It is commonly asserted or assumed that it was this acquiescence by the general assembly in the law of patronage, as fixed by the statute of 1712, which provoked the schism that took place in the church of Scotland in the early part of the last century, and gave rise to the Secession that still subsists. But this is quite a loose and incorrect view of the matter. The facts are simply the following:—The act of 1712, while putting an end to the system of election by heritors and elders established in 1690, had, as already explained, reserved to the church what was called the jus devolutum, or the right of having vacant charges filled up by the nomination of the presbytery in all cases in which a qualified person should not have been presented by the patron within six months. By the Act of 1719, the operation of the jus devolutum was very considerably extended; the patron, to escape that interference, being now obliged, not only within the limited time to present a qualified person (and the qualification was by this statute made to include subscription to a new oath), but a person who should accept, or declare his willingness to accept, of the presentation, and also who should not be a pastor or minister of any other church or parish.‡ In 1732 the general assembly passed an act directing that presbyteries in the exercise of the jus devolutum should in all cases appoint to the vacant charge the person elected by the heritors and elders of the parish—in other words, that, whenever the jus devolutum came into operation, substantially the same method of filling up the vacancy should be followed that would have been followed if the act of 1712, restoring patronage, had never been passed.* Strange as it may be thought, it was actually in opposition to this partial restoration of the popular law of 1690, that the founders of the Secession originally set up their banner. It is true that their real objection no doubt was, that the assembly on this occasion did not go far enough—that it did not restore (in so far as the exercise of the jus devolutum was concerned) the system of 1649, instead of that of 1690, or rather perhaps that it did not pronounce in favour of something going a great way beyond either, and throw the election of the clergyman absolutely into the hands of the people, without either previous nomination by the elders or subsequent control by the presbytery. But the fact, nevertheless, undeniably is, that it was the law of 1690, and not, as commonly represented, the law of 1712, against which the originators of the secession first put themselves in motion, and which they made the pretext and ground of their separation. Their leader, the Rev. Ebenezer Erskine, of Stirling, whatever may have been his private sentiments, had submitted for twenty years to the patronage law of 1712, when he began that course of resistance to the assembly which speedily terminated in his secession, along with his associates, from the church. When the act of 1732 was passed by the assembly, Erskine was one of fifteen members who entered a protest against the decision of the majority, which the assembly refused to record in conformity with an act passed two years before, prohibiting the recording of reasons of dissent against the determinations of church judicatories. A speech in which he insisted, ineffectually, that his protest should be recorded has been preserved, and there we find him distinctly directing his objections against the adoption in the new act of the law of 1690:—"I am so far," he says, "from thinking this act, conferring the power upon heritors, beyond other men, to come and choose ministers of the gospel, to be founded on the word, that I consider it to be diametrically opposite to it. What difference does a piece of land make between man and man in the affairs of Christ's kingdom, which is not of this

* It has been attempted, indeed, to make out that the plan laid down in the assembly's act of 1732 was not at all the same with that established by the act of the Scottish parliament of 1690. Those who are anxious to see what melancholy shifts determined party spirit will descend to in the way of argumentative fence when pushed into a corner, may turn to the demonstration of the difference between the two plans proffered by the Rev. Dr. Burns, in his evidence before the Church Patronage Committee, Question 546. It is sufficient to observe here that the Rev. Doctor cannot deny that the election and appointment of the clergyman were by both plans vested in the heritors and elders, and that the congregation was as much excluded from the exercise of any effective voice, in any part of the proceeding, by the one as by the other. As for any change of arrangement that may have been made in regard to the particular stage of the business at which the people were to be allowed to make their objections for the presbytery to judge and dispose of, which is the principal change alleged by the Doctor, that is altogether a subordinate and trivial matter.

* Stat. 5 Geo. I. c. 29, § 8.

† "It was generally understood that this limitation was equivalent to an express repealing of the law of patronage. For some time after the passing of the act [of 1719] no minister or preacher ventured to accept a presentation; and vacant churches were settled by means of a call from the parish, without annoyance from patrons."—Life and Diary of the Rev. Ebenezer Erskine, by the Rev. Donald Fraser, Edinburgh, 1831, p. 256.

‡ This last-mentioned restriction upon the rights of patrons imposed by the act of 1719 appears to have been generally disregarded in practice. Yet the words of the act are sufficiently clear.

world? &c. &c.* The speech does not contain a syllable in reference to the patronage law of 1712. A few days after the assembly rose, Erskine, in preaching to his own congregation, characterised its proceedings as arbitrary and tyrannical, and in a few months after he resumed the same theme in a sermon which he delivered in his quality of moderator, or president, before the synod of Perth and Stirling. This sermon occasioned a furious debate in the synod, which terminated, after three days, in a resolution, carried by a small majority, that Mr. Erskine should be censured for some expressions he had used, "tending to disquiet the peace of the church, and impugning several acts of assembly and proceedings of church judicatories." Against this sentence Erskine appealed to the next general assembly, by which, however, it was confirmed, and he was actually rebuked and admonished at the bar of the House. This was in May, 1733. While thus submitting to the censure of the assembly, however, Erskine thought fit to tender a protest against it, in which he declared that he should still hold himself at liberty notwithstanding to go on preaching and testifying the same as ever; "and I do hereby," he concluded, "adhere unto the testimonies I have formerly emitted against the act of assembly 1732, whether in the protest entered against it in open assembly, or yet in my synodical sermon." This protest, which was concurred in by three friends of Erskine's, the assembly took up as a new insult and act of disobedience; and, after an unsuccessful attempt had been made to persuade the four reverend gentlemen to withdraw the paper, they were ordered to appear in August next before the Commission, which, in the event of their continued contumacy, was authorised to suspend them, and, in case they should in the interim have disregarded the sentence of suspension, to visit them at a subsequent meeting with a higher punishment. The result was that in August 1733 they were suspended by the Commission—that they protested against the sentence as null and void, and continued to officiate in their churches as usual—and that on the 16th of November thereafter they were deposed. A few weeks after they met and constituted themselves into a presbytery. But notwithstanding this decided step, the next general assembly, which met in May, 1634, influenced probably by a feeling that the proceedings in the case had been somewhat passionate and precipitate, after rescinding both the act of 1730, about the recording of protests, and that of 1732 about the exercise of the ius devolutum, authorised the synod of Perth and Stirling, to which all the four deposed brethren belonged, to restore them to communion and to their respective charges. The synod, accordingly, when it met in the beginning of July, came to a vote declaring them to be reinstated in their office. Erskine and his three friends, however, seem to have construed this lenity on the part of the church only as an evidence of fear and conscious weakness, and they declared their determination to remain in a state of separation until they should have what they would account satisfactory evidence that the conduct of the church would, for the future, be agreeable to their notions. In this state the affair remained for some years, the church taking no further steps, but the four brethren appealing to the public, first in 1735, in a representation which they entitled "Reasons why they have not acceded to the judicatories of the Established Church;" and again, in 1736, in a more elaborate vindication of their conduct and principles, known by the title of their Second or Judicial Testimony, to distinguish it from another paper of the same kind, called their First or Extra-Judicial Testimony, published soon after their deposition by the Commission in 1733. In the mean time they had been joined by four other clergymen of the county of Fife,—one of them Mr. Ralph Erskine, of Dunfermline, a younger brother of Mr. Ebenezer Erskine. At length, in 1738, the attention of the Assembly was again called to the subject by representations from the synods of Fife, and of Perth and Stirling, and the commission was directed to prepare a libel, or indictment, against the eight ministers calling themselves the Associate Presbytery, and to cite them to appear to answer it before the next Assembly. It was only, nevertheless, by a narrow majority that the motion for proceeding in the case was carried in the Assembly of 1739; but the eight ministers, being called to the bar, thought proper to obey the summons. In answer to the libel, one of them, styling himself their moderator, read a long paper, entitled "An Act of the Associate Presbytery, finding and declaring that the present judicatories of this national church are not lawful nor right constitute courts of Christ; and declining all authority, power, and jurisdiction that the said judicatories may claim to themselves over the said presbytery, or any of the members thereof, or over any that are under their inspection; and particularly declining the authority of a General Assembly now met at Edinburgh." After this open defiance the court seemed to have only one course to pursue; but still the motion to proceed to a final sentence was negatived by a small majority, and for the present the Assembly satisfied itself with declaring the libel proven, and the defenders worthy of deposition, but forbore to pass that sentence upon them for yet another year; earnestly recommending it, however, to the next Assembly to depose them if they should not in the mean time have returned to their duty. In pursuance of this recommendation they were finally deposed, and their parishes declared vacant, by an act of the Assembly of 1740, passed on the 15th of May, by a majority of 140 to 30 votes. It is evident from this detail, that, whatever respect may be due to the sincerity and upright intentions of the clergymen who were thus expelled from the national church, the church could not, in the circumstances, have acted otherwise than it did.

* See Speech from his own notes, in Dr. Fraser's Life, p. 359.

Indeed, they had thrown off the church before it threw off them.

In 1743 the ministers of the Associate Presbytery agreed to renew both the Scottish National Covenant and the Solemn League and Covenant; and the following year they went the length of passing an act by which the swearing of these old persecuting bonds was imposed upon all the members of their church, lay as well as clerical, as a condition of Christian communion. After some time, however, this act, if never formally repealed, was allowed to fall into oblivion, and to be wholly disregarded in practice, as new views were gradually adopted by the generality of the Seceders in regard to the rights and duties of the state in matters of religion, quite opposed both to the emphatic declarations of the solemn League and Covenant, and to the principles of the founders of the Secession themselves. In 1744 the Associate Presbytery, now consisting of above thirty ministers, transformed itself into the Associate Synod, comprehending the three presbyteries of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dunfermline. Sixteen congregations also at this time belonged to the body, for which ministers had not yet been provided, but were providing with all expedition, for a theological class had been founded so early as the year 1736, which in 1741 is said to have been attended by a greater number of students preparing for the ministry than were to be found at any one of the Scottish universities, with the exception of Edinburgh.*

The Secession Church, however, had scarcely been well set up when it was rent in twain by a violent difference of opinion that suddenly arose among its members. The subject of this dispute was a clause in the oath required to be taken by burghesses in some of the Scottish municipal corporations, by which they made a declaration of their profession and hearty allowance of "the true religion at present professed within the realm, and authorised by the laws thereof," and their resolution to "abide by and defend the same" to their life's end. A large body of the Seceders, though discountenanced and opposed by the two Erskines, insisted that such a declaration could not be conscientiously taken by any who dissented from the established church; and after the controversy had raged with great fury for some years, it ended in a separation between the two parties on the 9th of April, 1747. From this date the Seceders continued to be divided into Burghers and Anti-Burghers, till, in the year 1820, the two branches again coalesced into the United Associate Synod. Two smaller bodies, however—the Original or Associate Burgher Synod, and the Synod of Original Anti-Burgher Seceders†—distinguished from each other by the same difference as to the burghess oath—had in the mean time separated from the main body of the Secession upon the discontinuance by the latter of the practice of covenanting. These two small bodies adhered to the old views on the question of religious establishments, or the union of church and state, which they still maintained to be expedient and according to the word of God, notwithstanding that they felt themselves bound to withdraw for the present from communion with the established church of Scotland, on account of what they deemed to be her abandonment of her own standards and principles in her submission to the law of patronage and other matters. Since the recent breaking out of the agitation on the subject of what is called the voluntary principle in Scotland, a considerable proportion of the ministers and congregations of the Original Burgher Synod, merging the question as to the still subsisting obligation of the Covenant, have returned into the bosom of the establishment.

A few years before the great schism of 1733, of which we have thus briefly traced the history and the results, a new sect of Independents had started up from the bosom of the Scottish church as the followers of the Reverend John Glas, minister of Tealing, a country parish near Dundee, whose first publication, entitled "Testimony of the King of the Martyrs," appeared in 1725, and who was deposed by the General Assembly in 1730. There are still a few small congregations of persons calling themselves Glassites in Scotland; but they, and also the Sandemanians, a slightly varying denomination, founded by Robert Sandeman, a son-in-law of Glas, have, we believe, been generally mixed up and confused among the Independents, whose Congregational Union in Scotland now comprises about ninety churches, of very miscellaneous origin, and perhaps not perfect agreement even as to doctrine, but all holding the fundamental tenet of the sufficiency of each separate congregation for all the purposes of a church, and consequently being opposed to the principle not only of a state church, but of a church at all, in the sense in which that term is understood by other sects. In 1752, also, a new breach was made in the national church by the Reverend Thomas Gillespie, minister of Carnock in Fife, who, refusing to preside at the induction of an unpopular presentee, was that year deposed by the Assembly, and, being afterwards joined by the Reverend Thomas Boston, founded the body still subsisting under the name of the Relief Synod, and now forming, after the Associate Synod, the most numerous dissenting body in Scotland. Their distinguishing tenet may be said to be a more extended freedom of communion than is allowed either by the established church or by any other sect in Scotland. Lastly, we may notice the remnant of the old Cameronians,—or followers of Richard Cameron and Donald Cargill, two famous field-preachers and martyrs of the days of persecution that followed the restoration of the Stuarts,—styling themselves the Reformed Presbyterian Church, of whom there are still above thirty congregations in Scotland, mostly in the southern counties, besides nearly as many more in the north of Ireland. These people are also sometimes called Macmillanites, from one of their preachers named Macmillan, in the early part of the last century, to whom Mr. Thomas Nairne, one of the eight original members of the Associate Presbytery, joined himself in 1743, and was in consequence excommunicated a few years after, by those he had left. At that date the Cameronians seem to have been commonly known by the designation of the Old Dissenters; and in fact they formed the only religious body in Scotland not in communion with the established church from the Revolution down to the new secession in 1733, with the exception of the Roman Catholics and the Episcopalians, who, as not being Presbyterians, were hardly counted Christians at all in the popular notion.

* Praser's Life of Erskine, p. 491.
 † In Scotland, we believe, often called the Old Light Burghers and Anti-Burghers, the others being called the New Light Seceders.

A curious account of the religious sects in Scotland in the reign of Anne and in the early part of that of George I. is given in the Memoirs of John Ker of Kersland, the First Part of which was published by himself in 1726. Ker, who was nothing else than a government spy, and has the impudence to parade in front of his book a privy seal warrant granted to him to act in that capacity by the ministers of Queen Anne in 1707—"to keep company," are the words, "and associate himself with such as are disaffected to us and our government, in such way or manner as he shall judge most for our service"—possessed great interest among the Cameronians, as the representative of a family which they had been accustomed to regard as their head from the days of Pentland Hill and Bothwell Bridge.* He divides the people of Scotland into three parties, in reference to religion; the Presbyterians, Cameronians, and Episcopalians. By the Presbyterians he means those of the established church, whom he describes as "very numerous, but under no concert among themselves, farther than their church judicatures, to which it is impossible to communicate anything but what must become public." Our author evidently looks with a certain degree of contempt upon a state of things so unsuited for the exercise of his honourable vocation. The Presbyterians, he adds, "are of late not a little weakened by an accident in the late reign, when the episcopal party in Scotland, supported by their friends in England, obtained a toleration [by the act of 1712, mentioned above.] The presbyterian ministers, as well as they, were expressly ordered at the same time to take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration, under the penalty of being excluded ab officio et beneficio, which, notwithstanding, near the half of the Presbyterian clergy refused, not from any dissatisfaction at the Revolution settlement, or his present majesty's accession, but because the oath referred to an act of parliament in England whereby the sovereign was obliged to be of the communion of that church. This occasioned great differences and animosities betwixt the complying and non-complying Presbyterians, and very much impaired what confidence and harmony they used to have, which may, if not prevented by a spirit of meekness and charity (rare to be found among churchmen), prove of dangerous consequence in Scotland; for the laity in that country generally concern themselves in the disputes and quarrels of the clergy with more zeal than discretion." Of the Cameronians Ker gives the following account, which contains some particulars not generally known:—"The Cameronians affect that form of church government established in the year 1648, when presbytery was at the greatest height, dissenting from the indulgence granted by King Charles II., the toleration granted by King James VII., and the present Revolution establishment. They are governed by a general quarterly meeting, composed of two commissioners deputed from each county and town where they live; and whatever is concluded at this meeting is a general rule to the whole. They are closer in their deliberations than the other parties are; for, whatever comes before them is disputed and concluded without the least danger of being exposed, and whatever is so resolved is accordingly executed with the profoundest secrecy and expedition; for the Cameronians are always ready under their proper officers well appointed, and when it is found at their general meeting to be their duty, can assemble upon the least notice given them; so that, though they be the fewest in number, yet they are in effect the most considerable of the three; for the commonalty of the presbyterians, who have a wonderful opinion of their piety and virtue, always readily join with them in anything that concerns the public, which the Cameronians encourage and allow, but do not permit them to be members of their societies, or to bear any part in the conduct of their affairs. They continue to preach in the fields, as they did in the reigns of Charles II. and James II., when the persecution was hot against them, still retaining the doctrine of resistance and self-defence, which they never fail to put in practice when violence is offered, or when in the least disturbed in their worship, at their meetings or their conventicles or elsewhere, by any sort of governors or governments whatsoever. They are peaceable in this reign, because they are permitted to live quietly, and so may be said to be passive under the present administration, but at the same time decline to be any way active in supporting it—being in them a mighty point of conscience." In a subsequent part of his book the author furnishes us with a further illustration of the character of this honest and brave-hearted people, and also of his own, in a circumstantial relation which he gives of the way in which, when they were about to rise in concert with the Jacobites against the Union, then under discussion in the Scottish parliament, he wormed himself into the confidence of the unsuspecting Cameronians, and managed to make their design break down. All this he tells, not indeed without many becoming expressions of contrition and self-coude-mnation; but it is not his dissimulation and trickery of which he is ashamed—the professed source of his regret is, that by this clever exploit he should have been “the unhappy instrument of the Union,” which he would have us believe must certainly have been prevented if he had not in this way drawn off the insurgent Cameronians. Writing with this view, it is probable that he somewhat exaggerates the effective force of that “zealous remnant,” as they called themselves, at the date to which his account refers. He, no doubt, also greatly overrates the numbers of the Episcopalians, when he says that they formed “near one-half of the nation”—“among whom,” he adds, “are to be reckoned the most part of the Highland clans, whose numbers, notwithstanding their late misfortunes, are rather increased than diminished; for the commiseration of such, who, with their families, have suffered lately, hath brought over several converts to that side.” Had the Highlanders been all Episcopalians, they probably did not amount to a fourth part of the inhabitants of Scotland; and the number of Episcopalians among the rest of the population was certainly very inconsiderable. Ker makes no mention of any Roman Catholics in Scotland, although, in the northern parts of the country especially, the ancient religion still had many adherents.

* Ker's name, in fact, was Crawford; but, having married a daughter of the family of Kersland, he took the name and arms of Ker on the death of his brother-in-law, the last male of that family, who was killed at the battle of Steinkirk in 1692.

The religious movement in Scotland of which the Secession was the most noticeable outward manifestation had in reality a much deeper source than was indicated by the circumstances out of which it immediately arose, and the particular grievance, or grievances, against which it professed to be mainly directed. The law of patronage, and the various things that were objected to in the conduct of the church courts, only furnished the occasion for an outbreak and revolt against the existing systems, with the real elements of which these obtrusive but superficial subjects of complaint had little or nothing to do. They were but the drawing of the trigger—at most but the exciting spark; the explosive force that wrought the effect lay in passions and tendencies that had long been forming and gathering strength in the minds of men, and were now become, in a manner, the moving spirit of the age, in so far as religion was concerned. It is remarkable that as nearly as possible of the same date with the Secession in Scotland is the origin of Methodism in England. John Wesley, then a student of Christ Church, Oxford, had been in the habit of meeting several evenings in each week for prayer and other religious exercises with some of his fellow-students from the year 1729, and the society thus formed was joined by George Whitefield in 1734; in 1735 John Wesley and his brother Charles embarked for the new colony of Georgia to preach to the American Indians; and in the following year

Whitefield, then just ordained, began to produce a great sensation in London and other parts of England, and to draw crowded audiences around him, by the fervid manner and strain of his preaching, and by a species of what would now be called Evangelicism in doctrine, which he and his Oxford associates appear to have drawn for the most part from the writings and the conversation of the celebrated mystic William Law, and which at that time, to the unaccustomed ears of the congregations of the established church, sounded almost like a new gospel. But neither Whitefield's nor Wesley's religious views were matured, or assumed their final shape and character, till some time after this: Wesley seems to have received his first impressions of what he accounted genuine Christianity from the Moravians, with some of whom he met in America, and whose principal establishment, at Hernhut, in Germany, he visited after his return to Europe in 1738; he himself relates that his conversion took place at a meeting of some religious friends in Aldersgate-street, London, where one was reading Luther's Preface to the Epistle to the Romans, about a quarter before nine o'clock on the evening of Wednesday, the 24th of May, in that year: Whitefield, again, who had first visited Georgia about the same time that Wesley left that colony, and who, in the course of a second transatlantic expedition, on which he set out about two years afterwards, proceeded to the older settlements of New England, was confirmed by the American puritans and the books they put into his hands in the Calvinistic creed of election and reprobation, of which he had already received a tincture from the writings of the old nonconformist divine Matthew Henry, and to which he ever afterwards adhered. Preaching extemporaneously and in the open air was first practised by Whitefield in 1739, in the interval between his two visits to America; the colliers in the neighbourhood of Bristol—to whom, drawn forth from the living entombment of their black subterranean working-places, well might the blue sky seem temple enough—were, appropriately, the first audiences he addressed in this fashion; soon afterwards he gathered other crowds of thousands and tens of thousands around him by the same novel exhibition, in Moorfields, on Kennington Common, and on Blackheath; and in this course he was speedily followed by Wesley, who had now returned from Germany, and found himself, as well as his friend, excluded from nearly all the pulpits of the established church. “When I was told,” says Wesley, “I must preach no more in this, and this, and another church, so much the more those who could not hear me there flocked together when I was at any of the societies, where I spoke more or less, though with much inconvenience, to as many as the room I was in would contain. But, after a time, finding those rooms could not contain a tenth part of the people that were earnest to hear, I determined to do the same thing in England which I had often done in a warmer climate,—namely, when the house would not contain the congregation, to preach in the open air. This I accordingly did, first in Bristol, where the society rooms were exceedingly small, and at Kingawood, where we had no room at all; afterwards in or near London." But Wesley, who never altogether got over the feelings of the churchman, is very solicitous to show that this deviation from the established forms was rather forced upon than sought by him. "Be pleased to observe," he adds,—“1. That I was forbidden, as by a general consent, to preach in any church (though not by any judicial sentence), for preaching such doctrine. This was the open, avowed cause: there was at that time no other, either real or pretended (except that the people crowded so). 2. That I had no desire or design to preach in the open air till after this prohibition. 3. That, when I did, as it was no matter of choice, so neither of premeditation: there was no scheme at all previously formed which was to be supported thereby; nor had I any other end in view than this—to save as many souls as I could. 4. Field-preaching was therefore a sudden expedient, a thing submitted to rather than chosen; and therefore submitted to because I thought preaching even thus better than not preaching at all.”* The great distinction of Methodism, the permission of lay preaching, soon followed; the first lay preacher whom Wesley employed being Thomas Maxfield, whom he had originally engaged merely to watch over and pray with the congregation at his meeting-house called the Foundery, which he had built in Moorfields, while he should himself be ministering elsewhere, but who, on one occasion of his master's absence, having discovered his talent, did not choose to keep it folded up in a napkin. When Wesley first heard of what was going on, he hastened home to London with full resolution to shut the mouth of the aspiring youth, and that with all dispatch. “So, Thomas Maxfield is turned preacher, I find,” said he to his mother, as soon as he arrived, with dissatisfaction in his countenance, and speech abrupt enough; but the old lady withstood him to his face, warned him not to oppose the work of God, and told him that Thomas Maxfield was as surely called of God to preach as he himself was; upon which Wesley consented to hear him, and, by an examination into the effects of his administrations, was soon convinced that his mother was in the right. A year or two before this, indeed, Whitefield had, in Wales, associated himself for some time with a Mr. Howel Harris, who, although a layman, had long been in the habit of preaching to the people in Welsh; Whitefield and he used to preach at every place to which they came, the one after the other, that those who understood either language might be benefited; but it does not appear that Whitefield had employed lay preachers in any of his own chapels, or contemplated their ministrations as a regular engine of religious instruction, before the adventurous attempt of Maxfield and its success made Wesley a convert to that practice, which indeed has been carried much farther in the great Methodist community of which he was the founder than by the rival sect.

* Wesley's Journal.

For scarce had the two regenerators well begun to act in concert, when, from friends and coadjutors, they became rivals, and, for a short time, almost enemies. Notwithstanding the love of power, and aversion to equality and brotherhood, attributed to Wesley, it must be admitted that the breach was of Whitefield's making, or at least that it was he who first came forward as the public opponent and assailant of his senior. This happened in the year 1741. “During my journey through America,” says Whitefield himself, “I had written two well-meant, though injudicious, letters against England's two great favourites—the Whole Duty of Man and Archbishop Tillotson, who, I said, knew no more of religion than Mahomet. Mr. John Wesley had been prevailed on to preach and print in favour of perfection and universal redemption, and very strongly against election, a doctrine which I thought, and do now believe, was taught me of God, therefore could not possibly recede from. I had written an answer, which, though revised and much approved of by some judicious divines, I think had some too strong expressions about absolute reprobation, which the apostle leaves rather to be inferred than expressed.” This paper, it appears, was printed, possibly without the knowledge of the writer, and copies of it distributed among Wesley's audience at the Foundery, upon which Wesley himself, having procured one of the copies, exhibited it from the pulpit, and then tore it in pieces, an act which was instantly imitated by all those present to whom it had been given. In thus acting Wesley said that he did just what he believed Mr. Whitefield himself would have done if he had been present. But, if this was his notion at the moment, he soon began to see things in a different light. “Having heard much,” he tells us in his Journal not long after this, “of Mr. Whitefield's unkind behaviour since his return from Georgia, I went to hear him speak for himself, that I might know how to judge. I much approved of his plainness of speech. He told me he and I preached two different gospels, and therefore he not only would not join with, or give me the right hand of fellowship, but was resolved publicly to preach against me and my brother whosoever he preached at all. Mr. Hall, who went with me, put him in mind of the promise he had made but a few days before,—that, whatever his private opinion was, he would never publicly preach against me. He said that promise was only an effect of human weakness, and he was now of another mind.” The consequence was an almost complete separation between the two for nearly ten years: it was not till 1750 that they ever again officiated together in the same chapel. Meanwhile, each had been unceasingly employed in extending the boundaries of what was still in the main their common Methodism, notwithstanding the discordance upon some points that kept them labouring apart, and sometimes at the opposite corners of the field. The year 1743 is assigned as the epoch of the proper foundation of Wesleyanism, by the contrivance of the first form of that system of government and discipline which has ever since united the followers of Wesley into one compact and at the same time thoroughly organized body, reciprocally sentient over all its circles, societies, classes, bands, and individual members; and also under the most complete subjection to the ruling authority, which he himself wielded so long as he lived, and then left to the council of preachers called the Conference, in so far at least as legal deeds could bequeath such a legacy. No such frame of polity was erected by Whitefield for his description of Methodism; and, whether owing entirely to that, or partly to other differences, this latter has never spread among the mass of the population to anything like the same extent with Wesleyanism; but it was perhaps somewhat before the other in penetrating to the upper regions of society,—an advantage which it owed chiefly to the accident of Whitefield finding a convert to his peculiar views in the famous Lady Huntingdon. Selina, Countess-Dowager of Huntingdon, appears to have taken to the open profession of Methodism soon after the death of her husband, in 1746; it was in the summer of 1748, after his return from a third visit to America, that Whitefield was first invited to preach in her house at Chelsea. He records the reception his oratory met with from a large company of persons of rank, whom her ladyship on several occasions afterwards brought together to hear him, with considerable complacency:—"All behaved quite well, and were in some degree affected. The Earl of Chesterfield thanked me, and said, Sir, I will not tell you what I shall tell others, how I approve of you,—or words to this purpose. At last Lord Bolingbroke came to hear, sat like an archbishop, and was pleased to say that I had done great justice to the divine attributes in my discourse. Soon afterwards her ladyship removed to town, where I preached generally twice a week to very brilliant audiences." But, certainly, this was not so favourable a soil in which to sow the seeds of Methodism, whether Calvinistic or Arminian, as that to which the ordinary labours both of Wesley and Whitefield were devoted—the labouring population. For what is still very much the case was so to a yet greater extent in the infancy of Methodism;—its chief acceptance was among the working classes; it did not make its way even up to the middle classes with any pervading or considerable effect. And indeed it is essentially, in all its peculiarities, the poor man's religion.

Besides its early diffusion in the congenial climate of puritanical America, where it continues to flourish in a degree unexampled even in the country where it first sprung up, Methodism was planted within the present period both in Scotland and in Ireland. Calvinistic Scotland, as might be expected, received the light in the first instance from Whitefield; he came to Edinburgh in the end of July, 1741, soon after his return from America, at the pressing request of the Brskines, who hoped to turn the great preacher to good account in building up and extending their new church. Immediately before his visit, Ebenezer wrote to him:—"It would be very unreasonable to propose or urge that you should incorporate as a member of our presbytery, and wholly embark in every branch of our reformation, unless the father of light were clearing your way thereto: . . . all intended by us at present is, that, when you come to Scotland, your way may be such as not to strengthen the hands of our corrupt clergy and judicatories, who are carrying on a course of defection, worming out a faithful ministry from the land, and the power of religion with it. . . . But if, besides, you could find freedom to company with us, to preach with us and for us, and to accept of our advices in your work while in this country, it might contribute much to weaken the enemy's hand, and to strengthen ours in the work of the Lord, when the strength of the battle is against us." All this was dexterous enough; and so was the concluding paragraph of the epistle:—"I am truly sorry for the Wesleyans—to see them so far left to themselves. I have seen your letter to them, and praise the Lord on your behalf, who enables you to stand up so valiantly for the truth, and with so much light and energy."* But the result was altogether different from what was anticipated. Whitefield, before he made his appearance, frankly told his friends of the Secession that, as to their grand question of church government, he intended to be "quite neuter;" and that he "came simply to preach the gospel, and not to enter into any particular connexion whatever." When he arrived he had a meeting with the Associate Presbytery, which left no favourable impression on either side; and, in the end, Whitefield fell rather into the hands of some of the clergy of the establishment. This issue of the matter was precipitated by the breaking out of an extraordinary moral epidemic, famous to this day in Scotland under the name of the Outpouring at Cambuslang, a furious fever of fanaticism which took possession of the people of that place, a small village in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, soon after some of them had heard Whitefield preach in that city, and which was encouraged and hailed as a miraculous manifestation of the favour of heaven by the clergyman of the parish—by whom, however, it was attributed quite as much to his own preaching as to that of Whitefield. The "Cambuslang work" was at its height in February and March, 1742, and when Whitefield returned to Scotland in the beginning of June that year, he was immediately assailed by his late friends of the Associate Presbytery, both from the pulpit and the press, with a storm of the most passionate reprobation. One zealous minister in particular, a Rev. Adam Gib, first preached against him, and then published his sermon, with a preface and an appendix, in which he attempted to prove by an elaborate demonstration that the apostle of Methodism, instead of being a minister of Christ, was, in fact, one of the false Christs of whom we are forewarned by the evangelist—in other words, that he was a mere impostor and emissary of the devil. In making out this proposition, the reverend gentleman calls all sorts of arguments to his aid. Mr. Whitefield, he contends in the first place, could be no minister of Christ, inasmuch as his assumption of that character rested upon his ordination in the English episcopal church, the most untenable form of church government ever set up or proposed; “but we must not overlook,” he adds, “the strength that is added to our argument by the English church and church officers their subjection unto and acknowledgment of the king’s supremacy, in all causes and over all persons, ecclesiastical as well as civil: Mr. Whitefield will not, I suppose, deny that he has sworn the oath of supremacy, nor allege that he has not vomited that spiritual poison.” But, secondly, even if Mr. Whitefield were a minister of Christ, still, says Mr. Gib, “he has no warrant to minister or preach here; . . . it is ridiculous and unwarrantable for a minister to come from one church and preach in another church, without either a mission from the church officers whence he comes, or admission by the church officers, or a due call by the church members, whither he comes.” This is amusing enough, and a high strain of churchmanship indeed, from such a quarter—the more especially, considering that Whitefield had actually been only twelve months before invited to Scotland by the heads of the writer’s own party. In a subsequent passage, the Scottish dissenter argues, somewhat ingeniously, that Whitefield’s weekday services were an evident violation of the Fourth Commandment—of which he contends the introductory clause, “Six days shalt thou labour and do all thy work,” is as much a part as the remainder in which the seventh day is set apart for the worship of God. To carry public religion at least beyond the bounds thus set for it, he conceives can proceed from nothing but a temptation of Satan, aiming thereby at disgusting men with all religion. Mr. Gib’s sermon was followed up by an act of the Associate Presbytery appointing a day of fasting and humiliation on account of “the present awful symptom of the Lord’s anger with this church and land, in sending them a strong delusion, that they should believe a lie,” and leaving them “to give such an open discovery of their apostasy from him in the fond reception that Mr. George Whitefield has met with, notwithstanding it is notoriously known that he is a priest of the church of England, who hath sworn the Oath of Supremacy, and abjured the Solemn League and Covenant!” Whitefield, on the other hand, declared it as his deliberate opinion that the Associate Presbytery were building a Babel, which he believed would soon tumble down about their ears. Scotland was also afterwards repeatedly visited and in great part traversed by Wesley; his first journey was made in 1751, and he returned again in 1753, in 1757, and several times in subsequent years. But, although a great sensation was produced at the moment by his preaching as well as by that of Whitefield, the Methodism of neither the one nor the other ever made any considerable progress in that part of the island. In so far, in truth, as Methodism was a system of religious belief or feeling, it was either the same thing that was already preached in Scotland by the popular section of the established clergy and in all the dissenting churches; or it was so directly opposed to the old presbyterian spirit and doctrines, that it never could take any extensive possession of the popular mind. As a system of what is called Evangelism, it was not needed; as a system of Latitudinarianism in regard to church government and various other matters, it was abhorrent to the most deep-rooted of the national prejudices and habits. In Ireland, at least in the more Protestant parts of the country, Methodism has been much more prosperous. It was first carried thither in 1747, by a Wesleyan preacher of the name of Williams, and the new field thus opened was soon after visited both by John Wesley himself and by his brother Charles. For a time, indeed, while the missionaries confined their operations, as they did at first, to the three southern counties, considerable opposition was encountered, not only from the Roman Catholic priests, and the mobs whom they were believed to instigate, but also from the high-church feeling of Protestants of the upper classes: in August, 1749, the grand jury of the county of Cork actually presented Charles Wesley and nine of his fellow preachers as persons of ill fame, vagabonds, and common disturbers of his majesty’s peace, and prayed that they might be transported; nor, on the whole, was any great inroad made by the new sect upon the domains either of the Roman Catholic or of the Established Church. But when they at last found their way to Ulster, where the common puritanical spirit of Protestant dissent had long been extensively prevalent, they received a very cordial reception; and there were soon many congregations of both kinds of Methodists formed in that part of Ireland.

* Finner's Life of E. Franklin, p. 427.

We have spoken of the Methodists as a sect; but, at least during the present period, they can scarcely be properly said to have assumed that character. Both Wesley and Whitefield continued to regard themselves as ministers of the Church of England, in which they had been ordained, to the end of their days; and Wesley, at least, seems to the last to have held to the principle that all the people ought to be in communion with the establishment, whether they saw good to limit their attendance to the ministrations of the established clergy or no. He recommended that the menbers of all his congregations should receive the sacrament thrice a-year, as the law required, from their parish clergymen—nay, he seems almost to have thought that it was their duty to hear service once every Sunday at their parish churches, as well as at their meeting-houses at another hour and on weekdays. At first, indeed, he would not allow his own preachers either to administer the sacrament or to perform the office of baptism, though after a time he deemed it expedient to give way in that matter to the general feeling of his followers. Whitefield perhaps did not carry his notion of the rights of the establishment quite so high, nor does he appear to have thought it of any great importance how those to whom he preached might be circumstanced in regard to the mere outward framework of a church; but this very indifference withheld him from sympathizing with dissent as such. Methodism, therefore, so long as its founders lived, was, or at any rate professed to be, rather an extension of the established church than a hostile or rival institution—a cultivation of the waste lands and commons lying scattered and hitherto neglected within her territory, rather than an abstraction of any part of her ancient and rightful possessions. No doubt all this while there were many elements in the new power thus called into action as essentially adverse to the interests of the establishment as any system of open dissent that was ever preached. On the whole, the position of Methodism in this respect was exceedingly anomalous. The whole phenomenon bore a considerable resemblance to the appearance in the early part of the thirteenth century of the Mendicant Friars;* who both in the field and manner of their ministrations, and in the peculiar character of the relation in which they stood to the church and to the rest of the clergy, may be styled the Methodists of that time.

* See vol. i. p. 803.

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION, GOVERNMENT, AND LAWS.

CHARLES MONTAGUE, EARL OF HALIFAX, from a Picture by Sir Godfrey Kneller.
 LORD CHANCELLOR SOMERS, from a Picture by Sir Godfrey Kneller.
 HENRY ST. JOHN, VISCOUNT BOLINGBROKE, from an anonymous Etching.
 ROBERT WALPOLE, EARL OF OXFORD, from a Painting by Pons.
 SIDNEY, EARL OF GODOLPHIN, from a Painting by Sir Godfrey Kneller.

be, are to be looked for henceforth from other quarters than the throne. We have seen the power of the king, with some fluctuations, on the whole upon the decline down to the wars of the Roses. We have seen it revive on the termination of these wars in the person of Henry VII., while that of the nobility was almost crushed. We have seen this monarchical power, on the whole, upon the increase through the reign of Henry VIII., and, perhaps we may add, of Elizabeth, though the Reformation had given it a blow which was acting with silent but vast effect in undermining it. We have seen the attempts of Charles I. to render this power well defined and fixed terminate in his defeat, dethronement, and violent death;—we have seen a bold and sagacious man, born in no higher station than that of a private gentleman, quarters than the throne. We have seen the power of the king, with some fluctuations, on the whole upon the decline down to the wars of the Roses. We have seen it revive on the termination of these wars in the person of Henry VII., while that of the nobility was almost crushed. We have seen this monarchical power, on the whole, upon the increase through the reign of Henry VIII., and, perhaps we may add, of Elizabeth, though the Reformation had given it a blow which was acting with silent but vast effect in undermining it. We have seen the attempts of Charles I. to render this power well defined and fixed terminate in his defeat, dethronement, and violent death;—we have seen a bold and sagacious man, born in no higher station than that of a private gentleman, fill the seat and wield the sceptre of a long line of kings;—we have seen the representatives of that line restored to their ancestral throne;—and, finally, we have seen them driven from it for ever by, to use the words of Mr. Hallam, “the triumph of those principles which, in the language of the present day, are denominated liberal or constitutional, over those of absolute monarchy, or of monarchy not effectually controlled by stated boundaries.”* Henceforth it is strictly correct to call our monarchy a monarchy strictly and definitely limited by law. It had, indeed, theoretically been limited by law long before;† but it was found to be one thing to place a law on the statute-roll, and another to put it in force. But now, besides the change of circumstances in the relative power of the king and the middle classes of society, the line of succession was broken; and, although a descendant of the old family was placed on the throne, it was not the descendant next in succession. Consequently any claim to title on the score of hereditary right was rendered about as invalid as if a total stranger had been placed on the throne. This completely swept away the whole of that large mass of mischiefs having their source in

“The right divine of kings to govern wrong.”

So that, without very much if at all altering the form of the government, its spirit was essentially changed.

The terms in which the English and Scottish conventions respectively had declared the vacancy of the throne have already been detailed.‡ As has also been observed, the Scotch term “forfaulted” was in some sense more correct than the “abdication” or “desertion” put forward by the English convention; and yet, as Mr. Hallam has remarked, even forfeiture would not bear out, by strict analogy of law, the exclusion of an heir, whose right was not liable to be set aside at the ancestor’s pleasure. Upon the whole, perhaps, to declare abdication and vacancy of the throne was the best course, as best agreeing with the resort by the convention to the leading idea for which, in the view of reason, all governments are constituted—the good, namely, of the governed, and not of the governing, and to the casting away everything like an acknowledgment of a system of law which they had seen converted into instruments of oppression in the hands of a tyrant. Whatever, too, may be the opinion respecting the philosophical accuracy of an “original contract between the king and people,”‡ embodied in the resolution of the Lords, there is no doubt that it aided the other idea (which, whatever name it might get, whether abdication or desertion, was undoubtedly well understood to mean forfeiture in a large sense) in breaking that mighty spell which had enthralled for so many centuries the minds not only of the English nation, but of nearly all mankind. This breaking then of the line of succession in this solemn manner,—accompanied, that is to say, by these solemn and deliberate declarations of the grounds on which it was broken,—did what no positive statutes or improvements, no concessions, however large and sweeping, made by the legitimate prince—what, in short, nothing else could do—“it cut up by the roots,” to borrow the appropriate language of Mr. Hallam, “all that theory of indefeasible right, of paramount prerogative, which had put the crown in continual opposition to the people. A contention had now subsisted for five hundred years, but particularly during the four last reigns, against the aggressions of arbitrary power. The sovereigns of this country had never patiently endured the control of parliament; nor was it natural for them to do so, while the two houses of parliament appeared historically, and in legal language, to derive their existence as well as privileges from the crown itself. They had at their side the plant lawyers, who held the prerogative to be uncontrollable by statutes—a doctrine of itself destructive to any scheme of reconciliation and compromise between a king and his subjects: they had the churchmen, whose casuistry denied that the most intolerable tyranny could excuse resistance to a lawful government. These two propositions could not obtain general acceptance without rendering all national liberty precarious. It has been always reckoned among the most difficult problems in the practical science of government, to combine an hereditary monarchy with security of freedom, so that neither the ambition of kings shall undermine the people’s rights, nor the jealousy of the people overturn the throne. England had already experience of both these mischiefs. And there seemed no prospect before her, but either their alternate recurrence, or a final submission to absolute power, unless by one great effort she could put the monarchy for ever beneath the law, and reduce it to an integrant portion instead of the primary source and principle of the constitution. She must reverse the favoured maxim—A Deo rex, a rege lex—and make the crown itself appear the creature of the law. But our ancient monarchy, strong in a possession of seven centuries, and in those high and paramount prerogatives which the consenting testimony of lawyers and the submission of parliaments had recognised, a monarchy from which the House of Commons and every existing peer, though not perhaps the aristocratic order itself, derived its participation in the legislature, could not be bent to the republican theories which have been not very successfully attempted in some modern codes of constitution. It could not be held, without breaking up all the foundations of our polity, that the monarchy emanated from the parliament or even from the people. But, by the Revolution and by the act of settlement the rights of the actual monarch, of the reigning family, were made to emanate from the parliament and the people. In technical language, in the grave and respectful theory of our constitution, the crown is still the fountain from which law and justice spring forth. Its prerogatives are in the main the same as under the Tudors and the Stuarts; but the right of the House of Brunswick to exercise them can only be deduced from the convention of 1688.*

* Const. Hist. vol. iii. p. 139.

† See ante, pp. 3, 8.

‡ The assertion of an “original contract,” though in fact a mere legal fiction, after all but amounts to this, that, in the eye of reason, government must exist under an implied obligation to act for the good of the governed.

The great advantage, therefore, of the Revolution, Mr. Hallam conceives to consist "in that which was reckoned its reproach by many and its misfortune by more; that it broke the line of succession."

We now proceed to examine somewhat in detail some of the leading legal enactments, which were the produce of this new state of things.

The Declaration of Rights was presented to the Prince of Orange by the Marquess of Halifax, as speaker of the Lords, in the presence of both Houses, on the 13th of February, 1689. This declaration was some months afterwards confirmed by a regular act of the legislature, the statute 1 W. & M. sess. 2, c. 2, entitled "An Act declaring the Rights and Liberties of the Subject, and settling the succession of the Crown," commonly called "The Bill of Rights;" which, as it forms the basis of the present fabric of our constitution, it will be necessary to explain somewhat minutely.

It begins by reciting in full the Declaration of Rights, which, after an enumeration of the illegal and arbitrary acts committed by the late king, proceeds to state that, upon his abdication of the government, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, assembled pursuant to letters written by the Prince of Orange, did, "as their ancestors in like cases have usually done, for the vindicating and asserting their ancient rights and liberties, declare—" 1. That the pretended power of suspending of laws or the execution of laws, by regal authority, without the consent of parliament, is illegal. 2. That the pretended power of dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal. 3. That the commission for erecting the late Court of Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Causes, and all other commissions and courts of like nature, are illegal and pernicious. 4. That levying money for or to the use of the crown, by pretence of prerogative, without grant of parliament, for longer time, or in other manner, than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal. 5. That it is the right of the subjects to petition the king; and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal. 6. That the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of parliament, is against law. 7. That the subjects which are Protestants may have arms for their defence suitable to their conditions, and as allowed by law. 8. That election of members of parliament ought to be free. 9. That the freedom of speech and debates or proceedings in parliament ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of parliament. 10. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed; nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. 11. That jurors ought to be duly empaneled and returned, and jurors which pass upon men in trials for high treason ought to be freeholders. 12. That all grants and promises of fines and forfeitures of particular persons before conviction are illegal and void. 13. And that for the redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving of the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently."

The Declaration adds—"And they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties;" and then proceeds to state the resolution of the said assembled Lords and Commons, "That William and Mary, Prince and Princess of Orange, be and be declared King and Queen of England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, to hold the crown and royal dignity of the said kingdoms and dominions to them the said prince and princess during their lives, and the life of the survivor of them; and that the sole and full exercise of the regal power be only in, and executed by, the said Prince of Orange, in the names of the said prince and princess, during their joint lives; and after their deceases the said crown and royal dignity of the said kingdoms and dominions to be to the heirs of the body of the said princess; and for default of such issue to the Princess Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and for default of such issue to the heirs of the body of the said Prince of Orange."

Then come the new Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, in the following words:—

"I, A. B., do sincerely promise and swear, that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to their majesties King William and Queen Mary. So help me God."

"I, A. B., do swear, that I do from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure, as impious and heretical, that damnable doctrine and position, that princes excommunicated or deprived by the pope, or any authority of the see of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects, or any other whatsoever. And I do declare, that no foreign prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm. So help me God."

The act then goes on to recite, that thereupon their said majesties did accept the said crown and royal dignity, according to the resolution and order of the said Lords and Commons, contained in the said declaration. These recitals being concluded, the bill thus proceeds:—

"Now, in pursuance of the premises, the said Lords, spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in parliament assembled, for the ratifying, confirming, and establishing the said Declaration, and the articles, clauses, matters, and things"

* Const. Hist. of England, vol. iii. p. 126. (5vo. edit.)

therein contained, by the force of a law made in due form by authority of parliament, do pray that it may be declared and enacted, that all and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in the said Declaration are the true, ancient, and indubitable rights and liberties of the people of this kingdom, and so shall be esteemed, allowed, adjudged, deemed, and taken to be, and that all and every the particulars aforesaid shall be firmly and strictly holden and observed, as they are expressed in the said Declaration; and all officers and ministers whatsoever shall serve their majesties and their successors according to the same in all times to come. And the said Lords, spiritual and temporal, and Commons, seriously considering how it hath pleased Almighty God, in his marvellous providence and merciful goodness to this nation, to provide and preserve their said majesties' royal persons most happily to reign over us upon the throne of their ancestors, for which they render unto him from the bottom of their hearts their humblest thanks and praises, do truly, firmly, assuredly, and in the sincerity of their hearts think, and do hereby recognise, acknowledge, and declare, that, King James II. having abdicated the government, and their majesties having accepted the crown and royal dignity as aforesaid, their said majesties did become, were, are, and of right ought to be, by the laws of this realm, our sovereign liege lord and lady, king and queen of England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, in and to whose princely persons the royal state, crown, and dignity of the said realms, with all honours, styles, titles, regalities, prerogatives, powers, jurisdictions, and authorities to the same belonging and appertaining, are most fully, rightfully, and entirely invested and incorporated, united, and annexed."

The next clause, or section, of the act confirms the limitation of the crown as declared in the recital given above. By what is usually numbered section 9th, every person who shall hold communion with the church of Rome, or shall profess the popish religion, or shall marry a papist, shall be excluded, and be for ever incapable to inherit, possess, or enjoy the crown and government of this realm; and in all such cases, the people of these realms shall be absolved from their allegiance, and the crown shall descend to the next heir. By section 10th, all kings and queens of this realm are required to take the declaration in the statute 30 Car. II. stat. 2. c. 1. Section 11 is the enacting clause, and, as the form is a somewhat unusual one, resembling rather more the ancient form of parliamentary bill by way of petition and answer, we shall give it in full:—"All which their majesties are contented and pleased shall be declared, enacted, and established by authority of this present parliament, and shall stand, remain, and be the law of this realm for ever; and the same are by their said majesties, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, declared, enacted, and established accordingly."

By section 12th it is enacted "that from and after this present session of parliament, no dispensation by non obstante of or to any statute, or any part thereof, shall be allowed, but that the same shall be held void and of no effect, except a dispensation be allowed of in such statute, and except in such cases as shall be specially provided for by one or more bill or bills to be passed during this present session of parliament."

Section 13th and last contains an exception in respect of charters, grants, or pardons, granted before the 23rd of October, 1689.

Very soon after an act was passed "For recognising King William and Queen Mary, and for avoiding all questions touching the act made in the parliament assembled at Westminster, the 13th day of February, 1688." This act is stat. 2 W. and M. c. 1., and as, though an important document, it is short, we shall give it in full:—

"We your majesties' most humble and loyal subjects, the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, do beseech your most excellent majesties that it may be published and declared in this high court of parliament, and enacted by authority of the same, that we do recognise and acknowledge your majesties were, are, and of right ought to be, by the laws of this realm, our sovereign liege lord and lady, King and Queen of England, France, and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, in and to whose princely persons the royal state, crown and dignity of the said realms, with all honours, stiles, titles, regalities, prerogatives, powers, jurisdictions, and authorities to the same belonging and appertaining, are most fully, rightfully, and entirely invested and incorporated, united and annexed. And, for the avoiding of all disputes and questions concerning the being and authority of the late parliament assembled at Westminster, the thirteenth day of February, one thousand six hundred eighty-eight, we do most humbly beseech your majesties that it may be enacted, and be it enacted by the king's and queen's most excellent majesties, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that all and singular the acts made and enacted in the said parliament were and are laws and statutes of this kingdom, and as such ought to be reputed, taken, and obeyed by all the people of this kingdom."

One of the most important matters to be dealt with under the new state of things was the settlement of the revenue. The first parliament of Charles II. had allotted 1,200,000*l.* as the ordinary revenue of the crown, to arise from various sources—the hereditary excise in liquors granted in lieu of the king's feudal rights, other excise and custom duties granted for his life, the post-office, the crown lands, the tax called the hearth-money (2*s.* on every house), and some other small taxes.

These taxes in the beginning of Charles's reign fell short of the sum estimated. But the revenue of James from these sources, by the improvement of trade, amounted, on an average of the four years of his reign, to 1,500,564*l*. To this is to be added the produce of duties imposed for eight years by his parliament of 1685, amounting to more than 400,000*l*. When the question of William's revenue came on, the accounts which the Commons called for exhibited both such an increase of the receipts and such a disposal of the expenditure as determined them more effectually to curtail the former and control the latter.

They voted 1,200,000*l*. for the annual revenue of the crown in time of peace; one half to be appropriated to the maintenance of the king's government and royal family, or what used to be called the civil list, the other to the public defence and contingent expenditure. The war which broke out rendered a new arrangement necessary. Estimates of the probable expenditure in the army, navy, and ordnance, were regularly laid before them, and the supply granted was strictly appropriated to each particular service. This principle of appropriation, as we have already mentioned, was introduced in the reign of Charles II., but, though generally, not invariably adopted. From the Revolution it has been the invariable usage. A clause is inserted in the Appropriation Act of every session forbidding the supplies to be applied to any other purposes than those specified. "This," says Mr. Hallam, "has given the House of Commons so effectual a control over the executive power, or, more truly speaking, has rendered it so much a participator in that power, that no administration can possibly subsist without its concurrence; nor can the session of parliament be intermitted for an entire year, without leaving both the naval and military force of the kingdom unprovided for. In time of war, or in circumstances that may induce war, it has not been very uncommon to deviate a little from the rule of appropriation, by a grant of considerable sums on a vote of credit, which the crown is thus enabled to apply at its discretion during the recess of parliament; and we have had also too frequent experience, that the charges of public service have not been brought within the limits of the last year's appropriation. But the general principle has not perhaps been often transgressed without sufficient reason; and a House of Commons would be deeply responsible to the country, if through supine confidence it should abandon that high privilege which has made it the arbiter of court factions and the regulator of foreign connexions. It is to this transference of the executive government (for the phrase is hardly too strong) from the crown to the two Houses of parliament, and especially the Commons, that we owe the proud attitude which England has maintained since the Revolution, so extraordinarily dissimilar, in the eyes of Europe, to her condition under the Stuarts. The supplies meted out with niggardly caution by former parliaments to sovereigns whom they could not trust, have flowed with redundant profuseness, when they could judge of their necessity and direct their application. Doubtless the demand has always been fixed by the ministers of the crown, and its influence has retrieved in some degree the loss of authority; but it is still true that no small portion of the executive power, according to the established laws and customs of our government, has passed into the hands of that body, which prescribes the application of the revenue as well as investigates at its pleasure every act of the administration."^{*}

There is another annual enactment, which, from the very important effect produced by it—in combination with the provision last mentioned—upon our government and constitution, this seems the proper place for noticing:—this is the Mutiny Bill, under which the army is held together, and subjected to military discipline, and which, at least in its modern form, regulates the manner in which the troops are to be dispersed among the several innkeepers and victuallers throughout the kingdom, and establishes a martial-law for their government. These two enactments, the Appropriation of Supply Act, and the Mutiny Act, form together the grand security for the annual meeting of parliament, and may therefore be considered as the instruments by which the popular element exercises its main control over the machine of government, both as regards the power of impelling it to do good and checking it from doing mischief; but especially of preventing it from turning the large amount of money which parliament intrusts it with the distribution of, and the standing army, of which it has the command, to the subversion of the liberties of the subject and the establishment of arbitrary power.

The Mutiny Bill naturally leads us to say something on the subject of standing armies, the introduction of which forms one of the leading features of the commencement of this period of our history. It has been seen that no army existed before the civil wars, that the Guards in the reign of Charles II. amounted to about 5000 men, that in the interval between the peace of Ryswick and the war of the Spanish succession the Commons would not consent to keep up more than 7000 troops. "The number of troops for whom a vote was annually demanded, after some variation, in the first year of George I., was during the whole administration of Sir Robert Walpole, except when the state of Europe excited some apprehension of disturbance, rather more than 17,000 men, independent of those on the Irish establishment, but including the garrisons of Minorca and Gibraltar. And this continued with little alteration to be our standing army in time of peace during the eighteenth century.†

This question of keeping up troops was always a bone of contention between William and ^{*} Const. History, vol. iii. p. 159.

[†] Hallam, Const. Hist. iii. 346.

his parliament. The keeping up a permanent body of men devoted to war as a profession, has, we think, generally been admitted by all parties to have been a somewhat perilous innovation. Something indeed may and has been said in its favour, independently of the question of its political necessity. Adam Smith remarks somewhere in his Wealth of Nations, that the effect of not making war a distinct profession, but making all men soldiers for a time, but none permanently, is to have six bad or indifferent soldiers and six good ploughmen spoiled; while the effect of the contrary course is that you have five good ploughmen and one good soldier. On the other hand it is held by Blackstone,* on the principles of Montesquieu, that "nothing ought to be more guarded against in a free state than making the military power, when such a one is necessary to be kept on foot, a body too distinct from the people." "It should," he adds, wholly be composed of natural subjects; it ought only to be enlisted for a short and limited time; the soldiers also should live intermixed with the people; no separate camp, no barracks, no inland fortresses should be allowed. And perhaps it might be still better, if, by dismissing a stated number and enlisting others at every renewal of their term, a circulation could be kept up between the army and the people, and the citizen and soldier be more intimately connected together."

There is certainly some force in these arguments—perhaps more than in the argument of Adam Smith mentioned above, though that is not by any means without weight either. But there is more force in circumstances than in all their arguments—and the march of events and the condition of Europe have determined the question of the existence of a standing army.

Much the same objections against a standing army as those quoted above from Blackstone were urged by Mr. Pulteney in 1732, in parliament. He said, "They are a body of men distinct from the body of the people; they are governed by different laws; blind obedience and an entire submission to the orders of their commanding officer is their only principle. The nations around us are already enslaved, and have been enslaved by these very means; by means of their standing armies they have every one lost their liberties; it is indeed impossible that the liberties of the people can be preserved in any country where a numerous standing army is kept up." † Mr. Pulteney overlooked the fact of the important difference between the case of England and those countries which, as he asserts, (for it is not the case—they lost their liberties long before the introduction of standing armies), have lost their liberties by their standing armies, comprised in the circumstance that England had a representative government, and not one of those countries to which he alludes had anything of the kind. A standing army is undoubtedly a most cogent piece of logic on whatever side it may chance to be arrayed. But its effect as an instrument for good or evil will, we think, be found to depend much upon the hands in which it is placed. It is true that a revolutionary army, flushed with a long unbroken series of victories, such as that of Cromwell and Napoleon, may "settle" the nation in which way it will. But we do not think there will be found an instance of a standing army, maintained in ordinary times for ordinary purposes, making use of its power for other ends than those which are desired and commanded by the person or persons raising and keeping up such army. A Louis XIV. would of course keep up a standing army for ends different from those for which an English parliament would keep up one. Generally a standing army will obey the sovereign—whether the sovereign be one—a few—or the nation at large. Though, after all, this is somewhat a begging of the question or a sort of reasoning in a circle. For it is the fact of who—namely, the one, the few, or the many—has the strongest argument, the ultima-ratio—in other words, the greatest physical force—which determines who shall be sovereign; and if the standing army obeys, as we have said, the sovereign—and the sovereign is sovereign either from having the command of the standing army or of a physical force greater than the standing army—this merely amounts to saying, that the standing army obeys the standing army or a force greater than the standing army. The conditions on which—the objects for which—a standing army has always been professed to be kept up in this country are thus expressed in the preamble to the Annual Mutiny Act:—"Whereas the raising or keeping a standing army within the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in time of peace, unless it be with consent of parliament, is against law: and whereas it is adjudged necessary by his majesty and this present parliament, that a body of forces should be continued, for the safety of the united kingdom, the defence of the possessions of his majesty's crown, and the preservation of the balance of power in Europe."

In early times every freeman had the education of a soldier; now that education is confined to a class—none but those who make it a profession know anything of the military art. This and the general neglect of manly and athletic exercises (a neglect which has likewise a most pernicious effect upon the bodily strength and health of the community), have undoubtedly a tendency to place any nation, whatever be its form of government—however popular, however democratical it may be, very much at the mercy of that class of its citizens who devote themselves to the cultivation of military science, and the athletic and manly exercises which such a profession requires. This is an interesting and most important topic, but a full discussion of it would be unsuited to this work. We shall, therefore, conclude what we have to say on it here with some judicious remarks from Mr. Hallam. After noticing the establishment of the militia in 1757, and its comparative failure as regarded some of the main ends contemplated in the plan of it, he thus proceeds:—"Yet the success of that magnificent organisation which, in our own time, has been established in France is sufficient to evince the possibility of a national militia; and we know with what spirit such a force was kept up for some years in this country, under the name of volunteers and yeomanry, on its only real basis, that of property, and in such local distribution as convenience pointed out. Nothing could be more idle, at any time since the Revolution, than to suppose that the regular army would pull the Speaker out of his chair, or in any manner be employed to confirm a despotic power in the crown. Such power, I think, could never have been the waking dream of either king or minister. But, as the slightest inroads upon private rights and liberties are to be guarded against in any nation that deserves to be called free, we should always keep in mind not only that the military power is subordinate to the civil, but, as this subordination must cease where the former is frequently employed, that it should never be called upon in aid of the peace without sufficient cause. Nothing would more break down this notion of the law's supremacy than the perpetual interference of those who are really governed by another law; for the doctrine of some judges, that the soldier, being still a citizen, acts only in preservation of the public peace, as another citizen is bound to do, must be felt as a sophism even by those who cannot find an answer to it. And, even in slight circumstances, it is not conformable to the principles of our government to make that vain display of military authority which disgusts us so much in some continental kingdoms. But, not to dwell on this, it is more to our immediate purpose that the executive power has acquired such a coadjutor in the regular army that it can, in no probable emergency, have much to apprehend from popular sedition. The increased facilities of transport, and several improvements in military art and science, which will occur to the reader, have in later times greatly enhanced this advantage."*

* 1 Com. 418.

† Parl. Hist., viii. 904.

In 1693 a bill for triennial parliaments passed both Houses. The king, however, refused his assent. But a similar bill passed both Houses and received the royal assent in November, 1694. By this act, which is the stat. 6 and 7 W. and M. c. 2, it is provided; 1. "That a parliament shall be holden once in three years at the least." 2. "That within three years at the farthest from and after the dissolution of the then present parliament, and so from time to time for ever thereafter within three years at the farthest from and after the determination of every other parliament, legal writs under the great seal shall be issued by direction of their majesties, their heirs and successors, for calling, assembling, and holding another new parliament." 3. "That from henceforth no parliament whatsoever that shall at any time hereafter be called, assembled, or held, shall have any continuation longer than for three years only at the farthest, to be accounted from the day on which, by the writs of summons, the said parliament shall be appointed to meet." The clause against the intermission of parliaments is practically rendered unnecessary by the Appropriation and Mutiny acts described above; these rendering even annual sessions indispensable to the machine of government.

This triennial act did not last much above twenty years. In 1715 was passed the statute 1 G. 1. st. 2, c. 38, intitled "An Act for enlarging the time of continuance of parliaments appointed by an act made in the sixth year of the reign of King William and Queen Mary, intitled an act for the frequent meeting and calling of parliaments." This act, after reciting the clause of the above act (6 and 7 W. and M. c. 2), which limits the duration of parliament to three years; thus proceeds:—"And whereas it has been found by experience that the said clause hath proved very grievous and burdensome, by occasioning much greater and more continued expenses in order to elections of members to serve in parliament, and more violent and lasting heats and animosities among the subjects of this realm than were ever known before the said clause was enacted; and the said provision, if it should continue, may probably at this juncture, when a restless and popish faction are designing and endeavouring to renew the rebellion within this kingdom and an invasion from abroad, be destructive to the peace and security of the government, be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that this present parliament, and all parliaments that shall at any time hereafter be called, assembled, or held, shall and may respectively have continuance for seven years, and no longer, to be accounted from the day on which by the writ or summons this present parliament hath been, or any future parliament shall be, appointed to meet, unless this present, or any such parliament hereafter to be summoned, shall be sooner dissolved by his majesty, his heirs or successors."

It is not to be denied that there is much weight in many of the reasons assigned in the above recited preamble for extending the duration of parliaments from three to seven years. Whether they are as valid at the present day as they were in the year 1715 may well be a question; and it may also be observed that it is not easy to conceive a greater stretch of power than for a House of Commons elected, as was the House which passed this act, for only three years, to extend its own existence to seven. But, although many attempts have been made to return to triennial parliaments, and a few to bring about annual parliaments, it is unnecessary to add that neither have yet succeeded.

This seems not an unfit occasion to devote some attention to the very important subject of privilege of parliament. Although we do not attach the importance to the etymology and primary signification of words or names as a means of arriving at the knowledge of all which they both denote and connote, that antiquarians and grammarians are apt to do, we think, nevertheless, that these may often be used advantageously as an aid in the prosecution of such an inquiry. We have, in a former Book* explained the primary meaning, or at least the derivation, of the word privilege. According to this view privilege may be considered as being that, as regards two branches of the legislature, the Lords and Commons, which prerogative once was, as regards the third—the King. Now, according to Blackstone, “by the word prerogative we usually understand that special pre-eminence which the king hath over and above all other persons, and out of the ordinary course of the common law, in right of his royal dignity.”† And, again, “Finch lays it down as a maxim, that the prerogative is that law in case of the king which is law in no case of the subject.”‡

* Const. Hist. iii. 349.

Both prerogative and privilege are incidents of sovereignty; consequently, as the monarchical limb of the sovereignty in our constitution has declined in magnitude and power, the prerogatives incidental to it have declined in importance, have become more definite, and more subjected to the laws and the jurisdiction of the courts which are the interpreters and administrators of the laws. While on the other hand, as the democratical limb of the sovereignty has increased in magnitude and power, the privileges incidental to it have had a tendency to increase in importance, to become less definite, and less subjected to the common laws and the jurisdiction of the courts. At the present day the courts of common law may judge of prerogative, while privilege is beyond their jurisdiction. §

We shall now proceed shortly to give the result of some of the leading cases that have occurred on the subject of parliamentary privilege. It will be convenient to consider this subject under the following heads:—

I. Individual or personal privilege.

II. Collective privilege. 1. As against strangers.

2. As against members of the House

I. The first in order of time of the immunities acquired by the House of Commons was the exemption of the members and their servants from arrest on civil process during their session. || But in all the instances of the exercise of this privilege that occur under the Plantagenet dynasty, and up to the middle of the sixteenth century, the House of Commons had never proceeded to deliver such person out of custody by virtue of their own authority; but if the party had been taken in execution, they applied for an act of parliament to enable the chancellor to issue his writ for his release; or if he was confined only on meane process, he was delivered by his writ of privilege, which he was entitled to at common law.* The first case in which the Commons took upon themselves to proceed by their own authority was that of George Ferrers, which occurred in the 34th of Henry VIII. (1543.) The history of the transaction is related by Holingshed, and Mr. Hallam attaches considerable importance to it: † but Mr. Hatsell expresses a supposition that the measures which were adopted, and the doctrine which was then first laid down with respect to the extent of the privileges of the House of Commons, were more owing to Ferrers being a servant of the king than to his being a member of the House of Commons. ‡ And Mr. Hatsell's view is certainly rather supported by the report of the committee in Edward Smalley's case, “that they could find no precedent for setting at large by the mace any person in arrest, but only by writ;” which shows that, if they were aware of Ferrers's case, they did not view it merely in the light of an arrest for debt, but as an insult on the king and the House. § However, their rescinding || the above-mentioned resolution before proceeding to act in Smalley's case would seem to leave the matter pretty much as it would be if no such resolution had been made.

Ferrers's case was this:—Ferrers, a burgess, and “servant to the king,” having been arrested on his way to the House, the Commons sent their serjeant with his mace to the Compter, in Breadstreet, to demand his release: Of what then ensued Holingshed gives the following graphic narration:—“Thereupon the serjeant, as he had in charge, went to the Compter, and declared to the clerks there what he had in commandment; but they, and other officers of the city, were so far from obeying the said commandment, as, after many stout words, they forcibly resisted the said serjeant; whereof ensued a fray within the Compter gates between the said Ferrers and the said officers, not without hurt of either part, so that the said serjeant was driven to defend himself with his mace of arms, and had the crown thereof broken by bearing off a stroke, and his man stricken down. During this brawl the sheriffs of London, called Rowland Hill and H. Suckley, came thither, to whom the serjeant complained of this injury, and required of them the delivery of the said burgess, as afore; but they, bearing with their officers, made little account either of his complaint or of his message, rejecting the same contemptuously, with much proud language, so as the serjeant was forced to return without the prisoner; and, finding the Speaker and all the knights and burgesses set in their places, declared unto them the whole cause as it fell out; who took the same in so ill

* See Vol. ii. p. 169.

† 1 Com. 239.

‡ Ibid.

§ In the case of the Queen v. Paty, reported in Lord Raymond and other reporters (2 Lord Raymond, 1105), Powys, Justice, says, “the meaning of privilege is, that it is a privilege against the courts of law.”

|| One or two of the earlier cases cited by Hatsell seem to imply that the goods of a member should not be taken in execution. These cases are—the case of the Master of the Temple, the case of the Prior of Malton, and Atwill's case.—Hatsell's Precedents, vol. i. chap. 1.

* Hatsell's Precedents, vol. i. chap. 1.

† Const. Hist. i. 364.

‡ Hatsell's Precedents, i. 58.

§ Hatsell, i. 90. Ferrers's case is cited by Mr. Justice Coleridge in his judgment in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, 9 Adolphus and Ellis, 234.

|| Journals, F. 4. 22 and 27 (1576).

part, that they all together (of whom there were not a few as well of the king's privy council as also of his privy chamber) would sit no longer without their burgess, but rose up wholly, and retired to the Upper House, where the whole case was declared, by the mouth of the Speaker, before Sir Thomas Audley, knight, then lord chancellor of England, and all the lords and judges there assembled; who, judging the contempt to be very great, referred the punishment thereof to the order of the Commons' House. They, returning to their places again, upon new debate of the case, took order, that their serjeant should esoon repair to the sheriffs of London, and require delivery of the said burgess, without any writ or warrant had for the same, but only as afore: albeit the lord chancellor offered there to grant a writ, which they of the Commons' House refused, being of a clear opinion that all commandments and other acts proceeding from the nether House were to be done and executed by their serjeant without writ, only by show of his mace, which was his warrant.*

Upon this the Commons compelled the two sheriffs and one of the clerks of the Compter, together with the plaintiff who had sued out the writ against Ferrers, to appear at the bar of their House, and committed them, and the officers also "which did the arrest," to prison; and the king, in the presence of the judges, confirmed this assertion of privilege by the Commons. His majesty's observations on the occasion, as recorded by Hollingshed, are curious and to the following effect:—"First commending their wisdom in maintaining the privileges of the House (which he would not have to be infringed in any point), alleged that he, being head of the parliament, and attending in his own person upon the business thereof, ought in reason to have privilege for him, and all his servants attending there upon him. So that if the said Ferrers had been no burgess, but only his servant, that in respect thereof he was to have the privilege as well as any other. For I understand, quoth he, that you, not only for your own persons, but also for your necessary servants, even to your cooks and housekeepers, enjoy the said privilege, inasmuch as my lord chancellor here present hath informed us, that he being Speaker of the parliament, the cook of the Temple was arrested in London, and in execution upon a statute of the staple; and forasmuch as the said cook, during the parliament, served the Speaker in that office, he was taken out of execution by the privilege of the parliament. And, further, we be informed by our judges, that we at no time stand so highly in our estate royal as in the time of parliament; wherein we as head, and you as members, are conjoined and knit together into one body politic, so as whatsoever offence or injury (during that time) is offered to the meanest member of the House is to be judged as done against our person and the whole court of parliament; which prerogative of the court is so great (as our learned counsel informeth us) as all acts and process coming out of any other inferior courts must for the time cease and give place to the highest. And, touching the party, it was a great presumption in him, knowing our servant to be one of this House, and being warned thereof before, would nevertheless prosecute this matter out of time, and therefore well worthy to have lost his debt, which I would not wish, and therefore do commend your equity, that, having lost the same by law, have restored him to the same against him who was the debtor; and this may be a good example to other, not to attempt anything against the privilege of this court, but to take the time better."—"Whereupon," adds the chronicler, "Sir Edward Montague, then lord chief justice, very gravely declared his opinion, confirming, by divers reasons, all that the king had said, which was assented unto by all the residue, none speaking to the contrary."

In 1575 the Commons repeated the proceeding in Ferrers's case, in the case of Smalley, a member's servant, whom, "after sundry reasons, arguments, and disputations, and after, as we observed above, rescinding* a previous resolution that they could find no precedents for setting at liberty any one in arrest except by writ of privilege, they sent their serjeant to release. The House afterwards finding that Smalley had fraudulently procured this arrest, in order to be discharged of the debt and execution, committed him to the Tower for a month, and until he should pay to William Hewet (his creditor) the sum of 100l."†

In 1584 one Mr. Anthony Kirle, "for that he had served Mr. Stepneth, a member, with a subpoena out of the Star Chamber in parliament time, and within the palace of Westminster," was "committed prisoner to the serjeant's ward and custody," and ordered to pay all Mr. Stepneth's expenses in or about the arrest. After which the said Kirle was brought again to the bar, and, there kneeling upon his knees, Mr. Speaker pronounced unto him the judgment of the House, in the name of the whole House. And on the 16th of February a motion having been made for his release, he was brought to the House, "and, kneeling upon his knees, making very humble submission to the House, and acknowledging his faults, alleging it also to have proceeded of ignorance, and not of wilfulness; and likewise having paid to the serjeant, to Mr. Stepneth's use, the money set down by Mr. Morrice and Mr. Sands (the persons for that purpose appointed by the House) according to the former order of the House," he was discharged, paying his fees, after he had first taken the oath of supremacy.‡

Towards the end of the reign of Elizabeth the House had laid it down as the established law of privilege, "That no subpoena or summons, for the attendance of a member in any other court, ought to be served without leave obtained, or information given to the House; and that the persons who procured and served such process were guilty of a breach of privilege, and were punishable by commitment or otherwise by the order of the House."* But the Commons did not stop here. They afterwards made it a breach of privilege to put them under the necessity of seeking redress at law for any civil injury. Persons were committed to prison for entering on the estates of members, carrying away timber, lopping trees, digging coal, fishing in their waters. Their servants, and even their tenants, claimed the same privilege. "In fact, hardly anything could be done disagreeable to a member, of which he might not inform the House, and cause it to be punished."† Then the act 12 Will. III. c. 3, was passed, whereby the members of both Houses were rendered liable to civil actions during the prorogation or adjournment of parliament for above the space of fourteen days. But they still continued to insist upon the extraordinary immunities which we above alluded to; until the statute 10 Geo. III. c. 50, altogether took away their exemption from legal process, except as regards personal arrest.

* Hallam, Const. Hist. i. 366. This circumstance would seem to have escaped Hatsell.

† Hatsell, i. 90.

‡ Hatsell, i. 97-99.

We conclude our remarks on this branch of privilege with the following passage from a speech delivered by John Pym, on the 7th of November, 1640, which contains a just as well as eloquent exposition of the end and object for which alone this privilege of parliament exists. "The privileges of parliament were not given for the ornament or advantage of those who are the members of parliament; they have a real use and efficacy, towards that which is the end of parliaments: we are free from suits, that we may the more entirely addict ourselves to the public services; we have therefore liberty of speech that our counsels may not be corrupted with fear, or our judgments prevented with false respects. Those three great faculties and functions of parliament, the legislative, judiciary, and consiliary power cannot be well exercised without such privileges as these. The wisdom of our laws, the faithfulness of our counsels, the righteousness of our judgments, can hardly be kept pure and untainted, if they proceed from distracted and restrained minds." Most true. And yet it will of course sometimes happen, that, by a shameful abuse of this privilege, profligate and needy men shall seek the walls of parliament as a place of sanctuary in which they may entirely evade the liquidation of their just debts, and from which they may insult with impunity their unfortunate creditors. The elevation of the electoral body, however, by the spread of intelligence, and the removal, as far as possible, of all corrupting influences, furnishes the proper corrective of this evil.

II. 1. Under the second class of privileges, those claimed by either House of Parliament collectively, two of the most remarkable cases, viz., the case of the Kentish Petition and that of Ashby

v. White, have already been noticed at some length in a preceding chapter.* Under this head comes the power, at one time claimed and acted upon, of animadverting upon and punishing political offences. One of the flagrant cases of this sort was that of Floyd, whom, for some slighting words about the elector palatine and his wife, daughter of James I., the Lords, having withdrawn the case from the jurisdiction of the Commons to their own, punished in the most outrageous and revolting manner.† In the reign of George I. the Commons committed Mist, the printer of a newspaper called "Mist's Journal," to Newgate, for a political libel, in no way concerning them or their privileges, and addressed the king that the authors and publishers of the libel might be prosecuted.

To this head of collective privilege is to be referred their power to try all cases of elections of their own members. In the reign of Elizabeth the Commons asserted, "perhaps," observes Mr. Hallam,‡ "for the first time," the right of determining all matters relative to their own elections. Such questions had in former times been decided in chancery, from which the writ issued, and into which the return was made. Mr. Hallam notices a remarkable entry in the Journals in the first year of the reign of Mary. A committee is appointed "to inquire if Alexander Nowell, prebendary of Westminster, may be of the House;" and it is declared next day by them, that "Alexander Nowell, being prebendary in Westminster, and thereby having voice in the convocation house, cannot be a member of this House; and so agreed by the House, and the queen's writ to be directed for another burgess in his place." Again, in 1586, the House appointed a committee to examine the state and circumstances of the returns for the county of Norfolk. The chancellor had issued a second writ for this county, on the ground of some informality in the first return, and a different person had been elected. The Commons having taken notice of this, and in consequence her majesty's displeasure having been signified to them that "the House had been troubled with a thing impertinent for them to deal with, and only belonging to the charge and office of the lord chancellor," the House, notwithstanding, proceeded to nominate a committee to examine into and report the circumstances of these returns. They reported that those elected on the first writ should take their seats, and, further, that they understood the chancellor and some of the judges to be of the same opinion; but that "they had not thought it proper to inquire of the chancellor what he had done, because they thought it prejudicial to the privilege of the House to have the same determined by others than such as were members thereof. And though they thought very reverently of the said lord chancellor and judges, and knew them to be competent judges in their

* Hatsell, i. 120.

† Hallam, Const. Hist. iii. 360, note.

* See ante, pp. 122, 158, 177.

† See Vol. iii. p. 84.

‡ Const. Hist. i. 373.

places, yet in this case they took them not for judges in parliament in this House; and, therefore, required that the members, if it were so thought good, might take their oaths and be allowed of by force of the first writ, as allowed by the custom of this House, and not as allowed of by the said lord chancellor and judges. Which was agreed unto by the whole House." "This judicial control over their elections," observes Mr. Hallam, "was not lost. A committee was appointed in the session of 1589, to examine into sundry abuses of returns, among which is enumerated that some are returned for new places. And several instances of the House's deciding on elections occur in subsequent parliaments."

The House's sensitive concern about the assertion of their dignity in small matters is indicative too of that state of mind which is observable both in individuals and in bodies of individuals, or nations, when they have attained that stage in their progress when they are emerging from a comparatively dependent and powerless into a more independent and powerful position, but before they feel themselves quite secure and at ease in that position. Of this nature were their complaint to the Lords in 1597, that they had received a message from the Commons at their bar without uncovering, or rising from their places; their remonstrance against having amendments to bills sent down to them on paper instead of parchment; and their indignation when Sir Robert Cecil, in 1601, proposed that the speaker should attend the lord-keeper about some matter.†

2. In regard to the power of punishing offences committed by any of the members themselves, Arthur Hall's case is usually regarded as the earliest precedent; but Mr. Hallam mentions two cases before that, viz., the case of Stone in the reign of Edward VI., and that of Copley in the reign of Mary. Arthur Hall's‡ case is thus given in Hatsell:—"On the 4th of February, 1580, Mr. Norton complains of a book 'not only as reproaching some particular good members of the House, but also very much slanderous and derogatory to the general authority, power, and state of this House, and prejudicial to the validity of its proceedings in making and establishing of laws.' And, it appearing to the House that Mr. Hall, a member, was the procurer that the said book was printed and published, he is ordered immediately to be apprehended by the serjeant-at-arms, assisted by Sir Thomas Scott and Sir Thomas Browne: and a committee is appointed to send for the printer and examine him. On the 6th of February this committee made a report, and, Mr. Hall and the printer being brought to the bar, and further examination had, Mr. Hall is committed to the custody of the serjeant, and other committees are added to the former committee to inquire further into this matter. On the 14th of February Mr. Vice-Chamberlain reports what had appeared

* Const. Hist. i. 375.

† D'Eves.

‡ Hall was the master of Smalley mentioned above.

to the committee; when Mr. Hall being again brought to the bar, he submitted himself to the House, and asked pardon: and, being withdrawn, 'sundry motions and arguments were had, touching the quality and nature of his faults, and of some proportionable forms of punishment for the same, as, imprisonment, fine, banishment from the fellowship of this House, and an utter condemnation and retraction of the book.' But at last it was resolved, without one negative voice, 'that he should be committed to prison;' and, upon another question, 'that he should be committed to the prison of the Tower, as the prison proper to the House.' And it was further resolved, 'that he should remain in the said prison for six months, and until he should make retraction of the book, to the satisfaction of the House; that he should pay a fine to the queen of five hundred marks; and that he should be presently severed and cut off from being a member of this House any more during the continuance of this present parliament: and a new writ is ordered in the room of Mr. Hall, 'so as before disabled to be any longer a member of this House.' And, Mr. Hall being brought to the bar, Mr. Speaker pronounces this judgment against him. After which, the course and form of these proceedings and judgment of the House are ordered to be digested and set down in due form, and entered by the clerk, as other orders and proceedings are; which was done accordingly. The offences which drew upon Mr. Hall this very extraordinary punishment are recited at large in the journal, and were certainly a very high and dangerous contempt of the authority of the House: he had been before charged before the privy council for the same crime; and it appears from the names of the committees, that the most considerable members of the House, lawyers and others, were appointed to examine into and conduct this matter; and yet, I should suspect, from the number of punishments which were heaped upon him, 'expulsion, fine, and imprisonment,' that there was some private history in this affair—some particular offence against the queen, with which we are not acquainted; for neither Prynne nor the compilers of the Parliamentary History do, as I can find, mention a single syllable of this very new and extraordinary proceeding. On the 18th of March, being the last day of the session, Mr. Hall having not then made any revocation or retraction of the errors, slanders, and untruths contained in his book, the House appoint several members of the House, the most considerable in rank, to receive such revocation, when he shall please to make it, to be by them reported to the House in the next session; but the House does not shorten the time of his commitment, or remit any part of the judgment pronounced against him. This parliament being afterwards dissolved, we find nothing more of this matter in the Journal. But some years after, on the 21st of November, 1586, Mr. Markham, member for Grantham, acquaints the House, on the part of the inhabitants of that borough, 'that Mr. Arthur Hall, having been in some former parliaments returned a Burgess for the said borough, and in some of those parliaments disabled for ever afterwards to be any member of the House at all, hath of late brought a writ for his wages (amongst other times) for his attendance at the late session of parliament, holden at Westminster, in the twenty-seventh year of the queen, during which time he did not serve in the House, but was, for some causes, disabled to be a member. This matter was referred to a committee, who, on the 21st of March, report at large a state of the facts; 'that Mr. Hall had commenced suits for his wages, as one of the burgesses of the parliament in the thirteenth, fourteenth, eighteenth, and twenty-third years of the Queen (not in the twenty-seventh), but that the committee having desired him to remit the said wages which he had demanded of the said borough, Mr. Hall had very freely and frankly remitted the same.'"^{*}

We have given this case at the greater length, as it may be and is considered the leading case as regards the power of the House of Commons over its own members. In this case of Arthur Hall, the House inflicted the threefold penalty of imprisonment, fine, and expulsion. The right of imprisoning any of their members for misconduct in the House or relating to it was thenceforth understood to belong to them. The right of imposing a fine they asserted rarely, that of expulsion frequently. This privilege was stretched beyond its legitimate bounds against Sir Richard Steele, who was expelled the House for writing the "Crisis," a pamphlet reflecting on the ministry.† Upon this proceeding Walpole make the following just remark:—"The liberty of the press is unrestrained; how, then, shall a part of the legislature dare to punish that as a crime, which is not declared to be so by any law framed by the whole?" Some attempts have even been made to carry this farther, by declaring the party incapable of sitting in parliament.

In the preceding Book we have given an account of the important privilege claimed and established by the Commons of their exclusive right respecting money bills.‡ The principles deduced by Hatsell, as the result of the precedents he has collected are—1. That, in bills of supply, the Lords can make no alteration but to correct verbal mistakes. 2. That in bills, not strictly of supply, yet imposing burdens, as turnpike acts, &c., the Lords cannot alter the amount of the toll, the persons to manage it, &c.; but in other clauses they may make amendments. 3. That, where a charge may indirectly be thrown on the people by a bill, the Commons object to the Lords making amendments. 4. That the Lords cannot insert pecuniary penalties in a bill, or alter those inserted by the Commons.§

There are several technical niceties to be observed as to the form of bringing forward a motion

having for its object a vote of money, which, as a departure from them, is at once fatal to such motion, it may be convenient to notice briefly in this place. On the 11th of December, 1706, it was resolved, "That this House will receive no petition for any sum of money, relating to public service, but what is recommended from the crown." On the 11th of June, 1713, this was declared to be a standing order.* "From this time whenever any petition which desires relief by public money is offered, or any motion is made to this purpose, before the speaker puts the question for bringing up the petition, it has been the practice, in conformity to this order, that the recommendation of the crown should be signified by some member authorised so to do: and if the chancellor of the exchequer, or person usually authorised by the crown, declines to signify this recommendation, the House cannot properly receive the petition."†

But in cases in which the House has addressed the king to give directions that an account may be taken of damages sustained by any parties, for compensating which they assure his majesty that they will make provision, the report having been made, the account having been taken, in conformity with the said directions of his majesty, the laying of the said report on the table of the House amounts to an authorised message from the crown, that the crown recommends the same to their consideration. All that then remains is, for it to be referred to the committee of supply to vote the amount specified in the report.‡

In 1695 the law of treason was placed on a new footing by the statute 7 Will. III. c. 3, entitled "An Act for Regulating of Trials in cases of Treason and Misprision of Treason." The 1st section of the statute provides that all persons indicted for high treason shall have a copy of the indictment five days before trial, on paying for the same [this period was extended to ten days by 7 Anne, c. 21, § 11, see below], and shall be admitted to make their defence by counsel, and to produce witnesses on oath; the court being authorised to assign counsel. By section 2, no person is to be tried for high treason but on the oath of two lawful witnesses, "either both of them to the same overt act, or one of them to one, and the other of them to another overt act of the same treason; unless the party indicted, and arraigned, or tried, shall willingly, without violence, in open court, confess the same, or shall stand mute, or refuse to plead, or in cases of high treason shall peremptorily challenge above the number of thirty-five of the jury." And by section 4, one witness to one treason, and another to another, were not to be deemed two witnesses. By section 5, no person was to be indicted for treason

* Hatsell's Precedents, vol. iii. p. 149. "The uniform practice of the House has applied this order, not only to petitions for public money, or money relating to public service, but to all motions whatsoever for grants of money, whether the grounds of such applications have been public or private."—Hatsell, iii. 173.

† Hatsell, iii. 214.

‡ Hatsell, iii. 174.

† Hatsell, i. 93, 94, 95.

‡ See ante, p. 283.

§ See Vol. III. p. 841.

§ Hatsell's Precedents, iii. 138.

unless within three years after the offence. By section 7, all persons tried are to have copies of the panel of the jurors who are to try them, two days at the least before the trial; and to have "the like process of the court where they shall be tried, to compel their witnesses to appear for them at any such trial or trials, as is usually granted to compel witnesses to appear against them." By section 8, "No evidence shall be admitted or given of any overt act that is not expressly laid in the indictment."

By the 14th section of statute 7 Anne, c. 21, "An act for improving the union of the two kingdoms," it is enacted that after the decease of the Pretender, and at the end of three years after the immediate succession to the crown, upon the demise of her majesty, shall take effect, as the same is limited by the act 1 Will. and Mary, sess. 2, c. 2, and by the act 12 Will. III. c. 2, when any person is indicted for high treason, or misprision of treason, a list of the witnesses that shall be produced on the trial for proving the said indictment, and of the jury, mentioning the names, profession, and place of abode of the said witnesses and jurors, shall be also given at the same time that the copy of the indictment is delivered to the party indicted; and that copies of all indictments for the offences aforesaid, with such lists, shall be delivered to the party indicted ten days before the trial, and in presence of two or more credible witnesses; any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding."

"The subtlety of crown lawyers," says Mr. Hallam, "in drawing indictments for treason, and the willingness of judges to favour such prosecutions, have considerably eluded the chief difficulties which the several statutes appear to throw in their way. The government has at least had no reason to complain that the construction of those enactments has been too rigid. The overt acts laid in the indictment are expressed so generally that they give sometimes little insight into the particular circumstances to be adduced in evidence; and, though the act of William is positive that no evidence shall be given of any overt act not laid in the indictment, it has been held allowable, and is become the constant practice, to bring forward such evidence, not as substantive charges, but on the pretence of its tending to prove certain other acts specially alleged. The disposition to extend a constructive interpretation to the statute of Edward III. has continued to increase, and was carried, especially by Chief Justice Eyre, in the trials of 1794, to a length at which we lose sight altogether of the plain meaning of words, and apparently much beyond what Pemberton or even Jefferies had reached. In the vast mass of circumstantial testimony which our modern trials for high treason display, it is sometimes difficult to discern whether the great principle of our law, requiring two witnesses to overt acts, has been adhered to; for certainly it is not adhered to, unless such witnesses depose to acts of the prisoner from which an inference of his guilt is immediately deducible."*

We have already shown that, by the Bill of Rights, the crown was settled upon, or, in the language of lawyers, limited to William and Mary for their joint lives; after their decease, to the heirs of the body of Mary; and, for default of such issue, to the Princess Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; and, for default of such issue, to the heirs of the body of William. In the year 1700 a second act of settlement was passed, by which a further limitation of the crown was made to the Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess-dowager of Hanover, and the heirs of her body being Protestants. This act is the stat. 12 and 13 Will. III. c. 2, and is intitled "An act for the further limitation of the crown, and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject." As it is that under which the present royal family hold the crown of these realms, we shall give its provisions in some detail. The act, after reciting as much of the 1 Will. and Mary, sess. 2, c. 2 (the Bill of Rights), as relates to the settlement of the crown, and lamenting the disappointment of the hopes of his majesty's "good people" by the deaths of Queen Mary and Duke of Gloucester, proceeds to enact "That the most excellent Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess-dowager of Hanover, daughter of the most excellent Princess Elizabeth, late Queen of Bohemia, daughter of our late sovereign lord King James the First, of happy memory, be and is hereby declared to be the next in succession, in the Protestant line, to the imperial crown and dignity of the said realms of England, France, and Ireland, with the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, after his majesty and the Princess Anne of Denmark, and for default of issue of the said Princess Anne, and of his majesty respectively; and that from and after the deceases of his said majesty, our now sovereign lord, and of her royal highness the Princess Anne of Denmark, and for default of issue of the said Princess Anne, and of his majesty respectively, the crown and regal government of the said kingdoms of England, France, and Ireland, and of the dominions thereunto belonging, with the royal state and dignity of the said realms, and all honours, styles, titles, regalities, prerogatives, powers, jurisdictions, and authorities, to the same belonging and appertaining, shall be, remain, and continue to the said most excellent Princess Sophia, and the heirs of her body, being Protestants."

By the 2nd section it is provided "That all and every person and persons who shall or may take or inherit the said crown, by virtue of the limitation of this present act, and is, are, or shall be reconciled to, or shall hold communion with the see or church of Rome, or shall profess the popish religion, or shall marry a papist, shall be subject to such incapacities, as in such case or cases are by the said recited act provided, enacted, and established; and that every king and queen of this realm, who shall come to and succeed in the imperial crown of this kingdom by virtue of this act, shall have the coronation oath administered to him, her, or them, at their respective coronations, according to the act of parliament made in the first year of the reign of his majesty and the said late Queen Mary, entitled "An act for establishing the coronation oath," and shall make, subscribe, and repeat the declaration in the act first above recited, mentioned, or referred to in the manner and form thereby prescribed."

* Const. Hist., iii. 224.

By section 3rd, with a view to the further securing "our religion, laws, and liberties, from and after the death of his majesty and the Princess Anne of Denmark, and in default of issue of the body of the said princess and of his majesty respectively," it is enacted,

1. "That whosoever shall hereafter come to the possession of this crown shall join in communion with the church of England as by law established ;

2. "That in case the crown and imperial dignity of this realm shall hereafter come to any person not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories which do not belong to the crown of England, without the consent of parliament ;

3. "That no person who shall hereafter come to the possession of this crown shall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without consent of parliament ;*

4. "That, from and after the time that the further limitation by this act shall take effect, all matters and things relating to the well governing of this kingdom, which are properly cognisable in the privy council by the laws and customs of this realm, shall be transacted there, and all resolutions taken thereupon shall be signed by such of the privy council as shall advise and consent to the same ;†

5. "That after the said limitation shall take effect, as aforesaid, no person born out of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging (although he be naturalised or made a denizen, except such as are born of English parents) shall be capable to be of the privy council, or a member of either house of parliament, or to enjoy any office or place of trust, either civil or military, or to have any grant of lands, tenements, or hereditaments from the crown, to himself or to any other or others in trust for him ;

6. "That no person who has an office or place of profit under the king, or receives a pension from the crown, shall be capable of serving as a member of the House of Commons ;§

7. "That after the said limitation shall take effect as aforesaid, judges' commissions be made quamvis se bene gesserint, and their salaries ascertained and established ; but upon the address of both houses of parliament it may be lawful to remove them ;

8. "That no pardon under the great seal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in parliament."

The fourth of the above recited articles, being occasioned by the alteration wrought in the working of the machinery of the executive government by the practical substitution of the cabinet council for the privy council, leads us to give some account of the changes which had taken place in the king's council since we last treated of it. We have already described the original composition of the king's council, or curia regis.* We have traced the changes gradually undergone by this body through successive ages ; showing that first a large portion of its judicial functions was separated from it, and constituted the several courts of judicature ; that then its legislative functions were withdrawn, and formed the parliament ; while what remained, namely, the administrative functions, were exercised by it, under the name of the king's ordinary or privy council. "The number of privy councillors," says Sir Edward Coke, "is at the king's will ; but of ancient time there were twelve or thereabouts."† However this might be, it is certain that, in process of time, the privy council increased to so large a number that it was found inconvenient for secrecy and dispatch. Hence it naturally happened that some members of the body, more in the confidence of the king than the rest, should form a sort of concilium in concilio,—a sort of smaller, inner, more privy council. Mr. Hallam says, "The name of a cabinet council, as distinguished from the larger body, may be found as far back as the reign of Charles I."‡ In the reign of Charles II. it became usual for the ministry to obtain the king's final approbation of their measures before they were laid, for form's sake, before the council. This distinction between the cabinet and the privy council, having become more fully established during the reign of William, produced a difficulty as to the responsibility of the advisers of the crown ; the cabinet having no legal existence, its members, in fact, being only responsible as privy councillors, a responsibility which they share with their adversaries, and which therefore amounts to nothing. Thus, in the case of a treaty which the House of Commons should deem mischievous and dishonourable, the chancellor, setting the great seal to it, might be the only minister who could be fixed with responsibility. To obviate this difficulty the above clause was inserted in the act of settlement. But, for what reasons does not appear, it was repealed only four years after.§ Mr. Hallam says, "Whether it were that real objections were found to stand in the way of this article, or that ministers shrunk

* Repealed by 1 Geo. I. stat. 2, c. 51.

† Repealed by 4 Anne, c. 8, § 24.

‡ This clause extends not to persons naturalised at or before the accession of Geo. I. to the crown.

§ Repealed by 4 Anne, c. 8, § 28.

* See particularly vol. I. p. 567, et seq.

† Inst. 43.

‡ Const. Hist. iii. 249.

§ 4 Anne, c. 8, § 24.

back from so definite a responsibility, they procured its repeal a very few years afterwards.”*

“In a note, at page 227 of the first volume of his Constitutional Code, Mr. Bentham states, on good authority, that about the time of the Earl of Shelburne’s administration (1782) there were in the cabinet three grades of power, distinguished by appropriate denominations: the cabinet simply, the cabinet with the circulation, and the cabinet with the circulation and the post-office. By the circulation was meant the privilege of a key to the box in which the foreign dispatches, with or without other documents of the day, went their round: by the post-office, the power of ordering the letters of individuals to be opened at the post-office. Such was the information given by a minister to Mr. Bentham. How the matter stands at present, he adds, he cannot say.”†

The plans of government are discussed and determined in the cabinet council; but orders and proclamations still issue, at least nominally, from the privy council, though it is generally understood that no councillor is to attend unless summoned. And in fact the office of privy councillor, as distinct from cabinet minister, is now little if anything more than a titular distinction, conferring the title of right honourable upon the bearer of it. Although the council, whether privy or cabinet, has no longer any legislative power, some of the more important of its functions partake more of the legislative than the administrative character. Thus, when a legislative measure of importance is about to be brought before parliament by the government, it is discussed beforehand most minutely in the cabinet. In regard to legislative measures grounded on the report of commissions of inquiry, the following course has sometimes been pursued. The report of the commissioners has been sent in parts, as it was written, to the cabinet, where the measure was then discussed, and a bill prepared in order that it might be submitted to the House soon after the laying of the commissioners’ report upon the table.

We may here mention, as connected with this subject, another innovation of modern times,—the name, and in some measure the office, of prime minister. We make an extract on this subject from the work already quoted:—

“The term premier, prime minister, or first minister, appears to have been borrowed from the French late in the seventeenth century. Lord Clarendon has the following remark on the term:—‘First minister,—a title so newly translated out of French into English, that it is was not enough understood to be liked, and every man would detest it for the burden it was attended with.’‡ yet the functions of chief minister belonged to no one in particular by virtue of his office. Sometimes the officer who exercised the chief authority might be the lord chancellor, sometimes the lord steward, sometimes the lord treasurer. As the judicial duties of the chancellor became more complicated, weighty, and important, and the others began to be confined to occasions of state ceremony, the importance of the lord treasurer as an administrative functionary increased, particularly after the time of lord treasurer Burleigh, who might be considered as long filling the place of Elizabeth’s chief minister. However, for some time after, it by no means followed that the office of lord treasurer necessarily implied that of prime minister, as in these days that of first lord of the treasury, though, as it were, only a portion or limb of the lord high treasurer, is understood to do; for example, Charles the First’s principal ministers were Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Wentworth, the Earl of Strafford, lord deputy, and afterwards lord-lieutenant of Ireland.”*

“After the abolition of the office of chief justice, although probably there was never a time when some one of the great officers about the king did not hold and exercise more power than the others,

The minutes of a speech of Lord Somers on the bill for abolishing the privy council of Scotland† convey an idea of the privy council as it now exists, or at least existed before it was quite superseded by the cabinet council, which, as emanating from so eminent an authority, deserves attention. According to Lord Somers, “The privy council is not a constitution of state and policy, but, in effect, a sovereign court of justice to see the laws effectually executed, and for preservation of the public peace.” What his lordship meant by these words, even when taken with what follows them in the same place, is not very easy to see. But the commentary we should be inclined to put upon them is this—that the privy council being identical with that branch of the English constitution which is represented by the crown, when the crown is absolute or almost so, as in the time of the Tudors, the privy council would be a very arbitrary, tyrannical power, partaking of, or rather wielding at once, all the three functions of sovereignty, the judicial, legislative, and administrative. But when the power of the monarchy is limited, the privy council will be, what it became after Charles I.’s time, limited in its authority also, and exercising only certain judicial and administrative functions, and those strictly guarded and limited by law, or by a power greater than itself, or, in other words, greater than that of the branch of the sovereignty which it represents, the monarchical—namely, by the actual sovereign; that is, the three branches conjoined. Yet that the modern representative of the privy council, namely, the cabinet, exercises some quasi legislative functions, appears, as we before remarked, from the mode pursued in bringing forward certain important legislative measures which the government approve of and introduce.

The sixth article of the act for the farther limit-

* Const. Hist. iii. 253.

† British and Foreign Review, 30^l. vi. p. 310.

‡ Life, ii. 89.

* British and Foreign Review, vol. vi. p. 241.

† See ante, p. 211, note.

of the crown, by which persons holding offices of profit under the king, or receiving a pension from the crown, are declared incapable of serving as members of the House of Commons, deserves some notice. The formation of a new board, in 1694, for managing the stamp duties, the members of which were incapacitated from sitting in parliament, is believed by Mr. Hallam* to be the first instance of exclusion on account of employment.† There is not to be found anything to that effect in the act in question. But the exclusion is effected by the operation of a clause of a previous act.‡

In 1699 a clause was passed incapacitating the commissioners, comptrollers, auditors, and other officers of excise from sitting in parliament.§ But the above recited clause in the act of settlement excludes all pail servants of the crown, without exception, from the highest minister of state to the lowest doorkeeper or messenger. If the clause had been strictly enforced there would have been a complete separation between the legislative and executive departments of our government. According to Mr. Hallam one or other of the following results must have been the consequence: "Such a separation and want of intelligence between the crown and parliament must either have destroyed the one or degraded the other. The House of Commons would either, in jealousy and passion, have armed the strength of the people to subvert the monarchy, or, losing that effective control over the appointment of ministers, which has sometimes gone near to their nomination, would have fallen almost into the condition of those states-general of ancient kingdoms which have met only to be cajoled into subsidies, and give a passive consent to the propositions of the court."¶

But this sweepingly exclusive clause was repealed by the act 4 Anne, c. 8, § 25. And by the act 6 Anne, c. 7, § 25, it was enacted "That no person, who should have in his own name, or in the name of any person or persons in trust for him or for his benefit, any new office or place of profit whatsoever under the crown, which at any time since the five and twentieth day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and five, have been created or erected, or hereafter shall be created or erected, nor any person who shall be a commissioner or sub-commissioner of prizes, secretary or receiver of the prizes, nor any comptroller of the accounts of the army, nor any commissioner of transports, nor any commissioner of the sick and wounded, nor any agent for any regiment, nor any commissioner for any wine licenses, nor any governor or deputy governor of any of the plantations, nor any commissioner of the navy employed in any of the outputs, nor any person having any pension from the crown during pleasure, shall be capable of being elected, or of sitting or voting, as a member of the House of Commons in any parliament which shall be hereafter summoned and holden."—And by the 26th section of the same statute it was provided "That if any person, being chosen a member of the House of Commons, shall accept of any office of profit from the crown during such time as he shall continue a member, his election shall be, and is hereby declared to be void, and a new writ shall issue for a new election, as if such person so accepting was naturally dead. Provided nevertheless that such person shall be capable of being again elected, as if his place had not become void as aforesaid."—And by the 27th section it was provided, "That in order to prevent, for the future, too great a number of commissioners to be appointed or constituted for the executing of an office, no greater number of commissioners shall be made or constituted for the execution of any office than have been employed in the execution of such respective office at some time before the first day of this present parliament."

The seventh clause in the Act of Settlement effected a most important and beneficial alteration in the commissions of the judges, which is sometimes ignorantly attributed to George III. The judges' commissions having formerly been made durante placito, it had been the practice, especially in the latter years of the Stuart dynasty, to dismiss those judges who showed any independent will of their own in political prosecutions, and this system had of course a strong tendency to destroy all independence and integrity of character in the judges and thus to defeat the very end for which judges existed, the pure administration of justice. That institution, to which from the time of Henry II. "we have owed," to borrow the apt and elegant language of Mr. Hallam, "the uniformity of our common law, which would otherwise have been split, like that of France, into a multitude of local customs; and to which we still owe the assurance, which is felt by the poorest and most remote inhabitant of England, that his right is weighed by the same incorrupt and acute understanding, upon which the decision of the highest questions is reposed," would have remained lamentably imperfect without the reform introduced by this clause, which made the judges' places be held during life or good behaviour, and not at the discretion of the crown.† So that now a judge cannot be removed from his office, but upon the address of both Houses of parliament. The commission of William's judges ran quam diu se bene gesserint. "But the king," observes Mr. Hallam, "gave an unfortunate instance of his very injudicious tenacity of bad prerogatives, in refusing his assent, in 1692, to a bill that had passed

* Const. Hist., iii. 880.

† 8 & 6 Will. & Mary, c. 21. Mr. Hallam cites it erroneously as the 4 & 5 Will. & Mary, c. 21.

‡ 5 Will. & Mary, c. 7, § 29.

§ 11 Will. III. c. 2, § 149.

¶ Const. Hist., iii. 257.

 Middle Ages, ii. 463.

† By the 1 Geo. III. c. 23, the judges are continued in their offices during their good behaviour, notwithstanding any demise of the crown, which was formerly held immediately to vacate their seats. This probably gave rise to the notion alluded to above, that we owe this provision of the Act of Settlement to George III.

both Houses, for establishing this independence of the judges by law and confirming their salaries."* This and one or two other proceedings of an analogous description form the spots upon William's character, one nevertheless of the brightest and greatest in the long list of England's kings. And this is not so small a praise as might be supposed from the vulgar notions which are apt to be taken up respecting kings in general. If we examine the roll of English kings from William the Conqueror downward, we shall find them considerably above the herd of mankind, not only in high position but in the qualities which enable men to retain that position. Indeed all of them (of the earlier ones at least) who had not those qualities were thrown from their seat, and the reins of government were seized by stronger and more dexterous hands. This is apparent in the earlier times and in the later. The sceptre which a Richard Plantagenet and a Charles Stuart could not wield was wrenched from their feeble grasp, and wielded by the iron hand of a Bolingbroke and a Cromwell. But the case was altered by the Revolution. The path of the English king was thenceforth marked out by the bounds and landmarks of the English law, which seemed to say to him, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther." As there were no longer the same dangers to beset a feeble or vicious prince, so there was no longer the same scope for the exercise of the talents and virtues of one of an opposite character. Any one who has read with ordinary attention the narrative of the civil and military transactions of William's reign contained in a preceding chapter will, we think, unless in a more than ordinary degree warped by party or religious prejudice, readily admit to the full the truth of the observation of Mr. Hallam, that "it must ever be an honour to the English crown that it has been worn by so great a man."† There is a quiet, simple, thoroughly unostentatious greatness about him, attended with a spirit of toleration and justice, in which we know no one that ever occupied the English throne that can be compared to him, save Cromwell. We say this upon the whole view of his character. Some of the earlier Normans may have excelled him in talents for war, and in some of the talents for administration others (for instance Elizabeth) may have excelled him. But if we take the whole together—the character at once firm, just, humane, and tolerant—the laborious, simple habits—the sound understanding, the calm temper, the combination of virtues and of talents, the capacity at once for the "arts of war and peace," we think we may safely say that we shall not easily "look upon his like again." Mr. Hallam has happily hit off, as it appears to us, the whole rationale of his position in the following few words:—"He was, in truth, too great, not for the times wherein he was called to action, but for the peculiar condition of a king of England after the Revolution."‡

In 1705 was passed an act (4 Ann. c. 8, intituled "An act for the better security of her majesty's person and government, and of the succession to the crown of England in the Protestant line;" this was re-enacted, with such alterations as were rendered necessary in consequence of the union with Scotland), by 6 Anne, c. 7, intituled "An act for the security of her majesty's person and government, and of the succession to the crown of Great Britain in the Protestant line;" and, by that act, all persons maliciously, by writing or printing, maintaining the queen not to be lawful queen, or that the pretended Prince of Wales or any other person had any right to the crown, were declared guilty of high treason. Preachers and others maintaining this were to incur the penalty of premunire. Parliament was not to be dissolved by the queen's death, but to continue for six months, unless sooner prorogued or dissolved by the person to whom the crown should come. And parliament, if in being at the time, was to meet immediately after the queen's death: and in case there should be no parliament in being, then the last preceding was to meet. The privy council was not to be dissolved by the queen's death; nor were the places of the great officers, nor any offices civil or military to become void, but their holders to continue for six months, unless sooner removed by the successor to the crown. On the queen's death the privy council were to cause the next protestant successor to be proclaimed, on pain of high treason. In case the successor should be out of the realm at the time of the queen's death, seven officers therein named, that is to say, the archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor or lord keeper, the lord high treasurer, the lord president of the council, the lord privy seal, the lord high admiral, and the lord chief justice of the Queen's Bench, at that time being, were appointed to be lords justices of Great Britain. The successor was empowered, at any time during her majesty's life, by three instruments under her or his hand and seal, to nominate and appoint such and so many persons, being natural born subjects of the realm of Great Britain, as she or he should think fit, to be added to the seven officers before named, to be lords justices as aforesaid. The lords justices were not to dissolve the parliament without express direction from the successor, nor repeal or alter 13 and 14 Car. II. c. 4, nor an act made in Scotland, intituled "An act for securing the protestant religion and presbyterian church government." The lords justices were to take the oaths mentioned in the act 1 Will. and Mary, sess. 1. c. 8, and also the oath therein after enacted to be taken after the demise of her majesty without issue. If after the death of her majesty without issue, and before the arrival of any succeeding queen or king in Great Britain, any parliament should be called by the lords justices, by writs tested in their names, such parliament should not be dissolved by the arrival of such successor, but should proceed after such arrival without any new summons.

* Const. Hist. iii. 262.

† Id. 200.

‡ Id. 200.

The substance of the chief provisions of the Act of Union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland (5 Anne, c. 8.) has been so fully stated in a preceding chapter,* that it does not seem necessary here to say any more on the subject.

During this period the benefit of clergy underwent considerable alteration, to understand which, it will be necessary to refer backwards. When we last mentioned benefit of clergy we stated that by statute 4 Hen. VII. c. 13, laymen were allowed their clergy only once; and in order to distinguish their persons, all laymen who never allowed this privilege were to be burnt with a red-hot iron in the brawn of the left thumb; and by stat. 12 Hen. VII. c. 7, benefit of clergy was taken away from any lay person premeditatedly murdering his lord, master, or sovereign immediate. The distinction between learned laymen and real clerks in orders was abolished for a time by the statutes 28 Hen. VIII. c. 1. and 32 Hen. VIII. c. 3, but is held to have been virtually restored by statute 1 Edw. VI. c. 12, which also enacts that lords of parliament and peers of the realm may have the benefit of their peerage, equivalent to that of clergy, for the first offence (although they cannot read, and without being burnt in the hand), for all offences then clergyable to commoners, and also for the crimes of housebreaking, highway robbery, horse-stealing, and robbing of churches. The operation of the abuses of benefit of clergy is well described in the following passage by Sir William Blackstone:—

“After this burning the laity, and before it the real clergy, were discharged from the sentence of the law in the king’s courts, and delivered over to the ordinary to be dealt with according to the ecclesiastical canons. Whereupon the ordinary, not satisfied with the proofs adduced in the profane secular court, set himself formally to work to make a purgation of the offender by a new canonical trial; although he had been previously convicted by his country, or perhaps by his own confession. This trial was held before the bishop in person or his deputy, and by a jury of twelve clerks: and there, first, the party himself was required to make oath of his own innocence; next, there was to be the oath of twelve compurgators, who swore they believed he spoke the truth; then witnesses were to be examined upon oath, but on behalf of the prisoner only; and, lastly, the jury were to bring in their verdict upon oath, which usually acquitted the prisoner; otherwise, if a clerk, he was degraded, or put to penance. A learned judge, in the beginning of the last century,† remarks with much indignation the vast complication of perjury and subornation of perjury, in this solemn farce of a mock trial; the witnesses, the compurgators, and the jury, being all of them partakers in the guilt: the delinquent party, also, though convicted before on the clearest evidence, and conscious of his own offence, yet was permitted and almost compelled to swear himself not guilty; nor was the good bishop himself, under whose countenance this scene of wickedness was daily transacted, by any means exempt from a share of it. And yet by this purgation the party was restored to his credit, his liberty, his lands, and his capacity of purchasing afresh, and was entirely made a new and an innocent man.”‡

To remedy these abuses, it was enacted by the statute 18 Eliz. c. 7, that, after the offender had been allowed his clergy, he should not be delivered to the ordinary as formerly, but, upon such allowance and burning in the hand, he should forthwith be let out of prison, with proviso that the judge might, if he thought fit, continue the offender in gaol for any time not exceeding a year. “And thus,” says Blackstone, “the law continued, for above a century, unaltered; except only that the statute 21 Jac. I. c. 6, allowed that women convicted of simple larcenies, under the value of ten shillings, should (not properly have the benefit of clergy, for they were not called upon to read, but) be burned in the hand, and whipped, stocked, or imprisoned, for any time not exceeding a year. And a similar indulgence, by the statutes 3 and 4 Will. and Mary c. 9. and 4 and 5 Will. and Mary c. 24, was extended to women, guilty of any clergyable felony whatsoever; who were allowed once to claim the benefit of the statute, in like manner as men might claim the benefit of clergy, and to be discharged upon being burned in the hand, and imprisoned for any time not exceeding a year. All women, all peers, and all male commoners who could read were therefore discharged in such felonies; absolutely, if clerks in orders; and for the first offence, upon burning in the hand, if lay; yet all liable (excepting peers) if the judge saw occasion, to imprisonment not exceeding a year; and those men, who could not read, if under the degree of peerage, were hanged.”†

By the statute 5 Ann. c. 6. § 4, it was enacted that benefit of clergy should be granted to all those convicted of any felony for which they were entitled to ask it, without requiring them to read by way of condition. And by the 2nd and 3rd sections of the same statute it was enacted that, when any person was convicted of any theft or larceny, and burnt in the hand for the same, he should also, at the discretion of the judge, be committed to the house of correction or public workhouse, to be there kept to hard labour for any time not less than six months, and not exceeding two years; and that if the offenders escaped and were retaken, they should be committed for any time not less than twelve months, and not exceeding four years. It was also enacted by the statutes 4 Geo. I. c. 11, and 6 Geo. I. c. 23, that when any persons should be convicted of any larceny, either grand or petit, or any felonious stealing or taking of money, or goods and chattels, either from the person or the house of any other, or in any other manner, and who by the law should be entitled to the benefit of clergy, and liable only to the penalties of burning in the hand or

* See ante, p. 196.

† Vol. ii. p. 755.

‡ Hob. 291.

† 4 Com. 1

† 4 Com. 369.

whipping, the court in their discretion, instead of such burning in the hand or whipping, might direct such offenders to be transported to America* for seven years; and that if they returned, or were seen at large in this kingdom within that time, it should be felony without benefit of clergy. These various successive changes in our penal statutes indicate so many steps in the progress from a rude and barbarous to a comparatively humanised state of society. Perhaps hardly any truer index could be used to measure either the advance made, or the various gradations of the scale passed over to attain that point.

In the year 1710 was passed an act, by the courtesy of those who made it, intituled "An act for securing the freedom of parliament, by the farther qualifying the members to sit in the House of Commons,"† by the 1st section of which it is enacted "that, from and after the determination of the then parliament, no person shall be capable to sit or vote as a member of the House of Commons, for any county, city, borough, or cinque port, within that part of Great Britain called England, the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, who shall not have an estate, freehold or copyhold, for his own life, or for some greater estate, either in law or equity, to and for his own use and benefit, of or in lands, tenements or hereditaments, over and above what will satisfy and clear all incumbrances that may affect the same, lying or being within that part of Great Britain called England, the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, of the respective annual value hereafter limited, videlicet, the annual value of six hundred pounds, above reprises, for every knight of a shire; and the annual value of three hundred pounds, above reprises, for every citizen, Burgess, or baron of the cinque ports." By section 2nd it was provided that the act should not extend to the eldest son of a peer, or of a person qualified to serve as knight of a shire. And by section 3rd it was provided that the universities might elect and return members as formerly. By section 4th a mortgagee cannot derive from the mortgaged estate a qualification to sit in parliament, unless he has been in possession seven years.

The celebration of clandestine marriages in the Fleet‡ and other places having given rise to "great mischief and inconveniences" (as the preamble of the act says), an act was passed (26 Geo. II. c. 33) "for the better preventing of clandestine marriages." It was ordered by this act that all banns of matrimony should be published in manner therein particularly mentioned, and that the marriage should be solemnised in one of the churches where such banns had been published. Notice of the names, places of abode, and times of residence was to be given to the minister seven days at the least before the publication of the banns. The minister was declared not punishable for solemnising marriages after banns published between persons, both or one of whom should be under the age of twenty-one years, where the parents or guardians give no notice of dissent; but, where such dissent should be publicly declared, publication of banns was to be void. Licences were to be granted to solemnise marriages, in the church or chapel of such parish only where one of the parties should have resided for four weeks immediately before. There was a reservation of the Archbishop of Canterbury's right to grant special licences. Marriages solemnised by licence without consent of the parents or guardians, where either of the parties (not being a widower or widow) should be under age, were declared void. The churchwardens were to provide books, in which were to be registered all marriages and banns; the said registers were to be signed by the minister, and the books were to belong to the parish, and to be kept for public use. Marriages were to be solemnised in the presence of two or more credible witnesses besides the minister, and were to be registered and signed by the minister, parties, and witnesses.*

The statute 7 Ann. c. 12. (passed in consequence of the arrest of an ambassador of Peter the Great, Czar of Muscovy, for a debt of fifty pounds), after reciting that "several turbulent and disorderly persons had in a most outrageous manner insulted the person of his excellency Andrew Artemonowit: Matueof, ambassador extraordinary of his Czarish majesty, Emperor of Great Russia, her majesty's good friend and ally, by arresting him and taking him by violence out of his coach in the public street, and detaining him in custody for several hours in contempt of the protection granted by her majesty, contrary to the law of nations, and in prejudice of the rights and privileges which ambassadors and other public ministers, authorised and received as such, have at all times been thereby possessed of, and ought to be kept sacred and inviolable;" enacts that for the future all process whereby the person of any ambassador or other public ministers of any foreign prince or state, authorised and received as such by her majesty, her heirs or successors, or of his domestic or domestic servant, may be arrested, or his goods distrained or seized, shall be utterly null and void; and all persons prosecuting such process, and all attorneys and solicitors prosecuting and soliciting in such case, and all officers executing such process, shall be deemed violators of the law of nations and disturbers of the public repose, and shall suffer such penalties and corporal punish-

* By 19 Geo. III. c. 24. power was given to the court to transport to any part beyond the seas.

† 51. 9 Ann. c. 2.

‡ Books were preserved respecting such marriage; but, from the many fabricated entries which they were found to contain, various judges have refused to receive them in evidence. Mr. Justice Le Blanc refused to receive such an entry in evidence, as being no more than a private memorandum made by somebody who had no authority to make it, and who might put down anything he pleased, whether true or false.

* The above statute is repealed by the 3 Geo. IV. c. 75: from which the 4 Geo. IV. c. 76, differed chiefly in this, that it did not make void clandestine marriages, but inflicted penalties on the parties. The last marriage act is the 6 & 7 Will. IV. c. 85, which came into operation in March, 1837.

ment as the lord chancellor or lord keeper, and the two chief justices, or any two of them, shall think fit. But it is provided that no trader within the description of the Bankrupt Laws, who shall be in the service of any ambassador, shall have any manner of benefit by this act; and that no person shall be proceeded against as having arrested the servant of an ambassador or public minister by virtue of this act, unless the name of such servant be first registered in the office of one of the principal secretaries of state, and by such secretary transmitted to the sheriffs of London and Middlesex, who shall hang up the same in some public place in their offices.*

By statute 1 Anne, st. 1, c. 7. § 5, the crown lands and hereditaments (except advowsons) in England and Wales are made inalienable, except that they may be leased for thirty years, or three lives, under the following restrictions:—That the tenant be liable to punishment for waste; and there be reserved upon every such grant, lease or assurance, respectively, the ancient or most usual rent, or more, or such rent as hath been reserved, yielded, and paid for such of the said manors, messuages, lands, tenements, rents, tithes, or other hereditaments as shall be therein contained, for the greater part of twenty years before the making thereof; and where no such rent shall have been reserved or payable, that then upon every such grant, lease, or assurance, there be reserved a reasonable rent, not being under the third part of the clear yearly value of such of the said manors, messuages, lands, tenements, tithes, or other hereditaments as shall be contained in such lease or grant; and that such respective rents be made payable to her majesty, her heirs or successors, who shall make such lease or grant, and to her or their heirs or successors, during the whole term or time of the continuance thereof respectively.

By the act 15 Geo. II. c. 22, a great number of inferior officers of government were excluded from the House of Commons. It is thereby enacted "that no person who shall be commissioner of the revenue in Ireland, or commissioner of the navy or victualling offices, nor any deputies or clerks in any of the said offices, or in any of the several offices following; that is to say, the office of lord high treasurer, or the commissioners of the treasury, or of the auditor of the receipt of his majesty's exchequer, or of the tellers of the exchequer, or of the chancellor of the exchequer, or of the lord high admiral, or the commissioners of the admiralty, or of the paymasters of the army, or of the navy, or of his majesty's principal secretaries of state, or of the commissioners of the salt, or of the commissioners of the stamps, or of the commissioners of appeals, or of the commissioners of wine licences, or of the commissioners of hackney coaches, or of the commissioners of hawkers and pedlars, nor any persons having any office, civil or military, within the island of Minorca, or in Gibraltar, other than officers having commissions in any regiment there only, shall be capable of being elected, or of sitting or voting as a member of the House of Commons, in any parliament which shall be hereafter summoned and holden."

During the period of which we are now treating, bribery at elections, particularly that species of it which is technically termed "treating,"—that is, bribing the poorer electors with drink and food,—begins to make a prominent figure in our political annals. Among the earlier occasions on which this appeared, one signal instance was the general election that took place immediately after Dr. Sacheverell's trial.* This practice is usually cited as an instance of gross corruption and breach of the principles of our constitution. There is more in it, however, than this. Like all similar phenomena, when of frequent and extensive recurrence, it indicates something beyond the mere breach of the letter of a theory or formula. Viewed with reference to the future,—to coming events as well as past,—it indicates a notion of some form and degree of power lodged in those who are thus bribed either with money or strong drink. Men do not give either money or money's worth for nothing. And where people are worth bribing or treating, they are of some consideration. At the time we speak of the poorer classes of France, Spain, or Italy were not bribed or treated—no more were those of England in the time of the Tudors. And why? Simply because they were not worth it. Men who had money to spend in exchange for power then, spent it in feeing, in securing the favour and interest of some court minion or favourite. The bribery and treating at elections, then, are to be viewed as a sign of the times,—as a sure sign that political power has changed hands,—and that some portion of it at least has been lodged in the hands of those who are thus paid in money or drink for it. The morality of thus purchasing or thus selling such power is a totally different question. But the fact is thereby established that there was a strong conviction in the minds of the purchasers that the vendors had some of the commodity in question to sell.

During the present period a good many acts were passed relative to the selection of juries, the mode of conducting trials, &c., some of which will require to be briefly noticed.

By the stat. 4 and 5 Will. and Mary, c. 24, § 15, all jurors were to have 10*l.* a year in England and 6*l.* in Wales, of freehold or copyhold lands or tenements within the county. This is the first time that copyholders (as such) were admitted to serve upon juries in any of the king's courts, though they had before been admitted to serve in some of the sheriffs' courts, by statutes 1 Ric. III. c. 4, and 19 Hen. VII. c. 13. By stat. 6 and 7 Will. III. c. 4, § 3 and 4 (continued 1 Anne, c. 11, and made perpetual 9 Geo. I. c. 8), apothecaries

* In the case of Vivvash v. Becher, 3 M. & S. 284, it was determined by the court of King's Bench that a consul was not a public minister within the meaning of this statute, and therefore not within its protection.

* See ante, p. 244.

caries within London and seven miles thereof, and country apothecaries who had served seven years, were exempted from serving the offices of constable, scavenger, and other pariah and ward offices, and from serving upon juries. By the 7 and 8 Will. III. c. 32, § 10, so much of the stat. 4 and 5 Will. and Mary, c. 24, as related to the returning of jurors, was continued for seven years, and again by 1 Anne, stat. 2, c. 13, for seven years more, and made perpetual by 6 Geo. II. c. 37. By stat. 3 Geo. II. c. 25, § 18, any leaseholder for the term of five hundred years absolute, or for any term determinable on one or more life or lives, of the yearly value of 20*l.* or upwards over and above the reserved rent payable thereout, is qualified to serve upon juries.

The stat. 24 Geo. II. c. 18, § 2, contains the following clause regulating the fees allowed to jurymen:—"And whereas complaints are frequently made of the great and extravagant fees paid to jurymen returned under the authority of the said recited acts, be it enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that no person who shall, after the said first day of Easter Term, serve upon any jury appointed or returned by authority of any of the said acts, shall be allowed or take for serving on any such jury more than the sum of money which the judge who tries the issue or issues shall think just and reasonable, not exceeding the sum of one pound one shilling, except in causes wherein a view hath been or shall be directed."

By the 4th section of the same statute it is enacted that no challenge shall be taken to any panel of jurors for want of a knight's being returned in such panel.

By the statute 3 Geo. II. c. 25, it is ordered that the sheriff or officer shall not return a separate panel for every separate cause, as formerly; but the same panel for every cause to be tried at the same assizes, containing not less than forty-eight nor more than seventy-two jurors; and that their names, being written on tickets, shall be put into a box or glass, and, when each cause is called, twelve of those persons whose names shall be first drawn out of the box shall be sworn upon the jury, unless absent, challenged, or excused, or unless a previous view of the messuages, lands, or place in question shall have been thought necessary by the court: in which case six or more of the jurors returned, to be agreed on by the parties, or named by a judge or other proper officer of the court, shall be appointed by special writ of habeas corpora or distringas, to have the matters in question shown to them by two persons named in the writ, and then such of the jury as have had the view, or so many of them as appear, shall be the first sworn on the inquest.

By the 15th section of the same statute, either party is entitled, upon motion, to have a special jury struck upon the trial of any issue, as well at the assizes as at bar, such party paying the extraordinary expense, unless [24 Geo. II. c. 18, § 1] the judge before whom the cause is tried shall, immediately after the trial, certify in open court, under his hand, upon the back of the record, that the same was a cause proper to be tried by a special jury.

By the stat. 14 Geo. II. c. 17, it is enacted that if, after issue joined, the plaintiff neglect to bring on such issue to be tried according to the course and practice of the court, the court may give judgment as in case of nonsuit. And judgment given by this act was to have the like force as judgment on nonsuit; and the defendant on such judgment was to have costs.

By stat. 12 Geo. I. c. 31, intituled "An Act for the better regulating trials by Nisi Prius in the county of Middlesex," it is recited that, by an act of parliament made in the eighteenth year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, intituled "An Act for the trial of Nisi Prius in the county of Middlesex," power was respectively given to the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer for the time being, and in the absence or default of any of them, to two other judges or barons of the same several courts where it shall happen either of the same chief justices, or chief baron for the time being, to be absent, to try issues as justices of Nisi Prius for the said county of Middlesex within the term time, or within four days next after the end of any term; and that the restraining the time for such trials, after the term, to four days, had frequently occasioned delay of justice, and the requiring the presence of two judges or barons, in the absence of any of them the said chief justices or chief baron, was found by experience to be very inconvenient: and then it is enacted that it may be lawful for the two chief justices and the chief baron, and in their absence for any other judge or baron, as justices of Nisi Prius for the said county of Middlesex, in term or within eight days after, to try issues at Nisi Prius.

We mentioned, in a former Chapter,* that by stat. 36 Edw. III. stat. 1, c. 15, it was enacted that from henceforth all pleas should be pleaded, shown, defended, answered, debated, and judged in the English tongue, but entered and enrolled in Latin. This Latin, which succeeded the French for the entry and enrolment of pleas, continued in use till the time of Cromwell, when, among "other innovations in the law," as Blackstone terms them, or law reforms, as others might term them, the language of our records was altered and turned into English. "But," says Blackstone, "at the restoration of King Charles, this novelty was no longer countenanced; the practisers finding it very difficult to express themselves so concisely or significantly in any other language but the Latin." "And thus it continued," adds Blackstone, "without any sensible inconvenience till about the year 1730."† But, whether the inconvenience was felt then or not before the year 1730, it began to be felt then or very soon after, if we may trust the preamble of the statute 4 Geo. II. c. 26, passed in 1731, which asserts that "many and great mischiefs do frequently happen to the subjects of this kingdom from the proceedings in courts of justice being in an unknown language, those who are summoned and impleaded having no knowledge or understanding of what is alleged for or against them in the pleadings of their lawyers and attorneys, who use a character not legible to any but persons practising the law." "To remedy these great mischiefs, and to protect the lives and fortunes of the subjects of that part of Great Britain called England, more effectually than heretofore, from the peril of being ensnared or brought in danger by forms and proceedings in courts of justice, in an unknown language, this statute enacted that all proceedings in courts of justice in England, and in the Court of Exchequer in Scotland, should be in the English language only, and should be written in such a common legible hand and character, as the acts of parliament are usually ingrossed in, and the lines and words of the same to be written at least as close as the said acts usually are, and not in any hand commonly called court hand, and in words at length, and not abbreviated. Blackstone ascribes the following inconveniences to this alteration: that now many clerks and attorneys are hardly able to read, much less to understand, a record even of so modern a date as the reign of George I.: and that it has much enhanced the expence of all legal proceedings; for, since the practisers are confined (for the sake of the stamp duties, which are thereby considerably increased) to write only a stated number of words in a sheet, and as the English language, through the multitude of its particles, is much more verbose than the Latin, it follows, that the number of the sheets must be very much augmented by the charge.* Two years after another act, 6 Geo. II. c. 14, was passed, which allows all technical words to continue in the usual language.

* See vol. i. p. 680.

† Com. iii. 322.

By the statute 9 and 10 Will. III. c. 17, inland bills of exchange of 5*l.* or upwards, payable at a certain number of days, weeks, or months after date thereof, and after acceptance, and three days after they are due, may be protested; the protest, or notice of such protest, to be sent within fourteen days after it is made to the party from whom the said bills were received. And by stat. 3 and 4 Anne, c. 9, a like remedy is given upon promissory notes; and in the case of a party refusing to underwrite a bill of exchange, it is enacted that such bill may be protested for non-acceptance.

"The Act of Settlement," says Mr. Hallam, "was the seal of our constitutional laws, the complement of the Revolution itself and the Bill of Rights, the last great statute which restrains the power of the crown, and manifests, in any conspicuous degree, a jealousy of parliament in behalf of its own and the subjects' privileges." At this point of our progress it will be convenient to take a view (which will necessarily be a cursory one) of the two great parties of Whig and Tory, which, since the Revolution, have figured so much in our political annals. It is evident that, before the Revolution, while there was a continual struggle going on between the king and the parliament, the two great parties would be the king on the one hand, the parliament on the other. To be sure, a few members of the parliamentary body would take part with the king, partly perhaps from an independent love of monarchical superiority, partly from interest and immediate connexion with the monarchy; but these would be too inconsiderable to deserve to be regarded as a party in themselves, or even as a limb of the party represented by the king. This is the subject presented under one aspect. Under another, as we have already seen,† we may consider the parliament as made up of two or three parties. But these are only to be considered as expressing different shades of political opinion, which, though they might be, and, indeed, were, the precursors of great events, yet exercised no immediate practical influence on the government of the country, not as the representatives of opinions which by turns swayed the councils of the state. Even when the king and parliament came to an open rupture, and a considerable number of the latter joined the king, we do not think that there can, then, be considered as existing any parties but the king on the one hand, and the parliament on the other; or that those who sided with the king can, with any accuracy, be called Tories (as, for instance, Mr. Hallam has said Lord Clarendon was a Tory), any more than that those who opposed the king can be called Whigs.

The terms Whig and Tory took their rise about the year 1679, though, according to Roger North,‡ Tory had the start of Whig about a year. It (Tory) seems to have been applied first to the Duke of York's friends and supporters, who were originally called Yorkists. "That," says Roger North, "served for mere distinction, but did not scandalise or reflect enough. Then they came to Tantivy, which implied riding post to Rome. . . . Then, observing that the duke favoured Irishmen, all his friends, or those accounted such, by appearing against the exclusion (of the Duke of York), were straight become Irish, and so wild Irish, thence Bogtrotters, and, in the copia of the factious language, the word Tory was entertained, which signified the most despicable savages among the wild Irish, and, being a vocal clever-sounding word, readily pronounced, it kept hold, and took possession of the foul mouths of the faction; and everywhere, as those men passed, we could observe them breathe little else but Tory, together with oaths and damnation."§ On the other hand, the party thus named, "according," continues Roger,

* In a note, he gives as an instance, that the three words "secedum formam statuti" are now converted into seven, "according to the form of the statute."

• Const. Hist. iii. 268.
‡ Examon, p. 320.

† Book vii. ch. 3.
‡ Ibid.

“to the common laws of scolding, considered which way to make payment for so much of Tory as they had been treated with, and to clear scores.” After beating about for some time, and trying various words, such as True Blues, Birmingham Protestants (by the latter alluding to false groats counterfeited at that place), they hit upon Whig, which, says Roger North, “was very significant, as well as ready, being vernacular in Scotland (from whence it was borrowed) for corrupt and sour whey. Immediately the train took, and, upon the first trial of the experiment, it ran like wildfire, and became general. And so the account of Tory was balanced, and soon began to run up a sharp score on the other side.”* In his life of his brother, the lord keeper, Roger, with characteristic naïveté, compares the Tories to the primitive Christians, inasmuch as they accounted for their glory what was intended for their reproach.† In its origin, then, the word Tory was used to signify those who favoured James Duke of York, afterwards James II., and in the earlier stage of its existence it might be considered as nearly synonymous with Jacobite. Whig, on the contrary, signified those who especially favoured and promoted the Revolution of 1688; and, as might be expected, the party called Whig held the ascendancy in the administration for a considerable time after the Revolution. Even King William, however, adopted to a considerable extent the policy of balancing one party by the other; nor can there be said to have been a pure Whig administration in any part of the reign of Anne; for even Godolphin and Marlborough, who for some time figured as Whigs, came into power as Tories. In the latter part of Anne’s reign, again, Harley and Bolingbroke were at the head of a pure Tory cabinet. But on the accession of George I. the Whigs regained power, which they kept during the whole of that and the succeeding reign.

In regard to the distinctive principles of Whigs and Tories, it may be convenient to refer for illustration to the respective parties of the king and parliament which had preceded them. Neither did the Tories go so far as the Royalists on the one hand, nor the Whigs so far as the parliament men on the other. The Tories were not for an absolute monarchy, nor the Whigs for a republic. They both agreed in being in favour of a hereditary monarchy, and of two Houses of Parliament, and also, to a certain extent, of the church as by law established. They differed in this, that, while the Whigs were in favour of progressive reform of institutions so as to adapt them to the new forms and wants of society as it advanced, the Tories were for leaving things as they were, either denying the existence of anything bad in the system, or saying that it was impossible to remove or destroy the bad parts without destroying the good at the same time. One strong feature of contrast between them, too, was, that the Tory was less in favour of toleration, and much more in favour of the power, splendour, and dignity of the church than the Whig.

The incorporation of the ancient kingdom of Scotland with that of England during the period now under review, renders it desirable that we should make a few remarks respecting the constitution and government of the former country.

The form of government in Scotland, at the time when we begin first to meet with any authentic records of it was, as we have seen, a monarchy with feudal institutions, assimilated to the Anglo-Norman, which the Scottish kings appeared studious to imitate. Wherein the Scottish parliament resembled and wherein it differed from the English has already appeared. The leading distinction, at least in the practical working of the constitutions of the two countries, was the power of the aristocracy in Scotland—we say practical, for theoretically the king might appear to possess as much power in Scotland as he did in England. The characteristic feature of the Scottish constitution in theory was the power given to the “Lords of the Articles.” “We do not read,” observes Mr. Hallam, “of any opposition in parliament to what the lords of the articles thought fit to propound. Those who disliked the Government stood aloof from such meetings, where the sovereign was in his vigour, and had sometimes crushed a leader of faction by a sudden stroke of power; confident that they could better frustrate the execution of laws than their enactment, and that questions of right and privilege could never be tried so advantageously as in the field. Hence it is, as I have already observed, that we must not look to the statute-book of Scotland for many limitations of monarchy.”*

The kings of Scotland had their aula or curia regis. The jurisdiction of this court came in time to be transferred to a tribunal composed of regular lawyers, called the Court of Session, as the jurisdiction of the corresponding court in England was transferred to the present courts of Westminster Hall, though the change took place much later in Scotland than in England. But the Court of Session possessed no criminal jurisdiction: “the hereditary jurisdictions remained unaffected for some ages, though the king’s two justices, replaced afterwards by a court of six judges, went their circuit” even through those counties wherein charters of royalty had been granted. Two remarkable innovations seem to have accompanied, or to have been not far removed in time from, the first formation of the Court of Session; the discontinuance of juries in civil causes, and the adoption of so many principles from the Roman law as have given the jurisprudence of Scotland a very different character from our own.†

The sufferings which Scotland endured under the Stuarts during the latter years of their accursed yoke are painted by Mr. Hallam with a few power-

* Examen, p. 320.

† Life of Lord Keeper Guildford, vol. ii. p. 51, edit. 1810.

* Const. Hist. iii. 411.

† Hallam, ibid.

ful strokes in some passages of the chapter which he has devoted to the Constitutional History of Scotland. "There was in fact," he says,* "a very striking difference in the circumstances of the two kingdoms. In the one, there had been illegal acts and unjustifiable severities; but it was, at first sight, no very strong case for national resistance, which stood rather on a calculation of expediency than an instinct of self-preservation or an impulse of indignant revenge. But in the other, it had been a tyranny, dark as that of the most barbarous ages; despotism, which in England, was scarcely in blossom, had born its bitter and poisonous fruits: no word of slighter import than forfeiture could be chosen to denote the national rejection of the Stuart line."

After considering briefly the arguments for and against the Union, and characterising the measure as "an experiment of such hazard that every lover of his country must have consented in trembling, or revolted from it with disgust," Mr. Hallam arrives at the following, we think, just conclusion:—"But it is always to be kept in mind, as the best justification of those who came into so great a sacrifice of natural patriotism, that they gave up no excellent form of polity; that the Scots constitution had never produced the people's happiness; that their parliament was bad in its composition, and in practice little else than a factious and venal aristocracy; that they had before them the alternatives of their present condition, with the prospect of unceasing discontent, half suppressed by unceasing corruption, or of a more honourable, but very precarious, separation of the two kingdoms, the renewal of national wars and border-feuds, at a cost the power of the two could never endure, and at a hazard of ultimate conquest, which, with all her pride and bravery, the experience of the last generation had shown to be no impossible term of the contest."

This is in fact most true. The Scottish parliament—the Scottish constitution was "in practice little else than a factious and venal aristocracy." A few remarks illustrative of it, as compared with other aristocracies that have made a figure in the world's annals, will throw further light on the subject.

There are some points of resemblance, though more of difference, between the Scottish aristocracy and the ancient Roman. Among the points of resemblance were the non-existence in both cases of a middle class, and the custom of the Scottish noble's placing his strength in the strength or number of his "following," or vassals, and the Roman noble's placing his in the number of his "clients." And as the nominal sovereign in Scotland, the king, attempted in vain, by legislative enactment, to diminish the magnitude of those feudal retinues, so also did the nominal sovereign of Rome, as appears from the attempt to pass such laws as the Lex Fabia de ambitu, vel numero sectatorum.‡

The leading points of difference were the careful and systematic education of the Roman in the arts both of peace and war, his consequent knowledge of the laws of his country and aptitude for the business of government, as well as the leading of armies. Hence another grand distinction: The Roman perpetrated his injustice and oppression under the colour of law; the Scottish noble in defiance of law. The Venetian oligarchy resembled more the Roman than the Scottish in their deeper policy and better union among themselves. The French nobility, before they finally fell before the power of the monarch, wielded by the iron hand of Richelieu, rather resembled the Scottish. The Scottish aristocracy, being mostly of the Anglo-Norman race, possessed originally, along with the courage and energy, some portion of the policy and astuteness of that remarkable people. The greatest champions of Scottish independence against the encroaching ambition of the Anglo-Norman kings, Robert Bruce and William Wallace, (for he too is said to have been of Anglo-Norman descent), were of the same race with those kings and their chivalry. But the tendency of the Anglo-Normans in Scotland (as in Ireland, though in a less degree than in Scotland), was to degenerate, to fall back to the level of the inferior civilisation of the people among whom they had settled. So that we see in the government of Scotland, throughout the greater portion of its history, only a wild and rude, a sanguinary and ferocious, and in its later stages, until its absorption in the milder influences and more advanced civilisation of England, a selfish, a factious, and venal oligarchy, redeemed by few even of the savage virtues; and latterly by almost none of the heroic deeds which, like stars seen here and there amidst dark clouds, had shone through the barbaric darkness of its earlier history.

The Roman law ingrafted into that of Scotland, as into that of the other nations of modern Europe, appears to have exercised little or no influence upon the character of the aristocracy. In none of them did the nobility adopt the profound policy of the Roman aristocracy of monopolising the legal knowledge as well as the military rank of the state. Gibbon indeed mentions an instance of a patrician lawyer,* whose shrewd and haughty reply, when he was asked to commit his knowledge to writing, seems to indicate that he was to a certain extent aware of this policy. While on the other hand Blackstone's remark that "the concealment (of the laws from the people by the lawyers of ancient Rome) was ridiculous,"† evinces as complete an ignorance of it. It was not merely the power that was the necessary concomitant of the technical legal knowledge; there was the acquisition of the habits of business and thought, particularly of business, or of practical as distinguished from speculative employment of the in-

* Raoul de Tabarie, who, in answer to the prayer of King Amauri that he would commit his knowledge to writing, declared "que de ce qu'il savoit, ne seroit il ja nul bourgeois son pareil, ne nul sage homme lettré."—Gibbon, Decline and Fall, chap. 1. §4.

† 3 Com. 116.

* Const. Hist. iii. 441.

† Const. Hist. iii. 452.

‡ Heineccii Hist. Jur. Rom. s. xci.

tellect, which fitted the Roman patricians at once for political and military leaders, and rendered them as a body the most consummate practical statesmen that the world has yet beheld.

In the course of the space of more than seventy years, over which the period we are now engaged extends, the public revenue—in other words, the portion of the annual produce of the national industry abstracted for the expenses of the government—continued progressively to increase; and many innovations were still introduced from time to time both in the apportionment of the burden of taxation and in the expenditure of its produce. A slight notice of the most remarkable particulars presented by a subject, a full account of which would fill volumes, is all that can be here attempted.

At the end of the reign of James II. the public income, or, as it was called, the revenue of the crown, amounted to about two millions sterling.* In 1701, the last year of William's reign, it is stated at 3,895,205*l.*; of which the customs yielded 1,539,100*l.*; the excise 986,004*l.*; the land-tax 989,965*l.*; the post-office 130,399*l.*; and various small taxes 247,737*l.* Even by this account, then, taxation had been nearly doubled in the course of the twelve years that succeeded the Revolution. But the income of this year was considerably below the average of the whole reign, in the thirteen years of which it appears that the total receipts of the exchequer amounted to not less than seventy-two millions sterling, giving an average annual income of nearly five millions and a half.

Of the seventy-two millions the land-tax produced about nineteen, the customs above thirteen, the excise above thirteen and a half, various polls or capitation taxes about two and a half, the post-office, along with some arrears of hearth-money, about two; about eight millions were derived from stamp duties, duties on glass and earthenware, lotteries, and a variety of other taxes, and in part also from certain financial operations, such as the sale of annuities, which would be more properly described as the borrowing of money than the raising of it by taxation; finally, above thirteen millions were directly raised by loan.

From the beginning to the end of the reign there were expended, upon the navy nearly twenty millions, upon the army about twenty-two millions, upon the ordnance about three millions, and upon what was then called the civil list (which, however, included various charges besides the expenses of the household) nearly nine millions, or about 650,000*l.* per annum. The rest went for the payment of interest on money borrowed (an item which absorbed above five millions in the course of the reign), for the payment of annuities, lottery prizes, and interest due to the Bank (making about three millions more), for the expense of a re-coining of the silver money in 1696 (above two millions and a half), and to meet a great variety of small charges. Above three millions of the money directly raised by loan was also repaid.†

Of the old sources of revenue the hearth-money was the principal, if not the only, tax that was relinquished in the course of this reign: it was abolished by parliament, as "grievous to the people," immediately after the Revolution. A tax imposed on the stock of the India and other public companies in 1692 was also repealed in the following year; and certain duties on glass and earthenware, imposed in 1695, were taken off in 1698 and 1699.

At the close of William's reign the public revenue consisted of the following branches:—

I. THE CUSTOMS; comprehending—1. The Tonnage and Poundage Duties, called the Old Subsidy, or Subsidy Inwards;† 2. The Petty Customs, or Aliens' Duty, being the higher poundage paid by foreign merchants; 3. The Additional Duty, a further tonnage and poundage; 4. The One Per Cent. Inwards, another tonnage and poundage, payable upon certain imposts from the Mediterranean; 5. Compositions on petty seizures of smuggled goods; 6. The One Per Cent. Outwards, a tonnage and poundage on exports; 7. The New Subsidy, another tonnage and poundage, first granted in 1697; 8. The Impost on Wines and Vinegar, first granted for eight years by James II.'s parliament in 1685; 9. The Impost on Tobacco, also first granted in 1685, for the same term; 10. The Impost of 1690, upon East India goods, wrought silk, and other foreign commodities, in all, fifty-five in number; 11. The Impost of 1692-3, upon seventy-two several sorts of goods; 12. The Coinage, an impost upon foreign wines, vinegar, cider, and beer, first granted in 1666, to enable the crown to bear the expense of coining money for the public; 13. The Excise on Salt, so called because managed by the Commissioners of Excise, but properly a branch of the Customs, being levied upon foreign salt imported, first imposed in 1693; 14. The New Duty on Spice and Pictures, first granted in 1695; 15. The Second Twenty-five per Cent. on French Goods, first granted in 1695; 16. The New Duty on Whalefins, first granted in 1697; 17. The New Duty on Coals, Cullm, and Cinders, first granted in 1698; 18. The Fifteen per Cent. on Mustins, a duty on East India goods, laid on in 1700; 19. The Excise on Liquors Imported, which was also, like the salt duty, under the management of the Commissioners of Excise, and, having been first granted in 1660, to Charles II. for life, was afterwards continued for the life of each successive sovereign, to George III., inclusive; and 20. The Duties of Prisage and

* See Account of the Receipts and Expenditures for the whole of this Reign, in Sinclair's History of the Public Revenue, vol. iii. Appendix, pp. 102—109; and in the Parliamentary History, vol. v. Appendix 12.

† See Vol. iii. p. 848.

* See Vol. iii. p. 841.

Butlerage, exigible on foreign wines by an ancient prerogative of the crown.

II. THE EXCISE; comprehending—1. The Temporary Excise, in like manner granted in 1660, for the life of Charles II., and renewed at the beginning of every subsequent reign; 2. The Hereditary Excise, granted to the crown for ever, in 1660, on the abolition of the profits of the Court of Wards, &c.;* 3. The Excise of 1692, upon beer, ale, and other liquors; 4. The Excise of 1693, an addition to the preceding; 5. The Second Excise of 1693, a further duty on the same liquors; 6. The Excise upon Home-made Sall, first granted in 1697; 7. The Second Excise upon Home-made Sall, first granted in 1698; 8. The Malt Tax, first granted in 1697; 9. The Excise on Sweets, a duty imposed in 1699, upon sweets, defined to mean "all liquors made by infusion, fermentation, or otherwise, from foreign fruit or sugar, or from fruit or sugar mixed with other materials, and commonly made use of for recovering, increasing, or making of any kinds of wine or cider;" and 10. The Excise on Low Wines or Spirits, first granted in 1700.

III. THE INLAND DUTIES; comprehending—1. The Post Office Revenue, granted in perpetuity to Charles II., his heirs and successors, at the Restoration; 2. The Casual Profits of wine licenses, seizures, &c.; 3. The First Stamp Duty, granted in 1694; 4. The Hackney Coach Duty, imposed in 1693; 5. The Duty on Bachelors and Widows, and on Marriages, Births, and Burials, imposed in 1695; 6. The Duty on Houses and Windows, imposed in 1696; 7. The Duty on Hawkers and Pedlars, first imposed in 1697; and 8. The Second Stamp Duty, granted in 1698.†

To these is to be added the Land-tax, which was always granted only for a year at a time, and which in this reign was at first 1s. in the pound, but was raised to 4s. in 1693, and was not reduced below 3s. in any subsequent year. And, finally, there were, forming part of the royal income, the rents of the Crown Lands, the revenues of the duchies of Lancaster and Cornwall, and the First Fruits and Tenths payable by the holders of church benefices.

