and as she took down and donned the new challis the merest hint of brightness touched her eyes.

An hour later, as before a long mirror she critically surveyed the soft-toned, exquisitely fitting new gown, a tinge of faintest pink softened the sallowness of her cheeks. "I've a good mind," said she wistfully, to Mrs. Winn, "to get me a new dress. I haven't had one for ages. I had really forgotten how good it made one feel!"

The dressmaker frowned,—she and Mrs. Drayton had been schoolmates, years back. "It's a shame, Trix Drayton," said she bluntly, taking out a mouthful of pins, "for a woman to drop her life as you have done."

Then standing erect, she gave her broad, capable shoulders a little shake. "I've been wanting this long time to say some things that I thought. Now, I'm going to say 'em! You've a man who's all around square. And you've as nice children as ever lived. And what are you giving 'em, Trix Drayton?" A challenging note sounded in her voice. "You're giving 'em a slave, instead of a wife and a mother. You're giving 'em a blasted, instead of a full-blossomed life; letting the one a good God gave you blast, like a blasted rose. No one admires a blasted bud, Trix Drayton. You don't! Haven't I seen you, times without number, bending over your flowers, plucking the blasted and imperfect ones? You love the fully developed posies best. You can't help it."

Beatrice Drayton slipped out of the silken gown. Not a word was spoken as she dressed, put on her hat and picked up her gloves. Then she stepped swiftly across the room and held out both hands to her old time schoolmate. "I see," she said simply. "Heaven grant it isn't too late to start growing. Where'd you get your first real spiritual nourishment, Fan?"

Fanny Winn raised honest, grave eyes. "You'd best start on your knees," she suggested slowly. "I fussed around with other things, quite a bit, before I found out. You won't go wrong that way. And it's easier than you think, Trix, once you're on the right road. We're made to love sweetness, and beauty, and growth, you know; so it's sort of like—getting on the road home!"

With steady resolution in her eyes Mrs. Drayton went forth once more into the clear, sunshiny air. "By God's help, I'm going to start on the right road this very day," she said to herself, as the door closed behind her.

It was tea time when she entered her own home once more. The family were gathered about the tea table, and as she joined them, almost diffidently, yet with a certain dignity both new and compelling, a little stir went around the table. The girls exchanged glances of surprise.

About her face, her hair lay softly; her eyes, rested and really eager now, were filled with a quiet light. A new gown of soft, clinging material cut in the latest style, replaced the shabby one she had worn going away in the morning. "I guess, Emmy," she announced quietly, "you'll have to make your pink dress do for the party next week. I decided I was next in order for a new gown. Hereafter, we'll take turns and—"

Emmy's shrill treble broke into her words. Her face was aglow with eager pride. She clapped her hands. "I don't care," she cried. "But Mother—Mother! Friday's Exercise Day, and I've got a part. Won't you come in, and hear it?"

Just for a second, a quick hurt rankled in the mother's heart. Then an illuminating flood of understanding rushed across her. It wasn't clothes. It was the new spirit to which her little daughter was paying homage. "All right, dear," she answered quietly, "I'll come."

She turned to her sister Bess, "I enjoyed that Woman's Meeting so much," said she, "and so I joined. I'm going to take your advice and clear out some of these useless things tomorrow. It will give me a chance to study up a bit, and rest."

From the head of the table the eyes of John Drayton slowly looked his wife up and down. Then he spoke: "Why, Mother," said he, "you've lost ten years somewhere, today! And that dress's the exact stuff you had on the night I asked you to be my wife." Pushing back his chair he stepped to her side. "I'm mighty glad," he continued emphatically, "that you didn't turn me down. You'd better take another day off, soon, if it can make you look like that. It makes me feel like courting all over again!" and bending, he kissed her, a little awkwardly, but with a world of tenderness that made her feel as if she were a young maiden once more.

Lost Ideals

BY A. MARIA CRAWFORD.

*Ever the luring lights of something unattained
Have shown for me across the pathless waste,
And when the glowing brilliancy at last has waned,
Behold with ideals greater am I faced!
But each, a dream, has passed like ships upon the sea
Which sent no welcome, flaming signal home to me.
And yet I know pursuit, though vain, for each ideal
Has helped me push my way through weary years
Into a fuller knowledge of all life, the real,
The true, which more than compensates for tears.
Thus do I climb the heights, whipped on by failure's rod, Where one day I shall look into "face of God.*

God's Voice Calling Through the Shadows

By Edgar L. Vincent

IT MAY have been in the silent watches of the night that the Prodigal Son who had wandered from his father's house came to himself. It is often so. The calls of the world so distract us that we do not hear the voice calling to us as long as the sun is above the horizon and we can press forward the business which so absorbs us. And God is very patient. He waits until the night shadows have deepened and we have put aside the things of the day. It was after the boy Samuel had gone to his rest that God spoke to him. Even then for a time the boy did not recognize the voice which came. It needed to be repeated over and over again, and finally to be interpreted by Eli, before Samuel realized the source of the heavenly summons.

And so it may have been when the work of the day was over that God spoke to the Prodigal Son. Tired of the wretched life he had been leading, how heavy his footsteps must have been when at last he had cared for the swine for the night, taking his supper from the husks they had missed, the only source of supply that he had. With bowed head and weary soul he crept away to lie down for the night. Where was it he put off his sandals that night? Was it under the shelter of some friendly hedge? Surely, there could have been nothing better than a miserable hut somewhere out in the fields for this outcast herdsman of an alien swine-grower.

And when his feet had been freed from the dusty shoes, did he not sit there in the gloaming as the stars broke through the blue one by one, his face turned away toward the home of his boyhood? That was a good home—did ever a boy have one that was better? If he had only realized it, while he had a chance! What a terrible failure his life had been! Hopes turned to ashes! Dreams broken by the rudest awakening! Calls to pleasure which led away into sin in its most awful form! The hot tears must have coursed down his face as he thought of it now, sitting alone in the twilight.

For at last he knew just what he had done. He could not help seeing that he had turned his back on everything that was worth having. He had used up life's very best. He had gone the pace! He had seen the lights in the distance and had followed them until they went flickering out in the swamp, like the will o' the wisp they were. What was there left for him? What but sin and shame and sorrow! With the cold earth for his bed and his only pillow an arm bent upward under his head he lay down, thinking that to-morrow, when it came, would be only another round of servile watching the creatures that were little more miserable than was he himself!

And then God spoke to the man of the broken heart! Sometimes it seems as if we never are quite ready to listen until some terrible thing has come to us. When the soul is riven by suffering, like a tree split by the thunderbolt; when everything else is lost and the sky is turned to midnight blackness, then we have time to stand still and hear what God has to say.

How was it that God spoke to the man lying under the dew-moistened hedge that night? Who knows? He has so many ways of whispering to you and me! It may have been that the wanderer caught the words of an old psalm, sifting down through the mist of the years gone by. It was father's voice, sounding out with faith sublime the words of the Sweet Singer of Israel. And was not that the gentler, more subdued tone of his mother's voice, chiming in with that of the priest of the household? Yes, and he could not mistake the note which fell from the lips of his brother, as together they chanted at bedtime the sweet hymn of the long ago.

Or was it that he dreamed of a day when his father sat by his side somewhere in the sweet-smelling fields and they talked together of the things of the coming kingdom? God has many ways of calling the heart back to Himself. Who ever forgets the little prayer learned from mother at her knee? When we least think of it, through the rift of the day's work come the words of counsel as they fell from the lips of father or mother when life was at its spring.

And so, whether it were the trill of an angel's harp or the chirping of a cricket, singing its harvest song, or the barking of a dog away beyond the hedges and the jagged mountain paths, be it what it may, something stirred the man's soul to its depths and "he came to himself!"

He came to himself! All the hot, restless fever gone! the allurements of the past broken in force! The fires of passion all burned out! The wild, half insane fancies swept away forever! He was himself once more—his own calm, steady self, not the rudderless hulk of a man, he might have been, for God had put back into his heart a new hope, a faith in himself he had never thought he would know again, a deep longing to get back home and be what God wanted him to be!

How good it is that when God tears up the soil of the soul to wrench from it the foul weeds set there by sin, He does not leave an empty place in the life; He plants once more the roses; He drops again the seed which will spring up and bear wheat, a hundredfold more than we ever dreamed; He gives back beauty for ashes: He wipes away the tears and brings the oil of gladness!

God's voice calling through the shadows! Have you heard it? Oh, the substance we have wasted in riotous living! Oh, the gems of beauty we have let slip through our fingers over the vessel's side into the fathomless deep! Oh, the treasures of riches in Christ Jesus we have flung to the winds of heaven! And now is it not full time that we should lean out and listen to God's voice calling to us? He is pleading with us with every passing moment, and shall we not hear and heed and go back to the Father's house?

Love's Touch

BY ANNE PORTER JOHNSON.

*Love softly touches dull, sad eyes,
Downcast, and blind with tears,
And makes them glow with glad surprise
That long-lost joy appears!*

*Love clasps the idle, nerveless hands,
And charges them with power
To dare, to strike, to break the bands
Within which victims cover.*

*Love bathes the weary, limping feet,
And starts them on with grace,
Away! Away—with running fleet,
To win life's greatest race!*

*Love soothes the wounded, broken soul—
With cooling, fragrant balm
It heals, and from the life made whole,
Rings out a joyful psalm!*

*O Love, I wish my touch, like thine,
Might beautify and heal:
Thy secret rare I crave for mine,
To me thy power reveal.*

Editorial Notes

The Sacredness of Toil

With the opening of the month of September we are reminded in a twofold way of the dignity and the sacredness of human toil. The first Sunday in the month has been designated as Labor Sunday, and pastors of Christian Churches everywhere are urged to give appropriate attention to this occasion, while the first Monday of the month, known as Labor Day, calls for a national recognition of the subject of labor in its varied aspects on the part of the general public.

Some thoughts that are exceedingly pertinent to this topic are finely expressed by Dr. Charles Carroll Albertson, in his article, "Blessed Be Work," which constitutes the leading feature in this issue of our paper.

The emphasis upon the subject of labor which comes from the observance of Labor Sunday and the celebration of the Labor Day holiday is timely and appropriate, and it should bear fruit in many ways that are distinctly helpful.

While Labor Sunday is concerning primarily with the subject of our daily toil, it is not inappropriate that some attention should also be paid to the matter of our spiritual activity. Indeed there is unquestionably more need for emphasizing the obligation of Christian service than the duty of secular toil, since in most cases we are constrained to labor by our physical necessities, while the impulse to Christian toil comes from purely spiritual motives.

In many churches the month of September marks the resumption of various lines of Christian activity that have been more or less interrupted by the summer vacation season. This is the reason for the Rally Day exercises that are held in many places.

Rally Day calls all Christians to more faithful service and to a larger spirit of consecration. It should not mark a merely passing enthusiasm, but it should serve as a starting point for a more efficient Christian service which will be productive of larger results for the Kingdom of God.

Desperate Need in Syria

To the already long list of small nationalities that are great sufferers through the European War must be added the Holy Land, which recent advices tell us is in the throes of awful destitution and of deplorable need.

The land in which Jesus lived when He was here upon the earth is suffering because all draft animals were commandeered and all crops were requisitioned by the military authorities as soon as Turkey entered upon the war. To add to the distress of the people a plague of locusts devoured nearly all the existing vegetation, and now the Syrians are literally starving.

Efforts to relieve the physical necessities of these ancient people are being made through the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, which is working in close conjunction with the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and other relief agencies. It is hoped that by the aid thus extended the threatened extermination of this historic race may be averted, and by the help thus given the Christians of America will be more closely linked than ever before with the people of the land where Jesus once walked.

Temperance Facts

Facts are the strongest arguments that can be brought to bear on any subject, and the facts that are constantly coming to light in regard to temperance show that the argument for total abstinence and prohibition is overwhelming.

Recently some statistics were furnished by a representative of one of the leading life insurance companies which constitute an unanswerable argument for temperance. These statistics, based upon the experience of seven American life insurance companies and one Canadian company, show that mortality is from ten to thirty per cent. lower among abstainers than among non-abstainers. It is shown further that mortality among total abstainers is markedly lower than among "temperate" drinkers, and very much lower than among "moderate" drinkers. The mortality among those who at the date of application for insurance took two glasses of whisky a day, but did not drink to excess, is eighty per cent. in excess of the normal. There is an extra mortality of forty per cent. among the policyholders who drank to excess at least five years prior to date of application for insurance, but had been temperate for five years before acceptance.

The Mission of Christian Literature Abroad

What Christian literature means to the missionaries on the foreign field is indicated in the letters of acknowledgment which are received in response to the cash appropriations that are annually sent by the American Tract Society to the mission stations abroad. We have already shared some of these letters with our readers, but there are some others lately received which we feel are worthy of reproduction, as they disclose conditions on the foreign field which are of interest to all.

Mr. A. W. Greenman, Treasurer of the Italy Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Rome, Italy, thus acknowledges the receipt of an appropriation of $100.00 sent in aid of the publication of the weekly periodical called L'Evangelista.

"We are very thankful for your timely aid, and it will be particularly useful just now, when we are giving special attention to the sending of the paper to the Italian soldiers who ask for it."

Rev. D. G. Collins, Manager of the American Presbyterian Mission Press at Chiengmai, Siam, which furnishes a supply of Christian literature for the Laos people writes:

"Many thanks indeed for the draft of $100 sent by the American Tract Society. It certainly means much to us at this time when there is such a call for our tracts and other Christian literature. Owing to the great European war the prices of paper and other press supplies have almost doubled in the past few months.

"During the past fourteen months thousands of tracts have gone into Chienug Hung State, a part of which is in Unan Province, China. We are planning to make such changes in our type that we may be able to supply the millions of Tai-speaking people who reside within the bounds of China."

Rev. Frank P. Gilman, of the American Presbyterian Mission in the Island of Hainan, China, writes:

"Permit me to acknowledge the receipt of your draft for the use of the Mission to be expended in behalf of Christian literature.

"Permit me also, on behalf of this Mission, to thank you for entrusting to it this sum toward carrying on the work we are endeavoring to do."

Rev. W. L. Ferguson, Treasurer of the American Baptist Telugu Mission writes:

"Kindly accept warm thanks for your contribution to the general work for Christ in this great land of India. I wish that you might have been with us in our recent special outdoor meetings for Hindus. We have been having great crowds and fine attention. Tracts are received with eagerness, and not only are they read by the receiver, but often one man will read aloud to those who are unable to read, and so one tract will be shared by half a dozen persons. Few tracts are destroyed by opposers of the gospel; most of them are carried home and are made to do service there."

The Consecration of Home Life.

The story of Cornelius the centurion furnishes us with a splendid example of piety in the home. Though probably not what the Jews called a "proselyte of the gate," Cornelius seems to have belonged among that class of Gentiles who had so far benefited by their contact with the Jewish people as to have become convinced that the Hebrew faith was the true religion, and who, therefore, worshipped the true God, studied the Scriptures of the Old Testament and observed various Jewish customs, such, for example, as their regular hours of prayer.

The Family Altar

It is plain from the Scripture narrative that Cornelius maintained the family altar in his home. One of the best ways in which to bring about a consecration of the home life is by the maintenance of the family altar.

In these busy, rushing days, especially in the great cities of our land, it is often difficult to assemble all the members of the family at the same time for family worship. But if it is not practicable to have all the family together at the morning hour, the evening hour will serve just as well, and where there are young children, the evening meal can be made to serve very appropriately as the time for a brief season of family devotion.

Each family must study its own conditions, but it is certainly worth any effort that can be made to keep the family altar as one of the features of the home life.

The Family Library

Some one has said, "The brain of a home is its library." Christianity calls for a consecrated brain, and this means that the home library should be consecrated to the honor and the service of the Master. In other words, all the reading in the home should be in harmony with a life consecrated to the Lord Jesus Christ. Every book and every periodical that enters a Christian home should be submitted to this test: "Will it aid the consecration of the home life?"

If a book or a magazine is impure or irreligious, if it does not conform to a high moral standard, or if it is vulgar or trashy, then such a publication is not deserving of a place in any Christian home.

Religion in the Home

The home life is truly consecrated when religion in all its purity and simplicity dominates the home. The spirit of consecration should find expression in many ways.

A consecrated home will be a helpful home. Cornelius and his family showed their piety not only by their prayers but by their alms. So true Christianity will make itself known in deeds of helpfulness.

A consecrated home will diffuse its influence beyond the immediate members of the family circle. The Scripture text shows that through the influence of Cornelius there were devout soldiers about him (Acts 10:7). So a truly devout family will diffuse the spirit of Christianity among all those who come within range of influence, and even those who are beyond the immediate circle of the household will nevertheless catch something of the contagion of holiness.

A consecrated home will be a source of brightness and joy. Just as a light in a house will send its rays through the open windows, so Christianity in the home will be a beacon light of salvation for souls who are tossing on the dark seas of doubt and sin.

Psalms 145 to 150 inclusive form a distinct portion of the Book of Psalms, and constitute a festal anthem, which has been of large service in the worship both of the Hebrews and of the Christian Church.

Psalm 145 is a worthy introduction to this festal anthem, to which it serves as a kind of prefatory mediation. It is a noble doxology, addressed to Israel's God as the supreme King, whose kingdom is universal and eternal. It celebrates His majesty, greatness and goodness; His providential care for all His creation; and His constant love toward those who love and fear Him.

The one who utters this splendid hymn of praise is really the nation of Israel, speaking through the Psalmist, who so completely identifies himself with the whole nation as to lose sight of the limitations of his own individual personality.

The unceasing praise which this Psalm contemplates is to be rendered by the nation, in which as one generation passes away, another takes up the strain to hand it on in turn to its successor.

Wherein God Is Great

A close study of this Psalm will reveal to us many of the manifestations of the greatness of God.

God is great in His work of creation. The world and all that is therein pay unceasing tribute to the greatness of His majesty.

God is great in the acts of His providence. Human history reveals His mighty deeds, and at the present moment we are witnessing some of His terrible acts.

God is great in His goodness. The Psalmist sings of the righteousness of God, which is like the great mountains. God is infinitely good, and his goodness is shown in His loving kindness and tender mercy. God is good to all, says the Psalmist, and His tender mercies are over all His works.

God is great in His grace. Human comprehension can hardly measure the extent of His graciousness. But God is infinite in all His attributes, and His grace is all-sufficient for every human need.

God is great in His power, His majesty, His compassion, His love, and in every quality of His being. And since He is so great, He should receive from us our adoration, our praise and our service.

A Great Religion

Since God is so great, it follows that our religion is a great religion. Indeed it is the greatest of all faiths, and according to the teaching of the Psalmist and of all the writers of Holy Scripture, it is destined to be a universal religion, claiming the allegiance of all mankind.

Often we fail to realize the fact that Christianity is destined to conquer all other systems of religion and to become the ruling faith of the whole human race. If we would dwell more on the greatness of God, we would have a larger faith and a wider vision. We would see the ultimate triumph of the Kingdom which Christ came to establish, and we would share in the glory of the consummation of His divine plan for the redemption of humanity.

Sharing in God's Greatness

It is an inspiring thought that, as children of God, we may share in His greatness. While the thought of God's greatness should keep us humble in spirit, the knowledge that we are His children should make us eager to share in the goodness, power, love and other graces of which He is alone the true source.

Little Chances to Help.

The incident upon which our topic is based is one of the most vivid word-pictures of the Old Testament. Israel is in deadly conflict with the Amalekites, one of the most warlike nations which they encountered on their way to the Promised Land. Joshua leads the fighting hosts of Israelites in the valley of Rephidim, while Moses ascends the hill overlooking the scene of the conflict, and lifts up his hands in the attitude and spirit of prayer, holding aloft the rod of God as a symbol of victory for the chosen people of God.

The battle wages long, however, and Moses grows weary, so that his hands fall to his side. At this juncture Aaron and Hur perceive their opportunity, and seizing "a little chance to help," they hold up the hands of Moses so that they are stayed until the going down of the sun, with the result that a mighty victory is achieved over the Amalekites by the forces of Israel.

Little Deeds of Helpfulness

The practical application of our topic is plain, and we may consider briefly some of the little ways to help that are presented to us in the course of our daily lives.

Let us remember, at the outset, that none are too young to render little deeds of helpfulness. Among the Daily Bible Readings for this week are some familiar Scriptural illustrations of this fact. Children may be valuable helpers in all kinds of work, and the part which they may take in promoting the progress of the Kingdom is not to be despised.

Little deeds of helpfulness may be done by both young and old in the home. Here there is perhaps the largest sphere of usefulness that can be found anywhere in the world, for the family is the fundamental unit of our civilization, and upon the home life depends the life of the whole nation.

Helpfulness, like charity, should begin at home, but it should not end there. In the Church, the Young People's Society, the Sunday School and other Christian organizations there are endless opportunities for little deeds of helpfulness—deeds which may be very inconspicuous but which may have a very large influence in making the Church successful in its efforts to win the world for Christ.

But the obligation to improve the little chances to help is not limited to the sphere of our religious duties. We should be on the alert for opportunities of helpfulness whether great or small wherever we go. On the street, in the store, at school, in the office, in short, everywhere we go or stay, we should be ready to do the little acts of service which will help those around us on their journey through life.

Little Causes and Great Results

It is a truism that little causes often lead to great results. The planting of the tiny acorn results in the growth of the mighty oak. By means of the mechanism of the hydraulic press the touch of a human hand is made to exert the pressure of thousands and thousands of pounds.

"Sow a thought, and you reap an act; sow an act and you reap a habit; sow a habit, and you reap a destiny." These words emphasize for us the mighty power of a single thought, and they also suggest how important a thing it is to influence the minds of those about us, so that they may think the right thoughts.

The Scriptures give us a comparative view of the religion of Israel and the religions of the heathen nations by which they were surrounded. The comparison shows us that the heathen faiths of olden times were cruel, licentious and degrading.

The religions with which Christianity comes into contact on the foreign mission fields are not those which Israel faced, for those false faiths have long since perished. But the heathen faiths of to-day have much in common with those ancient systems of unbelief.

We may dismiss with a very brief look the various heathen cults of savage and barbarous peoples. Such cults are intermingled with superstitious rites and customs which are not worthy of the name of religion. Among the vile features of these forms of superstition are cannibalism, torture, and other practices too horrible to mention.

Whatever of truth may be hidden away in the great non-Christian faiths, yet as a whole they are systems of error. They lack the essential verities of the Christian faith and they teach many, many things which are absolutely wrong.

Buddhism teaches that the highest state to be attained by the soul is that of Nirvana. But Nirvana implies the extinction of personality, and its real significance is practically nothingness.

Hinduism is a conglomerate of many superstitions, and it presents for worship an array of gods, many of which are simply the deification of lust and cruelty. India is the exponent of Hinduism, and under that false faith there have flourished the abominations of child marriage, the burning of widows, the practice of infanticide, and orgies of lust, which have made the temple worship of India a synonym for the grossest immorality.

Mohammedanism is a monotheistic faith, but it encourages polygamy and its exponent to-day is the land of Turkey—the land of unspeakable cruelty and fanaticism.

Zoroastrianism is perhaps nearer to the true faith than any of the other non-Christian religions, but its light is as darkness, when we compare the writings of Zoroaster and the teachings of Christ. Zoroaster taught that the world was under the control of two conflicting sets of forces—the powers of good and the powers of evil. But he gave no clear teaching of the sovereignty of God, the immortality of the soul or the redemption of humanity.

Confucianism is more a system of ethics than a form of religion. It teaches filial piety, which is in itself a most excellent virtue. But under Confucianism has been developed the worship of ancestors, and this has proved a serious hindrance to the progress of the Chinese race.

Christianity is not only superior to all other faiths, but it is really the only true religion. No other so-called sacred books can compare with the Bible, and no founder of any of the non-Christian faiths can compare with the noble founder of Christianity—the Lord Jesus Christ.

Our Little Folks

The Blue Box in the Attic.

BY MABEL S. MERRILL.

MOTHER RAND looked at the four downcast faces and then at the window, against which the rain was beating. She knew her young folks had planned to spend the whole of this day picking blueberries to sell so that they could have a little money to give to the Donation Party for the Children's Home just founded in the village.

"Well," began mother, "seeing that you can't go hunting outdoors for anything to help those poor babies, why not try what you can find nearer home—up in the attic, for instance?"

Chester jammed his hands into his pockets and looked gloomily at the drenched window. "There's nothing in the attic that's any good," he declared.

"Only old odds and ends," agreed Amy, and Pauline added: "We've pulled them all over a dozen times to see if there was anything fit to give away."

"All the same"—mother put her finger up to her lips mysteriously—"I know of a box of treasure up there which you must have missed. It is a square wooden box painted blue, and you'll find it pushed well back under the eaves."

"Is it gold, mother?" demanded six-year-old John, with his eyes wide open. "Hold on, I'll find it!" and he dashed up the attic stairs, with the four older ones racing after him.

They found the blue box and pulled it out to the light. Chester's eyes snapped with excitement as he unfastened the cover and threw it up. Then he sat back on his heels and stared.

"Say," he muttered, "somebody run downstairs and tell mother 'tisn't the first of April. There's nothing in this box but Grandma Thurlow's old seed catalogs."

Grandma Thurlow had been famous for her flower garden and she had saved every one of her seed catalogs for years. The box was packed full of them.

"Mother must have meant something," insisted Pauline. "She never makes silly jokes. Look, there are lots of colored pictures in these. Do you suppose—"

"That we could cut out and paste them and tie the leaves together to make gay-colored picture books for little folks that don't have much to play with?" finished Amy. "Of course we could!"

In fifteen minutes the big attic was turned into a workshop, and they soon forgot the rain which was pattering on the roof. The colored pictures of the different flowers were really beautiful and gay enough to please any child. They cut them out carefully and gummed them upon the sheets of strong white paper mother gave them from her stationery boxes, of which she happened to have an unusually large supply on hand. Opposite each picture they left a blank page, and Pauline, who was clever at making rhymes, wrote a bit of verse for each flower. Chester, who could write a beautiful hand, almost as plain as print, copied the verses in the blank spaces. Then mother stitched all the leaves together at the back to make a neat book.

There were only twelve children at the Home so far, and by laboring like bees all day the workers in the attic made twelve books, one for each child. "They're prettier than 'boughten' ones," cried Pauline, as she looked at them. "And I believe I've found an idea in the bottom of the blue box! Do you see that roll of colored tissue paper in the barrel over there, Amy? Let's make twelve flower-baskets and fill them with buttercups and daisies—children always love them

"That idea is bright enough to have come out of a treasure box," affirmed Amy. "Look now, here's another to go with it. In the middle of every basket of flowers we'll stick a horn of plenty made of stiff paper and filled with fat, ripe blueberries. There'll be time enough to get those in the morning."

"John and I will be on their trail as soon as the dew dries off," promised Chester. "And I don't think three or four early apples tucked in would do any harm."

They worked all the evening and got up early to finish and fill those baskets. They were just ready to start for the Children's Home with their load of gifts when John came trudging in at the back

Overcome Evil with Good

One day when the horse of a good man in Massachusetts happened to stray into the road, a churlish neighbor put the animal into the public pound. Meeting the owner soon after, he told him what he had done, and added: "If I catch him in the road after this, I'll do just so again." "Neighbor," replied the other, "a night or two ago I looked out of my window and saw your cattle in my meadow, and I drove them out and shut them in your yard; and if I ever catch them there at any time, I'll do it again." The man was so impressed with the reply that he took the horse out of the pound and paid the charges himself.

crept in a few moments later and found her darlings sound asleep.

The next day Aunt Bessie asked them if they would like to make a garden. "Yes, yes, Aunt Bessie," they both cried. "Let's begin at once."

They went busily to work in their own garden spots, planted their seeds and watched and cared for them daily.

Soon little shoots of green peeped out, then tiny buds; and then some strange straggly-looking leaves appeared; these were weeds, they discovered.

Winifred diligently uprooted them, but Dorothy thought it too much bother, and said anyway when the flowers bloomed, the weeds would not show.

Aunt Bessie, though interested in their gardens, offered no suggestions, preferring to let them work in their own way.

Despite Winifred's care, one weed kept on reappearing, but she did not lose courage, and conquered it at last. Her garden now bloomed luxuriously, and it was with great joy and pride that she picked the pretty flowers and decorated Aunt Bessie's table.

Little Dorothy, on the contrary, having neglected her garden, found it choked up with weeds which crushed and smothered the lovely blossoms. It was almost too late to repair the damage, and she didn't know what to do.

Aunt Bessie, stopping to look at both gardens, said: "Your two very different gardens make me think of something that I would like to tell you."

They were eager to hear, knowing that whatever Aunt Bessie had to say would prove interesting. Seating herself on the ground beside her youthful charges, she began:

"Our characters are just like garden spots filled with fertile soil; we have an abundance of good qualities; these are the seeds which we plant, and with them we can make all the world happier, just as our flowers gladden and brighten the landscape. So you see, we must guard and tend them most carefully. Little weeds, which are naughty things, must not be allowed to creep in. The big weeds, such as anger, greed, hatred and many others, will be easily found out, and no doubt quickly uprooted; little weeds, like impatience, unkind words and quick temper appear so slyly that they must be uprooted at once, and very thoroughly, for they have many tiny shoots and tendrils. If we are conscientious and alert there will be plenty of room and clear space for love, gentleness, patience and all good things to shine forth. Now, my darlings, I want you to remember all this and watch your gardens daily."

This they promised to do; and Aunt Bessie had illustrated the lesson so clearly that they never forgot it.

Upon the return of their parents they went home, and after a few weeks, Mother, noticing a great improvement in her dear little daughters, complimented them and said how happy they had made her. They then told her about their gardens and Aunt Bessie's lesson.

Mother drew them closely to her, and kissing them said: "Hereafter, I shall always call you 'My Sweet Flower Girls.'"

The Cure of Care

"Hast thou within a care so deep
It chases from thine eyelids sleep?
To thy Redeemer take that care
And change anxiety to prayer.

"Hast thou a hope with which thy heart
Would almost feel it death to part?
Entreat thy God that hope to crown,
Or give thee strength to lay it down."

door with his contribution. It was twelve great ripe purple plums, each one daintily wrapped in white tissue paper, and the whole packed in a pretty box.

"I asked Mr. Mace to lend 'em to me," explained the little fellow. "I'm going to pay him back when mine are ripe."

John was the proud owner of a plum tree at the foot of the garden, but the fruit was not an early kind like that on Mr. Mace's trees.

The Donation Party at the Home was a great success, and the matron privately told Mrs. Rand that she thought no other gifts had given more pleasure than those picture books and flower-baskets.

"You see," whispered Mother Rand to her children as they watched the happy groups of little ones, "the best things aren't always those that cost a lot of money. But there, it isn't every family that has a Grandma Thurlow to leave blue boxes of treasure in the attic for those who come after her."

Mother's Flower Girls

BY MARGERY CURLETTE FIGEE.

R. and Mrs. Charles Bell were away for a few months, and had gladly accepted Aunt Bessie's offer to care for little Dorothy and Winifred at her home in the country. The children were overjoyed too; for they always had such delightful times at Aunt Bessie's.

They arrived there one bright sunny day, and after many kisses and hugs, they put on their romping clothes, and started out to the barn to see the small downy chickens, the baby calf and the new pony; they climbed up into the hay-mow, played a game of hide-and-seek, and just had a wonderful afternoon.

Tired and hungry, they returned to the house, and shortly after supper Aunt Bessie tucked them in their beds. She

Mona's Daily Round

By Arthur Chamberlain

MONA ROSSITTER trudged along behind Brindle, the cow, feeling hot, tired, and rather out of tune with the warm September weather. "Seems to me you needn't stop every two steps, Brindle," she remarked severely, addressing the cow, who had halted to graze by the roadside. "I know it's a left-over dog-day, but I've got to get you across Crescent Chasm bridge and then get back to the house some time before dinner."

Mona found it a little cooler when they came to the bridge, from which one might look down nearly a sheer hundred feet. Some earthquake, ages ago, must have split apart the great walls of Crescent Chasm; but nowadays the bridge made a thoroughfare across the Chasm for the entire countryside, shortening transportation and doing away with a circuit of many miles.

Brindle quickened her pace across the bridge's wooden flooring, and Mona soon found herself on the other side. Just around a sharp curve was Brindle's pasture.

"I'll rest here a few minutes," decided Mona, "and then—well, I s'pose I must go back to the house and sweep up, and then I'll have to take hold with ma, getting the dinner—Oh!"

Disregarding Brindle, Mona hurried to meet a lady who was walking towards the bridge. "I'm so glad to see you, Miss Wolderham!" she cried. "You know it's generally afternoons when you're here."

"I—" Miss Wolderham checked herself. "This is a charming view, isn't it, Mona? It has a new beauty in these hazy, autumn days."

Mona nodded. "Yes, it's lovely. Some afternoons when I come up here after Brindle, when I've been working around in the house all day, I sit over on that rock, where I can look clear up Crescent Chasm. It makes me think of the verse in the Bible, 'a land that is very far off.'"

"Not so very far off, perhaps," replied Miss Wolderham, with a gentle smile. "The Hebrew gives it as 'a land of far distances.'"

"Oh!" breathed Mona. "That does make it seem nearer, as if it began right here, but kept getting bigger and more wonderful! I wish I could stay here, instead of having to go home and wash dishes."

"Washing dishes is not such very hard work, Mona," replied Miss Wolderham, with a smile.

"But it seems so dull, after this!" murmured Mona, looking down. "And so does sweeping, and making beds, and driving Brindle up here to pasture every morning and back again every afternoon."

"No one can afford to neglect the daily round, Mona," replied Miss Wolderham, seriously, "and to be faithful to everyday duties is the best preparation for a great emergency."

"Then I guess I'd better hurry home now," observed Mona. "Sweeping comes next in my daily round, and then I must take hold with ma on the dinner. I hope you'll be here to-morrow morning when I drive Brindle over, Miss Wolderham."

Miss Wolderham shook her head. "I didn't mean to tell you till this afternoon, Mona, when I'm coming to say good-by to your mother; I'm leaving to-morrow for the season."

"Oh!" cried Mona. "Well, of course you'd go pretty soon, anyway. It's later than you stayed last year. School begins next week, too."

"I start on a little trip in my touring car this afternoon," observed Miss Wolderham, "and I shall call on your mother on my way."

Mona walked slowly homeward; the sultry morning had grown into an oppressively hot day. "I—I wish I could go with Miss Wolderham in her touring car," she whispered to herself, "and see more of—the 'land of far distances!'"

"So Miss Wolderham's going back to the city," commented Mrs. Rossitter. "Coming to call on me before she goes; that shows what a lady she is! Now, Mona, you kind o' fly round and we'll have everything good and cleared up when she comes."

There was extra work in this, but Mona went about it cheerfully. "Miss Wolderham said that nobody can afford to neglect the daily round," she murmured to herself; "but it's nice to do this, though it's extra, because I love Miss Wolderham."

Dinner eaten and the dishes washed and put away, Mrs. Rossitter went into the little parlor.

"I declare it does seem kind of dark in here," she remarked, raising a shade. "This window gets the afternoon light, too. Patience, if there isn't a big black cloud in the west! We're going to get a thunder-shower, sure, Mona! I don't believe Miss Wolderham'll be here, after all; I don't believe she'll start."

"She said she would," replied Mona, sturdily, "and maybe the shower will be all over before she's ready, anyway."

"Well, maybe," assented her mother. "But if she isn't here pretty early, Mona, I'm afraid you'll have to miss her, for you'll have to go after Brindle when the shower's over. It's too early to go yet, let alone the shower."

Mona drew a rather long breath at this, but a sharp flash and a quick peal of thunder sent her scurrying off to shut windows and take in a few dish-towels that fluttered on the clothesline by the back door, and then another sudden glare lit up the room and a crackling, crashing thunder-peal sent her flying indoors.

"No call to be scared," observed Mrs. Rossitter, quickly. "Guess that struck somewhere pretty near; but we've had the worst of it; there'll be blue sky in the west inside half an hour."

Indeed, the great discharge of electricity seemed to end the force of the storm and ragged clouds were soon flying eastward across the blue sky.

"You'd better start after Brindle, Mona," observed Mrs. Rossitter. "It may be a bit early, but it's better to get her home after a shower like this."

