door." If the regent had hesitated to commit himself before, it was little probable that he should assist the Pretender either openly or covertly after these failures. Indeed, both Bolingbroke and Berwick had been for some time convinced that Orleans would not risk a war with England upon any account, or make any sacrifices for their cause. As a part of the plan of operations, the Duke of Ormond had been sent over to the west of England in the end of October to head the hoped-for rising in those parts; and the Pretender quitted Lorraine and proceeded in disguise towards the port of St. Malo. In a letter from Paris, dated the 2nd of November, Bolingbroke tells the Pretender that he is in the greatest concern at not hearing from the Duke of Ormond. "Your resolution," adds the secretary, "not to embark for England till you hear from thence, is a great satisfaction to me: any other measure would have been destruction. As to your proceeding to Scotland, I am really unable to speak for or against it, being perfectly ignorant of the coast and of the navigation. But, if your majesty cannot go to England, I take it the Duke of Ormond will be forced to come back, and he will certainly come back to the place where you wait, and that will be the time of determining finally."* Six days after this, when Lord Stair was making anxious efforts to discover the course the Pretender had taken, and to prevent his embarking, and when news had arrived of the disappointments of the Jacobites in the west of England, and when the Duke of Ormond had returned to St. Malo from the coast of Devonshire with the twenty officers and twenty troopers he had taken with him, and with the mournful intelligence that not a single Jacobite had met him where he had expected to meet thousands up in arms, Bolingbroke again addressed the Pretender, informing him that Stair had complained to the regent of his removing from Bar-le-duc, and had insisted upon having the coast visited. This visitation of the coast was entrusted to Bolingbroke's old friend the Marshal d'Huxelles. "The marshal," adds Bolingbroke, "sent to me immediately; and the orders are so given, that your ships will be overlooked. Should he (Stair) be able to point out your vessel, or to say positively where you are, I doubt the regent would think himself obliged to stop you." And the daring secretary, who, however, had been somewhat chary of his own life, warmly recommended the Pretender to risk his like a hero, and to go to England, notwithstanding Ormond's failure, and there trust to the movements in the north. "I must be humbly of opinion," he says, "that you should pass immediately, although the rising were in no degree so considerable as when you resolved to go you expected it would be. You are on the coast; the people will be in expectation of you; your reputation will increase by such a step." The last argument was a good one, for the French court had hinted that it would be rather absurd to incur risk for a prince who † Bolingbroke says, in one of his letters from Paris to the Pretender—"They fluctuate strangely in all their measures; their inclinations are with us, their fears work for the Whigs."—Stair's Papers. The Duke of Berwick says that the regent distrusted Bolingbroke, that the Irish hated him, that the queen-mother was offended at him, and the Duke of Ormond jealous of him. The picture the duke draws of these cabals is striking. "Lord Bolingbroke was to stay at Paris to attend to the interests of the Pretender, and endeavour to furnish him with everything he might want. This matter was so much the more difficult, as the regent, notwithstanding his good intentions, would not appear in it: he had entrusted it to the care of Le Blanc and Renault. These gentlemen gave Bolingbroke hopes that they would supply him with arms; but it was in vain that he solicited them underhand (for he could not venture to see them); he never got anything but fair promises from them; and, to say the truth, I believe the regent, beginning to have a bad opinion of this enterprise, was not much inclined to perform what he had given reason to expect: besides which, there were cabals among our people, which contributed not a little to the ill success of affairs. Bolingbroke was hated by the Irish, who were continually exclaiming against him. The Duke of Ormond, a weak man, suffered himself to be influenced by the jealousy they endeavoured to inspire him with, as if Bolingbroke did not pay him sufficient respect. The queen and those in whom she placed the greatest confidence at St. Germain were much discontented that he did not consult them continually, and that he did not acquaint them regularly with all he was doing. Even some women at Paris, who would be ministers, and who had found means to insinuate themselves privately into the confidence of the Duke of Orleans, contributed by their importunities to prejudice that prince against Bolingbroke: accordingly, I found, in several conversations I had with him, that he was dissatisfied with Bolingbroke: and, what will appear more extraordinary, the only reason he gave for it was, that he applied to those women to torment him from morning till night. I assured him that he did it only because he did not know how to get at his royal highness by any other means. Upon this, he told me that he must apply to Marshal d'Huxelles, and to no other person, and that then he would listen to him readily. Bolingbroke immediately broke off every connexion with these women; who, being already ill-disposed towards him, and irritated by this change in his conduct, became outrageous against him. The regent told me of it himself, and ordered me at the same time to assure Bolingbroke that he approved of his conduct. In the mean while nothing was done for the Pretender on the part of France, and every thing ended in hopes, which never produced any effect."

seemed loath to risk himself for a crown, and the Pretender had long been taunted with a want of personal courage—probably the worst of all imputations for a person in his circumstances, or for any revolutionist. Bolingbroke was clearly against his going to the Highlands of Scotland, at a season when the navigation was so uncertain, and at a conjuncture when so little progress could be expected in those parts; “and,” said he, “the utmost efforts of Scotland, if England cannot or will not rise, must end in a composition.” The Duke of Berwick, who had just warned Bolingbroke that the regent had sent a detachment to stop *his majesty at Chateau Thierry, where Stair had received information that he was, joined the secretary in recommending and urging an immediate departure; but, differing in this respect with the secretary, the duke thought that it would be better the Pretender should go to Scotland than any part of England. The Pretender, on the other hand, was very anxious that Berwick should go himself to Scotland, and he had sent him a commission, with a formal order to go to the Highlands, and take the command of the army there. “But,” says the half-brother of the Pretender, “as I had caused myself to be naturalised a Frenchman, with the consent of this prince, and was consequently become a subject of his most Christian majesty—as I was moreover an officer of the crown of France, engaged by several oaths not to go out of the kingdom without leave in writing, which, far from being given me upon this occasion, the late king and the regent had expressly forbidden—I did not think myself at liberty, either in honour or conscience, to obey the order I had received.” Berwick, however, embarked one of his sons in the wild enterprise. “The King of Spain,” he says, “sent us a hundred thousand crowns in ingots of gold, which we sent off immediately by my son, the Chevalier Erskine, and Mr. Bulkeley: but everything seemed to conspire to ruin our project; the vessel they were in was shipwrecked on the coast of Scotland, and they had but just time to escape by night in the boat, without being able to carry off the ingots, which they had concealed in the bottom of the vessel.” Three thousand muskets, which had been secreted in a vessel near the mouth of the Seine, were of no use, for they were never sent to Scotland. It appears that, having got to the coast, and made so much stir, the Pretender was ashamed to return to Lorraine without doing something; and that the representations of Bolingbroke and Berwick, and his anxiety to relieve himself from the imputation of cowardice, determined him to embark. He could no longer doubt the affair at Preston and the battle of Sheriffmuir; but the Scottish Jacobites continued to call for his presence, and the Earl of Mar represented that he had grown stronger since his battle with Argyll—that his army was increased to 16,000 fighting men. Therefore, after lying some time concealed at St. Malo, the Chevalier resolved to embark for Scotland; but the design was now scarcely practicable at that point, as an English squadron closely blockaded the port. But Dunkirk was neither blockaded nor suspected, and that port offered a much better passage to Scotland. Leaving St. Malo, where, according to Bolingbroke, he had as many ministers as there were people about him, the Pretender travelled across the country on horseback, and in disguise, to Dunkirk, having previously ordered a ship to be prepared for him there. At Dunkirk, attended by only six gentlemen, who were disguised like himself as French naval officers, he embarked immediately in a small vessel carrying eight guns, and, setting sail on a cloudy day in the middle of December, made for the little port of Peterhead, where he landed on the 22nd of that month. The vessel which bore him was instantly sent back to France with letters to Bolingbroke and others. To his secretary he said briefly—“I am at last, thank God! in my own ancient kingdom, as the bearer will tell you, with all the particulars of my passage, and his own proposals of future service. Send the queen the news I have got, and give a line to the regent en attendant that I send you from the army a letter from our friend, to whom I am going tomorrow. I find things in a prosperous way: I hope all will go well, if friends on your side do their part as I shall have done mine.” From Peterhead he proceeded in disguise through Aberdeen to Fetteresso, the seat of his partisan, the Earl Marshal. Here he was soon joined by Lord Mar, General Hamilton, and some thirty other Jacobites, who scoured across the country from Perth, leaving the army behind them. As a reward for his services, the Chevalier, who was very fond of such exercises of royalty, forthwith created Mar a duke. He lay for some days at Fetteresso, doing nothing but giving and receiving compliments: it was reported that he was ill of an ague; but it appears that the cold fit was occasioned by his dread of Argyll, and his doubts as to the movements of the regular troops of King

* It is quite evident that the regent acted according to circumstances, and that a little good success, as Bolingbroke says, would have inclined him the right way—i. e. to support the Pretender openly and with all his might. It is equally certain that the regent at no time was sincere and earnest in stopping the Chevalier: probably he would not have been sorry to be free of all the expense and trouble which the Pretender cost France. If he had been determined to intercept him he might surely have done so, as nearly two months elapsed between the Pretender's departure out of Lorraine and his sailing for Scotland; during which time the secret of his whereabouts was known to hundreds. Berwick says, “Never voyage longer than this, for two whole months elapsed. . . The Earl of Stair complained to the regent, and required that he should not be suffered to pass through France. The regent answered, that if Stair would inform him where he was, he would send thither, and have him conducted back to Lorraine: but that he was not obliged to be either the spy or the executioner of King George. One day Stair assured the regent that he knew the Pretender was to arrive on such a day at Chalons. Upon this, Contades, major of the French guards, was sent that way in order to try to find him, and conduct him back to Bar-le-Duc: but there was no possibility of meeting with him. At his return Contades made up a fine account to Stair of what he had done, with which Stair seemed to be satisfied, although, in the main, he judged, very correctly, that the regent had no great mind to prevent the passage of the Pretender, and that Contades had not been very desirous of succeeding in his commission.”—Memoirs.

George. At length, on the 30th of December, he began to stir: on the 2nd of January he was at Kinnaird, whence he wrote to Bolingbroke, to tell him among other things how he was obliged to send back to France one of his only two experienced officers, "on account of the disgust the Highlanders had got of him, which was altogether inexplicable." On the 4th he slept at Glamis Castle, the ancient and magnificent seat of the Earl of Strathmore; and on the 6th he made his public entry into Dundee on horseback, with Mar riding on his right hand, the Earl Marshal on his left, and with 300 Jacobite lords and gentlemen behind him. He remained for an hour in the public market-place to allow the people to kiss his hand. On the 8th he arrived at the royal palace of Scone, near Perth, and the head-quarters of his army, and there he formed a council and began to issue manifestos and proclamations. No fewer than six proclamations came out in rapid succession—one for a general thanksgiving for the miraculous providence shown in his safe arrival; one for prayers in all churches; one for making current all foreign coins; one for the meeting of the Convention of the States; one summoning all fencible men from sixteen to sixty to his standard; and another fixing his coronation for the 23rd day of January. It was noted that only two Presbyterian ministers in all Scotland consented to pray for the Pretender; and that only two Episcopal ministers prayed for King George.* In fact the Episcopalians, who had this excuse, that they were in Scotland the persecuted body, hurried to prostrate themselves at the feet of the Pretender. In the humble address of the Episcopal clergy of the diocese of Aberdeen, presented by six reverend doctors, who were formally introduced by the Duke of Mar and the Earl Marshal, it was declared, that his majesty's most faithful and dutiful subjects, the Episcopal clergy, did, from their hearts, render thanks to Almighty God for his majesty's safe and happy arrival in his ancient kingdom of Scotland, where his royal presence was so much longed for, and so necessary to animate his loyal subjects, the noble and generous patriots of Scotland, to go on with that invincible courage and resolution which they had so successfully exerted for the recovery of the rights of their king and country. The Pretender: "trained up from his infancy in the school of the cross"—"the school that had sent forth the most illustrious princes,"—was compared by these reverend addressers to Moses, Joseph, and David; and they declared that his princely virtues were such, that, in the opinion of the best judges, he was worthy to wear a crown even if he had not been born to one; and this made them confident that it would be his majesty's care to make his subjects a happy people, to secure to them their religion, liberties, and property, and to unite them all in true Christianity, according to the gospel of Jesus Christ, and the practice of the primitive Christians. And they wound up their magnificent address with ador-

ing the goodness of God in preserving his majesty amidst the many dangers to which he had been exposed, notwithstanding the hellish contrivances formed against him, for encouraging assassins to murder his sacred person—a practice abhorred by the very heathen;† and with praying that his majesty might be blessed with a long and happy reign, a plentiful royal progeny, and at last with an immortal crown of glory. Yet at this very moment, the Pretender, a bigoted Catholic by education, was refusing a promise of security to the church of Ireland, and the promise he had pledged for the security of the church of England was very ambiguous, and liable to more than one interpretation. In fact he loathed all Protestant churches like his father James, and like his grandfather Charles I. he had adopted as a system the practising of equivocation, half promises, and mental reservations. His prime adviser, Bolingbroke, had told him that his declarations ought to be plain and frank, but he had not been able to correct that bent of mind which was part natural and part the effect of a Jesuitical education. Moreover, apart from spirituals, he was obstinate and self-willed, and yet awkward, bashful, and timid. It was in vain that Mar sent out a circular letter to raise the affections of the people by describing the Pretender as the finest gentleman he ever knew, and the most amiable:‡ people, on a nearer approach, judged for themselves. The best portrait of him was drawn by one of the rebels who saw him at Scone and Perth:—"His person was tall and thin, seeming to be inclined to be lean rather than to fill up as he grows in years. His countenance pale, yet he seems to be sanguine in his constitution, and has something of a vivacity in his eye, that perhaps would have been more visible if he had not been under dejected circumstances and surrounded with discouragements, which, it must be acknowledged, were sufficient to alter the complexion even of his soul as well as of his body. His speech was grave, and not very clearly expressing his thoughts, nor over much to the purpose; but his words were few, and his behaviour seemed always composed. What he was in his diversions we know not: there was no room for such things; it was no time for mirth, neither can I say I ever saw him smile. . . . We found ourselves not at all animated by his presence, and, if he was disappointed in us, we were tenfold more so in him. We saw nothing in him that looked like spirit. He never appeared with cheerfulness and vigour to animate us: our men began to despise him;

* Lord Stair's vigilance and activity had rendered him the subject of all kind of foul accusations among the Jacobites. His personal as well as political enemy, the Duke of Berwick, honourably dispensed these calumnies with a stroke of his pen:—"It has also been said that Stair had employed people to assassinate the Pretender. I owe this justice to truth to declare that, after having thoroughly examined all the reasons alleged in proof of this accusation, I found them frivolous; and, though Stair was a great Whig, and consequently a sworn enemy to the Jacobite party, yet I believe him too much a man of honour ever to have had such a thought. The Duke of Mar, whose interest was very opposite to that of Stair, always spoke of him in that light, and when he spoke well of his enemy he ought to be believed."—Memoirs.

some asked if he could speak. His countenance looked extremely heavy. He cared not to come abroad amongst us soldiers, or to see us handle our arms or do our exercise. Some said the circumstances he found us in dejected him; I am sure the figure he made dejected us.* There was, in fact, a double disappointment—a universal dejection. Instead of the 16,000 men in arms that Mar had talked about, the Pretender found not above 5000 or 6000, and those ill armed, and in no very good humour; and, instead of a well-appointed French army, and that abundance of arms, accoutrements, and money which the Scots had expected with the Stuart, they saw that he had scarcely brought anything more than the clothes upon his back. The government meanwhile had been gaining strength and employing negotiations both at home and abroad; so that several of the great Highland chiefs had listened to, or already concluded bargains advantageous to themselves but fatal to the Jacobite cause. The devotion of the clansmen was rather to their respective chiefs than to the Stuarts: at the bidding of the chief they were equally ready to fight against or for the Pretender; and this too without any sense of shame, even if the chieftain shifted and changed as fast as the wind. Thus Simon Fraser, now Lord Lovat and chief of his clan, who in his mad youth had carried off the clansmen, with bagpipes playing, to join Dundee and fight for the Pretender's father, having made his bargain with that powerful Whig chief the Earl of Sutherland, carried off all his clansmen to make war upon Sir John Mackenzie, who held the important town and position of Inverness for the Pretender, but who was soon compelled to abandon it to Lovat. And as soon as the rest of the Frasers, who had followed a younger branch of the family to Mar's standard, learned that Lovat, the great head, had gone over to the opposite interest, they threw away their white cockades and went in a body to the royal army. Not trusting entirely to the insidious negotiations of Highland chiefs, many of whom had proposed an accommodation with the court before the arrival of the Pretender, the English cabinet adopted various means of making sure of the result. Horace Walpole, the brother of Sir Robert, had been dispatched to the Hague to claim 6000 men from the Dutch, in virtue of an article in the Guarantee Treaty; and 5000 regular troops had been brought over from that country and sent down to Argyll. The parliament had now really set a price upon his head, by offering a reward of 100,000*l.* to any one that should seize the Pretender dead or alive. All half-pay officers had been recalled to active service, and twenty-one regiments were raised, or begun to be raised, in different parts of England. Money, arms, ammunition, and abundant supplies of provisions—all that was wanting on the other side—were put at the disposal of the Duke of Argyll, who, moreover, received still more proofs of the failure of the insurrection from the north of Ireland, and from the western Highlands. Although he had done nothing in or for that ill-used country, the Pretender indulged in a day-dream of a new war in Ireland, and of successes there that would turn the scale in his favour. "There are," he says in a letter to Bolingbroke, "reports of a rising in Ireland: pray God it be true." He thought that the Duke of Ormond, though he could not get into England, might get into Ireland and make a terrible stir there. Dillon, who commanded the Irish brigade in the service of France, might be sent over to Dublin, where he could not fail of being useful. But these plans were of the latest, and the Pretender was obliged to avow that, after all, everything would depend upon the French regent. "Such are our circumstances," said he, "and such as I hope will move the regent, who can alone, but that with ease, sway the balance on our side, and make our game surc. What is absolutely necessary for us, and that without loss of time, is a competent number of arms, with all that belongs to them; our fine Irish regiments, with all their officers and the Duke of Berwick at their head; for whom and to whom I wish he may now be my general, but he shall never be my minister. His presence here would really work miracles, for they say nothing but good of him; and, to please them here, I am forced to say he is coming, for the contrary belief would be of the worst consequence."* Mar, he said, was weary of the command of the army, and wished to be relieved of that burthen.† If the regent, while he sent the Duke of Berwick with the Irish brigade into Scotland, would only help Ormond into England, "that would end the dispute very soon." He had written to Spain to implore the assistance of King Philip, whose ingots of gold had been lost. "The troops he now asked from Spain might be speedily got over; for that was the point—a speedy succour would gain all, and without it all was lost;"—and he trusted that Bolingbroke would neglect nothing in using the most urgent arguments in the pleading of his cause. The Pretender next spoke to his secretary about a private loan to relieve his woeful imppecuniosity. "Could there not," he says, "be ways found to raise money on particular people at Paris? You know how well inclined to me the French are in general." But Bolingbroke found little or no inclination among private Frenchmen to risk their cash; and little or no encouragement from the regent, who was fully assured by this time that the success of the rebellion would be exceedingly doubtful, even though the Stuart were backed by a French army. The Pretender declared that he should not be able to hold his ground beyond the spring of the year; but Argyll did not wait for the melting of the snow; and he found himself obliged to fly even sooner than he had expected. On the 16th of January, with a countenance more dejected than ever, he held a council at Perth, and spoke like a doomed man. "For me," said he, "it will be no new thing to be unfortunate. My whole life, even from my cradle, has been a constant series of misfortunes, and I am prepared, if so it please God, to suffer the threats of my enemies and yours." A number of things were determined upon in a hurry, which ought to have been begun if not finished before. Perth, for example, was to be fortified, and the advance of the Duke of Argyll was to be impeded by burning and destroying all the towns and villages between Perth and Stirling, with the corn, forage, and whatsoever else might be found in the country. A proclamation to this effect was signed by the Pretender, and a scene of horror ensued: Auchterarder, Blackford, and a number of small villages, were burnt to the ground, and the poor inhabitants, women and children, the aged and the infirm—the able-bodied men had been forced from their homes, either into the rebellion or into the royal army—were exposed, houseless, to the extremities of the season, in one of the coldest winters that had been known for many generations. The poor sufferers, deprived of everything else, as well as of their cots or huts, perished in many places of cold and hunger; and mothers with their infants at the breast, were found dead among the snow-heaps.

Argyll had been kept inactive by waiting for the Dutch troops, by the want of artillery, detained by contrary winds at the buoy of the Norc, by the deep fall of snow, and perhaps also by the correspondence he was maintaining with some of the Highland chiefs, as the Marquess of Huntly and Lord Seaforth, who excused themselves from attending the Pretender, and privately assured Argyll that they would join him. The government, it appears, became suspicious of his delays, though they must have been acquainted with the causes of them, and General Cadogan was sent down to quicken the Duke of Argyll. Then a small train of artillery was brought up from Berwick-upon-Tweed, provisions and forage were procured, and put upon light waggons, and Colonel Guest was detached from Stirling with two hundred dragoons to reconnoitre the roads leading to Perth, in order to begin the march of the royal army, who, be it observed, had not been accustomed even under the great Marlborough, and in climates less severe, to make campaigns in winter. The snow was very deep, and there happened a fresh and heavy fall; and, beyond a certain point, there were narrow and deep defiles completely blocked up with snow, and not a roof, not a bit of thatch, not a naked tree to give shelter to the troops. Nevertheless, on the 24th the Duke of Argyll and General Cadogan advanced in person to survey the roads leading to Perth, and to direct the labours of the soldiers and peasants employed in clearing the roads from snow. The rebel Highlanders, advancing from Perth and from a few little garrisons they held on the borders of Fife, skirmished to interrupt these operations, which could only go on under cover of muskets, and which were slow and tedious in themselves. But on the 29th a considerable advance was made, and a detachment of the royalists, with two pieces of cannon, got to the castle of Braco, which was immediately abandoned by the rebels. On the 30th the army advanced and lay all night in the open air on the snow, all but a detachment of 200 dragoons and 400 foot, which had driven the Highlanders out of Tullibardine. On the following morning the main body crossed the river Earn without opposition, and advanced to Tullibardine, which was only eight miles from Perth. That little city and the temporary court there had been a scene of confusion, despondency, and riot, ever since the 24th, when Argyll had been seen upon the move. The Highlanders, who were half famishing, looked with a longing eye towards the well-filled provision wagons and tumbrils of the regular army, and were ready and willing to try another battle, though we are inclined to believe they never would or could have thought of standing a siege in Perth, that being a military service for which they were wholly unfit, and which was opposed to their habits. But the Pretender had no great stomach for fighting at any time; the disparity of force and warlike means was sufficiently alarming; and, though they would not abandon him or give him up to his enemies, many of the chiefs undoubtedly considered that the best thing that could be done for or with the Pretender would be to send him back whence he came—to convey him, unscathed, to some port from which he might escape to France. On the 28th a sort of council of war sat all night without coming to any positive resolution. The Highlanders, or at least some of the clans, insulted the officers as cowards, and made a wild hubbub in the streets of Perth. One of the officers asked them what they would have them do? "Do!" rejoined one of the mountaineers, "what did you call us to arms for? Was it to run away? What did the king come hither for? Was it to see his people butchered by hangmen, and not strike one stroke for their lives?" Thus passed the 29th; and at night another council sat, to differ in opinion and quarrel, and to come to no certain conclusion. But on the morrow the near approach of Argyll and Cadogan made some resolution necessary; and on that day, the anniversary of the execution of Charles I., the Pretender got ready to quit Perth and his ancient kingdom of Scotland, in which he had been just five weeks. And on Tuesday, the last day of January, as Argyll with his main body was advancing from Tullibardine, Perth was evacuated, and the Pretender and the Highlanders defiled across the broad, deep, and rapid river Tay, which was then frozen over with ice strong enough to bear both horse and foot. Having crossed the Tay, Mar and the Pretender proceeded along the Carse of Gowrie to Dundee—the rapid movements of a Highland army leaving them little to apprehend from the slow pursuit of the regular troops, whose horses in many places could scarcely keep their feet. Argyll has been reproached for not following up and annihilating the now disheartened insurgents; but we do not believe that it was in his power to proceed faster than he did; though, at the same time, we may admit, and even respect, the inclination of which he was suspected, to facilitate the escape of the Pretender, with at least his life. Argyll, who received notice of the retreat about four in the afternoon, sent and occupied Perth by Dutch and English troops at ten o'clock on the following morning. His grace with General Cadogan and the dragoons entered in the course of the same day; but the rest of the army, delayed by bad weather and bad roads, did not arrive till night. On the following morning, having secured in Perth a few of the rebel prisoners, "who, being drunk, had stayed behind the rest," Argyll followed along the Carse of Gowrie with six squadrons of dragoons, three battalions, and a detachment of 800 light foot, being still impeded by the state of the roads, as also by the provisions and artillery he thought necessary to take with him. When he reached Dundee—on the 3rd of February—he of course found the Highlanders all gone, the light-footed mountaineers having struck along the road to Montrose, a road buried under the snow and almost impassable to any other kind of troops. Argyll, however, followed and sent Cadogan towards Montrose by another route. On the 5th of February, about the hour of noon, Cadogan, who had got as far as Arbroath, received advice that the Pretender was gone for France the evening before. He had ordered the clans which had remained with him since his flight from Perth to be ready to march with him about eight at night towards Aberdeen, where, he assured them, they would find a considerable force just arrived to join him from the continent. At the hour appointed for their march the Pretender's horses were at the door of the house in which he lodged, a guard of honour was ready to see him mount, and no doubt was entertained by the Highlanders as to his remaining with them and going on to Aberdeen; but in the meantime he had slipped out on foot by a back door, proceeded to Lord Mar's quarters, and thence by a by-way to the water-side, where a boat was in waiting. Mar and the Pretender got into this boat, which carried them to a French ship of about ninety tons, called the Marie Theresa of St. Malo, which lay in the offing with her yards bent. About a quarter of an hour later, two other boats carried on board the Earl of Melfort, the Lord Drummond, Lieutenant-General Sheldon, and ten other gentlemen, and then they spread their sails and put to sea. This cunning and paltry flight was decisive as to some important parts of the Pretender's character; but there are one or two circumstances to be mentioned that do honour to his better feelings. He left behind him a letter addressed to the Duke of Argyll, with a small sum of money—probably nearly all that he had—for the relief of the poor people dwelling between Perth and Stirling, whose houses and villages had been burned by his orders; and, in a letter addressed to General Gordon, who took upon him the remnant of the Highland army, he acquainted his friends that the disappointments he had met with, especially from abroad, obliged him to leave the country; and, after thanking them all for their services, he advised them now to consult their own safety, in the way they should think most advisable. Together with General Gordon, the Earls Marshal and Southesk, the Lord Teignmouth, son to the Duke of Berwick, and many other Jacobite noblemen and gentlemen, were left behind to shift for themselves. Some of these, with a few Irish and foreign officers that had come lately from the continent, hurried away to Peterhead, in order to embark where the Pretender had landed: but they were closely followed by a flying detachment from the army of Argyll, who entered Aberdeen on the 8th. This detachment prevented the embarkation at Peterhead, and followed this portion of the fugitives to Fraserburgh, where the Pretender's physician, whom he had left behind in his hurry, was taken prisoner by Colonel Campbell of Finab. Between that place and Banff a few other prisoners were taken; but the principals all escaped. The main body of the insurgents who remained under General Gordon, struck off from Aberdeen by Castle Gordon, Strath-Spey, and Strath-Don, diminishing in numbers at the opening of every glen or mountain-pass which led to the homes of some of them. Colonel Grant took possession of Castle Gordon, and there halted, Argyll and Cadogan having both agreed not to risk their regular troops among the wild parts of the Highlands, where they were sure of loss, if not of destruction. Gordon drew up at Badenoch with no more than 900 or 1000 men; and this residue of the army soon dispersed, some going into the wilds of Lochaber, some into regions equally inaccessible, and most of them, it is said, with the intention of waiting for the Pretender in the following summer. But about 120 gentlemen on horseback, among whom were the Lord Duffus, Sir George Sinclair, General Eclyn, Colonel Hay, Sir David Threpland, and other noted Jacobites, made for the extreme north of the Highlands. On the coast of Moray they seized ten open boats, and shot their horses through the head to prevent their being of service to the enemy. Embarking in the open boats they made for Capeness, and landed safely at Dunbeth. From that point they rode and sailed to the Orkneys, where a ship of twenty guns belonging to the Pretender was ready to take them on board. Two of the larger boats, containing sixty of these desperate men, reached the Orkneys and the ship in safety; but the rest of the boats were swamped or upset, and forty-seven of these Jacobite gentlemen were drowned.

The Pretender himself had stretched over to Norway, whence he shaped his course for the coast of Holland and Gravelines, at which port he arrived seven days after quitting Aberdeen. His game was up; he had given the most abundant proof that he could not play it—that stakes on his side were thrown away; but Bolingbroke, who waited upon him as soon as he arrived incognito in the neighbourhood of Paris, attempted to revive his spirits, and to prescribe a political line of action. His lordship advised him to get back to his old quarters at Bar-le-duc as soon as possible; as, otherwise, the French regent and the Duke of Lorraine, who had been so much vexed and annoyed by the remonstrances of the English court, would drive him in reality out of France, to seek shelter with the Pope on the other side of the Alps, where he must have great difficulty in corresponding with his partisans in England and Scotland. The Pretender fancied that he could prevail with the Duke of Orleans; but that easeloving regent, who was well watched by Lord Stair, refused even to grant him an audience; and then, after several days had been lost, James assured Bolingbroke that he would follow his advice, and set out for Lorraine the very next morning at an early hour: he begged his lordship would follow him thither as soon as he could, and he pressed him in his arms at parting like a bosom friend. But, three days after this, when Bolingbroke thought he was many a league off, he unexpectedly received a visit from the Duke of Ormond, who handed him two orders written by the Pretender, and stating, sans phrases, that he was dismissed from his post as secretary of state, and must deliver to the Duke of Ormond all the papers in his office! The witty profligate says that this all might have been contained in a moderate-sized letter-case: but the rage which this treatment excited was scarcely to be contained in any space. Bolingbroke, with all his genius, had been duped and insulted by a blockhead and a bevy of women. Instead of taking post for Lorraine, the Pretender had merely gone to an obscure house in the Bois de Boulogne, close to Paris, and had there confabulated and plotted with a set of kept-women and secretaries of foreign embassies, who used the place, and the majority of the persons assembled in it, for two kinds of intrigues; and, after receiving some pourparlers from the minister of Philip king of Spain, and of the heroic madman of the North, Charles XII., and dismissing Bolingbroke, either because when in his cups he had spoken disrespectfully of his temporary master, or because he suspected him of treachery, he set off from the French capital. Bolingbroke says that he had in his hands matter wherewith to damp the triumph of the Duke of Ormond, who was now secretary of state as well as lord-general to the prince without state or army. He says—"I gave the duke the seals and some papers I could readily come at. . . . I took care to convey to him (the Pretender), by a safe hand, several of his letters which it would have been very improper the duke should have seen. I am surprised that he did not reflect on the consequence of my obeying his order literally. It depended on me to have shown his general what an opinion the Chevalier had of his capacity. I scorned the trick, and would not appear piqued, when I was far from being angry." But anger would be too weak a word to express what Bolingbroke felt. He instantly renounced and denounced all connexion with the Jacobites; made overtures to Lord Stair, who was too conscious of his ability to despise him, and told Maria d'Este, the wretched mother of a wretched son, that he wished his arm might rot off if he ever again drew sword or pen for that cause. The Duke of Berwick saw at once the enormous blunder that had been committed in their dismissing the only Englishman the Pretender ever had able to manage his affairs. The duke dwells at some length, and with extraordinary heat, for a person habitually so cool and collected, upon this subject. "Bolingbroke," he says, "was born with splendid talents, which had raised him at a very early age to the highest employments; he exerted great influence over the Tories, and was, in fact, the very soul of that party. Could there, then, be a more lamentable foolishness than to turn off such a man at the very time when he was most wanted, and when it was most desirable to avoid making new enemies? If even he had been to blame, it would have been prudent to have excluded him by some milder means, and such would not have been hard to find; for it need only have been insinuated that the coldness which existed between him and Ormond would not admit of their acting any longer together. . . . But to cast a public stigma upon Bolingbroke, and seek to blacken his character with the world, is an inconceivable proceeding, and one that has lost King James many more friends than people generally believe. I was myself in part a witness how Bolingbroke acted for the king whilst he had the management of his affairs; and I owe him the justice to say that he left undone nothing which he could possibly do: he moved heaven and earth to obtain supplies while the king was in Scotland, but was always put off by the French court; and, though he saw through their pretences, and complained of them, yet there was no other power to which he could apply."* Berwick, as the Pretender had so often done before, speaks contemptuously of the ability of Ormond. He also fully confirms the account already given of the Pretender's duplicity. He says that the Duke of Ormond had always been jealous of Bolingbroke on account of his superior genius, and the apprehension that he would always have more interest than himself; that all the petty politicians and blundering plotters fancied that they should have everything their own way if they could put Ormond at their head; that the Earl of Mar had also his private interest in view;—"he wished to impose upon the public the idea that, if he had been assisted, while in the field, by Bolingbroke as he ought to have been, his insurrection would have succeeded: besides this, Mar wanted to be the sole minister, and to govern everything; for which purpose it was necessary that Bolingbroke should be dismissed. . . . Moreover, Mademoiselle de la Chausseraye, and several other of the women, enraged at Bolingbroke for his not consulting them any more, joined the rest of the assailants."

When he took the road, the Pretender went to Chalons, in Champagne, where he waited for an answer from his always unwilling host, the Duke of Lorraine, touching his former lodgings at Barle-duc. After some delay that little potentate told him, that, on account of the consideration he thought himself obliged to entertain for King George, he must advise him to seek an asylum elsewhere, in Deux-Ponts; assuring him, however, that, if the King of Sweden would not permit him to reside there, he, the Duke, would receive him back in Lorraine at the risk of all the evil consequences that might befall him therefrom. No refusal could be more politely worded; but still it was a refusal; and, instead of going into Lorraine or into the little state of Deux-Ponts, the Pretender, irritated at the duke, made a long stage towards Rome, and settled himself under the wing of the pope in the city of Avignon, which the French had still allowed to remain to the holy see. In that famed old town, where Petrarch met his Laura, the Pretender was rejoined by the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Mar, and other Scotch and English fugitives and outcasts. Little danger was to be apprehended from these staling specimens of mediocrity or imbecility. The arch-minister Bolingbroke gone, the cabinet of the Pretender was little better than a conclave of old women.

But, in the mean time, hundreds, thousands of Englishmen and Scots were paying a severe penalty for their rash doings. In Scotland the number of prisoners was very small, and little work was done by the courts of law; but the clans were let loose upon one another, and the troops of George were put to live at free quarters in the houses and upon the estates of the Jacobites. But, in England, Forster's imbecile conduct and dastardly surrender at Preston had filled the gaols of the North with prisoners of a strange variety of conditions—non-juring Protestants, high-church divines, Popish priests and monks in disguise, fox-hunting Jacobite squires, and Catholic officers and non-commissioned officers who had been turned out of the army on account of their religion: and mixed with these were Highland chiefs and dunnic-wassails, and Jacobite Lowland lairds, who had marched with Forster from Kelso. Upon some of these unfortunate captives military law was executed, and they were tried in bands by a court-martial, and then shot in a heap; while above five hundred prisoners of inferior condition were left inhumanly to starve of hunger and cold in various castles and gaols in the North. Forster and the most conspicuous of the leaders were marched off for London, where they arrived on the 9th of December. When these unfortunate gentlemen had crossed Finchley Common, and reached the brow of Highgate Hill, they were made to halt, and to submit to numerous indignities: their arms were tied behind their backs like cut-throats and cut-purses; their horses were led by foot soldiers, and their ears were stunned by all the drums of the escort beating a triumphal march, and by the shouts, scoffs, and jeers of the multitude. Upon their reaching the city, such as were lords or noblemen were sent to the Tower—the rest were divided among the four common gaols. They were not long suffered to remain there in doubt and uncertainty: the nation, the parliament, which re-assembled on the 9th of January, were eager for an example, and far too anxious, in the spirit of the time, for blood. On the very day of the opening of parliament Mr. Lechmere, after a long and vehement speech, interspersed with allusions to the many direct interferences of providence on the side of the government, impeached James Earl of Derwentwater of high treason. Other members of the Commons, with fewer words but equal heat, impeached Lord Widdrington, the Earls of Nithsdale, Winton, and Carnwath, Viscount Kenmure, and Lord Nairn. Not a single voice was raised in opposition, not an effort made in debate to avert the doom of these incompetent revolutionists, though certainly there was still many a Jacobite in the House. On the 19th of January these noblemen were all brought before the House of Lords, assembled as a court of justice in Westminster Hall, with Earl Cowper, the chancellor, presiding as lord-high steward. They knelt at the bar till the chancellor desired them to rise; and then they all but one confessed their guilt, and threw themselves upon the mercy of King George—a prince neither unmerciful nor cruel, but far indeed from possessing either a tender heart or a lively imagination. Sentence of death, as traitors, was forthwith pronounced upon Widdrington, Nithsdale, Carnwath, Kenmure, and Lord Nairn; and preparations were ordered for the trial of Lord Winton, who had pleaded not guilty. Secretary Stanhope, who was a man of feeling, interposed and saved the life of Lord Nairn, who had been his school-fellow: but the united interest and earnest supplications of the Duchesses of Cleveland and Bolton, of the young Countess of Derwentwater pleading with tears for the husband she tenderly loved, and of many other ladies of rank, failed in moving the rough and sturdy king, who admitted them to an audience, but adhered to his purpose, which was the purpose of the majority of his ministers. Bribes, which had succeeded before in like circumstances, were offered now without effect. Sixty thousand pounds were tendered for the single pardon of Lord Derwentwater, who, up to the time of the mad rising in the north, had been living happily and hospitably in his fine old castle, reflected in the clear waters of one of the most beautiful of English lakes; and for whose present hard fate tears were shed and lamentations raised in every valley and on every hill-side in Cumberland. Some of the best of the Whigs in the Commons, and among them poor Steele, would have saved life without money or bribe; but Robert Walpole, who in after-life was certainly not a cruel minister, was on the present occasion perfectly obdurate: he expressed his horror and disgust at the leniency of these Whigs, whom he called "unworthy members of this great body," since they could, "without blushing, open their mouths in favour of rebels and paricides." To make the descent of the axe the surer, Walpole moved that the House should adjourn till the first of March, intending to proceed to execution in the interval: he carried his point, but it was only by a majority of seven. But in the Upper House a better fight was made on the side of mercy. The Earl of Nottingham, who, in former times, had been Tory enough to put himself in the same situation, stood up and supported the petition of the condemned lords. Nottingham, it will be remembered, was of the present cabinet—the single avowed Tory in it. He carried his motion by the narrow majority of five for an address to the king for a reprieve; but thereby he lost his place, it being instantly resolved by Robert Walpole and the rest of the ministers that he should be dismissed from office, and that his son Lord Finch, and his brother Lord Ailesford, should be sent from court also. Nor were the efforts he had made in the House of Lords of much use, for, when the Commons carried up the address, George, with an immovable face, and with a speech that Walpole had prepared for him, laconically told them "that on this and all other occasions he would do what he thought most consistent with the dignity of the crown and the safety of his people." As, however, other favourable circumstances had arisen for the Earl of Carnwath and Lord Widdrington, and as some respect was due to the opinion and feeling of the House of Lords, those two noblemea were respited. The three remaining victims were left for execution, and, to prevent any further interference, orders were sent to the Tower to have the block ready on the following morning. But during that night the conjugal affection and heroism of Lady Nithsdale robbed the block of a head. She dressed her lord in her own clothes, and he escaped by night, and in that disguise, out of the Tower. There thus remained only two victims—the English Lord Derwentwater and the Scottish Lord Kenmure; and they, at an early hour the next morning—the 24th of February—were brought to the scaffold on Tower-hill. The English lord was the first that suffered. He was deadly pale, but his voice was firm, and on the whole he behaved like a man of courage and conscience. He declared that he died a Roman Catholic; that he deeply repented his plea of guilty at his trial; and that he knew and acknowledged no king but James III., his rightful and lawful sovereign, "whom he had an inclination to serve from his infancy." He further insisted that he had intended wrong to no man, that he harboured malice against no man, not even against those of the present government who were instrumental in his death; "that he had intended to serve his country as well as his legitimate king, and to contribute to the restoration of the ancient and fundamental constitution of these kingdoms." At one blow the executioner severed the neck of James Ratcliff, third and last Earl of Derwentwater, a gallant, courteous young man, perhaps the most interesting victim of this attempted revolution. The Scottish Lord Kenmure died an episcopalian. He was attended on the scaffold by his two sons, and by two clergymen of the established church. He, however, acted like Derwentwater in repenting of his plea of guilty; and in praying for the Pretender he showed equal courage and endured more suffering, for the executioner was obliged to strike twice.

Lord Winton, who had pleaded not guilty, embarrassed his prosecutors, for, though he seemed at times crazy or half idiotic, he managed his business with considerable craft and skill, and on his trial struck one of the first of Whigs and ministers with a sharp repartee. He was not put upon his trial till the 15th of March, having gained time by petitions and other devices. There was most abundant evidence to show that he had been out for and with the Pretender, voluntarily and without compulsion from the rebels; but he told their lordships he had plenty of good witnesses in Scotland to disprove this, if their lordships would only take into consideration that the season was very unfavourable to travelling, and would allow them time to come up. Cowper, the lord high steward, overruled these objections rather harshly. "I hope," said Winton, "you will do me justice, and not make use of Cowper law, as we use to say in our country—hang a man first and judge him after."* He entreated to have counsel allowed him; but this was refused, and thereupon he refused to say anything. He was found guilty of high treason, and sent back to the Tower; but it appears that there was no real intention to proceed to execution, and, after lying some time in that state prison, he effected his escape.

In the beginning of April a commission for trying the rebels of inferior rank met in the Court of Common Pleas. Forster, Brigadier Mackintosh, and twenty of their confederates were found guilty on indictments for high treason. Forster and Mackintosh were both fortunate enough to break their prison and escape, and seven others followed their example, and got safe to the continent. But four were executed in London, and twenty-two in Lancashire, where above a thousand submitted to the king's mercy, and petitioned to be transported to the colonies in America. The amount of punishment and of blood seemed in those days unaccountably and imprudently small. As the English Catholics, driven by persecution, and intolerance, and insult, into disaffection, had in some places shown so warm a zeal for the Pretender, it was resolved to increase those very evils which had been the cause of their disaffection. On the 17th of April a bill "to strengthen the Protestant interest in Great Britain, by enforcing the laws now in being against Papists," was finally passed without opposition. By one of the clauses of this bill all such persons as, being Papists, enlisted in his majesty's service, were to meet with effectual and exemplary punishment. So violent was this Protestant feeling even in some of the most enlightened and most liberal of the Whigs, that the Lord Chancellor Cowper, in passing sentence on the Catholic peers, uncharitably and indecently abused their religion, and advised them to choose better spiritual guides to attend them on the scaffold.

The Whigs in the last general election had secured a most triumphant majority; but extreme changes in opinion had of late years been both frequent and sudden; and it was seriously apprehended by the new king and his ministers, that circumstances had been and were at work among the people, which would render another general election very uncertain in its issue—perhaps return a strong Tory majority. With the first George the word Tory was, and could be, little better than a synonym for Jacobite or traitor: it was scarcely possible for him to be impartial, and to look coolly on the struggle of the two parties for power and pre-eminence. In his eyes, and in the opinion of a vast portion of the nation, it was not a mere party contest, a dispute about general principles, but a life and death conflict for dynasties and entire systems. But for the Whigs George would never have got to England; and, notwithstanding the Hanoverian Tories, whose number had been reduced since his accession by the disappointment of their hopes in obtaining high places and rewards, he firmly believed that, but for the Whigs, the Jacobites, Tories, and high-church-men would send him back to Germany in the course of a single session. It therefore became the great object of his majesty and the present Whig cabinet to keep by all means in their power the Jacobites and Tories out of parliament; and to effect this, they resorted to the very questionable measure of passing an act not only extending the limit of the duration of future parliaments from three to seven years, but even so far disregarding the act of 1694, under which the members of the existing House of Commons had been returned, as to give to the present parliament also the benefit of the extended term. If the act of 1694 were to continue law, the present Whig parliament must rise in little more than a year, when the nation was likely to be threatened with invasion from abroad, insurrections at home, plots, intrigues, and manœuvres of all kinds; but if, on the contrary, four years could be added to its existence, there was a probability that the political atmosphere might clear up in the interval—the Whigs would have time to complete their work, and the new king to become somewhat better acquainted with his subjects, among whom at present he was moving and acting like a strange man in a strange country. Ministers resolved that the Septennial Bill should originate in the House of Lords, where neither a failure nor the unpopularity of the measure could do any direct mischief; and on the 10th of April the Duke of Devonshire, lord steward of the household, and son of the nobleman who had been one of the principal promoters of the Triennial Act, brought in the new bill for repealing that act, which, according to the preamble, had been found "very grievous and burdensome, by occasioning much greater and more continued expenses in order to elections of members to serve in parliament, and more violent and lasting heats and animosities among the subjects of this realm, than were ever known before the said clause was enacted." The preamble also assigned, as a special reason for the most objectionable part of the new measure, that the Triennial Act, if allowed to continue, might, "at this juncture, when a restless and popish faction are designing and endeavouring to renew the rebellion within this kingdom and an invasion from abroad, be destructive to the peace and security of the government." The Duke of Devonshire, the proposer, was supported by the Duke of Argyll, Lords Dorset, Carteret, Cowper, and other peers attached to the ministry; and the measure was opposed by the Duke of Buckingham, Lords Peterborough, Nottingham, Anglesea, and all the Tories. On a division the commitment was carried by 96 votes to 61.* When the bill had finally passed the lords it was sent down to the Commons by the hands of two of the judges. Before the debate on the second reading, petitions against septennial parliaments were presented from the boroughs of Marlborough, Midhurst, Abingdon, Newcastle-under-Lync, Horsham, Hastings, Westbury, Cardiff, Peterfield, and the corporation of Cambridge; but, though the boroughs had found frequent elections a very profitable trade, these were all of them that petitioned the House. Robert Walpole was at the moment lying so dangerously ill that his life was despaired of; but his colleagues in office, secretary Stanhope, Craggs, Lord Coningsby, Jekyll, and others, exerted themselves to the utmost; and the Whigs generally, whether in office or out, did the same. Steele spoke with great vivacity. "Ever since the triennial parliament has been enacted," said he,

"the nation has been in a series of quarrels and contentions; the first year of a triennial parliament has been spent in vindictive decisions and animosities about the late elections; the second session has entered upon business, but rather with a spirit of contradiction to what the prevailing set of men in former parliaments have brought to pass, than with a disinterested zeal for the common good; the third session has languished in the pursuit of what little was intended to be done in the second session; and the approach of an ensuing election has terrified the members into a servile management, according as their respective principals were disposed towards the questions before them in the House. Thus the state of England has been like that of a vessel in distress at sea; the piloting mariners have been wholly employed in keeping the ship from sinking; the art of navigation was useless, and they never pretended to make sail." On the other hand, Sir Thomas Hanmer, late speaker, Lord Guernsey, Mr. Lechmere, Mr. Bromley, and others, combated long and loudly for triennial parliaments. They represented that short and frequent parliaments had been the rule of the English constitution; that, whenever parliaments had been prolonged overmuch, consequences had ensued most dangerous to the liberties and interests of the nation, which had ever recognised the source of the evil, and consistently pursued their object, till, in the time of William III., the Triennial Act was passed. "Long parliaments," said Shippen, a rising Tory, "will naturally grow either formidable or contemptible." To the argument of the Whigs—that the Triennial Act had, in fact, made a triennial king, a triennial ministry, and a triennial alliance—the Tories replied that, if they meant the king was rendered precarious and unsafe by the Triennial Act, it was false; if the ministry, it was neither the duty nor the object of the House of Commons to perpetuate an administration; and that, in saying that frequent parliaments would discourage foreign powers from entering into treaties and alliances with us, they offered an insult to the nation, as they seemed thereby to imply that we ought to give up our constitution in order to gratify our allies. Still further, on this latter point the Tories insisted that any change in the Triennial Act would have a worse effect upon our foreign relations than ever the act itself had had; and that the Septennial Bill would discourage or drive away our allies more than anything else, as it would prove to them that the king was so insecure on his throne that he feared his people, and could not trust them with the choice of members for a new parliament. When the House went into committee on the Septennial Bill, Lechmere proposed a clause to incapacitate all persons that held penans during pleasure from sitting in either House of Parliament; but the proposition was considered by the Whigs as a mere stratagem for delaying or defeating the whole bill; and it was negatived by the exertions of Secretary Stanhope and Craggs; who, however, instantly moved for leave to bring in a separate bill for the better security of the independence of parliaments. The Septennial Bill was read a third time on the 26th of April, when the Tory minority could muster no more than 121 votes; and, with the applauses of some, and the curses of others, it became the law of the land. The great Somers, whose complicated disorders had ended in a paralysis which affected both mind and body, died on the very day the bill was passed. The equally conspicuous Whig, Halifax, had died some months before him. It is said that Somers, on his death-bed, expressed his hearty approbation of the Septennial Act; but those who love shorter parliaments doubt whether he was in a state competent to give an opinion. Perhaps a better objection is, that the story rests upon hearsay.* On the 8th of June Stanhope and Craggs's separate bill, disabling any person from being chosen a member of the House of Commons, or sitting or voting in the same, that held any pension during pleasure, or for any number of years, from the crown, was passed; and on the 26th of June the parliament was prorogued after a speech from the throne, in which George declared that he felt great satisfaction at the prospect of a settled government, to be supported by a parliament which had shown such zeal for their country and for the Protestant interest of Europe.

* Thirty peers entered a protest against the bill, and among them were the Dukes of Somerset and Shrewsbury, who had both quarrelled with the Whig ministers and the new king. Shrewsbury, who had played the most important of all the parts in the last scene of Queen Anne's reign, had resigned his office of lord chamberlain in disgust, and had recommenced the correspondence with the Jacobites and the agents for the Pretender in the preceding autumn shortly before Mar threw off the mask.

And, as his majesty now considered himself in a state of security, and as he had been relieved by a subsequent statute from the embarrassing clause in the Act of Settlement restraining him from leaving the kingdom, he intimated that he was going to revisit his dominions in Germany, the state of affairs on the continent demanding serious attention. And, in fact, the elements of strife and hostility seemed to be combining in a very alarming manner against this first prince of the House of Hanover, who, beyond Holland and the States-General, had scarcely a single ally upon whom he could depend; for, even his own son-in-law, the King of Prussia, a capricious, wrongheaded prince, was frequently tempted to quarrel with him, and even to proceed to the extremity of joining the confederacy against him. The disputes carried on first between Hanover and Berlin, and then between London and Berlin, would fill many pages of violent and at times exceedingly indecorous language. The Emperor Charles, who was vested with the fanciful function of preserving harmony throughout the Germanic confederacy, was upon several grounds exceedingly jealous of George I., whom he personally disliked; and he had also a strong antipathy to the Dutch—the Hanoverian's best allies—on account of their conduct at the peace of Utrecht, and in the barrier treaty. The emperor, however, was not in a condition to provoke open hostilities with England and Holland; and, though he declined any direct engagement for compelling the Pretender to remove to Rome, and remain there quiet upon an English pension allowed by the occupant, or, as he considered him, the usurper, of his throne, he consented to a defensive alliance with England in case of aggression from France or any other power, with a mutual guarantee of territory. This alliance was concluded a month before the English king prorogued his parliament; but still there remained the difficult business of the Pretender's removal beyond the Alps, and many other serious questions which would be best settled on the continent. Lord Stair, after the miserable failure of the expedition into Scotland, had acquired a great influence over the French regent, who was himself surrounded by many difficulties. According to the arrangement of the peace of Utrecht, the Duke of Orleans, by the death of the boy Louis XV., would be promoted from his condition of regent to that of sole and absolute sovereign of France. Philip V. of Spain, indeed, stood nearer to the French throne; but in accepting the Spanish he had made that solemn act of renunciation about which so much has been said. It was, however, well known to Orleans that, in case of this sickly boy's death, Philip would get absolved from his oaths, set the act of renunciation and the treaty of Utrecht at defiance, and claim the French kingdom. And, indeed, as if to facilitate his seizure of the throne, Philip had endeavoured, and was at the moment endeavouring to deprive the Duke of Orleans even of the secondary and temporary honours and advantages of the regency. Orleans doubtless felt the value of the friendship of King George, but neither party had or could have much confidence in the other: George felt that the regent would use him for his own purposes, and then, if beneficial to his own interests, turn against him; nor was Orleans a whit surer of George. Lord Stair, however, made smooth many difficulties and doubts, and established such a degree of confidence between the two princes, that they agreed to proceed to a treaty. As a national object, which had been proposed before, in the latter days of Louis XIV., Orleans was anxious to obtain the erasure or modification of that clause in the treaty of Utrecht which had bound France to demolish Dunkirk and fill up its port. That port, indeed, had been partially destroyed; but, to get an equivalent, the French had begun to dig a new basin and a new canal at Mardyke, upon the same coast, and at a very short distance from Dunkirk. If George would consent to this making of a new Dunkirk—a scheme which had been vehemently denounced even under Queen Anne—he (the regent) would bind himself to other compliances. He represented, as the French diplomatists had done before, that Mardyke was not Dunkirk, nor

* The anecdote, and the dying speech of Somers, are said to have been communicated by the first Lord Sydney and Mr. Charles Townshend, who said they had it from their father, Lord Townshend.—Chloe's Walpole. The anecdote imports that Lord Townshend visited Somers as he was dying, and that Somers, after embracing him warmly, said, "I have just heard of the work in which you are engaged, and congratulate you upon it. I never approved of the Triennial Bill, and always considered it in effect the reverse of what it was intended. You have my hearty approbation in this business; and I think it will be the greatest support possible to the liberty of the country."

Dunkirk Mardyke; that there was nothing in the treaty of Utrecht to prevent the French making a new port wherever they pleased; and that treaties ought to be taken literally—for what they expressed, and for no more. But George and his ministers, who knew and feared the strong feeling of the English people on the question, held that the spirit and intention of the treaty ought to be decisive—that it was the intention, as it was the obvious interest of England, that her coast should be embraced in that direction neither by Dunkirk nor by any other such place: and here, perhaps, the negotiations would have come to a stand-still if it had not been for the increasing difficulties of Orleans, and his conviction that, after all, it was better to keep the regency than to get permission to make a new port. Accordingly he removed the negotiations from the Hague, took the management out of the hands of Chateaufort, and placed it in those of his prime adviser, the Abbé Dubois, who was equally his minister of state and the minister of his pleasures and debaucheries. The abbé, properly instructed, went into Holland, and found himself at the Hague,—ostensibly only to buy pictures, and books, and porcelain,—just as King George was to pass through that town on his way to Hanover. There it was easy for the abbé to talk, as if merely for the sake of conversation, with the English ministers and courtiers who were following their new sovereign to his own dominions; as also to discover that Secretary Stanhope was thinking very seriously of a definitive treaty with France, separate from, and independent of, the general arrangements of Utrecht. Upon receiving this information, the Duke of Orleans instructed Dubois to continue his travels, even unto Hanover, where he was to appear in a private capacity, but, at the same time, with ample authority to treat. Secretary Stanhope received the abbé, who arrived at Hanover on the 19th of August, in a friendly manner, and gave him a lodging in his own house or apartments. Dubois, following the general practice of diplomatists and horsedealers, who always ask for more than they expect and are ready to take, began by asking Stanhope for Mardyke; but the English secretary told him at once that that point would never be yielded—that England would never consent to the continuance of the works there. But, on the other matter or matters which the abbé's pupil and employer, Orleans, had far more at heart, Stanhope was as ready, as courteous, and complying as could be desired. England, he said, would not only support the duke in his regency, but would also guarantee to him his succession to the throne, in case the young Louis should die. "As to the succession to the throne of France," wrote Stanhope to Lord Townshend five days after the abbé's arrival at Hanover, "I offered to draw up an article with him, expressing his majesty's guarantee of the same to the Duke of Orleans, in as strong terms as he could suggest; but, when we came close to the point, I found that, notwithstanding this guarantee of the succession be the only true and real motive which induces the regent to seek his majesty's friendship, yet the abbé was instructed rather to have it brought in as an accessory to the treaty, than to have an article so framed as to make it evident that that was his only drift and intent. He insisted, therefore, very strongly, for three days, that his majesty should in this treaty guarantee the treaty of Utrecht, the sixth article of which treaty contains everything which relates to the succession of the crown of France." This, however, Stanhope positively refused; and then the abbé "talked of going away immediately"—"which threat," adds Stanhope, "I bore very patiently." The English secretary was not deceived; the abbé soon returned in a much less exacting humour, and agreed for the regent that he should rest satisfied with the insertion of an article guaranteeing the 4th, 5th, and 6th articles of the treaty of Utrecht between France and England, and the 31st between France and Holland—"the two former of which relate only to the succession of England, and the two latter contain everything which concerns the succession of France and the renunciations upon which it was founded."* King George approved of an article which Stanhope drew up to this effect, and, after three days' further wrangling, preliminaries were agreed upon by Stanhope and Dubois. The abbé not only said nothing in favour of the Pretender, but actually suggested, himself, several methods for driving him from Avignon beyond the Alps. When the preliminaries were signed by Stanhope and Dubois, they were forwarded to London for approval, and to the Hague for a further accession to the treaty, it being the intention of George all along to include his best allies, the Dutch. Lord Townshend and the rest of the cabinet fully approved of these preliminaries, but expressed some doubt whether the regent would really demolish Mardyke in the manner laid down. M. d'Iberville, whom the Duke of Orleans had sent over especially, indeed tried hard to preserve the canal and sluices at Mardyke in a condition capable of receiving men-of-war and privateers; but he receded from his point as the Abbé Dubois had done, and consented to an arrangement which, in the opinion of the most skilful of our sea officers and engineers, would effectually exclude ships of war and privateers, and leave Mardyke a simple and unprotected fishing port. The English ministers imputed this readiness of the regent "partly to the perplexed state of his own affairs, and partly to his having a better opinion of his majesty's affairs than heretofore. . . . But (they added), be the cause what it will, they think they have the justest cause to felicitate his majesty on the conclusion of this treaty with France."

Matters were in this state by the month of September (1716), when the treaty itself was drawn up and prepared for ratification. But at this point George's anxiety as Elector of Hanover to extend his dominions on the continent, and the desperate spirit of Charles XII. of Sweden, cast a damp on the negotiations, and for some months greatly embarrassed George and his English and Hanoverian advisers. At the peace of Westphalia the rich districts of Bremen and Verden, which had formerly been bishoprics and separate states, were secularised and ceded to Sweden, which continued to possess them in quiet till Charles XII. carried his victorious arms so far, as to be conquered by Russian serfs at Pultava. Then, Danes, Norwegians, Prussians, Saxons, and all the nations that had crouched at his feet rose up for revenge; and while he was detained a captive at Bender, in Turkey, whither he had fled, they commenced helping themselves to his territories. His Danish majesty had seized upon Verden and Bremen, and conquered Sleswick and Holstein. But in November, 1714, Charles XII. suddenly arrived in Sweden; and then the enemies he had so thoroughly beaten and humiliated began to tremble anew. Frederick of Denmark, in order to secure part of the prey he had made, offered to relinquish another part to George; and in the month of July of the preceding year (1715) George had concluded a treaty, not as king of England, but as Elector of Hanover; and, upon condition of keeping Bremen and Verden for himself, he had engaged to join the coalition against Sweden, and to pay his Danish majesty a sum equal to about 150,000*l.* sterling. Instantly some of the ill effects of having for king of England a prince that was sovereign of another country were made manifest: a British squadron under Sir John Norris was sent in the autumn of that year (1715) to the Baltic, upon a pretext that it was necessary to protect the British trade and shipping in that sea, where Danes, Swedes, and Russians were carrying on a maritime war and committing depredations: but the real object was to overawe the Swedes and to compel Charles to submit to the demands of the coalition, and agree to cede certain territories for a stipulated sum—the prominent condition being, of course, that George, as Elector of Hanover, should be allowed to retain both Bremen and Verden. Nearly at the same time that Sir John Norris appeared in the Baltic with the ships of England, six thousand Hanoverians marched into Pomerania, and there joined the Danes and Prussians, who reduced the islands of Rugen and Uledon, and attacked Stralsund, into which place Charles XII. had thrown himself, but from which he was now obliged to retire. The heroic madman was furious at the conduct of George and of the English cabinet: he taunted them as cowards for thus falling upon one already beset by many enemies; and, adopting at once, with his constitutional daring, a bold and immense scheme, he put himself in communication with the Jacobites of England and Scotland, and engaged to back the Pretender in a new war in Great Britain with 12,000 veteran Swedes. At this very moment Charles's rival, Peter the Great, who on many points was as mad as himself, stretched forth his rude arm to grasp a part of Denmark and a portion of the Germanic empire, betraying too clearly and too early that Russia was aiming at nothing less than the entire dominion of the Baltic. Unexpectedly an army of Muscovites marched into Mecklenburg, where great dissensions prevailed between the reigning duke and his subjects. Peter had given his niece in marriage to this little potentate of Mecklenburg; and could challenge, if necessary, a sort of family right to interfere. The King of Denmark took the alarm, and remonstrated: the semi-barbarous czar told him to take heed, or he would quarter his Muscovites in Denmark. Frederick poured out his sense of these wrongs and insults to his close ally, King George, who was himself deeply interested as a German prince, and who, moreover, bore an inveterate hatred to Peter.* George, in the heat of his rage, sent his favourite Bernsdorf to Stanhope with a project "to crush the czar immediately; to secure his ships, and even to seize his person, to be kept till his troops should evacuate Germany."† Stanhope, as an English minister, was startled at this daring proposal, in which the laws of nations were completely overlooked: he went directly to the king his master, and found him wedded to the scheme, and most anxious that orders for carrying it into immediate execution should be sent to Sir John Norris and the English fleet in the Baltic. Stanhope, however, though fond of daring enterprises, would not take upon himself to do more than instruct Norris to join his remonstrances with those of his Danish majesty. But it appears that, if Stanhope could have obtained the sanction of Townshend and the ministers at home, he would not have been disinclined to a sudden war with Russia. "I shall check my own nature, which was ever inclined to bold strokes, till I can hear from you," he wrote to Townshend towards the end of September; "but you will easily imagine how I shall daily be pressed to send orders to Sir John Norris. . . . We may easily master the czar if we go briskly to work, and if this be thought a right measure. But how far Sweden may be thereby enabled to disturb us in Britain, you must judge. If the czar be let alone, he will not only be master of Denmark, but, with the body of troops which he has still behind on the frontiers of Poland, he may take quarters where he pleases in Germany." Stanhope added, that he and the king also were now exceedingly anxious to have the treaty with France ratified; that the Abbé Dubois continued to talk well and promise fairly; and that it was clear, as matters now stood, not a moment ought to be lost in finishing that treaty. Lord Townshend, it appears, disapproved entirely of a war against the czar—of any new war in the North—and George's son the Prince of Wales, who invariably differed from his father, professed to be of the same opinion as his lordship. In a private and confidential letter to Secretary Stanhope, Townshend declared that such a northern war might be their ruin; and that an immediate peace ought to be made with Sweden, even at some cost or sacrifice. In a public dispatch Townshend represented that the contemplated rupture with the czar would be followed by very evil consequences; that the ships and British merchants in Russia would be seized upon at once, and that a stop would be put to the supplies of naval stores which England drew from that country. George had required that Norris and his squadron should be left to winter in the Baltic, as neither the czar nor his rival Charles followed the southern routine of going into winter quarters, and suspending hostilities when the weather grew bad; but Townshend strongly opposed this, as being unsafe at a moment when England was threatened with a new rising of the Jacobites, and with an invasion from Sweden. In this public dispatch Townshend speaks not merely for himself and for the cabinet over which he presided, but also for his royal highness the Prince of Wales, whose opinions he makes very prominent, as if to shelter himself under his name against the cholera of the king his father. Townshend was esteemed a frank and honest minister; but he was so only comparatively; and the very best statesmen had not as yet renounced the ancient practice of shuffling and double-dealing. The following proposal and the manner in which it is put in the minister's dispatch, as if solely proceeding from the heir to the crown, is deserving of particular notice:—"His royal highness is of opinion that his majesty, if he thinks the King of Denmark able to go through with the project himself, may insinuate privately, and under the greatest secrecy, that he will not only acquiesce in his Danish majesty's making this attempt, (i. e. to seize the person of the czar, &c.), but that he will also support and assist him in the sequel of the affair when once this blow is given." King George was greatly dissatisfied with these half proposals, and this evident backwardness on the part of his English cabinet; and Lord Townshend added to his ill-humour by the freedom of his language in remonstrating with Robethon and the Hanoverian ministers, and by his continuing to insist on the return of the English fleet. Townshend's private secretary Poyntz said, in a dispatch to Stanhope,—"My lord commands me to acquaint you, that it makes him lose all patience to see what ridiculous expedients they propose to his majesty for extricating themselves out of their present difficulties, as if the leaving you eight men-of-war to be frozen up for six months would signify five grains towards giving a new turn to the affairs of the North." Secretary Stanhope, however, seems to have been still inclined to bold strokes, and to have been moved and alarmed by the position of the czar, and the already encroaching and grasping spirit of the cabinet of St. Petersburg. Like the Prince of Wales, the secretary was convinced that Peter intended to make himself master of all the coast of the Baltic at least. "I believe," said this ardent and accomplished man, "it may not be impossible to put this northern business in such a light, as may induce the British parliament not to look on it with indifference. If I mistake not, Cromwell, who understood very well the interest of England with respect to foreign powers, fitted out more than one fleet to the Baltic, with no other view than to secure that, in the treaties of peace to be made betwixt those Northern potentates, a freedom of trade to the Baltic should be preserved to all nations. He frequently offered considerable sums of money to the King of Sweden for Bremen. [One of the places for which George had bargained with his Danish majesty, and which he now possessed not as King of England but as Elector of Hanover.] It is now certain, that if the czar be let alone three years, he will be absolute master of these seas."

* There was no love lost between the two royal brothers: "the czar hated King George mortally." "This hatred," says St. Simon, "lasted all their lives, and in the greatest bitterness."

During the height of these alarms Stanhope and his master were equally impatient to finish their affair with the Abbé Dubois, and to remove some obstacles which the French treaty had encountered on the part of the States-General. The Muscovites, however, were not then quite so powerful as they seemed to be; and Peter, who was beset by the diplomacy of nearly all Europe, and remonstrated with, if not threatened, by the English admiral, withdrew the greater part of his troops, and for the present gave up his alarming projects upon Mecklenburg, and Northern Germany. After this the French treaty languished again; and in the discussion and management of it Stanhope and Townshend disagreed and quarrelled, and thus gave origin to the noted schism in the great Whig administration. The king, who considered himself insulted by Townshend, took part with Stanhope: the States General complained of both ministers, as though they had been indifferent to their interests and careless whether Holland were included or not in the treaty with the French regent. There also arose another quarrel between the king and Robert Walpole, the paymaster of the army, about some German troops which Walpole refused either to pay or to retain in the service of England.* Walpole stood by Townshend, who, besides displeasing the king, had made an enemy for life of one of the German mistresses, Mademoiselle de Schulemberg, who was soon after created Duchess of Munster in Ireland, and Baroness Glastonbury, Countess of Feversham, and Duchess of Kendal in the English peerage. He had also provoked her colleague Bothmar, who, according to the minister's own declaration, "had every day some infamous project or other on foot to get money." There is not the least doubt of the rapacity of the Duchess of Kendal and the Baron Botmar, who continued to reside in England, and to act for or in concert with the ill-favoured mistress. The duchess was ready to make money in any way; and, as perages had been sold by mistresses before, and had been obtained by other means equally or more disgraceful, she was encouraged to offer for "a consideration," a peerage to Sir Richard Childc, a wealthy trader and a Tory member of the House of Commons—the political creed being of little consequence in her eyes: but here also she was opposed by Lord Townshend. It thus became every day more and more clear that Townshend must fall. It also happened unfortunately for that minister that he had become involved in a quarrel with Marlborough's son-in-law, the Earl of Sunderland, who did not enumerate among his many merits a calmness of temper or a readiness to forgive wrong. At the day of change when the Tories had to make way for the Whigs, Sunderland was dissatisfied with the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland which was allotted to him; and since then he had dissatisfied Townshend by the way in which he executed the duties of that always difficult and trying office, in which no man could do common justice to the natives and the Roman Catholics, without exciting a tempest among the English Protestants. The latter, with a glorious defiance of right and of the rules which ought to direct such matters, fell upon Sunderland because he appointed native Irish to be judges, and bishops too! And, as Sunderland was no zealot or bigot, and would not persecute or make war upon mass-houses, he was accused of being no Christian, and of entertaining designs hostile to the creed and property of the Anglican church. Upon the death of the Marquess of Wharton, in the preceding year, Sunderland was allowed to exchange his lord-lieutenancy for the privy seal and a seat in the cabinet; but he continued to be in an ill humour against some of the ministers personally, and to draw closer his ties of intimacy with the more liberal of the Whigs, who already looked upon the great Whigs in power as little better than Tories under another name. In the course of the present autumn the lord privy seal went to Aix-la-Chapelle to drink the waters, professing, according to Walpole, "an entire reconciliation and a perfect union" with Townshend and his party; but intending, in fact, to do all that he could with the new sovereign to precipitate their downfall. From Aix-la-Chapelle with the express permission of the king and Secretary Stanhope, Sunderland repaired to Hanover, where he made a wonderful progress in the favour of his sovereign and in the friendship of Stanhope. He went with the court to Gohre, a hunting seat which the king loved to frequent, and he took part rather in the business than in the sports of the place. He was there on the 11th of November, when Stanhope, now sure of his game, tendered his resignation, it being, he said, impossible that he should any longer co-operate with Lord Townshend, who was at once so dilatory and so positive. George, of course, instead of accepting the resignation, made Stanhope write a letter to Townshend to intimate his majesty's displeasure at the long delays of the French treaty, and to demand an explanation of his conduct. And on the very same day Sunderland indulged his vindictive temper by writing another letter to Townshend, but without the king's authority, in which he repeated the complaints and injunctions in a very harsh and arrogant style. To this rude attack of Sunderland the prime minister made no reply whatever; to the authorised letter of Stanhope he wrote a short answer, which ended with a prayer that God would forgive him as he did. To the king—in more modern and more honourable times the letter would have been accompanied by a resignation—Townshend wrote a vindication of his conduct in every part of the transactions relating to the French treaty. But there were other circumstances which widened the breach. George I. was at least as jealous as a father as the Prince of Wales was an undutiful or impatient son; and he had begun to suspect that, during his absence on the continent, Townshend had been caballing with the heir to the throne. It has been asserted that Stanhope as well as Sunderland promoted these suspicions for their own interests and purposes; but there is a want of sufficient evidence to prove this fact against Stanhope.* Apparently to try an experiment upon his cabinet or to lay a trap for Townshend and Walpole, who were about equally suspected, the king intimated that, if proper means could be found to carry on affairs in England in his absence, he should like to remain at Hanover the whole winter; and he desired Townshend to inform him of the sentiment of the cabinet, and of the heads of such business as it would be necessary to bring forward in the mean time in parliament. Townshend forthwith drew up and sent a sketch of the opinion of ministers as to the stormy politics of the North, the providing of funds for the public debt, the trial of Lord Oxford, and a proposed act of indemnity. So far there was little, if anything, to displease the king; but at the next step Townshend floundered into the mire. Instead of pressing his majesty to return into England, he urged that, if his majesty chose to remain at Hanover, the Prince of Wales should be entrusted with a discretionary power during his absence, so as to be able to meet any unexpected difficulty or new combination of circumstances. Horace Walpole, the brother of Sir Robert, was selected by Townshend to carry this remarkable dispatch to Hanover, and there to explain it fully to the king. It is pretty obvious that Walpole was also instructed by his brother and by Townshend to endeavour to remove unfavourable impressions from the royal mind, and to counteract, in particular, the very inimical influences of Sunderland. But for this kind of duty Horace Walpole, who was frank, open, and somewhat over-choleric, was ill suited. When he reached the hunting seat of

Gohre he found the king, who, we believe, had never intended otherwise, fully determined to return to England and to open the session of parliament in person; and upon this the 'unsuspicious envoy thought it quite unnecessary to go into that part of the dispatch which treated of the Prince of Wales, as it was only intended to provide for a contingency which no longer existed. Thus the subject was left to rankle in the mind of George uncorrected by any explanation: and the dispatch indeed became the death-warrant of Lord Townshend's administration. Matters were made worse by exaggerated intelligence received from England, which represented the prince as courting popularity by extraordinary means, and as uniting himself with Hampden and other extreme Whigs; and which spoke of extensive intrigues headed by the Duke of Argyll, and having for their obvious object the placing of the son above the father even in his lifetime. Horace Walpole was allowed to return to London with dispatches and explanations, which seemed satisfactory even to his far more acute brother and to the prime minister; but before he had got to St. James's the king had declared, in a great passion, to Stanhope, at Hanover, that he would most assuredly dismiss Lord Townshend from his service. Stanhope took to himself the credit of softening the king's resentment, and inducing him to give his consent that Townshend should be offered the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland as a sweetener; and he insists that to have attempted to do more for Townshend would have rendered "the continuance of a Whig administration with any ease to the king" an impossibility. We believe that there was little or no exaggeration in Stanhope's account of the exceeding uneasiness the king had been in of late.* But, on the other side of the water, the behaviour of the Prince of Wales had created almost equal inquietude; and Robert Walpole had been obliged to declare two or three months before this, that his royal highness was actually conducting himself in a manner to irritate his father and greatly embarrass ministers. "By some things that daily drop from him," says Walpole, "he seems to be preparing to keep up an interest of his own in parliament, independent of the king's." Stanhope saw a thousand reasons for which Lord Townshend ought to accept the lieutenancy of Ireland; and he told Walpole, that, if Townshend did what he ought to do, the cabinet council would remain just as it was, with the addition of the Duke of Kingston as privy seal. "But," continued Stanhope, "if my Lord Townshend shall decline Ireland, and if—which by some has been suggested, but which I cannot think possible—he should prevail upon you to offer to quit your employments, the king, in this case, hath engaged my Lord Sunderland and myself to promise that his lordship will be secretary, and that I, unable and unequal as I am every way, should be chancellor of the exchequer for this session; the king declaring that, as long as he can find Whigs that will serve him, he will be served by them; which good disposition his majesty shall not have reason to alter by any backwardness in me to expose myself to any trouble or hazard. You know as much of our plan now as I do, and are, I dare say, fully satisfied that I think it highly concerns me that you should stay where you are. I am very sorry that my Lord Townshend's temper hath made it impracticable for him to continue secretary."† Townshend was at the time exceedingly popular in England, being esteemed as essentially an English minister, above all foreign influences, and patriotic, blunt, and thoroughly honest. To resign he was obliged; but the acceptance or non-acceptance of the lord-lieutenancy was a matter of free choice, and he indignantly rejected it. "My private affairs," said he, "would not permit me to remove to Ireland, any more than common honesty would allow me to put the profits of that employment in my pocket, without going over to do the duties of it."‡ To Stanhope, who had seen the thousand reasons why he should accept the Irish place, he wrote a bitter letter; and to Sunderland he wrote another. This violent lord had provoked him by a letter addressed to Lord Oxford, in which he directly accused Townshend, Robert Walpole, and the Lord Chancellor Cowper, of secret engagements with the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Argyll. Townshend called this an infamous accusation, proceeding from the villany and infatuation of Lord Sunderland. Robert Walpole and his brother were at first equally indignant: they wrote to Stanhope, reproaching him with his "sudden changes to old sworn friends;" and declaring it to be their opinion that it had never been expected at Hanover that Townshend would, nor desired that he should, accept the lord-lieutenancy. Stanhope, who was not on the losing side, kept his temper, re-assured the Walpoles, and prevailed upon them still to persuade Townshend to accept the lieutenancy, which would be kept open for him till the king's return. In the mean time George had left Hanover for England, and arrived at the Hague. Here he was detained several days by important business with the States-General, who feared, and who had reason to fear, the effect of any serious division in the Whig cabinet—for through such a gap the Tories might get back to office, and then the whole scheme of foreign policy so recently laid down would be inevitably deranged.

* He says further—"The king will not bear him in that office, be the consequence what it will. This being the case, I hope and desire that you will endeavour to reconcile him to Ireland, which I once thought he did not dislike, and which, I think, he cannot now refuse, without declaring to the world that he will serve upon no other terms than being vicerey over father, son, and these three kingdoms. Is the Whig interest to be staked in defence of such a pretension? or, is the difference to the Whig party, whether Lord Townshend be secretary or lord-lieutenant of Ireland, tant P?"

† Letter to Slingeland.

* In this letter to Robert Walpole, Stanhope says—"I must own I think he has reason to be uneasy, even though I don't pretend to know so much of the matter as the king does, his majesty receiving many advices which come neither through my hands nor my Lord Sunderland's. But I cannot help observing to you, that he is jealous of certain intimacies with the two brothers (Argyll and Ials). I hope his majesty's presence in England, and the behaviour of our friends in the cabinet, will remove these jealousies."

Some of the ablest and best of the Dutch ministers were the personal friends of Townshend; and, while they endeavoured to soften the animosities of the king, they laboured to remove the obstinacy of the minister, and entreated his lordship not to decline the offer of the lord-licutenancy, and so close the avenue to his returning favour: if even he were indifferent as a courtier, he ought, they said, as a patriot, to sacrifice his resentment to the necessity of union and to the public good. Nearly a month before the king's arrival at the Hague, the treaty with the French regent had been signed for England and France; and a few days after George's departure thence for London, it was finally signed for Holland, and then became "THE TRIPLE ALLIANCE."^{*}

George reached London by the end of December, and, as his first passion had abated, he received Townshend very graciously, and even confessed to him that he had been over-hasty. He afterwards represented to the fallen minister, through the medium of Bernsdorf, that, though he had perhaps proceeded too hastily, and though he could not with due regard to his own dignity and consistency immediately restore Townshend, he was ready and willing to give him every other possible satisfaction: and, in the end, Townshend condescended to accept the lord-licutenancy, and to pocket its profits without going over to perform its duties. He was continued a member of the cabinet; and his conduct was not merely excused, but applauded by his party and friends as the only course that could prevent a fatal schism among the Whigs. Thus the Walpoles, the Pulteneys, the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Orford, and the rest of the men in place continued as they were; the only change being the appointment of Metlueu to be one of the principal secretaries of state. But from this moment Sunderland was suspected to be the secret mover of the royal counsels. Owing to these difficult negotiations, and to discoveries made of alarming plots and the correspondence of the Jacobites with Charles XII., the meeting of parliament, which had been fixed for the king's return, was put off for many weeks.

A. D. 1717.—At last parliament met, on the 20th day of February, when the king informed the two Houses of the happy conclusion of the Triple Alliance; and of the actual danger the nation had been in of an invasion from Sweden, and of a conspiracy at home, which, however, had been discovered in time and prevented. And in a day or two copies of letters and papers which went to prove the madness of the Jacobites and the audacity of the Swedes were laid before the Houses. The principal manager of this strange intrigue was Baron Gortz, a clever but desperate adventurer from Franconia, who had become Charles's principal adviser and most trusted minister. This Gortz was a notorious coward, but he was shrewd and quick, and was, according to Voltaire, equally ready with gifts, promises, oaths, and lies.* He put himself in direct communication with the Pretender and the Duke of Ormond, and carried on a secret correspondence both with London and Paris. As he became better acquainted with the state of England and France, and with the views of the Czar Peter, Gortz enlarged his scheme, and proposed nothing less than a lasting peace and a close alliance between Charles and Peter, the overthrow of the regent in France by means of a conspiracy, and the overthrow of George I. by an insurrection in England and an invasion of Scotland by the hero of Narva in person. Charles, indeed, was a different sort of soldier from the Pretender; but there were other circumstances in his favour besides his generalship and indomitable courage—he was a Protestant; and many men who had turned from the Pretender, because he had hitherto depended solely upon Catholic princes, would, it was calculated, rush to his standard if it was raised and defended by the Lutheran Swede. As Sweden was a very poor country—as Charles was actually cutting up his soldiers' boots to coin into mock money—Gortz was obliged to ask for cash to carry on the mighty scheme; and the little court at Avignon, poor as it was, offered 60,000*l.*, while the prime minister of Spain, Alberoni, actually sent to Spaar, the Swedish minister at Paris, a million of French livres as a subsidy. The Jacobites were wonderfully elated. "The people who belong to St. Germain and Avignon," writes the now un-Jacobitised Bolingbroke, "were never more sanguine in appearance." Perhaps, as usual, it was these extravagant and injudicious plotters that first let out the secret. Be this as it may, hints were dropped in London; and in the preceding month of October, some letters from Count Gyllenberg, the Swedish ambassador at St. James's, to the main plotter, Gortz, at the Hague, were stopped and deciphered by the English government, which therefore, in all probability, had been previously furnished with a key to the cipher used. Among other things in this intercepted correspondence were the following broad opinions and suggestions of Count Gyllenberg, who was, of course, mainly incited and excited, like his master, by George's bargain with Denmark for Verden and Bremen:—"There is no medium. Either Bremen or the Hanoverian must be sacrificed. The latter is not so difficult, considering the general discontent. Ten thousand men would be sufficient. The malcontents require but a body of regular forces, to which they may join themselves. That body being transported in the month of March, when the easterly winds reign, and when it will not in the least be dremt of, will cause a general revolt." In a later letter

* The Triple Alliance was signed by the Dutch on the 4th of January, 1717. It had been signed by the English and French on the 28th of November, 1716.

† Histoire de Charles XII. Voltaire knew Gortz personally and well. Indeed, at one time, when Gortz was residing at the Hague, and corresponding with London, he wished to engage the witty Frenchman as a secretary and travelling companion.

the ambassador thought that, if Sweden would submit to George, and settle the preliminary concerning Bremen, Charles might come to an agreement in relation to what George ought to help him to take from the czar. "But," added Gyllenberg, "if we do not submit, your excellency may be assured, that, as well to justify their past actions, as to force us to a compliance, they will prevail upon the mercenary parliament which they have at present to take vigorous resolutions, and perhaps even to declare war against us. The English ministers do not mince the matter; and they have already made it appear that they will stick at nothing. They are all furious persons. Sunderland, who is in a manner at the head of affairs, has got all the interest he has with the king of England by consenting to what has been done against us. . . . Your excellency, therefore, will find we ought to make use of this opportunity to enter into measures against people who certainly will not do anything by halves. We must either ruin them, or be undone ourselves. My friends are now in town: an express which came to them yesterday from the Pretender will put them in better condition for forming a plan. To-day they are going about it." This was pretty plain, but an intercepted letter from Gortz was still plainer. After stating that even before his departure from Sweden he had strongly recommended the expedition into Scotland, Gortz went on to say—"There is, therefore, now no other question but of the means to satisfy our just desire of revenge. For several months past we have had some preliminary negotiation upon these matters with the court of Avignon. And which way can the King of Sweden better secure to himself the recovery and possession of the duchy of Bremen, than by reducing King George to be nothing more than a elector of the empire?" All this was detected before George's return, and other information was obtained after his arrival. Stanhope on the 29th of January had laid most ample information before the privy council, and proposed the decisive but perfectly justifiable step of arresting Gyllenberg and seizing his papers. Some members of the cabinet were startled; but, as it was clear that the Swede had lost his character of ambassador in that of a conspirator with the subjects of the prince to whom he was accredited, it was presently resolved to follow Stanhope's advice, and Gyllenberg was arrested on the same day. General Wade, who was charged with this commission, found the count making up some dispatches: he told him he was his prisoner, seized the papers that were on the table, and demanded the keys of his escrutoire. Gyllenberg stormed and swore about this violation of the laws of nations, and then begged to be permitted to send for and consult with Monteleone, the Spanish ambassador. Wade, a staunch old soldier, accustomed to execute his orders to the letter, told the Swede that he should speak with nobody, and again demanded his keys. Gyllenberg refused the keys, and his wife coming in assured the general that the escrutoire contained nothing but her plate and linen. Wade then caused the doors to be burst open; and he found in it a great heap of papers. These he sealed up and carried away with him, leaving a guard upon the count, who was thus constituted a prisoner in his own house. In the course of the same day Mr. Cæsar, "a creature of Lord Oxford's,"* and a member of parliament for Hertford, was arrested, as was also Sir Jacob Banks, formerly member for Minehead, and who was equally suspected by government. A circular was forthwith addressed to the corps diplomatique in London; and not one of the foreign ambassadors made any complaint at the summary arrest of Gyllenberg, except Monteleone, whose court, as we have seen, had gone deeply into the conspiracy, and given money to promote its execution. Stanhope fully justified his proceeding by publishing immediately Gyllenberg's correspondence. Gortz, meanwhile, anxious to put his own masterly hand to the finale, had quitted the Hague, and had reached Calais on his way into England. But there he was informed of what had befallen Gyllenberg, and he instantly turned back into Holland, where, at the instance of the English government, he and his secretaries were arrested by an order from the States, who were themselves too deeply concerned to pay any very critical attention to the rights of ambassadors and the law of nations. Intelligence of these rapid events was soon conveyed to the Swedish king, who neither owned nor disowned the proceedings of Gortz and Gyllenberg. As a retaliation, he ordered the arrest of Mr. Jackson, the British resident at his court, and forbade the Dutch resident his presence.

When this business was laid before parliament, the Commons most vehemently expressed their indignation; and one member even proposed that war against Sweden should be declared without waiting for explanations or permitting delays. Stanhope, however, recommended the more prudent course. Yet, under every view of the case, it seemed essential to resent the insult offered and to provide against the danger threatened. In the month of April Stanhope delivered a royal message, informing the Commons of the danger which still impended over the nation from the designs of Sweden, and demanding an extraordinary supply to enable his majesty to make good such engagements as it might be necessary for him to contract with other powers, in order effectually to avert the storm. The debate that arose instantly proved that the seeming reconciliation between the Townshends and Walpoles and the Stanhopes and Sunderlands was hollow and unreal: Robert Walpole spoke coldly in favour of the motion; and all his and Townshend's friends and adherents voted against the supply (fixed at 250,000*l.*), which in consequence was only carried by a majority of four. Neither the king nor Stanhope could for a moment separate Townshend and Walpole from their party in the House; and on that very evening Stanhope announced to Townshend that he was no longer lord-licutenant of Ireland. Robert Walpole did not wait to be thus humiliated—though, perhaps, it may be doubted whether his services were not deemed indispensable, and whether Stanhope, at least, would not have been glad to retain him at any price:—at a very early hour on the next morning he waited on the king and resigned his places of first commissioner of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer. Methuen and Pulteney also resigned in the course of the same morning; but Lord Orford and the Duke of Devonshire clung to office two or three days longer, and the Lord Chancellor Cowper and the Duke of Kingston did not resign at all. Secretary Stanhope, who was departing farther and farther from his original profession of a soldier, was appointed first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer; the Earl of Sunderland and Joseph Addison became secretaries of state, the Earl of Berkeley first lord of the Admiralty, the Duke of Newcastle lord chamberlain, and the Duke of Bolton lord-licutenant of Ireland. This new cabinet was presently christened a German ministry, and Robert Walpole, who, more than Townshend, had been the head of the displaced administration, became terrible in opposition, and little less than a Jacobite. On the day of his resignation Walpole brought into the House a financial scheme, upon which he had been deeply engaged as chancellor of the exchequer, saying “that he now presented that bill as a country gentleman; but hoped that it would not fare the worse for having two fathers, and that his successor (Stanhope) would take care to bring it to perfection.” Stanhope testified a proper inclination to carry out the scheme, which was, in fact, a sort of germ of the Sinking Fund; but Stanhope was no financier, and when a dispute arose he fell into a perplexity, and then into a passion. “He ingenuously owned his incapacity for the affairs of the treasury, which were so remote from his studies and inclination, that he would fain have kept the employment he had before, which was both more easy and profitable to him, but that he thought it his duty to obey the king’s commands; that, however, he would endeavour to make up, by application, honesty, and disinterestedness, what he wanted in abilities and experience; that he would content himself with the salary and lawful perquisites of his office; . . . that he had no brothers nor other relations to provide for; and that, on his first entering into the Treasury he had made a standing order against the late practice of granting reversions of places.” All these insinuations were levelled at Robert Walpole, who replied with equal anger. He complained of breaches of friendship, of political treachery, and betraying of private confidence in conversation. As the facts were too notorious to be denied, he owned that while he was in place he had endeavoured to serve his friends and his relations, but this he said was nothing but what was reasonable and just. “As to the granting reversions of places,” continued Walpole, “I am willing to acquaint this House with the meaning of the charge. I have no objections to the German ministers whom the king brought with him from Hanover, and who, as far as I have observed, have behaved themselves like men of honour; but there is a mean fellow, of what nation I know not, who is eager to dispose of employments. This man (he meant Robethon), having obtained the grant of a reversion, which he designed for his son, I thought it too good for him, and therefore I reserved it for my own son. On this disappointment the foreigner was so impertinent as to demand 2500*l.*, under pretence that he had been offered that sum for the reversion. But I was wiser than to comply with his demands, and one of the chief reasons that made me resign was, because I would not connive at some things that were carrying on.” Stanhope replied with more passion than ever, and Walpole rejoined. The dispute would have ended in a duel if it had not been for the interference of the House. From this time the parties of Walpole and Stanhope were as violent against each other as the Whigs and Tories; but many even of his personal adherents thought that Walpole had gone too far in letting out the money secrets and jubbings of the court.

The new administration, anxious to secure popularity, recommended a reduction of the army, and an act of grace to extend to many persons concerned in the late insurrections in Scotland and the north of England. It was not intended that this act of grace should cover the ex-premier Lord Oxford, who had been now lying nearly two years in the Tower without any progress being made in his trial. Through the recent changes he felt himself perfectly safe from attainder and the block, and he petitioned for dispatch. The Lords fixed the 24th of June for the trial, intimating to the Commons that they must by that day make good their charges. But the leaders of the secret committee, who had drawn up the accusation while in office, were by no means anxious to press it now that they were out of office: then, the salvation of the nation depended upon the condign punishment of the minister, but now, the nation could be saved without it. Robert Walpole, who had formerly been so hot, was now perfectly cool, and, as he almost always absented himself from the committee, it became necessary to appoint another chairman. His object, and that of Lord Townshend, was, to thwart and embarrass the new administration; and for this end they both came to a secret understanding with the Jacobite Chancellor Harcourt, the bosom friend of Oxford, and with the Tories. On the 24th of June the peers, with the king and the rest of the royal family and the members of the corps diplomatique as spectators, assembled in Westminster Hall, which was properly prepared for the trial, and crowded by other persons anxious to witness the scene. Oxford was brought from the Tower, and stood bare-headed at the bar, with the executioner and the axe at his side—an old formality in cases of treason. The Commons assembled as a committee of the whole House; and, after the articles of impeachment had been read, together with Oxford's answers to them, and the replication of the Commons, Sir Joseph Jekyll stood up to make good the first article. But here Harcourt signified to their lordships that he had a special motion to make, which could only be done in their own house. The peers adjourned accordingly to their own house, where the ex-Jacobite chancellor represented that to go through all the articles of impeachment would take up a great deal of time to very little purpose; for if the Commons could make good the two articles for high treason, the Earl of Oxford would forfeit both life and estate, and there would be an end of the matter; whereas to proceed in the method the Commons proposed would draw the trial into a prodigious length. And Harcourt also observed "that a peer, on his trial on articles for misdemeanors only, ought not to be deprived of his liberty, nor sequestered from parliament, and is entitled to the privilege of sitting within the bar during the whole time of his trial; in all which particulars the known rule in such cases may be evaded should a peer be brought to his trial on several articles of misdemeanors and of high treason mixed together, and the Commons he admitted to make good the former before judgment be given on the latter." As the end and consequence of this reasoning, Harcourt moved that the lords should receive no evidence on the charges of misdemeanor, until after the charges of high treason had been heard and determined. Sunderland, Cadogan, Coningsby, and other peers engaged in, or friendly to, the new administration, vehemently opposed the motion, from the conviction that if it were carried Oxford would be let off unscathed. But it was carried nevertheless by a majority of 88 to 56—the Walpole or Townshend Whigs voting with the Tories. As Townshend himself had confessed nearly a year before, there was not evidence sufficient to convict Oxford of high treason. But it was easier to turn the House of Lords than the House of Commons, who resented the resolution, declared it to be an infringement of their privileges, and refused to comply with it. Hence there arose a new war of privileges—the Lords insisting that they had the privilege to make any such alteration in a state trial, and the Commons insisting that it belonged to them to conduct their impeachments in their own way. The Lords at length declared that they would admit of no further conferences or delays, and they appointed the 1st of July for the trial. The Commons resolved not to proceed with the prosecution on those terms; and on the appointed day no prosecutors appeared in Westminster Hall. The lords sat silent, and as if in expectation, for about a quarter of an hour. They then returned to their own House, where a motion was made and carried, that, as no charge had been maintained against Robert Earl of Oxford and Earl Mortimer, he should be acquitted;—and the ex-prime minister, after his long detention, stepped forth a free man, to the infinite mortification of Marlborough and his vindictive duchess, who had certainly desired exile and confiscation, if not blood.* The people, who at the beginning of the impeachment would probably have seen the plotting minister executed with much pleasure, now hailed his liberation with loud acclamations; but the king, by the lord chamberlain, forbade Oxford the court. Did George know or suspect the fact, which has been since proved, that Oxford during his detention in the Tower had written to the Pretender, promising his services, and giving him his advice as to the best means of managing his affairs?†

By the act of grace and free pardon, which was passed at the end of the present session, the Earl of Carnwath and Lords Widdrington and Nairn were released from the Tower; seventeen gentlemen under sentence of death in Newgate, and twenty-six in Carlisle Castle, were set free; and many other prisoners were discharged from the Fleet, the Marshalsea, and other places of custody. At Chester about two hundred prisoners, consisting mostly of Catholic gentlemen taken at Preston, were liberated; and in Scotland the prison doors were generally thrown open to the captive Jacobites. Matthew Prior, Thomas Harley, and a few others, were excepted out of the act of grace; and, as the clan of Rob Roy had made itself very conspicuous, there was a wholesale and barbarous exception against "all and every person of the name and clan of Macgregor." Even to those who were pardoned the sting was not taken out of the act of attainder, and their estates remained forfeited to the crown. A courtly pamphleteer, however, declared that the clemency of King George was not only great, but even extended farther than that of God himself!‡ At the close of the session Stanhope was raised to the peerage by the title of Viscount Stanhope. By this ill-timed promotion the affairs of the new administration in the Commons were left in the somewhat incompetent hands of Cragg, Aislabie, and Addison, who had little or no power to do anything themselves, and who were frequently left ignorant as to what their principals wished to have done. This childish impatience for the peerage had contributed already more than once to weaken and destroy an administration.

Charles XII. of Sweden, was still silent as to the Jacobite scheme and the plotting and conspiring of his ministers, but his neighbours found him too much employment to permit the carrying his arms into Scotland; and he became anxious for a temporary reconciliation. The French regent stepped forward as a common friend, and by virtue of his mediation the English court was assured that Charles had never any intention to disturb the tranquillity of Great Britain; Count Gyllenborg was liberated on one side, and Mr. Jackson on the other, and Gortz was set at liberty in Holland. But new rumours of wars with Spain soon agitated the public mind. The court of Madrid had behaved to George in a deceitful and irritating manner, making him in public solemn declarations that they would give no assistance to his enemies, and in private sending money to the Pretender. Upon the failure of the insurrection in Scotland, Alberoni, the prime minister, had discredited Montecome, the Spanish ambassador at London, and had made new professions of a sincere and lasting friendship, declaring that, next to God, the king his master looked up to King George. But it was the most earnest wish of Philip, or rather, perhaps, of his wife and prime minister, to weaken or overthrow the Duke of Orleans's regency, and to raise up barriers to his succession to the throne in case the young Louis XV. should die; and Spanish gold and Spanish intrigue were mixed up with every plot or conspiracy against the regent, whom George had bound himself to defend. At the same time the court of Madrid was furious against the court of Vienna, as the emperor, instead of acknowledging Philip, still retained for himself the title of King of Spain, and added that of Prince of Asturias to the many titles of his infant son. But what was a greater provocation still was the circumstance of the emperor's holding by the peace of Utrecht all the fair dominions in Italy which had formerly belonged to Spain. As soon as Philip had got quiet possession of the Spanish peninsula—an event which must have repeatedly appeared hopeless to him—he began to cast a longing eye towards the Italian peninsula. The national pride of the Spaniards, and the interests of many of them, encouraged the Bourbon; and it soon became a principle or an article of political faith at Madrid, that Spain would remain a dishonoured country until she had recovered Naples, Milan, everything in Italy, and everything elsewhere, which had been separated from her by the treaty of Utrecht. Thus the treaty between England and the empire which guaranteed the Italian provinces, and the recent Triple Alliance, which provided for a statu quo, and the protection of France and the regent, were both singularly distasteful to the Spanish court. Alberoni tried his hand alternately with George and the emperor, hoping to interrupt the good understanding between them. When the English court was found obstinate he suspended the execution of the commercial treaty, and permitted various vexations to be practised upon English merchants trading with Spain; and, when the emperor rejected all overtures for a compromise, he insulted and almost struck his ambassadors. A war, at least between Spain and the House of Austria, was inevitable; but Alberoni wanted time to repair the finances of the country, and would have abstained from hostilities for some three or four years longer. A summary and very unjustifiable proceeding on the part of the emperor hurried on the war. Don Jose Molinas, a mighty great priest—there is no turning a page of the history of Spain without finding these ecclesiastics uppermost—was appointed Grand Inquisitor in the place of the Cardinal del Giudice; and, being at the time at Rome as Spanish ambassador to the pope, and not liking a sea voyage, it was necessary for him to pass through a part of the emperor's Milanese territory. Before setting out on his journey he asked and obtained a safe conduct from the papal court; and it is said that the emperor's ambassador promised that he should not be molested. Yet when Don Jose got upon Austrian ground he was arrested, and carried a close prisoner to the castle of Milan, his papers being seized and transmitted to Vienna, with the expectation that they might contain many useful lights as to the designs of the Spaniards. In a paroxysm of rage, and overlooking his weakness, Philip, in defiance of the prudent advice of Alberoni, resolved upon an instant war. The Duke of Popoli, whose family had held vast estates in that part of Italy, recommended the king to begin with the invasion of Naples. Alberoni, in a powerfully written memorial, showed the uncertainty of the enterprise and the exceeding great danger of provoking the great maritime powers; but, finding his arguments of no avail, he pressed the requisite preparations for war with his usual zeal and ability.* At the same time, Italian and priest though he was, he solemnly assured the pope that the warlike preparations of Spain were not directed against the emperor but against the infidels and pirates of the African coast; and the pope chose this moment for conferring the cardinal's hat on Alberoni. In the beginning of August twelve ships-of-war and nine thousand men, commanded by the Marquess of Ledesma, sailed from Barcelona—an insignificant force, but which would have been sufficient to take, though certainly not to keep, the Neapolitan capital. But the scheme had been changed, and, instead of making for Naples, the Marquess stopped short at Cagliari, the capital of Sardinia, which island had been left to the emperor. The Spaniards wasted twenty-six days in idleness, waiting for the arrival of some of their ships and troops which had been left behind or driven from their course by contrary winds;† and then they summoned the Austrian governor of Cagliari to surrender. But that officer had made good use of the time which the Spaniards had lost, and, having re-inforced his garrison with a body of Spanish refugees and Catalonians, he returned a defiance. Ledesma then landed six thousand foot and six hundred horse, surrounded Cagliari, and forced or otherwise induced the neighbouring villages to declare for Philip and their old masters the Spaniards. The imperial governor held out as long as he could, and then escaped into the mountains to prolong the struggle; and it was not till the month of November, and after a severe loss, occasioned by the ambuscades of the natives and by malaria fevers, that the Spaniards achieved the conquest of the whole island. Then the Marquess of Lede left about five thousand men in Sardinia, and with the remainder, exhausted by fatigue and sickness, returned to Barcelona. Philip caused Te Deum to be sung at Madrid, and Alberoni drew up manifestos and circulars to excuse this attack in time of peace, for no declaration of war had been made. On the other side the emperor called upon the members of the Triple Alliance to fulfil their engagements, and protect him against such aggression; and he called upon the pope to justify himself against the suspicion of having connived with Spain. Viscount Stanhope dispatched his relative, Mr. Stanhope, to Madrid to attempt to prevent a war by arranging articles of accommodation between Philip and the emperor. Alberoni fell upon the imperfect arrangements of the wretched peace of Utrecht, which by this time had become a by-word of contempt throughout Europe. "You made war," said the able and eloquent Italian, "to establish the balance of power, and you concluded a peace without any balance whatever. . . . The king my master has no repugnance to propositions of peace; but those propositions must be such as to re-establish in some measure the ancient balance, and not leave the emperor in a situation to make himself master of all Italy whenever he pleases." The cardinal, of course, was well read in Machiavelli. When Mr. Stanhope and his colleague, Bubb Doddington, represented the obligations which England had contracted, he said, "With regard to the engagements which the Allies have taken, it is a well-known principle that princes and states are not bound to observe a treaty contrary to their interest. This principle is acknowledged by all religions, whether Catholic or Protestant. You have always acted thus. For instance, did you not acknowledge Philip as king of Spain? Yet soon afterwards, finding it to be your interest, did you not endeavour to dethrone him and place another in his room? Nor do I blame you for pursuing your interest as a nation." Mr. Stanhope, however, continued to represent that the present policy of the British court was wholly disinterested, and that George had no other object in view than the preservation of the peace of Europe. At first he was badly seconded by the Dutch minister at Madrid, while the French diplomatists seemed almost to oppose him. Lord Stair thus describes the instructions given by the regent M. de Nancré, at Madrid: "They are certainly drawn in the most guarded and cautious terms that I have ever seen. No man could touch fire with more unwillingness and circumspection than these instructions touch every point that could give the slightest chagrin to Spain.

M. de Nancré is to say nothing savouring of threat. . . . Nor has he any orders to insist upon a declaration that the Spaniards will not, in the mean while, undertake an invasion of Italy. Yet, in my opinion, there is no way to avoid a war so sure as seeming not to be afraid of it."* At length, however, both France and Holland adopted a more decisive tone, and absolutely refused to leave to Spain her recent conquest of Sardinia. The pope, who was overawed by the Austrians, that were now by far the most powerful in Italy, and that at any time, on a few days' notice, could surround him in Rome, directed a terrible brief against Philip, threatening him with the vengeance of Heaven, and assuring him that not merely his worldly reputation but his very soul was at stake. But the thunder of the Vatican was disregarded, and Alberoni, though a cardinal, cared not for a suspension of the indulgo. The cardinal was, however, obliged to dissemble, and to consent to open a negotiation. He hoped and trusted that, as usual, the different interests of the allies would create difficulties and delays, and he determined to make the most strenuous exertions to prepare for a war during these deliberations for a peace. He entertained a contempt for partition treaties and their framers. "There are certain men," said he, "who would cut and pare states and kingdoms, as though they were so many Dutch cheeses." Spain, that had been so long sinking into a lethargy and a slough of despond, was electrified and awakened by the rare energy of this Italian priest. Ships of war were built, cannons were cast, arms forged, sailors and soldiers engaged in all quarters; and all this, as Alberoni afterwards boasted, was done without levying any new tax upon the nation, but by enforcing economy, selling some court offices, and mortgaging some of the revenues. At this critical moment King Philip was dangerously ill, a prey to hypochondria, almost to the same extent as his wretched predecessor on that throne. His queen—who had far more of the man in her character than he had—and the cardinal, kept the entire management of affairs in their hands, and let none but their own creatures approach the royal invalid. Las Torres, Aguilar, and other Spaniards of rank, had the boldness to propose that the hypochondriac Philip should be set aside as incapable, and his young son, the Prince of Asturias, raised to the throne. "Either," they said, "our king is no longer capable of transacting the business of state, or he is under the control of Cardinal Alberoni and the Italians." The Duke of Escalona, the lord chamberlain, insisted upon his right of office to see the medicines administered to the sovereign in his presence; but he was told, by order of Alberoni, that he must not intrude on the king's privacy. Escalona, a proud old grandee, expressed his contempt of the cardinal, and his determination to do the duties of his office as regulated by the rigid etiquette of the Spanish court. Then Alberoni, as if acting under the commands of the queen, told the duke that he could not be admitted at all. But one afternoon the old grandee presented himself, and demanded an entrance into the sick chamber of the king; and, as the page in waiting would not open the door, he burst it open in his face, and, being crippled with the gout, he moved slowly across the apartment towards the bed, by the side of which the queen was sitting, with the cardinal standing by her side, and a few attendants at a greater distance. The curtains of the bed were closely drawn, so that Escalona could not see the suffering king. Alberoni sent one of the attendants to command him to retire; but that grandee continued to advance, halt and hobbling, and leaning upon his cane, so that the cardinal himself stepped forward and told him the king wished to be alone. "That is not true," exclaimed the grandee; "I am not blind, though lame. You did not approach the head of the bed, nor did his majesty speak to you." Alberoni repeated that he must retire, and laid his hand upon his sleeve. This insult transported the old Spaniard almost out of his senses, and, after reproaching the insolent Italian in terrible language, he either struck him, or threatened so to do. A struggle ensued between the prince of the church and the grandee, who appear to have cuffed each other till the grandee, the older and weaker of the two, sunk into a chair: but Escalona, from his seat, struck the cardinal on the head and shoulders with his cane, calling him a contemptible varlet, deserving nothing but a drubbing, and declaring that, if not restrained by the respect due to the royal presence, he would kick him out of the room. It appears that the king slumbered on, or at least took no notice; and that the queen and her attendants witnessed the singular scene in silent and inactive astonishment. But almost as soon as the gouty grandee got back to his own house, he was ordered to prepare for a longer journey. As soon as this order for his banishment was known, Spaniards of all ranks hastened to him to pay their respects, as if to a champion of the national independence, or a true Spaniard who would clear the court and country of the Italians.* Alberoni and the queen continued as absolute as before; and the cardinal urged on his preparations for war, and extended his intrigues in all directions. He enticed the sovereign of Savoy by the most tempting offers; he encouraged the sultan to continue an unfortunate war in which he was actually engaged with the emperor; he corresponded with the emperor's disaffected subjects in Hungary and Transylvania, who were always numerous, and almost always ready to put their hands to the throat of the Austrian eagle; he took all the factious in France under his care; and he entered into the closest correspondence with the Pretender, who had at last been compelled to quit France altogether, and to fix his residence at Rome; he artfully encouraged the Jacobites in England and Scotland, and, by means of these disaffected Bri-tons and foreign agents of his own, he sought to alarm the English people, and set them against any war with Spain, by which they must forfeit so valuable a portion of their trade. The adroit Italian even found work for the British press; and pamphlets, for which he paid, were published against the threatened war, against standing armies, against Hanoverian mistresses and ministers, and against every thing else that was most unpopular. Nor did he neglect the Dutch; he excited their old commercial jealousies of England, and he made himself acquainted with the different views and interests of the parties and factions in their country. And at the same time this extraordinary churchman, who cared little for any distinctions of churches or religions, communicated freely at one and the same time with Charles XII. of Sweden and with the Czar Peter, in the hope of uniting these rivals against Germany, and above all against the King of England, whose power he most feared.

In the mean time the unfortunate family dissensions in the House of Hanover continued on the increase; and on account of a ridiculous quarrel about the christening of a baby, the Prince or Wales, was at first put under arrest in his own apartment, and then ordered to quit St. James's. A French writer, who knew more of the history of courts than any one of his day, affirms broadly that George I. could never bear the prince, because he believed he was no son of his.* However this may be, the antipathy between the king and the prince was extreme. The latter, on his expulsion from court, fixed his residence at Leicester House, which, as a matter of course, became the constant resort of the disappointed and disaffected of all classes, and the centre of an increasing turmoil and intrigue. Walpole, who was the great champion of the opposition, and who did not very scrupulously direct its measures or limit its attacks, was a frequent guest with the prince. On the 21st of November, while the nation was reflecting upon the unnatural animosity between father and son, and upon the stormy aspect of affairs abroad, the parliament assembled. The king, in his speech, spoke of his successful endeavours to preserve tranquillity at home; but ministers thought themselves obliged to demand at least 18,000 men for the service of the ensuing year. Walpole, who knew as well as any one the dangers of insurrection and the chances of invasion, insisted that 18,000 men were far too many; that 12,000 would be enough, and more than enough; that we were in danger of a standing army, and that if we wished to remain a free country we could not too carefully keep down the numbers or the military force. The Walpole and Townshend Whigs and the Jacobites all adopted and carried out Walpole's arguments, taking frequent occasion to cast reflections upon the foreign character and un-English interests of the court. "These are things," said Shippen, "which seem calculated rather for the meridian of Germany than of Great Britain; but it is the infelicity of his majesty's reign that he is unacquainted with our language and constitution; and it is therefore the more incumbent upon his British ministers to inform him that our government does not stand upon the same foundation with that which is established in his German dominions." At the end of this speech Mr. Lechmere rose, and affirmed that Mr. Shippen had used words that were a slanderous invective against his majesty's person and government, such as merited the highest resentment of that House; and he therefore moved that the orator should be committed to the Tower. This motion was immediately seconded by Mr. Spencer Cowper, and supported by Sir Joseph Jekyll and others; when Walpole stepped forward to attempt the rescue of the bold-speaking Jacobite, by desiring that he might be permitted to explain what might merely be rash words delivered in the heat of debate. But Shippen would not avail himself of this friendly screen, declaring that he would ask for no indulgence, and that his words needed neither explanation nor apology. The debate then rose to a storm, which ended in the commitment of Shippen to the Tower.

During the same session, Walpole, who had formerly been secretary-at-war, and who then had shown no averseness to a military code, vehemently and eloquently opposed the Mutiny Bill, declaring martial law to be a law unknown to our constitution, destructive of our liberties, and not endured by our ancestors; and moving that the offences of the soldiery should be cognisable and punishable by the civil magistrate, and not by courts-martial. In the heat of debate Walpole exclaimed, "He that is for blood shall have blood." "But," says his very partial biographer, "though he spoke thus strenuously against the bill, he voted for it, and secured a large majority. Being reproached for his apparent inconsistency, he justified himself by declaring, that, although in the debate he was of opinion that mutiny and desertion should be punished by the civil magistrate, yet he was convinced that those crimes should be punished by the martial law rather than escape with impunity."* It was decided in the Commons by a majority of 247 against 229, that courts-martial should have the power to punish mutiny and desertion with death. In the Upper House, the now liberated Oxford opposed the bill, and his old foe Lord Townshend also spoke against it; but ministers carried the measure by a majority of 91 against 77.

A. D. 1718.—The session of parliament closed on the 21st of March. A few days before the prorogation, the king, by message, informed the House of Commons "that he had reason to judge, from the information he had lately received from abroad, that an additional naval force would be necessary;" and the Commons, by an address, assured his majesty "that the House would make good such proceedings as his majesty in his royal wisdom should deem necessary for the purpose of giving effect to his unwearied endeavours to preserve the peace of Europe." Walpole observed that all this had very much the air of a declaration of war; yet the address was carried without a division.

During the session a fanatic, or insane youth, named James Shepherd, undertook to convey letters to his majesty in Italy, and then to smite the usurper George in his own palace. There was nothing done beyond writing a wild letter and talking nonsense; and there was scarcely a doubt that the youth was deranged: nevertheless, he was brought to trial, and was sentenced to be executed as a traitor. At the place of execution he was attended by one Orme, a nonjuring clergyman, who, imitating the conduct of Jeremy Collier, the nonjuring priest who had attended Parkins and Friend in King William's time, gave him public absolution. Orme was taken into custody; but he pretended that the church of England had in all its members the faculty and right to absolve penitent sinners; and he was let off with no other punishment than a brief imprisonment.

A large armament was prepared at Portsmouth; but negotiations were not interrupted. The better to attend to them, and to foreign affairs generally, Lord Stanhope, who had many personal friends in all the courts of Europe, had given up the treasury and the chancellorship of the exchequer to Sunderland and Aislabic. Joseph Addison, that exquisite writer, had long before proved himself to be no orator, and he had since shown, as joint secretary of state with Sunderland, that he was no man of business. He retired at this time upon a pension of 1500*l.* a-year, and he died about fifteen months after at Holland House. The loss of Addison was probably little felt by his party; but they mourned over the sudden and sullen resignation of the lord chancellor Cowper, which occurred this year. Parker, chief justice of the King's Bench, and afterwards Earl of Macclesfield, got the great seal. Shrewsbury, who had played so many parts, but who on the whole had done infinite good to the cause of the Revolution of 1688, and to the Whigs, died early in the year. Stanhope corresponded with the French regent and Dubois; with Prince Eugene and the emperor; and with all the leading statesmen at Vienna, Madrid, and the Hague. A man so proud as he, must have been irritated by the arrogant tone of Alberoni, who, in reply to his public dispatches and private letters, spoke as if he had raised Spain to her old pre-eminence, and rendered her capable of imposing her will upon the rest of Europe. The cardinal also spoke most disrespectfully of the English court and its intentions; and, though he was preparing new fleets and armies himself, he protested loudly against the armament preparing at Portsmouth. The Spanish armament, actually ready, was described by Spaniards as grander and more formidable than any that had ever been equipped by Spain, even in the days of the Emperor Charles V., Philip II., and the grand Armada. Twenty-nine enormous ships of the line and a host of transports had taken on board thirty-five thousand disciplined troops, one hundred pieces of heavy artillery, forty mortars, and a vast supply of ammunition and stores of all kinds. The command was given to Castañeta, who had been a ship-builder, and to General the Marquess Lede, who had taken Sardinia the preceding summer. The fleet was equipped at Cadiz, but whither it was to go seemed a mystery to all. It is said, indeed, that the Spaniards knew as little of its real destination as did the English; and that the cardinal intrusted his secrets and his schemes to no living soul except Patiño, an ex-Jesuit. The British government, however, was not unprepared, and on the 4th of June the armament at Portsmouth sailed for the Mediterranean, under the command of Sir George Byng, who had twenty-one sail of the line, and peremptory orders to attack the Spanish fleet wherever he should find it, if it were engaged in any hostile enterprise against Sicily or Naples, or any other territories belonging to the emperor in Italy. Byng on his arrival off Cadiz transmitted a copy of his instructions to Alberoni. The cardinal tore the paper, threw it on the ground in a paroxysm of rage, and returned for answer that Byng might execute the orders he had received, if he could. The English fleet entered the Straits of Gibraltar, sailed up the Mediterranean, and came to anchor in the bay of Naples, where Byng apparently expected to find the Spanish armament, or a part of it. There was, however, not a single Spaniard there; but the Austrian viceroy of Naples, who received him with exceeding joy,* had to inform Byng that they had landed in Sicily and were reducing Messina to extremity.

In the mean time the court of Vienna had gratified King George with sundry assurances as to Bremen and Verden; had proposed a closer union of interests; and the famous Quadruple Alliance had been concluded between the courts of Vienna, Paris, the Hague, and London. By this treaty, which was concluded in July, though not finally signed till August, it was agreed that mutual renunciations should be made; that the Infant Don Carlos should have the reversion of Parma and Tuscany; that the emperor should have the island of Sicily instead of Sardinia, which had been taken from him by the Spaniards; and that Victor Amadeus of Savoy, who actually held Sicily by virtue of the treaty of Utrecht, should have the island of Sardinia, from which the Spaniards were to be expelled at all costs. As Sardinia, though more convenient for the Savoyard than Sicily, being situated nearer to his continental dominions, was inferior in size, and far inferior in wealth and population, to the island of which he was to be deprived, Victor Amadeus was to be compensated by the emperor's acknowledgment of the claims of the House of Savoy to the Spanish succession, in case of the failure of Philip's issue—for, upon paper, the emperor now waived his own claims. King Philip was to be allowed three months to accede, and the same indulgence was extended to the Savoyard; but if at the end of that time they rejected the quadruple alliance, then the emperor, France, England, and Holland, were to employ their whole force against them. Lord Stanhope went in person to Madrid, in the hope of subduing the stubbornness of Alberoni, by offering, if necessary, to yield the invaluable fortress of Gibraltar, which Stanhope, strange to say, considered as a place "of no great consequence."† But the Spanish armament had sailed from Barcelona with sealed orders, before Stanhope arrived in Spain; and the cardinal, while his lordship was on his road to Madrid, received intelligence that the Marquess Lede had landed his army in the bay of Solanto, driven the Piedmontese viceroy before him, and made a triumphant entrance into Palermo the Sicilian capital. The cardinal, who was much elated by this intelligence, and who probably believed that the allies would not proceed to extremities if he limited his attack to Sicily, which did not as yet belong to the emperor, but to the Savoyard, who was and must be averse to the Quadruple Alliance, comported himself like another Ximenes or Richelieu. He threatened to drive Nancreé, the French ambassador, from Madrid, at a quarter of an hour's notice. "If Stanhope," he said, "comes here thinking to lay down the law, he will find himself ill received. I have sent him a passport, as he requested, and I will hear the proposals he brings. But it will be impossible for me to give them the slightest attention unless they differ totally from his former project. . . . The king, my master, will wage eternal war rather than submit to this infamous project; and he will wreak his vengeance upon those who presume to threaten him with it."‡ Stanhope was not the sort of ambassador that could be insulted with impunity; yet when he reached Madrid he found the little cardinal more resolute than ever, as the news from Sicily, where the Savoyard had hardly any troops, continued to be good. He, however, pretended that he entertained a wonderful respect and even a tender friendship for the spirited Englishman, and told him that it was his master Philip and not he that urged on this rupture—that Philip's implacable animosity against the French regent

* The arrival of Byng presented a magnificent spectacle. "The fleet sailing with a gentle gale into the Bay of Naples, consisting of twenty-one sail of the line of battle, most of them great ships, and three of them bearing flags, afforded such a spectacle as had never been seen in those parts before. The whole city was in a tumult of joy and exultation. The shore was crowded with multitudes of coaches and people; and such an infinite number of boats came off, some with provisions and refreshments, others out of curiosity and admiration, that the sea between the fleet at anchor and the shore was literally covered. . . . The admiral, going ashore, attended by the flag-officers and captains in their boats, was saluted, at his landing, by all the cannon round the city and castles, and was carried to the Duke de Mantalona's palace, pleasantly situated by the seaside, which had been prepared for his reception during his stay at Naples. From thence he was conducted to court through an infinite throng of people, with the greatest acclamations of joy, and all the honours and ceremonies paid to a viceroy."—An Account of the Expedition of the British Fleet to Sicily, in the years 1718, 19, and 20, under the command of Sir George Byng, Bart., collected from the Admiral's MSS.

and the emperor was the cause of all. Alberoni also declared that he wished for no conquests in Italy, but only to prevent the emperor from rendering Italy the slave of Germany; that for himself he was convinced the proper course for Spain to pursue was, to rest satisfied with her own continental territory and her colonies in the two Indies, and to attend to the improvement of her internal administration, instead of weakening herself, as in former times, by occupying or fighting for scattered territories in Europe. At parting with Stanhope he even affected to shed tears; but Stanhope's mission was nevertheless a complete failure; and it now remained for Byng's cannons to do what his lordship's rhetoric had not been able to accomplish.

The English admiral, by the advice of Count Daun, the imperial viceroy, sailed away from Naples; but, before he could reach Messina, that weakly defended city fell into the hands of the Spaniards. The strong citadel, however, held out; and it was resolved to make every possible effort to relieve the brave garrison in it. To this end, while Byng proceeded by sea, Daun sent an army of Austrians and Neapolitans through Calabria to encamp at Reggio, almost immediately opposite to Messina, and separated from it by the narrow strait.* On the 9th of August Byng entered the strait and came in sight of the city of Messina, whither he dispatched his own flag-captain with a message to the Spanish General Lede. Byng proposed a suspension of arms in Sicily for two months, in order that the powers of Europe, who were still negotiating (Stanhope, at the time, had not reached Madrid), might have time to concert measures for settling all differences and restoring a lasting peace; intimating at the same time that, if this humane proposal should be rejected, he must use all his force to prevent further attempts to disturb the dominions which the king, his master, had undertaken to defend. The commander of the Spanish army answered that it would be an inexpressible joy to him personally to contribute to so laudable an end as peace, but, as he had no powers to treat, he could not agree to any suspension of arms, whatever proof the courage of his fleet and soldiers might be put to, but must follow his orders, which directed him to seize all Sicily for his master the King of Spain. Byng then got his ships in fighting order. He had received intelligence that the Spanish fleet had sailed from the roadstead of Paradiso, close by Messina, the day before his arrival off the strait; and this made him conclude that they had retired to Malta to seek shelter under the tremendous batteries of the Knights of St. John. Byng therefore sailed right into the Straits of Messina, in order to encourage and support the besieged citadel; and, if practicable, to land 2000 German foot which he had brought with him from Naples; but as he turned the point of Faro, towards Messina, he saw before him, in mid-channel, two scouts of the Spanish fleet; and nearly at the same moment he was boarded by a felucca from the Calabrian shore, and informed that the Calabrians from the hills behind Scylla and Reggio saw the whole Spanish fleet lying by, at the other end of the strait, in the direction of Taormina. In an instant Byng altered his design, and, sending away General Wetzell with the German infantry to Reggio under the convoy of two men-of-war, he stood right through the strait with his whole fleet. The day was beautiful; the rapid current of that narrow sea passage, and the cool strong current of air which always accompanies it, were in his favour; and he gilded through, between the high mountains of Calabria and Sicily, with all sails set and flags flying. On either shore—on the hills on either side—on every prominent point in that truly magical scene, Calabrians and Sicilians gathered in crowds, even as their ancestors had done five centuries before, when Richard Cœur de Lion first led the fleet of England through that channel. The two Spanish scouts fled before the English towards their own fleet; and before noon Byng had a fair sight of twenty-seven sail of the line, with fire-ships, bombs, ketches, and seven galleys, drawn up in line of battle, with store-ships and provision-ships between them and the shore. Castañeta, however, did not choose to keep his position; he slipped into the current, hoisted every sail, and “stood away large.” Byng followed closely all the rest of that day; but when they got beyond the influence of the current of the strait their progress was slow; and the wind went down in a dead summer calm, which allowed the Spaniards to make use of their seven galleys and a host of row-boats in towing. The calm lasted during the whole night, but in the morning the regular and unfailling vento da terra sprung up, and carried Byng down to Cape Passaro, near to which he found the Spanish rear-admiral, De Mari, with six ships of the line and all the galleys, fire-ships, bombs, and store-ships, separated from the main body, and standing in for the Sicilian shore. Byng instantly detached Captain Walton of the Canterbury, with five more ships, to look after De Mari, while he himself, with the rest of the English fleet, stood after Castañeta, who was farther to sea, in the broad channel between Cape Passaro and Malta. Captain Falkingham in the Orford, 70-gun ship, and Captain Nicholas Haddock in the Grafton, another 70, came up first with Castañeta's main body at about ten o'clock in the morning. The Spaniards began the fire with their stern-chase guns; but Falkingham soon came to closer shots, and attacked and took the Santa Rosa of 64 guns. Captain Matthews, in the Kent, with less than a broadside, made the San Carlos strike; and the Prince of Asturias, a large 74, was crippled by Captain Haddock, who left her to be taken by the Breda, and stretched a-head after another Spaniard, which had kept firing on his starboard bow during his engagement with the Prince of Asturias. At about one o'clock Captain

Matthews, in the Kent, came up with and engaged St. Philip the Royal, the admiral's ship: two heavy Spaniards rallied on their admiral's quarter, and fired into the Kent: Captain Masters, in the Superb, a 60-gun ship, bore up to the rescue of the Kent: upon this, Castañeta's ship and the two Spaniards that had stood by him hauled off, and made a running fight until about three o'clock in the afternoon. But then the Kent bore right in, crossed under Castañeta's stern, gave him a broadside, and fell to leeward; and the Superb, a minute or two after, making to lay the Spanish admiral aboard, fell upon his weather-quarter. Castañeta shifted his helm; but, the Kent ranging up under his lee-quarter, he thought himself obliged to strike, and lowered his flag accordingly. In the mean time the English admiral, in the Barfleur, had engaged the Spanish rear-admiral, Guevara, who, after giving him a broadside, clapped upon a wind, and stood in for land, with Byng after him. The English admiral thus got away from the main body of his own fleet, to which he could not return till two hours after sunset: he had no success in his pursuit of Guevara; but his captains in the main had been more successful—the Essex having taken the Juno of 36 guns; the Montague and Rupert, the Volante of 44 guns; and the Dorsetshire, Rear-admiral Delaval's ship, the Isabella of 60 guns. The English ships had received but little damage. The Grafton, the best sailer in the fleet, suffered most, her brave captain (Nicholas Haddock) having always pursued the headmost, engaging several of the enemy one after the other, and leaving the ships he had disabled or damaged to be taken by those that followed him, while he made way after the best sailing Spaniards that were attempting to escape. This action, which was chiefly decided off Cape Passaro, at about six leagues from the Sicilian shore, was fought on the 11th of August. Five days after, Captain Walton, who had been detached after De Mari and the Spanish galleys and the six ships of the line, wrote this laconic and often-quoted dispatch to Byng:—"Sir, we have taken and destroyed all the Spanish ships and vessels which were upon the coast, the number as per margin." And Walton's margin was uncommonly well filled, for he had taken De Mari in a 60-gun ship, and had captured besides one 54, one 40, and one 24, with a bomb, and a ship laden with arms; and he had burnt and destroyed four men-of-war—one of 54 guns, two of 40, and one of 30 guns, together with a large fire-ship and a bomb; and, having done all this, he had gone quietly into the ancient port of Syracuse. The total loss sustained by the Spaniards, including ships that were so badly treated as to sink at sea, and two that were afterwards taken, amounted to seventeen ships. Alberoni's fleet, in fact, was all but annihilated at one blow; and the short-lived pride of the Spaniards was succeeded by shame and despondency.* On the other side, Byng, rejoining in his victory, dispatched his eldest son to England with an account of the affair; and called upon the Sicilians to rise against the Spanish army on shore, and upon the allies to make a great effort to finish the war in that quarter at once. His son, who travelled overland from Naples to Hampton Court in fifteen days, was most graciously received by his majesty, who made him a handsome present, and sent him back with plenipotentiary powers to his father to negotiate with the several princes and states of Italy as there should be occasion. Mr. Byng was also the bearer of a royal grant to the officers and seamen of all the prizes they had taken from the Spaniards. This reward was merited by their services and the reasonable check they had given to the growing navy of Spain. That country had certainly vast designs in view; and the armament they had fitted out was suitable to the execution of a great undertaking. "Never," says a contemporary, "had any nation, in so short a time, sent to sea an armament so numerous, so well appointed, and so provided with all necessaries for a distant expedition: the least implement was not forgotten. All which was owing to the indefatigable care of Don Jose Patiño (the ex-Jesuit), a man of great abilities, who went in the expedition, and had the absolute direction and management of the whole enterprise, except the military command. The world was amazed to see Spain exerting a vigour she had not shown for above a century past. Some of the principal prisoners, and Castañeta himself, assured Admiral Byng that they intended the summer following to have at sea fifty sail of the line of battle." Cardinal Alberoni felt that this defeat off Cape Passaro must, if known in Spain, spread discouragement throughout the whole nation, and destroy

Spaniards in the battle of Passaro:—"Upon notice of the approach of the English squadron they held a consultation, in which the question was not whether they should fight or retreat, but in what station they should expect them,—whether go out from Messina to meet them, or pass through the Faro to the southward, and, lying by in order of battle, receive them there;—which latter opinion prevailed. But, when the admiral came up near to them, they soon abandoned their order of battle, and falling into confusion and uncertainty whether to resist or fly, by doing neither they became an easy prey, and the English might be rather said to have made a seizure than to have gotten a victory. There was, indeed, some disproportion in the strength of the two fleets, a list of both which is in the Appendix."—[According to this Appendix the English had 8895 men and 1400 guns in twenty-one ships; the Spaniards 8830 men and 1284 guns in twenty-nine ships; but, then, the Spaniards had the seven galleys, which were of great use in battle, especially in calm weather.]—"But the inequality was not such as deterred the Spaniards from a resolution of fighting, though it was but ill supported afterwards in the execution. But this justice is due to the admiral Castañeta, and to Rear-Admiral Charon, that they made as good a defence with their own ships as could be expected, and the former was wounded in both legs. It was reported that, at a consultation of the Spanish admirals, Rear-Admiral Cammock gave his opinion that they should remain at anchor in the road of Paraiso, ranging their ships in a line of battle, with their broadsides to the sea; which measure would certainly have given the English admiral infinite trouble to attack them; for the coast is so bold that the biggest ships could ride with a cable ashore, and farther out the currents are so various and rapid, that it would have been hardly practicable to get up to them, but impossible to anchor or lie by them in order of battle; besides, they lay so near the shore, and could have received such assistance of soldiers from the army to man and defend them, and the annoyance the Spaniards might have given from the several batteries they could have planted along the shore would have been such, that the only way of attacking the ships seemed to be by boarding and grappling with them at once, to prevent being cast off by the currents; which would have been a very hazardous undertaking, wherein the Spaniards would have had many advantages, and the English admiral have run the chance of destroying his fleet, or, by gaining a victory, if he succeeded, very dear."

* The author of "The Account of the Expedition of the British Fleet to Sicily" comments like a sailor upon the conduct of the

his ministry; and, therefore, he had recourse to the absurd expedient of publishing an edict by beat of drum, in the streets of Madrid, prohibiting all discourse about the disaster of the fleet. He wrote to Monteleone, who was still ambassador at the court of St. James's, complaining loudly of what he called the breach of faith of the English in attacking his fleet before they declared war, and commanding him to quit England immediately. The cardinal also wrote to Secretary Craggs; and both these letters were made public in London, in the view of exciting a ferment against the cabinet, and giving to the sea-victory an unfair and dishonourable character. At the same time he seized all the British goods and vessels in the ports of Spain, imprisoned or dismissed all the British consuls, and gave letters of marque to privateers. In some respects the battle off Cape Passaro is a parallel to the modern affair at Navarino. Admiral Byng not only had no declaration of war, but he also pretended that his destruction of the Spanish fleet was not to be interpreted into such a declaration. He represented to the Marquess Lede that the Spaniards had begun the battle by firing first upon his ships; and that this accident ought not to be looked upon as a rupture between the two nations. Byng's instructions, however, seem to have been positive; and, fortunately for him, there happened no ministerial changes at home to tarnish his laurels and designate his victory an untoward event. Lord Stanhope, who had left Madrid before the news of the battle was received there, wrote to the admiral from Bayonne, on the 2nd of September, recommending the very course which Byng had already taken. "Nothing," says his lordship, "has passed at Madrid which should divert you from pursuing the instructions you have. . . . If you should have an opportunity of attacking the Spanish fleet, I am persuaded you will not let such an occasion slip; and I perfectly agree in opinion with what is recommended to you by Mr. Secretary Craggs, that the first blow you give should, if possible, be decisive." This was sufficiently plain, and the person who thus wrote was, in effect, prime minister of England.

Coupled with the instruction to destroy the Spanish fleet, Byng had orders to make good, if possible, such a footing in Sicily as might enable England and her allies to land an army there; and that brave and skilful officer did his best to save the citadel and recover the town of Messina. On the 23rd of August he sailed from Syracuse; and on the 26th he arrived at Reggio, where he found General Wetzell with the Austrian and Neapolitan army. Wetzell proposed throwing troops across the strait into the citadel of Messina, if the English fleet would remain in that water to co-operate. Authorised by his instructions, Byng remained. The court of Turin for some time knew neither how to accept nor how to decline the Quadruple alliance: at the first landing of the Spaniards in their new dominion, the Savoyards, unable to support the struggle, solicited the emperor for his assistance, and a convention had been made between Count Daun, the viceroy of Naples, the Count de Borgo, resident of Savoy, and the Count Maffei, the Duke of Savoy's viceroy of Sicily: but the success of the British fleet raised such a confidence in the Savoyards, that the resident endeavoured to elude this convention, the necessity of which he thought no longer existed. De Borgo thought that he should reap all the benefits of the victory off Cape Passaro without tying himself to the allies; and he pretended want of powers—a reluctance to treat without an equivalent—a doubt whether he ought to admit the troops of the emperor into Messina or any other Sicilian fortress: and he alleged that he must have at least time to lay the matter before the cabinet at Turin. Byng heard him, and then acted like a good diplomatist, representing to the court "the unfairness of such a proceeding, and how contrary it was to what he himself had agreed to in their conference together the day before upon that subject:—that such a disagreement, at a time that the citadel was so vigorously attacked by the enemy, might be a means of their taking it, which the reputation of the English fleet would not suffer him to be an idle spectator of; and, therefore, if he was resolved to stay till he had instructions from the court of Turin, he (Byng) should likewise send to his court for further orders; and, in the mean time, would retire from the island to some other place to refresh his men and refit his ships, till he should receive new directions from England." This had its proper effect, and Maffei, the viceroy of Sicily, seeing that he would not be allowed to temporise, gave immediate orders for carrying the convention into execution, and for admitting German troops into the citadel of Messina. General Wetzell, however, had not yet received all his troops from Naples; and when they came the greater part of them were worth very little. Byng did what service he could, in throwing reinforcements and provisions into the citadel, and in molesting the Spaniards in their siege of it. The Spaniards, in fact, were in the curious position of being at once besiegers and besieged: but Lede was no common officer, and the Neapolitans, Austrians, and Savoyards could not or would not act with good concert against him; and he not only kept the town of Messina, but pushed on the siege with so much vigour, that the Savoyard governors surrendered it by capitulation on the 29th of September, to the great surprise and mortification of the Imperialists. Byng, equally dissatisfied, sailed over to Malta, where Rear-Admiral Cammock was lying with three Spanish ships of the line, and as many frigates, which had escaped from the battle: he made all the haste he could, as the Spaniards had seized a rich English merchant-ship homeward bound from Turkey, and three or four other vessels. But Cammock had sailed before he could reach Malta; he, however, recovered the Turkey ship, liberated some Sicilian galleys, and read the grand master of the Knights of St. John a severe lesson for his partiality to the Spaniards, his breaches of neutrality, and his ill usage of such of the Sicilians as adhered to the allies. He told those military monks that, if they continued this course, and made their harbour a lurking-place for the enemies of the allies, he would fight his way into their port and burn every ship he found in it. The grand master made apologies and promises; and then the admiral returned to Naples, where he received a most gracious letter from the emperor, written with his own hand, thanking him for his valour, conduct, and zeal in the common cause: this imperial letter was accompanied with a portrait set round with diamonds. At the end of the year's campaign the Spaniards were masters of all Sicily except Syracuse, Trapani, and Melazzo, in which three places the Duke of Savoy had considerable garrisons, and which he scrupled to give up to the allies without an equivalent. The Spanish army was numerous and well appointed; and the affections of the Sicilians seemed rather to incline to their old masters than to the Savoyards or Germans. The Quadruple alliance had given the island to the emperor; but it was clear to everybody that the emperor would never get possession of it except by means of the moral superiority of England.* Victor Amadeus, who had been again trimming, and again listening to the cajoling voice of Alberoni, saw that in no case the island could be kept by him or would be left to him; and at last he acceded to the Quadruple alliance, and consented to put the places he held into the hands of the emperor's troops.

On the 11th of December Charles XII. was killed before the "petty fortress" of Fredericks-hal, in Norway; and his death put an end to Alberoni's northern intrigues and to the sundry fears or misgivings in relation to that quarter which had agitated the mind of George I. and his cabinet. A short time before, the Duke of Ormond had been in Russia as plenipotentiary of the Pretender; negotiations between Charles and Peter had been opened, and it had been agreed between those rivals that there should henceforward be peace and a unity of purpose between them; that the czar should retain Livonia, Ingria, and other Swedish territories; that his Swedish majesty should conquer and keep Norway, and also Bremen and Verden; and that both should co-operate for the restoration of King Stanislaus in Poland, and of the House of Stuart in England. But the musket-ball from the unknown hand that laid the Swedish hero or madman in the grave destroyed all these schemes: Charles's sister, Ulrica, who ascended the throne, had neither the inclination nor the power to remain at war; the whole ministry and the very form of the monarchy were completely changed; and Gortz, who, more than any one, had framed the project against England, was presently executed on a scaffold. But there were in Europe many political adventurers as daring as Gortz; and Alberoni had been diplomatising and intriguing in other countries beside Russia and Sweden. In France there were numerous and increasing discontents against the regent. A part of the nation were incensed at what they called the unnatural alliance between France and England, and a still greater portion inveighed against the terrible profligacy and the immense power of the Abbé Dubois. The Duke of Maine, or rather his imperious duchess, longed for the power and profits of the regency, and entered into plots with the Prince of Cellamare, with the Jesuits and others, who were all abetted and set on by Alberoni and the court of Madrid. After many schemes had been proposed and abandoned, it was resolved to seize the Duke of Orleans while engaged in some of his usual orgies, to shut him up in the Bastille, to convok the States-General, and to proclaim Philip king of Spain regent, with the Duke of Maine for his deputy. The pleasure-loving and dissolute Orleans was warned of these machinations both by friends in England and by friends at Madrid, who could not, however, speak positively as to the real design, the time, or the mode of execution. The regent continued to divert himself as before, and, to all appearance, had no suspicion and no anxiety; but the keen eye of Dubois was watching all the while; and the rash conspirators were soon betrayed—by means, it is said, of a "distinguished procuress" and a young prostitute. Dubois learned that a young Spanish abbé, Don Vicente Portocarrero, and a son of the Marquess of Monteleone, the ambassador in England, were carrying papers and manifestos to Madrid: he gave orders to pursue them, and Portocarrero was arrested at Poitiers with his dispatches. Dubois laid these papers before the regent, who gladly left the management of the business in his hands. Cellamare, the Spanish ambassador, was put under arrest, but not before he had contrived to conceal or destroy his most important papers. There was, however, enough, and more than enough, to prove the designs of the Duke and Duchess of Maine, who, if they had not actually contemplated the death of the regent, seem to have been perfectly indifferent as to the chances of such a catastrophe. The Duke of Orleans was a libertine, a sluggard, a gross sensualist, but he was neither cowardly nor cruel; and he contented himself with relegating the Duke of Maine to Dourlans in Picardy, and sending the duchess to the castle of Dijon in Burgundy. He also, however, exiled from Paris Cardinal Polignac, who had employed his pen in drawing up manifestos and addresses, M. de Pompadour, the Count d'Eu, and several others, who had been engaged chiefly by the Duchess of Maine. Cellamare, the Spanish ambassador, a principal in the plot, was merely escorted to the frontiers; and not a drop of blood was shed in an affair which, under almost any other prince, would have found ample work for the executioner. Nearly at the same moment that the Abbé Dubois was pursuing Portocarrero, Cardinal Alberoni was trying to hunt down the Duke de St. Aignan, the French ambassador at Madrid, who, perceiving that there was a great storm brewing at Paris, and that the cardinal was resolved to detain him in Spain, set out clandestinely without passport or leave-taking. Alberoni, as much enraged as when the old grandee caned him, gave fiery hot orders to pursue and arrest the Frenchman; but St. Aignan knew the man he had to deal with, got quietly out of his carriage near Pamplona, left a footman behind him in the vehicle to pass for an ambassador, and then pushed across the Pyrenees upon a mule. The real ambassador got safely to the French side of the frontiers; but his representative, the valet, was seized and detained. For some days the Spaniards did not discover this little piece of masquerade; but when the cardinal came to learn the trick which had been put upon him he was furious; and, being fully aware that the Regent of France would no longer keep terms with him, he hastened to recal Cellamare, or rather to tell that plotting ambassador, in case he should be obliged to quit France, "first to set fire to all the mines." This letter, which did not arrive till after the discovery of the plot and the seizure of Portocarrero, was intercepted by the French government. Thus proof was added to proof, and all doubt removed as to the intentions of the court of Madrid, and their co-operation or connivance with all the conspirators in France. Instead of attempting a denial which would have been useless, the cardinal, upon being informed that the game was up and the conspirators prisoners, prevailed upon his master King Philip to issue a manifesto, justifying all the measures that had been taken to overthrow the regency of the Duke of Orleans, which was represented as illegal in its origin and atrocious or dishonourable to France in all its proceedings. Hereupon the French regent regularly declared war against Spain, being supported by a similar declaration on the part of England, which was issued nearly at the same moment, or on the 17th of December.

The British parliament had assembled on the preceding 11th of November, and the anomalous position in which the country stood with relation to Spain had given rise to long and violent debates. Lord Stanhope, in the Upper House, justified the course which had been taken, and gave an account of his journey to Madrid, stating that it was high time for Great Britain to check the growth of the naval power of Spain, in order to protect the trade of British subjects, who had been violently oppressed by the Spaniards;* that he thought it an honour to have been amongst those who advised Sir George Byng's instructions, for which he was ready to answer with his head. When it came to the vote, Lord Stanhope and his friends had a majority of 83 to 50. Walpole, in the Commons, exclaimed and declaimed with all imaginable vehemence against the whole Quadruple alliance and everything which had resulted from it. The late measures, he said, were against the law of nations, a breach of solemn treaties—treacherous—unpardonable! and ministers, conscious of having done amiss and of having begun a war with Spain irregularly and unjustifiably, now wanted to screen themselves under a parliamentary sanction. Walpole, however, found himself left in a minority of 155 to 216. And, when the declaration of war fell under discussion, ministers were still more triumphant. Stanhope, who had a greater mind than most of his colleagues, who was from conviction and temperament the friend of religious toleration, and who, moreover, for political purposes, had professed himself the friend of the dissenters, conceived the bold idea of doing away with all religious-political distinctions whatsoever, so as to admit even Roman Catholics their fair share of the privileges of the constitution. He held long conferences with the nonconformists and with his colleague in office, Sunderland, who was equally tolerant, but far from being so sanguine of making toleration the general rule of the government. "It would be difficult enough," said Sunderland, "to repeal the Schism and Occasional Conformity Acts, but any attack upon the Test Act would surely ruin all." Walpole and "the prince's people," as the partisans of the Prince of Wales were called, were resolved to oppose any scheme of the kind, and hoped to overthrow the ministry by a new cry of the church in danger: it was known that most if not all the Whigs in opposition, disregarding some of the foremost and best principles of their party, would join the Tories and high churchmen; and therefore it was resolved by Stanhope and Sunderland to leave the repeal of the Test Act to some more favourable opportunity, advising the

their trade with Spain was almost ruined and lost. They demanded arbitrary and heavy duties from the English factors residing in their ports, from which the treaties expressly exempted them; and, upon refusal of payment, their houses were surrounded by soldiers, their warehouses and chests broken open, and their goods sold at public outcry. The royal officers used them with such injustice and insolence as if they knew they made their profit by doing so. Every post brought complaints to the English minister at Madrid of new grievances and oppressions. The memorials delivered to that court for redress were numberless, without the least regard shown to them. When any transportation of troops was intended, they immediately embargoed all the English merchants' ships in their ports, compelling their masters, with great circumstances of severity, to enter into their service, imprisoning them in common goals if they refused, and obliging them to unload their cargoes, though perishable, and consigned to other markets. They proceeded so far in their unjust treatment, that their cruisers brought into the ports of Spain whatever English merchant-ships they met with in the open sea, though bound to Italy or other distant parts, and compelled them to unload their cargoes and enter their service. Such as were not used by them for transports had their seams taken away to serve in their men-of-war. Rear Admiral Cammock pressed no less than sixty for his own ship; and one of the masters, endeavouring to keep his men, had both his ears cut off.—[We must question these ears.] A story of the kind used to come out as regularly as an ordre-du-jour, whenever we had a quarrel with Spain. This Rear Admiral Cammock was an Irish-

* The cardinal had thrown off the mask too soon; and before the battle off Cape Passaro, and even before Byng's departure from Portsmouth, he had insulted our flag in a way that could be neither overlooked nor pardoned. "It should seem," says the writer of the account of Byng's expedition, "but ill policy in a court intent on such mighty designs to provoke and irritate, without cause, a nation the most capable in the world of thwarting and defeating them. And yet they seemed to make it a studied point to vex and distress the English by all manner of ways in their commerce, inasmuch that dissenters to have patience in the mean time; and on the 13th of December Stanhope brought forward his modified measure in the Lords. It was not called, plainly, an act for the relief of dissenters, but an act for strengthening the Protestant interest. Its real object was to repeal the intolerant Act against Occasional Conformity and the Schism Act, and also such clauses of the Test and Corporation Acts as excluded Protestant dissenters from civil offices. Stanhope laboured to show how rational and advantageous it would be to restore dissenters to their natural rights as English citizens, and to relieve them from the stigma and oppression of those laws which had been made in turbulent times and by unfair means: and he dwelt upon the happy vision of peace, and union, and Christian love, which would or ought to follow the removal of these invidious distinctions. But he soon found that, between latent bigotry and open political manœuvre, his bill, even modified as it was, would be hard to pass. The Duke of Devonshire and the Earl of Nottingham spoke against it, and the Earl of Isla declared that it would be a violation of the treaty of union with Scotland. Even the liberal-minded ex-chancellor, in declaring himself favourable to the repeal of the Schism Act, combated for the continuance of the Test and Corporation Acts, which he chose to call "the main bulwark of our excellent constitution in church and state." But it may be that Cowper, who had resigned, was as anxious as Walpole, who had been turned out, to annoy the cabinet; and that this intention had more to do with the speech than any real love of the two acts. The question was postponed from the 13th to the 18th, when the bench of bishops took up, and supported—almost by themselves—the important debate. Both the archbishops opposed Stanhope's bill. The primate, Doctor Wade, who had formerly passed for a friend to toleration, called occasional conformity a "scandalous practice," and declared that it was needless to repeal the Schism Act, since, through the great lenity of government, it was rarely or never enforced. On the other side Bishops Hoadly, Willis, Kennet, and Gibson supported the bill. Kennet, in the heat of debate, declared that the high-church party in Charles I.'s time "had promoted arbitrary measures and persecutions, until they first brought scandal and contempt upon the clergy, and at last ruin both upon church and state." There was no denying the fact; but the truth was very unpalatable, and got Kennet a very ill name. Bishop Hoadly denounced the acts styled by the primate the bulwarks of the church as acts of real persecution; and declared that, "if the mere pretext of self-preservation, or self-defence, was once admitted as a sufficient ground for passing laws of this nature, all the heathen persecutions against Christians, and all the Popish persecutions against Protestants, would be justifiable; that he trusted the Church of England would never stand in need of such miserable supports; that toleration was not a favour or indulgence, but a natural right; and that the safety of the church would be best secured by a regard to the just and equitable claims of their fellow Christians and fellow citizens; . . . that he feared that the ardent and intemperate zeal which many displayed for the interests of the church was principally incited by a regard to their own interests, and by a secret and fond attachment to the powers, the honours, and the emoluments which appertain to it." The debate was continued on the 19th, when the second reading of the bill was carried in the Lords by a majority of 86 to 68. Influenced by this large minority, or by a fear of what would happen in the Lower House, ministers consented in committee to strike out all the clauses which referred to the Test and Corporation Acts. Thus mutilated, Stanhope's bill was sent down to the Commons, where it was opposed by Walpole and his friends, and where it was passed by a majority of no more than 243 to 202—thirty-four of the thirty-seven Scottish members that were in the House voting with ministers for the bill.

A.D. 1719.—In the month of March a bill, generally attributed to Sunderland, was brought into the Lords,—“to settle and limit the peerage in such a manner that the number of English peers should not be enlarged beyond six of the present number, which, upon failure of issue male, might be supplied by new creations; that, instead of the sixteen elective peers from Scotland, twenty-five should be made hereditary on the part of that kingdom; and that this number, upon failure of heirs male, should be supplied from the other members of the Scotch peerage.” This looked like depriving the crown of its important prerogative of making peers at will; but George, it is said, went into it in order to take vengeance upon his son the Prince of Wales, and to weaken his party; while Sunderland, who had offended the Prince of Wales beyond hope of pardon or reconciliation, was also anxious to restrain the power of that prince when he came to the throne. If George II. should create peers a dozen at a time, as Queen Anne had done, there could be no security as to the principles or votes of the House of Lords, and the obnoxious Sunderland might in such case have cause to fear impeachment and attainder. As Anne's sudden creation, for the avowed purpose of obtaining a Tory majority in the Lords, had been the subject of such vehement and incessant declamation on the part of the Whigs, it was concluded that, with a few exceptions, the Whigs would give all their countenance and support to the present bill; for Sunderland and his colleagues could not have forgotten the repeated asseverations of the Whig party, that the crown ought in future to be deprived of a prerogative in the employment of which Anne and her Jacobite ministry had dishonoured Great Britain and endangered the liberties of Europe. Yet, as soon as the present bill was in the House of Lords, the great Whigs, Cowper and Townshend, joined the Tory Nottingham in reprobatating it as destructive of the very principle of monarchy. It was twice read, indeed, without a division; but, on the day appointed for the third reading, Stanhope stood up to give it its quietus, by observing "that, the bill having made a great noise and raised strange apprehensions, and since the design of it had been so much misrepresented and misunderstood that it was like to meet with great opposition in the other House, he thought it advisable to let the matter lie still till a more proper opportunity." But Sunderland would not so easily relinquish a measure upon which he had set his heart; and from this time to the next session of parliament great efforts were made by him and his party to remove the opposition to this peerage bill. It was a subject that divided some of the most honest of the Whigs, and it interrupted the friendship between Addison and Steele, as the author of the Spectator was for the bill, which he defended in a paper called The Old Whig, and the author of The Tatler was against it, and attacked it in a pamphlet entitled The Plebeian. Walpole also took up the pen and published a pamphlet against the bill; and a vast quantity of ink was shed on either side by less conspicuous writers. Sunderland declared that the peerage bill had originated with the king rather than with the ministers; that the king wished well to the constitution and to the country, and therefore was anxious to limit the future government of his son, who was rash and headstrong, and quite capable of doing mad things. In a long conversation he held with Middleton, the chancellor of Ireland, who had refused to support the bill, Sunderland was so excited that the blood gushed from his nose.* On the 18th of April parliament was prorogued; and early in May the king, accompanied by Stanhope, set off for his continental dominions. In appointing the regency or lords justices that were to attend to affairs in his majesty's absence, no mention was made of the Prince and Princess of Wales, nor were they even deputed to hold levies, that duty, "to the great scandal of the public, and further divulgement of family discord," being assigned to the young princesses.†

As Cardinal Alberoni had utterly failed in France, and as he had lost his mad hero Charles XII., he determined to take up with the Pretender, who had been passing his time pleasantly enough in Italy, residing alternately at Rome and Urbino. He had lately contracted a marriage with the Princess Clementina, grand-daughter of the heroic John Sobieski, King of Poland; but, as that princess was on her way to Italy to join her betrothed, she was arrested by the emperor's orders in the Tyrol, and detained in the emperor's castle of Inspruck. This was base and dishonourable in the emperor who did it, and scarcely less so in the English government that asked it. The Pretender appears to have been apprehensive for his own liberty, as the Austrians had now the complete ascendancy in the Italian peninsula, and as the English fleet was riding victorious off its shores, when he received and accepted the invitation of Alberoni to go into Spain. To delude the Austrians, he pretended to set out for Tuscany and Lombardy, as if he were going to make the whole journey by land; but in reality he lay concealed in the Papal States, while the Earls of Mar and Perth, with a party of his suite, crossed the Apennines and went into the emperor's dominions of Lombardy. The two lords were presently seized and made fast in the castle of Milan; and, as people there had not the felicity of being acquainted with the person and face of the Stuart, it was reported and believed that they had got the Pretender. Lord Stair joyfully announced from Paris to the ministers in London that this was the case; and then, while he was believed to be in an Austrian dungeon at Milan, where many a better man has pined away, the Pretender slipped down to the Pope's little port of Nettuno, near the mouth of the Tiber, and got secretly on board a vessel which carried him safely to the coast of Catalonia. There the fugitive threw off his disguise; and at Madrid he was received most royally as legitimate sovereign of Great Britain and Ireland. The palace of Buen Retiro was allotted for his residence, and he received the visits of Philip and his queen and of all the grandees that had not quarrelled with the cardinal. Before James arrived at Madrid the Duke of Ormond, disguised as a valet, had crossed the Pyrenees, to take the command of a formidable armament which the cardinal had prepared at Cadiz for the purpose of invading England and enthroning the Pretender! The last time Ormond had been in Spain was with an English fleet and army to storm Vigo and bombard Cadiz for Queen Anne! The admiring Jacobites compared him to Coriolanus retiring to the Volsci; but, in sober truth, Ormond was little like the hero of Corioli, and it mattered little where he went. He was to bear the title of captain-general of the king of Spain; and he was provided with a proclamation, to be published at his landing, in the name of Philip, declaring that his most Catholic majesty had sent these forces as auxiliaries to the rightful King James, hoping that Providence would favour so just a cause; but assuring the insurgents that, if they should be unsuccessful, he would give a secure retreat in his own dominions to all that should join; and engaging his royal word, in case they should be driven to expatriation, that he would give in Spain to every sea or land officer the same rank as he enjoyed in Great Britain, and that the common soldiers should be received and treated as though they were his own. This was not badly devised; but the cardinal was embarrassed about the Pretender, who had played his part so miserably in Scotland, and who seemed but little inclined to risk his person again. Madrid and Cadiz were crowded with Scottish and English exiles, who hoped to retrieve the misfortunes of 1715, but who seem to have been divided in opinion as to whether the Pretender should go with them or stay behind till they should make his path easy. But at last it was determined that James should stay in Spain, and that Ormond should have the undivided command. In the mean while the Abbé Dubois had obtained full and precise information as to all these Spanish schemes, and by the command of the regent he had imparted all his discoveries to Stanhope, together with the offer of some French troops. The English government politely declined receiving the French, but they accepted and brought over six battalions of Austrians from the Netherlands and two thousand Dutch. A good squadron of ships was put to sea to secure the Channel; the few English troops were cantoned in the most Jacobite districts in the North and West; both Houses of Parliament, which was then sitting, assured the king of their loyalty and determination to support him to the extent of their lives and fortunes; and a proclamation was issued offering 10,000*l.* for the apprehension of the traitor Ormond, the commander of the Spanish army of invasion. As the Scots had paid rather dearly for their rising in "the fifteen," a resolution had been universally taken not to move in Scotland till England was fairly engaged;* but upon the 16th of April two frigates put into the port of Kintail, in Ross-shire, landed about three hundred Spanish soldiers, a few gentlemen, and some arms, and then instantly left the coast and put out to sea. Among the gentlemen were the Earls Marshal and Seaforth and the Marquess of Tullibardine, who concealed themselves in the country to await the arrival of the Duke of Ormond in England. But Ormond never came: a storm in the Bay of Biscay had driven him back to Spain, and had entirely frustrated Alberoni's expedition. Many of the ships were lost; others were saved by throwing overboard the guns, the stands of arms, the horses and the stores provided for the campaign; and of five ships of the line and twenty transports, and five thousand soldiers, partly Irish, only the two frigates and the three hundred men with the Earl Marshal ever reached the British coast. But if they had all come they would only have come to destruction:

* Lockhart, Memoirs. The Jacobites in Spain had kept their brethren busy in England and Scotland perfectly well informed of their intentions and preparations. "The king's (the Pretender's) affairs for a long time made little or no noise, but, on the breaking out of the war with Spain, people began to hope that something in his favour would cast up; and, whilst we were fed with these hopes in very general terms with letters from abroad, all of a sudden we received the joyful news of the King of Spain's having declared for our king. What correspondence King Philip had in England I cannot particularly tell, but sure I am there was not the least intimation of such a design to any in Scotland, until a very little before it was public over all Europe. About which time the Earl of Wigton writ a letter to me from his country-house, desiring me to meet him without fail next day exactly at four in the afternoon, at a certain private place in Edinburgh; and, I having accordingly kept the tryst, his lordship introduced me to Mr. Francis Kennedy; this gentleman was sent express to acquaint the king's friends of the attempt that was to be made by Spain on Britain, and he was directed to go first to my Lord Wigton, who thought fit to call me to be present at the conference. Mr. Kennedy produced a small piece of parchment, writ and signed by the Duke of Ormond, desiring entire credit might be given to the bearer thereof; and then he told us that the duke was actually embarked with a considerable body of Spanish troops, designing to land them in England."—Lockhart Papers.

Ormond's heart had completely failed him before he began the voyage, and he had actually written to Alberoni to request the postponement or the relinquishment of the expedition, as he knew its design was no longer a secret to France and England, and as he could not, he said, be so imprudent as to propose to attack England with five thousand men, unless by surprise.* While the Earl Marshal and the Marquess of Tullibardine lay close at Kintail, Lord Seaforth, in disguise, ventured up the country to confer with some of the Highland clans; and some hard-drinking Jacobite lords saw in their cups Ormond's fleet, which had gone to the bottom of the Bay of Biscay, or back to the Spanish ports, riding triumphantly on the coast of Scotland: but sleep and daylight dissipated this vision; and, as some of the Highlanders had begun to muster, and had taken one or two insignificant places, the government, which at first had thought that the two Spanish frigates had carried back in them all the persons and things they had brought, became aware that there was an enemy in the land, and that some of the Jacobite lords had not gone back to Spain: Upon this discovery, some English ships of war were brought down to the coast, and General Wightman, with about a thousand men, moved from Inverness in quest of the insurgents, whom he soon found advantageously posted at Glenshiel. They were estimated at two thousand men; but Wightman, relying on the discipline of his troops, fell upon them on the evening of the 10th of June, the Pretender's birthday, and gave them a complete defeat. The light-footed Highlanders dispersed and ran home to their mountains; the three hundred Spaniards, who kept together, were obliged to surrender at discretion. The Earl Marshal, Seaforth, and Tullibardine were fortunate enough to escape with their clans from the field of battle, and they, with other persons of note, remained lurking in the Highlands till ships were provided to carry them back to Spain. While the Jacobites of Edinburgh were treating the Spanish prisoners, who were sent to the castle there, with rare civility and liberality, the victorious Wightman made a tour through all the difficult passes of Lord Seaforth's country, "to terrify the rebels by burning the houses of the guilty, and preserving those of the honest."† The determined Jacobite that relates most circumstantially all these events confesses that the expedition was miserably managed, and that few really joined it. "I do not pretend," he says, "to give an account of my Lord Marshal's proceedings; one thing is sure, that he and Tullibardine were soon at variance about the command; and it seemed very odd that such matters were not adjusted before their embarkation. The Highlanders, being formerly heartily bit, resolved not to move till they heard of Ormond's being landed, so that few, except Seaforth's clan, joined this little army, which, however, kept together till General Wightman marched against them." This busy plotter was, notwithstanding, of opinion that the Pretender had still a good chance in Scotland if he and his advisers would only make a proper use of their opportunities and advantages. Saying nothing of the undisputed Jacobitism of the Highlanders, Lockhart endeavoured to show, in a memorial which he sent to the Earl Marshal during his short stay in the country, that the Lowlanders, at least in good part, were equally averse to the House of Hanover. "The king's friends," said he, "are far from being diminished on the south side of Forth, and are abundantly willing to venture all in his service; but they have been kept so much under these three or four years bypast, and so little expected what has of late occurred, that most of them want horses and arms, and it will be no easy matter to procure them; and, as they are surrounded with spies and enemies, and cannot propose to make such a body as can resist the force that will be sent against them if they take to the fields, it is not to be desired or expected they should rise in arms until there be such a number of forces near them as can make a stand, and to which they may resort. Though the king does not want some friends in the western shires, yet the gross of the people, both gentry and commons, are either Presbyterians favourably disposed towards the present government, or pretty indifferent as to all governments whatsoever; but, as the far greatest part of both have a hearty aversion to the Union, if once they were thoroughly convinced that the king's prosperity would terminate in the dissolution thereof, there is reason to believe a great many of the first would be converted, at least so far as to be neutral, and most of the others declare for him." He proposed in this paper that the Earl Marshal should publish a manifesto, in which, after enumerating the many grievances which had attended the Union, such as the decay of trade, the violation of the liberties and the civil rights of the Scots, &c., he should declare that it was King James's intention to restore them to their ancient and independent state—that it was for this object that he and the lords and gentlemen with him were again up in arms. And Lockhart further recommended that, in this manifesto, full assurances should be given as to the early meeting of a Scottish parliament, and that the several electors in the Scottish shires and burghs should be earnestly recommended "to have their thoughts on persons fit to be appointed their representatives." "At present," adds Lockhart, "there is none on the south of Forth to whom King James's friends can repair for intelligence, or to have instructions and directions as to their conduct and measures; and hence it is that there is no correspondence nor concert amongst them." To make up this deficiency, he proposed that the Earl Marshal should appoint a small number of persons to meet together and concert the general measures; and, as the earl could not be supposed to be so well acquainted with the present state of parties as he (Lockhart) was, he thought "it would not be amiss to mention to him the Earls of Eglintoun and Wigtoun, the Lord Balmerino, the Bishop of Edinburgh, and Mr. John Paterson, as persons that would be faithful to the king and agreeable to his friends." And when all was over, Lockhart pretended that, if his advice had only been followed, and if the king's friends had only acted with concert, "this Spanish affair" would have had a very different result.*

Cardinal Alberoni, seeing that this card had failed him, was anxious to get the Pretender back to Rome as soon as possible, for his stay at Madrid was rather costly, and it might also tend to embarrass negotiations if the cardinal should be obliged to lay down the sword and trust to diplomacy. Fortunately for him there arrived news that the captive bride, the Princess Clementina Sobieski, had escaped disguised as a servant-maid from Inspruck, and had reached in safety the pope's city of Bologna: and upon this news the Stuart took leave of the cardinal and Spanish court, and returned to Italy to complete his marriage.

As France had made a regular declaration of war against Spain, it was necessary for the regent to exert himself, and, if he did no more, to secure his frontier on the side of the Pyrenees. He had, in effect, raised an army of 30,000 men to serve in that quarter; and, upon the refusal of old Marshal Villars, he had given the command of it to the Duke of Berwick, the half-brother of the Pretender, the victor of Almanza, the real hero, on the Bourbon side, of the war of the succession in Spain, and then the highly-prized and apparently most devoted servant of his majesty King Philip. Berwick, who owed his fortune to his sword, and whose fortune was entirely in France, in all probability fought like a mercenary Swiss, and would have fought against his half-brother himself if necessary: but his admirers and apologists give sundry reasons for the anomalous position into which he now threw himself. "The Marshal of Berwick was pitched upon to command the army from the extraordinary confidence placed in him on every account by the regent; yet there was not a Frenchman more affected with this breach, however just and necessary on the part of France. Beside the reasons which he had in common with every Frenchman, there were others peculiar to himself: he had been twice the instrument of preserving Spain; and the favours he had received from Philip V. attached him more immediately to that prince. On the other hand, he had obligations to the regent, who was personally attacked in this war; but all these were inferior considerations with the Marshal of Berwick, and were made subservient to the great line of duty. He thought himself bound indispensably, as governor of Guienne, upon the frontiers of Spain, to execute, without remonstrance, the orders he received for invading that kingdom. A refusal to serve would have been a breach of an immediate duty, from which he had, at that time, no right to excuse himself: it would have been a dangerous example, and might have even admitted a construction of criminality, if it had been followed by others: he obeyed, therefore, because it was his duty to obey."*

While Berwick was lying on the frontier, king Philip put himself at the head of a very indifferent Spanish army—the best of his forces were in Sicily and Sardinia—and advanced to the Pyrenees. Philip was no soldier; he was not even gifted with the very common attribute of personal courage; but he fondly fancied that there would be no fighting, that the French army under Berwick would desert, and join him as their rightful regent, and the only surviving grandson of Louis XIV: and for this purpose he had come to the army with his queen, his young son, his prime minister the cardinal, and a good stock of manifestos and proclamations to the French soldiery. But these proclamations, when dispersed in Berwick's camp, failed of their effect; and instead of going over to Philip, the French troops began to take his towns and castles almost under his eye. No part of Spain had displayed such activity and energy in seconding the great maritime schemes of the cardinal as the industrious Biscayan provinces. At every port on that coast ships had been built, or were in process of building. All this had been watched with a jealous eye by the French as well as by the English, and an important part of Berwick's instructions was that he should destroy these dock-yards and arsenals. Colonel William Stanhope, who had been sent on a mission to Berwick's army, accompanied a detachment of it to Port Passages, serving as a volunteer, and had the satisfaction of seeing one new ship of 70 guns, two of 60 guns, and some other vessels recently built, together with a vast quantity of timber and naval stores, burnt to ashes. The French then invested Fuenterrabia, which surrendered on the 18th of June. An English squadron was co-operating on the coast; and now it took on board about a thousand French soldiers, and sailed for Santona, where three fine new ships of the line were on the stocks, and where materials were collected for the building of seven more. The French soldiers and the English sailors landed together, and in a few hours everything was destroyed. The loss of the Spaniards in money alone was estimated at millions of dollars; but the mortal loss and depression was still more important. Berwick carried the strong town of St. Sebastian on the 2nd of August, and compelled the citadel to surrender on the 17th of the same month. Philip in the mean while had taken the road to Madrid, helpless and hopeless.

* An abridged continuation of the Memoirs, taken from the letters of the Duke of Berwick, and principally from his correspondence with the French ministry, appended to Berwick's autobiographical Memoirs.

* Lockhart Papers.