No civil list was settled upon King William at his accession; but several of the above-mentioned duties granted in the course of his reign were secured to his majesty for life, and to others he was considered to have a title in right of his possession of the crown. At the accession of Queen Anne it was arranged that the tonnage and poundage duties called the New Subsidy, imposed in 1697, the temporary excise, the revenue of the Post-Office, the First Fruits and Tenths, the casual profits of wine licenses, seizures, &c., with the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall and other rents of crown lands, should be formed into a fund for furnishing during the life-time of her majesty a yearly income of 700,000*l.*, for the support of her majesty's household and of the honour and dignity of the crown. And ever since it has been the practice at the commencement of every new reign to settle a certain civil list revenue upon the sovereign for life, although the sources of the said revenue, as well as its amount, and its appropriation, have been variously regulated. Anne devoted 700,000*l.* a-year from the amount allotted for her civil list to the public service, and she also resigned that part of it derived from the first fruits of church benefices (amounting to about 100,000*l.* a-year) for the augmentation of the poorer livings. The actual civil list during this reign, therefore, scarcely amounted to 600,000*l.* a-year.

The receipts of the exchequer in the reign of Anne are calculated to have amounted to about a hundred and twenty-two millions in all; of which about fifteen millions was derived from the customs, about twenty-one millions from the excise, about the same from the land-tax, above five millions from the remaining taxes, from lotteries, grants of annuities, &c., and about sixty millions from loans. Of the last-mentioned sum about thirty-two millions appears to have been repaid; about twenty-two and a half went for the payment of annuities and interest upon the debt; nearly thirty-three millions was expended upon the navy; twenty-three and a half on the army; two on the ordnance; above seven and a half on the civil list; and about two more on other charges. It appears, therefore, that the average annual revenue during this reign was about seven millions and a half; but of that nearly two millions went to pay the claims of the creditors of the state.

The most important changes that took place in the taxation of the country during this reign were the following. The tax on marriages, &c., imposed in 1695, was allowed to expire in 1706. In 1708 an additional tax of 2s. per ton was laid on coals brought coastwise into the port of London: this, like the previous duty of 1*s.* 6*d.*, was appropriated to the building of the cathedral of St. Paul's. An additional tax on foreign wines and some other merchandises, called the One-third Subsidy, was imposed in 1702; an additional duty on spice and pictures in 1703; a further duty on wines, called the Two-thirds Subsidy, in 1704; a new duty on pepper and raisins in 1709; new duties on foreign candles in 1709 and 1710; duties on the exportation of coals in 1710 and 1714; and various new duties on foreign hides, skins, parchment, vellum, cards, dice, hops, soap, paper, linen, sail-cloth, &c., in the latter years of the reign. In 1711 a duty of 9*s.* per ton was imposed upon rock-salt exported to Ireland. A fourth excise upon home-made liquors was granted in 1709; an excise upon candles the same year, and another in 1710; and in subsequent years excises upon tanned hides, home-made vellum, parchment, paper, pasteboard, soap, printed silks, calicoes, starch, gilt and silver wire, and various other commodities. The post-office rates were considerably increased in 1710; an additional duty on houses, according to the number of windows, was granted in 1709; the same year a duty of 6*d.* in the pound was imposed on all sums paid with clerks or apprentices; a third stamp duty, comprehending debentures, almanacs, &c., was laid on in 1711; a fourth, on pamphlets and advertisements, in 1712; a fifth, on policies of insurance the same year; and a sixth, on various descriptions of deeds and other legal writings, in 1714. In 1713 a tax of 35,000*l.* per annum was imposed on the civil list revenue, for the payment of arrears of salaries and other debts. Finally, the land-tax was kept up at the rate of 4*s.* till the last year of this reign, when it was reduced to 2*s.* "Thus," exclaims a painstaking historian of our taxation, after having enumerated thirty-seven heads of Customs, twenty-seven of Excise, and sixteen of Inland Duties, "thus we have at last made an end of our long list of taxes which were subsisting at the end of Queen Anne's reign; but there were several others, that, like noisome meteors, made their appearance for a year or more, and then vanished.* These we have forborne to mention, because, we believe, the reader will be by this time as heartily tired of reading as we are of collecting and writing such a disagreeable scroll as that we have now given." "Let him consider, then," our author pathetically adds, "what the people must be who are to pay these taxes."† And, indeed, it must be admitted that the financiers of the age of Anne had made a respectable progress in the art of getting at the superfluous contents of the peoples' pockets—though their science and skill have been far outshone by the discoveries of more recent times.

* See Vol. III. p. 880.

† The History of our Customs, Aids, &c., by T. Cunningham, Esq., 2nd Edit. pp. 96—94.

The same civil list which had been enjoyed by Queen Anne, with some slight alterations as to the taxes from which it was to be drawn, was settled at his accession upon George I. In the beginning of this reign all the taxes then subsisting, except the land-tax, the malt-tax, and a very few others, were made perpetual, and consolidated into what was termed the Aggregate Fund. Afterwards, a thirty-eighth branch was added to the Customs in 1721, by a duty of 2*s.* per bushel on foreign apples; a twenty-eighth branch to the Excise in 1719, by a duty of 6*s.* per ounce on wrought silver-plate; and a seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth to the Inland Duties by a tax of 6*l.* per annum imposed in 1725 on every retailer of beer or ale in the cities of London and Westminster, by certain new stamp duties on law proceedings imposed the same year, and by a tax of 5 per cent. laid in 1720 on all pensions and salaries derived from the crown. Thus at the end of this reign, "we had subsisting," observes Cunningham, "thirty-eight branches of Customs, twenty-eight branches of Excise, and nineteen branches of Inland Duties, in all, eighty-five different kinds of taxes; many of which branches affect a great variety of sorts of goods; and the laws relating to them make by far the greatest part of the many large folio volumes of statutes that have been enacted since the Revolution; whereas all the statutes from the beginning of our monarchy to that famous era are (including the original French and Latin, and the English translation) contained in two folio volumes, of which those that relate to taxes make but a very inconsiderable part."*

In the thirteen years of the reign of George I. the customs are stated to have produced in all above twenty-one millions and a half, the excise nearly thirty millions and a half, the land-tax about eighteen millions and a half, the stamp duties above a million and a half, and other sources of revenue something under five millions; making the total amount of the receipts of the exchequer above seventy-seven millions, giving an average of very nearly six millions per annum. The average revenue of the four last years of the reign was 6,762,643*l.*; of which sum the land-tax (at 4*s.*) produced 2,000,000*l.*, the customs 1,530,361*l.*, the excise 1,927,354*l.*, the malt-tax 750,000*l.*, the salt duty 185,505*l.*, the stamp duties 132,665*l.*, the house and window duty 131,011*l.*, the post-office 75,545*l.*, the taxes forming the Aggregate Fund 58,755*l.*: the remainder was derived from the hackney coach-tax, hawkers' and pedlars' licenses, the tax on pensions, and various small branches belonging to the civil list.

Of the seventy-seven millions received by the exchequer in the course of the reign, the civil list is calculated to have absorbed above ten millions and a half (or about 850,000*l.* per annum), the navy nearly thirteen millions, the army nearly fourteen millions, the ordnance above a million, and the interest on, and repayment of, a small part, of the public debts, with a few miscellaneous charges, the remainder. The military operations of this reign are calculated not to have cost more than about six millions.

On the accession of George II. the same revenues which had been payable for the support of the civil list in the time of his father were in like manner settled for life upon the new king, with the provision that if they should in any year fail to produce the sum of 800,000*l.*, the deficiency should be made good by parliament. If, however, they should produce more than that sum, the surplus was to belong to his majesty; and he was also to have in addition the crown revenues of Scotland. Many of the old taxes were augmented or modified in the course of this reign; but of most of these changes it is unnecessary to give any account. The land-tax was reduced to 2*s.* in the pound in 1730, and to 1*s.* in 1731; but in 1734 it was raised again to 2*s.*, and in 1740 to 4*s.*: at which rate it continued till 1750, when it fell to 3*s.*; in 1753 it was reduced to 2*s.*; but in 1756 it was again raised to 4*s., and was kept up at that rate to the end of the reign. The duty upon home-made salt was taken off, and that upon foreign salt reduced, in 1730; but both imposts were restored to their former state the following year. In 1735 a duty of 20s. per gallon over and above all existing duties was laid upon distilled spirituous liquors, besides an annual tax of 50l. upon every retailer of them; but this violent attempt absolutely to put down the drinking of spirits was found worse than ineffectual; and in 1742 the prohibitory duties were exchanged for others of moderate amount. In 1744 the duties upon the sale of tea were abolished, and it was subjected, before being taken out of the warehouse, to a duty of 1s. per pound, together with a fourth of the gross price which it should bring at the Company's sales: the Tea duty was thus transferred from the Excise to the Customs. In 1745 new duties were laid both upon foreign and home-made glass, and the manufacture of that article was at the same time subjected to the superintendence of the Excise. And in 1746 a tax was for the first time laid upon private coaches and other carriages. "Thus," observes Cunningham, "our rich people, at last, who can keep coaches of their own submitted themselves to a tax which had been long paid by those who could not, and were therefore obliged to make use of hackney-coaches; but still they took special care of themselves; for a gentleman who hires a hackney-coach must pay at the rate of 13l. a-year, but those who are rich enough to keep coaches of their own are to pay but 4l. per annum. The levying of this duty was committed to the Commissioners of Excise, and all the penalties and forfeitures inflicted by the act made determinable and recoverable as our other Excise penalties are; so that even our quality may now be said to be subjected to the laws of Excise."†

* Cunningham, History of Customs, &c., p. 184.

† History of our Customs, &c., p. 248.

The entire amount of the receipts of the exchequer during the thirty-three years of the reign of George II. is calculated to have been about 276 millions of pounds; of which the Customs yielded nearly 50 millions, the Excise and the Malt-tax nearly 94 millions, the Land-tax about 49½ millions, the Stamp Duties above 4 millions, and the remaining taxes nearly 20 millions; the rest was obtained by borrowing. The average yearly receipts, therefore, would be above eight millions; and the revenue, excluding borrowed money, nearly six millions and a half. In 1759 the actual revenue was 8,523,540l.; of which 1,985,376l. was obtained from the Customs, 3,887,349l. from the Excise and Malt-tax, 1,737,608l. from the Land-tax, 263,207l. from the Stamp Duties, and 650,000l. from other sources.

Of the 276 millions forming the entire receipts of the exchequer, about 93 millions went for the interest of the public debts and the repayment of money borrowed; of the remaining 183 millions there was expended for the Civil List nearly 27½ millions, for the Navy about 71½ millions, for the Army about 74 millions, for the Ordnance about 6½ millions: the rest was distributed among a multitude of small charges, of which the most considerable was the outlay upon the American colonies, amounting to nearly 1,700,000l. Sir John Sinclair calculates that the war of 1739-48 cost this country in all about 46,500,000l.; and the Seven Years' War, from its commencement in 1756 to the close of the reign of George II., above 111,000,000l. This latter war, therefore, in four years cost the country more money than would have maintained the whole peace establishment of the government, at the then rate of expenditure, for a hundred and thirty years.

With the present period begins the history of the National Debt. At the Revolution, with the exception of about 580,000l. of arrears due to the army, and 60,000l. to the late king's servants, to meet both of which charges there was money sufficient in the exchequer and in the hands of the receivers of taxes, the only debt due by the State was the sum of 1,328,526l. which had been seized by Charles II. on shutting up the exchequer in 1672. Interest had been originally paid upon this sum at the rate of six per cent., but had been discontinued in the last year of Charles's reign; from which date, to the discredit of the government of William as well as of that of James II., no provision was made for the just claims of the persons from whom this money had been taken till the year 1701 (the last of William's reign), when the hereditary excise was charged with interest upon the whole from the year 1705 at the rate of three per cent., and the principal was made redeemable on the payment of half its amount, or 664,263l. The unfortunate bankers and merchants, therefore, to whom this money properly belonged, after it had been borrowed from them in the first instance without their consent, and then detained from them without any interest being paid upon it for above twenty years, during which space it would, at the then customary rate of interest, have accumulated to three times its original amount, were now further mulcted or robbed of one-half of the sum which had hitherto been admitted to be legally due to them! In fact, the entire amount to which they were plundered by this arrangement considerably exceeded three millions sterling. King Charles's shutting of the exchequer has been deservedly reprobated; but the injustice and hardship of that measure, which consisted simply in forcing a loan from the subject, for which, however, the ordinary rate of interest was paid, were not to be compared to this winding-up and conclusion of the affair by the government of King William. The 664,263l. thus ultimately awarded in satisfaction of equitable claims to six times the amount was called the Bankers' Debt, and still remains undischarged, although long ago incorporated with other public debts in that vast pile of which it may be in a manner regarded as the foundation-stone.

Many other sums of money, however, had been

* That is, by summary proceeding before the commissioners or a justice of the peace.

† History of our Customs, &c., p. 294.

borrowed by the government, and inscribed on the public account-books, before this first incurred portion of the national debt was recognised; but, owing to the manner in which many of these early loans were effected, it is extremely difficult to estimate the exact amount of the money obligation which they entailed upon the state. Much of the money borrowed in the reign of William was raised upon annuities for lives or terms of years; and some of these annuities again were, by subsequent financial operations, converted or made convertible into annuities for other terms, or into perpetual annuities, the usual arrangement in modern times with the public creditor. Other loans were charged on particular taxes, which were expected to pay them off in a certain number of years, but which for the most part failed in doing so. It was found at the peace of Ryswick, in 1697, that the obligations thus contracted and remaining undischarged amounted to 5,160,495*l.*; which sum was then constituted into one debt or fund, and certain taxes set apart for its liquidation, which were expected to accomplish that object by the year 1706, and in the mean time to afford interest upon the whole at the rate of eight per cent., the rate at which the greater part of it had been borrowed. This was called the First General Mortgage. Other loans, however, secured upon duties for short terms of years were made after this to the amount of 3,020,000*l.* The amount that had been borrowed upon annuities subsisting at the end of this reign was 3,884,518*l.*, the sum annually payable upon which was 310,166*l.*; but some of these annuities did not expire till 1792, others expired in 1710, others were upon two lives, others upon three, others, finally, were tontine annuities granted upon a certain number of lives with the benefit of the whole to the longest survivor. On the whole, including two sums of 1,200,000*l.* and 2,000,000*l.* advanced by the Bank of England in 1694 and the East India Company in 1699, both on an interest of eight per cent., and 2,669,392*l.* of unfunded debt, bearing interest at six per cent., it is calculated that the entire amount of the National Debt at the death of King William was 16,394,702*l.*, occasioning an annual burden of 1,310,942*l.* It was in this reign that the practice of creating an unfunded, or floating, debt, by the issue of Exchequer Bills, or drafts upon the exchequer bearing a certain daily interest, was begun. This species of paper money—for such it is—was first issued, on the suggestion of Charles Montagu, then chancellor of the exchequer, in 1696, during the progress of the great recoinage of the silver money. Exchequer bills are now never issued for a less sum than 100*l.*; but at first some of them were for sums so low as 5*l.* and 10*l.*

In the reign of Anne there was raised by loans charged on certain funds mortgaged for short terms, and almost all bearing an interest of six per cent., the sum of 4,713,405*l.*; on annuities for 99 years, 8,191,942*l.*; and on annuities for 32 years, 2,400,000*l.* In 1708, 1,200,000*l.* was advanced by the East India Company without interest, and, in 1709, 4000,000*l.* by the Bank without interest after the first two years, on the renewal of their charters. And towards the end of the reign 9,000,000*l.* was raised by six successive lotteries, which the bonus allowed to the holders of prizes raised to a stock of 11,723,910*l.*, bearing an interest of six per cent. Finally, in 1711 the arrears due in the navy, victualling, transport, and ordnance departments, and other branches of the war expenditure, a loan of 1,296,552*l.* effected in the preceding year, and a new advance of 500,000*l.*, were all incorporated into one fund, amounting, with the interest then due upon the loans and arrears, to 9,177,967*l.*, upon which it was provided that interest should be paid at the rate of six per cent., and the holders of which were formed into a company called the South Sea Company, which, besides receiving 8000*l.* a-year for the management of this stock, was invested with the exclusive privilege of trading to the south and west coasts of America. This was the origin of the association afterwards so famous. At the death of Anne the National Debt, including 5,034,250*l.* of unfunded debt, amounted to 52,145,363*l.*, bearing an interest of 3,351,338*l.* Of this amount, however, above twelve millions and a half consisted of sums borrowed on annuities for terms of years or lives, and which, therefore, the mere operation of time would extinguish.

Some important operations took place in regard to the debt in the next reign. The whole of the debts were distributed into three great funds;—the South Sea Fund, established, as just stated, in 1711; the Aggregate Fund, established in 1714; and the General Fund, established in 1716. Among these were distributed all the existing taxes with the exception of those forming the Civil List and the Land and Malt Taxes, which were only annual grants; and each fund was charged with the payment of the interest due upon a certain portion of the debt. For this purpose the taxes composing the three funds were all made perpetual. This arrangement got rid of the confusion and inconvenience resulting from the old method, which was, to have each loan charged separately upon particular taxes, and consequently as many accounts kept as there were loans, while the produce of the assigned taxes in some cases fell short of, in others exceeded, the amount they had been expected to yield, and the various accounts, therefore, had to be adjusted by a constant process of cross-reference, or taking from one to give to another. Upon this scheme was grafted, in 1716, the first Sinking Fund, commonly called by the name of Sir Robert Walpole, who was minister at the time, although Lord Stanhope was in fact the author of the plan, which consisted in forming the surpluses of the three funds into a fourth fund, to be appropriated to the gradual discharge of the debt, and expressly ordained to be applicable to no other purpose whatever. In 1717, the legal rate of interest having been reduced to five per cent. three years before, government was enabled to effect a reduction of the interest on the whole of the public debt to the same extent; and in 1727 the interest on the portion of the debt due to the Bank and the South Sea Company was further reduced to four per cent. In 1715 the capital of the South Sea Company had been increased to 10,000,000*l.*, chiefly by adding arrears of interest unpaid to their former capital; and in 1719, by the conversion of certain unexpired annuities, it was farther raised to 11,746,844*l.* The next year, 1720, is memorable for the fatal project of uniting all the public debts into one fund, of which this Company undertook the execution. Here, however, we have only to do with the consequences that followed in regard to the public debt. Being enabled by act of parliament to purchase all the redeemable debts and annuities due by government (except those due to the East India Company and the Bank), the South Sea Company came into possession of as much additional stock as raised their capital to 37,802,483*l.* Of this sum, in the settlement of the affairs of the Company in 1722, four millions were purchased by the Bank, and the remainder was divided into two equal parts of 16,901,241*l.* each, one of which was considered as the trading capital of the Company, and the other was designated the Joint Stock of South Sea Annuities. The Company, it may be observed, continued to trade on the Assiento contract for the supply of negroes to Spanish America till 1748; but in 1733 their trading capital had been further reduced to 3,662,775*l.*, the remaining three-fourths of its former amount being now formed into a new fund called the New South Sea Annuities. Meanwhile, it is calculated that the effect of one part of the arrangement made by the government with the Company in 1720, by which the Company, on purchasing an annuity for which 1600*l.* had been originally paid, became entitled to stock to the amount of 2000*l.*, had been to increase the amount of the public debt by 3,034,769*l.* And this was, besides, a permanent burden, only to be removed by the money being paid; whereas the annuities were always diminishing, and the stock upon which they were due would in course of time have been extinguished without any repayment. On the other hand, however, the debt was now rendered redeemable; and the government was thus enabled to reduce the interest upon it, first, in 1727, as already noticed, to four per cent., and afterwards to three per cent.

Besides the great relief afforded by the two reductions of the interest on the National Debt in the reign of George I., some progress was also made in paying off the principal, but as, even while the Sinking Fund was kept in operation on the one hand, the process of borrowing was continued on the other, what was accomplished in this way was not considerable. It appears that the sums applied to the discharge of the National Debt from the establishment of the Sinking Fund to the end of the reign amounted altogether to 6,648,000*l.*; but during the same space new loans were contracted to the amount of about 8,000,000*l.* At the death of George I. the whole debt, funded and unfunded, is estimated to have been 52,092,235*l.*, bearing an interest of 2,217,551*l.*

Even during the first eleven or twelve years of the reign of George II., which was a period of peace, government continued the system of contracting new loans at the same time that it was paying off the old debt by means of the Sinking Fund; and in 1733, and several following years, that fund itself, its boasted inviolability no longer respected, was made to contribute to the current expenditure; but, on the whole, the debt was considerably diminished, its amount at the commencement of the war of 1739 being estimated at 47,954,629*l.*, with an interest of 2,012,774*l.* But at the conclusion of that war in 1748 the principal was found to have increased to 79,293,713*l.*, and the interest to 3,091,003*l.* In 1750, however, the rate of interest on the greater part of the debt was further reduced to three per cent.; the various stocks, the burden of which was thus diminished, being entered soon after into a new fund called the Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities, while those that had always borne only three per cent. interest were at the same time formed into another called the Three per Cent. Consolidated Annuities. This latter is the description of stock familiarly known under the abridged name of Consols, which now constitutes by far the largest portion of the public debt. In the interval between the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle and the commencement of the Seven Years' War in 1755, the unfunded debt was reduced to 1,451,767*l.*; but the entire amount of the public debt was still 74,332,153*l.* The annual burden, however, was now, by the late reduction of the rate of interest, diminished to 2,910,575*l.*, or to nearly half a million less than it was a few years before. What the Seven Years' War added will be stated in the next Book: it appears that the loans effected to the year 1760 inclusive amounted to 26,730,000*l.*, carrying an interest of 913,300*l.* At the death of George II., therefore, the funded debt probably exceeded a hundred millions, and entailed upon the country an annual payment of above three millions and a half. But of course a considerable mass of unfunded debt had also been accumulated by this time.

It was during this period that the practice of what is called Stock-jobbing arose, which, however, was originally a somewhat different thing from what it is now, and conducted both in another way and upon other principles. "King William's ministry," says Anderson, "had flattered themselves from year to year with the hope of a speedy peace. Many of the funds, therefore, upon the credit of which money had in different years been granted by parliament had by this time (1697) been found, or suffered to be, very deficient; the Treasury gentlemen, though otherwise men of abilities, having, in various instances of appropriating the duties, judged very widely of the true amount of those duties, as particularly might be instanced with respect to glass bottles, earthenware, tobacco-pipe clay, &c. The deficiencies of which funds for answering the principal and interest charged thereon were soon observed by the moneyed men who were creditors of the public, and who also took advantage of the remoteness of the courses of payment of the tallies and orders charged on some other funds. This had, since the Revolution, given rise to a new trade of dealing in government or national securities, very much to the damage of the public, as well as of such proprietors of the funds as were under the necessity of parting with them at the discount of from forty to fifty per cent.* But the facts are probably most correctly as well as authentically set forth in the preamble to an act passed in 1697, "To restrain the number and ill practice of Brokers and Stock-jobbers," which recites, that for the convenience of trade sworn brokers had been anciently admitted and allowed of within the city of London and liberties thereof, for the making and concluding of bargains and contracts between merchant and merchant, and other tradesmen, concerning their goods, wares, and merchandises, and moneys taken up by exchange, and for negotiating bills of exchange between merchant and merchant; but that divers brokers and stock-jobbers, or pretended brokers, had lately set up and carried on most unjust practices and designs, in selling and discounting of tallies, bank-stock, bank-bills, shares and interests in joint-stocks and other matters and things, and had unlawfully combined and confederated themselves together to raise or fall from time to time the value of such tallies, bank-stock, and bank-bills, as might be most convenient for their own private interest and advantage; and that the numbers of such brokers and stock-brokers were very much increased within the last few years, and were daily multiplying. To remedy these evils the act directed that all brokers should be licensed by the Lord Mayor, and that their number for the future should not exceed a hundred, and placed them in other respects under nearly the same regulations to which they are still subject.*

* Chron. of Com., ii. 630.

* 8. and 9 Will. III. c. 32.

CHAPTER IV.
HISTORY OF THE NATIONAL INDUSTRY.

DAMPIER, from an anonymous Print.
ANSON, from a Medal by Pingo.

HE Revolution, by plunging us into a war with France, at once altered a condition of things under which our foreign trade was rapidly growing and strengthening, in the peace and free intercourse between the two countries which had subsisted ever since the prohibitory act of 1677 had been repealed on the accession of James II.* In the course of the eight years of war which followed the Revolution the customs fell off considerably; and in the interval between 1688 and 1696 the English shipping annually cleared outwards appears to have declined from 190,533 tons to 91,767, the foreign from 95,267 to 83,024, and the value of the merchandise exported (as officially estimated) from 4,086,087*l.* to 2,729,520*l.*, or by about a third of its whole amount.† Within the same space also the revenue of the post office is stated to have been reduced from 76,318*l.* to 58,672*l.*; which may be taken as an evidence that the pressure of the war was not confined to our foreign trade, but was felt throughout our social system.

At the same time, no doubt, several branches of domestic industry might receive an impulse from the foreign supply being cut off. But those of our manufactures that derived any advantage in this way appear to have been only a few of inferior importance. Before the war we were accustomed to import considerable quantities of men's hats from Havre-de-Grace and other places in Normandy: this article we now set about making for ourselves with such success, that after some time English hats come to be both better and cheaper than French. The finer glass used in England had hitherto been almost entirely French, "for not only," observes Anderson, "very near all the plate glass of our coaches and chairs, and of our fine looking-glasses, came from France, but likewise our finest window-glass, which was usually called Normandy glass and French crown-glass; both which we have since made entirely our own manufacture in the highest perfection." This writer conceives, also, that the improvement of the various manufactures introduced some years before by the French Protestant artisans who fled to this country on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes could not have been so speedily nor so effectually accomplished, had it not been for the complete prevention of intercourse between the two countries by this war. To this cause he attributes the progress made by us in the manufacture of cutlery, watches, toys, ribbons, and especially of broad silk; in all of which branches we came in course of time even to outdo the French. In other cases, however, it is admitted that the failure of the usual supply from France merely occasioned the importation of the article from another quarter. Thus, before the war, we had been accustomed to consume the coarse linens of that country, called dowlases and lockams, chiefly manufactured in Normandy and Brittany, to the annual value of above 200,000*l.*; but now, "England," says Anderson, "not being well able to be without those two sorts of linen, set the Hamburgers on imitating them so well, that the very names of those French linens with us are buried in oblivion." Here, then, the only consolation was, that, if we were no gainers, our enemies at any rate were losers—that France was almost entirely deprived of a most profitable manufacture, which she was never likely to recover.

* See vol. III. p. 859.

† Chalmers's Estimate, p. 68, from accounts in the Exchequer books, communicated by Mr. Astle.

On the whole, however, the war, wasting capital on the one hand, and impeding its accumulation on the other,—augmenting the public burdens, and generally diminishing private gains,—could not fail, ere long, seriously to affect our economical prosperity; and, accordingly, when it had been brought to an end by the peace of Ryswick, in 1697, the kingdom seems to have felt like a man staggering with fatigue and weakness. One writer of the day affirms, "that so great had been the losses of a seven years' war, if a great stock be absolutely necessary to carry on a great trade, we may reasonably conclude the stock of this nation is so diminished it will fall short, and that, without prudence and industry, we shall rather consume what is left than recover what we have lost."* Dr. Davenant, in replying to this writer, although he does not take so desponding a view of the state to which the war had reduced us, yet admits not only that it put a stop to a course of constantly augmenting prosperity that had gone on without interruption from the Restoration, but that it had consumed much of the wealth accumulated in that previous long period of peace, as well as inflicted the most serious injury upon various branches of our trade. "Besides the ordinary expenses of the war," he observes, "our dead losses at sea, in nine years' time, have amounted to a greater sum than is fit here to mention."† In regard to our foreign commerce, he thinks it will be a great matter for the present if we can recover the ground we had lost during a contest which had left us, there and all over, sore with wounds. "By the unlucky conduct of our naval affairs," he proceeds, descending to particulars, "the trade to and from this kingdom was chiefly done by princes and states in neutrality, such as Denmark and Sweden to the northward, Portugal and the State of Genoa, who have hereby not only increased in their shipping but in the knowledge of our trade; and, unless care be taken to regain to England, in the very beginning of this peace, the ground we have thus lost, in all likelihood it will never be recovered." He goes on to complain of encroachments that had been made upon the Navigation Act through "the slack administration which war occasions;" and then he adds the following account of the state to which some of the most important branches of our trade had actually been reduced:—"The Norway and the Baltic trade have been lately carried on in a more disadvantageous way than ever; they always drained us of money; but this in some measure was compensated by giving employment to near a hundred sail of ships; but now they do not employ five ships, and for a great while have exported between 3000*l.* and 4000*l.* per annum. As to the Guinea trade, this war has brought it to a very low ebb, the French having disturbed our colonies, and destroyed our fortresses and places of strength upon the coast of Africa. The neglect in settling the African trade has forced the plantations [in America] for their support to deal with foreigners for negroes, and consequently to traffic with them in return for those negroes. Some of our West India plantations have been likewise very much despoiled lately by plagues and earthquakes; and in some parts, during the late war, the natives are grown upon us; and in other places we have been harassed and ruined by the French. Our East India trade is also in a very bad condition; losses abroad and discouragements at home have very much diminished the capital stock. The late piratical attempts on the Mogul's subjects and allies in the Red Sea have brought difficulties upon the Company's affairs in India not easily to be overcome; and these piracies are partly the effect of that loose administration with which war is accompanied; for the ships which have committed these depredations have been chiefly fitted out from the West India ports: if the governors there had kept a jealous eye over these freebooters and buccaneers—if they had narrowly watched their goings out and comings in—if, instead of sharing in the spoil (which perhaps has been practised), they had compelled suspected persons to give good security for their behaviour, or laid an embargo on their ships—and if they had been vigorous in seizing and prosecuting these pirates at their return (the contrary of which is but too notorious), such wicked actions and breaches of the laws of God and nations could never have been committed."*

Davenant, however, argues that, notwithstanding all it had suffered, the country had the principle of life still strong within it; and that even from the manner in which it had stood the severe strain of this war, great consolation was to be derived and hope for the future. After remarking

* Pollexfen, Discourse on Trade, Coin, and Paper Credit. 1697. Pollexfen was at this time a member of the Board of Trade.
† Discourses on the Public Revenues, and on the Trade of England. 1696; in Works, i. 371.

* Discourses on the Public Revenues, &c., in Works, i. 298.

that we had been able "to maintain a war abroad, with a fleet at the yearly charge of 2,500,000*l.*, and a land army at the yearly charge of above 2,500,000*l., of which a great part for some time has been spent in other countries,"—and " (the ordinary revenues of the crown not included) to give in taxes upwards of 39 millions, of which about 25 millions have been actually levied, 14 millions are in a way of payment, and the rest remains a debt to be provided for,"—he proceeds, in the following passages, to give as comprehensive and trustworthy a description as is perhaps anywhere to be found of the real state in which the war had left the kingdom:—"Our stock in stored goods, plate, jewels, money, and merchant-ships, is apparently not so great now as it was in 1688; however, we have still so good a prospect, and such a remainder of strength, as, if it be well managed, our affairs may be restored in some moderate term of time. A good symptom, for the present, of remaining health and vigour in the body politic is, that we see nothing abated in the price of our native commodities. And, besides, without doubt, we have yet felt no such poverty as has reduced us to let our buildings and farm-houses go to ruin. As yet, there has been no where a visible fall in the rents of land and houses. It is true the interest of money is risen; but that has plainly proceeded from the advantage men have found by dealing with the exchequer. It is to be feared our stock of shipping for trade is less at present than before: however, our fleet and naval strength is apparently more powerful now than ever it was; and undoubtedly this war has bred us more able seamen than formerly we had. But the truest sign of our vitals not being tainted, and that we are not wounded in any noble part, is, that our manufactures and all our home produce, generally speaking, hold up to their former rates. For this is a direct evidence that we are not at all, or very little, diminished in the numbers of our people; and it is a mark that, though we may have been interrupted in our importations, yet that we export rather more than in former times. If we decreased in people to any degree there would be less consumption, and consequently our home commodities would have become cheaper; and, if there were not a great call abroad for our product and manufactures, they must sink in value here. Not only now, but during the whole war, they have sold well at home and abroad, which is a sign that we did not quite consume and live altogether upon the capital, but that our annual produce and income did go a great way towards maintaining our foreign expenses." The war, finally, he observes, had not been unproductive of some advantages to our domestic industry, which helped to enable us to sustain the heavy pressure it had laid upon us:—"As it hindered our trade, and was expensive to us, so it interrupted the tillage, labour, and manufactures of other countries, and created there a necessity of our commodities; to which must be attributed, in some measure, the great call that has been during nine years for our corn, barreled beef and pork, tallow, leather, cheese and butter, and coarser sort of drapery. The returns of these commodities have helped us to maintain our foreign expenses, and have kept the radical moisture within the kingdom, which otherwise must have been quite exhausted by drawing out those sums that were necessary to subsist our troops in Flanders. This exportation, occasioned by the wants which war only had brought upon our neighbours, has stood in the room of money, which else must have been exported; so that, comparing the present species with what was in the kingdom in 1688, there seems to be still more money left than we could reasonably hope to find after a war so long and so expensive. By the stock that had been gathered in peace, and by the benefit of these more than ordinary, and in some sort accidental, exportations, we have maintained ourselves for nine years; and now, at the end of the business, our condition is very far from desperate."[†]

The fact, often exemplified, of the rapidity with which a country recovers from the obstruction and waste of war, as if the spirit of enterprise started forth on the return of peace like a spring from which a heavy pressure had been removed, and the very vacuum to be filled up occasioned a sudden rush of activity and consequent gain into the reopened channels of industry and commerce, verified Davenant's hopes and prognostications. The total tonnage of English ships cleared outwards rose again in 1697, the very first year of the peace, to 144,264 tons, and that of foreign ships to 100,524; and the entire official value of the exports to 3,525,907*l.* On the average of the three years 1699, 1700, and 1701, the last of the peace, the value of the annual exports was 6,709,881*l.*, conveyed in 337,328 tons of shipping, of which no less a proportion than 293,703 was English, the foreign having by this time fallen to 43,625.† Comparing this state of things with the point to which our commerce had been depressed (as above recorded) in the last year of the war, we find that in five years of peace our exports had very considerably more than doubled, and our mercantile marine more than quadrupled. It appears also that, whereas the net average annual income of the Post Office during the eight years of the war was only 67,222*l.* (it had fallen, as we have seen, to something considerably under this sum in 1697), its average amount for the space from 1698 to 1701 inclusive was 82,319.‡ These figures look insignificant enough at the present day, but they do not for that the less distinctly indicate the movements of what may perhaps be styled one of the best barometers we possess of the commercial activity, and even of the general economical condition, of the country.

* Discourse on the Publick Revenues, &c., in Works, i. 380
 † Mr. Axtell's transcripts, in Colclough, p. 72.
 ‡ Ibid.

Having cast this summary glance over the progress of our trade and public wealth during the reign of William, we will now proceed to notice some of the most important or most illustrative particulars by which this portion of the history of our national industry is marked.

It was in this reign that the Bank of England was founded, principally through the exertions of Mr. William Paterson, of whom we have already heard so much as the projector of the Scottish Darien Company.* Paterson, according to his own account, commenced his exertions for the establishment of an English bank, similar to those already existing, at Amsterdam, Venice, Genoa, and Hamburg, in the year 1691. A principal object which he had in view from the first, in addition to the accommodation of the mercantile community, appears to have been the support of public credit and the relief of the government from the ruinous terms upon which the raising of the supplies and other financial operations were then conducted. The lowest rate, he tells us, at which advances used to be obtained from capitalists, even upon the land-tax, which seems to have been considered the surest part of the national revenue, was eight per cent., although repayment was made within the year, and premiums were generally granted to the subscribers. On anticipations of other taxes, counting premiums, discount, and interest, the public had sometimes to pay twenty, thirty, and even forty per cent. Nor was the money easily obtained when wanted even on such terms. It was no uncommon thing for ministers to be obliged to solicit the common council of the city of London for so small a sum as a hundred or two hundred thousand pounds, to be repaid from the first returns of the land-tax; and then, if the application was granted, particular common councilmen had in like manner to make humble suit to the inhabitants of their respective wards, going from house to house for contributions to the loan.† In these circumstances Paterson might have laid his account with the opposition of the monied interest, whose inordinate gains his proposed Bank was to put an end to; the disaffected, also,—that is, the enemies of the revolutionary settlement,—were all, he tells us, against it; their argument was, that the new Bank would engross to itself all the money, stock, and riches of the kingdom; but what he conceived he had less reason to anticipate was the difficulty he experienced in prevailing upon the government to go into his scheme. King William was abroad when the proposal was brought before the cabinet in 1693, where long debates took place upon it in the presence of the queen; but at last an act of parliament was passed (5 and 6 W. and M. c. 20), which, in imposing certain rates and duties on tonnage of ships, and upon beer, ale, and other liquors, authorised their majesties to grant a commission to take subscriptions for 1,200,000*l.* of the whole 1,500,000*l.* which the new taxes were expected to raise, and to incorporate the subscribers into a company, under the name of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England. Interest at eight per cent. was to be allowed upon the money advanced, and also 4000*l.* a year for management;* making the whole annual payment to the company 100,000*l.* The company were to be enabled to purchase lands, &c., and to exercise all the usual powers of bodies corporate; but were not to trade in the buying or selling of any goods or merchandise, except that they might deal in bills of exchange, and in buying and selling of bullion, gold, or silver, and in selling of any goods or merchandise which should be pledged to them for money lent thereon, and might also sell the produce of their own lands. This act received the royal assent on the 25th of April, 1694; the subscription for the 1,200,000*l.* was completed in ten days, twenty-five per cent., or a fourth of the whole sum, being paid down; and the royal charter of incorporation was executed on the 27th of July following. It gave to the establishment the same constitution which it still retains, under a governor, deputy governor, and twenty-four directors, of whom Paterson was one. The new institution, though loudly clamoured against for some time, principally by interested parties, soon proved its usefulness to the general conviction. "The advantages," says Burnet, "that the king, and all concerned in tallies, had from the Bank were soon so sensibly felt that all people saw into the secret reasons that made the enemies of the constitution set themselves with so much earnestness against it."† Paterson himself ascribes to it no less an effect than the successful termination of the war:—"The erection of this famous Bank," says he, "not only relieved the ministerial managers from their frequent processions into the city for borrowing of money on the best and nearest public securities at an interest of ten or twelve per cent. per annum, but likewise gave life and currency to double or treble the value of its capital in other branches of public credit; and so, under God, became the principal means of the success of the campaign in the following year, 1695, as particularly in reducing the important fortress of Namur, the first material step towards the peace concluded at Ryawick in the year 1697."

A great operation in which the Bank, almost as

* "This is the first instance," observes Anderson, "of any national fund being managed by any other than the crown officers at the Exchequer; which new method of allowing a round sum for charges of management has ever since been followed, not only with respect to the Bank, but also to the East India and South Sea Companies; which allowances for the expense of management, that is, for salaries of governors, directors, clerks, office-rents, &c., were at first usually computed from what similar funds had formerly cost the crown when managed at the Exchequer, though generally, in later times, I conceive, with some saving to the public in this new method." Chron. Com. ii. 604. The entire management of the public debt has since been confided to the Bank; and the annual sum now allowed to it for that service is about 130,000*l.* Previous to the last renewal of the charter (in 1833) the allowance exceeded 250,000*l.*; and before 1798 it was at the still higher rate of 362*l.* 10*s.* for every million of the debt. But even this was a great reduction upon the original rate, which was not less than 333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* per million.

† Own Time, ii. 129.

* See ante, pp. 54, et seq.

† Paterson's Account of his Transactions in relation to the Bank of England, fol. 1695; and his Confessions on the Public Debt, by the Wednesday's Club in Friday-street.

soon as it had been set up, was called upon to assist the government and the country was the entire re-coining of the silver money, which was undertaken in 1696. The inconveniences arising from the clipping of the silver currency began to be felt about the close of the reign of Charles II., and to a greater degree in that of James II., but only very seriously after the Revolution. In 1692 we find a clause in an act of parliament reciting that "the receivers of the revenue and aids given to their majesties, and divers other persons, have in many places of this kingdom refused to receive or take in payment any sort of cracked money, which by law is and ought to pass as the current coin of this realm, by reason of which refusal many of their majesties' good subjects are under great hardships and difficulties for want of money to pay their taxes and supply their other necessary occasions, whilst the said cracked money lies dead by them, and is rendered wholly useless to their majesties and their subjects."* The clause goes on to enact that whoever should refuse to take in payment any cracked money being the current coin of the kingdom should for every such offence forfeit five pounds, to be recovered by action by any person who would sue for the same. But the evil was not to be cured in this way; no act of parliament could make a piece of silver intrinsically, for instance, worth only ninepence or tenpence pass for a shilling; if dealers could not have the price of their goods in money of sufficient weight, they raised the price; and the law which compelled them to take the clipped money did not, and could not, prevent them from allowing discount to those who brought them shillings, sixpences, or half-crowns of the full weight, or from receiving gold coin for more than its legal value in silver; so that, except that it occasioned some inconvenience, this enactment proved quite ineffectual. Then, in 1694, an act was passed expressly "to prevent counterfeiting and clipping the coin." "It is manifest," says the preamble, "that of late years the current coin of this kingdom hath been greatly diminished by rounding, clipping, filing, and melting the same, and likewise many false and counterfeit coins have been clipped for the better disguising thereof;" and then it is declared to be apparent that these practices are "very much occasioned by those who drive a trade of exchanging broad money for clipped money, and by other acts and devices." To remedy this state of things it is now enacted, that, if any person should at any one time either exchange, lend, sell, borrow, buy, receive, or pay any broad silver money, or silver money unclipped, of the coin of the kingdom, for more than the same was coined for, and ought by law to go for, he should forfeit ten times the amount of the money so illegally exchanged. A variety of new restrictions were at the same time imposed upon the trade in bullion; such as, that no person should cast ingots or bars of silver, under a penalty of five hundred pounds; that none should buy, sell, or have in custody any clippings or filings of coin under the like penalty; that no person should export any melted silver without having it first stamped at Goldsmiths' Hall, and taking oath that no part of it had been before it was melted current coin of the kingdom, or clippings therefrom; that none but goldsmiths and refiners should deal in the buying or selling of silver bullion, under pain of suffering six months' imprisonment, &c.* But it might as well have been attempted to stop the flowing of the tide by act of parliament. Before this measure was devised, guineas were passing for thirty shillings, and exchequer tallies were often at from thirty to forty per cent. discount. The new act did as little good as the other passed two years before; "and," says Anderson, "as the diminishing of the old hammered money daily increased, so far that it is said shillings scarcely contained more than threepence in silver, the condition of the nation became very alarming; which gave the greatest joy to the disaffected at home, who hoped thereby for a total overthrow of King William's government. The French king also had great expectations from this calamity, so far as to have been heard to say, that King William would never be able to surmount the difficulty."† The wretched state to which the coinage had actually been reduced is most clearly set forth in an "Essay for the Amendment of the Silver Coin," which appeared in 1695, and the author of which evidently writes from official sources of information. He computes the entire silver money coined by Queen Elizabeth to have amounted to 4,632,932*l.*; that coined by James I. to 1,700,000*l.*; and that coined by Charles I. to 8,776,544*l.*; making, in all, 15,109,476*l.* By this time, all Queen Elizabeth's crowns, half-crowns, groats, quarter-shillings, half-groats, three-halfpenny pieces, three-farthing pieces, and halfpence, were wholly gone; and also great numbers of her shillings and sixpences. The crowns, groats, twopenny pieces, pence, and halfpence of James I. and Charles I., had likewise all disappeared; with many of their half-crowns, shillings, and sixpences. On the whole, this author calculates that there did not remain in circulation more than a third part of this old coinage, or not much above 5,000,000*l.* sterling. This, however, constituted by far the greater part of the existing silver currency; for the unmelting coins of Charles II., James II., and King William, did not amount to more than about 563,000*l.* Thus the nominal value of the whole silver money of the kingdom, clipped and unclipped, hoarded and current, was about 5,600,000*l.* But of this about 4,000,000*l.* consisted of clipped money; while the remaining 1,600,000*l.* was either hoarded up, or current only in the remote counties. The most curious part of the statement, however, and that also which proceeds upon the surest grounds, is the calculation of the extent to which the clipping had been carried.

* 4 W. and M. c. 14, § 7.

* 6 and 7 W. and M., c. 17.

† Chron. of Com., ii. 619.

There had, it seems, been brought into the Mint in the three months of May, June, and July, 1695, 572 bags, each containing 100*l.* of silver coin, promiscuously collected, which, according to the standard, ought to have weighed 18,451*lbs.* 6*oz.* 16*dwt.* 8*gr.* troy; but the actual weight, of the whole turned out to be only 9480*lbs.* 1*oz.* 5*dwt., or very little more than half what it ought to have been! The exact diminution amounted to about five shillings in every eleven. The whole four millions of clipped silver money, therefore, were really not worth much more than two millions sterling; and the loss consequent upon calling in the whole and re-coining it would not amount to much less than that sum. The prospect of this great outlay, however, notwithstanding considerable opposition on the part of some members, did not deter parliament from resolving upon the only course that could effectually remedy the evil. By a succession of acts passed in the course of the years 1696 and 1697, provision was made for gradually calling in all the old silver money, and replacing it by another currency of the full standard weight; and before the end of the latter year the entire operation was accomplished, and "our silver coins came forth from the Mint," to quote Anderson's expression, "the finest and most beautiful of any in all Europe." The new money was coined partly at the Tower, partly at the country mints of Bristol, Exeter, Chester, Norwich, and York. According to the account of the receipts and issues of the Exchequer during the reign of William, which we have had occasion to quote in a former Chapter, the entire cost amounted to something under two millions and a half—a sum sufficiently near the estimate of the author of the essay from which we have taken the above view of the actual state of the silver currency before this re-coinage, to entitle us to place considerable confidence in the general accuracy of his facts and calculations.

To the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Charles Montague, afterwards Earl of Halifax, is ascribed the main credit of suggesting and carrying through this great reform, which was undoubtedly the mightiest financial operation that had yet been achieved or undertaken in England. In the mean time, however, it had, before its completion, very nearly brought down the infant establishment of the Bank, whose notes, together with Montague's new exchequer-bills,† had chiefly supplied, while the re-coinage was proceeding, the vacuum occasioned by the abstraction of the old clipped silver money. But these notes, being payable on demand, were presented so much faster than the new coin could be supplied from the Mint, that the Bank, in the course of the year 1697, was obliged to resort to what amounted in fact to a suspension of payments—giving coin for its notes, first by instalments of ten per cent. once a fortnight, and afterwards only at the rate of three per cent. once in the three months. The consequence was, that Bank paper fell to a discount of from fifteen to twenty per cent. In the preceding year the directors had made two successive calls of twenty per cent. each upon the proprietors; but such was the difficulty of procuring money, that we find them in the Gazette of the 6th of May, 1697, urging the defaulters upon the last of these calls, which should have been attended to on the 10th of the preceding November, "and also those indebted to the Bank upon mortgages, pawns, notes, bills, or other securities, to pay in the said twenty per cent., and the principal and interest of those securities, by the 1st of June next." But these difficulties were soon removed and the credit of the Bank completely restored by the effects of an act passed in the ensuing session of parliament, adding above a million sterling to the stock of the corporation, and extending the term of its exclusive privileges to the year 1711.* In 1708 its charter was farther continued to the year 1733; in 1712 to the year 1743; and in 1742 to the year 1765. Meanwhile also its capital, or the amount of the advances it had made to the public, had gone on increasing, till at the close of the present period it had risen to be nearly eleven millions. The establishment of the Bank of England was immediately followed by that of a similar institution in Scotland, also mainly through the exertions of the public-spirited and indefatigable Paterson. But, while the great corporation in Threadneedle-street remained the only privileged banking association in England, the Bank of Scotland was compelled within the present period to submit to the intrusion, first of one chartered rival, the Royal Bank, in 1727, and then of a second, the British Linen Company, in 1746.

Of the old incorporated trading associations, the only one the history of which offers much matter of interest during the present period, is the East India Company. This company underwent a complete re-organisation in consequence of measures that were taken respecting it in the reign of William. We have seen that for some time previous to the Revolution the exclusive privilege of the Company had been extensively invaded by numbers of private traders. These interlopers, as they were styled, taking advantage of the natural invidiousness of a monopoly, seem to have at length succeeded in exciting a very general feeling of hostility to the Company; to which were imputed various delinquencies and acts of mismanagement most injurious to the national interests; so that in January, 1692, the House of Commons, carried along by the prevailing clamour, sent up an address to his majesty requesting him at once to dissolve a body that had so misconducted itself, and incorporate a new company.

* It is observed, however, by Leake, that the "provision by law to receive the clipped money was the greatest encouragement to promote clipping, and gave the clippers all the advantages they could desire, making the crime more general; for now they were sure of a market for their clipped money; so that what had been hoarded, and hitherto escaped the shears, now underwent the same fate; and it is not improbable that more was clipped and re-clipped upon this general license than had been before."—Historical Account of English Money, 2nd Edit. p. 202.

† See ante, p. 686.

* 8 and 9. Will. III. c. 29.

This was the commencement of a long series of proceedings, of which we can here notice little more than the results. On the question being submitted to the privy council, they proposed that a new company should be incorporated for twenty-one years, to consist of the members of the old company, and as many new subscribers as should make up a capital of from 1,500,000*l.* to 2,000,000*l.*, of which the existing company's capital should be considered as making 740,000*l.* But the Company maintained that, reckoning everything they possessed, and looking to the current price of their stock in the market, their capital could not be fairly estimated at a less sum than 1,500,000*l.* They also contended that their forts, towns, and territories in India were by their charters theirs for ever, whatever might become of their privilege of exclusive trading. No steps were taken to carry into effect the recommendations of the privy council; nor did the enemies of the Company succeed in getting it broken up even when the following year, by an unaccountable piece of neglect, it had legally incurred the forfeiture of its charter by the nonpayment on the appointed day of a tax upon its capital imposed by a recent act of parliament. On the contrary, on the 7th of October, 1698, it obtained from the king a renewal of its charter, with a full restoration of all its former powers and privileges. An account has already been given in our first chapter of the investigation which was afterwards (in 1695) made by parliament into this transaction, when it appeared that the Company had, in the year 1693, expended for special (but unspecified) services little less than 90,000*l.; of which, among other persons in power, the Duke of Leeds, the president of the council, was all but proved to have been a sharer to a large amount, while his majesty himself was strongly suspected to have benefited to a still larger. These disclosures, or exposures, did not tend to allay the public feeling against the Company; which about the same time fell into further disfavour by being obliged to suspend for some years the payment of any dividends in consequence of a train of severe losses it had incurred. Indeed, the Company now scarcely derived any advantage at all from its charter, the validity of which was denied by parliament, and which even the government openly disregarded, granting licenses to the private traders in the most unreserved manner. To this pass had matters been brought, when, in the beginning of the year 1698, the government, being in want of money, bethought itself of trying what could be made of the monopoly of the India trade, which was thus contested or in abeyance. The Company now offered to make an advance of 700,000*l.*, at four per cent., on condition of obtaining a parliamentary confirmation of their charter; but, on this, at the instigation, as it is alleged, of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Montague, the private traders offered 2,000,000*l.*, at eight per cent., for an incorporation conferring upon them the exclusive privilege of the trade; and their proposal was accepted. An act was accordingly passed in July of that year, empowering the king to incorporate the new company; and on the 5th of September following his majesty signed a charter investing the subscribers of the two millions, under the name of The English Company trading to the East Indies, with the exclusive possession of the commerce with that part of the world for ever, subject only to the right of the Old Company to continue their trade for three years longer. Meanwhile, however, the Old Company had, through its treasurer, subscribed no less than 315,000*l.* of the loan of two millions, and had thus become by far the largest shareholder in the new and rival association. Hence a confusion and conflict of claims and interests such as a legislative arrangement has seldom produced. There were now trading all at the same time, first, the Old Company, expressly authorised to go on as usual for three years longer, and even after the expiration of that term left in possession of all its forts and factories in India, and of whatever privileges it had acquired there from the native authorities; secondly, the New Company, without any Indian possessions whatever, and with the rival body, which aimed at its destruction, permanently, as it were, seated upon its shoulders, and invested with almost a controlling power over its operations; thirdly, a few of the subscribers to the late loan, who had declined joining the New Company, but who in terms of the original contract with the government were nevertheless entitled, so long as the two millions remained unpaid, to trade each for himself; and, fourthly, all such separate traders as had cleared out from England previous to the 1st of July, 1698, the right of all such to carry on the trade till they should think fit to return to England having also been provided for by a clause in the act which created the New Company. It is said that no fewer than sixty ships in all were now engaged in the trade, which seems to have been reduced to a state in which all the inconveniences of a free trade and of a monopoly were combined, without any of the advantages of either. The native manufactures were extensively injured by a glut of India goods, the prices obtained for which at the same time entirely failed to remunerate the importers. And still the bitterest hostility divided the two companies, whose quarrel, indeed, gradually became one in which the whole nation took part, the Tories siding with the Old Company, the Whigs with the New, after the manner in which the whirlpool of political faction is wont to draw all things to it. In the city of London in particular, ever since the passing of the act of 1698, which had called the New Company into existence, all the powerful interest of the other company had been strenuously and perseveringly exerted against the government; and Burnet acknowledges "that this act, together with the inclinations which those of the Whigs who were in good posts had expressed for keeping up a greater land force, did contribute to the blasting the reputation they had hitherto maintained of being good patriots, and was made use of over England by the Tories to disgrace both the king and them.* And the Tory majority in the new House of Commons which met in February, 1701, appears to have been the effect of the returning popular feeling in favour of the Old Company, and of the exertions of their partisans throughout the kingdom, more than of any other cause. The elections, indeed, had turned principally upon the contention between the two companies; but Burnet himself is constrained to admit that what systematic bribery of the electors took place was chiefly, if not exclusively, on the part of the New Company and his own friends and theirs, the Whigs. When the House met, he tells us, "reports were brought to them of elections that had been scandalously purchased by some who were concerned in the New East India Company. Instead of drinking and entertainments, by which elections were formerly managed, now a most scandalous practice was brought in of buying votes, with so little decency, that the electors engaged themselves by subscription to choose a blank person before they were trusted with the name of their candidate." But he adds, with considerable naïveté, "the Old East India Company had driven a course of corruption within doors with so little shame, that the New Company intended to follow their example; but with this difference, that, whereas the former had bought the persons who were elected, they resolved to buy elections."† The general interest that was taken in the dispute between the two companies did not abate till towards the very close of William's reign; but at length the parties principally concerned began themselves to perceive that the contest was only exhausting and ruining both; and shortly after the accession of Anne an arrangement that had been for some time negotiating was completed under the sanction of the queen, by which their differences were composed in the mean time, and provision was made for their ultimate union into one body. The fixed property, or dead stock, as it was called, of the Old Company in India, being valued at 330,000*l.*, and that of the New Company at 70,000*l.*, a fair adjustment of their respective claims and liabilities in regard to that matter was made by the latter paying over to the former the sum of 130,000*l.*, so that each might be regarded as contributing 200,000*l.* to this part of the common stock; and then the money capital of 2,000,000*l.* was in like manner divided equally between the two, by the Old Company purchasing at par as much stock from the New Company as made up their original subscription of 315,000*l.* to 1,000,000*l.*‡ These terms were embodied in a tripartite indenture, which was signed by her majesty and both Companies on the 2nd of July, 1702; and by which it was also stipulated that after the expiration of the term of seven years all separation of interests should cease, and the whole incorporated shareholders should form one body, to be called The United Company of Merchants of England trading to the East Indies. This final and complete union, accordingly, took place in the year 1708. After this the Company's charter was three times renewed, and its exclusive trading privileges continued to it, within the present period; first, in 1712 till the year 1736; secondly, in 1730 till the year 1769; and lastly, in 1744 till the year 1783.

* See ante, p. 52.

Some of the other branches of our colonial and foreign trade, during the reign of William, require only a slight notice. The plantations, as they were called, or settlements on the continent of America, went on steadily increasing in population and wealth; and by the end of the century the trade with these rising dependencies and the adjacent West India Islands is said to have given employment to no less than five hundred sail of ships. Of these doubtless a considerable number were engaged in bringing negroes from the opposite coast of Africa—a trade which had originally been in the exclusive possession of the African Company, but which now, after having been for a considerable time practically open, was in 1698 made so legally by an act of parliament permitting all the king's subjects, whether of England or of America, to trade to Africa on payment of a certain per centage to the Company on all goods exported or imported—negroes, however, being exempted even from this tax. The change thus made was "at that time," remarks Anderson, "in every one's judgment much to the benefit of the nation, more especially with relation to the commerce to our sugar colonies; for it was confessed by all that the separate traders had considerably reduced the price of negroes to our negro colonies, and consequently had so far the better enabled them to undersell our rivals." In the Newfoundland fishery the French had for some time before the Revolution been encroaching more and more upon the exclusive rights claimed by the English; the first specific complaint in King William's declaration of war against France in 1689 was, that, whereas not long since the French had been accustomed to take licenses from the English governor of Newfoundland for fishing in the seas upon that coast, and to pay tribute for such licenses, as an acknowledgment of the sole right of the crown of England to that island, yet of late their encroachments upon his subjects' trade and fishery there had been more like the invasions of an enemy than becoming friends who enjoyed the advantages of the said trade only by permission. The capture of Nova Scotia, however, at the commencement of the war would probably make us again sole masters of the neighbouring island. An act passed in 1698 for the encouragement of the trade to Newfoundland may be taken as evidence that it was then of considerable value. The preamble declares it to be "a beneficial trade to this kingdom, not only in the employing great numbers of seamen and ships, and exporting and consuming great quantities of provisions and manufactures of this realm, whereby many tradesmen and poor artificers are kept at work, but also in bringing into this nation, by returns of the effects of the said fishery from other countries, great quantities of wine, oil, plate, iron, wool, and sundry other useful commodities, to the increase of his majesty's revenue, and encouragement of trade and navigation." Then follow a number of regulations for the orderly carrying on of the fishery, of which the principal is, that, "according to the ancient custom there used," the master of the vessel from England first entering any harbour or creek in the island after the 25th of March should be admiral of the said harbour or creek during that fishing season, and should see the rules and orders laid down in the act duly put in execution within the limits of the jurisdiction thus assigned to him. It is expressly ordered that no subject of any foreign power "shall at any time hereafter take any bait, or use any sort of trade or fishing whatsoever," in Newfoundland, or in any of the adjacent islands. But this complete exclusion of other countries from the fishery was not long maintained. Measures were also taken a few years after the Revolution to revive the Greenland fishery. In 1692 a company was incorporated for carrying on this branch of trade, by the name of the Company of Merchants of London trading to Greenland, with a capital of 40,000*l.*, and a charter conferring upon them the usual powers of succession, &c., and the exclusive possession of the trade for fourteen years. The preamble of the act gives a sort of history of the way in which the old English trade to Greenland had come to be "quite decayed and lost." It recites that several merchants and others had been by an act passed in 1673 "encouraged to fit out and send to the said Greenland seas some ships or vessels for the catching of whales, whereby some small quantities of oil, blubber, and whale-fins were imported into this kingdom; but, they not being able to carry on the said trade upon their single or separate interests, in regard that the neighbouring nations did yearly send far greater numbers of ships into those seas, the said merchants and other persons of this kingdom were forced to desist from following the said trade, which is now wholly engrossed by foreigners; and since the expiration and revival of the said act there hath not been any ships sent from England to the said Greenland seas, or any oil, blubber, or whale-fins imported into England but such as have been bought of foreigners, whereby great sums of money are yearly drawn out of England for those commodities, and the rates and prices which are now paid for the same are now above six times more than heretofore they were; and, the said trade having been for above these twelve years last past wholly lost to this kingdom, there are very few or no English harpinierers or English seamen skilled and exercised in the said trade of whale-catching, so that the said trade cannot now be regained to this kingdom, nor can be carried on, by or without the assistance of foreign harpinierers, or upon the single interests or stocks of any particular persons, or by any other way than by a joint-stock."† The trade, however, thrived under this new system no better than before: after a year or two the Company subscribed an additional capital of 42,000*l.*, and in 1696 they got a new act exempting them from all duties upon the oil, &c., imported by them during the currency of their charter; but some years before that term expired they had expended their second capital, also, on which they resolved to abandon the speculation. In these circumstances the trade was in 1702 thrown open by parliament, the act declaring that it had been wholly neglected by the Company and lost to the nation.‡ But no further attempt appears to have been made by any English adventurer in this field of enterprise for many years. In 1699 the trade with Russia, now becoming every day of greater importance in the new position to which that country was raised by the reforms of Peter the Great, was also practically thrown open by an act entitling any person to admission into the Russian Company on payment of an entrance fee of 5*l.* The Turkey Company appears to have been at this date in the possession of an active and prosperous commerce. The French Council of Commerce, in a memorial drawn up in the year 1701, admit that the English then carried on the Levant trade (which was in the hands of this company) with much more advantage than the French, chiefly in consequence of our woollen cloths being both superior in quality and lower in price. "The English," adds the Memorial, "also carry to the Levant lead, pewter, copperas, and logwood, which are goods they are masters of; together with a great deal of pepper; and, that they may not drain their country of its gold and silver, they also take in dry fish of their own catching, sugar of their own colonies, and other goods of their own produce, which they sell on the coasts of Portugal, Spain, and Italy, for pieces of eight, which they carry to the Levant to make up a stock sufficient for purchasing their homeward cargoes."§

* Own Time, ii. 209.

† Ibid. ii. 209.

‡ Strictly speaking, the amount of stock held by each company was only 238,500*l.*, the remaining 25,000*l.* being held by parties who, although they had subscribed to the 2,000,000*l.* loan to government, had preferred trading separately to joining the New Company.

The French Council of Commerce was established by Louis XIV. in the year 1700. From its erection Anderson, writing about the middle of the last century, when it still subsisted, thinks there is good reason to date "the great and almost surprising increase of the commerce, woollen manufacture, mercantile shipping, and foreign colonies of France."|| We have noticed in the

* Qy. "by us?"

† 4 ib. and ib., c. 17.

‡ Ann. c. 12.

§ Quoted by Anderson, in Chron. of Com. iii. 7.

|| Chron. of Com. ii. 646.

* 25 Car. II. c. 7. § 1.

† In 1690 by 2 Will. and Mary, sess. 1. c. 4.

last Book the English Council or Board of the same kind established by Charles II. in 1668,* which however was kept up only for about five or six years. From the time when it was allowed to drop matters relating to commerce and the colonies had been usually referred to committees of the privy council, specially appointed to consider each new subject as it arose; but in 1694 King William issued a commission appointing a permanent Board of Trade to consist (in addition to the great officers of state, whose attendance was expected to be only occasional) of a first lord and seven other commissioners, each having a salary of 1000*l.* Among the first commissioners were the celebrated John Locke, and Pollexfen, the writer on commerce. They were styled "Commissioners for promoting the Trade of this Kingdom, and for inspecting and improving the Plantations in America and elsewhere;" and their instructions more particularly directed them to examine into and take accounts of the general trade of England, and of our foreign commerce in all its departments—"to consider by what means profitable manufactures, already settled, may be further improved, and how other new and profitable manufactures may be introduced"—"to consider of proper methods for setting on work and employing the poor, and making them useful to the public"—and, in regard to the plantations, or colonies, to superintend not only their commerce but their government in all respects.† From this last class of duties the Board of Trade must have been relieved, we presume, on the institution of the office of Secretary of State for the Colonies, or the American department, in 1768; but its other functions were understood to remain nearly the same as at its first establishment down to its abolition in 1782, when the business of this department of the executive government was made over to a permanent committee of the privy council, according to the arrangement that still subsists.

The Revolution was immediately followed by an innovation, which demands our special notice, in the law regulating the foreign trade in the most important of all productions, the article of corn. As far as the subject can be historically traced, the first law permitting the exportation of corn from England, without the royal license, was passed in 1394 (17 Rich. II. c. 7). By this law exportation, which appears to have been hitherto strictly prohibited, was made free in all circumstances, that is to say, whatever might be the price at home. The only check reserved was, that, as the king had formerly the power of allowing exportation in particular cases, so now he might forbid it when to do so appeared to him to be for the profit of the realm. The matter, therefore, in fact remained still, as before, under the control of the crown—with this difference, that, whereas non-exportation had been the general rule formerly, liberty of exportation was established as the general rule now. The alteration of the law may be taken as indicating the increased political power of the agricultural interest, and probably also the increased cultivation and produce of the soil. And these same two causes we find operating, with almost uninterrupted constancy, in moulding our corn laws more and more into the form most accordant with the interests of the producer down to the date at which we are now arrived. In 1436 (by 15 Hen. VI. c. 2), the right of exportation, in the case of the home price being under a certain point, was given absolutely, without any restriction or reservation whatever; the old power of prohibition was wholly taken from the king so long as prices remained below the sum specified; it was merely provided that he should have his customs and duties, as usual, upon the exported commodity. And, of course, by the unrepealed act of 1394, exportation, whatever might be the state of prices at home, was still also free, unless when expressly forbidden by royal proclamation. The limit fixed by the act of 1436, as that within which the right of exportation remained independent of the crown, was so long as the home price (of the quarter of wheat) did not exceed 6*s.* 8*d.* In 1463 (by 3 Ed. IV. c. 2) a new advantage was given to the producers, by importation being for the first time forbidden whenever prices should be under that point. In this state the law remained for seventy-one years. But then in 1534 an act was passed (the 25th Hen. VIII. c. 2) which (in so far at least as regarded the exportation of corn) swept away all the legislation of the preceding hundred and forty years, and suddenly restored for a time the old original state of the law, by which exportation was prohibited in all circumstances except under the royal license. The importation of the article, indeed, still remained fettered by the act of 1463; but probably that act was now nearly inoperative from the rise of prices that had taken place since it passed;—a change that would, to be sure, make the act of 1436 also a dead letter; so that what was really done by Henry VIII.'s act of 1534 was principally to repeal Richard II.'s act of 1394, which first made free exportation the rule and non-exportation the exception, time itself having done the rest. However, the law, as we have said, was now (except as to the partial and probably inapplicable and harmless restriction on importation) brought back in all respects to the state in which it was before the course of legislation in favour of the agricultural interest began. But this lasted for twenty years only. In 1554 (by the 1 and 2 Phil. and Mar. c. 5) the law of 1463 was revived, and exportation again made free when the price was under 6*s.* 8*d.* It is expressly stated in the preamble to this new act that the general prohibition of exportation by the act of 1534 had been extensively evaded or completely disregarded: "yet notwithstanding," are the words of the preamble, "many and sundry covetous and insatiable persons, seeking their own lucre and gains, had and daily do carry and convey innumerable quantity as well of corn, cheese, butter, and other victual [the prohibition had extended to all other articles of food as well as grain], as of wood, out of this realm into the parts beyond the seas; by reason whereof the said corn, victual, and wood are grown into a wonderful dearth and extreme prices." So that we see even this short solitary suspension of the onward movement of the land-cultivating, or rather of the land-owning, interest was rather nominal than real. But at any rate the subsequent advance of the landed interest in this course of acquisition was both steady and open enough. In 1562 (by the 17th, or, in the common editions, the 26th section of the 5 Eliz. c. 5, curiously entitled "An Act touching certain politic constitutions made for the maintenance of the Navy") the limit within which there should be a free exportation of wheat was enlarged by the elevation of the terminating price to 10s. the quarter; a corresponding alteration being at the same time made for other descriptions of grain. In 1571 (by the 13 Eliz. c. 13) the law of 1394 was restored, and exportation was made free, whatever might be the home price, at all times when no proclamation had been issued to the contrary. Then by a succession of acts the limits within which the right of exportation was made absolute, and independent even of the control of the royal prerogative, were gradually extended, by the elevation of the terminating price in 1623 (by the 21 Jac. I. c. 28) to 32s.; in 1660 (by the 12 Car. II. c. 4) to 40s.; and in 1663 (by the 15 Car. II. c. 7) to 48s. Up to this point, however, although the landed interest had been successful in breaking down to a considerable extent the ancient policy of the kingdom, which was prohibitory of exportation in all circumstances, it cannot be said (if we except the law of 1463 forbidding importation while the home price was under 6s. 8d., which had now long ceased to be operative, if it ever had been so) that any unfair advantage had been given to the growers of corn; all that had been done in their favour had only tended to make the trade in corn more and more free, by removing part of the restrictions that had been laid upon the export of the commodity. But soon after this a new system was begun. In 1670 (by the 22 Car. II. c. 13) not only was the home price up to which exportation should be free raised to 53s. 4d., but for the first time (for we may disregard altogether the obsolete act of 1463) importation was restrained, by being loaded with a prohibitory amount of duty so long as the price in the home-market was under 53s. 4d., and even with a very heavy duty, 8s. per quarter, when the home price reached that point and until it rose to 80s. This was the law in force at the time of the Revolution. Corn could not be brought from abroad at all till the price at home rose to 53s. 4d., and even not then without the payment of a tax which made it necessary that the cost of purchase and charge of conveyance should not together have amounted to so much as

* See vol. III. p. 655.

† See abstract of the original Commission in Maepherson's Annals of Commerce, ii. 680.

45s. 4d.; and at the same time its exportation was perfectly free (except that it paid a moderate custom duty, like all other commodities) until it rose at home to a price which it might be safely presumed would make the sending it abroad no longer profitable. This, we might suppose, would have been deemed protection for agriculture enough. But not so; immediately after the Revolution an act was passed (the 1 Will. and Mary, c. 12) which introduced the new principle of actually paying the landlords for sending their produce out of the country, by allowing a bounty of 5s. upon every quarter of wheat exported so long as the home price did not exceed 48s. Nor was even this all that was done to promote exportation; in 1699 (by the 11 Will. III. c. 20) "for the greater encouragement of tillage," corn sent abroad was relieved even from all custom-house duties. It was time, indeed, to cease levying duties with the one hand upon that which we were paying bounties to encourage on the other.

Under the system of bounties, which was maintained throughout the present period and long after its close (for it was not till the year 1773 that the law of 1689 was partially, and not till 1815 that it was wholly, repealed), England became a corn-exporting country to some, though never to any very considerable extent. In 1697, for instance, 14,699 quarters of wheat and flour were sent abroad; in 1699 the quantity fell to 557; but in 1700 it was 49,056; and in the ten following years, while it rose in 1706 to 188,332, it never was under 74,000, till 1710, when it fell to 13,924. In the ten years from 1711 to 1720 it ranged from 71,800 quarters to 176,227, except in 1717, when it was only 22,954. In 1722 it was 178,880; in 1723, 157,720; in 1724, 245,865; and in 1725, 204,413. But in 1727 it had fallen to 30,315; and in 1728 to 3,817; nor in 1729 was it more than 18,993. After this, with the exception of a few unproductive years (1740, 1741, 1757, and 1758), in which it was very insignificant, it was seldom less than from 200,000 to 400,000, and sometimes it was considerably more: thus, in 1733 it was 427,199; in 1734, 498,196; in 1737, 461,602; in 1738, 580,596; in 1748, 543,387; in 1749, 629,049; in 1750, 947,602 (which was the highest amount it ever reached); and in 1751, 661,416. It has often been contended, and formerly it was an opinion almost universally held that, by the extension of tillage which it occasioned, the system of bounties upon the exportation of corn in fact operated to keep down the price of the commodity in the home-market. "In other states," observes the Count de Boulainvilliers, "private persons pay the government for the exportation of grain; England acts quite otherwise, and pays them. All common means made use of to that time to increase the fruits of the earth had been insufficient, or at least of little use. Before that epoch the agriculture of England was of little account in Europe. As long as that monarchy thought only of its own subsistence, it always found itself short of the necessary; it was very often obliged to have recourse to foreigners to make up the deficiency of the growth of the nation; but, when it made its agriculture an object of commerce, the cultivation of its land became one of the most abundant in Europe. Without that stroke of state, the best concerted of all those which have yet appeared in modern politics, England had never sown but for herself; for what could she have done with the surplus of her grain? It was the bounty only which could assure her of the sale in foreign markets, and, for that reason, be the only source of the augmentation of her harvests. Let us combine all the means which that monarchy hath put in use, for an age past, to establish its power, and we shall find that it is to this in particular that she is indebted for her elevation.* In later times this reasoning has generally been considered to be as mistaken as it is paradoxical, and the effects which it attributes to the bounty system have been traced to quite other causes; but it is at least certain that, howsoever caused, a reduction rather than a rise of the price of corn did follow this artificial encouragement given to its exportation. Grain was in general, according to Charles Smith, from fifteen to twenty per cent. cheaper during the seventy years that followed the enactment of the law of 1689 than it had been for forty years before that time.† For some years after the Restoration the average price of wheat exceeded 50s. the quarter; nor was it under 41s. at the date of the Revolution: for the ten years ending with 1695 it appears to have been about 39s. 6d.; for the ten ending 1705, about 43s.; for the ten ending 1715, about 44s.; for the twenty ending 1735, about 35s.; for the ten ending 1745, about 32s.; and for the ten ending 1755, about 33s.

According to an account given by Davenant, the official value of our entire exports for the year 1699 was 6,788,166*l.*; of which sum the woollen manufacture alone furnished not less than 2,932,292*l.*, or considerably nearer one-half than one-third.‡ Elsewhere the same writer estimates our total exports to France in that year at 103,961*l.*; in 1700 at 287,049*l.*; and in 1701 at 213,004*l.*: the values of the imports from that country being 76,272*l.* for 1699; 94,641*l.* for 1700; and 123,940*l.* for 1701.§ The only articles he particularises are, among the exports, woollen goods and lead; among the imports, linen, paper, wine, brandy, and kid-skins. On the whole it appears that the trade with France was considerably less now than it had been in the time of free intercourse which immediately succeeded the Restoration. The trade with Holland, on the other hand, had greatly increased. Up to the year 1669, according to Davenant, our exports to that country consisted of only 45 species of rated goods, whereas by the beginning of the reign of Anne we exported thither 120 or 130 different kinds. Formerly our principal exports to Holland were woollen goods, tin, lead, brass, molasses, wrought silk, butter, and morkins (hides); our principal importations thence, linens, wrought silk, thrown silk, threads, inkles, spicery, madder, battery, stock-fish, whale-fins, hemp, flax, unwrought copper, Rhenish wine, safflower, and iron ware. Of our woollens exported to Holland, the value in 1669 was 79,953*l.*; in 1703, 1,339,526*l.*: of our lead, 297*l.* in 1669; 38,283*l.* in 1703: of our tin, 1,635*l.* in 1669; 17,051*l.* in 1703. Altogether the value of our exports of the eight principal articles was 153,799*l.* in the former year, and 1,404,920*l.* in the latter. Of molasses, however, of which we exported thither to the value of 57,510*l.* in 1669, there appears to have been no exportation at all to Holland in 1703. On the other hand, many foreign, colonial, and East India goods entered into our exports in the latter year, which either formed no part of them, or a much smaller part, in the former. Of sugar and foreign fruits we re-exported to Holland in 1703 to the value of 114,416*l.*; of pepper, drugs, and dyeing substances to the value of 63,865*l.*; of tobacco to that of 143,596*l.*; of foreign wool to that of 7,800*l.*; and of cotton yarn to that of 1,783*l.* The East India goods re-exported to Holland this year amounted in value to 345,647*l.* We also now sent a considerable quantity of corn to the Dutch, a commodity of which in 1669 none was exported. Davenant says that in the year 1703 there was entered for exportation in all sorts of grain to the value of 12,202*l.* from London, and of 168,067*l.* from the outports; making altogether 180,269*l.: but this appears to have been to all foreign parts. The imports, however, from Holland in these two years do not exhibit so great a difference: their total amount in 1669 was 501,674*l.*; and in 1703, 522,413*l.* The principal articles of which there appears to have been an increase of importation are linens (from 170,972*l.* to 213,701*l.*), thrown silk (from 2,878*l.* to 15,966*l.*), and threads (from 11,694*l.* to 51,138*l.*): on the other hand there was a falling off in wrought silk, spicery, Rhenish wine, and several other articles. In the seven years from 1699 to 1705 inclusive, the average value of our exports to Holland is stated to have been 1,937,934*l.*, and that of our imports from that country, 549,832*l.* The latter, Davenant remarks, had "continued for several years in a manner at a stand, seldom exceeding half a million per annum." If we add the exports, which the account does not include, that sum might be increased by about a fourth. Our exports to Holland, on the other hand, had been constantly augmenting, their excess over the imports having, in some of the seven years, been not less than 1,500,000*l.* But, whether or no v. 460.

* Les Intérêts de la France mal entendus; 2 tom. 12mo. Amst. 1707; quoted in Mr. C. Smith's Tracts on the Corn Laws, p. 162.

† Tracts on the Corn Laws, p. 73 (second edition).

‡ Second Report to Commissioners of Public Accounts, Works,

§ First Report, Works, v. 256.

* Davenant, First Report, p. 418, where it is printed 1699; a misprint that also occurs in other places.

this seeming overbalance in trade with the Dutch had been all to the profit of this kingdom, Davenant, with a degree of good sense and sagacity superior to his time, is inclined to doubt. "If," he continues, "according to the vulgar notion, this large overbalance had been all clear gain to England, it would have been some kind of recompense for the interruptions so long a war has brought to other branches of our foreign traffic; but nothing can be more fallacious than, because a country takes off more of our commodities than we do of theirs, to argue from thence that our dealings with that country are always beneficial to us. . . If, for the last twenty-three years, the Dutch had so far augmented their luxuries as to want for their own consumption that vast bulk of commodities they have so constantly fetched from this kingdom, and if we had been all along so reformed in our manners as to stand in little need of foreign goods, Holland must have been great losers, and we great gainers, by the dealings that have been between us. If they had not found their accounts in the prodigious quantity of effects annually exported thither from hence, and if so wise a state had perceived itself to carry on a losing trade, they would have put a stop to this mischief, either by prohibitions of, or high duties upon, our product and manufacture, for which they had a sufficient pretence from the additional impositions we have been compelled to lay upon their linens and other goods; but they have been too prudent to be frightened with the false appearance of an overbalance, well knowing, the more they brought from hence, the better opportunities they had to enlarge their general traffics." He then proceeds, by an examination of details, to show that the greater part of the commodities taken from us by the Dutch were in reality re-exported by them to other countries. In the course of this investigation he notices various facts which throw a light upon the then state both of our own commerce and of that of the world. The total value of our exports of woollen manufactures to Holland, which in 1703, as we have seen; was 1,339,526*l.*, was in 1663 only 79,953*l.* Of three articles alone, perpetuanas, serges, and stuffs, we sent the Dutch in 1703 to the value of 798,527*l., or ten times the amount of our whole exportation of woollens to them forty years before. That people cannot possibly, argues Davenant, have within the period in question so increased in numbers, wealth and luxury, as to want for their own consumption so great a quantity of these articles over and above what they were wont to call for. "The fact is," he continues, "that they purchase those immense cargoes to re-export to other countries, and so they are become, in a more extended degree than heretofore, the carriers of our commodities to foreign markets; that is to say, they supply those parts which we, for want of industry, have not embraced, or where our traffic has been interrupted by the war. It is easy to prove that for the last twenty years great parcels of our fine draperies, and other woollen manufactures, went into France through Flanders, by the connivance of governors and by compositions with the French farmers,* to the value, (as I am well informed, when in Holland about six years since) of near 300,000*l.* per annum. Since the trade with the Spaniards has been interrupted, they must have carried of the same goods great quantities to Portugal; otherwise, how could they dispose of all the baize sent from hence to Holland, which article of baize, from 1699 to 1704, amounts to, at a medium of the said five years, 92,526*l.* per annum—a larger proportion than they can possibly be conceived to consume themselves; and from Portugal it must have found its way to Spain and the West Indies. The same may be said of perpetuanas, serges, says, and other stuffs; as also of stockings, woollen and worsted, for men, women, and children. During both the wars, not only the fine draperies, but manufactures from the long wool, got into France from the frontier places, which turned to the profit of Holland; and of late years, since they have so much enlarged their traffics, and accumulated such a stock of wealth to support their trade, they have carried up the rivers into Germany great parcels of fine cloths, stuffs, says, and serges, which our merchants were wont formerly to export to Hamburg and other parts of the German empire upon their own accounts." So likewise with regard to the tin taken from us by the Dutch. Our export of tin to all foreign countries amounted in 1663 to 153 tons; in 1669 to 240; in the three years of peace, from 1698 to 1700, on an average, to 1297; and in the ten years of war, from 1700 to 1710, on an average, to 1094. In these last ten years the Dutch alone bought from us annually, on an average, 5937 cwt., or nearly 300 tons, of the estimated value of 21,374*l.* "It is not difficult," says Davenant, "to account for the reasons why our late exportations of tin so far exceed those of former times. All our neighbours, as well as ourselves, have increased in the luxurious ways of living; such who heretofore were content with pewter are now served in plate, and such as made use of trenchers, wooden platters, and earthenware will now have pewter; all which is visible within forty years, and has occasioned this great call of a commodity almost peculiar to us." The quantity of tin raised from the mines, however, was still greater than the demands of the home-market and of foreign countries together took off our hands; at the time when Davenant wrote, her majesty, for whose behoof the mines were wrought, had unsold between 4000 and 5000 tons, or as much as would supply the consumption of the next four or five years. "As the case stands at present," he adds, "Holland is the great magazine for tin; the necessities of such as have it upon their hands, either in merchandise or security, drive it thither, and the Dutch set what price they please upon this rich product of England, to the damage of the public." He proposes that a thousand tons of the dead stock should be coined into tin halfpence and farthings. The annual quantity of tin that was raised in England, however, went on increasing from this time, instead of being diminished:—the quantity which had accumulated in Davenant's time is only about a year's produce of the mines at present. He next proceeds to our exports of corn. This, he observes, "is, in a manner, a new exportation, arising to us from the war, which has in other countries so employed the hands of their people that they could not till the ground, or from dearths or plagues, wherewith divers nations have been afflicted for these last twenty-three years." Formerly only a very small quantity of grain was sent from the port of London to Holland, Spain, Denmark, Africa, the Plantations, Italy, and Portugal: in 1663 the entire estimated value of the corn so exported was only 4315*l.*, and in 1699 not more than 2011*l.* "Whereas now," continues our author, "we export grain of all sorts to Africa, Canaries, Denmark and Norway, East Country, Flanders, France, Germany, Holland, Ireland, Italy, Madeiras, Newfoundland, Portugal, Russia, Scotland, Spain, Sweden, Venice, Isles of Guernsey, &c., and English Plantations." In the eleven years from 1700 to 1710, inclusive, the average total export of grain from England was of the estimated value of 274,171*l.*; of which the value of that entered for exportation to Holland alone averaged 151,934*l.* "What part of this commodity," says Davenant, "is for their own consumption, and what part they re-export to other countries, does not appear to me; but so far is certain—when corn bears a high price in foreign markets, they send large cargoes of it to the places where it finds a good vent; and it has been known that in years of scarcity they bring us back our own wheat, because of the premium we give upon exportation, and which they are enabled to do by having large granaries almost in every great town, wherein they store large quantities in cheap years, to answer the demands of other countries." Of tobacco our average annual importation from Virginia, for the ten years from 1700 to 1709 inclusive, had been 28,858,666 lbs.; and we had annually re-exported to foreign countries 17,598,007 lbs., of which quantity Holland alone took from us 7,851,157 lbs., or not much less than the half. "This product of our plantations," Davenant observes, "carried to Holland, brings considerable profit to that country; besides that the manufacturing of it, when there, employs a great number of their people. What proportion of it they consume themselves cannot well be stated; but so far is known, that they mix it with the tobacco of their own growth, viz., for France, one-third inland and two-thirds Virginia; making it finer or coarser, and adding to or diminishing the quantity of Virginia, and making some up only with our tobacco-stalks mixed with their own leaves, according to the use of the country whereunto they export it." According to an account which he had seen, and which he believed to be authentic, the Dutch had come by the year 1706 to grow at home, in their three provinces of Utrecht, Guelderland, Overysseel, and part of the duchy of Cleves, 13,000,000 lbs. of tobacco, although seven years before they did not raise more than 8,000,000 lbs. It appears from this account, that in the beginning of the last century our own consumption of tobacco exceeded 11,000,000 lbs.; at present, with probably double the population, it is only about 16,000,000 lbs. Nor is our entire annual importation of tobacco much more than it was then: in 1831, for instance, it was only about 33,000,000 lbs. The last class of our exports to Holland which Davenant examines is that of our East India goods. He begins by observing that Amsterdam and Rotterdam were then in a manner the magazines for the wrought silk, Bengal stuffs mixed with silk or herba of the manufacture of Persia, China, or East India, and for all calicoes painted, dyed, printed, or stained in those parts, which commodities, since their use had been prohibited here,* were chiefly sent to Holland, that country taking off, on the average of the four years from 1702 to 1705 inclusive, above 94,916 lbs. worth of them annually. He apprehends that the Dutch in this way drew into their pockets the greater part of the profits of our East India trade; and that such would continue to be the case so long as our own merchants were, by the law preventing the home consumption of the commodities in question, confined to that one foreign market. As for the supposed interference of these India fabrics with our woollen manufactures abroad, he does not think there is much or anything in that objection. "For these last thirty years," he observes, "in which the East India trade has been carried on to the highest pitch, we are not decreased in the manufactures from long wool, but rather the contrary, and to a large degree. . . . Nor does it appear to me, from any observation I can make, that East India goods have hurt the general traffic of our woollen manufactures in foreign markets; these silks and stuffs seem rather a commodity calculated for the middle rank of people; they are too vulgar to be worn by the best sort, and too costly for the lowest rank; so that the use of them remains in the middle rank, who (the luxuries of the world still increasing) would wear European silks if they had not East India stuffs and painted calicoes, whereby the vent of our woollen goods abroad would certainly be lessened." On the whole, Davenant concludes, "the truth of the case appears to be, that, especially during this last war (while our trade with France and Spain has been interrupted) large quantities of the woollen manufactures, corn, tin, tobacco, with divers other commodities, have been sent to Holland, which goods in the former course of trade we exported directly ourselves, and mostly in our own shipping, to the increase of our navigation, which the war having rendered difficult, and their ports being less exposed than ours to the danger of privateers, as well in ships outward as homeward bound, the Hollanders have in a great measure got to be the carriers of our goods; but, as our exports thither have increased all along, so our exports to other parts must, in proportion, have diminished, and what we seem to have gained in our dealings there we have lost in the general balance of our trade with other countries." Taking the year 1703, it appears that the value of our exports to all foreign parts was 6,544,103*l.*, while that of our exports to Holland alone was 2,417,890*l.*, or very nearly a third of the whole. Of the 2,417,890*l.* there was exported in English bottoms 1,502,169*l.*, and in foreign bottoms 915,720*l.* Of the imports from Holland for that year, to the value of 289,844*l.* was brought in English, and 232,568*l.* in foreign vessels. And these same proportions Davenant believes would nearly hold for other years. We may hence perceive the extent to which the carrying trade, both in goods for the English market and in English produce and manufactures, was at this time in the hands of foreigners, and principally of the Dutch.

* He is writing in 1712.

* Of customs.

* See Vol. III. 689.—These East India goods were prohibited in England, and only allowed to be imported for re-exportation, in 1694, by the 11 Will. III. c. 30. entitled "An Act for the more effectual employing the poor, by encouraging the manufactures of this Kingdom."

As for the prevalent notion which Davenant takes so much pains to combat, that this trade with Holland must needs be a profitable one, simply because our exports so much exceeded our imports, it was as irrational as it would be to maintain that the productive labourer must always be a greater gainer upon the article he produces than the capitalist who employs him. The Dutch here stood in the position of the capitalist, and the English of the labourer. The former, in fact, employed the latter to work for them—to produce the goods which they sold at a profit to other countries. Of course, in such a connexion, while the Dutch had the goods the English had the money—just as while the master has his goods the workmen has his wages; and thus, and thus alone, was brought about, in the exchange between the two countries, that excess in our receipt of money or bullion constituting the so called favourable balance of the mercantile and manufacturing theories.* But that the excess of profit or real advantage should be with the labourer rather than with the capitalist may fairly be presumed to be as unusual, and as little likely in the nature of things, in the case of nations as of individuals.

Davenant incidentally mentions in the Report from which we have abstracted these notices, that, on an average of the seven years from 1699 to 1705 inclusive, our exports to Germany had amounted to the estimated value of 838,791*l.*, and our imports thence to that of 677,521*l.*† This, he observes, "is no considerable excess from so large and populous a country, especially when it is considered what quantities of German linens have been imported hither since the first war with France, which German linens must have been answered by an adequate quantity of our woollen manufactures, if the Dutch did not intercept us in the traffic by our own commodities." Such as it was, however, this excess of exports over imports made our trade with Germany be considered a profitable one, as well as that with Holland. In our dealings with the countries in the north of Europe, on the contrary, as in those with France, we were losers, according to this way of calculating, if we may trust an account from which it appears that in the trade with Denmark and Norway, on the average of the four years from 1698 to 1701 inclusive, our annual imports amounted to 76,215*l.*, and our exports only to 39,543*l.*; in that with the East country our imports to 181,296*l.*, and our exports only to 149,893*l.*; in that with Russia, our imports to 112,252*l.*, and our exports only to 58,884*l.*; and in that with Sweden, our imports to 212,094*l.*, and our exports only to 57,555*l. These figures may at any rate be taken as showing the extent of our commercial intercourse at this time with the countries in question.

Down to this, and indeed to a much later date, our chief article of produce and export continued, as of old, to be our woollens. This important manufacture was the subject of various legislative regulations in the reign of William. Immediately after the Revolution an act was passed, renewing and strengthening the former laws against the exportation of the raw material, which, the preamble alleges, had of late years been extensively violated, "through the remissness and negligence of officers and others."† In 1698, however, we find the parliament again complaining that, nevertheless, the sending of the commodity abroad was still "notoriously continued, to the great prejudice and discouragement of the woollen trade and manufacture of England."‡ The next year the jealousy with which this great staple was watched over was strikingly evinced by the passing of an act which, after declaring that "the wool and the woollen manufactures of cloth, serge, baize, kerseys, and other stuffs made or mixed with wool, are the greatest and most profitable commodities of this kingdom, on which the value of lands and the trade of the nation do chiefly depend," proceeds to state, that "great quantities of the like manufactures have of late been made and are daily increasing in the kingdom of Ireland and in the English plantations in America, and are exported from thence to foreign markets heretofore supplied from England, which will inevitably sink the value of lands, and tend to the ruin of the trade and the woollen manufactures of this realm;" and thereupon strictly prohibits the export in future both of wool and of woollen goods to any part of

* Quoted by Anderson, Chron. of Com., iii. 11, from the monthly periodical called the Political State of Great Britain, for November, 1778.

† 1 W. and M., c. 32.

‡ 3 Will. III., c. 40.

* See Vol. iii. 863.

† Second Report, p. 420.

the world except to England, from either Ireland or the Plantations.* Finally, in the following session, by the same act which put an end to all duties on the exportation of corn, all subsisting duties upon the exportation of home woollen manufactures were also taken off, on the ground that "the wealth and prosperity of this kingdom doth in a great measure depend upon the improvement of its woollen manufactures, and the profitable trade carried on by the exportation of the same."† The system of artificial protection, however, was not in this case carried to the length of actually stimulating the exportation of either wool or woollens by bounties, as had been done with regard to corn.

In 1697 Davenant estimated the value of the wool yearly shorn in England at about 2,000,000.‡ At a general medium he conceives the material to be probably improved about fourfold in the working; so that the entire annual value of our woollen manufactures at this time might be set down at about 8,000,000. Of all the cloth made he allows a fourth for exportation; there would, therefore, remain for home consumption about 6,000,000. worth. These inferences, however, are probably considerable exaggerations. More reliance may perhaps be placed upon an account which he says he had procured "from a very skilful hand," and from which it would appear that the quantity of fine cloth manufactured in England from Spanish wool in the year 1688 was about 19,000 pieces, of which about 9000 were exported (8420 from the port of London, 614 from the outports), and 10,000 reserved for home consumption.§ "Some people," this writer elsewhere observes, "have been apt to fear that we sink in the woollen manufacture, because the accounts of the draperies exported have been heretofore larger than of late years; but such do not contemplate that, though the old may have lessened, what are commonly called the new draperies have increased, consisting in bays, serges, and stuffs; so that, upon the whole, infinitely more of the material of wool has of late years been wrought up for foreign use than in former times; and herein our merchants have been only forced to follow the modes and humour of those people with whom they deal, and the course they have pursued has hitherto not been detrimental to the public. Nor is there any cause to apprehend but that we may increase from time to time in the general manufacture of wool, though the exportation of particular commodities may now and then vary; for, upon the whole, our material is better and fitter for all uses than that of most countries. It were better, indeed, that the call from abroad were only for the fine draperies, because then we should be in a manner without a rival; no country but England and Ireland having a sward or turf that will rear sheep producing the wool of which most of our draperies are made. It is true the wool of Spain is fine above all others; but it is the wear only of the richer sort, and of Spanish cloths not above 9000 pieces are sent abroad communibus annis; and even in the working up of this wool perhaps it may be made out that our very climate gives us an advantage over other countries."¶ This was written in 1699. The act allowing woollen goods to be exported duty free came into operation the following year, and apparently produced a considerable increase of exportation; the duty received in the three years before the repeal having amounted to 129,640*l.*, and that which would have been payable upon the quantities of woollen manufactures entered for exportation in the three following years to 150,829*l.*,—a difference which, as the duty was an ad valorem one of five per cent., implied an increase of exports upon the three years to the value of 425,040*l.*, or of about 142,000*l.* per annum. But Davenant maintains that, "to carry on some mystery of trade," the merchants, now that it cost them nothing, were accustomed to enter larger quantities than they really exported, especially of the perpetuanas, serges, and other coarser descriptions of cloth. By the books of the Custom House, he says, the exportation of woollens would appear to be growing every year larger and larger, while at the same time there was a general complaint all over England of wool being a drug.†

The amount of the trade of England, in so far as it gave employment to our own shipping, whether for intercourse with foreign parts or for coasting purposes, and also its distribution over the country, at the end of the reign of King William, may be collected from an account of the mercantile marine of the kingdom as it existed in January, 1702, which has been drawn up from returns then made to the inquiries instituted by the Commissioners of the Customs. From this account it appears that there belonged to the port of London 560 vessels, of the average burden of about 151 tons, and 10,065 men; to Bristol 165 vessels, of 105 tons on an average, and 2,359 men; to Yarmouth 143 vessels, of 62 tons on an average, and 668 men; to Exeter 121 vessels, of the burden of 58 or 59 tons on an average, and 978 men; to Hull 115 vessels, of nearly 66 tons on an average, and 187 men (80 of the Hull vessels were at this time laid up); to Whitby 110 vessels, of 75 tons on an average, and 371 men; to Liverpool 102 vessels, of between 84 and 85 tons on an average, and 1101 men; and to Scarborough 100 vessels, of nearly 69 tons on an average, and 606 men. None of the other ports had so many as a hundred vessels; but Newcastle had

* 10 Will. III. c. 16 (c. 10. in common editions).

† 11 Will. III. c. 20.

‡ Discourse on the East India Trade, Works, ii. 146. His calculation is, that there were annually shorn about twelve millions of fleeces; the average value of 3*s.* 4*d.* per fleece, somewhat above eight fleeces making a tod of wool, the average price of which was 2*s.*, or 1*s.* 8*d.* a pound. Gregory King, in his Political Conclusions (1696), estimates the value of the wool yearly shorn at the same sum with Davenant.

§ Works, ii. 145.

* Essay upon the Probable Methods of making a people gainers in the Balance of Trade, in Works, ii. 237.

† Second Report on Public Accounts, in Works, v. 445.

63, measuring in all 11,000 tons, or above 178 tons on an average, and Ipswich 39; measuring 11,170 tons in all, or above 286 tons on an average. The number of vessels belonging to all the ports in England was 2281, measuring 261,222 tons, or nearly 80 tons on an average; and the total number of seamen 27,196. The vessels carried among them 5660 guns.* According to the account laid before the House of Commons by the Navy Office in 1791 which we have referred to on former occasions, the royal navy at the end of William's reign was of the estimated burden of 159,017 tons. A statement given on the authority of Pepys, the author of the Diary, who had been Secretary to the Admiralty in the reigns of Charles II. and James II., makes the number of ships, of fifty tons and upwards, forming the royal navy in 1695, to have been above 200, weighing in all above 112,400 tons, and manned by 45,000 sailors.† The entire number of seamen, therefore, which the kingdom could furnish at this time was probably above seventy thousand. It was in 1696, we may here mention, that the noble institution of Greenwich Hospital was founded for aged and disabled sailors (though not opened till 1705) by an act of parliament, which at the same time established a registry in which mariners, seamen, watermen, fishermen, lightermen, barge-men, keelmen, and other seafaring persons, between the ages of eighteen and fifty, were invited to enrol their names and places of residence, to the number of 30,000, on which they were to receive a bounty or retaining fee of 40s. annually, on condition of holding themselves at all times in readiness to man the royal navy.‡ This registry, however, which aimed at furnishing a substitute for imprisonment, was discontinued in 1710, on the alleged ground that it had not produced the good effects intended for the service of the crown, or the encouragement of seamen, but, on the contrary, had occasioned much charge, vexation, and trouble.§ In this same year, 1696, the first light-house was begun to be erected on the Eddystone rock, off Plymouth, by Winstanley, at the expense of the corporation of the Trinity House. It was not, however, completed till the year 1700, and it was blown down on the 26th of November, 1703, when Winstanley himself, happening to be at the rock superintending some repairs, perished with all his workmen. A new light-house, entirely of wood (Winstanley's had been partly of stone), was some years after erected by Rudyerd, which stood till it was burned down in 1755, when it was succeeded by the present admirable stone structure, the work of the late Mr. Smeaton.

* Note in Macpherson's Annals of Commerce, li. 719. Macpherson, who does not quote his authority for this account, expresses a doubt as to the correctness of the figures in the case of the tonnage assigned to the Ipswich vessels. Chalmers, in Estimate, pp. 87, 88, refers evidently to the same account, as "A detail in the Plantation Office," although he assigns it to the year 1701, instead of 1703, and gives (apparently by a typographical error) the number of sailors as only 16,391.

† Given in Gibson's Translation of Camden's Britannia, 2nd edit. i. 384.

‡ 7 and 8 Will. III. c. 21.

§ 9 Anne, c. 15 (21) editions.

On the whole the reign of William; notwithstanding the pressure of the war which extended over the greater part of it, certainly did not by any means either reverse or interrupt the progress the country was previously making in economical prosperity, although it may have somewhat slackened the rate of its advance. It may be asserted, in the words of a late writer, "that manufactures flourished in the mean time; that there was a great demand for labour; that the foreign traffic and navigation of England doubled from the peace of Ryswick to the accession of Queen Anne. For the re-coining of the silver, meantime, produced an exhilarating effect on industry, in the same proportion as the debasement of the current coin is always disadvantageous to the lower orders, and dishonourable to the state. The revival of public credit after the peace of Ryswick, and the rising of the notes of the Bank of England to par, strengthened private confidence, at the same time that these causes invigorated our manufactures and our trade. And the spirit of population was still more animated by the many acts of naturalisation which were readily passed, during every session, in the reign of William, and which clearly evince how many industrious foreigners found shelter in England from the persecution of countries less tolerant and free."* The national industry and enterprise, indeed, could not fail to receive new animation and vigour, in all their departments, from the increased security of person and property which the Revolution brought with it to every inhabitant of the kingdom, and from the very spirit of freedom that might now be said to vivify and enrich the air of England.

A still larger proportionate as well as actual part of the reign of Anne than that of William was spent in war, and, both from the greater extent to which military operations were carried on, and from the accumulation of the debt, the public burthens were now considerably increased; but, notwithstanding the cry which was as usual kept up by faction about the continued decay of the national resources, well established facts sufficiently prove that, even during the course of this second war with France the country, as soon as it had rallied from the first effects of the shock that again broke up and threw into confusion the relations to which it had begun to accommodate itself during the short previous interval of peace, rather made way than fell off in commercial and general prosperity, and that after the war was over its unfettered energies carried it forward at a rate such as it had perhaps never before experienced. It appears that the estimated value of our exports had been reduced by the year 1705 to 5,308,966*l.*; but from this point of greatest depression our foreign trade gradually so far recovered, that in 1709 the value of our exports to all countries had risen to 5,913,357*l.*; in 1711 to 5,962,988*l.*; and in 1712, when indeed hostilities had nearly ceased except in name, to 6,868,840*l.* In 1713, 1714, and 1716, the three years that immediately followed the war, their average amount was 7,696,573*l.—which was nearly a million sterling beyond their amount during the preceding peace. In another respect our foreign trade had now become more advantageous than it then had been: the total tonnage of the ships annually cleared outwards on the average of the years 1699, 1700, and 1701 had been 337,328 tons, and in the years 1713, 1714, and 1715, its average amount was 448,004 tons; but the portion of it that was foreign at the former period was 43,625 tons, whereas now that was only 26,573 tons—so that the native shipping employed in our foreign trade had increased in this interval from 293,703 to 421,431 tons, or by considerably more than a third. The progress of the post-office revenue does not indeed afford an equally favourable indication; but this we believe to be attributable to the great extent to which franking was now carried—an evidence of which we have in the fact that in the year 1722, when the net revenue of the post-office was only about 98,000*l.*, it was calculated that there was withdrawn from the gross revenue by franked letters no less a sum than 33,397*l.* The practice of franking is traced back to the Restoration; but it was probably not extensively practised till after the Revolution; from about which time, however, notwithstanding several attempts to regulate it and protect it from abuse, it appears to have been, in part by fraud and forgery, in part by merely the more liberal or unscrupulous use of the legal privilege, carried to a greater excess every year down to the close of the present period. In the first four years of the war, that is, from 1702 to 1705 inclusive, the net average annual revenue of the post-office declined to 61,568*l.*—a falling off which it seems impossible to suppose could have been owing simply to the war. On the average of the four years from 1707 to 1710 inclusive it was still less, having fallen to 58,052*l.*; nor did the augmentation of the rates one-third in 1711, and the restoration of peace together, raise it on the average of the four years ending with 1714 to a higher sum than 90,223*l.*, although the Scottish post-office, contributing about 2000*l.* a-year, was now incorporated with the English. It may be taken as an evidence of the growth of capital that the legal rate of interest was in 1714 reduced from six to five per cent., at which it still nominally continues.

* Chalmers, Estimate, p. 81.

One of the most important events affecting our foreign trade that took place in the reign of Anne was the conclusion in December, 1703, of the famous commercial arrangement with Portugal, commonly called the Methuen Treaty, after the ambassador by whom it was negotiated, by which, on condition of our admitting the wines of the growth of Portugal on payment of a duty one-third less than was paid upon French wines, his Portuguese majesty agreed to admit our woollen cloths on the same terms as before they were prohibited, which they appear to have been for about twenty years. This treaty, which continued to be observed till the year 1831, was, in great part no doubt owing to the anti-Gallic temper which prevailed in the public mind, generally regarded at the time as one of the greatest advantages ever secured for our trade and manufactures, and it long continued to be the theme of boundless laudation with all our writers on subjects of commerce and political economy who aspired to the reputation of either orthodoxy or patriotism. As a specimen of the style in which it was wont to be spoken of, and of the beneficial effects that were attributed to it, the reader may take the following passage from Mr. Charles King's Dedication to the collection of papers entitled The British Merchant to the son of Methuen:—"Your father, often ambassador extraordinary to the King of Portugal, procured for Great Britain that glorious treaty of commerce, by which she gains above a million a-year. By this treaty we paid our armies in Spain and Portugal, and drew from thence in the late war considerable sums for our troops in other parts, without remitting one farthing from England; and at the same time coined in the Tower above a million of Portugal gold in three years. By this treaty we gain a greater balance from Portugal only than from any other country whatsoever; and at this time it is the only country from whence we have any balance worth the naming. By this treaty we have increased our exports thither from about three hundred thousand pounds a-year to near a million and a half." One of the writers in the British Merchant declares that Mr. Methuen deserved to have his statue set up in every trading town in the island.* In the same spirit Anderson, the industrious and generally sensible historian of our commerce, earnestly expresses his hope that "this most just and beneficial convention," as it had remained unviolated to his day, may continue so for ever. But the Methuen Treaty is now looked back upon by most thinking persons as having been, if not at the moment when it was contracted, at least during the greater part of the time it was allowed to remain in force, an entanglement on the whole very prejudicial in its effects both commercially and politically. If it gained us the market of Portugal for our woollens, it excluded us from the vastly more wealthy and extensive market of France. In forcing upon us the wines of Portugal, it deprived us of those of France, although such used to be the preference given by our national taste to the latter, that it has been doubted if a single pipe of port was ever brought into this country previous to the Restoration. So great however was the change of sentiment and fashion gradually wrought by the wars and other events that had occurred since then, and finally fixed and made permanent by this treaty, that we soon nearly ceased to import or drink French wines altogether; and the belief in the superiority of port came to be held as much part and parcel of the creed of every true-born and true-hearted Englishman, in his belief in the eternal fitness of the corn-laws and the game-laws. An instance, as it has been remarked, perhaps the most remarkable in the history of commerce, of the course of trade and the taste and habits of a people being altered, by a mere custom-house regulation! Worst of all, this treaty, by rivetting in the manner it did our connexion with Portugal, and binding us both politically and commercially to that country, undoubtedly contributed more than any other cause to keep us from ever forming any really cordial or intimate alliance with France, even when there was no war between us. Sufficient evidence of this was given in what happened at the peace of Utrecht, in 1713, when the proposed commercial treaty with France, almost the only part of the arrangements then made that was creditable to the English government and their negotiators, was prevented from taking effect mainly by the adverse interests and prejudices created by this previous treaty with Portugal. By the 8th and 9th articles of the Utrecht treaty it was stipulated, in substance, that the subjects of the two contracting powers should, as to all duties on merchandise, and all such things as related either to commerce or to any other right whatever, be placed in each other's dominions in the position enjoyed by the most favoured foreign nation; and that, within two months after the English parliament should have repealed all laws prohibiting the importation of any French goods which were not prohibited before the year 1664, and enacted that no higher duties should be paid upon any goods or merchandizes brought from France than were paid upon articles of the like nature imported from any other European country, the French tariff made in 1664 should again come into operation in regard to imports from England, and all prohibitions that had since been issued against English produce and manufactures should be withdrawn or annulled. These propositions obviously went to do away with the Methuen Treaty; and the clamour raised against them on that express ground was instant and general. It was upon this occasion that the paper called The British Merchant was established by Mr. Henry Martin (afterwards Inspector General of Exports and Imports), assisted by Sir Theodore Janssen, Sir Charles Cooke, Mr. James Milner, Mr. Nathaniel Torriano, and other eminent London merchants, in opposition to the Mercator, or Commerce Retriev'd, a paper published thrice a-week, in defence of the French treaty and the government, by the celebrated Daniel Defoe. "As this author," says the somewhat unceremoniously-expressed Preface to the collected lubrications of his antagonists, "had a knack of writing very plausibly; and they who employed him and furnished him with materials had the command of all the public papers in the Custom-house, he had it in his power to do a great deal of mischief, especially against such as were unskilled in trade, and at the same time very fond of French wines, which it was then a great crime to be against. Several ingenious merchants, of long experience and well skilled in trade, joined together to contradict the impositions of this writer; they knew he had many heads, besides the advantages of public papers, to help him, and therefore thought this the most feasible way to confute him and set the state of our trade in a clear light." The paper they put out, they go on to state, was, in opposition to his title, called The British Merchant, or Commerce Preserved, and was published twice a-week. The discussion, it is admitted, was carried on in a somewhat loose and desultory way, and the facts bearing upon the question were stated without much method; but the reason of this was, "that Mercator, whenever he was close set, always quitted the point he was upon, and trumped up something new." No doubt Defoe would give his opponents enough to do in attempting to cope with his activity and dexterity at fence and thrust. Their publication, however, they tell us, and the convincing arguments Sir Charles Cooke and others concerned in the work laid before both houses of parliament, in speeches pronounced at the bar, had the good effect of throwing out the pernicious bill of commerce; and that although ministers had attempted to gain their point by a sort of stratagem, and, knowing that "French wine was a relishing liquor to English palates," had moved, in the first instance, to take off the duties from the article only for a couple of months—a motion which "was very accidentally, though very wisely, opposed as it was ready to pass, and dropt." The bill for rendering effectual the treaty of commerce was, after it had passed through the committee, lost on the motion that it should be engrossed—only 185 members in an otherwise very subservient House of Commons voting for the motion, and 194 against it. Among those, it seems, by whom the opposition to the treaty had been most zealously promoted, both within doors and without, were Charles Montague (who soon after was made Lord Halifax), and General (afterwards Lord) Stanhope; who became secretary of state in the reign of George I. "My Lord Halifax," says the preface before us, "was the support and the very spirit of the paper called The British Merchant: he encouraged the gentlemen concerned to meet, heard and assisted their debates, and, being zealous above all things that the trade of Great Britain should flourish, he not only continued his influence and advice to the last, but, out of his usual and unbounded liberality, contributed very largely to this work; a considerable sum being raised to carry it on." Stanhope, again, was the person who, suddenly coming into the House of Commons when the vote was about to pass for taking off the duties on French wines for two months, got up a debate on the question, and prevailed upon the House to consent that, before it was carried, the merchants should be heard. The consequences, indeed, that were represented as certain to follow from the treaty were sufficiently alarming, and might well make the legislature pause. "I shall make it appear," says one of the writers in The British Merchant, "that, if the 8th and 9th articles of the treaty of commerce between France and us had been rendered effectual by a law, this very thing had been more ruinous to the British nation than if the city of London were to be laid in ashes. This city has been once burned to the ground, but the people were still in being. They were, notwithstanding this calamity, a constant mart for the product and manufactures of the country. But, if such a law as I have mentioned had passed, France would have gone on from that moment to exhaust the treasures of the kingdom. We should have presently lost our best markets both at home and abroad, our gentlemen must have felt a sudden and universal decay of their rents, and our common people must have either starved for want of work, come to the lands or the parish for subsistence, or have retired to foreign parts for bread." The controversy, this eloquent gentleman proceeds, was not party against party, Tory against Whig, protestant against papist, or churchman against dissenter; but nation against nation—the trade of Britain against the trade of France.—"The questions upon this bill are, whether France, after all her ill successes in the late war, be suffered during the present peace, under the colour of a commerce, to exhaust our treasure, beggar our gentlemen, and starve our common people; and whether the gentlemen of Britain, after all their glorious victories, ought at last to be contented to become hewers of wood and drawers of water to the nation they have so often beaten."* In a subsequent part of the paper it is maintained, as used to be done by most reasoners on this side down to our own day, that by the treaty of commerce with Portugal we were absolutely bound to admit the wines of that country at a lower duty than those of France for ever, or at least so long as the Portuguese chose to admit our woollens at the then duty—a construction which the following express stipulation in the treaty itself sufficiently refutes:—"But if at any time this deduction or abatement of customs, which is to be made as aforesaid, shall in any manner be attempted and prejudiced, it shall be just and lawful for his sacred royal majesty of Portugal again to prohibit the woollen cloths and the rest of the British woollen manufactures."

* Chalmers, pp. 89 and 90; apparently from Mr. Astle's transcript.

With all its extravagance upon some points, The British Merchant contains a good deal of information on the state of our commerce at the close of the reign of Anne, and most of its facts may probably be confided in, whatever may be thought of many of its inferences and reasonings. Notwithstanding all the methodising the original papers are stated to have received on their republication in a collected form, the three volumes of which the book consists are still as confused enough miscellany; but we shall endeavour to select from the mass some of the particulars that seem most curious of otherwise worthy notice.

* British Merchant, l. 181.

In his preface the editor, enumerating the peculiar commercial advantages of Great Britain, states that in a list he had seen of the merchants in and about London, printed in the year 1677, they were 1786 in all: "I knew," he adds, "above 400 of them, who are all true merchants, that is, importers and exporters of goods, for no other are such. If the whole list, then, is true, as it probably is, and we add to these the merchants in Bristol, and other trading towns of Great Britain, Ireland, and our plantations, with those who are abroad in Turkey, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Holland, Germany, Russia, Norway, the Baltic, Africa, and the East Indies, I am of opinion we have at least two-thirds as many as all the rest of Europe put together, if not more." The account at least shows us the foreign countries in which English merchants were at this time resident.

The following passage on the comparative prices of labour and habits of the labouring classes in France and England is very interesting:—"The French did always outdo us in price of labour: their common people live upon roots, cabbage, and other herbage; four of their large provinces subsist entirely upon chestnuts; and the best of them eat bread made of barley, millet, Turkey and black corn; so that their wages used to be small in comparison with ours. But of late years, their crown pieces being made of the same value as ours, and raised from sixty to one hundred sols, and the manufacturers, servants, soldiers, day-labourers, and other working people earning no more sols or pence by the day than they did formerly, the price of labour is thereby so much lessened, that one may affirm for truth they have generally their work done for half the price we pay for ours. For, although provisions be as dear at Paris as they are at London, it is certain that in most of their provinces they are very cheap, and that they buy beef and mutton for half the price we pay for it here. But the price of meat and wheat doth little concern the poor manufacturers, as they generally drink nothing but water; and at best a sort of liquor they call beverage (which is water passed through the husks of grapes after the wine is drawn off); they save a great deal upon that account; for it is well known that our people spend half of their money in drink. The army is a notorious instance how cheap the French can live; it enables their king to maintain 800,000 men with the same money we maintain 112,500; their pay being five sols a day (which is exactly threepence English), and our soldiers' pay is eightpence. However, they subsist upon that small allowance; and, if there be the same disproportion between our manufactures and theirs as there is betwixt our soldiers and their soldiers as to pay, it is plain that the work in France is done for little more than a third part of what it is done for in England. And I am confident it is so in most of their manufactures, of which, I could give many instances, if it were needful; but let these two following, at present suffice:—At Lyons, which, next to Paris, is the best city in France, they pay nine sols an ell for making of lustrings, which is little more than fivepence English money; and the price paid here for making lustrings is twelpence an ell. In the paper manufacture abundance of people are employed for sorting of rags in the mills, who earn in France but two sols a day, which is less than five farthings of our money; and the price paid here for such work is fourpence a day.* Elsewhere it is stated that the common annual subsistence of working people in country places in England, taking old and young together, is about 4*l.* per head: “I have not known,” says the writer, “anywhere in the country that a husband, his wife, and three or four children, have asked any relief from the parish, if the whole labour of such a family could procure 20*l.* per annum.”†

The sum of the doctrine of the writers of the work on the subject of foreign commerce is given in the following words:—“That trade which makes money flow in most plentifully upon us, enables our people to subsist themselves better by their labour, raises the value of our lands, and occasions our rents to be better paid, must always be reckoned the best trade; for these are the only rules by which it is possible to state and determine the value of any particular trade, or of the general trade of the whole nation.” Upon this principle it is affirmed that we then carried on an advantageous trade with each of the following countries: 1. Portugal, from which kingdom, although we brought home wine, oil, and some other things for our own use and consumption, yet the greatest part of our returns were gold and silver; “so much, therefore, the Portuguese pay to the employment and subsistence of our people, and for the product of our lands; so much as this balance is in gold and silver they contribute to the prosperity and happiness of this nation.” 2. Spain, our imports from which used to consist of wine, oil, wood, cochineal, indigo, fruit, iron, &c. Of these things a great part were used in the manufactured goods we exported, and to that extent they contributed to the employment of our people and the improvement of our lands. “But a very great part of our returns from Spain was money, for the overbalance of our manufactures sent thither; and this undoubtedly was so much added to the prosperity and happiness of this nation.” 3. Italy, our exportations to which were made good to us by returns in oil, wine, thrown and raw silk, wrought silk, currants, paper, drugs, &c., and the rest in money. “This last,” it is again observed, “is so much added to the happiness and prosperity of the nation; and, so, indeed, are many of our other returns, since they are manufactured by our own people, and contribute so much to their maintenance.” 4. Turkey, from which, indeed, it is admitted that we brought home little or no money, the full or very nearly the full value of our exports being paid in raw silk, program-yarn, cotton, wool, cotton-yarn, goats’ hair, coffee, dyeing goods, drugs, &c. These, however, were all materials used in our manufactures, and things, therefore, which contributed to the employment and subsistence of our people. 5. Hamburg and other places in Germany, from which, although our returns were chiefly made in linen and linen-yarn, yet we also received a balance in money. 6. Holland, our exports to which “are,” says the writer, “prodigious, whether we consider our woollen manufactures, the produce of our own country and our plantations, our East India, Turkey, and other goods.” In return, we received from the Dutch some spices, linen, thread, paper, Rhenish wines, battery, madder, whale-fins, clapboard, wrought silks, &c.; but nearly three-fourths of the value of our exports were paid for in money, making, as has been already shown, what was called a balance in our favour of not much less than a million and a half sterling per annum. And many of the goods imported from Holland were also useful in our manufactures.*

It is afterwards admitted, however, that every trade on which we paid a balance in gold or silver was not to be set down as “guilty of exhausting our treasure;” on the principle that the goods we thus buy from a foreign country we may re-export, in whole or in part, for a greater sum of money than we paid for them. Thus, the following trades are also allowed to be profitable, or, at the least, not disadvantageous:—1. The East Country trade. “We buy,” it is observed, “hemp, pitch, tar, and all sorts of naval stores from the East-Country. Unless we did this, we could not fit out a single ship to sea. The goods we send to that country are by no means sufficient to even the account between us; we are forced to pay the balance in gold and silver, and this, as I have heard, amounts to 200,000*l.* per annum. Shall we be said, then, to lose so great an annual sum by our East-Country trade? No, certainly; for, not to insist upon the numberless people that are employed and subsisted by shipping and navigation, we gain much more by our shipping than the above-mentioned sums from other countries with which we trade; and it is certain we could gain nothing this way if we had not first bought the naval stores.” This may be true enough, but it is subversive of the whole doctrine of the mercantile and manufacturing theories: if we are to account the trade with a foreign country beneficial when, although there is an excess of imports over exports, and consequently a balance to be paid for in money, the imports are yet such as are necessary to enable us to carry on some other gainful branch or branches of commerce, then we might be said to trade profitably even with a country from which we imported nothing but food, to be consumed as fast as it arrived, and to which

* British Merchant, 1. 23. † Ibid. 1. 237.

* British Merchant, 1. 23.

we exported nothing but the money to pay for that food; for, assuredly, without the means of keeping ourselves alive, we could carry on no gainful trade or occupation whatever. And the same thing may be said of the purchase from abroad of any other article whether of necessity or convenience: if the article is one which we can procure at less cost in that way than by producing or manufacturing it at home, we shall be gainers by so procuring it, and leaving the labour that would have gone to furnish it free to be employed on something else (if any such thing is to be found) for the production of which we are more favourably situated, and which we either require ourselves or can dispose of profitably to some other country. Or even if the article we import be one of mere luxury, still, if we will have it, it is manifestly more economical, for the same reason, to pay money for it to a foreign country than to produce it at home by the expenditure of an amount of labour more than equivalent in value to that money, and which we could employ profitably in some other way. Our author goes on to argue, in regard to the advantages of the East Country trade, that, taking our shipping to amount in all to 500,000 tons, and estimating the freight at 5*l.* a ton, it might be said, seeing that the freight of all exported goods falls upon the purchasers, that more than a fifth of the 2,500,000*l.*, which might thus be called the annual value of our shipping, was paid by the nations with whom we traded. "Then," he concludes, "we pay the East Country about 200,000*l.* per annum for our naval stores, which could not be had but from that country, and gain above twice as much by our shipping from other nations. Therefore, though we pay so great an annual balance upon that trade, yet our treasure cannot be said to be exhausted by it: we have such goods in exchange for it as make us very ample amends, and enable us to supply that loss by our other commerce." We may here mention that early in the reign of Anne an act was passed "For encouraging the importation of naval stores from her majesty's plantations in America," which, after reciting in the preamble that such stores were then (in 1703) "brought in mostly from foreign parts, in foreign shipping, at exorbitant and arbitrary rates," while they might be provided in a more certain and beneficial manner from the vast tracts of land lying near the sea, and upon navigable rivers, in the colonies and plantations in America, which were at first settled, and were still maintained and protected at a great expense of the treasure of this kingdom, ordered that certain bounties should be paid upon the importation from the said colonies of tar, pitch, rosin, turpentine, hemp, and masts.* The good consequence of this reasonable law, according to Anderson, was soon felt; so that at the time when he wrote both the New England provinces and also Carolina furnished us with great quantities of pitch and tar, "fit for most uses in the navy." † Of late also," he adds, "good hemp and flax are raised in the said provinces, where there are such immense quantities of proper and excellent lands for the raising of those commodities." But this result was probably not produced to any considerable extent till a date a good deal later than that to which the details in the British Merchant refer. At the time when the act was passed it was computed that the quantity of pitch and tar, chiefly from Sweden, but in part also from Norway and from Archangel, imported by England was about 1000 lasts; by Holland, for home use and also for re-exportation to Spain, Portugal, and up the Mediterranean, 4000 lasts; by France 500; and by Hamburg, Lubeck, and the German ports, to the same amount.* By a subsequent act, passed in 1712, the same bounties were granted upon the importation of naval stores from Scotland; but this, as Anderson admits, was to little or no purpose, the lands and woods which might yield such naval stores being there, as the act itself states, "mostly in parts mountainous and remote from navigable rivers."† "This," he observes, "the York Buildings Company experienced, to their cost, some years after this time: the timber they felled in some of those woods, at a great expense, being left to rot on the ground, the carriage of it to the nearest places of navigation being found impracticable; which will probably ever be the case with respect to Scotland, notwithstanding the bounties allowed by that act, or any larger bounties to be reasonably granted." 2. Another trade which the writer in the British Merchant admits might also possibly be advantageous, although it occasioned an annual export of bullion in the first instance, is that which we carried on with China and the East Indies. Besides goods and merchandises we sent yearly to those countries between four and five hundred thousand pounds in money; but then, besides that there were some of our imports thence, such as saltpetre, pepper, and a few drugs, which perhaps we could not well do without, we re-exported all the silks and stained calicoes we brought home, the use of these articles being prohibited in England; and even of the white calicoes and muslins, of the coffee, tea, pepper, saltpetre, and other goods we procured by our East India and China trade, very great quantities were also re-exported, and for much more money than all that we sent to the East. "The consequence is," concludes our author, "that our treasure is not exhausted by that trade, since we have those goods in exchange for our money as procure us much greater sums from other countries, and since our whole loss is more than repaired by exporting part only of those goods at a much higher price than we paid for the whole."‡ This reasoning, however, would not have been deemed satisfactory by many political economists of the day—by Pollexfen and others, for instance,

* Anderson, Chron. of Com. 2*l.* 17.

† Stat. 12 Anne, c. 9.

‡ British Merchant, 1. 28.

* Stat. 3 and 4 Anne, c. 9 (or 10 in the common editions).

who still maintained that the East India trade was in reality little else than an exchange for useless and even pernicious luxuries of the only true wealth and, as it were, the very life-blood of the kingdom; but some of the writers in the British Merchant were probably concerned in that trade, and members of the now comparatively flourishing company by which it was carried on. The United East India Company had resumed the payment of their dividends in 1709, first at the rate of only five per cent.; but it was raised to eight in the latter part of the same year, soon after to nine, and at last, in September, 1711, to ten per cent.*

A curious illustration of the value of the Turkey trade is afterwards given in an account of the manufacture of 100 broad-cloths, and their export to and sale in that country, which is stated to have been communicated by a correspondent, and is probably therefore an account of an actual transaction. To begin at the beginning and follow the progress of the manufacture as well as the commercial history of the finished commodity, a clothier is first introduced who buys at market 50 packs of wool, picked and sorted, at 10*l.* per pack, or for 500*l.* With this wool he makes 100 broad-cloths, the manufacture of which, in carding, spinning, weaving, milling, dressing, &c., as such cloths were "usually brought to and sold white at Blackwell Hall," would amount to about the first cost of the wool, or 500*l.* more; making the whole cost of the article 1000*l.* The clothier's profit, of course, is on the manufacture, and is included in this sum, which is that for which he sells the 100 cloths to the merchant, being at the rate of 10*l.* per cloth. Then, the merchant has the cloths died, one-third in grain colours at 7*l.*, and two-thirds in ordinary colours at 30*s.* per cloth; making in all 333*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*; and he also pays 15*s.* per cloth for selling, drawing, pressing, packing, &c.: so that they have cost him altogether 1408*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* To repay him for this outlay, and for all other charges including interest and insurance, he must get at least for his cloth in Turkey 2200 pounds of Persian fine raw silk (called Sherbaffee). Having brought this home he manufactures the half of it into plain coloured tabies, for which he pays at the rate of 13*s.* 7*d.* per pound, or 747*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* in all; and the other half into rich flowered silks brocaded, which will cost him 1*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.* per pound, or 2,186*l.* 5*s.*; besides which the charge of dyeing only an eighth part of the silk into grain colours at 9*s.* per pound will be 123*l.* 15*s.* Add the freight of the cloth and the silk, computed at 40*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*; the duty on the import of the silk, 156*l.* 15*s.*; and his factor's commission abroad on the sale of the cloth, and the investment of the proceeds in silk, 100*l.*; and it will be found that the entire expenditure of the merchant, omitting some petty charges, has amounted to 4762*l.* 15*s.* "If any is to added for the merchant's and the mercer's gain," continues the statement, "and we may depend upon it they will not be at the trouble of driving their trades for nothing), we may very well affirm that the whole cost of this manufacture for consumption cannot be less than the sum of 5000*l.*; so that 2200 pound weight of Turkey raw silk manufactured here pays the sum of 5000*l.* for the subsistence of our own people." Our annual export of cloths to Turkey is stated to be about 20,000 pieces, for about the half of which our returns were in raw silk.*

A very minute and complete account of our trade with France for one year in the reign of James II., 1686, when the trade was free, as drawn up from official returns, and laid before the House of Commons during the discussion on the Utrecht Treaty of Commerce, is here adduced simply to show that our imports from that country then amounted annually in value to 1,284,419*l.*—namely, into the port of London 569,126*l.*, into the outports 715,293*l.*; and our exports thither to only 515,228*l.*—namely, from London 409,563*l.*, from the outports 105,665; so that the former exceeded the latter by the sum of 769,190*l.*, or in other words that we lost by the trade to that amount, even by such goods as were entered at the custom-house. "This were loss sufficient, if annually repeated," exclaims the alarmed writer in the British Merchant, "to ruin this kingdom in a very few years." Dismissing that apprehension, we will here note a few of the entries in the account which throw a light upon the intercourse that formerly subsisted between the two countries in a social rather than a commercial point of view. Among the imports from France are the following items:—229 cwt. of unbound books, valued at 20*s.* per cwt.; 37 small gross of bracelets or necklaces of glass, valued at 44*l.* 8*s.*; 3876 fleams to let blood, at 2*d.* each; 162 dozen fans for women, at 40*s.* per dozen; 1487 cases of glass for windows, at 30*s.* per case; 20 reams of blue paper, at 10*s.* per ream; 20 of cap paper, at 7*s.* 6*d.* per ream; 77,336 of copy paper, at 5*s.* per ream; and 1659 reams of royal and larger paper at 40*s.* per ream; besides 11,617 reams (probably of copy paper) into the outports at 5*s.* per ream; 70 tons of Caen stones, at 15*s.* per ton; 1188 ells of tapestry with caddas, at 8*s.* per ell; 162 ells of tapestry with silk, at 13*s.* 4*d.* per ell; 16,648 tons of wine, at 17*l.* 10*s.* per ton; 400 mill stones, at 10*l.* each; 302 pounds of coral, at 3*s.* 4*d.* per pound; 4266 pounds of garden seeds, at 8*d.* per pound; 268 gallons of orange flower water, at 5*s.* per gallon; and 400 pounds of rose-leaves, at 1*s.* per pound. Among the exports to France are, 1075 dozens of old shoes, at 10*s.* per dozen; 3 pairs of virginals, at 5*l.* per pair; 49 cwt. of printed books and maps, at 20*s.* per cwt.; 3 pictures, at 40*s.* each; 49 barrels of salmon, at 4*l.* per barrel; 11 horses, at 10*l.* each; 50 cats, valued altogether at 7*s.* 6*d.*; 141 dozen dogs, at 6*s.* per dozen; and 561 pounds of tea, at 10*s.* per pound. The writer before us asserts that even in his time, besides the goods from France entered at the Custom-house, great quantities were every day clandestinely imported.* He states also that, notwithstanding the higher duties that had been imposed, either our luxury or our substance had so much increased, that nearly as much wine was still imported from France as in the time of James II. "And are we," he asks, "less fond of clarets now than heretofore? † It was also understood that, besides the quantity mentioned in the above account, the importation of French wines into Scotland amounted to three or four thousand tons a-year. ‡ Comparing the four years from 1682 to 1685 inclusive, during which French wines were excluded from this country, with the four from 1686 to 1689 inclusive, during which they were admitted, it appears that the removal of the prohibition, while it brought us an average annual importation of French wines to the amount of 13,400 tons, reduced our average importation of Portuguese wines from about 11,000 to little more than 400 tons, of Spanish from about 6700 tons to less than 4000, and of Rhenish from above 1400 tons to between 600 and 700. In 1685 we imported no French wines and 12,185 tons of Portuguese; but the next year, when the prohibition was taken off, 12,760 tons of French wines were imported, and of Portuguese only 289.§ And it is admitted that even at the time when the prohibition was in force great quantities of French wines were every year imported under the names of Spanish and Portuguese, by the direction of the court and the connivance of the Custom-house officers. || The British Merchant, while he laments and condemns, very frankly admits not only the general preference of his countrymen for French wines, but even the reasonableness of this preference as a mere matter of taste. "Not to insist," he says, glancing at the threatened infliction of the Utrecht Treaty of Commerce, "upon the general inclination towards everything that is French, these wines will be the cheapest; but they are so preferable in themselves, that I believe at a third-part greater price they would be the common-draught in England." ¶

* Macpherson's European Com. with India, p. 168.

* British Merchant, i. 137.

From an account of the manufacture of paper at this date, both in France and in England, we abstract the following details:—"There are seven provinces in France where the manufacture of paper is settled, viz., Champagne, Normandy, Brittany, Angómois, Perigord, Limousin, and Auvergne; the three last provinces are full of large forests of chestnut trees, and abound so much in that kind of fruit, that the common people have no other food all the year round, and no other drink but water; so that they can afford their work very cheap, and do it for next to nothing, except some of the upper workmen, who earn a small salary by the week. This is so true that considerable parcels of paper were imported lately from thence, although the duties paid here exceed one hundred per cent. on the first cost." To the objection made by De Foe, that a Frenchman living "on an onion and a draught of water, a bunch of grapes, and a piece of bread" never could do such a day's work—could do so much in a day, and that much so well,—as an Englishman who had his beef and his pudding, our author replies, "I have had the curiosity to inquire into the paper manufacture, and I find that five pair of hands are employed at every fat; that so many hands are necessary in England, and that more cannot be employed in France. I am taught, too, by our own manufacturers, that they do not dispatch here above eight reams of paper in a day at a single fat, and that they dispatch above nine in France with the same number of hands; and yet I believe there is not any man in England so hardy as to affirm that either ours, or indeed any paper in the world, exceeds that of France." He accounts for this on the principle, that there is a slight of hand in almost every manufacture which is much more effective than mere strength. "Before the Revolution," the account proceeds, "there was hardly any other paper made in England than brown; but, the war ensuing, and duties being laid from time to time on foreign paper, it gave such encouragement to the paper-makers, that most of them began to make white paper fit for writing and printing; and they have brought it by degrees to so great perfection, both for quantity and goodness, that they make now near two thirds of what is consumed in Great Britain; and several of them make it as white and as well-bearing as any comes from abroad, as Sir William Humphreys, Mr. Baskett, and several others can witness. And I make no doubt, if further encouragement was given them by taking off the twelve per cent. excise which was lately laid upon home-made paper, and which, by the multitude of officers, brings in little or nothing to the queen, and the said twelve per cent., for an equivalent to the fund, was laid upon outlandish paper, but that they could in a little time make enough to supply all the occasions of the nation; there being above 120 fats within sixty miles of London, besides several more in Yorkshire and Scotland, which all, more or less, make white paper, and will undoubtedly go on daily improving and increasing that useful manufacture, if the present high duties be kept on French paper, being that which they dread most, by reason of its extraordinary cheapness." Then follows a description of the process of paper-making, which it is unnecessary to extract: the rags, it is stated, which are the main ingredient, were formerly cast away, and thrown to the dunghill, "but are now gathered with great care by poor people, who get honestly their livelihood by it, and would otherwise beg their bread; this employs abundance of hands." There is no mention of any importation of rags from abroad. The consumption of paper in Great Britain, the writer thinks, was not greater than it had been in the reign of King William; he rates it at about 400,000 reams per annum, of which the 120 fats within sixty miles of the metropolis, making each ‡ Id. pp. 307, &c.

* British Merchant, l. 279. † Id. p. 1.

‡ Id. p. 302.

‡ Id. p. 297.

¶ Id. p. 319.

on an average eight reams a day, furnished nearly three fourths, and those in Yorkshire and Scotland, and our importations from Holland and Italy, the remaining 100,000 reams.*

The Union of Scotland and England, which took place in the reign of Anne—an event important to both countries in every point of view—laid a foundation for the extension of the commerce of Scotland particularly, which was not one of its least important consequences. Till now the two kingdoms, though under the rule of the same sovereign, regarded each the other as a foreign state, commercially as well as in respect to most of their political relations. The privileges of foreign trade enjoyed by the one were withheld from the other; and their interchange of commodities with each other was extremely inconsiderable. An account has been published from the books of the Inspector-General of Customs of the value of the merchandize received by the one from the other by sea during the ten years preceding the Union, from which it appears that (independently of the little that might be conveyed by land-carriage) the amount of all the goods that passed between the two countries in a year much oftener fell short of than exceeded the small sum of 150,000*l.* In 1698 England imported from Scotland merchandize to the value of 124,835*l.*, and in 1700 to that of 130,087*l.*; but with the exception of these two years the English imports never reached 100,000*l.* And they went on decreasing almost every year: in 1697 they were 91,302*l.*; in 1699, 86,309*l.*; from 1701 to 1703 they never reached so high as 77,000*l.*; from 1704 to 1706 they were when at the highest under 58,000*l.*; and in the year 1706 they had fallen to 50,309*l.* The imports into Scotland from England, again, were never higher than 87,536*l.*, which they were in 1704; but they were more generally between 50,000*l.* and 60,000*l.*; in 1705 they were only 50,035*l.*† Except that she obtained a share in the Scottish fisheries, which for a long time she took very little advantage of, the chief direct commercial advantage of which the Union put England in possession was merely the increase of this intercourse with Scotland, which was now thrown as fully open to her manufacturers and merchants as Yorkshire; but Scotland, which had no colonies or distant dependencies of her own, her solitary attempt at Darien having not only failed in itself, but well nigh bankrupted the mother country, was at once admitted to a participation in all the colonial commerce of England, in so far as it was free to the subjects of the latter country themselves, and more especially to that both with the American plantations and with Ireland. The market of England, of course, was also opened to her for the sale of any native produce or manufactures she might have to export which suited the wants or the tastes of that part of the island. "By this union," writes Anderson, about half a century afterwards,

"Scotland's coarse woollen stuffs and stockings, and her more valuable linen manufactures, now of many various, beautiful, and ingenious kinds, have a prodigious vent, not only in England, but for the American plantations." He also notices the consumption to a large extent of the black cattle and peltry of Scotland by their southern neighbours—a branch of trade which has continued to increase down to our own day. Another economical advantage which the Scots derived from this political incorporation with England was the substitution of the coinage of the latter country for their own greatly depreciated currency. The Scottish gold and silver money was all called in on the occasion to be recoined; and the native antiquaries boast that no less a sum than 411,117*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* was actually brought to the Mint at Edinburgh for that purpose; "besides, perhaps as much more, hoarded up by the whimsical, disaffected, and timorous, who were strongly prepossessed against the Union, and were far from believing it would last any length of time; besides, also, what was then exported, and what was retained by silversmiths for plate, &c."‡ On the whole, it is calculated that the gold and silver currency of Scotland in the year 1707 was not less than 900,000*l.* sterling. It has been estimated that the money circulated in England at this time was about sixteen millions.

After the details into which we have entered respecting the quarter of a century that immediately followed the Revolution, during which our trade may be supposed to have settled itself in the new channels into which it was impelled principally by that great political change and the wars to which it gave rise, it will be sufficient that we notice only the most remarkable or significant facts in the commercial history of the remainder of the present period.

The accession of the House of Hanover, however much the national industry in all its branches may have benefited from the tranquillity and security resulting from the confirmed establishment of that family on the throne, and the final extinction of the hope of a second restoration of the Stuarts, would not seem at first to have operated favourably upon our foreign trade, nor, consequently, upon the spirit and activity with which production was carried on at home, if we were to regard our exports to other countries as measuring the entire produce of our land and labour. The value of our exports for 1714, the last year of the reign of Anne, was 8,008,068*l.*, which was a higher amount than they ever reached during the reign of George I. In 1715 they fell to 6,922,263*l.*; in 1716 they were 7,049,992*l.*; and in 1718 they had declined so low as to 6,361,390*l.* From this point, however, they gradually improved; in 1723 they were 7,395,908*l.*; and their average annual amount for the three

* British Merchant, ii. 228-229.

† See account published by: Macpherson, in Ang. of Com. ii. 737.

VOL. IV.

‡ Anderson, Chron. of Com. ii. 96, referring to Ruddiman's Preface to James Anderson's Thesaurus Diplomatum et Numismatum Scotiæ.

years 1726, 1727, and 1728 was 7,891,739*l*. The amount of shipping cleared outwards in each year corresponded generally with these valuations of the cargoes: in 1714 it was 478,793 tons (of which 33,950 were foreign); in 1715, 425,900 tons (of which 19,508 were foreign); in 1716, 456,309 tons (of which 17,493 were foreign); in 1718, 444,771 tons (of which 16,809 were foreign); in 1723, 419,683 tons (of which 27,040 were foreign); and on the average of the three years from 1726 to 1728 inclusive, 456,483 tons (of which 23,651 were foreign).^{*} In connexion with the subject of the mercantile shipping, we may note here that the royal navy, which at the end of the reign of Anne is stated to have amounted to 167,171 tons, was reduced in 1721, according to a writer of the day, to 158,233,[†] but had increased again at the death of George II. to 170,860 tons.[‡]

Among the minor events, or arrangements, by which our trade and manufactures were affected in the reign of George II., may be mentioned the following. In 1715 a treaty of commerce was made with Spain, by which it was stipulated that British subjects were to pay no higher duties in the Spanish ports than they paid in the reign of the Spanish king Charles II. (that is, than they paid before the commencement of the late war); that they should nowhere pay any higher or other duties than were paid by the subjects of his Catholic majesty in the same places; and that the subjects of both kingdoms should be mutually treated in each on the footing of the most favoured nations. In 1717 the duty on the export of British-made linen (which, however, was only sixpence on the piece of forty ells) was taken off, as that on the export of corn and woollens had been some years before, on the ground that the said linen manufacture employed many thousands of the poor of the kingdom.[§] In 1721 parliament passed an important act for the encouragement of the trade and manufactures of the kingdom, by which, first, certain bounties were granted upon the exportation of home-made silken stuffs and ribands, and mixed stuffs of silk and program, silk and inkle or cotton, and silk and worsted; secondly, all duties whatsoever payable on the exportation of native produce and merchandizes were taken off, except only those on alum, lead, tin, tanned leather, copperas, coals, wool-cards, white woollens, lapis calaminaris, skins, glue, coney wool, hare's wool, hair, horses, and litharge of lead; thirdly, all substances used in dyeing, saltpetre only excepted, were allowed to be imported duty-free; and, lastly, a reduction was made in the duties on the importation of pepper, mace, nutmegs, and cloves. Half the duty paid on furs was also ordered to be returned on their re-exportation.^{*} In 1719 an annual sum of 2000*l*. per annum out of the revenues of customs and excise in Scotland was allotted for ever to be applied towards the encouragement of the fisheries, and such other manufactures and improvements in that country as might most conduce to the general good of the United Kingdom.[†] And in 1726 certain new facilities were given by another act for the importation of salt from England into Newfoundland and the northern parts of America, where, as is recited in the preamble, the river Delaware, the bay and coast of the province of Pennsylvania, and the seas adjoining, had been found to be very commodiously situated for carrying on the fishing trade, and to abound with great quantities of shad, sturgeon, bass, and several other kinds of fish, which might be caught and cured, and made fit for foreign markets, "whereby," it is added, "the trade of Great Britain and the inhabitants of the said province would reap considerable benefit, which would enable the said inhabitants to purchase more of the British manufactures for their use than at present they are able by reason of the little trade and produce the said province affords."[‡] Of how little value our American settlements were still esteemed may be understood from the fact, that, when only a few years before this, in 1715, a bill was brought into parliament (which, however, did not pass) for enabling the crown to purchase what were called the charter and proprietary colonies, William Penn had agreed to sell his lordship of Pennsylvania for twelve thousand pounds! He had himself asked only twenty thousand in the first instance, when the negotiation was begun with him in the reign of Anne. In 1724, on the application of the South Sea Company, who had resolved to re-enter upon the long-abandoned whale-fishery, an act was passed by parliament taking off the duty of three pence per pound on whale-fins, and allowing fins, oil, and blubber to be exported duty-free in British ships for the term of seven years. The company forthwith directed twelve ships of 360 tons each to be built for the Greenland trade; and "hired," says Anderson, "the Duke of Bedford's great wet-dock at Deptford, for the use of their ships and stores, and for curing of their oil and whale-fins."[§] "In the year 1725," he afterwards relates, "the South Sea Company commenced their unfortunate whale-fishery. Their twelve new ships brought home twenty-five whales and a half; and, though this was scarcely a saving voyage, it was, nevertheless, the very best year of any of the eight in which they carried on that fishery. It must, however, he observed, that, the nation having entirely relinquished this trade for so many years past, there was not an Englishman to be found who knew anything of the Greenland or whale-fishery. The Company was, therefore, under the necessity of having all their commanders, ^{*} Chalmers, Estimate, 104, 106.

[†] Survey of Trade, by William Wood (afterwards secretary to the commissioners of the customs), p. 15. Wood dedicates his book to George I.; and his object is to prove the progress that the navy, as well as all the other elements of the national power and prosperity, had made since the Revolution.

[‡] Account laid before House of Commons in 1791.

[§] Stat. 5 Geo. I. c. 7.

^{*} Stat. 5 Geo. I. c. 15.

[†] Stat. 5 Geo. I. c. 20, § 14.

[‡] Stat. 13 Geo. I. c. 8.

harpooners, boatsteerers, line-veerers, and blubber-cutters, from Fohrde in Holstein (some few natives of Scotland excepted, who on this occasion left the service of the Hollanders), who had before this time been constantly employed either by Hamburgers, Bremers, or Hollanders. Those Holsteiners cost the Company this year 3056*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.*, although but 152 in number; not only because they were all what is usually called officers in that fishery, and consequently had more wages and allowances than the common sailors, but had also their charges borne by the Company both in coming every year from and returning back to Holstein to their families, as was also their constant practice when employed by other nations; whereas above double their number, namely, 353 British subjects, employed on those twelve ships, cost but 315*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.*" The Company, however, the next spring built twelve more ships, and in 1726 the whole twenty-four proceeded to Greenland and Davis Straits. "In which," says our annalist, "they succeeded considerably worse than in their first voyage, having brought home but sixteen whales and a half." In 1727 they sent out twenty-five ships, manned by 762 British subjects and 344 foreigners; when two of the ships were lost, and the rest brought home only twenty-two whales and a half—being not quite one fish for each. At last, in 1732, the Company determined to retire from the trade; their expenditure upon which during the eight years they had carried it on had been 262,172*l.*, while their returns had amounted only to 84,390*l.*, leaving them losers to the extent of 177,782*l.* "It has been usually computed," observes Anderson, "that, if a Greenland ship brought home but three whales, it would be a reasonably gainful year; but, most unfortunately for the South Sea Company, they had not, in all the eight years' fishery, brought home at the rate of one entire whale per ship, taking one year with another. It has, moreover, been a maxim among the whale-fishing adventurers, that one good fishing year in seven usually makes up the losses of six preceding bad years. But it was very unhappy that all the said eight years happened to be bad, not only to the Company, but to most of the adventurers of other nations." The next year an attempt was made by parliament to revive the trade by the forcing system of a bounty upon the ships employed in it; and other similar artificial encouragements were afterwards on several occasions applied for the same purpose; but, although the English whale-fishery was thus kept from absolutely expiring, it never was prosecuted with any considerable or general success, nor could be regarded as one of the regular branches of the national industry, till after the close of the present period.

A full account has already been given in another chapter of the origin, progress, and result of the famous South Sea scheme, which has made the year 1720 so memorable in our financial history.*

* See ante, pp. 370-376.

Without going over again the facts which have been there stated, we may here remark that, wild as was the epidemic phrensy that seized men's minds on this occasion, and disastrous as it proved in its consequences to the fortunes of numerous individuals, it was probably neither in its beginning symptomatic of anything unsubstantial or tending to a decline in the national wealth, nor in its ultimate consequences very much of a public or general calamity. We have just seen, that for some years after the accession of George I. our exports to foreign countries rather diminished than increased; but we should probably misinterpret that fact if we assumed it to be an evidence of any falling off in our produce and manufactures, as 'if we sent less of them abroad because we had less at home. It is much more likely that the contrary was the case—that we had less to spare to our neighbours because we were able to consume more ourselves, or, in other words, that our merchants were partially withdrawn from the foreign market by the temptations of an improved market at home. If it was so, the importance of our home trade is and always has been so prodigiously superior to that of our foreign trade, that is to say, the demand for our produce and manufactures abroad has at all times been so insignificant in comparison with their consumption among ourselves, that a slight falling off in the quantity of our exports may very possibly have been compensated ten times over to our manufacturers and producers by the readier vent and higher prices they obtained for their goods without crossing the seas. The single circumstance of the decline that now took place in the rate of interest may be regarded as a proof of the growing abundance of capital, seeing that it cannot apparently be attributed to the only other cause by which such an effect could be produced, a diminution of the field for the employment of capital; for the rate of interest always represents the effective value of capital, which again (as with all other things that are marketable or exchangeable) varies directly as the demand and inversely as the supply. Now, at this time the national interest of money had fallen to three per cent: even the government, which, from the extent of its necessities always made its loans at a disadvantage, seldom throughout the reign of George I. borrowed at more than four. And other indications pointed in the same direction, disclosing in like manner an economical condition of the nation, and a temper of the public mind, from which the chief danger to be apprehended was the wanton and impatient recklessness of unwonted plenty and prosperity;—among the rest the taste for lotteries, projects, and other short cuts to wealth, which appears to have been ever since the Revolution more and more gaining possession of the popular mind. For it is a mistake to suppose that the history of projects and bubble companies in England begins with the year of the South Sea delusion. They had never, indeed, come in so great an inundation before, but we had had less considerable outbreaks of the same kind of spirit on other occasions since the Revolution. The years 1694 and 1695, for instance, were remarkable project-years. Among many more schemes that were then set on foot, and which eventually came to nothing, were the famous Dr. Hugh Chamberlain, the man-midwife's, Land Bank, for lending money at a low interest on the security of land, and establishing a national paper currency on that basis; another scheme of the same kind proposed by one John Briscoe; various projects of fishing for lost treasure in the sea; projects for pearl-fishing, for mining, for turning copper into brass, for the manufacture of hollow sword-blades, glass bottles, japanned goods, printed hangings, Venetian metal, &c. "Some of which," says a writer of the day, who has given full details on the subject, "were very useful and successful whilst they continued in a few hands, till they fell into stock-jobbing, now much introduced, when they dwindled to nothing. Others of them were mere whims, of little or no service to the world. . . . Moreover, projects, as usual, begat projects—lottery upon lottery, engine upon engine, &c., multiplied wonderfully. If it happened that any one person got considerably by an happy and useful invention, the consequence generally was, that others followed the track, in spite of the patent, and published printed proposals, filling the daily newspapers therewith; thus going on to juggle out one another, and to abuse the credulity of the people."* Here we have, on a smaller scale, all the phenomena of the year 1720. Again, under the year 1698, we find the chronologist of our commerce noting—"London at this time abounded with many new projects and schemes, promising mountains of gold;" and quoting contemporary authorities as complaining heavily "that the Royal Exchange of London was crowded with projects, wagers, airy companies of new manufactures and inventions, stock-jobbers, &c." This was the reason, it seems, why soon after the business of stock-jobbing was removed from the Royal Exchange, first to 'Change Alley, and afterwards to Capel Court, where the building called the Stock Exchange now stands. The author of an Essay on Projects, printed about this time, speaks of having seen "shares of joint-stocks and other undertakings blown up by the air of great words, and the name of some man of credit concerned, to perhaps one hundred pounds for one five-hundredth part or share [the meaning probably is, for the fifth part of a hundred pound share], and yet at last dwindle to nothing."† Jobbing in the stock of the great chartered companies was now carried to such a length, that within the first nine or ten years after the Revolution shares in the East India Company had—"by the management of stock-jobbers," as Anderson affirms—been sold on the Exchange at all prices from 300 per cent. down to 37 per cent.—an extent of fluctuation belonging to a game of chance rather than to any legitimate commercial speculation. Successive acts of parliament testify to the rage for lotteries which had long prevailed. "Whereas," begins one passed in 1698, "several evil-disposed persons for divers years last past have set up many mischievous and unlawful games called lotteries, not only in the cities of London and Westminster, and in the suburbs hereof and places adjoining, but in most of the eminent towns and places in England and dominion of Wales have thereby most unjustly and fraudulently got to themselves great sums of money from the children and servants of several gentlemen, traders, and merchants, and from other unwary persons, to the utter ruin and impoverishment of many families, and to the reproach of the English laws and government, by colour of several patents or grants under the great seal of England for the said lotteries, or some of them, which said grants or patents are against the common good, trade, welfare, and peace of his majesty's kingdoms;" and then the lotteries in question are declared to be one and all public nuisances, and all the grants to be void and illegal.* The evil, however, was not effectually remedied; for in 1710 and 1711 we find parliament still complaining of its existence, and resorting to new measures for the suppression of lotteries and other such delusive and fraudulent projects, of which advertisements, it is declared, continued to be daily published in the common printed newspapers and otherwise.† The phrensy of the year 1720, therefore, we may say, was only the height and crisis of a fever that had been long at work in the public mind. And, although it is commonly assumed that it was the temporary success of Law's Mississippi conjuration in France which provoked the delirium and credulity of our own South Sea Company speculators, the truth rather appears to be that the example of the French project only suggested to the contrivers of the scheme for paying off the English national debt a method of proceeding by which, under that pretence, they could turn to the best account for themselves a general pre-disposition of their fellow-countrymen that prepared them for being readily duped by such extravagant promises of sudden wealth, and that would have certainly exploded about the same time in some other fashion, but with results nearly the same, if neither the South Sea scheme nor the Mississippi scheme had ever been thought of. And, after all, as we have observed, the calamitous effects of the madness were rather individual and immediate than permanent or general. There was little if any absolute destruction of capital; the whole mischief consisted in a most quick and violent shifting of property from

* Extracted, with much more, by Anderson, Chron. of Com. II. 614, from "Anglicæ Tutamen; or, the Safety of England: being an Account of the Banks, Lotteries, Diving, Draining, and Lifting, and sundry other Engines, Metalle, Salt, Linnen, and many other pernicious Projects now on foot, tending to the Destruction of Trade and Commerce, and the Impoverishing of this Realm. By a Person of Honour." 4to. Lond. 1695.