Mona paused, reluctant. "I wanted to see Miss Wolderham, ma; she's going to call, you know."

"She may not start now till to-morrow, and you're bound to see her on the road, anyway; run along now!" was her mother's reply.

Mona went down the road, wearing a somewhat injured air. "It's hours too soon to go after Brindle!" she assured herself, "and there'll only be time just to say 'good-by' to Miss Wolderham even if I don't miss her, hunting up Brindle. Oh, dear! I would like to have my own way—"

She stopped, recalling again Miss Wolderham's words.

"I s'pose this is part of the daily round that I can't afford to neglect," she murmured. "Well, there's Crescent Chasm bridge, anyway; but, somehow, it looks—queer."

Hurrying along, Mona came to the bridge; there was a great hole in its wooden flooring, with splintered edges showing the blackened metal work beneath.

"The lightning struck the bridge!" Mona murmured, going cautiously forward.

"I guess the bridge is all right except the floor of it," she finally decided, "and there's enough of that left for me to cross on, but I don't know how it'll be about coming back with Brindle. Maybe I'd better go home. Wish I could see around the curve at the other end of the bridge."

She turned, walking slowly away; but stopped, almost with a jerk. "If Brindle can't get over that bridge, how can Miss Wolderham in her touring car? That curve will keep her from seeing it till she's almost on to the bridge!" By this time Mona had turned again, running towards Crescent Chasm. "If that touring car runs on to the bridge there'll be an upset, maybe a smash." Mona gave a little gasp. "She'll go through, and down—"

Clinging to the railing of the bridge, Mona made her way across; and racing around the curve at the farther end of the bridge, she came out on a wide, straight road, down which she peered eagerly. Far away, she made out a touring car sweeping towards her. Mona sprang into the middle of the road, holding both hands high above her head.

The touring car drew up and stopped. "Oh, Miss Wolderham!" cried Mona, hurrying to the side of the car.

"Why, Mona!" Miss Wolderham sprang down. "What is it, child?"

"The lightning struck the bridge—I was afraid you'd go through!" explained Mona, gulping a little.

Miss Wolderham drew a quick breath. "If I hadn't come after Brindle, maybe—and I didn't want to come, but I remembered what you said—about the daily round," went on Mona, shakily.

"Then I have reason to be thankful that one little girl did her duty," replied Miss Wolderham with a smile.

"And—and I don't see how I'm to get Brindle across," observed Mona, ruefully.

Miss Wolderham's laugh was welcome. "I think, Mona," she remarked, with twinkling eyes, "that we'll send Brindle to the hotel—at least, to the hotel stables—for the night. Hunt her up, my dear, and my chauffeur will see that she gets there. I'm going home with you afoot—yes, I am, my dear—across the bridge. My little touring-trip can wait until to-morrow; by that time I trust the bridge will be repaired."

Mona nodded contentedly, coming close to Miss Wolderham. "Then you will make that call, and I'll be at home to see you; I thought maybe I'd miss you if I came here this afternoon. Isn't it beautiful after the shower; the 'land of far distances?'"

"Yes, dear," replied Miss Wolderham softly; she was thinking of the promise of the vision of "the king in his beauty."

"Mona," she asked suddenly, "how would you like to take that little touring-trip with me tomorrow? It will be only for the day, you know."

"Oh, Miss Wolderham!" breathed Mona, rapturously. "And I as good as know Ma will let me!"

"I think we may take that for granted, Mona," replied Miss Wolderham, "and even though we leave after breakfast and are back to supper, we can go quite a way into the 'land of far distances.'"

One Match to a Fire

"He was the sort of a man," says a noted author, describing his hero, "who would use only one match in lighting a fire." In that terse sentence there is food for reflection. Matches do not count much with most young Americans, any more than other little things. Small economies have gone out of fashion. The ambition to do something big has taken possession of us, and we are so absorbed in getting the fire lighted that we do not stop to think whether we will take one match or a box of matches.

Almost any one can sometimes kindle a fire using only one match. The peculiarity about this hero was that he was sure to do so. He could be depended on every time. He did not ask the most of himself in emergencies only, but regularly. When he had a matter in hand, you might rest satisfied that everything would be right.

A company of hunters on a mountain were caught in a snowstorm, and after an hour of wandering, they came at last to shelter—a deserted cabin left standing for just such emergencies. There was wood on the hearth, but only one match was in possession of the company. Its failure to ignite meant death to the chilled, exhausted hunters. If it burned, it meant life and safety. Fortunately there was in the number one man like the hero described. There was only one match, but one was all he needed. The fire was kindled, and the company was saved. It always pays to know how to do a thing the first time, without correction or repetition. But there come occasions when the second trial is out of the question. It is now or never. To fail once, is to lose all.

How the Call Came.

BY SARAH N. M'CREERY.

AS Evelyn Ward picked up the newspaper bearing the name Tremont News there was a smile on her lips as she remembered her mother's faithfulness in sending it week after week, and how little it really meant to her. Evelyn was born in Tremont; her parents had lived there until she was ready to enter high school, then they moved to the larger city of Frankfort. Mr. and Mrs. Ward enjoyed the "home paper," as they always called it. During Evelyn's two years at college it followed her, and now that she had entered the medical school it still came.

She glanced listlessly over column after column, then suddenly folded the paper and gave attention to this item: "Miss Pauline Greer, one of the faithful grade teachers in Avalon, has been forced to take a rest on account of ill health. Miss Greer was formerly a resident of Tremont and a teacher here."

"Why, that must be Miss Pauline Greer who was my Sunday school teacher in Tremont," Evelyn said aloud. "It surely is—there could not be two Pauline Greers." She re-read the item, then she dropped the paper and her mind went back to the Sunday school class of which she had been a member. "Avalon is only twenty miles from here; I believe I will go to see Miss Pauline," she remarked mentally. "This is Saturday; I could go this afternoon, if there is a train."

She called up the railroad station and found there was a train that went through at one o'clock, and she could return at seven. She decided at once to go. She did the mending that required her attention on Saturday and then dressed for the little journey.

It was just a quarter to two o'clock when Evelyn inquired of the ticket agent at Avalon where Miss Pauline Greer lived. He gave her the street and number and told her which car to take. She had no difficulty in finding the house that bore the number she wished.

"I came to see Miss Greer," she announced when the door was opened in response to her ring.

Mrs. Eaton, the landlady, looked a little surprised, for strangers seldom asked for Miss Greer. "I will show you to her room; she is not well," she said, as she led the way upstairs.

"Miss Pauline, I know you do not recognize me," Evelyn said when she closed the door behind her and advanced to the chair by the window, in which a pale, frail woman was seated.

Miss Greer's eyes had no light of recognition as she looked at the fresh, rosy-cheeked young woman before her. "There is a resemblance to somebody I once knew—who it is I cannot say."

"I am Evelyn Ward."

"Not little Evelyn Ward? Why, it cannot be possible. What have you done to yourself to become so tall, straight and rosy? Why, it seems that Evelyn Ward should still have on short dresses like she wore when she was in my Sunday school class."

"You forget you have not seen me for—well, I will not mention how many years it is," Evelyn replied smilingly.

"It has been long enough for me to leave short dresses behind, and the two braids of my hair now form this knot," turning slowly around.

"I am a poor hostess, but you took me by surprise," Miss Greer said. "Now remove your hat and wrap and tell me all about yourself, and about Tremont, if you know any news."

"I know little about Tremont except what I see in the paper that mother sends me. That is how I happened to know you were in Avalon and ill. It was in the Tremont News, so I came right out to see you."

Miss Greer looked a little bewildered. "You say your mother sent you the paper, and that you came right out to see me. Why are you not with your parents? I thought you lived in Frankfort. How did you get here?"

Evelyn laughed softly. "I have gotten you all mixed up, and I don't wonder, for it has been so long since you saw me, and now I come to call and give you such a surprise. We do live in Frankfort, but I am at school in Belmont. You see, we are almost neighbors for the time being."

"What school are you attending?" "The Medical School, and the work is so interesting," Evelyn responded, remembering again the reason she had come. "But you are ill. How are you to-day?"

Miss Greer shook her head slowly. "Not well. I am not really sick; there is just a listlessness and weakness that I cannot overcome. The doctor does not seem to help me any. As you are going to be a physician, when you graduate I will come to you for treatment, if I am not cured."

Evelyn smiled a radiant smile. "You will have to come a long way, for I am going to China as a medical missionary."

Miss Greer could scarcely bridge, with her thoughts, the years that lay between the days when Evelyn Warren was a little girl in her Sunday school class and this energetic young creature declaring that she was going to China as a medical missionary. "How did you happen to do that?"

"You caused me to do it." "I? I caused you to decide to be a medical missionary in China?" Miss Greer could hardly believe she heard aright.

"Yes, you!" "How? When?"

Evelyn smiled, with a far-away look in her eyes. "You remember when you had a missionary lesson once a month in our class?" Miss Greer nodded assent. "Perhaps you recall you had each girl write an essay from some book you gave her to read or a story you told. The book I read was about a medical missionary in China, and the fine things she did, and from that time I knew I was going as a medical missionary to China."

"But you never mentioned it to me," Miss Greer said.

"I was only a little girl and I was too timid to speak about it until later, but my call came then, through the book and the essay. You had me read the book and write the essay, so you were responsible for it all."

Evelyn saw the tears coursing down Miss Greer's cheeks. "Are you worse?" she asked in alarm.

"No," Miss Greer smiled wanly. "I have been so discouraged these past weeks since I have been ill; I felt as if I had never done anything worth while in the world. My mother died last year, and as I had nobody dependent on me now, I said this year I would support a child in a mission school, as I had always wanted to do; then before I could make the arrangements I took sick and I had to save my money for fear of actual need if I was idle long. I had never heard a word from the girls in my Sunday school class in Tremont and I thought the seed I tried to sow had borne little fruit, but you will never do a better missionary deed in China than you have done to-day by bringing me this wonderful news. I have done a little to help extend the Kingdom, if I am never able to help support a student."

Evelyn looked at her thoughtfully. "You may be sure that except for your influence there would be one less student preparing for medical missionary work in China. You can always feel that I am your personal representative there."

Then the former teacher and pupil talked of the future and of all it held for the latter. They had a cozy little tea together that Mrs. Eaton served in Miss Greer's Room, and when Evelyn departed for the train she left behind a more contented woman than she had found. Miss Greer had a satisfied feeling because she felt that she had, after all, done a work that counted.

"I am so glad I followed my impulsive thought and went to see Miss Pauline," was Evelyn's inward comment when she entered her room after the little journey. "I shall always keep her in touch with my work; she deserves it, because she was the inspiration for my call to China. I wonder why we are not more careful to tell people when they help us?" was the question over which she puzzled her brain. "If I had not seen that item about Miss Pauline in the Tremont News she might never have known of her good work as a Sunday school teacher."

Then Evelyn took her diary and under the date registered the vow, "I resolve to tell anyone who helps and inspires me to do anything worth while. I shall try to teach others to follow my example in this."

The Response of a Look

Corregio with the passion for art that burned in his soul looked upon the great painting of the master and studied and thought it out, forgetting himself in it until the genius of Raphael became for him a master passion and looking upon the great ideal that lured him on, his soul took fire and he said, "I too am a painter." So do we as we look upon the character of Christ find the great response rise up in our hearts, the identification of our very best with Him, and in our failure and in our love we too cry, "I too am a Christian." He embodies the chief end of man, and what He is, he enables us to become.

"Yea thro' life, death, thro' sorrow and thro' sinning
He shall suffice me, for he hath sufficed:
Christ is the end, for Christ was the beginning, Christ the beginning, for the end is Christ."

Donations

DONATIONS for the missionary work of the American Tract Society may be sent to Louis Tag, Treasurer, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y.

Life Members and Directors

THE donation of $30 at one time constitutes a Life Member of the American Tract Society; the addition of $70, or the donation of $100 at one time, constitutes a Life Director. Life members may receive annually copies of the Society's own publications to the value of $1; Life Directors to the value of $2; if applied for within the Society's year, from April 1st to April 1st, in person or by written order. No individual can draw more than one annuity any year for himself. Colporters are not authorized to supply Life Members.

Form of Bequest

I GIVE and bequeath to the "AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY," instituted in the City of New York, May, 1825, the sum of dollars to be applied to the charitable uses and purposes of said Society.

Three witnesses should state that the testator declares this to be his last will and testament, and that they signed at his request, and in his presence and the presence of each other.

To Our Subscribers

A RULING of the Post Office Department states that copies of the AMERICAN MESSENGER may not be mailed to persons whose subscriptions are in arrears for a period exceeding twelve months. In other words, the regulations of the Post Office Department compel us to remove from our regular mailing list the names of all who delay the payment of their subscriptions longer than twelve months. In view of this fact we urge upon all our friends the necessity of attending promptly to the renewal of their subscriptions. A glance at the address label on the wrapper of the paper will show at what date each subscription expires.

Barrio Classes in the Philippines

Rev. J. L. McLaughlin, representing the World's Sunday School Association as Sunday-school secretary for the Philippines, has originated and promoted the idea of "barrio" or suburban, Sunday-school classes. Under this plan, seventy-seven Sunday-schools of the Methodist Church alone report that they are conducting these classes apart from their regular school sessions. Through this extension work they carry the Gospel to their neighbors in adjoining districts of the town. These classes, which number 188 with a total membership of 4,050, are generally held on Sunday afternoon

A Wayside Ministry Open to All

A Christian worker writes: "I have found the use of religious literature, such as the American Tract Society furnishes, one of the best helps in developing spiritual life and efficiency in service. "For more than fifty years, that is since serving in the United States Commission in 1864, I have kept an assortment of tracts, cards and children's papers on hand to meet the various opportunities as they have occurred at home, in traveling, and on vacations. "I now use between two and three thousand tracts, leaflets, cards, etc., a year. It is a kind of 'wayside ministry open to every Christian, which is exceedingly helpful and has the promise of God's Word."

In Whatever Sphere

"I am not a hero, I am just a 'regular.'" This is what a private soldier is reported to have said when he was complimented upon his bravery. But in the performance of the duty, which was his as a regular soldier, he could be just as heroic as one who had only recently left his home to join the volunteer forces; and in the faithful performance of some inconspicuous task in an out-of-the-way place, he could serve his country as truly and deserve his meed of praise as surely as the dashing officer leading his troops into the thick of the fight. In whatever sphere of life one may move he should endeavor to measure up to the best that is in him, and it is this determination, the determination to use well one's powers, to use them in the service of man, and for the glory of the Creator, that makes man truly heroic, rather than some daring deed upon the field of battle.

Many a true hero goes to his last sleep with no flag wrapped about him and no funeral dirge of martial music accompanying him. Quietly he fought life's battle, and won, not fame, but the consciousness of duty done. His sphere of action was circumscribed; his days passed quietly; no trumpet sounded his praise, and no double headlines told of his daily deeds; but he felt that he had a mission in the world, humble though it might be, and day by day he lived a life of helpfulness to others, and the sweet fragrance of a pure and unselfish soul filled the atmosphere about him.

The community in which he lived felt, almost imperceptibly, his quiet touch, but moved on to better things because of it. He lived the worth-while life, and he who feels that only the life in a blaze of earthly glory is the worth-while life, has an entirely wrong idea of life's true value.

The fireman and the brakeman, and the section hand, are a part of the great railroad system as truly as the president in his private car, and upon their faithfulness also depends the efficiency of the road. The true performance of any duty elevates that duty to nobleness. The sweeping of the room, the cooking of the meal, the cleaning of the street, when faithfully done, assumes a greater dignity than many so-called higher duties, if performed in an indifferent manner.

It is all right to endeavor constantly to fit one's self for a higher sphere, and yet we should earnestly endeavor to do our duty in life, not because its faithful performance is a stepping stone to something higher, but simply and solely because it is the duty of the day or the hour.

We admire Captain Francis Inch, as he stands upon the deck of his burning ship, the Volturmo, fighting back the flames and risking his life for the lives of those intrusted to his care, and we are gratified to know that he has been given command of a larger and better vessel. But there were other heroes of that tragedy. A witness of the rescue from the Volturmo says: "It was a strange company that filled the last boat to put off from the side of the flame-swept Volturmo. It carried Captain Inch, it carried the officers, it carried a dog. And it carried a cook, who was one of the big heroes of the tragedy, for he stood at his post and baked and made coffee until the flames were so close that his shoes were literally burned off."

American Tract Society

THIS SOCIETY was organized in 1825. Its work is interdenominational and international in scope, and is commended by all evangelical denominations. It has published the Gospel messages in 178 languages, dialects and characters. It has been the pioneer for work among the foreign-speaking people in our country, and its missionary colporters are distributing Christian literature in thirty-three languages among the immigrants and making a home-to-home visitation among the spiritually destitute, both in the cities and rural districts, leaving all kinds of Christian literature, also the Bible or portions of the Scriptures.

Its publication of leaflets, volumes and periodicals from the Home Office total 794,639,700 copies. It has made foreign cash appropriations to the amount of $799,456.39, and grants of electrotypes to the value of $61,177.96, by means of which millions of copies of books and tracts have been published at mission stations abroad.

The gratuitous distribution of the past year is to the value of $16,684.99. The grand total of its gratuitous distribution has been to the value of $2,634,505.89, which is the equivalent of 5,269,010,000 tract pages.

The total number of family visits that have been made by the Society's colporters during the last year is 206,167; the total number of volumes distributed by sale or grant is 55,517, making the total number of volumes, that have been circulated by colporters in the last seventy-five years 17,382,454, and the total number of family visits that they have made during the same period 18,612,843.

Its work, ever widening, is dependent upon donations and legacies, and greatly needs increased offerings.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.
JUSON SWIFT, D.D., General Secretary.
Remittances should be sent to Louis Tag, Treasurer, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y.

IN THE MISSION FIELDS

Tract Distribution in Tokyo

The missionary colporters of the Japan Book and Tract Society scatter Christian tracts and books wherever they can find a suitable opportunity.

In the picture before us we see an actual scene in Tokyo. The people are sitting in the Temple grounds, and they are reading with eager interest the Christian literature that has just been handed them by the colporter, who may be seen standing in the foreground near the center of the picture.

The large tower that appears at the left hand side of the picture is probably the highest building in Japan. It is twelve stories high, and is used as an observatory.

The photograph from which this unique illustration was made was sent to the American Tract Society by the manager of the Japan Book and Tract Society. This Japanese Society has long been aided by cash appropriations from the American Tract Society, under whose auspices it was organized many years ago.

At the Guntur Mission

For many years the American Tract Society has aided the publication work of the Guntur Mission maintained by the General Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in India. Some of the results accomplished are set forth in the following extract from the last Annual Report of the Guntur Mission:

"Tracts have come to stay. Practically in every place in every Taluk, whether it was possible to hold a special meeting or not, tracts were sold or given away. The people are eager to obtain them. Literature, as such, is rarely if ever found in the villages, and whenever a school-boy or girl, though they read very poorly, learns that a 'book' (they all know this English word) is obtainable, they soon make their wishes known. Hundreds of Gospel portions and tracts have been readily disposed of. Missionaries often have returned from a tour with stock completely exhausted and could have sold twice as many books could they have been conveniently taken.

"Several small papers published monthly have been distributed with good effect. They are very helpful in directing the conversation into Christian channels. Recently here and there a new practice has been introduced whereby each worker is made a colporter. A liberal percentage is given to him from the sales he makes. One missionary reports that his sales have greatly increased and the method seems to be a great success. This is a very effective way of sowing the seed and it is being encouraged wherever possible. In the Guntur Dispensary and Hospital the selling of books has been carried on as usual and such an adept at this work is the little Dispensary Bible woman that it seems almost impossible to keep her supplied, especially with Gospels and Hymn Books. She has regularly sold eighty copies of our beautiful little monthly, The Children's Friend."

A Definite Program of Work

One feature of the work of the Christian Literature Society for India is the maintenance of the Tamil Publication Committee, of which Rev. A. C. Clayton of the Wesleyan Mission is secretary. For several years the American Tract Society has made a cash appropriation toward the support of Mr. Clayton in this special line of work, and is therefore deeply interested in the results of his labors.

Mr. Clayton was set apart for this work in the year 1907, and since that time he has produced the following publications in the Tamil language: "Jesus Christ and His Disciples," which has had a sale of many thousands, five Tamil Readers in the Vidya Malika Series, seventy new Tamil Handbills and Tracts, and the Tamil Bible Dictionary, the last part of which has just been printed. In addition to the foregoing, Mr. Clayton has written several stories and articles for the Tamil Preachers' Magazine and the Matharpothini, has done a considerable amount of proof reading and editorial revision for the Christian Literature Society of India and the Madras Religious Tract and Book Society, and has examined and reported on over 300 Tamil manuscripts.

DISTRIBUTING TRACTS IN THE TEMPLE GROUNDS IN TOKYO, JAPAN

This is a splendid record of work accomplished, and Mr. Clayton has large plans for the future, if he is permitted to continue in this special line of activity for the next five years. He writes:

"Now that I have nearly completed ten years of this work I can see more clearly than ever its immense importance for India and also a very definite programme of work that will fill up at least another five years of my time, and I should like to be allowed to attempt it. A word about it may interest you.

"We have no series of graded Scripture lessons for either our Sunday schools or village schools (which are of course vernacular schools), and although there are two or three useful manuals available there is not likely to be anything published in Tamil for years unless I can take the subject in hand. For the last year or so I have been gradually accumulating information and looking round for co-workers and I believe that the way is clearing for me to prepare a simple series that shall meet the needs of the ordinary vernacular teacher in the ordinary vernacular school at least for some years. The Christian Literature Society is ready to publish in several of the vernaculars as soon as the copy can be delivered to them. I think it would be well to proceed with the scheme rapidly. Still 'rapidly' does not mean next week. I reckon that it will be about two years before the series is in shape and it would not be wise to begin to publish till we see somewhat precisely how the whole series is likely to shape and what it will cost.

"Now that the Tamil Bible Dictionary is finished, I have taken up another very important though not very extensive task. We are going to publish two small reading books for junior classes in Mission Schools dealing with Temperance. Opium, various preparations of hemp, cocaine, as well as foreign and native alcoholic liquors are the curse of many classes in India. Of course there are numerous castes in which no individual ever touches any of these stimulants or narcotics. But there are other classes that do, and that do so in increasing degree. It is believed that in the Christian community, too, the freedom attained from caste restrictions as to food and drink has led some into misuse of their privilege. And as a large number of the Christian community have come from low castes or 'non-castes' in which drinking the juice of the palmyra palm when it has been fermented is practiced whenever the palm yields its juice, they have brought into the Christian community a laxity on the subject that sometimes has led to deplorable results. The two little Temperance Reading books that I am planning will be an attempt to provide information, scientific, ethical and economic on the evil of the use of these narcotics and stimulants.

"I expect to compile these books in English in the first case, for we want them in several vernaculars, and if they are in English we can get them translated. At present there are no books that cover the ground from the point of view of the Indian villager and the Indian village child, and I can assure you that it is by no means easy to give the necessary teaching in the form in which it can be assimilated, and it is particularly difficult to get illustrative stories and pictures which shall appeal to the vernacular reader."

Hospital Work in India

The new buildings erected for Dr. Wanless' Presbyterian Hospital at Miraj contains classrooms, a museum, laboratories for the medical school, consultation and treatment rooms for outdoor patients, private rooms for eye patients, surgical and operating rooms, an X-ray and electric treatment plant, etc. The remarkable thing about this enlargement is that four-fifths of its cost was contributed in India, a tribute of gratitude to the great surgeon at its head. Since the hospital was started twenty-two years ago, 34,250 operations have been performed in it and 638,000 out-patients treated.

The Heart of Islam

What is the meaning of the revolt of the Arabs against Turkish domination and the passing of the sacred Moslem shrines of Mecca and Medina out of Turkish into Arab hands? Many are asking this significant question. Does it mean that the unity and cohesion of the Moslem world is on the wane and that the military power of Turkey, which has given the drive to the Moslem propaganda, can no longer be relied upon? And with the breaking of the Turkish military power, will not the pride of Islam be so humbled, that a day of new opportunity may dawn for Christianity in Moslem lands?

Many are thinking of these possibilities. In the Moslem Sunday-school field, strong preparations are being made to meet the challenge of the new day that is surely dawning. At the heart of the Moslem educational world at Cairo, with its university of 10,000 students, a Sunday-school missionary and his wife, Rev. and Mrs. Stephen Trowbridge, are manufacturing the munitions for the peaceful conquest of Islam by reaching Moslem childhood through the Sunday-school. Thousands of parable stories in Arabic and of the lives of Livingstone and Hogg, eagerly read by Moslem children, are being distributed through the Sunday-school, and the Sunday-school attendance is doubling at many points. Teacher-training books in Arabic and pamphlets for workers are being printed and distributed. The Sunday-school Committee is planning to issue a Boys' Own Magazine in Arabic to offset the stories of crime and other demoralizing literature for boys which is being sold.

Sunday School Work in the Philippines

Cockfighting and the Sunday-school go on almost side by side in the Philippines and at San Leonardo it happened that the owner and his rooster actually went to church during a Sunday-school and evangelical institute. The man was converted, forthwith gave his rooster away, and was found at Sunday-school the next morning.

At one of the Sunday services at that institute a little girl in a red dress wanted to join. The pastor thought her too young. Her parents were opposed, but on Tuesday night the red dress was there beside her father and mother, and all three joined together. "A little child" still leads, the world over.

Imagine yourself for a day in the Island of Iloilo. Filipinos are doing the Sunday-school extension work. After teaching at the children's Sunday-school from seven to eight in the morning and attending the adult Sunday-school, the pastor and some eight or ten others go to the houses of different members where they hold Sunday-school classes for both children and adults who can not be reached by the central school. This is where the picture post-cards from America come in as a means of attracting attendance and carrying the gospel message.

At one of the Sunday-school conventions, thirty new schools were reported, and schools are reaching for the standard requirements as to teachers' class, cradle roll, and the promotion by each school of a branch Sunday-school.

Christian Sympathy

The Missionary Herald reports the fact that for a number of years the Bohemian Congregationalists of Prague have sent $75 (gold) for evangelistic work at Shaowu, China. The Shaowu Congregationalist churches, in view of the sorrows which came upon their friends in Bohemia in the tragic year 1915, determined to extend their sympathy to them. This took the shape of a draft of $87.90 (Mex.), which represents a very considerable sum to poor Chinese peasants. The brethren in Prague had not forgotten their evangelist in China either, and although in the extremities of wartime they were not able to send the full amount despatched, nearly $43. The two drafts crossed each other in their journeyings, each bearing testimony to the Christian sympathy of the widely separated Christian communities.

The George Wood Prize Books

Last year the American Tract Society offered two cash prizes, the First amounting to $250.00 and the Second to $100.00 for the two best manuscripts submitted for publication in book form.

Over two hundred manuscripts were entered in competition for these prizes, and the Publishing Committee of the Society found it an onerous task to determine which two were the most worthy. After careful deliberation it was finally decided that the First Prize should be awarded to the book entitled, "Letters from the Dominie," by Rev. David de Forest Burrell. The Second Prize was awarded to the volume entitled, "Paul the Preacher," by John L. Rosser, A.B., Th.M.

The money for the prizes awarded was provided through the income from the George Wood Premium Fund. The books are now in press, and will be issued in tasteful and attractive style within a few weeks.

Our Announcement Number

In this issue of the AMERICAN MESSENGER will be found the announcement of our plans for the coming year. We believe this is the most attractive prospectus that we have ever offered to our readers, and we trust that it will meet with their hearty approval.

Some improvements will be noted in the order and arrangement of the contents of our paper. Several new features have been introduced, and new titles have been given to some of the departments, which will undoubtedly commend themselves to our friends.

We are pleased to announce that the Editorial Contributors, whose writings have proved such a strong feature in our columns during the past year will continue their services for us during the coming months. In addition to these able writers we are to be favored by the contributions of many other popular and successful authors, whose names appear in our Announcement. Besides these we hope to enlist the services of still others during the coming months, whose contributions we are sure will prove a most desirable addition to our columns.

We ask all our subscribers to read most carefully the full Announcement which is printed on the opposite page. We request an early renewal on the part of those whose subscriptions fall due at this season of the year, and we bespeak the hearty co-operation of all our readers in extending the circulation of this paper, so that it may be an agency of ever-increasing power in promoting the progress of the Kingdom.

Prison Sunday

For over forty years the last Sunday in October has been designated by the National Prison Association as "Prison Sunday." This year Prison Sunday will fall on October 29th, and it is hoped that many pastors will make this the occasion for a careful consideration of the important subject of prison reform.

Undoubtedly the problem of the proper treatment of the criminal is engaging the sober thought of American citizens as never before. A constant agitation is being maintained for a more humane and more efficient treatment of the delinquent. Outdoor employment, the honor system, farm colonies, welfare leagues of prisoners and a number of other remarkable experiments are being tested with a view to the reformation of the prisoner.

It has been well said that the prison problem will never be solved until it becomes the deep concern of the great body of intelligent Americans whom the churches represent.

In some States remarkable progress has been made in handling this great problem, but in other States the conditions that still obtain are more characteristic of the Middle Ages than of the enlightened Twentieth Century in which we live.

Too much stress cannot be laid upon the necessity of a moral and spiritual reformation on the part of the criminal. The physical and material conditions in which the prisoner is placed should be such as to create a favorable environment for the efforts that are made to lead him into a higher life.

Above all things, the fact should ever be kept in mind that in Christianity alone may be found the sure cure for the evil which has brought the prisoner where he is. The Gospel of Christ is the only antidote for sin and there is nothing else that will redeem fallen men and women from their degradation.

✻ ✻ ✻

For the Protection of Native Races

One of the greatest foes of the native races in foreign lands is the liquor trade. Intoxicating liquors are playing havoc with the natives of Africa, and other lands are also being deluged with a flood of alcoholic beverages that bids fair to do immeasurable harm.

There is a strong movement in Europe to check the exportation of liquor to Africa and to the islands of the seas. Both the missionary workers and the native African chiefs have united in protesting against the traffic in strong drink which has been undermining the health and threatening the very existence of many of the people of Africa.

Nearly thirty years ago the Christian churches of Europe organized the "Native Races Liquor Traffic Committee," with headquarters in London. The nations represented in this organization are Great Britain, Germany, France, Switzerland, Holland, Denmark, Belgium, Italy and Spain.

Unfortunately the United States is not enrolled in this organization, and yet there is great need of some restraining influence to check the huge consignments of intoxicants which are being sent from our own land to curse the natives of Africa.

While we are extending the prohibition area of our land, at the same time we are shipping vast quantities of liquor to foreign lands, especially into Africa, the result of which is to debauch and degrade the very people whom our missionaries are trying to convert and uplift.

Surely there is a call for American Christians to join in a world-wide effort to eradicate this great evil, and to unite with those who are endeavoring to protect the native races in foreign lands from the continued infliction of that "liquid damnation" which is worse than any liquid fire which has ever been used in human warfare.

"Go to Church Sunday"

In many different sections of our country the custom has been adopted of designating a particular Sunday as "Go to Church Sunday." Many churches have chosen some Sunday in the month of October for this purpose, in the hope that the impetus thus given to church attendance may continue during the balance of the year.

There is no doubt of the need for stimulating Church attendance. While there are some church auditoriums that are well filled, and a few that are even crowded, in the great majority of cases the pews are but sparsely occupied and, in too many instances there is but a handful of people present at any of the regular Sunday services.

We need a revival in the matter of going to church, and the observance of a "Go to Church Sunday" has been found in many cases to be a decided help in accomplishing this desirable end.

In this connection it may be stated that the American Tract Society has devised a "Go to Church Stamp," which has proved exceedingly useful in stimulating the "Go to Church" movement. A full statement in regard to this Stamp will be found on another page of this issue.

It ought to be said that the main value of a "Go to Church Sunday" lies in the plans that are adopted to follow up the initial efforts and secure permanent results. The securing of a large congregation for a single Sunday is a good thing in itself, but unless it is followed by earnest, systematic efforts to retain the interest and attendance of those who come on that particular day, there will be but little to show in the way of permanent results.

Caring for the Birds

One of the praiseworthy movements of the present time is the effort which is being made by the National Association of Audubon Societies to save the plumage birds of North America. Through the greed of the feather hunters these birds might now have become well nigh exterminated, if it had not been for the laws secured and the wardens employed by the Audubon Societies.

In over a dozen States wardens are stationed to protect the colonies of those birds which might otherwise be doomed to extinction. Among the water birds which have been saved to the United States through these efforts are various species of gull and tern, the black skimmer and the glossy ibis.

One of the greatest crimes against bird life has been the destruction of egrets for the sake of their beautiful plumes, known as "aigrettes." These plumes are worn only during the nesting season, and the destruction of the adult bird leaves the young uncared for in their nests with the result that they slowly starve to death.

Laws to prohibit the sale of the feathers of egrets and other native birds have now been enacted in eleven different States, and it is to be hoped that the other States will fall into line in this humane endeavor to protect and care for the birds.

A Tribute to the Power of Conscience

A remarkable testimony to the power of conscience is found in the so-called Conscience Fund of the United States. This fund was started in 1811, when a letter was received containing $5, which the writer confessed having taken from the government. This was given to the treasury, and records of such contributions have been kept ever since although the money itself is not kept separate. Nothing further was received until 1827. From that date until the present only one year has passed without additions to the conscience fund. During the last fiscal year $54,923.15

Messages for Modern Men

BY REV. FRANK B. McALLISTER
First Things First

A PRIME requisite of the artist is a true sense of proportion. And so it is, with those engaged in that finest of the fine arts—the art of right living. We need continually to purge our vision, to correct our estimates, to strive to put the first things first.

The task is not as easy as it seems, in a world so crowded with opportunities and attractions as is our own. A thousand applicants knock at the door of life. The question as to which shall be given entrance may well be a serious concern with those who are minded to live worthily these human years. There were never so many calls on one's strength as now, never so many fields for work, for study, for amusement or philanthropic endeavor. Stevenson sings in his child's couplet

"The world is so full of a number of things, I'm sure we all should be happy as kings."

Practically, however, the very abundance and complexity of modern life has led to a certain confusion of mind and a lamentable frittering away of effort. Thousands are hospitable to all the invitations and are at the beck and call of all the passing voices. They are interested in every fad or legitimate fashion of the times. They strive to do almost everything that mortal hands may find to do, but they do nothing with distinguished consecration or effectiveness.

The average man, the man you pass each day in the street, is not much troubled by the relative importance of the good things of life. He is frankly after that which ministers to his immediate and material desires. He wants to make his "pile," to get his name in the papers or to be elected to office. He is trying to compass that thing which we sum up—and much too narrowly—in the word, success. In his conversation the word dollars is a monotonous refrain. He is, perhaps, thinking at this minute how he may gain enough dollars to enable him to discard his last year's automobile and purchase the model of next year, with eight cylinders and ten seats.

The mood of self indulgence sadly inverts one's scale of values. We elevate to the top of the list people and things properly to be assigned a much more modest place. That which is abased is exalted, in a way not contemplated in the Scripture. Who, at this hour, is the public character elevated to the world's supreme pinnacle of financial reward? Is he some college president in a needy western state, building the walls of the republic in the persons of hundreds of educated young men and women? Is he some missionary in the benighted part of a foreign land, a veritable Christian statesman, slowly laying the only foundations on which any civilization can endure? No; the favored party is a clever young moving-picture actor who is said to receive a princely income of over half a million dollars for his ability to rush about on a stage performing ridiculous slap-dash tricks. This single illustration may serve to show the degree to which false values prevail in our indulgent and pleasure-loving age.

was received, including one contribution of $30,000 and another of $10,000. It was the largest income during any one year. The total fund now is $498,763.54.

It has been truly said that the conscience fund preaches a sermon. It shows that there are men and women who are not satisfied with ill-gotten gains but who feel the constraining influence of a desire to be honest. Square dealing is essential to a mind at peace, and the frequent contributions to the conscience fund demonstrate that not until a wrong is rectified can the human mind find rest.

Subscription Blanks

We enclose in this issue of the AMERICAN MESSENGER a subscription blank for the convenience of our subscribers in renewing their subscriptions to this paper.

If your own subscription is already paid in advance, we suggest that you use the blank for sending us the name and address of some friend to whom you would like to make the gift of a year's subscription to this paper.