The whole of Guipuscoa was occupied or overrun; and the states of that province, incensed by innovations on their ancient laws and usages, and by arbitrary attempts made by Alberoni to assimilate the Biscayan provinces with the rest of Spain, offered to acknowledge the dominion of the French upon condition of security to their ancient rights and liberties.* In another direction the French continued their conquests without interruption; they entered Catalonia, took several forts, and made an attempt upon Rosas. Nor was the British fleet idle in other quarters; in the end of September a strong squadron with 4,000 troops on board, commanded by Lord Cobham, appeared off Corunna, to take vengeance on that port, from which Ormond had sailed with his unfortunate expedition. Corunna, however, seemed too well defended, and Cobham ran along the coast to Vigo, where many of Ormond's stores still remained. The British troops landed at three miles from the town, and encountered no enemy except a body of peasants who fired from the hills without coming near enough to hit or to be hit. The garrison of Vigo spiked their guns in the town and retired into the citadel, where they were compelled to surrender by the middle of October. Cobham found 43 pieces of ordnance, 8,000 muskets, 2,000 barrels of powder, and seven sloops, which were all seized and carried off. The neighbouring towns and little sea-ports were also sacked by the troops, who "abused themselves much with wine," and then this "important and secret expedition," as it had been called, returned to England. As so much had been said about it, the cardinal seems to have expected that it was really destined to occupy whole provinces or kingdoms! In Sicily, for which everything had been sacrificed, the course of the war was equally unfavourable to Spain, and the services of the British navy much more conspicuous. The Duke of Savoy, seeing that the Spaniards on the one hand were taking everything from him in Sicily, and that the emperor on the other, by virtue of the Quadruple Alliance was demanding the two or three towns he still held there, whilst the island of Sardinia, allotted to Savoy by the same treaty, remained in the hands of the Spaniards, began to suspect that, unless he made his bargain now, the imperialists would get and keep possession of Sicily, and then, with the rest of the allies, leave him to get Sardinia as he could. And he proposed, in the course of the preceding autumn, that, while operations were going on in Sicily for the emperor, others should be commenced in Sardinia for himself. After some delay, a convention was signed at Vienna, on the 29th of December (1718), between his imperial majesty and Savoy, whereby it was agreed to form an army for the reduction of Sardinia as soon as possible; that the emperor should furnish, at his own expense, 6500 foot and 600 horse for the expedition, in return for which the Duke of Savoy's troops in Sicily were to co-operate with the Germans and Neapolitans against the common enemy, and then, when the Spaniards were driven out, entirely to evacuate that island, and leave it to the emperor. The means of carrying out this convention were debated upon in the city of Naples by the emperor's viceroy, the Savoyard minister, and the English admiral, who could not agree in opinion, and who found the business perplexed with difficulties, as the court of Turin again wavered and seemed to distrust the emperor. But at last Sir George Byng removed all scruples, and obtained a written order from Turin to Count Maffei, to put the Imperialists in possession of the towns he held. In the mean while, Lede, the Spanish general, moving with a part of his forces from Messina, had undertaken the siege of Melazzo, a very important and well fortified place, built upon a narrow tongue of land which juts far out into the sea, towards the Lipari islands. As the allies, thanks to Byng, had the complete mastery at sea, troops both German and Neapolitan had been carried across the straits of Messina from Reggio and from Scylla, and landed on the mole-head of Melazzo; and the garrison had found itself sufficiently strong to make several destructive sorties, being led by General Caraffa, a brave Neapolitan officer. Caraffa had been recalled to Naples in the month of December, when the defence of Melazzo was intrusted to three Austrian generals, who had brought over considerable reinforcements from Italy. The siege then assumed a new and singular character; for, as the town was small, and afforded scanty accommodations for so large a force, the Austrians and Neapolitans threw up intrenchments considerably in advance of it, and there lodged themselves between the Spaniards and the town walls; while Lede, on the other hand, drew intrenchments round his own camp, and attended rather to maintaining his position there, than to the carrying of the town. Thus the two armies lay within musket shot of each other during the whole winter; both suffering severely from the marshy nature of the soil, and the continual damp that afflicted that low bad ground, where the trenches were alternately filled with water from the sky in rainy weather, and with sea water in blowing weather. Great numbers perished on both sides of disease and hunger, or of bad unwholesome provisions.* The Germans and Neapolitans had no provisions but what came over from time to time in small embarkations from Calabria, and the inhabitants of the Lipari islands, who were bold mariners, and who had many light armed vessels, finding it extremely profitable to own and carry the Spanish flag, intercepted a great many of these feluccas and spronaras, and carried home their cargoes of provisions to the islands and islets that lie scattered between the ever-burning Stromboli and the Sicilian shore. Byng's fleet did its best. "It was very hard service," says the English narrator of these Sicilian wars, "and one that was unknown and astonishing to the pilots of that country, to employ ships cruising in those dangerous seas during the rigour of the winter; for, when the westerly or northerly winds blow, there is so little sea-room in that narrow station, and the currents set in so strong upon the Calabrian shore, accompanied with a vast rolling sea, that it is extremely difficult for ships to work to windward, or indeed to hold their own, and avoid straining on a lee shore."* The admiral had appointed a squadron under the command of Captain Walton, of the Canterbury,—the author of the laconic dispatch after the battle off Cape Passaro,—to cruise upon this station, and to hinder rear-admiral Cammock from coming out of the Faro of Messina, as also to secure the passage of the provision boats for the allies at Melazzo. But it happened that Walton was blown from his station by a tremendous storm, and kept at a distance from it, without being seen or heard of for six and twenty days. Cammock, the brave and adroit Irishman, seized his opportunity to get out of Messina the moment the storm abated; and then, running down the Calabrian coast, he appeared before Tropea, the port in which provisions had been collected, to be sent when the weather should permit to the famishing Austrians and Neapolitans. Cammock hoisted English colours, and sent a letter ashore to the Governor of Tropea, under the name of one of the English captains, acquainting the Neapolitan that he was appointed by admiral Byng to convoy the provision vessels to Melazzo. Had this stratagem succeeded, the force at Melazzo would, in all probability, have been compelled by hunger to surrender; but the governor of Tropea happened to be a wary and acute man, and, observing that Cammock's letter was not written on English but on Genoa paper, he conceived a suspicion, and refused to send out the embarkations. A few days after Walton recovered his station, and then Cammock ran back into Messina. In the mean while Byng, being informed of the extremities the Germans and Neapolitans were reduced to, sent four English men-of-war, which had just arrived at Naples from Port Mahon, to carry provisions to Melazzo, directing the captains, at all hazards, to make that port. One of these men-of-war was disabled in a storm, but the three others relieved the garrison at a very critical moment. Still, however, the Spaniards continued in their intrenchments, working hard in order so to strengthen their position as not only to keep the Germans and Neapolitans penned up in the town, but also to hinder the descent of an army expected in the spring. When Byng thought of retiring to refit at Port Mahon—the convenience of which place was inestimable during this war—the viceroy of Naples entreated him to attend at a conference held at the palace: Byng consented, and there met Caraffa, Wetzell, and the Marquis de Fuencalada, general of the Neapolitan galleys. The viceroy informed Byng and the rest that, the emperor having concluded a truce with the Turks, Prince Eugene, who had been gathering fresh laurels on the Danube, was about sending from Hungary an army of 16,000 horse and foot, which, being added to the troops actually in Melazzo, was considered a force sufficient for the conquest of the whole island of Sicily. These imperialists, it was stated, would arrive at Naples by the beginning of March, and the important point to decide in this conference was, how and where they should be landed in Sicily. General Caraffa objected strongly to landing at Syracuse; General Wetzell thought that Syracuse would be the best of all landing places; and the general of the Neapolitan galleys excused himself from giving any opinion upon a subject that related to the land service, and, referring himself to what Caraffa and Wetzell had said before him, oracularly concluded that great caution ought to be taken, whichever opinion should be followed. Byng, in few words, told them that land forces should be trusted to the sea as little as possible, especially in that early and uncertain season; and that the troops they expected were not in his opinion sufficient to recover the island. "That it was a great error to hold the Spaniards in contempt, whose behaviour hitherto in Sicily had given no reason for it: that they were become used to arms and hardships, and the Germans would find them like other men: that, according to a calculation he had made, when those troops should be joined to the forces in Melazzo, they would not be able, after leaving the necessary garrisons in the towns which the Duke of Savoy was to deliver up, to bring into the field a greater number than what the Spanish army was reported to be; and that without a considerable superiority, little success was to be expected in a country, where the ill-will of the people towards them, and their inclinations to the Spaniards were so very evident, that they were to hope for no assistance, but expect every distress from them: . . . that they were not to look upon the enemy as a mouldering army; for, notwithstanding all the care of his cruisers, they received frequent recruits from Spain and Sardinia, and even from Italy in open vessels and boats, which was not always in his power to prevent: and besides the Marquis de Lede had lately raised four regiments of foot and one of horse in the island itself."* Having recommended the bay of Patti, a little to the westward of Melazzo, as the proper landing place, the English admiral, in the month of February, ran down to Port Mahon,* hoping that his suggestions would be attended to, and that the emperor would authorise Prince Eugene to send a sufficient force to finish the war in Sicily at once. But when the Imperialists arrived at Naples, in the month of May, they were fewer even than the number which Byng had declared to be insufficient, amounting not to sixteen thousand, but only to thirteen thousand; and these were badly provided, particularly in the article of money. The chief command was in the hands of the Count de Mercy, a native of Lorraine, but brought up in the emperor's service, and a personal favourite of Prince Eugene. Byng, who had returned to the bay of Naples in the beginning of April, and who had been waiting impatiently nearly a month, took these troops from Hungary on board his fleet; sailed from Baia, and on the evening of the 27th of May appeared off Melazzo. Officers came on board from the town with information that the coast to the eastward was well guarded by the Spaniards, but that to the westward all was open;—and thereupon Byng ran into the bay of Patti, and landed the troops with what was then considered a wonderful celerity.† A train of artillery with powder and ball were supplied by the English admiral out of his Spanish prizes; for de Mercy had scarcely a cannon or a barrel of gunpowder of his own. The Spaniards entrenched before Melazzo, though twenty miles off, decamped with precipitation as soon as they heard of the landing at Patti, and marched without halting some thirty-two miles to Franca Villa, an inland town in a hilly country, whence three roads branch off to Palermo, Messina and Syracuse. They left behind them their sick, a part of their artillery, most of their powder and ball, and 2000 sacks of flour; all which were found by de Mercy and the Austrians, who advanced from Patti to Melazzo by easy marches; the English fleet coasting along with the army, and coming to anchor as it came to a halt. Count Seckendorf was then detached with 2500 foot and 150 horse to reduce the troublesome Islanders of the Lipari group, who had done so much mischief, and who seemed disposed still to continue the profitable business of privateering. Seckendorf's success was easy and complete, and the flag of the emperor was raised on those volcanic isles. But it was the 17th of June before de Mercy began to look after Lede, his opponent, and once his friend and school-fellow. He then moved from Melazzo with about 21,000 men, imagining, from their hasty and panic-looking retreat from their entrenchments, that the Spaniards would not make any great stand at Franca Villa. His men suffered exceedingly from thirst, the burning sun, and the armed and hostile peasantry of Sicily. The Spaniards, unencumbered with baggage-waggons and baggage-mules, and marching as no other troops marched, had gone over the ground in a day; but the Austrians laboured "for three days through wild unknown roads, broken up, and rendered almost impassable by the enemy, conducted by ignorant guides, and climbing over craggy rocks and precipices; the soldiers all the while oppressed with the weight of their ammunition, and six days' bread which they carried, besides their arms; a fiery sun burning over their heads, and they being harassed and assailed all along from the heights and eminences by the peasants of the country, mixed with some Spanish foot." At last, however, they reached the ridge of Tre Fontane, and discovered the Spaniards encamped below in the plain of Franca Villa. At this sight a shout of joy ran through the whole imperial army; for fighting seemed better than marching in such a country, and no doubt was entertained of a speedy and decisive victory. But though in a dead level, with the Austrians hanging over him and ready to charge down hill, Lede felt pretty confident in his position; for his front was protected by the steep rocky banks of the river Alcantara;* his rear was defended by the little town of Franca Villa and a ridge of hills covered with armed peasantry; and his two wings rested upon an irregular hill and entrenchments and stone walls. In advance of him, and on the other side of the river Alcantara, but joined by a bridge to the town of Franca Villa, was a steep isolated rock, with a convent of Capuchins upon it: and here de Lede placed five battalions of his best troops, under the command of the gallant Villadarias. Count de Mercy is described as being "short-sighted almost to pur-blindness," full of fire, bold and resolute, but exceedingly rash. To add to the misfortune of the Austrians, not one deserter, not even a peasant—they were all up in arms in favour of the Spaniards—went over to give them the least information, so that they knew little of the strength and advantage of Lede's position till they got into action and were within musket-shot of the Spanish trenches. At first de Mercy intended to attack at three different points that evening; but the movements of the Austrians were slow, and night fell before they were ready. On the following morning, however, as soon as day dawned the three attacking columns moved and came to blows on three different points. Secken-

* Alberoni, among other things, had insisted upon establishing in every part of Spain a uniform tariff, in order to efface the inland custom-houses established, between the various old kingdoms which constituted the monarchy. The plan was good, but the people were not prepared for it; and it was a madness then on the part of the cardinal, as it has been since on the side of the Spanish liberals (both in 1820 and at present), to attempt by a too sudden reform the bravest or most energetic part of the nation at the very moment of the extremest difficulty.

* Lord Mahon says, "that both suffered alike from malaria; " but his lordship as a traveller ought to know, that malaria only prevails in summer and autumn, and that even the Pontine marshes and the Maremma are wholly free from it, from the end of September to the middle of May or the beginning of June.

* Byng left behind him Captain Matthews with a squadron to observe Cammock, and, if possible, hinder his escaping out of Messina to the eastward. Matthews had the good fortune to run the Santa Rosalia, of 64 guns, ashore; the San Pedro, of 80 guns, was cast away in the Gulf of Tarento; and Cammock, endeavouring to escape to Spain in a small frigate, was chased, and escaped with extreme difficulty in a boat to Catania, leaving his frigate with all his effects and papers to be taken by Captain Matthews. Among his papers was a commission from the Pretender, appointing him Admiral of the White. Cammock, it appears, had assured the ex-Jesuit Patino that he could put most of the English fleet into his hands; and "in that senseless confidence," he had written to Byng to let him know that he had King James's command to assure him that if he would bring over his fleet to Messina, or to any port in Spain, he would create him Duke of Albornoz, give him a hundred thousand pounds to support that rank, and reward proportionately every captain and every seaman in the fleet.

† All the foot, it is said, was landed in less than two hours, and most of the cavalry in nine hours.

* The Alcantara, like nearly all the so-called rivers in the island, is rather a risarzo, or water-course for the winter torrents, than a real river. Long before the end of June the water is dry in nearly every part of it: but the bed is rugged and difficult to pass, and the bare steep banks, running from six to eight feet in height, are at this point hard to climb.

dorf was rather successful: he drove the Spaniards behind their entrenchments; and the dragoons of Anspach charged very brilliantly and gained some advantages. But in the afternoon, when the Austrians concentrated and advanced towards the rock on which the Capuchin convent stood, they were received with such vigour, and they found the ground so difficult, that they were obliged to give way. De Mercy threw forward fresh corps to support them; and attack after attack was made upon the convent by the choicest of the emperor's troops. Villadarias repelled them all. Seeing that another night was about closing in, de Mercy put himself at the head of two fresh battalions to make another charge; but, after having one horse killed under him and two other horses disabled, he was dangerously wounded himself by a musket ball, and carried off the field. Darkness put an end to the action, and left things undecided: the Spaniards had suffered least; but the Germans retained several small posts which they had carried.* On the morrow de Mercy drew up his army as if to renew the attack on the fatal Capuchin convent, under whose rocks and walls nearly all the mischief had been sustained; but the other generals had become convinced of the strength of that position, and, perceiving that the men were dispirited, they with great difficulty prevailed upon him not to persist. De Mercy then withdrew in good order, hoping to re-establish his communication with the English fleet, and to cut off Ledé and his army from Messina. The fate of the war was in the hands of Byng and his sailors; the Austrians could scarcely find a mouthful of bread in the interior of the island. But the English admiral did more than furnish provisions and secure communications: he prevailed upon Count Daun, the viceroy of Naples, to represent or to get it hinted both at Turin and at Vienna that all thoughts of an expedition to Sardinia—the expedition agreed upon in the convention between the emperor and the Duke of Savoy—ought to be laid aside for the present, and that the troops which could be spared should be sent immediately into Sicily. And then, attending to an earnest invitation sent to him by the wounded and much suffering de Mercy, and “forgetting for a while his own station and element,” the admiral set out on horseback for the Austrian camp—and, “passing through roads strewn with dead bodies of men and horses that had fallen in skirmishes the day before between the sea-side and the camp, he alighted at the count's tent.”† As usual, he found the Austrian generals laying the blame upon one another, and insisting, each of them, that if his particular opinion had been taken the battle of Franca Villa would have been a decisive victory. Byng very properly directed their attention to the future. De Mercy now proposed that the army should march into the fertile country about Catania and the declivities of Mount Etna, or else go into cantonments round Syracuse (where they must have perished of malaria), waiting in either case for reinforcements from Germany. The English admiral agreed with him in opinion that the army could not continue where it was; that it was insufficient for any speedy conquest of the island; and that reinforcements ought to arrive before any extensive operations were undertaken: but he strongly opposed the march to Catania and the cantonment at Syracuse, as things “that would give the world a worse opinion of the late action at Franca Villa than it deserved, and make it be concluded that they had been defeated and disabled, which would blemish the credit of their arms, and give too much spirit to the enemy and to the Sicilians in their interest.” He earnestly recommended to de Mercy the siege of Messina, which would support the reputation of his army, and greatly facilitate the reduction of the rest of the island: nay, Byng insisted upon this siege for his own sake, saying, that his experience, the last winter, in keeping two squadrons, one within, the other without, the Faro, to block up the Spanish ships in Messina, and secure the passage of provisions to the army at Melazzo, had determined him never again to hazard the destruction of the king his master's ships on a service of such evident danger in that tempestuous season, without having a port to shelter or befriend him; that the reduction of Messina would enable him to do far more for the common cause than he had hitherto done; and, the necessity of the blockade being removed, he should at once be able to send a detachment to cruise on the coast of Spain, which would distress the enemy at home, and hinder their sending further succours into Sicily. The Austrians unanimously agreed with the admiral; and they heard with extreme pleasure that he had already taken it upon himself to recommend, indirectly, to the emperor and the Duke of Savoy that the army intended for the reduction of Sardinia should pass first into Sicily, which, as matters stood, was the nearest way to the conquest of both islands. A

* The Imperialists are said to have lost 846 in killed, and to have had 2460 wounded: the loss of the Spaniards is set down at about 1500 men in killed and wounded. Among the wounded on the side of the allies was Admiral Byng's second son, who was serving as a volunteer.

† After anxious consultations with de Mercy, the admiral went to visit his own son who had been wounded at Franca Villa. “He found him languishing in his tent, in a way that gave little hopes of his recovery; not so much from the malignity of the wound (though that was in a dangerous part) as from the unskillfulness of those who attended him.” We know from other quarters that the following remarks proceeded from no spirit of exaggeration—that long after the Sicilian war the medical staff of Austrian armies was disgraceful: “It may be wondered that the emperor is so well served in the courage of his troops, when so little care is generally taken of their proservation in accidents of wounds or sickness. Surgeons and medics are few and bad in their armies, and there is little difference between being wounded and killed in action, except that of a lingering or a sudden death. After the battle of Franca Villa the wounded men were laid on the ground with their ammunition broad set by them, and left exposed to the sun and fortune. The general himself had only his own valet-de-chambre to dress his wound and attend him. It was a moving spectacle to the admiral to meet with great numbers of poor wretches in his way up to the camp, some endeavouring, with the support of their wives or comrades, to crawl down to the sea-side, in order to get a passage over from Reggio; others unable to go on from pain or faintness, falling down on the earth and left to die there. This is a great blemish on their service, and gives handle to the maxim which their enemies would fix on them, that they account it cheaper to get a man than cure one, and so give themselves little concern for his recovery.”—Journal of the Expedition, &c.

remaining objection of the Austrians was removed by Byng's agreeing to spare them some fifty of his cannon, with a proportionate quantity of powder and ball, and by his undertaking to solicit personally at Naples for everything necessary to carry on that important service with honour and success. The whole of Byng's conduct in this little known but very curious war seems to have been that of an excellent officer and diplomatist. As soon as this conference was over he rode back to the coast, sailed away with two ships only, and, after a tedious and painful passage, got to Naples, where, to his great surprise and concern, he learned that his old friend Count Daun was removed from the government, and succeeded by Count Gallas, who was a good ambassador but no soldier, and wholly ignorant of military operations and the means by which they are to be carried on. Byng frankly and manfully told Gallas that the Spaniards in Sicily were favoured and assisted by the natives, and held Palermo, Messina, and nearly every other important city; that the Austrians, on the contrary, were disliked by the natives, and had an enemy in every Sicilian they met; that they had been entangled among barren mountains, and were actually depending on a precarious assistance from the sea; and, finally, that, without a reinforcement equal to another army, the conquest of Sicily was impracticable. Byng knew that the Imperial force collected for Sardinia lay ready in Lombardy and Piedmont; but he also knew that his own court, as well as the courts of Versailles and Turin, had just been eagerly and unwisely pressing for the embarkation of that force for its original destination: yet, notwithstanding the latter embarrassing circumstance, "he spoke out his opinion plainly to the viceroy, that the expedition to Sardinia ought to be laid aside for the present; that the carrying on both undertakings together would end in the failure of both; and that the shortest way of getting both islands was to conquer one first." Count Gallas had the good sense to see that this was the proper course, but he feared that Austria was not at liberty to divert those troops from Sardinia without the consent of the Duke of Savoy, who was to get and keep Sardinia, and of the other courts in the alliance; and he begged the admiral to make representations to Turin, Paris, and London, while he should himself make them to the emperor. And, in effect, Gallas instantly dispatched the Count de Ligneville to the emperor, to urge the good arguments of Byng. Naples was at this moment the great centre of affairs in Europe: all the powers in the Quadruple Alliance, as well as the minor states concerned for or with them, had their ministers and agents there to watch over their respective interests, to discover intrigues, or to make new ones. The English admiral had the good fortune to remove the jealousy of the Savoyards, who suspected that the emperor, in the matter of Sicily, was to be served first, and their own sovereign, in the matter of Sardinia, served last, or not at all; and he fully convinced the Duke of Savoy's minister that the expedient of sending the troops designed for Sardinia into Sicily was the effect of hard necessity, and not a pretence for postponing his master's interests, which the courts of England and France had as much at heart as the interests of the emperor;—and, in the end, the court of Turin gave its concurrence to Byng's scheme. While the admiral remained at Naples Captain Haddock, of the Grafton, brought into the bay two large Genoese ships, which he had taken off Palermo, with six hundred Swiss recruits on board for the Spanish army; Captain Strickland, of the Lennox, had driven a third Genoese on shore, and then burnt her, but about two hundred recruits and most of the sailors had escaped. Byng was now anxious to return to Messina—for he knew his assistance would be wanted. His leave-taking with Gallas, the new viceroy, was remarkable: he was himself ill of a fever, and the viceroy was dying of malaria;* unable to walk, and scarcely able to stand, he caused himself to be carried to the bedside of Count Gallas, and there, being seated, they held a short conference about the best means of carrying on the war, and then bade each other farewell. The viceroy died two days after; but the sea voyage restored Byng; and when, after five days (on the 28th of July) he came to anchor off the Faro Point near to Messina, though too weak to go out of his ship, he was out of all danger. The Austrians again wanted gunpowder, and he gave it them. They had not been idle:—General Wachtendonck had taken by stratagem the town of Tormina, a strong pass in the way to Messina, and then the main body had advanced without opposition by the passes of La Scaletta, suffering extremely from the heat, but being assisted by the transports, which coasted along in a line with them, carrying their artillery, heavy baggage, and provisions. De Mercy, who never saw well, had been struck with a temporary blindness; and he had retired across the straits to Reggio, to the cool and pleasant orange-groves on the Calabrian coast; leaving the command of the army to General Zumjungen, who, eight days before Byng's arrival, had begun the siege of Messina. But de Mercy's impatience would not permit him to lie idle at Reggio, and, notwithstanding the anguish of the wound he had received at Franca Villa—the unskillful surgeons had not yet been able to get the ball out of his body—as soon as he could see a little with one eye he recrossed the strait, and arrived at Messina nearly at the same time as the English admiral. That place was defended for Spain by the Marquess Spinola, the inheritor of a great military name, and himself an officer of high reputation; but he had only three thousand men, a force unequal to the extent of the works to be defended. The imperialists soon took the castle of Gonzaga, which stood on a hill immediately behind the town, and commanded the port and nearly every part of the city; and they also effected a considerable breach in one of the bastions of the town. Hereupon Spinola withdrew his troops from the town into the compact and exceedingly strong citadel; and then the senate of Messina sent to propose a capitulation for the town. De Mercy asked them whether he was to treat with them as subjects of his master the emperor, or as enemies: the poor Messinese thought it best to be considered as loyal Austrian subjects; and on the following day—the 8th of August—they opened their gates to his army, and relied on the clemency of the emperor. This sudden kind of change soon became very general; and the Sicilians, who had sworn fealty to his most Catholic majesty, hastened to declare that his imperial majesty was their true and lawful sovereign.* As soon as the city was taken, Byng landed some English sailors and grenadiers, who took the tower of the Faro, and opened a free passage for his ships. The admiral then came round to anchor almost at the mouth of the fine harbour of Messina, where he saw the Spanish men-of-war striking their masts and removing their rigging. It was quite clear that these Spanish ships could never get to sea; but they were, nevertheless, well-nigh being the cause of mischief to the allies. The case was curious:—an officer of the Duke of Savoy, whom we may henceforth call by his new and lasting title of King of Sardinia, claimed for his master two of the best ships which had formerly belonged to him, and which had been seized by the Spaniards in the port of Palermo: Byng, on the other hand, declared that he could not think the king of Sardinia had any shadow of title to them; that the ships had been taken by the Spaniards, had been fitted out and armed at their expense, and had fought under their colours; that even now they could and would most assuredly put out to sea, if the English fleet did not hinder them; and that he could not consider them in any other light than as the ships of an enemy, that were, or at least presently would be, his fair prize. But while these conflicting claims were irreconcilable, de Mercy put in a third claim for his master, the emperor, pretending that, as those ships would be found within the port of a town taken by his master's arms, they must, according to the law of nations, belong to his imperial majesty. To this claim of the Austrian general the English admiral replied, that, if it had not been for his two squadrons which he had employed on purpose and at a great hazard, there could have been no blockade of Messina, and there would have been no ships at all within the port to dispute about; adding that, if, even now, he were to withdraw his fleet, the Spaniards would be able to get to sea and out of the reach of the emperor's land forces; though he (Byng) with his ships would, in that case, have a good chance of falling in with them and capturing them all. Both Savoyards and Austrians, however, stuck to their claim; and the English admiral reflected that, possibly, the Spanish garrison in the citadel of Messina might capitulate for the safe return of those ships to Spain, "which he was determined never to suffer"—that the right of possession might lead to very inconvenient disputes, and that, if it should turn out "that they did not belong to England, if were better they belonged to nobody:" and, as the proper undoing of this Gordian knot, he proposed to de Mercy to set up a good battery and destroy the ships in the harbour as they lay. The general did not like this plan, and wanted time to write to Vienna for instructions; but the admiral, with some heat, assured him that no instructions were wanting to destroy everything that belonged to the enemy; and he insisted so firmly, that de Mercy, notwithstanding the representations and protests of the King of Sardinia's agent, consented to the erecting of a terrible battery, which, in a brief space of time, sunk and destroyed the much disputed ships, and completed the ruin of the naval power of Spain. Five days after the surrender of the city, the port of Castellazzo and the old Norman castle of Motta-Griffone were reduced by the Imperialists, aided by the British sailors and grenadiers. But the strong citadel was exceedingly well provided, the Germans were slow in their operations, and everything seemed to promise a long siege. On the 13th of August the Count de Ligneville arrived in the camp from Vienna, with the good news of the emperor's having dispatched orders that the little army designed for Sardinia should be embarked at Vado, and conveyed immediately to Sicily. The count was also the bearer of a gracious letter from the emperor to the English admiral, who was cordially thanked for his zeal and most valuable services. Byng determined to run over to the equinient in order to superintend the embarkation of the troops; "well knowing, from his experience of the slowness of the Germans in all their undertakings, how much his weight and credit were necessary to give their motions that quickness which their affairs required." De Mercy begged him to take Naples in his way, and there to represent plainly to the emperor's government the many and great wants of the besieging army.* By the 23rd of August Byng was again in the bay of Naples. He found that the emperor had appointed a cardinal to be viceroy in lieu of Gallas; and that Schrottenbach had just arrived in that quality from Rome. The cardinal "was an honest, good-natured man, and very willing to forward business, but had no great talent for it." When the admiral gave him de Mercy's list of wants, and explained how much that general needed artillery, the churchman told him that there was no artillery or ammunition to spare at Naples; that he would send to Mantua for some cannon, which might be transported down the Po into the Adriatic, and so round by sea to Messina, where, possibly, if no cross accidents happened, they might arrive in two months' time. Byng happened to know that these cannon at Mantua were unprovided with carriages; but the cardinal thought to make him easy on this point, by telling him that he would send some carpenters up into the woods of Abruzzo to cut down timber for gun-carriages. "These and the like unsoldierlike proposals gave the admiral a sensible regret of the loss of Count Daun, in whose room he found himself co-operating with a viceroy better qualified for his brevity than for counsel in operations of war, and whose court was crowded with monks and priests, and such like disagreeable objects, instead of men of business and service." His eminence, the cardinal, however, called together a number of Neapolitan and German officers, and bade them consult and do their best with Byng. These officers did not find much difficulty as to the articles of corn and recruits; but guns, they said, were guns at Naples, and not to be risked in Sicily lightly. The admiral told him that de Mercy had not above twenty cannon in battery; that he was within two hundred paces of the counterscarp of the citadel of Messina, and would certainly be forced to stop for want of necessary supplies. At last he told them that he would be contented if they could but send ten or twelve cannon, with a proportionate quantity of powder and ball. The Neapolitan who had charge of the ordnance said that perhaps eight guns might be spared from the mole and battery in the city; but, upon inquiry, Byng found that these guns were fifty and sixty pounders; some without ball to fit them, others without carriages, and all of them unwieldy and unfit for battery! And, upon further examination, the general officers assembled confessed, one and all, that the whole kingdom of Naples could not furnish the paltry supply of cannon and ammunition which de Mercy wanted. "This," says the narrator of these events, who we believe was one of Byng's sons, "was such a declaration of weakness as was not to be expected in so fine a kingdom." As the only resource, the British admiral stripped still further his Spanish prizes, sent de Mercy twenty-four eighteen pounders, with powder and shot; and wrote to Genoa and Leghorn to purchase a thousand barrels more powder, engaging his own credit for the payment. After extraordinary exertions he got together a number of transports, and with these he sailed down to Vado, near Genoa, where he hoped to find the Sardinian army ready, and the commander of it disposed to co-operate with de Mercy at Messina. But here Byng was doubly disappointed: the troops were not ready—they had not even begun to march down to the coast—and their general, Count de Bonneval, when he arrived, talked like a braggart and a fool, telling him that he could not co-operate with de Mercy—that his army was upon an independent establishment, and was to act under his own separate command—that it was for de Mercy to reinforce him, and to march with him to reduce Palermo and all that part of Sicily—that he could spare no guns, no gunpowder, no carriages—and that, as for men, de Mercy had surely already enough to take the citadel of Messina. When Byng endeavoured to expose the absurdity of this conduct, and to show that there ought to be no separate command or separate projects till the citadel of Messina had fallen, and that de Mercy ought instantly and at all hazards to be well supplied, Bonneval began to rail against Count Colorado, the governor of Milan, to whom he imputed all the delays, obstructions, and insufficiencies. But, on the other hand, Count Colorado, by means of his secretary and adjutant-general, justified himself; only admitting "that his good intentions were ill seconded by the sloth or knavery of the commissaries." With infinite trouble Byng got two vessels sent away, under convoy of one of his ships, with some artillery and ammunition for Messina; but he saw no signs of their victualling the transports, or fitting them up for the reception of troops when they should arrive. He complained to Bonneval, who, in his turn, laid all the blame upon the commissaries; "who," he said, "would do what they pleased, in spite of all that he could say to them, and, being appointed by the Aulic council of war at Vienna, had no regard to his authority or orders." Councils and conferences followed, and did nothing: some columns had arrived, and the rest were on their way from Milan; and still no preparations were made—there was not bread for the men to eat. The English admiral at last told these precious generals and commissaries that, if they continued thus to hinder the embarking of the troops, he would sail away for Messina, where his presence was wanted, and leave the army to follow as it could. The threat had some effect; and he was assured that everything should be ready by the 23rd of September. Yet on the 23rd, when the troops had all arrived, and while Byng was making the best dispositions for embarking them in the transports, he learned that most of the biscuit and wine was wanting; that there was no salt, oil, brandy, or tobacco; nor any hay or oats! He sent his first captain to remonstrate with the chief commissary; but that functionary skulked out of the way, and hid himself. But at last Byng's threats were so loud and terrible that both Bonneval and the commissariat thought it expedient to attend to their duty; and on the 27th of September about six thousand men were shipped off for Sicily with such provisions as could be got. On the 8th of October the admiral with his convoy arrived before Messina, which so elevated the spirits of the besieging army that they instantly attacked a half-moon, and carried it, after losing a hundred men in killed and more than eight hundred in wounded. Byng landed while this work was doing, or just after it was done, and was received with infinite joy by de Mercy and his troops, who considered him as the man that always brought them relief and success, and every good thing that attended the war. The siege was prosecuted with vigour. On the 18th the governor of the citadel, who had acquitted himself with great honour, beat a parley, and surrendered upon articles: on the 19th the emperor's grenadiers marched in and took possession of a gate of the citadel; and on the 21st the brave Spanish garrison marched out through the breach, and were transported by sea, under an English convoy, to Augusta. And thus ended the siege of Messina, which had lasted three months, and which had occasioned the Germans a tremendous loss in killed and wounded. Bonneval, finding his troops incorporated with those of de Mercy, pretended sickness, passed over to Reggio, and presently made his way back to Vienna, to endeavour to obtain a separate command or the recall of de Mercy. He never returned to Sicily, and it was well that he did not. During the siege, and nearly a month before the arrival of Byng and the six thousand men, Ledc and his Spaniards had fortified themselves in a strong and advantageous post at Castro Giovanni, in the centre of the island, and begun to lay in supplies of provisions: they had at one moment threatened to raise the siege of the citadel at Messina, and had even appeared upon the hills in sight of the imperialists' camp.

After the Germans had spent some time in levelling the lines, trenches, and batteries before Messina, and in putting that place into a good posture of defence, they began to concert what they should do next. As usual, a council was called. To march after the Spaniards in the wintry season, with half-starved horses and half-starved men, through an adverse country, mountainous and barren, seemed rather desperate: and at the end of this march was the fortified camp of Castro Giovanni; a position, at the very least, as formidable as that of Franca Villa, where the Imperialists had suffered so severely. There was another line of march along the northern coast to Palermo, and to get possession of that capital might decide the war: but the roads were longer and equally mountainous—the country barren by nature or laid bare by man—the inhabitants hostile—in many places the path or tract (for there was nothing that really merited the name of a road) was so narrow that two men could hardly go abreast—there was no forage for their horses, no magazines in the way, few beasts of burden to carry provisions along with them, and no money to buy them if they could be got—and therefore this project was abandoned also. The next project was to go to Trapani, where the Duke of Savoy or King of Sardinia had a garrison of Piedmontese. At Trapani, instead of being cooped up and famished among mountains, they would be in an open and a plentiful country; but to advance thither by land seemed impracticable, and there were not transports enough to carry the troops by sea; and the Austrians feared that, if they were sent in separate detachments, the Spaniards might destroy them one by one. Syracuse seemed open, and to offer advantages; but the autumnal rains had swelled all the fiumari, and there they would not only be at a greater distance from Palermo, but also widely separated from the great caricatori, or magazines where the inhabitants usually lay up their corn. After several days had passed in debate and uncertainty, de Mercy and the Austrian generals went one evening on board the English fleet to consult with the admiral. They told him, in a desponding manner, that, as they could neither find subsistence nor undertake any important action where they were, they had come to the resolution to leave a strong garrison in Messina, to transport the horse across the straits to Calabria, where they would find forage, and to send part of the foot by sea to Syracuse, where they might maintain themselves during the winter, and be ready to take the field in the spring. It scarcely required the penetration and ability of Byng to perceive that this scheme was a most mischievous one—a thing that would look like retreat and defeat. It was easy for him to point out a better; and he not only did this, but, what was more, he engaged to facilitate its execution. Indeed, without him, it would have been impracticable. He told de Mercy that a division of the army ought to be sent by sea to Trapani; and, as that division would be too weak to extend itself into the fertile country till other detachments arrived, and might so be starved, he would send his secretary to Tunis, the nearest African port, to buy up corn and transport it instantly to Trapani: adding, “that he knew very well they had no money, and therefore he would employ his own cash and credit to procure this supply, depending upon their honour for repayment, and not doubting to lodge the corn at Trapani before the first detachment of troops arrived there.” He showed them that the occupying the isthmus on which Trapani is situated would turn the winter difficulties of the war upon the Spaniards, by obliging them to make long and difficult marches, and to keep the field; that when the whole imperial army was collected at Trapani they would be enabled to enlarge their quarters, to take possession of the plentiful country and the granaries of corn, and to overawe Palermo by their vicinity to it, till the season should favour their march upon that capital. De Mercy embraced the English admiral in a transport of gratitude, and the admiral at once sent off his secretary to Tunis to buy the corn. On the 23rd of November a portion of the Imperialists, horse and foot, sailed for Trapani, where they arrived in three days, and where they found an abundant supply of Byng's Barbary corn ready for them. The transports and convoy-ships then returned to Messina for more troops, which were safely landed and joined to the first division, which was then strong enough to enlarge its quarters and take possession of the neighbouring towns of Marsala and Mazzara.

A. D. 1719.—On the 19th of January, Count de Mercy and Admiral Byng departed from Messina with the last convoy, which consisted of 5400 foot and 1100 horse. This voyage, unlike the preceding ones, was disastrous: off the isle of Alicudi they were overtaken by a terrible storm, which drove all the transports back to Melazzo and Messina. The admiral, with the general on board his ship, got with great difficulty into Trapani on the 29th; but the whole of the convoy did not arrive till the end of February, and, as it always happened when troops were kept for any length of time on board a ship, many of the soldiers died on this short but rough passage. Still, however, de Mercy mustered, at his first general review near Trapani, 14,000 foot and 3000 horse; and he had left behind him good garrisons in Melazzo, Messina, and one or two other places. He was soon emboldened to advance his outposts within sight of the gulf of Castel Amare; and his foraging parties occasionally looked down from the heights about Monreale upon the beautiful bay and city of Palermo. Lede and the Spaniards, meanwhile, quitted the posts of Mola, Taormina, and Catania; and, leaving a detachment in the fortified camp of Castro Giovanni to secure the magazines he had formed there, and, marching his troops from Valdemone through the island, Lede formed a line running from Alcamo to Salemi, and thence to Castel Vetrano, where he fixed his head-quarters, intending, if possible, to shut up the Imperialists in the north-western corner of the island, and prevent their approach to the capital. At first he was strong enough to keep these lines, and to throw out detachments to lay waste the country about Mazara, Marsala, and Trapani, and to carry off or destroy cattle, corn, and wine; but in the spring, when de Mercy had collected all his men, and had been strengthened with fresh supplies by sea, the Spaniards were obliged to give ground, and Lede was reduced to fortify his camp at Castel Vetrano, and there to remain almost inactive. De Mercy soon made a movement which seemed to threaten Palermo; and then Lede, moving along the lines he had attempted to occupy, fixed himself at Alcamo, at the opposite extremity of those lines, and near to the capital. But the turns the war had been taking had greatly discouraged the partisans of Spain; the peasantry no longer stood by Lede; the rabble of Palermo, always fierce and turbulent, seemed disposed to rise against him; and, cut off by the English cruisers from all assistance from Spain, he renounced the idea of maintaining himself, and made overtures to de Mercy and Byng for evacuating Sicily upon condition of a free passage for himself and army back to Barcelona or some other Spanish port on the Mediterranean. The Austrians, who would thus obtain all they wanted by becoming masters of the island without any further trouble, were well disposed to entertain this proposition; but Byng protested against it, declaring that not a man of the Spanish army should quit that island until a general peace was made; for, to let Lede go as he proposed, would be to furnish Spain with the very best army she possessed, and which might be employed in disturbing England, or in acting against France, the close ally of England in this war. In making the overture, Lede had desired as a prelude that there should be an immediate suspension of hostilities in Sicily. And now de Mercy, after hearing Byng, proposed to the Spaniards that they should surrender Palermo and the sea coast all round the island, and retire into the middle of the country to Castro Giovanni their former fortified camp, or to some other defensible position, in consideration of which a truce would be granted for six weeks, during which both sides might have time to consult their respective courts. The English admiral added the restriction, that, if the Spaniards attempted to withdraw or ship off any of their troops in the interval, the truce should be void; and he sent his eldest son, Mr. Byng, to Vienna, to intimate that, if the imperial court should listen to the proposals of the Spanish general, he as the officer of England could never suffer any part of the Spanish army to quit Sicily till the King of Spain had acceded to the Quadruple Alliance. Lede next proposed treating about the surrender of Palermo with a part of the adjacent country in consideration of a three months' truce, but this negotiation was broken off in consequence of advices received from Madrid; and the Imperialists, continuing hostilities, besieged and took the castle and town of Sciacca, where they found a large and seasonable supply of Sicilian wheat. Palermo might have been taken if they had been a little more active and daring.

But while these events were in progress in Sicily, Alberoni, the father of the expedition as of the war, had been thrown from his high post in Spain. That very remarkable churchman was soon convinced that he had embarked in schemes which far exceeded the power and the means of Spain; but he had the honour of the country at heart, and a spirit that revolted at the idea of sneaking meanly out of a conflict which he had provoked. When the arms of Spain were somewhat brightened by the battle of Franca Villa, he signified that he was ready to consent to a peace upon fair conditions; and he sent his countryman the Marquess Scotti on a mission to Paris and the Hague. Scotti told the French regent that Spain wished to appoint the States General her mediators, and that she would relinquish both Sicily and Sardinia if the French would restore the conquests they had made in her Biscayan provinces, and if the English would restore Gibraltar and port Mahon. The Duke of Orleans, in reply, told Scotti that he could do nothing without consulting his allies the emperor and the King of England; and he refused the Italian noble passports to continue his journey to the Hague. The Abbé Dubois wrote instantly to Stanhope, who was with King George at Hanover. Stanhope had himself gone to Madrid with the offer of restoring Gibraltar, but he was now resolved that nothing should be restored and nothing done in the way of peace, until Alberoni was removed from the ministry, and reduced to a condition in which he could no longer be dangerous. "We must make his disgrace an absolute condition of the peace," says Stanhope in his answer to Dubois, "for, as his unbounded ambition has been the sole cause of the war which he undertook in defiance of the most solemn engagements, and in breach of the most solemn promises, if he is compelled to accept peace, he will only yield to necessity, with the resolution to seize the first opportunity of vengeance. It is not to be imagined that he will ever lose sight of his vast designs, or lay aside the intention of again bringing them forward whenever the recovery of his strength, and the remissness of the allied powers, may flatter him with the hopes of better success. . . . Let us, therefore, exact from Philip his dismissal from Spain. . . . When Cardinal Alberoni is once driven from Spain, the Spaniards will never consent to his again coming into administration." A prince of spirit would have risked twenty battles rather than submit to this dictation; but Philip, as soon as it was known that he might purchase a peace by sacrificing his minister, made up his mind to that price. As for the grandees of Spain they had long been incensed at the rule of the son of an Italian gardener—for the cardinal had fought his way upwards from that very humble condition—and in their pride and spite there were many of them who would gladly have seen the minister burnt in an auto da fe. The king's confessor, the lord chamberlain, the courtiers of all degrees and of both sexes (the ladies were particularly incensed by the cardinal's economy in the palace), united in one general and sincere effort to work his ruin; but it was an English lord—the strangest of all our many eccentric peers—and the Regent of France that struck the decisive blow. Lord Peterborough, who had again put on his travelling boots, and who was determined to do something in great state affairs though he was neither employed nor trusted by the English government, had entered during the preceding summer into a private correspondence with the Duke of Parma, uncle of the Queen of Spain, and this correspondence had led to an invitation to the court at Parma. Peterborough, whose object it was to induce the duke to use his influence with his niece, who had always been Alberoni's warmest friend, to make her abandon that minister, declined going in person to the duke's court, but agreed to meet a private agent from Parma in the little town of Novi, at the foot of the Bocchetta, between Genoa and Turin; and in consequence of this meeting the Duke of Parma actually wrote pressing letters to his niece the Queen of Spain for the removal of the cardinal, as being the great obstacle to the peace of Europe and the greatest enemy of Spain. Almost at the same moment the French regent bribed Alberoni's agent, the Marquess Scotti, with 50,000 crowns, and sent him back to Madrid to intrigue against his countryman, his friend, and employer. If the war in Sicily had been more successful, the cardinal might perhaps have been spared a little longer; but the capture of the citadel of Messina, the occupation of Trapani, the fears entertained for Palermo, and every article of news that arrived from that country seemed to prove to the Spaniards that they had made enormous efforts only to sacrifice and throw away the finest fleet and army they had possessed for many a year; and even the highest-minded among them, who had clung to the cardinal as a minister likely to regenerate Spain and rouse her from her long slumber, now began to renounce him as a rash and unlucky man. On the evening of the 4th of December he transacted business as usual with Philip, and the king treated him with his usual kindness and consideration; but on the very next morning he was by a royal decree dismissed from all his employments, and commanded to leave Madrid in eight days, and the territory of Spain within twenty-one. He endeavoured to obtain an audience of the king or the queen, to justify his conduct with ministers and public men, but neither the king nor the queen would receive him, nor would the public men listen to him with a decent show of patience. The cardinal, therefore, took the road back to his native country, and quitted Spain for ever within the time prescribed by the royal decree, a poorer man than when he entered it, and pursued insidiously, and, as they hoped, to his utter destruction, by the court he had served.*

A. D. 1720. Philip now hoped that he had dissipated the jealousies and apprehensions of the allies, and that he should obtain favourable terms of peace; but he continued to refuse his accession to the Quadruple Alliance, and on the 19th of January (1720) a declaration was signed at Paris not to admit of any conditions contrary to the sense of that treaty. This declaration, aided by artful representations made by the Marquess Scotti and other intriguers in the pay of Dubois and Stanhope, prevailed over the queen of Spain, and she, as usual, prevailed upon her husband, who, before the end of the month, issued a decree announcing his intention to accede to the Quadruple Alliance.

* Philip endeavoured to render the Pope the instrument of his vengeance, and transmitted numerous accusations against the cardinal together with proofs and documents to support them; and the influence of the Spanish crown was exerted to obtain his arrest, trial, and condemnation in Italy. As soon as Alberoni arrived in the territories of the republic of Genoa, he was arrested at the instance of the Pope's nuncio, who accused him as an enemy of the Holy Catholic faith, and who exhibited to the Genoese Senate the heads of accusation furnished by Spain. These were, "1. That he employed the money which he derived from the crusades and other ecclesiastical taxes in making war against Catholic princes. 2. That he undertook a war against the emperor, at a moment when engaged in a contest with the Turks, to the great detriment of Italy and Europe. 3. That for his own private interests he had prohibited the subjects of Spain from soliciting bulls for the benefices conferred by the Pope." The Senate of Genoa, however, declined going into these charges, and restored Alberoni to his liberty, commanding him at the same time to quit their territories. During his short stay in that republic he wrote various defenses of his conduct, and his celebrated "Apology." He threw the whole blame of the war and of the broken promises to the Pope upon the King of Spain and his Queen, exposing the intrigue and ambitious designs of the latter. His bold truths gave additional offense to the court of Madrid, which laboured to deprive him of an asylum anywhere, and to procure his degradation at Rome. The members of the sacred college, however, would not deprive him of his cardinal's hat. But his native sovereign the Duke of Parma refused him a passport, and he was obliged to seek an asylum among the Swiss billages on the Italian side of the Alps, where he remained more than a year in the style of several base attempts to seize his person.—Case, Memoirs of the Kings of Spain.—We shall soon meet him again busy for the Pretender.

Philip, however, declared that he was thus making a sacrifice of his rights and possessions; and it was agreed beforehand that some of these his claims should be discussed at a congress to be held as soon as convenient at Cambray. He solemnly renewed his renunciation of the French crown, and promised to evacuate both Sardinia and Sicily within two months.

A courier dispatched from Paris by Lord Stair informed Sir George Byng of most of these circumstances; and de Mercy received a dispatch from the emperor's minister, acquainting him that Spain had acceded to the Quadruple Alliance. The English admiral and the Austrian general sent a trumpet to Lede, who still remained in a hostile attitude at Alcamo. Lede returned for answer that he must look upon the peace as a thing concluded, and that he was therefore ready to treat for a cessation of hostilities by sea and land, until they should receive further orders from their respective courts. De Mercy and Byng then told him they were ready to consent to a suspension of arms upon his delivering up to them the city and castles of Palermo, at which place transports could be best provided, and other necessary measures concerted for carrying him and his army back to Spain. But Lede urged that, as the plenipotentiaries of their masters assembled at the Hague were still in treaty for settling the terms of evacuation, he could not agree to a truce on any other condition than that each party should remain on the ground they now occupied without either of them giving up anything until further orders from their courts. It was hardly to be expected that Byng and de Mercy should consent to this arrangement; for the men-of-war and transports lay very inconveniently at Trapani, an unsafe roadstead, where they had suffered considerable damage. Palermo, on the other hand, would be a secure retreat for the fleet, and the occupation would be a pledge of the sincerity of the intention of the Spaniards to evacuate the island—an intention still doubted by some of the allies. There were also other reasons for objecting to Lede's proposition; for the Imperialists would be confined in a corner of the island, while the Spaniards would be in possession of the principal cartridge and corn depôts, and at liberty to plunder and rifle a country they were bound soon to leave—nor could it be comprehended, how they, who six weeks before, had offered to leave the whole island, upon condition of being sent back to Spain, should now scruple to surrender Palermo; and therefore, as all this had the appearance of chicanery, de Mercy and Byng resolved to go on with the operations of the war. The general and admiral, however, wrote a joint letter to Lede, proposing an interview at a spot half way between the two armies. The King of Spain's general consented to this conference, and they met on the 2nd of April at the place appointed. Lede confessed that he knew the king his master had signed the Quadruple Alliance, and he added that he did not doubt of his sincere intention of evacuating Sicily; but he declared at the same time that he had received no positive orders from Spain. Being asked what proposals he meant to make for a general cessation of hostilities, he replied, as he had done before, that each army might hold what was already in its possession until further orders. De Mercy asked him whether in case they should consent to his keeping possession of Palermo, he would deliver up Augusta and the other posts the Spaniards held on that side of the island, which were now of no possible use to him, though it would be an obvious convenience to him to withdraw the garrisons he had in those parts to join his army, in order to the intended re-embarkation. Lede averred that he could not give up nor quit the possession of any part he had of the island until he received further orders from Madrid; and he read part of the instructions he had received from King Philip. De Mercy on the other side read part of the orders which he had received from the emperor, to agree to a truce in order to the evacuation, and to concert with the Marquess Lede the necessary conditions for facilitating the same; but, if the Marquess Lede should not own his having orders, or endeavour to evade them, and gain time, by pretending to send to Madrid for further instructions, and not name a reasonable time for beginning to embark his troops, then, and in that case, he was to make use of his arms to oblige him to execute the treaty which the Spanish minister had signed at the Hague. De Mercy and Byng offered transports, provisions, and a convoy; but Lede maintained his point, declaring again that without fresh orders from Madrid he could give up nothing; and so the conference broke off. During the debate one of the English ships cruising off Palermo took a felucca with packets of letters from Spain to Lede; and Byng, seeing the King of Spain's seal upon the letters, generously sent them unopened to the Spanish general, and liberated the felucca and crew. Immediately after the conference Byng returned to his fleet at Trapani, and de Mercy marched towards Alcamo with the resolution of attacking the Spaniards. The Imperialists reached Alcamo on the 8th of April; but Lede had retreated the night before, leaving some of his sick behind him, and scarcely resting till he got between the heights of Monreale and behind Palermo. De Mercy instantly determined to invest Palermo, and he sent Colonel Baron Neyperg to confer with Admiral Byng, touching the necessary assistance to be rendered by the English fleet. Byng readily agreed to coast along the shore, to furnish provisions, ammunition, and other necessaries, and to co-operate with the land army as though his fleet were its left wing. On the 18th of April both fleet and army were in motion, and de Mercy got as far as Sala di Partenico, near the foot of the Monreale heights, where he found that Lede had fortified the passes that led through the hills or round by the sea-shore into the narrow but beautiful plain of Palermo. He then divided the Inperialists into two bodies, sending one round to the sea-side with orders to force the pass of Sferra Cavallo, and enter that way into the plain of Palermo, whilst he himself with the rest of the army ascended the difficult mountains about Carina, in order to get down that way into the same plain; judging, that, if Lede moved from Mon-Reale to defend the pass of Sferra Cavallo, he might get between him and Palermo, or at least have the advantage of falling upon his rear. With infinite toil and difficulty de Mercy gained the crest of the mountain at Carina, whence he saw the beautiful plain and city lying as it were at his feet; but he also discovered the whole Spanish army, which had wheeled round from Monreale, and was now encamped on the edge of the plain, occupying all the passes and erecting breast-works and batteries to stop his progress. De Mercy immediately recalled the principal part of the division he had sent to the sea-shore, leaving only a detachment to convey the artillery and baggage through Sferra Cavallo, which pass the Spaniards had found it necessary to abandon. On the 21st the Imperialists began to descend from Carina by rugged paths and dry water-courses, a most difficult and fatiguing march; but they got down before night and drove in all the Spanish outposts. In the mean while Byng had come to anchor off Mondello at the head of the bay of Palermo, and had taken possession of the tower and landing-place there. He had also landed some of his men, who established a communication between the shipping and de Mercy's camp. Lede now withdrew under the walls of Palermo, ranging his troops across the plain with their left to Monte Caputo, and their right on the sea near the mole-head: the Spaniards were thus in a manner covered with the cannon of the city, and they had strong intrenchments in their front, lined with forty pieces of artillery. They were well provided with all things, and seemed determined to stand the chance of a battle. De Mercy encamped on the same plain in their front and within a mile and a half distance, with his right leaning on the mountain from which he had descended, and his left extending to Monte Pellegrino, near the sea-side. Lede, who left nothing untried, and who seems up to the last moment to have been most reluctant to leave that fair island, sent off one of his aides-de-camp with a letter to Admiral Byng, enclosing a Spanish gazette, which published a treaty of suspension of arms at sea, concluded at the Hague between the ministers of Great Britain, France, and Spain, and which had commenced on the 10th instant; and, as it was now the 22nd, Lede insisted that the English fleet ought to cease hostilities on the instant. But Byng replied that he could give no regard or credit to a pretended convention published in a foreign newspaper; that the time for beginning the evacuation of Sicily was elapsed, and that he could not separate himself from the emperor's army until the Spaniards were more compliant. De Mercy then determined to bring on a general engagement in front of Palermo as soon as possible; and having received all his artillery and baggage by the way of Sferra Cavallo, he detached Baron Neyperg to dislodge the Spaniards from some posts they had fortified near the mole-head on the sea-side, while another of his best officers made an attempt upon Monte Pellegrino. Byng co-operated most vigorously by detaching three ships to cannonade the posts on the sea-side, where the Spaniards were soon driven from their guns, Several sanguinary attacks were subsequently made along the Spanish lines; and on the 2nd of May, while the Spanish guards were taking their siesta, the Germans surprised a redoubt, entered it without firing a shot, and pushed the Spaniards out at the point of the bayonet. This redoubt, though so badly guarded, commanded the whole of the Spanish line, and Lede resolved to retake it at any cost. On the other hand, de Mercy was quite as resolute to keep the point; and both armies were in motion, and on the very point of engaging in a great and decisive battle, when a little felucca shot into the bay and landed a courier from Spain with positive orders to Lede to agree about the evacuation and the transportation of the army into Spain. The marquis instantly drew off his army and sent flags of truce to the Austrians and to the English admiral. The next morning Byng repaired to the Imperialists' camp, where conventions were drawn up and signed for the immediate departure of the Spaniards. The Germans were put in possession of Palermo, and the Spanish army marched to Termini, whence the first embarkation, consisting of 12,000 foot and 600 horse, sailed on the 20th of June for Barcelona: the remainder followed at short intervals.

Nothing now remained to be done in the Mediterranean, but to put the Duke of Savoy in possession of Sardinia. In this operation the English admiral played a principal part, conducting the Savoyard troops to Cagliari, and assisting at the conferences there with the ministers and generals of the several powers concerned; and, at the instance of the court of Turin, the English did not depart till they had seen the whole treaty of surrender fully executed, the Spanish troops returned into Spain, and his majesty of Sardinia quietly possessed of this his new kingdom. The merits of Byng are scarcely exaggerated by the friendly historian of this exceedingly interesting war. "Thus," says that writer, "ended the war of Sicily, wherein the fleet of Great Britain bore so illustrious a part, that the fate of the island was wholly governed by its operations, both competitors agreeing that the one could not have conquered, nor the other have been subdued without it. Never was any service conducted in all its parts with greater zeal, activity, and judgment, nor was ever the British flag in so high reputation and respect in those distant parts of Europe."^{*}

* Account of the expedition of the British Fleet to Sicily, &c. Collected from the Admiral's MSS.

The Quadruple Alliance and the friendly union of France and England gave a twelve years' peace to Europe. A storm, provoked in the north partly through the predilections of King George for continental possessions, had necessitated the presence of an English fleet in the Baltic, and at one moment had threatened a fierce war between England and Russia. The new Queen of Sweden had gladly concluded a peace by yielding Bremen and Verden to the King of England, or rather to the Elector of Hanover, and Stetten and some other places to the King of Prussia. But the Czar Peter and the King of Denmark were not to be satisfied with slight sacrifices; and they sought the total ruin and dismemberment of the Swedish monarchy. The English king and the French regent united their pacific efforts, and offered themselves as mediators; but Peter received their overtures with rudeness; and as he was strongest on the Baltic he scoured those seas and committed frightful ravages on the Swedish coast. As an English ambassador—Lord Carteret—could make no impression on Peter, it was resolved to try what an English admiral could do; and Sir John Norris was dispatched to the Baltic with eleven sail of the line to protect the Queen of Sweden, who had thrown herself upon the protection and generosity of England. The czar, nevertheless, knowing that Norris was limited by his instructions, continued his ravages, burning above a thousand villages and the town of Nyköping. But at length Lord Stanhope, who was at Hanover with the king, gave Norris to understand that he must not care about declarations of war, but treat the Russian fleet in the Baltic just as Byng had treated the Spanish fleet in the Mediterranean. Norris consequently joined the Swedish men-of-war at Carlscroon, and proceeded in search of the Russians. If his Danish majesty had been bold enough to join his ships with those of the Czar, a combat might have been a very serious affair to England and of doubtful issue; but he had neither faith nor affection for his ally, and he not only withdrew his fleet, but entered into negotiations with England and Sweden. Peter had then the good sense to recal his fleet with all possible haste; by which he probably saved his infant navy from entire destruction. The King of Denmark accepted a sum of money as an equivalent for the conquests he had made or was making; and, with the exception of the Czar Peter, all her enemies made peace with the Queen of Sweden, in terror of the arms of England and France, who, in the words of the treaty, had bound themselves and their allies to contribute "ad coerendum Czarum Russiæ." The salvation of Sweden was certainly more owing to England than to any other power, or than to all the other powers put together; yet George did not enter upon it from any very high, or generous, or English motive, but merely for the obtainment of Verden and Bremen, which were absolutely ceded to him by the court of Stockholm. At the same time he was more than suspected of a not very honourable design of seizing and uniting to Hanover the duchy of Mecklenburg, the sovereign prince of which country had been suspended from his government by a sentence of the Aulic council for tyranny and maladministration. George had been invested with what was called a protectoral commission, by virtue of which he administered the affairs of the duchy. According to Lord Chesterfield this commission had been obtained from the emperor in exchange for the instructions sent to Sir George Byng in the Mediterranean! The suspended Duke of Mecklenburg could not deny that his government had been turbulent and mischievous to his people; but he solemnly declared that the troubles in his dominion had been continually fomented by the court of Hanover. All the recent transactions in the north were severely criticised in England, because the negotiations had been principally entrusted to Hanoverian ministers and favourites, and because they bound George to a complicated system of alliances and guarantees.

The king had returned to London in the autumn of the preceding year (1719), and had opened the parliament on the 23rd of November. It had pleased God, he said in his speech, to strengthen the arms of Great Britain, and to prosper the several negotiations: one Protestant kingdom—Sweden—had been already relieved by our reasonable interposition, and a foundation laid for such a union among the great Protestant princes as would tend to the security of our holy religion: and he affirmed that the hand of God had been visibly with them in all their undertakings. Two days after the commencement of the session the bill for limiting the peerage was again introduced; the king having strongly recommended the passing of it in his speech, and having urged parliament particularly to secure that part of the constitution which was most liable to abuse. Lord Cowper, more decided than ever in his opposition, said, "that, besides the reasons which induced him last session to oppose the bill, another now existed equal in weight to all the rest; and that was the earnestness with which it was recommended. Precipitation was always dangerous and in many cases suspicious; and he could not help being of opinion that, if there were no secret meaning in this bill, it would not be pressed upon the House in this extraordinary manner." Sunderland inveighed against this insinuation, protested the singleness and integrity of his own motives, and declared that the bill was favourable to the honour and dignity of the peerage, and so ought to pass that House. As no one rejoined—as Cowper was left alone—the bill was passed on the 30th of November, and sent down to the Commons on the 1st of December (1719). During the recess Walpole had called a meeting of the leaders of the Whigs in opposition at Devonshire House, and had endeavoured to organise a resistance to the bill in both Houses. But he had found that several of the Whig peers, though in opposition, secretly favoured a measure which would increase their importance; whilst others, commoners as well as peers, had declared that it would be inconsistent in them, as Whigs, to object to a bill which tended to prevent the repetition of an abuse of prerogative (the sudden making of peers for a given purpose) against which they had so often arrayed themselves in the Tory times: and, at this Devonshire House meeting, many of those who disliked the bill as much as Walpole did had declared that they would only expose themselves to defeat and to a lamentable exhibition of weakness as a party, if they attempted to throw it out of the House. But Walpole, who was never easily moved from his purpose, and who well knew how odious the bill was to many rich country gentlemen and ladies, persisted in recommending a trial of strength upon it, assuring the meeting that he would put it in such a light as to excite the indignation of every independent commoner. He told them that he had already overheard a country gentleman, a member of the Lower House, who possessed an estate of not more than 800*l.* a-year, declare, with great warmth, that, although he had no chance of being made a peer himself, yet he would never consent to the injustice of giving a perpetual exclusion to his family from the honours of the peerage. This sentiment Walpole insisted would have a strong effect upon the whole body of country gentlemen; he declared that if his party deserted him on this question he would stand forth single-handed against it; and, in the end, though the Whig lords gave him little to hope, he prevailed upon his party in the Commons to agree that an opposition should be made in that House.* Accordingly, when this memorable bill came to be read a second time in the Commons, on the 8th of December, Sir John Packington, Sir Richard Steele, Methuen, Smith, and others joined Walpole in denouncing it as invidious, treacherous, and dangerous. Walpole hardly ever indulged in metaphorical display, his speeches being as plain and unornamental as a compte rendu; but on this occasion his speech was highly figurative and enriched with classical allusion. Taking one broad side of the peerage question, he said, in the opening of his speech—“Among the Romans, the temple of Fame was placed behind the temple of Virtue, to denote that there was no coming to the temple of Fame but through that of Virtue. But if this bill is passed into a law, one of the most powerful incentives to virtue would be taken away, since there would be no arriving at honour, but through the winding-sheet of an old decrepit lord, or the grave of an extinct noble family.” After more rhetoric and some Latin quotations, Walpole continued, more in his own natural style:—“Had this bill originated with some noble peer of distinguished ancestry, it would have excited less surprise; a desire to exclude others from a participation of honours is no novelty in persons of that class:—Quod ex aliorum meritis sibi arrogat, id mihi ex meis ascribi nolunt. But it is matter of just surprise, that a bill of this nature should either have been projected, or at least promoted, by a gentleman who was, not long ago, seated amongst us,* and who, having got into the House of Peers, is now desirous to shut the door after him. When great alterations in the constitution are to be made, the experiment should be tried for a short time, before the proposed change is finally carried into execution, lest it should produce evil instead of good; but, in this case, when the bill is once sanctioned by parliament, there can be no future hopes of redress, because the Upper House will always oppose the repeal of an act which has so considerably increased their power. The great unanimity with which this bill has passed the Lords ought to inspire some jealousy in the Commons; for it must be obvious that whatever the Lords gain must be acquired at the loss of the Commons, and the diminution of the regal prerogative; and that, in all disputes between the Lords and Commons, when the House of Lords is immutable, the Commons must, sooner or later, be obliged to recede. The view of the ministry in forcing the bill is plainly nothing but to secure their power in the House of Lords. The principal argument on which the necessity of it is founded is drawn from the mischief occasioned by the creation of twelve peers during the reign of Queen Anne, for the purpose of carrying an infamous peace through the House of Lords: that was only a temporary measure, whereas the mischief to be occasioned by this bill will be perpetual. It creates thirty-one peers by authority of parliament: so extraordinary a step cannot be supposed to be taken without some sinister design in future. The ministry want no additional strength in the House of Lords for conducting the common affairs of government, as is sufficiently proved by the unanimity with which they have carried through this bill. If, therefore, they think it necessary to acquire additional strength, it must be done with views and intentions more extravagant and hostile to the constitution than any which have yet been attempted. The bill itself is of a most insidious and artful nature.” He alluded to the known enmity which existed between the king and the heir to the throne in a delicate but in a very striking manner; and then he spoke with equal art of the personal character of George, and of the seeming surrender of one of the most important of his prerogatives—the faculty of making peers. “We are told,” said he, “that his majesty has voluntarily consented to this limitation of his prerogative. It may be true; but may not the king have been deceived? which, if it is ever to be supposed, must be admitted in this case. . . . The character of the king furnishes us also with a strong proof that he has been deceived; for, although it is a fact that in Hanover, where he possesses absolute power, he never tyrannised over his subjects, or despotically exercised his authority, yet can one instance be produced of his ever giving up a prerogative?" He exposed all the Scotch clauses of the bill, declaring that nothing could be more unfair than that particular clause which assigned to twenty-five Scottish peers hereditary seats in lieu of the sixteen elective ones—the bill was a violation of the act of union, and would endanger the entire dissolution of it by the high offence it would give to the great body of the Scottish peerage, in thus excluding them and their posterity from all future possibility of taking their seats as British peers. The Scottish peerage had merited a terrible rebuke by their general political baseness and subservience to all ministries—and they got it. "The sixteen elective Scotch peers already admit themselves to be a dead court weight, yet the same sixteen are now to be made hereditary, and nine added to their number. These twenty-five, under the influence of corrupt ministers, might find their account in betraying their trust." After declaring that the bill would make the Lords masters of the king, and shut up the door of honour to the rest of the nation, Walpole said—"How can their Lordships expect the Commons to give their concurrence? . . . How would they themselves receive a bill which should prevent a baron from being made a viscount, a viscount an earl, an earl a marquess, and a marquess a duke? Would they consent to limit the number of any rank of peerage? Certainly none; unless, perhaps, the dukes. If the pretence for this measure is, that it will tend to secure the freedom of parliament, I say that there are many other steps more important and less equivocal, such as the discontinuance of bribes and pensions. That this bill will secure the liberty of parliament I totally deny: it will secure a great preponderance to the peers; it will form them into a compact impenetrable phalanx, by giving them the power to exclude, in all cases of extinction and creation, all such persons from their body as may be obnoxious to them." Steele also delivered a remarkable speech against the bill, which, indisputably, would have brought more dangers to the constitution than it could have removed from it, and which would, indeed, have prodigiously enhanced the ambition or "the perverse haughtiness of the aristocracy." Lord Sunderland, to smooth the way for the bill, had caused it to be hinted or promised that, if the Lower House would but pass it, the Lords would consent to part with their privilege of scandalum magnatum, and permit the Commons to administer an oath; and that the king should give up the prerogative of pardoning after an impeachment: but the offer of these "mere trifles, in comparison with the innovations projected,"* was wholly ineffectual; nor did the speeches of Craggs, Lechmere, Aislabie, Hampden, and the other ministerial Whigs make much impression on the House after the triumphant declamation of Walpole, who, in the words of Speaker Onslow, "bore down everything before him." The bill was rejected by a majority of 269 against 177. In spite of this signal defeat ministers continued to hold office. This was no novelty, nor was it considered a dishonour; but what must have appeared dishonourable even in those days was the indisputable fact that Walpole, seeing he could not displace them, began to compromise—promised to support at least parts of this very peerage bill, and in less than six months accepted a subordinate office under them.

It was during this session of parliament that the memorable South Sea Company Bill received the royal assent. Nine years before the date at which we are arrived, Harley, in the straits and difficulties in which he found himself by the decline of public credit consequent on the sudden dismissal of the Whigs, formed a project which was called his master-piece. He found that the floating debt of the nation amounted to about ten millions, and to settle a fund for paying the interest of 6 per cent., he rendered permanent all the duties upon wines, vinegar, tobacco, India goods, wrought silks, whale-fins, and some other commodities; and, to allure the creditors with the hopes of inestimable advantages from a monopoly of the trade to the South Sea, he proposed that the proprietors of this funded debt, or those to whom the money was owing by the nation, should form themselves into a company to be called "The South Sea Company." The project took wonderfully with the holders of the debentures and capitalists, and under the auspices of the ministry they were incorporated by act of parliament as the Governor and Company of Merchants of Great Britain trading to the South Seas and other parts of America. But the Bourbon Philip, who was allowed by the peace of Utrecht to retain Spain and the Indies, was far too jealous to admit the British to a free trade in the South Seas or to any part of his dominions; and all that the Company obtained was the nationally dishonouring assiento or contract by which they had the privilege of supplying Spanish America with negroes torn from Africa, for thirty years to come, with permission to send one ship annually with a cargo of goods for sale—which privileges had been secured to England at the peace of Utrecht, and were now made over to the new company by the government. But circumstances occurred which prevented the South Sea Company from reaping any advantages even from this foul monopoly in human flesh and this limited adventure in goods. Their first annual ship did not sail till 1717, and the very next year the trade was suppressed in consequence of Byng's operations in the Mediterranean and the open war with Spain, which led to the total suppression of the factories of the company and the seizure and detention of their servants. We were now, indeed, at peace with Spain, but the commercial jealousies of that country remained unaltered and unalterable; and, unless by way of conquest and perma-

ment occupation, there was scarcely a hope of securing any considerable share of the advantages of a trade in the South Seas and with her colonies; or, rather, there was no hope of being able to make a trade—for, under the miserable system which had been pursued, all commerce had remained stunted, or had died away of an atrophy, the mother-country herself deriving the least possible advantages from the rich regions she possessed, and representing to the letter the fable of the dog in the manger. Yet, with these certainties before them, with a blindness even greater than that of the enthusiastic theorist Paterson, British ministers now conceived that the South Sea Company might, by an extending trade, pay off in a trice all the national incumbrances, which in reality were only to be cleared off by slow degrees by an inviolable sinking-fund. Sir John Blunt, a leading South Sea director, a financier well read in the school of Law and Paterson, exhibited the many advantages which would result from consolidating all the funds into one; and he persuaded Stanhope, Sunderland, and Aislabie, the chancellor of the exchequer, that his company could do the business of the government and the nation in the surest and best manner. The great object was to get rid of the irredeemable annuities which had been granted in the two last reigns, mostly for terms of ninety-nine years, and which amounted at present to nearly 800,000*l.* a-year; and Blunt and his company undertook to do this, and to liquidate the entire national debt in the course of twenty-six years, provided only that all the different public securities were reduced to one aggregate fund in their hands, that they were vested with certain commercial privileges, and authorised to take in by purchase or subscription both the redeemable and irredeemable debts of the nation, at such rates and prices as should be agreed upon between the company and the respective proprietors. Aislabie, as chancellor of the exchequer, opened this business in the Commons in the month of February, and declared that, if the proposal was accepted, the prosperity of the nation would be marvellously increased and all her debts be paid. Secretary Craggs was equally sanguine, and thought that every member of the House must be ready and willing to embrace the proposal which had been explained to them in so clear and intelligible a manner by the chancellor of the exchequer. But when there had been a doubting silence for nearly a quarter of an hour, Mr. Thomas Broderick, member for Stockbridge, ventured to say that he quite agreed with ministers, that, until the national debt was discharged, or at least in a fair way of being so, we were not to expect to make the figure we formerly had made,—that, till this was done, we could not, properly speaking, call ourselves a nation; but that it was to be hoped that, in order to obtain the best bargain for the nation, every other company, or any other society of men, might be at liberty to deliver in their proposals. Ministers, who had closed with Blunt and the South Sea Company before bringing the matter under discussion, were disconcerted by this almost inevitable suggestion; and, not knowing what to say, they lost their temper and talked nonsense. The chancellor of the exchequer declared that to admit of a competition would be like setting the nation up to auction; that things of this nature should be carried on with spirit. Here he was interrupted by Jekyll, who observed, "It is this spirit which has undone the nation! Our business is to consider thoroughly, deliberate calmly, and judge of the whole upon reason, not with the spirit alluded to." Aislabie attempted to explain, but in his anger and confusion he only excited laughter. Walpole then rose, and, in a luminous speech, strongly recommended an open competition, and the receiving of proposals from other companies or capitalists. Lechmere replied, and fell violently upon the scheme which Walpole himself had once proposed for the payment of the national debt, declaring that the present South Sea scheme was far safer and surer, and preferable in all respects. Walpole retorted, and proved by papers and figures that Lechmere was in the wrong. That irritable member rose again, and proceeded to speak more violently than before; but he met with repeated interruptions. The chairman (the House was in committee) called to order and exclaimed, "Hear your member;" but nearly the whole House cried out, "We have heard him long enough!" The chairman quitted the chair, and as soon as the speaker had resumed it the House agreed to receive all proposals that might be offered. As the principle of competition was thus allowed, the Bank of England stepped in with proposals: * as soon as the offers of the Bank were known the South Sea Company called a meeting, and, at a general court, the directors were instructed to obtain the preference, cost what it would. Upon this the Bank of England raised its offers, and then the South Sea Company raised theirs; and in this manner they went on bidding against each other like two angry clowns at a country sale. When, however, the Company had risen to the enormous offer of seven millions and a half, which they represented as a gratuity to be paid to the public, the Bank stopped its bidding, and the South Sea directors remained in possession of their rash bargain. It appears that the chancellor of the exchequer thought at one time of sharing the bargain between the Bank and the Company, and that Sir John Blunt, referring to Solomon's judgment, said, "No, Sir, we will never divide the child!" The South Sea Bill, however, was still opposed in the Commons by Walpole, who apparently foresaw that the extravagant terms of the contract would never be fulfilled; that the project would only extend the pernicious practice of stock-jobbing, by diverting the genius of the nation from trade and industry, and exciting its contempt for slow profits and careful economy. He insisted that, if the proposal of the South Sea Company were accepted, the rise of their stock should be limited; that every care ought to be taken to prevent the artificial rise of the value of the stock by keeping up a general infatuation, and by promising dividends out of funds which would never be adequate to their payment. He endeavoured to introduce a clause into the bill, fixing how many years' purchase should be granted to the annuitants by the South Sea Company; but the Jobbers on the other side—for it is pretty certain that from the beginning there was a corrupt spirit of jobbing as well as folly and a vertigo—represented that it was the evident interest of the company to take up the annuities; and, as the annuitants were free to come in or not, there could be no doubt but that the company would offer advantageous terms; and that, therefore, the whole affair might safely be left to itself, or to be settled between the annuitants and the company. The South Sea Bill was finally passed in the Commons on the 2nd of April, by a majority of 172 to 55; and on the 4th it was carried triumphantly through the other House, where only seventeen peers opposed it, and where little attention was paid to Lord Cowper, who compared the project to the Trojan horse, which was ushered in with pomp and acclamations, but contrived for treachery and destruction. On the 7th of April the bill received the royal assent, and a few days after Walpole published a critical pamphlet entitled 'The South Sea Scheme Considered.' Yet at this moment Lord Townshend and Walpole were both negotiating with the Earl of Sunderland, whom they had charged with having treacherously supplanted them; and both were on the very eve of accepting office. Walpole, as we have said, found he was not strong enough to overthrow the ministry; and Sunderland and Stanhope, who were dreadfully hampered by the Hanoverian favourites, found that they were scarcely strong enough to do without him, as Aislachie, Craggs, and Lechmere, and their other orators in the House of Commons could never stand against him in debate. The objections of the king were removed in consequence of a reconciliation, effected chiefly by Walpole's means, with the Prince of Wales.* This reconciliation of father and son took place in May; and on the 4th of June Walpole was appointed paymaster of the forces, and on the 11th Lord Townshend was named president of the council.

The restoration of family peace at court, and the partial coalition of hostile ministers, cast a damp upon the hopes of the Jacobites. The plotting bishop Atterbury, however, and, no doubt, others of his party, took consolation in the suspicion that the royal father and son were in their hearts as much opposed to each other as ever. "The reconciliation which makes so great a noise," says the Jacobite bishop, "is, whatever may be apprehended of it, imperfect and insincere at the bottom, and calculated only to serve views at the present juncture which could not have been so well attained without it. But, in truth and at the bottom, the parties, as well the principals as those who list under them, are still as much separated in interest and inclination as ever. This is the certain state of the case at present. . . . But, on the other side, if this opportunity be not laid hold of, matters will alter here for the worse; the seeming reconciliation will, by next winter, grow real, and the common necessity of affairs will drive these new allies into measures that may be for their mutual interest; and into a closer and sincerer conjunction; and the grand money schemes projected of late will settle and fix them in such a manner as that it will not be easy to shake them."† The parliament was prorogued, with more talk about the national prosperity; and, on the 14th of June, George departed for Hanover, adding, before he went, Lord Townshend and the Duke of Devonshire to the council of regency.

Walpole, though re-admitted to place, retired to pass the summer at Houghton. His solitude was soon disturbed by the verification of his sinister predictions about the South Sea Company. The company, in order to fulfil its engagements with government, had recourse to a system of artifice and exaggeration, representing, among other things, that they had made surc of inestimable markets and acquisitions in the South Sea; that they had discovered mines of hidden treasure; that they should be able to pay dividends of 50 per cent., &c.; and the people, in their cupidity, were dazzled by these visions, and, believing them all to be true, rushed with their money, like water through a flood-gate, to invest it all in the company. Men of good estate sold house and land in order to become great shareholders; merchants of eminence neglected their established traffic to reap 50 per cent. of profit; and the whole nation became intoxicated with per-centages, dividends, and transfers. As there was plenty of invention on one side, and the most abundant credulity on the other, it was not wonderful that the company's funds should rapidly rise from 130 to above 300. The strange and exciting drama which John Law had got up at Paris in the autumn of the preceding year (1719) was re-performed in London upon a grander scale, and with numerous additions; for, though the French were quite as sanguine and gambling as the English of that period, they had not quite so much money to throw away. Subscription succeeded subscription, each mounting above the other till the stock rose to above a thousand per cent. And the insolence and arrogance of the governor and directors rose in proportion, until it was said by a member of the House of Commons,—“We have made them kings, and they deal with everybody as such.” Stanhope and his colleagues, on the rising of parliament, foreseeing what would happen from mere force of example, had issued a royal proclamation forbidding the formation of companies or bodies corporate, and any raising of stocks or shares, without legal authority; but it was most difficult at any time to enforce such a decree in a country like England; and it was absolutely impossible, in the present frenzied state of the public mind, to prevent the formation of the bubble companies which sprung up and grew round the mighty original like mushrooms round a rotten tree. Among the objects for which joint stocks were proposed were the following:—to make salt water fresh—to make oil out of sun-flower seeds—for extracting silver out of lead—for transmuted quicksilver into a malleable and fine metal—for trading in human hair—for importing a number of large jackasses from Spain, in order to propagate a larger breed of mulcs—for fattening of hogs—and for a wheel for perpetual motion! “To speak in a gaming style,” said a sober financier of the day, “the South Sea stock must be allowed the honour of being the gold table; the better sort of these bubbles, the silver tables; and the lower sort, the farthing tables for the footmen!” But every day brought forth a new project, till all trade was suspended save this gambling in shares,—till ‘Change Alley was crammed from morning till night with dukes, lords, country squires, parsons, dissenting ministers, brokers and jobbers, and men of every possible colour and description,—nay, the very ladies appeared there at times, in their eagerness to transact their own business. The highest personage in the land in the king’s absence, the Prince of Wales, the heir to the throne of three kingdoms, joined in the general scramble, and put his name down as a governor of a Welch copper company! This the prince did against the advice and remonstrances of Compton the Speaker and Walpole, who told him that he was subjecting himself to a prosecution, and to a certain attack in parliament; and that “the Prince of Wales’s bubble” would be hawked about in ‘Change Alley. As soon, however, as the prince got notice that a prosecution would be instituted against the company, he retired; but, in withdrawing his name, he took care to withdraw also a gambling profit of 40,000*l.*! The prosecutions with which these unauthorised companies were threatened proceeded from the jealousy of the South Sea Company, who, desiring to monopolise all the folly and all the money of the nation, obtained writs of scire facias against the managers of the lesser bubbles, and thus put an end to most of them. But, in thus exposing the cards of others, they drew attention to their own game: they wanted only to let in a bit of the truth; but, through the breach they had made, the whole truth burst in, and people began to suspect, and then to be certain, that they had been playing their solid gold against bits of paper, which represented little or nothing, save the matchless impudence of financial projectors. The South Sea stock, that had been going at 1000 in August, sunk below 300 in September, and no exertions could ever get it up again. Bankers, brokers, merchants, goldsmiths, began to break and fly the country, each ruining hundreds or thousands of others in his own ruin. In the height of the panic Walpole was applied to by men who had rejected and despised his advice, but who now implored him to come up to London and make terms with the Bank of England, or persuade the governors of it to accede to a proposal made by the South Sea Company to keep them from breaking, by circulating some of their bonds. Walpole left Houghton, and was present at several conferences between the committee of the South Sea Company and the committee of the Bank; but, after consenting to a proposal made by him for circulating three millions of bonds for one year, the Bank, seeing more clearly the desperate situation of affairs, withdrew, and refused to keep its bargain. And just at this moment news came from France that Law, the real parent of the scheme, was flying for his life from an enraged and beggared people; and that an edict, signed by the regent, had come out, depriving his paper-money of all value. If Englishmen had been cool enough to observe the course of events abroad, they might have seen, several months before, that Law’s system was falling more rapidly than it had risen, and was crushing in its ruins the credit and resources of their continental neighbours. If the Parisians, who had once cut his carriage to pieces and almost murdered his coachman, had caught John Law, in all probability they would have made as many pieces of him as they had done of his coach. The Londoners were not quite so ferocious; but they heaped execrations upon the South Sea Company and all that been concerned in it; and “the very name of a South Sea man grew abominable in every country.” The directors, the ministers, the royal family, the king himself, were all assailed; and nearly all of them had profited by the bubble while it lasted, or lost large sums when it burst. So general had been the gambling, that one who took the pains to count the exceptions among ministers and noblemen of the highest rank could only name Lord Stanhope and the Dukes of Argyll and Roxburgh as not having been “in the stocks.” It is believed, however, that Lord Townshend had taken no share in the mixed knavery and madness: but his relative, his public and private friend Walpole, notwithstanding his denouncement of the scheme, had been deeply in it, and had been a great gainer by it, having sold out at the highest price, leaving his wife to speculate a little longer on her own account. Stanhope’s colleague, Sunderland, lost considerable sums; and the Duke of Portland, Lord Lonsdale, and Lord Irwin were so reduced as to solicit West

Indian governments. It was said and believed that his majesty and his ill-favoured German mistresses, by buying at the lowest and selling out at the highest, had realised enormous sums, which were all carried over to Hanover, to be hoarded or spent there. It was also said that these rapacious sultanas, and some of the king's ministers as well, had received large sums in stock from Sir John Blunt, the projector, and others, to recommend the project. Reports were even circulated that Sunderland, following the example of his inexplicable father in his conduct with James II., was endeavouring to urge on the king to such acts of unpopularity as might cause his deposition, and the establishment of an oligarchical republic,—that he was persuading his majesty to marry the ugliest and most rapacious of his mistresses, Mademoiselle de Schulemberg, now Duchess of Kendal, in order to destroy the influence of the Prince of Wales, whom he hated and feared. George's Hanoverian counsellors, in their panic and ignorance of the nation, suggested the rashest measures to their sovereign; but George had the good sense to prefer the advice of Walpole, to whom he applied in a very desponding humour for counsel and succour. Doubts may be reasonably entertained as to Walpole's straightforwardness, and the accusations he made against his rival Sunderland, whom he charged with having principally promoted the South Sea Act, for the purpose of securing, by distributions of stock, a majority in both houses of parliament; but the courage with which Walpole came forward, at the call of the king, to face the storm, and the ability and address with which he weathered it, are altogether indisputable; nor is it too much to say that he was the restorer of public credit, and the minister that saved the nation from the worst kind of bankruptcy. While others—Englishmen as well as Hanoverians—were completely bewildered, and doing their best or their worst to increase the alarm and confusion of the king, Walpole looked with a confident eye to the resources of the country, and to the energy of the commercial world; and he wrote consoling letters to Hanover to cheer George, and to advise his speedy return to England. Accompanied by Stanhope, his majesty landed at Margate on the 9th of November, soon after which the South Sea stock fell down to 135.

Between the 9th of November and the 8th of December, when parliament assembled, Walpole matured his scheme for meeting the difficulties of the case, and held numerous conferences with the Bank of England and the East India Company, whom he brought into a plan for ingrafting a certain portion of the South Sea stock upon their stocks. In the House of Commons, however, all the good which Walpole devised ran a risk of being frustrated, by the vehement passions of those men who were more anxious for revenge, and for the downfall of Sunderland and Stanhope, than for the recovery of their country. It was long since so gigantic a mischief had been presented to the oratory of opposition; and the Whigs that were out of place, and the Tories and Jacobites that could hardly hope to get into place except by a revolution,* joined in one thick and noisy phalanx. Pulteney moved the address in reply to the king's speech, proposing that the Commons should assure his majesty that they would at this critical juncture proceed with care, prudence, and temper to inquire into the causes of these misfortunes, and apply proper remedies for restoring and fixing public credit upon such solid foundations as might effectually give ease and quiet to the minds of his majesty's subjects. The Jacobite Shippen proposed an amendment after the words "for restoring and fixing public credit," which he said should be "as far as was consistent with the honour of parliament, the interest of the nation, and the principles of justice." He was seconded, and a most violent debate ensued, several of the members uttering bitter invectives against the framers of the act for vesting such large powers in a set of men like the directors of the South Sea Company, whom they called miscreants, the scum of the people, &c. Sir Joseph Jekyll was sure that some men who were not directors (he meant some of the ministers) were highly criminal; and he trusted that a British parliament would punish great national crimes. Lord Molesworth thought that the contrivers, executors, and directors of the South Sea scheme ought to be treated, as the parricides of their country, in the same manner as the ancient Romans punished parricides—that is to say, the guilty wretches ought to be sewed up in a sack and thrown alive into the Thames. Walpole rose to show that all this angry declamation was worse than useless—that they ought to put out the fire and prevent its spreading before they inquired who were the incendiaries. "For my part," said he, "I never approved of the South Sea scheme; but since it cannot be undone, it is the duty of all good men to assist in retrieving the mischief. With this view, I have already bestowed some thoughts on a proposal to restore public credit, which, in proper time, I will submit to the wisdom of parliament." Through Walpole's temper and influence, and through the confidence men had in him as a financier, Shippen's amendment was negatived by a majority of 261 to 103. But on the very next day the storm broke out afresh, and a vindictive clause, recommending measures "for punishing the authors of our present calamities," was carried without a division and added to the address. On the 12th of December, or four days after the opening of parliament, it was moved that the South Sea directors should forthwith be called upon to lay before the House a full account of their proceedings. The motion was hotly seconded. Sir Richard Steele declared that this nation, which two years before had possessed more weight and greater credit than any other in Europe, was reduced to its present distress by a few ciphering cits, a species of men of equal capacity, in all respects, (that of cheating a deluded people only excepted,) with those animals who saved the capitol, and that they were now to be screened by men of greater figure. Walpole and his brother Horace both opposed this sudden summoning of the directors, and this warm, passionate way of debating, which could only exasperate the distemper and delay the remedy. The original motion, however, passed without a division, and the directors were ordered to deliver in an account of all their proceedings. So summary were the Commons, that they complained on the 14th of the dilatoriness of these directors; on the 15th some of their accounts were produced; and on the 19th Jekyll moved for a select committee. Walpole again urged that they ought first to consider his remedial plan,—that any delay would be dangerous; and the motion was reduced to a vote, declaring “that nothing can tend more to the establishment of public credit than preventing the infamous practice of stock-jobbing.” This vote was subsequently formed into a bill; and on the 21st Walpole brought forward his remedy, which was in substance to ingraft nine millions of the South Sea stock into the Bank of England, and the same sum into the East India Company, on certain conditions, leaving a remainder of twenty millions to the South Sea Company.

A. D. 1721. After a long opposition, and several alterations, this project was adopted by both Houses of parliament, and a bill embodying it received the royal assent; but from various circumstances it never came into operation. The cry for vengeance continued; and after the Christmas recess a bill was brought in by Jekyll, restraining the South Sea directors from leaving the kingdom, and obliging them to deliver in upon oath the strict value of their estates. Shippen and others declared that the whole injured nation called aloud for vengeance; and they had soon petitions from nearly every county, city, and borough in the kingdom, demanding the punishment of the villainous speculators, and indemnification to the sufferers out of the confiscation of their property. The directors petitioned to be heard by counsel in their defence, as the common right of British subjects—but their prayer was rejected, and Jekyll’s bill was carried. A committee of secrecy, consisting chiefly of members that were most violent, was appointed to examine the company’s accounts and other papers. Knight, the cashier of the company, and the man that knew most of its secret transactions, took the alarm, or was induced by the fears of others, to whom he had been an agent, to fly out of England, and to take with him the register called the Green Book. When his escape was reported to the House the excitement was as great as it could have been at the arrival of the Pretender in the city of London: the doors were ordered to be locked and the keys to be laid upon the table; and General Ross, a member of the committee of secrecy, declared that they had discovered “a train of the deepest villany and fraud that hell ever contrived to ruin a nation.” Without waiting for any proof, four of the South Sea directors, who were members of parliament, were expelled the House, taken into custody, and had their papers seized. The other directors were seized with their papers shortly after. Nor was there less heat in the House of Lords than in the House of Commons. Their lordships had brought five of the directors before them, and had made them either confess or admit by implication that South Sea paper had been liberally distributed to procure the passing of the act which had enabled them to do such fatal mischief. Upon this Lord Stanhope expressed great indignation, and moved a resolution that the transfer of stock for the use of any person in the administration was a dangerous corruption. On the 4th of February Sir John Blunt refused to answer their lordships, upon the ground that he had already given his evidence before the Commons’ secret committee. A vehement debate ensued, in the course of which the Duke of Wharton, who had just come of age, and who to splendid abilities united the wildest profligacy, fell with fury upon Stanhope, whom he compared to Sejanus, that evil and too powerful minister, who had sown division in the imperial family, and rendered the reign of Tiberius hateful to the Romans. Stanhope replied, and reminded the young libertine of the example of Brutus, who to assert the liberty of Rome had sacrificed his own degenerate and worthless son: but in his transport of rage the blood rushed to his head; he was led out of the House, and on the next day the accomplished Earl of Stanhope was a corpse. The president of the “Hell-fire Club,” having killed the minister, hardly ever spoke again in the House, but gave himself up to debaucheries which disgraced and shortened his own life, and involved him in difficulties which led him to treason and attainder. Lord Townshend became secretary of state in the room of Stanhope; and, as Aislabie was crushed by popular opinion, Walpole was again made chancellor of the exchequer. Meanwhile the secret committee continued their labours, sitting nearly every day from nine in the morning till eleven at night; and on the 16th of February they presented their report to the House. It was astounding, and calculated to destroy all remaining confidence (the all was very small) in ministerial honesty. The committee stated that their inquiry had been attended with many difficulties, as the company’s books were full of false and fictitious entries, blanks, erasures, and alterations, while some of their books had been destroyed altogether or secreted. They had, however, ascertained by the cross examination of the directors and accountants, and by other means, that before the South Sea Bill was passed, and in order to get it passed, the directors in the secret management had disposed of fictitious stock at various prices, amounting in the whole to rather more than 1,200,000*l.*, to be esteemed as holden of the company for the benefit of the pretended purchasers, who made no agreement, deposited no money, and gave no security for payment—a contrivance by which the holders of the stock could sustain no loss if it should fall, and would receive all the gain if it should rise. Sir John Blunt, Mr. Gibbon, Mr. Chester, Mr. Holditch, and Mr. Knight, the cashier, who had fled, had the disposal of this stock; and they had given to the Earl of Sunderland, at the request of Mr. Craggs, senior, 50,000*l.*—to the Duchess of Kendal, 10,000*l.*—to the Countess of Platen, another of the king's mistresses, 10,000*l.*—to the Countess of Platen's two nieces, 10,000*l.*—to Mr. Craggs, senior, 30,000*l.*—to Charles Stanhope, Esquire, secretary of the treasury, 10,000*l.*—to the Sword-blade Company, 50,000*l.* The committee of secrecy further showed, that Charles Stanhope had received a difference or profit of 250,000*l.*, through the hands of Sir George Caswal and Co., but that his name had been altered in their books to Stangape; that Aislabie, chancellor of the exchequer, had accounts with merchants or brokers to the amount of 794,451*l.*; and that he had advised the company to make their second subscription, by their own authority and without any warrant, a million and a half instead of a million; that on the third subscription Aislabie's list amounted to 70,000*l.*, Sunderland's to 160,000*l.*, Craggs's to 659,000*l.*, and Stanhope's to 47,000*l.*; and that on the pawed stock which had been sold there was, by the means of Mr. Knight, a deficiency of 400,000*l.* This report was succeeded by six others, in the last of which the committee declared that the absconding of Knight, who had the key to the darkest secrets, and who had often been solely intrusted, had left them in the dark as to many particulars. While this report was reading in the House one of the ministers accused, James Craggs, secretary of state, died of the small-pox, which was then raging. It is supposed that anxiety of mind contributed with the loathsome disease in killing this accomplished friend of Alexander Pope. As to his father, the post-master-general, who was accused of similar speculation, he took poison and died of it a few weeks after. The first public man the House proceeded against was Charles Stanhope, a near relation of the late minister Lord Stanhope, and brother of Colonel William Stanhope, first Lord Harrington. It was proved against him that a large sum of stock had been entered for him, and that the name Stangape in the ledger had really been Stanhope; but, chiefly through the esteem felt for his deceased relative Lord Stanhope, he was declared innocent by a majority of three. Aislabie's case came on next, and it was so bad as to admit of scarcely any defence or palliation: he was unanimously expelled the House and committed to the Tower, to the great joy of the city of London, where bonfires were lit in all directions. The greater part of Aislabie's property was also seized. The House

next charged Lord Sunderland, who had repeatedly shown a noble disinterestedness in money matters; but their charge rested on second-hand evidence, or upon words which Sir John Blunt, now a ruined and desperate man, said that Knight had said to him; and Sunderland was acquitted by the large majority of 233 against 172. It appears indeed that one of that minister's bitterest enemies accused Sunderland not of having been the confederate, but the dupe and victim, of the directors;* and instead of making money he lost large sums by the South Sea scheme. Against the mistresses and court ladies the Commons did not proceed; but they fell with the whole weight of their vengeance upon the directors, who, as "monsters of pride and covetousness"—"cannibals of 'Change Alley,"—and traitors to their country, were deemed unentitled to fair play, and to the ordinary decencies of legal procedure. They were for ever disabled from holding places, sitting in parliament, or becoming members of any companies; their estates were confiscated for the relief of the beggary they had caused, and they were themselves allowed little better than a beggar's pittance out of their confiscated property. No distinction was made as to degrees of guilt or folly, and no attention paid to the fact that several of these directors left off poorer than when they had begun.† Among the victims was Mr. Gibbon, the grandfather of the historian, who had been one of the distributors of the fictitious stock as bribes. His eloquent grandson afterwards exposed the irregularity and violence of these proceedings, which, at the time, seemed to the public to have no fault but that of being too mild. The pamphleteers of the day recommended hanging, and a member of the House of Commons lamented that after all there would be nobody's blood shed.

In spite of his acquittal, Sunderland found himself so unpopular that he resigned the treasury and premiership, and was succeeded by Walpole, who thus obtained the summit of his ambition. He shared his power for a time with Lord Townshend, who got the secretaryship of state vacated by the death of Lord Stanhope; but Sunderland continued to be a sort of favourite or prime adviser with the king, and to have considerable influence at court. It was said to be through his influence that Lord Cadogan was placed at the head of the army, and Lord Carteret advanced to the office of joint-secretary with Townshend. Walpole's commission, as first lord of the treasury, was dated the 2nd of April, 1721; and from this date down to the year 1742 he held the reins of government in England, often in circumstances of peculiar embarrassment and difficulty. His first care now was to dissipate the popular panic and restore credit and confidence. As chairman of the committee he drew up the address of the Commons to the king. After representing the confusion and mischiefs which had resulted from the fatal South Sea scheme, this address described the cause of those mischiefs, explained the difficulty of remedying them all at once, and recapitulated the resolutions which had passed the House for re-establishing the national credit, remitting 4,156,341*l.* to the South Sea Company, dividing the remaining capital stock among the proprietors, and preventing stock-jobbing. All these resolutions were embodied in a bill for making several provisions to restore the public credit, which suffered from the frauds and mismanagements of the late South Sea directors and others. On the day appointed for the second reading of this bill, the lobby of the House was filled with proprietors of the short annuities and other redeemable debts, who tumultuously demanded justice of the members as they were passing, and put into their hands papers, both written and printed, to show that they ought not to be bound down nor lose a sixpence of the money, nor pay any penalty for the greedy imprudence of which they had been guilty. The clamour was so great that the justices of peace for Westminster and the constables were sent for before the House proceeded to business. Sir John Ward presented a petition from these proprietors of the redeemable funds, who prayed to be heard by themselves or counsel. But Walpole put the question for adjourning, which was carried by a majority of 78 to 29. As the riot grew louder, the justices of peace were commanded by the speaker to disperse the crowd. The Riot Act was read and some of the most noisy were arrested. These men exclaimed, "You first pick our pockets and then send us to gaol for complaining." On the following day the bill was re-produced, and after some slight changes was ordered to be engrossed: it was read the third time, passed, and sent to the Lords, and by the 10th of July it received the royal assent. By this bill which superseded the measure he had formerly proposed, Walpole remitted more than five millions of the seven millions and a-half which the South Sea directors had promised the public as a bonus;* their forfeited estates were applied to clear off part of the incumbrances, and 33 per cent. of the capital was to be paid to the proprietors: If not perfect, the measure did great good; but Walpole had not been unsuspected of the passion of money-getting, and he was subsequently accused of having made his arrangements to suit his own interests, and of having concluded a collusive bargain with the Bank of England. The charges, however, were never well supported, and now seem incapable of proof.

When this difficult business was ended, parliament was prorogued with a consoling speech from the throne. "The common calamity," said his majesty, "occasioned by the wicked execution of the South Sea scheme, was become so very great before your meeting, that the providing proper remedies for it was very difficult; but it is a great comfort to me to observe that public credit now begins to recover; which gives me the greatest hopes that it will be entirely restored, when all the provisions you have made for that end shall be fully put in execution. I have great compassion for the sufferers of the innocent, and a just indignation against the guilty; and have readily given my assent to such bills as you have presented to me, for punishing the authors of our late misfortunes, and for obtaining the restitution and satisfaction due to those who have been injured by them, in such a manner as you judged proper. I was at the same time willing and desirous by my free and general pardon to give ease and quiet to the rest of my subjects, many of whom may, in such a general infatuation, have been unwarily drawn in to transgress the laws." But the rest of his majesty's subjects could not help observing that Mademoiselle de Schulemberg remained an English duchess, and that the women and foreign favourites, who were believed to have gotten a far larger share of the booty than was proved against them, continued at the English court to make fresh bargains. It is difficult to estimate the extent of the greed of these questionable personages, who had repeatedly harassed the late minister Stanhope almost to death, and had induced him more than once to threaten his resignation.

After the fall of Alberoni and the evacuation of Sicily and Sardinia, all obstacles to a peace with Spain seemed to be removed, and a treaty between that country and Great Britain was signed at Madrid on the 13th of June, one of the conditions being that restitution should be made of all the effects taken on both sides. And on the very same day, to the surprise of all who were not acquainted with the motives of King George, a treaty of defensive alliance was signed between Great Britain, France, and Spain. In this treaty Great Britain engaged, by a secret article, not to oppose the views of Spain in Italy; and by another secret article France and Spain guaranteed to Hanover the possession of Bremen and Verden—a guarantee which had been obstinately refused by the emperor, who thereby had lost the friendship of George, and exposed both the dominions he held, and the others he coveted in Italy. Numerous differences were referred to the congress agreed to be held at Cambray, which met, and disputed, and dissolved without settling anything. George, in his eagerness to procure the guarantee of Spain for Bremen and Verden, had again made an offer, "touching the restoration of Gibraltar," promising in a letter to Philip "to regulate this article with the consent of parliament;" but when the secret proposal became known it excited so much indignation that he was obliged to withdraw it.* In the month of August a definitive treaty was concluded, under the mediation of France, between the Czar Peter and the Queen of Sweden, by which the fertile provinces of Livonia, Ingria, Esthonia, and Carelia, were confirmed to Russia, and nothing but the barren deserts of Finland restored to Sweden.

The first Septennial Parliament of Great Britain met for its last session on October the 19th, this year. The king, in his speech, set forth the happy event of peace being restored to Europe. During the recess Walpole had abolished various duties and had given an impulse to the national industry; and in the royal speech, which was drawn up by Walpole, further exertions in this direction were recommended. But the spirit of opposition was unsoothed, and a most violent debate arose on the vast amount of the navy debt, stated at 1,700,000*l.* The Tories—for the two divisions of Whigs had coalesced on Walpole's obtaining the premiership—represented that the money had been spent in employing more seamen than were needed; that neither the services of Byng* in the Mediterranean nor those of Sir John Norris in the Baltic had any national or honourable object: but the storm was laid in the Commons by the Whig majority, and by the dexterous parliamentary management of the minister. In the Lords the Jacobite Earl of Strafford declaimed vehemently against the whole course of our foreign politics. His lordship, who had wished for the success of the Duke of Ormond and the Spanish invasion of Scotland and England, declared that the war against Spain had been begun without provocation, and ended without advantage; that the Spanish fleet had been attacked by Byng contrary to the law of nations, without any declaration of war, and while amicable negotiations were pending; and he concluded with a motion for an address to his majesty, that he would be pleased to cause the instructions given to Byng to be laid before the House. His motion was, however, rejected by a majority of 67 to 24.

In the preceding session part of the time of parliament had been occupied with theological disputation, and the Earl of Nottingham had brought a bill into the House of Peers for the suppression of blasphemy and profaneness. This bill had been recommended to his lordship and probably written by the university of Oxford, who were excited by the publications of the famous professor Whiston. It enacted that, if any one spoke or wrote against the being of a God, the divinity of Jesus Christ or of the Holy Ghost, the doctrine of the Trinity, the truth of the Christian religion, or the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, he should suffer imprisonment for an indefinite term, unless, within a given time, and in a form prescribed, he should publicly renounce and abjure his errors: and by a clause in the bill the archbishops and bishops within their respective jurisdictions, and the justices of peace in their several counties, were authorised to summon to appear at the quarter session any dissenting teacher, and require his subscription to a declaration of faith, having it in their power, upon his refusal, to deprive him of the benefit of the Act of Toleration. Doctor Kennet, bishop of Peterborough, compared this to the establishment of a Protestant Inquisition; the Earl of Peterborough declared that, though he was for a parliamentary king, he was not for a parliamentary God, or a parliamentary religion, and that if the bill were to pass he should think of obtaining a seat in the conclave of cardinals. Lord Onslow said, that, though he was himself zealously attached to the doctrines of the church of England, he would never consent to support even the truth itself by persecution; and he moved that the bill should be thrown out—and upon a division the bill had been thrown out by a majority of 60 to 31. In the present session there was another religious debate. That respectable class of citizens denominated Quakers, who had rapidly cooled down from the blazing heat of extravagance and fanaticism to the gentlest and most amiable of temperatures, had been indulged by an act, passed long before, for taking their solemn affirmation in lieu of an oath. But in the form of this affirmation were the words—“in the presence of Almighty God”—and they now petitioned for the removal of these words, which they held to be essentially an oath. Walpole, who was the decided friend of toleration, and the court, which was indifferent about it, supported the application of the Quakers, and a bill was passed through the House of Commons without difficulty. It was passed by the Lords also, but not without debate. Doctor Atterbury, the Jacobite Bishop of Rochester, who had been corresponding almost daily with the pretender or his agents, testified a great anxiety for the security of the church, and said that he knew not why such a distinguishing mark of indulgence should be allowed to a set of people who were hardly Christians. And the Archbishop of York presented a petition from the London clergy, expressing their serious concern “lest the minds of good men should be grieved and wounded, and the enemies of Christianity triumph, when they should see such condescensions made by a Christian legislature to a set of men who renounced the divine institutions of Christianity, particularly that (baptism) by which the faithful are initiated into this religion, and denominated Christians.” But the petition was rejected with some symptoms of disgust and contempt. It was made apparent, from the beginning of Walpole's long administration to the end of it, that liberty of conscience was on the increase.

A. D. 1722.—On the 7th of March the parliament was prorogued, and, as it had sat for nearly seven years, it was dissolved on the 10th by proclamation. The Earl of Sunderland, who had continued to support ministers and to intimate publicly the large share he still held in the confidence of his sovereign, died suddenly on the 19th of April. As he had many enemies, as he was suspected of dark designs, and as it was known he was feared as well as hated, a report arose that he had been poisoned; but the surgeons opened his body and discovered an organic disease in the heart which was quite sufficient to account for his death. Since his fall from the highest offices of government, Sunderland had been engaged in a correspondence with the Jacobites; but it appears that he carried it on with the knowledge and approval of his master King George.* In less than two months he was followed to the grave by his great father-in-law, the Duke of Marlborough, who, after suffering a paralytic attack in 1716, and living for six years in a state little removed from dotage, expired at Windsor Lodge, immensely rich, on the 16th of June, in the seventy-second year of his age. His body was embalmed, and removed to Marlborough House, Pall Mall, where it lay in state. The funeral was splendid and almost regal; all his vices, his political baseness, and his more private meannesses were forgotten, and nothing was borne in mind at the moment but his high achievements as the first of English captains. Not merely the population of London, but the inhabitants of all parts of England, and thousands from Scotland and Ireland, thronged to witness the last scene of all which ended this truly eventful history. Followed by the king and the Prince of Wales, and a vast procession of the nobility and the military, the remains of the hero of Blenheim were carried to Westminster Abbey, and there deposited at the east end of the tomb of Henry VII.; the long and gorgeous ceremony being concluded by Garter King of Arms, who, standing on the verge of the equalising grave, recited the long roll of titles and honours of the deceased, and pronounced—"Thus it has pleased Almighty God to take out of this transitory world, into his mercy, the most high, mighty, and noble prince, John Duke of Marlborough."† The duchess, who survived her lord twenty-two years, said that she defrayed all the expenses.‡ After a short time the body was removed from Henry VII.'s Chapel to the chapel at the palace of Blenheim, where it now moulders in a magnificent mausoleum, excuted by Rysbrach, under the superintendence of the duchess.

While Marlborough was lying on his death-bed the nation was agitated by fresh rumours of plots and conspiracies. A star had risen in the South that revived the hopes of the Jacobites: the Polish wife of the Pretender had given birth to a son at Rome at the end of the year 1720. This child of exile, this heir to a crown that was no longer allowed to go by inheritance, was ushered into the world in the presence of seven cardinals, deputed by the pope; and at a most royal christening he received the name of Charles Edward Louis Cassimir. The happy event was proclaimed by the Jacobites in all parts of the United Kingdom; and fresh comparisons were drawn between the Stuarts and the Guelphs—the family of love and the family of hate—the legitimate exiles and the illegitimate occupants of the throne. Attention was again directed to the oldness and ugliness of King George's mistresses; and their rapacity, and the unengaging qualities of the king, and everything that dissatisfied and disgusted the nation were put together as a dark background to the beauties and graces and amiabilities of King James and Queen Clementina, and the sweet innocent young prince. While these things were producing their effect upon unthinking masses, men of deep thought and cool deliberation were laying positive schemes for a revolution. At the head of these plotters were the Earls of Arran and Orrery, Lords Lansdowne, North, and Gower, and Atterbury Bishop of Rochester; and these men of mark were in communication with Queen Anne's Tory prime minister, Lord Oxford, and numerous others who were too timid to take decisive steps at first, but ready to join might and main when the opportunity should seem free from danger. But of the bold—though there were veteran soldiers like Lord North—not one was so bold as Bishop Atterbury, who, in addition to hardihood and daring, had ability and genius of a rare order, and a truly classical mind. Atterbury's great object was to obtain a foreign force under the exiled Duke of Ormond; and he fondly fancied that, if that nobleman could land with only five thousand men, the enthusiasm of the Jacobites and the dissatisfaction of the people would do the rest. As long as England was engaged in war the bishop and his brother counsellors hoped that Spain or some other country might fit out such an expedition, and, favoured by circumstances, effect an invasion; but, now that the kingdom was at peace with all the world, such an armament was scarcely to be expected. But instead of being deterred, these resolute men resolved to proceed with that less kind of assistance that might be procured clandestinely from abroad; and they trusted sufficiently in the insincerity of treaties to believe that not only Spain, but also France, would gladly contribute to light a fire in Britain by sending, or permitting to be sent over, some of their disbanded troops, money, and arms. While the Duke of Ormond intrigued to this end at

* The fact of Sunderland's uncertain and tricky correspondence is proved by the Stuart Papers, and by Lockhart in his Memoirs, who, however, says that he was "far from having any particular proof of his sincerity." Some writers have imagined that George, in his fixed hatred to his only son, listened to schemes for his exclusion from the throne, and the consequent restoration of the banished family; but it seems far more natural to suppose that George merely wished to get at the bottom of the Jacobite plots, which were still going on without let or interruption; and that Sunderland, willing to serve him in this respect, was also desirous of winning over some of the leading Tories and Jacobites to his own party. There is, indeed, another supposition not so probable as this latter, but more so than the first, that Sunderland was really at times aiming at another revolution, in order to set aside the Guelphs and Stuarts, and establish a commonwealth. Like his father, Sunderland was a riddle.

† His sister Arabella Churchill, whose dishonour promoted his first rise, survived Marlborough eight years. By James II. she was the mother of the celebrated James Fitz-James, Duke of Berwick; of Henry Fitz-James, who became Grand Prior of France; of Henrietta, who was married to Lord Waldegrave; and of another daughter whose name is not preserved, but who is said to have taken the veil. Some time after her connexion with James, Arabella Churchill married Colonel Charles Godfrey, Comptroller of the Household and Master of the Jewel Office, by whom she had two daughters. She died in May, 1730, at the age of eighty-two.—Orange, Biog. Hist.

Madrid, General Dillon, an Irish Catholic, and an exile from his country ever since the victories of William III., laboured in the same vocation at Paris. Atterbury and his friends in England engaged on their side to get possession of the Tower, the Bank, the Exchequer, and other places where public money was deposited, and to proclaim King James III. simultaneously in different parts of the country. At one moment they thought of availing themselves of the malcontent spirit which was engendered by the bursting of the South Sea bubble; then they thought that the general election, which was just over, would be a better time still; and, at last, they agreed that the best time of all for commencing operations would be when the king should take his annual journey to Hanover, which he was expected to do about July. But in the month of May the English government was informed by the regent of France, upon condition that no one should die for it, that there was a formidable design against the person and government of King George. This opened wide the eyes of Walpole, which probably had not been altogether closed before; and the minister ascertained that the Pretender had actually left Rome, and that the Duke of Ormond was on his way from Madrid to the Biscayan coast. Expert in these matters, Walpole obtained other intelligence, probably through some of the subaltern plotters. He instantly persuaded George to give up his continental journey, and to form a camp in Hyde Park, to which all military officers were ordered to repair. He also dispatched General Macartney to bring over troops from Ireland, apprehended some suspected persons in Scotland, applied to the States of Holland to have ships and land-troops in readiness, sent Colonel Churchill to Paris to deal with the regent, and obtained from the court of Madrid an order to prevent the embarking of Ormond. King George settled himself at Kensington, in the rear of the camp and in the midst of troops; the Prince of Wales retired to Richmond. As Walpole had now the names of the chief conspirators and proofs of their guilt, warrants were issued for the apprehension of some of them. On the 21st of May, Kelly, a non-juring clergyman, was seized at his lodgings in Bury-street, St. James's, by two messengers. The messengers, who were two cowards, took his sword and some papers; but while they were looking out for other papers Kelly recovered his sword, and, threatening to run them through if they approached him, he burnt his most important paper at a candle, holding it with his left hand, while he pointed his sword with his right. As soon as the important manuscript was burnt its spirited owner surrendered. Neynoe, an Irish Catholic priest, on his arrest, tied the blankets and sheets of his bed together, and descended from a window two stories high to a garden-wall that abutted on the Thames: he then leaped into the water, but not being able to swim was drowned. Layer, a young barrister of the Temple, escaped, but was presently recaptured. Thomas Carte, the learned and industrious Jacobite historian, who was deep in the plot, fled betimes and got safe into France: Plunket, an Irish Jesuit, who had been active in many plots, was seized with his papers. Lord North, upon learning the arrest of the young Templar, Layer, his friend or confidant, fled in disguise to the Isle of Wight; but before he could get away to the continent he was discovered, and was soon made fast in London. Subsequently Lord Orrery, who was indisputably a principal conspirator, and the Duke of Norfolk, were sent to the Tower; but in both cases there was either a want of evidence or a wish on the part of government to spare them; and they were liberated after a short confinement. There seems to have been an intention or a desire to overlook the plotting bishop altogether, but proofs accumulated upon proofs, and it was judged indispensable to commit him. The warrant, however, was not executed till the 24th of August, when Atterbury was arrested at his deanery at Bromley, in Kent, and brought before the privy council. He was cool and collected; not a word could be extracted from him to endanger either himself or his friends; and after a short examination he was sent to the Tower. No sooner was his captivity known than the high churchmen set up a cry against the sacrilegious arrest of a bishop, vowing and maintaining that there was no plot at all, and that an iniquitous ministry was seeking the ruin of their opponents by inventions and fictions. The parochial clergy in many of the churches of London and Westminster even publicly prayed for him. Provoked by these demonstrations, and anxious to keep so dangerous a prisoner close and well watched, the government caused the bishop to be treated with unusual severity in the Tower. In the mean time the king, attended by the prince, made a summer progress through the western counties, endeavouring, somewhat of the latest, to efface evil personal impressions and to cultivate popularity.

On the 9th of October the second septennial parliament assembled, to all appearance calm and confident in the midst of that general alarm and excitement. The elections had been most favourable to Walpole and the Whigs, and the opposition was rather loud-toned than formidable. The royal speech disclosed the particulars of the late Jacobite plot. "I should less wonder at it," said George, "had I, in any one instance, since my accession to the throne invaded the liberty or property of my subjects." In treating of the ingratitude, implacability, and infatuation of the disaffected, he said, with unanswerable truth:—"By forming plots they depreciate all property that is vested in the public funds, and then complain of the low state of credit; they make an increase of the national expenses necessary, and then clamour at the burden of taxes, and endeavour to impute to my government, as grievances, the mischiefs and calamities which they alone create and occasion." After voting a highly complimentary address, the Commons at once proceeded to that always questionable measure of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act; and they called for a longer suspension than had been before granted. Some members objected to the term of a year, and proposed six months, declaring that, at the end of that period, the measure might be renewed if necessary: but the amendment was rejected by an immense majority, and the suspension was carried for a whole year. The next subject they fell upon was an insane declaration of the Pretender, dated Lucca, the 20th of September of the present year, and which coolly proposed, among other absurdities, that George should deliver up the throne of Great Britain, and retire to Germany with the title of king in his native dominions, and with his chances of the succession to the English throne in a legitimate way unimpaired by his usurpation. Both Lords and Commons expressed their utmost astonishment and indignation at the surprising insolence of this document, which had been printed and industriously circulated in England; and with little ceremony they ordered it to be burnt by the common hangman. Walpole, in some unusual vision of poetical justice, conceived that the Papists were at the bottom of the late plot, and that those ought to pay for the mischief who had made it. He accordingly brought in a bill for raising a hundred thousand pounds by a tax upon the real and personal estates of all Papists, or persons educated in the Romish religion, to go towards defraying the expenses occasioned by the late attempt. The good sense and feeling of many revolted at this indiscriminate punishment, which savoured of the dark ages; but the motion was carried, nevertheless, by a triumphant majority of 217 to 168. As, however, there was no concealing the fact that priests of the Church of England had been as busy in the plot as priests of the Church of Rome, it was deemed but fair to lengthen the lash, and by a subsequent motion the bill was extended to all nonjurors. The effect of these blundering and iniquitous votes was as bad as might have been expected. To save their purses, or to escape further persecution, or to get into that House of Commons which, in spite of every effort, continued to contain a small knot of Jacobites, many hundreds of men were made to commit perjury by act of parliament. "I saw a great deal of it," says Speaker Onslow; "and it was a strange as well as ridiculous sight to see people crowding at the quarter sessions to give a testimony of their allegiance to government, and cursing it at the same time for giving them the trouble of so doing, and for the fright they were put into by it."

A.D. 1723.—The young Templar, Mr. Layer, was tried and convicted in the Court of King's Bench of having enlisted men for the Pretender's service, in order to stir up a rebellion. He was relieved, and examined by a committee of the House of Commons; but, as he would confess nothing, he suffered at Tyburn, and his head was fixed up at Temple Bar. Pulteney, who had been chairman of the committee that examined Layer and others, presented a report to the House on the 1st of March. It appeared that the names of Lords Scarsdale, Strafford, Craven, Bathurst, Gower, Bingley, and Cowper had been mentioned in the depositions. All these noblemen repelled the imputation in the House of Lords, though there is ground for believing that all were, more or less, implicated, with the single exception of Lord Cowper; and even he, as known to be discontented with the ministerial arrangements, had received solicitations from the Earl of Mar and the Pretender.* With respect to others of the Jacobites, the report of the committee was far more clear. Bills of pains and penalties, subjecting them to imprisonment during pleasure, and to confiscation of property, were carried through both Houses by large majorities against Plunket the Jesuit, and Kelly the Protestant nonjuring clergyman: and another bill, enacting banishment and deprivation, but without forfeiture of goods, was brought into the House of Commons against Bishop Atterbury.† Atterbury, who had wit to spare, and a most ample knowledge of the forms of the two Houses, wrote to the Speaker of the Commons, requesting to have the assistance of three lawyers as his counsel; and, as soon as he had obtained this from the Commons, he stated to the Lords that, by a standing order of their lordships' House, no peer might appear by counsel before the House of Commons: he was at a loss, he said, how to act, and humbly requested their lordships' direction. Their lordships got out of this dilemma by giving him leave to do as he pleased,—that is, to be heard by counsel or otherwise, as he should think fit. The bishop then wrote to the Speaker to say that he should decline giving the Commons any trouble, and content himself with making his own defence before the other House, of which he was a member, as a lord spiritual. The bill for banishment and deprivation having thus passed through the Commons without a division, was sent up to the Lords; and the bishop was brought to the bar of the Upper House on the 6th of May. When the evidence against him was gone through, the bishop produced his counter evidence. Alexander Pope, his bosom friend,—the Catholic poet, who loved the Protestant prelate, and has preserved the memory of his social qualities and domestic virtues in more than one undying verse,—was among Atterbury's witnesses. But the poet was nervous and confused; he stammered and blundered; and all that he really had to say was, that he could never consider his friend as a conspirator—that their social, happy hours at Bromley had been spent in discussing matters very different from plots and revolutions. Another author, but one of a very inferior stamp,—Erasmus Lewis, the associate and correspondent of Swift, and once the "prose-man" of Harley,—appeared on the same side, and undertook to prove, from his official experience, how easy it was to counterfeit any one's hand-writing, and how dangerous it was to judge upon such evidence. But, among his other witnesses, Atterbury was furnished with three who invalidated a confession made by Neynoe before his escape and drowning,—deposing, point blank, that Walpole had tampered with that unhappy priest. A Mr. Skene swore that he had asked Neynoe whether there really was a plot, and whether he knew anything about it, when Neynoe answered that he knew of two plots,—one of Mr. Walpole's against some great men; the other a plot of his own (Neynoe's), which was only to get eighteen or twenty thousand pounds out of Mr. Walpole! These witnesses were not much respected, and one of them had been whipped and pilloried at Dublin for a treasonable libel; yet Walpole judged it necessary to reply to their charges, and appeared as a witness in the House of Lords. Atterbury, who always considered him as the author of his ruin, fixed upon the minister with all his might and with all his wit, endeavouring to perplex him. "A greater trial of skill," says Speaker Onslow, "scarce ever happened between two such combatants; the one fighting for his reputation, the other for his acquittal." But the minister sustained that intellectual wrestle without cross or fall; and little was left to the bishop but to rely on a touching appeal to the feelings of the House. On the 11th of May he delivered his defence, beginning with a recital of the hardships he had suffered in the Tower, and the restrictions which had been put upon his only consolation—the visits of his beloved daughter. "Such usage, such hardships, such insults as I have undergone," said the bishop, "might have broke a more resolute spirit and a much stronger constitution than falls to my share. . . . By which means, what little strength and use of my limbs I had when committed, in August last, is now so far impaired that I am very unfit to appear before your lordships on any occasion, but especially when I am to make my defence against a bill of so extraordinary a nature." He then proceeded, in a speech that was both eloquent and argumentative, to refute the evidence against him. He made the most of the best argument he had to use, which was, the apparent want of a motive to drive him into the desperate paths of conspiracy and revolution. He professed that he had no ambition to climb into a higher station in the church; that he coveted not money, but had always been contented with little, spending the revenues of his poor bishopric in repairs, hospitality, and charity; that so far from having any inclination towards popery, he had written, thirty-seven years ago, in defence of Martin Luther; and would now burn at the stake rather than, in any material point, depart from the Protestant religion as professed in the Church of England. As to any suspicion of his favouring arbitrary power, he maintained that the whole course of his life spoke against it; for he had always been a friend to the liberty of the subject. He objected to the evidence which had been produced against him, and concluded with pious ejaculations from the Scripture, and professions of submission to the will of God. He was answered by one of the counsel for the bill; and then the Lords took their debate on the question "That this bill do pass." Most of the bishops were silent or adverse to their brother; but that profligate layman the young Duke of Wharton stood up in his defence, and Lord Cowper also maintained his innocence, and declared that parliament was not competent to pass sentence of deprivation upon a bishop. But, upon a division, the bill was carried through the Lords by a majority of 83 to 43, and within a few days it received the royal assent. The bishop took an affecting leave of the poet Pope and his other friends, who, somewhat strangely, compared him to Cato; and on the 18th of June he was embarked on board a king's ship and conveyed to Calais. Atterbury threw himself at once into the service of the Pretender, and became his confidential agent, first at Brussels and afterwards at Paris; and all the while he represented to the quiet part of his friends and admirers at home that he was eating the bread of poverty and exile with a meek and an enduring spirit, and finding consolation for the wrongs of princes and politicians in religion and divine philosophy. Upon his first landing in France he learned that Lord Bolingbroke, who, after long bargaining and making a pointed exposure of the weakness of the Pretender's character and the hopelessness of his cause,* had just received his pardon from King George, was on the point of returning to England, which the bishop had left for ever. The ex-prime minister or chief secretary of the luckless Stuart had obtained his pardon through the sagacious Lord Stair, who had told his court that no man could do so much injury to the Jacobite cause, and through the rapacious Duchess of Kendal, who was bribed to remove impediments. Walpole, who afterwards accused Bolingbroke of baseness and ingratitude, got the pardon passed under the great seal. This pardon, however, merely secured the person of Bolingbroke in England, and comprised no reversal of the attainder in relation to his estates and his seat in the House of Lords, which could not be granted by the king without a special act of parliament. Upon his arrival at London, in the month of June, he applied all his energy and ability to recover his seat; but the king had already departed for Germany, and was not expected to return for some time; and, what was worse, he had taken the Duchess of Kendal with him. As he had made money in France in Law's Mississippi scheme, and as he had recently married a rich French lady, Madame de Villette, a niece of Madame de Maintenon, the last and unctuous mistress of Louis XIV., Bolingbroke had cash and to spare;

and, though money had been already paid to the Schuëberg, it appears that he brought over more for that grasping sultana. He renewed his connexion with his friend Sir William Wyndham, who was still the leader of the Tories in the House of Commons; and, waiting upon Walpole, whom he envied and hated, he attempted to persuade that minister that his allies, the Tories, might, upon conditions, be brought to coalesce with him. But Walpole sternly rejected any such union; he told Bolingbroke that, as his entire restoration to his property and his seat in the House of Lords must depend upon a Whig parliament, he would do well to shun any new engagement with the Tories; and that ministers would not hazard the king's affairs by proposing his restoration rashly. The Anglo-Frenchman then returned to France, where he was more at home than in his native country, and where he remained till September, 1724, mixing in fresh political intrigues, and amusing his leisure with writing philosophical letters to his friends, in which he denounced in good set phrases the crimes and follies of ambition.* The profligate Abbé Dubois, who had risen to be a cardinal and prime minister of France, died in the month of August; and in the following month of December his more profligate pupil, the Duke of Orleans, the regent, expired at Versailles, a worn out man, at the age of fifty. As the young Louis XV. was nominally of age, no other regent was appointed, but the Duke de Bourbon in reality assumed the reins of government, and was regent under the title of a minister. Bourbon had neither the extreme vices nor the abilities of his predecessor, Orleans; he was a weak man, governed by his mistress, Mademoiselle de Prie; and Bolingbroke flattered himself that in his own person, and in that of his accomplished and thoroughly court-trained French wife, he could rule both the mistress and the prime minister, with whom he had been on the most intimate terms for many years. He soon knew that there were dissensions in the English cabinet, that the new secretary of state, Lord Carteret, afterwards Earl Granville, who was an excellent linguist, and could speak German with the king, which none of the other English ministers could do,† was endeavouring to supplant both Walpole and Townshend, by promoting all George's German measures and favouring his strong partialities. The old, lean mistress, the Duchess of Kendal, stood firm for Walpole, but Carteret had secured the younger and thinner mistress, Madame Kilmanseg, now Countess of Darlington, and her sister, Madame Platen. Bolingbroke, after weighing well which might the better serve his own turn, sided with Walpole and Townshend; and through Horace

Walpole, the minister's brother, who was then employed on an embassy at Paris, he made an offer of his services, and engaged to use his influence with the Duke de Bourbon, so as to make the relations with France run smooth, and favourably for them. At the same time Carteret and the Platens had their agent at Paris in the person of Sir Luke Schaub, who was resident minister there. In the end, and chiefly, we believe, through the manoeuvres of Bolingbroke, Schaub was recalled, and Horace Walpole was appointed resident ambassador; a favour upon which the Platens had set their hearts,* was refused by the French court, and Carteret, weakened in that quarter, was sent into Ireland as lord-lieutenant, his secretaryship being given to the Duke of Newcastle, who was contented, for a long time, to be very submissive to the premier.

On the 19th of December, after being engaged at Hanover and Berlin in long and useless negotiations, which had for their chief object the extension of his continental dominions and the chastisement of the Czar Peter, who had given fresh causes of offence, the king returned to London and prepared for the opening of parliament.

A.D. 1724.—The Houses met on the 7th of January. "I cannot," said George, in a well-written speech, the production of Walpole, "open this session without congratulating you upon the success of your endeavours last year for the safety, interest, and honour of the kingdom. The rise of the public credit, the flourishing condition of our trade and manufactures, and the general tranquillity of my people, are the happy consequences of your prudent resolutions. I desire such supplies only as you shall find absolutely necessary for preserving the peace of the kingdom, and for the security of my people. I must, in a particular manner, recommend to your care the public debts of the kingdom as the most national concern you can possibly take into your consideration. In the present happy situation of our affairs, make use of the opportunities which your own good conduct has put into your hands in considering of such further laws as may be wanting for the ease and encouragement of trade and navigation, for the employment of the poor, and for the exciting and encouraging a spirit of industry in the nation. I am fully satisfied that the trade and wealth of my people are the happy effects of the liberties they enjoy, and that the grandeur of the crown consists in their prosperity." The Commons, following the king's recommendation, made provision for the liquidation of a part of the public debts out of the surplus arising from the sinking fund. They granted all the supplies that were demanded; voted 10,000 men for the navy, and agreed to maintain 4000 additional land troops, which had been raised in the preceding year on the alarm of invasion and insurrection. The standing army thus allowed amounted altogether to 18,200 men. The Commons took into consideration the serious grievances arising out of protections which had been allowed to be granted by foreign ambassadors, peers, and members of parliament, who, not seldom, had screened profligate persons and fraudulent debtors. They came to a resolution that all such protections granted by members of that House should cease and be declared void. The Lords re-echoed this resolution, making, however, an exception in favour of menial servants, and those necessarily employed about the estates of peers. The parliament was prorogued by a gracious speech from the throne on the 24th of April.

* Madame de Platen was about marrying her daughter to the Count St. Florentin, son of La Veillière, French secretary of state, and wanted a French dukedom for her son-in-law elect. George instructed his ambassador, Schaub, to press for this favour; but the French nobility raised a terrible outcry, as the family of La Veillière was rather obscure. If Bolingbroke had used his influence with the Duke de Bourbon and his mistress, the title might probably have been obtained nevertheless. Not being able to get the French dukedom, George pacified Madame de Platen with English money, and gave her 10,000*l.* as a portion for her daughter, who married the young Frenchman.

While England seemed relapsing into quiet and content a tremendous tempest was got up in Ireland, about the coining of farthings and halfpence. During the lord-lieutenancy of the Duke of Grafton in the preceding year a patent had been granted by the king to Mr. William Wood, a considerable proprietor and renter of iron and copper works, for coining farthings and halfpence for the kingdom of Ireland, to the amount of 108,000*l.* sterling, in order to supply the acknowledged and often complained of deficiency of copper money in that country. This coinage was first designed under the late minister Sunderland; but it was Walpole that completed the scheme, and, in so doing, he had carefully consulted Sir Isaac Newton, as Master of the Mint, and taken the legal advice of the attorney and solicitor-general, in order to guard against unfair alloy in the farthings and halfpence, and against any other fraud or irregularity. Walpole himself, as head of the Treasury, granted the patent. But it was rumoured, and universally believed, that the royal mistress, the Duchess of Kendal, had taken money from the patentee, or that Wood had promised her a share of the profits he should derive from making farthings for the Irish poor; and the patent was flagrantly passed without consulting the parliament, the lord-lieutenant, or the privy council of Ireland. The Irish parliament felt the insult, and proceeded to exaggerate the wrong with their usual heat and imaginativeness. But the storm might have passed over like so many others if it had not been for the tremendous pen of Dr. Jonathan Swift. That ambitious and intriguing churchman was cut off from all hopes of the mitre by the downfall of Oxford and Bolingbroke, and found himself compelled to retire to the deanery of St. Patrick. He hated Ireland, and always considered his residence in that country as an exile; but he was by accident of birth an Irishman, and he determined to step forward as a patriot, in order solely to wreak his vengeance upon his political enemies, and to make the English cabinet feel how dangerous a thing it was to disappoint the hopes and stir up the black bile of such a penman. The matter, in its most important part, resolved itself into a question of chemistry, about which Dean Swift knew no more than his Lilliputians and Brobdignagians knew about steam-engines; but he was well aware that the Irish people knew just as little as himself; he found the cry ready made to his mouth, and he proclaimed that the farthings and halfpence were of a most base quality, and alloyed beyond all precedent. Now, in fact, these Irish farthings and halfpence were proved, by experiments at the Mint, made under the direction of Newton, to equal or exceed, in weight and purity, coins of the same denomination in England. Still, however, part of the wrong remained indisputable:—for the king to delegate a branch of his prerogative to a private projector like Wood,* without the consent or concurrence of the legislature of Ireland, was arbitrary; and that his mistress should have gone designedly and corruptly into the business was revolting. Both the Irish Houses of Parliament joined in addressing the crown, and Swift began to publish his far-famed Drapier's Letters; and, not satisfied with writing, he even preached against Wood's halfpence from the pulpit. Nothing was heard of in Dublin, in all Ireland, but Wood and his accursed coinage. As paper followed paper from the witty and most caustic pen of the dean, the excitement was increased till it reached almost the point of madness. All distinctions of parties seemed to cease; the Protestant was as violent as the papist, the Presbyterian as loud as the high-churchman, and Whigs, Tories, Orangemen, and Rapparees, all joined together in the universal malediction. Wood's relatives in Ireland were in danger of their lives: at the instigation of the dean the grand jury and the rest of the inhabitants of the liberty of the dean and chapter of St. Patrick's, Dublin, joined in an association for refusing any of the halfpence or farthings already coined, or that should hereafter be coined by "one William Wood;" the merchants to whom the coin had been consigned, fearing the popular fury, announced by public advertisement that they had nothing to do with it; by degrees every shopkeeper, every vintner, every dealer of any kind refused the currency; and even the hawkers, errand-boys, and link-boys rejected it with contempt, since they could "neither get news, ale, tobacco, nor brandy for such cursed stuff." Riotous processions were got up, and the effigy of the unfortunate projector, William Wood, was dragged through the streets of Dublin and then burned. In addition to the Drapier's Letters and his sermons, the fertile genius of Swift furnished the hawkers with a variety of coarse ballads and satires in prose, which made the welkin ring, and which were quite intelligible to the most ignorant ear. But he did not confine himself to the false side of the question or to the alloy of the coinage: as he wrote on he grew bolder and clearer, until he proclaimed that Ireland was or ought to be an independent country, not to be governed,—as she was almost exclusively,—by natives of England; that her throne was held by a different right, and might be conferred upon a different prince, and that, by the laws of God, of nature, of nations, and of their country, the Irish were and ought to be as free a people as their brethren in England. It was when the tempest was at its highest that Carteret arrived as lord-lieutenant: he offered a reward of 300*l.* for the discovery of the author of The Drapier's Letters; and Harding, the printer, was thrown into prison and a crown prosecution prepared against him. Swift had no intention of relieving the poor printer by declaring himself; but he presented himself at a levee of the lord-lieutenant, and sternly demanded of Carteret the meaning of these severities against a poor and industrious tradesman, who had published two or three papers designed for the good of his country. Lord Carteret, who knew Swift personally, and who could hardly have doubted of his being the author, evaded the expostulation by an apt quotation from Virgil, and let the dean go his way. Walpole had endeavoured to let the scheme drop gradually by a proclamation which limited Wood's coinage to 40,000*l.* instead of the 108,000*l.* originally contracted for; but the Irish insisted that they would not take a shilling of the brass; and, in the end, it was all withdrawn, to the great loss and almost entire ruin of the projector, who, however, was eventually indemnified by a grant of 3000*l.* a-year for the term of twelve years. When the bill against the printer, Harding, was brought before the grand jury they made a return of "ignoramus." The dean rose to the very apex of popularity, and was cherished as a patriot by the country which he had, in some respects, really served, but only to gratify his spite. Lord Carteret, who, in effect, had been sent to struggle through the difficulties which his rival, Walpole, had created, was held up as a tyrant and an oppressor as long as he resisted, and was treated with insult and contempt when he yielded.*

As this Irish tempest died down the wind, another storm rose in Scotland, not about farthings but about malt. The Scots had never been subjected to the malt-tax, and had hitherto resisted all attempts to impose it upon them as contrary to the articles of the Union. Walpole, knowing the violent feeling of the nation, would gladly have connived at their escape; but some jealous English country gentlemen had brought the subject before the House of Commons, and he had been obliged to consent that a duty of three-pence on every barrel of ale should be raised in Scotland in lieu of the malt-tax. "Some of the Scottish members had voted for this duty upon ale, but the Scottish people were resolved not to pay it. At Glasgow the mob assembled, and shouting, Down with

Walpole! broke open and plundered the house of Mr. Campbell of Shawfield, member for that city, who had voted with ministers. General Wade, who was commanding the forces in Scotland, sent Captain Bushell with two companies of foot to put down this disturbance. The captain drew up his men in the streets of Glasgow—the mob pelted them with stones—he fired among them without shot—the mob, unhurt, pelted more violently than before—and then he ordered his men to put ball in their muskets and fire point-blank. Nine persons fell dead and many more were wounded; but the mob, instead of dispersing, fell upon the soldiery, drove them out of the town, and pursued them on their road to Dunbarton Castle, into which Bushell threw himself. Hereupon General Wade marched into Glasgow with a considerable force, seized some of the rioters, apprehended the chief magistrates, and sent them prisoners to Edinburgh Castle. But when the Glasgow magistrates were brought before the Lords of Justiciary, charged with timidity or treachery for not checking the riots, they were declared innocent and immediately discharged. Captain Bushell, on the other hand, being brought to trial for murder, was convicted and condemned; but the government stepped in with a royal pardon and promoted him in the service. It was suspected by Walpole that the Duke of Roxburgh, who was at that time secretary of state for Scotland, and who had been in close alliance with his rival Carteret, encouraged these popular commotions, in order to break down his ministry; and forthwith Roxburgh was dismissed, his office was abolished, and Walpole's close ally the Earl of Ilay, brother to the Duke of Argyll, was sent down to Scotland to pacify the country. Ilay was very successful; and in a short time Walpole congratulated himself that he had got Scotland as well as Ireland into a state of quiet.

Parliament met on the 12th of November; and the king, though embarrassed by continental politics and alarmed by the intelligence of a close alliance between Russia and Sweden, professed the highest satisfaction at the prosperous state of his affairs abroad, as well as at the perfect tranquillity at home. He, however, was most anxious that no reduction should be made in the forces, and by the management of Walpole, who was notoriously organising a regular system of bribery and corruption in the House of Commons, the army was continued as it was for another year.

The misdoings of Parker, Earl of Macclesfield and lord chancellor, had gone to such an extent that it was imperative to check and punish him. Warned by the public voice he resigned the great seal, hoping thereby to save his iniquitous gains and escape punishment; but Sir George Oxendon carried his impeachment in the Commons, and he was brought to the bar of the Lords, charged with having made unusual and exorbitant profits by the sale of masterships in Chancery, &c., with having abused his trust in using the money of suitors, and of widows and orphans, to whom he was the legal guardian, and with other enormous abuses. He was unanimously found guilty by his peers, and sentenced to pay a fine of 30,000*l.*, and to be imprisoned in the Tower till he paid it. A motion, however, to disable him from sitting in parliament or holding any future office, was lost by a small majority. Sir Peter King, one of the justices of the Common Pleas, now created Baron King, succeeded Macclesfield in the chancellorship.

Lady Bolingbroke was now in England, with a well-filled purse, to work out her husband's full restoration. She got introduced at court, where the king did not like her; but the Duchess of Kendal took her money; and through that means Walpole was constantly assailed for a bill to restore Bolingbroke both to his property and to his seat.* Walpole, who would as soon have seen his satanic majesty in the British parliament, resolutely maintained that Bolingbroke ought never to be restored to his seat in the Lords; but he willingly enough consented to a bill for putting him in possession of his forfeited estates. This bill was brought in by Lord Finch and seconded by Walpole himself; but it was opposed by the hottest of the Whigs, and by the few decided Jacobites in the House, who could never forgive what they considered Bolingbroke's treachery to the Pretender. The bill, however, was carried through the Commons by a majority of 231 to 113; and the Lords acceded, notwithstanding a strong protest signed by five peers.† Presently after this Bolingbroke came back again and fixed his residence in England, much less thankful at what parliament or ministers had given him than furious at what they withheld. According to Horace Walpole, as he could not decently avoid waiting upon his father to thank him, he was invited by the minister to dine with him at Chelsea;—"but whether tortured at witnessing Walpole's serene frankness and felicity, or suffocated with indignation and confusion at being forced to be obliged to one whom he hated and envied, the first morsel he put into his mouth was near choking him, and he was reduced to rise from table and leave the room for some minutes."‡ In a letter announcing his arrival to his friend Dean Swift, Bolingbroke said, "Here I am, two-thirds restored; my person safe (unless I meet hereafter with harder treatment than even that of Sir Walter Raleigh); and my estate, with all the other property I have acquired, or may acquire, secured to me. But the attainder is kept carefully and prudently in force, lest so corrupt a member should come again into the House of Lords, and his bad leaven should sour that sweet untainted mass." But if this man of infinite wit and intrigue, and surpassing eloquence, could point to peers nearly as guilty as himself, there was no Jacobite or plotting member of the House of Lords that could be half so dangerous, or that had even a tittle of his ability for mischief. In keeping him out of that house Walpole, as his son observes, had paid him the compliment of avowing that his eloquence was to be feared. But the returned exile could write almost as well as he could speak; and, not being able to assail the ministry with his tongue, he soon began to lash them with his pen. In a little more than a year after his return he began to publish a political paper called 'The Craftsman,' in which he assailed Walpole with terrible invectives. "Craftsmen, pamphlets, libels, combinations, were showered on, or employed for years against, the prime minister, without shaking his power or ruffling his temper: and Bolingbroke had the mortification of finding his rival had abilities to maintain his influence against the mistresses of two kings, with whom his antagonist had plotted in vain to overturn him."§ At the same time Bolingbroke drew close his old bonds of alliance with the ultra-Tories, whom he had recently treated with contempt, and struck up a side friendship with the ultra-Whigs—with Pulteney and the other discontented men who had fallen off from Walpole. This celebrated party-leader, William Pulteney, had been, from his first appearance in public life, the friend and steady adherent of Walpole; but irritated at the slowness of his promotion—he was only cofferer of the household—and apparently convinced that the jealous monopolising spirit of Walpole would keep him down, he went into opposition and became the head of those who were called the Patriots. He presently was deprived of his place; and he then joined Bolingbroke in an attempt to write down the ministry. 'The Craftsman,' it appears, was planned between Pulteney and the returned exile. Since the time when Bolingbroke, as Mr. St. John, captivated and ruled that House, there had been no speaker in the Commons, except Walpole, that could at all cope with Pulteney, who has been called "the unrivalled orator."

A.D. 1725. In the beginning of the preceding year the hypochondriac Philip of Spain had retired with his queen to the country palace of St. Ildefonso, and there carried into effect a design which he professed to have long meditated. In a message to the council of Castile he announced his intention of abdication in favour of his son. "Having," said Philip, "reflected, these few † Methuen, though comptroller of the household, strongly opposed the bill, declaring "that the public crimes for which this petitioner (Bolingbroke) stood admitted were so heinous, so flagrant, and of so deep a dye as not to admit of any expiation or atonement; and, whatever he might have done to deserve his majesty's private grace and pardon, yet he thought him altogether unworthy of any national favour." He enumerated the instances of Bolingbroke's villainous conduct, while he had a share in the administration under Queen Anne; and concluded;—"To sum up all his crimes in one, his traitorous design of defeating the Protestant succession, the foundation of both our present and future happiness; and of advancing a popish Pretender to the throne, which would have involved his native country in endless misery." Serjeant Miller was against the pardon for three reasons:—"1. Because he thought it against the interest of the king; 2. Against the interest of his country; 3. Against the interest of the present ministry." Arthur Onslow, afterwards the celebrated speaker, and always the steady friend of the Whig ministry, strongly opposed the motion.

years, with due and mature consideration on the miseries of this life, and on the infirmities, wars, and troubles, with which God has visited me during the twenty-three years of my reign; seeing also that my son the Infant Don Louis is of competent age, married, and endowed with discretion, judgment, and talent sufficient for governing this monarchy justly and wisely, I have determined to retire wholly from the government renouncing all my states, kingdoms, and lordships, in favour of the said Don Louis, in order to lead, at St. Ildefonso, a private life with the queen, who has offered to accompany me with pleasure; that, freed from all other cares, I may serve God, meditate on a future life, and devote myself to the important work of my salvation." The council, which had been properly warned and prepared, raised no objection to this partial imitation of the conduct of the great Charles V., and the act of abdication was formally passed in a long decree, in which it was regulated that if Louis should die without issue the crown should descend to the other sons of Philip in succession, and that a council of regency should be appointed in case of a minority. Philip also took occasion to recommend to his successor devotion to the blessed virgin, respect towards the church and the inquisition as the great bulwark of the Catholic faith, and the redress of the grievances of his subjects. On the 15th of January Don Louis announced his acceptance of the crown, expressing his veneration and astonishment at the piety and self-denial of his father. "God grant," said he, "that, after treading awhile in his steps, I may have the same opinion of the vain greatness of this world." The juggle was imposing, but still it appears to have been little more than a state-trick. The young French King, Louis XV., was again in a precarious state; and Philip, who had never been happy in Spain, who had conscientious scruples about his right to the Spanish throne, and an inward conviction that his renunciation of the French crown was illegal and invalid, entertained a hope of succeeding to the inheritance of Louis XIV. By transferring Spain beforehand to one of his sons, he fancied that the opposition of the great powers would be removed; and he was ready to give fresh pledges that the crowns of France and Spain should never be united on one head. On the other side his abdication was in reality very incomplete, for he had established an administration which depended entirely upon himself, and which would receive its orders from him, though his son was nominally king; he had made deposits of large sums of money at Segovia; and had altogether so arranged matters that he could exercise the authority of a king in Spain as well at St. Ildefonso as if he were at Madrid, and seat himself upon the throne again whenever he chose. The boy Louis, eldest son of Philip by his first wife Maria Louisa of Savoy, was only in the 17th year of his age, without talent or the promise of it—a complete piece of royal inanity; he was frivolous and indolent rather than vicious; but his wife, third daughter of the regent Duke of Orleans, was inclined to be dissolute and debauched, capricious and arrogant, and she hated and despised her husband, who, it is said, out of aversion to her person, never consummated his marriage.* The management of affairs continued to be vested in Philip's prime minister Grimaldo, who continued to prosecute the ambitious schemes of the old queen, whose great object it was to obtain a considerable part of Italy for her own son Don Carlos. The business of government divided between two courts—St. Ildefonso and Madrid—was managed as if state business had become a game of riddles and cross-questions. The old Marshal Tessé, the French ambassador, was obliged to declare that this farce of king and no king could not last much longer. It was ended in seven months by the death of Don Louis, who fell a victim to the small-pox; and thereupon Philip re-ascended the throne of Spain, almost despairing of that of France, as the occupant of it had not only recovered but had been declared likely to live and beget children. The death of Don Louis alone saved his young queen from the humiliation of a divorce; the recovery of Louis XV. led to the rupture of the marriage contract between his most Christian majesty and an infanta of Spain, who, on the conclusion of peace and Philip's accession to the Quadruple Alliance, had been affianced and sent to Paris, though only four years of age, at the same time that Don Louis's young wife had been sent from Paris to Madrid. The Infanta Mary Ann was even now little more than six years old, and the French court was anxious for immediate issue, while Louis XV. had conceived a strong dislike to the person of his Spanish cousin. The Duke of Bourbon and his mistress Madame de Prie resolved at all hazards to gratify the young king, to send the infanta back to Madrid, and to procure another bride of more acceptable person and maturer years. It is said that at one time the Duke of Bourbon thought of the Princess Anne of England, and that George objected on account of the difference in religion; but at last Mary Leczinska, daughter of Stanislaus, the dethroned and exiled King of Poland, was fixed upon as a proper wife for Louis XV.; and having made this choice they sent the affianced infanta back to Spain in the month of March of the present year (1725). This insult threw the court and the whole kingdom of Spain into a frenzy. "The restored queen tore a miniature of Louis XV. from her bracelet, and trampled it under foot, exclaiming, "All the Bourbons are a race of devils!" but, recollecting that her own husband Philip was a Bourbon, she turned to him and added, "Except your majesty." Philip himself, in spite of his thin blood, declared that all the blood of Spain could not wipe out the insult, and that he would never be reconciled to France till the Duke of Bourbon came to Madrid to implore pardon on his knees. The French ambassador and the French consuls were commanded to quit the kingdom; and, as the people were as furious as their rulers and less circumspect, it was with difficulty that a general massacre of the French in Madrid was prevented. When the match-making and interchange of princesses had been at its height, Mademoiselle Beaujolais, another daughter of the late regent Orleans, had been betrothed to Don Carlos and sent into Spain; but now that young lady was hurried across the Pyrenees, along with the widow of the late Don, or King, Louis. If the welfare and tranquillity of millions of people had not been mixed up with these contemptible family squabbles and spites, we might laugh at them as at the intrigues of a comical romance! But the treaties of Europe, the complicated relations of numerous and great states, were influenced by these dissensions. The court of Madrid had agreed to leave France the power of arbitrating at Cambray; but now Philip and his queen sent for the English ambassador Mr. Stanhope, and declared their intention of throwing themselves entirely into the arms of England, which, for some time past, had been uneasy at the seeming subservience of Spain to the will of France. "I am resolved," said Philip, "to separate myself for ever from France, which instead of weakening will, I trust, strengthen the bonds of amity between Spain and England. I would place my whole friendship and confidence in your sovereign, and will command my plenipotentiaries at Cambray to reject the interposition of France, and submit the arrangement of my disputes with the emperor to the sole mediation of Great Britain."* King George, however, declined this extreme overture, which might have involved him in a war with France; and he not only refused to break with the French government, but also urged that Spain stood greatly in need of French countenance and assistance in order to be safe from the pretensions and attacks of the emperor. Upon this the court of Madrid, blinded by their fury, dissolved the congress of Cambray by recalling their plenipotentiaries, professed their readiness to abandon all the points they had been contesting with the court of Vienna, and "proposed to the emperor a close alliance against France and England." The emperor, who had never been satisfied with the conditions of the late peace,—who was jealous of France,—who detested George and his continental schemes,—and who had involved himself in a quarrel both with England and Holland by establishing an East India Company at Ostend, gladly closed with his old rival Philip; and by the 30th of April, 1725, a treaty between Spain and his imperial majesty was concluded at Vienna. It was agreed between these two princes, whose rivalry had deluged Europe with blood for so many years, that the ties of alliance and friendship should be of the closest kind—that the King of Spain should sanction the Ostend Company, and allow it all the privileges of the most favoured nations; that he should acknowledge the emperor's right to Naples, Sicily, the Milanese, and the Netherlands, and abandon all pretensions to every part of the territories dismembered from Spain at the peace of Utrecht; and finally that he should guarantee THE PRAGMATIC SANCTION, which provided that the succession of all the hereditary states of the House of Austria should, in default of males, be secured and rest in the female line:—an important point with the emperor Charles, who had no sons to succeed him. The two sovereigns further bound themselves to support each other against any hostile attack from any other power or powers: the emperor was to furnish 20,000 foot and 10,000 horse; Philip 20,000 troops in all, and a fleet of fifteen ships. The emperor Charles, as a matter of course, repeated his renunciation of the Spanish throne; but it was soon discovered that he had also pledged himself in a private agreement to secure Philip more solid advantages—to demand Gibraltar for Spain; and, should George refuse the precious rock, to combine with his Catholic majesty in recovering it and the Island of Minorca by force, and in placing the Pretender on the throne of Great Britain. As soon as the treaty was signed at Vienna the strange allies looked round to see what princes might be induced to join in their confederacy against France and England; and their eyes soon rested with confident hope upon Russia. The Czar Peter the Great had died suddenly in the preceding month of January; and had been quietly succeeded by his widow Catherine, who carried out his plans and continued his animosity to George, and to his ally the King of Denmark, who had squared his dominions at the expense of the Duke of Holstein, who had married the czarina's daughter. Money—for Spain, though languishing, had still some gold to spare—was sent from Madrid to St. Petersburg; and Catherine began to equip a fleet and to recruit her army. Philip now assumed very high and haughty language, insulted the British ambassador, and presently demanded the restitution of Gibraltar. But in the mean time England and France had not been idle, and a treaty in opposition to that of Vienna was signed at Hanover on the 3rd of September, between Great Britain, France, and Prussia; and to this treaty Denmark and Holland acceded shortly after. The whole of this treaty passed under the eye of George, who, at first, had shown some reluctance to assent to it, as it might expose his continental dominions to the rage and invasion of the emperor; yet, on our side of the water, men asserted that the treaty had been concluded and a war provoked solely on account of Hanover and the king's hunger after petty dominions on the continent.

A.D. 1726.—Having been detained longer abroad by these important transactions, it was not till New Year's Day that his majesty embarked for Harwich. On the voyage a terrible storm arose; the king's yacht was separated from her convoy; and it was not till after two days of danger and distress that she made the little port of Rye, on the Sussex coast. And on shore the weather was so terrible, and the snow so deep, that the king could not reach St. James's before the 9th of January. Parliament met on the 20th; and then Pulteney and the dissatisfied Whigs, and Shippen and the still plotting Jacobites, assailed the treaty of Hanover as unnecessary, unjust, unnatural,—as tending to destroy the balance of power in Europe, undo the trade of England, and engage her in a dependence upon France. But Walpole was ready with his overwhelming majority, and an address in approval of the treaty was carried by 285 against 107. The susceptible funds, which, on the first apprehension of the war, had fallen 12 or 14 per cent., gradually recovered, and the Commons voted their supplies with confidence and liberality. Parliament was prorogued on the 24th of May, when a strong English fleet, under Sir Charles Wager, was riding in the Baltic. Wager, being joined by a Danish squadron, ran up the Gulf of Finland, and on the 29th of May appeared before the Russian port of Revel, with positive orders not to suffer the Russian fleet to put to sea till the empress had removed all ground of suspicion, and declared her pacific intentions. Catherine was compelled to temporise: she denied any intention of war, or of giving any encouragement or assistance to the Pretender; but at the same time she prepared for war, and formally acceded to the treaty of Vienna. Sir Charles Wager continued to blockade Revel and other ports till the month of October, when the ice and storms of the North warned him to retire. During the course of the summer English diplomacy and English gold detached Sweden from the alliance which she had so recently formed with Russia; but, on another side, the capricious and violent King of Prussia broke suddenly off from the treaty of Hanover and acceded to the treaty of Vienna. Two other English fleets sailed in the spring,—one for the West Indies, under Rear-Admiral Hosier, who had orders to take or block up the Spanish galleons; and the other, under Sir John Jennings, for the coast of Spain, where it was apprehended that a new armament was preparing to carry the Pretender into England or Scotland. Jennings, who had some land-troops on board, scoured the Spanish coasts, where no armament was ready, and, after causing great alarm and doing some mischief, returned safely home; but Hosier and a considerable part of his fleet perished miserably of yellow fever and other diseases off Porto Bello and the Spanish Main. A more fatal expedition than this last had rarely left the English shore. As was but too usual in these inordinately corrupt and jobbing times, the ships had been badly provisioned and appointed, that profits might be put into the pockets of government men and contractors; and some of the ships, scarcely sea-worthy when they left England, became rotten in the West Indies.

A.D. 1727.—The parliament assembled on the 17th of January, when an essentially warlike speech was delivered from the throne. George informed the two Houses that the alliance, offensive and defensive, concluded between Spain and the emperor in the treaty of Vienna, had laid the foundation of a most exorbitant and formidable power; and that this power was levelled against the dearest interests and privileges of the English nation, which must either surrender Gibraltar and Port Mahon, and acquiesce in the emperor's usurped exercise of commerce, or resolve vigorously to defend her undoubted rights. He assured them that it was a secret article of this alliance to invade and revolutionize the kingdom, and place the Pretender upon the throne of Great Britain. He alluded to the manoeuvres and designs of Russia, and gave to the British fleet in the Baltic the honour of having prevented the empress from taking the field, and of having thwarted the measures which might have led to the invasion of these kingdoms. And he further informed them that the King of Spain had ordered his ambassador to quit England, leaving a memorial containing a formal demand for the restitution of Gibraltar. Pulteney and the patriots, Sir William Wyndham and the Jacobites, who were furnished with arguments, wit, and sarcasm by the ever busy Bolingbroke, got up a loud and long debate upon the address. They insisted that it would be irrational to approve of a rupture with Spain, the emperor, and their allies, without knowing the precise ground of the quarrel, and whether the dangers alleged were imaginary or real; and they called for papers to establish the facts stated in his majesty's speech. Mr. Hungerford asked whether the Pretender was going to embark on the floating island of Gulliver, as he could not see how he was to obtain a fleet or a convoy for England. Sir Thomas Hanmer was altogether incredulous as to the dangers with which they were threatened; and said that, though the name of the Pretender might be converted to a political use by foreign princes, in order to frighten and alarm us, his interest was never so low, nor his party so despicable, as at present. And Hanmer also said that he was extremely apprehensive that the acquisition of certain foreign dominions had sown the seeds of these divisions and disturbances; and that we had involved ourselves in difficulties by compliances, unaccountable on any possible ground connected with the national interests. The original address of the Commons, expressing their determination to stand by and support his majesty with their lives and fortunes against all his enemies, to raise the supplies necessary for the present exigency, and to enable his majesty to make good his engagements with his allies, in order to preserve the balance of power in Europe and the undoubted rights of the crown of Great Britain, was, however, carried by a majority of 251 against 81. Twenty thousand seamen and twenty-six thousand soldiers were voted. In the Lords the opposition was led by Lord Bathurst, who said that we were rushing without reason into a war with two of the greatest potentates in Europe—a war in which we had everything to lose and nothing to gain; and he dwelt upon the hopelessness of our case, as the nation was absolutely loaded with a debt of fifty millions. He was answered by Lord Townshend, who declared, with undoubted truth, that the dangers were not chimerical; that his majesty, while at Hanover, had received positive information with respect to the secret article of alliance between Philip and the emperor in favour of the Pretender, though the safety of the state did not permit him at present to lay these advices before his parliament. Sixteen peers joined Bathurst in a protest against the resolution of the majority, that the measures his majesty had taken were honourable, just, and highly necessary for preventing the execution of the engagements entered into in favour of the Pretender; for preserving the dominions belonging to the crown of Great Britain by right of solemn treaties, and particularly her conquests of Gibraltar and the island of Minorca; and for maintaining for his people their most valuable rights and privileges of commerce, and the peace and tranquillity of Europe. Some awkward questions arose about George's previous offer of restoring Gibraltar to Spain,—an indisputable fact, which Townshend denied in the Peers, and which Sir Robert Walpole admitted in the Commons; but the opposition was too weak to make any valid stand; and the indignation of the public at the demand of the restitution of Gibraltar, and the engagements of the courts of Madrid and Vienna with the Pretender, more than seconded the warlike zeal of the majority. The emperor, who probably would not have had an empire, or one of his numerous crowns, if it had not been for England and the military genius of Marlborough, behaved with extreme arrogance and insolence. He ordered his resident at London, M. Palm, to present a memorial to the king, reflecting severely on his majesty's speech as being altogether false or grossly exaggerated; denying, in the emperor's name and in the most solemn manner, the existence of any secret treaty whatsoever; and concluding with these words:—"Which things being thus, the injury offered to truth, the honour and dignity of his sacred, imperial, and Catholic majesty require that they should be exposed to your majesty, to the kingdom of Great Britain, and to the whole world: and his sacred imperial majesty demands that reparation which is due to him by all manner of right for the great injuries which have been done him by these many imputations." This memorial was printed and circulated, and was accompanied by a letter from the imperial chancellor, Count Zinzendorf, enjoining Palm to publish it, that the whole nation might be acquainted with its contents. The intemperate language of these papers, and the very unroyal indiscretion of distinguishing between the King of England and his subjects, and of appealing from the throne to the people, excited almost universal resentment. When the precious memorial was brought before the Commons the voice of opposition was silent: even Pulteney, Wyndham, and the thorough Jacobite Shippen expressed their indignation at this affront; and the House unanimously adopted a spirited address, drawn up by Walpole, "To express the highest resentment at the affront and indignity offered to his most sacred majesty by the memorial delivered by Monsieur de Palm, the emperor's resident, and at his insolence in printing and dispersing the same throughout the kingdom; to declare their utmost abhorrence of this audacious manner of appealing to the people against his majesty; and their detestation of the presumptuous and vain attempt of endeavouring to instil into the minds of any of his majesty's faithful subjects the least distrust or diffidence in his most sacred royal word; to return his majesty the thanks of this House for his care and vigilance in discovering the secret and pernicious designs of his enemies, and his goodness in communicating to his parliament the dangers that threatened the kingdom; and to assure his majesty that the House would stand by and support him against all open and secret enemies both at home and abroad, and effectually defeat the expectation of all such as may have in any manner countenanced, encouraged, or abetted the disturbers of the public tranquillity in this extravagant insult upon his majesty, or flattered them with hopes that an obstinate perseverance in their destructive measures could stagger the firmness of the British nation in vindication of his majesty's honour and the defence of their rights and privileges." This address was presented, and Palm was commanded to quit the kingdom, while the British resident at Vienna was recalled. The emperor sent declarations and manifestoes to the Diet of the empire at Ratisbon; the King of England replied to these; and personal reflections were not spared on either side. Spain commenced hostilities by laying another fruitless siege to Gibraltar, expecting to be joined by an Austrian army; but the emperor was in no condition to fulfil the engagements he had contracted in the treaty of Vienna; he saw that a confederacy he was forming in Germany was not likely to come to anything without money; that England had taken into her pay 12,000 Hessians; that Sweden had been detached from Russia; that troops had been subsidized by England both in Sweden and Denmark; that the French were collecting an army on the Rhine; and that the Czarina, though she had concluded a strict alliance with him, was wavering and uncertain. The death of Peter's widow, which happened in the month of May, completed the emperor's despondency; and, after vapouring like a bully, he seized on the first overtures of peace like a coward, and, sacrificing his rash ally Spain, he accepted the mediation of France; and on the 31st of May his ambassador at Paris signed the preliminaries of peace with England, France, and Holland. In twelve preliminary articles it was agreed that hostilities should immediately cease; that the emperor should suspend for seven years the charter of the Ostend East India Company, and confirm all the treaties previous to the year 1725; that a general congress should be opened within four months at Aix-la-Chapelle, for settling all differences whatsoever, consolidating the peace of Europe, &c. Nothing was left for Philip to do but to accede as quickly as possible to this treaty: his minister at Vienna, the Duke of Bourbonville, signed the preliminaries at Vienna a week or two after; and then the Spaniards raised the siege of Gibraltar, and the English recalled their shipping from the blockade of Porto Bello, which allowed the plate ships to return to Spain. Philip, however, did not ratify the preliminaries or relinquish any of his pretensions; and England and Spain continued in a dubious state between peace and war.

The merit of this pacification is generally attributed to the moderation and peace-loving politics of Sir Robert Walpole and the Cardinal Fleury, who had become prime minister of France in lieu of the Duke de Bourbon. But, in part, the prevention of a war was owing to the rashness, imprudence, and miserable folly of Ripperda, a Fleming, who had risen from a humble condition to be a duke and prime minister of Spain, and who, without any of his talent, had been endeavouring to follow the example of Alberoni,—an unfortunate precedent, in spite of all that Italian's energy and indisputable genius for government. Ripperda, who had boasted that he had six very good friends—God, the Holy Virgin, the emperor and empress, and the king and queen of Spain,—and who acted as if he had clutched the wand of power for ever and a day, was presently cast off at least by two of his great friends—by the King of Spain and by the emperor, who found that he had deluded him as to the resources of the Spanish government, and its ability to supply the court of Vienna with money; and after a very few months, cursed by the people and threatened by the court, Ripperda was dismissed (on the 14th of May of the preceding year 1726). Fearing to be torn in pieces by the mob of Madrid, and burning with resentment against his late royal master, the fallen minister took refuge in the house of Mr. William Stanhope, the English envoy, weeping and blubbering like a whipped schoolboy. When he dried his tears he vented his revenge, communicating to Stanhope all the particulars of the private agreement entered into by Philip and the emperor at Vienna, and declaring that that treaty aimed at nothing less than a new war of religion, and the total extirpation of the Protestant faith. It appears that he divulged many other things, but that Stanhope gathered from the whole of his revelations that the inclination of Philip to do mischief was limited by his inability, and that the treaty of Vienna might be broken without a war, if the English government acted with timely energy and prevented the coalition in the North,—all which Walpole did, as we have seen, with a high hand. The subsequent adventures of Ripperda—the very beau-ideal of an adventurer—are too singular to be passed over without a brief notice. The Spanish court demanded his person; the English envoy refused to give him up, and pleaded the rights of an ambassador to guard and protect all within his house. The Spaniards, nevertheless, surrounded Stanhope's house with a troop of horse, and dragged away the refugee by force; Stanhope protested; the ministry at home took up the quarrel, and many diplomatic notes were exchanged; but, nevertheless, Ripperda was shut up in the castle of Segovia, and kept there a close prisoner even after the conclusion of peace. In 1728 this duke and ex-prime minister seduced a maid-servant in the castle, and, by her assistance and that of a corporal, he escaped out of the tower, by descending a rope-ladder. Though crippled with the gout, which obliged him to make short journeys, he got safely across the frontier of Portugal. Shortly after he arrived in London, under the name of Mendoza, and was received with open arms by the English ministry. It was, however, considered proper at that moment not to give any new disgust to the court of Madrid; and he was conducted privately by an under-secretary of state to the house of Dr. Bland, head master of Eton College, where he lay for some time, as it were, perdu, and where he had several conferences with Lord Townshend, touching the treaties, the schemes, and objects of Spain. But not long after this, Ripperda appeared abroad in the great world, taking a large house in Soho Square, and living very magnificently—apparently upon money allowed him by the English government. When he could no longer be of any use, and when all the differences with Spain were adjusted, he was cast off. He then, in the year 1731, went over to Holland, and re-embraced the Protestant religion, which he had renounced to push his fortunes in Spain. At the Hague he formed an acquaintance with a Spanish renegade, who was acting as a Moorish agent, and with him he presently bargained to enter the service of Muley Abdallah, Emperor of Morocco. Ripperda sailed for Barbary, turned Turk, and became a pasha and a sort of prime minister. As the ministers of such potentates are bound to fight as well as write, and as Ripperda in all probability was still thirsting for vengeance, he led an army of Moors against the Spaniards at their African colony of Ceuta, whence he could see the hoary rock of Gibraltar, the dark blue hills of Spain, and the towns and villages of that Christian country of which he had once been the prime minister—all separated from him only by a narrow strait or a few miles of the opening Mediterranean. But Ripperda was not fortunate in his new military character, being defeated and obliged to resign his command. After this he is said to have decided a civil war in Morocco by his sudden change of party; and at last he retired to the protection of the pacha of Tetuan, at which place he died in 1737, at an advanced age—"whether as a Christian or a Mussulman is uncertain and unimportant.*"

If an adventurer like this had been allowed to control for a time the destinies of Spain, instruments as base had been allowed no inconsiderable share of power and influence in the court of England. Even at this very moment, when Walpole and his friends had brought the country out of an incipient war without any loss of honour or dignity, George's mistress, the Duchess of Kendal, bought over by Bolingbroke and his party, was endeavouring to ruin the minister in the king's opinion, and to reinstate Bolingbroke, not merely in the House of Peers, but also in the cabinet. Walpole, who had his eyes everywhere, discovered the intrigue, and counterworked it for the time; but he was fain to confess that, as his rival had the duchess entirely on his side, he knew not what must or might in time have been the consequences. But Bolingbroke, who had already seen all his ardent hopes dashed by one sudden royal death, was destined to another disappointment of the same kind by the same cause. George set out for Hanover on the 3rd of June,† attended by the Duchess of Kendal and Lord Townshend. He was apparently in his usual health; but on the forenoon of the 10th, as he was travelling along the road, he was seized with apoplexy in his coach, and on reaching Ippenburg he was quite lethargic, with his eyes fixed and his tongue hanging out of his mouth. His mistress and his minister Townshend had been both left behind at different places on the road; but his attendants proposed that his majesty should stop at Ippenburg, and obtain medical assistance. The king, however, recovered speech enough to say, "Osnabruck! Osnabruck!" several times, and the attendants, trained to implicit obedience, got the royal carriage in motion for that place; but before they reached Osnabruck George was dead. His unfortunate wife, who never saw England, and who never bore the title of queen, had died just seven months before him. While the Schulembergs, the Platens, and other ill-conditioned mistresses had been disgracing the court of St. James's, this beautiful, imprudent, perhaps criminal, but certainly most unfortunate, princess, had been languishing in a prison! Sophia Dorothea of Zell was married to George in 1682, when she was young and admired as well for her accomplishments, as for her beauty. George's father, the old elector, who was then living, kept a mistress or mistresses, like all the princes of his time, and it was the misfortune of the young bride to offend one of the sultanas. While George himself was absent at the army, and while his father was incensed at his young wife, Count Philip Christopher Königsmark, younger brother of Count Charles John Königsmark, who had made himself notorious in England some years before by the murder of Mr. Thynn, happened to arrive at the Hanoverian court, where he was treated with distinction as the member of an ancient and still considerable family, the head of which was governor of a Swedish province and high in favour at the court of Stockholm. This handsome Swede paid marked attentions to the neglected Sophia Dorothea, who, with great indiscretion, encouraged at the least a flirtation. As George had already discovered his exceeding bad taste—the morality of the thing was not considered in princes in those days—and as he had already more than one ill-favoured mistress, the princess may possibly have thought it fair retaliation to have one handsome lover. The old elector, in a rage, ordered Königsmark to quit his dominions forthwith. What followed is perhaps best told in the words of Horace Walpole. "The princess, surrounded by women too closely connected with her husband, and consequently enemies of the lady they injured, was persuaded by them to suffer brows, two acres of cheeks spread with crimson, an ocean of neck that overflowed and was not distinguished from the lower part of her body, and no part restrained by stays—no wonder that a child dived such an ogress, and that the mob of London were highly interested at the importation of so uncommon a seraglio! They were food for all the venom of the Jacobites; and, indeed, nothing could be grosser than the ribaldry that was vomited out in lampoons, libels, and every channel of abuse, against the sovereign and the new court, and chanted even in their hearing in the public streets."—Reminiscences.

* Coxe, Memoirs of the Bourbons of Spain, and Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole.—Lord Mahon, Hist. Eug. from Peace of Utrecht. His lordship says, "When I was at Tetuan, in 1827, I made several inquiries respecting Ripperda, but could find no trace or recollection of him." Among Ripperda's mad projects was one for what he styled a universal religion. According to this scheme, Judaism, Christianity, and Mahomedanism were to be mingled and compounded in one common faith.

† Just before his departure, the king and his strange favourite were seen by Horace Walpole for the first and the last time. That best of English tellers of anecdotes has thus recorded his recollection of the scene and of his boyish impressions. After mentioning that the first vehement inclination he ever expressed was a longing to see the king, he continues:—"This childish caprice was so strong, that my mother solicited the Duchess of Kendal to obtain for me the honour of kissing his majesty's hand before he set out for Hanover. A favour so unusual to be asked for a boy of ten years' old was still too slight to be refused to the wife of the first minister for her darling child; yet, not being proper to be made a precedent, it was settled to be in private and at night. Accordingly, the night but one before the king began his last journey, my mother carried me at ten at night to the apartment of the Countess of Walsingham, on the ground-floor towards the garden at St. James's, which opened into that of her aunt, the Duchess of Kendal; apartments occupied by George II. after his queen's death, and by his successive mistresses, the Countesses of Suffolk and Yarmouth. Notice being given that the king was come down to supper, Lady Walsingham took me alone into the duchess's ante-room, where we found alone the king and her. I knelt down and kissed his hand. He said a few words to me, and my conductress led me back to my mother. The person of the king is as perfect in my memory as if I saw him but yesterday. It was that of an elderly man, rather pale, and exactly like his pictures and coins; not tall, of an aspect rather good than august, with a dark tie-wig, a plain coat, waistcoat, and breeches, of muff-coloured cloth, with stockings of the same colour, and a blue Hband over all. So entirely was he my object, that I do not believe I once looked at the duchess; but, as I could not avoid seeing her on entering the room, I remember that just beyond his majesty stood a very tall, lean, ill-favoured old lady; but I do not retain the least idea of her features, nor know what the colour of her dress was." The other powerful mistress of George I., the Countess of Platen in Germany, created Countess of Darlington in England, was, it appears, as fat as the Duchess of Kendal was lean. "Lady Darlington," says Horace Walpole, "whom I saw at my mother's in my infancy, and whom I remember by being terrified at her enormous figure, was as corpulent and ample as the duchess was long and emaciated. Two fierce black eyes, large and rolling beneath two lofty arched eye-

the count to kiss her hand before his abrupt departure; and he was actually introduced by them into her bedchamber the next morning before she rose. From that moment he disappeared; nor was it known what became of him, till, on the death of George I., on his son the new king's first journey to Hanover, some alterations in the palace being ordered by him, the body of Königsmark was discovered under the floor of the electoral princess's dressing-room—the count having probably been strangled there the instant he left her; and his body secreted. The discovery was hushed up; George II. intrusted the secret to his wife, Queen Caroline, who told it to my father: but the king was too tender of the honour of his mother to utter it to his mistress; nor did Lady Suffolk ever hear of it, till I informed her of it several years afterwards. The disappearance of the count made his murder suspected, and various reports of the discovery of his body have of late years been spread, but not with the authentic circumstances.* They still show the spot where the murder was committed. The Princess Sophia Dorothea, who was first-cousin to her husband, was placed under arrest, and in December, 1694, a few months after the event, George obtained from the Consistory a sentence of divorce—or so at least it was stated. "Of the circumstances," says Horace Walpole, "that ensued on Königsmark's disappearance, I am ignorant; nor am I acquainted with the laws of Germany relative to divorce or separation: nor do I know or suppose that despotism and pride allow the law to insist on much formality when a sovereign has reason or a mind to get rid of his wife. . . . Sovereigns, who narrow or let out the law of God according to their prejudices or passions, mould their own laws no doubt to the standard of their convenience. Genealogic purity of blood is the predominant folly of Germany; and the code of Malta seems to have had more force in the empire than the Ten Commandments. . . . Separated the Princess Dorothea certainly was, and never admitted even to the nominal honours of her rank, being thenceforward always styled Duchess of Halle. Whether divorced is problematic, at least to me; nor can I pronounce, as, though it was generally believed, I am not certain, that George espoused the Duchess of Kendal with his left hand. As the Princess Dorothea died only some months before him, that ridiculous ceremony was scarcely deferred till then; and the extreme outward devotion of the duchess, who every Sunday went seven times to Lutheran chapels, seemed to announce a legalised wife. As the genuine wife was always detained in her husband's power, he seems not to have wholly dissolved their union; for, on the approach of the French army towards Hanover, during Queen Anne's reign, the Duchess of Halle was sent home to her father and mother, who doted on their only child, and did retain her for a whole year, and did implore, though in vain, that she might continue to reside with them. As her son too, George II., had thoughts of bringing her over and declaring her Queen-Dowager, one can hardly believe that a ceremonial divorce had passed, the existence of which process would have glared in the face of her royalty. But though German curiosity might allow her husband to take another wife with his left hand, because his legal wife had suffered her right hand to be kissed in bed by a gallant, even Westphalian or Aulic counsellors could not have pronounced that such a momentary adieu constituted adultery; and therefore of a formal divorce I must doubt." After the death of George I. many persons of credit at Hanover expressed their belief that the imputation cast upon the princess was false and unjust. It was also reported that, her husband having once made some proposals for a reconciliation, Sophia Dorothea gave this noble answer—"If what I am accused of be true, I am unworthy of his bed, and if the accusation is false, he is unworthy of me: I will not accept his offer." Those who exculpated Sophia asserted either that a common visit was construed into an adulterous rendezvous, or that the Countess of Platen maliciously summoned Königsmark at a late hour in the night, and in the name of the princess, though without her connivance or knowledge; that on his being introduced the princess was surprised at the count's bold intrusion; that on quitting the apartment he was discovered by the old elector, whom the countess had purposely placed in the gallery, and was instantly assassinated by persons whom she had engaged. But, whatever was the amount of her guilt or simply of her imprudence, Sophia Dorothea was confined for nearly thirty-two years in the solitary castle of Ahlen, on the river Aller, where she died on the 13th of November, 1726, or just seven months, wanting two days, before her husband King George.* It is stated

* The honest and able, though enthusiastic, and at times credulous and superstitious Jacobite, Lockhart of Carnwath, tells a story which makes George's sudden death proceed from an agony of remorse. "Having," he says, "mentioned King George's death, it will not be reckoned a great digression to give an account of a paper which perhaps is not so well known in Britain as other parts of Europe. About eight or ten weeks after his death, the copy of a letter was propagated and handed about at most of the courts of Europe, especially in Germany. An account and copy thereof was, whilst I was at Aix-la-Chapelle, sent by a gentleman of distinction in Paris to a French officer, and the like from Vienna to General Count Velling, governor of Luxembourg, who gave me the copy of it and assured me it was dispersed over all Germany. He added that some people gave no credit to the commission mentioned in the letter being either given or executed, believing the whole to be a story forged to vindicate the reputation of the late Electress of Hanover. However that may be, it took with a great many, and, he the story true or false, the dispersing it so industriously showed that the said electress's friends, some naming her son, and others the King of Prussia, carried their resentment high against her husband, by their endeavours to blacken his memory and represent his exit in such a manner. Follows the letter in English from the French:—

"The circumstances of King George's death are terrible and worth the knowledge of all our friends: they are kept as much concealed as possible even in Germany, so probably will be a secret both in England and France. What was told me lately, by a person of superior rank and of great esteem in these parts, I had heard imperfectly before from a lady of quality. It seems, when the late electress was dangerously ill of her last sickness, she delivered to a faithful friend a letter to her husband, upon promise that it should be given into his own hands. It contained a protestation of her innocence, a reproach for his hard usage and unjust treatment, and concluded with a summons or citation to her husband to appear within the year and day at the divine tribunal, and there to answer for the long and many injuries she had received from him. As this letter could not with safety to the bearer be delivered in England or that during her long confinement she used to receive the sacrament every week, and that every time she took the sacred symbol, she solemnly protested her innocence. Of this innocence her son George II. seems always to have been fully convinced. It is related of him that once during his father's life he had made a bold attempt to see his unfortunate mother; that he even crossed the Aller on horseback, opposite to the castle, but was denied access there by the Baron Bulow, the stern jailor to whose care she had been committed. Had she survived his accession, he intended to restore her to liberty and to all her honours. "The Second George," says Horace Walpole, "loved his mother as much as he hated his father. . . . Lady Suffolk (mistress to George II.) has told me her surprise, on going to the new queen the morning after the news arrived of the death of George I., at seeing hung up in the queen's dressing-room a whole length of a lady in royal robes, and in the bedchamber a half length of the same person, neither of which Lady Suffolk had ever seen before. The prince had kept them concealed, not daring to produce them during the life-time of his father." The well-known story about Count K nigsmark and the want of paternal and filial affection between George I. and his son, furnished the Jacobite songsters and ballad-makers with some of their sharpest points.*

The deceased sovereign, who expired on Sunday, the 11th of June (o.s.), was in the sixty-eighth year of his age. In spite of many vices and infirmities of character, he had, on the whole, submitted admirably well to the restrictions of constitutional monarchy, and had on many occasions displayed very considerable ability as a ruler and a politician. In private life he seems also to have had some attractive qualities. Horace Walpole, who was not much given to flattering kings, calls him a good-natured prince; and records several instances of his amiability, humour, or wit.† His

Hanover, it was given to him in his coach on the road. He opened it immediately, supposing it came from Hanover; he was so struck with these unexpected contents and his fatal citation, that his convulsions and apoplexy came fast on him; after being bled his mouth turned awry, and they then proposed to drive off to a nearer place than Osnabruck, but he signed twice or thrice with his hand to go on, and that was the only mark of sense he showed. This is no secret among the Catholics in Germany, but the Protestants hush it up as much as they can. . . . Register of Letters, in Lockhart's Papers. According to Horace Walpole, a fatal prophecy "warned George I. to take care of his wife, or he would not survive her a-year." "That oracle," he adds, "was probably dictated to the French Deborah by the Duke and Duchess of Zell, (the parents of Sophia Dorothea), who might be apprehensive lest the Duchess of Kendal should be tempted to remove entirely the obstacle to her constitutional union with their son-in-law."