† Quoted in Anderson, II. 642.

* 10 Will. III. c. 23 (c. 17 in common editions).

* See 9 Ann. c. 6. §. 37, &c., and 10 Ann. c. 19 (c. 26 in common editions), §. 111, &c. See also 5 Geo. I. c. 9 (passed in 1718).

one hand to another; many rich persons were made suddenly poor, but many poor persons were also made suddenly rich; and, if some old families were thrown to the ground, some new ones were at the same time raised from the ground and established in their places. Not a social revolution, certainly, which it would be desirable to see often repeated—on the contrary, an interruption of the natural, even course of things fraught with much temporary inconvenience and misery—a wrench or shake given to the body politic which it cannot but feel sharply at the moment, but by which, for all that, its general health will suffer nothing. Nay, the shock may do good in the long-run rather than harm. In the present instance, that would appear to have been the case. The catastrophe of the South Sea delusion—the ruin many of the eager adventurers had brought upon themselves, and the well-merited punishment that was inflicted upon others—had probably a considerable effect in sobering down the extravagant spirit of cupidity, bred under the influence of an unaccustomed prosperity and abundance, in which the recent mania had originated, and in turning people's thoughts from the dream of making money by mere legerdemain and gambling to the slower but surer ways of regular commercial industry and enterprise.

During the short time it lasted, however, the excess to which the general intoxication excited by the mounting up of the South Sea Company's stock proceeded is almost incredible. Anderson has given us a curious table of the crowd of new projects that jostled one another in the money market, and also an interesting description of the general scene of competition and clamour among the dealers and purchasers of the various stocks, which seems to be taken from personal observation. Of the great legal corporations whose stock was raised for the time to extravagant prices he enumerates, besides the South Sea Company, whose original 100*l.* shares came at last to sell for 1000*l.* each, the East India Company, whose 100*l.* shares rose to 445*l.*; the Bank of England, whose shares originally worth about 96*l.* rose to 250*l.*; and the Royal African Company, whose 23*l.* shares rose to 200*l.* Besides these there were, having doubtful charters, the Million Bank, whose stock rose from 100*l.* to 440*l.*; the York Buildings Company, whose 10*l.* shares rose to 305*l.*; the Lustring Company, whose shares originally of 5*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* rose to 120*l.*, and others. Another class of funds was founded on the revival of old companies, such as the Mine Adventurers, the Sword Blade Company, &c., which had long been deserted and defunct. Other schemes were for local and personal objects, such as the Temple Mills Brass Works, whose 10*l.* shares rose to 250*l.*; and Sir Richard Steele's Fish Pool, for bringing fresh fish by sea to London, the shares in which rose in the market to 160*l.*, although no money at all was paid for them originally. Then there was a vast number of what Anderson describes as "Projects or bubbles, having neither charter nor act of parliament to authorise them; none of which were under one million, and some went as far as ten millions;" "very many whereof," he adds, "are distinctly remembered by the author of this work, how ridiculous and improbable soever they may now seem to many not acquainted with the infatuation of that year." The prices of the shares of only a few of those are given; but one example, that of the Orkney Fishery, the stock of which rose from 25*l.* to 250*l.*, may show that the most unsubstantial among them did not fail to be turned into powerful engines of swindling and plunder. Among them are enumerated eleven other fishing projects—four salt companies—ten insurance companies—four water companies—two companies for the remittance of money—two sugar companies—eleven companies for settlements in or trading to America—two building companies—thirteen land companies—six oil companies—four harbour and river companies—four companies for supplying London with coal, cattle, and hay, and for paving the streets—six hemp, flax, and linen companies—five companies for carrying on the manufacture of silks and cottons, one of which is described as Sir Richard Manningham's Company "for planting of mulberry trees and breeding of silk-worms in Chelsea Park, where two thousand of these trees were actually planted, and many large expensive edifices were erected, the remains whereof are scarcely now to be seen"—fifteen mining companies—and, bringing up the rear, a miscellaneous rabble, sixty in all, among which we read the following titles:—For building of hospitals for bastard children—for importing a number of large jackasses from Spain, in order to propagate a larger kind of mules in England; "for which purpose marsh lands were treating for near Woolwich; a clergyman, long since dead, being at the head of this bubble"—for trading in human hair—for fattening of hogs—for a grand dispensary, three millions—for a wheel for a perpetual motion—for furnishing funerals—for insuring and increasing children's fortunes—for trading in and improving certain commodities of this kingdom, three millions—and even, carrying the indefinite still farther than this, for an undertaking which shall in due time be revealed! For this last we are told an subscription was actually opened. The most absurd of these bubbles indeed seem not to have wanted dupes. "From morning till evening," says Anderson, "the dealers therein, as well as in South Sea stock, appeared in continual crowds all over Exchange Alley, so as to choke up the passage through it. Not a week-day passed without fresh projects recommended by pompous advertisements in all the newspapers (which were now swelled enormously), directing where to subscribe to them. On some sixpence per cent. was paid down, on others one shilling per cent., and some came so low as one shilling per thousand at the time of subscribing. Some of the obscure keepers of those books of subscription, contenting themselves with what they had got in the forenoon by the subscriptions of one or two millions (one of which the author particularly well remembers), were not to be found in the afternoon of the same day, the room they had hired for a day being shut up, and they and their subscription-books never heard of more." The utmost that appears to have been paid even on those projects that "had one or more persons of known credit to midwife them into the alley" was ten shillings per cent. "Persons of quality of both sexes," continues our author, "were deeply engaged in many of these bubbles, avarice prevailing at this time over all considerations of either dignity or equity; the males coming to taverns and coffee-houses to meet their brokers, and the ladies to the shops of milliners and haberdashers for the same ends. Any impudent impostor, whilst the delusion was at its greatest height, needed only to hire a room at some coffee-house or other house near that alley for a few hours, and open a subscription-book, for somewhat relative to commerce, manufacture, plantation, or of some supposed invention, either newly hatched out of his own brain, or else stolen from some of the many abortive projects of which we have given an account in former reigns, having first advertised it in the newspapers the preceding day, and he might in a few hours find subscribers for one or two millions—in some cases more—of imaginary stock. Yet many of those very subscribers were far from believing those projects feasible: it was enough for their purpose that there would very soon be a premium on the receipts for those subscriptions; when they generally got rid of them in the crowded alley to others more credulous than themselves. And, in all events, the projector was sure of the deposit money. The first purchasers of those receipts soon found second purchasers, and so on, at still higher prices, coming from all parts of the town, and even many from the adjacent counties; and so great was the wild confusion in the crowd in Exchange Alley, that the same project or bubble has been known to be sold, at the same instant of time, ten per cent. higher at one end of the alley than at the other end." In some cases what people got for their money scarcely professed to be anything else than simply a receipt for it—which nevertheless the purchaser was to try to pass over at a higher price upon somebody else; as if it were to be attempted to circulate a description of bank-notes without either signature or promise of payment, on the mere chance of each successive receiver finding some other more sanguine or venturesome than himself to take the worthless paper off his hands on a similar calculation. This might be called a paper currency resting not on credit but on hope. Anderson says that he well remembers what were called Globe Permits, which came to be currently sold for sixty guineas and upwards each in the Alley, and which were nevertheless only square bits of a playing card bearing the impression in wax of the sign of the Globe

Tavern in the neighbourhood, and the words Sail Cloth Permits for a motto, without any signature, and only conveying to their possessors the permission to subscribe some time afterwards to a new Sail Cloth Company not yet formed! We cannot help thinking that money must have been pretty plentiful when people could be found to give sixty guineas for any such article. Yet it is impossible to say how much higher the prices of shares in even the most nonsensical and absurd of these bubbles might have mounted, if the system had not received a sudden check from the very quarter whence it had derived its beginning and original impulse. "The taverns, coffee-houses, and even victualling-houses, near the Exchange," Anderson goes on to relate, "were constantly crowded, and became the scenes of incredible extravagance. The very advertisements of those bubbles were so many as to fill up two or three sheets of paper in some of the daily newspapers for some months." Even the wildest of the schemes, he adds, "had a very considerable run, much money being got and lost by them; and, as for the great bulk of them, there were almost incredible numbers of transactions in them daily and hourly, for ready money, and mostly at very advanced prices Moreover, great numbers of contracts were made for taking many of them at a future time." About Midsummer it was calculated that the value of the stock of all the different companies and projects at the current prices exceeded five hundred millions sterling, or probably five times as much as the current cash of all Europe, and more than twice the worth of the fee-simple of all the land in the kingdom. But now, on the 18th of August, came out writs of scire facias, at the instance of the South Sea Company, directed against certain of the pretended companies expressly by name, and generally against all other projects promulgated contrary to law, all the subscribers to which were ordered to be prosecuted by the law-officers of the crown. "This," continues Anderson, "instantly struck so general a panic amongst the conductors of all the undertakings, projects, or bubbles, that the suddenness as well as greatness of their fall was amazing. York Buildings stock, for instance, fell at once from 300 to 200, and in two days after neither it nor the other three undertakings expressly named in the scire facias had buyers at any price whatever. The more barefaced bubbles of all kinds immediately shrank to their original nothing; their projectors shut up their offices and suddenly disappeared; and Exchange Alley with its coffee-houses were no longer crowded with adventurers; many of whom, having laid out their substance in those airy purchases, now found themselves to be utterly undone; whilst, on the other hand, such as had dealt in them to great advantage became extremely shy of owning their gains." But the great mother of all the delusions and impositions soon felt that, though her progeny had become her rivals, in their life was involved her own. It was the spirit of gambling and madness that the mob of minor projects excited and fed by which the South Sea Company itself was sustained. From the day on which they were put down is to be dated the beginning of a decline in the price of the Company's stock from which it never recovered. When the scire facias came abroad South Sea stock was at 850; by the 22nd of August it had fallen to 820; by the 30th, to 780; by the 8th of September, to 680; by the 20th, to 410; by the 29th, to 175. By this time all faith in the possibility of its being kept up at a price above its original cost and real value was irretrievably gone; the bubble was burst; the delusion over; the drunkenness passed away, and only exhaustion, aching, and repentance left. "And now, towards the close of this year of marvels," says Anderson, winding up his narrative, "we see the great losses of many families of rank, and some of great quality, and the utter ruin of merchants before of great figure, and also of certain eminent physicians, clergy, and lawyers, as well as of many eminent tradesmen; some of whom, after so long living in splendour, were not able to stand the shock of poverty and contempt, and died of broken hearts; others withdrew to remote parts of the world and never returned." But, as we have intimated, the hurricane which so greatly disturbed the air in rapidly passing through it probably made it purer and healthier for a long time to come.

The reign of George II. may be conveniently regarded for our present purpose as divided into three periods of nearly equal length—the first extending from its commencement to the year 1739, during which, with the exception of the short war with Spain, which George I. had left as a legacy to his successor, and which was brought to a close soon after the commencement of the new reign, we were in the enjoyment of peace with all the world;—the second, the space embraced by the general war which broke out in 1739, and continued to rage till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748;—and the third, consisting of the remaining twelve years of the reign, the first eight of which were years of peace, the last four of war.

The general condition of the country at the commencement of the reign was undoubtedly one of considerable actual prosperity; and the rate of our economical advancement was probably also both higher and steadier than it had ever been before. Anderson has collected under the year 1729 the various evidences by which Walpole and the friends of his administration supported their assertion of the thriving circumstances of the time in reply to the factious declarations of their opponents:—the low rate of interest, demonstrating the plenty of money; the rise that had taken place in the price of land, from twenty or twenty-one years' purchase;—the great sums that had been of late years expended in the enclosing and improving of lands and in the opening and working of mines; "the great increase of jewels, plate, and other rich moveables, much beyond elder times;" the increased value of our general exports, and especially of our exports of the great staple articles of produce and manufacture, wool, coal, lead, and tin; and, lastly, the increase that had taken place in the quantity of our mercantile shipping.*

The progress of the two last-mentioned measures of the activity of our manufactures and commerce may be stated as follows for the whole of the reign:—The total estimated annual value of our exports, which, on the average of the three years 1726, 1727, and 1728, was, as we have seen, 7,891,739*l.*,† had grown to be on the average of 1736, 1737, and 1738, the three last years of the peace, 9,933,232*l.*; on that of 1739, 1740, and 1741, the three first years of the war, it fell to 8,870,499*l.*; but in 1744 it was 9,190,621*l.*; in 1747, 9,775,340*l.*; and in 1748, which was rather the first year of peace than the last of the war, it mounted at once to 11,141,202*l.* Nor was this a mere temporary elevation: in the next three years, 1749, 1750, and 1751, the total value of our exports was on an average 12,599,112*l.* The amount slightly declined, indeed, in 1755, 1756, and 1757, on the average of which three years it was only 11,708,515*l.*—the depression being probably occasioned by the uncertain and threatening aspect of things that preceded the breaking out of hostilities; but the war when it came, unlike all former wars in which we had ever been engaged, rather assisted than injured our foreign trade; and our exports from this date continued to increase every year to the end of the reign, their estimated value being, in 1758, 12,618,335*l.*; in 1759, 13,947,788*l.*; and in 1760, 14,693,270*l.* Thus, in the course of the reign of George II. the amount of our exports was very little less than doubled. The increase in the quantity of the shipping employed in our foreign trade, however, was not nearly so great. The total tonnage of the ships cleared outwards, which on the average of the three years ending with 1728 had been 456,483 tons, was 503,568 (including 26,627 foreign) on that of the three ending with 1738; 471,451 (including 87,260 foreign) on that of the three years ending with 1741; 446,666 (including 72,849 foreign) in 1744; 496,242 (including 101,671 foreign) in 1747; 554,713 (including 75,477 foreign) in 1748; 661,184 (including 51,386 foreign) on the average of the three years ending with 1751; 524,711 (including 73,456 foreign) on that of the three ending with 1757; 505,844 (including 116,002 foreign) in 1758; 527,351 (including 121,016 foreign) in 1759; and 573,978 (including 112,737 foreign) in 1760. Thus the amount of native shipping employed in our foreign trade, which was 432,832 tons at the beginning of the reign, was not more than 471,241 at its close.‡ This, however, in the absence of any account of our coasting trade, proves nothing as to the amount of the general mercantile marine of the kingdom. The tonnage of the royal navy, which at the end of the last reign was 170,862 tons, was in 1741, 198,387; in 1749, 228,215; in 1754, 226,246; and in 1760, 321,104.*

* Chron. of Com. iii. 156.

† Chalmers, Estimate, p. 105. At p. 113 the figures are printed 7,818,406*l.*

‡ From various accounts (apparently official) given by Chalmers, Estimate. pp. 113—122.

Another indication of the advancing wealth of the country throughout this reign is afforded by the regularly augmenting produce of the Sinking Fund, which, as explained in a previous Chapter, was made up from the surplus yielded by the ordinary taxes over and above certain fixed payments with which they were made chargeable.† The Sinking Fund, therefore, may be regarded as an index of the productiveness of the national taxation, which, again, was itself an index of the consumption of the people as determined by their numbers and their ability to purchase necessaries and luxuries. Now the surplus paid over to the Sinking Fund, which, at its establishment in 1717, was only 323,427*l.*, and by 1724 had only reached 653,000*l.*, had in 1738 come to be no less than 1,231,127*l.*, and it appears to have gone on increasing at the same rate to the end of the reign, seeing that in 1764, the next date at which we find it noted, it is stated to have been about 2,200,000*l.* Part of this increase is no doubt to be attributed to the increase of population; but that cause alone will not nearly account for the whole of it.

One of the sources to which the stream of our commerce owed its gradual and steady expansion throughout this reign was the growing importance of our possessions in the islands and on the continent of America. Of the attractions which the latter already presented to persons who found themselves in want of employment or in straitened circumstances in the old world, or for any other reason sought a new country in which to better their fortunes, we may judge from an account which has been preserved of the arrivals from Europe in the single province of Pennsylvania in the year 1729. There emigrated from Europe to Pennsylvania in that year no fewer than 6208 persons, of whom, as in the emigration of the present day, the great mass were Irish, driven from their native land, the account states, "by reason of rack-rents there"—in other words, by the same scarcity and high price of land, and utter want of any other means of subsistence, which still constitute the unhappy economical condition of that country. Of the 6208 individuals, 243 were Germans from the Palatinate, 267 English and Welsh, 43 Scotch, and the remaining 5655 all, or mostly all, Irish. The Germans were all passengers, the Scotch all servants, the English, Welsh, and Irish, partly passengers, partly servants. By this time, "in the province of Pennsylvania," says Anderson, "great improvements were constantly making in commerce, shipping, and agriculture; many ships and sloops were continually building at Philadelphia, Newcastle, &c., which they mostly dispose of to our sugar colonies, and the rest they use in the carrying their own product, consisting of cask-staves, lumber, pork, pease, flour, biscuit, &c., in exchange for sugar, rum, molasses, and British money."‡ As yet, however, as we learn from a report of the Board of Trade which was drawn up on an order of the House of Commons in 1732, there were no manufactures of any consequence established in Pennsylvania; even the clothing of the people and the utensils for their houses were all imported from Great Britain. The case was nearly the same, according to the report, in New Hampshire, New York, and New Jersey. The inhabitants only made a few coarse linens and woollens for their own use, and even of these a less quantity than they used to do. In Massachusetts's Bay, however, industry had made somewhat greater progress. There they not only built ships for the French and Spaniards, as the Pennsylvanians did for their neighbours of the West India islands, but they had already in that and other New England states six furnaces and nineteen forges for the smelting of iron, and they fabricated all sorts of iron-work for shipping. They also made great quantities of hats, many of which were exported, as was complained of by the Hatters' Company of London, to Spain and Portugal as well as to the West Indies. There were besides, the report states, several still-houses (for making rum) and sugar bakeries established in New England. It is affirmed, however, that after all, the iron-works in the province of Massachusetts were not sufficient to supply the twentieth part of what was required for the use of the country, and that the quality of the little that was made was greatly inferior to that of the iron imported from Great Britain. Some iron was also made in Rhode Island, but not to the extent of a fourth part of the consumption. From another account of nearly the same date, a work published at London in 1731, entitled, "The Importance of the British Plantations in America to this Kingdom considered," we gather some other interesting particulars. Pennsylvania, this author states, though the youngest of our American colonies, had already a more numerous white population than was spread over all Virginia, Maryland, and both the Carolinas. The produce of this province for exportation consisted of wheat, flour, biscuit, barrelled beef and pork, bacon, hams, butter, cheese, cider, apples, soap, myrtle-wax, candles, starch, hair-powder, tanned leather, bees'-wax, tallow candles, strong beer, linseed oil, strong waters, deer-skins and other peltry, hemp, some little tobacco, sawed boards and timber for building of houses, cypress-wood, shingles, cask-staves, headings, masts, and other ship-timber, and various dyeing substances, or drugs as they were called. The shipping which they employed in their own

* This last number is taken from the account laid before the House of Commons in 1791, which was made up at the Navy Office, Chalmers, on whose authority the other numbers are given, makes the tonnage in 1760 only 300,416 tons.

† See ante, p. 686.

‡ Chron. of Com., iii. 165.

trade might amount to about six thousand tons, and the quantity they built for sale was about two thousand tons annually. "They send," the account continues, "great quantities of corn to Portugal and Spain, frequently selling the ship as well as cargo; and the produce of both is then sent to England, where it is always laid out in goods and sent home to Pennsylvania. . . . They receive no less than from 4000 to 6000 pistoles from the Dutch isle of Curaçoa alone, for provisions and liquors. And they trade to Surinam in the like manner, and to the French part of Hispaniola, as also to the other French sugar islands; from whence they bring back molasses and also some money. From Jamaica they sometimes return with all money and no goods, because rum and molasses are so dear there; and all the money they can get from all parts, as also sugar, rice, tar, pitch, &c., is brought to England, to pay for the manufactures, &c., they carry home from us." The amount of the purchases thus made by the Pennsylvanians in England, he affirms, had not for many years been less than 150,000*l.* per annum. New York and Jersey had the same commodities to dispose of as Pennsylvania, except that they did not build so many ships; but there had lately been discovered in New York the richest coppermine perhaps that was ever heard of, and great quantities of its produce had been brought to England. And, although this province sent fewer ships to England than some of the other colonies, yet those it did send were more richly laden, a larger portion of their cargoes being made up of furs and skins, which were obtained from the Indians. On the whole, this writer reckons New York to be at least of equal advantage to the mother country with Pennsylvania, both in respect to the money it sent us and the manufactures it took from us. Massachusetts, he goes on to state, had already at least 120,000 white inhabitants, employing about 40,000 tons of shipping in their foreign and coasting trades, making above 600 sail of one kind and another, about one-half of which traded to Europe. "Their fisheries," he adds, "have been reckoned annually to produce 230,000 quintals of dried fish, which, being sent to Portugal, Spain, and up the Mediterranean, yield twelve shillings per quintal, being 138,000*l.* sterling. . . . By this fishery they are said to employ at least 600,000 seamen; and, adding to the above sum the freight and commission, all earned by our own people, and reckoned at one-third more, the whole will be 172,500*l.*, all remitted to Great Britain." To this was to be added their whale-fishery, employing about 1300 tons of shipping. They also sent to England great quantities of provisions, lumber, and the other descriptions of produce already enumerated as forming the exports of Pennsylvania; and many of their ships were loaded directly from the sugar islands for this country. "From New England, also," continues the account, "we have the largest masts in the world for our royal navy. From thence also, as from our other continent colonies, we receive all the gold and silver that they can spare; for we give them in exchange all manner of wearing apparel, woollen, brass, and linen manufactures, East India goods, &c., in all, to the value of 400,000*l.* yearly." Of the southern colonies, Virginia and Maryland are described as together sending over annually to Great Britain 50,000 hogheads of tobacco, one with another of the weight of 600 lbs.; the value of which, at 2½*d.* per pound, would be 375,000*l.* The shipping employed to bring home this tobacco is reckoned to amount to at least 24,000 tons, in by far the greater part English-built, and always fitted out and repaired in England—though, it seems to be implied, owned by the colonists. From these provinces also we received annually about 6000*l.* worth of skins and furs; they produced, moreover, excellent flax, and wool equal to the best grown in England; and there were already at least one iron-work in Virginia and another in Maryland. But, of all our American colonies, the one perhaps of the most visibly rising importance was that of Carolina. This author relates how the cultivation of rice originated in that province about the beginning of this century:—"A brigantine from the isle of Madagascar happened to put in at Carolina, having a little seed-rice left, which the captain gave to a gentleman of the name of Woodward. From part of this he had a very good crop, but was ignorant for some years how to clean it. It was soon dispersed over the province, and by frequent experiments and observations they found out ways of producing and manufacturing it to such great perfection that it is thought to exceed any other in value. The writer of this hath seen the said captain in Carolina, where he received a handsome gratuity from the gentlemen of that country, in acknowledgment of the service he had done that province. It is likewise reported that Mr. Dubois, then treasurer of the East India Company, did send to that country a small bag of seed-rice some short time after, from whence it is reasonable enough to suppose come those two sorts of that commodity—the one called red rice, in contradistinction to the white, from the redness of the inner husk or rind of this sort, although they both clean and become white alike." Before the year 1733 the Carolina rice exported to Spain and Portugal had nearly put a stop to the purchase of the article by those two countries from Venice and other parts of Italy. In that year the total exportation of rice from Carolina was 36,584 barrels; besides which the province also exported 2802 barrels of pitch, 848 of turpentine, 60 tons of lignum vite, 20 of Brasiletto wood, 27 of sassafras, 8 chests of skins, and a quantity of lumber, pork, peas, beef, and Indian corn. "This colony," adds Anderson, "is continually increasing by the encouragement they give to new comers, both British and foreigners."⁶ By the year 1739 we find its exportation of rice raised to 71,484 barrels, and among various additions to its other exports above 200,000 feet of pine and cypress timber, and a small quantity of potatoes. The vessels that cleared out from the province this year were 238 of all sorts. The next year its exportation of rice amounted to 91,110 barrels. A few years after this the Carolina planters, finding that they were overstocking the European market with their rice, began the cultivation of indigo, which had formerly been extensively grown in Jamaica and the other sugar islands. In 1747 about 200,000 lbs. of indigo was sent from Carolina to England, which had been heretofore wont to pay about 200,000*l.* a year to France for that article. Parliament the following year granted a bounty of sixpence per pound weight on all indigo raised in any of our American colonies, and imported into Britain directly from the place of its growth; and aided by this encouragement the cultivation of the plant continued to be prosecuted in Carolina with considerable success, so that by the end of the present period the quantity annually exported from the province amounted to about 400,000 lbs. In the year 1732 a new colony was established on the unoccupied territory between Carolina and the Spanish possession of Florida, by a society of gentlemen, headed by General Oglethorpe, whose primary object was to provide by this means a place of settlement for destitute debtors after their liberation from gaol, and for foreign protestants who might be desirous of emigrating to a settlement where they would have the free exercise of their religion. A charter was granted by the crown establishing the independence of the new province, which was named Georgia, in honour of his majesty. The trustees immediately erected two towns, Savannah and Frederica; planted a nursery of white mulberry-trees, with a view to the production of silk; and imported a number of natives of Piedmont to tend the worms, as well as other foreigners to dress and improve by cultivation the vines which grew wild in the country in great abundance. "Yet," adds Anderson, "by having several idle drones, drunkards, and determined rogues, the prosperity of this colony was at first much retarded, as it was also by frequent alarms from the Spaniards, and, it must be confessed, in part also by an ill-judged though well-meant Utopian scheme for limiting the tenure of lands and for the exclusion of negro slaves; both which mistakes have since been rectified.*" The rearing of the silkworm was gradually extended both in Georgia and Carolina; so that before the end of the present period the quantity of raw silk produced in Georgia exceeded ten thousand pounds weight annually.†

⁶ Chron. of Com., iii. 201.

The growing strength and importance of these continental settlements, however, was regarded with a jealous eye by the elder sugar colonies in their neighbourhood; and so early as the year 1715 loud complaints began to be made by the planters of Jamaica and the other West India islands of what they considered as the illegal traffic that was springing up between them and the French and Dutch dependencies in that quarter of the world, which they supplied, as we have seen, to a considerable extent, both with agricultural produce and with shipping, and from which they were themselves furnished in return with sugar, rum, and other articles of which the English islands maintained that they had by law a monopoly in regard to all the dominions of the mother country. The dispute produced several publications on both sides—among others, that entitled The Importance of the Plantations, noticed above; and at last, in 1731, a bill was brought into parliament, which passed the Commons, absolutely prohibiting, under forfeiture of ship as well as cargo, the importation into any part of English America of sugar, rum, or molasses grown in the plantations of any foreign power. This bill was allowed to drop in the House of Lords; but, two years after, the matter was settled by an act "for the better securing and encouraging the trade of his majesty's sugar colonies in America," which, while it granted a drawback upon the re-exportation from Great Britain of West India sugar, imposed certain duties upon the importation into the American settlements of the produce of the foreign plantations.* According to the preamble of the act our West India islands were at this time far from being in a thriving condition; their welfare and prosperity are asserted to be of the greatest consequence and importance to the trade, navigation, and strength of the kingdom; but of late years, it is added, the planters had fallen under such great discouragements as to be "unable to improve or carry on the sugar-trade upon an equal footing with the foreign sugar colonies without some advantage and relief be given to them from Great Britain." From an account of our West India Islands laid before the House of Lords by the Board of Trade in 1734 we learn various particulars of their trade and general condition. All our sugar islands together were reckoned to produce annually, on an average, 85,000 hogsheads, or 1,200,000 cwt., of sugar; "of which," adds Anderson, in his comment on the Report, "Great Britain was thought to consume annually 70,000 hogsheads, or 94,080,000 pounds of sugar; which, for ten millions of people, if so many there be in Britain, comes to nine pounds and a half of sugar to each person; or, if but eight millions of people, then about eleven pounds and a half of sugar to each person; and, as there are undoubtedly about two millions and upwards of people in Ireland, we may omit them in this computation, as there may probably be near that number in all the British dominions who use little or no sugar at all." In the present day, we may mention, our consumption of sugar is upwards of 400,000,000 of pounds, or between four and five times what it was a century ago. At that time it was computed that the shipping that went annually from

* Chron. of Com. iii. 169.

† Id. 309.

* Stat. 6 Geo. II. c. 13.

Great Britain to the sugar islands amounted to about 300 sail, navigated by 4500 seamen; and that the value of the British manufactures annually exported thither was about 240,000*l*. On an average of the four years ending with 1732, our annual exports to Jamaica amounted to 147,675*l*. in value, and our imports the 539,499*l*. At this time the number of the white inhabitants of Jamaica was only 7644, which was much less than it had formerly been. "The diminution of the white people of Jamaica," Anderson observes, "was owing to the great decay of their private or illicit trade to the Spanish main; that trade having drawn thither many white people, who were wont to get rich in a few years, and then return to their mother country, and the Spanish money they got in Jamaica did at length centre in England. From Jamaica our said people privately carried all sorts of our manufactures, &c., to New Spain, which it is well known can only be legally carried thither by the flota and flotilla from Old Spain: they also carried thither great numbers of negroes." Barbadoes had a white population of 18,295; that of our Leeward Islands, consisting of St. Christopher's, Antigua, Nevis, and Montserrat, with their dependencies, Barbuda, Anguilla, Spanish Town (or Virgin Gorda), Tortola, and the rest of the Virgin Islands, was 10,262; that of Providence, the only one of the Bahamas that could yet be said to be peopled, was 500; and that of the Bermudas, 5000. Besides sugar and rum, considerable quantities of cotton, indigo, ginger, pimento, and cocoa were exported from Jamaica and some of the other islands; and the cultivation of coffee, which had been grown in the Dutch continental settlement of Surinam since 1718, was introduced a few years after into the French and Spanish, and also into our own West India plantations. From Jamaica, as is well known, we now derive a large portion of our supply of this article.

During the latter portion of this period the affairs, and it may be said the essential character, of the East India Company underwent a complete revolution, under the influence of circumstances and events of which this is not the place to enter into any detail. The destruction of the authority of the Mogul Emperor by the invasion of Thamas Kouli Khan in 1739, and the consequent assumption of a practical independence, though still veiled under the old forms of vassalage, by the nabobs and other provincial Mahometan governors, had, in the course of the war which terminated in 1748, involved the agents of the French and English companies, as partisans of opposing competitors for various of the petty thrones which had thus arisen, in as fierce hostilities as were carried on by their respective countries in Europe or in any other part of the globe; nor did the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, which gave some years of repose to the swords of the combatants in the West, allay for more than a moment these oriental feuds, which had again burst into flame, and embroiled the two companies as furiously as ever, long before arms were again taken up by the two nations. All this has been elsewhere related, as well as the course of the memorable contest that now arose, in which the brilliant successes of Clive at the same time levelled with the ground the already formidable fabric of political power which France was erecting in India, and elevated his own employers from a trading company to be the rulers of an empire. What we are here concerned with are merely the results of these great changes upon the position and circumstances of the Company. The factory at Calcutta, which had been previously subordinate to Madras, had been declared an independent presidency so early as the year 1707; and in 1717 a firman granted by the Mogul had exempted the Company's trade from duties, and permitted them to purchase and hold possession of land in the neighbourhood of their several factories. In 1726 a charter obtained from the crown authorised the establishment of courts of justice at Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta, for the trial of all causes, civil and criminal, high treason only excepted. In 1746 the French took Madras, which however was restored two years after on the termination of the war. In 1749 the Company obtained possession of the town and district of Devicotal, in Tanjore, by a negotiation with the rajah of that country, after they had unsuccessfully attempted to depose him at the solicitation of his half-brother, from whom he had shortly before wrested the crown—a transaction which may be regarded as the first in which they openly took part in the politics of India, and as that which laid the foundation of their subsequent military power. Clive's operations range from the year 1751 to the end of the present period, in the course of which space of time Calcutta was taken by Surajah-ul-Dowlah, the subahdar of Bengal, in June 1756, but retaken in January following; the French settlement of Chandernagore was captured in March 1757; the power of Surajah-ul-Dowlah was overthrown at the battle of Plassy, in June, that same year; and before the end of the year 1760 every fort and factory belonging to the French had fallen into the hands of their rivals, except Pondicherry, which also surrendered in January, 1761. All this time, however, while the Company was making such advances in the acquisition of political power and even of territorial possessions, no great increase appears to have taken place in its trade. On the average of the eight years ending with 1741 the value of the British produce and goods of all sorts annually exported to India and China was no more than 147,944*l*.; and on that of the seven years ending with 1748 it had only increased to 188,176*l*. The average annual export of bullion during the last seven years was 548,711*l*. For some years after this there was a considerable rise in the amount exported both of goods and of bullion. Thus in 1749 the value of the goods was 275,890*l*., of the bullion 909,136*l*.; in 1750, of the goods 305,068*l*., of the bullion 816,310*l*.; in 1751, of the goods 341,633*l.*, of the bullion 944,471*l.*; in 1752, of the goods 410,968*l.*, of the bullion 840,417*l.*; in 1753, of the goods 418,015*l.*, of the bullion 951,951*l.*,—making together 1,369,966*l.*, which was the largest amount to which the total exports rose within the present period. From this date there was, with the exception of one or two years, a great decline in the amount of the bullion, and some falling off also in that of the goods; so that in 1755 the value of the goods was only 245,030*l.*, and that of the bullion 625,485*l.*; in 1758, of the goods 358,949*l.*, of the bullion 174,099*l.*; in 1759, of the goods, 366,974*l.*, of the bullion, 144,160*l.*,—making together only 511,134*l.*, which was a lower point than the total amount of exports had descended to since 1715. In 1760 the value of the goods exported was 520,719*l.*, but the amount of bullion was only 91,924*l.* The number of ships annually sent out usually ranged from sixteen to twenty; some few times it was twenty-two or twenty-four, but in other years it was only fourteen. Of the Company's imports the chief article in which there appears to have been a steady increase was tea: of that the home consumption gradually rose from 141,995 lbs. in 1711, to 237,994 lbs. in 1720, to 537,016 lbs. in 1730, to 1,380,199 lbs. in 1735, to 2,209,183 lbs. in 1745, and to 2,738,136 lbs. in 1755. In 1760 it appears to have fallen to 2,293,613 lbs.; but that proved only a temporary check. Perhaps it would not be easy to find a better evidence of the advancing refinement as well as comfort of the great body of the people than is furnished by this steadily extending preference for what may be called the temperate man's wine—"the cup that cheers but not inebriates."

The active spirit of the national industry, and the growth of our trade and manufactures, throughout the greater part of the present period, were shown by nothing more remarkably than by the continued extension of the metropolis and most of our other long established centres of population, and the rapid rise of several places formerly of inconsiderable magnitude to the rank of great towns. In London no fewer than eight new parishes were erected between the Revolution and the end of the reign of George II.:—in 1694 that of St. John, in Wapping; in 1729 that of Christ Church, Spital-fields, and that of St. George in the East; in 1730 that of St. George, Bloomsbury, and that of St. Anne, Limehouse; in 1732 that of St. John, Southwark; and that of St. Luke, in Old-street; and in 1743 that of St. Matthew, Bethnal Green. The act for the building of fifty new churches passed in 1710, the establishment of the Chelsea Water-Company in 1721, and the building of Westminster Bridge, begun in 1739, and finished in 1750; are all further indications of the expansion of this mighty heart of our social system. Bristol, Hull, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Sheffield, Leeds, Frome, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Dublin, had also each derived a large accession of population, some of them to the extent of several times the numbers they contained at the commencement of the period, either from the increase of trade and manufactures, or from that diffusion of luxury which is one of the common and natural consequences of commercial prosperity. Yet the spirit of improvement was still in a great measure confined to our cities and towns. In the country even the basis and first essential of a good economical system was still very deficient or altogether wanting; although turnpikes had been introduced soon after the Restoration, and in the reign of George II. it was made a felony to pull them down, our highways still continued to be generally kept in repair merely by the compulsory labour of the parish paupers, and even so late as 1754 we are told the traveller seldom saw a turnpike for two hundred miles after leaving the vicinity of London. Most of our great roads consequently still remained nearly in their ancient condition to the end of the present period.*

We must not close the commercial history of this period without adverting for a moment to the progress of the new science of political economy, some of the earlier cultivators of which we noticed in the last Book.† The most remarkable work upon this science that had yet appeared was produced in 1691, on occasion of the proposed recoinage of the silver money, by Sir Dudley North, under the title of "Discourses upon Trade, principally directed to the cases of Interest, Coinage, Clipping, and Increase of Money." The immediate object of the work was to oppose the government plan (which was that ultimately adopted) of throwing the loss arising from the clipped money upon the public; and Sir Dudley's brother and biographer, Roger North, hints that means were taken to suppress it:—"it is certain," he says, "the pamphlet is, and hath been ever since, utterly sunk, and a copy not to be had for money."‡ But the author sought to establish his conclusions by the most rigorous and methodical deduction, and his Discourses accordingly presented a statement and elucidation of all the leading principles of commercial and economical science. "He is throughout," says a distinguished modern writer upon these subjects, "the intelligent and consistent advocate of commercial freedom. He is not, like the most eminent of his predecessors, well informed on one subject and erroneous on another. His system is consentaneous in its parts, and complete. He shows that in commercial matters nations have the same interests as individuals, and forcibly exposes the absurdity of supposing that any trade which is advantageous to the merchant can be injurious to the public. His opinions respecting the imposition of a seignorage on the coinage of money, and the expediency of sumptuary laws, then very popular, are equally enlightened."§ One or two of the general proposi-

* Chalmers, Estimate, p. 129.

† See Vol. iii. pp. 653-665.

‡ Livins, iii. 172.

§ Principles of Political Economy, by J. B. McCulloch, Esq.

tions which Sir Dudley lays down will show how perfectly untrammelled he was by the prevailing prejudices and false notions of his day:—"That there can be no trade unprofitable to the public; for, if any prove so, men leave it off; and, wherever the traders thrive, the public, of which they are a part, thrive also:—That money is a n. erchandize, whereof there may be a glut as well as a scarcity, and that even to an inconvenience:—That a people cannot want money to serve the ordinary dealing, and more than enough they will not have:—That no man will be the richer for the making much money, nor have any part of it but as he buys it for an equivalent price."* Other writers who immediately followed North, and who all also promulgated some sound principles, though no one of them perhaps with the same complete elevation above the false or imperfect views of the time, were John Locke, in his "Considerations on the Lowering of Interest and Raising the Value of Money," published in 1691, and his "Further Considerations on raising the Value of Money," 1695; Nicholas Barbon, in a Discourse concerning Coining the New Money lighter, published in 1693; and the anonymous author of a very remarkable pamphlet which appeared in 1701, entitled "Considerations on the East India Trade." To a later part of the period belong Jacob Vanderlint's tract entitled "Money answers all things," 1734; Sir Matthew Decker's very able "Essay on the Causes of the Decline of Foreign Trade," 1744; Mr. Hume's "Political Essays," 1752; and Harris's "Essay on Coins," 1757, the views in which are chiefly systematised from the previous disquisitions of Locke and Hume, but which has been described as perhaps the best work, upon the whole, on the subject of money antecedent to the Wealth of Nations.*

p. 43. Mr. M'Culloch, we believe, was fortunate enough to recover a few years ago the only known copy of the original edition of Sir Dudley North's tract. A small impression has been since privately printed from that copy.

* Quoted by Mr. M'Culloch, at supra.

* Article on Political Economy, by Mr. M'Culloch, in Supplement to Encyclopedia Britannica; to which treatise, and to the same writer's Principles of Political Economy, we are indebted for the substance of the above notices.

COINS OF WILLIAM AND MARY, AND WILLIAM.

CROWN OF WILLIAM AND MARY.

SHILLING OF WILLIAM AND MARY.

SHILLING OF WILLIAM III.

HALFPENNY OF WILLIAM III.

The money of this period will not detain us long. The gold coins of William and Mary are five-pound pieces, forty-shilling pieces, guineas, and half-guineas; the silver, all the usual pieces, from crowns down to pennies. On both the gold and silver money are the heads of their majesties in profile, both looking to the left, the queen's half-covered by the king's, which is outermost. Some tin halfpence and farthings were coined in 1690; but, being frequently counterfeited, they were replaced by a copper coinage of these descriptions of money in 1694. We have already given an account of the calling in of the old silver money, and its recoinage, in 1696. Each of the new coins has immediately under the king's head the initial letter of the name of the town where it was struck. The Scotch coins of William and Mary have their heads turned to the right. Their only Irish coins are halfpence and farthings, of copper, brass, and pewter. The escutcheon in the centre of the royal arms on the money of this reign is that of Nassau.

The gold and silver money of Anne consists of the same pieces as that of her predecessor. She likewise coined a few copper halfpence and farthings, the latter dated in 1713 and 1714, and now very rare. "Upon the Union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland," says Leake,

COINS OF QUEEN ANNE.

HALFPENNY.

"the arms being altered, the same was observed upon all the money coined afterwards; the arms of England and Scotland being impaled in the first and bottom shields, France in the sinister, and Ireland in the dexter, according to this left-handed rotation, which, however irregular and absurd, has prevailed ever since the first milled money."* For some time after the Union a mint was kept up at Edinburgh, at which silver money was coined of the same stamp with that coined in London, but distinguished by an E, for Edinburgh, under the queen's head.

The coins of George I. are remarkable as being the first on which the letters F. D. (for Fidei Defensor) appear. They have also his majesty's electoral titles on the reverse; and in the arms Ireland is placed in the bottom shield, and in the dexter (where those of Ireland used to be) are the arms of his majesty's German dominions. In this reign, in the year 1717, the legal value of the guinea was reduced from 21s. 6d. to 21s., and that of each of the other gold coins in the same proportion; considerable loss having been sustained by our mint price of gold being higher than that of other countries. In 1718 there were issued, for the first time, some quarter-guineas; but they were found too diminutive for use, and no more of them were coined within the present period. Of the famous Irish copper money coined by Wood in 1722 and 1723, the halfpence, and the farthings of 1723, have on the reverse Ireland represented under the figure of a woman in profile, sitting, with a palm-branch in her right hand, and resting her left upon a harp, with the legend HIBERNIA: the figure on the farthing of 1722 is slightly different. "These," says Leake, "were undoubtedly the best copper money ever made for Ireland, considerably exceeding those of King Charles II., King James II., and King William and Queen

* Historical Account of English Money, p. 405.

QUEEN ANNE'S FARTHING.—Complete Set.—The third of the series is the one so highly valued by Collectors.

COINS OF GEORGE I.

CROWN.

SHILLING.

HALFPENNY.

Mary, in weight, goodness, fineness, and value of the copper." They were also much handsomer than the contemporary English farthings and halfpence, the king's head being in particular much better executed, as well as having more resemblance to his majesty. The violent opposition raised against them, although not one of the allegations on which it professed to be founded was ever either proved or attempted to be proved, compelled the crown to issue an order, in August, 1724, that only as many of the halfpence and farthings as had then been issued, amounting in value to about 17,000*l.*, and as many more as should make up that amount to 40,000*l.*, should be put into circulation. The amount for which the patent had been granted was only 100,800*l.* Before this it is stated that the Irish, in their want of small money, were wont to make use of counterfeit coins called Raps, of such base metal that what passed for halfpenny was not worth half a farthing, and persons employing many workmen were obliged to pay them their wages with tallies, or tokens in ls.

Silver groats, threepenny, twopenny, and even penny pieces continued to be coined in the reign of George II. Upon the gold coins of this reign the arms, Leake observes, are properly disposed in one shield crowned, instead of being misplaced in four shields, as had been done upon all the milled money since the Restoration, some few coins of William and Mary excepted. At the commencement of the reign a great deal of the old hammered gold money of James I., Charles I., and Charles II. was still current, under the name of broadpieces, half broadpieces, and quarter broadpieces, much of which was greatly diminished either by wear or by clipping and filing; but in 1732 all this old money was called in, and

COINS OF GEORGE II.

CROWN.

SHILLING.

HALFPENNY.

paid for at the Mint at the rate of 8*ls.* per ounce; after which it was declared no longer current. In one of George II.'s halfpennies of 1730 an extraordinary blunder occurs, the omission of the r in his majesty's name. Foreign gold coins still continued to form a great part of our currency in this reign, much to the general inconvenience. Leake, writing in 1745, gives a deplorable account, also, of the state to which the silver money was already reduced, although most of it was not yet fifty years old. "We have not, indeed," he says, "had any clipping, as formerly, for that is impracticable upon the milled money; but time has diminished it in a manner equivalent to clipping. Our sixpences are, many of them, worn to groats, and some shillings are not much better in proportion. The half-crowns are not so bad, but then they are not so common; the later ones, since King William, being most of them melted or transported; and crowns seem to have answered no other end; they disappear as soon as coined, and indeed are too burdensome for common use, two half-crowns better answering the purpose."*

* Historical Account of English Money, p. 457.

WOOD'S IRISH HALF-PENNIES.

The state of things to which the Revolution of 1688 put a termination was favourable to the development of agricultural industry during the present period. Other political circumstances also favoured the landed interest, and for eighty years after the Revolution England, as we have seen, was a corn-exporting country;* fresh land was brought into cultivation, and in 1710 the first Enclosure Act was passed. In 1697 a duty was laid in England on malt, and the same duty was extended to Scotland in 1713. In 1710 the winnowing-machine was introduced from Holland; in Scotland its use was denounced from the pulpit as impious. The threshing-machine was first employed in the northern parts of the island about the same time: no instrument for saving labour has made such slow progress, and in many extensive districts its use is unknown even in the present day. In 1732 Jethro Tull commenced his experiments in drilling and horse-hoeing on his farm in Berkshire, but thirty years elapsed before they excited much practical attention, and before the really valuable parts of his system began to be adopted by intelligent agriculturists. Towards the close of the period the extension of the turnip-husbandry was already effecting the most important revolution in the history of modern agriculture. Those improvements were also commenced which have gone far towards eradicating the defects of the ancient breeds of domestic animals in this country: Bakewell, the great improver of live-stock, began his experiments about the year 1760.

The writings of Evelyn, published near the close of the last period, had awakened a taste for horticulture and planting. Gardens had become a luxury on which large sums were expended; the cottage of the labourer began to be considered incomplete without a plot of ground for the cultivation of vegetables; and a great increase took place in the quantity and variety of vegetables consumed by the labouring classes. The farmer who did not provide plenty of greens, pease, and beans for his servants to eat with their salt-meat was despised for his parsimony.† By the middle of the century the cultivation of the potatoe had become almost general in every part of England, and the prejudices against its use had been nearly removed; but in some quarters premiums were still resorted to for the purpose of bringing this root into consumption amongst the poor.

In the higher departments of horticultural science an important advance was made. At the commencement of the century the successful cultivation of the plants and fruits of tropical countries was nearly unknown. In 1684 the greenhouse in the Apothecaries' Garden at Chelsea was heated by embers placed in a hole in the floor. The greenhouse was only a receptacle for plants in winter, and they were removed to the open air as soon as the warm weather returned. The adoption of glass roofs by Switzer, in 1717, rendered it practicable to cultivate plants which would not bear the open air in summer by affording light as well as heat; and all the modern improvements in the science of "forcing" may be said to date from this period.

At the close of this period Arkwright, Watt, Hargrave, Crompton, and others, were silently co-operating in effecting those improvements in machinery and inanimate agents, by means of which the great branches of national industry assumed in many instances a totally new character; but this change did not take place during the present period. The application of steam as a moving power, which had been proposed by the Marquess of Worcester* in 1683, was but imperfectly carried into effect. In 1698 Savery constructed his steam-engine for draining the mines, but it required a large supply of fuel, and a great waste of power attended its operations.† To Savery, however, belongs the merit of producing a vacuum by the condensation of steam. In 1707 Newmān and Cawley remedied some of the defects of Savery's engine, and conjointly with him they obtained a patent for these improvements. From this time no further advance was made in the efficiency of the steam-engine for about half a century. In 1756 Brindley made some alterations in its construction which effected a great saving in fuel,

* From 1697 to 1773 the total excess of exports amounted to 30,908,366 quarters of corn, upon which bounties were paid of not less than 6,237,176*l*. From 1748 to 1752 the average quantity exported was 643,961 quarters annually. The bounty paid in 1750 amounted to 284,176*l*.

† White's Selborne.

* Century of Inventions.

† The act securing to Savery the benefits of his invention was passed in 1698 (10 Wm. III. c. 61), and is entitled "An Act for the Encouragement of a New Invention by Thomas Savery, for raising Water and occasioning Motion to all sorts of Mill Works by the impellent force of Fire."

and this was the chief object of most of the attempts at improvement which were made until the time of Watt. That great man did not commence his experiments on the power of steam till 1763.

The origin of navigable canals in England dates from 1755. In 1758 the Duke of Bridgewater obtained an act for constructing the canal which bears his name. He employed Brindley as his engineer, a man of original genius, who superintended nearly all the great works of this kind constructed during the ensuing ten years. The introduction of railways occurred about a century before any artificial canal had been formed in England for the purposes of navigation. The rails were of wood, which were laid down to facilitate the transport of coal from the collieries at Newcastle.*

In 1754 The Society for the encouragement of Arts and Manufactures was instituted in London; and, though it scarcely ever happens that great inventions or discoveries are to be directly attributed to such institutions, yet their existence is a strong proof of the necessity and desire for improvement.

In preceding notices of the state of the useful arts during each period, the woollen manufacture, from its extent and value, has always first demanded our attention; but another textile fabric was now growing into importance, and was placed in circumstances which led to future improvements of such vast consequence that its condition first attracts consideration.

From the end of the sixteenth century a species of mixed fabric had been manufactured at Manchester and some other towns in Lancashire, the material of which, consisted of linen and cotton, the latter imported from the Levant and the East Indies. The weft was cotton, and the warp, which constituted the most important part, was of linen. The manufacture of this mixed cloth during the whole of the present period was as much a domestic employment as that of woollens or linen; but the demand for it had considerably increased towards the middle of the century. The average importation of cotton-wool indeed did not exceed two million lbs. a year up to this time, but a considerable quantity of cotton-yarn was imported by the East India Company. In working up cotton-yarn an active weaver could keep in continual occupation three women at the wheel spinning weft, and unless he obtained this article in sufficient quantity he was unable to fulfil his engagement with the merchant or the wholesale manufacturer: the latter pressing upon the weaver for the completion of his work occasioned him to be urgent with his spinners. Towards the close of this period the demand for the compound fabric in question had so much increased, that the greatest difficulty was experienced by the weavers; and all who were connected with the manufacture felt the necessity of some process for accelerating the operations of the spinners and enabling them to keep pace with the loom. The weaver was often obliged to visit his spinners, walking perhaps a distance of several miles, to importune them for a supply of weft to keep his loom employed during the day. In these excursions he was met by other weavers on the same errand as himself, and he was "often obliged to treat the females with presents in order to quicken their diligence at the wheel."† These were the circumstances which led to the inventions of Arkwright, Hargrave, and Crompton, the influence of which upon this branch of industry we shall have occasion to describe in the next Book. Before they accomplished their improvements some ineffectual attempts had been made to render the spinning of wool and cotton more purely mechanical processes. In 1733 Mr. Wyatt constructed a model of a machine by which it is asserted "the first thread of cotton ever produced without the intervention of the human fingers" was spun. Wyatt applied to a foreigner named Paul, who obtained a patent for this machine in 1738. In 1741 the invention was brought into practical operation in a warehouse at Birmingham: the machine was set in motion by two asses walking round an axis, and ten or a dozen girls were employed in superintending and assisting its operations. The establishment soon failed. Wyatt's apparatus was next employed in a factory at Northampton, belonging to Cave the London bookseller; but this concern also proved unsuccessful. The machinery was in fact ill adapted to its purpose, and the yarn which it produced was inferior to that obtained by the common hand-wheel. The machine for which Wyatt and Paul obtained a patent must therefore be regarded as having completely failed, since it did not supersede the ancient household machine. In 1758 Paul obtained a separate patent for the spinning-machine, but neither did this invention accomplish the desired object, and in fact it did not greatly differ from those which he had first constructed. The cylinder-card was his invention, but it was not adapted to cotton, and on the breaking up of his factory it appears to have been employed in carding sheep's-wool for hats; in 1760 it was again applied to the carding of cotton, and ten years afterwards Arkwright introduced such improvements in its construction as rendered it a valuable auxiliary in the cotton manufacture. We leave the cotton manufacture (so called, though during this period no fabric was manufactured in England entirely of that material) on the eve of great improvements.

The acts of Edward VI. and Philip and Mary, which were formed to prevent the introduction of new machines in the woollen manufacture, and to confine the clothing trade, as far as it was possible,

* Baines's History of the Cotton Manufacture; also Guise's History.

† A description of these railways as constructed in 1676 is given in Roger North's Life of his brother, the lord keeper:—"The manner of the carriage is by laying rails of timber from the colliery to the river, exactly straight and parallel; and bulky carts are made with four rollers fitting those rails, whereby the carriage is so easy that one horse will draw down four or five chaldrons of coals, and is an immense benefit to the coal-merchant."

to cities and corporate towns, still remained in force; and these acts undoubtedly had the effect of repressing mechanical improvements and preventing any material changes in the ancient modes of cloth-making: the same machines which were in use at the beginning of the present period continued, for the most part unimproved at its close. The notions which prevailed respecting the influence of machinery on human labour might also probably have some effect in repressing improvement. The skilfulness of the workmen, however, had become greater in every department of the manufacture. A writer on trade and manufactures, whose work was published in 1694,* confirms this opinion. He says, "We have evidently made a great progress in the curiosity of our cloth these late years, having quite vanquished the Dutch in their last efforts upon us with their blacks;" and he further remarks that "not above forty years past we were served from Holland with most of our fine cloths for our nobility and gentry, and the great complaint of those days was that our cloth was not fully manufactured in England; both which points are now accomplished." In 1738 Mr. John Kay invented the present mode of casting the shuttle, by what is called a "picking-peg," by which means a weaver was enabled to perform twice the former quantity of work, and to weave cloth of any width. This valuable little instrument was confined to the weaving of woollens for the first twenty years after its invention.† This branch of the national industry continued, as it had heretofore been, the one of greatest importance; and all the old opinions which had been current for three or four centuries concerning its magnitude and value continued to be repeated; but, although it might be true at the commencement of the present period that "nine parts in ten of our exported commodities doth come from the sheep's back, and from hence alone is the spring of our riches,"‡ this was far from being the case at its close.

The woollen manufacture seems to have been in some parts of the country carried on under local regulations. Thus in the West Riding of Yorkshire the magistrates in quarter-sessions appointed persons to take an account of the quantity of cloth manufactured in the riding in each year. From 1732 to 1741 inclusive, the total number of pieces produced appears to have been 580,645; from 1742 to 1751 the quantity had more than doubled, being 1,236,304 pieces; and from 1752 to 1761 it remained nearly stationary, being 1,255,339 pieces. The Leeds Cloth Hall was established in 1758, and had 1800 stands for the exposure of the goods of country manufacturers on the market-days: a hall for white cloths was erected about twenty years afterwards.

The stimulus given to the silk manufacture at the close of the last period, when the revocation of the Edict of Nantes brought great numbers of French artisans to this country, was sufficiently powerful to have enabled this branch of manufacture to have defied competition. But, instead of its being fearlessly left to take care of itself, and to make its way by its own natural strength, its progressive improvement was checked by a system of protection, though the manufacture was evidently rising into great importance. In 1697 a Royal Lustering Company was established in London, with the Earl of Pembroke as governor, for making silk "lustrings" and "à-la-modes." The company had sufficient influence to procure the passing of an act prohibiting the importation of foreign goods of this particular description; but before they could derive much profit from their monopoly the fashion of wearing these silks had begun to change. In 1713 the Silk Weavers' Company, in a petition to parliament against the commercial treaty with France, represented the silk manufacture as being of twenty times greater extent than it was in 1664; affirming that black and coloured silks were made equal in quality to those of France; and that black silk for hoods and scarfs, which had not been made in England at all twenty-five years before, had now for several years been manufactured to the value of 300,000*l.* a year. These statements, if taken literally, would doubtless present an exaggerated view of the progress of the silk manufacture, but they sufficiently indicate that it was advancing. In 1722 an act was passed granting bounties on the exportation of silk goods for the three following years.

The art of silk-throwing was at this period practised with most skill in Italy, where machinery of a superior description was applied to the purpose; and the weavers in England were entirely dependent upon that country for the supply of silk thread. In 1715 Mr. John Lombe, one of three brothers who were in business in London as silk-throwsters and merchants, proceeded to Italy in the hope of obtaining such an acquaintance with the machinery as might enable him to introduce it into this country. Undeterred by the dangers and difficulties of his project, he succeeded in obtaining employment in a mean capacity in one of the Italian mills, in which, on account of his supposed destitute condition, he was allowed to sleep, and the night was employed in making drawings of the machinery, which he succeeded in bringing in safety to England. A silk-mill, the first of the kind in England, was erected at Derby in 1719, by Lombe and his brothers. But the King of Sardinia having prohibited the exportation of raw silk, great difficulty was experienced in procuring a supply from other quarters, so that the patent which had been granted to Sir Thomas Lombe, for the sole making and use of the engines for fourteen years, did not prove so advantageous to him as he had anticipated; and parliament, in consideration of these circumstances, granted him 14,000*l., on condition that the invention should be thrown open to the trade. The mill erected at Derby came nearer to the idea of a factory of the present day than any previous establishment of the kind. The machine had 97,746 wheels, movements, and individual parts (working day and night), all which received their motion from one large water-wheel, and were governed by one regulator; and it employed three hundred persons to attend and supply it with work. To encourage this new branch of industry duties were imposed on foreign-wrought silk. In 1750 an act was passed (the second which had ever been enacted against the exportation of machinery) prohibiting the exportation of tools and utensils used in the silk manufacture. About 1730 our silks appear to have been held in considerable esteem in various parts of the continent. "In Italy itself," says a writer of this date, "the silks of English manufacture are most esteemed, and bear a greater price than those of Italy; so that at Naples, when a tradesman would highly recommend his silk stockings, &c., he protests they are right English.†"

* The Interest of England Considered. London, 1694.

† Baines's Lancashire.

‡ The Interest of England Considered, 1694.

Great efforts were made during the present period both in Scotland and in Ireland to raise the importance of the linen manufacture. In Ireland it was hoped it might become what the woollen manufacture was in England: in Scotland, at the Union, it was the staple branch of industry, though of no great absolute value. In 1698, when it was resolved to crush the woollen manufacture of Ireland by an act prohibiting the export of woollen goods from that country,‡ it was at the same time determined to afford every encouragement to the Irish linen trade. Political feeling was in some measure mixed up with this determination, for the Protestant interest was strong in that part of Ireland where the manufacture was carried on with most spirit. In 1704 an act was passed allowing the exportation of Irish linens to England; and the ground for conferring this privilege is set forth in the preamble of the act as follows:—"Forasmuch as the Protestant interest ought to be supported by giving the utmost encouragement to the linen manufactures of that kingdom.§" In 1711 a board was established in Dublin for effecting this object, for which purpose premiums and bounties were liberally given. Bounties on exportation were granted in 1743. As in England the bodies of the dead were shrouded in woollen for the encouragement of the manufacture, so in Ireland linen scarfs and hatbands were directed to be used at funerals. The importation of linen into Ireland from Scotland was prohibited in 1705.|| In Scotland also the linen manufacture was superintended by a board established in 1727. One of its plans was to advance money to manufacturers, and the system of bounties and premiums was also adopted. All the mechanical processes connected with the manufacture of linen still continued of the simplest kind, and the yarn was all produced by the common spinning-wheel of the cottager. In 1753 the manufacture of coarse linens had made some progress in the Highlands. The quantity manufactured in Scotland at the period of the Union is said not to have exceeded one million and a half yards; and in 1750 it was about seven millions and a half. In England the linen manufacture was comparatively neglected.

In 1699 we had passed an act* prohibiting the importation of lace from Flanders, which was met by a prohibition on their part of our woollens. This mode of retaliation had the effect of rendering our legislators more clear-sighted; and an act was passed repealing the prohibitory enactment within three months after the duty on our woollens should have been taken off in Flanders. The manufacture of lace was essentially a domestic employment, and was chiefly carried on in Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and some of the adjoining counties, and in a few places in the west of England. No lace was made by machinery in England before 1768.

In 1696 the exportation of stocking-loom was prohibited;‡ from which we may infer that the best machines of this kind were at that time made in England: this was also the first act passed against the exportation of machinery. About 1755 Mr. Jedediah Strutt introduced some useful improvements in Lee's stocking-frame.

The state of the metallic manufactures will not require any lengthened notice. In preceding periods we had to notice the increasing scarcity of timber which prevailed in the districts where the smelting of iron had been carried on for several centuries. The legislative provisions that were made with a view of maintaining the supply of fuel did not effect much towards accomplishing this object; and the rise of prices indicated the necessity of resorting to some other remedy. It was proposed by some that the waste lands of the kingdom should be planted; and others suggested that the forests of our American colonies pointed out that quarter as a fitting place to which the business of smelting should be transferred. The woods of Ireland being less exhausted than those of England, attention was directed to that country, and for some time considerable quantities of iron were smelted there. The device of offering some public reward to any individual who should discover the means of making bar-iron with coal might, it was also thought, be the means of relieving the ironmasters from their difficulties. The patent which Lord Dudley had obtained in 1619 for accomplishing this very object seems to have been forgotten. The works which he had established had been destroyed by an ignorant mob. About 1740, however, Lord Dudley's process seems to have been revived, and iron was made with pit-coal at Colebrook Dale; but in 1747 the fact seems to have been so little known, that it had not reached the author of a paper on the subject in the Philosophical Transactions for

* Paper by Sir Thomas Lombe, setting forth his claims.

† Keyser's Travels, from the German. London, 1756.

‡ See ante, p. 708.

§ 3 and 4 Anne, c. 7.

* 11 and 12 Wm. III. c. 11.

‡ 7 and 8 Wm. III. c. 20.

that year, although he resided in the above-mentioned district: he states, however, that iron was made by one ironmaster in Colebrook Dale, either brittle or tough at pleasure, by means of pit-coal.* In 1740 the quantity of pig-iron made in England and Wales was estimated at about 17,000 tons. In 1719 the iron trade was deemed the third of our national manufactures, and the number of persons it is said to have employed was 200,000. The furnaces in Kent and Sussex were not entirely relinquished at the close of this period; but iron-works were now established in many other parts of the kingdom; those at Rotherham, in Yorkshire, about 1750, and the great works at Carron, in Scotland, in 1760.

The manufacture of copper appears to have made satisfactory progress during this period. By an act passed in 1694† the exportation of copper was allowed (except to France) with a view of encouraging the working of copper-mines. From 1736 to 1745 the mines in Cornwall furnished about 700 tons of fine copper annually, and towards the close of the period the supply had considerably more than doubled. The great copper-mines in Anglesea were not yet discovered; but besides the Cornish mines there were others worked in Staffordshire, which however have long ceased to be productive. In an act passed in 1714,‡ permitting the re-exportation of foreign copper with a drawback, it is asserted that "the copper manufacture of this kingdom is brought to such great perfection that there is more made here than can be expended here and in the Plantations." Of the manufacture of brass, a material of so much value in the composition of a great variety of articles, and which had been introduced into England by a German in 1649, we have scarcely any account during the present period. The brass manufacture was commenced at Birmingham in 1748. In 1721 it was computed that the number of persons employed in England in the manufacture of articles of copper and brass amounted to 30,000.

The patent for applying Yarranton's process for tinning iron, already noticed,§ does not appear to have been long made use of by the individuals who acquired the rights which it conferred; and it was not until about the year 1730 that this manufacture can be said to have been established by parties who commenced making tinned iron in Wales: it was further improved about the year 1740.

The refining of metals was carried on by improved processes. A statute of Henry IV.|| which impeded the operations of refiners of the precious metals was repealed in 1689,¶ by an act in the preamble of which it is stated that men "are arrived to great skill and perfection in the art of smelting and refining of metals and otherwise improving them and their ores (which very much abound within this realm), and extracting gold and silver out of the same, but dare not exercise their skill within this realm for fear of the penalties in the said act." Wardens and assay-masters for assaying wrought plate were appointed in York, Exeter, Bristol, Chester, and Norwich, by an act passed in 1706.*

In 1742 the ware known as Sheffield plate was first made in that town, and was at first confined to buttons, snuff-boxes, and articles of a similar description; but a few years afterwards the side-board was furnished with articles of the new manufacture, elegant in design, and as brilliant as silver in appearance.

According to Postlethwayte watches of English manufacture were in great repute in France in the early part of the century; and Law, the notorious projector, is said to have established a number of English watchmakers at Versailles. By an act passed in 1698,† the exportation of parts of watches, that is, cases and dials, was prohibited. The other parts were made abroad, and the completed article stamped with the name of a London maker. Being of inferior quality and workmanship, these foreign fabrications tended to bring English watches into disrepute.

Printing-type, which we imported from Holland until some time after the reign of Anne, was so much improved during this period that the type made in England came to be in demand on the continent. This was effected by Caslon, an engraver of gun-locks and barrels, who, being employed in 1720 to cut a fount of Arabic type, was induced to commence business as a letter-cutter, and in a few years rendered the English types superior to any in Europe. Baskerville, the printer, added further improvements. In 1725, William Ged, an inhabitant of Edinburgh, discovered the principle of casting metal plates, that is, the art of stereotyping. It was employed by the University of Cambridge to print bibles and prayer-books, but the compositors, thinking their craft in danger, secretly made errors in the pages as originally set up in moveable types after they had passed the reader, and the bibles were so defective that the university abandoned the practice of stereotyping them. We may notice in this place the art of paper-making. The improvements which were introduced at the close of the last period did not render paper made in England equal in quality to that manufactured abroad; and the importation of foreign paper continued, though in a diminishing proportion, to the end of the present period. In 1690 we commenced the manufacture of white paper: about 1713, as we have seen, the quantity of paper of every description, made in England, was estimated at 300,000 reams. An excise duty was first laid on paper in 1711. So late as the last years of this period Baskerville imported paper from Holland for his fine editions.

The improvements which Wedgwood introduced

* Vol. ix. p. 308.

† 12 Anna, st. 1. c. 18.

‡ 5 Hen. IV. c. 4.

§ 5 and 6 Wm. and Mary, c. 17.

|| See vol. iii. p. 570.

¶ 1 Wm. and Mary, c. 30.

* 12 and 13 Wm. III. c. 4.

† 9 and 10 Wm. III. c. 18.

in the manufacture of earthenware do not date earlier than the year 1760, up to which period we imported considerable quantities of earthenware from the continent. At the commencement of the period the art was in the rudest state, and only articles of the commonest and coarsest kind were made. De Foe introduced the manufacture of pantiles, at Tilbury, in Essex. They had been previously imported in large quantities from Holland, but notwithstanding the concern did not prosper. In his Review for March, 1705, De Foe tells us that he employed a 'hundred poor' abourers in making pantiles. Before the war with France in 1698 the best kinds of glass, even for windows, as has been already stated, were imported from France: the manufacture of crown glass was not even attempted in England until after 1760. Still, even at the commencement of the period, the glass manufacture was of sufficient importance to render it an object of taxation; a duty being levied upon glass by an act passed in 1695.* This duty, which had been granted for five years, was made perpetual by an act of the following year. By a statute of the session immediately succeeding one-half the amount of duties was remitted, it being found "by experience (says the preamble to the statute) that the said rates and duties upon glass and glass wares are too great, so that the makers of those manufactures in this kingdom are thereby discouraged." By another act* passed in the following year the glass manufacture was fortunately relieved from the vexatious interference of fiscal officers, partly on the ground that the duties did not produce much, and being oppressive would thus "hinder the employing great numbers of poor and endanger the loss of so beneficial a manufacture to this kingdom." Glass remained free from any duty until 1746, when a duty was imposed on the materials used in the manufacture,† and additional duties were at the same time levied on the importation of foreign glass.

* 6 and 7 Wm. and Mary, c. 16.

* 10 Wm. III. c. 18.

† 19 Geo. II. c. 12.

WHITEHALL, as it appeared before the great fire of 1691, which destroyed all but the Banqueting House.
From a View in the margin of Morden and Lea's Map of London, published at that period.

CHAPTER V.

THE HISTORY OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND THE FINE ARTS.

SWIFT, from a Picture in the Bodleian Library.
 LOCKE, from a Picture by Sir Godfrey Kneller.
 HOGARTH, from a Picture by himself.

NEWTON, from a Picture by Vanderbank.
 ADDISON, from an anonymous Picture.
 POPE, from a Picture by Hudson.

N the present occasion we will postpone our review of the history of literature and science till we have dismissed the subject of the fine arts of architecture, sculpture, painting, and music.

Perhaps at no period since the revival of the arts have they ever fallen into so low a state in Britain as during that upon which we are now about to enter. In painting, the degradation was general throughout Europe: in Italy the art was all but extinct; the French school, such as it was, on the decline; and the sources now dried up, or utterly vitiated, from which the demands of England had hitherto been satisfied. Sculpture was reduced to the manner of Bernini. The independent school of architecture which England can claim at least from the middle of the fourteenth century, if not from a much earlier period, approached its extinction, but not until it had taken a new flight and attained the highest pitch of grandeur under Wren and Vanbrugh.

Few circumstances in the history of the arts are more remarkable than the coincidence which produced a genius so mighty as that of Sir Christopher Wren, and afforded such extraordinary occasion for its development. He was destined to state in Britain as during that upon which we are now about to enter. In painting, the degradation was general throughout Europe: in Italy the art raise a metropolis from its ashes, and he proved himself worthy of the task. The number of public buildings which he executed during the progress of this undertaking seems almost to surpass the measure of human industry. Their merit is not inferior to their extent. Much of what is most valuable among the public buildings of England (and they are inferior to none), especially among modern ecclesiastical structures, we owe to this great architect, whose name is worthily associated throughout the civilized world with that of Inigo Jones, to the honour and glory of their country.

During the most important period of his public life, Wren sustained alone the reputation of English architecture. The progress of Inigo Jones, and of the arts in general, had been checked by the calamity of the great rebellion, and he left none worthy to be called his successor. His scholar and son-in-law, Webb, gained a reputation by completing some of his works, but we have no evidence that he possessed any original talent, and the fact that Charles I. had granted the reversion of Inigo's post of surveyor-general to Sir John Denham, the poet, sufficiently proves, if proof were necessary on this point, that between Jones and Wren none were to be found of merit sufficient to challenge on professional grounds an employment so honourably filled by them both.

The education of Wren was not professional; and, though architecture must very early have engaged his attention, yet his application to it exclusively seems to have been determined by the circumstances in which he was placed. Before he had displayed his talents in the art which has rendered him so illustrious, he had acquired an eminent reputation as a mathematician and astronomer. At the early age of sixteen he had highly distinguished himself at Oxford by his proficiency in the sciences, and in his eighteenth year he held a place among those philosophers whose association formed the nucleus of the Royal Society, in the establishment of which institution in 1660 he was called upon by the united voices of his sovereign and his fellow-labourers in science to act a leading part. The result of his studies had at this time been exhibited in fifty-three new theories, inventions, experiments, and mechanical improvements;* and, whatever may be the practical value of most of them in the present day, when they have been superseded by the accumulated knowledge of nearly two centuries, they are not the less illustrative of the originality of Wren's genius, and the solidity as well as the variety of his acquirements.

Although several of his inventions have a direct reference to architecture, yet we have no account of his pursuits in that art; but that he had studied it assiduously and successfully, and had given proofs that he had done so, is evident, since in 1661 he was called upon by the king to assist Sir John Denham in his office. The great works which Charles contemplated from the moment of his restoration demanded knowledge and skill in architecture. Wren was appointed coadjutor to the surveyor-general, and, after some delay of which the reason is not ascertained, during which he seems to have occupied himself principally with the proceedings of the Royal Society and the duties of the Savilian professorship of Oxford (to which he had been elected in 1659), he received a commission under the great seal to make a survey of the cathedral church of St. Paul, and furnish plans for its restoration. Thus he entered upon that great work which was destined to furnish him with occupation during the greater part of his long life, and to result in the completion of "a building which is deservedly the boast of England and the eternal monument of its author." This commission is dated in 1663.

Notwithstanding the partial repair executed by Inigo Jones, this vast, venerable, and once magnificent church was found to be in a state of dilapidation bordering upon ruin. Since the alterations intended in the preceding reign had been interrupted, the hand of violence had lent its aid to accelerate the more gradual effect of time in the destruction of the fabric. "The body of the church," says Dugdale, "was converted to a horse-quarter for soldiers. The beautiful pillars of Inigo Jones's portico were shamefully hewed and defaced for the support of the timber-work of shops for seamstresses and other trades, for which sordid uses that once stately colonnade was wholly taken up and defiled. Upon taking away the inner scaffolds which supported the arched vaults in order to their late intended repair, the whole roof of the south cross tumbled down, and the rest in several places of the church did after fall, so that the structure continued a woeful spectacle of ruin till the happy Restoration."

Wren's opinion from the first was in favour of rebuilding, working to the scale laid down by his great predecessor, and making the church worthy of the portico; but to this scheme the prejudices of the majority of those who were with him in the commission were too strongly opposed; and, when he pointed out that the pressure of the vaulting had thrust the piers of the nave considerably out of the perpendicular, some of these worthy members of what would be called in modern parlance the committee of taste were not ashamed to argue that they had been thus built by the original architect for the purpose of assisting the effect of the perspective![†] Being thus baffled in his design of entirely taking down the old Norman pile, he gave a plan for removing the tower and expanding the centre of the church into a cupola, uniting the transepts to the main body of the church by a concave line. But to this plan also, which he seems to have suggested as a mezzo-termine between the proposals of those "who might aim at

* Sir John Soane has recorded some anecdotes of amateur architects in the eighteenth century quite a match for this, in his account of the building of the new Law Courts—not however in the published edition of his "Public Buildings," but in the copies for private distribution, which are scarce.

* Allan Cunningham, Life of Sir C. Wren, in Family Library.

too great a magnificence, which neither the disposition or extent of this age will probably bring to a period," and the opinions of others who might "fall so low as to think of piecing up the old fabric, here with a stone, there with a brick, and cover all faults with a coat of plaster, leaving it still to posterity as a further object of charity,"*—to this plan no less difficulties presented themselves, not only on the part of the commissioners, but from a strong popular feeling in favour of preserving the old tower, of which the citizens of London were traditionally proud, although its glories were long since departed. Strong applications were made to the king for its preservation, and Wren was obliged to propose a plan by which the tower might be kept standing until the new work should be built around it; "for," to use his own words,† "many unbelievers would bewail the loss of old St. Paul's steeple, and despond if they did not see a successor rise in its stead." At length came the great fire of London to interrupt these disputes, in all of which Wren had been strenuously backed and supported by his friend and fellow-commissioner, John Evelyn. "You will not, I am sure," says this excellent and accomplished man (whom it is impossible to name without a testimony of respect), "forget the struggle we had with some who were for patching it (St. Paul's) up anyhow so the steeple might stand, instead of new-building, which it altogether needed, when, to put an end to the contest, five days after that dreadful conflagration happened, out of whose ashes this Phoenix, new St. Paul's, is risen, and was by Providence designed for you."

But, though the great fire suspended these vex-

* Parentalia.

† Id.

atious contests, they were by no means terminated. In the teeth of Wren's opinion on the hopeless state of the building—the tower now tottering to its fall, the portico shattered to pieces, and the very crypt broken down by the weight of the fallen materials—two years more were consumed in vain attempts to restore it, and the commissioners persevered in their own course, even after the architect's prognostications had been justified by the fall of a portion of the nave while the scaffold was up for its repair. It was not until a second warning of the same kind had occurred that he was at length authorized to raze the church to its foundations. The removal of the ruined walls was a work of time and labour; but, though it was long before the ground was cleared, it was still longer before the necessary approval of the plan for the new building could be obtained from the king and the commissioners. It was not until the year 1675, nine years after the fire, and twelve years after the first commission had been issued, that Wren was enabled to lay the foundation of "the second temple of the Christian world."

During this interval Wren had executed several of those edifices of which his country is justly proud. Although St. Paul's is the first public work with which his name is associated, yet the first which he completed was the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford, a structure planned with the most successful adaptation to its purpose, and remarkable for the skilful construction of its roof. This building was commenced in 1663, and opened in 1669. The noble Library of Trinity College, Cambridge, and the beautiful quadrangle called Neville's Court, were the work of the same period, and, from a letter written by the president of the college in 1665, they appear not to have been executed without a considerable share of the same sort of controversy which had thwarted Wren in his designs for St. Paul's. "One of the chief miseries of an architect's life," observes Allan Cunningham,* in reference to this circumstance, "springs out of the changes which presumption more frequently than knowledge compels him to make in his designs. Ordinary eyes cannot see the derangement of true harmonious proportion which trivial alterations cause in architectural plans; they are incapable of perceiving that symmetry in a work of art, as in the human frame, may be utterly ruined by adding or withdrawing even a very little." Wren was at the same time employed upon the less important works of the chapels of Pembroke and Emmanuel Colleges in the same university. The latter is an early specimen of his intense feeling for the picturesque in architecture.

LIBRARY OF TRINITY COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE.

In 1665 he withdrew for a while from the squabbles of the commissioners, and visited France. At this time the most eminent artists of the age of Louis XIV. were in their zenith, and structures were rising which could not fail to excite the highest admiration in the possessor of a genius destined to create those which should rival them. The Church of St. Roque and the College of the Quatre Nations (now the Institute of France) were lately completed, the elegant cupola of the Invalids nearly so, and the Louvre was in progress. Wren's correspondence shows that he surveyed these buildings, and the numerous châteaux which the example of the monarch was creating in France, with a full appreciation of their beauties and a due sense of their defects; and we find him in communication with Mansard, Le Vau, and Le Pautre, and with Bernini, who had been invited from Rome to furnish designs for the Louvre. "Bernini's design for the Louvre," says Wren, "I would have given my skin for; but the old reserved Italian gave me but a few minutes' view. It was five little designs in paper, for which he hath received as many thousand pistoles. I had only time to copy it in my fancy and memory." This journey of Wren's is important in the history of his works, since it has been assumed that his style was biased and his taste vitiated by what he learned at Paris.

The fire of London has been represented as a great ultimate benefit to our metropolis, by at once clearing the way for those extensive improvements, which in other capitals have been the slow work of ages; but this position may very reasonably be doubted. It is true that little seems to have been lost that there is much reason to regret. The pictures of old London are not very favourable. The houses, as we have had previous occasion to notice, were universally of timber, projecting story above story, till the narrow streets were nearly closed at the top, and a great proportion of them were now very old. As early as the reign of Elizabeth complaints had arisen of the state of the streets; and Evelyn, in his tract called "Fumifugium," written to advocate the improvement of the city shortly before the fire, remonstrates indignantly "that the buildings should be composed of such a congestion of mis-shapen and extravagant houses, that the streets should be so narrow and incommodious in the very centre and busiest places of intercourse, that there should be so ill and uneasy a form of paving underfoot, and so troublesome and malicious a disposure of the spouts and gutters overhead." Of the public buildings swept away by the conflagration we have but a scanty account. With the exception of St. Paul's, the church of the Grey Friars (or Christ Church, in Newgate-street) is the only ecclesiastical edifice existing at the time of the fire upon which our old topographers have thought it worth while to be particular. This church measured three hundred feet in length. It was consecrated in 1325, and during two centuries nobles and citizens seem to have delighted in lavishing gifts upon it. In the number of its royal tombs it was second only to Westminster Abbey; but even this building had been grievously dilapidated and its monuments defaced long before it was involved in the general destruction. Hollar's elaborate view of the city shows that it possessed but two spires and few towers of importance; and, if such as were spared may be taken as a criterion for those which were lost, Old London had but little to boast in her parish churches. Nor does Howel,* in his comparison between London and other cities, ancient and modern, find any public building which he can venture to exalt except the Cathedral, that unfailling object of admiration to the citizens of the olden time; and even this he is compelled to praise rather for what it had been and ought to be, than for what it actually was. Thus far it must be admitted that London rose regenerated from its ashes. The legislature took advantage of the occasion to order, that in future all buildings in London should be of brick or stone, that sufficient party-walls should separate one house from another, and that rain-water pipes should replace those "malicious spouts" of which Evelyn complains; and builders were encouraged to study some effect in street architecture, by a recommendation to make mouldings and projections of rubbed brick. To Wren was intrusted the restoration of London. He was appointed deputy surveyor-general and principal architect for the rebuilding of the city, and a field of action was opened to his genius such as perhaps was never afforded to any other single architect. At the king's desire he made a survey of the ruins, and produced a plan for laying out the new town on a regular and consistent design. In this plan Wren proposes to enlarge the principal streets to ninety feet, the second-rate streets being sixty, and the third-rate thirty feet wide. The

* Life of Sir C. Wren, in Family Library.

* Londinopolis.

PLAN proposed by SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN for rebuilding the CITY OF LONDON after the great fire of 1666.

The shaded part shows the extent of the fire.

- | | | | | | | |
|-----------------------|------------------|----------------|---------------|---------------------|-----------------|-------------|
| A The Royal Exchange. | c Excise-office. | x Insurance. | a Guildhall. | 1 Doctor's Commons. | z Custom-house. | w Markets. |
| n Post-office. | D The Mint. | y Goldsmith's. | h St. Paul's. | 1 Wood-market. | m Piazzas. | † Churches. |
- ‡ Continuation of London Wall.

Exchange occupies the centre of a grand piazza, round which are situated the Post Office, the Mint, the Excise, and other public offices, and from whence as a centre the streets radiate to all the principal points of the city, one spacious line extending to Ludgate, where it falls into another of like dimensions reaching from the Tower. In the fork of these two streets is formed a large opening for St. Paul's. The parish churches are distributed as nearly as possible at equal distances, and each is so placed as to form the termination of a vista. They are likewise completely isolated, and it was proposed to banish churchyards from the town and establish cemeteries in convenient places in the suburbs. Toward the river a noble quay extends from London Bridge to the Temple.* "The practicability of this scheme," says the author of the Parentalia, "without loss to any man or infringement of any property, was at that time demonstrated, and all material objections fully weighed and answered." It may be doubted whether the answers to the objections were satisfactory to the parties principally interested, and the scheme, however desirable, was ill calculated for the circumstances in which the citizens of London were placed. Besides the prejudices and jealousies which would naturally lead them to cling to their old possessions, it may easily be imagined that they had neither funds to bestow upon external grandeur, nor leisure to wait for new distributions of property by the public commissioners.* When we consider what was actually done, we shall find sufficient cause to admire the energy and wonder at the resources of the citizens. According to a contemporary writer,† ten thousand houses were erected in the course of four years, and in 1681 scarcely a vacancy remained. But the new plan had been abandoned—opposition had started up—private interests had prevailed, and, though the mode of building was essentially improved, the new city finally rose up in nearly the same inconvenient form as the old one, and the general aspect of our metropolis was restamped for an indefinite period with that meanness which has remained its characteristic down to the present century. Within that period important changes have been effected in our older streets, and, whatever may be thought of the manner in which some of these alterations have been effected, a taste for more lofty buildings, coupled with a dislike to the dingy brick which has hitherto disgraced our street architecture, has indisputably been established, and the London of the seventeenth century is beginning to disappear before it. When we see these changes rapidly following the increase of wealth and intelligence, and consider the progress of architecture in other capitals (in Paris, for instance, where, without the aid of a conflagration, the city of the middle ages has long been nearly obliterated), it is not to be doubted that the intervention of the great fire, by causing a renewal

* It may not be generally known that the act of Charles II. for removing obstructions on the quays continued in force until 1821. In that year the head of a city firm, alarmed at certain encroachments connected with water-side premises being called in question, made use of his influence as a member of parliament, and the act was repealed.

* The records of the disputes relative to the properties of the citizens adjudicated by the commissioners appointed for that purpose fill forty-one folio volumes in the British Museum.

† DeLaune, The Present State of London, 1681.

of the whole city under adverse circumstances, has only retarded a much more effectual though more gradual improvement, at such opportunities as might have been favourable to its development.*

To trace minutely the course of Wren's life, or even to follow the progress of his buildings, is not the object to be considered in this place. It will be sufficient to glance rapidly at the facts and dates necessarily connected with such a review of his works as may interest the general reader. From the time that Wren became thoroughly engaged as an architect, we hear but little of him as a philosopher, and, although he continued to take an interest in the proceedings of the Royal Society, he resigned the Savilian professorship in 1673.

Among the earliest public works completed in the restoration of London were the Royal Exchange and Temple Bar, neither of them favourable specimens of the architect's style. The latter especially contrasts very unfavourably with the design left by Inigo Jones. The palace erected for Charles II. at Greenwich, which expanded at a later period under the auspices of Queen Mary into that proud national monument, the Royal Hospital, was also among Wren's earliest finished works; and it was on the completion of the original building in 1673 that he received the honour of knighthood. The following forty years of a life passed in the service of his country saw the completion of the fabric of St. Paul's, of the fifty-one churches erected from his designs in the city of London, the Royal Hospital of Chelsea, the College of Physicians, the extensive works at Windsor, the Palace of Winchester, left incomplete; that of Hampton Court, vitiated by the Dutch taste of William III., who rejected Wren's original design; Marlborough House, St. James's; the Monument of London; several of the halls of the city companies, and numerous works of less account. To analyse even the principal of these would lead us far beyond the limits of general history; but some critical notice cannot be altogether withheld. In this inquiry the churches claim the first place, not only in regard to their number, but because it is in his ecclesiastical edifices that the originality of Wren's genius shines most conspicuously. In his churches Wren appears as an inventor. He had the problem to solve of adapting them to the forms of worship of the church of England, for which no precedent existed, and he has essayed various forms with various degrees of success. They may be divided into three classes:—domed churches; those of the basilical form, i. e., with nave and side aisles; and simple rectangular plans without columns. At the head of the first class stands the justly celebrated fane of St. Stephen, Walbrook, a work unsurpassed in masterly composition and graceful proportions, to which is succeeded a degree of refinement and delicacy of line not always apparent in the works of its author. St. Benet Fink is remarkable chiefly for the ingenuity with which the difficulties of a confined and irregular site have been overcome. St. Mildred's, in Breadstreet, is a small church of this class without columns, and deriving its beauty from its simplicity. St. Magnus is a noble building of the second class, of the Ionic order, but injured by an unaccountable irregularity in the intercolumniation.

INTERIOR OF ST. STEPHEN'S, WALBROOK.

St. Bartholomew's, near the Bank, and St. Michael's, Cornhill, are composed altogether on the ancient plan, with arches springing from single columns, a clerestory above, and a recess by the altar; and the satisfactory result produced by these combinations seems to vindicate the basilical form as the most characteristic of ecclesiastical edifices. The former especially, in a style of the most perfect simplicity, is strikingly effective from its harmonious proportions and the good keeping of all its parts. Bow Church is a composition of much grandeur, though it has suffered some wrong in the process of adaptation from the Temple of Peace, at Rome, a favourite authority among the monuments of antiquity with Wren, who misquotes it in defence of some indefensible solecisms in the interior of St. Paul's. In this church the galleries are well introduced. In his management of these obstructions Wren has not always been successful. In some cases he has raised the pedestals of his columns to an extravagant disproportion, in order that they may serve also as props to the galleries, of which St. Swinthen's, in Cannon-street, a domed church with columns reduced to insignificance by the stilts on which they are raised, and Christ Church, in

* One of the latest of the great improvements in the city is a model for street architecture—Moorgate-street. "O di sic omnia!"

A PARALLEL OF SOME OF THE PRINCIPAL TOWERS AND SPIRES AS SEEN BY St. CHRISTOPHER'S WALK.

1. St. Dunstan in the East. 2. St. Martin.
3. St. Peter, Orgechurch-street. 4. St. Edmund the King, Lombard-street.
5. St. Margaret Patern.
6. Allhallows the Great.
7. St. Mary Abchurch.
8. St. Michael, Cornhill. 9. St. Lawrence, Jewry.
10. St. Andrew Undershaft.
11. St. Martin-in-the-Fields.
12. St. Michael, Queenhithe.
13. St. Michael Royal, Walling-street.
14. St. Andrew, Broad-street.
15. St. Stephen, Walbrook. 16. St. Swithin, Cannon-street.
17. St. Mary-le-Towre, Chepe.
18. St. Andrew by the Wardrobe.
19. St. Andrew, Broad-street.
20. St. Andrew, Broad-street.
21. St. Augustin, Watling-street. 22. St. Mary Somerset.
23. St. Martin, Ludgate. 24. St. Andrew by the Wardrobe.
25. St. Bride, Fleet-street.

The Scale is expressed by St. Paul's in the background.

Newgate-street, may be cited as examples. But in other instances, where he has placed the galleries on supports of their own, and established an order above to carry the roof, he has produced in a high degree that union of beauty and usefulness in which he surpasses all other architects, and has established a precedent which has regulated the majority of modern English churches. The church of St. James, Westminster, is of this class, and is an edifice worthy of the author of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, as far as the interior is concerned. The outside has the unpardonable fault of being plain without being simple. Of the third class of Wren's churches want of character is a prevailing fault, some of the plainer sort differing from ordinary halls in little but the extraneous fittings: but these are in many instances sufficient of themselves to merit observation, as in the church of St. Edmund the King, which is raised to the dignity of the ecclesiastical style chiefly by the picturesque grouping and rich carved-work of the pews. St. Lawrence Jewry, one of the finest of the London churches, is also of this class; an irregularity in the plan, said to have been committed for the purpose of giving it a resemblance to a gridiron, is in nowise injurious to the noble and effective style of decoration which is its characteristic. The exterior is also to be noted, as being the most Palladian of Wren's designs.

Thus far the interiors of these buildings have been principally considered; externally they exhibit but little that calls for remark. The majority are huddled into corners or ranged in narrow avenues, where grandeur would be misplaced and decoration thrown away. Wren has, therefore, with consummate judgment put his strength into the steeples and campanili, which soar above the sordid and dingy mass of habitations, and, clustering like satellites round the majestic dome of the Cathedral, impart to the general aspect of the city a picturesque grandeur scarcely rivalled by Rome itself. Again may Wren claim the attribute of invention—for, although he did not originate the principle upon which his spires and lanterns are for the most part composed, of applying Italian detail to Gothic forms, (which is in fact a characteristic of the French semi-Gothic architecture of the sixteenth century), yet his mode of adapting it is peculiarly and exclusively his own, and he has maintained with perfect success the most characteristic feature of the English church in a style never before applied to it. The popular association between the forms of religion and the buildings anciently consecrated to it may have had its effect in suggesting these compositions to Wren; and if these prejudices on some occasions proved an embarrassment and stumbling-block to the architect, we may allow that they bore their own antidote if we owe to them the spires of Bow and St. Bride's. Had the stream set in another direction the fifty-one churches might each have exhibited its bald portico and its pepper-box.

Of Wren's steeples the designs are very various and the merits very unequal. The accompanying plate shows some of the principal of each sort, and may supersede descriptions, which could hardly be made intelligible. One excellence they possess in common—the graceful manner in which the superstructures unite with the towers which support them. The vases and other objects which decorate the angles are always admirably calculated for this effect. Wren's eye for form and proportion seems to have been perfect, and his invention always at command to fill up the beautiful and luxuriant outlines which his imagination shadowed forth. This was his vantage-ground, and the failure of some of his interiors may be attributed to his desire to maintain it when it could be of no avail to him. Perhaps none of his buildings have suffered more from this error than St. Paul's.

Wren presented several designs for St. Paul's. It is well known that the one which he preferred himself was not adopted, and that which was underwrought considerable alterations, suggested by the Duke of York, in order to adapt the church to the Roman worship, which it was already in his contemplation to revive, and insisted upon although Wren is said to have remonstrated even to tears. The original plan was compact and simple, and suited to the uses of the reformed church: he was compelled to add the oratories, the long aisles which James wished to fill with processions, and the recesses which he would have occupied with altars. But, apart from these impertinencies, which altered the character of the plan, and compelled the architect to Italianize a Gothic cathedral, it may be doubted whether he exercised a sound judgment in his partiality for the rejected design. A physical difficulty, that of obtaining stone of sufficient scantling, militated against the adoption of an order on a scale amounting to grandeur, and it must require an inveterate attachment to system to reconcile the extravagant height of the stylobate and attic into which the architect was driven in attempting to obtain a suitable altitude. At St. Peter's a column has been adopted of such dimensions that no attainable material would suffice for the entablature, which has consequently been restricted and stunted even to deformity. This fault, and many others necessarily contingent upon working to a disproportionate module in a building adapted to modern purposes, have been successfully avoided at St. Paul's by the use of two orders, and, whatever faults that expedient may have entailed, it will hardly be disputed that the exterior architecture of St. Paul's is both better in composition and sounder in style than that of its more magnificent rival.

In the adaptation of the old basilical form to Italian architecture a great difficulty has always been experienced in reconciling the low flanks of the side aisles with the elevated front of the nave. The principal elevation of the original basilica of the ancients was on the side; the pyramidal façades of the Romanesque churches and the flying buttresses of the pointed style exhibit without disguise the real form of the building; but to the Italian architect it has always proved a stumbling-block, and few have passed over it with credit. The usual expedient to which they have resorted is, to mask the end of the nave with a second order, and, as this superstructure has no proper correspondence with anything within, Forsyth has pithily called the fronts of the Roman churches "a splendid lie." What shall be said of St. Paul's? The deception is carried all round the building, and on the flanks the upper order is a mere screen wall, concealing the roof and the buttresses which sustain the vaulting of the nave and choir. To the internal effect the upper order contributes nothing. Upon entering the church the discrepancy is at once detected between the low and confined space of the side aisles and the perpendicular altitude outside, while the order of the nave is exaggerated and crowned by a disproportioned attic, for the purpose of exalting it into something like an accordance with the elevation.

SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN'S FIRST DESIGN FOR ST. PAUL'S.

WREN'S FIRST PLAN FOR ST. PAUL'S.

THE DOME OF ST. PAUL'S.

THE CHOIR OF ST. PAUL'S.

introduction of fictitious architecture, in the paintings which the present generation may hope to see obliterated, time having already half performed the work. When Wren designed the church he dreamed of Mosaics!

The most striking defect not only of St. Paul's, but of Wren's style in general, is a want of purity in the treatment of the parts. Such as Wren's style was, he derived it from the common authority which at this time regulated all Europe. Bernini had long exercised a despotic influence over the arts, to the extent of which our attention will be more pointedly called when we come to the subject of sculpture. Wren, who, it must be admitted, wanted some of that discriminating taste which characterizes Inigo Jones, to whom alone it was given to be picturesque without being licentious, seems to have been content to follow such precedents as this school of art afforded him; hence the mutilations caused by the interpenetrations of pilasters, interruptions of the horizontal lines, complicated forms in the arched windows, and, above all, a most wretched style of decoration, loose and uncertain, executed with a relief ruinous to general breadth of effect, and of his additions being such as he conceives may agree with the original scheme of the architect, "without any modern mixtures to show my own

FESTOONS.

1. From the Antique.

2. From St. Paul's.

encumbering without filling the spaces it is designed to ornament. These defects are unfortunately such as catch the eye of the superficial observer, and stamp an unfavourable impression upon those who are incapable of looking farther. Hence abundance of small criticism in disparagement of Wren.

The London Monument is a column remarkable for nothing but its magnitude and poverty of invention,—a fault not to be attributed to the architect, who submitted a design at once characteristic, striking, and original. The accompanying plate will supply the place of description. The flames issuing from the loop-holes were to be gilt. The causes for its rejection, and the substitution of the actual design by the authorities who had the control of the affair, may easily be imagined after what we have seen of the manner of conducting St. Paul's. They were probably afraid to approve of an original idea, and experience shows that the impotence of indecision ever resorts to precedent, and that ignorance takes refuge in the common place. They would be incapable of appreciating a column which differed in anything from the regular orders of architecture. Another proposition of Wren's was to crown the column with a statue of the king; but Charles himself seems to have declined the compliment.

One of Wren's latest employments was the repair of Westminster Abbey, to which he added the towers at the west end, and proposed to erect a spire in the centre. Wren's want of comprehension of the details belonging to a style, into the general spirit of which he entered so thoroughly, is surprising. It might have been supposed that he aimed, however unsuccessfully, at a composite style in his Gothic performances, were it not that, in his report upon Westminster Abbey, he speaks *inventions. This report, and another on Salisbury Cathedral, which he surveyed in 1678, are invaluable for their observations on the construction of our Gothic cathedrals; and his reports in general ought to be the study of every one who aspires to a knowledge of architecture.

SIR CHRISTOPHER WREN'S FIRST DESIGN FOR THE MONUMENT OF LONDON.

In addition to his executed works, Wren left a numerous collection of drawings.† Charles II. seems to have kept him in constant employment; and among other designs proposed, but never effected, is one for a stately mausoleum to Charles I., intended to be erected at Windsor. Seventy thousand pounds were voted by parliament for this work and for celebrating the obsequies of the royal martyr, but the money fell into Charles's hands, and the mausoleum remained upon paper. He also made designs for Whitehall after the fire which finally led to the abandonment of that site in 1697. They extend to the rebuilding of the Houses of Parliament.*

* The general repairs of the Abbey were partly effected under the superintendance of Edward Tufnell, architect, as recorded on his monument in the Cloister.

† Preserved in the Library of All Souls' College, Oxford.

It has always been noted as a remarkable fact that the architect of so vast an undertaking as St. Paul's should live to see its completion. He laid the last stone in the seventy-ninth year of his age, when most of those who had been associated with him in its commencement were to be seen no more; but among the commissioners who conducted the work a disposition seems to have been perpetuated to persecute him. After the death of his early friend Evelyn he was left exposed to the full effects of their ignorance and malice; and after the loss of his unfailing patroness Queen Anne, they succeeded in depriving him of his post of surveyor-general, in the eighty-sixth year of his age, and the forty-ninth of his service. "He then," says his son, "betook himself to a country life, saying only, with the stoic, Nunc me jubet fortuna expeditius philosophari;—in which recess, free from worldly affairs, he passed the greatest part of the five last years of his life in contemplation and study, and principally in the consolation of the Holy Scriptures;—cheerful in solitude, and as well pleased to die in the shade as in the light." He closed his lengthened and glorious life on the 25th of February, 1723, and lies in the vault of St. Paul's under the south aisle of the choir, "with four words," says Walpole, "that comprehend his merit and his fame,—SI MONUMENTUM QUÆRIS CIRCUMSPICE."

* The last occasion on which we hear of Inigo Jones's palace is in the reign of Queen Anne, when a pamphlet was published, which, supposing the inhabitants of Westminster to be diminished to the extent of 30 per cent. in their houses, trades, and properties by the removal of the court, proposes the rebuilding of the palace as a popular measure, and suggests ways and means to carry it into effect.

During the greater part of his protracted career Wren was without a rival to partake of his fame. It was not until the year 1702, in the thirty-sixth of his age, that Vanbrugh, who, like Wren, was fitted to succeed in more pursuits than one, and was already in the zenith of reputation as a dramatic writer, made his appearance as an architect. He must, however, have distinguished himself by his knowledge of architecture much earlier, since in 1695 he had been made secretary to the commission appointed for extending the Palace of Greenwich and converting it into the Hospital. His first essay, the noble mansion of Castle Howard, erected for Charles, third Earl of Carlisle, at once developed the full extent of his genius. The success of that magnificent work led to his employment on the national tribute of gratitude to the Duke of Marlborough, and he produced Blenheim, a monument worthy of the nation and of the hero to whose glory it was dedicated. But, while the architect was immortalised, his days were embittered and his fortune injured. Parliament, which voted the palace, forgot to vote the funds. As long as the queen lived this deficiency continued to be supplied; but Queen Anne died; the treasury closed its doors; the parliament eluded to fulfil their engagement; and . . . it will scarcely be credited, but no fact is better established, that the English parliament ordered Blenheim to be erected,—Queen Anne paid for what was built while she lived,—the duke paid a part,—and Vanbrugh and his workmen did the rest at their own costs and charges.* It was Vanbrugh's misfortune that, amidst the embarrassments arising out of these circumstances, he had provoked the implacable resentment of the duchess, and he was neither suf-

CASTLE HOWARD.

* Allan Cunningham, Life of Vanbrugh.

BLENHIM.

ferred to complete his own design nor did he ever obtain what was due to him.

It is no disadvantage to the comparative reputations of Wren and Vanbrugh that they followed different courses in the pursuit of their profession. Vanbrugh's practice lay chiefly in the erection of noble mansions, in which branch of architecture Wren has left few examples of any note, and those few seem purposely contrasted with his ecclesiastical buildings by a studied tameness of style. Vanbrugh turned to new account the principle established by Wren, and adopted the majestic turrets of the baronial residences of our ancestors with the same success as had attended Wren's appropriation of their spires. The characteristics of Sir John Vanbrugh's style cannot be better defined than in the words of Price, in his Treatise on the Picturesque,—"It appears to me that, at Blenheim, Vanbrugh conceived and executed a very bold and difficult design, that of uniting in one building the beauty and magnificence of the Grecian architecture, the picturesqueness of the Gothic, and the massive grandeur of a castle; and that, in spite of many faults for which he was very justly reproached, he has formed in a style truly his own, and a well-combined whole, a mansion worthy of a great prince and warrior. His first point appears to have been massiveness as the foundation of grandeur; then, to prevent the mass from being a lump, he has made bold projections of various heights as foregrounds to the main building; and, lastly, having been forcibly struck with the variety of outline against the sky in many Gothic and other ancient buildings, he has raised on the top of that part where the slanting roof begins in any house of the Italian style a number of decorations of various characters. These, if not new in themselves, have at least been applied by him in a new and peculiar manner, and the union of them gives a surprising splendour and magnificence, as well as variety, to the summit of that princely edifice."

These sentiments in a man of sound taste belong to an age which thinks for itself, and were not those of some of Vanbrugh's contemporaries. His merits could not have been unappreciated, since he obtained extensive patronage from those who proved the sincerity of their belief in him by employing him at their own, and not at the public, expense: but he was assailed by the class of critics who swore by Palladio; who were determined to measure architecture by no rule but his; who could allow but one kind of merit; and could see in the works of Vanbrugh nothing but a fantastic affectation of novelty. Swift and Pope lent the aid of their verse to lampoon him; the brilliant sarcasms of Walpole have perpetuated the same judgment in prose; and thousands who take opinions upon trust have been influenced by the epigram—

Lie heavy on him, earth; for he Laid many a heavy load on thee.

Vanbrugh died in 1726. His principal works, after Castle Howard and Blenheim, are—King's Weston in Gloucestershire, Grimsthorpe in the county of Lincoln, Eastbury in Dorsetshire (now destroyed), and Seaton Delaval in Northumberland; all strongly marked with the picturesque beauties of his style.* He also built the Opera House in London, which perished by fire in 1789, after having undergone many alterations.

In the tenth year of Queen Anne an act of parliament was passed for the erection of fifty new churches in the metropolis and its neighbourhood; and, though the intentions of the legislature were imperfectly carried out, yet many of our finest churches resulted from this act, and others which were consequent upon it. Among the architects who distinguished themselves on the occasions arising from this new impulse given to church-building, James Gibbs, a native of Aberdeen, claims the first place. After ten years of diligent study in Italy, he appeared in London as an architect about 1710, and the church of St. Martin-in-the-Fields placed him at once in the foremost rank of his profession. Few works have excited more general admiration than the portico of this building; and yet it has had the singular fate of being praised for what it is not, and condemned for not being what it ought not to be—that is to say, a model after the antique. To the unlearned in architecture it would seem to require but little skill to arrange so many columns on a given plan and surmount them with a pediment, and still less if it be sufficient to appropriate a portico ready made from some ancient temple. But there is surely some difference required in the character of a portico, the quantity of its masses, the proportion of its intercolumniations, and the style of its ornaments, according to its position as an integral portion of the simple and unbroken form of a Greek temple, with its dead walls and single aperture, or as the avant-corps of a modern building, more intricate in composition, and pierced with numerous openings for light and entrance. To modify the ancient portico to modern usages, without either losing its intrinsic beauties or its unity of combination, may indeed exercise the talent of the architect. In this difficult task Gibbs has been eminently successful, and the portico of St. Martin's Church is still unequalled. The great fault of St. Martin's is the position of the spire. Nothing can be more contrary to sound principle than the appearance of a tower elevated upon a roof. Gibbs set the example of this vicious practice, which has had the fortune to be almost universally followed. Wren never committed this error—his steeples always stand upon the ground. Few buildings have provoked severer criticism than Gibbs's next work—St. Mary's in the Strand; but, though it must be condemned as a heap of small parts and meretricious ornaments, yet it possesses in a high degree the merit of being admirably composed for the situation in which it is placed, and the combination between the façade of the building and the campanile is very happy. The interior also merits praise. Gibbs was also the architect of the Radcliffe Library at Oxford, a noble domed building in a country where such domes are scarce; Mary-le-bonne Chapel, a standard model for economical ecclesiastical buildings during the last century; and Allhallow's Church, Derby, a good and simple design, but inconspicuously tacked to an ancient Gothic tower. The west side of the quadrangle of King's College, and the Senate House, at Cambridge, are portions of extensive designs left incomplete. The credit of the latter he divides with Sir James Burrough, Master of Caius College, an amateur of distinguished talent, and designer of the beautiful Chapel of Clare Hall in the same University.

* All published in the Vitruvius Britannicus.

Nicholas Hawksmoor, who greatly distinguished himself in this church-building period, was a pupil of Wren, and succeeded him in several of his public appointments. He was also associated with Vanbrugh both at Blenheim and Castle Howard, and certainly imitated him in the churches of St. George in the East; St. Anne, Limehouse; and Christ Church, Spitalfields; but he labours clumsily to heap up the picturesque forms which his master seems to drop into their right places without effort. St. George's, Bloomsbury, is in another and a better style. The portico stands out with dignity; and the steeple, notwithstanding all that has been said in disparagement and even in ridicule of it, is an original and effective composition. The interior of St. Mary Woolnoth, in Lombard-street, is Hawksmoor's masterpiece, and may challenge comparison with any work that modern architecture has produced for the classical simplicity of its plan and the harmony of all its proportions.

Among the rest of those buildings which call for particular remark St. John the Evangelist, Westminster, was built by Thomas Archer, a pupil of Vanbrugh, not deficient in grandeur of conception, but supplying the variety of parts peculiar to the school by barbarous contortions and mutilations of the architecture; the churches of Greenwich, St. George, Hanover-square, and St. Luke, Middlesex, by John James; and those of St. Giles in the Fields, and St. Olave, Southwark, by Flitcroft, the architect of Woburn Abbey. We may further notice as belonging to this period the noble palace of Chatsworth by Talman; Thoresby by the same architect; Montague House by Pouget, remarkable as our only complete specimen of the genuine peculiarities of the French style; and Buckingham House, now so strangely metamorphosed, by Wynne. Nor must we omit the works of two distinguished amateurs—Dr. Henry Aldrich, Dean of Christ Church, architect of the Peckwater quadrangle in that College, the Church of All Saints, and several other buildings in the University of Oxford; and Dr. George Clarke, M.P. for Oxford in the reign of Queen Anne, from whose designs the Library of Christ Church was erected.

ST. MARTIN'S CHURCH.

ST. MARY WOOLNOUTH, LOMBARD STREET.

But we are now passing beyond the contemporaries of Wren, and touching upon another school of architecture, at the head of which must be placed the name of Richard Earl of Burlington, a nobleman distinguished from his earliest years by his attachment to the fine arts, and especially to architecture, to the study of which he devoted himself with the assiduity of a professor. Having visited Italy, he returned with a high admiration of the works of Palladio, and a deep reverence for the genius of Inigo Jones. To the revival of the pure style of architecture drawn from the study of the ancients by those great masters, and to the diffusion of sound taste among the great and wealthy, Lord Burlington thenceforward devoted his talents and his fortune, and it is not surprising that, with the additional advantages of his rank and high descent, he should have attained the utmost degree of personal distinction and the most extensive influence over his contemporaries. But, though Lord Burlington possessed a consummate taste and a strong perception of the beautiful, quafications to which he has established his claim no less in practice than in theory, yet to them must his pretensions as an architect be limited; and he who, with the names of Palladio and Inigo Jones to conjure with, could direct the critical storm which burst upon the productions of Vanbrugh, was little capable of imparting anything like original character to his own. "Perhaps," observes Allan Cunningham, "the witty Vanbrugh smiled at the elegant tameness of Burlington's designs as often as the other arched his eyebrows and shrugged his shoulders at the wild and unprecedented splendours of Blenheim or Castle Howard. One was an original inventor, admired at once by the public, and by slow degrees admitted into the favour of critics and connoisseurs; the other, by working to pattern and rule, achieved a name of note in his own time, but which has ever since been on the wane. Such, sooner or later, is the sure fate of all copyists. We never can lawfully become heirs to the fame of men who wrought in other lands and died three thousand years ago. No poet will claim as much merit from translating Homer or Dante, though he should excel Cowper or Carey, as he would deem his due had he written a Fairy Queen or a Task; but your architectural copyist takes a much loftier view of himself;—he imagines he has achieved something truly grand when he has persuaded a prince or a peer to have a house every pillar and architrave of which can be justified from antique example. This servile spirit disgraces the architecture of our country. Greece will never surrender to us the honour of her porticoes, nor Italy of her elevations; and there is the more reason that we should dwell on the memories of such men as Wykeham and Vanbrugh, whose genius, whatever else we may say of it, has at least given us architecture which we can honestly call our own."

These just and penetrating observations are applicable to all of that numerous class of architects which sprung up under the example and encouragement of Lord Burlington. To avoid errors, and to adhere to precedents, seem to be the fundamental doctrines of the whole school, and their practice to be confined to mere selections and combinations from the works of Palladio, with very little attention to the adaptations demanded by the exigencies of our habits and climate. On the other hand, the merit must be conceded to them, and it is not a trifling one, of a thorough knowledge of the style they imitated, and their works generally display in an eminent degree the harmony and good keeping which result from a familiar acquaintance with the principles so laboriously worked out by the great masters of Italy, which are to architecture what grammar is to language, and which later architects, "the mob of geniuses who build with ease," have thought it superfluous to acquire. And it is worthy of observation, and to the credit of the English school of this period, that the style they had adopted they maintained against all the influence of the new and execrable mode of decoration (known in the present day as the Louis Quinze style) into which the successors of the Perraults and Mansards had degenerated in France. Still the charm of independent character is wanting in their spiritless compilations. The consequence has been, that no beauty which these structures may possess has been sufficient to redeem their authors from obscurity; and the names of those architects with which we are familiar bear a surprisingly small proportion to the number of mansions deficient neither in grandeur nor elegance which were erected in England during the eighteenth century. The works of Colin Campbell, who shared with Kent the patronage of Lord Burlington, and built Houghton, Wanstead, Good-wood, and many other houses of the first class, are typical of the whole school, and may be consulted by the reader in the Vitruvius Britannicus. The executed works of Lord Burlington himself are not numerous. The beautiful Villa of Chiswick (spoiled by subsequent additions) is a professed copy from Palladio's chef-d'œuvre, the Villa Capra near Vicenza, and the noble architect is entitled to all the praise due to having copied it well. The dormitory at Westminster School is an unbroken and unpretending façade, possessing a truly Palladian character in the just proportions of all its component parts, and the excellent drawing of the details. He also erected an assembly-room at York, Lord Harrington's house at Petersham, the Duke of Richmond's at Whitehall, and General Wade's in Burlington-street, in which convenience was so much sacrificed to architectural effect, that Lord Chesterfield said the general had better take a house over the way and look at it. His best work is the colonnade in the court-yard of Burlington House. "Few in this great city suspect," says Sir William Chambers, "that behind an old wall in Piccadilly there is one of the finest pieces of architecture in Europe." The façade of Burlington House has been claimed both by Kent and Campbell, but the title of the noble architect to the beautiful peristyle, a production equally classical and original, has never been denied. It was by the munificence of Lord Burlington that Kent was enabled to publish the designs of Inigo Jones. The Antique Baths of Palladio, and Castell's Villas of the Ancients, were also published at his cost. He died in 1753, in the fifty-eighth year of his age.

If our notice of every artist of celebrity were proportioned to that which he obtained from his contemporaries, none would occupy more space in our pages than William Kent, who demands attention as the principal agent in the introduction of the English system of gardening. With little talent for any other art except that useful one—the art of rising in the world, he professed himself a painter, sculptor, and architect; and contrived to establish and maintain during his life the reputation of a universal genius. For this position he was mainly indebted to the influence of Lord Burlington, although the works which he executed as a painter of portrait and history, at the recommendation of his patron, are remembered only for their utter deficiency in every requisite of the art. His altarpiece for the Church of St. Clement Danes has been embalmed by Hogarth in a caricature scarcely more ludicrous than the picture itself.* As a sculptor he designed the wretched cenotaph to Shakspeare in Westminster Abbey, executed by the hand of Scheemakers. As an architect posterity has refused to confirm his reputation. Holkham, in Norfolk, is one of his best works, and has no particular beauty to boast. The Horse Guards, his principal work in the metropolis, exhibits nothing excellent but what he could produce by rule; and the cupola, where he was left to his own resources, betrays at once the total absence of "the felicitous invention of genius." The unaccountable lack of discrimination which secured to Kent the patronage of Lord Burlington seems to have been infectious. "His oracle," says Walpole, "was so much consulted by all who affected taste, that nothing was thought complete without his assistance. He was not only consulted for furniture, as frames of pictures, glasses, tables, chairs, &c., but for plate, for a barge, for a cradle, &c. Nay, so impetuous was fashion, that two great ladies prevailed upon him to make designs for their birthday gowns. The one he dressed in a petticoat with columns of the five orders, the other like a bronze, in copper-coloured satin with ornaments of gold."

WANSTEAD HOUSE.

Kent's only title to his extraordinary reputation lies in his talent for landscape gardening, an art of which the invention has been claimed for him, but not with justice. It is true that an invention seldom starts forth at once matured and armed, and it would detract little from Kent's claim that Lord Bacon had long before condemned the petty formality of artificial gardens, that poets had imagined scenes of delight from which art was discarded, or even that another artist (Bridgman) had been so far his precursor as to let a glimpse of nature into our pleasure-grounds by the adoption of sunk fences. The exquisite landscapes of Spenser and Milton were but "the baseless fabric of a vision," until another poet developed the principles upon which their conceptions might be realized, and reduced them to practice in his own little domain. Few rights are less disputable than that of Pope to the honour of having planned and executed the first English garden. There is still left a great share of credit to Kent, who enlarged and illustrated the new art, and to whose influence it is chiefly due that the world were at once persuaded to prefer the graceful movements of "nature to advantage dressed" to the barbarous trammels of stone walls and topiary works. On this ground the fame of Kent rests on a substantial basis.

During the reign of George II. also flourished

Thomas Ripley, originally a carpenter, who perpetrated the Admiralty; — Giacomo Leoni, a protégé of Lord Burlington, who did much private business, and has left us an excellent edition of Palladio; — and John Nicolas Servandoni, who had acquired a great and undeserved reputation at Paris, where he built that most defective composition the church of St. Sulpice. Labeley, a Swiss, was employed to erect Westminster Bridge, at the recommendation of the Earl of Pembroke, who laid the first stone of that structure in 1739. It was completed in 1747, being the first work of the like description and importance which England had seen since Peter of Colechurch built the old London Bridge, — a period of nearly six centuries.

At the accession of William and Mary the throne of painting was occupied by Sir Godfrey Kneller; "a man," says Walpole "lessened by his own reputation, as he chose to make it subservient to his fortune. Had he lived in a country where his merit had been rewarded according to the worth instead of the number of his productions, he might have shone in the roll of the greatest masters; but where he offered one picture to fame he sacrificed twenty to lucre, and he met with customers of so little judgment, that they were fond of being painted by a man who would gladly have disowned his works the moment they were paid for."

Sir Godfrey Kneller was born at Lubec about 1648. Having studied under the best Flemish masters of the day, and completed his education in Italy, he came to England, where the fairest field was then open to talent in that branch of the art to which he had devoted himself. By the recommendation of the Duke of Monmouth, he immediately obtained a commission to paint the portrait of Charles II.; and, in order to save trouble to the king, it was arranged that he should sit to Sir Peter Lely and Kneller at the same time. The former had the choice of light and position, but, notwithstanding the disadvantages under which Kneller was thus placed, the facility of his execution, the vigour of his handling, and the force of his colouring and effect excited the greatest admiration when contrasted with the refined but more timid style of his rival. He rose at once into reputation, and after the death of Lely reigned paramount until 1723, when he died, leaving his art in the lowest state of degradation, to which he had himself been mainly instrumental in reducing it.

Kneller's talent was of the highest order, but totally obscured by his inordinate love of money. For the gratification of this sordid passion, the man who could, and occasionally did, produce works inferior to none achieved by his predecessors, degraded his art to a mere manufacture, and aimed at nothing beyond supplying the demand for faces, which flowed upon him with the irresistible tide of fashion. He painted his heads with inconceivable rapidity, and then left his canvas to be filled by his assistants. Pieters, Bakker, and Vander Roer, Flemings, and the two Bings,

* This painting is still extant in the vestry-room of the parish, and is a curious specimen of what passed for art at this period.

Englishmen, were fully occupied in painting his draperies and backgrounds, in a style purposely calculated to give value to the heads by the slovenly execution of the accessories. Sir John Medina, a Fleming of Spanish extraction, and a respectable painter, who came over in 1684, carried this mechanical system to perfection. He prepared ready-made bodies and postures to which he fitted the heads of his sitters. To the level of performances thus produced, the blind deference paid to Kneller soon had the effect of sinking the general taste. His own fame he considered to be secured by the few works upon which he exerted himself, and he was accustomed to say of the rest, "that no one would ever believe they were painted by the same man who did the Converted Chinese." That admirable specimen of his pencil, one of the gems of our royal collection, was his favourite work.

Under such influence the art declined rapidly, and in the reign of George I. came to that state in which it is proverbially said things are about to mend. John Riley, who died as early as 1691, was, indeed, a painter of original talent, and has left some excellent works; but, though patronised by the courts both of Charles and James, the overwhelming popularity of Kneller kept him in obscurity, and he has been less known than he deserves. Michael Dahl, a Swede, who came to England in the year of the Revolution, and died in 1743, and John Murray, a Scot, whose portrait holds a place in the collection at Florence, are also to be distinguished as rising above the general mediocrity. But few artists of the period had any ambition beyond following in the path which had led Kneller to fame and fortune. The state of the art throughout Europe was such, that little new light was to be expected from abroad. Encouraged by feeling themselves competent to meet the expectations of the public upon the depreciated scale of merit which Kneller had established, and by the employment which unavoidably fell to their share in the absence of foreign competition, a school of artists was at length formed within the country; and at the death of Kneller, the public patronage in England, for the first time since the revival of the arts, was inherited by native painters, among whom Jervas, Richardson, and Hudson took the lead.

The reputation of Charles Jervas was assuredly not founded on his merit. He lives to posterity solely through his friendship with Pope; and the extravagant praises bestowed upon him by the poet, and by Steele,* prove sufficiently how slender an appreciation of the fine arts entered into the highest degree of cultivation and accomplishment at this period. Whatever merit any portrait of Jervas may possess arises from his imitation of Carlo Maratti, whose works he had learned to copy in Italy with some success. He died in 1739. Jonathan Richardson, a disciple of Riley, was an artist greatly superior to Jervas. He enjoyed a considerable reputation even during the life of Kneller, and was afterwards considered the head of the profession. It is, however, from his writings on art that Richardson derives his greatest honours. His "Essay on the whole Art of Criticism, as it relates to Painting," should be in the hands of every one who seeks for a knowledge of sound principles, and would learn to appreciate the divine excellencies of Raffaele. Richardson died in 1745. Thomas Hudson was Richardson's pupil and son-in-law, and a good painter of heads. His name will ever be in remembrance as the master of Sir Joshua Reynolds, whose appearance on the horizon in 1752 gilds the close of this gloomy period with the dawn of an English school. Joseph Highmore also obtained a considerable share of reputation, and his works deserve notice for the lightness and freedom of his handling. One foreigner may also be named: John Baptist Vanloo, brother of the celebrated Carl Vanloo, whose careful finishing and attention to nature certainly contributed to the improvement in the art which is visible during the reign of George II. With these names we may stop. It were an unprofitable task to follow into detail a catalogue of artists whose works have long since perished in the oblivion of brokers' shops, save where they maintain a place on the walls of our palaces and mansions as illustrations of the genealogical tree. Want of taste and ignorance of drawing are the marks set upon them all. In fact, drawing and composition were not even attempted. That which Kneller dispensed with, others thought it superfluous to acquire; and the leading painters of the day were glad to shelter their neglect of the elements of their art under the precedent of confining their own share of their pictures to the head, and leaving the rest to be done by deputy. Joseph Vanaken, a native of Antwerp, a dexterous workman in satins, velvets, and embroidery, supplied attitudes and dresses to most of the principal painters; and it is said that Hudson was nearly driven to quit the profession on being deprived of Vanaken's assistance by his death in 1749. Hogarth drew the funeral of Vanaken followed by all the painters in despair. He had, however, a share in mending our style, by leading the way to a better taste in drapery.

We cannot take leave of the school of Kneller better than by summing up its characteristics in the words of Walpole, in reference to the state of the arts at the accession of George I.:—"From the stiffness introduced by Holbein and the Flemish masters, who not only laboured under the timidity of the new art, but who saw nothing but the starch and unpliant habits of the times, we were fallen into a loose, and, if I may use the word, a dissolute kind of painting, which was not less barbarous than the opposite extreme, and yet had not the merit of representing even the dresses of the age. Sir Godfrey Kneller still lived, but only in name, which he prostituted by suffering the most wretched daubings of hired substitutes to pass for his works, while at most he gave himself the trouble of taking the likeness of the person who sat to him. His bold and free manner was the sole admiration of his successors, who thought they had caught his style when they neglected drawing, probability, and finishing. Kneller had exaggerated the curls of full-bottomed wigs, and the tiaras of ribands, lace, and hair, till he had struck out a graceful kind of unnatural grandeur; but the succeeding modes were still less favourable to picturesque imagination. The habits of the time were shrunk to awkward coats and waistcoats for the men, and for the women to tight-laced gowns, round hoops, and half a dozen squeezed plaits of linen, to which dangled behind two unmeaning pendants called lappets, not half covering their straight-drawn hair. Dahl, Richardson, Jervas, and others, rebuffed such barbarous forms, but, not possessing genius enough to deviate from what they saw with graceful variations, clothed all their personages with a loose drapery and airy mantles, which not only were not, but could not be, the dress of any age or nation, so little were they adapted to cover limbs or exhibit any form, or to adhere to the person which they scarce enveloped, and from which they must fall at the least motion. As these casual lappings and flowing streamers were imitated from nothing, they seldom have any folds or chiaroscuro, anatomy and colouring being equally forgotten. Linen, from what economy I know not, is seldom allowed in these portraits, even to the ladies, who lean carelessly on a bank, and play with a parrot they do not look at, under a tranquillity which ill accords with their seeming situation; the slightness of their vestments and the lankness of their hair having the appearance of their being just risen from the bath, and having none of their clothes to put on but a loose gown.³³ Anomalous as were these female costumes, they are not worse than the plate-armour and voluminous wigs with which the Kneller school clothed their warriors. The ludicrous combination of the reigning fashion, the Highland costume, and the royal robes, represented at p. 483 of this volume, is perfectly characteristic of the taste of the period, and illustrates it better than pages of description.*

* Tatler, No. 4.

In the higher class of art efforts were still made in the decoration of ceilings, halls, and staircases, on a grand scale, with as much success as might be expected when we consider the state of the arts in general. To the fame and practice of Verrio succeeded his assistant and imitator, Louis Laguerre, a native of Paris, who had studied under Le Brun, came to England in 1683, and died in 1721. His name and reputation are inseparably linked with those of his predecessor in that significant line of Pope's—

"Where sprang the saints of Verrio and Laguerre."

His works were numerous, and many still remain

* Perhaps, however, we have nothing in England which quite equals Mignard's representation of two little French princes deposed, sitting naked in the clouds, with the order of St. Louis round their necks!

at Hampton Court, Burleigh, Blenheim, and other places. The saloon at Blenheim is his best performance. The compartments represent the costumes of various nations, and the ceiling of course a vast allegory. Laguerre was in the first instance chosen to paint the Cupola of St. Paul's, for which designs were also offered by Antonio Pellegrini, who painted the staircase and ceilings at Castle Howard, and Marco Ricci, another artist of reputation in the same class. But the claim was preferred of a native painter worthy of the distinction, whose name will ever occupy an honourable place in the history of English art. Sir James Thornhill, though his rank is rather that of a clever painter than an artist of genius, stands alone among his compatriots as a successful follower of the Italian and French style of decoration, and in the fertility of invention and readiness and freedom of pencil requisite for distributing numerous groups over large surfaces, while in every qualification of an artist he is at least equal to any of his contemporaries. It is to be lamented that Thornhill never visited Italy, but was content to form his taste upon the French school. There is much grandeur in the compositions of the history of the apostle in the dome of St. Paul's, but, as we have already had occasion to notice, the architectural framework which accompanies them is misplaced, and, with all their merit, they are a defect upon the general aspect of the building. Many of his works have perished in the changes of fashion. Among the best of those which remain are the halls at Greenwich Hospital and Blenheim, which display many beauties of his own, and all the defects of the age, which his talents were not of an order to surmount. Although he was much employed, he felt severely the unjust predilection for foreigners, which has ever been the bane of English art; and, while Lafosse had received thousands for his paintings at Montague House, Thornhill was forced to submit to be paid for his public works by the square yard. Sir James Thornhill was an honour to his profession in every way. He enriched himself by his works, repurchased the estate of the ancient family to which he belonged, was chosen member of parliament for Weymouth, and died in 1734, universally esteemed both as an artist and a man. The valuable copies of the Cartoons of Raffaele, now the property of the Royal Academy, were painted by him.

After the death of Sir James Thornhill this branch of painting went rapidly out of fashion in England, probably from the mutual attrition of want of talent and want of encouragement. Kent may have contributed to bring it into disrepute. In the earlier part of his career, as we have already noticed, he had been extensively employed as a painter through the interest of Lord Burlington, although, according to Walpole, his colouring was worse and more raw than that of the most arrant journeyman of the profession, and his drawing as defective and void of every merit as his colouring. Giacomo Amiconi, a Venetian, who came to England in 1729, is one of the last painters who professed this style. After filling many staircases and halls with Scripture, fable, and allegory, now long forgotten, but recorded as equally devoid of colour, composition, and expression, he was obliged to descend to portrait, in which, in spite of these demerits, he was greatly encouraged and well paid. Henry Cooke, who belongs to the earlier part of this period, since he died in 1700, must be noticed as having studied under Salvator Rosa. He painted the choir of New College Chapel, at Oxford, and the ceiling of the large room at the New River head.

A few more painters, both foreign and native, not included in the foregoing classes, remain to be mentioned. The celebrated battle painter, Peter Vander Meulen, came to England in 1676; Hensskirk died in London in 1704; and Godfrey Schalken, famous for his candle-lights (to which, however, his talent was entirely limited), came over twice in the reign of King William, by whom he was patronised. It is related of him that he directed the king to hold the candle, and suffered the hot wax to run over his fingers while he was painting his portrait with his favourite effect. John Van Wyck, a painter of horses scarcely inferior to Wouvermans, died in England in 1702. James Bogdani, a Hungarian, painted flowers, fruit, birds, and other light decorations, of which many still remain in the panels of the royal palaces. Luke Cradock, a native of Somersetshire, distinguished himself in the same style, which seems to have come into vogue as the heavier mode of decoration declined, since Walpole mentions several artists who practised it at the same time.* Boit, an artist of French parentage, was an excellent master in enamel, who was much patronised and received high prices in the reign of Queen Anne. Liotard and Zincke, in the same style of art, flourished in the reign of George II. The latter is scarcely surpassed by Petitot. Theodore Netscher, the eldest son of Gaspar Netscher, painted in England; he excelled in small portraits placed in family groups. Balthazar Denner, known by his extraordinary finish, which he carried to a perfection amounting to a merit, came to England on the invitation of George I. in 1726. Monamy, a native of Jersey, was a good painter of sea-pieces. The landscapes of Peter Tillemans, who painted many views of gentlemen's seats, with hunts, races, &c., are well known in English collections. He died in 1734. John Wootton was one of the first artists of his time as an animal painter. He was also successful in landscape. Francis Hayman ought perhaps to have been placed in the former class of artists, as he professed the historical style; but he began life as a scene-painter, and first distinguished himself by his decorations at Vauxhall. He is best known by his designs for book-plates, in which he succeeded well, though a strong mannerist; and "easily distinguishable," says Walpole, "by the large noses and shuffling legs of his figures." His best work is his set of designs for Don Quixote. The celebrated Antonio Canaletti, encouraged by the number of pictures he sold to the English who visited Venice, came to England in 1746; he staid about two years, having met with indifferent success. Canaletti's Venetian paintings are the most perfect transcripts of his native city; those he executed in London are inferior in the precise ratio of the difference of subject and climate. George Lambert is one of the first of our painters who distinguished himself in landscape; but as yet there was no English school, and he did but imitate Gaspar Poussin.

Apart from all, himself a class, of which he is the first and the last, dwells William Hogarth, of whom England may proudly boast that he is her own son. This great and original genius was born in London in 1697 or 1698. His early propensity for the arts met with no further encouragement than to place him with an engraver of arms upon plate; but he very soon felt his strength, and aspired to something beyond an occupation so humble, and, having applied himself to painting, we find him, when he began business on his own account, furnishing plates to booksellers, among which the illustrations to Hudibras brought him some reputation, and painting small family groups, in which for some time he met with good success. He also occasionally produced a satirical plate—the earliest, called "The Taste of the Times," is dated 1724. Thus employed, he passed several years before he astonished the world with any of those productions which have immortalised him. The "Midnight Modern Conversation" and "Southwark Fair" were his first considerable works in his own peculiar style; but it was "The Harlot's Progress" which fully revealed his genius and established his fame in 1734. A representation of real life so just and so striking—a tale so interesting, so intelligibly told, and so dramatically elaborated—passions and feelings so accurately expressed, accessories so pregnant with humour, at once impressed the understandings and the hearts of all ranks. Its popularity was unbounded; twelve hundred subscriptions to the engravings rewarded the talents of the artist: the scenes were dramatised for the stage, and thousands of imitations were dispersed throughout the kingdom. The success of this first essay in his pictured morals led to the production of "The Rake's Progress" in the following year, which produced less éclat, as it was no longer a novelty.

Previously to the publication of the Harlot's Progress he had married, against the consent of her parents, the only daughter of Sir James Thornhill. His success was the means of leading to a reconciliation with his father-in-law, and Hogarth's pungent satires against Kent and his supporters may be traced to the jealousy with which Thornhill regarded the protégé of Lord Burlington. In the Taste of the Times Hogarth had already represented Kent exalted above Raffaele and Michael Angelo on the apex of Burlington gate, and some years later he joined in the general indignation against Pope for his description of "Timon's Villa," by a print in which the poet is whitewashing Burlington-gate, and bespattering the Duke of Chandos's carriage as it passes by.

* Monkey Island, near Windsor, was so named from the monkeys painted there in two temples for the Duke of Marlborough, by Clermont, a Frenchman.

As Hogarth had married with only his profession for a maintenance, he judged it prudent to continue the practice of portrait-painting, for which he certainly possessed but few qualifications. By the other professors of that branch of the art he was considered an interloper; in fact, they reluctantly admitted him to be a painter at all, but affected to look upon him as an engraver, and his pictures as materials for copper-plates. They could not complacently class with themselves one who belonged to no school, and followed none of the conventions which passed with them for the principles of art, and whose works bore an impress of thought different from what had raised any artist to eminence. Hogarth, on the other hand, holding the contemporary state of art as cheap as it deserved, was inclined to misunderstand his own just value. Having expressed some contempt for the taste of one of his friends who had compared Greene with Handel—"Ay," said his informant, "but he said at the same time that you were as good a portrait painter as Vanduyke." "There he was right," said Hogarth; "and so by G—I am—give me my time and let me choose my subject." Conceiving himself to have attained this point without any obligation to books or to the works of other masters, he affected upon all occasions to despise a course of study which he considered superfluous. On this favourite topic his declamation was fluent and bitter, and provoked enmities which pursued him through life.

In 1744 he brought to the test the public estimation of his talents on canvas, by offering for sale the original paintings of the Harlot's Progress, the Rake's Progress, those amusing records of London life "The Four Times of the Day," and the "Strolling Actresses dressing in a barn," perhaps the most exquisitely humorous of all his productions. Owing probably in some measure to the cabals which his pretensions had raised against him, partly perhaps to the offence given by the etching of "The Battle of the Pictures," which he distributed as a ticket of admission, and partly to some singular and arbitrary conditions in the terms of the sale, not likely to conciliate patrons, he received for the whole of these pictures, nineteen in number, no more than 427*l.* The Rake's Progress alone has since produced nearly double the amount.

The next of his dramas—for such he himself designated them, and as such they have been well characterised by Walpole—was the "Marriage à la Mode," of which the prints were published in 1745. The pictures he put up to the best bidder in 1750, and, remembering and resenting his disappointment on the former occasion, he put forth an advertisement in such caustic and imprudent terms as effectually drove away all competitors, and he obtained but 120 guineas for this admirable series, which were afterwards placed in Mr. Angerstein's collection at the price of 1000.*

These were not all the mortifications the painter had to undergo. On the production of the "March to Finchley" he dedicated the plate to the king, and the picture was submitted to his majesty's inspection. George II. was a brave soldier and an honest man, but no judge of any work either of art or humour. Expecting, perhaps, to see some warlike allegory, he was unluckily seized with the idea that the painter meant to ridicule his Guards, and ordered the picture out of his sight in terms to which Hogarth gave the retort courteous, by substituting for his name that of the King of Prussia, "as an encourager of the arts." This picture, considered his chef-d'œuvre, being disposed of by lottery, Hogarth presented the unsold chances to the Foundling Hospital, where it was consequently deposited and still remains.

The Marriage à la Mode was shortly followed by the twelve plates of Industry and Illness. As the former exposed the vices of high life, the latter were meant to convey similar instruction to the humbler classes. The artist announces them as being for use rather than ornament, and the execution in fact is inferior to the intention.

In 1753 he gratified his old enemies and made a host of new ones by writing a book. "The Analysis of Beauty" drew upon him a storm of clamour. But, whatever may be the value of the theory which its purpose is to recommend, or however signal the failure which attended the author's attempts to carry it into practice, it is a book full of sound and acute observations upon art. It is difficult to believe, in perusing this and other writings which Hogarth has left, that he was the illiterate man some of his biographers have represented him.

In 1757 he visited France, but had only reached Calais when he was arrested and insulted, according to the then practice of "the politest nation in the world," for making use of his sketch-book in a fortified town. This adventure he has commemorated in his picture of "Calais Gate," one of the best of his works in point of colouring, though that is a quality in which he is seldom deficient. In the following year he painted his "Sigismunda," an undertaking by which he gained nothing but vexation. Hogarth was accustomed, and not without cause, to attribute the depressed state of art in England to the indiscriminate preference for everything foreign, and, being provoked at the price of four hundred pounds paid for the Sigismunda reputed to be by Correggio, and purchased as such at Sir Luke Schaub's sale, he asserted in an evil hour that he would produce one as good if any one would encourage him by as good a price. He was taken at his word by Sir Richard (afterwards Lord) Grosvenor, who returned the picture upon the artist's hands accompanied by an ungenerous and vulgar affront. That Hogarth had failed is not to be denied, but the savage criticism of Walpole is altogether gratuitous; and the rival picture, which is in the collection at Clumber, is at best but the work of Furino, and may therefore justify the contempt of Hogarth for ignorant virtuosi, and the impudent tricks of picture-dealers.

* Now in the National Gallery.

The last year of the reign of George II. is remarkable for the first exhibition of pictures by British artists, the preliminary step to the foundation of the Royal Academy of Arts. Hogarth had presented to the Foundling Hospital three of his best works—the March to Finchley already mentioned; Moses brought before Pharaoh's Daughter, the most successful attempt he ever made out of his own style; and the noble whole-length portrait of the founder, Captain Coram. Hayman and other artists had followed his example by similar benefactions; and the public interest was so strongly excited by the collection thus formed of the works of living painters, that an association of artists, who were now in the habit of meeting together for the purpose of drawing from the life, conceived that such an exhibition might be made profitable. To this scheme was added a revival of a plan, which had been several times agitated, for the establishment of a Royal Academy, which, as might be expected from his known opinions, met with the most decided opposition from Hogarth. The latter part of the plan was therefore, from that and other causes, postponed; but the exhibition was opened in May, 1760, and the profits devoted to the relief of distressed artists and their families. Thus far Hogarth gave his cordial support to the association, and etched for them two keen vignettes emblematical of the misdirection of royal and public patronage, which adorn their catalogue for 1761.

Hogarth's works are numerous. The four Election scenes, the Enraged Musician, the Distressed Poet, and England and France, are among the principal of those not already noticed, which, through the medium of the graver, have given delight to thousands of all classes, from the palace to the cottage. In execution his engravings are somewhat coarse, and betray the marks of his early studies in the art; but in forcible effect and freedom of handling they are unrivalled. The greater part of his published works are by his own hand. Of his attempts in the epic style of painting a melancholy example may yet be seen in Lincoln's Inn Hall—Paul before Felix—and two others which he presented to St. Bartholomew's Hospital.*

Hogarth died in 1764. His last years were disturbed by a quarrel with the notorious John Wilkes and his ally, the poet Churchill. The pen on one side and the pencil on the other were mercilessly applied; and never did men of talent throw dirt more unskilfully.

The following just and eloquent character of this great man, as an artist, is from the pen of Mr. Allan Cunningham:—"The character of William Hogarth, as an artist, is to be gathered from numerous works at once original and unrivalled. His fame has flown far and wide. His skill as an engraver spread his fame as a painter; and all who love the dramatic representation of actual life—all who have hearts to be gladdened by humour—all who are pleased with judicious and well-directed satire—all who are charmed with the ludicrous looks of popular folly—and all who can be moved with the pathos of human suffering, are admirers of Hogarth. That his works are unlike those of other men is his merit, and not his fault. He belonged to no school of art—he was the produce of no academy—no man, living or dead, had any share in forming his mind or in rendering his hand skilful. He was the spontaneous offspring of the graphic spirit of his country, as native to the heart of England as independence is; and he may be fairly called, in his own walk, the first-born of her spirit. He painted life as he saw it. He gives no visions of by-gone things—no splendid images of ancient manners: he regards neither the historian's page nor the poet's song; he was contented with the occurrences of the passing day, with the folly or sin of the hour; but to the garb or fashion of the moment he adds story and sentiment for all time."

As Sculpture had always languished in England even while painting had flourished under Vandylke and his successors, we shall not be surprised to find it, during the earlier part of the period under consideration, in a still worse state than the sister art; and, though the last thirty years produced some works of a superior order, yet we are indebted for them exclusively to foreigners, and have no pretension to any proficiency of our own. During the reign of William and Mary it is difficult to find even the name of a sculptor. John Bushnell, who executed the statues of the kings at Temple Bar, and Le Marchand, a native of Dieppe, who was much employed upon busts, seem to be the only artists in any credit. In the following reign the principal occupation as a sculptor was engrossed by Francis Bird, who had studied at Rome, and on his return distinguished himself by his monument to Dr. Busby in the south transept of Westminster Abbey, a work so superior to anything he ever afterwards produced, that, coupled with the evident relationship of the figure to the French school, it raises a suspicion that he may have obtained the aid of some assistant more able than himself. As a stone-carver he made himself useful to Sir Christopher Wren, and executed the Conversion of St. Paul in the pediment of the church, the bas-reliefs under the portico, and the group in front—all despicable enough, though their offence is lessened by the situations in which they are placed. But his monuments challenge examination. That to Sir Cloudesly Shovel, at Westminster, approaches the bathos of art; and it would be difficult to point out anything much worse than the bronze statue of Henry VI. in the quadrangle of Eton College. If such be the demerits of the leading artist, for such he was, what must be the delinquencies of the rest? The walls of Westminster Abbey may answer; where the reader may turn his eyes upon the tomb of Dame Elizabeth Carteret in the north transept, as being more conspicuous, but perhaps not more barbarous, than others, for a specimen of taste, drawing, and execution which will not easily be paralleled in ancient, mediæval, or modern art. From this state of degradation our monumental style was rescued by the arrival of three foreigners—Rysbrack, Scheemakers, and Roubilliac—whose names are familiar in English art, and who fill the history of our sculpture during the present period after the year 1720.

* For the whole of the works of Hogarth, see Illustrations of Hogarth by John Ireland.

* Life of Hogarth.

These artists imported with them the style of sculpture which then flourished in France, and in which Coysevox, Bouchardon, and Le Moyne had followed Bernini, whose despotic influence over the arts has already been noticed. Bernini possessed a lively and fertile imagination. A certain ease in the conception and execution, an absence of study, and a want of correctness, are the characteristics of his style as a sculptor. His draperies are confused and fluttering, his expression savours of grimace, and his graces of affectation. He introduced trees and architecture in perspective into his bas-reliefs; and represented clouds and draperies floating in the air. He neglected the models bequeathed to us by the ancients, and became himself the model of more bad scholars than any artist on record. Such was the style which infected the sculpture of all Europe, and took firm root in England through the influence of these three artists. Hitherto the character of our grand sepulchral monuments had been principally architectural. That of John Holles, Duke of Newcastle, at Westminster, is perhaps the last of those tasteless heaps of marble which came into fashion under James I., and is the joint production of Gibbs and Bird. On the first arrival of Rysbrack in England, being then a young man, he fell into the hands of Kent and Gibbs, who turned his talents to account by employing him as the statuary in monumental designs of which the architects took both the credit and the profit. But the sculptor soon learned his own value, and asserted the independence of his art, which he almost monopolised during several years, until his supremacy was interrupted by the arrival of Scheemakers and Roubilliac. Rysbrack's principal works are the monuments of Sir Isaac Newton and Lord Stanhope, done in conjunction with Kent,—that of Prior, which bears also the name of Gibbs, and of which the bust is the work of Coysevox,—and those of Admiral Vernon and Sir Godfrey Kneller, all at Westminster; the statues of George II. at Greenwich, and Dr. Radcliffe at Oxford. He also did several statues for Stourhead and Chiswick. His busts are numerous, and by far the best of his works, marked with great truth and character; and, as he was an accomplished workman, their execution has scarcely been excelled. His larger works are remarkable only for their insipidity.

Peter Scheemakers was a native of Antwerp, and greatly inferior to either of his contemporaries: he is, in fact, a mere workman; but through his association with Kent, from whose design, as already mentioned, he executed the statue of Shakspeare, he was thrust into considerable employment, and his works are much more numerous and important than his merit might warrant. His colleague, Laurent Delvaux, was perhaps the better artist of the two; but the name of Scheemakers obtained the notoriety. The monument of Dr. Chamberlain, at Westminster, is marked as their joint production, and it is certain that one of the accessory figures is in a taste much superior to anything in those of Sheffield Duke of Buckingham, Sir Charles Watson, or Sir Charles Wager, which Scheemakers claims for his own. He also executed the monument of the Lord Chancellor Hardwicke at Wimpole.

Louis Francis Roubilliac, a native of Lyons, is incomparably the best artist of this trio, and, indeed, one of the best the French school of this stamp ever produced. He was an enthusiast in his art, studied nature carefully, and worked his marble with unwearied diligence; and, what is not always the result, with success proportioned to his pains. The execution of his drapery is astonishing, but it has the fault of being too often taken from the most disagreeable examples in nature, the folds being either heavy or meagre, frequently without a determined general form, and hung on his figures with little meaning.* Such as it is, its exquisite finish will always deserve its share of praise. Roubilliac's best work is the figure of Eloquence in the monument of John Duke of Argyll, at Westminster: had he never executed any other, it would have ranked him very high in the art, though it may not be fully appreciated by those who consider a servile imitation of the antique as the first step towards excellence in sculpture. His statue of Sir Isaac Newton, at Cambridge, is scarcely equal to this, though it has contributed more to his fame. The well-known Nightingale monument displays his peculiar beauties and defects in a strong light. The design an imperfect metaphor—Death warded off by an arm of flesh. The execution of the skeleton, and the drapery in which it is enveloped, marvellous—the attitudes energetic, but theatrical—the expression just, but common and undignified. Roubilliac's other principal works are the monuments of Har-grave, Fleming, Handel, and Warren, at Westminster; Bishop Hough's, at Worcester; the statue of Handel which he did for Vauxhall; and that of Shakspeare, executed for Garrick, and now in the hall of the British Museum. Roubilliac died in 1762: Rysbrack survived him until 1770.

* FLAXMAN.