We believe such a gift would be highly appreciated, especially since the friend for whom you subscribe will receive the Thanksgiving and Christmas issues of this year free; if you send ten cents additional, your friend will also receive a copy of our beautiful Calendar for 1917, entitled "Making Friends."

Kindly look for the date on the address label of your paper, as it indicates to what time your subscription is paid. It would be a great accommodation to us if you would send in your subscription orders early, thereby avoiding the delays likely to occur later during the rush of the holiday season.

What are the first things? What ideals should be kept in the forefront of a worthy life? To this query our fathers had a ready answer: "The chief end of man is to glorify God and to enjoy Him forever." To such a splendid purpose the consciences of a former generation were geared. However far they may have lagged behind, that great pillar of cloud or of fire stood ever before them in the way. They were better men and women because, in thought and purpose, at least, they put the first things first.

The words of the catechism are but the echo of Jesus's own utterance, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Obedience to that command is perfectly practicable, even in this crowded and complex era of time in which our lot is cast. It is the call to hold things in perspective, to see life steadily and see it whole.

For a Christian disciple, Christian faith and service must be the primary and dominating impulse. Let him make as large a living as he honestly can; his supreme responsibility is to make a life. The first things must not be pushed into second or third place; for they will not stay there. One may have just enough religion to make him miserable, a condition which really constitutes a spiritual tragedy. But to give Christ the right of way, that is to let all the other incidental purposes of life fall into proper alignment, this is to set one's feet in the highway of power and of peace.

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTION

DR. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN.

A GREAT HOPE

BY REV. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, D.D.

anything better than the story of the mother of Moses and her care for her child, especially that part of the story where the daughter of Pharaoh looked into the face of the little boy who had been brought to her by her maids and who turned to the mother of Moses, who was not far away, saying, "Take this child away, and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages."

This is an oriental scene. In itself it is fascinating. In its historical import it is thrilling. This little child of whom the text speaks is destined to be the world's greatest leader of men, and therefore we look into his face with peculiar interest and we listen to his story with rapt attention.

There are three beautiful pictures suggested by the story of Moses—his mother, his sister Miriam, and the daughter of Pharaoh.

The Mother and Her Child.

The first picture is that of the mother with her child. Holding this little boy in her arms, like every other mother at such a time, she is not only interesting, but beautiful. Pharaoh had said, "Every son that is born ye shall cast into the river," and therefore she was very much afraid. For three months she had hid her child, and when she could do it no longer she made a little ark with her own fingers, weaving her love into the little vessel. Then she carried it in her arms to the river and set it afloat in the flags by the river's brink. Strange to say, it was the very river into which Pharaoh's agents would have cast the child had it not been hidden. In the one case it would have meant death to the child, but in the other case it meant life—and this suggests to me a picture of a child going out into the world in one of two ways: the world with all its wickedness, with its many pitfalls, with its sorrows and its shame. If the child goes without Christ the conflict will be sharp indeed.

On the other hand, if the child goes out into this same wicked world, with the memory of a Christian home, surrounded by the influence of a Christian mother, and followed day by day by the power of prayer, temptations may come, trials may be met, foes may allure, and Satan may seek to charm, but the life is one of victory.

Brother and Sister.

The second picture which interests us in this oriental scene is that of Miriam, his sister—standing afar off and watching her little brother, at the same time keeping watch of all who might come near to do him harm. What wonderful influences surround children in general. I have always believed in guardian angels sent of God to protect little ones, like Heavenly influences holding them in the time of trial and delivering them in the hour of sin. In Matthew 18:10 I read: "In Heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in Heaven," just as if they were reading God's will in His face that they might know what to do for little children unprotected and in danger.

The fact that the mother is a consistent Christian is a safeguard to every young man.

An infidel lecturer had assailed Jesus Christ and His followers, and as he thought, had done it successfully. Two young men walked out from the lecture together and one said: "Well, he demolished everything, didn't he?" "No, indeed," said the other, "he never touched my mother's religion."

The fact that family worship has been successfully and beautifully maintained, has often been Heaven's guard keeping watch over boys and girls as they have grown to manhood and womanhood.

In October last, the word "mother" actually restored reason to a soldier in France, whose mind had been left a blank by shell and shock. A concert party had gone over from England to cheer up the sick, and one of their number, a well-known tenor, sang the old favorite, "Mother Machree." Among the audience was a nerve-shattered soldier who came out of a bombardment not only blind, but almost an idiot. He could understand nothing and had to be treated like an infant. He was still blind when taken to the concert. The word "mother" recurred in the song and the soldier caught at it. When the song was finished he was still muttering the word to himself. But it proved the key to his memory. He began to recall detached incidents about himself, and later recovered both his mind and his sight.

A Right Beginning.

The third picture which interests us so is that given to us on the morning when the daughter of Pharaoh went down to the river to bathe. Her maidens were with her. Suddenly she saw this little ark and she sent her maid to fetch it, and in the ark she saw the child, and on the child's face his tears. Her heart was touched. Miriam came at once to her, and the mother arrived, and then Pharaoh's daughter said to her, "Take this child away and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages." How true it is that all things work together for good to them that love God. If children are only started well and protected by prayer and consistent living, how beautifully their lives turn out.

I had a dear friend, now in Heaven, who was one of seven sons. Six of the boys were true, and one of them was drunken. The old Scotch mother grieved day after day for her boy, and one day a neighbor came in and said, "Why do you weary so for John? You have six boys saved. Just let John go." The old mother rose tremblingly, holding on to the chair to keep from falling, and said, "Let him go? I shall never let him go. I gave that boy to God before he was born. I took him into the kirk the first day I could walk and dedicated him to God, and he is God's boy, and God will have him if He turns the world upside down to get him"—and my friend told me that his old mother lived long enough to see John a Christian, a great judge, and an officer in the Church.

When the home is right the battles of life for all the members of the household are half fought, and the victory is more than half won. I do not mean to say that minister's homes

DO not know of a greater need today than that mothers should be true. Mother the world and you could more easily save it. That is, if mothers were truly Christian, their children would more naturally follow the teachings of Jesus. Lord Shaftsbury is quoted as saying that a generation of Christian mothers could save England, and so in these dark days our great hope must be in our mothers.

If I had the opportunity I should like to say to the mothers of our day some short sharp sentences like the following:

There is no love like a mother's love.

I have spoken the name of "mother" in the midst of a howling, drunken mob of men, and quieted them instantly.

I have never seen such tender light in a man's eyes as when he spoke of his mother, if she were true.

I have never seen such bitterness in men's faces as in the memory of their mother, when she has been untrue.

"If I had only had a mother," sobbed a boy when asked by the judge why sentence of death should not be passed upon him.

We may possibly take people into the church when they are too old; we can not take them in when they are too young, if the homes from which they come are right.

A boy may wander far from God, but if his home was true, and his mother consistent, he will come back before it is too late.

A worldly mother endangers the life of her child. A mother who is an expert at cards, or at the dance, has hardly time enough left to train her children for eternity.

Five minutes after death earthly charms will count for nothing; Christian faith will count for everything.

I pity the boy whose mother has never invited him to come to Christ.

I pity the girl who does not say that her mother is like Christ.

Many criticisms have been hurled at the Jews by people who seem to forget that our Lord was a Jew, but whatever may be said concerning this most remarkable people, this must be acknowledged by all who would be honest and fair, that the home life of God's ancient people has been most beautiful. This is true in modern times and it was specially true in Old Testament days. Where is there anything finer than the story of the Shunamite and her love for her boy, or of the widow with her cruse of oil and her saving her boys from the blight of debt? And where could there be are flawless, but I do mean to say that generally they are ordered according to right principles.

It is significant at least to know that, of the fifty-one names in the National Hall of Fame in the United States, twelve are from ministers' homes: Roger Williams, Jonathan Edwards, William Ellery Channing, Emerson, Holmes, Henry Clay, Agassiz, Bancroft, Beecher, Stowe, Lowell, and Phillips Brooks, being fifty times more than the normal proportion.

Peril in the Wrong Start.

What a peril a child is in if it has a wrong start in a home—if, for example, the child takes its first drink at home, with human nature as weak as it is, and the downward pull of life so strong.

What a protection is round about a child when it goes out from a home with the memory of all that is good and true, especially the memory of a mother. James Whitcomb Riley suggests it in one of his verses:

My mother she's so good to me,
If I was good as I could be,
I couldn't be as good, no sir,
Can't any boy be good as her.

D. L. Moody illustrated it in the tribute which I once heard him pay to his mother. One day standing just outside her home, when a company of men had gone to her to congratulate her on her birthday, I saw him put his arm around her and say to famous men from all over the world: "Gentlemen, all I am in this world I owe to my mother."

How shall the children be brought up? Perhaps it would be well to suggest some special things.

Introduce Your Children to Christ.

Always introduce your children to Christ, and do not make the mistake of waiting too long. There is a time in every child's life when impressions are easily made; the sad thing is that very often we allow them to grow to manhood or womanhood, and not having introduced them to Christ, the world has charmed them and we have lost them.

Always labor in faith, believing in God's Word, which never fails. Trust in Christ, He will never leave you, and your great question should be this: N O T, "Is my boy wandering?" or, "Are my children untrue?" B U T, "Am I true?" and "Am I believing?"

Not long ago the following was quoted in one of the metropolitan dailies: "In the old burying ground of a town we know is one narrow mound, green at this time of the year, and marked by the simplest white stone, on which are written deep a certain name and these words: 'My Mother.'"

"Every morning the year round one fresh flower is laid on this grave by a man well on in years, who, as he stoops, bares his head, whatever the weather. Then he goes to his desk in the president's office of a big factory on the other side of the town.

"More than twenty years ago this man came back to his mother in every physical way the opposite of what he now is. Ten years before that miserable home-coming his father had ordered him out of the hillside cottage, pushing him down the porch steps with a rum-reddened oath and warning him never to return.

"The people in the town said he did right, though they knew the young man's worthlessness was chiefly, if not solely, his father's fault. They felt sorry for the mother, but this son had always been a burden, and she had enough to bear in the shiftless husband, who would have let her starve, as she might have done but for a little legacy so entailed that he could not lay hands on it.

"Three years later the husband died, and she was left alone. Her friends wanted her to go to a sister in the city, but she would not. 'I must stay here to have the home ready if my boy should come back,' was her answer. And for each meal she set two places at the table, and each night turned down the covers of his bed.

"The night he came back she didn't know him at first. At no other house in the town would such a creature have been admitted. But when he dragged himself to a chair near the light and whispered he had come home to die, she took his hands in hers and holding back her tears, said to him, 'You've come home to live!'

"A few weeks of her care made him over. She got him a job in the factory, taking him to work each morning and going for him each evening, so there would be help at hand to fight off the old temptation. She lived to see him managing the place. Then, having conquered ingratitude, want and disgrace, very calmly she met the Unconquerable.

"And because he whose life had been saved and transformed by her love wanted to say the most that could be said, there are carved on the stone at the head of her last bed those words, 'My Mother.'"

An Abundant Reward.

What are the wages that true parents receive? They are abundant. There is the realization that we have done the best we could. There is the return made by the children themselves in strength of character and Christian comeliness. Then there is the reception in Heaven when the last battle is fought, the end of the journey is reached, the last tear has been shed, the last disappointment is over, and we face Him. When looking at this mother and that, He will say: "And where are the children I gave to you?"—and the answer will be—"They are all here, they are all safe Home."

It was in a little mountain cottage in Idaho. The minister had been away a day or so attending a convention, and was informed on his return that one of his parishioners was dying and wished to see her pastor. He went; he thought to be able to assist her, as her "feet were slipping o'er the brink." On entering he peered through the semi-darkness of the humble domicile, and after getting his eyes adjusted to the place found the invalid radiant and cheerful. The usual greetings ensued, and he asked how she was. "Just fine," said she "because I am getting ready to go away." "Going away! Where to?" echoed the pastor. "Why, with Him there in the corner." "I see no one in the corner," said the minister. "No," said she, smiling, "I did not think you could, for you have not received your new eyes yet. Mine have come to me since I saw you last. The messenger is Jesus, and He has come for me, and I am packing now. I'll soon be ready."

That was on Friday. She died that night. Her funeral was to occur on Sunday. Early on the day of her interment a son, who heretofore had been a godless fellow apparently unreachable, though a man of family, came to the parsonage door carrying a bundle. Upon entering the door, he said: "I have something here that breaks my heart; I cannot stand it any longer." Unwrapping the bundle it was seen to be the old-fashioned family Bible. Turning to the family record where his birth was recorded we saw these words written by the hand which that day was still, and it was dated about fifteen years before: "Lord, I promise Thee this day I will never cease praying for my children till Thou bless them." Said the grieving and weeping son: "I want my mother's God to be mine today. I want my name to be entered on the records of the Church before her face is laid out of sight, so that I can begin now to take her place in the work for the welfare of the world."

God is saying to every mother today regarding her children: "Take this child away, and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages"—and God always keeps His Word.

"The Word of God Increased"

BY WILLIAM NORRIS BURR.

ROXBORO CHURCH people were looking for a pastor. Roxboro Church was one of the brighter stars in one of those ecclesiastical galaxies that sometimes resort to "candidating" when a new pastor must be chosen. But "candidating" was a practice not in very good repute in Roxboro Church. So while the "Committee" swept the denominational range with such searchlights as were available, hoping to focus some of them on the man whom they might be willing to call "on his record," numerous "supplies" came to the pulpit of Roxboro Church. Thus the Sunday services were regularly maintained, though a new face was seen and a new voice heard in the pulpit almost every Sunday.

Very soon there was heard a ripple of expression among the members of the congregation which, simply stated, indicated that some were asking if the pastor they were looking for might not be found among the "supplies;" and soon some were speaking favorable words of one, while others were more inclined to see their need met by another whose qualifications were of a different order. And so developed the fact that the people of Roxboro Church were not all of one mind concerning the man they would have as an "under-shepherd."

"He must be a man of exceptional pulpit ability, like Dr. A. who supplied for us last month," said one group. "A man, who, by his preaching can draw in the multitude, fill the church, and—as a secondary matter, of course, but none the less a vital matter—fill up the church treasury."

Another group shook their heads at all this, and murmured something concerning "sensationalism" and "the froth of surface bubblings." "A man like Dr. B. will do better for us," they added; "a quieter and more quieting man, one who will speak to the hearts of the people, and send us out rested and equipped for the distractions of 'the common task.'"

Judge Gracey, honored as a man of poise, who was in the habit of picking up various viewpoints and piecing them together, came upon representative members of both these groups one day, and listened silently for a time to their discussion. Then he said:

"If I were asked to choose the pastor for Roxboro Church, my good friends, I should not be satisfied with one whose chief recommendation is that he has ability to 'draw a crowd,' nor with one whose only qualification commendatory is that he speaks in restful terms to busy people and who are 'tossed about with many a conflict' to say nothing of 'many a doubt.' The man who will be doing the best work as pastor of Roxboro Church will be one who will help us from the pulpit, to be sure—and I confess to you I feel certain that Dr. B. would do more for me through his sermons than would Dr. A.—and one who will also be keen enough to be finding out what you and I are in the world for, and compelling enough to persuade us to take our places and do the work which we have been called here to do. The pastor we need is the one with ability to secure team-work in Roxboro Church, following somewhat the example of the twelve when they called for 'seven men of good report' to take hold and do some things themselves, instead of leaving it all to the preachers. There are almost seven hundred of us in Roxboro Church who ought to be 'on the team' in the church work. I am for the man who shall persuade the members of our church to preach such sermons by their personal activity, consecration, loyalty and devotion to the interests of the kingdom of our Lord, that the multitude shall be drawn by the magnetic power lodged in the lives and the hearty service of men and women who 'let the Spirit of God dwell in them richly.'"

Such a man was found; and from the time of his coming the Word of God has increased in Roxboro through the ministrations of the devoted membership of Roxboro Church.

FAIR CARCASSONNE

By Annette L. Noble

THE citadel of Carcassonne in Southern France is one of the most interesting and remarkable military monuments of mediæval times existing in Europe. The hill on which it stands was crowned by a fortress nine hundred years before Christ. From that date it was held as a most important place of defence throughout the time of the Visigoths and the Saracens. Between the eighth and the thirteenth century, Counts and Viscounts ruled the castle, until Simon de Montfort made himself its master, after a siege famous in history. But the ramparts of the present vast pile were built upon Roman foundations by Louis the Ninth, afterwards known as Saint Louis of France, about the middle of the thirteenth century. From that time, Carcassonne has always belonged to France.

Carcassonne is situated in that romantic part of southern France called Languedoc, and is surrounded by wooded mountains, deep ravines and running streams. Its many hills are topped by ruined castles that overlook fertile plains and sunny vineyards, but far surpassing in size any other castle of the land, is the great stretch of this massive citadel. In order to reach it, one must climb a steep slope, cross the bed of an ancient moat, and then by a great drawbridge enter under the tall towers of the Porte Narbonaise.

Inside the walls of the fortress there are narrow cobble-paved streets, tiny houses and quaint little shops. Very beautiful, too, is the old time Cathedral of Saint Nazaire, with its fine stained glass windows and truly remarkable tombs of lords and bishops of the ancient days.

But any detailed history of Carcassonne would fill many volumes, for it would have to be a tale of mighty warriors, knightly crusaders, singing troubadours, lovely ladies, holy martyrs, bloody sieges, deeds of marvelous valor and, alas, too often a story of awful atrocities and treachery.

Carcassonne and all the surrounding region is intimately associated with the thrilling story of the pious Albigenses. After these people had been pronounced heretics, because they demanded a simpler form of worship and a purer doctrine than any they then found in the practice and teaching of the Popes and the Church at Rome, they were persecuted and slaughtered until almost exterminated.

The Albigenses were so called from Alba, a town which became one of their religious centers. Historians differ in regard to their doctrines, but their austere maxims of conduct show that their standard of morality was high, considering the age in which they lived. They rejected many errors that had crept into the Roman Church, although they borrowed traditions and some other errors from the East.

Pope Innocent the Third well knew that the exercise of free thought, or any prolonged struggle after pure morality, must surely undermine existing conditions in the Roman Church. For this reason, in the year 1207 A. D. he wrote to King Philip of France (his willing tool) that the latter might appropriate to himself, so far as he could, any lands or goods belonging to the Albigenses. He was also authorized to promise any person who would take arms against the Albigenses and slay them the same remission of all sins that was offered to Pilgrims who helped to save the Holy Land from infidels. For twenty-five years after that date the sword, the stake and the scaffold did their work all around Carcassonne. Nearly all the cities of Languedoc were laid in ruins. When the beautiful city of Beziers was stormed fifteen hundred people were massacred. Not all of them were Albigenses, but Abbot Arnold, the Roman Catholic leader, calmly gave the order—"Slay every one and God will know his own."

In this connection, too, those who are familiar with the citadel will recall the romantic history of Raymond of Toulouse, the brave and chivalrous lord of all this wide domain, and of his son Raymond the Seventh and Viscount Roger de Beziers. Counts of the Raymond line had long held sway at Carcassonne and each had cared for his vassals and had been honored by them. But one day the Pope's legate appeared before the castle gate, with a splendid cavalcade, and sternly bade Count Raymond to chastise his people and "punish with death all heretics." Instead of so doing, the brave man protected one and all as best he could until the awful papal anathema was pronounced upon him. Enraged by the curse, and hoping to help his master, one of Count Raymond's men assassinated the Pope's legate, which of course made a bad matter worse for there were few who could stand out against the power of Rome in those days.

The old count, clad in sackcloth, was scourged by priests until his blood ran down in streams before the high altar of a church. Later he was banished and the Pope promised Carcassonne and its domain to the man who could take and hold it. Meanwhile the Inquisition was established in Languedoc, and that once happy country of song and poetry, of charming rural life and of a people awakened to a clearer vision of the meaning of Christianity—became like a howling wilderness. But Count Raymond's adherents were not all Albigenses nor were all of them exterminated. When, after a time, he reappeared they gathered loyally around him, as of old. All were eager to welcome him and his noble son Raymond the Seventh.

Carcassonne had been given to Simon de Montfort, but now in the battle that ensued for its possession Simon de Montfort was slain and again the Counts of Toulouse held Carcassonne; but with diminished powers and smaller possessions.

From 1226 to 1270 A. D. Louis the Ninth was King of France and although he was a fanatical churchman he was, according to his light, a good and just ruler. He protected his subjects, achieved very many fine things for his country and was later canonized by the Pope. He led crusades from France to Egypt and to Palestine and died during the last crusade. In the course of time, a daughter of Count Raymond the Seventh married the brother of Saint Louis and so, before the end of the thirteenth century, Carcassonne with all its domain pertained to the French crown.

There is a very old and pretty ballad, once often quoted, about a poor peasant who all his life looked at the great citadel, only four leagues from his home, but only saw it "dimly from the heights" and "beyond the mountains blue." From childhood he longed and planned to journey there, but the time was never right. One day, when he was eighty years of age, he told his longing to a kindly traveller, and so the ballad runs:

"I have not seen Carcassonne,"
Thus sighed a peasant bent with age,
Half dreaming in his chair.
I said, "My friend, come go with me
Tomorrow, then thine eyes shall see
Those streets that seem so fair."
That night there came for passing soul
The church bell's low and solemn toll.
He never saw gay Carcassonne—
Who has not known a Carcassonne?

How to Love God

BY WARREN G. PARTRIDGE, D. D.

Some time ago I read the wonderful life of John G. Paton, the successful Scotch Missionary to the South Sea Islands. He tells of the devotion of his aged grandmother. She had lost her beloved son, who disappeared mysteriously; yet for over twenty long years she went to call him home twice every day. Mr. Paton saw his white-haired and affectionate old grandmother every night, before retiring and locking the door, throw wide open the front door, and call out into the darkness, "Come hame, my boy Walter, your Mither wearies sair." And every morning, at early break of day for over twenty years, the aged woman toddled up a hill-top, and gazing with tear-filled eyes toward the south, she searched for the form of her returning boy. And she prayed morning and night, and many times during each day for over twenty years, for his safety and return.

The Bible represents God as saying, "As one whom his mother comforteth so will I comfort you." Since we have in the loving God the tenderness of a mother and the affection of a father, how can we help loving such an ideal heavenly parent!

It is the Fatherhood of God that elicits our fondest affection for Him. And his Fatherly heart is so tender and capacious that it includes all the compassion and loyalty of an ideal mother. "We love Him because He first loved us." Love cannot be forced. God does not compel men to love Him by threats. He shows Himself a lover. And the proof of love is unselfish tenderness and self-sacrifice. God proved the riches of His divine affection for us, by giving His Son to die for us upon the cross.

Echoes

BY CORA S. DAY.

The youthful members of the little picnic party were amusing themselves with the echo across the lake. Merry snatches of song, ripples of laughter and gay greetings came back in odd abbreviation, faint yet clear, from the cliffs across the beautiful sheet of water. Then one of the boys, in a spirit of mischief, sent forth a dismal wail that came back to them like a cry of despair from a lost soul. There was an instant chorus of protest. One girl voiced the general sentiment when she cried:

"Don't, Paul, give it only happy sounds—they're the only echoes we want to hear."

The chaperone laughed softly.

"That reminds me of a last week's experience," she began. "Want to hear about it?" and she laughed again as they gathered willingly about her on the grassy slope.

"It was a dull, rainy day. I had promised two old friends I'd call, so I went. I'll not name names—but the first old friend I found blue as indigo. 'It's such a gloomy day' she lamented. 'A day like this always brings up all the sad memories of my life. I'll be ill from it tomorrow,' and she sighed as gustily as the wind in the chimney. I was glad to get away without breaking into tears. The other old friend was different. 'Of course it's bound to rain sometimes,' she argued. 'But I've been too busy thinking of old times to fret. Such good old times as I've had—His goodness has followed me all the days of my life. My memories have made sunshine for me this dull day.' The chaperone paused. "Echoes of the past—glad or sad. Which sort of memory echo do you think most worth while—best in the sight of Him who sends all our days for good?"

Fruition

BY MINNIE LEONA UPTON.

In a dark, untended corner
Of a garden broad and fair,
A little plant grew blithely,
Though there was none to care.

Only a few stray sunbeams
Could down to its dim nook dart,
But it gathered them, and stored them
Safe in its brave, warm heart.

And there a hope sprang buoyant,
And as the days went by
It grew to a sweet assurance:
"I shall bear a blossom—I."

And lo, one day in Autumn,
A blossom, with heart of flame,
Crowned it with radiant splendor—
And then the black frost came.

There in its gloomy corner
The plant lay down to die,
But the nightwind heard a whisper:
"I bore a blossom—I!"

The Secret of Contentment

BY Z. I. DAVIS.

HUMILITY, love and forgiveness are among the great things that Jesus taught both by example and precept. They were lightly esteemed among men at the beginning of the Christian Era.

Apart from these heavenly graces, contentment is an impossibility. Pride, hatred and revenge are accompanied by restlessness and bitter dissatisfaction. Briars and thorns are the fruits of their sowing.

Humbleness of mind and meekness are the first steps to a contented spirit. All heavenly virtues spring from them. The Apostle Paul warned men not to think of themselves more highly than they ought. A man must see himself in his true light before he can be humble. The person who thinks there is no one greater than himself is apt to be proud, arrogant and selfish.

As we catch the first gleam of His Heavenly Face,
And feel our hearts melt in His Infinite Grace,
The portal swings open, He enters the soul,
He speaks as the Waters, and we are made whole.

The Bible has been called a "Bundle of Promises." The supreme promise is found in John 3:16, "For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him, should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Love is a divine attribute. It was love that filled the heart of Christ, and brought Him into this world of sin and sorrow that we might be redeemed.

John, the beloved disciple, said, "He that hateth his brother is a murderer." No stronger proof of our relationship with God can be given, than that we have our hearts full of love for humanity.

In answer to the question, "What is the greatest command?" Jesus said, "Thou shalt love the Lord, thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy mind and with all thy strength, and thy neighbor as thyself."

Without love to God and humanity, there is no real religion. This is the condition of right relationship with our Heavenly Father, and with His children. It can not be counterfeited. It involves not a negative, but an active love, of which we are conscious, and whose presence in our hearts prompts us to beautiful deeds of needed service, and to lives of self-denial. Sin is rooted in selfishness. Jesus Christ is the only cure. Until we know Him and respond to His healing touch, we are not willing to part with our sins. The paths of sinful pleasure, no matter how alluring, never lead to content.

David, the sweet singer of Israel, wrote, "I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness." When we are like God, then the joy of the Lord is the strength of our hearts.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS

(INTRODUCTORY NOTE: With this issue of the AMERICAN MESSENGER we inaugurate a new department for the discussion of live religious problems of the day. We invite our readers to address letters to the Editor of the AMERICAN MESSENGER, setting forth any question concerning the religious life, the discussion of which may prove helpful and interesting for the general Christian public. Only the initials of the writer will be given in connection with any letter that is printed. The answers to the problems thus presented will be given by Rev. Edgar Whitaker Work, D. D., Pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church of New York City and one of the Contributing Editors to our paper. We present herewith the first letter received and Dr. Work's reply to the question raised by our correspondent.)

"DEAR SIR:

"I have recently suffered a severe bereavement, and my mind is filled with wanderings and questionings about the future life, especially about recognition after death. Will you kindly tell me what ground there is for believing that we shall know our dear ones in the other life?"

"Yours respectfully,

"W. B. E."

DEAR FRIEND:

There are few persons who have not been troubled by questions about the future life. When sorrow comes and loved ones pass beyond our sight, such questions become personal and acute. There are many who would willingly give all that they possess if they could have their questions satisfactorily answered. An all-wise God has left many problems unsolved, many questions unanswered. Doubtless it is best that it should be so. If there were no mysteries about the future life, if the veil were wholly removed and we were permitted to penetrate the secrets of the other world, something of its power and fascination for us would be lost. We must be content to trust a loving Providence for the joy and plenitude of the future life.

There are three grounds for believing that we shall see and know our loved ones in God's presence in the home beyond.

The first ground is just that intense longing of the heart which voices itself in these anxious questions. We cannot believe that we shall never see them again. Our affection cannot let them go. For a longer or shorter time we shall dwell apart, and then our hearts tell us that we shall look again upon the faces of those whom we have loved and lost. This expectation of the heart amounts really to a fixed belief. As we believe that we shall see our Saviour face to face, so also we know in our hearts that we shall see and know our dear ones in the Saviour's presence. This argument is in itself almost conclusive. It is inconceivable that this deep longing of the universal human heart is nothing more than a will-o'-the-wisp that is luring us on to disappointment.

But this is not all. Reason also has something to say on the subject. The change produced by death is appalling to us. The light of the eye goes out; a pall of silence falls upon the lips; the grace and motion of the body fail. But these are only outward changes. It is impossible to believe that the real life within suffers any such change as we sadly witness on the outside. The soul survives. That clear intellect, those strong emotions of love and hope, those eager intelligences of the spirit—we cannot believe that death changes such real elements of life. No wonder Tennyson spoke of death as "a laughable impossibility." He felt that death could not touch the real personality within.

And if this be so, is there not reason to believe that personal identity remains? The personality which we have learned to know in this life, however changed its condition and environment, will be still the same. Surely there will survive in the other life such familiar signs of personal identity as will enable us without difficulty to recognize those whose very souls we have known and loved in this life. Science contributes to this conviction, for not a few of our ablest students have become convinced of the permanency of personal identity in the other world.

If personal identity remains, how can we help recognizing our friends after death? There is a partial analogy in the experiences of this life. How often we have been surprised at the ease with which we have recognized by some token of personality those whom we have not seen for many years. A child may grow to manhood and still bear about him some unmistakable mark of his early identity. Something like this will be realized in the recognition of our loved ones in the future life. There will be sure tokens of their familiar presence which cannot be mistaken.

Beside these reasonings of heart and mind, there are many intimations of the Word of God on the subject. The field is too broad to enter fully here. We suggest to anxious inquirers that they "search the Scriptures." They will be surprised to find how abundant is the testimony, much of it indirect to be sure, yet quite unmistakable. David's lament for instance over his child means nothing less than recognition—"He shall not return to me, but I shall go to him."

The incident of the Mount of Transfiguration when the disciples recognized Moses and Elias supports our faith in this matter. True they had not known them in life, but the point is that there was personal identity that could be apprehended.

So also the resurrection appearances of Our Lord bear upon this subject. It is not strange that Mary and others were not prompt to recognize Jesus, for their eyes were holden, as Luke says of the two with whom the Master walked and talked on the way to Emmaus. In this last instance it was some familiar sign or custom of Jesus in breaking the bread that restored to them the realization of His unchanged personality.

But more than anything else we can console ourselves with the certain implications of the teachings of the Bible about the future life. That life is never pictured as a solitary life. There is no loneliness in Heaven. God is the Father of the whole family in Heaven and earth. The ties that have bound us here cannot be ignored there. "In my Father's house are many mansions"—many dwelling places. How can there be dwelling places in the future life without recognition?

No doubt the changes that will transpire will far exceed our expectation. Eye hath not seen nor ear heard. But personal identity must remain, and we believe that around this permanency there will be gathered in a wholly new and transformed environment those familiar facts and graces of personality that have constituted the charm of our loved ones here, and that cannot elude or mislead us there.

EDGAR WHITAKER WORK.

PRINTED PREACHERS

Under the Great Live Oaks of Texas

One of the veteran missionary colporters of the American Tract Society is Dr. H. V. Kolbye. For many years he has been using "printed preachers" in the form of tracts, leaflets, books and periodicals for the dissemination of the Gospel truth.

A recent photograph received from Dr. Kolbye, which is reproduced on this page of our paper, shows the automobile outfit which he employs in his journeys through the country, and illustrates how he reaches both young and old alike with the attractive Christian literature that he carries.

Dr. Kolbye is working under the direction of Rev. George Whitefort, Superintendent of Colportage in the Southern Agency of the American Tract Society, who writes:

"Dr. Kolbye is holding Gospel meetings, organizing and outfitting Sunday Schools with the Christian literature that they need, and preaching under the great live oaks of the State of Texas.

"He is holding meetings on the frontier, where some of the live oaks cover an area one hundred feet square and shelter as many as two thousand people under their spreading branches.

"Assuredly Dr. Kolbye is doing a very fine work and is showing the people that the American Tract Society is a great home missionary agency."

A Message for Prisoners

Rev. Samuel Mueller is carrying on missionary colportage in the State of Oregon. He gives the following interesting incidents that have occurred in connection with his work:

"While preparing a package of tracts to take with me for this month's work I noticed one that had been written especially for a prisoner. I was about to lay it aside, thinking that I would have no occasion to use it, but God's Spirit seemed to say, 'Take it along.' I then started on my journey, and when the train stopped at Garden Home, a State officer came into the car with two prisoners. Now I knew why I had felt constrained to take the tracts with me. Asking the officer for permission to give the tract to the men, I handed it to them together with several other tracts, and spoke a few words concerning the liberty with which Christ makes us free. As I returned to my seat I could not help feeling deeply for these unfortunate men and prayed to the Lord to save their souls.

"At Dallas I addressed a small congregation of German Mennonites from Russia. They received me kindly, and extended their warm hospitality. At St. Paul I had occasion to speak to a Roman Catholic, whose mind seemed open to the Word. At Newburg I had a conversation with another Roman Catholic, whose heart was overflowing with gratitude to the Lord for delivering his wife and child from dangerous illness.

"At Brooks I found a large gang of Italian laborers, who lived in a freight car. The weather being too bad for them to work on the railroad, I had the opportunity of doing some missionary work among them. I gave them all the Italian tracts which I had with me and arranged with the Evangelical minister, Rev. Guy R. Stover, to distribute more which I ordered sent to him. I also sent some Chinese tracts by mail to some Christian Chinese, who promised to hand these tracts to their neighbors."

DISTRIBUTING CHRISTIAN LITERATURE ON THE ROAD IN TEXAS.

In New York State

Rev. Samuel Coddard is circulating Christian literature as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society in the northern part of New York State. In a recent letter he thus describes some interesting features of his work:

"During the past month I have gone out into the villages and hamlets for some forty miles around the city of Buffalo. I called upon nearly four thousand people. Here again I was most cordially received by the people of God.

"In one village a poor woman, a widow, took me by both hands and said, 'Come in! I am so glad to see you. The books you bring are so helpful. I value them next to my Bible.' After I had spent some time in reading the blessed Word to her, she took the book, 'The Old Time Religion,' by Dr. David James Burrell. I left her cottage much refreshed and praised the Lord for her strong Christian faith.

"Upon another occasion a poor man stopped me and thanked me for giving to him the temperance tract, 'Buy Your Own Cherries.' He said, 'Since reading that tract I have given up drinking, and now I have found the blessed Saviour.' I bade him hold fast and be of good cheer, remembering that the loving Saviour would keep him safe."

In Foreign Fields

Christian literature in the vernacular is the strong right arm of the missionaries at work in foreign fields. Realizing this fact the American Tract Society has for many years sent cash appropriations to the mission stations abroad to be used in the publication of Christian literature in the different languages used at those stations.

A few months ago a number of cash appropriations were forwarded to various foreign mission stations and the acknowledgments that have come to the American Tract Society in response to those remittances indicate very clearly the wisdom of this form of missionary endeavor. For example, Dr. S. H. Wainright, Executive Secretary of the Christian Literature Society of Japan has written:

"I am greatly pleased to acknowledge receipt of the appropriation of $100.00 sent by the American Tract Society to the Christian Literature Society of Japan. Acknowledgment will be made at the next meeting of our Executive Committee, but I want to assure you that the Christian Literature Society most heartily appreciates this manifestation of interest in our work.

"Last year we published 20,000,000 pages of tracts. This year we will get out two series, one for village evangelization and the other for students. The first is called 'The True Life Series,' and the subjects will be as follows: 'The True Life,' 'The True God,' 'The True Worship,' etc. The second series we call the 'Whatever is Pure Series.' On the face of each tract in the latter series, the passage from Philippians 4:8, beginning, 'Whatever things are pure,' will be printed, and the titles of the publications will be as follows: 'The Pure Heart,' 'The Pure Lips,' 'The Pure Body,' 'Pure Art,' etc.

"It will be seen from the above that our tract work is systematic, and that the object in view is to disseminate Christian truth."