* Every one that knows anything of their Jacobite relics and the most popular songs of Scotland will remember how many of them go to the tune of "cuckold George," meaning George I. and "bastard George," meaning George II. In nearly all circumstances, and under nearly every possible point of view, the courts and the personal characters of the two first sovereigns of the House of Hanover were but little calculated to remove or to soothe deep-seated prejudices and antipathies.

death took place in the palace of his brother, who was Bishop of Osnabruck. His mistress, or left-handed wife, the Duchess of Kendal, who had remained behind at Delden, was warned at Ippenburen of his danger, and was met on the road by a second courier announcing his demise. She beat her breast, tore her hair, and gave other signs of violent grief; and then dismissing the English ladies, who had deemed it no dishonour to attend her, she changed her route, and took the road to Brunswick. She soon, however, returned to England, where she lived till 1743, chiefly at Kendal House, Isleworth. Her great wealth would have been greater but for an interference of George II. with the testamentary arrangements of his father. The late king had made a will bequeathing ample legacies to the duchess and her niece or daughter, Lady Walsingham; and had intrusted a copy of it to Dr. Wake, Archbishop of Canterbury. At the very first council at which the new king attended, the archbishop produced this copy of the will, expecting that his majesty would immediately open it and read it. But the second George, without saying a word, put the precious document in his pocket and walked out of the room, and it was never more heard of,—the most reverend prelate being too timid or too courtly to complain, and the duchess probably having weighty reasons for avoiding discussions which might endanger some of the property she had got. It is said that another copy of the will had been deposited with the Duke of Brunswick, who suppressed it for a seasonable subsidy: and it is added that the celebrated Lord Chesterfield, who married the duchess's niece or daughter in 1733, afterwards threatened a suit in Chancery touching the will, and obtained 20,000*l.* from the court to be quiet.*

one of the rooms but an unknown portrait of a person in the robes and with the regalia of the sovereigns of Great Britain? George asked whom it represented. The nobleman replied, with much diffidence, but devout respect, that in various journeys to Rome, he had been acquainted with the Chevalier de St. George, who had done him the honour of sending him that picture. "Upon my word," said the king, instantly, "it is very like to the family." It was impossible to remove the embarrassment of the proprietor with more good-breeding.—Reminiscences.

* Horace Walpole, Reminiscences, Memoirs.—The young Mademoiselle Schuemburg, who came over with the duchess, and was created Countess of Walsingham, bore a strong resemblance to the king; and it seems to have been generally believed that he was her father, and the duchess her mother. Walpole dwells at greater length upon the will, mentioning one or two other circumstances. "The poor prelate" (the archbishop), he says, "was thunderstruck when George II. stalked out of the room with the will in his pocket, and had not the presence of mind or the courage to demand the testament's being opened, or, at least, to have it registered. No man present chose to be more hardy than the person to whom the deposit had been trusted,—perhaps none of them immediately conceived the possible violation of so solemn an act, so notoriously existent. . . . Whispers only by degrees informed the public that the will was burnt. . . . What the contents were was never ascertained. Report said that 40,000*l.* had been bequeathed to the Duchess of Kendal; and more vague rumours spoke of a large legacy to the Queen of Prussia, daughter of the late king. Of that honest demands were afterwards said to have been frequently and roughly made by her son, the great King of Prussia (Frederick the Great), between whom and his uncle subsisted much inveteracy." After mentioning that Lord Chesterfield, resenting his proscription at court, was on the point of bringing the subject of the will to open and legal discussion, but was quieted by the payment of 20,000*l.*, this caustic recorder, who got his court secrets from Lady Suffolk, the mistress of George II., goes on to say—"But if the archbishop had too timidly betrayed the trust reposed in him from weakness and want of spirit, there were two other men who had no such bias of imbecility, and who, being independent and above being basely sacrificed their honour and integrity for positive gain.

GREAT SEAL OF GEORGE II.

GEORGE II.

A. D. 1727.—Lord Townshend, who had accompanied George I. to the continent, but who had been left behind on the road, did not reach Osna-bruck till his master was dead. He instantly dispatched a courier for England, whither he soon followed himself. Townshend's messenger and dispatch arrived at his brother-in-law's, Sir Robert Walpole's, house, in Chelsea, on the 14th of June. Walpole instantly repaired to the palace at Richmond to salute the new sovereign. He found that George was retired, according to his usual custom, to take his afternoon's nap. When he was roused and informed that his father was dead he could scarcely credit the news; but when they told him that the prime minister was in his ante-chamber with the express, he started up and rushed out of his bedroom only half-dressed. It is said that he could scarcely credit the fact until Lord Townshend's dispatch was produced and read. Walpole knelt at his feet, kissed his hand as his king, and inquired whom his majesty would be pleased to appoint to draw up the usual speech or declaration to the council? "Sir Spencer Compton," replied the new monarch abruptly. The answer seemed decisive—and implied Sir Robert's dismission. That minister left the apartment and Richmond with the conviction that his reign was over, and immediately waited upon Compton with the king's commands. "Sir Spencer Compton," says Walpole's son, "was speaker of the House of Commons, and treasurer, I think, at that time, to his royal highness, who by that first command implied his intention of making Sir Spencer his prime minister. He was a worthy man, of exceedingly grave formality, but of no parts—as his conduct immediately proved. The poor gentleman was so little qualified to accommodate himself to the grandeur of the moment, and to conceive how a new sovereign should address himself to his ministers, and he had also been so far from meditating to supplant the premier, that in his distress it was to Sir Robert Walpole himself he had recourse, and whom he besought to make the new draft of the king's speech for him."* The speech which Walpole wrote was delivered

George I. had deposited duplicates of his will with two sovereign German princes,—I will not specify them, because, at this distance of time, I do not perfectly recollect their titles; but I was actually, some years ago, shown a copy of a letter from one of our ambassadors abroad to a secretary of state at that period, in which the ambassador said, one of the princes in question would accept the proffered subsidy, and had delivered, or would deliver, the duplicate of the king's will. The other trustee was no doubt as little conscientious and as corrupt. It is pity the late King of Prussia did not learn their infamous treachery. Discouraging once with Lady Suffolk on that suppressed testament, she made the only plausible shadow of an excuse that could be made for George II.—she told me that George I. had burnt two wills made in favour of his son. They were probably the wills of the Duke and Duchess of Zell; or one of them might be that of his mother, the Princess Sophia.—Glover, the English Iugonidas, who also tells the story in his Memoirs published five years ago, asserts that the Chesterfield got was 50,000l.

* Reminiscences.—Horace adds, "Sir Spencer Compton, afterwards Earl of Wilmington, was so far from resenting Sir Robert's superior talents, that he remained steadily attached to him; and when the famous motion for removing Sir Robert was made in both Houses, Lord Wilmington, though confined to his bed, and with his head blistered, rose and went to the House of Lords, to vote against a measure that avowed its own injustice by being grounded only on popular clamour." This Spencer Compton was second surviving son of James Earl of Northampton. He had been treasurer to queen Anne's husband and one of the managers at the trial of Doctor Sacheverell. At the accession of George I. he was appointed treasurer to the Prince of Wales. His intimacy with Walpole and his steady adherence to the Whigs led to the speakership; and he had also been paymaster of the forces, and treasurer of Chelsea Hospital.

that same evening to the privy council; and on the following day at noon—the 15th of June—George II. was peaceably, if not joyously, proclaimed king of these realms. He was then in his 44th year. In person and in manners George was still less dignified than his predecessor; he was also more fiery and passionate, and was generally supposed to have less talent for business. George I. had been rather dishonoured by the avarice of his mistresses than by his own greed for money; but George II. was meanly avaricious—a most unfortunate and odious quality in a prince. This master-passion seemed typified in his person and features, the first being diminutive, the second pinched and hard. He was, however, a man of undisputed courage in the field, as his father had been before him; and he had these particular advantages over his sire—he could speak English fluently though with a foreign accent; he knew the English people much better, from his having associated familiarly with them; he was sociable, communicative, and accessible on all occasions; and he had naturally a strong sense of justice and of honour. He was also much more temperate than his father, who would occasionally indulge in strong potations and disclose his state secrets over the punch-bowl. In his habits and occupations he was as regular as a piece of clock-work; and he was so much a slave to routine, that he seemed “to think his having done a thing to-day an unanswerable reason for his doing it to-morrow.”* He sometimes read history, and he had a retentive and scrupulous memory as to dates; but as for elegant literature he had no sense of its beauties, and he affected to despise what he did not understand. He hardly paid more respect to the seventh commandment than had been paid by his father, or than was paid by the other European potentates his contemporaries; but he chose his mistresses with far more taste, and instead of being a tyrannical, he was a most kind, and even a submissive, husband. It was, in fact, his good fortune, and the good fortune of the nation, that he allowed his wife, who was altogether a superior being, to rule him, and the state for him; and that his principal mistress was one of the quietest and most amiable of women. Carolina Wilhelmina was daughter of John Frederick, Margrave of Anspach, and born in 1683, the same year as her husband George. Through the death of her father and the re-marrying of her mother, she was left under the guardianship of Frederick I., King of Prussia, and she was brought up chiefly at Berlin, under the superintendence of her aunt Sophia Charlotte, Frederick's second wife and a sister of George I. From the example and instructions of this aunt, who was an accomplished woman—a solitary model of refinement in the midst of a gross, clownish, and corrupt court—Caroline derived an ardent love of literature and philosophy, with a fondness for metaphysical pursuits, which obtained for her the eulogium of Clark and Leibnitz. After rejecting the matrimonial overtures of the Archduke Charles, subsequently emperor, she espoused in 1705 George II., then only Electoral Prince of Hanover. She was esteemed handsome before she had the small-pox and became corpulent. Her hand and arm were greatly admired for their whiteness and elegance; and she had a penetrating eye, an expressive countenance, a fine voice, and much sweetness and grace, particularly when she spoke. A Whig poet, who must have felt that there was little else about the court of George I. to make it "the darling of the land," said that the princess was

"Form'd to gain hearts that Brunswick's cause denied,
And charm a people to her father's side."^{*}

In some respects, however, Caroline would have been a promising subject for the satirist; for she affected to combine the characters of a philosopher and a princess royal and proudly royal, a beauty and a wit, a metaphysician and a divine—though, in divinity, her notions were scarcely considered strictly orthodox. "Her lewes," says Archdeacon Coxé, "were a strange picture of the motley character and manners of a queen and a learned woman. She received company while she was at her toilet; prayers, and sometimes a sermon, were read, learned men and divines were intermixed with courtiers and ladies of the household; the conversation turned on metaphysical subjects, blended with repartees, sallies of mirth, and the tittle-tattle of a drawing-room." "On the table," says Lord Mahon, "perhaps, lay heaped together the newest ode by Stephen Duck upon her beauty, her last letter from Leibnitz upon free-will, and a most high-wrought panegyric of Dr. Clarke on her 'inimitable sweetness of temper,' 'impartial love of truth,' and 'very particular and uncommon degree of knowledge, even on matters of the most abstract speculation.'"[†] She took great delight in making theologians dispute knotty points in her presence; in perplexing them with questions concerning the opposite doctrines of the different Christian churches, and in carrying on a correspondence with them by means of her bedchamber-woman Mrs. Clayton, afterwards Lady Sundon. In short, her head was never free of divines and philosophers, poets, and authors of all descriptions; and it may be that all this did not tend to create in her husband a love of books and letters and literary men. George, who loved his army extravagantly, and who was nick-named by the Jacobites "the Captain," or "the Little Captain," would rather discourse with a cornet of horse or with a good corporal of grenadiers, than with all the Leibnites, Clarkes, Gays, and Popes in the world. But mixed with these femme savante absurdities, there was a good fund of homely sense, discretion, and dignity; and Caroline's moral character was without a blemish. During ten years she was more pleasing than her husband, who seldom went except when led contrary to her advice. In conversation, yet she was never arrogant, or seemed self-willed, to her husband, who, to all outward appearance, was the absolute lord and master of the woman who ruled him. She had even the very rare philosophy of living on a friendly footing with his favourite mistress, who was one of her own bedchamber-women. Always taking care, however, to make her feel the difference between their rank and stations, she used to call her banteringly, "sister Howard," and to employ her at her toilet, making her dress her head until she became a countess, but always apologising to her good Howard! This lady was Henrietta, daughter of Sir Henry Hobart, afterwards by her interest made a baron, and then created Earl of Buckinghamshire. She was first married to Mr. Howard, who subsequently succeeded to the earldom of Suffolk, and who left a son he had by her, who was the last earl of that branch. At the time of their wedding, towards the close of Queen Anne's reign, the young couple, being miserably poor, saw no step more promising than to go over to Hanover, and endeavour to ingratiate themselves with the future sovereigns of England. Mrs. Howard, though extremely acceptable to the old Princess Sophia, had no impression on the rough heart of her grandson George, until after the Hanoverian succession, when she became one of the bedchamber-women to the Princess of Wales, his wife; and even then he would have preferred the charming and lively Miss Bellenden, if she had not gone off and married one of the grooms of his bedchamber, Colonel Campbell, who long afterwards succeeded to the title and estates of Argyll. "I do not suppose," says the chronicler of these great court events, "that love had any share in the sacrifice Mrs. Howard made of her virtue. She had felt poverty, and was far from disliking power. Mr. Howard was probably as little agreeable to her as he proved worthless. The king, though very amorous, was certainly more attracted by a silly idea he had entertained of gallantry being becoming, than by a love of variety; and he added the more egregious folly of fancying that inconstancy proved he was not governed: but so awkwardly did he manage that artifice, that it but demonstrated more clearly the influence of the queen." Howard, who only wanted money, played the part of the injured husband—no doubt to the astonishment of many men about court. He went one night into the quadrangle of St. James's palace, and there, in the hearing of the guards and others, vociferously demanded to have his wife restored to him. He must have foreseen what happened—they turned him away from the palace. Thereupon he sent a letter to his wife, re-claiming her, by the hand of the Archbishop of Canterbury; and the archbishop, by his instructions, consigned this letter to the queen, "who had the malicious pleasure of delivering the letter to her rival." In the course of the following summer Howard attempted, or made his wife believe that he intended to attempt, carrying her off by force; but the end of the disgraceful story was, that "a negotiation was commenced with the obstreperous husband, and he sold his own noisy honour and the possession of his wife for a pension of 1200*l.* a-year.* But seldom has so amiable a woman submitted to royal dishonour, or occupied the invidious and most difficult part of mistress to a prince. She was pretty rather than handsome, was remarkably genteel, and dressed with taste and simplicity. "Her mental qualifications," says Walpole, "were by no means shining; her eyes and countenance showed her character, which was grave and mild. Her strict love of truth and her accurate memory were always in unison. . . . She was discreet without being reserved; and, having no bad qualities, and being constant to her connexions, she preserved uncommon respect till the end of her life; and, from the propriety and decency of her behaviour, was always treated as if her virtue had never been questioned; her friends even affecting to suppose that her connexion with the king had been confined to pure friendship."† The literary men of the day did not offer up all their incense to the savante princess and queen; and though Caroline may have had the best of the philosophers and divines with her, the best of the poets were certainly rather with Mrs. Howard or Lady Suffolk. In part, perhaps, through the volatility of the race, and in part because they fancied that Caroline was not so liberal as she ought to be, and that the mistress must eventually have more power over the heart of the king than the wife, and a greater faculty for disposing of places and pensions, Gay "put his whole trust in that lady;" Swift praised her as the person of her sex for whom he had the most esteem; and Pope, who always declared that he wanted nothing for himself, but "only for his friends, and who quarrelled with the princess, frequented the society of the mistress, and complimented her with some elegant verse. Chesterfield, Bolingbroke, and Arbuthnot paid their court in the same quarter: but we regret to add that all these poets and wits turned against the inoffensive lady, and abused her roundly, when they found she could be of no use to them or to their party—that she never meddled with state affairs or with that treasury urn in which lay the prizes of places and appointments.‡ The mistress, in fact, constantly watched and thwarted by the queen, and disregarded by the ministers, who knew who it was that really held the reins, had scarcely the shadow of pride; and to all politics she was constantly and wisely averse. Caroline, who from their earliest connexion had determined to govern, and deserved to do so, retained an undivided sway; and, as she was convinced from the first that no minister could stand with Walpole in opposition, there could never have been much doubt as to the continuance of the ministry which George I. had left. Sir Robert also at this crisis fixed her favour by offering to obtain from parliament a jointure for her majesty of 100,000*l.* a-year, while Sir Spencer Compton—who, we suspect, was all along playing into Walpole's hands—would only undertake to propose 60,000*l.* Her majesty represented to her husband, at a fitting moment, that Compton was not even able to draw up a declaration; that it would be highly prejudicial to his affairs to prefer to the minister in actual possession a man in whose own judgment his predecessor was the fittest person to execute his office; she dwelt upon the danger of a motley cabinet; and she hinted that Walpole had agreed to carry through the House of Commons an augmentation to the civil list of 130,000*l.* This settled the business;—there was no more question of Sir Spencer Compton as prime minister; he got a peerage, the Order of the Garter, and the presidency of the council; and the king re-appointed the old ministry. The only change that took place in the cabinet was one which squared with the interests and views of Walpole and his brother-in-law, Townshend. Lord Berkeley, who had been in alliance with their dangerous rival, Lord Carteret, was dismissed from the Admiralty, and replaced by Lord Torrington, who was wholly devoted to Walpole. The change, however, in the king's determination was sudden and unexpected. The son of the fortunate prime minister says, "The instance I shall cite will be a true picture of courtiers. Their majesties had removed from Richmond to their temporary palace in Leicester Fields, on the very evening of their receiving notice of their accession to the crown; and the next day all the nobility and gentry in town crowded to kiss their hands: my mother amongst the rest, who, Sir Spencer Compton's designation, and not its evaporation, being known, could not make her way between the scornful backs and elbows of her late devotees, nor could approach nearer to the queen than the third or fourth row: but no sooner was she desecrated by her majesty, than the queen said aloud, 'There I am sure I see a friend!' The torrent divided and shrunk to either side; 'and, as I came away,' said my mother, 'I might have

* "These now little known anecdotes of Mr. Howard's behaviour," says Horace Walpole, "I received between twenty and thirty years afterwards from the mouth of Lady Suffolk herself. She had left the court about the year 1735, and passed her summers at her villa of Marble Hill at Twickenham, living very retired both there and in London. I purchased Strawberry Hill in 1747; and, being much acquainted with the houses of Dorset, Vere, and others of Lady Suffolk's intimates, was become known to her; though she and my father had been at the head of two such hostile factions at court. Becoming neighbours, and both, after her second husband's death, living single and alone, our acquaintance turned to intimacy. She was extremely deaf, and consequently had more satisfaction in narrating than in listening; her memory both of remote and of the most recent facts was correct beyond belief. . . . Each of us knew different parts of many court stories, and each was eager to learn what either could relate more; and thus, by comparing notes, we sometimes could make out discoveries of a third circumstance, before unknown to both."—Reminiscences.

† The Countess of Suffolk, having lost her first husband, married the Hon. George Berkeley, a brother of the Earl of Berkeley; but this was after she had left the court.

‡ Her credit had always been extremely limited by the queen's superior influence, and by the devotion of the minister to her majesty. Except a barony, a red ribbon, and a good place for her brother, Lady Suffolk could succeed but in very subordinate recommendations. Her own acquisitions were so moderate, that, besides Marble Hill, which cost the king 10,000*l.* or 12,000*l.*, her compliance had not been too dearly purchased. She left the court with as little to be envied, that, though an economist and not expensive, she found herself straitened; and, besides Marble Hill, she did not at her death leave 20,000*l.* to her family."—Walpole's Reminiscences.

walked over their heads, if I had pleased.' ”* The opposition, of all colours and shades, appears to have been stunned ’or bewildered. In conformity to the Act of Settlement, the parliament assembled the day after the announcement of the death of George I., that is, on the 15th of June; but it was prorogued by commission till the 27th. On that day the king went to the House of Peers; and, after expressing his concern for his father’s death, and his own determination to preserve the constitution, and secure to all his subjects the full enjoyment of their religious and civil rights, he gave his sanction to the late measures of government. The address of condolence and congratulation was moved by Sir Paul Methuen, was seconded by Walpole, and was carried without any attempt at opposition. On the 3rd of July Walpole proposed that the entire revenue of the civil list, which had been found to produce about 130,000*l.* more than the 700,000*l.* granted to the late king, should be settled on his majesty during life. The “thorough Shippen” observed that the sum of 700,000*l.* had been considered by all as an ample royal revenue; and that it was to be hoped that many personal expenses, particularly those incurred in the frequent journeys to Hanover, would cease or decrease in this reign; that in the reign of the late Queen Anne the revenue did not in general exceed the sum of 550,000*l.*, and yet parliament was called upon only once in a reign of thirteen years to pay the debts contracted by her civil government, and these debts were occasioned by her majesty’s piety and generosity, and especially by her devoting 100,000*l.* per annum to the public service during the war; that in the late reign of George I.; which was nearly the same length as that of Anne, 500,000*l.* had been twice voted for the discharge of the civil list debts; and during the last session 125,000*l.* were granted for purposes not yet explained; notwithstanding which there was a civil list debt of 600,000*l.* unaccounted for, but which he supposed had been contracted in a manner not fit to be owned, or swallowed up in the bottomless gulf of secret service. Shippen added that this amazing extravagance had happened under ministers who pretended to surpass all their predecessors in the knowledge and care of the public revenue; that he thought no addition to the civil list was needed, and that he should move that the duties and resources appropriated should be strictly limited so as to make up the clear yearly sum of 700,000*l.*, and no more. Yet, so thoroughly was Walpole the master of this parliament, that not a single member rose to second Shippen; the motion was dropped, and the 130,000*l.* were added to the 700,000*l.* And on the 9th it was agreed, with the same unanimity, that the sum of 100,000*l.* per annum should be settled as a jointure upon the queen, in case of her surviving her husband. On the 17th the king, from the throne, thanked the Commons for this mark of attachment and affection; and, after adverting to the flourishing state of the country, prorogued the parliament. The necessary dissolution was proclaimed shortly after, and writs were issued for a new parliament to meet in the month of January.

* Horace accounts for all this, and for the success of his father, without thinking of giving him credit for any superior morality. “The pre-occupation of the queen in favour of Walpole must be explained. He had early discovered that, in whatever gallantries George Prince of Wales indulged or affected, even the persona of his princess was dearer to him than any charms in his mistresses: and, though Mrs. Howard (afterwards Lady Suffolk) was openly declared his favourite, as secretly was the Duchess of Kendal was his father’s. Sir Robert’s sagacity discerned that the power would be lodged with the wife, not with the mistress; and he not only devoted himself to the princess, but totally abstained from ever visiting Mrs. Howard; while the injudicious multitude concluded that the common consequences of an inconstant husband’s passion for his concubine would follow; and accordingly warmer, if not public, vows were made to the supposed favourite than to the prince’s consort. They especially, who in the late reign had been out of favour at court, had, to pave their future path to favour, and to secure the fall of Sir Robert Walpole, sedulously, and no doubt seriously, dedicated themselves to the mistress; Bolingbroke secretly, his friend Swift openly, and as anonymously, cultivated Mrs. Howard; and the neighbourhood of Pope’s villa to Richmond facilitated their intercourse; though his religion forbade his entertaining views beyond those of serving his friends. Lord Bathurst, another of that connexion, and Lord Chesterfield, too early for his interest, founded their hopes on Mrs. Howard’s influence; but, astonished and disappointed at finding Walpole not shaken from his seat, they determined on an experiment that should be the touchstone of Mrs. Howard’s credit. They persuaded her to demand of the new king an earl’s coronet for Lord Bathurst; she did; the queen put in her veto; and Swift, in despair, returned to Ireland, to lament Queen Anne and curse Queen Caroline, under the mask of patriotism, ’country he abhorred and despised.”—Reminiscences.

The Jacobites, whom no series of failures could wholly discourage, had been sanguine in their hopes that the death of the first George would lead to a revolution, and eventually to a restoration; but at the critical moment they saw all these hopes vanish into thin air; and the Earl of Strafford was obliged to confess to the Pretender that the torrent was too strong for his friends to resist.* At the news of George I.’s death the Pretender set out from Bologna, where he had been residing, and travelled rapidly across the Alps to Lorraine, whence he dispatched a messenger to Bishop Atterbury, who was now residing at Paris as a regular agent or minister of the Stuart, and who, indisputably, was holding a correspondence with a desperate faction in England. The bishop, however, had small consolation or encouragement to offer to his master. “You will observe, Sir,” wrote Atterbury, “what a spirit of caution and fear possesses your friends at home, and how they dread any alarm being given to the government, or taken by it. . . . It appears that nothing is to be expected from them, without a foreign, and a very considerable assistance. . . . It is plain that the Tories at this turn hoped to get into place, if not into power; and though they resolved to keep their principles and inclinations (i. e. their devotion to the Pretender) if they had done so, I much question whether they really would, or, rather, I am satisfied that the bulk of them would not.”† Nor were the advices received from other Jacobite agents much more encouraging. Lord Orrery, in London, confessed that the number of discontented among the people was small; and he deplored the servility, ignorance, and poor spirit of the English nobility and gentry, who, he said, were striving who should sell themselves at the best price to the new court, but were resolved to sell themselves at any price. Lockhart, who had been obliged to fly from Scotland, where some of his plotting had been discovered, declared that the project of himself and his friends returning to their country without a foreign army to back them, was a hopeless one, that could only bring down ruin upon the cause and all that adhered to it. At the same moment the little beggared and vagabond court of the Pretender was distracted with all kinds of intrigues, jealousies, and animosities; and the Pretender himself had behaved so unfaithfully and so savagely to his wife Clementina, that that high-spirited woman had ran away from him and shut herself up in a convent at Rome. By this conduct James had given deep offence both to the court of Vienna and the court of Madrid. The court of Versailles, which had taken no part in these matrimonial quarrels, had other and far more weighty reasons for not wishing to have the Stuart on their side of the Alps; and, upon the representations of the English government, they directed the Duke of Lorraine to drive James out of his territories. By the advice of Atterbury, however, instead of crossing the Alps, the Pretender went into the pope's town of Avignon. But he was not left undisturbed there; and in the course of a few months he was obliged to return to Italy, where his wife forgave him and rejoined him. Atterbury had been, and continued to be, deeply involved in all the contemptible intrigues of the little Jacobite court, aiming at nothing less than at that supreme voice in their councils which had once belonged to his friend and ally Bolingbroke. This Protestant prelate cabalised with priests, monks, and mistresses; took part with the husband against the injured wife; overthrew the influence of the Earl of Mar and General Dillon; and then, becoming jealous of Hay and Murray, the Pretender's new ministers, he took part with the wife against the husband, and reviled James as a selfish, dangerous, and incurable blockhead. He continued, however, to plot and cabal to the last; and died at Paris early in 1731, in the seventieth year of his age. Every man that joined the Pretender became convinced of his woful incapacity, and ran a rapid race to misery and ruin. The volatile, debauched, but witty Duke of Wharton went abroad in the year 1726, attached himself to the Pretender's party, and embraced, or pretended to embrace, the Roman Catholic religion; and Lord North did the same. The latter nobleman soon left the jangling court in disgust, and entered the Spanish service, in which he died seven or eight years after. Wharton was sent to Madrid, in the time of Ripperda's mad schemes, to assist the Duke of Ormond in pressing for an invasion of England, and to justify or excuse the conduct of the Pretender to his wife. At Madrid he behaved like a drunkard and madman. "The Duke of Wharton," writes Keene, the British consul, on April the 5th, 1726, "has not been sober, or scarce had a pipe out of his mouth, since he came from his expedition to St. Ildefonso. On Tuesday last I had some company with me that the Duke of Liria and Wharton wanted to speak with. Wharton made his compliments, and placed himself by me. I did not think myself obliged to turn out his star and garter; because, as he is an everlasting talker and tippler, in all probability he would lavish out something that might be of use to know, at least might discover, by the warmth of his hopes and expectations, whether any scheme was to be put in immediate execution in favour of his dear master, as he calls the Pretender. He began with telling me he had just then left the Duke de Ripperda, after an audience of an hour and a half and four minutes. The Duke of Ormond was with him; but that circumstance he omitted. I told him, sure it must have been an affair of the greatest importance to his new cause, that could have made Ripperda spare so much of his time, considering the multiplicity of business he is charged with. At which says he, You will shortly see the event; it is in my power to make your stocks fall as I think fit; my master is now in a postchaise, but the place he designs for I shall not tell you. He complained that Mr. Stanhope had prevented his seeing their Catholic majesties; but I am very sure that he has delivered in some proposals in writing, which are not discouraged; for on the 1st of May, his P's birth-day, both he and the Duke of Liria, amongst a thousand other things they let slip, were fond of drinking a perpetual union of the saints of the day—whom God has joined let no man separate. The evening he was with me he declared himself the Pretender's prime minister, and Duke of Wharton and Northumberland. Hitherto (says he) my master's interest has been managed by the Duchesse of Perth and three or four other old women, who meet under the portal of St. Germain's; he wanted a Whig, and a brisk one, to put them in the right train, and I am the man; you may now look upon me Sir Philip Wharton, knight of the garter, and Sir Robert Walpole, knight of the bath, running a course, and by God he shall be hard pressed; he bought my family pictures, but they will not be long in his possession; that account is still open; neither he nor King George shall be six months at ease, as long as I have the honour to serve in the employ I am in. He mentioned mighty things from Moscow, and talked so much nonsense and contradictions, that it was neither worth my while to remember them, or yours to read them. I used him very cavalièrement; upon which he was affronted; sword and pistol next day; but before I slept a gentleman was sent to desire everything might be forgot: what a pleasure must it have been to have killed a prime minister?"* Soon after this the Duke of Wharton received, at Madrid, an order under the privy seal of England, commanding him on his allegiance to return home. It is said that he scornfully threw the letter out of his coach window—its contents he certainly set at defiance. The end of this famed president of the Hell-fire Club, who had left England with a constitution as shattered as his fortune, could not be far distant. His first wife having died in England, he married Miss O'Byrne, the daughter of an exiled Irish colonel and a maid of honour to the Queen of Spain, in one freak, and abandoned her just as suddenly in another. He joined the Spanish army as a volunteer, and fought against his countrymen at the absurd siege of Gibraltar. From Spain he soon went into Italy, where he boasted of his enthusiastic zeal for the Pretender, and complained to him that some gentlemen branded that zeal with the name of madness. A short month after this he was in France, writing to Horace Walpole, protesting his loyalty to the House of Hanover, and declaring that ever since the accession of his present majesty George II. he had absolutely refused to be concerned with the Pretender or any of his affairs. "I am coming to Paris," wrote this undoubted madman to the English minister, "to put myself entirely under your excellency's protection, and hope that Sir Robert Walpole's good nature will prompt him to serve a family which his generosity induced him to spare."* At Paris Wharton repeated these assurances to the prime minister's brother Horace Walpole, to whom he gave, "in a rambling way that was entertaining enough, an account of several of his late motions and actions while he was in the Pretender's service."† Sir Robert, however, who had by this time preferred against him an indictment for high treason, refused to receive any application from him; and thereupon Wharton made fresh vows of fidelity to the Pretender, and begged and got some money from that court. After wandering about Europe with a numerous but ragged retinue of servants, he went again into Spain, where his whole stock was one shirt, one cravat, and 500 livres. To save him from starving, the Spanish court gave him the command of a regiment at Lerida. There his much abused constitution broke completely; he derived some benefit from the mineral waters of Catalonia, but he soon relapsed, and was discovered by the charitable monks of the Bernardine convent of Poblet, lying in a small village in a most wretched state of helplessness and destitution. The monks carried him to their own house, and, according to their own account, his penitence and their prayers made that conversion to Catholicism real which before had only been feigned. According to a common practice with dying penitents Wharton put on the monastic habit, and on the 31st of May, 1731, or about a week after his removal to the convent, he expired in that dress and was interred in the convent church, where a plain slab in an aisle apart from other monuments marks the last resting place of the last noble Wharton! The Earl of Mar, who had managed the rebellion in Scotland in 1715, died at Aix-la-chapelle about a year after Wharton, distrusted by the Pretender and despised by every one. As for the inferior agents of the expelled family, they were, with a few exceptions, a base and knavish crew—the Jonathan Wildes of politics. Many of them took money on both sides the water, and communicated the letters with which they were intrusted to the cabinet of St. James's. The honest Lockhart was told that Walpole had a key to the cipher he used in corresponding with James and his advisers. "I replied," says the Scottish Jacobite, "that I did not believe one word of this; for it was a usual trick in statesmen to pretend they had intelligence of the most secret doings, with a design of raising jealousies and fears among their enemies: whereupon one of my friends returned, that he was determined to convince me, and they produced a paper, which contained the cant names of the persons and several others in my cipher, telling me distinctly who was meant by them, adding with an oath that he read the seized letters with no other impediment than turning over the leaves of his cipher. . . . This I confess surprised me much, and having said that I could not imagine how they had come by these papers, it was answered, 'What is proof against the money of Great Britain?'" Lockhart ruminated whom he ought to accuse as the author of this treachery, and finally concluded that it must have proceeded from some one near the Pretender's person, who had access to his papers.

A. D. 1728.—The new parliament assembled on the 23rd of January, and was soon found to be as loyal and as compliant as the last. Indeed it appears that Walpole had gained by the elections. As Sir Spencer Compton had been elevated to the peerage, it became necessary to appoint a new speaker; and Arthur Onslow, one of the most distinguished of the many eminent men that have filled that post, was elected unanimously. The king's speech was, at the first glance, rather alarming; he assured the Houses that it was absolutely necessary to continue those warlike preparations which had hitherto secured the nation, as the execution of the preliminaries signed at Paris in his father's time had been retarded by unexpected difficulties, raised chiefly by the obstinate opposition of Spain. Shippen again raised his bold came, whenever the occasion happened, were full of enlogiums of my Lord Sunderland, whose death they lament as a fatal blow to their cause. Upon the whole behaviour of this gentleman, it is easy to observe that some project in their favour was certainly laid in Vienna; but Ripperda must have found himself not able to sustain it, since he was better informed of the true state of Spain, which must have obliged him to lay it aside till a better opportunity offers. Wharton, Liria, and the young Jacks are yet fond of it, and if it depends on them, would now put it in execution; but the graver sort of them are not so confident, nor so much on their mettle. Wharton was telling the Duke of Omond that his master did not love fox-hunting, but that he promised to go to Newmarket: to which he answered, he saw no great probability of it on a sudden, but wished the Pretender might take such care of his affairs, that he might be able to keep his word. But I think you will see our new knight strip himself of his new honours before twelve months are passed, if he be thought worth the receiving."

voice in opposition, reflecting severely upon ministers, and abusing the fleet for not having rifled the galleons at Carthage and plundered Porto Bello, "whereby we might have had those riches in our hands to dispute with the Spaniards." Sir William Wyndham seconded Shippen, and abused the languid measures of government and the dilatory course of their diplomacy; but their amendments were not risked to the chances of a division. George II. on his accession had pretended to turn off the Germans that crowded the court, and to renounce that partiality for Hanover of which his father had been accused; yet he now obliged ministers to ask parliament for 230,000*l.* for the maintenance during this year of 12,000 German troops, described as Hessians, in the pay of England. Upon this strong point the opposition made a stand; but they could muster only 84 votes against 280. Other bargains were struck with the Duke of Brunswick, who was to receive a yearly subsidy of 25,000*l.* While Bolingbroke was at work in the Craftsman, Pulteney, thinking the opportunity favourable, undertook to prove in the House of Commons that, notwithstanding the sinking fund and the sacrifices made, the national debt was on the increase; but a large majority affirmed with Walpole that it had decreased and was decreasing. In reply to an address of the Commons requesting a specific account of 250,000*l.*, which had been put down as secret service money, the king said that he trusted the House would repose the same confidence in him as they had reposed in his father; and declared that a specific account of such disbursements could not be given, without manifest prejudice to the public service. Pulteney inveighed against this principle as tending to render parliament useless, to cover embezzlement, and to screen corrupt and rapacious ministers; and, in the course of a prolonged debate, the ministers were repeatedly and loudly called upon to give an account of the moneys: but all that Walpole could or would answer, was, that the sums had been expended in negotiations too delicate to be specified. He was suspected of having used the best part, if not all, of the money in managing the elections and in buying up the votes of members; but, by a lucky coincidence, while he was in the midst of his speech an express arrived announcing that the King of Spain, who had hoped to see a revolution in England, had at length ratified the former preliminaries with France and England, and referred the settlement of all differences to the congress, which was now appointed to be held at Soissons instead of Aix-la-chapelle. Walpole, who, no doubt, had helped to time the arrival of the dispatch, instantly read it to the House, adding, with dramatic effect, "that the nation would be now relieved from the burthen of the late expenses, and that he could assure the members who called so loudly for a specification of the secret service money, that it had been expended in obtaining the conclusion of this peace." In this manner he rode over the heads of Pulteney, Shippen, and the rest, and carried everything he attempted by large majorities. His witty son afterwards said, that a good majority, like a good sum of money, soon makes itself bigger!

The Congress of Soissons opened on the 19th of June, when the ministers of the emperor, France, Spain, Great Britain, and the northern courts proceeded to perplex each other with an interminable series of memorials, and counter-memorials. Cardinal Fleury had, however, effected a reconciliation between the courts of Versailles and Madrid; and Lord Chesterfield, who was residing as ambassador at the Hague, had soon to announce that Philip and the emperor, who had so recently pledged their faith to each other in the treaty of Vienna, were becoming irreconcilable enemies.

A.D. 1729.—Frederick, Prince of Wales, and heir to the throne, had hitherto been left at Hanover, and had never been allowed to visit England; but now he came over, and was received with exceeding great joy by the nation. He was twenty-one years of age, and seemed full of promise—and, as Lord Mahon observes, the multitude are always apt to love an heir-apparent better than a king. If George had seen his arrival with satisfaction he soon had occasion to regret the hour of his coming; for his son behaved to him precisely as he, when Prince of Wales, had behaved to his own father. The parliament assembled on the 21st of January, when the king still expressed something like an uncertainty as to whether we were to have peace or war; declaring, however, his unwillingness to kindle a new war in Europe precipitately. Spain, in fact, had interrupted the trade which had for some time been carried on by connivance, though not by actual permission, between the English colonies and the West Indies and her dominions on the South American continent; and the merchants of London and other places, suffering from this interruption, vented their complaints in petitions to parliament. Another complaint was, that the Spaniards were preventing the English from cutting log-wood in Campeachy bay. The Commons agreed in a declaration that the Spaniards had violated treaties; and also in an address desiring that his majesty would be pleased to use his utmost endeavours to procure a just and reasonable satisfaction for these injuries, and for securing to his majesty's subjects the free exercise of commerce and navigation to and from the British colonies in America. The opposition now adopted a curious course, proclaiming that it was the broken promise of George I. and his minister to restore Gibraltar to Spain which had incensed King Philip, produced all these mischiefs, and still threatened a war—holding, however, at the same time that Gibraltar was on no account to be ceded, and that the fault was in having made the promise. A motion had been made before for producing the letter of George I. to Philip; but Walpole had then replied that, the promise having been given when he was not in administration, he was in no respect answerable for it; that if it had ever been made he could venture to assure the House that it must have been only a conditional promise, and rendered void by the refusal of Spain to comply with the terms proposed (which was the fact); that he himself had always maintained that Gibraltar could never be granted without full consent of parliament; but that, as to producing the late king's letter, he was of opinion that the private letters of princes were almost as sacred as their persons. But now, when a fresh call was made for the letter, he produced it to the House of Lords, where the opposition moved this resolution:—"That effectual care be taken in any treaty that the King of Spain do renounce all claims and pretensions to Gibraltar and Minorca in plain and strong terms." This, however, was overruled by a large majority with a counter-resolution:—"That the House relies upon his majesty for preserving his undoubted right to Gibraltar and Minorca." Similar proceedings took place in the House of Commons, where also the royal letter was produced. It was during this session, and on the 26th of February, that the House of Commons, taking great offence at Mr. Raikes, a respectable printer of Gloucester, for publishing some reports of their proceedings, unanimously resolved "That it is an indignity ^{to}, and a breach of the privilege of, this House, for any person to presume to give in written or printed newspapers any account or minutes of the debates or other proceedings of this House, or of any committee thereof;" and "That, upon discovery of the authors, printers, or publishers, this House will proceed against the offenders with the utmost severity." If these resolutions had been continued in force we much question whether by this time there would have been any House of Commons—any parliament whatsoever to have its proceedings reported. There certainly seemed, however, in the course of the same session some good reason for drawing the veil of mystery over the doings of the House. For example, Walpole proposed, and the Commons voted by a large majority, a grant to his majesty of 115,000*l.* to supply a deficiency in the civil list—which deficiency did not exist, as there had been no falling off whatever in the civil list revenues. To add mockery to robbery, there was inserted some futile provision for the repayment of this money at his majesty's death. There is, however, one strong argument in excuse of the still growing bribery and corruption of Robert Walpole: the majority of public men were so detestably mean and venal that there were no means of securing them except by money; and, but for the sums expended in home negotiations "too delicate to be specified," it may be doubted whether he could have driven on the car of government at all, and whether England would not have been involved in disgraces abroad and in constant turmoils and troubles at home.

On the 14th of May George terminated the session with a most gracious speech, in which he extolled the wisdom and patriotism of his parliament. Soon after he departed for his German dominions, leaving Queen Caroline sole regent during his absence. The queen, who continued to exercise the same authority in the like cases as long as she lived, gave almost universal satisfaction to the nation by her prudent and dignified conduct. To settle, if possible, the differences with Spain, the peace-loving Walpole now dispatched the former ambassador, Mr. William Stanhope, to the Spanish court, which had fixed itself for a time at Seville. Stanhope was indisputably one of the most accomplished of English diplomatists; and on the 9th of November, after many vexations and difficulties, he brought to a conclusion the celebrated and advantageous treaty of Seville, by which Spain joined in a defensive alliance with England, France, and Holland, confirmed preceding treaties, revoked the exclusive privileges granted to the subjects of the emperor by the treaty of Vienna, put the English trade in America on its former footing, restored all captures, and confirmed the Asiento. The question of Gibraltar was passed over in silence; but at the very same moment the Spaniards were devising and erecting works which they trusted would for ever cut off the communications of that glorious fortress with the main land, if they did not some day enable them to strike the English banner from its pride of place. In short, they were constructing the memorable lines of San Roque, or the Campo, which ran right across the narrow sandy isthmus that connects the rock with the Andalusian main; and no remonstrances on the part of England could make Philip desist. "I was assured," writes Mr. Keene, the English consul, on the 20th of May, 1731, "that, if the whole universe should fall upon the king to make him desist, he would rather let himself be cut to pieces than consent. . . . We might as well pretend to Cadiz as to the spot where the line is."^{*} The English government, it should appear, did not claim the spot, but they did pretend that it should be considered as neutral ground, and not converted into means of imprisoning and annoying their garrison at Gibraltar. When nearly a century had elapsed, and these lines, strengthened for repeated sieges, had been the cause of infinite mischief to the English, they were blown into the air through an ingenious device; and the only remains of what cost the Spaniards many millions of hard dollars now consist of a sightless heap of stones which can never again be put, in that place, one upon the other.†

A. D. 1730.—Parliament re-assembled in the

* Cox's Memoirs of the Spanish House of Bourbon.

† In the last war, when the French advanced to the town of San Roque, the troops and people ran for protection to the neutral ground under the guns of Gibraltar, and the governor of that place persuaded them that the French intended to attack the lines, that he could spare no troops for their defence, and that they by themselves would be incapable of holding them; and, in time, that the best and only thing to do was to blow them up—a pleasant task, in which nearly every English inhabitant of Gibraltar took a part—civilians, military, merchants, clerks, shopkeepers! Owing to the excavations which have been made in the rock, and the tremendous batteries which have been brought to bear upon the spot, it is scarcely possible to re-erect those famous lines.

month of January, when his majesty declared that the peace of Europe was now firmly established by the treaty of Seville; but when the terms of that treaty were before them, the opposition raised numerous objections to it, complaining more particularly that the right of Great Britain to Gibraltar and Minorca was not formally and explicitly acknowledged; that the guarantee of Tuscany, Parma, and Piacenza to the infant Don Carlos might involve Great Britain in future quarrels; and that it had been most unwisely agreed to convoy in English ships six thousand Spanish troops to garrison Leghorn, Porto Ferrajo, Parma, &c., which had so incensed the court of Vienna, that an edict had been issued by the emperor, prohibiting the subjects of Great Britain from trading in his dominions. At the same moment his imperial majesty, cut-off from the supplies of Spanish money, was attempting to raise a loan of 400,000*l.* in the city of London. Walpole determined to stop this borrowing and lending; and a bill was presently brought in and carried, prohibiting loans to any foreign power without express licence from the king under his privy seal. The opposition called this a bill of terrors, and an advantageous bargain for the Dutch, who would get into their money-market all the business of great loans; but Walpole replied that it was not to be expected that British merchants should be permitted to lend their money to be employed against the British nation, or to assist with supplies the enemies of their country. And through want of money the emperor was compelled to moderate his indignation and submit to terms of accommodation. Walpole carried with somewhat more difficulty his annual motion for continuing the subsidies to the Hessians and other German troops; a minority of 169 rallying against him on this ground. On the 16th of February the opposition proposed their famous Pension Bill, which went to disable all persons from sitting in parliament who had any pension, or any offices held in trust for them from the crown, directly or indirectly; and which provided that every member on taking his seat should take an oath that he had no pension, gratuity, reward, office, or place; and that in case of his afterwards accepting anything, he should signify it to the House within fourteen days. Walpole himself, knowing how popular the bill was abroad, was prudently silent, and the bill was carried by a majority of 144 to 134. The odium of negating it rested therefore with the Lords, who threw it out after a long debate and a protest entered by twenty-six peers. It appears that this business widened a breach which had for some time been open in the friendship of the two brothers-in-law, Walpole and Townshend, and that Townshend was dissatisfied at having the odious part of the business left to himself in the Upper House. In the following session, when Townshend was dismissed, Walpole did not hesitate to oppose the motion, or to describe the Pension Bill as tending to erect the House into a court of inquisition. During the whole of his administration, however, he left the bill, which was the most popularity-gaining measure of the opposition, to be rejected by the Lords. It will be remembered that France had agreed at the peace of Utrecht, and in a subsequent treaty, to destroy the harbour of Dunkirk; but that power had never kept its disagreeable promise in full, pretending, not without reason, that the interests of the inhabitants and the strong feeling of the French nation generally prevented or delayed their compliance. Bolingbroke sent over his secretary, Brinsden, to inspect the state of the port and works of Dunkirk, and Brinsden reported that the French, instead of letting them go to ruin, were repairing them and making them more formidable than ever. Upon this exaggerated report, the opposition got up a debate tending to excite and alarm the English people; and then moved for an address, that "the king should direct the tall orders, instructions, reports, and proceedings had in regard to the port and harbour of Dunkirk, since its demolition, be laid before the House." George complied, and a heap of papers were laid upon the table. Bolingbroke's friend Wyndham then moved that the evidence established the fact, and that in what had been done to the harbour of Dunkirk there was a manifest violation of treaties, and a design to annoy the trade of England at the least. But he was met and foiled by a counter motion, expressing entire satisfaction in the good effects which his majesty's instances had had, by obtaining express orders from the most Christian king for causing to be destroyed all the works that might have been erected at Dunkirk contrary to the treaties of Utrecht, &c. In the course of the debate Walpole fell upon Bolingbroke, who was well known to be the cause of it; and Wyndham, in reply, attempted to show that Bolingbroke was as honest a minister as Walpole—a comparison that excited a general indignation among the Whigs. The next stand made by the opposition was against the renewal of the East India Company's charter, which was, however, prolonged to 1766, on the condition of the company's paying 200,000*l.* towards the supply of the current year, and reducing by 1 per cent. the interest of the money they had already advanced to the public. To make up for their weakness in parliament, the opposition had exerted all their strength in the press, and had deluged the town with inflammatory pamphlets and papers in which truth and decency were too often disregarded. In proroguing parliament on the 15th of May, the king alluded to these publications in unwise and passionate terms; calling them scandalous libels and the authors of them incendiaries. As soon as the parliament had risen Lord Townshend resigned, after a quarrel with Walpole, in which they almost came to blows, and in which, it is said, the two brother ministers and brothers-in-law seized one another by the collar and grasped their swords. Townshend was overbearing and exceedingly passionate, and in foreign politics more particularly he entertained views which differed widely from those of Walpole, who felt his unquestioned superiority as a politician, who was impatient of opposition, and who appears to have been all along determined to be the sole and supreme head of his ministry. Townshend might have planted many a thorn in his side if he had gone into opposition; but he retired quietly to a country life, devoted himself to farming, and did more good to England by introducing the cultivation of the turnip from Germany than he could ever have done as one of "the patriots." Mr. William Stanhope, who had been created Earl of Harrington as a reward for the treaty of Seville, was now appointed secretary of state; Henry Pelham was made secretary-at-war, and the privy seal was given to Sir Spencer Compton, now Earl of Wilmington. The ascendancy of Walpole was absolute; and, in peace abroad, and growing prosperity at home, the nation saw little cause to repine at it. The good which Walpole did might certainly in many instances have been done in a higher and nobler manner; but, again, we must remember the lowness and baseness of the means he had at his disposal. He left the chief management of foreign affairs to Lord Harrington and to the Duke of Newcastle; but he impressed upon them the grand principle of avoiding foreign quarrels, and, as much as possible—as much as the king would let them—foreign engagements and perplexing undertreaties; and he invariably held up the blessings of peace and the superiority of commerce to conquest. Regardless of popular prejudices, he cemented our alliance with France; and he wisely overlooked many little squabbles which under a less pacific minister might have cost both nations much blood and treasure. He bore with the capricious insolence of the king of Spain, and he concluded an amicable treaty with the emperor.

A. D. 1731.—When parliament met again our foreign policy was once more severely criticised by Sir William Wyndham and those who acted with him, and the old cry was repeated, somewhat out of season, that we were making ruinous treaties solely on account of Hanover, that mill-stone hung to the neck of England to sink her for ever. Pulteney, formerly the bosom friend of Walpole, joined in these attacks; and he not only continued to write in the Craftsman with Bolingbroke, but he also maintained a very questionable correspondence with the ministers of the foreign powers that were not quite pleased with the English cabinet. We may leave these altercations, to note the progress made in good and wise measures. A judicious bill was introduced for preventing delays of justice occasioned by the use of the Latin tongue in proceedings at law, and enacting that all processes and pleadings, and all proceedings of courts of justice, should be in plain English. Obstacles were, however, raised, and most of the lawyers resisted the change, urging that this bill would render useless the ancient records which were all written in Latin; and that, far from expediting, it would introduce confusion and delay of, justice, by altering the established form and method of judicial proceedings. Lord Raymond said that if the bill passed, the law must likewise be translated into Welsh, since many in Wales understood no English. Somebody said in reply, that it would be as easy for the Welsh to learn English as to learn Latin. "Our prayers," said the eloquent Duke of Argyll, "are in our native tongue, that they may be intelligible; and why should not the laws, wherein our lives and properties are concerned, be so, for the same reason?" The bill was carried by one of Walpole's good majorities. Parliament also took into consideration frauds and malversations in the charitable corporation which had been formed for the relief of the industrious poor, and expelled from their House no less a person than Sir Robert Sutton, who had recently been ambassador at Paris, but who had been detected in fraud and peculation. The infamous state of the public prisons was also investigated and in part amended, a check being put to the monstrous abuses of the wardens and jailors, who oppressed and tortured the poor criminals, pampered the rich, and often connived at their escape; but in this respect much was left to be done, and much that could only be done in a more enlightened and humane age. A bill was brought in, from no very pure motive—apparently from sheer spite against the Bishop of Bangor, Dr. Sherlock—to prevent for the future the translation of bishops from one see to another; but it was negatived by an immense majority. Considerable discontent was occasioned by the revival of the salt-tax, which had been abolished about two years before, but which was now granted again for the term of three years. Walpole declared that the land-tax for the ensuing year should be reduced; but the opposition observed that, previously to the abolition of the duty on salt, they had been exhorted in a speech from the throne to abolish some of those taxes that were most burdensome to the poor; that the tax upon salt was the most burdensome of all, and the most pernicious to the trade of the kingdom; and that now there could be no good reason for so suddenly reviving that tax, and grinding the faces of the poor in order to ease a few rich men of the landed interest. They further alleged that the salt-tax particularly affected the poor, who could not afford to eat fresh provisions; and that, as it formerly occasioned murmurs and discontents among the lower class of people, the revival of it would, in all probability, exasperate them into open sedition. Nor was the measure carried without considerable difficulty. Parliament was prorogued in the month of May, and little occurred during the remainder of the year worthy of notice, unless it be a visit paid in the autumn to England by the Duke of Lorraine, who was destined to become the consort of Maria Theresa, the emperor's only daughter, and who on this visit was deeply impressed with the wealth and prosperity of the country, and the kindness and courtesiousness of the English people. At this moment public credit seemed fully and firmly established, agriculture was improving, and our foreign trade was extending in every direction. In every sea then known was seen the busy flag of England; and her colonies were making prodigious strides from infancy to manhood—and, as a natural consequence, to emancipation from her authority.

A. D. 1732.—To the parliament, which met in January, George expressed his satisfaction at the general tranquillity, the happy effect of their zeal, attachment, and resolution. The courtly Lord Harvey, the Lady 'Fanny' of Pope, moved an adulatory address, to which the opposition started an amendment. Pulteney, not venturing to condemn what had been done in foreign policy, insisted that it might all have been done a great deal sooner and at infinitely less expense. In the recent treaty with the emperor, England had guaranteed the Pragmatic Sanction, which went to secure the inheritance of the House of Austria to Maria Theresa. Pulteney said that this very guarantee had formerly been represented as inconsistent with the interest of England by the very men who were now pluming themselves and demanding the applause of the House for having assented to it. He doubted the policy of our obliging ourselves by a positive guarantee to maintain this Austrian succession at a future and indeterminate period, when England, for reasons impossible to foresee, might find it very incompatible with her interests to engage in a foreign war upon any account whatever. Nothing, he said, would be left in that case but to violate the national faith, which, indeed, he further said, was no new thing with his majesty's present ministers. But Pulteney's eloquence and arguments were thrown away upon a scoffing majority. His next attempt was to reduce the standing army; and he and his party represented, in a very effective manner, that a standing military force in time of peace was not only superfluous but unconstitutional and dangerous; that the internal tranquillity of the country, which ministers had declared to be so perfect, might be maintained by the civil power, aided by the militia. On the other side some good and not a few very bad arguments were used. The scribbling Lord Harvey said that the multiplicity of seditious writings proved that there was a dangerous spirit still abroad; to which Mr. Plumer replied that, if scribblers gave the government uneasiness, they ought to employ other scribblers, and not soldiers against them. It was said by or for ministers, that though the country was tranquil and contented, and had reason to be so under his majesty's wise and paternal government, there were still many men capable of plotting and caballing, there was still a pretender to the crown, and therefore a force was necessary to overawe malcontents and deter invasions from abroad. This force they said was too inconsiderable to excite the jealousy of the people even under an ambitious and arbitrary sovereign, and much less under a prince who could not be accused or suspected of entertaining the remotest wish of infringing upon the liberties of his subjects. But Pulteney and his party urged that the small standing army was gradually becoming greater and greater; that for almost a century past it had been a progressive army, and that every effort to reduce it or limit its numbers had signally failed. The present attempt was no exception, and the forces were left as they were. The king, who seems to have loved his army above all things, was furious against Pulteney, and, calling for the book, he with his own hand struck his name out of the list of privy counsellors, and ordered that all the commissions of the peace which he held in different counties should be instantly revoked. It is said that the royal indignation was increased by Walpole, whom Pulteney had offended beyond hope of reconciliation by disclosing private conversations which had passed formerly between him and the minister, and in which Sir Robert had said sharp things against the character of George II., then Prince of Wales.* On the 1st of June George closed the session, informing the Houses that he had determined to visit his German dominions, and to leave the queen regent as before. During his residence at Hanover the decree of the Pragmatic Sanction was ratified and confirmed by the Diet of the empire, notwithstanding the opposition and protests of the Electors of Saxony, Bavaria, and the Palatinate, who, each and all, pretended to some share of the emperor's inheritance in default of heirs male of his own body. George also took under his protection a considerable number of the Protestant inhabitants of the archbishopric of Saltzburg, who were suffering under religious persecution in contravention of the treaty of Westphalia, which accorded liberty of conscience to all parts of Germany. Many of these poor people, abandoning their homes like the Palatinates in Queen Anne's time, came over to England, where a parliamentary provision was made for them, and whence for the most part they soon crossed the Atlantic to settle in the infant colony of Georgia, founded by the active and benevolent General Oglethorpe.

A. D. 1733.—On the meeting of parliament complaints were made that Spain had not yet made satisfaction for the depredations which had been committed during the last quarrel upon British merchants; and the king was obliged to confess that the meetings of the commissioners of the two crowns had been delayed, and that he could give no perfect account of their proceedings. The fact was, the Spanish court pretended that all or most of these British merchants had been engaged in an illicit trade to the Spanish Main—and, according to their principle, nearly all trade except that in negroes licensed by the Asiento, was smuggling. Walpole was reviled for not insisting upon immediate satisfaction, and for not throwing open the trade of the South American continent; but these were things not to be done without a war. The Pension Bill and a standing army were again debated with the same success as before. The sinking fund established by Walpole and Stanhope had been kept sacred for nearly ten years, or during the whole reign of George I.; but since the accession of his son various encroachments had been made upon it; and now Walpole proposed to take half a million from it for the service of the current year. Sir John Barnard, member for London, and a practical economist and financier, represented that such a fund ought never to be turned from its original purpose of paying off debts except in cases of extreme emergency; that to ease ourselves by loading our posterity is a poor, short-sighted expedient, the authors of which must expect the curses of posterity. Walpole, however, declared that, if he were not allowed to take this half million from the sinking fund, he must move for a land tax of two shillings in the pound; and this argument, addressed to the purses of country gentlemen and great landed proprietors had such an effect that his original proposal was presently carried in the Commons by a majority of 110! The practice of alienating the sinking fund having been thus once sanctioned by parliament was afterwards continued without intermission. In the following year (1734) not half a million but 1,200,000*l.*, or the whole produce of the year was taken from it; and in the two years next following (1735-6) it was anticipated and mortgaged. The best excuse pleaded for Walpole is, that in the reign of the two first Georges the national debt was considered as a main pillar of the established government by interesting so many persons in its support. The fund-holders had been led to believe that a revolution would destroy all obligations; that the Pretender would come with a sword in his right hand and a sponge in his left; and it was a dogma of the government that to pay off or reduce considerably the number of the state creditors would be to weaken the Hanoverian succession, by diminishing the number of capitalists bound to them by the strongest of ties, as the purse-string was then universally considered. While the sinking-fund, or the half million to be taken from it, was under discussion, Pulteney exclaimed, "But, sir, there is another thing, a very terrible thing impending! A monstrous project! Yea, more monstrous than has ever yet been represented! . . . I mean, sir, that monster the EXCISE! That plan of arbitrary power which is expected to be laid before this House in the present session!" Walpole soon made this expectation a certainty by producing his famous EXCISE SCHEME. The House having resolved itself into a committee to deliberate upon the best methods for securing and improving the duties and revenues charged upon tobacco and wines, all the papers and accounts relating to these duties were called for; and the commissioners of customs and excise were ordered to attend the House. A system of fraud and evasion was thus laid bare, and the complication, obscurity, and uncertainty of the accounts were made evident. The chief articles subjected to the excise duties were malt, salt, and the materials used in the distilleries, and the duties produced at this time somewhat above three millions per annum. In the midst of a universal storm and a deluge of pamphlets and broadsides, which represented that everything was to be taxed, that the people were to be ground to dust in order that the constitution might be overthrown and a tyranny established, Walpole, on the 14th of March, broached his design in a temperate speech. After alluding to the wild reports which had been spread through the country to prejudice the people against his plan before they knew what it was; and after asserting that many of these prejudices had originally proceeded from smugglers and fraudulent dealers, he said—"My thoughts have been confined solely to the duties on wine and tobacco; and it was the frequent advices I had of the shameful frauds committed in these two branches, and the complaints of the merchants themselves, that turned my attention to a remedy for this growing evil. . . . I shall, for the present, confine myself entirely to the tobacco trade." And pursuing this subject, he said—"If there is one article of taxation more obvious than another, more immediately within the direct aim of fiscal imposition than another, it is such an article of luxury as depends for its use on custom or caprice, and is by no means essential to the support of real comfort or human life. If there is a subject of taxation where it is more immediately the province of the legislature to suppress fraud, and strictly to insist on the payment of every import, it must be that where the wrong is felt by every class of persons, and none are benefited except the most dishonest and profligate part of the community. Both these descriptions apply to the subject before us. For though the use of tobacco is perhaps less sanctioned by natural reason than any other luxury, yet so great is the predilection for it in its various forms, that from the palace to the hovel there is no exemption from the duty; and surely it must be considered an intolerable grievance, that, by the frauds which are daily committed, the very poorest of the peasantry are obliged to pay this duty twice; once in the enhanced price of the article—for, though the fraudulent trader contrives to save to himself the amount of the tax imposed by parliament, yet he does not sell it cheaper to the public; and a second time, in the tax that is necessarily substituted to make good the deficiency which has been by these means occasioned." He went on to show that the growers of tobacco, the planters in our American colonies, "were reduced to the utmost extremity, even almost to a state of despair," by the frauds of their factors and correspondents in England, who from being their servants had become their tyrants; that the unfortunate planters had sent home many representations, and had lately deputed a gentleman with a remonstrance praying for some speedy relief; that the state of the tobacco trade at home was ruinous to the fair trader, who found himself forestalled in almost every market within the island by the smuggler and fraudulent dealer; that it gave occasion to an incessant series of perjuries and false entries; that if parliament properly regulated this matter it would acquire the means of exercising one of its most enviable privileges, that of diminishing the burdens of the country; that a proper levy of the duty on tobacco would enable him to alleviate those taxes which fell heaviest on our manufacturers and the labouring poor, as those upon soap and candles; that the existing duties on tobacco amounted to sixpence and one-third of a penny on every pound, and that the gross produce was at a medium 754,000*l.*, whereas the net produce, or what was got by the government, was not more than 161,000*l.*! He proposed that the tobacco duty should be brought under the laws of excise, and that the excise laws themselves should be remodeled and improved. He also proposed a reduction in the duty, making it 4*d.* instead of sixpence and one-third of a penny. He suggested that the same rules might be afterwards applied to the duty upon wine, and that a system of bonding or warehousing for re-exportation might be instituted, "which," said Walpole, "will tend to make London a free port, and, by consequence, the market of the world!" By the increase of trade and of money thus levied, the land tax, he said, might eventually be altogether abolished. It had been reported out of the House that one of his principal motives for pressing this measure was to increase his control over elections by immeasurably increasing the number of excise officers and agents in his pay, and who would, it was said, form another standing army. In the course of his speech, which occupied two hours and a quarter, Walpole made more than one reply to these accusations. "Those," said he, "who deal in these general declamations stigmatise the scheme in the most unqualified manner, as tending to reduce those subjected to it to a state of slavery. . . . But there are already ten or twelve articles of consumption subjected to the excise laws. . . . Are the brewers and maltsters slaves, or do they reckon themselves so? Are they not as free in elections, to elect or be elected, as any other? . . . This standing army of revenue officers, allowing the proposed addition to extend to tobacco and wine, will not, according to the estimate of the commissioners, exceed 126 persons; that number, in addition to those already employed, will do all the duty."

The tempting hope of the total abolition of the land-tax was calculated to dazzle the eyes of the country gentlemen; and the profered system of bonding or warehousing was an immense advantage to the merchant, and, in reality, calculated to make England the great porto franco of the world; yet the vehemence of opposition was not softened.

Wyndham declared that in all countries excises of every kind were looked upon as badges of slavery, and he instituted a comparison between the ministers of the day and the rapacious favourites of Henry VII.; Empson and Dudley, who, he said, "had the misfortune to outlive their master, and his son, as soon as he came to the throne, took off both their heads!" George's son, Frederick Prince of Wales, was under the gallery when this speech was delivered. Pulteney, taking a less tragical illustration, compared Walpole to Sir Ephraim Manham in the Alchemist, who was gulled out of his money by fine promises of the philosopher's stone, but at last only got some little charm for curing the itch. On the other side Walpole was supported by the able Sir Philip York, then attorney-general, and by Sir Joseph Jekyll, Master of the Rolls, who declared that he had come down to the House undetermined, but had been convinced by the minister's arguments. At two o'clock in the morning, when the debate had lasted thirteen hours, the House divided on the resolutions, when the minister found 266 for his scheme and 205 against it. He was little accustomed to such a large minority; and his good humour was not increased on his leaving the House, for a noisy mob, that had beset the doors during the debate, seized him by the cloak, and might have done him some bodily mischief but for the interference of Mr. Pelham. On the 16th of March, when the report of the committee was brought up, the debate was resumed with increased acrimony. But there was truth as well as bitterness in Pulteney's declamation. "It is well known," said that accomplished orator, "that every one of the public officers have already many boroughs or corporations which they look on as their properties. There are some boroughs which may be called treasury boroughs; there are others which may be called admiralty boroughs; in short, it may be said that nearly all the towns upon the sea coast are already seized on, and, in a manner, taken prisoners by the officers of the crown; in most of them they have so great an influence, that none can be chosen members of parliament but such as they are pleased to recommend. But as the customs are confined to our sea-ports, as they cannot travel far from the coast, therefore this scheme seems to be contrived in order to extend the laws of excise, and thereby to extend the influence of the crown over all the inland towns and corporations in England." Upon a division, however, Walpole had still a majority of 60, or 249 to 189. The popular ferment was as great as it had been on the 14th. On the 4th of April the bill founded on the report of the committee was read a first time, and after a long debate, a motion, that it should be read a second time on that day evening, was carried by a majority of only 36: and the next day when Walpole moved that the bill should be printed and distributed to the members of the House, he carried his point by a majority of only 16. The lord mayor of London, however, contrived to obtain a copy of the bill, and under his direction the common council drew up a violent petition against it.* Similar petitions were sent up from Nottingham, Coventry, and other inland towns; and "the public," says Tindal, "was so heated with papers and pamphlets, that matters rose next to a rebellion." Warned by these evil omens and by his decreasing majority, Walpole made up his mind to relinquish the bill. He summoned a meeting of the principal members who had supported it. "He reserved his own opinion till the last: but perseverance was the unanimous voice. It was urged that all taxes were obnoxious, and there would be an end of supplies if mobs were to control the legislature in the manner of raising them. When Sir Robert had heard them all he assured them that he was conscious of having meant well; that in the present inflamed temper of the people the act could not be carried into execution without an armed force; that there would be an end of the liberty of England if supplies were to be raised by the sword. If, therefore, the resolution was to proceed with the bill, he would instantly request the king's permission to resign, for he would not be the minister to enforce taxes at the expense of blood. This anecdote is mentioned in 'Historical Remarks on the Taxation of free States,' on the authority of Mr. White, member for Retford, who lived in friendship with Sir Robert Walpole. † And accordingly, on the 11th of August, the day appointed for the second reading, Walpole moved that it should be postponed till the 12th of June, before which day it was known that parliament would rise. The opposition were dissatisfied at this quiet mode of dropping the measure, and much wanted a formal rejection with severe animadversion; but the general sense of the House was against them, and they would not hazard a motion. Out of doors there was more noise and rejoicing than had ever been known at our greatest victories: bonfires were lit in the streets, the Monument was illuminated, and the minister Walpole was burnt in effigy. Cockades were worn with the motto, "Liberty, Property, and no Excise." The provincial towns followed the example of the capital; but the learned university of Oxford, filled with the fumes of tobacco and Jacobitism, outdid itself: the gownsmen joined the rabble of the town in their noisy rejoicings; curses of Walpole were mingled with Jacobite cries and cant phrases, and these Saturnalia on the banks of the Isis lasted three days and three nights. As Queen Caroline had gone fully into the excise scheme, and partook in the pangs of Walpole's disappointment, it was the more easy for him to chastise certain noblemen and gentlemen, who, though holding office, had criticised or opposed the bill. Thus Lord Chesterfield, who had become lord steward of the household, was very abruptly and unceremoniously deprived of his white staff, and Lord Clinton, a lord of the bed-chamber, the Earl of Burlington, captain of his band of pensioners, and the Duke of Montrose and the Earls of Marchmont and Stair, who held lucrative and sinecure offices in Scotland, were all dismissed. Nor did[‡] the ministerial vengeance stop here: the Duke of Bolton and Lord Cobham, who had no offices about the court, were deprived of their regiments for their opposition.* This seemed an unjustifiable stretch of the prerogative, and in the next session led to warm debates in the House of Commons, where Lord Morpeth moved for a bill to prevent any commissioned officer, not above the rank of a colonel, from being removed, unless by a court-martial, or by address of either House of parliament; and when this was negatived Mr. Sandys moved for an address, desiring to know who advised his majesty to remove the Duke of Bolton and Lord Cobham from their respective regiments; and Sandys was supported—of course in vain—by Sir William Wyndham and by Pulteney. After this a bill similar to that which had been produced more than once in the time of William III. was brought in for securing the freedom of parliament by limiting the number of military officers in the House of Commons; but it was rejected after the second reading.

In the course of the session of 1733 another bill for preventing the infamous practice of stock-jobbing was laid aside, in consequence of some amendments proposed by the Commons. The Commons also voted 80,000*l.* as a marriage portion to the princess royal, who was affianced to the Prince of Orange. The prince arrived in England in the month of November, and, after he had for some time drunk the waters of Bath to improve his health, the nuptials were solemnised in the French chapel at St James's, on the 14th of February of the following year (1734).

But, though pacific in England, the year 1733 was in other parts of Europe a year of strife and contention. Augustus II., King of Poland and Elector of Saxony, died in the month of February, when the Polish crown became, as usual, the object of a disgraceful struggle, which went by the name of "election." The competitors were Augustus, Elector of Saxony, son of the deceased king, and Stanislaus Leczinski, who had already been King of Poland, but who had been driven from his throne on the downfall of Charles XII. of Sweden, who, rather by force of arms than by any other right, had made him king.† By a strange com-

* Before the end of the year, the great seal having been resigned by Lord King (who died a few months afterwards), Charles Talbot, the solicitor-general, was made lord-chancellor and (in the month of December) Baron Talbot. Still further to strengthen himself in the Upper House, Walpole made the attorney-general, Philip York, lord chief-justice and Baron Hardwicke. Talbot, one of the best men upon whom promotion could fall, survived only three years.

† Augustus on re-ascending his throne had thought proper to publish a long manifesto to justify his conduct and his perjury, as in a treaty he had solemnly sworn never more to pretend any right to the sovereignty of Poland. One day he asked a Polish gentleman what he thought of this long manifesto. "Nothing is more ridiculous," said the Poie; "you ought to have said simply, Seeing that the King of Sweden has been beaten at Pultava, I have re-ascended the throne."—Rathor bination of circumstances the daughter of Stanislaus, even when his fortunes were at the lowest ebb, and he was an exile and proscribed, had become the wife of young Louis XV., and was now Queen of France. The French people made it a point of honour to procure for the father of their queen the crown which he had formerly worn, and the government resolved to support and assist Stanislaus. On the other side Augustus was supported by the Emperor Charles and the Czarina Anne of Russia, who, on the death of Peter I.'s widow Catherine, and a revolution which set aside Peter II., had ascended the throne of that country. France had for a long time ceased to have any connexion with Poland, and was at the moment unacquainted with the state of affairs in that country, and unprepared with the means of making any great effort. But Stanislaus, who was residing there, set out for his native country in disguise; and, attended by only one officer, he presented himself to the Poles at Warsaw, and was received with acclamations. The majority of the nation, or of the nobles who exercised the right of king-making by vote, were decidedly in his favour, and 60,000 suffrages recalled him to the throne. But the Czarina had resolved that the question should not be left to the decision of the Poles; three Russian armies hovered on the frontiers, and threatened to inundate the kingdom; and Augustus III. and the minority of the noble electors of Poland were soon in the Russian camp, and inviting the Muscovites into the heart of their country. In a brief space of time the whole of the Lithuanian provinces were occupied by the Muscovites, and Stanislaus was compelled to fly from the capital and shut himself up in Dantzic. There he was soon besieged by a confederate army of Russians, Saxons, and Polish partisans. The defence was heroic and long. Eight thousand of the Czarina's troops are said to have fallen in one assault; and in the fortifications of Dantzic they still point out a place which they call the grave of the Russians; but the end of all was, that Stanislaus was again obliged to disguise himself and to fly. His rival was then proclaimed King of Poland under the guns and bayonets of Russia, and the adherents of Stanislaus either submitted or carried on a hopeless, desultory, partisan warfare, which contributed to throw the country still farther back into barbarity, and to render it more and more an easy prey to Russia. The Emperor Charles had left the business to be settled by the Czarina; but this was rather through want of ability than any want of inclination to interfere, and he had indirectly aided and assisted Augustus, and injured the cause of the protégé of France. Notwithstanding the pacific intentions of Cardinal Fleury, the French court determined to resent this conduct, and they found the court of Madrid quite ready to join in a war against the emperor; for, besides old scores of animosities, the Queen of Spain, who had secured to her son the dukedom of Parma, aspired to placing him on the throne of Naples, which was weakly defended for the emperor. Everything depended upon dispatch, and armies, both French and Spanish, were prepared in a wonderfully short space of time. Walpole wisely endeavoured to prevent the firing of the first cannon, but his efforts were unsuccessful; and in the course of the following year some of the fairest parts of Europe were again scourged by the march of hostile forces, and the diplomatic scissors were once more employed to reshape and refashion dominions, principalities, and powers.

A. D. 1734.—The English parliament met on the 17th of January, when the king attended to the war which had begun on the continent, and which he said proved the necessity of increasing our forces at home. The opposition, whose plans of attack had been principally organised by Bolingbroke, were soon found to be more formidable than they had hitherto been. Our foreign policy, and the internal administration, were equally attacked; and, after a variety of minor efforts, a proposal to repeal the Septennial Bill was brought in on the 13th of March by Mr. Bromley, the son of Queen Anne's Tory secretary of state. The disaffected of the Whigs, it appears, had long scrupled about voting for the repeal of a bill which they themselves had once thought necessary for the security of the Protestant succession, but they were brought over by the persuasions of Bolingbroke and the determined will of the Tories, with whom they were now acting, and without whom they would have formed a very insignificant minority. Still, however, these Whigs were rather shy of the debate, and Pulteney, their head, delivered only a short speech, and that too in an embarrassed manner. The Tory chief, Sir William Wyndham, fought the battle; and in a very remarkable speech, which has been considered as one of the most powerful specimens of the parliamentary eloquence of that day, he hypothetically described Walpole as the most dangerous of all villains "Let us suppose," says Wyndham, "a man abandoned to all notions of virtue and honour, of no great family, and but a mean fortune, raised to be chief minister of state by the concurrence of many whimsical events; afraid, or unwilling, to trust any but creatures of his own making,—lost to all sense of shame and reputation,—ignorant of his country's true interest,—pursuing no aim but that of aggrandizing himself and his favourites,—in foreign affairs trusting none but those who, from the nature of their education, cannot possibly be qualified for the service of their country, or give weight and credit to their negotiations. Let us suppose the true interest of the nation, by such means, neglected or misunderstood, her honour tarnished, her importance lost, her trade insulted, her merchants plundered, and her sailors murdered; and all these circumstances overlooked, lest his administration should be endangered. Suppose him next possessed of immense wealth, the plunder of the nation, with a parliament chiefly composed of members whose seats are purchased, and whose votes are bought at the expense of the public treasure. In such a parliament, suppose attempts made to inquire into his conduct, or to relieve the nation from the distress which has been entailed upon it by his administration. Suppose him screened by a corrupt majority of his creatures, whom he retains in daily pay, or engages in his particular interest by distributing among them those posts and places which ought never to be bestowed upon any but for the good of the public. Let him plume himself upon his scandalous victory, because he has obtained a parliament like a packed jury, ready to acquit him at all adventures. Let us suppose him domineering with insolence over all the men of ancient families, over all the men of sense, figure, or fortune in the nation; as he has no virtue of his own, ridiculing it in others, and endeavouring to destroy or corrupt it in all. With such a minister, and such a parliament, let us suppose a case which I hope will never happen—a prince upon the throne, uninformed, ignorant, and unacquainted with the inclinations and true interests of his people; weak, capricious, transported with unbounded ambition, and possessed with insatiable avarice;—I hope such a case will never occur; but, as it possibly may, could any greater curse happen to a nation than such a prince on the throne, advised, and solely advised, by such a minister, and that minister supported by such a parliament? The nature of mankind cannot be altered by human laws; the existence of such a prince or such a minister we cannot prevent by act of parliament; but the existence of such a parliament I think we may prevent; as it is much more likely to exist, and may do more mischief, while the septennial law remains in force than if it were repealed: therefore, I am heartily for its being repealed.” In reply to this tremendous invective, which loses some of its strength in its extravagance, Walpole scarcely noticed Wyndham, whom he probably considered, on this occasion, as the mere mouth-piece of Bolingbroke; but upon that flagitious politician he laid a brand of fire which burnt through flesh and skin, and went heart-deep. “Sir,” said Walpole, “I do assure you I did not intend to have troubled you in this debate, but such incidents now generally happen towards the end of our debates, nothing at all relating to the subject, and gentlemen making such suppositions, meaning some person, or perhaps, as they say, no person now in being, and talk so much of wicked ministers, domineering ministers, ministers pluming themselves in defiance, which terms, and such like, have been of late so much made use of in this House, that, if they really mean nobody, either in the House or out of it, yet it must be supposed they at least mean to call upon some gentleman in this House to make them a reply; and, therefore, I hope I may be allowed to draw a picture in my turn; and I may likewise say that I do not mean to give a description of any particular person now in being. When gentlemen talk of ministers abandoned to all sense of virtue and honour, other gentlemen may, I am sure, with equal justice, and, I think, more justly, speak of anti-ministers and mock patriots who never had either virtue or honour, but in the whole course of their opposition are actuated only by motives of envy, and of resentment against those who have disappointed them in their views, or may not perhaps have complied with all their desires. But now, Sir, let me, too, suppose—and, the House being cleared, I am sure that no person that hears me can come within the description of the person I am to suppose—let me suppose in this, or in some other unfortunate country, an anti-minister, who thinks himself a person of so great and extensive parts, and of so many eminent qualifications, that he looks upon himself as the only person in the kingdom capable to conduct the public affairs of the nation, and therefore christening every other gentleman who has the honour to be employed in the administration by the name of Blunderer. Suppose this fine gentleman lucky enough to have gained over to his party some persons really of fine parts, of ancient families, and of great fortunes, and others of desperate views, arising from disappointed and malicious hearts; all these gentlemen, with respect to their political behaviour, moved by him, and him solely; all they say, either in private or public, being only a repetition of the words he has put into their mouths, and a spitting out that venom which he has infused into them; and yet we may suppose this leader not really liked by any even of those who so blindly follow him, and hated by all the rest of mankind. We will suppose this anti-minister to be in a country where he really ought not to be, and where he could not have been but by an effect of too much goodness and mercy, yet endeavouring, with all his might and with all his art, to destroy the fountain from whence that mercy flowed. In that country, suppose him continually contracting friendships and familiarities with the ambassadors of those princes who at the time happen to be most at enmity with his own; and if at any time it should happen to be for the interest of any of those foreign ministers to have a secret divulged to them which might be highly prejudicial to his native country, as well as to all its friends,—suppose this foreign minister applying to him, and he answering, I will get it you—tell me but what you want, I will endeavour to procure it for you: upon this, he puts a speech or two in the mouths of some of his creatures, or some of his new converts; what he wants is moved for in parliament, and, when so very reasonable a request as this is refused, suppose him and his creatures and tools, by his advice, spreading the alarm over the whole nation, and crying out, Gentlemen, our country is at present involved in many dangerous difficulties, all which we would have extricated you from, but a wicked minister and a corrupt majority refused us the proper materials; and upon this scandalous victory this minister became so insolent as to plume himself in defiances. Let us farther suppose this anti-minister to have travelled, and, at every court where he was, thinking himself the greatest minister, and making it his trade to betray the secrets of every court where he had before been; void of all faith or honour, and betraying every master he ever served. I could carry my suppositions a great deal farther, and I may say I mean no person now in being; but if we can suppose such a one, can there be imagined a greater disgrace to human nature than such as this?" This was not prophecy, but history—it was not an hypothetical case, but a strong relation of what Bolingbroke had actually done; and, as that brilliant profligate announced soon after his intention of leaving England and giving up his factious contest as hopeless, it has been assumed that Walpole's speech was the cause of this resolution.* In the rest of his famous speech Walpole exhibited with sufficient coolness the reasons which made him prefer septennial parliaments to triennial, or to parliaments of shorter duration. The triennial law, he said, ran too much into that form of government which is properly called democratical; which form was liable to these inconveniences—that it was generally too tedious in coming to any resolution, and seldom brisk enough in carrying its resolutions into execution—was never steady in any measures, and was often involved in factious seditions and insurrections, which exposed the country to the risk of being made the tool, if not the prey, of her neighbours. No prudent administration, he said, would ever resolve upon any measure of importance till they had felt not only the pulse of the parliament, but also the pulse of the people; and with triennial elections ministers would labour under this disadvantage—that, as secrets of state must not always be immediately divulged, their enemies would have a handle for exposing their measures, and rendering them disagreeable to the people, and thereby carrying a new election against them, before they could have an opportunity of justifying their measures by divulging the facts and circumstances upon which they were based. "Then," said he, "it is by experience well known that what is called the populace, in every country, are apt to be too much elated with success, and too much dejected with every misfortune. This makes them wavering in their opinions about affairs of state, and never long of the same mind; and, as the House of Commons is chosen by the free and unbiassed voice of the people in general, if this choice were so often renewed we might expect that this House would be as wavering and unsteady as the people usually are; and, it being impossible to carry on the public affairs of the nation without the concurrence of the House, the ministers would always be obliged to comply, and consequently would be obliged to change their meaasures as often as the people changed their minds." Continuing to insist that triennial parliaments would lead to democracy, and democracy to tyranny, he said—"In all countries and in all governments there will be many factious and unquiet spirits who can never be at rest either in power or out of power. When in power, they are never easy unless every man submits entirely to their direction; and when out of power they are always working and intriguing against those that are in, without any regard to justice or to the interest of their country. In popular governments such men have too much game,—they have too many opportunities for working upon and corrupting the minds of the people, in order to give them a bad impression of, and to raise discontents against, those that have the management of the public affairs for the time; and these discontents often break out into seditions and insurrections. This would, in my opinion, be our misfortune if our parliaments were either annual or triennial." As to bribery and corruption, he held that it was impossible to influence, by such base means, the majority of the electors of Great Britain to choose such men as would put their liberties in jeopardy. He spoke on this point at length, and in a curious style. "When," said he, "no encroachments are made upon the rights of the people, when the people do not think themselves in any danger, there may be many of the electors who, by a bribe of ten guineas, might be induced to vote for one candidate rather than another; but, if the court were making any encroachments upon the rights of the people, a proper spirit would, without doubt, arise in the nation; and, in such a case, I am persuaded that none, or very few, even of such electors could be induced to vote for a court candidate—no, not for ten times the sum. There may be some bribery and corruption in the nation—I am afraid there will always be some. . . . But to insinuate that money may be issued from the public treasury for bribing elections (Walpole's notorious bribes were certainly not managed in so bungling a manner) is really something very extraordinary, especially in those gentlemen who know how many checks there are upon every shilling that can be issued from thence, and how regularly the money granted in one year for the service of the nation must always be accounted for the very next session in this House, and likewise in the other, if they have a mind to call for any such account. And as to gentlemen in offices, if they have any advantages over country gentlemen, in having something else to depend on besides their own private fortunes, they have likewise many disadvantages; they are obliged to live here at London with their families, by which they are put to a much greater expense than gentlemen of equal fortune who live in the country. This lays them under a very great disadvantage in supporting their interest in the country. The country gentleman, by living among the electors, and purchasing the necessaries for his family from them,

* Lord Mahon is correct in showing that there were other causes—that this could not be the sole cause of Bolingbroke's retiring to the continent; but it may, nevertheless, have contributed among other causes. Neither Bolingbroke nor his friends could ever give anything like a consistent reply to Walpole's allegations.

keeps up an acquaintance and correspondence with them without putting himself to any extraordinary charge; whereas a gentleman who lives in London has no other way of keeping up an acquaintance and correspondence among his friends in the country but by going down, once or twice a-year, at a very extraordinary expense, and often without any other business; so that we may conclude a gentleman in office cannot, even in seven years, save much for distributing in ready money at the time of an election; and I really believe, if the fact were narrowly inquired into, it would appear that the gentlemen in office are as little guilty of bribing their electors with ready money as any other set of gentlemen in the kingdom." In the end he insisted that there was still Jacobitism and disaffection, and cases likely to occur productive of a ferment which would make frequent elections dangerous to the liberty of the country; and therefore he should consider, he believed, at all times, that it would be a very dangerous experiment to repeal the Septennial Bill. It was in vain that the Opposition asserted that the septennial law was itself an encroachment on the rights of the people—a law passed by a parliament that made itself septennial—that this long-enduring parliament had effected unconstitutional alterations in the laws of treason, and imposed the Riot Act, by which a little, dirty justice of the peace, the meanest tool of a ministry, had it in his power to put twenty or thirty of the best subjects in England to immediate death, without any trial or form but that of reading a proclamation—that it had passed the fatal South Sea Bill, and had almost passed the late odious Excise Bill:—upon a division Walpole found himself supported by a majority of 247 to 184.

On the 16th of April, having sat near its full term, parliament was dissolved by a speech from the throne, in which George spoke again of the prosperity and glory of the country, said that the interests of sovereign and subject were mutual and inseparable, and that any infringement of the rights of either would be a diminution of the strength of both, which, kept within their due limits, constitute that just balance which is necessary for the honour and dignity of the crown, and for the protection and prosperity of the people. In about a month after this the new elections came on, and were conducted with great heat. The Excise scheme, the Riot Act, the unsettled state of our commercial claims upon Spain, were all very popular and exciting topics; and the Tories, who would have exclaimed against a war if ministers had gone into one, now represented the neutrality of Great Britain as dangerous and disgraceful. By these cries, and by other means not purer than those resorted to by Walpole, the Opposition gained several seats; and even in the county of Norfolk the two Whig candidates, Coke and Marden, were defeated by two Tories, Woodhouse and Bacon. "On the whole," wrote the Duke of Newcastle, a member of the cabinet, "our parliament is, I think, a good one; but by no means such a one as the queen and Sir Robert imagine. It will require great care, attention, and management to set out right and to keep people in good humour."*

Spain and France on the one side, and the Emperor Charles on the other, seem to have made sure of the co-operation of the King of Sardinia, who held, in a manner, the key of Italy, and who, with the usual policy of his House, had given promises to both, and was resolved to act according to circumstances. At last France and Spain outbid Austria; and, while his envoy at Vienna was actually pledging his faith to the emperor, his Sardinian majesty joined the French and Spaniards, burst into the Milanese, and overran the whole of Austrian Lombardy. At the same time a strong body of Spanish infantry was landed at Genoa, a mass of cavalry was sent by land to Antibio, and a strong French and Spanish fleet dominated in the Italian seas. The Spanish forces were directed by the Count de Montemar, but, "for fame and dignity of name," were under the supreme command of the Infant Don Carlos, who had been for some time settled in his Italian dominions at Parma. The object in view was no secret—it was to deprive Austria of Lombardy and the two Sicilies (i.e. Naples and the island)—"which," wrote the Queen of Spain to her favourite son Carlos, "being created an independent kingdom, shall be thine. Go, then, and conquer. The finest crown of Italy expects thee."† Don Carlos was little more than seventeen years old; but he was active, ambitious, and not without ability. He had a very advantageous person, excellent manners and address, and he was encouraged and favoured underhand by Pope Clement XII., who liked not to see the Austrians settled on both sides of him. In the month of March he assembled in Perugia 16,000 foot and 5000 horse, Spaniards, French, and Italians; and then, with his prime adviser, and afterwards his excellent minister, the Pisan advocate and professor of Jus publicum, Bernardo Tanucci, he held a council of war, which was attended by many Neapolitan princes and nobles dissatisfied with the Austrian government, by many grantees of Spain who wanted to recover the vast estates and power they had lost in Naples and Sicily, by the Count de Marsillac, and many Frenchmen of distinction. It was presently resolved to advance with all speed to the city of Naples, and to send beforehand proclamations to inform the people that Don Carlos was coming to relieve them from the oppression, hardness, and avarice of the Germans, and to reign like a father over them,—that the Inquisition, which the Neapolitans abhorred and had always successfully resisted, should never be imposed or be attempted to be imposed upon them. have been as fiery and imprudent as ever, had been defeated with great slaughter in the battle of La Crocetta, and as the King of Sardinia had engaged to secure the passes of the Alps, there was no fear of any attack in the rear; and, putting himself in motion, Don Carlos traversed the states of the Church, avoiding the city of Rome at the earnest prayer of the Pope, and taking the road of Valmontone and Frosinone to the Neapolitan frontiers. At the same time a strong Spanish squadron, with troops on board, sailed along the coast from Leghorn and the island of Elba, and, seldom out of sight of the land army until it struck among the mountains, made for the beautiful islands of Ichia and Procida, which lie at the head of the Gulf of Naples, and which, being left by the Austrians wholly without defence, were obliged to surrender and pass under the obedience of the fortunate Infant. Then the Spanish men-of-war ran into the gulf, scoured the coasts, and took sundry vessels and small forts within view of the capital, where the people, as was their wont, were complaining of being betrayed and abandoned, and shaping their mouths to cry Long live King Carlo! instead of Long live the Emperor Carlo! In the mean while the main Spanish army crossed the frontier and the river Garigliano, or Liris, without opposition, and reached the antique towns of Aquino and San Germano. At the latter place Don Carlos halted three days; as the Austrian general, Count Traun, was in his front with 5000 men, well defended behind the trenches and batteries of Mignano. But on the 30th of March some mountaineers and foresters of the village of Sesto offered to conduct the Spaniards through the woods which overhang Mignano, and lead them without fear of discovery on the flank and rear of the Austrian lines; and the Duke of Eboli put himself under the guidance of these peasants with 4000 men, while the Count de Montemar moved in another direction, to be at hand when a sudden night assault should be made. Eboli was well nigh surprising the camp in a dead sleep; but a vidette discovered some of his troops stealing across the mountains and forests, and ran into Mignano with the news. At first the Austrian general, who believed these mountains inaccessible, and his position unapproachable except in front and in the teeth of his cannon, would not credit the intelligence; but the fatal truth was presently proved; and then Traun broke up his camp in panic and confusion, spiked the heaviest of his guns, burnt his baggage-waggons, marched off in the depth of night, and never stopped till he had got beyond the deep and rapid river Volturno, and within the regularly fortified and exceedingly strong town of Capua, which stands on the left bank of that river. As soon as this was known in Naples, the lazzaroni and the countless mob of that city, encouraged by the presence of Spanish ships of war in the gulf, began to insult and threaten the imperial viceroy, who, without publishing any edict or establishing any provisional government, stole away and fled with his German ministers and a few German officers towards the Adriatic and the province of Apulia. Don Carlos, advancing slowly and cautiously, and crossing the Garigliano above Capua, fixed his head-quarters at Maddaloni, within twelve miles of the capital, where he received the visits, oaths, and allegiance of Neapolitan princes, dukes, and barons without number, and amused himself with shooting pigeons. The "Elect," or magistrates of the capital, waited upon him, and presented the keys of their city; and on the following day, the 10th of April, Don Carlos moved from Maddaloni to Aversa, whence he dispatched Marsillac to occupy the city of Naples and reduce its three castles, in which the Imperialists still held out. Other squadrons were encamped in the plain of Sessa to watch and shut up the garrisons of Capua and Gaeta; and, finally, the main body of the Spaniards was marched across the mountains into Apulia, to look after the imperial viceroy, who had collected some forces there, and was expecting others from Sicily and Trieste. The Neapolitan castles had all surrendered by the 6th of May; and on the 10th Don Carlos made his triumphal entry as a conqueror and a king. The imperial viceroy contrived to collect about 8000 men in Apulia, but he fled before 12,000 Spaniards, and left the command of his forces to the Prince Belmonte, who was destitute neither of fidelity to the emperor nor of bravery, but woefully deficient in military genius. He was defeated on the 25th of May at Bitonto, on the shore of the Adriatic; and then nearly all the towns and castles of Apulia surrendered to the Spaniards. The rest of the kingdom soon followed the example; even the strong fortress of Pescara in the Abruzzo capitulated, and the stronger fortress of Gaeta surrendered in the month of August, if not without firing a gun, almost without losing a man. But Count Traun kept the flag of the emperor flying a little longer over the walls of Capua, which did not surrender till the month of November. The island of Sicily, which had been so recently won from Spain by the English fleet and the Austrian army for the emperor Charles, made even less resistance than the continental kingdom, and its conquest was effected with less bloodshed than had often been spent at the taking of an outpost. Don Carlos remained undisputed master of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. Such was the fate of the war in Italy; nor was it much more favourable to the emperor on the Rhine, though there the imperialists were commanded by that great soldier Prince Eugene, the rival of the fame of Marlborough, a conqueror in many a hard-fought battle. The French in superior force, and under the command of Marlborough's nephew, the almost equally favoured Duke of Berwick, crossed the Rhine and invested Philipsbourg. But before the walls of this place Berwick ended his career, being killed by a cannon-ball. The command of the French army then fell to the Marquis d'Asfeld, who took Philipsbourg after a trying siege, in spite of all the skill and efforts of Eugene, who scarcely took any active part in war after this unfortunate campaign, and who died about two years afterwards at Vienna. The emperor called upon all Europe for succour and assistance, representing that the schemes of Louis XIV. were reviving,—that the worst consequences ever apprehended from the union of France and Spain were now realizing; and he entertained some hopes that England and Holland would again take up arms to curb the ambition of France.

A. D. 1735.—On the opening of parliament, in the month of January, the minority was found to be larger than formerly; but the majority was still an overwhelming one. The king expressed his concern at the present commotions on the continent; and said that, though he had hitherto resisted the pressing solicitations of the emperor for aid in this war, he hoped that his subjects would not repine at furnishing the necessary means of placing him in a situation to act that part which might eventually be incumbent upon him. The opposition, or some of the patriots who had been exclaiming so recently on the hustings that England was dishonoured by keeping out of this continental war, now declared that she ought never to intermeddle in the unintelligible and everlasting broils upon the continent, but keep herself quiet and reduce the standing army instead of increasing it; but the majority nevertheless voted an increase of the forces both for land and sea, and furnished the necessary supplies. A subsidy was also voted to Denmark. The session was closed in the month of May, and then George, leaving his queen as sole regent, took his departure for Hanover. Bolingbroke had gone to the continent some months before, with the intention of spending the remainder of his life in France. According to Tindal there was published this year, in London, an octavo pamphlet containing a correspondence of some length which had taken place between Bolingbroke and the secretary of the Pretender immediately after his abrupt dismissal from that prince's service in 1716. This pamphlet it appears was immediately suppressed, but Tindal has printed the letters at large; and their contents are such as must have been both disagreeable and alarming to Bolingbroke.* A recent writer attributes Bolingbroke's departure to his despondency at the result of the late general election, and at the retirement of lady Suffolk, which destroyed his expectations from the court. The first of these reasons may very well have been the motive; but we doubt whether the astute plotter could ever of late years have built any hope upon a person so passive and powerless as George's amiable mistress; and we are still inclined to give importance to the effect of Walpole's withering speech. But it further appears that Bolingbroke had disgusted his allies, the out-of-place discontented Whigs, and had quarrelled with Pulteney, who considered him rather as a hindrance than a help in the war carrying on against ministers. But, whatever were the causes, Bolingbroke went over early in the year and established himself in his beautiful villa of Chanteloup in Touraine. A few months after he wrote to his friend Wyndham—"My part is over; and he who remains on the stage after his part is over deserves to be hissed off. . . . I thought it my duty not to decline the service of my party till the party itself either succeeded or despaired of success." Pulteney, at the same time, was observed to be gloomy and depressed. The day before the House rose some remarkable civilities passed between him and his former bosom friend Sir Robert, and subsequently he seemed to make advances towards a reconciliation. Going over to the Hague he sent a message to the minister's brother Horace, who, in consequence, went to see him. According to Horace Walpole's account he was very cordially received. "I endeavoured," says Horace, "to be easy and cheerful, and to make him so; but his constant complaint was lowness of spirits, and, in my opinion, he is rather dead-hearted than sick in body; in other respects, had a stranger come into the room, he would have thought we had never been otherwise than good friends."*

The emperor thought that at last he had discovered a certain means of moving both the Dutch and English government to take a part in the continental war; and he actually threatened to withdraw his troops from the Netherlands and cede that country to the French, whose occupancy of it had always been the stalking terror of Holland and England. But, as Walpole still remained averse to war and unmoved by a threat which he no doubt believed would never be realised, the emperor endeavoured to overthrow that ministry by a cabinet intrigue to be headed by Lord Harrington, who was known to be in favour of an armed interference. To this end one Abbé Strickland, who had intrigued for the Jacobites and against them, and who lived and thrived by intrigue, was sent over to England; but Walpole now found out the abbé under his false name, and Queen Caroline sent him out of England, intimating at the same time to the court of Vienna that they had been deceived by false reports, and that England would on no account engage in this war. Nothing therefore was left but submission, and the emperor finally consented to accept the mediation of the maritime powers. The march of armies was then stopped, and the diplomatists began their campaign, which, as usual, was very long and very formal. If the French minister Cardinal Fleury had not been as pacific as Walpole, it is quite certain that the business would never have been settled by the pen. In the end, however, it was agreed that Naples and Sicily should remain to Don Carlos, as a separate kingdom, independent of Spain and every other country; and that the infant, on the other hand, should resign Parma and his other possessions in Italy, together with the reversion of Tuscany—that the Milanese should be restored to the emperor—that Augustus, the protégé of Russia and Austria, should remain King of Poland—that his rival Stanislaus, the French king's father-in-law, should retain the royal title, and be put in possession of the duchy of Lorraine, which, after his decease, should devolve to the French crown, and be incorporated politically, as it was physically, with the kingdom of France. The Duke of Lorraine, weak and a mere vassal as he was, had rights which could not well be overlooked, and he had a natural reluctance to resign to the Pole his paternal dominions; but eventually the young Duke of Lorraine, who was going to marry Maria Theresa, the heiress of the emperor's states under the Pragmatic Sanction, was induced to comply by the persuasions and authority of his imperial majesty, by a pension from France, and by being promised the succession to Tuscany in lieu of Don Carlos. The treaty further stipulated that both France and Sardinia should guarantee the Pragmatic Sanction, upon which the tranquillity of Europe and the safety or greatness of the emperor's daughter depended. His Sardinian majesty, who had played so double a part, was rewarded with the cession of Novara, Tortona, and other districts sliced off from the emperor's Lombard dominions. France was well satisfied with the acquisition of Lorraine, which ought to have been hers long before, but which neither Richelieu nor Mazarin had been able to acquire. The people of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies were also great gainers by these arrangements, for, instead of hungry viceroys, ever changing, from Madrid or Vienna, they got a king and a court of their own; and the government of Don Carlos and his minister Tanucci was on the whole a blessing to the country.

Avoiding one war for the emperor, England ran some risk of being brought into another for her ally the King of Portugal. The origin of this quarrel was sufficiently insignificant. The government at Madrid accused the servants of the Portuguese minister there of rescuing a criminal, and threw the said servants into prison. Every foreign ambassador at Madrid took part with the Portuguese envoy, and considered himself insulted in the infringement of the ambassadorial privileges. On the other side, the proud Spaniards would make no apology or concession. The dispute, embittered by memorials and counter-memorials, ran so high, that hostilities between Spain and Portugal seemed inevitable, and the court of Lisbon sent over to London Dom Antonio D'Alzevedo to claim the assistance of their close ally King George. Our obligation to give this assistance was indisputable and imperative; and Walpole forthwith sent a fleet of twenty-five ships of the line to the Tagus, taking care, however, well to instruct the admiral, Sir John Norris, that he was to act only defensively, and, in case of Spain's beginning hostilities, to represent to the Portuguese the expediency and advantage of moderation. So strong an English fleet riding in the Tagus produced an immediate effect at Madrid, where also the British resident intimated to his Catholic majesty that England must, and assuredly would, protect her faithful ally. Cardinal Fleury joined in this good work of peace, and the quarrel was soon made up without the logic of cannon-balls.

A. D. 1736.—When the parliament met, in the month of January, George announced that the affairs of Europe had taken a very happy turn, and that this would enable him to make a considerable reduction in the forces both by sea and land. His majesty added—"I am willing to hope this pleasing prospect of peace abroad will greatly contribute to peace and good harmony at home. Let that example of temper and moderation, which has so happily calmed the spirits of contending princes, banish from among you all intestine discord and dissension. Those who truly wish the peace and prosperity of their country can never have a more favourable opportunity than now offers, of distinguishing themselves, by declaring their satisfaction in the progress already made towards restoring the public tranquillity, and in promoting what is still necessary to bring it to perfection." The congratulatory address was carried not only without a division, but without a syllable of criticism or opposition. It was gin that disturbed this harmony. The vice of drunkenness had always been the worst defect of the English people, and it was conceived by Sir Joseph Jekyll and others that it had lately been on the increase, and that the best way to stop it was to put so heavy a tax upon gin as should make that liquor too dear for the poor, who chiefly or solely used it. Jekyll brought in a bill proposing that a duty of twenty shillings per gallon should be laid upon gin and other spirituous liquors, that no unlicensed persons should be allowed to retail the same, and that every licensed retailer should pay fifty pounds per annum for his licence. Walpole foresaw that these extravagant duties would lead to smuggling and fraud, and that his successors in office would be obliged to modify the bill which they now carried. The duties hitherto levied upon gin, &c., had belonged to the civil list, and had not exceeded 70,000*l.* per annum; but Walpole demanded that whatever deficiency might happen from the reduced consumption of duty-paying spirits should be made good to the crown, and obtained a vote to that effect. This Gin Act did as little good to the public morality as to the public revenue. Clandestine dealers increased their trade, and then were made only more vicious and reckless by being thrown into prison to pay fines which they either could not or would not pay; "persons of inferior trades" "journeymen," "apprentices and servants," got drunk upon gin as frequently as before, and committed sundry riots because, as they pretended, the minister had tried to put gin out of their reach, and had shown that he was indifferent to what they drank, provided the government purse did not suffer. One of the great Hogarth's engravings was likely to do better service than a thousand bills like Sir Joseph Jekyll's, which certainly, however, had the effect of serving the purposes of the opposition by increasing Walpole's unpopularity. The Jacobite plotters tried to avail themselves of this gin fever of discontent, but the government, aided by all the respectable classes of society, put down the riots without bloodshed. In the month of March Mr. Plumer prematurely brought forward a motion for repealing the Pest Act. Walpole, who had deluded the dissenters with hopes of his support when the proper time should come, opposed the motion with great caution and daintiness of expression, for he could not afford to lose the support of the dissenters, who had almost to a man voted for him and his friends at the late election, and he feared to give offence to the church party or to provoke a new war about "the church in danger." The motion was negatived by a majority of 251 to 123. Nearly at the same time, however, the minister warmly supported a bill for the relief of the Quakers, who, in a petition to the Commons had complained—"that, notwithstanding the several acts of parliament made for the more easy recovery of tithes and ecclesiastical dues, in a summary way, by warrant from justices of the peace, yet, as the said people conscientiously refused the payment, they were not only liable to, but many of them had undergone, grievous sufferings, by prosecution in the Exchequer, Ecclesiastical, and other courts, to the imprisonment of their persons, and the impoverishing and ruin of them and their families, for such small sums as were recoverable by those acts." The clergy took alarm, cried out spoliation, and blew their loudest blasts; petitions against the Quakers' petition were poured into the House, setting forth "that such a law would be extremely prejudicial to themselves and brethren, excluding them from the benefit of the law then in being for the recovery of tithes and other dues, and thereby putting the clergy of the established church upon a worse foot than the rest of his majesty's subjects; and praying to be heard by counsel against the bill." The Quakers, however, had gained the universal esteem of the nation by their exemplary moral conduct and elevated notions of mutual charity; they had many and warm friends in the Commons, and the House generally seemed to favour the bill. Yet it was found necessary to submit the measure to numerous alterations in committee; for example, it was inserted that all church and chapel rates, if refused by Quakers, were, upon complaint of the church-wardens, to be levied by distress, by order of two justices, but no Quaker was to be sued or prosecuted in any other manner, for non-payment of church and chapel rates. The bill, clogged with other clauses, was carried through the Commons by a majority of 164 to 48; but the Lords threw it out by a majority of 54 to 35. Walpole, who, among other considerations, was anxious to gratify the numerous and influential body of Quakers established in his native county of Norfolk—a body that had stood by him in many a stern contest—was furious at this rejection, which he chiefly attributed to the bishops. He sent for Gibson, the Bishop of London, and rated him severely for his conduct in the House of Lords. Up to this moment he had entrusted the chief management of ecclesiastical affairs, the niceties of which he did not pretend to understand, to that prelate; but now he transferred the honours and advantages of that management to other hands. But Gibson, it appears, lost not only the minister's favour but also the see of Canterbury by his opposition to the Quaker Bill. The controversialist Whiston used to call him the heir apparent to the primacy, and it was universally believed from his intimacy with the minister that he would obtain that promotion; but on the death of Archbishop Wake, which happened in the following year (1737), the vacant dignity was conferred on Potter, bishop of Oxford.

The session of parliament closed on the 26th of May; and then his majesty went to Hanover. This time the temporary regency of Queen Caroline was far from being so tranquil as it had been on former occasions. The gin mobs were not yet tranquillized, and other riots were caused in London by the employment in the Spitalfields looms of a number of poor Irish, who had come over to mow and reap, but who had engaged to help to weave silk at two-thirds of the ordinary wages. But the disturbances in London were trifles compared to a tremendous popular outbreak in the city of Edinburgh. The tale scarcely needs telling, for it has been told by Sir Walter Scott in one of the best and most read of his exquisite Waverley novels. Two noted smugglers from Fife—Wilson and Robertson—were lying under sentence of death in the Tulbooth, for having robbed a collector of the excise. Through friendship or a bribe these doomed men procured a file, removed their fetters, and cut through the bar of a window. Wilson, eager to escape first, insisted upon making the first attempt, but, being a big, burly man, he stuck fast in the gap and was discovered by the jailors, when he and his more slender companion were again made fast. When the two unfortunate men were led out of prison into the neighbouring church to hear their last sermon, Wilson, who conceived himself to be the cause of preventing Robertson's escape—for, as a thin man, he might have passed through the bars if he had been allowed to go first—conceived a desperate and perhaps a sudden notion that he might yet liberate his comrade. The two were guarded by only four soldiers of the city-guard, and Wilson, though fat, was strong. When such a movement was no more expected than an earthquake, he sprung forward, seized two of the soldiers with his hands, bade Robertson run for his life, and secured a third soldier with his teeth. Robertson, whether warned or not, presently shook off the fourth soldier, rushed out of the church and was never again seen in Edinburgh. This was not a time of romantic feeling in high quarters, or Wilson, who saved his friend and remained to be hanged, would have received a pardon, or at least his life; but the people of Edinburgh were much moved by the incident, and, having besides no great affection for excisemen and officers of the revenue—and Wilson they said had done no more than rob one of those robbers—they earnestly wished and apparently even hoped that the sufferer might be respited, or saved by some other less legal means. But no respite came, and, as the magistrates were warned that a rescue would be attempted, they took every precaution in order to prevent any interruption of the hangman's performance, and drew out a considerable portion of their city-guard under the command of their captain, John Porteous. This Porteous is described as a daring and active police officer, but a harsh and brutal man, that was feared and hated by the Edinburgh populace. Backed by this array, the executioner performed his horrible office, nor was any interruption offered till Wilson was dead and about to be cut down. Then some of the rabble began to groan and curse, and this excited others to throw stones at the hangman. It is said that executions of the kind seldom took place in Edinburgh without some such expression of the popular disgust; but the stones now hit the city guard and perhaps their captain as well as the hangman, and Porteous, in one of his savage furies, seized a musket and fired right into the mob. Some of his men followed his example, and many shots were fired without the Riot Act being read, or any legal formality gone through. By the usual fatality attending these cases most of the people that were killed or wounded were quiet spectators. The indignation at Porteous's rash and bloody proceedings was universal and excessive: he was thrown into the prison from which Wilson had just issued, was brought to trial for murder before the High Court of Justiciary, and was found guilty by an Edinburgh jury, though only by a majority of eight to seven. It was made to appear on his trial that he had been attacked first by the mob, and it was even inserted in the verdict which condemned him, that "he and his guards were attacked and beat with several stones of a considerable bigness, thrown by the multitude, whereby several of the soldiers were bruised and wounded." As the best thing she could do under these circumstances, Queen Caroline sent down a respite of six weeks in order to have time to inquire into the circumstances. But the reprieve was no sooner known in Edinburgh than the populace, who well remembered how Captain Bushell, who had fired upon the people of Glasgow, had been promoted instead of being hanged, were convinced it was the intention of the government to extend a full pardon to the prisoner—who most assuredly merited, if not death, a severe and exemplary punishment; and soon there arose a more terrible storm than ever, which was the more dangerous from its concentration and the caution used in collecting and directing its elements. On the 7th of September the evening, previous to the day which had been originally appointed for his execution, Porteous, who interpreted the respite as it had been interpreted by others, gave an entertainment in his prison to a party of friends, drank wine and whiskey, and spoke with confidence of his approaching delivery. But at about ten o'clock that night a drum beat in the lower suburbs of Edinburgh, and a fierce multitude, which increased as the roll of the drum was heard, and which was apparently under the guidance of cautious and skilful leaders, soon seized and barricaded the West Port, the ports of the Canongate and Netherbow, and effectually cut off a regiment of infantry. These wary rioters next attacked and disarmed the city guard, who offered no resistance and received no injury, though among them were some of the very men who had fired upon the people at Wilson's execution. But the mob wanted not the blood of these inferior agents—the only man they had doomed to die was the captain. Armed with the guns, halberts, and Lochaber axes they had taken from the burgher guard, they rushed towards the Tolbooth shouting Porteous! Porteous! But the walls and low gates of that old prison were tremendously strong, and it was a long and doubtful task to drag their victim from his lair. The worthy magistrates of the good city of Edinburgh were all drinking at a tavern in the Parliament Close. Mr. Lindsay, who had the honour of representing the city in parliament, was at the tavern with the magistrates, and, as the riot increased, he undertook to carry a message to General Moyle, who was, with the regular troops, cut off in the suburbs. Lindsay, not without difficulty and danger, reached the general's quarters, and requested him to force the barricaded Nether Bow Port or Gate, and march into the city. Moyle, very properly, refused to move against the people unless authorised by a written warrant from the magistrates: Lindsay, on the other side, was afraid to be the bearer of any such paper, as the people were likely to tear him to pieces if they intercepted him and found it upon him. The general afterwards declared that Lindsay had come to him drunk;—that honourable member said that the general showed a wonderful want of alacrity—which might well be, considering the circumstances and the recent example of what had befallen Porteous; and it was with extreme difficulty that mischief was prevented between General Moyle and Mr. Lindsay. The general, however, seeing it impossible to obtain a written order to act from the magistrates in the city, sent to Andrew Fletcher, Lord Justice Clerk of Scotland, who was at his villa at the distance of about three miles; but Fletcher was in bed, no answer was procured until one o'clock in the morning, and then, by some mistake, it was not delivered to the general, but to Lindsay. The governor of Edinburgh Castle having also refused to act without a written order, the magistrates, left to themselves, sallied out of the tavern, and tried to descend the High-street towards the prison; but they were presently stopped by the mob, who neither injured them nor insulted them, but made them go back to the tavern and remain quiet. After battering the iron-bound Tolbooth-gate without effect till their strength or patience was exhausted, a voice in the crowd cried out "Try fire!" The suggestion was acted upon instantly;—tar-barrels and other combustible materials were heaped before the door, and the old oak began to char and burn. The jailor then thought himself compelled to surrender, and he threw out the keys to the mob, who rushed in, while the other prisoners confined rushed out. The ringleaders went straight to the cell of Porteous and broke it open; but the cell was empty—the victim seemed gone. But a man cried out that he could not be gone far, and pointed to the chimney. A rush was made to that aperture and Porteous was pulled down by the legs, and told that he must die the death he deserved. The fierce but fallen and helpless man entreated and prayed and offered large sums of money; but it was all in vain. The ringleaders allowed him to give the money and papers he had with him to the safe keeping of a friend, who was in confinement for debt; and then, as if he had made his will in a regular manner, a man of a grave and reverend aspect offered him sundry spiritual exhortations of the sort considered proper to dying men. They then carried Porteous from the Tolbooth to the Grassmarket, the spot where Wilson had suffered, where the captain had fired upon the people, and where executions were usually performed. To obtain a coil of ropes they broke open a shop, but they left a guinea behind them to pay for what they had taken. They could not find the ordinary gallows, but they seized a dyer's pole and made that serve for the horrid office. When Porteous was hanged, and dead and cold, the mob dispersed quietly to their houses, and when day dawned nothing remained in the streets of Edinburgh but a few scattered halberts and Lochaber axes which the rioters had thrown away to be resumed by their proprietors of the city guard, and the suspended body of the wretched Porteous. The news of this remarkable outrage created astonishment at London and bewildered the government: Queen Caroline was greatly excited, as she considered the murder of Porteous, whom she had reprieved, as a direct insult to her own person and authority. It is said that in her first rage she exclaimed to the Duke of Argyll that, rather than submit to such things, she would desolate the country and make Scotland a hunting-field; when that high-born Scot replied, with a profound bow, "Then, madam, I will take leave of your majesty and go down to my own country to get my hounds ready!" Yet it was Lord Hay, the Duke of Argyll's brother, that was sent down to Edinburgh as the only person capable of ascertaining the real nature of the riot and bringing the offenders to justice; and he was intrusted by his friend Walpole with very full powers. Ilay offered rewards and denounced tremendous threats, but he could never elicit any disclosures as to the ringleaders or actors in the tragical affair. The fact appears to be that nearly all Edinburgh was about equally guilty—that the hanging of Porteous was considered a great national measure, and that the meanest man, woman, or child disdained to reveal anything that might point the vengeance of government against Scotsmen for so laudable a deed! Every body knew that persons of very superior manners and condition had been actively engaged. Lord Ilay was paralyzed and knew not what to do or think. “The most shocking circumstance,” says his lordship in a letter to Walpole, “is, that it plainly appears the high-flyers of our Scotch church have made this infamous murder a point of conscience. One of the actors went straight away to a country church, where the sacrament was given to a vast crowd of people, as the fashion is here, and there boasted what he had done; all the lower rank of the people who have distinguished themselves by pretences to a superior sanctity talk of this murder as the hand of God doing justice; and my endeavours to punish murderers are called grievous persecution.” The people of Scotland, however, remained perfectly quiet, leaving the execution of Porteous to appear as an isolated fact unconnected with any other scheme or intention of revolt.

A. D. 1737.—The parliament this year did not open till the 1st of February. Its first debates were upon the Edinburgh tumults, and were characterized by a violence almost as inexcusable as that of the Porteous mob. There were madmen in both Houses, who, if they had had their way, would have converted a night riot into a long and bloody civil war. A fierce vindictive bill was brought in proposing nothing less than to abolish the city charter of Edinburgh, raze the city gates, disband the city guard, and fine and imprison and render the provost, Mr. Wilson, for ever incapable of holding any public office. Witnesses were examined at the bar of the Lords, and even three Scottish judges in their robes were subjected to questionings and cross-questionings; yet all that could be fairly proved against the provost and magistrates was, that they had been somewhat careless; that they had disregarded some indirect warnings, and that they had been taken by surprise. But their strong Scottish feeling of nationality, which could often rise even in courtly lords and members of parliament high above the love of lucre and every other consideration, blazed forth with a heat which alarmed and deterred the prosecuting party. In the Lords the Duke of Argyll denounced the bill as contrary to law and justice; and in the Commons the wise and patriotic Duncan Forbes, though holding office under the crown as lord advocate for Scotland, spoke eloquently and vehemently in the same sense; and, though Walpole replied, the Scottish lawyer was generally considered to have had the best of the argument. Walpole, however, was wise enough to declare that he by no means made the bill a ministerial question. The harsh measure did not captivate the English people; and in spite of old national antipathy it soon became unpopular with them. It was well nigh cast out in committee. In the end it was rendered almost “stingless;” the most obnoxious clauses were allowed to drop one by one, and nothing was left but an act for disabling Alexander Wilson, the provost, from taking, holding, or enjoying any office or place of magistracy in the city of Edinburgh, or elsewhere in Great Britain, and for imposing a fine upon the said corporation of Edinburgh of 2000*l.* for the benefit of the widow of Porteous. And so, as some humourist at the time observed, the end of all these great debates was, the making the fortune of an old cook-maid. There was, however, a second bill, originated by the Lords, containing a clause compelling the ministers of the Scottish church to read once every month for twelve months to come a proclamation from their pulpits, calling on their congregations to find out and bring to justice the murderers of Porteous. This order was exceedingly odious to the majority of the Presbyterian clergy, who complained, with some reason, that it was making the pulpit a place of hue-and-cry. Other conscientious preachers objected that, as the proclamation mentioned the lords spiritual in parliament, their reading of it might look like an acknowledgment of episcopacy, which they still abhorred. Between the bill and proclamation, the violence of the people and the irritation of the clergy, Walpole lost materially in his hold on the Scotch burghs; and this he was made to feel at the next elections.

The remaining debates of the present session were chiefly of a financial nature. In a committee of supply on the 9th of March Walpole moved that a sum of one million should be taken from the sinking fund, and applied to relieve some of the old South Sea annuitants. On the 14th this resolution was agreed to. But then Sir John Barnard proposed that the House should resolve itself into committee to consider the national debt, and receive any proposals which might be made to reduce the rate of interest to 3 per cent. The minister, after speaking about the danger of meddling with public credit, or taking any step likely to affect it, consented, and on the 21st the House resolved itself into a committee of supply. The national debt was proved to amount to 47,866,596*l.* Sir John Barnard produced his scheme, which was, that his majesty might be enabled to borrow money at 3 per cent. to redeem old South Sea annuities and others for which a higher rate of interest was paid. The land interest seconded the project, captivated by the notion of getting money at 3 per cent.; but the monied interest, the capitalists, in general opposed it, and, after a long debate and some of those parliamentary manoeuvres of which Walpole was so great a master, it was rejected.

In the spring of the preceding year Frederick Prince of Wales, who had fixed his heart upon his cousin, Frederica of Prussia, reluctantly married, at the instigation of his father, Augusta Princess of Saxe Gotha, whose beauty and accomplishments seem soon to have made him forget his former unhappy passion. But marriage increases expense; and, as out of a civil list of 800,000*l.*, the prince received only 50,000*l.* a-year, he was much straitened, and the opposition, who had fastened upon him almost from the first moment of his arrival in England, easily led him to consider himself as ill-used by a grasping and avaricious father. Two years before, Bolingbroke, who had been one of the prince's chief admirers, had recommended him to set his father at defiance, and apply to parliament for a settled revenue of 100,000*l.* a-year independent of him. It is probable that Bolingbroke's friend Wyndham gave the same advice, and that Pulteney and Chesterfield, Carteret and Cobham, and the other members of the mixed opposition of Whig and Tory who called themselves "the patriots," and who maintained a close intercourse with the prince, were equally regardless of the Fifth Commandment. Bubb Dodington, who has been justly described as "a man of some talent, and a patron of two boroughs,"* but who, by a severer pen, might be set down as one of the most thorough-going jobbers of those jobbing days, takes to himself the credit of attempting to dissuade the prince from following the advice of Bolingbroke. Bubb confesses, however, that his royal highness requested his assistance, "and designed partly to employ him in the measure," which would have been dangerous at that moment to his own interests. "The prince," he says, "entered into very bitter complaints of the usage he had all along met with from the administration, and even from their majesties: that he was not allowed wherewithal to live, &c., that he was resolved to endure it no longer, and had determined to make a demand in parliament of a jointure for the princess, and of 100,000*l.* per annum for himself, which his father had when prince, and which he looked on to be his right, both in law and equity. I objected to the very great danger of such an undertaking; put his royal highness in mind, how strongly I had always been against it, when he formerly mentioned it; and was going to show the fatal consequences it must produce, besides the great improbability of success. But he interrupted me, and said, that it was too far gone for those considerations; that he did not ask my advice, but my assistance; he was determined upon the measure, and designed to send and speak with my particular friends, namely, Sir Paul Methuen, Lord Wilmington, and the Duke of Dorset; but chose out of kindness to me, to acquaint me first with it: that he would send to Sir Paul by Sir Thomas Frankland, and asked me if I would break the matter to them, and what I believed, they would think of it." Bubb Dodington continues in a style which is exceedingly characteristic of the man:—"Sensible of the danger and difficulties that attend negotiations of this delicate nature, even among the best friends, I replied, as to the first part, that I humbly begged to be excused from breaking it; that, whatever friendship those gentlemen did me the honour to admit me to, I thought it a matter too high to undertake; that, as he had mentioned his intentions of sending to them, and as they were, by their rank, and affection to his royal highness, every way qualified to be consulted, I thought it highly proper that he should know their sentiments from their own mouths, in an affair of this very great importance; that then what they said to his royal highness could not be mistaken, and what he was pleased to say to them could not be misrepresented. As to what they would think of it, I was confident, by what I felt myself, that they would be infinitely surprised: too much so, in my judgment, to give his royal highness any positive and determinate opinion." According to Bubb, his royal highness then said he did not want their opinion, but their assistance, and asked him what his friend the Duke of Argyll, who was now much out of favour with the court and ministry, would do for him? To which Dodington replied, that the duke would be as much surprised as himself; that he did not know what his grace would do, but was confident he knew what he would not do, which was to advise his highness to this dangerous measure. The minute recorder of his own shame, who had a moral obtuseness which seems to have made him insensible to the disgrace of his most shameful proceedings, then continues:—"He (the prince) answered, that the measure was fixed, that he was resolved, and wanted no advice; but he would not send to him, nor to Lord Scarborough, but to the Duke of Dorset and Lord Wilmington he would send, being resolved it should come into the House of Lords the same day, or soon after, let the fate of it be what it would in the House of Commons. He stopped here a little, and used some expressions, as if he would have me understand that he had said enough about all those that he thought I lived with in the closest connexion. I endeavoured, after assuring him with what affectionate duty we had always been his sincere servants, to show the great improbability of success in such an undertaking; but he cut me short, and said, none at all, that there were precedents for it, and mentioned that of the Princess of Denmark, in King William's time; that all the opposition and the Tories were engaged in it; that as it was his own determination, and he had been advised by nobody, when he had resolved it in his own mind he thought it necessary to speak to people himself; he had done so to Mr. Pulteney, Lord Carteret, Lord Chesterfield, Master of the Rolls (Jekyll), and Sir William Wyndham; that they were all hearty in it; that Mr. Pulteney, at the first notice, expressed himself so handsomely, that he should never forget it; but said he could, at that time, only answer for himself, not expecting the proposition, but begged leave to consult with some of his friends, which his royal highness granted him, and he had since assured him that they were unanimous; that Sir William Wyndham had said that he had long desired an opportunity of showing his regard and attachment to his royal highness; that he would answer for his whole party, as well as for himself; and that he was very happy that an occasion presented itself to convince his royal highness, by their zealous and hearty appearance in support of his interest, how far they were from being Jacobites, and how much they were misrepresented under that name." Continuing his revelations as to the parties who had pledged themselves to assist him against his father, the prince said that Lord Winchelsea was gone down to Petworth, to bring up the old Duke of Somerset, who he expected would move the measure in the House of Lords; that Mr. Sandys, Mr. Gibbon, Sir John Barnard, and several others were acquainted with the project, of which they highly approved, and that possibly Sir John Barnard, the financier, who had recently been declaiming upon the necessity of reducing taxation, might move it in the House of Commons. The prince then asked Dodington, who was at this time about court, wearing a mask of devotion to the king and his ministers, whether he had heard nothing of this business at court; and upon Bubb's assuring him that he had not, the prince drew the consoling inference that the minister must be generally odious when nobody would tell him a thing that so nearly concerned him, though some forty-six to fifty were well acquainted with it; adding that this would make an end of Walpole's great power. Bubb wished for the minister's downfall very earnestly, but he told his royal highness that this did not seem to him the proper way of effecting it—that it would only make the king's cause and Walpole's inseparable, and rivet the minister yet faster where his only strength lay. At this very moment, George the Second was sick, and even apprehended to be in danger. Bubb says that he begged the prince to consider this circumstance, and to reflect how far it might be consistent with the greatness and generosity of his character to make such an attack, when his father was in a languishing condition. He says that the prince replied "that he was sensible of that, but he could not help it: he was engaged, and would go through: the king could not live many years, but might linger thus a good while, and he could not stay that while: that the time, indeed, had its inconveniences of one sort, and he wished it otherwise, but it had its conveniences of another, it would make people more cautious and apprehensive of offending him: that, besides, he had told the queen of it in the summer, and assured her that he designed to bring it into parliament; that she had treated it as idle and chimerical, that it was impossible that he should make anything of it, and seemed to think he was only in jest; that if his friends stood by him he should carry it in the House, but, if he missed then, he could not fail of it in six months; that I should know the family as well as anybody; he always thought I did, but found that I did not, or would not: but he himself knew his own family best; and he would make a bet that, if he failed now, he gained his point in less than a twelve-month by this means; in short, he was resolved, and too far engaged in honour to go back; that it was his due, and his right, absolutely necessary to make him easy the rest of his life; he could never want his friends but on this occasion; those that would stand by him in this he should always look on as his friends, and reward as such; those that would not he should not reckon to be so, they would have nothing to expect from him." Bubb made no particular answer, but expressed his alarm as to the consequences. He waited upon the prince down stairs to his horse, and begged him to consider how necessary it was to delay the motion from the great impropriety of the time. The royal and unloving son replied, "If a little time would do, it might be considered, but the king may linger out the session." Bubb suggested that no great harm would be done if the business were left over to another session; but the prince said that it could not be, that his honour was too far engaged, that he could not and would not wait.* Dodington assures us that he neither directly promised or refused to vote for the proposal, and that he left his royal highness with very great uneasiness and perplexity upon his own mind, considerably augmented "by the great ease and tranquillity that appeared upon the prince's"—"which," he adds, with a glorious disregard of the feelings of nature, "is the natural effect of great resolutions, when they are fixed and determined." This precious courtier thought it necessary to warn his friend, Sir Paul Methuen, of this disagreeable business, and he says that he and Sir Paul "joined in lamenting the fate of this country to be divided and torn to pieces by a disunion in this royal family, which, with so many ardent wishes, and with the profusion of so much blood and treasure, we had at last so happily placed on the throne, to end all our divisions, and protect us in union and tranquillity." They agreed that Sir Paul, when sent for by the prince, should seem not to be any ways apprised of the affair, but should lay hold on any opportunity that might be given him to represent to his royal highness the probable fate and consequences of the undertaking. Bubb and Methuen then waited upon the Duke of Dorset and the other lords, who agreed to do their utmost to prevent this ill-advised attempt, and to declare plainly to the prince that they would oppose it, as fatal to his royal highness, injurious to the king, and destructive to the quiet and tranquillity of the whole country; and they desired Dodington to speak in the same way to the prince. A day or two after, Sir Paul Methuen had an interview with the Prince of Wales, to whom he represented the danger and impracticability of the measure, and "used all possible arguments that a good head and a good heart could suggest to dissuade him from it; but all without effect." Seeing that he could not move this most royal obstinacy, Methuen ventured to declare that he could not give the prince his vote in the House. This resolution, however, was soon modified by a promise that, as he could not vote for him, he would not vote against him—that he would not vote at all.* On the very next day the prince summoned Dodington to another private conference, and insinuated that Sir Paul Methuen had appeared to be well enough satisfied with the proposition. But upon Bubb's expressing his astonishment, his royal highness receded a little, and "seemed to give him leave to think that Sir Paul did not much approve of it, but, however, had promised to be absent." The prince assured him that he had talked to several other persons, and that they all entered into the plan most heartily. Bubb was silent. After some pause the prince said that Mr. Hedges his treasurer, and Lord Baltimore of his bed-chamber, were zealously for it. Bubb said that no doubt his servants would vote for it—nobody could take it ill of them—they would have leave to do it. The prince said he cared not whose leave they had, so he had their votes. His royal highness added that there was Mr. Arthur Herbert, who would vote for him and bring in all his friends. Bubb doubted whether this gentleman could get any vote but his own: the prince said he would bet Mr. Herbert would make above five. Bubb said that, if it were so, it must be by making use of his royal highness's name. The prince rejoined that everybody was for him—that he was absolutely determined to bring it in—that he would hear no advice upon it—and that if there were but seven of the Commons, and three in the Lords for him, he would do it. Dodington says that he then said that he thought it necessary to lay his humble opinion before him; and that the prince told him he did not want his opinion. "I replied," continues Bubb, "that I did not presume to offer my opinion as to what was to guide his actions, but to lay before him what was to direct and govern my own; which I should be glad to take the first opportunity of doing, this not being a proper one, because I saw one of the gentlemen coming to acquaint his royal highness that dinner was served." The prince took no notice of this, but walked further into the garden where they were talking, and showed Bubb a letter from the "humoursome, proud, and capricious," Duke of Somerset, as he has been called, who had once played a great part by accident, but who never showed any real political capacity of a high order. Somerset entertained so extravagant an opinion of his own value and importance that it was impossible any king or court should satisfy him; he was therefore discontented with the father; but he was not disposed to give himself much trouble for the son; and his letter contained one of those interminable accounts of the infirmities of his precious health which he was accustomed to write, an assurance that it was impossible for him to come up to town, a sly reference to Lord Winchelsea for his opinion about his royal highness's intention, and wishes that his royal highness might live many years in health, prosperity, and plenty. After talking about this unmeaning letter, and saying that though his grace should not come up he was quite sure he would send his proxy, the prince talked vehemently about his difficulties, and declared (as other princes of the family have done since) that, as he had sacrificed himself to the nation in marrying, the nation ought to stand by him.* As Bubb was a placeman, the prince's next argument or invective had a direct personal application. He said that if people would value their employments more than right and justice, he could not help it; though he was so strong that he was sure the court durst not touch any one that voted for him. The supple courtier made suitable protestations of his disregard of place or of any pecuniary considerations. The prince, who evidently valued these professions for just what they were worth, brought him up by saying that it was very hard that he should be all his life in want of money. "I asked him," continues Bubb, "if he did not think it very dangerous to drive things to such an extremity between him and his father, as might make it the interest of one half of the gentlemen of England that he should never come upon the throne? He replied Why would they make themselves desperate? Why would they not do what they owed him, and what was justice? It would be their own faults: did he deserve less than the Princess of Denmark? The gentlemen stood by her. I endeavoured to show him the difference of the case, in one essential point, which I thought most likely to strike him, viz.—in that case the addition was proposed when the civil list was precarious, and not granted to King William for his life; and, upon regranteeing the duties, which were then in the power of parliament, that addition was demanded in her favour. But he gave no attention to it, but walked about with great precipitation, and a good deal agitated. As I saw there was no room left to make any impression upon him, I thought it was high time to put an end to the conversation." Bubb, however, says that he thought himself obliged to declare to the prince, with exceeding great concern, that if the matter came into parliament he should think himself bound in honour and conscience to give his absolute dissent to it. The prince was very angry, but curbed himself a little—said that in the Princess of Denmark's time there were gentlemen

* It is pleasant to see how these things are put by one like Bubb Dodington:—"At the importunate and repeated request of his royal highness, and reflecting that he had not attended the House so as to give one single vote since the Excise Bill, he had been prevailed on to promise his royal highness to be absent, as he used to be."

that valued doing right more than their employments—but he was sorry the race of them was extinct—and so they went to dinner. “As soon as dinner and drinking was over,” continues Bubb, “we rose, and I shuffled myself into the midst of the company, in order to get away with the first of them, when he should please to make us his bow; but he dismissed them all, and ordered me to come with him into the little room.” The conversation which followed lasted nearly two hours, and, according to Bubb, “contained a great deal of repetition.” The prince said he should leave off talking about his own interests to talk a little about Bubb’s, whose reputation in the world would suffer extremely by his leaving him at this juncture. He reminded the courtier that he had already gone great lengths with him in his opposition to his father and ministers, and that there would be no safety for him if he did not go on to finish the work and overthrow Walpole. Bubb says that he spoke about his conscience and his honour, which would both oblige him to dissent. His highness then asked whether he had never given a vote against his conscience or opinion—to which Bubb replied that he had certainly given many, and believed it to be the case with every body who acted with a party, either for or against an administration—but that he had never acted contrary to his opinion where he thought the whole immediately concerned, and never would. The prince, he says, then tried to overpower him with an array of names of men high in influence, who had promised their support; and asked him to go and consult Lord Carteret and Mr. Pulteney. Bubb shuffled out of this as well as he could; and then his royal highness tried whether the lawyers would not have more weight than laymen, and assured Bubb that the Master of the Rolls had told him that what he asked was his right in equity.† But the courtier, according to his own account, was proof even against a lawyer, and represented that it could scarcely be equity to take the allotment of the estate or civil list vested in the crown out of the king’s hands. Having come to this argument he suggested that it would be better for the prince to ask an addition of 50,000*l.* a-year from the parliament on his own account, than to attempt to make parliament forcibly deduct the money from the king’s allowance; but his highness replied that he thought the nation had done enough, if not too much, for the family already—that he would rather beg his bread from door to door than be a further charge to them—and that he would have the money in his own way or not at all. The courtier hinted that the measure his royal highness proposed—that the family quarrel driven to desperation, might cost the nation more money than the 50,000*l.* per annum he wanted—that it might cost blood as well as money. Having said that he should not be surprised if the prince’s friends all absented themselves from the House, his highness replied that, if they would not do their duty cheerfully, they must be frightened into it. Bubb says that he asked him whether he thought such gentlemen were to be frightened, and, if they were, whether that were a just return for their attachment—that he most earnestly supplicated him not to overturn the constitution and the whole royal family together—that to bring the parliament into the king’s closet to examine into his most private domestic affairs, to intrude into the government of his private estate and family, was the most fatal precedent that could be made, and the most unheard-of to be attempted by a prince that was to succeed him. But all these and many other arguments were completely thrown away upon the prince, who was resolved to proceed, though now convinced that neither the Duke of Argyll nor Lord Scarborough, the Duke of Dorset nor Lord Wilmington, Sir Thomas Frankland nor Sir Conyers Darcy would vote for him—which keeping back he attributed to their having employments at court or to their being full of fears. His father, he said, was unpopular—he himself was popular—and therefore he must succeed in the end, in spite of placemen and cowards.*

On the next day, Sunday, the 13th of February, or, at latest, on Monday, the 14th, Walpole got the first hint of what was intended; but by the 16th the whole matter was public. On that evening Bubb was stopped by several gentlemen in the House of Commons, who desired his advice and opinion; and Sir Robert Walpole requested him to stay till the House rose, that he might speak with him. When the House was almost empty these two retired behind the chair; and then Bubb took credit to himself for having done his best to prevent this “great question;” saying, that for three years and more it had been the great struggle of his life to keep the prince from it. The minister begged the pliant courtier to engage his friends—by which Dodington understood him to mean five members whom he names—~~not to~~ vote for the measure; and desired him not to do the thing “by halves.” From Dodington’s reply we must conclude that by wholes Walpole meant bribes, for he subjoins—“I told him that they were independent gentlemen; that, though their fortunes were not large, yet they were sufficient, and they were resolved they always should be sufficient to keep them in independency; and that he best knew they had not been regarded or treated in a manner to give them any great present expectations.” Here the minister interrupted him, and said,—“Well, we understand one another;”—and no doubt they did thoroughly. Bubb, however, returning to solid things, said that, as he knew his friends had no present expectations, he would by no means undertake to say how far they would care to forfeit the prospect of future favours and advantages under the Prince of Wales when he should be king. Walpole replied that there had indeed been great misunderstandings between him and those gentlemen; but then so great a service as this would wipe out a multitude of sins. In other words, the minister was willing to give the multitude of places, or honours, or pounds sterling, for the service he wanted, or for the preventing of the parliamentary onslaught of the prince. Bubb, like most men in similar situations, protested that he wanted nothing, expected nothing, for himself—and said that he would lay the matter fairly before his friends, and plainly tell them that he intended to vote against the prince. "I did so the same night," he continues, "and they, from their own judgments, entirely unbiassed, or attempted to be so by me, all determined to vote for the king." On the next Sunday Bubb attended a meeting of parliament men at the minister's, and, when the company was gone, he told Sir Robert of his success with his friends. The premier thanked him, and was going on to mention future expectations. But it is impossible to do justice to this delicate quibbler, who was perhaps even quibbling with his own conscience, in other words than his own. "I prevented his offers," continues Bubb, "by saying that, if I had been so unfortunate as to take another part in this unlucky affair than that which the real sense of my duty and zeal for the whole royal family had determined me to take, I believed he must be very sensible that the connexion between those gentlemen and me was such, that we should not have differed in opinion. He said there could be no manner of doubt of it. I added that I then left him to consider whether, beside that real sense of my duty, I had had, from the day this king came upon the throne up to that hour, any one inducement to do what I had resolved to do. He answered, 'To be sure not; the misunderstandings between him and me were very public, but now—and was going on, but I thought it not proper to enter into explanations, and interrupted him by saying, I did not mention this in any the least way of complaint, but thought I owed myself so much justice as to put him in mind of it: that, as I acted from a principle of honour and conscience only, I was very regardless of the consequences that might happen to me from it, though I was not so blind as not to see that I stood exposed to future resentments by it, at least as much as any gentleman in England: with which I took my leave.'" Was ever disinterested patriotism heightened and put forward for a bribe in a finer style than this? But after all, Bubb had only secured the votes of a few second or third-rate men—he had not won over Sir William Wyndham, nor had he made any impression on Pulteney or Sir John Barnard—the measure was not stopped, and the prince ran his course notwithstanding a message sent to him by the king at Walpole's persuasion, promising to settle a large jointure upon the princess, and to render his own income independent of his father's control. At the moment when this offer was made by the mouth of the lord chancellor (Hardwicke) and other great officers of state,* the king was worse than he had been, and indeed so bad that his recovery was despaired of. Yet, on the very next day, the 22nd of February, Pulteney brought forward the motion in the House of Commons, in the form of an address, beseeching the king to settle upon the prince 100,000*l.* a-year, and the same jointure on the princess as the queen had enjoyed when she was Princess of Wales, and assuring his majesty that that House would provide him with the necessary means. Pulteney supported his motion by a long historical speech full of references to heirs apparent and heirs presumptive, Princes of Wales, and Princesses of Wales; queens and queen dowagers, and consorts of queens; and he endeavoured to prove that, by equity, good policy, law, and precedent, the prince had a right to what was demanded, and an indefeasible claim to a permanent and independent establishment, which the king had it not in his power either to withhold or control. Sir John Barnard, the man of finance and economy, seconded Pulteney; and Walpole replied to both. He began with a courtly fiction, saying that, from his personal knowledge of the two great characters concerned, he was convinced that neither of them would think himself injured by any gentleman's giving his opinion or voting freely in parliament upon the question at issue; and that he was convinced the Prince of Wales had so much wisdom, and such a true sense of filial duty, that he could never consider as a favour bestowed on himself anything that had the least tendency towards offering an indignity to his father. The minister then declared that it was the prerogative of the crown, and the right of the king, to dispose of his civil revenues without the interference of parliament, and to manage his family in his own way. He communicated to the House the conciliatory message which had been sent by the king to the prince, with his royal highness's answer, and gently hinted that he thought 50,000*l.* a-year, added to the revenues enjoyed by the prince of the duchy of Cornwall, and which amounted to about 10,000*l.* a-year more, was income enough even for the heir

* The whole transaction reminds us of another recorded of Walpole. "He wanted to carry a question in the House of Commons, to which he knew there would be great opposition, and which was disliked by some of his own dependents. As he was passing through the Court of Requests, he met a member of the contrary party, whose avarice he imagined would not reject a large bribe. He took him aside, and said, 'Such a question comes on this day; give me your vote, and here is a bank bill of 8000*l.*' which he put into his hands. The member made him this answer, 'Sir Robert, you have lately served some of my particular friends; and when my wife was laid at court, the king was very gracious to her, which must have happened at your instance. I should therefore think myself very ungrateful (putting the bank bill into his pocket) if I were to refuse the favour you are now pleased to ask me.'" —Dr. King, Political and Literary Anecdotes of his own Times.

* Hardwicke had obtained the seals on the 21st of February through the death of Lord Talbot, and it appears to have been by Hardwicke's advice that the message was sent to the prince. The new chancellor, however, did not wish to go in person with the message, but George prevented all discussion by exclaiming, "My lord chancellor shall go." The prince, in his verbal reply to his father's written message, said, that the affair was now out of his hands, and therefore he could give no answer to it. And after a parade of dutiful expressions and humility to his majesty, he added — "Indeed, my lords, it is in other hands, I am sorry for it." The affair, of course, was in the hands of the opposition.

apparent, and quite as much as his father could afford out of the civil list. He represented the dangerous impropriety of interposing between father and son, and making a lasting breach between them; he met Pulteney's historical references with other references of the same kind; he denied that any precedent for such parliamentary interposition could be found except in the reign of the weak and imbecile Henry VI.; he declared that the prince had no claim either in equity or good policy, and still less in law, or precedent; and he affirmed that the civil list had been granted unconditionally to the king, without stipulations, without restrictions, without a hint of 100,000*l.* per annum for the prince. Pulteney said in reply, that in reality the prince had only 52,000*l.* a-year; that the whole expense of his household amounted to 63,000*l., "without allowing his royal highness one shilling for the indulgence of that generous and charitable disposition with which he was known to be endued in a very eminent degree;"—that the prince was being reduced to real want, even with respect to his absolute necessities, "and consequently to an unavoidable dependence, and a vile pecuniary dependence too, upon his father's ministers and servants." Between twelve and one o'clock in the morning the House divided, when the numbers for the king were 234, for the prince 204. According to Bubb Doddington, forty-five Tories were absent, but thirty-five members of the class who had never voted against government before voted for the prince. If the Tory opponents of Walpole had all remained and voted, he and the king would have been left in a minority; but the hottest of the Tories as Jacobites were disposed neither to give any vote in favour of the heir of the House of Hanover nor against the prerogative and authority of the crown. The prince, or the party acting with him and driving him on, was determined to "go through." On Friday, the 25th, precisely the same motion was made in the House of Lords by Carteret, who, since his return from his Irish government, seems to have been more inimical to Walpole than ever. Lord Carteret was seconded by Lord Gower, and the debate lasted till half-past eight at night, when the motion was rejected by a majority of 103 to 40. The prince set no bounds to his rage, and studied how he might best insult his father. His wife had been for some time enceinte, but he did not deign to announce this fact either to the king or to the queen until the beginning of July, when her time approached. All the royal family were then at Hampton Court, where the usual stately preparations were made for the birth. But, upon the 31st of July, when the princess was seized with the pains of labour, the prince, at the hazard of her life and the life of her offspring, hurried her off in the middle of the night to London, to the unaired palace and beds of St. James's, without giving the slightest intimation to the king and queen, or to any of the great officers of state who were required to be present to certify the birth of an infant that might inherit the crown. George, angry and alarmed, sent off Sir Robert Walpole and Lord Harrington to attend the birth; but though they used speed they did not arrive till after the accouchement. The princess was safely delivered of a daughter in St. James's, but had run a near risk of being delivered at a road-side inn. According to Horace Walpole, Queen Caroline hastened up to town, and was with the princess by an early hour on the following morning. "The gracious prince, so far from attempting an apology, spoke not a word to his mother; but, on her retreat gave her his hand, led her into the street to her coach—still dumb; but, a crowd being assembled at the gate, he kneeled down in the dirt, and humbly kissed her majesty's hand! Her indignation must have shrunk into contempt." The edifying quarrel, the exemplary hatred, between father and son was now pushed to extremities, even as it had been in the preceding reign when George II., as prince, had exercised that filial undutifulness of which he was now the victim. Frederick, however, for the sake of public opinion, proffered submissions and apologies to his parents, and, to account for his strange conduct in removing his wife, told stories which no one believed; and the father was at the very least as harsh and obstinate as the son was rash and undutiful. Walpole, at the same time, apprehending that his removal from office might be made the condition of a reconciliation, opposed all the prince's overtures, and endeavoured, it is said, to keep alive the unnatural enmity. Yet, for ourselves, we are disposed to believe that there was small necessity for any such exertion on the part of the minister; and that the feelings of the king might be safely left to their own deep resentment and unforgiveness. Lord Hardwicke, the new chancellor, exerted himself to the utmost to effect a reconciliation, and failed; and even so, we apprehend, would Walpole have failed if he had made the attempt. Possibly, too, such an attempt might have shaken the king's confidence in his premier, as much as any reconciliation could have done. When Frederick intimated his design of visiting the king, the queen strongly advised him to delay his visit for a few days. In the mean while the king dictated the draft of a message to Sir Robert, who submitted it to the consideration of the Lords Hardwicke, Wilmington, and Harrington. Hardwicke suggested gentler terms; Wilmington, who seldom spoke

* Forty-five was near about the number of determined Jacobites in the House of Commons at that moment. But, with all his enemies arrayed against him, Walpole could never have dropped to the small majority of thirty if it had not been for the pretty general belief that George II. was dying, and that his son would in the course of a very few months or weeks, or perhaps days, be king. Hence arose the votes of the thirty members who had never voted against Walpole before. The courtly instinct of others both in parliament and out of parliament went, no doubt, in the same way.

 Reminiscences. Horace repeats the same story in his Memoirs; and in many letters of the time, written by less caustic pens, the circumstances are alluded to. Horace says—"A baby that wounds itself to vex its nurse is not more void of reflection. The scene which commenced by an foolish idiotism closed with paltry hypocrisy." Yet such was Frederick Prince of Wales, and, such as he was, he was made, for selfish ends no doubt, the idol of a party.

decidedly on any subject, maintained with warmth that the message ought to go as it was written, and Harrington was silent. On the 3rd of August the message was therefore sent as it was by the hands of Lord Essex. It ran in these words:—"The king has commanded me to acquaint your royal highness that his majesty most heartily rejoices at the safe delivery of the princess, but that your carrying away her royal highness from Hampton Court, the then residence of the king, the queen, and the family, under the pains, and certain indications of immediate labour, to the imminent danger and hazard both of the princess and her child, after sufficient warnings for a week before, to have made the necessary preparations for this happy event, without acquainting his majesty or the queen with the circumstances the princess was in, or giving them the least notice of your departure, is looked upon by the king to be such a deliberate indignity offered to himself and to the queen, that he has commanded me to acquaint your royal highness that he resents it to the highest degree." As a birth had begun, so a baptism completed, the family rupture. George took no heed of a letter which Frederick wrote to excuse himself, and refused to admit him to his presence. On the morrow a royal message, conveyed by the Earl of Dunmore, appointed the baptism of the infant princess to be performed on the 29th of August, intimating that his majesty would send the lord chancellor to stand godfather as his proxy, that the queen would send a lady of the bedchamber as her proxy, and that the princess might appoint one of the ladies of her own bedchamber to be proxy for the Dowager-Duchess of Saxe Gotha, the other godmother. The prince, who, as Bölingbroke observed—for Bölingbroke, though at Chantolup, had his eye on all these transactions at St. James's—asked pardon in the terms of one who owned himself in the wrong, and wrote again to his father; but his submissions, his entreaties, were of no avail; and the king adopted the violent resolution of dismissing him and his family from the palace. There was a conference upon this knotty point; and Chancellor Hardwicke again vainly attempted to make up matters, or, at least, prevent the slander likely to arise from so public and so extreme a measure. Walpole, according to Hardwicke, said it would be better "to be short at first;" and on the 9th of September a very short message was submitted to the consideration of all the lords of the cabinet-council then in London. These lords agreed that, as the king was undoubtedly master in his own family, and as he had been highly offended, lie was himself to judge whether he would forgive or resent. As his majesty, instead of dying, had grown better under these altercations, there was evidently less fear than formerly of the wrath and revenge of the Prince of Wales. After a few verbal altercations, suggested by different members of the council, the following message was agreed to and sent by the hands of the Duke of Grafton, the Duke of Richmond, and the Earl of Pembroke:—"The professions you have lately made in your letters of your particular regard to me are so contradictory to all your actions, that I cannot suffer myself to be imposed upon by them. You know very well you did not give the least intimation to me, or to the queen, that the princess was with child, or breeding, until within less than a month of the birth of the young princess: you removed the princess twice in the week immediately preceding the day of her delivery from the place of my residence, in expectation, as you have voluntarily declared, of her labour; and both times upon your return you industriously concealed from the knowledge of me and the queen every circumstance relating to this important affair: and you, at last, without giving any notice to me or to the queen, precipitately hurried the princess from Hampton Court, in a condition not to be named. After having thus, in execution of your own determined measures, exposed both the princess and her child to the greatest perils, you now plead surprise and tenderness for the princess, as the only motives that occasioned these repeated indignities offered to me and to the queen your mother. This extravagant and undutiful behaviour, in so essential a point as the birth of an heir to my crown, is such an evidence of your premeditated defiance of me, and such a contempt of my authority, and of the natural right belonging to your parents, as cannot be excused by the pretended innocence of your intentions, nor palliated or disguised by specious words only. But the whole tenor of your conduct for a considerable time has been so entirely void of all real duty to me, that I have long had reason to be highly offended with you. And until you withdraw your regard and confidence from those by whose advice you are directed and encouraged in your unwarrantable behaviour to me and to the queen, and until your return to your duty, you shall not reside in my palace, which I will not suffer to be made the resort of them who under the appearance of an attachment to you, foment the division which you have made in my family, and thereby weaken the common interest of the whole. In this situation I will receive no reply; but, when your actions manifest a just sense of your duty and submission, that may induce me to pardon what at present I most justly resent. In the mean time, it is my pleasure that you leave St. James's, with all your family, when it can be done without prejudice or inconvenience to the princess. I shall for the present leave to the princess the care of my grand-daughter, until a proper time calls upon me to consider of her education." After this peremptory message the prince retired with his family to Norfolk House, St. James's Square, which became the centre and head of opposition. Irritated anew by the numbers that flocked constantly to Norfolk House, the king issued an order that none of the persons who visited there should be admitted to his presence in any of the royal palaces. Moreover, as every court in Europe was excited by these family squabbles, George ordered an official circular to be sent to all the foreign ambassadors at London with his account of the affair; and this paper was afterwards published, together with the correspondence which had taken place between the king and the prince. Lord Hardwicke has hinted that there was more in this quarrel than met the public eye. "Sir Robert Walpole," says his lordship, "informed me of certain passages between the king and himself and between the queen and the prince, of too high and secret a nature even to be trusted to this narrative; but from thence I found great reason to think that this unhappy difference between the king and queen and his royal highness turned upon some points of a more interesting and important nature than have hitherto appeared."^{*}

A few weeks after the departure of the prince from St. James's, Queen Caroline, who appears indisputably to have been the best person of the family, departed this life. From an excess of delicacy her majesty had carefully concealed, even from her personal attendants and physicians, a bad rupture under which she had suffered for many years. "The queen's great secret," says Horace Walpole, "was her own rupture, which till her last illness nobody knew but the king, her German nurse, Mrs. Mailborne, and one other person (her confidante, lady Sundon,† who had exercised an extraordinary degree of influence over the queen, and who was accused of swaying her majesty's countenance towards the heterodox or less believing part of the clergy). To prevent all suspicion, her majesty would frequently stand some minutes in her shift talking to her ladies; and, though labouring with so dangerous a complaint, she made it so invariably a rule never to refuse a desire of the king, that every morning at Richmond she walked several miles with him; and more than once, when she had the gout in her foot, she dipped her whole leg in cold water to be ready to attend him. The pain, her bulk, and the exercise, threw her into such fits of perspiration as vented the gout; but those exertions hastened the crisis of her distemper." Ignorant to the last of her real malady, the physicians treated her majesty as if she had gout in the stomach, and thereby hastened her death. When the secret was disclosed it was too late, though one of the surgeons is said to have declared that if he had known it only two days sooner he could have set her upon her legs within four-and-twenty hours; but such professional declarations, not very rare even now, were common then. The high-minded, strongly-nerved woman bore her agonies with wonderful fortitude. Her friendship to Walpole, or her conviction that he was the most likely minister to carry her husband honourably through the increasing difficulties of government, remained unshaken to the last. It is said that the day before her death, as the king and the premier were standing by her bedside, she pathetically recommended, not the minister to the sovereign, but the master to the servant, saying to Walpole, "I hope you will never desert the king, but continue to serve him with your usual fidelity; I recommend his majesty to you." But it appears that, even in dying, her orthodoxy to the church of England was questioned,* and it has been asserted that she could not make up her mind to the natural and truly Christian duty of forgiving† the Prince of Wales, who had not merely wronged her by recent insult, but who, ever since his arrival in England, had treated her with marked aversion, arising, probably, in good part, from her great political influence and his own nothingness in the cabinet, and from the king's constantly leaving her regent during his absences on the continent, without deputing the least share of authority to her son. The story of the queen's implacable resentment even on her dying bed is, however, open to some doubt. Horace Walpole, who certainly had the fullest means of information, though not in all cases the most perfect veracity—as he would twist a tale to make it tell the better, and turn circumstances so as to favour the character of his own father or his father's great patroness—affirmed positively that Caroline sent both her forgiveness and her blessing to her unaffectionate son, and said she would have seen him with pleasure had she not feared to embarrass and irritate the king her husband.‡ The generally amiable character of Caroline facilitates our belief; and, if Horace Walpole was prejudiced on one side, the authorities which state her unforgiveness were at least as much prejudiced on the other. Pope was Caroline's enemy and a friend of Swift, and, as a poet, quite as much given to turning truth to make a point as was the anecdote-telling Horace Walpole; Lord Chesterfield was her enemy upon many

* Horace Walpole, who was not very orthodox himself, says that the queen declined taking the sacrament, which was offered to her by Archbishop Potter, very few persons being in the room at the time. He adds—"When the prelate retired, the courtiers in the anteroom crowded round him, crying, 'My lord, has the queen received?' His grace artfully eluded the question, only saying, most devoutly, 'Her majesty was in a heavenly disposition; and the truth escaped the public.'"

† Lord Chesterfield, who occasionally rhymed, though he had no genius for poetry, circulated a copy of verses, in which was the line,—

"And, unforgiving, unforgiven, dies."

Pope, who took another occasion of saying, in the coarsest manner, that Caroline had no bowels, put the following sarcasm in the Epilogue to his Satires:—

"And, hail her passage to the realms of rest,
All parts perform'd, and all her children bless'd."

‡ Coxe, Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole. The archdeacon says that he had some circumstances from Lord Orford, i. e. Horace Walpole, in his old age. In his Reminiscences Horace says, in his most caustic manner—"She suffered more unjustly by declining to see her son, the Prince of Wales, to whom she sent her blessing and forgiveness; but, conceiving the extreme distress it would lay on the king, should he thus be forced to forgive so impudent a son, or to banish him again if once recalled, she heroically preferred a meritorious husband to a worthless child."

* Lord Hardwicke's Narrative.

† "It was great shrewdness in Sir Robert Walpole," says that minister's son, "who, before her distemper broke out, discovered her secret. On my mother's death, who was of the queen's age, her majesty asked Sir Robert many physical questions; but he remarked that she oftener reverted to a rupture, which had not been the illness of his wife. When he came home he said to me, 'Now, Horace, I know by possession of what secret Lady Sundon has preserved such an ascendant over the queen.' He was in the right."—Reminiscences.

grounds; * and Mr. Charles Ford, who gives the most distinct account on this side, could not have been her friend, as he was the correspondent and friend of the black-billed dean of St. Patrick's. In fact, this particular account is given by Ford, in a letter to Swift. Ford says—"She absolutely refused to see the Prince of Wales, nor could the Archbishop of Canterbury, when he gave her the sacrament, † prevail on her, though she said she heartily forgave the prince." But was Ford at all likely to deck out Caroline as a saint to the malicious revengeful man who had been cursing her for years for not making him a bishop, for adhering to Walpole, and frustrating all the schemes and intrigues of his close allies, Atterbury, Bolingbroke, and the rest? But, again, Ford's prose account disagrees with the poetical points of Pope and Chesterfield—for it admits that the dying queen heartily forgave her son. Although written in a different spirit, indeed, it is, in what relates to the prince, substantially the same with that given by Walpole.

Whatever was her conduct on her death-bed, Queen Caroline died on the 20th of November, and her loss was deeply felt both by the king and the nation, and probably by Walpole more than all. That minister knew that she had been the better genius that guided the king—that she had been the only person in the world that could properly understand and manage her husband—that her good sense had carried him through all his official difficulties, and that without her he could have no sure reliance on George. He vented some of his feelings in a letter to his brother, relating the queen's death. "I must have done," said he; "our grief and distraction want no relation; I am oppressed with sorrow and dread." The king, however, repeatedly assured him of his intention still to follow his advice in all things, and reminded him how the queen on her death-bed had recommended her husband to the minister, which his majesty emphatically said was a just and wise recommendation. These royal sentiments lasted as long as grief for the deceased, which was at first passionate; for, as we have already observed, though George kept mistresses, he never loved any woman as he did his wife. Some time after the queen's death, he called Baron Brinkman, one of his German attendants, to his bedside, and said, "I hear you have a picture of my wife—a better likeness than any in my possession—bring it to me." When the picture was brought, the king was deeply affected, and after a short pause he said, "It is very like; put it upon the chair at the foot of my bed, and leave it till I ring the bell." The bell was not rung till two hours had elapsed, and when the Baron entered the bed-chamber, George said, "Take the picture away; I never yet saw the woman worthy to buckle her shoe."*

And yet George had at Hanover—and had had for some time—a successor to Lady Suffolk, in the person of the Countess of Walmoden; and not very long after the queen's death he brought her over to England, and on the 24th of March, 1740, created her Baroness and Countess of Yarmouth. † Fortunately, the Walmoden was almost as inoffensive as her predecessor Lady Suffolk, albeit somewhat fonder of money. She looked to the main chance, and tried to enrich her family and friends, leaving politics to take their own course, and shunning any dangerous connexion either with rabid Tories or discontented Whigs. A more dangerous woman was the princess royal, Anne, whom George had married to the Prince of Orange. Anne, who is described as being of a most imperious and ambitious nature, came over from Holland soon after the queen's death, in the hope of succeeding to her mother's influence: but the king, aware of her plan, was so offended that he sent her to Bath as soon as she arrived, and then, in as peremptory a manner, back to Holland. The Princess Amelia and the Princess Caroline remained in England, unmarried, but they took little or no part in cabinet intrigues, and their brother, the Duke of Cumberland, whose passion it would have been to command the army, rarely interfered in politics.

A. D. 1738. *The opposition, or all that part of it linked at Norfolk House, took alarm at a curious attempt to reconcile the Prince of Wales to the king. At a masquerade, Madame Hoppe, wife of the Dutch minister in London, went up to the prince, and asking him if he were afraid to talk to a lady, presented to him Madame Walmoden, "who proposed some things to him, and talked of being reconciled to his father, and they agreed to

* According to Horace Walpole, Chesterfield had been put in the Queen's Index Expurgatorius some years before, on account of a suspicion that his lordship was intriguing (politically) with Mrs. Howard, afterwards Lady Suffolk. "The queen," says Horace, "had an obscure window, at St. James's, that looked into a dark passage, lighted only by a single lamp at night, which looked upon Mrs. Howard's apartment. Lord Chesterfield, one Twelfth-night, at court, had won so large a sum of money that he thought it imprudent to carry it home in the dark, and deposited it with the mistress. Thence the queen inferred great intimacy; and thenceforward Lord Chesterfield could obtain no favour from court; and, finding himself desperate, went into opposition. My father himself long afterwards told me the story, and had become the principal object of the poet's satiric wit, though he had not been the mover of his disgrace. The weight of that anger fell more disagreeably on the king." The noble lord's revenge on George II. was instituting proceedings at law about the suppressed will of George I.—(See ante.) Chesterfield, moreover, had made a close league with the old Duchess of Marlborough, who lost no occasion of venting her spite against the present government. Her grace hated St. James's, but she could never long agree with Norfolk House. For some time Chesterfield was her go-between in the House of Lords. The opposition, on the whole, seem to have been rather troubled than served by the self-willed imperious old woman—and, now and then, she obliged some of them with loans of money out of her enormous wealth.—Marchmont Papers.

† Horace Walpole, as we have seen, says that the queen did not take the sacrament at all. He was more likely to know the fact than was Ford.

* This anecdote was communicated at the end of the last century to Archdeacon Coxe by Theodore Henry Broadhead, Esquire, grandson of Baron Brinkman, who possessed the portrait alluded to.

† "After the death of the queen," says Horace Walpole, "Lady Yarmouth came over, who had been the king's mistress at Hanover during his later journeys—and with the queen's privacy, for he always made her the confidante of his amours. . . . In his letters to the queen from Hanover, he said, 'You must love the Walmoden, for she loves me.' She was created a countess, and had much weight with him, but never employed her credit but to assist his ministers, or to convert some honours and favours to her own advantage. She had two sons, who both bore her husband's name; but the younger, though never acknowledged, was supposed the king's, and consequently did not miss additional homage from the courtiers."—Reminiscences.

meet at another masquerade, better disguised." * But the secret got wind, and the Earl of Marchmont warned the prince that a reconciliation, or the talk of a reconciliation, would spoil everything; "that the talk of his going to court on his birthday had done harm, the bad consequences of which must inevitably follow, for he would be at mercy, and lose the interest he had gained, which was a great security, to the Hanoverian establishment, to himself, and to the whole family." † The Scottish Whig lord farther assured the prince that since the quarrel he had been gaining ground in the hearts of the people; that he was surrounded now by those most loved and respected by the people, by men of unblemished characters, that is to say the Pulteneys, the Carterets, the Chesterfields, and the Marchmonts. In reply, the prince assured Lord Marchmont that he would never make any dishonourable terms, and would never speak to Sir Robert Walpole. He said, that, if ordered to go to court, he must go; but he wished that might not happen. In this manner did a faction labour to prolong the unnatural discord. The assurances of the prince were satisfactory, but the opposition was split into sections, each jealous of the other; and, a day or two after this interview, the Earl of Marchmont and his more particular allies were alarmed at a project revealed to them by Lord Cobham, as having been formed by Lord Carteret and Pulteney, "to get the Prince of Wales into their hands, by which they might have made a property of him." It appears, however, that as soon as the Earl of Chesterfield and Lord Cobham got a glimpse of this scheme they went to the prince and prevented it. ‡ At the same time all kinds of stories were circulated, and probably for the most part invented, to exasperate the prince still more against the prime minister, and to render Walpole odious and ridiculous to the people. It was said, for example, that, when a deputation was appointed to compliment the prince on the birth of his child, Sir Robert called across the House to Alderman Heathcote, member for Southwark, who was one of those named to go up with the address—"Take a bank bill of 20,000*l.* with you; he needs it; he will touch!" It was also said that Walpole called the Prince of Wales one of the pretenders to the king's crown, saying that there were two of them, one at Rome, the other at Norfolk House! "You may guess," says the Earl of Marchmont, "how this is taken. . . . What does not such a fellow deserve? What do you think of all this flagitious madness from one in his situation? The Duchess of Marlborough showed me a drawing which points out his deserved exit. You know where it came from." § This able and busy Scot professed to love the prince well "for many valuable qualities," especially for his goodness of heart, which did not "dispose him to be over fond of money or of power:" but it is quite evident that he could never depend upon the prince's promises and solemn assurances, and that he considered his royal highness as little better than a well-oiled weathercock, affected by the slightest breath of air, and always denoting the last wind that blew.