The general style of composition in the monuments of this school is pyramidal, and this is generally assisted by an actual pyramid or some object of pyramidal figure which forms the background against the wall. In front a triple pile of pedestal supports a bust—or a principal figure reclines on a sarcophagus flanked by allegorical personages—or personifications of the virtues or moral attributes raise the bust of the deceased—or crown it—or display his medallion. Rysbrack seldom attempts more than one allegorical figure—Roubilliac groups two; weeping cherubs hang about the corners of the sarcophagi with a studied disregard of symmetry, and sometimes even a principal figure is thus perched. The object seems to be, mistaking the reverse of wrong for right, to contrast as strongly as possible with the stiff formality of older date. A bust, a cherub, and a pyramid on a shelf, are frequently the component parts of smaller designs of this class. It is remarkable how often the figure of the person commemorated is either omitted or kept subordinate. There is scarcely an example in these monuments of a principal figure upright and in repose. In Roubilliac's figure of Handel is the only one which approaches to it; and there is one other at Westminster of this period, that of Secretary Craggs, by Guelfi, an Italian sculptor patronised by Lord Burlington.

It is not to be supposed that the influence of the leading artists should operate a sudden improvement on the popular taste in an art so much in request as sculpture, of a certain class, was at this period. Before the reforms of Kent were generally established, there was an extensive demand for statues to adorn our gardens and pleasure-grounds. The west end of Piccadilly was at this time a mart for the supply of these objects, and was lined with the yards and shops of statuaries. What was the sort of ware in which they dealt we may learn from Ralph, who wrote in 1731. "Among a hundred statues," says this critic, "you shall hardly see one even tolerable either in design or execution; nay, even the copies of the antique are so monstrously wretched that one can hardly guess at their originals. I will not lay the blame of this prostitution of so fine an art entirely on its professors,—no, I rather attribute it to the ignorance and folly of the buyers, who, being resolved to have statues in their gardens at all events, first make a wrong choice, and then resolve to purchase their follies as cheap as possible." Long after this period there continued to be a depot at Hyde Park corner for leaden statues of shepherds and shepherdesses, painted in colours, some of which may still be remembered lingering in the suburban gardens of the metropolis. Henry Cheere was the presiding genius of this school of art. Roubilliac worked under him on his first arrival in England; and it was on an order given to Cheere, in the way of trade, that his journeyman produced the statue of Handel, which first led him to fame. Charpentier was another dealer in these leaden figures, and was a pupil of Van Ost, the author of the equestrian statue of George I. in Leicester-square.

MONUMENT OF SIR PETER WARREN, WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

The art of engraving during the present period will not require any lengthened notice, for, although it produced some good and many useful engravers, yet there will be found few of any great eminence, and none of those remarkable productions, which form epochs in art. In the early part of this period the new art of mezzotint principally occupied the attention of our own artists; and Henry Luttrell and Isaac Becket, who worked in conjunction, did much to improve it; but it was first brought to perfection by William Smith, the pupil of Becket. The excellent adaptation of this art to portrait did not escape Sir Godfrey Kneller. He took Smith into his own house for the purpose of employing him upon his works. It is not to be doubted that he improved himself greatly by the hints of that able artist; and his works, which are numerous, have seldom been equalled in tone and brilliancy. After Smith, Kneller employed John Simons, a native of Normandy. The two Fabers also distinguished themselves in mezzotint; the younger was second only to Smith. They are followed by Williams and Le Blon. The latter first tried the experiment of mezzotinting in colours. Edward Kirkall, known as an engraver of book-plates, also attempted to imitate coloured drawings by a mixture of etching, mezzotinting, and wood-blocks, which, like numerous other schemes for the same purpose, produced nothing of value.

In the reigns of Queen Anne and George I. France supplied us with several good engravers. Simon Gribelin, a native of Blois, engraved the first complete set of the Cartoons. Gribelin is a finished workman, but he failed in imparting to his engravings anything of the real character of the master. He was followed, in 1719, by Nicholas Dorigny, who also engraved the Cartoons, but with very little success. The Transfiguration is the best work of this artist. About this time a set of the Duke of Marlborough's battles was published, and it is remarkable that most of the artists employed upon them were French. The principal was Claude Dubosc, assisted by Du Guernier, Beauvais, and Baron. Dubosc also published a translation of Picart's Religious Ceremonies, in which he was assisted by Gravelot and Scotin. Gravelot was an excellent draughtsman, and more employed in that capacity than as an engraver. He furnished many of the monuments and antiquities engraved by Vertue. Baron, who was a thorough master of his burin, engraved many considerable pictures, and at a later period assisted Hogarth, with Ravenet and Sullivan.

John Kip, a Dutchman, who had arrived in England soon after the Revolution, is known by the series of the palaces and mansions of England which he engraved after the drawings of his countryman, Leonard Knyff. They would be little worthy of notice as works of art, but, like the etchings of Hollar, are valuable to posterity as representations of remarkable scenes no longer in existence. Van Gunst, though it does not appear that he ever visited England, must not be omitted, since he principally employed himself for this country upon the works of Vandyke, of which drawings were made for him by Houbraken. Of the two Van der Gutches, whose works are very numerous in all departments of the art, the younger distinguished himself as an engraver of anatomy. He also executed the plates from Sir James Thornhill's paintings in the cupola of St. Paul's. Hulsberg and Fourdrinière are well known for their share in the valuable architectural publications of this period, to some of which reference has been incidentally made; John Pine for book-plates, many of which are of great merit. He engraved the ceremonies of the Order of the Bath, and the tapestry of the House of Lords, which now survives only in his representation. Arthur Pond, though little distinguished as an artist, is to be honourably mentioned for the share he took in producing that splendid monument of engraving, the Illustrious Heads by Houbraken. Thomas Worlidge practised etching in a degree of perfection seldom attained. "Worlidge's Gems" are gems in themselves.

The last name to be recorded in this department of the fine arts is that of George Vertue, an artist of great talent and unwearied industry, but not more distinguished by his works as an engraver than by his researches as an antiquary. He zealously devoted himself to the occupation of rescuing from obscurity not only the objects which merited illustration through the medium of the graver, but the facts and records which relate to the history of the arts in his native country from the earliest period to his own time. The labours of a life thus employed furnished the ore, which, refined and moulded by Horace Walpole, shines forth in the "Anecdotes of Painting," a work of which the intrinsic value is in no degree deteriorated by the brilliancy with which it is invested. The laborious perseverance of the collector and the dazzling wit of the editor could scarcely perhaps have emanated from one mind:—their union has produced a work unrivalled for the combination of instruction and entertainment. The reader who turns back to these pages will see how much the history of the arts is indebted to George Vertue.

The coinage of Queen Anne must not be omitted among the notices of art. It was the work of Croker, an English medallist, second only to Simon; and, in this department at least, native artists have done honour to the country. Croker also executed a series of medals on the glorious events of Queen Anne's reign. Of his coins the celebrated farthings are well known and of great scarcity, having been executed as pattern pieces and never issued. That with Peace in a chariot and the legend Pax missa per orbem, and those with Britannia under a porch are the finest and rarest.* The only coinage of George I. is by the same artist. During the remainder of that and the succeeding reign it continued in a tolerable state, though declining.

During the period between the Revolution and the accession of George III., Music made vast strides in the British dominions, and the improvement was equally observable in the church, the chamber, and the theatre. For this we are partly indebted to Italy, which, from about the end of the seventeenth century, began to supply us with the compositions of her best masters, the study of which took some of the stiffness out of our English musicians, without impairing their native vigour: though to the powerful mind of our own highly-gifted countryman, Purcell,† much of our advance is to be ascribed. He at once, in his secular music, pushed aside the formality of the old school, and filled its place with easy graceful melody. But to the arrival in London of the greatest musical genius that has yet appeared—Handel—were mainly to be attributed those improvements in our taste and style so manifest from the time when his compositions began to be known and understood.

Music received but little encouragement from the court of William and Mary, during the greater part of whose joint reign the public mind was too much agitated by the consequences of the Revolution, and the intrigues more or less open and active of the Tory, or high-church, party, to bestow much attention on the peaceful arts.‡ Nevertheless, nearly the whole of those works of Purcell to which he chiefly owes his fame, namely, his dramatic and other secular compositions, were created while the House of Orange swayed the British sceptre. Much of his music in The Tempest, Dionæsius, King Arthur, Don Quixote, Bonduca, &c.; many of his cantatas, and other pieces published in the Orpheus Britannicus, are still as fresh and pleasing as at the time of their birth, and indeed are now more generally and highly appreciated; the natural consequence of the increased prevalence of musical habits throughout the country.

* These coins will be found at p. 727.

† See Vol. III. 286.

‡ William, however, was not insensible to the influence of modulated sounds. While Prince of Orange—Sir John Hawkins tells us—and deeply engaged in reflections on the critical situation of his affairs, he had three choice musicians to play to him, whenever he was disposed to be melancholy or over thoughtful. The taste of his consort does not appear to have been very refined. When queen, she sent for Purcell and Mrs. Arabella Hunt, a famous singer of that day, that they might entertain her with some music. The lady sang several compositions by Purcell, who accompanied them on the harpsichord; but her majesty, becoming tired of those, called on Mrs. Hunt to sing the Scotch ballad, 'Cold and raw,' a command

Though, strictly speaking, we cannot ascribe to Purcell the first introduction of the English opera, yet we are indebted to him for having given such an interest to that kind of entertainment as led to its subsequent establishment. It is true that D'Avenant's Circe, composed by Banister, Shadwell's Psyche, set by Lock, and Dryden's Albion and Albanus, the music by Grabut, one of the second Charles's French favourites, were all produced before Purcell had begun to compose for the stage: but of the first not a single vestige have we been able to find; the second added nothing to Lock's reputation, and is only known to antiquaries; and the last, of which a printed copy is sometimes to be met with, failed at the very outset, having been at once treated with the most deserved contempt. King Arthur, therefore (composed in 1691), which is well known and highly esteemed by all real judges, and is yet, wholly or in part, occasionally performed, may be considered as the legitimate parent of the English opera. The lyric drama, however, in an English garb, made but slow progress, and nothing of the kind demanding our notice was produced till the year 1727, when Gay brought out his Beggars' Opera. It is difficult now to say which had most influence in the success of a work performed sixty-three nights consecutively—its subtle wit and concealed satire, the number of popular airs introduced in it, or the party-feeling raging at the time; but subsequently and at present the music is its chief attraction.* A void then of eleven years occurs. In 1738 appeared Milton's Comus, ingeniously adapted to the stage by the Rev. Dr. Dalton, with music by Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Arne. This placed the composer's reputation on a firm basis. "He here introduced a style peculiarly his own, which, without pretending to the energy of Purcell or the dignity of Handel, was vigorous, gay, natural, and possessed such strong and distinctive features as formed an era in English music. There is a grace, a lucid sweetness, and an eloquence in its melodies, which captivate the ear, and at the same time satisfy the understanding."† We can only allude to Arne's Artaxerxes, as it was composed two years after the period to which we are confined; but we may observe that it more than fulfilled the expectations which his Comus had led the public to indulge.

Before the seventeenth century had drawn quite to a close, a taste for music had made considerable progress in the metropolis, and perhaps also in the provinces. Public concerts, vocal and instrumental, English and Italian, were frequently given in London, and seem to have been well attended, both as regards the quality and number of the auditors. Evelyn and Pepys, in their Me-she immediately obeyed, accompanying herself on the lute, and not much to the gratification of the great English composer.—Hawkins's Hist. iv. 8.

* The celebrated Dr. Pepusch furnished the overture, selected and adapted the airs, and wrote accompaniments to them. To the latter some additions have since been made.

† Harmonicon, iii. 72, slightly altered.

moirs, mention, in warm terms of praise, several performers whom they had heard, publicly and privately; but it is at the same time evident that a disposition in the upper ranks to patronise foreigners, merely because they were foreigners, in preference to native musicians, gained ground. This predilection, however, was not allowed to influence our cathedral music; for fashion, powerful though it was, and always is, could not force aliens into the ecclesiastical establishments; our church music, therefore, regularly proceeded towards that degree of perfection which it attained in the middle of the eighteenth century.

Among those who, at the period we have now reached, had distinguished themselves by their compositions for the church, and are entitled to notice here, are—Jeremiah Clarke,* a sweet and pathetic composer; the Rev. Henry Aldrich, D.D., dean of Christ Church, whose scientific skill and superior judgment in music formed only a part of his almost universal knowledge; John Weldon;† the Rev. Robert Creighton, D.D., a canon of Salisbury;‡ William Croft, Mus. D.,§ whose two splendid volumes of thirty-one anthems, contain some compositions that have never been surpassed, and which in style unite the older and more modern schools, exhibiting the severe science of the former, and the melodious ease of the latter; Maurice Greene, Mus. D.,|| author of forty admirable anthems, that are still in use in all our choirs, and will never fall into neglect so long as beautiful melody, most skilfully sustained by the richest harmony, shall find admirers; and William Boyce, Mus. D.,¶ one of the ornaments of his country, whose numerous anthems and services, his oratorio of Solomon, and many other compositions, more especially the grand anthem performed annually at the Feast of the Sons of the Clergy, are evidences of genius and ability of a very rare kind.

The introduction of the Italian opera into London tended much to meliorate the English taste in music. It obtained a settlement by slow degrees, entering first, in 1703, in the form of intermezzi, or Italian interludes made up of singing and dancing. It next appeared in a mixed state, the music Italian, the text translated. In 1707 an entire opera was produced, in which Urbani, a male soprano, and two foreign women, sang in Italian, while the other parts were sung to English words! In 1710, all prejudices against this exotic having been overcome, Almatide, wholly in Italian and performed by foreign singers only, was successfully brought out at the Queen's Theatre, in the Haymarket; and thenceforward the Italian opera firmly rooted itself in British ground. This immediately led to an event of the highest importance to the art—the arrival in London of George Frederick Handel, a young Saxon, then in his twenty-sixth year; and, as England became the country of his adoption—as he composed here all his great works without exception—here permanently resided nearly fifty years, amassed an independent fortune, breathed his last, and found a grave—we feel an equitable right to claim his works as British productions, and to consider him virtually, though not actually, as a countryman. Our title to his compositions is further strengthened by the fact, that, till a few years since, scarcely one of them had been performed out of the British isles, though all were written more than eighty, and some much more than a hundred, years ago.

The Italian theatre speedily was consigned to the able management of Handel, who there produced fifteen of his best operas; but he was too independent in spirit to be regulated by the folly, to yield to the caprice, or to tolerate the pride of a considerable portion of the nobility, who declared themselves his enemies; he consequently was obliged to withdraw from an enterprise in which he had damaged his health and sacrificed nearly the whole of his fortune. But “out of evil sometimes issues good,” and the undaunted genius immediately commenced his greatest works, his oratorios, which were publicly performed under his own direction, and, though far from successful at first,* ultimately not only indemnified him for his former losses, but proved to him the source of considerable wealth, and immortalised his name.

“The oratorio; or sacred drama, was introduced into England in 1720, when Handel set Esther—Racine's tragedy abridged and altered by Mr. Humphreys—for the chapel of the Duke of Chandos (Pope's Timon) at Cannons. This, in 1731, was performed by the Children of the Chapel-Royal, at the house of their master, Bernard Gates. The next year it was publicly produced, by his majesty's command, at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket. The custom of performing oratorios

* Incredible as it may appear, yet the fact seems to be undeniable, that The Messiah, that sublime emanation of genius, failed when, in 1741, it was performed in London for the first time: but in Dublin, to which city the almost despairing composer repaired with his matchless work, it received every proof of the highest admiration. Pope notices this in the Dunciad, where a representation of the Italian Opera thus instructs Dulness:—

But soon, ah soon, rebellion will commence,
If Music evenly borrows aid from sense:
Strong in new arms, lo! giant Handel stands,
Like bold Briareus, with a hundred hands:
To stir, to rouse, to shake the soul he comes,
And Jove's own thunders follow Mars's drums.
Arrest him, empress, or you sleep no more:—
She heard—and drove him to th' Iberian shore.

The ‘new arms’ were the Oratorios. On the return of Handel to the British capital, the public, rebelled and corrected by the sister island, reversed their former decision, and, the composer then generously presenting his manuscript to the Foundling Hospital, The Messiah was performed annually for the benefit of that charity, and added to its funds the sum of 19,500*l.*

* Organist to Queen Anne, and of St. Paul's Cathedral. Clarke's mournful end was still more indicative than his music of a sensitive melancholy mind. Indulging a hopeless passion for a very beautiful lady of superior rank, life became burdensome, and he put a period to it in a moment of despair.—Hanckius's Hist. v. 58.

† Organist and composer to Queen Anne, George I., and George II.

‡ Son of that Bishop of Bath and Wells who accompanied Charles II. in his banishment.

§ Organist, composer, and master of the children, to Queen Anne and George I.

¶ Organist, composer, and master of the band, to George II., organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, and professor of music to the University of Cambridge.

¶ Organist, composer, and master of the band, to George II. and George III.

on the Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent is to be dated from 1737, from which time they were, with few intermissions, continued till very recently.*

An institution which much promoted the cause of music in England was founded, in 1710, under the title of The Academy of Ancient Music, the object of which was, 'the study and practice of vocal and instrumental harmony.' Among the founders were Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Pepusch, Mr. Galliard, a good composer and possessed of literary talents, and Mr. Gates of the Chapel-Royal, who were soon joined by Dr. Greene, together with other eminent professors. They collected a very valuable musical library, and had periodical performances at the great room in the Crown and Anchor Tavern, at which assisted, either by their talents or purses, nearly all the best musicians and amateurs in London. The Academy subsisted, and produced the most beneficial effects on the art, till about the year 1793, when more fashionable, though not more useful, concerts caused its dissolution. Other smaller societies, having the same views, arose during the early part of the eighteenth century, of which a rather more than ample account is given in Hawkins's History.

In 1741 John Immyms, an attorney by profession, was the means of establishing a club under the name of the Madrigal Society. At first it consisted chiefly of mechanics and small tradesmen, who met every Wednesday evening to practice those compositions for many voices called Madrigals, and to sing catches and glees. Immyms occasionally read them a lecture on some musical subject. The subscription was moderate and suited to the circumstances of the members. By degrees it assumed a somewhat higher character, but seems to have been exposed to many vicissitudes: it, however, triumphed over all difficulties, preserved a taste for an admirable species of music in which English composers have excelled in a remarkable degree,† and at the present moment (1840) is one of the most flourishing societies of vocal harmonists in Europe.

Though the English opera made but little progress, yet few dramas were produced without a ballad or two, furnished by the popular composers of the day. Among the contributors were Purcell, Eccles, Playford, Leveridge, Harry Carey, George Haydon, and Arne. In the middle of the seventeenth century public gardens were opened, and much resorted to by persons of condition. Of these the earliest and best was the Spring Garden, mentioned in very encomiastic terms by Addison, in the Spectator, No. 383, which certainly existed in 1661, for Evelyn, in his Memoirs, says, under the date of July 2nd in that year, "I went to see the new Spring Garden at Lambeth, a pretty contrived plantation." This, in 1730, in a much improved state, took the name of Vauxhall. ‡

Music was there, as well as at other places of the kind, ostensibly the chief attraction, and certainly many of the most pleasing English songs that have been preserved were composed for that very charming and unique place of amusement; and not a few of the best native performers of the last century there first made themselves known. The success of Vauxhall led to the building of Ranelagh,* a vast Rotunda, which in 1742 was opened as a promenade under cover, and immediately patronised by the upper classes, who, during the spring season,‡ for nearly fifty years, there assembled in crowds on the evenings of Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays in every week. A superior band attended, and, at first, music of a higher order was performed, including choruses from oratorios;‡ but, after a time, songs and other light compositions were found to be better suited to the taste of so fashionable a company. These, however, were, during many years, selected from the works of eminent composers, or written by such persons expressly for the place, and the performers, both vocal and instrumental, were of the best kind; so that Ranelagh (and also Vauxhall) may be considered as having contributed a fair proportion to the diffusion of musical taste in England.

At the close of the seventeenth century and commencement of the eighteenth, a fierce controversy was waged on the question of "the Lawfulness of Music in Churches." Much learning and no small portion of intolerance were displayed: the pens of skilful polemics were actively engaged in the dispute; but the public could detect no wickedness in harmony, though they were able to discover much mischief in the excesses of puritanical zeal; so the organists continued to play and the singers to chant, till at length they silenced their opposers.

There were during this period some very able writers on the science of music. The Rev. Dr. Holder,‡ in his Treatise on the Natural Grounds and Principles of Harmony, renders the philosophical theory of sound and the doctrine of intervals perfectly intelligible to the general reader, whom he enables easily to make himself master of these subjects without possessing any mathematical placed there a statue of Handel, executed by Roubilliac. This admirable piece of sculpture, with which few are unacquainted, was the source of the following lines, written at the time:—

That Orpheus moved a grove, or rock, or stream,
 His music's power, will not a fiction seem;
 For here as great a miracle is shown—
 A Handel breathing, though transformed to stone.

In Manning and Bray's Surrey is the following remark on this statue:—"This is said to have been the first public display of that artist's abilities. The figure is small, owing to there not being a block of marble in England at that time sufficient to supply a figure as large as the life. It was carved in the present dwelling-house [i.e. at Vauxhall], where Mr. Handel sat to the artist; and so accurate was the resemblance, that a person who had never seen him before discovered him one night whilst walking in the Garden." (iii. 491.)

* Erected on the ground which had been the garden of the Viscount Ranelagh who was one of the ministers of Charles II. The building was taken down many years ago, and the handsome gardens, adjoining those of Chelsea College, are now covered with houses.

‡ Dr. Burney, in Rees's Cyclop.

‡ William Holder, D.D. F.R.S., sub-dean of the Chapel Royal. He was also the composer of several of the anthems in the Tudway Collection in the British Museum.

* Penny Cyclopædia, ORATORIO.

† See vol. iii. p. 562.

‡ The London Daily Post of May 2, 1738, states that, on the preceding night, the spiritual proprietor of the Gardens, Mr. Tyers, knowledge whatever. This treatise was first published in 1694, but a corrected edition was printed in 1731.

A Treatise on Music, Speculative, Practical, and Historical, appeared in 1721, by Alexander Malcolm, A.M.,* which at the time it was written was by far the clearest and most instructive work on the subject that had ever issued from the press. The author evidently was a learned and scientific man, one who thought for himself, and more free from musical prejudices than most of those who preceded him in the same line.

Dr. Pepusch† published, in 1731, A Treatise on Harmony, which long continued to be the textbook of studious young musicians, and ought still to be read by them; for, though the author is on some points rather bigotted, and does not express himself in the clearest language, yet his theory and rules of composition are irrefragable, and his examples clear and well chosen.

The Harmonics, or the Philosophy of Musical Sounds, by the Rev. Dr. Smith,‡ is a profound work of high authority, and was long read as a class-book at Cambridge. But to understand it a preparatory course of mathematical studies is indispensable: indeed, to enter fully into the learned author's reasonings, a knowledge of the higher branches of mathematics is found so necessary that the readers of the work—at least the professional readers—are very few in number.

Charles Avison, organist of Newcastle-on-Tyne, gave to the world, in 1752, An Essay on Musical Expression, a critical work, written in an easy manner, displaying a full knowledge of the subject, and no small share of acumen. In this he is said to have been assisted by Dr. Brown,§ the celebrated author of The Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times. He was a good practical musician, and published Twenty-six Concertos for a band, which were long admired, and possess much merit. His partiality for Marcello and Geminiani—the latter his master—betrayed him into the error of disparaging the incomparable Handel. This, and some other mistakes, drew upon him an attack—a somewhat illiberal one—by Dr. William Hayes.|| Avison replied to this, and indiscreetly let his opponent know that he felt the pungency of his remarks. To the second edition of Avison's Essay is adjoined a learned and clever letter addressed to him, 'Concerning the Music of the Ancients,' by the Rev. Dr. Jortin.

A few far separated names, and a still smaller number of distinct facts, make up the history of the Mathematical and Physical Sciences in England to the date to which our previous notices have carried it—the latter part of the fifteenth century.* Nor from that date to the age of Bacon, or throughout the era of the Tudors, have we perhaps so many as a dozen English names of any note to show in this department. Yet before the end of the sixteenth century scientific speculation and experiment were busy in all the principal countries of continental Europe, and the first steps in the march of discovery had already been taken in various directions. In pure science, trigonometry, of which the foundations had been laid in the middle ages by the Arabian geometers, had been brought almost to the state in which it still remains by Purbach and his much more illustrious pupil John Müller (Regiomontanus); Müller had also created a new arithmetic by the invention of decimal fractions: algebra, known in its elements since the beginning of the thirteenth century, had been carried to the length of cubic equations by Ferro, Tartalea, and Cardan, and of biquadratic by Cardan's pupil, Ludovico Ferrari, and had acquired all the generalization of expression it yet possesses in the hands first of Stifel's, and soon after of Vieta. The true system of the universe had been revealed by Copernicus; and Tycho Brahe, although rejecting the hypothesis of his predecessor, as well as clinging to the old superstitions of astrology, had both wonderfully improved the instruments and the art of observation, and had greatly enlarged our knowledge of the heavens. The variation of the compass had been observed by Columbus; in mechanics, the theory of the inclined plane had been investigated by Cardan, the pulley had been explained by Uhalii, and some cases of the composition of forces, and other propositions in statics, had been solved by Stevinus; in optics, the use of spectacles, which can be traced back to the early part of the fourteenth century, had been followed by the discovery of the crystalline lens of the eye by Maurolico, and the invention of the camera obscura by Baptista della Porta. The purely physical sciences had also made considerable advances. Mondino of Bologna, who has been called the father of modern anatomy, had set the example of the practice of dissection so early as the year 1315; and the knowledge of the structure of the human body, and of its functions; had been prosecuted since his time with great success both in Italy and France by Achillini, Berenger (Carpi), Jacques Dubois (Silvius), Charles Euenne (Stephanus), and especially by Vesalius, Fallopius, and Eustachius, whose celebrated Anatomical Tables, completed in 1552, were still the most perfect that had yet been produced when they were first published more than a century and a half after the author's death. In medicine, the Hippocratic method, revived by Nicolas Leoniceus before the end of the fifteenth century, had been cultivated and advanced by Jop, Ruel, Gonthier, Fuchs, and others; and con-

* Of this writer scarcely any information seems attainable. Dr. Burney says that "Chambers, in the first edition of his Cyclopaedia, was indebted to Malcolm for most of his musical articles."

† John Christopher Pepusch, Mus. D., F.R.S., Organist of the Charter House, a Prussian by birth, who early settled in this country. His account of the Genera of the Ancients, and of their musical scale, is printed in the Philosophical Transactions for 1746.

‡ Robert Smith, D.D., Master of Trinity College, Cambridge.

§ Life of Brown, in Anderson's Poets, vol. x.

|| The eminent Oxford Professor of Music, and composer of much fine church music, and many charming glee's, &c.

* See vol. ii. p. 208.

siderable progress had even been made in emancipating the art from authority, and founding a new school on the basis of experience and common sense, or at least independent speculation, by Fernel, Argentier of Turin, and, above all, by the original and enterprising, though unregulated genius of Paracelsus. Conrad Gesner, Rondelet, and Aldrovandus, by the large additions they had made to the facts collected by Aristotle, Pliny, Ælian, and other ancient writers, and by their attempts at classification and system, had more than laid the foundations of modern zoology. In botany, Otto Brunfels of Strasburg had published his magnificent Herbarum Ficones, which has been regarded as leading the way in the restoration of the science; the route opened by him had been farther explored by Ruel and Fuchs, already mentioned (the latter the name commemorated in the well-known Fuchsia), by Matthioli, and others; Conrad Gesner had, about the middle of the sixteenth century, not only collected and arranged all the knowledge of his predecessors, but had given a new form to the science by his own discoveries; many accessions to his lists had been contributed by Dodœns (Dodonæus), Cæsalpinus, John and Caspar Bauhin, and especially by P'Écluse (Clusius); and before the end of the century the first natural system of plants had been devised and published by Lobel. Finally, chemistry, in which numerous facts had been long ascertained by Roger Bacon, Geber and the other Arabian physicians, Raymond Lully and the other alchemists, had been cultivated in later times by Basil Valentine (the discoverer of antimony), George Agricola (who first mentions bismuth), and Paracelsus (in whose writings we find the first notice of zinc), and in the hands of Dornacus, Crolius, and Bartholæus had begun to assume the rudiments of a scientific form; and the remarkable work of Agricola De Re Metallica, first published in 1546, followed as it was, before the end of the century, by the writings and researches of Ercher, Faclis, and Palissy (the great improver of the manufacture of enamelled pottery), may be said to have already established the science of mineralogy, and also to have furnished some indications of that of geology.

In England, meanwhile, much of this progress that had been made in other countries probably remained unknown. We have most to boast of in the physical sciences; medicine was both practised and taught on the revived principles of the ancient physicians, in the early part of the sixteenth century, by the learned Linacre, the translator of Galen, the founder of the medical lectureships at Oxford and Cambridge, and the first president of the College of Physicians, which was incorporated by Henry VIII. in 1518; some valuable works on botany and zoology were published in the latter half of the century by William Turner, particularly the earliest English Herbal, the first part of which appeared at London in 1551, the second and third at Cologne in 1562 and 1568,* the north and south poles of the magnet are described by Robert Norman, a writer on navigation, in 1581; and at the head of the modern sciences of navigation and electricity stands the name of Dr. William Gilbert, whose treatise De Magnete published in 1600, afforded one of the most remarkable specimens that had then appeared both of ingenious experimentin and, of sound inductive reasoning. To Gilbert is assigned the invention of artificial magnets. In the pure sciences, and those more immediately dependent upon mathematics, we did very little during this period. Cuthbert Tunstall or Tunstall, Bishop of London, and afterwards of Durham, published a Latin Treatise on Arithmetic (De Arte Supputandi) at London, in 1522, which was frequently reprinted abroad in the course of the century. This performance so far from containing anything new, scarcely attempts even to explain the principles of the old rules and processes which it details and exemplifies; but it has the merit of a simplicity and a freedom from extraneous matter which were very rare in that age.† From what Tunstall says in the dedication of his book to his friend, Sir Thomas More, it would appear that, like almost every other nation in Europe, we were already possessed of arithmetical manuals in the vernacular tongue, though of a very low order. Of much greater importance were various works produced about the same date, or a little later, by William Recorde, the physician. "He was the first," says the authority to which we have just referred, "who wrote on arithmetic in English (that is, anything of a higher cast than the works mentioned by Tunstall); the first who wrote on geometry in English; the first who introduced algebra into England; the first who wrote on astronomy and the doctrine of the sphere in English; and, finally, the first Englishman (in all probability) who adopted the system of Copernicus."‡ Recorde's Ground of Arts, a treatise on arithmetic, first published in 1551, was many times reprinted, and kept its ground as a common schoolbook till the end of the seventeenth century. His Pathway to Knowledge, also first printed in 1551, is a treatise of practical geometry, but containing also an account of the theorems in the first four books of Euclid, though without the demonstrations. His Castle of Knowledge, published in 1556, is a treatise on astronomy, both theoretical and practical; and it is in this work that Recorde shows himself, in the words of the writer before us, "as much of a Copernican as any reasonable man could well be at the time; at least as much so (in profession) as was Copernicus himself, who makes no decided declaration of belief in his own system, but says, it is by no means necessary that hypotheses should be true, or even probable,—it suffices that they make calculation and observation agree.”* Recorde’s Whetstone of Wit, first published in 1553, is a treatise of algebra, although the author does not use that name except in calling the application of indeterminate numbers to the solution of equations “the rule of Algeber.” “In this treatise,” says the writer of the Notices, “he appears to have compounded, for the first time, the rule for extracting the square roots of multi-nomial algebraical quantities, and also to have first used the sign = . . . In other respects he follows Scheubel, whom he cites, and Stifel, whom he does not cite. There is nothing on cubic equations, nor does he appear to have known anything of the Italian algebraists. . . . Recorde was one of the first who had a distinct perception of the difference between an algebraical operation and its numerical interpretation, to the extent of seeing that the one is independent of the other; and also he appears to have broken out of the consideration of integer numbers, to a much greater extent than his contemporaries.” In his perception of general results connected with the fundamental notation of algebra, this writer conceives Recorde to show himself superior even to Vieta himself, though of course immeasurably below the Italian in the invention of means of expression. “All his writings considered together,” it is added, “Recorde was no common man. It is evident that he did not write very freely at first in English, but his style improves as he goes on. His writings continued to the end of the century to be those in common use on the subjects on which he wrote, though we must gather this more from the adoption of ideas and notation than from absolute citation.”† Another English Copernican of this early date was John Field, the author of an Ephemeris for 1557, published in the preceding year. In the earliest English work on cosmography, nevertheless, “The Cosmographical Glass, compiled by William Cunningham,” London, 1559, the system taught is that of Ptolemy, nor is the least hint of that of Copernicus to be found in the book.‡ In 1573 was published the first English translation of Euclid, professedly by the famous John Dee, the astrologer and soi-disant magician, but commonly believed to have been actually the performance of Sir Henry Billingsley, whom, however, the writer of the Notices before us supposes to have been a pupil of Dee, who only executed the more mechanical part of the undertaking, working under his master’s general, if not special, instructions. The first Latin translation of the Elements of Euclid, that of Campanus, had appeared at Venice in 1482 (the original Greek not having been printed till 1530); and the only translations into any modern European tongues which preceded that of Dee were, that of Tartalea into Italian, Venice 1543; those of Scheubel of the 7th, 8th, and 9th books, and of Holtzmann of the preceding six, into German, Augsburg, 1562 and 1565; and that of Henrion into French, Paris, 1565 (as is supposed). Dee’s translation appears either to have been made from the original, or at least to have been corrected by the Greek text. It “contains,” says the writer before us, “the whole of the fifteen books commonly considered as making up the Elements of Euclid, and forms the first body of complete mathematical demonstration which appears in our language. For, though the works of Recorde were much less dogmatical than the elementary schoolbooks of the eighteenth, and (for the most part) of the present century, yet they partake of the character which they tended perhaps to perpetuate, and in many instances teach rules without demonstration, or with at most a rough kind of illustration. . . . The appearance of Euclid in an English form probably saved the credit of the exact sciences, and in this point of view Dee and Billingsley have exercised a material and beneficial influence upon their favourite pursuits.”* Of Dee’s works the greater number still remain in manuscript; among those that have been published are a Latin treatise on Parallax, and a preface to Field’s Ephemeris for 1557 (mentioned above) from which latter it appears that Dee also was a Copernican. Contemporary with this mathematician was Leonard Digges, who died in 1574, after having published various works, most of which were republished, with additions, by his son Leonard Digges, who lived till 1595. The writings of both father and son relate for the most part to mensuration and the art of war, and are characterised by the application of arithmetical geometry in these departments. One, a work of Thomas Digges, entitled Alae sive Scelae Mathematicae, 1573, being a tract upon parallaxes, undertaken at the suggestion of Lord Burligh, in consequence of the appearance of the remarkable new star discovered the preceding year by Tycho Brahe in the constellation Cassiopeia, “is,” says the author of the Notices, “the first work of an English writer in which we have noticed anything on spherical trigonometry, and the writings of Copernicus are more than once referred to as the source of this subject.” From some passages, Thomas Digges appears, this writer thinks, “to have been a believer in the real motion of the earth, and not merely an admirer of the system of Copernicus as an explanatory hypothesis.”† On the whole it may be said that nearly the whole history of the advancement of English mathematical science in the sixteenth century is connected with the names of Recorde, Dee, and Digges. If a judgment might be formed from some works published between 1580 and 1600, the author of the Notices is inclined to suppose that, instead of making any progress, science rather declined among us in that interval. “The writers,” he observes, “seem to have abandoned what had been newly

* Lohel, also, already mentioned, though a Fleming by birth, spent the latter years of his life in England, where James I. gave him the appointment of royal botanist.

† Notices of English Mathematical and Astronomical writers to the Norman Conquest and the year 1600, in Companion to the Almanac for 1837, p. 30.

‡ Ibid.—An interesting account of Recorde's various works follows, pp. 30–37.

* Comparison to the Almanac for 1637, p. 36.
† Id. p. 37.

‡ Id. pp. 39 and 37.

* Comparison to the Almanac for 1637, p. 39.
† Id. pp. 40, 41.

introduced, and to have betaken themselves to older authors and other notions." Among the productions in question are, the Mathematical Jewel, by John Blagrave, of Reading, 1585, a treatise on a new mathematical instrument, apparently a projection of the sphere, for the construction of problems in astronomy, which proceeds upon the Ptolemaic system of the world, and does not contain a hint of the Copernican, although Copernicus is several times alluded to as an observer; a work on the projection of the sphere, described as "very poor and insufficient," published in 1590, by Thomas Hood, the inventor of an astronomical instrument called Hood's Staff; M. Blundevile's Exercisces, containing six treatises on arithmetic, cosmography, &c., 1594, in which is found a set of tables of sines, tangents, and seconds, being the first printed in England, but the author of which expressly denounces the Copernican system of the world as a "false supposition," although he admits that by help of it Copernicus had "made truer demonstrations of the motions and revolutions of the celestial spheres than ever were made before;" and various works by a Thomas Hill, one of which, The School of Skill, London, 1599, is described as "an account of the heavens and the surface of the earth, replete with those notions on astrology and physics which are not very common in the works of Recorde or Blundevile."* Hill notices the scheme of Pythagoras and Copernicus, by which, as he expresses it, they "took the earth from the middle of the world, and placed it in a peculiar orb." "But," he adds, "overpassing such reasons, lest by the newness of the arguments they may offend or trouble young students in the art, we therefore (by true knowledge of the wise) do attribute the middle seat of the world to the earth, and appoint it the centre of the whole."

But the daylight that had already arisen on the continent of Europe was soon to visit our island. The next age, in which Galileo, and Kepler, and Descartes, and Torricelli, and Pascal, and Huygens, revolutionised the entire structure and character of the mathematical and mathematico-physical sciences abroad, was ushered in among us by the bold speculations of Bacon and the brilliant inventions of Napier. Of what has been called the Baconian philosophy, and the amount of the effect it may be supposed to have had in impelling and directing the progress of science, we have already spoken.† The writings of Bacon probably did more service by exciting and diffusing the spirit of scientific observation and research, than by any new light they afforded for its guidance, which in truth was no more than it must have furnished to itself as soon as it was fairly awakened and engaged in operating. At all events, neither the pure sciences of figure and number, nor even those of the mixed sciences that have been chiefly advanced by the aid of mathematics and calculation, among which are astronomy, mechanics, and all the principal branches of what is commonly called natural philosophy, can well have received either impulse or direction from Bacon, who was not only entirely unacquainted with geometry and algebra, but evidently insensible even of their value or their use. Of those mathematical and analytical investigations which are the chief glory of the science of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, there is not the slightest anticipation in Bacon, nor any direction or suggestion by which they could have been at all promoted. Napier's great invention of logarithms, on the contrary, has from his own day to the present hour been one of the most active and efficient servants of all the sciences dependent upon calculation; nor could those of them in which the most splendid triumphs have been achieved have possibly been carried to the height they have reached without its assistance. The Mirifici Logarithmorum Canonis Descriptio was published by Napier at Edinburgh in a small quarto volume in the year 1614; and logarithms received their improved form, or that in which we now possess them, from their inventor and his friend Henry Briggs, in the same or the following year, although they were not partially published in that form till 1618, after the death of Napier, by Briggs, by whom the calculations had been performed. "Many inventions," says a late distinguished historian of science, "have been eclipsed or obscured by new discoveries, or they have been so altered by subsequent improvements that their original form can hardly be recognised, and, in some instances, has been entirely forgotten. This has almost always happened to the discoveries made at an early period in the progress of science, and before their principles were fully unfolded. It has been quite otherwise with the invention of logarithms, which came out of the hands of the author so perfect that it has never yet received but one material improvement—that which it derived, as has just been said, from the ingenuity of his friend in conjunction with his own. Subsequent improvements in science, instead of offering any thing that could supplant this invention, have only enlarged the circle to which its utility extended. Logarithms have been applied to numberless purposes which were not thought of at the time of their first construction. Even the sagacity of the author did not see the immense fertility of the principle he had discovered: he calculated his tables merely to facilitate arithmetical, and chiefly trigonometrical computation; and little imagined that he was at the same time constructing a scale whercon to measure the density of the strata of the atmosphere and the heights of mountains, that he was actually computing the areas and the lengths of innumerable curves, and was preparing for a calculus which was yet to be discovered many of the most refined and most valuable of its resources. Of Napier, therefore, if of any man, it may safely be pronounced, that his name will never be eclipsed by any one more conspicuous, or his invention superseded by anything more valuable."* In the same volume with his logarithms Napier gave to the world the two very elegant and useful trigonometrical theorems known by his name.

* Companion to the Almanac for 1637, p. 43.

† See vol. iii.

Of the other English mathematicians of this age, Harriot, Briggs, and Horrocks may be mentioned as the most famous. Thomas Harriot, who died in 1621, is the author of a work on algebra (Artis Analyticæ Præcis), not published till ten years after his death, which makes an epoch in the history of that science, explaining in their full extent certain views first partially propounded by Vieta, and greatly simplifying some of the operations. To Harriot we also owe the convenient improvement of the substitution of the small for the capital letters which had been used up to this time. It appears, too, from his unpublished papers preserved at Petworth (formerly the seat of his patron the Earl of Northumberland), that he is entitled to a high place among the astronomers of his day, having, among other things, discovered the solar spots before any announcement of them was made by Galileo, and observed the satellites of Jupiter within a very few days after Galileo had first seen them.† Henry Briggs, besides the share he had, as mentioned above, in the improvement of logarithms, is entitled to the honour of having made a first step towards what is called the binomial theorem in algebra, finally discovered by Newton. He died in 1630. His Trigonometria Britannica, or tables of the logarithms of sines, &c. (in the preface to which is his distant view of the binomial theorem), was published in 1633, by his friend Henry Gellibrand, who had been for some time associated with him in the calculation of the logarithms. Samuel Horrocks, or Horrox, a native of Toxteth, near Liverpool, was an astronomer of remarkable genius, who died in 1641, at the early age of twenty-two. He was the first person who saw the planet Venus on the body of the sun: his account of this observation (made 24th November, 1639) was printed by Hevelius at the end of his Mercurius in Sole Visus, published at Dantzic in 1662. But Horrocks is principally famous in the history of astronomy as having anticipated, hypothetically, the view of the lunar motions which Newton afterwards showed to be a necessary consequence of the theory of gravitation. This discovery was given to the world by Dr. Wallis, in a collection of Horrocks's posthumous papers which he published at London in 1672. It had been originally communicated by Horrocks in a letter (which has also been preserved, and is to be found in some copies of Wallis's publication) to his friend William Crabtree, whose fate, as well as genius, was singularly similar to his own. Crabtree was a clothier at Broughton, near Manchester, and had made many valuable astronomical observations (a portion of which have been preserved and printed) when he was cut off only a few months after his friend Horrocks, and about the same early age. Another member of this remarkable cluster of friends, whom a common devotion to science united at a time when the fiercest political heats were occupying and distracting most of their countrymen, was William Gascoigne, of Middleton, in Yorkshire, who also died very young, having been killed, about two years after the decease of Horrocks and Crabtree, fighting on the royalist side, at the battle of Marston Moor. He appears to have first used two convex glasses in the telescope, and to have been the original inventor of the wire micrometer and of its application to the telescope, and also of the application of the telescope to the quadrant. A fourth of these associated cultivators of science in the north of England was William Milbourn, who was curate of Brancespeth, near Durham, and who is stated to have made his way by himself to certain of the algebraic discoveries first published in Harriot's work, and likewise to have, by his own observations, detected the errors in the astronomical tables of Lansberg, and verified those of Kepler. The names of several other astronomical observers of less eminent merit who existed at this time in England have also been preserved; among which may be particularised that of Jeremiah Shakerly, the author of a work entitled Tabula Britannica, published at London in 1653, which is stated to have been compiled mostly from papers left by Horrocks that were afterwards destroyed in the great fire of 1666.* Nor ought we to pass over the name of Edmund Gunter, the inventor of the useful wooden logarithmic scale still known by his name, and also of the sector and of the common surveyor's chain, and the author of several works, one of which, his Canon Triangulorum, first published at London in 1620, is the earliest printed table of logarithmic sines, &c., constructed on the improved or common system of logarithms. Briggs's tables, as has been stated above, were not printed till 1633. Gunter also appears to have been the author of the convenient terms cosine, cotangent, &c., for sine, tangent, &c., of the complement. "Whatever, in short," as has been observed, "could be done by a well-informed and ready-witted person to make the new theory of logarithms more immediately available in practice to those who were not skilful mathematicians, was done by Gunter."† He has moreover the credit of having been the first observer of the important fact of the variation of the compass itself varying. Another eminent English mathematician of this age was John Peaves, the author of the first good account of the Pyramids of Egypt, which he visited

* Playfair's Dissertation on the Progress of Mechanical and Physical Science (in Encyclopædia Britannica), p. 448.

† These facts, ascertained from the examination of Harriot's papers, then in possession of the Earl of Egremont, were first stated by Zach in the Astronomical Ephemeris of the Berlin Royal Society of Sciences for 1788.

* See a notice of these English astronomers of the earlier half of the seventeenth century, in an article on Horrocks in the Penny Cyclopædia, xii. 306.

† Penny Cyclopædia, xi. 497.

in 1638, and of various learned works relating to the Oriental astronomy and geography, and the weights and measures of the ancients. He died in 1652. Briggs, Gunter, Gellibrand, and Greaves were all at one time or other professors in the new establishment of Gresham College, London, which may be regarded as having considerably assisted the promotion of science in England in the early part of the seventeenth century. The founder, as is well known, was the eminent London merchant Sir Thomas Gresham, who died in 1579, and left his house in Bishopsgate-street for the proposed seminary, although the reserved interest of his widow prevented his intentions from being carried into effect till after her decease in 1596. The seven branches of learning and science for which professorships were instituted were divinity, astronomy, music, geometry, law, physic, and rhetoric; the first four under the patronage of the corporation of the City of London, the last three under that of the Mercers' Company. The chair of geometry, in which Briggs and Greaves had sate, was occupied in a later age by Barrow and Hooke; and that of astronomy, in which Gellibrand had succeeded Gunter, was afterwards filled by Wren. Another Gresham professorship that has to boast of at least two distinguished names in the seventeenth century is that of music, which was first held by the famous Dr. John Bull, and afterwards by Sir William Petty.

In the physical sciences, the event most glorious to England in this age is the discovery of the circulation of the blood by Dr. William Harvey. To our illustrious countryman at least is indisputably due the demonstration and complete establishment of this fact, or what alone in a scientific sense is to be called its discovery, even if we admit all the importance that ever has been or can be claimed for the conjectures and partial anticipations of preceding speculators. Even Aristotle speaks of the blood flowing from the heart to all parts of the body; and Galen infers, from the valves in the pulmonary artery, its true course in passing through that vessel. After the revival of anatomy, Mondino and his successor Borenger taught nearly the same doctrine with regard to the passage of the blood from the right side of the heart to the lungs. Much nearer approaches were made to Harvey's discovery in the latter half of the sixteenth century. The famous Michael Servetus (put to death at Geneva for his anti-trinitarian heresies), in a work printed in 1553, distinctly describes the passage of the blood from the right to the left side of the heart, telling us that it does not take place, as commonly supposed, through the middle partition of the heart (the septum, which in fact is impervious), but in a highly artificial manner through the lungs, where it is changed to a bright colour, adding that after it has thus been transferred from the arterial vein (that is, the pulmonary artery) to the venous artery (that is, the pulmonary vein), it is then diffused from the left ventricle of the heart throughout the arteries (or blood-vessels) of the whole body.* A few years after, in 1559, the pulmonary, or small circulation, as it is called, was again brought forward as an original discovery of his own by Realdus Columbus, in his work De Re Anatomica, published at Venice in that year. And in 1571 Cæsalpinus of Arezzo, in his Questiones Peripateticæ, also published at Venice, inferred from the swelling of veins below ligatures that the blood must flow from these vessels to the heart. So far had the investigation of the subject, or rather speculation respecting it, proceeded when it was taken up by Harvey. From Fabricius ab Aquapendente, under whom he studied at Padua about the year 1600, Harvey, then in his twenty second or twenty third year, learned the fact of the existence of valves in many of the veins, which were evidently so constructed as to prevent the flow of blood in these vessels from the heart, and at the same time not to impede its motion in the opposite direction. According to Harvey's own account, given in a conversation with Boyle, which the latter has reported in his Treatise on Final Causes, it was the existence of these valves in the veins that first suggested to him the idea of his general theory of the circulation. Having satisfied himself by much consideration of the subject, and by many dissections and other careful experiments both on dead and living bodies, that his views were at least in the highest degree probable, he is supposed to have first announced the doctrine of the complete circulation of the blood from the left ventricle of the heart through the whole system back to the right by means of the arteries and veins in his delivery of the Lumleian lectures on anatomy and surgery before the College of Physicians in 1615. But it was not till the year 1619 that he came before the world with the full demonstration of his theory in his treatise entitled 'Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis et Sanguinis in Animalibus.' The best proof of the novelty of the views propounded in this work is furnished by the general incredulity with which they were received by the profession in every part of Europe. It is said that there was scarcely an instance known of the doctrine of the circulation being received on its first promulgation by any anatomist or medical man who had passed his fortieth year. It is probable, indeed, that even the small circulation, or the passage of the blood from the right to the left ventricle of the heart through the lungs, which was really all that had been hitherto discovered, was as yet but little known, or generally looked upon rather as at most an ingenious supposition than a well established fact. At all events there can be no doubt that, beyond this point, all was darkness and error—that, notwithstanding some vague, inaccurate generalizations that had been thrown out by Servetus, Columbus, and one or two other writers, the circulation of the blood through the whole course of the arteries and veins, so far from being believed in, had scarcely been heard of or dreamed of by anybody before it was demonstrated by Harvey. The notion, we may say, universally entertained still was, as in the earliest times, that the veins were merely sacks of stagnant or at least unprogressive blood, and the arteries nothing more than air-tubes. Harvey himself, in proceeding to propound his theory, expresses his apprehension lest the opposition of the views he is about to state to those hitherto entertained might make all men his enemies; and it appears that he encountered as much popular as professional opposition and odium by his book, which was looked upon as a daring attack at once upon antiquity, common sense, and nature herself. It was indeed the beginning and proclamation of a complete revolution in medical science. If the circulation of the blood was true, the greater part of all that had been hitherto taught and believed on the subjects of anatomy and physiology was false. As has been strikingly observed by a writer of our own day, "a person who tries to imagine what the science of medicine could have been while it took no account of this fact, on which, as a basis, all certain reasoning about the phenomena of life must rest, is prepared for what old medical books exhibit of the writhings of human reason in attempts to explain and to form theories while a fatal error was mixed with every supposition."*

* This remarkable passage is often erroneously quoted from the fifth book of Servetus's first publication, entitled De Trinitatis Erroribus, which was printed, probably at Basle, in 1531. It occurs, in fact, in the fifth book of the first part of quite another work, his Christianismi Restitutio, published at Vienne in 1553. Of this work only one copy is known to be in existence, which has been minutely described by De Bure, who calls it the rarest of all books. See his Bibliographie Instructive, i. 418—422, where the passage relating to the circulation of the blood is extracted at length. It is remarkable, however, that what is believed to be the original manuscript, in the author's own handwriting, of the First Part of the Christianismi Restitutio also still survives. See De Bure, i. 423, 424.

Harvey, whose life was extended to the year 1658, contributed to the improvement of anatomical and physiological knowledge by various subsequent publications; and the progress of discovery in this department was also aided by others of our countrymen, particularly by Dr. Nathaniel Highmore (who has given his name to that cavity in the upper jaw called the Antrum Highmorianum), Dr. Francis Glisson (the discoverer of what is called the capsule of Glisson, lying between the liver and the stomach), Dr. Jolyffe, Dr. Thomas Wharton, and Drs. Thomas Willis and Richard Lower, celebrated as the first accurate anatomists of the brain and nerves. Some of the most important publications of the three last mentioned, however, were not produced till after the Restoration. In natural history little was done in England in the earlier half of the seventeenth century. The great authority in botany was still the "Herbal, or General History of Plants," of John Gerard, originally published in 1597, which was for the most part merely a hasty and inartificial compilation from Dodonæus, and nearly as destitute of scientific as of literary merit.

But even in the mathematico-physical sciences, and the other branches of what is commonly called natural philosophy, it is wonderful how little general effect appears to have been produced in this country either by the example or by the actual discoveries of Kepler, Galileo, Torricelli, Pascal, Des Cartes, and their associates and immediate successors abroad, and of Napier, Briggs, Horrocks, and the few others among ourselves whose names have a place in this period of the history of science beside those of their illustrious continental contemporaries;—how little of the general darkness they had dispersed—how little acceptance, or even attention, either their doctrines or the spirit of their philosophy seems to have met with from the common herd of our English speculators and professional men. Some notion of the barbarous state in which physical science still remained among us after the middle of the seventeenth century may be obtained from a curious volume entitled 'Archæologia Nova, or New Principles of Philosophy,' which was published in the year 1663 by a Dr. Gideon Harvey, who had held the high office of physician to the forces in Flanders, and may be therefore regarded as having stood nearly at the head of his profession. Besides an introduction on philosophy in general, Dr. Harvey's work treats of metaphysics and of natural theology, as well as of natural philosophy or physics; but the last mentioned subject occupies the greater portion of the book. The author makes an apology in his preface for some deficiency of polish in his style; the learned tongues, he would have us understand, apparently, had occupied his whole time to the exclusion of the vernacular: "it was never my fortune," he says, "to read two sheets of any English book in my life, or even to have had the view of so much as the title leaf of an English grammar." His English certainly is not always very classical; but the language of his explanations and reasonings would usually be intelligible enough if the matter were equally so. The work, as we have seen, professes to be a new system of philosophy; and it does contain, certainly, various new crotchets, but the author's views are founded, nevertheless, in the main upon the old Aristotelian and mediæval notions, and one of his principal aims throughout is to refute the recent innovators who in so many departments had been questioning or denying these long universally admitted dicta. Thus, in an early chapter, he falls with great violence upon Van Helmont for his dissent from the authority of Hippocrates, Galen, and Aristotle in various points of physical doctrine, and especially for his rejection of the four elements. Afterwards he attacks Des Cartes, whom he charges with no fewer than seventeen serious errors; amongst which are, "that the moon and the other planets borrow their light from the sun,"—"that the earth is nothing different from a planet, and consequently that the other planets are inhabitable,"—"that the moon is illuminated by the earth,"—and "that he assumes most of the erroneous opinions of Copernicus." Harvey, however, professes to be quite a common sense philosopher: "The only instruments," he says in his preface, "that I have employed in the sounding of the natures of things are the external senses, assuming nothing, or concluding no inference, without their advice and undoubted assent, whether in metaphysics, theology, or natural philosophy. Those terms or notions that only give a confused testimony of their being to the understanding, escaping the evidence of external sense, we have declined, as rocks whereon any one might otherwise easily make shipwreck of his sensible knowledge." His practice, however, does not always exactly square with these professions. Take for example a portion of his demonstration of the existence of atoms, or, as he chooses to call them, minimas. "Is not time composed out of instants united, and motion out of spurts joined to one another? That there are instants and spurts the operations of angels do confirm to us." This is hardly keeping within the province of the senses. Nor is what follows in the most matter of fact style:—in grinding any substance, if you continue the operation beyond a certain point, "you shall sooner," says our author, "grind it into clods and bigger pieces than lesser; the reason is, because nature is irritated by the violence and heat of grinding to call the air to its assistance, which glueth its body again together."* The historical deduction of the created universe from the original chaos, and much argumentation that follows touching the essential qualities and forms of things, may be passed over. But we may abridge a speculation about the phenomena of drowning which occurs in one of the chapters. The true reason, we are told, had never before been laid down by any, why "a man yet living, or any other creature when alive, is much heavier than when he is dead." That such is the fact, in the first place, is assumed from a living man sinking at first when he falls into the water, and rising again to the top after he has been dead for some time. "The reason is," proceeds our philosopher, "because, through the great heat which was inherent in that man, the heavy and terrestrial parts were the more detained from the centre; they, again, being thus detained, moved stronger towards the centre, and therefore make the body heavier during their violent detention, through the great heat which was in the said man when alive; so that, through this great weight, the alive body sinks down to the bottom. Now, when a man is suffocated, and the heat squeezed out of him by the thick compressing parts of the water, then he is rendered less heavy, and immediately leaves the inferior parts of water, as being less weighty than the said profound parts." So that we see one principle of Dr. Gideon Harvey's philosophy is, that weight is partly occasioned by heat—that the same substance is heavier or lighter according as it is hotter or colder. The further explanation, in the like strain, of the reasons that nevertheless detain the body below for a considerable time after it may be supposed to have become as cold as the pressure of the water can well make it, need not be quoted at length:—

* Arnot's Elements of Physics, 4th edit. i. 519.

* Arch. Philos. Nova, Part ii. p. 29.

there still remain, it seems, certain "airy and fiery parts," after the vital flame has been extinguished, which it requires in most cases some days to overcome. A strong, compact, well-set man will be eight or nine days in ascending to the top, "because his heat was deeper, and in greater quantity impacted into his body;" and for the same reason it is affirmed such a man will sink sooner to the bottom, vanishing under water in the twinkling of an eye. "On the contrary," continues our author, "we hear how that weak and tender women have fallen into the river, and have swam upon the water until watermen have rowed to them, and have taken them up; and many weakly women, that were suspected to be witches, being cast into the water for a trial, have been wickedly and wrongfully adjudged to be witches because they were long in sinking; and, alas, it is natural: the reason was, because they were comparatively light; for their earthy parts were not so much detained, and consequently moved not so forcibly downwards." "No doubt," it is added, with naïveté enough, "but their coats conduced also somewhat to it." "Whence I collect," concludes the demonstration, "that an ordinary woman is almost one-third longer descending to the bottom than an ordinary man, because a man, from being a third stronger (because he is a third heavier through the force of the light elements—but I mean not through fat or corpulency) than a woman, is conjectured to have one-third more heat than a woman."* But if a woman has less heat than a man, she is, in the worthy doctor's opinion, still more decidedly his inferior in other respects, what heat she has, it should seem, being, after all, too much for the weakness of her general organization. "Women," he afterwards observes, "die faster, that is, thicker than men, and are more disposed to sickness than they, because their innate heat and air do effect greater alterations upon their bodies, as having but little earth or compressing density, in comparison to men, to resist the light elements and moderate their irritations; and, therefore, women seldom reach to any equal or consistent temperature, but are always in changing, which in them after eighteen, twenty, or twenty-four years' expiration is particularly called breaking, because then they alter so fast that they swiftly put a period to their days; and that because their bodies being lax and porous, their innate heat shoots through in particles, and not in minimas, without which there can be no durable temperature. Were their bodies heavier and denser, the minimas of earth would divide their heat into minimas, and reduce it to a temperature. If, then, their innate heat doth constantly cohere in particles, and is never directed into minimas, it retaining in that case stronger force than otherwise it could do in minimas, it alters their bodies continually, and so they never attain to any consistency of age. Many sexagenarian widowers, or men of threescore years of age, do alter less and

* Arch. Philos. Nova, Part ii. p. 106.

alower than most women do from their five-and-thirtieth year; wherefore they do rather covet a wife of twenty, because she will just last as long in her prime, or will be as fast in breaking, altering, and changing her temperament, form, and shape, in one year as the old man shall alter or change in three or four years; and so they [the old man and his young wife] grow deformed in equal time. Wherefore a man's consistent age may last out the beauties of two or three women, one after the other; and, because of this, some in their mirth have proclaimed a woman after her thirty-fifth year to be fitter for an hospital than to continue a wife. No wonder if a woman be more fierce, furious, and of a more rash, swift judgment than a man; for their spirits and heat, moving in great troops and confluences of particles, must needs move swift, which swiftness of motion is the cause of their sudden rages, nimble tongues, and rash wits, &c. &c.* But our fair readers have probably had enough of this. From many other curious things in the multifarious miscellany, which comprises chemistry, botany, mineralogy, and other subjects besides those now usually included under the name of natural philosophy, we will transcribe a few sentences from what is laid down in various places on the matters that had most engaged the attention of inquirers for more than a century preceding the time of this writer, and in the elucidation of which the greatest progress had been made by Copernicus, Kepler, Galileo, Des Cartes, and some of his own countrymen. The "old fancy of Pythagoras, Plato, Aristarchus, Seleucus, Niceta, and others," the making the earth revolve around the sun, which had been in modern times revived by Copernicus, we have already seen that our author treats as a very absurd notion. "The earth is," he says, "and must necessarily be, the centre of the world, or of all the other elements, within which it is contained like the yolk of an egg within the white and the shell. I prove the proposition: if the nature of earth be to move conically from the circumference to its own centre through a contiguous gravity, and the nature of air and fire be to be equally diffused from the centre through their levity, ergo, the earth must needs fall to the midst of them all, its parts tending circularly and conically to their centre. The earth being arrived to the centre, it resteth quiet and immovable."† As for the position that the sun is the centre of the system, besides that it is in manifest contradiction to the language of Scripture, it cannot be true, we are told, for this, among other reasons:—"The sun is accounted by most, and proved by us, to be a fiery body, or a flame, and therefore is incapable of attaining to rest in a restless region, which, if it did, its flame would soon diminish through the continual rushing by the fiery element, tearing its flames into a thousand parts, whose effects would certainly prove destructive to the whole universe, but especially to all living creatures." "The moon," it is added, "is liker (if any) to be the centre, it consisting by far of more earth than the sun, as her minority in body, motion, and degree of brightness do testify."‡ Our author objects, moreover, to the motion assigned to the earth by the Copernican hypothesis on a variety of grounds. In particular, he argues, it is incredibly rapid for so large and heavy a body. Again, "were the earth a planet or star," he observes, "it is supposed it should cast a light, which is repugnant to its nature, through which, as I have showed before, she is rendered dark, and is the cause of all darkness. Were this absurdity admitted, all our knowledge which hitherto wise men have so laboured to accomplish would be in vain; for, as I said before, earth, and earthy bodies must be light, fire, and fiery bodies must be heavy, and enjoy their rest; water and watery bodies must be likewise heavy; the air and airy bodies must be weighty, and enjoy their rest; . . . all dark colours must be supposed light; all astronomical appearances, shadows; sounds, tastes, scents, and all mixed bodies must then be understood to be contrary to what really they are." In fine, he concludes, after quoting some passages to show that Scripture likewise, as well as common sense, is plain against the earth's motion, "what need there more words to confute so absurd an opinion?"‡ In a subsequent chapter on the tides, he objects altogether to the imagination entertained by Des Cartes, of the sun and moon having anything to do with that phenomenon. "I deny," he says, in the first place, "his supposition of the earth's motion, as being fabulous, which we have confuted elsewhere. He might as well assert that there be as many Neptunes under water moving it circularly, as Aristotel stated intelligences to move the heavens; for even this he might excuse by saying it was but an assumption to prove a phenomenon of the water." "Can any one rationally or probably conceive," again he indignantly asks, "that the sun, much less the moon, being so remote, and whose forcible effects are so little felt by sublunary bodies, should be capable of driving, so deep, so large, and so heavy a body as the ocean, which is as powerful to resist through its extreme gravity as all the celestial bodies are potent to move through their extreme lightness? What, because the ocean and the moon move one way, therefore the one must either follow or move the other? What, can a passion so durable and constant, and so equal, depend upon a violent cause? . . . Such fancies are ridiculous, and not to be proposed by any philosopher."‡ The reason why the greatest height of the waters happens at full moon he conceives simply to be "because the ocean began its course at that instant when the moon after her creation, being placed in opposition to the sun, began hers."§ His own explanation of the cause of the tides is, that they are occasioned in some way or other, which he takes great pains, but not to much pur-

* Arch. Philos. Nova, Part ii. p. 134.

† Id. p. 206.

* Arch. Philos. Nova, Part ii. p. 206.

† Id., p. 209.

‡ Id. p. 305.

§ Id. p. 305.

pose, to investigate, by the force of their own gravity periodically drawing the waters of the ocean downward: "the waters," he says, "take the beginning of their motion underneath not far from the ground, where their being pressed by the great weight of many hundred fathoms of water lying upon them must needs cause a very swift course of waters removing underneath and withdrawing from that of the surface, which is prevented by a swift motion, because it sinks down to that place whence the subjected parts do withdraw themselves; which gives us a reason why the superficial parts of the sea do not flow by many degrees so swift as the subjected ones."* In another chapter he takes up the question of the relative magnitudes of the earth, the sun, and the other heavenly bodies; setting out by asserting that "the body of the sun is by far exceeded in mole and bigness by the weighty globe"† (that is, by this earth). But what he calls his proofs of this proposition need not be inflicted upon the reader.

Such were the notions in science which prevailed probably among the generality even of persons of education and reading in England at the date of the incorporation and first public establishment of the Royal Society. The origin of this institution is traced to about the year 1645, when, on the suggestion of Mr. Theodore Haak, a native of the Palatinate, a number of persons resident in London, who took an interest in what was called the new or experimental philosophy, began to meet together once a week, sometimes at the lodgings of one of their number, Dr. Jonathan Goddard, a physician, in Wood-street, who kept an operator in his house for grinding glasses for telescopes; sometimes at apartments in Cheapside, sometimes in Gresham College or its neighbourhood. Such is the account given by Dr. Birch, on the authority of Dr. John Wallis, the eminent mathematician, who was himself a member of the association thus formed.‡ Besides Wallis, Haak, and Goddard, it included Dr. Wilkins (afterwards bishop of Chester, and the author of several curious scientific projects and speculations), Dr. George Ent (the friend of Harvey, and defender of his great discovery), Dr. Glisson, already mentioned, Dr. Christopher Merret, who afterwards distinguished himself by his experimental investigations, Mr. Samuel Foster, professor of astronomy in Gresham College, and several others whose names have not been recorded. "Their business was," says Birch, "precluding affairs of state and questions of theology, to consider and discuss philosophical subjects, and whatever had any connexion with or relation to them—as physic, anatomy, geometry, astronomy, navigation, statics, magnetism, chemistry, mechanics, and natural experiments, with the state of these studies as then cultivated at home or abroad." In some letters written in 1646 and 1647 we find the Honourable Robert Boyle, then a very young man, making mention of what he calls "our new Philosophical or Invisible College," by which he is supposed to mean this association. Wilkins, Wallis, and Goddard were all withdrawn to Oxford by being appointed to offices in the university in the course of the years 1648, 1649, and 1651; and by their exertions a society similar to the London one was now established in that city, which was joined by Dr. Seth Ward, then Savilian professor of astronomy, afterwards successively bishop of Exeter and Salisbury, by Dr. Ralph Bathurst, Dr. Thomas Willis, Dr. (afterwards Sir) William Petty (all physicians), and divers others. The Oxford society met at first in Dr. Petty's lodgings, in the house of an apothecary, whose boxes and phials furnished them with many of the chemical substances they wanted for inspection or experiment; after Petty went to Ireland in September, 1652, the meetings seem to have been discontinued for some years; but in February, 1658, we find Petty, in a letter from Dublin to Boyle, observing that he had not heard better news than that the club was restored at Oxford, and shortly before that date the members appear to have, in fact, begun to assemble again at Dr. Wilkins's apartments in Wadham College, whence, on the appointment of Wilkins, in September, 1659, to the mastership of Trinity College, Cambridge, they transferred themselves to the lodgings of Mr. Boyle, who had come to Oxford in June, 1654, and continued to reside there till April, 1668. All this while the original London society is believed to have met once or twice a week for the greater part of the year without interruption, those of the members who had removed to Oxford rejoining it whenever they chanced to come up to town. In course of time many of the members of the Oxford club became resident in London; and it is certain that, by the year 1659, the meetings had come to be held pretty regularly in term time at Gresham College every week, either after the Wednesday's lecture on astronomy by Wren, or after the Thursday's on geometry by Mr. Lawrence Rooke, sometimes, perhaps, on both days. Among the members at this time are mentioned Lord Brouncker and John Evelyn. The confusion in which public affairs were involved in the latter part of the year 1659, when Gresham College was turned into a barrack for soldiers, dispersed the philosophers; but "their meetings," continues their historian, "were revived, and attended with a larger concourse of persons, eminent for their characters and learning, upon the Restoration, 1660; and, as appears from the journal book of the Royal Society, on the 28th of November that year, the Lord Viscount Brouncker, Mr. Boyle, Mr. Bruce, Sir Robert Moray, Sir Paul Neile, Dr. Wilkins, Dr. Goddard, Dr. Petty, Mr. Balle, Mr. Rooke, Mr. Wren, and Mr. Hill, after the lecture of Mr. Wren, at Gresham College, withdrew for mutual conversation into Mr. Rooke's apartment, where, amongst other matters discoursed of, something was offered about a design of founding a cohege for the promoting of physico-mathematical experimental learning. And, because they had these frequent occasions of meeting with one another, it was proposed that some course might be thought of to improve this meeting to a more regular way of debating things; and that, according to the manner in other countries, where there were voluntary associations of men into academies for the advancement of various parts of learning, they might do something answerable here for the promoting of experimental philosophy.* It was thereupon agreed that the meetings should be continued at three o'clock in the afternoon on every Wednesday, in Mr. Rooke's chamber at Gresham College during term time, and at Mr. Balle's apartments in the Temple in the vacation. It was also arranged that every member of the society should pay ten shillings on his admission, and a shilling a week besides so long as he remained a member. At this meeting, which may be regarded as that at which the present Royal Society was actually founded, Dr. Wilkins presided. From the subsequent admissions it appears that only the twelve persons present on this occasion were considered as members; all others, even those who had attended the meetings kept before the Restoration, had to be regularly proposed and balloted for. A list, however, was now drawn out of "such persons as were known to those present, and judged by them willing and fit to be joined with them in their design, and who, if they should desire it, might be admitted before any others;" among whom we find the names of Lord Hatton, Mr. (afterwards Lord) Brereton, who had been a member of the old club, Sir Kenelm Digby, Mr. Evelyn, Mr. Slingsbey (another attendant at the meetings before the Restoration), Mr. (afterwards Sir John) Denham, Dr. Ward, Dr. Wallis, Dr. Glisson, Dr. Ent, Dr. Bate (author of the Elenchus Motuum), Dr. Willis, Dr. Cowley (the poet), Mr. Ashmole (founder of the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford), Mr. Oldenburg (long secretary), &c. At the next meeting, on that day week, Sir Robert Moray informed the members, from the king, that his majesty had been made acquainted with their design, and that he highly approved of it, and would be ready to give it his encouragement. It appears to have been principally through Moray, who held the office of a sort of private secretary to Charles II., that the society acquired and was enabled to keep up its interest at court. Burnet, who knew him well, calls him "the first formor of the Royal Society," and adds that "while he lived he was the life and soul of that body." "He was," says the bishop, "the most universally beloved and esteemed by men of all sides and sorts of any man I have ever known in my whole life. He was a pious man, and in the midst of armies and courts he spent many hours a day in devotion, which was in a most elevating strain. He had gone through the easy parts of mathematics, and knew the history of nature beyond any man I ever yet knew. He had a genius much like Peiriski, as he is described by Gassendi. On the 16th of January, 1661, we find the king sending the society two loadstones by Sir Robert Moray, with a message, "that he expected an account from the society of some of the most considerable experiments upon them."† Charles seems to have taken much interest in the society from the first; in the account of the meeting of the 4th of September this year, it is noted that "a proposition of Mr. Hobbes, for finding two mean proportionals between two straight lines given, was delivered in to the society by Sir Paul Neile from the king, indorsed with his majesty's own hand, and was ordered to be registered;"‡ and on the 16th of October Sir Robert Moray acquaints the society that he and Sir Paul Neile had kissed the king's hand in their name; on which he was desired to return their most humble thanks to his majesty "for the favour and honour done them, of offering himself to be entered one of their society."§ "When the society first addressed themselves to his majesty," Bishop Spratt tells us, "he was pleased to express much satisfaction that this enterprise was begun in his reign. He then represented to them the gravity and difficulty of their work; and assured them of all the kind influence of his power and prerogative. Since that he has frequently committed many things to their search; he has referred many foreign rarities to their inspection; he has recommended many domestic improvements to their care; he has demanded the result of their trials in many appearances of nature; he has been present, and assisted with his own hands, at the performing of many of their experiments, in his gardens, his parks, and on the river."|| On the 15th of July, 1662, a charter was passed incorporating the society under the name of the Royal Society, and constituting William Lord Brouncker the first president; Moray, Boyle, Brereton, Digby, Neile, Slingsbey, Petty, Drs. Wallis, Timothy Clarke, Wilkins, and Ent, William Areskine, Esq., cup-bearer to his majesty, Drs. Goddard and Christopher Wren, William Balle, Esq., Matthew Wren, Esq., Evelyn, T. Henslow, Esq., Dudley Palmer, Esq., and Oldenburg, the first council; Balle, the first treasurer; and Wilkins and Oldenburg the first secretaries. And some additional privileges were granted by a second charter which passed the privy seal on the 22nd of April, 1663.¶ From a list drawn up on the 21st of May, in that year, it appears that the number of members was then a hundred and fifteen. Among them, besides the names that have

* Arch. Philol. Nova, Part ii. p. 306.

† Id. p. 417.

‡ History of the Royal Society of London, 1756; l. i. Dr. Birch refers to Dr. Wallis's account of his own Life in the Preface to Hearn's edition of Langtoft's Chronicle, l. 161. What is here called an account of his life is a letter from Wallis to his friend Dr. Thomas Smith.

* Own Time, l. 59.

† Id. p. 49.

‡ History of the Royal Society, Lond. 1667, p. 131.

§ See the first Charter in Birch, l. 68-96; the second, 221-230.

 Birch, l. 239.

* Birch, l. 3.

† Birch, l. 10.

‡ Id. p. 50.

§ Id. p. 131.

been already mentioned, are those of James Lord Annesley, John Aubrey, Esquire, (the author of the Miscellanies), George Duke of Buckingham, George Lord Berkeley, Robert Lord Bruce, Isaac Barrow, B.D., Walter Lord Cavendish, Dr. Walter Charleton, John Earl of Crawford and Lindsay, Henry Marquis of Dorchester, William Earl of Devonshire, John Dryden, Esquire, (the poet), John Graunt, Esquire, (author of the Observations upon the Bills of Mortality), Mr. Robert Hooke, (already a very active member, although the only one whose name stands thus undecorated by any designation either civil or academic), Alexander Earl of Kincardine, John Lord Lucas, John Viscount Massareene, James Earl of Northampton, Dr. Walter Pope (author of the well known song called the Old Man's Wish, and other pieces of verse), Edward Earl of Sandwich, Thomas Spratt, M. A. (afterwards Bishop of Rochester), Edmund Waller, Esquire (the poet). The Royal Society, we thus perceive, besides the array of titled names which it doubtless owed in part to the patronage of the court, had at this time to boast of a considerable sprinkling of the cultivators of poetry and general literature among its men of science and experimentalists.* It had however been specially royal charter, and in the English oath therein directed to be taken by the president.*

We have a curious account of the Royal Society at this early date from Louis XIV.'s historiographer, M. Samuel Sorbriere, who came over to this country in 1663, and after his return to France published a narrative of his adventures.† Sorbriere's book is on the whole a somewhat cox-complical performance, and, of course, in a hastily written description of a foreign country, in which he spent only a few months, he has made several mistakes as to matters of fact; but he may be trusted at least for the outside appearances of things which he saw with his own eyes, and which he evidently does not intend to misrepresent. One of his principal objects in visiting England, he states, was to renew his acquaintance with some old friends, and to be introduced to other learned persons here. One of those whom he had formerly known was Mr. Hobbes, whom, he tells us, he found much the same man as he had seen him fourteen years before, "and even," he adds, "in the same posture in his chamber as he was wont to be every afternoon, wherein he betook himself to his studies after he had been walking about all the morning. This he did for his health, of which he ought to have the greatest regard, he being at this time seventy-eight years of age. Besides which he plays so long at tennis once a week till he is quite tired. I found very little alteration in his face, and none at all in the vigour of his mind, strength of memory, and cheerfulness of spirit; all which he perfectly retained."‡ Hobbes, who in fact was at this time no more than seventy-five, and who lived and wrote for sixteen or seventeen years longer, had already involved himself in his famous mathematical controversy with Dr. Wallis and the new society, which speedily became so angry and scurrilous on both sides—especially on that of Hobbes, who was in the wrong; but it does not appear either that Sorbriere was prepossessed against the society, or they against him in the first instance, by his connexion with their great assailant. Perhaps, however, the circumstance was remembered afterwards, when some of the more zealous members found themselves dissatisfied with the Frenchman's published narrative, and Spratt, already the appointed historian of the society, and vain of his reputation as the finest or smartest writer of the day, undertook the task of exposing its blunders and calumnies.§ The society elected Sorbriere a member while he was in England; and he on his part speaks with great respect both of the society as a body, and of those of its members whom he has occasion to mention. Of Sir Robert constituted for the promotion of natural or physical science: Regalis Societas Londini pro scientia naturali promovenda, or the Royal Society of London for improving natural knowledge, is the full title by which it is described in the second

SEAL OF THE ROYAL SOCIETY.

* On the 7th of December, 1664, "it being suggested that there were several persons of the society whose genius was very proper and inclined to improve the English tongue, and particularly for philosophical purposes, it was voted that there be a committee for improving the English language, and that they meet at Sir Peter Wyche's lodgings in Gray's Inn once or twice a month, and give an account of their proceedings to the society when called upon." A committee of twenty-one members was accordingly appointed for this purpose: among them were Dryden, Evelyn, Spratt, and Waller.—Birkb., i. 489, 500.

* In the first Charter it is called simply the Royal Society (Regalis Societas); but its object is there still farther limited to mere experimental science—"ad rerum naturalium atque utilium scientiarum experimentorum sive ulterius promovendas."

† Relation d'un Voyage en Angleterre, 1664: translated under the title of A Voyage to England, containing many things relating to the state of learning, religion, and other curiosities of that kingdom, 1709.

‡ English Translation, p. 27.

§ Observations on M. de Sorbriere's Voyage into England; written to Dr. Wren, professor of astronomy in Oxford. 1708 (first printed in 1665).

Moray, he says, "It was a wonderful or rather a very edifying thing, to find a person employed in matters of state, and of such excellent merit, and one who had been engaged a great part of his life in warlike commands and the affairs of the cabinet, apply himself in making machines in St. James's Park and adjusting telescopes. All this we have seen him do with great application. . . . I made him frequent visits, very much to my satisfaction, having never had the honour to see him but I learned something of him." He adds, "He was so kind as to introduce me to Prince Rupert, who is of the same frank temper, kind, modest, very curious, and takes no state upon him. . . . Sir Robert Moray brought me likewise into the king's presence, who is a lover of the curiosities of art and nature. He took the pains to bring me into the Royal Society, and had the goodness, almost every time that I attended there, to seat me next himself, that so he might interpret to me whatever was said in English."* An account is afterwards given of the origin of the Royal Society, in which we are told that during the late civil war "persons of quality, having no court to make, applied themselves to their studies; some turning their heads to chemistry, others to mechanism, mathematics, or natural philosophy." "Those same persons," proceeds our author, "who had found their account in their respective studies, would not, after the king's return . . . be guilty if so much ingratitude as to leave them and take upon them an idle court life; but they chose rather to intersperse these sorts of entertainments with their other diversions; and so the Lords Digby, Boyle, Brouncker, Moray, Devonshire, Worcester, and divers others (for the English nobility are all of them learned and polite), built laboratories, made machines, opened mines, and made use of an hundred sorts of artists to find out some new invention or other. The king himself is not devoid of this curiosity; nay, he has caused a famous chymist to be brought over from Paris, for whom he has built a very fine laboratory in St. James's Park. But his majesty more particularly takes great delight in finding out useful experiments in navigation, wherein he has immense knowledge."† He then notices with great admiration Boyle's pneumatic engine, or air-pump, and other inventions of some of the members of the Royal Society. He states, by mistake, that the society had already begun a library adjoining to the gallery through which they passed from their hall of meeting in Gresham College: "they have as yet no library," Spratt observes, "but only a repository for their instruments and rarities."‡ Spratt is scandalised at the triviality of the description given of the meetings of the society; but the "mean circumstances," the enumeration of which he denounces as unworthy of so noble a theme, are interesting enough at this distance of time. First is noticed the usher or beadle, "who goes before the president with a mace, which he lays down on the table when the society have taken their places." This is the gilt silver mace the society still possess, the gift of their first royal patron. "The room where the society meets," the account goes on, "is large and wainscotted; there is a large table before the chimney, with seven or eight chairs covered with green cloth about it, and two rows of wooden and matted benches to lean on, the first being higher than the other, in form like an amphitheatre. The president and council are elective; they mind no precedence in the society, but the president sits at the middle of the table in an elbow chair, with his back to the chimney. The secretary sits at the end of the table on his left hand, and they have each of them pen, ink, and paper, before them. I saw nobody sit on the chairs; I think they are reserved for persons of great quality, or those who have occasion to draw near to the president. All the other members take their places as they think fit, and without any ceremony; and, if any one comes in after the society is fixed, nobody stirs, but he takes a place presently where he can find it, that so no interruption may be given to him that speaks. The president has a little wooden mace in his hand, with which he strikes the table when he would command silence; they address their discourse to him barcheated till he makes a sign for them to put on their hats; and there is a relation given in a few words of what is thought proper to be said concerning the experiments proposed by the secretary. There is nobody here eager to speak, that makes a long harangue, or intent upon saying all he knows; he is never interrupted that speaks, and differences of opinion cause no manner of resentment, nor as much as a disobliging way of speech; there is nothing seemed to me to be more civil, respectful, and better managed than this meeting; and, if there are any private discourses held between any while a member is speaking, they only whisper, and the least sign from the president causes a sudden stop, though they have not told their mind out. I took special notice of this conduct in a body consisting of so many persons, and of such different nations. . . . In short, it cannot be discerned that any authority prevails here; and, whereas those who are mere mathematicians favour Descartes more than Gassendus, the literati, on the other side, are more inclined to the latter. But both of them have hitherto demeaned themselves with so much moderation that no different hypotheses or principles have been a means to break in upon the good harmony of the society."§ Spratt takes fire at this statement about the authority of Descartes with the mathematicians and of Gassendi with the men of general learning: "neither of these two men," he says, "bear any sway amongst them; they are never named there as dictators over men's reasons; nor is there any extraordinary reference to their judgments."¶

The Royal Society began to publish the most important of the papers communicated to it, under the

* English Translation, p. 31.
 † Observations, p. 166.

Id., p. 33.

* English Translation, p. 38.

† Observations, p. 165.

title of the Philosophical Transactions, in March, 1665; and the work has been continued from that date to the present day, with the exception of the four years from January 1679 to January 1683 (for which space the deficiency is partly supplied by Hooke's volume of Philosophical Collections), of the three years and a month from December 1687 to January 1691, and of various shorter intervals, amounting in all to nearly a-year and a half more, previous to October, 1695. From this work, or either of its abridgments—the first begun by Mr. Lowthorp and brought down by a succession of continuators to the middle of last century; the second, and best, by the late Dr. Charles Hutton and assistants, extending to the year 1800—and from the histories of Bishop Spratt and Dr. Birch, the former, however, coming down only to the year 1667, in which it was published—may be learned the general character of the inquiries with which the Royal Society occupied itself in the earlier stage of its existence, and which, we may hence infer, formed the kind of science at that time chiefly cultivated in this country. It will be found that mathematical and analytical investigations then bore an extremely small proportion to the bulk of the business at the society's meetings; which indeed did not consist much of mere speculation of any kind, but rather of exhibitions and experiments, of details as to the useful arts, accounts of new inventions, communications of remarkable facts, phenomena, and incidents in natural history, chemistry, medicine, and anatomy,—of a great deal, indeed, that would now probably be accounted to belong only to the curiosities or popular pastimes of science. A list drawn up 30th March, 1664, presents the members as then distributed into the following seven committees (besides an eighth for correspondence): 1. Mechanical, to consider and improve all mechanical inventions; 2. Astronomical and optical; 3. Anatomical; 4. Chemical; 5. Geographical; 6. For histories of trades; 7. For collecting all the phenomena of nature hitherto observed, and all experiments made and recorded.* Here we have no mention at all of either mathematical or algebraical science; the cultivation of these branches separately, or for their own sake, does not seem to have then been considered as coming within the design of the society. Nor were they extensively applied even in mechanical, astronomical, and optical investigations. If we take up the first volume of Hutton's abridgment of the Philosophical Transactions, which comprises the first seven volumes of the original publication, extending over seven years, from 1665 to 1672 inclusive, we shall find that of about 450 communications (besides nearly 200 reviews of books), only nine come under the heads of algebra and geometry, or pure science; that of about 140 relating to mechanical philosophy, and arranged under the heads of dynamics, astronomy, chronology, navigation, gunnery, hydraulics, pneumatics, optics, electricity, magnetism, pyrotechny, thermometry, &c., nine in every ten are mere accounts of observations and experiments, or explanations and hypotheses in which there is little or no mathematics; and that the remaining 300, or two-thirds of the whole, belong to the departments of natural history (divided into zoology, botany, mineralogy, geography, and hydrology), of chemical philosophy (divided into chemistry, meteorology, and geology), of physiology (divided into physiology of animals, physiology of plants, medicine, surgery, and anatomy), and of the arts (divided into mechanical, chemical, and the fine arts).* So that at this time only about one paper in fifty was purely mathematical or analytical, and only one in three on subjects to which the science of lines and quantities was applicable—for chemistry was not yet in a condition to be treated otherwise than tentatively, and, if mathematical reasoning had been attempted in medicine, the attempt was a failure and a folly.

The history of the Royal Society, however, is very nearly the whole history of English science, both physical and mathematical, from the date of its institution to the end of the present period. Almost all the scientific discoveries and improvements that originated in this country during that century were made by its members, and a large proportion of them are recorded and were first published in its transactions. But the Royal Society, it is to be remembered, was, after all still more an effect than a cause, still more an indication than a power; and, although it no doubt gave an impulse to the progress of science by the communication and union which it helped to maintain among the labourers in that field, by some advantages which it derived from its position, and by the spirit which it excited and diffused, the advance which was made under its auspices, or partly by force of its example, would probably have been accomplished little less rapidly without its assistance; for the time was come, and the men with it, who assuredly would not have been hindered from doing their work, although such an institution had never been called into existence. But it was part of the work they were sent to do to establish such an institution, which, although not the tree on which science grows, is both a convenient and ornamental shelter for the gathered fruit, and may be made serviceable for various subsidiary purposes which even philosophers are entitled to hold in some regard in a refined and luxurious age.

One invention, dating after the Restoration, of which much has been said in recent times, is assigned to an individual whose name does not occur in the roll of the members of the Royal Society—the first steam-engine, which is commonly believed to have been both described and constructed by the Marquess of Worcester—the same whose negotiations with the Irish Catholics, when he was Earl of Glamorgan, was so remarkable a

* In Hutton's table of contents a few papers are repeated under different heads, but this cannot much affect the calculation.

* Birch, i. 406, 407.

in the history of the contest between Charles I. and the parliament. The Marquess of Worcester's famous publication entitled "A Century of the names and scantlings of such inventions as at present I can call to mind to have tried and perfected (my former notes being lost), &c.," was first printed in 1663. "It is a very small piece," says Walpole, "containing a dedication to Charles II.; another to both Houses of Parliament, in which he affirms having in the presence of Charles I. performed many of the feats mentioned in his book; a table of contents; and the work itself, which is but a table of contents neither, being a list of a hundred projects, most of them impossibilities, but all of which he affirms having discovered the art of performing. Some of the easiest seem to be, how to write with a single line; with a point; how to use all the senses indifferently for each other, as, to talk by colours, and to read by the taste; to make an unsinkable ship; how to do and to prevent the same thing; how to sail against wind and tide; how to form an universal character; how to converse by jangling bells out of tune; how to take towns or prevent their being taken; how to write in the dark; how to cheat with dice; and, in short, how to fly."* "Of all these wonderful inventions," adds Walpole, "the last but one seems the only one of which his lordship has left the secret;" but the wit, who characterises the whole production as "an amazing piece of folly," has missed the most interesting of all the marquess's projects, the sixty-eighth in the list, which he entitles "An admirable and most forcible way to drive up water by fire," and which appears from his description to have been, in fact, a species of steam-engine. His language implies, too, that the idea had been actually carried into effect: he speaks of having made use of a cannon for his boiler; and he says, "I have seen the water run like a constant fountain-stream forty feet high; one vessel of water rarified by fire driveth up forty of cold water." And Sorbier, when here in 1663, saw the engine at work—although the superficial, chattering Frenchman has described it, and probably understood it, so imperfectly as to have taken no note even of the nature of the power by which it was made to act:—"One of the most curious things I had a mind to see," he writes, "was a water-engine invented by the Marquess of Worcester, of which he had made an experiment. I went on purpose to see it at Fox Hall (Vauxhall), on the other side of the Thames, a little above Lambeth, the Archbishop of Canterbury's palace, standing in sight of London. One man, by the help of this machine, raised four large buckets full of water in an instant forty feet high, and that through a pipe of about eight inches long; which invention will be of greater use to the public than that very ingenious machine already made use of, and raised upon wooden work above Somerset House, that supplies part of the town with water, but with great difficulty, and in less quantity than could be wished."† Forty years before the publication of the Century of Inventions, it is to be observed, a French engineer, Solomon de Caus, in a volume published at Paris entitled "Les Raisons des Forces Mouvantes," had not only called attention to the power of steam produced in a close vessel, but had proposed a mode of raising water by means of such a force, the principle of which, as far as can be collected, appears to have been the same with that of the Marquess of Worcester's contrivance. It is possible that the marquess may have taken the idea from this book, which would be the more likely to attract attention in England from the circumstance of De Caus having come over to this country in 1612 in the train of the Elector Palatine, and resided here for some years; but still the English nobleman remains, as far as is known, the first person who ever actually constructed a steam-engine. Twenty years later, as appears from the author's manuscript now in the British Museum, the same idea that had been already published by De Caus, and realised by the Marquess of Worcester, was proposed as his own by Sir Samuel Morland in a work on machines for raising water, written in French, and addressed to Louis XIV.;‡ although the passage was omitted from the book when it was soon afterwards sent to the press. About 1690, Denis Papin, a native of France, but then and for a great part of his life resident in this country, discovered and applied the two important improvements of making the expansive force of the steam act by means of a piston and of producing a reaction of the piston through the condensation of the steam by means of cold; he is also the inventor of the safety-valve, which, however, he only applied in the cooking apparatus called his digester, where steam was employed merely to produce heat, not in any machine where that agent was the moving power. In 1698 Captain Savery contrived the first steam-engine which can be said to have been found practically useful; he employed the principle of the condensation of the steam by cold, not to permit the relapse of a piston, as Papin had done, but to effect the elevation of the water directly by allowing it to ascend into the vacuum so produced. From this date steam may be considered to have ranked as an important working power in this country, although Savery's engine was never applied to any other purpose except the raising of water, which, too, it could only effect from a very inconsiderable depth, the vacuum, by means of which it principally operated, ceasing to act as soon as the column of water came to balance an atmospheric column of the same base, in other words, as soon as the water had ascended through the vacuum to the height of about thirty-two feet. About 1711 a much more effective engine was invented by Thomas Newcomen, an ironmonger of Dartmouth, assisted by John Colley, a glazier of the same place, upon Papin's principle.

* Royal and Noble Authors.

• Journey to England, p. 29.

† Recueil de Machines pour l'Élévation des Eaux, &c.

of making the vacuum produced by the condensation of the steam serve for allowing the descent of a piston under its own gravitation and the pressure of the atmosphere. Newcomen's, or the atmospheric engine, as it has been called, soon came to be extensively employed, especially in the mining districts, where water had often to be raised from great depths. Dr. John Theophilus Desaguliers, a clergyman of the church of England, but of French birth and extraction, in the year 1718 improved Savery's engine (which from its cheapness has for some purposes continued in use to our own day) by substituting the injection of a small current of cold water into the receiver for the old method of dashing the water over the outside of the vessel to effect the concentration of the steam; and this same improvement—re-discovered, it is said, by himself—was also soon after applied by Newcomen to his engine. About the same time Mr. Beighton contrived to make the machine itself open and shut the cocks by which it received its alternate supplies of steam and water; and here the improvement of the steam-engine stopped for the present period.

At the head of the cultivators of experimental science in England in the latter part of the seventeenth century stands the Honourable Robert Boyle, seventh and youngest son of Richard first Earl of Cork, commonly called the Great Earl. He was born in 1627, and lived till 1691. Boyle was an unwearied observer and collector of facts, and also a voluminous speculator, in physical science; but his actual discoveries do not amount to much. He made considerable improvements on the air-pump, originally invented a few years before by Otto von Guericke of Magdeburg, and indeed it may be said to have been in his hands that it first became an instrument available for the purposes of science. The few additions which Boyle made to our knowledge of general principles, or what are called the laws of nature, were almost confined to the one department of pneumatics; he is commonly held to have discovered or established the absorbing power of the atmosphere and the propagation of sound by the air; he proved that element to possess much more both of expansibility and of compressibility than had been previously suspected; he made some progress towards ascertaining the weight of atmospheric air; and he showed more clearly than had been done before his time its indispensableness to the sustentation both of combustion and of animal life. He may be regarded, therefore, along with Torricelli, Pascal, and Guericke, as one of the fathers of pneumatic science—in so far at least as it is concerned with the mechanical properties of the atmosphere. Boyle also ascertained many particular facts, and arrived at some general, though rather vague, conclusions, in chemistry, in the course of his multifarious experiments; the practice of applying one chemical agent as a test for detecting the presence of another was first adopted by him; and he exposed the falsehood of the notion then commonly entertained, that whatever could not be destroyed or changed by fire was to be ranked among the elementary constituents of the natural world. In chemical pneumatics, however, little progress was made either by Boyle, or for many years after his day. He conjectured, indeed, that only a portion of the atmosphere was employed in sustaining combustion and animal life; and his fellow-labourer Hooke divined that the element in question is the same with that contained in nitre (namely, what is now called oxygen), and that in combustion it combined with the burning body. But neither of these sagacious conclusions was yet experimentally established.

Robert Hooke, born in 1635, was, till his death in 1702, one of the most devoted cultivators of science in this age. Besides his skill and sagacity as a chemist, he had a remarkable quickness and fertility of mechanical invention, and his speculations ranged over the whole field of natural history and natural philosophy, from the minutest disclosures of the microscope to beyond the farthest sweep of the telescope. His jealous and rapacious temper, and sordid personal habits, which made him an object of general dislike in his own day, have probably somewhat stunted the acknowledgment paid to his merits both by his contemporaries and by posterity; and in fact, of numerous inventions and discoveries to which he himself laid claim, there is scarcely one to which his right has been universally admitted. It is generally allowed, however, that we are indebted to him for the improvement of the pendulum as a measure of time, and for some valuable innovations in the construction of pendulum watches, in particular the application of a spiral spring to regulate the balance. But in his own notion Hooke was the true author of several of the discoveries which have immortalised the greatest of his contemporaries. He disputed partly the originality, partly the truth, of Newton's theory of light; and he even asserted, when the Principia came out, that there was little or nothing there announced on the force and action of gravitation that he had not himself anticipated. He had, indeed, some years before, in a paper printed in the Philosophical Transactions, sketched a hypothesis of the movements of the earth and the other planets on the assumption of the principle of universal gravitation;* but this was a very different thing from the demonstration of the system of the world by Newton on the establishment and accurate measurement of that force. Newton himself eventually admitted that his proposition of the gravitation of the planets being as the inverse square of the distance had been previously deduced from Kepler's discovery of their elliptical orbits by Hooke, as well as by Wren and Halley; but this concession is supposed to have been made rather for the sake of peace than from conviction.

The first president of the Royal Society, William Brouncker, Lord Viscount Brouncker (of the kingdom of Ireland), who was born in 1620 and died in 1684, was an able mathematician, and is known as the author of the first series invented for the quadrature of the hyperbola, and also as the first writer who noticed what are called continued fractions in arithmetic. Dr. John Wallis (b. 1616, d. 1703) is the author of many works of great learning, ingenuity, and profoundness on algebra, geometry, and mechanical philosophy. Among the practical subjects to which he devoted himself were the deciphering of secret writing, and the teaching of persons born deaf to speak. "I was informed," says Sorbriere, "that Dr. Wallis had brought a person that was born deaf and dumb to read at Oxford, by teaching him several inflexions fitted to the organs of his voice, to make it articulate."* The French traveller afterwards went to Oxford, and saw and conversed with Wallis (who held the office of Savilian professor of geometry in the university), although he complains that the professor and all the other learned Englishmen he met with spoke Latin, which was his medium of communication with them, with such an accent and way of pronunciation that they were very hard to be understood. † However, he adds that he was much edified, notwithstanding, by Wallis's conversation; and was mightily pleased both with the experiments he saw made by him in teaching the deaf to read, and with the model of a floor he had invented "that could bear a great weight, and make a very large hall, though it consisted only of several short pieces of timber joined together, without any mortices, nails, and pins, or any other support than what they gave one another; for the weight they bear closes them so together as if they were but one board, and the floor all of a piece." He gives a diagram of this ingenious floor; "and indeed," he continues, "I made Mr. Hobbes himself even admire it, though he is at no good terms with Dr. Wallis, and has no reason to love him." ‡ We have already mentioned the hot war, about what might seem the least heating of all subjects, that was carried on for some years between Wallis and Hobbes. A curious account is afterwards given of Wallis's personal appearance:—"The doctor," says our traveller, "has less in him of the gallant man than Mr. Hobbes; and, if you should see him with his university cap on his head, as if he had a porte-feuille on, covered with black cloth and sewed to his calot, you would be as much inclined to laugh at this diverting sight as you would be ready to entertain the excellency and civility of my friend [Hobbes] with esteem and affection." And then the coxcomb adds—"What I have said concerning Dr. Wallis is not intended in the least to derogate from the praises due to one of the greatest mathematicians in the world; and who, being yet no more than forty years of age [he was forty-seven], may advance his studies much farther, and become polite, if purified by the air of the court at London; for I must tell you, sir, that that of the university stands in need of it, and that those who are not purified otherways have naturally strong breaths that are noxious in conversation."* It may be doubtful whether these last expressions are to be understood literally, or in some metaphorical sense; for it is not obvious how the air of a court, though it may polish a man's address, is actually to sweeten a bad breath. Dr. Wallis, besides his publication of the papers of Horrocks already noticed, edited several of the works of Archimedes, Ptolemy, and other ancient mathematicians; and he is also the author of a grammar of the English tongue, written in Latin, which abounds in curious and valuable matter.

* Phil. Trans., No. 101 (for April 1674).

Another ingenious, though somewhat fanciful mathematician of this day, was Dr. John Wilkins, who was made Bishop of Chester some years after the Restoration, although during the interregnum he had married a sister of Oliver Cromwell, as Archbishop Tillotson had a niece in the reign of Charles I. Dr. Wilkins is chiefly remembered for his "Discovery of a New World," published in 1638, in which he attempts to prove the practicability of a passage to the moon; and his "Essay towards a Real Character," being a scheme of a universal language, which he gave to the world thirty years later. He is also the author of various theological works. Of the high mathematical merits of Dr. Isaac Barrow and Sir Christopher Wren, who have both earned their chief renown in other departments, we have already spoken elsewhere. † Barrow's Lectiones Opticæ, published in 1669, and his Lectiones Geometricæ, 1670, contain his principal contributions to mathematical science. The former advanced the science of optics to the point at which it was taken up by Newton: the latter promulgated a partial anticipation of Newton's differential calculus—what is known by the name of the method of tangents,—and was the simplest and most elegant form to which the principle of fluxions had been reduced previous to the system of Leibnitz. Barrow's Mathematicæ Lectiones, not published till after his death, which took place in 1677, at the early age of forty-seven, are also celebrated for their learning and profoundness. Wren's most important paper in the Philosophical Transactions is one on the laws of the collision of bodies, read before the Royal Society in December, 1668. ‡ It is remarkable that this subject, which had been recommended by the society to the attention of its members, was at the same time completely elucidated by three individuals working without communication with each other:—by Wren in this paper; by Wallis in another, read the preceding month; and by the celebrated Huygens (who had been elected

* Journey to England, p. 28.

† In this matter, "we do," says Spratt, in his answer, "as all our neighbours besides: we speak the ancient Latin after the same way that we pronounce our mother tongue; so the Germans do, so the Italians, so the French," p. 159.

‡ Journey to England, p. 39.

* Journey to England, p. 41.

† See Vol. III. p. 681; and ante, p. 728.

‡ In No. 48, p. 867.

a fellow of the society soon after its establishment), in a third read in January, 1669.

A greater glory is shed over this than over any other age in the history of the higher sciences by the discoveries of Sir Isaac Newton, the most penetrating and comprehensive intellect which has ever been exerted in that field of speculation. The era of Newton extends to the year 1727, when he died at the age of eighty-five. What he did for science almost justifies the poetical comparison of his appearance among men to the first dispersion of the primeval darkness at the creation of the material world: "God said, Let Newton be, and there was light." While yet in earliest manhood, he had not only outstripped and left far behind him the ablest mathematicians and analytic investigators of the day, but had discovered, it may be said, the whole of his new system of the world, except only that he had not verified some parts of it by the requisite calculations. The year 1664, when he was only twenty-two, is assigned as the date of his discovery of the Binomial Theorem; the year 1665 as that of his invention of fluxions; the year 1666 as that in which he demonstrated the law of gravitation in regard to the movement of the planets around the sun, and was only prevented from extending it to the movement of the moon around the earth, and to that of bodies falling towards the earth, by the apparent refutation of his hypothesis when attempted to be so applied which was occasioned by the erroneous estimate then received of the earth's diameter. He did not attempt to wrest the supposed facts so as to suit his theory; on the contrary, with a singular superiority to the seductions of mere plausibility, he said nothing of his theory to any one, and seems even to have thought no more of it for sixteen years, till, having heard by chance at a meeting of the Royal Society in 1682, of Picard's measurement of an arc of the meridian executed three years before, he thence deduced the true length of the earth's diameter, resumed and finished his long abandoned calculation—not without such emotion as compelled him to call in the assistance of a friend as he discerned the approaching confirmation of what he had formerly anticipated—and the following year transmitted to the Royal Society what afterwards formed the leading propositions of the Principia. That work, containing the complete exposition of the new theory of the universe, was published at London, at the expense of the Royal Society, in 1687. Meanwhile, about the year 1669, he had made his other great discovery of the non-homogeneity of light, and the differing refrangibility of the rays of which it is composed; by these fundamental facts revolutionising the whole science of optics. His Treatise on Optics, in which these discoveries and their consequences were developed, was first published in 1704; and along with it a Latin tract, entitled "De Quadratura Curvarum," containing an exposition of the method of fluxions; of which, however, the Principia had already shown him to be in complete possession twenty years before, and which he had made use of in a paper written, according to his own account, in 1666, and undoubtedly communicated to Dr. Barrow, and by him to Mr. Collins, in 1669. This paper, entitled "Analysis per æquationes numero terminorum infinitas," was published in 1711. The question of the invention of the fluxionary or differential calculus, as is well known, gave occasion to a warm and protracted dispute between the partisans of Newton and those of his illustrious continental contemporary, Leibnitz; but it is now admitted on all hands that, whatever claim Leibnitz also may have to be accounted its independent inventor (and there can scarcely be a doubt that he has a good claim to be so accounted), the honour of the prior invention belongs to Newton.

We must dismiss some other distinguished names with a very brief mention. James Gregory, who died in 1675 at the age of only thirty-six, after having been successively Professor of Mathematics at St. Andrew's and Edinburgh, had in his short life accomplished more than any of his contemporaries except Newton. He is popularly remembered chiefly as the inventor of the first reflecting telescope; but his geometrical and analytical inventions and discoveries were also numerous, and some of them of the highest order of merit. His nephew, David Gregory, Professor of Mathematics at Edinburgh, and afterwards Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford, was also an able mathematician, and published some valuable works on geometry, optics, and astronomy. The Newtonian theory of universal gravitation is said to have been taught by him at Edinburgh before it was introduced into any other European university. It is remarkable that when this David Gregory died, in 1708, he and two of his brothers held professorships in three British universities—himself at Oxford, James at Edinburgh, and Charles at St. Andrew's. The last-mentioned, too, was succeeded, upon his resignation in 1639, by his son, named David. John Collins (b. 1624, d. 1683) is the author of several practical works and of a good many papers in the Philosophical Transactions; but he was most useful in promoting the publication of the works of others: it is said that Wallis's History of Algebra, Barrow's Optical and Geometrical Lectures, and various other publications owed their seeing the light principally to his instigation and encouragement. He also kept up an extensive epistolary intercourse with the other scientific men of the day: it was principally from the letters and papers he left behind him that the Commercium Epistolicum, or volume of correspondence on the invention of fluxions, published in 1712, was made up. "Many of the discoveries in physical knowledge," says Dr. Hutton, "owe their chief improvement to him; for, while he excited some to disclose every new and useful invention, he employed others in improving them. Sometimes he was peculiarly useful by showing where the defect lay in any branch of science, and pointing out the difficulties attending the inquiry; at other times explaining their advantages, and keeping up a spirit and energy for improvement. In short, Mr. Collins was like the register of all the new acquisitions made in the mathematical sciences; the magazine to which the curious had frequent recourse; which acquired him the appellation of the English Mersenne.* Roger Cotes died in 1716, at the age of thirty-four, after having, in the estimation of his contemporaries, given promise of becoming one of the greatest mathematicians that had ever existed: Newton himself is reported to have said, † If Cotes had lived we should have known something." Cotes's mathematical papers were published, in 1722, under the title of "Harmonia Mensurarum," by his cousin Dr. Robert Smith (author of a work on optics), and his Hydrostatical and Pneumatics Lectures in 1733 by the same editor. Of all the publications that appeared in the early stages of the fluxionary calculus, Professor Playfair conceives that none is more entitled to notice than the "Harmonia Mensurarum" of Cotes. In this work, he observes, a method of reducing the areas of curves, in cases not admitting of an accurate comparison with rectilinear spaces, to those of the circle and hyperbola, which Newton had exemplified in his Quadratura Curvarum, was extended by Cotes, who also "gave the rules for finding the fluents of fractional expressions, whether rational or irrational, greatly generalised and highly improved by means of a property of the circle discovered by himself, and justly reckoned among the most remarkable propositions in geometry." ‡ Another eminent authority describes the "Harmonia" as "the earliest work in which decided progress was made in the application of logarithms, and of the properties of the circle, to the calculus of fluents." § Cotes superintended the printing of the second edition of Newton's Principia, published in 1713, and prefixed to it a preface which immediately acquired for him a wide scientific reputation. The last of these early English cultivators of the new calculus whom we shall mention is Dr. Brook Taylor, a geometrician and analyst of great profundity and originality, whose Methodus Incrementorum, published in 1715, is characterised by Playfair as having "added a new branch to the analysis of variable quantity." "A single analytical formula," Playfair adds, "in the Method of Increments, has conferred a celebrity on its author which the most voluminous works have not often been able to bestow. It is known by the name of Taylor's Theorem, and expresses the value of any function of a variable quantity in terms of the successive orders of increments, whether finite or infinitely small. If any one proposition can be said to comprehend in it a whole science, it is this: for from it almost every truth and every method of the new analysis may be deduced. It is difficult to say whether the theorem does most credit to the genius of the author, or the power of the language which is capable of concentrating such a vast body of knowledge in a single expression."* Taylor's Theorem has since its first announcement been, in the language of the late Professor Leslie, "successively modified, transformed, and extended by Maclaurin, Lagrange, and Laplace, whose names are attached to their respective formulae." †

The example and discoveries of Newton, and especially the publication of the Principia, had before the end of the seventeenth century given a new direction and character to scientific speculation, and even to what was generally understood by the term science, in England. The day of little more than mere virtuosity, in which the Royal Society had taken its rise and commenced its operations, had given place to that of pure science in its highest forms and most lofty and extensive applications. Next to the development and application of the fluxionary calculus, the field in which, as might have been expected, the impulse given by Newton produced the most brilliant results, was that of astronomy. The Royal Observatory at Greenwich was founded by Charles II., for the benefit of astronomy and navigation, in 1676; and the appointment of Astronomer Royal (or Astronomical Observer, in the official style) bestowed upon John Flamsteed, then about thirty years of age, and already distinguished as a cultivator of astronomical science. Flamsteed held this office till his death in 1719; and during that space of time made and published a voluminous series of observations, from the commencement of which his late biographer, Mr. Baily, dates the commencement of modern astronomy. "Nor," observes another writer, to whose masterly contributions to the history of the mathematical sciences we have been repeatedly indebted in the preceding pages, "can such chronology be disputed, if we consider that we now return to Flamsteed's observations as the earliest with which it is desirable to compare those of our day, and also that Flamsteed's Catalogue is the first which attained a precision comparable to that of later times." ‡ What is here alluded to is a catalogue of above 3300 stars, "whose places," as has been remarked, "were more accurate than any determined in the next fifty years, and whose selection and nomenclature have served as basis to every catalogue since that time." § A portion of this Catalogue was first published without Flamsteed's consent in 1712, by a committee appointed by the government, of which Newton, Wren, and Gregory were members, and under the immediate superintendence of Halley, by whose name the work, entitled "Historiæ Cœlestis Libri Duo," is commonly known. Flamsteed considered himself, and ap-

* Dissertation, p. 532.

† Dissertation on the Progress of the Math. and Phys. Sciences in the Eighteenth Century, in Encyclopædia Britannica, p. 599.

‡ Article on Flamsteed, in Penny Cyclopædia, v. 296.

§ Article on Greenwich Observatory, in Penny Cyclopædia, xi. 441.

* Abridg. of Phil. Trans., i. 338.

† Dissertation on Progress of Math. and Phys. Science, p. 531.

‡ Article on Cotes in Penny Cyclopædia, viii. 67.

THE ROYAL OBSERVATORY, GREENWICH.

parently with good reason, to have been very ill-used in this transaction;* and, having at last succeeded in recovering from the government all the copies of Halley's book that remained unsold, he committed them to the flames, with the exception of a portion of the sheets, out of which he formed part of the first volume of a new work, with the title of the "Historia Cœlestis Britannica," the printing of which, however (in three volumes folio), was not completed till 1725, six years after the author's death. It was carried through the press by his widow, with the aid of his assistants Mr. Crosthwait and Mr. Abraham Sharp, the latter of whom had attained great distinction as an accurate observer. This work is characterised by the writer of the article on Flamsteed in the Penny Cyclopædia as occupying the same place in practical astronomy which the Principia of Newton holds in the theoretical part. It was to Flamsteed that Newton (who afterwards quarrelled with his old friend, and abused him in no measured terms, on the misunderstanding that arose about the first publication of his catalogue) was indebted for all the observations of the moon which he made use of in the illustration and verification of his lunar theory. "The first edition of Newton's Principia," to quote again the publication just referred to, "had appeared shortly before Flamsteed had supplied himself with his best instruments; and at Newton's request many of Flamsteed's observations of the moon, reduced as well as was then practicable, were communicated to him to aid in perfecting the theory deduced from the principle of universal gravitation. The time at which these observations were made was in fact a most critical one—when the most accurate observations that had been made were needed for the support of the most extensive philosophical theory that man had invented."⁶

The successor of Flamsteed, as astronomer royal, was Edmund Halley, who was then in his sixty-fourth year, and who held the appointment till his death in 1742, at the age of eighty-six. "Among the Englishmen of his day," says the writer of his life in the Penny Cyclopædia, "Halley stands second only to Newton, and probably for many years after the publication of the Principia, he was the only one who both could and would rightly appreciate the character and coming utility of that memorable work. His own attention was too much divided to permit of his being the mathematician which he might have been; but nevertheless his papers on pure mathematics show a genius of the same order of power, though of much less fertility, with that of John Bernouilli."[†] Besides numerous papers in the Philosophical Transactions, Halley is the author of a Catalogue of the Southern Stars (Catalogue Stellarum Australium, sive Supplementum Catalogi Tycho-nici) published in 1679, being the result of his observations made at St. Helena, where he had resided the two preceding

* See the particulars as for the first time brought to light by Mr. Francis Baily in his new edition of "The British Catalogue of Stars, corrected and enlarged," with an account of the life of Flamsteed prefixed. Lond. 1835.

⁶ Article on Greenwich Observatory, in Penny Cyclopædia, xi. 441.
[†] Penny Cyclopædia, xii. 21.

years; and of editions of the treatise of Apollonius De Rationis Sectione (from the Arabic), and of the same ancient geometrician's Conic Sections (partly from the Arabic), the former of which was published at Oxford in 1706, the latter in 1710. Halley did not himself understand Arabic, but he was able both to restore what was lost in these works, and in many cases to suggest the true meaning and emendation of the text where it was corrupted, merely by his geometrical ingenuity and profound knowledge of their subjects. Besides other astronomical labours, Halley is famous for having been the first person to predict the return of a comet, that known by his name, which he first saw at Paris in December 1680, and which actually reappeared, as he had calculated that it would, in 1758 and 1835. He also suggested the observation of the transit of Venus with the view of determining the sun's parallax, which was accomplished at St. Helena, by Dr. Maskelyne, in 1761. Out of the province of astronomy he contributed to the progress of science by his construction of the first tables of mortality (from observations made at Breslau), by his improvements in the diving-bell, and by his speculations on the variation of the compass, the theory of the trade winds, and other subjects.

The third astronomer royal was James Bradley — "the first, perhaps, of all astronomers," as he is called by the writer of his life in the Penny Cyclopædia, "in the union of theoretical sagacity with practical excellence." Bradley, who was born in 1693, had already in 1728 made his great discovery of the aberration of light, or the apparent alteration in the place of a star arising in part from the motion of light, in part from the change of position in the spectator occasioned by the motion of the earth; "the greatest discovery," says the writer just quoted, "of a man who has, more than any other, contributed to render a single observation of a star correct enough for the purposes of astronomy," and "the first positively direct and unanswerable proof of the earth's motion."* Bradley, whom Newton had declared the best astronomer in Europe, held the office of astronomer royal from 1742 till his death in 1762. Besides an immense mass of observations of unprecedented accuracy (which have been published by the University of Oxford in two volumes, 1798—1805), he made in 1747 his second great discovery of the nutation of the earth's axis, that is, of the fact that the curve in which the pole of the equator moves round the pole of the ecliptic is not that of a plain but of a waving or tremulous circle, somewhat like the rim of a milled coin. One of the subjects that occupied the attention of this last of the astronomers royal of the present period was the introduction of the new style which was effected by act of parliament in 1751. "Bradley," says his biographer in the Penny Cyclopædia, "appears to have had some share in drawing up the necessary tables, as well as in aiding Lord Macclesfield, his early friend, and the seconder of the measure in the House of Lords, and Mr. Pelham, then minister, with his advice on the subject. But this procured him some unpopularity, for the common people of all ranks imagined that the alteration was equivalent to robbing them of eleven days of their natural lives, and called Bradley's subsequent illness and decline a judgment of heaven." "This," adds the learned writer, "was, as far as we know, the last expiring manifestation of a belief in the wickedness of altering the time of religious anniversaries, which had disturbed the world more or less, and at different periods, for fourteen hundred years."† But, if the people believed that the change of style had actually shortened their lives, they had more serious cause for alarm than the zealots of orthodoxy in former times, who made themselves unhappy about the notion of merely celebrating Easter on the wrong day.

In the earlier part of the eighteenth century, we ought not to omit to mention, was invented the ingenious and valuable instrument called Hadley's Quadrant (since improved into a sextant, and still more recently into an entire circle), either by John Hadley, who was a fellow of the Royal Society, and who gave an account of it in the Philosophical Transactions for 1731, or by Thomas Godfrey, a glazier in Philadelphia, who is generally believed to have been in possession of it a year before the date of Hadley's communication. But it appears that a similar instrument had been described to Dr. Halley by Newton, some time before his death in 1727. And the close of the period under review is also marked in the history of optics and astronomical observation by the important correction of the Newtonian views as to the dispersion of refracted light, of which the honour belongs to John Dollond, and by the invention of the Achromatic Telescope, with which that sagacious and philosophical experimentalist followed up his discovery. Dollond's account of his "Experiments concerning the different refrangibility of light" appeared in the Philosophical Transactions in 1758; and his achromatic object-glass was contrived the same year.

Of a few other distinguished British mathematicians belonging to the later portion of the present period the most eminent was Colin Maclaurin, the successor of James Gregory in the mathematical chair at Edinburgh, who was born in 1698, and died in 1746. Maclaurin's principal works are his Geometria Organica (a treatise on curves), published in 1720; his admirable Treatise of Fluxions, 1742; and his Treatise on Algebra 1748. Another very able performance printed after his death, is his Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries, which also appeared at London in 1748. All Maclaurin's works are distinguished by profoundness and solidity united with elegance, and often by originality in the method of exposition, or novelty in the application of principles. His countryman and contemporary, Dr. Robert Simpson, professor of mathematics at Glasgow (b. 1687, d. 1768), was also a most learned and able geometrician: he is the author of a restoration of the "Locī" of Apollonius, and of an English translation of Euclid, which continued down to our own day in common use as an elementary book both in Scotland and England. Along with these may be mentioned James Stirling, the author of a Latin treatise published in 1717, on what are called lines of the third order, and a treatise on fluxions, entitled Methodus Differentialis, 1730. William Emerson, a mathematician and mechanist of great talent, is the author of a series of works, on fluxions, trigonometry, mechanics, navigation, algebra, optics, astronomy, geography, dialing, &c., which, however, were only in part published within the present period—for his death did not take place till 1782, when he had reached his eighty-first year. His manner of writing is singularly uncouth; but his works often exhibit much scientific elegance, as well as considerable invention. Another author of a remarkable series of mathematical works, of this date, is the self-taught genius, Thomas Simpson, who was born at Market Bosworth, in the humblest rank of life, in 1710, worked at his trade of a weaver till he was seven-and-twenty, and then suddenly came forth as one of the most acute and well-furnished mathematical writers of the day. A Treatise on Fluxions, another on the Nature and Laws of Chance, a quarto volume of Essays on subjects in speculative and mixed mathematics, a work on the doctrine of Annuities and Reversion, a second volume of Mathematical Dissertations, a treatise on Algebra, another on Elementary Geometry, another on Trigonometry, plane and spherical, a new work on the doctrine and application of Fluxions, a volume of Exercises for young proficient in Mathematics, and a volume of Miscellaneous Tracts, were all produced by Simpson in the twenty years between 1737 and 1757. And he also furnished several papers to the Philosophical Transactions, and edited for some years the mathematical annual called The Ladies' Diary. He died in 1761. In the same year with Simpson was born in Banffshire, in Scotland, James Ferguson, who was the son of a day-labourer, and who taught himself the elements of mechanics and astronomy while employed as a farmer's boy in tending sheep. Ferguson published his first performance, his Dissertation on the Phenomena of the Harvest Moon, in 1747; his Astronomy in 1756; his Lectures on Mechanics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, and Optics, in 1760; and two or three other works between that date and his death in 1776. "Ferguson," it has been observed, "has contributed more than perhaps any other man in this country to the extension of physical science among all classes of society, but especially among that largest class whose circumstances preclude them from a regular course of scientific instruction. Perspicuity in the selection and arrangement of his facts, and in the display of the truths deduced from them, was his characteristic both as a lecturer and a writer."*

* Penny Cyclopædia, v. 321.

† Penny Cyclopædia, v. 321.

Another department of natural philosophy in which some splendid results were obtained by English experimenters before the close of the present period was that of electricity. Francis Hawksbee, who was admitted a fellow of the Royal Society in 1705, published several papers in the Transactions between that year and 1711, giving an account of a series of experiments, partly performed with a glass globe, in the course of which he noticed a number of facts connected with electrical attraction and repulsion, and in particular detected for the first time the remarkable phenomenon of the production of light by friction. A few years later the subject was taken up by Stephen Gray, a pensioner of the Charter House, who, with the aid of a very poor apparatus, made out a catalogue, which he published in 1720, of bodies which show electricity on being rubbed, and in 1732 discovered the conducting property inherent in bodies that are not electrical. The two opposite kinds, or exhibitions, of electricity (which he called the vitreous and the resinous) were discovered by Dufay, keeper of the King's Garden at Paris, before 1739; and he also showed that bodies similarly electrified repel, and those dissimilarly electrified attract, each other. The mode of accumulating the electric power by what is called the Leyden phial, or jar, was discovered by Cuneus and Lallemand in 1745. This experiment immediately attracted universal attention: Nollet in France, and Watson in England, in particular, applied themselves to find out the explanation of it; and the latter is asserted to have first conceived the hypothesis of the redundancy of the electricity on the one side of the jar and its deficiency on the other. The same view occurred to the celebrated Benjamin Franklin, in America, who expounded it in a series of letters written to his friend Collinson, in London, in the course of the year 1747, in which he described the overcharged side of the jar as in a state of positive, and the undercharged of negative, electricity, and showed how all the known phenomena of electric action were to be accounted for on this hypothesis of only one kind of electric matter, or power, in opposite states. Franklin seems to have known little or nothing of what had been done by his predecessors either in France or England; of the theories, at least, either of Dufay or Watson, he appears never to have heard. Although not the first in the field, his penetrating and inventive genius immediately raised him to the first place among the cultivators of the new science. He soon improved the Leyden jar into the much more powerful apparatus of the electrical battery. Some of his earliest experiments had taught him the superior efficiency of sharp points both in attracting and giving out the electric matter; from the year 1749 he had inferred from a great number of facts which he had observed and collected the probable identity of electricity and lightning; and at last, in June 1752, he established that truth by the decisive experiment of actually drawing down the electric matter from the clouds. This was followed by his invention of lightning-conductors, of which, however, none were erected in England, till the year 1762.

* Fenny Cyclopædia, x. 224.

The thermometer was invented at Florence soon after the middle of the seventeenth century, and by the assistance of that instrument, as manufactured by Fahrenheit and Reaumur, a considerable number of facts relating to the laws of heat had been gradually collected before the middle of the eighteenth. "The most judicious writer," says Professor Leslie, "that had yet appeared on the subject of heat, was Dr. Martine, of St. Andrew's, who studied medicine on the continent, and, like the accomplished physicians of that period, cultivated learning and general science. His acute Essays, published in the years 1739 and 1740, not only corrected the different thermometric scales, but enriched philosophy by several well devised and original experiments. Unfortunately the career of this promising genius was very short. Having in the pursuit of his profession accompanied Admiral Vernon in the fatal expedition against Carthage, he perished by a malignant fever."* Mr. Leslie adds that, if Martine's investigations had been steadily prosecuted, they must have led to interesting results. About the year 1750 Dr. Cullen had his attention accidentally drawn to some facts connected with the curious subject of the production of cold by evaporation; but he did not pursue the inquiry. The investigations of his pupil, the celebrated Dr. Joseph Black, which resulted in his great discovery of what he called latent heat, were not completed till after the expiration of the present period.

In general chemistry the experiments begun by Boyle and Hooke had been followed up by their contemporary Dr. John Mayow, a physician of Oxford, whose tracts, written in Latin, on nitre and other connected subjects, were published in 1674. They announced many new and important facts illustrative of the phenomena of respiration and combustion. About the beginning of the next century the first general theory of combustion was given to the world by the German chemist Stahl—that which, under the name of the Stahlian or Phlogistic theory (from his imaginary phlogiston, or principle of inflammability), continued to be generally received down to the era of Black, Cavendish, and Priestly. Some considerable additions were made to our knowledge of æriform bodies by Dr. Stephen Hales about a quarter of a century after this. But the most important chemical discovery that belongs to the present period is that of the new air discovered by Black in the commencement of his career, and announced in his "Experiments on Magnesia, Quicklime, and other Alkaline Substances," published in 1755. Fixed air, or, as it is now called, carbonic acid, had indeed been long before recognised as something distinct from common air by Van Helmont; but his notice of it appears to have been quite forgotten, when it was again detected by Black, who also first examined it with any degree of care, and ascertained its most remarkable properties.

In the English medical science of the latter part of the seventeenth century the most distinguished name is that of Dr. Thomas Sydenham (b. 1624, d. 1689). Discarding mere theory, Sydenham applied himself to the careful observation of nature and facts; and his practice and writings are considered as marking an era in the history of the healing art. After his time little innovation was made among British practitioners, either in the treatment or doctrine of diseases, till the era of Cullen and Brown, which properly did not commence till after the date to which our present survey is limited. Anatomical science from the middle of the seventeenth to the middle of the eighteenth century was principally advanced by Malpighi, Steno, Ruysch, Duverney, Morgagni, Albinus, Haller, and other Italian, French, and German physicians; but some new facts were also contributed by Humphrey Ridley, the author of a work on the Brain, published in 1695; by William Cowper, whose Anatomical Tables, published in 1698, however, are asserted to have been stolen from the Dutch anatomist Bidloo; by the eldest Alexander Monro, the author of the Osteology, first published in 1726, and the founder of the medical school of Edinburgh; and by the celebrated William Cheselden, author of the Osteography, published in 1733, and of various other works, and the most expert English operator of his day. To these names ought to be added that of Stephen Hales, already mentioned, whose "Vegetable Statics," published in 1727, and "Hæmastatics," published in 1733, carried both vegetable and animal physiology considerably farther than any preceding work either English or foreign. Something was also done in the new sciences (if they were yet entitled to be so called) of zoology and comparative anatomy, by Nehemiah Grew, Edward Tyson, Samuel Collins, and other early members of the Royal Society. Grew is likewise one of the fathers of modern botany; but that science was indebted for altogether a new form to the famous John Ray, whose various works were published between 1670 and his death, in 1705. "Botany," says a late writer, in noticing the merits of Ray, "he found was fast settling back into the chaos of the middle ages, partly beneath the weight of undigested materials, but more from the want of some fixed principles by which the knowledge of the day should be methodised. Profiting by the discoveries of Grew and the other vegetable anatomists, to which he added a great store of original observations, he, in his "Historia Plantarum," the first volume of which appeared in 1686, embodied in one connected series all the facts that had been collected concerning the structure and functions of plants: to these he added an exposition of what he considered the philosophy of classification, as indicated partly by human reason, and partly by experience; and from the whole he deduced a classification which is unquestionably the basis of that which, under the name of the system of Jussieu, is everywhere recognised at the present day."* Ray's views, however, were encountered even in his own day by the artificial system of the French botanist Tournefort; and before the close of the present period the science was again revolutionised by the genius of the great Linnæus. The Botanical, or Physic Garden, as it was called, at Oxford, we may here mention, had been founded and endowed by Henry Danvers, Earl of Danby, in 1632. Ornithology and ichthyology may almost be said to owe their beginning, at least in this country, to Ray's friend, Francis Willughby. Willughby died, at the age of thirty-seven, in 1672, but his works on these subjects—his "Ornithologiæ Libri Tres," and his "Historia Piscium,"—were some years after published under the superintendence of Ray; indeed, of the latter, which did not appear till 1686, Ray was half the author as well as the editor. A similar service was performed to conchology by the magnificent "Historia Conchyliorum" of Dr. Martin Lister, the first part of which appeared in 1685, the fifth and last in 1693. Finally, in geology, while some progress was made in the collecting and even in the arranging of facts by Ray, Dr. John Woodward, and others, and a few elementary general principles or natural laws of the science were beginning to be perceived, a host of speculators, headed by the eloquent Thomas Burnet and the eccentric William Whiston, both men of genius and learning, but of more fancy than either judgment or knowledge of the subjects which in this instance they undertook to discuss, had already in the last years of the seventeenth and the first of the eighteenth century produced many theories of the earth, which explained not only its structure, but its origin and its destiny—in other words, its whole history, past, present, and future, as well as such a task could be accomplished by the imagination working without materials, and without the aid of any other faculty.

* Dissertation Fourth, in Encyc. Brit., p. 642.

* Penny Cyclopædia, v. 248.

BOTANICAL GARDEN AT OXFORD.

The Revolution, brought on by some of the same causes that had given birth to the Commonwealth, and restoring something of the same spirit and condition of things, came like another night-fall upon our higher Literature, extinguishing whatever was poetical in the land still more completely than even that previous triumph of the popular principle. Up to this date English literature had grown and flourished chiefly in the sunshine of court protection and favour; the public appreciation and sympathy were not yet sufficiently extended to afford it the necessary warmth and shelter. Consequently its spirit and affections were in the main courtly; it drooped and withered when the encouragement of the court was withdrawn, from the deprivation both of its customary support and sustenance and of its chief inspiration—of that in which it lived and moved and had its whole being. And, if the decay of this kind of light at the Revolution was still more complete than that which followed upon the setting up of the Commonwealth, the difference seems to have been mainly owing to there having been less of it to destroy at the one epoch than at the other. It might have been expected, perhaps, that triumphant puritanism and republicanism would have been both more conservative and more productive of the poetical spirit than mere Whiggism and Church-of-Englandism when they got into the ascendant; but in point of fact it does not appear to have so turned out: of the few poets and other writers of an imaginative or original cast of mind that belong to the space between the abolition of the monarchy and the Restoration, Milton is almost the only republican name;* and even of his poetry the spirit can hardly be said to be either republican or puritanical. But the impulse given by the great poets of the age of Elizabeth and James was yet operating, without the interruption of any foreign influence, upon the language and the national mind; and, doubtless, whatever we may think of the literary tendencies of puritanism and republicanism, the nurture both for head and heart furnished by the ten years of high deeds, and higher speculations and hopes, that ushered in the Commonwealth, must have been of a far other kind than any that was to be got out of the thirty years, or thereby, of laxity, frivolity, denationalization, and insincerity of all sorts, down the comparatively smooth stream of which men slid, without effort and without thought, to the Revolution. No wonder that some powerful minds were trained by the former, and almost none by the latter.

With the exception of some two or three names, none of them of the highest class, to be presently mentioned, almost the only writers that shed any lustre on the first reign after the Revolution are those of a few of the survivors of the preceding period. Dryden, fallen on what to him were evil days and evil tongues, and forced in his old age to write for bread with less rest for his wearied head and hand than they had ever had before, now produced some of his most laborious and also some of his happiest works—his translation of Virgil, among others, his Fables, and his Alexander's Feast. Lee, the dramatic poet, discharged from Bedlam, finished two more tragedies, his Princess of Cleve and his Massacre of Paris, before "returning one night from the Bear and Harrow, in Butcher-row, through Clare-market, to his lodgings in Duke-street, overladen with wine, he fell down on the ground as some say, according to others on a bulk, and was killed or stifled in the snow," some time in the year 1691 or 1692.† The comic Etheridge also outlived the deposition of his patron James II., but is not known to have written anything after that event; he followed James to France, and is reported to have died characteristically at Ratisbon a year or two after: "having treated some company with a liberal entertainment at his house there, where he had taken his glass too freely, and being, through his great complaisance, too forward in waiting on his guests at their departure, flushed as he was, he tumbled down stairs and broke his neck, and so fell a martyr to jollity and civility." Wycherley, who, at the date of the Revolution, was under fifty, lived to become the correspondent of Pope, and even saw out the reign of Anne; but he produced nothing in that of William, although he published a volume of poems in 1704, and left some other trifles behind him, which were printed long afterwards by Theobald. Southern, indeed, who survived till 1746, continued to write and publish till within twenty years of his death; his two best dramas, his Fatal Marriage and his Oroonoko, were both produced in the reign of William. Southern was fortunate in a genius not above the appreciation of the age he lived in: "Dryden once took occasion to ask him how much he got by one of his plays; to which he answered that he was really ashamed to inform him. But, Mr. Dryden being a little importunate to know, he plainly told him that by his last play he cleared seven hundred pounds, which appeared astonishing to Dryden, as he himself had never been able to acquire more than one hundred by his most successful pieces."† Southern, who, although no great poet, was not, we may gather from this anecdote, without some conscience and modesty, had worse writers than himself to keep him in countenance by their preposterous prosperity, in this lucky time for mediocrity and dulness:—Shadwell was King William's first poet-laureate, and Nahum Tate his next. Tate, indeed, and his friend Dr. Nicholas Brady were among the most flourishing authors and greatest public favourites of this reign; it was now that they perpetrated in concert their version, or perversion, of the Psalms, with which we are still afflicted. Brady also published a play, and, at a later date, some volumes of sermons and a translation of the Æneid, which, fortunately not having been imposed or recommended by authority, are all among the most forgotten of books. Elkanah Settle, too, was provided for as city poet. Among writers of another class, perhaps the most eminent, who, having been distinguished before the Revolution, survived and continued to write after that event, was Sir William Temple. His Miscellanies, by which he is principally known, though partly composed before, were not published till then. John Evelyn, who, however, although a very miscellaneous as well as voluminous writer, has hardly left any work that is held in esteem for either style or thought, or for anything save what it may contain of positive information or mere matter of fact, also published one or two books in the reign of William, which he saw to an end, for he died, at the age of eighty-five, in 1706. Bishop Stillingfleet, who had been known as an author since before the Restoration, for his Irenicum appeared in 1659, when he was

* See Vol. iii. p. 872.

† MS. Note by Oldys, quoted in Biog. Dram.

 Biog. Dram. on authority of Biog. Britan.

† Id.

only in his twenty-fourth year, and who had kept the press in employment by a rapid succession of publications during the next five-and-twenty years, resumed his pen after the Revolution, which raised him to the bench, to engage in a controversy with Locke about some of the principles of his famous Essay; but, whether it was that years had abated his powers, or that he had a worse cause to defend, or merely that the public taste was changed, he gained much less applause for his dialectic skill on this than on most former occasions. Stillingfleet lived to the year 1699. Two other eminent theological writers of this reign, Cumberland and Bull, who both eventually became bishops, had also first acquired distinction in the preceding period. Cumberland's principal work is his Latin treatise De Legibus Naturæ, an attack of considerable acuteness on the philosophy of Hobbes; Bull, who is also the author of some sermons in English, is most celebrated for his Harmonia Apostolica, directed against Calvinism, 1669; his Defensio Fidei Nicænæ, 1685; and his Judicium Ecclesiæ Catholicæ, 1694; all in Latin. John Norris, also, one of the last of the school of English Platonists which may be considered as having been founded in the latter part of the seventeenth century by Cudworth and Henry More, had, we believe, become first known as a writer some years before the Revolution; but the greater number of his publications first appeared in the reign of William, and he may be reckoned one of the best writers properly or principally belonging to that reign. Yet he is not for a moment to be compared for learning, compass of thought, or power and skill of expression, to either Cudworth or More. Norris's principal work is his Essay on the Ideal World, published in two parts in 1701 and 1702. He is also the author of a volume of religious poetry, of rather a feeble character, which has been often reprinted. Bishop Spratt, though a clergyman, and a writer both of prose and verse, cannot be called a divine; he had in earlier life the reputation of being the finest writer of the day, but, although he lived till very nearly the end of the reign of Anne, he published nothing, we believe, after the Revolution, nor indeed for a good many years before it. His style, which was so much admired in his own age, is a Frenchified English, with an air of ease and occasionally of vivacity, but without any true grace or expressiveness. Good old Richard Baxter, who had been filling the world with books for half a century, just lived to see the Revolution. He died, at the age of seventy-six, in the beginning of December, 1691. And in the end of the same month died, a somewhat younger man, Robert Boyle, another of the most voluminous writers of the preceding period, and famous also for his services in the cause of religion, as well as of science. In the preceding May, at a still less advanced age, had died the most eminent Scotch writer of the period between the Restoration and the Revolution, Sir George Mackenzie, formerly lord-advocate, both under Charles II. and his successor; the author of the "Institutions of the Laws of Scotland," and many other professional, historical, and antiquarian works, but the master also of a flowing pen in moral speculation, the belles lettres, and even in the department of fancy and fiction—as may be gathered from the titles of his Arctina or the Serious Romance, 1660; Religio Stoici, or the Virtuoso, 1663; Solitude preferred to Public Employment, 1665; Moral Gallantry, 1667. Mackenzie may be regarded as the first successor of his countryman, Drummond of Hawthornden, in the cultivation of an English style; he was the correspondent of Dryden and other distinguished English writers of his day; but he has no pretensions of his own to any high rank either for the graces of expression or the value of his matter. Whatever may have been his professional learning, too, his historical disquisitions are as jejune and uncritical as his attempts at fine writing are, with all their elaboration, at once pedantic and clownish. He has nothing either of the poetry or the elegance of Drummond.

The most active and conspicuous undoubtedly of the prose writers, who, having acquired distinction in the preceding period, continued to prosecute the business of authorship after the Revolution, was the celebrated Dr. Gilbert Burnet, now Bishop of Salisbury. Of 145 distinct publications (many of them, however, only single sermons and other short pamphlets), which are enumerated as having proceeded from his incessant pen between 1669 and his death, at the age of seventy-two, in 1715 (including, indeed, his History of his Own Time, and his Thoughts on Education, which did not appear till after his death), we find that 71 (namely, 21 historical works and 50 sermons and tracts) belong to the period before the Revolution; 36 (namely, 5 historical works and 31 sermons and tracts) to the reign of William; and the remaining 38 (namely, one historical work and 37 pamphlets) to a later date.* Many of what we have called historical works, however, are mere pamphlets: in fact Burnet's literary performances of any considerable extent are only three in number:—his Memoirs of James and William, Dukes of Hamilton, published, in one volume folio, in 1676; his History of the Reformation of the Church of England, 3 volumes folio, 1679, 1681, and 1714; and his History of his Own Time, in two volumes folio, published after his death in 1723 and 1734. There is enough of literary labour, as well as of historical value, in these works to preserve to the author a very honourable name; each of them contains much matter now nowhere else to be found, and they must always continue to rank among the original sources of our national history, both ecclesiastical and civil. In regard to their execution, too, it must be admitted that the style is at least straight-forward and unaffected, and generally as unambiguous as it is unambitious; the facts are clearly enough arranged; and the story is told not only intelligibly, but for the most part in rather a lively and interesting way. On the other hand, to any high station as a writer Burnet can make no claim; he is an industrious collector of intelligence, and a loquacious and moderately lively gossip; but of eloquence, or grace, or refinement of any sort, he is as destitute as he is (and that is altogether) of imagination, and wit, and humour, and subtlety, and depth and weight of thought, and whatever other qualities give anything either of life or lustre to what a man utters out of his own head or heart. We read him for the sake of his facts only; he troubles us with but few reflections, but of that no reader will complain. He does not see far into any thing, nor indeed, properly speaking, into it at all; for that matter, he is little more, to adopt a modern term, than a penny-a-liner on a large scale, and best performs his task when he does not attempt to be anything else. Nor is he a neat-handed workman even of that class; in his History of his Own Time, in particular, his style, with no strength, or flavour, or natural charm of any kind, to redeem its rudeness, is the most slovenly undress in which a writer ever wrapt up what he had to communicate to the public. Its only merit, as we have observed, is that it is without any air of pretension, and that it is evidently as extemporaneous and careless as it is unelevated, shapeless, and ungrammatical. Among the most important and best known of Burnet's other works are, that entitled "Some Passages of the Life and Death of the Right Honourable John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester," 1680: his Life of Bishop Bedel, 1685; his Travels through France, Italy, Germany, and Switzerland, 1685; and his Exposition of the Thirty-Nine Articles, 1699.

* We have, for convenience of classification, reckoned each of the three vols. of the History of the Reformation a distinct publication.

In the same year with Bishop Burnet, but at a more advanced age, died Dr. Thomas Burnet, the learned and eloquent author of the Telluris Sacra Theoria, first published in Latin in 1680, and afterwards translated into English by the author; of the Archæologia Philosophica, published in 1692; and of two or three other treatises, also in Latin, which did not appear till after his death. The author of the Sacred Theory of the Earth, a man of genius and imagination as well as of consummate scholarship, is a very different species of writer from his mitred namesake: his English style is singularly flowing and harmonious, as well as perspicuous and animated, and rises on fit occasions to much majesty and impressiveness. It has been already intimated that his system of geology has no scientific value whatever; indeed, it must be considered as a mere romance, although, from the earnestness of the author's manner and his constant citation of texts of scripture in support of his positions, as well as from more than one answer which he afterwards published to the attacks made upon his book, it is evident that he by no means intended it to be so received.

Along with these names may be mentioned that of Archbishop Tillotson, who was a very popular preacher among the Presbyterians before the Restoration, and began publishing sermons so early as in the year 1661, while he still belonged to that sect. He died in 1694 in his sixty-fourth year. Tillotson's Sermons, still familiarly known by reputation, long continued to be the most generally esteemed collection of such compositions in the language; but are probably now very little read. They are substantial performances, such as make the reader feel, when he has got through one of them, that he has accomplished something of a feat; and, being without as free from pedantry and every other kind of eccentricity or extravagance as from flimsiness, and exceedingly sober in their strain of doctrine, with a certain blunt cordiality in the expression and manner, they were in all respects very happily addressed to the ordinary peculiarities of the national mind and character. But, having once fallen into neglect, Tillotson's writings have no qualities that will ever revive attention to them. There is much more of a true vitality in the sermons of Dr. Robert South, whose career of authorship commenced in the time of the Protectorate, though his life was extended till after the accession of George I. He died in 1716 at the age of eighty-three. South's sermons, the first of which date even before the earliest of Tillotson's, and the last after Tillotson's latest, are very well characterised by Mr. Hallam:—"They were," he observes, "much celebrated at the time, and retain a portion of their renown. This is by no means surprising. South had great qualifications for that popularity which attends the pulpit, and his manner was at that time original. Not diffuse, not learned, not formal in argument like Barrow, with a more natural structure of sentences, a more pointed, though by no means a more fair and satisfactory turn of reasoning, with a style clear and English, free from all pedantry, but abounding with those colloquial novelties of idiom, which, though now become vulgar and offensive, the age of Charles II. affected, sparing no personal or temporary sarcasm, but, if he seems for a moment to tread on the verge of buffoonery, recovering himself by some stroke of vigorous sense and language; such was the worthy Dr. South, whom the courtiers delighted to hear. His sermons want all that is called unctio, and sometimes even earnestness; but there is a masculine spirit about them, which, combined with their peculiar characteristics, would naturally fill the churches where he might be heard."* Both South and Tillotson are considered to belong as divines to the Arminian, or, as it was then commonly called, the Latitudinarian school—as well as Cudworth, More, and Stillingfleet.

The only considerable literary name that can be said to belong exclusively, or almost exclusively, to the reign of King William, is that of Locke. John Locke, born in 1632, although his "Adversarium Methodus, or New Method of a Common-Place-Book," had appeared in French, in

* Lit. of Europe, iv. 177.

Leclerc's Bibliothèque for 1686, and an abridgment of his celebrated Essay, and his first Letter on Toleration, both also in French, in the same publication for 1687 and 1688, had published nothing in English, or with his name, till he produced in 1690 the work which has ever since made him one of the best known of English writers, both in his own and in other countries, his "Essay concerning Human Understanding." This was followed by his Second Letter on Toleration, and his two Treatises on Government, in the same year; his Considerations on Lowering the Interest of Money in 1691; his Third Letter on Toleration in 1692; his Thoughts concerning Education in 1693; his Reasonableness of Christianity in 1695; and various controversial tracts in reply to his assailants, Dr. Edwards and Bishop Stillingfleet, between that date and his death in 1704. After his death appeared his Conduct of the Understanding, and several theological treatises, the composition of which had been the employment of the last years of his industrious and productive old age. Locke's famous Essay was the first work, perhaps in any language, which professedly or systematically attempted to popularise metaphysical philosophy. The author's persuasion evidently is, that there is nothing more difficult to comprehend, or at least more incomprehensible, about the operations of the human mind than there is in the movements of an eight-day clock. What he especially sets himself to run down and do away with from the beginning to the end of his book, is the notion that there is any mystery in any part of the subject he has undertaken to expound which his pen cannot make clear to the most ordinary capacity that will lend him half an hour's fair attention. Locke was a man of great moral worth, of the highest integrity, disinterested, just, tolerant, and humane, as well as of extraordinary penetration and capacity; moreover, he was probably as free from anything like self-conceit, or the over-estimation either of his own virtues or his own talents, as people of good sense usually are; and he had undoubtedly a great respect for the deity as the First Magistrate of the universe; yet, to a mind differently constituted from his, and which, instead of seeing a mystery in nothing, sees a mystery in all things, there is, it must be confessed, something so offensive in the whole tone and manner of his speculations, that his real merits perhaps will scarcely be rated by such a mind so high as they deserve. It seems all like a man, if not trying to deceive others, at least so perseveringly shutting his eyes upon, and turning away his head from, every real difficulty, that he may be almost said to be wilfully deceiving himself; merely skimming the surface of his subject while he assumes the air of exploring it to the bottom; repelling objections, sometimes by dexterously thrusting them aside, mostly by not noticing them at all; in other words, a piece of mere clever and plausible, but hollow and insincere conjuring; a vain show of wisdom, having in it almost as little of the real as of the reverential. No awe, no wonder, no self-distrust—no sense of anything above—we might almost say beside, or out of—the intellect of the speculator. Malebranche saw all things in God; Locke saw all things in himself. Nay, he went all but the length of seeing the whole universe in his five corporeal senses; and the majority of his disciples in more recent times have boldly leaped across the slight barrier which kept their master back from that great discovery. But, while there will continue to be in many minds this dissent from the general spirit of Locke's philosophy, and also from the general tenor of his conclusions, the Essay on Human Understanding will, nevertheless, always be recognised as not only an illustrious monument, of the penetration, ingenuity, and other high mental powers and resources of its author, but as a fundamental book in modern metaphysics. It is, as has been remarked, the first comprehensive survey that had been attempted of the whole mind and its faculties; and the very conception of such a design argued an intellect of no common reach, originality, and boldness. It will remain also of very considerable value as an extensive register of facts, and a storehouse of acute and often suggestive observations on psychological phenomena, whatever may be the fate of the views propounded in it as a metaphysical system. Further, it is not to be denied that this work has exercised a powerful influence upon the course of philosophical inquiry and opinion ever since its appearance. At first in particular it did good service in putting finally to the rout some fantastic notions and methods that still lingered in the schools; it was the loudest and most comprehensive proclamation that had yet been made of the liberation of philosophy from the dominion of authority; but Locke's was a mind stronger and better furnished for the work of pulling down than of building up; he had enough of clear-sightedness and independence of mental character for the one; whatever endowments of a different kind he possessed, he had too little imagination, or creative power, for the other. Besides, the very passionless character of his mind would have unfitted him for going far into the philosophy of our complex nature, in which the passions are the revealers and teachers of all the deepest truths, and alone afford us any intimation of many things which, even with the aid of their lurid light, we discern but as fearful and unfathomable mysteries. What would Shakspeare's understanding of the philosophy of human nature have been, if he had had no more imagination and passion in his own nature than Locke?

We have already in a preceding chapter noticed Locke's contributions to the infant science of political economy; and also the more remarkable publication in the same department of his contemporary, Sir Dudley North.* A more voluminous writer on such subjects in this and the next reign was Dr. Charles Davenant (son of Sir William

* See ante, p. 725.

Davenant, the poet), whose works, however, are more valuable for the mere facts they record than for any light they throw on the principles of economical science. Davenant was a laborious examiner of documents and accounts, and a sensible but without rather a dull man. We have had occasion to quote several passages from his various publications in the account of the progress of commerce during the present period, on which subject they are among our most trustworthy sources of information.