Rev. E. M. Wherry, D. D., has written from Ludhiana, India, in part as follows:

"Your welcome draft come yesterday, and I wish to thank you for this helpful gift.

"The Tract and Book Societies of India, nine in number, recently met in Allahabad, and discussed the situation as to Christian literature. As a result we formed a Federation of Religious Tract and Literature Societies, to be known as the 'All India Federation of Literature and Tract Societies,' the object of which is to promote efficiency by a larger and more comprehensive outlook, presenting a united front which will promote co-operation and prevent overlapping and desultory effort. We shall make the Indian Bookman, published by the Madras Christian Literature Society, our organ, and through it we shall place full descriptive catalogues of all books published in the vernaculars of India. I think this will work a new era in vernacular literature for India."

The Consecration of School Life

Proverbs 4:1-13.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Sept. 25. Consecrated study. 2 Tim. 2:19-26.
- T. Sept. 26. Power of influence. Rom. 14:13-23.
- W. Sept. 27. Worthy behaviour. Eph. 4:1-6.
- T. Sept. 28. Witnessing for Christ. Luke 12:1-9.
- F. Sept. 29. Truth-speaking. Mal. 2:1-9.
- S. Sept. 30. Honesty. 1 Sam. 12:1-5.

At this season of the year, when young people all over the land are resuming their school work this topic comes as a timely reminder that there is just as imperative a call for consecration in the schoolroom as in any other sphere of life.

Some of the fundamental principles of education are set forth in the fourth chapter of the Book of Proverbs, from which our Scripture selection is taken. In these verses we are taught that wisdom and righteousness are inseparable. In other words education is not merely a matter of the head but it involves the heart. It means not only the development of the brain but it includes also the cultivation of the right emotions.

The best education is a Christian education. Indeed an education which lacks the Christian element is incomplete. Only by the study of Christian ideals can there be imparted that well-rounded view of life which characterizes the truly cultured man or woman.

Evidences of Consecration

A Christian will show consecration in school life by earnest devotion to study. In the schoolroom there is offered the opportunity for the acquisition of knowledge, and one who is consecrated to the highest ideals will make the most of the golden privilege to acquire wisdom.

Consecration in the schoolroom will be evidenced by worthy behaviour. Discipline will not be a problem to the teacher whose scholars are actuated by consecrated motives.

Strict fidelity to the truth will be another of the evidences of consecration in school life. And the atmosphere of the schoolroom where truth prevails at all times will make it seem like a heavenly place in Christ Jesus.

The Great Teacher

It will help both teacher and scholar to lead a consecrated life in the schoolroom if it is realized that the Great Teacher is ever present with us. As some one has wisely said, "Living your school life with Christ does not mean a less enjoyable time, but the most glorious happiness all the time."

The greatest aim that we can set before ourselves is the development of character. In reality the principal object of school life is to help us in the attainment of such a character as will be a blessing to ourselves and our neighbors all through our earthly career.

The friends with whom we associate have much to do with the moulding of our character. The best friend whose companionship we may have is the Lord Jesus Christ. If we take Him to be our constant companion both in and out of school, and we are fully consecrated to His service, then our school days will fit us for the after experiences of life, which is God's school for His children of a larger growth.

What New Work Should Our Society Undertake?

Exodus 14:8-15.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Oct. 2. Missions. Acts 13:1-5.
- T. Oct. 3. Quiet Hour. Luke 6:12.
- W. Oct. 4. Tenth Legion. Mal. 3:7-18.
- T. Oct. 5. Peace Union. Isa. 2:1-4.
- F. Oct. 6. Evangelism. Prov. 11:30.
- S. Oct. 7. Life-Work Recruits. Isa. 6:8.

Just as surely as Jehovah spoke unto the children of Israel through the lips of His servant Moses bidding them go forward, so the Lord is bidding the young people of to-day to arise and go forward into new avenues of Christian toil so that they may aid in hastening the progress of His Kingdom.

It must rest with the members of each individual society to decide just what forms of new work should be undertaken this fall. But let each society make a careful study of this question, and having decided what new endeavors should be made, let every member loyally and enthusiastically support the advance movements that are undertaken.

The Daily Bible Readings for this topic suggest a number of lines of work which each and every society may very appropriately emphasize. The great enterprise of Missions, both at home and abroad, calls for ever-increasing support, and if your society is not already doing its utmost, this is an excellent work for you to undertake. The Tenth Legion, whose members are pledged to give one-tenth of their income to the cause of Christ is calling for new recruits, and doubtless there are many members in every society who might well be enrolled in this splendid fellowship of giving. The Quiet Hour emphasizes a side of life that is sorely needed in this busy, rushing age, and it would be well if each society would present the opportunity for those who so desire to become Comrades of the Quiet Hour.

In an era of the world's history where militarism presents the most dangerous obstacle to the realization of the vision of a world at peace, it is well to emphasize the claim of the Peace Union and every kindred agency upon those who are professed followers of the Prince of Peace.

Every Christian Endeavor Society should be engaged in some form of evangelistic service. If your society is not doing some definite work for the winning of souls, now is the time to begin.

Individual Christians should ask themselves the question, "Ought I to be a Life-work recruit?" That means, "Should I devote my whole life to some form of Christian service?" There is a loud call for Christian workers of every kind, and every Christian young man and young woman should thoughtfully and earnestly ask whether or not the Master is calling to a life that shall be wholly yielded to His service.

There is one field of Christian enterprise where young people may be of great service, and that is in the circulation of good Christian literature. This is a line of work which calls loudly for increased support and for more workers. It is also a line of service which brings to those who engage in it a rich and satisfying reward in the knowledge that they have been instrumental in spreading the gospel message through the printed page and have thus scattered seed the blessed fruitage of which will be gathered in eternity itself.

Public Spirit and How to Cultivate It.

Psalms 122:1-9.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Oct. 9. Civic pride. Acts 21:37-29.
- T. Oct. 10. Cleansing a city. Mal. 4:1-6.
- W. Oct. 11. Passion for civic purity. Jer. 33:1-9.
- T. Oct. 12. Love of the people. Rom. 11:13-36.
- F. Oct. 13. High-minded officials. 2 Sam. 23:1-7.
- S. Oct. 14. The coming city. Rev. 21:10-27.

This topic which is suggested for use on Citizenship Sunday, is very appropriate in view of the approaching national elections, which call for the display of the best public spirit as the citizens of our land proceed to the selection of those who are to preside over the destinies of the people in state and nation.

Public spirit means taking an interest in the welfare of the people at large. It is opposed to that narrow view of life which is concerned simply with oneself and one's immediate family.

Lack of public spirit is one of the real perils of our national life, and it is well for the young people of our land to do their utmost to stimulate and cultivate this vital quality.

The Development of Public Spirit

A good public spirit is developed by the cultivation of real neighborliness. The observance of the Golden Rule cannot fail to promote public spirit in local affairs.

When we remember that through the modern devices of the railroad, the telegraph and the telephone the whole country is brought together into neighborly relations, the importance of carrying the principle of the Golden Rule into the larger and broader relations of life becomes at once apparent.

Public spirit and patriotism are practically synonymous expressions, and the cultivation of a spirit of devotion to our country will inevitably result in the development of that public spirit which is so greatly needed in our land.

Christianity is not exclusively individualistic in its nature, though there are some who have thus misinterpreted its spirit. Christianity calls for the recognition of the best interests of the community and for the practice of social service, and these activities depend in the last analysis upon the cultivation of the right public spirit.

Public spirit is needed in both city and country alike. Though the forms in which this spirit is manifested may vary according to the different necessities of each individual case, yet there is wide scope for its exercise in both rural and urban communities.

Public spirit is based upon unselfishness. It requires knowledge and discernment. It calls for full information and for the accurate statement of facts.

Public spirit must be backed up by moral bravery in order to accomplish definite results. Without courage there is no public spirit that is worth mentioning.

Public spirit calls for the gift of continuance. Perseverance is a prime requisite for those who would achieve anything that is worth-while in the line of civic benefit.

Public spirit should be linked with consecration. The best Christian is the one who is most devoted to the public welfare.

Manliness and Womanliness

Nehemiah 6:1-13; Esther 4:6-16.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Oct. 16. Be men! 1 Cor. 16:13, 14.
- T. Oct. 17. Manliness in danger. Dan. 5:17-31.
- W. Oct. 18. Manliness in temptation. Acts 8:14-25.
- T. Oct. 19. Women's tenderness. Acts 9:36-43.
- F. Oct. 20. Women's revolt. Esth. 1:10-22.
- S. Oct. 21. Women's faithfulness. John 20:1-18.

The Bible presents to us many shining illustrations of manliness and womanliness, and among these Nehemiah and Esther stand out very prominently as examples of that nobility of character which should characterize every true man and every true woman.

It is interesting to notice how many noble qualities may be possessed in common by both men and women. For example, we notice in the case of Nehemiah and Esther, they were both full of courage. Nothing could quell either the dauntless spirit of this brave governor of the Jews or the heroic attitude of this noble queen. Again Nehemiah and Esther were both actuated by the deepest patriotism. They were both devoted to the love of their countrymen and to the best welfare of their fellow-citizens. Furthermore they were both inspired by the most lofty purpose, and their supreme object in life was the attainment of that purpose.

Other Shining Examples

It would be a profitable exercise to name as many other illustrations as possible of Bible characters exhibiting true manliness and womanliness.

In the Old Testament Joseph and Ruth, and in the New Testament Paul and Mary have been named by Amos R. Wells as supreme examples of manly men and womanly women.

Moses may be cited as another instance of a splendid type of manliness and Dorcas may be mentioned as a fine illustration of true womanliness.

Suggestive Thoughts

Kindness is a quality that is just as essential to true manliness as to real womanliness. The noblest type of manhood is found in the man who is gentle, or as we are wont to say, a gentleman.

Faithfulness is an essential characteristic of every true woman and every sincere man. Fidelity is a priceless quality, and without it no character can be perfect.

The Lord Jesus Christ has been spoken of as the first true gentleman. He stands out in human history as the highest embodiment of manliness that the world has ever known.

The secret of true manliness and of womanliness lies in the possession of the Christ spirit. It is the presence of the Master in our hearts that makes us true men and true women.

OCTOBER 29.

The Rewards of Religion

1 Corinthians 3:6-23.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

- M. Oct. 23. A good name. Prov. 22:1.
- T. Oct. 24. Respect of men. Rom. 14:16-19.
- W. Oct. 25. Heart's peace. Ps. 91:1-10.
- T. Oct. 26. Abounding joy. Ps. 16:1-11.
- F. Oct. 27. Fruitful service. Col. 1:10.
- S. Oct. 28. Glory. 2 Tim. 4:6-8.

It is suggested that the meeting at which topic is considered be an "Honorary Members' Meeting." This is a good suggestion, for honorary members out of their mature Christian experience may throw a flood of light upon this subject.

The rewards of religion are so many and so rich that we cannot enumerate nor describe them in detail. We can only glance at a few of the most striking facts.

It is one of the eternal principles of human life that every action meets with some return. In the words of the Apostle, "Each shall receive his own reward according to his own labor." But in the infinite mercy of God the rewards which we receive as the result of our acceptance of the Christian faith are immeasurably beyond our own deserts. It is by the grace of Christ that we are rewarded by the gift of His unsearchable riches.

We are not to embrace religion merely because of the rewards which its offers us. We should accept the Christian faith because it is the only right and wise thing to do. And we should think of the rewards that come to the Christian not as payment for services rendered but as the free gift of God's infinite grace.

Among the rich rewards which the Christian receives we may name the sense of abiding peace which comes to those who put their trust in the Lord. Another reward is the consciousness of the divine presence which the friendship of Jesus assures. Still another reward is the satisfaction which comes from service rendered to God and to man.

Even in this world the rewards of religion constitute a rich and satisfying inheritance to every true child of God. But when we consider the rewards that await us in the world to come, we realize how infinitely rich are those who have yielded themselves to God. For eternal life and joy are the portion of all those who bear the name of Christ and who have witnessed a good confession and have fought a good fight with the world, the flesh and the devil.

It has been well said that religion never gives prizes, for a prize can be won by only a single person, but religion offers rewards which are within the reach of all who will accept its teachings.

Our Young Folks

Going to Kindergarten in China

BY JANIE RICE BIGELOW.

THERE is in Canton, China, a home where live a dear little boy named Sun Tak, and his sister, Ah So. Ah So really means "little sister," and the Chinese often call little baby girls by this name until they are big enough to go to school.

Being Christian Chinese, their parents were eager to send Sun Tak and Ah So to a missionary kindergarten but it was a long distance from their home and too far for the children to walk. Besides, the streets were crowded and very narrow so that it would be unsafe for a little boy and girl to walk alone.

How do you think these little folks managed? They did not go in a street car, nor in a carriage, nor in a sedan chair. Some of their classmates were carried on the backs of servants, but Sun Tak's father could not well afford two servants to go with them, and Ah So must go too. But it was a very good plan, the children thought, when their father told them how they were to go.

In Canton, there are people who make baskets and chairs of bamboo and rattan. Well, Sun Tak's father had basket chairs made for them in which they could sit safely without fear of falling. He tied strong ropes to them, put one on each end of a pole, and a servant carried them on his shoulders through the crowded streets to the kindergarten every day. Their basket chairs hung from the ends of the pole—like the little plates of the scales in which the druggist weighs medicine—but it was something more valuable than medicine they contained, their mother thought, when she saw them go out into the street.

If you could see those streets, you would not wonder they were glad to be carried in baskets. Why, if two little girls should stand in the middle of the street and should join hands, they could easily touch the wall on either side in some places. So you see, little children cannot have auto rides there, and, if they go out with their mother, they must stay close by her side lest they get lost in the crowd.

Now, let us watch Sun Tak and Ah So starting off to kindergarten. Their chairs are made with flat bottoms for little feet to rest upon. They are very comfortable indeed and have doors, or half covers, that open to let them in and out, much like baby's high chair at table. It was great fun that first morning when their chair-baskets were brought out. The neighbors were there to see them get in, and how they laughed as they were lifted into their seats! They sat quietly enough, though holding on to the sides, when the servant put his pole through the ropes—for Chinese children are taught to be quiet at times and can be sober as judges, however full of fun they may be.

At last they were ready. The doors were securely closed, the servant squatted down to get the pole on his shoulder, and with a good-natured grunt lifted the chairs, the children swinging from the ends of the pole like birds in their nests. Then, waving a merry goodbye, away they went down the street to the tune of the servant's chant, "Heigh-ahoi-a, heigh-a-ho! Heigh-a-hoi-a, ho!" For those who carry burdens in China often have a way of chanting.

Let us follow them down the street. What shall we see on the way to kindergarten? Such crowds of people! The servant keeps calling to them to make way, for it is the rule that all must make way for those who carry things through the streets on their shoulders just as we make way for vehicles and street cars. They have no wagons, no carriages and no cars in these streets of Canton, remember, so many things must be carried through the streets on people's shoulders.

As we go along on either side we see many little shops where fruit and vegetables are sold, grocery stores, blacksmith shops, shoe stores, candy stores—many things you see every day in the streets, and you can easily tell what they are.

just ahead and he stops, puts down his tubs and takes out a fish, a real, live fish! He has been calling "Buy fish, buy fish," and this woman wants fish for breakfast.

Then there is a man with flowers, a little boy with peanuts, another with cakes all pink and round made of rice flour. Now, we hear a baby crying. Where is it? Look all around, you see no baby. Ah, there it is on the back of its nurse with a cloth tied over it to keep it from falling. You can just see its head and feet sticking out. The nurse pats it gently and makes a kind of "Coo, coo" sound, which baby knows so well means, "Go to sleep, don't cry."

SUN TAK AND AH SO GOING TO KINDERGARTEN IN CANTON, CHINA.

But there are some things you could never guess at all. There is a man with baskets over his shoulder, too, very much like the ones Sun Tak and Ah So are in, and he keeps calling in a loud voice, "Bo hai, bo hai." When he comes to a place where the street is wider, he puts down his baskets, takes out a stool, a hammer, an awl, a box of tacks, and some leather. Yes, you know him now, he mends shoes, and goes around to people's doors to get work to do. "Bo hai" means "shoes," you see!

But there is another with tubs hanging from the end of his pole. You hear him calling, "Mai yuc, mai yuc." As we get nearer, the water, we can see, is splashing around in the tubs. Presently some one calls at a doorway

If you wish to try a little Chinese girl's way of playing nurse, take a large handkerchief, fasten a long piece of tape on each corner, put your doll on your back, head just between the shoulders, then lean over a bit till you spread the handkerchief over it and let the tape come under each arm and over the shoulders. Now gather the four ends together in front and tie Miss Dolly securely in place. Baby's feet would come under the arms over the tape, maybe Dolly's can too, but she will not fall if they hang straight. Little children in China enjoy greatly playing with their dolls in this way.

And now we come to a long street much wider than the others. There are only high walls on either side. Very wide street doors open here and there into the homes of the people. Inside the walls are sometimes lovely flower gardens with trees and birds and goldfish, and lotus ponds.

One other thing you must see. Here it is in front of this door, a big red lantern. That means there is a little baby in that home. Yes, and there comes a servant girl with a basket full of red eggs. They look like Easter eggs, you say. And so they do, but they are a present baby's mother is sending to a friend because baby is four weeks old!

But here comes a group of merry children running to meet us. They have spied Sun Tak's head above the basket, and he is calling to them. The servant carefully enters the wide street door, lets down the basket-chairs, and helps Sun Tak out—just in time, for the teacher has come to the Kindergarten entrance and he must bow "good morning."

Ah So must be content with smiling up from her basket. Two black eyes shine like stars under her red cap at the look of surprise on teacher's face—for who ever heard of children being brought to Kindergarten in baskets before?

Our Collectors' Column

Many boys and girls are fond of collecting things, and it has therefore been suggested that we have a "Collectors' Column" on Our Young Folks' Page. Accordingly we have decided to give all our young friends an opportunity to write to the Editor of the AMERICAN MESSENGER telling about the various collections which they have made.

One very popular pursuit is the making of a stamp collection, and we would be very glad to hear from any of our young readers who have been collecting stamps. Tell us how large a variety you have secured, and if you have obtained any very special specimens, please be sure to mention them.

A coin collection is always an object of interest, and we should like to hear from any one who owns such a collection.

Picture post cards are easily obtained, and many young folks have made very choice collections of these. There are many uses to which these picture post cards may be put, and in a later issue the Editor will tell one very useful and delightful way of disposing of all the picture post cards you may collect.

Some of the older boys and girls have cameras and are making a collection of photographs. The Editor would be very glad to hear from those who are collecting photographs, and if you can submit a pretty photograph which may be reproduced on this page, it would add a great deal of interest to Our Young Folks' Department.

Pressed flowers and leaves make a very instructive and entertaining collection. Those who live by the seashore may also prepare a collection of pressed seaweeds or of seashells.

There may be other collections which have not been mentioned which have been gathered by some of Our Young Folks. If so, do not fail to let us know what you have been collecting and what success you have had.

Before the next number of the AMERICAN MESSENGER goes to press, we hope that we may have a goodly number of letters which we may print in our Collectors' Column. Write at once to the Editor of the AMERICAN MESSENGER, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y., and your letter may be in time to insert in our next issue.

CHURCH NEWS

Meeting of the Federal Council of Churches

The Christian forces of America will be gathered as never before in their history at the Third Quadrennial Council of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, which will convene for a week beginning Wednesday evening, December 6, 1916, at St. Louis.

The headquarters of the council will be the commodious Second Baptist Church. The local arrangements will be made by a committee of the St. Louis Federation of Churches, of which Rev. W. C. Bitting is the chairman.

The reports of the various Commissions on Evangelism, Social Service, Peace and Arbitration, Christian Education, Foreign Missions, Temperance, Family Life, Sunday Observance, and Country Life will this year consist of a thorough and complete survey of all these movements on the part of the churches and allied interdenominational organizations. The Home Missions Council will present a complete review of the entire field committed to that body.

The Commission on State and Local Federations will give a four years' review of the progress of these bodies, and the more recently organized Commission on Federated Movements will present its program, past, present and future, for the development of the local field, including a session to be given for a review of the interdenominational movements participating in the work of this Commission, including the following bodies: United Society of Christian Endeavor, Laymen's Missionary Movement, Missionary Education Movement, The Young Men's Christian Association, The Young Women's Christian Association, International Sunday School Association, American Sunday School Union, Sunday School Council for Evangelical Denominations, Council of Women for Home Missions, Home Missions Council, The Epworth League, Adult Bible Classes and Brotherhood Movements.

There will be a two-day session of the conference of representatives of theological seminaries, and the Joint Commission appointed four years ago on the study of social and industrial questions in the seminaries will present its findings. In addition, there will be reports of several special committees, including the Committee of One Hundred which carried on religious work at the Panama Pacific Exposition, the Commission on Relations with Japan, the recent Christian Embassy to that country, and the Committee appointed on the Special Interests of the Colored Denominations.

The official delegates from the thirty constituent bodies of the council will number about four hundred and fifty, and in addition there will be a large attendance of members of the various Commissions which number in all about one thousand, the representatives of the theological seminaries, and of the several interdenominational movements.

Each Commission has been instructed by the Executive Committee of the Council to present a complete review of all the activities of the churches and religious bodies relating to the various phases of Christian work covered by these Commissions.

A Committee of Fifteen has been appointed, which is under instruction to present to the Council a review and appraisal, not only of the work of the Federal Council itself for the Quadrennium, but of the federative movement in general, with recommendations for the future policy of the Council.

Owing to the large extent to which the Federal Council has recently participated in international movements and because of the present world situation it is probable that large attention will be given to the international relations of the churches.

The Pilgrim Anniversary

The Congregational Churches are planning for the tercentenary celebration of the landing of the Pilgrims in a way which promises enlargement for the work of the denomination and provides for restatement of the principles and ideals which animated those devoted fathers. The anniversary occurs in December, 1921, but the general inauguration of the work which is to cover the celebration is to occur on Sunday, October 15, 1916. The five goals fixed for the churches are: 1. Intelligent study and setting forth of the political and religious convictions which brought the Pilgrims to America. 2. Half a million new members for the churches. 3. Large numbers of recruits for the ministry or other Christian callings. 4. Two million dollars annually for missions. 5. A great permanent fund as a memorial of the Pilgrims.

The Congregationalist reports that the churches are taking hold of the scheme with unusual interest and vigor. "Thus with some of the ablest and most inventive men in our denomination planning and overseeing this fine piece of team work, and with unprecedented resources in the way of literature and practical helps of many kinds, and above all with certain great, definite goals, the next four years should represent the finest flowering forth of the Congregational spirit which this country has ever seen."

Home Talent for Evangelism

BY ROY B. GUILD.

Gipsy Smith was conducting an evangelistic campaign in Chicago. Each noon the Great Northern Theatre was filled within seven minutes of the time the doors were opened.

Each day the gipsy evangelist was preceded by a Chicago preacher, who took half the time. Men who had not been called evangelistic gave wonderful messages. Near the close of the week after we had listened to the most stirring appeal we had yet heard Gipsy Smith came forward holding a bundle of letters in his hands.

"These," he said, "are protests from some of you who think I ought to occupy all of this brief noon hour. Do you know why I have insisted on your own preachers dividing the time? First, because the Lord did not send me over here to commit suicide. Second and chiefly, I wanted you to know that if you will support your own preachers as loyally and as enthusiastically as you do me, and as you have just supported this man, you will not have to send to England for a gipsy to preach the Gospel."

Some of our cities are taking this truth to heart. Three years ago Indianapolis failed to secure a professional evangelist. The officers of the evangelistic committee of the Church Federation of Indianapolis decided to go ahead any way and have a Simultaneous Evangelistic Campaign. The pastors and laymen responded to the proposal. The churches were led to expect results. At the end of the Easter season three thousand had been added to the churches. More careful plans covering the whole winter's work were made. Seven thousand were received into the churches. All denominations worked along normal lines and worked hard. Last winter over eight thousand were received. Counting the summer seasons with the winter nearly twenty thousand have been brought into the membership of the Indianapolis churches.

Ministers have come to expect results. The church members have manifested faith in their own pastor and in themselves.

The Federated Churches of Cleveland report remarkable success in the use of home talent for evangelistic campaigns. This was the plan which they followed. A goal of 10,000 new church members by Easter Sunday, April 23, 1916, was adopted by 200 pastors at their all-day conference on Monday, September 27, 1915. This program of organized personal evangelism was furthered by observing October as a General Rally and Go-to-Church Month, each Sunday having a name and each week having some special significance. Publicity was given this campaign by advertisements in the four daily newspapers of the city and by news items upon special features emphasized during the month. The weekly church calendars were used to set forth the nature of the Christian life and claims of the church.

Much was made of that part of the program which requested the pastors to give at least once every Sunday a public invitation to begin the Christian life. Churches appointed committees of laymen to assist in parish visitation. The Laymen's Missionary Convention, Dec. 5 to 8, which enrolled 2,200 delegates, was made a part of this evangelistic campaign, and was followed by a concerted effort to develop a strong evangelistic Sunday evening service, culminating in two weeks of meetings in individual or groups of churches before Easter Sunday. Statements were secured from thirty leading churches in the country that have large Sunday evening services, showing the methods employed to build up this service. Never have the churches of Cleveland co-operated with so much real enthusiasm in a uniform program of evangelism. In their addresses on life work, Sunday, February 13, pastors requested their young people to dedicate their lives to some special form of Christian service, including the Christian ministry and social service activities. The noon-day meetings in the Euclid Avenue Opera House during Holy Week were attended by more than 1,000 every day, and gave much inspiration to the closing days of the year's campaign of evangelism. Returns from the churches to date indicate that the goal of 10,000 new members has been reached.

In Minneapolis the churches had been linked in a strong fellowship in a great fight for a dry city. While the battle went against them because of the importing of hundreds of voters yet they manifested a strength that has terrorized the liquor interests. Following this fight they co-operated in a simultaneous campaign with splendid results. Richmond, Virginia had similar success.

One of the secrets of success for great evangelists is that the whole city is thinking about the same thing at the same time, though their thoughts may be very different. A unified program can bring these results. Those wishing printed matter telling how the plan has worked can secure the same by writing to Rev. Roy B. Guild, Executive Secretary of the Commission on Federated Movements, United Charities Building, New York.

FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT

The AMERICAN MESSENGER is found very acceptable by the Home Departments of many Sabbath Schools. What better publication could be secured for home reading at the price at which this paper is offered? When ordered in clubs of five or more, the price is only 30 cents a year. The papers may be mailed to individual names, or they may be sent in one package to be distributed by the Sabbath School Visitor—whichever way is preferred. We trust that the Good Literature Committees in all Churches, Sabbath Schools and Christian Endeavor Societies will consider the AMERICAN MESSENGER in ordering their supplies for the coming year. If the order for 1917 is forwarded at once, the issues for November and December, 1916, will be sent gratis.

PARK AVE. AND 40TH ST. NEW YORK

The World's Largest Y. M. C. A.

The report for last year of the West Side Young Men's Christian Association in New York City is interesting as showing the magnitude of the work for men which now centers around a Y. M. C. A. building. The West Side Branch is the largest Y. M. C. A., in the world, the membership being about 7,500. During 1915 the religious work department held 3,304 meetings, with an attendance of 257,566. Of these 798 were in the building, being attended by 36,453 men and boys; 193,203 men in shops were reached in 1,524 meetings, and 27,205 attended Bible classes. Religious interviews were given to 1,990 men, 1,564 were introduced in churches, and 333 known conversions were recorded. In the educational department 3,763 students were enrolled, and 4,201 separate class sessions were attended by 85,453 men. In the physical department 3,338 were enrolled in gymnasium classes, and the social department engineered 673 events, attended by 90,931 men. The employment department received 4,908 applications from employers and 3,428 from men and boys, of whom 2,643 found jobs. West Side Branch sent out 557 men to help at religious meetings in churches and in community work, and $3,000 was contributed by 1,046 members to the work of the Havana Branch, West Side is entirely self-supporting.

A Work for Young People's Societies

Did you ever stop to think of the many thousands of people who are not in attendance upon church services, and who are unreached by the Gospel's Message?

Did it ever occur to you that you might have an effectual part in good missionary work right in your own town or neighborhood? There are many families in your immediate community where a religious paper is not taken. Why not take up the work of circulating in these homes a splendid, wholesome, inspiring, religious periodical every month? Think of the many families that would surely receive a spiritual uplift from the reading of such a paper each month. Who can tell the good that might be accomplished for the extension of the Master's Kingdom through such efforts?

The AMERICAN MESSENGER is a paper just suited for this purpose. It is an un denominational, inspiring and evangelical monthly, published by the American Tract Society. For more than seventy years it has been esteemed one of the most useful of religious periodicals, as well as one of the best and cheapest papers published. It is considered the finest illustrated religious monthly published at the low price of only 50 cents a year for a single subscription or only 30 cents in clubs of five or more.

This would be a good time for your society to take up this work, and at a very small outlay—

$3.00 would pay for 10 copies each month for one year; $6.00 would pay for 20 copies; 40 copies would cost $12.00. Surely a paper of this kind would be much appreciated, and we believe it would be a help to your Society. Try it for a year. You surely have a number of earnest, consecrated young people in your Society who would be most happy to engage in this special work, and thus bring the story of Christ and His love to those who do not know Him.

HIS VINEYARD AND OURS

A Model Sunday School in the Making.

The largest Spanish-speaking church in Buenos Aires, Argentine Republic, had, until a couple of months ago, a very unsatisfactory school, numbering only 140 on an average. The pastor, official board and teachers sent the following message to Rev. George P. Howard, Secretary for the World's Sunday School Association: "Something is wrong with our school; come over and help us. We give you full control; do anything you want to do, only improve us."

"And I did take things into my hands," writes Mr. Howard, "First I took one of their large Sunday evening audiences and did my best to get the whole church awakened to the importance of the Sunday School. I drove the men's Bible class out of their comfortable quarters (they had one of the only two available separate rooms) and put the primary department in their place. The men have since found a comfortable corner somewhere else, and the primary children are delighted with their quarters. The other room was the Pastor's study; it is still his study during the week, but on Sunday it is changed into a modern kindergarten department with sand-table, black-board, etc. That they have all caught the Sunday-school vision is proved, I think, by the fact that last Sunday their attendance reached 256, and the children declare that they will not rest until they reach the 300 mark. The interesting part is that they are by their efforts stirring up other schools."

"One of the largest Sunday-schools in Montevideo, Uruguay, has set out to become a model school. They have put in a complete graded course, kindergarten department, three teacher-training classes, etc. They have been doing wonders, but as soon as they heard about the school in this rival city of Buenos Aires, they held a council of war, sent a letter of congratulation to the superintendent, and made up their minds that they would not let their brethren across the River Plate beat them. And so the work goes on. The days are all too short for the accomplishing of all that needs to be done, but I am heartened when I think how many friends in the United States are remembering the work on this continent in their prayers."

How He Was Converted

The first man to confess Christ in the Chinese province of Kweichow, Elder Chen, has recently passed to his reward. The occasion of his conversion is worth recording. He had served as teacher in Chinese to a missionary, knew about the Gospel, and cared nothing for it. One day he was standing with the missionary as he preached in a country market place. The crowd was rude and threatening. The missionary, fearing a riot, took great pains to extricate Mr. Chen from the danger, saying of him that he was not a Christian and had no interest in the Gospel but was merely engaged to teach books. Whatever they might do to himself he hoped they would let Mr. Chen go quietly on his way. This proceeding appeared very strange to Mr. Chen, who felt convinced that the God the missionary preached must be very powerful to keep him so unconcerned about himself while he took so great pains to help others. His reflections upon the matter led to his acceptance of Christ. He became a man of prayer, deeply read in the Scriptures. During the Boxer trial he refused flight. "Can I hide?" he said, "My face is my signboard. For twenty years I have been known throughout this city as a preacher of the Gospel; can I now be hid? I will stay here and die." Happily, however, he was spared for fifteen years' longer service.

ZULU CHRISTIANS AT MT. TABOR, SOUTH AFRICA.

Christian Literature for Zulus

For several years the American Tract Society has sent a foreign cash appropriation to the South Africa General Mission, of which Rev. Andrew Murray is president. The headquarters of this Mission are at Cape Town, but its work is widely extended throughout the southern part of the African continent.

A part of the last appropriation was used by the South Africa General Mission to provide Christian literature for the Zulus. This remittance was acknowledged by one of the workers at the Mount Tabor Mission School, who sent to the American Tract Society the photograph, from which was reproduced the interesting picture which appears on this page of our paper, and who wrote in part as follows:

"I write to thank you so very much for your kind gift to buy literature for the Zulu Christians. It was a most welcome gift as we often have wished to be able to put into the hands of these Christians some of the helpful little books that are available for them in the Zulu language.

"It may interest you to look into the faces of some of those who received 'Daily Light' and 'The Life of Jesus Christ' in the Zulu language.

"I send you a photo taken at this station. A few words about those who appear in this picture may be of interest. Beginning at the left-hand side we see Magangeni Dube, about eighteen years of age, who came to us about a year ago looking for work. He had not been with us long before he said he wanted to be a Christian. His people, who are living near at hand, soon heard of it and did all in their power to get him away from us. They worried him so much that once he came and said that he thought he had better leave us, but after we talked with him he stayed on, and for the last six months his people have left him alone.

"Timote Mswela has been a professing Christian for about ten years. For some time his life was not what it ought to have been and he therefore kept away from church and fellowship with God's children. A few months ago, however, at one of our evangelist's meetings he stood up and confessed his backsliding; then a few Sundays later he came to this station and said he wished to come back into fellowship again, for he felt that the Lord had forgiven his backsliding, and he asked for our forgiveness also.

"Johannes Mbulazi has grown up with us, for he was a little boy when we first built here. For years he used to attend school, and, at times, he stayed with us altogether. Last year he married one of our Christian girls; she is sitting in front of the man holding the little boy on his shoulder.

"Richard Mbulazi, the man with the little boy on his shoulder, has been living some distance away from here with his wife and children, but now one of our evangelists has built a home close to him, for which fact he and his wife are very glad.

"Aron Mbulazi was baptized last Christmas. He has been with us nearly three years but will be soon leaving us.

"Jessie Mbulazi, the girl in the front row with her hand under her chin, has been with us eight years. She also was baptized last Christmas.

"All those whom I have just named received a copy of 'Daily Light.'

"Anna Nxumalo, the wife of one of our evangelists, received 'The Life of Jesus Christ.' She does not appear in the picture as she was ill with fever the day the photo was taken, but her husband, Elias, is standing fourth in the back row."

The Hawaiian Methodist Mission

In the Hawaiian Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church there are thirty-six pastors or evangelists, thirty-three church buildings, valued at $110,560, and seven parsonages valued at $13,800. There are seventy-nine Mission stations. There are 2,209 members and 1,500 Sunday School scholars gathered in thirty Sunday Schools. There are fifteen Epworth Leagues with a membership of 465. There are two English, nine Japanese, twelve Korean and seven Filipino appointments. A Korean Boys' School is doing excellent work toward the support of which the Home Board makes liberal donation. There are to be found in the Mission four English, sixteen Korean, two Japanese and three Filipino local preachers. There are one English, three Japanese and twenty Korean exhorters. Twelve schools are being sustained in the work. The general condition of the Japanese work is reported as exceedingly satisfactory. Several plantation churches are maintained among the Koreans with good results. The present Superintendent is Rev. William Henry Fry.

A Flag Booklet and a Moslem.

When Dr. Zwemer was recently on a trip in the town of Deir Mowas, Egypt, he was entertained most hospitably both by the evangelical pastor and by the Moslem omdeh, or chief of the town. In fact, when he arrived at the railway station a large crowd of Moslems and Christians had gathered to welcome him, and he was soon mounted on a horse provided by his hosts, while they rode by his side on donkeys, and many people followed on foot. This honorable procession through the town was in itself a sufficient invitation to people to come to the service in the church, and that very evening, which was Saturday, a Sunday-school entertainment was given at which most of the prominent Mohammedans were invited guests.