The session of parliament, which began in January, was very stormy, and seemed to prove to most men that Walpole would not be able long to maintain the pacific system on which he prided himself. The "patriots," as they persisted in calling themselves, resolved to inflame the public mind against Spain, and that country unfortunately pursued a jealous and unamiable course, which afforded a broad background for high colouring and exaggeration. Yet, while they clamoured for a foreign war, these "patriots" cried out quite as lustily against any increase of the forces as if war were to be made by means of loud speeches in St. Stephen's Chapel. Walpole proposed 17,000 men for the army—no great number, considering that if we went to war at all we were likely to have France as well as Spain against us; but they insisted that 12,000 men would be enough. The minister, irritated at the declamations of the disguised Jacobites, laid them bare and scourged them with unusual severity. "No man of common prudence," cried he, "will now profess himself openly a Jacobite; as by so doing he not only may injure his private fortune, but must render himself less able to do any effectual service to his cause. . . . Your right Jacobite now disguises his true sentiments; he roars out for revolutionary principles; he pretends to be a great friend to liberty, and a great admirer of our ancient constitution; and under this pretence there are numbers who every day endeavour to sow discontent among the people. These men know that discontent and disaffection are, like wit and madness, separated by thin partitions, and therefore they hope that, if they can once render the people thoroughly discontented, it will be easy for them to render them disaffected." The patriots paid so much homage to truth as to remain silent, and the increase of the army was carried without a division. Atterbury had called Walpole in rhyme, "The cur-dog of Britain and spaniel of Spain;" and the Jacobites and discontented Whigs now went on to prove the latter part of the proposition, by showing that he had not protected smuggling, had not put down the Spanish Guarda Costas in the West Indies, and had not proclaimed a war to force the Spanish court to change its commercial code and admit the principle of free trade for her colonies in South America and everywhere else. By the law of nations, which sanctioned to every independent power the right of regulating her trade and colonies in her own way, however jealous, exclusive, or irrational—by treaties, old and new, which sanctified this principle, and expressly bound England to submit to the Spanish regulations in the New World—Walpole had been deterred from pursuing the course which he was now censured for not following. By the treaty of 1670 Spain recognised the British colonies in North America ; but England agreed that none of her ships should approach the Spanish colonies in South America, unless by stress of weather, or with a special licence for trade from the Spanish government. By the latter clause the right of search was virtually acknowledged, and Spain had always kept up her guard-ships on the coast of the Spanish main ; though sometimes through negligence, sometimes through bribery, and not seldom on account of the imposing attitude of the English ships that navigated those seas, and the dare-devil spirit of those that manœuvred them, they had been remiss in exercising the right of search. Occasionally, indeed, they had been vigilant and severe enough ; but then, on other occasions, English adventurers, like Dampier, little better than the buccaneers who had preceded them, plundered the Spanish towns on the coast, and captured or defied every Spanish ship they met either in the Atlantic or in the Pacific. If, on the one side, the Spaniards sometimes exceeded the letter of the treaty, these men never regarded any treaty whatsoever. The treaty of Seville, signed in 1729, did not profess to do much more than put our trade in the West Indies and South America upon its old footing,—that is, it allowed us to sell slaves, and to send one ship annually to the Spanish dominions in America. The restriction was abominable ; and, perhaps, when England was at war she ought not to have concluded a peace until it was removed ; but she had concluded a peace, and she had solemnly recognised and submitted to the restriction. But the market was too tempting to allow of her subjects submitting to it, and English merchants exercised their ingenuity in devising means to elude it. Sometimes a bribe did that business, and made the Spanish governor stone blind to the presence of English ships on the coast. Another method was to send a number of smaller vessels in the wake of the annual ship allowed by the Spanish court ; and, while this ship went into port in a regular manner, the others, beating about in the offing, or lying snug in some creek at a short distance, supplied the large ship with fresh goods over her larboard side, as fast as she unloaded her original cargo over the starboard. In other cases, English ships, jauntily rigged so as to escape observation at a distance, hove to, many a league at sea, till the South American smugglers, with their fine, large, and fast boats, put off to them, and gradually landed the merchandise they brought. As the people wanted the commodities, as many of them were absolutely indispensable, and as they could not get them so good and so cheap in any other way, it became impossible, along a coast where distances are counted by hundreds of leagues together, to prevent this contraband trade ; and from either shore to the ridges of the Andes, from the Gulfs of Mexico and Panama to Cape Horn, English goods were found wherever a few civilised men were settled. That part of the revenue of government which was to be received from duties fell, of course, to a very insignificant sum, and the annual fair of Panama, where the goods licensed by Spain or imported directly by the government were sold, instead of being the mart of South America as it once had been, dwindled away almost to nothing. To make up for the losses she thus sustained, Spain ought to have altered her system ; but she was not wise enough for this, and she endeavoured to enforce it by employing more vigour and vigilance. On our side a terrible storm was raised whenever an English ship was captured or detained, or even subjected to the search ; the merchants constantly affirming either that the goods were not contraband or that the vessel had been driven upon the coast by stress of weather. There never yet was found a set of sailors of one nation that could exercise the right of search without insolence and violence, or a set of sailors of another nation that could submit to the search with moderation and temper. It appears, however, that, in consequence of the new and rigid instructions sent out from Madrid, some of the commanders of the guarda-costas became not only vigilant but excessively insolent, harsh, and cruel. The English sailors, too, had terrible traditions about the cruelties practised in former times, and hereditarily, and, as it were, constitutionally, they detested the right of the Spanish flag, and hated the Dons at sea more than they did rocks or storm, the devil or the Pretender. It was easy for the opposition to gather many an exasperating tale of oppression and barbarity, practised beyond the Western main. The one they chose is well known, but perhaps it was not the best. Burke has since called it "The Fable of Jenkyns's Ears." This Jenkyns had been skipper or master of a small vessel which ran from Jamaica, and he had been boarded and searched by a guarda-costa. Like every English skipper in the like circumstances he declared that he had no contraband goods on board, no intention to break through the jealous and harsh regulations of the Spanish government ; but, he added with more than usual emphasis, that he had been most barbarously treated by the officers and crew of the guardship. He said that they had tortured him and some of his crew, had cut off one of his ears, and even told him to go and carry it to his king, and inform his majesty that they would be glad to treat him in the same manner. The circumstances thus related had occurred long before—the story was seven years old—but now, when the table of the Commons was loaded with petitions, and the city of London ringing with complaints against the barbarity of the Spaniards and the mean-spiritedness of ministers, the opposition laid hold of it, and determined to bring Jenkyns before them, in order to give increased weight and effect to his narrative. On the 16th of March it was ordered "that Captain Robert Jenkyns do attend this House immediately." On the same day they went into committee on the Spanish grievances, and heard counsel and examined several witnesses. The skipper had evidently been trained ; and an answer which he gave had the turn and cadence of parliamentary oratory. Being asked by a member what he, a free-born Briton, felt when subjected to such treatment at the hands of the Spaniards, Jenkyns exclaimed—"I recommended my soul to God, and my cause to my country." Rarely in England has an oratorical point produced such effect: it stirred the parliament and the country up into fury, and Pulteney declared that we had no longer need of allies or confederacies to enable us to command justice upon Spain—that Jenkyns's story alone would raise volunteers everywhere. It has been said since that Jenkyns had both his ears on at the very moment he was describing how one of them had been cut or torn from his head; and that, in the excitement produced by his narrative, people never thought of examining the rough head of the skipper—who might have worn a wig. But it appears, upon better authority, that he really had lost an ear, and that he carried a bit of one in his pocket wrapped up in cotton—but a cotemporary intimates that he had not been mutilated by the Spaniards, but at home, in the fashion of Prynne and Bastwick, i. e. that he had lost his ear in the pillory.* When the committee made its report to the House the general indignation was heightened; and Murray, afterwards Earl of Mansfield, made it rise still higher, for he was heard as counsel for the petitioners, and he supported the petition, justified the complaints, and called for vengeance upon the Spaniards, with remarkable eloquence. Pulteney then rose and delivered one of his best speeches: he drew a frightful picture of Spanish cruelty and injustice, assuming the facts to have been fully proved by the witnesses the committee had examined; he stated that the British nation had the right of free navigation to every part of the American seas, provided the ships did not touch at any Spanish ports—the right of carrying all sorts of goods from one part of the British dominions to the other—the right to cut logwood in the bay of Campeachy—the right to gather salt on the island of Tortuga (which two last rights the Spaniards had always resolutely opposed, nor had the English ever enjoyed them except as exercised by buccaneers and smugglers that went to Campeachy Bay and Tortuga with arms in their hands, and cut logwood and carried away salt, because they were, pro tempore, stronger than the Spaniards); and Pulteney concluded his long speech by proposing a series of resolutions asserting these rights. Walpole did not attempt to deny that the Spaniards had given great offence; but he expressed a hope that they would yet make satisfaction. Pulteney's resolution, he said, would make matters worse—would cramp the pacific negotiations still carrying on with the court of Madrid; and he reminded the Commons that, with respect to several of the rights claimed, they had never been explicitly acknowledged by Spain except in general terms. If a treaty could do the business without the horrors of war, he was for continuing the negotiation, though it might, as usual, be somewhat tedious; but he added that, if he saw their object was not to be obtained otherwise, he was ready to demand and obtain it by force. "But still," said he, "I think, if proper satisfaction and full reparation can be obtained by peaceable means, we ought not to involve the nation in a war, from the event of which we have a great deal to fear; and the utmost we can hope for from the most uninterrupted success is a proper satisfaction for past injuries, and a proper security against our meeting with any such hereafter." In the course of prolonged debates he replied to the charge which had long been made against him, that his love of peace proceeded merely from his love of place, and that he avoided war, and was ready to tolerate any injury or affront offered to the nation, solely because he knew that a change in our foreign policy would lead to a change of ministers. "I have always," said he, "disregarded a popularity that was not acquired by a hearty zeal for the public interest, and I have been long enough in this House to see that the most steady opposers of popularity founded upon any other views have lived to receive the thanks of their country for that opposition." His experience he said proved to him that a cabinet was as likely to last in war-time as in a time of peace. "Nay," he added, "if we are to judge by reason alone, it is the interest of a minister, conscious of any mismanagement, that there should be a war, because by a war the eyes of the public are diverted from examining into his conduct." He proposed several amendments in a mild spirit, agreeing, however, to declare that the Spaniards had unjustly interfered with the freedom of navigation and commerce, had committed depredations attended with many instances of unheard-of cruelty and barbarity; that the court of Madrid had been exceedingly backward in giving satisfaction to his majesty's injured subjects and bringing the offenders to condign punishment; that the orders or cedulas granted by the King of Spain for restitution and reparation had been disobeyed by the Spanish governors, or totally evaded or eluded; and that all these violences and depredations were in direct violation of existing treaties. His amendments were carried; but Alderman Perry, who had been chairman of the committee, proposed and carried a very warlike address, beseeching the king to use his endeavours to obtain prompt and effectual redress, and pledging the House to support his majesty in a war if his negotiations were not presently attended with full success. In the Upper House Chesterfield and Carteret went more into extremes than Pulteney; and a majority of the Lords voted with them, and passed resolutions, absolutely denying the right of search as practised by the Spaniards on the coast of South America, &c. Their lordships also voted an address, promising effectual support if his majesty should have recourse to war. The king replied to the address of the Lords in a very warlike tone. Pulteney, who undertook the chief management of the business, because he hoped that a war would raise him to Walpole's seat, brought in a bill for effectually securing and encouraging our trade to America—a strange bill, which one might almost fancy had been drawn up by a band of buccaneers, as, by its most important clause, the sailors were to keep everything they could get, and to appropriate all property found under the Spanish flag, without reference to the rights of the French, the Dutch, and other trading nations of Europe. The bill, in fact, if carried, would have converted the English nation into one great buccaneering power. It must have given such an alarm to the French for their property, which was often even greater than that of the Spaniards on board the galleons or plate-fleet, that they would hardly have hesitated to take part with Spain and join her with their whole naval force. Walpole made use of other arguments equally strong, and Pulteney's bill was negatived by a large majority. Parliament rose a few days after, but the prorogation brought no quiet to the minister, whose pacific disposition continued to be reviled by the mass of the nation, and whose party enemies carried on fifty intrigues at once, but all concentrating in two objects—the declaration of a war and the downfall of the ministry. The king himself, passionately fond of his army, longed to distinguish it;—the wisdom and moderation of Queen Caroline were gone, and several of Walpole's colleagues or subordinates had, for some time and for various reasons, taken up the war cry. This was more particularly the case with the Duke of Newcastle, one of the secretaries of state, who had been entertaining hopes, ever since the death of the queen, to supplant Walpole, who, as the duke and others understood it, monopolised far too large a portion of the power and profits of the state. The premier, however, still clung to his pacific measures and pressed his negotiations with the court of Madrid; but, at the same time, to show that he could and might make war, he sent Admiral Haddock into the Mediterranean with ten ships of the line, sent many single ships to the West Indies, offered letters of marque and reprisal to the merchants, supplied the infant colony of Georgia with troops and stores, and directed the British merchants in the several sea-ports of Spain to register their goods before notaries public, in case of a rupture. These things and the proceedings and speeches in the British parliament made the Spaniards somewhat more modest and humble. They liberated some prizes they had captured, sent home some English sailors that had been taken by guarda costas, and declared that they would hasten the consideration of the English claims for reparation. On our side it was admitted that certain sums were due to Spain, but on striking a balance it was made to appear that there remained due to England 140,000*l.* The Spaniards tried to reduce this balance, but finally they agreed to pay it by assignments upon the revenues of their American colonies. It was represented to Walpole that if our debt was to be paid in that quarter it would not be liquidated for many a year—perhaps never paid at all; and the minister was therefore induced to agree to receive in prompt payments in Europe 95,000*l.* in lieu of the 140,000*l.* in America. Having settled the sum and the mode of payment, a convention was signed on the 14th of January (1739), at Madrid, by Mr. Keene and La Quadra. This convention stipulated that the 95,000*l.* should be paid within four months from the date of the ratification; that the mutual discharge of claims should not extend to any existing differences or balances between Spain and the English South Sea Company as holders of the Assiento contract; that within six weeks two English plenipotentiaries should meet two Spanish plenipotentiaries at Madrid, to regulate the rights of trade and navigation, and settle the boundaries of Carolina and Florida, all which they were to do within eight months. La Quadra, who signed this convention, had insisted all along that the English South Sea Company owed his master 68,000*l.*, and had declared that the convention could not be ratified until Philip got that money. Mr. Keene, on the other hand, had maintained that the government of England and the South Sea Company were entirely distinct, and that the government could not control the company; but he declared that, if it should be proved there was really a debt of 68,000*l.* owing to his Catholic majesty, he would undertake that it should be honourably discharged. La Quadra chose to consider this as a positive promise that the 68,000*l.* should be paid before the execution of the articles; and at the very moment they were signing the convention he delivered to Keene a declaration or protest, purporting that his Spanish majesty reserved to himself the right of suspending the Assiento treaty, unless the South Sea Company satisfied his claims forthwith. The English negotiator was greatly embarrassed, but he went on to sign the convention notwithstanding, and even consented to receive the protest, though without admitting its demands, but merely as referring them to the consideration of the British cabinet.

A.D. 1739.—Parliament assembled on the 1st of February, when George in his speech from the throne mentioned the ratification of the convention, and stated that the King of Spain had agreed to make reparation, and that plenipotentiaries had been appointed to regulate within a limited time all the grievances and abuses which had interrupted our commerce and navigation in the American seas, &c. "If," said the king, "all the ends which are to be hoped for even from successful arms can be attained without plunging the nation into a war, it must be thought by all reasonable and unprejudiced persons the most desirable event." But the nation had been filled with a dream of war, conquest, and revenge; and the convention, even interpreted in its best sense, was not a peace or a security for peace—it was not, in fact, even so much as a good preliminary to a treaty, seeing how it was hampered by the protest. The opposition, in both Houses, fell upon its weak and bad parts, and Sir William Wyndham moved that in the address everything like an approbation of the convention should be carefully struck out. Walpole said that at all events an opening to a peace was better than the beginning of a war—that, if he had declared war, the very men that were now reviling him and his war—that he would tell the world that a trading people ought by all manner of means to avoid war—that any peace was preferable even to a successful war; and his original address was carried by a large majority. But when the articles of the convention were laid before parliament, the ministerial majority of 234 against 141 dropped suddenly to “a miserable baker’s dozen,” &c. to thirteen. As under no point of view the convention was of more than a preliminary, there was not a word in it about the right of search, about the limits of Georgia, which Spain claimed almost in toto, or indeed about any of the more difficult of the points in dispute. And now, without heeding the nature of that diplomatic instrument, people in the House and out of the House exclaimed and clamoured as if the document was a final one, as if England had given up the pretension of being exempted from search, renounced her claims to Georgia, &c. And, as if this were not excitement enough, there was a clause in the convention that Spain was to be allowed 60,000*l.* for the ships taken by Admiral Byng off the coast of Sicily in the year 1718.* This, they said, was paying the enemy for our victories—was giving them back more than they had lost! Of course the opposition took no heed of the peculiar circumstances attending Byng’s battle off Cape Passaro, or of the facts that, in an article in the peace of Madrid, concluded during the administration of Sunderland, a mutual restitution was promised, that this promise had been confirmed by England in the more recent treaty of Seville, and that Spain had never foregone her claim. In the Upper House the Duke of Argyll, who had been wavering for some time, went openly into opposition; Chesterfield and Carteret continued and improved their declamations; and the Prince of Wales, the mortal enemy of Walpole, took this occasion of giving his first vote in parliament. The minister, by the mouth of Lord Cholmondeley, moved an address to thank his majesty for concluding the convention; to express a reliance that, in continuing the negotiations, care would be taken to secure our trade and navigation in the American seas; and to promise that, if these negotiations should not answer his majesty’s just expectations, the House would support him in vindicating the honour of his crown and the rights of his people. This, after a long debate, was carried, but by a majority of only thirteen—fifty-eight lords, with the Prince of Wales at their head, voting against the minister. The same address was moved in the Commons by the premier’s brother Horace, who spoke for two hours, and explained with tolerable fairness the real meaning of the convention. He insisted that nothing had been done to commit the honour of the country; that the great questions remained open; that there was nothing in them but might be settled by diplomacy; that to treat was better than to fight; that from the state of things in Europe England had not one ally upon whom she could count, while France was sure to take part with Spain; that in eight months a definitive treaty might be obtained. Sir Thomas Sanderson, who spoke first in reply to Horace Walpole, thought that nothing could go right till we had made war, and taken vengeance for the mutilating of Jenkyns’s ear; and he vehemently proclaimed that the fellow—the pirate—the monster—that had done the deed, was now enjoying the fruits of his rapine—a living testimony of the cowardly tameness and mean submission of Great Britain, and of the triumphant pride and stubborn haughtiness of Spain. Lord Gage, leaving Jenkyns’s ear in its owner’s pocket, declaimed with almost equal heat upon the reduction of the balance due by Spain, which, his lordship said, ought to pay 340,000*l.* at the very least. Young William Pitt, who was already making himself known, and meriting from Walpole the designation of “that terrible cornet of horse,” asked whether we had not wholly lost our nationality. “Is this,” cried he, “any longer a nation? Or what is an English parliament if, with more ships in our harbours than in all the nations of Europe, with above two millions of people in our American colonies, we will bear to hear of the expediency of receiving from Spain an insecure, unsatisfactory, dishonourable convention?” From the date of this speech the tongue of William Pitt awed or commanded the House of Commons. In its abstract points few questions could have been better suited to a young and enthusiastic orator: the freedom of the seas, the might and right of the British flag, the jealousy of Spain and her inhuman policy, were subjects that never yet failed to excite the English people. After speaking of the merely financial part of the business and the suspension of the Assiento, Pitt maintained that Spain had imposed her conditions in the most absolute, imperious manner, and that England had submitted to them most tamely and abjectly. “Can any verbal distinction,” said he, “can any evasions whatever, possibly explain away this public infamy? To whom would we disguise it? To ourselves and to the nation? I wish we could hide it from every court in Europe! They see Spain has talked to you like your master; they see this arbitrary fundamental condition, and it must stand with distinction, with a pre-eminence of shame, as a part even of this convention. This convention, Sir, I think from my soul, is nothing but a stipulation for national ignominy; an illusory expedient to baffle the resentment of the nation; a truce without a suspension of hostilities on the part of Spain; on the part of England a suspension as to Georgia of the first law of nature, self-preservation and self-defence; a surrender of the rights and trade of England to the mercy of plenipotentiaries; and on this infinitely highest and sacred point, future security, not only inadequate but directly repugnant to the resolutions of parliament and the gracious promise of the throne. The complaints of your despairing merchants—the voice of England has condemned it. Be the guilt of it upon the head of the adviser: God forbid that this committee should share the guilt by approving it!" Littleton observed that the grievances of England admitted but of one remedy, and that a very short and simple one—her ships should never be searched by the Spaniards, or by any other power, upon any pretence whatever. He said that even as a preliminary the convention was disgraceful; and the very worst result that could have been produced by the most ruinous war. "Let us, then, reject it with scorn," he continued, "so that to all we have suffered before, to all the accumulated insults ever heaped upon a nation, a worse dishonour may not be added, and that dishonour fall upon the parliament." Walpole, who spoke last in the debate, urged in reply that the convention laid the foundation for a good definitive treaty; that he held it to be his greatest boast at present, as it would be his greatest honour in succeeding times, to be named as the minister who had endeavoured by this convention to prevent the necessity of making war upon a nation with whom it was our greatest interest to be at peace, at a time, too, when we could not hope to be assisted by any power, but might reasonably apprehend being attacked by several. He repeated again and again his fundamental maxim—that peace was better than war, and that, England being a trading nation, the prosperity of her trade ought always to be the principal object. Admitting even that the convention had not answered all the expectations of the House, they ought still to consider whether a declaration of war would answer those expectations any better, whether we had a fair prospect of success, and particularly whether even a successful war with Spain might not involve us in a very doubtful and expensive war with other powers. He spoke of the obligations, contracted in former treaties, of our submitting to and acknowledging the right of Spain to regulate her own colonies in her own way; and after other arguments he expressed a hope that parliament would sanction the convention. On a division he found himself supported by a majority, but by a very slender one—260 being for him, and 232 against him. On the next day Putney resumed the attack, and was supported by Wyndham; but the motion for a recommitment of the address was negatived by 244 against 214. Wyndham, who was still following the advice of Bolingbroke, then rose, and with great solemnity announced his intention of taking his leave of the House of Commons. "I have seen," said he, "this shameful, this fatal measure approved of by a majority of but twenty-eight, and I now rise to pay my last duty to my country as a member of this House." He said he had entertained hopes that the unanswerable arguments urged in the debate against the convention might have prevailed upon gentlemen to have for once listened to the dictates of reason, to have for once distinguished themselves from being a faction against the liberties and properties of their fellow-subjects; that those hopes had been the stronger since he had never found one single person out of doors that pretended to justify the dishonouring convention. He added—"The majority of this House must, then, proceed either from their being determined by arguments that we have not heard, or from my wanting common sense to comprehend the force of those we have heard. In the first case I think I cannot, with honour, sit in an assembly which is determined by motives which I am not at liberty to mention; and, if the last is the case, I look upon myself as a very unfit person to serve as a senator. I here, Sir, bid a final adieu to this House. Perhaps when another parliament shall succeed, I may be again at liberty to serve my country in the same capacity. I therefore appeal to a future, free, uninfluenced House of Commons. Let it be the judge of my conduct and of that of my friends on this occasion." Pelham was so incensed at the insult offered to the House, and the calling of the ministerial majority a corrupt faction, that he was rising to move for Wyndham's commitment to the Tower; but Walpole stopped him, and said, with quite as much warmth as the Tory or Jacobite orator, that the measures that that gentleman and his friends might pursue gave him no uneasiness. "The friends of the nation," said he, "and this House are obliged to them for pulling off the mask, by making this public declaration. We can be upon our guard against open rebellion, but it is difficult to guard against secret traitors. The faction I speak of never sat in this House, they never joined in any public measure of the government, but with a view to distress it, and serve a popish interest. The gentleman who is now the mouth of this faction was looked upon as the head of those traitors who, twenty-five years ago, conspired the destruction of their country and of the royal family, to set a popish pretender upon the throne. He was seized by the vigilance of government, and pardoned by its clemency; but all the use he ungratefully made of that clemency has been to qualify himself according to law, that he and his party may, some time or other, have an opportunity to overthrow all law. I am only afraid that they will not be so good as their word, and that they will return; for I remember that, in the case of their favourite prelate, who was impeached of treason, the same gentleman and his faction made the same revolution. They went off like traitors as they were; but their retreat had not the detestable effect they expected and wished, and therefore they returned. Ever since, Sir, they have persevered in the same treasonable intention of serving that interest, by distressing the government. But I hope their behaviour will unite all true friends of the present happy establishment of the crown in his majesty's person and family more firmly than ever; and that the gentlemen, who, with good intentions, have been deluded into the like measures, will awaken from their delusion, since the trumpet of rebellion is now audaciously sounded." In thus seceding, Sir William Wyndham calculated upon carrying and keeping the whole of his party with him; but these Tories soon grew weary of their secession, which, to the popular eye, looked like cowardice, and several of them never seceded at all. Sir John Barnard, Mr. Plumer of Hertfordshire, and one or two others, refused to desert their posts in parliament; and these gentlemen were much more praised for staying than was Wyndham for going. It appears, indeed, that that chief orator of the Tories hoped to get back through a call of the House, which had been fixed for the next Monday, and that Walpole baffled him by moving an adjournment till the following Tuesday. It is quite certain that the minister was not only unhurt by the secession, but was also anxious to prolong it. His measures passed off smoothly, always without a division, and often without a single opposition speech. He most undoubtedly rejoiced at the absence of Wyndham when he was compelled by the Hanoverian schemes of his master to ask for a subsidy of 250,000 dollars per annum for three years for the King of Denmark.* To improve our woollen manufactures and trade in cloth, a bill was brought in and carried, facilitating the importation of wool from Ireland, and laying additional duties upon the exportation of that commodity in its crude state. Another act was passed with the view of serving the British colonies in the West Indies, by permitting the introduction of sugar into foreign ports in British bottoms, without first landing it, as formerly, in Great Britain, and by rendering the importation of foreign sugar and molasses more difficult. Encouraged by the Tory secession, and hoping that, in the absence of the sturdiest opponents of religious liberty, a step might be made in their favour, the Dissenters renewed their petition for the repeal of the Test Act. This really embarrassed the minister, who knew that, though the desired measure might pass in the House of Commons, it would be assuredly rejected in the Lords. The seceders rejoiced in his dilemma, and forgetting their exceeding great anxiety for the church, and relying upon the sure bar that would be interposed by the Lords, they kept aloof in spite of the warning voices of preachers who again declared that the church was in danger, and that its best defenders ought not to permit the bill to pass even through one branch of the legislature. But the measure was not destined even to that partial success: the Whigs could equally overlook their old principles in favour of religious liberty, and, incensed at the conduct of the Tories, and determined at all hazards to relieve Walpole from his embarrassment, they negatived the motion by a majority of 188 to 89. Walpole complained that the Dissenters had been too impatient, and had not waited for the time when he should be able to do them service; the Dissenters, on the other hand, began to perceive that the minister would run no risk whatever on their account; and from this moment they either withdrew their support altogether, or only gave it out of fear of a worse successor to the premiership. Yet it appears that, if Walpole, at this juncture, had exerted himself in favour of the repeal of the Test Act, he would have lost on the side of Whig churchmen quite as much as he could have gained on the side of the Dissenters; and, after all, he must have failed in reconciling the Upper House to the bill. Parliament was very quietly prorogued on the 14th of June.

But our foreign negotiations were anything rather than smooth and tranquil. When, in pursuance of the convention, two British plenipotentiaries went to Madrid to confer with two plenipotentiaries of Spain, there seemed little probability that the preliminaries would end in a definitive, amicable treaty. The Spaniards were enraged at the declarations and denunciations made in our parliament, and they seemed determined to talk as loud as we did: they bitterly complained of the presence of a British squadron off their Mediterranean coast; they assumed a high tone about their right of search, and they declared that that right must be admitted, or they would not treat at all: they also complained of the non-payment of the 68,000*l.* by the South Sea Company, and told the English diplomatists that the King of Spain thought himself justified in seizing the effects of the company, and suspending their trade in negroes. It is quite certain that these Dons would have spoken less boldly if Walpole had said less about his anxious desire to prevent hostilities. The equally pacific Cardinal Fleury, however, stepped in with an offer of the mediation of France, and he undertook to guarantee to England the immediate payment of the 95,000*l.* stipulated for in the convention, provided only the British squadron were recalled from the Mediterranean. But the course of events, together with the disposition of the nation and of the king, who had all along been far less anxious for peace, convinced Walpole that the time for friendly compromise was past, and that he must either engage in a war or retire into private life, leaving his enemies to triumph in his fall, and undo, perhaps in a single session, the system which he had framed in so many laborious years. Thanks to the opposition orators in the House of Commons and to skipper Jenkyns, the mass of the nation was in a high Spanish fever, which nothing could moderate but Spanish blood. Under these circumstances Walpole took his stand on the very best ground that was offered—for he demanded from Spain an absolute renunciation for ever of the right of search, and an express acknowledgment of all the British rights and claims in North America. At the same time he reinforced the squadron in the Mediterranean, sent Sir Chaloner Ogle with more ships to the West Indies, and put another fleet to sea under Sir John Norris. Spain proudly rejected the English demands, and on the 19th of October war was proclaimed in London in the most jubilant manner. The stocks, which had been on the decline, rose instantly. The colonies in South America, the mines of Mexico and Peru, were already, by anticipation, the conquests of England; and every loud-tongued vagabond in the streets of London that shouted for joy, or rung the bells in the church steeples, seemed to fancy himself a sharer in the prey. Several of the leaders of the opposition joined in the jubilee, which they in reality had made by striving for the war; and they walked in procession after the heralds who had to proclaim, by sound of trumpet, that an indefinite quantity of human blood was to be shed. The Prince of Wales was not far behind his friends, and he stopped before the Rose tavern, at Temple Bar, to drink, with the mob, "Success to the war!" Walpole, in the mean while, was muttering, in a sure spirit of prophecy, "They may ring the bells now, but they will soon be wringing their hands." If there was any excess of joy to be compared to that of the thoughtless London mob, it was that of the Pretender's court in Italy and the exiled Jacobites, who all held that the war would soon be a general one, and that France and Spain would unite in setting King James on his throne when the fleets and armies of England should be engaged in distant hostilities. In fact, the heralds of King George had scarcely finished their flourishes, when the agents of King James began to post and gallop in all directions; and the most zealous of the Jacobites assembled at Edinburgh to draw up a bond of association, and to engage to take arms and venture their lives and fortunes for the restoration of the Stuart king.

* George II., as Elector of Hanover, had bought from Holstein the petty lordship and castle of Steinhorst; but his Danish majesty pretended that Holstein had no right to sell it—that the thing belonged to him. A detachment of Danish troops had even attempted to take forcible possession of Steinhorst; but George's Hanoverians had beaten them off after a smart skirmish. The King of Denmark hereupon had raised a terrible clamour, had threatened war, and had put himself in correspondence with the French. But the English subsidy conjured the storm.

Before the declaration of war Walpole sent his brother Horace to Holland to require the auxiliary troops which the States were bound to furnish. But the court of France prevailed upon the Dutch to remain neutral, by threatening them with an army of 50,000 men, and alluring them with hopes of procuring the best part of the trade which the English had carried on with Spanish America. England was then left without an ally, and France continued to wear a threatening rather than an amicable aspect.

Parliament assembled on the 15th of November. "The present posture of our affairs," said his majesty, "has obliged me to call you together sooner than has been usual of late years, that I may have the immediate advice and assistance of my parliament at this critical and important conjuncture. I have, in all my proceedings with the court of Spain, acted agreeably to the sense of both Houses, and therefore I can make no doubt but I shall meet with a ready and vigorous support in this just and necessary war, which the repeated injuries and violence committed by that nation upon the navigation and commerce of these Kingdoms, and their obstinacy and notorious violation of the most solemn engagements, have rendered unavoidable." He mentioned the necessary increase of his forces, and his confidence of being furnished with fitting supplies; he spoke of the heats and animosities which had been fomented throughout his kingdom, and which had chiefly encouraged the proceedings of the court of Spain, and expressed his hope that there would be as general a concurrence in carrying on the war as there had appeared for engaging in it. This, he said, would make Spain repent the wrongs she had done us, and convince those who aimed at the subversion of the present establishment that England was well able to vindicate her injured honour, and to defend herself against all her enemies, whether open or secret, at home or abroad. Sir William Wyndham and the rest of the seceders had by this time returned to their posts, confident that they should soon make them a stepping-stone to the cabinet, which was now greatly divided against Walpole. When Mr. Archer moved the usual address, the seceders almost lost sight of the subject in their anxiety to justify their recent secession. Pulteney said that nothing else had been left to them for clearing their characters to posterity—that the step they had taken, though hitherto much censured, would, for the future, be treated in a different manner, as it was fully justified by the declaration of war, which was so universally approved—that the seceders had only been moved by their zeal for the honour of their country—that war was just as necessary when they seceded as it was now—that the minister had at last made up his mind to do precisely what they had recommended while opposing the convention. He then declared that we ought to attack the Spanish settlements in the West Indies, and never allow any minister, under any pretence whatsoever, to give up the conquests we might make; that he was ready to support the present ministry in carrying on the war with vigour; but that he wished no mention had been made in his majesty's speech of heats and animosities, and must move that the House, in its address, should take no notice of that particular clause, which seemed to go against the honour of the House. Walpole, vexed and harassed on every side, and conscious that he had taken a false step, gave full vent to his spleen. He said that, after what had passed last session, he little expected to be so soon favoured with the company of the acceders; he was always pleased when he saw gentlemen in the way of their duty, and glad that those members had returned to theirs, though, to say the truth, he had entertained no great apprehension that the service either of his majesty or of the nation would suffer much by their absence. "I believe," continued Walpole, "that the nation is generally sensible that the many useful and popular acts which passed towards the end of last session were greatly forwarded and facilitated by the secession of these gentlemen; and, if they are returned only to oppose and perplex, I shall not be at all sorry if they secede again. . . . I cannot, however, believe that the honourable gentleman and his friends have found any reason to boast of the effects produced by their secession upon the minds of the people, for it was a very new way of defending the interests of their constituents to desert them when they apprehended them to be endangered." He said other things equally bitter, and ended by declaring that he could not see how his majesty's not issuing a declaration of war at the precise moment when they were pleased to require it was a good reason for their running from their duty, nor how its being issued at last was any apology for their return. The original address passed in the Commons without a division, but the address of the Upper House had a different fate—Chesterfield, Carteret, and others harangued at great length, and forty-eight peers voted against sixty-eight. The Duke of Argyll was now in resolute opposition, and he was even more formidable by his eloquence and address than by the influence he possessed over other Scottish lords and leaders. Walpole had been taunted with want of courage, for he had left the great Scottish duke in possession of all his offices, places, and military commands,—and this, as Pulteney had said in the House, because he durst not turn him out. But, a few months after this, the minister prevailed upon the king to dismiss Argyll from all his employments by one stroke of the pen or by a single order. According to a Jacobite authority, the Highland blood of the duke got the better of his prudence, and he exclaimed—"Fall flat, fall edge, we must get rid of these people." "Which," adds the Jacobite reporter, "might imply both man and master, or only the man."* The opposition, who correctly considered themselves as the parents of the war, thought that they had a right to manage it in their own way; and Walpole found himself obliged to withdraw his resistance to a bill, for encouraging seamen by giving them all the prize-money, which had been thrown out the preceding session.

A. D. 1740.—Sir William Wyndham believed, or pretended to believe, that, notwithstanding the declaration of hostilities, Walpole was determined to get out of the war as soon as he could; and on the 21st of February he moved a most violent address, beseeching his majesty never to admit of any treaty of peace with Spain unless the acknowledgment of our natural and indubitable right to navigate in the American seas, without being searched, visited, or stopped under any pretence whatsoever, should have been first obtained as a preliminary. Wyndham had flattered himself that Walpole would resist the motion; but that minister, who could not be blind to its tendency, declared that he would be the first to agree to it; and it was carried without one dissentient voice. The place and pension bill was again produced, and was thrown out by a majority of only sixteen, or by 222 against 206. If the general election had been more distant, the minority would have been far less; but a considerable number of members began to depart from their usual course, and to vote, at least occasionally, for popularity-gaining measures, now that the hustings were coming in view. It was soon found that England was not altogether prepared for a war, even on her proper element; and that, though the sailors had clamoured loudly "to have a brush with the Spaniards," they did not like to serve his majesty for less wages than they could get from merchants, and had no taste for the arbitrary system of impressment. Thus we had ships ready for sea, and not sailors enough to man them; and, while we were getting ready, the Spanish cruisers picked up our trading-vessels with alarming rapidity. The merchants and others petitioned parliament for convoys to protect trade,—for fleets and squadrons to maintain the supremacy of the English flag everywhere,—and yet, at the same time, not to permit government to press the seamen. The matter was referred to a committee of the House of Commons, who concluded that the best method would be to establish a general register of all seamen and watermen capable of service, out of which men might be drafted from time to time as necessity required. A bill to this effect was presented by Admiral Sir Charles Wager. The opposition seemed to think that this general register would be a greater hardship upon seamen than the custom of impressing,—that it would compel married men, fathers of families, to leave everything, and serve upon a sudden notice; and Pulteney proposed that the second reading should be deferred for a few days, and the bill be printed for the consideration of the House. Walpole declared that the impressing of seamen, though resorted to in times of emergency, was neither eligible nor legal—that it was ineffectual and insufficient—that the delay in procuring sailors was a general grievance and a great obstruction to offensive operations—that while we were publishing proclamations, and issuing press-warrants, and gleaning up our sailors man by man, our secrets were betrayed and our enterprises defeated. He consented, however, to the delay and the printing of the bill proposed by Pulteney; and this delay was fatal to the register scheme; for it gave time for a terrible outcry against the measure as a thing founded upon French edicts and ordinances, and tending to French despotism. When the bill was produced in the House it was received with silent horror, and was presently rejected. A motion was then made for a committee to consider of the heads of a bill for the better encouragement of seamen to enter into his majesty's service; but it came to nothing, though all parties seemed to agree that a register was necessary. On the 13th of March the committee resolved that a voluntary register of seamen would be of great utility to the kingdom! Walpole found himself compelled to sanction letters of marque and licenses to a vast number of privateers; for by this time many adventurers, both French and Dutch, had taken to the profitable business of piracy, and were plundering our ships under bits of Spanish bunting. He, however, attended to the building of light twenty-gun ships, and fitted out as many cruisers of the royal navy as he could. "An embargo," says Tindal, "upon all shipping except coasters, had continued, by order of the Lords of the Admiralty, from the 1st of February to the 28th of March, when a petition from the merchants and owners of ships, and others concerned in manufactures and commerce, was sent to the House of Commons, complaining of the great hardships the continuance of this embargo brought upon trade in general, and containing some insinuations as if it had been continued through wantonness. The fact was, the petitioners had been amongst the loudest in the outcry raised against government for not protecting their trade; and, as that clamour increased, the necessity of employing more seamen increased likewise. The lords of the admiralty had employed every fair means in their power to procure seamen, but without success, till they were reduced to the disagreeable alternative of either imposing the embargo, or permitting the service of the public to suffer. To give all the ease, however, in their power to trade, they soon took off the embargo on foreign ships, and acquainted the masters of British ships that they were willing to take it off entirely, if every master, or merchant, or owner of a ship, would, in proportion to their number of hands, contribute to the supply of the navy."* But this conduct was represented in the anti-ministerial speeches and writings as an intolerable oppression upon commerce, calculated with a view to make the city of London and the trading part of the nation weary of the war. The ministry, however, did not think fit to comply with the prayer of the petitioners, which was, to be heard by counsel against the embargo. They maintained that to admit counsel on such a head was stripping his majesty of one of his most unquestionable prerogatives; and the motion was rejected by a majority of 166 against 95. This firmness of the government was attended with the desired effect; for the merchants at last agreed to carry one-third of their crew landmen, and to furnish one man in four to the king's ships; upon which condition these ships had protection granted them, and about the 14th of April the embargo was taken off from all merchants' ships in the ports of Great Britain and Ireland outward-bound. But, although the opposition thwarted the minister in everything else, they voted him the public money with an easy liberality, forgetting, as his biographer observes, their own repeated assertions that Walpole had so impoverished the nation that it could not possibly bear any further burdens.† With their consent the land-tax was raised from two to four shillings in the pound, the sinking fund was again encroached upon, and the whole amount of supplies came up to more than four millions.

Parliament was prorogued on the 29th of April. While it was yet sitting—on the 13th of March—advices were received that Admiral Vernon had taken Porto Bello from the Spaniards. Vernon was the pet admiral of the opposition, and a personal enemy to the minister. While people were making bonfires in the streets, the Lords sent an address to the Commons for their concurrence, in which they congratulated his majesty on the glorious success of his arms under the command of Admiral Vernon, by the taking of Porto Bello with only six ships of war. This was meant to blacken the memory of Admiral Hosier, and to revive old animosities; yet the address was passed as it stood in a thin House by a majority of 36 to 31; and Vernon, a vain, hot-headed, incompetent commander, was informed in due course that Walpole's friends were the foes of his glory. Sir John Norris, having his royal highness the Duke of Cumberland with him as a volunteer, sailed away for Ferrol, in order to intercept the Spanish fleet about to sail for the West Indies; but the weather was contrary and foul; two of his best ships were greatly damaged, and before Norris could get clear of the English coast he received intelligence that the Spaniards had put to sea and were on their way to America.* In the autumn Commodore Anson was detached with a small squadron to assist Vernon and commit depredations in the South Seas. Anson was to co-operate occasionally with the admiral across the narrow Isthmus of Darien.† But the grand exertion made by England was the fitting out a formidable armament for the northern coast of Spanish America and his Catholic majesty's settlements on the Atlantic. Four battalions were raised in the British colonies of North America, and conveyed to Jamaica to await the arrival of forces from England. These latter forces, consisting chiefly of marines and of detachments from some old regiments, were embarked in the month of October at the Isle of Wight, under the command of Lord Cathcart. Sir Chaloner Ogle accompanied them with a fleet of twenty-seven ships of the line, besides frigates, fire-ships, bomb-ketches, tenders, hospital-ships, and store-ships. The armament was exceedingly well equipped, and it was expected that Cathcart and Ogle between them would do nothing less than subvert the empire of the Spaniards in the western world.

After the departure of the king for Hanover the dissensions in the cabinet increased; and the Duke of Newcastle, who had hitherto seemed to be content with his subordinate office, began to aspire to the premiership. The duke even came to an open quarrel with Walpole; they were reconciled by mutual friends, but soon quarrelled again. Newcastle, who had always been inclined to the war, thought that he was the proper person of the two to have the entire management of it: he was for sending every ship of war that could be spared to the West Indies and South America, while Walpole, well knowing the schemes of the

Pretender, considered it unsafe to leave our own coasts unguarded. Matters soon arrived at that point that no single measure was debated at the council-table without violent altercations. The premier must have felt he was losing ground daily, for he allowed himself to be overcome by frequent fits of passion; and, instead of being good-humoured and cheerful, as had been his wont, was peevish and querulous, and apparently anxious to throw all responsibility—at least as far as the war was concerned—upon the weak shoulders of Newcastle. As he had feared and foreseen, France concluded a family compact with Spain, and employed her accomplished diplomatists in every court in Europe to prevent England from forming new alliances, or to break those she had already formed. Walpole, however, succeeded in detaching Russia from the French interest, and he subsidized Sweden as well as Denmark, Hesse Cassel, and some other German states. But the great trial of diplomatic strength was at the court of Berlin. The capricious and inept Frederick William of Prussia died on the 31st of May of the present year 1740, and was succeeded by his extraordinary son, whom he had most brutally treated, but who became Frederick the Great. Frederick William left at his death a treasure of a million and a half sterling, and a disciplined army of 76,000 men. He had made little use of this imposing force, but his son was no sooner on the throne than he resolved to improve it and use it for conquest. This young king—he was in his twenty-eighth year—found himself courted by all the great European powers: France was most anxious to secure his friendship, and England hoped that, now that the personal animosities between his father and the House of Hanover were removed, she might secure him in her interests. The minister's brother, Horace Walpole, even drew up the plan of a grand confederacy against the House of Bourbon, of which the young Frederick was to be the head. The Duke of Newcastle gave his approbation to the scheme, and submitted it to George. But Frederick was in no hurry to conclude a bargain either with France or England; he amused both, and waited events. Circumstances soon occurred which tempted him to turn his 76,000 men against the House of Austria. On the 20th of October the Emperor Charles VI. died, and was succeeded in all his hereditary states by his daughter Maria Theresa, whose rights were guaranteed, in conformity with the Pragmatic Sanction, by all the great powers of Europe. At first, every one of these powers, except Bavaria, recognised her accession; but, in the end, not one of them, except England, adhered to its engagements. The Elector of Bavaria had claims of his own to a good part of the Austrian inheritance, and he maintained that the female line could not legally succeed. But the first blow against the fair Austrian did not proceed from that quarter; the elector was too weak to take the field except as a second to a greater power. The King of Prussia

* The old Duchess of Marlborough was busy commenting with her usual severity on the conduct of ministers, the war, &c. "Sir Robert," she says, "never likes any but fools, and such as have lost all credit. As to what happens to the sea affairs, I know no more for certain than you see in the prints. But I cannot but think it looks ill that so many delays are made in Sir John Norris's going out, and that he is still very near England. Perhaps this management may have been to let the Spaniards get out their fleet from Ferrol."—Letter to Hugh Earl of Marchmont, in Sir George Henry Jans's Selection from the Marchmont Papers. In the same caustic epistle the old dowager says—"There is a great talk all over the town that his majesty is mightily in love with the Princess of Hesse's sister; and it is said she is extremely handsome, and about seventeen; and some people believe we shall soon have a queen. And as the Princess of Wales is ready to lie in again, we need not apprehend having an increase of princes and princesses, every year at least two, so that we shall never want heirs to the crown; nor they will never want good provisions as long as they have a House of Lords and Commons that are so liberal."

revived some antiquated claims to part of the province of Silesia, and he thought that he could not better employ his army and his treasure than in taking possession of the whole—"a project," as he himself observed afterwards, "which promised to fulfil all the political views he had most at heart, as it was the readiest means of obtaining reputation, of augmenting the power of his kingdom, and of terminating satisfactorily several long litigated questions." He, however, kept his secret till he was ready to act; and when, on the 15th of December, after a grand masked ball, he set out from Berlin at the head of 30,000 men, very few persons knew whither he was going, or what were his real intentions in beginning a campaign at so unusual a season. He merely said to the French ambassador as he was getting to horse—"I am going to play your game; if aces are dealt to me we will go halves." On the 23rd of December Frederick crossed his frontier, and found himself well received by the majority of the Silesians, who, as Protestants, inclined rather to Prussia than to Catholic Austria. Maria Theresa had very few troops in the province, and these were soon obliged to retire into Moravia. Breslau, the capital, through the harangues of an enthusiastic Protestant shoemaker, opened its gates to the Prussians; Namslau and Ohlau followed the example, and by the middle of January the whole province was overrun. On the first alarm the Queen of Hungary, as Maria Theresa was generally called, applied for advice and aid to King George. George and his English ministers, knowing her weakness, advised her to purchase a peace with her dangerous neighbour by sacrificing part or the whole of Silesia; but she indignantly rejected the proposition, and claimed, as a matter of right, the succour stipulated in the treaty by which England guaranteed the Pragmatic Sanction. All that George could do at the moment was to collect some troops on his Hanoverian frontier; but this obliged his nephew Frederick to leave a considerable part of his army in that quarter to watch the proceedings of these Hanoverians. At the same time, however, Frederick spent the money his father had left him in increasing his army, and before the winter was over he had nearly 30,000 more men to join those already in Silesia. Nor was he less active in diplomacy: the Elector of Bavaria was ready to join him, and he won over the Elector of Saxony; the Kings of Spain and Sardinia engaged to abet him secretly, and the King of France, who was to go halves, promised a more open assistance. Other states, equally anxious to profit by the favourable opportunity of aggrandizing themselves at the expense of an apparently almost defenceless woman, merely waited a little to see how the game would be played.

Anne, the czarina of Russia, died nearly at the same time as the Emperor Charles. She bequeathed her crown to Ivan, the infant grandson of her elder sister, the Duchess of Mecklenburg; but the Russian nobles soon set aside the helpless boy, and placed the Princess Elizabeth upon the throne. This daughter of Peter the Great was of mature age and experience, and endowed with considerable ability and spirit. She, in her turn, was as much courted for her alliance as Frederick of Prussia had been, and much seemed to depend upon the course she might take. Altogether the politics of Europe were changed or modified—the cards were fresh shuffled, and statesmen hardly knew the hands they might get.

At home the year had not been so tranquil as usual: in the month of July there were riots in various parts of England, owing to the high price of bread; the military were called out and several persons were killed. While we were sending our ships to America, the Spaniards continued to pick up our merchantmen in our own seas, and our foreign trade was paralyzed. Walpole, who had laboured to prevent the real causes of the worst of these calamities, was blamed for them all, and the popular abuse grew so loud, that it is said at last not a man in the kingdom mentioned his name with decency except his own dependents and servants.*

George came back to England and opened parliament on the 18th of November. The speech from the throne mentioned the exertions made to fit out fleets and armies for the West Indies and South America, and the resolution of his majesty to add strength to those armaments in order to bring Spain to reason. It alluded plainly to the probability of France becoming an open enemy. "The court of Spain," said his majesty, "having already felt some effects of our resentment, began to be sensible that they should no longer be able to defend themselves against the efforts of the British nation. And if any other power, agreeably to some late extraordinary proceedings, should interpose, and attempt to prescribe or limit the operations of the war against my declared enemies, the honour and interest of my crown and kingdoms must call upon us to lose no time in putting ourselves into such a condition as may enable us to repel any insults, and to frustrate any designs formed against us in violation of the faith of treaties. And I hope any such unprecedented steps, under what colour or pretence soever they may be taken, will inspire my allies with a true sense of the common danger, and will unite us in the support and defence of the common cause." [At this moment our alliances were either insignificant or insecure.] The speech finally alluded to the unhappy event of the death of the emperor, and stated that it was impossible to determine what turn the policy, interest, or ambition of the several courts might lead them to take in this critical conjuncture.

Walpole had nothing more to fear from the eloquence of Sir William Wyndham, for that Tory chief had gone to his grave in the course of the summer; but the opposition was now so formidable as scarcely to feel his loss. They were led in the Lords by the Duke of Argyll, who criticised and condemned the whole conduct of the war, and proposed an address very different from the ministerial one. Lord Bathurst seconded him, and Lord Carteret was even more violent than his grace, calling Walpole "a minister who has for almost twenty years been demonstrating to the world that he has neither wisdom nor conduct."* Lord Chesterfield, made sharp "by accumulated disappointments and spite," spoke in the same vein; but the original address was nevertheless carried in the Lords by a majority of 66 to 38. In the Commons, Pitt and Lyttleton were very warm, which occasioned Sir Robert to be so too; but there also the original address was carried. No ways discouraged, the opposition began a sharp fire of motions and calls for papers. In the Lords they got up an address for the instructions to Admiral Vernon in taking Porto Bello, with the object of making it appear that the whole merit belonged to their pet admiral, and no portion of it to the minister, whom they accused of thwarting him. They pretended that Haddock had done nothing in the Mediterranean. The Duke of Newcastle thought fit to reply that Haddock had effectually guarded Gibraltar and Port Mahon, had blockaded Cadiz, and had protected an important part of the British trade. But the opposition had the audacity to reply that such were "mean and mercantile considerations." In the same breath they blamed ministers for not carrying on the war everywhere with more vigour, and proposed that the army should on no account be augmented. These, however, were only the skirmishes which precede a general engagement.

A. D. 1741.—On the 11th of February, Sandys, who has been well called "the motion-maker," left his seat and crossed the floor of the House to the minister, to tell him that he thought it an act of common courtesy to inform him that he should on Friday next move an accusation of several articles against him. Walpole, unmoved, thanked him" for this piece of information. Sandys returned to his seat, and, standing up soon after, he acquainted the House with his intention of opening on Friday a matter of great importance, which personally concerned the chancellor of the exchequer, who he therefore hoped would on that day be present. Walpole instantly rose, and with great composure publicly thanked Sandys for his notice: he requested an impartial hearing, declared that he would not fail to attend the House on Friday, as he was not conscious of any crime, and then, laying his hand on his breast, he said with some emotion, "Nil conscire sibi, nulli pallescere culpæ." His former friend, and now inveterate enemy, Pulteney, untouched by the minister's emotion, declared that his Latin was as bad as his logic—that he had misquoted Horace, who had written nullâ pallescere culpâ. Walpole, who had not had much time for the classics, was hurt at being called to task; he defended his quotation, and offered to bet a guinea on its correctness. Pulteney took the bet and referred to the minister's friend Nicholas Hardinge, clerk of the House, and a reputed scholar. Hardinge decided against Walpole, and thereupon the guinea was tossed to Pulteney, who, holding it up to the House, exclaimed—"It is the only money I have received from the Treasury for many years, and it shall be the last." On the black Friday the motion-maker stood up in a crowded House, and began his terrible accusations with a sonorous voice.* After a preamble showing the difference between absolute monarchies and a kingdom like England, and saying that he had long expected such a motion to have been brought forward by some other gentleman more capable than himself, Sandys declared that the nation was in a most miserable condition, engaged in a war with one potentate, and likely to be involved in another, without one steady ally abroad, and with an immense debt bearing her down at home. In regard to foreign affairs he said that we had departed from all our old principles, which tended to depress our inveterate enemy the House of Bourbon, and had basely abandoned and consequently lost our natural ally the House of Austria. He could not attempt to deny that the treaty of Utrecht, in Queen Anne's time, had been the cause of much mischief; but he thought that the evils of that treaty might have been repaired by the Quadruple Alliance and by the glorious victory which Admiral Byng had gained over the Spanish fleet off the coast of Sicily. He insisted that our alliance with the French had been a monstrous thing, which had at last brought the balance of power into the utmost danger, if not to inevitable destruction; and he said that we ought to have taken advantage of the resentment entertained by Philip of Spain against the French court, for returning upon his hands the infanta his daughter after she had been affianced to Louis XV., and to have then assisted the Spanish branch of the House of Bourbon in a war against the French branch. Neither Sandys nor any other politician of the day was capable of rising above dupey, or of viewing foreign politics in any other light than that of a clever system of trick. Continuing his long harangue, he said—"But the most pernicious of all our pernicious measures was the treaty of Hanover. When the alliance between Spain and the emperor was concluded, we, who by a little dexterity might have duped France, who has duped us so often, instead of doing so, by the treaty of Hanover flung ourselves into her arms, and England's affairs seem ever since to have been managed by a French interest." He asserted

* The continuation of Carteret's speech was still more indecorous. "He may," said he, "have a little low cunning, such as those have that buy cattle in Smithfield market, or such as a French valet makes use of for managing an indulgent master, but the whole tenor of his conduct has shown that he has no true wisdom."

* At one time there were nearly 800 members present. Several of the members had secured their seats as early as six in the morning. The debate did not begin till one in the afternoon. The passages to the gallery were crowded, and an immense crowd was collected outside of the House.

that when we most needed assistance ministers had never demanded it from the French, because they knew that none would be granted. In the same manner he condemned the act of the Pardo, the treaty of Seville, and every other negotiation. He blamed Walpole for suffering the emperor to lose Sicily and Naples, and for permitting France to gain Lorraine. "That great man Admiral Vernon,"—for so it suited the purposes of party to style a man who was neither great nor wise—had represented all these things frequently, and had warned the House of Commons against the perfidy of France—"for which reason it was contrived that he should be excluded from the next parliament, and he was likewise denied his rank." The convention, about which so much had been said, was again held up to abhorrence; and, having finished with foreign politics, the long-winded motion-maker fell upon home affairs. Here he threw the entire onus of the South Sea Company mania upon Walpole, whom he directly accused of wicked, avaricious, and fraudulent views. He went deep into the sinking-fund, and averred that since the year 1727 it must have produced not less than fifteen millions, all which he said had been "spent in Spithead expeditions and Hyde Park reviews." Among the unconstitutional doings of the minister he counted the large standing army—bribery and corruption—penal laws of an arbitrary tendency—frequent votes of credit—the increased expenses of the civil list—the successful resistance to the abolition of burdensome taxes, proceeding from the principle that the collection of these taxes rendered necessary a great number of officers and placements—and the dismissing of officers from the army for voting against the excise scheme, which he called one of the worst projects ever set on foot by any minister. Having thus discussed foreign affairs and home affairs, Sandys went minutely into the management of this present war, declaring that everything that ought to have been done had been left undone, and that everything that ought to have been left undone had been done, and that the ministry had more particularly hampered and ill-treated the great Admiral Vernon. In concluding his harangue Sandys said—"I believe no one can mistake the person to whom I allude: every one must be convinced that I mean the right honourable gentleman opposite, and the whole House may see that the right honourable gentleman takes it to himself; that against him there is as general a discontent as there ever was against any minister. Yet, though this discontent has lasted so long, that right honourable gentleman continues in his post, in opposition to the sense of the country: This is no sign of the freedom of government, because a free people neither will nor can be governed by a minister whom they hate or despise. . . . This gentleman has arrogated to himself a place of French extraction, that of sole minister, contrary to the nature and principles of the English constitution. . . . If it should be asked why I impute all these evils to one person, I reply, because that one person has grasped in his own hands every branch of government; that one person has attained the sole direction of affairs, monopolised all the favours of the crown, compassed the disposal of all places, pensions, titles, ribands, as well as all-preferments, civil, military, and ecclesiastical; that one person has made a blind submission to his will, both in elections and parliament, the only terms of present favour and future expectation. . . . I therefore move that an humble address be presented to his majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to remove the Right Honourable Sir Robert Walpole from his majesty's presence and counsels for ever." Lord Limrick seconded the motion, declaring that the nation was reduced to the lowest state, that the reins of government were held by a sole minister, who lived by expedients, and who removed the best and ablest men in the army for opposing him in parliament. Next Mr. Wortley Montague, an enormously rich gentleman and the very dull husband of a brisk and witty wife, proposed that, according to many old precedents, Sir Robert should be ordered to retire from the House while his conduct was examined. Wortley Montague was seconded by Gibbon, but the motion was warmly opposed by Bromley and Howe, and the majority of the House seemed to consider the precedents quoted as very harsh to the party accused, or as altogether inapplicable. Gibbon then proposed that Walpole should be first heard in his own defence, and then ordered to withdraw; it being, he said, to be clearly understood, that neither the life and liberty nor the estate of the minister would be affected by the decision. It was urged, on the other side, that it was a most unprecedented mode of proceeding to charge a gentleman in general terms, by speeches only, without any written documents, without the statement of any particular facts, without any evidence of any kind; and then to expect that he should withdraw, and that other members should be permitted to load him with general accusations. Notwithstanding the absurdity and injustice of Gibbon's proposal, the opposition strenuously supported it; but at last, yielding to the general sense of the House, they withdrew it; and it was then resolved that the accused minister should hear every charge, and should be himself the last to speak. The House then reverted to the main question; and Pulteney, Pitt, Boote, Fazakerly, Littleton, and others, charged Walpole with as much acrimony as Sandys had displayed in the beginning. Pulteney, who probably had had a hand in the composition of Sandys's speech, merely played a lively variation upon it; but he particularly insisted upon the monstrous folly and crime of which the minister had been guilty in contracting alliances with the French court, and exalting the House of Bourbon at the expense of the House of Austria. Pitt declared that during Walpole's administration debts were increased and taxes multiplied at home, while abroad the system of Europe was totally subverted; and he held "that at this awful moment, when the greatest scene was opening to Europe that had ever before occurred, he who had lost the confidence of all mankind should not be permitted to continue at the head of his majesty's government." While other members of the opposition were comparing Walpole to the most worthless favourites and minions of royalty,—even to Piers Gaveston and Le Despenser,—and were charging him with crimes for which the scaffold seemed too mild a punishment, Edward Harley, the brother of the late lord-treasurer Oxford, displayed something that looked like magnanimity. "I have opposed the measures of administration," said he, "because I thought them wrong. . . . The state of the nation, by the conduct of our ministers, is deplorable; a war is destroying us abroad, and poverty and corruption are devouring us at home. But, whatever I may think of men, God forbid that my private opinion should be the only rule of my judgment. I should desire to have an exterior conviction from facts and evidences, and, without this, I am so far from condemning, that I would not censure any man. . . . A noble lord, to whom I had the honour to be related, has been often mentioned in this debate: he was impeached and imprisoned; by that imprisonment his years were shortened; and the prosecution was carried on by the honourable person who is now the subject of your question, though he knew at that very time that there was no evidence to support it. I am now glad of this opportunity to return good for evil, and to do that right honourable gentleman and his family that justice which he denied to mine." So saying, he left the House, and was followed by his relative, Mr. Robert Harley. The thorough Shippen, who in many respects merited his other name, "the honest," also refused to strike the falling minister. He declared that he looked upon the motion merely as a scheme for turning out one minister and bringing in another; that, as he had never any regard to his own private interest, it was quite indifferent to him who was in or who was out; and that he should give himself no concern in the question: and, so saying, he too withdrew, and was followed by thirty-four of his party. Shippen's behaviour has been accounted for by the following circumstances. Some time before the minister had discovered a correspondence which a Jacobite, a bosom friend of Shippen's, was carrying on with the Pretender, and which by law might have been punished even with death. Shippen called upon the minister and implored him to save his friend, and Walpole readily complied, saying to him, "Mr. Shippen, I cannot desire you to vote with my administration, for, with your principles, I have no right to expect it. But I only require, whenever any question is brought forward in the House affecting me personally, that you will recollect the favour I have now granted you."* But the conduct of Shippen is also accounted for in another way, which will equally explain (which the anecdote just related does not) the conduct of the rest of the high Tories and Jacobites, who were bound by no obligation, and who had given Walpole no such promise. Thomas Carte, the Jacobite historian, whom Queen Caroline had permitted to return to England, says distinctly, in a letter to the Pretender, that his party were irritated at the suddenness of Sandys's motion, and at their not having been previously consulted. "It was set on foot," writes Carte, "by the Duke of Argyll and the party of old Whigs, without either concerting measures with the Tories or acquainting them with the matter; so that, when it was moved in the Commons, Sir John Hynde Cotton and Sir Watkin Williams were forced to go about the House to solicit their friends to stay the debate, which they were vexed should be brought on without their concurrence: and all they could say could not keep Will Shippen and twenty-three others of the Tories from leaving the House in a body. All Prince Frederick's servants, and party also, except Littleton, Pitt, and Grenville, left the House; so that, though there were once above 500 members in the House, when the question came to be put there were not above 400 present."* There is still another reason given for the departure and non-voting of the Jacobites, and a strange one it is. In the midst of his embarrassments and difficulties Walpole himself addressed a letter to the Pretender, with the view of softening the animosities of his partisans in England; and it is said that James was induced to believe that George's prime minister intended to serve him, and sent suitable instructions to the Jacobite members.† How-

* Letter to James, in Stuart Papers, as given by Lord Mahon, Appendix.

† See Lord Mahon's Appendix.—Bolingbroke seems to have thought that the hot Tories or the Jacobites marred the business through a miserable blunder; and that if his friend and their great leader, Sir William Wyndham, had been alive, matters would have been managed very differently. In a letter to Hugh Earl of Marchmont, in which he calls England a despicable and despised country, he says,—“The conduct of the Tories is silly, infamous, and void of any colour of excuse: and yet the truth is, that the behaviour and language of some of those who complain on this occasion has prepared it, and given Shippen, who disliked the coalition (with the discontented Whigs) from the first as much as Walpole, a pretence to make his foals break it. . . . The reflection you make concerning our departed friend renews all the bitterness of sorrow that I felt when we lost him. He did not expect any more that I have long done, to render this generation of Tories of much good use to their country; and, though he came to it late, he came at last to have as bad opinions of Shippen as you see the man deserves. But still, if he had lived, he would have hindered these strange creatures (I can hardly call them men) from doing all the mischief they have lately done, and will perhaps continue to do.” Marchmont Papers.—But unless Will Shippen had been a finished dissembler, a Proteus like Bolingbroke, he could never have acted consonantly with the discontented Whigs, who wanted a change of ministers, but certainly no change of dynasty. Shippen, on the other side, wanted above all things the restoration of the Stuarts; and, being a blunt, warm-hearted, and hot-headed man, he hardly ever made a secret of his inclinations: at the meetings of the heterogeneous opposition he disgusted the discontented Whigs, or “the old Whigs” as they called themselves, by proclaiming the absolute necessity of bringing the Pretender to the throne; while among his more intimate friends he would often declare that he waited for instructions or orders from the Pretender before he would give his vote in the House of Commons. Shippen's great and rare merit seems to have been his disinterestedness in money matters. His vote was never to be bought. It was a dictum of Walpole that he would not say who was corrupted, but he would say who was not corruptible,—and that man was Will Shippen. He once refused a bribe of a thousand pounds from the Prince of Wales,—a wonderful stretch of virtue in those days.

* Coxe, Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole. The archdeacon says that this curious fact was communicated to him by a member of the Shippen family.

ever this may be, when the Jacobites were all gone, and when all the old Whigs had done speaking, Sir Robert rose to have the last word in defence of himself. The speech he delivered has been admitted to be his masterpiece; and, even as it is reported, it abounds with striking and most effective passages. He observed that the parties combined against him might be divided into three classes—the Tories,—the disaffected Whigs, calling themselves patriots,—and the boys. In fact, nearly every young man in the House was in opposition, as very young men, for the most part, are apt to be. To the first class Walpole's tone was mild and almost conciliatory, but it became sharp and cruel as a two-edged sword when he fell upon the disaffected Whigs. "These patriots," he exclaimed, "are such from discontent and disappointment, who would change the ministry that themselves might exclusively succeed. They have laboured at this point for twenty years, and unsuccessfully; they are impatient of longer delay. They clamour for change of measures, but mean only change of ministers. In party contests why should not both sides be equally steady? Does not a Whig administration as well deserve the support of the Whigs as the contrary? Why is not principle the cement in one as well as the other, especially when they confess that all is levelled against one man? Why this one man? Because they think, vainly, nobody else could withstand them. All others are treated as tools and vassals. The one is the corrupter, the numbers corrupted. But whence this cry of corruption and exclusive claim of honourable distinction? Compare the estates, character, and fortunes of the Commons on one side with those on the other. Let the matter be fairly investigated; survey and examine the individuals who usually support the measures of government and those who are in opposition. Let us see to whose side the balance preponderates. Look round both Houses, and see to which side the balance of virtue and talent preponderates. Are all these on one side, and not on the other? Or are all these to be counterbalanced by an affected claim to the exclusive title of patriotism? Gentlemen have talked a great deal of patriotism; a venerable word when duly practised. But I am sorry to say that, of late, it has been so much hackneyed about that it is in danger of falling into disgrace; the very idea of true patriotism is lost, and the term has been prostituted to the very worst of purposes. A patriot, Sir! why patriots spring up like mushrooms. I could raise fifty of them within the four-and-twenty hours. I have raised many of them in one night. It is but refusing to gratify an unreasonable or an insolent demand, and up starts a patriot! I have never been afraid of making patriots, but I disclaim and despise all their efforts. But this pretended virtue proceeds from personal malice and from disappointed ambition. There is not a man amongst them whose particular aim I am not able to ascertain, and from what motive they have entered into the lists of opposition." Proceeding to consider the articles of accusation which they had brought against him, and which they had not thought fit to reduce to specific charges, he spoke of foreign affairs first, and complained, with some reason, of the way in which they had managed the question, by blending numerous treaties and complicated negotiations into one general mass, by stigmatizing the whole diplomacy of Europe for thirty years past, and making him accountable for all its shiftings and changings, and all its mischiefs and errors. "To form a fair and candid judgment," said he, "it becomes necessary not to consider the treaties merely insulated; but to advert to the time in which they were made,—to the circumstances and situation of Europe when they were made,—to the peculiar situation in which I stand,—and to the power which I possessed. I am called, repeatedly and insidiously, prime and sole minister. Admitting, however, for the sake of argument, that I am prime and sole minister in this country, am I, therefore, prime and sole minister of all Europe? Am I answerable for the conduct of other countries as well as for that of my own? Many words are not wanting to show that the particular views of each court occasioned the dangers which affected the public tranquillity; yet the whole is charged to my account. Nor is this sufficient; whatever was the conduct of England, I am equally arraigned. If we maintained ourselves in peace, and took no share in foreign transactions, we are reproached for tameness and pusillanimity. If, on the contrary, we interfered in the disputes, we are called Don Quixotes and dupes to all the world. If we contracted guarantees, it was asked, why is the nation wantonly burdened? If guarantees were declined, we were reproached with having no allies." He showed that the balance of power in Europe, and the whole scheme of European policy, had been affected and altered by the peace of Utrecht, which suffered the Bourbon Philip to remain on the Spanish throne, but which was concluded long before he became minister. The Quadruple Alliance, he said, was the inevitable consequence of that treaty, but he was not accountable for that, though he had been unwillingly an accessory to the execution of it. He maintained that France was not to be considered eternally the enemy of England; that there were circumstances in which the interests of the two countries might coincide, and in which the friendship of France was more valuable than that of any other nation. The treaty of Hanover he defended as an indispensable measure to counteract the treaty of Vienna, which aimed at nothing less than depriving us of Gibraltar and Port Mahon, and forcing the Pretender upon us, while, in its continental bearings, it tended to produce the dangerous union on one head of the imperial crown, the crowns of France and Spain, the crowns of Austria, Hungary, Bohemia, &c., as Don Carlos, the son of the Spanish king, was to have married Maria Theresa, the emperor's eldest daughter. In concluding this subject Walpole said,—“I do not pretend to be a great master of foreign affairs. In that post in which I have the honour to serve his majesty it is not my business to interfere; and as one of his majesty’s counsellors I have but one voice; but if I had been the sole adviser of the treaty of Hanover, and of all the measures which were taken in pursuance of it, I hope it will appear that I do not deserve to be censured either as a weak or a wicked minister on that account.” He then went to the subject of the guarantee of the Pragmatic Sanction, expressing his surprise to find that a measure which, at the time, had been so universally approved both within doors and without, should now be objected to. All men, he said, agreed that the inheritance of the late emperor should be secured to his daughter, and not parcelled out among a number of claimants, or left to aggrandize some other power already sufficiently great and formidable. Even those who were now blaming him for the guarantee had insisted, in this very debate, on the necessity of preserving entire the dominions of the House of Austria, as something essential to the political balance of power in Europe. He maintained that that balance had been scarcely disturbed at all by Don Carlos’s conquests in Italy, for, though Austria had lost Naples and Sicily, she had got in lieu of them Tuscany, Parma, and Piacenza; and as to the power of France being increased by the acquisition of Lorraine, he said, with perfect truth, that that country for a long time had been a mere province, of which she had taken and kept possession whenever she pleased or whenever war broke out. As to the Spanish Convention, he said, again, that he had gone into it out of his love of peace, and in the confident hope that all differences might be accommodated in an amicable manner; and that, if Spain had honestly performed her part of that preliminary treaty, his hope would not have ended in disappointment and war. He urged that it was no fault of his if England had to carry on this war single-handed,—that other countries shunned her alliance because, at this crisis, they had other views and interests. “Sweden corrupted by France; Denmark tempted and wavering; the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel almost gained; the King of Prussia, the emperor, and the czarina, with whom alliances were negotiated, all dead; the Austrian dominions claimed by Spain and Bavaria; the Elector of Saxony hesitating whether he should accede to the general confederacy planned by France; the court of Vienna irresolute and indecisive. In this critical juncture, if France enters into engagements with Prussia, and if the Queen of Hungary hesitates and listens to France, are all or any of these events to be imputed to English counsels? and, if to English counsels, why are they to be attributed to one man?” He next passed to his conduct of domestic affairs, maintaining that, if guilty, the whole cabinet shared in his guilt,—nay, that if there was any ground for this imputation, it bore equally upon

King, Lords, and Commons: but that there was no ground for any such accusation; no proof of what was alleged; that no expenses had been incurred but what had been approved of and provided for by parliament; that he had practised no bribery or corruption (which was notoriously false); that, if some members of both Houses had been deprived of their commissions, or removed from their employments under the crown, they had been so removed because his majesty, who had a right so to do, did not think fit to continue them longer in his service. He was more successful in replying to Shippen’s charges against his administration of the sinking fund; and he showed that, within the last sixteen or seventeen years, no less than eight millions of the national debt had been actually discharged by the new application of that fund, and that at least seven millions had been taken from that fund and applied to the relief of the agricultural interest by the diminution of the land-tax. As to the South Sea scheme, it was no project of his; and he asked whether he had not been called on by the voice of the king and the unanimous voice of the nation to remedy the fatal effects produced by it? He proceeded with these pertinent queries:—“Was I not placed at the head of the Treasury when the revenues were in the greatest confusion? Is credit revived? Does it not now flourish? Is it not at an incredible height? and, if so, to whom must that circumstance be attributed? Has not tranquillity been preserved at home, notwithstanding a most unreasonableness and violent opposition? Has not trade flourished?” As to the conduct of the war, he said, “As I am, neither admiral nor general, as I have nothing to do either with our navy or army, I am sure I am not answerable for the prosecution of it. But, were I to answer for everything, no fault could, I think, be found with my conduct in the prosecution of this war. . . . If our attacks upon the enemy were too long delayed, or if they have not been so vigorous or so frequent as they ought to have been, those only are to blame who have for so many years been haranguing against standing armies; for, without a sufficient number of regular troops in proportion to the numbers kept up by our neighbours, I am sure we can neither defend ourselves nor offend our enemies.” In concluding his long and really eloquent defence, he said,—“What have been the effects of the corruption, ambition, and avarice with which I am so abundantly charged? Have I ever been suspected of being corrupted? A strange phenomenon; a corrupter himself not corrupt! Is ambition imputed to me? Why, then, do I still continue a commoner? I, who refused a white staff and a peerage. I had, indeed, like to have forgotten the little ornament about my shoulders (the ribbon of the Order of the Garter) which gentlemen have so repeatedly mentioned in terms of sarcastic obloquy. But, surely, though this may be regarded with envy or indignation in another place, it cannot be supposed to raise any resentment in this House, where many may be pleased to see those honours which their ancestors have worn restored again to the Commons. Have I given any symptoms of an avaricious disposition? Have I obtained any grants from the crown since I have been placed at the head of the Treasury? Has my conduct been different from that which others in the same station would have followed? Have I acted wrong in giving the place of auditor to my son, and in providing for my own family? I trust that their advancement will not be imputed to me as a crime, unless it shall be proved that I placed them in offices of trust and responsibility for which they were unfit. But while I unequivocally deny that I am sole and prime minister, and that to my influence and direction all the mensurs of government must be attributed, yet I will not shrink from the responsibility which attaches to the post I have the honour to hold; and should, during the long period in which I have sat upon this bench, any one step taken by government be proved to be either disgraceful or disadvantageous to the nation, I am ready to hold myself accountable. To conclude, Sir, though I shall always be proud of the honour of any trust or confidence from his majesty, yet I shall always be ready to remove from his councils and presence when he thinks fit; and therefore I should think myself very little concerned in the event of the present question, if it were not for the encroachment that will thereby be made upon the prerogatives of the crown. But I must think that an address to his majesty to remove one of his servants, without so much as alleging any particular crime against him, is one of the greatest encroachments that was ever made upon the prerogatives of the crown; and therefore, for the sake of my master, without any regard for my own, I hope that all those that have a due regard for our constitution, and for the rights and prerogatives of the crown, without which our constitution cannot be preserved, will be against this motion." It was four o'clock in the morning ere Walpole had done speaking, and then, upon a speedy division, Sandys's motion was rejected by a majority of 290 to 106. Carte says, in his letter to the Pretender already cited,—“Had all Sir Robert's actual opponents stayed, he would not have carried the question by above fifty votes; but the retiring of so many encouraged others to stay, and even vote for him, who durst not else have done it. Among those who so voted were Lord Cornbury, Lord Quarendon, the Earl of Lichfield's son, Mr. Bathurst, son of the lord of that name, and Lord Andover, son to the Earl of Berkshire; though the fathers of the three last voted against Sir Robert Walpole in the House of Lords.” On the same day that Sandys made his motion in the Commons, Lord Carteret produced its counterpart in the Lords;* and was strenuously supported by the Dukes of Argyll and Bedford, the Earls of Sandwich, Westmoreland, Berkshire, Carlisle, Abingdon, and Halifax, and the Lords Haversham and Bathurst. On the other side, the Dukes of Newcastle and Devonshire, the Lord Chancellor, Sherlock Bishop of Salisbury, the Earl of Ilay, and Lord Hervey spoke as warmly against the motion, which was finally rejected by a majority of 108 to 59. Thirty-one peers signed a hot protest. The Prince of Wales was in the House, but did not vote; and it was observed that Lord Wilmington, and several other peers holding places under government, neither voted nor spoke pro or con.* The peers' protest is said to have been prepared by the minister's arch enemy Bolingbroke, who could not be quiet in his rose-bowers at Chanteloup. “This weak attempt,” says Carte to the Pretender, “to ruin Sir Robert, has established him more firmly in the ministry; and he was never known to have so great a levee as the next morning; though it is marking him out to the nation, and ministers once attacked in such a manner, though the attack be defeated, seldom keep their posts long, by reason of the general odium; and the Duke of Buckingham had a worse fate in 1628.†” It appears that Walpole himself felt that his fall was only delayed for a season; at least, it is said, that he remarked to Sandys, in a private conversation, that they might get the better of him, but he was sure no other minister would ever be able to stand so long as he had done.‡ A recent writer, who, since expressing this opinion, has himself been tried in the same furnace, thinks that, after this victory, Walpole, tired of party war, and growing inactive from age, fell into a sort of lethargy of power, flattering his indolence with the belief that the opposition to his

Sandys, who went still further than he to make his court upon the tender point of Hanover. The next day the king's speech was to be considered in our House; when, before the meeting of the House, Carteret came up to the Duke of Argyll and myself, and said to us, ‘You heard what was done in the House of Commons yesterday; we shall do the same here to-day.’ We answered that we had not the least intention of doing the same, for that we should certainly oppose the motion; at which he seemed concerned and surprised. Accordingly the Duke of Argyll threw the first stone at the motion for the address, and I, the second and last; then Carteret opened himself with all the zeal and heat of a convert or an apostate, which you please, if a man can be called either who has no religion at all. We divided the House, not so much to show our own strength, which we knew, but his weakness; and, indeed, it appeared upon the division, he was left us but for numerosi only, that is, himself, Winchelsea, Roxburgh, and Berkeley of Stratton, who will not always go with him; the others who left us, such as Northampton and Oxford, doing it visibly upon other considerations. His Royal Highness behaved very silly upon this occasion, making Lords North and Darnley vote against us; such was the power of the natalis solus. This has hurt him much in the public. Our opposition in the House of Lords had liked to have spirited up one in the House of Commons in the committee, in which Pulteney would have been brought to the same trial as his friend Carteret, and I dare say would have acted in the same manner; but I prevented, though with difficulty, that opposition, because I plainly saw that it would be almost only a Tory opposition, and that Pulteney would have carried two-thirds of the Whigs present along with him; a triumph which I thought it better he should not have at the end of this parliament.”—Marchmont Papers.

* Hence Wilmington and the rest got the name of meeters.
 † Letter already cited. The Jacobite writer says, in continuation, “Sir Robert, however, is as yet absolute master of the administration; and as the squabbles and animosities between those left in it last year obstructed all business then, he will take care, probably, to have it so modelled, now that his master is going into Germany, for his purpose, that all the power will be in his own hands. I wish he may make a proper use of it.”

‡ Opinions of the Duchess of Marlborough.

* Chesterfield, in a letter to Lord Marchmont, relates what took place in the Upper House. “Pulteney gave up the point at once with alacrity in the House of Commons, seconded by your friend government was dispirited and dispersed.* But we confess that we can see no proof of this lethargy and inactivity, though we can see a thousand reasons why no vigour, no activity, no means within human control, could possibly have preserved him much longer in his evicted seat.

As all parties in parliament had seemed to agree in the necessity of supporting the fair heiress of the emperor,—as Maria Theresa, a female attacked by a confederacy of selfish princes, was a popular favourite in England,—and as George was not without alarm for the security of his German dominions,—it was presently resolved to do something in conformity with the obligations of our guarantee. On the 8th of April the king, in a speech from the throne, announced his determination to adhere to the engagements he was under, in order to the maintaining of the balance of power and the liberties of Europe. “The war which has broke out,” continued his majesty, “and the various and extensive claims which are made on the late emperor’s succession, are new events that require the utmost care and attention, as they may involve all Europe in a bloody war, and in consequence expose the dominions of such princes as shall take part in support of the Pragmatic Sanction to imminent and immediate danger. The Queen of Hungary has already made to us a requisition of the twelve thousand men expressly stipulated by treaty; and thereupon I have demanded of the King of Denmark, and of the King of Sweden as Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, their respective bodies of troops, consisting of 6000 men each, to be in readiness to march forthwith to the assistance of her Hungarian majesty.” The speech further imported that other measures were concerting to disappoint the dangerous designs carrying on against the House of Austria; that his majesty might be obliged to enter into still greater expenses for maintaining the Pragmatic Sanction; and that in a conjuncture so critical he desired the concurrence of his parliament in enabling him to contribute in an effectual manner to the support of the assailed and injured Queen of Hungary. When the debate came on in the Commons, Clutterbuck, one of the lords of the treasury, committed a great mistake by making too prominent his majesty’s alarms about Hanover. “We ought,” said this mal-adroit orator, “to pronounce that the territories of Hanover will be considered on this occasion as the dominions of England, and that any attack on one or the other will be equally resented.” The opposition, who could not in decency have said a word against the supporting of Maria Theresa, caught hold of this unlucky expression, and declared that, but for the fears about Hanover, the Austrian inheritance would have been left to run its chance—the Queen of Hungary would have been aided! Ever since the accession of the Georges the English people had been taught to loathe the very name of Hanover: any argument, any declamation about sacrificing their interests for the aggrandizement or preservation of that electorate, was sure to transport them; and therefore Pulteney made a long speech on the subject, affirming, among other things, that by the Act of Settlement, which advanced the present family to the throne, it was provided that England should never be involved in a war for the enlargement or protection of the dominions of Hanover—“dominions,” said Pulteney, “from which we never expected nor received any benefit, and for which therefore nothing ought to be either suffered or hazarded.” Walpole remedied the mistake of Clutterbuck by drawing attention from the electorate to that vast composite of states the Austrian empire, and by recapitulating the specific obligations we had contracted by the treaty in which we guaranteed the succession. He showed that the Dutch had engaged to supply the Queen of Hungary with 5000 men, and that it was agreed between the Dutch and ourselves to unite, if necessary, our whole force in the defence of our ally Maria Theresa, and in support of the balance of power. “By these stipulations,” said he, “no engagements have been formed that can be imagined to have been prohibited by the Act of Settlement, by which it is provided that the House of Hanover shall not plunge this nation into a war for the sake of their foreign dominions, without the consent of the parliament; for this war is by no means entered upon for the particular security of Hanover, but for the general advantage of Europe, to repress the ambition of the French, and to preserve ourselves and our posterity from the most abject dependence.” Sandys made a speech and said something about allegiance being due to the King of Great Britain and not to the Elector of Hanover; but an address in terms of assenting response to the royal speech was carried without a division; and on the 13th of April Walpole moved for and obtained—also without a division—a subsidy of 300,000*l.* to the Queen of Hungary. Yet this vote had scarcely passed ere Lord Carteret assured the court of Vienna that it was not owing to the good disposition of the ministry, but extorted by the unanimous voice of parliament and people; and by these and similar assertions Carteret and some of his party created a prejudice in Maria Theresa against Walpole, which made her turn a deaf ear to his suggestions for slight sacrifices of territory to secure the remainder.

On the 25th of April the parliament was prorogued by a speech from the throne, and, as it had sat nearly its limited term of seven years, it was dissolved immediately after, and writs were issued for new elections, returnable the 25th day of June. Walpole, well knowing the difficulties he should be left under, implored the king to put off his usual journey; but his influence was fast declining, George was anxious to get to Hanover, and he embarked on the 7th of May. About a month before his departure Frederick of Prussia won a great battle in spite of a lamentable display of per-brought to blush at the idea of falling upon a defenceless woman, tried hard to induce Frederick to lower his pretensions and display generosity and magnanimity, which were such beautiful things in a conqueror. The cold and wiry Prussian soon interrupted him by saying, "Talk not to me, my lord, of magnanimity! A prince ought first to consult his own interests. I am not averse to a peace, but I expect to have four duchies, and I will have them." At the same time Robinson was equally unsuccessful at Vienna. Weak as she was and as she knew herself to be—terrible as was the confederacy forming against her, Maria Theresa absolutely refused to yield to Frederick any part of Silesia, or to admit the justice of the Prussian claim. At last she most reluctantly agreed to buy a peace by giving up the Duchy of Limbourg and some other strips of land in the Low Countries. Yet in empowering Robinson to make this offer to Frederick she passionately exclaimed—"I hope he may reject it!" When Robinson arrived at the head quarters of the Prussian army and opened his commission to the king, he met precisely the kind of reception he expected, though probably he was not prepared for the stage-tone and action which the royal Prussian had learned from an attentive study of French tragedies and a close intimacy with French authors and courtiers. "Still beggarly offers!" cried this pupil of Voltaire; "since you have nothing to propose on the side of Silesia, all negotiations are useless. My ancestors would rise out of their tombs to reproach me, should I abandon my just rights." And, so saying, he took off his hat and rushed behind the curtain of his tent, after the fashion of a hero of a French tragedy, when something terrible is to be done. But, while Walpole sent Lord Hyndford as minister plenipotentiary from England, George sent to the same camp Mr. Schwickelt in the same capacity from Hanover; and, if we may believe Frederick himself, the Scottish lord and the Hanoverian were the bearers of very different messages. He says that Schwickelt offered the neutrality of his master George, if he would only cede or agree to the cession of certain territories to square the Electorate of Hanover! Frederick could lie, both royally and diplomatically; and, even though he narrates this story long after the events and the heats of the contest, some doubt may reasonably be entertained as to its truth, particularly when we reflect that a hatred of his uncle George was ever a strong passion in the mind of Frederick. Walpole also sent ambassadors or agents in other directions. He was well represented at the court of Russia by the Honourable Edward Finch, and it was agreed that a Russian army, assembled in Livonia, should act against Prussia, and thus oblige Frederick to divide his conquering army; but, unfortunately, France was all prevalent at the Swedish court; Sweden was made to declare war against Russia, and, owing to that circumstance, and to internal commotions and changes, Russia sent not a man in aid of Maria Theresa. Still, however, Frederick was alarmed by reports of the marching of Danish and Hessian troops in the pay of his uncle of England, and of demonstrations making in Saxony; and, seeing that he must have some great ally, or be quiet, he at length concluded the treaty offered by France, stipulating that it should be kept secret till the French arms were ready to act in his favour. He says himself that the secret was kept by the French; and he boasts how he succeeded in amusing Lord Hyndford and Schwickelt with empty negotiations as long as was necessary for his purpose. While fresh encouragements were given to the Jacobites to attempt another civil war in Scotland, the French court, where the pacific Cardinal Fleury had grown old and powerless, hurried Marshal Maillebois across the Rhine with one army, and detached the Marshals Belleisle and De Broglie with another. Maillebois, after crossing the Rhine, moved straight upon Hanover, where King George was then residing, and probably now wishing that he had taken Walpole's advice and remained in England. He was employed in assembling, reviewing, and drilling the troops he had subsidised, when he learned the rapid approach of the French. Too weak to stop their march, and dreading the worst for his electoral dominions, George hastened to conclude one year's neutrality for Hanover, stipulating that, during that period, she should afford no assistance whatever to Maria Theresa, and that, at the ensuing election of emperor, he, as an elector, would not give his vote in favour of her husband, who very unwisely pretended to the dignity. As soon as it was known in England this treaty excited universal indignation, and was denounced on every side as cowardly, selfish, and base. George had been very anxious for a war, but, personally, his débit was a most unfortunate one! In the mean while Belleisle and De Broglie, having joined the forces of the Elector of Bavaria, reduced the important city of Lintz, and pushed forward for Vienna. When these French and Bavarians had thrown their outposts within three leagues of her ancient capital, Maria Theresa departed with her infant son into Hungary, leaving her husband and his brother, Prince Charles of Lorraine, to defend Vienna.* But, in calculating the weakness of the Queen of Hungary, her enemies had overlooked her really strong point—which was the devotion and valour of her Hungarian subjects. She had gratified that high-spirited people by many previous condescensions: in the preceding month of June she had been crowned at their ancient capital according to their ancient and national forms; and she had taken the oaths to preserve their constitution, which, defective and wholly aristocratic as it was, had yet tended more than any other cause to keep alive their gallant spirit. Though she spoke not Magyar, or the ancient and very peculiar language of their country, she could discourse fluently in Latin, which all classes above the mere serfs used, and still use, as the general language of society, or as other nations employ French. She was then one of the most charming women in Europe; her countenance beautiful, her figure elegant, and her demeanour majestic. Now a fugitive and apparently abandoned by the rest of her subjects, she repaired again to the old walls of Presburg, where the Magnates and the other orders were assembled in diet or parliament. On the 11th of September she summoned them to attend her at the castle; and there, with her infant son, afterwards the Emperor Joseph II., in her arms, she addressed the assembly in a Latin speech, made the more touching by the occasional interruption of sobs and tears. When she came to the words—"The kingdom of Hungary, our person, our children, our crown, are at stake!—forsaken by all, we seek shelter only in the fidelity, the arms, the hereditary valour of the renowned Hungarian states"—the Magnates and all present, as if animated by one soul, drew their sabres half way from the scabbard, and exclaimed, "Our lives and our blood for your majesty! We will die for our king, Maria Theresa." Nor was this enthusiasm hollow or transient; the voice of war ran through the land; every Magnate flew to arms, and armed his vassals; every town—and there were several rich and flourishing, because they had been permitted to enjoy free municipal institutions—furnished troops, money to pay them, and provisions to support them; and the most distant provinces as the nearest—those who had only heard remotely of the beauty and distress of the queen, as well as those that were eye-witnesses—poured forth their warlike hosts, to fight to the death for Maria Theresa. In a country so poor in money, though rich in all natural products, the English subsidy of 300,000*l.* went a great way, and contributed very materially to the success of the war.

The Elector of Bavaria and the French marshal stopped short of Vienna, and turned aside into the kingdom of Bohemia, which was expected to be an easy prey. They advanced to Prague, the capital, and invested it. Prague was defended by Ogilvie, an Irish exile, with only 3000 men. Some of the Hungarian levies, headed by Maria Theresa's husband and his brother, moved rapidly to the relief of the Bohemian city; but before they could reach Prague it was taken. The Elector of Bavaria caused himself to be crowned as king of Bohemia, and then hurried away to Frankfort, where the Diet elected him emperor without one dissentient voice; George, as Elector of Hanover, being excluded from voting by the treaty he had made with the French. The solemn coronation of the Elector of Bavaria, who called himself the Emperor Charles VII., was not celebrated till the 14th of February of the following year, 1742, when this representative of the Cæsars was dying of gout and gravel, and scarcely able to stand.* In the mean time the King of Prussia, who had concluded a friendly treaty with the Elector of Bavaria before he became emperor, proceeded from one success to another, using both force and fraud with singular effect. By means of an intrigue of some Austrian old ladies, the important city of Breslau was taken without firing a shot, and the burghers took the oath of allegiance to Frederick. Count Neuperg was driven into Moravia by a lie: at the instance of Lord Hyndford, the court of Vienna had at length consented to cede Lower Silesia and a portion of Upper Silesia, and to withdraw Neuperg from that province, provided Frederick would declare upon his word that he would not attempt anything more against her Hungarian majesty. This temptation, says Frederick, was not to be resisted, the enemy being willing to rest satisfied with a verbal communication, which would acquire provinces to Prussia, and winter-quarters for her army, fatigued with eleven months of military labour.† This curious truce was, however, to be kept a profound secret; and the French and Bavarians were completely puzzled to see Frederick stop suddenly short in his career of conquest, and refuse to allow his army to act. He returned to Berlin; but, regardless of his promise, he left orders to Marshal Schwerin to push on his conquests at a proper moment; and, at the end of December, when the snow lay deep on the mountains, and when the Austrians expected no such attack, Schwerin rushed into Moravia, and besieged and took the important town and fortress of Olmutz. The French army, however, after getting a distant view of the old towers of Vienna, was driven out of Austria by Khevenhüller, who bravely pushed on into Bavaria, and eventually obliged the Bavarian army to abandon Prague and the whole of Bohemia, and hasten to the defence of their own country.

On our side the war had been attended with no success or glory. In the Mediterranean Admiral Haddock retreated before a Spanish fleet which had been suddenly joined by twelve ships of war from Toulon, and the commander of which announced that, though there was no war between France and England, he had orders to defend the Spaniards if they were attacked. There was no imputation on Haddock's courage, for the united ships of France and Spain doubled his own fleet. That great man of a party, Admiral Vernon, had proved himself a very little man in war. After the destruction of Porto Bello, nothing was done in Spanish America, or, we might say, worse than nothing. When Sir Chaloner Ogle and Lord Cathcart had joined Vernon at Jamaica,‡ the English armament was far greater than any that had ever been seen in those seas : there were thirty ships of the line, and nearly ninety other vessels, having on board 15,000 seamen, and 12,000 soldiers. Lord Cathcart caught the endemic fever and died ; upon which General Wentworth took the command of the land forces. After demolishing the insignificant fort Chagre on the Atlantic side of the Isthmus of Darien, they knew not what to do next. A council of war was called, which, as usual, led to conflicting schemes, jealousies, and irreconcilable hatreds. Some proposed to attack the Havannah, which lay to leeward, and might have been reached in less than three days, and which was said to be at that moment ill prepared for defence ; but Vernon, who had "the voice potential," preferred beating up against the wind to Hispaniola, in order to observe the motions of the French squadron collected there under the Marquis d'Antin, who continued to wear so dubious an aspect, that it was difficult to treat him either as a friend or as a foe. Many days were thus lost in beating and tacking in the teeth of the wind ; and then Vernon learned that d'Antin, with a greatly diminished crew and exhausted provisions, had slipped off for France. The English armament reached Hispaniola, took in wood and water, and turned back towards the Spanish main. Another council of war was called, and, as the Spanish admiral de Torres had now sailed to the Havannah with ample means of defence, it was resolved by Vernon to attack Carthage. But Carthage was strongly fortified, and Don Blas de Leso, an officer of experience and reputation, had just reinforced it, and lay there with a small squadron of large ships. Vernon, however, who was too rash and passionate to listen to advice, persisted in his plan of attack ; but, as if the climate had affected his intellect, when he had anchored a little to the windward of Carthage, he lay inactive for five days, and then the troops were landed on the islet called Tierra Bomba, near the harbour-mouth known by the name of Boca Chica, or little mouth, which, according to an eye-witness, was surprisingly fortified with castles, batteries, bombs, chains, cables, and ships of war. The British troops, however, effected their landing on the islet, covered their ground in good style, threw up a battery, and made a breach in the principal fort, being assisted by the admiral, who sent in a number of ships to divide the enemy's fire and attention. Lord Aubrey Beauclerc, a gallant officer, who commanded one of these ships, was slain. The Spanish ships that lay athwart the harbour's mouth were, however, soon destroyed or taken ; the land troops, advancing to the breach, carried the principal post, and found the rest of the forts and batteries abandoned ; the passage of the Boca Chica was cleared, and the fleet sailed into the immense harbour. The Spaniards abandoned the great outwork of Castel Grande without a blow ; but they continued strengthening Carthage till 300 cannon were mounted on the ramparts. Vernon, exulting in his partial success, sent home a ship with dispatches to the Duke of Newcastle, dated the 1st of April, 1741. "The wonderful success of this evening and night is so astonishing, that one cannot but cry out with the psalmist, It is the Lord's doing, and seems marvellous in our eyes." So wrote the admiral ; and so ready of belief were the English people, that they began to proclaim him the greatest of all commanders ; and men were singing his praises at tavern dinners and about the streets when he was retreating with a dishonoured flag ! After entering the harbour, the troops and artillery were landed within a mile of Carthage, all the Spanish outposts retiring before them. But then there was a pause, Admiral Vernon seeming to think that General Wentworth ought to take the town with his land troops, and Wentworth seeming to be of opinion that that office ought to be performed by Vernon and the sailors.* The general complained that the sailors lay idle, while his troops ashore were harassed and diminished by hard duty, fevers, and other distempers : the admiral affirmed that his ships could not lie near enough to batter the town with any effect, and he accused the soldiers of inactivity and want of resolution in not attacking the fort of San Lazaro, which commanded part of the town, and might be taken by escalade. The truth appears to be, that there were grievous faults on both sides—that Vernon was so slow in landing the tents, stores, and artillery, that the soldiers were left for three nights on the bare and fatally dewy ground, exposed to the fire of the enemy's guns without the means of returning it, and that afterwards Wentworth left open the communication between the town and the neighbouring country, by which the garrison was recruited and well supplied with provisions. If, however, we may rely upon Smollett, Vernon was by far the more faulty of the two. Stung by the reproaches of the admiral, Wentworth called a council of officers, and with their advice he attempted to carry Fort San Lazaro by storm. Twelve hundred men, headed by General Guise, and guided by some Spanish deserters or peasants, who were either ignorant, or, what is more likely, in the pay of the Spanish governor, whom they pretended to have left, marched boldly up to the foot of the fort ; but the guides led them to the very strongest part of part of the night, the enemy hoisted their colours in the morning, and appeared to be part of the French squadron which had sailed from Europe under the command of the Marquis d'Antin, with orders to assist the Spanish admiral, de Torres, in attacking and distressing the English ships and colonies. War was not yet declared between France and England ; therefore hostilities ceased ; the English and French commanders complimented each other, excused themselves mutually for the mistake which had happened, and parted as friends, with a considerable loss of men on both sides."—Smollett, Hist. Eng. Smollett was in this action, and has given a most spirited description of it in his famous sea-novel of Roderick Random. He was serving as assistant-surgeon, and was an eye-witness of most of the misdoings of this famous expedition.

‡ "As the fleet sailed along the island of Hispaniola, in its way to Jamaica, four large ships of war were discovered; and Sir Chaloner detached an equal number of his squadron to give them chase while he himself proceeded on his voyage. As those strange ships refused to bring to, Lord Augustus Pittroy, the commodore of the four British ships, saluted one of them with a broadside, and a smart engagement ensued. After they had fought during the best

* "The admiral and general had contracted a hearty contempt for each other, and took all opportunities of expressing their mutual dislike : far from acting vigorously in concert, for the advantage of the community, they maintained a mutual reserve and separate cables ; and each proved more eager for the disgrace of his rival than zealous for the honour of the nation."—Smollett, Hist. Eng.

the fortifications; and, what was worse, when they came to try the scaling ladders with which they were provided, they found them too short. This occasioned a fatal delay, and presently the brilliant morning of the tropics broke with its glaring light upon what had been intended for a nocturnal attack. Under these circumstances the wisest thing would have been an instant retreat; but the soldiers had come to take the fort, and with a bull-dog resolution they seemed determined to take it at every disadvantage. They stood under a terrible plunging fire, adjusting their ladders and fixing upon points where they might climb; and they did not yield an inch of ground, though every Spanish cannon and musket told upon them and thinned their ranks:—one party of grenadiers even attained a footing on the top of a rampart, when their brave leader, Colonel Grant, was mortally wounded. The grenadiers were swept over the face of the wall; but still the rest sustained the enemy's fire for several hours, and did not retreat till six hundred, or one-half of their original number, lay dead or wounded at the foot of those fatal walls. It is said that Vernon stood inactive on his quarter-deck all the while, and did not send in his boats full of men till the very last moment, when Wentworth was retreating. The heavy rains now set in, and disease spread with such terrible rapidity, that in less than two days one-half of the troops on shore were dead, dying, or unfit for service. Another council of war was therefore called; and it was then resolved to give up the enterprisé as desperate, to re-embark the land forces, and to sail away to Jamaica. They first, however, destroyed all the fortifications and outworks they had taken.* On board, says Smollett, one of the sufferers, "nothing was heard but complaints and execrations, the groans of the dying, and the service for the dead; nothing was seen but objects of woe and images of dejection. The conductors of this unfortunate expedition agreed in nothing but the expediency of a speedy retreat from this scene of misery and disgrace."

* Smollett says—"The admiral, however, in order to demonstrate the impracticality of taking the place by sea, sent in the Gallicia, one of the Spanish ships which had been taken at Boca Chica, to cannonade the town with sixteen guns, mounted on one side like a floating battery. This vessel, manned by detachments of volunteers from different ships, and commanded by Captain Hoare, was warped into the inner harbour, and moored before day at a considerable distance from the walls, and in very shallow water. In this position she stood the fire of several batteries for some hours, without doing or sustaining much damage; then the admiral ordered the men to be brought off in boats and the cables to be cut; so that she drove with the sea breeze upon a shoal, where she was soon filled with water. This exploit was absurd, and the inference which the admiral drew from it altogether fallacious: he said it plainly proved that there was not depth of water in the inner harbour sufficient to admit large ships near enough to batter the town with any prospect of success. This, indeed, was the case in that part of the harbour to which the Gallicia was conducted; but a little farther to the left he might have stationed four or five of his largest ships abreast within pistol shot of the walls; and, if this step had been taken when the land forces mustered to the attack of St. Lazaro, in all probability the town would have been surrendered."

After quarrelling for a while at Jamaica, Vernon and Wentworth, in pursuance of fresh orders from home, set sail for the island of Cuba. The fine land army of 12,000 men which had left England with Lord Cathcart, was now reduced to less than 3000:—to make it greater 1000 Jamaica negroes were drilled and added to it. They anchored in the bay of Guentnamo on the south-east of Cuba, and re-christened the place Cumberland Harbour in honour of his royal highness at home—and this was absolutely all they could do, for the town of St. Jago was deemed too strong for attack, and the troops, after being landed and left inactive for months, were re-embarked in November, and carried back again to Jamaica. But the muster-roll was sadder than if those troops had come from a fierce campaign—disease, bad salted provisions in a state of putridity, and excesses in rum had reduced the whites from 3000 to less than 2000. After these failures it was madness, or something worse, in the ministry to send out to Vernon, as they did, four more ships of war and 3000 more soldiers. The land crabs of the Caribbees ate most of those unfortunate men, and Vernon did nothing with an armament that from first to last cost millions of money and many thousands of lives. As bit by bit the dreadful intelligence was made public in England, the kingdom became filled with murmurs, and the people were depressed in proportion to the sanguine hope by which they had been elevated. They then, adds Smollett, began to perceive that they had mistaken the character of the great Vernon. That admiral, however, threw all the blame upon Wentworth, and most indecently and outrageously boasted in a dispatch to the Duke of Newcastle, that, if the sole command had been left to him, both in the Carthagena and in the Cuba expeditions, he would have taken the towns of Carthagena and St. Jago with the loss of much fewer men than had died.

These dismal occurrences, though they were not half known until a month after that struggle was over, had a great effect upon the general election, and rendered still more unpopular the ministry of Walpole—for people would not remember that he had done his best to prevent this war, and his political opponents who had driven him into it did not scruple to make him answerable for every failure. At the same time the opposition aided by the purses of the wealthy old Duchess of Marlborough, of Pulteney, and of the Prince of Wales, who incurred considerable debts in the purchase of boroughs, practised corruption and bribery to an unprecedented extent. By these and other means the ministerial candidates were defeated in many places, and before parliament met the thickly coming news of disaster and disgrace converted many men who had started as friends to the minister into enemies or querulous critics. To organise beforehand their modes of attack in the two houses the chiefs of the opposition had numerous meetings and conferences; and that nothing might be wanting Lord Chesterfield went over to

Avignon, and became the guest of the Pretender's ex-minister the Duke of Ormond, and by so doing procured from the Pretender letters to nearly a hundred of the principal Jacobites in England and Scotland, urging them to exert themselves against Walpole. With the most compact and harmonious cabinet that ever existed, this minister would not have been able to hide the storm; but his cabinet was more and more divided;—the Duke of Newcastle had opened a secret intercourse with the Duke of Argyll, and Lord Hardwicke the chancellor seemed determined to side with Newcastle in all things; Lord Harrington was incensed at Walpole's strictures upon his conduct in Hanover, where he was when his master King George was put to such straits by the rapid advance of Marshal de Maillebois; and as for Lord Wilmington he now thought himself great enough to be Walpole's successor in the premiership, though, as Sir Spencer Compton, he had fourteen years before thrown the cards into his hands and helped him to play them. When the king came over matters were not mended, for he was in an ill humour at the miserable exhibition he had made in his continental dominions, and was distracted by doubts and fears as to the result of the great confederacy between France, Russia, and Bavaria. He opened the new parliament on the 4th of December, in a speech in which he took care to remind the Houses that the war with Spain, in which he was engaged, had been entered into by the repeated advice of both Houses of parliament, who, moreover, had particularly recommended him to carry it on in America. He next mentioned the powerful confederacy formed against the Queen of Hungary, complaining that other powers that were under the same engagements as England with respect to the Pragmatic Sanction had not performed the promises they had so solemnly given. He said that he had used every possible endeavour to unite his allies in the common interests of Europe, and to reconcile the other princes and claimants; and he expressed a hope that a just sense of the common and approaching danger would produce a more favourable turn in the councils of the continental powers. The opposition in the new House of Commons allowed Arthur Onslow to be re-elected speaker without opposition; but they began their fight upon the address. Shippen moved an amendment to the effect that his majesty might be entreated not to engage the kingdom in war for the security of Hanover. Lord Noel Somerset seconded Shippen, and the now re-united Tories and discontented Whigs seemed anxious to divide the House and show their strength at once; but Pulteney, who was not quite sure of their numbers, told them that dividing was not the way to multiply. Walpole, embarrassed and dispirited, offered as a compromise the omission of the whole paragraph of the proposed address "for returning his majesty the thanks of this House for his royal care in prosecuting the war with Spain." This unusual concession was nothing less than a confession of hopeless weakness: Pulteney chose to consider it as a consciousness and confession of guilt, and that orator then proceeded to heap invective upon invective, until he went so far as to assert that Walpole was purposely ruining the nation to serve the Pretender. According to the partial authority of the minister's son, Sir Robert replied with as much spirit, as much force and command, as he had ever shown; and there was enough in the extravagance of Pulteney's declamations to restore him for a moment to his old vigour. He quoted some words which had been used by Chesterfield in the other House, and he hinted at that lord's secret mission to the Jacobites at Avignon. He asked whether he as minister had raised the war in Germany, or advised the war with Spain—whether he killed the late Emperor and King of Prussia—whether he was the counsellor of the ambitious and conquering Frederick—whether he had kindled the war between Muscovy and Sweden, which was preventing the czarina from assisting the assailed Queen of Hungary. And in conclusion, he said, that he was so far from wishing to evade a strict inquiry that if the gentleman who had arraigned his conduct would name a day for inquiring into the state of the nation, he would himself second the motion. Pulteney accepted the challenge, naming the 21st of January next; and Walpole keeping his word, seconded him. Meanwhile the whole clause about the Spanish war was struck out of the address, which was then passed unanimously.

But, before the grand contest of the 21st of January, there were several trials of strength on minor points. Walpole was defeated in the election of chairman of committees by a majority of 242 to 238.* But, on a motion for papers on the German negotiations, Walpole beat Pulteney by a majority of ten. The House was deluged with election petitions, the fruits of the animosities and unfair proceedings of both parties in the last general election, and election petitions were then decided upon, not, as in later times, by a select committee, but by the votes of all the House, which were always given from purely party motives, without any regard to justice or impartiality. In one of these election contests Walpole prevailed by a majority of only seven; and on the case of the Westminster election, in which the interference of the soldiery was proved, he was defeated by a majority of four. It was on this occasion that William Murray, afterwards Earl of Mansfield, who was retained as counsel for the petitioners, first won universal applause by his brilliant and persuasive eloquence. "Murray," says the minister's son, "spoke divinely, beyond what was ever heard at the bar."† The justices of Westminster, who had called in the soldiery, apparently because the riot and license at the hustings were alarming, had a day appointed for being reprimanded on their knees by the Speaker.

A. D. 1742.—If Walpole had consulted his own dignity he would assuredly have resigned before the declaration of war; but he clung to office even now, when the possession of it could only entail disgrace and wretchedness. Some allowance is to be made for use and long habit; and, after being for twenty years the real head of the nation, he probably considered the private life of a country gentleman monotonous and insupportable. He was rich and old; and, through continual vexations and incessant fatigues, the infirmities of age began to tell even upon his robust frame;‡ but still he wished to wear a crown of thorns to the last, and to die at the head of affairs. Some of his nearest friends ventured to suggest that he was losing daily, not only his adherents, but his health and his most enviable good humour; that he was becoming uneasy, fretful, and irritable; that it was utterly beyond his power to prevent the treachery of his colleagues; and that, finally, it would be more honourable and more safe to wrap his cloak about him and withdraw, than to stay for a few weeks or months to be stripped naked, dismissed, impeached! But all was of no avail; the old man thought (though, as he afterwards found, incorrectly) that life was not life without the premiership; and, to retain office, he had recourse to fresh schemes and intrigues, and to base, unpatriotic expedients. Fancying that he might gain his object if he could buy over the Prince of Wales and his party, he prevailed upon the king to offer his royal highness an additional 50,000*l.* a-year and the payment of all his debts, provided he would cease opposing the measures of government. Secker, Bishop of Oxford, was thought the proper messenger to carry this offer to the prince; but the prince declared that he would hearken to no proposals so long as Walpole continued in power.‡

* Letters to Mann.

† In the preceding month of October, Horace Walpole says:—"My father who used to be called in the morning, and was asleep as soon as his head touched the pillow, for I have frequently known him snore ere they had drawn his curtains, now never sleeps above an hour without waking; and he who at dinner always forgot he was minister, and was more gay and thoughtless than all his company, now sits without speaking, and with his eyes fixed for an hour together."—Letter to Horace Mann.

‡ "As many erroneous narratives of this transaction," says Coxe, "have been given to the public, I shall subjoin an account, which I found among the Walpole Papers, in the handwriting of Sir Robert Walpole, and bearing the following endorsement:—"An account of what passed between H. R. H. and Lord Oxford, January 5, 1741-2, with the printed letter that passed between the king and prince upon the breach." "An account of what the Bishop of Oxford said to the Prince of Wales, from Lord Cholmondeley, authorised by his majesty, January 5, 1742:—That if his royal highness would write a dutiful letter to his majesty, expressing his concern for what was past, in such a manner as might be consistent with his majesty's honour to accept, representing the uneasy circumstances of his fortune, and referring them to his majesty's goodness, Lord Cholmondeley had full and sufficient ground, from his knowledge of his majesty's intentions and dispositions, to assure his royal highness that his majesty would be reconciled to him, and would add 50,000*l.* a-year to his present income, and would not require any terms from him in relation to any of those persons who were in his royal highness's service, counsels, or confidences, nor retain any resentment or displeasure against him. To this Lord Cholmondeley added, that there was no doubt but that his royal highness's debt would in this

* The minister had proposed Giles Earle, a man of wit as well as of business; the successful candidate brought forward by the opposition was Dr. Lee. "You have no idea of their huzzas," writes the minister's son, "unless you can conceive how people must triumph after defeats of twenty years together. . . . They say Sir Robert miscalculated: how should he calculate when there are men like Charles Ross and fifty others he could name?"—Letters from Horace Walpole to Sir H. Mann.—This Ross, though under obligations and promises to the minister, suddenly deserted him; and those desertions now became very frequent.

The minister must have been weakened as well as disgraced by this strange proceeding. During the Christmas holidays Walpole and his enemies were alike busy conferring, planning, bribing, promising; but the opposition were the more successful: and Walpole's underling, the courtly, silky Lord Hervey, formed one of a triumvirate with Chesterfield and Pulteney. Bubb Dodington renewed his close alliance with the Prince of Wales; and, seeing that there could now be no danger from his boldness,—that the minister he had so long feared could neither punish nor reward, he wrote a letter to Lord Wilmington, urging him to use his influence with his majesty for the immediate dismissal of Sir Robert. Bubb, who was accustomed to write and talk about patriotism and “the noble simplicity of opposition,” wanted a peerage; but, though he contributed to that event, his wishes were not gratified till nineteen years after the fall of Walpole, and little more than one year before his own death. Parliament met, after the holidays, on the 18th of January; and on the 21st Pulteney began his great combat with the minister, protesting that his motion was not pointed against any particular person, but was simply intended to assist his majesty. Pitt, who was every day rising in consideration, and several others of the assailants, spoke to the same effect; but Lord Perceval, one of the “patriots,” who had been returned for Westminster without opposition on the re-election necessitated by the vote of the House, soon let out the secret, that the combat à outrance was intended against Walpole, for his lordship declared that he should vote for a committee of accusation. The veteran minister rose, and said that he must therefore take the question upon himself; and he then proceeded to deliver his last great speech. He inveighed with as much vigour as he had ever displayed against the personal malice of the opposition; he taunted them with their long series of failures and defeats; he told them that, for twenty years, they had not been able to touch him; and that, even now, in order to get near his heart, they had been reduced to a disgraceful subterfuge. He defied them to substantiate their charges, and assured them he wanted no favour but to be acquainted with their articles of accusation. If Bubb Dodington had been capable of blushing he must have blushed now; for Walpole designated him as a person of great self-mortification, seeing that for sixteen years he had condescended to bear part in that administration which case be provided for in such a manner as, upon further consideration, should be found most proper and practicable.” The answer of his royal highness, January 5, 1741-2.—His royal highness used strong expressions of duty and affection to his majesty, and answered further to this purpose—that, if this had been a message directly from his majesty, it would have been his duty to have written a letter to H.M. on the occasion; but, as it was a proposition that came from Lord Cholmondeley, in the manner I had mentioned, his answer to Lord Cholmondeley was, that he would not hearken to it so long as Sir Robert Walpole was in power, by whom he conceived himself to have been greatly injured, and to whom he thought the most prudent advice for Sir Robert Walpole himself, and the public, was, that he should retire; and that he, the prince, had before this received intimations of the same nature with those I had now said to him, and desired not to have any more whilst Sir Robert continued in power.”

he now termed infamous. According to one account Sir Robert also dissected Pulteney, and laid his heart open to the view of the House; and, according to all accounts, the old minister had never before displayed so much eloquence and so intimate an acquaintance with foreign affairs. Sir William Yonge, Winnington, and Pelham distinguished themselves by their speeches in support of the minister; but it was not eloquence or argument that was to carry conviction and decide this struggle. Men and parties had been packed, not to listen, but to vote and condemn; and, upon a division, Pulteney's motion was rejected, but rejected only by a majority of three. There had not been so full a house for many a year, each party having “whipped in” to the very utmost. Members were brought in from the bed of sickness; but, according to the story of a contemporary who was favourable to Walpole, the minister was far more careful of his sick men than the opposition were of theirs, and for that reason and by a paltry trick he lost several votes. The ministerial sick had been placed in an adjoining apartment belonging to Walpole's son as auditor of the exchequer, which communicated with the House; and some of the opposition, aware of this fact, filled the keyhole of the door with dirt and sand, which prevented the admission of these sick members into the House till the division was over.* The Prince of Wales was present in the House to share in the triumph. When a member was brought in to vote that had lost the use of his limbs, his royal highness said to General Churchill, who was friendly to Walpole, “So, I see you bring in the lame, the halt, and the blind.” “Yes,” replied Churchill, “the lame on our side, and the blind on yours!” After the mournful exhibition of his majority of three, Walpole made no opposition to an address to the king for copies of the correspondence with his Prussian majesty; and the motion, though it had been rejected on the 18th of December by a majority of twenty-four, was now allowed to pass without a division. But it was a disputed election that sealed the old minister's doom. On the 28th of January, in a vote upon the Chippenham election petition, he was defeated by a majority of one, or by 237 against 236. He

Of a full-charg'd confederacy.

His brother, his sons, and all his truest friends advised an instant retreat; and his colleagues or subalterns seem to have refused to act with him a day longer, declaring, all of them, that his retiring was become absolutely necessary, as the only means to carry on the public business. On the night of Sunday, the 31st of January, he got ready to retire to his splendid mansion at Houghton; and on the next morning, at a private audience, he informed his master that at last he must quit his service. George was not destitute of feeling; and such a separation, such a breaking of a connexion which had lasted so many years, and which, on the whole, had been so beneficial to his majesty's affairs, was enough to move a sterner heart. As Walpole knelt to kiss hands, the king fell on his neck, wept, kissed his cheek, and requested to see him frequently. The shade of Queen Caroline may at that moment have been in the mental vision of both king and minister. On the following day, the 2nd of February, Walpole sent a private intimation to the Prince of Wales, who must have joyfully announced his downfall to the opposition; for on that evening, when the House of Commons came to their final decision on the Chippenham election, the opposition majority of one was found to be swelled to sixteen. But, once having made up his mind to his fate, Walpole found that it was not so difficult to bear; and during the discussion, and upon the division, he was cheerful, and even facetious. Beckoning Sir Edward Baynton, the member whose return was supported by the opposition, to come and sit beside him, he pointed out to him several individuals, who were now voting against him, though they had begged and received great favours from him; said his time was come, and that he should never again enter that House. Next morning, the 3rd of February, Lord Chancellor Hardwicke intimated that it was his majesty's desire that the Houses should adjourn for a fortnight. On the 9th Sir Robert Walpole was created Earl of Orford, and on the 11th he formally resigned all his places. As we have repeatedly hinted, this great minister, in promoting the interests of his country, had not been neglectful of his own; and though he had indulged all along in a sumptuous hospitality and a most lavish expenditure of money, he withdrew a very rich lord; and the palace rather than house at Houghton, and the library and the splendid picture galleries there, denoted far different resources than his original patrimonial estate of 2000*l.* a-year. These, however, were not times in which statesmen served for nothing; there were few men of the day but would have paid themselves a higher price: a part of his large fortune had been made, not out of the exchequer, but in speculations on the stock exchange, which practice, bad as it might be, was many degrees better than that of some of his predecessors, who had taken money from France. Though not the best of possible ministers, Walpole was better and wiser than those who had gone before him—wiser, we believe, and more suited to the difficult circumstances of the times than any of his contemporaries or immediate successors. Still, however, we are not disposed to regret that he was driven from his post: he had seen his best days, and the country, under his care, had grown strong enough to do without a dictator or sole minister, which he indisputably, and, as we think, fortunately for England, was. In a country like this, one man, or one body of men acting under a single head, can hardly hope for a permanence of power; and, in spite of the frequent mischiefs resulting from changes, it is not desirable that they should. His downfall was hailed with enthusiastic joy by the people; but Walpole could take with him the proud satisfaction that he had secured the constitution and the Hanoverian succession; that the people who were cursing him had made rapid strides in wealth and civilization; that their general condition and the whole aspect of the country had been wonderfully improved under his long administration; and that he had never been harsh, cruel, or blood-thirsty, but had, on the contrary, moderated, in practice, the barbarities of the law, and made an execution for political offences a most rare spectacle. The nation, however, long continued to rail at the parting favours conferred upon him by his sovereign, and which included, besides the peerage, a pension of 4000*l.* a-year, and a patent of rank for an illegitimate daughter by a mistress whom he had subsequently married. It is true Sir Robert relinquished the pension; but two years after, when the storm was somewhat blown over, he sued for it and got it again. On the 11th of January, the day of his resignation, he went to a lodge he had at Richmond, never again, as he said, to return to the turmoils and vanities of a court. On that same day Lord Morton wrote to Duncan Forbes, President of the Scottish Court of Session, to say that he was in some fear about their common friend Sir Robert's safety. "The letter of rank for his daughter," says Morton, "has raised such a torrent of wrath against him, that God knows where it may end. They now talk of a strict parliamentary inquiry; your lordship knows how little any man can stand such an ordeal trial after twenty years' administration. The last time I saw him, which was on Sunday evening, I told him of the clamour that was raised upon the subject of his daughter; but the thing was then past the officers, and could not be recalled (though she had not been presented), else I believe he would have stopped it. I would fain hope, after he is fairly away, that the fury may subside; at present it is very violent; happy had it been for him, had he had your lordship now here; last week there passed a scene between him and me, by ourselves, that affected me more than anything I ever met with in my life; but it is too long to trouble your lordship with it; he has been sore hurt by flatterers, but has a great and an undaunted spirit, and a tranquillity something more than human."* But Walpole was not, like Wolsey, hounded down by his king, and left altogether naked to the fury of his enemies: in dismissing him, George consulted him as to the formation of a new ministry, and allowed him to bargain with his successor for security as to the past. His successor in the Treasury was none other than his old friend and tool Wilmington, the Sir Spencer Compton of former days, who might have been prime minister at the accession of George II., if he had possessed talent and spirit, and had not quailed before Sir Robert. In the new arrangements the leaders of the opposition were well high quarrelling among themselves, but they proposed nothing very dangerous to the retired premier. Anxious to keep out the Tories at all costs, Walpole had recommended George to appoint Wilmington first lord of the Treasury in case Pulteney should decline it; but in the first instance the offer was to be made to Pulteney, and it was actually made—through the mouth of the Duke of Newcastle—by the king, though he hated the man; and his majesty accompanied the message with the offer of full power to Pulteney upon the express condition that he should resist and defeat as premier any attempt to prosecute his predecessor. Pulteney at first replied, that if that condition was insisted upon he could never accept office, saying that, whatever might be his own inclinations, it might not be in his power to screen Walpole—"for the heads of parties are like the heads of snakes, carried on by their tails."* Still following the advice of Walpole, the king sent Pulteney another private message, and thereupon he quietly consented to let Wilmington slide into the premiership, which in such occupation could be little more than nominal. Lord Carteret thought that neither Pulteney nor Wilmington, but he himself, ought to have the highest post; but Pulteney told his lordship, that, if he would not acquiesce in Wilmington's promotion, he would take himself what had been offered to him. Carteret was flattered by a compliment paid to his knowledge of foreign affairs, and was fain to rest satisfied with the promise of being entrusted with the management of those affairs as secretary of state. All this was settled before Walpole resigned, and a few days after that great event the Duke of Newcastle, who saw that there was no hope of being premier himself, but who was resolved, if possible, to keep his seat in the cabinet, was commissioned by the king to conciliate Pulteney, and to obtain from him a promise, that if any prosecution were attempted against Sir Robert, if he could not oppose the motion, he would at least do nothing to inflame the debate. Pulteney replied that he was not a man of blood; that in all his denunciations of destruction he had meant the destruction of Walpole's power, but not of his person; that he could not say what was proper to be done, though he was free to confess that, in his opinion, some parliamentary censure, at the least, ought to be inflicted; and, finally, that he must consult his party and friends. Then his grace of Newcastle said a word for himself—as, that the king trusted Pulteney would not distress the government by making too many changes in the cabinet in the midst of a session of parliament. Pulteney politely replied, that he had no objection to the Duke of Newcastle or to the lord chancellor; but that he must insist that some obnoxious persons should be dismissed at once, and that he and his friends should have a majority in the cabinet, the nomination to the boards of treasury and admiralty, and the disposal of the office of secretary of state for Scotland—an office which had been abolished, but which they thought ought now to be revived. Being made easy as to his own place, Newcastle again advised Pulteney to take the premiership; but that patriot said modestly, that, as he had the disposal of all places in his hands, he would accept of none—that all that he wanted for himself was a peerage and a seat in the cabinet. And, according to the absolute dictum of this House of Commons orator, Wilmington was confirmed first lord of the treasury, Sandys the motion-maker was made chancellor of the exchequer, Carteret secretary of state, and the Marquess of Tweeddale secretary for Scotland. Nor was this the only security which had been procured for the fallen minister: the court had consented to disarm the fierce enmity of the Prince of Wales by actually giving him the additional 50,000*l.* a-year, and by promising that Lord Baltimore and Lord Archibald Hamilton, two of his steady adherents, should have seats at the new board of Admiralty. After this his royal highness had granted Walpole a private audience, and had assured him that his enmity was at an end, and that, instead of attacking, he would defend him if assailed by others.

When the ministerial arrangements were divulged, they threw the Tories into a paroxysm of rage; for the Tories, who had helped the opposition to gain their victory by confesing with them in the present parliament, got nothing—nay, not so much as a title or a promise. But this discontent was not confined to the Tories; all the leading Whigs that had not got a share of the ministerial spoils were as furious as they, and there presently arose a loud lament about the faithlessness of parties, and the iniquity of Pulteney and Carteret in treating and absolutely bargaining for themselves without consulting the great body of the opposition. Pitt, Lyttleton, the Grenvilles, and all those young men in parliament whom Walpole had been accustomed to call the "boy patriots," and who had done their best to prevent the arrangements which had been entered into, murmured the loudest of all, and sharpened their tongues and their wits for the continuation of the opposition harangues to which they had been so long accustomed. On the 11th of February, the very day of Walpole's formal resignation, a great Whig meeting was called at the Fountain Tavern in the Strand. Lord Carteret refused to go, saying that he never dined at taverns; but Pulteney went, and Sandys, the new chancellor of the exchequer, and nearly three hundred more, peers and commoners, most of them dissatisfied men. Lord Talbot filled a glass to the brim, and drank to cleansing the Angean stable of the dung and grooms. The Duke of Argyll, who had done as much against Walpole as any lord, and who had got nothing by the change, declaimed as if disappointment had turned him into a downright Jacobite, or as if he had been born and bred in Tory principles; and he finished a long speech by saying that nothing would go well until the Tories were provided with places as well as the Whigs, and the administration was founded "upon the broad bottom of both parties." Pulteney, in reply, made the tavern resound with protestations of disinterestedness, and with denials that he and his friends had selfishly taken the management of the negotiation into their own hands. As to the appointment of Tories, he said it must be a work of some time "to remove suspicions inculcated long, and long credited, with regard to a denomination of men who had formerly been thought not heartily attached to the reigning family." Motion-making Sandys also made a speech, saying that the king had offered him a place, and why should he not accept it?—that, if he did not, another would—or, if nobody would, his majesty would be obliged to employ his old minister again, which he fancied the gentlemen present did not wish to see. The meeting broke up in a humour much improved by wine and good cheer; "but," adds a recent writer, "what seems to have principally weighed with them was, that each remembered how many offices were still vacant, and hoped that some were reserved for himself or for his friends."* A few days after, a conference took place in the presence of the Prince of Wales, and the Duke of Argyll and the Lords Chesterfield, Cobham, and Bathurst pressed their claims on Pulteney and the friends he had put into office. In the end, Argyll obtained for himself a seat in the cabinet, the mastership of the ordnance, and the regiment of which he had recently been deprived by Walpole; and he procured, though not without opposition and difficulty, the promise of a seat at the new board of Admiralty for his friend Sir John Hynde Cotton, a declared Jacobite. Chesterfield got nothing; † Cobham, who had been dismissed on account of his opposition to the Excise Bill, was restored to the command of the Grenadier Guards, and made a field marshal. Cobham, who was maternal uncle to two of the "boy patriots"—Lyttleton and Grenville—could get nothing for his nephews. Gower and Bathurst got for the present nothing but promises for themselves or for their particular friends. As Lord Harrington chose to resign his secretaryship of state in favour of Carteret, he was created an earl, and made president of the council in lieu of Wilmington; Walpole's secretary-at-war, Sir William Yonge, and his paymaster of the forces, Mr. Pelham, brother to the Duke of Newcastle, were both allowed to remain in office. Having settled these matters, the Prince of Wales and all the leaders of the late opposition went to pay their respects at court, where none of them had appeared for a long time. George received his son very coldly. His majesty said, "How does the princess do? I hope she is well." The prince kissed his hand, and this was all.* On that same day the parliament met, and the voice of opposition seemed to be mute. But the king positively refused to admit Sir John Hynde Cotton to the place promised him in the Admiralty, saying, with some reason, that they ought not to expect him to employ and promote the enemies of his family, and declaring that he would stand by those who had set the House of Brunswick upon the throne in opposition to the will of the Jacobites. This made a new storm. The Duke of Argyll, who had insisted upon Cotton's promotion, and who, moreover, is supposed to have aimed at the entire authority in Scotland, and to have been irritated at the appointment of the Marquess of Tweeddale, thundered in the House of Lords, and the Tory party in both Houses expressed the utmost indignation at the rejection of the Jacobite Cotton, who, as a member of the House of Commons, had been almost as troublesome to the Whigs as the thorough-going Jacobite Shippen. This Tory opposition would have been insignificant enough if left to itself; but disappointment, irritation, and jealousy at once induced an abundance of Whigs to join it, and there was thus again a coalition of men of opposite principles, but one spite; discontented Whigs joining Tories and Jacobites, as they had done before in order to overthrow Walpole. The Prince of Wales himself grew dissatisfied, and soon began to cry down the government which he had helped to make. Wilmington, the nominal head of this government, had not improved in ability and energy in growing old; and Pulteney, who threw himself out of the Commons, his proper sphere, by taking a peerage and becoming Lord Bath, gave satisfaction to no party, but considerable disgust to the country. When towards the end of the session his creation was announced, the public everywhere called his peerage the price of his perfidy, and said that, though he had not taken places and money, which he did not want, being so very rich without them, he had sold his party and his country for a title and a seat in the House of Lords. As leader of the opposition in the Lower House, he had been accustomed to shouts of applause and vehement congratulations whenever he appeared abroad in the streets of London; but now he was hissed and hooted by his late admirers. It is said that Walpole artfully contributed to Pulteney's false step; †

* At the end of this conference, which took place at Pulteney's own house, Carteret being present, some news was brought in, and Newcastle drank—"To our happier meeting." To this Pulteney replied,—

"If we do meet again, why, we shall smile;
If not, why, then this meeting was well made."

† "Walpole was eager to secure the chief power in the future ministry to one whose enmity he did not fear. By his advice, it appears, the king sent a private message to Pulteney, requesting that, if he did not choose to place himself at the head of the treasury, he would let Lord Wilmington (Sir Spencer Compton) slide into that post. Carteret, who desired the place for himself, objected to this arrangement; but Pulteney having obliged him to consent, Walpole was fully satisfied. and that, when he, as Lord Orford, first met the new Lord Bath in the House of Peers, he triumphed over him with these cutting words—"My Lord Bath, you and I are now two as insignificant men as any in England." "In which," adds the narrator of the anecdote, "he spoke the truth of Pulteney my Lord Bath, but not of himself; for my Lord Orford was consulted by ministers to the last days of his life."* In the poignant words of Chesterfield, "the nation looked upon Pulteney as a deserter; and he shrunk into insignificance and an earldom." He and his party soon found how much more easy it is to condemn than to rectify; how many things that served to adorn an opposition speech are impracticable, or even undesirable, in office. But the people are never disposed to make allowances for these seeming discrepancies in the conduct of public men; and they expected, as the least that the new cabinet could do, that they should undo everything they had opposed, everything they had complained of and protested against, during the long reign of Sir Robert. There was no want of clamours and petitions from towns and counties for the punishment of the expelled minister: the electors of Westminster asked whether such as he were to be permitted the enjoyment of a private tranquillity; and others spoke as if the blood of Walpole ought to be shed upon the scaffold. The "boy patriots" urged on by these clamours and petitions, displayed much boldness of innovation; and nothing less was proposed than the putting down of any standing army whatsoever in time of peace, the strict limitation of placemen in parliament, and triennial parliaments instead of septennial. The mad cry was continued that Walpole had ruined the trade of the country; but it appeared that no man knew how to suggest the remedy for this greatest of all evils. If we are to believe Tindal "many of the towns were for reducing if not abolishing almost all taxes, though they all agreed in the wisdom and necessity of continuing the war with double vigour." On the 9th of March Lord Limerick, who had been intended for secretary-at-war, but who was afraid of vacating his seat by taking office, moved in the House of Commons for a secret committee to inquire into the administration of affairs by Sir Robert Walpole during the last twenty years. Pitt and that section strongly supported the motion, which was hotly urged by the Tories. Mr. Pelham, the principal member of the government who spoke, ably resisted Lord Limerick's motion; but Pulteney was not present, being engaged with a sick and dying daughter: as he, however, had intimated to his party his strong aversion to the measure, the ministerial bench had voted against Limerick, whose motion was lost by two votes in a House consisting of 486 members. But when Pulteney re-appeared he was bitterly reproached for his want of zeal in pursuing the old enemy; and thereupon this wavering statesman requested Lord Limerick to renew his motion in an altered shape, the forms of the House not allowing precisely the same motion to be reproduced in the same session. On the 23rd of March, Limerick rose and proposed the appointment of a secret committee to inquire into the ten last years of Walpole's administration; Pulteney not only voted but spoke in favour of the motion, and it was carried accordingly, the majority being 252 to 245. Pulteney, however, desired not to be named on the committee, and recommended moderation and fair play. The fallen minister's witty son Horace Walpole, though not so able with his tongue as with his pen, delivered a speech—the first he had ever made in the House—in defence of his father; and was answered in a fierce and ungenerous style by Pitt. They then appointed a committee to name the members of this secret committee of inquiry, a task which is said to have occupied them without intermission or rest for twenty-two hours. When the names of this secret committee were announced there were found to be among them only two decided friends of the ex-minister:—the rest of the twenty-one (the total number) were indifferent to his fate, or were his rancorous enemies. They chose Lord Limerick their chairman, and entered upon their investigation, not hesitating, in their active hatred, to attack and examine mountains of state papers and pyramids of treasury books. Sir John Bernard, the city member and financier, though so sturdy an enemy to the minister when in power, soon became disgusted with their unfairness, and declared that, since their views were not general, but particular, and all directed against one man, he would no longer take part in the labours of the committee. On the other side the king, who was in constant communication with Walpole and his friends, did all that he could to frustrate the inquiry and to encourage the obstinacy of witnesses in refusing to give evidence against their former patron and master. Mr. Edgcumbe, who had managed the Cornish boroughs for Walpole, and who might have told many a treasury tale, was raised to the peerage, and so shielded from the examination of the Lower House. Paxton, the solicitor to the treasury, was committed to Newgate for refusing to answer questions put to him; and this did not make other men more communicative, and Scrope, the secretary to the treasury, and several other officials resolutely refused to answer teney to the palace without his party; and when the king, conquering his aversion, allowed this to be done, he said to his son Horace, making a motion with his hand, as if locking a door, "I have turned the key of the closet upon him."—Lord John Russell, Mem. of Affairs of Europe.

* Doctor King's Political and Literary Anecdotes of his own Times.—This reformed Jacobite says, "No incident in this reign astonished us so much as the conduct of my Lord Bath, who chose to receive his honours as the wages of iniquity, which he might have had as the reward of virtue. By his opposition to a mal-administration for near twenty years, he had contracted an universal esteem, and was considered as the chief bulwark and protector of the British liberties. By the fall of Walpole he enjoyed for some days a kind of sovereign power. During this interval it was expected that he would have formed a patriot ministry, and have put the public affairs in such a train as would necessarily, in a very short time, have required all the breaches in our constitution. But how were we deceived! He deserted the cause of his country; he betrayed his friends and adherents; he ruined his character; and from a most glorious eminence sunk down to a degree of contempt."

the queries put to them by the committee, lest, as they said, they might criminate themselves, which they were not bound to do by any law. Recourse was then had to a very irregular and unjustifiable bill, which proposed to grant to every witness a full indemnity to himself, let his disclosures be what they might. Bad as was this bill, the Commons in their heat passed it by a majority of 12 in a House of 444. When carried up to the Lords it was supported by Chesterfield and Bathurst, but effectually opposed by Carteret and Hardwicke. The chancellor declared that this was a bill calculated to let loose oppression and perjury upon the world. "It is," continued he, "a bill to dazzle the wicked with a prospect of security, and to incite them to purchase an indemnity for one crime by the perpetration of another. It is a bill to confound the notions of right and wrong, to violate the essence of our constitution, and to leave us without any certain security for our properties or any rule for our actions." It was rejected by a large majority. The Commons were inflamed, and the violent and petulant Lord Strange, son of the Earl of Derby, moved a resolution that the proceedings of the peers were an obstruction to justice. Pulteney then thought it necessary to stand forward to prevent a collision between the two Houses, and upon a division Lord Strange was beaten by a majority of 52. This made some of the members of the secret committee more violent than they had been before, and Scrope, the secretary of the treasury, who still refused to answer their questions, was threatened and insulted in a terrible manner. But this old Whig, who in the days of his youth had fought for Monmouth at the battle of Sedgemoor, merely said, "that he was fourscore years of age, and did not care whether he spent the few months he had to live in the Tower or not, but that the last thing he would do was to betray the king, and, next to the king, the Earl of Orford."* As the best thing they could do, the committee dismissed old Scrope without further trouble. On the 30th of June, when the session was drawing to its close, the secret committee presented a report, alleging that, during an election at Weymouth, a place had been promised to the mayor if he would use his influence in obtaining the nomination of a returning officer, and that a living in the church had been promised to the brother-in-law of the mayor with the same corrupt design; as also that some revenue officers, who refused to give their votes for the ministerial candidate, had been dismissed; that a fraudulent contract had been given to Peter Burrell and John Bristow, two members of the House of Commons, for furnishing money in Jamaica towards the payment of the British troops, by which the contractors had gained fourteen pounds three shillings and twopenny halfpenny per cent.; that Walpole had employed for secret services, during the last ten years of his administration, much greater sums than had been expended in the like manner during any other ten preceding years; or that there was set down under the head of secret and special services between the first day of August, 1707, and the first day of August, 1717, no more than the sum of 337,960*l.* 4*s.* 5*d.*, whereas Walpole's sum for ten years amounted to no less than 1,453,000*l.* Part of this money had indisputably been spent in bribing and corrupting electors; but it can be proved almost to a positive certainty that the far greater part of it had been employed in foreign negotiations, or in smoothing the road to treaties and alliances with exceedingly poor and exceedingly mercenary courts. Besides, the parallel between the last seven years of Queen Anne and the first three years of George I. and the last ten years of Walpole was most unfairly drawn: the value of money was different at the two periods, and our foreign relations were far more complicated during the latter than during the former period—and, moreover, the committee took no notice of the allowance granted in Anne's time of 10,000*l.* per annum for procuring secret intelligence, or of the two-and-a-half per cent. deducted from the pay of the foreign troops in the service of Great Britain, and set down to the same secret service account; and they wholly overlooked the rather important sum of 500,000*l.* voted to Anne in 1713 to pay off her civil list debt. It is quite clear that, if on the one side impediments had been thrown in the way of their investigation, the secret committee on the other side had been as far as possible from the impartial and just spirit which ought to have guided their inquiry and dictated their report. These gentlemen gained no honour by their doings, for the report was received by the public with universal contempt, and their labours were compared to those of the parturient mountain in the fable that brought forth a ridiculous mouse. Personally, the character of the ex-minister seemed, in some respects, to gain by these proceedings; for, though he had so often been accused of being harsh and tyrannical to his dependents, there was not one of his subalterns in office, though threatened with severe punishment, and, no doubt, tempted by the offer of rewards, that would speak against him or betray any of his secrets.

Sir Robert Godschall, lord mayor and member for the city, and a very dull heavy man besides, brought forward a motion for the repeal of the Septennial Act. Pulteney, who was not yet gone to the Lords, opposed this repeal with all his might, though it had been the burthen of some of the longest and best of his opposition speeches. On the motion of Pulteney five hundred thousand more pounds were granted to the Queen of Hungary; and a supply of more than five millions was voted for carrying on the war with vigour. Little else passed worthy of notice during this session, which was closed on the 15th of July, when his majesty in the prorogation speech intimated that a treaty of peace was concluded between her Hungarian majesty and the King of Prussia under his mediation. Lord Gower was now appointed keeper of the privy seal in the room of Lord Hervey, and Lord Bathurst, a Jacobite, as Gower was, or had been, was made captain of the band of gentlemen pensioners in the room of the Duke of Bolton. But the party called "the boys" still remained out of place and out of humour. Carteret prevailed upon his colleagues to send 16,000 men to serve as auxiliaries to the House of Austria in Flanders; but the result of the British campaign in the great scene of Marlborough's glory is told in a very few words. The Dutch would not act with them, nor make any vigorous effort in support of the Pragmatic Sanction, and our troops remained in Flanders "idle, unemployed, and quarrelling with the inhabitants."* But, fortunately for her, Maria Theresa did not depend upon the States General or upon English auxiliaries. Her best General Khevenhüller, continued to serve her well in the field, and doubts and misgivings as to the intentions of France crept into the cabinet of Frederick of Prussia, and of most of the minor princes, who had entered into or had favoured the confederacy. A battle gained by the Prussians in the month of May at Czaslau, in Bohemia, had, moreover, the effect of inducing the Queen of Hungary to be less tenacious about Silesia; and, as she agreed to yield that province to Frederick, all present obstacles to a peace were removed, and a treaty between them was signed in the month of June. Left to themselves, the French who had penetrated into Bohemia or the other hereditary dominions of Austria could neither maintain their footing nor extricate themselves without tremendous loss. Marshal Belleisle made his renowned retreat, which has been considered as a masterpiece in war; yet when he got across the Rhine he found that, of the 35,000 men he had conducted with him into Germany, he had not brought back more than 8000. The Marshals Maillebois and De Broglie, who were acting with the Elector of Bavaria, or, as he was now styled by one part of Europe, the Emperor, remained yet awhile in his electoral dominions.

As the Queen of Spain had obtained Naples and Sicily for her son Don Carlos, she thought she might acquire some other sovereignty south of the Alps for her younger son Don Philip. This scheme of hers produced a great effect in the Peninsula: the King of Sardinia, who had contributed to the conquest of Naples by suddenly declaring against the House of Austria, now as suddenly broke his alliance with the Bourbons of France and Spain, allied himself with Maria Theresa, and enabled her troops to drive the Spaniards out of Lombardy, where Montemar lost nearly half his army. To keep in check Don Carlos, who was collecting an army at Naples, and who had already sent troops to Upper Italy to co-operate with the Spaniards and his brother Don Philip, the English government dispatched Commodore Martin with five ships of the line. Martin, when no such bold measure was expected, sailed into the bay of Naples, and, without firing the usual friendly salute, lay to, off the city, and sent a messenger on shore to inform the king that Great Britain, as the ally and confederate of Austria, and as the enemy of Spain, proposed to the two Sicilies an absolute neutrality in this war; that if his Sicilian majesty would accede to this proposal, and engage in writing to withdraw his troops from the Spanish army and to remain neutral, no harm should happen to him; but that, if he refused, the English men-of-war would bombard his city. Don Carlos and his court were thrown into consternation, for the city was without defences and almost without any garrison, and the people, according to their wont, were beginning to riot. The Neapolitan ministers endeavoured to gain a little time, and sent a noble messenger on board the English commodore to debate and defer proceedings; but Martin, a decided sailor of the true stamp, pulled out his watch, laid it upon his cabin table, and told them that in two hours' time he should begin to bombard. Upon this the Neapolitan counsellors of state, who had been assembled in a hurry, loudly declared to the king that nothing was left for them but to accede to the neutrality; and then Don Carlos wrote out the promises required of him, and, at the same time, a letter to his general, the Duke of Castropignano, commanding him to leave the Spaniards and return home with the Neapolitan troops forthwith. The haughty messenger of the English commodore, says a native historian, insisted upon reading this letter to Castropignano. He then returned on board, and Martin, who had done his business, sailed out of the bay and was lost sight of before night. When he was gone, the Neapolitans thought of fortifying the city and port, and of building some ships of war; but Don Carlos kept the promises he had made, and wisely remained neutral until the armics of Maria Theresa attacked him in his own territories.* Another English sailor behaved with equal decision. Haddock, who had done nothing in the Mediterranean, was recalled, and succeeded by Admiral Matthews, who took out seven additional ships. One of Matthews's captains, irritated by the strange conduct of the French, who acted as enemies, though there was as yet no declaration of war, followed five Spanish galleys into the French port of St. Tropez, and attacked and destroyed them there, in spite of the French flag, which had so often been allowed to cover the ships of Spain in similar circumstances. In other directions our navy did little to distinguish itself. Captain Smith and Captain Stewart with two frigates engaged three Spanish ships of war near the island of St. Christopher's and fought them till night, when the Spaniards withdrew in a shattered condition. The Tilbury, a ship of sixty guns, was accidentally set on fire and destroyed off the island of Hispaniola:

127 men perished; but the rest were saved by Captain Hoare of the Defiance. While we were planning a land expedition across the Isthmus of Darien to attack Panama—a scheme which came to nothing*—the Spaniards, with 4000 men, fell upon our new colony of Georgia, and began to march for Frederica, the capital; but the gallant and philanthropic General Oglethorpe defeated them in two encounters, and, with merely a handful of men, he drove them out of the colony after they had suffered a terrible loss.

The king and the Duke of Cumberland had at one moment thought of proceeding to Flanders to take the command of the 16,000 British troops there; and they had even embarked their baggage; but the arrival of the old Earl of Stair, who had had the command of those troops, and the return of Lord Carteret, who had been sent to the Hague to quicken the Dutch, altered his majesty's determination. The plain truth was, the States General would risk nothing in this war, and the Dutch merchants were carrying on a profitable trade at the expense of the English. Parliament met on the 16th of November, when George told them that he had augmented the British forces in the Low Countries with 16,000 Hanoverians, and 6000 Hessians; that the magnanimity and fortitude of the Queen of Hungary and the resolute conduct of the King of Sardinia had done wonders; that Sweden had applied to him for his good offices in procuring a peace with Russia; that he had concluded defensive alliances with the Czarina and the King of Prussia—events which could not have happened if Great Britain had not manifested a reasonable spirit and vigour in defending and assisting her ancient allies, and maintaining the liberties of Europe; and that he must still recommend the same spirit, vigour, and prudence, as essential to the success of our war with Spain, and the re-establishment of the balance and tranquillity of Europe. The address proposed by ministers encountered some resistance, particularly in the Upper House from the Earl of Chesterfield. But the opposition reserved their fire till the 10th of December, when Sir William Yonge, as secretary-at-war, intimated that we must pay for the 16,000 Hanoverians (the 6000 Hessians had been already provided for under a convention made in Walpole's time), and proposed a grant of 657,000*l.* for maintaining these troops from August, 1742, till December, 1743. Sandys, the new chancellor of the exchequer, who had delivered so many sonorous speeches against Hanover and Hanoverian interests, and the folly and wickedness of employing mercenaries, supported the secretary-at-war, apparently without a blush at his inconsistency. The terrible ex-cornet of horse, Pitt, said that it was now too apparent that this great kingdom was considered only as a province to a despicable electorate, and that, in consequence of a scheme formed long ago, and invariably pursued, these troops were hired only to drain this unhappy nation of its money. Sir John St. Aubyn and others spoke with equal heat; but, when they came to a division, the new opposition found that they could only muster 193 against the ministerial majority of 260. The remodelled cabinet had had the good sense to strengthen itself with the splendid abilities of William Murray, whom they had made solicitor-general; and Murray, in his first speech in parliament, which was about the British troops in Flanders, proved that he could cope even with Pitt as an orator and debater. The learned, eccentric, and almost republican Lord Stanhope, son and successor of the late prime minister of that name, delivered a remarkable speech in the House of Lords against this constant subsidising and engaging of mercenaries.* Alluding to the Hanoverians more particularly, he said,—“The country these troops come from makes it probable they will frequently be taken into our pay, and that affairs abroad will be embroiled for the sake of lending them. . . . Why should not some regard be had to the opinion of the people, who will always judge right from the end, though not of the means, as well as to the inclinations of rulers, who may aim wrong in both?” And Stanhope concluded by moving an address that his majesty would be graciously pleased to exonerate his people from those mercenaries taken into pay without consent of parliament. Lord Sandwich seconded Stanhope, talking with great contempt of Hanover; and the Duke of Bedford enlarged upon the same subject. Lord Hervey, evidently because he was out of place, attacked the Hanoverians, whom he had so often defended; and Lord Bathurst, just as evidently because he was in place, defended the Hanoverians whom he had so often attacked. Lord Carteret replied to Stanhope and the opposition in general; and Pulteney, speaking for the first time in that House as Lord Bath, made use of the very arguments which Walpole had so often employed, and for which that minister had been so often taunted by him and his party. On the division, ministers had a majority of 90 to 35; but two members of the new cabinet, Lords Cobham and Gower, voted with the minority. The public expected that they would be both dismissed for this conduct; but they were allowed to remain in office. None were so clamorous against the employ-

* All kinds of schemes had been entertained and proposed by various individuals in high offices and employments. Thus, at the beginning of the war, when the conquest of the Spaniards in America seemed so easy, we find Trelawney governor of Jamaica writing to Duncan Forbes, under date of the 29th of August, 1740—“I am very warm for a project which a great many will look upon as visionary and ridiculous, but I think far from being so; and that is, to restore the Indians to their liberty, and put them into the possession of their own country, driving out the Spaniards, and only keeping for ourselves a fort or two at most in the South Sea to have communication between the two seas; for the rest of the country, let the natives, to whom nature has given it, enjoy it; and let us only have a commerce with them, which is more beneficial than having the land, which we could not inhabit. By the best accounts I have, the thing is feasible, and I think right; so I could put my hand to the plough with pleasure.”—Colleton Papers.

* “He spoke a pre-composed speech, which he held in his hand, with great tremblings and agitations, and hesitated frequently in the midst of great vehemence; but his matter was not contemptible.”—*B.S. ment of the foreign troops as the Jacobites, who knew that 22,000 men would have great effect on the war, and defeat their hopes of succour from France and Spain—for these insane men were still corresponding with both those countries and plotting with increasing activity in Scotland as in England.

A. D. 1743.—Walpole, in 1731, at the passing of the Gin Act, had foretold that it would encourage fraud and increase drunkenness. When those severe duties were imposed they were intended to check the drinking to excess of what Smollett styles “the pernicious spirit called gin, which before was sold so cheap that the lowest class of the people could afford to indulge themselves in one continued state of intoxication, to the destruction of all morals, industry, and order.” This historian, who witnessed the horrors he describes, continues—“Such a shameful degree of profligacy prevailed that the retailers of this poisonous compound set up painted boards in public, inviting people to be drunk for the small expense of one penny; assuring them they might be dead drunk for two-pence, and have straw for nothing. They accordingly provided cellars and places strewed with straw, to which they conveyed those wretches who were overwhelmed with intoxication. In these dismal caverns they lay until they had recovered some use of their faculties, and then they had recourse to the same mischievous potion; thus consuming their health and ruining their families, in hideous receptacles of the most filthy vice, re-sounding with riot, execration, and blasphemy. Such beastly practices too plainly denoted a total want of all policy and civil regulation, and would have reflected disgrace upon the most barbarous community. In order to restrain this evil, which was become intolerable, the legislature enacted that law which we have already mentioned. But the populace soon broke through all restraint. Though no license was obtained and no duty paid, the liquor continued to be sold in all corners of the streets: informers were intimidated by the threats of the people; and the justices of the peace, either from indolence or corruption, neglected to put the law in execution. The new ministers foresaw that a great revenue would accrue to the crown from a repeal of this act; and this measure they thought they might the more decently take as the law had proved ineffectual: for it appeared that the consumption of gin had considerably increased every year since those heavy duties were imposed. They, therefore, pretended that, should the price of the liquor be moderately raised, and the licenses granted at twenty shillings each to the retailers, the lowest class of people would be debarred the use of it to excess; their morals would of consequence be mended; and a considerable sum of money might be raised for the support of the war, by mortgaging the revenue arising from the duty and the licenses.”* Upon these principles the new bill was framed, proposing, in addition to the twenty shilling licenses, that a small duty per gallon should be laid on the spirits at the still head. It passed through the House of Commons with the utmost precipitation, and almost without the formality of a debate. But in the Lords it encountered a vigorous resistance, being denounced as a license to the people to poison themselves,—as “a bait spread over the pitfalls of debauchery,”—as an attempt to raise the revenue at the expense of the health and morals of the people.* Chesterfield, who was becoming more and more eloquent by being left out of place, prophesied that, if the bill passed, it would depopulate and absolutely ruin these kingdoms. Lord Hervey, the former lord privy seal, spoke against it, and proposed that eminent physicians should be summoned to the bar of the Lords to prove the fatal effects of gin drinking; and Lord Gower, the new privy seal, voted for it. “These two noblemen,” says Smollett, “had exchanged principles: the first was hardened into a sturdy patriot; the other supplanted into an obsequious courtier.” The whole bench of bishops voted with the opposition, yet the bill was carried by a great majority. When the question was put for committing the bill, and the bishops were joining in his division, Chesterfield said, “I am in doubt whether I have not got on the other side of the question; for I have not had the honour to divide with so many lawn sleeves for several years.” A faint attempt was made by Mr. Waller, seconded by Sir Watkin Wynn, to renew the inquiry into the ministerial conduct of Walpole; but a vast majority declared against any such proceeding. As Walpole had been accused by the secret committee of prosecuting and persecuting the mayors of boroughs that had opposed his interest, a bill was prepared by the opposition for securing the independence of corporations, but it was rejected on a division. Having voted for the year 40,000 seamen and 11,000 marines, 16,000 British troops to serve in Flanders, and 23,000 for guards and garrisons at home, and six millions of money as supplies, the parliament was prorogued on the 21st of April, when his majesty told the Houses that, at the requisition of the Queen of Hungary, he had ordered his army on the continent to pass the Rhine for her support and assistance.

Immediately after the prorogation George hastened over to Germany accompanied by his son, the Duke of Cumberland, and attended by Lord Carteret as secretary of state, and by many other noblemen and gentlemen. The pacific Cardinal Fleury had died at the beginning of the year, in the ninetieth year of his age. For a long time he had been overruled and driven into measures which he disapproved, but his death removed the only hope there was of France being induced to remain at peace with England. His power as minister was divided between Count d’Argenson, minister of war, and Cardinal Tencin, who was devoted to the House of Stuart, which had favoured his advancement in the Roman church. Bolingbroke had been so extremely intimate with the cardinal's sister, a woman of wit and intrigue in the Parisian fashion of those days, that he was even supposed by some to have been the father of the celebrated mathematician and philosopher d'Alembert, of whom she was the reputed mother.* Bolingbroke, who had written and talked so pathetically about leaving his unhappy country for ever, returned to England in the month of January, and fixed his residence at the family seat near Battersea, whither he drew around him most of the wits of the time, and all the opponents of ministers. He still directed many of the attacks in parliament, but it appears that he never again corresponded with the Stuarts. He had seen enough of the Pretender, and could never forgive the treatment he had received at his hands.

The French ministers d'Argenson and Cardinal Tencin sent a considerable army under the Duke de Noailles to support de Broglie in Germany; but, before these reinforcements arrived, de Broglie had been compelled to retreat to the banks of the Neckar; and the poor emperor, "beloved of the French," had been defeated by the Austrians and driven out of his hereditary states to seek shelter as a helpless fugitive in the free city of Frankfort.† Hotly pursued and sorely harassed by the excellent Hungarian cavalry, de Broglie hardly stopped until Noailles brought up 12,000 men; but he then faced about, and endeavoured to keep in check Prince Charles of Lorraine, while Noailles, whose army, even after the deduction of the 12,000 men, amounted to 60,000, crossed the Rhine, and pushed towards Frankfort, which was now threatened by the united army of English, Hanoverians, Hessians, and some Austrian regiments from the Low Countries, under the Duke d'Arenberg. The supreme command was still in the hands of the Earl of Stair, who was too old for action, and perhaps somewhat too scrupulous, as he respected the neutrality of Frankfort, and so lost an excellent opportunity of finishing one part of the war by making the emperor his prisoner. Stair was on the northern bank of the Maine when Noailles and the French approached its southern bank. This confronting of the two armies was somewhat embarrassing, as there was still no declaration of war between France and Great Britain, both countries professing to act merely as auxiliaries to their respective allies, and there being at the moment a British minister at Paris and a French minister in London. Stair, however, as an old practitioner, knew enough of the insignificance of diplomacy to be quite certain that if two such armies met they must fight: but to fight he was not prepared; and with the view of establishing communications with the Austrian forces behind him, and of obtaining reinforcements from Hanover, he retreated before the French. Noailles followed him so closely, and so completely out-manceuvred him, that he cut him off from his magazines at Hanau, and left him almost without bread and forage. To make matters worse, Stair and d'Arenberg disagreed as to what was to be done; and the French, after depriving them of the resources collected at Hanau, succeeded in intercepting their communications with Franconia, whence they might have derived sufficient supplies of provisions. Affairs were in this critical state—the united army being cooped up in a narrow valley that runs along the river Maine from the town of Aschaffenburg to the large village of Dettingen—when King George, with the Duke of Cumberland and Lord Carteret, arrived at headquarters from Hanover. The force of the allies was reduced to 37,000 men, and these were put upon half rations, while the horses of the cavalry were starving for want of sufficient forage; the Hessians and Hanoverians that were to join them had marched upon Hanau, where the magazines were, and were equally cut off from the main army, and were in danger of starving or being taken by the French. Still, however, the soldiers were full of heart, and George was no coward. After holding several councils of war, the king resolved to get out of that narrow valley at all hazards, and force his way back to Hanau. According to a French authority, if he had stayed only two days longer in that position, he would have been obliged to sacrifice his horses from want of forage. But George was watched by a far superior force, and by a general who was exceedingly quick-sighted. Noailles, as soon as he saw the allies in movement, altered his position so as to point on their flank and rear, and he detached his nephew, the Duke de Grammont, with 23,000 men to secure the defile of Dettingen. He also threw up batteries on the opposite bank of the river Maine, having previously thrown two bridges across that river, which served for the advance of de Grammont and to keep open the communications between him and his uncle. It was on the 27th of June when the allies marched towards Dettingen in two columns. George commanded in person in the rear, which he considered the post of danger, being as yet ignorant of Noailles's change of position, and of the movement of the Duke de Grammont; nor did he find out his mistake till he saw the heads of his columns suddenly halt, and his advanced posts running back from the defile of Dettingen. This unwelcome sight was soon succeeded by another—the French showed themselves in great force in the Dettingen pass. George instantly halted his columns, and riding from the rear to the front, the real post of danger, he made his arrangements for a battle, placing his infantry before and the cavalry behind. He was by this time completely shut up in the valley, for a French division of 12,000 men had pushed into Aschaffenburg, which he had left behind him, and his flank was now exposed to the batteries on the bank of the Maine. Nothing was left but to surrender or cut his way through the defile, which was fully occupied by Grammont, and covered by a morass and a small rivulet in front. But the rashness of Grammont relieved George from this jeopardy; while his uncle, Noailles, who had given him strict orders not to move, was bringing up other divisions from the opposite side of the Maine to make the pass of Dettingen still more terrible, he rushed from the village in the ravine, crossed the rivulet, and engaged the allies in front. As the French approached with a tremendous noise, George's horse took fright, and, with the bit in his teeth, nearly carried his majesty into the midst of the enemy. But a lucky hand stopped him in time; and then the king, dismounting, put himself at the head of his British and Hanoverian infantry, flourishing his sword, and addressing a few encouraging words to his men. His speech to the English was short and suitable;—"Now, my boys," said he, "now for the honour of England! fire, and behave bravely, and the French will soon run!" His son, the Duke of Cumberland, was also in front, on the left, and behaved as staunchly as his father. At the first onset Grammont and his impetuous cavalry threw the allies into some confusion; but the steady foot soon rallied; and at this critical moment the batteries across the Maine suspended their fire, which they could not continue without striking their countrymen as well as their enemies; for they were mixed. George, in person, formed his infantry into one dense column, and charged with them till they broke de Grammont's squadrons, and pushed both horse and foot before them. Noailles, from the opposite side of the river, beheld the fatal mistake of his nephew, and tried to redeem it; but, before he could get to Dettingen, the affair was decided, and Grammont's men were in headlong retreat, and so panic struck that he could not rally them. The French made for the bridges across the Maine; the English pursued them with the sabre and bayonet in their loins: multitudes were killed before they could reach the bridges; others, in their mad speed, rushed into the river or fell over the choked-up bridges, and were drowned; others, throwing down their arms, tried to escape by running up the hills on the opposite side of the valley, and were for the most part taken prisoners without a blow. Altogether the loss of the French, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, was estimated at 6000. The English and their allies lost, in killed and wounded, about 2000 men, including many officers of rank. Generals Clayton and Monroy were killed; the Earl of Albemarle, General Huske, and others were wounded. The king, who had exposed his person as much as any of them, was not touched. This much-famed battle of Dettingen lasted till four o'clock in the afternoon, and George remained on the ground till dark at night. The Duke of Cumberland, though wounded in the leg, had refused to quit the field. Both father and son displayed the greatest personal bravery; but, as for generalship, there was none in the allied army. The great merit rested with the unflinching infantry of England and the steady Hanoverian foot. When the battle was over the allies were still without victuals, drink, and tents to lie in; but the road to life well-furnished magazines of Hanau was now opened, and thither they marched, after a short rest, leaving their wounded behind them on the field at the mercy of the French.* Lord Stair, though wounded in the shoulder, proposed that instead of going back to Hanau they should go forward and pursue the French; but provisions were indispensable, and, though de Grammont had been so thoroughly defeated, nearly one-half of the French army had never been engaged at all, and the junction of those retreating with those who had not fought and were fresh for action would still have presented a force far superior to that of the allies. There remains, however, to be considered the effect of a sudden panic, and of a closely pursued advantage; but as some time was lost in deliberation, and as the stomach arguments were so strong, it was generally considered that George did well in rejecting the advice of the brave old Scotch lord. Stair, nevertheless, continued to think that his advice ought to have been followed.† George reached Hanau and obtained provisions and the columns expected from Hanover, and, his force being thus nearly equal in numbers to the whole French army, Stair again proposed a pursuit; but his advice was again rejected, and then his lordship quarrelled with Hanoverians, Hessians,‡ officers,* princes, and all. But another battle, in reality, was hardly necessary—de Broglie, to whose assistance Noailles was marching into the heart of the empire, was driven across the Rhine (near Mannheim) by the troops of the Queen of Hungary, under the command of her brother-in-law, Prince Charles of Lorraine; and thereupon Noailles burnt his magazines, retreated towards Worms, crossed the Rhine on the 17th of July, and joining de Broglie, left the German frontier to return in a lamentable plight to his own country. Thus abandoned, the Elector of Bavaria, or Emperor beloved of the French, who was without an army and almost without a shilling, prostrated himself before the House of Austria and signed a neutrality for his hereditary states, which, however, were to remain in possession of the Queen of Hungary, whose armies had overrun and occupied them, till the conclusion of a general peace. The quarters of King George, at Hanau, were made the centre of negotiations for this peace, and his majesty was flattered with the honour of being named mediator; but Maria Theresa, heroic in her misfortunes, was not moderate in her successes, and as, besides, the Elector or Emperor Charles wanted English money to carry him through, the negotiations came to nothing. George's chief companion and adviser in all these matters was Carteret, who, though nominally only secretary of state for foreign affairs, was in reality prime minister of England—for Wilmington had immediately sunk into a man of straw. When the king at length moved from Hanau, he went to Mayence, crossed the Rhine there, and took his post at Worms, while Prince Charles of Lorraine, with the Queen of Hungary's army, made a corresponding movement, and fixed himself on the left bank of the Rhine. Nothing less had been talked of than a joint invasion of France; but the united force seemed insufficient, the different commanders could not agree, the autumnal rains were beginning, and it was presently resolved—and again in spite of the advice and remonstrances of Stair—that the season was too far advanced for further hostilities, and that they had better all go into winter quarters. Stair, the Duke of Marlborough, who had been serving as second in command, and many other English officers, threw up their commissions in disgust, and returned to England, complaining most bitterly of the Hanoverian generals, and of the slowness, indecision, and obstinacy of our German allies generally. The king soon followed these discontented officers into England, leaving his troops in Flanders in nearly the same cantonments they had moved from at the opening of the campaign. But before his departure from the continent, George, having Carteret still acting with him, signed at Worms a very important treaty with Austria and Sardinia. In return for an annual subsidy of 200,000*l.* from England, the cession of some Italian districts from Austria, the supreme command of the allied forces beyond the Alps, and other advantages expressed or understood, his Sardinian majesty engaged to assist the allies with an army of 45,000 men, and to give up to Maria Theresa all the pretensions he had advanced to the Duchy of Milan. By another clause of this treaty of Worms George engaged to keep a very strong fleet constantly in the Mediterranean to co-operate with the King of Sardinia in his Italian or other wars. The campaign in that peninsula had been indecisive, but, on the whole, unfavourable to Spain. Count de Gages, who had succeeded Montemar in command of the Spanish army, engaged the Austrians under Count Traun at Campo Santo, and captured a few guns and flags; but de Gages could not maintain himself, and in the autumn he retreated towards the Neapolitan frontiers, to take refuge with Don Carlos.

We have said that the real power of the government rested with Carteret, and that Wilmington was little but a name; but Wilmington died more than two months before the conclusion of the treaty of Worms, and was succeeded by Pelham, who was about equally powerless. Pulteney now aimed at the post, but he was defeated by the influence of Walpole, who, though out of place, was more powerful, or at least could do more with the king, than all the cabinet put together. Pelham was allowed to make places or promotions for his particular friends Henry Fox and Lord Mordaunt. The paymastership of the forces, which he had held himself, he gave to Winnington; and as he wanted the office of chancellor of the exchequer for himself, he was allowed to sweeten the dismissal of Sandys with a peerage and a place in the household. Pelham was considered by Walpole as well qualified to manage the treasury, and the House of Commons, and as an old servant, who, if not too grateful, was too mild and amiable, to turn upon his old master. When Lord Gower resigned the privy seal, Pelham was permitted to give it to Lord Cholmondeley, in spite of the efforts of Lord Bath (Pulteney), who wanted it for Lord Carlisle.

* To his honour Marshal Noailles treated these unfortunate men in a most humane manner. But the leaving the wounded behind was severely censured.

† Shortly after Voltaire met Lord Stair at the Hague, and coolly asked him what he thought of the battle of Dettingen. "I think," replied the Scot, "that the French made one great mistake, and the English two: yours was, not standing still; our first, engaging ourselves in a most dangerous position, our second, falling to pursue our victory."

The parliament was opened on the 1st of December. In the Upper House the opposition was weakened by the deaths of Lord Hervey and the Duke of Argyll; but in the Commons it was strengthened by the still growing powers of Pitt in debate, and by the conversions to the popular side made by the course of events abroad. An attempt, however, against the ministerial address was defeated by a majority of 278 to 149. Pitt, as loud against Carteret as he had formerly been against Walpole, denounced his lordship as an execrable, a sole minister—the Hanover troop minister—a flagitious task-master, with the 16,000 Hanoverians as his placemen, and with no other party. When it became known that these Hanoverian troops were still to be continued in the pay of England, and that great subsidies had been promised to the King of Sardinia, the people raised a shout of indignation, and Pitt in the Commons and Chesterfield in the Lords assailed Carteret more violently and more successfully. That injudicious minister was accused of a readiness to sacrifice his country for the sake of the king's favour, which was only to be kept by abetting his Hanoverian partialities, and promoting his ruinously expensive continental schemes. Out of doors—and sometimes as much was hinted within—Carteret was accused of being a drunkard and a madman. "He is never sober," writes Horace Walpole, "and his rants are amazing, but so are his parts and his spirit." The historian Carte said in a letter to the Pretender—"One good effect of Sir Robert Walpole's removal is, the bringing of this new set of ministers into power, whose measures have already done your majesty so much service. There never was a bolder, more blustering, and hot-headed minister than Carteret; and the consequence of all the steps which he inspires will be seen into and felt the first moment. . . . It was certainly no very politic declaration which Carteret made publicly as soon as he got into power, namely, that it was impossible to govern England but by corruption."*

A. D. 1744.—Now, assailed as they were by motions in both Houses, by popular petitions, and by debates night after night, every member of the cabinet except Carteret began to think it expedient to drop the question of the foreign troops, and commit the king's honour by leaving unvoted and undemanded the money for the foreign subsidies; but Carteret was firm, and Lord Orford (Walpole) encouraged him in his firmness, and overcame the fears of Pelham and the rest of the ministry. "The whole world," says Horace Walpole, "nay, the prince himself, allows that if Lord Orford had not come to town the Hanover troops had been lost." Walpole, who had never before spoken in the House of Lords, declaring that he had left his tongue behind him in the Commons, delivered a long speech on this occasion, being quickened by repeated messages from the king, and by his majesty's declaration to both Houses (on the 18th of February), that he had received undoubted information that the Pretender's eldest son was arrived at Paris, and in concert with some of his disaffected subjects was preparing to make an invasion, supported by a French fleet. The aged ex-minister, who was suffering under an acute disease, spoke with astonishing animation: he said he could not easily have believed that it could ever have been necessary for him to appear on such an occasion as this; he conjured their lordships to have regard to their sovereign, and to the obligations they and the country owed to his House; he represented our imminent danger at a time when the greatest power in Europe was setting up a pretender to the throne, and when only the winds had hindered an invasion. "I have, indeed," continued his lordship, "particular reason to express my astonishment and my own uneasiness,—I feel my breast fired with the warmest gratitude to a gracious and royal master, whom I have so long served; my heart overflows with zeal for his honour, and ardour for the lasting security of his illustrious house. But, my lords, the danger is common, and an invasion equally involves all our happiness, all our hopes, and all our fortunes. It cannot be thought consistent with the wisdom of your lordships to be employed in determining private property when so weighty an affair as the security of the whole kingdom demands your attention; when it is not known that at this instant the enemy has not set his foot on our coast, is ravaging our country with fire and sword, and threatening us with no less than extirpation and servitude." Frederick Prince of Wales, forgetting the deep enmity of years, quitted his seat, and taking Walpole by the hand, expressed his gratitude. The speech had an instantaneous effect upon the whole House, and for the present not a word more was said about discharging the Hanoverians, or reducing our army, or weakening our alliances by stopping subsidies. The Duke of Marlborough, notwithstanding his recent resignation and loud complaints, hastened up to London to move a loyal address; the Earl of Stair, equally forgetting recent quarrels, offered his sword to his sovereign—offered to serve in any station; and, in the Commons, Pitt and the other leaders of the opposition ceased their assaults, and energetically pleaded the necessity of supporting his majesty's government. The high Tories and Jacobites were awed into silence, and withdrew from parliament. The Habeas Corpus Act was suspended for two months; a bill, brought in by the opposition in the Commons, provided that the penalties on treasonable correspondence with his children; and the Lords added an additional clause to attain the sons of the Pretender in case they should attempt to land.* The subsidy of 200,000*l.* was promptly granted to Sardinia; 300,000*l.* were allotted to Austria; and, on the whole, the Commons at this crisis voted near ten millions as necessary supplies. In the month of May, when parliament was prorogued, Lord Orford retired to his seat at Houghton, suffering greatly both in body and mind—for he was far from feeling confident either in the wisdom of ministers or in the steadiness of the English people. His brother even apprehended "that the people might perhaps look on and cry 'Fight dog, fight bear,' if they did no worse." There was, however, no lack of loyal addresses and declarations in favour of fighting to the last against the French and the Pretender. According to the old rule, a proclamation was issued for enforcing the penal laws against Roman Catholics and non-jurors, and for commanding all papists whatsoever to depart from the cities of London and Westminster; and from within ten miles of the same; for confining the papists to their houses, for seizing the arms and horses of such as refused to take the oaths, &c. The Earl of Barrimore, an Irish peer, a member of the House of Commons in England, and the oldest lieutenant-general in our service, was taken into custody at his house in Henrietta-street, Cavendish-square; and Colonel Cecil was also arrested; but both were soon released. The magistrates of Edinburgh offered, of their own accord, 6000*l.* to any man that should apprehend either the Pretender or his eldest son.

That eldest son and heir to the misfortunes of the Stuarts was indeed coming:—King George's message to the Houses was perfectly correct—he was in France, and the French were helping him.

The pressing invitation came again from Scotland, which had too soon forgotten the mischievous effects of the attempt of 1715. The association of the most zealous Scottish Jacobites entered into at Edinburgh in the year 1740 was signed by Lord Lovat, Lord James Drummond, commonly called Duke of Perth, Lord Traquair, Sir James Campbell of Auchinbreck, Cameron of Lochell, John Stuart, brother to Lord Traquair, and Lord John Drummond, uncle to the Duke of Perth. This act of association was carried to the old Pretender at Rome by Drummond of Bochaldu, a near relation to Cameron of Lochell, together with a list of such Highland chiefs as the subscribers thought would join the standard of the Stuarts if it only came accompanied by a body of French troops. James, having read the papers, thought the project practicable and well-timed; for the clamour against Walpole was then at its height, and, knowing little of England or of English humours, the old Pretender fancied that the voice of party was the voice of revolution. He sent the papers brought by Drummond to Cardinal Fleury, at Paris, accompanying them with a request that the French minister would afford that assistance and co-operation which was now, as formerly, a sine quâ non with the northern Jacobites. The French court replied as formerly, that they could not venture men and money unless the Scots could prove to them that their insurrection was likely to succeed. The cardinal himself was averse to the undertaking; but when the continental war broke out on the death of the emperor the pacific influence of Fleury terminated, and, from her close alliance with Spain, and the conditions of the family compact, France deemed herself bound to distress Great Britain, and was sufficiently unscrupulous as to the means she employed. These motives became the stronger when British troops began to act as auxiliaries on the continent, and when British money and British credit were evidently assisting to maintain the House of Austria and to frustrate the schemes of the great confederacy for spoliation. In the month of February, 1742, Drummond of Bochaldu came privately over to Edinburgh, to assure the Jacobites that Cardinal Fleury had the Pretender's interest so much at heart, that, provided he could only obtain assurances similar to theirs from the Jacobites of England, he would venture an army of 13,000 men, 3000 of which should be landed in Scotland, while 10,000, under the command of the renowned Marshal Saxe,* should land in England as near to London as possible, and carry with them Prince Charles, the Pretender's eldest son. It appears that Bochaldu went beyond the letter of his instructions in several particulars, and that, though the scheme had been proposed to him, the Pretender had not yet made up his mind to send over his son with these promised French troops. Drummond found that the seven conspirators who had signed the association, being joined by many others, had formed themselves into a society which they called "The Concert of Gentlemen for managing the King's affairs in Scotland." With all these he communicated personally, and he waited at Edinburgh till Cameron of Lochell came to town and conferred with him. He then returned to Paris to assure the French ministers that the prospect of success was en-

* This clause, proposed by the lord chancellor, passed unanimously; but another harsh and barbarous clause for extending the penalties of the act to the posterity of those who should be convicted under it, during the lifetime of both the young Pretenders, was vehemently opposed, and was passed with so much difficulty as proved that it would become practically a dead letter.