In taking leave of the seventeenth century we ought not to omit noticing the memorable contest of wit and learning which arose in the reign of William, out of the publication of an edition of the Greek Epistles attributed to Phalaris, the tyrant of Agrigentum, in Sicily, by the Honourable Charles Boyle (afterwards Earl of Orrery). In the preface to his book, which was published in the beginning of the year 1695, Boyle, who was then an undergraduate of Christ's Church, Oxford, animadverted with some severity upon a piece of discourtesy which he conceived he had met with from Dr. Bentley, then keeper of the King's Library, in regard to the loan of a manuscript of the Epistles there preserved. After an interval of two years Bentley published, in an appendix to the second edition of his friend William Wotton's Reflections on Ancient and Modern Learning, an elaborate exposition of his reasons for holding the compositions printed by Boyle, and ranked by him with the most precious remains of the remotest antiquity, to be a comparatively modern forgery; and at the same time took an opportunity both of replying to the charge brought against him by Boyle (from which he appears to have vindicated himself), and of criticising the late edition of the Epistles with great severity, and with all the power of his vast erudition and unrivalled acumen. This, the first edition of Bentley's celebrated Dissertation on Phalaris, is now, in truth, universally considered to have established the spuriousness of the Epistles conclusively and unanswerably. An answer, however, was produced to it in the following year (1698), under the title of "Dr. Bentley's Dissertations on the Epistles of Phalaris and the Fables of Æsop Examined;" to which Boyle's name was prefixed, but which is believed to have been chiefly the composition of his tutor, the celebrated Dr. Francis Atterbury, afterwards Bishop of Rochester, whose very considerable attainments in classical scholarship were enlivened and decorated by the finest spirit of wit and humour. Some others of the most distinguished among the Oxford men also contributed their blows or missiles; so that the cause of the old Sicilian tyrant against the denier and derider of his literary pretensions may be said to have been taken up and defended by the whole force and fury of the university. The laugh was turned for the moment against Bentley by this attack, which was for the most part a fierce personal invective; but he set at least the original question at rest, and effectually put down the pretensions of his assailants to cope with him in the field of learning and criticism, by a second and enlarged edition of his Dissertation, which he brought forth after about another year's interval. To this a reply was threatened, but none was ever made. Bentley's performance was in every way a masterpiece. "Professedly controversial," observes a late writer, "it embodies a mass of accurate information relative to historical facts, antiquities, chronology, and philology, such as we may safely say has rarely been collected in the same space; and the reader cannot fail to admire the ingenuity with which things apparently trifling, or foreign to the point in question, are made effective in illustrating or proving the author's views. Nothing shows so well how thoroughly digested and familiar was the vast stock of reading which Bentley possessed. The banter and ridicule of his opponents are returned with interest, and the reader is reconciled to what might seem to savour too much of arrogance and the bitterness of controversy by a sense of the strong provocation given to the author."* We may add a few words from Mr. Hallam's notice of this controversy:—"It was the first great literary war that had been waged in England; and, like that of Troy, it has still the prerogative of being remembered after the Epistles of Phalaris are as much buried as the walls of Troy itself. Both combatants were skilful in wielding the sword: the arms of Boyle, in Swift's language, were given him by all the gods;† but his antagonist stood forward in no such figurative strength, master of a learning to which nothing parallel had been known in England, and that directed by an understanding prompt, discriminating, not idly sceptical, but still farther removed from trust in authority, sagacious in perceiving corruptions of language, and ingenious, at the least, in removing them, with a style rapid, concise, amusing, and superior to Boyle in that which he had most to boast, a sarcastic wit."‡ What is here alluded to is one of the earliest performances of one of the greatest geniuses of the next age—the Battle of the Books, published anonymously, and never acknowledged, but never doubted to be the production of the afterwards renowned Jonathan Swift. It did not, however, appear till the year 1704. In fact the dispute about the authenticity of the Epistles of Phalaris had formed all along only a branch of a larger controversy, which was kept up for some years after the question of Phalaris had been set

* Article on Bentley, in Penny Cyclopaedia, iv. 250.

† Upon this assertion of Swift's, Boyle's son, John Earl of Orrery, remarks with a filial or family partiality that is excusable enough:—"I shall not dispute about the gift of the armour; but thus far I will venture to observe, that the gods never bestowed celestial armour, except upon heroes whose courage and superior strength distinguished them from the rest of mankind; whose merits and abilities were already conspicuous; and who could wield, though young, the sword of Mars, and adorn it with all the virtues of Minerva." Remarks on the Life and Writings of Dr. Swift, 2d edition, p. 228. Charles Boyle was in truth a person of respectable talent; but, although in after life he wrote a comedy (As You Find It), and some other trifles, his wit did not appear to have ripened with his years, and nothing that he produced ever excited any attention except his college publication in the Phalaris controversy.

‡ Lit. of Eu. iv. 114.

at rest and abandoned on all hands. It was Swift's relation and patron, Sir William Temple, who had first called attention to the Epistles by a passage in one of his Essays, in which he endeavoured to maintain the superiority of the ancients over the moderns in all kinds of learning and knowledge, the physical and experimental sciences themselves not excepted. It was in answer to Temple's Essay, which was itself a reply to Perrault's "Parallèle des Anciens et Modernes," published at Paris in 1687, that Wotton wrote his "Reflections," the first edition of which appeared in 1694, and expressed therein an opinion unfavourable to the antiquity of the Epistles, which Temple had both eulogised in warm terms, and cited as of unquestionable authenticity. This argument between Temple as the champion-general of the ancients, and Wotton of the moderns, which produced a great many more publications from both, and from their respective partisans, is the main subject of the Battle of the Books, which was probably the last blow struck in the pen and ink war, and at any rate is the last that is now remembered.

The Tale of a Tub and the Battle of the Books, published together, were the first announcement of the greatest master of satire at once comic and caustic that has yet appeared in our language. Swift, born in Ireland in 1667, had already, in the last years of the preceding reign, made himself known by two volumes of Letters selected from the papers of his friend Temple, and also by a political pamphlet in favour of the ministry of the day, which attracted little notice, and gave as little promise of his future eminence as a writer. To politics as well as satire, however, he adhered throughout his career—often blending the two, but producing scarcely anything, if we may not except some of his effusions in verse, that was not either satirical or political. His course of authorship as a political writer may be considered properly to begin with his "Letter concerning the Sacramental Test," and another high Tory and high church tract, which he published in 1708; in which same year he also came forward with his ironical "Argument for the Abolition of Christianity," and in his humorous "Predictions" first assumed his nom de guerre of Isaac Bickerstaff, Esquire, afterwards made so famous by other jeux d'esprit in the same style, and by its adoption soon after by the wits of the Tatler. Of his other most notable performances, his Conduct of the Allies was published in 1712; his Public Spirit of the Whigs in 1714; his Drapier's Letters in 1724; his immortal Gulliver's Travels in 1727; and his Polite Conversation, which had been written many years before, in 1738. His poem of Cadenus and Vanessa, besides, had appeared, without his consent, in 1723, soon after the death of Miss Hester Van Homrigh, its heroine. The History of the Four Last Years of Queen Anne (if his), the Directions for Servants, many of his verses and other shorter pieces, and his Diary written to Stella (Miss Johnson, to whom he was afterwards married), were none of them printed till after, some of them not till long after, his death, which took place in 1745.

"O thou!" exclaims his friend Pope, — "whatever title pleases thine ear,

Dean, Drapier, Bickerstaff, or Gulliver!
Whether thou choose Cervantes' rousin air,
Or laugh and shake in Rabelais' easy chair,
Or praise the court, or magnify an mankind,
Or thy griev'd country's copper of ains unbind, lines that describe comprehensively enough the celebrated dean's genius and writings—what he did and what he was. And the first remark to be made about Swift is, that into everything that came from his pen he put a strong infusion of himself; that in his writings we read the man—not merely his intellectual ability, but his moral nature, his passions, his principles, his prejudices, his humours, his whole temper and individuality. The common herd of writers have no individuality at all; those of the very highest class can assume at will any other individuality as perfectly as their own—they have no exclusiveness. Next under this highest class stand those whose individuality is at once their strength and their weakness;—their strength, in as much as it distinguishes them from and lifts them far above the multitude of writers of mere talent or expository skill; their weakness and bondage, in that it will not be thrown off, and that it withholds them from ever going out of themselves, and rising from the merely characteristic, striking, or picturesque either to the dramatic or to the beautiful, of both of which equally the spirit is unegotistic and universal. To this class, which is not the highest, but the next to it, Swift belongs. The class, however, like both that which is above and that which is below it, is one of wide comprehension, and includes many degrees of power, and even many diversities of gifts. Swift was neither a Cervantes nor a Rabelais; but yet, with something that was peculiar to himself, he combined considerable portions of both. He had more of Cervantes than Rabelais had, and more of Rabelais than was given to Cervantes. He wants altogether the refinement, the humanity, the pathos, the noble elevation of the Spaniard,—all that irradiates and beautifies his satire and drollery as the blue sky does the earth it bends over;—as little has our English wit and humourist, with all his ingenuity and fertility, either the grotesque invention or the gay, luxuriant fancy of the historian of the Doings and Sayings of the Giant Gargantua, in whose singular work the brightest sunshine often plays with so strange an effect on floods of the foulest mire. But, on the other hand, he has a severity, an earnestness, a seva indignatio, that are all his own, and that certainly have never been blended in any other writer with so keen a perception of the ludicrous and so much general comic power. The breath of his loud, cordial, heart-shaking laughter is at the same time withering and consuming as fire. Other masters of the same art are satisfied if they can only make their readers laugh; this is their main, often their sole aim, in the exercise of their skill, whether upon things or upon persons: with Swift, to excite the emotion of the ludicrous is only a subordinate purpose,—a means employed for effecting quite another and a much higher end; if he labours to make anything ridiculous, it is because he hates it, and would have it trodden into the earth or extirpated. No sneaking kindness for the victim of his raillery is ever to be detected in his laughter; he is not a mere admirer of the comic picturesque, who will sometimes rack or gibbet an unhappy individual for the sake of the fantastic grimaces he may make, or the capers he may cut in the air; he has the true spirit of an executioner, and only loves his joke as sauce and seasoning to more serious work. Few men have been more perversely prejudiced and self-willed than Swift, and therefore of absolute truth his works may probably contain less than many others not so earnestly written; but of what was truth to the mind of the writer, of what he actually believed and desired, no works contain more. Here, again, Swift is in the middle class of writers; far above those whose whole truth is truth of expression—that is, correspondence between the words and the thoughts (possibly without any between the thoughts and the writer's belief); but below those who both write what they think, and whose thoughts are valuable for their intrinsic beauty or profundness. Yet in setting honestly and effectively before us even his own passions and prejudices a writer also tells us the truth—the truth, at least, respecting himself, if not respecting anything else. This much does Swift always; and this is his great distinction among the masters of wit and humour;—the merriest of his jests is an utterance of some real feeling of his heart at the moment as much as the fiercest of his invectives. Alas! with all his jesting and merriment, he did not know what it was to have a mind at ease, or free from the burden and torment of dark, devouring passions, till, in his own words, the cruel indignation that tore continually at his heart was laid at rest in the grave. In truth, the insanity which ultimately fell down upon and laid prostrate his fine faculties had cast something of its black shadow athwart their vision from the first,—as he himself probably felt or suspected when he determined to bequeath his fortune to build an hospital in his native country for persons afflicted with that calamity; and sad enough, we may be sure, he was at heart, when he gaily wrote that he did so merely

To show, by one satiric touch,
No nation wanted it so much.*

Yet the madness, or predisposition to madness, was also part and parcel of the man, and possibly an element of his genius,—which might have had less earnestness and force, as well as less activity, productiveness, and originality, if it had not been excited and impelled by that perilous fervour. Nay, something of their power and peculiar character Swift's writings may owe to the exertions called forth in curbing and keeping down the demon, which, like a proud steed under a stout rider, would have mastered him if he had not mastered it, and, although support and strength to him so long as it was held in subjection, would, dominant over him, have rent him in pieces, as in the end it did. Few, perhaps, could have maintained the struggle so toughly and so long. But Swift was undoubtedly the most masculine English intellect of his age, the most earnest thinker of a time in which there was less among us of either earnest or deep thinking than in any other era of our literature. There was an earnestness; if we may so speak, even in his jesting, evincing itself in a richness and originality, as well as in a causticity, reached by no one of his brother wits.

* "I have often," says Lord Orrery, "heard him lament the state of childhood and idiotism to which some of the greatest men of this nation were reduced before their death. He mentioned, as examples within his own time, the Duke of Marlborough and Lord Somers; and, when he cited these melancholy instances, it was always with a heavy sigh, and with gestures that showed great sadness, as if he felt an impulse of what was to happen to him before he died."—Remarks, p. 186.

Of these by far the most memorable was Alexander Pope. If Swift was at the head of the prose-writers of that day, still more incontestably was Pope the first of its writers in verse, with no other either equal or second to him. Born a few months before the Revolution, he came forth as a poet by the publication of his Pastorals in Tonson's Miscellany in 1709, when he was yet only in his twenty-first year; and they had been written five years before. Nor were they the earliest of his performances; his Ode on Solitude, his verses upon Silence, his translations of the First Book of the Thebais and of Ovid's Epistle from Sappho to Phaon, and his much more remarkable paraphrases of Chaucer's January and May, and the Prologue to the Wife of Bath's Tale, all preceded the composition of the Pastorals. His Essay on Criticism (written in 1709) was published in 1711; the Messiah the same year (in the Spectator); the Rape of the Lock in 1712; the Temple of Fame (written two years before) the same year; his Windsor Forest (which he had commenced at sixteen) in 1713; the first four books of his translation of the Iliad in 1715; his Epistle from Eloisa to Abelard (written some years before) we believe in 1717, when he published a collected edition of his poems; the remaining portions of the Iliad at different times, the last in 1720; his translation of the Odyssey (in concert with Fenton and Broome) in 1725; the first three books of the Dunciad in 1728; his Epistle on Taste in 1731; his Essay on Man in 1733 and 1734; his Imitations of Horace, various other satirical pieces, the Prologue and Epilogue to the Satires, his Moral Epistles, and his modernised version of Donne's Satires between 1730 and 1740; and the fourth book of the Dunciad in 1742. Besides all this verse, collections of his Letters were published first surreptitiously by Curl, and then by himself in 1737; and, among other publications in prose, his clever jeu d'esprit entitled a Narrative of the Frenzy of John Dennis appeared in 1718; his Preface to Shakspeare, with his edition of the works of that poet, in 1721; his Treatise of the Baths, or Art of Sinking in Poetry, and his Memoirs of P.P., Clerk of This Parish (in ridicule of Burnet's History of his Own Time), in 1727. He died in May, 1744, about a year and a half before his friend Swift, who, more than twenty years his senior, had naturally anticipated that he should be the first to depart, and that, as he cynically, and yet touchingly too, expressed it, while Arbuthnot grieved for him a day, and Gay a week, he should be lamented a whole month by "Poor Pope,"—whom, of all those he best knew, he seems to have the most loved.

Pope, with talent enough for anything, might deserve to be ranked among the most distinguished prose-writers of his time, if he were not its greatest poet; but it is in the latter character that he falls to be noticed in the history of our literature. And what a broad and bright region would be cut off from our poetry if he had never lived! If we even confine ourselves to his own works, without regarding the numerous subsequent writers who have in the greater part formed themselves upon him as an example and model, and may be said to constitute the school of which he was the founder, how rich an inheritance of brilliant and melodious fancies do we not owe to him! For what would any of us resign the Rape of the Lock, or the Epistle of Eloisa, or the Essay on Man, or the Moral Essays, or the Satires, or the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, or the Dunciad? That we have nothing in the same style in the language to be set beside or weighed against any one of these performances will probably be admitted by all; and, if we could say no more, this would be to assign to Pope a rank in our poetic literature which certainly not so many as half a dozen other names are entitled to share with his. Down to his own day at least, Chaucer, Spenser, Shakspeare, Milton, and Dryden alone had any pretensions to be placed before him or by his side. It is unnecessary to dilate upon what has been sufficiently pointed out by all the critics, and is too obvious to be overlooked, the general resemblance of his poetry, in both its form and spirit, to that of Dryden rather than to that of our elder great writers. He belongs to the classical school as opposed to the romantic, to that in which a French rather than to that in which an Italian inspiration may be detected. Whether this is to be attributed principally to his constitutional temperament and the native character of his imagination, or to the influences of the age in which he lived and wrote, we shall not stop to inquire. It is enough that such is the fact. But, though he may be regarded as in the main the pupil and legitimate successor of Dryden, the amount of what he learned or borrowed from that master was by no means so considerable as to prevent his manner from having a great deal in it that is distinctive and original. If Dryden has more impetuosity and a freer flow, Pope has far more delicacy, and, on fit occasions, far more tenderness and true passion. Dryden has written nothing in the same style with the Rape of the Lock on the one hand, or with the Epistle to Abelard and the Elegy on the Death of an Unfortunate Lady on the other. Indeed, these two styles may be said to have been both, in so far as the English tongue is concerned, invented by Pope. In what preceding writer had he an example of either? Nay, did either the French or the Italian language furnish him with anything to copy from nearly so brilliant and felicitous as his own performances? In the sharper or more severe species of satire, again, while in some things he is inferior to Dryden, in others he excels him. It must be admitted that Dryden's is the nobler, the more generous scorn; it is passionate, while Pope's is frequently only peevish: the one is vehement, the other venomous. But, although Pope does not wield the ponderous, fervid scourge with which his predecessor tears and mangles the luckless object of his indignation or derision, he knows how, with a lighter touch, to inflict a torture quite as maddening at the moment, and perhaps more difficult to heal. Neither has anything of the easy elegance, the simple natural grace, the most exquisite artifice imitating the absence of all art, of Horace; but the care, and dexterity, and superior refinement of Pope, his neatness, and concentration, and point, supply a better substitute for these charms than the ruder strength, the more turbulent passion, of Dryden. If Dryden, too, has more natural fire and force, and rises in his greater passages to a stormy grandeur to which the other does not venture to commit himself, Pope in some degree compensates for that by a dignity, a quiet, sometimes pathetic, majesty, which we find nowhere in Dryden's poetry. Dryden has translated the Æneid, and Pope the Iliad; but the two tasks would apparently have been better distributed if Dryden had chanced to have taken up Homer, and left Virgil to Pope. Pope's Iliad, in truth, whatever may be its merits of another kind, is, in spirit and style, about the most unhomeric performance in the whole compass of our poetry, as Pope had, of all our great poets, the most unhomeric genius. He was emphatically the poet of the highly artificial age in which he lived; and his excellence lay in, or at least was fostered and perfected by, the accordance of all his tastes and talents, of his whole moral and intellectual constitution, with the spirit of that condition of things: Not touches of natural emotion, but the titillation of wit and fancy,—not tones of natural music, but the tone of good society, make up the charm of his poetry; which however is, for correctness, polish, pungency, and brilliance, all that the happiest genius for that style and the most consummate art could make it. Pope, no doubt, wrote with a care and elaboration that were unknown to Dryden; against whom, indeed, it is a reproach made by his pupil, that, copious as he was, he —wasted or forgot

The last and great:—the art to blot.

And so perhaps, although the expression is a strong and a startling one, may the said art, not without some reason, be called in reference to the particular species of poetry which Dryden and Pope cultivated, dependent as that is for its success in pleasing us almost as much upon the absence of faults as upon the presence of beauties. Such, partial obscuration or distortion of the imagery as we excuse, or even admire, in the expanded mirror of a lake reflecting the woods and hills and overhanging sky, when its waters are ruffled or swayed by the fitful breeze, would be intolerable in a looking-glass, were it otherwise the most splendid article of the sort that upholstery ever furnished.

Next to the prose of Swift and the poetry of Pope, perhaps the portion of the literature of the beginning of the last century that was both most influential at the time, and still lives most in the popular remembrance, is that connected with the names of Addison and Steele. These two writers were the chief boast of the Whig party, as Swift and Pope were of the Tories. Addison's poem, "The Campaign," on the victory of Blenheim, his imposing but frigid tragedy of Cato, and some other dramatic productions, besides various other writings in prose, have given him a reputation in many departments of literature; and Steele also holds a respectable rank among our comic dramatists as the author of the Tender Husband and the Conscious Lovers; but it is as the first, and on the whole the best, of our English Essayists, the principal authors (in every sense) of the Tatler, the Spectator, and the Guardian, that these two writers have sent down their names with most honour to posterity, and have especially earned the love and gratitude of their countrymen. Steele was in his thirty-ninth and his friend Addison in his thirty-eighth year when the Tatler was started by the former in April, 1709. The paper, published thrice a week, had gone on for about six weeks before Addison took any part in it, but from that time he became, next to Steele, the chief contributor to it, till it was dropped in January, 1711. "I have only one gentleman," says Steele in his Preface to the collected papers, "who will be nameless, to thank for any frequent assistance to me, which indeed it would have been barbarous in him to have denied to one with whom he has lived in an intimacy from childhood, considering the great ease with which he is able to dispatch the most entertaining pieces of this nature." The person alluded to is Addison. "This good office," Steele generously adds, "he performed with such force of genius, humour, wit, and learning, that I fared like a distressed prince who calls in a powerful neighbour to his aid: I was undone by my auxiliary; when I had once called him in I could not subsist without dependence on him." By far the greater part of the Tatler, however, is Steele's. Of 271 papers of which it consists, above 200 are attributed either entirely or in the greater part to him, while those believed to have been written by Addison are only about fifty. Among the other contributors Swift is the most frequent. The Spectator was begun within two months after the discontinuance of the Tatler, and was carried on at the rate of six papers a week till the 6th of December, 1712, on which day Number 555 was published. In these first seven volumes of the Spectator Addison's papers are probably more numerous than Steele's; and between them they wrote perhaps four-fifths of the whole work. The Guardian was commenced on the 12th of March, 1713, and, being also published six times a week, had extended to 175 Numbers when it was brought to a close on the 1st of October in the same year. There is only one paper by Addison in the first volume of the Guardian, but to the second he was rather a more frequent contributor than Steele. This was the last work in which the two friends joined; for Addison, we believe, wrote nothing in the Englishman, the fifty-seven numbers of which were published, at the rate of three a week, between the 6th of October, 1713, and the 15th of February following; nor Steele any of the papers, eighty in number, forming the eighth volume of the Spectator, of which the first was published on the 18th of June, 1714, the last on the 20th of December in the same year, the rate of publication being also three times a week. Of these additional Spectators twenty-four are attributed to Addison. The friendship of nearly half a century which had united these two admirable writers was rent asunder by political differences some years before the death of Addison, in 1719: Steele survived till 1729.

Invented or introduced among us as the periodical essay may be said to have been by Steele and Addison, it is a species of writing, as already observed, in which perhaps they have never been surpassed, or on the whole equalled, by any one of their many followers. More elaboration and depth, and also more brilliancy, we may have had in some recent attempts of the same kind; but hardly so much genuine liveliness, ease, and cordiality, anything so thoroughly agreeable, so skilfully adapted to interest without demanding more attention than is naturally and spontaneously given to it. Perhaps so large an admixture of the speculative and didactic was never made so easy of apprehension and so entertaining, so like in the reading to the merely narrative. But, besides this constant atmosphere of the pleasurable arising simply from the lightness, variety, and urbanity of these delightful papers, the delicate imagination and exquisite humour of Addison, and the vivacity, warmheartedness, and altogether generous nature of Steele, give a charm to the best of them, which is to be enjoyed, not described. We not only admire the writers, but soon come to love them, and to regard both them and the several fictitious personages that move about in the other little world they have created for us as among our best and best known friends.

Along with Pope, as we have seen, Swift numbers among those who would most mourn his death, Gay and Arbuthnot. He survived them both, Gay having died, in his forty-fourth year, in 1732, and Arbuthnot at a much more advanced age in 1735. John Gay, the author of a considerable quantity of verse and of above a dozen dramatic pieces, is now chiefly remembered for his Beggar's Opera, his Fables, his mock-heroic poem of Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London, and some of his ballads. He has no pretensions to any elevation of genius, but there is an agreeable ease, nature, and sprightliness in everything he has written; and the happiest of his performances are animated by an archness, and light but spirited raillery, in which he has not often been excelled. His celebrated English opera, as it was the first attempt of the kind, still remains the only one that has been eminently successful. Now, indeed, that much of the wit has lost its point and application to existing characters and circumstances, the dialogue of the play, apart from the music, may be admitted to owe its popularity in some degree to its traditional fame; but still what is temporary in it is intermixed with a sufficiently diffused, though not very deep, vein of general satire, to allow the whole to retain considerable piquancy. Even at first the Beggar's Opera was probably indebted for the greater portion of its success to the music, and that is so happily selected that it continues still as fresh and as delightful as ever. Dr. John Arbuthnot, a native of Scotland, besides various professional works of much ability, is generally regarded as the author of the Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, printed in the works of Pope and Swift, and said to have been intended as the commencement of a general satire on the abuses of learning, of which, however, nothing more was ever written except Pope's treatise already mentioned on the Bathos, and one or two shorter fragments. The celebrated political satire, entitled The History of John Bull, which has been the model of various subsequent imitations, but of none in which the fiction is at once so apposite and so ludicrous, is also attributed to Arbuthnot. Pope's highly wrought and noble Prologue to his Satires, which is addressed to Arbuthnot, or rather in which the latter figures as the poet's interlocutor, will for ever preserve both the memory of their friendship, and also some traits of the character and manner of the learned, witty, and kind-hearted physician. The commencement of the reign of the Whigs at the accession of the House of Hanover, which deprived Arbuthnot of his appointment of one of the physicians extraordinary—leaving him, however, in the poet's words, social, cheerful, and serene,

And just as rich as when he served a queen—was more fatal to the fortunes of another of Pope's Tory or Jacobite friends, Francis Atterbury, the celebrated Bishop of Rochester, already mentioned as the principal author of the reply to Bentley's Dissertation on Phalaris. Atterbury also took a distinguished part in the professional controversies of his day, and his sermons and letters and one or two short poetical pieces of his are well known; but his fervid character probably flashed out in conversation in a way of which we do not gather any notion from his writings. Atterbury, as the reader knows, was deprived and outlawed in 1722; and he died abroad in 1731 in his sixty-ninth year.

Matthew Prior is another distinguished name in the band of the Tory writers of this age, and he was also an associate of Pope and Swift, although we hear less of him in their epistolary correspondence than of most of their other friends. Yet perhaps no one of the minor wits and poets of the time has continued to enjoy higher or more general favour with posterity. Much that he wrote, indeed, is now forgotten; but some of the best of his comic tales in verse will live as long as the language, which contains nothing that surpasses them in the union of ease and fluency with sprightliness and point, and in all that makes up the spirit of humorous and graceful narrative. They are our happiest examples of a style that has been cultivated with more frequent success by French writers than by our own. Prior, who was born in 1664, commenced poet before the Revolution, by the publication in 1688 of his City Mouse and Country Mouse, written in concert with Charles Montagu, afterwards Earl of Halifax, in ridicule of Dryden's Hind and Panther; and he continued a Whig nearly to the end of the reign of William; but he then joined the most extreme section of the Tories, and acted cordially with that party down to his death in 1721.

The mention of Prior naturally suggests that of his friend and patron, and also the friend of Swift and Pope—Henry St. John, better known by his title of the Lord Viscount Bolingbroke, although his era comes down to a much later date, for he was not born till 1678, and he lived to 1751. Bolingbroke wrote no poetry, but his collected prose works fill five quarto volumes (without including his letters), and would thus entitle him by their quantity alone to be ranked as one of the most considerable writers of his time; of which we have abundant testimony that he was one of the most brilliant orators and talkers, and in every species of mere cleverness one of the most distinguished figures. His writings, being principally on subjects of temporary politics, have lost much of their interest; but a few of them, especially his Letters on the Study and Use of History, his Idea of a Patriot King, and his account and defence of his own conduct in his famous Letter to Sir William Wyndham, will still reward perusal even for the sake of their matter, while in style and manner almost everything he has left is of very remarkable merit. Bolingbroke's style, as has been observed, "was a happy medium between that of the scholar and that of the man of society—or rather it was a happy combination of the best qualities of both, heightening the ease, freedom, fluency, and liveliness of elegant conversation with many of the deeper and richer tones of the eloquence of formal orations and of books. The example he thus set has probably had a very considerable effect in moulding the style of popular writing since his time.*

In one of the passages in which he commemorates the friendship of Swift, Atterbury, and Bolingbroke, Pope records also the encouragement his earliest performances in rhyme received from a poet and man of wit of the opposite party, "well-natured Garth."† Sir Samuel Garth, who was an eminent physician and a zealous Whig, is the author of various poetical pieces published in the reigns of William and Anne, of which the one of greatest pretension is that entitled The Dispensary, a mock epic, in six short cantos, on the quarrels of his professional brethren, which appeared in 1699. The wit of this slight performance has possibly somewhat evaporated with age, but it does not seem to have been at any time very pungent. A much more voluminous, and also more ambitious, Whig poet of this Augustan age, as it is sometimes called, of our literature, was another physician, Sir Richard Blackmore. Blackmore made his debut as a poet so early as the year 1696, by the publication of his Prince Arthur, which was followed by a succession of other epics, or long poems of a serious kind, each in six, ten, or twelve books, under the names of King Arthur, King Alfred, Eliza, the Redeemer, the Creation, &c., besides a Paraphrase of the Book of Job, a new version of the Psalms, a Satire on Wit, and various shorter effusions both in verse and prose. The indefatigable rhymester—"the everlasting Blackmore," as Pope calls him—died at last in 1729. Nothing can be conceived exceeding in absurdity this incessant discharge of epics; but Blackmore, whom Dryden charged with writing "to the rumbling of his coach's wheels," may be pronounced, without any undue severity, to have been not more a fool than a blockhead. His Creation, indeed, has been praised both by Addison and Johnson; but the politics of the author may be supposed to have blinded or mollified the one critic, and his piety the other; at least the only thing an ordinary reader will be apt to discover in this his chef d'œuvre, that is not the flattest common-place, is an occasional outbreak of the most ludicrous extravagance and bombast. Altogether this knight, droning away at his epics for above a quarter of a century, is as absurd a phenomenon as is presented to us in the history of literature. Pope has done him no more than justice in assigning him the first place among the contending "brayers" at the immortal games instituted by the goddess of the Dunciad.

But far o'er all, sonorous Blackmore's strain,
Walls, steeples, skies, bring back to him again.
In Tot'ham fields the brethren, with arms
Prick all their ears up, and forget to graze;
Long Chancery-lane retentive rolls the sound,
And courts to courts return it round and round.

* Article on Bolingbroke in Penny Cyclopædia, v. 78.

† See Prologue to the Satires, 135, &c.

Thames waits it thence to Rufus' roaring hall,
And Hungerford re-echoes bawl for bawl.
All hail him victor in both gifts of song,
Who sings so loudly and who sings so long.

The Whigs, however, had to boast of one great writer of prose fiction, if, indeed, one who, although taking a frequent and warm part in the discussion of political subjects, really stood aloof from and above all parties, and may be said to have been in enlargement of view far in advance of all the public men of his time, can be properly claimed by any party. Nor does Daniel Defoe seem to have been recognised as one of themselves by the Whigs of his own day. He stood up, indeed, from first to last, for the principles of the Revolution against those of the Jacobites; but in the alternating struggle between the Whig and Tory parties for the possession of office he took little or no concern; he served and opposed administrations of either colour without reference to anything but their measures: thus we find him in 1706 assisting Godolphin and his colleagues to compass the union with Scotland; and in 1713 exerting himself with equal zeal in supporting Harley and Bolingbroke in the attempt to carry through their commercial treaty with France. He is believed to have first addressed himself to his countrymen through the press in 1683, when he was only in his twenty-third year. From this time for a space of above thirty years he may be said never to have laid down his pen as a political writer: his publications in prose and verse, which are far too numerous to be here particularised, embracing nearly every subject which either the progress of events made of prominent importance during that time, or which was of eminent popular or social interest, independently of times and circumstances. Many of these productions, written for a temporary purpose, or on the spur of some particular occasion, still retain a considerable value even for their matter, either as directories of conduct or accounts of matters of fact; some, indeed, such as his History of the Union, are the works of highest authority we possess respecting the transactions to which they relate; all of them bear the traces of a sincere, earnest, manly character, and of an understanding unusually active, penetrating, and well-informed. Evidence enough there often is, no doubt, of haste and precipitation, but it is always the haste of a full mind; the subject may be rapidly and somewhat rudely sketched out, and the matter not always very artificially disposed, or set forth to the most advantage; but Defoe never wrote for the mere sake of writing, or unless when he really had something to state which he conceived it important that the public should know. He was too thoroughly honest for that. Defoe's course and character as a political writer bear a considerable resemblance in some leading points to those of one of the most remarkable men of our own day, the late William Cobbett, who, however, had certainly much more passion and wilfulness than Defoe, whatever we may think of his claims to as much principle. But Defoe's political writings make the smallest part of his literary renown. At the age of fifty-eight—an age when other writers, without the tenth part of his amount of performance to boast of, have usually thought themselves entitled to close their labours—he commenced a new life of authorship with all the spirit and hopeful alacrity of five-and-twenty. A succession of works of fiction, destined, some of them, to take and keep the highest rank in that department of our literature, and to become popular books in every language of Europe, now proceeded from his pen with a rapidity evincing the easiest flow as well as the greatest fertility of imagination. Robinson Crusoe appeared in 1719; the Dumb Philosopher, the same year; Captain Singleton, in 1720; Duncan Campbell, the same year; Moll Flanders, in 1721; Colonel Jacque, in 1722; the Journal of the Plague, and probably, also, the Memoirs of a Cavalier (to which there is no date), the same year; the Fortunate Mistress, or Roxana, in 1724; the New Voyage Round the World, in 1725; and the Memoirs of Captain Carleton in 1728. But these effusions of his inventive faculty seem to have been, after all, little more than the amusements of his leisure. In the course of the twelve years from 1719 to his death in 1731, besides his novels he produced about twenty miscellaneous works, many of them of considerable extent. It may be pretty safely affirmed that no one who has written so much has written so well. No writer of fictitious narrative has ever excelled him in at least one prime excellence—the air of reality which he throws over the creations of his fancy; an effect proceeding from the strength of conception with which he enters into the scenes, adventures, and characters he undertakes to describe, and his perfect reliance upon his power of interesting the reader by the plainest possible manner of relating things essentially interesting. Truth and nature are never either heightened by flowers of speech in Defoe, or smothered under that sort of adornment. In some of his political writings there are not wanting passages of considerable height of style, in which, excited by a fit occasion, he employs to good purpose the artifices of rhetorical embellishment and modulation; but in his works of imagination the almost constant characteristic of his style is a simplicity and plainness, which, if there be any affectation about it at all, is chargeable only with that of a homeliness sometimes approaching to rusticity. Yet it is full of idiomatic nerve, too, and in a high degree graphic and expressive; and even its occasional slovenliness, whether the result of carelessness or design, aids the illusion by which the fiction is made to read so like a matter of fact. The truthful air of Defoe's fictions, we may just remark, is of quite a different character from that of Swift's, in which, although there is also much of the same vivid conception, and therefore minutely accurate delineation, of every person and thing introduced, a discerning reader will always perceive a smile lurking beneath the author's assumed gravity, telling him intelligibly enough that the whole is a joke. It is said, indeed, that, as the Journal of the Plague is quoted as an authentic narrative by Dr. Mead, and as Lord Chatham was, in all simplicity, in the habit of recommending the Memoirs of a Cavalier to his friends as the best account of the Civil Wars, and as those of Captain Carleton were read even by Samuel Johnson, without a suspicion of their being other than a true history, so some Irish bishop was found with faith enough to believe in Gulliver's Travels, although not a little amazed by some things stated in the book. But this must have been a bishop of a very rare order of intellect.

To this age, too, belong three of the greatest of our comic dramatists. Congreve, Vanbrugh, and Farquhar were born in the order in which we have named them, and also, we believe, successively presented themselves before the public as writers for the stage in the same order, although they reversed it in making their exits from the stage of life,—Farquhar dying in 1707 at the age of twenty-nine, Vanbrugh in 1726 at that of fifty-four, Congreve not till 1729 in his fifty-ninth or sixtieth year. Congreve's first play, the Old Bachelor, was brought out in 1693, the author having already, two or three years before, made himself known in the literary world by a novel called "The Incognita, or Love and Duty Reconciled." The Old Bachelor was followed by The Double Dealer in 1694, and by Love for Love in 1695; the tragedy of the Mourning Bride was produced in 1697; and the comedy of The Way of the World, in 1700; a masquerade and an opera, both of slight importance, were the only dramatic pieces he wrote during the rest of his life. The comedy of Congreve has not much character, still less humour, and no nature at all; but blazes and crackles with wit and repartee, for the most part of an unusually pure and brilliant species,—not quaint, forced, and awkward, like what we find in some other attempts, in our dramatic literature and elsewhere, at the same kind of display, but apparently as easy and spontaneous as it is pointed, polished, and exact. His plots are also constructed with much artifice. Sir John Vanbrugh is the author of ten or twelve comedies, of which the first, The Relapse, was produced in 1697, and of which The Provoked Wife, The Confederacy, and The Journey to London (which last, left unfinished by the author, was completed by Colley Cibber), are those of greatest merit. The wit of Vanbrugh flows rather than flashes; but its copious stream may vie in its own way with the dazzling fire-shower of Congreve's; and his characters have much more of real flesh and blood in their composition, coarse and vicious as almost all the more powerfully drawn among them are. George Farquhar, the author of the Constant Couple and the Beaux' Stratagem, and of five or six other comedies, was a native of Ireland, in which country Congreve also spent his childhood and boyhood.

Farquhar's first play, his Love in a Bottle, was brought out with great success at Drury Lane in 1698; the Beaux' Stratagem, his last, was in the midst of its run when the illness during which it had been written terminated in the poor author's early death. The thoughtless and volatile, but goodnatured and generous, character of Farquhar is reflected in his comedies, which, with less sparkle, have more natural life and airiness, and are animated by a finer spirit of whim, than those of either Vanbrugh or Congreve. His morality, like theirs, is abundantly free and easy; but there is much more heart about his profligacy than in theirs, as well as much less grossness or hardness. To these names may be added that of Colley Cibber, who has, however, scarcely any pretensions to be ranked as one of our classic dramatists, although, of about two dozen comedies, tragedies, and other pieces of which he is the author, his Careless Husband and one or two others may be admitted to be lively and agreeable. Cibber, who was born in 1671, produced his first play, the comedy of Love's Last Shift, in 1696, and was still an occasional writer for the stage after the commencement of the reign of George II.; one of his productions, indeed, his tragedy entitled Papal Tyranny, was brought out so late as the year 1745, when he himself performed one of the principal characters; and he lived till 1757. His well-known account of his own life, or his Apology for his Life, as he modestly or affectedly calls it, is an amusing piece of something higher than gossip; the sketches he gives of the various celebrated actors of his time are many of them executed, not perhaps with the deepest insight, but yet with much graphic skill in so far as regards those mere superficial characteristics that meet the ordinary eye. The chief tragic writer of this age was Nicholas Rowe, the author of the Fair Penitent and Jane Shore, of five other tragedies, one comedy, and a translation in rhyme of Lucan's Pharsalia. Rowe, who was born in 1673, and died in 1718, was esteemed in his own day a great master of the pathetic, but is now regarded as little more than a smooth and occasionally sounding versifier.

Many other minor writers both of verse and of prose we must pass over altogether; but two poetical names still remain too eminent to be omitted. Dr. Edward Young, the celebrated author of the Night Thoughts, was born in 1681 and lived till 1765, but his works were all written and published within the present period. He may be shortly characterised as, at least in manner, a sort of successor, under the reign of Pope and the new style established by him and Dryden, of the Donnes and the Cowleys of a former age. He had nothing, however, of Donne's subtle fancy, and as little of the gaiety and playfulness that occasionally break out among the quibbles and contortions of Cowley. On the other hand he has much more passion and pathos than Cowley, and, with less elegance, perhaps makes a nearer approach in some of his greatest passages to the true sublime. But his style is radically an affected and false one; and of what force it seems to possess the greater part is the result, not of any real principle of life within it, but of mere strutting and straining. Nothing can be more unlike the poetry of the Night Thoughts than that of the Seasons. If Young is all art and effort, Thomson is all negligence and nature; so negligent, indeed, that he pours forth his unpremeditated song apparently without the thought ever occurring to him that he could improve it by any study or elaboration, any more than if he were some winged warbler of the woodlands, seeking and caring for no other listener except the universal air which the strain made vocal. As he is the poet of nature, so his poetry has all the intermingled rudeness and luxuriance of its theme. There is no writer who has drunk in more of the inmost soul of his subject. If it be the object of descriptive poetry to present us with pictures and visions the effect of which shall vie with that of the originals from which they are drawn, then Thomson is the greatest of all descriptive poets; for there is no other who surrounds us with so much of the truth of Nature, or makes us feel so intimately the actual presence and companionship of all her hues and fragrances. His spring blossoms and gives forth its beauty like a daisied meadow; and his summer landscapes have all the sultry warmth and green luxuriance of June; and his harvest fields and his orchards "hang the heavy head" as if their fruitage were indeed embrowning in the sun; and we see and hear the driving of his winter snows, as if the air around us were in confusion with their uproar. The beauty and purity of imagination, also, diffused over the melodious stanzas of the Castle of Indolence, make that poem one of the gems of the language. Thomson died in 1748, in his forty-eighth year. His countryman and contemporary, Allan Ramsay, the author of the Gentle Shepherd, and of many songs and other shorter poetical pieces written in his native dialect, survived till 1758, when he died at the age of seventy-three. Ramsay's lyrics, though often coarse, have, many of them, considerable rustic hilarity and humour; and his well-known pastoral, though its dramatic pretensions otherwise are slender enough, has much nature and truth both in the characters and the manners.

Our space will allow us barely to add the names of Parnell, Savage, Dyer, Robert Blair, Collins, Shenstone, Akenside, and Gray in poetry,—of Mandeville, Hutcheson, Berkeley, and Hartley in philosophy,—of Butler, Warburton, Hoadley, Middleton, Secker, and Watts, in theology,—and of the novelists, Fielding, Richardson, Sterne, and Smollet,—as the most remarkable of the remaining writers belonging to this period. Several of these, however, survived the accession of George III., although their works were mostly produced before that epoch. Johnson, Hume, Smith, Burke, and others of the most distinguished writers of the next reign, had also already begun to court the public attention.

CHAPTER VI.

THE HISTORY OF MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

THE dress of the upper classes, both male and female, during the reign of William III. differed but little from that which had become fashionable towards the close of Charles II's. Strait square-cut coats, and waistcoats of equal length reaching to the knee;

breeches fastened beneath the knee, but hidden by the long stockings which were drawn up over them; long neckcloths of Flanders or Spanish point lace; shoes, the upper leathers of which rose considerably above the instep and were fastened by a small strap over it, passing through a buckle placed rather on one side; hats bent up or cocked all round and trimmed with feathers; fringed gloves and monstrous periwigs, which it was the fashion to comb publicly, formed the habit of the beaux of London. The ladies seem to have adopted some of the Dutch fashions. The stomacher appears more formally hecd. The sleeves of the gown become strait and tight, and terminate with a cuff above the elbow, in imitation of those of the male sex. Rows of flounces and furbelows or falbalas border the petticoat, which is disclosed by the gown being looped completely back. The head dress was exceedingly high in front, being composed of a cap, the lace of which rose in three or more tiers almost to a point above the forehead, the hair being combed up and disposed in rows of wavy curls one above the other, in a way which must be seen to be understood, and we must therefore refer our readers to the accompanying engravings.

Hair-powder was worn occasionally, but not generally.

The dress of the commonalty underwent no alteration. Footmen were forbidden to wear swords or any offensive weapon, "within the cities of London and Westminster and the liberties and precincts of the same," by an order of the Earl Marshal of England, gazetted January 1, 1701.

COSTUME OF THE NOBILITY AND GENTRY, TEMP. WILLIAM AND MARY.

From Prints by Romain de Hooge, 1689, and Costumes by Myer, 1691.

COSTUME OF THE COMMONALTY, TEMP. WILLIAM AND MARY.
From Prints by Romain de Hooge, 1689, and Mauron's Cries of London

Muffs were carried by both sexes. They were very small and ornamented sometimes with large bows of ribands. Leopard skin muffs were fashionable in 1702.

The reign of Queen Anne was distinguished by no particular alteration in the male costume. The hat became smaller and was more regularly cocked on three sides, and the cuffs of the coats, worn very large, descended a little nearer to the wrist. The broad sword-belt had vanished, and the sword-hilt now peeped from between the stiffened skirts of the square-cut coat. Blue or scarlet silk stockings, with gold or silver clocks, were much worn; and shoes, with high red heels and small buckles; velvet garters were worn over the stockings below knee and fastened by small buckles on one side. The campaign wig was imported from France. They were made very full, curled eighteen inches in length to the front with drop locks. "When human hair was scarce," says Malcolm, "a little horsehair supplied the place in the parts least in sight." We also read of black riding wigs, bag wigs, and nightcap wigs.

The dress of a youth in the middle ranks of life is thus described in an advertisement issued in 1703:—"He is of fair complexion with light brown lank hair, having, on a dark brown frieze coat double-breasted on each side, with black buttons and button-holes; a light druggat waistcoat, red shag breeches striped with black stripes and black stockings."

Mourning rings were worn in 1703, and black silk facings to coats of all colours. The battle of Ramilies, fought in 1706, gave name to a peculiar cock of the hat, and to a long gradually diminishing plaited tail to the wig, with a great bow at the top and a small one at the bottom; as also to the peruke itself which was called a Ramilie wig, and was worn as late as the reign of George III. The ridiculous long wigs of 1710 were very expensive. One was advertised as stolen in that year worth five guineas, and Duumvir's "fair wig," in the Tatler (No. 54), "cost forty guineas." In the same work also a ludicrous advertisement contains the following notice:—"N. B. Dancing shoes not exceeding four inches height in the heel, and periwigs not exceeding three feet in length, are carried in the coach-box gratis." Bickerstaff mentions casually the beau's pearl-coloured stockings, red-topped shoes, fringed gloves, large wigs, and feathers in the hat under the same date.

Those who did not wear powder, and who objected to the enormous expense or weight of the fashionable wigs, wore their own hair in long curls to resemble them, and a Mr. Michon, a goldsmith, advertised in 1710 that he had "found out a clear water" which would convert grey or red hair into brown or black.

In 1714 a Mr. John Osheal had the misfortune to be robbed of "a scarlet cloth suit laced with broad gold lace, lined and faced with blue; a fine cinnamon cloth suit with plate-buttons, the waistcoat fringed with a silk fringe of the same colour, and a rich yellow-flowered satin morning gown,"

GENERAL COSTUME, TEMP. ANNE.

From Print dated 1706—1709, and figures in Jeffries' 'Collecti

lined with cherry-coloured satin, with a pocket on the right side.”

The dress of the ladies for the first eight or nine years of Queen Anne's reign differed little from that introduced during that of her immediate predecessors; but in 1711 two vast changes took place. The first was the abandonment of the monstrously high heads and caps, the tower and commode, &c., for a natural and elegant coiffure, observable in the best known portraits of her majesty, and highly praised by Addison in the Spectator, who says, “I remember several ladies who were once very near seven feet high that at present want some inches of five.” The second was the introduction of the hoop. This well-known article of female attire was invented by a celebrated mantua-maker of the name of Selby, whose death is announced in the Weekly Journal of 1717. In the month of July, 1711, we find that the new-fashioned petticoat had swollen out to an enormous size, so that what the ladies had lost in height they made up in breadth; and a correspondent, speaking of the unfashionable country ladies at sixty miles' distance from London, says they can absolutely walk in their hooped petticoats without inconvenience.

The fashion of patching the face, which was introduced at least as early as 1680, was at this period carried to a great extent. Its application to party politics we shall presently have occasion to notice.

Powder was worn more by gentlemen than by ladies, the latter assuming sometimes even the male periwig when taking the air on horseback. A lady's riding suit of this period is described in the 104th Number of the Spectator, as consisting of a coat and waistcoat of blue camlet trimmed and embroidered with silver, with a petticoat of the same stuff, by which alone her sex was recognised, as she wore a smartly cocked beaver-hat edged with silver and rendered more sprightly by a feather; while her hair, curled and powdered, hung to a considerable length down her shoulders, tied like that of a rakish young gentleman, with a long streaming scarlet riband.*

The sacque and the hood were still worn;—the latter, which during the previous reign was commonly black silk, velvet, or sarcenet, we now find of various colours. “A spotted hood” is advertised as having been stolen, in the Post Boy of Nov. 15, 1709. Blue, yellow, pink, and green hoods were worn at the Opera in 1711, and cherry-coloured hoods were the rage in 1712. The following remarkable articles of female apparel are mentioned by Malcolm, from advertisements dated during the first twelve years of the eighteenth century:—“A gown of orange damask lined with striped silk—a head with very fine looped lace of very great value—a Flanders laced hood—a pair of double ruffles and tuckers—two laced aprons, one point, the other Flanders lace—and a large black scarf embroidered with gold."—These were all stolen during a fire which occurred in Red Lion Square in 1700. A black silk petticoat with a red and white calico border, cherry-coloured stays trimmed with blue and silver, a red and dove-coloured damask gown flowered with large trees, a yellow satin apron trimmed with white Persian muslin, head cloths with crow-foot edging, double ruffles with fine edging, a black silk furbelowed scarf, and a spotted hood: these were stolen in November, 1709. The lace-chamber, on Ludgate Hill, in 1710, advertises "one Brussels head at 40*l.*; one ground Brussels head at 30*l.*; one looped Brussels head at 30*l.*"

* This fashion of tying the hair is said to have been first introduced by the noted Lord Bolingbroke.—See Nash's Collect. for Worcester-shire, i. 561.

In 1712 were advertised for sale an Isabella coloured kincob gown, flowered with green and gold; a dark-coloured cloth gown and petticoat with two silver orrices;* a purple and gold atlas gown; a scarlet and gold atlas petticoat edged with silver; a wrought under-petticoat edged with gold; a black velvet petticoat; an allejah petticoat striped with green, gold, and white; a blue and silver silk gown and petticoat; a blue and gold atlas gown and petticoat; and clogs laced with silver.

In the same year were lost "a green silk knit waistcoat, with gold and silver flowers all over it, and about fourteen yards of gold and silver thick lace on it; and a petticoat of rich strong flowered satin, red and white, all in great flowers or leaves, and scarlet flowers with black specks brocaded in, raised high like velvet or shag."

So much for names and descriptions; for shapes we must refer to the engraver.

* A peculiar sort of lace.

GENERAL COSTUME, TEMP. GEORGE I. Selected from early works of Hogarth.

The reign of George I. offers no particular feature for remark. Wigs maintained their ground: and in 1720 white hair, for the manufacture of them, bore a monstrous price. In the Original Weekly Journal for that year it is stated that the hair of a woman who lived to the age of 170 (probably a misprint for 107) was sold, after her death, to a periwig-maker for 50*l.*

Powder became more general, but not amongst the military, it would seem, as, according to the Flying Post of June 14th, 1722, the Bishop of Durham (Dr. Talbot) appeared on horseback at a review, in the king's train, in a lay habit of purple, with jack boots, and his hat cocked, and a black wig tied behind him, like a militant officer.

The ladies wore hooped petticoats, scarlet cloaks with hoods, termed cardinals, and masks when walking. Black and white beaver hats for ladies were advertised in 1719, faced with coloured silks and trimmed with gold or silver lace. The sacque was still in vogue. The paintings of Watteau, who died in 1721, and of Lancret, who died in 1724, though their works are much tinged with fancy, are to a certain extent authorities for the dress of this and the preceding reign.

The reign of George II. furnishes us with hosts of authorities. The paintings of the unrivalled Hogarth alone form a gallery of fashions of the most instructive and amusing description.

The following picture of a beau of 1737, in doggre^o of the day, is given by Malcolm from Mist's Journal :—

Take one of the brights from St. James's or White's, Twill best be if nigh six feet he prove high,
Then take of fine linen enough to wrap him in,

Right Mechin must twist round his bosom and wrist.
 Red heels to his shoes, gold clocks to his hose,
 With calves quantum suff,—for a muff;
 In black velvet brooches let him put all his riches,
 Then cover his waist with a suit that's well faced;
 'Tis best if he wears not more than ten hairs,
 To keep his brains cool, on each side of his skull.
 Let a queue be prepared twice as long as a yard, Short measure I mean,—there is great odds between:
 This done, your bean place before a large glass.
 The recipe to fulfil, mix with powder pulvil.
 And then let it moulder away on his shoulder.
 Let a sword then be tied up to his left side,
 And under his arm place his hat for a charm;
 Then let him learn dancing, and to ride horses prancing;
 Italian and French, to drink and to wench:
 Oh, then, with what wonder will he fill the beau monde here.

The Universal Spectator of 1730, quoted by Malcolm, says, "The wearing of swords at the court end of the town is by many polite young gentlemen laid aside; and, instead thereof, they carry large oak sticks, with great heads and ugly faces carved thereon." We give an engraving illustrative of this particular fashion, as well as of the general dress of the day, from a well-known print representing the Mall in St. James's Park, with old Buckingham House, in 1735. Amongst other peculiarities the reader will distinguish that the high-crowned hat is worn by several females: and we find in the Weekly Register of July 10th, 1731, that it had then first made its re-appearance:—"The high-crowned hat, after having been confined to cots and villagee for so long a time, is become the favourite mode of quality, and is the politest distinction of a fashionable undress."* Perukes were a highly important article in 1734. Those of light gray human hair were four guineas each, light grizzle ties three guineas; and other colours in proportion, down to twenty-five shillings. Bright gray human hair cue perukes were from two guineas to fifteen shillings each, and bob-perukes of the same material a little dearer. Malcolm adds, "It will be observed, from the gradation in price, that real gray hair was most in fashion, and dark of no estimation."

ALAMODE, 1735.

The following extracts give us a description of the full or court dress of 1735:—"On his majesty's birth-day the queen was in a beautiful suit made of silk of the produce of Georgia. . . . The noblemen and gentlemen wore chiefly at court brown flowered velvets, or dark cloth coats laced with gold or silver, or plain velvets of various colours, and breeches of the same. Their waistcoats were either gold stuffs, or rich flowered silks of a large pattern with a white ground; the make much the same as has been worn some time, only many had open sleeves to their coats: their tie-wigs were with large curls, setting forward and rising from the forehead, though not very high: the ties were thick and longer than of late, and both behind; some few had bag-wigs.

* Malcolm's Anecdotes, ii. 331.

"The ladies wore flowered silks of various sorts of a large pattern, but mostly with a white ground, with wide short sleeves, and short petticoats: their gowns were pinned up variously behind, though mostly narrow. Some few had gold or silver nets on their petticoats, and to their facings and robings; and some had gold and silver nets on their gown sleeves, like flounces: they wore chiefly fine scalloped laced heads, and dressed mostly English. Some few had their hair curled down on the sides, but most of them had it pinned up quite short, and almost all of them with powder both before and behind.

"Some few had their heads made up Dutch, some with cockades of ribands on the side, and others with artificial flowers; they wore treble escalloped laced ruffles, one full tacked up before and two down, but all three down behind, though some few had two falls tacked up and one down before. Laced tippets were much worn; some had diamond solitaires to hook them together, others had their jewels made up bows and ends. Those without tippets had mostly very broad-laced tuckers, with diamond necklaces and earrings. Diamond buckles were much worn in the shoes both of the gentlemen and ladies. Lord Castlemain made a very splendid appearance among the young noblemen in a rich gold stuff coat, as Lady Harcourt did among the ladies in a white ground rich silk embossed with gold and silver, and fine coloured flowers of a large pattern.

The editor of the London Evening Post, in December, 1738, makes a lady of fashion complain of the dress of gentlemen at the play in the following terms:—"Some of them had those loose kind of great coats on, which I have heard called wrappers, with gold-laced hats slouched, in humble imitation of stage-coachmen; others aspired at being grooms, and had dirty boots and spurs, with black caps on and long whips in their hands: a third wore scanty frocks, little shabby hats put on one side, and clubs in their hands."

These fashions will be all observed in the print before alluded to, and it is interesting to compare it with the companion print of fashions in 1745, from which we also give an engraving. Claret-coloured cloths were now considered as handsome suits; and light blue, with silver button-holes and silver garters to the knees, was very fashionable between 1740 and 1751.

* Vide also a similar description of the court dresses on the marriage of Frederick Prince of Wales, in the Weekly Journal, May 1, 1736, and Malcolm's Anecdotes, l. 303.

In 1753 The Adventurer (No. 101) contains a description of the gradual metamorphosis of a green-horn into a blood. "I cut off my hair and procured a brown bob periwig of Wilding, of the same colour, with a single row of curls put round the bottom, which I wore very nicely combed and without powder. My hat, which had been cocked with great exactness in an equilateral triangle, I discarded, and purchased one of a more fashionable size, the fore-corner of which projected near two inches further than those on each side, and was moulded into the shape of a spout." This latter fashion, however, we find he altered by considerably elevating and shortening the fore-corner of it "till it no longer resembled a spout, but the corner of a minced pie." To this form of hat succeeded the larger one from Germany called the Kevenhuller.

With respect to the ladies' dress of this reign, we find that in 1745 the hoop had increased at the sides and diminished in front; and a pamphlet was published in that year, entitled "The Enormous Abomination of the Hoop-petticoat as the Fashion now is." In 1755 it was so much reduced as to be scarcely discernible in some figures; but two years afterwards we find it re-expanding right and left into the last and most familiar shape assumed by that monstrosity within the recollection of the present generation.

In 1745-6 gipsy straw hats are seen, and little bonnets tied under the chin almost of the modern shape. Long aprons were worn in 1744; then short ones; and before 1752 long ones again, as in that year a lady is made to exclaim, "Short aprons are coming into fashion again."* In the same year we hear of a successor to the hood under the name of a capuchin. Patches were much used,

* Gray's Inn Journal, No. 7.

ALAMODE, 1745.

GENERAL COSTUME, TEMP. GEORGE II.
From Prints of the Trial and Execution of the Rebel Lords. 1746.

and bracelets worn over long gloves. In 1751 we read of the loss of a lady's "white fustian riding-habit turned up with blue and laced with silver, a petticoat of the same, and a waistcoat trimmed also with silver."* Three years before this we hear of

* Malcolm's Anecdotes, vol. ii. p. 336.

the Duchess of Bedford being met by George II. on horseback, her grace being attired in a riding-habit of blue faced with white; with the effect of which the king was so much struck, that, a uniform for the navy having been at that time under consideration, his majesty immediately ordered those colours to be adopted.* A uniform for the army had been long previously in existence : the exact date of its introduction it would be perhaps difficult to determine ; but, as the cuirass and buff coat were abandoned about the close of the reign of William III., the scarlet and blue national uniform became, we presume, definitely established in that of Queen Anne, in which reign also the musket with the socket bayonet superseded the pike, the cartouch-box the bandelier, and the gorget, the last piece of ancient defensive armour, dwindled into the ornamental trifle which has been latterly altogether discarded. The red and white feather appears first in Queen Anne's reign, and the black cockade in George II.'s. Hogarth, in his "March to Finchley," furnishes us with the dress of the grenadiers in 1745. The cap that is there seen was worn, however, as early as Queen Anne's reign, as an original one is preserved at Goodrich Court.

MILITARY COSTUME, TEMP. GEORGE II.
Selected from Hogarth's March to Finchley.

For the more minute changes of cut and colour in the uniforms of the various regiments during the first half of the eighteenth century, we must refer the reader to the Memorials of the British Army now publishing (one number or volume being dedicated to each regiment) from the very best authorities, the work having been originally undertaken by command of his late majesty King William IV., as we have not space for such details as that subject would necessarily lead us into.

The commencement of the eighteenth century may be said to have completed the furnishing of our English mansions, and supplied them with nearly every article of convenience or luxury which they at present possess, and generally made in so superior a style, in respect both of elegance of form and durability of material, that original furniture of that period is now greedily sought after, and imitations of it widely fabricated to meet the demand. Nor is this rage for furniture "à la Louis Quatorze" and "à la Louis Quinze" to be wondered at after the poor, tasteless, comfortable, mockery of the "classical style" introduced subsequently to the French Revolution, and but recently discarded. In 1703 one of the earliest works on furniture and ornamental architecture was published by the Sieur de Marot, architect to King William III., containing the most elegant designs for fauteuils, canapés, beds, tables, mirrors, girandoles, candelabras, mantel-pieces, &c. The passion for porcelain at that period is particularly illustrated by the engraving of a room fitted up "à la Chinoise," with quantities of small brackets following the outlines of the panels, mantel-piece, glass, &c., on each of which stands a small cup, saucer, jar, or other china ornament. The plays of this date have also continual allusions to the purchase of china-ware tea-cups, jars, monsters, and mandarins, by ladies of quality. Japanned cabinets and folding screens were also much in fashion about this time.

The principal novelty, however, of this date was the introduction of mahogany. A block of it was sent at the end of the seventeenth century to Dr. Gibbons, a physician of London; and the beauty of the wood when wrought up became so attractive that it speedily engrossed universal attention. Requiring no additional embellishment from painting

* Paper by Mr. Locker, one of the commissioners of Greenwich Hospital, read before the Society of Antiquaries, March 18th, 1830.

SITTING-ROOM FURNITURE, TEMP. WILLIAM III.
Selected from Specimens at Knole, and in Private Collections.

CABINET CHAIRS, ETC., TEMP. WILLIAM III. AND ANNE.
From Specimens in Private Collections.

SOFA, CHAIRS, CABINET, ETC., TEMP. WILLIAM III. AND ANNE.
Selected from Specimens at Penshurst and in Private Collections.

BED, CABINET, CHAIRS, ETC., TEMP. GEORGE I. AND II.
From Specimens in Private Collections and in Prints of the Period.

SITTING-ROOM FURNITURE, TEMP. GEORGE I. AND II.
Selected from Specimens in Private Collections and from Prints of the period.

and gilding, and its beauty increasing rather than diminishing by use and age, it rapidly superseded all other woods for the general purposes of cabinet-making, and was also chosen for the embellishment of churches and other public edifices, as the exquisitely carved pulpits, columns, galleries, banisters, doors, &c., of such buildings both here and on the continent sufficiently testify. In addition to the Chinese porcelain, both for use and ornament, the manufactures of Holland, Germany, France, &c., enlightened by the revelations of a Jesuit named D'Entrecolles, in 1712, contributed their productions, and candlesticks, inkstands, hand-bells, and a multiplicity of articles for the toilet and writing-table were added to the dinner, tea, and coffee-services composed of this novel and beautiful material. With the close of the seventeenth century, too, the making of flint-glass had arrived at sufficient perfection in this country to render us independent of foreigners for the supply of the common articles of decanters, drinking-glasses, &c.; but for plate-glass we were still indebted to Venice; an establishment founded at Lambeth by the Duke of Buckingham, in 1673, having failed shortly afterwards.* The art of making what are called Brussels carpets was introduced at Kidderminster in 1745, from Tournay, and by the end of the reign of George II. the floors of all respectable houses were carpeted as at present.

The circumstances in which the present period commenced sufficiently account for the political spirit that now diffused itself throughout English society, and the warm party-feeling that took possession of all classes, giving rise to various new habits of life, and extensively influencing the manners and customs of the time. Old and young, rich and poor, men and women, now became alike politicians; contention about affairs of state overran not only literature and religion, the coffee-house and the church, but the places of public amusement, and the very street merriment of the populace. In 1737 Walpole found himself so much annoyed by the satire and abuse levelled at his administration from the stage, that he brought in and carried through parliament a bill prohibiting the acting of any play for the future without the authority of the lord chamberlain—a restriction on the liberty of theatrical representation, which, as is well known, remains still unrepealed. Some years before this, in 1711, a procession of wax figures which had been announced for the birthday of Queen Elizabeth, the 17th of November, so much annoyed the government, that a secretary of state's warrant was issued for the apprehension of the puppets. Even Punch abandoned his domestic brawls for public feuds, and might be heard, at the corners of streets, gibbering for or against the existing order of things at the pleasure of his employer. The reign of Anne, and still more those of the two first Georges, abounded in female politicians. Lady Sunderland, the second daughter of the Duke of Marlborough, and commonly called the Little Whig, had, like her mother, a beautiful head of hair; and, with her fair tresses, she was wont to angle for the hearts of the Tories, by receiving at her toilet all those gentlemen whose votes or interest she wished to secure, and dressing her head while they stood by.† At public places the political party to which a lady belonged was to be known by the arrangement of her patches. The Spectator gives a humorous description of a beautiful Whig lady who had a natural mole, like a patch, upon the Tory side of her brow, by which she was sometimes mistaken for an ally by her political opponents; and thus, like a privateer under false colours, she often sunk the unwary enemy by an unexpected broadside.‡ At the theatre the female Whigs and Tories sat also upon opposite sides of the house, while those ladies who had not yet declared themselves patched both sides of the brow, and occupied the middle boxes. Another method by which they announced their party-feelings was, by the colour of their hoods, when these had become a fashionable head-dress.‡

Places of public resort and political discussion for gentlemen had, by the beginning of the eighteenth century, multiplied in an inconceivable degree in London, in the shape of club-houses, chocolate-houses, and coffee-houses. Of the chocolate-houses, the chief were the Cocoa Tree and White's; the principal coffee-houses were St. James's, the Smyrna, Mrs. Rochford's, and the British. All these were so near each other, that in less than an hour one might see the company at all of them. As for the club-houses, they were so numerous, that, besides the large ones, there was one or more for almost every parish, in which the citizens regaled themselves after the business of the day, and found fault with the management of public affairs. As might have been expected, the rival parties kept by their respective houses of resort; so that a Whig would not go to the Cocoa Tree or Ofinda's, and a Tory would not be seen in St. James's.§ In entering a coffee-house, the customer had only to pay a penny at the bar; and for this he was not only regaled with a cup of coffee, but accommodated with the newspapers of the day, both English and foreign, and the newest pamphlets on morals and politics. In these places politicians were wont (if they were so fortunate as to gather hearers, where all were ready to speak) to settle the balance of Europe, to crown and depose kings at pleasure, and to prove that England was upon the brink of ruin, to their hearts' contentment. In this spirit the tradesman forsook his shop, and the merchant his warehouse, to take care of the state, and harangue upon the miscon-

* The art of etching upon glass was discovered by Henry Schwanhard, in 1670. Smelling-glasses and decanters, particularly of Dutch or German manufacture, were elaborately engraved with heraldic devices, hunting subjects, &c.

• Walpole's Reminiscences of the Reign of George I.

† Spectator, No. 81.

‡ Spectator, No. 258.

§ A journey through England, Scotland, and Ireland; by John Macky. Lond., 1722. Vol. 1.

THE FOLLY; a floating Coffee-house on the Thames, opposite Somerset House.
From a Print by Knyff. 1709.

duct of the ministry, without thinking of his own; and, as a necessary consequence, the approaches to a club-house had often an ambushment of bailiffs and bailiffs' followers on the look-out for these disinterested patriots; so that an oratorical financier, after he had satisfactorily cleared off the debts of the nation, was often walked to the sponging-house for being unable to settle a paltry bill. One mark of the political quidnuncs of this age was, to have the upper lip well besmeared with snuff, which was supposed to impart an air of peculiar sagacity to the whole countenance.* To counteract the preponderance of the Tories, at the beginning of the reign of George I., the friends of the Hanoverian succession established places of political resort, called mug-houses, in all the corners of London, for the well-affected citizens and tradesmen, to keep up a spirit of public zeal for the protestant succession. At these meetings, however, strong liquors were in plentiful circulation, and the members often rushed out to attack the Tories under the double inspiration of ale and patriotism, in consequence of which riotous excesses the mug-houses had to be suppressed by act of parliament.†

Among the fashionable classes, however, the spirit of gallantry was still more active and potent than that of politics. It clearly appears, from the popular literature of the earlier half of the eighteenth century, that the generality of men dressed, looked, acted, and studied, entirely with a reference to the tastes and humours of the fair sex. In the present day, when love is but an episode, rather than the great subject of life, a lady's man of the time of Queen Anne or George I. would be regarded as a sort of lusus nature; but the following features, grouped together from the various sketches of the period, will convey an idea of a numerous class of human beings now happily extinct. From ten till twelve o'clock the fashionable beau received visits in bed, where he lay in state, his periwig, superbly powdered, lying beside him on the sheets, while his dressing-table was sprinkled with a few volumes of love-poetry, a canister or two of Lisbon or Spanish snuff, a smelling-bottle, and sundry fashionable trinkets. At twelve he rose, and managed to finish the business of the toilet by three o'clock. In this complicated process he perfumed his clothes; soaked his hands in washes to make them white and delicate; tinged his cheeks with carminative, so as to give them the gentle blush which nature had denied; arranged, perhaps, a few patches upon his face, to produce the effect of moles and dimples; dipped his handkerchief in rose-water, and powdered his linen, to banish from it the smell of soap. The tying of his cravat was also a weighty operation that occupied much time, as well as the adjustment of his wig and the proper cock of his hat. After he had surveyed the whole arrangement in his looking-glass, it was necessary to practise before it the most becoming attitudes to give his finery its full effect, and study such smiles as would show the whiteness of his teeth to most advantage. He then dined; after which he ordered a chair, and repaired at four to some coffee or chocolate-house, where he endeavoured to exhibit his wit or his gallantry—the former, by railing at the last publication, or giving mysterious hints that he had some hand in producing it; the latter, by pulling out some tailor's or laundress's bill, and kissing it with great fervour, pretending that it was a billet-doux from a celebrated toast or lady of high rank. The bar of a coffee-house was generally superintended by some belle belonging to the establishment, whose charms were intended to draw customers to the place; and here the beau usually paid his devoirs, with his arms a-kimbo, and his nose within an inch of her face, while the poor damsel, who had no place of retreat, was compelled to give ear to his impertinences.* After spending an hour in this manner, it was time to repair to the theatre; upon which our spark re-adjusted his cravat and wig, sprinkled his face with snuff to give himself a critical air, and repaired to the house: but there, instead of seating himself quietly, he shifted from seat to seat, and traversed alternately the boxes, pit, and gallery, to exhibit his attractions and win attention. Amidst these vagaries the "nice conduct of his clouded cane" was not forgotten, the frequent consequential tap upon his snuff-box lid (garnished most commonly with some indecent picture), or the graceful presentation of the pinch of snuff to his nose, so as to display to advantage the rich brilliant in his ring. It was shockingly vulgar to attend to the play, and therefore he turned his back upon the stage. From the play, he repaired to the park, buzzing and fluttering from lady to lady, chattering to each a jargon of bad English, worse French, and worst Latin, and was rewarded with many a rap on the shoulders from their fans, and the epithets of "Mad fellow"—"Dear, tormenting devil," &c. &c. When his lounge was ended he dropped into some fashionable party in Pall Mall or St. James's Square, to spend two or three hours at ombre or tic-tac, where he chatted his empty nothings, and lost his money with an air of fashionable indifference. This beau was ably matched by the assembled belles with their tower-like head-dresses, looking in their huge hoops as if they were enclosed in puncheons or in go-carts. A less elaborately constructed beau than the foregoing was conspicuous by "a cane dangling at his button, his breast open, no gloves, one eye tucked under his hat, and a tooth-pick."* But there were many ladies who required, of course, admirers made of sterner stuff; and, therefore, there were also abundance of those who, in the language of the day, were called bully-beaus—fellows who maintained a reputation for courage and enterprise by empty swagger and violent assaults upon the peaceable members of society. These were the personages who figured in Ramelies perukes, laced hats, black cockades, and scarlet suits; frequented the Tilt Yard Coffee-house, the great resort of military men, that they might be taken to belong to the army; manfully pulled the noses of those quiet citizens at the theatre who wore no swords;† and at length plucked up courage to break a head, by practising a little upon a tavern-drawer, or a box-keeper at the playhouse. An individual of such a stamp is thus sketched in Congreve's Old Bachelor:—"He is a pretender, and wears the habit of a soldier. . . . You must know he has been abroad—went purely to run away from a campaign; enriched himself with the plunder of a few outlaws—and here vents them against the general, who, slighting men of merit, and preferring only those of interest, has made him quit the service."

* Tatler, Nos. 35 and 46.

† Macky's Journal, Vol. i.

* Works of Thomas Brown, Vol. III. p. 66.—Spectator, passim.

‡ The attractions of dress being of such paramount importance to the gallants of the period, the mercers found their account in continually devising new fashions; and the way in which they recommended their wares was frank and honest enough. The master of a fashionable shop, or his apprentice, (if his figure was worthy of being made a clothes'-block,) had a waistcoat made of the newest rich silk that was to be brought into vogue. He then took his station at the shop-door, dressed in a black coat, with the breast thrown open to exhibit the new pattern, a pair of white stockings, and a light-coloured, well powdered bob-wig. He thus spent the day exhibiting his waistcoat and recommending its elegant colours and texture to the passers by; and the beaux were attracted and caught, like moths by the glare of a candle. In this way a pretence of Paternoster Row often set the fashion in dress to the west end of the town.*

To the charms of dress and address, however, it was an advantage for the gallant if he added something of literary accomplishment—if he were as graceful in the flourish of a pen as of a cane. To compose a good billet-doux was well; to be or at least to pass for somewhat of a linguist was better still; but to have the knack of tapping a few rhymes in laudation of a lady, or her lapdog, was a qualification that usually carried everything before it. The learning, however, of a literary beau generally consisted in little more than in having read all those collections of the day called miscellany poems, a few comedies, and in such an acquaintanceship with Ovid's Epistles (in English) as enabled him to quote them when the occasion required. Thus equipped, he was a complete intellectual Adonis whose charms none could resist, and from whose critical verdicts there was no appeal; and the entrance of such a favoured individual into company was generally marked by "an elevated chest, a pinched hat, a measurable step, and a sly surveying eye."†

The general style of courtship by which ladies were wooed and won comported with the character of the unintellectual coxcombs by whom the incense was offered; and in a love-speech angels, gods, racks, furies, tortures, and demons "ran through all the mazes of metaphorical confusion." This ridiculous medley, seasoned with poetical rant from the plays of Lee, Otway, and Dryden, and uttered with correspondent pomp and fervour, beat down the strongest defences of a female heart, and the fair "victor stood subdued by sound." Custom had sanctioned these forced expressions of feeling; the metaphors and phraseology were all ready at hand; and the swains of the day had not so much genius, or originality, as to strike into some new unbeat path: Add to this, that female education had not advanced so far as to enable women to detect the absurdity of such vapid lip-worship, so that it appeared to them the language of truth and propriety, more especially as it was familiarised to their minds by the example of the heroes of the stage. They were delighted to be deified by the adoration of an Anthony, or an Oroondates, and would have broken their fans in disdain had a

* The Character of the Beau. Lon., 1696.

† Spectator, No. 156.

* Cibber's Careless Husband.

† Spectator, No. 267.

lover presumed to address them in the prosaic language of nature and sincerity. Even when courtship was of a more refined character, its language was still artificial, being wholly fashioned upon the old classical models of Greece and Italy. In this case, while the enamoured parties shivered under a December sky of England they professed to think of Arcadian bowers, and to fancy themselves among groves of myrtle; the spicy gales of Paphos were quoted by the lover while his teeth chattered in the face of an icy north-wind; and even the honest village church in the distance was a temple, where Venus and Cupid smiled propitiously, while Hymen waited at the altar. To finish the picture we must fancy the solemn entrances and exits of the parties, so like the measured steps of an ancient choral dance—the profound congees and bowings of the gentleman, and the demure, slowly-sinking courtesies of the lady, so much in keeping with the stateliness of laced hoop and powdered periwig—and those formal harangues which in the present day so greatly excite an irreverent mirth, when we read them in the institutes of Lord Chesterfield, or the novels of Richardson.

It would have been well if the London gallants had been content to confine their follies and fopperies within the compass of the metropolis. But they were men of enterprise and eager for variety; and, as business was sometimes slack upon their hands, they made country excursions to astonish fox-hunting squires, and make love to their unsophisticated daughters. The fair rustics were dazzled by the surpassing finery of such manners, dress, and speech, while young clodpole esquires were set agog to emulate the captivating visitor. It was thus that many a youth, whose chief hope of triumph was confined to a fox-brush, and whose gayest party was a country wake, was translated into a London beau. As soon as his father had broken his neck over a six-barred gate, or fairly drunk himself out of the world, the rustic aspirant turned his back upon the old mansion of his forefathers, and hied to London, dressed in his best leathern-breeches tied at the knee with red taffeta, his new blue jacket, and his greatcoat with buttons no bigger than nutmegs. Although his entry was so uncouth and unpromising, he took care to announce that he was somebody, in which case he was soon surrounded by those who engaged to lick him into shape, and make a man of him. Bully-beaus and sharpers took him into training; his levee was soon thronged with tailors, silk mercers, and cabinetmakers; with fiddlers and dancing-masters; with prize-fighters, horse-racers, pimps, and parasites; and thus in an incredibly short space of time he was translated, from a raw bumpkin, into a finished gentleman of the town.* He was now ready to run the well-known career of the "Rake's Progress," and his new instructors took care that he should have no time to pause. They first led him into all kinds of dissipation, generally treating him at their own proper cost; and, when they had thus secured his confidence, they gradually allured him to the gaming-table, where he was soon brought to fell his forests, and mortgage his paternal acres. Hogarth has shown us what followed—the dilapidation of fortune—the hated marriage to retrieve it—the fresh course of riot ending in utter beggary—and the closing scene of all in the mad-house. But, if our fine gentleman took the alarm before it was too late, and perceived the gulph that yawned before him, he broke up his establishment, shook himself loose from his lewd associates, and fled homeward, sorely lightened in purse and estate, but enriched at least with experience. He thus settled down, perhaps, into the country oracle of taste and fashion, and the arbiter elegantiarum of a county ball; while at table he regaled his brother squires with wonderful stories of bear-garden exploits, and coffee-house repartees, his midnight scourgings in the streets, or his conquests at masquerades among toasts and countesses.

While such were the mere externals of gallantry, its moral character, during the present period, had undergone little or perhaps no improvement; and the taint which Charles II. and his licentious court had inflicted upon the nation still festered, especially among the aristocracy. The plays, the novels, and the secret memoirs of the eighteenth century exhibit such scenes of depravity as, after making ample allowance for exaggeration, fully equal those of the preceding age. A more striking proof, however, of the immorality of this period is to be found in the writings of those distinguished Essayists who manfully stood in the breach, and arrested the progress of the plague. Although these writers dared to be so singular as to stand aloof from and to denounce the prevailing licentiousness, yet they evidently show by their occasional descriptions that they had not wholly escaped the contamination. Court example, which had introduced the evil into England, would have been necessary to expel it; but until the reign of George III., a royal mistress continued to be maintained at court as a state appendage, by which the public immorality was kept in countenance; and right reverend prelates, as well as grave senators, did not disdain to watch the politics, and profit by the favour, of the predominating lady of the day.

The quality and extent of female education, during the present period, corresponded with the superficial frivolity of the other sex, being confined to those flimsy external accomplishments that were best qualified to attract such unintellectual admirers. Even those accomplishments too were of very small amount—and consisted chiefly of a very little music, some skill in dancing, and as much arithmetic as sufficed for the purposes of card-playing. A fashionable lady was thought to be learned enough if she could barely read and write; if she could finish a letter without notoriously violating the common laws of orthography, she might pass for a wit. Her range of reading was not only limited but demoralising, consisting chiefly of those worthless ephemeral works of fiction, to which we have already alluded; and those plays of the period, to few of which a lady with any pretensions to decorum could go without a mask.*

* Character of the Beau. Lon., 1696.—Hogarth.

The humble estimate that was generally formed as to the essentials of female education may be understood from such expressions in boarding-school advertisements as the following:—"Where young women may be soberly educated, and taught all sorts of learning fit for them."† A girl's schooling, indeed, was made very short work of; by the time she was fourteen or fifteen she was usually introduced into society, and set to begin the serious business of life, that is, to show off her personal attractions so as to get herself a good marriage. These, however, were also the days of runaway marriages, in which love laughed at locksmiths. The enamoured parties had only to hasten to the Fleet, where they were extemporaneously united by some reverend divine who plied his profession within its liberties in defiance of the canon. When, in the course of events, the consequences of such a step became prominent, the lady would sometimes publish, in her own defence, some such manifesto as the following, which is copied from the Post Boy of May 27th, 1712:—"Whereas, for several reasons, the marriage of Mrs. — to Captain — was kept private for some time, which has occasioned some insolent people to censure her virtue; to prevent which censures for the future, it is thought proper to give the public notice that she was married to the said Captain — on the 18th of June last at — church, by license, and before witnesses."‡

If a young lady thus prematurely launched into the world had undergone the probation uncontaminated, or at least undetected, and secured the grand aim of a comfortable settlement, she then displayed the effects of her education and habits upon a more extensive scale, and plunged into all the fashionable amusements of the day with an intensity proportioned to her lack of moral and intellectual resources. A whirl of daily variety being necessary to occupy the emptiness of her mind, she dashed over the town upon a round of visiting, in a carriage with four laced and powdered footmen behind it; and, in paying a visit, she entered a house as if she meant to fire it, and departed as if she had stolen something out of it.† When she was obliged to stay at home she regaled herself with frequent libations of tea, which sometimes was qualified with more potent liquors disguised

* When a play was particularly gross, ladies sometimes stole into the gallery, that they might enjoy it undetected.—Gay's Letters.

† Observator for 1712.

‡ The newspapers of the day also abound with advertisements of runaway wives, warning all shopkeepers and others against giving them credit. This seems to be a new feature in the manners of the country.

† Tatler, No. 109.

COACHES, TEMP. ANNE.

From Prints dated 1713, representing the Parliamentary Procession to St. Paul's.

under gentle appellations.* When her female friends dropped in the scandal of the day commenced, and reputations were torn in tatters, because they were generally incapable of conversing on higher subjects. When she held her levee the dashing rake and notorious profligate had free access, and the lewd jest or double entendre scarcely raised the fan to a single cheek.† It was unfashionable to be religious, and, if a lady of ton went to church, it was to see company, and

* Congreve's Way of the World.

† Spectator, No. 106.

deal curtsies from her pew;* but her Sundays were more commonly spent in the Park and at evening parties of card-playing. Then she patronised French milliners, French hairdressers, and Italian opera-singers; she loved tall footmen and turbaned negro footboys; she doted upon monkeys, paroquets, and lap-dogs; was a perfect critic in old china and Indian trinkets; and could not exist without a raffle or a sale. A day spent by such a lady is thus graphically described by Cibber:—"A married woman may have men at her toilet; invite them to dinner; appoint them a party in a stage-box at the play; engross the conversation there; call them by their Christian names; talk louder than the players; from thence jaunt into the city; take a frolicsome supper at an India house; perhaps, in her gaité de cœur, toast a pretty fellow. Then clatter again to this (west) end of the town; break with the morning into an assembly; crowd to the hazard-table; throw a familiar levant upon some sharp, lurching man of quality, and, if he demands his money, turn it off with a loud laugh, and cry you'll owe it him, to vex him."* This gambling spirit might be characterised as the great female vice of the age. But a lady's debts of honour could not always be thus easily laughed away: on the contrary, the "sharp, lurching man of quality" had often his own ends in view; and a bankrupt female gamester had sometimes to compound with her creditor at the expense of her honour and domestic happiness. Many of the plays and tales of the period turn upon this critical point. A day so spent necessarily borrowed largely from the night, and late hours had therefore become fashionable, although at first they were regarded with wonder and alarm; and sometimes a highly fashionable lady did not return from her tour till two o'clock. The more sober part of the upper classes, however, still went to bed by eleven.†

* We learn from Gay, and other writers, that the fashionable time of going to church was in the afternoon.

The manners of high life being thus frivolous and depraved, and indifference to peaceful, domestic happiness so general, it could not be expected that servants would be either wiser or better than their masters. While, therefore, a gentleman was squandering his money in the gaming-house, the lackey who attended him played at cards on the stairs; and while a fashionable debauch was going on in the dining-room of the tavern, the valets were drinking in equal measure in the kitchen or at the bar. When people of fashion repaired to the Park they were obliged to leave their attendants at the gate; and here the party-coloured tribe amused themselves with boxing and wrestling, and frequently with more reprehensible amusements. It was also their custom, while they were in waiting at the gate, to rehearse all the scandal of their respective establishments, and tell everything that was said and done at home, by which means the privacy and peace of every family were given to the winds.‡ There was also a great deal of high-life-below-stairs dishonesty among servants, who, at their meetings and junketings, not only assumed the names and titles of their masters, but used moreover their choicest wines and viands; and often a smart lackey, when opportunity permitted, dressed himself in his lord's apparel, and sallied to the theatre or the ball-room in quest of intrigues, in which he often out-did the out-doings of his master. These, and still worse excesses, are frequently alluded to by the Essayists as a marked feature of the times; and they were supposed to originate in the practice of keeping servants on board-wages, which was now common in London. But it was at the theatre that the footmen chiefly exhibited their arrogance and untruthfulness. When they attended their masters and mistresses they had been allowed seats in the gallery gratis; and here their numbers, union, and confidence gave them almost unlimited power to annoy an actor or condemn a piece. "I am he," writes a representative of one of these dramatic censors, "that keeps time with beating my cudgel against the boards in the gallery at an opera; I am he that am touched so properly at a tragedy, when the people of quality are staring at one another during the most important incidents. When you hear in a crowd a cry in the right place, a hum when the point is touched in a speech, or a huzza set up where it is the voice of the people, you may conclude it is begun or joined by Thomas Trusty."* Sometimes their criticisms were of a more practical and troublesome character, so that when Cleomenes or Jane Shore was introduced dying of hunger, a shower of crusts would descend from the gallery upon the stage. At length, when their license had become intolerable, the footmen's gallery was closed. This was done on the 5th of May, 1737; but the reform was opposed with all the violence of an O.P. riot. The excluded, to the number of three hundred, armed with offensive weapons of various kinds, assaulted Drury Lane Theatre, broke open the doors, and carried the stage itself by storm, after wounding twenty-five persons, although the Prince of Wales and several of the royal family were present at the time. After a vain attempt to make the riot act heard in the midst of this uproar, the rioters were quelled by force, and thirty of their ringleaders were captured and sent to prison. Upon this, Mr. Fleetwood, the manager of the theatre, received a threatening letter from the footmen, in which they insisted that the gallery belonged to them of right, and that, if it was still closed against them, they would come in a body and pull down the whole house. In consequence of this threat a guard of fifty soldiers was placed over the theatre, and the mutineers made no further attempt.†

While complaints were universally made of the arrogance and dishonesty, the laziness and luxury of valets, footmen, and other male attendants, the charges against female servants were equally loud and numerous; and the character of the pert, mercenary, intriguing abigail of the eighteenth century is familiarised to us by many a dramatic sketch. When the country damsel came to town by the waggon, fresh in innocence and inexperience, and entered into service, a coterie of the town menials took her under their especial charge, and taught her the most approved methods of ob-

* The Provoked Husband.

† Vaintrough's Journey to London.

‡ Spectator, No. 88.

* Spectator, No. 96.

† Gentleman's Magazine for June 1737.

taining the highest wages for the smallest amount of service, and the best way of picking up waifs, vails, and perquisites. In this way she learned to assume the cast-off airs with the cast-off gowns of her mistress; so that in a short time, among her other town accomplishments, she could "drink tea, take snuff, and carry herself as high as the best." Nor was it better with the servants of the middle classes. "Women servants are now so scarce," says an anonymous writer of the period, "that, from thirty and forty shillings a year, their wages are increased of late to six, seven, and eight pounds per annum, insomuch that an ordinary tradesman cannot well keep one; but his wife, who might be useful in his shop or business, must do the drudgery of household affairs, and all this because our servant-wenchers are so puffed up with pride now-a-days that they never think they go fine enough. It is a hard matter to know the mistress from the maid by their dress; nay, very often, the maid shall be much the finer of the two."†

Nor were boys in general much better instructed than girls. The substance of a finished education for a young gentleman of this period was, a little Latin and less Greek, beaten into him either at one of the public establishments, or by the Thwackum of a domestic schoolroom. When the youth had been whipped through the parts of speech, interjections and all, and driven through a few fragmentary portions of the classics, and was able to construct a few "nonsense verses" upon his fingers, he was then qualified to shine equally in the senate or at a masquerade. To these he added the accomplishment of dancing, and perhaps a little music. As for science, that was out of the question, being deemed suitable only for professional characters. The grand finish to such an education was the tour of Europe; and forth went the boy accordingly, in leading strings, to gaze at streets, mountains, rivers, and trees. "Nothing is more frequent," says the Spectator on this head, "than to take a lad from grammar and law, and, under the tuition of some poor scholar who is willing to be banished for thirty pounds a year and a little victuals, send him crying and snivelling into foreign countries. Thus he spends his time as children do at puppet-shows, and with much the same advantage, in staring and gaping at an amazing variety of strange things; strange, indeed, to one who is not prepared to comprehend the reasons and meanings of them; whilst he should be laying the solid foundations of knowledge in his mind, and furnishing it with just rules to direct his future progress in life, under some skilful master in the art of instruction."‡ Such tourists naturally picked up in their rambles what was most easily acquired—the fashions, the frivolities, and the vices of foreign countries, which they imported into England, and engrafted upon the native stock.

Such a state of things naturally threw out abundance of wild off-shoots, and the annals of the day are filled with descriptions of eccentric characters, by whose turbulent conduct the peace of society was outraged. Allusion has already been made to those swaggering beaux who assumed the dress and titles of military officers: these were fellows who bilked coachmen, bolted from taverns without paying, thrust themselves into the theatre gratis, and forced quarrels upon the peaceably-disposed at public places.* Many of these characters, after having squandered their estates, lived by gaming and swindling, while others more adventurously endeavoured to repair their losses by taking to the road. Then there were Darby captains, who attended gaming-houses, to bully those who grew clamorous about their money gained from them by foul play; and Tash captains, who were champions to women of the town, to protect them from constables and informers; and Cock-and-bottle captains, who were generally to be found at ale-houses, and whose vocation consisted in thrashing bailiffs, bullying timorous persons, and doing other such exploits for hire.† There were also nickers in abundance in London; that is, gentlemen who were indignant at the impertinence of a tradesman's bill, and who answered it by a volley of coppers, which they discharged at his windows as they reeled homeward at night.‡ But of all the turbulent characters of the period, none were so distinguished as the Mohocks. These fellows, who assumed the name and out-did the atrocities of a tribe of Indian savages, acted under a president, whom they styled Emperor of the Mohocks, and their aim was to excel each other in wanton outrages upon the peace of society. At their nocturnal meetings, therefore, they drank to an outrageous pitch, to qualify themselves for action, and then rushed into the streets with drawn swords, cutting, stabbing, and carbonadoing all such unlucky persons as happened to come in their way. An attack upon the watchmen was a favourite part of their frolic—a safe enough exploit, since these guardians of the night were generally weak, broken-down old men, who had neither strength to wield their poles in an assault, nor activity to run away from it. But what the Mohocks chiefly aimed at was, to mingle originality and wit with their mischief; and a few of their practical jokes will give a full idea of their character, as well as of the barbarism and insecurity that still lingered in London. Sometimes they "tipped the lion" on their victim; that is, they squeezed his nose flat, and gouged out his eyes with their fingers. Some of the Mohocks were called dancing-masters, because they made people cut capers, by thrusting swords into their legs: others were called tumblers, because they placed the women whom they caught topsy-turvy upon their heads. Another choice device of these wretches was, to tumble a

* A Trip through the Town. Lond. 1785.

† Id. p. 14.

‡ Spectator, No. 264.

* Character of the Beaux. Lond. 1697.

† A Trip through the Town. Lond. 1735.

‡ Gay's Trivia.

WATCHMEN. Selected from Prints of the Period.

woman into an empty barrel, and then send it rolling down Snow Hill.* Sometimes a band of Mohocks, as soon as they saw a person in the streets, raised the view-halloo, and gave chase, crying, "A sweat! a sweat!" As soon as they had run down, and surrounded the trembling runaway, they drew their swords, holding them in a circle with their points upwards. The game then commenced by one of their number giving the prisoner a smart puncture in the rear: he naturally wheeled about; and still as he turned he was assailed by the rest in succession; and thus he was kept spinning round, until, in their estimation, he was thoroughly sweated by the exercise.† It may be seen from his own letters to Stella, that Swift, while he was in London, was frequently in dread of being maimed, or even murdered, by these villainous Mohocks.

As taverns were the chief haunts of these desperate characters, most of them were places of quarrelling and uproar, so that the landlord was generally more curious in the strength of his chairs and tables, than that of his wines. To such a height had these excesses reached, that even in the year 1744 the lord mayor and aldermen went up with an address to the king, in which was the following statement:—"That divers confederacies of evil-disposed persons, armed with bludgeons, pistols, cutlasses, and other dangerous weapons, infest not only the private lanes and passages, but likewise the public streets, and places of usual concourse; and commit most daring outrages upon the persons of your majesty's good subjects, whose affairs oblige them to pass through the streets, by terrifying, robbing, and wounding them, and these facts are frequently perpetrated at such times as were heretofore deemed hours of security; that the officers of justice have been repulsed in the performance of their duty, some of whom have been shot at, some wounded, and others murdered, in endeavouring to discover and apprehend the said persons."^o

Such a condition of the national character as that we have described was a fruitful soil for superstition and credulity; which, accordingly, still flourished as vigorously in the earlier part of the eighteenth century as they had done perhaps during the middle ages. Almost every old mansion in England was still ghost-haunted, and every parish was tormented by a witch. Fortune-telling also was still a common and a thriving occupation in London, where the customers of the seer or sibyl were not mere love-sick waiting-maids and amorous prentices, but sometimes women, and even men, of the highest rank.† When goods were lost, also, the cunning-man was frequently applied to, and thus he became a sort of rival to the notorious Jonathan Wild. Even the wise and the learned had not yet shaken themselves loose from such unintellectual thralldom, so that Dryden calculated nativities, Steele almost ruined himself in seeking after the grand magisterium, and Whiston not only believed in the miracle of Mary Tofts, who brought forth a warren of rabbits, but wrote to prove that she was announced in the prophecies of Ezekiel. In fact, these hallucinations continued to linger among our literary men until they were finally laid with the Cock-lane ghost. Medical quacks were, if possible, still more numerous and thriving than astrologers and fortune-tellers; and some of them

^o It will be seen, from the foregoing account, that the extravagances of Sir John Brute, Lord Rake, and Colonel Bully, in the play of the Provoked Wife, were far from being exaggerations.

† The most celebrated fortune-teller of this time was a certain Duncan Campbell, a Scotoman, born deaf and dumb. He was resorted to by people of the highest rank, and implicit faith was placed in his supernatural sagacity and prescience. Defoe has written the (pretended) adventures of this impostor.

* Gay's Trivia.

† Spectator, in curia.

enjoyed such extensive practice, that they were enabled to parade about the country in a style out-vying that of the wealthiest of the nobility. One of these fellows, of the name of Smith, used to ride his circuits in a coach drawn by six bay horses; a calash and four followed, and then a chaise marine and four: this imposing equipage was attended by four footmen in yellow liveries, and four in blue, trimmed with silver, while the panel of the carriage in which the oracle rode was decorated with this punning motto upon his name—Argento laborat Faber. This splendid train, however, was not wholly for show, as the footmen in yellow were his tumblers and trumpeters, those in blue his merry-andrew, apothecary, and speech-maker, while the lady who sat by his side in the coach was a dancer on the tight-rope. This fellow cured every human disease, and sold his packets for six-pence.* Such was the unblushing effrontery of these charlatans, and the strength of popular credulity, that the foot of a mountebank's stage was often covered with patents, medals, and certificates, purporting to have come from the sultan of Egypt, the emperor of Persia, the king of Bantam, and other remote potentates, in attestation of his wonder-working cures.† Every street and lane, too, was filled with quack advertisements, in which all impossibilities in healing were promised, while every trick was adopted by their writers to catch the eye and excite the imagination. Sometimes the healing specific was announced by some mysterious name of awful dimensions, and thus people swallowed with alacrity what they were unable to comprehend. Sometimes the doctor advertised that he had studied thirty years by candle-light. But the best recommendation of a quack was, that he had not studied at all, but received his knowledge by a certain divine intuition: thus, to be a seventh son was to be born a man of healing; but the seventh son of a seventh son was an infallible physician. These pretensions could only be exceeded by that cunning fellow who advertised himself as the Unborn Doctor.‡ Even respectable chemists and druggists indulged in the same style in advertising the miracles of their laboratory; and their medicines were not only infallible cures, but might be taken with absolute pleasure and delight. The following few specimens of their announcements are selected from the newspapers of the first twenty years of the eighteenth century. There was angelic snuff, which cured all diseases of the head, besides deafness, megrim, palsy, apoplexy, and gout; and there was royal snuff, which was equally potent in its effects. There was a medicine which cured the vapours in ladies, by a single application, and so effectually that they would never return; and there was another for leanness, by which the most attenuated frame would expand into the dimensions of a civic dignitary. By one electuary weak memories were completely renovated, so that the whole past was vividly recalled before the mind's eye in an instant; and by a few drops of another hypochondria was banished, and all those blessed effects were produced upon the mind for which Macbeth's physician would have received a king's fee. And who would have carried about a "mind diseas'd," when the healing phial was sold for only half a crown? or "been cursed with the helplessness of "mere oblivion," when he could recover his memory for the same paltry sum? Then, too, there were lotions to remove warts and pimples, soften the skin, whiten parts of it that were red, redden parts of it that were white, and transform the whole complexion at pleasure, so that the homeliest face might assume the beauty of an angel. So lowly and condescending, too, were the powers of chemistry, that the "incomparable, secret white water" was distilled, to renovate and beautify the gentlemen's periwigs. "By it," says the advertisement, "old wigs that look almost scandalous may be made to show inconceivably fine and neat; and if any lock or part of a wig be out of curl by the pressing of the hat, or riding in windy or rainy weather, in one night's time it may be repaired to satisfaction."

In such a state of society as now existed it cannot be supposed that the rage of duelling would abate. In fact, it seems to have increased, as the political rancours which were now so prevalent gave rise to offences that nothing but blood could expiate. Affairs of love formed a still more fruitful ground of quarrel; and nothing was more common, when two gentlemen were paying their addresses to the same lady, than to settle it by mortal arbitrement. Such an event was considered, of course, the highest attestation of a lady's charms. Accidental encounters, too, or angry jostlings frequently took place at the turnings of streets, or the haunts of public amusement and dissipation; and between parties flushed with wine, and whose sword-hilts were temptingly at hand, ended either in a formal challenge or an immediate affray; and plenty of quiet places could be found in every part of the metropolis where the combatants could settle the quarrel extempore, under the glimmering of the nearest lamp. In the formal duels of the period, sometimes more than one second was employed on either side; but his office was not that comfortable sinecure to which modern usage has reduced it. On the contrary, as in the duel fought in 1712 between the Duke of Hamilton and Lord Mohun, of which an account has been given in a preceding chapter,* the seconds frequently joined battle as well as their principals; and thus the engagement became a desperate skirmish between half a dozen combatants. The ring in Hyde Park, the back of Montague House, and Barns Elms, were the principal places for these hostile meetings.

Next to the manners of the world of wealth and fashion we may notice those of the class of authors and literary men, who now constituted an import-

* Macky's Journey.

† Tattler, No. 240.

‡ Tattler, No. 210.—Goldsmith's Citizen of the World.

* See ante, p. 271.

ant section of English society. The time had gone by when a writer, like a silk-worm, spun out his existence into a huge volume, and died; and when it was thought presumptuous to write at all unless the matter to be announced was of vital importance. A tiny pamphlet or even a copy of verses sufficed to gratify the vanity of seeing oneself in print. But it was now also discovered that the writing of books might be turned to profitable account; and the hope of solid pudding as well as empty praise induced many to forego their more regular and gainful occupations for the precarious bounty of the press. For a considerable part of this period, a titled or influential patron was still deemed indispensable for an author's success; and the man of genius was generally to be found besieging the door of some great man with a poem or a high-flown dedication in his pocket, and obliged perhaps to purchase admittance from the grim Cerberus of a porter with his last shilling. And even when he had surmounted this difficult barrier, and got admission to the presence of the Mæcenas, his best reward was a something like an alms in the shape of a dedication-fee, for which he was obliged to blow the loudest trump in Fame's collection, and deafen the public with the tale of his patron's liberality. The literary dinner-parties of such a patronising peer—the crowding to his mansion of authors with their faded attire newly brushed, and the brass hilts of their swords newly scoured—the solemn, Jove-like importance of the great man under whose eye the whole universe of intellect revolved, and upon the bending of whose brows the life and death of poems and literary systems depended; and the trembling veneration with which his satellites listened to his oracular sayings, and bowed assent over the rich sirlon or savoury venison, that effectually stopped the mouth of cavil or contradiction, is a frequent picture of the period, and one in which the pen of the atrabilious Smollett especially delighted to revel. On the other hand, however, we discern the commencement of the public patronage of literature even in the intercourse of authors with the Tonsons, the Lintots, and other publishers, which, in some of its rougher passages, has been recorded in so many a lampoon of the day, from that of Dryden upon Tonson's "two left legs," to the halting and desperate rhyme of the disappointed garretteer. In these performances several peaceful booksellers were immortalised who little dreamt of such a distinction. But it was the public, in truth, as in all such cases, and not the booksellers, that were to blame for the inadequate encouragement of which the authors complained. Readers as yet were few, and even the kinds of writing that were in request were not many. As yet, science was scarcely a marketable commodity; the lighter departments of literature were almost exclusively cultivated, and essay writing and tales, but especially poetry, formed the staple of the trade of authorship. As it was a general impression, too, of the period that recklessness and eccentricity were the true marks of genius, most authors fully established their claim to genius by taking no thought for the morrow. It is no wonder, therefore, that they were so generally a dinnerless and dun-haunted generation, eschewed by butchers, bakers, and tailors; and that the streets and alleys of London were so often enlivened by a race between a light-heeled bard and a panting bailiff. The usual habitation of an author was some poor garret; and, as certain places in London more particularly abounded in such cheap domiciles, Drury-lane was a classical region, and Grub-street was holy ground. The sanctuary of the Mint was a place of refuge for many a writer, and the Fleet is called by Pope a "haunt of the muses." In Grub-street those writers especially resided who had sunk to the lowest grade of the craft. These unfortunate moilers contrived to exist upon a few daily pence which they procured by writing ballads, wonderful accounts of ghosts, reports of monsters and prodigies, and, above all, the lives, crimes, and dying-speeches of malefactors. As for their domestic economy, what description can be needed after Hogarth's well-known sketch of the Distressed Author?

The advance of the mercantile classes in wealth and importance was now shown by their ambition of aristocratic distinctions as well as by other evidences. In London, while several of the most eminent of the merchants and civic functionaries rejoiced in the honour of knighthood, all who were of any consideration or even respectability had the title of esquire, or at least of gentleman, appended to their names. Even the clerks at last assumed these envied designations, and Steele complains that England had now become Populus Armigerorum—a nation of esquires.* London merchants as yet lived generally in the city, having their warehouses or counting-houses fronting the street; behind were their dwellings, which were entered by a small court; and, although these domiciles were sufficiently dark and confined externally, their interior was often very expensively and luxuriously furnished. At half-past one o'clock the merchant repaired to the Royal Exchange, and there remained till three; but those of greatest eminence preferred to transact business at Garaway's, Robins's, and Jonathan's coffee-houses. The first of these was frequented by people of quality who had business in the city, and by the wealthiest of the merchants; the second by foreign bankers, and sometimes also by foreign ministers; and the last by buyers and sellers of stock. There were two comfortable French eating-houses in the neighbourhood of the Exchange—Kivat's and the sign of Pontac.† But mere eating could not always satisfy those who bought and sold, and there were several persons belonging to 'Change who sipped in the forenoon, until they were neither drunk, nor yet fairly sober, in which twilight state they trans-

* Tattler, No. 18.

† Macky's Journey through England.

CORNHILL, THE EXCHANGE, AND LOWARD STREET.
From an Old Print.

acted business. These persons were called Whetters in the days of Steele and Addison.*

In descending from the merchants to the tradesmen of London, we find that already they had become so numerous, and consequently the competition among them was so keen, that the various trickeries of puffing advertisements were well understood and practised. We have already alluded to the extravagant laudations with which all kinds of quack nostrums were recommended to the public. Sometimes a shopkeeper, scorning a direct advertisement of his commodities, commenced with an angry—"Whereas it has been reported that A. B. is going to leave off business;" and then followed an earnest assurance that such was not the case, and that he continued, as before, to sell the following articles at the lowest prices. A more ingenious plan was for H. Z. to advertise in the public prints that a purse, containing gold and bank-notes to a large amount, had been dropped in his shop, and would be returned to the proper owner on describing the contents. Of course every person was eager to deal with so honest a tradesman, and his visionary purse soon became a reality. But the chief attraction and best advertisement of a shop was the sign-board that announced the name and occupation of the owner with all the splendour of painting and gilding. To strike the eye more effectually, the common traders from an early period had been accustomed to blazon some animal or object upon their sign. When these subjects were exhausted, or when fancy became capricious, something more piquant than dull reality was adopted, and among the cognisances of tradesmen, there arose blue boars, black swans, red lions, flying pigs, hogs in armour, swans with two necks, and such "skimble-skamble stuff" as would have put the Welsh heraldry of Glendower to utter shame. Then there were multitudes of compound signs, such as the Fox and Seven Stars, the Bell and Neat's Tongue, the Dog and Gridiron, the Sheep and Dolphin. Such grotesque combinations seem to have originated in the apprentice quartering his master's symbol with his own, like the combined arms of a coat matrimonial in heraldry. In not a few instances also they can be traced to the ignorance of the people, by which emblems in themselves abundantly rational were most ludicrously perverted. Thus, the Boulogne mouth became the Bull and Mouth; the Satyr and Bacchanals was metamorphosed into the Devil and Bag of Nails; and the pious puritanical legend—God encompasseth us—after having probably undergone a succession of perversions on lips little understanding or sympathising with the original sentiment, assumed a pictorial existence in the startling form of the Goat and Compasses. These signs generally projected far into the street, where they swung and creaked with every blast; but at last, as it was found that they intercepted ventilation, they were ordered to be placed against the buildings, as at present. This improvement, however, did not take place until the middle of the reign of George II. The rage for splendid signs in those days resembled that which now prevails among shopkeepers for plate-glass windows and mahogany counters. It is mentioned in the Gentleman's Magazine ten years after the close of the present period, that there were signs on Ludgate Hill which, with their iron supporters, had cost several hundred pounds. Certain localities in the metropolis were occupied by particular departments of trade. Thus Fleet Street was noted for linendrapers' shops; Newgate was the chief market for mutton; Leadenhall for beef; St. James's for veal; Thames Street for cheeses; Covent Garden for fruit; Moorfields for old books; and Monmouth Street for old clothes.* Book-selling was now become a trade of great importance, and each branch of it possessed its particular locality. Old books were to be bought in Little Britain and Paternoster Row; those of divinity and the classics on the north side of St. Paul's Church; those of law, history, and plays, about Temple Bar; and French books in the Strand.† Millinery shops were still, as before, at the Royal Exchange, and Change Alley, and also at the New Exchange, which was situated between Durham Yard and York Buildings in the Strand; and as the counters at these places were generally attended by the most showy young women that could be procured, they were favourite haunts of beaux and profligates, who spent their time and money there in frivolous purchases, and more frivolous conversation.‡

* Taylor, No. 189.

Besides the regular tradesmen, London appears to have abounded with hawkers, whose occupations and modes of dealing would be indicted as nuisances in the present day. Thus, even so late as the beginning of the eighteenth century, Westminster Hall swarmed with female hucksters; so that ribands, gloves, towers, commodities, and other such fancy articles were selling on one side of the building, while the property of lands and tenements was settled or wrangled about on the other: on the one side might be heard a shrill-tongued sempstress rehearsing a list of her wares, and on the other a deep-mouthed crier commanding silence.§ There were many shops in which toys, trinkets, and jewellery, were disposed of, not by regular sale, but by a raffle; and to these places gallants were wont to take their mistresses, and treat them out of their winnings.|| These fooleries were imitated in humble life, so that the very fruit-stalls in the streets were places for gambling, where dice or the wheel of fortune initiated apple-munching urchins into the doctrine of chances. Thimble-rigging also was fearlessly practised as a trade in the open streets. It is easy to conceive how the national love of betting must have been cherished by such hap-hazard kinds of traffic. But a still more pernicious kind of trade was that practised by a class of pedlars who vended strong liquors in the streets upon stalls and wheelbarrows, or carried them about wherever a crowd was gathered. Drinking-houses were at least as numerous in London as they are at present, although the population was little more than one-third of its present amount. According to a report drawn up by a committee of the magistrates of Middlesex, in 1725, there were then in the metropolis alone, exclusively of the city and Southwark, 6187 houses and shops, "wherein Geneva and other strong waters were sold by retail," being in some parishes every tenth house, in others every seventh, and in one, the largest of the whole, every fifth house. Then there were to be added those who sold strong liquors on bulks, stalls, and wheelbarrows.

London, even so late as the close of the present period, retained much of the rudeness and discomfort of earlier ages. The streets, as yet were for the most part unpaved, and each tradesman paved the entrance to his shop in his own fashion. What was in those days called the pavement was the edge of the street railed off by posts for the protection of foot-passengers. The kennels, which were open on both sides of the street, swelled into inundations in wet weather, while in summer drought they sent forth pestilent exhalations from the garbage with which they were choked up. Into these vile puddles also, when they were at full tide, carmen and coachmen delighted to drive their vehicles for the purpose of splashing a well-dressed pedestrian. As for Snow Hill, it was in wet weather a perfect torrent that flowed into Fleet ditch—that Stygian flood of civic abominations with which Pope's Dunciad has made us so familiar. It was fortunate that such streets were furnished with sweepers who cleared the crossings, and with shoe-blacks who plied their vocation at every corner. While even fair weather was scarcely tolerable in London from the clouds of dust with which every breeze was laden, nothing could be more unpleasant than a rainy day. When the clouds darkened, the shopmen eyed the coming storm, and prepared to encounter it. The hosier stripped the long poles projecting over his door of the stockings that dangled from them in rows, like a wary mariner striking sail; booksellers, whose shops were frequently furnished with large, unprotected stalls, made haste to remove their books under shelter; and the boatmen clothed their boats with a tilt, in the hope of tempting a fare. As the rain increased, the streets were soon covered with liquid mud, while the whole tribe of blue boys, red lions, and goats in boots collected and discharged the water in one heavy, pitiless stream. Then it was that "taking the wall" was a deed of hardihood which only strength and courage could maintain; and, while the robust kept close to the shelter of the numerous penthouse lids, the weak were elbowed out into the full brunt of the storm.

* Gay's Trivia.

† Macky's Journey.

‡ The New Exchange was taken down in 1757, and dwelling-houses were erected in its stead.

§ Works of Thomas Brown. Lond. 1744, vol. iii. p. 40.

|| Gay's Eclogues.

But the natural evils of rain, mud, and dust were not the worst to be encountered in walking about the metropolis. Pickpockets had become wonderfully numerous, so that whether at church or market, the theatre or the ball-room, purses, snuff-boxes, and watches disappeared with a facility incomprehensible to the owners. Even articles attached more closely to the person were not secure, and the gallant who presented his hand to a lady, to prevent her from stumbling, sometimes found, when too late, that a brilliant had departed from his finger. Occasionally, too, a skilful rogue carried a covered basket on his head, in which a boy was concealed; he passed through some crowd where something had been provided to be stared at—and the best periwig in the throng would vanish as suddenly as if it had gone to keep company with Berenice's hair. The squares of London were infested with throngs of beggars, who assailed the cars of the passers-by in every tone of clamorous supplication, and shocked their eyes with the exhibition of every disgusting malady that flesh is heir to. But frequently these wretches were also thieves; and thus the cripple, who had begged all day, converted his crutch into a truncheon at night, with which he knocked his victims on the head. This was especially the case in the lonely square of Lincoln's Inn Fields, which at this period was a haunt of the most desperate characters, especially during the hours of darkness. If the pedestrian, eschewing these perils, hoped to escape them by a coach, the matter was not much impeded: the streets of London were so narrow and the obstacles so numerous, that the whole tide of drays and carriages was frequently brought to a dead-lock, by some sudden impediment; in such cases, the coachmen, instead of extricating themselves by winding through the mass, or waiting patiently till motion was restored, would begin to lash each other with their whips, or descend from their boxes for a regular trial at bruising, while the delighted crowd formed a ring, and cheered the combatants. Sometimes, too, when part of a street was undergoing repair, the lamp that marked the dangerous spot at night would be extinguished by design or accident; and thus the carriage was shattered in pieces against the pile of stones, or thrown headlong into the excavation. In our own day, when the splendour of gas has reduced the moon and stars to mere rural conveniences, we are astonished at the cimmerian darkness in which our great-grandfathers were content to wander. In the year 1736 London could boast of no more than about a thousand lamps, which were kept burning only till midnight, and that for only one-half of the year; during the other half (that is from Lady-day till Michaelmas) they were not lighted at all. Indeed, had it not been for the numerous link-boys in every public street, a night walk in the metropolis would have been out of the question. But sometimes even these link-boys were in league with the thieves and night-prowlers, and thus the link often went out, as if by sheer accident, in the very worst place for such an accident to happen; and, while the be-darkened citizen was anxiously endeavouring to peer out amidst the surrounding gloom, he found himself suddenly environed, and perhaps knocked down by the ruffianly ambush into which he had been so treacherously conducted.* Sedans were used to a great extent at this period, not only by ladies and effeminate beaux, but also by robust men; the bearers, who were generally Irishmen, derived from the nature of their occupation a thickness of leg and strength of calf that became proverbial; and the conveyance itself was a cheap one, as a chair, with its bearers, could be hired for a guinea a week, or a shilling an hour. Water conveyance also was much used in passing from one part of London to another; and a person would be rowed anywhere above the bridge to Westminster, in a boat with two rowers, for sixpence, and with one for threepence; and below the bridge, to the lower extremity of the city, for the same sum. In sailing down the river, people of whatever rank had to encounter a broadside of coarse raillery from every passing boat.* Such moderate fares encouraged among the citizens the practice of forming water-parties; and in these aquatic trips Folly House, at Blackwall, formed the usual landing-place and house of entertainment for those whose appetites were whetted by the keen air of the river.

LONDON LAMP-LIGHTER. From Hogarth.

* Gay's Trivia.

FOLLY HOUSE, BLACKWALL. FROM AN OLD PRINT.

In turning to those amusements that particularly illustrate the character of the period, the watering-places may be first mentioned. Medicinal springs had long been known; the diseased, the hypochondriacal, and the idle had flocked to them; and, as the healing waters increased in reputation, it became fashionable during this period to spend the summer season in their neighbourhood, where, as a matter of course, parties, balls, and festivals, were frequent among an idle population. Bath had for many years been one of the chief of these places of resort; and under the able management of Beau Nash, popularly called the King of Bath, it was now enabled to throw all other watering-places into the shade, so that above eight thousand families generally repaired to it in the course of a season. Two laws which Nash established, and rigorously enforced upon his subjects, tended upon the whole to make his reign a very useful one. By one, all politics were absolutely banished from Bath, so that the most fruitful source of quarrels among gentlemen was removed: by another, all scandal was prohibited, by which the ladies were reduced to an equally pacific state.* Next to Bath Tunbridge and Epsom Wells were in greatest repute. These were resorted to by the families of the wealthier inhabitants of London and the rural gentry; and an account of the manner in which time was spent at one of these places will serve as a picture of the rest. At Tunbridge, there was, on one side of the well, a row of shops and coffee-rooms, on the other a market; and behind the well was a large chapel, in which divine service was performed twice a day. Early in the morning the company repaired to the waters, and there the ladies and gentlemen associated with each other in dishabille: at nine o'clock they separated to dress. At ten, the company again became visible, some repairing to church and others to the coffee-houses. After prayers they promenaded on the walks, while the bands of music continued to play; they also amused themselves with raffling, hazard, drinking tea, and walking, till two, when it was time to repair to dinner. In the afternoon the bowling-greens were open for those who loved that national sport; and on the same greens balls were held four times a week, for the diversion of the young people. At night the company returned to the shops on the walks, and there all manner of play and diversion was kept up till midnight. As ceremony was greatly abated at such public and promiscuous meetings, a greater frankness towards strangers was allowed than in the metropolis, so that no gentleman needed a formal introduction to a lady at play or upon the walk; and this liberty, as might be supposed, was very frequently abused by sharpers and fortune-hunters.* In the sketches of the day, accordingly, a dashing Irishman in chase of an heiress at a watering-place is a very common feature. As the luxuries of Bath, Tunbridge, and Epsom were as expensive as they were fashionable, persons of moderate fortunes contented themselves with the more accessible mineral springs of Islington, to which they repaired with their families, and where they imitated upon a humble scale the amusements of the more aristocratic watering-places.

* Macky's Journey through England.

* Life of Beau Nash.

RANELAGH. 1751.

But the Londoners had likewise places of entertainment nearer at hand, where the foot could step at once from the dusty pavement upon a velvet lawn, or wander at will among shady avenues. Of these Spring Garden was the chief at the close of the seventeenth century, until it was found that something more than mere walks and trees was desirable, and accordingly in Ranelagh and Vauxhall Gardens the attractions of art were introduced to heighten the charms of nature. At these places the trees were hung with lamps, and the plats enlivened with artificial cascades; the whole scene was studded with summer-houses that served either as love-houses or places of refection, while music, fire-works, water-works, and wonderful mechanism presented an ample variety to every kind of taste. These scenes, however, are familiarised to every reader of Fielding, Goldsmith, and Johnson.

Play-going was still as frequent and as fashionable as ever, without the theatre having undergone any moral improvement: the same sort of plays were acted, and the same license in behaviour tolerated, as had prevailed during the reign of Charles II. Theatrical representations had now reached their perfection in point of splendour under the able management of Cibber, Quin, and Garrick; but amidst every change a striking indifference continued to be manifested towards the proprieties of costume, especially in tragedy, where these proprieties are most required. Whether the hero was Greek or Roman, regal, military, or sacerdotal, his dress was that of a beau of the eighteenth century; while a Cleopatra or a Semiramis could not appear without a powdered comode, a hooped petticoat, a stomacher, and a fan. Even Cato was introduced upon the stage in 1712 in a "long wig, flowered gown, and lacker'd chair," while these preposterous adjuncts were hailed, not with shouts of derision but peals of applause. The false taste of such exhibitions does not seem to have been as yet detected, although the incongruities of the opera were seen and ridiculed. Thus, when Nicolini was exposed to a tempest in robes of ermine, or when he sailed in an open boat upon a sea of pasteboard; when enchanted chariots were drawn by Flanders mares, and real cascades were made to flow through canvas landscapes, such a critic as Addison could point out the impropriety of blending reality with imitation in the same piece. And yet he was contented to see his own Cato metamorphosed into something like a London alderman, and he perceived nothing absurd in Macbeth figuring in a court dress of sky-blue and scarlet.

* Macky's Journey through England.

Besides the theatre and the opera there were some other exhibitions of the dramatic class which came into great favour in the eighteenth century. Of these, the most distinguished was the puppet-show of Mr. Powel, which was established in the piazza of Covent Garden, and was attended by numerous and fashionable audiences. In Mr. Powel's little theatre interludes upon all subjects sacred or profane were acted by puppets; but, whether the play might be scriptural or historical, Punch was always the principal figure, and his jests formed the main amusement of the audience. Thus, in a sacred interlude representing the general deluge, Punch and his wife were introduced dancing merrily in Noah's ark. The following advertisement inserted by Powel in the prints of the day will convey a distinct idea of the nature of his exhibitions:—

“At Punch's Theatre in the little Piazza, this present Friday, being the 2nd, and to-morrow the 3rd of May, will be presented an opera called the State of Innocence, or the Fall of Man. With variety of scenes and machines, particularly the scene of Paradise in its primitive state, with birds, beasts, and all its ancient inhabitants; the subtlety of the serpent in betraying Adam and Eve, &c., with variety of diverting interludes, too many to be inserted here. No person to be admitted with masks or riding-hoods,* nor any money to be returned after the curtain is up. Boxes 2s. pit 1s. Beginning exactly at seven o'clock.” Wynstanly's Water Theatre was another of these minor places of public amusement. It stood at the lower end of Piccadilly, and was distinguished by a windmill on the top of the building. The exhibitions here varied according to the season and the humour of the public, and consisted chiefly of the representations of sea-deities, nymphs, mermaids, tritons, and other aquatic personages, playing and spouting out water, or sometimes water mingled with fire. The price of admission to the boxes varied from four shillings to half-a-crown, to the pit from three to two shillings, and there was also a sixpenny gallery, as in the royal theatres. The quantity of water used on extraordinary occasions sometimes amounted to eight hundred tons; so that the exhibitions at this house must have been of rather a splendid description. Sadler's Wells at this period combined the characteristics of a tavern and a theatre; for the spectators were not only amused with songs, recitations, and spectacles, but regaled with ale, wine, cakes, and tobacco. It was chiefly a resort however of low and vicious company.*

* Masks and riding-hoods were still greatly used in the galleries of the royal theatres for the purposes of licentious intrigue; and therefore Powel, who regarded himself as a teacher of religion and morals, was anxious to guard his house from such profanations.

There were also hops, that is, balls, held in some hall or tavern for the entertainment of the lower classes. Hampstead was a famous, or rather infamous place for such merry-meetings, where the excesses to which they led were so common, that no decent tradesman cared to be seen in that beautiful suburban village.† The chief of these places of concourse at Hampstead, which was called Belsize House, is worthy of more particular notice. This edifice, which was erected in the

* Walk to Islington. 8vo. Lond., 1699.

† Macky's Journey through England.

VAUXHALL, 1751.

BELLSIZE HOUSE.

reign of Charles II., upon the site of the ancient "manor of Belses," stood in front of the highway of Hampstead, having a large park and handsome gardens in its immediate neighbourhood. The success which had already attended similar speculations undoubtedly suggested the idea of converting this stately mansion into a place of public entertainment; and accordingly it was opened for that purpose in April, 1720. The nature of the amusements at this institution may be ascertained from the following exact copy of the first advertisement which was published on the occasion:—

THESE are to give Notice, that Bellsize is now open'd for the whole Season, and that all Things are most commodiously concerted for the Reception of Gentlemen and Ladies; The Park, Wilderness, and Gardens, being wonderfully Improv'd, and fill'd with variety of Birds which compose a most Melodious and Delightful Harmony. Every Morning at Seven a Clock, the Musick begins to play and continues the whole Day thro'; and any Persons inclin'd to walk and divert themselves in the Morning, may as cheaply break fast there, on Tea or Coffee, as in their own Chambers: And for the convenience of single Persons or Families who reside at Hampstead, there are Coaches prepar'd to ply betwixt the 2 places; which, by the least Notice given, shall attend at their Lodgings or Houses for sixpence per Passenger; and for the Security of his Guests, there are 12 stout Fellows compleatly Arm'd to patrol betwixt London and Bellsize to prevent the Insults of Highwaymen or Footpads which may infest the Road."

The pretensions of this place were at first rather aristocratic; but the company soon became sufficiently miscellaneous. Thus it appears, from Read's Journal for July 15, 1721, that the Prince and Princess of Wales dined at Belsize House, attended by several persons of quality; yet, from the satire entitled "Belsize House," published only a year after, we find that persons of the lowest description as well as the highest were the regular frequenters, while excesses prevailed among them which would have shamed the lowest place of entertainment. In fact, so rapid was the process of degeneracy, that in less than a twelvemonth the "twelve stout fellows completely armed" had increased to thirty, so perilous had the approaches to this precious temple of Cotyto become. The proprietor, or master of the ceremonies, generally called the Welsh Ambassador, soon also became so infamous that he was committed to Newgate; but he speedily regained his liberty, and resumed his public functions. On each side of the gate of Belsize House a grenadier mounted guard. The coffee-room was set apart for the more-select customers, while the north side of the building was reserved for the common herd; but the dining-room was neutral ground in which all ranks were fused into one common mass. Besides the amusements specified in the programme, hunting and fishing were the out-of-door sports of the establishment, and balls and concerts were held in the long room; but deep and ruinous play, after all, formed the chief recreation, unless we except illicit love intrigues, for which the extensive grounds about the house afforded sufficient facilities.

Shooting-matches were also common in the outskirts of London; and the nature of these will be understood by the following advertisement from the Postman of June 7, 1713:—
"A stall-fed fat deer to be shot for at the Greyhound, in Islington, on Wednesday, in Whitsun-week, for half-a-crown a man, forty men to shoot, at four of the clock in the afternoon." The chief out-door sports, besides bowls and skittles, were football, which was played at by the young prentices within the porches of Covent Garden,* and cricket. In this last stirring game matches were often made between equal numbers of the gentlemen of two counties by advertisement in the public prints. The chief place in London for these competitions was the Artillery Ground.

Prize fights had now become frequent, at which the common weapons were broadsword, sword and dagger, and single stick; and the gladiators who mangled each other for the amusement of the crowd, devoted themselves to this savage calling as a regular trade, and subsisted upon the subscription-purses or admittance fees. Many of these fellows were also accustomed to ramble about the country, like knight-errants in quest of adventures, and sound their challenges to combat in every village. The following short sketch sufficiently describes the nature of a prize-fight:—"Seats filled and crowded by two, drums beat, dogs yelp, butchers and foot-soldiers clatter their sticks; at last the two heroes in their fine bosomed Holland shirts mount the stage about three; cut large collops out of one another to divert the mob, and make work for the surgeons; smoking, swearing, drinking, thrusting, justling, elbowing, sweating, kicking, cuffing, stinking, all the while the company stays."† The writer adds that even the ladies attended such exhibitions, and viewed them with keen interest. The most distinguished of these bullies was Figg, whose face and figure have been familiarised to us by Hogarth in one of the sketches of the Rake's Progress. This personage taught the "noble science of defence" in Oxford-street road, near the Adam and Eve court, where gentlemen were trained in the use of the small sword and single stick.‡

It was from this cultivation of the science of defence that scientific boxing took its rise among us. About the beginning of the eighteenth century such preceptors as Figg began to give lessons in pugilism, as well as in the use of weapons. The addition was hailed with delight; boxing matches became daily more popular, and at last superseded every other kind of pugnacious competition. Even the magistrates rather encouraged the practice under an idea that pugilism would promote manliness of character. But a more decided and influential patronage was that of persons of rank and wealth, who found in the chances of a boxing match the strongest excitement for betting; they adopted their favourite champions, trained them for the ring, as they had been accustomed to train game-cocks for the cock-pit, and then wagered immense sums upon their prowess. Among the lovers of this sport one of the most eminent was the Duke of Cumberland (the hero of Culloden), who lost several thousand pounds at a single milling match by the defeat of Broughton, his pet bruiser. The challenges of these combatants also were regularly published in the daily prints; and the following specimen*—a gentle one compared with others that might be quoted—will show the nature of such cartels:—"Whereas I, William Willis, commonly called by the name of the Fighting Quaker, have fought Mr. Smallwood about twelve months since, and held him the tightest to it, and bruised and battered more than any one he ever encountered, though I had the ill-fortune to be beat by an accidental fall; the said Smallwood flushed with the success blind Fortune then gave him, and the weak attempts of a few vain Irishmen and boys that have of late fought him for a minute or two, makes him think himself unconquerable; to convince him of the falsity of which I invite him to fight me for one hundred pounds, at the time and place above mentioned, when I doubt not I shall prove the truth of what I have asserted by pegs, darts, hard blows, falls, and cross buttocks." We may add that the meeting took place, and that the fighting quaker was completely vanquished.†

The love of spectacles which had always distinguished the London population had now become more rampant than ever; so that, while a bull-baiting was enough to rouse a whole ward, a public execution could at any time empty the half of the metropolis into Tyburn. But more potent even than these were the attractions of a civic fair, and especially a Bartholomew Fair. Bartholomew Fair had its origin so early as the reign of Edward I., and was allowed by the charter to be held for three days only: but when the allotted time had expired, the crowds were not so easily dispersed, and they continued to linger on from day to day, until hunger or satiety sent them back to their occupations. At last, the popular appetite for the amusements of this carnival had become so rabid, that in the reign of Anne a plan was set on foot to have the period extended to fourteen days—a project which, as might be expected, excited the alarm of all sober-minded people in the metropolis, so that a whole tempest of protests and petitions was discharged against the proposition.‡ In our own day, when even popular excitement is graduated by the scale, it is almost impossible to conceive the turmoil with which London was formerly pervaded on the arrival of the period for holding Bartholomew Fair. All was then a preparation for merriment, uproar, and licence, and every parish in the metropolis discharged its population into Smithfield as into a vast reservoir. Thither came the man of town from the west-end, who hoped to exchange his more fashionable diversions for some vulgar intrigue;—thither came the anxious citizen, his more anxious dame, and his half-delighted,

* Guy's Trivia.

† Works of Thomas Brown, vol. i. p. 131. Lond., 1744.

‡ Pierce Egan's Boxiana.

* Daily Advertiser for April 26, 1749.

† Egan's Boxiana.

‡ Reasons for the punctual limiting of Bartholomew Fair to Three Days, &c. Lond. 1711.

half-terrified stripling, to drown the cares of a whole year amidst the uproar and confusion of a day;—on one side was to be seen the sleek country grazier, or blue-aproned butcher, elbowing his way through the crowd to settle a bargain in hay or bullocks; and on the other the ambulatory vintner with his wheelbarrow of Geneva, for which he found customers in abundance, as may be seen in the following sketch: Here, too, came the thimble-rigger with his table, and the bearward with his monkey and dancing bear; the robber, the thief, the bully, and the pickpocket; in the hope that where so much business and folly were mingled they would reap a plentiful harvest. And not less strange seems the place of meeting itself than the crowds that repaired to it. A city had suddenly started up composed of streets of show-booths and lanes of stalls, where everything that could allure the fancy or the palate might be purchased for a trivial sum; while the roaring of rival showmen, the braying of trumpets, and hammering of gongs and cymbals, made every brain reel that was not well fortified by nature against such portentous concussions. The nature of the shows, which formed the principal attraction of the fair, may be discovered from a glance at the foregoing and following prints: but under the character of raree-shows there were sometimes exhibitions which could scarcely have been expected even from an age so depraved. Thus we are informed, in a work which we have already quoted, that at the beginning of the eighteenth century one of these exhibitions consisted of a series of indecent paintings which were publicly displayed for pence to the gaze of the youth of both sexes.* Not only the idleness and tumult, but also the immorality and excesses of Bartholomew Fair, had long been a civic pestilence which the authorities endeavoured to banish. In 1702 a proclamation issued by the lord mayor for the suppression of the “great profaneness, vice, and debauchery, too frequently practised there,” required all persons concerned in the fair not to “let, set, or hire, or use any booth, shed, stall, or other erection whatsoever, to be used or employed contrary to law, for interludes, stage-plays, comedies, gaming-places, lotteries, music-meetings, or other occasions or opportunities for enticing, assembling, or congregating idle, loose, vicious, and debauched people together under colour and pretence of innocent diversion and recreation.” Another similar proclamation was issued in 1707, wherein the “deplorable increase of profaneness and debauchery” are emphatically pointed out, and all erections belonging to the fair are required to be constructed for the purposes of traffic only. In

* Reasons for the punctual limiting of Bartholomew Fair to Three Days, &c. Lond. 1711.

BARTHOLOMEW FAIR. 1721. (Vaux the Conjurer's Booth.)
From a Painted Fan of that date.

BARTHOLOMEW FAIR. 1721. (Lee and Harper's Booth.)
From a Painted Fun of that date.

order also to lessen the access of the crowd, the gates and thoroughfares of Christ's and Bartholomew's Hospitals were ordered to be shut at ten o'clock, and no persons who were not inhabitants of the place were to stay beyond that hour.

In passing from the metropolitan to the rural population, the country gentlemen first demand our notice. Their habits have been amply delineated in the plays, the novels, and essays of the period. Who is unacquainted with Sir Roger de Coverley? In that masterly picture, the author, Apelles-like, has concentrated all the amiableness, the simplicity, the humour, and amusing weaknesses of the class of which Sir Roger is the great representative, without its vices and defects. From this example we learn, that, although many of the rural squires had the last polish given to their education in London, where perchance they rented chambers for a few terms in the Temple, and frequented the coffee-houses to which the wits of the day resorted, yet they returned by no means overburdened either with learning or a general knowledge of the world. They cultivated their paternal acres, watched with almost Druidical reverence the safety of their ancient oaks, jealously defended their hedges and enclosures from trespass, were members of the worshipful quorum, in which capacity, perhaps, they impressed their tenants with respectful awe by a speech of three minutes long upon some great occasion, and enforced especially those statutes that regarded the preservation of public decency—and game. When Sunday arrived they repaired to the village church, which they entered through a lane of uncovered and bowing peasantry, who took this opportunity of showing their respect for his worship and receiving his kind enquiries in return; after which they ascended "the squire's pew," the chief seat in the synagogue, where they edified their tenantry during service by the loudness of their responses, while they looked considerably about to see which of their dependants were absent, as well as to impress decorousness upon those who were present. And when joyous Christmas came round, then the mansion rang with those festivities that seemed a perfect echo of the Elizabethan age, although now antiquated or wholly forgotten among the fashionable circles of the metropolis; and the master of the mansion caused the doors to be thrown open that the enjoyments of the season might be as general as the blessings it commemorated. A multitude of fattened hogs were slaughtered for the occasion, cut into chines, and distributed among the neighbours; and a string of hog's pudding and a pack of cards were sent to every poor family in the parish. Then, also, a double quantity of malt was allowed to the small beer, which was set a running in the hall for every one that called for it, while the table was continually set out with a large round of cold beef and a mince pie. And at evening, when the Christmas sports of the happy yeomanry were making roof and rafter shake, as if they too were alive with merriment, the landlord vouchsafed to look in upon their festival and enjoy the practical jokes that had been treasured up for the occasion. A squire of this old school stampt loved to see the old arras that still lingered upon the walls, and the pictures of his ancestors that seemed to smile upon him approvingly for treading in their footsteps; and he valued as choice heir-looms his antique, massive, high-backed chairs, the covers of which were adorned with embroidered flowers, cupids, and shepherdesses, by the needles of his grandmother and her industrious household. He was also proud of his chaplain, his housekeeper, and his throng of servants, although one half of them were only of use to wait upon the other half; and he dwelt upon the past merits and exploits of his aged hunters, which he allowed to graze labour-free, for life, in his richest paddock. His diet and his hours of eating were also conformed to the same primitive principle: he breakfasted at an early hour upon hot rolls, plumcake, and strong ale, and dined at twelve o'clock.

The stirring amusement of hunting was more generally followed by the country gentlemen of the last than by those of the present century. This was to be expected in an age when the resources of politics and literature were as yet only of secondary account. A very large portion of the rustic squires of this period were foxhunters exclusively—men whose whole lives and energies were devoted to the amusements of the chase, such as those with whose manners we have been made so familiar by the descriptions of Fielding and Smollet. They appear to have been for the most part as unintellectual as the horses they rode or the animals they pursued; their proudest exploit was to clear a six-barred gate, and their highest ambition to wear the brush in their cap. In those days, when after a hard chase the stag or buck was at last pulled down, the old laws of veneration respecting the cutting up of the quarry were still carefully observed; and first of all a knife was tendered to the stranger of the party to cut the victim's throat, his refusal of which made him liable to the charge of daintiness and want of manly spirit. When the animal was cut up another compliment was for the master of the ceremonies to lave his hands in the blood and gravely besmear with it the stranger's face—a mode of baptism into the family of Nimrod well calculated to keep the fastidious aloof; after which the whole company put their hunting-horns to their mouths and blew most outrageously. The party then adjourned to dinner, where, if the venison happened to be served up, it was passed untouched by those who had been engaged in the chase, it being a principle that no stanch sportsman should eat his own game. The characteristic circumstances of a banquet of this kind; the prodigious feats of hunger and thirst; the brainless babble and boisterous debate of so many hirsute, un-ideal animals, swelling into a universal roar, like the gathering of a sea-storm, and like it subsiding, in the slow progress of hours, into the dead calm of speechless helplessness, are well described in Thomson's Seasons. The torpid reaction of such violent excitement could only be banished by preparations for the next chase; and in this way the mere hunting gentleman continued to live from week to week, until some sharp and sudden disease cut him down in the midst of his strength, or some desperate flying leap, in which his horse fell short, and broke its own neck as well as that of its rider.

Commerce was still regarded with a supercilious eye by the generality of the proud and ignorant country gentlemen, and even younger sons, though deprived of all share in the family estate, and often sent forth into the world with scarcely any provision, were taught to despise mercantile pursuits as derogatory to their rank and the honour of their family. Hence the numerous Will Wimbles, the led-captains, and genteel parasites of the time, who endeavoured to make themselves necessary to some nobleman or gentleman for the privilege of a place at his table. For this purpose some of them studied profoundly the points of a horse, the breaking in of hunters, and the training of pointers, with the cure of the diseases to which such animals are liable; others were skilful in the mysteries of angling and the manufacture of the best kinds of flies: many had no other qualification than a strong head, by which they were enabled to superintend the overflowing hospitality of their patron, and drink hard in his service at an election canvass.* Others who had no genius for these vocations, endeavoured to recommend themselves by their skill in flattery, gallantry, or even more questionable accomplishments.†

Of the country ladies of this period, those who had not learned the fashions and frivolities of London are chiefly represented to us in the light of "notable ladies," and quiet domestic drudges, with scarcely education enough to keep the household account-book, or spell correctly a receipt for a new home-made wine, or improved syllabub. The principal change that had taken place in their domestic habits since the last age was, that a lady no longer thought that the great business of life was to embroider cushions and coverlets; but, if she did not become a politician, as those figuring in the London circles usually did, she most commonly settled down into the character of a Lady Bountiful, and occupied herself in supplying the poor of the village with money, the industrious

* "Some persons, and those of quality, may not be safely visited in an afternoon, especially in the country, without running the hazard of excessive drinking of healths, whereby in a short time twice as much liquor is consumed as by the Dutch, who sip and prate; and in some places it is esteemed a piece of wit to make a man drunk; for which purpose some swilling, insipid, trencher buffoon, is always at hand, under the boasted but scandalous title of Major Domo." Magna Britannia Notitia, by John Chamberlaine, Lond., 1708, p. 254.

† The qualifications for such an office are particularly described in Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield, chap. xx.

with work, the idle and the vicious with counsel and rebuke, and the sick with medicines and cordials. In this last department many of them became so presumptuous that no ailment was too hard for them, from a toothache to a pestilence, from the stroke of a cudgel to that of a thunderbolt. Their remedies were for the most part the strangest quackery. One of their favourite cures for consumption, for example, was what they called small potage. This was a peck of garden shell snails washed in small beer and fried in a frying-pan, shells and all, with a quart of earth worms, and mingled with abundance of strong ale, herbs, spices, and drugs. In others of their preparations there was as much cruelty as loathsomeness and absurdity. To make oil of swallows, some ten or a dozen swallows were pounded alive in a mortar, with many other choice ingredients; and in making what was called cock-water, the poor bird had first to be plucked alive. Sometimes, also, the aid of the planets was necessary to make the charm successful; as, for instance, in the case of one of their medicines into which the tips of crabs' claws entered largely, the rule was that they should be gathered "when the sun enters the sign of cancer."⁴ Many of the possets and restoratives, in short, which filled the receipt-books of these good ladies, one would think, must have required the nerves as well as the caldron of the weird sisters to prepare them. The practices in question, however, were chiefly confined to staid elderly females, the wife of the squire or vicar, some well-dowered widow or considerate spinster, who with abundance of means and inclination to do good, had stumbled upon a wrong path. One of these ladies bound upon her visits of mercy, and followed by her abigail panting under the well-laden basket, must have been a formidable spectacle. We may conceive the deep and low-muttered curses with which she was followed by the village doctor, whose office was thus reduced to a starving sinecure; the shudder of her patients when her step was heard upon the threshold, or when her budget of cures was unpacked, to be administered under her own eye; and the annoyance she must have inflicted upon those sufferers whose cases were hopeless, until they were glad to escape from her benevolence by dying in good earnest.

The chief domestic amusements of the rural gentry were the anniversary festivals, which the progress of fashion had as yet left almost untouched in the country mansions: but there were also parties for card-playing, dancing, and music, as in London. Next to the chase, shooting and fishing were the principal out-door amusements. This last sport seems to have been a favourite among the fair sex, if we may judge from the numerous pictures in which ladies are drawn seated on the bank of a river or pond, with fishing-rods in their hands. County and subscription balls were also of frequent occurrence, and were often enlivened by the presence of smart young recruiting officers, anxious to add to their scanty pay the dowry of some high-born rustic, who might be charmed by the attractions of a red coat. Some of the fairs also were select and fashionable, rather than promiscuous resorts; in particular, Bury fair, which was in high reputation at the time of the Spectator. It lasted a fortnight each year, and was numerously attended by the nobility and gentry. The meeting was held upon the Angel Hill, in Bury St. Edmonds, which was covered for the occasion with streets of gay tents; and here the multitude diverted themselves in the afternoon with raffling, till it was time to repair to the play. After that was over the company adjourned in parties to the houses of the noblemen and gentlemen of the neighbourhood, which were kept open during the fair. This annual meeting at Bury was in great favour with people in high life, not only on account of the gay parties and amusements with which it was enlivened, but the frequent marriages it occasioned, so that it was considered one of the best matrimonial markets in England.*

It was not always, however, that country gentlemen and their families could be satisfied with such a monotonous round of occupation and amusement when the routs, masquerades, and theatres of the metropolis glittered in perspective. But a trip to London was not then the smooth and expeditious process which modern improvements have rendered it, more especially if it was to be made from one of the remote districts. The English roads were so execrable that in 1703, when Prince George of Denmark had to travel from Windsor to Petworth, a journey of only forty miles, it took him no less than fourteen hours to accomplish it. Frequently the carriages stuck fast in the mire; some of them were overturned; and the prince's coach would have shared the same fate, but for the boors of the district, who propped and poised it with their brawny shoulders all the way from Godalming to the neighbourhood of Petworth. The last nine miles of the journey occupied fully six hours. But broken limbs and overturns in the mud were not the only, or even the worst evils to be experienced in such a migration; for the great approaches to the capital, and especially Bagshot and Hounslow Heath, and Popham Lane, were traversed by mounted highwaymen, either singly or in small bodies, and the daily prints were filled with accounts of robberies committed upon travellers and the mails. Few, therefore, ventured to set out on a journey without being well armed, and sanguinary encounters with robbers were frequent upon the highways. The style in which Sir Francis Wronghead and his family travelled to London, however laughable it might appear on the stage, was not only prudent, bating a few extravagancies, but was actually not unusual with persons of his rank. Two strong cart-horses were added to the four old geldings that drew the pair-

* The Queen's Closet opened, Lon., 1710.

* Macky's Journey through England.

derous family carriage; this vehicle was laden at top with an array of trunks and boxes, while seven living souls, besides a lap-dog, were stowed within. The danger of famine was averted by a travelling larder of baskets of plum-cake, Dutch gingerbread, Cheshire cheese, Naples biscuit, neat's tongues, and cold boiled beef; the risk of sickness was provided for by bottles of usquebaugh, black cherry brandy, cinnamon water, sack, tent, and strong beer; while the convoy was protected by a basket-hilted sword, a Turkish cymetar, an old blunderbuss, a bag of bullets, and a great horn of gunpowder.*

The manners of the peasantry still exhibited much of the same rude simplicity by which they had been characterised in the days of Elizabeth. Rural education had undergone little, if any, improvement or enlargement during the seventeenth century. The monotonous toils and occupations of the rustics, therefore, still continued to be enlivened chiefly by wakes and fairs, which were thronged with puppet-shows, pedlars' stalls, raffling tables, and drinking booths, while the peasants contended with each other in wrestling, cudgel-playing, and foot-racing. In this last sport young women were frequently the performers, in which case the prize for the successful runner was a smock. Among the favourite competitions at fairs were grinning-matches, in which the candidates grinned most hideously through a horse's-collar; and trials in whistling, where the person who could whistle through a whole tune, without being put out by the drolleries of a Merry-Andrew that were played off before him, was the victor. Contentions of this nature were also frequent during the celebration of the annual church festivals, and especially at Christmas, when a trial of yawning for a Cheshire cheese took place at midnight, and he who gave the widest and most natural yawn, so as to set the whole company agape in sympathy, carried off the cheese in triumph.†

The old Saxon, or perhaps originally Druidical, superstitious observances, which had amused the rural hearths of England during the days of the Heptarchy, were still in a great part retained, especially those relating to courtship and marriage; and each season of the year seems to have had its appropriate spell. Thus, a young damsel who was anxious to know something of the husband whom fate had destined for her, was directed to run until she was out of breath as soon as she heard the first notes of the cuckoo, after which, on pulling off her shoe, she would find in it a hair of the same colour as that of her future mate. If she wished to see his full appearance, she was to sow hempseed on Midsommer-eve, and command her lover, in a rhyming couplet, to follow, and mow; and, behold, on looking over her shoulder she would see him at her heel, scythe in hand! On Valentine's morning, the first batchelor whom a girl accidentally met was supposed to be her destined husband. On May-day, a girl had only to bring home a snail, and lay it upon the ashes of the hearth; and, in crawling about, the reptile would mark the initial letter of her true-love's name. Another way was, for her to pare a pippin, and throw the rind over her head; the skin, on falling, would exhibit the same letter. If she had more than one lover, and hesitated in her choice, she judged of their comparative merits by taking two hazel-nuts, to each of which she attached the name of a candidate, and threw them into the fire; the nut that blazed brightest and longest intimated the lover who would prove the most constant. Another equally good experiment for the same purpose was, to take from a pippin two kernels, and stick them on her cheeks, with the name of a lover for each; the kernel that stuck longest showed, of course, the person she ought to prefer. If she wished to communicate with an absent lover she took up the insect called a lady-bird, and thus addressed it:—

Fly, lady-bird, fly, north, south, east, or west;
Fly where the man is that I love the best:

and the little messenger would fly to him accordingly. If a lover showed symptoms of inconstancy, a girl had only to purloin his garter, and bind it with her own in a true-love knot, by which his heart was noosed beyond the power of escaping.* But the belief in the efficacy of these antique rites was before the end of the present period fast departing from its last shelter in hut and cottage; and such spells were now chiefly tolerated only from the power of habit, and for the purposes of amusement. The sunshine that had already enlightened the mountain-tops was now entering the humble valleys, and penetrating the dark recesses; dubious objects were daily becoming more palpable, and shadows ceasing to dismay or deceive.

In Scotland; during this and the preceding period, first a struggling and persecuted, and then a triumphant and dominant presbyterianism had moulded the national manners and habits of feeling to a severity probably much beyond what would have been the natural result in other circumstances either of that form of religion, or of the inherent character of the people. A stern and gloomy asceticism was strangely mixed in the prevalent religious temper with a superstition as weak and abject, though not as imaginative, as ever enthralled the most credulous devotees of Romanism. Thus in common doubts or dilemmas, pious clergymen, instead of taking counsel with flesh and blood, were accustomed to open the Bible, and pounce upon a text at random, "to see what the Lord would say unto them."† If they were on a journey, and at a loss what road to take, they laid the bridle on the horse's neck, and prayed for divine guidance, after which the animal was allowed to choose its own path. If the way was the right one, this was a merciful answer to prayer; but if the rider was carried astray, there was some gracious purpose to be served by the

* Vanbrugh's Journey to London.

† Spectator.