One of these guests was a police magistrate, an educated Moslem and one of marked liberality of view. Dr. Zwemer was told that this magistrate had become interested in a Christian orphanage at Assiut, managed by one of the missionaries, and had given $100.00 towards its funds. This Moslem has already translated on his own initiative an English book on the care of children, and he hopes to publish this at the Nile Mission Press—a Christian Mission Press in Cairo. After the Sunday-school gathering was over the guests were invited to come to the church service on Sunday when Dr. Zwemer was to preach, and all of them promised to do so. During the service the next day, the church was crowded and Dr. Zwemer, knowing something of the local conditions, took occasion in the course of his sermon to make a drive at the liquor traffic. As soon as he launched on this subject, the Mohammedan visitors in the front rows commenced clapping vigorously and showing their approval in several ways orally as well.

After the service the Moslem police magistrate, mentioned above, took Dr. Zwemer to his own home. He said, in particular, he wanted to show him a curiosity, namely, a little book which had in it the flags of all the world and "certain figures relating to the Sunday-schools in all the countries of the world." Going to his safe, with great ceremony he unlocked the door and took out a torn and much-used copy of the booklet published at the World's Sunday School convention in Zurich, "The Strength of the World's Sunday School Army." Someone in Assiut who received a copy through Mr. Trowbridge had shown it to the police magistrate and had finally given it to him at his urgent request. He presented this to Dr. Zwemer as something of rare interest, and was greatly pleased to learn that Dr. Zwemer himself was one of the speakers at the Zurich Convention and already knew the booklet.

Then, speaking confidentially to Dr. Zwemer, he took out of his pocketbook a leaf torn from the beginning of the flag-book, bearing the poem "Others." "This," he said, "is my religion. I am a Moslem and shall continue a Moslem, but I am with you in this great thought of living for others. This little poem is wonderfully true and it is the best thing I have seen in my life."

The Reason for Medical Missions

David Livingstone said: "God had only one Son and he gave him to be a medical missionary." From its very beginning we see Christianity has been a healing as well as a teaching religion. Heathen lands have all the diseases of our own country, but the sufferings incident thereto are greatly intensified by the ignorance, superstition and filth of its natives. Quackery reigns supreme and medicine men and witch doctors easily gain incredible power over the superstitious minds of the people. Disease is believed by them to be caused by a demon in the body of the sufferer and all sorts of remedies are resorted to in trying to expel him, such as beating of drums and blowing of horns. These, while torturing the nerves, do not compare to the suffering caused by pricking the patients with hot needles and pounding on the head or afflicted part of the patient, to drive away this demon of disease. Women are allowed to suffer excruciating agonies, the sick are often neglected and the dying are held in superstitious dread. Heathen lands are lands of pain, and scientific medicine has developed only in Christian countries.

Our Fireside

The Armor of Light

By Lloyd Logan

"WE ARE taking the place of the soldiers, because they can not work to relieve the suffering. I will give five dollars. If each of us do the same, then we can give the entertainment—" Nan paused.

She was most enthusiastic herself and she looked from one to another of the girls for a responsive echo. But each girl was very much occupied with her needle, for this was a meeting of the Busy-Bees. Kate tapped her foot impatiently. Mary gazed thoughtfully at some far distant object. There was an embarrassing silence.

"Well, if we did do it," Nan continued somewhat defiantly, "We would be proud of our Belgium fund."

"Are there more white strips?" asked Mary, rather inharmoniously.

"Catch!" laughed Kate as she picked a handful of the long white strips from a bandbox in the middle of the floor.

Mary held up her dress and caught the flying bundle.

"Mother promised to buy a blue rug as well as a white and blue. She said that we could give our things to the Ladies' Aid and have them woven at the same time. The larger the number of rugs, the more reasonable the cost of weaving." Estelle Coleman had been waiting for a breathing spell amid the clatter of the ten voices, to launch this pleasing bit of information.

"Lovely," cried Kate, "Then our profits will be larger. I think that we will have a very nice sum by the end of our first quarter."

"It is fine," Nan interrupted cheerily, generously willing to applaud the other person. "But it might be finer. I like big things. Just imagine how well it would look—the account of what the Busy-Bees had done. Rugs are so slow."

Again there was perceptible a decided lack of appreciation of Nan's plan. Her face flushed at the aloneness of her position. She thought that she had proposed something splendid. Surely she needed her five dollars as much as any one. Mary caught a glimpse of Nan's face with its quivering upper lip. The sympathy which she always felt for any kind of distress called her valiantly to the rescue.

"It is splendid," she admitted, "but I do not think Kate or I could very well give five dollars. The entertainment would take time and our school work is very heavy this year. Rag rugs are slow. But I can give one afternoon a week, every week, to sew rag rugs."

Mary's voice was so gentle that it was impossible for it to offend.

"You have just as much spending money as I," Nan rejoined with more ardor than courtesy.

It was true that Kate's and Mary's allowance equalled Nan's. It was equally true that at least five of the remaining Busy-Bees could not easily afford to give five dollars each. It was of this fact that Mary thought. As for herself she would have willingly given. Mary did not reply. The conversation naturally turned to rag rugs.

To Nan, her own point of view was the only one possible. Hot tears welled up in her eyes. She left the room on some pretext, going upstairs to Estelle's room to bathe her face and remove every vestige of tears. Defeat or absolute surrender never held any place in Nan's plans.

The stairway rounded up into what might have been a pretty little upstairs hall, but the architect had continued the wall that formed the front bedroom, so that this little unused space was enclosed, forming a room, if so small a place could carry so large a name. Nannette had never been within this disregarded little corner. On ascending the stairs she heard the tapping of a little bell; a repeated, purposeful tapping. She hesitated, wondering if it were a summons.

"Come," it was a sweet, gentle voice calling from within.

Nan opened the door. "I am so sorry to bother you. The curtains blowing caught that glass of water on the stand and tipped it over. I was afraid it would drip onto the bed; then that would have to be all changed, and make so much trouble."

"I will be glad to fix it," Nan answered pleasantly.

"Call one of the maids. I would have done so, but I thought possibly I would hear some one coming up the stairs, and I would not have to take them from their work."

It was just a little old lady, so very little, so very old. She was propped up in a big chair, over which had been spread a light blue silk comfort. It was very becoming to her silvery hair, while it caught the remnant of blue in her faded old eyes.

"Oh! Allow me," cried Nan. "Where is a cloth?"

She was much interested and glad to find an excuse for not rejoicing the Busy-Bees. The old lady smiled. If she noticed the tear-stained face she ignored it, as she watched Nan put the stand in order.

Not a detail of the tiny room was lost to Nan. The little white iron bed was in reality an old discarded child's bed, with the sides removed, and extended to the length of a cot. Truly the room could not have held a larger bed; the marble-topped walnut bureau was quite high, with the most fascinating little box-like drawers on top; the small rose-wood sewing table, with its many little drawers, had not been "done over," but bore the nicks and scars of many years; on the floor lay a braided rug, whose brighter hues had been blended into softening tones by the touch of time.

"I was going to Estelle's room," Nan explained. "I am a Busy-Bee."

"I am Estelle's Great Aunt Penelope. I thought the Busy-Bees were going to meet. Estelle borrowed my gold thimble." Aunt Penelope smiled, so introducing herself.

The breeze blew the muslin curtains in and out.

"Shall I close the door? Isn't the draught rather strong?" suggested Nan, who vaguely remembered Estelle saying something about an old aunt that her mother took care of, because she had a larger house and more money than any other of the relatives.

"You will stop for a little visit?" Aunt Penelope's face beamed, if so old a face, so softly covered with so many wrinkles could be said to beam.

"I'd love to," Nan replied in her most engaging manner.

Closing the door seemed to shut out the other world, as it were, with all its disputes, struggles, failures, and even its triumphs. The tiny little room had an atmosphere of its very own.

"It is peace, tranquillity, yes, and softly radiant," thought Nan, ever impressionable.

Her eyes fell on the face of the little old lady, whose hands in their disuse, lay calmly folded in her lap. Nan's heart was full. Here was a ready listener.

"You see, the girls are so slow. With my plan we could send one hundred dollars—I expect. That would be something like!" Nan sighed as she finished explaining. "I like big things. I do not mind the work. It's like girding on our armor to fight for the helpless."

"It is so," Aunt Penelope sympathetically replied. "I used to feel the same way, when I was young."

"Did you?"
Nan was sitting on a hassock, her hands clasped around her knees. It seemed almost incredible as she gazed into the gentle, benign, old face that any fight ever had been there.

"Did you fight?" Nan continued, laughing quietly. "Did you win? Did you wear armor, and, if so, what armor?"

It was simply ridiculous to conceive that so frail a body should have fought any one, or borne any kind of armor.

"Indeed I did," Aunt Penelope replied merrily. "I know I have won, but it took me many, many years to adjust my armor."

"Oh tell me all about it," Nan fairly beseeched.

Here was a story, a real, live story, by some one who understood and had felt just as she felt now.

"Well," Aunt Penelope smiled as in remembrance she turned the pages of the past, constituting the book she had been over eighty years in compiling. "I was young, strong, and well, with a vigorous mind and clear vision. If it had been this generation, I believe I would have tried to be a militant suffragette, a nurse for the European battlefield, a missionary to a far country, a prima-donna,—or something big and commanding." Aunt Penelope smiled with pleasure as she saw Nan's eyes kindle with her own old time fire. "And I myself would have been in the foreground as the most conspicuous figure," she continued, watching the eager sympathetic understanding of this vivacious little girl.

"I would just love to do any or all of those things," cried Nan with enthusiasm. "What did you do?" She waited breathlessly for the recital of something heroic.

"I,—ah I,—I," Aunt Penelope smiled, replying sweetly. "I never did anything, or received anything in all of my life that I really wished to do, or longed to have."

"Why, I thought that you were so happy," Nan exclaimed.

"I am. It is because of my armor, a difficult armor to learn to bear. I'm coming to that. I was the youngest; my brothers and sisters had married and Father and Mother were gone, when I reached my young ladyhood. I wanted Mother's rose-wood bed-room set, and the onyx table from the library. But it was natural that the married ones should receive the furniture, as I had no especial home. In my day and generation ladies of an independent income lived unassumingly with their relatives. It is not a conspicuous position, nor does it call for applause from the multitude. But providence had placed me exactly in that situation."

"To fight?" Nan laughingly inquired. "Yes, but my fighting qualities were of necessity turned inward, to conquer myself, to rise superior to the thousand and one nagging, humiliating, little things that continuously occur,—in living in other people's homes."

"I should not have liked that," Nan interrupted.

"No," Aunt Penelope acquiesced. "But he who controls his spirit is rated 'mightier than he that taketh a city.' I found that was not enough. I must make myself agreeable so that I would be loved and wanted; even more,—my personal burden was not all the responsibility that I must assume."

"Just what I said to the Busy-Bees," interjected Nan. "We must do something big."

Aunt Penelope waited patiently. "I was in no position to do the big things, so I met every little thing that came my way. I found that I led a busy, useful, active life. I am standing afar now, with a clear vision of this industrious, whirling mass of humanity,—achieving so much. And, I ken, the great army of men and women, yes, and little girls, who accomplish in like manner, are the pivot of the universe, the real foundation."

"But then you had money to give," Nan suggested.

"Yes," answered Aunt Penelope, "that was my greatest pride, my independence. Perhaps I was a little over-bearing. After I was sixty-five, my immediate family were gone. I lived with my nieces and nephews, where it was convenient. The corporation in which my money was invested failed." Aunt Penelope paused. "I was penniless. So for over fifteen years I have accepted. I have learned to accept,—all things."

"That is quite wonderful," Nan's voice was vibrant with admiring awe.

"So," Aunt Penelope added cheerily, "we can not all do the big things, nor send big, showy sums to the Belgians. Most of us weave rag carpets, very necessary carpets, that are trod under foot."

"I see," Nan spoke humbly, before this little, old, lady, who had outlived her generation, and who passed her days amidst the discarded furniture, in an unused nook in the great house.

The snow-white hair against the blue comfort formed a beautiful setting for the old face, whose exquisite, benign expression bespoke the victory achieved after many years. Nan kissed her.

"I've had such a nice time."

"Ah," Aunt Penelope's voice trailed off indistinctly. "The day is far spent,—having done all to stand,—put on the armor of light."

The Warning

A clear-minded farmer in one of the rural churches gave a unique definition of conscience, not long ago, at the mid-week prayer meeting.

"I've often noticed," he said, "when driving my mowing machine, that when there's something gone wrong with it there's pretty sure to be a warning. If the gear is getting dry or out of place, and doesn't run right, it gives a hard, squeaky crunch that lets me know there's trouble coming, and if I am wise I stop and investigate."

"Now it seems to me conscience is a good deal like that. It's the crunch my spiritual nature gives to warn me, when there's a wrong in front of it. It isn't a pleasant thing to hear, perhaps, but it's very valuable as a reminder of danger ahead."

Let us heed the warning as soon as we hear it, and so prevent danger and damage.

A Vital Question

BY HELEN M. RICHARDSON.

"Why doesn't father go to church, mother?"

This question was asked by a bright-eyed boy as he saw his father leave the house one pleasant Sunday morning with his golf sticks under his arm.

"Father works hard all the week and needs a little relaxation," the mother replied, in a hesitating tone, at loss for a more satisfactory answer.

"But I have to go to Sunday school, and you won't even let me play ball—on the front side of the house," boldly asserted the boy. "When I'm a man I suppose I can do as father does," he continued with an air of bravado, watching his father's receding figure with longing eyes.

The mother's cheeks crimsoned. Here was a problem with which it was hard to cope. She herself had gotten so accustomed to this state of things that she had not reckoned upon the keenness of her son's eyes in discerning certain incongruities with which she long since had ceased to wrestle.

Church was her place on Sunday. Sunday-school was the haven in which she sought to shelter her little boy; but for the father—the golf links. Why, oh, why, had it been made necessary for her to face this problem, the solving of which her little boy's innocent question had so suddenly forced upon her.

To be sure, other men as good, if not better than her husband, accepted this mode of relaxation as their prerogative after a week of strenuous indoor labor; but it had not been thus in her own childhood. Her mind's eye pictured her own parents, Sunday after Sunday, rain or shine, together wending their way to the sanctuary. This season of uplift was followed by a quiet, happy afternoon at home in the companionship of some entertaining or instructive book. Now those whom the golf links do not claim, automobiles or the beaches do. Sunday has gotten to be an acknowledged weekly holiday. What little thought is given to the Sabbath by the great rank-and-file is not of a worshipful nature, but rather one of happy-go-lucky pleasure.

The child in many cases is sent to Sunday-school simply as a matter of custom and because it seems to be the correct thing to do. The question that naturally arises in many thoughtful minds is, how soon will this beautiful and holy legacy of our ancestors degenerate into a memory, only, and our children, also, be allowed to pass the day in any secular pastimes caprice may suggest, with no anchor to hold them to duty and right, except, perchance, the memory of the custom of some sainted mother who believed in the House of God as a place of refuge and uplift? It is a question which in this reckless, pleasure-seeking age is worthy of our most earnest thought and study.

"Lo, I Am With You Always"

A busy woman entered her room hastily as twilight shades were falling—went directly to her desk, turned on the gas and began to write. Page after page she wrote. The solitude became oppressive. She wheeled her chair around, and, with a shock of joyful surprise, looked squarely into the face of her dearest friend, lying on the lounge at her side. "Why, I didn't know you were here," she said. "Why didn't you speak to me?"

"Because you were so busy. You didn't speak to me."

So it is with Jesus—He is here all the time. The room is full of Him, always ready to greet us with a smile—but we are so busy. But when the solitude grows oppressive we suddenly turn, and, lo! He is at our side. We speak to Him and He speaks to us, and the soul's deepest yearnings are satisfied.—SELECTED.

"I Heard"

The human ear is a wonderful piece of mechanism. When we have explained all that we know about the outer ear—that door which admits all the sounds of earth, from the crashing thunder down to the softest music—and have studied the marvelous vestibule of the inner ear, with its servants that convey the sound waves to the brain, we still have only touched upon the mystery of hearing. The door and the vestibule are free to every sound that seeks admission, but beyond these is the chamber of the brain, the inner temple of the mind, and here there must come choice and sifting.

"Take heed therefore how ye hear," said the Master. The same sound of waves breaking upon the shore, the same low whisper of the wind, was in the ears of all the multitude about him that day, and he was speaking the same words to all; yet well he knew that they did not all hear alike. Before him was the scornful listener, inwardly questioning and eavilng at every word; the careless listener, impatient to have the talk over, thinking, perhaps, that some miracle might follow; the hungry-hearted listener longing to be helped. Yet all these people were hearing as differently as the men themselves were different.

It is still the same. "I heard" are words that begin countless sentences spoken on the streets, on the cars, in our homes. What follows these words reveals how the listener heard. The bird's song, the child's laugh, the vile oath, the hum of machinery, the bit of cruel gossip, the story of heroism and of unselfish kindness, all have been in the air, all have passed both door and vestibule of the ear, but each hearer has sifted and held according to his character.

There are sweet, sunny souls that gather notes of cheer and comfort as naturally as the bee gathers honey. If there is good news, they hear it. If there falls a word of praise or encouragement concerning any one's work, they not only catch at it eagerly, but they make sure to speed it on its way to the tired laborer, to whom it will be not only music, but new strength. All hopeful sounds come to them, and they carry to others the harmonies they hear.

One wonders why any one should choose to gather up unkind criticism and to pour them upon sensitive souls already too heavily burdened; to repeat the half-truth, the carelessly uttered disapproval, to pastor, to teacher or to fellow-worker, whom it will only pain and dishearten; and yet there are those who do this very thing continually. They are not intentionally bad or cruel, yet they steal away courage and make hearts sore with the poison they recklessly scatter. "I heard" always is their excuse for the repetition of unkind things. They live in the same world and walk the same streets with the other class of hearers, but the voices that are borne to their inner consciousness are very different.

Often we can not help what we hear; but how we hear, how we allow what we hear to leave its impress, must be somewhat within our power, or our Lord's warning would be useless.

"Wild words wander here and there, God's great gift of speech abused." These "wild words" do their destroying work only when they fall upon ears that greedily drink them in, on natures eager to repeat them to other listeners. This matter of hearing has not only to do with what of help or hindrance we carry to others, it has still more to do with what we build into our own lives. We grow by what we hear, for sounds become thoughts, the spirit's food. And ever in among the earthly voices come the heavenly voices—God's call to service, to kindness, to himself. "Take heed therefore how ye hear."—FORWARD.

You Can Reach It

Five thousand, six thousand, seven thousand—aye, ten thousand feet up into the blue the airmen of our day may make their flight. Wonderful records! The world never saw the like before! And we wonder where the limit will be. Is there, indeed, any point beyond which the daring explorer of the upper sky may not venture?

Yes, we know there is such a place. The bird-man might have a heart brave enough to strike higher and still higher levels, but a bound has been set for him. Farther than that he can not, must not, try to go; for it is God who has fixed the bounds, and when God says, "Thus far and no farther shalt thou go!" that means, "Go back! Not another step, at your peril!"

By the bitter cold blasts which sweep about him, because of the thin air which will not sustain the weight of his machine, the swift voyager of the air is warned that he will pass the bound set by the Almighty only at the risk of his life.

God draws the line, and man can not go beyond it.

But there is one flight to which there is absolutely no bound. Indeed, God invites us to push on and on and on when once we have spread our wings for that journey. It is the flight Godward and heavenward! To that there are no bounds.

Have you not already learned—you must have learned—that the more you think about great things, the keener becomes your desire to know more about things that are of supreme worth? At first it was hard for you to hold your mind to the consideration of these thoughts. But with the using your strength grew. The more you centered your mind on the wonderful themes you had taken up, the easier it was for you to push still farther on.

It is exactly so with the quest of the highest. Here God sets no limit. "Come still higher!" is always his kindly invitation. "I have still better things in store for you. Live the pure life, and I will help you to be still more pure in heart! Trust me fully. So shall greater faith be given you! Do the kindest, most unselfish thing you can today. Tomorrow you shall have the grace to reach far more beautiful things!"

So God encourages us ever on and on, until by and by we are never satisfied to live on the lower levels of life. We feel that we must strike out for the very best, and go on until we have mastered the perfect life!—EXCHANGE.

Her Offering

BY KATHLEEN HAY.

A LITTLE old lady, with a careworn stoop in her shoulders, and a face long since grown weary, yet bearing a gentle, patient look, sat alone one bright morning, her usually busy hands folded idly in her lap.

"And that is what they would have you to do . . . give your earnings to help build the grand new church, and the old one, where he ministered to his small flock, must be torn down to give place to the new."

The beauty of a spring morning long since gone, stole back, gently smoothing away the lines of care. Away through the old apple orchard, down the lane, she had gone to meet him, while the splendor of golden morning and the brightness of the gay, sweet flowers, shone, too, in her happy, care-free face. The gladness of their wedding day, just forty years ago!

And now the little church, where they had been married, must be torn down to give place to a grand, new building.

How they stood out in all their brightness, those treasured years that followed, until the sweetness and song of her life had faded, for near him they placed her two little ones, while she alone remained. With a start, she aroused herself, and a brave little smile crept back into her face.

No bitterness had come in to overshadow the goodness of so pure a soul, and through long years she had worked for her Master faithfully.

A small tin box lay near her chair; reaching down she picked it up and counted slowly the many bills inside.

"God loveth a cheerful giver."
Tremblingly her lips framed the words.

"Dear Lord, help me to give it gladly."

Slowly the trembling fingers counted them one by one, each representing some self-denial, some labor in the past. Then she placed them in an envelope which she sealed and marked with a shaking hand, "My Offering."

"Lord, I would do what Thou wouldst have me to do," she whispered. Beside her chair the small tin box lay empty, while down the lane beyond the apple orchard, a small bent figure stole on.

At last she reached the church, and finding her old seat sank down to rest.

"Nothing changed these forty years, our same dear little church. Forgive me, Lord, for worshipping this wood and stone."

Evening, with its calm, settled down. The last beams of the setting sun stole in long golden lines across the shabby pulpit, filling it with a holy radiance to the tired eyes resting quietly there.

"Perhaps it looks old to them," she mused, "and they have set their hearts on the new . . . poor young things. I'm glad of my offering; they'll find it here when they come tomorrow."

With trembling, yet willing hands, gladly now, she laid it down.

"How could I expect them to know that each day I have found my rest hour here . . . here where the gold of the sun played over my babies' hair; here where I have looked to the rock that has higher than I."

Once again she found her way to the corner where the organ stood. It was here she had played for them in those days gone by, but they had grown tired of it now, and soon the tones she loved, so well would be replaced with deeper, grander chords.

Reverently she lifted the lid, her weary fingers stealing lovingly over the familiar keys.

"Jesus, tender Shepherd, bless thy lambs tonight. . ."

Again they were beside her, those baby forms, their small voices mingling with the organ notes. And what a blessing He had given them, gathering them safely home!

Once more the low, soft notes stole through the little old church, a tremulous voice, grown a bit weary, yet singing His praises still.

Outside, the sun had sunk to rest, the goodnight song of the birds had ceased with the solemn hush of night, but to a still, small form inside, a sun that knows no setting, the light of Eternal Day, shone on.

American Tract Society

This Society was organized in 1825. Its work is interdenominational and international in scope, and is commended by all evangelical denominations.

It has published the Gospel messages in 178 languages, dialects and characters. It has been the pioneer for work among the foreign-speaking people in our country, and its missionary colporters are distributing Christian literature in thirty-three languages among the immigrants and making a home-to-home visitation among the spiritually destitute, both in the cities and rural districts, leaving all kinds of Christian literature, also the Bible or portions of the Scriptures.

Its publication of leaflets, volumes and periodicals from the Home Office total 794,639,700 copies. It has made foreign cash appropriations to the amount of $799,456.39, and grants of electrotypes to the value of $61,177.96, by means of which millions of copies of books and tracts have been published at mission stations abroad.

The gratuitous distribution of the past year is to the value of $16,684.99. The grand total of its gratuitous distribution has been to the value of $2,634,505.89, which is the equivalent of 5,269,010,000 tract pages.

The total number of family visits that have been made by the Society's colporters during the last year is 206,167; the total number of volumes distributed by sale or grant is 55,517, making the total number of volumes that have been circulated by colporters in the last seventy-five years 17,382,454, and the total number of family visits that they have made during the same period 18,612,843.

Its work, ever widening, is dependent upon donations and legacies, and greatly needs increased offerings.

WILLIAM PHILLIPS HALL, President.

JUDSON SWIFT, D.D., General Secretary.

Remittances should be sent to Louis Tag, Treasurer; Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y.

A Pleasant Tribute.

A friend in Massachusetts writes: "For over forty years the AMERICAN MESSENGER has been a welcome guest in my home. There is not another paper that brings a sweeter message of the Master to the human heart."

Superstition in Japan

In spite of the general enlightenment in Japan there still are those who keep serpents in cages (Honorable Lord Serpents) before which they bow and worship. In almost every village soothsaying women are consulted by intelligent men in the community at all important crises.

Each subscription in New York or Bronx County must be at the rate of 50 cts. net.

Remit by Express Money Order, Draft, Post Office Order or Registered Letter. For very small amounts, postage stamps may be sent at the risk of the sender.

RENEWALS: The date opposite your name shows to what time the subscription has been paid, and a change in the date is the receipt for renewal.

CHANGES: When sending change of address, be sure to send the old address as well as the new one.

OUR ADVERTISERS: We believe that all the advertisements in this paper are from responsible advertisers, and it is our intention to admit only such to our columns. Should, however, any of our subscribers find that any advertiser does not live up to his agreements, we would consider it a favor if they will inform us, and we will at any time give prompt attention to any complaint.

We do not, of course, guarantee that all persons will take the same point of view with the advertisers, and it must be borne in mind that the claims and statements made by advertisers are their assertions, and not ours.

Our readers will confer a favor upon advertisers and also upon us if they will mention the American Messenger when answering advertisements.

To Our Subscribers

A RULING of the Post Office Department states that copies of the AMERICAN MESSENGER may not be mailed to persons whose subscriptions are in arrears for a period exceeding twelve months. In other words, the regulations of the Post Office Department compel us to remove from our regular mailing list the names of all who delay the payment of their subscriptions longer than twelve months. In view of this fact we urge upon all our friends the necessity of attending promptly to the renewal of their subscriptions. A glance at the address label on the wrapper of the paper will show at what date each subscription expires.

The Breaking Down of Caste

Rev. E. E. Jeffrey, of Aruppukottai, India, tells how the lines of caste are breaking down in India. He says:

"A marvelous revolution is in progress. Twenty-five years ago the writer was stoned for innocently taking a low caste Christian servant through the Brahmin street. The other day he sat down to a banquet with college students of all castes, including three divisions of Brahmins. All were served by servants of low caste extraction. In Bombay, on December 28th, an All-India Inter-caste dinner, organized with the avowed object of doing away with caste differences, was held. Of the 450 guests from various castes, 225 were Brahmins, 50 were Indian women, and 20 were the so-called 'untouchables!'"

The sending of one of these Stamps may be the means of winning over one or more souls to Christ by way of the Church. We wish to have the Millions who do not attend any Church or Mission receive a Message by the receipt of a 'Go to Church' Stamp and we ask you to assist us in doing this. OUR MEDICINE CHEST

The writer of the Book of Proverbs has said, "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine," or as it is expressed in the Revised Version, "A cheerful heart is a good medicine." Recognizing the value that there is in a good, wholesome joke, the AMERICAN MESSENGER will publish in Our Medicine Chest, from month to month, such selected witticisms as it is believed will help to make merry and cheerful hearts.

"I have had many stupid questions asked me in my life," said an elderly doctor, "but the most foolish was when I was a young fellow, just beginning to make my living. A young man applied to me for some slight eye trouble; I recommended a mild wash to be dropped in the eye three times a day. He paid the fee and disappeared—was gone a few minutes, and suddenly stuck his head back in the doorway.

"Shall that medicine," he asked, "be dropped in my eye before or after meals?"

Amos Whittaker, a miserly millionaire, was approached by a friend who used his most persuasive powers to have him dress more in accordance with his station in life. "I am surprised, Amos," said the friend, "that you should allow yourself to become shabby." "But I'm not shabby," firmly interposed the millionaire miser. "O, but you are," returned his old friend. "Remember your father. He was always neatly, even elaborately, dressed. His clothes were always finely tailored and of the best material." "Why," shouted the miser triumphantly, "these clothes I've got on were father's!"

The teacher, picking up an orange that was lying on the desk, explained that it was a unit. The next day the peelings had been left there, so, picking up a couple, she asked what they were. There was a pause. Presently a bright-faced but shy little girl answered, "Why, that's the skin of a unit."

A worthy vicar in a rural parish who preached one Sunday in the interest of foreign missions was surprised on entering the village shop during the week to be greeted with marked coldness by the old dame who kept it.

He asked the cause, and the good woman, producing a half crown from a drawer and throwing it down before him said:

"I marked that coin and put it in the plate last Sunday, and here it is back in my shop. I knowed well them poor Africans never got the money."

A traveling man in Maine met a middle-aged farmer, who said his father, ninety years old, was still on the farm where he was born. "Ninety years old, eh?" "Yep, pop is close to ninety." "Is his health good?" "'Tain't much now. He's been complainin' for a few months back." "What's the matter with him?" "I dunno; sometimes I think farmin' don't agree with him."

"Children," said the minister, addressing the Sunday school, "I want to talk to you a few moments about one of the most important organs in the whole world. What is it that throbs away, beats away, never stopping, never ceasing, whether you wake or sleep, night and day, week in and week out, month in and month out, year in and year out, without any volition on your part, hidden away, as it were, in the depths, unseen by you, throbbing, throbbing, rhythmically all your life long?" And during the pause of oratorical effect came a small voice: "The gas meter."

It is told of a learned professor, who was better at Greek than golf, that after a round on the links, in which he had fozzled most of his shots, he turned to his caddie for advice as to improving his play. The reply of the ruthless caddie was: "Ye see, sir, it's easy to teach laddies Latin and Greek; but it needs a head for gofff."

"Yes," said Brown, "I have a wonderful dog. Only this morning, when I came down to breakfast, after a sleepless night, and forgot to give him his usual tit-bit, he went out into the garden, pulled up a bunch of flowers, and laid them at my feet."

"And what were they?" inquired his friend.

"Forget-me-nots," answered Brown, as he hurriedly left the room.

Sir Hubert von Herkomer, the well-known artist who died recently, used to tell an amusing story of a London art dealer. This man had two beautiful reproductions of the painting, "The Approaching Storm."

One of the pictures he placed in the show-window; but it did not sell. At length, in order to draw attention to the picture, he put a card on it, on which he printed the words, "The Approaching Storm," especially suitable for a wedding present."

"What is a phenomenon?" asked one workman of another.

"It's like this. Suppose you were to get out into the country and see a field of thistles growing."

"Yes."

"Well, that would not be a phenomenon!"

"No, that's quite clear," agreed the other man.

"But suppose you were to see a lark singing away up in the sky."

"Yes."

American Messenger, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York

"Well, that would not be a phenomenon!"

"No, that also seems clear."

"But imagine there is a bull in the field."

"Yes."

"Even that would not be a phenomenon."

"No."

"But, now, Bill, look here. Suppose you saw that bull sitting on them thistles whistling like a lark—well, that would be a phenomenon."

The hansom ordered by the middle-aged spinster was late, and the cabby came in for a good rating when he finally drove up.

"I shall probably miss my train," the irate lady informed him, "and I shall hold you responsible. I want your name, my man. Do you understand? I—want—your—name!"

The Boston driver clucked up his horse easily. "I'll let you have the number if you like," he said, "but you can't have my name. That's promised to another young lady."

"My dear, I've an idea," said old Mrs. Goodart to her caller. "You know we frequently read of the soldiers making sorties. Now, why not make up a lot of those sorties and send them to the poor fellows at the front?"

She had just fed the tramp and felt it a matter of principle to make him do some work.

"You may take down the front storm door."

"S-s-sorry, mum," replied the tramp, quaking like an aspen leaf. "I've g-got t-the s-shaking ague."

"Oh, well, then, you can sift the ashes."

THE AMERICAN MESSENGER PREMIUM LIST

INSTRUCTIONS AND SUGGESTIONS TO OUR WORKERS

FOR the benefit of the many new friends whose names have been added to our AMERICAN MESSENGER Subscription list since the last Annual Premium Catalogue was published, we would state that we have found it an incentive to the readers of the paper to offer them beautiful and desirable articles as rewards for doing a little pleasant work during their spare moments by securing subscriptions for the AMERICAN MESSENGER. The premiums or rewards have been very acceptable, and many letters have come from friends thanking us for the premiums sent, and telling us that many of the names were secured with little effort. Both our workers and ourselves have been well paid.

At this season many people are making their selection of reading matter for the coming year. Why not speak to your friends and recommend the AMERICAN MESSENGER? Having been a subscriber yourself, you know its value and can heartily commend it. The very low subscription price of Fifty Cents a year will be a strong inducement. Try it and see how easy it is to obtain one or more of the beautiful articles offered. We know of many who earn their Christmas gifts by securing subscriptions to the AMERICAN MESSENGER. You can do the same.

As you see, we are now offering our friends another opportunity to secure one or more of our valuable premiums. As some of the articles have been so greatly appreciated in the past, they will remain on the list, with new ones added, and we trust that all our friends will avail themselves of these excellent offers.

Should any one wish to work for any of the books published by the American Tract Society, or any other articles not indicated on the following pages, please write us and we will tell you how many subscriptions it will be necessary for you to send in order to secure the premium desired.

We aim at securing MANY THOUSAND NEW SUBSCRIPTIONS to the AMERICAN MESSENGER during the next four months, and we are confident that this can be accomplished if all our friends will use their influence in behalf of this splendid periodical.

Please read very carefully the following instructions:

Send in your list of names as received and credit will be given, and as soon as the list is complete the premium will be forwarded to you.

Cash must accompany each order.

No premiums are allowed on subscriptions in Manhattan or Bronx Boroughs of New York City.

We cannot allow a premium to a subscriber on his own subscription, unless it is sent in with at least one other new subscription.

Subscriptions may begin with any month; but new subscribers who send in their subscriptions before January 1, 1917, will receive the special Thanksgiving and Christmas numbers of this year FREE, thus securing the paper for fourteen months (i. e., to the end of December, 1917) by the payment of one year's subscription.

Our beautiful Calendar for 1917, entitled "Making Friends," will be sent POSTPAID to each subscriber (both new and renewal), provided 10 cents additional is sent with each subscription. This will serve as a special inducement in securing subscribers. See special notice on page 166 of this paper.

Merchandise Premiums will be sent only to subscribers in the United States, inasmuch as a duty is required in foreign countries.

The full subscription price of Fifty Cents must be sent for each subscription when agents are working for a premium.

Money may be sent by Post-Office Money Order, Express Money Order, Bank Draft on New York, or Registered Letter. It is unsafe to send currency or even postage stamps in a letter, unless it is registered. Make all money orders payable to AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY, Park Avenue and 40th Street, New York.

In all correspondence be sure to give your own name and address in full as well as the full name and address of all those whose subscriptions you forward. When sending money for a subscription, state whether it is to pay for a new subscription or a renewal.

To those who do not care to work for a premium, we will allow a cash commission. Full particulars will be sent on application.

We use every precaution to insure the delivery of goods sent by mail, but we are not responsible for the loss of goods so sent. We will, however, guarantee the delivery of goods, when 5 cents extra is enclosed for Insured Parcel Post Mail.

Canadian subscriptions require 12 cents additional, and Foreign subscriptions, 24 cents additional for postage.

SCRIPTURE WALL ROLLS

Who can measure the extent of silent influence? We refer specifically to the effect which Scripture Wall Rolls, hung on bedroom, parlor, dining-room or kitchen walls, exert over the minds and hearts of the inmates of the home. The child takes in as by breathing every day the enlightening, soothing, elevating influence of these silent teachers. Some of God's most powerful agencies in the material realm are the most silent; for instance, the sunshine scattering gladness and life everywhere, illuminating ten thousand landscapes, painting the flowers with many colors and beautifying the cheek of merry childhood. So the silent Scripture Wall Roll, with the beautiful setting which it gives to the carefully selected Scripture verses, cannot fail to make a lasting impression for good.

Here is something for both young and old in every family. Many thousands of these popular Wall Rolls have been sold, and no Christian home should be without one.