* Marshal Saxe, now one of the best officers in the French service, was a natural son of Frederick Augustus II., king of Poland, by the Countess Maria-Aurora of Königsmark, sister of the count of that name that was murdered at Hanover as the suspected lover of the wife of George I., and also sister to the other Count Königsmark, who had murdered Mr. Thynne in the streets of London by means of three hired assassins.—See English Causes Celebrated.

couraging in the utmost degree. After his audience Drummond, by letter, assured Lord Traquair and the "concert of gentlemen" that the French designed to put their scheme in execution that very year. But nothing was done or attempted, and the Scottish Jacobites began to apprehend that Drummond had deceived them, or that Cardinal Fleury had deceived him, and that France did not seriously intend an invasion of a country with which she was still nominally at peace. In the beginning of the following year (1743) Murray of Broughton, a member of the secret society of Jacobites—one of the concert—went over to Paris to learn from the cardinal himself what he really intended; but before Murray reached the French capital the cardinal was dead. The Jacobite envoy, however, waited upon M. Amelot, secretary for foreign affairs, who told him that the cardinal had delivered to him all the papers relating to the Pretender's business, and that Fleury, in dying, had recommended his successor in office, Cardinal de Tencin, to carry into execution the plans devised for restoring the Stuarts. Cardinal de Tencin certainly wanted no such recommendation from Fleury;—he owed his cardinal's cap to the friendship and patronage of the Pretender, and he was throughout life devoted to the interests of the Stuarts. The secretary for foreign affairs, moreover, told Murray of Broughton that Louis XV. was as much interested for the Stuart family as any Scottish gentleman that had signed the association; and that his majesty had commanded him to assure Murray, that as soon as an opportunity offered he would carry the great scheme into execution. Murray returned rejoicing to Scotland. Shortly after this, Drummond of Bochaldy went to Rome, at the desire of the French court, to persuade James to send his son to France. Other agents were sent over to London and to different parts of England: but the English Jacobites were extremely shy, and not a single Englishman could be persuaded to follow the example of the seven original Scottish conspirators, or to pledge themselves, under their hand and seal, to the Pretender. A few vague promises were, however, given—mostly among the Catholics in the northern counties. In the summer of the same year (1743) Cardinal de Tencin wrote to the old Pretender, acquainting him with the preparations made for an invasion, and urging him to send his son Charles immediately to Paris, that he might go with the expedition. On the 27th of June, James, writing from his delightful villa of Albano, near Rome, assured his friend the cardinal that nothing could be more desirable in general than the journey of the prince his son into France. "But," added the old Pretender, made cautious and diffident by thirty years of failure and disappointment, "if you seriously meditate an enterprise against England, would it not be more prudent to defer my son's journey until you are ready for the execution of the grand project? For such a journey will produce a great noise, will put the English government on its guard, and engage it to do everything in order to provide against an invasion, which will then be regarded as certain and near at hand. I have considered it my duty to make this reflection; but if, in the mean while, you assure me that the King of France wishes my son to go to Paris, I will send him."* The French cabinet then commenced collecting at Dunkirk and Calais a large body of veteran troops under Marshal Saxe, a fleet of transports and other necessaries, and also put in order at Brest and Rochfort eighteen or twenty men-of-war. When all these preparations were made—when 15,000 men were all but ready to embark—de Tencin dispatched another messenger to Rome, to urge the instant coming of Prince Charles. The old Pretender then, on the 23rd of December, 1743, signed a proclamation to be published on his son's landing in England, and a commission appointing Charles his regent and alter ego. Other papers were prepared, including patents of nobility to reward the most forward of the Jacobites; some little money was got together; and on the night of the 9th of January, 1744, Charles, giving out that he was going to hunt the boar in the Pontine marshes and the wilds of the Maremma, as he had been used to do at that season, stole out of Rome very privately, disguised like a Spanish courier, and attended by only one servant, a favourite groom, who played for the nonce the part of a Spanish cabinet messenger. He had to avoid by land George's ally, the King of Sardinia, and by sea George's admiral, Matthews, who was cruising off the Italian coast. Travelling day and night, the young Pretender passed Genoa and reached the little sea-port of Savona: there he embarked in a felucca, or small half-deck vessel, and, no doubt by keeping close in shore, he escaped observation, and got safe to the French port of Antibes. Thence he pursued his journey with all speed to Paris, where he arrived, unknown and unobserved, on the 20th of January. His confidence was somewhat damped by Louis XV. refusing to confer with him personally. His most Christian majesty still deemed the deceptive veil necessary, and he never admitted Charles to an audience during this his first stay at Paris. The young Pretender was, however, met by the exiled Earl Marshal, by Lord Elcho, by Drummond of Bochaldy, and by one or two other Scots, whose secrecy and discretion could be trusted. After lying concealed some short time at Paris, he stole away to the little port of Gravelines, from the downs of which place he beheld for the first time the white cliffs of England. During his stay at Gravelines he took the name of the Chevalier Douglas, and remained close and unknown, having no one with him save the laird of Bochaldy. The exiled Earl Marshal, one of the best men that ever engaged in that desperate cause, repaired in all privacy to Gravelines to accompany the prince. At first it had been arranged that the 3000 Frenchmen for Scotland should be sent off before the main body, but now it was resolved that the main body should go at the same time. Having effected the junction of the Brest and Rochefort squadrons, Admiral Roquefeuille ventured up the British Channel, to examine the state and position of our guard-ships previously to taking in charge the transports and troops at Dunkirk. Towards the end of February people on the look-out on the heights of Torbay discovered the French fleet, which consisted of fifteen ships of the line and five frigates, and they watched it with an anxious eye. Roquefeuille continued his course till he came abreast of the Isle of Wight, and could look into Spithead. Not seeing a single English man-of-war on that usual station, he dispatched a tender to Dunkirk, advising Marshal Saxe to embark his troops without delay. That active general soon shipped 7000 of his men: Prince Charles had come round from Gravelines, and he and the marshal embarked together and even put out to sea. After dispatching the tender, Roquefeuille continued to steal along the Channel, until he arrived off Dungeness, where he cast anchor. But his anchors had scarcely bit the ground when he was disturbed by the apparition of our Channel fleet, bearing down upon him in superior force. This fleet was commanded by Sir John Norris, an excellent sailor, but somewhat too aged for dashing, daring enterprises. Norris had been lying at Spithead a short time before the coming out of the French fleet, but had steered round to the Downs to effect his junction with other ships that lay at the mouth of the Medway or that came down from Chatham. He now cast anchor within two leagues of Roquefeuille, considering, from the state of the tide and the approach of night, it would be better to delay the combat till the next day. There were, perhaps, other circumstances to impose or excuse this delay, but the consequence of it was, there was no combat at all: Roquefeuille slipped his cables in the night and bore away for the French coast, and when the morning sun arose old Norris could not see so much as a strip of French canvass. But the wind that wafted Roquefeuille out of the reach of the English fleet blew too hard for Marshal Saxe, the Pretender, and the transports, that had come out of Dunkirk. It blew right in their teeth—it rose to a hurricane—it sunk some of the largest ships with all the men on board—it drove others back on the French coast among rocks and sandbanks; and the luckiest of the fleet were those that got back into port dimasted and shattered. The French troops, with their numbers considerably diminished by these sea casualties and with their spirits quite sunk by the horrors of sea-sickness, were glad to be on terra firma again, and in no hurry to re-embark. The discouragement extended to the French cabinet, who, moreover, had now urgent need of troops in Flanders to face the Dutch, who seemed to be entering with more heart into the war; and soon after the fatal storm the army was withdrawn from the coast, and

Marshal Saxe was sent into the Low Countries. Charles retired to his old hiding-place at Gravelines, where he lived very privately all the spring, still calling himself the Chevalier Douglas. "The situation I am in," wrote Charles to his father, "is very particular, for nobody knows where I am, or what is become of me; so that I am entirely buried as to the public, and cannot but say that it is a very great constraint upon me, for I am obliged very often not to stir out of my room for fear of somebody's noting my face." It appears that, to support his travestimento, this royal Stuart was in the habit while at Gravelines of going to market to buy his own dinner. We find him writing to his father—"I very often think that you would laugh very heartily, if you saw me going about with a single servant, buying fish and other things, and squabbling for a penny, more or less! Everybody is wondering where the prince is; some will have him in one place, and some in another, but nobody knows where he really is; and sometimes he is told news of himself to his face, which is very diverting." But there were other things attending this masquerade which were by no means so pleasant: there was hard work to do in reading and answering dispatches secretly conveyed to him from various quarters; and the prince, who loved hunting, but hated writing—who was so ill educated that he could write in no language, neither in French, Italian, nor English, without committing gross blunders in orthography—complained much of this hard work, and of having no one to help him, save the laird of Bochaldu, who, in all probability, was no great linguist or penman himself.* He wished to join the French army in Flanders, fighting against Englishmen and the allies of England; but Louis would not permit him to go to his army, and Lord Marshal strongly advised the young Pretender against such a step, so little likely to conciliate the people he wished to govern as king. For this advice Charles was furious, and he wrote to his father at Rome to accuse and abuse the noble exile. In the month of June Charles left the coast and returned to Paris, where Louis ordered him to remain concealed. He accordingly took a house some distance from that capital, where, as he said himself, he should be at full liberty to have the spleen, being compelled to live like a hermit. We find him complaining that he could get no shooting—that he had not handled a gun for two months; "but," adds he, with a nice attention to the weather, "I intend to begin to shoot again soon, but not when it rains." It is true, Charles was a young man, but youth can scarcely excuse this trifling in one that was risking thousands of lives for the attainment of a great object. At all events, such poco-curante youths are not made to carve their way to thrones.

A few days after the retreat of Roquefeuille and the disasters of Marshal Saxe's transports, 6000 Dutch troops were landed at Gravelines, as a contingent which the States-General were bound to furnish by old treaties. Other troops were raised at home, fresh ships were equipped, and the chief landing-places on our coasts were put into a better state of defence. The fierce battle of Dettingen had produced no declaration of war from France; but, after the recent demonstrations on our own coasts, Louis XV. considered it decent to declare war in a regular form, accusing King George of being the cause of all the wars on the continent, by dissuading Maria Theresa from listening to terms. George replied in a counter-declaration of war, in which he accused Louis of violating the Pragmatic Sanction, of covertly and treacherously assisting Spain in her war with England, and of basely harbouring and abetting the son of the Pretender.

While Roquefeuille had been engaging the attention of England in the Channel, a bold attempt had been made in the Mediterranean by a Spanish fleet united to the fleet of Toulon. The Spaniards and French ventured out from Toulon, in the beginning of March, against the English Mediterranean fleet, commanded by Admirals Mathews and Lestock. The British vessels were foul from long service and cruising, while those of their opponents were clean and fresh out of port; the English were more numerous by two or three ships; but their crews were weaker, and some of the enemy—particularly the Spaniards—carried greater weight of metal. At the beginning of the fight Mathews attacked the Spanish division, bearing himself gallantly down upon their flag-ship, which carried 114 guns. But there had long been a deadly feud between the two English commanders;—Mathews complained that Lestock kept aloof purposely and maliciously—Lestock said that Mathews's signals were in fault, being confused and unintelligible. The Spanish flag-ship was shattered, the Royal Philip was disabled, and another large Spanish ship, after being taken and retaken, was finally burnt by Mathews's division. Night separated the combatants, when Mathews found his own ship so much damaged that he moved his flag into another. The brave Captain Cornwall fell in this day's engagement; but our loss in men was represented as very inconsiderable. On the following morning the French and Spaniards appeared to leeward: Mathews gave chase, but Lestock's division hung astern, and nothing was done that day. On the morrow the pursuit was renewed, and Lestock's division outailed that of Mathews; but then Mathews hoisted a signal for leaving off the chase, and bore away for Port Mahon, to repair, in our arsenals there, the damage he had sustained. In a close, land-bound sea like the Mediterranean the winds are often seen to vary so much that there will be a good breeze at one point, and scarcely a cap of wind half a league behind;—there are also inequalities in the sailing of ships, and capabilities of sailing better under one wind than another, that may account for great irregularity in a pursuit; but on the present occasion it was generally believed that the jealousy and hatred of the two commanders were the sole cause of the escape of the enemy. Mathews, as superior in command, suspended Lestock, and sent him home to England for trial; but he was soon after recalled himself, and subjected equally with Lestock to the ordeal of a court martial, on which men were too passionate to be impartial. The House of Commons had interfered, and the proceedings were long and tedious; but in the end the court-martial honourably acquitted Lestock and declared Mathews for ever incapable of serving his majesty. Several commanders of ships were cashiered at the same time. The Spanish admiral who had escaped into Carthagena was made a marquis, and the Frenchman was promoted for not having been worse beaten than he was.* The remaining naval operations of the year were unimportant, if we except the return of Commodore Anson, who added a curious episode to the maritime history of his country. Anson, as we have shown, had been appointed to go to the South Seas in 1740, to harass the unsuspecting coasts of Chili and Peru, and to co-operate occasionally with Admiral Vernon across the Isthmus of Darien. The small squadron placed under his command was delayed till the season was far advanced, and, what was far worse, his ships were scarcely sea-worthy and badly found in provisions and accommodations—because, as usual, the contractors, commissioners, and dock-yard men had been allowed to make their infamous profits at the expense of the safety and health of hundreds of brave men. In doubling Cape Horn in March 1741, his store ship, the Wager, was wrecked, and the rest of his ships were scattered. With only his own ship, the Centurion, he reached in June the solitary island of Juan Fernandez, having lost on his way, chiefly by scurvy, 200 from a crew of between 400 and 500 men. At Juan Fernandez he was joined by the Gloucester, a sloop, and a pink laden with provisions, which had fought their way after their bold leader. With these vessels, and not more than 335 men, he left Juan Fernandez in September to scour the Pacific side of Spanish America. His exploits bore a close resemblance to those of the Buccaneers: he made prize of all the vessels he could meet, and he burnt towns and villages. He could hardly do more, as the miserable failures of Vernon made his intended co-operation across the Isthmus of Darien a dream. But he boldly conceived a project of his own, which was to intercept the Manilla galleon, a Spanish ship which sailed annually between Manilla, one of the Philippine islands, and Acapulco in Mexico, laden with silver and other valuable commodities. After hovering on the coast of America eight or nine months, he stretched across the vast Pacific Ocean, with ships that would fill with despair a modern mariner, and with crews perishing of scurvy. In the course of his long voyage he was obliged to destroy the Gloucester and the two other vessels from want of men to navigate them, and in the Centurion, his only remaining ship, he could hardly muster half a crew, even when all the survivors were assembled in her. While resting on shore on the uninhabited island of Tinian, one of the Ladrones, the Centurion was driven out to sea; but the men on board contrived, after some time, to work her back to the island. Instead of despairing, Anson had, during her absence, begun to construct a vessel, working himself like a shipwright. From the Ladrones he shaped his course for China, got into the bay of Canton in November 1742, and cast anchor at Macao. There he new-sheathed the rotting Centurion and procured some fresh seamen. Having well calculated his time he sailed from the bay of Canton to the straits of Manilla, where he met and captured the great galleon, mounted with 40 guns and carrying 600 men. The battle, though short, was vigorous; and in the moment of victory a fire broke out near the powder room of the Centurion, which but for the presence of mind of the commodore would have blown the victors into the air. The value of the prize in bullion and other effects was estimated at 313,000*l*. He returned to China, sold the prize ship, and then began his voyage homeward by the Cape of Good Hope. After suffering many hardships and running risks innumerable, he got into the Channel, passed through the heart of a French fleet, without seeing them, in a thick fog, and finally arrived safely at Spithead on the 15th of June of the present year, 1744. All the treasure he brought with him in coin, bullion, and gold and silver dust, amounted in value to one million and a quarter sterling. It was resolved for popular purposes to get up an exhibition; and on the 4th of July thirty waggons from Portsmouth carrying the treasure brought home passed through the Strand and Cheapside to the Tower, guarded by the ship's crew, and preceded by the officers with swords drawn, music playing, and colours flying, the flags taken from the Spaniards, and particularly that of the great galleon, making an attractive part of the exhibition. Anson, who had greatly enriched himself, was presently made rear-admiral of the blue.*

* Smollett, a very competent critic in such matters, says, "Admiral Mathews, on his arrival at Minorca, accused Lestock of having misbehaved on the day of action; suspended him from his office, and sent him prisoner to England, where, in his turn, he accused his accuser. Long before the engagement, these two officers had expressed the most virulent resentment against each other. Mathews was brave, open, and undisguised; but proud, imperious, and precipitate. Lestock had signalled his courage on many occasions, and perfectly understood the whole discipline of the navy; but he was cool, cunning, and vindictive. He had been treated superciliously by Mathews, and in revenge took advantage of his errors and precipitation. To gratify this passion, he betrayed the interest and glory of his country; for it is not to be denied that he might have come up in time to engage, and in that case the fleets of France and Spain would in all likelihood have been destroyed; but he intrinched himself within the punitiveness of discipline, and saw with pleasure his antagonist expose himself to the hazard of death, ruin, and disgrace. Mathews himself, in the sequel, sacrificed his duty to his resentment, in restraining Lestock from pursuing and attacking the combined squadrons on the third day after the engagement, when they appeared disabled and in manifest disorder, and would have fallen an easy prey, had they been vigorously attacked. One can hardly, without indignation, reflect upon these instances, in which a community has so severely suffered from the personal animosity of individuals."—Hist. Reg.

The incidents of the land war during 1744 were various. Louis XV., in the month of May, went into Flanders to take the command of his own army, which amounted to 80,000 men. Marshal Saxe, fortunately for the French, was left with the real direction, for of war Louis knew nothing. King George had expected that the allies would muster a force equal to that of the enemy, but all that could really be got together was a discordant army of English, Dutch, Austrians, and Flemings, of about 52,000 men. With this vast superiority Louis was enabled to indulge for a short time in that spectacular part of war which had been so much to the taste of his great-grandfather Louis XIV.—that is, he witnessed the surrender of towns and fortresses, which seemed made to be taken and retaken some half-dozen of times in every war. But Maria Theresa's army, under Prince Charles of Lorraine, burst into Alsace, driving the French behind the ramparts of Strasburg; and then, in the month of July, the French king turned from witnessing the capture of ill defended towns, and hastened towards his invaded province, leaving half his army behind in Flanders under Saxe. But Louis was not made for the fatigues of campaigning, and he had besides overreached himself: he fell sick unto death at Metz on his march into Alsace; confessed his sins, turned off his reigning mistress, and resigned himself entirely to his priests. In this state he lay between life and death for many weeks. But a more warlike hand than his was now outstretched against the Austrians. Frederick of Prussia suddenly broke his pacific engagements, tore up his treaties, and burst into Bohemia with 60,000 men, while another division of his army marched into Moravia. Frederick made straight for the Bohemian capital; and Prague, though defended by 15,000 men, capitulated on the 16th of September. Before moving he had renewed his correspondence with France, and had concluded at Frankfort a sort of treaty with the dispossessed Emperor Charles, the Elector of Bavaria, who now found himself able to send an army under Marshal Seckendorf into his lost hereditary dominions. Seckendorf entered Bavaria, drove the Austrian army there before him, and re-conducted his master Charles to Munich, his ancient capital. Terrified at these successes of Frederick and Seckendorf, the court of Vienna hastily recalled Prince Charles from the French province of Alsace, whither the sick Louis had been going. The able Lorrainer recrossed the Rhine with admirable skill in the face of a strong French army, and proceeded by forced marches to Bohemia, where Frederick was carrying everything before him. The Hungarians, to whom Maria Theresa again fled, renewed their heroic exertions, and crowded into Bohemia to serve look after the French fleet at Brest. In the Bay of Biscay he encountered a dreadful storm, which sunk his own ship the Victory, then esteemed the most beautiful first-rate in the world, and he and eleven hundred others perished in her. The rest of the dispersed fleet was collected by Admiral Stewart, the second in command, who led the greater part of them back to Plymouth in a disabled condition.

under Prince Charles. Frederick called upon the French marshals on the Rhine to assist him; and he called in vain—the French were unwilling to engage themselves again in the heart of Austria;—but his opponent was almost daily reinforced by large bodies of Croats, Pandours, and other light troops, who cut off all stragglers, seized upon convoys and magazines, and harassed the Prussians perpetually by ambuscades, and night attacks. Frederick soon found himself obliged to retrace his steps through Bohemia, and to abandon to their fate his garrisons at Tábor and other places. His retreat through a mountainous country was exceedingly disastrous;—many of the Prussians were killed, many more taken, and their king himself had a narrow escape. They considered themselves fortunate, when, at the beginning of December, they found themselves clear of Bohemia, and once more in Silesia. In beginning his retreat Frederick fancied that General Einsiedel could maintain himself in Prague; but Einsiedel was obliged to abandon his heavy artillery and to march out of that capital at the end of November; and before he got across the Bohemian frontier his force of 11,000 men was reduced to 6000. Frederick afterwards acknowledged that in this the most disastrous of all his campaigns he had committed more faults and blunders than ever general had done before: but the illness of the King of France, and the despondency and backwardness of the French, were events over which he had no controul, and which greatly affected the issue of the war. He left his army in winter quarters in Silesia, and hastened to Berlin to raise more men for the shambles. Owing to exertions which had tended to weaken them in other quarters, the French were enabled to gain some brilliant but transient successes on the side of Italy. The Prince de Conti suddenly crossed the Alps by the Col de Tende, took by assault various important places, penetrated into Piedmont, joined some Spaniards under the Infant Don Philip, and routed the King of Sardinia in a bloody battle fought near the town of Coni. But the French could not keep their ground, and, perishing from want of supplies and the avenging muskets and knives of the peasantry whose fields they had desolated, they soon retreated through the defiles of the Alps into Savoy. But in Lower Italy the allies of England were singularly unsuccessful, and a Neapolitan army, for once in modern history, stood firm on the field of battle and gallantly won a victory. The remnant of the Spanish army had retreated by Rimini to the frontiers of Naples. The Austrian general, Prince Lobkowitz, followed them and threatened to attack them even on the Neapolitan territory, complaining that his majesty Don Carlos had, by giving them shelter and succour, and by other proceedings, broken the neutrality to which he had pledged himself when Commodore Martin threatened his capital and his very palace with bombardment. Don Carlos, on the other side, proclaimed that the conquest of his dominions was all along a part of the scheme of the Austrians; that the Spanish fugitives, who had claimed the shelter of his frontiers, were too few and powerless to excite any rational fears; and that now Lobkowitz's real design was to drive him out of his states. He then put his wife and children for safety within the strong fortress of Gaeta, and marched to his frontiers to join the Spaniards there and face Lobkowitz and the Austrians. He was followed by an army of 25,000 Neapolitans, and the Spaniards and their partisans made nearly 20,000 men more. Lobkowitz on the other hand had about 35,000 men in all—but they were men that had served in many wars, and that had been accustomed to speak with derision of a Neapolitan army. After numerous manœuvres, in which the Austrians tried to penetrate into the Neapolitan kingdom by the difficult passes of the Abruzzi, Don Carlos advanced a little into the neighbouring states of the Pope, and took quarters in Velletri, a considerable city situated on the summit of a steep hill, covered from root to top with vineyards and olive groves. Here Lobkowitz thought to surround him and catch him as in a trap; but on the night between the 10th and 11th of August, the Austrians, after penetrating into Velletri and setting fire to one of the suburbs, were repulsed with tremendous loss by the Neapolitans and Spaniards; and Lobkowitz, instead of taking the kingdom of Naples, was finally compelled to retreat behind the Po. With an army reduced by famine and malaria fever Lobkowitz began his retreat in the night of the 1st of November: the Neapolitans and Spaniards followed him as far as the Tiber; but there they slackened their pursuit, and Don Carlos, after paying his respects to the Pope, returned to his capital.*

In the month of October the turbulent old Duchess Dowager of Marlborough found peace at last in the grave, having equally survived her friends and her enemies. Out of her enormous wealth she bequeathed large legacies to the leaders of the opposition. Thus Chesterfield got 20,000*l.* and the reversion of an estate at Wimbledon, and Pitt 10,000*l.* The day of her death was also that of the death of the Countess Granville, mother to Lord Carteret, who thereupon became Earl Granville. This minister was still in the highest favour with the king, but he had become proportionably odious to the Duke of Newcastle and his other colleagues, who seemed determined to drive him

* The Marshal de Belleisle had always been considered, next to Cardinal de Fleury, as the chief promoter of the war of France against us. In the course of the autumn this Belleisle and his brother were sent by Louis XV. on a mission to Frederick of Prussia, who was fallen into the embarrassments and adversities we have narrated: taking the shortest road, the two Frenchmen ventured to go through Ivanover, but, while they were changing horses at a village in that electorate, they were seized and detained by the local authorities. Soon after they were sent over as prisoners to England, and, refusing to give their parole in the form required of them, they were both committed to close confinement in Windsor Castle. This treatment of two diplomats made a great noise; the Emperor Charles complained that their arrest was a breach of the privilege of the empire; George seemed disposed to keep them fast, not as prisoners of war but as state prisoners and spies; but after several months' detention they were, upon the decision of the three field marshals, Stair, Cobham and Wade, declared to be prisoners of war, and sent back to France under a cartel.

from office. There was nothing new nor edifying in these cabinet squabbles and court intrigues. Carteret, or Granville, drinking as hard as usual, wanted still more power; and in the month of November the Duke of Newcastle and his brother Mr. Pelham told his majesty, for themselves and for the greater part of the cabinet, that he must choose between their resignations and the dismissal of Granville.* George, in this extremity, entreated the Earl of Orford to come up to town and give his advice. Walpole obeyed the summons, but his advice was strongly against driving matters to extremities by retaining Granville. The Prince of Wales, who was now living on better terms with his father, was also consulted by George; but the prince could do nothing with his friends of the opposition, who were all bent upon the expulsion of Granville. The king bitterly blamed the Duke of Newcastle, saying of him—"He is grown as jealous of Lord Granville as he used to be of Walpole, and wants to be prime minister, which, a puppy! how can he be?" Nevertheless he found himself compelled, on the 23rd of November, to dismiss Granville. Lord Winchelsea, with his new board of admiralty, and a few other inferior placemen, retired with the expelled minister: the Earl of Harrington was re-appointed to the place which Granville had vacated. Strong efforts were made to overcome the personal aversion of the king to Lord Chesterfield and Mr. Pitt, in order to gratify that section of the Whigs, and also to induce his majesty to give some employment to Sir John Hynde Cotton, in order to keep the Tories quiet: for the Pellhams, in seeking for parliamentary aid, had not overlooked the latter party; and one of the most flattering promises they had made to the king was, that, Carteret being once removed, they should still the noisy voice of opposition in parliament. In short, they wanted to make what they rather inelegantly termed a broad-bottomed ministry; that is to say, a cabinet which should have for its basis men of all parties, from which, however, the particular adherents both of Pulteney and Carteret were to be carefully excluded. George, who could never forget the affair of his father's legacies, and the attempt of Chesterfield to bring to light the suppressed will, and who had otherwise been incensed by the parliamentary conduct of that lord, would on no account have him about his person as one of the secretaries of state, the post which his lordship aspired to; but he reluctantly consented to give him the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland. Pitt might have been gratified with a place if he would have accepted a minor one, but he proudly said that he would be secretary-at-war or nothing; and so he remained in opposition, but only for a few days, for the Duke of Newcastle and Pelham, who felt his assistance indispensable, assured him that the king's antipathy should soon be overcome, and that he should then have what he wanted. Pitt, therefore, resigned his place in the household of the Prince of Wales, who was now losing his party and his influence by inclining to the displaced minister Carteret and the Hanoverian faction. After bitter complaints of not being allowed to have a will of his own,—of being forced by his ministers to employ one that was an enemy to his House—George consented to make Sir John Hynde Cotton treasurer of the chamber in the royal household. The changeling Tory Lord Gower was restored to his former office of lord privy seal, from which Lord Cholmondeley was dismissed; the Duke of Dorset got the presidency of the council, vacated by Harrington; the Duke of Bedford became first lord of the admiralty in the room of Winchelsea, having the Earl of Sandwich as second commissioner; Mr. Grenville was made another of the junior lords of the admiralty; Lyttleton obtained a seat at the treasury board; and even the tricky Bubb Dodington got on the broad-bottom, for he was appointed treasurer of the navy. He is understood, indeed, to have been at the head of a secret opposition committee of six, which had throughout the session directed all the operations in the Commons against the late ministry. Lord Hardwicke remained chancellor, Mr. Pelham first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer, and the Duke of Newcastle one of the secretaries of state, Lord Harrington being made the other in the room of Lord Granville, though without succeeding to the premiership which had been held by his predecessor. The Duke of Devonshire, Walpole's rough diamond and steady friend, remained satisfied with the post of steward of the household. The makers of this broad-bottom administration told the king that he might now look round the House of Commons and not find one man of business or of any weight capable of heading or conducting an opposition.

A. D. 1745.—"This general coalition," says Lord John Russell, "smoothed the great sea of parliamentary debate; and the session is remarkable for producing scarcely a single division. Yet the conduct of the new ministry did not essentially differ from that of Lord Carteret." The opponents of that minister—the Chesterfields, the Pitts, the Lyttletons—had constantly reproached him for leaning to Hanover and employing or paying Hanoverian troops; and they had exhausted their eloquence upon this particular topic: yet these men now, in office, or (as in Pitt's case) making sure of being in, found it necessary to qualify their criticism; and they only escaped by a practical equivocalism from pursuing precisely the same line that they had condemned and denounced in Carteret. Pitt read a sort of recantation in the House

* According to one account, Carteret, provoked at finding himself frequently outvoted in the cabinet by four to one, had declared that if his colleagues chose to take the government upon themselves they might, but that, if they would not, he would: that then both parties began to look for other aid, in which Carteret failed and the Pelhams were successful; that then Lord Hardwicke, the chancellor, drew up a strong memorial representing the bad management of foreign affairs; and that this memorial, after being approved by the Pelhams, and the Dukes of Devonshire, Dorset, Argyll, and Montague, was presented to the king, who showed by his countenance his displeasure at it, but who, having no other remedy, finally signified to the chancellor that Carteret should resign.—Lord John Russell, Memoirs of the Affairs of Europe.

in the month of January, upon a motion for continuing the army in Flanders; and, though the Hanoverian troops were nominally dismissed, an increased subsidy was voted to the Queen of Hungary,* to enable her to take those very troops into her pay. This she did; and the Hanoverians continued to serve in the allied armies as much in the pay of England as they had been before. But there was more than this: when the popular outcry grew faint, the farce of paying them indirectly was suspended, the money was counted out again from the English treasury, and the number of Hanoverians was increased from 15,000, which it had been in Carteret's time, to 22,000! In the same easy way a new subsidy for the Elector of Saxony was carried by the patriots and the broad-bottom men as soon as Carteret was removed; 24,000*l.* were voted for the Elector of Cologne, and 8000*l.* for the Elector of Mayence. Not a whisper was now raised against our increasing and complicating our foreign engagements, which a few months before had been considered so dangerous by the opposition;—the Quadruple Alliance, concluded in January between England, Holland, Austria, and Saxony, binding the last-mentioned power to furnish 30,000 men for the defence of Bohemia, and binding England to pay two-thirds of the whole subsidy to the Saxon Elector, while Holland paid but one-third, met with no comment and excited no complaint in the House of Commons. To move the Dutch to some greater degree of activity in the war, Chesterfield, before going over to his lord-lieutenancy, repaired to the Hague, and negotiated and diplomatized (as he always did) with ability and success. At last, the States engaged to have 60,000 men under arms for the ensuing campaign, and consented that the supreme command of the united armies in Flanders should be entrusted to George's son, the Duke of Cumberland. The old Elector of Bavaria, who had hardly known one fortunate day since he had been elected emperor, died at Munich, in the month of January, of a complication of disorders and sufferings, physical and moral, that should seem sufficient to kill fifty men.† His son and successor to his hereditary states of Bavaria was wise enough not to be tempted by the imperial crown: he instantly opened negotiations with Maria Theresa; engaged to vote for her husband, the Duke of Lorraine, in the next Imperial Diet; renounced all claims whatsoever to any part of the Austrian succession; and promised to recall his troops from the French army, and never send them to assist the King of Prussia. The Queen of Hungary, on her part, agreed to acknowledge that the election of the late emperor was good and valid, and also to restore whatever territory she had occupied or conquered in Bavaria; and upon these terms a treaty was concluded at Fuessen.

Before the annual waste of human life began that great minister died, who had checked it for so many years. Walpole, Earl of Orford, was sick and suffering when summoned to London by George to give his advice in his ministerial difficulties. He soon returned to Houghton, employing four days on the journey, and suffering excruciating torments all the way. When at Houghton he called in the celebrated Dr. Jurin; but the new physician could do nothing for the old man, whose disorder was the worst kind of stone. His only relief was opium, and he took so much of that drug that for six weeks he was almost in a constant state of stupefaction. But neither opium nor pain could make him forget what he had learned at court, or wholly confuse his intellect. A few days before he died the Duke of Cumberland sent his governor, Mr. Poyntz, to consult him on a very delicate subject: George, for political purposes, had set his heart upon marrying his second son to a daughter of the King of Denmark; but, as the young lady was deformed, the Duke of Cumberland was much averse to the match, and wished to know from his father's old minister which would be the best means of avoiding it. Walpole, who well knew that the king's obstinacy was to be moved only by his avarice or by his dread of fresh parliamentary contentions, reflected a moment, and then told Poyntz that he must advise the duke to give his consent to the marriage upon condition of receiving a separate, ample, and immediate revenue and establishment; "and believe me," added the dying minister, "the match will then be no longer pressed upon him." The Duke of Cumberland followed this advice, and the event justified the prediction. Walpole expired on the 18th of March, 1745, in the sixty ninth year of his age; thus escaping the mournful spectacle of the civil war which was about to rage in the northern parts of our island.*

In the month of April Marshal Saxe found himself at the head of 76,000 French troops in Flanders; and, after a few movements to puzzle and embarrass the allies, he marched suddenly upon Tournay, and invested that place in the beginning of May. England had furnished all the troops she had promised, and had about 28,000 brave men under arms in that old battle-field of Europe; but the Dutch, instead of sending 50,000 and keeping 10,000 in garrison, had hardly sent 25,000; and the Austrians mustered no more than eight or nine squadrons of horse. As if the inferiority of number to the French was not sufficient to insure a bad campaign, the Duke of Cumberland, who had indisputably some (not many) of the qualities of a great general, and who was young and active at least, found himself under the control of an old Austrian pedant in war, Marshal Konigsegg,—and hampered and thwarted by the Dutch general, Prince Waldeck. At the earnest instance of Waldeck and the States-General, Cumberland moved with this inferior force to relieve Tournay, which ought to have been strong enough to defend itself, for it was esteemed one of the best fortresses in the Low Countries, and there were 9000 Dutch within it well supplied with everything. Having come to this resolution of relieving Tournay, the allied armies ought to have been quick and sudden in their motions; but they lost time,—they went at parade pace,—and, when they got near Tournay, they found that Saxe was well prepared to meet them. That skilful and active general, leaving 15,000 of his foot to block up the fortress, moved with the rest of his army of 60,000 horse and foot, to an excellent position between Tournay and Fontenoy, which he presently occupied and strengthened with numerous works. And while he lay there Louis XV. and the Dauphin arrived post from Paris, and joined him, to the great joy and encouragement of the French army. If the young Pretender had been allowed, he would have followed the French king, and his first encounter with Cumberland would have been at Fontenoy instead of Culloden. When the allies came up they found the French encamped on the gentle heights that rise from the right bank of the river Scheldt, with that river and the village of Antoine on their right, Fontenoy and a narrow valley in their front, and a small wood on their left. As at Dettingen, the French had a free passage across the river by means of a bridge; and this bridge was defended by a tête du pont and by a strong body of reserve. Fontenoy and Antoine were well fortified and garrisoned; redoubts were thrown up between the two villages, and there were abbatiss on the left in front of the wood. Apparently nothing daunted—it may be suspected that they were not skilful enough to detect at a glance the whole strength of the position—the allied generals resolved still to relieve Tournay and engage; and, driving in the French picquets and outposts, they advanced in gallant style. But night fell, operations were suspended, and the troops lay under their arms till the following morning, the 11th of May (n.s.). At about four o'clock in the morning a brisk cannonade began on both sides,* and before six both armies were closely engaged. The Duke of Cumberland with the English and Hanoverians advanced against the left of the French, and detached General Ingoldsby to clear the wood there and carry a redoubt a little beyond it. When Ingoldsby came up to the wood he found it occupied by some detachments of sharpshooters, whom he mistook for a whole division; and, after hesitating and losing time, he rode back to Cumberland for fresh instructions. This was a blunder; but on the other side Prince Waldeck and the Dutch, who had moved against the French's right to attack Fontenoy and Antoine, gave unequivocal proofs of cowardice; for, after failing in their assault, and suffering from the French batteries, they gave ground,† and remained little more than spectators of the rest of the fight. Nay, to increase the shame, Appius, the colonel of a regiment of Hesse-Homburgers in the pay of the States, galloped away with most of his men to the town of Ath, and thence wrote a letter to the Dutch government to inform them that the allied army had been cut to pieces. Still, however, Cumberland, with his brave British and Hanoverian troops, persevered in his attack on the left. Leaving the cavalry in their rear, and dragging some pieces of artillery with the force of their own nervous arms, the foot crossed a ravine, and advanced full in front of the wood, the batteries, and the abbatiss, and of the best part of the French army, which had had time and opportunity to gather strength from its right. When the combat became close it was terrific: our men were killed in heaps by the enemy's artillery; but still they went closer, sweeping away the French foot and the firm Swiss guards. The Duke de Grammont, who had lost the day at Dettingen, found that his last day was come, for he was killed early in the struggle, and many officers better than he bit the dust. When the British and Hanoverians carried the French position on the left,* and looked with the eyes of conquerors to the right, they could see nothing of their allies the Dutch; and presently whose letter we have quoted in the preceding note, was with them. In the same letter Munro says—"We were to support the Dutch, who, in their usual way, were very dilatory. We the Highlanders got within musket-shot of the batteries at Fontenoy, where we received three full fires from batteries and small arms, which killed us forty men and one ensign. Here we were obliged to skulk behind houses and hedges for about an hour and a half, waiting for the Dutch, who, when they came up, behaved but so so. Our regiment being in some disorder, I wanted to draw them up in rear of the Dutch, which their general would scarce allow of; but at last I did it, and soon marched them again to the front. In half an hour after the Dutch gave way, and Sir Robert Munro thought proper we should retire; for we had then the whole batteries from the enemy's ground playing upon us, and 3000 foot ready to fall upon us. We retired; but before we had marched fifty yards we had orders to return to the attack; which we did; and, in about ten minutes after, had orders to march directly, with all expedition, to assist the Hanoverians, who had got by this time well advanced upon the batteries upon the left." According to another Scotch officer engaged, the Dutch confidently undertook to make themselves masters of Fontenoy early in the morning; "but, not having rightly reconnoitred it, found, to their surprise, a fosse round it, and that the French, by cutting the roofs of the houses and letting them fall in, had raised so many cannon upon the rubbish as made the place impregnable."—Letter from Lieutenant John Forbes to Captain Hugh Forbes, in Culloden Papers.

"I want describe the cause of our failure," says Lieutenant Forbes, "although I know it; but sure never troops behaved wild more intemperately than the English; nor never have troops suffered so much. In short, there was but one way of marching into the ground where we were to form our line, which was through the village of Yezou. The opening would not allow above fourteen or twenty abreast; and from thence to the French batteries a rising ground like a glacis, and they at half-cannon shot distance. General Campbell, with twelve squadrons, was ordered through the defile first, as a corps to cover the mouth of the opening, whilst the infantry marched in; which, as they marched from the right, formed as soon as they went in; so one regiment covered another, till they formed all the way to the left. You may believe this took up a great deal of time; in which the French batteries played incessantly on the twelve squadrons and on the troops as they formed; but, as it is impossible to describe a thing unless you had a plan before you, I shall only say we formed with all the regularity in the world, and we marched up towards the enemy, who were all along upon the height with their different batteries; the whole length of which run a hollow way, that they had made a very good entrenchment. Off we beat them out of this hollow way, and gained the height, whence we had the first view of their bodies, at about 200 paces distance; an immense number of them, and numberless cannon still playing upon us. Here we dressed our lines, and began to march towards them; when they went into another entrenchment, extremely well provided and flanked with batteries of cannon. Nevertheless, on we went, drove them from that, which was the first small shot we had an opportunity to make use of from the beginning, which was now near six hours."—Culloden Papers.

* "Our cannon began to play a little after four in the morning, and the French batteries, with triple our weight of metal and numbers too, answered us; about five the infantry was in march."—Colonel John Munro to the Lord President, in Culloden Papers.

† A regiment of brave Highlanders was sent at the beginning of the movement to support the Dutch; and Colonel Munro, from

they were charged where they stood by masses of the French cavalry. But charge after charge was wasted upon them, and, instead of retreating, they pressed forward in the view of taking Fontenoy in the rear, and cutting the French off from their bridge across the Scheldt. "If," says Voltaire, "the Dutch had moved at this moment and joined the British, there would have been no resource, nay, no retreat for the French army; nor, in all probability, for the king and for his son." Louis, in fact, had been advised to seek safety in flight; but either because he thought flight more dangerous than staying where he was, or from some nobler motive, he refused to quit the field, though repeatedly urged to it by Marshal Saxe, who, it is said, was actually preparing to retreat himself. Old Königsegg congratulated the English prince as a conqueror; but his compliments were premature. Saxe, who could not at first credit the fact, saw that Waldeck and the Dutch were determined to keep aloof; and then, calling away all the troops that had held Fontenoy and Antoine, laying bare the right of his position (which ought to have been occupied by our allies), bringing up the household troops and the entire body of his reserve, he tried to crush the British and Hanoverians by a last desperate effort. It was melancholy then to see the brave Irish brigade in the pay of France turn the first and most furious of all against their English brethren. From the necessity of the ground they now occupied between the wood and Fontenoy, which ground was hollow and narrow, British and Hanoverian foot were huddled together in compact masses. Saxe, by the advice of the Duke de Richelieu, brought four pieces of heavy artillery to play upon them in this condition; and while the cannon roared with murderous effect in their front, they were attacked in flank by fresh troops, both horse and foot. Meanwhile their own cavalry did little or nothing. This inactivity is accounted for by the roughness of the ground; but surely English horses could ride where the French could; and we are disposed to believe that, as usual, our cavalry was far inferior to our foot.* But the foot itself was at last compelled to fall back, which they did slowly and with their faces to their foes. It is related of the Duke of Cumberland that he was the last in the retreat,—that he called upon his men to remember Blenheim and Ramillies, and that he threatened to shoot one of his officers whom he saw running. Thus retreating, the English and Hanoverian infantry came to their horse, who then presented a front to the French and checked their pursuit. They were joined by their precious allies the Dutch, and then they all hastened together back to the strong walls of Ath. If the men had had their will, and no enemy in their rear, it might have been difficult to prevent a very different kind of combat, for their fury against the

Dutch was boundless.* In this battle of Fontenoy the British lost, in killed and wounded, more than 4000 men, and the Hanoverians nearly 2000. They left behind them a few pieces of artillery, but no standards, and scarcely any prisoners except the wounded, who here, as in the victory of Dettingen, were abandoned to the mercy of the enemy. The French, on their part, owned to a loss of 7000 men; but it is believed that on both sides the numbers were under-rated. Among the English officers of distinction who fell were, Lieutenant-General Campbell and Major-General Ponsouly. "The action," says a Highland officer engaged, "will, I believe, be found to be the bloodiest as to officers that has happened to the British in the memory of man. . . . The Hanoverians behaved most gallantly and bravely; and had the Dutch taken example from them we had supped in Tournay." Tournay, the cause of this vast slaughter, was delivered up through an astonishing piece of treachery. Hertsall, a principal engineer in the Dutch service, and who was chiefly relied upon for the defence of the place, sold himself to the French, escaped to their camp the third day of the siege, and assisted them with his advice and information in carrying on their approaches. This Hertsall, moreover, took off with him two persons who had had the care of the sluices and reservoirs, which, before they deserted, they so spoiled that the water ran out. It was also supposed that the seemingly accidental blowing up of a powder magazine, with good part of a Dutch regiment, was owing to trains the traitor Hertsall had laid before he went off.† The town of Tournay surrendered in a fortnight; and the citadel a week after! The French next invested the citadel of Ghent, which capitulated after an equally disgraceful defence; as did, in a brief time, Bruges, Dendermond, and Oudenard. Then, while the allies were covering Brussels and Antwerp, the French besieged and carried the town of Ostend. Here again a Dutch officer was suspected of treachery, and wonder and consternation was excited among the allies at seeing that the old spirit, as well as the old politics, of the States-General had quite left them, and that their high mightinesses, to all appearance, observed the rapid paces making by the French towards the entire conquest of the Low Countries without exerting their full strength to oppose them.

Encouraged by the successes of his ally, Frederick of Prussia scorned the representations of Lord

* It appears that one regiment of horse—the Oxford Blues—behaved better here than they had done at Dettingen. "The Blues," writes a Scottish officer, "behaved well, and rubbed off the stain of Dettingen."—Letter from Colonel John Akenside to the Lord President, in Culloch's Papers.

† "It was monstrous," says Philip Yorke, in a letter to Horace Walpole the elder, "for the Dutch not to have even half the quota which they had agreed to bring into the field. . . . When the battle was fought, the whole confederate army, according to the best accounts I have seen, consisted of 46 battalions, and 73 squadrons, making in all 33,000 effective men: the French, of 102 battalions, and 149 squadrons, making 60,000; a terrible disproportion, considering, at the same time, how advantageously they were posted, and lined with so many batteries. We have had few particular accounts of the action: some of those first dispatched were stopped on the other side of the water, and the officers write with caution and reserve. It is whispered about that Prince Waldeck pulled us into this desperate attempt; the best thing that can be said for it, now it is over, here is, that our Johns were fighting for their money, and that there was no other chance for raising the siege."

Harrington, who had gone to Hanover with King George, and who was attempting to mediate a peace between Prussia and Austria. After defeating Prince Charles of Lorraine in Silesia, Frederick threw himself between the Austrians and their auxiliaries the Saxons, and defeated both on the 3rd of June, in the decisive battle of Hohen Friedberg, where, for the first time, he really displayed the abilities of a great general. The loss of the Austrians was estimated at 9000 in killed and wounded, and as many in prisoners. Prince Charles of Lorraine then retreated into Bohemia, and by the end of June he had collected a fresh army in an entrenched camp at Konigsgratz. Frederick soon entered into Bohemia, with the view—if he could do no more—of wasting and consuming all the means of subsistence along that frontier, so as to render it impossible for the Austrians to winter there. He advanced to Chlum, and there fixed himself for a time. In the mean while Maria Theresa, chiefly through the influence of George, whose faculty of subsidising with English money made him all powerful in the electoral college and among the petty potentates of Germany, had the satisfaction of seeing her husband Francis elected emperor by the Diet of Frankfort on the 13th of September. The King of Prussia and the Elector Palatine entered a vain protest against the election. United with the vast possessions of the Austrian family, the imperial dignity was something; but separately it was little more than a sounding word or an empty pageantry. It was scarcely worth quarrelling for. Maria Theresa continued to govern her own states by and for herself, leaving her husband to play the emperor in his own manner. Yet it appears that the coronation of her husband made her insensible to the recent defeats of her armies, and that she rejected at this moment some propositions of peace which were insinuated by Frederick to her minister. From Frankfort, where she witnessed the ceremony, and was the first to cry “Long live the Emperor Francis I.!” she repaired to Heidelberg, and reviewed an army of 60,000 men, riding along the ranks, and displaying her beauty and her liberality to the soldiers. But Frederick was a foe born to humble the Austrian pride. In the month of September want of provisions compelled him to retreat; Prince Charles of Lorraine, who had been reinforced by the junction of 6000 Bavarians, followed him with nearly 60,000 men in all, and enveloped him near Konigshof. The Prussian army did not at this moment exceed 28,000 men; but they were veterans, whereas the enemy consisted in good part of new levies and irregular hordes of horse. Frederick again displayed the qualities of a great general; the light troops of Austria took to pillaging when they ought to have been fighting, and the affair ended in the brilliant, and, by the Prussians, unexpected, victory of Soor. Frederick, who had lost all his own baggage, and who could procure neither pen nor ink, wrote to his minister with a pencil—“I have beaten the Austrians; I have taken some prisoners; let the Te Deum be performed.” And, accordingly, God was praised at Berlin for a frightful massacre; for the Austrians lost upwards of 6000 in killed and wounded, and the Prussians themselves more than 5000. The conqueror continued his retreat into Silesia, where he put his troops into winter-quarters, and then returned himself to Berlin to see what advantages he could gain by negotiating. He had already induced George to sign a convention at Hanover, guaranteeing to Prussia the possession of Silesia, and he hoped for other advantages from the fears and increasing difficulties of the English sovereign. The convention of Hanover he kept a profound secret; for any compact with England was likely to deprive him of his French alliance. In Italy the campaign was exceedingly unfavourable to the allies of England. A French and Spanish army, commanded by Marshal Maillebois and Don Philip, crossed the Alps, and, advancing into the Peninsula, was met by Count de Gages, with the Spanish and Neapolitan army that had been victorious at Velletri under Don Carlos. The proud republic of Genoa, resenting some recent and ancient injuries, declared against Austria and Sardinia, and sent 10,000 men to join Maillebois and Don Philip. Admiral Rowley, who now commanded the British fleet in the Mediterranean, bombarded and burned several towns on the Genoese coast; but this diversion was not sufficiently important, and the combined army of French, Spaniards, Neapolitans, and Genoese, forced the passage of the Tamaro, and gave battle to the Austrians and Sardinians, under the command of Count Schulemberg and his Sardinian majesty, near Bassignano. They were completely victorious. Charles Emanuel was obliged to retreat to his capital, and Casal, Asti, Lodi, and other towns submitted to the conquerors. The Austrians for the present were compelled to leave nearly the whole of Lombardy open to Don Philip, who made a triumphant entry into Milan, and fondly fancied that he had secured for good an Italian kingdom as well as his brother Don Carlos. Except upon the Main, where the army under the Prince of Conti, weakened by draughts made upon it to strengthen the army in Flanders, was compelled to retreat precipitately and with considerable loss before Count Traun, the French in Europe were nearly everywhere successful. But in America they sustained a considerable loss in the capital and island of Cape Breton, which were taken by 4000 volunteers from Boston, assisted by a few marines, and supported by Admiral Warren with a squadron of ten ships.

But the flames of a more fatal war were now lighted on our own territory. The battle of Fontenoy and our other reverses in Flanders were made the most of by the French, who were always skilful in such exaggerations. The young Pretender was led to believe that his moment was come, and that, if he could only unfurl his banner on the hills of Scotland, it would soon be carried through a distracted and defenceless land—our armies being so engaged in Flanders—to the capital and the palace of St. James's. Charles, who had been shooting at Fitz-James, a seat which had belonged to the late Duke of Berwick, went to Paris to get assistance, and to raise some money, being determined to go even without a French army. He found the French ministers quite ready to countenance his schemes, but very badly provided with cash, and rather averse to any open or decided proceeding, which it appears would have given offence to their ally, the King of Prussia, whose schemes and intentions and negotiations were exceedingly complicated. Besides, to secure the advantages they had gained, it was necessary that the French should keep up their army in Flanders; and their past experience proved that the sanguine hopes of the Jacobites were not to be relied upon so as to encourage any great adventure with or for them. The French cabinet wished for a diversion in Scotland, but were not disposed to make any great sacrifices for it. The young Pretender might go, and little they cared what was his fate. The Highlanders had again expressly told him that his coming would be useless and desperate unless he brought with him at least 6000 disciplined troops, 10,000 stand of arms, and some money. The rashness was Charles's and not theirs—but dearly did they pay the penalty of it. He wrote to inform them that he was determined to come, though he could have neither the troops nor the arms required. As for money, all that he could do was to borrow 180,000 livres, and to write to Rome for his jewels that he might pawn them. "For our object," said he, "I would even pawn my shirt." It appears that he concealed his real project from his father, and that all his friends in Scotland, with the single exception of the Duke of Perth, condemned it, and did their best to dissuade him from it. But the rash young man was completely dazzled with the French relations of Fontenoy—an army cut in pieces, a nation in despair,—and the fast succeeding reverses of all that were in alliance with or that were likely to assist King George in his hour of need completed his enchantment. The example of his father, which ought to have deterred him, urged him on; and when, at last, in the month of June, he revealed his design to his family at Rome, he said, after complaining bitterly of what he called the scandalous usage of the French court—"Your majesty cannot disapprove a son's following the example of his father. You yourself did the like in the year fifteen; but the circumstances now are indeed very different, by being much more encouraging. . . . Let what will happen, the stroke is struck; and I have taken a firm resolution to conquer or to die." He had sent agents to Spain to demand succours, and had written to the king and queen, who, however, had no money or troops to spare in the adventure, and who were not inclined to listen to their expelled and ill-treated minister, Cardinal Alberoni, who had been exerting himself at Rome in favour of the Stuart. Leaving Paris, where he had long dropped his incognito, Charles went towards the coast of Normandy, and fixed his residence for a time at the Chateau de Navarre, near Evreux, the seat of the young Duke de Bouillon, one of his warmest friends. His first business was to procure shipping, and this, it appears, was attended with some difficulty, being done at last in an underhand manner, without the knowledge of the French court.* He, however, obtained the Doutelle, a fast sailing brig carrying 18 guns, which had recently been employed as a privateer against the English.† And he clandestinely got the convoy of the Elizabeth, an old man-of-war carrying 67 guns. The Doutelle went round to the mouth of the Loire, and Charles and the gentlemen who had made up their minds to accompany him went by different routes to the town of Nantes. On the 2nd of July Charles, disguised as a student of the Scotch College at Paris, embarked in the Doutelle, but he was detained till the 13th by the non arrival of the Elizabeth, on board of which were embarked the greater part of the warlike materials he had been enabled to procure, and which consisted of some fifteen hundred fusils, eighteen broadswords, twenty small field pieces, some powder, ball, and flints. The money, which he kept under his own care in the Doutelle, was not much above 3000l. sterling. At last the Elizabeth came to the rendezvous, and then the two ships sailed together from Belleisle, Charles suffering much from sea-sickness. It appears that his quality was unknown to the crew, and that the better to conceal himself he let his beard grow. On the fourth day of their voyage a ship bearing the English flag hove in sight. It was the Lion of 58 guns, commanded by the brave Captain Brett, who, as soon as the wind permitted, engaged the two ships. The Doutelle presently hauled off and pursued her course, leaving the Elizabeth to sustain the combat single-handed, which she did gallantly for five or six hours, when she and the Lion parted about equally disabled. In the shattered condition in which his ship was left the French captain deemed it expedient to return to his own coast; the Doutelle, meanwhile, pursued her original course for the coast of Scotland, safe and unhurt, but cut off from the arms and ammunition that had been put on board the Elizabeth. Two days after the parting of the two ships the Doutelle was pursued off the south end of the Long Island by an English ship of superior force; but she was saved by her superior sailing; and, changing her course and ranging along the east side of Barra, she came to anchor off the islet of Erisca, between Barra and South Uist. As they neared the rocky shore, an eagle—no uncommon sight in those quarters—hovered over their ship. “Here,” said Lord Tullibardine, one of the daring adventurers, “is the king of birds come to welcome your royal highness to old Scotland!” Charles went on shore and was conducted to the house of the tacksman or tenant of Erisca, who rented all the small islands which composed that group. His quality was still concealed, and his attendants gave out that the prince was a young Irish priest. From the tacksman they learned that the lord of those islands was MacDonald of Clanronald, a young chief, who was deeply pledged to the Jacobite cause; that this young chief had just gone himself to the main land, and was at Moidart; but that his uncle and chief adviser MacDonald of Boisdale was close at hand, with his brother, upon the island of South Uist. Charles stayed all night at the tacksman’s, having sent a summons to MacDonald of Boisdale. In the morning he returned on board the Doutelle, where the chief of Boisdale soon waited upon him. This old Jacobite, on seeing one small ship and no more, thought that the young Pretender was mad, and he refused to engage his nephew in so desperate an enterprise.

* "It will appear strange to you," writes Charles to his father's secretary Mr. Edgár, "how I should get these things without the knowledge of the French court. I employed one Rutledge and one Walsh, who are French subjects (they were of Irish extraction, the sons of refugees who had followed James II.: Rutledge had been settled at Dunkirk and Walsh at Nantz, and they had united to their trade as West Indian merchants the profitable calling of privateering against England). The first has got a grant of a man-of-war from the French court to cruise on the coast of Scotland, and is luckily obliged to go as far north as I do, so he will escort me without appearing to do it."—Stuart Papers to Lord Mahon's Appendix.—In a letter to his father, dated Chateau Navarre, June 7 (N.S.), he says, "If your majesty was in this country I flatter myself you would be surprised to see with your own eyes how I blind several, and impose upon them at the same time they think to do it to me. If I was not able to do this, things here would go at a fine rate."—Id.

VOL. IV.

Charles then wished him to repair as his ambassador to Sir Alexander MacDonald and MacLeod of MacLeod, two other chiefs with whom he had been in correspondence; but Boisdale flatly told him that such a mission to the Isle of Skye was useless, as he had very lately seen Sir Alexander and MacLeod, who had both declared that if the prince should come they would not join him, unless he brought with him a body of regular troops. The young Pretender then ordered his sailors to weigh the anchor, and the Doutelle with Boisdale’s boat hanging astern, glided away from the island, and advanced several miles towards the main. As soon as he was allowed—which he was when Charles found all his arguments and persuasions ineffectual—the old Jacobite got over the ship’s side into his boat, and rowed back for his island. The Doutelle kept her course for the main land, and came to anchor in the bay of Lochnanuagh, between Moidart and Arisaig. * Young MacDonald of Clanronald presently obeyed Charles’s summons, and went on board attended by several of his clan, and by the head of one of its branches styled MacDonald of Kinloch Moidart. But, though young, MacDonald of Clanronald had some sense and discretion; and he represented, as his uncle had done before him, that it would be madness to take up arms without support from abroad. Charles entreated and implored, appealing to their warlike pride and other passions. During this conversation the parties walked backward and forward upon the deck, talking aloud : a young Highlander, armed at all points in the fashion of his country, was leaning against the taffrel, listening with all his ears and with excited glistening eyes. It was a younger brother of Kinloch Moidart, who had come on board without any knowledge of the prince being there. Charles observed the young Highlander's excitement—watched him as his colour went and came, as he shifted his place, compressed his lips, and grasped the hilt of his broadsword—and then, turning suddenly to him, he exclaimed, “You, at least, will assist me?”—“I will, I will,” cried Ronald; “though no other man in the Highlands should draw a sword, I am ready to die for you.” The enthusiasm was infectious—it caught both the MacDonalds, who swore that they would take up arms instantly, and endeavour to engage every man that wore the tartan to do the same. “At the first appearance of the royal youth, though I then knew him not,” says another of the MacDonalds who had gone on board, “I found my heart swell to my very throat.”* During the 19th, 20th, and 21st, Charles kept close on board with those who had accompanied him from France and with Clanronald :—on the 22nd Clanronald was sent to Sir Alexander MacDonald and MacLeod to induce them to join, and Glennaladel was sent to gather Clanronald's clan and enrol some of the best of the men as a body-guard for the prince, and to be employed in landing the arms and ammunition. Clanronald's mission to the Isle of Skye was in vain; Sir Alexander MacDonald and his friend persisting that Charles ought not to have come without some regular troops, more arms, and money; and that, since he had not fulfilled his engagement, they were not bound in honour to concur in the enterprise. But at the same time encouraging messages were brought from the Glengarries and from other chieftains, some of whom came to the coast and carried back arms and ammunition for their people. On the 25th of July (o. s.) Charles, being thus assured of some support, set his foot for the first time on the main land of Scotland, with a train of only seven persons—the Marquess of Tullibardine, styled by the Highlanders the Duke of Atholl, which he would have been by right of descent but for the bar of the attainder provoked by his conduct in 1715—Sir Thomas Sheridan, who had been Charles's tutor—Sir John MacDonald, an officer in the Spanish service—Kelly, the non-juring clergyman who had been engaged in Bishop Atterbury's plot—Francis Strickland, an English gentleman—Eneas MacDonald, a banker in Paris, but brother to Kinloch Moidart—and Buchanan, who had been the messenger employed by Cardinal Tencin between Paris and Rome. These were afterwards called “The seven men of Moidart.” They were now conducted to Borodale, a farm house in the neighbourhood, which belonged to young Clanronald, whence Charles dispatched letters and messengers to nearly every mountain and glen in the Highlands. The gallant Cameron of Lochiel received the summons and resolved to obey it; not, however, with the intention of joining the prince, but with a design of urging him to forego his rash enterprise and return to France, while he could do so in safety. On his way down to the coast, Lochiel called upon his brother Cameron of Fassefern, who entreated him not to go forward, but to send his sentiments in writing. “I know you,” said Fassefern, “better than you know yourself. If this prince once sets his eyes upon you, he will make you do whatever he pleases.”* But Lochiel, saying that he must, in respect, wait upon the prince, continued his ill-omensed journey to the fatal farm house of Borodale. As soon as he arrived there, Charles took him aside, and artfully or eloquently laboured to remove his strong objections, which the chief stated to him manfully. Lochiel for some time resisted, and, seeing that the young Pretender was determined not to re-embark, he advised him at least to lie concealed where he was. “No,” cried Charles, now making his last and strongest appeal, “I am resolved to put all to the hazard. In a few days, with the few friends I have, I will erect the royal standard, and proclaim to the people of Britain that Charles Stuart is come over to claim the crown of his ancestors, or perish in the attempt. Lochiel, who my father has often told me was our firmest friend, may stay at home, and learn from the newspapers the fate of his prince!” This was too much for the “gentle Lochiel,” as he was always styled by the Highlanders; his resolution

* Lockhart Papers; Journals and Memoirs of Prince Charles's Expedition into Scotland, 1745-6, by a Highland Officer in his army.—It appears from this account that, while Charles was conversing with the chiefs, the rest of the Highlanders who had gone on board were accommodated under a tent or a covering erected on a different part of the deck. “After being three hours with the prince,” says this Journalist, “Clanronald returned to us, and in about half an hour after there entered the tent a plain youth of a most agreeable aspect, in a plain blue coat with a plain shirt not very clean, and a cambric stock fixed with a plain silver buckle, a fair round wig out of the buckle, a plain hat with a canvass string having one end tied to one of his coat buttons; he had black silk stockings, and brass buckles in his shoes: at his first appearance I found my heart swell, &c. We were immediately told by one O'Brien, a churchman, that this youth was also an English clergyman, who had long been possessed with a desire to see and converse with Highlanders. When this youth entered, O'Brien forbade any of those who were sitting to rise; he saluted none of us, and we only made a low bow at a distance. I chanced to be one of those who were standing when he came in, and he took his seat near me, but immediately started up again and caused me to sit down by him upon a chest. I at this time, taking him to be only a passenger or some clergyman, presumed to speak to him with too much familiarity, yet still retained some suspicions that he might be one of more note than he was said to be. He asked me if I was not cold in that habit (viz. the Highland garb); I answered I was so habituated to it that I should rather be so if I was to change my dress for any other. At this he laughed heartily, and next inquired how I lay with it at night, which I explained to him; he said that by wrapping myself so close in my plaid I would be unprepared for any sudden defence in the case of a surprise. I answered that in such times of danger or during a war we had a different method of using the plaid; that with one end fastened to my feet with drawn sword and cocked pistol he lay down, without being the least encumbered with my bed-clothes. He then such questions he put to me; then rising quickly from his seat he called for a dram, when the same person whispered me a second time, to pledge the stranger, but not to drink to him, by which reasonable hint I was confirmed in my suspicion who he was. Having taken a glass of wine in his hand he drank to all around, and soon after left us.”

gave way, and he exclaimed with a warmth equal to that of Charles—"No! I will share the fate of my prince; and so shall every man over whom nature or fortune hath given me any power!" And thus was the die cast; for, if Locheil had persisted in his original intention, there would have been no civil war, and the blood of Culloden would have been spared. Charles then gave a feast "in as hospitable a manner as the place could afford;"—men, women, and children crowded to see him, and the Highland chiefs and chieftains drank in deep cups—"Deochs laint an Reogh," which was good Erse for "God save the king." Locheil returned to his clan, and sent messengers through Lochaber, and to every spot where there was a Cameron living, with word that they must march to Glenfinnin and join their chief in arms. Some detachments from the Glengarries were sent down to Charles at Borodale, who then set out for Kinloch Moidart, a town distant about seven miles: he went himself by sea with his artillery and baggage, but the Highlanders marched close by the shore.* In spite of every precaution, "a surmise of the prince's landing was now whispered abroad; and the government having notice thereof, sent a detachment of four companies to reinforce their garrison at Fort William." It was upon this detachment that the Highland broad-sword was first drawn. The regulars, which consisted of two companies, and not of four, as stated by the Jacobites, had to pass through part of the country of Glengarry and Keppoch, in the midst of lakes, mountains, and torrents. They were commanded by Captain John Scott, who set out at a very early hour in the morning of the 16th of August, that he might reach Fort William before night, there being no quarters on the road. Scott advanced cautiously, but without any disturbance, till he got near High Bridge, built over a mountain torrent which can hardly be passed by any other means; but then he heard a shrill bagpipe, and saw some Highlanders on the other side of the bridge, skipping about with swords and firelocks in their hands. He instantly halted his men and sent forward a sergeant with his own trusty body-servant to reconnoitre; but they had not gone many steps when two nimble Highlanders darted out from a cranny in the rocks, seized them and carried them over the bridge. As he knew not what was their force—as they appeared more numerous than they were,

* Charles, with his baggage, &c., was conveyed in three boats, furnished by the Highlanders. The Doutelle soon returned to France, Walsh carrying with him a letter to the old Pretender, in which Charles begged a title for the armateur and privateer owner. It appears the vain honour was conferred. There is still in France a Count Walsh—a descendant or representative of the original Walsh. This Monsieur le Comte has married an English lady.

and as the pass was so narrow and difficult, Scott turned face and retreated. The Highlanders let the soldiers go quietly for some two or three miles, till they saw themselves engaged in a narrow road between Loch Lochie and a mountain, when they opened a murderous fire from behind trees and rocks—a fire which not only wounded Scott's men, but attracted other armed mountaineers to the spot. The regulars hastened their march, hoping to get to Invergarry, a place of some strength; but they had not gone far when they saw another body of Highlanders coming down the hill in their front, and heard bagpipes and fierce cries on every side. They were, in fact, surrounded, and Captain Scott was badly wounded, and two of his men were killed. They formed into a hollow square, but resistance was hopeless, and when MacDonald of Keppoch ran to the spot with a fresh party, offering quarter, and assuring them that if they attempted further resistance they would be cut to pieces, the soldiers laid down their arms. Matters were in this state when Cameron of Lochell arrived on the spot with some of his clansmen, took charge of the prisoners and conducted them to his house at Achnacarie. The Highlanders, who had not lost a single man, were exceedingly elated with this their first essay.*

The general rendezvous of the Camerons and other Jacobite clans was appointed to be at Glenfinn, a narrow vale in which the river Finnin runs between lofty and craggy mountains, inaccessible to horse. The vale is closed at either end by a loch, or lake, about twelve miles long. Leaving Kinloch Moidart, Charles repaired to this glen,† and entered a shepherd's hovel to await the arrival of the clans. For nearly two hours not a soul was seen; but then Lochell and his men appeared hanging on the top of one of the mountains. The Camerons rapidly descended, and then advanced towards the prince in two lines, each line being three men deep, and the two companies of prisoners without their arms marching between the two lines. They were not all armed, but from 700 to 800 brave Highlanders stood in this martial array before Charles, who instantly gave orders to erect, for the first time, the royal standard. Old Tullibardine unfurled the colours, which were made of white, blue, and red silk, and which were twice the size of an ordinary pair of colours; his lordship, supported by a Highlander on each side, held the flag-staff till a manifesto from James and his commission of regency to his son were read, both being dated at Rome, December, 1743. When this was over Charles made a short speech to the chiefs;—few of the common men could understand a word he said, but they all shouted till the mountains rang again, and “such loud huzzas and skimming of bounets up into the air, appearing like a cloud, was not heard of a long time.”* Captain Swettenham, an English officer who had been taken prisoner as he was travelling towards Fort William the day before the unfortunate affair of the two companies, was an unwilling spectator of this wild and romantic scene. At first the common men had treated the captain rather roughly; but “no gentleman could be better used than he was when he got among the gentlemen; neither was there anything that was taken from him but what was returned, except his horse's saddle and sword; and the prince had ordered a pair of horses to be given him in lieu of his own; but that was neglected.”† The Highlanders told Captain Swettenham that they would soon be in England, where they were sure to meet with friends enough. Charles, it is said, in releasing the captain upon his parole, told him to go to his general, describe to him what he had seen, and tell him that he was coming to give him battle. On the same day, and shortly after the elevation of the standard, on the 19th of August, MacDonald of Keppoch joined with 300 men, and in the evening some of the MacLeods came to Glenfinn, disclaimed their chieftain as a traitor and coward, and enrolled themselves in the rebel army. All that night they lay in Glenfinn, which was not above fifteen miles from Fort William. On the morrow, the 20th of August, they began their march southward; O'Sullivan, an Irish officer, acting as quartermaster-general—an office scarcely needed in a Highland army. When Charles halted at Lochell's house he was joined by MacDonald of Glenco, who brought him 150 men; by Stuart of Appin, who brought about 200; and by the younger Glengarry, who brought 200 more. His force now consisted of 1500 or 1600 men; and he confidently assured himself that, as he advanced, it would gather and grow like a snow-hill in motion.

On the very day that the rebel standard was erected at Glenfinn, Sir John Cope, commander-in-chief for Scotland, put himself at the head of his troops, which had for some time been drawing together near Stirling. A hint had been sent to Edinburgh on the 2nd of July that the Pretender's eldest son was expected to land in the Highlands that summer; and Cope, whose force was weak, had written repeatedly to London to the Marquess of Tweeddale, the secretary of state for Scotland,

* According to the Lord President of the Court of Session, Duncan Forbes, who did more towards suppressing this rebellion than any man, the Highlanders had not much to boast of in a military point of view. In a letter to Sir Alexander Mac Donald, whom he was labouring to keep steady in his determination not to join the rebels, Duncan Forbes says—“Two companies of the Royal made prisoners sounds pretty well, and will surely be passed for a notable achievement; but when it is considered that these companies were not half complete, that they were lads picked up last season in the low country, without anything of the royal but the name, and that their officers were raw, the achievement is not by any means so important.”—Letters in Appendix to Howe's Hist. Rebellion.

† “As the prince was setting out for Glenfinn to meet his friends according to appointment, I was detached to Ardnamurchan to recruit, and soon returned with fifty clever fellows who pleased the prince, and, upon review, his highness was pleased to honour me with the command of them, and told me I was the first officer he had made in Scotland; which compliment encouraged my vanity not a little, and, with our friends, vowed to the Almighty we would live and die with our noble prince, though all Britain should forsake him but our little regiment alone.”—Journal of the Highland Officer, in Lockhart Papers.

representing the necessity of providing against invasion and insurrection. But Tweeddale and the lords of the regency were somewhat incredulous, and very much disinclined to take any steps during the absence of his majesty, who had gone to Hanover, and who did not return to England till the 31st of August (o.s.). On the 30th of July, however, Lord Tweeddale wrote to Sir John Cope to put him on the alert, and to inform him that the lords justices, or lords of the regency, had received several informations, importing that the French court was meditating an invasion, and that the Pretender's son had sailed from Nantes, and by some accounts was said to be actually landed in Scotland; "which last part," added the marquess, "I can hardly believe." On the 6th of August the regency published a proclamation in the London Gazette, offering a reward of 30,000*l.* to any person or persons that should seize and secure the Pretender's eldest son. On the 8th of August, before this proclamation reached Edinburgh, a letter was received at the Scottish capital from the Lord Justice Clerk, Andrew Fletcher Lord Milton, who was with the Duke of Argyll at his grace's seat of Roseneath, in Dumbartonshire, importing that his lordship had received certain information from one that had lived in Glenco, and had connexions both in Lochaber and Glen-garry, that the Pretender's eldest son was really landed, and that the disaffected Highlanders were expecting every day to hear of another landing in England. "Money," added his lordship, "is sent to this person, who lives in Glenco, to enable him to travel northward, and get more sure intelligence of the designs, movements, and progress of these people." His letter and other papers were forwarded by express to London, and the Marquess of Tweeddale then hastened to send down to Sir John Cope orders for money to answer the exigencies of the case, and to put other sums at the disposal of Lord Milton, for procuring intelligence, or for other services necessary at this juncture. Tweeddale also approved of Cope's intention of marching directly with such troops as could be spared, hoping that that general would be able to check any sudden insurrection, especially as no accounts had been received of any foreign troops being landed or of any preparations making by the French at Dunkirk. "There are, indeed," said his lordship, "accounts that mention some Spanish men-of-war being at Ferrol, which it is not impossible may be intended to give us disturbance in some port here." Tweeddale, moreover, authorised the Justice Clerk to issue proper warrants for seizing persons suspected of being engaged in treasonable practices, without waiting for orders from London, which might perhaps come too late.* Sir John Cope then hastened his preparations, proposing to march his troops into the heart of the Highlands and fight the rebels wherever he might find them. Tweeddale and the lords of the regency, without knowing what force Charles had collected, and apparently without reflecting on the danger of engaging the only army they had in Scotland in the glens and defiles of the Highlands, and leaving the capital and the whole of the Lowlands open to attack, sent down an express with positive orders to Cope to march forthwith. That general sent out officers and intelligent sergeants in various directions to examine the ground; and the attempt was made to reinforce Fort William with two companies, of which we have seen the unfortunate issue. He continued to remain completely in the dark as to the force of the insurgents, and as to the positive whereabouts of the young Pretender; and the Jacobites spared no pains to prolong this darkness, and to bewilder one that never saw very clearly—a man of routine, a martinet, that could play only one regular game in war, and who was disconcerted, like a bad chess-player, by every move except the most straightforward or transparent ones. He was constantly puzzled by anonymous letters containing the most absurd and contradictory articles of intelligence; one hour he was assured that Charles had brought 10,000 Frenchmen with him—the next that he had none but Highlanders; for a long time he had been assured that Charles had not come at all,—that it was a false alarm, created by a French smuggler,—and when this story was worn out, he was told that, though Charles had really been in the Highlands, he was going back as fast as he could, finding that few of the Highlanders would join him. Others of his Jacobite correspondents indulged in the facetious vein, as if to laugh him out of his caution: thus one wrote to him that a French army of 3000 men had landed at the Goose Dubb, a puddle in a meadow close by the walls of Edinburgh! Having collected all the men he could, Sir John Cope found himself at the head of about 1500 foot and two regiments of dragoons—Gardiner's and Hamilton's; both infantry and cavalry being chiefly composed, if not of raw recruits, of men that had never seen any active service. Considering that the horse would be unserviceable and difficult to subsist in the rough country, he left both the regiments of dragoons behind him; and with the foot, four field-pieces, four colorns, a great number of provision-carts and baggage-carts, and 700 stand of arms to distribute among the well-affected Highlanders, he marched away from Stirling for Crieff, intending to proceed to Fort Augustus, a central post between Fort William and Fort George, the three forts having been built as a chain to curb the Highlanders, and to cross the whole country from east to west. At Crieff he expected to be joined by hundreds, but not a soul came to his standard. He therefore sent back to Stirling 400 of the spare muskets he had brought with him, well knowing that arms were much wanted—that the whole of the Lowlands was most lamentably deficient of this means of defence—that there was a far greater want of guns and swords than of heart and courage. From Crieff Cope advanced to Dalnacardoch, where he arrived on the 25th of August, and where he met Captain Swettenham, who had witnessed the raising of the standard of the Stuart in Glenfinnin. The captain told the general that when he left the rebels on his parole their number did not exceed 1400 men; but he added that he had since met upon the road several parties going to join them, and had heard at Dalwhinnie a day or two before that they were 3000 strong. Yet Cope, assuming that they must be very indifferently armed, thought that even 3000* Highlanders might be beaten by 1500 regulars; and he continued his march to Dalwhinnie, where he arrived on the 26th. Captain Swettenham had assured him that the Jacobite clans, perfectly well aware of his approach, intended to bar his passage at Corryarrak, an immense mountain that lay between him and Fort Augustus, and directly in his line of March; and now this assurance was confirmed by the active and vigilant Duncan Forbes, who was fortunately in the Highlands at his seat called Culloden House, near Inverness and Fort George. Cope determined to change his route, but not before consulting a council of war, to which he summoned every field officer and every commander of a separate corps in his little army. He laid before this meeting the positive orders he had received from the Marquess of Tweeddale to advance into the Highlands—orders which never ought to have been given under the circumstances—and produced the different accounts he had received of the number and condition of the rebels. His officers were of opinion—it is said unanimously so—that the march to Fort Augustus by Corryarrak was impracticable. That famed mountain, which, seen from the south, seems to rise almost like a perpendicular wall, would have been bar and impediment enough if, instead of 3000, there had only been 300 armed Highlanders. It was traversed by a military road made by General Wade after the insurrection of 1715—a complete Alpine road carried up to the summit on the south side by seventeen ramps or traverses, and thence down to the valleys on the north by other traverses, and across several deep glens and chasms with mountain torrents roaring and foaming through them, over which narrow bridges were the only passage.† Duncan Forbes, who knew the ground well, had warned Cope to beware of Corryarrak. The best thing the general could have done would have been to retreat at once to Stirling and cover Edinburgh; but Tweeddale's orders stuck in his throat, and, as he continued to dwell upon them, the council of war, by a sudden and most unlucky inspiration, thought he would be fulfilling his instructions if he marched anywhere to the north, and recommended him to give up the route he had chosen for Fort Augustus, and strike aside for Inverness and Fort George, as the only part of the chain he could reach. He made them give this their opinion in writing; and then, on the following day, he quitted Dalwhinnie, and marched towards Garvamore, on the road to Corryarrak.

But, while he had been halting and hesitating, the light-footed Highlanders had been moving with their usual rapidity, and before he got eight miles from Dalwhinnie, when his line was thin and far extended, he saw some tartans darting along the hill sides: and then he called a halt, faced about, and, leaving the road to Garvamore, took, more rapidly than he had intended, the road which diverges there and leads by Ruthven to Inverness. No one had joined him, but not a few had left him; and now a deserter from his ranks—a Cameron—ran away to his friends upon the hill side, and communicated all the intelligence he was master of. Early that morning Charles had ascended the summit of Corryarrak, expecting to see Cope advancing on the zigzag road; but he could see nothing but a few Highlanders, who proved to be deserters, and who assured him that Cope was going a different road. Instantly detachments were hurried in advance along the declivities of the mountains, and these men presently saw the English army moving off by the Ruthven road. The Highlanders exulted, and wished to run down and pursue, and give battle; but the chiefs thought it would be far better to let Cope go his way and strike off themselves into the Lowlands by the route which he had left completely open to them, and so advance to Stirling and the capital.* And while Sir John proceeded by forced marches to Inverness, where he arrived on the 29th of August, the Highland army, moving far more rapidly, went through the mountains of Badenoch into the vale of Atholl, being joined just before or during their march by 100 men of the clan of the Grants of Glenmoriston, and by other little troops, all hot for Prince Charles and for the plunder of the South. On the 30th of August Charles reached Blair Castle, from which the Whig Duke of Atholl fled at his approach, while his brother Tullibardine, (the Jacobite Duke of Atholl) prepared to take possession of his paternal mansion. Tullibardine, who was above sixty years of age when he entered on this desperate enterprise, feasted the prince and his ancestral vassals in the Castle, and seems to have fancied that he had got his own again for good after a quarter of a century of exile and attainder.† They stayed two days at Blair, and were joined by several Highland gentlemen bring-

* The consternation produced by this intelligence in London was immense. Many people considered that Scotland was lost. "The young Pretender," says Horace Walpole, "at the head of 2000 men, has got a march on General Cope, who is not 1800 strong; and, when the last accounts came away, was fifty miles nearer Edinburgh than Cope, and by this time is there. The clans will not rise for the government. . . . I look upon Scotland as gone!"—Letter to Horace Mann, dated September 6.

† It appears that the Whig duke, during his elder brother's exile, had greatly improved the place, and had got a good garden at Blair-Atholl. "The young Chevalier," says Horace Walpole, "stayed some time at the Duke of Atholl's, whither Old Tullibardine sent to bespeak dinner; and has since sent his brother word that he likes the alterations made there. The Pretender found pine-apples there, the first he ever tasted."—Letter to Horace Mann.

* "We were not," says the Highland journalist, "when our little army was encamped and provisions provided, above 1800 men, under the command of Clanronald, Lochell, and Kerpeoh. The Macdonalds of Glenparry, being 600 good men, and the men of Appen being 600 more, joined afterwards."—Lochell's Papers.

ing all the men they could; but still Fraser Lord Lovat, whose influence was immense, kept aloof, though Charles had sent him his patent to be Duke of Fraser, and his commission to be lieutenant of all the northern counties. Cameron of Lochell had waited upon this wily head of the Frasers; but Duncan Forbes, true and staunch to the established government, was at the same time labouring to keep the old man quiet. "Lord Lovat," writes Forbes, on the 19th of August, "was with me here (at Culloden House) last Thursday, and has, by the bad weather, been detained at Inverness till this day. He has declared to me his full purpose to be prudent, and I verily believe him."* On the very next day, Forbes, writing to Sir John Cope for a supply of arms, expresses his apprehension that, should the Pretender move that way, Lord Lovat and others of "the well disposed" might be under considerable difficulties, as their clans had got no arms. He adds, however, that Lovat and Lord Fortrose had been with him again, and had promised to collect all their people to act in defence of the government. Lovat wrote in a somewhat different strain to Lochell—"My service to the prince," said the old fox; "I will aid you what I can, but my prayers are all I can give at present." This hoary sinner, who had crowded nearly every page of a long life with crime and guile—who had been of all parties and had betrayed all, but whose first public act was carrying off the Frasers to fight under the banner of Dundee for James II., as his last act was dying on a scaffold for the Stuart cause—evidently wished to gain time and to see what was likely to be the success of the young Pretender before he joined him. With such a man, to be prudent meant merely to join the stronger. No doubt he also wanted to get some of the arms for which Duncan Forbes was writing, before he should give any the least suspicion to the friends of government.† His son-in-law MacPherson of Clunie, the head of a clan, was less circumspect; for, being taken prisoner—apparently a willing one—he forgot his oaths and obligations to government, which had appointed him captain of an independent company, and, after some conversation with Charles, joined him at once, and engaged to raise his clan for that service. After his two days' rest at Blair-Atholl, the young Pretender resumed his march to the south, and on the 4th of September he entered Perth, not merely without opposition, but amidst loud acclamations. The money he had brought from France was already spent, and he had only one Louis-d'or in his pocket; but, showing the coin to Mr. Kelly, he gaily assured that nonjuring parson that he should soon get more cash. And, as active collectors, he forthwith detached armed parties of Highlanders through Angus and Fife, who proclaimed King James VIII., seized all the public money they could find, and levied the duties and taxes due to the established government. The city of Perth furnished him with 500*l.; but he prudently abstained from plundering the merchants and dealers that were attending the fair at Perth on his arrival. It must, however, have been absolutely impossible wholly to prevent the wild Highlanders from indulging in their inveterate habit of "lifting." Still further to lengthen his diminutive purse, some hot Jacobites in Edinburgh and other places clandestinely sent him voluntary donations or loans, which were to be repaid when King James got his own again. But few of the Lowlanders appeared to recruit his little army. He fixed his residence in the town of Perth in an old house belonging to Lord Stormont; and there he entertained the ladies of the place with a ball. At Perth James Drummond, in the Jacobite Red Book Duke of Perth, came and joined him after a narrow escape from arrest by the government. This Perth was young, brave, courteous, and inexperienced—a pleasing, shallow-headed person. Lord George Murray, a much older and a much abler man, who had been engaged with his brother Tulibardine in the affair of the Fifteen, came in at the same time to offer his sword and his military experience. Lord George had served several years abroad in the armies of the King of Sardinia; but having received a pardon from the government he had returned home, and had been living for some and to Duncan Forbes, signing himself to the latter "Your most affectionate cousin and most faithful slave." He announced how chief after chief was joining the young Pretender, dwelt upon his own extreme danger, and still pressed for arms. On the 27th of August he writes to Forbes—"I own, I must regret my dear cousin Lochell, who, contrary to his promise to me, engaged in this mad enterprise; but if Sir John Cope is best (which I think next to impossible), this desperate prince will be the occasion of much bloodshed, which I pray God may avert; for to have bloodshed in our bowels is a horrible thing to any man that loves Scotland, or has a good stake in it, as your lordship and I have. Therefore I pray God that we may not have a civil war in Scotland: this has been my constant wish since ever I had the use of my reason; and it shall be the same while there is breath in me; so that they must be damnably ignorant of the principle of my heart and soul, who can imagine that I would endeavour to promote a civil war in my country." But Lovat, to use the words of Walker Scott, was at all times profuse of oaths and protestations, and more so than ever when he had determined in his own mind to infringe them.

† Lovat had also been applied to on the first news of the landing of the Pretender by the Lord Advocate Robert Craigie, who spoke very flatteringly of his lordship's zeal for the established government, and of his power and influence in the Highlands. The old chieftain, in his reply, assured the lord advocate that no hardship or ill usage that he had met with could alter or diminish his zeal and attachment for his majesty's person and government. But, says he, "my clan and I have been so neglected these many years that I have not twelvemonth stand of arms in my country, though I thank God I could bring 1200 good men to the field for the king's service, if I had arms and other accoutrements for them. Therefore, my good lord, I earnestly intreat, that, as you wish that I would do good service to the government on this critical occasion, you may order immediately a thousand stand of arms to be delivered to me and my clan at Inverness; and then your lordship shall see that I will exert myself for the king's service. Although I am entirely infirm myself these three or four months past, yet I have very pretty gentlemen of my family that will lead my clan wherever I bid them for the king's service. And if we do not get these arms immediately we will certainly be undone. For those madmen that are in arms with the pretended Prince of Wales threaten every day to burn and destroy my country, if we do not rise in arms and join them; so that my people cry out horribly that they have no arms to defend themselves, nor no protection nor support from the government. So I earnestly intreat your lordship may consider seriously on this; for it will be an essential and serious loss to the government if my clan and kindred be destroyed, who possess the centre of the Highlands of Scotland and the countries, most proper, by their situation, to save the king and government. . . . I hear that mad and unaccountable gentleman (Charles) has set up a standard at a place called, Glenfinnan, Monday last."—Culloden Papers. years on his estates, to all appearance the happy father of a family. But, it is said, he had been anxious for the honours and profits of military employment, and had been driven back to a rabid state of Jacobitism by the refusal of the government to employ one who had repeatedly fought against the king, at home and abroad. He has been generally esteemed the best officer and planner of a campaign that ever followed Charles. He had genius enough to soar above the pedantry of his art, and, seeing that there was no time to complete that military transformation, he recommended that no attempt should be made to perplex and confound the Highlanders with new tactics, new weapons, and new modes of marching and fighting; but that they should be left to their old methods, with merely a little improvement in the way of training. This Lord George Murray had courage and mettle equal to his skill; but he is accused of having been of a very bad temper, and of not very good manners. It appears that he was hardly in the rebel camp ere he quarrelled with Perth, of whom he was jealous, and with Sir Thomas Sheridan, the ignorant tutor of the ignorant Charles, whom he despised, among other things, for his want of all knowledge of the laws and constitution of the country. A printing press was set at work at Perth, and proclamations were struck off and widely distributed. One of these, as a retaliation, offered thirty pounds to any person or persons that should seize and secure George

Elector of Hanover, &c. This was considered merely as a joke, or as a cutting way of expressing contempt; but shortly after, this offer of reward was raised to 30,000*l.* "Should any fatal accident," said the proclamation, "happen from hence, let the blame lie entirely at the door of those who first set the infamous example." Charles dispatched a letter to the Earl of Barrymore in London, a noted Jacobite, who had been arrested and released the year before by government, and who, as the possessor of great wealth, was supposed to have influence over the disaffected in England. In the letters and other writings of the Jacobites there now and then peeps out a hint of promises received from the capital and from one or two other English towns; but we find not a single proof of anything like an important engagement made by any party of men in England. On the 11th of September, with his army strengthened by above 200 men brought in by the Duke of Perth, by 100 who had joined under Robertson of Strowan, and by a handful of Lowland recruits, Charles left Perth; and, marching at the head of a detachment, he reached Dunblane that evening, having been joined on the road by MacGregor of Glengulic, with 250 MacGregors—"all with red hair"—and by MacDonald with sixty MacDonalds. He was now in a hurry to reach Edinburgh, for he had received news that General Cope, after getting to Inverness, was marching to Aberdeen, with the intention of embarking at that port and returning with all the speed that winds and waves would permit for the defence of the capital. If Sir John had been there with only a fourth part of his men, Charles could never have had to record the occupation of Edinburgh in his eventful story. He felt now that if Cope could land in the neighbourhood of the city before he reached its walls the cause would be hopeless; and on the 12th he pushed forward from Dumblane for the Frith of Forth. Knowing that several ships of the royal navy were stationed at the head of the Frith, and that the bridge of Stirling was commanded by the artillery of the castle, he directed his steps to Frew, a spot about eight miles above Stirling, where the Forth is fordable at low water. When he got to the ford of Frew, Gardiner's dragoons were on the opposite bank; but, instead of attempting to defend the ford, or to annoy the Highlanders on their passage, these unwarlike horsemen turned their horses' tails and trotted off towards Leith,* whither Hamilton's, the other body of horse which Cope had left behind him, had repaired some days before. Having crossed the river on the evening of the 13th, Charles lay that night at Leckie House. Continuing his march on the following morning he passed within a mile of Stirling Castle,† from the ramparts of which one or two cannon-shots were fired at him. Traversing the field of Bannockburn he proceeded to Falkirk, quartered his men in that town, and took up his own lodging for the night at Callender, the seat of the Earl of Kilmarnock. A thousand Highlanders, under Lord George Murray, ran on by night to Linlithgow, hoping to catch and surprise Gardiner's dragoons while resting there; but the dragoons were too quick for them—their fears had sharpened their spurs, and before the clansmen reached that "royal dwelling" they were considerably advanced on the road to Leith and Edinburgh. On the evening of that day—Sunday the 15th—the young Pretender and the whole of his army were quartered in Linlithgow, which is only sixteen miles from Edinburgh. A faithful messenger carried this ominous news to the capital, which remained in a very defenceless state, for Cope had not got back from his Highland promenade, though transports had been dispatched on the 10th to convey him and his troops. The citizens, who had been so long accustomed to a life of quiet, were thrown into consternation. At first, underrating the force of the Highlanders, they had despised the danger; and government had been extremely remiss in providing the means of defence. The reader by this time must have formed a pretty correct notion of what Cope's two regiments of dragoons were worth: these were now collected outside of the town at Corstorphine, between Leith and Linlithgow, about three miles from the city walls; and within the town the only force consisted of the town guard—"the Edinburgh regiment," a very indifferent body of men, who had been levied and embodied a week or two before—and the corps of Edinburgh Volunteers, who knew nothing of war, and whose number never amounted to 500 men. Of the latter, "many, doubtless, were gallant young men—students from the university, and so forth—but by far the greater part were citizens, at an age unfit to take up arms, without previous habit and experience. They had religious zeal and political enthusiasm to animate them; but these, though they make a prodigious addition to the effect of discipline, cannot supply its place. Cromwell's enthusiasts beat all the nobility and gentry of England; but the same class of men, not having the advantage of similar training, fled at Bothwell Bridge, without even waiting to see their enemy. Many of the Edinburgh corps were moreover Oneyers and Moneyers, as Falstaff says, men whose word upon 'Change would go much farther than their blows in battle. Most had shops to be plundered, houses to be burned, children to be brained with Lochaber axes, and wives, daughters, and favourite handmaidens to be treated according to the rules of war."‡ The chief command rested with the lord provost or principal magistrate, Archibald Stewart, who was afterwards suspected of Jacobitism, but who probably was merely unmartial, and confounded like the rest. The city was indeed surrounded by a wall which had parapets; but the wall in many places was not ten feet high, and not stronger than a garden enclosure; and, as for the parapets, they were for the most part too narrow to admit the mounting of proper cannon, if there had been proper guns to use, which, it appears, there were not. Professor MacLaurin, the famous mathematician, had indeed been at work in devising some fortifications, but he had not been allowed either time or materials to finish his work. The Castle, on its steep rock, was safe; but General Guest, a brave old soldier, who commanded there, had a very small garrison, and could hardly spare a man beyond the walls of the fortress. Still, however, according to Home, who was himself one of the most active and zealous of the corps, the volunteers, who had received each man a musket, bayonet, and cartridge-box from the dépôt in the Castle, and who had been drilling, morning, noon, and night, for three days and no more, kept a good countenance, and seemed determined to fight the rebels. But the historian allows that Mr. Drummond, their captain, could only answer for 250 of the number. Drummond asked these picked men if they were willing to risk their lives for the defence of the capital of Scotland and the honour of their country; and whether they would go out, make a stand with the two regiments of † "The town of Stirling, abandoned by the dragoons, was ready to receive us, though we did not enter; provisions being demanded were soon provided for us by order of the magist. dragoons, and fight the Highlanders on their way to the city;—a plan, he said, which had been proposed and recommended by General Guest, who imagined that the two regiments of horse would make a great impression if they had only a body of foot with them to draw off the enemy's fire. The two hundred and fifty, having an equal or superior confidence in the prowess of the dragoons, threw up their hats in the air, and began a huzza to signify that they were ready to march out and die on the field. But it was immediately felt that none but "young men not connected with families, and at liberty to dispose of their own lives," should go to this new Marathon. They had surveyed the walls and had been fully convinced that they could not be defended; yet "most part of the volunteers in every company (Captain Drummond's company only excepted) had really no mind to march out of town, and some of them murmured at the proposal."*

As their houses were high and strongly built of stone, and as the streets were narrow, they might have defended Edinburgh when the Highlanders had climbed the walls or forced the gates, if they had only had a sufficient supply of fire-arms and a little more confidence; but it appears that this idea was never suggested. Their own arms were few, and they had got it into their heads that the young Pretender was coming with a regular train of artillery, with which he might have battered down their houses. Captain Drummond, however, informed General Guest that his company, and a good many other volunteers, would assuredly go out and fight; and the Lord Provost agreed that ninety men of the town-guard, and as many of the men of the Edinburgh regiment as were fit for service, should accompany the volunteers and dragoons, and support them in the battle. In the course of the preceding Saturday night orders had been given that all the volunteers should repair to the Lawn-market, under arms, whenever the fire-bell of the town was rung. This alarm was sounded on Sunday during kirk time, and, "instead of rousing the hearts of the volunteers like the sound of a trumpet, it rather reminded them of a passing knell."† This choice of a signal was, indeed, rather unfortunate, and was not forgotten afterwards in the censures passed upon the Provost. But, spite of that dreadful bell, the gentlemen volunteers, who had pledged their valour, assembled in the appointed market-place, and, if we are to believe that priestly and poetical warrior and historian, John Home, who was himself one of them, they were ready to go out, and would have gone, if it had not been for the mothers and fathers, wives, sweethearts, and other near connexions, who, rushing out of church, mixed in their ranks, and caught them by the arms, imploring them, with tears and with prayers, to have more regard for their precious Christian lives than to risk them with a set of beggarly, heathenish Highlanders. At this moment Hamilton's dragoons, who were moving between the links of Leith and Corstorphine, the selected Marathon, appeared outside the town-walls, waiting for their infantry, and making martial music by clashing their swords together. The volunteers gave a huzza—it is believed to have been a faint one—and the bold Drummond gave the word of command, to march. But the tears of the women and the arguments of the old men, who still kept mixed with their lines, had produced their effect: some lagged behind—some stood stock still—others sidled off into closes or courts, or bolted into houses with tempting, open doors. In descending "the Bow," they made a more decided conquest over their sense of shame, and disappeared under door-ways or down blind alleys, scores at a time. The officers complained that their men would not follow, while the men complained that their officers would not lead; and when Captain Drummond halted near the town-gate called the West Port, and looked behind him, he could scarcely see a volunteer, except the forty men of his own company.* Home assures us that Dr. Wishart, principal of the University of Edinburgh, and several other clergymen, had addressed the volunteers while in the Grass Market; and had conjured them, by all they held most sacred, to stay within the walls, and reserve themselves for the defence of the city; and that the Lord Provost was very much against their marching, and sent them word that he was glad to see that they intended to stay. Drummond marched back with his company to the College yard; and the Provost ordered his precious town-guard of ninety men and some of the Edinburgh regiment to join the dragoons without the volunteers. He might as well have sent the Levies which marched through Coventry with Sir John Falstaff. Twenty of the youngest and most enthusiastic of the volunteers stole away from the College yard to a tavern, "where they unbosomed themselves, and resolved that, if the town was not to be defended, which they thought was very likely to happen, in that case they would separate from the other volunteers, and march to the eastward with their arms, in order to join Cope." † Home, who narrates this decision, was one of the men that took it; and when the corps to which they belonged gave up musket, bayonet, cartridge-box and all, to be lodged for safety in the Castle, Home and his friends sallied out from Edinburgh, and took the road to Dunbar. On Sunday evening, while the Provost and the other notables of Edinburgh were debating and speech-making in the Goldsmiths' Hall, Colonel Gardiner, having left an advanced post at Corstorphine, retreated with the rest of his dragoons to a field between Leith and Edinburgh, and sent back the worse than useless supply of infantry into the town. In the course of the night Brigadier Fowkes arrived from London, and took the chief command. The Highlanders lay that night

* The author of Douglas hints, in a note to his History, that even Drummond's courage was all make-believe; that "he did not intend to fight the rebel army; but that his real intention was to make himself popular at the eye of an election, by showing extraordinary zeal."

upon a rising ground between Linlithgow and Edinburgh, at the distance of about twelve miles from the capital. But early on Monday morning they began to move, the Pretender contriving to send beforehand a message to the people of Edinburgh to acquaint them, that, if they would admit him peaceably, all would be well; but otherwise they must make up their minds for military execution. As the rebels approached Corstorphine they saw the advanced party of dragoons; but they had scarcely more than a glimpse of them; for, without touching sabre, pistol, or carbine, the dragoons wheeled about, and rode off to the main body, which was now posted by Fowkes and Colonel Gardiner at the east end of Colt Bridge, about two miles from Edinburgh, on the way to Corstorphine. But the main body did not long stand there: "before the rebels came within sight orders were issued to the dragoons to wheel, which they immediately did with the greatest order and regularity imaginable. As it is known that nothing is more beautiful than the evolutions and movements of cavalry, the spectators stood in expectation of what fine, war-like manœuvre they might terminate in, when new orders were immediately issued to retreat, which they immediately obeyed, and began to march at the usual pace of cavalry. Orders were repeated every furlong to quicken their pace, and, both precept and example concurring, they quickened it so well, that before they reached Edinburgh they had quickened it to a pretty smart gallop. They passed in inexpressible hurry and confusion through the narrow lanes at Barefoot's Park, in the sight of all the north part of the town, to the infinite joy of the disaffected, and equal grief and consternation of all the other inhabitants. They rushed like a torrent down to Leith, where they endeavoured to draw breath; but some unlucky boy (I suppose a Jacobite in his heart) calling to them that the Highlanders were approaching, they immediately took to their heels again and galloped to Prestonpans, about six miles farther."* Six or seven hundred men, consisting of the trained bands, the Edinburgh volunteers, and some other volunteers who had come in from Musselburgh and Dalkeith, still mounted guard at the different gates of the capital; but the young Pretender's message, which was promptly delivered, and then the sight of the flying dragoons, presently settled the question of resistance or non-resistance in the hearts of most of the notables that had assembled to debate in the Goldsmiths' Hall. Yet the meeting thought it would take a middle course, and a deputation was sent out to Charles, desiring that hostilities might not commence till they had had more time for deliberation. The deputies had scarcely taken their departure, when the Provost and magistrates received intelligence that the transports with General Cope's army on board were off

Dunbar; and that, as the wind was unfavourable for coming up to Leith, the general intended to land at Dunbar, and then march with all speed to the capital. This piece of intelligence materially changed the face of affairs; and it was resolved to recal the deputation, and to apply to General Guest for arms, and for the recal of the fugitive dragoons. Guest had some doubts about risking his muskets, bayonets, and cartridge-boxes again in the hands of men who had given them up; and he told the magistrates that it was absolutely necessary for his majesty's service that the dragoons should be ordered to join General Cope, who had no cavalry with him. It is fair to doubt whether any messenger could have run fast enough to catch these performers of "the canter of Colt Brigg;" or whether, if the message had reached them, the dragoons would have had heart to obey it. Scared from Prestonpans they had galloped on to North Berwick, and seemed determined to stop nowhere till they should get under cover of Cope's infantry. There was another cause of embarrassment; the gentlemen composing the deputation could not be overtaken before they reached Charles, and they were now in his hands as hostages, and ready to be hanged—so thought their tender friends—if the town should ring the alarm-bell again, or attempt resistance. At about ten o'clock at night, the town being quiet the while, the deputies returned from Gray's Mill, a place within two miles of the city, where Charles was now quartered. The answer they brought was very peremptory. A written paper, signed by John Murray of Broughton, Charles's secretary, imported that his royal highness the Prince Regent thought his manifesto, and the king his father's declarations already published, a sufficient capitulation for all his majesty's subjects to accept with joy; that he demanded to be received into the city as the son and representative of the king his father; and that he expected a positive answer before two o'clock in the morning, otherwise he should think himself obliged to take measures conform. What was to be done? Cope was still some thirty weary miles off, and the Pretender was at hand with an army, whose force had been multiplied by their fears, and by ingenious arts employed by the Jacobites. Thus, a gentleman had galloped through the streets on a white horse, shouting out that there were 16,000 Highlanders! The poor Provost resolved to send a second deputation; and about two o'clock in the morning it set out in a hackney coach for Gray's Mill. But Charles refused to see them, and the deputies returned in their coach with heavy hearts, and were set down near their houses in the High-street. It was near five o'clock in the morning when the coachman turned his horses' heads to lead them to their stables in the Canongate, which suburb was then separated from the town by the walls and the strong gate called the Nether Bow. And, as the Nether Bow Port was now opened to let this coach go out, Cameron of Lochell and 800 Highlanders rushed in. The rest of the work was like a trick in a pantomime—easy and instantaneous; the town-guard, and all the guards and sentinels upon duty were made prisoners without a blow, and the Highlanders occupied their posts and took possession of the city as quietly as one guard relieves another.* Charles, who in the course of the preceding evening had been joined by David Lord Elcho, eldest son of the Earl of Wemyss, and a man of distinguished bravery, put himself in motion with the main body of his little army, at about ten o'clock, and, marching by Duddingstone to avoid the fire of the Castle, he entered the King's Park by a breach which had been made in the wall, and halted his men under Arthur's Seat, in the hollow between the hills. It was there that Home carefully examined them, being anxious to carry some useful intelligence to Sir John Cope, to whom he was flying. They did not exceed 2000 men! They seemed to be strong, active, and hardy; but many of the men were low in stature, and, if clothed like low-country men, would, in Home's opinion, have appeared inferior to the men in the king's troops; "but the Highland garb favoured them much, as it showed their naked limbs, which were strong and muscular." Having, in all probability, only known the mountaineers in Highland drovers—and even they, plaided, bonnetted, belted, and brogued, drove their black cattle with an air of great dignity and consequence—Home was much struck with their bold and imposing aspect. As to their arms, he says that they had no cannon nor artillery of any sort, except one small iron gun, which he saw, without a carriage, lying upon a cart, drawn by a little Highland horse: about 1400 or 1500 of the men were armed with firelocks and broadswords, those firelocks being of all sorts and sizes, including many fowling-pieces; some of the rest had firelocks without swords, and some, swords without firelocks; many of the swords were not Highland broadswords, which they best knew how to use, but French swords; one or two companies were armed with scythes fixed in the shafts of pitchforks, so as to resemble somewhat the weapon called the Lochaber axe, which the soldiers of the town-guard of Edinburgh were wont to carry. Home also took a glance of Prince Charles as he crossed the King's Park on his way to Holyrood House; and he has left us an admirable picture of his personal appearance, which was by far the best part of the young Pretender. "The figure and presence of Charles

Stuart were not ill suited to his lofty pretensions. He was in the prime of youth,* tall and handsome, of a fair complexion; he had a light-coloured periwig, with his own hair combed over the front; he wore the Highland dress, that is, a tartan short coat without the plaid, a blue bonnet on his head, and on his breast the star of the order of St. Andrew. Charles stood some time in the park to show himself to the people; and then, though he was very near the palace, mounted his horse, either to render himself more conspicuous, or because he rode well, and looked graceful on horseback. The Jacobites were charmed with his appearance; they compared him to Robert the Bruce, whom he resembled, they said, in his figure, as in his fortune." The Whigs looked upon him with other eyes. They acknowledged that he was a goodly person; but they observed, that even in that triumphant hour, when he was about to enter the palace of his fathers, the air of his countenance was languid and melancholy; that he looked like a gentleman and a man of fashion, but not like a hero or a conqueror. Hence they formed their conclusions that the enterprise was above the pitch of his mind; and that his heart was not great enough for the sphere in which he moved." When he came in front of the palace a cannon-ball fired from the Castle struck James V.'s Tower, and fell into the court-yard with a quantity of rubbish; but it harmed no one, and he entered the porch, preceded by a gentleman who had suddenly stepped from the crowd, and who now, with a drawn sword in his hand, walked up-stairs before him.†

Locheil and his Highlanders, in securing all the arms they could find on first entering the town, had also secured the heralds and poursuivants which then, as still, were carefully and pompously maintained as emblems of Scottish royalty and independence. At the hour of noon these functionaries, with their trumpets and gaudy dresses, were marched up to the old Cross, where the clans were drawn up under arms, and were there forced to proclaim King James, and to read the commission of regency to Charles, the declaration dated at Rome, and a manifesto in the name of the regent. While this was doing some of the mob huzzaed, and a number of Jacobite ladies stationed in the windows waved their white handkerchiefs; but very few gentlemen were to be seen in the streets or in the windows; and even amongst the poorer people many showed their dislike of the pageantry by a sullen silence. By the unceasing exertions of the gentle Locheil, the wild High-

* Home.—The Jacobite account of the entrance into Edinburgh is to this effect:—"His royal highness ordered a detachment of 900 men, under cloud of night, to storm the town; and, accordingly, Locheil, Keppoch, and Ardabiel, with some of the best armed of their several commands, together with Mr. O'Sullivan, silently marched up to the city gate at the Netherbow, and about break of day boldly forced their way, there being no resistance made by the small guard at the port, so there was no blood shed. Our people, with drawn sword and target, with a hideous yell and their particular manner of making an attack (they not knowing what resistance they might meet with in the town), marched quickly up street, one only leaving their rank or order, and forced their way into the city guardhouse and took possession. The main body drew up in the Parliament Close, and guards were immediately placed at every gate of the city; and the inhabitants cannot in justice but acknowledge that the behaviour of our Highlanders was civil and innocent, beyond what even their best friends could have expected."—Locheil Papers.

† This was James Hepburn, of Keith, a man esteemed by all parties. In his youth he had been out in the Fifteen. Since then he had compounded the spirit of Jacobitism with the spirit of liberty; for he disclaimed the hereditary indefensible right of kings. He also condemned and abhorred the Act of Union, as something injurious and humiliating to his country, and which had made a Scotch gentleman of small fortune nobody. "Wrapped up in these notions, he had kept himself for thirty years in constant readiness to take arms, and was the first person who joined Charles at Edinburgh; idolised by the Jacobites, and beloved by some of the best Whigs, who regretted that this accomplished gentleman, the model of ancient simplicity, manliness, and honour, should sacrifice himself to a visionary idea of the independence of Scotland."—Hume.

landers were kept from plunder and from whiskey. It is even said that they refused whiskey when offered to them by the people of Edinburgh; but this almost incredible fact rests upon Jacobite authority. In the evening the long deserted and dingy apartments of Holyrood were enlivened with lights, crowds of company, and a ball; and the younger of the Jacobite ladies were charmed into still warmer enthusiasm by seeing that Charles was an excellent dancer. It seemed, indeed, as if the infusion of the Polish blood of the Sobieski had raised and improved the old Stuart stock; but the improvement, as we have intimated, did not extend to mental qualifications, and Charles's education had been neglected in many essentials, and had been exceedingly bad in others. He could dance well, ride well, and shoot well; and a love of field sports, which he had indulged in the marshes, woods, and mountains about Rome, had strengthened his constitution, and made him fit to bear the fatigues of war; but even his personal bravery in action remains, in spite of all that has been said and written about it, a very questionable point. So defective was his education, that his tutor, Sir Thomas Sheridan, an Irish papist, was suspected by some of having been in the pay of the English government, and of having purposely neglected his duty as an instructor.* Perhaps a surer way of accounting for Charles's want of the knowledge most necessary to one in his station and circumstances, is to remember that Sheridan himself, who had passed nearly all his life abroad, had none of that knowledge to impart: he might have taught the young Pretender to write and spell better than he did—he might have drilled him into Latin, and made him familiar with routine histories,—but he could not teach him the laws and constitution, the rights and usages of Britain, because he knew nothing of them himself.

While they were proclaiming the young Pretender at Edinburgh, Cope was landing his troops, artillery, and stores at Dunbar; an operation that was not completed till the morning of the 18th. His men were discouraged at once by the panic-stricken regiment of dragoons, which had continued flying on till they came to Dunbar, many of them without swords, pistols, or any other weapon.† He found some of the judges and men of the law from Edinburgh, who expressed their resolution of continuing with his army; and the Earl of Home presently came and joined him at Dunbar. But, while the clanship of the Highlands had been left little disturbed, the feudal grandeur and might of the border lords had been vastly diminished, and, instead of coming with hundreds of armed vassals, as his ancestors had been wont to do, the Earl of Home brought with him only two servants. It was resolved to move instantly upon Edinburgh; and Sir John Cope, with his usual fatality, chose the worst road by which he could go. "He well knew that the high road from Edinburgh to the South lies along the coast, and it seems never to have occurred to him that it was possible the Highlanders might choose, even by preference, to cross the country and occupy the heights at the bottom of which the public road takes its course, and thus have him and his army so far at their mercy, that they might avoid or bring on a battle at their sole pleasure. On the contrary, Sir John trusted that their Highland courtesy would induce them, if they moved from Edinburgh, to come by the very road on which he was advancing towards that city, and thus meet him on equal terms."‡ It is true, however, that the shortest road was enticing, as a speedy arrival at the capital was deemed of the highest importance; but then Cope should have sent exploring parties up the hills and across the country to have an eye on the march of his enemies; and this he neglected to do—he caused to be reconnoitred nothing but the high post road, and two or three diverging paths. And even to this end he employed persons unfit for the duty—some of the young volunteers, who had fled with the poet Home from Edinburgh. It was on the 19th of September that he left Dunbar with his little army, which made a great show with its cavalry, artillery, and long train of baggage wagons. He went no farther than to a field a little to the west of Haddington, which town is only twelve miles from Dunbar. About 9 o'clock at night, it being feared that during the dark hours the Highlanders might advance and surprise them, eight of the young volunteers, mounted on horseback, went by parties of two to examine the main road, and some other paths that diverged to Duddingston. These young men returned at midnight to the camp and reported that all was quiet; and then other eight of them mounted and rode in the same manner till peep of day—but two of this last division of explorers never came back to Cope's camp. On the following morning Sir John continued his march; but when he came near Haddington he suddenly quitted the high post road, because, as he afterwards said, there were defiles and enclosures near it where cavalry could not act, and took the lower road by St. Germans and Seaton. As they marched along his officers assured the people that crowded about them that there would be no battle; that, the cavalry and infantry being joined, and the big

* Lord Mahon, who has been a diligent searcher into the unpublished Stuart Papers and other little known documents, says—"I am bound to say that I have found no corroboration of so foul a charge. Sheridan appears to me to have lived and died a man of honour; but history can only acquit him of baseperdy by accusing him of gross neglect. He had certainly left his pupil uninstructed in the most common elements of knowledge."—Hist. from Peace of Utrecht. But it should be remembered that the dulness, or waywardness, or illness of pupils—particularly of royal pupils—may account for deficiencies in education quite as much as the gross neglect of the teacher.

† According to Home, they had dismounted to pass the night near Prestonpans; but a dragoon seeking forage for his horse, between ten and eleven o'clock, fell into an old coal-pit, and made such a noise that the rest of the dragoons thought the Highlanders were upon them; and, mounting their horses, they fled again. Colonel Gardiner had gone to his own house, which was close by the field near Preston chosen for the bivouac. When he rose in the morning he found all the men gone: he followed with a heavy heart; for the road to Dunbar was strewn with swords, pistols, and firelocks, which he caused to be gathered together and carried in covered carts to Dunbar.

guns being plentiful, the Highlanders would fly before them, and never wait the attack of so complete an army. The van of the army was entering the dead flats which lie between Seaton and Preston, when Lord Loudon, who was acting as adjutant-general, and who had gone forward to reconnoitre, came back at a round pace, and informed Cope that the rebels were in full march towards him—not by the road and the open country to the west, where alone Sir John had been looking for them, but by the ridge of hills to the south. Cope, however, thought that the plain he was in was good ground, and he pushed forward along the high road to Preston and Seaton, till he came to Prestonpans, where he formed his army in order of battle. The young Pretender, having previously been joined by the Earl of Kellie, Lord Balmerino, Sir Stewart Threipland, Sir David Murray, and a few other Lowland gentlemen, and having exacted tents, targets, and shoes from the citizens of Edinburgh, and carried off all their arms—including, it is said, about a thousand muskets—had resolved to come forth and meet Cope.* He was further encouraged by the timely arrival of Lord Nairn, who brought up from the north 500 men—Mac Lauchlans and other Macs from Atholl. On the night of Thursday, the 19th, Charles repaired to the village of Duddingston, where the troops lay upon their arms; and at an early hour on the following morning he put himself at their head, drawing his sword and exclaiming—“Gentlemen, I have thrown away the scabbard!” The Highlanders moved on in a long narrow column, crossed the bridge at Musselburgh, and then struck away over the hills to the right, leaving the post road entirely. They paused on the heights of Carberry, where many a year before Mary Stuart had been led captive by her insurgent subjects. They did not halt again till they came in full sight of the king’s army.* The regulars set up a tremendous shout, to which the Highlanders replied. Cope, who had shifted his front, and re-formed his army, now lay with his right leancowaring to the rest and make them desert.”—Jacobite Account of Operations, &c. To obtain shoes, targets, tents, &c., all the inhabitants of Edinburgh were called, and taxed according to their valued rents. These proceedings were not likely to conciliate the Lowlanders, who, moreover, hated the Highlanders with an old and growing hatred.

* On the 18th there was a proclamation issued by the rebels requiring all persons in Mid Lothian to deliver up all the arms and ammunition they had in their custody, on pain of military execution. In the course of the same day the Castle fired very briskly upon the town of Edinburgh, and threatened to lay it in ashes. “By the firing the cannon, a ball struck upon the top of a chimney and threw down some stones, which wounded Lochell and his major that was upon guard that day. It was proposed to put a stronger guard on the outside of the castle, to strangle it more, in order to reduce it by famine (as it was thought not to be very well provided); but that was objected to, as the Highlanders were not accustomed to that way of doing, and if any of them were killed it would be dis-

* The Highland officer says—“His royal highness marched us from the field of Duddingston early in the morning, and at about three in the afternoon we were in sight of the enemy, who had taken up their ground on the plain near the town of Prestonpans, betwixt Colonel Gardiner’s house and Fort Seaton: . . . having a broad and deep ditch in their front, a small morass on their left, and the Frith of Forth on their rear.”—Appendix to Lockhart Papers. In another Jacobite account in the same Appendix it is said, “The prince marched out with his whole army to meet them, and that afternoon gained Carberry Hill, from which they could see Sir John Cope’s army. . . . The prince continued his march along the hill till he came to Tranent, where it was proposed to attack directly, which was objected to as impracticable as they were situated.”—Account of the Young Pretender’s Operations.

ing on Colonel Gardiner's park-wall and the village of Preston, having on his left Seaton House and the sea, and a little in his rear the village of Prestonpans. At the distance of less than a mile the Highlanders formed on the declivities near the little town of Tranent. But between them and the king's army there was a swamp or morass cut by hedges, dry stone dykes, and willow trees; and close in front of the king's army there was a ditch with a thick and strong hedge. It was about three in the afternoon when Kerr of Gradou, mounted upon a little white pony, rode down the hill side to see if he could discover a passage for the Highlanders across the morass. He performed this duty with great coolness, notwithstanding the shots that were fired at him, but upon his return he assured Charles that the morass was impassable—that Cope's front was not to be attacked in that direction. Both armies lay inactive the rest of the day, except that Cope fired a few cannon shots, and dislodged a party of Highlanders who had occupied the churchyard of Tranent. The night which followed, and which proved dark and cold, was still more tranquil, the two armies lying upon the ground with their sentinels and picquets very close to each other.* But during that night several of the few Highlanders that had been induced to follow Cope from Aberdeen, deserted to their countrymen; and Robert Anderson, a Jacobite gentleman of the neighbourhood, who knew the country step by step, told Hepburn of Keith that he would undertake to show the prince's army a place where they might easily pass the morass without being seen by the enemy, and form without being exposed to their fire. After consulting with Lord George Murray, Hepburn conducted this Anderson to Charles, who was found sleeping on the ground with a sheaf of peas for his pillow. Awaking, the young Pretender summoned Lochcil and the other chiefs to council, and it was soon resolved to trust to the guidance and loyalty of the Lowland gentleman, whose father had been out in the Fifteen. At the earliest peep of day, and under the favouring veil of a frosty mist, and the fog that hung over the swampy ground, the Highlanders began to move, with the Clanronalds in front, marching in column, three men in a rank. They came down by a hollow that wended through the farm of Ringanhead—not a whisper was heard amongst them. They were close to the place where Anderson intended to lead them through the morass, when some of the dragoons in picquet heard their footfalls, and shouted through the mist "Who goes there?" Apparently without waiting for an answer, which would not have been given, these doughty horsemen reined up, turned their horses' heads, and rode off to give the alarm—the only thing they could do. The clans, still as silent as death, pushed on rapidly, in spite of the boggy nature of the ground, in which they sometimes sunk to their kilts; they crossed the ditch upon a little narrow wooden bridge; and then the Duke of Perth, who led the column, ordered them to halt, face to the left, and form as usual. The first line consisted of six regiments, with the Clanronalds, the men of Glengarry and Keppoch on the right, the Mac Gregors and the Duke of Perth's men in the centre, and the men of Appin and Lochcil on the left. Behind this first line stood a body of reserve or second line, consisting of the Atholl men, the Robertsons of Strowan, the Mac Donalds of Glenco, and the Mac Lauchlans, who were all commianded by Lord Nairn, but who were never engaged. Charles took his post in front of this body of reserve and behind the first line. Sir John Cope, who had not been sleeping with his troops on the field, but had gone to more comfortable quarters in Cockenzie, a little village on the seashore close by, being warned by the dragoons, was now on the field, and obliged to change his front and alter his dispositions in face of the enemy. Even with the best disciplined troops such sudden manœuvres, under such circumstances, are likely to produce some confusion. The outposts of the front had not time to find out the regiments to which they respectively belonged, and they formed awkwardly on the right so as to cramp the cavalry, and not leave them sufficient room to act. The mass of the infantry, consisting of four regiments, "Lees's," "Guise's," "Lascelles's," and "Murray's," two of which were very incomplete, stood in the centre: Hamilton's dragoons occupied the left, and Gardiner's dragoons and the artillery were posted on the right next the morass; there was no body of reserve, but they still had in their rear Preston, some strong stone walls, and Prestonpans; their baggage was to their left in the village of Cockenzie, which has a small harbour. The ground which intervened between the two armies was an extensive corn field, plain and level, without a bush or a tree; and it was now lighted up by the morning sun, which had dispelled the fog and mist, and revealed the enemies to each other. "Harvest was just got in, and the ground was covered with a thick stubble, which rustled under the feet of the Highlanders as they ran on, speaking and muttering in a manner that expressed and heightened their fierceuess and rage."† Their first attack, under Lochcil, was upon the guns. "The cannon," says a Jacobite that was present, "consisting of seven pieces and four cohorts, fired upon them as they marched, but did no execution, and was immediately seized; and the Highlanders (who never after that did regard cannon, which had been formerly very terrible to them) continued their march with loud huzzas."† The fact was, that Cope, having no regular artillerymen with him, had pressed a number of unskilful, unpractised seamen to serve these guns; and the sailors being badly defended, or rather not defended at all, by

* The Highland officer says—"We lay in sight of them till the evening, when our people grew very impatient to be engaged; but, with difficulty being restrained by authority, both armies lay upon their arms all night."

the dragoons, turned and fled after one or two random fires, and left the cannon to the Highlanders. Colonel Gardiner, who deserved to have better men under him, advanced at the head of his regiment, and did all that he could to make them charge the Highlanders and recover the guns: but the dragoons had no heart in them, and after receiving one irregular fire they wheeled about and galloped off, making a canter at Preston as they had done at Colt Brigg. Abandoned by their horse, and seeing their artillery in the hands of the enemy, the infantry gave one weak, desultory fire; the Highlanders threw down their muskets and rushed on them with their sharp claymores; the line broke—Hamilton's dragoons were galloping away as fast as Gardiner's—Murray's regiment of foot, which occupied the left, fled also; in a few minutes from the firing of the first gun the whole army, both horse and foot, were in flight, and the disgraceful affair of Preston was over almost as soon as begun.* Not one of the regular soldiers attempted to load his piece a second time, not one English bayonet was used. Charles had no cavalry; the whole amount of horse with him did not exceed the number of fifty, consisting chiefly of gentlemen and their grooms; but with a part of this Lord Elcho and Sir Peter Threipland spurred after the panic-struck dragoons, while the light-footed Highlanders followed the foot to cut them down or make them prisoners. Few had courage enough to provoke the broad sword; the men threw down their arms and surrendered in heaps, and the actual loss on the side of the royalists in killed and wounded did not exceed 200 men and five officers; but eighty officers were taken prisoners, and the cannon, the tents, the baggage, and the military chest were all left to fall into the hands of the Highlanders, whose loss amounted to four officers and thirty private men killed, and six officers and seventy private men wounded. One hundred and five of Cope's foot escaped and got to Edinburgh Castle, and about seventy found their way to Berwick. Sir John, with the assistance of the Earls of Home and Loudon, collected about 450 of the dragoons, who fled too fast to be taken, and marched them, by Soutra Hill and Lauder, down to the banks of the Tweed at Coldstream, where they are said to have arrived that very night.'

* To make the more of their victory the Highlanders and Jacobites exaggerated the number of Cope's army and diminished that of their own. Besides the two worthless regiments of dragoons Cope certainly had not with him more than 1000 or 1500 men. The Highlanders, it is true, had no cavalry, no artillery; but they had at the very least 2500 brave and active men on the field. See answers to queries sent to Mr. Patullo, master-master of the rebel army, in Home's Appendix, and Home's own note. Patullo says, that the number of the rebels when they took possession of Edinburgh was about 2500, and that it was much the same at the battle of Prestonpans. Home says, that when they came to Edinburgh they scarcely amounted to 2000, but they had been joined since then by 250 Atholl men under Lord Nairn, by 150 MacLaughlans, and by various other bands.

* Sir John—"Johnnie Cope," as he will be for ever called in Scotland—was merely ridiculed at first, and hotly prosecuted afterwards. It is reported that when he went flying on with his dragoons to Berwick, his brother officer, Lord Mark Kerr, received him with the sarcastic remark, that he believed him to be the very first general on record that had first carried the tidings of his own defeat. The Jacobites made epigrams and songs about him, one of which, commemorating his sudden wakening and his rapid flight, is known to every one that is a Scot, or that has lived in Scotland. The satirical Horace Walpole thought that he was to be more pitied than blamed. In a letter dated London, the 27th of December, he says, "I pity poor him, who, with no shining abilities, and no experience, and no force, was sent to fight for a crown. He never saw a battle but that of Dettingen, where he got his red riband: Churchill, whose led

Colonel Gardiner, probably the best man and the best officer there, remained dead on the corn-field at Prestonpans. The veteran, disdaining to fly with his dragoons, though he was badly wounded, put himself at the head of a small party of the foot, a knot of true-bred Englishmen, who, though left without officers, stood their ground on a corner of the field. "These brave fellows," said he, "will be cut to pieces for want of a commander;" and, riding to their front, he took the command and cheered them; but he was presently cut down by a fierce Highlander, armed with a scythe, and he sunk under other wounds close to his own park wall, and within sight of his happy home. They carried him senseless to the manse, or parsonage, of Trantun, where he soon expired, and was buried by the side of his children in that village church. He was a truly virtuous and religious man, and his bravery was indisputable; but some people thought that he must have preached and prayed to his dragoons more than he drilled them; and certainly, the regiment, which had been for a considerable time under his command, had not acquired any military virtue. The young Pretender, who had been with the body of reserve, which had nothing to do in the fight,* is said to have shown some magnanimity or prudence after it was over: he remained on the field till mid-day, giving orders for the relief of the wounded of both armies, and for the disposal of his numerous prisoners. He lay that night at Pinkie, and returned the next morning to Edinburgh, with the 1,500l.—a seasonable supply—which had been found in Cope's military chest. He entered Holyrood House to the joyful tune "The king shall have his own again," flags flying, pibrochs playing, and the Highlanders making a feu de joie by firing their pieces in the air. One of their balls grazed the forehead of Miss Nairne, a Jacobite lady, who, with others of her principles and sex, stood waving her white handkerchief from a balcony. "Thank God," said the fair enthusiast, "that this accident happened to me, whose principles are known. Had it fallen on a Whig, they would have said it was done on purpose."† At a review a few days after there appeared only about 1400 Highlanders; some had been killed and wounded, it is true, but the large majority of those missing had gone home with the plunder and spoil they had made at Prestonpans. With the brave old General Guest still in the Castle, with the majority of the inhabitants of Edinburgh wishing every "sharp-edged claymore man" behind Strathbogie, and the Pretender back in France or Italy, or in a still hotter atmosphere, any competent commander with 1200 or 1400 proper men might have settled the rebellion if he had come to Edinburgh on the 21st or 22nd, but there was no one at hand to take up the card which Cope had thrown away; there was scarcely the fraction of an English regiment anywhere north of Tweed; and thus the Highlanders were allowed at their leisure to go and come, to deposit their plunder in the mountains, and to return on the look out for more; and an irresistible temptation was offered to France and Spain to send money and troops. Duncan Forbes, and some other friends of the government, still remained in the north about Inverness and Fort George, in the hopes of raising the Whiggish clans and sending them to take the Pretender in the rear. The Duke of Argyll's vassals—all the clans that bore the name of Campbell, had friendship and adimity with them,—were resolute and ready to march for King George; but the Duke of Argyll was left without proper orders or instructions, and the men without arms. In vain had Duncan Forbes and Andrew Fletcher, Lord Milton, the loyal and able Justice-Clerk; repeated their applications for muskets and bayonets—the government at London seemed to be deaf, careless, or stupified, or confident that Cope's ill supplied army must have proved more than enough. The only excuse to be offered is, that they probably knew not whom to trust. On the 16th of September, when the capital was falling into the hands of Charles, the Justice-Clerk wrote an admirable letter to the Marquess of Tweeddale:—"I shall now signify to your lordship in plain words what authorities I desired to have been sent down, to empower the well affected to appear in a legal way for the defence of his majesty's person and government. Scotland may be divided into two parts; the one disarmed, and the other unarmed. By the former, I mean the Highlands; and by the latter, the Lowlands. The former (the Highlands) produces as good militia, perhaps, as any in Europe; the latter are neighbourlike, but little accustomed to the use of arms till they are employed in a military manner. The Highlands, again, may be divided into three classes; first, what I shall call the Whig clans, which have always bore that character since the names of Whig or Jacobite were known among us; of this sort, your lordship, and every one acquainted with this country knows, that the chief are the Campbells, Grants, Munros, MacKays, Sutherlands. The second class are, the clans still properly Jacobite, and who at this moment are giving proof of it; the Camerons, the MacDonnalds of Keppoch, Clanronald, and Glengarry—none of their chiefs reckoned great princes in the Highlands. The third class are, the clans which were engaged in the last rebellion, but their chiefs now profess and practise obedience to the government. Of these, the most powerful are the Duke of Gordon, Seaforth, Sir Alexander MacDonald, and MacLeod of MacLeod. The behaviour of the two last has been most exemplary and meritorious on this occasion. By an act of the first of the late king (George I.), intituled, 'For the more effectually securing the peace of the Highlands,⁷ the whole Highlands, without distinction, were disarmed, and for ever forbid to use or bear arms, under penalties. This act has been found, by experience, to work the quite contrary effect from what was intended by it; and, in reality, it proves a measure for more effectually disturbing the peace of the Highlands, and of the rest of the kingdom. For, at the time appointed by the disarming act, all the dutiful and well-affected clans truly submitted to the act of parliament and gave up their arms, so that they are now completely disarmed; but the disaffected clans either concealed their arms at first, or have provided themselves since with other arms. The fatal effects of this difference, at the time of a rebellious insurrection, must be very obvious; and are by us, in this country, felt at this hour: I pray God they may be felt no farther south. By that disarming act, as it stands, there is still room left for arming occasionally even the Highlands, or prohibited counties; and the method reserved or excepted from the prohibition is, when by his majesty's order, and out of his arsenal, the people are called out and armed by the lords lieutenant of counties; then they may lawfully wear and use such arms, during such number of days or space of time as shall be expressed in his majesty's order."—The able, honest, and earnest writer, after observing, "this is, in the plain words of a statute, an answer to your lordship's question, what authorities I desired might be sent down to empower the well affected to appear in a legal way," proceeds to state, that this was what he meant in his first letter to his lordship, and also what he meant in his second letter; and, as courteously as he can, he hints his astonishment at Tweeddale's not understanding him. Nay, he tells his lordship that he had plainly stated to him, the beginning of last year, when we were threatened with the former invasion, that the friends of government in Scotland remained without arms, and without power to make use of any; adding, "Had legal strength been given to the friends of government in the Highlands, no such insurrection would have happened as this, without a landing of foreign troops; or, if it had, it must have been crushed at the beginning, without endangering or harassing the regular troops, or taking them from parts where they may be wanted."* He thought it would be imprudent to arm the clans of the third class above described, whose chiefs were themselves but recent converts, and whose people might not yet be cured of their prejudices against the present establishment; but he could see nothing that could possibly be objected to the arming of the other clans who were thoroughly to be depended upon, "I take it," says he, "to be a clear case, that there can be no hazard, but a high utility, in arming the Whig clans above named; and also, in case of further need, the low-country militia in the southern and western counties. The former indeed was the most useful and immediately necessary; and, if it had been done, it is as clear as any moral demonstration to every man in Scotland that this at first pitiful and now ugly insurrection would have been dissipated and crushed at once; for they were counted at Blair-Adholl on the 1st of September, and were not then 2000 men; and what would have been more easy than for Sir John Cope to have remained at Stirling till he had got a greater number of Highlanders than the rebel army from the Campbells alone, who lay nearest to him? And then he had Highlanders against Highlanders, and his regular troops into the bargain, and might safely have marched where he pleased. Instead of which what do we now see? The regular troops harassed and exposed by a tedious, useless march to Inverness, and back again by Aberdeen, and conveyed from thence by sea. In the mean time, what I prophesied came to pass: the rebels got betwixt him and the low-country. Alas! my lord, I have grief and not glory, that my fears have been more than fulfilled; for more than I feared is come to pass." He hoped his lordship would excuse him if his style appeared too ardent; and the honest Whig concluded his long letter, by saying, "I pray God to prevent further bad consequences. The beginning of mischief is often small; but I will never despond of the cause of the king and the country."* It does not appear that all the blame of the delay and negligence should be imputed to the Marquess of Tweeddale: the secretary of state for Scotland was only one in a jealous and distracted cabinet; and Tweeddale, who soon resigned, complained ever afterwards that he had been ill used, and that his advice had been slighted. In replying to Fletcher, he assured him that his majesty had transmitted such powers about arming the Whig clans as had been suggested by his servants at London; and that his majesty thought proper on this occasion to bestow a particular mark of his confidence on the Lord President of the Session, Duncan Forbes, whose presence in the North, and efforts among the clans, had been esteemed as of great service at this juncture. Yet Tweeddale's letter, which was written between the English army's landing at Dunbar and their march to Prestonpans, concluded with the hope that Sir John Cope would be able to finish the rebellion.†

Without underrating the disinterested and romantic Jacobitism of the gentle Lochell, and two or three other chiefs, on the one side, or the incurable turbulence and predatory habits of some score of chiefs and chieftains on the other side, it may be believed that the great mass of the Highlanders who followed Charles were urged on by the poverty and hardships of their situation, and by the hopes of

* Fletcher says, after this last paragraph, "It did not occur to me that it was at all needful to speak plainer to your lordship than I did in the words of my letters above recited. I took it for granted your lordship perfectly understood my meaning, alluding to so late a statute relating to this country; but possibly there were other weighty considerations, which I could not penetrate, that prevented such means being taken as I then suggested."

improving their condition; and that, if proper means had been adopted by the established government to furnish them with employment and bread, the name of the Stuarts would have been no more a magical name in the Highlands than it was in the fat plains of England. Since the Revolution, which drove that dynasty from the throne, both nations had been making prodigious strides in wealth and in general civilization and comfort; but these blessings were not extended to the bare and hungry mountains of the North, which remained in their primitive poverty and discomfort—materially increased by the increase of population. The numbers of many of the clans had, long before the year forty-five, exceeded the means of subsistence afforded by the ground they occupied. In some of the straths and glens they were huddled together, and hundreds were compelled to live upon a bit of ground which, in England, with all the superiority of soil and of agricultural industry to boot, would not have been made to support scores. In the wintry season it was no uncommon thing for them to support life by bleeding their black cattle, mixing the blood with a little barley or oatmeal, and frying the whole into a sort of cake. Trade they had none, except in occasionally exporting to the Lowlands their small black cattle: shipping they had none, because they had nothing by which to create and employ it; and because, like all the Celtic tribes, they had a strong prejudice and aversion to a seafaring life. The Highlanders were as inapt as sailors, as they were apt as soldiers. Their clannish institutions, their devotion to their chiefs, who were more to their respective clans than either king or law, and other obstacles, both natural and artificial, made it difficult for any government to change or suddenly improve their condition; but a wiser and more spirited government would assuredly have tried the effect of a gradual and gentle change—would have laboured to find out better means of subsistence and of education for a brave and excitable people—and would, most assuredly, never have rejected the proposals which had been made over and over again, for employing the Highlanders, and disengaging them, by the influence of better feeding, from the desperate cause of the Stuarts. Seven years before this their last and terrible outbreak, Duncan Forbes, who was thoroughly acquainted both with Highlands and Lowlands, waited upon Lord Milton, at his house at Brunstane, one morning before breakfast. Milton, surprised to see him at so early an hour, asked what was the matter. The Lord President replied, that the matter he had to communicate was of some importance. “You know very well,” said he, “that I am like you, a Whig; but I am also the neighbour and friend of the Highlanders, and intimately acquainted with most of their chiefs. For some time I have been revolving in my mind different schemes for reconciling the Highlanders to government; now, I think the time is come to bring forward a scheme, which, in my opinion, will certainly have that effect.” After remarking that a war with Spain was at hand, and a war with France in all probability not distant, and that the struggle would demand far more troops than the standing army his majesty then had, Duncan Forbes proposed that government should raise four or five regiments of Highlanders, appointing an English or Scotch officer of undoubted loyalty to be colonel of each regiment, leaving the posts of lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, and subalterns to be filled by the chiefs and chieftains of the disaffected clans, who, if left at home in their present poverty and discontent, were the very persons whom France and Spain would call upon to take arms for the Pretender. The Highlanders who had been raised and sent to serve in the army abroad had always been not only among the bravest, but among the steadiest and most contented of our troops; their Jacobitism never followed them beyond their own bare mountains. “If,” continued Duncan Forbes, “government will pre-engage the Highlanders in the manner I propose, they will not only serve well against the enemy abroad, but will be hostages for the good behaviour of their relations at home; and I am persuaded that it will be absolutely impossible to raise a rebellion in the Highlands.” Forbes gave his scheme in writing, and with more detail, to Lord Milton, who fully approved of it, and submitted it to Lord Hay, who had then the chief management of the king’s affairs in Scotland. This brother of Argyll, who since then (by the death of his brother in 1743) had become Duke of Argyll himself, was delighted with the plan, carried it up to London, and presented it to Walpole. Sir Robert declared at once that it was the most sensible plan he had ever seen; and that he was surprised nobody had ever thought of it before. [If Walpole had looked a little back, he might have seen that a plan very like it had been suggested to William the Third.*] Summoning a cabinet council, the minister laid Duncan Forbes’s paper before them, and recommended the measure as one which ought to be carried into execution immediately, in case of a war; but every member of that council, except Sir Robert, instantly declared against it, saying that, if government should adopt the plan, the English opposition in parliament would instantly exclaim that he (Walpole), ever intent on subverting the British constitution, was raising an army of Highlanders to join the standing army, and enslave the people of England.† It, indeed, unfortunately happened that precedents and records of the past must have inevitably suggested to the opposition strong arguments, or declamations, against the project. In modern times the Highlanders had scarcely been heard of south of the Forth, except as devoted partisans of the house of Stuart, and as men that were ready to enforce with the sword the most insolent and fanatic pretensions of despotism.

* See ante, p. 44.

† The venerable author of Douglas, and of the History of the Rebellion, says that all these particulars were communicated to him by Lord Milton himself.

For whom had Montrose fought? For whom had Dundee fallen? Who had been the stern executors of the monstrous orders of Duke Lauderdale and James the Second? Who had butchered the Whigs in the West, and routed and captured the Covenanters and Cameronians, sending the prisoners to be tortured, booted, thumb-screwed, and then hanged or exiled by Lauderdale? Little—marvellously, and almost unaccountably, little—as they knew of the state of the extreme north of the island and of the clans, every Englishman knew that it was the Highlanders who had done all this; and every Lowland Scot—every Whig and presbyterian south of the Tweed—would have answered the queries with indignation and horror. There remained, however, in defence of Duncan Forbes's plan the consideration that these Highlanders were not to be kept at home, but sent at once abroad to serve on the continent—they were not to be employed in executing the will of arbitrary princes like the two Charleses and the second James, but in warring against the Spaniards, whose punishment and humiliation were then such popular themes. But there was a potent motive, overlooked by Home, but which, as we conceive, was the main cause of the rejection of Forbes's plan. The king wanted to employ Hanoverians and Hessians, and to subsidise all his little neighbours in Germany; and the majority of the ministry knew that they could keep their places only by gratifying his majesty in this particular. Thus Hanoverians were preferred to Highlanders; and instead of five full regiments of the latter, only one was raised—the famed Forty-second, or the Black Watch, as it was then generally called;—and this, it appears, was chiefly raised among the Campbells and the clans already attached to the House of Hanover. That Hanoverian mouths might be filled the rest of the Highlanders were left to their hunger and their discontent—and no disaffection is so strong as the disaffection of the stomach. And thus was England deprived of the services of the best infantry she could possibly have procured—the cheapest to support, the most capable of enduring fatigue, the most cheerful under occasional privation, the bravest of the brave in battle. The few Highlanders actually engaged on the continent had already by their conduct challenged and obtained this high eulogium. In the recent battle of Fontenoy the Forty-second had made themselves terrible to the best veterans of France.

In general, when project-makers find their plans rejected they are apt to become disaffected; but, happily for his country, this was not the case with the Lord President Forbes, who in the moment of extreme danger, when the battle of Prestonpans was fought, remained in the Highlands; and by unceasing exertions, by employing his own money and his own credit, by exercising all the talent of a true statesman and the virtue of a true patriot, he was now succeeding in assembling such a force about Inverness and Fort George, as served to distract the counsels and interrupt the supplies of Charles, and to pave the way for his final downfall.*

The English had certainly no right to accuse the unarmed Lowlanders of Scotland of a want of spirit, for their own spirit was at moments—we mean, of course, in the beginning of the rebellion—at an exceedingly low ebb. They cried out for succour to the Dutch, as if English hearts and hands were not sufficient; and the government pressingly demanded the 6,000 auxiliaries which the States General were bound to furnish. The rich and peaceful citizens of London were for a time as much afraid of the Pretender, though more than 300 miles off, as had been the burghers of Edinburgh when he was only three miles off. Even Fox, a member of the administration, said in a confidential letter to a friend—"England is for the first comer; and if you can tell whether the 6,000 Dutch and the ten battalions of English we have sent for from Flanders, or 5,000 French or Spaniards will be here first, you know our fate." This was written on the 5th of September; and on the 19th of the same month Henry Fox wrote to the same friend—"The French are not come, God be thanked! But, had 5,000 landed in any part of this island a week ago, I verily believe the entire conquest would not have cost them a battle." On the 6th of September Horace Walpole wrote—"Notice came yesterday, that there are 10,000 men, thirty transports, and ten men-of-war at Dunkirk. Against this force we have—I don't know what—scarce fears!" On the 13th he says—"Spirit seems to rise in London, though not in the proportion it ought; and then the person (the king) most concerned does everything to check its progress; when the ministers propose anything with regard to the rebellion, he cries, Pho! don't talk to me of such stuff. Lord Granville has persuaded him that it is of no consequence. Mr. Pelham talks every day of resigning: he certainly will as soon as this is got over!—if it is got over!" In the same letter, however, Horace Walpole himself is inclined to think lightly of the young Pretender, as there is little appearance hitherto of countenance given to his undertaking by France or Spain. "It seems," adds he, "an effort of despair, and weariness of the manner in which he

* The Lord President himself describes some of the difficulties he had to encounter. In a letter dated the 13th of November, when the Highlanders had begun their march into England, he says—"At first the prospect was very flattering, and the errand I came on had no appearance of difficulty; but the rebels' successes at Edinburgh and Prestonpans soon changed the scene. All Jacobites, how prudent soever, became mad; all doubtful people became Jacobites; and all bankrupts became heroes, and talked of nothing but hereditary rights and victory; and what was more grievous to men of gallantry, and if you will believe me, much more mischievous to the public, all the fine ladies, if you will except one or two, became passionately fond of the young adventurer, and used all their arts and industry for him in the most intemperate manner. Under these circumstances I found myself almost alone, without troops, without arms, without money or credit; provided with no means to prevent extreme folly, except pen and ink, a tongue, and some reputation; and, if you will except MacLeod, whom I sent for from the Isle of Skye, supported by nobody of common sense or courage. Had arms and money come when they were first called for, before these unexpected successes blew up folly to madness, I could have answered it with my head; that no man from the North should have joined the original flock of rebels that passed the Forth."—*Duncan Forbes to Sir Andrew Mitchell. has been kept in France. On the grenadiers' caps is written, A grave or a throne. . . . The merchants are zealous, and are opening a great subscription for raising troops. . . . In the midst of all this, no parliament is called! The ministers say they have nothing ready to offer; but have they nothing to notify? . . . I don't despair, and yet I expect nothing but bad!"* The bad news had brought George rapidly over from Hanover to London, where he had arrived on the 31st of August; but he seemed to think, first that Sir John Cope would be enough—then that the 6,000 Dutch and ten English battalions would be more than enough; and no pains were spared by Lord Granville (Carteret) and his party, who were still constantly consulted, to persuade his majesty that there was no danger whatever, and to hint, less directly, that if they had been in office the insurrection would not have happened. On the 20th of September, when three battalions of Dutch had been landed at Gravesend, and had received orders to march to the north of England, Horace Walpole wrote—"Lord Granville and his faction persist in persuading the king that it is an affair of no consequence—and, as for the Duke of Newcastle, he is glad when the rebels make any progress, in order to confute Lord Granville's assertions."† In this manner was the civil war neglected, and the property and lives of thousands left to depend upon the desponding or sanguine humour of majesty, and upon the intrigues of ministers and ex-ministers, base enough to manœuvre for place and favour at a critical moment like this. "The best of our situation," adds Walpole in the same letter, "is our strength at sea: the Channel is well guarded, and twelve men-of-war more are arrived (fifteen men-of-war were collected in the Downs before this arrival). Admiral Vernon, that simple, noisy creature, has hit upon a scheme that is of great service; he has laid Folkstone cutters all round the coast, which are constantly relieved, and bring constant notice of everything that stirs." The English sailors indeed, whether employed in men-of-war, government cutters, privateers, or fishing-boats, did admirable service, displaying on all occasions the greatest vigilance and activity, and a contempt of danger and a bravery as extreme in its degree as was the cowardice of the dragoons at Prestonpans. On one occasion a small privateer of Bristol took a large Spanish ship, laden with arms and money for Scotland; another ship under the same flag and on the same mission was driven on the Irish coast and there lost; Captain Beavor, of the Fox man-of-war, on receiving a flattering message and some splendid promises from the Chevalier if he would only change his flag, replied that he never treated with any but principals, but that if Charles would go on board he would talk with him; another small ship took the Soleil from Dunkirk, going to Montrose with twenty French officers and some sixty men; a small squadron of privateers, who joined voluntarily under the command of a brave and experienced seaman, captured a vast number of French vessels and drove a great many more upon their own coasts;* and hence the French, and the Spaniards as well, became convinced that to send succours to the young Pretender was a matter of extreme hazard, or of almost certain loss. His younger brother, styled Henry Duke of York, had arrived in France from Rome to press for assistance and to share in the danger; and Louis XV. even designed to put at the boy's disposal the Irish regiments in his service, with one or two other regiments. Preparations to carry him over were in progress at Dunkirk. By means of Kelly, that active nonjuring parson, who managed, though with extreme difficulty, to get back from Scotland to France, Charles implored that this great succour might be dispatched while it was yet time: but Louis would not risk so much in the face of the strong English fleet and the swarms of active privateers that seemed to be everywhere at once; and all the succour that was sent—chiefly in arms and money—was carried in some little vessel that now and then had the good fortune to escape our cruisers. But this little helped to keep the flame of civil war alive, to embarrass George, and to weaken his forces on the continent, which, in reality, was nearly all that the French court ever very earnestly desired.

The citizens of London, for some time, ordered that the city gates should be shut every night at 10 o'clock, and not be opened before 6 in the morning; and they kept the trained bands on duty night and day. Their unmanly fears were increased by the stale and worn-out report that there was a conspiracy worse than the gunpowder-plot on foot, and that the Papists intended to rise, to cut all their throats, and then bury them in the ashes of the consumed city.† In consequence of what was called certain information to this effect, there was one day a terrible stir—the king's guards were all ordered out—the Tower was shut up some hours earlier than usual, and a considerable number of poor fellows were seized in the streets for looking discontented and desperate, and like Papists. The common council of London was as much split into parties as the privy council of his majesty, and equally capable of overlooking the real dangers of the country in their indulgence of jealousy and animosity against each other. The leader of the opposition party in the common council was Alderman George Heathcote, who was in close connection with Lord Bolingbroke,‡ the Earl of March-

* Some of the exploits of these privateers, though all unknown to fame, were as brilliant as anything that has been performed by the royal British navy. In the following spring Horace Walpole mentions that an account was just arrived of two of our privateers having met eight-and-twenty French transports going with supplies to the Brest fleet, and sunk ten, taken four, and driven the rest on shore.

† In the course of the autumn there broke out all round London something like a murrain among the oows; so that people durst not eat milk, butter, beef, or anything of that sort. At first it was imagined that the Papists had done all this by poisoning the pools; but the physicians, fortunately for the poor Catholics, pronounced the cow murrain to be infectious and brought from abroad.

mont, and others of that faction, who put words or arguments into his mouth, and wrote the papers which he was to produce in the city. According to the old custom some of the aldermen and common councilmen moved the lord mayor to send up an address to his majesty on his safe return from the continent with the loyal assurances of the city to stand by him, &c. But Alderman Heathcote proposed either that the address should contain a prayer for a redress of grievances—for some proof that the government established was in the interest of the people, would pursue that interest, and so give the people a reason why they should prefer one government to another—or that there should be no address sent at all.* Heathcote, however, found himself in a minority, or, as he says, "two honest gentlemen," whom he took to be "as good courtiers as any in the kingdom," prevailed against him, and "industriously and artfully surprised the city into an address, as they did the court of aldermen also." "But I think," adds this alderman, "notwithstanding their addresses, and another now on foot called the merchants' address, to sign which men are dragged by the prayers and entreaties of the court faction, your lordship may depend on the account I gave of the general coldness and indifference of the people." † This was the voice of a party-man—of a discontented member of the court of aldermen speaking to discontented statesmen; but unhappily it was to a considerable degree the voice of truth; for as the alarm subsided it was succeeded in the city of London and elsewhere by a great show of unconcern and indifference—a far worse symptom than the fear which had preceded it. The merchants of London, however, opened a subscription at Garraway's coffee-house in order to raise a fund of 250,000*l.* to be spent in troops, and several of them subscribed as much as 200*l.* a-piece. They also entered into associations and subscriptions for sustaining the Bank of England, upon which a run at one moment began to be made, and for supporting the public credit in general; but self-interest would, without any extraordinary patriotism, have suggested this latter course.

The household troops, horse and foot, a regiment of horse grenadiers, and some of the battalions as tender or his son, but who was yet anxious to overthrow the ministry and the Whigs, affected the most perfect indifference at this crisis, which could not possibly be indifferent to any man that loved his country. In a letter from Battersea to the Earl of Marchmont, he says, "I wait with much resignation to know to what lion's paw we are to fall." And the rest of the letter is occupied with some queries about a couple of small greyhounds, which Mauptuis, the president of the academy of Berlin, wanted for his master King Frederick.

* Alderman George Heathcote to Hugh Earl of Marchmont, in Marchmont Papers.

† Id.—The account which Heathcote had given to the Earl of Marchmont was, that the people of London were dissatisfied because the grievances they suffered were numerous—because the nation was groaning under the fatal conduct of a ruinous land-war, carried on against the general bent of the people—because the fleet was neglected, dishonoured, and ruined—because there was a total distraction and dissolution of government, &c. "I have observed," says he, "a remarkable change in the dispositions of people within these last two years; for numbers of those, who during the apprehensions of the last invasion (in February and March 1744) appeared most zealous for the government, are now grown absolutely cold and indifferent, so that, except in the persons in the pay of the government, and a few dissenters, there is not the least appearance of concern to be met with."

they came from Flanders were encamped in Hyde Park. In the provinces several great lords professed to raise regiments at their own expense—meaning, however, to be more than paid for their outlay. Few or none of these lords were either so disinterested or so prompt as Doctor Herring, the excellent Archbishop of York. "He," says Horace Walpole, "has set an example that would rouse the most indifferent: two days after the news arrived at York of Cope's defeat, and when they every moment expected the victorious rebels at their gates, the bishop made a speech to the assembled county, that had as much true spirit, honesty, and bravery in it, as ever was penned by an historian for an ancient hero."* Under this prince of the church bodies of horse and foot were raised in Yorkshire with admirable rapidity, and not one gentleman there thought of making a profitable job out of his courage and patriotism. † The archbishop, who, in such a case, may be excused—nay, applauded—for following the warlike conduct of more ancient prelates, was constant at muster and review, and declared that he would be ready to fight with the gentlemen and burghers of the north. "He was," says Horace Walpole in another place, "a very amiable man, to whom no fault was objected; though perhaps the gentleness of his principles, his great merit, was thought one. During this rebellion he took up arms to defend from oppression that religion which he abhorred making an instrument of oppression." ‡ His example had the best of effects: the nobility and gentry of Lancashire entered into an association to raise 3000 men; similar measures were adopted, under the bishop and Sir Robert Grosvenor, in Chester, where even the Catholic gentlemen associated and subscribed, declaring that this mad attempt of the Stuarts tended only to ruin them and their religion in Britain. A similar association was set on foot in Surrey under Lord Onslow, and in other directions the same good spirit prevailed.

Parliament assembled on the 18th of October; when George announced in form the breaking out of the unnatural rebellion, and the dangers of popery and arbitrary power to which the nation was exposed. The House of Commons did not assemble in full force, for many of the Scotch members could not have come if they had been willing, as the young Pretender had published a declaration, threatening to confiscate the estates of all Scots that should dare attend this parliament; and though it was doubtful whether his edict of confiscation could be lasting, it was quite certain that he had the power of letting his Highlanders loose in the Lowlands, and of wasting or plundering every estate there. In the same declaration Charles denounced as traitors all the English members that might meet at Westminster. The session was scarcely opened when it was seen that the Jacobites who attended, and who in all probability had been encouraged to attend, in spite of the declaration, had wonderfully plucked up their spirits. They opposed the address, and offered many objections to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. "By this," says Walpole, "we may expect what spirit they will show hereafter; though, with all this, I am far from thinking that they are so confident and sanguine as their friends at Rome." But what was a far worse sign than this Jacobite opposition, which was too weak to venture upon any division, was the mean selfishness of the Whig magnates and others who had offered to raise regiments for the defence of their country. The Dukes of Devonshire, Bedford, Rutland, Montague, the Lords Herbert, Halifax, Cholmondeley, Falmouth, Malton, Derby, and four more, insisted that their regiments should be put on the regular establishment, and be paid by the king—and, "not much to the honour of the undertakers, or of the firmness of the ministry," this was carried. These noble and most disinterested colonels had named none but their own relations and dependents as officers; and these officers were to have rank with the brave old part of the army which had served all the war—with veterans who had grown grey in the service. People at once left off praising the heroism and patriotism of these great lords to abuse their littleness of soul; nor are we prepared to say that on this head the popular clamour was a single note too high. The king was much averse to the new men taking rank as if they were in his own old army. He could not, however, refuse the Lords what they demanded; but he hoped or wished that the House of Commons would feel the meanness of the demand, and address him not to grant it. But, though there were plenty of members to oppose the raising of the regiments altogether, there appears not to have been one that took his majesty's view of the case, or that ventured to urge the arguments he wished. "The Jacobites and patriots," says Horace Walpole, who was sitting in this parliament, "and such as are not included in the coalition, violently opposed the regiments themselves; so did Fox in a very warm speech, levelled particularly at the Duke of Montague, who, besides his old regiment, had one of horse and one of foot on this new plan. Pitt defended them as warmly; the Duke of Bedford, Lord Gower, and Lord Halifax, being at the head of this job. At last, at 10 at night, thirteen regiments of foot were voted without a division, and two of horse carried by 192 to 82. Then came the motion for the address (i. e. that his majesty should not grant rank, &c., to the new officers), and in an hour and a half it was rejected by 126 to 124. Of this latter number were several of the old corps; I among the rest. . . . The king is now against this address (he had been bullied), and all sides are using their utmost efforts. The fourteen lords threaten to throw up unless their whole terms are complied with; and the Duke of Bedford is not moderately insolent against such of the king's servants as voted against him. . . . I should be sorry, for the appearance, to have the regiments given up; but I am sure our affair is over if our two old armies are beaten, and we should come to want these new ones; four only of which are even pretended to be actually raised.*" In effect, though the levies "of these patriot heroes the regiment-factors" swelled the army-list with lordlings and other utterly inexperienced officers, and had cost the government more money than regiments raised in the ordinary way, they were of exceedingly little use in the field—the men mutinying on some occasions when called upon to march out of their own counties, and the officers not knowing how to command the men anywhere. In Ireland, where apprehensions were entertained of a rising, and where the young Pretender's brother was for a long time expected with Louis XV.'s Irish brigade, the Protestants of all denominations made vigorous exertions, and a nobleman was found that could make a splendid offer without demand or hope of user's interest. This was James Fitzgerald, twentieth Earl of Kildare, and subsequently first Duke of Leinster. He proposed to ministers to raise, clothe, and arm a regiment at his own and sole expense; but, though his loyalty was undoubted and the motives which attached him to the established government as obvious as they were powerful, ministers told him in reply that the king had no occasion for his regiment.

* Letter to Horace Mann, dated 4th November.—On the 15th he mentions that the affair of rank was again disputed on the report till 10 at night, when it was carried in favour of the lordly regiment-factors by a majority of 23. "The king," he adds, "had been persuaded to appear for it, though Lord Granville made it a party point against Mr. Pelham. Winington did not speak. I was not there, for I could not vote for it, and yielded out to give any hindrance to a public measure (or at least what was called so) just now. The prince acted openly and influenced his people against it; but it only served to let Mr. Pelham see, what, like everything else, he did not know, how strong he is. The king will scarce speak to him, and he cannot yet get Pitt into place." According to the same authority, which is generally to be taken en grano when speaking of that adversary of his father, Pitt had alternately bullied and flattered Mr. Pelham, who at last had promised to get him into place as secretary-at-war—the ambitious cornet of horse not being satisfied with anything less than that. "Pitt," says Walpole a few days after, "is ravenous for the place of secretary-at-war: they would give it him; but, as a preliminary, he insists on a declaration of our having nothing to do with the continent." When he obtained power this eloquent and able man may have made a better use of it, and may have been actuated by higher principles, than his competitors; but it appears very clear that he was quite capable of meanness and concessions, and of most of the tricks and intrigues of party, in order to obtain that power. He could vote in direct opposition to votes he had given and to principles he had proclaimed not six months before; and, what was more dangerous, he could advocate perilsous or absurd measures, even at a moment of crisis, in order to vex, perplex, and displace his opponents. Thus he could insist that the only method of putting an end to the rebellion was to augment our naval force, as if ships built a year hence were to suppress an army of Highlanders actually marching into England. Some whimsical and ludicrous circumstances attended this ludicrous debate. Horace Walpole the elder, the uncle of the wit and great letter-writer, and the plain-speaking warm-complexioned brother of the late great premier, sarcastically congratulated the country on the wisdom of the modern young statesman; and said that he had himself a son of two-and-twenty, who, no doubt, would come out wiser than anybody. "Pitt," says the younger Horace, "was provoked, and retorted on his former negotiations and his grey-headed experience. At these words, my uncle, as if he had been at Bartholomew fair, matched off his wig, and showed his grey-hair, which made the august senate laugh, and put Pitt out, who, after laughing himself, diverted his venom upon Mr. Pelham."—Letter to Mann.—Pitt was left in a minority of only 36.

—came over, and the Duke of Cumberland arrived from Flanders to take the chief command. The flower of that brave army which had stood the murderous fire of Fontenoy began to rendezvous in the centre of England, about Lichfield and Coventry; and old Marshal Wade advanced into the more northern counties of England. "It is certain," says Walpole, "that the army adore the duke, and are gone in the greatest spirits; and on the parade, as they began their march, the guards vowed that they would neither give nor take quarter. For bravery, his royal highness is certainly no Stuart, but literally loves to be in the act of fighting."* Charles had thus lost his opportunity of marching into England when it was bare of troops,† and to march now, as he was actually doing, was an act of madness, or at the best an expedition which could only end like a Highland raid or foray. After the battle of Prestonpans he lay at Edinburgh while his father was proclaimed in almost every town in Scotland. The civil authorities had all fled, leaving all the attributes of government to him and his adherents. The banking companies had made themselves and their money safe within the strong walls of the Castle, where they continued in spite of his tempting proclamations. The Presbyterian clergy, who still exercised an immense and a paramount influence over all the Lowlands, absented themselves from their pulpits in the capital, and one of the few that remained—the famed MacVicar—is said to have continued praying for King George his lawful sovereign, adding to his prayer, "And as for the young man that is come among us to seek an earthly crown, we beseech thee in mercy take him to thyself and give him a crown of glory." Although the Highlanders were not good missionaries to convert the Whig Lowlanders and change their Presbyterianism and their Whiggery, they were uncommonly effective as collectors of the taxes which Charles imposed to support himself and his army. Out of Glasgow they got 5000*l.*, and minor sums were raised in many other places under the sharp claymore and the highland buckler. In returning to their homes with the booty they had made at Prestonpans, they had promised as soon as they had gotten their harvests in to return to head-quarters five times more numerous than be-

* Letter to Mann.

† "The most of people," says one of his adherents, "seem to be surprised that the prince did not pursue his victory of Prestonpans and march into England while they were in such a consternation and panic; but, if those people had known the true state of his affairs at that time, their surprise might, perhaps, have ceased."—Account of the Young Pretender's Operations, in Lockhart Papers. This Jacobite adds that he was sadly in want of arms—that a great many of his men had fought at Preston with nothing but pieces of old scythes fixed to the ends of long poles, and that the Highlanders took the locks off the muskets they got at Preston from the English troops, and sold them—that arms, ammunition, and six brace of cannon were expected on the northern coast, as also some money from France, for which it was necessary to wait. Charles, it will be remembered, was also obliged to wait for the return of the Highlanders who had gone to their homes. It may be said, however, that his desperate chance in England, with only half his men, and with his scythes and poles, might have been some shades better at the first consideration, when there were no regular troops between him and London, than it could be with all the force he could collect after the return of Cumberland.

fore; and it behoved Charles to wait for them. It appears that at one time he flattered himself that Edinburgh Castle would be put into his hands by the treachery of some within that garrison. The Highlanders at first kept guard in some old buildings near the Castle wall, but allowed necessaries of every kind to pass into the garrison. But, disappointed in his first hope, and being informed that the castle was badly provided, Charles resolved upon a blockade, and on the 29th of September orders were given to the Highlanders to allow no person to pass or repass into the Castle. General Guest, the governor of the Castle, forthwith sent a letter to the provost, who, as yet, continued at his post, acquainting him that, unless a free communication was allowed between the Castle and town, he must begin to use his cannon on the latter, to dislodge the rebels who were blockading him. The poor provost obtained from Guest a respite for the town till the next day, when six deputies were sent to Holyrood-house with the general's letter. Guest had done no more than any other officer would have done in the like case; but Charles pretended great surprise at his barbarity for threatening to punish the inhabitants of Edinburgh for not doing what it was out of their power to do. In his answer, which expressed this mock humanity meant to produce a popular effect in his favour, he said that, if compassion to the inhabitants should make him withdraw his guards from their posts round the Castle, General Guest might next with equal reason require him to evacuate Edinburgh and abandon all the advantages of his victory; and finally, that if Guest bombarded the town, or attempted any wanton mischief upon it, he would take his revenge and make full reprisal upon the estates of the officers serving in the Castle, and upon all who were known to be open abettors of the German government. Guest now agreed to suspend his cannonade until the return of an express from London.* But the wild Highlanders understood little about truces and suspensions; and some of them, probably tempted by a good mark, or anxious to get the good things they were carrying, fired at some people that were conveying provisions up the Castle Hill. Guest, interpreting this irregularity as a breach of the agreement, opened a fire from his battlements, using both cannon and small arms, against the houses that covered the Highlanders on the blockade. Charles then strictly prohibited all correspondence with the Castle upon pain of death, and strengthened the blockade by posting additional troops on several points. Hereupon Guest informed the magistrates that he must forthwith demolish those houses that stood nearest the Castle, but that care should be taken to do as little damage

* On the 4th of October Horace Walpole says—"Just as I wrote this, a person is come in who tells me that the rebels have cut off the communication between Edinburgh and the Castle; the commanders renewed their threats, and the good magistrates have went up hither to beg orders may be sent to forbid this execution. It is modest! it is Scotch!—and I dare say will be granted. Ask a government to spare your town, which you yourself have given up to rebels; and the consequence of saving which will be the loss of your castle!—but they knew to what government they applied."

as possible to the peaceful inhabitants. From two o'clock on the 4th of October till sunset a terrible fire was kept up by the Castle; and as soon as it grew dark the garrison made a vigorous sally, set fire to some houses, and made a trench between the Castle and the upper end of the High-street, where they planted some field-pieces and fired down the street with cartridge-shot. Next day the cannonade was continued, and several of the Highlanders and a few of the unfortunate inhabitants were killed or wounded.* The loud cries and murmurs of the people were calculated to make many impressions besides that of compassion; and in the evening the young Pretender published a proclamation recalling his former orders, withdrawing his troops from the blockade, and allowing a free communication between the town and the Castle. "This cannonade, or, as it was called, bombardment, of Edinburgh," says Home, "was grievously complained of. The generality of people concluded that the garrison of the Castle was in want of provisions, and that the general found himself under the necessity of keeping the communication open in the manner he did. It was not so; the Castle was well provided, and General Guest meant to engage the Highlanders in a siege, and prevent them from marching into England. With this view, in the beginning of the week after the battle of Preston, he wrote four or five letters to the Duke of Newcastle, secretary of state, acquainting his grace that there was but a very small stock of provisions in the Castle of Edinburgh, that he would be obliged to surrender if he was not relieved immediately; and he gave his advice that the troops to relieve him should be sent by sea to Berwick or Newcastle, as the quickest conveyance. These letters were sent out from the Castle, that they might fall into the hands of the rebels; but, lest any of them should make its way through the Highlanders and reach London, General Guest wrote a letter to the Duke of Newcastle that contained an account of the real state of the garrison, and of the deception which he intended to practise on the rebels. This letter was sent to Captain Beaver, of the Fox man-of-war, lying in the road of Leith, by one Corsar, a writing-master in Edinburgh, who desired Captain Beaver to send his long-boat to Berwick with the general's letter, and put it into the post-house there, that it might be safely conveyed to London." This would have been good military conduct, if necessary; but it still seems to us to have been unnecessary, as there were other causes sufficient to detain Charles and his Highlanders at Edinburgh, and to give time to the English for preparation. During the contest with General Guest, which lasted from the 29th of September to the 6th of October, very few people either in Edinburgh or its neighbourhood joined the Pretender; and no men of quality whatever except Lord Kilmarnock and Arthur Elphinstone, who became soon afterwards, by the death of his brother, Lord Balmerino. But the nobility and gentry of the mountains and of that part of Scotland which lies nearest the Highlands began to come in rather freely. The first of them that reached Edinburgh was Lord Ogilvie, eldest son of the Earl of Airie, who brought with him a good regiment of 600 men. The very next day—the 4th of October—Gordon of Glenbucket arrived with another regiment of 400 men; and on the 9th Lord Pitsligo presented himself with six companies of infantry and a great many gentlemen from Aberdeen and Banff, who, with their servants well armed and mounted, formed a respectable-looking body of cavalry. But Pitsligo, by the force of character and example, was of more value to the cause than another man would have been, though he had quadrupled his actual levies. His lordship was not rich—few Scotch lords then were, unless they jobbed at court—but he was exceedingly beloved and esteemed by all his neighbours, who considered him as wise as he was amiable, and who gave him so much credit for wariness and caution, that they concluded the cause must be both good in itself and likely to be prosperous in its issue when he could make up his mind to join it.* But still those powerful island chiefs, Sir Alexander MacDonald and MacLeod of MacLeod, kept sternly aloof; while the still more powerful Lord Lovat equivocated, quibbled, and hesitated. Charles sent to the isle of Skye a trusty messenger, himself a MacLeod, with a paper of instructions, containing rules for what he should say to the chiefs of Skye, and also to other persons, according to circumstances. This messenger represented to Sir Alexander MacDonald and MacLeod of MacLeod that it was still time to join the good cause, that his royal highness Prince Charles entertained no resentment at their backwardness, but was still willing to receive them as the most favoured of his

* In speaking of one he had known—a rara avis in terris—who spoke evil of no man, Dr. King says, "The person I mean is the present Lord Pitsligo of Scotland. I not only never heard this gentleman speak an ill word of any man living, but I always observed him ready to defend any other person who was ill spoken of in his company. If the person accused were of his acquaintance, my Lord Pitsligo would always find something good to say of him as a counterpoise. If he were a stranger and quite unknown to him, my lord would urge in his defence the general corruption of manners, and the frailties and infirmities of human nature. It is no wonder that such an excellent man, who, besides, is a polite scholar, and has many other great and good qualities, should be universally admired and beloved, inasmuch that I persuade myself he has not one enemy in the world. At least, to this general esteem and affection for his person his preservation must be owing. For, since his attainder, he has never removed far from his own house, protected by men of different principles, and unought for and unloved by the government. . . . It was not ambition, but a love for his country, and a conscientious regard to his duty, which drew this honest man (however he might be mistaken) into the rebellion of 1745. A great prince, who had been well informed of my Lord Pitsligo's character, would immediately have pardoned him, and restored the little estate which he had forfeited."—Anecdotes, Political and Literary, of His own Times.