* Gay's Pastorals: The Spell.

aberration.* Under the ministrations and authority of such instructors all gaiety was banished from the land. Innocent festive recreations were scowled at under the designations of "chambering and wantonness;" and even those stirring games and athletic exercises which best suited the martial temper of the people began to be regarded as sinful, and that not the less for having been enforced in the hated episcopal Book of Sports. But, of all amusements, card-playing was reckoned the chief of abominations; those who were accustomed to the spiritual gambling of dipping between the leaves of a Bible accounted all games of chance connected with cards as processes of diabolical consultation, or even as practices of sheer atheism. The following naïve account will convey an idea not only of the feelings entertained upon this head, but of the habits of a well-ordered presbyterian family of rank during the seventeenth and the earlier part of the eighteenth century. "The house of Raploch being much frequented by strangers and the family itself numerous, it cannot be imagined but servants took occasion to spend much of their time idly, if not profanely. There was nothing wherein they exercised themselves more than in dicing and carding. One evening while they were gaming (their master's grandchild James looking on, being then in the fifth year of his age), they first contended, and then quarrelled with much noise; which, coming to their master's ears, residing in the garden chamber directly opposite to the kitchen lights, who, hearing this great noise, he makes down the stairs to understand the cause, but not so quietly but the patting of his staff upon the steps of the stair discovered his coming; which made all of them betake themselves to their heels, to seek for a place of shelter, knowing well that if they were caught they should be soundly battoned. Being come to the kitchen, he finds none there but his grandchild James, and the cards upon the table, which he takes up, and throws in the fire; when they were burning, the child cries out, 'Dear grandfather, the bonnie king o' hearts is now burnt!' Whereupon his grandfather with his staff strikes him twice upon the head, saying, 'False knave, know ye the cards already? Soon get out of my sight, otherwise ye shall be soundly whipt!' . . . This correction even then took so deep impression, that during his (the boy's) whole life he hated the playing at cards, neither did he ever but unwillingly exercise himself therein."†

When in the storm of persecution under Lauderdale and York the presbyterian clergymen, driven from their churches, were compelled to flee with their flocks to the caves and dens of the mountains, and to preach and fight by turns, a still darker and wilder character was impressed upon the national mind. Many of the hunted fugitives, in addition to the encounter of earthly enemies, were forced to grapple with Satan himself, who, as they believed, delighted to cross their path, or haunt their solitudes, in a corporeal form. Others of these stern confessors became seers and woe-denouncing prophets, whose visions were nothing but what their circumstances and the times inspired—the downfall of unrighteous rulers, and the destruction of persecutors, amidst tracks of desolation and rivers of blood. The same turn for the marvellous and supernatural made them invest their enemies with unearthly terrors; so that such unrelenting shedders of the blood of the saints as Dalziel and Claverhouse were supposed to have sold themselves to the prince of darkness, and it was asserted that the fiend had made their bodies proof to lead or steel, for the more effectual destruction of the children of the covenant. It was scarcely therefore to be wondered at, if acts of merciless cruelty were often thought justifiable against enemies who were thus supposed to have removed themselves beyond the pale of humanity: the only wonder is, that such acts were so few. Nor was the intolerance of the Covenanters unnatural. Having renounced all, and being ready to endure all for the sake of their faith, every man was consequently extremely jealous of its purity, and could not endure with patience the slightest deviation from what he regarded as the one rigid line of truth and salvation. It happened accordingly that the flocks of different teachers, when they found themselves driven together to the mountains as recusants, eyed each other with distrust, and even amidst their common sufferings found opportunities to debate and disagree upon the split hairs of their respective opinions; so that, even when the royal artillery was thundering upon their shaken ranks at Bothwell Bridge, they were more intent about their polemic debates among themselves than about the destructive onslaught of the enemy. Yet, extravagant and bigotted as these men were, they still, it is ever to be remembered, possessed that indomitable energy which vindicated the liberties of their country in the darkest hour of oppression, and when Scotland had no other patriots.

On the re-establishment of presbyterianism at the Revolution, the church courts were restored to all their former power, and their censures and penances to all their former severity. To this new system the great majority of the nation gave a willing obedience, as that for which they and their fathers had contended at the sacrifice of all things; and the national character and manners were now irrevocably modelled upon the spirit of presbyterianism. In the days of peace and prosperity that followed during the reign of William, and after the accession of the House of Brunswick, the old Covenanters and their children looked back with complacency upon their past struggles and sufferings. Almost every family was hallowed by the martyrdom of some one of its members; and it was a proud boast for any one to be able to tell that his father or his ancestor had been hanged at the Grassmarket, for the sake of the good cause. Then the stalwart iron-handed champions of the covenant—the Patons, Hackstons, Balfours, and Clelands—who had fought in the field, and perished on the scaffold, were exalted into national heroes as well as martyrs; and while their exploits in passing from mouth to mouth were gradually magnified into the impossibilities of romance, these men at last divided the popular enthusiasm with the Wallaces, the Bruces, and the Douglasses of former ages. Then, too, the pale-eyed, woe-worn prophets of the cause, the Pedens and Cargills, who had cheered the hearts of their followers in the gloomiest hour with predictions of deliverance and retribution, were fondly remembered, and their prophetic powers as devoutly credited as those of the apostles themselves. With such feelings, and such themes, the devout peasantry of Scotland around their rural hearths experienced the high enjoyment of those who listen by the shelter of a fire-side to the storm from which they have escaped. The literature also of these simple people was in harmony with their favourite subjects of conversation. In the kitchen of every hut there was a bole (niche) in the wall which, like a shrine, contained the most sacred treasures of the family in the form of a small collection of books and pamphlets. These consisted of such books as Boston's Marrow of Divinity, the Cloud of Wittnesses, Naphthali, or the Wrestlings of the Church of Scotland, Howie of Lochgoin's Scotch Worthies, a few volumes of sermons, by Cameron, Renwick, and other apostles of the covenant, preached extemporaneously among the moors and mosses, and taken down in short hand by some zealous follower, and various short tracts of covenanting history and biography written by Peter Walker, the travelling packman, and his devout contemporaries; and, above all, there was the "big ha' Bible," a massive quarto carefully covered with a hairy, undressed calf's-skin, or one of more portable dimensions, the oaken boards and brass mountings of which were dented perhaps with bullets that had flown at Air-moss or Drumclog, and with which the business of every successive day was solemnly wound up by the gudeman, who was the priest, as well as the father of the family.

* Memoirs of the Life of Mr. Robert Blair. Edit. 1754.

† Memoir of the Somervilles. Edit., 1815. Vol. ii. pp. 139-40.

But while such manners prevailed among the rural population, whose obedience was a willing service, or where the kirk was strong enough to quell the refractory, the case was very different with a considerable portion of the inhabitants of the larger towns, and especially of the capital. The great external distinction between the Presbyterians and the Episcopalians had all along been the opposite modes of observing the Sabbath followed by the two parties. On the restoration of the old authority of presbyterianism, measures were taken, in conformity with the principles of that discipline, to make the Sabbath universally a day of devotion, and meditation, and silence. No voice of levity was to wound, or look of gaiety to profane it; nothing was to be audible but the swing of the church-bells, or seen but the crowds that moved in slow and hushed procession to and from the churches: and during the intervals of public worship the work was to be varied by nothing but domestic devotion. A distinct idea of what was accounted sinful on that day may be obtained from the registers of the presbytery of Edinburgh for 1719 and 1721, in which the following enormities are enumerated: standing in companies upon the street—holding idle discourses there—~~withdrawing~~ withdrawing from the city—taking recreation before or after church, by walking through fields, parks, meadows, and such places—giving and receiving visits—gazing out at windows and beholding vanities abroad—entering into taverns, ale-houses, milk-houses, gardens, and other places. "Yea," adds the manifesto, "some have arrived at that height of impiety as not to be ashamed of washing in water and swimming in rivers upon the holy Sabbath." All who were guilty of such delinquencies were solemnly summoned to repent, while those who persevered in their iniquity were threatened with the utmost severity of ecclesiastical censure. There were in most of the large towns ecclesiastical officers called Seizers, whose duty it was to glide about the streets and lanes during divine service, and to apprehend all loiterers and evil-doers, and bring them before the spiritual tribunal.

It was a natural consequence of this excessive rigour of discipline which the Scottish church attempted to enforce, that the part of the population which set its authority at defiance, and was indifferent to character, was unusually turbulent and reckless. The desperadoes of the Scottish capital out-herded the roysters of London in every kind of excess. There was a Scottish Hell Fire Club which, in daring impieties and indecencies, appears to have even gone beyond the English association of the same name. There were also associations in Edinburgh similar to those of the Mohocks and Nickers of London. One of these was called the Sweating Club, from the practice of chasing people through the streets at midnight, and almost sweating them to death. But street misrule and mischief were not by any means confined to these infamous associations; persons from whose grave occupations different things might have been expected were as turbulent as the Sweaters themselves, especially after a hearty carouse—an event of almost as regular occurrence as the every-day dinner. It had become the custom in Edinburgh for half the business of life to be carried on in taverns and public houses: there the rich, deserting their own mansions, entertained their guests with greater freedom and licence; there the lawyers met with their clients, the merchants and tradesmen with their customers, and all bargains were discussed and settled over plentiful libations of strong liquors. Then it was that judges and advocates might be seen reeling homeward through the streets at midnight, laughing to scorn the laws which they administered by day, roaring bacchanalian catches, and hailing every ragamuffin they met. Lawyers' clerks, in imitation of their betters, scoured the streets under the same drunken inspiration, driving the peaceable and the sober before them like a flock of sheep. From time immemorial the Edinburgh houses had had a pin at the door instead of a knocker: this was a notched or twisted bar of iron standing perpendicularly from the door, and bearing a small ring of the same metal, which was drawn along the bar when a person sought admittance, an operation familiarly called "tirling at the pin." When the knocker superseded this primitive accommodation the innovation somehow displeased these nocturnal swaggerers, and they were not scrupulous in testifying their resentment. Sometimes a whole street of houses had all its knockers wrenched off in a single night.* But the great object of hatred on the part of these Edinburgh brawlers was the town-guard. This body, which was originally established by the Regent Murray, consisted of two or three hundred men, armed and disciplined for the conservation of the public peace. And truly their office was no insecure; for, if a company were reeling home at night, if a discontented mob assembled, if even a king's birth-day or civic festival was to be celebrated, the unfortunate guard seemed to have been drawn up as a fair mark for every missile; so that mud, stones, dead cats (and sometimes live ones), bruised the bodies, and defiled the uniforms of this obnoxious soldiery. But the members of the corps were Highland veterans, men of a race not famed for meekness or patience; and as they wielded formidable Lochaber axes, which they let fall with little ceremony, an Edinburgh row was by no means so safe as a London one. The guard-house, in fact, was often filled, in the course of the night, with broken-headed captives. The poet Fergusson, whose wild kind of life often brought him into a most undesirable contact with these champions of the peace, has celebrated them in many a rhyming malediction. Every Edinburgh shopkeeper, too, was required to keep by him a Jeddart staff or spear, with which to sally out, and aid the public authorities in any sudden commotion. Such, however, was the fierceness and determination of an Edinburgh mob in cases of great political excitement, that these powerful obstacles were swept away in an instant. It will be remembered how resistlessly they carried everything before them in the Porteous affair.

A considerable proportion even of the burghers and middle classes in Edinburgh appear to have been nearly as indifferent to the censures of the church as either their inferiors or superiors. We may gather from the poems of Ramsay and Fergusson, that hard drinking was general among them, and that they spent nearly as much of their time in the tavern as at their own firesides. There they besotted themselves with strong ale and whiskey, and played at high-jinks, where the forfeits commonly consisted in swallowing certain measures of liquor. One of their favourite possets, in a cold evening, was a toasted pease-scone (a cake of the flour of pease) in a cup of ale to take the chill off. Such excesses, which might have been fatal without active exercise, were relieved by the athletic games of bowling, curling, golf, and penny-stane; and by morning walks on the Castle-hill, which was then the favourite promenade of the citizens. On holidays, also, and especially on the Sunday evenings, they were wont, in spite of clerical prohibitions, to stroll to Newhaven or Musselburgh, to sup on fish, fresh oysters, and mussel-brose. If they returned to town later than ten o'clock they would find the gates shut; but, in this case, a trifling bribe would induce the porter to open the wicket.* In transacting business, the shopkeepers sat in the entrance of their little dark shops, or upon the stair-head, with their wares upon the pavement before them, which they loudly recommended to all who passed by. But, as their traffic did not require very close attention, they frequently adjourned from their shops to some place of social resort, locking their doors, and putting up a label telling their customers at what hour they would return. After mid-day they generally assembled at the Cross, and there discussed the price of goods or the politics of the day.† At eight o'clock in the evening the hour loudly struck from the steeple of St. Giles's was the signal to close business, upon which every shop and booth was shut up, and the owners repaired to their homes, or more probably to their favourite clubs and taverns.‡

In the early part of the eighteenth century many of the ladies of the highest rank in Scotland could not write, and some of them could not even read. Some brilliant specimens, indeed, of female talents and accomplishments graced the northern capital; but these were rare exceptions to the general rule. A certain bluntness, and even licentiousness, of conversation prevailed among women of rank; and the youngest and fairest of them in social parties could sing with wonderful complacency such equivocal or rather unequivocal songs as are now only to be found in the cabinets of virtuosos and relic-hunters. Lady Stair, who was the leader of ton in Edinburgh about the middle of the eighteenth century, was so free of speech, that, having quarrelled with the Earl of Dundonald, she defied him to his teeth, and called him thrice, "a d—d villain." Anne, the eldest daughter of Lord Royston, a lady of wit, beauty, and accomplishments, used to disguise herself in male attire, and scour the streets at midnight in quest of adventures, like a regular whook. In one of these sallies she fell into the hands of the town-guard, and was confined for a whole night in the guard-house. When ladies walked in the streets their favourite attire was a large plaid, which was gracefully disposed over the head like a Spanish mantilla, so that it formed a more complete disguise than even a mask.§ On this account it served to cover, or rather conceal a multitude of sins, in the shape of assigna-

* Chambers's Tradition of Edinburgh.

• Allan Ramsay.
‡ Fergusson.

† Chambers.
§ Ramsay's Tartan, or the Plaid.

tions and intrigues, a circumstance which brought upon it the ban both of town-council and kirk-session. Ladies also were frequenters of taverns, as well as gentlemen; and it would appear that, on these occasions, they did not generally stint themselves in drinking to the measure of feminine propriety. But of all the excesses of these aristocratic ranti-poles, their oyster suppers were the most startling. Edinburgh at this time abounded with little dark cellars, which were used as vulgar hostelrys, and in these subterranean dens fashionable parties of both sexes assembled for the purposes of feasting and revelry. The supper on these occasions was generally oysters and porter; the conversation that enlivened it was as low as the place of festival; and when the coarse banquet was over, dancing, brandy, and rum-punch kept the whole party in a state of uproarious excitement till morning light began to dawn. Sometimes, too, by way of heightening the revel, town courtesans were actually invited to take a share in the dancing and merriment.*

Edinburgh at this period, and even until she had "flung her white arms to the sea," enjoyed the unenviable distinction of being the filthiest city in Europe. While war was rife between England and Scotland, the citizens, in building their houses, were anxious to keep as near the protection of the Castle as possible; and, therefore, instead of increasing the limits of the city, they piled story upon story, after the model of the Parisians, until a house sometimes rivalled the steeples in height, while it sheltered some twenty or thirty families within its walls. This was especially the case in the High-street, where some of these fourteen-story dwellings remained till within these few years. The streets being very narrow, while the houses were so lofty, were consequently gloomy and ill-ventilated; and, as those who dwelt in the airy regions begrudged the toil of a descent to the street when it could be avoided, the whole garbage of many families was ejected from the windows with little ceremony. This vile process, indeed, was confined to an early period of the morning; but woe to the stranger who ventured to go forth, in the hope of inhaling the morning breeze! A whole volley of miscellaneous abominations lighted upon his head before the tardy warning of "Gare de Peau" could travel to his ears. Another source of the dirtiness of Edinburgh was, the circumstance of so many outside stairs projecting from the houses, under which the inhabitants kept swine, that were allowed to wander about in the streets, and play the part of scavengers. These animals naturally became the pets and playfellows of the young people, and thus a litter of pigs and children might often be seen rolling lovingly together in the mud.† As the desire of protection im-elled the common people Castle-ward, the situation of Holyrood Palace at its lower extremity made the Canongate a street of noblemen's houses, before the accession of James VI. to the crown of England. Even after that event, indeed, although several of the Scottish nobility repaired to the English court, yet the majority, who were both proud and poor, found themselves unable to sustain the expenses of a London life, and very profitably abode by their Edinburgh domiciles. This state of things continued till the Union, when the removal of the parliament certainly gave a blow to the prosperity of Edinburgh, which for a time was severely felt. The insurrections in 1715 and 1745 succeeded, by which the town was still further thrown back; but after the final overthrow of the Stuart cause, Edinburgh, as if it had been delivered from its evil genius, suddenly commenced a career of prosperity nearly unexampled in the progress of modern capitals.*

In their domestic economy the Scottish population had, up to the end of the present period, made a slower advance than might have been expected, especially after the union of the country with England. The time had not yet arrived when they were to contend with their ancient rivals in the arts of civilization, as they had formerly contended with them in arms, and for a long time after the Union they rather sought, by an opposition of manners and ways of living, to distinguish themselves from a nation which they hated. Thus, the Scottish peasant who should have been so fastidious as to remove the huge festering dunghill from before his door, whitewash his cottage walls, ornament his porch with flowers or woodbine, or even improve the rude and scanty comforts of his butt and ben, would have been derided by the whole village as a dainty, precise Scotchman, who had grown ashamed of his fathers and his country—a blundering imitator of the new-fangled crotchets of the false-hearted and luxurious Southrons. This feeling also was in some degree shared by those of the nobility who still remained in Scotland, and neither their finances nor their feelings of domestic comfort could persuade them to exchange their dismal country-seats for elegant and stately mansions. These homely dwellings, however, since the beginning of the seventeenth century, had been generally furnished with bowling-greens, butts for archery, tennis-courts, and billiard-tables.† Even the royal palaces, such as Holyrood and Falkland, were only covered with thatch till about the middle of the seventeenth century. The Duke of Queensberry attempted a bold innovation when he built the splendid palace of Drumlanrig; but, when the work was done, he appears to have valued himself little upon the experiment. On the first day of his residence there he was attacked by a sudden illness in his

* Ramsay.—Ferguson.—Chambers.

† Chambers, Traditions, &c.—In such a state of things frequent visits of the plague might have been expected; and yet such a calamity had been unknown in Edinburgh since A.D. 1645. Arnott's History of Edinburgh, p. 259.—Fletcher of Saltoun, in his Discourses upon the Affairs of Scotland, attributes the dirtiness of the city to its situation, when, in fact, the evil should rather have been charged upon the vile habits of the people.

* Arnott.—Chambers.

† Memorie of the Somervilles, vol. ii. p. 141.

bed at midnight; but, being unable to sound a sufficient alarm through so huge an edifice, his servants could not hear him, so that he almost expired in the midst of his splendid solitude. On this account he never again attempted to sojourn in his new house. He was so scandalised also at the building expenses, that he endorsed the bundle of accounts with this malediction—"The devil pike out his een that looks herein!"* But, notwithstanding the inferiority of their dwellings, there was still no lack of large retinues among the Scottish nobles, as the feudal feelings of the people were still strong, and men preferred following the heels of a laird to more independent but more laborious processes of industry. Sometimes, too, these trains exhibited all the pomp of the middle ages, especially at a riding of parliament before the Union: so late as 1700, the Duke of Queensberry, the king's commissioner, entered Edinburgh with forty coaches and twelve hundred horse.†

From the cheapness of education, both at school and college, a Scottish gentleman was able, at a small expense, to send all his sons to the university; but, as the eldest only inherited the patrimonial estate, the rest commonly went abroad, and prospered so well that the good luck of Scotsmen in foreign countries had already become proverbial. Thus, even so early as the period of the Thirty Years' war in Germany, Gustavus Adolphus had four lieutenant-generals, twenty colonels, and inferior officers without number, in his army, who were all natives of Scotland.‡ Towards the end of that period, when Scotland was beginning to be smitten with a new commercial ambition, it became a practice in some parts of the country, and especially in Fifeshire and Perthshire, for the younger sons of noble families to be instructed in some mechanical art, for the encouragement of trade and manufactures.§ This was a change which would not have been objected to even by the aristocratic spirit of Fletcher of Saltoun, who complained that the younger sons of ancient Scottish families devoted themselves too exclusively to the career of a soldier-of-fortune. In the article of diet the Scots were pretty nearly assimilated to their neighbours of England, with the exception of their retention of certain dishes which had been national from an early period. The chief of these were a singed or scorched sheep's head boiled, a haggis, oatmeal porridge, cakes of the same material, and kail-brose. Tea had been imported into Scotland in 1681, and in 1750 it was in common use among the middle classes of Edinburgh.

At all times a large portion of the Scottish population had consisted of mendicants and other lawless characters. About the date of the Union, according to Fletcher, there were 200,000 persons in Scotland who begged their bread from door to door, while there had never at any time been less than 100,000. He tells us, also, that they generally went in bands; that whatever they were unable to obtain by entreaty they took by force and violence; and that they lived among themselves in a state of lawless and unnatural intercourse. Many of these pariahs, however, were not Scots, but gypsies. The genuine Scottish gaberlunzie and bluegownsmen of the eighteenth century was a person of a very different stamp, being at once the newsmonger, love-broker, and letter-carrier of his little district, and sometimes also its chief wit and politician. He was thus a useful personage in his day and generation; and, instead of being humbled under his office, he rather regarded himself as a benefactor of society who had a good right to be fed. While the progress of civilization, therefore, crushed and exterminated the gypsy race, as it does in the case of other savages, it passed lightly over the privileged beggar of the village, so that many an Edie Ochiltree is still to be met with in the rural districts of the North.

The Highland population of Scotland acted so important a part on more than one occasion in this period that they call for particular notice. Although they constituted a part of the British empire, yet, till the year 1745, they were as complete strangers to the English as the inhabitants of Timbuctoo. Even of the inland Lowlanders few knew anything about them; the only specimen they saw of this secluded race being occasionally a Highland drover armed to the teeth, and stalking with an air of majesty after his drove of black cattle. Those who lived more immediately in the neighbourhood of the Highlands knew them only as troublesome neighbours, who either made forays upon their lands or subjected them to the tribute of black-mail.

The government of this singular people was as exotic as their appearance, language, and dress, being neither feudal nor monarchical, but patriarchal, after the fashion of the earliest tribes of mankind. Indeed, the closest resemblance to the Gaël of Scotland in this point is to be found among the mountaineers of India, and especially among the Affghans. At the head of every clan was the chief, or Cear Cinne, who was regarded as the descendant and representative of the father of the tribe. He was the steward of the soil, and the magistrate, judge, and general of the people. Next in the order of rank were the tacksmen,—men related to the chief, and who obtained portions of the land from him upon lease or mortgage. And last and lowest of all were the families and dependents of the tacksmen, by whom the land was stocked and cultivated. In large clans the tacksmen frequently became chieftains (that is, subordinate chiefs over their own sept); but, where they were not so fortunate, they were at least duinhè-wassails, that is, gentlemen, and as such entitled to wear the eagle's feather in their bonnet. Sometimes it unluckily happened that the duinhè-wassail, notwithstanding his rank and noble pedigree as the sixteenth cousin

* Chambers.

† Arnott's Edinburgh, p. 185.

‡ Macky's Journey through Scotland.

§ Chambers's Traditions of Edinburgh.

of a chief, was obliged to follow the occupation of a drover or even a carrier, which brought him daily into contact with the Lowlanders, who laughed his high pretensions to scorn. In such cases the claymore was promptly unsheathed; but the sturdy Lowland peasant, plunging his bonnet into water and wrapping it round the head of his cudgel, buckled fearlessly with his adversary, and then "With many a hard thwack, many a bang, Stout crab-tree and old iron rang."

From the minute subdivision of land, and from each clan being confined within its own territorial limits, the Highland population was continually increasing beyond the means of subsistence; and whole throngs, therefore, were at length obliged to emigrate to Edinburgh, where they found occupation as chairmen, caddies (errand-men), porters, and in other humble offices. On the other hand, the duinhe-wassails frequently became robbers; a noble occupation in their eyes, as it was conducted upon a grand scale at the head of some score or two of "pretty men," and against their supplanters the Saxons of the plains, from whom they only wrested, as they said, what had been originally their own. With this view of the matter the catteran was in their estimation a patriot and a hero, even though his career should be terminated by the "kind gallows of Crief." On account of this superabundance of population, also, war was profitable for all parties; and a Highland chief, who regarded such a state of things as his proper season of harvest, was wont to value himself, not upon the amount of his rental, but upon the number of broadswords he could bring into the field. Thus MacDonald of Keppoch, having regaled some English strangers one day with a plentiful banquet, at which there was abundance of good wine, was asked by one of the guests, who had more curiosity than politeness, what might be the amount of his income: "I can raise five hundred men," was the chief's laconic reply.*

The mode of living of a Highland chief was a curious mixture of patriarchal pomp and simplicity. His castle (if he had a castle) was generally a rude square tower, but more usually his abode was only a plain stone house, which an English yeoman would scarcely have coveted. Here dwelt the mountain satrap, surrounded by a crowd of officers, who regarded him with almost Eastern adoration—his pipers and bards, his speech-makers and henchmen, and all the various functionaries that composed the joints of his unwieldy tail. Even old Lord Lovat, one of the very greatest of the Highland chiefs, lived in a house that would have been thought a poor one for a common English gentleman, but in the style of a sovereign in the midst of his court; for he kept several public tables, while a large retinue was constantly in attendance. All this could not be done, however, without much crowding, and economissing of space; and therefore his own room served for dining-room, parlour, audience-hall, and dormitory; his lady's sitting-room was also her bed-chamber; and the only accommodation for lodging the throng of servants and retainers was a quantity of straw spread every night on the floors of the lower apartments, upon which they all slept. One luxury of this old nobleman reminds us of the ancient Persian kings. There was a particular spring of which it was his pleasure to drink, and a servant therefore was sent to it every day for water, although the distance was eight miles. Sometimes the patriarchal fashions of the Highlands set every principle of propriety at defiance: Lord Lovat, when he found in his old days that he lacked animal warmth, supplied the defect by lying in bed between two buxom damsels.*

No towns properly so called were to be found in the Highlands. The houses, which were generally scattered in a glen or strath, were built of sod or turf, sometimes of clay, and occasionally of stone without lime. The food of the common Highlanders was not only very simple, but generally scanty: we have already mentioned their practice of bleeding their black cattle at the beginning of summer, and boiling the blood in kettles with a great quantity of salt, to be laid up for food. With the exception of the target, which was used only in battle, a Highlander was at all times completely armed: he even went to church in armour, so that his weapons became as familiar to him as his own limbs; and such was the iron hardihood and power of endurance which his mode of life imparted, that, having been a soldier from his boyhood, he was scarcely at all subject to any of those military ailments that in a campaign destroy more lives than the sword.† In illustration of the high ideas of honour that were cherished by this primitive race, it is sufficient to allude to the fidelity with which they protected the young Chevalier when a price of 30,000*l.* was set upon his head; and the poor Highlander who sheltered and guarded him in defiance of such a bribe, and who was afterwards hanged for cattle-stealing, was only a specimen of the general character of his nation. The two great master-feelings of the Highlanders were, love of revenge, and devotedness to their chiefs. In the retaliation of injuries the Highlander was an avenger of blood, whom neither the Goel of the Hebrews nor the Tair of the Arabs could have surpassed; and thus every glen and mountain was the dwelling-place of deadly feuds handed down like heir-looms from father to son to the latest posterity. Their love and veneration for their chief was equally intense. He was the impersonation of his clan, the heart from which all its life-blood circulated, and to which it as faithfully returned; and the common exclamation of a Highlander, under any sudden surprise, when others give vent to a devout or profane ejaculation, was, "May God be

* Home's History of the Rebellion in 1745.—Article by Sir W. Scott, on the Culloden Papers, in the Quarterly Review, vol. xiv.

* Chambers's Edinburgh.
† Home's Rebellion of 1746.

with the chief;" or "May the chief be uppermost."*

It is in these peculiar habits and dispositions of the Highlanders that we are to discover the causes of all that was wonderful and romantic in their campaign of 1745. Charles Stuart arrived among them in the character of a chief forsaken by his people, and their sympathies were kindled by what appeared to them the highest of all calamities. The Highland leaders commanded their vassals to arm, and they armed accordingly. Few of these chiefs indeed had ever seen a battle; but then they were high-spirited and brave, and wherever they charged they were sure that their people would follow. In this way a host of men that could scarcely be called an army, unprovided with military stores, and scarcely half-armed, were enabled to traverse one hostile kingdom and part of another in despite of all opposition, and to rout with ease the numerous legions of veteran troops, and skilful leaders that were successively sent to overwhelm them.

* Home.

CHAPTER VII.

HISTORY OF THE CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE.

THE circumstances of the different classes of the people of England about the date of the Revolution have been attempted to be determined with curious precision by a political arithmetician of that day, Gregory King, the author of a little work entitled "Natural and Political Observations and Conclusions upon the State and Condition of England," drawn up in the year 1696.* Without placing absolute reliance upon King's calculations, we may accept his conclusions, which appear to be deduced on the whole both with care and sagacity, as probably in most points coming nearer to the truth than any we should be able to form from other sources of information.

From the returns of the collectors of the chimney-money or hearth-tax for 1690 (the last year it subsisted), King infers that the number of inhabited houses in England was at the time when he wrote about 1,300,000; of which he assigns 105,000 to London and the parishes comprehended within the bills of mortality, 195,000 to the other cities and market-towns throughout the kingdom, and the remaining 1,000,000 to the villages and hamlets. Allowing $5\frac{1}{2}$ souls for each house in London within the walls, $4\frac{1}{2}$ for each in the rest of the bills of mortality and in other great towns, and 4 for each in the hamlets and villages, he concludes that, making allowance for omissions of all kinds, the entire population of England must at that time have amounted to above five millions and a half. It is probable, however, as we have had occasion to notice in a former Book, that this estimate of the number of persons in each house is considerably too low. If we take the number of the inhabitants of each house, on the average of the whole kingdom, at $5\frac{1}{2}$, which appears to be nearest the truth,† we shall obtain from the 1,300,000 houses, and the additions King makes for omissions and vagrants, a population of above 7,200,000. We may safely assume that the entire number of people in England at the Revolution was not under seven millions, or fully a fourth more than the amount at which King fixes it.

But the most curious of King's calculations is his scheme of the ranks, occupations, and incomes of all the families in the kingdom, drawn out for the year 1688. According to this table the families of the nobility then amounted to 160; of the bishops, to 26; of baronets, to 800; of knights, to 600; of esquires, to 3000; of gentlemen, to 12,000; of persons in offices (meaning, apparently, in the employment of government), 10,000; of merchants and traders by sea, 2000; of merchants and traders by land, 8000; of persons belonging to the profession of the law, 10,000; of clergymen, 10,000; of freeholders, 180,000; of farmers, 150,000; of persons connected with the sciences and liberal arts, 16,000; of naval officers, 5000; of military officers, 4000; of shopkeepers and tradesmen, 40,000; of artisans, 60,000; of common seamen, 50,000; of common soldiers, 35,000; of labouring people and outservants, 364,000; of cottagers and paupers, 400,000. It does not appear from what data these numbers are drawn, and indeed our author could scarcely in this part of his labours have had anything else to guide him except his own sagacity exerted on a very small number of ascertained facts. Even no better furnished, he is doubtless entitled to speak with more authority than any one can do at the present day; yet some of the items in the table seem rather remarkable. The number of persons in public employments, at a time when both the post-office and the excise were so insignificant, appears very large; so does that of persons belonging to the legal profession; the number of clergymen, again, must be rather understated, if those of the Roman Catholic persuasion and of the dissenting bodies are intended to be included; on the other hand, we should scarcely have looked for so large a body of persons in any way connected with the sciences and the liberal arts. This last item, however, probably includes all the members of the medical profession.

Another column of the scheme presents us with the average yearly income of each description of family; and this, although also of course only a conjectural approximation to the truth, is both more likely to be tolerably correct than the guess

* Gregory King's calculations were first partially given to the world by Dr. Davenant in his "Essay upon the Probable Methods of making a People Gainers in the Balance of Trade," published in 1699; and they have been often quoted from Davenant's imperfect account. But King's work has been published in full from his own manuscript, in the British Museum, by the late George Chalmers, at the end of the fourth edition of his "Estimate of the Comparative Strength of Great Britain." Lon. 1804.

† See vol. iii. p. 654; and Chalmers's Estimate, p. 57.

at the numbers of the families of each class, and is of fully as much value as an evidence of the economic condition of the country. In almost every case the income assigned is probably less than would be expected. Those of the nobility are set down as averaging 2800*l.*; of the bishops, 1300*l.*; of the baronets, 880*l.*; of the knights, 650*l.*; of the esquires, or untitled landed gentry, 450*l.*; of the gentlemen, 280*l.*; of one half of the public functionaries, 240*l.*; of the other, 120*l.*; of the foreign merchants 400*l.*; of the home merchants, 200*l.*; of the lawyers, 140*l.*; of one-fifth of the clergy, 60*l.*; of the remaining four-fifths, only 45*l.*; of two-ninths of the freeholders, 84*l.*; of the remaining seven-ninths, 50*l.*; of the farmers, 44*l.*; of the men of science and the liberal arts, 60*l.*; of the officers of the navy, 80*l.*; of the officers of the army, 60*l.*; of the shopkeepers and tradesmen, 45*l.*; of the artisans and handicraftsmen, 40*l.*; of the common seamen, 20*l.*; of the common soldiers, 14*l.*; of the labouring people and out-of-door servants, 15*l.*; of the cottagers and paupers, 6*l.* 10*s.* According to this statement, then, the highest grades of the church, the medical profession, and the army brought only an income half as much more than the average annual earning of a common mechanic; and the amount of the latter was within four or five pounds of the income of eight thousand of the clergy and of the general body of the farmers. Legal practitioners fared somewhat better; but even they, one with another, did not earn more than between three and four times the income of a common mechanic. The incomes of individuals of course varied considerably in most of these classes; but still, after every allowance on that account, the state of things seems to have been widely different from that which now exists; the general inequality of incomes must have been much less; and, in particular, the social position of the mere labourer would appear to have approached much nearer than it now does to that of the capitalist, whether the moneyed man, or the man of education and accumulated knowledge, whose capital lies, not in his pocket, but in his head. And this is the more worthy of remark inasmuch as the ordinary profits of money capital were certainly not less, but greater, than they are now, although the positive amount of such capital profitably invested was infinitely less than it now is.

Another of the chapters or sections in King's work contains an estimate of the yearly consumption of flesh in England at this time. This he makes to consist—1. of 800,000 beeves and calves, weighing on an average 260 pounds each, and of the market value of 1*½d.* per pound; 2. of 3,200,000 sheep and lambs, each of the weight of 32 pounds, at 2*½d.* per pound; 3. of 1,300,000 swine and pigs, each weighing 46 pounds, at 3*d.* per pound; 4. of 20,000 deer and fawns, each of 70 pounds weight, at 6*d.* per pound; 5. of 10,000 goats and kids, each weighing 36 pounds, at 2*½d.* per pound; 6. of 12,000 hares and leverets, each of 2*½* pounds, at 7*d.* per pound; 7. of 2,000,000 of rabbits and conies, weighing each $\frac{3}{4}$ and $\frac{1}{2}$ a pound, at 6*d.* per pound; 8. of tame fowls, such as geese, turkeys, hens, ducks, pigeons, swans, and peacocks, to the value of 600,000*l.*, at 6*d.* per pound; 9. of wild fowl, to the value of 20,000*l.*, at a shilling a pound. If but little reliance can be placed upon the quantities here supposed to be consumed of each of these various kinds of animal food, the statement may at least be received as evidence of the average weight of the carcasses, and of the current price of the several descriptions of butcher's meat and poultry. It will be found, however, that the estimate makes the entire annual consumption of flesh and fowl to have amounted in weight to 398,090,000 pounds, and in value to 3,922,000*l.* Of the entire population of the kingdom, calculated, as above, at five millions and a half, King assumes that very nearly a half eat flesh constantly: of the remainder he sets down 200,000 as infants under thirteen months old; 40,000 as sick persons; 260,000 as persons who, for whatever reason, do not feed on flesh more than twice a-week; 1,280,000 as persons "who, by reason of their poverty, do not contribute to church or poor, and consequently eat not flesh above two days in seven;" and 1,020,000 as persons receiving alms, and consequently not eating flesh above once a-week. At this time, therefore, it would appear, there were none of the people of England who had not flesh at least once a-week; and not more than about one individual in six who ate it so seldom. According to another table, the quantity of malt brewed in 1688 was 23,000,000 bushels, producing 5,300,000 barrels of strong ale and beer and 7,100,000 of small; and in 1695, after the excise had been raised, the quantity of malt was only 22,000,000 bushels, producing 3,850,000 barrels of strong drink and 7,500,000 of small. Even this reduced quantity would still allow about two barrels of malt-liquor for each individual, if we make the proper deduction for infants and sick persons. At this time a barrel of beer contained 32 gallons, equal to 32*½* imperial gallons; so that, if we take the entire beer-drinking population as amounting to six millions, the above quantities would allow for the annual consumption of each individual at the Revolution about 28 gallons of strong and 40 of small beer, and in 1695 about 21 gallons of strong beer and 40 of small. But we believe that in fact the drinking of beer, either strong or small, has at no time been a habit of the population over the whole extent of England—that perhaps it has never been general over more than half, or at most two-thirds, of the kingdom. The actual consumption, therefore, of each individual in the districts where beer was drunk must have been much greater than has been just stated. The amount of the beer-drinking in England, at the end of the seventeenth century, may be best estimated from the fact, that, whereas the quantity of malt then consumed was about twenty-two or twenty-three millions of bushels, it does not now, with our population more than doubled, exceed thirty millions. There can be no doubt indeed, that the consumption of malt-liquor has declined in this country within the last century and a half; one obvious cause of the change, whatever others may have also operated, being the vastly extended substitution of tea and coffee—beverages which were scarcely known to the mass of the people at the date to which King's calculations refer.

The manner in which the population was distributed over the country at this time may be learned from an account which Davenant has published of the number of inhabited houses in each county, according to the hearth-books for the year 1690.* If we compare this account with the last population returns of 1831, we shall discover some remarkable points of diversity between the two. In 1831 the three counties of Middlesex, Lancashire, and Yorkshire, in that order, head the list arranged according to the population, that of each being very nearly the same, namely, between 1,300,000 and 1,400,000 souls. In 1690, if we allow $5\frac{1}{2}$ persons to each house, Yorkshire stood first, with a population of 653,000, and Middlesex second, with 600,000; but the third county was Norfolk, of which the population was 306,000; and the fourth, Devonshire, with 304,000. Suffolk, with 257,000, also preceded Lancashire, which had only 253,000; Kent having 251,000, Somerset 248,000, and Lincoln 243,000. Durham and Northumberland, also, which are reckoned together, had 288,000 between them. Surrey, including Southwark, had 219,000, and Essex very nearly the same number. In 1831, the nine counties that came next in order after the three already mentioned, the population of each of which was not far from three times as great as that of the most considerable in the remainder of the list, were Devonshire with 494,478, Surrey with 486,334, Kent with 479,155, Staffordshire with 410,512, Somersetshire with 404,200, Norfolk with 390,054, Gloucester with 387,019, Warwickshire with 336,610, and Cheshire with 334,391. The population of Lincoln was then 317,465, and that of Essex 317,507; Suffolk, formerly more populous than Lancashire, had now only 296,317 inhabitants, or not 40,000 more than it had nearly a century and a half before. It was then the fifth in order among the English counties; it was now the seventeenth. Indeed, at the time of the immediately preceding census in 1821 Suffolk had not quite recovered the actual population it appears to have had a hundred and thirty years before. Other counties in which the population has made very little progress are Bedford, Berkshire, Buckingham, Hereford, Huntingdon, Northampton, Rutland, and Westmoreland. On the other hand, the increase has been very considerable in Cheshire, Cornwall, Cumberland, Derby, Gloucester, Shropshire, and Wiltshire; and still greater in Cambridge, Kent, Nottingham, Staffordshire, Northamptonshire, Sussex, and Warwickshire.

The pressure of the poor-rates, which, as we have seen, had been felt throughout the seventeenth century, became more severe than ever after the Revolution, and various schemes continued to be proposed by philanthropic or ingenious speculators for checking an evil which it was now perceived would inevitably, if left alone, maintain its progress at an accelerating pace. The consideration of the best method of employing the poor was, as already noticed, one of the subjects to which the Board of Trade, established in 1696, was directed to give its attention;* and, accordingly, the following year a Report on the subject was presented by the commissioners to the lords justices, drawn up by Mr. Locke. "The multiplying of the poor," says this Report, "and the increase of the tax for their maintenance, is so general an observation and complaint that it cannot be doubted of; nor has it been only since the last war that the evil has come upon us; it has been a growing burden on the kingdom these many years; and the two last reigns felt the increase of it as well as the present." The growth of the evil Locke attributes simply to "the relaxation of discipline and the corruption of manners." Above one half of the persons in receipt of parish relief might, he calculates, maintain themselves if they had employment—so far had the inundation of able-bodied pauperism already forced itself upon the rates. We need not, however, go into any account of the plan proposed by Locke for remedying the evils described in his report, since, although it was some years afterwards embodied in a bill which was introduced into the House of Commons, it was never sanctioned by the legislature or carried into effect. It consisted principally in the enactment of more stringent regulations for compelling the overseers of parishes to find employment for their able-bodied paupers, and in some provisions for enabling them to put out the poor to work with such persons as would hire them. The author seems to have anticipated that in this way all the poor who were able to work might be made to defray the expense of their maintenance—as if it were not simply the deficiency of employment having really in itself the power of supporting the labourer which created the class of able-bodied paupers. No doubt an overseer, or other public officer appointed for that purpose, might do something in removing impediments or obstacles that sometimes separate the work to be done from the hands able and ready to do it,—as when the overstocked labour-market of one parish or district of the country, or even of one portion of the empire, might be relieved, and at the same time another in opposite circumstances benefited, by the opening of a free communication between the two, and the transference of labourers from the former to the latter. But overseers cannot, any more than other men, create employment—cannot perform the miracle of making that labour productive or profitable which naturally is not so. Above all, this is not to be done by making people hire labourers, or take apprentices, whom they do not actually want; that is merely the most roundabout, wasteful, unfair, delusive, and in all respects most objectionable way of imposing a rate.

* In his Essay upon Ways and Means, published in 1696. See Works, l. 89.

* See ante, p. 696.

In 1698, Richard Dunning, whose plan, published in 1685, for the management of the poor of Devonshire we noticed in the last Book,* printed at Exeter another pamphlet, to which he only prefixed his initials, with the title of "Bread for the Poor." In this tract he states that, in some parishes of Devonshire, the charge of maintaining the poor had already advanced from forty shillings to forty pounds a year within about half a century; and that, on a moderate calculation, the entire rates for the county did not amount to much less than 40,000*l.*, which was about four times their amount fifty or sixty years before.† Yet this writer maintains wages were in his day higher than formerly, work more plentiful, and provisions cheaper. The charge for the poor throughout the whole kingdom he estimates at above 819,000*l.* per annum. "Add to this," he goes on, "what they receive by begging, and what they might get in the time they now spend idly, or worse; which few but will agree is more than the poor-rates; so the same, being but another such sum, and added to the former, makes up 1,638,000*l.* per annum." The first cause which he assigns for the great increase of the rates is the extravagant living of the poor. He affirms "that not only more ale and brandy are sold than formerly in single alehouses and brandy-shops, but the number of such houses and shops is also increased; that the money spent in ale and brandy, in small country shops and alehouses, amounts to a vast and almost incredible sum, did not their payments for excise manifest it; that a very small and inconsiderable part thereof is spent by gentlemen or travellers, or housekeepers that pay rates to the king and poor; that such as are maintained by parish pay seldom drink any other than the strongest alehouse beer, which, at the rate they buy it, costs 50*s.* or 3*l.* a hogshead; that they seldom eat any bread save what is made of the finest wheat flour sold by common bakers." The second cause he assigns is idleness. "Persons," he observes, "once receiving parish pay, presently become idle, alleging that the parish is bound to maintain them, and that, in case they should work, it would only favour a parish, from whom, they say, they shall have no thanks." The allowances made by parishes to their poor Dunning censures as in general much too high, and as, in consequence, having the effect of not only fostering extravagance and idleness in them, but discouraging industry in others. The parish pay he declares to be, in fact, three times as much as a common labourer, having to maintain a wife and three children, can afford to expend upon himself. "As it is not strange," he observes, "to see labourers to have four or five children apiece, which they maintain by their labour, so it is common to see many maintain three children apiece in a decent manner: now, admitting the wife maintains herself and one child,—which is the most a woman can, and what few will do,—what is needful to maintain himself and two children the husband must bear: he must pay house-rent, which, in 20*s.* yearly, is weekly upwards of 4*d.*; he must buy wood, which cannot be less than 3*d.*; his own clothes, in 20*s.* yearly, cost above 4*d.*; his Sunday's diet, 2*d.*; and working tools, weekly, 1*d.*; there remains of his week's wages, to maintain two children, meat and drink, clothes, attendance, washing, &c., scarce above 1*d.* a day for each child, 1*s.* 2*d.*" "So weekly," it is added, "both cost 2*s.* 5*d.*;" by which we understand it to be meant that the above enumerated items, being his charges both for his children and on his own account, imply a weekly expenditure of about 2*s.* 5*d.*—the penny being added to make up the full 20*s.* for rent and 20*s.* for clothes. Then, we are told, "his full wages, in some parts of the country, are weekly 2*s.* 6*d.*; in others 2*s.* 8*d.*; in some places less; and, where more is paid, house-rent and wood are dearer." But this, apparently, must have been his money wages only,—what he received in addition to his diet, which, it will be observed, is charged, in the above account of his expenditure, only for Sunday. This circumstance, strangely enough, appears to have escaped Sir Frederick Eden, who, in his work on the State of the Poor, assumes, from what is here stated by Dunning, that in Devonshire, in the latter end of the seventeenth century, a working man's income was only about 6*l.* 10*s.* a-year, and labours through a long quack page to reconcile this account with those of other contemporary authorities—with that of Sir Matthew Hale, for instance, who, as formerly noted, computes the necessary expense of a labourer's family of six individuals, in Gloucestershire, about the time of the Restoration, at 26*l.* a-year;‡ and with that of Gregory King, who, as we have just seen, estimates the ordinary income of a labourer, having a wife and two children to support, at 15*l.*, within a few years of the very time when Dunning's pamphlet was published. If we suppose the cost of the Devonshire labourer's food to be equal to the amount of his wages, Dunning's statement will very nearly agree both with King's and Hale's. In that part of the island, where there were no manufactures, and where living was cheap, it may be supposed that wages would be rather below the average.

It had already, before the end of the seventeenth century, begun to be felt that various inconveniences in the management of the poor were occasioned by

* See vol. iii. p. 912.

† According to Mr. Arthur Moore's estimate, published by Davison, and referred to in our last Book (vol. iii. p. 908), the annual assessment for the poor in Devonshire in the latter part of the reign of Charles II. was 34,764*l.*

‡ See vol. iii. p. 905.

the universal assessment of the rates in separate parishes. In a tract published about the last year of that century by a Mr. John Cary, entitled "An Essay towards regulating the trade and employing the Poor of this Kingdom," the author recommends, as a matter of chief importance, "that the poor's rates be made with more equality in cities and great towns, especially in the former, where the greatest number of poor usually residing together in the suburbs and out-parishes are very serviceable, by their labours, to the rich in carrying on their trades; yet, when age, sickness, or a numerous family make them desire relief, their chief dependence must be on people but one step above their own condition, by which means these out-parishes are more burthened in their payments than the in-parishes are, though much richer; and is one reason why they are so ill inhabited, no man caring to come to a certain charge; and this is attended with another ill consequence, the want of better inhabitants making way for those disorders which easily grow among the poor; whereas, if cities and towns were made but one poor's rate, or equally divided into more, these inconveniences would be removed, and the poor maintained by a more equal contribution." An act of parliament passed in 1697, by which the different parishes in the city of Bristol were formed into a union, with a workhouse, and the management of all parochial concerns within the city vested in a single corporation, appears to have been procured mainly by Cary, who in another publication has given an account of the proceedings of the managers in execution of the act. "It was probably," Sir Frederick Eden observes, "in consequence of the prosperous beginnings of the Bristol workhouse, which seem to have been chiefly owing to the active exertions of Mr. Cary and the other promoters of the establishment, that city workhouses came much into vogue during the reigns of King William and Queen Anne. Two years after the passing of the Bristol Act, Exeter, Hereford, Colchester, Kingston-upon-Hull, and Shaftesbury were authorised to erect workhouses for the employment and maintenance of their poor; and these establishments were soon after extended to Lynn, Sudbury, Gloucester, Plymouth, Norwich, and other places."*

Before the end of the reign of Anne the assessment for the maintenance of the poor is supposed to have amounted, for the whole of England, to not less than a million sterling.† In 1704 a bill was brought into parliament, and passed by the House of Commons, but rejected by the Lords, for carrying into effect a scheme of Sir Humphrey Mackworth, the object of which was to maintain the poor by establishing a workhouse in every parish, in which they might be employed in various trades and manufactures. In opposition to this project Defoe published one of the cleverest of his pamphlets, his "Giving Alms no Charity," in the form of an address to the House of Commons. We have no concern at present with the views advocated in this tract, either upon the question of setting the parish poor to work at trades followed by the rest of the population, or upon that of the expediency of any system of public relief whatever for able-bodied pauperism, on both of which the negative is strongly and unreservedly maintained. But in the course of the argument some statements are advanced which illustrate the actual condition of the labouring population at this date. Defoe maintains that there was in England, when he wrote, "more labour than hands to perform it, and consequently a want of people, not of employment;" and that no man in any part of the kingdom, of sound limbs and senses, could at that time be poor, that is, in a state of destitution, merely for want of work. In proof of these positions, he observes that "the meanest labours in the nation afford the workman sufficient to support himself and family, which could never be if there was a want of work." "I humbly desire this Honourable House," he goes on, "to consider the difficulty of raising soldiers in this kingdom; the vast charge that the kingdom is at to the officers to procure men; the many little, and not over honest, methods made use of to bring them into the service, and the laws made to compel them. Why are gaols rummaged for malefactors, and the Mint and prisons for debtors? The war is an employment of honour, and suffers some scandal in having men taken from the gallows, and immediately, from villains and housebreakers, made gentlemen soldiers. If men wanted employment, and consequently bread, this would never be; any man would carry a musket rather than starve, and wear the queen's cloth, or anybody's cloth, rather than go naked and live in rags and want. It is plain the nation is full of people; and it is as plain our people have no particular aversion to the war; but they are not poor enough to go abroad. It is poverty makes men soldiers, and drives crowds into the armies; and the difficulty to get Englishmen to list is, because they live in plenty and ease; and he that can earn twenty shillings a-week at an easy, steady employment, must be drunk or mad when he lists for a soldier, to be knocked o' th' head for 3s. 6d. per week. But if there was no work to be had, if the poor wanted employment, if they had not bread to eat, nor knew not how to earn it, thousands of young lusty fellows would fly to the pike and musket, and choose to die like men in the face of the enemy, rather than lie at home, starve, perish, in poverty and distress." And, we may add, it would be no answer to this reasoning to object that women and persons above the military age had not the resource of going to serve as soldiers. The fact that young and able-bodied men generally refused to serve still proved that there was no scarcity of other employment, and consequently that none needed to be in want who were able and willing to work, of either sex or of whatever age: it proved that the labour-market was not overstocked. Defoe, whose sketches of this kind are all taken from the life, as well as done to the life,

* State of the Poor, l. 237.

† See the authorities for this in Eden's State of the Poor, i. 264.

draws rather a glowing picture of the improvidence of the generality of his poorer fellow-countrymen. "Good husbandry," he says, "is no English virtue: it may have been brought over, and in some places where it has been planted it has thriven well enough; but it is a foreign species; it neither loves nor is beloved by an Englishman. The English get estates, and the Dutch save them; and this observation I have made between foreigners and Englishmen—that where an Englishman earns twenty shillings a-week, and but just lives, as we call it, a Dutchman grows rich, and leaves his children in very good condition. Where an English labouring man with his nine shillings per week lives wretchedly and poor, a Dutchman with that wages will live tolerably well, keep the wolf from the door, and have everything handsome about him. In short, he will be rich with the same gain as makes the Englishman poor; he'll thrive where the other goes in rags; and he'll live where the other starves or goes a-begging. We are the most lazy diligent nation in the world: there is nothing more frequent than for an Englishman to work till he has got his pocket full of money, and then go and be idle, or perhaps drunk, till it is all gone, and perhaps himself in debt; and, ask him in his cups what he intends, he'll tell you honestly he'll drink as long as it lasts, and then go to work for more. I make no difficulty to promise, on a short summons, to produce above a thousand families in England, within my particular knowledge, who go in rags, and their children wanting bread, whose fathers can earn their fifteen to twenty-five shillings a-week, but will not work; who have work enough, but are too idle to seek after it, and hardly vouchsafe to earn anything but bare subsistence and expending-money for themselves. I can give an incredible number of examples in my own knowledge among our own labouring poor. I once paid six or seven men together on a Saturday night, the least ten shillings, and some thirty shillings, for work, and have seen them go with it directly to the alehouse, lie there till Monday, spend it every penny, and run in debt to boot, and not give a farthing of it to their families, though all of them had wives and children." And afterwards he observes, "The poverty of England does not lie among the craving beggars, but among poor families, where the children are numerous, and where death or sickness has deprived them of the labour of the father: these are the houses that the sons and daughters of charity, if they would order it well, should seek out and relieve. . . . As for the craving poor, I am persuaded I do them no wrong when I say, that, if they were incorporated, they would be the richest society in the nation; and the reason why so many pretend to want work is, that, as they can live so well with the pretence of wanting work, they would be mad to leave it and work in earnest. And I affirm, of my own knowledge, that when I wanted a man for labouring work, and offered nine shillings per week to strolling fellows at my door, they have frequently told me to my face that they could get more a-begging; and I once set a lusty fellow in the stocks, for making the experiment." The state of things at the beginning of the eighteenth century seems, in fact, very much to have resembled that which continued to prevail down to our own day, and under which the almost uninterrupted progression of the poor-rates certainly did not imply either a constantly increasing scarcity of work, or a constant decline in the economical condition of the labouring classes from any other cause. On the whole, the various accounts that have been quoted leave the impression that, notwithstanding the increased and increasing amount of the assessments for the support of the parish poor, the circumstances of the mass of the people in the reign of Anne were far from uncomfortable, and were decidedly improving rather than falling off. With the progress of trade and manufactures, and of the national industry in general, wages had risen, without provisions having become dearer. The increase of the poor-rates is probably itself to be considered as an indication of this improved condition of the class for whose benefit they were professed and understood to be levied. Whether under a good or under a bad system of management, the allowance to the parish pauper will naturally be influenced by the customary rate of living among the general labouring population: the higher that is, the better will the paupers also fare. And so it should be, if one and the very chief good effect of a public provision for pauperism be, as we believe it is, the keeping up of a sufficiently high standard of living even in the lowest grade of the population; and if our workhouses, or other pauper establishments, are not to be a means of degrading and demoralizing the labouring classes instead of sustaining them.

An important change was made in the general management of the poor in the reign of George I. by the erection of workhouses in a great number of parishes, in virtue of the powers conferred by an act passed in 1723, which also amended the law by providing that no justice of peace should make any order for relief until oath should be made before him of some matter which he should judge to be reasonable cause, and until after the party had made application without success to a vestry, or to two of the overseers. Most of the workhouses that were built were projected, and the management of the poor in them contracted for, by a Mr. Matthew Marryott, of Olney, in Buckinghamshire, and the effect, in most cases, for some years, was a very considerable reduction of the rates. "But," says Sir Frederick Eden, writing in 1797, "from comparing the present state of those parishes which erected workhouses in consequence of this act with their condition seventy years ago, it would seem that the expectations entertained by the nation, that great and permanent benefits would be the result of these establishments, have not been realized." From the details which he places before his readers respecting many of the parishes which adopted workhouses about this time, he thinks it will appear "that the charge of maintaining the poor has advanced very rapidly, notwithstanding the aid of workhouses, and perhaps as rapidly as in those parishes which have continued to relieve the poor by occasional pensions at their own habitations." In the first operation of the workhouse and contract system, however, there can be no doubt that large savings were effected by the economy of purchasing on a great scale, and still more by the reduction of the numbers of the paupers that was brought about partly by the aversion of the poor to the confinement and discipline of the workhouse, partly by the more careful inquiry that was now made as to settlements. From a publication, entitled "An Account of several Workhouses," which appeared in 1725, and was reprinted, with considerable additions, in 1732, we may collect some facts which help to illustrate both the expense of living at this period, and the general condition of the working classes. The workhouse of St. Giles's-in-the-Fields was opened in April, 1726, and for the first year the entire number of persons maintained in the house was 235, of all ages; the expenditure for victuals was 203*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.*; so that each person cost for food, one with another, 1*s.* 5*d.* a-week. The items of expenditure were baking, milk, butcher's meat (180*l.*), cheese (81*l.*), bread and flour (321*l.*), oatmeal, peas, beer (161*l.*), shop-goods, herbs, and mackarel. The cost, however, at which the paupers were maintained varied considerably in the different workhouses. Thus, at Westham, in Essex, even after the erection of a workhouse had reduced the rates one-half, each individual of forty or forty-five poor, maintained in the year 1727, cost about 5*l.* for the whole year, or nearly 2*s.* a-week. At Newport Pagnel, in Buckinghamshire, again, each inmate of the workhouse cost only about a shilling a-week. About eighteen pence seems to be the average cost. On the whole, Sir Frederick Eden estimates the expense of maintaining a pauper in the first workhouses to have been about half what it was when he wrote. "The diet, however," he adds, "provided in the houses on their first establishment seems to have been equally good with what it is at present. In most of the workhouses meat dinners were served three or four times a-week." At Bedford, for instance, the allowance consisted of bread and cheese four times, and broth three times a-week, for breakfast; of boiled beef and suet-pudding three times, cold meat three times, and hasty pudding, or milk-porridge, once, for dinner; and of bread and cheese again, or sometimes broth, for supper. We may be pretty sure that the labourer who maintained himself by his own industry could not afford to feed better, and probably not nearly so well as these paupers. "Their bread," the account adds, "is wheat dressed down, and made into large household loaves by a woman in the house. Their drink is beer, tunned in from the public brewhouse at three-halfpence per gallon. The overseers do sometimes put a cow upon the common for them; and that nothing may be wasted or lost, they have a pig or two bought in, to live upon their wash, and dregs, and fragments; which, when well grown, is fed and killed for the house. They have also a little garden for herbs, onions, &c." In the original establishment at Bristol, according to the narrative published by Cary, one of the managers, a hundred girls, who were set to work at spinning worsted, were supported at a cost of 1*s.* 4*d.* a week for each; their diets being, he says, "made up of such provisions as were very wholesome, afforded good nourishment, and were not costly in price, namely, beef, peas, potatoes, broth, peas-porridge, milk-porridge, bread and cheese, good beer (such as we drink at our own tables), cabbage, carrots, turnips, &c., in which we took the advice of our physician, and bought the best of every sort." The principle, however, upon which this establishment was founded, of attempting to make the paupers work for their maintenance, had in a few years to be abandoned, after the attempt to carry it into effect had involved the concern in a debt of some thousands of pounds.

The amount of the poor-rates, and the numbers of the parish-poor, went on increasing throughout the reign of George II., and various plans were proposed from time to time for checking the evil, none of which, however, received the sanction of the legislature. Sir Frederick Eden has detailed the leading provisions of the several schemes suggested by William Hay, Esq., M.P. for Seaforth (the same who wrote the well-known Essay on Deformity), in his "Remarks on the Laws relating to the Poor, with Proposals for their better Relief and Employment," published in 1735, and in a bill which he introduced into the House of Commons the same year; by Mr. Thomas Alcock, in his "Observations on the Defects of the Poor Laws, and on the Causes and Consequences of the great increase and burthen of the Poor," published in 1752; by Sir Richard Lloyd in 1753; by the Earl of Hillsborough the same year; by Henry Fielding, the novelist, in a pamphlet entitled "A Proposal for making an effectual Provision for the Poor," also published in 1753; by Mr. James Massie, in his "Plan for the Establishment of Charity Houses," published in 1758; and by Mr. William Bailey, a member of the Society for promoting Arts and Commerce, in his "Treatise on the better Employment and more comfortable Support of the Poor in Workhouses," published in the same year. Not much information, however, as to the actual circumstances of the poor and the labouring classes, is to be gathered from these well-intended speculations. Mr. Alcock mentions, on the authority of accounts given in to parliament, that the whole sum laid out on the poor in England, for four years preceding the date of his publication, amounted, on an average, to nearly three millions per annum. The oppression suffered by the poor from the law of settlement is painted in as strong colours by Mr. Hay, in 1735, as it was by Adam Smith, in the "Wealth of Nations," forty years later. "A poor man." Hay observes, "is no sooner got into a neighbourhood, habitation, and employment that he likes, but, upon humour or caprice of the parish, he is sent to another place, where he can find none of these conveniencies: not certain long to continue there; for, perhaps, after the appeal, he is sent back again, and then hurried to a third place; and sometimes is a great while before he knows where he shall be at rest. In the mean time, he is at expense in removing his family and goods; or, perhaps, not able to carry them with him, is forced to sell them to a disadvantage; he loses his time, and is obliged to neglect his work, which is his only support; so that 'tis no wonder if by this treatment he is very much impoverished, and; from being only likely to become chargeable, is made actually so." That all this might be, and in many instances actually was, practised under the former state of the law, is admitted on all hands; the only question that has ever been raised is as to the extent to which forcible removals were carried. Probably the right with which the law invested them had come to be less generally abused by parishes and overseers for some years before it was taken away (in 1795), under the salutary check of that very public opinion which at last brought about its abolition.*

From an Order and Declaration passed at a quarter sessions for the county of Lancaster in 1725, "upon conference with discreet and grave men of the said county respecting the plenty of the time and other necessary circumstances," we learn the common rates of wages of the different descriptions of servants, labourers, and artificers, in the north of England towards the end of the reign of George I. It is herein laid down that a bailiff of husbandry, or chief hind, shall take for his wages by the year not above 6*l.*; a chief servant in husbandry, that can mow or sow, and do other husbandry well, not above 5*l.*; a common servant in husbandry, of twenty-four years of age or upwards, not above 4*l.*; a man-servant from twenty to twenty-four years of age, not above 3*l.* 10*s.*; a man-servant from sixteen to twenty years of age, not above 2*l.* 10*s.*; the best woman-servant, being a cook, or able to take charge of a household, not above 2*l.* 10*s.*; a chamber-maid, dairy-maid, wash-maid, or other mean servant, not above 2*l.*; a woman-servant under the age of sixteen, not above 1*l.* 10*s.* In all these cases, we presume, the sums set down are the wages in addition to victuals, though that is not expressed. It is distinctly stated in the case of "the best of millers" that his year's wages, without meat and drink, shall be not above 10*l.*, and, with meat and drink, not above 5*l.* As for labourers hired by the day or week, it is in the first place declared that their hours of work, from the middle of March to the middle of September, shall be from five in the morning till half-past seven at night, and for the rest of the year from the spring of day till night, resting only half an hour at breakfast, an hour at dinner, and half an hour again at drinking; "and in the summer half-year," it is added, "they may sleep each day half an hour: else for every hour's absence to default a penny; and every Saturday afternoon, or eve of a holiday, that they cease to work, is to be accounted but half a day." The day's wages for the best description of husbandry labourer are appointed for the winter half-year not to exceed a shilling without, or sixpence with, meat and drink; for the summer, ten-pence without, or five-pence with, meat and drink. For the ordinary sort of labourers the rates are fixed at ten-pence without, or five-pence with, victuals, in winter; and at nine-pence without, or four-pence with, victuals, in summer. Male haymakers are allowed ten-pence or six-pence; women haymakers, seven-pence or three-pence; mowers, fifteen-pence or nine-pence; men-shearers, a shilling or six-pence; women-shearers, ten-pence or six-pence; hedgers, ditchers, palers, threshers, or persons employed in other task work, ten-pence or six-pence, according as they provide their own food or otherwise. Masons, carpenters, joiners, plumbers, tilers, slaters, coopers, and turners are not to receive more than a shilling without, or six-pence with, meat and drink; except a master workman, having others working under his direction, who may receive fourteen-pence (of course without victuals). A pair of sawyers are not to have above a shilling with meat and drink, nor above two shillings without; master tailors are to be paid at the same rate; their journeymen and apprentices at ten-pence without, and five-pence with, their food. These rates may be fairly presumed to be considerably lower than were paid at this time in the southern counties; yet the Lancashire justices express it as their opinion that, their county being nearly eighty miles in length, "the more northern part thereof ought not to demand so much, but be content with what the custom of the country hath usually been." Fortunately for the labourers in the northern extremity of Lancashire, the statutes under which the justices acted did not permit them to fix more than one set of rates for the whole county.* The following passage from Sir Frederick Eden's work, published in 1797, gives some interesting information respecting both the earnings of labourers and the price of provisions in the North of England at dates not far removed from that of the above order of the Lancashire justices:—"In the neighbourhood of Carlisle, fifty years ago, reapers received 4*d.* a-day and diet; or 6*d.* a-day and dinner. Common labourers in husbandry, sixty years ago, were paid 1*s.* 6*d.* and 2*s.* a-week, and

* Fielding's account, written in 1751, is perhaps nearest the truth. "In all cases of removal, the good of the parish, and not of the public, is consulted; nay, sometimes the good of an individual only; and therefore the poor man who is capable of getting his livelihood by his dexterity at any handicraft, and likely to do it by his industry, is sure to be removed with his family; especially if the overseer or any of his relations should be of the same occupation; but the idle poor, who threaten to rival no man in his business, are never taken any notice of till they become actually chargeable; and, if by begging or robbing they avoid this, as it is no man's interest, so no man thinks it his duty, to apprehend them."—Inquiry into Increase of Robbers board; they now receive 10*d.* and 1*s.* a-day, and diet. A farmer's maid-servant, sixty years ago, was paid from 40*s.* to 50*s.* a-year, with diet; a man-servant from 4*l.* to 6*l.* a-year, with diet; he was usually hired by the half-year. At present, maid-servants with farmers receive from 6*l.* to 8*l.* a-year, with diet; and men-servants from 15*l.* to 20*l.* a-year, with diet. Masons fifty years ago had in winter 6*d.* a-day and board, and 1*s.* without board; in summer 8*d.* a-day and board, and 1*s.* 2*d.* without board. At present they receive 1*s.* 4*d.* a-day with board, and from 2*s.* to 2*s.* 6*d.* a-day without board. Wages of carpenters fifty years ago were 1*d.* a-day less than those of masons; they are now 2*d.* a-day less. . . . An old man, of great credibility and good memory, in a village a few miles to the east of Carlisle, says that sixty years ago the common daily wages of labourers in husbandry from Martinmas to Christmas were 3*d.* and victuals, and 4*d.* with victuals in the summer; that reaping was 6*d.* the day, and a dinner; or 4*d.*, and the day's diet. Women about seventy years ago, he says, earned 2*d.* a-day and board, for weeding, spinning wool, spreading peats, scaling (scattering or spreading) manure, &c.; and it was rare that a woman, hired by the half-year, had more than 20*s.* for that period. Seventy or eighty years ago, he says, butter was 2*d.* the pound (or at that rate, for neither butter nor butcher's meat were weighed, nor milk measured); barley 3*s.* 6*d.* and 4*s.* the Carlisle bushel (three Winchester bushels); oats 2*s.* ditto; rye 5*s.* ditto; wheat from 7*s.* to 8*s.* ditto. Mutton was then usually sold at Carlisle by the quarter; and a quarter, which would now cost 3*s.*, sold then for 1*s.*; and a fat calf, three weeks or a month old, from 4*s.* 6*d.* to 5*s..

* See the Order, given at length in Eden's State of the Poor, vol. ii. Append. civ.—cx., from the Annals of Agricult., xiv. 305.

An account of the fluctuations of the price of wheat throughout this period has already been given in another chapter.† On the whole, this article will be found to have rather fallen than risen in price from the Revolution to the end of the reign of George II. According to tables drawn up by Bishop Fleetwood and Mr. Charles Smith, the average price of the Windsor quarter (nine bushels) of the best wheat was, for the twenty years from 1686 to 1705, 2*l.* 5*s.* 10½*d.*; for the twenty years from 1706 to 1725, 2*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*; for the twenty years from 1726 to 1745, 1*l.* 17*s.* 9½*d.*; and for the nineteen years from 1746 to 1764, 2*l.* 0*s.* 1½*d.*. The average price of the Winchester quarter of middling wheat was, for the first of the above periods, 1*l.* 16*s.* 3½*d.*; for the last, 1*l.* 11*s.* 8½*d.*. It could not therefore be contended, even on the assumption that wheat had always been the general food of the people of England, that the rise which undoubtedly took place in wages during the present period was balanced by any corresponding rise in the cost of subsistence. But upon this subject Sir Frederick Eden has some remarks that are well worth extracting. He observes, "The price of wheat, I conceive, is no criterion of the ability of a man to subsist by his labour, unless it can be shown that this grain is wholly and entirely his ordinary food. But at no period of our history has this been the case. To argue from such data would warrant us in supposing that a labourer must have been under an absolute impossibility of subsisting in 1595, when wheat was above 2*l.* the quarter, and the wages of ordinary agricultural labourers not more than 4*d.* or 5*d.* the day, without diet; and that 8*d.* the day was a miserable pittance in 1682, when wheat was nearly at the same price. But the truth is, that at neither of these periods did wheat constitute a part of the diet of either the peasant or artificer in many parts of England. From the Household Book of Sir Edward Coke . . . it appears that in 1596 rye-bread and oatmeal formed a considerable portion of the diet of servants even in great families. In 1626 barley-bread is stated, in a grant of a monopoly from King Charles, to have been the usual food of the ordinary sort of people."* He then refers to an estimate, drawn up by Gregory King, of the quantities of grain of different sorts grown in England a few years after the Revolution, which, however, is not quite the same as it stands in King's own work with the copy given by Davenant, which Sir Frederick Eden quotes. Exclusive of the seed-corn, King calculates the annual amount of wheat produced in England at only 12 millions of bushels (not 14, as stated by Davenant); that of rye at 8 millions (not 10, as in Davenant); that of barley at 25 millions (Davenant has 27); that of oats at 16 millions; that of peas at 7 millions; that of beans at 4 millions; and that of vetches, &c., at one million.† Sir Frederick goes on to state that it is only since the commencement of the eighteenth century that the use of wheaten bread has been gradually introduced among the labouring classes. "About fifty years ago," he afterwards tells us (that is, about the year 1747), "so little was the quantity of wheat used in the county of Cumberland, that it was only a rich family that used a peck of wheat in the course of the year, and that was used at Christmas. The crust of the goose-pie—a dish which almost every table in the county at that season is supplied—was made of barley-meal: one of wheaten flour was considered as a great delicacy, but is now getting into very general use: the barley-pie, however, is not yet entirely excluded from the Christmas fare of some families. The usual treat for a stranger fifty years ago in Cumberland was a thick oat-cake (called haver hannock) and butter. Puddings and dumplings, made of oatmeal and suet, were a common dish at rural entertainments. An old labourer of eighty-five remarks that, when he was a boy, he was at Carlisle market with his father, and, wishing to indulge himself with a penny loaf made of wheat-flour, he searched for it for some time; but could

* State of the Poor, i. 591.

† Political Conclusions, p. 83. Davenant's professed transcript is in his Essay on the Probable Methods of making a People Gainss in the Balance of Trade, in his Works, ii. 317.

* State of the Poor, i. 597.

† See ante, p. 700.

not procure a piece of wheaten bread at any shop in the town."* These details relate, we believe, to the writer's own county. It appears, however, from the account of the first workhouses referred to in a former page, that in 1725, when that account was published, wheaten bread was used in many of these establishments in the southern counties. But the most minute and curious statement we find upon this subject is that given in the second edition of Mr. Charles Smith's Three Tracts on the Corn Trade and Corn Laws, which, although not published till 1766, may be regarded as referring rather to a date a few years earlier, when the inquiries upon which the calculation is founded were made. "It is certain," this writer observes, "that bread made of wheat is become much more generally the food of the common people since 1689 than it was before that time, but it is still very far from being the food of the people in general; and some, who have considered this matter with great attention, and are better informed in regard thereto than most inquirers generally be, were inclined to think that in the year 1764 one-half of the people could not be supposed to feed on such bread." To obtain all the certainty possible in the matter, inquiries were made in every direction; the supply of the several sorts of grain to the London market was taken into consideration; communications were opened with persons living in or travelling into each county; and in particular conversations were held with the labouring people themselves of various districts, as being best acquainted with their own circumstances and the food they lived upon. By combining the results of all these modes of investigation Mr. Smith and his coadjutors arrived at the following conclusions:—1. That in Wales, the number of inhabitants being calculated from the number of houses at 270,450, of these 29,344 eat wheat, 127,585 barley, and 113,521 rye; 2. That in the five northern counties of Northumberland, Durham, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and York, the entire population being 892,560, of these 283,996 eat wheat, 37,196 barley, 285,382 rye, and 285,986 oats; 3. That in Lancashire, Cheshire, Derby, Nottingham, and Lincoln, out of a population of 738,150, there were 200,339 who eat wheat, 128,621 who eat barley, 118,795 who eat rye, and 290,395 who eat oats; 4. That in the midland counties of Monmouth, Gloucester, Oxford, Hereford, Worcester, Warwick, Northampton, Shropshire, Stafford, Leicester, and Rutland, the entire population being 1,024,476, the eaters of wheat were 691,258, of barley 159,136, of rye 156,237, and of oats 17,845; 5. That in the south-western counties of Wilt, Somerset, Dorset, Devon, and Cornwall, the population being 904,134, of these 682,815 eat wheat, and 221,319 barley; 6. That in the rest of England, out of a population of 2,089,122, wheat was the food of 1,866,405, barley of 36,741, and rye of 185,976. On the whole, then, according to this calculation, the entire population of England and Wales being taken, in round numbers, at 6,000,000, the eaters of wheat about the end of the present period would be 3,750,000, of barley 739,000, of rye 888,000, and of oats 623,000. In other words, fully five-eighths of the people of England at this time lived upon wheat; and of the remainder, rather more than an eighth upon rye, about an eighth upon barley, and rather less than an eighth upon oats. There is reason to believe that the entire population of the country must have been considerably greater than is here assumed; but probably the above proportions may, for all that, be tolerably correct. Wheat, it appears, already constituted the food of the great majority of the people in all the southern and midland counties; barley was consumed by the majority of the people only in Wales; rye was not eaten at all in the five south-western counties, but in the five northern counties was the ordinary food of about a third of the people; oats were the food of another third of the people in the northern counties, and of considerably more than a third of those of Lancashire and the rest of that group, but were only used to a very small extent in the midland counties, and not at all in any other part of the kingdom.

Respecting the prices of butcher's meat during this period, the following are the chief facts that have been collected. From 1660 to 1690 the mean price of mutton is stated to have been 2*d.* the pound; 2½*d.* from 1706 to 1730; and 3*d.* from 1730 to 1760. In 1710 beef is stated to have been 1½*d.* the pound; veal 2½*d.*; and lamb 2½*d.* The prices paid at the Victualling Office, from 1740 to 1760, were, for beef usually about 2½*d.* a pound; for pork from about 2½*d.* to 3½*d.*; for butter usually rather more than 5*d.*; for Cheshire cheese about 3*d.*; for Suffolk cheese about 1½*d.* or 1¼*d.* On the whole there was no rise in the price of any of these articles during that space. The prices paid by the Victualling Office, however, were always considerably lower than those charged to private consumers. The price of wool also underwent little variation throughout the present period, and certainly was not higher at its close than at its commencement. In 1681 wool was from 18*s.* to 19*s.* the tod; in 1707, 16*s.*; in 1711, 13*s.*; in 1713, 17*s.*; in 1717, 23*s.*; in 1722, 20*s.*; in 1732, 19*s.*; in 1738, 13*s.*; in 1744, 21*s.*; in 1754, 12*s.*; in 1755, 14*s.*; in 1760, 18*s.* 6*d.* Notwithstanding the progress which it can scarcely be doubted was made by the population of London in that time, there was scarcely any increase in the number either of the cattle or sheep sold at Smithfield for the last thirty years of this period. In 1733 the number of cattle was 80,169, of sheep 555,050; in 1737, of cattle 89,862, of sheep 607,330; in 1746, of cattle 71,552, of sheep 620,790; in 1748, of cattle 67,681, of sheep 610,060; in 1756, of cattle 77,257; of sheep 624,710; in 1759, of cattle 86,439, of sheep 582,260; in 1760, of cattle 88,594, of sheep 622,210. But in 1761 the number of cattle again fell off to 82,514; that of the sheep, however, rising to 666,010.*

* State of the Poor, l. 364.

We have already noticed the fact of the apparently declining, rather than augmenting, consumption of beer between the Revolution and the close of the reign of George II., as indicated by the returns of the tax on malt, taken along with what may be fairly supposed to have been the increase in the numbers of the population in the course of that time. According to a table given in the Tracts on the Corn Laws, the average quantity of malt made for home consumption was, from 1703 to 1713, 2,959,063 quarters; from 1713 to 1723, 3,542,157 quarters; from 1723 to 1733, 3,358,071 quarters; from 1733 to 1743, 3,215,094 quarters; from 1743 to 1753, 3,404,026 quarters.† Even supposing the population to have remained stationary, this account would show no increase in beer-drinking, but rather the reverse, in the forty years from 1713 to 1753. But any abatement that might be taking place in the attachment of the people to their old national beverage was, if we may trust the chronicles of the time, abundantly made up for, in the case of some portions of them at least, by the passion that had seized them for the novel stimulant of ardent spirits in the shape of gin. It is towards the close of the reign of George I. that we first hear much of the excessive gin-drinking of the populace of our great towns; from about that date we have a succession of strong presentments by the grand juries of Middlesex against the practice, which they call upon the authorities and the legislature to put down as the great source of the crimes which came before the courts of law, as well as one of the main causes of the general poverty and wretchedness of the lower orders. But it was not till the year 1736 that the evil forced itself upon the notice of parliament. Smollett's somewhat rhetorical description, without being taken quite according to the letter, may give us a notion of the height to which it had risen by this time. "The populace of London," he writes, "were sunk into the most brutal degeneracy by drinking to excess the pernicious spirit called gin, which was sold so cheap that the lowest class of the people could afford to indulge themselves in one continued state of intoxication, to the destruction of all morals, industry, and order. Such a shameful degree of profligacy prevailed, that the retailers of this poisonous compound set up painted boards in public, inviting people to be drunk for the small expense of one penny; assuring them they might be dead drunk for twopence, and have straw for nothing. They accordingly provided cellars and places strewed with straw, to which they conveyed those wretches who were overwhelmed with intoxication; in these dismal caverns they lay until they recovered some use of their faculties, and then they had recourse to the same mischievous potion; thus consuming their health and ruining their families, in hideous receptacles of the most filthy vice, resounding with riot, execration, and blasphemy."* That all this may have happened is probable enough: what alone is of much importance is the extent to which such corruption of manners prevailed among the lower orders, or the progress the habit of intemperance was making throughout that portion of the social body. If, however gross, it was confined to the very lowest grade of the populace, their conduct, like that of the drunken Helots among the Spartans, might be more likely to disgust than to seduce the rest of the community. However, this was not the general feeling at the time; the cry of all the more zealous and busy philanthropists was that the poison of gin-drinking was eating into the very vitals of society, and that no measures could be too strong, to take against an evil which, if its progress was not arrested, would speedily leave us nothing but the mere dead and putrid carcase of a once great nation. It was under the excitement of these alarms, which, it may be fairly assumed, somewhat exaggerated the danger, that the legislature was called upon to act. On the 20th of February, 1736, a petition from the magistracy of the county of Middlesex was presented to the House of Commons, setting forth "that the drinking of Geneva, and other distilled spirituous liquors, had for some years past greatly increased, especially among the people of inferior rank; and that the constant and excessive use thereof had already destroyed thousands of his Majesty's subjects, and rendered great numbers of others unfit for useful labour and service, debauching at the same time their morals, and driving them into all manner of vice and wickedness; and that that pernicious liquor was then sold, not only by the distillers and Genevashops, but by many other persons of inferior trades; by which means journeymen, apprentices, and servants were drawn in to taste, and by degrees to like, approve, and immoderately to drink thereof; and that the petitioners apprehended the public welfare and safety, as well as the trade of the nation, would be greatly affected by it; and therefore praying that the House would take the premises into their serious consideration, and apply such remedy as the House should judge most proper." † Three days after, in a committee of the whole House, Sir Joseph Jekyll moved a series of resolutions, declaring, in substance, that the low price of gin was the principal inducement to the excessive and pernicious use of it, and that the sale of that and other spirituous liquors ought both to be discouraged by a heavy duty, and restricted to persons keeping public brandy-shops, victualling-houses, coffee-houses, and alehouses, to innholders, and to such apothecaries and surgeons as should make use of the same by way of medicine only. These resolutions were agreed to without debate; but when, on the 8th of March, Jekyll moved in a committee of supply that there should be laid upon all spirituous liquors sold by retail the prohibitory duty of 20s. per gallon, the proposition encountered some re-assistance. Mr. Pulteney urged, among other things, that the business of distilling had been carried on in this country by royal authority for nearly a hundred years, and had been much encouraged by various acts of parliament passed since the Revolution; that even the retail of spirits had been hitherto so much encouraged, or at least connived at, that there was not now an inn, an alehouse, or a coffeehouse in the kingdom, but what owed a great part of its profits to the retail of such liquors; that, with respect to rum at least, there never had been any complaint of the excessive use of that liquor among the lower classes of the people; that the sugar colonies were now chiefly supported by the sale of their rum; that brandy and rum were more coveted by the common people, and might easily be made more palatable, than any sort of home-made spirit, and therefore the non-consumption of these liquors in any excess appeared to be completely ensured merely by the existing duties upon them, which were high, though far from prohibitory. Mr. Pulteney then alluded to a recent act which had imposed certain high duties upon gin also, but which had been repealed: "It cannot be said, sir," he proceeded, "that nothing but a total prohibition can be an effectual remedy against the evil complained of, because we all know that the late act against Geneva was effectual so far as it went; it was made, we know, to extend only to compound spirits; and with respect to them it was an effectual remedy, for it put an entire stop to the constant and excessive use of such spirits amongst those of inferior rank; but some of the distillers immediately began to make a sort of plain spirit, which, I believe, in derision of the act, they called parliament brandy, and this the common people made as constant and excessive an use of as they had before done of compound spirits: this was the case of that act; and, if it had been amended and made to extend to all home-made spirits, instead of being repealed, there would never have been occasion for any such complaint as that we have now before us." The act here alluded to by Mr. Pulteney, which has not been noticed in the common accounts of this gin legislation, appears to be the 2 Geo. II. c. 17, passed in 1729, entitled An Act for laying a Duty upon Compound Waters or Spirits; it was repealed in 1733 by the 6 Geo. II. c. 17, on the alleged ground that it had not answered the good purposes thereby intended, and had proved a discouragement to the distilling of spirits from corn in Great Britain. Neither Pulteney's speech, nor the silent but perfectly understood dislike of the minister himself, Sir Robert Walpole, to the extravagance of the proposition, prevented Jekyll's resolution from being agreed to by the House, or from being followed up by another, recommending that the sum of fifty pounds yearly should be paid for a licence by every person keeping a public brandy-shop, a public victualling-house, coffeehouse, or alehouse, or being an inholder, who should sell any spirituous liquors. A bill was accordingly brought in, founded upon these resolutions; and, notwithstanding the opposition made to it, principally by the West India interest, was eventually passed into a law (the 9 Geo. II. c. 23). Archdeacon Coxe has printed the following curious letter from Sir Robert Walpole to his brother Horace, written on the 30th of September (O.S.), the day after the new law came into operation, which, as a lively picture of the state of public feeling, and of the general civilization of the time, well deserves to be transcribed:—"Dear brother, I have forborne troubling you with the various surmises and apprehensions which of late at different times have filled the town with different fears and expectations concerning the first and immediate consequences that might attend the commencement of the gin act, because it was difficult at some times to form any probable opinion of what might happen; and at other times, and especially lately, it appeared a great deal more reasonable that there would not be any trouble or disorder at all, until about the middle of last week; I then began to receive again accounts from all quarters of the town that the Jacobites were busy and industrious in endeavouring to stir up the common people, and make an advantage of the universal clamour that prevailed among the populace at the approaching expiration of this darling vice. The scheme that was laid was, for all the distillers that were able to give away gratis, to all that should ask for it, as much gin and strong waters as they should desire, and the great distillers were to supply all the retailers and small shops with as much as they should want, to be distributed and given away in like manner. The shops were to begin to be opened on Tuesday evening, the eve of Michaelmas day, and to be continued and repeated on Wednesday night, that the mob, being made thus drunk, might be prepared and ready to commit any sort of mischief; and, in order to this, anonymous letters were sent to the distillers and town retailers in all parts of the town, to instruct them, and incite them to rise and join their friends, and do as their neighbours did. Four of these letters have fallen into my hands, which the persons to whom they were directed discovered and brought to us; and by the excise officers that go round the town I am informed that letters to the same purpose were dropped, and directed to most of the distillers in all quarters. Those we have seen differ very little from each other in the tenor and substance; and the strong criminal expressions are in all the same, only transposed. In such as were less formal, and not so laboured, the word was given Sir Robert and Sir Joseph. Upon the information the queen was pleased to give such orders to the guards as you will have had an account of, which have had the designed effect, and, in the opinion of all mankind, are thought to have prevented the greatest mischief and disorders that have of late been known or heard of—at least we have the satisfaction to have our measures universally applauded. I must beg leave so say there has been infinite care taken to observe and watch all their motions for above a month past; and upon the turn that the Spitalfields riots took, I think I may affirm that the whole spirit was at once dashed, and seemed to have been totally laid aside; but, upon the contrary success at Edinburgh [the allusion is to the Porteous affair], the fire kindled anew, and nothing less than such vigorous measures could have prevented the evil, which I hope now is put an end to. But the murmuring and complaints of the common people for want of gin, and the great sufferings and loss of the dealers in spirituous liquors in general, have created such uneasiness, that they well deserve a great deal of attention and consideration. And I am not without my apprehensions that a non-observance of the law in some may create great trouble; and a sullen acquiescence and present submission in others, in hopes of gaining redress by parliament, may lay the foundation of very riotous and mobbish applications when we next meet." He adds, under date of the following day, October 1st.—"That last night is likewise passed over in perfect quiet, although the patrols in the streets were taken off."* But the act for the suppression of the gin-shops altogether failed of its intended effect. Within a few months after it had passed, Tindal tells us, the commissioners of excise themselves became sensible of the impossibility or unadvisableness of carrying it rigorously into execution; "policy, as well as humanity," says the historian, "obliged them to mitigate the severity of the law, which was now become odious and contemptible." Smollett, who has drawn so dark a picture of the state of things the act was designed to put down, has painted in colours equally strong the mischiefs which it produced:—"The populace," he writes, "soon broke through all restraint. Though no licence was obtained and no duty paid, the liquor, continued to be sold in all corners of the streets; informers were intimidated by the threats of the people; and the justices of the peace, either from indolence or corruption, neglected to put the law in execution." In fact, in course of time, "it appeared," he adds, "that the consumption of gin had considerably increased every year since those heavy duties were imposed." In these circumstances, in 1743, the ministry that had newly come into office upon the expulsion of Sir Robert Walpole brought in a bill into the House of Commons for the repeal of the law which had thus turned out so much worse than a dead letter. The bill passed the Commons without opposition; but in the Upper House it was not carried till after long and warm altercation. From the debates, which fill nearly three hundred columns of the Parliamentary History, we may glean a few additional particulars touching the working of the late act. The increased consumption of gin during the time it had been in force was admitted on all hands; Lord Lonsdale himself, one of the opponents of the repeal bill, produced an account from which it appeared that the quantity of gin distilled in England, which in 1684, when the business was introduced into this country, had been 527,000 gallons, had risen to 948,000 in 1694, to 1,375,000 in 1704, to 2,000,000 in 1714, to 3,520,000 in 1724, to 4,947,000 in 1734, and to not less than 7,160,000 in 1742. Lord Bathurst, who was in favour of the repeal, mentioned that in the whole kingdom during the seven years the high duties had been in force the number of licences taken out for the sale of spirits had only been two! The same noble lord remarked that the practice of gin-drinking had of late years extended much farther than was generally imagined; the class of farmers had hitherto been distinguished for their frugality and temperance, but even they had not escaped this infection, nor was anything now more common than to find gin drunk in those farm-houses in which a few years ago ale was the highest luxury that was thought of. The consequences that had followed from the late act, however, sufficiently showed the inefficacy of violent methods to cure or check the evil. "It is well known," said his lordship, "that by that law the use of spirituous liquors was prohibited to the common people; that retailers were deterred from vending them by the utmost encouragement that could be given to informers; and that discoveries were incited by every art that could be practised, and offenders punished with the utmost rigour. Yet what was the effect, my lords, of all this diligence and vigour? A general panic suppressed for a few weeks the practice of selling the prohibited liquors; but in a very short time necessity forced some, who had nothing to lose, to return to their former trade; they were suffered sometimes to escape, because nothing was to be gained by informing against them, and others were encouraged by their example to imitate them, though with more secrecy and caution; of those indeed many were punished, but many more escaped, and such as were fined often found the profit more than the loss. The prospect of raising money by detecting their practices incited many to turn information into a trade; and the facility with which the crime was to be proved encouraged some to gratify their malice by perjury, and others their avarice; so that the multitude of informations became a public grievance, and the magistrates themselves complained that the law was not to be executed. The perjuries of informers were now so flagrant and common, that the people thought all informations malicious; or, at least, thinking themselves oppressed by the law, they looked upon every man that promoted its execution as their enemy; and therefore now began to declare war against informers, many of whom they treated with great cruelty, and some they murdered in the streets." This account is supported by the testimony of several of the other speakers in the debate; nor,

* See Eden's State of the Poor, iii. lxxxiii.-lxxxvii.
 † 2d Edit. p. 200.

* Complete History of England, 4to Edit. of 1788; vol. iv. p. 632.

* Cox's Memoirs of the Life and Administration of Sir Robert Walpole, vol. iii. p. 386.

"Even the very commencement of the law," said Lord Cholmondeley, "exposed us to the danger of a rebellion: an insurrection of the populace was threatened, nay, the government had information of its being actually designed, and very wisely ordered the troops to indeed, are the facts denied or questioned by any opponent of the repeal. Lord Bathurst proceeded to state that, by their determination and violence, the people at last wearied out the magistrates, and intimidated all persons from lodging informations; so that the law had now for some years been totally disregarded. "The practice, therefore, of vending and of drinking distilled spirits," continued his lordship, "has prevailed for some time without opposition; nor can any man enter a tavern or an alehouse in which they will be denied him, or walk along the streets without being incited to drink them at every corner: they have been sold for several years with no less openness and security than any other commodity; and whoever walks in this great city will find his way very frequently obstructed by those who are selling these pernicious liquors to the greedy populace, or by those who have drunk them till they are unable to move." In short, the whole body of the lower orders appears to have been arrayed in opposition to the law, which in these circumstances could only have been maintained by a strong military force. The general sense of its despotic and oppressive character would unite against it many other persons beside the lovers of gin; gin-drinking itself would become in the common estimation less odious amid the hatred that was felt against the rash and mischievous means that had been taken to put it down; and in the unpopularity of this one law, and the contempt into which it had fallen, all law would be somewhat shaken and weakened. Meanwhile, the trade in spirits, abandoned by all respectable dealers, would be left in the hands of persons without either means or character, ruffians and desperadoes upon whom neither law nor public opinion could be brought to bear; and all the revenue that the sale of spirits might, under another system, be made to yield would be thrown away and lost in this wild and unseemly scene of universal illicit trading. In opposition to the repeal, the principal argument that was urged was, that the sale of gin, which was now carried on, not, certainly, in secret or with any attempt at concealment, but still without open proclamation by the dealers of the article they had to dispose of on their sign-boards and casks, would in future be thrust forward with an impudent exposure of the name as well as of the thing, which it seemed to be thought might not only tend to harden the victims of gin-drinking, but might throw more opportunity and temptation in the way of persons who had not yet fallen into the habit. In illustration of the extent to which the open retail of gin was carried before the imposition of the prohibitory duties (which had proved no prohibition and no duties at all), the Bishop of Salisbury (Dr. Thomas Sherlock) quoted a Report drawn up in the year 1736 by the justices of Middlesex, according to which the number of gin-retailers in the districts of Westminster, Holborn, the Tower, and Finsbury (exclusively of the city of London and Southwark) was then 7044, "besides 3209 alehouses that did not sell spirituous liquors, and besides a great number of persons who retailed gin privately in garrets, cellars, and back rooms, or places not exposed to public view." Every sixth house in the metropolis, it appeared by this Report, was then a licensed gin-shop; and the bishop apprehended that, with a reduction of the duties, this state of things, or a worse, would be brought back—that there would immediately be not fewer than 50,000 gin-retailers set up under the sanction of the government throughout the kingdom. However, although all the bishops, as well as most of the adherents of the late ministry, voted against it, the repeal bill was ultimately carried; "and we cannot help owning," says Smollett, "that it has not been attended with those dismal consequences which the lords in the opposition foretold." Although gin-drinking continued to prevail to a sufficiently lamentable extent among the lower orders of London and our other great towns, as it still does, we certainly no longer read of such a condition of things as is described to have been produced by the prohibitory act, or at least to have subsisted under that state of the law—when, as was stated in the debate to which we have been referring, by Lord Lonsdale, although an opponent of the repeal bill, whoever should pass along the streets of the metropolis would find wretches stretched upon the pavement, insensible and motionless, and only removed by the charity of passengers from the danger of being crushed by carriages, or trampled by horses, or strangled with filth in the common sewers. Better police arrangements have no doubt contributed something to the improvement that has taken place; but the mere restoration of the spirit-trade to the protection of the law, and thereby to the hands of persons of respectable character, appears to have had an immediately beneficial effect of itself. Indeed it was not till after this had been done that even the best possible police establishment could have been of any avail in preserving public decency or repressing disorder. No mere police could have made the law be obeyed against so unanimous a determination of the populace to set it at defiance.

In point of fact, however, the police of London continued exceedingly defective throughout nearly the whole of the present period; and constant evidence was furnished of its inefficiency by the commission of the most flagrant crimes at all hours in the open streets. Under the year 1702 Maitland notes that robberies and burglaries had bebe drawn out and posted in the several places where the mob was likely to assemble, which perhaps prevented a great deal of bloodshed, and the law began to be executed without any forcible opposition. As there were multitudes of offenders, there was presently a multitude of informations; but as soon as any man was known to be an informer he was assaulted and pelted by the mob wherever they could meet with him. A noble peer was obliged to open his gates to one of these unfortunate creatures in order to protect him from the mob, who were in full cry, and would probably have torn him to pieces if they could have laid hold of him; for they had before actually murdered some of these informers. This was not the only difficulty; the magistrates themselves were in danger if they appeared zealous in the execution of this law; the prosecutions were vastly expensive, and, when the person was convicted, seldom anything could be recovered, so that it put the government to an infinite expence."

come very frequent in the city after the breaking up of the watch in the morning; upon which it was ordered by the justices of peace, met in quarter sessions at Guildhall, that thenceforth all the constables should, from the 1st of November to the 1st of February, set their several watches at ten o'clock at night, and continue them till six in the morning. It would appear, therefore, that before this the watch was not kept on even till sunrise in winter; and during the day there was no watch at all. In 1704 the common council passed an act appointing the number of constables for the different wards, to be 583 in all, provided each with lantern and candle, and well and sufficiently armed with halberds; and it was at the same time ordered that they should be at their posts from nine at night till seven in the morning during the winter months, and from ten till five in the summer. Another act of the municipal parliament, passed in 1716, regulated the lighting of the city, by ordering that all housekeepers whose houses, doors, or gateways fronted or were next to any street, lane, or other public passage or place, should, every night between the second night after full moon and the seventh after new moon, set or hang out one or more lights, with sufficient cotton wicks, that should continue to burn from six o'clock till eleven. Under this economical arrangement, therefore, the town was left in total darkness all night after what we should now account the very early hour of eleven, and also, during nearly a third part of each month, for the whole of every evening on which the moon should, indeed, have shone, but did not. Meanwhile the desperate characters that infested the public thoroughfares seem to have very little minded either the lamps with their sufficient cotton wicks, or the watchmen with their halberds. Under date of 1728 Maitland writes—"The streets of this city, and those of Westminster, having for a considerable time been grievously pestered with street-robbers, their audacious villany was got to such a height that they formed a design to rob the queen in St. Paul's Churchyard, as she privately returned from supper in the city to the palace of St. James's, as confessed by one of the gang when under sentence of death. But, those execrable villains being busily employed in robbing Sir Gilbert Heathcote, an alderman of London, on his return in his chariot from the House of Commons, her majesty luckily passed them in her coach without being attacked." This incident, it seems, excited for the moment an extraordinary diligence on the part of the authorities; so that "the streets," adds Maitland, "were soon cleared of those wicked and detestable rogues, many of whom being apprehended, they were justly condemned and executed for their many enormous crimes." The next year we find the Middlesex grand jury including in their presentment, along with the gin-shops, "the unusual swarms of sturdy and clamorous beggars" that were to be seen in the metropolis, and also "the bold and frequent robberies in the streets"—"a wickedness," they add, "that till within these few years was unheard of among us." It was not till the year 1736 that lamp-posts and glass lamps were ordered to be put up in the city, and the lamps to be kept burning all the year through from sunset till sunrise. "Till this time," observes Maitland, "the streets of London were perhaps worse illuminated by night than those of any other great city, which was entirely owing to bad management; for, the same being lighted by contract, the contractors were annually obliged to pay to the city the sum of six hundred pounds for the liberty of lighting; the same." These contractors, it seems, kept about a thousand lamps burning till twelve o'clock for a hundred and seventeen nights in the year, where the householders did not choose to hang out their own lights, receiving from each householder whose door they thus illuminated the sum of six shillings annually. But after a few years we find the old complaint of the insecurity of the streets as loud as ever. One day in April, 1744, it is related, a band of desperadoes, to the number of about twenty, attacked St. Martin's roundhouse about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, armed with cutlasses, bludgeons, and pistols, with the design of rescuing some of their comrades; nor could they be dispersed till a party of the horse-guards had been sent for. A few months after we read of an active peace-officer, who had distinguished himself in the pursuit of the perpetrators of some recent robberies, being assailed in the open street by twelve villains armed with cutlasses and two with pistols, and fired at and wounded by them. "The gang," says Maitland, "who committed these robberies were so insolent that they went to the houses of peace-officers, made them beg pardon for endeavouring to do their duty, and promise not to molest them. Some, whose lives they threatened, were obliged to lie in Bridewell for their safety." In an address to the king this same year the lord mayor and aldermen represent "that divers confederacies of great numbers of evil-disposed persons, armed with bludgeons, pistols, cutlasses, and other dangerous weapons, infest not only the private lanes and passages, but likewise the public streets and places of usual concourse, and commit most daring outrages upon the persons of your majesty's good subjects whose affairs oblige them to pass through the streets, by terrifying, robbing, and wounding them; and these facts are frequently perpetrated at such times as were heretofore deemed hours of security;" and "that the officers of justice have been repulsed in the performance of their duty, some of whom have been shot at, some wounded, and others murdered, in endeavouring to discover and apprehend the said persons; by which means many are intimidated from duly executing their offices, and others put in manifest danger of their lives." The evil, however, continued unabated for some years after this. It was in 1751 that the celebrated Henry Fielding, then holding the office of a justice of peace for Westminster, published his "Inquiry into the Causes of the late Increase of Robbers, &c., with some Proposals for Remedying this growing Evil." Fielding begins this treatise by observing that the great increase of robberies that had taken place within a few years of the time when he wrote, though already become so flagrant, did not seem to have yet arrived at the height it was likely to attain. "In fact," he says, "I make no doubt but that the streets of this town, and the roads leading to it, will shortly be impassable without the utmost hazard; nor are we threatened with seeing less dangerous gangs of rogues among us than those which the Italians call the banditti. . . . What, indeed, may not the public apprehend when they are informed, as an unquestionable fact, that there are at this time a great gang of rogues, whose number falls little short of a hundred, who are incorporated in one body, have officers and a treasury, and have reduced theft and robbery into a regular system? There are of this society men who appear in all disguises, and mix in most companies."* And in a subsequent page we find the following statements: "How long have we known highwaymen reign in this kingdom after they have been publicly known for such? Have not some of these committed robberies in open daylight, in the sight of many people, and have afterwards rode solemnly and triumphantly through the neighbouring towns without any danger or molestation? This happens to every rogue who is become eminent for his audaciousness, and is thought to be desperate; and it is in a more particular manner the case of great and numerous gangs, many of which have for a long time committed the most open outrages in defiance of the law. Officers of justice have owned to me that they have passed by such with warrants in their pockets against them without daring to apprehend them; and, indeed, they could not be blamed for not exposing themselves to sure destruction; for it is a melancholy truth, that at this very day a rogue no sooner gives the alarm, within certain purlieus, than twenty or thirty armed ruffians are found ready to come to his assistance."† And all this went on notwithstanding a frequency of executions, a destruction of life by the arm of the law, that of itself seems to us now to belong to the horrors of a state of semi-barbarism; when, to adopt Fielding's own expression, cartloads of our fellow-creatures were once in every six weeks carried to slaughter.‡

But we must not allow such statements as these to carry us too far in our conclusions as to the general condition of the people at this time. We must not, out of a few particular facts, too hastily make up for ourselves a picture of the whole department of the social system to which they belong; still less must we from such facts relating to one department draw our inferences as to all the others. Facts that are remarkable and exceptional are more apt to be recorded, and commented upon by contemporary writers than such as more truly represent the ordinary course in which things proceed; and the same fact has not the same meaning, does not imply the same concomitants, at different epochs. Hence the difficulty, indeed the impossibility, of getting at a complete view of the state of society in any past age, even with the aid of the amplest statistical information. We look at it only as it were through so many long narrow tubes irregularly disposed, which permit us to see each of them little more than the small insulated portion of the field that chances to be directly opposite to it. Doubtless, what is strictly and distinctively to be called civilization has now been carried to a very considerably higher point in this country than it had arrived at by the middle of the last century: that is to say, along with a greatly improved condition of all material and mechanical arrangements, the moral dominion of law and order is more firmly established; crimes of violence, and violence in every shape, have diminished; human life has come to be held on all hands in higher estimation; great economical irregularities, such as famines and pestilences, have been much reduced in frequency and in severity; the general rate of mortality has been lessened; in short, the whole system of circulation upon which our existence as a community depends has been brought to act both with more freedom and with more efficiency. But our existence as a community is a different thing from our existence either as individuals or as families; and an advance in civilization is not necessarily the same thing with an advance either in happiness or in virtue. It does not even follow, as a matter of course, that, with a more submissive obedience to the law, and with actually a lower amount of what the law calls crime, we are in a more healthy condition, either socially or politically. With less crime there may be more vice; the spirit of legality, to borrow a phrase from the theologians, may have weakened the spirit of liberty. At the same time, while it is but fair to the past to keep these possibilities in mind, it would be the most fatal of all errors to assume that liberty and order, civilization and morality, might not all exist in the highest degrees together and in harmony. And certainly, in the case immediately before us—the comparison between our present condition and that of our ancestors of the earlier part of the last century,—it would be very difficult to show that the higher degree of morality and liberty really went along with the lower degree of civilization and order.

* Inquiry, p. 3.

† Id. p. 94.

‡ Id. p. 127.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

BOOK I.

B.C.	BOOK I.	Page	A.D.	BOOK I.	Page
55	JULIUS CÆSAR lands in Britain; gains several battles, and returns the same year to Gaul	28, 29	183	The Caledonians lay waste the country between the lines of Agricola and the wall of Hadrian	49
54	Julius Cæsar lands a second time in Britain; fights Cassivellaunus; forces the passage of the Thames; takes the capital of Cassivellaunus; appoints a yearly tribute, and again returns to Gaul	30-33	207	Severus lands in South Britain; penetrates into Caledonia; builds a wall parallel with those of Agricola and Hadrian	49, 50
A.D.			211	He marches against the Caledonians, but dies at Eboracum (York). Caracalla yield the ground between the Solway and Tyne and the Friths of Clyde and Forth to the Caledonians	52
43	Aulus Plautius lands in Britain; defeats Caractacus and Togodumnus, and compels some of the tribes to submit. Claudius arrives in Britain, receives the submission of some of the tribes, and returns to Rome after being in the island six months	39, 40	288	Carausius defeats the Scandinavian and Saxon pirates; is made emperor of Britain, &c. Britain a naval power	53
50	Ostorius Scapula, prætor, arrives in Britain; carries on the war nine years; erects forts and lines; defeats the Sceni, captures Caractacus, and sends him to Rome	40-42	297	He is murdered at Eboracum by Allectus, who succeeds him	id.
59-61	Paulus Suetonius takes Mona (Anglesey). Bonduca defeats the Romans, and is afterwards defeated by Suetonius, and poisons herself	43, 44	300	Allectus defeated and slain	id.
75-78	Julius Frontinus subdues the Silures	id.	306	Constantius Chlorus dies at Eboracum	id.
	Agricola completes the conquest of South Britain, and reconquers Mona	45	337	The Emperor Constantine the Great dies	id.
79	He pursues his operations in the south-west	id.	367	The Picts and Scots pillage Augusta (London) and make the inhabitants slaves	53, 54
80, 81	Agricola's wall; erects a chain of forts from Solway Frith to the Friths of Clyde and Forth	id.	382	Maximus becomes emperor of Britain, Gaul, Spain, and Italy	54
82	Agricola subdues the Novantæ, Selgovæ, and Damnii, and clears the south-west of Scotland	45, 46	388	He is defeated and put to death by the Emperor Theodosius the Great	id.
83	Crosses the Frith of Forth, and defeats the Caledonians	46	395	Theodosius dies, bequeathing the empire of a great part to Honorius, over whom he appoints Stilicho guardian	id.
84	Again defeats them at the Grampians under Galgacus. Britain discovered to be an island. Agricola recalled to Rome by Domitian	47	403	Stilicho repels the Picts, Scots, and Saxons	id.
120	Hadrian arrives in Britain; raises a rampart between Solway Frith and the German Ocean	id.	407	The Roman empire dismembered; part of the Roman troops recalled	55
121	He repairs the wall of Agricola	49	417	Marcus elected emperor of Britain; dethroned and murdered	id.
138	Lollius Urbicus drives the Caledonians beyond the Clyde and Forth, and there fixes the Roman frontier; erects a rampart on the line of Agricola's forts	47-49		Constantine elected emperor of Britain; conquers a great part of Gaul; gives Spain to his son Constans; dies	id.
			420	The Romans finally abandon Britain	id.
			428	Leogaire MacNeil, first Christian King of Ireland, began to reign	223
			441	The Roman party in Britain petition Ætius for aid. Germanus, a Gallic bishop, defeats the Picts	57
			449	Vortigern calls in the aid of the Saxons under Hengist and Horsa, whom he places in the Isle of Thanet	57, 58

BOOK II.

A.D.	BOOK II.	Page	A.D.	BOOK II.	Page
463	Leogaire MacNeil, first Christian king of Ireland, dies	223		Hengist founds in Kent the first Saxon kingdom	141-2
	Hengist and Horsa drive out the Picts and Scots. Vortigern marries Rowena	140-1	470	Riothamus, a king of Cornwall, embarks with 12,000 British to assist the Gauls	142
	The Saxons fortify Thanet. Vortigern is deposed, and Vortimer elected king. The Saxons massacre the Britons at Stouchege.		477	Ella, the Saxon, with his three sons, lands in Sussex; defeats the Britons, and founds the kingdom of the South Saxons	id.

A.D.	BOOK II.	Page	A.D.	BOOK II.	Page
510	He dies, having been the first Bretwalda	145	836	Kenneth II., Pictish king of Scots, begins to reign	217
527-9	Ercenwine takes possession of Essex, and founds the kingdom of the East Saxons	142		Egbert dies, and is buried at Winchester	152
547	Ida, the Angle, lands at Flamborough head, and settles between the Tees and the Tyne, and founds the Kingdom of Bernicia	id.	843	Kenneth II. acknowledged king of the Picts and Scots	217
568	Ceawlin, king of Wessex, begins to reign	145	845	Turgesin, the Dane, proclaimed king of all Ireland	223
593	Ethelbert, king of Kent, becomes Bretwalda	id.	851	The Danes defeated at Okeley by Ethelwulf and Ethelwald. Barhuif, king of Mercia, is slain. The Danes are again defeated at Wenbury, in Devon	152
616	He dies, and is succeeded as king of Kent by his son Eastbald	id.	853	Ethelwulf goes to Rome and stops a year; Alfred, his son, is anointed king by the pope. Ethelwulf marries Judith, daughter of the king of the Franks, and revives the title of queen	152-3
617	Redwald, king of East Anglia, becomes a Bretwalda	id.		He returns to England, and divides the kingdom with Ethelbald	153
	The Angles of Bernicia and Deira united, and called Northumbrians	142	857	Ethelwulf dies	id.
621	Edilfrid, king of Northumbria, is slain, and Edwin, fifth Bretwalda, succeeds to his kingdom	146		Ethelbald succeeds, and marries his father's widow	id.
625	Edwin styled "Rex Anglorum"	id.	859	He dies and is succeeded by Ethelbert	id.
634	Perida, prince of Mercia, and Cuthwaller, king of North Wales, defeat and slay Edwin	147		Kenneth MacAlpine, king of Scots, dies at Forteviot	218
	*Oswy defeats and slays Cuthwaller at Hexham	id.	863	Donald III., successor of Kenneth, dies, and is succeeded by Constantine II.	id.
642	He is acknowledged Bretwalda	id.	866-7	Ethelbert dies, and is succeeded by Ethelred, who fights nine battles against the Danes	153-4
	He is slain in battle by Penda, and is succeeded in his kingdom by Oswy	148	871	Accession of Alfred the Great	154
647	The Britons of Cornwall and Devonshire submit to the Anglo-Saxons	143	875	The Danes under Halfden settle Northumbria	157
651	The kingdom of Northumbria again divided	148	876	They invade Wessex, land in Dorsetshire, and take Wareham. Alfred beats their ships at sea, and they evacuate Wessex	id.
652	Penda ravages Northumberland. Oswy sues for peace. The families of Penda and Oswy intermarry	id.		A Saxon fleet destroys the Danish ships at the mouth of the Exe. Guthrum capitulates at Exeter, and gives hostages	id.
654	Penda is defeated and slain near York	id.	878	Alfred is surprised at Chippenham by the Danes under Guthrum, and is obliged to fly, and the Danes overrun Wessex. Alfred takes refuge in Athelney	158-9
655	Oswy conquers Mercia, and assumes the title of Bretwalda	id.		He fights the battle of Ethandune; defeats the Danes; and Guthrum embraces Christianity; and England is then divided between him and Alfred	160
656	Wulfere made king of Mercia, and becomes Bretwalda of parts south of the Humber	id.		Asser made bishop of Sherburn	161
	Alchfrid obtains part of Northumbria	id.	879	Guthrum the Dane baptized. An army of pagans land and winter at Fulham	id.
	The yellow plague rages over Britain	id.	882	Constantine II., king of Scots, is defeated and slain by the Danes	219
670	Oswy dies, and Egfrid, his son, succeeds	149		Accession and dethronement of Hugh, king of Scots	id.
	Egfrid defeats the Picts	id.		Alfred gains a naval victory over the Danes	162
679	Egfrid invades Mercia	id.	885	He gains another naval victory, and the same year he drives the Danes from before Rochester, and compels them to retreat to their ships	id.
685	He is slain in a war with Brude, King of the Picts	id.	886	He rebuilds and fortifies London	id.
737	Ethelbald, king of Mercia, rules the country south of the Humber, except Wales	id.		The Danes besiege Paris during this and the two following years	id.
742	Wessex again becomes independent	id.	893	Grig and Etha, kings of Scots, dethroned, and Donald IV. succeeds	219
743	Donald III., king of Ireland, begins to reign, and continues king until 763	223	893-6	The Danes invade England and land at Romney Marsh. Another division under Hasting land at Milton. The Danes of England rise in their favour; Alfred defeats them at Farulham; he raises the siege of Exeter. Ethelred, earl of the Mercians, takes Hasting prisoner, whom Alfred liberates. The Danes are routed at Buttington and in various other battles. Hasting, abandoned by his followers, leaves England	162, 3, 4
718	The Danes make their first incursion into Ireland	id.	897	Alfred dies at the age of fifty-three, and is buried at Winchester	167
757	Offa, king of Mercia, makes conquests in Sussex, to Kent, and Oxfordshire; takes part of Mercia; defeats the Welsh; exacts tribute from the Northumbrians; builds a palace at Tamworth; and defeats the Danes, who invade England	149-50		Edward and Ethelwald dispute the succession;
791	Constantine, a Pictish king, reigns in Scotland	217
795	Offa the Terrible dies	150
800	Beortric, king of Wessex, is poisoned by his wife Eadburgha, who is expelled the kingdom and the title of queen abolished	id.
	Egbert becomes king of Wessex; defeats the Mercians, and takes possession of their kingdom; establishes sub-kings of Kent and East Anglia	id.
815	The Danes settle in Armagh	223
825	Egbert subdues Northumbria and makes King Eanred his vassal; assumes the title of Bretwalda	151
830	Ungus, king of Scots, dies	217
832	The Danish pirates land and ravage the Isle of Sheppey	151
833	They land again and are fought by Egbert at Charmouth	152
834	Egbert defeats the Danes and Britons of Cornwall and Devon at Hengdown Hill	id.

A.D.	BOOK II.	Page	A.D.	BOOK II.	Page
	the latter flies to Danelagh, and becomes king of the Danes	168	991	The Danes ravage all between Ipswich and Maldon, and slay Earl Brithnot	176
904	Donald IV., king of Scots, killed in battle near Forteviot, and is succeeded by Constantine III.	219	992	A large fleet is collected at London, but Alfred, the principal commander, goes over to the Danes; the eyes of Elfgar, his son, are put out by Ethelred	id.
905	Ethelwald is slain in battle by Edward	168	993	A Danish host land and take Bamborough Castle by storm	id.
911	Edward gains a signal victory over the Danes	id.	994	Sweyn, king of Denmark, and Olave, king of Norway, ravage the south, and are bought off by the payment of 16,000 pounds of silver	id.
912	Ethelred dies, and leaves the care of Mercia to his widow Ethelfleda; she drives the Danes out of Derby and Leicester, compels many of the tribes to submit, and takes the wife of the Welsh king prisoner	id.	998	Ethelred prepares a large fleet	177
920	Ethelfleda dies; is succeeded in Mercia by Edward, who dies, and is succeeded by Athelstane	id.	1001	The Danes again land and ravage the whole country; they are paid 24,000 l. to depart. The Danes still become permanent	id.
925	Accession of Athelstane; reduces nearly all Wales; compels the Welsh to pay tribute, and drives the Cornish out of Devon	id.	1002	Ethelred marries Emma, the Flower of Normandy, the sister of Duke Richard	id.
934	North Britain called for the first time Scotland	218	Nov. 13. The Danes through England are massacred in the feast of St. Brice; Gunhilda, sister of Sweyn is murdered	id.
937	Athelstane defeats Anlaf the Dane, and Constantine, king of Scots, at Brunaburgh; assumes the title of king of the Anglo-Saxons	168	Sweyn invades England; lands near Exeter, which city he plunders and ravages Wiltshire	178
940	He dies, and is buried at Malmesbury	170	1003	Malcolm II. of Scotland defeats and slays Kenneth the Grim, at the battle of Monivaird	221
	Anlaf again invades England; takes a great part; Edmund Atheling regains possession of it	id.		The Danes take, plunder, and burn Norwich, and destroy the other towns in Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, and Lincolnshire	178
944	Constantine III., king of Scots, becomes abbot of the Culdees of St. Andrew's, and Malcolm I. succeeds	219		Bryan the Brave, king of Ireland, begins to reign	223
	Kenneth is murdered by Fenella at Fettercairn	220	1004	The Danes return to the Baltic	178
946	Edmund Atheling expels Dunmail, king of Cumbria, and gives the country to the king of Scots; puts out the eyes of Dunmail's sons; is stabbed by Leof; dies, and is buried at Glastonbury	170	1006	Sweyn again ravages the kingdom, and is paid 36,000 l. to retire	id.
	Accession of Edred. The Danes again infest England; are beaten; Edred obliges the Danes of England to pay a fine, and incorporates Northumbria with the rest of the kingdom; he dies	170-1	1008	A large fleet is built and equipped, but rendered useless by treachery of the commanders; Wylthoth takes twenty and ravages the south coast, and eighty are destroyed by a storm	178 9
948	The Danes of Ireland embrace Christianity	223	1009,	The Danes called "Thurkill's host" land in England and ravage the country; Alpheg, Archbishop of Canterbury, defends that city, but it is taken and the archbishop is murdered	179
953	Malcolm I., king of Scots, is killed, and succeeded by Indulf	219		Thurkill accepts 48,000 l. and the cession of some counties, and enters the service of Ethelred	id.
955	Accession of Edwy; appoints Edgar sub-regulus of part of England; marries Elgiva; Dunstan insults him, and is banished. The Northumbrians and Mercians rise and declare Edgar king of England worth of the Thanes	172		The Danes under Sweyn sail up the Humber, and landing, devastate the country; many counties submit, and some of the Thanes do homage to him. Ethelred retires to Normandy	179, 180
956	Dunstan returns. Elgiva cruelly treated and murdered	id.	1013	Sweyn is declared "Full King of England." He dies suddenly at Gainborough, and Ethelred returns, but Canute is declared king by his Danish followers	180
958,	9 Edwy dies, and is succeeded by Edgar. Dunstan is made archbishop of Canterbury. Edgar is styled emperor of Allion and king of England	173	1011	Bryan the Brave, king of Ireland, is killed by the Danes at the battle of Clontarf, and is succeeded by Malachi	223
	He causes the extirpation of wolves	id.	1016	Ethelred dies, and Edmund Ironside is chosen king by the Saxons. England is again divided, Canute reigning over the north and Edmund the south. Edmund dies suddenly	180
961	Indulf, king of Scots, killed at the battle of the Bards, and is succeeded by Duff	219	1017	Canute succeeds to the whole kingdom of England; murders all the Saxon princes he can, except Edmund and Edward, who are sent to Sweden; he marries Emma, the widow of Ethelred; engages in foreign wars	180-1
964	Edgar issues a new coinage. Athelwold marries Elfrida; he is murdered; Edgar marries the widow	173	1019	Compels the Cumbrians and Scots to submit	181
965	Duff, king of Scots, is assassinated, and Culen succeeds	219	1020	Eadulf enters to Malcolm, king of Scots, part of his dominions called Lothian	221
978	Culen is killed in battle, and is succeeded by Kenneth III.	220	1022	Malachi, king of Ireland, dies	223
973	Kenneth overcomes Dunwallon, king of Strathclyde, at the battle of Vacour, and incorporates his kingdom with the rest of Scotland	218	1030	Canute goes on a pilgrimage to Rome; visits Denmark; and after two years' absence returns to England	182-3
975	Edgar dies, and is buried at Glastonbury	173	1033	Malcolm II., king of Scots, dies, and is succeeded by Duncan	221
	Accession of Edward the Martyr	174	1034	Robert, Duke of Normandy, dies	192
978	He is murdered near Corfe Castle by an attendant of Elfrida	175	1035	Canute dies and is buried at Winchester	184
979	Ethelred is crowned at Kingston by Dunstan	id.
981	Southampton is plundered and its inhabitants taken for slaves by Sweyn, a prince of Denmark, who afterwards takes Chester, London, and attacks many other places	176

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

A.D.	BOOK II.	Page	A.D.	BOOK II.	Page
	The Wittenagemote declare that the kingdom shall be divided between Harold and Hardicanute	184	1054	Siward, Earl of Northumbria, defeats Macbeth near Dunstanuane	id. , 222
	Hardicanute remains in Denmark; Edward lands, but returns to Normandy; Alfred lands at Herne Bay, and is received by Earl Godwin; he is captured and cruelly treated; he dies	185	1056	Dec. 5. Macduff and Malcolm defeat and slay Macbeth	222
	Harold is declared full king over all the Island	id.	1057	April 3. Lulach, successor of Macbeth, is defeated and slain at the battle of Rassic by Malcolm III.	id.
1039	Duncan, king of Scots, is murdered at Bothgouman by Macbeth, who succeeds to the throne	221-2	1059	The Earl Algar dies	191
1040	Harold dies and is buried at Westminster. Hardicanute arrives in England, and is accepted as king	186	1063	Harold with his brother Tostig overcome the Welch, who decapitate their king Griffith, and send his head to Harold; the Welch give hostages and engage to pay the ancient tribute	195
1042	He dies at a feast, and is buried at Winchester	id.		Edward, the outlaw, arrives in London and dies soon after, and is buried in St. Paul's	id.
	Accession of Edward the Confessor	id.	1064	Turlogh becomes king of Ireland	223
	He marries Editha, the daughter of Earl Godwin	187	1065	Harold is wrecked on the French coast; is taken prisoner; is ransomed by the Duke of Normandy; Harold swears to aid William to get possession of the English crown after Edward's death	198-9
1043	The Danes, under King Magnus, threaten to invade England, but retire	188		Tostig is expelled from Northumbria, and Morcar is appointed Earl in his stead; he flies to Bruges	200
1044	Sweyn II., son of Earl Godwin, violates an abbess and is exiled; he becomes a pirate and murders his cousin Beorn; he is pardoned and restored to his government	189	Nov. 30.	Harold arrives in London	201
1051	A retainer of Eustace, Count of Boulogne, kills an Englishman at Dover, and the count and his followers are driven out; Earl Godwin is disgraced; he flies to Flanders; his sons Harold and Leofwin go to Ireland	191	1066	Jan. 5. Edward the Confessor dies and is buried at Westminster	203
	Edward seizes the jewels and money of his Queen Editha, and confines her in the monastery of Werwell; William, Duke of Normandy, visits England at the king's invitation	191-2		Harold is proclaimed king; the foreign favourites are dismissed; Duke William demands by his ambassadors the fulfilment of Harold's oath; he refuses; the Pope sanctions the invasion of England	206-7
1052	Earl Godwin lands on the south coast; he and his sons Harold and Leofwin sail up the Thames and stop at Southwark; the Normans and French are banished; the queen set at liberty; Wilnot, one of the sons, and Haco, a grandson of the earl, are given as hostages, and sent to Normandy; Sweyn is banished and goes on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; the Saxon authority is rendered supreme	193		Tostig ravages the Isle of Wight and the coast of Lincolnshire; sails up the Humber, but is beaten off; Hardrada, king of Norway, invades England, and with Tostig defeats Earls Morcar and Edwin, and takes York; Harold fights and beats them at Stamford bridge, and Hardrada and Tostig are slain	208-9
	Earl Godwin dies at Windsor, and is succeeded in his titles and possessions by Harold, his eldest son	194	Sept. 28.	The Normans land at Bulerwithhe, march to Hastings, and form a fortified camp	210
				They ravage the surrounding country	211
				Harold arrives in London from the north, and in six days marches against the Normans	209
				Oct. 14. The battle of Hastings; Harold is slain	212-15

BOOK III.

A.D.	BOOK III.	Page	A.D.	BOOK III.	Page
	William takes Dover Castle	359		Keeps his Christmas in London; the Saxon laws to be observed	366
	Edgar Atheling is declared king, and Earls Edwin and Morcar appointed to military command	360	1068	William besieges and takes Exeter, and builds a castle there; he is crowned with his Queen Matilda at York, by Archbishop Aldred	id.
	William marches to Southwark; ravages the country; Edgar surrenders the crown to him; a fortnight afterwards the Tower of London, built by William	361		Harold's sons again invade England; are defeated and seek refuge in Denmark	367
	Coronation of William in Westminster Abbey	362		William extends his conquests to Devonshire, Somersetshire, Gloucestershire, and Oxford, and many fortified cities	id.
	William holds his court at Barking, where he receives Edgar Atheling	id.		Earls Edwin and Morcar raise the people in the north	368
	A castle is built at Winchester	363		William marches and gives them battle on the Ouse, and defeats them; he takes York and builds a citadel	369
1067	March. William goes over to Normandy, leaving Otto in command with certain councillors	364		Aldred, Archbishop of York, curses William	id.
	Insurrection in Kent; Dover Castle is attacked; Count Eustace, of Boulogne, comes over, but retires	365		Edgar Atheling and his family fly to Scotland	id. , 534
	Edric rises in Herefordshire; the sons of Harold invade England from Ireland; are repulsed; the English rise in several parts	id.		Several Norman followers of William abandon England	370
	Dec. 6. William embarks at Dieppe for England	366		He sends his queen back to Normandy	id.
			1069	William raises the siege of York and erects a second castle. Robert de Comine attacks

A.D.	BOOK III.	Page	A.D.	BOOK III.	Page
	and takes Durham, but he and his followers are destroyed in the night	370		The Dane-geld again laid on by the king	387
1072	William advances into Scotland; subdues Malcolm III.; who meets and gives hostages to William; and does homage at Abernethy	378 534 536		He enlists many foreign soldiers; lays waste the lands near the sea-shore; encourages commerce	id. id.
1073	Aug. The Danes under Osbeorn invade England; land at the Ouse; are joined by Edgar Atheling; they besiege York; the Norwegians burn the city and cathedral, and 3000 of them are destroyed	371		William and Henry, the king's sons, disagree	id.
	William retakes York, and Edgar flies again to Scotland	372		The king lays waste a circumference of ninety miles in Hampshire to make a hunting ground	387 388
	William lays waste Northumbria; Egelwin, Bishop of Durham, retires to Lindisfarne; Durham is taken by William and fortified	373	1086	He enacts the forest laws	388
	He is nearly lost on his way to York	id.		The king assembles all his vassals at Salisbury, who again take the oath of allegiance and do homage	id.
	The conquered country partitioned out to Normans	374, 5		The king then departs for the continent with his sons William and Henry, to lay siege to Mantox	id.
	Earls Edwin and Morcar are admitted to their estates	375		July. Turlogh, king of Ireland, dies at Kinkora	458
	William enters Chester without resistance	id.	1087	July. William lays siege to Mantox; it is taken and burned; he receives an injury by his horse stumbling; he is carried to Rouen; removes to the monastery of St. Gervais; liberates state prisoners; bequeathes Normandy to Robert, and gives 5000 l. of silver to Henry	389
	Hugh the Wolf, Earl of Chester, invades North Wales and builds Rhuddlan Castle	376		Sept. 9. Death of William the Conqueror	id.
	Hereward raises an insurrection in Lincolnshire, Huntingdon, and Cambridge. Edwin and Morcar fly from William; the former is killed and Morcar joins Hereward; the English make a fortified camp in the Isle of Ely; William besieges them for three months; the monks of Ely betray the camp; the English surrender, but Hereward escapes; he afterwards takes the oath of allegiance to William	376, 7, 8		His body is carried to Caen and is buried in St. Stephen's church	390, 1
	William takes with him an English army and reduces Maine	379		Sept. 26. William Rufus is crowned at Westminster by Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury	392
	Edgar Atheling goes to Rouen to William	380		He again imprisons the English state prisoners liberated by his father	392, 3
	Some of the Norman barons raise an insurrection at Norwich; the Earl of Norfolk is defeated; Norwich Castle surrenders; William besieges Dol in Brittany unsuccessfully; he returns to England	381, 2		The Bishop of Bayeux raises an insurrection in England in favour of Robert of Normandy	391
	Earl Waltheof is executed near Winchester	382		The Normans are defeated at sea; Rufus calls the Saxons together; besieges Odo, the bishop, in Pevensey Castle; Pevensey and Rochester Castles are surrendered to the king, and Odo departs from England, and the insurrection is quelled	391, 5, 6
	The abbot of Croxland is accused of idolatry and degraded	id.	1089	Archbishop Lanfranc dies; Rufus seizes the revenues of Canterbury	396
1077-9	Robert of Normandy, William's eldest son claims that province; he is refused; he revolts and attacks the Castle of Rouen; retires to Le Perche; again demands Normandy; is again refused; he goes to the French court; ravages Normandy; William besieges him in the Castle of Gesbrocy; is wounded by Robert; he abandons the siege; Robert is reconciled to the king	384	1090	The Norman barons rebel against Robert and take many of his castles; they are garrisoned by Rufus; Henry assists Robert, and the adherents of Rufus are expelled; Henry gains some castles; Henry throws Conan, the leader of the Rebellion, over the battlements of a high tower	396, 7
1079	Malcolm III. makes an incursion into Northumberland			Jan. Rufus hunts in Normandy at the head of an English army; a peace is concluded and Rufus retains many towns; Rufus and Robert attack Henry and lay siege to Mount St. Michael, which he evacuates and retires into Brittany	397, 8
1080	Robert is sent to command against the Scots, but effects nothing	536		Rufus engages in a war with Malcolm III. of Scotland; Rufus lays the foundation of a castle at Carlisle; and colonises that part; Rufus requires Malcolm to appear at Gloucester and do homage, which is refused	398 536 537
	Robert finally leaves the king	384		Malcolm does homage; Edgar Atheling comes to England and lives in the court of Rufus	398
	Liulf having been robbed by Gilbert and other retainers of the Bishop of Durham, raises an insurrection; the people meet at Gateshead; they fire the church; Gilbert is put to death; the bishop and his retinue are slain	384, 5		Nov. 13. Malcolm III. and his son Edward killed at the siege of Alnwick Castle	399, 537
1082	Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, is sent by the king to against the insurgents; lays waste the country; Odo aspires to the Popedom and leaves England	385		Nov. 16. Queen Margaret his wife, the sister of Edgar Atheling, dies	399, 538
	William arrests him at the Isle of Wight and sends him prisoner to Normandy	386	1091	Donald Bain seizes the throne of Scotland	538
	Queen Matilda dies	id.		May. Duncan offers to swear fealty to Rufus; invades Scotland; drives Donald Bain from the throne and becomes king	id.
	The Danes again appear upon the coast, but return	id.	1094-5	The Welch invade the English border; besiege and take Montgomery Castle, and overrun Cheshire, Shropshire, and Herefordshire, and reduce the Isle of Anglesey; Rufus marches against them; goes into Wales, but retreats; orders the erection of forts along the frontier	399
	Sueno and his son Harold of Denmark die	id.		Mowbray, Earl of Northumberland, enters into a conspiracy against Rufus to place Stephen on the throne; the king marches against him; besieges him in Bamborough Castle; he is
	Canute succeeds to the Danish throne and prepares with Olaf, king of Norway, to invade England; imprisons his brother Sleswic; the invasion is abandoned	386, 7

A.D.	BOOK III.	Page	A.D.	BOOK III.	Page
	taken prisoner; his wife delivers up the castle; the conspirators are variously punished	400	1109	July 30. Turgot is consecrated bishop of St. Andrew's by the Archbishop of York	539
1094	Ireland is divided between Murtach, son of King Turlogh, and Domnal MacLochlin	459	1110	Matilda, the daughter of Henry, affianced to Henry V., emperor of Germany, and a tax laid on the country to pay the marriage portion	412
1095	Donald Bain causes the assassination of Duncan, and again becomes king of Scotland	538		The Welsh are defeated; and a colony of Flemings established at Haverfordwest	id.
	He expels all foreign settlers, and abolishes all innovations on the customs of the country	id.		Henry obliges the barons and prelates to swear fealty to his son William at Salisbury	413
1096	Robert resigns Normandy to Rufus for a sum of money	400	1113	The King of France and Fulk, Earl of Anjou, attack the frontiers of Normandy; peace is restored	412
	He sails to take possession of it	401	1115	Turgot, bishop of St. Andrew's, dies	539
1097	Edgar Atheling marches into Scotland	538	1117	Thomas a Becket is born	446
1098	Defeats Donald Bain, and places his nephew Edgar on the throne	id.	1118	Maud the Good, queen of Henry, dies. The Earl of Mellent, Henry's chief minister, also dies	413
1099	The town of Mans is delivered up to Rufus by the Lord of La Flèche	401		Henry is engaged in a war with his Norman barons	id.
	July 15. Jerusalem is captured by the Crusaders	407		Baldwin, earl of Flanders, dies of his wounds	id.
1100	Helie besieges Mans; Rufus instantly repairs to Beaufort; Mans is surrendered; Rufus is wounded; he ravages the country and returns to England	401		The Order of the Templars founded	746
	May. Richard, son of Duke Robert, is killed by an arrow in the New Forest	id.	1119	Murtach, one of the kings of Ireland, dies	459
	Aug. 1. Rufus is slain by an arrow in the New Forest, shot by Sir Walter Tyrell, who flies to Normandy, and afterwards departs for the Holy Land	403		Aug. 20. The battle of Breunville fought between Henry and Louis, king of France	413
	Rufus is buried in Winchester Cathedral	id.	1120	Eadmer elected bishop of St. Andrew's, but is not consecrated	539
	Henry attempts to seize the treasures in Winchester Castle; is opposed by Robert de Breteuil	404		Nov. 25. Henry sets sail from Barfleur for England	414
	Aug. 5. Accession of Henry I.; he is crowned in Westminster Abbey by Maurice, bishop of London	405		The Blanche-nef , the ship in which Prince William embarked, is wrecked and all perish	415
	Henry grants a charter of liberties; restores the rights of the church; and promises to restore the laws of Edward the Confessor	406		The Norman barons again revolt	416
	Nov. 11. Henry marries Mand, daughter of Malcolm, king of Scots	406, 7		Henry marries Alice, daughter of Geoffry, duke of Louvain	id.
	He expels the favourites of Rufus	407	1121	MacLochlin, king of all Ireland, dies	459
1101	Ralf Flambard, bishop of Durham, escapes from the Tower of London and goes to Normandy	id.	1124	The Emperor Henry V. dies	416
	Robert prepares to invade England	408		Robert, Prior of Scone, is made bishop of St. Andrew's, and consecrated by the Archbishop of York	539
	The English fleet desert to him; he lands at Portsmouth; peace is concluded, and Henry cedes all his castles in Normandy to Robert	409		April 27. Alexander I., king of Scotland, dies, and is succeeded by David, earl of Cumberland	id.
	Henry goes to war with some of his barons; siege of Arundel Castle; of Bridgenorth; it is captured; capitulation of Shrewsbury	id.	1126	Matilda, the widow of the Emperor Henry V., and daughter of Henry I., is declared the next heir to the throne	416
	Robert comes to England, and is made prisoner	410		Fulk, earl of Anjou, goes to the Holy Land, and renounces his government in favour of his son, Geoffry Plantagenet	417
	Robert is liberated and returns to Normandy	id.	1127	Matilda is married to Geoffry Plantagenet at Rouen	id.
1102	Sibylla, the wife of Robert, dies	id.		Henry causes his barons again to swear to support the accession of Matilda; David, king of Scots, is the first to do so	540
1103	Murtach, one of the kings of Ireland, is defeated by MacLochlin the other king, at Cobha, in Tyrone	459	1128	July 27. William of Normandy, the son of Robert, dies at St. Omer, of a wound in the hand	417
1106	Henry invades Normandy; lays siege to Teuchebrey; Robert marches to its relief; is defeated and taken prisoner, and Normandy falls into the possession of Henry	410-12		Matilda leaves her husband and comes over to England; she returns	418
	Edgar Atheling is taken prisoner at the same place; is brought to England, and a pension is allowed him	411	1133	Matilda is delivered of a son at Mans, who is afterwards Henry II. of England	id.
	Duke Robert is committed to prison for life; he attempts to escape; is blinded by order of Henry	id.		Henry again causes his barons to swear to support the succession of Matilda and her children	id.
	Henry takes Falaise, and there secures William, the infant son of Robert; commits him to the custody of Helie de St. Saen	412	1133	Geoffry, another son of Matilda, is born	id.
1107	Jan. 8. Edgar, king of Scotland, dies, and is succeeded by Alexander I.	538	1134	William, a third son, is born	id.
	Cumberland is severed from the kingdom of Scotland, having been bequeathed by Edgar to his brother David	id.	1135	Robert of Normandy dies in Cardiff Castle	411
				Nov. 25. Henry is taken sick while in Normandy	418
				Dec. 1. He dies, leaving all his territories to his daughter Matilda	id.
				His bowels are buried at St. Mary's, Rouen, and his body brought over and buried at Reading Abbey	id.
				Stephen arrives in London, and is acknowledged king by the citizens	421.

A.D.	BOOK III.	Page	A.D.	BOOK III.	Page
Dec. 26.	He is crowned at Westminster . . .	422	Nov. 1.	Stephen is set at liberty in exchange for Robert Earl of Gloucester . . .	433
	He calls a meeting of the barons and clergy at Oxford, who swear to obey him so long as he preserves the church discipline; the pope confirms his election as king . . .	id.	Dec. 17.	The Bishop of Winchester summons an ecclesiastical council, whigh Stephen is formally restored by them . . .	434
	Stephen grants a charter of liberties; he allows his barons to fortify their castles . . .	id.	1112	Stephen marches to Oxford and invests the citadel and fires the town, after three months' siege . . .	id.
1136	Stephen goes to Normandy and is received as the lawful successor . . .	id.	Dec. 20.	Matilda escapes in the snow; is joined by the Earl of Gloucester and her son, Prince Henry, at Wallingford; Oxford Castle surrenders . . .	435
	David, king of Scotland, invades England in favour of Matilda; a peace is concluded . . .	423	1143	Stephen is defeated at Wilton by the Earl of Gloucester . . .	id.
	Feb. Henry, David's son, is created earl of Huntingdon; David again invades England; a truce is made . . .	423-540	1147	Matilda's son, Prince Henry, is sent back to Normandy . . .	id.
	Turlough O'Connor, king of Connaught, is acknowledged king of all Ireland . . .	459	Oct.	Robert Earl of Gloucester dies of a fever Matilda quits England . . .	id.
1137	Robert Earl of Gloucester comes to England; swears fealty to Stephen; raises an insurrection in favour of Matilda; is aided by the King of Scots; Norwich and other royal castles are taken; Stephen regains them . . .	423	1148	Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, is exiled. The churches in half the kingdom are closed . . .	id.
	Eleanor, daughter of the Duke of Aquitaine, is married to Louis VII. of France . . .	439	1149	Prince Henry lands in Scotland and is met by King David at Carlisle, where he knights him . . .	436-451
1138	March. David, king of Scots, invades England a third time . . .	423-541		David and his son Henry invade England and advance to Lancaster . . .	511
	June 9. Defeats the English at Clithierow . . .	541		Thomas à Becket goes to Rome and obtains a prohibition against the anointing of Prince Eustace . . .	446
	Aug. 22. The battle of the Standard is fought at Northallerton . . .	424-5-6, 541	1150	Prince Henry succeeds as duke of Anjou Stephen requires the Archbishop of Canterbury to anoint Prince Eustace, his son, but he refuses . . .	436
	Stephen seizes Roger, bishop of Sarum, and Alexander, bishop of Lincoln . . .	426			435
	Keeps them without food till their castles are given up . . .	427	1151	Ireland is divided between two princes by Turlough O'Connor, after the battle of Moimnor . . .	459
	Stephen is summoned to appear before the pope's legate and a synod of bishops at Winchester; but refuses . . .	id.		Wimund, an adventurer in Scotland, is taken prisoner and has his eyes put out . . .	511
	Dec. Roger, bishop of Sarum, dies . . .	428		Maud, the queen of Stephen, dies, and is buried at Faversham . . .	428
1139	Peace concluded at Durlham between David, king of Scots, and Stephen; David made earl of Northumberland . . .	541	1152	Eleanor, wife of Louis VII. of France, is divorced . . .	439
	Sept. 1. The synod of Winchester dissolved . . .	428		Prince Henry marries her, and attains Poitou, Guienne, and Aquitaine . . .	436-9
	Matilda lands in England; Stephen surprises her in Arundel Castle; she is allowed to depart; the barons of the north and west join Matilda . . .	428		He lands in England with an army; he is met by Stephen at Wallingford; a truce is agreed upon . . .	437
	Stephen defeats the barons at Ely and other places . . .	429		Prince Eustace dies . . .	id.
1140	Dermond MacMurrough, king of Leinster, seizes seventeen of his nobility and puts out their eyes . . .	id.	June 12.	Henry, son of David, king of Scotland, dies . . .	511
1141	Feb. 2. Robert Earl of Gloucester takes Stephen prisoner before Lincoln . . .	430	1153	May 24. David, king of Scotland, dies, and is succeeded by his grandson, Malcolm IV. . .	512
	March 2. The Bishop of Winchester abandons Stephen, and the following day gives his benediction to Matilda in Winchester Cathedral; she assumes royal authority . . .	id.	Nov. 7.	A peace is concluded at Winchester between Stephen and Prince Henry; the latter is adopted as his son; appointed his successor, and has the kingdom given to him after the king's death . . .	437
	April 7. Matilda convenes a meeting of churchmen, who, the following day, ratify her accession . . .	430-1		MacMurrough, king of Leinster, carries off Dergorvilla, the wife of Tiernan O'Ruarc . . .	460
— 9.	The deputies from London object; Christian, the chaplain of Stephen's queen, demands the liberation of the king; the legate Winchester excommunicates the adherents of Stephen . . .	431	1154	Prince Henry returns to the continent . . .	437-8
	June. Matilda enters London; insults the queen and Bishop of Winchester . . .	id.	Oct. 25.	King Stephen dies, and is buried at Faversham Monastery . . .	438
	Matilda is driven from London by Queen Maud, and retires to Oxford; she attempts to seize the Bishop of Winchester; he fortifies his palace; Matilda enters the castle of Winchester, and lays siege to the palace . . .	432	Dec.	Henry arrives in England and enters Winchester . . .	410
	Aug. 1. The bishop besieges Winchester Castle . . .	433	— 19.	He is crowned with his queen in Westminster Abbey by Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury . . .	440-1
	Sept. 14. Matilda makes her escape from the castle, and reaches Devizes Castle; is carried as a corpse from that place to Gloucester . . .	id.		He makes the barons and bishops swear fealty to his two sons, William and Henry . . .	441
	Her adherents, the Earl of Gloucester, and others, are taken prisoners; but the King of Scots escapes and returns to Scotland . . .	id. , 541		The Earl of Leicester is appointed grand justiciary of the kingdom; a new coinage issued; the foreign companies of adventurers are expelled . . .	id.
				The king summons a great council, and obtains their sanction to resume the castles granted by Stephen and Matilda . . .	id.
				Eleven hundred of them are levelled . . .	442

A.D.	BOOK III.	Page	A.D.	BOOK III.	Page
	At the siege of Bridgenorth Henry's life is saved by Hubert de St. Clair	442	Dec. 9.	Malcolm IV. dies at Jedburgh, and is succeeded by William the Lion	543
	Geoffry, Henry's younger brother, lays claim to the earldom of Anjou	id.	1166	Insurrection in Brittany. Henry, accompanied by William, king of Scots, passes over and reduces the country to submission; he keeps his court at Mount St. Michael	451-2, 513
1156	Henry goes to France and does homage to Louis VII. for Normandy and other provinces	442, 3	Dec.	Murtoch O'Lochin, king of Ireland, is killed in battle, and is succeeded by Roderick O'Connor	459
	He reduces Anjou and grants Geoffry a pension	443	1167	Henry orders a tax to be levied for the support of the war in the Holy Land	452
	Turlogh O'Connor, king of Ireland, called O'Connor the Great, dies, and is succeeded by Murtoch O'Lochin as supreme king	459	May.	Becket excommunicates in the church of Vezelay the supporters of the constitutions of Clarendon; and several of the favourites of Henry	452
	Thomas à Becket is made chancellor of England, preceptor to the prince, and warden of the Tower	446	1167	Dermond MacMurrough, king of Leinster, acknowledges himself vassal to Henry, at Aquitaine, and Henry grants him protection; he comes to England; engages with Richard de Clare; earl of Pembroke, called Strongbow, and Maurice Fitzgerald and Robert Fitzstephen, for aid in his restoration; returns to Ireland	461-2
1157	Henry invades Wales; he is defeated with great loss at Coleshill Forest; he cuts down forests; erects forts; the Welsh, after a few months, do homage and give hostages	443		The Empress Matilda dies at Rouen	452
	Malcolm IV. of Scotland resigns at Chester his claim to territory north of the Tyne and all his right to Cumberland, and all other possessions in England except the earldom of Huntingdon	542	1169	Dermond is defeated by Roderick and O'Ruarc, and accepts part of his former territory as O'Ruarc's vassal	462
1158	Malcolm attends at Carlisle to be knighted by Henry, but quarrels, and returns home	id.		Peace is concluded between the kings of England and France; Henry's sons do homage for their several fiefs, &c. Marriage is agreed between Prince Richard, and Alice, a daughter of Louis	452
	Geoffry, Henry's younger brother, dies	443	Dec. 1.	Becket lands at Sandwich; proceeds to Canterbury	id.
	Henry claims Nantes, and takes possession of that and several other places at the head of a powerful army	id.		Excommunicates Ranulf and Robert de Broc and the rector of Harrow	id.
	Thomas à Becket goes as ambassador to Paris	444		The excommunicated bishops appeal to the king	454, 5
	Henry soon after goes there in person	id.	1170	An English army and the Irish, under the command of Dermot MacMurrough, besiege Wexford, which surrenders	462
	He commutes the personal services of his vassals for a sum, and raises a large army	444, 5		Fitzstephen overcomes the district of Osory	id.
1159	He embarks for Toulouse with Malcolm, king of Scotland, whom he knights in France, à Becket and others	445-542		MacMurrough is acknowledged king of Leinster	463
	Malcolm returns to Scotland; his nobles attempt to seize him	542		Maurice Fitzgerald arrives from England. Dublin is reduced	id.
	Henry takes Cahors and returns to Normandy	445	May.	Raymond le Gros lands in Waterford; he defeats the inhabitants	464
	Becket fortifies Cahors; takes three castles, and returns to Normandy	id.	June 14.	Prince Henry is crowned during his father's lifetime by the Archbishop of York; William, king of Scots, and David, his son, do homage to the prince	453, 543
1160	Peace is concluded between Henry and Louis	446	July 22.	A congress is held on the borders of Touraine, when Henry and Becket are reconciled	id.
	Constance, queen of France, dies; Louis marries Adelaïde, niece of King Stephen; Prince Henry is married to Margaret, daughter of Louis; Louis exiles the Knights Templars	id.		Becket sends into England letters of excommunication against the Archbishop of York and the Bishops of London and Salisbury	454
1161.	Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, dies	448	Sept.	Stronghow embarks at Milford Haven with a large force and lands near Waterford; the city is attacked and taken; Stronghow marries Eva, the daughter of MacMurrough; Dublin is taken; Meath is overrun	464
1162	Thomas à Becket made primate of England	id.		The English slaves in Ireland set at liberty	465
1163	The Welsh rise in arms, but are defeated	451		Proclamation of Henry for the return of the English	id.
	Becket lays claim to Rochester Castle and other castles and several baronies	448		The Danes invade Ireland; attack Dublin, but are defeated	id.
	He excommunicates William de Eynsford, but at the command of Henry absolves him	id.		Dermot MacMurrough dies, and Stronghow assumes the title of king of Leinster in right of his wife	id.
	July 1. Malcolm IV. of Scotland renews his homage to King Henry at Woodstock	id.		Lawrence, archbishop of Dublin, causes a confederacy of native princes under the command of Roderick to invest Dublin; Stronghow cuts his way through the army of Roderick, which he routs	465, 6
1164	Jan. 25. Becket and the clergy sign a series of articles rendering the clergy subject to the civil courts for felony at Clarendon, in Wiltshire, called the Constitutions of Clarendon	449		Fitzstephen is besieged in Wexford and surrenders	466
	Becket is cited before the council at Northampton	id.
	Oct. 11. Becket appears before the king with his pastoral staff; is renounced as primate by the bishops	449, 450
	He is accused of magic; sentenced to imprisonment	450
	— 26. He leaves Northampton and flies to Gravelines	id.
	He is reinvested by the pope as archbishop	451
	Henry banishes his relations and friends, and seizes his goods and possessions	id.
	Malcolm IV. routs the army of Somerled, thane of Argyle, who with his son is slain	543
1165	Henry commands in person a campaign against the Welsh, and commits great cruelties upon his hostages	451

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

9.