Given for only 4 yearly subscriptions to the AMERICAN MESSENGER at 50 cents each, or we will give one year's subscription and the Wall Roll, postpaid, upon receipt of $1.25.

This Bible contains the text of the Bible, together with valuable introductions to the books of the Bible and notes and instructions based upon the text. The work also includes the outline of Kerr's Harmony of the Gospels.

"I have looked over the Self-Explaining Bible and am much pleased with the condensed explanatory portion of the text, as well as with the Instructions or practical application of the truth in each portion of the Word. For those who cannot afford a more voluminous commentary this one volume ought to be of inestimable value. The average Bible student could hardly invest money better than in purchasing this volume and in studying it faithfully."—A. F. Schaeffler, D.D.

"We know of no book which is more worthy of a popular reception than this. It contains, ready to hand, much of the material needed in reading the Bible."—Christian Press.

This book should be in the home of every Bible student.

We will give this beautiful Bible for only 18 yearly subscriptions to the AMERICAN MESSENGER at 50 cents each; or we will give the Bible and one year's subscription to the paper for $5.00

Dear Christian Endeavorer:

We knew a minister of the Gospel who invited the young people of the community to his home. Then he saw to it that they enjoyed themselves there better than they did anywhere else. And what a host of friends and what a congregation that man did have!

That is precisely the way we feel about it. We want just such a host of friends among the young people. We do everything in our power to make every one enjoy himself while in our realm of bookdom—yourself included. We therefore hope that no matter how small or how large your requirements are for books and supplies you will think of us as the young folks thought of that minister we have just told you about. With the coming of Fall and the cooler weather you'll want books for your own reading; then you'll want books later on for Christmas giving. With the opening of the public schools and the return to Sunday-school work, you'll need books also there. You'll need books for your little friends. There are the multitude of activities for which you'll require books. To-day everybody is reading both for pleasure and for study more than they ever did before.

We deserve your patronage. We keep a large, well selected, well-kept stock of all worth-while books on hand in both our store and our stockroom. We are right in the publishing center of the United States so that we can obtain at once any book not on hand. No one is too far away for our trade because we are within mailing distance of everybody. We make prompt deliveries to your door and our prices are the same as in your own home town.

Yours cordially,

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY,

Park Ave., and 40th St., New York.

P.S.—Give us a chance at your book requirements. Make us your book-dealer, exclusively. If you have not one of our catalogs ask for it. We want your book business. You will appreciate our SERVICE.

FOUR SPLENDID NEW BOOKS

DAVID de FOREST BURRELL.

PAUL THE PREACHER

(GEORGE WOOD SECOND PRIZE BOOK)

By JOHN L. ROSSER, A. B., Th.M.

PAUL—the orator, the theologian, the traveller, the teacher, the friend, the preacher—the subject is never exhausted. Here is a new study, strong, keen, scholarly, full of human interest, of Paul as a preacher. The book of Acts furnishes the pulpit, but the subject-matter of the sermons and the viewpoint of the preacher are richly supplemented from his various epistles.

Bible students will all want this concise, compact, helpful volume, which won the second prize in the American Tract Society's contest this year.

Cloth, 12mo. 5 x 7½ inches. 112 pages. Jacketed
Price, net, 60 cents postpaid.

JOHN L. ROSSER.

LETTERS FROM THE DOMINIE

(GEORGE WOOD FIRST PRIZE BOOK)

By DAVID de FOREST BURRELL

HOW does the man in the pew look to the man in the pulpit? This volume, written in a frank, friendly spirit, gives a new viewpoint of the work of a parish and its people.

"I hope you know the man to whom these letters were written," says the author. "For he is a fine fellow, a strong, kindly, sensible, serviceable man. You will find him East and West, in country and city, in overalls and broadcloth. The letters—one for every week in the year—were written to no one man in particular, but with many men in mind whom I have known and loved, with whom I have talked of the affairs of the Christian life and the present-day Church, knowing that their desire for the Kingdom is one with mine. They—the letters—are an attempt to convey to the mind of the devoted man in the pew the dominie's point of view on matters, small and great, germane to the Kingdom. And to this man they are dedicated, in the hope that, being born of one dominie's experiences and prayers, they may be of some small service in solving the problems of a busy life."

Because this is such a manly book, because it touches so wisely on present-day problems of the Church life, it was selected from more than two hundred manuscripts for the George Wood first prize.

You want it; your pastor wants it; your friends want it.

Cloth, 12mo. Frontispiece. 243 pages.

MISS PHENA

By FLORA SWETNAM

(With drawings by ALBERT MATZKE)

MISS PHENA is one of those quiet, whole-souled individuals who when they set out to do things, do them; without whom nothing would be done and yet who go on as though nothing had happened. She is the leader in more than one movement toward better things in her community and it was Miss Phena who started the ball rolling for the young folks. You'll read it, your children will read it, and then you'll want to pass it along.

Cloth, 12mo. 5 x 7½ inches. 182 pages. Jacketed.

The Thanksgiving Spirit

As we approach the day of national thanksgiving appointed by the President of the United States, perhaps the most important thing for us to remember is that the vital and essential feature of the Thanksgiving season is the cultivation and maintenance of the Thanksgiving spirit.

It is not necessary at this time for us to specify the reasons which our nation has for thanksgiving. These will be ably set forth from pulpit and platform at the services that will be held in connection with Thanksgiving Day.

Neither is it necessary that we should specify the reasons which each individual may find in his or her own personal life for observing Thanksgiving Day.

But it is eminently desirable that we should emphasize the moral obligation which rests upon every child of God to cultivate the spirit of thanksgiving and to manifest that spirit in its full beauty and power in all the relations of life.

Human nature is prone to selfishness, but the possession of a thankful spirit will be found a most effective antidote to that selfish tendency which is the malignant curse of mankind.

The thankful spirit reveals itself in a broad and true sympathy with others who are less fortunate than ourselves. It delights to remember the widow and the orphan and strives to carry the message of joy and gladness into the homes of the sick and the sorrowing on Thanksgiving Day. It looks unto God as the Author of every good and perfect gift, and insists on sharing the blessings which He has bestowed with those who are needy and in want.

The Temperance Campaign

In seven States on Election Day the question of prohibition will be presented to the voters for their decision. The territory of Alaska and many local cities and counties will also have an opportunity to register their decision on this vital issue.

The States in which the temperance issue is to be decided are California, Montana, Idaho, South Dakota, Nebraska, Missouri and Michigan. Weighty as are the other issues to be passed upon in the approaching national election, it is safe to say that the most important matter presented for settlement in the seven States named is the question as to the proposed prohibition of the liquor traffic.

The abolition of the saloon is the most needed reform in our country. Intemperance is the most crying evil with which the forces of righteousness have to contend. Christian patriots should not rest content until the liquor traffic has been outlawed in every State of the Union, for it is the most prolific source of corruption and the most dangerous and implacable enemy to the moral, social and political welfare of our nation.

Surely all Christian citizens will rally to the side of the temperance forces in the approaching contest and will do all in their power to help win the victory that will mean so much for the protection of the home and the advancement of the Kingdom in our beloved land.

It is sometimes alleged that to stop the liquor traffic will throw multitudes of men out of employment and cause a serious economic disaster. A sufficient reply to this argument is presented in these two questions, which each reader may readily answer for himself.

First, will prohibition help the merchant, groceryman, baker, milkman, farmer, tradesman, landlord, carpenter, mason, bricklayer, plumber, paperhanger, and other industrial workers, when the $2,500,000,000.00 now spent in the United States for liquor is spent instead for better shelter, food and clothing and for other comforts and luxuries of human life?

Second, will the present saloonkeepers, bartenders, distillers, brewery workers and other employes now engaged in the manufacture and sale of liquor be worse off in handling various necessities and comforts of life to the value of $2,500,000,000.00 than they are now in the making and handling of alcoholic beverages which tend to destroy life?

Horace Grant Underwood

It is with the deepest regret that we record the death of Rev. Horace Grant Underwood, D.D., LL.D., who passed to his eternal reward on October 12, 1916.

Dr. Underwood was born in England on July 19, 1859. When a lad he came to the United States with his father, John Underwood. He graduated from New York University in 1881, and from the Theological Seminary at New Brunswick, N. J., in 1884. He was then ordained, and after a brief pastorate in Pompton, N. J., he went forth as a pioneer missionary to Korea, at a time when a law in that country prescribed the death penalty for any one who should institute a religious propaganda. By his tact, courage and devotion, however, he escaped the operation of that law, and lived to see the Christian faith not only tolerated but honored throughout the land.

Dr. Underwood's labors in Korea were of the most varied kind. For a few years he was teacher of chemistry and physics in the Royal Korean Medical College. For twenty-four years he was chairman of the Korean Board of Bible translation. He was treasurer and afterward chairman of the Korean Presbyterian Mission. He was chairman of the Korean Educational Federation. He filled the chair of theology in the Korean Theological Seminary. He was also principal of the John D. Wells Training School in Seoul, Korea. He was a member of the Royal Asiatic Society and of the Delta Upsilon Fraternity. On one of his visits to the United States he served as the Foreign Mission Lecturer at Princeton Theological Seminary.

The crowning feature of Dr. Underwood's life work was his service for the cause of Christian literature in Korea. He was corresponding secretary and afterward for many years president of the Korean Religious Tract Society, which is the only society in Korea for the publication of Christian literature and which has been aided from the outset by cash appropriations from the American Tract Society.

Dr. Underwood was the author of many notable works, including an English-Korean Dictionary, a Korean Grammar, an "Introduction to the Korean Spoken Language," "The Call of Korea," and "Religions of Eastern Asia."

The funeral services for this honored servant of God were held on Sunday afternoon, October 15, 1916, at the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, N. Y., at which an eloquent tribute to his life and work was paid by the pastor, Dr. Charles C. Albertson. Dr. George Alexander, President of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, and Bishop Merriman C. Harris of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Japan, assisted in the service, which was attended by a widely representative body of Christian ministers and laymen.

Our Thanksgiving Issue

In this number of the AMERICAN MESSENGER we believe our readers will find many features appropriate for this season of the year. The editorial contribution by Rev. George Ernest Merriam on "Gleaners in the Fields of Life," brings a most timely message for the Thanksgiving season. In Our Fireside will be found a fascinating Thanksgiving story, while scattered on other pages will be found other articles that are in harmony with this great national festival.

A very forceful and pertinent article by Rev. Warren G. Partridge, D.D., entitled, "Every Sunday School Teacher an Evangelist," will be found full of suggestions for the large army of Christian workers who labor in the Sunday Schools of our land.

Many other features of this issue will commend themselves to our readers, we are sure, and we bespeak their hearty co-operation in the efforts which are being made to increase the circulation of our paper and thus to add to its usefulness.

At this season of the year the gift of a year's subscription to the AMERICAN MESSENGER sent to some loved one who may be far away would make a very pleasant Thanksgiving remembrance. It would also be a gracious thing to send this paper into the home of some home missionary or shut-in, who might not otherwise receive it.

We know, by actual testimony that this paper is a most welcome visitor into many hospitals and it would be well if by gift subscriptions the circulation of the AMERICAN MESSENGER in such worthy institutions might be greatly multiplied. Any subscriptions for the purposes indicated will be most gratefully received, and will be used to the best possible advantage in supplying the many deserving cases which are constantly appealing for spiritual help.

Another Millions Movement

This is an age in which we think in large numbers. The latest movement which aims to enroll a million adherents is the effort being made by the National Temperance Society to enroll one million persons as "Associate Abstainers."

This effort recognizes the fact that prohibition, to be permanently successful must rest upon the practice of total abstinence. This truth has been somewhat overlooked in the activities of some of the temperance organizations. For this reason the National Temperance Society has decided to place special emphasis on this phase of temperance work, and it invites the co-operation of all who believe in prohibition in the effort to build up an army of Associate Abstainers.

Continuous Evangelistic Effort

One of the aims set forth at the last national Christian Endeavor convention in Chicago by Dr. Francis E. Clark, the honored president of the society, was the securing of a million new members for the church within the space of two years.

This means a continuous evangelistic effort on the part of the young people enrolled in that great society, and it is an enterprise in which they should have the warmest support and encouragement on the part of both pastors and church members.

Comparatively little has been said about this effort outside of the Christian Endeavor Societies, but it is an object worthy of the highest commendation, and it should be aided in every possible way by all those who are anxious to promote the growth of the Kingdom, of which the Christian Church is the visible representative.

The Sabbath Tuning Fork

A suggestive design appearing in The Lord's Day Leader, issued by the Lord's Day Alliance, represents a tuning fork, upon one prong of which are inscribed the words, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,"—Ex. 20:8, and on the other the words, "The Sabbath was made for man."—Mark 2:27.

Thus are indicated both the divine sanction and the human need which constitute the impregnable foundation upon which rests this hallowed institution of the Sabbath.

Messages for Modern Men

BY REV. FRANK B. McALLISTER

Pull Your Own Weight

THE ship of life is built like a Roman trireme, in which all who ride are expected to tug at an oar. No one has a right to loll about the decks, while a small, hired crew does the work. The figure of the luxurious passenger liner is inapt when used to image forth our passage across the sea of time. On this sea one is supposed, at least, to pull his own weight. They are but human barnacles who steal rides on ships propelled by other men's labor.

That one should strive to put into life as much as he takes out of it is a sentiment that finds response with earnest people everywhere. No normal human ambition will fall to a lower plane than that. No awakened human being will be content to be simply a burden on society.

In describing a class of able-bodied idlers, good old Isaac Watts once wrote some lines that do not appear in the author's hymn books, but which are not lacking, nevertheless, in pungent truth.

"There is a number of us creep,
Into the world to eat and sleep,
And know no reason why we're born,
But only to consume the corn,
Devour the cattle, flesh, and fish
And leave behind an empty dish.
And, if our tombstones, when we die,
Be n't taug't to flatter and to lie,
There's nothing better can be said,
Than that he's eat up all his bread,
Drank up his drink, and gone to bed."

A sufficient number of parasites of the kind here described would bankrupt the world. It is only because the producers keep a bit ahead of the consumers that civilization endures. Into the mouth of the servant of Falstaff; Shakespeare puts a despicable philosophy. Exclaims Pistol, that swashbuckling lover of pompous phrases,

"Why, then the world's mine oyster
Which I with sword will open."

There you have bad economics as well as bad morals. If all men went on that piratical plan, the universe could not endure the drain on its resources. There would soon be no oyster left for anybody.

No one who has caught the Christian vision of what these earthly careers of ours may be, will be content to remain solely a consumer. He will try to produce something for the good of his fellows, no matter how infinitesimal the product be. He will tug some grain of wheat to the common mill, justifying thereby his presence on the higher road of time. He will try to pull his own weight—and a little more.

One has the privilege of thinking of his vocation not alone as the means of paying his board bill but as his means of doing good in the world. His particular job is the medium through which he is to make his contribution to the welfare of humanity. It used to be thought that a youth who desired to live a life of service could find no opportunity save in the ministry. That great calling still presents a surpassing opportunity. We see, however, today, that every honorable calling offers a chance to do good. All useful work, whether of hand or brain, may be entered upon in the spirit of consecration.

Romance used to center about the life of royal courts, with their atmosphere of idleness and luxurious pleasure. The motto of the proud, mediæval order of the Golden Fleece was, "Wealth, not servile labor." That estimate of values was reversed by Him who came to minister rather than to be ministered unto; who, in the upper room, girded Himself with a napkin and performed a slave's office for His disciples.

An idle king is a sorry spectacle in comparison with a common laborer passing along the street homeward at nightfall, swinging his dinner pail, and with the marks of toil upon him. Whether he has laid bricks for a building, or stood behind a counter, or tended a loom, he has been justifying his existence as a productive member of society; he has been pulling his own weight.

From participation in useful and honorable labor no one of the sons of men is debarred. From prisons and from sick-rooms have come some of the great inspirations of the race. "They also serve who only stand and wait." The great thing is that one's work be touched with the glow of a moral idealism, that it be intended to serve human well-being in physical, mental, moral, or spiritual ways.

"We are laborers together with God." We are partners with the Eternal. The Almighty asks our help in making this world the abode of righteousness and peace and joy. The city that hath foundations, the "New Jerusalem," is being built here; out of such materials as we can supply. Who can be content to slink through life as a non-producer when his bit of work might have a part in so stupendous a plan?

Gleaners in the Fields of Life

BY

REV. GEORGE ERNEST MERRIAM

In all literature there is no more beautiful story than that of Ruth. It recalls Millet's picture of "The Gleaners," which hangs in the Louvre. As in that picture so in the story of Ruth wealth is contrasted with poverty. As there the gleaners are seen bending to their toil, picking up the stray slender stalks as they may find them, while close by are the full sheaves that tell of the owner with plenty and to spare, so with Ruth are seen the gleaners on the one hand and on the other the rich Boaz, the kinsman of Naomi. The story deals with his generosity. It is also a tale of strange customs and of deep love. If Boaz is rich, Ruth is poor; yet Ruth, the gleaner, is the great grandmother of David and the ancestress of the Christ.

We have here an oriental atmosphere with incidents and scenes that tell of ancient times and characters. We cannot but feel the charm of the setting. The dramatis personae are most interesting. But more than this we are reminded of our opportunities as gleaners. Our fortune, too, depends upon our industry, upon the fields in which we labor, and upon the favor which we find with man and above all with God. We glean not in one field alone nor is it one kind of grain that we glean. There is barley and there is wheat. Our life is a pastoral poem like that of the bee. As the insect flits from flower to flower, from buckwheat to clover and from clover to honey-suckle, and finds in each something to add to the honey cell, so should it be with us.

The message is a spiritual one but it must needs deal with secular things. The kingdom of the world is to become the kingdom of Christ. It is to become such through us, that is through our gleaning.

We should be gleaners in the field of nature. All around us are large estates quite set apart, bound as it were into sheaves. They belong to favored individuals and we perhaps have little or no part therein. And yet if we look about us are there not stalks left here and there? Whole handfuls indeed, plucked from the bundles of nature, are flung at our very feet, if only our mood is right and our attitude is one of patient search. By dint of patience we garner our ephah, that is our bushel and a half, of the finest wheat. But we must glean in every shining hour. We must glean in the sunshine, and in the moonlight, and beneath the friendly stars. We must glean from the distant hills and from the near-by forests, from the lake and by the meadow brook as well as in harvest fields. The park that is almost forgotten in the midst of our city's turmoil is a goodly field for gleaners, if they will seek it out. Ever the story is the same; everywhere the opportunity is to be seen. There are wild flowers by the wayside, while even the very weeds, if only the microscope of the soul is applied to them, has something to add to the stores already gathered into our lap. The very sands of the desert are studded with diamond dust, flints and prisms, for the eye that sees. The birds of the air, the butterflies and all winged things bring something if only we watch for their gifts. He who once has made even a small herbarium knows the fascination of gleaning in the field of nature. The camera, the note book and memory all serve to make us gleaners in this field.

There is a chance here for all the senses. With your hand you may gather material wealth, furniture for the home, raiment for the body, food for self and wife and little ones. Wordsworth speaks of "the harvest of the quiet eye." With your eyes and your ears you may glean. In this you are as well equipped doubtless as the very best. Yet only as you train yourself can you expect to gather and to garner as others do. Indeed in the field of nature we must always remember that we are only gleaners. Scientists may reap. We can but glean.

So, too, in the fields of literature and of art. We may not be endowed with genius of any kind. There may be no large number of books in our home and no gallery of art even within our locality. Here as within the wider field of nature we must confess that to others belong the great sheaves. We are but gleaners still. Yet how much is ours through the generosity of men. Even as Boaz commanded his young men to pull out handfuls from the bundles and to leave them in line with the steps of Ruth, so through the wisdom of far-seeing municipalities and the gifts of philanthropists we may glean widely in the volumes of past and present and from the works of painters and of musicians. Public libraries are in every city and nearly every village. Circulating libraries are furnished by the state. Books and magazines are upon the market everywhere. A few good etchings, engravings, pastels and photographs—these well studied are better than the larger number in the hands of those who do not care. The home-made scrap-book and portfolio may become granaries stored with the wealth of years, enough for self and others. For example, on one and the same day I have cut from an ordinary newspaper Wordsworth's poem on "Intimations of Immortality" and have clipped from a periodical a reproduction of Hoffman's picture of "Christ in Gethsemane." Thus can one glean the best from sheaves that otherwise might be destroyed. It is merely a matter of proper valuation. One can study, classify, analyze, and above all remember. Learn to compare the perfect with the imperfect. Thus it is that we gain the spirit of the poet, the painter and the musician. They, to be sure, are the reapers. We are but the gleaners.

If we change to the realm of society we find it the same. Rich indeed are the fields of nature, the library and the picture gallery. But richer yet are the fields where men go. It seems, alas, as though men too were sheaves. The very reapers are bound into bundles. One man frequently employs a hundred or a thousand men. He commands their time, their talents and their strength. Yet directly or indirectly some of their hours, some of their thoughts, some of their efforts and affections belong to us. We follow in their footsteps and we glean that which they leave in their wake. And it is not difficult thus to gather an entire ephah of kindness and inspiration. There were three gleaners in the famous picture of Millet, and we read there were maidens in company with Ruth. We doubt not that she gleaned much from their companionship as well as from the sunlight that shone about her and the wheat which she gathered into the upheld corner of her robe. Do you feel that you are barred from "the four hundred"? Weep not. All that they have or could possibly give is not necessary to the finish of your character. It is good indeed to know college men, women who have traveled, statesmen, artists and literary celebrities. It is good also to know the farmer, the mechanic and the merchant. The main question is what are you getting from the one or from the other? Is it but a passing comradeship? Is it but the wit of the moment? Is it but the knowledge that passeth away? All this is well enough and yet not enough. We should learn from the experience of our friends. We should catch something from their inspiration. We should assimilate the best in their character. Thus it is that you and I may glean and even reap from all that we meet.

Doubtless you have gleaned in the fields of nature, art, literature, and among men. May I ask if you are gleaning in Christian fields? To miss this is to miss the field of Boaz, the field of opportunity and of opulence. This is the field which includes all others, the field which is as large and resourceful as the kingdom of God, the sum of all kingdoms. This is but a part of God's world, one corner of His realm. All the works of men are inspired by Him, made from His materials, patterned after His ideas. Men themselves are but His ideals—partly realized. They are the grain, the finest of the wheat.

And in this field Christ is the Lord of the harvest. All that was gleaned by Ruth from this field and from the reapers was less than what she received directly from Boaz. So is it with us: our true opportunity is with the Christ. It is when lying at His feet, as Ruth lay at the feet of Boaz that we are nearest to the wealth intended for us in the plans of Providence. Then are we bidden to spread out our mantles and to receive therein not six measures of barley, as with Ruth, but all that is represented by her marriage to her great and generous patron. When Ruth was taken into the bosom of Boaz how little in comparison must have seemed all else which she hitherto had received. Love may bring material wealth of little account. Yet her marriage was for Ruth the consummate gift of Providence. It gave into her possession all the sheaves of the wheat, all the granaries with their contents, the very fields themselves with the workers and the owner of the fields himself.

I wonder what have we done? What are we doing? Are we gleaners in the fields of life? Gleaning means toil and sacrifice. According to Mrs. Whitney, the novelist, "the tests of life are the things crowded out." Let us add to this statement by saying that the tests of life are also the things gathered in. Are they merely material and natural and intellectual, or are they all this and more—spiritual? Then are we true gleaners for we have found the field of Boaz.

Again are we beating out that which we have gleaned, as Ruth did? That is, are we preparing it for the nourishment of the body, of the soul and of the spirit? Are we assimilating it so that we are growing physically and spiritually? Again are we gleaning not for self alone but for others? Ruth took her daily stores to Naomi. With her she shared all. Are we using thus that which we have gleaned? Are we making life richer for others in the home and in the church? Are we giving credit where credit is due and exclaiming with the friends of Ruth, "Blessed be Jehovah"? The first message flashed by the inventor of the electric telegraph beneath the waters of the ocean was the sentence, "What hath God wrought!" Professor Morse felt, according to his own statement, that his invention was an answer to prayer, and, if he was the first to use electricity for this purpose, it was not because he was superior to other men but solely because God had used him as the humble instrument of His own plans. This shows the heart of the true spiritual gleaner.

Let us not forget that the Lord of the harvest is speaking to us as He spoke to His disciples of old saying, "Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields that they are white already unto harvest." We are not ignorant of His meaning. All about us the souls of men are ripening ready to be gathered. Let us up and doing. With all our gathering in, let us not fail to garner souls as we ourselves hope finally to be garnered by the great Lord of the harvest.

Every Sunday School Teacher An Evangelist

By Warren G. Partridge, D.D.

THE evangelistic Sunday School teacher is one of the most valuable evangelists in the world. The Sunday School is one of the whitest harvest fields on earth, and that teacher magnifies his or her exalted office who sees the opportunity to win the priceless souls in his or her respective class.

The Sunday School teacher should be a soul winner. Our love to Christ should constrain us to be fishers of men. Our love for souls should impel us to save the lost; and our love for the church should prompt us to win new recruits to strengthen this divine institution.

Every teacher should be anxious to save the world. But it is often necessary to make a mighty effort to save the church. The teacher's church may be facing a crisis. The location of the church may be unfortunate. The church members may be moving farther away from the house of worship. Older members are dying, or moving away. Who shall be the officers and pillars of the church in the next decade or generation? Your church has a noble history. It has been a beautiful religious home for hundreds of people, who needed inspiration and consolation. But will the church be able to live in these trying days, and remain vigorous and powerful in serving the coming generation in your city or town? The teachers in that Sunday School may hold the future destiny of that local church largely in their hands. Teachers can not only save the souls of their pupils, but they may save the lives of their pupils for years of church work.

The churches are in crying need of workers, ministers, missionaries, teachers, and other helpers. Teachers may have the material before them, every Sunday, out of which can be made efficient church officers, evangelists, and other invaluable church workers. No church can possibly realize the priceless value of a teacher who is a successful soul-winner. The teacher has opportunities for service which may be far more efficacious, than the efforts of the minister or the parents. Evangelistic teachers have been among the most efficient soul winners in the world. Their opportunities are magnificent; but their responsibilities are tremendous. For the eternal destiny of millions of souls are in the hands of that grand army of teachers throughout the world.

Wisdom in soul-winning is evinced by the use of sanctified strategy. Joseph told his brethren that they should not see his face until they brought to him their youngest brother, Benjamin. Suppose that Jesus Christ should say to us, "Ye shall never see my face, until you bring your Sunday School scholars to me." A young woman, once went to her Pastor, and said with deep emotion: "Pastor, how can I reach a clerk in our office, who is not a Christian? He has sat for several years at the desk, next to mine in the same office. I feel responsibility for my influence over him. What shall I give him to read, or what can I possibly say or do, to win him for Christ?" She was a faithful teacher in a Sunday School, and she saw that this youth was being led into dangerous temptations, by his older companions.

It is individual effort that will count the most in soul winning. A teacher may teach the lesson to the whole class in a brilliant fashion, captivating the entire group, and holding the attention of all. But the tender word spoken to the pupil alone, before or after the meeting of the class, or in the home of the pupil or the teacher may accomplish more in the winning of that soul, than the formal teaching of the class for several years.

Let the teacher become the personal friend of each member of the class, and know the home, the burdens, the hardships, and the temptations of each scholar, and then the sympathetic and loving words of the teacher, alone with the individual, will ultimately "save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins."

It is personal work that counts in soul-winning. A general once said to his soldiers, "Wait until you see the whites of the eyes of your foes before you fire." We as Christian soldiers often fire at too long range. In teaching a whole class we may fire over their heads, and not wound the conscience of any. But if we gain the respect, confidence and love of every member of the class; then when our two eyes look, at close range, into the two eyes of our beloved scholar alone, we may save a soul by the help of the Holy Spirit. "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever."

Friends for Eternity

BY EMMA YOUNGLOVE.

A California woman, since childhood a resident of the state, was speaking of a contemplated visit to her early home and her relatives in the East.

"You will have an opportunity to see much of this country," remarked a friend. "How greatly you will enjoy it all!"

"I do not care so much for the scenery," replied the woman, "as I do for the people whom I shall know through all eternity."

Something of the same thought of the eternal reach of Christian friendships was in the mind of Paul when he wrote his first tender, yearning letter to the Thessalonians. He sent the message that "the dead in Christ" and "we which are alive" shall together be forever with the Lord.

Written primarily to comfort those who were mourning dear ones of their own kindred, this message broadens, deepens and sanctifies all Christian friendships.

Perhaps nothing does more to vitalize our friendships and render them worthy of immortality than making personal mention in prayer of those we know and love, as Paul did of his converts. It is desirable to enlarge the circle of those whom we thus remember, and not to forget to thank God for as well as to petition Him in behalf of all our Christian friends. What is more natural, indeed, if we are to spend all eternity in one another's society in heaven, than to think often of our friends, when we bow at the throne of the Lord of heaven?

THE OBLIGATION OF GOOD CHEER

By Clarence E. Flynn

TO say that there is no virtue in melancholy and no harm in cheerfulness only half states the case. Melancholy is positively wrong, and good cheer is a Christian grace. Whoever has a cheerful disposition has that much of a start toward positive and complete goodness.

From every viewpoint, both of the life to come and the life that now is, cheerfulness is a thing to be cultivated. It makes for happiness, it constitutes a guard against the danger of misjudgment and censoriousness, and it makes for success in the affairs of life. Everybody seeks out and likes the cheerful person. The world has no time—nor ought it to have—for the complainer and the grumbler.

Happiness is not a thing to be bought nor to be obtained from any external source. The only happiness which has lasting quality comes from within. No one can be happy long who is not happy in soul. Toys lose their gay color, baubles fade, treasures vanish, but a merry heart is glad forever. Happiness is not exclusive in its choice of where to go. It will go anywhere that anyone is willing to receive it. It graces the hovel as well as the mansion, and it is perfectly willing to pulsate in a breast covered with the rags of poverty. Anyone, anywhere, can be happy.

Melancholy is harmful to the individual. It not only spoils life for him, but it breaks down his health as well. No unhappy person can remain healthy long. On the other hand, no unhealthy person can cultivate the grace of joy without receiving substantial physical benefits therefrom.

The reasons for this are natural and plain. The unhappy person is never relaxed. He lives between a high tension of discontent and the lifeless reaction which follows. Today he is writhing in his self-inflicted misery. Tomorrow he is drowsy and languid as the inevitable result.

No one can feel well or go efficiently about his duties with his nerves on a strain. Every muscle must be free and loose. Each organ must be at ease and liberty to proceed in the performance of its function. The physical life cannot move by fits and starts without harm to itself. We cannot go in jerks without soon feeling the harmful results of so doing.

There is a still deeper reason than this for the harmful effect of discontent on the health. Unhappy emotions promptly set up processes which form poisons and pour them out into the system. These poisons have a paralyzing effect upon muscle and nerve. This accounts for the fact that indigestion or other organic inactivity will often follow a fit of violent anger or deep grief.

The Japanese are said to cultivate the habit of forcing themselves to smile. They do this, it is said, for the general benefit it renders both to disposition and health. It is a fact that a relaxed and smiling countenance has a tendency to put the rest of the body at its ease.

The conclusion is that every cheerful moment contributes to long life and physical well-being, and that it is not possible to give way to an uncontrolled torrent of unpleasant feelings or to the chilling hold of gloom without by so much shortening the days one has to live.

Melancholy is anti-social. It would scarcely be too much to say that it is criminal. If it is a crime to trespass upon the rights or the happiness of others, then gloom is a crime, for the reason that it does increase the burden and detract from the happiness of every person who ever comes into its chilling and blighting presence.

It does not dispose of the responsibility to say that other people need not be affected by our feelings. As a matter of fact, other people cannot help being affected by our feelings. Nothing is more contagious than feeling. The warm and genial spirit sheds light and joy wherever it goes—as a matter of course. The chilled and crabbed soul makes its presence a place of arctic coldness—and equally without effort. Where there is cheer there we find spontaneity and freedom. Where there is gloom there are weakness and constraint.

It is a serious question whether anyone ought to be allowed so to add to the world's burden. Having been near someone who was constitutionally unhappy has more than once unfitted someone else for his daily task. No one cares how long his day or how hard his work so long as he can keep a courageous spirit, but when he is robbed of that, he is shorn of practically all his power.

Men are not looking for more troubles. They already have more than enough. They are looking for genial souls who know the value of a smile and can teach it to men. The world really owes a large debt to the men who have made it their business to coax a laugh occasionally to its weary and hardened face. The man who has made the way a little more sunny for some far stranger whose face he will never see in this world, shall in no wise lose his reward.

It may often happen that one could render no other service quite so great as to just keep happy. The other man may not need a lift with his load. He may only need a fresh supply of gladness in his heart to make him feel that it is a little lighter. The world treasures its little supply of hearty good cheer as it might treasure gold and precious gems. Furthermore, it loves none so much as it loves those who try to pluck some of its thorns and plant flowers in their places.

Melancholy is not only unhealthful and anti-social, it is also sinful. The person who treasures an unhappy spirit sins not only against himself and his fellow men, but he also sins against the Almighty.

Of course it should be understood that in order to be happy there is no need of questionable and dangerous diversions. Let it be said once more that happiness does not come from without but from within. The whole outside world takes on the color of the spectacles we wear. It is just as unpleasing as the person who sees it is unpleasant. It is just as rosy and beautiful as the eye that looks upon it is bright and hopeful. We are speaking here not of diversions but of the inner spirit of our lives. Happiness, if it is anything, is a quality of character.

In his story of "The Laughing Man," Victor Hugo has sketched a remarkable character. Gwynplaine is a traveling showman, who as a baby was stolen from noble parents, and so disfigured by surgical means that his face always bore the appearance of a laugh. All through his life, however heavy might be his heart, Gwynplaine had no choice but to wear a laugh upon his face. The tears might flow from his eyes, but his features never lost their look of merriment. He laughed in sun and shadow, joy and woe.

After all, there is something wonderfully suggestive in this supposedly unfortunate character. He at least helped others too to be merry. He at least did not impose the chill of a downcast countenance upon any companion while he lived. This is worth while. It would be infinitely better if more could bury their sorrows beneath their cheer. Not only would others about them fare better, but the sorrows themselves would the sooner disappear. We cannot banish sorrow, but we can learn to bear it well.

If one will look to the Bible for a vindication of the statement that cheerfulness is Christian and gloom sinful, he will find abundant evidence to that effect. Everything there goes to indicate the gladness that clings about that One in whose presence is fulness of joy and at whose right hand there are pleasures forevermore. The person who thinks religion must be sombre has misread his Bible and misinterpreted his Master. It may be serious and earnest, but never morose and gloomy.

The Man of Galilee was indeed a man of sorrows, but He was too much of a man of joy to burden the world with His sorrows. He did not dwell upon them in the presence of others. He was content to endure them manfully, and to give the world an example of courage to the last.

A despondent person is no ornament to religion. It is the joy-lighted face which inspires and wins. It is the light of joy about the altar that makes it an impressive place. It is the glad service which lifts the world a little farther in its long, hard climb.

Asleep At the Switch.

BY REV. C. A. S. DWIGHT, PH. D.

Now and then an accident occurs on a railway, which has only one explanation—a switchman somewhere was asleep and failed at the proper moment to guide the wheels of the oncoming cars to a safe siding or, having set the switch in favor of a previous way train, dropped into slumber and failed to change the target when a limited express approached.

It too often happens in life that some person on whom great responsibilities rest fails at a critical juncture to do just that thing which is needed to turn events into the path of successful achievement. There are many events which are pivotal, for on them swing the issues which facilitate or arrest progress. Life, metaphorically speaking, is full of cross-overs, frogs and derailing devices, all of which require constant attention if trains of thought and carloads of valuable freight are to run swiftly and safely to their proper destinations. Only by the constant vigilance of those who serve as track-walkers, signal-men and switch-tenders, can accidents be avoided.

As moral factors in the world we have constantly power to divert the thoughts and energies of our fellow men from good to evil, or vice versa. Often they will take a cue from our example, and be influenced for better or for worse by some word of counsel, if we are only wise or alert enough to offer it. If, at such a critical juncture, we are mentally or morally drowsy, unawake just then to the possibilities of action—in other words, if we are asleep at the switch, the results may be disastrous.