* It appears that during the cannonade the young Pretender left Holyrood-house for a much safer place—that is, for Duddingstone, where the mass of his army was encamped, and where Guest's cannon-balls could not reach him. "Lord Tweeddale," says Marchmont, "showed me a paper of intelligence from one James Wallace, who has been sent by Coxe to Edinburgh, and who says that the Castle had then fired about ten guns, only two whereof had any effect, but killed nobody, and some had been without ball; that, as soon as the Castle fired, the young man left the abbey and went to the camp."—Diary.

father's loyal subjects. Finding his argument ineffectual, the messenger went from Skye to Castle Downie, the chief seat of the Frasers, and there remained some time in close conference with Lord Lovat. Notwithstanding all the representations of Duncan Forbes, that old chief had been wonderfully elated with the news of the battle of Prestonpans, declaring that it was a victory not to be paralleled in history; and that, as sure as God was in heaven, his right master would prevail. He had already connived at sundry little levies and marchings of the Frasers to join his son-in-law, MacPherson of Clunie; and now he began to complain to Duncan Forbes, with whom it was necessary to wear a mask to the last, that, while he, Lord Lovat himself, was in a deplorable state of health—with a most terrible stitch in his side—with a shortness of breath—with horrible tortures that would not yield even to warm brandy—his eldest son and heir, losing all fear of God and of his father, was exerting himself for the false prince and carrying off his vassals from their allegiance to King George. "My stitch," writes the old fox, "still continues; it will soon make an end of me; and then I'll be no further troublesome to my dear Lord President, or to any other of my friends; and the mad youth will be then Lord Lovat, as well as colonel of his rebellious regiment. I do assure you, my dear lord, that I will not regret dying at this time, that I may not see the evils that threaten my family, which was always regarded as an honest brave family in this country. I am very easy about my obstreperous and unnatural son, and the mad people that feed him in his false ambition; but the thoughts and fears of seeing the honest family of Lovat demolished and extinguished in our days pierces my heart and soul with the most melancholy thoughts, which would be enough to kill me, though I had no stitch nor pains in my body. . . . As to my clan, I wish with all my heart that the villains and rascals of them were seized and severely chastised and punished; but I believe they are marched south, in the regiment of that unhappy youth, to screen themselves from justice; and I would be very glad that the fifth man of them were hanged. But, my dear lord, as to the honest gentlemen and tenants that have stayed at home for love of me, and for love of peace and quietness, it would be the hardest case in the world that those honest people should be molested."* All this was clear, or it became so soon after:—the obstreperous and unnatural son, as he chose to call the heir of his house, was in reality set on by his truly unnatural father, who had ever behaved to the young man in a tyrannical and brutal manner, and who was now intending to make him his stalking-horse, and, if need were, his scape-goat.† The artful blind was further intended for his own security—for there had been repeatedly a talk of putting him under arrest—and for keeping together unhurt and in arms all the rest of his clan, so that he might declare himself with weight and effect at the most proper moment. The person he most feared was Lord Loudon, who had kept together a good strong regiment in the Highlands, and was daily enlisting more men for the service of King George. In the same remarkable letter from which we have just quoted, he gives Duncan Forbes a thousand thanks for speaking to Loudon in his favour. "I would expect," he says, "civility and friendship from his father's son, who was my good and intimate friend. It is certain, my dear lord, that while you please, and the Earl of Loudon pleases, I will be safe and unmolested in this little hut; for the ministry will never give a warrant against me, or against any man in this country, but on your lordship's representation or the Earl of Loudon's." Meanwhile the other great Whig lords of the Highlands were far from being so active and honest as Loudon and Duncan Forbes. Whether residing about court, or being at the time in the North, most of these noblemen betrayed an astounding degree of selfishness. One of the greatest among them—the Duke of Hamilton—was discontented because government had not given him the lord-lieutenancy of his county; the Duke of Queensberry had other grounds of personal dissatisfaction, and so had the Duke of Montrose, the Duke of Buccleugh, the Marquess of Lothian, Lord Dumfries, and nearly all the rest. These thanes seldom agreed among themselves, except upon the single point of jealousy and hatred to the Duke of Argyll. "I would do nothing," said the Earl of Marchmont, "that should enable the Duke of Argyll to say we were forced to call his lackeys to our assistance. . . . They must not be left free to do what they would with Scotland, and saddle us with the Duke of Argyll." Hampred and embarrassed, Argyll had gone up to London; but he found that he was neither permitted to act by himself nor able to get his jealous co-thanes to act with him. According to Lord Marchmont, "Those in power in Scotland considered only how to create blame to one another." The great leader of the Campbells declared that, on leaving Argyleshire, he was in danger of being taken by the rebels,—that he had now three companies at Inverary, but no arms to give them,—that the Camerons had been in arms for several years,—that he had been in the habit of paying $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of his own rents, as black mail, to be safe from plunder,—and that whenever he had spoken of these things they had not been regarded by the government. The Duke of Argyll, moreover, complained generally that Scotland had been neglected, and hinted that somebody at Edinburgh had behaved like fools, or worse, in opening a gate to let a hackney-coach out, and the Highlanders in. But his readiness and versatility with which his father qualified it."—Art. in Quart. Rev.

* Lord Lovat to the Lord President, in Culloden Papers.

† "It appears," says Walter Scott, "from the evidence of Fraser of Dunhalloch and others upon Lord Lovat's trial, that all this while the threats and arguments of the father were urging the son (afterwards the highly esteemed General Fraser) to a step of which he disapproved, and that he was still more disgusted by the duplicity presentations and suggestions continued to be disregarded by the lords of the opposite faction, who, as Lord Marchmont confesses without a blush, had a political purpose in view, and meant all they did or offered for a political use—that is to say, to show that they could serve King George better than Argyll could, and that, consequently, they were better fitted for honours and employments, and the real men that ought to have the government of Scotland in their hands.* In this base manner did the dissensions of a most corrupt and jobbing aristocracy tend to leave the people in the Lowlands of Scotland at the mercy of the Jacobite clans, and to favour the Pretender's march into England, which could hardly have been undertaken now if half of the great lords had raised their men in his rear.

On the 9th of October Charles had published a proclamation denouncing "the pretended parliament of the Elector of Hanover," and on the 10th of the same month he issued another proclamation, drawn up by Sir James Stewart and Sir Thomas Sheridan, abolishing for ever the Act of Union, and announcing that his father would never ratify this "pretended union," though he was ready to approve and confirm all other laws or acts which had been passed since the Revolution, if called upon so to do by a free and legal Scottish parliament. Charles thought at one moment of calling a Scottish parliament at once to meet in Edinburgh, but in the face of many difficulties he readily gave up that scheme. Parts of his last proclamation were well conceived and strongly expressed. It was known how the dread of the Stuart sponge had increased the loyalty of fundholders to King George, and the proclamation aimed at removing those fears. "We must declare," said the printed document, "the sentiments of our royal father with regard to the national debt. That it has been contracted under an unlawful government nobody can disown, no more than that it is now a most heavy load upon the nation; yet, in regard that it is for the greatest part due to those very subjects whom he promises to protect, cherish, and defend, he is resolved to take the advice of his parliament concerning it." The proclamation, in the name of Almighty God, and upon the faith of a Christian and the honour of a prince, promised liberty of conscience, and to England, Scotland, and Ireland the enjoyment of the religions or forms of worship at present established in those countries respectively, and also full security for property of all kinds. It stigmatised as false and ridiculous the dreadful threats of popery and arbitrary power with which all the pulpits of the country were ringing; and it denied that the cause of the Stuarts was linked with the formidable powers of France and Spain. "Listen only to the naked truth," said the paper; "I, with my own money, hired a vessel, ill-provided with money, arms, or friends:

I arrive in Scotland attended by seven persons; I publish the king my father's declaration, and proclaim his title, with pardon in one hand, and in the other liberty of conscience, and the most solemn promises to grant whatever a free parliament shall propose for the happiness of the people." The proclamation threw a glaring light upon the unsightly and unnatural spectacle of England calling in foreign troops to assist her in this contest on her own soil. "The fears of the nation from the powers of France and Spain," said the paper, "are vain and groundless. My expedition was undertaken unsupported by either. But, indeed, when I see a foreign force brought by my enemies against me, and when I hear of Dutch, Danes, Hessians, and Swiss, the Elector of Hanover's allies, being called over to protect his government against the king's subjects, is it not high time for the king my father to accept also of assistance?"* In simple truth, Charles had come unattended by a foreign army because neither France nor Spain would risk one with him; he and his father had deafened those two courts with cries for such an army; and they had endeavoured, in nearly every country in Europe, from Russia to Italy, to get a foreign force wherewith to invade England; at this very moment they were pressing the French for such a force as would, if granted, have established, at least for a season, the supremacy of that contemptible despot Louis XV. in Scotland; but nevertheless, the thing told well in the public eye, for Charles had really come as he said, as yet very few French or Spaniards had joined him, and no considerable number did join him until after the arrival of most of George's foreign host. As the weather grew more stormy and foggy, a few more French ships braved the vigilance of the English cruisers and privateers; one got into Montrose with about 5000*l.*, and two or three others contrived to land on the same coast 5000 stand of arms, six field-pieces, a little more money, and several experienced officers, French and Irish. Nay, in one of these ships there ventured over M. de Boyer, who brought a letter of congratulation from Louis XV. Charles received this Monsieur as a regular ambassador from the court of Versailles, and paraded him as such among his Highland chiefs, whom he deluded into the belief that Louis was soon going to send an immense army. Another gentleman was forthwith sent to France to give a magnified account of his successes, and to press for further and immediate supplies. Indeed, five or six thousand pounds would not go far with as many thousand hungry Highlanders. Various odd and irregular methods were resorted to to obtain more cash. One of these methods was particularly curious. Charles seized all the goods of smugglers that were deposited in the custom-houses of Leith and other ports, and sold them back for ready money, at low prices, to the very smugglers from whom they had been taken. The Highlanders in and about the camp at Duddingstone were still less particular, for they occasionally demanded baubees from the peaceful passengers with levelled muskets or brandished claymores; and, to make matters worse, the young Pretender had thrown open all the gaols, and the emancipated felons, putting on the Highland kilt and mounting the white cockade, levied more considerable contributions as real Highlanders.

* The conclusion of this paragraph of the proclamation was still more startling:—"Who has the better chance to be independent of foreign powers—he who with the aid of his own subjects can wrest the government out of the hands of an intruder, or he who cannot, with assistance from abroad, support his government, though established by all the civil power and secured by a strong military force, against the undisciplined part of those he has ruled over for so many years? Let him, if he pleases, try the experiment: let him send off his foreign hirelings and put all upon the issue of a battle, and I will trust only to the king my father's subjects!"

The young Pretender had by this time a regular council of state, consisting of the Duke of Perth and Lord George Murray, his two lieutenant-generals; O'Sullivan, his quarter-master-general; Lord Elcho, a colonel of his horse-guards; Murray of Broughton, his secretary; Sir Thomas Sheridan, his former tutor; the Lords Oglevie, Nairne, Pitsligo, and Lewis Gordon; Cameron of Lochiel, and all the greater Highland chiefs. But if we are to believe Lord Elcho, one of the members of it, Charles might just as well have had no council at all, being prevented by the old family obstinacy of the Stuarts from taking its advice. "His royal highness," says Elcho, "could not bear to hear anybody differ in sentiment from him, and took a dislike to everybody that did." His lordship also assures us that about one-third of this council consisted of true Tories and divinc-right men, whose principle it was that kings and princes could never do or think wrong.* The place where he was seen to most advantage was indisputably the ball-room; and Charles entertained the fair Jacobites with several gay balls while he stayed at Edinburgh. "In the evening," says Home, "he received the ladies who came to his drawing-room; he then supped in public, and generally there was music at supper and a ball afterwards." But this kind of life could not last; it was necessary to hear the louder music of cannon-balls, and do something, unless he intended to remain to be attacked at Edinburgh. He had all along expressed his determination of marching into England. His uneasiness about his rear was partly removed by the assurance of Fraser of Foyers that old Lord Lovat would now declare on the right side, and that not only the MacIntoshes and the MacKenzies, but also the MacDonalds and the MacLeods of Skye, had engaged in honour to join Lovat and the Frasers on the Corryrarak.† But the old fox was deceived as to the intentions of the MacDonalds and the MacLeods of Skye, the most powerful of the clans; and he dispatched his secretary Hugh Fraser to acquaint Charles that he had once expected to have assembled a body of four or five thousand men, and to have marched at their head to Edinburgh, but that, as some people had not acted up to their engagements, and as he was so old and infirm, he had resolved to stay at home, leaving his eldest son, with the clansmen he had with him, to serve the prince. And as old Lovat did not declare himself until some time after Charles had left Edinburgh, and as few of the Frasers went farther than Perth, they were of little use to the insurgents. The Highlanders who had fought at Prestonpans returned however to their standard; and by the end of October, Charles mustered, in all, from 5000 to 6000 men, of whom about 400 were cavalry and 4000 real Highlanders. All the regiments of foot wore the Highland dress. But, as it was perfectly well known that 12,000 veteran troops were now on foot in England, besides the thirteen regiments of infantry and two regiments of cavalry raised by the noble regiment factors, it seemed but a desperate enterprise to invade that country. The council in Holyrood was much divided in opinion; some proposed waiting until the arrival of that French army of which the Prince had spoken so confidently; some wanted to wait at least till they had got more money from France; and some were of opinion that he ought not to go to England at all, nor aspire to the possession of that throne, but content himself with the ancient kingdom of Scotland, as his ancestors had done before him. But at last it was resolved to march, sanguine hopes being entertained of a Jacobite rising in England as soon as they should get across the borders; and on the last day of October, at six o'clock in the evening, the young Pretender left Holyrood House. That night he slept at Pinkie House, as he had done the night after the battle of Prestonpans; and on the 1st of November, having appointed Lord Strathallan to command in Scotland during his absence, he began his march.* He was now joined by MacPherson of Clunie and by Menzies of Sheen, who brought about 900 more Highlanders; and this was the last reinforcement that joined. The whole army was divided into two columns: the first, with the baggage, artillery, &c., to move upon Carlisle by the direct road through Moffat; the second, headed by Charles in person, to take the more circuitous route by Kelso, as if it intended to enter England not by Cumberland but by Northumberland, and to meet Marshal Wade, who lay at Newcastle, in front. Either column was preceded by some men on horseback, denominated hussars, who kept a look out, scoured the country, and procured intelligence. In the clan regiments every company had two captains, two lieutenants, and two ensigns; the colonelcy and command resting with the chiefs of the respective clans, or with their sons or brothers or nearest of kin capable of war, according to the ancient custom of clanship. Every man in the regiment bore the name and considered himself the kinsman of the chief and colonel. The pay of a captain was fixed at half-a-crown a day: that of a lieutenant at two shillings; that of an ensign at one shilling and sixpence; and the privates received sixpence a-day without deduction; but the front rank of each regiment, consisting of persons who considered themselves gentlemen, were paid a shilling a-day per man; and these tacksmen and duniewassails were better armed than the ranks behind them, and had all of them targets, which many of the others had not. In the day of battle, each company of a Highland regiment furnished two of its best men to form a body guard to the chief, who always took post in the centre, and who was generally flanked by brothers or cousins, who, in common with the whole clan, held it the greatest possible disgrace to abandon the head of their house; but it was soon observed that the common men of the clans were less enthusiastic than usual. To make raids and forays on the Lowlands of Scotland, was work to which they had been accustomed, and the success of which in all times was recorded in a thousand ballads and traditions; but the country beyond the Cheviot and the Tweed was an unknown world to them, and they liked not to go so far from their homes, uncertain as they were of the intentions and the power of the Whig clans they had left behind them. Thus almost as soon as they lost sight of Edinburgh they began to desert in small parties. Charles crossed the Tweed at Kelso, and halted one day in that little town. From Kelso he sent forward to Wooler with sham orders to prepare quarters there for his troops, as if he intended to march eastward; but when he moved he struck to the westward, marching down Liddesdale, and, crossing the river Esk on the 8th of November, he and his men occupied that night a place called Reddings, in Cumberland, on the road to Carlisle, from which important city the attention of Wade had been completely withdrawn by the deceptive movements of the Highland army. But in crossing the English border the spirit of the superstitious mountaineers had been further depressed by a trifling accident:—as they set their feet on English sward they drew their claymores and shouted; but Cameron of Lochiel, in drawing his sword, happened to cut his hand, and all those hardy fellows turned pale at the sight of a little blood, because it was considered as a bad omen.* Next day the other column, which had gone by the Moffat road, having turned suddenly westward, as agreed upon, joined on the Carlisle road, and the whole army marched forward for that city, which they summoned in form on the 10th.† Carlisle, like all our old inland fortified towns, had been suffered to go to decay since the cessation of the fierce border wars between Scots and English. It was surrounded by a very old and very infirm wall; it had a castle stronger than the wall, but with no other garrison in it than a company of invalids, commanded by Colonel Durand. Within the city, however, there was a considerable body of Cumberland and Westmoreland militia; * and the officers of that force, Colonel Durand, and Mr. Pattison the mayor, resolved to defend the place, and to return no answer to the summons. They, no doubt, expected that General Wade would soon come across from Newcastle to their relief; and, in effect, before the Highlanders could break ground, intelligence was received that Wade was in full march, by Hexham, to raise the siege. Upon this the whole rebel army was ordered to march to Brampton, in the forest of Inglewood, seven miles from Carlisle, to wait for Wade there; but at Brampton no English troops were seen or heard of; and, after losing three days, it was resolved to return to Carlisle and besiege that place in form. The Duke of Perth had the direction of the siege, which Lord George Murray covered, taking up his quarters at Harraby, on the high road to Penrith, and placing Glenbucket at Rickerby, on the north side of the river, to hinder any succour from going into the town by the bridge. Other troops were thrown into little hovels and hamlets round about, or, for want of better lodging, they lay upon the ground—the weather being very cold, with both frost and snow. Charles himself remained with a strong detachment at Brampton, and appears not to have moved till the business was finished at Carlisle. For a short time the Cumberland militiamen fired very briskly all along the walls, making a great noise, and hitting very few of the enemy; but when they saw Perth erecting a battery, or rather preparing to erect a battery, with a few contemptible light pieces upon it, their hearts failed them, and they hung out the white flag. Perth and his officers refused to admit the town to a separate capitulation, and insisted that the castle should be included in the surrender; and both town and castle were accordingly surrendered on the 15th of November, at the very moment when Marshal Wade in reality had begun to move from Newcastle to their relief. "Not a battery was raised," says a Highland officer, "not a cannon was fired continued it briskly for some time. The Pretender took up his quarters at Mr. Lowry's, of Blakewell, from which, on the 10th, he dispatched a messenger, to whom he gave two guineas, with a letter to the garrison, which was received in at the silly-port. . . . On which the garrison thought proper to confine the messenger, and returned no other answer but from the mouths of their cannon.—A Complete History of the Rebellion, from its first rise, in 1745, to its total suppression at the glorious battle of Culloden, in April, 1746. By James Ray, of Whitehaven, Volunteer under his Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland.—This Volunteer Ray was rather a silly, vapouring person, but he saw a good deal of the military operations, and is to be depended upon when he describes what he has seen with his own eyes. In other particulars his very absurdities render him amusing.

* Strathallan was to remain at Perth with some Jacobite gentlemen and a few French and Irish officers and their men, to look after the succours expected from France, and to form an army of reserve of such other Highland clans as might come in.

* Ray says, "there was the whole militia of the two counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, who were about 1600 men, besides the inhabitants, and 80 invalids in the castle, which was well supplied with ammunition, partly from Whitehaven."

* Account of the Young Pretender's Operations, in Lockhart Papers. We learn from a letter written by Doctor Chandler, Bishop of Durham, that the public spirit in Northumberland, Durham, and the neighbouring counties was exceedingly good; but that, unless the troops of the association could be put under a proper regulation of discipline, they could not stand before a body of Highlanders.—Sir Henry Ellis, Original Letters, Illustr. by us." This easy acquisition was matter of great triumph; but during the short siege Perth had quarrelled most violently with Lord George Murray; and, as Perth was allowed the honour of signing the capitulation, the quarrel became still further envenomed. The mass of the Highlanders were a sort of Protestants, and were therefore disposed to hate the Duke of Perth, who was a Papist. The army murmured; and Lord George Murray insisted upon resigning his commission as lieutenant-general, telling the prince he would continue to serve as a volunteer to the last drop of his blood; this was presently followed by a petition from several officers, praying Charles to dismiss all Roman Catholics, and reinstate Lord George Murray. Perth then waited upon the prince, and resigned his commission of lieutenant-general, assuring him at the same time that he would remain at the head of the regiment which he had raised. The young Pretender could do nothing but submit to circumstances. Perth was left to serve as a colonel of a regiment, and the sole command was intrusted to Murray, who was far the more competent of the two. It is said that Perth was anxious to avoid discord, which must ruin everything at once, and that he had magnanimity enough to feel or show no resentment at his dismissal from the joint command. But if it be true that Perth himself was capable of this generosity and greatness of mind, it is impossible to conceive that his friends, vassals, and dependents were animated by the same sentiments. We believe, on the contrary, that, even under the most favourable circumstances, jealousies and dissensions like these, and the fierce old feuds between clan and clan, would have broken up the army in a very short time. As for the young Pretender, his authority and influence were next to nothing among the common Highlanders, who now, as formerly, merely looked to their respective chiefs, and would take no command from any other person.

Having surrendered the town, the castle, the military stores, and their own arms and horses, and having engaged not to serve against the Pretender for one whole twelvemonth, the Cumberland militia-men and the invalids marched out; and on the 17th Charles made a triumphal entry into Carlisle, where the people seemed stupified, but by no means disposed to welcome him or to join him. A council of war was called to decide what was to be done next: some proposed to march towards Newcastle, and bring Wade to an action; some thought it would be better to march directly upon London by the Lancashire road; and others thought it would be best of all to go back into Scotland, as there was no appearance of an invasion from France, and

* "The Duke of Perth, with his division, were the first of the rebels that entered Carlisle, which they did on the 15th, the Pretender being then seven miles from the city. They made the garrison to swear never to appear in arms any more against them; and Perth, shaking the men by the hands, told them they were brave fellows, and offered them money to enlist with him. The rebels have taken about 200 horses, and all the arms from the militia, besides a thousand stand lodged in the castle. They also found a rich booty in the castle; the people of the country round about having brought thither for safety the most valuable of their effects. One of their Highland chiefs was killed by the fire from the walls on the 10th."—Letter from a Gentleman of Cumberland, in Ray's History.—It appears from the Jacobite accounts that the person killed was not a chief, but a common man; and that the addition of another man wounded made up all the loss they sustained in taking Carlisle. According to Ray, the Highlanders, while they were at Brampton, made very free with the sheep, pease, and other poultry, belonging to Lord Carlisle's tenants; and they also seized all the horses they could lay hold of, without any question either as to the value of the beasts or the rights of the owners.

just as little of a Jacobite rising in England. Charles, it is said, declared that he would adhere to his original resolution of marching forward at all hazards. "Lord George Murray," says Home, "compared the advantages and disadvantages of each of the proposals; and concluded that, if his royal highness chose to make a trial of what could be done by marching to the southward, he was persuaded that his army, small as it was, would follow him. Charles said he would venture it. It was a venture."* If, instead of advancing, Charles had chosen to retire, he would not very easily have got back to his old lodgings in Holyrood. He had scarcely turned his back upon Edinburgh, when the crown officers re-entered that city in solemn procession,—while he was resting at Kelso, the garrison of Edinburgh castle was reinforced, levies of men were made for King George, and now Wade had sent forward two regiments of cavalry to support the forces assembled in Edinburgh. The Jacobite ladies wrung their hands; but there was nothing to be done. The Holyrood royalty of Charles was destined to be scarcely longer lived than the gourd of the prophet. He had now sent back orders to Lord Strathallan to march from Perth with all speed, and join him in England with his whole force: but Strathallan was in no condition to move; for the Earl of Loudon and the Lord President Forbes were gathering in great force in his rear—levies of Highland Whigs were coming down from the mountains—the Philistines were almost upon him—Glasgow, Paisley, Dumfries, nearly all the towns where there was trade or industry, and their attendant the Whig principle, were beginning to give alarming symptoms of loyalty to King George; and even in the fair city of Perth itself, the destined head-quarters of this Jacobite army of reserve, the mob could not be restrained from celebrating King George's birthday; and, what with whiskey, and what with loyalty, they came to blows with Strathallan's men! The same demonstrations took place at Dundee; and Strathallan told the Pretender he could not move yet. It is said that M. de Boyer, who had accompanied him on his march into England, confidently declared that a French force would presently land; and that Charles himself proclaimed with equal confidence that he was sure his old friends of Lancashire would join him as soon as he appeared among them. With these hopes, and with an army reduced to 4500 men, Charles renewed his march, leaving 200 men to garrison Carlisle. The Highlanders marched in two divisions: the first, consisting of six regiments of foot and the first troop of Horse Guards, and commanded by Lord George Murray, moved first, and marched to Penrith on the 21st of November; the second division, under the command of Charles, arrived at Penrith on the following day, and there occupied the quarters which the van and Lord George Murray had left. In the rear of this division were the cannon, guarded by Perth's regiment, the second troop of Horse Guards, and some other mounted gentlemen, whom it was a stretch of courtesy to call hussars. There was a short halt at Penrith, on account of a rumour that Wade was crossing the Westmoreland and Cumberland mountains to attack them in flank; but, as this intelligence was disproved, they pushed on by Shapp, Kendal, and Lancaster to Preston, where both columns met and rested on the 27th. The catastrophe in 1715, when MacIntosh and Forster laid down their arms before Generals Carpenter and Wills, had made a very deep impression on the Highlanders; and perhaps there were other traditions which pointed out that town as their ne plus ultra. It is at least certain that there was a general impression among them that they could not, or ought not, to venture farther into England than Preston. "Preston," says one of the Pretender's officers, "was so fatal to the Scots, that they never could get beyond it; but Lord George Murray, in order to evade the freec (or superstition, which the Highlanders are full of), crossed the bridge immediately, and quartered a great many of the men on that side of the water; where they halted next day, expecting some intelligence, in which, it is to be presumed, they were disappointed."* Their march from Kendal had not been altogether undisturbed, for some of the Cumberland farmers, who had been robbed of their horses, being better mounted upon other steeds, followed the so-called hussars, dismounting some of them, and recovering their lost property. Wherever the young Pretender came he demanded the public money.† From Preston the Highlanders marched to Wigan, where they arrived on the 28th, when a party of them went through Leigh, and what was called an advance party entered Manchester the same day. This advanced party, according to all accounts, consisted of a serjeant, a drummer, and a drunken woman. "Manchester," says Ray, "was taken by a serjeant, a drum, and a woman, about two o'clock in the afternoon, who rode up to the Bull's Head on horses with hempen halters (a just emblem of what they deserved), where they dined; after dinner they beat up for recruits, and in less than an hour listed about thirty. They were likewise joined by several others, some of desperate fortunes, who were modelled into what they called the Manchester Regiment,—mostly people of the lowest rank and the vilest principles; which occasioned him who called himself the Duke of Perth to say that if the devil had come a recruiting, and proffered a shilling more than his prince, they would have preferred † Volunteer Ray was following the march of the rebels from Cumberland—"reconnoitring," as he says, in the disguise of a pedlar. He assures us that, having borrowed a fuffi and a case of pistols, he sallied out from his quarters at the Sun in Lancaster, and made two prisoners, that he picked up another straggler between Lancaster and Preston, and that within two miles of the latter town he stopped and made prisoner the rebel courier who was carrying dispatches from the army to Scotland, and forty-nine letters besides.

the former.* To deceive people as to their real numbers, quarters had been demanded in Manchester for 10,000 men. Ray says that they were a plundering mob of about 6700; but in reality the Pretender's force did not at this moment much exceed 4000 men, for few or none had joined them on their march in Lancashire; and even "proud Preston," though considered the most Jacobite place in England, had furnished only some half-dozen vagabonds. When all these roadside recruits had been joined to the Manchester men the total number was about 200. This Manchester regiment was put under the command of Mr. Francis Townley, a Roman Catholic of a very ancient family, and almost the only gentleman that joined in Lancashire. In the mean-time Marshal Wade, with the Major-Generals Howard and Ogleshorpe and Brigadiers Cholmondeley and Mordaunt, had marched as far as Hexham in the direction of Carlisle, where he arrived on the 17th, with a considerable body of Swiss troops for his van. Receiving intelligence there that Carlisle had surrendered, Wade had returned to Newcastle, where he arrived on the 22nd, with his forces much fatigued and distressed by inclement weather. But after a rest he had again put himself in motion, and was now marching through Yorkshire to attack the Pretender in the rear. In the front lay the Duke of Cumberland at his head-quarters at Lichfield, and with an army that counted at least 5000 disciplined troops and from 2000 to 3000 militia and new levies; and behind the duke, between him and London, a third army was rapidly collecting on the borders of Hertfordshire and Middlesex. Nor was this all: the city of Chester, where there were many Catholics, who were all—somewhat unreasonably—expected to join the standard of rebellion, had been secured for government by the Earl of Cholmondeley, and put into a posture of defence in a surprisingly short time; while, still nearer to Manchester, the important town of Liverpool was secured by the magistrates, merchants, and other inhabitants, who showed as much spirit and resolution as the people of Manchester had shown indifference. The townspeople of Liverpool raised a regiment nearly 700 strong; and, unlike the noble regiment-factors, they asked no pay, no reward, and attempted to make no job whatever; but at their own expense clothed, fed, and paid the men, and took for their colonel an old and experienced officer, the Honourable Colonel Graham, appointed by the king. To this service the corporation voted 2000*l., and nearly every man in Liverpool, from the opulent merchant down to the poor porter or day-labourer, contributed something, according to his ability. When the first fear of an attack from the Highlanders had evaporated, this Liverpool regiment, after breaking down several bridges to embarrass and retard the march of the Highlanders, crossed the country, and joined the forces of the Duke of Cumberland, who was astonished to find them so well disciplined in so short a time.

The wisest and even the most resolute of the Highland chiefs recommended an instant retreat, saying that they might possibly avoid Wade, or defeat him if they met him, and get back into Scotland without any great loss; but that, if they went forward into the heart of England, where the people, instead of joining them—as Charles had assured them they would—were thwarting them in all possible ways, and reinforcing day after day the forces of King George, they must inevitably be surrounded by three or four armies and cut to pieces. Lord George Murray, as an experienced soldier, must have felt the force of these arguments; yet he said that they ought not to oppose the will of the prince, who was quite certain of being joined by thousands as he approached the Trent; and he induced them to agree to go on as far as Derby. On the 1st of December they resumed their onward march, fording the Mersey near Stockport, and carrying the baggage and artillery across, lower down the river at Cheadle, by means of a rude temporary bridge made of the trunks of trees. On the Cheshire bank they found assembled an enthusiastic old lady, and some few old Jacobite gentlemen; but no reinforcements, no insurgent bands of English, no money (except a little donation to be mentioned presently), nothing but some timid good wishes and one or two fervent prayers. The old Jacobite lady—the story is traditional—was a Mrs. Skyring, who, when an infant, had witnessed what was called the happy landing of Charles II. at the Restoration. Since the second, and, as it proved, final expulsion of the Stuarts, by the Revolution of 1688, she had continued hoping to witness another restoration, and another blessed

* Lord Mahon has found in the State Paper Office, Scotland, several letters of secret intelligence written by a gentleman at Manchester to the Duke of Cumberland; and one of these letters completely agrees with the account given by Ray and others of the mighty force that took for the Pretender the good town of Manchester. "Just now," says the Manchester correspondent, writing on the 28th of November, "are come in two of the Pretender's men, a serjeant and a drummer, and a woman with them. I have seen them. The serjeant is a Scotchman, the drummer is a Halifax man, and they are now going to beat up. These two men and the woman, without any other, came into the town amidst thousands of spectators." On the following day, when the Pretender and his main body had arrived in Manchester, the same correspondent says—"The two Highlanders who came in yesterday and beat up for volunteers for him they call his royal highness Charles Prince of Wales, offered five guineas advance. Many took on; each received one shilling, to have the rest when the prince came! They do not appear to be such terrible fellows as has been represented. Many of the foot are diminutive creatures, but many clever men among them. The guards and officers are all in a Highland dress, a long sword, and stuck with pistols; their horses all sizes and colours. The bellman went to order all persons charged with excise, and innkeepers, forthwith to appear, and bring their best acquaintance, and as much ready cash as that contains, on pain of military execution. . . . Several thousands came in at two o'clock: they ordered the bells to ring, and the bellman has been ordering us to illuminate our houses to-night, which must be done. The chevalier marched by my door in a Highland

* "It is to be observed that after the prince passed Preston the bridges where he was to pass were all broke down, and the fords spoiled, in order to hinder his passage; but that was a needless precaution, for Highlanders give themselves no great trouble about a bridge, if the water be any way fordable."—Account of the Young Pretender's Operations, in Lockhart Papers. The artillery and baggage and sundry other parts of the Pretender's army could not, however, dispense with bridges so well as the Highlanders; and when the advance was converted into a retreat the precaution caused them much mischief and suffering.

that his account of the arrival of Charles at Manchester and the proceedings thereupon exactly agrees with that given in these letters.

landing at Dover or somewhere else; and she had ever since laid aside half of her yearly income to remit to the exiled family abroad, from whom she concealed her name. She had just now sold her jewels, her plate, and every little article of value she possessed; and she brought the money in a purse and laid it at the Chevalier's feet, exclaiming, as she beheld him—"Lord now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace." The amiable and aged enthusiast, it is added, could not survive the shock when she heard a few days after that Charles had completely failed in England, and was retreating in a wretched condition.* On the same day on which he crossed the Mersey, Charles, with the main body of his army and all his artillery, entered Macclesfield, where they busily employed themselves in putting their fire-arms in order, as if they expected a battle. From the Cheshire bank of the Mersey Lord George Murray marched to Congleton with a strong body of horse and foot, and sent forward Colonel Kerr, who drove before him a small body of the Duke of Kingston's horse, who fled in the direction of the Trent, to which the Duke of Cumberland was now advancing. Kerr also seized "the famous Captain Weir, well known to all about court, and carried him to Congleton, from which he was sent to Prince Charles to be examined."† This Weir, who was reconnoitring for Cumberland, was threatened with the gallows as a spy, and thereupon it appears he revealed all he knew about the motions of the duke. This was that his royal highness, deceived by Lord George Murray's side movement, had been led to believe that the Highlanders intended to get into Wales, and that the best thing he could do was to interpose between them and that country, where some hot-headed gentlemen were suspected of Jacobitism. And, in effect, Cumberland went on that wrong scent as far as Stone, thus leaving the London road as it were open to the Highlanders. Lord George Murray instantly turned off to the left, and gained the high road to Derby and the capital at Ashburn. The other division of their army also made straight for Ashburn, and by the evening of Wednesday, the 4th of December, Charles, with his united and entire force, was at Derby, and some two days' march nearer to London than his deceived opponent the Duke of Cumberland. The young Pretender took up his quarters at a house in the town belonging to the Earl of Exeter.* His artillery, consisting of thirteen pieces, was stationed upon Nun's Green; his troops were dispersed through the town, and amounted to nearly the number of the inhabitants. Charles entered on foot with his guards in the dusk of the evening. According to a gentleman of Derby—"he was tall, straight, slender, and handsome, dressed in a green bonnet laced with gold, a white bob-wig, a Highland plaid, and broadsword." The same respectable eye-witness says that the prince's life-guards, commanded by Lord Elcho, "were fine figures, well dressed; but their horses were jaded"—that "the main body of the army entered Derby six or eight abreast; a mixture of every kind, from childhood to old age, from the dwarf to the giant, chiefly in deranged dresses, marked with dirt and fatigue"—that "they carried eight standards, white with red crosses; and were ushered in by bagpipes, that ancient northern music which raises the spirit of the martial Highlander."* "His whole force," says Ray, "being now together, and his stragglers and English recruits all come in, they made their most formidable appearance at Derby; yet they used all the precaution imaginable to hinder an exact account from being taken of their number; which was a point they laboured to manage with the utmost diligence during their whole march, often demanding billets for 10,000 men, when they had not above half that number with them. On their first coming into Derby, it was judged, both from the measures they took and from the behaviour of their chiefs, that they were still disposed to march on. In the evening they held several councils of war; in which the debates amongst their chiefs grew too high to be concealed; yet they agreed upon nothing the first night except levying the public money, which they did with the usual threats of military execution, as they had done in all the towns they marched through."† On their first entrance they demanded billets for 9000 men, and then inquired for the magistrates, but were told they were fled. However, they afterwards seized upon Alderman Cooper, who was too lame to run away, and obliged him to proclaim the Pretender. Articles of dress were applied for, as being much wanted by the Highlanders, who had torn and worn their clothes in their rough progress, "and some they had with money, but more without."‡ They demanded the land-tax, excise, &c., and actually received about 2500*l.* They demanded also 100*l.* from the post-office, which was refused: they then reduced it to 50*l., and, not getting even that, they seized and took away a post-chaise. On the following day one Coppock, whom the chevalier had chosen to make bishop of Carlisle, preached at All Saints Church, Derby; and the drummers and sergeants beat up for volunteers, offering five shillings in hand, and five guineas when they should arrive in London. Cook, an itinerant journeyman blacksmith, Edward Hewitt, a butcher, who had had a brother hanged, and James Sparks, a stocking-maker, took the five shillings and enlisted; and these were all the recruits Charles got at Derby. Another council was held, apparently more stormy and discordant than that of the preceding night. The Highland chiefs insisted that they had shown no want of alacrity and daring—that they had already run hazards equal to their ardent love for the cause; but that now they could not in common sanity go farther, and that they ought not and could not lead the brave men who followed them to certain destruction. Lord George Murray, now the real commander-in-chief, and the man of most military ability and knowledge, agreed with the chiefs, and told Charles that, as there was no rising among the English; no sign of a descent from France, not one circumstance to encourage their going forward, they must retrace their steps and get across the borders while it was yet time—for, if the Duke of Cumberland should get between them and Scotland, and join Marshal Wade's army to his own, retreat would be impracticable. Murray also represented that, by going back instantly, they might greatly increase their force; for news had reached them that Lord John Drummond had landed at Montrose from France, with some piequets of the Irish brigade and some Scottish troops in the service of Louis XV.; and, if Lord Strathallan could only keep his forces together at Perth, there was reason to hope that there would be 4000 brave men on foot to meet them on their return to the North. Lord George Murray offered to occupy the post of danger, which in a retreat is in the rear. There are several discrepancies and contradictions in the contemporary accounts of these proceedings; but the majority of them agree in stating that Charles was much averse to the retreat; and hence occasion has been taken to commend his personal bravery at—as appears to us—the expense of his discretion or sanity. Nobody, however, seems to have reflected that he may have considered it as dangerous to go back as to go forward, or that cowardice itself is capable of desperation, or that it was not cool manly courage, but absolute madness to think of rejecting the strong arguments offered to him by Murray and the chiefs, who were, assuredly, no cowards themselves, no timid, cautious, formal campaign-makers, that could deem the capture of a town worth enough for a season, and a retreat no disgrace, but as brave and daring men as ever drew sword in a * Letter written by Hugh Bateman, Esq., as cited in W. Hutton's sensible and excellent history of Derby. Old William Hutton, who had a large and liberal mind himself, says with perfect truth that Mr. Bateman's letter is written with more candour than was the practice of the time.

* Lord Mahon says that he heard this interesting story in conversation from the late Lord Keith. To make Mrs. Skyring's devotion the more wonderful, it is said that her father, an old cavalier, had been basely treated at the Restoration by Charles II.

† "Order was given for the collecting all the public monies, as also the association money signed for by particular persons for raising men for the government, which was done everywhere where we passed.—Jacobite Account, Luckhart Papers.—The respectable people in the counties of England had signed associations for mutual and general defence. Whatever sum of money they had paid, or had promised to pay, for raising troops for King George, the like sum they were compelled to pay to the Pretender whenever the subscribers could be caught, or whenever their property could be subjected to claymore law.

‡ Bateman's Letter, in Hutton's Hist. Derby.—Volunteer Ray says that the common Highlanders were sadly addicted to borrowing, and that when they wanted a pair of shoes they would borrow them from the feet of any man they met. Ray, however, was far from having so much candour as Mr. Bateman, or as good old William Hutton, who says—"Perhaps history cannot produce any instance of so small a number of men, so ill supplied, making a November march of so great an extent in a remarkable wet winter, into the centre of a powerful enemy's country, and surrounded with continual dangers, who were able to retreat, and who did so little mischief. The prince was of a mild temper, much averse to cruelty or depredation. Horses, arms, ammunition, and public money, in all similar cases, are deemed lawful plunder. They frequently paid their quarters—more frequently it was not expected. If they took people's shoes it was because they had none of their own; and no voice speaks so loud as that of necessity: if they omitted payment, it was because they had no money."

* Of these Derby recruits Cook and Hewitt escaped when the game was up; but Sparks, the poor stocking-maker, was caught and

desperate cause. And what had the young Pretender to answer to the arguments they urged? Nothing—absolutely nothing but childish dreams and a trusting in chance, or, as he termed it, in Providence. The reasoning generally put into his mouth is no reasoning at all; and if he actually employed it to men of sense he must have excited their contempt or compassion. It is represented, for example, that he said to the council of officers that he trusted in the justice of his cause,—that Providence, which had hitherto protected him, would continue its favour and open his way to London,—that it was probable the French might yet land in Kent or Essex, and that the English would yet rise and join him,—that it would be better to go into Wales than to retreat to Scotland,—and that, as for himself, he would rather be twenty feet under ground than go back. It is said that not one of the noblemen, officers, or chiefs with him was in the least moved by these discourses, except the Duke of Perth, who, be it observed, had the weakest head among them, and who had personal reasons to induce him to vote against Lord George Murray, who had reduced him from a lieutenant-general to be the simple commander of his own regiment. But it is admitted that even Perth reluctantly and against his better judgment agreed with his master that it would be better to advance than to retreat. Some Irish officers, it is said, were not so unwilling to cross the Trent; but it is added that the Scots observed that these Irish, who held regular commissions in the French army, and who had been sent over by Louis, were sure, at the worst, of being honourably treated as prisoners of war; whereas they (the Scots), if defeated and made prisoners, would be hanged and quartered as rebels and traitors. It is absurd to call this reflection invidious—it is the height of injustice and folly to attempt to throw any imputation upon the courage of these Highlanders. No men in their circumstances, and with the use of their eyes, ears, and reason, would, unless they had taken a bond of fate, have consented to march towards London. It is reported that the men in the ranks, or at least all the common Highlanders, were eager to go forward, and employed themselves while at Derby in taking the sacrament and sharpening their broadswords; but these poor mountaineers, who could speak no English, were probably ignorant of the intelligence that was familiar to their chiefs; they had seen no enemy since they had left Carlisle, and they may have fancied that they should see none between Derby and London. With all our high notion of their hardihood and daring, we cannot allow ourselves to believe that they could have been anxious to advance if they had known the real force of the several English armies, which by this time made in the aggregate upwards of 25,000 men. Under no circumstances, however, could the common Highlanders have been in a state to judge and decide; but among their leaders there was an abundance of proper military judgment, and they,

as we have seen, were unanimous. It is said that Sir Thomas Sheridan, his tutor, and Murray of Broughton, his secretary, at length prevailed over the obstinacy or woful stupidity of Charles, and that he at last sullenly agreed to a retreat; saying that, in future, he would summon no more councils—that he was accountable to nobody except to God and his father, and that he would no longer be advised by any man. This, if true, goes to prove that he was a true Stuart, and that he bore a striking resemblance in character to his grandfather, James II.

Walter Scott, whose charming and romantic fancy not unfrequently blinded his keen and shrewd perception in matters of history and historical doubts, treats the council of war at Derby as a great mystery, that requires documentary explanations; and he hints that papers may yet be produced capable of altering received opinions very materially. "The history of the council of war at Derby," he says, "in which Charles Edward's retreat was determined has never yet been fully explained; it will, however, be one day made known."* Waiting for this knowledge, we must humbly say that it appears to us that no explanation however full, no document that was ever penned, can alter the facts of the case, diminish the force of the English gathering on all sides to close round the Highlanders, disprove the utter aversion of the English people to the Pretender's cause, or their resolution to stand by the government, or in any way establish that the retreat from Derby was not a proper military measure and an inevitable necessity. No evidence, documentary or traditional, can ever prove that a French army had landed on the English coast, and that the English people between Derby and London were ready to take up arms for the Stuarts—two contingencies without which an advance was madness. If Charles had stayed only two days longer at Derby the Duke of Cumberland would have been upon him with a far superior force, with men very different from Cope's dragoons at Prestonpans,—veterans who had fought at Dettingen and Fontenoy, and who were devoted to their leader. According to some of the Jacobite accounts there was no council of war at all held at Derby. Thus John Hay says that there was a council held at Macclesfield, when Lord George Murray was keen for the advance; and that Lord George at Derby suddenly told the young Pretender that it was high time to think what they were to do,—that he was of opinion they ought to go back to Scotland, and join their friends there (under Lord George Drummond and Lord Strathallan); and that he finally used the names of many of the chiefs, who he said were bent upon the retreat. "The whole day was spent in intrigue and cabal, but no council of war was called."† In the same collection there is, however, a paper apparently written by Charles himself, stating that M. le Comte affirmed that the retreat was in consequence of a council of war; that all the members of that council, except M. le Comte himself, were of opinion that the retreat was absolutely necessary; and that M. le Comte endeavoured to persuade some of them to join with him, but could not prevail upon one single person. The Highland officer who kept the journal we have so often referred to says, distinctly, that there was a council held at Derby in Charles's presence,* and that, "dispatches of importance being received, it was resolved to return to Scotland."† The account of the young Pretender's operations in the same valuable repertory, and to which also we have frequently referred, does not mention the council of war at Derby, but shows, in the clearest manner possible, that no council could possibly have recommended Charles either to advance or to stay where he was. This Jacobite authority says,—“They were now at Derby, with an army not half the number they were reported to be, surrounded in a manner with regular troops on all sides and more than double their number. To go forward there was no encouragement, for their friends (if they had any) had kept little or no correspondence with them from the time they entered England. If they passed Swarkston-bridge, not far from Derby, which of necessity they must do to go either to London or Wales, they were credibly informed that there were orders to cut the bridge behind them to hinder their retreat, which, if done, they must fall a sacrifice to their enemies. As they had no assurance of assistance even if they went forward, and as they had intelligence of Lord John Drummond's arrival in Scotland with his regiment, and some Irish piquets from the Irish regiments in France, commanded by Brigadier Stapleton, with four pieces of brass cannon, eight-pounders, two of sixteen, some small arms, with a profusion (as was said) of warlike stores, it was resolved to return to Scotland, and to send orders to Lord John Drummond, who was commander-in-chief of the French troops, to march with all expedition with his whole force to join the prince on the borders.”

If Charles had meant to go on to London, he ought not to have rested a single day at Derby; for the Duke of Cumberland soon found out his mistake, and retraced his steps: he was at Stafford on the 5th, with detachments at Burton-upon-Trent and at Lichfield; and on the 6th he had his head-quarters at Lichfield, whence he moved to cover the high road to the capital, and to take post at Northampton. Marshal Wade on the 5th was at Weatherby, with his horse and dragoons thrown forward to Doncaster. On the morning of the 6th, before daylight, the Highlanders began their retreat from Derby. According to John Hay, very few of them knew that they were marching back; and when the men, who had been put in motion in the grey of the morning, began to perceive, by daylight, from marks they had taken of the road, that they were retreating, there was a universal lamentation among them.* Charles, who during the advance had generally walked on foot at the head of his men, now mounted on horseback, “for his spirit was heavy; he could not walk, and hardly stand, as was always the case with him when he was cruelly used.”† He rode a black horse, which was said to have belonged to Colonel Gardiner, slain at Prestonpans. The first night they got back to Ashburn; on Saturday, the 7th, they reached Leek, destroying in their passage whatever might be of use to the government troops, and resenting the disappointments they had met with, which provoked the country people to do them all the mischief they could; and on Monday, the 9th, about the hour of noon, they re-entered Manchester, where the mob gave them some visible marks of their dislike. On the 8th the Duke of Cumberland sent forward General Hawley from Meriden Moor, near Coventry, with the dragoons and some mounted infantry,‡ to try and harass the Highlanders in their retreat, and detached an aide-de-camp across the country with orders to Marshal Wade to hasten his march, so as to intercept them in their northern route. On Friday, the 6th, when the last news in London was that the young Pretender was at Derby, between the army of the Duke of Cumberland and the capital, there was a considerable panic in the city, and men feared the worst when the Highlanders were actually retreating. The consternation was so great as to obtain for that day the name of “Black Friday.” But on the next day news was received of their retreat; and by the 9th the alarm was entirely dissipated. “We dread them no longer,” writes Horace Walpole. “We are, indeed, threatened with preparations for a French invasion, but the coast is exceedingly guarded; and, for the people, the spirit against the rebels increases every day: though they have marched thus into the heart of the kingdom, there has not been the least symptom of a rising, not even in the great towns of which they possessed themselves. . . . Here in London the aversion to them is amazing.”§ Volunteers of all descriptions offered themselves to serve in the

* Volunteer Ray, who was riding about the country reconnoitring, says, that on leaving Derby they made a feint, as if they would have marched for Loughborough, but suddenly retreated northward, with the utmost speed, and fled to Ashburn that night.

‡ Volunteer Ray says—“To facilitate his march the country people, firm to their king, brought in horses to mount 1000 foot soldiers, drafted out of several regiments, that were to follow in order to overtake the rebels. Our foot soldiers not being accustomed to riding, I thought they looked odd on horseback, with their muskets and knapsacks slung over their shoulders; but their desire to come up with the rebels was visible in every one of their countenances; with so much pleasure they rode along, and the countrymen with fresh horses coming to remount our soldiers, running themselves on foot very cheerfully, that it really afforded a most pleasing prospect.”

* A room in Lord Exeter's, now Mr. Eaton Mousley's, house, has always been pointed out as the place where the council was held. ranks; and the whole body of the law had formed themselves into a regiment; under the command of Lord Chief Justice Willes, and were to have done duty at St. James's, to guard the royal family, in case it had been necessary for the king to take the field with the army that lay encamped about Barnet and Finchley Common. Luckily that force was not required, and did little more than scare away the highwaymen from their usual beat. Weavers and other London artisans were probably not the best of troops, and it became the fashion to turn the Finchley camp and the march to Finchley into ridicule; but there were nevertheless some good regular troops on that point, both horse and foot, with thirty-two pieces of artillery; and the life guards and horse grenadiers were ready to march out from London at a moment's notice. As soon as the retreat of Charles was known, these regular troops, which, without the household corps, amounted to 3000 foot and 1000 horse, were marched from Finchley Common and Barnet to the coasts of Essex and Suffolk; and London and the neighbourhood, was besides enabled to send 4000 foot and 1500 horse to the coasts of Kent and Sussex, to meet any attempt that might be made at invasion. If it had been necessary for the king to take the field—if the Highlanders had really given Cumberland the slip,—it is quite certain that his majesty could have covered London with a regular army far superior in number to that of the Pretender; and we cannot think so lightly of the spirit of the English people, as to believe that the thronging thousands of volunteers and new recruits would have counted for nothing in a battle. As, however, the rumour still rang of an invasion—which France certainly never seriously entertained a notion of—his majesty notified to parliament that he had sent for 6000 more foreign troops—Hessians of good name and repute, that might serve in Scotland. Pelham moved for an address of thanks; but Lord Cornbury proposed to add a representation that national troops were the only constitutional troops, and that the House hoped to be relieved of all foreigners as soon as possible. Pitt, who was not yet secretary-at-war, joined Cornbury; but, upon a division, it was decided, by a majority of 190 to 44, that the utmost precaution was recommendable, and that the nation at such a crisis was anxious to get all the troops it could. In a very brief space of time people laughed as much at the apprehensions of a French invasion as they had done at their fears of the Highland army.

The young Pretender meanwhile continued his headlong retreat, apparently taking little or no charge of the army, riding on in the van on his black charger, getting gloomily into quarters every night as soon as he could, and leaving the rear to take care of itself. Having levied some heavy contributions from Manchester, which were to be repaid when the country should be settled under his government, he left that city on the 10th of December, and hurried on to Wigan. On the next day he and the Highlanders reached proud Preston, in the neighbourhood of which they were extremely apprehensive of some sudden attack. On the 13th they were at Lancaster, where they threw open the gaols and committed other disorders. The discipline preserved on their advance, which, though not so perfect as described by some writers of Jacobite propensities, was still very remarkable for an army of Highlanders, disappeared on the retreat. "The meaner part of them pilfered and stole everything portable for their purpose; and their chiefs sent ruffians to plunder and extort money from gentlemen who had exerted themselves most against them."* This conduct excited the people against them; and the peasants of Lancashire and Cumberland ceased to have any awe of a flying army. Thus when the Duke of Perth was sent in advance, with a party of hussars for his escort, to get across the borders, and, if possible, to bring up Lord John Drummond and his so-called French army, he was attacked between Penrith and Kendal by a party of the country people, and forced to return to Charles at Kendal, after losing several of his horses and horsemen. This was on the 14th; and on the 15th, when Perth advanced again with a greater force to Penrith, the townsmen rose and fell upon him with such fury that he was again obliged to turn rein and fly. Several gentlemen and farmers of the neighbourhood mounted their horses and pursued Perth as far as Shapp, a little village between Penrith and Kendal; and that night beacon-fires were lighted on every hill-top to raise the country. The night of the 16th was spent by Charles and the whole rebel army in and about Shapp: before reaching that place they had seen some troops of light horse appearing on the heights in their rear, and during the night they had frequent alarms. Lord George Murray, who had charge of the rear and of all the baggage, found it extremely difficult to proceed over the mountains; for his carts broke down, his gun-carriages stuck in the ruts, and the horses were worn out. He was even compelled to throw a great deal of the powder into one of the mountain tarns, from want of means of transport. On the next day they pushed forward for Penrith with all their force, being watched by some troops of government light horse, who continued to hover on the heights. On crossing an open moor the country people, with about fifty or sixty of the regular cavalry, seemed disposed to make a stand; but they went off as soon as the Highlanders ran towards them. "If," says one of the Jacobites, "these people had had the least thought or judgment, they might have made themselves masters of all the baggage and cannon; for, if they had had the precaution to have thrown down in different places parts of the stone walls on the sides of the highway near the villages, it would not have been possible for the baggage and cannon to have passed without a great deal of trouble and more time than we had to spare: however, as that was neglected, the Highlanders continued their march, not without a great many stops occasioned by the frequent breaking of the carriages.* Old Marshal Wade was not quick enough for the rebels, and he made a bad guess as to the route they would take. When he got to Ferry bridge he called a council of war, wherein it was resolved to march by Wakefield and Halifax into Lancashire, as the most likely way to intercept the Highlanders. But when he reached Wakefield he learned that they were already at Preston, and, judging it impossible to come up with them with his fatigued infantry, he detached major-general Oglethorpe with all his horse to look after the Pretender; and then with the foot turned back towards Newcastle. Oglethorpe and his horse marched one hundred miles in three days over ice and snow, and got to Preston on the 13th, not many hours after the Highlanders had left it. On the same day the Duke of Cumberland with part of his light horse reached Preston also. On the 14th Oglethorpe continued his pursuit at the heels of the Highlanders, some of his rangers going so fast that they fell among the clans before they were aware of it, and were taken prisoners. On the 17th, when the mass of the Highlanders were near Penrith, both Cumberland and Oglethorpe arrived in considerable force of horse, and with the duke's thousand mounted foot, at Kendal. They had then good hopes of coming up with the enemy; but they were obliged to rest their men and horses that night, and during the night Charles rested at Penrith, where Lord George Murray strained every nerve to bring up the encumbered rear with all the baggage, &c. On the morrow, the 18th, Cumberland and Oglethorpe moved so early that their light horse came in sight of the Highland rear as it was toiling across Clifton Moor about three miles from Penrith; but the pursuers were too weak to attempt any important attack; and the Cumberland squires and farmers that were acting with them wheeled about when the clan of Glengary set up a shout and threatened to fall upon them. Moreover, Charles from Penrith sent back most of his horse to assist Lord George and the rear, and then the light horse of Oglethorpe fell back to wait the arrival of their main body. The baggage was sent forward to Penrith with a small escort, and it was proposed to turn aside and surprise Lowther Hall, the princely residence of Lord Lonsdale. Lord George Murray, who had been frequently at Lowther Hall, said that he was very well acquainted with the park and all the enclosures about the house, and that he would be himself the guide. † Leaving some of his hussars as a decoy at a farm-house on the edge of the moor, Lord George with about 300 foot and a troop of horse marched through the village of Clifton and turned down to Lowther Hall. He found the gates shut, and that those within would not open them at his summons, but some of his light Highlanders soon began to climb over the walls; and then a man on horseback and another on foot rushed out from the mansion. But the attempt at escape was hopeless;—the two Englishmen were soon taken, and one of them proved to be a running footman of the Duke of Cumberland, who told them that his royal highness had appointed to sleep at Lowther Hall that night, and was coming on with all possible speed with 4000 horse and with some infantry following him. Lord George Murray then moved back to the village of Clifton, and sent notice to Charles, who was reviewing his men on the moor behind Penrith, but who soon detached some regiments to Clifton to reinforce Lord George. The day was now spent, but the moon arose in a clouded sky, and gave an occasional and fitful light. Murray in a short time discovered some of Cumberland's and Oglethorpe's horse, and part of the infantry that had now quitted the horses which had carried them forward so rapidly, stealing between the hedges and stone walls, as if they hoped to take him by surprise.* But Murray had already lined most of those hedges and walls; and, though the English troops came on with a deal of bravery and resolution, they were checked by a most unexpected cross fire; and then Lord George, shouting "Claymore! claymore!" rushed down with Clunie and the MacPhersons, and attacked them sword in hand. The English dragoons soon retired; Colonel Honeywood was wounded and left for dead; and the intended surprise ended in a complete discomfiture. Volunteer Ray, who will not admit the defeat, says—"The rebels, from their situation, had greatly the advantage of us, we being obliged to go over the hedges up to the boot-tops in water; and not only so, but, it being late, they could see our buff belts and laced hats when we could not so well discern their blue bonnets and dark-coloured plaids; so that we directed our fire at their fire, which for a time was very hot on both sides." Even the Jacobite officers allow that they were glad to be off, and that the most they intended was to check the pursuit. There never was a notion entertained of attacking Cumberland and his main body, which was now clearly seen on the edge of Clifton Moor. "Night coming on," says one of these warm partisans, "put an end to the affair, and both parties retired—the Duke of Cumberland, it was said, towards Appleby, and the Highlanders to Penrith." "Our men," says the journalising Highland officer, "would have done more execution on the enemy had not night prevented them; but,

* According to Ray, who was present, the rebels at Clifton had posted themselves in the most advantageous manner, by lining every hedge, orchard, and outhouse, from the south end of Clifton to Thomas Savage's, a Quaker, at the foot of the moor. By this time his royal highness was come up, and was close by the ambuscade; but he was warned of his danger by Jonathan Savage, who ran through the fields at the risk of his life.

* Account in Lockhart Papers.

† It appears that several of the Scotch lords knew well Lowther Hall and the country about, from having been educated in that neighbourhood.

learning that they might be overpowered by the greatly superior number of the enemy, they made now a quick but orderly retreat, and joined the prince at Penrith; and it was not judged proper to engage their whole force till we were reinforced by our army from Perth." Late at night as it was when the affair was over, Charles instantly resumed his march, leaving Clanronald's and Kerpoch's regiments between Penrith and Clifton-bridge, to cover his retreat, or to make Cumberland believe that he intended to stay and fight the next day. The duke slept neither at Appleby nor in Lowther Hall, but was fain to take up his lodgings with a loyal Quaker, whose house was close to the village of Clifton.* According to the official account, he had only lost in killed and wounded some forty men and four officers; but, according to the Highlanders, his loss was much more considerable. The clans confessed to the loss of twelve men; but the English said that five of them were found dead on the field, and about thirty thrown into the river. But, whatever was the relative amount of slaughter, the affair of Clifton Moor seems to have discouraged Cumberland's dragoons, who left off their close pursuit, and allowed the rebel army, rear, baggage, artillery, and all, to get to Carlisle without any disturbance. But the night-march from Penrith was dreadful; the moon had set, or become obscured by the clouds, so that the men could hardly see their hands before them or the rough and dangerous mountain-road over which they were walking.† Charles was obliged to quit the saddle and trudge on foot with the rest; and when they arrived at Carlisle in the morning of the following day, the 19th of December, both officers and men were spent with fatigue, and altogether in a deplorable condition. "This," says the Highland officer, "was one of the darkest nights I ever saw; yet did his highness walk it on foot, and most part of the way without a lantern, and yet never stumbled, which many of us Highlanders did often." Perhaps it was scarcely to be expected that Cumberland's and Ogleshorpe's tired horse, which for the most part had marched ten hours that day, or that any regular troops, even in better plight, should have hazarded themselves along such a road in such a night. If they had ventured to do so nearly every advantage would have been on the side of the Highland foot, who had been accustomed to fight and skirmish by the light of "Mac Farlane's lantern,"‡ or even without it, in the dark: as for the English foot, they could never have kept pace with the nimble, long-winded mountaineers; and horses would have been little more than an embarrassment in that darkness where even men on foot could not see their way. Some of the Highlanders boasted that the English regulars never appeared after Clifton Moor, and that what they met with there had cooled their courage; but it appears to us that the rebels never gave them an opportunity of trying their mettle, and that they ran too fast to be caught. Even at Carlisle they only rested part of a day and night, setting forward early on the morning of the 20th, and moving so rapidly that they crossed the deep river Esk that very night, and so got back into Scotland. To go the faster, and at the same time to improve the defences of Carlisle, where they changed their garrison, they left behind them there all their cannon except three, called the Swedish pieces, all their cohorts, and a great deal of their baggage. Ray says that they chose rather to venture drowning than stay to give Cumberland battle; and he adds that some of them were drowned in crossing the deep river. The duke was certainly not far behind them; for, while they were crossing the Esk, he advanced to within eight miles of Carlisle; and on the next day that place was invested by the king's troops, who were aided and assisted most zealously by the country people—a class of men who would have made more figure in this invasion if they had not been deprived of arms by a jealous and barbarous statute.* As Cumberland had already begun to show the natural severity of his temper by hanging some prisoners and spies as soon as caught, few or none ventured to give any assistance or information to the beleaguered garrison, which consisted of some men from a regiment of Lowland Scots, a few Frenchmen and Irishmen, and the recently raised Manchester regiment: in all they were about four hundred unpractised soldiers, under the incompetent command of Mr. Townley and one Hamilton, who had formerly been steward to the Duke of Gordon. At first they seemed disposed to make a vigorous defence, firing their cannon on everybody that appeared; but they were astonished and palsied, as at the shock of an earthquake, when the duke began to reply to their four and seven gun batteries with six 18-pounders, which had been brought up with sixteen or eighteen country horses to each piece from the sea-port of Whitehaven; and on the morning of the 30th, when shot and shell were falling fast about them, they hung out a white flag, and proposed a surrender. They sent out a man with two letters, one directed to his royal highness and the other to the commander of the Dutch troops, supposed to be with his army, and both subscribed by a French officer, who styled himself the commandant of the French garrison and French artillery. The letter to the Dutch was to require their withdrawing from the English army, under pretence of

* The house of Thomas Savage, mentioned by Ray.

† It is quite clear that the young Pretender feared a pursuit, for otherwise he would not have risked the disorders of a retreat in a dark night with tired soldiers. According to Ray, he began his retreat even while Lord George Murray was fighting at Clifton; "and was so apprehensive of being overtaken, that at ten o'clock at night he ordered his artillery and baggage to advance towards Carlisle."

‡ The moon.

* "All the horse and foot-guards," says Ray, who was himself sent down to Whitehaven, his native place, to bring up some battering cannon, "were cantoned round the town of Carlisle, at a mile or two distance. His royal highness fixed his head-quarters at Black-hall, and a great many people came out of the country to assist the king's army, with their meat staves, and such other weapons as they had; the game-law forbidding the use of fire-arms."

a capitulation which had been entered into at Tournay between France and the States-General. Cumberland, in reply, said that he could make no bargain with rebels,—that he had no Dutch troops with him, but Englishmen enough to chastise the rebels and those who dared give them assistance. Hamilton, the Duke of Gordon's ex-steward, then made another application in a letter signed by himself; but he was only answered, that the only terms his royal highness could grant to the rebel garrison of Carlisle were, that they should not be put to the sword, but be reserved for the king's pleasure. And at three o'clock in the afternoon both town and castle were thrown open to Brigadier Bligh; the officers yielded themselves prisoners, and the men, piling their arms in the market-place, retired into the cathedral, where a strong guard was set upon them. The French part of the garrison was found to amount only to three officers and five men! Among the prisoners were seven that had deserted from Cope's army at Prestonpans, or had taken service with the Pretender after that catastrophe;—the duke hanged them instantly, together with four others of the same sort. Poor Thomas Coppoch, the young Pretender's intrusive Bishop of Carlisle, was also taken, and reserved for the gallows in another place. The duke, leaving the command to General Hawley, set out from Carlisle on the 3rd of January, to travel post back to London. The 20th of December, when Charles recrossed the Scottish border, was his birth-day, but there was small time or means to celebrate it. It appears he expected that Lord John Drummond, with the army from Perth, would have crossed the Forth, and have been well advanced towards the borders to meet him; but there was no news of this reinforcement, and it was not found possible to keep together all the army that had been in England. As soon as they were on their own territory many of the Scots began to run home. Those that remained were, for convenience of quarters, divided into separate columns, and marched by different routes. Charles went with one of these divisions to the town of Annan, where he arrived that night; Lord George Murray went with another to Ecclefechan; and Lord Elcho advanced with the horse to Dumfries, where, as one of the rebels remarked, his presence would not be very agreeable, as, in his advance, he had seized all the town-people's carts. But, besides, Dumfries, an industrious, trading place, was strongly attached to the established government; and it is said that, as the Highlanders marched in, they found bonfires blazing in the streets in joy at their failure. The point fixed for the re-union of the divisions was not Edinburgh but Glasgow, where they all arrived by the 26th of December, Lord George Murray entering that town a day before Charles. The Duke of Perth was then sent to hasten the march of his brother, Lord John Drummond; the rest remained seven or eight days in Glasgow, levying contributions and forcing the Whiggish and Presbyterian inhabitants of that thriving place to furnish shirts, coats, shoes, bonnets, and all that the Highlanders and their allies wanted. During their march into England the magistrates and citizens of Glasgow had raised a regiment of 600 men, and had made other great exertions for the established government. The Glasgow regiment, under the command of the Earl of Home, had joined the king's troops at Stirling on the 12th of December. These circumstances did not tend to moderate the rapacity and animosity of the Highlanders, who, moreover, had always considered the rich town of Glasgow as a proper place to be plundered. The king's troops, which had assembled in and about Stirling to guard the passage of the river Forth against the rebels collected at Perth, consisted of two regiments of foot and of the two regiments of dragoons (Hamilton's and Gardiner's) that had behaved so shamefully at Prestonpans, and they were backed by about 3000 volunteers from Glasgow, from Edinburgh, and from other places. Many of these volunteers served at their own expense,—not above half of them required any pay; but all, it appears, received their arms from the government and the castle of Edinburgh. During the same interval, or while Charles had been marching towards London, Lord London had raised his little army in the North to more than 2000 men, who, when the money was spent with which government had furnished his lordship, were kept together through the credit and influence of the Lord President Forbes. The head-quarters of this force, composed almost entirely of Highlanders devoted to the government or to their Whig chiefs, continued to be in the town of Inverness. On the other side Lord Lewis Gordon, brother to the Duke of Gordon, had raised a regiment for the Pretender, and several Jacobite gentlemen had made levies in Aberdeenshire, Angus, and other places in the low country of the North, in expectation of the arrival of Lord John Drummond with a great force from France. But Lord John had been very unfortunate at sea; more than half of his transports had been captured by the English cruisers, or driven back to Dunkirk; and when he landed in Scotland he had only his own regiment of foot, and that not complete, and two troops of horse from Fitz James's, or the Duke of Berwick's, regiment, a few companies of the Irish brigade, a very petty train of artillery, some arms, and a very little money. Indeed, when landing at Montrose, his first occupation, was to send out parties into the neighbouring country to collect money,—a circumstance which had an exceedingly bad effect upon a people who had been led to believe that he was coming to give, and not to take,—that he was bringing over ship-loads of Louis d'ors and other bright French coins. He also sought to impose a regular military levy like those established in France, exacting that every proprietor of land should furnish him with one able-bodied man, or 5*l.* sterling for every 100*l.* Scots of his valued rent. Shortly after his arrival at Montrose he detached General Stapleton, with his Irish piquets and some companies of his own regiment, to join Lord Strathallan at Perth; sending at the same time some other companies to join Lord Lewis Gordon, who had fixed himself at Aberdeen. Lord Loudon was resolved to check as much as possible the levy of Drummond's arbitrary imposition; and, as MacLeod of MacLeod had come over from Skye, and brought 450 of his men to serve King George, Loudon detached him with this force and with 200 Monros to Inverury, about twelve computed miles to the north-west of the town of Aberdeen, Lord Lewis Gordon's head-quarters. Lord Lewis, warned of MacLeod's approach, advanced by night, and lay waiting for him in ambush with a superior force. A short moonlight combat was the result; and, as MacLeod's men would not stand the charge, he was obliged to turn, and run for it, leaving about forty prisoners behind him, but very few either killed or wounded. This skirmish happened after the young Pretender had recrossed the border; but, before that time, Lord Strathallan's head-quarters at Perth had been the scene of constant quarrel,—the Highlanders and Lowlanders, the Irish troops and the French, all disagreeing in opinion, and indulging in old antipathies and prejudices. Though old Lovat had finally thrown the dice, and sent all the Frasers to Perth, —though the Mackintoshes, the Mackenzies, the Farquharsons, and other clans had assembled there, —it was considered by Lord Strathallan and a council of officers, that the order received from Charles to march forward to the borders and advance into England could not be obeyed. Strathallan was supported in this opinion by all the Frenchmen, all the Irish, and most of the low country Jacobites; but the Highlanders declared that he ought not to examine and criticise but obey the prince's order; and they were actually on the point of taking forced possession of Strathallan's money, arms, ammunition, and stores, when Rollo of Powhouse arrived at Perth just in time to prevent a battle. Rollo announced that the young Pretender was in Scotland, was marching from Dumfries to Glasgow, and expected Lord Strathallan to hold himself with his forces in readiness to join him as soon as he should send further orders from Glasgow. The cause of the quarrel was thus removed, but not the bad blood which it had excited. On the first news of Charles's return from England, the king's troops and the volunteers at Stirling fell back upon Edinburgh, not being strong enough to keep their ground on the river Forth, between two armies. Thus the passages of that river were again left open, and there was no obstruction whatever to the junction of the two armies of Charles and Strathallan. On the 29th of December it was announced from every pulpit in Edinburgh that it had been resolved in a council of war to defend the city against the rebels if they should venture to attack it, and on the following day a number of able-bodied men from the neighbouring parishes were marched into the High-street and furnished with arms, the ministers of the kirk marching with their respective parishioners. The spirit was good, but still liable to cold fits and ague-like attacks of fear and misgiving, until the second day of January, when two regiments of foot arrived from the south at Edinburgh, with news that General Hawley was following with nearly the whole force of Marshal Wade.

A. D. 1746.—On the same day the Highland army left Glasgow, and began their march towards Stirling, to meet Lord Strathallan and Lord John Drummond: they moved in two divisions, one led by Charles, marching by Kilsyth, and the other under the command of Lord George Murray, going by Cumbernauld. During their march they received certain accounts of the surrender of Carlisle from two gentlemen that had made their escape from that place. On the next day Charles took up his quarters in the house of Bamockburn, near Stirling, and his men were cantoned in the neighbouring villages: Lord George Murray occupied the town of Falkirk, and threw out some of the clan regiments as an advanced post. Lord Strathallan and Lord John Drummond presently came up from Perth and joined; and then the Pretender's army amounted to 9000 men, by far the greatest number they had ever assembled. Yet, instead of wheeling round to meet Hawley, and to check the English troops that were constantly marching along the east coast from Berwick and Dunbar to Edinburgh—instead of attempting some bold and decisive blow, Charles and his officers resolved to sit down before Stirling Castle, which was exceedingly well provided, and sure to be well defended by the brave General Blakeney. With extreme difficulty they got their French artillery across the Forth, broke ground, and began the siege. "Our artillery," says one of the rebels, "was commanded by one M. Gourdon (alias the Marquis de Mirabelle, nom de guerre), a French engineer, and another young man that had applied himself to that business (a volunteer never in commission), and there were ten or twelve French gunners, which was all of that kind that came from France, who were covered by the Duke of Perth with four or five hundred men. The engineer, to show his dexterity in his profession (not considering that he had neither all things necessary for such an undertaking nor regular troops that had been accustomed to such undertakings), made his appearance on the strongest side of the castle, where there was nothing but rock and shingle to work upon, so that in order to raise the batteries that were intended, there was nothing but forced earth which was to be carried from a great distance and at great expense, and when finished was commanded by the castle, by which there was a great many men lost, and the battery of little use; however the work was continued rather than oppose his schemes, though it was agreed that the approaches might have been made, and to better purpose, on the other side."* Nothing could well be more absurd than this siege, except the method which Hawley took to raise it. That very confident English general reached Edinburgh on the 6th of January, breathing fire and destruction. He had seen some service both at home and abroad, having served as an officer of dragoons in the battle of Sheriffmuir, and having fought in Flanders under the Duke of Cumberland, who had favoured and promoted him. He appears to have been fitter for the post of provost martial and hangman than for that of general. "I must give you some idea of this man," says Horace Walpole; "he is called Lord Chief Justice (as if another Jeffries); frequent and sudden executions are his passion. Last winter abroad he had intelligence of a spy come from the French army: the first notice our army had of his arrival was, by seeing him dangle on a gallows in his muff and boots. One of the surgeons of the army begged the body of a soldier, who was hanged for desertion, to dissect. Well, said Hawley, but then you shall give me the skeleton to hang up in the guard-room."† The army was full of stories of this man's brutal severity and passionate temper. The first thing he did on entering Edinburgh was to erect two gibbets on which to hang the rebels he intended to take. He brought a staff of executioners with him, and he conferred more frequently with his hangmen than with his aides-de-camp. When Lord John Drummond, who had a regular commission from Louis XV., and who styled himself commander-in-chief of the army of his most Christian majesty in Scotland, sent to propose a cartel or exchange of prisoners, Hawley threw the letter into the fire, seized upon the drummer that brought it as a traitor, and made him write to Lord John—"that rebels were not to be treated with." He had scoffed most unmercifully at the sad failures of poor Sir John Cope, and had boasted in a company of officers, "that he knew the Highlanders, they were good militia, but he was certain that they could not stand against a charge of dragoons who attacked them well."‡ Hawley had now with him twelve old regiments of foot, who for the most part had served on the continent, the Glasgow regiment of foot recently raised, and Gardiner's and Hamilton's dragoons. On the 13th of January he sent forward the dragoons, the Glasgow men, and six of his old regiments of foot towards Stirling, by Linlithgow and Borrowstonness, under the command of General Husk; on the 14th he sent forward his other six regiments; and upon the 16th he left Edinburgh himself, and encamped that evening with all his troops collected at Falkirk, only nine miles from Bannockburn, where Charles had now fixed himself with all his troops, except about a thousand men, left to carry on the siege of Stirling Castle. On the morning of the 17th Hawley was joined by Cobham's regiment of dragoons, and by one thousand Argyllshire Highlanders under Lieutenant Colonel Campbell, afterwards Duke of Argyll. He was thus, even numerically, equal to the young Pretender, or nearly so, having between eight and nine thousand men. Between night and morning Charles's forces had advanced a little, and were now drawn up upon Pleanmuir, about two miles to the east of Bannockburn. The Torwood lay between the two armies, the whole of the intervening distance being about seven miles. It appears that the Highlanders expected Hawley would attack them, and that Hawley expected the Highlanders would run away at the mere fame of his approach. Indeed that vain-glorious general had said as much. But the mountaineers had no such notions; and, seeing that Hawley was in no hurry to attack them, they determined to attack him. At about eleven o'clock in the forenoon a body of the rebels appeared upon the high road which traversed the Torwood and led from Stirling to Bannockburn and Falkirk, moving about with standards and colours to attract the attention of the English camp. Hawley was not at his post—he was refreshing his inward man with a good luncheon at Callender House, at some distance from the field;—but his officers and men fully expected that the Highlanders would attack them right in front from the quarter where they were showing themselves. But a little before one Captain Teesdale of the third regiment of foot and another officer climbed a tree, and with the aid of a telescope discovered the mass of the Highland army in full march, not by the high road through the centre of the Torwood, but by another road on the southern side of the Torwood. In fact the Highlanders had already crossed the river Carron near Dunnipace, and were pointing towards Falkirk moor and some high ground on the left of the king's army. General Husk, the second in command, had been completely deceived by the demonstrations on the high road; but Hawley was so blind or so absorbed by his good cheer that he could not make out the design even when Lieutenant-Colonel Howard of the third regiment reported to him what Teesdale had seen from the tree: he said that the men might put on their accoutrements, but that there was no necessity for them to be under arms; and he continued where he was, feasting at Callender House. The officers on the field were heard saying to one another, "Where is the general? What shall be done? We have no orders." Warned, however, of the close approach of the rebels by some gentleman well mounted, who attended the army and rode about to procure intelligence, the commanding-officers formed their regiments in the front of their camp; and then—when there was nothing but Falkirk moor between the two armies—Hawley came galloping up with curses and confusion, and without his hat. In the middle the rugged moor covered with heath rose to a considerable elevation, which it was the object of both armies to occupy first. Hawley threw forward his three regiments of dragoons, ordering the infantry to follow with fixed bayonets; and, on the other side, Lord George Murray threw forward his light-footed mountaineers. The English cavalry went considerably in advance of their infantry, spurring over the rough heath; and for a time it seemed a sort of race between the Highlanders and the dragoons, which of them should get first to the top of the hill. The Highland foot, however, outran the English horse, occupied the height, and formed along the ridge of it, while Hawley's men were compelled to halt a little below them, with a storm of wind and rain beating right in their eyes and wetting their muskets. The Highlanders formed in two lines; the first line consisted of the three MacDonalcl clans, Keppoch, Clanronald, and Glengary, who stood on the right; of the Farquharsons, the Mackenzies, and the Mackintoshes, who stood in the centre; and of the Macphersons, the Frasers, the Camerons, and the Stuarts, who occupied the left: their second line, including a considerable number of Lowland levies who were neither so fond of fighting nor so passionately attached to the cause as the mountaineers, comprised the Atholl brigade, Lord Ogilvie's regiment, Lord Lewis Gordon's two battalions, the MacLachlans, and Lord John Drummond's regiment. Charles was neither in the first line nor in the second; he stood not even between the two lines, as he had done at Prestonpans; but he took up his post in the rear of the second line, on a mound which still goes by the name of Charlie's Hill. When Hawley's men formed, the three regiments of dragoons were in front; the infantry which had followed them stood in two lines; and the rest of the army, consisting of the Argyllshire Highlanders and the Glasgow regiment, remained as a body of reserve at a considerable distance. Artillery there was none on either side, for the Highlanders, in their rapid advance, had left their guns behind them, and in crossing the moor the English guns had stuck fast in a bog and could not be removed in time. But Hawley heeded them not; he had got his horse and they were to do everything; though two of the three regiments had not yet cleansed their banners of the foul dirt of Prestonpans. In his younger days he had fought against the old Pretender at Sheriff Muir, and he remembered how the left wing of the Highlanders had been broken by a charge of the Duke of Argyll's horse, which fell upon them across a morass, and as he had now a bog in his front and flank, and bogs in his rear, he fancied the cases were parallel. He, however, forgot a material circumstance.—the morass at Sheriff Muir was hard frozen of a sudden, and gave good passage to the cavalry; whereas the bogs at Falkirk Muir were in their most liquid and sinking state. On the word of command to charge, Colonel Ligonier led on all the horse towards the enemy's right. That right, consisting of the Macdonalds, advanced to meet Ligonier, reserving their fire till they were within pistol-shot; but then they gave such a volley as made the dragoons reel in their saddles; and, the rest of the Highland line stepping forward, Lord Lovat's regiment gave a similar discharge with equal effect. This was enough for the heroes of the "Canter of Colt Brig;"—Hamilton's and Gardiner's regiments wheeled round, disordered the foot behind them, and fled with loose bridle. Cobham's dragoons behaved better; but the Highland fire was terrible, the ground was unfavourable for horse, and they wheeled to the right and went off between the two armies, receiving many a murderous shot as they passed the left wing of the Highlanders. Many of the flying horse ran into the bogs, and sinking to the saddle-girths, were cut to pieces by the Highland claymore.* When the English dragoons were gone off, Lord George Murray, who displayed as much personal bravery as good generalship, endeavoured to keep the Macdonalds in their ranks, well knowing that the well disciplined infantry of the enemy would be firmer than their horse, and that any premature pursuit of the fugitives would prove mischievous or fatal; but those hot-headed clans disregarded his orders, and some of the men continued to run into the bogs after the floundering dragoons, and some ran furiously upon the left of Hawley's army, who received them with a general discharge. But while the Highlanders had had the rain, which continued still to fall in torrents, at their backs, and the convenience of their kilts and plaids wherewith to keep their pieces dry, the English infantry, with the rain full in their faces, and with no such convenient drapery, had got their muskets and powder-pans so wetted that hardly more than one piece in five went off.† The Macdonalds, little hurt by this irregular fire, poured in a much more effective volley, and then, throwing down their muskets in their usual way, they fell upon the English infantry with their broad-swords, attacking them both in front and flank. The left gave way, the centre followed their example, and the second line as well as the first was thrown into confusion. It seemed a total rout, and Hawley, who had been standing a little behind the three regiments of dragoons when they advanced to the attack, had got involved in a crowd of flying horse, had been swept down the hill-side, and now had not the means of knowing whether any of his regiments of foot stood firm.‡ But Burrell's regiment stood

† Volunteer Ray says—"It rained heavily and blew hard, which, in a great measure, was the cause of our misfortunes; for our men could not see before them, and consequently the rebels had the advantage of us greatly in that particular. Besides, as it rained hard before, many of the firelocks were so wet, that it is believed not above one in five that were attempted to be fired went off."

‡ Home—who was himself the lieutenant he speaks of—says that the Edinburgh company of volunteers had marched up the hill, was standing by itself, and had not begun to fly—that the captain of that company went in search of General Hawley to know what the volunteers were to do, and that the lieutenant followed the captain to ask the general, if he would be pleased to assign the Edinburgh volun-

as firm as a wall, and, being joined by part of two other veteran regiments, it moved to the Highland left wing, and, when it came directly opposite to the Cameron and Stuart clans, it began to fire with good effect. A narrow ravine that lay between them prevented the Camerons and Stuarts from charging with the claymore, and, soon finding that they were losing a considerable number of men, and that their fire was not equal to that of the English veterans, they fell back from the opposite edge of the ravine in some disorder. Cobham's dragoons, who had soon rallied, now came up to support these gallant regiments of foot. In the mean while the fiery Macdonalds had broken loose, and fought loosely in pursuit, as if the battle were over; but the steady fire of Burrel's regiment, and other signs now seen in their rear, induced these Macdonalds to run speedily back to the ground which they had occupied at the beginning of the battle, and upon which Lord George Murray had been so anxious to keep them. But when they got there they found that their second line had vanished! The indiscipline of those Highlanders that formed the second line had been equal to that of the Macdonalds;—most of the men, seeing the wonderful success of the first onslaught, and being fearful that if they stayed where they were they should get no horses, saddles, and bridles—no part of the booty—had broken away from their lines to join in the pursuit, and when their comrades, who were more obedient to orders and remained on their ground, saw the Camerons and Stuarts repulsed, and heard the steady and increasing fire of the king's troops that stood, and saw Cobham's horse compact and firm, and ready, as they thought, to charge them in their loose and broken lines, they lost heart, and had gone off rapidly to the westward. "At this moment," says Home, "the field of battle presented a spectacle seldom seen in war, whose great events fortune is said to rule. Part of the king's army—much the greater part—was flying to the eastward, and part of the rebel army was flying to the westward. Not one regiment of the second line of the rebels remained in its place; for the Atholl brigade, being left almost alone on the right, marched up to the first line and joined Lord George Murray where he stood with the Macdonalds of Keppoch. Between this body of men on the right of the first line, and the Camerons and Stuarts on the left (who had retreated a little from the fire of the troops across the ravine), there was a considerable space altogether void and empty, those men excepted who had returned from the chase, and were straggling about in great disorder and confusion, with nothing in their hands but their swords." Lord George Murray, however, succeeded in getting these men into line, and brought up some of his own men who had been cool enough to obey orders; and then Charles, who had moved off with the second line, came back with the Irish piquets and some other troops, and, when the Highlanders had collected their muskets which lay thick upon the ground, he led them to the brow of the hill. This movement of so considerable a body disconcerted Cobham's dragoons, who had been again attempting to cover the ridge: they turned back, went down to the place where Burrel's regiment and the portions of the two regiments acting with them were standing, and, retreating with them in good order, they joined the rest of the army, which had rallied on the ground in the front of their camp, where the Argyllshire Highlanders had been left by Hawley, except the heroes of the "Canter of Colt Brig," who, for the most part, never drew rein till they got to Linlithgow.

This was the whole of the battle or affair of Falkirk, which did not last altogether half an hour. But it was now drawing near five o'clock of a wintry evening, and the early darkness of the season was increased by the storm and the black rolling clouds which continued to deluge that uncomfortable moor. Before it grew quite dark Hawley set fire to his tents, and, marching through Falkirk, retreated for Linlithgow, leaving behind him bag and baggage, artillery, ammunition, and provisions. As for his tents, they were so soaked by the rain that they would not burn, and the Highlanders got possession of most of them also. Lord George Murray immediately advanced, and took possession of the abandoned town; and Charles entered Falkirk by torch-light late in the evening, and was conducted to a lodging prepared for him. Hawley had left behind him between 300 and 400 killed and wounded and a considerable number of prisoners, including many of the Glasgow regiment and the Edinburgh volunteers, who, on the whole, had behaved rather manfully. The poet Home was among the captives. But the steady fire of Burrel's men and their companions who had stood by them at the perilous moment seems to have done almost as much mischief; and many of the Highlanders of the second line who had run away were in no hurry to return, while those who remained on the field of battle, or moved from the moor of Falkirk towards the town, were far more eager to pick up the spoils and undress the killed than to pursue the retreating enemy.* Besides, Cobham's dragoons and a considerable part of the English infantry continued to behave well, and the whole army (the Colt Brig men always excepted) made a good and regular retreat, with drums beating and colours flying, and the rear-guard under a brave and sensible veteran—Major-General Husk—who had teers some post, which they would do their utmost to maintain. "The lieutenant," continues Home, "knew General Hawley very well, having waited on him several times at Holyrood House, and asked if there were any regiments standing? Where they were? The general made no answer to his questions, but, pointing to a fold for cattle, which was close by, called to him to get in there with his men. The disorder and confusion increased, and General Hawley rode down the hill."

* "The mountaineers did this work so effectually, that a townsman of Falkirk, who surveyed the field of battle on the following morning, used to say that he could compare the slain only to a large flock of white sheep at rest on the face of the hill—so completely had the Highlanders stripped them."—Chambers, Hist. of the Rebellion.

not lost his head like Hawley. Few doubts can be entertained as to the conduct of the bullying Hawley. General Wightman, an old soldier, who had fought in Scotland in the Fifteen, says, in a letter written a few days after the disgraceful fact, to Duncan Forbes—"I am sorry to tell you, that Lord H——e and Lord Gl——n abandoned the Glasgow regiment on the field of battle, before they were formed, and fled as fast as the Irish dragoons. General Hawley is in much the same situation as General Cope; he was never seen in the field during the battle; and everything would have gone to wreck, in a worse manner than at Preston, if General Husk had not acted with judgment and courage, and appeared everywhere. Hawley seems to be sensible of his misconduct; for, when I was with him on Saturday morning at Linlithgow, he looked most wretchedly; even worse than Cope did a few hours after his scuffle, when I saw him at Fala. This is an odd scene of things, and altogether an unexpected occurrence; and will doubtless shock the K. and the M——ry, as well as the whole English nation, more than the Preston affair did; but does not at all shock me: I see no one bad consequence from it, unless Hawley's disgrace be reckoned one; and I apprehend several good ones; such as the duke's coming down hither, and our having an army of 20,000 men in this country for some months; to which I add General Husk's advancement, who is, indeed, an excellent officer, and an open honest man." But when the news of the affair of Falkirk was announced at court—which it was upon a drawing-room day—the king was neither shocked nor much surprised; and, though the countenances of most of the company betrayed doubt and apprehension, George's was as cheerful as that of the Earl of Stair or as that of Sir John Cope, which was radiant with joy at Hawley's discomfiture. We have seen how disrespectfully the hero of Falkirk had spoken of the hero of Prestonpans; but now their odds were made even—Hawley and Cope seemed one and the same—and a Scotch peer much amused that drawing-room by addressing Sir John with the title of General Hawley.*

Having rested for the night at Linlithgow, Hawley continued his retreat to Edinburgh; but not till the 19th, and then, rather to dry his wet gunpowder, and get more, than out of any fear of

* Walter Scott.—Horace Walpole.—Walpole says—"Hawley, of whom I said so much, has been as unsuccessful as Cope, and by almost every circumstance the same, except that Hawley had less want of skill and much more presumption. The very same dragoons ran away at Falkirk that ran away at Prestonpans. . . . General Husk and Brigadier Cholmondeley shone extremely. . . . Our loss is trifling; for many of the rebels fled as fast as the glorious dragoons; but we have lost some good officers, particularly Sir Robert Munro; and seven pieces of cannon. . . . The fighting lay in a very small compass, the great body of each army running away."—Letters to Horace Mann.

Prince Charles. On his leaving Linlithgow, by accident or by design, fire was set to the palace, and that "royal dwelling"—"the fairest in all Scotland"—was reduced to a ruin. Charles was in no condition to follow or molest King George's army: on the morning after the battle thousands of his Highlanders went off to their mountains to secure the plunder they had made, and violent dissensions broke out between Lord George Murray and Lord John Drummond, and between several of the Highland chiefs. It was evident that there was and could be no unity of command—no steadiness of purpose, no discipline, and that the chevalier possessed not the rare talent of overawing, and commanding, or winning by other means the respect and obedience of turbulent clans and self-willed chiefs. It appears that in the heat of the battle several of his chief officers were as careful as he was himself of keeping out of harm's way—that Lord John Drummond was not in his place—that O'Sullivan, the adjutant-general, was skulking in the rear, and that no general officer was seen in front except Lord George Murray. Some unlucky accidents which occurred in Falkirk the morning after the battle greatly augmented the anarchy and discontent. Lord Kilmarnock came in with some prisoners he had made near his house at Callender, where Hawley had made that good repast which was followed by so bad a digestion; and the chevalier stood at an open window with the list in his hand to look at the captives. Home, who was of the number, has recorded in his best manner the singular occurrence which followed:—"Meanwhile a soldier, in the uniform of one of the king's regiments, made his appearance in the street of Falkirk, which was full of Highlanders: he was armed with a musket and bayonet, and had a black cockade in his hat. When the volunteers saw a soldier with his firelock in his hand coming towards Charles, they were amazed, and fancied a thousand things; they expected every moment to hear a shot. Charles observing that the volunteers (who were within a few yards of him) looked all one way, turned his head that way too: he seemed surprised; and, calling Lord Kilmarnock, pointed to the soldier. Lord Kilmarnock came down stairs immediately: when he got to the street the soldier was just opposite to the window where Charles stood. Kilmarnock came up to the fellow, struck his hat off his head, and set his foot on the black cockade. At that instant a Highlander came running from the other side of the street, laid hands on Lord Kilmarnock, and pushed him back. Kilmarnock pulled out a pistol, and presented it at the Highlander's head; the Highlander drew his dirk, and held it close to Kilmarnock's breast. In this posture they stood about half a minute, when a crowd of Highlanders rushed in and drove away Lord Kilmarnock. The man with the dirk in his hand took up the hat, put it upon the soldier's head, and the Highlanders marched off with him in triumph. This piece of dumb show, of which they understood nothing, perplexed the volunteers. They expressed their astonishment to a Highland officer who stood near them, and entreated him to explain the meaning of what they had seen. He told them that the soldier in the uniform of the Royals was a Cameron:—"Yesterday," said he, "when your army was defeated, he joined his clan; the Camerons received him with great joy, and told him that he should wear his arms, his clothes, and everything else, till he was provided with other clothes and other arms. The Highlander who first interposed, and drew his dirk on Lord Kilmarnock, is the soldier's brother; the crowd who rushed in are the Camerons, many of them his relations." "And in my opinion," continued the officer, "no colonel nor general in the prince's army can take that cockade out of his hat except Lochcil himself." One of the Macdonalds of Keppoch, while examining an English musket he had taken on the field of battle, let the piece go off, and unluckily killed Colonel Æneas Macdonald of the clan of Glengary, and second son of the chief, who was passing by. The Highland tribes had many eastern notions, and, like the Chinese, made no difference between intentional and accidental homicide; and the clan of Glengary made a wild "ululu," and demanded life for life. Charles did what he could to moderate this fury, and correct a barbarous but ancient custom: he attended the wake or funeral as chief mourner; but all was of no avail—the chief of the clan was obliged, by laws more potent than those in the Statute Book, to give up the owner of the musket, who was forthwith led out and shot by the Macdonalds of Glengary. Æneas, who is described by a brother officer as a brave and good-natured youth, was fully satisfied of the unhappy fellow's innocence, and had begged with his dying breath that he might not suffer. "But nothing," says the Highland officer, "could restrain the grief and fury of his people; and good luck it was that the man was a Macdonald, though not of his own tribe, but of Keppoch's." If the owner of the musket had not been a Macdonald his single life would not have satisfied the grief and fury of the Glengaries, who, after all, "began to desert daily upon this accident, which had a bad effect upon others also, and lessened the numbers of the army considerably."^{*}

After staying two days at Falkirk, Charles returned to Bannockburn, leaving Lord George Murray to observe the motions of the enemy, and cover the siege of Stirling Castle, which he was still resolved to prosecute. He employed a printing press, which had been brought from Glasgow, to print a quarto sheet with an exaggerated account of the battle of Falkirk. This was the last of his gazettes or proclamations. A few days after he attended a general review at Falkirk, "where the men made a good appearance, though far short of the numbers they were before the battle."[†] When

Lord George Drummond summoned Stirling Castle, and threatened terrible things in case the surrender were any longer delayed, old General Blakeney answered as before—that he had always been looked upon as a man of honour, and the rebels should find he would die so. Instead of destroying the old fortress, the besiegers seemed to run a chance of being destroyed by it: the Highlanders soon grew desperately weary of work for which they were unfit; and on the 24th of January, after suffering severely from the hot and exact fire of the castle, they refused to man their batteries or to go any more into the trenches; and the operations of the siege were then left to the piquets of the Irish brigade and Drummond's regiment from France, who had been better trained to such service. They succeeded in erecting two batteries—the one on Gawan-hill, within forty yards of the castle, and the other on Lady's-hill; and on the 28th they began to batter from these points with two eighteen pounders, two sixteens, and three twelves, continuing to fire all the while upon the castle with small arms, which did little or no mischief. But both their gunners and musketeers suffered severely at those close quarters; and what put the whole besieging force more and more out of humour with the siege was the great want of provisions, and a galling fire kept up by the Vulture sloop of war and by small craft filled with soldiers, which had ascended the Forth. They sent out parties in all directions to seize oatmeal and such other victuals as they could find in the country; but all kinds of provisions were scarce and concealed, or occasionally well defended by their sturdy owners; and not a few of these parties were cut off or sent back to Stirling without victuals, but with broken heads.

The tragi-comedy, however, was now drawing rapidly to its close: the curtain was about to fall on the bloody field of Culloden. On the 30th of January, the anniversary of the execution of Charles I., and three days after the erection of the batteries on Gawan-hill and Lady's-hill, the chevalier's unloving cousin, William Augustus Duke of Cumberland, arrived in the Scottish capital with full powers to finish the war in his own way. Upon receiving the news of the affair of Falkirk, Cumberland had "laid the blame of Hawley on want of discipline; and said, were he there, he would attack the rebels with the men that Hawley now had; and said soldiers must be told what they are to do, and then he believed they would do it."^{} As he was popular with the army, it was determined to entrust him with the sole and supreme command; though it should appear that this determination was not adopted without some jealousies and obstructions. The duke, on his part, slighted the loyal offers of the Lowland lords, and left Lord Marchmont at court, though he had particularly requested the honour of being allowed to accompany him. Cumberland was of very nearly the same age as the young Pretender, but, with his youth, he had none of Charles's personal graces and outward accomplishments, being fat and ill-favoured, with boisterous and uncouth manners. His temper also was hasty, harsh, and often tyrannical; and, like a thorough trooper, he was apt to despise all that was not military, and to be irritated at the nice restrictions of constitutional law. As he had undoubted bravery, some talent, and more energy and steadiness of purpose, it was unquestionably fortunate for England and the English constitution that an elder brother and that elder brother's son stood between Cumberland and the throne. One who knew him well, and was, on the whole, favourably disposed towards him, says—"His royal highness's judgment would be equal to his parts were it not too much guided by his passions, which are often violent and ungovernable. He has abilities to perform things which are difficult, but sometimes loves an impossibility. In his military capacity he appears greatly superior to any man in this country; and I have frequently wished that he had confined himself to that department, without entering into party disputes or interfering in the affairs of civil government, the first of which is below his dignity, and for the latter he is not qualified. His notions of honour and generosity are worthy of a prince. That he is ambitious is not to be doubted."[†]

The duke left London on the 27th, and, travelling post day and night, he arrived at Holyrood House on the 30th of January, many hours sooner than he was expected. He very judiciously stopped the hangman hand of his friend or protégé Hawley, who, having caught no rebels at Falkirk to execute, was decorating his gibbets at Edinburgh with some of his own soldiers who had behaved particularly ill in that battle,—as if hanging dragoons were the best mode of reviving their courage. The duke was received by the army with great surprise and joy: he took up his lodging in the same apartment, and slept even in the same bed, which had been so lately occupied by Charles. But the citizens of Edinburgh were considerably less pleased than the troops with his royal highness's arrival and conduct. When the magistrates represented that it was against the laws to bring troops into the city without their permission, he took no heed of their remonstrances, but made his guards ride in sword in hand; and he afterwards refused to see the magistrates at the palace. And he treated with little respect the citizens and lowland gentlemen

Papers.—It seems at least probable that the loss of the Highlanders in the affair of Falkirk was greater than was stated by either party. Duncan Forbes says he was told by a gentleman who was present in the action, that the loss of the Highlanders, at the lowest computation, was supposed to be 1000—that the gaps made in their lines were terrible.

that waited upon him, intimating that, if he did not suspect them all of Jacobitism, he had no great opinion of their zeal for the House of Hanover. The Scottish pride was sorely hurt; but the self-seeking, timeserving spirit of their thanes and men in office had in some degree merited the duke's coolness and suspicion.

On the 31st, the very day after his arrival, Cumberland put himself at the head of the army, to go in search of Charles. The men "banished all remembrances of the late untoward accident, and the troops showed uncommon ardour to be led (had as the weather was) into the field again."* They were formed and marched in two columns, consisting of fourteen battalions; and the Argyllshire men and Cobham's dragoons led the van. Instead of sending Hawley to London to be tried by a court-martial, as he most richly deserved, the duke kept him with him as one of his lieutenant-generals, the other lieutenant-general being William Earl of Albemarle. He quartered that night at Linlithgow with eight battalions; Brigadier Mordaunt was at Borrowstonness; the dragoons lay in adjacent villages; and Colonel Campbell, with his brave loyal Highland-men, took post in the front of the army. A considerable body of Charles's army, that was still lying in that town, now immediately retired from Falkirk towards the Torwood, giving out that they would await the English there, or repeat upon them at Bannockburn the chastisement which the great Bruce had given their ancestors at the same place. The next morning the duke continued his march, all his officers and soldiers showing the greatest alacrity; but before he reached Falkirk he was informed that Charles had no intention of meeting him at Bannockburn, the Torwood, or at any other place in the south; and that the Highlanders were actually repossessing the Forth with headlong speed. As the English troops marched on they saw the advanced guards retiring everywhere with the utmost precipitation; and presently they heard a most tremendous noise—two loud reports like the blowing up of powder-magazines. By this it was understood that the siege of Stirling Castle was raised, and that old Blakeney was safe. The duke forthwith detached Brigadier Mordaunt with the Cobham dragoons and the Argyllshire Highlanders to harass the retreating forces and to take possession of the town of Stirling. Mordaunt arrived at Stirling late in the evening, and found that, in blowing-up about 6000 pounds of gunpowder which they kept in the church of St. Ninians, about a mile distant, the hasty and unskilful Highlanders had killed several of the townspeople and several of their own men, had destroyed entirely the church and all the buildings near it, and broken the windows of all the houses in the place.

A great deal has been made of a memorial recommending retreat, and signed by most of the chiefs; but it is as clear as any fact in military history, that a retreat from Stirling was as imperative as it had been from Derby; and that if

Charles and his favourite counsellors, Secretary Murray, Sheridan, and O'Sullivan, the quarter-master-general,—since his return from England he had scarcely deigned to consult with any others,—really proposed staying and prosecuting their miserably-conducted siege of Stirling Castle, they must have been far gone in fatuity. But we can scarcely credit that any four men could be so woefully blind as not to see the facts set down in the memorial or address of the chiefs which was presented to the young Pretender on the 29th of January, one day before Cumberland got even to Edinburgh, and when the Highlanders scarcely knew that he was coming, and which was signed by Lord George Murray, by the gentle Lochiel, by the impetuous Keppoch, by the brave Clauronald, and by four other chiefs, including Simon Fraser, master of Lovat. "We think it our duty," said these chiefs, "in this critical juncture, to lay our opinions in the most respectful manner before your royal highness. We are certain that a vast number of the soldiers of your royal highness's army are gone home since the battle of Falkirk; and notwithstanding all the endeavours of the commanders of the different corps, they find that this evil is increasing hourly, and not in their power to prevent; and, as we are afraid Stirling Castle cannot be taken so soon as was expected, if the enemy should march before it fall into your royal highness's hands, we can foresee nothing but utter destruction to the few that will remain, considering the inequality of our numbers to that of the enemy. For these reasons we are humbly of opinion that there is no way to extricate your royal highness, and those who remain with you, out of the most imminent danger, but by retiring immediately to the Highlands, where we can be usefully employed the remainder of the winter by taking and mastering the forts of the north; and we are morally sure we can keep as many men together as will answer that end, and hinder the enemy from following us in the mountains at this season of the year; and in spring we doubt not but an army of 10,000 effective Highlanders can be brought together, to follow your royal highness wherever you think proper. This will certainly disconcert your enemies, and cannot but be approved by your royal highness's friends both at home and abroad. If a landing should happen in the mean time, the Highlanders would immediately rise, either to join them or to make a powerful diversion elsewhere. The hard marches which your army has undergone, the winter season, and now the inclemency of the weather, cannot fail of making this measure approved of by your royal highness's allies abroad, as well as your faithful adherents at home. The greatest difficulty that occurs to us is the saving of the artillery, particularly the heavy cannon; but better some of these were thrown into the river Forth,* as that your royal highness, besides the danger of your own person, should risk the flower of your army, which we apprehend must inevitably be the case if this retreat be not agreed to and gone about without the loss of one moment; and we think that it would be the greatest imprudence to risk the whole on so unequal a chance when there are such hopes of succour from abroad, besides the resources your royal highness will have from your faithful and dutiful followers at home. It is but just now we are apprised of the numbers of our own people that are gone off, besides the many sick that are in no condition to fight. And we offer this our opinion with the more freedom, that we are persuaded that your royal highness can never doubt of the uprightness of our intentions.*

There was nothing to answer to this reasoning—the going off of the Highlanders must have been as well known to Charles and his quarter-master-general, as to Lord George Murray or the devoted Lochiel, or to any of the chiefs that signed the paper: it was not a thing to be either concealed or invented—if there had been any attempt either to conceal the fact or to exaggerate the numbers of the deserters, a military eye would have detected it at a glance. There is, however, a story told by one that was about Charles's person, and resolutely determined to attribute every failure to treacherous or bad advice, and since repeated by others that seem equally determined to make the chevalier a Paladin, a real hero of chivalry—a hero even at the expense of his sanity;—and, according to this incredible tale, he, if left to his own devices, would not have retreated at all, would not have raised the siege of Stirling, but would have waited, with his army as it was, for Cumberland, in the confident hope of rivalling at Bamockburn the fame of his remote ancestor the immortal Bruce. The story is soon told in its author's own words.—“Before the retreat from Stirling a plan of battle was drawn up by Lord George Murray, and shown to Charles, who approved the plan, and corrected it with his own hand. That night Charles was unusually gay, held a council of war at Falkirk, where he was quartered, and early in the morning his aide-de-camp came to Charles's quarters with a parcel for him from Lord George. Charles was a-bed, and Mr. Hay would not allow him to be called for some time. When he got up Hay went into the room with this dispatch. Charles opened it, and found a paper signed by Lord George Murray and many of the chiefs, advising a retreat to the north as absolutely necessary; for many of the men, they alleged, were gone home, particularly the men of Glengary's regiment. When Charles read this paper, he struck his head against the wall till he staggered, and exclaimed most violently against Lord George Murray. His words were, Good God! have I lived to see this? He sent Sir Thomas Sheridan to Falkirk to signify his opinion to the chiefs against a retreat. Sheridan returned with Keppoch and several other chiefs, who were of Lord George's opinion, and argued for a retreat.*

After crossing the Forth at the ford of Frew, the Highlanders made a flight rather than a retreat; but such as kept together and obeyed orders went by Dumblane to Crieff, where a council was held. According to the Highland officer they then divided and marched in two separate corps; Charles himself with the clans, going by Tay bridge, the high road to the Highlands, and the horse and the low-countrymen going by Perth and the coast side to Aberdeen, it being agreed that they should meet again to the north of Inverness. This separation, he adds, was necessary for the easier march and better subsistence of the army.

Cumberland, who entered Stirling with the main body of his army at about one in the afternoon on the 2nd of February, or many hours after the last of the Highlanders had wetted their trows and their active limbs in the Forth at Frew, did not attempt a vain pursuit. He paid a fitting compliment to General Blakeney; he gave directions for repairing Stirling-bridge, one of the arches of which had been blown up some time before by the garrison of the castle. While this work was performing a whole company of the Irish brigade, that had deserted from Lord John Drummond, came to Stirling and delivered themselves up; and a considerable number of the rebels, who had hid themselves in holes and corners, were brought prisoners to head quarters. Even Mistress Jenny Cameron who had repaired to the Jacobite standard shortly after it was raised, riding on a bay gelding with cap and scarlet feather, and with a naked sword in her hand, and who, according to the

* The eight chiefs added.—“No body is privy to this address to your royal highness except your subscribers; and we beg leave to assure your royal highness that it is with great concern and reluctance we find ourselves obliged to declare our sentiments in so dangerous a situation, which nothing could have prevailed with us to have done but the unhappy going off of so many men.”—Address from the Chiefs to Charles, in Home's Appendix. The writer of the “Account of the Young Pretender's Operations,” in the Appendix to the Lockhart Papers, says, most distinctly, that the rebel army was so reduced as to make it impossible to stay. “Next morning (i.e. after the affair of Falkirk Muir) an inquiry was made into the force in the town (Falkirk), and it was found that there were not 500 men, the rest having gone either from the field of battle the night before or early that morning to Stirling (where the Duke of Perth had been left to keep the garrison of the castle from sallying out to carry off the cannon and destroying the works) and other places, where officers were sent after them to endeavour to stop them, and if possible to prevail with them to stay. When they entered Scotland from England they began to desert, and, in order to prevent that, they were promised leave to go home to see their friends as they came near their own countries. Till they saw what would be the consequence of the battle they were prevailed upon to stay for some days, but were always going off.” The Highland officer who kept the journal, says, with equal distinctness, that the men had been deserting daily, “so that when the Duke of Cumberland was ordered down to Scotland with a reinforcement of two regiments of foot and two of dragoons, it was judged expedient by the prince and a council of war to retake the Forth. Colonel O'Sullivan having wrote to Lord John Drummond to leave the siege of Stirling, and join us in the retreat, we accordingly passed the Forth at the Frew.” Neither of these writers makes any mention of the strong reluctance of Charles to the retreat. That story seems to rest solely on the testimony of John Hay, a man too enthusiastic to make use of his senses, and who had pretended that even the retreat from Derby was necessarily forced upon the chevalier.

* Account of the retreat from Stirling by John Hay, in Home's Appendix. Hay adds that it was afterwards found that the number of men said to be absent was greatly exaggerated; but this exaggeration—at least to any extent—must, as we have already said, have been open to detection at the instant.

scandalous chronicle of the Whigs, had been to Charles what my Lady Yarmouth was to George II., was left behind in the retreat, made prisoner, and sent to Edinburgh Castle. The repairs of Stirling bridge were finished by the 4th of February, and at six o'clock in the morning Cumberland and his army crossed the Forth. The advanced guard, consisting of the Argyllshire men and the dragoons, marched that day as far as Crieff; but the Duke and the main body of the infantry halted in and about Dumblane, and passed the night there. On the following day the advanced guard took quiet possession of Perth, being welcomed as deliverers by the large majority of the townspeople.* Lord John Drummond, who headed one of Charles's divisions, had evacuated the place on the 3rd of February, leaving behind him thirteen pieces of iron cannon, all spiked, and fourteen swivel guns which had been taken out of the Hazard sloop of war,† which, together with a considerable quantity of ammunition, he threw into the river Tay. There were also found several works which had been thrown up by Lord Strathallan for the defence of the place. The swivel guns were easily discovered and fished up. On the 6th the Duke of Cumberland, with the main body, reached Perth, where he remained several days.

While he was thus advancing in Scotland against the rebels there happened a ministerial revolution at London. The Duke of Newcastle and his more important brother, Mr. Pelham, who was prime minister, had both pledged themselves to Pitt to get him into office as secretary-at-war, and, urged by the hot impatience of that able and aspiring man, and suspecting that the king, who had never withdrawn his confidence from Lord Granville (Carteret), was intending to place that ex-minister at the head of affairs, they demanded in a peremptory manner an office for Pitt. On the 6th of February Lord Bath (Pulteney) announced that the king would not employ Mr. Pitt as secretary-at-war—that he, himself, had advised his majesty to negative that appointment, and that if Mr. Pitt was forced into that office his majesty was fully resolved never to transact business with him or admit him to his presence. "The ministry," says Horace Walpole, "then gave up that point; but, finding that a change had been made in a scheme of foreign politics which they had laid before the king, and for which he had thanked them; and perceiving some symptoms of a resolution to dismiss them at the end of the session, they came to a sudden determination not to do Lord Granville's business by carrying the supplies, and then to be turned out: so on Monday morning, to the astonishment of every body, the two secretaries of state* threw up the seals, and the next day Mr. Pelham, with the rest of the treasury, the Duke of Bedford with the admiralty, Lord Gower, privy seal, and Lord Pembroke, groom of the stole, gave up too: the Dukes of Devonshire, Grafton, and Richmond, the Lord Chancellor, Winnington, paymaster, and almost all the other great officers and offices, declaring they would do the same. Lord Granville immediately received both seals, one for himself and the other to give to whom he pleased. Lord Bath was named first commissioner of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer; Lord Carlisle privy seal; and Lord Winchelsea re-instated in the admiralty. Thus far all went swimmingly; they had only forgot one little point, which was, to secure a majority in both Houses. In the Commons they unluckily found that they had no better man to take the lead than poor Sir John Rushout, for Sir John Barnard refused to be chancellor of the exchequer; so did Lord Chief Justice Willes to be lord chancellor; and the wildness of the scheme soon prevented others, who did not wish ill to Lord Granville, or well to the Pelhams, from giving in to it."† While this sudden and mad Granville ministry found that there was no chance of obtaining a majority in either House, and that courtiers and placemen were running a race to resign their white staves and golden keys, Hoppe, the Dutch ambassador, made matters worse by declaring that the States General, which could have no confidence in such a cabinet, would be almost sure to accept terms offered by France, and leave England to manage the war without their alliance. Lord Bath, whose ambition and avarice were now counted equally great, had not courage to undertake the treasury, and on Wednesday morning he went to the king and told him he had tried the House of Commons and found it would not do. "The poor king," adds Walpole, "who, from being fatigued with the Duke of Newcastle, and sick of Pelham's timidity and compromises, had given in to this mad hurly-burly of alterations, was confounded with having floundered to no purpose, and to find himself more than ever in the power of men he hated, shut himself up in his closet, and refused to admit any more of the persons who were pouring in upon him with white sticks and golden keys, commissions, &c. At last he sent for Winnington, and told him he was the only honest man about him, and he should have the honour of the reconciliation, and sent him to Mr. Pelham to desire they would all return to their employments.

* "It is here to be observed," writes Volunteer Ray, whose facts are generally more correct than his rhetorical figures, "and I believe not history can show a more illustrious instance of the effects of a general's reputation, that, in the space of one single week, his royal highness quitted the court of the king his father, put himself at the head of his troops in Scotland, and saw the enemy flying with precipitation before him; so that it may be said, that his progress was like lightning,—the rebels fled at the flash, fearing the thunder that was to follow."

† The Hazard sloop had been surprised and captured by the Highlanders at Montrose in the preceding month of November.

* The Duke of Newcastle and Lord Harrington.—Newcastle, as usual with him, hung back at the critical moment: Harrington, who was ever afterwards hated by George, threw up the seals first, on Monday morning the 10th of February, and Newcastle, half reluctantly, followed his example in the evening of the same day. Neither of these men nor any of the rest—whether their friends or their opponents—could have cared very much about the dangerous state of their country, threatened with invasion from abroad and with a civil war still raging at home! Their objects were all personal—to keep or to gain power and its profits, to help themselves, their brothers, and cousins, and to circumvent their rivals.

† Letter to Horace Mann.

Lord Granville is as jolly as ever; laughs and drinks, and owns it was mad, and owns he would do it again to-morrow."

But the Pelhams and their adherents, who had great advantages to secure to themselves from the great move he had made, would not return to their posts without driving a hard bargain with their perplexed and bewildered master. They demanded that Lord Bath should be removed from the cabinet, and that his few dependents who had places should be deprived of them; that Lord Barrington and Mr. Legge should both have seats at the board of admiralty; that Mr. James Grenville should have a seat at the board of trade, and that Mr. Pitt should be in the war office; and George, however unwilling, was obliged to accede to these demands—but mitigated in one essential; for, as he passionately declared that he would risk everything rather than make Pitt secretary-at-war, they agreed that, for the present, the terrible orator should be only joint vice-treasurer of Ireland; and he who had so often proclaimed that he would never accept anything less than the war secretaryship was fain to rest satisfied with this lucrative office. The Irish vice-treasurership was little more than a sinecure; and, if there had been much work attached to it, Pitt was incompetent to the performance of such duties; for, with all his genius and abilities, he was not, and he never became, a man of business. He seemed to have been born solely to make splendid speeches and to overthrow by oratory—which, by itself, can never make a government—an infinite variety and long succession of administrations. Such as it was, this Irish office had an immediate and wonderful effect on the patriot: his old themes for declamation were dropped; Hanover and Hanoverian interests ceased to be his bugbears, subsidies to foreign powers were no longer his abominations; and, in a brief space of time from his swallowing the well gilded pill* of the Irish vice-treasurership, he spoke and voted for the grants of 400,000*l.* to the Queen of Hungary, 300,000*l.* to the King of Sardinia, and 310,000*l.* for 18,000 Hanoverian troops!

The Duke of Cumberland, who was advised by letter of the sudden breaking up of the Pelham administration, and who could scarcely imagine that the Granville ministry was to last only forty-eight hours, wrote to the king, his father, to express his deep concern at proceedings which, in his eyes, seemed to threaten the dissolution of the Whig interest that had placed and maintained his family on the throne. But his anxieties were soon removed, for he received the news of the restoration of the Pelhams, while he lay with his army at Perth—and then, without fear for the Whigs in England, he prepared to crush the Ultra-Tories or Jacobites in Scotland. He detached 500 foot and some Whig Highlanders to Dunkeld, under the command of Sir Andrew Agnew; sent forward

Colonel Leighton with a similar detachment to Castle Menzies, and then continued his own march, with the main body, to Aberdeen, where he arrived on the 26th of February. Scarcely a Highlander with the white cockade was seen anywhere; the rebel army seemed to have vanished into thin air; but here and there the Duke's exploring parties discovered and made prize of muskets, bayonets, ball and gunpowder, hid among the mountain-heather or buried in the snow-heaps. It began to be generally believed, not only in London, but at Edinburgh and Aberdeen, that the war was over, that the young Pretender had fled back to France, and that the clans would not again attempt to make head anywhere. Nevertheless considerable reinforcements—including the 6000 Hessians—continued to be sent to Perth, or still farther to the north, to join the Duke. Meanwhile Charles had reached Inverness, which was in no disposition to bid him welcome. Lord Loudon lay there with a little army steady to King George, and protected from attack by a ditch and a palisade. The Chevalier therefore turned aside to Moy Castle, ten miles from the town of Inverness, and, while there with only a few of his followers, Loudon almost succeeded in making him prisoner by a night attack. Yet, a day or two after this attempt, the Highlanders gathered in such numbers round him at Moy Castle that Charles felt himself strong enough to attack Loudon at Inverness; and on the 18th of February his lordship found it expedient to withdraw his men and to cross the ferry of Kessock into Ross-shire. The Lord President, Duncan Forbes, who had remained at his chosen post at Inverness, doing everything that man could do for a blundering and an ungrateful government, accompanied Loudon in this retreat, and shared in his subsequent hardships and dangers. It is impossible to read without astonishment and indignation this true patriot's account of his own doings, and the no-doings or misdoings of the government. He and Loudon had exhausted both their purse and their credit, yet still the mercenary statesmen of the day, that could give, and were giving, away thousands to stop the tongues of their opponents in parliament, would, for a long time, send neither money nor arms to Inverness! "What distressed us most," said Forbes, "and was the real cause why the rebels ever came to a head after their flight from Stirling, was the want of arms and money, which, God knows, had been long enough called for and expected: had these come in due time, we could have armed a force sufficient to have prevented their looking at us on this side Drummachter."¹⁸

Upon Loudon's retreat into Ross-shire, the Chevalier entered the town of Inverness; and from that day, as Home observes, the war assumed a new form. Siege was laid to Fort George, which surrendered in two or three days; and from this exploit, which put them in possession of sixteen pieces of artillery and a considerable stock of provisions and ammunition, the Highlanders marched away thirty-two miles from Inverness, and laid siege to Fort Augustus, battering its walls with the heavy guns they had just taken at Fort George. In a very few days the flag of the Stuart floated over Fort Augustus. Lochell and General Stapleton were then sent, with the Camerons, the Macdonalds of Keppoch, the Stuarts of Appin, and 300 of the French-Irish piquets, towards the western end of the chain of forts, to lay siege to Fort William. But this enterprise was not destined to be so successful: the way was long, the roads and mountain-paths were steep and terrible; the heavy guns had, in many places, to be drawn by the men; and it was the 20th of March ere Stapleton and Lochell could get them placed in battery before the fort. But, in the mean time, while snow and ice impeded Cumberland's advance, and the cutting, cruel March winds, doubly cruel on that north-eastern coast, blew life and spirit out of the English troops (accustomed to the old routine of winter-quarters), the hardier Highlanders, indifferent to the inclemencies of the season, carried on a series of attacks and expeditions. The clans of Mackinnon and Macgregor, the Borisdale men, and some others, under the command of Lord Cromartie, burst into Ross-shire to dislodge Lord Loudon, and, as this force was not found sufficient, as Loudon's and Duncan Forbes's independent companies stood their ground against it, Lord George Murray followed and joined Cromartie with the Macdonalds of Clanronald and other clans. Loudon and the Lord President were then compelled to retreat across the Dornoch Frith into Sutherland. Leaving the Duke of Perth to look after Loudon, Lord George Murray flew back to Inverness, and from Inverness to the mountains of Badenoch, where they overlook Atholl and the lowlands of Aberdeen. On those rugged, snow-covered heights he was joined by Macpherson of Cluny, with 300 Macphersons, who knew all the sly passes and every bit of the country before them, and who brought news that several detachments of Argyllshire men, and some advanced posts of Cumberland's regulars, had come forward from Aberdeen into Atholl, and were now cantoned in farm-houses and inns considerably apart from each other. It was presently resolved by Lord George and by Cluny, who had already taken care to guard the passes, and so prevent any warning being carried from Badenoch to Atholl, to surprise these scattered corps, and cut them off by a simultaneous attack at all points. This was precisely the service for which the Highlanders were best fitted. On the approach of evening 700 men, of different clans, were set in motion from Dalwhinnie; at Drumuachter, or Drumochter, they were separated into many parties, and so they proceeded, under cover of night and in perfect silence,—their habitual activity, vigilance, and caution increased by a promise made by Lord George Murray to give a guinea to every man that should surprise a sentinel at his post. They succeeded in nearly every attack; killed a few, and at the appointed time rejoined Lord George at the bridge of Bruer with some scores of prisoners.* The castle of Blair, where Sir Andrew Agnew was now quartered with a considerable number of officers, was only two miles from the bridge of Bruer. As soon as the Highlanders had come in to the rendezvous, he marched to attack the castle, but the shot of his two small field-pieces made no impression upon walls seven feet thick; and he converted his siege into a blockade, believing that the place was badly victualled, and that hunger would soon open the gates. But Sir Andrew Agnew and his friends preferred eating horse-flesh to surrendering; and, though the blockade lasted eighteen or twenty days, it failed completely. The Duke of Perth had better success with Lord Loudon, who, after losing some men, was again compelled to shift his quarters. Loudon, with about 800 men, and Duncan Forbes, and Macleod of Macleod, quitted the main-land, and went over to the Isle of Skye: the rest of his independent companies dispersed in different directions.

But, though the rebel clans had been thus allowed to make head, the king's troops were gradually closing upon them, and shutting them up within their hungry mountains, while the king's ships were intercepting the inadequate supplies sent from France. "The French," says Horace Walpole, "continue to drop a ship or two: we have taken two, with the Duke of Berwick's brother on board: it seems evident that they design to keep up our disturbances as long as possible, to prevent our sending any troops to Flanders." The Hazard sloop, a fast sailing vessel, which, as mentioned above, had been captured by the Highlanders, and sent once or twice to France, re-appeared at this critical juncture, having on board a considerable sum of money for Charles's use, and

* "About break of day, before any of the parties had joined Lord George at the place of rendezvous, or any account had been received of their success, a common fellow, from the town of Blair, came to the bridge of Bruer and informed Lord George Murray that Sir Andrew Agnew had got his men under arms, and was coming to see who they were that attacked his posts. When Lord George and Cluny received this notice they had with them only twenty-five private men and some elderly gentlemen. They consulted together what should be done. Some advised that, without loss of time, they should make the best of their way back to Drumochter; others were of opinion that it would be better to mount the hills that were nearest, and make their retreat by roads where they could not easily be followed. Lord George differed from everybody who had given his opinion. 'If I quit my post,' said he, 'all the parties I have sent out, as they come in, will fall into the hands of the enemy.' It was daylight, but the sun was not up. Lord George, looking earnestly about him, observed a feal dyke (that is, a wall of sod or turf) which had been begun as a fence for cattle, and left unfinished: it was of considerable length, and cut in two a field that was near the bridge. He ordered his men to follow him, and drew them up behind the dyke at such a distance one from another that they might make a great show, having the colours of both regiments flying in their front. He then gave orders to the pipers (for he had with him all the pipers both of the Atholl-men and the Macphersons) to keep their eyes fixed upon the road from Blair, and the moment they saw the soldiers appear to strike up all their bagpipes at once. It happened that the regiment came in sight just as the sun rose, and that instant the pipers began to play one of their most noisy pibrochs. Lord George Murray and his Highlanders, both officers and men, drew their swords and brandished them about their heads. Sir Andrew, after gazing awhile at this spectacle, ordered his men to the right about and marched them back to the castle of Blair. Lord George Murray kept his post at the bridge till several of his parties came in.—Home.

120 men and 20 officers, mostly Irish, in the service of Spain. An English cruiser caught sight of her on the 25th of March, and, after a long chase, drove her ashore on the coast of Sutherland, where some of Loudon's companies and some of the Mackays, raised and regimented by Lord Rêay, took both the men and the money. The chevalier was again reduced almost to his last Louis-d'or, and compelled to pay his troops in oatmeal or barley-meal. "This loss at this critical time," says the Highland officer, "contributed much to all our future misfortunes, we being at this time in great want of pay, which we had got very regularly before. Our men now got no pay in money, but meal only, which the men being obliged to sell out and convert into money, it went but a short way for their other needs, at which the poor creatures grumbled exceedingly, and were suspicious that we, the officers, had detained it from them." But the officers were, in reality, as poor as the men, and reduced to subsist on whatever coarse food they could beg, borrow, or steal. The Frenchmen and all the adventurers that had come from France and Spain were worn out and utterly disheartened. As their lives were safe, they would generally have preferred a surrender to a continuance of such a war in such a country; and even under more favourable circumstances the life and manners of the Highlanders were exceedingly distasteful to them. As the cold winds of March had dried the ground and rendered the rivers fordable, and as the weather became milder, the army of King George began to draw still more closely round the Highlanders; and they effectually closed the passes into the low country, where alone provisions and money could be obtained. General Bland lay at Strathogie, Mordaunt at Old Meldrum, and the Duke of Cumberland at Aberdeen, with strong advanced posts in various directions. As it was believed his royal highness would march very soon to attack Charles in his head-quarters at Inverness, all the detached corps of the Highlanders were called in and united on that point. Lord George Murray was thus compelled to give up his blockade of Blair Castle, and Lochail and Stapleton their siege of Fort William. Lord George carried his two light pieces back with him, but Stapleton found it necessary to spike his heavy guns. Cumberland had got up to Perth the 6000 Hessians, who, however, according to his own account, behaved sadly.* Overwhelming as was his force, the duke resolved to proceed with extreme caution. He waited till the southerly wind brought up to Aberdeen a fleet of transports with Bligh's regiment, firing, and provision. Then, upon the report of two officers that the river Spey was fordable, he put his troops in motion on the 7th of April; and on the next day he himself marched from Aberdeen with six battalions of foot and Lord Mark Kerr's dragoons. He kept to the sea-coast road, having his right flanked by the English fleet. "It being fine weather," says Ray, "our transports moved with us close along shore, with a gentle breeze and a fair wind." The first night Cumberland quartered at Old Meldrum, and the next evening he got to Banff, where he gave the army a day's rest, and hanged two Highland prisoners. "Here," says Ray, "two rebel spies were taken; the one was notching on a stick the number of our forces, for which he was hanged on a tree in the town; and the other a little out of town; and, for want of a tree, was hanged on what they call the ridging-tree of a house, that projected out from the end, and on his breast was fixed, in writing,—A rebel spy." Every day summary executions of this kind took place; so that Cumberland's line of march and his halting places were to be traced by gibbets. His troops also set fire to the chapels of the episcopalian Scots, who had always given unequivocal proofs of Jacobitism. From Banff Cumberland proceeded to Cullen, and from Cullen to Fochabers, on the right bank of the Spey, seldom losing sight of the men-of-war and transports. On approaching the Spey he saw the shipping discharging some shot at a party of rebel hussars beyond the river, and discovered on the left bank of the Spey a considerable body of Charles's army, with his white flags displayed. This division was under the command of Lord John Drummond, and consisted in good part of the men he had brought over with him from France. Lord John had raised a battery to sweep the ford, and he stationed some of his best marksmen along the bank, who fired across the river, "kneeling and taking sight as at a blackbird."* But neither his battery nor his men could stand against the numerous and well-appointed artillery of the duke; and, after setting fire to his barracks and huts, Lord John Drummond retreated and left his enemies to pass at a narrow and slippery ford—which they did with no greater loss than that of a dragoon and a woman, who fell from her horse and was swept down the rapid river and drowned. On Sunday, the 13th of April, the English and their allies advanced on the left bank of the Spey to the Muir of Alves, and encamped near the parish church. "About this time," says Ray, "a great many of the rebels deserted and came to his royal highness with their arms." On Monday, the 14th, the army moved on to Nairn, about seventeen miles from Alves, the van being led by part of the Argyllshire men, some companies of grenadiers, and Kingston's lighthouse. On coming up to the bridge of Nairn, this van found that Lord George Drummond's rear had not left the town, and there was a short skirmish with muskets on the bridge between Drummond's Irish piquets and the English grenadiers. When Lord John Drummond's men quitted the town of Nairn their retreat was covered by two troops of horse, and they ran as fast as their legs could carry them to a place called the Loch of the Clans, some five or six miles beyond Nairn. At that point the young Pretender very unexpectedly came up in person from Inverness with the clan Macintosh and some of his guards; and then the English pursuers, seeing themselves out-numbered, fled in their turn, and hardly stopped till they rejoined the main body of the army, which was now encamped on a plain to the west of the town of Nairn. That night Charles took up his lodging in Culloden House, the seat of Duncan Forbes, his troops lying out upon the moor, where the heather served both for bedding and fuel, the cold being very severe.* Early on the following morning, the 15th of April, the Highlanders rose from their rough bed, and, expecting an attack, they formed in order of battle upon Drummoisie Muir, a part of the Culloden plain, and about a mile and a half to the south-east of Culloden House. The gentle Lochiel, with the bold Camerons, had joined in the course of the preceding night; but Cluny, with the Macphersons, was still away in Badenoch; Lord Cromartie, with about 700 men, and also Mackinnon, Glengyle, and Borisdale, with their clans, were still in Sutherland, where Duncan Forbes and Loudon had made work for them; and the Master of Lovat, with the Frasers, had gone up to his father's country. Yet, it is said, notwithstanding all these deficiencies it was resolved by, or for, the Highlanders, that they should stand their ground, and seek rather than avoid an action. They kept looking across the moor in the expectation of seeing Cumberland's columns; but, when mid-day came and not a red coat was seen, Lord Elcho was detached with his troops of horse to reconnoitre. His lordship soon returned with intelligence that the English were halting at Nairn, and that, as it was the Duke of Cumberland's birthday, the troops were keeping a feast and a holiday, drinking, and singing, and showing no intention of moving forward. The generality of accounts state the fact differently; but we believe that it was Elcho's intelligence which really induced the Highlanders to stay where they were, instead of falling back upon Inverness to strengthen themselves with the junction of Lord Cromartie, Mackinnon, Cluny, Fraser, and the rest; we believe that they were completely fascinated by the prospect of making a night surprise and attack upon a drunken camp"—that, when this surprise failed, as it did, they stood and fought without their clans in the rear, because they could not avoid a battle, because the men worn out with a long night march and counter march were too tired to run, and because a retreat, with the English now close at their heels, must have been more dangerous and bloody than even an unequal action. It is recorded that upon Lord Elcho's report a council of war was assembled; that there Charles made a speech, and proposed a march with all the forces he had with him, and to make a night attack; that the Duke of Perth and Lord John Drummond expressed their dislike of the project; that Lochell, a man of few words, said it would be better to wait till the morrow, when their army would be stronger by at least 1500 men; that Lord George Murray insisted and enlarged upon the advantages of a night attack, which would render artillery and cavalry—in which the superiority of Cumberland's army chiefly consisted—of little service; and that it was finally agreed to make the attempt, as the best thing that could be done in their present circumstances, as they were almost entirely destitute both of money and provisions.* It is said, indeed, that on that day the poor Highlanders got no other food than a single biscuit a man.† To quiet their murmurs they had been promised payment of all their arrears two days before a battle; and now that they were drawn up in battle array there was not a farthing to give them. "This," says the Highland Officer, "made the fellows refractory and more negligent of their duty." When the council of war rose and the officers and chiefs returned to their regiments and clans, they found that many of their men had gone off to Inverness in order to get something to eat. These poor famishing fellows were followed along the road and intreated to return; but they told their officers that they might shoot them if they pleased, but that they would not go back till they had got some food. By this time it was between six and seven o'clock, and the army was appointed to march at eight. Many were of opinion that the hunger defection ought to put an end to the design; but Charles, it appears, thought otherwise, and ordered Lord George Murray to put himself at the head of the men that remained and march upon Nairn with all the speed possible. "Accordingly," says one of the actors, "we set out about eight o'clock that night, with express orders to observe the profoundest silence in our march. Our word was, 'King James the Eighth.' We were likewise forbid in the attack to make any use of our fire arms, but only of sword, dirk, and bayonet, to cut the tent strings and pull down the poles, and where we observed a swelling or bulge in the fallen tents there we were to strike and push vigorously."‡ The river Nairn passes within half a mile of Drummosie muir, where the Highlanders had been spending the day, and runs from that point directly east to the town of Nairn, which stands upon the north bank of the river. The distance from the muir to the town was about twelve miles by the regular road; but considerably farther by the route which part of the Highland army were instructed to take—for Lord George Murray intended to divide his troops at Kilravock and to cross the river with the van some two or three miles above Nairn, in order to attack Cumberland both in flank and rear as well as in front. The whole army marched from Culloiden in a long irregular line, with an interval in the middle, as if there had been two columns, one following the other. Lord George Murray was in the front with the Atholl brigade; Charles and the Duke of Perth were in the interval in the middle, and Lord John Drummond was in the rear. The night was very dark, yet, to avoid some houses on the highway, they quitted the road, and struck aside through some very wet and heavy ground, which retarded their march, and caused the men, hungry and in a bad humour when they started, to murmur and to curse and swear. Those in the rear moved so slowly that they were left far behind. An officer forced his way to the front and ordered the van to halt; but the van would not halt, and the rear was left more and more behind. Other orders were sent to the front, and then Lord George Murray made his men go somewhat slower; but, as the rear moved slower still, they continued to lose ground. Lord George afterwards said himself he was positive he was stopped by aides-de-camp and other officers fifty times before he had marched six miles. It was now two o'clock in the morning. By this time most of the officers of distinction had got to the van, and, for the first time, there was a general and regular halt. It is said that Lord John Drummond, who had repeatedly whispered to Lord George Murray before, now said aloud to his lordship—"Why will you go on? there is a gap in the line half a mile long; the men won't come up,"—and that then Lord George for the first time ordered the halt. They had calculated upon being at Nairn by two o'clock, but even in a straight line that town was still some three or four miles off, and the rear was still far behind, and without any alacrity or spirit. "Several of the officers," says Lord George Murray, "that came from the rear, assured us that many of the men had left the ranks and had laid down, particularly in the wood of Kilravock. This must have been occasioned by faintness for want of food, for it could not be weariness in a six miles' march. . . . What I am persuaded is, that, if all the line had marched as quickly as the four or five first regiments, they might all have been at or near Nairn by two in the morning; but even the van, as the thing happened, was four full miles from Nairn at two in the morning. . . . At the halt all the principal officers who were come to the van agreed that the thing was now impossible. A surprise was designed, but now it was palpable they could not, even by a quick march, advance two miles before day-break, so that they must be for two miles in the enemies' sight before they could come at them: add to this that the officers were also convinced that they had not half of the men that had been drawn up the day before." * Lord George, on whose honour and veracity we are disposed to rely, says that Charles never came up to the front, but sent O'Sullivan with a message, importing that his royal highness would be very glad to have the attack made, but that Lord George was the best judge whether it could be made in time or not. Charles, on the other hand, afterwards said that upon the army's halting he rode up to the front to inquire the reason, and was there and then convinced by Lord George Murray of the unavoidable necessity of retreating. † Great pains have been taken to prove that the Chevalier was determined to make the attack, or, in other words, to prove that he was mad; and that Lord George Murray, in defiance of his authority, insisted upon returning. It is scarcely worth examining whether the young Pretender wanted to make a night attack, with such a force, in broad daylight or not. According to Murray, every officer present declared against such an insane step; and only Mr. Hepburn of Keith, the gentleman volunteer, who had conducted Charles into Holyrood House, was of opinion that the attack might be made, arguing that though it were daylight the red coats would be drunk with solemnising the Duke of Cumberland's birth-day. Lord George says distinctly that there was not one officer present but agreed that the best thing to do was to get back to Culloden as fast as possible, in order that the tired men might have some hours' refreshment; and, repeating the assertion that Charles was not come up to the front, he adds that he was actually a mile behind, so that it would have wasted a considerable time to send backward and forward to him for orders. "I am certain," says his lordship, "as things were situated, had we advanced from Kilarvock to Nairn, it would have been near five before we could have reached it, and made the dispositions that it would have been requisite to have made in our army before we attacked the enemy. No person who knows the truth can find fault with this retreat. Our design was a surprise and an attack before break of day. I never yet heard of one man who thought it was to have been done in another way. We had not half of our men; and it was found impossible to make the attack in the time proposed." Home, who seems to rely on some tradition (and he does not here furnish any documentary evidence), says that several of the officers advised a retreat, as daylight was so near; that others declared themselves for marching forward, and that Mr. Hepburn, in particular, urged Lord George to order the men to march on as fast as they could. "While Mr. Hepburn was speaking a drum beat. Don't you hear?" said Lord George. The enemy are alarmed; we can't surprise them. I never expected, said Mr. Hepburn, to find them asleep; but it is much better to march on and attack them than to retreat, for they will most certainly follow and oblige us to fight when we shall be in a much worse condition than we are now." * But though Hepburn was a brave man he was no general, and, if he really said these words, it is nevertheless certain that the whole hope of the Highlanders lay in taking the English army by surprise, and finding them, if not all dead asleep in their tents, stupified with drink. It is said moreover by Home himself—and the fact is exceedingly probable—that the Duke of Cumberland had certain information of this night march towards Nairn, from several people in his pay who spoke the Highland language, wore the Highland dress, mixed with the rebels as they marched, and stole away from them at different times—a thing easy to do in the darkness, and when so many were lying down from exhaustion in the wood or lagging behind. Volunteer Ray, who was in Nairn at the time, says simply—"The rebels expecting to find us merry marched to attack us in our camp; but, not arriving in due time, and our men being got under arms, they returned without making us a visit." All accounts agree that the Highland army hurried back whence it had come, and that most of them were at or near Culloden by five in the morning. But the Duke of Cumberland, with his men fresh and vigorous, and well fed, was close behind them, having marched away from Nairn between four and five. Orders had been given for collecting some meat and drink on the field; but either the supply was insufficient, or it did not arrive in time; for many of the Highlanders slipped off in search of food. Others, exhausted by hunger and want of sleep, fell upon the moor, as if careless whether the English dragoons rode over them or not. "By this means," says the Highland officer, "we wanted in the action at least one-third of our best men, and of those who did engage many had hurried all the way from Inverness." Perhaps the desperate, tired condition of the men had as much to do as the folly of Charles and his favourite advisers, Sheridan and O'Sullivan, in defeating a plan suggested by Lord George Murray. This plan was to march to some good ground upon the south side of the water of Nairn, to draw the Duke of Cumberland up afterwards to passes in the mountains, and to prolong the war in the very heart of the Highlands. Overlooking too much, perhaps, the present condition of their troops, and the future difficulty of victualling them, Lord George says—"Why what I have now mentioned, was not performed, let them answer, who were determined against a hill campaign, as they called it. What I can aver is, that myself and most of the clans, at least all, those I spoke with, were for this operation; and his royal highness could have supported the fatigue as well as any person in the army. It's true Sir Thomas Sheridan, &c., could not have undergone it; so we were obliged to be undone for their ease. As to provisions, had I been allowed to have any direction, we would not have wanted (though perhaps not the best) for years, as long as there were cattle in the Highlands or meal in the Lowlands."

In this epistle his royal highness is in an absolute fury against all the Scots, whether Highlanders or Lowlanders. He prepares us to expect the detestable acerbities he exercised as soon as he was able. Apparently not being able to see beyond the district he was in, he says—"All in this country are almost to a man Jacobites; and mild measures will not do; . . . were I to commiserate the villains and villainies this country abounds in, I should never have done."

CULLODEN (OR DRUMOSSIE) MOOR.

* The Highland Officer says—"In the evening it was resolved in a council of war that we should march under cloud of night and attack the enemy in their camp at Nairn, judging that, this being the Duke of Cumberland's birthday, his army would make merry and be less prepared for a surprise."

* MS. Memoirs of Captain Daniel, as cited by Lord Mahon.

In the morn while the English army was coming on with a broad front, divided into three columns of five battalions each, with the artillery and baggage following the first column on the right, which moved by the sea-coast, and with the cavalry covering the left wing, which stretched towards the hills. The men were in the best spirits, and even the dragoons that had fled at Colt Brigg, at Prestonpans, and Falkirk, seemed fully determined never to fly again. About eight o'clock a Cameron, one of Lochell's lieutenants, who had been left dead asleep in Kiltravock wood, when the halt had been made, came running into Culloden House and informed Charles and his principal officers, who were taking a little rest in Duncan Forbes's mansion, that the English were in full march. Thereupon hurried orders were issued to move the fatigued and sadly thinned regiments to a part of Culloden moor, about half a mile to the west of the place where they had been drawn up in battle array the day before. The Highlanders formed in two lines with a body of reserve. Great discontent was given to one of the bravest and most powerful of the clans, whose superstitions were excited as much as their honour and pride were piqued. "We of the clan MacDonald," says the Highland Officer, "thought it ominous we had not this day the right hand in battle as formerly, and as we engaged in this enterprise when the events proved successful, as at Prestonpans and Falkirk, and in which our clans maintained we had engaged in all our battles and struggles in behalf of our royal family since the battle of Bannockburn, on which glorious day Robert the Bruce bestowed this honour upon Angus MacDonald, Lord of the Isles, as a reward for his never-to-be-forgot fidelity to that brave prince, in protecting him for above nine months in his country of Ruchlin, Isla, and Uist, as the same name has done since to his royal successor Prince Charles."* Instead of the MacDonalds the Atholl brigade had the right of the first line; in the centre stood the Camerons of Lochell, the Stuarts of Appin, the Frasers, the MacIntoshes, the MacLauchlans, the MacLeans, the Fergusons, and the Roy Stuarts; and on the extreme left were the MacDonalds, who formed three regiments under their respective chiefs, Clan Ronald, Keppoch, and Glengary. Lord George Murray, incomparably the best of Charles's generals, commanded on the right, and Lord John Drummond on the left. The second line consisted of Lord Ogilvie's regiment, which had the right of Lord Lewis Gordon's men, Glenbucket's regiment, the Duke of Perth's, Lord John Drummond's, and the Irish piquets, who stood on the extreme left. This second line was commanded by Stapleton. On the right of the first line, and somewhat behind it, were two or three troops of horse—nearly all that remained in the service, or that remained mounted, for the rapid marches and counter-marches, the sad roads of the Highlands, and the sadder want of proper forage had knocked up all the rest of the horses.—The body of reserve, in which Charles placed himself on a small eminence, behind the right of the second line, consisted of Lord Kilmarnock's regiment of foot guards, and some two or three dozen of horse, the miserable remnant of Lord Pitligo's and Lord Strathallan's cavalry. The right flank of the Highland army was covered with a strong stone wall. It appears that the Duke of Cumberland hardly expected that the Highlanders would stand for battle; but he found them arranged in this order when he came up with them at about eleven o'clock. He halted within half a mile of their first line, and then formed his columns into two lines of foot, with a morass on his right, between him and the sea shore, which secured that flank. He placed two of his regiments of dragoons and four companies of Argyllshire Highlanders on his left, to fall upon the enemy's right; and, in addition to his two lines, he formed a very strong body of reserve with the Duke of Kingston's horse, the rest of the Argyllshire foot, and two or three English regiments. The Scots Royals had the right of the first line, and Burrell's regiment, which had behaved so well at Falkirk, had the left of the foot. In the second line, which, like the first, consisted of six full regiments, Howard's regiment had the right and Wolfe's the left; but when the battle began one or two other regiments were brought forward from the reserve, and placed on the left by the side of Wolfe's, and additional squadrons of horse were sent to the flanks of both lines. Ten pieces of well served artillery were placed in the intervals between the regiments of the front line: the right flank was commanded by Major General Bland, the left by Lord Ancram, the centre by the Earl of Albemarle:—this was the front line. In the second line the Duke of Cumberland was on the right, and his favourite General Hawley on the left. While these dispositions were making, and each army was trying to outflank the other, there set in a heavy shower of rain, "which," says Volunteer Ray, "was very discouraging, remembering the Falkirk affair." But this time the English had the wind and the rain at their backs, and the Highlanders in their faces. When the English came within five or six hundred paces of the enemy they got upon soft and boggy ground, which was also calculated to revive unpleasant recollections; but, when the artillery horses and the heavy guns stuck fast in the mire, the soldiers cheerfully slung their firelocks and dragged the cannon across the bog with the strength of their own arms. While this was doing the weather grew fair, and the Highlanders from behind a strip of old wall began to fire with their cannon. But their pieces were so badly served and so badly pointed that they did no other mischief than carrying off the leg of a common soldier in Bligh's regiment. At about one o'clock Cumberland commenced replying to this cannonade; and, as his guns were exceedingly well served, they made a slaughter-house of the Highlanders' irregular and crazy battery, cutting at the same time lanes through some of the clan regiments. It was with extreme difficulty that Lord George Murray and his officers could keep their men in their positions to face this murderous fire;—the Highlanders wanted to run, but forward and not backward from the field; they wanted to take the cannon with the broadsword, as they had done at Prestonpans. "Not liking this way of fighting," says Ray, who was in the English front, "they came running forward in their furious wild way on our right, where his royal highness had placed himself to receive them, imagining the greatest push would be there: they came down three several times within a hundred yards of our men, firing their pistols and brandishing their swords; but our soldiers appeared as if they took little notice of their bravadoes." The cannonade lasted nearly an hour, during which time Cumberland made several changes in the disposition of his army; the most important of which was bringing up Wolfe's regiment from the second line, where the men were standing in water up to their ankles, to the front line, and there placing them, en potence, or forward at a right angle from the left flank, so as to make a new front, and to fire upon the flank of the Highlanders if they should come forward in full force. The duke then placed himself in the front of Howard's regiment between the two lines, and Colonel Belford, who had the charge of the artillery, threw some ball, so well that they broke ground in the midst of Charles's reserve, bespattered the Chevalier's face with dirt, and killed one of his attendants. Upon seeing that masses of the Highlanders were breaking from their centre and right to come forward, Belford, who had been using common cannon-ball, loaded his field-pieces with grape-shot. The clan MacIntosh came right on to the English centre, but the fire of the field-pieces and the small arms of the 21st regiment made them incline to the right; other clans, however, advanced to their support; and then, in spite of grape-shot and musketry in front, and the flank fire from Wolfe's regiment, they fired their pieces, threw down their muskets, and attacked the English left, sword in hand, broke through Burrell's regiment in the first line, and pushed forward, through the gap they had made, on the second line; but there they were checked by Sempill's regiment, which, kneeling down, reserved their fire till they came close up, and then, with their bayonets fixed, gave a terrible discharge, that brought a great many of them to the ground. Most of those who did not fall turned back after they had killed Lord Robert Kerr and some twenty men. A few of the most desperate still pressed on with their broadswords and targets to break into Sempill's regiment; but not a man of them could succeed; they all dropped at the point of the well-directed bayonets.* It was calculated that from four to five hundred of them fell dead or desperately wounded between the two lines of the English army. This was, in fact, almost all the fighting; the rest of the operations at Culloden and beyond it were little more than pursuit, slaughter, and butchery. When the regiments on the right of the Highland first line made this attack, the regiments on the left of that line, the Fergusons and the three MacDonald clans, who thought that they ought to have been on the right, did not accompany the forward movement, but hung back till the MacIntoshes were goring themselves on the English bayonets. Then they came forward, gave a general discharge, threw down their muskets, and drew their claymores; but the grape-shot and the musket-shot, right in their teeth, made them pause, and, when the MacDonalds saw the MacIntoshes running back from the gap they had made, they also went off, pursued by some English dragoons. The Irish piquets in Charles's second line fired upon the dragoons, and made them either halt or wheel about. Through this timely check the MacDonalds, the Fergusons, and all that remained of the MacIntoshes, got back to the main body, which was now formed into one single line instead of two. But in another direction Cumberland's cavalry performed a more important service than the dragoons that had pursued the MacDonalds. General Hawley, with four companies of the Campbells of Argyllshire, had succeeded in breaking down the east wall of the inclosure, whose north wall covered the flank of the Highlanders, killed all the men that were in that inclosure, and pulled down other parts of the wall; and through these apertures Lord Ancram led Lord Mark Kerr's dragoons and some of Cobham's, and formed on the right flank of the rebels, a little behind them. With that mass of horse standing in that threatening position, and with the whole of the English infantry and artillery, and other clouds of cavalry coming on full in their front, the mountaineers lost heart completely, and began to go off the field in small parties, some with their chief and officers, and others without them. "At this sight," says Ray, who is an un-courteous critic of Charles's military conduct, but whose assertions are supported by every contemporary authority at all entitled to credit, "their mock prince wheeled off and fled; so that he had then the honour of being in the front, which held on with so much courage that he crossed the river at the nearest place, at the hazard of drowning, and never stopped nor looked behind him until he got to Lord Lovat's house, where he stayed all night." It is said, that Lord Elcho, before the bloody game was quite finished, rode up to Charles and implored him to head a general and desperate charge in person; that the Chevalier turned pale and refused; and that thereupon Elcho called him an Italian coward and scoundrel, and swore he would never serve him or speak to him again. The authority for the fact is Lord Elcho himself; and, though his lordship lived an exile for the Stuarts' cause, he would never again see Prince Charles, and used to leave Paris as soon as the Chevalier entered it.* On the other hand, it is affirmed that Charles desired to go from his place in the rear and rally the Highlanders, and that he was only forced from the field by the entreaties of Sheridan and others, who represented the attempt as desperate, and the success of it impossible. Nay, according to a cornet of his horseguards, who summons 'his eyes' to witness the truth, Charles would not move until O'Sullivan laid hold of the reins of his horse and turned him about. The weight of authority is, however, on the side of Lord Elcho, a man of bravery and honour. Nor can we ever give much credit to the stories of mere intentions. It is so easy to say that Charles intended the charge, and that his tender friends prevented him! Yet all his valour in battle rests upon these stories. Walter Scott says, correctly, that after the battle was over there was no hope of collecting the Highlanders, who fled to their mountains and glens; but a hero would most assuredly have attempted a charge with the left wing and part of the second line when the right was repulsed; this, in similar cases, had been done over and over again, successfully or otherwise, by every veteran general; and it was neither done, nor, as we believe, attempted by the Chevalier. Under the circumstances the charge would and must have failed; but it was better for the Highlanders to throw away their lives in battle than to be butchered as they were in their retreat, and afterwards in their hiding-places; and it behoved a young man who had set himself forward as the romantic hero of the age to risk life and all in the decisive struggle. As it was, the fugitives went off in two large bodies, the larger one consisting of western Highlanders, directing their flight towards Badenoch; the other, and much smaller one, consisting of the Frasers, Lord John Drummond's regiment, and the Irish piquets, retreating to Inverness. The latter body suffered most, being pursued till within a mile of Inverness by the Duke of Cumberland's horse, who made few prisoners, but shot or cut down nearly every officer they overtook; for they had learned from their royal commander that rebels had no claim to mercy, while most of the dragoons were made fierce and pitiless by the recollections of the defeats and humiliations they had sustained. Cumberland and the infantry followed leisurely towards Inverness. When near the town a drummer presented himself with a letter from the French officers, and Irish officers that had been in Louis's service, offering to surrender themselves prisoners to his royal highness, and invoking from the English generous quarter and honourable treatment. The duke promised them quarter, and then sent forward a company of grenadiers, who took possession of Inverness and of the arms which the French and Irish there laid down. It appears that the Highlanders lost three times more men in the retreat than in the battle, and that, altogether, there perished on that bloody day from 2000 to 2500 men. Many of their bravest chiefs were killed or miserably wounded on the field. Mac Lean of Drimmin, after losing two of his sons, was killed by a random shot while turning to look for his third son; Cameron of Lochell fell wounded with grape-shot, but was carried off by two brothers between whom he was advancing; Mac Donald of Keppoch was wounded by a musket-shot, which brought him to the ground; a friend ran to his assistance, told him that the wound was not mortal, and implored him to exert himself and join in the retreat; but Keppoch begged his friend to take care of himself, and, rising to his feet, he soon received another shot, which dispatched him. In the regiments which had charged Burrel's regiment, and thrown themselves upon the bayonets of Sempill's, there was scarcely an officer or a first-rank man left alive. According to the official returns published by Cumberland and the government, the loss of the English in killed, wounded, and missing, officers and men, amounted only to 310. It is not easy to say what was the exact force engaged. A report furnished to Home from the State-Paper Office states that the effective force of Cumberland's army at Aberdeen on the 28th of March was, rank and file, 7179 men. He may have left some detachments in his rear, but in his advance to Culloden he was joined by Lord Albemarle, who brought some reinforcements with him. Ray, however, says that there were only 5721 rank and file in the king's army on the day of the battle; but this appears to be an intentional error, and it may be fairly assumed that Cumberland had from 7000 to 8000 men, fresh and in excellent condition, while the Highlanders, with their allies, could not possibly have mustered 4000, and these, as we have seen, exhausted by hunger, incessant fatigue, and that fatal night march and countermarch which made their condition—had enough before—worse than ever. The ministry at London, and the friends and dependants about the duke, styled this a great and glorious victory; but there was no glory in it or about it. His royal highness himself called it a "complete victory;" and complete it certainly was. "I thank God most heartily," he says in a letter to ministers, "that I was an instrument in the affair, and that the glory of the day was owing entirely to the British troops, who fully retrieved the little stain of Falkirk without any assistance from the Hessians, though they might have saved us a good deal of trouble, and were of some use, even in their inactive state." If all the Hessians had been up at Culloden, Cumberland's army would have exceeded 13,000 men! The carnage which had been committed, and which was still committing, by his moveable columns, his royal highness was pleased to style "a little blood-letting, which has only weakened the madness, but not at all cured it."* "If," says he, "we had destroyed every man of them, such is the soil, rebellion would sprout out again." In another letter he says,—“But my greatest pleasure is, in hoping that the king may have restored his favour to the troops, and that the nation in general find that their own army is almost as good as a foreign one.”† If these words were not meant in irony they were a gross insult to the English nation; his royal highness ought to have recollected that the English had been the foremost soldiers in the world; that no very long time ago—no further back than the days of Marlborough—they had beaten every enemy opposed to them; and that, if this tide of triumph had been turned back at various periods, it was not owing to any degeneracy in the men, but to the blundering, the ignorance, the indolence, and fatuity of their commanders. But in those grovelling days, when our king and our ministers sought to fight their battles with Hanoverians and Hessians, and subsidized mercenaries, it had become the fashion to speak of the descendants of the Englishmen that fought at Cressy and Azincourt, at Blenheim and Ramillies, as men unfit for soldiers; and this degrading of the military character of the nation had the worst effect upon its general character. We can almost excuse his royal highness for thirsting for the blood of the doubly-damned traitor, Fraser of Lovat. Immediately after the battle of Culloden he wrote to ministers—"I believe old Lovat will not escape me. I have several parties out for him, and papers such as will suffice to prove high treason upon him." The Chevalier, as we have stated, fled straight from the field of Culloden to Lovat's house, and there he and the old fox met for the first and for the last time. Walter Scott has preserved, in magical colours, the picture drawn of this strange meeting by an eye and ear witness:—"A lady, who, when a girl, was residing in Lord Lovat's family, described to us the unexpected appearance of Prince Charles and his flying attendants at Castle Donnie. The wild, desolate vale on which she was gazing with indolent composure was at once so suddenly filled with horsemen riding furiously towards the castle, that, impressed with the belief that they were fairies, who, according to Highland tradition, are visible to men only from one twinkle of the eyelid to another, she strove to refrain from the vibration which she believed would occasion the strange and magnificent apparition to become invisible. To Lord

* According to a letter published shortly after in the Scots Magazine, the Duke of Cumberland had made a sensible alteration in the mode of manœuvring the bayonet against the Highlanders;—before this the bayonet-man attacked the swordsman fronting him: now the left-hand bayonet-man attacked the swordsman fronting his right-hand man. He was then covered by the adversary's target where he was open on his left, and the adversary's right was open to him. This manner made an essential difference; staggered the enemy, who were not prepared to alter their way of fighting, and destroyed them in a manner rather to be conceived than told.

Lovat it brought a certainty more dreadful than the presence of fairies or even demons. The tower on which he had depended had fallen to crush him, and he only met the Chevalier to exchange mutual condolences." Lovat was then so old and infirm that he could neither ride nor walk, but he agreed with Lochell and other chiefs in recommending the prosecution of a mountain war, or at least the keeping together of the clans, so as to present a bold countenance to the enemy, and obtain honourable or merciful conditions. But the Chevalier's head was completely bewildered; his chief favourites and advisers were only anxious to get back to France; and, changing his dress, Charles stole away by night, and crossed the mountains to Invergarie, near Fort Augustus, which fort had been set fire to and burnt by a body of Highlanders the day before the battle of Culloden. Left to shift for himself, old Lovat put himself in a sort of hammock, and was carried away to a good hiding-place on the shoulders of some of his clan.

Lord George Murray had succeeded in rallying at Ruthven about 1200 of the fugitives from Culloden, and was sustained by the confident hope of collecting such an army as might face Cumberland again; but there was no corresponding spirit on the part of the Chevalier; there was no means of provisioning an army; and, instead of increasing, the body of 1200 men began to disperse. Yet Lord George did not give up the cause as hopeless until he received a message from Charles urging the chiefs and men in arms to look to their own safety. At Invergarie Charles himself became almost a solitary fugitive, and began to trust to holes in the rocks and other hiding-places for his safety. All his company took leave of him except O'Sullivan, O'Neile, and one Burke, a common servant, who knew the country well, and was kept as a guide. With this slight attendance Charles stole secretly from Invergarie to Loch Arkaig, in Lochaber, and then to Glenboisdale, where he lurked a day or two, and where he received a message from Lord George Murray, entreating him not to leave Scotland just yet. The Chevalier replied to Lord George that he must go to France, but that he hoped to return soon with powerful reinforcements which he was quite sure of obtaining. He also left a paper, written and signed by himself, containing an account of his designs; but this paper was not to be opened or shown to his friends till a certain number of days after he had embarked for the continent. But to embark was no such easy matter; the English cruisers continued to do their duty well, and no French ship appeared to take off the forlorn adventurer.

Two days after the battle of Culloden, Brigadier Mordaunt was detached into the Frasers' country with 900 foot, and there he seized a great number of cattle and a quantity of oatmeal, said to have been collected for the use of the rebel army. "He went also," says volunteer Ray, "to Lord Lovat's house, that nest and cage of unclean birds, where much treason and rebellion had been hatched: he only found the nest, for the birds were flown: however, he thought proper to purge it from all pollutions by fire." The Duke of Cumberland advanced to the smoking ruins of Fort Augustus, and established himself there in the very centre of the rebellious districts, sending out parties in all directions to scourge the land, to cut off every Highlander found in arms, and to track them to their hiding-places in their glens and mountains. In a short time all the gaols were crammed, notwithstanding a great number being shipped off for Newcastle; and more were killed or starved than were made prisoners. Every encouragement was given to the fierce passions of the Argyllshire men and the other Whig clans or hereditary enemies of the Jacobite Highlanders; and the worst rabble of the regular army were let loose to plunder and destroy. In many places the dispersed clans were hunted down like wild beasts—tracked to their dens and holes in the hill sides, and either burnt or smothered by combustible materials lighted at the mouths of those crannies, or compelled to come out to fall upon the bayonets and swords of their pursuers. These men were not likely to make a distinction which their royal leader could not or would not make: the duke had declared that blood-letting was the best remedy, that every man that wore the tartan in those parts was a rebel and traitor, whose body, soul, and goods were forfeited;—and so the soldiers slashed and plundered wherever they came, without any attention to guilt or innocence, or to degrees of guilt or degrees of misfortune. In many places they swept the country so bare of every thing that the inhabitants were left to perish with hunger on the hill sides; and, if tradition is to be credited, there were not wanting cases where the horrors of hunger led to the atrocities of cannibalism. The English soldiers, it appears, were allowed to carry off for their own use all the cattle and horses they could find; and Volunteer Ray describes, with disgusting facetiousness, the abundance of the booty and the uses the men made of it.* A host of

* This Cumberland volunteer had no taste for the picturesque. He describes the Highlands, with their black mountains and streams of water rolling down them, as a sight sufficient to give a well-bred dog the vapours; and he assures us that these solitary horrors occasioned numbers of the English to fall sick daily, as well in their minds as bodies. "This," he adds, "might have been still worse, had it not been for the duke's presence. . . . And, to divert their melancholy, his royal highness and officers frequently gave money to be run for by Highland horses, sometimes without saddles or bridles, both men and women riding: here were also many foot-races performed by both sexes, which afforded many droll scenes. It was necessary to entertain life in this manner, otherwise the people were in danger of being affected with hypochondriacal melancholy. At this time most of the soldiers had horses, which they bought and sold to each other at a low price, and on which they rode about, neglecting their duty, which made it necessary to publish an order to part with them, otherwise they were all to be shot. I saw a soldier riding on one of these horses, when, being met by a comrade, he asked him, 'Tom, what hast thou given for the gallop?' Tom answered, 'Half-a-crown.' To which the other replied, with an oath, 'He is too dear; I saw a better bought for eighteen pence.' Notwithstanding the low price, the vast quantity of cattle such as oxen, horses, sheep, and ponies taken from the rebels, and bought up by the lumpy by the jockeys and farmers from Yorkshire and south of Scotland came to a great deal of money, all which was divided amongst the men that witnesses of all parties, including even officers in the English army, speak to such atrocities as had not been witnessed in our island since the dark ages. Among these witnesses are bishops and clergymen of the episcopal church, presbyterian ministers and elders, gentlemen of rank and character, who gave in specific cases with names and dates, and their signatures attached to their papers, so that we can scarcely escape from a harrowing and revolting narrative by a comforting doubt in Highland and Jacobite exaggerations. As a last touch to the horrible picture, we may mention what is asserted on indisputable authority, that the Highland women were subjected to the last indignity and brutality, that their children were frequently shot, stabbed, or thrown over the rocks, and that it became a common spectacle to see men, women, and children, frantic with hunger, following in the track of the plunderers, and imploring for the blood and offal of their own black cattle, carried off and slaughtered for the use of the Duke of Cumberland's army. The hangman Hawley distinguished himself in this war of extermination, which lasted without check or pause till the month of July, when his royal highness repaired to London to claim and wear his sullied laurels. He left behind him in Scotland the name of the Butcher, and the people of England, disgusted sooner than any other with cruelty, confirmed this title to the hero of Culloden.*

The English parliament had not waited for his arrival to testify their gratitude for the glorious victory, both Houses having voted, nemine contradicente, letters of thanks to his royal highness for the eminent and very important services performed by him; and the Commons, in addressing his majesty upon this glorious occasion, had said in their concluding paragraph, that, being truly sensible of the eminent courage and conduct of his royal highness, they were impatiently desirous and would be found quite ready to give his royal highness such distinguishing marks of public gratitude as should be most agreeable to his majesty. As the king is the fountain of honour, parliament could only give money; and when his majesty, in a message delivered on the 13th of May, recommended to the consideration of the Commons "the settling an additional revenue upon his said son and his issue male," the dutiful Commons prepared to vote the people's money; and on the very next day no less than a sum of 25,000*l.* per annum, payable out of the duties and revenues brought them in, who were sent out in parties in search of the Pretender; and they frequently came to rebels' houses who had left them, and would not be reduced to obedience: these sort our soldiers commonly plundered and burnt, so that many grew rich by their share of spoil." The Rev. James Hay, of Inverness, says, in an attestation sent to Bishop Forbes in the month of June, that the women that rode races on horseback, for the amusement of the English camp at Fort Augustus were saddled, and that, in other particulars, there was the grossest indecency and depravity.

* "The king," says Horace Walpole, "is much inclined to some mercy; but the duke, who has not so much of Cusack after a victory as in gaining it, is for the strictest severity. It was lately proposed in the city to present him with the freedom of some company; one of the aldermen said aloud, then let it be of the Butchers."—Letter to Mansel.

composing the aggregate fund was added to the duke's income of 15,000*l.*, payable out of the civil list. Out of doors this reward seemed sufficiently high, but within doors it was not opposed by a single voice. The patriot Pitt, who was now half a deputy treasurer for Ireland, was himself ready to propose this large annual grant; but the Duke of Cumberland thought that the proposition would come better from the first minister; and so Mr. Pelham made it. As Pitt was on the ladder of promotion, as he was about being advanced to the post of paymaster of the forces, we believe he would have asked 50,000*l.* a-year instead of 25,000*l.*, if the king, who really fixed the sum which was represented as the spontaneous offering of the parliament and people of England, had chosen to suggest the larger allowance. The legacy of 10,000*l.* which the old Duchess of Marlborough had left him to encourage him in his patriotic opposition, and to enable him to bear life without office, ought to have burned in the great orator's pocket, and to have confused the rolling and sonorous periods of his eloquence; but Pitt seems to have been high above such influences—insensible to shame or contrition on such paltry points, which he, no doubt, considered as unworthy the attention of a man of his transcendent genius. "We have amply prepared for the duke's reception," says Horace Walpole, "by settling on him immediately and for ever 25,000*l.* a-year; . . . it was imagined that the Prince of Wales would have opposed this, on the reflection that 50,000*l.* was thought enough for him, though heir to the crown, and abounding in issue; but he has wisely reflected forwards, and likes the precedent."* The gratitude of the parliament and cabinet seemed to begin and end with his royal highness. On the very day on which 25,000*l.* a-year were proposed for the Duke of Cumberland, we find Duncan Forbes, the lord president, begging and entreating for 1500*l.*, not as a pension to himself, not as a reward for his invaluable services, but to enable him to make payment of sums of money he had borrowed for the service of government. "Above nine months ago," says this able and excellent man, "my zeal led me into this north country to quench a very furious rebellion, without arms, without money, without credit; and if the king's enemies are to be credited, my endeavours were attended with some success. His majesty was pleased to entrust me with the disposition of commissions for raising some independent companies: which I accordingly raised and employed—I hope usefully. The Marquess of Tweeddale, then secretary of state for Scotland, acquainted me, by order, that, for supplying any extraordinary expense, I was to draw on Mr. Pelham; but the total interruption of correspondence made my receiving money on such drafts impossible, and I was forced to supply the necessary expense, after employing what money of my own I could come at

in this country, by borrowing upon my proper notes such small sums as I could hear of. The rebellion is now happily over; and the persons who lent me this money at a pinch are now justly demanding payment; and I, who cannot coin, and who never hitherto was dunned, find myself uneasy. The whole of the small sums does not exceed 1500*l.* Now if Mr. Pelham would impress that money into the hands of George Ross, or any other person, to be remitted to me to account; or if he would authorise me to draw upon him, or upon any other person whom he may direct, for that sum, in like manner to account, it would tend much to the quiet of my mind. I have of this date wrote to Mr. Pelham on this subject."* But it was in vain that Duncan Forbes wrote, and his friends and the friends of justice represented his case to a most corrupt, jobbing, and selfish ministry. The amount of his services was known to most men, and it was equally notorious that he had not only begged and borrowed, but that he had expended three years' rent of his own estates in the public cause. He had also exposed himself to more personal danger, and, though a judge, a man of the pen, a quiet domestic man, had undergone far more fatigue, than any general engaged in his majesty's service in Scotland. All this, we say, and more than this, must have been known to ministers, and yet the government, of which the magnanimous Pitt was a member, not only left his merit unrewarded, but absolutely failed to pay him either the money he had spent out of his own private fortune or the debts he had contracted. The blood turns back cold to the heart in contemplating this base example of national or rather ministerial ingratitude. An excuse has been found for the king in the supposition that he did not know the whole of the case,—that he knew nothing except by the report of his ministers, who had Forbes entirely at their mercy, and who felt that to have displayed the extent of his services would have been to discover to the sovereign the extent of their own demerit; since their want of foresight and preparation, their selfish intrigues and jealousies, had allowed a paltry danger to become a great one, and had plunged the whole island into doubt, peril, and perplexity.† But if we admit that the truth was concealed from George—and there is a difficulty in the full admission—we cannot allow ourselves to believe that the facts could be disguised from the Duke of Cumberland, though we can very easily credit the hypothesis that his royal highness took a mortal offence when the lord president, like a Scotchman and a man of humanity, tried to make him hold his bloody hand; and, as a consequence of this resentment, that Cumberland, who repeatedly declared that there was not a man in Scotland to be trusted—that all were Jacobites alike—may have given encouragement to the cabinet to persevere in their foul injustice. It is upon record, that when Duncan Forbes manfully remonstrated with the duke against the enormities committing by the soldiery, and invoked the laws of his country, Cumberland exclaimed, "Laws! what laws? I'll make a brigade give laws!" And when the high-minded Scot made intercession in favour of his old neighbours and friends the Highland chiefs, whose wild schemes he had opposed to the very utmost, and when he endeavoured to show that some allowance, some consideration was due to early education and the force of habit, and that the Jacobitism of the Highland gentlemen might be cured by other means than the gallows and the block, and when he tried to preserve to the Highlanders their picturesque and convenient dress, as fitted to their occupations and manner of life, the ministry filled up their baseness by half suspecting him of disaffection, if not of downright Jacobitism. All these things depressed the spirits and broke the health of the good old man, and he died not long after, at Edinburgh (on the 10th of December, 1747), in the sixty-third year of his age, complaining on his death-bed of his reduced fortune and of "the oppression of power," and advising his son never to think of getting into parliament.* His ample fortune was, indeed, left in a state of such embarrassment, that the best friends of his family saw no prospect of relief, but in saving one of his estates by selling the other and employing the proceeds in discharging the debts he had contracted. "But," says a warm-hearted, admiring countryman, "he left behind him a name endeared even in these days of strife and bitterness, to enemies as to friends, and doubly to be honoured by posterity, for that impartiality which uniformly distinguished between the cause of the country and political party."† We fear, however, that the whole tone of society was too low and mean at the middle of the last century to feel these things very acutely. As for the government, when forty years were passed they were guilty of what has been properly called a sort of posthumous ingratitude; for in 1784 they arbitrarily resumed the privilege of distilling whiskey without payment of duty upon the Forbes barony of Fairintosh, an immunity conferred in perpetuity to compensate Duncan Forbes's father for the losses he had sustained and the exertions he had made at the great Whig Revolution of 1688; giving nothing in return to the family except a most inadequate compensation.‡

While the Duke of Cumberland was being welcomed into London with illuminations and sky-rockets, his cousin Charles was wandering from place to place in the most wretched condition, and making himself again interesting, not by his own heroism and address, but by the bravery, exquisite fidelity, and promptitude of others. This course of life lasted five long months, or from April to September; and during all that time not one of the hundreds of poor people he was obliged to trust could be induced to betray him, even by the government offer of thirty thousand pounds. Charles, after hiding for a day or two in Glenboisdale, went to Borradaie, the place where he landed on his first fatal coming to our island: MacDonald of Borradaie procured him an open boat, with eight oars, at Lochnanuagh, and there Charles embarked, on the evening of the 26th of April, for the Long Island, where he expected to find a French vessel. His tutor, Sheridan, the Duke of Perth, and others had provided for their escape in a better manner, but Charles was still accompanied by O'Sullivan, O'Neil, and Burke. After encountering a terrific storm and a dark night the party landed in Benbecula, on the Long Island, a solitary spot wholly destitute of the means of sustaining life. They had brought nothing with them but four pecks of oatmeal, and upon this and the water of a brook they were obliged to subsist for two days during which the storm raged. When they put again to sea they were driven from their course by another tempest which drove them into the small island of Glas. Here they were received by a farmer or tacksman, who lent one of the party a boat to proceed to the island of Lewis, where a small trading or fishing vessel was lying. Donald MacLeod got safe to Lewis, hired the little vessel, and sent notice to Charles that he had done so; but when the Chevalier got to the port of Lewis he found that the master of the vessel had discovered who he was, and would not stand to his bargain or take him aboard on any account. Charles and his companions in suffering then returned to the open boat which had brought them from Lochnanuagh, and put to sea, uncertain whither they should go. They had not gone far from Lewis when they saw two men-of-war under sail in the distance, and, taking these ships for English, they put about their helm and ran for the nearest shore, which was a small island to the southward called Issurt. This was a most unhappy mistake—the continuance of an unfortunate move; for the ships were in fact two French frigates which had come over with some money, ammunition, and arms, and which had put into Lochnanuagh only a few hours after Charles had left that place. Had he waited there, or had he ventured near enough to discover what the ships really were, his hardships would have been ended, and he might have got back to the continent early in May, safe and unscathed, save by the reflection that his escapade had cost the lives of many hundreds of brave men, and had plunged into irremediable ruin the warmest, if not the sole, friends of his family in Britain. When the two ships were out of sight he crept along the shores of Issurt and Harris:

‡ Introduction to Culloden Papers. Robert Burns termed the old privilege which had been enjoyed by the family for nearly a hundred years "Loyal Forbes's chartered boat;" and all the poets and song-writers of Scotland had celebrated the excellence of the Fairintosh whiskey. It was proper to resume the immunity;—the unfairness lay in not giving, as was done in other cases, a proper equivalent.

but here was a fresh alarm!—an English sloop of war lying in a harbour on that coast spied his boat, but before she could get out his boatmen pulled away and got into a small creek on the coast of North Uist. There the party lay hid for many days supporting life with some dried fish which they found in a lone hut. About the middle of May they put to sea again and made the island of South Uist, where the chief or proprietor of the greater part of the island—MacDonald of Clanronald—comforted and restored the royal fugitive, whose health and spirits were breaking, with Spanish wine and proper food, and gave him shoes and stockings—for the last of the Stuarts was almost bare-foot. But his humiliations were not over, and it remained for the young hero, who had come with oaths to conquer or die, to cover his manhood with woman's clothes, and to follow in the train of a young lady as a waiting woman. General Campbell, afterwards Duke of Argyll, had a commission to search the islands and secure the fugitives and the disaffected. With a considerable number of men, and several ships of war and transports, Campbell came to Barra, where he made many prisoners; from Barra he sailed to St. Kilda, and from St. Kilda he returned to Barra, with the determination of going to South Uist and searching the island from end to end. And early in June South Uist was surrounded on every side by ships and boats, while companies of soldiers were put on shore to scour the interior and search every house, cavern, nook, and corner of the island. But Clanronald had pledged his faith, and the islanders were resolute to respect the sacred rights of hospitality and misfortune; and by a combination of ingenuity, activity, and vigilance, which must have been incessant, and exercised at one time or other by nearly every man, woman, and child in the place, they contrived to delude the troops and to conceal their guest from the first to the last week of June, when the generous Flora MacDonald undertook to carry Charles to a safer place, and procure the means for so doing. This young lady, the daughter of MacDonald of Milton, in the isle of South Uist, was nearly related to the Chevalier's host Clanronald, and was on a visit at his house. She was distressed day after day by seeing the danger the Chevalier was running, and by hearing accounts of his distressed condition from his constant attendant O'Neil, who visited the house clandestinely for food and advice. She expressed an earnest desire to see the prince in person, and declared that, if she could in any way save him from his enemies, she would do it with all her heart. Upon this O'Neil ventured to propose that she should take Charles dressed in woman's clothes, as her maid, and conduct him out of South Uist to Skye. At first Flora MacDonald thought the scheme fantastical and dangerous, and positively declined it; but soon after this conversation means were found to introduce to her, at a solitary farm house, the prince in person, and then his sad condition, his thin and wasted habit of body, and his arguments, went to her heart, and removed all scruples; and she went forthwith from this interview to put the scheme into execution. No body could possibly leave the island or escape the cruisers' row-boats and guards without a passport. Flora asked and obtained from her stepfather Hugh MacDonald, who commanded part of the troops assembled in South Uist, a pass for herself and her lady's-maid Betty Burke; and she further induced the captain to recommend to his wife, residing in the isle of Skye, the said Betty as an excellent spinner of flax, and a faithful servant. We are following Flora MacDonald's own account of the transaction which is believed to have been written or dictated by herself.* It is said there, or rather it is left to be inferred, that her stepfather was not admitted into the dangerous secret, but deceived by Flora's ingenuity; but neither Captain Hugh MacDonald nor other MacDonalds in South Uist and in Skye were really imposed upon by the young lady. Having obtained the passport, a boat, six boatmen, and some provisions, and sent a dress to Charles, she walked along the sea-shore with Lady Clanronald and met the proscribed Stuart in his female attire. The ladies carried materials for a supper with them; but, as the party were sitting down among the rocks on the sea-side to a hasty meal, a messenger came to Lady Clanronald informing her that General Campbell and some soldiers were in her house searching for the prince. The ladies hurried home. Soon after their departure four armed cutters came round the coast, but Charles and O'Neil escaped the observation of the soldiers and sailors aboard by skulking among the rocks. On the following morning, the weather being calm and serene, Charles, Flora, and the six boatmen set out for Skye. As they were passing the point of Vaternish in Skye, a party of the MacCleod militia ran to the shore with their guns, and levelled them at the boat, but luckily the tide was out, the beach long and rough, and the sturdy boatmen pulled them away before the MacCleods could get near enough to force them to land, or could launch a boat to pursue them. The generous lady and her maid, the prince, landed safe at Mugstole, the seat of the MacDonalds, where Lady Margaret MacDonald was then residing. This lady, who, like her husband Sir Alexander, had once been a Jacobite of the deepest hue, gave the lady and her mock maid a good dinner, and, as her house was open to the visits of officers and troops, she then sent them forward to her kinsman and factor MacDonald of Kingsburgh, more in the interior of the island. Near to this house the Chevalier put on a Highland dress and then Flora left him to the care of Kingsburgh, and went home to her stepfather's house. She says that Charles was then greatly restored to health, had recovered much strength, and was in good spirits; but Kingsburgh found his condition wretched enough. According to a letter from Sir

From a Painting by Ramsay.