A.D.	BOOK III.	Page	A.D.	BOOK III.	Page
1170	Strongbow repairs to Newham, in Gloucestershire, at the command of Henry; he surrenders Dublin and other forts to the king, and holds the remainder in subjection to the English crown	466	1178	William seizes the revenues, and causes Hugh to be consecrated; Pope Alexander III. cancels the appointment	544
	Becket is murdered in St. Augustine's Church, Canterbury	455, 6	1179	John Scot is consecrated; is banished	id.
1171	Oct 18. Henry, attended by Strongbow and a large army, lands at Crook, near Waterford	466	1181	William is excommunicated, and Scotland laid under an interdict; Pope Alexander dies; Pope Lucius III. reverses the decree, and appoints Hugh, bishop of St. Andrew's, and John, bishop of Dunkeeld	id.
	Henry receives the submission of many princes and Chieftains, and all Ireland, except Ulster, is subjugated	467	1182	Prince Richard refuses to do homage to his brother Henry for the duchy of Aquitaine; war commences between them	473
1172	April 17. Henry appoints Hugh de Lacy governor of Dublin and sails from Wexford, and the same day lands at Portlinnan, in Wales	id.	1183, 4	King Henry and Prince Geoffry are at war with Prince Henry and Prince Richard; Prince Henry submits to his father; King Henry is nearly assassinated at Linoges	474
	May. Henry is absolved from the murder of Becket by the pope's legates at Avranches	458		Prince Henry falls sick at Château Martel	id.
	Prince Henry is again crowned; his consort Margaret, daughter of Louis of France, is crowned with him	467		June 11. He dies	475
	Prince Henry demands the sovereignty of either England or Normandy	468		Henry takes Linoges by assault; takes several castles; captures Bertrand de Born; pardons him	id.
	He flies to the French court	id.		Prince Geoffry is reconciled to his father; Queen Eleanor is released from captivity	id.
	The Irish rise against the English	546		Geoffry demands the earldom of Anjou; is refused; flies to the French court; prepares for war	475, 6
1173	March. Richard and Geoffry, the king's other sons, go to the French court, and Queen Eleanor abandons her husband, but is retaken and imprisoned	468	1186	He is killed at a tournament	476
	Prince Henry is acknowledged sole king of England by Louis of France; the three princes swear that they will not make peace with Henry without the consent of the barons of France	id.		Is buried by Philip II., king of France; Prince Richard goes to the French court; seizes his father's treasures at Chinon; heads another revolt in Aquitaine; submits to his father, and swears obedience	id.
	Henry declares that England belongs to the jurisdiction of the pope	469		William the Lion marries Ermengarde, daughter of Viscount Beaumont; Henry restores the castle of Edinburgh to him	544
	June. The war commences in Normandy, but the rebels and invaders are repulsed; and a meeting takes place between the kings of England and France. The Earl of Leinster insults Henry	id.		Henry, son of the Emperor Frederic Barbarossa, marries Constance, aunt of William the Good, king of Sicily	486
	Richard de Lucy repulses the Scots; burns Berwick	470	1187	Donald Bane or MacWilliam, grandson of King Duncan, invades Ross and Moray, but is repulsed	544
	William the Lion is created Earl of Northumberland by Prince Henry	543		Sept. Jerusalem is retaken by the Mahomedans	id.
	The Earl of Leinster taken prisoner by De Lucy	470	1188	Jan. Peace between Henry and Philip; they meet and agree to march to the Holy Land	476
1174	Louis and Prince Henry again attack Normandy; Prince Richard leads the insurgents in Poitou and Aquitaine	id.		Feb. Henry calls a council at Gidington, in Northamptonshire; money is raised; the Jews are persecuted, and more money raised for the holy war	476, 7
	Roger de Mowbray revolts in Yorkshire; the Scotch invade England; Hugh Bigod takes Norwich Castle	id.		Nov. Prince Richard does homage to King Philip for his father's continental territories	477
	July 8. Henry returns to England, and lands at Southampton, bringing as prisoners his own and Prince Henry's wife; does penance at the grave of Becket	id.		Philip and Richard take many of Henry's towns	id.
	He is scourged in the church	471	1189	June. Henry sues for peace; a meeting between him and Philip appointed; a treaty is prepared	478
	July 12. Ranulph de Glanville takes William the Lion prisoner with sixty Scottish lords; William is sent to Falaise	id. , 472		July 6. King Henry dies at Chinon, and is buried at Fontevraud	479
	Henry subdues the revolt in England, and leads his army into Normandy, where he raises the siege of Rouen	471-544		Queen Eleanor is liberated and made regent	482
	Henry is reconciled to his children, and peace is restored	id.		Richard I. returns to England, accompanied by Prince John	id.
	Dec. William the Lion is released, on doing homage to Henry, by the treaty of Falaise	472-544		Sept. 2. Proclamation forbidding Jews to be present at the coronation	484
1175	Henry again at variance with his eldest son; they are reconciled	472		Sept. 3. Richard is crowned at Westminster by Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury	483
	Ireland is subjected to England by treaty; the King of Ireland does homage	546		Massacre of the Jews in London	484
1177	March. Henry arbitrates the dispute between Alfonso, king of Castile, and Sancho, king of Navarre	id.		Richard raises money for the crusade	485
				Releases William the Lion from his obligations to the crown of England	472, 485, 545
1178	The chapter of St. Andrew's elect John Scot their bishop	544		He appoints a regency	id.
				Gives John various earldoms; and some lands to Queen Eleanor	486
				Nov. William the Good, king of Sicily, dies	489
				1190 Tancred is crowned, at Palermo, king of Sicily	490
				Feb. Richard holds a great council in Normandy; he exchanges oaths with Philip of France	486

A.D.	BOOK III.	Page	A.D.	BOOK III.	Page
1190	The English and French armies are assembled at Vezelai and march to Lyons; the English fleet sails from Dartmouth; the ships are dispersed in the Bay of Biscay; sixty-three reach the Tagus and land; commit excesses; depart and reach Messina	487, 8		sister. Philip is defeated in Normandy by the Earl of Leicester	509
	Richard visits many parts of Italy	488	1193	The Duke of Austria sells King Richard to the Emperor Henry; he is confined in the Tyrol	503, 4, 9
	The Jews are massacred in several parts of England	504		The emperor and the duke are excommunicated	509
	March 16. A great massacre of the Jews at York	id.		Richard is brought before the diet of the empire	510
	Sept. 23. Richard arrives at Messina	489		Sept. 22. Terms are agreed upon for the liberation of Richard; 70,000 marks are raised for the ransom	id.
	Seizes the town of Bagoara; and takes Messina	490, 1	1194	Feb. Richard is liberated	id.
	He receives a large sum from Tancred; affiances his nephew, Prince Arthur, to an infant daughter of Tancred	492		March 13. He lands at Sandwich	511
	Richard confers with Gioacchino of Calabria	id.		Marches to London; Nottingham Castle surrenders	id.
	Meets Tancred; has disputes with Philip	492, 3		— 30. Holds a great council at Nottingham	id.
	March 30. Philip sails for Acre	493		He is again crowned, but at Winchester	id.
	Berengaria, the daughter of the king of Navarre, arrives in Brindisi; and sails in the English fleet from Acre	493, 4		Prince John massacres the officers of the garrison of Evreux	id.
	Prince John takes the castles of Nottingham and Tickhill, and is acknowledged heir to the throne	507		May. Richard lands at Barfleu. John submits and is forgiven. Philip is defeated in several engagements	id.
	Richard arrives at Rhodes; he sails for Cyprus, reduces the island, and levies tribute, and sends the emperor to a castle at Tripoli; he marries Berengaria at Limasol; embarks for Acre; he captures a large ship and massacres the crew	911, 5		July 23. Truce is agreed on for one year	id.
	June 8. Richard arrives at Acre; the siege of the castle proceeds. The kings of England and France quarrel	495		The Duke of Austria dies	513
1191	June 12. Acre is surrendered	496	1195	Hubert Walter is appointed grand justiciary	id.
	Philip quits Acre and returns to France	497	1196	William FitzOshert leads a secret society; he is arrested; he stabs Geoffry, a citizen; is hanged in West Smithfield	id.
	The Crusaders massacre the hostages given at the capitulation of Acre	id.		A great famine and plague in England	id.
	Naples is besieged by the Emperor Henry	503		William the Lion seizes the Earl of Orkney and Caithness	545
	Aug. 22. Richard marches towards Jerusalem	497	1197	The barons of Brittany and Aquitaine revolt; join the French king; Richard marries his sister Joan to the Earl of Toulouse	513
	Sept. 7. Defeats Saladin near Azotus and takes possession of Jaffa	498		Richard takes the Bishop of Beauvais prisoner, who is committed to a dungeon in Rouen Castle	id.
	Oct. 9. Prince John is declared chief governor of England; Louchamp, the justiciary, is deposed; John obtains possession of the Tower	507, 8		Sept. The Emperor Henry dies at Messina	513
	Nov. Richard marches from Jaffa; retreats to Ascalon	498		Truce again agreed upon	id.
	Richard and his followers repair the fortifications	499	1198	Richard defeats Philip near Gisors	id.
	Quarrel between the Duke of Austria and Richard	id.	1199	April 6. Death of King Richard; is buried at Fontevraud	511
	He negotiates for peace with Saladin	500		— 25. John is inaugurated at Rouen	515
	Gives Guy of Lusignan the island of Cyprus	id.		May 25. He lands at Shoreham	id.
	Conrad of Monterrat, titular king of Jerusalem, is murdered at Tyre	id.		— 27. He is crowned at Westminster	515, 16
	Henry of Champagne takes possession of Tyre; marries the widow of Conrad; and is acknowledged king of Jerusalem	500, 1		— 28. The barons and prelates do homage to him	516
1192	Saladin takes the town of Jaffa all but the citadel; Richard retakes it; battle of Jaffa	501		The French king demands for Arthur of Brittany all John's continental possessions except Normandy	id.
	Truce is made for three years between the Crusaders and Saladin; and the former go to Jerusalem as pilgrims	501, 2		The troops of John ravage Brittany	517
	Oct. Richard sails from Acre	502		Arthur is knighted by Philip	id.
	Nov. Reaches Corfu; he is driven on shore on the coast of Istria; he is discovered; flies as far as Erperg; and is captured by the Duke of Austria and confined in the castle of Tiersteign	503	1200	Peace concluded, and Arthur disinherited	id.
	John goes to France and does homage to King Philip for his brother's dominions on the continent	509		John marries Isabella, the wife of the Count de la Marche	id.
	John takes Windsor and Wallingford castles; demands the crown in London; is repulsed	id.		He is recrowned at Westminster with his queen	id.
	Philip prepares to make war on Normandy; John is betrothed to Alice, the French king's	id.		Nov. 22. William the Lion does homage to John at Lincoln	id.
			1201	Constance, mother of Arthur of Brittany, dies	id.
			1202	Arthur invests the town of Mirebeau; takes it; Queen Eleanor, widow of Henry II., defends the citadel; John marches to her relief	518
				July 31. John obtains possession of the town and takes Arthur, the Count de la Marche, and others, prisoners	id.
				Arthur is confined at Falaise and afterwards in the castle of Rouen	id.
			1203	April 3. Death of Arthur	519, 20
				A general insurrection takes place in Brittany; many of John's territories are taken	520
				Dec. John flies from Rouen to England	521
			1204	Rouen, Verneuil, and Chateau Gaillard surrender to Philip, and Normandy is re-annexed to the French dominions	id.
				Brittany, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and Poitou acknowledge Philip	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

11

A.D.	BOOK III.	Page	A.D.	BOOK III.	Page
1206	John invades Brittany; takes Rochelle; burns Angers; lays siege to Nantes; peace made for two years	521	1214	Oct. 20. John returns to England	127
1207	John disputes with the pope the right of appointing bishops; John de Gray is appointed Archbishop of Canterbury; the pope appoints Stephen Langton; John expels the monks of Canterbury; seizes their effects	522	Nov. 20. The barons meet at St. Edmund's Bury, and swear to assert their rights	id.
1208	March 23. The kingdom is laid under an interdict	id.	Dec. 4. William the Lion, king of Scotland, dies at Stirling	515, 6
1209	John is excommunicated	id.	— 10. Accession of Alexander II.	546
	He applies for aid to the Mahomedans of Spain	id.	1215	Jan. The barons demand the Great Charter	527
	He advances as far as Norham against William the Lion, but a truce is concluded	515	Feb. 2. John swears to engage in the holy war	528
1210	June 6. John lands in Ireland; receives the homage of many chieftains; reduces some castles; establishes English laws; appoints that the same money shall be current in both countries	523	The barons meet at Stamford; march to Oxford; they present the heads of their demands; they elect Robert FitzWalter their leader	id.
1211	The Jews are again persecuted; John leads an army into Wales; obtains tribute and carries away hostages	id.	May 24. They enter London; John agrees to their terms	id.
1212	The Welsh rise; John hangs the hostages; the barons of England revolt	id.	June 15. Meeting at Runnymede; John grants the Great Charter	528, 9
1213	John is deposed by the pope. Philip collects a large fleet for the invasion of England; John sends out ships; they destroy the principal part of the French fleet; John encamps on Barham Downs; the pope's legate arrives, and John submits	324	John invites an army of foreign mercenaries, and takes Rochester Castle; the barons are excommunicated by the pope; John ravages the country; the King of Scots assists the barons; John pursues him as far as Edinburgh, and devastates Haddington, Dumbar, and Berwick	530
	May 15. John swears fealty to the pope and surrenders his kingdom	id.	Dec. 16. The barons are again excommunicated and London laid under an interdict	531
	John orders Peter the Hermit to be murdered. An English fleet sails from Portsmouth to aid the Earl of Flanders; great naval victory gained over the French at Damme	525	The English crown is offered to Louis, son of Philip, king of France, by the confederate barons	id.
	The Barons refuse to embark in an expedition against France; John makes war on them	526	1216	May 30. The French army lands at Sudwich; Louis takes Rochester Castle	id.
	Aug. 25. Langton swears the barons at London to maintain the charter of Henry I.	id.	June 2. He enters London, and the barons do homage and swear fealty to him in St. Paul's Cathedral	id.
	Sept. 29. John again swears fealty to the pope	id.	Louis besieges Dover Castle; the barons besiege Windsor Castle. The Viscount Melun dies	532
1214	John again marches an army against the French	id.	Oct. John marches through Peterborough; his luggage and army are nearly all swallowed up by the wash at Fosse dike; he repairs to Swinhead Abbey	id.
	July 17. Battle of Bouvines	id. , 527	— 15. John is seized with fever; he appoints his son Henry his successor; the barons with him swear fealty to the prince	533
	Oct. 19. A truce is made between England and France	127	— 18. King John dies; is buried in Worcester Cathedral	id.

BOOK IV.

A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page
	Accession of Henry III.	671	1217	Sept 14. He sails for France	674
	Oct. 26. Henry is crowned at St. Peter's Church, Gloucester; does homage to the pope for England and Ireland	id.	Oct. 2. The barons who had adhered to Louis are received at court	id.
	Louis raises the siege of Dover Castle	672	— 4. New charter granted to the city of London	id.
	Nov. 6. The Tower of London is given up to him	id.	Dec. 1. Alexander II., king of Scots, surrenders to Henry the town of Carlisle, and does homage for his English possessions	700
	— 11. Great council at Bristol; the Earl of Pembroke chosen Rector Regis et Regni; Magna Charta is revised	671	Treaty of commerce concluded with Norway	id.
	Dec. 6. Louis takes Hertford Castle	672	The queen-mother is remarried to the Count de la Marche	id.
	Takes Berkhamstead Castle	id.	Magna Charta again confirmed	674, 5
	Truce agreed upon	id.	The Charter of Forests is granted	675
1217	The Earl of Pembroke besieges Mount Sorel Castle	673	1219	May. The Earl of Pembroke, the regent, dies, and is buried in the Temple Church	675
	May 20. The battle called "The Fair of Lincoln" fought	id.	Hubert de Burgh and the Bishop of Winchester are appointed regents	id.
	June. Louis offers terms of accommodation	id.	Pandulph is made legate	id.
	Aug. 23. French fleet sails from Calais	id.	1220	May 17. Henry is again crowned	id.
	— 24. Hubert de Burgh takes or destroys the whole	id.	1221	June 25. Joanna, his sister, is married to Alexander II.	id. 700
	Sept. 11. Louis agrees to abandon his claim on England	674	1223	Henry is declared of age	675

A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page
1224	Most of the disputed castles are surrendered to Henry	675	1258	June 11. The Parliament called the "22nd Parliament" meet at Oxford; committee of government appointed, and three sessions appointed to be held yearly; the king takes oaths to observe these acts	682
1225	A parliament is summoned at Westminster; money is granted on condition of the ratification of the two charters	id.	1259	The king of the Romans returns to England	683
	April. Richard Earl of Cornwall goes with an army to Guienne; a truce agreed upon	id.	1260	The king and queen of Scotland come to London	704
1229	War declared against France	676	1261	Feb. 2. Henry dismisses the committee of government; seizes the Tower and the Mint; Prince Edward joins the barons; the king publishes a dispensation from the pope absolving him from his oaths taken at Oxford	683
1230	Henry embarks from England and lands at St. Malo, in Brittany	id.		The Queen of Scots is delivered of a daughter, Margaret, at Windsor	704
	Louis takes several towns belonging to Henry	id.	1263	March. The Earl of Gloucester raises his retainers	683
	Oct. Henry returns to England	id.		April. The Earl of Leicester returns to England	id.
	Parliament refuses fresh supplies	id.		The Queen takes refuge in St. Paul's, and Prince Edward at Windsor	id.
1232	Hubert de Burgh is disgraced; sent to the Tower; his lands are forfeited; he escapes into Wales	id., 677		July. The foreigners are banished, and peace restored. The Earl of Ross invades the Hebrides; the King of Norway arrives	704
	Dés Roches, bishop of Winchester, and his foreign associates, are banished	677	Aug. 5.	An annular eclipse seen at Ronaldsore	id.
1233	The people of Galloway break out into revolt	700		The battle of Largs is fought	704, 5
1234	Again break out, but are suppressed	id.	Oct.	Henry defeats the barons, and Prince Edward joins him	684
	Hubert de Burgh restored to his honours	677	— 29.	The King of Norway retreats to Orkney	705
1236	Henry marries Eleanor, daughter of the Count of Provence; her relations are all appointed to high places	678	Dec. 15.	He dies at that place	id.
1237	Sept. A conference is held at York to settle the claims of the kings of Scots and England	700, 1	1264	Jan. 21. Alexander, son of Alexander III., is born at Jedburgh	id.
1238	March 4. Queen Joan of Scots dies at Canterbury	701		The king and the barons refer their differences to the arbitration of Louis IX. of France; the civil war again rages; the Jews are again massacred and plundered throughout England	684
	Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester, marries Eleanor, countess-dowager of Pembroke, sister of King Henry	681	May 12.	Battle of Lewes; the king, the King of the Romans, and Prince Edward, are taken prisoners; the truce of Lewes is concluded	685
1239	May 15. Alexander marries Mary, daughter of Ingelram de Couci	701	1265	Parliament is called, in which for the first time representatives appear	id.
1241	Sept. 4. Alexander, son of the king of Scots, is born at Roxburgh	702		Prince Edward escapes; battle at Kenilworth	id.
1242	Henry confides the care of the northern border to the King of Scots	701	Aug. 4.	The battle of Evesham; the Earl of Leicester is slain	686, 7
	Henry sails from Portsmouth and lands on the Garonne; Louis defeats him near Taillebourg; again at Saintes; Henry flies to Blaye; truce agreed upon	678		Parliament at Winchester; London deprived of its charter; dictum of Kenilworth	687
	The Earl of Athole is murdered at Haddington	701		Battle of Alton	688
1244	Parliament vote twenty shillings on every knight's fee for the marriage of the king's daughter. The Jews are persecuted and plundered	678, 9	1266	Battle of the Grandella is fought near Benevento	689
	Henry proclaims war against Scotland	701	1267	Parliament at Marlborough; the dictum of Kenilworth accepted	688
	Aug. 13. Peace concluded at Newcastle	702	1269	Louis IX. of France dies at Carthage	690
1248	The parliament remonstrate with Henry; and refuse supplies; Henry establishes a fair in Westminster	679	1270	July. Prince Edward sails for the Holy Land	688
	Alexander of Scots claims homage for the western islands from the Lord of Argyll	702	1271	Henry d'Almaine, son of the king of the Romans, is murdered by Simon and Guy de Montfort	id.
1249	July 8. Alexander dies at Kerarry	id.		Edward lands at Acre; takes Nazareth; the Moslems are massacred; returns to Acre; is wounded by an assassin	690
— 13.	Alexander III. is crowned at Scone	id.	Dec.	Richard, king of the Romans, dies	688
1250	Frederick II., king of the two Sicilies, dies	680	1272	Nov. 16. King Henry dies at Westminster, and is buried in the abbey	id.
1251	Dec. 26. Alexander III. is married at York to Margaret, daughter of King Henry. He does homage for his English possessions	703	— 20.	Edward I. proclaimed by the barons at the New Temple, and a regency appointed	id.
1252	Henry quarrels with the Earl of Leicester	681	1273	Feb. Edward arrives at Rome; goes to Paris and does homage to Philip III. for the lands in France	691
1253	May 3. Henry solemnly swears in Westminster Hall to observe the charters, and obtains money	679	1274	He recovers a challenge at Guiznes, from the Count de Châlons; the "little war of Châlons" is fought	691, 2
	Prince Edward marries Eleanor, daughter of Alphonso, king of Castile	680		The trade with the Flemings is renewed	692
	Prince Edward is declared king of Sicily	id.	Aug. 2.	Edward lands at Dover	id.
1255	Sept. 26. Henry meets Alexander III. and his queen at Roxburgh; and a regency for Scotland is framed	703
1256	Richard earl of Cornwall is elected king of the Romans; is crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle	681
1257	Alexander III. is seized by some nobles; and a new regency for Scotland is appointed	703
1258	A great scarcity in England	681
	May 2. Parliament is assembled at Westminster; the barons appear armed	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

13

A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page
1274	Aug. 28. He is crowned with his queen at Westminster	693
	Alexander III., king of Scots, does homage to Edward	705
	He persecutes and plunders the Jews, hanging two hundred and eighty in London	693 ^a
1275	Margaret, queen of Scotland, dies	705
1277	Edward invades Wales	697
	Nov. 10. Llewellyn, prince of Wales, cedes the greater part of the country to Edward; does homage for the remainder	id.
1278	The king of Scotland again does homage to Edward for his English possessions	705
1281	The Princess Margaret of Scotland is married to Eric, king of Norway	id.
1282	March 23. David, brother of the prince of Wales, takes Hawardine Castle; Llewellyn takes several places; the English are defeated at Meuai Strait	698
	Nov. 6. Edward is defeated; Llewellyn is slain	698, 9
1283	Margaret, queen of Norway, dies	705
	David is taken prisoner by Edward	699
	Sept. At a parliament held at Shrewsbury, he is sentenced to death; he is executed	id.
1284	Jan. 28. Alexander, prince of Scotland, dies	706
	Feb. 5. The succession of Scotland is settled on the "Maiden of Norway"	id.
1285	April 15. Alexander, king of Scotland, marries Joleta, daughter of the Count de Dreux	id.
1286	March 16. He is killed	id.
	April 17. A regency appointed	id.
	Sept. 20. The adherents of Robert Bruce meet	id.
1287	The Jews are again persecuted and robbed	693
1290	July 18. The treaty of Bridgeham is concluded, securing the integrity of the kingdom of Scotland	707
	Sept. The Maiden of Norway dies	id.
	The Jews are expelled the kingdom and their property seized	693
1291	May 10. The Scotch barons appear at Norham, and Edward claims to be lord paramount of Scotland	707, 8
	June 2. The several competitors for the crown of Scotland admit Edward's title as lord paramount	708
	— 3. Commissioners appointed to examine and report to Edward	id.
	— 11. The regents of Scotland surrender the kingdom to Edward; the castles are delivered up	id.
	— 15. Baliol and Bruce swear fealty to Edward	709
	Aug. 3. The commissioners meet at Berwick	id.
1292	June 2. The consideration adjourned for the opinion of parliament	710
	Oct. 15. Baliol and Bruce attend the parliament at Berwick; parliament decide in favour of Baliol	id.
	Nov. 6 and 17. Edward adjudges the kingdom of Scotland to Baliol	id.
	— 30. Baliol is crowned at Scone	id.
	Dec. 26. He does homage to Edward for his kingdom at Newcastle	id.
	Edward suppresses an insurrection in Wales, and is said to have hanged the Welsh hardy Edmund, the king's brother, makes conquests in France; Dover and its priory are burnt	711
1293	Edward compels Baliol to attend at Newcastle the appeals before him	712
	Baliol releases Edward from the treaty of Bridgeham	id.
	Oct. 16. Baliol appears before the parliament; three of his castles and towns are taken from him for contempt	713
1291	At a parliament at Scone the English of the court are dismissed	id.

A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page
1291	The English parliament is compelled to grant a tenth on lay property, and a half on the incomes of the clergy	719
1295	Oct. 23. Treaty between Scotland and France. Edward obtains a grant of a tenth from the clergy	713
1296	March. A Scottish army invade Cumberland	719
	— 30. Edward takes Berwick and massacres the inhabitants	713
	April 5. Baliol renounces his allegiance to Edward	id.
	— 28. Earl Warenne takes Dunbar Castle	id.
	May 18. Roxburgh Castle is surrendered to Edward by James, the Stewart of Scotland, who does homage	714
	Edinburgh and Stirling are taken	id.
	July 7. Baliol does penance before the Bishop of Durham at Strathkathro	id.
	The coronation stone is removed from Scone to Westminster	id.
	Aug. 28. The Scotch do fealty to Edward at Berwick	id.
	Edward outlaws the clergy and seizes their goods	719
1297	Wallace beats a revolt and takes Scone	715
	July 9. Some of the adherents of Wallace submit	716
	Aug. Edward lands at Sluys; gains some towns	720,
	Sept. 4. Wallace gains a victory; the castles of Edinburgh, Dunbar, Roxburgh, and Berwick surrender; he is made guardian of the kingdom	717
	Parliament, under Prince Edward, pass the statute "De Tallagio non Concedendo"	721
	Dec. Edward at Sluys confirms the same and the two charters	id.
1298	Jan. An English army is collected at York	718
	Truce for two years between Edward and Philip	721
	March. Edward arrives in England	718
	July 22. The battle of Falkirk; Edward ravages Scotland	718, 10
	Sept. Edward returns to England	719
1299	March. Edward attempts to introduce a new clause into the charters	722
	The charters are re-confirmed	id.
	July. Baliol is released from the Tower and goes to Normandy	721
	Sept. Edward marries Margaret of France; the Prince of Wales is contracted to Isabella of France	723
	Nov. An army is collected at Berwick	721
	The pope claims Scotland	id.
1300	Edward devastates Amundale	id.
1301	Parliament denies the authority of the pope in temporal matters	id.
	Edward marches against Scotland	id.
1302	Truce with the Scotch	id.
1303	John de Segrave is defeated by the Scotch	725
	May 20. A treaty of commerce is concluded; the treaty of Montreuil is ratified	723
	Edward goes to Scotland; receives the homages of many barons; Brechin surrenders	725
1304	He demands a tallage on all cities and boroughs	722
	Feb. Comyn and other nobles submit at Straththords	725
	April 22. Edward besieges the castle of Stirling	726
	July 20. It surrenders	id.
	Wallace is captured and brought to London	id.
	Robert Bruce dies	727
1305	Aug. 23. Wallace is executed as a traitor	726
1306	Feb. 10. Robert Bruce the younger slays Comyn	728

A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page
1306	March 27. He is crowned king of Scotland at Scone	728	1321	Aug. The Despencers are banished by parliament	740
	May 22. The prince of Wales is knighted	id.		Oct. They return to England	id.
	June 19. Battle of Methven; Bruce and his army are routed by the earl of Pembroke; he flies to Ireland	729	1322	The earl of Lancaster is defeated and taken prisoner at Boroughbridge	741
	Nigel Bruce surrenders Kildrummie, and is hanged at Berwick	id.		He is condemned and executed for treason	id.
1307	Feb. Thomas and Alexander Bruce are captured; they are executed at Carlisle	730		The elder Despencer is created earl of Winchester	id.
	May 10. Battle of Loudon Hill; Bruce defeats the earl of Pembroke; defeats the earl of Gloucester		1323	May 30. A suspension of arms for thirteen years agreed upon between England and Scotland	id.
	July 7. Edward dies at Burgh-upon-Sands	730		Roger Mortimer escapes from the Tower	id.
	— 8. Edward II. is acknowledged king at Carlisle	id.		Charles IV., king of France, overruns some of Edward's continental possessions	712
	Oct. 13. The Templars are seized throughout France	746	1325	March. Queen Isabella goes on a mission to Paris; Guienne and Poitiers are surrendered to France; the prince of Wales goes to France; Mortimer repairs to Paris; Edward demands her return; the prince of Wales is affianced to Philippa, daughter of the Count of Hainault	742
	— 27. Edward I. is buried at Westminster	731		Sept. 24. Isabella and the prince of Wales land with a small army at Orwell; she is joined by the barons; Edward flies, and takes ship with Despencer, and is driven on the coast of Wales	713
	Gaveston is made earl of Cornwall	id.		The elder Despencer is taken at Bristol; tried, sentenced, and executed as a traitor	id.
1308	Jan. 25. Edward marries Isabella of France at Boulogne	732		— 26. The prince of Wales declared by the barons guardian of the kingdom	711
	Feb. 24. He is crowned at Westminster	id.		Edward and the younger Despencer are captured; Despencer is executed at Hereford as a traitor; the king is sent to Kenilworth castle	id.
	Gaveston is expelled, but made governor of Ireland	id.	1327	Jan. 7. Parliament meets at Westminster	id.
	May 22. Bruce gains the battle of Inverary	735		— 8. Edward is deposed and the Prince of Wales proclaimed king	id.
	He extends his conquests, and a truce is made	id.		— 13. Edward III. presides in parliament	id.
	The Templars are seized throughout England and Ireland	747		— 20. Edward II. resigns the crown	id.
1309	Gaveston returns	732		— 21. Edward the Third's peace is proclaimed	715
	Oct. The barons refuse to attend a parliament summoned to meet at York	733		— 29. He is crowned at Westminster	id.
	The Templars of England are tried and condemned, and the order suppressed	717		Edward II. is removed to Berkeley castle	id.
1310	The barons meet at Westminster, and appoint a committee of ordainers	733		Feb. 3. The Scotch make an inroad into England; march as far as York; Edward marches against them	719
	May 12. Many of the Templars are executed in Paris, and the order is suppressed	746		Aug. The English and Scotch forces after skirmishes severally retire	719, 750
	Sept. Edward marches into Scotland	735		Sept. Edward II. is murdered at Berkeley castle, and buried in the Abbey at Gloucester	746
1311	July. Edward returns to England; Bruce ravages as far as Durham	id.		Parliament grants the queen 20,000 l. a year	718
	Aug. Parliament recalls the grants made by Edward to Gaveston; he is banished; parliament to be holden once every year	733		Dec. Philippa of Hainault arrives in England	751
	Dec. Gaveston again returns; his honours re-granted	id.	1328	Jan. 24. Edward marries her	id.
1312	Jan. Perth Castle is taken by Bruce	735		Peace is concluded with the Scots; the independence of Scotland recognised	id.
	May 19. Gaveston surrenders at Scarborough to the earl of Pembroke	733		July 22. The Princess Joanna, Edward's sister, is married to David, prince of Scotland	id.
	He is beheaded at Blacklow Hill	734		Oct. Mortimer is created Earl of March	id.
1313	March 7. Bruce takes Roxburgh Castle	736		Charles IV. of France dies	757
	— 14. Randolph takes Edinburgh Castle	id.	1329	Edward does homage to Philip VI. of France	id.
	Bruce again ravages Cumberland	id.		June. Robert Bruce, king of Scotland, dies at Cardross	751
	June 11. Edward marches into Scotland	id.	1330	March 11. Parliament meets at Winchester; the Earl of Kent is accused of treason	752
	— 23. Battle of Bannockburn; the English are driven out of Scotland	736-8		— 16. He is convicted	id.
1314	The Scotch ravage the north of England	738		— 19. He is executed near Winchester	752, 3
1315	May 25. Edward Bruce lands at Carrickfergus; takes and burns Dundalk and other towns	id.		June. Edward the Black Prince is born at Woodstock	753
1316	Jan. 26. He gains victories over the English	id.		Sept. A joust held in Chespeide by the king	id.
	May 2. He is crowned king of Ireland at Carrickfergus	id.		Oct. 19. Mortimer is dragged from Nottingham castle by Edward and his followers	754
	Bruce arrives and overruns the south of Ireland	739		Nov. 26. Parliament is assembled; Mortimer is impeached of murder and other crimes; found guilty	754, 5
1317	May. The two Bruces return to Ulster	id.		— 29. He is hanged at the Elms, and queen Isabella is committed to custody	755
1318	March 28. Berwick is taken by the Scotch	id.	1331	Lord James Douglas is killed in Spain	id.
	Bruce makes two invasions of England	id.		Edward again does homage to the king of France for his continental possessions	757
	Oct. 3. Edward Bruce is defeated and killed at Fagher, and the Scots are expelled from Ireland	id.
1319.	Edward marches an army into Scotland; the Scotch invade England; ravage Yorkshire	id.
	Sept. 28. The battle called the Chapter of Milton fought	id.
	Dec. Truce agreed upon for two years	id.
1321	The barons destroy the castles of the Despencers	740

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

15

A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page
1332	July. Murray, the regent of Scotland, dies Aug. Edward Baliol, son of king John Baliol, invades Scotland, and gains a victory at Duplin-moor Sept. 21. He is crowned king of Scotland at Scone He renews his oaths of fealty to Edward Dec. 16. He is obliged to fly from Scotland	755 id. 756 id. id.
1333	May. The English army invest Berwick July 13. Battle of Halidon-hill King David and his queen are removed to France; Edward Baliol is reinstated as king He does homage; surrenders Berwick and other places to Edward He is again driven across the border	id. id. id. id.
1335	Aug. Edward marches with an army into Scotland; is joined by Baliol; returns to England	id.
1336	Edward twice again marches into Scotland	id.
1337	Oct. 7. Edward sends a commission to the Earl of Brabant, and others, to demand the French crown as his right	758
1338	July 15. He sails from Orwerp for Antwerp He grants trading privileges to the Flemings and Brabanters Baliol is again expelled from Scotland	id. id. 759
1339	Sept. Edward marches with his army into France; is abandoned by his allies He assumes the title of king of France, and quarters the French arms	758 id.
1340	Feb. Edward returns to England June 22. He sails with a fleet for Sluys — 21. Destroys the French fleet; is joined by his allies; challenges the French king to single combat; returns to England Nov. Edward imprisons three of the judges and other officers	id. 759 759 id. id.
1341	May 11. David, king of Scots and his queen return from France; Edward concludes a truce with him John III. duke of Brittany dies The English fleet relieve Hennebon in Brittany Edward sails to Hennebon Philip VI. beheads Olivier de Clisson and 12 other knights without trial	id. id. 761 762 id.
1345	The Earl of Derby drives the French out of Guienne John Van Artevelde is murdered at Ghent	763 id.
1346	July. Edward lands at Cape La Hogue with an army of English, Welsh, and Irish; he takes several towns; burns St. Germain, St. Cloud, and Neuilly; he forces the passage of Blanche-Taque Aug. 26. Battle of Crecy gained by the Black Prince Death of the King of Bohemia — 31. Edward begins the siege of Calais Sept. David of Scotland invades England; takes several places Oct. 17. Battle of Nevil's Cross King David is taken prisoner, and sent to London	761 765-7 768 id. id. id. id.
1347	June 18. The English drive the French from before Roche-Derrien; capture Charles de Blois, and send him prisoner to England Aug. 3. Calais is surrendered to Edward Margaret of Calais is born	768, 9 769, 770 770
1348	The French attempt to recover Calais Nov. The plague ravages London	771 id.
1349	Edward gains a naval victory over the Spaniards	id.
1350	Philip King of France dies, and is succeeded by John I.	id.
1355	Edward opens the campaign in France; he ravages a great part of the country. The Scots retake Berwick. Edward returns to England	id.
1356	Jan. Edward recovers Berwick	772

A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page
1356	Jan. 20. Purchases all Baliol's rights to the Scotch throne. He burns Haddington and Edinburgh, and wastes the country. "The burnt Cauldennas" July. The Black Prince ravages as far as Berri Sept. 19. Battle of Poitiers. King John and his son Philip are taken prisoners	772 id. 772, 3
1357	April 24. The Black Prince, King John, and Prince Philip enter London Oct. 3. The Scots ransom King David Nov. He returns to Scotland	773 774 id.
1358	Stephen Marsel heads an insurrection in Paris	771, 5
1359	Edward goes to France with a great army; lays siege to Rheims; raises it and retires to Burgundy A French fleet take and plunder the town of Winchelsea	775 id.
1360	March 31. Edward encamps before Paris April. Marches to Brittany May. The peace of Breigny concluded. Edward renounces his pretensions to the crown of France King John is sent to Calais to ratify the treaty Oct. 21. The two kings swear to the treaty. King John is set at liberty, and Edward returns to England	id. id. id. id. id.
1362	Queen Joanna of Scotland dies	774
1363	David proposes to the Parliament of Scotland that the Earl of Cambridge should succeed to the crown Edward Baliol dies	id. id.
1364	The Duke of Anjou breaks his parole and leaves Calais King John returns to England April. Dies at the Savoy Palace	776 id. id.
1365	Truce agreed on between England and Scotland	771
1366	Peter the Cruel, king of Castile, is expelled from his kingdom Richard of Bourdeaux, son of the Black Prince, is born	776 780
1367	April 3. The Black Prince, the Duke of Lancaster, and Peter the Cruel, defeat Don Enrique, and Peter is rebated on the throne July. The Black Prince returns to Guienne Don Enrique stabs Peter and regains the throne Charles V., of France, invades Aquitaine Edward re-assumes his title of King of France	777 id. id. id. 778
1369	Queen Philippa dies The Black Prince besieges Limoges and massacres the inhabitants. He returns to England	779 778
1371	David, king of Scotland, dies Accession of Robert II.	774 id.
1372	June. The English fleet, under the Earl of Pembroke, captured by the Spaniards near Rochelle	778
1371	Truce concluded between England and France	779
1376	Several of the ministers are removed and imprisoned Women forbidden to be guilty of "maintenance" June 8. The Black Prince dies He is buried in Canterbury Cathedral Prince Richard is acknowledged by Parliament heir to the throne The Speaker of the Commons is arrested, and William of Wickham, Bishop of Winchester, dismissed the court	id. id. id. id. id. id.
1377	The Duke of Lancaster supports Wycliffe, and causes a riot in London. The Savoy Palace is plundered Feb. General amnesty proclaimed June 21. King Edward dies June 22. Accession of Richard the Second July 16. Richard is crowned at Westminster August. The French and Spaniards plunder and waste the Isle of Wight, Hastings, and Rye Alice Perrers is banished	id. id. 781 782 id. id. 783

A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IV.	Page
1378	Cherbourg is taken by the English; fourteen of the Spanish ships are captured; the harbour of Brest is ceded to the English.	763	1385	The French prepare to invade England; several of their ships are taken.	792
	John Mercer takes all the English ships in the port of Scarborough. John Philpot recovers the ships; takes the Spanish fleet, and captures Mercer.	id.	1386	The earl of Suffolk is dismissed; the duke of Gloucester is appointed head of a regency.	id.
	October. Parliament grants the king a new aid. Some parts of Kent and Essex refuse to pay a poll-tax.	785	1387	Aug. The commission of regency declared illegal.	id.
	The people of Fobbing drive away one of the commissioners.	id.		Nov. 17. The duke of Gloucester enters London; appeals the king's adherents of treason.	id.
	The peasants drive away the chief justice of the pleas, and behead the jurors sent to try the rioters.	id.	1388	The "wonderful parliament" confirm the impeachments; the duke of Gloucester causes the execution of Sir Simon Burley, and three other knights.	793
	Jack Straw raises an insurrection in Essex, Kent, Suffolk, and Norfolk.	id.		Aug. 15. The battle of Otterbourne (Chevy Chase).	id.
	A tax-gatherer killed by Wat Tyler.	id.	1389	May. Richard assumes the government.	793, 4
1381	He enters Canterbury.	id.	1390	April 19. Robert II., king of Scots, dies, and is succeeded by Robert III.	794
	June 11. The rebels encamp at Blackheath.	786		Gloucester is reconciled; Lancaster is created duke of Aquitaine for life.	id.
	— 12. Richard goes to the Tower.	id.	1394	Truce with France concluded for four years.	id.
	The rebels plunder several places, and enter London; the prisons are demolished, and murders are committed.	id.		June. Queen Anne dies at Shene.	id.
	— 14. Richard meets the rebels at Mile-End; the rebels of Kent enter the Tower.	787		Richard marches into Ireland.	id.
	Wat Tyler is slain in Smithfield.	id.	1396	October. Richard goes to France, and marries Isabella, daughter of Charles VI.	id.
	The rebellion is repressed, and a general pardon is granted.	788		July. Richard arrests Warwick, Arundel, and Gloucester; Gloucester is sent to Calais.	id.
	Philip Van Artevelde raises the siege of Ghent.	790		Sept. Arundel is impeached and beheaded.	795
1382	Richard is married to Anne of Bohemia, daughter of the Emperor Charles IV.	789-790		Gloucester dies at Calais; Warwick is imprisoned.	id.
	Nov. Philip Van Artevelde is defeated at the battle of Rosebeque, and is slain.	790		Bolingbroke is created duke of Hereford; the earl of Nottingham and John Holland are created dukes of Norfolk and Exeter.	id.
	The Bishop of Norwich invades Flanders.	id.		Parliament grants the king a subsidy on wool for life.	id.
1384	The duke of Lancaster is accused of treason by John Latimer; Latimer is murdered.	791	1398	January. Norfolk challenges Hereford.	796
1385	A French army lands in Scotland; an inroad is made into England; Richard defeats the French and Scots; burns Edinburgh, Perth, and other towns; the king's mother dies; Henry of Bolingbroke is made earl of Derby; the earls of Cambridge and Buckingham created dukes of York and Gloucester; Pole created earl of Suffolk; Robert de Vere created duke of Ireland; Roger earl of March declared successor to the crown.	id.		Sept. 16. Norfolk is banished for life, and Hereford for ten years.	id.
	July. The duke of Lancaster invades Castile; gains many battles; his daughter is married to the heir of the king of Castile.	id.		Dec. The duke of Lancaster dies, and Richard seizes his estates.	id.
			1399	May. Richard sails for Ireland.	797
				July. Hereford lands at Ravenspur.	id.
				The duke of York goes to St. Albans; Hereford is received in London; he takes Bristol Castle; Richard lands at Milford Haven; flies to Conway; he is captured and taken to Flint; he is carried prisoner to Chester.	id.
				He escapes from Lichfield; is retaken; sent to the Tower.	798
				Sept. 30. Parliament meets; Richard renounces the crown; an act of deposition is passed; Hereford is acknowledged king.	799-800

BOOK V.

A.D.	BOOK V.	Page	A.D.	BOOK V.	Page
	Henry calls a parliament in six days.	4		Prince Henry is created Prince of Wales, Duke of Guienne, Lancaster, and Cornwall, and Earl of Chester, and is declared heir apparent to the throne.	id.
	Oct. 1. A deputation wait upon Richard in the Tower to renounce fealty to him.	5		Edmund Mortimer and his brother are lodged in Windsor Castle.	id.
	— 6. Parliament meets.	id.		The Earl of Salisbury plots the restoration of Richard.	id.
	— 13. Henry IV. is crowned in Westminster Abbey.	id.		A statute for burning heretics is passed.	22
	The attainders of Arundel and Warwick are reversed. The Dukes of Albemarle, Surrey, and Exeter, the Marquess of Dorset, and the Earl of Gloucester are reduced to their former rank of Earls of Rutland, Kent, Huntingdon, and Somerset, and Lord le Despencer.		1400	Jan. 3. A tournament is held at Oxford, at which it is intended to assassinate Henry and his sons.	6, 7
	— 23. The lords agree that Richard shall be privately removed to safe custody.	6		— 4. The conspirators surprise Windsor Castle; they raise different parts of the country and proclaim King Richard; they are all captured and killed.	7
	He is removed to Leeds and several other castles.	id.		King Richard is murdered at Pontefract Castle.	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

A.D.	BOOK V.	Page	A.D.	BOOK V.	Page
1400	The Dukes of Bourbon and Burgundy endeavour to unite the continental dominions of Henry to France	8	1406	The French take sixty castles and fortresses in Guienne and Saintonge; Isabella, widow of Richard II., is married to the Count of Angoulême; the French endeavour to retake Calais	19, 20
	Charles V. of France demands his daughter, the widow of Richard, and her dower and jewels	9		Nov. 23. The Duke of Orleans is murdered in Paris	20
	She is sent to Calais to the Duke of Burgundy Henry collects an army; demands of the King of Scots to do him homage; he marches to Edinburgh, but is repulsed by the Duke of Rothsay	id.	1408	The Earl of Northumberland and Lord Haroldph take several castles in Northumberland	19
	Owen Glendower heads an insurrection in Wales	9, 10		Feb. 28. They are defeated and slain at Branham Moor	id.
1101	Feb. Henry goes into Wales against Glendower	10		June. The Duke of Burgundy is expelled	20
1102	Feb. 10. The Count de Ligny sends a letter of defiance and hostility to Henry	id.		Isabella, ex-queen of England, wife of the Duke of Orleans, dies	21
	Sir Roger de Clarendon and others are executed as traitors for asserting Richard to be alive	11	1409	The quarrel of the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleans is arranged	20, 21
	March. The Duke of Rothsay is imprisoned and murdered in Falkland Castle	19-131	1411	Henry sends a force to aid the Duke of Burgundy; his partisans enter Paris	21
	June. A Scottish army enter England; are defeated at Nesbit Moor; Earl Douglas ravages England as far as Newcastle	11-131		July 21. The Earl of Mar defeats the Lord of the Isles at the Battle of Harlaw	132
	Aug. The Duke of Orleans challenges Henry and a hundred knights	12, 13		The treaty of Lochgillitic the Lord of the Isles acknowledges himself a vassal of the Scottish crown	132
	Sept. 14. Battle of Homildon Hill; Douglas is captured	11-131	1412	Henry is acknowledged lawful Duke of Aquitaine	21
	Glendower gains the battles of Wornwy and Knyghton, and captures Sir Edmund Mortimer	id.		The Duke of Clarence lands with an army in Normandy; he marches through France	22
1103	Insurrection of the Percies of Northumberland Douglas is liberated; the right of the Earl of March first insisted on	13		May 17. Truce concluded between England and Scotland	132
	July 21. Battle of Shrewsbury; Hotspur is killed	14, 15	1413	March 20. Henry dies in the Jerusalem Chamber	23
	The Earl of Northumberland submits	15		— 21. Accession of Henry V.; he is proclaimed	21
	The Prince of Wales defeats Glendower in some skirmishes	id.		April 9. He is crowned	id.
	The French ravage the coast: take Guernsey and Jersey, and attack and burn Plymouth.			The body of Richard II. is removed from the Friar's Church, Langley, and buried in Westminster Abbey. Henry releases the Earl of March	25
1104	Ward, a Scotelman, personates Richard; a plot is formed against Henry; it is suppressed; Serle, the contriver of it, is hanged	16		Sir John Oldecastle is accused of heresy	id.
	Oct. 6. The "Parliamentum inductorum" held; the king wishes to alienate a portion of the church property	id.		Is committed to the Tower; is sentenced to be burnt; escapes from the Tower; endeavours to take the king at Eltham palace	id.
1105	The Earl of March and his brother escape from Windsor Castle; they are retaken; the Duke of York is seized and his estates sequestered	id.		The butchers of Paris raise an insurrection	26
	An insurrection again breaks out in the north	17		July 1. They behead the provost of Paris	id.
	Prince John defeats the rebels	id.	1414	Jan. 7. The king takes some of the Lollards in St. Giles's Fields and at Haregay Park	25
	The Archbishop of York, the Earl of Nottingham, and others, captured at Shipton-on-the-Moor; they are beheaded at Pontefract	id.		— 13. The Lollards are hanged and burnt in St. Giles's Fields	26
	The Lords Hastings, Falconbridge, and others tried, convicted, and executed for treason at Durham	id.		Others are captured and many executed	id.
	Berwick surrenders to Henry, who puts the governor and others to death	id.		Murdoch, the son of the Duke of Albany, is liberated	132
	Henry seizes the castles of the Earl of Northumberland	id.		Henry demands the crown of France	26
	March. The Prince of Wales defeats the Welsh at Grosmont; takes Lampeter Castle	id.	1415	April 16. He announces to a council at Westminster his determination to invade France; appoints the Duke of Bedford regent	24
	— 30. Henry captures the heir apparent of Scotland, and sends him to Peversey Castle	19-131		The Earl of Cambridge, Lord Scrope, and Sir Thomas Masham are executed for treason	29
	A French fleet appear in Milford Haven; the English destroy many of the ships; the French burn Haverfordwest; take Carmarthen; the French abandon the Welsh and return to their ships	18		Henry sails from Southampton	id.
	The Prince of Wales subdues South Wales	id.		Aug. 14. lands near Harfleur	id.
1406	April 4. Robert III., king of Scotland, dies at Rothsay Castle	131		— 17. Besieges Harfleur	id.
	James Earl of Carrick is declared king, and Albany regent			Sept. 22. It is surrendered to him; challenges the dauphin	id.
				Oct. 6. Henry begins his march; passes through Normandy	id.
				— 12. He reaches the ford of Blanche Taque	29, 30
				— 14. Attempts to pass the Somme at Port St. Remy; is repulsed; is several times repulsed	30
				— 19. Passes between Betencourt and Voyenne	id.
				Oct. 25. The battle of Agincourt	30, 1, 2, 3, 4
				Henry marches to Calais	31
				The dauphin dies	36
				Henry sails for England	34
				Parliament grant him for life a subsidy on wool and leather	id.

A.D.	BOOK V.	Page	A.D.	BOOK V.	Page
1416	Sigismund, king of the Romans, and the Count of Holland, visit England	34, 5	1422	The Duke of Bedford is appointed regent of France	53, 4
	The French besiege Harfleur	35, 6		Oct. Charles VI. of France dies	64
	Aug. 15. The Duke of Bedford sails from Rye; he gains a victory over the French and Genoese fleets; raises the siege of Harfleur; returns to England	35		The dauphin is proclaimed by his party Charles VII.	id.
	Sept. Henry, the king of the Romans, and the Count of Holland, hold a congress at Calais	36		He is crowned and anointed at Poitiers	id.
1417	The dauphin dies at Compeigne	37		The Duke of Bedford proclaims Henry VI. at Paris, and fealty is sworn to him as king of France	id.
	Aug. Henry lands at Tonque; conquers many places in Normandy; the French sue for peace	38		The Duke of Bedford marries Anne of Burgundy	id.
	The Scots invade England; "the foul raid"	38, 132		He gains a victory over the French and Scotch before Crevant	id.
	Sir John Oldcastle is captured; tried as a traitor before the House of Lords	38		The English under John de la Pole are defeated at La Gravelle	55
	Dec. He is hanged and burnt in St. Giles's fields	id.		The Count de Richemont deserts from the English	56
1418	Henry besieges and takes various towns	39	1423	The dauphin's army is increased by further Scotch troops; the Earl of Douglas is created Duke of Touraine	id.
	July. Henry completes the conquest of Lower Normandy	id.		Feb. 24. James, king of Scotland, marries Lady Joanna Beaufort	132
	— 14. The Queen of France and the Duke of Burgundy enter Paris	42		He is released from his imprisonment in England	56
	— 30. Henry commences the siege of Rouen	39		April 5. He arrives in Scotland	133
1419	Jan. 16. He enters Rouen; completes the conquest of Normandy	43		May 21. He is crowned with his queen at Spoue	id.
	May 30. He meets the Queen of France and the Duke of Burgundy near Meulan; agreements entered into for peace	44		The Duke of Bedford besieges and takes Ivry in Normandy	56
	The Duke of Burgundy and the dauphin join against the English	44, 5		Edmund Mortimer, earl of March, dies	89
	The Duke of Burgundy is assassinated at Montereau	46		Aug. 17. Battle of Verneuil	56, 7
	July 27. Henry takes Pontoise	45		The Duke of Gloucester, and Jacqueline of Hainault, his wife, take possession of Mous	58
	Sept. 3. The Regent Albany dies at Stirling palace	132	1425	Gloucester returns to England; the Duke of Brittany abandons the English; he is defeated, and forced to swear to the treaty of Troyes	id.
1420	Negotiations are again entered into with Henry	47		Queen Catherine marries Owen Tudor	80
	The treaty of Troyes is executed	id.	1427	The Duke of Brabant, first husband of Jacqueline, dies	59
	June 2. Henry is married to the Princess Catherine of France	id.		The King of Scotland executes several high-land chiefs	133
	— 4. He marches to Sens, which he reduces	48	1428	The Duke of Gloucester's marriage is declared void; he marries Eleanor Cobham	59
	Takes Montereau, Villeneuve-le-Roy, and besieges Melun	id.		March 21. The King of Scotland arrests several great lords	133
	Nov. 18. Melun surrenders	id.		May. They are executed	id.
	Dec. Henry and King Charles enter Paris; the two queens enter Paris	id.		Oct. 12. The siege of Orleans is commenced by the Earl of Salisbury	60
	— 6. The treaty of Troyes is ratified	id.		— 23. Takes the fortress of Tournelles	id.
1421	Jan. Henry leaves Paris; returns to London	id.		Nov. The Earl of Salisbury is wounded, and dies	1
	Catherine is crowned Queen of England at Westminster	id.	1429	Feb. The battle of Herrings fought at Rouvrai	id.
	March 22. The Duke of Clarence is slain in Anjou	id.		The Maid of Orleans is introduced to Charles at Chinon	62
	The Earl of Buchan is made constable of France by the Dauphin Charles	49		She carries succours into Orleans	65
	The English parliament ratify the treaty of Troyes	id.		She heads a sortie; the battle of Saint-Loup is carried; she attacks Tournelles; is wounded; Tournelles is captured; the siege is raised	66, 7
	James, king of Scotland, is released from Windsor Castle	id.		May 8. The fortress of Jargeau is taken; Suffolk is made prisoner	68
	June 12. The English and Scottish army land at Calais; several victories are gained	id.		The English are defeated at the battle of Patay	68
	The King of Scots besieges Dreux	id.		Troyes is surrendered to Charles	69
	Oct. Henry besieges Meaux	id.		July 15. He enters Rheims with the Maid of Orleans	id.
	Dec. 6. The Queen is delivered of a son at Windsor	50		— 17. He is anointed and crowned in the cathedral	id.
1422	May. Meaux is taken, and the bastard of Vaurus hanged	50		Many places submit to him	70, 71
	— 21. Queen Catherine lands at Harfleur	id.		The army of Charles attack Paris; they are repulsed; the Maid is wounded	72
	June. Henry and Catherine keep their court at the palace of the Louvre	id.	1430	May 25. The Maid relieves Compeigne; makes a sortie; she is captured by the troops of the Duke of Burgundy	73, 4
	July. Henry marches to relieve Cosne; is carried back to Corbeil	id.		Henry is crowned at Westminster	77
	Aug. 31. Henry dies at Vincennes	51	1431	The Maid is sent to Rouen; she is tried for heresy, and sentenced to perpetual imprisonment	75, 6
	His body is carried in state through France; is embarked at Calais; landed at Dover, and buried at Westminster	id.		May 24. She abjures	id.
	The Duke of Gloucester is appointed protector	52

A. D.	BOOK V.	Page	A. D.	BOOK V.	Page
1431	May 31. She is burnt in the market-place Nov. Henry is crowned in Notre Dame in Paris by Cardinal Beaufort	76; 77	1452	The people of Guienne revolt against the French; the Earl of Shrewsbury goes to Bourdeaux; makes the garrison prisoners	91
1432	Many of the Highland captives are put to death by the King of Scots Nov. The Duchess of Bedford, sister of the Duke of Burgundy, dies	133 77	1453	Queen Margaret is delivered of a son; he is created Prince of Wales, and Earl of Chester The earl gains many victories; he is slain; Bour- deaux is retaken; the English return	92 91
1433	May. The Duke of Bedford marries Jacquetta of Luxembourg	id.	1454	The Duke of Somerset is sent to the Tower Feb. The Duke of York opens Parliament as lieutenant for the king; he is elected protector The king resumes his authority; liberates the Duke of Somerset	id. 91, 2 93
1434	Sept. 14. The Duke of Bedford, dies at Rouen	79	May 22. The Duke of York takes St. Albans, and captures Henry; the Duke of Somerset and many other nobles are slain York is again declared protector	id. 93
1435	A congress is held at Arras, and a treaty of peace signed between the king of France and the Duke of Burgundy	78	1450	Henry again resumes his authority March 25. The Lancastrians and Yorkists are reconciled	id. id.
1436	Isabella, the queen-mother, dies April. Paris and other towns surrender to the French king The Duke of York is appointed regent of France The Earl of Shrewsbury reduces the revolted towns of Normandy; takes Pontoise The Duke of Gloucester raises the siege of Calais The Scotch besiege Roxburgh; king James sud- denly returns to Scotland	79 79 id. id. 80 131	1459	Sept. The Yorkists gain a great victory at Blore- heath Oct. 13. Sir Andrew Trollop deserts to the king — 14. York breaks up his camp and retreats to Ireland Nov. 20. He and his adherents are attainted in parliament The sailors of the fleet at Calais desert, and take their ships to the Earl of Warwick; he sails to Dublin	94 id. id. id.
1437	The Duke of Burgundy is defeated before Crotuy The Duke of York is recalled; the Earl of War- wick is appointed to command The King of Scotland is assassinated	80 id. 131	1460	June. Warwick lands in Kent; he enters Lon- don with the son of York. Battle of Northampton; Henry is taken prisoner July. James II. of Scotland is killed at the siege of Roxburgh Oct. 16. The Duke of York returns to London; he demands the crown — 23. It is agreed in the upper house that Henry shall continue king, and on his death York shall succeed	95 id. 135 95
1439	The Earl of Warwick dies; York is reappointed The Earl of Shrewsbury recovers Harflour The plague and famine ravage England and France	80 id. id.	Dec. 31. Battle of Wakefield; York is slain The earl of Rutland, his second son, is stabbed by Lord Clifford	96 id.
1431	The Duchess of Gloucester is accused of treason and sorcery; is condemned to perpetual im- prisonment Roger Bolingbroke and Margery Jourdain are executed	83 id.	1461	The earl of March succeeds his father as Duke of York Feb. 1. Battle of Mortimer's Cross; Owen Tud- or is taken, and with others is beheaded Queen Margaret defeats the earl of Warwick Feb. 17. Battle of Barnet; second battle of St. Albans; King Henry is retaken by the queen — 25. The Duke of York enters London Mar. 1. He is elected king in St. John's field — 1. He claims the crown at Westminster; he is proclaimed king — 10. The bishop of Exeter is made chancellor — 24. Battle of Towton; Henry, Queen Mar- garet, and the Prince of Wales, fly to Scotland June 29. Edward IV. is crowned at Westmin- ster; his brothers, George and Richard, are created dukes of Clarence and Gloucester The Scots besiege Carlisle; they are defeated Nov. 4. Parliament assemble; Edward's title is declared valid, and the Lancastrian kings pronounced usurpers; their adherents are attainted, and their estates bestowed upon Yorkists	83 id. id. 95, 6 96 id. id. 98 102 98, 9 99 id. 100
1441	Truce agreed on for two years Anjou and Maine are agreed to be given up to the Duke of Anjou on the marriage of his daughter Margaret with King Henry; the Earl of Suffolk is made a marquis	id. id. 81	Dec. Bamboorough and Dunstanburgh sur- render	id.
1447	Feb. 11. The Duke of Gloucester is arrested for treason — 28. He is found dead in bed The Marquis of Suffolk seizes his estates James II. of Scotland marries Mary of Gueldres April 11. Cardinal Beaufort dies at Walsesey	83 84 135 84	1463	Jan. Ahnwick Castle capitulates to Warwick Henry is conveyed to Wales; Margaret goes to Flanders	100 id.
1449	Rouen is taken by the Count of Dunois Nov. 4. The citadel surrenders The power of the Livingstons is destroyed in Scotland The Duke of York suppresses an insurrection in Ireland	85 id. 135 89	1464	April 25. King Henry is brought back to Eng- land; the Lancastrians again take the field; they are defeated at Hedgley Moor	101
1450	Jan. The Duke of Suffolk is committed to the Tower March. He is impeached; is banished by the king May 5. He is beheaded in a boat in the Channel The English are defeated at Fourmigni Aug. 12. Cherbourg is besieged; surrenders to the French; the whole of Normandy is lost	86 87 87 85 id.
1451	Various towns surrender to the French; Bour- deaux, Bayonne, and Fronsac capitulate Jack Cade raises an insurrection in Kent June. He encamps on Blackheath — 24. He defeats the royal troops at Sevenoaks July 4. He beheads the Lord Say in Cheapside Cade is slain by Alexander Iden Aug. The Duke of York returns to England Nov. It is proposed in parliament that he shall be declared heir to the throne	id. 88 id. id. 89 id. 90
1452	Feb. The Earl of Douglas is assassinated at Stirling York levies an army; he disbands it; is made prisoner and sent to London March 10. He makes his submission; retires to Wigmore	135 90 90

A.D.	BOOK V.	Page	A.D.	BOOK V.	Page
1164	May 1. Edward marries the widow of Sir John Gray	101	1475	Edward contracts an alliance with the Dukes of Brittany and Burgundy; he demands the crown of France of Louis XI.	111
	— 15. Battle of Hexham; Sir Ralph Gray is degraded and beheaded; other Lancastrians are executed.	id.		Edward raises money by benevolences	112
	Sept. 29. At a meeting of the great council at Reading, Edward acknowledges his marriage	id.		June 22. He lands at Calais with a great army	id.
	Dec. The Council at Westminster settle 4000 marks a-year on her	id.		Aug. 22. He meets Louis on a bridge across the Somme, at Picquigny; a treaty is concluded	113
1165	The Duke of Luxemburg comes to England to the coronation of his niece	id.	1476	The Duchess of Clarence dies; some of the duke's servants are executed for sorcery	114
	May 25. Elizabeth is carried through the streets of London	102		Clarence is committed to the Tower	id.
	— 26. She is crowned at Westminster	id.	1478	Jan. 16. Parliament is summoned. Clarence is accused of witchcraft and other crimes	id.
	The queen's relations are advanced.	id.		Feb. 7. He is found guilty, and sentenced to death	id.
1167	The Earl of Warwick goes to Normandy to negotiate a marriage between the son of Louis XI. of France and the Princess Margaret	103		— 18. He dies, or is killed, in the Tower	id.
	Edward marries his sister Margaret to the Duke of Burgundy	id.	1480	The Duke of Gloucester commands the army in Scotland	115
	The Nevilles are expelled from court	id.		The Earl of Mar is accused of witchcraft	115
1168	Warwick again appears at court	id.	1482	The Duke of Albany, after escaping to France, returns; assumes the title of Alexander, king of Scotland; agrees to accept the crown as a gift from King Edward	136
1469	The duke of Clarence marries Isabella, daughter of Warwick, at Calais	104		June. Treaty of Fotheringay is executed between Edward and Albany. The Duke of Gloucester takes the town of Berwick. The Earl of Angus hangs the nobles of King James at the bridge of Lauder; James is taken to Edinburgh	117, 136
	Insurrection in Yorkshire; Edward advances against the insurgents; retreats to Nottingham Castle	id.		July. Albany and Gloucester march into Edinburgh	115
	July 26. Battle of Edgecote; the Earl of Pembroke is slain; the father and brother of Queen Elizabeth are captured and beheaded at Northampton	id.		Aug. King James is liberated; Albany is appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom	115, 136
	Warwick returns to England; Edward is confined in Middleham Castle	id.		Louis XI. affiances the dauphin to the daughter of the Duchess of Burgundy	116
	Nov. The Scotch rise in favour of King Henry; Edward is released; an amnesty is agreed on	id.	1183	April 9. King Edward dies; is buried at Windsor	id.
1170	The faction of the Boyls are banished from Scotland by James III.	135		Gloucester returns from Scotland; he collects the nobility and others at York; they swear fealty to Edward V.	118
	Mar. 12. The battle of Eppingham; Edward defeats the Lancastrians; Warwick and Clarence take refuge in Normandy	101, 5		— 22. He arrives at Northampton; the Lord Richard Gray, Earl Rivers, and the Duke of Buckingham meet him	id.
	June. Queen Margaret and Warwick meet at Amboise	105		— 23. He places Rivers, Gray, and Sir Thomas Vaughan under arrest	id.
	The Prince of Wales is married to Anne, the second daughter of Warwick	id.		Sends them to Pontefract Castle	id.
	Sept. 13. Warwick lands on the coast of Devonshire	106		Queen Elizabeth takes sanctuary with the Duke of York and her daughters at Westminster	id.
	Edward takes ship and sails for Holland; he runs ashore at Alkmaar; he proceeds to the Hague	107		The mayor and sheriff meet King Edward	119
	Oct. 6. Warwick enters London; releases King Henry from the Tower; Queen Elizabeth takes refuge in the Sanctuary at Westminster; is there delivered of a son	id.		May. Edward is conveyed to the Tower	id.
1471	March 12. Edward appears with a fleet off the Wash in Lincolnshire	108		— 22. Gloucester is appointed Protector	id.
	— 16. He lands at Ravenspur; he swears not to attempt to gain the crown; he reaches London	id.		June 13. Lord Hastings is arrested	120
	April 30. Second battle of Barnet; Warwick is slain; King Henry is again sent to the Tower; Queen Margaret and the Prince of Wales land at Plymouth	id. , 100		He is beheaded; others of the council are thrown into prison	121
	May 4. Battle of Tewkesbury; the queen and prince are taken prisoners; the prince is murdered	id.		— 14. Rivers, Gray, and Vaughan are beheaded	id.
	— 14. Thomas Nevil attempts the release of King Henry	110		— 16. The Duke of York is carried to the Tower	id.
	— 21. Edward enters London	id.		June Shore does penance	id.
	— 22. King Henry is found dead in the Tower. He is buried at Chertsey	id.		Dr. Shaw preaches at Paul's Cross	id.
1472	Prince Edward is created Prince of Wales, and acknowledged heir to the throne	111		June 25. The crown is offered to Gloucester at Baynard's Castle	122
	The Duke of Gloucester marries the widow of the Prince of Wales, slain at Tewkesbury	111		— 26. He appears in Westminster Hall; rides to St. Paul's, and is received by the clergy	123
	The king divides the property of Warwick between Clarence and Gloucester	id.		July 6. Gloucester is crowned King of England as Richard III., with his wife Anne, at Westminster	124
1474	This division declared valid by parliament	id.		They are again crowned at York	id.
				Edward V. and the Duke of York are murdered	125, 314
				The Earl of Richmond is invited into England	126
				Aug. 30. Louis XI. of France dies, and is succeeded by Charles VIII.	292
				Oct. Richard summons a meeting of his adherents at Leicester	126
				— 18. The insurrection in favour of Richmond breaks out; he is proclaimed king in Exeter and other places	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

21

A.D.	BOOK V.	Page	A.D.	BOOK V.	Page
1483	Oct. The Duke of Buckingham is captured and beheaded	127	1485	The Earl of Richmond collects a fleet at Harfleur; Richard issues a proclamation against him	128
	Nov. 11. Parliament recognises Richard's title; his son Edward is declared Prince of Wales	id.		Aug. 7. Richmond lands at Milford Haven
1484	The Prince of Wales dies suddenly at Middleham Castle	id.		— 22. Battle of Bosworth Field; Richard is slain	129
	Queen Elizabeth appears at the court of Richard	id.		Henry VII. is crowned on the field of battle	id.
1485	Queen Anne dies	128		Richard is buried at the Grey Friars in Leicester	130

BOOK VI.

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1485	The Earl of Warwick, son of the Duke of Clarence, is removed from Sheriff-Hutton to the Tower	281	1488	July 20. The English and Breton army under Sir Edward Woodville and the Duke of Orleans are defeated between Andouillé and St. Aubin du Cormier; Woodville is slain; the Duke is taken prisoner; several are executed	294
	Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV., is removed from the same place to London	id.		Aug. The Duke of Brittany signs the treaty of Verger	295
	Aug. 27. Henry enters London	id.		Sept. 7. Francis, duke of Brittany, dies	id.
	Sept. 21. The sweating sickness breaks out in London	282		James IV. gains the battle of Talla Moss	303
	Oct. 28. Jasper, earl of Pembroke, is made Duke of Bedford; Lord Stanley and Sir Edward Courtney are made Earls of Derby and Devonshire	282	1489	Parliament grant 75,000 l. to carry on the war in Brittany; Lord Willoughby de Broke lands with a small army	295
	Oct. 30. Henry VII. is crowned at Westminster. The yeomen of the guard established	283		An insurrection breaks out in the northern counties of England; it is suppressed by the Earl of Surrey	196
	Nov. 7. Parliament meets; the king's title is admitted	id.		John à Chambre and his confederates are hanged at York	id.
	Attainders are passed on Richard and his adherents. Henry dates his reign from the day before the battle of Bosworth	283, 4		Sir Andrew Wood beats the English in sea-fights off Dunbar and St. Abbs	303, 4
	Catesby and others are executed	284	1490	Maximilian, king of the Romans, marries Anne, duchess of Brittany, by proxy	196
	The crown is settled on Henry VII. and the heirs of his body	id.	1491	Dec. 6. She is married at the castle of Langeais, in Touraine, to Charles VIII. of France	298
	All grants from the crown since 34 Henry VI. are resumed; an act of grace is published by the king	285		Perkin Warbeck lands at Cork, and declares himself the Duke of York, son of Edward IV.	299
1486	Jan. 18. Henry marries Elizabeth of York; union of the houses of York and Lancaster	id.	1492	Henry proceeds to France; lays siege to Boulogne
	Pope Innocent III. gives a dispensation for the marriage, acknowledging Henry's title	286		Oct. 27. A council is held, and peace proposed with France	298, 9
	Humphrey and Thomas Stafford are executed for treason	287		Nov. The treaty of Estaples is signed	298, 9
	Henry goes to York and other towns	id.	1494	Many persons are arrested for countenancing Warbeck	300
	June. Treaty of peace with Scotland	id.		Charles VIII. of France marches into Italy to enforce his claim as King of the Two Sicilies	311
	Sept. 20. The queen is delivered of a son, he is named Arthur	id.	1495	Feb. 15. Sir William Stanley is executed for treason	301
	Nov. Lambert Simnel, the pretended Earl of Warwick, appears in Dublin, with Simon, the priest of Oxford	id.		July 3. Warbeck lands at Deal; the people rise against him; his adherents are sent to London; he escapes to Flanders; the rebels are all executed	id.
	The king proclaims a general pardon	288	1496	Treaty of commerce signed between England and Flanders; Warbeck retreats to Scotland	id.
	The queen dowager is committed prisoner to the monastery of Bermondsey	id.		Warbeck is married to Lady Catherine Gordon, daughter of the Earl of Huntley	305
	The Marquis of Dorset is sent to the Tower	id.		A treaty is concluded between King James and Warbeck	id.
	The Earl of Warwick is paraded through the streets of London	id.		King James invades England with Warbeck and an army of Scots, Germans, and Flemings; they retire	306
	John de la Pole, earl of Lincoln, flies to Flanders	289		The western counties break out into rebellion; the insurgents march to Blackheath	id.
	Lambert Simnel is crowned in Dublin as King Edward VI.	id.	1497	June 22. Battle of Blackheath; Lord Daubeny and the Earl of Oxford defeat them; Lord Audley is taken and beheaded; others are hanged	307
	Simnel, with the Earl of Lincoln and others, and an army of Germans and Irish, lands at the pile of Foudray	289, 90		July. Warbeck and his wife sail from Scotland; he lands in Ireland, but retires	id.
1487	June 16. Battle of Stoke; the rebels are defeated; Simnel and Simon are taken; the Earl of Lincoln is slain	290		Sept. He lands at Whitland Bay, Cornwall; assumes the title of Richard IV.	id.
	James III. of Scotland is driven from Edinburgh	302
	— 18. Battle of Cragler Moor; James III. is killed; is buried at Cambuskenneth Abbey	302, 3
	— 26. James IV. is crowned at Scone	203
	Nov. 20. The Queen is crowned at Westminster	291

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1497	He attacks Exeter; is repulsed; marches to Taunton Dean; he flies to the sanctuary at Beaulieu; the ringleaders of the insurrection are hanged; the Lady Catherine Gordon is taken to London	308	1509	They are convicted and sentenced to death as traitors	320
	Warbeck surrenders; Henry proceeds to Exeter; returns to London	id., 309	1510	Aug. 17. Empson and Dudley are beheaded	id.
1498	June. Warbeck escapes; he is captured; he is placed in the stocks in various places; reads his confession; is recommitted to the Tower. Charles VIII. of France dies, and is succeeded by Louis XII.	309	1512	Henry demands the crown of France; sends a large army into Guisnes; the expedition returns	320, 1
1499	Ralph Wilford personates the Earl of Warwick; raises an insurrection with Patrick, an Augustine friar	309	1513	Henry obtains supplies from Parliament; prepares for a war with France; arms his northern towns	321, 2
	Mar. Wilford is taken and executed; the friar is imprisoned for life	id.	April.	The English fleet is defeated in the harbour of Brest; Sir Edward Howard, the lord admiral, is slain	322
	Louis XII. conquers Lombardy, and takes possession of Naples	311	May.	Henry sends the vanguard of his army to Calais; the Earl of Suffolk is beheaded; appoints the Queen governor of the realm; Henry sails for France	323
	July. A plot is formed to liberate the Earl of Warwick and Warbeck	309	June 30.	He lands at Calais; marches to the siege of Terouenne; the Emperor Maximilian joins him; the battle of the Spurs	325
	Nov. 16. Warbeck is tried for treason, and convicted	310	Augst.	Terouenne surrenders	id.
	— 23. He is executed, with the mayor of Cork, at Tyburn	id.	— 23.	James, king of Scotland, crosses the borders; besieges Norham Castle; it surrenders; takes Wart and Ford Castles	326
	— 24. The Earl of Warwick is beheaded for treason	id.	Sept.	Tournay surrenders to Henry	id.
	Prince Arthur is affianced to Catherine of Aragon	312	— 9.	Battle of Flodden-field; James is slain	327-330
1500	A plague rages in London	310	— 22.	Henry enters Tournay in triumph	326
	Henry goes to Calais	id.	Oct. 21.	He returns with his army to England	id.
1501	Henry sends an embassy to Scotland; James asks the hand of Margaret, Henry's eldest daughter	311		He creates the Earl of Surrey duke of Norfolk	330
	Nov. 6. Arthur is married to Catherine of Aragon	312	Queen Margaret of Scotland is appointed regent	331
1502	Jan. 29. The Princess Margaret is married by proxy in London	id.	1514	May. She marries the Earl of Angus; forfeits the regency; the Duke of Albany arrives and is appointed regent	319
	April. Arthur, prince of Wales, dies at Ludlow	id.	Aug. 7.	The Princess Mary, sister of Henry, is married by proxy to Louis XII. of France	331
	Elizabeth, Henry's Queen, dies in the Tower	id.	Oct.	She departs for France, and is remarried	id.
1503	Henry, prince of Wales, is affianced to the widow of his brother Arthur	id.	Anne Boleyn is appointed maid of honour to Mary	id., 363
	July. Margaret, queen of Scotland, proceeds from London	id.	Nov. 5.	Mary is crowned at St. Denis	332
	Aug. 7. She enters Edinburgh	id.	1515	Jan. 1. Louis XII. dies, and is succeeded by Francis I.	id.
	— 8. She is married	id.	March.	Queen Mary marries Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk	id.
	Empson and Dudley exact money from various persons	313	Wolsey is created a cardinal	id.
1501	Sir James Tyrrel and Sir John Wyndham are executed	314	He is made chancellor and legate	344
	Edmund de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, flies to Burgundy	id.	Queen Margaret of Scotland comes to England	351
1505	Prince Henry is knighted; the King obtains 30,000 l. from Parliament	id.	The Regent Albany suppresses an insurrection raised by the Earl of Arrou; he and his confederates are executed	351, 2
1506	Jan. The Archduke Philip, and his wife, Joanna queen of Castile, are driven by stress of weather into Weymouth	id., 315	Albany leaves Scotland; Queen Margaret returns to Scotland	352
	— 17. Henry meets Philip on Elworth Green, near Windsor	315	1516	Francis I. marches with an army for the recovery of Milan; the battle of Marignano; Milan surrenders; he returns to France	335, 6
	April. Philip and Joanna are permitted to depart	id.	1518	Oct. 4. A treaty of alliance is ratified between Henry and Francis	336
1507,	Philip dies; Joanna becomes insane	316	1519	Jan. The Emperor Maximilian dies	id.
	Henry releases some prisoners; several persons are heavily fined and committed to prison; Empson and Dudley continue their extortions for the king	317	March.	Francis I. proposes himself as a candidate for the empire	id.
	Anne Boleyn is born	363	May.	Henry announces himself a candidate	id.
1509	Apr. 21. Henry dies at Richmond; is buried in his chapel at Westminster	317	June 2.	The Archduke Charles, king of Spain, is elected emperor, under the title of Charles V.	337
	Accession of Henry VIII.	318	1520	May 26. The emperor visits Henry at Dover; proceeds to Canterbury; he re-embarks at Sandwich	338
	— 22. He is proclaimed	id.	— 31.	Henry, the queen, and his retinue embark for Calais, to meet Francis I.	id.
	June 3. He is married to Catherine of Aragon, at Greenwich	319	June 4.	Henry proceeds to Guisnes	id.
	June 24. He is crowned, with his queen, Catherine, at Westminster	318	— 7.	The two kings meet at the Field of Cloth of Gold	340-3
	Empson and Dudley are brought before the council and committed to the Tower	320	1521	April 16. The Duke of Buckingham is arrested for treason, and taken to the Tower	344
			May 13.	He is tried and condemned	id.
			— 14.	Orders are issued by Wolsey for the seizure of heretical books	345
			— 17.	Buckingham is beheaded on Tower Hill	id.
			July 30.	Wolsey is sent ambassador to mediate the emperor and Francis I.	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

23

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1521	Oct. A league is made by Henry with the pope and the emperor	346	1527	May 5. Rome is assaulted, taken, and sacked by the Spaniards; the Constable Bourbon is killed; the pope and some of the cardinals are besieged in the Castle of St. Angelo	363
	Henry's defence of the seven sacraments is sent to Leo X., who confers on him the title of Defender of the Faith	345		Henry's marriage with Catherine of Aragon questioned	364
	The French are expelled from Italy	346		Aug. Cardinal Wolsey goes on an embassy to France	365
	Nov. The Duke of Albany resumes the regency of Scotland	353		Henry writes a treatise upon the unlawfulness of his marriage with Catherine	366
	Dec. L. Pope Leo X. dies	347		The pope is captured, but escapes to Orvieto	id.
	— 27. Adrian, cardinal of Tortosa, is elected pope by the title of Adrian VI.	id.		He authorizes Wolsey and another cardinal to decide the question of divorce; grants a dispensation for Henry's marriage with any other woman	367
1522	Francis seizes the goods of English merchants in his ports	348	1528	Henry demands a decretal bull from the pope	id.
	May 26. The Emperor lands at Dover; a treaty is concluded between him and Henry for the invasion of France	id.		Wolsey and Cardinal Campeggio are authorised to determine the divorce	368
	The Earl of Shrewsbury makes inroads into Scotland	353		May. The sweating sickness breaks out in London	id.
	Forced loans are raised in London	348, 349		July. King James, of Scotland, obtains his freedom; banishes Angus	330
	August. The Earl of Surrey opens the campaign; returns to Calais	id.		Aug. The plague rages in Italy	368
	The Earl of Kildare is appointed lord-deputy of Ireland for the third time	125		Sept. The French army in Italy surrenders to the Imperialists	id.
	The Regent of Scotland declares war against England; a truce is concluded	354	1529	May 30. Henry issues a licence for the cardinals to proceed with the question of the divorce	369
	The regent again returns to France	id.		— 31. The court is opened in the hall of the Black Friars	id.
1523	The Earl of Surrey with a great army destroys Meuse and the abbey of Jedburgh	429		June 21. The king and queen both appear before the cardinals; the queen withdraws and refuses again to appear	id.
	Parliament is assembled; Sir Thomas More is chosen speaker of the Commons; Wolsey demands in person in the House of Commons 800,000 l. for the recovery of France; a property-tax is agreed to	355		She is pronounced contumacious	370
	The Duke of Albany arrives with a French fleet in Scotland; the Scotch ravage the English border; Albany returns to France	429		July 15. The pope revokes the legatine commission	371
	The Duke of Suffolk opens the campaign in France	355		— 23. Campeggio adjourns the cause	id.
	He returns to Calais	357		Wolsey has two bills filed against him in the court of King's Bench, for exercising the functions of pope's legate	id.
	Sept. 14. Pope Adrian VI. dies	id.		He refuses to deliver the great seal to the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk	372
	Cardinal Giulio dei Medici is elected by the title of Clement VII.	id.		He delivers them up	id.
	Boniviet, the commander of the French army, overruns Piedmont and the Milanese	358		Sentence is pronounced against him in the court of King's Bench	id.
1524	The emperor retakes all the conquests of the French; death of the Chevalier Bayard	id.		Dec. 1. A bill of impeachment against him in parliament is thrown out	id.
	Siege of Marseilles; it is raised; the plague at Milan; siege of Pavia	358, 9	1530	He is deprived of all but the bishoprics of York and Winchester	373
1525	Feb. 24. Battle of Pavia; Francis is taken prisoner	359		He receives a free pardon from the king	id.
	Henry attempts to levy money by benevolences for the conquest of France; it is refused; an insurrection is raised; the benevolence is not insisted on	360		Nov. 4. He is arrested for high treason	id.
	June 18. Sir Thomas Boleyn is created Viscount Rochford, and Henry Fitzroy, the king's natural son, is created duke of Richmond	364		He is taken sick at Leicester	id.
	Henry and Wolsey disagree concerning the suppression of some monasteries	362		— 29. He dies at Leicester Abbey, and is buried in the Lady's Chapel of the monastery	371
	Henry concludes an alliance, offensive and defensive, with France	361		The marriage of Henry is declared illegal by the universities of Oxford and Cambridge	375, 6
	Francis abdicates in favour of his son, the dauphin	id.		The foreign universities differ	376
	Queen Margaret obtains possession of King James	430	1531	March. The pope publishes a breve, forbidding Henry to contract a new marriage under pain of excommunication	id.
1526	Jan. 14. The concord of Madrid is signed; Francis is set at liberty and returns to France	361		Thomas Cromwell advises the king to act on the opinion of the English universities, and to obtain the sanction of parliament	377
	Moncada seizes Rome; plunders the Vatican; the pope takes refuge in the Castle of St. Angelo	362		He advises Henry to declare himself supreme head of the church	id.
	Sept. 21. A treaty of peace is signed, and the Spaniards leave Rome	id.		The whole body of the clergy are involved in a premature for abetting Wolsey in acting as the pope's legate	377, 8
	Dec. The Spaniards again invade the Roman States	id.		The convocation offer 100,000 l. , and acknowledge the king to be protector and only supreme head of the church and clergy of England, as far as may be by the law of Christ; they are pardoned	378
	Queen Margaret, of Scotland, is divorced from Angus and marries Henry Stewart	430		Sir Thomas More, the chancellor, and some peers, attend in the House of Commons, and declare the king's proceedings touching his marriage	id.
1527	March. The pope executes another treaty	363

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1531	May. Catherine refuses to abide by the decision of four bishops and four lay peers; is removed from Greenwich to Moor in Hertfordshire; she removes to Amptill	378	1534	April 21. They are executed at Tyburn	385
	Thomas Bilney is burned in Smithfield, as a heretic, for attempting to expose the errors of popery	id.		Fisher, bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More, are committed to the Tower	id.
1532	The war with Scotland again breaks out on the borders	430		May 12. Treaty of peace signed with Scotland	430
	May 16. Sir Thomas More retires	378		July 22. Frith and Hewet are burnt in Smithfield for heresy against the church of Rome	386
	June 4. Sir Thomas Audley is appointed chancellor	id.		— 27. David Straiton and Norman Göttrlay are burnt at Edinburgh as heretics	431
	Parliament abolishes annates or first-fruits	id.		— 31. Alleg, archbishop of Dublin, is murdered by the Fitzgeralds	425
	Anne Boleyn is created Marchioness of Pembroke	379		Nov. Parliament imposes new oaths; annexes first-fruits and tenths to the crown; empowers the king to punish heresies	386
	She goes with Henry to Calais; they meet Francis I. at Boulogne	id.	1535	May 5. Several Catholic priests are executed for treason for denying the supremacy	id.
	Elizabeth Barton, the Holy Maid of Kent, is arrested by order of Henry	384		— 25. Some Dutch anabaptists are burned for denying the actual presence in the Eucharist	id.
1533	Nov. 15. The pope signs a breve, declaring Henry and Anne excommunicated, unless they should separate	378, 9		June 14. Interrogatories are administered to Sir Thomas More	387
	Jan 4 or 25. Henry is married to Anne Boleyn, at Whitehall	379		— 18. Other Catholics are executed for denying the supremacy	386
	Cranmer is made Archbishop of Canterbury	380		— 22. Fisher, bishop of Rochester, is beheaded for the same offence	id.
	Feb. 22. The pope signs a bull, ratifying the election	id.		July 6. More is also executed for the same	389
	March 30. Cranmer is consecrated, and takes the oaths of canonical obedience to the pope	id.		Aug. Lord Thomas Fitzgerald is sent to England, and committed to the Tower	426
	Appeals to Rome prohibited by parliament	id.		— 30. Pope Paul III. signs a bull against Henry, citing him to appear at Rome; in default declares him to have forfeited the crown; and his children by Anne incapable of inheriting	389
	Queen Catherine declared by parliament to be only Princess Dowager of Wales	id.		Sir Thomas Cromwell is appointed vicar-general of the king; he proposes the suppression of some monasteries, convents, and abbays	390
	May 8. Catherine is cited before a court at Dunstable; refuses to attend; is pronounced contumacious	380, 1		Henry issues a commission to inquire into the conduct of the religious houses	id.
	— 23. Cranmer pronounces her marriage with Henry null and void	381	1536	Jan. 8. Queen Catherine dies at Kimbolton	id.
	The Earl of Kildare is recalled from Ireland, and committed to the Tower	425		— 29. Anne Boleyn is delivered of a son still-born	390, 1
	— 28. Cranmer declares to the clergy the marriage of Henry with Anne Boleyn, and confirms the same	381		Feb. The five Fitzgeralds, uncles of Lord Thomas, are captured and sent to the Tower	426
	June 1. Anne is crowned at Westminster by Cranmer	id.		May 1. A tournament is held at Greenwich	391
	Lord Thomas Fitzgerald raises an insurrection in Ireland	425		— 2. Anne is arrested for treason and committed to the Tower; Viscount Rochford, her brother, Norris, Smeaton, Brereton, and Weston, are committed also	id.
	July 11. The pope annuls the judgment of Cranmer, and publishes his bull of excommunication against Henry and Anne	381		Anne is examined before the privy council	392
	Sept. 7. Anne is delivered of a girl, the Princess Elizabeth	383		Smeaton confesses his guilt	id.
	Queen Catherine refuses to remove from Ampt-hill	id.		— 10. Bills of indictment are found against all but Lord Rochford	id.
	Oct. The pope visits Francis at Marseilles; Bomper appeals on behalf of Henry from the pope to a general council of the church; the pope returns to Italy	382		— 12. Norris, Weston, Brereton, and Smeaton, are arraigned and convicted of treason and adultery	id.
	Nov. The Maid of Kent and her abettors are condemned by the Star Chamber to confess their imposture	384		— 15. Anne and Lord Rochford are tried in the Tower, and condemned to death	393
1534	Parliament prohibits every kind of payment or appeal to the pope; confirms Henry's title as supreme head of the church; vests in the king only the right of appointing to all bishoprics; of deciding in all ecclesiastical causes	384		— 17. Smeaton is hanged, the others are beheaded	394, 5
	March 23. The consistory of Rome decides on the validity of Henry's marriage with Catherine; the pope gives sentence	id.		Cranmer pronounces the marriage of Anne to have been always null and void	395
	Parliament declares the marriage between Henry and Anne lawful; sets aside the Princess Mary as illegitimate; settles the succession on the issue of Anne; declares it to be high treason to question the second marriage	id.		— 19. Anne is beheaded in the Tower	393, 4
	The Maid of Kent and her abettors are attainted of high treason, and others of misprision of treason	385		— 20. Henry marries Jane Seymour	394
				— 29. Jane publicly appears as queen	id.
				June. Parliament passes an act of succession entailing the crown on Henry's issue by Jane Seymour; with power to Henry to bequeath the crown by letters patent or will	395
				Wales is united to England and governed by the same laws	425
				The Duke of Richmond dies	395
				The lesser monasteries are suppressed	396
				The king reduces the number of sacraments to three	397
				An English translation of the bible ordered to be printed	id.
				Oct. An insurrection breaks out in Lincolnshire; the Duke of Suffolk negotiates	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

25

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1536	Oct. The king answers the articles of complaint	398	1539	May 22. Forest, a friar, is burnt alive as a relapsed traitor and heretic	403
	— 9. A priest and a butcher are hanged at Windsor by martial law for speaking about the insurgents	id.		June 11. Thomas à Becket is tried and convicted of treason, rebellion, and contumacy; his bones to be burnt; the riches of his shrine to be forfeited to the crown	403
	An insurrection breaks out in the northern counties	399		July 8. The Vicar of Wandsworth and Friar Ware are executed for treason	411
	— 30. The insurgents of Lincoln disperse; fifteen of them are given up	398		— 10. Sir Adam Fortescue and Sir Thomas Dingley are beheaded	409
	Lords Darcy, Lumley, and others, and the Archbishop of York, join the northern insurgents, who are called the Pilgrims of Grace; Robert Aske is appointed leader	399		James Beaton is made primate of Scotland	431
	The Duke of Suffolk treats with them	id.		Queen Margaret dies	430
	The king offers terms; they are rejected	400		Aug. All the jewels and plate of the shrine of Becket are taken from Canterbury	403
	Reginald Pole is created a cardinal	401		Nov. 14. Whiting, abbot of Glastonbury, is tried for treason	411
1537	The insurgents endeavour to take various places; disperse; Aske, Darcy, and others are taken	400, 1		— 15. He is hanged and quartered at Tor Hill	412
	Martial law is proclaimed in the north, and many executions take place	401	1540	Dec. Ann of Cleves arrives at Dover	413
	Jan. James of Scotland marries Marie de Bourbon	431		Jan. 5. She is married to Henry	414
	Feb. The six Fitzgeralds are beheaded in the Tower	426		The remaining monasteries and other religious houses are suppressed; their lands divided amongst courtiers and favourites	404
	May. King James and his queen land at Leith	431		Cromwell is created Earl of Essex	414
	July. The queen dies	id.		Feb. Henry sends an embassy to the King of Scotland recommending the sequestration of the property of the monasteries	431
	The Bible is published in English; the Bishops' Book	424		June 10. Cromwell is arrested for treason and taken to the Tower	415
	Oct. 12. Queen Jane Seymour is delivered of a son	402		— 19. He is attainted as a traitor and heretic	id.
	— 24. She dies; the prince is created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester. Edward Seymour is created Earl of Hereford	id.		July 9. Henry is divorced from Ann of Cleves	id.
	Some of the larger monasteries are suppressed and the abbey is seized by the king	id.		— 16. She addresses Henry as her brother	416
	Thomas à Becket is cited to appear at Westminster	403		Henry is married to Catherine Howard	417
1538	The Protestant princes of Germany send over a deputation to convert Henry to the Protestant faith	400		— 28. Cromwell is beheaded on Tower Hill	id.
	The papist nobles and bishops are invited to court	id.		— 31. Dr. Barnes and five others are executed	id.
	George Wishart preaches at Bristol against the worship of the Virgin	446		Aug. 8. Catherine Howard is publicly acknowledged queen	id.
	June 18. A truce is concluded at Nice for ten years between the emperor, Henry, and Francis	407		The Prior of Dunfermline and six others are hanged for defending a monastic life	id.
	James of Scotland marries Mary of Guise	431	1541	Ireland is devastated by civil war	428
	Nov. Thomas à Becket is declared a rebel and a traitor	406		May 27. The Countess of Salisbury is beheaded in the Tower	409
	A man and a woman, Anabaptists, are burnt in Smithfield	id.		An attempt is made to revive the Pilgrimage of Grace	417
	John Lambert is tried for heresy in denying the real presence; Henry presides as supreme head of the church; Lambert is condemned to be burnt; he is executed in Smithfield	406, 7		June 28. Lord Leonard Gray is beheaded for treason	426
	Lord Montacute, Sir Geoffrey Pole, the Marquess of Exeter, Sir Edward Neville, and others, are committed to the Tower	408		Severe statutes are passed in Scotland against heresy	431
1539	They are tried and condemned for treason	id.		Aug. The king proceeds on a progress in the north	417
	Jan. 9. Montacute, Exeter, and Neville are beheaded	id.		Catherine Howard is accused to the king	id.
	April 28. Parliament passes bills of attainder against the Countess of Salisbury and others	408		The matter is investigated by commissioners	418
	They are all condemned to death by bill in parliament without trial	409		They report to the king	419, 20-23
	May 18. Six questions are proposed concerning the Eucharist and other matters for the consideration of parliament	410		The accomplices of Catherine are imprisoned for life for misprision of treason	422, 3
	— 20. Henry disputes in parliament upon them; they are adopted and called the Six Articles, or the Bloody Statute	id.	1542	Henry resolves to raise Ireland to the rank of a kingdom; creates several of the native chiefs peers; Ulline de Burgh, Murrock O'Brien, and O'Neil, are made Earls of Clanricarde, Thomond, and Tyrone	428
	Shaxton, bishop of Salisbury, and Latimer resign their sees	id.		The chiefs do homage for their lands to Henry, and hold them by military service; letters patent are granted them for securing the possession of the lands	id.
	Parliament passes an act declaring the king's proclamation to have the force of a statute	411		Feb. 11. Catherine is attainted by parliament, with Lady Rochford	423
				— 13. They are both beheaded in the Tower	id.
				Aug. The English invade the Scottish border; they are defeated at Haddenrig	433
				Oct. Henry claims the sovereignty of Scotland; the Duke of Norfolk marches with a powerful army; the Scotch are routed on Solway Moss; many of the Scottish nobility are carried prisoners to England	id.
				Dec. 7. The Queen of Scots gives birth to a daughter	434
				James V. dies	id.

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1542	Dec. 22. The Earl of Arran becomes Regent of Scotland	431	1545	Sept. The Earl of Hertford again marches into Scotland; burns and destroys the villages; attacks the abbey of Kelso; murders the monks; plunders the abbays of Melrose and Dryburgh; he retreats	415
1543	Jan. 10. The Douglasses return to Scotland	id.		Anne Askew is condemned for heresy	418
	Feb. The English parliament restore the Princess Mary to her place in the succession	438		She is examined, before the council in the Tower; is put to the torture and burned with others in Smithfield	418
	A treaty of peace is signed between Henry and the emperor	id.		Dec. 12. The Duke of Norfolk and the Earl of Surrey are sent to the Tower	449
	Cardinal Beaton is seized and carried to Blackness Castle	434	1547	Jan. 13. The Earl of Surrey is arraigned for treason at Guildhall for using the royal arms of Edward the Confessor quartered with his own; he is found guilty of an attempt upon the throne	450
	The Reformation is supported by Arran	id.		— 19. He is beheaded	id.
	The churches are shut up by the Catholic clergy	435		The Duke of Norfolk makes a confession; a bill of attainder is brought in which passes both houses in six days	451
	Henry demands that Beaton shall be delivered up to him, and that the Scotch castles shall be put into his hands	id.		— 27. The royal assent is given to the bill by commission; orders are sent to the Tower for his execution on the following morning	id.
	The Earls of Huntley, Bothwell, and Murray demand certain articles, one of which is that the New Testament shall not be allowed to be circulated in the vulgar tongue	id.		— 28. Henry dies early in the morning	id.
	March 12. The lords meet in parliament; they recommend the marriage of the infant queen with the Prince of Wales	id.		The Duke of Norfolk is respited	id.
	Cardinal Beaton regains his liberty	436		— 31. The death of Henry is announced to parliament	453
	The treaty of Greenwich is executed by Henry and Angus and others of the regency	id.		King Edward VI. enters London and proceeds to the Tower	454
	Aug. It is ratified by the nobles	id.		Feb. 1. King Henry's will is read, appointing sixteen executors to be governors of King Edward till he should be sixteen years of age; the Earl of Hertford is appointed sole governor by the others	455
	The ships of Scotch merchants are seized in the English ports, whither they were driven by stress of weather	437		He is made Duke of Somerset	456
	July. Henry is married to Catherine Parr	438		— 16. King Henry is buried at Windsor	id.
	Three sectarians or Protestants are burnt in Smithfield	id.		— 18. The chancellor, the Earl of Southampton, issues a commission under the great seal enabling the masters of the court to make decrees	457
	Sept. Arran publicly abjures his heresy and is reconciled to the Church of Rome	id.		— 20. King Edward VI. is crowned at Westminster, the ceremony being shortened	456, 7
	Queen Mary of Scotland is crowned at Stirling	id.		March 6. The chancellor is dismissed by the council	457
	The Earl of Angus and his associates execute a bond at Douglas Castle to serve King Henry	id.		Somerset is appointed sole governor of the king and protector of the kingdom	id.
	Marco Grimani, the pope's legate, lands in Scotland	id.		— 31. Francis I. dies at Rambouillet, and is succeeded by his son Henry II.	458
	Angus and his confederates are accused of treason. The treaty of marriage is declared void	438		June. Lord Seymour, the Duke of Somerset's brother, marries Queen Catherine Parr	471
	Sir Thomas Wallop with an English army besiege Landreci; returns to winter quarters	438		July. The adherents of Cardinal Beaton are besieged in St. Andrew's Castle: surrender to the French fleet	458
	George Wishart goes to Scotland and preaches against popery	446		John Knox with other prisoners is carried to France	id.
1544	May 4. An English army land at Leith, which they plunder; the Scotch evacuate Edinburgh; the Earl of Hertford attacks the castle; is defeated; burns the town and lays waste the country; he retreats from Leith, burns the shipping, and retreats to Berwick; the Catholics and Protestants coalesce against the English	440		The Castle of St. Andrew's is demolished	459
	July. Henry proceeds from Dover to Calais; besieges Boulogne	439		The protector marches with an army for the invasion of Scotland; Lord Clinton commands the fleet	id.
	Sept. Boulogne surrenders, and Henry returns to England	id.		The army take possession of Douglas Castle	id.
1545	Lemox with a fleet takes the Isles of Arran and Bute, and ravages the coast of Scotland	440, 1		Sept. 10. Battle of Pinkey, at Salt Preston; Black Saturday; the Scotch army are routed	460, 3
	Sir Ralph Evre lays waste the country about Jedburgh and Kyle	441		The Scottish camp is plundered	463, 4
	Battle of Ancrum Moor; the English are defeated; Sir Ralph Evre is slain	id.		The fleet take the Island of Inchoalm; the town of Kinghorn; plunder and ravage the coast	464
	July 16. A French fleet cast anchor at St. Helen's, in the Isle of Wight; the English fleet in Portsmouth harbour is prevented going out by Henry	442		— 17. Leith is set on fire	id.
	The French fleet returns to Brest	443		— 18. The army marches back towards the border	id.
	Nov. Parliament grants Henry a subsidy and the disposal of all colleges, charities, and hospitals. George Wishart is seized; is tried as a heretic and burnt at St. Andrew's	446		Clinton assaults and takes Broughty Castle	id.
	May 28. Cardinal Beaton is assassinated	446, 7		— 21. The protector takes possession of Hume Castle	465
	June. Treaty of Campes; Henry agrees to give up Boulogne on payment of money by Francis	447		— 29. The English army recross the Tweed	id.
				Visitors of each diocese are appointed; an English copy of the Bible is ordered to be deposited in every parish church; other regulations are made	466

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1547	Bonner and Gardiner are committed to the Fleet	466	1549	March 4. The bill passes the House of Commons	479
	Nov. 4. Parliament repeals the act of Henry giving proclamations the force of laws, and many other statutes of the late reign	46, 7		— 14. The royal assent is given to the bill	id.
	Abolishes the congé d'élire ; orders the sacrament to be delivered to the laity; vests all chantries, colleges, and free chapels in the king	467		— 26. He is beheaded on Tower Hill	480
	It also passes an act for the punishing of vagabonds and the relief of poor and impotent persons	id.		June. An insurrection breaks out in various parts of England against the Reformation and the use of the reformed liturgy	481-3
	Proclamations are issued against carrying candles on Candlemas day, ashes on Ash Wednesday, and palms on Palm Sunday	468		Siege of Exeter by the rebels	483, 4
	All images are ordered to be removed from churches and chapels; the rich shrines are forfeited to the crown; act of general pardon published	id.		Lord Russell defeats the rebels at Fennington Bridge	485
	New order of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper proclaimed; the elevation of the Host forbidden; the service to be in English	id.		Ket's insurrection in Norfolk; the Tree of Reformation	485, 6
	Craumer publishes a catechism in English	id.		The Marquess of Northampton marches against Ket; he is driven out of Norwich by the rebels; Lord Sheffield is killed; Northampton retreats to London	487
1548	Jan. 8. Gardiner is brought before the council and discharged	id.		Aug. 6. Lord Russell and Lord Grey raise the siege of Exeter; the rebels of the west are executed	485
	April. Lord Gray of Wilton is sent into Scotland with a powerful army; he takes the town of Haddington and fortifies it; Dalkeith and Musselburgh are burnt	469		— 27. The Earl of Warwick defeats the Norfolk rebels at Dussingdale; Ket and all the principal rebels are executed	487
	Bishop Gardiner is committed to the Tower	468		Bishop Bonner is reprimanded by the council	493
	June. A fleet with an army of French and Germans arrives at Leith; Arran and the Scotch with the French and Germans encamp before Haddington; a treaty of marriage between Queen Mary and the dauphin is here ratified	469		Oct. 1. The English evacuate Haddington	489
	The queen goes on board the French fleet at Dunbarton	id.		The lords meet in London to complain of the lord protector; the king is hastened to Windsor	490, 1
	Aug 13. She reaches Brest; proceeds to St. Germain-en-Laye; is contracted to the dauphin			— 12. The council meet at Windsor	491
	Haddington is relieved			— 14. The protector is brought before them; articles of impeachment are exhibited against him; he is sent to the Tower	id.
	The English are defeated in attempting again to relieve the town	470		Nov. 4. Parliament again meets; passes laws against prophecies and repeals the act relating to vagabonds	492
	The Earl of Shrewsbury relieves Haddington	id.		Dec. 13. Somerset confesses before the king and council	id.
	Lord Clinton, the admiral, lands at several places, but is repulsed	id.	1550	Jan. 2. A bill of pains and penalties is passed against him; he is fined and deprived of his offices	id.
	Lord Grey makes an incursion as far as Tiviotdale and Liddesdale	id.		Feb. 6. He is released from the Tower	id.
	Sept. 30. The queen dowager, wife of Seymour, dies, after giving birth to a daughter	476		— 16. He receives a royal pardon	id.
	Oct. 9. D'Esse attempts to surprise Haddington; is repulsed	470		Warwick is made lord high admiral and great master of the household
	— 15. The plague rages in London	id.		March. Peace is concluded between England and France; Boulogne is agreed to be surrendered to the French	id.
	Nov. 24. Parliament meets; bill introduced in the Commons permitting the marriage of the clergy	id.		April. Bonner having been reprieved and committed to the Tower, Ridley is made bishop of London	493
	Dec. 13. It is passed and carried to the House of Lords	471		— 10. The Duke of Somerset is again sworn in of the privy council	492
	The English are driven out of Jedburgh; the castles of Hume and Furfurhaist are retaken; the Scotch, assisted by the French, gain other successes and ravage the English border	488		May 2. Joan of Kent is burned in Smithfield for heresy	id.
1549	Jan. 19. The Lord Admiral Seymour is committed to the Tower for high treason	478		July. John Hooper is nominated bishop of Gloucester	493
	Feb. 9. The bill allowing the marriage of the clergy is considered in the House of Lords	471		Aug. A fleet is sent to sea to prevent the escape of the Princess Mary	491
	— 19. The bill is read a third time and passed	id.		Dec. Two of her chaplains are indicted for performing mass	id.
	An act is passed establishing the use of the reformed liturgy, and another "touching abstinence from flesh in Lent," &c.	id.	1551	Jan. John Hooper, bishop of Gloucester, is committed to the Fleet	493
	— 23. The whole council proceed to the Tower and exhibit articles of charge against the lord admiral	479		March 18. The Princess Mary is brought before the council	491
	— 27. A bill of attainder against him is passed in the House of Lords	id.		— 19. The emperor threatens war	id.
				— 20. The princess is allowed to follow Roman Catholic worship	id.
				April 6. Von Paris, a Dutchman, is burned in Smithfield for heresy	493
				May. An agreement for marriage between Edward and Elizabeth, the French king's daughter, is made	495
				June 3. Lord Lisle, the Earl of Warwick's eldest son, is married to the Duke of Somerset's daughter Anne	id.
				— 4. His third son, Sir Robert Dudley, is married to the daughter of Sir John Rolsart	id.
				July. The sweating sickness rages in London	id.

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1551	Aug. The chief officers of the household of the Princess Mary are committed to the Tower	494	1553	Aug. 18. The Duke of Northumberland, the Earl of Warwick, and the Marquis of Northampton are arraigned for treason in Westminster Hall; they are all condemned	505
	The chancellor and other members of the council confer with her at Coptihall, respecting the mass; she refuses to relinquish it	id.		— 19. Others are condemned by the same court	id.
	Sept. Warwick is made Warden of the Scottish Marches	495		— 20. A sermon is preached in favour of the mass at Paul's Cross	506
	Oct. 11. He is created Duke of Northumberland	id.		— 22. Northumberland and two others are beheaded	id.
	— 16. The Duke of Somerset is arrested for conspiracy and treason, and committed to the Tower	id.		— 23. Gardiner is made chancellor; the mass is performed in St. Paul's Church	id.
	An indictment is presented and found against him, by the Grand Jury, at Guildhall	496		Sept. 14. Crammer is arrested and sent to the Tower	507
	Dec. 1. He is tried in Westminster Hall by some peers; is found guilty of felony only	496, 7		Oct. 1. Mary is crowned at Westminster with the ancient formalities	id. , 508
1552	Jan. 22. He is beheaded on Tower Hill	497, 8		— 6. Parliament assembles; mass is performed; the Bishop of Lincoln, Taylor, refuses to kneel, and is thrown out of the House of Lords	508
	— 23. Parliament meets; acts are passed for the enforcing the use of the books of Common Prayer; for amending the law of treason; for the relief of the poor; for legalising the marriage of priests; and for other purposes	498		The queen is declared legitimate; the law of treason restored; all the statutes of Edward VI. respecting religion repealed	id.
	Feb. 26. Some of the accomplices of the Duke of Somerset are executed	id.		Gardiner assembles the convocation; the Book of Common Prayer declared an abomination; they recommend the suppression of the reformed English Catechism	508, 9
	Parliament is dissolved	id.		Many of the bishops are deprived and sent to prison	509
	April. The King is afflicted by small-pox and measles	499		Nov. 13. Lady Jane Grey, her husband, and Lord Ambrose Dudley, with Crammer, are tried and condemned for treason; they are sent back to the Tower; Crammer is respited but detained for heresy	510
1553	March 1. Parliament meets; the Bishopric of Durham is suppressed	499		The attainder of the Duke of Norfolk is reversed	id.
	April. Durham is created into a County Palatine	id.		Parliament petitions against the queen's marriage with Philip of Spain	511
	May. Lord Guilford Dudley is married to Lady Jane Grey	id.		Dec. 21. The church service begins to be performed in Latin throughout England	510
	June 11. The king requires the crown lawyers to draw a bill, entailing the crown on Lady Jane Grey	500		The queen issues an order that no one shall preach without a license	id.
	— 21. The will, after being executed by the king, receives the signature of the Lords of the council	id.		Judge Hales remonstrates; is thrown into prison; he kills himself	id.
	July 6. The king dies at Greenwich	id.		Edward Courtenay is restored to the Earldom of Devon	id.
	— 8. The Lord Mayor of London, and others of the citizens, swear allegiance to Lady Jane Grey	502	1554	Jan. 14. The Chancellor Gardiner announces the queen's intended marriage with the Prince of Spain	511
	— 10. Lady Jane is conveyed to the Tower; the king's death is publicly announced, and Jane is proclaimed queen	id.		Robert Dudley, son of Northumberland, is condemned as a traitor	id.
	— 12. Queen Mary sends an order from Framlingham Castle for her proclamation at Norwich	503		Sir Peter Carew raises an insurrection in Devonshire against the Spanish match	512
	— 13. She is proclaimed there	id.		Sir Thomas Wyatt raises a rebellion in Kent against the same	id.
	The Duke of Northumberland marches against Queen Mary	503		— 25. The Duke of Suffolk flies to Warwickshire and raises the people there	id.
	Ridley preaches at Paul's Cross in favour of Queen Jane	id.		— 29. The Duke of Norfolk marches against Sir Thomas Wyatt; the London trained bands desert to Wyatt at Rochester bridge; Wyatt marches to Southwark; retires to Kingston; marches to London; is met at Hyde Park by the royal forces; he surrenders, and is committed to the Tower	513, 14
	July 19. The council quit the Tower; proceed to Baynard's Castle, and declare for Mary	id.		Many of the rebels are hanged	514
	They proclaim Queen Mary; they proceed to the Tower; take possession of it	id.		The Princess Elizabeth is arrested and brought to London; is examined before the council; returns into Buckinghamshire	515
	— 20. The Duke of Northumberland proclaims Mary at Cambridge	504		Feb. 12. Lady Jane Grey and her husband are beheaded	517, 18
	— 21. Northumberland is arrested for treason; he is conveyed to the Tower; many of the nobility, with the Duke of Suffolk, are also committed there	id.		— 17. The Duke of Suffolk is tried and condemned for treason	518
	— 30. The Lady Elizabeth rides through London to meet Mary	id.		— 23. He is beheaded	id.
	— 31. The Duke of Suffolk is discharged from the Tower, and soon after receives a pardon	id.		March 14. Elizabeth Croft plays the Spirit in the Wall	519
	Aug. 3. Queen Mary enters London; proceeds to the Tower; the Duke of Norfolk, Gardiner, and others, are liberated; Bonner and Tunstall are liberated from the Fleet	505		— 15. The Princess Elizabeth is again arrested, and sent to the Tower	515, 16
	— 9. A mass is performed in the Tower for the obsequies of King Edward; the same day he is buried in Westminster Abbey, according to the Protestant rite	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1551	Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, are removed from the Tower to Oxford	524	1556	June 18. A son of Lord Sandys is hanged in London for robbery	531
	April 11. Sir Thomas Wyatt is beheaded	518		— 27. Thirteen persons are burnt, at Stratford le Bow, for heresy	528
	— 14. Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, are questioned before the commissions at Oxford	525		Sir John Cheke is sent to the Tower; he recants his heretical opinions	530
	— 15. Sir Nicholas Throgmorton is tried and acquitted	518		July 8. Peckham and Daniel are hanged and beheaded on Tower Hill, for concerting to rob the queen's treasury	511
	— 16. Cranmer argues before the Consistory	525	1557	Feb. The emperor, Charles V., retires to the monastery of St. Just	id.
	— 17. Ridley does the same	id.		March. King Philip II. of Spain revisits England	532
	— 18. Latimer does the same	id.		Thomas Stafford and a few others land at Scarborough; attack and surprise the castle; they are made prisoners, and Stafford and others, one a Frenchman, are sent to London and tortured in the Tower	id.
	— 24. William Branch is burned in the Sanctuary, at Westminster, for stabbing a priest, and for heresy	521		May 28. Stafford is beheaded	id.
	— 28. Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, are condemned to be burnt	525		— 29. Saunders is pardoned, the others are hanged	id.
May 19.	The Princess Elizabeth is removed from the Tower to Richmond, under the charge of Sir Richard Bedingfield	519		June 7. Mary declares war against France	id.
	The Earl of Devon is sent to Fotheringay Castle	id.		July 6. Philip departs from England	id.
July 14.	Elizabeth Croft is placed in the pillory for playing the part of the Spirit in the Wall	id.		The Earl of Pembroke and Lord Robert Dudley go to the Low Countries with an army in aid of Philip	id.
	— 19. The Prince of Spain arrives in Southampton water	id.		Anne of Cleves dies at Chelsea	id.
	— 23. Mary meets him at Winchester	520		The army of Philip gain a battle under the walls of St. Quintin	533
Aug.	They are married there; go to Windsor; enter London	id.	1558	Jan. 1. The Duke of Guise commences the siege of Calais; it is assaulted and taken in a few days	533, 4, 5
Oct. 26.	Some of the jury who acquitted Sir Nicholas Throgmorton are fined in the Star Chamber. They are committed to prison	519		— 13. He attacks and takes the town and fort of Guisnes	535
Nov. 12.	Parliament meets; Cardinal Pole gives absolution; the acts against heretics are revised	520, 21		April 24. Mary, queen of Scots, is married to Francis, the eldest son of the King of France	536
	— 27. A Te Deum is sung in St. Paul's for the hope of an heir to the crown	521		Parliament grants money for the recovery of Calais; the Lord High Admiral, Lord Clinton, sails to join King Philip, with an English fleet	id.
Dec. 12.	The jorymen, who were committed for acquitting Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, pay their fines, and are discharged	519		The English and Flemish fleets take Comquet and several other small places	536, 7
1555	Mary sends an embassy to the pope to confirm the reconciliation of England with the church	522		The battle of Gravelines; the French are defeated	537
	A commission of ecclesiastics sits for the trial of Protestants; John Rogers is tried; he is condemned to be burnt	522, 3		Sept. Mary falls ill of the cold and hot fever	id.
Feb. 4.	He is burned in Smithfield	523		Nov. 17. She dies at St. James's	id., 538
	— 9. Bishop Hooper is burned at Gloucester	id.		Cardinal Pole dies the same day	538
	Dr. Taylor is burned at Haddleigh	id.		Queen Elizabeth's accession is acknowledged by both Houses of Parliament; she is proclaimed	539
March 30.	Bishop Ferrar is burned at St. David's	id.		— 18. Sir William Cecil is appointed Secretary of State	id.
May.	William Featherstone pretends to be Edward VI.; is seized and committed to the Marshalsea as a lunatic; he is afterwards whipped and banished to the north	522		— 23. The queen removes from Hatfield; proceeds to the Charterhouse	id.
	— 31. John Cardmaker is burned at London	524		— 28. She enters London, and proceeds to the Tower	id.
June.	John Bradford is also burned in London	id.		Dec. 5. She goes to Somerset House	id.
	Many others are burned in various parts of England for heresy	id.		— 13. The body of Queen Mary is buried in Westminster Abbey with Roman Catholic ceremonies	511
Sept.	Philip quits England for the continent	526		— 25. Mass is performed in the great closet; the queen retires after the reading of the gospel	id.
Oct. 16.	Ridley and Latimer are burned at Oxford	525	1559	Jan. 12. The queen proceeds to the Tower before her coronation	id.
	— 25. The Emperor resigns his crown to his son Philip of Spain	531		— 13. Sir Henry Carey is created Lord Hunsdon	id.
Nov. 12.	Bishop Gardiner, the chancellor, dies, and is succeeded by Heath, Archbishop of York	526		— 14. The queen goes to Westminster	id.
1556	Forced loans are contracted	527		— 15. She is crowned by the Bishop of Carlisle in the ancient manner	512
	Embargoes are laid on foreign goods	id.		— 25. She meets the parliament; they restore the first fruits and tenths to the crown; they declare the queen supreme head of the church; the laws of Edward VI. relating to religion are restored; the book of Common Prayer re-established	513
	The Earl of Devon dies at Padua	521		Dr. Story is kidnapped, brought to England, and executed	544
	Cranmer having been formally condemned by the pope, is sentenced to be degraded and burnt	527
	He signs his recantation	id.
March 21.	He is taken to St. Mary's church, Oxford, to make a public declaration; he refuses; is burned near Baliol College	528
	— 22. Cardinal Pole is consecrated, and installed Archbishop of Canterbury	id.

A. D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A. D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1559	Parliament exhort the queen to marry; she declares her intention to live and die a virgin queen	544	1560	The Duke of Holstein arrives to negotiate on behalf of the King of Denmark in the same matter	562
	Philip II. offers his hand in marriage	id.	Aug. 1.	The Scotch parliament declare that the authority of the Roman church is an usurpation; pass a declaration of faith, renouncing the tenets and dogmas of that church, and disowning the authority of the pope	563
	April 2. General treaty of peace signed at Cateau Cambresis	547		Queen Mary refuses to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, and refuses to assent to the statutes passed against the Roman Catholic religion	id.
	May 8. Parliament is dissolved	544	Dec. 5.	Francis II. of France dies, and is succeeded by Charles IX.; Mary retires from court and resides at Rheims	id.
	— 10. The Queen Regent of Scotland summons the reformed clergy to Stirling	547	— 19.	She arrives at Leith; proceeds to Holyrood	565
	— 11. John Knox preaches against Catholicism	548		John Knox has an interview with her	id.
	The Queen Regent enters into a treaty with the reformers	id.		Mary removes to Stirling; issues proclamations banishing the monks and friars	566
	— 15. The clergy of England are admonished by the council to make their dependents conform to the statutes recently passed	544		The presbyterian clergy preach against the mass, and dancing, and other amusements	id.
	— 30. The oath of supremacy is tendered to Bonner; he refuses to take it; he is deprived, as are others who refuse	545		The queen's chapel is broken into and the altar defiled; two offenders are indicted	568
	The Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity are strictly enforced, and the Protestant religion established throughout England	id.		John Knox writes to the presbyterians to come armed to Edinburgh and release the prisoners; he is cited before the council; he defies them, and is discharged	id.
	The queen publishes certain injunctions	546		Elizabeth pays off crown debts; regulates the coinage; increases the naval force	id.
	John Knox and the Scottish reformers form themselves into the Congregation of the Lord	518		The Lady Catherine Grey, wife of the Earl of Hertford, and her husband, are committed to the Tower; their marriage declared unlawful, and their issue illegitimate	569
	July 10. Henry II. of France dies; is succeeded by Francis II., the husband of Mary, queen of Scots	549		The earl is fined 15,000 l.	id.
	A French army lands at Leith	id.		Sir Edward Waldegrave and his wife are sent to the Tower for hearing mass	515
	Sir Ralph Sadler is appointed a privy councillor	550		Ambrose Dudley is restored to the title of Baron Lisle	570
	Aug. He is commissioned to settle matters on the Scottish borders	551		Arthur and Edmund Pole are tried for high treason; they confess; are condemned; the queen grants them a pardon	545
	— 29. The Queen Regent of Scotland appoints commissioners to treat with Sadler	id.		Parliament passes laws against prophecies and prognostications on coats of arms	570
	Sept. 11. The commissioners meet on the borders	554	1562	Elizabeth sends an army under Sir Edward Poyning to take possession of Havre, and to aid the protestants of France; Rouen is besieged and captured by the French	id.
	The French fortify Leith	555		Lord Lisle is restored to the title of Earl of Warwick	id.
	The titles of King and Queen of France, England, and Scotland are assumed by Francis II. and Mary; a great seal is made bearing the arms of those countries	id.		He is sent with a reinforcement to Havre	id.
	The Duke of Chatelherault and the lords of the congregation suppress the abbeys of Paisley, Kilwinning, and Dumfermline	556		The Huguenots under Condé and Coligni are defeated at Dreux; Elizabeth sends further aid	571
	They march for Edinburgh; the queen regent retreats to Leith	557		The Earl of Arran is sent prisoner to Edinburgh Castle; Lord James Stuart, the half-brother of Queen Mary, is made Earl of Marr	571
	They call a parliament; deprive the queen regent of her authority; ask aid of England	id.		Queen Mary proceeds on a royal progress to the north	id.
	Nov. 6. They attack Leith; they are defeated at Restalrig; they evacuate Edinburgh and fly to Stirling; the queen regent re-enters Edinburgh	559		Inverness Castle holds out against her; it is taken; the governor is put to death	id.
1560	Feb. 27. Elizabeth concludes a treaty at Berwick with the lords of the congregation for mutual defence, to last during the marriage of Mary with the French king and a year after March. An English fleet appears in the Frith of Forth	id.		Lord James Stuart is appointed Earl of Murray instead of Earl of Marr	id.
	The French ravage the county of Fife	id.	Oct. 28.	A battle is fought at Corrichie by Murray, against the Earl of Huntley, who is beaten	575
	They retreat to Edinburgh; the queen regent takes refuge in Edinburgh Castle; the French army march to Leith	560		Huntley is killed; his son, Sir John Gordon, is captured and beheaded	id.
	The English fleet blockade the port of Leith; the army and the Scotch attack the town by land	id.		Philip II. introduces the inquisition into the Netherlands	620
	June 10. The queen regent dies in Edinburgh Castle	561		Elizabeth proposes Lord Robert Dudley as a husband for Queen Mary	575
	July 7. French commissioners execute the treaty of peace; the treaty of Edinburgh; Leith is surrendered to the lords of the congregation and the English	id.	1563	Parliament meets; addresses the queen as to her marriage; the Duke of Wirtemberg proposes for her hand	571
	A separate peace is concluded between England and France, recognising Elizabeth's right to the crown of England, and agreeing that Mary shall not use the arms of England	562
	The Duke of Finland arrives in London to negotiate his brother, the King of Sweden's, marriage with Elizabeth	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

31

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1563	An act is passed, "of assurance of the queen's royal power over all states and subjects within her dominions"	571	1567	Feb. 12. A reward is offered for the discovery of the murderers	596
	Persons are punished for conjuring and other offences	572		— 16. The Earl of Bothwell and others are accused	id.
	Feb. 24. The Duke of Guise is assassinated; peace is agreed on between the Huguenots and Roman Catholics	id.		Mar. 17. The Earl of Lennox formally accuses them	id.
	May. The French besiege Havre	573		— 21. Bothwell gets possession of Edinburgh castle	id.
	July 27. The Earl of Warwick is wounded	id.		Apr. 9. Murray retires to France	597
	— 28. Havre is surrendered to the French	id.		— 12. Bothwell is arraigned for the murder of Darnley, and is acquitted	id.
	Sept. The plague rages in London	574		— 16. Mary appears personally in her parliament; the estates of Bothwell are confined to him; an act is passed renouncing the authority of Rome, and establishing the protestant religion	id.
	— 20. Lord Robert Dudley is created Earl of Leicester	575		Bothwell proposes to marry the queen; it is agreed to by many lords and others	598
1564	The attainder of the Earl of Lennox is reversed by the Scottish parliament	579		Bothwell captures the queen at Foulbrigs, and takes her to Dunbar castle	id.
1565	Henry, lord Darnley, son of the Earl of Lennox, sails for Scotland	id.		— 29. He takes the queen back to Edinburgh	id.
	Feb. 16. He visits Queen Mary at Wemyss Castle	id.		May 7. — Applies for a divorce from his wife, which is granted	599
	Elizabeth remonstrates against the marriage with Darnley	580		The queen appears before the session, and declares her forgiveness of Bothwell	id.
	The Countess of Lennox and her younger son are committed to the Tower	id.		Bothwell is created Duke of Orkney	id.
	The Earl of Murray joins Knox against Queen Mary; the assembly of the kirk demand that the queen shall conform to the Protestant faith, and abolish the Romish worship throughout Scotland	581		— 15. He is married to the queen	id.
	July 28. Darnley is married to Mary, and proclaimed king	id.		June 6. Morton and other lords attempt to seize the queen and Bothwell; they escape to Dunbar	600
	Murray, Chatelherault, Argyle, Glencairn, and Rothies, take up arms	id.		The confederate lords assume the powers of government	id.
	The queen takes the field; the lords retreat into England; "the roundabout raid"	id. , 582		— 14. The queen marches against them; issues a proclamation; sleeps at Seton	id.
	Murray and the Abbot of Kilwinning proceed to London; the French and Spanish ambassadors remonstrate against the encouragement of the Scotch rebellion	582		— 15. Mary advances to Carberry Hill; she surrenders to the confederate lords; Bothwell departs for Dunbar	601
	Mary calls her parliament together; attains Murray and others	583		Mary is carried to Edinburgh, and from thence to Lochleven castle	602
	The queen and Darnley quarrel	584		Bothwell flies to Norway; is thrown into the castle of Malmoë	id.
1566	March. The attainder of the Earl of Huntley is reversed	575		The insurgent nobles assume the title of "Lords of the Secret Council"	id.
	Darnley signs a bond to certain lords for the murder of Rizzio	586		Captain Blackadder and others are tried and executed for the murder of Darnley	id.
	— 9. Rizzio is murdered by Ruthven and other conspirators	586, 7		July 24. Mary resigns the crown to her son	604
	— 10. Murray and other banished lords return	587		— 29. Murray is appointed regent	id.
	Ruthven and Morton retire into England	id.		— 29. The infant king is crowned at Stirling	id.
	The queen is reconciled to Murray	588		Aug. 11. Murray reaches Edinburgh	id.
	The Prince of Orange joins a confederacy against the inquisition in the Netherlands	620		— 20. He visits Mary at Lochleven	605
	June 19. Mary is delivered of a son	548		— 22. He is proclaimed regent; obtains possession of Edinburgh castle	id.
	He is named James; Elizabeth is his godmother at the christening, and the King of France and the Duke of Savoy, godfathers	589		Sept. 30. Obtains possession of the castle of Dunbar	606
	The Earls of Morton, Ruthven, and others, are pardoned, and return to Scotland	591, 5		Raises Morton to high honours	id.
	Elizabeth declares to parliament that she will marry	590		Dec. 16. Murray assembles a parliament; the acts against popery are revived; the deposition of the queen and the appointment of the regent are confirmed, and Mary declared guilty of the murder of Darnley	id.
	The parliament press the question of the succession; she reprimands them	id.		Elizabeth sends the Earl of Sussex on an embassy to Vienna respecting her proposed marriage with the Archduke Charles	622
	Elizabeth remits part of the supplies voted by parliament	591	1568	Jan. 3. Four servants of Bothwell are executed for assisting in the murder of Darnley	606
	Nov. 9. Mary writes to Elizabeth to settle the succession	id.		Mar. 25. Mary attempts to escape from Lochleven castle	id.
	Dec. A determination is come to to divorce Mary from Darnley	594		May 2. She escapes, and is carried to Hamilton; an army is assembled for her defence	607
	Darnley falls sick of the small-pox	595		The regent marches against her	id.
1567	The Lady Catherine Grey dies in the Tower	569		— 14. Battle of Langside; the queen's forces are defeated; she flies to Dundrennan Abbey	id.
	Jan. 14. Queen Mary arrives with the prince in Edinburgh	595		— 16. She passes to Workington, in Cumberland	id.
	— 25. She is reconciled to Darnley at Glasgow	id.		She is conducted to Carlisle; is lodged in the prison	id.
	— 31. They enter Edinburgh together	id.
	Darnley is lodged at Kirk-a-Field	id.
	Feb. 10. Darnley is murdered	id. , 596

A. D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A. D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1568	Elizabeth refuses to see Mary till she is cleared of the murder of Darnley	608	1571	Aug. 4. The Duke of Norfolk is removed to one of his town-houses	638
	Ulster is vested in the English crown, and is colonized by English	651		Sept. 7. He is again committed to the Tower	id. , 639
	July 16. Mary is carried to Bolton castle	611	1572	Jan. 14. The Earl of Shrewsbury, the keeper of Queen Mary, is nominated lord high steward for the trial of the Duke of Norfolk	610
	Elizabeth seizes some Spanish ships with specie on board	626		— 16. The duke is tried for treason, and convicted	id. , 611, 2
	Oct. 4. A commission meets at York to arbitrate the differences between Mary and the lords	612		Feb. Mather and Barney are executed for treason Apr. Treaty concluded between England and France	646
1569	The regent, who had appeared in person at York, returns to Scotland; Mary is detained a prisoner	616		June 2. The Duke of Norfolk is beheaded on Tower Hill	611
	Jan. 26. Mary is removed from Bolton	618		Parliament declare the Queen of Scots incapable of succeeding to the English crown	id.
	Feb. 2. The regent reaches Edinburgh	id.		Queen Mary is removed to Sheffield castle	id.
	— 3. Mary is placed in Tutbury castle	id.		July. The Earl of Northumberland is lauded at Berwick; is sent to York, and there beheaded without trial	615
	The Duke of Norfolk proposes to marry Queen Mary	621		The Duke of Anjou is elected king of Poland	619
	Aug. Norfolk retires to Kenninghall	id. , 625		Aug. 18. The King of Navarre is married to the Princess Margaret, sister of Charles IX.	646
	Paris, a Frenchman, is executed in Scotland, for being concerned in the murder of Darnley	625		— 22. The Admiral Coligny is attempted to be assassinated in the streets of Paris	id.
	Norfolk is invited to court	626		23. The massacre of St. Bartholomew	647
	Oct. 2. He is arrested at St. Albans	id.		The Huguenots take the field in France	648
	— 9. He is committed to the Tower	id. , 638		Oct. The Regent Marr dies at Stirling	id.
	— 11. The Bishop of Ross is committed to the Tower	id.		Nov. 24. The Earl of Morton is chosen regent	id.
	An insurrection breaks out in York, Durham, and Northumberland; Dr. Nicholas Morton arrives in England as apostolical penitentiary	628	1573	Elizabeth sends an army to reduce Edinburgh Castle, which still holds out for Mary	648, 9
	Queen Mary is removed to Coventry	629		May. The castle surrenders	649
	Nov. 16. The insurgents march to Durham, burn the Bible and Common Prayer-book, and celebrate mass in the cathedral; they retreat to Raby castle; attack and take Barnard castle	id.		June 9. Maitland dies	id.
	They retreat towards the borders	630		Aug. 3. Kirkaldy is hanged and quartered as a traitor	id.
	The Earl of Northumberland is sent to Lochleven castle	id.		Elizabeth sends secret aid to the Huguenots, and a fleet to attempt the relief of Rochelle	id.
	Queen Mary is recommitted to Tutbury castle	614		Walter Devereux undertakes to subdue and colonise the district of Clan-huboy in Ulster	651
1570	Jan. 4. Many of the insurgents are executed	630	1574	May. Charles IX. of France dies, and is succeeded by the Duke of Anjou, king of Poland, as Henry III.	649
	Elizabeth issues a proclamation of pardon	id.		Henry III. detects his brother, the Duke of Alençon, in a conspiracy to assassinate him	id.
	She also issues a "Declaration of the Queen's proceedings since her reign"	id.	1576	A treaty is concluded, by which the Huguenots are to exercise their religion	id.
	— 22. The Regent Murray is shot at Linlithgow	632		Henry heads the Catholic league to protect the church from the Protestants	id.
	Chatelherault, Argyle, and Huntley assume the government of Scotland, as lieutenants of Queen Mary	id.		Walter Devereux, earl of Essex, dies at Dublin	651
	April. Elizabeth sends two armies into Scotland; they ravage for a week, and then return	id.		The Prince of Orange establishes the independence of Holland and Zealand	id.
	— 26. The armies again enter Scotland; take Hume and False castles	id.		Bothwell dies at the Castle of Malmoe	602
	May 11. Another force marches into Scotland	id.	1577	Feb. Henry III. annuls the privileges granted to the Huguenots; they take up arms	649
	A bull of excommunication is affixed to the gates of the Bishop of London's residence	id.		Elizabeth, after rejecting the sovereignty of Holland and Zealand, sends aid to the Netherlands; concludes a treaty offensive and defensive with the Orange party	id.
	— 25. John Felton is sent to the Tower for having a copy of the bull in his possession	633	1578	A convention of Scotch nobility insist that King James shall undertake the government; the Regent Morton retires to Lochleven Castle; he obtains possession of the king's person, and resumes his authority	652
	A conspiracy is entered into in Norfolk; the conspirators are seized, tried, and executed	id.		Ernie Stuart, lord of Aubigny, arrives from France; is created Duke of Lennox. Morton is sent to prison	id. , 653
	Aug. 4. Felton is tried and convicted of treason	id.		Morton is executed by "the maiden"	id.
	— 8. He is executed	id.		James assumes the government	id.
1571	The Earl of Lennox is made regent of Scotland; he seizes the castle of Dunbarton	645		The Earl of Gowrie takes King James, and keeps him prisoner at the Castle of Ruthven	651
	He hangs the Archbishop of St. Andrews at Stirling, without trial	id.		The Duke of Lennox flies to France. The Earl of Arran is thrown into prison	id.
	Several persons are attainted in parliament for the murder of his son Darnley	id.		The king resumes the government	id.
	The Regent Lennox is shot, and the Earl of Marr is nominated regent	646	1579	The Earl of Leicester marries the widow of the Earl of Essex	650
	Apr. 2. Parliament meets; supplies are granted; it is declared to be high treason to claim a right to the succession of the crown during the queen's lifetime	633		Pope Gregory XIII. sends Fitz-Morris with some troops to Ireland	651
	Bailey, a servant of the Queen of Scots, is seized at Dover, returning from the Duke of Alva; he is sent to the Tower and tortured	637

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1580	A great rising takes place there: the rebels are defeated, and the Italian soldiers put to the sword, Ulster and Connaught are reduced to obedience	652	1587	Dec. 7. The Earl of Shrewsbury, earl marshal, attended by the Earls of Kent, Cumberland, and Derby, arrive at Fotheringay Castle, and read the warrant to Mary	667, 8
	Alençon, now Duke of Anjou, arrives at Greenwich as a suitor to Queen Elizabeth	650		— 8. Queen Mary is beheaded in the great hall of the castle	669, 670, 1
	He returns; Elizabeth submits the question of her marriage to the council	id.		— 14. Davison, the secretary, is committed to the Tower: he is fined 10,000 l.	671
1581	An embassy arrives from Catherine de Medici; the queen agrees to the marriage with the Duke of Anjou in six weeks	id.		Sir Robert Carey is sent to make excuses to King James for the execution of Mary	id.
	Anjou is elected King of the Netherlands; Elizabeth sends him supplies; he raises the siege of Cambray, and gains other successes; he returns to England	id.		Elizabeth apologises to the French ambassador for the same	id.
	Stubs and others have their right hands cut off for writing and publishing a pamphlet against the Duke of Anjou	651		April 19. Sir Francis Drake sails into Cadiz roads, and destroys thirty ships	672
	Anjou returns to the Netherlands, the queen refusing to marry	id.		He takes or destroys 100 Spanish vessels; captures a large ship in the Tagus; performs other brilliant exploits	id.
1583	The Earl of Desmond is killed: his head is sent to Elizabeth; it is placed on London Bridge	651		Nov. Elizabeth summons a great council of war; Sir Walter Raleigh advises that the expected invasion of the Spaniards be met at sea; vast preparations are made; a great camp is formed at Tilbury Fort; the queen reviews the troops at Tilbury Fort	672, 3, 4
	The Earl of Arundel, a Catholic, is arrested and sent to the Tower	id.		Robert Devereux, earl of Essex, is made master of the horse, knight of the garter, and captain-general of the cavalry	678
	The Earl of Northumberland shoots himself	id.	1588	May 29. The invincible armada, under the Duke of Medina Sidonia, sails from the Tagus; it is dispersed by a tempest off Cape Finisterre; Lord Howard of Edingham, the lord high admiral, sails for the Spanish coast; returns to Plymouth	671, 5
	Several papists are tortured and executed, charged with conspiracy against the government	id.		July 20. It arrives in channel	675
1584	The Throckmorton plot; Francis Throckmorton is put on the rack; he is executed at Tyburn	655		The battle commences, and is continued several days, from the 20th to the 26th of July; the Duke of Medina Sidonia sails for Spain; many of his ships are wrecked at the Orkneys and the coast of Norway; some of the Spaniards are made prisoners in Scotland, others are taken in Ireland and are put to death	675—8
	Parliament passes penal statutes against the Catholics; the jesuits, seminary priests, and English priests, are ordered to quit the kingdom in forty days on pain of treason	id.		Aug. The camp at Tilbury Fort is broken up	678
	Dr. Parry is committed to the Tower for treason for speaking in the House of Commons against the bill	id.		Sept. The Duke of Medina arrives with the wreck of the armada	id.
1585	Feb. 25. Dr. Parry is tried at Westminster; he pleads guilty; he denies his guilt; is executed as a traitor	656		— 4. The Earl of Leicester dies	id.
	Elizabeth sends a large army into the Netherlands under the command of Leicester; he is made governor-general of the Low Countries; he attacks Zutphen; is defeated. Sir Philip Sidney is killed	656	1589	Elizabeth fits out a large fleet under Drake, which sails against Spain; he proclaims Don Antonio king of Portugal; the fleet do great damage on the Portuguese coast; the army gain several victories; the expedition returns to England with great loss	678, 9
	Dec. Queen Mary is removed to Chartley Castle	658	1590	Essex marries the widow of Sir Philip Sidney	679
1586	Babington's conspiracy to assassinate Elizabeth is discovered; he is taken with many of his adherents; they are tortured	657	1591	He goes to France with a small army to aid Henry IV.; he gains some successes	id.
	Sept. 13. Some of them are tried and condemned	id.	1593	Henry IV. of France becomes a Roman Catholic	id.
	— 20. They are executed in Lincoln's Inn Fields	id.	1594	Rodrigo Lopez, physician to the queen, is examined on suspicion of a plot against the queen; he is discharged	id.
	— 15. The remainder of the conspirators tried and condemned	id.		He is again accused with Ferreira and Manuel Lewis of treason, in attempting to poison the queen; they are tortured; confess; are tried and executed	id., 680
	— 21. They are executed at the same place	id.	1595	Drake and Sir John Hawkins die	680
	Leicester returns to England	id.	1596	A fleet sails under the lord admiral to attack the Spanish coast	id.
	Elizabeth issues a commission for the trial of Queen Mary	658		June. The fleet sails into the bay of Cadiz; a sea-fight is gained by the English; Cadiz is taken	id.
	Mary is removed to Fotheringay Castle	id.		Burleigh is dismissed from court	id.
	Oct. 11. Thirty-six English commissioners arrive at the castle; they announce to Mary that she is to be tried for being accessory to Babington's conspiracy, and other treasons	id.	1597	Essex is made master of the ordnance	id.
	— 14. The trial commences; is adjourned to the 25th, at the Star Chamber at Westminster	660, 1, 2		July. A large fleet is fitted out to attack the coast of Spain; Essex captures three Spanish ships; he returns; is received by the queen with displeasure; he retires from court	680, 1
	— 25. Mary is pronounced guilty of treason, and sentenced to death	662		Essex is made hereditary earl marshal	681
	— 29. Parliament assembles	id.		A treaty of peace is signed	id.
	Nov. 12. Both houses address the queen, imploring her to order the execution of Mary	id.
	Dec. 6. The order for her execution is proclaimed	663
1587	Feb. 1. Elizabeth signs the warrant for her execution	666

A.D.	BOOK VI.	Pa	A.D.	BOOK VI.	Page
1598	June. The queen quarrels with Essex; he leaves the court	681	1601	He is called before the council	685
	Aug. 4. Lord Burleigh dies	id.		Feb. 8. Essex, the Earls of Southampton and Rutland, and others, attempt an insurrection in London; he is captured, and with Southampton sent to the Tower	686, 7
	Philip II. of Spain dies	id.		— 17. Lee is executed for treason	687
	Squires are accused of attempting to poison the queen; is put upon the rack; is condemned and executed as a traitor	id.		— 19. Essex and Southampton are tried and condemned	686, 7, 8
	The edict of Nantes is published	682		— 25. Essex is executed privately in the Tower	689
	Valentine Thomas accuses King James of hiring him to assassinate the queen	id.		— 28. Woodhouse is hanged for speaking against the execution of Essex	id.
	An insurrection breaks out in Ireland, headed by the Earl of Tyrone; he defeats the English at Blackwater	id.		March. Several others are executed for the insurrection during the month	id.
1599	March. The Earl of Essex is appointed to command in Ireland; he leaves London with a large army; he effects nothing	683		Oct. The queen meets parliament; the commons demand a redress of grievances; the queen agrees to revoke patents for monopolies	692, 3
	Sept. He returns to London, and appears at court without leave	684		Dec. 21. Lord Mountjoy, deputy of Ireland, attacks the Spaniards in Ireland; he captures them	693
	He is called before the council	id.	1602	The Earl of Tyrone surrenders to Mountjoy	id.
	He is delivered into free custody	id.	1603	March 21. The queen is confined to her bed	691
1600	Aug. He is released from custody	id.		— 22. She names James VI. of Scotland as her successor	id.
	The Gowrie conspiracy; the Ruthvens attempt to assassinate King James	690, 1		— 21. She dies	id.
1601	Essex encourages papists at his house, and corresponds with James about the succession	684, 5

BOOK VII.

A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page
1605	March 24. Sir Robert Carey posts to Scotland to inform King James of Elizabeth's death	2	1603	Aug. 5. Thanksgiving for James's escape from the Gowrie conspiracy	6
	King James is proclaimed in the city of London	3		— 10. General fast every Wednesday during the plague	7
	— 26. Sir Robert Carey arrives in Edinburgh	2		James appoints a master of the ceremonies	id.
	— 30. Sir Charles Percy and Thomas Somerset arrive from the council to announce to James his accession to the throne	id.		Raleigh, Cobham, Grey of Wilton, and others, are engaged in the plot to seize the king and force him to change his ministers and grant a general toleration	7, 8
	Sir Robert Cecil seizes eight hundred turbulent persons and sends them to serve on board the Dutch fleet	3		Nov. 15. The commoners in the "Bye Plot" are tried and convicted at Winchester	9
	April 6. King James sets out for Berwick	4		Sir Walter Raleigh is tried for the "Main"	9, 10, 11
	Queen Elizabeth is buried at Westminster	id.		He is found guilty of treason and condemned	12
	Sir Robert Cecil meets the king at York	id.		Grey and Cobham are tried by a commission of peers; they are both condemned for treason	2, 13
	— 21. James orders a thief to be hanged at Newark-upon-Trent without trial	id.		— 29. Clarke and Watson are executed at Winchester	13
	He knights a vast number of persons on his journey	5		Dec. 5. George Brooke is beheaded at the same place	id.
	May 3. He arrives at Theobalds; the lords of the council do homage	id.		Cobham, Grey, and Raleigh are sent to the Tower during the king's pleasure	11
	— 7. He arrives at the Charter House; issues a proclamation suspending all monopolies till examined; that royal protections shall cease, and that the oppressions of purveyors to the court be put down	id.		Markham, Brooksby, and Copley are banished	15
	All persons are forbidden to kill deer and all kinds of wild fowl used for hunting and hawking	id.	1604	Jan. 14-16. The king holds a meeting of the bishops and puritans at Hampton Court, acting as moderator; the king decides in favour of the bishops	16, 17
	A conspiracy is formed for seizing the king and forcing him to change his ministers and to grant toleration; the "Bye plot" and the "Main plot;" Raleigh, Cobham, Grey of Wilton, and others are engaged	7, 8		— 18. The puritans obtain time to conform	17
	James proceeds to the Tower and thence to Greenwich	5		Whitgift dies; Bancroft is made Archbishop of Canterbury	id.
	June. The queen, Prince Henry, and the other children, except Prince Charles, meet the king at Windsor Castle	6		The non-conforming clergy are persecuted and driven from their livings	id.
	Prince Henry is made a Knight of the Garter	id.		The papists are also persecuted	id.
	July 6. Several of the conspirators are arrested	8		March 19. Parliament meets; the king commands a conference between the two houses regarding the election of Sir Francis Goodwin	id.
	— 25. King James is crowned at Westminster	6		Commissioners abrogate all hostile laws between England and Scotland	35
	Sir Walter Raleigh and Lord Cobham are committed to the Tower	9		Parliament remonstrates against purveyance and monopolies; warship and other abuses; tonnage and poundage is granted	19.
	The plague rages in London	6

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page
1604	Richard Haddock preaches before the king and some lords "in his sleep"	20	1606	July. Christian IV., king of Denmark, visits England	33
	Robert Catesby furnishes the gunpowder plot	20, 21		The Prince Vandemont visits England	34
	Guido Fawkes is brought to England by Winter			Nov. 18. Parliament meets; Sir Christopher Pigot is expelled the House of Commons and committed to the Tower; parliament refuses to naturalise the Scots born before the accession of James; the king interferes with the liberties of the House of Commons	31, 35
	The conspirators meet and take the oath	id.		An ecclesiastical convention summoned by royal authority in Scotland appoint moderators of the presbyteries and the bishops to be ex officio moderators of provincial synods	65
	Nov. 29. Mr. Pound, a Catholic, is tried in the Star Chamber; he is fined and imprisoned	22	1607	May. An insurrection is raised by the Levellers in Northamptonshire, Warwickshire, and Leicestershire	36
	The gunpowder conspirators proceed in their work of mining under the houses of parliament	22, 3		They are defeated and executed as rebels	36, 37
1605	Jan. They are increased to the number nine	23		Dec. 21. Robert Carr is knighted	38
	May. A celliar is hired under the parliament-house and powder carried there	id.	1608	The Earl of Tyrone goes to Spain, and from thence to Rome, and lives on a pension from the pope	39
	Aug. Fawkes goes to Flanders to win over Sir William Stanley and Captain Owen	id.		The Earl of Dorset dies; Cecil, now Earl of Salisbury, is appointed treasurer	m.
	Sept. Sir Edmund Baynham is sent to Rome to secure the favour of the pope	24	1609	Monopolies are established and bartered	40
	Parliament is prorogued to the 5th of November	id.		A duty is laid on Cornish raisins; Bates, a Turkey merchant, resists payment; the barons of the Exchequer decide that the king has a right to levy taxes without the consent of parliament	id.
	Sir Everard Digby, Ambrose Rookwood, and Francis Tresham join the conspiracy	id.		The Consistorial Courts of Scotland are restored to the bishops	63
	Oct. 26. Lord Mounteagle receives a letter warning him to stay away from parliament	25	1610	Feb. 14. Parliament meets; Cecil asks the Lords for supplies; the Commons declare the decision of the Exchequer illegal; the king calls both Houses before him at Whitehall; the Commons insist upon the right of parliament to levy taxes	40, 41
	He carries it to Secretary Cecil	id.		An arrangement of marriage between the Lady Arabella Stuart and William Seymour is discovered; they are summoned before the privy council; they are forbidden to marry without the king's leave	46
	— 31. King James comes from Royston; he reads the letter	26		July. Their marriage is detected; Lady Arabella is committed to custody at Lambeth; Seymour to the Tower; she is released and sent to Durham; escapes on the way; sails for France; is overtaken and sent to the Tower; Seymour escapes to France	46, 7
	Nov. 4. The Lord Chamberlain Suffolk and Lord Mounteagle discover Fawkes	27		The king erects the High Commission Courts in Scotland: one at St. Andrew's, another at Glasgow	65
	— 5. He is apprehended; carried before the king	id.		The authority of the bishops is confirmed by Parliament in Scotland	65, 6
	— 6. He is carried to the Tower; most of the other conspirators quit London	id.		The Scottish bishops are summoned to London for consecration, and afterwards consecrate others in Scotland	66
	The Earl of Northumberland is committed to custody	32		Ogilvy, a Jesuit, is executed	66
	— 10. Fawkes on this and preceding days is tortured; he declares his associates	27		The two houses confer upon Dr. Cowell's book on Prerogative; he is sent to prison and his book suppressed by proclamation	41
	Catesby, Winter, John and Christopher Wright, and Percy are killed	28		The Commons petition against the High Commission Court and other grievances	42
	Many others are captured, and with Tresham lodged in the Tower	29		They agree to grant 200,000 l. a-year revenue upon the king giving up the right of wardship, purveyance, and other privileges	43
	Lords Stourton, Mordaunt, and Montague are arrested	32	May 14. Henry IV. of France is assassinated; is succeeded by Louis XIII.
	Dec. 23. Tresham dies in the Tower	29		Convocation of the clergy of Canterbury grant a subsidy	45
1606	Jan. 15. A proclamation is issued against three Jesuits, Garnet, Greenway, and Gerard	id.		Nov. Archbishop Bancroft dies	41, 5
	— 21. Parliament meets; passes severe laws against the papists; a new oath of allegiance is framed	32	1611	Parliament is dissolved without passing one act	41
	— 27. Digby, the two Winters, Rookwood, Grant, Fawkes, Keyes, and Bates, are tried; Digby pleads guilty; the rest are convicted; all are condemned to death as traitors	29, 30		Dr. George Abbot is made archbishop of Canterbury	45
	— 29, 30. They are executed in St. Paul's churchyard	30		King James writes against Vorstinus	47
	Garnet, the Jesuit, is taken; his two servants, Owen and Chambers, and Oldcorn, a Jesuit, are also captured; all but Garnet are tortured; Owen kills himself	id.		March. Robert Carr is created Viscount Rochester	49
	Oldcorn and others are tried and executed at Worcester	31
	March 3. Garnet is tried for treason at Guildhall; he is convicted	id. 32
	Blackwall publishes the pope's breve against the oath of allegiance; he is committed to prison	33
	May 3. Garnet is executed	32
	Cecil is made knight of the Garter	id.
	June. The Earl of Northumberland is tried in the Star Chamber for seeking to be head of the papists and a promoter of toleration; he is sentenced to pay a fine of 30,000 l. , to be deprived of his offices and imprisoned for life

A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page
1612	March 1. Legate, an Arian heretic, is burnt in Smithfield	48	1617	March. Lord Brackley, the chancellor, resigns the seal, and soon after dies	63
	April. Viscount Rochester is made a privy councillor and knight of the Garter	49		Francis Bacon is made lord keeper	id.
	— 11. Wightman is burnt for heresy at Lichfield	48		— 28. Sir Walter Raleigh sails for the recovery of Guiana	74
	May 24. Robert Cecil, earl of Salisbury, dies Carr is made Lord chamberlain	45 49		June. King James arrives in Edinburgh	66
	Oct. 16. The Count Palatine, Frederic V., arrives in England to marry the Princess Elizabeth			Calls a parliament; an act is prepared to declare that whatever should be determined by the king, with the advice of the bishops and clergy, relating to ecclesiastical affairs, shall be law; the clergy remonstrate; parliament is dissolved	id.
	— 24. Henry Prince of Wales falls sick	51		James attends a great meeting of the clergy at St. Andrew's; Simpson, Ewart, and Calderwood, three of the remonstrants, are punished by the High Commission Court	id.
	Nov. 6. He dies	52		James insists upon five articles at the meeting of St. Andrew's; the same are referred to a general meeting of the kirk; James returns to England	id.
	Dec. The Princess Elizabeth is affianced to the Palatine	id.		On his way back he publishes his Book of Sports, and appoints its reading in the churches	67
1613	Feb. 14. They are married	id.		Bacon, who had fallen into disgrace and quarrelled with Coke during the king's absence, is received into favour	68, 9
	April 21. Sir Thomas Overbury is committed to the Tower	53		Lord Coke's daughter is married to Sir John Villiers	70
	The Countess of Essex sues for a divorce; a commission of delegates is appointed by the king	id.		Coke is restored to the council-table	id.
	Sept. 24. Sir Thomas Overbury dies in the Tower	54		Nov. 13. Raleigh and his companions recover the land of Guiana	71
	— 25. The marriage of the Earl and Countess of Essex is declared null and void	id.		Dec. Several disputes take place with the Spaniards; some on both sides are killed; the town of St. Thomas is burnt; Captain Keymis shoots himself	75
	Nov. 4. Carr is created Earl of Somerset	id.	1618	Jan. 4. Bacon is made lord chancellor	70
	Dec. 26. Somerset and the countess are married at Whitehall	id.		June. Sir Walter Raleigh anchors at Plymouth; he is arrested; is carried to London; attempts to escape; is lodged in the Tower	75, 6
1614	The order of baronets is created; peerages are sold	54,		July. Chancellor Bacon is created Baron Verulam	70
	April 5. Parliament is assembled; the Commons demand a conference with the Lords on the right of the king to tax the subject; the Lords demand the opinion of the judges; the judges, headed by Coke, chief justice, refuse to give an opinion; the Lords decline the conference	55		Villiers is created Marquis of Buckingham; made lord high admiral, warden of the cinque ports, &c. &c.	71
	The king demands supplies; the Commons refuse without a redress of grievances	56		Peerages are sold to or forced upon parties	70, 71
	June 7. Parliament (the Addle Parliament) is dissolved	id.		Raleigh is examined in the Tower by the privy council	77
	— 8. Five of the members of the late House of Commons are committed to the Tower	id.		The Earl and Countess of Suffolk are committed to the Tower	71
	Lord Grey, committed for the gunpowder plot, dies in the Tower	15		They are brought before the Star Chamber and fined; recommitted to the Tower; and afterwards released	id.
	— 15. The Earl of Northampton dies; George Villiers appears at court; is made cup-bearer to the king	57		Oct. 28. Raleigh is taken by habeas corpus to the Court of King's Bench to receive judgment for the treason committed in 1603; "Execution is granted"	77, 78
1615	March. Sir Walter Raleigh is released from the Tower	73		— 29. He is taken from the Gatehouse and beheaded in Old Palace Yard	78, 9
	April 24. George Villiers is sworn a gentleman of the privy chamber; has a pension of 1000 l. a-year	58	1619	Lord Cobham dies in the Minories	15
	— 25. He is knighted	id.		Nov. 4. The Elector Palatine is elected King of Bohemia	81
	The king grants a pardon to Somerset for all treasons and felonies; Ellesmere, the chancellor, refuses to put the great seal to it	id.		The synod of Dort is held	48
	Somerset is arrested by warrant from the lord chief justice; is committed to the Tower	id.	1620	James sends a force, under the command of the Earls of Essex and Oxford, and Sir Horatio Vere, to Holland to assist the new made king	id.
	Weston, Mrs. Turner, Franklin, and Elwes are tried for the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury	58, 9	1621	Jan. 27. Bacon is created Viscount St. Albans	82
	They are all hanged at Tyburn	59		— 30. Parliament meets; James asks supplies for the war in the Palatinate	81
	Aug. 7. Edward Peacham is condemned for treason for writing a sermon blaming the king's fondness for sport	57		Feb. 15. The Commons vote the supplies; they attack the monopolists; they commit Sir Francis Mitchell to the Tower; the Lords adjudge him and his partner, Sir Giles Mompesson, to be degraded, fined, and imprisoned	82
	Sept. 27. The Lady Arabella Stuart dies mad in the Tower	47		Yelverton is fined and imprisoned for life	id.
1616	May 24. The Countess of Somerset is arraigned; pleads guilty; is condemned to death	61		Bacon is impeached for corruption	id.
	— 25. Somerset is brought to trial; is declared guilty	61, 2		March. Philip III. of Spain dies; is succeeded by Philip IV.	89
	Sir Edward Coke is disgraced; Montague is made chief justice	62, 3
	Nov. Lord Ellesmere is created Viscount Brackley	63
1617	Jan. 5. Villiers is created Earl of Buckingham	id.