In the course of history many a man, sleeping in the post of duty, has let a chance for remarkable moral achievement go by him, or, by failing to give warning from the signal-tower, has caused the wreck of many souls. "Watchful waiting," is the phrase to which many meanings have been attached, but it is certainly worthy of approval when it denotes a steady alertness to moral opportunities as they occur. On the great trunk line of life passengers and trainmen alike must keep awake, for sloth and success have nothing in common.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS

(NOTE: In this department we invite our readers to address letters to the Editor of the AMERICAN MESSENGER, setting forth any question concerning the religious life, the discussion of which may prove helpful and interesting for the general Christian public. Only the initials of the writer will be given in connection with any letter that is printed. The answers to the problems thus presented will be given by Rev. Edgar Whitaker Work, D.D., Pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church of New York City and one of the Contributing Editors to our paper.)

DEAR SIR:

Will you kindly give me a clear and satisfactory answer to the question—Can a person be as good a Christian outside as inside the church? I am not a member of the church, but not because I am not a believer. I simply have never felt that I needed the church to make me live a Christian life.

R. W. P.

DEAR FRIEND:

If you really do not feel the need of such aid as the church offers to the Christian life it may be impossible to show the necessity of church membership. We do not doubt for one moment that there are good Christians outside of the church. We believe, however, that as they grow in the Christian life they will naturally turn to the church. We fear also that it is true that there are some outside the church who are better than some inside the church. But it does not follow from this that the church is not the House of God, or that our duty toward it is any less binding. With these qualifications we are prepared to say that a person cannot be as good a Christian outside as inside the church. We shall offer only a few reasons, but they are very cogent ones. And first, it is true, whether you realize it or not, that you need the church. To be sure the church has many human limitations, and they are often very saddening. Nevertheless the church has much to give to any believer who will come to it with an open heart. To mention one thing only, it helps one to cultivate the habit of regular worship. We often lose sight of this constant service of the church. A thoughtful member of the writer's church said not long since, "I feel that I must be in my place in the church every Sunday, for it is the only opportunity I have to give thanks publicly and regularly to God." We do not say that worship is impossible outside of the church, but we do say that it tends to be intermittent, irregular and uncertain. Moreover one who is a believer should determine his duty toward the church by reference to what the church is in its character and destiny. There are many organizations toward which one may cherish indifference if he will. There is no obligation in relation to them. But are you justified in being indifferent to the House of God? For that is what the church is—it is "the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth." (See I Timothy 3:15.)

Again, it is not merely that you need the church, but the church needs you. There is a great battle for the Kingdom of God going on in this world. The church more than any other organization is at the forefront of the battle. It is a serious question, when one remains out of the church, whether he may not be guilty of the fault of the inhabitants of Meroz, who "came not to the help of Jehovah, to the help of Jehovah against the mighty" (see Judges 5:23). There are many other reasons that might be alleged. But there is one especially that is often overlooked. The church is the place where the Lord's Supper is observed. There is no other institution in all the world that does this "in remembrance" of Christ. May we ask you, dear friend, with all urgency, whether you may not have neglected an important command of your Lord?

DEAR SIR:

In the clash today between Labor Aggressive and Capital Defiant, what is the church, the exponent of Christianity, doing to bring about a better condition?

F. N.

DEAR FRIEND:

We may answer this question in the first place by asking another one. What is the church expected to do? No one is prepared to say that the church is doing all it ought to do to bring about better conditions in this world. We have to confess that the church is often a laggard in duty. Often its vision seems dim, and its appreciation of opportunity weak. Nevertheless we must do justice to the church. We are convinced that the church often fails to receive credit that is due to it. Its influence is often more real than obvious. We may ask our questioner this question—If the church were taken away, would not conditions grow steadily worse? We believe that the church is constantly exercising a steadying influence in the affairs of the world. It is very easy to criticize the church for the things it does not do. But the trouble is that the critics are frequently blinded to what the church is really doing. The real question, however, that underlies this matter is as to the actual function of the church. What should the church be expected to do in the dispute between Labor and Capital? This question is differently answered by different persons. One person will tell us that the church should become an active partisan and that it should take sides and join issues. But which side should the church take? The side of truth, you answer. Yes, but is the truth found all on one side? Another person will tell you that the church has no business to deal with such matters. Its function is wholly spiritual. It should confine itself to the realm of salvation. Even so, must not the church be interested in justice, righteousness and peace? Are not these spiritual entities in industrial as well as ecclesiastical circles?

Our answer to the question then as to what the church is doing to bring about better conditions between Labor and Capital is first, that the church is doing a great deal; second, that it is not doing enough. The church cannot be a partisan in these matters. We believe that our Lord points to this truth in His answer to that one who came to him and said: "Teacher, bid my brother divide the inheritance with me." The Master's answer must have created surprise. "Man, who made Me a judge or a divider over you?" (Luke 12:13-15). Was it not the business of Jesus to see that justice was done between men? Not quite that. It was His business to set men to thinking and believing in such a way about God and man, that they would seek out justice for themselves and do it. So He added, "Take heed, and keep yourselves from all covetousness; for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth." His immediate concern was not in dividing the inheritance, but in giving men a principle wherewith to govern their affairs. The business of the church is in a sense just what the business of the Master was, to give men the truth in relation to brotherhood, justice, and righteousness, and to furnish divine sanctions therefor. The church is doing this every day of the year. If it were not for the gospel of the divine Fatherhood and human Brotherhood which the church is preaching day in and day out, we believe that the conditions of the jungle would return to earth. Yet the church is not doing enough. Its preaching and teaching ought to be more explicit and more urgent. Without partisanship the church should nevertheless insist in our day as never before upon the social values and applications of the gospel to all classes and conditions of men. Every pulpit in the land ought to ring out with prophetic power against injustice, whether of Capital against Labor, or of Labor against Capital.

The Victory

BY WILLIAM NORRIS BURR.

Is there anything harder to bear than the sting of false accusation? At such a time how the heart is likely to be crying out for justice! Frances Power Cobb once said: "There is one unutterable thought: it is that justice may fail to be done either in time or eternity. This thought makes the human soul writhe like a trampled worm. The better we are the more insufferable it is. On the other hand, every trouble becomes endurable, nay, it is followed by a great calm, when we reflect upon an after-life in which the soul of us shall know that Infinite Wisdom and Love and Power have combined to usher in the day of absolute Justice."

The longing for justice is legitimate when it is unalloyed by a spirit of vindictiveness. Unjust accusation came almost daily into the experience of the Apostle Paul, and though he manfully repudiated the charges brought against him it was never in a spirit of bitterness against his accusers, for his life was closely knit with that of the Divine Sufferer who, looking down from the cross of crucifixion upon those who had driven nails into His hands and feet and thrust spear-points into His side, prayed "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

Sometimes, in our efforts to secure our "rights," we trample upon the right. Not so the harassed and persecuted disciples of Jesus Christ in the early days. They proved that it is possible to meet the most unreasonable of false charges in a spirit of calmness and loving regard for one's persecutors. They "rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer dishonor for the Name." Jesus Christ had cleared away that one unendurable thought that justice may fail to be done in time or eternity. Blessed are those beaten, battered ones who drown the old cry, "Let justice be done though the heavens fall," in the exultant shout, "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ!"

Back Of It All

BY CORA S. DAY.

"There goes the most faithful attendant at our church," remarked the pastor. He nodded out of the study window. A plain little old lady was passing. "She is one of the oldest members, too, and truly a shining example for our young folks. Her pew is never empty if she can possibly be there, both for the Sunday and the mid-week services. I know she is faithful in prayer and Bible reading as well. But she does not stop there. She lives her religion, daily, hourly, at home and abroad. That is what makes it real to us. We know her worship is not mere form when back of it is the spiritual force that sends her to those who need cheer or help or advice; and prompts her to give them all as if it were a favor to her to accept them. It is not outward show that makes her so sweet and good in her own home—where she has many duties hard for one of her age—that it is a very haven of rest for those who live there or are privileged to go there. We can see her formal religion every time we go to church; but we can see and feel the Christian living back of it all every time we meet her, whether it be in her own kitchen or parlor, or some other home where she has found blessed work to do for her Lord."

PRINTED PREACHERS

For the Soldiers on the Border

During the past few months the American Tract Society has sent a large amount of Christian literature down to the Mexican border for distribution among both the regular troops and the members of the National Guard of the various States who were summoned to service under the Federal call for the militia regiments of the country.

About 30,000 copies of the Soldier's Text Book and thousands of copies of various tracts suitable for the purpose were sent to different chaplains for distribution to the men under their spiritual care. One consignment went to Captain J. Madison Hare, Chaplain of the Fourth N. J. Infantry at Douglas, Arizona. In acknowledgment of this grant Chaplain Hare wrote:

"I desire to thank you for the Soldier's Text Books sent to our men at Douglas, Arizona. They were greatly appreciated."

Another consignment of Soldier's Text Books went to Chaplain H. S. Smith of the Third Infantry at Camp Eagle Pass, Texas. Similar shipments were sent to Chaplain John T. Axton, of the Twentieth U. S. Infantry at Fort Bliss, Texas, Major E. C. Clemans of the Second Minnesota Infantry at Llano Grande, Texas, Chaplain W. G. Crocker of the Seventy-first Infantry, N. G., N. Y., and Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, Chaplain of the Twenty-third Regiment, N. G., N. Y., at Pharr, Texas.

Evangelical Christian Literature for Italians

For several years the American Tract Society has made a substantial contribution toward the publication of L'Evangelista, a weekly periodical issued by the Italy Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the city of Rome, Italy. The usefulness of this paper is set forth in a recent letter from Mr. A. W. Greenman, Treasurer of the Italy Mission, who writes:

"Immediately on the outbreak of the war it was decided to send copies of L'Evangelista free to all military men in active service who would make written request for the same, and special efforts were made to adapt the paper to meet the needs of the man in the army. I very much doubt whether any other evangelistic paper in Italy has been more popular among the soldiers. We have had a multitude of unsolicited cards and letters of sincere thanks from all parts of the field, and the demands are still coming in. The free numbers sent out each week have increased from 100 or 200 until they now reach about 2500 and will probably be 3,000 before long.

"Let me give you an incident showing how it has been appreciated. Rev. Sig. Bani, the Superintendent of our Northern District, has just told me that one of his friends who went to the front as a common soldier and who asked for L'Evangelista, complained after two or three months that he had not received it. The letter was forwarded to Sig. Nitti, the editor and publisher in Rome, and he replied at once that the paper had been mailed to the soldier's address as given. Recently when the soldier was home for a few days he told Sig. Bani that shortly after Sig. Nitti's reply had been received, he happened to be called to the tent of the commanding officer, and while in the tent he noticed on the table copies of L'Evangelista. Thereupon he remarked to the officer:

"Do you take L'Evangelista?"

"No, I don't take it," was the reply, "but it comes here, and by the way, I think it is your copy I am reading. I greatly enjoy it, and now that you are here, you had better take your copies, but don't fail to let me see every copy that comes, because I don't want to miss a number."

With this letter Mr. Greenman sent a number of proofs of illustrations, which have been published in L'Evangelista, showing the wide field of influence exerted by this periodical. These illustrations show that L'Evangelista is read by soldiers and officers in the Italian Army, by the sulphur miners of Sicily, by the men in the Italian Navy, and by Red Cross workers.

CHAPLAIN J. MADISON HARE.

In the South

For many years Rev. James M. Carter has served as a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society among the Negroes in the Southern States. In a recent report he writes:

"It is always pleasant after serving on the field in this most glorious mission to make my report, for then I forget the hard trials that I have to undergo in carrying abroad the Gospel message, and as I reflect upon the joy and comfort which this message is bringing to my field of labor I have the satisfaction of knowing that my work is accomplishing that for which I am sent forth.

"Here in my own home town of Martinsville, Va., one minister purchased one hundred copies of 'The Good News in Story and Song,' in order that his people might read and sing His Word for themselves. I am urging upon the people the idea, 'Get acquainted with God's Word for yourselves,' and that idea is doing much to dispel the darkness and superstition among my fellow-countrymen of the negro race.

"I called upon one lady who was sick. She took a copy of 'The Good News in Story and Song,' and made a vow that if God would raise her up from her sickness, she would serve Him and read His Word every day. She told me about this many days later, when she was sitting up and could walk about on the floor. She declares that the reading of the New Testament and her decision to live for Jesus were the sole cause of her getting better.

"Our field continues to invite the labors of the American Tract Society colporters, as so much good is being accomplished."

In the Empire State

Rev. Samuel Goddard, a missionary colporter of the American Tract Society, whose field of labor includes the city of Buffalo, N. Y., and vicinity, writes:

"By the grace of God I have been enabled to continue my work, going out in all kinds of weather in the city of Buffalo and into the villages for some forty miles around. I have called upon some 4,200 people, and have circulated by sale and grant 1,300 books, mottoes, cards, tracts and papers.

"I addressed the people of Ingleside Home, who thanked me warmly for the grants of literature received. I also preached to the people of St. James Evangelical Church and addressed the Sunday School, where I was well received. I also visited the Buffalo Orphan Asylum, where the dear children were much pleased with the cards and papers I gave them."

Among the Cubans

"Printed preachers" in the form of Christian books, tracts and periodicals in the Spanish language are being distributed among the Cubans by Mr. Pedro Pozo, a devoted missionary colporter of the American Tract Society, whose activities are under the immediate direction of Rev. J. Milton Greene, D.D., Superintendent of Colportage in Cuba. In a recent report Mr. Pozo writes:

"Having worked a few days in Cabaquan, I went on to Jicotea, where in the surrounding country I labored for three days, giving several Bible readings in the farm houses and endeavoring to explain in simplest language the Word of God to the people who were in utter ignorance.

"Some one said to me, 'Your explanations give us to understand what kind of books you offer, and the interest which you feel and show convinces us that you are not working merely for the sake of money.' I replied, 'My only desire is that you may know the Word of God. Tell me, if your father had written you a letter and had left you an inheritance, would you not be anxious to read the letter and claim the inheritance? Now this is just what God has done, and these books explain it all.'

"After these meetings I disposed of many books, and this is the work which I try to do wherever I go. I have special success among the country people. In the cities I find it more difficult to interest the people, for there I find so much indifference and infidelity as well as many false beliefs such as theosophy, spiritualism and even voodooism or witchcraft. I never hold a service without trying to point out the way of salvation and to show the people that they need to be saved."

The Consecration of Social Life
I Corinthians 9:19-23.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Oct. 30. Christ in company. John 2:1-11.
T. Oct. 31. Social to save. Luke 14:1-14.
W. Nov. 1. Social to teach. Luke 10:38-42.
T. Nov. 2. Barriers broken down. Gal.
3:26-39.
F. Nov. 3. Choosing company. 2 Cor. 6:14-18.
S. Nov. 4. Function of play. 1 Tim. 4:8.

In the helpful series of topics devoted to the subject of consecration we have now come to the consideration of the social life of the consecrated Christian. The first thing for us to observe in this connection is:

The Example of Jesus

In the Gospels we see the Master in various social relations. We see Him at the wedding feast in Cana of Galilee; we see Him in the home of Simon the Pharisee and in the family circle of Lazarus. And wherever we see Him, we find that He perfectly fulfills all the social obligations resting upon Him.

It should be noted that Jesus in no wise altered His principles nor changed His personal characteristics by entering into the various social relations which He sustained to others. Yet He never seemed out of place, whether He was in the midst of joyous festivities as in the wedding feast, or in the house of sorrow, as when He raised the daughter of Jairus.

The Perils of Society Life

In these modern days some young Christians are exposed to serious moral perils when they enter upon what is known as society life. One class of perils are those that arise from the questionable amusements which are in vogue at the present time. There is danger to the moral life in the immodest dances, the wine-drinking customs and the loose standards of conduct that are characteristic of what is sometimes called high life, but which should be more properly designated as low living.

Another class of perils are those that arise from the false ideas of morality that are too often found among the so-called "four hundred" set of society.

Another peril to which young people are exposed in certain classes of society is found in the tendency to an idle, butterfly kind of existence, in which the sole object of pursuit is mere pleasure, and no regard is had to the real, earnest side of life.

The Redemption of Society

If society is ever to be redeemed from the evils to which reference has been made, it must be by means of consecrated Christians, who will show by their example "a more excellent way."

Christianity does not forbid the enjoyment of social privileges nor require that we should withdraw ourselves from society. But it does demand that the social pleasures in which we indulge should be pure and uplifting. It demands that the forms of recreation which we employ should be truly recreative, that is, that they should tend to make us new creatures and fit us more effectively to take up the battle of life. It demands that we adhere always and everywhere to the high standards of life and conduct that were set forth by the Master Himself.

Practical Suggestions

Christian young people should plan for their amusements as carefully as they plan for their regular duties in life.

If we carry into society the aroma of a consecrated life, the whole atmosphere must inevitably become purified.

A good social may be one of the practical methods by which we may secure the consecration of the social life of the community.

The importance of the social life is set forth in a striking way by William Caxton in these words: "Man in society is like a flower blown in its native land. It is there alone his faculties expanded in full bloom shine out, there only reach their proper use."

How to Be Strong
Hebrews 11:32-40; 12:1-4.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Nov. 6. Strong in faith. Rom. 4:20.
T. Nov. 7. Strong in patience. 2 Cor. 12:1-10.
W. Nov. 8. Strong in goodness. Matt. 5:43-48.
T. Nov. 9. Strong through study. Josh. 1:1-9.
F. Nov. 10. Strong through prayer. Mark 14:38.
S. Nov. 11. Strong through gentleness. Ps. 18:35.

Our topic refers to spiritual strength, but we may obtain some suggestive hints as to how to be strong spiritually by considering the question as to how we grow strong physically.

Use the Right Food

An athlete in training pays particular attention to the food which he eats. He is careful to avoid those kinds of food which impair digestion or tend to weaken the physical frame, and he uses only that food which experience has shown will build up body and muscle.

To grow strong spiritually we must feed on the Word of God. In its pages we will find that spiritual sustenance which will make us mighty in faith, strong in patience, abounding in hope and full of love.

Take the Right Exercise

Exercise is a most important feature of physical training. Without it no results can be obtained, but by using the right kind of exercise a man may make himself proficient in any kind of physical effort.

To be strong physically we must exercise ourselves in Christian service. Faith without works is dead, and we cannot grow in grace save as we put into practice the teachings of our Christian faith.

By constant physical exercise we grow continually stronger, and by patient continuance in well-doing we become increasingly strong spiritually.

Choose the Right Example

A man in training usually patterns himself after some successful athlete in order that he may excel. So the young Christian who would develop strength in the spiritual life should look to Christ as the Great Example. The Apostle Paul said, "I can do all things in Him that strengtheneth me." So it is by looking unto Jesus that we may attain unto real power in the Christian life.

The Value of Spiritual Strength

Young men covet physical strength, and rightly consider it a thing worth striving for.

But spiritual strength is even more earnestly to be desired, and it is possible for every young man and young woman to secure that priceless possession.

The world to-day needs men and women who are spiritually strong. They are the leaven which imparts a saving element to our national life. They constitute the bulwark which protects our civilization from the tide of worldliness and sin that would otherwise overwhelm us. They serve as the anchor that keeps us from slipping into the abyss of atheism and inhumanity that would otherwise engulf us.

Hints for Meditation

The gift of the Holy Spirit is an essential endowment in order that we may grow spiritually strong. With the endowment of the Holy Spirit we receive the fruits of love, joy, peace, long-suffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness and self-control which assure the continuance of our spiritual strength.

We grow strong through prayer. Indeed, without the use of prayer we cannot expect to have spiritual strength. Prayer is a channel of communication by which we may avail ourselves of the divine strength. By prayer we are brought into contact with the inexhaustible riches of God's grace and the infinite resources of His power.

We are strong when we work with God. We are weak when we are not in perfect accord with Him.

Why Christianity is the Hope of Our Country
Psalm 9:1-20.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Nov. 13. Christianity enlightens. Isa. 60:13-22.
T. Nov. 14. It builds ideals. 1 Pet. 2:5-12.
W. Nov. 15. It is aggressive. Acts 17:22-34.
T. Nov. 16. It is socially constructive. Jas. 2:1-12.
F. Nov. 17. It stirs conscience. Heb. 4:12-16.
S. Nov. 18. It stands for justice. Matt. 23:13-39.

As the week, November 19 to 26, 1916, has been designated as "Home Mission Week" by the Home Missions Council, this topic is a very appropriate and timely one for our consideration.

The Only Solution for Our National Problems

Our country is face to face with big problems. We have the Mormon peril, the negro problem, the question of immigration, the labor situation and varied social problems, upon the right solution of which depends the welfare of our country. Christianity alone offers a successful and lasting solution of these problems. Indeed Christianity has already begun to aid in the adjustment of many of these vexatious questions, and it is only by the continued application of Christian principles that they will be finally solved.

The Only True Faith

In our country there are many forms of false religion seeking for acceptance. In some of these there is a certain amount of truth that is mingled with the false, but that only serves to make the resulting mixture more dangerous. Then there is also rampant a good deal of atheism and infidelity.

The only way to eliminate these false forms of faith and to drive out atheism and infidelity is to spread abroad the message of true Christianity. Herein is the only hope for the religion of our country.

The Basis of Good Citizenship

Christianity is the only hope of our country because it furnishes the only secure foundation for good citizenship. The teachings of Jesus contain the fundamental elements of good citizenship, and true patriotism should inspire us to spread abroad the Gospel story throughout the length and breadth of our land.

The Function of Home Missions

It is the function of home missionary effort to spread the teachings of Christianity because they constitute the brightest hope for our country.

Home missionary service is patriotic service, and home missions have done more than most people realize in laying a strong foundation for our American civilization and in helping to build upon that foundation a worthy superstructure of noble Christian citizenship.

The Christian motive played a large part in the early discovery and settlement of our country. It is now playing a still more important part in the development and upbuilding of the best institutions in our land.

Vital Truths

The best way to evangelize the whole world is to push forward the evangelization of our own country, for home missions is always a strong stimulating force to foreign missions.

The home missionary field offers an opportunity for the display of a quiet heroism, whose far-reaching results may affect the future destiny of our whole country.

Our population is made up of many diverse elements. Only the influence of Christianity can weld together these divergent and sometimes discordant elements.

Christian literature has often been the forerunner for home missions. Indeed, the distribution of the Gospel message in the printed page has often proved the most effective way of introducing home missionary effort. Christian books and tracts have served as pioneer preachers, and have led to the establishment of Christian Sunday schools and churches.

The Grace of Gratitude.
Psalm 107:1-43.

DAILY BIBLE READINGS.

M. Nov. 20. For deliverance. Gen. 35:1-5.
T. Nov. 21. For divine leading. Deut. 8:1-18.
W. Nov. 22. For salvation. Ps. 40:1-8.
T. Nov. 23. Where are the Nine? Luke 17:11-19.
F. Nov. 24. Gratitude to benefactors. Acts 28:1-10.
S. Nov. 25. Keeping gratitude fresh. Heb. 13:13-16.

The Scripture selection for our topic is a beautiful Psalm which has been aptly named "The Song of the Redeemed." A careful study of this Psalm will show not only the causes for gratitude which the Israelites of old had but also the reasons for thankfulness which we have at the present day.

Reasons for Gratitude

In view of the approaching Thanksgiving season we may well inquire what are the reasons which we have for being grateful.

First, let us consider the personal reasons which we have for rendering praise to our heavenly Father. Whatever our lot and station in life, we can each find some personal blessings which call for our grateful remembrance. Home, friends, kindred, church fellowships, business success, these are but a few of the many personal reasons which furnish abundant cause for thanksgiving.

In the second place there are many reasons for gratitude on the part of our citizens, from a national point of view. Our land has been peculiarly blessed in all its history. Though there have been dark days, yet the gloom has never completely overwhelmed our nation. Though disasters have sometimes come, nevertheless we have been enabled to emerge from them and to go forward triumphantly along the path of destiny.

At the moment when these words are being written, there appears to be abundant cause for national thanksgiving. Our country is still at peace, despite all the complications that have threatened to involve us in war. And for the privilege of maintaining peace when almost all the rest of the world is at war calls for the exercise of the grace of gratitude.

We also have cause for gratitude in the abundant crops that have blessed the land and which furnish the substantial basis for the era of prosperity which we are now enjoying.

Expressions of Gratitude

It has been well said, "The thought unexpressed dies." So, unless the grace of gratitude finds expression in our words and deeds it is sure to die.

We ought to express our gratitude for the personal blessings we have received by giving ourselves to Him who gave Himself for us.

The grace of gratitude should manifest itself in our personal consecration, and we should present ourselves as a living thank-offering to the God who is the source of all our blessings.

As a nation our gratitude for our present prosperity should make itself evident by our gifts to relieve the awful suffering and want which are afflicting so many of the nations engaged in the great European War. In comparison with our abounding prosperity the gifts that have been so far made for this purpose are but small and even niggardly.

We have a National Thanksgiving Day once a year, but each and every day should be a day of personal thanksgiving.

Margaret Deland says: "When I don't sleep, I just count my blessings. That is a splendid thing to do, because you fall asleep before you get to the end of them."

Our Young Folks

Five Apples Each

BY I. G. WITT.

THE Ladies' Aid Society was getting supplies for the Orphans' Home in a distant city and all the church was helping. That is, all but the Primary class. The Men's Bible class was to nail up the barrels and haul them to the depot. The Epworth League was sewing and mending, and even the Junior League was going about for contributions and collecting clothing.

"Well, dears, I don't know what you could do, unless it would be to thread needles," replied Mrs. Wentworth, the Primary teacher, when the Aldrich twins had asked her what they could do to help. "And," she continued, "the ladies are working so busily that they wouldn't stop to take a needle from anyone. I will be thinking about it all week though and maybe by Sunday we can manage something."

Two days after that conversation Julius Aldrich was lying in the orchard under a winesap apple tree. It was almost time to go for the cows and while he was waiting for Julia, his twin, to come and head the cattle off so that they would not rush down the lane, he watched a litter of pigs as they snorted and rooted about on the other side of the fence. They had eaten all the apples that they could reach by pushing their snouts against the wire, and every now and then Julius would throw an apple away into the pig yard just to see them scurry after it.

Presently a buggy drove past and Julius heard the driver say to her companion, "Just look at that boy wasting those delicious apples!"

"Yes," replied her companion, "but there's no market for them this year. They are so plentiful."

Julius knew this. He had heard his father speak of it, but he was not prepared for the reply that he overheard as they drove out of hearing—

"I know, but isn't it a pity that some of those poor orphans can't have them?"

Julius sat erect and called after the ladies, but the horse had started up and was spinning down the lane. Then he began to pick up apples so fast that he had a big pile by the time Julia joined him.

"If you throw all those to the hogs," she laughed, "you'll make them lean running after them."

"Why Julia Aldrich," he exclaimed, "I wouldn't waste an apple on a hog for anything!"

Julia laughed heartily. "Since when, please?"

"Since half an hour ago," and he told her what he had heard.

After supper they picked up apples until dark and next day their mother told about it at the Aid Society. So Saturday Mrs. Wentworth brought out the Primary Class and they picked up apples and apples until Jenny Maxwell declared that every time she closed her eyes she saw red apples and green apples and yellow apples and russet apples.

When the letter of thanks that came from the Orphans' Home was read on the Sunday after Thanksgiving there was a long postscript to the Primary Class. The message made them very happy and there was a smile on every face when these words were read:

"There are things in your contribution which are more needful and more useful but nothing surely which gave more pleasure, for that wagon load of apples means five apples for every child in the Orphans' Home."

Our Collectors' Column.

The first letter which has come for our Collectors' Column is from a boy in the country who has sent us a very interesting account of "Stamps and Stamp Collecting." This is what he says:

DEAR EDITOR: I am thirteen, and for three years I have been collecting stamps. For the first year I had the "stamp craze." Every one that collects stamps has it for a time. The last time I counted my stamps I had 3,008. I started my book with some of the age was first thought of by Kowland Hill, who was prominent in postal reform. The first stamps made were real works of art, I think. The profile of Queen Victoria is beautiful. A piece of gummed paper was sold with these stamps, by which they were affixed to the mail matter. These stamps were not perforated. The perforating machine was not invented till thirteen years after. The water-marks on the back of these stamps made it impossible to counterfeit them.

Post-paid envelopes were used in Paris in 1853, long before the adhesive stamp was thought of. On the first day that I wish that more boys and girls would collect stamps, they would find it so interesting. It is not necessary to buy them. Just keep what you get, and ask your friends for them. I think it is real fun, and every time you get new stamps and study your old ones you learn something.

GERALD MINER.

We are delighted with this letter, and we trust that we shall hear from other boys and girls in regard to their stamp collections.

We would also like to hear from those who have made a collection of stones, pressed flowers, seaweeds, seashells or other interesting objects.

If any of our young readers have taken photographs which would make good illustrations for Our Young Folks' page, we would be very glad to receive them. If you send photographs for this purpose, please be sure to wrap them securely so that they will not be injured in the mail. Oftentimes a good photograph is spoiled, because it was not properly protected when put in the post office.

Some of our young friends may have been making other collections which have not been mentioned here. If so, please do not fail to let us know what you have been collecting and what success you have had.

Write at once to the Editor of the AMERICAN MESSENGER, Park Avenue and Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y., and your letter may be in time to be printed in our next issue.

"Dares"—Right and Wrong

Because he would not take a "dare," a young English baronet tried to swim the river Thames in a full-dress suit. He lost his life, and the two young women who, in a moment of hilarity, dared him to do it, have broken hearts and remorse for their share.

Because some other fellows dared him, a twelve-year-old boy climbed far out on a limb too fragile to bear his weight, and fell twenty-five feet to the ground—badly injured and unconscious.

Because they dared to keep their heads on the railroad track longer than their comrades, two Lynn (Mass.) boys were hurled to death by the onrushing train. For several weeks the boys of that city had been daring each other to place their heads on the track and see which one would hold his head there the longest when the train was bearing down upon them. The railroad officials tried in vain to stop the folly until these two boys were killed.

All these folks above mentioned confounded courage with foolhardiness and recklessness. A small boy of ten, on the other hand, when dared to go into a piece of mischief, absolutely refused to be bulldozed or sneered into it—because, as he said, "It isn't right." Someone dubbed that boy a "noble coward!" rather, they should have called him a "modern hero."

Real courage risks being laughed at, sneered at. Real courage lives up to its own convictions, at any cost. Dare to do right. Dare to be true. For the sake of others, dare even to risk your life, but refuse to join the great number of foolish persons who have been weak enough to throw their lives away rather than be laughed at.

THE WELLSPRING.

PREPARING FOR HALLOWE'EN.

old Russian stamps with the coats of arms in beautiful colors and a brown stamp from Mazambique that I thought was the most wonderful one ever issued. My favorite stamp is the 2-cent black Jackson of 1862; mine is uncanceled. I like the small square stamp, the 1-cent, with Franklin's picture, the 2-cent—a man on horseback, the 3-cent—an engine, and the 6-cent, with Washington's picture. There are stamps up to 90 cents in this set. Stamps are really more valuable than would be supposed. My grandmother had some old letters from which I got a lot of old U. S. stamps, and some old Wurtemberg stamps worth $15.00.

The first postage stamps were issued by Great Britain in 1839. Penny post-stamps were placed on sale in Great Britain 7,500,000 were sold.

The next country to issue stamps was Switzerland, the Canton of Geneva in 1884, and of Basel in 1845. These stamps were soon superseded by others, and some are worth a great deal. Now countries all over the world began to issue stamps—Russia in 1848, France, a year after, followed by Tuscany, Belgium, etc. It seems funny to me that the Sandwich Islands issued stamps before Holland.

Africa has lately issued some very handsome stamps; they show the pictures of a couple of giraffes picking fruit from a tree. There have been a whole lot of war stamps—one set issued by Austria with a field howitzer, etc.

CHURCH NEWS

Home Mission Week

At the suggestion of the Home Missions Council, November 19 to 26, 1916, has been designated as Home Mission Week. The Council has issued this appeal to the members of the Christian Churches:

"Four years ago the American churches were challenged by the watchword: 'Christian Patriotism—Our Country—God's Country.'" Then, as now the American public was absorbed in a great political campaign. In all their discussion of political issues Christian people were charged to remember the great decision which must guide every subsidiary choice. Whatever else we agree in thinking or doing; whatever issues we disagree upon, there must be no laxness or faltering in the endeavor to make this land God's country. Now, as then, Home Mission Week follows at once upon the season of political agitation. Now, as then, Thanksgiving Day succeeds as the month of November closes. For prosperity and the reign of justice, righteousness and peace, it is the duty of all to strive through the sovereign choices of the people. For the proper use of the bounties of nature and the stores amassed by our wide reaching industries, truly thankful hearts will inspire us to no less exalted endeavor.

"To lift to the highest each aspiration of this crucial season; to supply motives worthy of each decision; to guide every sincere wish and choice of men into the courses of the divine purpose; to purify and sanctify every impulse of patriotism; to bring all inhabitants of the land within the godly fellowship, whether high or low, rich or poor, of whatever color or race; this is the challenge of Home Mission Week. Help make your church and all the churches equal to this spiritual ministry to the American people."

This appeal has been sent to the leaders in practically every evangelical church in America. It is expected that nearly every Protestant church will in some way observe Home Mission Week, so that on the designated dates millions of American Christians will be thinking about, hearing about and praying for Home Missions. It is hoped that such a concerted effort will do much to advance the time when our beloved country shall be truly God's country.

In many communities it will be possible to arrange for union or mass meetings for one of the Sunday afternoons of Home Mission Week. Plans for these may be developed by the churches working in concert, or by the local Church Federation or Young Men's Christian Association. Such a meeting should be held in the largest auditorium available. It should be well advertised in the community, two or three excellent speakers secured, with the assistance of the Missionary Boards if necessary, and good music provided. At least one of the speakers should talk of local church and mission problems, opportunities for Christian service in the community, etc. Another might speak on "Christian Patriotism," and a third on national Home Missions.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement in New England

One result of the four of the large city conventions of the Laymen's Missionary Movement in New England last year has been the organization of the New England Division of the Movement in charge of a committee of fifty laymen representing different states and different denominations. The chairman of this committee is Hon. George R. Jones of Melrose, a deacon in the Orthodox Congregational church in that city and a Boston lawyer. The secretary is Charles C. Merrill, who was executive secretary of the conventions held last season in Boston and Worcester.

In order that the plans of the Movement may be in thorough harmony with the plans of the denominational leaders, an Advisory Committee of Board secretaries and denominational leaders has been formed with which the Executive Committee of the New England Division will work in close harmony.

Last year's work having been in the cities, special attention will be given this year to the country churches and communities through a series of country conventions. The first of these was held at Rutland, Vt., on October 15, 16 and 17.

Another country convention is scheduled for Dover, N. H., Dec. 10-12.

Another feature of this season's plans is a return visit for a single night to each of the cities where conventions were held in the last season's campaign or in the campaign of seven years ago. These meetings will be known as Decennial Suppers in recognition of the fact that the Laymen's Movement is ten years old this fall. In all the year's work special emphasis will be laid upon Men's Discussion groups, which has been found to be so fruitful a method of interesting men vitally in national and world problems. It is hoped that a large number of these groups will be formed in New England churches during the coming months, even when it is not possible to bring a church within reach of a large interdenominational meeting. The spirit and methods of the Movement have proven so beneficial to the country at large during the ten years of its existence that a very real gain ought to come to the masculine life of New England churches from this effort to bring its influence to bear intensively on these six New England states. A leaflet entitled "Mobilizing New England Laymen During 1916-17" has been published which sets forth the aims and plans of the New England Committee.

Work of the Moody Bible Institute

The Moody Bible Institute of Chicago has opened its Fall term with 712 men and women as resident day students, and 33 instructors, five of whom are new members of the faculty. This does not include the evening classes.

A feature introduced this year is the Swedish-English course, at the suggestion of the Swedish Evangelical Free Church, which has adopted the Institute as its Theological Seminary. The faculty acting upon the recommendation and advice of church leaders of different denominations has extended its curriculum to include New Testament Greek for men looking towards pastoral work on the frontiers and in mission fields. In pedagogics, for women especially, it now includes Bible Story Telling; and for both men and women who may be deficient in early education, it has increased its teachers and the required time to be spent in the study of English.