Alexander MacDonald to the Lord President Duncan Forbes, "he (the Pretender) accosted Kingsburgh with telling him that his life was now in his hands, which he might dispose of; that he was in the utmost distress, having had no meat or sleep for two days and two nights—sitting on a rock beat upon by the rains, and when they ceased ate up by flies: he conjured him to show compassion but for one night, and he should be gone. This moving speech prevailed, and the visible distress, for he was meagre, ill-coloured, and overrun with the scab." It should be borne in mind, however, that this letter was apologetic and meant to screen Kingsburgh and Flora MacDonald from the vengeance of government. It enclosed another letter from Sir Alexander's wife, Lady Margaret MacDonald, who, with somewhat more art, deplored the great trouble which had been brought upon the island of Skye "by the indiscretion of a foolish girl, with whom the unhappy disturber of the kingdom had landed"—protesting that she Lady Margaret did not know the Pretender in his disguise—affirming that that unhappy man had intruded himself by night upon her kinsman Kingsburgh, "a man well known for his singular honesty, integrity, and prudence, in all occurrences of life before that unhappy night; a man of such consequence, and so well liked in the country, that if the Pretender's son had done no other hurt to it but the ruin of this single man, it could not but render him odious to their posterity."* Her ladyship implored Forbes to befriend Kingsburgh and contribute his good offices with the Duke of Cumberland and the government:—"His crime," she says, "I will not venture to extenuate; but yet I am certain it was accidental, and proceeded rather from an excess of good nature and compassion upon a miserable person, who threw himself into his mercy, than from any disloyalty or rebellious principles."

The day after his arrival at Kingsburgh's house in Skye, the Chevalier left that island and went over to the small island of Rassy, which was only six miles off. The chief, MacLeod of Rassy, who had fought for the Pretender both at Falkirk and at Culloden, was lying hid somewhere on the mainland, but his sons were at home, and they accommodated Charles in a cowshed. They had no better lodging to give him—there was nothing better left on the island; for a detachment of King George's army had been there a few days before with fire and sword, had carried off all the cattle, and had burnt every house in Rassy. While the Chevalier was lying pinched with hunger in the cowshed at Rassy, his generous deliverer Flora MacDonald was apprehended by some of the militia in Skye, put on board a king's ship, and carried as a prisoner and a dangerous rebel to London. Her secret had been forced from the poor boatmen who had ferried her and Charles from South Uist. Kingsburgh also was laid in duress and threatened with nothing less than death. He told General Campbell that he had indeed seen the young Pretender, but in such misery that he could not lay hands on him. He joined, or pretended to join, Campbell in searching for the fugitive—"but the bird was flown." Some women about Kingsburgh's house, being seized and examined, confessed that Charles had been harboured there the whole night. When Kingsburgh was carried to head quarters at Fort Augustus, Sir Alexander MacDonald tried to soften the heart of the Duke of Cumberland. "I used my little rhetoric with the duke," says Sir Alexander, "but he stopped my mouth by saying that this man had neglected the greatest piece of service that could have been done; and if he was to be pardoned it would encourage others to follow his example." In the state in which matters now were, the wisest and best thing to do was to scare the wretched fugitive back to France—to permit and connive at Charles's escape. George II. was not a blood-thirsty prince, and even if his nature had been more severe he would not have chosen to draw down upon himself the odium of Europe and the criticism of every civilised court, by putting to death as a felon and traitor the descendant of many kings. To have kept Charles as a state prisoner either in Scotland or England, or even in the American plantations, would have been very troublesome, and might have proved exceedingly dangerous. For the safety, for the honour of the House of Brunswick, it was better to let him go than to catch him; and we cannot help believing that this was the opinion of a considerable portion of the English cabinet, and of not a few of the officers that were serving in Scotland—though, as for his royal highness of Cumberland, we can easily fancy that he would have sent him to the Tower and the block without compunction.* Kingsburgh, however, was not sent to the Tower, but confined in Edinburgh Castle. Both of these gloomy abodes were by this time filled with unhappy inmates.

After staying some days with the sons of MacLeod of Rasay, the Chevalier returned to the Isle of Skye, but not to the bounds of the MacDonalds, but to those of MacKinnon of MacKinnon, who had sent his clan to join the rebel army. At parting he gave young Rasay a little case containing a silver spoon, knife, and fork, and desired him to keep it till they met again. The MacKinnons received him with great kindness, procured him a boat, and carried him to Lochnevis, on the main land about twelve miles from Borradaie. Here he learned that there were lines of troops with sentinels so placed as to watch every road, every path, by night as well as by day, having fires lighted on the hills at regular distances. But two of the MacDonalds of Glenaladale smuggled him through a gully or narrow channel worn by a mountain stream among the rocks; and, after crossing the line of posts, they resolved to conduct him out of the Western Islands right into the Ross-shire Highlands, and lodge him among the MacKenzies, who had remained during the war on the side of King George, and were therefore not scourged with the visitations of troops now. The chief of Glenaladale thought that the MacKenzies would not betray the helpless fugitive, and that, notwithstanding their exceeding loyalty to the established government, they would assist in the escape of the son of their old kings. Accordingly Charles and Glenaladale, with two or three attendants, set out on foot for Ross-shire. The journey was long and rough. When they came to the Braes of Kintail, inhabited by the Macraes, the most barbarous of the Highland clans, they were like to perish for want of food, and were apparently saved only by the timely arrival of another fugitive—a MacDonald—who had fought for Charles at Culloden, from being seized and delivered up; for a Macrae, with whom they had taken up their lodging, exclaimed against the Highlanders who had been in arms, saying that they and those who still protected the young Pretender were fools and madmen, and that they ought to relieve themselves and their country by giving him up, and taking the large reward which government had offered. This new MacDonald, who knew the Chevalier at first sight, was of still further service; for he warned him that some troops had got even into Ross-shire, and he told him of a much safer hiding-place, where he himself had passed the preceding night. This was a cave of the rock in the great mountain of Corado, which lies between Kintail and Glenmoriston. "There," said this MacDonald, "live seven men upon whom the prince may absolutely depend; for they are brave and faithful, and most of them have been in his army." Charles and his companions put themselves under the guidance of this MacDonald, who conducted them to the wildest and most craggy part of the mountain, and into the secret cave, where they found six of the seven men assembled at dinner upon a sheep which they had lifted that very day. The dwellers in the cave were, in fact, what would have been called in other countries freebooters, brigands, or banditti; but whether they had adopted that course of life recently under the pressure of their difficulties, or whether they were veterans in the profession, is not mentioned. In the wild parts of the Highlands the laws had never yet been able to put down cattle-lifting; and the only thing that made any distinction in the apprehension of the mountaineers in general between freebooting and fair capture was, when the thing was done by a whole clan, and when it was done by a handful of men who had thrown off their allegiance to their chiefs, and lifted on their own account. The seven men of the cave fell upon their knees, for some of them knew the person of the prince in spite of his sad and ragged condition.* With such hosts his toilet was soon improved, and his diet also. The seven brethren lifted some clean linen, by stopping the servants of some English officers who were following their masters from Fort Augustus to Strathgilas with their port-manteaus. Food was seized in an equally unceremonious manner, and some comparative delicacies were bought at Fort Augustus under the beard of Cumberland's officers and executioners. That fort was not above eight miles from the cave, and Charles's attendants used to go thither frequently in the night-time to procure what intelligence they could from the Highlanders inhabiting the village; and occasionally these men procured an English newspaper. Charles stayed in the cave with the freebooters five weeks and three days; but then he began to long for better company, and instructed Glenaladale to find out some neighbouring gentleman with whom he might trust himself. The Seven conjured Glenaladale to dissuade the prince from this purpose, saying, that no reward could possibly tempt them, for, if they betrayed the prince, they must fly their country, as nobody would speak to them except to curse them; whereas 30,000*l.* was a great reward for a poor Highland gentleman, who could go away to Edinburgh or London with his money, where his treachery would be unnoticed, and where he would find people enough to eat his meat and drink his wine, and live with him as his friends.† Peter Grant, however, one of the seven, and the most active or most intelligent of the band, submitted to royal orders, and went into Lochaber to find out some gentleman of the name of Cameron. The first Cameron he met was the brave chief Cameron of Clunes, who sent Peter back to the cave to assure the prince that he would meet him at the head of Glencoich, where he, Clunes, had a little hut in a secret place. Charles instantly left the cave and travelled along the tops of the mountains in a very stormy night; but, as he thought it necessary to lie concealed by day, he did not reach Glencoich and the little hut at the time appointed, and when he got there he found neither the chief nor food to eat. Peter Grant, however, supplied both these deficiencies: he killed a deer, and found out Clunes again, who forthwith came to the hut with his three sons. The chief informed Charles, who wanted to get to Radnoch and Badenoch, where the gentle Lochiel and Clunie were lurking, that the troops and scouts of government were numerous, and that all the ferries of the rivers and lochs were so strictly guarded that such a journey was, for the present, impossible. It was, therefore, resolved to keep close for a time in or about the little hut in Glencoich. They were in this situation when Mac Donald of Lochgary and Dr. Cameron, Lochiel's own brother, penetrated into the district in search of the prince; for Lochiel and Clunie had both concluded that he must be somewhere to the north of the lakes. The two messengers, who knew the country and all the passes, found out Charles, and, after many more dangers and hardships, they succeeded in carrying him into Badenoch, where at a place called Mellanaur he met Lochiel and Clunie.* The gentle Lochiel was still lame, and suffering from the wounds he had received in the battle of Culloden. After staying a day or two in a hut called Uiskichibra, the two chiefs carried the prince to a still better hiding-place in the great mountain of Benalder, which Clunie had fitted up some three months before for his own use and that of his wounded friend, styled very appropriately "the Cage." "It was," said Clunie himself, "a great curiosity, and can scarcely be described to perfection. It was situated in the face of a very rough, high, and rocky mountain, called Lettermilich, still a part of Benalder, full of great stones and crevices, and some scattered wood interspersed. The habitation called the Cage, in the face of that mountain, was within a small thick bush of wood. There were first some rows of trees laid down, in order to level a floor for the habitation; and, as the place was steep, this raised the lower side to an equal height with the other; and these trees, in the way of joints and planks, were levelled with earth and gravel. There were between the trees, growing naturally on their own roots, some stakes fixed in the earth, which, with the trees, were interwoven with ropes, made of heath and birch twigs, up to the top of the

* In a letter dated the 16th May, or just a month after the battle of Culloden, Horace Walpole says, "The Pretender is not openly taken, but many people think he is in their power; however, I dare say he will be allowed to escape, and some French ships are hovering about the coast to receive him."

* These two chiefs were, considering the circumstances, summarily provided for at Mellanaur, and Charles felt better than he had done for a very long time. Clunie himself thus recorded the meeting:—"Lochiel would have knelt. . . . 'Oh, no! my dear Lochiel,' said his royal highness, clapping him on the shoulder; 'we do not know who may be looking from the top of yonder hills, and if they see any such motion, they'll immediately conclude that I am here.' Lochiel then ushered him into his habitation, which was, indeed, a very poor one. The prince was gay and in better spirits than it was possible to think he could have been, considering the many disasters, disappointments, fatigues, and difficulties he had undergone. His royal highness, with his retinue, went into the hut; and there was more meat and drink provided for them than he expected. There was plenty of mutton, an anker of whiskey containing twenty Scotch pints, some good beef sausages made the year before, with plenty of butter and cheese, besides a large well-cured bacon-ham. Upon his entry the prince took a hearty drum, which he sometimes called for thereafter to drink the health of his friends. When some minced collops were dressed with butter, in a large sauce-pan, which Lochiel and Clunie carried always about with them, being the only fire-vessel they had, his royal highness eat heartily, and said, with a very cheerful countenance, 'Now, gentlemen, I live like a prince' though at the same time he was no otherwise entertained than eating his collops out of the pan with a silver spoon. After dinner he asked Lochiel if he had always lived here during his skulking in such a good way. 'Yes, Sir,' answered Lochiel, 'for near three months that I have been herabouts with my cousin Clunie, he has provided for me so well, that I have had plenty of such as you see, and I thank heaven your royal highness has got through so many dangers to take a part.'—Clunie's Account of Lochiel and himself, after the Battle of Culloden, &c., in Home's Appendix. The original of this paper, dictated by the chief, together with other MSS. and letters relating to the Highland war, was put into Home's hands by Clunie's son and successor.

* The condition of Charles was thus described by Hugh Chisholm, one of the seven men:—"He had a coat of coarse dark-coloured cloth, a stirring tartan waistcoat, much worn, a pretty well belted plaid, tartan hose, and Highland brogues, tied with thongs, so much worn that they would scarcely stick upon his feet. His skirt—and he had not another—was of the colour of saffron."—"This Chisholm," says Home, "was at Edinburgh a good many years after the rebellion; and several people had the curiosity to see him and hear his story. Some of them gave him money. He shook hands with his benefactors, and hoped they would excuse him for giving them his left hand, as when he parted with the prince he had got a shake of his hand, and was resolved never to give his right hand to any man till he saw the prince again."

cage, it being of a round or rather oval shape; and the whole thatched and covered with fog (moss). This whole fabric hung, as it were, by a large tree, which reclined from the one end, all along the roof to the other, and which gave it the name of the Cage. And by chance here happened to be two stones at a small distance from one another, in the side next the precipice, resembling the pillars of a chimney, where the fire was placed. The smoke had its vent out here all along the face of the rock, which was so much of the same colour that one could discover no difference in the clearest day. The Cage was no larger than to contain six or seven persons, four of whom were frequently employed playing at cards, one idle looking on, one baking, and another firing bread and cooking." Here the party remained caged till the 13th of September, when a message arrived from Cameron of Clunes, to inform Charles that two French frigates had put into Lochmanuagh, and were waiting there to carry him and his friends off. The Chevalier set out immediately, but as he travelled only by night he did not arrive at the port till the 19th. Other messages had warned other gentlemen lying in concealment up and down the country; and, besides Locheil, Clunie, and Colonel Roy Stewart, about one hundred embarked with Charles on the 20th of September at Lochmanuagh, the very spot where he had landed fourteen months before. He disembarked at a little port near Morlaix, in Brittany, on the 29th of September, and thence proceeded to Paris, where he was kindly received by Louis, and enthusiastically greeted by the people on his first appearance at the Opera House—for the Parisians were quite charmed with his romantic adventures.

But, before this time, many of those who had ventured for him had been hanged and beheaded, with the usual and revolting accompaniments of drawing and quartering; and while Charles was showing his face in the French Opera the heads of braver and better men were exhibited at Temple Bar, on the walls of Carlisle, York, and other places. If there had been no glory, nothing at all striking or romantic, in the war which put an end to the rebellion, there was no mercy, no generosity in princely bosoms after the victory; and statesmen and judges seemed but too well disposed to make the law as sharp as Cumberland's sword. It was to be hoped that, in the course of thirty years, the nation would be found to have advanced in humanity; but the severities exercised now were greater than those which had been exercised against the Scotch rebels in 1715,—greater, and less necessary. The Duke of Cumberland continued to be "for the utmost severity." Both in Scotland and in England numerous prisons were crammed with victims, and for some time vast numbers were lodged in the holds of ships of war and transports,—packed, huddled together, like Africans on board slave-ships. Hence arose, in many cases, fevers and diseases, which robbed the gibbets of their prey, and which did not always respect the government soldiers and sailors, but carried off the victors as well as the vanquished, the gaolers as well as the captives.* In Carlisle there were nearly 400 unfortunate Scots crowded into a place not large enough for forty; but the common men were allowed to cast lots, one in twenty to be tried and hanged, and the rest to be transported to our West Indian plantations without any trial. In defiance of the recognised rights of the courts of Scotland, and in open contravention of articles in the Act of Union, the Scottish prisoners were all removed for trial to England, out of dread of the partiality or compassion of their countrymen. After the rebellion of 1715 an English prelate—the Bishop of Carlisle of those days—had lamented that the lenity of government "gave occasion for seditious insinuations, as if only a few beggars were to be sacrificed for the transgression of their lairds."† There was scarcely any ground for such a complaint now, for lords, and lairds, and gentlemen, both English and Scotch, were executed in plenty. One of the first that suffered was Colonel Townley, the colonel of the Manchester regiment. He was hanged on Kennington Common, had his bowels torn out, and his heart cast into a fire; and eight of his officers and men were treated in the same manner at the same place. Similar executions took place at York, Brampton, and Penrith; and about eighty ghastly heads were kept and exhibited in different parts of the North, as if to drive back the people towards their ancient barbarity. It appears that, in every place, the authorities were most punctilious in executing the treason sentences with all their atrocities. Charles Radcliffe, brother to the unfortunate Earl of Derwentwater who had suffered in 1716, had escaped the block then by breaking out of prison, but now he had been lately captured‡ on board a French vessel carrying arms and supplies to the young Pretender in Scotland, and he was put to death without any fresh trial, but upon his former sentence, passed thirty years ago. He pleaded that he was a subject of France,—that he held a commission from the French king; but the court overruled the plea, and rejected an application for delay. He died with the greatest fortitude upon

* Ray mentions that a most malignant kind of sickness was introduced among the Duke of Cumberland's army in Scotland by Brigadier Houghton's regiment coming from sea in ships that had before carried rebel prisoners to London, amongst whom was the gaoil distemper. This malady not only made havoc amongst our soldiers, but even among the townspeople of Inverness, great numbers of whom, both young and old, died daily thereof.

† Letter from Nicolson, Bishop of Carlisle, to Archbishop Wade, in Sir Henry Ellis's Collection. This Protestant prelate draws a frightful picture of the castle where the rebels were then confined, and he urges an immediate trial. "Not," he says, "that I have any jealousy that the prisoners are like to make their escape, but because I apprehend that, if justice be not executed speedily, many of them will leave the world in a less exemplary way than they ought to do." That is, the bishop feared they would die of disease in their horrible dungeons, instead of living to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

‡ When Charles Radcliffe was first taken, his son, who was with him, was mistaken for Charles Stuart's younger brother, the Duke, and afterwards Cardinal, of York. Many private letters of the time add confidently that he was the young Pretender's brother, and that King George and his ministers were greatly embarrassed to know what to do with him.

Tower Hill, and his headless body was interred near the headless body of his brother in St. Giles's church. Elcho and many of the lords and gentlemen had escaped to the continent (the Duke of Perth had died at sea on his passage), but Cumberland's detachments caught and made fast the Earl of Cromartie and his son Lord Macleod, Lord Kilmarnock, Lord Balmerino, Lord Mordington, Sir Archibald Primrose, and several other persons of distinction; and, last of all, old Lord Lovat, who, after many escapes, was found concealed in a hollow tree in one of the wildest parts of the Highlands. Parliament had passed an act for attainting all that had escaped, and that did not surrender themselves before the 12th of July. The list was long, and included some of the highest names in Scotland, and nearly all the great Highland chiefs. On the 28th of July the Earls of Cromartie and Kilmarnock and Lord Balmerino, who claimed their privileges, were brought before the peers in Westminster Hall, where the chancellor, Lord Hardwicke, who had been appointed lord high steward, presided. The scene was solemn and grand. "Three parts of Westminster Hall," says Horace Walpole, "were enclosed with galleries and hung with scarlet; and the whole ceremony was conducted with the most awful solemnity and decency. . . . No part of the royal family was there, which was a proper regard to the unhappy men who were become their victims. One hundred and thirty-nine lords were present. . . . I had armed myself with all the resolution I could with the thought of the prisoners' crimes and of the danger past, and was assisted by the sight of the Marquis of Lothian in weepers for his son who fell at Culloden;* but the first appearance of the prisoners shocked me—their behaviour melted me." Cromartie was a timid man, and shed tears; and the other earl, Kilmarnock, though behaving with more dignity, pleaded guilty, as did Cromartie, both expressing remorse for their past conduct, and their present good wishes for the person and government of King George; but old Lord Balmerino, the hero of the party, pleaded not guilty, and took exceptions to the indictment. "He is," says Walpole, "the most natural brave old fellow I ever saw: the highest intrepidity, even to indifference. At the bar he behaved like a soldier and a man; in the intervals of form, with carelessness and humour. . . . At the bar he plays with his fingers upon the axe,† while he talks to the gentleman gaoler; and one day, somebody coming up to listen, he took the blade and held it like a fan between their faces. During the trial a little boy was near him, but not tall enough to see; he made room for the child, and placed him near himself." He proposed to disprove the indictment, by showing that he was not present at the taking of Carlisle; but upon being informed that this was no answer to the charge of his joining the king's enemies there, inasmuch as he had marched into the town at the head of his troop after it was taken by the rebels, he said, with a smile, that he should give their lordships no further trouble. While the peers were withdrawn to their own chamber, previous to delivering their verdict, Murray, the solicitor-general (afterwards Lord Mansfield), asked Balmerino why he had put in a plea which his solicitor had previously informed him could be of no use? The old Scot, who was witty as well as brave, asked the bystanders who this person was; and, being told, he said, in a tone which must have chilled the heart of that able and rising lawyer,—“Oh, Mr. Murray! I am extremely glad to see you; I have been with several of your relations; the good lady your mother was of great use to us at Perth!” Murray, indeed, came of a very Jacobite stock; and his elder brother, Lord Dunbar, was minister or secretary to the Pretender. When the peers returned to their places, the lord high steward asked them severally whether Lord Balmerino was guilty or not guilty? and all said,—Guilty, upon honour. He begged their pardon for giving so much trouble; and, as he went away, he said, “They call me a Jacobite; I am no more a Jacobite than any that tried me; but if the Great Mogul had set up his standard I should have followed it, for I could not starve.” He also said that one of his reasons for pleading not guilty was, that so many fine ladies might not be disappointed of their show. If poverty could have excused rebellion, all three lords might have pleaded it. Since the stopping of a pension allowed to him by Sir Robert Walpole, Kilmarnock, though a fourfold earl,—being Earl of Erroll, of Linlithgow, and of Calendar as well as of Kilmarnock,—had often wanted a dinner; and the Earl of Cromartie was not in better circumstances. On being brought up to receive sentence both these earls sued for mercy. “My own fate,” said Cromartie, “is the least part of my suffering; but, my lords, I have involved an affectionate wife with an unborn infant as parties of my guilt to share its penalties. I have involved my eldest son, whose youth and regard for his parent hurried him down the stream of rebellion. I have involved eight innocent children, who must feel their parent's punishment before they know his guilt. Let the silent eloquence of their grief and tears supply my want of persuasion.” Lord Kilmarnock, who had infinitely more self-possession, and who possessed a fine voice and extremely fine person, and a noble carriage, made what was considered by all an able and impressive speech. He said that he would not deny the extent of his own crime, but that there was some alleviation to it in his having instilled good principles into his eldest son, “who was in the Duke of Cumberland's

* Lord Robert Kerr, who was killed at Culloden, was the Marquis's second son, and one of the most promising young men of the time.

† The axe, in such cases, was always brought from the Tower with the prisoners, and held by the executioner near to them during the trial. In the morning, when the three lords were to be brought from the Tower in separate coaches, there was some dispute in which the axe must go: old Balmerino cried out, “Come, come, put it with me!”

army fighting for the liberties of his country at Culloden, when his unhappy father was in arms to destroy them." [This was true; but, unluckily, his second son was with him in the field, and was now with him in the Tower.] He also considered that he was entitled to take some merit to himself for the great tenderness with which he had treated the English prisoners when the victory was on his side. He spoke so well that Lord Leicester went up to the Duke of Newcastle, and said, "I never heard so great an orator as Lord Kilmarnock. If I was your grace I would pardon him, and make him paymaster to the forces, like Pitt."

The case of the unfortunate lords and others had been prejudiced rather than helped by a very indiscreet letter which Vanhoy, the Dutch ambassador at Paris, had been induced by the French court to address to the Duke of Newcastle, recommending humanity, clemency, and greatness of soul—the latter a quality which was non-existent in court and cabinet. Another letter was sent to the lieutenant of the Tower for the prisoners, but stopped and forwarded to the House of Lords. It contained a plea for the prisoners, objecting that the late act for regulating the trials of rebels did not come into operation till after their crime was committed; but this legal objection was set aside by the Lords, and without any other legal proceedings the Chancellor, as Lord High Steward, pronounced the horrible sentence of death, as traitors, upon the three lords. Great intercession was made for the two earls, but apparently little or none for old Balmerino, who would have excited more sympathy in magnanimous hearts than either of the earls. The Duke of Hamilton, who had never been at court, kissed the king's hand and asked Lord Kilmarnock's life—but, according to an acute observer, Hamilton's intercession rather hurried Kilmarnock to the block. Cromartie found better petitioners and advocates in the Prince of Wales,* and in his own handsome and excellent wife, who was far advanced in pregnancy. It is said that Kilmarnock, with the greatest nobleness of soul, desired to have Lord Cromartie preferred to himself for pardon, if there could be but one saved. A pardon was granted to Lady Cromartie for her husband, and the two others were ordered for execution on the 18th of August. Kilmarnock was not so light-hearted, but old Balmerino continued to be joyous with his pretty young wife almost to the last.† On the fatal morning, just before they came out of the Tower, he called for wine and drank a bumper to the health of King James. Both the lords were made to walk on foot from their prison to the scaffold. Kilmarnock, on account, we suppose, of the superiority of his rank and title walked first, supported by two Presbyterian preachers, and dressed all in black. Balmerino followed, all alone, wearing a blue coat turned up with red, "his rebellious regimentals," a large loose flannel waistcoat, and under that his shroud and grave-clothes. Their hearse^s were close behind them. They were conducted to a house near the scaffold. Here they parted. "My Lord," said Balmerino, embracing the earl, "I wish I could suffer for both!" But Kilmarnock had scarcely left him before he desired to see him again, and then asked him whether he knew anything of a resolution said to have been taken in the Highland army the day before the battle of Culloden, to put all the English prisoners to death. Kilmarnock replied, "My Lord, I was not present; but since I came hither I have had all the reason in the world to believe that there was such order taken; and I hear the Duke of Cumberland has the pocketbook with the order." Balmerino, who was present, rejoined indignantly—"It is a lie raised to excuse their barbarity to us." And, as no such order was ever produced to the world, and as Balmerino, Lord George Murray, the gentle Lochell, and the great majority of the Jacobite officers and chief men were wholly incapable of such a barbarous design, and as the young Pretender himself had never shown a cruel disposition, we must believe that the dying lord spoke the truth. After spending about an hour in his devotions with the Presbyterian clergyman, Kilmarnock ascended the scaffold; he seemed terrified, but yet preserved the dignity of a gentleman. He stood and prayed some time with one of the ministers, who exhorted and encouraged him, but wept the while. His penitence was much admired; he delivered a long speech to the sheriff and stuck to the recantation he had made at his trial, declaring he was satisfied with the legality of King George's title, and that he wished all that embarked in the Pretender's cause might meet the same fate. At last he knelt down "with a visible unwillingness to depart," and the executioner struck off his head at a single blow. The scaffold was then new-strewed with sawdust, the blood on the block was covered, the executioner put on a new dress and took up a new axe. "And then came old Balmerino, treading with the air of a general." He walked round the scaffold, bowed to the people, went up to his coffin, read the inscription on the lid, and with a nod and a smile, said, it was all right. He then gazed around him upon the spectators who had assembled in amazing numbers (even the masts of the ships in the river were covered with men eager to catch a distant view), and he read a long paper in an audible voice and gave it to the sheriff. He mentioned George as a good kind of prince, but denied his right to the throne, and declared that Prince Charles was so sweet a prince that flesh and blood could not resist following him. In trying the block he exclaimed, "If I had a thousand lives I

* "The Prince of Wales, whose intercession saved Lord Cromartie, says he did it in return for old Sir W. Gordon, Lady Cromartie's father, coming down out of his death-bed to vote against my father in the Chipponham election. If his royal highness had not countenanced invidiousness like that of Sir W. Gordon, he would have no occasion to exert his gratitude now in favour of rebels."—H. Walpole. The reader will remember the strange scene when the antagonists of Sir Robert Walpole brought down the lame, the halt, and the blind, to vote against him.

“would lay them all down here in the same cause.” He called up the executioner, felt the edge of the axe, asked him how many blows he had given Kilmarnock, and then gave the headsman three guineas, saying he never was rich—that this was all the money he now had, and he wished it was more.* Two clergymen came up to offer their assistance, but he declined it, saying they had already done him all the good they could. He then pulled off his periwig, took a plaid cap out of his pocket, and put it on his head, saying he would die a Scotchman. He pulled off his coat and gave it to the executioner, whom he patted on the back, and encouraged to do his work like a man. He stretched his neck across the block, and gave the sign instantly “by tossing up his arm as if he were giving the signal for battle.” But the headsman, taken by surprise with so much rapidity, gave him a bad blow, and it cost him a third effort to sever the head from the body.†

Old Lord Lovat was not brought to trial till the spring of the following year (1747); for he had not appeared in arms like Kilmarnock and Balmerino, and it was more difficult to prove against him an overt act. It appears, indeed, that the old fox confidently expected he should escape the vengeance of the law by a natural death in the Tower, for he was sinking under his age and his maladies.‡ But John Murray of Broughton, the young Pretender’s secretary, saved his own neck by turning king’s evidence, and sacrificing his former friends and associates. His ample revelations were quite enough to convict Lovat, and even to fix the guilt of treason or treasonable correspondence upon several English Jacobites of high rank: and if the government of the day had been so inclined they might legally have sacrificed the Duke of Beaufort, Sir William Wynn, and others who had been plotting, and corresponding for years. Murray of Broughton produced Lovat’s own letters to Charles and other documents; and, remembering the iniquities of the chief rather than the old principle of clan-ship, several of his kinsmen and clan appeared against him upon his trial. This trial began on the 9th of March and lasted seven days. He complained bitterly to the Lords that the factor appointed to manage his estate had not complied with the order of their house; that Captain Fergusson had not restored his strong box with his money, though ordered so to do, at his Majesty’s command, by a warrant from the Duke of Newcastle, and that he had consequently been left destitute of money to support himself in his prison, or to provide for his defence. The Duke of Newcastle said, that, as to the strong box and money which Captain Fergusson had seized, he had been ordered to deliver it up; but that on the captain’s representing that he looked on the money as a fair prize, belonging to himself and his seamen, it was considered that it would be hard to rob him of it, till it was known whether it was so or not; “which,” added the Duke of Newcastle, “could not be ascertained till the event of Lord Lovat’s trial.”* In other words Lovat was not to have the use of his own money till it was useless to himself. According to the Scottish eye and ear witness we are following, “he said some strong things with regard to his unhappy situation, and read some strong epithets with regard to Captain Fergusson and the factor”† —epithets which we cannot help fancying were well merited. Nor was it without extreme difficulty that he obtained leave for his agent William Fraser to have access to him in the Tower. It appears, however, that government had some fears, not altogether unfounded, that the old fox might break cover and escape. When he first came to the Tower he said that if he were not so old and infirm they would find it difficult to keep him there. And when they told him they had kept much younger men, he said, “Yes, but they were inexperienced; they had not broken so many jails as I have.” He told Williamson, the lieutenant of the Tower, that he would contrive to hang his eldest son, and then marry his second son to Williamson’s niece. And this intention of sacrificing his son, whom he had cajoled and driven into the rebellion long before he declared himself, was not said merely as a bon-mot; for the grey-headed sinner capped all his monstrous iniquities by attempting to save himself by accusing and sacrificing his eldest son. According to Horace Walpole, who seems not to have missed one moment of the trial,‡ Lovat’s behaviour was the strangest that had ever been witnessed in any court or anywhere else. We believe we shall not go far wrong in adopting the theory of the great Scotch writer, that there was a touch of madness in the old man’s composition.§ But seldom was madness allied with so much caustic wit. “At his trial,” says Walpole, “he affected great weakness and infirmities, but often broke out into passions, particularly at the first witness who was his vassal; he asked him how he dared to come thither? The man replied, to satisfy his conscience. Murray, the Pretender’s secretary, was the chief evidence, who, in the course of his information, mentioned Lord Traquair’s having conversed with Lord Barrymore, Sir Watkyn Williams, and Sir John

† Id.—Lovat had previously petitioned the House of Lords touching the strong box and the money. “There was,” says Sir Andrew Mitchell, “neither gravity nor decency in his behaviour; he appeared quite unconcerned; and what he said was ludicrous and unbecomingly bold; but his petition was bold and well-ordered, which, however, would have been passed over without notice, had not Lord Granville bounced and Lord Bath vapoured, and procured an order to be entered in the Journal, and have by that acquired to themselves a sort of popularity which you know they very much wanted. No Scots noblemen spoke on this occasion; they are prudent and cautious. God bless them!”—Letter to the Lord President, in Calloden Papers.

‡ Walpole opens the letter containing this account with the words “I have been being at old Lovat’s trial.” The Duke of Cumberland attended this trial, though he had kept away from that of the other Lords.

Cotton, on the Pretender's affairs, but that they were shy. He was proceeding to name others, but was stopped by Lord Talbot, and the court acquiesced—I think very indecently. It was imagined that the Duchess of Norfolk would have come upon the stage. The two knights were present, as was MacLeod, against whom a bitter letter from Lovat was read, accusing him of breach of faith; and afterwards Lovat summoned him to answer some questions he had to ask, but did not. It is much expected that Lord Traquair, who is a great coward, will give ample information of the whole plot. When Sir Everard Falkener had been examined* against Lovat, the lord high steward asked the latter if he had anything to say to Sir Everard? he replied, No; but that he was his humble servant, and wished him joy of his young wife." The two last days of the trial he behaved ridiculously; and he joked and made everybody laugh even at the awful crisis when sentence was pronounced. To Lord Hechester, who sat near him, he said, in the words of an old French song—

Et ne m'en soucie guères.*

* He was secretary to the duke, whom he had attended into Scotland during the rebellion.

And in withdrawing from Westminster Hall he exclaimed, "Farewell, my lords: we shall never meet again in the same place!" Both before and after trial he made his prison echo with his jests, and he carried the same spirit to the block. Perhaps the greatest weakness and folly he committed was in writing a letter to the Duke of Cumberland, endeavouring to excite his compassion by reminding his royal highness how often he had carried him in his arms as a child. Still there was even in this letter a touch of his cunning and remorselessness—a stroke that was likely to tell with the Butcher of Culloden—for he offered to make such discoveries as would be a hundred-fold more useful to government than the chopping off his old grey head. "He says he will be hanged," says Walpole; "for that his neck is so short and bended, that, if beheaded, he should be struck on the shoulders. I did not think it possible to feel so little as I did at so melancholy a spectacle, but tyranny and villainy, wound up by buffoonery, took off all the edge of concern." He ate heartily during his whole confinement, even the morning of his execution; and

he declared the day before he died he was never in better spirits. He said he should die as a Christian, and as a Highland chief should do—that is, not in his bed.* On the morning of the 9th of April he was led to the scaffold. He said one of his predecessors five hundred years ago had died in the same way for his principles; that his principles had been constant and invariable; that in the course of his life he had never betrayed them nor anybody; nor should any peer or commoner be hurt from what he should say now.† Some short time before he got to the place of execution, a great scaffold near the bars on Tower Hill, being overloaded with spectators, broke down, and by this accident about eighteen persons were killed, and many more so hurt that they died afterwards. “So that, as he caused much destruction in his life, the like fate attended him on the day of his death.”‡ He had desired that Mr. Baker, a Romish priest attached to the Sardinian embassy, might attend him in private till his execution; and this favour had been granted him. Yet he professed himself not an orthodox Catholic, but a Jansenist, and denied the infallibility of the pope. He made no set speech, but sat down a little while in a chair on the scaffold, and talked to the people nearest to him, lying most deliberately, and quoting Horace. He said he was glad to suffer for his country—dulce est pro patria mori; that he did not know how it was, but he had always loved his country—nescio quâ natale solem, &c.; that he had never swerved from his principles, and that this was the character of his family, who had been gentlemen for five hundred years. It seems to us that the burlesque could not go farther; but our great letter and anecdote writer says, “he died extremely well, without passion, affectation, buffoonery, or timidity, his behaviour being natural and intrepid.” He quietly laid his head down on the block and gave the sign quickly; and, notwithstanding the awkward shortness and twist in his neck, he was dispatched at a single blow.

* A few circumstances remain to be noticed in connexion with this unhappy civil war. Sir John Cope, after being most virulently abused, caricatured, and put into ballads, was brought to trial by a court-martial, and honourably acquitted. According to Walpole, he came off most gloriously, his courage being ascertained, and even his conduct as a general, which everybody had given up, being fully justified. Two of his generals, Lascelles and Folkes, came off also, but not so happily in the opinion of the world. Hawley, who deserved a court-martial far more than Cope, escaped the ordeal through the friendship and protection of the Duke of Cumberland, who continued to treat him as an ornament to the service. Flora MacDonald was released after twelve months' confinement, and went back to the Highlands with some 1500*l.* in her pocket, which had been collected for her, chiefly among Jacobite ladies in London.*

As soon as the storm had blown over, ministers seemed to act as if it had never existed or had never been more than a joke; they were too busy with their own party cabals and intrigues to be able to spare time to attend to Scotland and correct the abuses which had led to or extended the rebellion. Duncan Forbes, though in a bad state of health, travelled up to London with a most admirable plan of pacification for the Highlands, and he exerted himself to the very utmost in order to win or force the attention of the cabinet; but he was obliged to return with the disheartening conviction that he had done little good in this direction; and, as late as the end of December, 1746, his friend Sir Andrew Mitchell, who had remained in the capital, was forced to confess to him that little or nothing had been done. “As to the affairs of Scotland,” writes Mitchell, “I am convinced that no man in the administration has had one serious thought about them since you left this place; one only excepted, whose labours for the good of his country are incessant; but as he chooses to work in the dark I can give no account of his progress, only that I fear he will be successful.”† After many delays, however, and, alas! too many executions, ministers prepared an act of indemnity, granting pardon to all who had been engaged in the rebellion except some eighty individuals named—a wide and ungenerous exception. This act was passed without opposition through parliament, which subsequently confirmed with equal facility—a bill not only for disarming the clans, but for restraining the use of their national garb;—a bill making it imperative on the master and teacher of every private school in Scotland to swear allegiance to King George, his heirs and successors, and to register their oaths;—a bill to check the episcopalian divines, who in Scotland were all Jacobites, and to restrain nonjurors in general;—a bill to abolish for ever the system of heritable jurisdictions, by which many Scottish lords and lairds had been allowed, on their own estates, to administer law in their own way. At the same time some encouragement was given to the High-

At the time when she smuggled the young Pretender in her train she was about twenty-four years old. Dr. Johnson saw her in the year 1773, when Boswell contrived to get the great moralist to the Highlands and to the Isle of Skye. Flora, or, as she spelled the name, Flory, was then past her seventh climacteric; but Johnson describes her as “not old, of a pleasing person, and elegant behaviour;” and his companion Boswell sets her down as “a little woman of a genteel appearance, and uncommonly mild and well bred.” Johnson says, in a letter to Mrs. Thrale, “She was carried to London, but dismissed without a trial, and came down with Malcolm Macleod, against whom sufficient evidence could not be procured. She and her husband are poor, and are now going to try their fortune in America—Sic rerum volvitur orbi.” They did emigrate to America, but returned to Scotland during the war of independence; and Flora died in the Isle of Skye on the 4th of March, 1790.—Boswell's Life of Johnson, with Mr. Croker's notes.

‡ Ray.—It is said that the old sinner exclaimed, “Ay, Ay, the mair mischief the better sport.” Horace Walpole says—“A scaffold fell down and killed several persons; one a man that had rid post from Salisbury the day before to see the ceremony; and a woman was taken up dead with a live child in her arms.” But Walpole, who took great pains to collect every particular, does not mention the demoniacal expression just noticed; nor does Volunteer Ray, who writes as if he had been on the spot.

leaders to emigrate to our American colonies, or to enlist in the army; and, by virtue of all these and other measures, and the slow but sure effects of time and custom, the strong remnant of the feudal system in Scotland was rent into pieces, and clanships and distinctive Highland customs were destroyed, with all, their evil and with all their good.

Badly as it had ended for the Stuarts and those engaged with them, the Scotch war of 1745 had been a most advantageous diversion for the French, who, while the English were intent upon putting it down, had been marching from conquest to conquest, and at the time when the battle of Culloden was fought were threatening Holland with annihilation. When the Duke of Cumberland came so hastily up to London from the North, it was with the hope of obtaining the supreme command of the allied armies in Flanders, and of measuring his sword with Marshal Saxe, who was commanding the armies of Louis XV.; but the duke found that that post had been given to Prince Charles of Lorraine, the Queen of Hungary's brother-in-law, without any notification to George. Both king and duke were greatly offended; and at the same time the English parliament took it into their heads that the Dutch were privately negotiating with France—a fact which, if true, would not have been unaccountable or very blamable, seeing how little able England had been to assist them. Cumberland had, therefore, staid at home to recommend severity against the Scots; and our military achievements abroad were this year confined to a paltry expedition to the coast of Brittany under the command of General St. Clair, Admiral Lestock, and a prostitute, old Lestock's mistress, who went with him in his ship, and who ruled and advised even in matters of war. The strange trio did not take Port L'Orient, but they plundered and burnt a few fishing villages, and returned home without much loss. Some troops, however, were sent back to Holland, and great conquests were spoken of, to be made at some future day over the French in Canada; and Sir John Ligonier and the English cavalry, though they could not prevent the defeat of the allies at the battle of Rocoux, on the Year, saved Prince Charles of Lorraine's army from destruction. Our foreign negotiations were as complicated and as unsatisfactory as our campaign was inglorious; but, fortunately, the French were greatly weakened by the death of Philip V. of Spain, which happened in the autumn of 1746, and by the great reverses they sustained in Italy, where the armies of Austria and Sardinia recovered Milan, Parma, and many other places, obtained a great victory over the French and Spaniards near Piacenza, and finally drove the forces of Louis XV. beyond the Alps. Ferdinand, the new king of Spain, entered into some separate negotiations with England, and arrangements were made for a congress at Breda to settle the terms of a general peace. But Frederick of Prussia refused his co-operation; and the ministers of Louis XV., dazzled by the brilliant successes they had obtained in the Low Countries—the capture of Brussels, the capture of Antwerp, &c.—were glad to continue the war.

The dissensions in the English cabinet continued on the increase. The discussion of them would occupy volumes, but the great present result was, that Pitt continued to rise—though by slow and uncertain steps—in power and influence; that Lord Harrington was succeeded as one of the secretaries of state by Lord Chesterfield, who had been for some time governing Ireland as lord-lieutenant, with rare ability and a most rare liberality; and that the Duke of Newcastle and his brother disagreed in many particulars.

The parliament had re-assembled on the 18th of November, when his majesty expressed his determination never to abandon his allies, and requested the Commons to make up the deficiency in his civil list, which, he said, had for several years fallen short of the amount contemplated by parliament. Though the rebellion was suppressed, and the chief rebels executed or driven to starve abroad, the peers unanimously passed a bill, introduced by Newcastle, for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act for three months longer. This bill was opposed in the Commons by the violent Tories and Jacobites, and apparently by none other, for it was finally carried by 143 to 34. Pitt continued paymaster of the forces, and Fox secretary at war; and it was their duty to announce, and to congratulate parliament on the fact, that his majesty had effected an annual saving of seventy thousand pounds by dismissing two troops of his life-guards and reducing three heavy cavalry regiments to dragoon regiments; and the Commons voted an address of thanks upon this great occasion. Now and then the feeble voice of opposition was heard to murmur that the nation was beggared and ruined; but the fact appears to be, that, in spite of the increased expenditure of the government, England was richer than she had ever been before, and that, notwithstanding the mistakes of those who governed them, the English people were advancing rapidly in wealth and civilization.

A. p. 1747.—The jealous prohibitions of parliament had stimulated public curiosity, and several periodical publications, without the fear of the House of Commons before their eyes, had for some time ventured to give sketches of the debates and proceedings of both Houses. The Gentleman's Magazine and the London Magazine published, in the month of March this year, an account of Lovat's trial, with Lord Chancellor Hardwicke's speeches on the occasion. The Lords instantly resented this as a flagrant breach of privilege, brought the poor printers to the bar on their knees, committed them to prison, and would not liberate them till they had abjectly expressed their contrition, promised to offend no more, and paid very heavy fees. These high-handed proceedings had an effect; the writers in magazines and other papers were frightened into silence, and the great body of the people were kept in the dark as to what was said or done in the Upper House. And, in fact, but for the notes taken to the notes left by Lord Hardwicke and one or two others who had seats in parliament, we should at this day know next to nothing of any debate in the Lords for some twenty or thirty years after this castigation of the two magazines. There were no wanting men in the Commons who would have been as severe as the Lords; and many members complained of being put into print "by low fellows;" but Pelham had the good sense and the good humour to observe, "Let them alone; they make better speeches for us than we can make for ourselves:"* and so the debates of the Commons continued to be given occasionally, but vaguely and badly reported, and always under fictitious names; for to have said that Mr. Pitt or Mr. Fox said such and such things in any given debate would have been a stretch of audacity beyond the boldness of even news-writers or news-makers in those days.

To quicken the Austrian sluggishness, 100,000*l.* were added to the Queen of Hungary's subsidy, and the session was terminated on the 17th of June, when his majesty intimated his intention of appealing to his people by a speedy dissolution and fresh election. Vast expectations were entertained of this year's campaign. Lord Sandwich, as ambassador to the States-General, had smoothed some difficulties, and the Duke of Cumberland repaired to Holland to take the chief command of the allied armies. Between Dutch, Flemish, Bavarians, Austrians, and English, nearly 100,000 men were collected, in the month of March, under our English prince, who, however, soon testified that he was not the general destined to vanquish Marshal Saxe. There were, it is true, many unfavourable circumstances: the allied army consisted of many unamalgamating parts, and the number of native British troops fell far short of what had been agreed upon; yet still it must remain indisputable that Cumberland, compared to Saxe, was as a bold dragoon to a consummate general. The latter, from his cantonments, intercepted the duke's provisions and supplies; and when he took the field it was to move to certain victory; for Cumberland had put his army into some of the worst positions that could have been chosen; and the allies were thoroughly beaten at Lauffeld, near Maastricht, on the 2nd of July, when the gallant Ligonier, with the British cavalry, again checked the advance of the French, and preserved the allies from destruction. But, generally, the fighting of the British troops, both horse and foot, was as good as Cumberland's generalship was bad. Each reached the extreme: While the Dutch in the centre gave way and fled, and the Austrians on the right would not or could not come into action at all, the British on the left stood the brunt and strewed the field with 10,000 Frenchmen before they retreated. Saxe himself afterwards confessed to Ligonier that his victory had cost him in killed and wounded 8000-foot, 1000 horse, and a great many officers. "The duke," says Walpole, "was very nearly taken, having, through his short sight, mistaken a body of French for his own people. He behaved as bravely as usual; but his prowess is so well established that it grows time for him to exert other qualities of a general. . . . A French officer said to an English private who had been made prisoner, 'Had there been 50,000 such men as you, we should have found it very difficult to conquer.' 'There were men enough like me,' was the reply; 'but we wanted one like Marshal Saxe.'" After this battle the French continued to take fortresses with wondrous facility till they sat down before the walls of Bergen-op-Zoom, where they lost a vast number of men, and where they must have failed entirely but for the indolence of the Dutch governor, an old man in his eighty-first year. With the surrender of this famous fortress the campaign in the Low Countries ended, and both armies went into winter quarters, the French triumphantly, the allies accusing one another and quarrelling. Nor was the war more favourable to the allies on the side of the Alps. Having driven the French out of Italy in the autumn of the preceding year, the Austrians and Sardinians, assisted by the British fleet, made an invasion of the South of France, and laid siege to Antibes; but they were soon compelled to retreat, were followed by the French, were forced to give up Genoa, and were so irritated by their many failures that they, too, began to quarrel among themselves. A second French force, however, commanded by the brother of Marshal Belleisle, was stopped in the narrow defiles of Savoy, as it was attempting to open its way to Susa and Turin, was defeated with great loss, and driven back without its brave commander, who was knocked on the head at the barricades of Exilles. But the English navy did something this summer. Admiral Anson fought a gallant battle off Cape Finisterre, took six ships of the line, several frigates, and the best part of a numerous French convoy; Admiral Hawke, off Belleisle, captured six ships of the line out of nine; Commodore Fox took forty French ships, richly laden from the West Indies; and other successes were obtained at sea in various parts of the world, from the Bay of Bengal to the British Channel. The French trade was completely paralysed, and great want, suffering, and dissension were the consequences. Thus, in spite of their successes under Marshal Saxe in the Low Countries, the cabinet of Versailles began to sigh for peace; and the more when they ascertained that Ferdinand VI., the new King of Spain, was determined to conclude a treaty with England with or without France. Mr. Pelham was equally anxious to treat; but his brother, the Duke of Newcastle, sided with the king and the Duke of Cumberland in recommending a continuation of hostilities. Pelham, however, stuck to his point, misti-

taining that either Frederick of Prussia must be secured as our ally or peace must be concluded on the best terms that could be procured, as we had absolutely nothing to hope from the weak, selfish, and divided allies with whom we were acting. Marshal Saxe made certain indirect overtures to the Duke of Cumberland, hoping that his royal highness would receive full powers to treat. Cumberland, as a fighting man, still preferred the chances of another campaign; but, if peace was to be made, he was desirous of having the honour of making it. The king was ready to gratify his favourite son; but the cabinet took fright; they had no notion of the duke's abilities as a diplomatist, and they prevailed upon George to consent that Lord Sandwich should go to head-quarters to assist his royal highness. After some very ingenious tricks on the part of the French, Sandwich proposed that matters should be referred to a congress to be held at Aix-la-Chapelle, and to this the Marquis de Puisieux assented. The able diplomatic pen of Lord Chesterfield was employed by Mr. Pelham in drawing up conditions and the outlines of a treaty; communications were made to our allies, the States-General, the King of Sardinia, and the empress-queen, who were invited to concur; and an active intercourse was set on foot between Paris and London. It soon appeared, however, that our allies, who had been making war at the expense of English money and English blood, were not over anxious for peace.* At the moment of danger the Dutch had chosen to appoint the Prince of Orange, who had married Anne, daughter of George II., their captain-general, admiral, and hereditary stadtholder, hoping that this William Charles Henry Friso would serve them as King William had done at a like crisis. And, though this Prince of Orange was ignorant of military affairs, he was anxious to signalise himself in war, and begged his father-in-law not to think of making peace until they had tried their fortunes in at least one more campaign; and the King of Sardinia and Maria Theresa were, upon other grounds, equally anxious for another throw of the dice, for the former wanted to swallow up the republic of Genoa, and the Austrian knew she would be required to make sacrifices in Italy to set up the Spanish infanta, Don Philip. But, as it happened that without the assistance and the subsidies of England these potentates were powerless, they, too, were obliged to entertain the propositions, and to agree to send ministers to the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle. The King of Prussia was kept quiet by the guarantee of Silesia, which was formally pledged to him by England and Holland.

The new parliament assembled on the 10th of November, soon after George's return from Hanover. The Prince of Wales, who was constantly smarting under the preference shown to his brother the Duke of Cumberland, and who was as inveterate against the Pelham administration as ever he had been against that of Sir Robert Walpole, had put the whole strength of his party into play at the late general election; but the returns, on the whole, were very favourable to the ministry. The opening speech from the throne passed lightly over our reverses in Flanders, but dwelt upon our naval victories and the mischief we had done to the navy and trade of France; it alluded to the arrangements making for a pacifying congress; but at the same time it called for powerful armaments and good supplies, as the only means of securing an honourable peace. Each House was as compliant as possible; the Commons voted above thirteen millions of money almost without opposition; and in the whole course of the session there was not a single division in the House of Lords against any ministerial proposal whatsoever. Yet there was a clause in their Lordships' address that was highly honourable to that House. In speaking of the best means of extinguishing the spirit of rebellion and anarchy in the North, Lord Chesterfield had recommended "schools and villages to civilise the Highlands;"* and the peers, in their address, declared that the diffusion of knowledge among the people would be the best safeguard of their loyalty and tranquillity. But it unfortunately was not deemed essential by either House, by cabinet or by country, to make any proper provision for national education; and, though ministers could raise loans of millions for the purposes of war, and could squander annually hundreds of thousands in court pensions, they could spare little or nothing for the greatest and most glorious of all national objects.

A. D. 1748.—The king closed this complacent session on the 13th of May, by announcing the cessation of hostilities and the recent signature of preliminaries of peace. But the cabinet had scarcely been so tranquil as the parliament, and it was growing every day more apparent that ministerial jealousy, selfishness, and intrigue were becoming more and more fierce and shameless as parliament became more moderate. The voice of faction ceased, the great struggles of parties on broad and opposite principles of government terminated, and were succeeded by private personal contests for power and place, almost without any of the old distinctions of Whig and Tory. The Duke of Newcastle, alarmed at Chesterfield's successes as a diplomatist, and still more at an intimacy which that accomplished and intriguing lord had formed with the king's mistress, the German Lady Yarmouth, resolved to get rid of him at all costs; and Newcastle retained influence enough with the king, who disliked Chesterfield for what he considered his too great eagerness for peace, to make the court so uncomfortable a place for him that his lordship resigned on the 6th of February. Then there was a fresh cabal to decide who should succeed Chesterfield as secretary of state. The Duke of Newcastle wanted to bring in his friend Lord Sandwich—a very convenient kind of political jobber, whose private morality and public honesty were pretty nearly on a par. Fox, still secretary-at-war, says, in a humorous letter, “Lord Sandwich was the man his grace of Newcastle intended. . . . The Duke of Newcastle, who, I think, never could mean to make the Duke of Bedford his colleague, thought of making him a shoeing-horn to Lord Sandwich: he talked of the Duke of Bedford for the place; and then said, he was sure his grace would expect it, and would acquiesce in nobody but our friend Lord Sandwich. He was right in the first; but as to the last, the Duke of Bedford meant Sandwich only in the second place, and himself in the first, which I think might easily have been foreseen; and, though his grace of Bedford says he takes it only for six months, nobody who knows him and the king thinks Sandwich has a better chance for his nomination six months hence, than he had now.”* The Duke of Bedford thus became joint-secretary of state with Newcastle, who, in six days, became as jealous of him as he had been of Chesterfield. By a sudden handy-dandy trick Newcastle changed his province and took the secretaryship which was more immediately concerned with foreign affairs, leaving home concerns to Bedford. All this occurred before the preliminaries were signed; and for some weeks Newcastle paid his court to the king and the Duke of Cumberland, by maintaining a very warlike tone.† Lord Sandwich was soothed by his appointment to be first lord of the admiralty; and John Stanhope, the resigning and retiring Lord Chesterfield’s youngest brother, was, at Chesterfield’s own prayer, put at the board of admiralty under Sandwich. In the mean while Mr. Pitt continued to rise in consideration, and as we suspect, began to discover, through the chasms caused by the frequent disagreements between Mr. Pelham and his brother the Duke of Newcastle, a rough and tortuous road for himself to the ministerial pinnacle. He was consulted by both the brothers and put in the always tempting position of an arbiter or mediator in their cabinet quarrels. Some months after this we find Pelham writing to his brother the Duke—“I have had a long discourse with Pitt. He seems mighty happy with an opinion, that his interposition and his truly friendly offices have had a good effect in bringing you and me nearer to one another. I let him think so; it may probably keep him nearer to us both; but I would not have you think so, for I should be sorry that it was your opinion that the interposition of any one, especially of so new an acquaintance, could influence me in your cause more than my own reason or natural affection for you would do. However, I most sincerely desire you to go on in your correspondence with him, with all the frankness and cordiality you can; I do so in all my conversations with him; I think him besides the most able and useful man we have amongst us; truly honourable and strictly honest. He is as firm a friend to us as we can wish for; and a more useful one there does not exist.”* We shall see more of Pitt’s frankness, true honour, and strict honesty hereafter; but it is to be noticed that even at this moment some of his contemporaries would not give him credit for these qualities. In the course of the last session Sir William Stanhope had fallen most violently upon the “Cobhamites” and the “Cousinhood,” and had pointed out Pitt as one likely to revel on the spoils of Pelham and Newcastle. Stanhope described the Cobhams and their family connexions as men who coloured over ambition with patriotism and disgraced every virtue by wearing it only for mercenary purposes—as men who, from being the most clamorous incendiaries against power and peace, had become actually possessed of more employments than the most comprehensive place-bill could possibly include—as a family who had raised themselves from obscurity by the petulance of the times and the timidity of the two ministers. “The elder ones,” cried Stanhope, “already riot in the spoils of their treachery, and the younger”——. Here Stanhope was called to order; but before he sat down he said that he hoped the House would have more spirit than submit to be made tools of this faction, agents of their jobs, instruments of their malice, and dupes of their self-interested politics. Pitt rose and replied to this irritable man with as much irritability, calling Sir William Stanhope’s assertions false assertions, scandalous inventions, scurrilous abuse, and so forth.† Pitt, however, persevered in the look-out for better things, and supported, in the mean while, every ministerial measure, however opposite it might be to the principles he had formerly proclaimed when in opposition and engaged in hunting down Sir Robert Walpole. All this, added to his hot and unguarded expressions in parliament, his towering pride, and cold repelling manners, made him exceedingly unpopular both with parliament and people. One who had been his ardent admirer and his close ally says, that he sunk to a level with Pulteney when he became Earl of Bath.‡ But Pitt remained in the Commons, and by powers of oratory infinitely superior to those of Pulteney in his best days, he soon rose buoyant from this state of depression and forced those who never could love the man to fear and respect the orator.

The congress of Aix-la-Chapelle had assembled early in the spring, and the conferences were opened on the 11th of March; but it was not until Marshal Saxe had invested several places, the Prince of Orange had failed in his warlike engagements, and thirty thousand Russians, subsidised by England, had proved that they could not come up in time to be of any service, that the notion of the renewal of the war was really given up, and that George consented to sign the preliminaries; and even after this he put the peace in jeopardy by insisting upon little advantages for his family, such as the reversion of the bishopric of Osnaburg, &c. But while the king went to Hanover his minister at Aix-la-Chapelle continued to attend the congress, which came to a final settlement after numerous delays and difficulties in the month of October, upon the principle of the status quo ante bellum, with some exceptions. In other words, after a long and bloody war, every one was to keep what he had before the war began, and (save the exceptions) to get no more. The arrangement was most imperfect, and many clauses of the treaty were conceived in such loose terms as to allow of double or treble interpretations, and to furnish grounds for new disputes and fresh wars as soon as either party should consider itself ready to take the field. The King of Prussia was guaranteed in the duchy of Silesia and the county of Glatz; the Queen of Spain's second son, Don Philip, obtained Parma, Piacenza, and Guastalla; the King of Sardinia had some trifling conquests confirmed to him; but England not only gave back all she had taken, but submitted to the indignity of sending two noble hostages to France—the Earl of Sussex and Lord Cathcart—to ensure to Louis the restitution of our recent conquest, Cape Breton. The original causes of the war on our part seemed to be wholly forgotten, and yet Pitt, who had so materially helped to drive on the war against the inclination of Sir Robert Walpole, and who had grazed a hundred harangues with the declaration that peace ought never to be made with Spain until that power renounced the right of search, continued to act with and to be part of a ministry that hurried on the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and after that, began and concluded a separate Spanish treaty, without once mentioning this odious right, which, therefore, as far as diplomacy was concerned, was left on its old footing. Nor did the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle contain any satisfaction of the commercial claims England had upon Spain, nor did it in any degree throw open the Spanish main to our trade and shipping; it did nothing^{} commercially, but revive for four years the asiento, or our odious privilege of supplying Spanish America with African slaves. Old Walpole might have turned himself in his grave, and, after a groan for the blood and treasure which had been thrown away, might have smiled in pity or contempt at these doings of his successors. But by this time Pitt was professing a veneration for Walpole's ashes, and taking frequent occasion of eulogising the wisdom of that great minister, and of excusing his former petulance and opposition to him on the score of his youth; and when he was attacked in parliament for justifying ministers about that essential point, he coolly declared that the British claim of no search could never be conceded by Spain,—that he had, indeed, at one time thought otherwise, but now he was ten years older, and had considered public affairs more deliberately.*

By an article in the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, Louis XV. bound himself to give up the cause of the Pretender and exclude the Stuarts from France. On the return of the young Pretender from Scotland Louis XV. had behaved to him with considerable liberality, supplying him with money for his own necessities, and giving commissions in the French army or pensions to the bravest of his Scotch followers—as Lochiel, Lord Ogilvie, and others; but at the same time Louis absolutely refused to supply him with men, money, and materials of war for another invasion of Scotland. Thereupon Charles turned his eyes in other directions; and early in 1747, unknown to, and against the inclinations of, the French court, he stole across the Pyrennees and went to Madrid to solicit aid from the impoverished Spaniards and their timid and pacific new king, Ferdinand VI. On his arrival he saw, in private, Carvajal, the prime minister, who at midnight introduced him to the king and queen, who, according to Charles's own account, showed him a great many civilities, but, at the same time, desired him to go back to France as soon as possible; and when he asked the king leave to see the queen-dowager and the rest of the Royal family, his majesty answered there was no need for it.† He attempted to draw the indolent and cautious Ferdinand into discussions of the war and of his business; but Ferdinand referred him to his minister and bowed him out. "I found by that," says the Chevalier, "that he had got his lesson, and was a weak man, just put in motion like a clockwork." At the door of the royal apartment he encountered Farinelli, the Neapolitan musicò, decorated like a duke, and wearing the cross of Calatrava; for the emaculated warbler had fascinated both king and queen, and was in reality more their prime minister than Carvajal or any one else. "He took me by the hand with effrontery," says Charles. "I first thought, as with reason; it was some grandee or captain of the guards that had seen me in Italy, and was never so much surprised as when he

* "This," says Horace Walpole, with more truth than always accompanies his diatribes, "was the conclusion of the Spanish war I contemplated, to overturn Sir Robert Walpole, by Lord Granville, who had neglected it for a French war; by Lord Sandwich, who made a peace that stipulated for no one of the conditions for which it was undertaken; by Pitt, who ridiculed and condemned his own orations for it, and who declared for a peace on any terms; and by the Duke of Newcastle, who betrayed all the claims of the merchants and the South Sea Company."—Memoirs of the last Ten Years of the Reign of George II.

* From letters in the recently published correspondence of Pitt, Earl of Chatham. It appears that, before making this last speech, he had consulted old Horace Walpole (the brother of Sir Robert), who had formerly twitted him with his youth and inexperience; and it appears at least probable that old Horace himself prompted this speech.—See also an article on the life of Chatham, in the Quarterly Review, No. 131.

named himself." On leaving the musico he went to the minister, who pressed him ardently "to go out of the town of Madrid and away immediately." Charles begged for a little delay—for a little time to rest, and explain and settle things; but Carvajal assured him that it was absolutely necessary to do the king this pleasure and quit Madrid the next day; and this Charles was obliged to do.* He went back to France with the intention to keep himself absolutely in private till the season should be favourable for another attempt; to leave no stone unturned, and to trust to Providence for the rest.† It appears, however, that as early as this he had begun to give himself up to that hard drinking and debauchery which stupified the little wit he had ever possessed, and disgraced all the latter part of his life. He had chosen for his confessor and boon companion an Irish cordelier, named Kelly, who drank even more than Irish cordeliers in general, and who was said at one and the same time to govern his conscience and regulate his diversions; so that his royal highness's character in point of sobriety was a little blemished on this friar's account.‡ In the mean while Charles's younger brother, styled the Duke of York, who had come into France, and who, during the civil war, had been expected to land in Scotland, had given up all thoughts of English crowns and principalities, and, unknown to his brother, had quitted Paris, and gone back to Rome to enter the church. One very prominent circumstance in their history is, that these members of the House of Stuart were always masking their intentions and deceiving one another. When Charles was expecting no such thing, he received at Paris a letter from his father, dated Albano, June 13, and importing that his brother would be made a cardinal the first day of next month! The whole proceeding, and the entire letter, was singularly characteristic of the old Pretender. "Naturally speaking," says he, "you should have been consulted about a resolution of that kind before it had been executed; but as the duke your brother and I were unalterably determined on the matter, and that we foresaw you might probably not approve of it, we thought it would be showing you more regard, and that it would be even more agreeable to you, that the thing should be done before your answer could come here, and to have it in your power to say it was done without your knowledge and approbation. It is very true I did not expect to see the duke here so soon, and that his tenderness and affection for me prompted him to undertake that journey; but, after I had seen him, I soon found his chief motive—for it was to discourse with me fully and freely on the vocation he had long had to embrace an ecclesiastical state, and which he had so long concealed from me and kept to himself, with a view, no doubt, of having it in his power of being of some use to you in the late conjunctures. But the case is now altered; and, as I am fully convinced of the sincerity and solidity of his vocation, I should think it a resisting the will of God, and acting directly against my conscience, if I should pretend to constrain him in a matter which so nearly concerns him." After mentioning the sin of forcing people's conscience in matters of religion, and professing a toleration which he was too superstitious a man to feel, James confesses that motives of conscience and equity had not alone determined him in this particular, and that if the Duke of York had not had the vocation in himself, he, as his father, should still have used his best endeavours and all arguments to have induced him to embrace the state and condition of a Catholic priest, as the best means of securing to him that tranquillity and happiness which he felt it was impossible for him to enjoy in any other state. He assures Charles that his brother could never possibly have been of any use to him by remaining in the world; and then adds—"But let us look forward, and not backward; the resolution is taken, and will be executed before your answer can come here. If you think proper to say you were ignorant of it, and do not approve it, I shall not take it amiss of you; but for God's sake let not a step, which naturally should secure peace and union amongst us for the rest of our days, become a subject of scandal and éclat, which would fall heavier upon you than upon us in our present situation, and which a filial and brotherly conduct in you will easily prevent. Your silence towards your brother, and what you write to me about him since he left Paris, would do you little honour if they were known, and are mortifications your brother did not deserve, but which cannot alter his sentiments towards you."* But, unmoved by this letter, Charles did make the business a matter of scandal and éclat: he and his friends declared that the making young York a cardinal was of much worse consequence to the cause than even the battle of Culloden: he broke off all correspondence with his brother, and from that time forward scarcely treated his father with common filial decency. A few months after his brother had taken holy orders, and become a prince of the Roman church, a member of the conclave, with a chance of becoming pope himself, Charles endeavoured to marry a Protestant princess, and to strike up an alliance with Frederick of Prussia, who entertained an equal contempt for all religions or modes of faith. He sent Sir John Graham to Berlin with his instructions to propose, "in a modest manner," a marriage with one of the Prussian princesses—Frederick's sisters or nieces—for that great captain had no children, and was not likely to have any; to declare that he never intended to marry any other than a Protestant; and, if his majesty should decline his alliance, "to ask advice whom to take, as he was known to be the wisest prince in Europe." But this unpromising mission came to nothing, though Frederick, when it suited his purpose, continued to profess a friendship for Charles, who, seven months after this proposal, was driven out of France. There were many circumstances in his conduct likely to irritate Louis XV.; and the English government at the same time urged his most Christian majesty to observe the recent treaty. He, however, would have treated the Chevalier mildly and generously; but Charles would not listen to his proposals, and refused to leave Paris when entreated so to do. The French court begged the old Pretender to make use of his authority, but Charles set at nought his father's letter and still refused to go: nothing, therefore, was left but force. On the evening of the 11th of December, as he was going to the opera his coach was stopped by a company of the French guards, who seized him, bound him hand and foot—for he had arms about his person, and threatened to use them—and carried him with a single attendant to the castle of Vincennes, where, according to his own account, he was most rudely treated, and thrust into a dungeon. But he did not lie there long, for in a few days he was conveyed to the frontier of Savoy, and there left to go whither he might choose. For some time he disappeared altogether from the eyes of the world, and, bearing many names and many disguises, he continued a dissipated wanderer till the year 1766, when his father died, and he returned to Rome to seek a reconciliation with his brother, the cardinal. During this strange vagabond life he came, at least once, into England. It is certain that he visited London in the year 1754, and it has been affirmed that he was here again in 1760, and was actually present at the coronation of George III.

‡ Letter from Paris to Murray, Lord Dunbar, the old Pretender's minister at Rome, in Stuart Papers. It appears, from this curious letter, that the Irish monk was distributing satires directed against the old Pretender and his friends at Rome, and was in the habit of saying that James was a fool, and Murray a traitor. "It were to be wished," says the writer of the letter, "that his royal highness would forbid that friar his apartment, because he passes for a notorious drunkard. The opinion prevails here that the cordeliers in general are great drinkers, yet even among them this Kelly is infamous for his excesses; in fine, the wine of the prince's table is termed Friar Kelly's wine."

* Stuart Papers, in Lord Mahon's Appendix.—Several parts of the letter are touching, and excite a sympathy for the old Pretender at the expense of the young one, who before this great breach had been accustomed to browbeat and bully his weak, helpless father. "You must be sensible," says James, "that on many occasions I have had reason to complain of you, and that I have acted for this long while towards you more like a son than a father. But I can assure you, my dear child, nothing of all that sticks with me, and I forgive you the more sincerely and cordially all the trouble you have given me, that I am persuaded it was not your intention to fall towards me, and that I shall have reason to be pleased with you for the time to come, since all I request of you hereafter is your personal love and affection for me and your brother. Those who may have had their own views in endeavouring to remove us from your affairs have compassed their end. We are satisfied, and you remain master; so that I see no hope of contention remaining, nor any possible obstacle to a perfect peace and union amongst us for the future. God bless my dearest Carluect, whom I tenderly embrace. I am all yours."

A. D. 1749.—The public rejoicing for the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle was soon succeeded by loud complaints that ministers had sacrificed the interest and honour of England; but the overbearing eloquence of Pitt kept the House of Commons in order, and the feeble voice of opposition in parliament was almost hushed. This fiery patriot of former days seems to have stuck at nothing that was recommended by the court. When the Pelhams and Sandwiches, as if ashamed of their own work, preserved a silence about the recent treaty, Pitt stood forward and defended it as one of the best treaties that had ever been made; and when the king, the Duke of Cumberland, and ministers wanted to extend the operation and increase the severity of the Mutiny Bill, Pitt was there to advocate the measure and to carry it by a large majority. A clause was introduced subjecting military officers on half-pay to martial law, and it was enacted that all members of a court-martial should be bound by oath not to disclose any of its proceedings unless required so to do by act of parliament. Admiral Byng, who was so soon to feel the sting of this martial law, voted for it. As for Pitt he proclaimed in the course of the debate that martial law must be made comprehensive and severe, that the crown must have more authority over the army and navy—"that the existence of English liberty depended on the moderation of the sovereign, and the virtue of the army"—"that, without these virtues, should the Lords, the Commons, and the people of England entrench themselves behind parchment up to the teeth, the sword will find a passage to the vitals of the constitution." In the course of this session he mentioned repeatedly his great fear of Jacobitism and his dread of popular innovation, and declared that he was determined to lead his political life with the present ministry. Mr. Hampden ventured to criticise his inconsistency, to bewail the mischief which rhetoric had brought upon the nation, and to allude to the effects which place and public money had wrought upon the orator; but Pitt made him feel that he was indeed an orator, and that the House of Commons was not yet rhetoric-proof—he crushed Hampden under a mountain of words and led the House as before. Hampden would have resented his personalities by an appeal to arms, but the speaker interfered. Of the two brothers that divided the chief authority of government between them, Mr. Pelham, first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer, was incomparably the superior in point of ability, being in fact thoroughly a man of business and one of the best financiers and managers of an office; and yet Pitt, the arbiter of their quarrels, generally sided not with Pelham but with Newcastle. It has, indeed, been suspected that he had an eye to Pelham's place of chancellor, and thought that the Duke of Newcastle would be glad to have him in that office instead of his brother, and make him his leader in the House of Commons. In this very session while Pelham was carrying a rigorous reduction of the army and navy, and trying to relieve the country by reducing the interest of the national debt, he more than once found himself opposed by Pitt. The army, however, was reduced to 19,000 men and the navy to 8000, and Pelham succeeded in reducing the four per cents.

to three and a half for seven years, after which they were to be farther reduced to three.

A. D. 1750.—During the session several bills were passed for the encouragement of our trade, and for the establishment of fisheries which might compete with those of the Dutch; and not perceiving how useless are such regulations and restrictions, parliament made a law prohibiting the abduction of British artificers into foreign states, and the export of implements used in the British woollen and silk manufactures. Some considerable attention was also paid to the subject of internal communication, and sundry bills were passed for the formation of new roads and for the improvement of the city of London. With the return of peace the intelligence, capital, and spirit of the nation were turned in these directions, and the effect was soon seen in many admirable works. The session was closed on the 12th of April when the king spoke of the sincere disposition manifested by foreign powers to maintain the peace of Europe—a piece of state insincerity; for his majesty must have known at the time that several of those powers were taking the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle to pieces, and were looking out for early opportunities of renewing the war. George then prepared to go as usual to Hanover, and the government was vested as usual in a regency of Lords Justices. The king's back was scarcely turned when fresh dissensions broke out in the cabinet, for the Duke of Newcastle was anxious to liberate himself from his intractable colleague the Duke of Bedford, who, by means of Lord and Lady Sandwich, had secured the favour and protection of the Duke of Cumberland and his sister the Princess Amelia, who had taken offence at Newcastle's paying too much court to Lady Yarmouth. But worse followed; the king's mistress had far more influence over him than his daughter Amelia, and the Duke of Newcastle found to his great surprise that Lady Yarmouth was of opinion that it would not be safe or prudent to dismiss the Duke of Bedford, because he was a man of great consequence, and because it would make the king uneasy. The plain truth was, Lord and Lady Sandwich, who had no previous acquaintance with Lady Yarmouth, had formed a sudden intimacy with the mistress, and filled her ear with reasons or arguments for keeping Bedford in his place in spite of his jealous colleague.

In the course of the summer a strong British colony was settled in Nova Scotia, and the troops withdrawn from Cape Breton were sent to its support. The town of Halifax, fortified with a palisade, began to rise in the waste, and, as reduced officers and soldiers continued to flock to that part of America, Nova Scotia soon became a very important colony, to the great mortification of France, which pretended that such an establishment was an infraction of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. Nearly at the same time some bodies of English and Scotch began to settle on the Mosquito coast, in the gulph of Mexico, and this caused equal or greater irritation to the court of Spain. A French ambassador at Madrid worked upon this discontent with the view of inducing Ferdinand VI. to join in a new war against England; but the Spanish king was exceedingly pacific; his consort Barbara, a Portuguese princess, was strongly attached to the English; and our envoy Mr. Keene, one of the best negotiators of the day, and one that knew Spain and the Spanish character thoroughly, succeeded in concluding a commercial treaty with the court of Madrid. By this treaty, which was signed on the 5th of October, 1750, the British were restored to various privileges and put on the footing of the most favoured nations; we renounced the remaining term of the Assiento Treaty, and obtained 100,000*l.* to compensate the claims of our South Sea Company; but not a word was said about the right of search! The Spaniards in the new world, when strong enough, insisted on the right; and the English, when strong enough, set them at defiance. Hence there was a perennial well-spring of quarrel and ill blood, and it was pretty constantly supplied with strong under-currents occasioned by our seamen, who did not respect treaties sufficiently to give up the profitable occupation of cutting logwood in Campeachy Bay and smuggling on the Spanish main; nor was it ever in the power of the British government wholly to suppress these irregularities. At the same time Maria Theresa, dissatisfied with the terms she had procured, and unmindful of her former and vast obligations to England, was making overtures both to France and Spain, and taking every opportunity of showing her animosity to the court of St. James's. We avoid entering into the complicated intrigues which were carrying on in Germany, where princes who had been subsidised by England as yesterday were ready to take the pay of the best bidder as to-morrow, and where Frederic of Prussia was determined to carve for himself with the sword. George was naturally solicitous and anxious about Hanover; but, where so many other fruitful causes of quarrel existed—in America, in both Indies, on the African coast, in the Mediterranean, about Gibraltar and Minorca, it was a vulgar falsehood—though at times a popular one—to say that the king's affection for his hereditary dominions was the sole cause that was leading us fast to another waste of blood and money. The French at this very moment were advancing claims to a part of Nova Scotia, and were refusing to give up the islands of St. Lucia and St. Vincent, which they were bound by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle to evacuate. While the king was at Hanover, whither Newcastle had accompanied him, he began to complain of the silence of the Duke of Bedford, who hardly ever wrote to him, and to say that he had an easy office of it—that he received his pay without doing any work. In effect Newcastle had taken the principal management of foreign affairs into his own hands, and had excluded his colleague as much as possible from all other affairs; and Bedford, irritated at being thus reduced to a cypher, neglected the little he had to do, and seldom or ever put his hand to a dispatch. He is described as a proud, resentful man; but if his pride had been of the right kind he would have resigned at once, and would not have continued to take five thousand a-year for doing nothing. At length the king made up his mind to remove Bedford from the office of secretary of state; but sundry difficulties were started by Lady Yarmouth, and it was feared that the Duke would not be satisfied with the post of master of the horse, which was vacant by the death of the Duke of Richmond, and which George thought of offering to Bedford. These things are tiresome to write and most tedious to read, but the business of three nations was delayed and perplexed by them, and it is necessary to have some notion of what forms the materials of a large part of the history of this reign.

The king returned and found Mr. Pelham greatly embarrassed as to the direction of the House of Commons, and anxious to reconcile his friend Bedford and his brother Newcastle. Pitt continued to court the favour of Newcastle, but Lord Cobham and Pitt's nearest friends and relations were labouring to aggravate the dissensions in the cabinet, and were secretly caballing with the Prince of Wales, who, for some time past, had been in close connexion with Bolingbroke and the factious men that frequented his lordship's house at Battersea. The prince's chief manager was Bubb Dodington, who, upon a careful calculation of interests and chances, had thought it advisable to relinquish the treasurer-ship of the navy and resume a place in the prince's household. Most of the speeches in opposition to government were concocted either at Leicester House, the residence of the Prince of Wales, or at Lord Bolingbroke's at Battersea. Fox, who never travelled in the same path with Pitt, continued to attach himself to the Duke of Bedford and Mr. Pelham.* Bedford, it appears, would now have resigned his secretaryship and taken the mastership of the horse; but upon the unpalatable condition that he should be allowed to name Lord Sandwich for his successor. According to Horace Walpole, Sandwich had first worked himself into the affections of the Duke of Bedford "by intrigues, cricket-matches, and acting plays." The only important change which immediately followed his majesty's arrival from Hanover, was the sudden and uncourteous removal of Lord Har-

A. D. 1751.—Parliament met on the 17th of January, when the king announced that he had concluded a treaty with the Elector of Bavaria for the better security of peace on the continent. The effect of recent deliberations at Battersea and Leicester House was made evident at once. Lord Egmont, one of the Prince of Wales's men and a fluent speaker, opposed the address on the ground that it approved of useless treaties and ruinous subsidies (for, as a matter of course, Bavaria was to be subsidised); and he was followed by Bubb Dodington, Dr. Lee, and others of that party; but the address was carried by a majority of 203 to 74. In the course of the morning on which parliament met great numbers of inflammatory papers were dispersed through London by the Penny Post, and by being dropt secretly into the areas of houses. The chief of these papers was entitled "Constitutional Queries," and was levelled at the Duke of Cumberland, whose defeats in Flanders had sadly overshadowed his victory at Culloden, and whose unpopularity was now extreme and extended even to the army, which he had disgraced with his severity and his martinet notions of discipline. In these queries the duke was compared to "John of Lancaster and crook-backed Richard." As it was a great measure of the Prince of Wales's opposition to attack his brother, the Jacobites bore but half the suspicion of being authors of this libel, which was indeed generally ascribed to the pen of Lord Egmont.* On the 22nd of January the Duke of Marlborough with great heat moved in the House of Lords that the Constitutional Queries should be burned by the common hangman. The motion easily passed there, but it gave rise to some unpleasant debates in the Commons. Sir Francis Dashwood thought that some of the charges in the Queries were not unfounded, particularly the complaints about the dismissal of old officers and the substitution of new men who had no stake in the country and no character to lose. Colonel Richard Littleton insisted that the Duke of Cumberland had employed troops very improperly in and about London, without regard to municipal privileges and regulations. Lord Egmont, the suspected author of the paper, made "an extremely fine and artful speech." Among other things his lordship said that he disliked such methods of proceeding against libels for two reasons;—he did not approve of parliament taking the business of the law upon itself, and he knew that such motions only tended to spread the libel the more. But he owned that

* Writing in the month of November the caustic Horace Walpole says, "The ministry is all in shatters The ground of all, besides Newcastle's natural fickleness and jealousy, is that the Bedford and Sandwich have got the Duke of Cumberland. A crash has been expected, but people now seem to think that they will rub on a little longer, though all the world seems indifferent whether they will or not. . . . The only difficulty is, who shall succeed them; and it is even a question whether some of the old discarded must not cross over and figure again. I mean it has been even said, that Lord Granville will once more be brought upon the stage. If he should, and should push too forward, could they again persuade people to resign with them? The other nominees for the secretaryship are Pitt, the Vienna Sir Thomas Robinson, and even that formal piece of dullness at the Hague, Lord Holderness."—Letter to H. Mann.

* Horace Walpole's Memoirs of George II.—The imputations conveyed in the queries were, that Cumberland had disgraced or dismissed old officers, men of family and property, to make way for slaves, boys, and beggars—that he had acquired an absolute power over the army, and was endeavouring by a factions connexion to make himself master of the fleet—that he had shown in Scotland that an army might usurp a dominion over law—that the omnipotence of a commander joined with the faction, stupidity, and corruption of the times, might be able to stifle and baffle all regular proof of notorious acts of arbitrary power, &c.—and that the right of succession was in danger from him.

no censure could be too severe upon a paper which was calculated to sow division between two brothers of the blood royal, where he hoped there was no such thing! In the end the resolution of the Lords was agreed to nemine contradicente—the Queries were burned by the hangman, and an address was presented to the king requesting his majesty to take effectual means to discover the author, printers, and publishers of the Queries.

The next matter of interest arose out of a petition from several of the electors of Westminster against the return of Lord Trentham, son of Lord Gower, who, by means of the high bailiff, "had attempted to violate the maiden and uncorrupted city of Westminster." Crowle, a lawyer, was brought to the bar of the House, charged with having spoken disrespectfully of their privileges, and with having called their anger a brutum fulmen; but he avoided further persecution by submitting to the word of command, and falling down on his knees to hear the speaker's reprimand. But, being a wit and a punster, Crowle took his revenge by saying, as he rose from the ground and wiped his knees, "This is the dirtiest house I have ever been in." The high bailiff was brought to the bar of the House, and so was Mr. Alexander Murray, a Scotch Tory, and brother of Lord Elibank, whom the bailiff charged with threatening his life during the heat of the election. Murray desired counsel, and was allowed a respite; but Gibson, a Tory electioneering upholsterer, was sent straight to Newgate. After five days Mr. Murray appeared again at the bar, and the high bailiff produced eight witnesses to prove that he had been guilty of menaces and seditious behaviour during the election, in order to make people vote for Sir George Vandeput, the Jacobite opponent of Lord Trentham. Murray, who had smiled on hearing himself taxed with calling Lord Trentham and the high bailiff a couple of rascals, said that several of the things alleged against him were true, and that he was ashamed of nothing he was accused of having said, but calling Lord Trentham a rogue to a chimney-sweeper, which was below him to have done. At twelve o'clock at night it was carried by a majority of 210 to 74 that Murray was guilty. It was then moved that he should be sent close prisoner to Newgate. Sir John Cotton divided on the word close, but he found himself in a minority of only 52 to 169. Colonel Littleton and Lord Coke, not satisfied with the close confinement in what was then a most unhealthy and pestiferous prison, moved that Murray should be brought to the bar on his knees; and, this being carried by 163 to 40, the proud Jacobite Scot was called in. As he advanced to the bar the speaker called out "Your obeisances! Sir, your obeisances!" and then—"Sir, you must kneel." He replied, "Sir, I beg to be excused; I never kneel but to God." The speaker repeated the command with great warmth. Murray replied, "Sir, I am sorry I cannot comply with your request; I would in anything else." The speaker cried, "Sir, I call upon you again to consider of it." Murray answered, "Sir, when I have committed a crime, I kneel to God for pardon; but I know my own innocence, and cannot kneel to anybody else." The speaker ordered the serjeant to take him away and secure him. He was going to reply; the speaker would not suffer him.* The speaker then said that there would be an end of the dignity and power of the House if such contemptuous behaviour were allowed to pass without the severest punishment. Mr. Harding quoted three precedents where members had received their sentence on their knees. Mr. Fox so far lost his constitutional good nature as to speak of a horrible dungeon in the Tower, called "Little Ease." Sir William Yonge suggested that the close confinement in Newgate would not now be enough, unless he were debarred the visits of friends and the use of pen, ink, and paper. Pitt hinted at a bill to be passed against him if he would not comply and come to his knees; but Pelham declared against over severity, and mildly proposed a committee to search for precedents, and Admiral Vernon made an outrageous speech against the whole proceedings, desiring to have Magna Charta referred to, and going such lengths that he was several times called to order by the speaker, and was on the brink of falling under the sentence of the House himself. Mr. Coke went out and tried to persuade Murray to submit, but Murray swore that he would rather cut his throat. The speaker himself proposed the question on Murray's contempt, which being carried and inserted in the votes, the House broke up at two o'clock; and at five in the morning Murray was carried in a hackney-coach, strictly guarded, to Newgate, which was crammed with prisoners, and had been only a few months before visited by a malignant gaol-fever. Horace Walpole jests at the captivity, but, in sober truth, a close confinement in such a prison at such a time was no joke; and the illness with which Murray was visited almost immediately after his committal may very well have been not a fiction, but a reality. In a recent session at the Old Bailey the gaol fever had caused the death of more than twenty individuals; and what was strong enough to kill judges, undersheriffs, criminal lawyers, and aldermen of the city of London, might surely be strong enough to make the brother of a Scotch lord fall sick. Murray, indeed, said he was very ill, and must have a physician; and the House in two days permitted Lord Elibank to visit him with a physician and an apothecary; and, in five days more, grew so tender

* Westminster had been hotly contested at the last election, and a scrutiny upon the return had lasted five months in the preceding year. Lord Trentham, who had accepted office under the present ministry (he had a seat at the board of admiralty, and kept it as long as the Duke of Bedford remained in office), was detected by the Jacobites, on account of his father, Lord Gower, who had abandoned their party. Lord Egmont had set up a Jacobite to oppose Trentham, and then got up the petition to show that violence and unfair means had been employed by Trentham's friends.

as to indulge him with the company of his sister, a nurse, and his own servant. Notwithstanding his taint of Jacobitism, the prisoner was commiserated and the conduct of the House of Commons was condemned as harsh and arbitrary. Another paper, entitled "New Queries," or "Queries offered to the serious consideration of every true Englishman," was printed and circulated; but, though this paper stated that in the case of Mr. Murray the House of Commons had assumed a power they had no right to, had proceeded against him in an unconstitutional, unprecedented manner, and had brought a lasting dishonour upon the British parliament, they did not choose to take any notice of it. Walpole, continuing his jests, says that the Commons were not eager to have more prisoners to nurse! On the next day Gibson, the upholsterer, applied from his cell in Newgate for his enlargement, making use of penitent and submissive expressions. He was ordered to attend on the morrow, when he was reprimanded on his knees and discharged. On the 18th of February, ten days after Murray's committal, Sir William Yonge read the report of the committee appointed to search for precedents bearing on his case. This report was ordered to lie on the table, and Sir William moved that, if Murray should not submit this session, the consideration of his case should be resumed in the next. Mr. Pelham still recommended moderate proceedings. Mr. Fox complained that Murray had been allowed pen, ink, and paper, and had been writing an apology for some part of his conduct, and then moved that the physician and apothecary should attend that day se'night with an account of Mr. Murray's state of health, which was agreed to. At the appointed time Dr. Lamont was called in and asked several questions. The doctor affirmed that Mr. Murray was, indeed, suffering from fever, and had been so bad from a cramp in his stomach, to which he had been subject these seven years, that it was expected he would have died; that he (the doctor) thought close confinement, without riding, dangerous for him; that he had advised Mr. Murray to petition the House for his liberty, and that Mr. Murray had replied in a passion, he would take his prescriptions, but not his counsel. Sir William Yonge then moved to restrain everybody except the physician, apothecary, and nurse from visiting the prisoner; and after a hot debate this was agreed to by a majority of two to one. But, on the 2nd of April, when Murray had been nearly two months in Newgate, it was moved and carried, in a very thin House, that he should be transferred to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms, on account of his bad health, and that the speaker should give permission to whomsoever he thought proper to visit him. In fact, by this time, Lamont, the physician, had represented to the House that Murray had caught the gaol distemper! On the following day the deputy sergeant-at-arms reported to the House that Dr. Lamont had told him that the prisoner could not then be removed from Newgate, or bear the motion of a carriage, without danger; and that, when he, the deputy sergeant-at-arms, had acquainted the prisoner with the gracious indulgence of the House, Mr. Murray had replied that he would not come out of Newgate, and that it was mean and paltry in his brother to petition for his enlargement. The Commons, falling into a corresponding passion, sent for the doctor again, examined and cross-examined him, and then voted a total revocation of the preceding indulgence to the prisoner. But on the 26th of April Sir John Philips moved the King's Bench for a habeas corpus for Murray, which was granted; and on the morrow the prisoner was brought by his habeas corpus into that court: but, as three judges allowed the validity of the commitment, he was remanded to Newgate. As, however, it exceeded the privilege and power of the House of Commons to extend their imprisonment beyond the term of their own session, Murray was released on the 25th of June, the instant the parliament was prorogued. His friend Sir George Vandeput, the unsuccessful candidate for Westminster, Lord Carpenter, and the two sheriffs went to Newgate and conducted him in triumph to his own house. A few days after his liberation a strong account of his case was published. The author of this paper, generally believed to have been Paul Whitehead, a very indifferent poet, escaped; the printer was taken into custody. But the parliament had scarcely reassembled (in the month of November) when a meeting was called at the speaker's to consult about further chastisement, and punishing the sheriffs for their behaviour; but nothing was decided, except that Murray should be recommitted to Newgate. And, accordingly, on the 20th of November, Lord Coke, in a vehement speech, moved that the former votes against Murray should be read and revived in all their rigour. Coke was the more bitter against Murray and against Scotchmen in general, because he had got a Scotch wife of his own—a daughter of the late Duke of Argyll—whom he mortally hated, and from whom he had recently separated in a scandalous manner. Lord Duplin seconded the spite of Coke; but Lord Egmont, who thought himself obliged to speak with great caution, and even to apologise for undertaking the cause—so furious was the feeling against Murray—said, "This man has demonstrated the insufficiency of the power of this House; his imprisonment will not put a stop to pamphlets; the public, who cannot judge as the House of Commons does, will think the whole an election matter—a point in which they are most jealous. Mr. Murray has already suffered greatly; to revive the sentence will be inflicting banishment, which will be no further voluntary, than as he will prefer it to imprisonment in Newgate. Then this sentence must be renewed every session; and it may be found that the Commons, though but a third part of the legislature, will be exercising the power of banishment, which is unknown to the crown itself."

Such a stretch of authority would be most unpopular; . . . and this prosecution cannot be pursued without injustice, as it must be stopped somewhere, and it will be unjust not to proceed as far hereafter on any election complaint." And at the end of this speech Egmont moved to adjourn. But Coke said it would not be moderation but weakness to discontinue the prosecution of a criminal who was pluming himself on his defiance, and who was the patron of a lost, fallen, unanimated cause. Mr. Pelham said that, if the House of Commons had not all the authority it wished, it ought at least to exert all it had; and the motion for adjournment was rejected, and the resumption of the sentence agreed to without a division. Lord Coke then moved that Murray should receive the sentence on his knees; and that the pamphlet, called his Case, might be read. To bring Murray to his knees was beyond the power of the House, inasmuch as he had got beyond the Straits of Calais, preferring, as Egmont hinted he would, exile to imprisonment. But his Case was there, and was read, and unanimously voted a false, scandalous, and seditious libel. And then Lord Coke moved an address to the king to order the attorney-general to prosecute the author, printer, and publisher; adding, very considerably, that he would not move any censure on the sheriffs, but hoped their conduct would be a warning to the city in their future choice of magistrates. A day or two after Lord Coke moved to call in the sergeant-at-arms, who reported in form that Murray had absconded. Coke then moved for a red-hot proclamation with a reward for his apprehension. This was opposed by Vyner and Sydenham. The latter, who is described by Horace Walpole as "a mad high-church zealot," made a long speech on the occasion, comparing the fugitive Murray to the prophet Daniel, who would not kneel to Nebuchadnezzar's idol. Alderman Jansen took occasion to defend the city from the reflections of Coke, and said that to have touched the sheriffs merely for accompanying Murray from his prison to his home would have raised a tumult. But at the end of the long debate a reward of 500*l.* for apprehending Murray was voted by a majority of 98 to 26. To complete this strange story we may mention here that when the pamphlet which was entitled, "The Case of the Honourable Alexander Murray, Esquire, in an appeal to the people of Great Britain," was brought into a court of justice, and the cause of Owen the printer and publisher was heard before Willes the lord chief-justice, the jury, considering it as an appeal against oppression, returned a verdict for the defendant!*

While this privilege war at its hottest, and many months before it terminated, the Prince of Wales was removed by death from factious struggles and the expectation of that crown which had so long seemed to be within his grasp, and of which he had made so sure, through the illness of his father, fourteen years ago.* On the 18th of March it was reported in the House of Commons that the prince was dangerously ill. He had been suffering some time from an attack of pleurisy, but on the 12th he had considered himself sufficiently recovered to attend the king to the House of Lords. On leaving the House, which was exceedingly crowded and heated, he went to Carlton House, unrobed there, put on a light frock coat, and proceeded to Kew, where he walked about for some time in the gardens. Returning to Carlton House in the evening, he lay down upon a couch for three hours in a cold damp room, and caught a fresh cold, which brought back all the worst symptoms of his recent malady. On the 18th he was thought better, but on the 20th he was worse and had a severe fit of coughing. One of the physicians told him the cough would do him good; but Hawkins, the surgeon, said in coming out of the room—"Here is something I do not like." This was about ten o'clock at night; the cough continued; and soon after the prince laid his hand upon his chest and said, "Je sens la mort." His favourite German valet-de-chambre felt him shiver, and cried out, "Good God, the prince is going!" The Princess of Wales, who was in the room, snatched up a candle and rushed to the bed-head; but before she got there he was gone. An imposthume in the breast had burst and had caused this almost instantaneous death.† His constitution had never been a good one, and his habits of life had not tended to improve it. The little that has been related of the conduct of Frederick is not calculated to conciliate any esteem for his memory; but, as usual with princes, his character was neither so bad as it was painted by his enemies, nor so good as it was represented by his friends. He appears to have been weak rather than vicious, and more pettish and passionate than headstrong and malignant. His early education, at Hanover, had been exceedingly bad; and from the first moment of his arriving in England he had been purposely initiated into irregularities and excesses, and made the tool of a faction. His incontinence was scarcely deemed a matter of consequence in those days; and, though

* At the time of his death the prince was forty-four years old—the king, his father, sixty-six. Not one of the political jobbers seems to have calculated that the hale temperate father might possibly outlive the frail intemperate son!

† Letter of Mr. Fox and Mr. Paris to Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, in Cox's Pelham Administration.—Horace Walpole's Memoirs of George II., and Letters to H. Mann.—Bubb Dodington's Diary.—Bubb, though he well knew the crazy state of the prince's health, the little care he took of it, and the family obstinacy, does not hesitate in attributing the death to the medical attendants.—He says—"His physicians, Wilmot and Leo, knew nothing of his distemper; as they declared, half an hour before he died, that his pulse was like a man's in perfect health. They either would not see or did not know the consequences of the black thrush, which appeared in his mouth and quite down into his throat. Their ignorance or their knowledge of his disorder renders them equally inexcusable for not calling in other assistances."

* Horace Walpole's Memoirs of George II., and Letters to H. Mann.—Bubb Dodington's Diary.—Dodington says, under date of July 8th, 1752—"Owen tried and acquitted for publishing Mr. Murray's Case. This is the third great case, where the juries have insisted on judging the matter of law as well as of fact. The first was of Bushell, the Quaker, reported by Lord Chief Justice Vaughan; the second was that of the bishops in the reign of James II."

he had a succession of mistresses, he was considered as a good husband to his easy, uncomplaining wife. Like his grandfather, his immorality in this respect was accompanied with very bad taste, for his mistresses were all ugly, and one or two of them old. Frederick was also addicted to gambling, and is said to have been mean enough to cheat. He appears to have borrowed money from every friend that could lend it; and a story is told of his boasting how he had "nicked" Bubb Dodgington out of 5000*l.—by nicking he meant borrowing! Unlike his father, he was free and lavish of his money, indulging his generosity at the expense of justice, for he borrowed and took with one hand what he gave away or spent with the other. He was accused of insincerity and indifference to truth; but we should remember, in pity, that he lived in an atmosphere of intrigue, treachery, and lies. He was fond of the society of men of wit, affected to be a protector of literature and the arts, and wrote two or three very bad songs himself. But at the same time he was accused of being addicted to practical jokes, low sports, and very unseemly company, being at times to be found at Hockley in the Hole! And yet Bubb Dodgington, who is said to have got the promise of being made not merely a peer but a duke and prime minister, when Frederick should come to the throne, ventures to describe him as a prince without a blemish—the delight and ornament of the age he lived in—the hope and expectation of England—the refuge of the distressed, and the balm of the afflicted—the patron of the arts, the graces, and virtues of society.† Though never popular—not even when heading the strong opposition to government in Sir Robert Walpole's days—the people were generally disposed to prefer him to the Duke of Cumberland; and just after his death ballads were sung about the streets wishing that it were but his brother; and some on Change were heard to say, "Oh that it were but the Butcher." Since the reconciliation effected between father and son in the year 1742, though they had often met, the king had scarcely ever spoken a dozen words at once to the prince; and the recent attempt of his royal highness to set up the banner of opposition had not tended to awaken any affection for the first-born—a feeling which George never knew, and the want of which and his partiality to his second son ought to be taken into account among the circumstances which had tended to make Frederic what he was. The old king, however, was shocked at the sudden death, which was announced to him by Lord North, who found him looking over a table where Princess Emily, the Duchess of Dorset, and the Duke of Grafton, were playing at cards. When his surprise allowed him to speak, his majesty said, "Why, they told me he was better!" He sent back Lord North with a very kind message to the princess, promising that everything should be done that she could possibly desire, and he then went down immediately to the apartment of his mistress, Lady Yarmouth, looking extremely pale, and only saying to her ladyship—" Il est mort." On the following morning he sent another message by the lord in waiting, and assured the princess in writing of his affection and goodwill towards her and her children. The princess had eight young children, and was far gone with the ninth. It was said bitterly that the king recovered from the shock in a day, and that except the princess's, and that of the prince's creditors, the grief of no one was very sincere or lasting. The amount of Frederic's debts is differently stated; but there is no doubt as to the fact that they were never paid either by his father or by his son and successor. The greater part of them, it is true, probably did not deserve to be paid.*

Bubb Dodgington, and the men of intrigue acting with him, instantly called a meeting to know what was to be done "under this fatal change of situation."† Dodgington spoke of the military interest—of the sad certainty of having the Duke of Cumberland forced upon them as regent in case the old king should die—and recommended bold measures. But the Princess of Wales, after speaking in private with Lord Egmont‡ and Dr. Lee, burned all the prince's papers, and made up her mind to trust wholly and solely to the king, without any reliance on those factions and cabals which had brought nothing but mischief to her husband. "The king and she both took their parts at once; she, of flinging herself entirely into his hands, and studying nothing but his pleasure, yet winding what interest she got with him to the advantage of her own and the prince's friends: the king, of acting the tender grandfather; which he, who had never acted the tender father, grew so pleased with representing, that he soon became it in earnest."§ The Leicester House faction was thus utterly disconcerted, and compelled to look

* Bubb, who, only two years before, had thrown up the profitable post of treasurer to the navy, to return to the prince's service, to become his treasurer with 2000*l.* a year as a salary, and to join "the patriot band" in opposition in the House of Commons, does not allow that he ever aspired for so high promotion as a dukedom and the premiership: all that he owns to is, that the prince promised him a peerage with the management of the House of Lords, and the seals of secretary of state for the Southern province, and made him kiss hands upon it.—See Diary.

† Bubb was in sundry ways sorely disappointed. Finding that the banner of opposition newly raised by the Prince of Wales attracted few recruits, he had been organising a great scheme which he flattered himself must be attended with complete success. He says in his Diary—"When this unfortunate event happened, I had set on foot, by means of the Earl of Shaftesbury, a project for an union between the independent Whigs and Tories, by a writing renouncing all tincture of Jacobitism, and affirming short but constitutional and revolutionary principles. I had given his lordship this paper: his good heart and understanding made him indefatigable, and so far successful, that there were good grounds to hope for a happy issue. These parties so united were to lay this paper, containing these principles, before the prince, offering to appear as his party now, and upon those principles to undertake the administration when he was king, in the subordination and rank among themselves, that he should please to appoint.—Father of mercy! thy hand, that wounds, alone can save!"—Diary.

* Horace Walpole says that people talked of 1,400,000*l.* on post obits; but he mentions this merely as a rumour.

† Diary.

‡ Horace Walpole says that Egmont called a meeting of the faction at his own house at a very early hour in the morning after the prince's death. "All was whisper! At last Egmont hinted something of taking the princess and her family under their protection, and something of the necessity of harmony. No answer was made to the former proposition; somebody said, it was very likely indeed they should agree now, when the prince could never bring it about; and so everybody went away to take care of himself."—Letter to Horace Mann.

out for some new game. As soon as Frederic was interred in Westminster Abbey* some of these honourable gentlemen offered their services to the Pelhams, for their dread of the Duke of Cumberland was a lasting and reasonable passion, and they suspected that, if the Duke of Bedford and the other members of the government opposed to the Pelhams were permitted to gain the ascendancy, Cumberland would be put at the head of the regency. In the course of a few days Prince George (afterwards George III.), Frederick's eldest son, was created Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester, and had a household settled for him. Lord North was dismissed, and Lord Harcourt, a very inferior man, was appointed governor to the prince, as being more devoted to Mr. Pelham and the Duke of Newcastle; for these personal objects were kept closely in view in selecting the persons who were to be intrusted with the education of the future sovereign,—an education which had been hitherto so much neglected, that Prince George, at eleven years old, could hardly read English. Stone, a man of ability, who had long been private secretary to the Duke of Newcastle, and who had ingratiated himself with the king during the frequent journeys to, and residences at, Hanover, was appointed sub-governor.† Hayter, Bishop of Norwich, and reputed to be a natural son of Blackburn, was named preceptor. The Bishop of Norwich was good-humoured, sensible, and attached to the constitution as established by the Revolution of 1688, and believed to be devoted to the Duke of Newcastle: but he had for his assistant, or sub-preceptor, one Scott, a high Tory and decided Jacobite, who had been strongly recommended to the prince and princess by that great mischief-maker Lord Bolingbroke. It was strange to leave the young prince chiefly in the hands of this Scott, who was ready to teach the boy arbitrary principles of government, if he did not venture to hint to him that his family had no right to the throne; but the fact is, that the young prince was so left, and that his intellectual and moral training depended almost entirely upon the Jacobite tutor and his well-meaning but ill-informed mother. "The princess-dowager of Wales," says Lord Waldegrave, "was reputed a woman of excellent sense by those who knew her very imperfectly; but, in fact, was one of those moderate geniuses who, with much natural dissimulation, a civil address, an assenting conversation, and a few ideas of their own, can act with tolerable propriety so long as they are conducted by wise and prudent counsellors. Her secretary, Cresset, had been hitherto her principal adviser; a cautious man, uncommonly skilful in the politics of the back stairs, trusted by Lady Yarmouth," &c.* A plan of regency was drawn up by the Pelhams, who seemed determined to exclude the dreaded Duke of Cumberland; and on the 7th of May the Duke of Newcastle brought the bill into the House of Lords. This bill proposed, simply, that the Princess-dowager of Wales should be guardian of the heir-apparent and regent of Great Britain, in the event of the reigning sovereign's dying before his successor had attained the age of eighteen. The second reading was appointed for the 8th (the very next day); but, previously to that reading, Newcastle appeared with a message from his majesty, recommending the settlement of a council of regency to co-operate with the princess-regent, and to be headed by Cumberland. The cabinet had disagreed among themselves, and had not been unanimous on any one clause of the bill; the hatred and fear of the duke seem to have been balanced by the consideration that all the great officers of the crown were appointed to have seats in this council of regency;‡ and though there was some declamation—little, but loud—against the danger of placing an ambitious uncle, with the army at his command, in such a tempting situation,§ and, against the complications and delays which must arise from a division of authority, the suggestions of the king were adopted, and the Regency Bill was passed in that form in the House of Lords by a majority of 106 to 12, and in the Commons by about 270 to 90.§ There were several objectionable clauses and provisions in the bill; but, as George II. did not die till his successor had attained the age of royal majority, and as it was consequently never acted upon, they may be passed over in silence.¶ The

* Memoirs of James Earl, Waldegrave (one of the best of authorities), a book in which every syllable seems as if it had been written upon oath, or upon the honour of a truly honourable and upright man. The Princess of Wales's secretary, Cresset, was related to the royal family by a Duchess of Zell, who was daughter of a private French gentleman, and mother to Sophia Dorothea, [the unhappy wife of George I.

† The royal message recommended that the council to the regent should include the persons who should, at the time respectively hold the offices of Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, or First Lord of the Treasury, Lord President, Keeper of the Privy Seal, Lord High Admiral, or First Lord of the Admiralty, the principal Secretaries of State, and the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench.

‡ Horace Walpole, who frequently laughs at the violent prejudice, tells the following anecdote to show in what light the duke appeared at his sister-in-law's court:—"Soon after the Regency Bill Prince George, making him a visit, asked to see his apartment, where there are few ornaments but arms. The duke is neither curious nor magnificent. To amuse the boy, he took down a sword, and drew it. The young prince turned pale and trembled, and thought his uncle was going to murder him. The duke was extremely shocked, and complained to the princess of the impressions that had been instilled into the child against him."—Memoirs of George II.

§ The majorities varied upon different clauses of the bill, but the average may be taken as about 270 to 90.

¶ One of the clauses contained the sitting parliament to the end of the minority. This was strongly opposed by Fox, George Townshend, and a few others. Townshend said there was nothing so dangerous as to incultinate into a young king that he owes his safety to anything unconstitutional; and Fox hinted that, if the present parliament were, by the king's death, to sit on for eight or nine years, they might possibly think of prolonging their existence after his successor came of age. But the clause was carried by 258 to 81.

* Dodington complains bitterly of the whole ceremonial of the funeral, and of the sad fact that the lords of the bedchamber and all the prince's gentlemen were obliged to pay for their own dinner. Ladies can scarcely go lower. These are Bubb's memorable words—"There was not the attention to order Green Cloth to provide for them a bit of bread; and these gentlemen, of the first rank and distinction, in discharge of their last and duty to a loved and loving master, were forced to bespeak a great cold dinner from a common oven in the neighbourhood. At three o'clock, indeed, they vouchsafed to think of dinner, and ordered one; but the disgrace was complete—the tavern dinner was paid for, and given to the poor. . . . N.B.—The Duke of Somerset was chief mourner, notwithstanding the flourishing state of the royal family."

merits and demerits of the bill were attributed entirely to the king and the chancellor Hardwicke. George had declared that, upon consideration, he was terrified at the prospect of leaving public affairs in the hands of women and children. "I have a good opinion of the princess," said his majesty, "but I don't quite know her. . . . The English nation is so changeable! My affection is with my son Cumberland. I don't know why they dislike him. It was brought about by the Scotch, the Jacobites, and the English that don't love discipline; and by all this not being enough discouraged by the ministry.*"

The public were astonished at the great ease with which this regency bill had been passed; and people, who had neglected that kind of prayer before, now earnestly prayed that the life of the old king might be spared till his grandson came of age, in order that they might be spared from the discipline of the Duke of Cumberland. In other directions death was busy with the royal family this year. The Prince of Orange, who had so recently got the stadtholdership made hereditary in his family, and who was married to George's eldest daughter, died of a fever, after five days' illness, in the month of October; and his death was the more felt by his father-in-law, as it was likely to embarrass some of his foreign negotiations. The Queen of Denmark, his majesty's youngest daughter (who resembled her mother, Queen Caroline, in many circumstances of life and fortune, and in the malady which caused her death), expired in the month of December; and in addition to these losses George was well nigh losing his grandson, Prince Edward, and his son Cumberland. The duke had a fall as he was hunting at Windsor, was taken up speechless, and, refusing, with his usual obstinacy, to be bled, he grew so dangerously ill that he was at one time given over by the physicians. George showed much feeling; yet in the tears he shed he seems to have been thinking and feeling more as a king than as a father; for he continued to deplore to everybody that was in his confidence that the nation would be undone—left to nothing but a woman and children!

Another death to be noticed was that of the Proteus Bolingbroke, who died at Battersea, of a cancer in the heart, on the 15th of December, having employed some of his last hours in blackening the memory of his late friend Pope. Between the demise of the Prince of Wales and the departure of Bolingbroke the voice of faction was almost hushed, and opposition in parliament all but extinguished. The only battle that was fought was fought in the cabinet; and there the victory remained with the Pelhams; for early in June the king dismissed Lord Sandwich, and the Duke of Bedford resigned the next day. The two posts of master of the horse and president of the council, which had both been kept open for the acceptance of Bedford, if he could have been induced to give up his seals of secretary of state, were now filled;—Lord Hartington got the first, and Lord Granville the second. This ex-premier had lost none of his fire or confidence—his hard drinking had apparently affected neither his health nor his intellect. "Lord Granville," says Horace Walpole, "comes into power as boisterously as ever, and dashes at everything; . . . he is actually lord president, and, by all outward and visible signs, something more; . . . the king's favour to him is visible, and so much credited, that all the incense is offered to him." Lord Holderness got the Duke of Bedford's place, and Lord Halifax, at the head of the Board of Trade, endeavoured to get the colonies subjected to that Board, and to be nominated a third secretary of state for the West Indies and America; but George would not consent to part with any of his authority in that quarter. In delivering the seals to Holderness, he charged him to mind only the business of his province, telling him that of late the secretary's office had been turned into a mere office of faction.* The Leicester House party, headed by Bubb Dodington, made overtures to the Pelhams, offering, upon what Bubb calls "proper conditions," to join them with all their force, and to increase their majorities to such an extent that the displaced Bedford party would be absolutely crushed; but the Pelhams did not consider them worth buying, as they knew that, through the indolence of the Duke of Bedford and the weakness of his party, they would rarely be disturbed by a division. The Duke of Newcastle, however, kept Bubb Dodington in play, looking forward to future elections and changes; for, as Bubb returned five or six members, and was a practised hand in canvassing, bribing, and otherwise influencing boroughs, he might possibly be useful to the ministry. In the autumn session the only breath of opposition proceeded from Sir John Hynde Cotton, who objected to the words in the address—"our flourishing condition." The navy was raised from 8000 to 10,000; ministers saying that they did not think so large a number always necessary, but that circumstances made them so now. Mr. Fox proposed the same army as last year, as there was no alteration of circumstances. A faint proposal was made to reduce it to 15,000; but then it was urged by ministers that the situation of affairs abroad and at home was greatly altered by the deaths of the Prince of Wales and the Prince of Orange, and by the recent birth of a Duke of Burgundy. Lord Egmont thought it would be very absurd to increase our army whenever there was an heir born to the crown of France; and he complained more of the expense than of the number of our land forces, saying that our small army cost very nearly as much as that immense one of the King of Prussia. But these were mere whispers from the diminutive faction of the deceased Prince of Wales; and some new subsidising treaties were recognised by both Houses with little difficulty.

* Horace Walpole, Memoirs of George II.

* Walpole, Memoirs of George II.—Letters to H. Mann.

The avowed object of these burdensome engagements was to secure the election of Maria Theresa's eldest son, the Archduke Joseph, as King of the Romans! It would, with the most microscopic eye, be difficult to detect what interest or concern England had in this mighty matter; but it is evident that George took the greatest interest in it, and his eagerness is accounted for—at least in good part—by his jealousy of his nephew of Prussia, who had taken several recent opportunities of insulting his uncle. "Indeed," says Walpole, "it was a constant war of piques and affronts between the king and his nephew of Prussia. The latter had insisted upon the recall of Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, who had sacrificed to the ruling passion of the uncle by treating the character of the King of Prussia, in his public dispatches and private letters, in the strongest terms of satire."* So little, however, was there estimable in the character of that cynical tyrant, Frederick, so revolting was the state of his court, and so deplorable the condition of his kingdom (which he was turning into one vast camp) that it was not easy even for a wit and practised satirist like Hanbury Williams to exaggerate the truth.† Apart from his brilliant operations in the field, and one or two civil reforms, the great Frederick is one of the most disgusting objects in modern history, and is convicted of some of the meanest acts recorded of any sovereign. He would insult and browbeat a foreign ambassador by day, and stop and steal that ambassador's dispatches by night! Williams had his revenge; for, returning to Dresden, he concluded a subsidiary treaty with the Elector of Saxony and King of Poland (one and the same potentate), who engaged with George to traverse the designs of Frederick and to give his vote for the Archduke Joseph. Frederick lost no time in reviling his uncle, whom he called the last and youngest of the electors. His animosities were seconded underhand by the French court, which, if not very anxious at this moment about the election, was very desirous that George should be involved in difficulties, and that the money of England should continue to be thrown into the gulf of German politics. As for the Elector of Saxony and the other electors generally, their only object was to prolong the doubts and jealousies in order to fatten upon our subsidies.

In the course of the present year (1751) the calendar was changed, upon the motion of Lord Chesterfield, and the Gregorian was adopted in order to make our computation of time harmonise with that of the rest of civilised Europe. The Duke of Newcastle said he was averse to disturb that which was at rest, and did not love new-fangled things; but his grace was laughed at. A liberal bill was introduced for facilitating naturalization to all foreigners being Protestants that might settle in Great Britain; but, after being treated with indecent indifference—the House of Commons adjourned on one occasion at three o'clock in the afternoon, to go and see a play acted at Drury Lane "by people of some fashion"—and being found unpopular in the city, where numerous prejudices were opposed to it, advantage was taken of the death of the Prince of Wales, which happened on the day appointed for the third reading; and the bill was let drop.

A.D. 1752.—The displaced Duke of Bedford seemed so far from meditating opposition, that he came up from Woburn on the re-opening of parliament to ask the king for a pension for Lady Elizabeth Waldegrave, his wife's sister. It was understood that the Pelhams would have pressed the king to grant this trifling boon, were it only to silence Bedford's murmurs and to keep him, by the weight of an obligation, quiet in the House of Lords. But the feeble opposition corps wished to fix Bedford against the court, and to engage him to speak against the Saxon treaty; and they succeeded in inflaming the duke, "whose warmth was most impetuous."* The House had met after the Christmas recess on the 7th of January; on the 16th Mr. Pelham produced the treaty with Saxony; and on the 28th the Duke of Bedford opened the opposition to it with much spirit and considerable ability. After professing his great regret that the treaty should have been the act of the king—"that good king whom he had served seven years"—and his fear of being misrepresented to his majesty for what he was now about to say, he declared that in conscience he could neither acquiesce nor be content with silently opposing subsidiary treaties in time of peace, and the dangerous practice of wasting the money we ought to be saving. He said that, by paying the German electors for their uncertain votes for the Archduke Joseph, we were purchasing advantages for our allies, and instructing those princes who took our money never to unite with us but for money; that it must be a measure most unpopular with the English people to tax them for money to be sent into Germany when they could not possibly discern how it touched their own interest; that the Elector of Saxony was no more to be depended upon than the Elector of Cologne, who, after signing and subscribing, had openly renounced the subsidiary treaty; that thirty or forty of the College of Princes might be found to take money and do nothing for it; that Holland was too poor to share in our expenses; that Russia, though she had taken our money, failed to earn it; that France had threatened to interfere;

* Memoirs.

† The letters of Sir Charles Hanbury Williams from Berlin, which Walpole gives in the Appendix to his Memoirs, contain nothing about Frederick but what has been related in bitter terms by many others. The iron rod with which this nephew of George ruled is no invention, no satire, but simple truth. The miserable valet-like slavery of his ministers of state, the poverty to which he had reduced the gentry, the oppression exercised on the people, the general constraint, and the diffidence he saw painted on every face, were things seen, and described too by others than Williams.

* Horace Walpole says that he himself was most active in engaging the Duke of Bedford to speak against the treaty, "which would either prevent him from soliciting the pension, or, by touching so tender a point as a German subsidy, would provoke the king to refuse his request." In either case they calculated that Bedford would be confirmed and quickened in opposition.

that, if we were fortunate enough to avoid a war on our other grounds of quarrel with France and Spain, this German business might engage us suddenly in a war that had no English or national object; and that if the minister had yielded to the Saxon treaty against his will he had acted with extravagant imbecility. The duke concluded by moving for an address to represent that subsidiary treaties ought never to be concluded in time of peace, especially after a long and costly war, and that they were neither necessary at present, nor likely to procure any real advantage. The speech fully proved that, if the Duke of Bedford chose, he could make himself a very formidable and able debater. Lord Sandwich, the close ally and dependent of Bedford, and who had left office with his grace, took the strange course of voting for the treaty and censuring the Pelhams in the same breath. The Duke of Newcastle, Lord Halifax, and the Duke of Argyll defended the treaty; and Lord Granville put an end to the debate by saying that, as our army was limited at home, we ought to have the faculty of making in one day 18,000 men 50,000; that, if we no longer took German princes into our pay, we had a bridge without complete arches; and that we must count upon our power of subsidising as the best means of checking France, &c. The motion was rejected in the Lords without a division. The next time the Duke of Bedford went to court the king took no notice of him. The subject was renewed in the Commons, where Lord Harley made a motion against subsidies in time of peace. Several strong things were said, and some of them in a good manner; but they were all said purely for party purposes and without any real patriotic feeling. It was urged that when the subsidies were all granted the Electoral College would postpone the election; that France would be furnished with a plausible pretext for asserting that the liberties of the empire were invaded by bribery and corruption, and that she was called upon, as one of the guarantees of the treaty of Westphalia, to undertake the defence of the Germanic constitution against English gold and Hanoverian intrigue. Mr. Hampden said, sarcastically, that he approved bribing electors, as he saw by other instances how it had contributed to quash opposition. Old Horace Walpole spoke on one side and voted on the other—a kind of parliamentary behaviour not without recent precedent. But in the end the motion was rejected by 180 to 52. The Duke of Newcastle was “flustered” by the Duke of Bedford’s unexpected activity:—his brother Pelham tried to provide against it, and met Bubb Dodington by appointment. “I then asked him,” says the unblushing Diarist, who seems never for a moment to have thought that he was, doing anything mean or wrong, “whether there was any real inclination in the Duke of Newcastle and himself to accept of us into their friendship and protection, if objections could be removed? I told him I desired to live with him and his as their attached friend and servant; that I desired no rank which could justly create envy in my equals, or any sort of power that might occasion suspicion in my superiors; reserving only, that, if he gave me a musket, and ordered me to a post, I should certainly fire; and that, if clouds should arise, I was not afraid at all to meet the great geniuses now on the stage.” [By the great geniuses, Bubb meant the Pitts, the Foxes, the Grenvilles, &c., whom he fancied to be moved by much the same motives as his own; and we are not prepared to say that in this the turncoat was much deceived.] Pelham said, in reply, that he and his brother had real good wishes and goodwill for Mr. Dodington—for nobody more—but that there were difficulties, and great ones, with the king, on account of his quitting his service for the prince’s. “I replied,” says Bubb, “that I was aware of such a prejudice; but that I believed, when it was represented to the king that I could be of some utility to his majesty’s service, by my own and by the weight of my friends, particularly in choosing several members, it would be the means of removing all prejudices against me.” Pelham acknowledged Bubb’s great weight in boroughs, and assured him that he had already attempted to remove his majesty’s prejudices.* Bubb’s members, he said, would be of the more importance, as he and his brother, the Duke of Newcastle, had made up their minds to have a new parliament—“a parliament that should be all of a piece—such a parliament as might serve the king if he lived, and be steady to put the young king in the right way, if the old one died—he meant a thorough Whig parliament; for when there were factions, though a wise man was obliged to avail himself of them as well as he could, yet they were not desirable nor what he liked; but he wished to have a thorough Whig parliament, all of a piece.” Bubb, who had votes to sell, humbly said that he thought that the offers he now made from himself and his friends might contribute to facilitate that great end. Pelham admitted that it was to that end he was negotiating with him; for that, though he and his brother were without competitors, and as well with the king as they could hope to be, he knew that all this depended upon nothing but upon the ease with which they carried on his majesty’s service in parliament. The boroughmonger said that he had a most sincere wish to attach himself to ministers, and to end his life with those with whom he had begun it. “I told him,” adds Bubb, “that I was desirous to serve my country, and chose to do it with the good liking of the king—but, if his majesty should shut up that way, that then I must endeavour to do it by such way as should offer in the course of things." This meant that, if the king would consent to receive Bubb Dodington kindly at court, and give him a place, he would join the ministry with tongue, boroughs, and votes; but that if he would not so gratify him he would turn patriot and do his best to prevent Pelham's "thorough Whig parliament all of a piece." The minister, who knew what he had to contend with in the obstinacy and aversions of his royal master, gave Bubb more flattering assurances, and invited himself, "in a most gentlemanlike and obliging manner," to dine with him at his gorgeous but tasteless mansion at Hammersmith. But the minister carefully avoided binding himself in any specific promises, and Bubb, being too old a bird at court and parliament to take his chaff, avoided just as carefully the doing anything for him. In justice to the bargainer it should be stated that his pretensions were not immoderate: the place he wanted in presenti was merely the one he had held before, or that of treasurer to the navy. The dinner at Hammersmith did not bring about a conclusion to the bargain, and several other meetings ended with nothing more solid than expressions of mutual esteem. "In short," says Bubb, "the minister spoke a little Pelham, but intelligible enough to those who are acquainted with the language." In one of these conversations Bubb spoke cunningly of disensions in the ministerial quarters, and of "somebody fastened upon them," who was not always in a humour to obey their orders. Pelham said quickly, "Who, Pitt?" Bubb said No, he thought it was Fox; and then Pelham, with great signs of uneasiness and discomposure, repeated in a low tone, "Oh, Mr. Fox."

* The words which Bubb here puts into the mouth of the prime minister are curious enough:—“Upon my coming to Kensington, on a Sunday, some time after the prince’s death, the king said, I see Dodington here sometimes, what does he come for? To which Pelham replied, that he did not know, indeed, but he did not believe that I had any particular views, because he never had the least hint of any; which, if I had formed any, he thought he should, sooner than another have heard of them, from the long acquaintance between us: that he was sure my coming to court was to show my duty, and that I desired to live in his favour, and he supposed that I might wish for his (Pelham’s) protection, and desire to come into his service; but that was guess only: the king replied, No, there has been too much of that already—and the conversation did not end well.” —Diary.

In the mean while the Duke of Bedford continued to make a phantom of opposition in the Lords. A bill which had passed the Commons without opposition, and which was designed to soften the severity of military law, was thrown out in the Lords, who could discover nothing wrong even in the Mutiny Bill, which was marked all over with the sanguinary genius of the Duke of Cumberland.* An attempt to diminish the necessity of a standing army, by making the militia more effective, failed altogether. The king and his son, the duke, always spoke with contempt of an English militia. A bill for annexing to the crown the estates forfeited in Scotland by the late rebellion, and making provision, out of the rents of those estates, for establishing colonies and trade, and industry in the Highlands, met with better success. Legge, whose first promotion as a diplomatist had been favoured by Pitt, and who was rising in consideration as the ally of the great orator, declared that the system would have more effect than all that had been done about dress and jurisdiction, or that had been imposed by force; that we must either improve the condition of the Highlanders or exterminate the disaffected by fire and sword. "What is loyalty or disloyalty here," said Legge, "is there food or starving? Feed the clans and they will obey; starve them and they must rebel. The means of cradicking this spirit in the common people are obvious: Civilise them! Introduce the arts of peace among them!" This Scotch bill was passed in the Commons by a majority of 134 to 39. The Duke of Cumberland, who would have preferred the exterminating process, was furious; his resentments against the Scots were not softened by the implacability of their hatred to him, and he was still farther disgusted at having been totally unconsulted upon the measures proposed by the bill. Yet he would not risk the king's displeasure by opposing it openly; and, as the best means of traversing the design, he secretly communicated to Horace Walpole the younger—the witty author of the Letters, Memoirs, &c.—what he called "some very extraordinary anecdotes on Scotch affairs," and the whole burden of which was, that, ever since the rebellion, government had been guilty of monstrous imprudence and a disgraceful and dangerous lenity. The Duke of Bedford was persuaded to accept and make use of this information, without knowing from whom it originally came; and when the bill was brought up to the Lords his grace delivered a strong speech against it. He denounced the bill as an extensive job, and he told all the anecdotes which the Duke of Cumberland, by means of Horace Walpole, who never let a story lose in his way of repeating it, had put into his mouth. Lord Bath joined in the opposition, and accused the government of partialities to the Scotch; but the bill was passed by a majority of 80 against 12. The Duke of Cumberland was present during the debate, but did not venture to vote; yet he took occasion immediately after to deliver to the king a paper purporting to be a list of sixty notorious Jacobites who had been preferred in Scotland since the rebellion. This was meant to frighten the king; but it appears that George, or at least his ministers, had come to the conclusion that there was no longer much to be feared from putting a few Jacobites into the excise and customs, and that the best way to un-Jacobitise the Scots was to give them places.*

On the 11th of March a petition was presented from the city of London, complaining that many foreigners had lately come into England, and, having procured advantages in trade, by private naturalisation bills, had returned to their own countries, where they placed their gains, and were exempted from contributing to our public burdens. The prayer of the petition was, that this abuse

* The severities in the Mutiny Bill, where, as Horace Walpole expresses it, "the penalty of death came over as often as the curses in the Commutation Act on Ash Wednesday," were generally attributed to the Duke.

The king, however, put the Duke of Cumberland's black list in a private report on the state of Scotland, which probably proceeded from the same quarter, into the hands of the prime minister, ordering him at the same time to attend the duke and enter into an examination of the matter.

might be prevented, by confining the benefit of naturalisation to the time during which such foreigners should reside within the realm. The request was deemed reasonable, and the proposed restrictive clause was inserted in a private naturalisation bill then pending; and it still continues to be inserted in all acts of that description. To the honour of the Pelhams they this session got an order passed for printing the Journals of Parliament. Mr. Pelham also prosecuted his plan for financial reforms, and by means of a bill which was carried through both Houses, he consolidated the several classes of annuities into five stocks chargeable on the sinking fund, and made transferable at the Bank and South-Sea House respectively. Previously to this measure there were no less than fourteen different stocks—a multiplicity which occasioned great perplexity, both public and private.*

On the 26th of March George prorogued parliament with a gracious speech, and then went over to Hanover. He was attended, as usual, by the Duke of Newcastle, who resumed his negotiations with the German electors, undeterred by the opposition speeches of the Duke of Bedford and his small party. Bavaria, Saxony, Mentz, Cologne, the Palatinate, were the chief scenes of Newcastle's negotiations; and tempting subsidies were held out to nearly every court in Germany, great or small. At the same time, George found himself involved in a double dispute with his nephew Frederick. Both Prussia and Hanover claimed possession of East Friesland (the English people hardly knew there was such a country), and George, in his capacity of Elector of Hanover, proposed that the question should be referred to the decision of the Aulic council of the empire; but the King of Prussia would not submit to this arbitration, and spoke of vindicating his rights with his dragoons and grenadiers. Nor did Frederick stop here: he complained that certain Prussian vessels had been seized and plundered by English cruisers during the last war, and he seized the revenues of certain mines in Silesia, which had been mortgaged to some English subjects by the late Emperor Charles VI., for a loan of 250,000*l.* Frederick himself, in obtaining from Maria Theresa the cession of Silesia, had guaranteed this mortgage in public treaties; but when his animosities or interests were concerned he cared little for public or private faith, and he answered the English memorialists, who represented the debt as due to private individuals, with insolent invectives. A cabinet correspondence ensued on the subject of the ships and the mines; and, as a complete revolution was working in our foreign politics, and as Frederick saw he might be placed in a situation to court and need the alliance of his uncle, he dropped his claims as to the shipping, and resumed the payment of the interest upon the loan. We had, in fact, by this time come almost to an open breach with the House of Austria, who had treated our ambassador, Lord Hyndford, with insolence and arrogance, and had refused to admit the arbitration of the King of England in claims and other matters relating to the Elector Palatine. George, by the mouth and pen of the Duke of Newcastle, denounced the court of Vienna as ungrateful and impertinent, and threatened to form a connexion with France and with Prussia, if they did not instantly comply with his ultimatum. Lord Hyndford, in fact, was recalled; but, as he was taking his leave, Maria Theresa's imperial husband, who was much less imperious than herself, made use of strong expressions of gratitude to England, and offered in his own person to place 500,000 florins at the disposal of King George, towards the liquidation of the claims of the Elector Palatine. George insisted that he ought to have 700,000 florins; the court of Vienna then offered 600,000—we feel as if we were detailing the dealings, not of great nations and empires, but of a set of pedlars and trucksters—but George stuck to his 700,000, and the quarrel with Vienna, fanned by France, grew hotter. The Duke of Newcastle thought it necessary to declare that the honour of the king his master and the reputation of the people of England were at stake! But, while this game was playing above board, George, in his capacity of Elector of Hanover, and without the knowledge of the Duke of Newcastle, was playing another little game under the table—he was requiring, in secret memorials, that the court of Vienna should allow some fiefs belonging to the palatine to be attached to his Hanoverian states, and thus giving Maria Theresa and the emperor the opportunity of proclaiming his meanness and justifying their own. But, after wearisome negotiations, a conditional treaty was concluded between the Elector Palatine and the King of England, which was to be ratified if Austria would consent to be a party to it; but, as Austria never would become a party, it remained a dead letter; and George and the Duke of Newcastle came back to England with the uncomfortable feeling that they had been losing their time, and that the emperor and empress queen were determined to oppose rather than go into the great Germanic scheme of electing their son, the Archduke Joseph, king of the Romans.

George found no relief from these continental embarrassments in the squabbles which had broken out in his own family, or in the household of the young Prince of Wales. The princess dowager had taken an aversion to Lord Harcourt, the governor, and the Bishop of Norwich, the preceptor of her son, and had been at no pains to conceal her feelings either in her own house or elsewhere.* She had peculiar notions of education, and does not appear to have considered that, if she failed in respect to her son's instructors, he was very likely

* In the month of July Horace Walpole writes—"The tutorhood at Kew is split into factions: the Bishop of Norwich and Lord Harcourt openly at war with Stone and Scott, who are supported by Cresset, and countenanced by the princess and Murray (the solicitor-general, and afterwards Lord Mansfield); so, my Lord Bolingbroke dead, will govern, which he never could living."—*Letter to H. to follow her example. She told Bubb Dodington, whom she consulted and admitted very frequently to her society both at Kew and at Leicester House, that she had a very poor opinion of the prince's preceptors; that she really did not well know what they taught him, but was afraid not much; that they were in the country, and followed their diversions, and did little else that she could discover; that Lord Harcourt and the prince agreed pretty well, but that she thought that her son could not learn much from his lordship; that Scott, in her opinion, was a very proper preceptor; but, as for the good bishop, he might be, and she supposed he was, a mighty learned man, but he did not seem to her very proper to convey knowledge to children. She asked Bubb what use there was for princes in logic and books; and Bubb said, not much. "I said," adds Bubb, "that I did not much regard books,—that what I the most wished was, that his royal highness should begin to learn the usages and knowledge of the world; be informed of the general frame and nature of this government and constitution, and of the general course and manner of business, without descending into minutias; and she said she was of my opinion."^{*} But what Bubb thought the most essential part of the prince's education was to instil into him a warm regard and affection for the friends and companions of his deceased father; "because he was now bred in a manner, and in hands so totally unacquainted with the late prince, and with those who had been about him, that he might very easily be brought to forget them." [Bubb had subsequently the satisfaction of finding that the young prince did not forget him—for it was George III. that gratified his ambition by creating him Lord Melcombe.] The princess confessed that the Bishop of Norwich had complained strongly of being disregarded, and had shown the great necessity of a preceptor's being respected and supported; but that, as for Lord Harcourt, he hardly ever spoke to her at all. It appears, from other quarters, that, while Lord Harcourt was obliged to hire a house at Brentford, Stone, the sub-governor, had a residence provided for him close to Kew Palace; that in sundry little disagreements the princess had taken part with Stone and with Scott, the sub-preceptor, against Lord Harcourt and the bishop; and that it was no unusual thing for Harcourt, a proud punctilious courtier, to be left waiting in the hall at Kew among the servants. Prince George, moreover, gave all his confidence to Stone. Horace Walpole, who disliked the man, describes his lordship as being over minute and strict in trifles;† and the bishop as being sincerely honest and zealous in the education of the two princes, but as too apt to thwart the princess, who, "as an indulgent, or perhaps a little, as an ambitious mother," was desirous of relaxing application, or giving the boy too many holidays. Lord Harcourt was so annoyed with these jars, which broke out openly as soon as the king went to Hanover, that he determined to request his majesty's interposition as soon as he should return, and the Bishop of Norwich joined with him. The king arrived on the 18th of November, and in the beginning of December his lordship intimated to the king not only that he had been obstructed in the fulfilment of his duty, but that improper means had been employed to fill the young prince with wrong and dangerous notions of government. The king deputed Lord Hardwicke, the chancellor, and Potter, the Archbishop of Canterbury, to hear his complaints; but Harcourt told them that they were not proper to be told except to the king himself. The Bishop of Norwich saw the archbishop, and told him that he must either speak with the king in private or resign his unthankful office of preceptor. It appears that the bishop had one day found prince George reading Père d'Orléans's Révolution d'Angleterre, an ultra-absolutist work, written under the direction of the expelled James II., to justify his arbitrary measures: "that Stone, upon being charged with putting the book into the prince's hands denied having seen the work for thirty years; but that at last it was confessed that the prince had really had the book, which his younger brother, Prince Edward, had borrowed from his sister Augusta. According to Bubb Dodington, the princess dowager declared to him "that the stories about the History of the Père d'Orléans were false; the only little dispute between the bishop and Prince Edward being about Pereficx's History of Henry IV." It is not very probable that George II., who hated all books but books of account, ever read or ever cared much about Père d'Orléans or Père Pereficx. He admitted Lord Harcourt to a private audience in his closet on the 6th of December, declined entering into the subject of his complaints, and accepted his resignation at once; and, when the archbishop waited upon him to know whether he would be pleased to see the Bishop of Norwich, or accept his resignation from his (the archbishop's) hands, his majesty chose the latter. Lord Harcourt had complained before this, by letter and otherwise, that dangerous notions and arbitrary principles were instilled into the prince, and that he could be of no use unless the instillers of these doctrines—Stone and Scott—were dismissed; and the princess dowager actually confessed to Dodington that she knew and had long known Stone for a decided Jacobite! The subject caused a great excitement beyond the purlieu of the court; nor is it easy to conceive a matter in which the people at large could be more interested than in the education of their future sovereign. A anonymous letter was sent to Dr. Newton, a popular preacher, setting forth the dangerous way the prince's education was left in, and putting it to him as a sacred duty to take notice of it in the pulpit. Another anonymous letter on the same subject was sent to General Hawley, the hero of Falkirk Muir, whose own education had been so sadly neglected that it was said of him he could scarcely read and write. Hawley carried the letter, which ran in the name of the Whig nobility and gentry, to the Duke of Cumberland, who laid it before the king. Great pains were taken to find out the author of it, but they were taken in vain. Many years after the fact Horace Walpole let the public into his confidence,* confessing that he wrote a letter "pretended to be signed by several noblemen and gentlemen of the first rank and fortune," and sent it himself "to five or six particular persons," and to General Hawley and to Lord Ravensworth among the number. The points in this letter or memorial were strongly put; the chief of them were—That the education of a Prince of Wales concerns the whole nation, and ought always to be entrusted to noblemen of unblemished honour, and to prelates of virtue, learning, and unsuspected principles; that the misfortunes which this nation formerly suffered or escaped under King Charles I., King Charles II., and King James II., were owing to the bad education of those princes, who were early initiated in maxims of arbitrary power; that, it being notorious that books inculcating the worst maxims of government, and defending the most avowed tyrannies, have been put into the hands of the Prince of Wales, it cannot but affect the memorialists with the most melancholy apprehensions, when they find that the men who had the honesty and resolution to complain of such astonishing methods of instruction are driven away from court, and that men who have dared to teach such doctrines are continued in trust and favour; that, the security of this government being built on Whig principles, and the establishment of the present royal family being settled on the timely overthrow of Queen Anne's last ministry, it cannot but alarm all true Whigs to hear of schoolmasters of very contrary principles, and to see none but the friends and pupils of the late Lord Bolingbroke entrusted with the education of a prince, whose family that lord endeavoured to exclude from the throne of these kingdoms; that, there being great reason to believe that a noble lord has accused one of the preceptors of Jacobitism, it is astonishing that no notice has been taken of the complaint, and that the accused person has been continued in the same trust without any satisfaction being given to the governor and preceptor, who, though a nobleman of the most unblemished honour, and a prelate of the most unbiassed virtue, have been treated in the grosslest terms of abuse by a menial servant in the family; and that whosoever advised the refusal of an audience to the Lord Bishop of Norwich, who was so justly alarmed at the wrong methods which he saw taken in the education of the prince, is an enemy to his country.*

'Vexed by these clamours and beset by the Princess Dowager, who begged for the appointment of Dr. Johnson, Bishop of Gloucester, the king hardly knew whom to choose either as chief preceptor or as governor; and when he made a selection he found that one lord after another declined the invidious post. "Many," says Walpole, "were named, and many refused it. At last, after long waiving it, Lord Waldegrave, at the earnest request of the king, accepted it, and after repeated assurances of the submission and tractability of Stone. The earl was very averse to it; he was a man of pleasure, understood the court, was firm in the king's favour, easy in his circumstances, and at once undesirous of rising and afraid to fall. He said to a friend—'If I dared, I would make this excuse to the king—'Sir, I am too young to govern and too old to be governed.' But he was forced to submit."† Lord Waldegrave was indeed a man of strict honour, a most faithful and attached servant to the king, of an amiable disposition and excellent understanding, a scholar, and a gentleman in the highest acceptation of the latter term; but he had few exterior graces to recommend him, and, what was of more consequence and somewhat strange in the eye of the public, was, that the blood of James II., through an illegitimate channel, ran in his veins: his family were all Papists, and his father had been but the first convert to the established church.‡ The Whigs took fire and criticised this choice severely. The preceptor finally fixed upon was Dr. Thomas, Bishop of Peterborough, against whom it appears there was nothing to say. Horace Walpole, who had written the Memorial, seems to have admired and loved Lord Waldegrave, who subsequently married his niece, as much as he was capable of loving and admiring any one; but the effect produced by his paper could not be effaced, and Lord Ravensworth, "reckoned," as Walpole says, "one of the warmest and honestest Whigs in England," to whom he had sent a copy of the Memorial, brooded over it, and became so alarmed as to think it necessary to bring the matter before the council, on some words spoken to him by a drunken country attorney.

* It was broadly hinted in the Memorial that Murray, the solicitor-general, was the person who had given this advice, and who had the chief management of the whole affair. Many men (and Horace Walpole, the writer of the Memorial among them) could never forgive Murray his country: and it was certainly not easy to forget the Jacobitism of Murray's family and nearest connexions.

‡ Lord Waldegrave's grandmother was a daughter of James II. by Arabella Churchill, sister to the great Duke of Marlborough. His grandfather, a zealous Papist, followed his king and father-in-law into exile, and died in Paris in 1689. Waldegrave's father became a Protestant in 1729, to the great scandal of the Jacobites and fury of his uncle, the Duke of Berwick. After his conversion he was employed both by George I. and George II. in important embassies, and he died an earl and a Knight of the Garter in 1741.—*Introduction to Memoirs from 1784 to 1788, by James Earl Waldegrave, K. town and acquainted Mr. Pelham that he had strong evidence of Jacobitism to produce against Stone, the sub-governor, Dr. Johnson, Bishop of Gloucester, who had been recommended as preceptor, and Murray, the solicitor-general. Mr. Pelham and Lord Granville would gladly have overlooked the matter, but it could not be stifled, as Ravensworth had told his story to the Duke of Devonshire and many others; and the cabinet was compelled to hear the important revelations, which amounted to this, and no more—that Fawcett, an attorney, had told his lordship, at Durham, that Dr. Johnson, the new Bishop of Gloucester, had drunk the Pretender's health twenty times with Mr. Stone, Mr. Murray, and himself. The cabinet council was occupied for three whole days in hearing Lord Ravensworth and the Dean of Durham; and then, on the 16th of February, the attorney himself was brought into the council chamber and examined. Fawcett was in extreme terror and confusion; but with reluctance and uncertainty he confessed that the words he had uttered at Durham were true, and admitted that "about twenty years ago, Murray, then a young lawyer, Stone then in indigence, and himself, had used to sup frequently at one Vernon's, a rich mercer, a noted Jacobite, and a lover of ingenious young men;—the conversation was wont to be partly literature, partly treason—the customary healths, the Chevalier and Lord Dunbar." He did not mention the Bishop of Gloucester as being of these convivial parties, in which a few needy young men seemed to have enjoyed themselves by flattering the tastes and prejudices of the rich old citizen—though probably in those days of their poverty and discontent their Jacobitism might not have been altogether an affectation or a condensation. The attorney hesitated and trembled about signing his deposition, and said he was fitter to die than to make an affidavit. Stone upon being called in, said he was ready to swear that he never drank the Pretender's health, even when in the most Jacobitish companies—"not even when he was a student at Oxford." Murray, the solicitor-general, proudly objected to having the depositions read to him, saying, that be they what they might they were lies, as, being aware that suspicions might arise from his family and connexions, he had lived a life of caution beyond even what his principles would have dictated. And when he had heard the attorney's deposition he took a solemn oath that the charge was absolutely false. When this contemptible business had occupied the council nine or ten days they unanimously reported to the king that Fawcett's account was false and scandalous. But the Duke of Bedford would not let the matter rest there, and on the 22nd of March he moved for the papers relating to the examination of Stone and Murray; and by this means the Lords were led into a terrible long debate, the best part of which was the Duke of Bedford's denunciation of the strange proceedings in the council, which he compared to a revived star-chamber—an inquisition—"different, indeed, from the inquisition in one point, for the heretics of this court were the favourites of it! Before this court the accused had been admitted to purge themselves upon oath, the minutes had been secreted, and the witnesses made to tremble and held in a state of confinement." At a late hour Lord Ravensworth put a period "to this solemn mummery:" he said that he was satisfied—that at least his own honour was cleared—that he would leave it here; and so left the House! A silence of some minutes ensued—nobody rose to speak—and the rest of the lords went away without coming to a division.*

The Duke of Bedford had declared in his speech that no objection could be taken to the appointment of Lord Waldegrave—that the choice was the more acceptable as it was his majesty's own, who always acted right when he acted himself, &c. But, though Waldegrave might be considered fit for the place, he soon found that the place was not fit for him. His royal pupil would not give him his affection or confidence, and the Princess Dowager hated him because he was appointed by the king, and chose always to consider that he was placed as a spy over her.† "I found his royal highness," says the plain-speaking, and, as we believe, thoroughly veracious Lord Waldegrave‡ "uncommonly full of princely prejudice, contracted in the nursery, and improved by the society of bedchamber women, and pages of the back stairs. As a right system of education seemed quite impracticable, the best which could be hoped for was to give him true notions of common things; to instruct him by conversation, rather than by books; and sometimes, under the disguise of amusement, to entice him to the pursuit of more serious studies."§ His lordship, in speaking of the Prince of Wales afterwards, when his royal highness was entering into his twenty-first year, says, that great allowances should be made on account of his bad education; for that, though the Bishop of Peterborough the preceptor, Mr. Scott the sub-preceptor, and Mr. Stone the sub-governor were men of sense, learning, and worth, they had but little weight and influence; the mother and the nursery having always prevailed against them. His lordship found the prince uncommonly indolent, as indifferent to pleasure as to study, and with few lively affections. The Princess Dowager told Bubb Dodington that he cared little for anybody except for his brother Edward; that he conversed little with people of the world, and had no associates of his own age, because she was aware to the young people of rank on account of their excessively bad education and the bad example they might set the prince. On another occasion she said that the young people of quality were so ill educated and so very vicious, that they frightened her.* It cannot be denied that the prevailing immorality among young people of fashion was sufficient to justify a mother's fears; but it was shrewdly surmised that there was a mixture of ambition, and love of power and controul, in these moral apprehensions; and that the Princess Dowager gave her son a bad opinion of everybody else, in order that she might the better keep him to herself, and prolong her own sway over him. Yet, on the other side, it may be assumed that the care with which she kept him, up to the age of manhood, from evil communications contributed to form those habits of morality and decency which George III. afterwards displayed and enforced in his court. Lord Waldegrave, who was unfashionably grateful to his master George II., was compelled to listen to bitter sarcasms and complaints against his majesty at Kew Palace and Leicester House. We know from Bubb Dodington that one of the standing complaints was about money. When Bubb thought proper to speak of his majesty's great civility to her royal highness and great kindness to her children, the Princess Dowager said, "she wished the king would be less civil, and put less of their money into his own pocket—that his majesty got full 30,000*l.* per annum by the poor prince's death;—if he would but have given them the Duchy of Cornwall to have paid the debts, it would have been something;—should resentments be carried beyond the grave?—should the innocent suffer?—was it becoming so great a king to leave his son's debts unpaid?"†

‡ We have expressed before our conviction of the truthfulness of Lord Waldegrave's pen. His lordship in opening his Memoirs, says, "I will advance no facts which are not strictly true, and do not mean to misrepresent any man; but will make no professions of impartiality, because I take it for granted that it is not in my power to be unprejudiced." We will not venture to say more for his lordship than he ventured to say for himself, but we feel assured that he was as impartial as human nature can be, and never misrepresented a fact.

Lord Waldegrave laboured hard to restore harmony and union in the royal family—or rather to create it, for it had never existed;—and, having free access to the king, he had frequent opportunities of doing good offices to the inmates of Kew Palace and Leicester House. "I was," says his lordship, "a very useful apologist whenever his majesty was displeased with his grandson's shyness, or want of attention; and never failed to notify even the most minute circumstance of the young prince's behaviour which was likely to give satisfaction. He continued at his difficult post as chief governor for nearly three years, and was treated with, at least, civility, till the princess and her son conceived that enthusiastic affection for Lord Bute which brought about fresh revolutions in court and cabinet.

† Diary. The princess dowager said that the debts her husband had left were inconsiderable. Bubb asked what she thought they might amount to? She said that she could not say exactly, though she had endeavoured to know as near as a person could properly inquire, who, not having it in her power, could not pretend to pay them, but that she thought there was about 90,000*l.* owing to the tradespeople and servants; a private debt due to the Earl of Scarborough, and about 70,000*l.* owing abroad.

parliament that he was continuing his negotiations, and should require no money beyond the ordinary supply. Lord Egmont got up a debate upon the address, and proposed striking out the approbation of his majesty's foreign policy. "I believe," said Egmont, "that his majesty's measures are well intended; but they will prove unsuccessful. The College of Princes is averse to the election of a King of the Romans; and the proceedings of the King of Prussia, though outwardly referring to the Silesian loan, are, in reality, prompted by his disapprobation of our conduct in promoting the election." Several other members inveighed against the whole system of foreign affairs; but they were too few to press for a division. Lord Egmont, however, renewed his opposition, when Mr. Fox, as Secretary-at-War, moved that the land forces should be continued at 18,857 men. His lordship expressed his surprise at seeing gentlemen professing Whig principles voting for so great a standing army in time of peace. Pelham replied in a well-reasoned speech, in which he insisted upon the necessity of a competent force, and maintained that no danger to liberty was to be apprehended from a native and Protestant army paid and provided for by parliament. Lord Egmont had said that King George, like Queen Elizabeth, might point to the people in the streets and say, "These are my guards;" and that the old pretence of danger from Jacobitism and conspiracy had ceased altogether. In reply, Pelham said—"In reference to the disaffected, I must observe, that in the interval from 1715 to 1745, during the greater part of which I was in parliament, in all debates concerning them the Jacobites were represented by gentlemen in opposition as a dispirited, contemptible party, which had for ever ceased to be dangerous; and yet, in 1745, we found this party again in rebellion, defeating our troops, and advancing on our capital." Upon a division ministers had a majority of 253 against 65.

For nearly a century, or ever since the Restoration, the Jews, persecuted everywhere else except in Holland, had enjoyed a kind of toleration in England; and many of the old superstitions and hatreds had been gradually forgotten by the English people.* In the reign of Queen Anne the

* A negotiation, indeed, was begun for permitting the return of the Jews in the time of the Protectorate; and in Spence's Anecdotes there is a curious account of Cromwell's proposing to grant them permission to have a synagogue in London. "They offered him, when Protector, 60,000*l.* for that privilege. Cromwell appointed them a day for his giving them an answer. He then sent to some of the most powerful among the clergy, and some of the chief merchants of the city, to be present at their meeting. It was in the Long Gallery at Whitehall. Sir Paul Blicke, who was then a young man, pressed in among the crowd, and said he never heard a man speak so well in his life as Cromwell did on the occasion. When they all met he ordered the Jews to speak for themselves. And after that he turned to the clergy, who inveighed much against the Jews, as a cruel and accursed people. Cromwell, in his answer to the clergy, called them 'Men of God,' and desired to be informed by them, whether it was not their opinion that the Jews were to be called, in the fulness of time, into the church. He then desired to know whether it was not every Christian man's duty to forward that good end all he could. Then he flourished a good deal on religion prevailing in this nation, the only places in the world where religion was taught in its full purity; was it not, then, our duty, in particular, to encourage them to settle where they could be taught the truth; and not to exclude them from the light and leave Jews had even offered Lord Treasurer Godolphin half a million of money, if he would obtain for them permission to purchase the town of Brentford, with full privileges of trade, &c. The agent from the Jews represented to his lordship that such a measure would bring the richest of the Jew merchants into England, and cause an addition of more than twenty millions of money to circulate in the nation. The offer was tempting—the Jews, it is said, would have doubled it—and the prospect of the attendant advantages more so; but Godolphin was deterred, and let the scheme drop, because “he foresaw that it would provoke two of the most powerful bodies in the nation—the clergy and the merchants.” Godolphin, perhaps, knew not the arguments of Oliver Cromwell; but Mr. Pelham, whether he knew them or not, seems to have considered that the time was come when the experiment upon bigotry and prejudice might be carried out; and he introduced, as a ministerial measure, a bill for permitting the naturalisation of foreign Jews. This bill passed through the House of Lords without exciting a murmur even from the bench of bishops; but, upon being sent down to the Commons, it encountered a fierce and formidable opposition. It was read for the first time on the 17th of April; but, on the 7th of May, when the question was put for the second reading, the great combat took place—the factious opposition being greatly encouraged by the abuse which the bill encountered out of doors. Men not hitherto noted for any zeal for religion began to fight under the banners of prophecy, proclaiming that to give the Jews a settlement anywhere would be an impious attempt to oppose the will of the Almighty as signified by the prophets, who had foretold the eternal dispersion of that accursed race. The Scriptures were quoted to prove that the Jews were and must remain scattered over the world as vagabonds and outlaws without a country, without a home; and, in the red-hot torrent of declamation, all our penal enactments made against the Jews in the most barbarous times were applauded as things tending to work out the will of Heaven; and every mark of favour shown to them was denounced as execrable, and ascribed to the policy of an usurper or the self-interest of a tyrant. Mr. Pelham replied like a philosopher and a statesman. He could not allow himself to believe that the church of England could be in any danger, or that he was bound to deem every man his enemy who differed from him on a point of religion. “We have less danger,” said the minister, “to apprehend to our church from them than from our dissenters, because they never attempt to make converts, and because such an attempt would be peculiarly difficult: the strict tenets of their religion exclude every man who is not of the seed of Israel; and as they cannot intermarry with a strange woman, we need not fear that they will have any success in converting our countrymen. Our ecclesiastical establishment, therefore, is in no danger from them; and, as to our civil establishment, the Jews are sufficiently excluded from all participation in it by existing laws; for, unless they become Christians—unless they take the sacrament—they cannot even be excisemen or custom-house officers.” Pelham’s speech made some impression, and the second reading was carried by 95 against 16. But the men who had made the question merely a handle for factious opposition and party strife, continued the combat, and loaded the table of the House with petitions from the corporation of London, from merchants, and traders; and procured council to be heard and witnesses to be examined. When the third reading was proposed Lord Egmont moved an adjournment, and made a long speech, telling those who voted for the bill that they would experience the ill consequences to themselves at the approaching general election, when they would be made to feel the national resentment. “When that day comes,” exclaimed his lordship, “I shall not fear to set my foot upon any ground, as a candidate, in opposition to any one man among you, or any new Christian, who has appeared or voted for this bill.” This was a strong argument; yet, with the fear of the hustings before their eyes, ninety-six honourable members voted against fifty-five; the adjournment was negatived; and the bill, after passing the House, received the royal assent. During its whole progress the House was thinly attended, as all who could seem to have been anxious to escape the odium of voting for the Jews.

Complaints had arisen among the country gentlemen that the old laws were insufficient for the preservation of game, and that poaching was greatly on the increase; during the session a new game act was carried through both Houses, but it had not the effect of tranquillising our little Nimrods, and our jails continued to be crowded as before with unqualified sportsmen, who there became qualified for the commission of much more serious offences.

The law of marriage had hitherto been so loose that all kinds of hurried and clandestine unions could be formed all over England with more facility than they are now at Gretna Green. No notice or publication of banns was required, no license was looked for, and any parson might perform the ceremony at any time or in any place, without consent of parents, or any other preliminary conditions whatsoever; and the worst or the most needy of the clergy would often forward the most rash or disgraceful marriages for the sake of the paltry fee. The great temple of the pseudo Hymen was the Fleet prison. Parsons confined for debt, scoundrels fuddled with gin and tobacco, would marry in three minutes, and for the small charge them among false teachers, papists, and idolaters. This silenced the clergy. He then turned to the merchants, who spoke of their falsehood and meanness, and that they would get their trade from them. ‘And can you really be afraid,’ says he, ‘that this mean despised people should be able to prevail in trade and credit over the merchants of England, the noblest and most esteemed merchants in the world?’ Thus he went on till he had silenced them too; and so was at liberty to grant what he desired to the Jews.” Lockier, Spence’s informant, received his information from Sir Paul Ricaut himself.

of two shillings, any couple that presented themselves. "In walking along the street in my youth," says Pennant, "on the side next to this prison. I have often been tempted by the question, Sir, will you be pleased to walk in and be married? Along this most lawless space was hung up the frequent sign of a male and female hand conjoined, with Marriages performed within, written beneath. A dirty fellow invited you in. The parson was seen walking before his shop; a squalid profligate figure, clad in a tattered plaid night-gown, with a fiery face, and ready to couple you for a dram of gin or roll of tobacco.* To put a stop to these crying abuses a bill was prepared by the judges under the auspices of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, and brought into the Upper House. It provided that all marriages should henceforward take place either by banns published on three successive Sundays or by license granted in a regular manner; and that all other marriages should be void, and the parson that solemnised any such transported for seven years. Every class of society had felt the mischief of the old system; but the provisions of Hardwicke's Marriage Act, on the other hand, were thought to be intended and contrived to keep together the wealth and family connexions of the aristocracy, to raise too many obstacles to matrimony, and to place too much power in the hands of the chancellor. It excited some severe criticisms in the House of Lords, particularly from the Duke of Bedford; and numerous amendments were introduced by their lordships. But when it reached the Commons it encountered far greater opposition: the Speaker, Mr. Nugent, Charles Townshend, and Mr. Fox, spoke with great acrimony against it, the last of these gentlemen declaring that, from the beginning to the end of the act no principle predominated but pride and aristocracy. In the heat of debate Fox spoke of the chicanery and jargon of the lawyers, called Chancellor Hardwicke their proud^o Mufti, and drew a very severe character of the head of the law and the keeper of the royal conscience. In the course of one of his harangues Fox held up a copy of the bill, on which he had marked with red ink various erasures, alterations, and additions that had been made to it since it came down from the Lords. The attorney-general exclaimed—"See how bloody it looks!" Fox retorted in the words of Macbeth to the Ghost of Banquo—"Thou can'st not say I did it." He then parodied the lamentation of Mark Antony over the robe of Cæsar, and exclaimed, pointing to the attorney-general—"Look what a rent the learned Casca made;"—and then, alluding to Mr. Pelham,—"through this the well beloved Brutus stabbed." But in the end of his speech Fox apologised for his attacks on the chancellor, and disavowed any personal feeling against that lord. The bill with its amendments was not returned to the Peers before the 6th of June, and the prorogation was fixed for the 7th. Softened as it was the Duke of Bedford attacked it with undiminished severity, and styled it a faulty and obnoxious law forced through parliament to gratify the prime minister. Lord Chancellor Hardwicke reluctantly concurred in the amendments, though he declared that several of them weakened the bill—a bill, which he held, could not be wrong since it had been maturely deliberated, prepared by the judges, improved by the whole House of Lords, and sanctioned by all the bishops. Hardwicke then alluded in the plainest terms to the attacks made upon him in the Commons by Charles Townshend and Mr. Fox. He was content to treat Townshend as an amorous, hot, and inexperienced young man; but he could make no allowance for so grave a personage as his official colleague Mr. Fox. Choosing to overlook the circumstances which had attended Mr. Fox's own marriage, and which might, in themselves, have been sufficient to render the bill unpalatable in that quarter,* he attributed his opposition to dark intrigue and faction. And unsoothed by Fox's apology he declared that he "despised his scurrility as much as his adulation and recantation."† Fox wished that the session was not to be closed on the morrow, for then he would have made an ample retaliation upon the lord chancellor. We have seen how adroitly Bubb Dodington had insinuated to Mr. Pelham a distrust of Fox; and it appears that Fox at this moment was closely connected with the Duke of Cumberland and the Duke of Bedford, that he had many personal friends and more political followers, that the distribution of military preferment had added greatly to his strength, and that he was looked upon as the rising minister in the House of Commons, in case of Mr. Pelham's death, resignation, or removal to the House of Peers.‡ He told the Duke of Cumberland that he was ten times stronger than Pelham; and his royal highness, in reply, said that Pelham had neither candour, honour, nor sincerity. Cumberland could never forgive the Pelhams, the Chancellor Hardwicke, and the Solicitor Murray, for their behaviour on the Regency Bill, and Fox as well as Bedford were anxious to promote his animosity and revenge. In the course of the following session Bedford brought in a bill to postpone the operation of the Marriage Act till it should be maturely considered and amended; but the chancellor opposed the motion dictatorially, and it was rejected by a majority of fifty-six to ten. The peers were inclined to extend the operation of Hardwicke's bill to Scotland, and an order was even given to the Lords of Session to prepare a measure to that effect: but strong objections were raised by the Scottish lawyers and the Scottish representative peers in parliament; the plan was silently abandoned, and thus Gretna Green remained open to all such Englishmen as had money enough to make the journey. In the course of a few years Hardwicke's bill became exceedingly unpopular with all classes; but no amendment was made in it till our own day.

During the present session a bill was brought in by Mr. Potter, son of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, to establish a general register of the population; but, after struggling with difficulty through the Commons, it was thrown out by the Lords, who trumpeted all kinds of popular prejudices, and proclaimed that it would be dangerous to the constitution and destructive of the people's liberties to take a census, or register the number of free-born Englishmen. Among various, and, for the most part, laudable measures of domestic policy adopted during the session, a bill was passed for preventing the depredations committed on wrecks, and the infamous cruelties inflicted on shipwrecked persons, which had increased to an enormous degree on the coast of Cornwall and other parts of the kingdom. With unwonted liberality parliament enabled the commissioners of longitude to pay 20,000*l.* to Mr. Harrison for his improvements on chronometers; and they also passed an act empowering the crown to raise money by lottery to purchase the Sloane Library and Museum, the Harleian Manuscripts, and Montague House, in Russell-street. Such was the origin of the British Museum, to which Mr. Pelham, greatly to his honour, contributed very zealously.

But while parliament was yet sitting ministers manifested something like a return to their old fears and their old cruelty; and the day on which it was prorogued—the 7th of June—London witnessed another horrible execution in the person of Doctor Archibald Cameron, brother to the gentle Lochiel. The doctor, a man of learning and humanity, had done his best to prevent Lochiel's engaging in the rebellion of 1745; but, upon seeing his beloved brother join the young Pretender, he followed him to the field, though he had a large family, and he attended Lochiel throughout the war, and cured his desperate wounds when the conflict was over. We have seen him traversing the mountains of Badenoch to rescue Charles Stuart, and living in "the Cage," in the great mountain of Benalder with his lame and suffering brother, with Clunie and the Pretender;* and it appears he escaped with them in the French frigates that put into Lochnanuagh. When Louis XV. gave the gentle Lochiel a regiment, the doctor was appointed chief surgeon to it, and he thus remained in the French service, universally respected, till the spring of the present year (1753), when he unwisely ventured back to his native land. He was presently discovered, seized, and brought up to London.† As he had been excepted in the Act of Amnesty and included in the Acts of Attainder, ministers and judges held that, as usual in the like cases, he might at once be executed as a traitor without any legal proceedings; and the king was accordingly asked to sign the death warrant. It is said that old George exclaimed—"Surely there has been too much blood spilt upon this account already;" and that he signed the warrant with extreme reluctance. Doctor Cameron behaved like a hero and a worthy brother of the brave Lochiel. His parting with his wife the night before his execution was tender and heroic at the same time: he let her stay with him till the last moment, and then told her she must go, as they were about to lock the gates of the Tower for the night: she fell at his feet in an agony of grief; but he said to her, "Madam, this was not what you promised me," and, embracing her for the last time, he forced her to leave that dismal prison: he then stood at the window looking at her coach with seeming firmness; but when it was out of sight he turned away from the window and wept. At the place of execution he was as firm as a man could be. "His only concern," says Horace Walpole, "seemed to be at the ignominy of Tyburn: he was not disturbed at the dresser for his body, or at the fire to burn his bowels. The crowd was so great, that a friend who attended him could not get away, but was forced to stay and behold the execution."‡ It had been reported that Doctor Cameron had been sent over to Scotland by the young Pretender and the King of Prussia to feel the ground and organise a new rebellion; but this incredible story was never supported by anything like evidence. Another and a much more probable account is, that he came to recover a sum of money. His fate was deplored by all who saw him suffer.

For some time the much misgoverned people of Ireland had been in a state of discontent and uneasiness, and the Irish parliament complained of the administration of the Duke of Dorset and the ascendancy of the protestant primacy, who was accused of meddling with the House of Commons. On some occasions the government were left in a minority in the House—in others they found their majorities reduced to twos and threes. "As the parties were so equally balanced," says Walpole, "their animosities did not flag, but proceeded to great extremities, both in the English manner of abuse, and in the Irish of duels."†

The English parliament re-assembled on the 15th of November. It was notorious to every one that paid the least attention to public affairs that a new war was brewing—nay, that hostilities had actually been commenced by the French on the confines of Canada and Nova Scotia. Yet the royal speech expressed a confidence that peace

† On the 8th of April Horace Walpole writes—"He is just brought to London; but nobody troubles their head about him, or anything else, but Newmarket, where the duke is at present making a campaign, with half the nobility and half the money of England attending him: they really say that not less than an hundred thousand pounds have been carried thither for the hazard of this single week." —Letters to Mann.

‡ Letters to Mann.—Walpole adds a horrible and almost incredible circumstance—"But what will you say to the minister or priest who accompanied him? would be preserved, and congratulated parliament upon the fact that there had been no important change in our foreign relations. It was easily understood that this tone, so much at variance with truth, proceeded from the fear of the approaching general election; and other matters presently introduced were calculated to conciliate the popular feeling that was about to express itself around the hustings. The Jew bill, passed a few months before, had inflamed the nation and excited the bigotry of the people to a degree which had not been witnessed since the affair of Doctor Sacheverel. The bishops had concurred in the bill, but the little curates and the country parsons preached against it every where, and the common people were led to believe that England would be made to partake in the curses pronounced by prophecy on Jerusalem and the Holy Land. If the parliament had not been so near its close ministers might possibly have braved the storm; but as matters stood they resolved to allay it by throwing the bill overboard like another Jonas. On the very day the Houses met the Duke of Newcastle moved to repeal the bill, which, he said, had been merely a point of political policy. Drummond, bishop of St. Asaph, in a manly speech, said the bishops could not have opposed the bill without indulging a spirit of persecution, abhorrent from the spirit of the Gospel. The Bishop of Oxford said that his brethren had never much liked the bill, and were glad to have it repealed to quiet the minds of good people. Lord Temple said that the daily papers had got up this storm; that popular clamour ought not to prevail; that the voice of the people was not always the voice of God; and that the approaching general election had given the first foundation to this uproar. The Duke of Bedford, who had been against the bill, was now against the repeal, which he called "an effect of the imbecility of the administration." In the Commons a similar motion for repeal was made on the same day by Sir James Dashwood; and, in the end, the Lords' bill was adopted and carried without a division. Nor did the war against the Jews stop with this repeal. By a clause in the Plantation Act, which had subsisted thirteen years, foreign Jews as well as foreign Christians might become free denizens of Great Britain, after having resided seven years in any of his majesty's plantations or colonies in America. Lord Harley moved to bring in a bill to repeal this clause, and was seconded by Dashwood and supported by Lord Egmont. But ministers made a stand here, Pitt made one of his fine speeches, and Harley's motion was rejected.*

A. D. 1754.—On the 7th of February Sir John Barnard, professing great horror at the perjuries constantly committed on elections, made a motion to repeal the bribery oath; but it was considered that this would be avowing permission of bribery, and the motion was rejected without a division. The rest of the business of parliament was not very important, and the session was drawing tranquilly to a close, when death deprived the king of his prime minister. Mr. Pelham, who had been in a bad state of health for many months, died rather suddenly on the 6th of March, in the sixty-first year of his age.* His brother, the Duke of Newcastle, an older man, and a far less able minister, resolved to step into his place, and, after deluding and balking Pitt and Fox, who both aimed at the treasury, he succeeded in gratifying his ambition, for the king continued his personal dislike to Pitt, and Newcastle had art enough to drive Fox into declarations which displeased his majesty. The solicitor-general, Murray, who was a better orator than Fox, and superior in argumentative debate to Pitt, might have made the duke's victory uncertain, if it had not been for the Jacobitism of his family, and his own fixed determination to stick to his profession as a lawyer, and to aspire to nothing more than the highest honours of the law. He was now on the verge of promotion, and soon became attorney-general. The Duke of Newcastle made himself first lord of the treasury, gave his place of secretary of state to Sir Thomas Robinson, and appointed Mr. Legge, originally the protégé of Mr. Pitt, chancellor of the exchequer. Pitt and Fox, left in their subordinate places, soon forgot their old rivalry in their common spite against Newcastle. But Pitt carefully concealed his resentment for some time, and continued to court the duke, whose creature or instrument he had repeatedly called himself. Newcastle, on his side, represented that, though Pitt had been left out, most of his friends were let in; thus, Lyttelton was treasurer of the navy, and Grenville cofferer. And at the same time Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, at the duke's request, wrote a long letter to pacify Pitt. Hardwicke, touching lightly on that delicate subject, the king's aversion to Pitt, artfully instilled into the great orator motives of jealousy against Fox, who was described as hungering after promotion, and as being sure of obtaining it at Pitt's expense, if the latter should betray any inconsiderate resentment.† The orator affected a tone of melancholy regret and broken-hearted submission; but he hoped that his grace of Newcastle would eventually bring forward "an instrument of his own raising," and effect "some degree of softening in his majesty's mind." On the 6th of April, just one month after Mr. Pelham's death, Pitt wrote a letter to the chancellor. It was meant to be pathetic, but it will appear in our days affected and mean. It would be well for the fame of that brilliant man if this epistle stood by itself; but in the turns and changes of his political course he wrote many such, and some still more base; and the recent publication of his own correspondence darkens the brightness of his fame and genius with a cloud that can never pass away, even in the eyes of those who are disposed to make the most liberal allowance for the low spirit of the age, and the unspeakable baseness of most of his political contemporaries. After a prelude of respect, veneration, gratitude, sensibility, &c., Pitt says to Hardwicke—"It is very kind and generous in your lordship to suggest a ray of distant, general hope to a man you see despairing, and to turn his hope forward from the present scene to a future. But, my lord, after having set out under suggestions of this general hope ten years ago, and bearing a load of obloquy for supporting the king's measures, and never obtaining, in recompense, the smallest remission of that displeasure I vainly laboured to soften, all ardour for public business is really extinguished in my mind, and I am totally deprived of all consideration by which alone I could have been of any use. The weight of irremovable royal displeasure is a load too great to move under; it must crush any man; it has sunk and broken me. I succumb; and wish for nothing but a decent and innocent retreat, wherein I may no longer, by continuing in the public stream of promotion, for ever stick fast aground, and afford to the world the ridiculous spectacle of being passed by every boat that navigates the same river. To speak without a figure, I will presume upon your lordship's great goodness to me to tell my utmost wish:—it is, that a retreat, not void of advantage or derogatory to the rank of the office I hold, might, as soon as practicable, be opened to me. In this view I take the liberty to recommend myself to your lordship's friendship, as I have done to the Duke of Newcastle's. Out of his grace's immediate province accommodations of this kind arise, and to your joint protection, and that only, I wish to owe the future satisfaction of my life."*

* The chancellor, who defended the repeal of the recent Jew Bill, was opposed to any thought of repealing this part of the Plantation Act. He said that as the Jews were chiefly concerned in remittances, it would undo our colonies to repeal what was done in favour of that people.—Walpole's Memoirs of George II.