A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page
1621	April 24. Bacon confesses	82, 3	1625	The council and officers of government are re-appointed	108
	May 3. The House of Lords deliver judgment; he is fined 40,000 l. , and committed to the Tower during the king's pleasure	83		March 30. The king ratifies the treaty of marriage with France	109
	Edward Floyde, a Catholic, is fined by the Commons	84		May 1. Henrietta Maria is married by proxy at Paris	id.
	The House of Lords increase the fine, and adds to the punishment whipping and imprisonment for life in Newgate	id.		June 7. The queen arrives at Dover with the Duke of Buckingham	id.
	Bishop Williams is made Lord Keeper	85		— 8. The king meets her at Dover	id.
	The King abolishes thirty-six of the monopolies and patents			Parliament meets; Charles asks for supplies; the Commons grant a sum; and the duties of tonnage and poundage for one year; the Lords reject the latter part of the bill	110, 11
	May 24. Sir Robert Mansell sails to Algiers; burns some shipping, and returns home			The Commons take Dr. Montague, one of the king's chaplains, into custody; the king interposes; the Commons refuse to release him till he finds bail; the king adjourns parliament to Oxford on account of the plague	111
	The Earls of Oxford and Southampton, Selden, and others, are committed by the king to prison without trial			The king raises troops for the Palatinate by warrants of his own authority	id.
	Nov. Parliament reassembles; the king reproves the Commons for questioning his commitments, and for objecting to the marriage of the Prince of Wales with the Infanta of Spain			Troops are sent against Rochelle	id.
	Dec. 18. The Commons enter a protestation of liberties on their Journals			July. Ships are chartered in the king's name; they refuse to go against the Huguenots; the troops desert	112
	The king expunges it			Aug. Parliament meets at Oxford; the Commons refuse to alter their former vote; they consider the various grievances; complain of the conduct of Buckingham	113
1622	The king dissolves parliament by proclamation He commits Coke and Sir Robert Phillips to the Tower; Selden, Pym, and Mallory, to other prisons	id.		— 12. The king suddenly dissolves parliament Writs are issued for loans to the king; tonnage and poundage are levied, though the bill did not pass; other means are devised for levying money to make war on Spain	id.
	Some of the peers are called before the privy council, and committed to the Tower	id.		A large army and fleet are collected; the Dutch contribute sixteen ships; the expedition sails to the coast of Spain; fails; returns to Plymouth	id. , 114
	The king pardons for recusancy all English Catholics who apply; others are released	89		The commander, Lord Wimbledon, is called before the council	114
	Sept. Vorstius dies	48		Buckingham goes to Holland; purvis the crown jewels and plate
1623	Feb. 17. The Prince of Wales and Buckingham proceed to Spain	91		Charles issues orders against the Catholics; the papish lords are disgraced	116
	The king releases all the seminary priests and Jesuits from the London prisons	id.		The king arbitrarily appoints seven members of the House of Commons to be sheriffs	117
	Charles is received at Madrid by the royal family of Spain	93, 4	1626	Feb. 2. The king is crowned at Westminster	id.
	Buckingham is made a duke	97		— 6. Parliament assembles; Lord Keeper Coventry opens the business; a committee of the Commons draws up a list of grievances; the king commands them not to question his servants	id. , 118
	The Infanta Donna Maria adopts the style of Princess of England	98		He agrees to submit to a secret committee the abuses of the state	119
	Oct. 5. The prince and Buckingham land at Portsmouth	99		The Earl of Arundel is committed by royal warrant to the Tower	id.
	— 6. They return to London	100		The Lords demand his liberation; he is released	id.
	The prince refuses to marry the Infanta	100		Buckingham impeaches the Earl of Bristol at the bar of the Lords	id.
	The Earl of Bristol is commanded to retire to his house in the country as a prisoner	id.		Bristol impeaches Buckingham	id.
1624	Feb. 19. The Houses of Parliament assemble; the king asks for supplies for a Spanish war; supplies are voted, to be applied by a parliamentary committee; strict orders are issued against all Catholics	102		May 8. The Commons impeach the duke	120
	The Earl of Middlesex is impeached; condemned by the Lords to pay a fine of 5000 l. , and to be imprisoned during pleasure	103		10. Sir John Eliot and Sir Dudley Digges are sent to the Tower	id.
	The Spanish ambassadors remonstrate with James	id.		The Commons refuse to proceed to business; the two members are released	121
	The king takes the Prince of Wales to Windsor; Buckingham retires to Wallingford; he is reconciled to the king	104		The king commands the university of Cambridge to elect Buckingham chancellor	id.
	Troops are raised and sent for the recovery of the Palatinate	105, 6		June 1. He is elected by a majority of three	122
	Several Englishmen are massacred by the Dutch at Amboyna	105		— 8. Buckingham answers the impeachment of the Commons; pleads a pardon of the king being voted	id.
1625	An embassy is sent to France to negotiate a marriage between the Princess Henrietta Maria and the Prince of Wales	106		— 15. Parliament is dissolved without supplies being voted
	The match is concluded, and liberty of conscience promised by James to the Catholics	107		The Earl of Arundel is kept in custody in his own house; the Earl of Bristol is committed to the Tower	123
	March 27. King James dies at Theobalds; the Prince of Wales is immediately proclaimed	108		A warrant is issued under the great seal for levying import and export duties; forced loans
	Accession of King Charles I.	id.
	— 23. Charles is proclaimed	id.
	The plague rages throughout London	id.

A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page
	are directed; ships are commanded to be furnished by the ports; troops are levied by lords lieutenant	123	1629	The members apply for writs of habeas corpus; are defeated	141
1626	Sir John Eliot and Hampden, and Sir Thomas Wentworth, are imprisoned for refusing to contribute to the loan	id.		Nov. They appear to give bail; refuse to find sureties, and are recommitted to the Tower	id.
	The clergy preach in favour of the loan, and against parliaments	id.		Richard Chambers is fined by the Star Chamber for uttering seditious words	145
	Aug. The king banishes all the queen's French servants	124		Sir John Eliot, Hollis and Valentine are fined and imprisoned during the king's pleasure by the court of king's bench for words spoken in Parliament	144
	Sept. Marshal de Bassompierre is sent to England as special ambassador from France	125, 6		Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, gains many victories in Germany in favour of the Protestants	146
1627	May. Troops and ships are raised to aid Rochelle; the Duke of Buckingham is appointed to command	127	1630	May. The queen gives birth to a son	151
	July 11. The expedition lands, takes St. Martin, and performs other unimportant operations	128		Alexander Leighton, a puritan preacher, is whipped, placed in the pillory, and imprisoned for life for sedition by the Star Chamber	id.
	Nov. He returns to England	129		Nov. Charles signs a treaty of peace with Spain. He still continues to collect tonnage and poundage	150
	The refusers to contribute to the loan are sent to London, and arbitrarily imprisoned	id.		He revives several of the feudal customs; the monopolies are increased; the lauds of former forests are seized, and other proceedings taken to raise money	id. , 151
1628	The king appoints commissioners to collect war-money; the commission is revoked; he orders duties to be levied on merchandize; the judges declare it illegal; the orders are revoked	130		Many of the Puritans emigrate to America	152
	Mar. 17. Parliament meets; some of the "refusers" are released; Bristol is discharged from the Tower	id.	1631	Land revives the mode of consecrating churches	158
	May 8. The commons resolve that the king has no right to commit without authority of law; that the habeas corpus writs cannot be denied; that forced loans are illegal	131		May. A commission is issued empowering the privy council to determine differences between the courts of justice	id.
	— 28. The commons pray the king's assent to the "petition of right"	id.		Sherfield is fined in the Star Chamber for removing a painted window in a church	159
	They question the conduct of Buckingham; the king interferes	133	1632	The Countess of Somerset dies	62
	June 7. The king gives his assent to the "Petition of Right"	134		Wentworth is made lord president of the North	160
	— 12. The commons grant supplies; vote a remonstrance against Buckingham; the king prorogues Parliament	135		Nov. 6. Gustavus Adolphus is killed at the battle of Lutzen	173
	Buckingham proceeds to Portsmouth to embark for Rochelle	136		The Prince Palatine Frederick dies at the same place	id.
	Aug. 23. He is stabbed by Felton	id.		— 27. Sir John Eliot dies in the Tower	212
	Sept. 18. He is buried in Westminster Abbey	137	1633	Charles pays a visit to Scotland	156
	Felton is tried and executed	138		Wentworth is made lord deputy of Ireland	168
	Rochelle is taken by the French	id.		He calls a parliament; exacts implicit obedience to the king; erects a court similar to the Star Chamber; arbitrarily fines people; persecutes Lord Mountnorris for extortion, who is cashiered and sentenced to be shot 169-70-71
1629	Sir Thomas Wentworth is created Baron and Viscount Wentworth	145		June 18. Charles is crowned in Edinburgh	156
	Jan. 20. Parliament meets. The Commons take into consideration the invasion of the Petition of Right	id.		A Scottish parliament is summoned; it votes supplies; the regulation for the vestments of the clergy are renounced by a majority; but the articles are declared by the king to be carried	id.
	— 20. The houses attend before the king at Whitehall	139		— 28. The parliament is dissolved	id.
	The lords and commons confer upon the state of the church	id.		The king appoints Edinburgh an episcopal see	157
	Feb. 2. The commons present to the king their apology for delaying tonnage and poundage	140		July 20. He returns to London	id.
	— 3. The king commands them to proceed with the bill	id.		Aug. 6. Laud is made archbishop of Canterbury	id.
	The commons complain of the growth of Arminianism; Cromwell joins the debate	id.		Sep. 19. He is installed	id.
	25. The commons present a report entitled "Heads of Articles agreed upon, and to be insisted on by the House," directed against Laud and Arminianism	141		Oct. Chief justice Richardson and Baron Deuhem issue an order prohibiting noisy sports on Sundays	160
	The king adjourns the house	id.		— 18. The king issues a proclamation enforcing King James's Book of Sports	161
	Mar. 2. The house meets; is again adjourned by the king	id.	1634	Grotius publishes his book "Mare Liberum"	174
	The house denies the king's right to adjourn them; they remonstrate; the commons hold the speaker in the chair; they pass a resolution; adjourn themselves to the 10th	142		Pyrrone is prosecuted in the Star Chamber for writing "Histrio Mastix;" is fined 10,000 l. ; is braided; his ears cut off; and his nose slit	152-5
	— 10. The king dissolves the Parliament	142		Mar. Laud is made lord high treasurer	161
	He counts seven members to the Tower	id.		June 21. He establishes before the king in council his right as metropolitan of visitation of both universities	163
	They are cited before the Star Chamber, and are fined	143		Williams, the late lord keeper, is fined 10,000 l. by the Star Chamber; and imprisoned in the Tower during pleasure; and 8000 l. by the high commission court for writing "The Holy Table"	163-4-5
	The king issues a proclamation	id.		Laud has the power of licensing all printed books	165, 6

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page
1634	Oct. 21. The first writ is issued by the lords of the council for levying ship-money	176	1638	The bishops deny the jurisdiction of the assembly	195
	The judges give an extra-judicial opinion that the king may levy it	177		The assembly proceed; excommunicate the bishops, and abolish episcopacy throughout Scotland	199
1635	Selden publishes his book "Mare Clausum"	174	1639	Feb. 15. The king writes to the nobility and gentry commanding them to raise troops and meet him at York on the 1st of April	200
	Prince Charles Louis, and Prince Rupert, sons of the Palatine, come to England	173		The queen issues a circular to the Catholics calling upon them to aid in the Scottish war	201
	The queen is delivered of a daughter	id.		March. General Leslie takes Edinburgh Castle for the covenanters; other strong places are taken	203
	Writs for ship-money are sent into the inland counties	176		Leslie and Montrose defeat the Marquis of Huntley, and take him to Edinburgh Castle	203
1636	The king sends a fleet under the command of the Earl of Northumberland, and they sink some Dutch vessels in the northern seas	174		The Marquis of Hamilton lands with a large force on the Isle of May	id.
	The Dutch give 30,000 l. a year for liberty to fish	id.		— 23. The king begins his journey towards the north	id.
1637	Feb. The Emperor Ferdinand the 2nd dies, and is succeeded by Ferdinand the 3rd	id.		— 30. He arrives at York	id.
	The Princes Charles Louis, and Rupert, go to Holland with a force for the recovery of the Palatinate; they are defeated; Rupert is captured and sent to the Castle of Vincennes	id.		He exacts an oath from all to be faithful and obedient, and to have no correspondence with the covenanters; Lords Saye and Brook refuse	201
	June. Prynne, Dr. Bastwick, and Burton are prosecuted in the Star Chamber for libels on the church; are fined 5000 l. each; branded and otherwise mutilated; sent to solitary imprisonment	166	April 29.	He marches from York; appoints the Earl of Arundel his general, the Earl of Essex lieutenant-general, and the Earl of Holland general of the horse	id.
	July 23. The Book of Services for the Church of Scotland is read in St. Giles's kirk, Edinburgh, by the Bishop of Edinburgh; a riot takes place; the bishop is attacked	182, 3		The royal army encamps near Berwick	id.
	— 21. A proclamation is issued against the rioters	183	May 30.	Leslie, with the Scottish army, advances across the borders, and takes up a position within a mile of Charles	id.
	The council, by order of Charles, issue a decree banishing the clergy who refuse to read the Book of Common Prayer	184	June 20.	A treaty is concluded between the covenanters and the king	205
	The king sends down orders for moving the session and the council from Edinburgh, and a proclamation commanding the Presbyterians to disperse	185	— 21.	Both armies are disbanded; the king takes up his quarters at Berwick	id.
	Nov. 6. The question of ship money in the case of Hampden is argued before the whole judges of England	179, 180	Aug. 1.	The king returns to London	206
1638	Jan. Lilburne and Warton are cited before the Star Chamber for printing without licence	167	— 6.	The Earl of Traquair is appointed commissioner to treat with the general assembly at Edinburgh	id.
	Feb. 13. They are fined 500 l. each; Lilburne is whipped; both are set in the pillory and committed to the Fleet	id.	— 12.	The convention meets; adopts all the acts of the assembly at Glasgow; the commissioner signs the covenant; the assembly is dissolved	id.
	— 19. The Scotch Presbyterians having demanded the removal of the liturgy, the book of canons, and the abolition of the High Commission Court, Lord Traquair issues a proclamation against meetings on pain of treason	186	Edinburgh	and twenty other castles are given up by the covenanters in pursuance of the treaty	207
	Lords Home and Lauderdale issue a counter proclamation	id.	— 20.	The Scottish parliament meets; is prorogued	id.
	They are joined by vast numbers	id.	Lord Loudon	is sent to London by the covenanters; is seized and sent to the Tower for writing a letter signed "Au Roi"	id.
	March 1. The Presbyterians hold a meeting at St. Giles's kirk, of which they take possession; they swear to the Covenant	187	A Spanish	fleet is beaten by Van Tromp and De Witt near Dover	208
	June 3. The Marquis of Hamilton proceeds to Dalkeith to meet the covenanters; he proceeds thence to Holyrood House; they demand the total establishment of the covenant throughout Scotland	189, 190	Wentworth	is sent for from Ireland; he and the other members of the council advise the calling of a parliament	209
	— 12. Judgment is given in favour of the king by a majority of the judges in the case of Hampden	181	He is made	lord lieutenant of Ireland	id.
	Sept. 22. The liturgy, the High Commission Court, and other grievances in Scotland are abolished by the king's proclamation at Edinburgh	193	1640	Jan. 12. He is created Earl of Strafford; he returns to Ireland; calls a parliament	id.
	Mary de Medicis, queen dowager of France, visits England	217	Mar. 17.	The Irish parliament grants large supplies	id.
	Oct. The covenanters demand a warrant for citing the Scotch bishops as criminals before the general assembly at Glasgow	195	April.	Strafford returns to England	210
	Nov. 21. The general assembly takes place there	id.	— 13.	The English parliament assembles	211
				The first petition is presented to the House of Commons against ship-money, monopolies, the Star Chamber, the High Commission Court, and other grievances	212
				— 18. The Commons refer the case of Sir John Eliot and Mr. Hollis to a committee; order the record in the case of Hampden to be brought into the house	213
				March 20. They resolve that the adjournment of the house by the speaker by the king's command is a breach of privilege	213
				— 21. Both houses are summoned before the king; he allows the Commons to enter into their grievances after they vote supplies, and

A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page
	declares that he never intended to make ship-money an annual revenue	213	1640	Nov. 28. They are brought to London; their punishment declared illegal, and damages awarded them	228, 229
1640	The Lords and Commons confer; the Lords declare that they have voted that supply should precede the question of grievance	215		Strafford is impeached by the Commons and sent to the Tower	230
	The Commons vote this a breach of privilege	id.		Dec. 18. Laud is impeached by the Commons for high treason; he is committed to custody by the House of Lords'	229
	April 30. The House of Commons resolves itself into a grand committee on ship-money; the Lords demand an immediate conference; the Commons refuse	id.		Wren, bishop of Ely, is ordered to give security in 10,000 l. to answer the judgment of parliament	230
	May 1. The two houses confer; the Commons continue their committee	id.		Windebank and Finch are impeached, but escape	231
	— 2. The king sends a message hastening the supplies	id.		Six of the judges are ordered by the House of Lords to find bail to abide the decision of parliament for their judgment regarding ship-money	id.
	May 4. Sends another message; offers to give up ship-money if supplies are voted, and will then consider the question of grievances	216		Berkeley, one of them, is arrested on the bench	id.
	The Commons reply that they will resume the question on the morrow	id.	1641	Jan. The Triennial Bill passes	232
	— 5. The king commands the attendance of the speaker at Whitehall	id.		Feb. 4. The queen sends a letter to the Commons concerning one of her priests	id. , 233
	The Commons meet; are summoned to the bar of the Lords by the Usher of the Black Rod; they attend without the speaker; the king dissolves the parliament	216, 217		Parliament votes money for the payment of the Scotch army	234
	The king puts forth a declaration of his reasons for dissolving the short parliament	217		March 11. The commons resolve that the clergy shall not be magistrates or judges in any civil court	id.
	— 6. Bellasis and Hotbani, two members, are sent to the Fleet by warrant signed by some of the council	id.		— 22. Strafford's trial commences	235
	Crew is committed in the same manner to the Tower	id.		April 21. A bill of attainder against him passes the commons	210
	The convocation enact some new constitutions	218		May 1. Both houses are called before the king; he proposes that Strafford should be punished for misdemeanour	241
	Writs of ship-money are issued and enforced; money is arbitrarily raised in various ways	id.		— 3. The commons pass a "solemn protestation"	id.
	Four aldermen are committed for not using diligence regarding the collection of ship-money	id.		— 4. They go into committee on the bill, that parliament should not be dissolved without consent of both houses	242
	— 11. The palace of Lambeth is attacked by a mob	id. , 219		— 7. The bill is passed in the lords; also the attainder of Strafford	id.
	One of the rioters is executed for treason	219		— 9. The king signs a commission to give his assent to the bill of attainder	218
	June 2. The Scottish parliament meets; puts forth manifestos, levies a tax on rent, and otherwise prepares for the war and provides for the government	id.		— 10. The royal assent is given to the bill	211
	Aug. 20. Charles begins his journey towards York	220		— 11. The king writes to the house of lords in favour of Strafford	214
	Leslie, the general of the army of the covenant, crosses the Tweed	id.		— 12. Strafford is beleaguered on Tower Hill	215
	— 27. He encamps at Heddonlaw; Lord Conway draws up the royal army	id. , 221		— 17. Several officers of state resign; re-appointments are made; the Earl of Leicester is made lord-lieutenant of Ireland	216
	— 28. Rout of the royal forces at Newburn	221		June 22. The commons grant tonnage and poundage, and vote six subsidies; pass bills imposing a poll-tax for paying the army, and for abolishing the star chamber and high commission court	247
	— 29. The royalists evacuate Newcastle; retreat to Northallerton	222		July 2-5. The king gives his assent to them	id.
	Sept. The king negotiates with the Scotch; twelve English petition the king to call a parliament; 10,000 of the Londoners petition to the same effect	223		Aug. 4. Thirteen bishops are impeached by the commons	248
	— 24. A great council of peers assembles at York by the king's summons; commissioners are appointed to treat with the Scotch commissioners at Ripon	224		— 10. The king goes to Scotland	249
	The Lords resolve to borrow money for the supply of the army	id.		A commission from parliament is sent to watch his proceedings	id.
	Oct. 16. An agreement is come to between the English and Scotch commissioners for the maintenance of the Scotch army for a time; negotiations are adjourned to London	226		He meets the Scotch parliament	id. , 250
	Nov. 3. The king opens the long parliament	id.		"The incident" is discovered by the parliament	id. , 251
	Lenthall is chosen speaker of the Commons	id.		General Leslie is created earl of Leven	252
	The Commons appoint a committee of grievance	227		Oct. An insurrection breaks out in Ireland; the Protestants are massacred	252, 3, 4
	— 7. They resolve that Burton, Bastwick, and Frynne attend the house, and certify why they are imprisoned, and have been mutilated and brandol	228		Oct. 31. The English house of commons vote supplies in aid of the government of Ireland	253
				Nov. Other measures are taken for suppressing the insurrection	id.
				The king sets out on his return to London	id.
				— 20. The parliament insist on their right to have a guard during their deliberations	id.
				— 22. The commons carry, by a majority, their "remonstrance of the state of the kingdom"	256
				A proposition that it be printed is lost	id.
				— 23. Palmer, a member, is committed by the house for protesting against the remonstrance	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

41

A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page
1641	Dec. 1. It is presented to the king	257	1612	The commons impeach Lord Digby	272
	— 3. The king makes a speech to both houses	id.		The Princess Mary is married to the Prince of Orange	id.
	— 8. Both houses resolve that they will give no consent to toleration of the popish religion	id.		Feb. The king gives his assent to a bill for excluding the bishops from the house of lords, and another for impressing soldiers for Ireland	id.
	The king issues a proclamation against religious not established by law	258		Both houses pass the militia bill	274
	— 14. The king again makes a speech in parliament	id.		— 23. The queen and Princess Mary embark for Holland	272
	— 15. The commons, by a majority, vote the printing of "the remonstrance"	id.		— 25. The king commands the Prince of Wales to meet him at Greenwich	274
	— 22. Balfour, lieutenant of the Tower, is dismissed, and Colonel Lunsford is appointed by the king	259		— 27. The king refuses to let the prince come to London	id.
	The commons resolve that he is unfit for the office	id.		Parliament petition the king to come to London; to send the prince; to assent to the militia bill	275
	— 26. The king removes him, and the Earl of Newport, the constable	260		The houses resolve to put the kingdom in a state of defence; issue orders; the militia ordinance is read, and the commons state their declaration of fears	id.
	— 27. Some riots take place round the houses of parliament	260		May 7. The king removes to Newmarket; refuses his assent to the militia ordinance	276
	The thirteen bishops, who had been impeached, having again taken their places, remonstrate to the king against all acts done in their absence	261		— 16. Parliament declares the kingdom in danger; orders the lords-tenant to call out the militia by authority of the two houses alone	277
	The two houses pronounce the remonstrance a breach of privilege; the commons accuse twelve of them of treason; they are seized, and ten are committed to the Tower	id.		— 19. The king arrives at York; organises a government there	278
	— 31. The commons send an address to the king, praying for a guard; they procure arms in the house	262		Hull is taken possession of for the parliament	278
1642	Jan. 3. The king sends an answer	id.		— 24. The king issues a proclamation for the collection of tonnage and poundage	279
	Lord Kimbolton, Hollis, Hazlerig, Pym, Hampden, and Strode, are accused of treason before the lords; a serjeant-at-arms demands the five who are members of the house of commons	263		The lords and commons publish an order, retaining to themselves the control of that revenue	id.
	— 4. The accused members attend in their places; they withdraw by order of the house; the king appears in person in the house of commons, demands them, makes a speech, and retires; the house adjourns	id. , 264		April 8. The king declares his intention of going into Ireland	id.
	— 5. The king has his speech printed and circulated	id.		— 23. He demands admission into Hull, which is refused; he proclaims Sir John Hotham a traitor	id.
	The commons establish a permanent committee at Guildhall; the king goes to the common council, and there demands the five members	265		Messages pass between the king and parliament	280, 1
	— 9. The commons draw up a declaration and petition respecting the king's visit to the house	id.		May 3. The parliament require the militia ordinance to be put in force	283
	The king issues a proclamation, charging Kimbolton and the five members with treason	id.		The king issues a proclamation against the muster of troops or militia without his authority	id.
	The committee declare the same and all the late acts to be breaches of privilege	266		He summons a county meeting at York; a small force is collected	id.
	The royal family remove to Hampton Court	id.		The Scotch parliament mediate between the king and the English parliament; they remonstrate against the king going to Ireland	284
	— 10. Lord Kimbolton and the five members proceed to parliament	id.		Several members of both houses go to the king at York	id.
	The king declares he does not wish to violate the privileges of parliament	id.		Lord Keeper Littleton sends the great seal to the king; he goes to York	287
	— 12. Lord Digby escapes beyond sea; Colonel Lunsford is sent to the Tower for raising troops for the king	267		Hyde joins the king at the same place	id. , 288
	Parliament makes various rules for putting the country in a posture of defence	id.		— 30. Parliament summons nine peers to appear at Westminster; they refuse to attend	288
	— 15. The Attorney-General Herbert is removed, and committed to the Fleet by the lords for having taken the articles to the lords	id.		June 2. A Dutch ship runs ashore laden with military stores, which are carried to York	id.
	The Scottish commissioners offer to mediate between the king and the parliament	268		The parliament send a petition with propositions for a lasting peace; the king rejects them	id. , 289
	— 20. The king desires both houses to state all the grievances of the kingdom	id.		June 15. The commons impeach the nine peers; and the lords adjudge them incapable of sitting as members of the house; and sentence them to imprisonment during pleasure	288
	Petitions are presented from London and other places, complaining of the delay in putting down the insurrection in Ireland	269		The fleet submit to the command of the Earl of Warwick as admiral of the parliament	290
	A conference managed by Pym takes place	id.		July 12. The Earl of Essex is appointed captain general of the army; and the Earl of Bedford general of the horse for the parliament	id.
	His speech is ordered by the commons to be printed	270		The parliament send a commission to the king at Beverley praying him to dismiss his garrisons	292
	Both houses address the king concerning intercepted letters of Lord Digby	271		He demands that they lay down their arms	id.
				Other negotiations pass between them	id.

A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page
1612	The king's forces endeavour to surprise Hull . . .	293	1614	The parliament negotiate for peace . . .	326, 7
	He issues a proclamation for all persons capable of bearing arms to meet him at Nottingham . . .	id.		The Independents with Cromwell quarrel with the aristocracy . . .	319, 20
	He attempts to get possession of Coventry . . .	294		Dec. 9. "The self-denying ordinance" is introduced, by which members of either House . . .	322
	Aug. 25. The king erects his standard on Nottingham Castle . . .	293		are excluded from command in the army . . .	id.
	— 28. He sends to London to treat; the parliament refuse . . .	295	1615	Jan. 10. Laud is beheaded . . .	326
	Sep. 20. He reaches Shrewsbury; money is coined there . . .	296		— 13. The Lords reject the "Self-denying ordinance" . . .	322
	Oct. 23. Battle of Edgehill . . .	297, 8		The Commons remodel the army and appoint Fairfax general-in-chief; pass an ordinance respecting it . . .	323
	The king proceeds to Oxford; marches to Reading, which is evacuated . . .	299		— 29. Conferences of peace are held at Wexbridge . . .	329
	Nov. 7. Essex arrives in London . . .	id.		Feb. 2. Montrose defeats the Covenanters . . .	338
	Prince Rupert attacks Brentford; is repulsed; the royal army retreats to Oxford . . .	id. , 300		He gains several other battles . . .	id. , 339, 40
1643	The queen returns to England . . .	301		— 4. The self-denying ordinance is altered by the Lords . . .	323
	March 1. Parliamentarian commissioners treat with the king at Oxford . . .	300, 1		March 24. The Commons alter it again, discharging the officers now being members . . .	id.
	Essex takes Reading . . .	301		The Commons declare they will preserve the privileges of the peerage . . .	321
	May. The Commons impeach the queen of high treason; she sends supplies and ammunition to Charles . . .	302		April 3. The Lords pass the "Self-denying ordinance" . . .	id.
	Waller and others are detected in a conspiracy to deliver the leaders of the parliament to the king; two are executed; Waller and others are committed to the Tower . . .	id.		— 7. Sir Thomas Fairfax takes the command of the parliament army at Windsor . . .	id.
	Robert Yeomans and George Bouchier are hanged at Bristol for conspiracy . . .	id.		June 14. Battle of Naseby . . .	333, 4
	June 18. Battle of Chalgrove Field; Hampden is mortally wounded . . .	303, 4		July 2. Montrose gains the battle of Alford . . .	310
	— 24. Hampden dies . . .	304		— 23. Bridgewater is surrendered to Fairfax . . .	337
	— 30. The Earl of Newcastle defeats the parliament troops under Fairfax at Atherton Moor . . .	305		— 30. The Scotch besiege Hereford . . .	340
	July 15. Sir John Hotham and his son are committed to the Tower for a plot to deliver Hull to the king . . .	id.		Aug. 19. Montrose takes Glasgow; Edinburgh surrenders . . .	id.
	Cromwell gains a battle at Grantham . . .	id.		— 24. The king takes Huntington by assault . . .	id.
	The royalists take Gainsborough and Lincoln . . .	id.		— 27. Lord Keeper Littleton dies at Oxford . . .	id.
	The king's troops defeat Sir William Waller at Devizes . . .	id.		Sept. 11. Prince Rupert surrenders Bristol . . .	341
	The national synod for settling the government and form of worship of the Church of England meet at Westminster . . .	311		— 23. Battle of Rowton Heath . . .	id.
	Prince Rupert takes Bristol . . .	306		Battle of Philiphaugh; Montrose is defeated . . .	id.
	Sept 3. Gloucester is besieged by the royalists; is relieved by the Earl of Essex . . .	id.		Nov. Charles escapes from Newark and arrives at Belvoir Castle; proceeds to Oxford . . .	314
	— 20. Battle of Newbury; the Earl of Falkland is killed . . .	307, 308		The king again negotiates with parliament . . .	315
	The Earls of Bedford, Clare, and Holland go over to the king; they return to the parliament . . .	308	1646	April 27. He escapes from Oxford . . .	350
	The solemn league and covenant of England and Scotland is ordered to be taken . . .	309		He throws himself upon the protection of the Scotch army . . .	352
	Nov. A body of Irish are defeated at Nantwich . . .	310		June 24. Oxford surrenders to the parliament . . .	355
	Pym dies, and is buried in Westminster Abbey . . .	311		Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice embark at Dover . . .	id.
1644	Jan. 1 and 2. The two Hothams are beheaded on Tower Hill . . .	305		All the garrisons in England and Wales, except those in the north, are in the hands of the parliament . . .	356
	— 22. The parliament is summoned at Oxford . . .	312		July 23. The parliament send their final propositions to the king at Newcastle . . .	358
	— 27. They draw up a declaration for peace . . .	313		The king refuses the conditions offered . . .	359
	The king sends a letter to the parliament at Westminster; he raises money . . .	id.		Sept. The Scottish army agree to give up the king to the parliamentarians for a sum of money . . .	360, 61
	Mar. 12. Laud is tried in the House of Lords . . .	325	1647	Jan. 30. The king is delivered up at Newcastle . . .	362
	April. The mongrel parliament is dismissed . . .	313		Feb. It is proposed to reduce the army to a peace establishment, and dismantle the garrisons in England and Wales . . .	364
	Charles retreats from Oxford to Worcester . . .	314		The Presbyterians in parliament endeavour to depress the Independents . . .	364-66
	July 3. Battle of Marston Moor . . .	315		They vote the disbanding of the army . . .	366
	— 15. York is surrendered to the Parliamentarians . . .	id.		May 25. The army refuse to disband without payment, &c.	id.
	Aug. The Parliament troops of the west are beset; the cavalry escape; the foot surrender . . .	317, 18		— 28. Parliament send commissioners as a committee to act with Fairfax for disbanding the army . . .	307
	Charles marches from Cornwall into Devonshire; marches towards Oxford; second battle of Newbury; the king retreats to Oxford . . .	318, 19		June 3. A force from the Independents, headed by Joyce, remove the king to Childerly . . .	id. , 368
	Oct. 11. The impeachment against Laud is abandoned, and an ordinance of attainder passed by the Commons . . .	325		Cromwell joins the army; they pledge themselves not to disband without redress of grievances; the dismissal of the Presbyterian government . . .	368
				Cromwell, Fairfax, Ireton, and other leaders, confer with the king . . .	id.
				— 10. The army marches towards London . . .	369

A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VII.	Page
1647	June 15. The army, at St. Albans, formally accuse Hollis and other members of the Commons	369	1648	A new scheme of government is drawn up by Fairfax and the army	388
	The king is removed to Windsor Castle	id.	Dec. 17—28. The king is removed from Hurst to Windsor	id.	id.
	Charles has an interview with his children at Caversham	id.	1649	Jan. 1. The Commons agree to charge the king; draw up an ordinance; the Lords reject it	389
	July 30. A committee of safety is called	id.	The Commons declare their authority supreme	id.	id.
	Aug. 6. Fairfax appears in parliament; is thanked	370	— 6. The ordinance for the trial of the king passes	id.	id.
	— 7. He and Cromwell march to the Tower; the Presbyterian party are wholly suppressed	id.	— 8. The same is proclaimed	id.	id.
	Hollis and others of the Presbyterians are allowed to depart; are accused of treason	id.	— 9. A new great seal is voted	id.	id.
	The officers of the army draw up their "Proposals" for the settlement of the kingdom; they are refused by the king	id. , 371	— 19. The king is brought before the High Court of Justice	390
	Nov. 10. The king escapes from Hampton Court to the Isle of Wight	371, 5, 6, 7, 8	— 22. He again appears; refuses to plead	391, 2
	Dec. 14. Parliament send four propositions for the king to sign and agree to a personal interview	379	— 25. Commissioners from the Scotch parliament pre-test against the proceedings	393
	— 24. He refuses to sign them	id.	— 27. The king is condemned	id. , 394, 5
1648	He endeavours to escape from Carisbrook Castle	id.	— 30. He is beheaded	396, 7
	Jan. 3. Parliament resolves to have no further treaty with the king without the consent of both Houses	380	Feb. 1. The Commons vote for proceeding against some of the royalists	398
	— 9. The army declare in favour of the parliament	381	— 5. They debate about the continuance of the peerage	id.
	A committee of safety appointed for the Commonwealth	id.	— 6. They vote the abolition of the House of Lords	399
	April 9. An insurrection in London in favour of Charles	id.	— 7. The office of king abolished	id.
	The same in other places	id.	Six of the Judges agree to hold their offices; an Executive Council of State appointed	id.
	— 21. The Presbyterians in parliament carry a vote in favour of King, Lords, and Commons	382	— 10. Hamilton, Goring, Capel, and Owen are tried	400
	The insurrection is put down by Cromwell and Ireton	id.	Charles II. is proclaimed in Scotland	401
	A Scotch army crosses the borders; it is defeated by Cromwell at Preston; Hamilton and Langdale are captured; Cromwell is received at Edinburgh	id.	An insurrection breaks out in Ireland	id.
	July 5. The Earl of Holland is defeated at Kingston-upon-Thames	383	March 6. The four royalists are condemned	400
	— 10. He surrenders to Fairfax	id.	— 9. Hamilton, Holland, and Capel are beheaded in Palace-yard	id.
	The Prince of Wales arrives in the Downs with a fleet; retires	id. , 384	Aug. 15. Cromwell goes to Ireland; suppresses the rebellion by the end of May, 1650	401
	Aug. 27. Colchester is surrendered to Fairfax; he shoots Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle	383	1650	Montrose proceeds to Scotland with a foreign force in favour of Charles II.	402
	Sept. Petitions are presented from various places for justice on the king	385	May. He is defeated at Invercarroun; is hanged at Edinburgh	id.
	Oct. Others from the army are presented	id.	June. Charles lands at the Frith of Cromarty; he takes the covenant	id.
	— 16. Cromwell leaves Edinburgh	382	Cromwell is appointed captain-general-in-chief in lieu of Fairfax	403
	— 21. Ingoldsbys's regiment declare the king a traitor	385	— 29. Cromwell marches into Scotland	id.
	The army present a remonstrance to the two Houses, demanding that the office of king shall be elective	386	Aug. 31. The battle of Dunbar; Charles flies to the Highlands	id. , 404
	Nov. 30. The king is removed from Carisbrook Castle to Hurst Castle	id.	1651	Charles marches into England	404
	Parliament refuses to consider the "Remonstrance"	id.	Sept. 3. Battle of Worcester; the king goes to France	405
	Dec. 2. Fairfax arrives in London with the army	387	The union and incorporation of Scotland and Ireland with England	406
	— 4. The Commons declare the imprisonment of the king by the army to be without their consent	id.	1652	May 19. Van Tromp sails up the Channel with a Dutch fleet; is brought to action by Blake	id.
	Cromwell arrives in London	id.	Sept. 28. Blake beats the Dutch under De Ruyter and De Witt off Plymouth	407
	— 5. The Commons vote a settlement of the kingdom	id.	Nov. 29. Van Tromp gains a victory over Blake in the Downs	id.
	— 6. Colonel Pride and Colonel Rich, with troops surround the House; Cromwell is thanked by the Ho	id.	1653	Feb. 18. Blake fights Van Tromp for this and two succeeding days and gains a victory	id.
	The Presbyterian members are arrested	id.	April 20. Cromwell dissolves the Long Parliament	411
	— 8. The "Rump" consists of only fifty members, all Independents; a solemn fast is kept	388	— 22. He issues a declaration	id.
			July 4. One hundred and twenty persons meet in Whitehall and are invested by Cromwell with the government; the "Little Parliament"	412
			July 31. Blake defeats the Dutch fleet; Van Tromp is killed	415
			Dec. The Little Parliament dissolves; a council of officers appoint Cromwell Lord Protector, with a council	413
			— 16. He is installed in the Court of Chancery	414
			— 17. Is proclaimed	id.
			1654	July 10. The brother of the Portuguese ambassador, having been tried for murder, and

A. D.	BOOK VII.	Page	A. D.	BOOK VII.	Page
	convicted, is beheaded on Tower Hill. Gerard and Vowel are also executed for a plot to assassinate the Protector	416	1668	Cromwell suppresses another conspiracy for the restoration; beheads Dr. Hewit and Sir Henry Slingsby	427
1651	The Scotch refuse to acknowledge the Commonwealth	id.		The English gain victories in the Low Countries	id.
	General Monk quells the insurrection there	id.	Aug.	The Protector's daughter, Lady Claypole, dies	id.
	Sept. 3, 4. The parliament attend the Protector in the Painted Chamber	id. , 417	Sept 2.	He declares his son Richard his successor	id.
	— 5. They debate whether the legislative power should be vested in a single person and parliament	id.	— 3.	The Protector dies	id.
	Oct. They continue the debate and frame a test for members to take	413, 19	Richard Cromwell is declared Lord Protector		id.
1656	Jan. 22. The parliament is dissolved	419	He issues writs for a new parliament		429
	A plot is formed for the restoration of Charles the Second	id.	1659	Jan. 27. Parliament meets; the Commons and the "other House" pass an act of recognition of Richard Cromwell's title	id.
	Major Wildman is seized, with "A declaration of the free and well-affected people of England now in arms against the tyrant Oliver Cromwell, Esq."	id.		The Commons agree to transact business with the "other House"	id.
	March 11. The conspirators seize Salisbury; they are routed at South Molton; Penruddock, Groves, and Lucas are executed	id.		The army petition for their pay through Lambert, Fleetwood, and others, the party of Wallingford House	id.
	The insurrection in other parts is quelled; Lord Rochester makes an attempt in Yorkshire; is defeated; escapes	id.		The Quakers present a similar petition	430
	Cromwell divides England and Wales into eleven districts, and places over each a major-general	420	April 22.	Parliament is dissolved	id.
	Jamaica is taken by the English; Blake checks the Barbary pirates in the Mediterranean; the Protector negotiates in favour of the Waldenses	id.	May 6.	Lambert, Fleetwood, and others, issue a declaration calling together the "Long Parliament," or "the Rump"	id.
	Treaty of alliance between England and France against Spain; Blake gains several victories	id.	— 7.	They meet in the Painted Chamber	id.
	Sept. 17. Cromwell calls a new parliament: a plot is formed for his assassination by Syndercombe	id.	— 9.	They appoint a committee of safety	id.
1657	Feb. 23 to March 26. Cromwell is desired by parliament to assume the title of king: they remonstrate against the military government, and urge the appointment of two houses of parliament	421	Fleetwood, in the name of the army, proffers allegiance to "the Rump"; General Monk from Scotland concurs for the army in the new revolution	id.
	April 4. He refuses the title of king; agrees to the recall of the House of Peers	id.	— 13.	A council of state is formed	id.
	Major-General Harrison and other Fifth-monarchy men are sent to the Tower	id.	June 22.	Henry Cromwell, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, for himself and the army, submits to parliament	id.
	May 19. It is finally arranged that Cromwell's title shall continue Lord Protector	422	Aug.	Riots and an insurrection take place in favour of a restoration of Charles; they are suppressed	431
	— 22. Parliament settles the bounds and limits of the title of Lord Protector	id.	Oct. 13.	The parliament is prevented from sitting by the soldiery of Lambert and others; "the Rump" is suppressed	id.
	— 25. The "petition and advice" are presented to Cromwell praying him to appoint his successor and to create the "other House"	id.	— 29.	General Monk marches from Scotland; takes possession of Berwick	432
	The Protector gives his assent	423	Lambert is appointed by the council of officers to command the army of the north	id.
	June 25. He is inaugurated in Westminster Hall	id. , 424	The committee of safety prepare a form of Government	id.
	Blake dies as he enters Plymouth Sound	id. , 425	Dec. 5.	Disturbances take place in London; petitions are presented from various places for the restoration of the parliament	id.
	Charles II. offers to marry Cromwell's daughter	425	— 22.	The soldiery about London insist on the sitting of parliament	429*
1658	Jan. 20. Parliament again meets; sixty peers summoned by writ take their seats in the Upper House	id. , 426	— 26.	Lenthall and the old parliament, "the Rump," resume	id.
	— 24. The two Houses disagree	426	1660	Jan. Monk advances; Fairfax meets him at York, and agrees to the restoration of Charles	430*
	— 25. The Protector summons them before him at Whitehall	id.	Feb. 21.	Monk is made commander-in-chief by the presbyterian majority in parliament	id.
	The Lords adjourn and meet no more	id.	An act is passed dissolving parliament	id.
	Feb. 4. Cromwell dissolves the parliament	id. , 427	April 25.	The new parliament meets; the peers are restored, and take their places	id.
	A tract called "Killing no Murder" is circulated	427	May 1.	Letters from Charles II. are read in the council of state	431*
				They are sent to the Houses of Parliament; that to the Commons contains "The Declaration of Breda"	id.
				An answer is voted, and the terms offered by the king in the Declaration acceded to	id.
				The navy declare for the king	432*
				May 8. King Charles II. is proclaimed at the gate of Westminster Hall	id.

BOOK VIII.

A.D.	BOOK VIII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VIII.	Page
1660	May 10. The Lords have the Book of Common Prayer read before them; parliament prepares many measures for punishing the regicides	664	1661	Acts are passed in the Scottish parliament for compelling persons to take oaths against the covenant	684
	— 25. King Charles and the Dukes of York and Gloucester land at Dover	662		May 8. The English parliament meets; the "Pension Parliament;" the Solemn League and Covenant is ordered to be burned by the hangman; an oath of "non-resistance" established	id.
	— 29. Charles enters London; makes Monk a knight of the Garter and a privy councillor; is addressed by both houses of parliament	id.		The bishops are restored to their seats in the House of Lords; a "Conformity act" is passed; a hearth and chimney tax is granted to the king for ever	id. , 685
	Measures are taken by parliament for the prosecution of the regicides: a bill of indemnity is passed excepting many persons: tonnage and poundage are granted to the king for life	665, 6		— 20. Catherine of Braganza arrives at Portsmouth	685
	Milton is committed to custody of the serjeant-at-arms	666		June 2. Sir Henry Vane is tried in the Court of King's Bench; he is convicted of treason	687, 8, 9
	July 7. Monk is created Duke of Albemarle	661		— 11. He is beheaded on Tower Hill	689
	— 9. The Commons vote that the settlement of religion shall be left to the king	667		Lambert pleads guilty to a charge of treason, and is imprisoned for life; Okey, Corbet, and Barkstead are executed for treason	690
	The Duke of Gloucester dies of the small-pox	677		1662 The Act of Uniformity is enforced: upwards of two thousand ministers are thrust out of their livings	691
	Sept. 13. Parliament is adjourned	668		Dunkirk is sold to the French	692
	Oct. 9. The trial of the regicides takes place	670-6		Dec. 26. A declaration of indulgence is put forth by the king	691
	— 13 and 15. Ten of them are executed	666, 7		1663 Feb. 18. The parliament meets; a bill to give the king a dispensing power without consent of parliament is opposed by the bishops, and abandoned	693
	Meeting of the clergy on "the healing question"	id.		The Earl of Bristol impeaches the chancellor; the charges are declared illegal; Bristol absconds	id.
	— 25. The king publishes "The Healing Declaration"	669		A riot takes place at Farnley Wood, in Yorkshire; is suppressed	id.
	The Queen-mother Henrietta Maria arrives	677		1661 March 16. Parliament re-assembles; repeals the Triennial Act; passes the Conventicle Act	694
	The marriage of the Duke of York with Anne Hyde is publicly acknowledged	id.		The Scotch parliament passes a similar act	id.
	The Princess of Orange dies of the small-pox	678		Archbishop Sharp puts it in force against the Presbyterians	id.
	Nov. A bill for making the king's "Healing Declaration" law is thrown out	id.		War is declared against the Dutch	695
	Dec. 8. Oliver Cromwell, Bradshaw, and Ireton are attainted	678		Aug. Mr. Lisle is shot on going to church at Lausanne	690
1661	Jan. 6. Venner, a Fifth-monarchy man, raises a riot in London	679		1665 The plague ravages London	695
	— 9. The riot is suppressed; many rioters are killed; others are taken	id.		June 3. The Duke of York gains a victory over the Dutch fleet off Lowestoffe; Admiral Opdam is killed	id. , 696
	— 30. The bodies of Cromwell, Bradshaw, and Ireton are disinterred, and hanged and otherwise misused	678		The Earl of Sandwich attacks a Dutch fleet at Berghen, in Norway; is repulsed	696
	The bodies of Cromwell's mother-in-law and daughter, of Dorislaus, May, Pym, Blake, and others, are exhumed and thrown into a pit in St. Margaret's churchyard	id.		The Court removes to Oxford on account of the plague	id.
	Some of the officers of the old army are put under arrest	679		Oct. Parliament at Oxford passes the "Five Mile Act"	id.
	The Marquess of Argyle, head of the Covenanters, is lured to Whitehall; he is sent to the Tower	680		1666 Feb. The plague in London disappears	697
	The Earl of Glencairn, chief of the Cavaliers of Scotland, is sent to Edinburgh to restore the committee of estates as existing in 1650	id.		The court returns to Whitehall	id.
	General Middleton is created Earl of Middleton, general of the army, and king's commissioner for holding parliament; the Earl of Lauderdale is made secretary of state in Scotland	681		June 1, 2, 3, and 4. Great battle between the English and Dutch fleets off the coast of Dunkirk, under Monk and Prince Rupert and the Dutch admiral De Ruyter	id. , 698
	The Marquess of Argyle is tried at Edinburgh; he is condemned for treason	681, 2		July. They again fight De Ruyter, and drive him into the Texel	698
	He is executed	682		Sept. 2. The fire of London commences near London Bridge	699
	Several Covenanters are hanged	id.		Herbert, a Freuchman, is hanged	id.
	Sharp is made archbishop of St. Andrew's	683		— 21. Parliament again meets; a bill passes for appointing commissioners to examine the accounts of persons who received money raised for the war	700, 1
	Other bishops are consecrated by the Archbishop of Canterbury and sent to their sees in Scotland	id.
	All persons are required to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy; the Earl of Cassilis, and Leighton, bishop of Dunblane, refuse	id.

A.D.	BOOK VIII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VIII.	Page
1666	The Duke of Buckingham is deprived of all his places	701	1675	April. The Session of Parliament opens; the Commons demand the recall of the English under the Duke of Monmouth	712
	Nov. 13. An insurrection of the Covenanters breaks out in the West of Scotland	id.		The Lords pass a bill imposing an oath that it is unlawful on any pretence to take up arms against the king and for the security of the Protestant religion; the Commons refuse it; parliament is prorogued	id. , 713
	— 28. The Covenanters are defeated on the Pentland hills; many are hanged, others are tortured by order of Archbishop Sharp	id.		Oct. The Commons vote 300,000 l. for building ships	713
1667	June. De Ruyter destroys Sheerness and a great quantity of English shipping	702		Nov. 22. Parliament is prorogued for three months	id.
	Aug. Treaty of Breda concluded; peace made between England, France, and Holland	702	1676	War is general in the Low Countries, in Spain, Sicily, on the Upper and Lower Rhine, in Sweden, and in the German Provinces, in the Mediterranean, the Ocean, and the Baltic	id.
	The Lord Chancellor Clarendon is desired to resign the great seal	id.		Louis XIV. gives Charles 100,000 l. , and engages to send over troops; Charles writes and signs a treaty with Louis	714
	The great seal is taken from him and given to Bridgman	703	1677	Feb. 5. Parliament meets; Buckingham, Salisbury, Wharton, and Shaftesbury are committed to the Tower	id.
	Oct. 10. Parliament meets; the king is thanked for the removal of Clarendon	id.		The Lords originate a bill to settle the succession; it is dropped; they bring in a bill to punish popish recusants; the Commons throw it out and pass another; the Lords refuse their assent; the writ de hæretico comburendo is abolished	id.
	Nov. 12. Clarendon is impeached by the Commons; the Lords refuse to commit him	705		The Commons vote 600,000 l. for ship-building; Parliament is prorogued	715
	He escapes to France; a bill for banishing him for life passes both Houses	id.		The king receives 200,000 l. from Louis	id.
	The "Calal" engross the powers of the government	id.		The four Lords make submission and are released	id.
1668	The "Triple" alliance is formed between England, Holland, and Sweden	706		The Prince of Orange marries Mary, daughter of the Duke of York	id.
	Feb. Parliament meets; the king recommends toleration; the Conventicle Act is continued; the Commons vote the supplies	id.		A treaty is entered into with the States-general; Louis stops Charles's pension	id.
	May 8. Parliament is adjourned	id.	1678	Parliament votes money for ships, and an army of 30,000 men for a war with France	id.
	Oct. It is dissolved	id.		Charles agrees to break with the States-general for a sum of money	717
	James Mitchel fires at Archbishop Sharp; wounds the Bishop of Orkney	713		The Commons vote money on condition that the army be paid and disbanded	id.
1669	Lauderdale holds a parliament in Scotland; the government of the church is transferred to the king; the Scottish army is enacted to be kept up, and to march anywhere in the kingdom they may be ordered by the king	id.		The war continues	id.
1670	Feb. 14. The houses of parliament meet; the king goes to open the session with a guard	707		Aug. 12. Kirby informs the king of a plot to assassinate him	id.
	May 22. Secret treaty with France; "The Dover Treaty"	id.		The plot is sworn to before Sir Edmundbury Godfrey	718
	Colonel Blood attempts to hang the Duke of Ormond	708	Sept. 28. Titus Oates is summoned before the council; declares the popish plot	id. , 719
	Oct. Parliament votes an extraordinary supply for the navy; Sir John Coventry makes remarks in the House of Commons on the king's amours	707	Oct. 18. Sir Edmundbury Godfrey is found murdered	720
	He is set upon by some of the guards, who cut off his nose	708		His body is buried, being attended by seventy-two Protestant divines in full canonicals	721
	Parliament passes the Coventry Act	708	Oct. 21. Parliament reassembles; Oates is called before both Houses; they commit the Catholic lords Stafford, Powis, Petre, Arundel, and Bellasis, to the Tower, and various persons to other prisons; grant Oates a pension	id.
1671	Colonel Blood attempts to steal the regalia from the Tower	709		The king commands the Duke of York to retire from the council	id.
1672	Jan. 2. The king, by the advice of the Cabal ministry, shuts up the exchequer	id.		A bill passes, excluding Papists from parliament, with a saving proviso for the Duke of York	id.
	May 3. De Ruyter attacks the English and French fleets at Solebay; the Earl of Sandwich is killed	id. , 710		Bedloe appears before the council; accuses the Lords Powis, Bellasis, and Arundel, before the House of Lords, and makes other revelations	id. , 722
	Louis XIV. marches into the United Provinces; overruns three; he attacks Amsterdam; the Prince of Orange defeats the French in several engagements	710	Nov. 28. Oates accuses the queen of high treason at the bar of the House of Commons	723
	Charles issues a declaration of Indulgence	711		The five lords in the Tower are impeached	id.
1673	Lauderdale publishes a pardon for all offences against the Scotch Conventicle Act	713		Stayley, a banker, is tried and executed at Tyburn	723
	Feb. Parliament meets; remonstrates against the indulgence; the king withdraws it; the Test Act is passed	711		Ireland, Grove, and Pickering, are convicted and executed	724
	Nov. 4. Parliament is prorogued; the Cabal ministry is dismissed; the Danby administration succeeds	id.
	Louis XIV. gives a title and estates to the Duchess of Portsmouth	707
1674	Jan. 7. The king declares in Parliament that he has no secret treaty with France	711
	Feb. 28. Peace with Holland is proclaimed	712
	Mitchel is executed for firing at Archbishop Sharp	729

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

A.D.	BOOK VIII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VIII.	Page
1678	France is seized; accuses Hill, Green, and Berry, of the murder of Godfrey; he is examined before the king; denies his evidence; they are tried, convicted, and executed at Tyburn	721, 5		the House of Lords; the king prorogues parliament	733
	Mr. Montagne, the English ambassador at Paris, returns to England without leave	725	1681	Jan. 6. Parliament is dissolved, and a new one appointed to be held at Oxford on the 21st of March	id.
	He is returned to the House of Commons as member for Northampton	726		The king receives further supplies from Louis	id.
	His papers are seized; the House remonstrates; he produces other papers to the Commons criminating Danby; the latter is impeached; the Lords refuse to commit him to the Tower			March 21. Parliament meets at Oxford, both parties coming armed; the Bill of Exclusion is still insisted on	id.
	Dec. 30. The king prorogues parliament			— 28. The parliament is dissolved	id.
1679	Jan. 23. Parliament is dissolved by proclamation			Shaftesbury is committed to the Tower	731
	The king formally declares the Duke of Monmouth illegitimate	728		Stephen College and John Rouse are arrested	id.
	The Duke of York retires to the continent	id.		College is tried at Oxford and executed for treason	id.
	March 6. Parliament meets; the king informs the two Houses he has granted a pardon to Danby, but dismissed him; he absconds			Oliver Plunkett, titular Romish Archbishop of Armagh, is executed for treason	735
	April 10. Danby surrenders, and is sent to the Tower			The Prince of Orange visits England	id.
	A new council of thirty is formed; Shaftesbury is at the head; the Commons pass resolutions against the Duke of York and the papists	id.		Cameron and other Covenanters are defeated	id.
	The king recommends to the parliament the prosecution of the parties engaged in the popish plot; the disbanding of the army, and providing a fleet	729		July 27. Donald Cargill and other Covenanters are executed for treason	id.
	The Commons pass a bill of exclusion of the Duke of York	id.		The Duke of York, as king's commissioner, opens the Scotch parliament; proposes a test to be taken by all to maintain the supremacy of the king, and for passive obedience; Fletcher of Saltoun opposes and modifies the oath	736
	The Habeas Corpus Act is passed	id.		The Duke calls upon Argyle to take the test; he does, but adds an explanation	id.
	May 3. Archbishop Sharp is put to death by Balfour and other Covenanters at Magnusmuir	730		Argyle is committed to Edinburgh Castle for treason	id.
	— 29. The Covenanters burn the acts of parliament hostile to the kirk, and affix a declaration upon the market-cross of Rutherglen	id.		Dec. 12. He is condemned	737
	Defeat Graham of Clavesthouse; take Glasgow; the Duke of Monmouth routs them at Bothwell Bridge	id.		He escapes from the Tolbooth	id.
	Five Jesuits are convicted for the popish plot, and executed	id.		The Scotch parliament passes an act declaring it to be treason to maintain the lawfulness of the exclusion of the Duke of York	id.
	The Duke of York returns; quarrels with Monmouth; the former is sent to Scotland, the latter to Holland	731		The Duke of York comes to England	id. , 738
	Shaftesbury is dismissed	id.		He is nearly wrecked on his return to Scotland	738
	Dangerfield gets up two plots, but fails	id. , 732		Violent measures are enacted against the Covenanters and Cameronians	id.
1680	The Duke of York is recalled from Scotland; the king declares the illegitimacy of Monmouth before the council	732		The Duke of York returns to England; is re-appointed Lord High Admiral; the Duke of Monmouth returns; makes a progress through the kingdom	id.
	Shaftesbury presents a bill to the grand jury against the Duke of York as a popish recusant; the judge discharges the jury	id.		The Duke of Monmouth is arrested; he is admitted to bail	739
	The Duke of Monmouth returns to London; the Duke of York is sent to Edinburgh	id.		North and Rich are illegally appointed sheriffs of London	id.
	Oct. 21. The session of parliament opens; Dangerfield accuses the Duke of York of instigating him to murder the king	id.		The Duke of York brings an action de scandalis magnatum against Pilkington	id.
	Nov. 11. The bill of exclusion of the Duke of York passes the Commons	id.		A verdict with 100,000 l. damages is returned against him	740
	— 15. Lord Russell carries it up to the House of Lords	id.		The Rye House Plot is concerted	id.
	The Lords throw out the bill	id.		Nov. Shaftesbury retires to Holland	id.
	Lord Stafford is tried before the Peers; he is condemned; the king alters the sentence to beheading; the Commons and sheriffs question his authority	id.		George, son of the Elector of Hanover, visits England	759
	Dec. 29. Lord Stafford is beheaded	733	1683	June 12. Keyling informs Lord Dartmouth of the Rye House plot	741, 2, 3, 4
1681	The king refuses to sanction the Exclusion Bill	id.		— 26. A proclamation is issued for the apprehension of the Duke of Monmouth, Lords Grey and Russell, and Armstrong, Walcot, and others	745
	Jan. 5. The Commons vote that no supplies be granted without the Exclusion Bill	id.		Lord Russell is apprehended	id.
	— 6. The Commons pass votes against the Duke of York and the papists; are summoned to	id.		He is examined before the council and committed to the Tower	id.
				Lord Grey is committed, but escapes to Holland	id.
				July 9. Lord Howard is apprehended; he confesses	746
				Algernon Sidney, the Earl of Essex, and Hanjeden, are committed to the Tower	id.
				Walcot, Rouse, and Hone, are tried and convicted	id.
				The Earl of Essex commits suicide in the Tower	747
				— 13. Lord Russell is tried at the Old Bailey, and convicted	id. , 749

A.D.	BOOK VIII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VIII.	Page
1683	July 19. Prince George of Denmark arrives in England	760	1685	James receives money from Louis XIV.	765
	— 24. He marries the Princess Anne, daughter of the Duke of York	id.		April 23. He and the queen are crowned by Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury	id.
	The Earl of Bedford offers 100,000 l. to save his son's life; Russell petitions the king; writes a letter to the Duke of York	748, 9		May 7. Titus Oates is tried for perjury; is convicted, fined, whipped, and put in the pillory	766
	— 30. Walcot, Rouse, and Howe, are executed	746		Dangerfield is convicted of libel; fined, whipped, and put in the pillory	767
	— 31. Lord Russell is beheaded in Lincoln's Inn Fields	749		Frances, a barrister, is tried, convicted, and executed, for murder	id.
	The University of Oxford publish their judgment and decree against certain damnable doctrines, &c.	751		— 22. The king opens parliament; renews his promises; the Commons vote him 1,300,000 l. for life	id.
	A judgment of Quo Warranto is given in the Court of King's Bench against the City of London	id.		The Earl of Argyle lands in Scotland; declares he comes to re-establish the covenant; he is routed by Lord Dumbarton near Glasgow	769
	Eight of the Aldermen are deprived	id.		June 2. Argyle is captured and taken to Edinburgh Castle	id.
	Aug. 23. Spence and Carstairs are tortured at Edinburgh	756		— 4. The Duke of Monmouth lands at Lyme, declaring he comes to secure the protestant religion, and to deliver the country from the tyranny of James Duke of York	771
	Sept. 5. Carstairs confesses a plot for excluding the Duke of York from the succession; many persons are taken and tortured	id.		June 20. He assumes the title of king	773
	— 7. Algernon Sidney is brought to trial in the Court of King's Bench; he is convicted	751, 2, 3		He proceeds through several parts of the west	773, 4, 5
	Oct. The Duke of Monmouth has an audience of the king	754		— 30. Argyle is beheaded; Richard Rumbold is executed	769, 70
	Nov. 23. Sidney is called up for judgment; is sentenced to death as a traitor	753, 4		July 5. Battle of Sedgemoor	775
	Gordon of Earliston goes mad for fear of the torture	756		— 7. Lord Grey is captured	776
	— 25. Monmouth surrenders; confesses before the king and the Duke of York	754		— 8. The Duke of Monmouth is captured	id.
	Dec. 8. Sidney is beheaded on Tower Hill	id.		— 13. They are both brought to London	id.
	Monmouth receives a pardon; denies his confession; readmits it; flies to Holland	755		They are carried before the king at Whitehall	id.
	The English settlement at Tangier is abandoned	760		The king compels Monmouth to sign a paper, admitting that Charles II. was not married to the duke's mother	id. , 777
1684	Hampden is tried for a misdemeanour; is convicted and fined 40,000 l. , and imprisoned till the fine is paid	755		Monmouth is committed to the Tower	777
	Holloway and Sir Thomas Armstrong are tried and executed for the Rye-House Plot	id.		A bill of attainder passes both Houses	id.
	Many persons are executed at Edinburgh for the same	id.		— 14. He writes to the king for a respite; it is refused	778
	Others are tortured in various parts of Scotland	757		— 15. He is beheaded on Tower Hill	778
	The Covenanters and Cameronians are imprisoned at the Bass Rock, Dumbarton Castle, and other places	id.		Lord Grey, also attainted, is respited for life	779
	Sir Samuel Barnardiston is condemned for libel and fined 10,000 l.	758		Colonel Kirk executes many prisoners taken at Sedgemoor	id.
	Danby, Arundel, Powis, and Bellasis, are released from the Tower	id.		Aug. 10. Kirk is summoned to court to give an account of the state of the west	780
	The Duke of York, notwithstanding the "Test Act," is again admitted to the privy council	id.		Colonel Trelawney executes many without trial	id.
	Titus Oates is condemned in 100,000 l. damages, under the act of scandalis magnatum , for a libel on the Duke of York	id.		— 27. Jeffries and three other judges open a commission at Winchester	id.
	Judge Jeffreys proposes the release of the recusants	id.		Mrs. Alicia Lisle is tried for harbouring two of the fugitives of Sedgemoor	id.
1685	Feb. 2. The king is taken suddenly ill	id.		Sept. 3. She is beheaded at Winchester	781
	— 5. He confesses, receives absolution, the communion of the Romish church, and extreme unction	762		Jeffries is made Lord Chancellor	id.
	— 6. He dies	id.		— 16. Thirty-eight rebels are executed at Dorchester	id.
	Accession of James II.; he immediately calls the council and addresses them, promising to support the government in church and state	763		Some are sold as slaves	id.
	He is proclaimed	id.		At Exeter many are executed after pleading guilty	id.
	He retains the late government	764		At Dorchester 239 are executed	782
	He publicly attends mass in state	id.		Many are sent as slaves to the West Indies; some are sold to courtiers for the same purpose	id.
	He orders the publication of the fact of the late king having died a Roman Catholic	id.		— 30. Jeffries returns to court and is thanked by James	783
	A proclamation is issued for levying the excise and other duties without authority of parliament	765		Cornish is tried at the Old Bailey for the Rye House Plot and executed	id.
	All papists and dissenters are discharged from prison by royal warrant	id.		Elizabeth Gaunt is burnt at Tyburn, and Lindsay hanged on Tower Hill	id.
				The quarters of Rumbold are brought from Scotland, and exposed in different places	id.
				Lords Brandon, Delamere, and Stamford, are proceeded against for high treason	id.
				Nov. 9. The session of parliament opens; John Kok is committed to the Tower; both Houses address the king to discharge all officers who refuse to take the Protestant test	784
				— 20. James prorogues the parliament	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX

49

A.D.	BOOK VIII.	Page	A.D.	BOOK VIII.	Page
1686	Catherine Sedley, the king's mistress, is created Countess of Dorchester	785		Prince of Wales in the Common Prayer Book	793
	The king asserts a dispensing, suspending and repealing power over acts of parliament	id.	1688	May 30. The bishops are acquitted	792
	Papists are openly admitted to all the offices of the state; Protestant soldiers are cashiered	id.		Several noblemen go to the Prince of Orange	793, 4
	Similar proceedings take place in Scotland and Ireland	id.		A correspondence is opened with him	791
	The king issues letters mandatory to the English bishops forbidding the clergy to preach on controversial points, and establishing an ecclesiastical commission	id.		The Prince of Orange collects large land and naval forces	id.
	Compton, Bishop of London, is suspended	786		James does many acts to appease the Protestants	790
	Fifteen thousand soldiers are encamped on Houslow Heath. Samuel Johnson, a clergyman, is fined, put in the pillory, and whipped	id.		Oct. 3. The Archbishop of Canterbury and eight bishops wait on the king with a letter of advice	id.
1687	The governors of the Charter House refuse to admit a papist without the oath	id.		The prince is baptised according to the Romish rites	id.
	The king issues a declaration of liberty of conscience	787		James calls a great council: the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Marquess of Halifax and Lords Clarendon and Nottingham refuse to sit at the board with papists	id.
	The University of Oxford refuses to acknowledge the right of Petre to name fellows of Exeter College	786		An examination takes place as to the birth of the prince	id.
	Cambridge refuses to make Francis a master of arts	id.		Oct. 16. The Prince of Orange embarks for England, but puts back to Helvoet	id.
	Pechell, the Vice-chancellor of Cambridge, is suspended by the Ecclesiastical Commission Court	id.		A manifesto by him is circulated in London	797
	The fellows of Magdalen College refuse to elect a papist their master	id.		Nov. 1. The Prince of Orange again sets sail	798
	The king cites the fellows before him at Oxford	787		— 5. He lands at Torbay; marches to Exeter	id.
	The pope's nuncio is publicly introduced at court	788		James goes to the camp at Houslow; several of his officers desert	798, 9
	Oct. 20. Parker is appointed master of Magdalen College by the commission, and How elected by the fellows displaced	787		— 16. The king calls a council of war at Whitehall; the Prince of Wales is sent to Portsmouth	799
	Dec. Further proceedings are taken	id.		— 19. The king sets out for Salisbury; Churchill and the Duke of Grafton desert to the Prince of Orange	id.
	— 23. The queen's pregnancy is announced in the Gazette	789		— 25. Prince George of Denmark and the Duke of Ormond abandon James	id.
1688	April 27. The king publishes a new declaration of indulgence, and commands the clergy to read it in the churches	id.		The Princess Anne proceeds to the camp of the Prince of Orange	799, 800
	May 18. Several of the bishops petition the king against the declaration	id.		The Prince of Wales is brought back to London	800
	— 20. The first day of reading the declaration, only seven clergymen comply	790		The queen and Prince of Wales go to Calais	id.
	June 8. The bishops who signed the petition are summoned before the council; they are committed to the Tower	id.		James quits London; is seized at the Isle of Sheppy and sent to Faversham	id.
	— 10. The queen is delivered of a son	793		Jeffries is maltreated at Wapping; is carried before the Lord Mayor and committed to the Tower	801
	— 15. The bishops are brought before the Court of King's Bench for a misdemeanour; they are enlarged on their own recognisances	792		A provisional council is formed; the Prince of Orange is invited to London; James returns to London; invites the Prince to a conference at Whitehall, which is refused	id.
	— 29. They are tried for "censuring the government, and giving their opinion about affairs of state"	id.		James goes to mass and dines in public	id.
	Orders are issued for inserting the name of the			Four battalions of Dutch guards and a squadron of horse are marched to Westminster	id.
				The king is required to go to Ham House	id.
				He goes by the consent of the Prince of Orange to Rochester	802
				Dec. 23. He embarks in the Medway	id.
				— 24. He reaches a fishing smack hired for his use	id.
				— 25. Lands at Ambletuse	id.

BOOK IX.

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1688	Dec. 25. The House of Lords request the Prince of Orange to take upon himself the administration of affairs, and to issue writs for a convention	2	1689	They address the prince to take upon himself the administration of affairs	3
	— 26. The members of the House of Commons of Charles II., the aldermen and common council of London, do the like	id.		— 28. The Commons vote that James has abdicated	4
1689	Jan. 22. The Convention meets in the houses of parliament; speaker chosen for each House	id.		— 31. The Lords vote that the throne is vacant	id.
			1690	Lord Mountjoy goes to James at Paris; he is imprisoned in the Bastille	11, 12
				Feb. 1. James leaves St. Germain	12
				— 5. He arrives at Brest	id.

H

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1690	Feb. 12. Both Houses agree that the Prince and Princess of Orange shall be king and queen	5	1690	March 27. The Commons agree to a supply for the war with France and for the reduction of Ireland	20
	Mary arrives at Whitehall from Holland	id.		— 28. The revenues vested in the crown in 1688 declared to be vested in William and Mary; and other matters relating to the revenue resolved by the Commons	id.
	— 13. The crown is tendered to William and Mary	id.		The Whigs in the Lords introduce the Abjuration Bill, by which all persons in employment are to take an oath abjuring James and his title to the crown	21
	They are proclaimed king and queen	id.		The bill is thrown out by the Tories in the Commons	22
	— 17. King William III. publishes his list of the privy council	9		A bill is passed calling for the fine of 500 l incurred by unqualified persons using in office	id.
	— 18. He makes his first speech from the throne	id.		The queen is authorised to act during the king's absence; the quo warranto judgment against the city of London is reversed; a general pardon is passed; thirty-one persons are excepted	id.
	— 19. The Convention declared to have been a legal parliament	id.		June 2. Parliament is prorogued	23
	March 1. A new oath of allegiance is framed and tendered; the Archbishop of Canterbury and seven bishops refuse the oath; four hundred of the clergy do the like; "non-jurors"	B, 10		— 14. William lands at Belfast	id.
	The Commons suspend the Habeas Corpus Act	10		— 16. James marches from Dublin	24
	The hearth-tax is abolished	id.		— 29. He crosses the Boyne and takes up a position on the right bank	id.
	The attainders of Lord Russell and Algernon Sidney are reversed	11		— 30. William arrives on the left bank; is slightly wounded by a cannon-ball	id.
	— 12. James lands at Kinsale; proceeds to various places; is acknowledged by the Catholics	12		An action is fought off Beachy Head by the English and Dutch fleets against the French	27
	— 14. The Scottish convention of estates meet at Edinburgh; the union of the two kingdoms is proposed, but abandoned	8		July 1. Battle of the Boyne; William passes the river	25, 6
	April 4. They resolve that James has forfeited the crown	id.		Marshal Schomberg is killed	26
	The crown is offered to William and Mary by the deputies from the Scottish convention	8, 9		King James embarks for France	id.
	Naval action between Admiral Herbert and the French fleet	12		July 2. Drogheda surrenders	id.
	James forms a council of government in Dublin; he issues various proclamations; summons a parliament to meet in Dublin on the 7th of May	13		— 8. William enters Dublin	id.
	He commences the siege of Londonderry	17		Various places surrender	id.
	May 7. The Irish parliament meets; the Act of Settlement, by which the English and Scotch Protestants hold their lands in Ireland, is repealed	id.		Aug. 9. William commences the siege of Limerick	id.
	Attains the adherents of the Prince of Orange, and votes supplies, and passes an act for liberty of conscience	14		— 30. He raises the siege and returns to England	id.
	Lord Dundee raises an insurrection in Scotland in favour of James; Lord Murray's men desert to Dundee; General Mackay's troops are defeated by Dundee and his Highlanders near the pass of Killikrankie; Dundee is killed	15		Sept. 21. The Earl of Marlborough lands at Cork; he and the Duke of Wirtemberg besiege Cork and Kinsale; both are taken; the Duke of Grafton is killed	28
	William III. relieves Londonderry; the siege is raised	17		Oct. 2. The king opens parliament; supplies are voted	id. , 29
	General Mackarty is defeated before Inniskillen	id.		The Earl of Marlborough returns to England; the Duke of Berwick goes to France	28
	Aug. 13. Marshal Schomberg lands at Carrickfergus with a large army of English, Dutch, French, Huguenots, and others	18		Dec. 20. The Commons vote four millions for the support of the army and the fleet	29
	Schomberg takes Belfast, Carrickfergus, Newry, and Dundalk	23		They vote 500,000 l more for building ships	30
	He is brought to a stand by James; entrenches himself by Dundalk	id.		Episcopacy is abolished in Scotland	43
	Sligo is taken by the Catholics	id.	1691	Jan. 5. William takes leave of the parliament and adjourns it to March 31	30
	Oct. 19. William opens the session of parliament	19		— 6. William proceeds to the Hague; gets to Canterbury; is obliged to return	id.
	Nov. 8. James returns to Dublin	23		— 16. He again proceeds; gets off the Dutch coast; goes in an open boat and reaches Goree	id.
	— 16. The Bill of Rights and the Land-tax Act are passed	19		— 20. Enters the Hague; the confederate princes meet him	id.
	The Princess Anne has an allowance of 50,000 l . a-year granted by parliament; the king's revenue is settled for one year	id.		March 5. He leaves the Hague for Loo	31
	Jan. 27. The Convention parliament is dissolved	id.		The French besiege Mons	32
	Feb. The Duke of Berwick attacks Schomberg at Belturbet, but is repulsed	23		April 20. The town and garrison capitulate to the French	id.
	March 20. A new English parliament meets	20		William returns to England; Tillotson is made archbishop of Canterbury and the sees of the nonjuring bishops filled up	id.
				May 1. The king leaves London for Holland	id.
				— 2. Sails from H ^l lwich; various military operations	id. , 33
				June 18. General Ginckel attacks Athlone	33
				— 19. Passes the Shannon and captures the town	id.
				July 12. Battle of Aghrim; the Irish and French are defeated	id. , 34

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1691	Aug. 26. General Ginckel lays siege to Limerick	31		the French: relieves Barcelona; blockades Toulou, and gains other successes	49
	Sept. King William goes to Loo; returns to England	33	1694	Nov. 9. William lands at Margate; is met by the queen	id.
	A proclamation is issued by the Scotch government, offering a pardon to all who take the oaths to the new government before the 1st of January, 1692	45		— 12. He meets the parliament; five millions of supplies are voted; the Triennial Bill passes both Houses	id.
	Oct. 1. Limerick surrenders; a treaty is executed, and an end put to the Irish war	34		Dec. 22. The royal assent is given to the "Triennial Bill"	id.
	Ginckel is created Baron Aghrim and Earl of Athlone	id.		Dr. Temison is made archbishop of Canterbury	50
	— 22. The king meets parliament; supplies are voted for carrying on the war and for increasing the army and navy	35		— 28. Queen Mary dies of the small-pox	id.
1692	A poll-tax act is passed	id.		William is reconciled to the Princess Anne	51
	The massacre of Glencoe	46		Crosby and Parker are committed to prison during this year as agents of James; Crosby is liberated on bail; Parker escapes from the Tower	64
	Feb. 29. Parliament is prorogued	35	1695	The secretary of the Treasury is dismissed and sent to the Tower, and Sir John Trevor, the speaker of the House of Commons, is expelled for corrupt practices; Mr. Paul Foley is elected speaker	51
	The Princess Anne quits the court	36		Many other persons are punished for similar offences; the Duke of Leeds (Danby) is impeached; William prorogues the parliament	52, 3
	March 5. William embarks for the continent	id.		May 12. William again embarks for the allied army	55
	May 5. The Earl of Marlborough is committed to the Tower	37		The Earl of Breadalban is sent to Edinburgh Castle by the Scottish parliament for the massacre of Glencoe	53
	— 21 and 22. Battle of La Hogue	38, 9		A bill passes the Scottish parliament for colonising the Isthmus of Darien	54
	June 16. The Earl of Marlborough is released	39		The Irish parliament passes many acts against the papists; they are rendered incapable of being guardians; the law of inheritance for papists is altered, and they are rendered incapable of holding land for more than thirty-one years; the Romish rites are forbidden and priests are banished. (These acts were passed between 1692 and 1705)	55
	— 23. He is dismissed from the privy council	id.		July. William commences the siege of Namur	56
	— 30. Namur surrenders to the French	36		Sept. 5. Namur capitulates	58
	William attacks Mons; battle of Steinkirk; he is defeated	id. , 37		Lord Berkeley bombards Dunkinque, Calais, and St. Malo, and destroys the town of Grandval	id.
	De Grandval is shot for a plot to assassinate William	37		Oct. 20. William returns to England; dissolves parliament by proclamation	id. , 59
	Oct. 19. William returns to London	39		William makes a progress to the north	id.
	Nov. 4. He opens parliament	id.		Nov. 22. A new parliament assembles; Foley is chosen speaker	id.
	He dismisses Admiral Russell	40		An act is passed regulating trials in cases of treason; and one regulating the expenses of elections	60
	Dec. 13. The Whigs in the Commons pass the "Place Bill"	id.		The Commons petition against the extensive grants made by the king to the Earl of Portland; the king recalls them and makes others	61
	— 22. It is rejected in the Lords	id.		The lords remonstrate against certain acts passed in the Scottish parliament relating to trading charters	id. , 62
	A bill for triennial parliaments, providing for annual sessions and elections every three years passes both Houses; William refuses the royal assent	id. , 41	1696	Jan. 26. The Commons also attack the Scotch trading charters	62
1693	March 14. William prorogues parliament; appoints Somers lord keeper; other Whigs to various places	41		The Marquess of Tweedale, the lord high commissioner, and two secretaries of state for Scotland, are dismissed	id.
	April. He again joins the allied army			The Commons carry a motion for an act to create a board of trade; the king takes offence at it	id.
	June 17. The Smyrna fleet is attacked; the French beat the English and Dutch fleets	42, 3		Feb. 11. Captain Fisher discloses to the Earl of Portland a plot to assassinate William	66
	July 29. William fights the battle of Landen; is defeated	41		The invasion plot	62, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8
	Heidelberg is taken by the French	id.		— 14. Prendergast gives further information	66
	Nov. William returns from the continent; establishes a Whig government	46		— 24. William declares the discovery of the plot to parliament; a proclamation is issued against the conspirators	id.
	Admiral Russell is restored	47		March. Admiral Russell bombards Calais	72
	The Dukes of Leeds, Bedford, Newcastle, Devonshire, and Shrewsbury, and the Marquess of Normandy are created	id.		— 11. Charnock, King, and Keys are tried
	The Earl of Sunderland is taken into favour	id.
	— 7. Parliament meets; large additions are voted to the army and navy; Lord Falkland is removed, and Admiral Russell placed at the head of the Admiralty	id.
	Lord Bellamont is dismissed from the privy council; Lord Coningsby and Sir Charles Porter, the lords justices of Ireland, against whom the Commons complain, are pardoned	47, 8
1694	Feb. Admiral Wheeler's fleet in the Mediterranean is destroyed by a tempest	48
	April. William again joins the army; the military operations are continued	49
	Jan. 7. Lord Berkeley with a fleet appears off Brest; the army lands under General Tolle-mache; they are wholly defeated. Tolle-mache is killed	48, 9
	Lord Berkeley bombards and destroys Dieppe and Havre de Grace	49
	Admiral Russell sails to the Mediterranean with an English and Dutch fleet; clears it of

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
	and convicted of high treason at the Old Bailey	68	1699	The Commons pass a bill of supply with a clause for taking an account of the Irish forfeited estates in order that they may be applied	95
1696	March 18. They are executed at Tyburn	id.		April. The king issues a proclamation against the Scottish settlement of New St. Andrew's in the Isthmus of Darien	97
	Sir John Friend, Sir William Perkins, Rookwood, Lowick, and Cranburn are also tried, convicted, and executed	69		The colonists are reduced to great necessity; the remainder re-embark for Scotland	98
	Parliament suspends the Habeas Corpus Act; vote the banishment of all papists from London and Westminster, and propose a protestant association for the defence of King William	71		Captain Campbell and a new set of adventurers arrive; they attack the Spaniards at Tubacante; rout them; the Spaniards besiege them in New St. Andrew's; they capitulate; he returns to Scotland with the few remaining of his followers	id., 97
	A bond of association that William is by law entitled to the crown, and that James, his son, or any other have no right, is signed by both Houses, and generally throughout the country	id.		May 4. The Lords pass the bill of supply with its clause, and the king assents	95
	The clergy sign a somewhat similar one	72		The king goes to Loo	id.
	An act is passed for the better security of his majesty's person and government	id.		Sept. The Scottish Company remonstrate upon the conduct pursued in regard to Paterson and his followers	99
	April 27. The session of parliament is closed	id.		Oct. William returns to England	101
	May. William arrives on the continent	73		Nov. 16. He opens the session of parliament	id.
	June. Sir John Fenwick, engaged in the invasion plot, is arrested	74		The Commons receive the report of the commissioners for taking the account of the Irish forfeited estates	103
	Aug. 10. He makes a confession, implicating many persons	id.	1700	Lady Orkney's grant is brought into question	id., 104
	Oct. William returns to England	id.		Sir Richard Levhz is committed to the Tower	104
	— 20. Opens parliament; supplies are voted; money is proposed to be borrowed upon state counters or exchequer tallies, bearing interest and secured upon supplies voted in succeeding sessions	id.		The Commons pass the Resumption Bill, and tack it to a money bill; the Lords amend it; the Commons reject the amendments; the Lords pass the bill	101, 5
1697	Jan. Admiral Russell lays the confessions of Fenwick upon the table of the House of Commons; Fenwick is summoned; the papers voted false, and an act of attainder brought in against him	76		April 11. The king gives his assent and prorogues parliament	105
	The bill passes both Houses, and receives the royal assent	id.		Lord Somers is removed; Sir Matthew Wright is made lord keeper	106
	28. Fenwick is beheaded on Tower Hill	id.		July. The king departs for Loo	id.
	The Earl of Monmouth is sent to the Tower	id.		Sir George Rooke with the English and Dutch fleets drives the Danish fleet into Copenhagen	108
	April 16. Parliament is prorogued	id.		A treaty of peace is signed between Sweden and Denmark	id.
	The king creates Admiral Russell Earl of Orford; Summers, Lord Somers, Baron of Evesham and lord chancellor, and makes Sunderland lord chamberlain; he appoints a council of regency and goes to the continent	77		The Second Partition Treaty	108-112
	Preliminaries of the treaty of Ryswick are arranged	78		— 30. The Duke of Gloucester, son of the Princess Anne, dies	112
	Sept. 20. The treaty of Ryswick is signed	79	1701	Feb. 10. Parliament assembles; Robert Harley is elected speaker	id.
	Nov. 16. William enters London	80		The king recommends a settlement of the succession	id.
	Dec. 3. Parliament meets; the king proposes keeping up a land force; the Commons pass a resolution for the disbanding the army raised since 1680; Sunderland retires; parliament votes a revenue of 700,000 l. a-year to the king for life	id., 81		The States General abandon the Partition treaty	114, 115
	Some acts are passed injurious to Ireland	81, 2		An intercepted letter from Lord Melfort to the Earl of Perth is read in both houses of parliament, proposing measures for the restoration of James	115
1698	The Commons complain of the standing army	82		Parliament votes large supplies for the army, the navy, and the garrisons	116
	July 5. William prorogues parliament	id.		The House of Lords appoints a committee to consider the two partition treaties	117
	— 7. Dissolves it by proclamation	id.		The Commons resolve to impeach the Earl of Portland for negotiating the partition treaties; Lord Somers, Lord Halifax, and Lord Orford are also impeached for having advised the signing of it	120, 1
	The treaty of partition	86-92		The "Kentish Petition" is presented	122
	— 26. Paterson sails from Leith Roads with 12,000 men for Darien	95		All the petitioners are sent to the Gate House	id.
	Oct. They reach Darien, land at Acta; establish New St. Andrew's and New Edinburgh	96		The Legion memorial is presented to the House of Commons	124
	Dec. 4. William returns to London from Loo	92		May 19. The impeachment of Lord Somers is carried up to the House of Lords	125
	— 6. Opens the new parliament	id.		— 24. He sends his answer	id.
	The Commons pass resolutions for disbanding the army, except 7000 in England and 12,000 in Ireland, natural born subjects; they send a bill up to the Lords	92		The Succession Bill passes	226, 7
1699	The bill passes the Lords	93		Lord Somers is acquitted	127, 8
	Feb. 1. The king gives the royal assent	id.		Orford is acquitted; the Lords dismiss the charges against Portland and Halifax	128
	He requests that the Dutch guards may remain; it is refused by the Commons	94		June 24. The king prorogues parliament	id.
	The Earl of Orford resigns his places	95		He embarks for Holland	id.

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1701	Sept. 7. "The Second Grand Alliance signed at the Hague"	128, 9	1703	Oct. 31. The Duke of Marlborough returns to England	154
	— 16. James II. dies at St. Germain	130		The King of Spain (the Archduke Charles) arrives in England	id.
	Nov. 4. William returns from Holland	133		Nov. 9. Parliament meets; the queen announces the intention to recover the monarchy of Spain from the House of Bourbon, and restore it to that of Austria	id.
	— 11. He dissolves parliament	id.		Supplies are voted; the army and navy increased; the occasional Conformity Bill is again carried in the Commons, and again rejected by the Lords	155
	Dec. 30. The new parliament assembles	135		Dec. 17. The queen informs the Commons of a plot going on in Scotland (Fraser's plot) id. , 156, 7
1702	Jan. 1. The supplies are voted for the maintenance of the army and for carrying on the war	135, 6		The Lords examine some parties; commit them to the custody of the Black rod, who takes them out of the custody of the queen's messenger, but they are again given into his keeping	id.
	— 2. A bill of attainder passes the Commons against James II.'s son	137		The Commons address the queen upon the invasion of her prerogative; both Houses quarrel	id.
	Feb. 21. The king fractures his collar bone	id.		1704 Jan. 19. The Duke of Marlborough arrives at the Hague	163
	— 28. He sends a message to parliament recommending a union between England and Scotland	id.		— 29. The Earl of Nottingham produces by order of the queen the papers concerning Fraser's plot; the Lords are dissatisfied; continue their inquiry by committee; the Commons address the queen; an union between England and Scotland is proposed	157
	The royal assent is given to the Attainder Bill	138		The case of Ashby against White, on elections, is determined by the Court of Queen's Bench; is carried by appeal to the House of Lords; the judgment of the Queen's Bench is reversed	158
	March 7. The royal assent is given by commission to the Abjuration and Malt-tax Bill	id.		The Commons declare that the bringing the action is a breach of privilege in all parties concerned; and that all matters relating to elections belong to the House of Commons	id.
	The sign manual is affixed by a stamp	id.		The Lords pass resolutions declaring the decision of the Commons an unprecedented attempt upon the judicature of parliament, and an attempt to subject the law to the will of the Commons	id.
	— 8. King William III. dies	139		Feb. 4. The queen, who has revived the Order of the Thistle, gives a green ribbon to the Duke of Argyll	161
	Queen Anne is proclaimed	140		— 7. The Queen proposes to give up first fruits and tenths for the augmentation of four benefices	159
	The late king's ministry is continued	id.		Queen Anne's bounty is established	id.
	— 11. The Earl of Marlborough is made knight of the Garter	141		The Earl of Nottingham retires; Harley is made Secretary of State	160
	— 12. He is appointed captain-general of the English forces at home and abroad	id.		The bill for recruiting the army, after a quarrel between the Houses, passes for a year	id.
	He is made master of the ordnance; Prince George of Denmark is made lord high admiral and generalissimo	id.		— 21. Marlborough returns to England	164
	Lady Marlborough is made mistress of the robes; her two daughters ladies of the bed-chamber; the Earl of Sunderland's pension is continued	id.		April 3. The queen prorogues parliament	161
	The Tories come into power	142		— 4. David Lindsay is brought to trial for high treason; he is carried to Tyburn; sent back to Newgate	id.
	Sir George Rooke is appointed vice-admiral of England	id.		Marlborough rejoins the allied army	164
	— 28. Marlborough is sent ambassador to the Hague; is appointed to the chief command of the allied armies; returns to England	143		July 2. The battle of Schellenberg or Donawert	167, 8
	May 4. War is declared against France	144		— 6. The Scottish parliament assembles	161
	The Earl of Rochester is dismissed	143		They pass a bill called the Scottish Security Bill for regulating the succession to the Scottish throne, and for disbanding the army; the queen gives her assent	162, 3
	The Commons vote the queen 709,000 l. a-year for life	144		An attempt is made to place the Archduke Charles on the throne of Spain	174
	— 12. Marlborough departs for Holland; places himself at the head of the army; begins military operations	id. , 145		— 23. Admiral Rooke takes Gibraltar	175
	Aug. Rooke and Ormond make an unsuccessful attack upon Cadix	146		Aug. 13. Battle of Blenheim	170, 1, 2
	They attack Vigo Bay; destroy the Spanish galleons and capture several ships and great wealth	id.		Sea fight off Malaga between the English and Dutch fleets, under Rooke, and the French fleet under the command of the Count of Toulouze	175
	Sept. 23. Venloo surrenders	145		1705 Feb. The queen grants the manor and honour of Woodstock to the Duke of Marlborough;
	Oct. 7. Rurenmond and Stevenswaert are captured	id.
	— 20. Parliament meets	146
	— 29. Liege with its garrison surrenders to Marlborough	145
	Marlborough is captured on a canal, but liberated	id.
	Proceeds to the Hague and returns to London	id.
	The occasional conformity Bill is passed in the Commons, but lost in the Lords	147, 8
	Dec. 14. Marlborough is created a duke	148
	The queen gives him 5000 l. a-year during her life; an annual revenue is settled on Prince George of Denmark of 100,000 l. for life	149
1703	Lord Ranelagh is expelled the House of Commons	id. , 150
	The two Houses quarrel concerning Lord Halifax	150
	Feb. 27. The queen prorogues parliament	id.
	The two houses of convocation disagree	id.
	March 9. Marshal Villiers reduces the town of Kebl	151
	May 15. Cologne capitulates to the allies	152
	The allies carry on various military operations	153

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
	the Commons grant money to pay off the incumbrances; the queen orders the erection of Blenheim House	176	1708	Troops are marched to Scotland; Sir George Byng is sent with a fleet to Dunkirk, where the Pretender is ready to embark for Scotland	216
1705	Feb. Admiral Rooke is dismissed, and Sir Cloudeley Shovel appointed to the command of the fleet	177		He captures the Salisbury, one of the French ships, with Lord Griffin, two sons of Lord Middleton, and some Irish officers and French companies on board	217
	The case of Ashby against Wright is again agitated; the burgesses of Aylesbury are sent to Newgate; writs of Habeas Corpus are granted; a writ of error is removed to the House of Lords; the prisoners are removed into custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms	id.		Lord Griffin is sent to the Tower; condemned, but relieved	id.
	The House of Lords passes resolutions that the appeal to courts of law is no breach of privilege	178		The Pretender returns to France	218
	March 14. Parliament is prorogued	id.		None of the prisoners taken are executed	id.
	April 5. It is dissolved by proclamation	id.		April 1. Parliament is prorogued, and soon after dissolved	219
	Marlborough again joins the allies; retakes Huy; the campaign closes in May	id.		Marlborough goes to the Hague	id.
	The Emperor Leopold dies; is succeeded by Joseph	id.		May. An attempt at insurrection is made in Ireland by Father O'Connor	id.
	The war is carried on in Spain	179		Commodore Wager takes several Spanish galleons	222
	The Earl of Peterborough gains many battles	179, 80		The French take Ghent, Ypres, and invest Oudenarde	219
	Oct. The new parliament meets; the Whigs have a majority in the House of Commons	180		July 11. Battle of Oudenarde	220
	A Regency Bill, in case of the queen's death, is passed	182		Sept. Admiral Leake conquers the Island of Sardinia	221
	Mr. Casar is committed to the Tower	183		— 30. The fortress of St. Philip in Port Mahon is taken by General Stanhope and Admiral Leake; the Island of Minorca is taken by the English	id.
1706	March 19. The queen prorogues parliament	id.		Oct. 22. Lisle is taken by Marlborough and Prince Eugene	220
	April. Marlborough again leaves England	id.		Prince George of Denmark dies	222
	May 23. Battle of Ramilies	184		The Earl of Pembroke is made Lord High Admiral	id.
	Prince Eugene beats the French between the Doria and the Stura	185		Nov. 16. The second parliament of Great Britain meets	223
	King Philip of Spain besieges Barcelona; the siege is raised by Peterborough	id.		Dec. 1. The citadel of Lisle surrenders	220
	June 24. Galway takes Madrid	186		Ghent, Bruges, and other places are retaken, or surrender	id.
	Oct. 3. The commission is opened for the Union between England and Scotland	187		The French gain many successes in Spain	221
	Disturbances take place in Edinburgh	191	1709	A new treason act for Scotland is debated and passed	226, 7, 8
	The Treaty of Union is passed by the Scottish parliament	196		An Act of Grace is issued for all offences before the signing the bill, except offences on the seas	228
1707	March 4. The Act of Union receives the royal assent	199		An act is passed, defining the privileges of ambassadors	230
	The Duke of Marlborough's titles are limited to his eldest daughter and her heir's male; 5000 l. a-year is settled on his widow and descendants	200		A new scheme for invading Scotland is agitated at Versailles, but is abandoned	228, 9
	— 25. The last Scottish parliament rises	196		The House of Lords resolves that no peer of Great Britain, whether English or Scotch, having a seat, shall vote for representative peers for Scotland	231
	April 21. The last separate English parliament rises	200		The Commons exclude the eldest sons of Scottish peers from seats in the House of Commons	id.
	Battle of Almaraz	202		Conferences take place, and preliminaries are made at the Hague for a peace	231, 2, 3, 4, 5
	— 28. The Duke of Marlborough and Charles XII. of Sweden meet	201		June. Prince Eugene and Marlborough take the field	235
	Oct. 12. Capture of Lerida	203		July 7. They besiege Tournay	id.
	— 22. Sir Cloudeley Shovel is wrecked off Scilly	204		— 30. Tournay surrenders	id.
	— 23. The first parliament of Great Britain meets	210		Sept. 3. The citadel surrenders to Prince Eugene	id.
	The privy council for Scotland is abolished	211		— 12. Battle of Malplaquet	236
	Dec. 17. Capture of Morella	203		Nov. 5. Dr. Sacheverell preaches a virulent sermon in St. Paul's	237
	Siege of Toulon; the Austrians gain possession of the kingdom of Naples	203, 4		— 15. The session of parliament is opened	236
	— 23. Both Houses address the queen to continue war till the whole of the Spanish territories are restored to the House of Austria	211		The Commons vote 6,200,000 l. for supplies	237
1708	William Grey is hanged for high treason	214, 15		Dec. 15. Sacheverell is ordered to be impeached by the Commons for publishing his sermon; he is taken into custody	238
	Marlborough and Godolphin absent themselves from the council	215	1710	Jan. 13. The impeachment is carried up to the Lords	id.
	Harley is dismissed	216		Feb. 27. His trial takes place	239, 240, 1, 2
	March. The queen announces to parliament an intention in Scotland to reinstate the Stuarts	id.		March 19. New conferences for a peace are held at the Hague	246
	The Habeas Corpus Act is suspended	id.
	A proclamation is issued against the Pretender and his adherents	id.
	The Duke of Hamilton and twenty-one other Scottish lords and gentlemen are arrested	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

55

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1710	March 20. Sacheverell is found guilty of high crimes and misdemeanours	242	1713	April 9. The session of parliament is opened; the queen announces that the Treaty of Peace of Utrecht is signed	273
	— 23. He is sentenced not to preach for three years, and his sermons ordered to be burnt by the hangman	id.		May 4. Peace is proclaimed	271
	The Whigs are dismissed from office, and are succeeded by the Tories	246		June 14. A motion for leave to bring in a bill for dissolving the Union between England and Scotland is lost in the House of Lords	277
	Douay is besieged and taken by Marlborough and Eugene	247.		— 18. A bill for establishing a commercial intercourse between England and France is thrown out by the Commons	276
	May. General Stanhope and Count Starenberg commence the campaign in Spain	id.		July 16. The parliament is prorogued	277
	July 27. Stanhope defeats King Philip near Almanara	id.		Aug. 8. Is dissolved by proclamation	id.
	Aug. 19. He is again defeated by Stanhope and Starenberg, near Saragoza; Saragoza surrenders	id.		The people of Catalonia are entirely subdued by King Philip	279
	Sept. 21. Stanhope takes possession of Madrid	id.		Intrigues are entered into for the restoration of the Stuarts	280, 1, 2
	— 28. King Charles enters Madrid	id.	1714	Feb. 16. The new parliament assembles	282
	Nov. 25. Parliament meets	248		March 2. The queen delivers the speech from the throne; complains of the statement that the Hanoverian succession is in danger	id.
	Dec. 9. Stanhope is defeated and taken prisoner by the Duke of Vendôme	id.		The House of Commons vote that "the Crisis," written by Mr. Richard Steele, is a scandalous libel, and expel him the House	281
1711	— 10. Starenberg retreats before Vendôme	id.		Lord Wharton moves in the Lords that the protestant succession is in danger; it is lost	id.
	A bill is brought into parliament requiring property qualification for members of the Commons	250		The Lords agree to a vote proposing the issuing a proclamation, offering a reward for the apprehending and bringing the Pretender to justice, in case he should land or attempt to land in Great Britain or Ireland	285
	Guiscard stabs Mr. Harley whilst under examination before the privy council	id.		April 12. A writ is demanded for summoning the Electoral Prince of Hanover, as Duke of Cambridge, to parliament	id. , 286, 7
	Harley is created Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer	252		May 30. The queen writes to the Electoral Prince	292
	June 12. Parliament is prorogued	id.		The Electress Sophia of Hanover dies	293
	Overtures are made to France for peace; preliminaries are executed	253, 4, 5, 6		June 11. The Electoral Prince replies to the queen's letter	295
	An attempt is made by the English to conquer Canada	257		— 23. A proclamation is issued for the apprehension of the Pretender	296
	Sir Simon Harcourt is made Lord Harcourt and Lord Chancellor; the Duke of Hamilton is created Duke of Brandon, in the English peerage	id. , 258		A bill passes, making it high-treason to enlist or be enlisted in his service	id.
	Dec. 7. The session of parliament opens; the Duke of Brandon is refused his seat as an English peer	258		The Schism Bill is debated and passed	296, 7, 8
	— 21. Marlborough is charged in the Commons with misappropriating public money	id.		July 9. The queen closes the session of parliament	294
	He is dismissed from his employment by the queen	260		— 27. The Earl of Oxford is dismissed	299
1712	Jan. 1. The queen signs twelve new patent of peerage	id.		— 30. The queen is seized with a fit of apoplexy	300
	— 14. The queen sends a message ordering the Lords to adjourn; the question is debated and carried; the House is adjourned	id.		The Duke of Shrewsbury is nominated Prime Minister	id.
	Robert Walpole is committed to the Tower and expelled the House of Commons for corruption	261		— 31. A messenger is sent to hurry the arrival of the Electoral Prince	301
	— 14. The House of Lords re-assembles	id.		Aug. 1. Queen Anne dies	id.
	Prince Eugene visits England	262		Accession of King George I.; he is immediately proclaimed; the Duke of Marlborough arrives the same evening at Dover; the Houses of Lords and Commons sit	id. , 301
	— 29. The congress is opened at Utrecht	264		The Lords Justices, appointed by the Regency Act, meet and appoint Addison secretary	302
	May. The Duke of Ormond receives secret orders from the ministry not to engage in any siege or battle	265		The Duke of Marlborough is met on his entry into London by 200 gentlemen on horseback, and a long train of carriages; he proceeds to the House of Lords and takes the oaths to King George	id.
	June 5. The queen announces to parliament the intended peace	266		The king is proclaimed in Dublin	id.
	A preface to a book written by Fleetwood, Bishop of St. Asaph, is declared by the House of Commons to be seditious; and is ordered to be burnt by the hangman	267		Aug. 5. The Commons vote a civil list of 700,000 l.	301
	— 21. Parliament is adjourned	id.		A reward of 100,000 l. is offered for the apprehension of the Pretender if he shall land	id.
	July. The Duke of Ormond withdraws his troops	268		The parliament is prorogued	id.
	Marshal Villars gains various successes	269		— 29. The Pretender signs and puts forth a manifesto at Plombiere, asserting his right to the crown	303
	Sept. Lord Godolphin dies	272		Sept. 18. King George I. and his son Prince George land at Greenwich; Lord Harcourt is dismissed; the king refuses to see the Duke of Ormond; Lord Bolingbroke is removed	304, 5
	Oct. The Duke of Ormond returns to England	268
	Nov. 5. Lord Lexington is sent to Madrid; the king of Spain, Philip, signs his renunciation of the French succession	270
	— 15. The Duke of Hamilton and Lord Mohun fight a duel, and are both killed	271
	The Duke of Marlborough retires to Brussels	272

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1714	Marlborough is appointed commander-in-chief; the other offices are filled up by Whigs	305	1715	General Wille marches against them; they lay down their arms. Lords Derwentwater, Widdrington, Kenmuir, and other lords are taken; Mackintosh, Forster, and other gentlemen are also captured; the insurrection in England is suppressed	317
	Oct. 20. The king is crowned at Westminster	id.		— 13. Battle of Dunblane; the insurgents, under the Earl of Mar, are routed by the Duke of Argyll; the banner of the Stuarts called "The Restoration" is taken	318, 19
1715	Jan. Parliament is dissolved; a new one called March 19. The new parliament meets	id.		Many of the insurgents of England are executed by martial law	327
	The king appears in person in parliament; his speech is read by Lord Cowper, the chancellor; he promises to make the constitution in church and state the rule of his government	id.		Dec. 9. Forster and the principal of them arrive in London; the Lords are sent to the Tower; the others to the gaols	328
	Sir William Wyndham is reprimanded by the speaker	id.		The Pretender leaves St. Malo and embarks at Dunkirk	321
	Lord Bolingbroke goes to Calais	307		— 22. He lands at Peterhead	id.
	April 9. His papers with others are laid before the House, and referred to a select committee	id.		He goes to Fetteresso; is joined by Mar, General Hamilton, and other Jacobites	id.
	June 9. Walpole brings up the report; he impeaches Lord Bolingbroke of high crimes and misdemeanours	id.		— 30. He removes from Fetteresso to Kinnaird	322
	Lord Coningsby impeaches Lord Oxford of high treason	id.	1716	Jan. 6. The Pretender makes his public entry into Dundee	id.
	— 10 and 17. Mathew Prior is impeached and sent to close custody	308		— 8. He arrives at Scone	id.
	— 21. General Stanhope impeaches the Duke of Ormond	307		— 9. Parliament re-assembles; the Earl of Derwentwater is impeached; Lords Widdrington, Nairn, and Kenmuir, and the Earls of Nithsdale, Winton, and Caruath are also impeached	328
	— 22. Mr. Ainslie impeaches Lord Strafford	308		— 16. The Pretender holds a council at Perth	321
	The Duke of Ormond flies to France	id.		— 19. The Lords are brought before the Peers in Westminster Hall; all but Winton plead guilty; are condemned	328
	July 9. Lord Coningsby carries the impeachment of Oxford to the House of Lords	id.		The Pretender orders the burning of all towns between Perth and Stirling; many are destroyed	521
	— 11. Oxford is committed to the Tower	id.		— 24. The Duke of Argyll and General Cadogan advance and survey the roads leading to Perth	id.
	Bolingbroke and Ormond intrigue in France for the restoration of the Stuarts	309, 10, 11		— 29. The royal army reaches Tullihardine	325
	Lord Stair demands of the Regent Orleans the seizure of ships at Havre, fitted out for the service of the Pretender	311		— 31. The Pretender evacuates Perth and proceeds to Dundee	id.
	Sept. 1. The Earl of Mar erects the standard of the Pretender at Brae Mar	312		Feb. 1. Perth is occupied by the royal troops	id.
	— 9. He issues a declaration calling on the people to arm, and assumes the title of lieutenant-general to King James	id.		— 3. Argyll follows the Pretender; arrives at Dundee; the rebels have retreated to Montrose	id.
	The Earls of Hume, Wigtown, and Kinnoul, Lord Deskford, Lockart of Cornwall, and Hume of Whitfield, are apprehended and sent to Edinburgh Castle	id.		The Pretender retires to a ship and sails for France	id.
	Troops are sent into Scotland; the Duke of Argyll is sent as commander-in-chief, and the Earl of Sutherland raises his clans for King George	id.		— 8. Argyll enters Aberdeen; many prisoners are taken	326
	The titular Duke of Powis, Lord Lansdowne and Lord Duplin, are arrested	id.		The Earls of Carnwath and Widdrington are respited; Lord Nairn is saved	328
	Sir William Wyndham is arrested; he escapes; surrenders	id.		— 23. The Earl of Nithsdale escapes from the Tower in his wife's clothes	id.
	Mr. Forster raises a rebellion in Northumberland	id.		— 24. The Earls of Derwentwater and Kenmuir are beheaded on Tower Hill	329
	Sir Richard Vivian is sent in custody to London	313		March 15. Lord Winton is condemned for treason and sent back to the Tower	320
	Oct. 6. General Pepper arrives in Oxford with an army; he arrests several suspected persons; Colonel Owen escapes	id.		April. Forster, Mackintosh, and others, are convicted with twenty others for high treason; some escape, others are executed	id.
	The Earl of Derwentwater joins Forster; they march to Warkworth and are joined by Lord Widdrington; Forster proclaims the Pretender; they march to Morpeth	id.		— 17. A bill to enforce the laws against papists is passed	id.
	— 12. Lord Kenmuir proclaims the Pretender at Moffat	id.		— 26. The Septennial Bill passes	330, 31
	Forster attempts Newcastle; fails; marches to Hexham	id.		June 8. An act disabling persons holding pensions from the crown from sitting in the Commons is passed	331
	Kenmuir joins Forster near Rothbury; they march to Kelso	id.		— 28. Parliament is prorogued	id.
	The Duke of Argyll and General Whetham prevent any successful attempt by the insurgents in Scotland	314, 15		The king goes to Hanover	id.
	Nov. 2. Mackintosh and Forster arrive at Penrith; march to Kirkby Lonsdale, proclaiming the Pretender	316		Negotiations take place for the "French treaty" concerning the defection of Dunkirk and matters relating to the north of Europe, and a scheme of the Swedes to invade England and restore the Stuarts	id. , 332, 3, 4,
	The insurgents march to Lancaster; they are joined by the Roman Catholics; they advance to Preston	id.		A division takes place in the Whig cabinet	334
				The French treaty is signed at the Hague	337
				Dec. The king returns to England	id.

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

57

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1716	The treaty is signed at the Hague for Holland, and becomes "The Triple Alliance"	337	1720	Sept. The South Sea scheme bursts; a general panic prevails	373, 4
1717	Jan. 29. Count Gyllenborg, the Swedish ambassador, is arrested by order of the privy council	338		Nov. 9. The king lands at Margate	374
	Feb. 20. Parliament meets	id.		The South Sea stock falls to 135	id.
	April. A change takes place in the ministry; the "German ministry" is formed	339		Dec. 8. Parliament meets	id.
	Jan. 24. The Earl of Oxford is tried before the Lords in Westminster Hall for high treason; he is acquitted	id. , 340		— 12. The South Sea directors are ordered to lay their accounts before parliament	id.
	The Earl of Carnarvon and Lords Widdrington and Nairn are discharged from the Tower	340		— 21. Walpole brings in a bill to transfer part of the South Sea stock into the Bank and part into the East India Company's stock	375
	Aug. The Quadruple Alliance	345	1721	Walpole's bill is passed	id.
	The Prince of Wales is ordered to quit St. James's	343		Four members of parliament, directors of the company, are expelled the House, taken into custody and their papers seized	id.
	Nov. The Spaniards conquer Sardinia	342		Feb. 4. A violent debate takes place in the House of Lords; the Earl of Stanhope is taken suddenly ill in the House	id.
	— 21. Parliament assembles; Mr. Shippen is committed to the Tower	344		— 5. He dies	id.
	The Mutiny Bill passes with a clause giving courts-martial the power to punish mutiny and desertion with death	id.		— 16. The secret committee of the Commons present their report on the South Sea scheme	id.
1718	James Sheppard is executed for treason	id.		Ainslie is expelled and sent to the Tower	376
	March 21. The parliament is prorogued	id.		Sunderland is accused, but acquitted	id.
	A large naval armament is prepared at Portsmouth	id.		The property of the directors is confiscated	id.
	June 4. The fleet sails under Sir George Byng for the Mediterranean	345		April 2. Walpole is made first lord of the Treasury	id.
	Ang. 11. Battle off Cape Passaro	346, 7		He introduces a new bill for remedying the mischief of the South Sea scheme	377
	Nov. 11. Parliament meets	350		June 13. A treaty of peace is signed between Great Britain and Spain	id.
	Dec. 11. Charles XII. of Sweden is killed before Frederickshal	349		July 10. Walpole's new bill receives the royal assent	id.
	— 19. A bill passes for strengthening the Protestant interest	351		The parliament is prorogued	id.
1719	March. A bill is introduced into the House of Lords to limit the creation of peers, but is withdrawn	id. , 352		Oct. 19. Parliament again meets	378
	April 16. Two frigates put into the port of Kintail and land Spanish soldiers and arms, and put out to sea	353		Dec. 18. Matthew Prior dies	308
	— 18. Parliament is prorogued	352	1722	March 7. Parliament is again prorogued, and dissolved on the 10th	378
	May. The king appoints a council of regency and goes to Hanover	id.		April 19. The Earl of Sunderland dies suddenly	id.
	June 10. General Wightman defeats the Spaniards and Highlanders at Glensheil	354		May. Walpole receives intelligence of a new plot to restore the Pretender; several arrests take place; a camp is formed in Hyde Park, and other precautions taken	380
	18. Fusterabia surrenders to the French	355		Lord Orrery and the Duke of Norfolk are sent to the Tower; after a short time are liberated	id.
	The French soldiers and English sailors destroy Santoun	id.		June 16. The Duke of Marlborough dies; his body is deposited in Westminster Abbey, the king and Prince of Wales attending; it is afterwards removed to Blenheim	379
	Aug. 2. The Duke of Berwick besieges and takes St. Sebastian	id.		Aug. 24. Bishop Atterbury is arrested and sent to the Tower	380
	— 8. The siege of Messina	361, 3		Sept. 20. The Pretender issues a declaration at Lucca calling on the king to give up the throne	381
	— 17. The citadel of St. Sebastian surrenders	355		Oct. 9. The new parliament meets; the Habeas Corpus Act is suspended for a year	id.
	The French make great conquests in Spain	356		The Houses order the Pretender's declaration of Lucca to be burned by the hangman	id.
	Oct. Lord Colburn takes the citadel of Vigo	id.		An act is passed for raising money by tax upon the property of all non-jurors	id.
	During this year Sir George Byng prosecutes the war in Sicily	358-63		1723	Mr. Lyster is tried, convicted, and executed, for enlisting troops for the Pretender	id.
	The king returns from Hanover	368		Bills of pains and penalties are passed against several persons	id.
	Nov. 23. Parliament is opened	id.		A bill of banishment and deprivation passes the Commons against Bishop Atterbury	id.
	— 25. The bill for limiting the peerage is again introduced into the House of Lords; it passes on the 30th	id.		May 6. He is brought to the bar of the House of Lords; the bill is passed, and receives the royal assent	id.
	The bill is thrown out in the Commons	370		June 18. He is conveyed to Calais	382
1720	April 7. The South Sea Company Bill is passed	id. , 372		The king goes again to Hanover	id.
	May. The king is reconciled to the Prince of Wales	372		Bolingbroke is pardoned, and returns to England; proposes to Walpole a coalition with the Tories; returns to France	id.
	June 14. The king departs for Hanover	id.		Aug. The Abbé Dubois dies	383
	The South Sea Company's funds rise from 130 to 300	id.		Dec. The Regent Duke of Orleans dies	id.
	Aug. The South Sea stock rises to above 1000 per cent.	id. , 373		— 19. The king returns to London	id.
	The council of regency issue a proclamation forbidding the formation of companies	373
	Immense speculations are formed in companies	id.
	The Prince of Wales becomes a Governor of the Welsh Copper Company, but withdraws	id.
	Sept. The South Sea stock falls below 300	id.

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1724	Jan. 7. Parliament meets; supplies are voted; the standing army is raised to 18,200 men	383, 4	1728	The Commons address the king for an account of the secret service money	402
	Resolutions are passed restricting the protections given by ambassadors, peers, and members of parliament	384	1729	Frederick, Prince of Wales, comes from Hanover	id.
	April 24. The parliament is prorogued	id.	Jan. 21. Parliament assembles; resolutions are passed for the preservation of Gibraltar and Minorca	id., 103
	Wood's coinage in Ireland creates disturbances; Dean Swift publishes "Drapier's Letters"	id.	— 26. The House of Commons resolves that it is a breach of privilege to publish their debates in a newspaper	103
	The printer is indicted; the grand jury ignore the bill	385	They vote 115,000 l. for a deficiency in the civil list	id.
	A riot takes place at Glasgow against the malt-tax; nine persons are shot by the military; Captain Bushell is tried and convicted, but pardoned	id.	May 14. The parliament is prorogued	id.
	Nov. 12. Parliament meets; the army is continued for another year	id.	The king appoints Queen Caroline regent, and departs for Hanover	id.
	The Earl of Macclesfield, lord chancellor, is impeached and fined for corruption, and sent to the Tower	id., 386	The Spaniards erect the lines of S. Roque	id.
	Lord Bolingbroke is restored to his seat in parliament	386	Nov. 9. The treaty of Seville is concluded	id.
1725	Jan. 15. Don Louis succeeds to the Bourbon title to the Spanish crown on the abdication of King Philip; he dies in seven months	387	1730	Jan. Parliament is opened	404
	Peter the Great, czar of Russia, dies	388	A bill is carried prohibiting loans to foreign states without the licence of the king under the privy seal	id.
	April 30. A treaty is concluded between Spain and the emperor at Vienna	id.	Feb. 16. The Pension Bill is passed by the Commons	id.
	Sept. 3. A treaty is signed at Hanover between Great Britain, France, and Prussia; Denmark and Holland accede soon after	id.	It is rejected by the Lords	id.
1726	Jan. 1. The king embarks for Harwich	389	The East India Company's charter is prolonged to 1766	id.
	— 4. He arrives at Rye	id.	1731	A bill passes for all pleadings and processes in courts of law to be in English	405
	— 9. He reaches St. James's	id.	Sir Robert Sutton is expelled the House of Commons for peculation	id.
	— 20. Parliament meets; the treaty of Hanover is approved by a large majority; supplies are voted	id.	A bill is thrown out for preventing the translation of bishops	id.
	May 21. Parliament is prorogued	id.	May. Parliament is prorogued	id.
	Sir Charles Wager blockades the Russian ports; Admiral Hosier goes on an expedition to the West Indies, and Sir John Jennings to the coast of Spain	id.	— 31. The Duke of Wharton dies at the convent of Poblet	401
	Nov. 13. Sophia Dorothea of Zell, wife of King George, dies	393	The Duke of Lorraine visits England	405
1727	Jan. 17. Parliament assembles; 20,000 seamen and 26,000 soldiers are voted	390	Atterbury dies in Paris	400
	Palm, the Russian ambassador, presents a memorial to the king; he is ordered to quit the kingdom; the British resident at Vienna is recalled	id.	1732	Jan. Parliament meets	406
	May. The widow of Peter the Great dies	id.	The king strikes the name of Pulteney out of the list of privy councillors	id.
	— 31. Preliminaries of peace are signed between England, France, Holland, and Russia	391	June 1. The session of parliament closes	id.
	The King of Spain accedes to the same	id.	The king appoints Queen Caroline regent, and goes to Hanover	id.
	Ripperda is dragged by force from the house of the English ambassador at Madrid	id.	The Pragmatic Sanction securing the succession of the empire to Maria Theresa is ratified	id.
	June 3. The king sets out for Hanover	392	1733	Feb. Augustus II., king of Poland, dies	409
	— 10. The king is seized with a fit of apoplexy	id.	March 14. Walpole introduces to the House of Commons his scheme for excise duties	407
	— 11. He dies on the road to Osnaburgh	id.	The bill passes the committee; is withdrawn	108, 9
	Accession of King George II.	id.	The Duke of Bolton and Lord Cobham are deprived of their regiments for their opposition to the bill	409
	— 14. News of the king's death is brought to Walpole	395	Stanislaus is elected king of Poland	410
	Sir Spencer Compton is ordered to draw up the speech to the council; is unable; it is done by Walpole	id.	Augustus III. is also elected	id.
	— 15. George II. is proclaimed	396	Stanislaus flies to Dantzic; is besieged by the Russians; Augustus III. is proclaimed	id.
	July 3. Walpole proposes a civil list of 830,000 l. a-year should be settled on the king for life	399	1731	Jan. 17. Parliament meets	id.
	— 9. The same is agreed to, and 100,000 l. a-year is settled on the queen for life	id.	Feb. 14. The Prince of Orange is married to the princess royal at St. James's	409
	— 17. The king prorogues parliament	id.	Mar. 13. A bill is brought into the House of Commons for the repeal of the Septennial Act	410
	The same is dissolved by proclamation	id.	It is debated and thrown out	411, 13
	The Pretender intrigues in various places for the restoration, but without avail	id., 400	April 16. Parliament is dissolved	413
1728	Jan. 23. A new parliament assembles; Arthur Onslow is elected speaker	401	May 10. Don Carlos enters Naples; the Spaniards conquer Sicily; Don Carlos becomes master of the kingdom and of the Two Sicilies	414
			The Duke of Bevis is killed before Philipshourg	id.
			1735	Jan. Parliament meets; an increase of the army and navy is voted, and a subsidy is voted to Denmark	415
			The Prince of Wales marries Augusta, Princess of Saxe Gotha	421
			Bolingbroke goes to the continent	415

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1735	The king goes to Hanover leaving Queen Caroline regent	415	1740	The Empress Maria Theresa succeeds; her title guaranteed by all Europe except Bavaria under the Pragmatic Sanction	440
	The Abbe Strickland is sent out of England by the queen regent	416	Nov. 18.	The king opens parliament	441
	Don Carlos is acknowledged king of Naples and Sicily as an independent kingdom	id.	Dec. 15.	The King of Prussia crosses the frontier into Silesia; Breslau, Namslau, and Ohlau open their gates to him	id.
	Sir John Norris with a fleet is sent to the Tagus	id.		A Jacobite association is entered into at Edinburgh by some noblemen and gentlemen	469
	The king returns from Hanover	417	1741	Feb. 11. Walpole misquotes in the House, and pays a bet of a guinea to Pitt	112
1736	Jan. Parliament meets; passes an act for laying a heavy duty on gin and other spirits	id.		Sandys moves an address for the removal of Walpole; the motion is rejected	id.
	Mar. A bill to repeal the Test Act is thrown out by the Commons, and one for the relief of the Quakers by the Lords	418		Lord Carteret makes a similar motion in the House of Lords, which is also rejected	117
	May 26. Parliament is prorogued	418		March. Anson's store-ship, the "Wager," is wrecked at Cape Horn	172
	The king goes to Hanover	id.		April 8. The king announces to parliament his intention to support the Empress Maria Theresa	418
	A riot takes place in Edinburgh; Captain Porteous and his soldiers fire on the mob and kill several	id.		— 10. Battle of Molwitz	449
	Captain Porteous is tried and convicted of murder	id.		— 13. A subsidy of 300,000 l. is voted for her	id.
	He is respited	id.		— 25. Parliament is prorogued	id.
	Sept. 7. A riotous mob attack the Tolbooth and hang Captain Porteous	419		May 4. The King of Prussia takes Breig	419
1737	Potter, bishop of Oxford, is made archbishop of Canterbury	418		— 7. The king embarks for Hanover	418
	Feb. 1. Parliament meets; the corporation of Edinburgh are fined by act of parliament for the benefit of the widow of Porteous	420		Negotiations are opened with the King of Prussia	450
	By another bill the Scotch clergy are compelled to read a proclamation from the pulpit calling on the people to bring the murderers of Porteous to justice	id.		King George concludes a year's neutrality for Hanover	id.
	— 22 and 25. Motions are lost in both Houses for an address to settle 100,000 l. a-year on the Prince of Wales	425, 6		Carthage is unsuccessfully attacked by the English	452, 3
	July 31. The Princess of Wales is delivered of a daughter	426		Cuba is attacked with no better success	454
	The Prince of Wales and his family are dismissed from St. James's Palace	427		May 4. The King of Prussia takes Prague, Breslau, and gains other victories	451
	Nov. 20. Queen Caroline dies	428, 9		June. Anson arrives at Juan Fernandez	472
	The Princess of Orange comes to England; is ordered by the king to Bath, and thence sent back to Holland	429		Sept 11. The empress summons the Hungarian nobles at Presburg; they declare in her favour	451
1738	Jan. The session of parliament commences	430		The Elector of Bavaria is crowned king of Bohemia, and elected emperor by the title of Charles VII.	id.
	March 13. Captain Robert Jenkyns is ordered to attend the House of Commons; long debates take place on the right of search exercised by the Spaniards; parliament is prorogued	431, 2, 3		The king returns from Hanover	454
1739	Jan. 14. A convention is signed at Madrid	433		Dec. 4. He opens parliament	id.
	Feb. 6. Parliament meets; debates upon the convention of Madrid; the Prince of Wales joins and votes with the opposition in the House of Lords	id.		Walpole consents to the omission of a paragraph relating to the Spanish war in the address	455
	June 14. Parliament is prorogued	436		He is defeated on the appointment of chairman of committees	id.
	Oct. 19. War is proclaimed against Spain	437	1742	Drummond of Bocharly arrives in Edinburgh, and meets "The concert of gentlemen for managing the king's affairs in Scotland," with news of aid from the French in the invasion of England	469
	Nov. 15. Parliament again meets; an act is passed giving all the prize-money taken to the seamen engaged in the capture	438		The king offers the Prince of Wales an additional 50,000 l. a-year, to his income; he refuses so long as Walpole is in power	455
1740	Feb. 21. An address is agreed to in the Commons to the king, that no treaty be entered into with Spain without having an acknowledgment of the right of English vessels to navigate the American seas without search	id.		Jan. 21. Pulteney makes a motion against Walpole; it is lost on a division	456
	More than four millions of supplies are voted	439		— 28. Walpole is defeated on the Chippensham election petition by a majority of one, and finally of sixteen	id.
	March. Admiral Vernon captures Porto Bello	id.		Feb. 1. He tenders his resignation to the king	457
	April. Parliament is prorogued	id.		— 3. The Houses adjourn	id.
	May 31. Frederick William, king of Prussia, dies, and is succeeded by Frederick the Great	440		— 9. Walpole is created Earl of Orford	id.
	Sir John Norris and Sir Chaloner Ogle are put in command of fleets	id.		— 11. He formally resigns all his places	id.
	Anson is sent to the coasts of Chili and Peru	472		Wilmington is made first lord of the Treasury, Sandys chancellor of the exchequer, Carteret secretary of state, and the Marquess of Tweedale secretary for Scotland	458
	The king goes to Hanover	440		— 14. The Emperor Charles VII. is crowned	451
	Oct. 20. The Emperor Charles VI. dies	id.		March 9. Lord Limerick moves in the House of Commons for a secret committee to inquire into Walpole's administration; it is negatived	160
	Anne, Czarina of Russia, dies; is succeeded by the Empress Elizabeth	441		— 23. He renews the motion limited to ten years; it is carried	id.

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1742	Paxton, the solicitor of the Treasury, is committed to Newgate	460	1744	June. The Young Pretender returns from Gravelines to Paris; six thousand Dutch troops are landed at Gravesend	471
	A bill of indemnity for witnesses passes the Commons, but is rejected by the Lords	461		— 15. Anson arrives at Spithead	473
	The secret committee bring up their report	id.		Troops are raised and ships are equipped	472
	A grant of 500,000 l. is made to the Queen of Hungary (the empress); 5,000,000 l. are voted to carry on the war	461		War is declared between England and France	id.
	Battle of Cospolau; Bohemia is surrendered to Prussia	462		July 4. The treasure taken by Anson is carried in procession from Portsmouth to the Tower	473
	Peace is concluded between the empress and the King of Prussia	id.		Sept. The King of Prussia takes Prague	id.
	June. Marshal Belleisle retreats across the Rhine	462		Oct. The Duchess of Marlborough dies	474
	July 15. Parliament is prorogued	461		Nov. 1. Don Carlos drives the Austrians out of the kingdom of Naples	id.
	Pulteney is created Earl of Bath	459		A coalition ministry is formed	475
	The war is carried on in Italy by the Spaniards	462	1745	Parliament votes an additional subsidy to Maria Theresa	476
	Battle off St. Christopher's; the Spanish ships are beaten	id.		The Emperor Charles VII. dies	id.
	The Spaniards attack the colony of Georgia, but are defeated by Oglethorpe	463		March 18. Robert Walpole, Earl of Orford, dies	id.
	Nov. 16. Parliament meets; the address is voted	id.		May 11. Battle of Fontenoy	477, 8
	Anson reaches the bay of Canton	473		Tournay, Ghent, Bruges, Deundermond, and Oudenard surrender to the French; Ostend is also captured	478
	Dec. 10. A motion is made for payment of the Hanoverian troops; it is resisted, but carried in both Houses	463		June 3. Battle of Hoher Friedberg	479
1743	The Cardinal Fleury dies	461		July 2. The Young Pretender embarks at Nantes	480
	Jan. Lord Bolingbroke returns to England	465		— 15 to 25. Sails on board the Doutelle in company with the Elizabeth ; they are engaged by the Lion , an English ship; the Young Pretender lands in Scotland with seven noblemen and gentlemen, "The seven men of Moidart"	480-2
	The act called the "Gin Act" passed in 1731, is repealed	464		Aug. 8. The council of regency offer a reward for the apprehension of Charles Edward	485
	Six millions of supplies are voted	id.		— 16. Four companies of the regular troops are taken by the Highlanders	483, 4
	April 21. Parliament is prorogued	id.		— 19. The Young Pretender raises the royal standard, and publishes his father's proclamations	484
	Wilmington, first lord of the Treasury, dies; is succeeded by Pelham	467		Sir John Cope puts himself at the head of the royal troops near Stirling	id.
	The king and the Duke of Cumberland go to Germany	464		— 20. The rebels begin their march southward	id.
	June 20. Anson captures a Spanish Galleon at Manilla	473		— 25. Cope arrives at Dalnacardloch	486
	— 27. Battle of Dettingen; the Duke of Cumberland is wounded	466		— 26. Arrives at Dalwhinnie	id.
	The treaty of Worms	467		— 29. Having altered his course reaches Inverness	id.
	The king returns to England	id.		— 30. Charles Edward reaches Blair Castle	id.
	Dec. 1. Parliament opens; the debates are strong concerning keeping the Hanoverian troops in pay	468		— 31. King George arrives in London	501
	— 23. The old Pretender signs a proclamation at Albano to be published on his son's landing in England, and a commission appointing him his regent and alter ego	470		Sept. 4. Charles Edward enters Perth	487
1744	Jan. 9. Prince Charles, the young Pretender, leaves Rome	id.		The King of Prussia gains the victory of Soor	479
	— 20. He arrives in Paris	id.		— 11. The Young Pretender reaches Dunblane	488
	He goes to Gravelines	id.		— 12. He crosses the ford of Frew	489
	The quadruple alliance between England, Holland, Austria, and Saxony	476		— 13. The husband of Maria Theresa is elected Emperor (Francis I.)	479
	Feb. 18. The king announces to the Houses the preparation for an invasion by the young Pretender	id.		— 15. Charles Edward quarters his troops at Linlithgow	489
	The Habeas Corpus Act is suspended for two months	469		— 16. He enters Edinburgh; his father is proclaimed	491, 2
	The sons of the Pretender are attainted if they attempt to land; other precautions are taken	id.		— 19. Cope marches from Dunbar	493
	Supplies to the amount of ten millions are voted	id.		Battle of Prestonpans; the royal army is routed	495, 6
	The young Pretender sails from France; is met by the Chamael fleet; retires, and his fleet is dispersed by a hurricane	471		Colonel Gardiner is killed	497
	March. Admirals Matthews and Lestock engage the Spanish fleet in the Mediterranean; Lestock is sent home; Matthews is recalled; both are tried, and Matthews dismissed	472		Dutch, Danish, and English troops, under the Duke of Cumberland, arrive from Flanders	503, 4
	May. Parliament is prorogued	469		— 29. The rebels blockade Edinburgh Castle	504
	The Earl of Barrimore and Colonel Cecil are arrested	id.		Oct. 4. General Guest, governor of the castle, bombards the town	505
	Louis XV. takes the command of the army in Flanders	473		Several Highland gentlemen join the Young Pretender at Edinburgh	id.
				— 9 and 10. He issues various proclamations	507
				— 18. Parliament assembles; the Habeas Corpus Act is suspended; new soldiers are put upon the footing of the old army; many regiments are ordered to be raised	502, 3
				Nov. 1. Charles Edward appoints Lord Strathallan to command in Scotland, and marches south	508
				— 8. Crosses the Eak and occupies Reiddings in Cumberland	509

CHRONOLOGICAL INDEX.

61

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1745	Nov. 10. Summons the city of Carlisle; lays siege to it	509
	— 15. The town and castle surrender	id.
	— 17. Charles Edward enters Carlisle	510
	— 22. He arrives at Penrith	511
	— 27. The rebel army reaches Preston	511
	— 28. They reach Wigan; part enter Manchester	id.
	The royal army lie at Newcastle under Wade, and at Lichfield under the Duke of Cumberland	512
	Dec. 1. The rebel army crosses the Mersey near Stockport	id.
	Enters Macclesfield; Captain Weir is taken	513
	Charles Edward enters Derby	id.
	The old Pretender is proclaimed	514
	A council of war is held	515
	— 6. The rebel army commence their retreat	516
	The royal army advances after them	id.
	The Young Pretender precipitately retreats	517
	— 10. Leaves Manchester	id.
	— 13. Arrives at Lancaster	id.
	Lord John Drummond, with the advanced guard, is set upon by the people between Penrith and Kendal	id.
	— 16. The rebel army lies at Penrith	id.
	— 17. The Duke of Cumberland and General Ogilthorpe advance to Kendal	518
	A skirmish takes place near Clifton Moor	id.
	— 19. The rebels re-enter Carlisle	519
	— 20. Cross the Fok and re-enter Scotland	id.
	— 29. The authorities at Edinburgh determine to resist the rebels	521
	30. The garrison of Carlisle surrenders	519, 20
1746	Jan. 3. The Duke of Cumberland leaving the command to General Hawley, sets out from Carlisle for London	520
	The rebels besiege Stirling Castle	521
	— 16. Charles Edward encamps at Falkirk	522
	— 17. Battle of Falkirk	id., 523, 4
	James MacDonald is accidentally shot	523
	Linlithgow Palace is burnt	id.
	— 19. General Hawley, with the royalist army, reaches Edinburgh	525
	— 28. The siege of Stirling Castle continues	527
	— 30. The Duke of Cumberland arrives at Edinburgh	id.
	— 31. He places himself at the head of the army	528
	Feb. 2. He enters Stirling; Jenny Cameron is sent to Edinburgh Castle	529
	The Pelham administration is displaced and restored	530, 31
	— 26. The Duke of Cumberland arrives at Aberdeen	531
	The rebels besiege and take Fort George	id.
	They take Fort Augustus	532
	They gain various other successes	id.
	March 25. A ship with money for the Pretender is driven on-shore by an English ship on the coast of Sutherland, and taken	533
	April 14. The royal army reaches Nairn	id.
	— 17. Battle of Culloden	535-39
	May 13. The House of Commons grant the Duke of Cumberland 25,000 l. a-year	541
	Flora MacDonald secures the Young Pretender's flight as far as Mugstole	543, 4
	He goes to the Island of Razy	545
	Flora MacDonald is captured and sent to London	id.
	Colonel Townley is hanged on Kennington Common	548
	Executions take place in various places	id.
	The Earl of Derwentwater is beheaded	id., 549
	July 28. The Earls of Cromartie and Kilmarnock, and Lord Balmerino, are tried in Westminster Hall	549

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1746	Cromartie and Kilmarnock plead guilty; Balmerino is condemned	549
	Lord Cromartie is pardoned	550
	Aug. 18. Balmerino and Kilmarnock are beheaded	id., 551
	Sept. 20. The Pretender embarks at Loolanagh	548
	— 29. Reaches Morlaix in Brittany; proceeds to Paris	id.
	Philip V. of Spain dies, and is succeeded by Ferdinand VI.	554
	Nov. 18. Parliament reassembles at the Halsea Corpus Act is further suspended	id.
1747	March 8 to 16. Lord Lovat is tried and condemned	551, 2
	April 9. He is beheaded	553
	Flora MacDonald is released	id.
	The House of Lords bring the printer of the Gentleman's and London Magazines to their bar for breach of privilege in printing the proceedings of Lord Lovat's trial	554
	A new subsidy of 100,000 l. is voted for Maria Theresa	555
	June 17. Parliament is prorogued	id.
	July 2. The allies are beaten at Lauffeld	id.
	Bergen-op-Zoom is taken by the French	id.
	Marshal Belleisle's brother is defeated and killed at Exilles	id.
	Admiral Anson defeats the French fleet off Cape Finisterre; Admiral Hawke off Belleisle captures six ships, and Commodore Fox takes forty French ships richly laden from the West Indies	id.
	The younger son of the old Pretender is made a cardinal	559
	A congress is proposed and agreed upon at Aix la Chapelle	556
	The king returns from Hanover	id.
	Nov. 10. A new parliament assembles; the Commons vote fifteen millions of supplies; Lord Chesterfield recommends schools and villages to civilise the Highlanders	id.
	Dec. 11. The Young Pretender is forcibly expelled from France	560
1748	Feb. 6. Lord Chesterfield resigns his office as Secretary of State	556
	March 11. The congress of Aix la Chapelle commences	557
	May 13. Parliament is prorogued	556
	Oct. The treaty of Aix la Chapelle is concluded	558
1749	A clause is introduced into the Mutiny Bill for subjecting officers on half-pay to martial law, and for enforcing an oath of secrecy upon all members of court-martial	560
	The army is reduced; the four per cent are reduced to three and a half	id., 561
1750	Many bills are passed for the encouragement of trade and internal improvement	561
	April 12. The parliament is prorogued	id.
	The king goes to Hanover appointing Lords Justices	id.
	A British colony is established in Nova Scotia	id.
	A settlement is commenced by the English and Scotch, on the Mosquito coast, in the Gulf of Mexico	id.
	Oct. A commercial treaty with Spain is concluded at Madrid	id.
	The King returns from Hanover	562
1751	Jan. 17. Parliament meets	id.
	Inflammatory papers called "Constitutional queries" are circulated	id.
	— 22. The Lords order them to be burnt by the hangman	id., 563
	Crowle, a lawyer, is reprimanded by the speaker for using disrespectful language concerning the House of Commons	563

A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page	A.D.	BOOK IX.	Page
1751	Feb. 8. Mr. Murray, a member, is sent to Newgate	563	1755	The French ambassador at London is recalled	582
	March 20. The Prince of Wales dies	565		The English ambassador at Paris is recalled	id.
	Prince George is created Prince of Wales	567	July.	Sir Edward Hawke starts with a fleet on a cruise	id.
	April 2. Mr. Murray is ordered to be removed to the custody of a serjeant at arms; he refuses to go	564	Sept.	The king returns from Hanover	583
	— 23. A Habeas Corpus is moved for in the Court of King's Bench; he is remanded	id.	Oct.	Admiral Byng sails with a large fleet	582
	May 8. The Regency Bill passes both Houses	567		Many important operations take place in Canada and other parts of North America	id.
	June 25. Parliament is prorogued; Murray is released	564	Nov. 13.	Parliament meets; Pitt, master of the forces, Legge, chancellor of the exchequer, oppose the ministry and speak for war	583
	Oct. The Prince of Orange dies	568	— 20.	They are both dismissed	id.
	Nov. 20. The case of Mr. Murray is again debated in the House of Commons; a proclamation issues, offering a reward for his apprehension	564, 5	1756	Large votes pass for the army, navy, and supplies; 8000 Hanoverian and Hessian troops are allowed to be brought into England	585
	The printer and publisher of "Mr. Murray's case" is tried; the jury find a verdict for the defendant	565	May.	Parliament is prorogued	id.
	Dec. The Queen of Denmark dies	568	— 18.	Admiral Byng approaches Minorca	586
	In the course of this year the Gregorian calendar is adopted	569	— 19.	An action is fought with the French in which Admiral West is engaged, but Byng is not	id.
1752	Jan. 7. Parliament meets; the treaty with Saxony, made by the king, is debated in both Houses	id. , 570		The French fleet supplies the army besieging Minorca and returns to Toulon	587
	— 28. A bill passes both Houses annexing to the crown the estates forfeited in Scotland by the late rebellion, and making provision out of the rents for establishing colonies and trade, and industry, in the Highlands	571		Admiral Byng returns to Gibraltar without attempting the relief of Fort St. Philip	id.
	March 11. The city of London petition parliament that the privileges of naturalization of foreigners may be limited to the time of their residence in this country; a clause to this effect is introduced into such bills	571, 2	July.	General Blakeney surrenders the fort	id.
	An order is made for printing the Journals of Parliament on the motion of Mr. Pelham	572		Admiral Hawke supersedes Byng, who is placed under arrest and sent to Portsmouth. He is put in custody at Greenwich Hospital	id.
	A bill is passed consolidating the several classes of annuities into five stocks	id.		Calcutta is taken by Sujah-ud-Dowlah; the black hole	599
	— 26. Parliament is prorogued	id.	Oct.	Mr. Fox resigns	587
	Nov. Disputes occur in the establishment of the Princess Dowager of Wales	id. , 573, 4		The Duke of Newcastle and Lord Hardwicke resign	588
	Dec. Lord Waldegrave is appointed governor of the Prince of Wales	575		The Duke of Devonshire is made prime minister	id.
1753	Matters relating to the education of the Prince of Wales are debated in the privy council	id.		Pitt is made secretary of state, and Legge re-appointed chancellor of the exchequer	id.
	A bill for naturalising foreign Jews passes	577		The King of Prussia effects great conquests; France, Sweden, and Russia, declare against him	589
	A new Game Act passes	id.	1757	Lord Clive retakes Calcutta, and gains great victories in the East Indies	589
	A new Marriage Act is passed	578		Admiral Byng is removed to Portsmouth and tried by a court-martial, and condemned to be shot	590
	Parliament votes 20,000 l. to Mr. Harrison for his improvement in chronometers; an act is passed for the purchase of the Harleian MSS. and Montague House	579		Endeavours are made to save him	id. , 591
	June 7. Parliament is prorogued; Dr. Archibald Cameron is executed	id.	Feb. 28.	The Lords of the Admiralty issue their warrant for his execution	591
	Nov. 15. Parliament re-assembles; the Duke of Newcastle moves to repeal the Jews' Naturalisation Bill; a similar motion is made in the Commons; the bill is repealed	580		A bill is introduced to absolve the members of the court-martial from their oath of secrecy	id.
1754	March 6. Mr. Pelham dies suddenly; the Duke of Newcastle is appointed First Lord of the Treasury	id.		The execution is respited for a fortnight	id.
	May 31. Parliament meets	id.		The bill passes the Commons but is thrown out by the Lords	592
	The French make encroachments in Canada; the Indians attack and compel Major Washington to capitulate at a fort on the Ohio	581	March 14.	Admiral Byng is shot	id.
	Nov. 14. Parliament re-assembles	id.		Temple and Pitt are dismissed	593, 4
1755	The king goes to Hanover, leaves the Duke of Cumberland one of the regency	582, 3		Lord Waldegrave is made prime minister	595
	Ministers announce to parliament that a visit is inevitable	581		The Pitt administration is reinstated	596
	A million is voted for the defence of our American possessions; Admiral Boscawen is sent with a fleet to the Gulf of St. Lawrence	id.		Lord Waldegrave is made a knight of the garter	id.
	Captain Howe and Captain Andrews take two French ships of the line	582		Sir Edward Hawke is sent with a fleet to attempt the capture of Rochfort	597
			Sept. 7.	The Duke of Cumberland is defeated; the Convention of Closter-Seven	id.
			— 23.	Captain Howe takes the Isle of Aix	id.
			Oct. 3.	The whole expedition returns	id.
				The Duke of Cumberland returns to England; resigns his commands	599
			Nov. 3.	Battle of Rosback	598
				Various other military operations of the Prussians and French	id.
			Dec. 1.	Parliament meets; a subsidy is voted for the King of Prussia	601
			— 5.	Battle of Jena	598
				Riots take place at various places in England	600
			1758	June 1. A large fleet sails for the French coast	601