The department of Gospel Music also has been strengthened by two new professors, one of whom is a specialist in voice-building. Its policy, however, is not changed in offering its advantages free to students of all denominations.

Evangelical Progress

In the town of Ambion in the Philippine Islands the walls of a large Roman Catholic church stand roofless,—the building having been burned when the Filipinos rose against Spain; its priests also having been chased out of the place. Since then the Church of Rome has never been able to raise money enough in the neighborhood to re-roof the fire-smoked walls, but the people of the town have built without outside aid a beautiful evangelical chapel and have contributed a number of thousand pesos to the fund for enlarging Silliman Institute.

For World's Temperance Sunday

The Lincoln-Lee Legion, in accordance with its custom, is prepared to furnish to the Sunday Schools of the United States for World's Temperance Sunday, November 12, 1916, supplies for a pledge signing service. Since 1911 tens of thousands of Sunday Schools from all states and representing every denomination have used these supplies. The universal testimony regarding them is, "The best we ever used." The supplies this year will excel those of any previous year.

They will consist of (1) an eight-page program containing new songs with the music; responsive service, giving the latest information regarding the progress of the battle for National Constitutional Prohibition, etc.; (2) duplicate Lincoln-Lee Legion pledge cards (3x9 in.) in two colors; (3) a Wall Roll (17x28 in.) in two colors, with spaces for 250 names; (4) a "wet" and "dry" chart (36x44 in.) giving two United States maps, one showing wet and dry territory in 1893, the other in 1916; (5) leaflets (3x6 in.), facsimile reproductions of the large chart.

Finally, to the FIRST 5,000 schools enlisting for the day will be given the large, historic picture (22x32 in.) printed in three colors, of Lincoln presenting his pledge at South Fork school house in 1846. This picture was painted by Arthur I. Keller and is a companion picture to "Lincoln Pledging the Boy Breckenridge," which now hangs in tens of thousands of Sunday School rooms. If you have one, you will want the other. If you have not the one, you will want both. Since 1911, three and a half millions of temperance pledges have been signed in the Sunday Schools of America. Now for another million in a single day—November 12, 1916.

In order to print the vast quantities of supplies necessary to furnish them to tens of thousands of Sunday Schools, orders must be placed at once. If you are interested, write today to the Lincoln-Lee Legion, Westerville, Ohio.

HIS VINEYARD AND OURS

The Bo-Tree of India

The Bo-Tree, or sacred fig tree, of India is held in reverence by the Hindus, who maintain that Vishnu was born under it. This species of fig tree somewhat resembles the banyan, but the branches do not root like that tree, and the leaves which are rounded at the base, have long attenuated points which serve to carry off the rain, a necessary device in wet tropical forests. The Bo-Tree often attains a height of one hundred feet or more. It is frequently planted near Hindu temples, and religious devotees spend their lives under its shade.

Buddhists also venerate the Bo-Tree, for they claim that it was under this tree that the Buddha, Prince Siddhartha, sat during the night in which he received supreme enlightenment and attained to the Buddhahood.

As Bo-Tree literally means "Tree of Wisdom," the name is applicable to any tree under which a Buddha receives the great spiritual enlightenment.

It is claimed that the particular Bo-Tree under which the Sakya sage, Gotama, was seated when he became Buddha, was situated at Uruvela, the modern Gaya, in Behar, about 150 miles southeast of Benares. Another Bo-Tree is at Anuradhapura, in northwestern Ceylon. This is said to be the oldest historically authenticated tree in existence. Its leaves are most sacred relics for the thousands of Buddhist pilgrims that visit it. Buddhist temples elsewhere have Bo-Trees planted by them.

The accompanying illustration of a Bo-Tree is reproduced from a photograph sent to the American Tract Society by Rev. L. B. Chamberlain. At the base of the Bo-Tree in this picture are seen various idols, which are venerated by the superstitious worshippers who come to that shrine.

The only remedy for such superstition as that which is manifested in the worship of the Bo-Tree is found in the dissemination of the Gospel message. Christian literature is an invaluable help to the missionaries who are striving to proclaim the Gospel message in India, and the American Tract Society is aiding them to the best of its ability by foreign cash appropriations to be used in the preparation of Christian books, tracts and periodicals in the vernacular.

The Ceylon Centenary

The month of October, 1916, saw the completion of one hundred years of life and work on the part of the Ceylon Mission of the American Board.

"For dramatic events and picturesque setting," says a writer in the Missionary Herald, "the story of the Ceylon Mission would rejoice the heart of the cinema artists. But missionaries are busy folk, and probably the moving-picture films will never present the scenes of the arrival of the knightly young Newell at Colombo, instead of Bombay, where he supposed he was going; of the presentation to Governor Brownrigg, by the royal chaplain, of the five young couples whom Newell's eloquence had induced the American Board to send from America; of the long palanquin journey through tropical forest roads to Elephant Pass, then over the lagoon causeway to Jaffna, where the mission finally settled; of the crowds of sick at the tiny temporary hospital at Tellippallai; of the days when remittances failed to come and actual want overtook the brave young band; and so on through the years."

The little hospital where Messrs. Richards and Warren first preached their gospel of healing to bodies and souls alike is now replaced by two institutions, the Green Memorial Hospital at Manepay and the McLeod Hospital for women and children at Inuvil. An efficient nurses' home and crowded dispensaries are also a part of the hospital equipment, while the hospitals' Bible-women find a wide field of usefulness.

The flourishing boarding school for girls at Uduvil, too, is a large development from the tiny beginning of two little lassies who broke caste by eating of the missionary's food when storm-bound on her veranda, and who were therefore turned over to the mission by their distracted parents. Last year the school reported 350 odd pupils in grades from kindergarten to normal training.

The normal training school for men at Tellippallai and Jaffna College, the product of the determination, in 1822, by some of the missionaries to maintain a central school "as much like a college in America as circumstances should permit," continue to serve the Christian boys and young men.

The literary contributions made by the mission have been valuable. A great achievement was the publication of a Tamil dictionary, also a Tamil-English and an English-Tamil lexicon, all of which were printed on the American Mission press at Madras; then Dr. Samuel Fisk Green made a Tamil medical vocabulary and put through the press translations into Tamil of Cutler's Anatomy, Gray's Anatomy, Wells's Chemistry, books on physiology, surgery, general hygiene, etc., to the extent of some four thousand pages. Quantities of tracts, scientific pamphlets, etc., were also translated by Dr. Green. The mission paper, the Morning Star, founded in 1840, is still printed on the mission press, which is now a well-equipped and self-supporting institution.

The First Student Conference in Shansi, China

"A notable gathering of Shansi students," writes Rev. Arthur W. Hummel, "took place in the Flower Garden of the American Board Mission in Taikuhsien station, last July. Considering that this was the first summer conference of the Young Men's Christian Association ever held in Shansi Province, this meeting of more than a hundred student delegates in the height of summer's heat is considered by the Shansi missionaries as one of the most important mission successes of the year. Moreover, it marks a great advance in union missionary effort, since all the missions of the province were represented: English Baptist, Church of the Brethren, the China Inland Mission, and the American Board Mission.

"Much credit is due to Mr. H. H. K'ung, principal of the Taiku Memorial Academy, for his efficient management and splendid leadership of the conference. Besides the Shansi missionary representatives, the National Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association sent Mr. Daddisman, of Nanking, as their representative. The Bible classes, the addresses, the recreation, and, above all, the prayer life, seemed to us to equal that of our summer conferences in America.

"A very potent influence throughout the conference was the presence of General Chao, the military governor of Tatungfu, in Northern Shansi. Although a Christian for only three years, his deep prayer life and his wide knowledge of the Scriptures, his moral earnestness and uncompromising fearlessness, together with his ability as a speaker and his high social position, make his influence really wonderful. This man is proving to be one of Shansi's most powerful Christians. Before becoming a Christian he was proud and haughty, neither was he known to have any ability as a speaker; but the gospel opened his mouth and tamed his pride. Once, while fighting hostile tribes in Garden, where the missionary martyrs of 1900 lie buried, these fine youths of Shansi communed with God and made decisions the importance of which no one can estimate. At least one-fifth of the delegates present are planning to enter the ministry. The theme of the conference was, 'Christianity in Relation to China's Present Needs,'—a most appropriate theme in these days of China's weakness and humiliation. On the Fourth of July Mr. K'ung gave an address on George Washington, drawing lessons from his life and times for the salvation of the rejuvenated republic of China."

A College for South African Blacks.

The opening of the South African Native College at Fort Hare, says the Record of Christian Work, marks a milestone in the development of Christian education among the blacks. The new college is a joint undertaking of the government and the mission. The United Free Church of Scotland provided the site for the college and an initial gift of $25,000, pledging itself further to an annual contribution of the interest on an additional $25,000. The college is within sight of Lovedale, the great center of an industrial education built up by Dr. Stewart. At the opening exercises native chiefs were present from the Transkei, Basutoland, Bechuanaland, Swaziland, the Transvaal, and the Free State. General Botha, the Prime Minister of the South African Federation, delivered an admirable speech and left a substantial subscription to the institution funds upon his departure. The college will aim to provide the native churches with well-trained ministers. It will have a training school which will feed the school system of South Africa with negro educationalists. Faculties of medicine and law will come later,—the germ of the latter being provided in arrangements for training interpreters for the courts. One of the main aims of the college will be to develop a strong school of agriculture. Hampton and Tuskegee were held up for imitation in a letter from the Rt. Hon. J. X. Merriman. There will be work of a theoretical character also, as, for example, research study of the African languages. Mrs. Stewart, the wife of the great educationalist pioneer of Africa, urged that the college should never be allowed to become a mere secular school, but one where God is revered and Jesus brought before the students as the Saviour of mankind.

Seventy Years' Work in Foochow

The first missionaries of the American Board reached Foochow, China, on January 2, 1847. It is almost seventy years since that date. The Foochow Mission proposes to mark the anniversary, choosing the days from November 7 to 16 as the time for the celebration.

Many things have happened in China since that New Year's of 1847, when Stephen Johnson arrived in Foochow, whither he had been deputed with Lyman D. Peet to open a new station. It was a tight, provincial city in which they began to proclaim the Christian message. Progress was not rapid or easy. The first convert was baptized in 1856; in 1857—after a decade—six more were baptized and the first church was organized.

Now there are seventy-one organized congregations, with 2,661 members and a Christian constituency of 10,000. The offerings of the people last year for church work amounted to $10,000 (Mexican). There are 165 men and women engaged in evangelistic work, 222 in teaching, and 5,636 pupils of all grades in American Board schools. These figures, which tell but the small part of the story, indicate something of the achievement to be celebrated and the challenge to be faced.

Our Fireside

A Profitable Thanksgiving

By Hilda Richmond

HERE comes Lily Beach and she's bound to ask me for Thanksgiving dinner," said Jessie Pitkin, as she hurried home from work with Maybelle Tompkins one November evening. "I suppose I might as well have it over with, but I won't go. Lily's a dear and it's very sweet of her to ask me, but after all it's a great nuisance to spend the day at her little house. I know she can't afford guests, but she feels sorry for me that I have no home and so she's duty bound to ask me."

"That's exactly the way I feel about it," echoed Maybelle. "Ever since I've been out of a home somebody has dragged me away at holidays, and this year I'm going to stay indoors. I told Cousin Amy that this year I intended to give myself the luxury of a whole day in bed. My dinner is paid for at the boarding house, and there I intend to stay."

"So am I!" said Jessie. "I intend to stay in bed until about ten o'clock and then get up and wash my hair and lounge around the rest of the day in my kimono. I may go down and get myself a tray and have dinner in my room just for the fun of having a whole day to lounge—that is if anybody else stays at the boarding house. I have an economical streak this year and I'm going to save up a little."

"Doesn't it cost to go out to dinner on all holidays?" said Maybelle. "If I go to Amy's I feel that I must take her a bunch of flowers and presents for the kiddies and a box of candy for the family, so it takes the best part of two dollars."

"That's exactly my case," said Jessie. "I can't invite my friends to have dinner with me except I give them a restaurant meal, so I have to return any hospitality I receive in other ways. It usually costs me about two dollars each holiday so this year I intend to economize. If I stay away from Lily's now it will mean that I can send trifles to the children from the ten-cent store at Christmas, and not spend a cent for flowers or candies or fancy work. I want a new silk dress when the bargain sales come in January and—Why, how do you do, Lily? You know my friend Maybelle Tompkins? Of course you've met her with me. How are John and the kiddies? No, my dear Lily, I am not going to impose upon you this Thanksgiving. You have hustled around to cook and wash dishes for me too often. I never can repay your kindness, and this year I'm going to stay right at home. Maybelle is to be there and I couldn't leave her entirely alone."

"Bring her right along with you," said charming little Mrs. Beach. "We'll be delighted to have you both."

But the girls firmly declined the invitation with many thanks, and went on their way rejoicing that now they were to plan the day according to their own pleasure. "I do wish Lily Beach had a little more common sense," said Jessie, looking after the young woman who was rapidly disappearing in the twilight. "If she didn't feel it her duty to gather in the homeless each holiday she could wear better clothes and save more money. Last Thanksgiving she had her old Aunt Hannah and I don't know how many people in. She had to set the table in the sitting room and it was so crowded. Of course it is nice to do those things if one has plenty of money, but Lily and John have only his salary."

"It was sweet of her to ask me," agreed Maybelle, "but I should have felt awkward among a lot of strangers. Now let's plan what we'll do after dinner on Thanksgiving. I don't suppose Mrs. Gregg will overfeed us, but what does one dinner matter when we're to have a long, quiet leisurely day? I'm going to finish some of my needlework for Christmas. By the way if I miss going to Dora's and Amy's this year I won't have to send them anything. I'll sell their gifts at the Women's Exchange and have that much more for my silk dress fund. Hurrah! I'm quite infatuated with this economy business."

Maybelle declined three more invitations and Jessie two before Thanksgiving day, but that morning found them stretched out luxuriously in bed regardless of alarm clock and the tramping of the boarders hurrying to catch early trains home. Many of them had gone the night before, but a few still remained to bang doors joyously and whistle their joy in the dim halls.

"Jessie! Jessie! Are you awake?" said Maybelle cautiously creeping in in her kimono and slippers before it was fairly daylight. "I hear someone crying."

"I thought that, too," said Jessie sitting up in bed. "Listen! It seems to be some person down in the sitting room. I don't know who it can be. Mrs. Gregg went early this morning and—"

"Well, I'm going to investigate. Somebody is in trouble," interrupted Maybelle making her way cautiously down to the sitting room.

"Maggie! What is the matter?" said Jessie, who had thrown on her slippers and a wrapper and hurried down almost as soon as Maybelle. "Are you ill?"

"Nothin's the matter," said Maggie sullenly. She was dusting the sitting room as usual before the boarders should appear, and weeping as she did so. "I said nothin's the matter," she repeated as the girls made attempts to find out what had gone wrong. "I won't tell it anyhow."

"Well, we may as well dress now," said Jessie as they climbed the stairs. "I won't be satisfied until I coax out of Maggie what's the matter, for she's usually so cheery. I can't go back to bed and to sleep now, can you?"

"O, dear no!" sighed Maybelle. "I'm afraid this is a bad beginning. It is too afraid to sew or crochet and too gloomy to read. Besides I'm hungry. I'm going to dress and go down to see if I can get it out of Maggie why she cries."

But it was nine o'clock before their joint efforts coaxed the weeping Maggie to confide her troubles to them. "It's you two girls," she sobbed. "Mrs. Gregg made me stay to get dinner for you. If you had been invited—"

"Is that all?" cried two relieved maidens. "What did you want to do, Maggie, if we had not stayed?"

"I could have gone home," wailed Maggie burying her head in her apron and giving way to uncontrolled weeping. "I'm so homesick to see my mother and all of them."

"Get ready this minute, child," said Jessie. "We can take care of ourselves. I'm amazed that Mrs. Gregg didn't say something to us."

"It's too late now," said Maggie firmly. "At first I thought it would be real nice to have the money I would spend on car fare, and I went and bought myself a green silk dress with it. O dear! O dear! It's the first time in my life that I was ever away on Thanksgiving."

Over Maggie's bowed head the two girls nodded and calculated, and presently two shining dollars were slipped into each hand. Maggie raised her head in astonishment, but she handed back the money. "That's only part of what I spent. I always take presents home to the folks and this year I spent that, too. I'm a selfish pig! O dear! O dear!"

"Is that all?" said Jessie much relieved. "You scramble into your new green silk and we'll hunt up some presents for the home folks."

It was worth a great deal to see the transformation until Maggie thought of a new trouble. "I don't think Mrs. Gregg would like to have me go," she said hesitatingly. "She told me to give you wings and backs and dressing and gravy, and to save the best parts of the chicken for cold tomorrow night," she explained.

"We'll not even touch wings and backs if you'll hurry," said the girls. "It will be all right with Mrs. Gregg."

So Maggie departed radiantly happy in the new green silk dress. In a knobby, hastily wrapped parcel she carried an embroidered towel for her mother, a handsome doll for her little sister from Jessie's Christmas store, while Maybelle had contributed a piece of neckwear for Maggie's sister and shining half dollars for each of the two small boys. Poor Maggie felt like a fairy princess at the very latest, and she said over and over that never again would she buy herself a dress or anything else that would rob the dear home folks. Her thin shoes and old hat and gloves were not in keeping with the silk dress, but she did not know that and she said goodbye with rapture in her tones.

"O, Miss Pitkin, could you do us a favor?" asked two anxious ladies at the front door just as they were seeing Maggie off. "Could you come over and help with the singing at the Church? Emmy Mason was to sing a solo and at the last minute she got a chance to ride home in an automobile down to the country and she just couldn't resist."

Jessie was astonished at herself for promising, and hardly was the door closed when she said to Maybelle, "I think I must be losing my wits. If I wanted to go to Church at all I'd go to St. Mark's where the singing and the decorations are in keeping with the day. Yet here I've promised to go over to that little mission chapel for the morning service. Come and go with me, there's a dear. We can sing a duet."

"I'm afraid our backs and wings will burn up while we're gone," said Maybelle, with a little laugh. "Isn't it like Mrs. Gregg to caution Maggie? But then, poor woman, she has her own troubles too."

"You're trying to get out of my invitation. Will you or will you not sing with me?"

"I suppose we'll have to stick together in our distress. What dress are you going to wear?"

"I'll put on my new white one under my rain cloak. It isn't cold and no one will see it on the way over. I helped once with the Easter singing at the chapel and they were all so glad that I dressed up. I wonder if we couldn't carry over the plants in my room to help take away that bare look."

"And we were planning a day of rest!" laughed Maybelle as they superintended the transfer of the precious blooming plants to the dingy little chapel. "I feel hungry enough this minute to eat both those chickens, and dressed up enough for a party. Maybe they'll think we are too much dressed up."

If the two girls had desired any thanks for their loan of the plants and for the singing they certainly felt repaid for their efforts. The service was hearty and full of the Thanksgiving spirit from first to last, and as Jessie and Maybelle saw the sincere worship given by the poor and humble congregation a sense of their own opportunities and blessings came upon them as never before. They had been in the habit of pitying themselves because they had to live in a good boarding house and had to work as stenographers week in and week out, but all at once the salaries they had thought so meagre became princely when viewed in the light of the pay these poor folks received for hard and incessant toil. And when the collection for the poor was taken and women who washed for a living put in quarters and half dollars, the two guests felt condemned at giving only one dollar each to the really substantial offering.

"And now for the backs and wings!" said Maybelle as they hurried home from the chapel. It was an effort to break the thoughtful silence that had come upon both as the kindly people thanked them over and over and invited them to come again and sing. "I'm hungry as a wolf."

"The telephone is jingling madly," said Jessie as they neared the house. "I wonder what is the matter."

They ran to open the front door and Jessie hurried to take down the receiver. "It's Lily Beach!" she panted turning to Maybelle. "She says we must come to dinner. They are waiting for us! What do you say?"

"Say? Tell her we'll be there in a hurry. I don't care for backs and necks, do you?"

They scampered upstairs and again rifled their Christmas boxes to get presents for Lily and her three little ones. The fact that they had their wraps on saved time, and it took but an instant to turn out the gas in the oven and draw the skinny chickens to a place of safety. Three minutes after they entered the house they were wrapping up their gifts and going out the front door at the same instant. They stopped long enough to indulge in a big bunch of carnations and a box of candy, and then trotted along to the humble street where Lily Beach was at the side door cooling her warm face and airing out her dining room for the great feast at the same time.

"You see I just had to have you," said Lily kissing them both. "The table is so long and there are so many things to serve that you must lend a hand. I got the biggest turkey you ever saw and I want you to help eat it."

"She didn't need us at all," whispered Maybelle to Jessie as they helped with the final preparations, "but I'm glad she can pretend so nicely. It would have been horrid eating there alone. Isn't this richness?"

"It's magnificence!" returned Jessie as the Beach children clung to her skirts. "To think that I was horrid enough to want to miss this. Isn't Lily dear to invite in all the left-overs and those who would otherwise have a lonely time on Thanksgiving?"

Maybelle was too near tears to trust herself to reply as she saw Lily and John giving the best seats at the long table to shabby old ladies and feeble old men. The house might have little furniture and the dishes be cheap, but there was a kindly spirit of hospitality and enjoyment pervading the little house that was worth more than silver or gold. Jessie could scarcely eat the good food that heaped her plate as she watched the pleased faces all about her. John and Lily might have added to their small bank account by doing without the pleasure of the day, but it was evident that they considered the Thanksgiving feast worth all it cost them.

"Bless your hearts! I don't know what I should have done without you!" said Lily heartily as she kissed them goodbye after they had helped her put the house to rights and wash the dishes. "And those lovely things you brought me! I never had an embroidered towel before in my life. I guess I'll have to frame this and hang it up. You girls must earn a lot of money to be able to do such beautiful things for folks. And you'll be back at Christmas, won't you? I'll depend upon you both."

"Of course we'll be back!" said Jessie heartily. "We'll depend upon it too. I thank you so much, Lily. This Thanksgiving has meant more to me than any holiday for years."

On the way home Maybelle gave a happy little laugh and said: "How about our economical holiday, Jessie? Counting the things, and the money for Maggie, and the offering at the chapel, and coming down here I'm sure not to have that blue silk dress after Christmas. But I don't care. It was worth all that and more too because it taught me a good lesson."

"And I know I'll not have a new silk dress," said Jessie, "but I don't need it. I still think it is a profitable day though, for it has saved me from the sin of selfishness this once anyhow. Really, Maybelle, all day I've been scared to think how thoughtless and selfish I've been this long time."

"I don't feel exactly scared," said Maybelle. "Rather, I'm thankful for this day that has made me realize that it doesn't pay to live for self alone."

"Why, yes," said Jessie brightening. "I suppose that is the right way to look at the matter. Anyhow it has been a most remarkable day and I'm glad everything turned out exactly as it has."

Told by the Tongue

BY HELEN M. RICHARDSON.

The tongue is an unruly member; it says either too little or too much. When silence would be golden it often wags indiscriminately; and when words of praise would encourage some weary, despondent soul the tongue too often halts for utterance.

"Speak well of your friend; of your enemy say nothing," is a motto which guides but few, when, in confidential intercourse with a neighbor or acquaintance, the character of an absent one becomes the target for praise or blame. Yet praise cannot be meted out too freely, since those traits in our friend which we admire become, by our laudation, more apparent to others, and often serve as a source of emulation to them.

We love our friends. We rejoice in their prosperity, we sorrow at their failures and defeats. We are glad to lend a helping hand, to speak an encouraging, helpful word, and whenever we can to extol their virtues.

But our enemy—what of him? We cannot praise him, it is true, but we need not censure. We can shut our lips firmly and hold our peace. Although he may be our enemy he is someone's friend; someone loves and respects him; and to speak ill of a person behind his back is a coward's privilege. If we say nothing we shall then have nothing to be sorry for when the deeds of the day stand up in judgment against us.

Men and women who rule their lives by this motto soon have no enemies; for by continually striving to be peacemakers and to look for virtues instead of faults, they begin to see that every one with whom they come in contact has something about him which merits praise; and by continually dwelling upon these qualities the unlovely ones gradually begin to disappear.

If on the other hand by some unwise chance we happen to raise up an enemy, do not let us bruit our opinion of him to the world. A man's friends are his safeguards; his bulwarks against temptation; his refuge in times of trouble. Of his friends a man always finds it easy to speak words of praise, and when they pass on, to eulogize their memory. But let the condemnation of one who may perhaps have done us some grievous wrong be the condemnation of silence. Silence is often eloquent, but it leaves behind no sting.

The Happy Home

By the Author of "Preston Papers"

WHILE the homes of state or nation make the state or nation, individuals make the homes, each one of mature years sharing in the responsibility for the happiness, harmony, health, and general "atmosphere" of each particular home.

Every home has its influence, too, in neighborhood character as well as in state and nation, so that almost within a stone's throw of each other we may see a thrifty neighborhood, and one that is "run down"—a tidy community and a dirty one—a row of neat-looking houses with gardens in the rear and lawns in front, then a row of dilapidated buildings, no lawns or gardens, and the tenants in careless abandon of manner and untidy dress, idly gossiping, while dirty children play (or quarrel) in the dirty street.

"Home's not merely four square walls," for shelter and to afford a place to eat and sleep—though these are among the fundamentals; but home, the real home, must have Love in it as a perpetual tenant, for a first requisite. Where love for each and for all prevails as a ruling spirit there will be mutual attempts to make the home pleasant and attractive through such practical virtues as order, cleanliness, and punctuality, and by the practice of generosity, self-denial, industry, and economy.

No one, in the Happy Home, will habitually put things out of place, leaving them for some one else to put away, as that would be unjust to that one; and Justice goes hand in hand with Love. Injustice is not an "affinity" of Love—and is a bar to happiness. What is a minor duty, when performed by each—as occasion demands—becomes an unjust burden if left for one by all the rest. Even a full-grown man or a half-grown girl may and should do their share toward keeping the family rooms in order, and keeping their own rooms and equipment "spick and span"; and then the burden rests heavily on no one.

When books, magazines, and newspapers, are taken from their appointed receptacles, it is as easy to return them to their proper places, as to leave them on couch, chairs, and rugs, thus giving the rooms a neglected and "littered" appearance which is anything but attractive.

So, too, each may avoid tracking mud into halls or on porches, or leaving bathtub or washbowl unfit for the next comer to use, etc., etc., etc.

Punctuality is a homely virtue, but it is a keynote in the Song of Success, whether in the home or in business; and while the punctual serving of meals is one of the housewife's duties, the punctuality must not stop there, each member of the family being under equal obligation not to keep meals—or other housework—waiting on their tardy plans and motions. The Golden Rule is as effective in the home as elsewhere, and is ever on duty in the really Happy Home.

A mistaken idea prevails, to some extent, among mothers of very young children that they should not be held to the laws of order and of responsibility that are felt necessary for the best good of older boys and girls; but the earlier the training in lifelong habits is begun, the easier it will be to make the right impression, to give the best motive, to plant the seeds of unselfish living and of Duty's call. It needs to be "I must" at first; a little later the next step becomes "I ought to," which is but briefly separated from "I want to," and when this has been reached by all, the Happy Home is assured.

Nor need the process become anything but persuasive in most cases, though it must be concrete in the beginning, even with those who are older, as:

"Baby, put the blocks in his box; then Mamma will rock and sing to him."

"Freddie, what can you do to help Sister clear up this room, and make it nice for us to sit down in?"

"Who will be the one to do the errands this morning?"

If necessary—and it may be well even where not necessary—apportion little duties for each to be held responsible for, daily, changing these from week to week, so that no one needs to have the work "pall" on him. Teach each to be willing to "change off" with any of the others, to meet emergencies; in short, teach all to live in harmony, if you want a really Happy Home, for harmony is happiness, and to be had by "the poorest comer," neither depending on things, but each on the heart and the mind.

Keep in mind, too, that it takes but one "rift in the lute" to spoil the harmony, doing injustice to all; and that every happy home makes it easier for others, as it helps make the general home atmosphere. Point, and point frequently, to the fact that Heaven is Heaven because of its perfect harmony, and that if we want to live happily there we must learn to live happily here, for "Heaven is not gained at a single bound; But we build the ladder by which we rise From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies, And we mount to its summit, round by round."

Father, the provider for the home, should find it a haven of quiet, orderly comfort; and, equally, he should throw off his business burdens when he enters this harbor of love and affection, entering it with a smile, even when he can do nothing more. Nor should the minor questions—and muddles—be brought to him for solution, although he may be used as the highest court of last resort for cases that cannot be settled without his wisdom; but these should be so infrequent as to confer honor on him!

Finally, with a family altar, where all share in the form of worship used, every home may be a foretaste of the Eternal Home, the "house not made with hands."

Good Roads

One of the provisions of the Federal aid road bill, recently signed by the President, appropriates $1,000,000 a year for ten years to be spent by the Secretary of Agriculture for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails within or partly within the National Forests.

The bill provides that, upon request of the proper officers of the States or counties, the money shall be used for building roads and trails which are necessary for the use and development of resources upon which communities within or near the National Forests are dependent. The work is to be done in cooperation with the various States and counties. Not more than 10 per cent. of the value of the timber and forage resources of the National Forests within the respective county or counties in which the roads or trails will be constructed may be spent. Provision is made for the return of the money to the Treasury by applying 10 per cent. of the annual receipts of the National Forests in the State or county until the amount advanced is covered.

Officers in charge say that the bill will make possible the construction of many roads which are greatly needed. Since 1913 ten per cent. of the receipts of the National Forests have been used in road and trail building, but the funds have been inadequate to meet the needs. Many isolated communities within the National Forests are entirely dependent on the Government roads and trails. In some instances these settlements are said to be almost entirely without means of communication. According to Forest Service officials the money now made available will permit the construction of many roads necessary to open up inaccessible territory, and will greatly facilitate the development of large areas.

OUR MEDICINE CHEST

Little Bess, on returning from a party, said to her mother: "At the party a little girl fell over in her chair, and everybody laughed but me." Mother: "Why didn't you laugh?" Bess: "Because I was the one that fell over."

"What happened to Babylon?" asked the Sunday school teacher of her Brooklyn class.
"It fell!" cried the pupil.
"And what became of Nineveh?"
"It was destroyed!"
"And what of Tyre?"
"Punctured."

Mistress: "Did you see if the butcher had pigs' feet?" Maid: "No, ma'am, I couldn't—he had his boots on!"

History Professor: "Why are the Middle Ages known as Dark Ages?"
Wise Freshman: "Because there were so many knights."

Billy, aged four, often called on his nearest neighbor, Mrs. Brown, who petted him a great deal, and usually gave him a couple of her nice cookies. And if she happened to forget to pass them out he sometimes reminded her of it.

His father learned of this and chided him for begging, and told him he must not do so any more. Last year, just before Christmas, Billy came home with cooky crumbs in evidence.

"Have you been begging cookies from Mrs. Brown again?" asked his father, rather sternly.

"No!" said Billy. "I didn't beg for any. I just said, 'This house smells as if it was full of cookies, but what's that to me?'"

The professor in charge of a Princeton classroom was annoyed by the tardy entrance of a student. He pointedly ceased talking until the man took his seat.

After the lecture the student apologized. "Professor," said he, "my watch was fifteen minutes out of the way. It's bothered me a great deal lately, but after this I shall put no more faith in it."

"It's not faith you want in it," replied the professor, "it's works."

Little Alfred has a great aversion to work. Admonished to pull some rather large weeds in the backyard, after a faint-hearted lift on one of them, he shouted, "Mother, how do you think I'm going to pull weeds when the whole world is hitched onto them?"

"Yes, I heard a noise and got up, and there under the bed I saw a man's leg." "Mercy! The burglar's?" "No; my husband's. He had heard the noise too."

Address—The Layman Company, 143 N. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

First Office Boy: "I told the governor to look at the dark circles under my eyes and see if I didn't need a half day off." Second Office Boy: "What did he say?" First Office Boy: "He said I needed a bar of soap."

Rapid disappearance of coal from his bin alarmed Major Higgins, and he determined to trace it. He questioned the man who tended the furnace, relates an exchange. "Rastus," he asked, "where do you reckon my coal has disappeared to?" Rastus scratched his head thoughtfully. "Well, suh," he replied, "Ah—Ah—Ah reckon dem squirrels done took it. Yasch, squirrels, Major Higgins. Dat was nut coal, suh."

"Now, boys, said the schoolmaster, "what is the axis of the earth?" Johnny raised his hand promptly. "Well, Johnny, how would you describe it?" "The axis of the earth," said Johnny proudly, "is an imaginary line which passes from one pole to the other, and on which the earth revolves." "Very good," exclaimed the teacher. "Now could you hang clothes on that line, Johnny?" "Yes, sir," was the reply. "Indeed?" said the examiner, disappointed. "And what sort of clothes?" "Imaginary clothes, sir."

"There's no danger," said the doctor. "It's only a carbuncle coming on the back of your neck. But you must keep your eye on it!"

The American Tract Society

ITS OBJECT The object of the American Tract Society is to diffuse a knowledge of the Lord Jesus Christ, by means of the circulation of the word of Gospel truth on the printed page.
ITS FIELD. The field of the Society's operations is the world. Its mission is to all classes and conditions of people. It is interdenominational in character, evangelical in principle, and international in scope.
ITS WORK. Union Missionary Colportage is an important feature of the work of the Society. Its colporters labor among the immigrants in all sections of our own land, and in our island possessions. Its publications have been printed in 178 different languages. The grand total of all its issues from the home office alone, including books, periodicals, tracts, leaflets, etc., is over 794,000,000 copies.
ITS NEEDS. To maintain its force of consecrated workers and to furnish the supplies of Christian literature, urgently demanded in the home and foreign field, the Society needs generous donations from both large and small givers.
$1.00 will provide 1500 pages of English tracts, each of which may become a messenger of saving truth.
$10.00 will send 100 copies of "Manzanar de Oro," a beautiful Spanish weekly, to some Sunday school in Latin America for one year.
$50.00 will provide a tract in some foreign language for each of 5000 immigrants arriving at Ellis Island, New York.
$100.00 will provide a cash appropriation for printing books or tracts at a foreign mission station.
$500.00 will provide for the support of a missionary colporter in the home land for a whole year.
$1000.00 invested in Christian literature and colporters to distribute it will render invaluable service in extending Christ's Kingdom.

Donations may be sent to Louis Tag, Treasurer, AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY, Park Ave. and Fortieth St., New York, N. Y.

American Tract Society

THIS SOCIETY was organized in 1825. Its work is interdenominational and international in scope, and is commended by all evangelical denominations.

It has published the Gospel messages in 178 languages, dialects and characters. It has been the pioneer for work among the foreign-speaking people in our country, and its missionary colporters are distributing Christian literature in thirty-three languages among the immigrants and making a home-to-home visitation among the spiritually destitute, both in the cities and rural districts, leaving all kinds of Christian literature, also the Bible or portions of the Scriptures.

Its publication of leaflets, volumes and periodicals from the Home Office total 794,639,700 copies. It has made foreign cash appropriations to the amount of $799,456.39, and grants of electrotypes to the value of $61,177.96, by means of which millions of copies of books and tracts have been published at mission stations abroad.

The gratuitous distribution of the past year is to the value of $16,684.99. The grand total of its gratuitous distribution has been to the value of $2,634,505.89, which is the equivalent of 5,269,010,000 tract pages.

VOL. 39—NO. 44. PRICE 5 CENTS

THE IDEAL FAMILY NEWSPAPER

NEXT to the Bible, the Christian Herald takes its place in the homes of America and in the hearts of its people. Wherever it goes, it is welcome, and its presence is presumptive evidence that the household is a Christian one. Pastors of all denominations tell us that they find it everywhere in the homes of their parishioners. Evangelists who travel much declare that they have never yet known any locality where the Christian Herald is not read, and home missionaries run across it, and note the influence of its teachings, wherever they go. Its great army of readers in the cities can hardly know how eagerly it is welcomed by multitudes on the farms and in the lonely rural places, as a weekly evangel of spiritual help and good cheer, as well as the bringer of wholesome entertainment and instruction. In the letters we are constantly receiving from these friends, a very remarkable number tell us that they "couldn't keep house without the Christian Herald."