* The candid Lord Waldegrave says of this much abused minister, "He had acquired the reputation of an able and honest minister; had a plain, solid understanding, improved by experience in business, as well as by a thorough knowledge of the world; and, without being an orator, or having the finest parts, no man in the House of Commons argued with more weight, or was heard with greater attention. He was a frugal steward to the public, averse to continental extravagance and useless subsidies, preferring a tolerable peace to the most successful war; jealous to maintain his personal credit and authority, but nowise inattentive to the true interest of his country." Even the uncharitable Horace Walpole confesses that Pelham "lived without abusing his power, and died poor."

At the same time, Pitt, who might easily have obtained a seat from his family or his friends, accepted from Newcastle his grace's borough of Aldborough. The elections passed off more quietly than had been expected, and the new parliament was essentially a Pelham parliament. It met on the 31st of May, and sat for five or six days in order to pass one bill, and to constitute itself a parliament; "for," says Walpole, "by the regency bill the last parliament that should sit in the life of the king was to revive on his death; and the new one was too acceptable to the ministry not to be ensured." The lord chancellor informed the Houses that his majesty would not call their attention to foreign affairs until they met in winter. Those affairs were becoming more and more involved:

the Spaniards were ordering their governors in the West Indies to fall upon our ships, and lending money to the French, who were building forts on some disputed territory, harassing Nova Scotia, and arming the wild Indians against the British settlers. But for internal dissensions in France about taxes and the Bull Unigenitus, the court of Versailles would have made or permitted greater exertions, in the belief that the Duke of Newcastle was too pacific or too weak to venture upon a war. The Earl of Albemarle, who was our ambassador, remonstrated and memorialised; but the French in-Canada continued their encroachments, and with a body of Indians fell upon Major Washington, who was erecting a little fort on the Ohio to protect the British territory. Washington, though then a very young man, displayed conduct as well as courage, but he was finally compelled to capitulate. The French continued erecting their forts, hoping to establish a chain of garrisons from Canada to the mouths of the Mississippi, and to starve out the British colonies; and, while Lord Albemarle was negotiating at Paris, the French court sent out reinforcements to Quebec. At the same time collisions between the English and French were constantly occurring in the East Indies and on the coast of Africa. The preservation of peace seemed an impossibility.

The new parliament re-assembled on the 14th of November; and then the king demanded supplies for the preservation of our rights in America; still, however, speaking as if all our differences with France and Spain might be accommodated by negotiation. But, in the debate upon the address, several members declared that Spain would never fulfil her promises, nor France cease her aggressions, until compelled by cannon-balls. Mr. Beckford said that now was the time to exert our naval strength, instead of looking out for alliances,—that our subsidised allies in the last war had run us thirty millions in debt,—that Queen Elizabeth, in her distress, did not go about begging and buying alliances.

A. D. 1755.—It was not, however, till the month of March that ministers frankly announced to parliament that a war was inevitable. Sir Thomas Robinson, the new secretary of state, who was a bad orator, and whose speeches were generally laughed at, acquainted the Commons, by His majesty's command, that France was making preparations, and that our forces must be instantly augmented. In the fears that were felt for Ireland, which was still dissatisfied and turbulent, all the officers on that establishment were ordered to their posts. The committee of supply eagerly voted a million for the defence of our American possessions; and Admiral Boscawen was sent with a good fleet towards the Gulf of St. Lawrence, to intercept a French fleet which had been prepared in the ports of Rochfort and Brest, and which was carrying reinforcements to the French Canadians. Boscawen was to fall upon the French, and, if possible, destroy them. He took post off the banks of Newfoundland; but the French admiral, Boia de la Mothe, passed him in a fog without seeing him, and got safe into the river St. Lawrence. Two French ships of the line were, however, captured by Captain Howe (afterwards Lord Howe) and Captain Andrews. Howe displayed wonderful bravery, and quite as much skill; the action lasted some hours; and the prizes were found to contain about 8000*l.* in money, and a considerable number of officers and engineers. As soon as this affair was known in Europe the French recalled M. de Mirepoix, their ambassador at London, and M. de Bussy, whom they had recently sent to Hanover to negotiate with the king there; for George, in spite of a motion made in the House of Lords by Earl Paulet to keep him in England at this critical conjuncture, had gone over to his continental dominions. The court of Versailles complained most bitterly and loudly of Boscawen's attacking their ships in a time of peace: the court of St. James's replied, that the French had rendered reprisals justifiable and necessary by their encroachments and warlike operations in America; and we recalled our ambassador from Paris. This was equivalent to a regular declaration of hostilities on both sides. In the month of July Sir Edward Hawke went on a cruise with eighteen ships of the line, a frigate, and a sloop; and on the 14th of October Admiral Byng took the sea with twenty-two ships of the line, two frigates, and two sloops. Both these fleets failed in the attempt of intercepting the French fleet on its return from America; but, in the mean time, our cruisers and privateers almost annihilated the French trade in the West Indies. According to Smollet, before the end of the year, three hundred French merchant ships, many of them from St. Domingo and Martinico, and extremely rich, and about eight thousand French seamen, were brought into English ports. This increased the commercial distress and the general discontent of the French nation to an alarming degree. No one would insure their outward-bound merchant-ships at a lower rate than thirty per cent., while the English paid no more than the common insurance. But our successes by land were inferior to those obtained by sea. Colonel Monckton defeated a body of French and Indians, and took the fort of Beau-Sour, on the confines of Nova Scotia; but Major-General Braddock was defeated and slain in an attempt to drive the French from the Ohio. Here, again, George Washington distinguished himself, and covered the retreat of the defeated English army. Sir William Johnson failed completely in an expedition against the French fort at Crown Point, and General Shirley was not more successful in a design to carry their fort at Niagara. A war of boats was carried on upon the vast freshwater lakes; and the English colonists began to construct larger vessels, in order to obtain the command of those waters. Monstrous cruelties were committed by the wild Indian tribes, who were then chiefly in alliance with the French Canadians. They laid waste the western frontiers of Virginia and Pennsylvania, and continued their atrocities during the winter, when the regular troops on both sides had gone into winter quarters.

The immediate cause of this war had not been Hanover, but Nova Scotia; but Hanover, in a manner, lay open to the vengeance of the French, who always treated that electorate as a sort of whipping boy to the royalty of England. To avert the chastisement now threatened, George entered into subsidising treaties with the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, the Empress of Russia, and the King of Prussia, who had long been negotiating, and who at last gave up his French alliance without ceremony and without scruple. This soon brought about a strange revolution in French politics; for Louis XV., who had been leagued with Prussia to dismember the territories of the empress-queen, now entered into the closest alliance with the House of Austria, the ancient enemy of the Bourbons. Both England and France did their utmost to secure Spain; but the court of Madrid very wisely determined to remain neutral. So high was the reputation of Frederick the Great, that an opinion was very generally held, both on the continent and in England, that that side must prevail on which he threw his victorious sword; yet some of our statesmen chose to entertain a contrary opinion, and among them was Mr. Pitt, who, two years after, when he was in power, and could manage matters in his own way, appreciated the military genius of Frederick, and backed him with all the resources of his government. But at the present moment Pitt was still a disappointed man. In the course of the autumn of the preceding year he came to an understanding with Fox that they should unite their forces against Newcastle, and that Fox should be placed at the head of the treasury, and that he (Pitt) should be secretary of state. He had just at the same time increased his political importance by marrying Lady Hester Grenville, the sister of Lord Temple; and he laboured, and with success, to convert the new secretary of state, Sir Thomas Robinson, into an object of contempt. The Duke of Newcastle was soon made aware of the Pitt and Fox alliance, which he determined to break, either by raising Pitt over Fox, or Fox over Pitt.* The disseverance was the easier, as neither party really trusted the other. The premier employed old Horace Walpole to break their coalition. Walpole first applied to Pitt, but, as Pitt required an instant admission into the cabinet, he failed. The Duke of Newcastle, or rather the king, then had recourse to Lord Waldegrave, who has left his own account of the negotiation. "It became necessary," says his lordship, "that Pitt and Fox should be disunited: one of them must be treated with; and Fox was first applied to, as being thought more practicable, less disagreeable to the king, and more a man of business. As Fox was apt to be warm, and the Duke of Newcastle as apt to be shuffling, it seemed necessary that some neutral person should negotiate between them; and his majesty thought proper to employ me on this occasion, because I belonged to neither of them, but was a well-wisher to both. That the progress of this amicable treaty might not be interrupted by a fresh quarrel, I persuaded them to defer their meeting till they had settled preliminaries, and clearly understood each other's meaning. Fox very readily gave me his demands in writing, which I reported to the king, and entered into a more minute explanation with the Duke of Newcastle, who made some objections, and proposed some alterations, but consented to most of the material articles. There would have been many more difficulties if I had not begun by terrifying his grace with a melancholy representation of the fatal consequences of Fox's uniting with Pitt in open opposition; how he would be exposed to all the virulence of abusive oratory; how his leaders in the House of Commons would be treated with contempt; and how his numerous parliamentary forces, having learned to despise their generals, would soon become mutinous and ungovernable. On the other hand, I assured Fox that the king had, if possible, still less inclination to make him a minister than the Duke of Newcastle himself. I therefore advised him, as a friend, to rest satisfied with a moderate share of power, and to wait for a more favourable opportunity; unless he had absolutely determined to join Pitt, enter into all the violence of opposition, set the nation in a flame, and take the closet by storm.* To remove some remaining difficulties, Lord Waldegrave proposed an interview between Fox and the premier, the result of which was an agreement that Fox should be called up to the cabinet; that employment should be given to some of his friends who were not yet provided for; and that others of his friends who had places already should be promoted. These arrangements were accordingly made. "But the Duke of Newcastle," says Waldegrave, "lost all the merit of every concession by conferring his favours with a bad grace; and it was easy to foresee that this peace and amity would be of short duration."

Fox, as a cabinet minister, had been named one of the council of regency on the king's departure for the continent, and he had induced the king and the Duke of Newcastle to make the Duke of Cumberland—for the first time—another of the lords justices, or members of the temporary regency; but Pitt had been left, as before, out of the cabinet and out of the regency—an irritated and almost mutinous paymaster of the forces. This induced him to draw more closely to Leicester House;† and he, together with his brothers-in-law, Lord Temple, and the Grenvilles, now paid as assiduous court to the Dowager Princess of Wales, her favourite, Lord Bute, and young Prince George, as they had done twenty years before to his father, Prince Frederick. But so much were Pitt and his party feared, that, during the king's absence on the continent this summer, fresh overtures were made, with his majesty's consent, to the great orator. Pitt proudly said that he would content himself with no mean employment—that he would be really a minister. The Duke of Newcastle replied, as he had often done before, that he had the greatest respect and esteem for Mr. Pitt, and wished to gratify him in every particular; but that the king would never give his consent to admit him into the cabinet: and so this treaty ended; and Pitt, though he retained his lucrative office of paymaster, was confirmed in his resolution of making open war upon the whole ministry. Legge, the chancellor of the exchequer, sided with the paymaster, and concurred with him in refusing to pay a draft for 100,000*l.* on account of the Russian subsidy, the treaty for which had not yet received the sanction of parliament. This refusal was constitutional and proper; but it may be suspected that it would never have been made if Pitt's ambition had been gratified, and if Legge's pride had not been hurt by Newcastle, who treated him little better than a government clerk. The king came over in September, and parliament met on the 13th of November, to exhibit what has been well called "the extraordinary scene of the chancellor of the exchequer and the paymaster opposing the treaties of the crown, both in their details and principles."‡ Pitt, as an orator, surpassed himself. He denounced the whole scheme of foreign negotiations as "flagrantly absurd and desperate;" as intended only to save Hanover at the expense of England; he lashed, crushed, crucified ministers, attacked Mr. Fox, and "even hinted up to the Duke of Cumberland himself."† "His eloquence," says Walpole, "like a torrent long obstructed, burst forth with more commanding impetuosity."‡ In the course of his speech he exclaimed, in the sure spirit of prophecy—"This, I hope, is the day that shall give the colour to my life!" The debate lasted till five o'clock in the morning. "If," says one of his bewitched audience, "eloquence could convince, Mr. Pitt would have had more than 105 against 311; but it is long since the arts of persuasion were artful enough to persuade;—rhetoric was invented before places and commissions! The expectation of the world is suspended, to see whether these gentlemen will resign or be dismissed: perhaps neither; perhaps they may continue in place and opposition; perhaps they may continue in place and not oppose."§ But the world was not left long in doubt; for, on the 20th of November, a week after the great oratorical display, the irritated king dismissed both Pitt and Legge: Pitt's brother-in-law, George Grenville, treasurer of the navy, was turned out on the same day, and his other brother-in-law, James Grenville, resigned his seat at the board of trade. The great orator felt confident that the cause of his dismissal would raise him to be the idol of the people; but, at the same time, he accepted from the court a pension of 1000*l.* a-year! In the recasting of parts in the ministerial drama, Sir George Lyttelton, who had some time before quarrelled with Pitt and joined the Duke of Newcastle, was made chancellor of the exchequer in lieu of Legge; Pitt's place of paymaster was split into two, and conferred upon the Earl of Darlington and Viscount Duplin; ~~Some~~ Jenyns obtained a seat at the board of trade, and Bubb Dodington, after many hopes delayed, crosses, losses, and heart-burnings, got snugly back to the treasurership of the navy.* Mr. Fox gained an important step; for the king at length consented to dismiss Sir Thomas Robinson, and gave him the seals of secretary of state. Sir Thomas, who was very acceptable to the king, because he was intimately acquainted with Germany and German politics, was soothed with the place of master of the wardrobe, and a good pension settled upon him for the lives of himself and his sons. Lord Barrington, formerly master of the wardrobe, succeeded Fox as secretary-at-war. The Duke of Leeds became cofferer in place of Sir George Lyttelton; the Duke of Marlborough became master of the ordnance, a place which had long been kept vacant, and Lord Gower stepped into the place which Marlborough vacated, that of lord privy seal. There were several minor appointments and one or two pensions, granted as usual upon Ireland; but Fox complained in the beginning that Newcastle did not keep his promise; but kept too many of these good things for his own creatures. Several of the characters thus reproduced had figured in a contemptible manner before; "but," says Horace Walpole, "as the Duke of Newcastle has so often turned in and out all the men in England, he must employ some of the same dupes over again."†

It was evident to every one that this cabinet could not stand. The Princess Dowager of Wales was furious against the Duke of Newcastle for having admitted Fox to the cabinet, and the Duke of Cumberland to the regency. She still dreaded the power of her royal brother-in-law, and hated Cumberland as much as she feared him; and she still retained all the jealousies which had divided the royal family during the lifetime of her husband. Until recently she had hated Pitt, but now she admitted him as chief and arbiter of the little junta of Leicester House. "Pitt," says Lord Waldegrave, "who had been a groom of the bedchamber to the prince her husband, and had not quitted his master in the most decent manner, makes a tender of his services, with the assistance of his relations and friends, which are joyfully accepted. This treaty was negotiated by the Earl of Bute, at that time a favourite of little fame, but who has since merited a very uncommon reputation."‡ The substance of the treaty was, that Pitt and his friends should do their utmost to support the princess dowager and her son, and to oppose the Duke of Cumberland and raise a clamour against him. An event had occurred during the preceding summer which engaged Leicester House deeper in faction than was at first intended. During his majesty's absence from England the Duchess of Brunswick Wolfenbottel paid him a visit at Hanover, with two unmarried and marriageable daughters. The elder of the young princesses was handsome, cheerful, modest, sensible, and accomplished; and George was so charmed with her that he was eager to marry her at once to his grandson, who was entering into his eighteenth year.† As soon as the king's intention was whispered in England, the Princess Dowager of Wales, who, to use the language of a courtier, who probably repeated the very words of the old king, "was tempted to do a job for her own relations, by marrying her son to one of the Saxe Gotha family," exerted all her influence and all her energy to defeat it. She taught her son to believe that he was to be made a sacrifice merely to gratify the king's private interest in the electorate of Hanover; and that the intended bride would make a very bad wife. "The young princess," adds Lord Waldegrave, who was still governor to the prince, "was most cruelly misrepresented; many even of her perfections were aggravated into faults; his royal highness implicitly believing every idle tale and improbable aspersion, till his prejudice against her amounted to aversion itself. From this time all duty and obedience to the grandfather entirely ceased: for, though it would have been difficult to have persuaded him to do that which he thought wrong, he was ready to think right whatever was prompted either by his mother or by her favourite, the Earl of Bute." Thus Leicester House became more and more what it has been aptly called—"The putting place of princes"—and the young George promised fair to be as troublesome to the old one as his father had been before him. It was arranged, however, in the junta that neither the prince nor his mother should openly declare themselves, unless the king's obstinacy in the affair of the marriage should force them to pull off the mask. "But they were to shew strong symptoms, by taking that kind of notice of the † Old George afterwards told Lord Waldegrave, with much animation, that, had he been only twenty years younger, the young lady would never have been refused by a Prince of Wales, but should at once have been Queen of England.

* Bubb records one very sad tale of pecuniary loss. Having, as he fancied, made sure of ministers, he had spent in the preceding year nearly 6000*l.* in a disputed election, and had not even received the thanks of the court. Nay, the Duke of Newcastle had told him that the king said that he could not bestow on him any mark of his favour. "And yet," says Bubb, "Mr. Pelham had declared that I had a good deal of merchantable stock (parliamentary interest), and that if I would empower him to offer it all to the king without conditions, he would be answerable to bring the affair to a good account."

king's principal servants which at court is called rumping, whilst Pitt and his relations were most graciously received, and whilst the Earl of Bute was distinguished by the most particular marks of favour and confidence; a notification to all men who sought for future preferment, that without his lordship's mediation there was no political salvation. The king, who had early intelligence of everything they did, and of most things they intended, treated the princess with the same coldness with which she and her son treated his ministers.* About three months after the king's return to England, the old king called the Prince of Wales into his closet; not to propose the match, which he knew would be rejected, but to find out the extent of his political knowledge, to sift him and caution him against evil counsellors. The discourse was short, the substance kind and affectionate, though the king's manner was not quite gracious. "The prince," says the narrator who best knew what passed, and was least capable of misrepresenting it, "was flustered and sulky; bowed, but scarce made any answer: so the conference ended very little to the satisfaction of either party. Here his majesty was guilty of a very capital mistake: instead of sending for the prince, he should have spoke firmly to the mother: told her that, as she governed her son, she should be answerable for his conduct; that he would overlook what was past, and treat her still like a friend, if she behaved in a proper manner; but, on the other hand, if either herself, her son, or any person influenced by them, should give any future disturbance, she must expect no quarter: he might then have ended his admonition, by whispering a word in her ear, which would have made her tremble, in spite of her spotless innocence." The one word in Lord Waldegrave's mind was, no doubt, BUTE. The sudden and extraordinary favour of that handsome Scotch lord had long before this given rise to sinister reports and scandals that fell heavily upon the fair fame of the princess dowager. Horace Walpole, jesting on the subject, says one of the reasons for his not going to pay his court at Leicester House was, his dread lest, in his absent-mindedness, he should address Lord Bute as "Your royal highness!" The admission of Lord Waldegrave, that the princess's innocence was spotless, is corroborated by others who had the best opportunities of judging of the fact; but, nevertheless, the rumours were loud and of dangerous import. The virtue of the princess dowager was weighed in the scales of faction, and while she was maintained to be all purity and continence by the opposition, the government party was ready to declare a somewhat different opinion. At a subsequent period we shall find the case altered, and that the princess dowager's virtue becomes dress under the assay of the opposition, and double refined gold in that of the government party. It was this family war which animated the cause and gave spirit and vigour to the so-called Patriots! Yet, though aided by the splendid rhetoric of Pitt, the opposition could scarcely diminish the great majorities of ministers; and it was even thought that the ill humour of Leicester House did more harm than good. "This," says Waldegrave, "may at first appear extraordinary; but the wonder ceases when we examine the conduct of the Princess of Wales, who had not acquired that freedom and openness of behaviour which gains the profligate; whilst the sober and conscientious part of the world doubted whether it was strictly right that a boy of seventeen should be taught to set his grandfather at defiance: nor were they much edified with other rumours of a less serious nature, which were now universally credited." Murray, now attorney-general, assisted Fox in defending the subsidy treaties and the other measures of government, and distinguished himself so much, both as a debater and orator, that he was considered nearly equal to Pitt in everything except invective and denunciation.

A.D. 1756.—For the navy 50,000 men, including marines, were voted; for the army 34,263 native British; and enormous supplies, necessitating new duties and taxes, were carried by immense majorities. As there was a rumour of flat-bottomed boats and invasion, parliament even consented to the bringing over 8000 Hanoverians and Hessians for the defence of England; but at the close of the session, in the month of May, Speaker Onslow, in presenting the money bills, ventured to say for the House of Commons, that "there were two circumstances existing, at which nothing but their confidence in his majesty's justice and love to his people could hinder them from being most seriously alarmed—subsidies to foreign princes and an army of foreign troops—a thing unprecedented, unheard of, unknown, brought into England: . . . still they had reliance upon his majesty, and hoped that their burdens might be lightened, their fears removed as soon as possible; and, in the mean time, that the sword of these foreigners should not be trusted a moment out of his own hand to any other person whatsoever."

The king's negotiations with the Czarina came to nothing, and the Russians joined the French and Austrians against the King of Prussia, who was, moreover, threatened by the Poles and the Saxons, who were both under one bad sovereign. The plan of the empress-queen was to bring an army of Muscovites into the heart of Germany, and to throw them and the Saxons upon Frederick in an unguarded moment. But Frederick was the last prince in the world to be caught napping: he made his treaty with George to include as a prin-

* Lord Waldegrave's Memoirs. His lordship did not fancy that her desire to provide for a princess of her own family was the sole reason that made her royal highness oppose the marriage with the Wolfenbutterl. On the contrary, he thought that her anxious desire to retain the control over her son had quite as much to do with her opposition. He says—"She knew the temper of the prince, her son; that he was by nature indolent, but loved a domestic life, and would make an excellent husband. She knew, also, that the young princess, having merit and understanding equal to her beauty, and in a short time have the greatest influence over him. In which circumstances it may naturally be concluded that her royal highness did everything in her power to prevent the match."

ciple the prevention of the introduction of foreign troops into the empire (a stipulation which was alike calculated to save Prussia from the Russians, and Hanover from the French); he wrote to his now loving uncle that it was better prævenire quam præveniri; and he attended with all his wonderful activity and untiring application to the improving and increasing of his veteran army, well knowing that the habitual slowness of Austria, the unwarlike character and habits of the Saxon sovereign, and the poverty and the sluggish march of the Russians would allow him time for everything.

But before Frederick marched to victory the flag of England was disgraced. While ministers were alarmed with hostile preparations on the Channel, and bringing over Hessians and Hanoverians to be useless and to be laughed at, the French got ready a vast armament in the Mediterranean to pounce upon Minorca, which we had left in a miserable state of defence. Even when they were duly informed that this French fleet would soon sail from Toulon, our ministers pretended that it was nothing more than a feint, to facilitate a descent upon England or Ireland by drawing off our ships of the line to blockade the rotten part of the French navy in the harbour of Toulon; and they persisted in keeping our ships at home. But, as Minorca was prized next to Gibraltar, and as Pitt and the people began to exclaim against this neglect, they awoke from their lethargy, and tardily dispatched Admiral Byng with what the admiral thought an insufficient fleet, to the Mediterranean. Byng was instructed to touch at Gibraltar, to take on board some troops there, and then to proceed with all haste to Port Mahon. But the governor and garrison of Gibraltar, alarmed by reports of an intended siege, called a council of war, and absolutely refused to spare Byng a battalion. The lateness and the insufficiency of the expedition was Byng's first misfortune—this was the second; and he made it worse by intimating to the Admiralty at home that, in case he found it dangerous to attempt the relief of Minorca, he should retire under the guns of Gibraltar! Time was lost again, of which too much had been lost already; the Duke of Richelieu had landed in Minorca with 16,000 men; and la Galissoniere was cruising off Port Mahon with thirteen ships of the line. In fact, so wretchedly had the expedition been timed, that Byng, who had to cross the Bay of Biscay, to touch at Gibraltar, and then traverse two hundred leagues of the Mediterranean, left Spithead only three days before the French, who had merely to cross the Gulf of Lyons, and sail some seventy leagues in all, left Toulon. Byng had only ten ships of the line, and these in not very good condition; yet Admiral Anson, now a peer and at the head of the Admiralty, had declared that this squadron would beat anything the French had or could have in the Mediterranean; and upon this confident assertion the Duke of Newcastle had disregarded the advice of Mr. Fox, to send more ships.* Byng, however, was joined at Gibraltar by Captain Edgecombe, who had run down from Minorca (where he had left his marines to strengthen the castle) with a third-rate ship and a sloop; and as he sailed up the Mediterranean he was joined off Majorca by Captain Hervey in another ship. But all these vessels, which had been long cruising in the Mediterranean, were exceedingly foul. With that despondency which is in itself an assurance of failure or defeat, Byng, on the 18th of May, approached Minorca and saw the British colours still flying over the fortress of St. Philip, though the French flag was seen on other points, and numerous bomb-batteries were playing upon the castle. La Galissoniere was not in sight; but before Byng could send a letter on shore to General Blakeney, the brave old governor, whom we have seen before defending Stirling Castle, the whole French fleet, which now comprised four smaller vessels besides the thirteen ships of the line, appeared to the south-east advancing in order of battle. Byng then formed his line, and the men expected to be soon at their guns; but, about seven o'clock in the evening, la Galissoniere tacked, to gain the weather-gage; then Byng manœuvred so as to keep the advantage of the weather-gage;—and night fell without a gun being fired. When morning dawned the French fleet was invisible; but the English picked up a tartan (a small, one-masted vessel) with some French soldiers on board, sent out to reinforce their fleet; and in a few hours that fleet itself re-appeared. The line of battle was again formed on either side, and about two o'clock in the afternoon Byng threw out a signal to bear away two points from the wind and engage. His second in command, Rear-Admiral West, perceiving it impossible to comply with both orders, bore away with his division, not two, but seven points from the wind, and, closing down, attacked the French with such spirit that he drove several of their ships out of the line. But Byng, enslaved by his despondency and that passion for routine and rigid discipline which, together with his pride and austerity, had made him unpopular in the service, would not advance, saying that he was determined to keep his line entire—that nothing was so dangerous as an irregular fight;—and notwithstanding the remonstrances of his own captain he left West to be destroyed or fall back, and he kept at such a wary distance that his own ship, a noble vessel of ninety guns, was scarcely brought into action at all; for, though, in a paltry play of long guns, she received a shot or two in her hull, she had not a single man either killed or wounded. West of course was obliged to veer round; and then la Galissoniere, who certainly had no inclination to continue the battle, edged away under easy sail, to join the ships which West had beaten. Then Byng gave the signal for chase, but he made no way upon them, as the enemy's ships were cleaner than his:—towards evening he put his fleet on the other tack, in order to keep to the windward;—and the next morning the French were altogether out of sight! La Galissoniere, who before Byng's appearance had landed supplies and reinforcements for the besiegers, was gone back towards Toulon, claiming the honours of victory. Having thus failed in destroying the French ships, Byng next failed in helping the English garrison. He called a council of war, and represented that forty-two men, including Captain Andrews of the Defiance, had been killed, and about 170 wounded; that three of his best ships were so damaged in their masts and rigging that they could not keep the sea; that a great many of the scamen were sick, and that he had no hospital-vessel for the sick and wounded; that la Galissoniere, who might return,* was much superior to him in weight of metal; that in his opinion it was impossible to relieve Fort St. Philip, and that it would be imprudent, if practicable, to throw a handful of men and officers ashore, as they could only increase our loss in the inevitable surrender of that place; and, as the doleful end of all, he said that the fleet ought to make the best of its way back to Gibraltar, which might be in as great danger as Minorca. All his officers, and some colonels of regiments who had gone out with him from England, subscribed to this opinion; and Byng returned forthwith to the Rock. If old Blakeney had laid down his arms at the sight of the retiring fleet, which had done nothing for him, his conduct would have been excusable; but, though oppressed with age and sickness, and suffering the tortures of the gout, the veteran held out till the beginning of July, when he obtained honourable terms of capitulation for himself and his garrison, which had been reduced rather by the enmity of the natives, hard duty, and want of proper supplies, than by the fire of the enemy or the unscientific operations of the Duke of Richelieu.†

As soon as ministers knew of Byng's retreat they sent out Admirals Hawke and Saunders to take the command in the Mediterranean, and Lord Tyrawley to supersede General Fowke as governor at Gibraltar. Byng, on learning that he was recalled, wrote a stinging letter to the Admiralty, in which he justified his conduct, and threw the blame of his failure upon ministers. Thereupon directions were sent to Admiral Hawke to put him under arrest. The ill-fated commander arrived as a prisoner at Portsmouth, where the people were with difficulty prevented from tearing him to pieces. The same rage against him prevailed all over the kingdom, and in no place to a greater extent than in London, where the mob, in a mistake, fell upon a gentleman in the streets, who resembled the admiral, and were with difficulty prevented from tearing him to pieces. It is assumed that ministers encouraged this popular fury against

Byng, in order to turn it from themselves. Nothing can well be clearer than that there were enormous and most exasperating faults on both sides. The admiral's faults, however, were the more visible to the popular eye; and, happily, the English people had contracted a tenfold horror of anything that looked like cowardice, when the element was the sea. It required a captain and a party of sixty dragoons to bring Byng up to London and save him from summary execution on the road. It was expected that he would be lodged in the Tower, but he was committed a close prisoner to an apartment in Greenwich Hospital, where he continued to quarrel with the Admiralty and ministry, and to behave like a man conscious of having done his best. Meanwhile the Duke of Newcastle made the unseemly excuse that no blame could rest upon him as the sea was not his province. To this shallow reasoning his much dissatisfied colleague in office, Mr. Fox, replied that those who had the chief direction in an administration would always bear the greatest share of blame. And Fox asked Bubb Dodington whether it were not true that the premier must be the most obnoxious? "I," says Dodington, "answered, yes; unless they had any one to make a scape-goat!" "Fox," he continues, "seemed alarmed, and asked me if I thought him likely to be a scape-goat, and dwelt upon the expression. I told him, as the truth was, that I had not him in any degree so much as in my contemplation, and I had no such apprehensions. Mr. Fox continued, and said he was very uneasy; that the country was in a sad way; but, if it was in a better, those who had the direction of it could no more carry on this war than his three children—that he himself had always hinted at sending a squadron to Minorca sooner; and that the Duke of Cumberland had pressed it strongly, so long ago as last Christmas."* Fox further declared to the Duke of Newcastle himself, that he had defended his grace in the House of Commons, in everything where he could defend him; "but in one thing he never could, which was, in his not believing it must be war, and in not arming sooner."† And in the month of October Fox, after betraying what Dodington calls "an extraordinary perturbation," resigned; for, as Murray, the attorney-general, was about retiring to the bench and the House of Peers,‡ in spite of every effort to retain him in the Commons, he foresaw that he should be left alone to contend in the Commons against Pitt and the opposition, whose tongues would be sharpened by ‡ Sir Dudley Rider, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, had died very unexpectedly, and Murray put in for his place. Rather than lose their ablest debater in the House of Commons at a moment when his services were so much wanted, ministers tempted him with a profusion of offers—as a very honourable employment, with a large salary for his own life, a considerable reversion for his family, and a peerage in futurity; but Murray, who had a large independent fortune, and no children, refused them all, having always aimed at the post of Chief Justice, for which, in the estimation of all men, he was admirably qualified. "At last," says Lord Waldegrave, "after various proposals on one part, and as many refusals on the other, Murray was obliged to tell them, in plain terms, that if they did not think proper to make him lord chief justice, he would no longer continue attorney-general; and, as to the business of the House of Commons, he should leave them to fight their own battles."

* The French admiral did return almost as soon as Byng was out of sight, but he took care to run away again before Hawke came in sight.
† The king was so well satisfied with Blakeney's conduct that he made him

other disgraces and failures besides those in the Mediterranean, seeing that the arms of England were tarnished in the course of this year in both the Indies. "This resignation," says Lord Waldegrave, "was nowise pleasing to the Duke of Newcastle, who meant that Fox should have continued in a responsible office, with a double portion of danger and abuse, but without any share of power." Seeing that he had neither Fox nor Murray to fight his battles with Pitt, Newcastle endeavoured to disarm the great orator's hostility by bringing him into the cabinet; and he prevailed so far with the king as to convince him that Pitt was an inevitable necessity. But Pitt now thought himself strong enough to impose his own terms, and, when summoned to town by the king's orders, he positively refused to coalesce with Newcastle, or belong to any ministry of which that nobleman formed a part. The bewildered premier, who had recently incurred the mortal hatred of Leicester House, by opposing, as long as he could, the promotion of the Earl of Bute to be groom of the stole to the young Prince of Wales, while Pitt had, in a manner, identified himself with the interests of Bute, hardly knew where to look for colleagues and for support. At last he addressed himself to Lord Egmont, the Tory declaimer, who had gained a reputation in the House by his spirited speeches on the opposition side, and who had an excellent character in private life. He, too, had been identified with Leicester House, but the Duke of Newcastle knew how easily and how often public men had changed sides; and, perhaps not reflecting sufficiently on the very advanced age of the king and the resentful temper of the heir-apparent and his mother, he fancied that Egmont would be irresistibly tempted by the offer of Fox's place of secretary of state. But Egmont wanted to be elevated at once to the House of Lords, where his services were not required. Newcastle promised him an English peerage in futuro, if he would only accept office and fight his battles at this critical conjuncture in the Commons: but Egmont, who had no great faith in ministerial promises, refused to engage unless he was instantly removed to the House of Lords. His grace next applied to the dashing, daring Granville, who was president of the council, and modestly proposed exchanging employments, he, the duke, descending to the presidency, and Lord Granville mounting to the head of the treasury and premiership: but age had somewhat cooled Granville's boldness, and he told Newcastle that he was not now what he had been ten years ago, that experience had made him wiser, and that he was well contented with the ease and dignity of his present employment. At last, when all his proposals had been rejected, and when no man would stand in the gap, the Duke of Newcastle, after having filled the offices of secretary of state and first lord of the treasury for thirty-two years, reluctantly resigned, and was followed by his friend the chancellor, Lord Hardwicke, who had held the seals nearly twenty years. Nothing then was left for the king to do but to call in Pitt, whom he still detested, and Pitt's great political friends. Pitt showed no great eagerness, reporting that he had got a fit of the gout, a malady which he frequently and notoriously put on to serve an occasion. The Duke of Devonshire was scarcely more eager than Pitt, and did not accept the Treasury and the nominal premiership till his majesty had given his word, that, in case he disliked his employment, he should be at full liberty to resign at the end of the approaching session of parliament. Lord Temple and Lord Bute—for the understanding with Leicester House was now complete—seem to have had the chief management, the king mentally reserving to himself the determination to undo what was now done as soon as he should be able. There was much caballing, and many minor difficulties were raised. Pitt's demands were at first thought so unreasonable, that the king authorised the Duke of Devonshire to endeavour to form an administration in concert with Fox and the Duke of Bedford, and with any other assistance that could be obtained, provided Pitt and his adherents might be excluded. Fox and some others were ready to engage with the Duke of Devonshire; and for two days it seemed doubtful who were to be our ministers. But in this interval Pitt became more reasonable, and Devonshire, who was convinced that the new cabinet could not stand without him, advised his majesty to comply with his demands. "The Duke of Devonshire," continues Lord Waldegrave, "joined Pitt rather than Fox, not from any change of friendship, or any partiality in Pitt's favour, but because it was more safe to be united with him who had the nation of his side, than with the man who was the most unpopular. A reason which will always have its proper weight with most ministers." Pitt, therefore, succeeded Fox as secretary of state; his friend Legge was re-appointed chancellor of the exchequer in lieu of Sir George Lyttelton, who was raised to the peerage and retired into the country to study divinity, and to write Dialogues of the Dead; Pitt's brother-in-law, Lord Temple, was placed at the head of the Admiralty in lieu of Lord Anson, who had become exceedingly unpopular on account of our naval failures; and Temple's brother, George Grenville, was made Treasurer of the Navy in the place of Bubb Dodington, who had scarcely held that office a year; Pitt's other brother-in-law, James Grenville, was restored to his seat at the Treasury Board; the great seal was put in commission, with Willes, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, as first commissioner; and the rest of Pitt's friends were provided for in the Treasury, Admiralty, or other places of less consequence, in proportion to their parliamentary interest or their abilities in debate. There seemed, indeed, one exception to this latter rule; for Charles Townshend, an accomplished debater and ever ready speaker, was merely made treasurer of the chamber, though his abilities seemed to qualify him for, and to demand, a more important employment. Hence the inference was drawn that Pitt was very capable of ministerial jealousy, and did not choose to advance a young man whose abilities were thought to be of the same kind and in some respects nearly equal to his own.*

But the ministry thus formed was so badly provided with interest in the boroughs that it was said to resemble an administration out of parliament, and it was no easy matter to turn the House of Commons now sitting from their old allegiance to Newcastle. Dr. Hay, one of the new lords of the admiralty, was defeated in an election at Stockbridge by the friends of Fox, and there was a difficulty in finding a borough for Charles Townshend. Nor was the conduct of some of the new cabinet at all calculated to remove the antipathies of the king. Pitt protested he would not serve if thanks were moved in the House of Commons to his majesty for having brought over the Hanoverian troops; and Lord Temple thwarted the royal inclination in this and in several other matters. Pitt, however, was ready and willing to support his majesty's treaties in Germany; and parliament opened in the midst of clamours, and discontent, and popular riots in many places, occasioned by the excessive dearness of bread. The speech from the throne appeared, from its style and substance, to be the work of a new speech-maker; the militia, which his majesty had always turned into ridicule, being strongly recommended as the best and most constitutional means of defending England from invasion; and the late administration being severely censured. This was not the first time that the king's speech in parliament had been made to express sentiments which his majesty did not entertain in private; but, on the present occasion, his aversion to Pitt made him feel the discrepancy more acutely; and, in common conversation, he frankly declared his real sentiments. When a poor printer was to be punished for publishing a spurious opening speech, George observed, with some humour, that he hoped the man's punishment would be of the mildest sort, for he had read both speeches, and, as far as he understood either of them, he liked the spurious speech better than his own. And on the very first day of the session, when it was moved in the House of Lords to thank the king for having brought over the Hanoverians, who were now returning to their own country at a moment when we wanted their assistance, Lord Temple, the new chief of the admiralty, told their lordships that he had come down to the House out of a sick bed, and at the hazard of his life, to represent the fatal consequences of the intended compliment to the king. The people of England, he said, would be offended even at the name of Hanover or of foreign mercenaries. Pitt nevertheless, and notwithstanding ing his numerous and his very recent protests against German treaties and alliances, adopted the subsidising treaty with Prussia, which was avowedly for the defence of Hanover; and his first appearance as minister in the House of Commons was to express his affection for our good ally the King of Prussia, and to propose a vote of 200,000*l.* on his account. Fox reminded him that he had lately called Hanover "a mill-stone round the neck of England;" but Pitt paid little attention to such attacks, and kept his countenance in spite of his inconsistency. The brilliant achievements of Frederick may perhaps have convinced him that this time the money of England would not be altogether thrown away. One evening, in the month of August, Frederick, at a great supper, whispered to Sir Andrew Mitchell, the English ambassador, that he wished to see him at three o'clock on the following morning. Mitchell kept the early appointment, and was conducted by Frederick to his camp. "Here," said the great soldier, "are a hundred thousand men setting out this instant they know not whither: write to your master that I am going to defend his majesty's dominions and my own." By the end of August Frederick was master nearly of all Saxony; by the middle of September he had taken possession of Dresden, blockaded the Saxon army in their fortified camp at Pirna, and defeated two Austrian armies; and by the middle of October he had compelled the Saxons to fly everywhere or surrender, and had driven their elector into his kingdom of Poland. Hereupon the aulic council of the empire declared him a disturber of the public peace and a rebel: but, as Voltaire observes, it was difficult to make their declaration good against a prince who had now 150,000 soldiers at his command, and who already passed for the greatest general in Europe. The "Seven Years' War" was now fairly begun: France, Sweden, Russia, all declared against Frederick; and our hopes of coming honourably out of the war on the continent of Europe, and advantageously out of it in America and the East Indies, all rested upon the personal safety and the genius and energy of that wonderful man. If a cannon-ball had cut short the career of Frederick, it would have required something more than the parliamentary eloquence and official activity of Pitt to have carried us honourably through the seven years' war. Pitt, however, as a minister, was a most valuable ally; he sustained Frederick cordially, and he promoted schemes of conquest both in the East and West Indies, and also on the coast of Africa, which distracted the attention and weakened the resources of France.

A. D. 1757.—The overthrow of the cabinet which had employed him had not the effect of moderating the popular indignation against Admiral Byng; and, if the Duke of Newcastle and his colleagues had been willing to make him a scape-goat, the new ministry were just as unwilling to contract any odium by saving him. After Pitt's accession to office the admiral was removed from Greenwich to Portsmouth harbour, and there, on board the St. George, his trial was begun by court-martial. Byng made so sure of a prompt acquittal, that he kept a post-chaise standing daily, nay, hourly, ready to carry him up to London, as it were in triumph; and he told a friend that, as soon as he should reach town, he would take his seat in the House of Commons, and return the charge upon his enemies by a regular accusation, the heads of which he had written out.* He employed a number of people to write up by every post from Portsmouth, and fill the newspapers with paragraphs in his favour; "and he himself, and all about him, affected a show of the most sanguine hopes, or rather of a state of absolute security."† But, after a long and careful examination of witnesses,—the trial lasted a month,—the court-martial‡ came to the resolution that Byng had not done his utmost to take, seize, and destroy the ships of the French king, which it was his duty to have engaged, nor to assist such of his majesty's ships as were engaged, which it was his duty to have assisted; and that he did not exert his utmost power for the relief of Fort St. Philip; and they, therefore, unanimously agreed that he fell under part of the twelfth article of an act of parliament of the twenty-second year of his present majesty, for amending, explaining, and reducing into one act the laws relating to the government of his majesty's ships, vessels, and forces by sea; and, as that article positively prescribed death without any alternative left to the discretion of the court, under any variation of circumstances, the court did unanimously adjudge the said Admiral John Byng to be shot to death, at such time, and on board such ship, as the lords commissioners of the admiralty should direct. The court, however, added to their sentence that, as it appeared by the evidence of Lord Robert Bertie, Colonel Smith, Captain Gardener, and other officers who were near the person of the admiral during the engagement, that they did not perceive any backwardness in him during the action, or any marks of fear or confusion either from his countenance or behaviour, and that he did not seem wanting in personal courage, the court, from these and other circumstances, did not believe that his misconduct arose either from cowardice§ or disaffection, and did therefore unanimously think it their duty most earnestly to recommend him as a proper object of mercy: and, not resting satisfied with this, the president of the court-martial, and every member of it, sent up a petition or representation to the Board of Admiralty, where Pitt's brother-in-law, Lord Temple, now presided. "In the whole course of this trial," said they, "we have done our utmost endeavour to come at the truth, and to do the strictest justice to our country and the prisoner; but we cannot help laying the distresses of our minds before your lordships on this occasion, in finding ourselves under a necessity of condemning a man to death under the great severity of the twelfth article of war, part of which he falls under, and which admits of no mitigation, even if the crime should be committed by an error in judgment only; and therefore, for our own consciences' sakes, as well as in justice to the prisoner, we pray your lordships, in the most earnest manner, to recommend him to his majesty's clemency." Nothing was more uncommon than the execution of any criminal when his judge recommended him to the mercy of the crown; but in the present instance it was resolved to let the law take its course; the Duke of Newcastle and the late ministers had in a manner barricaded the gates of mercy, by engaging the king in a promise to the petitioning or remonstrating city of London, and his majesty now took no notice of the recommendation to mercy. The sentence of the court-martial was called a very strange thing—not so much a sentence against Admiral Byng as against the articles of war. "In the mean while," says one well disposed to the court, "all the world agreed that it was a cruel thing to throw the determination on the king, who was in a manner told in the sentence that he ought to pardon Byng, notwithstanding he had in a solemn manner declared, in his answer to the address of the city of London, that he would allow law and justice to have their course. The city began to sound this very high."¶ A great deal more has been said to throw the blame upon the court-martial, and to involve some of its members in dark suspicions; yet, viewing the Duke de Richelieu to M. Voltaire, in which he declared that Mr. Byng had acted like a brave and a prudent admiral in the engagement; and that, as the French were greatly superior in men and in the condition of their ships to the English on that occasion, had Mr. Byng obstinately persisted in a closer engagement, he must by that have given up the English fleet to sure destruction. You may judge whether that attestation could have been of great service to Mr. Byng. Many are of opinion that this certificate of good behaviour had been begged by him or his friends."—Letter from Symmer to Mitchell, in Sir H. Ellis's Collection.

* "Both had fine natural parts; both were capable of great application; which was the greater master of abuse could not easily be determined; and, if there was something more awful and compulsory in Pitt's oratory, there was more sentiment and more wit in Charles Townshend's."—Lord Waldegrave's Memoirs.

A better objection to the letter would be, that Richelieu, on shore and at the distance of some leagues, could hardly be a good judge of what passed at sea. The letter should have been written by La Galissoniere; but, even then, it would have had little weight with the English public, but would probably have increased the irritation. The sentence of the letter was certainly the spontaneous act of Voltaire, who was a man of active humanity, and who had testified before now his abhorrence of harsh and cruel judgments. His note to Byng, including Richelieu's letter, was written in English, and in the following words:—"Sir, though I am almost unknown to you, I think 'tis my duty to send you the copy of the letter which I have just received from the Marshal Duc de Richelieu; honour, humanity, and equity order me to convey it into your hands. The noble and unexpected testimony from one of the most candid, as well as most generous, of my countrymen, makes me presume your judgment will do you the same justice."

‡ The court consisted of Thomas Smith, Esq., Vice-Admiral of the Red, president; Francis Holburne, Esq., Rear-Admiral of the Red; Henry Norris, Esq., Rear-Admiral of the White; Thomas Urdroick, Esq., Rear-Admiral of the Blue; and Captains Charles Holmes, William Boscawen, John Simcoe, John Bontley, Peter Denis, Francis Geary, John Moore, James Douglas, and the Hon. Augustus Kestel.

§ That vain, flighty, and empty scribbler and poetaster, the Rev. Percival Stockdale, who was an officer of marines before he entered the church, and who was present in the engagement off Minorca, says, roundly, that Byng betrayed symptoms of personal fear; but the assertions of such a coxcomb scarcely merit any attention. "A very odd circumstance," says the correspondent of Sir Andrew Mitchell, "was thrown in after the close of the evidence, which has afforded matter of speculation. A letter came from M. Voltaire addressed to Mr. Byng, which was stamped at the post-office, brought to Lord Holderness, and opened. This contained an original letter from the subject calmly, it appears to us that that court could scarcely have returned any other sentence. They absolved Byng of personal cowardice,—treachery was out of the question,—but they found that there had been great remissness and errors in judgment; and it was not their fault, but the fault of the war articles, if such things in a commander were punishable with death. They expressed, in the strongest manner, their opinion that the law was too severe; they complained that it had left nothing to the discretion of the court; and they did all that remained for them to do, in recommending the case to the royal prerogative, which alone could suspend execution. The fate of Byng rested with the king and the king's advisers. It is generally stated that Pitt was willing that the unhappy officer should be pardoned, but wished to throw the unpopularity of the act on the king personally;* and it appears to us quite in character that he should carefully shun risking his own popularity, which he had revived and brightened up by going out of office on the Hessian subsidy in 1755, but which he had put in some peril by returning to office and voting for far greater subsidies in 1756. We can hardly credit that Pitt pretended to know more of the matter than all the officers who sat on the court-martial, or that he conceived (which the court-martial most assuredly did not) that Byng really merited death, and that the war articles, as applicable to his case, were not too severe. We know that Lord Temple, though equally anxious to avoid committing himself, looked upon the sentence of death with horror; yet Temple, as head of the admiralty, signed that sentence. Hence, we confess, the damning conviction rests on our minds that Pitt and his friends would rather permit a murder than lose office or risk the favour of the people by opposing their blind fury. They were more guilty than the Duke of Newcastle and his party without having had the same personal provocations, for Byng had laid the whole blame upon the late ministers, had spoken and written most furiously against them, and had even threatened them with impeachment. Instead of insisting on a pardon, which alone could relieve the victim from the fangs of the war articles, the council at last referred his sentence to the twelve judges to give their opinion as to its legality; and all that the judges would or could do was to affirm that the twelfth article, which punished neglect or remissness as much as cowardice or treachery, bore out the sentence which the court-martial had pronounced. The council transmitted this report of the judges to the lords of the admiralty, who then, on the last day of February, issued their warrant for executing the sentence. Lord Temple was dreadfully agitated, and hesitated some time before he would sign the warrant, and Admiral Forbes, one of the board, would not sign it at all, declaring that he would rather die himself than give his sanction to the death of Byng. Forbes, three weeks before this, had written out several reasons why the sentence should not be executed. The strongest was that the admiral's negligence could not be wilful, as the court-martial had acquitted him both of cowardice and disaffection, and had declared him not deserving of death. The officers who had sat on the court-martial became exceedingly uneasy when they saw the execution advancing; but the city grew impatient for it, and Mr. Fox, to damage the popularity of Pitt and his associates, represented them in the House of Commons as being much too compassionate. At first three, and then seven members of the court-martial renewed their solicitations at the admiralty; and Lord Torrington and other kinsmen and friends of the unfortunate Byng made a fruitless attempt upon the feelings of the old king. On Friday Captain Keppel, being no orator himself, spoke to Sir Francis Dashwood in the House of Commons, who thereupon rose to desire a bill to absolve the members of the court-martial from the oath of secrecy, which, by the military code, they had, as usual in such cases, been obliged to take. Keppel himself then rose, and declared that he desired to be absolved from his oath—that he had something on his mind which he wished to say. The speaker was just putting the question for the orders of the day, after which no motion could be made;—it was Friday,—the House would not sit on Saturday, and the execution was fixed for Monday; but Sir Francis Dashwood called out to the speaker, and, though the orders were passed, he was suffered to make his motion. The House was much softened: but pains were taken to prove that Captain Keppel might speak notwithstanding his oath of secrecy. The captain very properly doubted, and desired time to consult some of his brother officers, who had commissioned him to desire the bill. The House agreed to meet on the morrow, Saturday, which would afford the time and opportunity required. When the morrow came Pitt rose to deliver a message from the king, stating that his majesty, agreeably to his royal word, for the sake of justice and of example to the discipline of the navy, and for the safety and honour of the nation, was determined to have let the law take its course with relation to Admiral Byng, upon Monday next, and had resisted all solicitations to the contrary; but that he thought it right to suspend the execution for a fortnight till the bill proposed by Sir Francis Dashwood could be passed, and the examination of the members of the court-martial be gone through. The bill was read twice and carried through committee in the course of Saturday, Captain Keppel still affirming that he had something material to tell which his majesty ought to know, and naming four of his associates in the court-martial who desired equally with himself to be relieved from the oath of secrecy and empowered to speak. On Sunday it was reported that the four officers were disclaiming what Keppel had said for them. On Monday Keppel told the House that he had, indeed, been mistaken in one of those officers; that another did not declare off, but wished that all the members of the court-martial should be compelled to speak; and he produced a letter from two others upholding what he had said for them. The Secrecy Bill was passed by 153 to 23; but on Tuesday it was treated very differently in the Lords, where the new Chief Justice Murray, now Lord Mansfield, and the late chancellor, both spoke against it and against Byng. Hardwicke called for a day's delay, though Lord Temple showed him that some of the captains and admirals who had sat on the court-martial were actually under sailing orders for America. On the next day the Lords sent a message to the Commons, desiring that such of the members of the court-martial as were members of that House might attend their lordships in order to be examined. These members, together with all the other officers who had composed the court, attended their lordships accordingly, but, as there was some vacillation and discrepancy of opinion among them, and as their lordships held that they failed to show any good reasons for the bill, it was unanimously rejected, not without some marks of contempt towards the House of Commons for sending it up. As the last reed had broken, Byng was left to his fate. His heroic behaviour seemed to justify the sentence of the court-martial in exempting him from the foul charge of cowardice; yet, it must be remarked that a man of the greatest personal bravery may be capable of hesitation, over-caution, and a misgiving timidity in a great and difficult situation like that in which Byng was placed. His crime was, that he was not, what the ministry had taken him for, as great a man as his father.* His behaviour, after he knew that his doom was inevitable, was manly and firm in the highest degree. A few days before his execution, one of his friends standing up by his side, said, "Which of us is the taller?" Byng replied, "Why this ceremony? I know what it means; let the man come in and measure me for my coffin." He declared that, being acquitted of cowardice, and being persuaded he had acted for the best, he was not unwilling to die. On Monday morning, the 14th of March, the Monarque, his prison ship, was surrounded by the boats belonging to the squadron at Spithead and the ships of war in Portsmouth harbour, all manned and armed, and with an infinite number of other boats crowded with people, all anxious to catch a glimpse of so rare a spectacle as the execution of a British admiral. Byng desired as a favour that he might be shot on the quarter-deck, took leave of a clergyman and two friends who staid with him to the last, and at the hour of noon walked out of the cabin with a firm deliberate step and sat down in a chair, in front of the two files of marines who were to shoot him, for he would not kneel. He refused to have his face covered, saying that his countenance should show whether he feared death. But, upon its being represented that his looks might unnerve the marines and prevent their taking aim properly, he submitted to tie a white handkerchief over his eyes. He gave the signal by throwing his hat upon the deck, and in the next instant he received a bullet through the head, another through the heart, three others in different parts of his body, and fell dead. The time from his walking out of the cabin to his being deposited in his coffin did not exceed three minutes. "Do cowards," says Horace Walpole, "live or die thus?"†

* Lord Waldegrave, upon whose strict veracity we rely, says—“The popular cry continued violent against the admiral; but Pitt and Lord Temple were desirous to save him: (partly) to please Leicester House, and partly because making him less criminal would throw greater blame on the late administration. But, to avoid the odium of protecting a man who had been hanged in effigy in every town in England, they wanted the king to pardon him without their seeming to interfere; agreeable to the practice of most ministers, who take all merit to themselves when measures are approved of, and load their master with those acts of prerogative which are most unpopular.”

The old king's aversion to Pitt and to Lord Temple took a more decided turn after this tragical transaction, and the death of Byng hurried on their expulsion from office. Other causes, however, contributed to this new change of ministers. The Duke of Newcastle, still formidable from his numerous and old connexions, from his control of boroughs, and from a half superstitious belief that one who had been thirty years a minister must be a minister again, and have the good things of the church and state at his disposal, was planning and manœuvring with great activity; and the Duke of Cumberland, who had been appointed to command the allied army assembled for the protection of Hanover, positively refused to go while Pitt and his friends remained in office. Pitt, suffering or pretending to suffer from the gout, met the king as seldom as possible, and when he made his appearance behaved with proper respect; but Temple, who had no gout to plead, was frequent in his attendance, and was accused by the king of pert familiarity. In the month of February, Lord Waldegrave, who had quitted the service of the Prince of Wales on the promotion of Lord Bute, had a long conversation with the king, whose confidence he enjoyed to an extraordinary degree. "His Majesty," says his lordship, "then expressed his dislike to Pitt and Lord Temple in very strong terms; the substance of which was, that the secretary made him long speeches, which possibly might be very fine, but were greatly beyond his comprehension; and that his letters were affected, formal, and pedantic. That as to Temple, he was so disagreeable a fellow, there was no hearing him; that when he attempted to argue, he was pert, and sometimes insolent; that when he meant to be civil he was exceedingly troublesome; and that in the business of his office he was totally ignorant."‡

† Lord Waldegrave also says, "The king, who had a quick conception, and did not like to be kept long in suspense, expected that those who talked to him on business should use no superfluous arguments, but should come at once to the point; whilst Pitt and Lord Temple, who were orators even in familiar conversation, endeavoured

* Horace Walpole says that people believed him to be a real "Mediteranean Byng"—a name given to his father, Lord Torrington, after his exploits off Sicily and the coast of Spain—and were transported with indelible rage when they found out their mistake.—Letters to Horace Mann.

The king next questioned Waldegrave concerning old Newcastle. His lordship answered, that, though his grace was no longer a minister, it was evident that a great party in both Houses of parliament still considered him as their chief—"that some of these might possibly be attached to him by a principle of gratitude, but the greater number were his followers, because they had reason to expect that he would soon be in a condition to reward their services"—but that the Duke himself was timid and doubtful. The king charged Waldegrave to go and encourage his grace. "Tell him," said the plain-speaking and irascible George, "I do not look upon myself as king, whilst I am in the hands of these scoundrels; that I am determined to get rid of them at any rate; that I expect his assistance; and that he may depend on my favour and protection." Waldegrave had several conferences with the Duke of Newcastle, whom he found eager and impatient to come into office, but fearful of the danger. He said that it was not yet the proper time—that they must wait till the supplies were granted, the Byng affair ended, and the late cabinet excused or acquitted; and that then Pitt and his followers might be set at defiance. When Waldegrave reported this answer to the king the old sovereign exclaimed, "Neither the Duke of Newcastle nor yourself are judges of what I feel: I can endure their insolence no longer." He desired his lordship to speak to Newcastle again; but as the king grew more determined his grace grew more irresolute. Thus time was consumed and the Duke of Cumberland's impatience made unmanageable. His royal highness pressed very strongly that at least Pitt and Lord Temple might be turned out without further deliberation. Cumberland and Fox were then desired to draw up a plan of administration; but they found they were powerless without Newcastle, who was about equally unwilling to see the promotion of Fox or to incur the risk himself. After various and tedious negotiations the king lost all patience, and absolutely commanded Fox to form a plan of administration in concert with the Duke of Cumberland. Fox drew up a hopeless plan, taking care, however, not to neglect the desperate chance of promoting his own interests. Pitt and Lord Temple were to be dismissed immediately, and the Duke of Newcastle tempted or terrified back by a show that they could do without him, and intended giving his post to somebody else; the persons who were to have the refusal of the principal employments were to be Lord Egmont, Lord George Sackville, Lord Halifax, Lord Strange, Charles Townshend, who was supposed to be dissatisfied with Pitt, on account of the insignificant place he had allotted him, and that used weather-cock, Bubb Dodington:—Fox himself was only to be paymaster of the forces; but he was to have an Irish reversion granted to his children, as a compensation for giving up all hope of preferment in a future reign. When Lord Waldegrave showed this plan to the king he made many objections to it, saying that it possibly might be a good scheme for Mr. Fox, his friends, and relations; but that it did not answer his purposes. His lordship replied that he was not prejudiced in its favour; that Fox's requests in behalf of his friends and family might be unreasonable; but that he imagined, whoever were employed in forming a plan of administration, his majesty would find none of them forgetful of their own interest. He added that most of the persons named were good speakers in parliament, and that, unfortunately, oratory was now esteemed the first quality of a minister; that some of these gentlemen might not be inclined to take any part in the present state of confusion, but that they might be talked to, and when his majesty knew their terms he might then determine whether he would accept their services or not; and that, as to Fox himself, he was persuaded that he would be satisfied with whatever mark of favour his majesty might please to confer. After some hesitation the king told Lord Waldegrave to authorise Fox to treat with the several parties named. The negotiation turned out just as his lordship expected. Lord George Sackville, though he had been violent against Pitt at the beginning of the session, was now closely connected with him, and had entered into engagements with Leicester House—that is to say, with the princess dowager, the Prince of Wales, and Lord Bute, who were determined to force Pitt upon the king whether he would or not. Lord Egmont's object was still a pecuniary, and he therefore excused himself from joining Fox on the score of bad health, which he said could not bear the fatigues of the House of Commons. Lord Halifax would not accept unless the Duke of Newcastle would promise to support him. Lord Strange kept away in the country. Charles Townshend was found to be furious against Pitt and his mean employment; but he recollected that old George was seventy-three, and young George nineteen, and of a promising constitution, and he therefore did not think it advisable to undertake the defence of an old king, or to be connected with unpopular associates who might bar his future progress. In short, Bubb Dodington was the only person ready to engage. It was now the end of March, and Cumberland, who ought to have been in the field, still refused to go until at least Pitt and Temple were turned out. The perplexed old king then sent to the Earl of Winchelsea, who had held the same office in Lord Granville's administration, and made him an offer of the admiralty. Winchelsea, "with most unfashionable readiness," accepted; and then it was notified to Lord Temple that his services were no longer required. It was imagined that his brother-in-law, Pitt, would immediately have resigned; but Pitt "did not choose to save his enemies any trouble, and attended to his duty with unusual assiduity." But time pressed; the day appointed for the Duke of Cumberland's departure

arrived; and so, about a week after Temple's dismissal, Pitt was told he must go also. This was followed by Legge's resigning the chancellorship of the exchequer, and by some other resignations. But though the king had thus got rid of the Pittites, he had not been able to accomplish any arrangements to replace them; and now hardly knew where to look for ministers. From the cabinet Pitt again stepped to the very apex of popularity, and freedoms of corporations in rich gold snuff-boxes were liberally showered upon him and his friend Legge. This made those who had been timid before still more timid, and increased the difficulties of the king. The Duke of Devonshire, avowedly out of compassion to his majesty, remained at the head of the treasury till a successor should be named; but he was anxious to be gone, and no successor could be found! Lord Waldegrave, the only man on whom George really relied, was again employed to look out for ministers. By the king's desire he spoke to Sir Thomas Robinson and Lord Dupplin; but Sir Thomas said that he was not a fit man to succeed Pitt; that he had already experienced that a secretary of state was nothing unless he could speak well in the House of Commons; that he had never been an orator, and was now too old to learn: Lord Dupplin excused himself from being made chancellor of the exchequer, as not being equal to such an employment even in times of the greatest tranquillity—and these were times of tempest and hurricane! At last, when everybody had refused, and when the Duke of Cumberland had gone over to Hanover; the Duke of Newcastle became more courageous, and seemed willing to undertake a new ministry. This courage in good part arose from the fact that a parliamentary inquiry into the loss of Minorca was now over, and had ended in smoke. He demanded permission to treat with whomsoever he pleased; the king found himself compelled to give him a kind of tacit permission to treat even with Pitt himself! And Newcastle, whom Pitt had marked with the brand of exclusion, actually treated with Pitt, and implored him to be his colleague. But Pitt, conscious of his strength, would not consent to allow the duke any real authority in the cabinet; and his grace, low as he was sunk, would not yet submit to be only a nominal minister. Upon this, another plan was formed:—Pitt and his party were to be totally excluded; the Duke of Newcastle was to be at the head of the Treasury, and Sir George Lee his chancellor of the exchequer. But when Newcastle had bowed at court, and everything seemed settled, he begged a delay of a few days. This was to begin or to renew negotiations with Leicester House, which had never imagined that Newcastle would have courage to act "in open defiance of the heir apparent." Lord Bute was dispatched to the Earl of Chesterfield to engage him to negotiate with the duke, and induce his grace to bring in Pitt and the Leicester House party. Chesterfield undertook the business, and represented to Newcastle that his administration could never be strong or permanent unless he firmly united himself with Pitt and Leicester House—that the king would never be at ease till then—and that Lord Bute had assured him that Pitt would be found less unreasonable than his majesty expected, and that the princess and her son were better disposed than they had been. All this made Newcastle veer round and tell the king that there could be no cabinet without Pitt. His Majesty then once more, and most unwillingly, consented that Pitt and his friends should be treated with; the duke having first pledged his word that, in case they continued unreasonable, he would perform his part and undertake the conduct of affairs without them. The duke, being joined by the ex-chancellor Hardwicke, had several conferences with Pitt and Lord Bute, settled articles of peace and amity, and carried a new plan of administration to the king for his assent—without having given the least notice to Sir George Lee or any of the gentlemen whom he had engaged a few days before, and who are described as being now "waiting in their best clothes, in hourly expectation of being sent for to court to kiss hands on their appointments."* It was now the month of June, and the country had been nearly two months without a ministry. Yet his majesty in casting his eye over the joint scheme of Newcastle, Hardwicke, Pitt, and Bute, cut the affair short, and at once rejected their proposals; for Fox, who was hated by the Leicester House party and feared by Newcastle, was not to be paymaster—Lord Temple, who was detested by the king, was to have a cabinet employment—and, what was sorest of all, Lord Winchelsea, who had so recently accepted the admiralty to oblige his majesty when all others kept aloof, was to be unceremoniously dismissed. The Duke of Newcastle endeavoured in vain to make his majesty indifferent to the sense of gratitude and the shame of promise-breaking; and then shamelessly broke his own promise to the king by refusing to take part in any administration, unless he had the cordial assistance of Pitt and Leicester House. This was on the 7th of June. On the morning of the 8th the Duke of Devonshire and the Duke of Bedford and Lord Granville went separately into the royal closet, and when they came out they spoke with Lord Waldegrave, saying that the king's situation was pitiable, that this was no time for his friends to consult their own ease. This was a prelude to a demand which startled Waldegrave, though the king had more than hinted at it some weeks before. He was summoned into the closet, where his majesty told him that the Duke of Newcastle had proved himself equally false and ungrateful; that few princes had ever been treated so scandalously; but that it was in his (Lord Waldegrave's) power to disengage him from all his difficulties, by taking the lead in a ministry as first commissioner of the treasury. George poured out a torrent of words, and would hear of no excuses of want of experience or want of abilities; and Waldegrave, volens volens, found himself prime minister of Great Britain!* But his lordship's prediction was soon verified, that he would find few followers. That morning the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Bedford, Lord Winchelsea, Lord Granville, who had plucked up some of his old spirit, and Mr. Fox promised to stand by him in the cabinet and support him in parliament; but in the evening, when Waldegrave went with Devonshire to meet Fox at Holland House, he found him wholly changed since the morning and full of doubts and apprehensions, for Fox had been talking with some gentlemen upon whose assistance in the House of Commons he had counted, and had not found them ready to engage with him against Pitt; and he also complained that, in a private audience, his majesty had received him with coolness, and seemed to mistrust him even while he was requiring his services. "And indeed," says the candid Waldegrave, "the king made use of Fox on the present occasion, not from choice, but because he was the only man of abilities who had spirit to answer Pitt; and in his own language." In spite, however, of these misgivings, Fox consented to be chancellor of the exchequer. The Earl of Egremont undertook to be one of the secretaries of state; and Winchelsea had already formed his admiralty.† But the very next morning Lord Holderness, who had been promoted to be one of the secretaries of state, through the personal favour of the king, and who had remained at his post, during the late changes, surprised every body by resigning without having given any previous notice. Old George, however, said that this loss was not considerable, and he ordered Waldegrave with his official colleagues and friends to meet again that night. At the meeting Fox, who was to lead in the Commons, was found still anxious and doubtful, and others were equally timid. But the dashing and confident Granville assured them all, "in his lively manner," that they could not fail of success—that they had got the army, navy, treasury, and church, with all their subordinate branches, out of which they had so much to give away, and that, though volunteers did not come in quite so fast as had been expected, they had the whole summer before them to raise recruits. Nor did Granville think that great majorities in parliament were at all indispensable. "For," said he, "though of late years ministers have not thought themselves safe without a majority in the House of Commons of one hundred and fifty or two hundred, I remember the time when twenty or thirty were thought more than sufficient." But the king was affected by Fox's despondency, and complained bitterly that almost everybody was abandoning him. On the following day there was another meeting consisting of the Dukes of Devonshire and Bedford, the Earls of Waldegrave, Granville, Winchelsea, Gower, and Mr. Fox. Granville and Winchelsea were as stout and resolute as ever; but Bedford went far beyond them, insisting that their administration would be the strongest that had ever been known in this country. But by this time Lord Waldegrave had ascertained from some private conversation with the Duke of Devonshire and Fox that the administration could not be formed at all, and that it was very likely the king would give up the plan in despair on the morrow; and at the end of the conference the Duke of Bedford, who had spoken out so boldly, whispered in Waldegrave's ear that it would be to no purpose to give themselves any further trouble, as they could not possibly go on without a great performer in the House of Commons, and as Fox evidently had not spirit to undertake it. And thus the whole system broke down, leaving the old king prostrate at the feet of Pitt! His majesty summoned Murray, now Lord Chief Justice and Baron Mansfield, and gave him full powers to negotiate with Pitt and the Duke of Newcastle on their own terms, insisting only that Temple should have no employment which required a frequent attendance in the closet; and, as a sine qua non, that Fox should be paymaster, because he had pledged his word that he should. It appears to us that in all these proceedings the old king behaved with far more honour and candour than any of them, Lord Waldegrave and Lord Winchelsea only excepted. As soon as he had authorised Lord Mansfield to treat he asked Waldegrave whether he thought there was a possibility of his forming and sustaining a cabinet; and his lordship frankly answered that there was not. He represented to his majesty that the Duke of Newcastle had still a considerable majority in the Commons, and that the cry out of doors was all for Pitt; and that, "though the Duke of Newcastle hated Pitt as much as Pitt despised the Duke of Newcastle, they were united in one particular—that nothing should be done for the public service till they were ministers." He stated it as his opinion that his majesty must inevitably give in to the necessity of the times; that if he would only gratify Pitt's vanity he would find him no intractable minister,—that Pitt, though capable of the worst actions whenever his ambition, his pride, or his resentment was to be gratified, was very sensible of kind treatment, and, above all, was bold and resolute, and if once engaged for the king would go farther than any man in this country; "nor would his former violence against Hanover be any kind of obstacle, as he had given frequent proofs that he could change sides whenever he found it necessary, and could deny his own words with an unembarrassed countenance." George said that he desired nothing more to be done for Hanover than what we were bound in honour and justice to do for any country whatsoever, when it was exposed to danger entirely on our account; and he wound up his complaints of ill usage by saying that we were a very extraordinary people, continually talking of our constitution, laws, and liberty,—that, as to our constitution, it was a good one, and he defied any man to produce a single instance in which he had acted contrary to it,—that he never meant to screen any public servant who had done amiss, but still he thought he had a right to choose those who were to serve him, though now he found that, so far from having an option, he was not even allowed a negative;—that, as to our laws, we passed near a hundred every session, which seemed made for no other purpose but to afford us the pleasure of breaking them; and that our zeal for liberty must be mingled with singular notions, as the chief of the nobility chose rather to be the dependents and followers of a Duke of Newcastle than the friends and counsellors of their sovereign. According to Horace Walpole, the old man complained that they were doing everything by and for Leicester House; that they were making his grandson king in his lifetime, and constituting him a prisoner for the rest of his life; that he had not thought that he had so many of the Duke of Newcastle's footmen about him; and that soon, he supposed, he should not be able to make a page of the back-stairs. The negotiations, however, proceeded, and, being, through some mistrust and jealousy, taken out of the hands of Lord Mansfield, they were entrusted to the Earl of Hardwicke, who concluded them in about a fortnight. The substance of the treaty was, that the Duke of Newcastle should be first commissioner of the Treasury, without having one man at the board that really belonged to him; that Pitt, with a voice doubly potential, should be again secretary of state, with Lord Holderness for his colleague or subaltern; that Lord Granville, whom Pitt had stigmatised as "the Hannoverian minister," "the flagitious taskmaster," should again be president of the council; Lord Temple, privy seal, in the room of Lord Gower, who was to be master of the horse, in the room of the Duke of Dorset, who was to have a large pension, under the name of additional salary annexed to his place of warden of the cinque ports. The attorney-general, Sir Robert Henley, afterwards Lord Nottingham, was to have the great seal, not as chancellor, but as lord keeper, with a pension, and a good reversion for his son; and Pratt, afterwards Lord Camden, was to take Henley's place of attorney-general. The royal promise to Fox was kept, for he was set down for the profitable place of paymaster; and Potter, who had been holding half that office, was to be made one of the vice-treasurers of Ireland, in the room of the Earl of Cholmondeley, who was to be gratified with a considerable pension on the Irish establishment—a source seldom overlooked when jobbing placemen or court favourites were to be gratified or kept quiet. "But," says Waldegrave, "the most surprising phenomenon was Lord Anson returning to his old employment, in spite of his unpopularity and of all the abuse which had been raised against him by the very men who were now to be his associates, either at the cabinet council or at the board of Admiralty." No one had been half so violent against Anson as Pitt, and yet, according to Horace Walpole, it was Pitt who insisted that Anson should be reinstated. "Who did act with honour and noble spirit," says Walpole, "was Lord Winchelsea; he refused a pension, disdaining to accept any emolument when his associates were excluded: at the board of Admiralty he had always acted with capacity, and everywhere with firmness. He was the only man who in all these changes acquired credit both by his rise and by his fall."* The makers of this cabinet would have brought in to some good place Lord George Sackville; but here his majesty's flat negative was bowed to. To reward his services, unsuccessful though they were, and the friendship and steadiness of Waldegrave, George instantly conferred upon his lordship the Order of the Garter. The INTER-MINISTERIUM now ceased, after lasting more than eleven weeks. Pitt's re-appointment was formally announced in the Gazette on the 29th of June; and all the set kissed hands. "Men," says Walpole, "could not but smile, observing Pitt return to court, the moment he had been made free of so many cities for quitting it, exactly as he had accepted an employment there before old Marlborough was scarce cold, who had left him 10,000*l.* as a reward for his patriotism."†

* In excusing himself from being premier, Lord Waldegrave made use of the following arguments:—"That as an independent man, who was known to be honoured with his majesty's confidence, I might be useful on many occasions; and, having no private views, neither the jealousy of his ministers nor the anger of his successor would in the least intimidate me; but, on the contrary, would exercise my spirits, and make me still more active in his majesty's service. On the other hand, whenever I acted on my own account, my insufficiency would immediately appear; all my weight and influence would vanish in an instant. That I did not mean to magnify the dangers or difficulties of a ministerial employment; nor did I think there was anything mysterious in the art of politics, which might not be attained by proper application, and a tolerable capacity. But that prudence and diligence in the business of office were only to be rated amongst the inferior qualities of a first commissioner of the treasury; that nothing could be done for the public service, without a steady majority in both Houses of parliament; and that a minister must expect few followers, who had never cultivated political friendship, and had always abhorred party violence."

† Generally," says Waldegrave, "as to the inferior places, there were numbers enough ready to take them, though not exactly the men we would have chosen."

The great orator was scarcely repossessed of the seals ere he confirmed the opinion of Lord Waldegrave—that he would go farther than any man. He opened a secret project to Sir Benjamin Keene, our ambassador at Madrid, for ceding Gibraltar to Spain, in exchange for Minorca, and on condition of Spain joining England in the war against France; and he intimated that satisfaction should be given to the Spanish court touching the establishments made by English subjects on the Mosquito shore and in the Bay of Honduras since the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748, and that all establishments so made should be evacuated.‡ When our veteran and able diplomatist read the dispatch he threw his cap on the ground, and exclaimed, "Are they mad on the other side of the water? What can they mean?"§ And, in truth, ‡ Letter from Secretary Pitt to Sir Benjamin Keene, in Archdeacon Coxe's Memoirs of the Kings of Spain. Pitt's offer savoured of insanity. Because the popular clamour exaggerated the importance of Minorca, a place difficult for us to defend, this dashing secretary of state proposed giving up Gibraltar, a place almost impossible for any enemy to take, and the importance of which could not be exaggerated; or, because he wanted to strengthen the arms of his majesty's allies on the continent, and secure Hanover, he was ready to make a sacrifice which would have transported the English people with ten times more rage than the loss of Minorca had done. But, luckily for Pitt, not even the offer of so precious an object as Gibraltar could tempt Ferdinand VI. to break his neutrality and to engage in a war with France; and the secret negotiation ended in nothing except in contributing to hasten the death of the excellent Sir Benjamin Keene.

Nor were Pitt's first warlike schemes either well conceived or attended with success. They centered in one of those descents on the coast of France which had so often failed, and which, notwithstanding the failures, were so lamentably persevered in both by Pitt and his son. Sir Edward Hawke, with a powerful fleet, and a land army under the command of Generals Mordaunt and Conway, was ordered to attempt Rochefort, as one Clarke, a Scottish adventurer, who had travelled in that part of France had reported to Pitt that the place might be easily taken. But if Hawke and the generals should find Rochefort too strong for them they were to attempt some other place on the coast—any place “where they should find an opening.” With such vague orders and plans, and with the command frittered among three, or, rather, seven officers—for Vice-Admiral Knowles and Captain Howe, the king's nephew by an illegitimate source, competed with Hawke in the sea-management, and General Howard and the gallant Wolfe with Mordaunt and Conway in the land department—success or honour was very problematical, although, besides the brave Hawke and the intrepid Conway, there were two real heroes engaged. Wolfe, who was soon to raise the ministry of Pitt to glory on the heights of Abraham, was a young officer; but he had acquired a reputation from his quickness and intelligence, and from the discipline and perfection to which he had brought his own regiment. “The world,” says Walpole, “could not expect more from him than he thought himself capable of performing. He looked on danger as the favourable moment that would call forth his talents.”* The other hero was Howe, third on the navy list. “He was undaunted as a rock, and as silent; the characteristics of his whole race. He and Wolfe soon contracted a friendship like the union of cannon and gunpowder.”† On the 20th of September the fleet got in sight of Oleron; but it was the 23rd before they came to anchor there. Vice-Admiral Knowles was ordered to attack the Isle of Aix; and Howe led this detachment in the finest style, never firing till within pistol-shot of the fort, and then opening a dreadful fire, which made the French surrender in less than two hours. But the fort was not worth the gunpowder spent upon it, and a council of war was called to know what should be done next. This council was no exception to the general rule:—after various controversies and dissensions the generals and the admirals agreed in nothing except in the opinion that Rochefort was too strong to be attacked. Conway proposed that they should attack Fouras—that they should do something; but Mordaunt agreed with Hawke that the best thing to do would be to return home, as the bad season was approaching, and the French were collecting a great army along the coast. Wolfe and Howe had been indignant at the dilatoriness of the chief commanders; but, seeing the moment lost, they made no objection to a retreat; and home they all came on the 3rd of October. Mordaunt, who had throughout opposed the bolder opinions of Conway, was brought to a court-martial, but acquitted; upon which it was observed that Byng had been shot for not doing enough, and this general acquitted for doing nothing.

Before this failure the Duke of Cumberland, with an army of Hanoverian and confederate troops, amounting to 50,000 men, had been foiled, beaten, driven from the banks of the Rhine, the Weser, and Hanover, by the French under Marshal D'Étrée, pushed into a corner between the river Elbe and the German Ocean, and led to sign a most disgraceful capitulation, memorable in history by the name of the Convention of Closter-Seven. By this convention, signed on the 7th of September, the Electorate of Hanover was left in the hands of the French till peace should be concluded between them and the English; and the Hanoverians, Hessians, and Brunswickers were dispersed into different and distant cantonments under the obligation of not taking up arms again during the war. Frederick, however, was lucky enough to withdraw in good time the Prussian veterans who had been serving with Cumberland; and it was held by most military men, that if his royal highness had taken Frederick's advice, instead of adhering obstinately to his own plans, the campaign would have had a very different termination. As it was, Frederick, who had been defeated by Count Daun and the Austrians in the terrible battle of Kolin, was now left alone to defend his frontiers from French, Austrians, Russians, and Swedes. General Haddick, with a detachment from the great Austrian army in Lusatia, made a dash at Berlin, and laid Frederick's unfortunate capital under contribution; but Haddick was presently obliged to retreat more rapidly than he had advanced. General Apraxin, who had crossed the eastern frontier with more than 100,000 Russians, got such a lesson from Marshal Lehwald and 22,000 Prussians, who attacked him in his camp at Jægerndorff, that he evacuated Prussia with the exception of the fortress of Memel. And immediately after this Marshal Lehwald and General Mantoufel drove the Swedes like a herd of cattle out of Prussian Pomcrania, taking 3000 of them prisoners. Acting at once upon the offensive and defensive, Frederick proceeded in person against a united army of France and the empire, which was encamped on the bank of the river Saale, under the command of Marshal Soubise and the Prince of Hildbourghausen, leaving the Duke of Bevern to watch Prince Charles of Lorraine and Marshal Keith to face another Austrian army under Nadasti. At the approach of Frederick, Soubise and Hildbourghausen beat a retreat. They fell back to Eisenach—Frederick followed them—and then they broke away for Erfurt and Gotha, with the Prussians still close behind them. But Frederick was recalled from this pursuit by learning that Bevern and Keith were in difficulties. After a variety of most brilliant manœuvres, he rescued Keith at Leipsic; then, on the 3rd of November, with an army of only 20,000 men, he crossed the Saale, and on the 5th of the same month fought and won the wonderful battle of Rossbach. "This," says Voltaire, "was the most inconceivable and complete rout mentioned in history. Thirty thousand French and twenty thousand Imperial troops there made a disgraceful and precipitate flight before five Prussian battalions and a few squadrons. The defeats of Azincourt, Crecy, and Poitiers, were not more humiliating." Immediately after this splendid victory the Hanoverians and Hessians resumed their arms in spite of the Convention of Closter-Seven: it was alleged that the cruelties and extortions exercised by the French and the Duke of Richelieu, the inglorious conqueror of Minorca, upon the electorate, provoked this infraction of the usages of war and the faith of treaties. The conduct of the French in Hanover was indeed execrable; yet it is pretty certain that but for the battle of Rossbach the convention would have been observed at least a little longer. At the desire of his English majesty Frederick sent Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, one of his best generals, to take the command of this force, and also detached his brother Henry with 15,000 Prussian veterans to co-operate with the Hanoverians and Hessians. A series of actions took place, and in every one of them the Hanoverian troops behaved admirably, and were successful. They drove the French marauders from Lauenberg and from Zell; and they recovered a good part of Brunswick. On quitting Zell the French plundered and then set fire to the town. The Duke of Richelieu took up his head quarters at Hanover; but he was driven thence in the end of November, and he soon afterwards left the army in disgust. The Count of Clermont, a prince of the blood, who then came from Paris to take the command, thus described the troops to Louis XV.:—"I have found the army of your majesty divided into three very different corps. The first is above ground, and is composed of robbers and marauders, who are

besides in rags; the second is under ground; and the third is in the hospitals. Would your majesty wish me to bring back the first without waiting till the two latter are able to rejoin it?"* Clermont was driven from post to post—forced to cross the Weser, and by the end of the year the Rhine. Prince Henry of Prussia, after assisting the Hanoverians to drive the French out of Hanover, returned to Dresden to defend Saxony against the Austrians and the army of the empire. "This time," said Frederick, "we must not talk of winter-quarters—our operas and balls must be in the field." He was now in Silesia, where Prince Charles of Lorraine and General Nadasti had been taking a town or two and gaining the battle of Breslau over the Duke of Bevern and the Prussians. But, in less than a fortnight, Frederick restored his affairs by gaining the great victory of Lissa. This tremendous battle, fought on the 5th of December, was even more decisive and remarkable than that of Rossbach; for Frederick with 30,000 men defeated an army of 90,000 Austrians and Imperialists, took 24,000 prisoners on the field, 15,000 on the retreat, and 17,000 in the neighbouring city of Breslau, which was forced to surrender after a very short siege. The Austrians lost, besides, 130 cannon, 2,000 baggage waggons, all their ammunition, all their equipages—everything that gives strength, splendour, and consistency to an army. In summing up the results of the wonderful campaign or series of campaigns of this year, 1757, Voltaire exclaims:—"Even Gustavus Adolphus never did such great things as Frederick! We must indeed pardon him his bad verses, his sarcasms, and his little malices. All the faults of the man disappear before the glory of the hero!" It was in contemplating all this military genius, and all this astonishing success, that Pitt was led to exclaim, "that America was to be conquered through Germany!"—meaning thereby, that, while Frederick was occupying France and her allies, the English might obtain possession of the Canadas and of everything belonging to the French in the western world. And yet, in spite of his frequent, open, and eloquent proclamations of this plan, which could be carried into operation only by prolonging the war in Germany (at least so Pitt and his colleagues thought), he could afterwards declare that he had always been anxious to stop the German war and to save England the enormous sums she spent to support Frederick! Pitt, after all, was essentially a war-minister—all his official glories lie in carrying on a war with unwonted spirit and vigour: as a peace minister, as a promoter of internal improvement, he cannot stand a comparison with Pelham, and he sinks into insignificance if compared with Sir Robert Walpole.

After General Braddock's defeat Pitt had devised a bold plan for securing North America: reinforcements had been sent from England, a regiment had been raised consisting of four bat-tations of German protestants, and Lord Loudon, esteemed an experienced and good officer, was appointed commander-in-chief. Admiral Holborne, with a powerful fleet and a considerable body of land forces, was sent out to join Lord Loudon; and nothing less was expected than the capture of Quebec and the entire expulsion of the French from that continent. But the French had several advantages which made the war longer and more difficult than was expected: our colonies were superior to theirs in wealth, regular industry, and number of inhabitants; but their colonists were superior to ours in military discipline and in soldierly aptness; almost every man amongst them was a good huntsman, a good riflemen, and, in essentials, a trained soldier; most of the hunting Indians were attached rather to their interest than to ours; and they had still a chain of forts at the back of our settlements. Lord Loudon achieved little or nothing, and he returned to England at the end of the year, leaving the command to General Abercrombie. But in the East Indies the tide of victory had been turned in our favour by the activity and military genius of Clive, who had begun his extraordinary career in the East as early as 1748, when, as a mere stripling fresh from the writer's desk, he out-generated the veteran commanders of the French. In the preceding year (1756) while Clive was engaged at a distance, reducing the dangerous pirate Angria, taking Gheriah, his capital, and all his treasures, the Nabob Sujah-u-Dowlah, the ally of the French, had attacked the British, destroyed their factories, taken Calcutta, and barbarously thrown part of his prisoners into the memorable Black Hole, where, in the course of a few hours, 123 persons out of a total of 146 died a horrible death. The wretched remnant of the factory were embarked in trading vessels lying at the mouth of the Ganges: but by the month of December Clive, with his fitting colleague Admiral Watson, came to anchor in that river; and by the month of January (1757) Calcutta was invested and reduced, the city of Hooghly taken, with all the warlike stores; and by February the vast native army was thoroughly defeated, and Sujah-u-Dowlah compelled to sign such articles of peace as Clive chose to dictate. The conqueror then fell upon the French settlements; for in India, as in America, the plan was now adopted of expelling at all hazards those with whom we could never live in good neighbourhood—partly through their fault, partly through our own. In Hindostan there had always been, and there were ever likely to be, fierce disputes and competitions among the Mahomedan and Mahratta princes, who had themselves no other right to the soil than the right of conquest, and who ruled the Hindoo population in the most arbitrary and brutal manner. It was the policy of the Europeans who had at first settled there as traders to encourage these contentions and wars, in order to profit by them and found an independent power on Maho-medan barbarity and folly. Whenever France sided with one rajah or nabob, England took up the sword for the other; and whenever England espoused the cause of one competitor, the French gave to his rival the benefit of their arms and counsels. Almost any change in this state of things must be an improvement and favourable to humanity. The power of France and England could not co-exist on the same coast; the absolute dominion of either of them singly would be likely to terminate these incessant and consuming wars, and to render the countless native population far happier than they had ever been or hoped to be under their Mahomedan dynasties. The genius of Clive decided that the great experiment should at least be tried under the supremacy of England. He drove the French from their fortress and factory of Chandernagore, gained other advantages over them, and then, with a handful of men, again made war on Sujah-u-Dowlah, performed a most rapid and bold march to Murshedabad, defeated his tens of thousands in the great battle of Plassey, dethroned him, and put the ally of the English, Jafier Ali Cawn, in his place. The broad foundations of our Indian empire were thus laid in the course of the year 1757.* By this time the English and French had extended their fierce contest to all the four quarters of the globe; for they were fighting in Europe, America, Asia, and Africa. Owing to our naval superiority, we obtained in the course of the summer some trifling advantages over the French castles and factories on the African coast.

The Duke of Cumberland returned to England in October, about a month after signing the disgraceful convention of Closter-Seven, which the king, his father, disavowed before the Hanoverians took up arms again, although, according to Horace Walpole, his majesty had, through the medium of his Hanoverian ministers, indirectly authorised the duke to sign that agreement, in order to save himself and his army from destruction by famine and the sword of the French. It certainly had not been usual to entrust a general in the field with any such powers as Cumberland had exercised; and we confess we can scarcely believe that George ever empowered him to leave the whole of Hanover as a deposit in the hands of the French until the conclusion of a war, which promised to be long and inveterate. Such a proceeding was at least out of character with one so firm, sturdy, or obstinate as George, and so warmly attached to the home of his fathers and the country that gave him birth. It has been unfairly urged by various English writers that Hanover ought to have been left as a deposit,—that Great Britain would thus have saved many millions of money, while the Hanoverians would have enjoyed the blessings of peace. But the blessings of peace did not flourish under a French army of occupation; and it was far better for the poor Hanoverians and Hessians to be at war than to entertain such guests as the Duke of Richelieu and his demoralised forces. If these armed vagabonds laid the electorate almost waste and bare in six months, what would they have done in six years? As for our twenty and odd millions of pounds sterling, they were not spent exclusively in defending Hanover during the remainder of the Seven Years' War: they went to work out Pitt's splendid problem of conquering America through Germany; and we got for them the two Canadas, a congeries of islands in the West Indies, dominions and empire in the East Indies, long strips on the coast of Africa, and the complete supremacy of the ocean. And, besides, our leaving Hanover to the tender mercies of the French would not have released us from the engagements we had contracted by treaty with the King of Prussia. The connexion was in many respects disadvantageous to England; and it would have been well if the statesmen who brought in the House of Hanover could have succeeded (they would have done it had they been able to conquer natural and laudable affections) in providing that the electoral coronet and the kingly crown of Great Britain should never be worn by the same head; yet it seems to us childish to continue in history popular prejudices and party exaggerations, and to hold up Hanover as the constant and sole great curse of England—the cause which provoked all our wars and delayed all our peace—the one gulf which swallowed up our best blood and treasure. If any doubt remained upon the mind of George, he apparently thought he should clear himself from the dishonour of infringing the convention of Closter-Seven by disavowing his son's authority, which he constantly did. The Duke of Cumberland, on his side, thought he would escape all odium by resigning his commands, which he did as soon as he returned to England. According to Horace Walpole, old George welcomed him with the words—"Here is my son, who has ruined me, and disgraced himself." The duke then went down to the apartment of Lady Yarmouth, and told her the king had left him but one favour to ask, which he was come to solicit by her interposition; and this favour was—leave to resign his post of captain-general, his regiment, everything. His father's mistress begged him to be calm, and take time for consideration; but Cumberland insisted; the countess delivered his message; and on the 15th of October the duke threw up everything, except his allowance out of the privy purse, and the 15,000*l.* a-year settled on him by parliament for his solitary victory of Culloden. Horace Walpole further says, that the Duke of Cumberland told his friend Fox that he had written orders in his pocket for everything he had done (they were never produced); and that Pitt, who had never managed his royal highness, nor stood on any good terms with him, acted on this occasion "a part nobly honest." "When the king," says Walpole, "told Pitt that he had given his son no orders for

Ireland, or that fraction of it which was represented by its Protestant parliament, had been brought into a state of unusual serenity, when the Duke of Bedford, in the month of September, went over as lord-lieutenant, with the convivial and profligate Rigby for his secretary and chief manager. Between the duke and the secretary an end was soon put to the calm; factions became more violent than ever; and his grace, one of the richest noblemen of England, provoked severe criticism by an act of meanness. The Queen-dowager of Prussia, sister to King George, and mother to Frederick the Great, had been allowed a pension of 800*l.* a-year on Ireland, to save her from the effects of the mad parsimony of her husband; and this money had been privately transmitted to her year by year since the accession of her son. But she died a short time before Bedford went over to the government of Ireland; and, as his wife's sister, Lady Betty Waldgrave, had not yet got a pension, he asked Sophia Dorothea's 800*l.* a-year for her, and obtained it. Upton, an Irish patriot, moved in the House of Commons for the list of pensions charged on Ireland, in which Lady Betty's name must have appeared; and, in spite of all the lord-lieutenant's influence, the motion was rejected only by a majority of five: nor did the duke, after this, venture to stem a torrent of violent resolutions against pensions, absentees, and other grievances.

In the course of the year some riots broke out in England on account of the new militia bill, which had been recommended by Fox at the beginning of the war, but which, as it was held, had been spoiled by Lord Hardwicke and the peers. The bill obliged every man, poor or rich, to pay 10*l.* or find a substitute if he was drawn for the militia; and yet he remained liable to be drawn again at the end of three years. The people, moreover, were led to believe that the militia would be employed on foreign service; and this misrepresentation produced risings in Surrey, Kent, Leicestershire, Hertfordshire, Nottinghamshire, Yorkshire, and Bedfordshire. In the last-named county the peasantry fell upon the Duke of Bedford's splendid seat of Woburn Abbey, and would have demolished it but for the timely arrival of a regiment of cavalry. Other regiments were employed in other places to put down the riots and enforce the militia bill; so that a really constitutional force was, in some measure, imposed upon the people by the standing army.†

The English parliament opened on the 1st of December, when the royal speech, again the composition of Pitt, spoke of the necessity of defending his majesty's dominions of Great Britain and elsewhere. Though allowed to pass in the address, this word elsewhere excited loud censure; and on the 14th Pitt thought himself obliged to declare that, by elsewhere, he did not of necessity mean Hanover,—“that he had never been against continental measures when practicable, but would not now send a drop of English blood to the Elbe, to be lost in that ocean of gore." He took care, however, to pass a sounding panegyric on his majesty's virtues and wisdom in general, and on his great goodness to himself in particular since he last took the seals. In the course of this speech he spoke with transport of our successes in the East, and called Clive "that heaven-born general." He also panegyricised his Prussian majesty; and his eloquence, and the enthusiasm both of parliament and people, procured, as if by acclamation, the passing of a subsidy of 670,000*l.* per annum to enable Frederick to carry on the war; or, as it was expressed, "to be employed at his discretion for the common cause."^{*}

A. D. 1758.†—To meet an increasing expenditure new taxes were laid upon houses and windows, and the sinking fund was again touched. In the course of this session Lord George Sackville, whose interest with Pitt was great, distinguished himself by his abilities in the House of Commons, and seemed to be on the fair road to a high post in the government and the first rank in the army. Old Ligonier, now a lord, a field marshal, and the successor of the Duke of Cumberland as commander-in-chief, was wholly ruled and governed by him; but Lord George had the misfortune to provoke the enmity of Lord Tyrawley, a stern, blunt veteran, who accused him before the House of having carefully avoided all services of danger and all foreign commands. Tyrawley's animosity did not evaporate with his speech and a written memorial he had also drawn up, which seem to have had the effect of inducing Lord George Sackville to embark in the very next expedition, where neither he nor any one else gained any honour. "Unfortunately," says Horace Walpole, "Pitt's mind was not yet purged of its vision of Rochefort, and he again chose the coast of France for the scene of his romance." A mighty fleet, consisting of eighteen ships of the line, thirteen frigates, three sloops, four fire-ships, and two bomb-ketches, and carrying an army of 14,000 men and 6000 marines, set sail on the 1st of June for the French coast, where they were to do something which was to be of the greatest moment, but which was not very clearly defined. The old king did not share in Pitt's confidence; for he said to Lord Waldegrave that he had never any opinion of this expedition—that it would end as others to the same coast had done—that we should brag of having burned their ships, and the French of having driven us away. The Duke of Marlborough, who was personally brave, but without experience, without military knowledge, with nothing of the great general but the name he had inherited, was appointed to the chief command of the land forces, with Lord George Sackville and Lord Granby under him. The passion of volunteering, which the Duke of Cumberland had always discouraged, from a notion that it was prejudicial to the discipline of the army, now revived; and Lord Downe, Sir John Armitage, Sir James Lowther (master of 40,000*l.* a-year), and other noblemen and gentlemen, accompanied the land forces to serve as volunteers. The silent,* stern, and heroic Howe was appointed to the command of the fleet: but, upon this, his senior, Sir Edward Hawke, struck his flag, and refused to serve. This quarrel was appeased by Lord Anson's taking the command himself. On the 5th of June, Howe, heading and leading the transports, anchored in the Bay of Cancale, near St. Maloes. Howe presently knocked a coast battery about the ears of the French, and then the troops were landed without opposition: but the generals soon found that the town of St. Maloes was so strongly situated and so well fortified that it could not be carried by assault. Here, it is said, the soldiers observed that Lord George Sackville was shy in courting danger; "and Howe, who never made a friendship but at the cannon's mouth, conceived and expressed a strong aversion to him."[†] After burning a parcel of small vessels, generals and men returned to their shipping; "and the French learned that they were not to be conquered by every Duke of Marlborough." The duke embarked in some haste, for he left his tea-spoons behind him; and these were sent home in a cartel-ship by the Duke d'Aiguillon, "politely to mark contempt." After enduring a storm at sea, part of the fleet, with the transports, ran down to Havre de Grace, where the flat-bottomed boats were hoisted out, and a second landing expected. But the wind blew inland, and, to avoid the dangers of a lee-shore, the ships hauled off for the night, and the next morning the Duke of Marlborough, after surveying the coast in an open boat, determined that there was no good landing there. They then bore away before the wind, and came to anchor near Cherbourg, where some of the transports received the fire of six different batteries. The flat-bottomed

† Three days before the new year died the king's third daughter, the Princess Caroline. She had been the favourite of her mother, who had predicted on her death-bed that she would follow her in less than a year. Though she lived so many years after the prediction had proved a vain one, she quitted the world, and spent her time in religious preparation and in acts of charity. Her health, never good, was completely broken, and her spirits never recovered the shock they had sustained by the death of Lord Hervey, for whom she had conceived an unalterable passion. "For many years she was totally an invalid, and shut herself up in two chambers in the inner part of St. James's, from whence she could not see a single object. In this monastic retirement, with no company but of the king, the duke, Princess Emily, and a few of the most intimate of the court, she led, not an unblameable life only, but a meritorious one: her whole income was dispersed between generosity and charity; and, till her death, by shutting up the current, discovered the source, the goals of London did not suspect that the best support of their wretched inhabitants was issued from the palace."—Walpole's Memoirs of George II.

* During this wretchedly managed expedition Lord George Sackville, who was a great and oratorical talker, oppressed Howe with words and questions. One day, when the tactful sailor would not answer him, he said,—"Mr. Howe, don't you hear me? I have asked you several questions." Howe replied—"I don't like questions!"—Walpole's Memoirs of George II.

boats were again hoisted out and the soldiers began to get into them; but the gale freshened into a storm; the transports ran foul of each other, and the ships were again exposed to the perils of a lee-shore. Moreover, the soldiers and the horses had consumed nearly all their food and provender, and began to fall sick. Howe, in the worst of humours (Anson and Hawke with a considerable part of the fleet had run along the French coast towards the Bay of Biscay, to look for an "opening" or for prizes), led the transports through a storm back to Portsmouth, whence the Duke of Marlborough and Lord George Sackville, heartily sick of the sea, repaired to take the command of our troops in Germany;* for, notwithstanding Pitt's phrases and declarations, we had sent a small army to that part of the continent to defend Hanover and co-operate with the King of Prussia. The old king's prediction was amply verified; but still Pitt resolved that the experiment on the French coast should be repeated by the same force which had just failed, and which was now much lessened, as Anson and Hawke had not returned, and as part of the troops were withdrawn to be sent into Germany. This time the command of the land forces was given to General Bligh, a very old cavalry officer; and Prince Edward, afterwards created Duke of York, entered as a volunteer with his blood relative Howe. They sailed from St. Helen's on the 1st of August, anchored in the bay of Cherbourg on the 7th, and put out their boats on the 8th; when the troops were landed under a loose fire, which the French soon gave up. They then entered the town of Cherbourg without opposition, and began to plunder and ill use the inhabitants. On the following morning Bligh set his men to work upon the dock-yard basin and forts, upon which the French government had spent large sums; and they were soon destroyed or made useless. While this work was doing parties of English light horse scoured the country to the distance of some four leagues, and had several little skirmishes with the French troops who were waiting in the neighbourhood for reinforcements. As soon as intelligence reached Bligh that these reinforcements were coming, he levied about 3000*l.* sterling upon the unfortunate town, carried off some brass cannons and mortars, which were afterwards exhibited for a few days in Hyde Park as trophies of victory, re-embarked his men, and sailed back to the English coast. But in about a fortnight Bligh returned to St. Maloes to make another attempt there. That town was again found much too strong. The English armament had been weakened; but, as it had been so long hovering about and seesawing between the two coasts, it was not likely that the French would weaken the garrison and defences of St. Maloes. General Bligh, however, landed his troops in the bay of St. Lunaire, about two leagues to the westward of St. Maloes. The landing was beautifully performed under the eye of Howe, but we cannot possibly discover what it was intended the men should do when landed. They were scarcely on shore when an autumnal gale made it impossible for Howe to keep the ships where they were. Perhaps it was not easy to re-embark the troops, who had done all the work that could be done there when they had burned some fifteen or twenty sloops and fishing-boats. Howe went away with the fleet to the safer bay of St. Cas, a few leagues off, arranging with Bligh that the troops should march by land to that bay. On the 8th of September Bligh began his march, and met with some annoyance from the peasantry, who fired at his men from hedges and houses. Yet he neither hurried his march nor took the shortest road, and his men went rambling about as if they had landed in a newly discovered country. On the following morning he had some smart skirmishing near the village of Matignon; but two battalions of French drawn up at a little distance dispersed as the English grenadiers advanced towards them. That night he encamped on the open ground about three miles from the bay of St. Cas, and there received certain intelligence that the Duke d'Aiguillon had crossed the country from Brest, and was within six miles of him with a considerable regular army and some regiments of militia. The English ministry, who could hardly pretend that they were going to take Paris with 6000 men—who could not even take a third-rate town—gave out that the chief object of these expeditions was to assist the King of Prussia, by obliging the French to keep a considerable part of their forces on their own coasts instead of sending them to the war in Germany. How, then, could General Bligh expect to make a march by land along that particular part of the coast, which had been threatened for four months, without encountering a force superior to his own? But even when Bligh knew that d'Aiguillon was so near he did not make haste to the port, which was still nearer. He stayed in his encampment all night, and did not reach the bay of St. Cas till nine the next morning. The French general followed close in his rear, yet did not venture to attack till two-thirds of his little army were re-embarked. Then the French pounced upon their prey as they were engaged among the rocks or in a hollow way that led down to them. The rear guard, consisting of the British grenadiers and half of a regiment of guards under the command of General Dury, and not exceeding in all 1500 men, fought for a short time with wonderful bravery; but General Dury was shot, and, running into the sea, perished there; Sir John Armitage, one of the volunteers of fortune, met with the same fate; many of the gallant young officers of the guards were picked out by French musketeers standing on rocks right above their heads; and, after a frightful carnage, the men broke away from their ranks, and were nearly all either slaughtered or made prisoners by the pursuing crowds of the French soldiery or the vindictive peasantry.

* Lord George Sackville said, he would no longer go because: "the king refused to let him go to Germany, but his majesty was obliged to submit."—Dodding's Diary.

It was well for Pitt's popularity that the fleet and army in America began to furnish better materials for his gazettes. He had wisely appreciated the genius and daring of Wolfe, had procured his promotion, and sent him across the Atlantic to serve with General Amherst, who had taken the chief command out of the hands of Abercrombie. Amherst, with Wolfe and 14,000 men, partly raised in the colonies, embarked with Admiral Boscawen for the island of Cape Breton. Boscawen destroyed five French men-of-war that lay to cover Louisburg, took five French frigates, and landed the troops, who by the 27th of July made themselves masters of the whole island. Out of compliment to the minister, they changed the name of Louisburg, the capital, into that of Pittsburg. General Abercrombie, who undertook the reduction of all the French forts on the lakes George and Champlain, was repulsed with the loss of 800 men at Ticonderago; but Brigadier Forbes and Colonel Bradstreet, whom Abercrombie had detached for those services, took Fort Duquesne, on the Ohio, and Fort Frontenac on the northern bank of the St. Lawrence, at the point where that river issues from Lake Ontario. The French were dispirited and their systems disorganised; the Indians began to forsake them and make treaties with the English, whereby they engaged to tomahawk and scalp the French for King George as they had formerly tomahawked and scalped the English for King Louis. Pitt's official humanity was not shocked: he spoke of the Indian nations as effective and valuable allies! Although there remained much to do, it was evident the tables were completely turned, and that the French, instead of driving us out of Nova Scotia, would themselves be driven out of the Canadas. The French flag was fast disappearing from the ocean; our privateers picked up nearly all their merchantmen, and our men-of-war defeated theirs wherever they met them, with but few and trifling exceptions. An expedition conquered the French islands of Guadaloupe, Desada, and Marigalante, in the West Indies; another took the French island of Goree, to the south of Senegal; and Fort Louis on the river Senegal was reduced and occupied as an English factory. In the East Indies Clive consolidated his advantages and interests by land, and Admiral Pococke gained many advantages by sea. Pococke, who had succeeded Admiral Watson, lately deceased, in the command of our squadron on the coast of Comandul, was reinforced from England with several ships, and in the month of March he fought a drawn battle with the French admiral, d'Apché, who was carrying reinforcements to Pondicherry, under the command of General Lally, an officer of Irish extraction, who afterwards distinguished himself greatly in India. Pococke broke two of his captains by court-martial for not having behaved so well as he expected, and then went again in quest of the French admiral. In the month of August he completely defeated d'Apché, who bore away with the remains of his shattered squadron for the island of Bourbon, leaving the command of the Indian seas to the English admiral.

In the mean while our good ally, Frederick, was again fighting against armies of Austrians, Imperialists, Russians, Swedes, and French, and was not allowed to go into quarters at all. In the depth of winter Count Fermor, with 100,000 Russians, burst into Prussia, took many towns, and forced the inhabitants to swear allegiance to the Czarina Elizabeth. But this did not prevent Frederick from prosecuting to a successful end the siege of Schweidnitz, and undertaking the siege of Ollmutz, in Moravia, which had been the principal station for provisioning and arming the Austrian forces. Marshal Daun advanced with a large army to the relief of Ollmutz, and then, leaving a part of his army to cover Silesia, Frederick marched off with 20,000 men to make head against the Russians, who were bombarding his good town of Custrin. After an extraordinary march, and a still more extraordinary battle, which lasted from nine in the morning till seven at night, he obliged "that savage and undaunted people" to retire. It was said of the Russians that no people ever took so much killing. Their movements were slow and heavy; the generalship of their leaders was contemptible; but the men stood like rocks. The carnage was frightful. Incensed at the barbarities which had been committed on their own soil, a cry was heard all along the line—"The Prussians give no quarter to-day!"—"Nor do we," responded the Russians. Nearly 20,000 of the latter were left on the field; and yet the remainder moved off at a slow pace, and did not fully evacuate the Prussian provinces till the end of October. From this great battle of Custrin, or Zorn-dorf, as it is more generally called, Frederick marched away for Saxony, where his brother, Prince Henry, had been driven by the Imperialists and Austrians back upon Dresden; but on his way he was unexpectedly met by Marshal Daun, who defeated him in the battle of Hochkirchen, where Frederick lost nearly all his artillery, 5500 men, and one of the best of his generals, the brave Scottish veteran and exile, Marshal Keith, who fell mortally wounded in the arms of an English volunteer. But scarcely one of Frederick's generals escaped un wounded; and Prince Francis of Brunswick had his head taken off by a cannon-ball. The news of the victory of Hochkirchen threw the court of Vienna into transports of joy, as if the hero of so many astonishing victories was to be undone by one defeat. After keeping his ground for several days in face of Daun, who did not venture upon a second attack, Frederick went away with a grin and a sneer, saying that the game was not yet lost—that Daun did not know how to play his cards! And in a brief space of time he compelled the Austrians and Imperialists to abandon all their sieges, to clear out of Saxony, Silesia, and Pomerania, and retire for winter quarters into their own territories. And Frederick's much esteemed general, Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, with the Hanoverians and Hessians, seemed almost as successful upon the Rhine. After driving the Count of Clermont out of Germany he pursued him, crossed the Rhine, came up with him near Crevelt, and gained a complete victory. Prince Ferdinand, however, was obliged to recross the Rhine to meet the Prince of Soubise, who had got into Hesse with another French force. On the 14th of August the prince was joined by the Duke of Marlborough and the English auxiliaries, who amounted to about 12,000 men. But these English troops had scarcely taken the field when an epidemic disorder broke out among them, which thinned their numbers and carried off the Duke of Marlborough. The command then devolved to the incapable and imperious Lord George Sackville, who thought it unworthy of an English Lord to submit to the commands of a German Prince. It appears that quarrels between them began immediately, and that the gallant and good-natured Lord Granby, after attempting in vain to moderate the pride of Lord George Sackville, sided with Prince Ferdinand. In spite, however, of these dissensions the Prince of Soubise was well beaten and driven out of Hesse; and King George, at the end of the campaign, sent his nephew, the King of Prussia, his hearty thanks for having lent him so good a general as Prince Ferdinand.*

Parliament re-assembled on the 23rd of November, when Pitt told them that the war must be carried on with increased vigour, and that, as war was now more expensive than in former times, additional millions must be raised. The addresses of both Houses justified and panegyrised the conduct of ministers; not a word was said about this being a war for the defence of Hanover—but our conquests in America were upheld as worth the money we were spending. Thanks were voted to Amherst and Boscawen, and ministers were applauded for their plans and their wisdom in selecting the best men to carry them into execution. Sir Richard Grosvenor, a young converted Tory, called Mr. Pitt “a blazing star.” In the heat of this enthusiasm an army of 95,000 British troops and 7000 foreigners was voted, and about 12,000,000*l.* was raised for the service of the ensuing year. At this moment the French government was so miserably poor that they could not spare money for the support of their unfortunate subjects who crowded our prisons as prisoners of war, to the number of 24,000; and, but for charitable subscriptions set on foot by the English people, many of these unfortunate Frenchmen might have been starved.†

† It is to this subscription for the French prisoners that Goldsmith alludes in his “Citizen of the World,” Letter xxiii. —“Their countrymen were informed of their deplorable situation; but they, more intent on annoying their enemies than relieving their friends, refused the least assistance. The English now saw thousands of their fellow-creatures starving in every prison, forsaken by those whose duty it was to protect them, labouring with disease, and without clothes to keep off the severity of the season. National benevolence prevailed over national animosity—their prisoners were, indeed, enemies, but they were enemies in distress; they ceased to be hat-

In the course of this year the ignominious punishment of the pillory, as applicable to literary offences, was revived; but Pitt's ministry dropped the cutting off of ears, which had so usually attended it in former times. The victim was Dr. Shebbeare, a reviewer, pamphleteer, and author of many books now forgotten. He had begun his career as a hot Jacobite, and had written many bitter things against the Hanoverian succession. According to Horace Walpole, the Doctor had long declared he would write himself into a place or the pillory; and he had gone such enormous lengths, that the warmest friends to the liberty of the press could scarcely regret his chastisement. He had recently published several “Letters to the People of England,” taking as his motto, in allusion to the white horse in the arms of Hanover, this passage from the Revelations:—“I looked, and behold a pale horse, and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him.” The bitterest part of his works was a satire on King William and George I.; but Murray, now chief justice and Lord Mansfield, laid it down for law, that satires even on dead kings were punishable. The Doctor was sentenced in the Court of King's Bench to stand in the pillory, to be imprisoned for three years, and then to find security in 1000*l.* for his good behaviour for seven years. Shebbeare caused to be dispersed printed hand-bills, inviting the friends of the liberty of the press and of old England to be at Charing Cross by twelve o'clock of the 5th of December, to see the British champion: and on that day when he mounted the pillory it was surrounded by many thousands, who received him with three cheers and tremendous huzzas. Perhaps out of respect to one who occupied the position of a gentleman and scholar—perhaps, in part, through fear of the multitude,—the sheriff did not execute the worst part of the sentence, and the Doctor stood on, rather than in, the pillory, and was allowed to have a footman holding an umbrella to keep off the rain. Colonel Brudenel, who is described as “a hot-headed, foolish young officer,” threatened the sheriff on the spot for allowing these indulgencies; and subsequently the King's Bench took up the business and prosecuted the sheriff. But one thing was clear—the time was gone by for pillorying authors. In the next reign Shebbeare was pensioned by the court.* Another doctor who had been guilty of absolute treason was threatened with a much more serious punishment. This was Dr. Florence Hensley, an indigent physician, who for a paltry pension had been acting as a spy for the French ministry, and sending them intelligence of our naval and military preparations. He had been the first to give notice of our design upon Rochefort. The sentence of death as a traitor was passed upon him in all its horrible forms ; but on the morning fixed for his execution he received the royal pardon, upon condition of leaving England for ever. Smollet suggests that he may have earned forgiveness by some material discoveries, or that the English minister may have found him so insignificant as to be ashamed of taking his life : but Walpole, who knew more of the secret wheels at work, says that he owed his pardon to d'Abreu, the Spanish ambassador, whose physician he was, and who visited him often in prison ;* and as, at the moment, Pitt was most anxious to conciliate Spain, it seems the more likely that this was the intervention which saved Hensley from Tyburn. Smollet, whose sympathies as an author and prejudices as a politician were engaged for Shebbeare, contrasts their fates with some heat. "This good man," he says, "suffered more for having given vent to the unguarded effusions of mistaken zeal, couched in the language of passion and scurrility, than was inflicted upon Hensley, a convicted traitor, who had acted as a spy for France, and betrayed his own country for hire."†

ful when they no longer continued to be formidable: forgetting, therefore, their national hatred, the men who were brave enough to conquer, were generous enough to forgive; and they whom all the world seem to have disclaimed at last found pity and redress from those they attempted to subdue. A subscription was opened, ample charities collected, proper necessities procured, and the poor gay sons of a merry nation were once more taught to resume their former gaiety.

* He was pensioned at the same time as Dr. Samuel Johnson, which led some droll to say that his majesty (George III.) had taken into pay a She-bear and a He-bear!

A bill for explaining and extending the act of Habeas Corpus, with the intention of rendering that great safeguard of our liberty still stronger and of more universal application, was brought into the House of Lords, with slight chance of success. The king talked openly against the bill at his levee; and it was understood that his majesty would take offence at those who voted for it. "He was a king," says Walpole, "and could not desire to reduce the prerogative lower than it had been delivered to him."‡ It appears, however, that George's objections arose principally from his apprehension that the bill would interfere with the discipline of the forces, and reduce too much his power and that of his officers over subjects serving in the army and navy. The bill was in its essence a Whiggish bill; or at least it was in accordance with the spirit of the old Whigs who had made the Revolution of 1688; yet the Russells and Cavendishes of the day now voted against it. "The Lords," says Walpole, "were become so much more considerable than they had been before the Revolution, that they were in no danger from the crown; and, when they do not fear it themselves, they will always be ready to uphold it. They look on themselves as distinct from the rest of the nation; and, at best, leave the people to be taken care of by their representatives, the Commons. As jealous of, and as fond of, their privileges, as the king of his prerogative, they are attentive to maintain them, and deem the rights of the people rather encroachments than a common interest." We believe this to be not only true in the main, but also the inevitable consequence of our constitutional structure, which in many respects may stand the more firmly from this opposition of views and interests; and, if we have any doubt as to Walpole's censure being somewhat too severe, or not applicable to the House of Lords at all times, we cannot but admit its applicability to the vast majority of the peers of that day, any more than we can allow ourselves to doubt that they were what he describes them—"a tame, subservient, incapably set of men."* The bench of bishops, too much in the habit of complaisance to the court, opposed a bill which the king disliked. The Duke of Bedford, the head of the Russells, silently acquiesced in its rejection; but the Duke of Devonshire, the heir of the House of Cavendish, became an active emissary to procure votes against it. "A Cavendish," says Walpole, "soliciting against the Habeas Corpus, was a phenomenon!" But Pitt's Lord Temple spoke repeatedly and earnestly in favour of the bill, to the no small annoyance of his official colleague, the Duke of Newcastle, "who," says Walpole, "though approaching to seventy, still appeared in the full vigour of his nonsense." Lord Hardwicke proposed taking the opinions of the judges. But this bench was very far from being unanimous: Foster, who excused himself from attending in the House of Lords, on the ground of his wife's dangerous illness, was zealous for the bill, and published a large pamphlet in support of it; Wilnot spoke warmly against the bill; and his learned brother Bathurst spoke as warmly against Wilnot. The rest disagreed on sundry points and clauses, so that Lord Temple now pleaded for the bill on the very disagreement of the judges; and moved, as a part of the bill, that an affidavit of confinement ought to be cause for the judges to grant the writ of habeas corpus. The new and pious Lord Lyttelton accused Temple of speaking disrespectfully of the judges, and said that his words in any other place would be a defamatory libel. Temple started up, exclaiming, "This is impertinence I will not bear;" and the House thought itself obliged to interfere in order to prevent a duel. Lord Mansfield then took the rejection of the bill upon himself, and delivered one of his most argumentative, and, at the same time, most eloquent speeches. Still, however, they would not venture directly to reject the bill. Hardwicke artfully said that he agreed that all the judges ought to have equal power in granting the writ; and that he would move to order the judges to bring in a bill to that effect the next session. Temple and his very weak minority seemed glad to catch at this evasive proposal; and the bill was heard of no more!—until our own day, when men felt its justice and necessity, and it was passed without any reference to the judges.†

support our conquests and military glory. Duties were laid upon sugar and other dry goods. Pitt thought that a tax upon hops would be better than a duty upon sugar—that a tax upon wine or linen would be preferable to that upon dry goods—but, that the best thing of all would be a bill of general excise like that proposed by Sir Robert Walpole, which Pitt had vehemently opposed at the time, losing his comrady of horse for his opposition. While the head of Pitt was filled with splendid schemes of foreign conquest, a message was received from the king, importing that his majesty desired to be enabled to collect the militia and march them out of their several counties, as he apprehended the French intended an invasion. And, in fact, there had been for some time a great air and show of preparation all along the French coast—a gathering of flat-bottomed boats, &c. That court had even notified to the Dutch that they intended to invade England, adding, with great modesty, that they did not intend to disturb the established succession in the House of Hanover, but only to chastise England for her late attempts on their coasts. Our militia were called out, and our 24,000 and odd prisoners of war were marched up into the interior of the island and put under the guard of our militiamen. It is true that we had only 12,000 regular troops in England; but then the dominion of the seas was ours. To meet and dissipate the apprehended storm before it should reach our shores, Admiral Rodney was dispatched to the French coasts. He bombarded Havre-de-Grace, set fire to the town in several places, and, at an enormous expense to the English, did considerable damage to the French. Shortly after, Admiral Boscawen, who had returned from America to take the command in the Mediterranean, sent three ships of the line into the outer harbour of Toulon against some French ships that were lying there. The French on shore opened a tremendous fire from some masked batteries which Boscawen had not seen; the three attacking ships were seriously injured, and the admiral felt himself obliged to descend the Mediterranean to Gibraltar, in order to refit. The commander of the Toulon fleet, M. de la Clue, whose object it was to get out into the ocean and join the Brest fleet under M. Conflans, thinking the opportunity favourable, slid down the Mediterranean soon after Boscawen's departure from Toulon. He was not wholly deceived in his calculations—he got through the straits of Gibraltar—but Boscawen watched and followed, and fell upon him off Cape Lagos, in Portugal. De la vessels carrying warlike and other supplies to the French settlements in America and the Indies. But the States-General, once so powerful and heroic at sea, had lost nearly all their strength and quite all their spirit: they wished to remain neutral, because, if they joined the English, the French would invade them by land, and if they joined the French, the triumphant navy of England would sweep them from the seas. Besides, the profits of their carrying trade were more than enough to compensate the occasional seizure of their ships. They talked loud, but they never for a moment contemplated a war with England.

In the autumn of the same year died the Lady Elizabeth of England, second daughter to the late Prince of Wales. She was in her eighteenth year, had more wit and vivacity than any of the family, but was deformed and homely in person.

Clue, after fighting very gallantly, was mortally wounded; his ship, esteemed the finest in the French navy, and three other first-rate ships, struck to Boscawen, and a fifth was driven on shore and burnt. This battle was fought on the 18th of August. On the 20th of November Sir Edward Hawke, who had been driven from the coast he had been blockading, returned to the neighbourhood of Brest, and found that M. Conflans had stolen out with his fleet, and was then near at hand in Quiberon Bay. It blew a storm at the time, yet Hawke, disregarding the dangers of a lee-shore, off a coast roughened with rocks and sand-banks, and covered with an hostile and brave population, went at once to the attack, even before half his ships had joined him. The English had twenty-three ships in all, the French only twenty-one; but many of the English did not come up in time to engage; and, what was of still greater advantage to the French, they were sheltered among the rocks and banks, and the English, in a gale of wind, had to go through narrow and most dangerous passes in order to attack them. Commodore Howe, now, by the death of his elder brother, who had been slain in America, Lord Howe, attacked the great French ship the 'Formidable,' with fury, and came so close to her in a trough of that stormy sea, that her prow struck his ship's waist and drove in her lower tier of guns. The thick darkness of a November night fell upon this scene of horror, and slackened the fire of the English, whose guns had been out-roaring the elements. Conflans' own ship and another were driven on shore and burnt; two more were sunk, one was taken, and another struck her colours, but afterwards got off, as the storm prevented the English sailors taking possession of her. Favoured by the night, seven ships got away into the river Vilaine, where they were covered by land-batteries, and eight others escaped in a shattered, hopeless condition to different ports on that coast. Two of our ships were lost in the storm, but the crews were saved; and even in the vessels which had been most hotly engaged the loss in killed and wounded was estimated as very moderate. It is said not above eight or ten of our ships were actually engaged in obtaining this decisive victory, which, for the time, put an end to the navy and the hopes of France, and to all English apprehensions of invasion. A little episode, however, remains to be mentioned—"a codicil to the lofty plan of invading these kingdoms in various parts at once."* M. Thurot, a daring adventurer, who had distinguished himself as a privateer, got out of Dunkirk with four or five small frigates a short time before the battle in Quiberon Bay, intending to make a diversion either in Scotland or somewhere in Ireland, where the discontent of the people had risen almost to a rebellion, and where there was no want of French agents to stir up the flame. Thurot, after roving about for nearly three months in the northern sea, lost two of his ships and half of his men. About the middle of February of the following year (1760) he put into the Isle of Islay, procured some provisions, and then made for Carrickfergus on the Irish coast, a defenceless town, which he took and plundered after a short blockade and a battle of stones and brickbats on the part of the inhabitants. But he was soon scared away by the approach of troops sent by the lord-lieutenant, the Duke of Bedford, and Thurot took to his ships, taking along with him the poor mayor of Carrickfergus and three of the principal inhabitants. But three English ships under the command of Captain Elliot put out after him from Kinsale, came up with him in the Irish Channel, and boarded his own ship. The brave fellow fought as if he had been carrying the blood-red flag of a pirate, and could expect no quarter, and fell covered with wounds on his own deck. After his death Elliot found it an easy task to take the three ships and carry them all as prizes into the Isle of Man.

But the great harvest of laurels this year was in those lands "that see the Atlantic wave their morn restore." The Canadas had been left open to attack the year before, and the defeated, impoverished, bankrupt Louis XV., had not been able to succour them.* The time was come for executing Pitt's great scheme; and he had now wisely insisted that the execution of it should be entrusted to a hero. The king, who thought only of antiquity and seniority in the service, selected old Hopson, who may have been a very respectable jog-trot veteran, though he had certainly never done anything to distinguish himself as a general. Pitt, who would have his own way, put forward Wolfe, now a lieutenant-general of his own promoting; and never was choice more fortunate to a minister, though it sent his admired soldier to an early grave. "Ambition, activity, industry, passion for the service, were conspicuous in Wolfe: he seemed to breathe for nothing but fame, and lost no moments in qualifying himself to compass his object."† The military scheme, after being subjected to various alterations, was finally arranged thus:—Wolfe was to advance with a part of our forces and seize Quebec, the capital of the French provinces; General Amherst, with a second division, was to occupy Crown Point, reduce fort Ticonderago, then cross Lake Champlain, fall down the St. Lawrence, and join Wolfe under the walls of Quebec; while General Prideaux, with a third division and a considerable body of wild Indians, was to invest Niagara, then embark on Lake Ontario, besiege and carry Montreal, and then form his junction with Wolfe and Amherst under the capital. These combined movements had generally failed even when natural obstacles were far less numerous, and the distances to be traversed by the different corps far shorter; and when Wolfe got near to Quebec he found himself alone with the division he had brought. Amherst had, indeed, carried Crown Point and Ticonderago, and Prideaux had made himself master of Niagara; but there they stopped. No blame, we believe, attaches either to Amherst or Prideaux, who were checked by a variety of circumstances and difficulties, some of which, at least, ought to have been foreseen and provided for by those who planned the campaign. Nor does the honour of Wolfe at all rest on his being the first at the place of rendezvous; for he was carried by sea and then up the St. Lawrence by Admiral Saunders, whose ships and seamen remained to co-operate. About the last day of June Wolfe disembarked his troops upon the large and fertile Isle of Orleans, a little below Quebec. Here he erected some batteries, which Montcalm, a French general, vainly attempted to prevent by throwing a strong detachment across the river. Wolfe also prepared a military hospital and works to secure his stores. He attempted to reconcile the Canadians on the

* The term bankrupt is scarcely used in a figurative sense. Three arrêts were published by the court of France, suspending payments of orders on the treasury, and the interest due on capital vested in the treasury and public funds. The king, the princes of the blood, and the chief nobility were obliged to send their plate to the Mint to be coined into money. An English wit inserted in one of our newspapers, as an addition to the list of bankrupts:—"Louis le Petit, of the city of Paris, peacebreaker, dealer, and chapman." The French nation, not without reason, attributed all their disgraces and impoverishment to the indolence of Louis XV. and the ascendancy of his mistress, Madame Pompadour, who sold places, appointed generals, &c.

island by friendly proclamations; but those rough people joined scalping parties of wild Indians that were skulking among the woods, and butchered all the English stragglers they could surprise. While the fleet lay at the Isle of Orleans it was exposed to great danger; and if once the fleet had been destroyed, or even driven from its post, nothing would have remained for Wolfe but a surrender. The troops were scarcely landed when a terrible storm blew down the river, driving several of their large ships from their anchors, and making the transports run foul of one another. Some of the smaller craft foundered, and a considerable number of boats swamped. While they were in this confusion the enemy sent down from Quebec seven fire-ships, which made for the thickest part of our shipping; but the British sailors grappled these fire-ships, towed them away to the banks, and left them fast aground, where they lay burning to the water's edge without doing any mischief; and some radeaux or rafts piled up with combustible materials, and sent down after the fire-ships had failed, were treated in the same manner by our seamen, who behaved with admirable spirit. Quebec by this time was strongly fortified, and its natural situation always rendered it formidable to an assailant; for it stands on a steep rock at the confluence of the St. Charles and St. Lawrence, and these rivers, rocks, and ravines render it inaccessible on three of its sides. Montcalm, as brave an officer as Wolfe, covered the town with 10,000 men, having posted himself on the left bank of the St. Charles, with encampments extending as far as the river Montmorenci, and with entrenchments thrown up at every accessible place. With an inferior force Wolfe resolved to attack Montcalm in this position. "When," he says in a letter to Pitt, "that succours of all kinds had been thrown into Quebec, that five batteries of regular troops, some of the troops of the colony, and every Canadian that was able to bear arms, besides several nations of savages, had taken the field in a very advantageous situation, I could not flatter myself that I should be able to reduce the place. I sought, however, an occasion to attack their army, knowing well that with these troops I was able to fight, and that a victory might disperse them." On the 9th of July, at night, he crossed the north channel of the St. Lawrence, and encamped near Montcalm's left, the river Montmorenci being between them. On the following morning, a company of rangers which he threw out were almost annihilated, in a wood, by a body of wild Indians. He carefully examined the course of the Montmorenci, and found it fordable at a place about three miles up; but the opposite bank was entrenched, and steep and woody, and he gave up the idea of crossing there. His escort was twice attacked by the Indians, who, though repulsed, killed or wounded some forty men. On the 18th of July, two English men-of-war, two armed sloops, and two transports, with troops on board, passed by the town of Quebec, and got into what is called the Upper River, and close to Wolfe's encampment on the Montmorenci. The French had placed some ships, and floating batteries under the town, to prevent the passage of our ships, but their fire did little damage. With the assistance of these ships, which had got into the Upper River, Wolfe reconnoitred the banks, and threw Colonel Carleton on shore, with a detachment, to make a diversion, and tempt Montcalm, or part of his forces, out of their entrenchments. But the French general stayed where he was, kept his men in their strong posts, and left Wolfe to seek an avenue to attack him. At last, on the 31st of July, Wolfe attacked Montcalm in his entrenchments: leaving Brigadier Townshend to ford the Montmorenci and attack in flank, he, with the help of the ships and the fleet's boats, threw himself on the beach, and attacked in front. The Centurion ship of war was so placed as to check the fire of a French battery, which commanded the ford of the Montmorenci; and two transports drawing little water were furnished with guns, and sent close in shore to cover the place which Wolfe had selected for his landing; but these two vessels could not get near enough to be of much use,—a number of boats filled with soldiers grounded upon a ledge of rocks,—time was lost in getting them off,—and Wolfe was obliged to send an officer to stop Townshend, who was crossing the ford. The French, meanwhile, had crowded their artillery on the point menaced, which was a rising ground beyond the river bank; and, galled by their fire, the English grenadiers, as soon as they were landed, rushed tumultuously up towards the entrenchments, without waiting for the corps which were to sustain them and join in the attack. Indeed, Townshend, though upon his march in very good order, was still at some distance, and Brigadier Monckton had not got his men out of the boats. The grenadiers were met in the teeth by a fire too terrible for the bravest of them, and they fell back in confusion after sustaining a great loss. Still further deterred by the approach of night, and the ominous roaring of the St. Lawrence—for the mighty tide was retiring and a storm was setting in,—Wolfe gave up his attack and withdrew his men. "The French," he says, "did not attempt to interrupt us; but some of their savages came down to murder such wounded as could not be brought off, and to scalp the dead as their custom is." His situation seemed growing desperate, and his health began to fail him. In his letter to Pitt, which was written from his head quarters at Montmorenci on the 2d of September, more than a month after this failure, he confessed that he had descended to the dubiousness and despondency of consulting a council of war. After saying that he had been suffering by a fever, he adds,—“I found myself so ill, and am still so weak, that I begged the general officers to consult together for the public utility. . . . To the uncommon strength of this country, the enemy have added, for the defence of the river, a great number of floating batteries and boats. By the vigilance of these and the Indians round our posts, it has been impossible to execute anything by surprise. . . . We have almost the whole force of Canada to oppose. In this situation there is such a choice of difficulties, that I own myself at a loss how to determine. The affairs of Great Britain require the most vigorous measures; but then the courage of a handful of brave men should be exerted only where there is some hope of a favourable event." When this letter reached England, it excited consternation and anger. Pitt feared that he had been mistaken in his favourite general, and that the next news would be, either that he had been destroyed or had capitulated. But in the conclusion of his melancholy epistle, Wolfe had said he would do his best—and that best turned out a miracle in war. He declared that he would rather die than be brought to a court-martial for misarrying, and in conjunction with Admiral Saunders he concerted a plan for scaling the heights of Abraham, and gaining possession of the elevated plateau at the back of Quebec, on the side where the fortifications were the weakest, as the French engineers had trusted to the precipices and the river beneath. In order to deceive the enemy, the admiral sailed some three or four leagues higher up the river, lay there as if intent on other business, and then, on the night of the 12th of September, glided down the river and put out all his boats to land the troops under the heights of Abraham. Through the darkness of the night, and the skill and caution of the seamen, the French sentinals posted along the banks of the river, and even close to the narrow ledge of rock selected for the disembarkation, were all passed without notice or alarm, given, and the English soldiers were landed by boatfuls at a time. The first that landed were some Highlanders, who began to climb the steep face of the rocks, using their hands more than their feet, and grasping at every bush and bough, or projection, that could facilitate their ascent. The Highlanders were followed in the same manner by the English light infantry and those by the line. There was a French guard over their heads, and hearing a rustling noise, but seeing nothing, these fellows fired down the precipice at random. Our men then fired up into the air, and also at random; but, terrified at so strange and unexpected an attempt, the French piquet ran off, all but the captain, who was wounded and taken prisoner, and who begged our officers to sign a certificate of his courage, lest he should be punished as corrupted, believing that Wolfe's bold enterprise would be deemed impossible without corruption. That general now stood on the heights of Abraham; but he had no artillery with him, and excessive fatigue and disease, the French and the wild Indians, had reduced his army to less than 5000 men. His light infantry, however, seized four guns which the French had placed in battery, and the English seamen made shift to haul up one gun from the landing-place. On the other side, Montcalm came on in too great a hurry to allow the French to bring their artillery with them, and they brought no more than two small field-pieces. "At first the French general could hardly credit the evidence of his senses—so impossible did it seem for an army to ascend those dangerous cliffs,—at last he said, "I see them where they ought not to be; but, since we must fight, I will go and crush them." Quitting his intrenchments, he advanced with confident haste to the heights of Abraham, where Wolfe had formed his little army in order of battle, within long cannon-shot of the out-works of Quebec. After lining the bushes with detachments of Indians, the French and Canadians advanced to the charge in good order, and with great vivacity; but they opened an irregular fire before they got within musket range. The English reserved their fire until the enemy were within a few yards of their front; and then they poured in a terrible discharge. This first volley was succeeded by a most steady and deliberate fire, and, in less than half an hour, the French began to waver. But as Wolfe stood conspicuous in the front line cheering his men a musket-ball struck his wrist. He wrapped a handkerchief round the wound, continued giving his orders, and soon put himself at the head of his grenadiers, who had fixed their bayonets for the charge: he was hit by a second ball in the upper part of the abdomen; but he seemed scarcely to heed this more serious wound, and was giving his orders, or repeating his encouragements, when a third musket-ball hit him in the breast and brought him to the ground. His grieved men picked him up and carried him to the rear. He was dying fast, yet still continued intent on the battle. As his eyes were growing dim, he heard a wounded officer near him exclaim, "See how they run!"—"Who run?" cried Wolfe. "The French," replied the officer; "they give way in all directions." "Then," said the hero, "I die content!"—and after giving an order for Webb's regiment to move down to Charles's River and secure the bridge there in order to cut off the enemy's retreat, he expired. General Monckton, the second in command, was dangerously wounded, but Townshend completed the victory. Montcalm received a mortal wound in attempting to rally the French, and his second in command was made prisoner, and conveyed on board an English ship, where he died the next day of his wounds. The city of Quebec capitulated five days after the battle, and the disheartened remnant of the French grand army of Canada retired to Montreal. One dispatch conveyed to England intelligence of the unexpected victory on the heights of Abraham, of the death of Wolfe, and of the surrender of Quebec.

Other triumphs unmixed with that deep grief—for the nation had wept the fate of Wolfe—other victories in various parts of the world, were reported in rapid succession. In India, Colonel Coote, worthy of competing with Clive, defeated the French under General Lally, and conquered the whole of Arcot; Colonel Ford defeated the Marquis de Conflans, and took Masulipatam; and other advantages were gained by Captain Knox. On the continent of Europe success was not quite so invariable, for the French gained one or two battles, and once more threatened the unlucky electorate of Hanover. The regency there packed up the archives and the valuables, and sent them to Stade to be shipped for England; but Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, with his Hanoverians, Hessians, and English, determined to make a bold effort for the defence of the country, and took post near Minden. Here he was attacked at the dawn of day, on the 31st of July, by Marshal Contades, the Duke de Broglie, and the French, whose recent successes made them disregard his strong position and the admirably served British artillery which garnished it. After fighting nearly to the hour of noon the French fell into disorder, and reeled back from a field covered with their dead. At this moment Prince Ferdinand sent orders to Lord George Sackville to bring up all the British and Hanoverian cavalry, which had been lying on the right wing inactive and unexposed. This order was scarcely delivered by Ligonier when a second order was brought to march with only the British cavalry. Lord George, who had not ceased quarrelling with the prince, replied to his aide-de-camp, in some confusion, "This cannot be!—would he have me break the line?" Young Fitzroy, the aide-de-camp, said, "My orders from the prince are positive: the French are in disorder!—here is a glorious opportunity for the English to distinguish themselves!" Lord George Sackville still hesitated, saying it was impossible the prince could mean to break the line. Fitzroy repeated the prince's orders, and then Lord George asked which way the cavalry was to march, and who was to be their guide? Young Fitzroy replied that he would guide them. Lord George hesitated again, said that he had received two contradictory orders, and would go and seek an explanation from the prince himself. Lord Granby, the second in command, was spurring on, but Lord George made him halt. In the mean while the French fled completely from the field, and the battle was over before the British and Hanoverian cavalry came up. His dissensions with his superior in command were notorious to the whole army, but this did not hinder many officers from believing that there was cowardice mixed with spite; others, however, more friendly to Lord George, pretended that the orders had been purposely delayed, and made contradictory; that Prince Ferdinand never intended he should have any share in the honours of the victory; and that, if the orders had been explicit and consistent, and if Lord George had moved at once, he could not possibly have come up in time to be of any use. He himself insisted that the prince's orders would have made any officer pause as he had done; that, after all, he had only lost eight or ten minutes in hesitation, and that his march was obstructed by some rough, uneven ground, covered with trees and bushes. The weight of opinion was, however, generally against Lord George, both in the camp abroad and in court and city at home. He wrote for leave to resign his command, and returned to England to face and brave a court-martial, which, after Byng's affair, had become more terrible in the eyes of most officers than all the risks and dangers of a bloody battle. But, if our cavalry had no part in the honour of Minden, our infantry as well as our artillery obtained a large share of it. Six regiments of English foot sustained for a time the whole effort of the French, who exceeded 60,000 men. The whole force of the allies engaged was about 35,000. On the very same day the Hereditary Prince of Brunswick defeated a French corps at Coveltd. After various successes Frederick was again called to defend his own frontiers against the Russians, who were advancing with 86,000 men, after defeating General Wedel in the great battle of Zulichau. Before his Prussian majesty could come up the Russians had effected their junction, at Frankfort on the Oder, with an Austrian army of 12,000 men under Marshal Laudon; yet, with only 48,000 men, Frederick attacked these hosts in their intrenchments, and was defeated after a horrible slaughter on both sides. This battle of Frankfort, or Kunersdorf, cost the King of Prussia nearly all his artillery, half of his generals and officers of distinction, and above 18,000 men in killed and wounded. He himself had two horses killed under him, and his hat and clothes were pierced with balls. But Frederick, who seldom despaired, was cheered at this very moment by news of Prince Ferdinand's victory at Minden; and then, considering his own loss was not very important, he called out more troops from a country where he had made nearly every man a soldier, and occupied his fertile genius in devising the schemes of fresh campaigns. The Russians and Austrians were again assisted by an army from Sweden, but the Swedes were soon driven back by General Manteuffel.

The English parliament met on the 13th of October, when Pitt spoke as the oracle of war. He disclaimed particular praise to himself, and professed his determination of keeping united with the rest of the ministers. Not a week had passed in the summer but had been a crisis, in which he had not known whether he should be torn in pieces for failures, or commended, as he now was, for victories and conquests. In continuation, he said that, the more a man was versed in business, the more he found the hand of providence everywhere,—that success had given us unanimity, not unanimity success,—that other ministers had hoped as well, but had not been so circumstanced as to dare to do as much for the war, as he had done,—but that more must be done still,—that all was Providence, whose favour was to be merited by virtue,—that our allies must be supported with more money and more troops,—that he had unlearned his favourite errors, and no longer thought that England could do everything by herself. But the ministerial unanimity which Pitt boasted did not exist, and his brother-in-law, Lord Temple, was at this very moment urging a claim that put the cabinet in jeopardy. Temple asked the king for a vacant order of the garter,—the king, it appears, had promised the first riband to the Marquis of Rockingham, and wanted one, besides, to confer upon Prince Ferdinand. Pitt, with great eagerness, pressed his majesty to gratify Temple, saying that he would take it as a personal favour done to himself. But from entreaties he proceeded to threats, hinting to the Duke of Newcastle that, if he were not gratified, he would no longer sustain “the vast and dangerous load his majesty had been pleased to lay on his feeble shoulders.” The great patriot minister had openly said, and no doubt felt inwardly assured, that he, and he alone, could manage the war and serve his country effectually at this crisis; yet he was ready rather to cease serving his country than forego his brother-in-law's claim to a gewgaw! Seldom has a man been so meanly proud or so proudly mean; and, bringing his inconsistencies as it were into a sentence and an antithesis, he speaks to a courtier with an insolent scorn of courts while he is begging and bullying for a court distinction. In his letter to Newcastle he says,—“All I mean at present to trouble your grace with is, to desire that, when next my reluctant steps shall bring me up the stairs of Kensington, and mix me with the dust of the antechamber, I may learn, once for all, whether the king continues finally inexorable and obdurate to all such united entreaties and remonstrances, as, except towards me and mine, never fail of success.”⁸ But the old king, who loved Temple no better now than he had done two years before, continued obstinate; and Temple, on the 13th of November, just a month after the meeting of parliament, resigned. It is said that, in doing so, his lordship besought Mr. Pitt and his brothers (the two Grenvilles) not to follow his example, but remain where their services were so much wanted. But the old king, who knew the close links that bound the parties, and who could hardly be ignorant of Pitt's menacing letter to Newcastle, took the alarm, and commissioned the Duke of Devonshire to persuade Lord Temple to resume his place, by promising him that his ardent passion for the blue riband should be gratified. Temple, whose sudden resignation had been censured by the public, who felt that it must lead to the retirement of Pitt, was soothed by Devonshire's persuasion and promise: within a week he kissed hands again for the privy seal; and, shortly after this violence on the old king, he got the blue riband. According to Horace Walpole, Temple pretended to Lord Hertford, that, finding himself ill treated by the king, he had asked for the garter merely as an indication of returning favour, not being so anxious to wear the Honi soit us to show the world that he stood well with his sovereign.

Pitt declared that this was no time for paltry economy; that the best economy was to push expenditure so as to finish the war. With more perfect truth than always attended his tropes, he painted France as in a state of bankruptcy and despondence; and described her attempts and efforts as those of a dying rather than a living monarchy. Few or none ventured to oppose or contradict; supplies, amounting to the hitherto unparalleled extent of 15,000,000*l.*, were voted; and the army, including the 18,000 militia, was fixed at more than 175,000 men in British pay! It was reported that Pitt said, in private,—“Some time before I should have been well contented to bring France on her knees, but now I will not rest till I have laid her on her back!”

A.D. 1760.—Lord George Sackville, having waited till the return of his brother officers from Germany, imperiously demanded a court-martial. He received for answer, that a question had arisen whether he could be legally tried, as the orders he had disobeyed had been given by a foreigner, and that this question must be referred to the judges. The question, however, was not referred to the judges, but to the attorney and solicitor-general, who gave it as their opinion that he might be tried by court-martial. Another doubt had been started, whether his lordship, who had left the army, was any longer subject to military law; but this was passed over. Lord Holderness, however, in notifying the opinion of the law-officers of the crown, told Lord George that his majesty wished to know whether his lordship really wished to have this court-martial, as there was no specific charge against him. Lord George boldly declared that such a trial was necessary to clear his honour; repeated his petition for a court-martial, and said he would bide the event, conscious that he had not been guilty of any fault. And yet he knew that the court would contain several personal and bitter enemies—that the popular outcry was against him—and that, though he was favoured exceedingly by the princess dowager and the Prince of Wales, the old king was determined to let the law take its course, should the court-martial he had called for once begin proceedings. It is supposed that Lord George relied on his imposing demeanour and his vehement and daring eloquence—and with the tongue no man was bolder—but Horace Walpole slyly adds another encouraging circumstance. “The approaching reign promised to be favourable to any sufferer under the present; nor could Lord George but know that to be the enemy of Prince Ferdinand would be meritorious in the eyes of the prince and princess dowager, who hated the ducal line of Brunswick.”* The court-martial was appointed, with General Onslow, brother of the speaker, for president; a messenger was sent over to Germany to procure written evidence from Prince Ferdinand. On the 28th of February the king intimated, by message, to the House of Commons,

that Lord George Sackville, a member of that honourable House, had been put under arrest for unmilitary conduct and disobedience of orders. The speaker was averse to the military trial of a member who was no longer in the army, and hoped it would be opposed; but Lord Milton, brother-in-law to Lord George, said that the trial was what he earnestly desired. Lord Barrington then moved an address of thanks to the king for his communication, and for his majesty's great tenderness towards the privileges of the House. As this was readily agreed to, and no one spoke, Lord Barrington said it was nemine contradicente: but here Bubb Dodington, who since his loss of place had returned to Leicester House, muttered a sulky No. This led to a short debate, in which Sir Francis Dashwood spoke against the Mutiny Bill, and said that the time ought to be limited, and that it ought to be strictly defined how long persons who had quitted the army should be liable to martial law. Bubb Dodington said that he did not think it law at all; that they might have tried Lord George while he was yet a military man; that martial law was growing upon us and becoming dangerous to our liberties—the Mutiny Act fell to the ground every year, but, like the giant, recovered new strength on touching it. Sir John Rushout said that were he in the army he would not sit on the trial of any man out of it; and Sir Francis Dashwood promised to call for a revival of the whole Mutiny Act. General Onslow, while sitting on another court-martial upon Lord Charles Hay, who had severely criticised the conduct of his commander, Lord Loudon, in America, was seized with an apoplectic fit and died. The king, with headlong haste, got another commission drawn up for another president; for his majesty was now most eager to show Prince Ferdinand that he had the power to punish Lord George. But General Pulteney excused himself from sitting as president, and the king was obliged to look out for another. At last Sir Charles Howard was appointed, and the trial proceeded. Prince Ferdinand had sent over one of his German aides-de-camp, Captain Wintzenrode, who, it appeared, had carried an order from the prince to Lord George to bring up his cavalry before Ligonier and Fitzroy carried their messages to the same effect. Wintzenrode deposed that Lord George had seemed not to understand his orders, and a faint doubt remains in favour of his lordship that they were not very intelligible. Colonel Sloper deposed that at least a quarter of an hour elapsed between the departure of Wintzenrode and the arrival of Colonel Ligonier, and both Sloper and Ligonier said that the countenance of Lord George betrayed confusion. The brave and good-natured Granby reluctantly admitted that his advance had been checked by Lord George, and that when the cavalry moved he was obliged to regulate his pace to his lordship's slowness. Lord George, on his side, accused Prince Ferdinand of malice, and his aides-de-camp of blundering. His lordship, as we have noted, was bold with his tongue, and he was skilful too. He assumed a dictatorial style to the court, and treated the inferiority of their capacities as he might have done if sitting amongst them, instead of being a prisoner before them. He browbeat the witnesses, gave the lie to Sloper, and treated the judge-advocate with contempt. "Nothing," adds Walpole, "was timid, nothing humble, in his behaviour. His replies were quick and spirited. He prescribed to the court, and they acquiesced. An instant of such resolution at Minden had established his character for ever;"* The trial ran out to a great length, and while it was yet unfinished the Mutiny Act expired. It thus became necessary to make out a new warrant and to read over again the depositions of the witnesses: but at length, on the 3rd of April, the court-martial finished their tedious business by pronouncing Lord George Sackville guilty of having disobeyed the orders of Prince Ferdinand, whom, by his commission and instructions, he was ordered to obey, and declared it their opinion that he was unfit to serve his majesty in any military capacity whatever. This sentence was confirmed by the king, who, moreover, signified his pleasure, "that it should be given out in public orders, not only in Britain, but in America, and every quarter of the globe where any of the English troops happened to be, that, officers being convinced that neither high birth nor great employments can shelter offences of such a nature, and that seeing they are subject to censures much worse than death to a man who has any sense of honour, they may avoid the fatal consequences arising from disobedience of orders." Nor did the old king stop here: he, with his own hand, struck out Lord George's name from the list of privy councillors, and forbade his appearance at court; ordered the lord chamberlain to notify this prohibition to the Prince of Wales and the princess dowager; and sent the vice-chamberlain to acquaint Lord Bute with it. The potent favourite said, to be sure the prince would not think of seeing Lord George while it was disagreeable to his majesty; but the advanced age of the king gave assurance that the proscription at court could not last very long; and almost as soon as George III. was king, the haughty Sackville was taken back openly into favour, and he subsequently obtained lucrative employment and a peerage.

During this session a bill for establishing a militia in Scotland was rejected by a large majority, though Sir Henry Erskine declared that the want of such a force was so deeply felt, that all Scotland would come and demand it at the bar of the House. Another bill of more questionable utility met with a different fate. The Qualification Act, passed in the reign of Queen Anne, to provide that every member of the House of Commons should, at the moment of his election, be possessed of property in land to the amount of 600*l.* a-year if sitting for a county, 300*l.* if for a borough, had long been notoriously evaded; for, as the act did not require any proofs of a prolonged possession while sitting in the House, it was enough to produce a fictitious transfer from some man really holding landed property, which could be restored to the owner and cancelled the moment a member had taken his seat. Sir John Philipps, a noted Jacobite, now proposed that the House should oblige every member to produce a schedule of his lands to the speaker of the House, explain his qualifications, and swear to the truth of them. Pitt, who had himself slid into the House on a fictitious qualification, and who at the time of his first election had little he could call his own, except his cornetcy of horse, promoted the bill; Lord Egmont opposed it with great ability, saying that it would subject men's estates to the inspection and iniquitous practices of lawyers; Lord Strange ridiculed a notorious blunder in it; Thomas Townshend, the younger, spoke warmly against it, tracing its origin to the four last disgraceful years of Queen Anne, when a similar bill had been attempted by the Tories; and others showed some spirit on the same side. It should appear, however, that the subject was not considered important enough to draw a full House, for it was carried by a majority of 80 against 40. It had still, however, to encounter some opposition in the Lords. The old Duke of Newcastle had been averse to it, and, though Pitt had insisted that something must be done to gratify the Tories, he would probably have seen it thrown out with pleasure. The Duke of Richmond and the Earls of Gower and Hillsborough spoke against it, and Lord Hardwicke was lukewarm. Gower put it home to the bishops whether the bill would not multiply perjuries; but the bench seemed to have had a sudden and wonderful reliance on human virtue; though certainly, as observed by Walpole, "perjury was not the crime at which most men stuck in that age; nor could it be hoped that they who made a seat in parliament the foundation of their fortune would not overleap any obstacle to obtain one." Lord Temple supported the bill, and made use of the old threat of disunion in the cabinet if it were not allowed to pass; and so it was passed by a majority of 50 against 16.

General Murray, a brave and adventurous soldier, had been left to defend the half-ruined town of Quebec, and our fleet had retired to escape being frozen up in the St. Lawrence. M. Levi, who had succeeded Montcalm, spent the winter in making preparations for a desperate effort to recover all that the French had lost, and early in the spring he took the field with a mixed body of French, Canadians, and Indians, exceeding in all 10,000 men. He marched from Montreal, and in the month of April, when the weather was still inclement, he appeared before Quebec. General Murray, with scarcely 7000 men, disdaining to wait a regular siege, marched out and attacked the enemy; but he was defeated, lost most of the guns he had taken out with him, was nearly cut off in his re-treach, and got back to the city with great difficulty. As the ice cleared away, Levi brought up six French frigates, and began to form the siege by land and water. But on the 9th of May Lord Colville, with two good frigates outailing the rest of the English squadron, ascended the river and destroyed the French ships, under the eyes of Levi, who stood on the heights on the other side, but who presently decamped, and with such precipitation that he left his artillery and stores behind him. Nothing now remained to the French in Canada except Montreal, and that last stronghold, wherein the Marquis de Vaudreuil, the governor-general, had collected all his magazines, was soon invested by General Amherst, General Murray, and Colonel Haviland; and, despairing of any succour from France, which could scarcely put a ship to sea, or spare a man from her wars in Europe, Vaudreuil capitulated on the 8th of September. Thus were the Canadas won, and the conquest of them had cost us comparatively but few men. This encouraged Pitt to call it "a bloodless war;" but, as he was conquering America through Germany, the blood spilt there was assuredly, in some measure, to be taken into the account; and there the carnage was and continued to be unprecedented in modern war. In the year 1758 the loss of the King of Prussia was estimated at 30,000 men, and that of his enemies at 100,000. The year 1759 was scarcely less bloody; and we shall presently see the monstrous waste of human life in the present year, 1760.

On the 23rd of June the Austrians under Laudon attacked the Prussians under Fouquet, near Glatz, in Silesia, and gained a victory which cost the Prussians 8000 men in killed, wounded, and prisoners, and the Austrians themselves 3000 men; and after their victory the Austrian soldiers committed unspeakable atrocities in one or two towns which their unusual success opened to them. "At Landshut," says the royal cynic, "nothing was spared but misery and ugliness." These atrocities were of frequent occurrence, and to the fearful amount of lives and limbs lost in the field must be added the darker horrors committed on the peaceful townspeople and the unhappy peasantry during this seven years' war. From Glatz, Laudon advanced upon Breslau, Frederick's brother, Prince Henry, obliged him to raise that siege; but before the Austrians departed they had reduced the greater part of the thriving Breslau to a heap of ruins. Frederick himself, after a fruitless attempt to recover Dresden, was intercepted at Liegnitz, and almost completely surrounded by Austrians and Russians; but on the 15th of August, with an union of heroism and consummate skill, he cut his way through the Austrians, killing some 2000, and taking some 5000 prisoners. He himself lost in killed and wounded about 1200 men, but this he called "only a scratch." He then joined his brother Henry, and rescued the town of Schweidnitz, besieged by Daun. But, in the mean while, a Russian army under Tottleben and

Czernichef, and an Austrian army under Lacy, after firing red-hot balls into the town, and bombarding it with shells and grenades, took Berlin, committed dreadful havoc, and threw out their Cossacks and Pandours to ravage all the country round about. Frederick struck away to rescue his capital, and Daun followed him. In a moment of despondency Frederick spoke, as he had done once or twice before, of committing suicide; but the Russians and Austrians ran away from Berlin as soon as they had heard of his approach, and his genius soon gave him fresh triumphs over the mediocrity or downright stupidity of his enemies' generals. The Hereditary Prince of Brunswick was defeated at Corbach, when Prince Ferdinand was at too great a distance to support him. In his retreat his army fell into confusion, and the greater part of the infantry would have been cut off had not the Hereditary Prince made a brilliant charge in person at the head of the British dragoons. The prince was wounded in the action. A few days after this affair, while the Duke de Broglie was encamped on the heights of Corbach, the Hereditary Prince defeated a detached corps at Exdorf, and took the commander of it and five entire battalions prisoners. Here the British horse distinguished themselves, Elliot's dragoons, a new regiment which had never been in the field before, charging five several times, and breaking the enemy's line at each charge. Soon after this exploit the Hereditary Prince was detached to the Lower Rhine, which he crossed in September. He took the ancient city of Cleves, and then invested Wesel. But the French, under M. de Castries, attacked him in his positions, and, after two days' hard fighting, he was compelled to retreat beyond the Rhine, which river he crossed in admirable order, though in presence of a far superior and victorious force. His loss had been very considerable, and had fallen heaviest on the British part of his army. His own person, which he had exposed like a common trooper, was covered with wounds. Lord Doun, a gallant, accomplished, and amiable young man, received three wounds, and, after languishing some weeks, died in torment. Prince Ferdinand, who had with him nearly 20,000 British troops, gave the French a complete defeat at Warburg, and drove them into the Dimel, where many of them were drowned. The British grenadiers, artillery, dragoons, and the Highlanders particularly distinguished themselves in this sharp encounter, and the gallant Marquess of Granby was always found charging at the head of the horse. Such, however, was the numerical superiority of the French, who now called in their detachments and got reinforcements across the Rhine, that they were soon enabled to overrun Hesse and threaten the electorate of Hanover once more.

But George II., who had already spent nearly all his privately accumulated treasure and vast savings in defending his electorate, looked confidently to the arms of his nephew, Frederick, and the increasing poverty and disorganization of the French monarchy, and if he had any tender apprehensions about Hanover—he had been victorious for the last two years everywhere else—they were soon quieted in the grave.* On the 25th of October, the temperate, methodical old man rose as usual at six o'clock and drank his chocolate. At a quarter after seven he went into a little closet. Presently his German valet heard a noise as of some one falling, and running into the closet, he found the king dead on the floor: in falling he had cut his face against the corner of a bureau. They carried him to a bed and applied the lancet, but not a drop of blood followed:—the ventricle of his heart had burst and caused an instantaneous and painless death.—“Full of years and glory, he died without a pang, and without a reverse. HE Settlement, as it used properly to be styled, of 1689, was in the church as well as in the state much less of a revolution than was either the abolition of the ancient government in 1649, or its restoration in 1660. The change in regard to the one as well as the other was not of institutions, but only of persons. As the monarchy remained with only a new king, so did the esta-lished church with only the substitution of some new bishops and other clergymen.

Both in church and state this Revolution, or rather this winding up and stoppage of the Revolution, was more remarkably than anything else a victory of protestantism over popery, or rather of the half-protestantism of the Anglican and Scottish churches over the principle of absolutism (which is the essence of popery) alike in religion and in politics. As 1649 was the high day of republicanism and radicalism, of independency and sectarianism, so was 1689 that of constitutionalism, pure Whiggism, or Juste-milieuism, and of Protestant established-churchism, which is merely theological and ecclesiastical Juste-milieuism.

and in effect, the restoration of absolutism and of popery. Neither the one nor the other, indeed, was openly or formally re-established; the state of the country and of the popular feeling made that impracticable at the moment; but both were introduced in disguise—the work of preparation for their complete re-establishment was begun—and in the mean time every institution in the kingdom, even while retaining its old form, took their character, and worked for their ends. The crown proceeded from violating the constitution to trampling upon the laws; the parliament was coerced until it became the obedient ally of the court; the law was perverted into the most convenient instrument of oppression, the judges themselves serving as the mere beagles and bloodhounds of the royal tyranny; the corporations and municipal franchises—those sheltering depositories of the liberties of the nation in the worst times, were now either extinguished, or forced, like everything else, into conformity and subserviency to the one dominant authority in the state, the power of the monarch. Finally, the established church, half-popish at any rate, as every established church essentially is, was made, as far as possible, except in mere name and profession, to conceal and suppress its protestantism, and to give way to its inclinations of an opposite kind; that is to say, the pressure to which it was subjected from the court, and by which of course it was swayed to a certain extent, was all in that direction. Thus in England it signalled itself by a vigorously coercive, or, as others termed it, a persecuting policy towards dissenters, from which it required dexterous management on the part of the crown to protect the Roman Catholics themselves; while in Scotland, where the Catholics were few in number, besides going faster and farther in the same course, it assumed, of the two forms or constitutions, the episcopalian and presbyterian, which ever since the Reformation had been struggling for the mastery in that country, the one—namely, the episcopalian—which was most opposed to democracy and to the popular sentiment, and had in it the largest infusion of the principle of popery and absolutism.

All these three successive revolutions, or rather grand shiftings of the scene in the progress of one revolution, were alike reactions, brought about by the opposite principle, or system, having in each case been previously carried out to the point at which it was no longer endurable. The absolutism and at least semi-popery of the early part of the reign of Charles I. produced the violent protestantism and anti-monarchism of 1649. Republicanism and sectarianism were swept away together in 1660 by a returning tide of all but absolute power in the crown, and of the most rigorous intolerance of dissent in the church. Partly from the natural tendency of things, partly from circumstances personal to Charles II. and his successor, the ascendancy acquired by the royal authority after the Restoration was employed, more perseveringly than for any other object, first in the protection and ultimately in the open encouragement and promotion of popery; and accordingly the chief characteristic of the next and final phasis of the Revolution; the settlement made in 1689, was its anti-papal spirit. It may be regarded as the completion of the Reformation begun by Henry VIII. a century and a half before.

It is true, indeed, that, with the fall of absolute power in the church, absolute power in the state was also necessarily put an end to; and the settlement made in 1689 was therefore the commencement of a new era of political as well as of religious liberty. The most self-willed of despots did not foresee, or consider, that when he cast off the supremacy of the pope he was making the first move against the supremacy of his own prerogative. Then was really begun the long contest between absolutism and constitutionalism, which, after many fluctuations, was finally decided in favour of the latter in 1889. But yet this result, whatever it was essentially, or in its more remote operation, took the shape at the time rather of a victory over popery than a victory over the prerogative. The royal prerogative, in fact, was not formally curtailed by any of the changes then made, but popery, as an element of the constitution, was expressly declared an abolished and forbidden thing.

The victory then was really in the main a victory of protestantism, and, as such, a victory of the established church. Yet, notwithstanding this character of the result, and notwithstanding also the fact that it had been principally brought about by means of the church, there is no doubt that the Revolution was far from being acceptable to the generality of the clergy. That event, indeed, brought with it no new laws directly affecting the established church in England—no alteration of anything in either its internal or external condition, in its doctrines, its discipline, its endowments, or its position in the state. On the contrary, all its ancient rights and liberties, some of which had been recently attempted to be infringed, were confirmed and more distinctly recognised than they had been at any former period. But still there were obvious enough reasons why such a body as the established clergy should be in general dissatisfied with such a change as the Revolution. It is certain, in the first place, that, although the resistance of some of the heads of the church, in which they were backed by the nearly universal body of the clergy as well as of the laity, had been principally instrumental in driving the late king from the throne, yet that was a consequence of their conduct which was neither foreseen nor desired either by some of themselves or by the great multitude of their inferiors by whom they were supported and applauded. Whether they would have taken the course they did if they had rightly discerned to what it was to lead, may be doubted; some of them might have thought the assumption and exercise of a dispensing power,—in other words, of an absolute despotism—by the king, a less, others a greater evil, than the expulsion of the reigning family from the throne; all we can say is, that, after they had gained their immediate object, the vast majority of the clergy would have been very glad if they could have there stopped the wheel of change they had set in motion, and reduced the Revolution to a mere triumph over the crown in a trial at law. And, in truth, if it had come to a show of hands, they would probably have had the majority of the nation with them in this sentiment. The mass of the people can scarcely be said to have taken part at all in the measures that were ultimately adopted. And even in the legislature the majority of the peers were avowedly hostile to the deposition of the king. The Revolution of 1689 was the act of the House of Commons alone, in so far as it was a national act at all. And even that body might possibly have contented itself with a less decided change if it had not been for the attitude taken by the Prince of Orange himself, who soon made it be clearly understood that he would only go on with and finish the work he had been called in to do upon one condition. So that, after all, this glorious Revolution, as it is styled, may be said to have been on the part of the English nation little less than a forced leap over a precipice at the edge of which it found itself without the power of retreat. No wonder that an act performed in such circumstances, however wise it may have really been, or however fortunate it may have turned out, should have failed to give universal or even very general satisfaction at first; but there were peculiar reasons why the clergy for the most part should above all other classes regard it with little favour or with avowed hostility. The established church, the creature of the crown, had, faithful to its origin, always stood by the royal authority in its contests with the other powers of the state, and, except in so far as it came in itself for a share of what was going, it must from this its constitutional habit have rather sympathised than otherwise with James's arbitrary and high-handed style of government; at any rate, it could not be expected to see very clearly the fitness either of deposing a king for merely transgressing a few acts of parliament, or of permanently placing the throne under subjection to the law. Besides, as itself one of the great fixed institutions of the state, the church was naturally conservative in all its affections and tendencies, and simply as a change or innovation the Revolution must have been distasteful to it. And yet it be admitted also that honesty and sincere conviction here did their part as well as mere selfish or sentimental considerations—that scrupulous minds, having taken up certain views in religion, might conscientiously shrink from sanctioning proceedings, which, whether agreeable or not to human laws, they deemed to be opposed to the law of God.

When the convention, which had conferred the crown upon William and Mary, had by an act of the two Houses, which received the royal assent in the usual form, been turned into a parliament, and the oath of allegiance imposed by that act came to be administered to the Lords and Commons, only eight of the bishops in the first instance consented to take it; two more, after some hesitation, followed their example; but eight absented themselves and persisted in refusing to acknowledge the new government. Of the number were Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, Turner, Bishop of Ely, Lake of Chichester, Ken of Bath and Wells, and White of Peterborough, five of the seven prelates whose refusal to read King James's Declaration of Indulgence had given the signal for the late Revolution. The other three who refused to take the oath were Thomas, Bishop of Worcester, Lloyd of Norwich, and Frampton of Gloucester. Lloyd of St. Asaph and Trelawny of Bristol were the only two of the seven petitioners against the indulgence who consented to sanction the change which their petition had mainly contributed to bring about; the others who took the oath along with them being Lamplugh, Archbishop of York, (to which see he had been translated from Exeter scarcely three months before, by King James.)* Compton, Bishop of London, Barlowe of Lincoln, Mew of Winchester, Sprat of Rochester, Beaw of Landaff, and shortly afterwards Smith of Carlisle and Watson of St. Davids. To these may be added Lord Crewe, Bishop of Durham, who seems to have taken the oath in his capacity of a temporal peer. Burnet has drawn a very severe character of this double lord, who had been promoted from Oxford to Durham in 1674, but "who," writes his right reverend brother, "bating the dignity of being born of a noble, though puritan, family, had not any one quality to recommend him to so great a post, unless obedience and compliance could supply all other defects. He has neither learning nor good sense, and is no preacher. He was a fawning abject slave to the court. And thus was [he] raised [to], and has been now for above thirty years possessed of, the greatest income in the church."† At the Revolution, he afterwards tells us, "the poor Bishop of Durham, who had absconded for some time, and was waiting for a ship to get beyond sea, fearing public affronts, and had offered to compound by

* Dr. Lamplugh, Bishop of Exeter, flying from that city while the Prince of Orange was marching to it, was rewarded by King James with the translation to the Archbishopric of York, on November 16th; and the ceremonies of his translation were performed at Lambeth, on Saturday December 8th, by his grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Bishops of St. Asaph, Ely, Rochester, and Peterborough; and the day after he did his homage to his majesty at Whitehall; and within two days after he joined with the Lords spiritual and temporal, assembled at Guildhall, to invite the Prince of Orange to take the administration of the government upon him."—Kennet's Complete History, iii. 523.

† History of his Own Time, i. 392.—The passage is one of those suppressed in the older editions of the Bishop's work, and first published in that of Dr. Routh, 6 vols. 8vo. Oxford, 1823. Crewe outlived Burnet by seven or eight years, not dying till 1723, within two years of the appearance of the first volume of the latter's History, which, if it had been published, as he intended it should be, in six years after he had left the world, and as he expressly directed in his will, "without adding, suppressing, or altering it in any particular," would have produced rather an awkward sensation in various quarters by this and other similar passages. See Burnet's will in Memoirs of the Secret Services of John Macky, Esquire, Appendix, pp. i.—xxii.

reigning his bishopric, was now prevailed on to come, and, by voting the new settlement, to merit at least a pardon for all that he had done; which, all things considered, was thought very indecent in him, yet not unbecoming the rest of his life and character." But indeed nearly all the other bishops who complied with the new settlement were as much opposed to it at heart as Crewe; Compton and Trelawney must be regarded as the only members of the right reverend bench who were really in favour of the transference of the crown from the head of James to that of William; only these two voted in the majority of fifty-one against forty-nine, by which it was carried that the vacant throne should be filled, not by a regent but by a king, while thirteen of their brethren were counted in the minority—among whom were York, Winchester, St. Asaph, Rochester, St. Davids, and Lincoln, who afterwards submitted, as well as Norwich, Ely, Bath and Wells, Peterborough, Chichester, and Gloucester, who stood out. The thirteenth was Hall, Bishop of Oxford, who does not seem to have presented himself in the House after the passing of the act imposing the new oath of allegiance, being probably prevented by the state of his health, for he died in about a year after. He had been made a bishop by the late king only a few months before his abdication, being, according to Bishop Kennet, "one of the meanest and most obscure of the city divines, who had taken no other degree than that of Bachelor of Arts, and had indeed no merit but that of reading the king's declaration in his church, when all his brethren of conscience and honour did refuse it."* Burnet, in the like temper, describes him as "one Hall, a conformist in London, who was looked on as half a Presbyterian." † Cartwright, who had been made Bishop of Chester in 1686, took fright and fled, and, having afterwards gone to Ireland with King James, died there in neglect and destitution. "He was," Burnet allows, "a man of good capacity, and had made some progress in learning;" but, he adds, "he was ambitious and servile, cruel and boisterous; and by the great liberties he allowed himself, he fell under much scandal of the worst sort. He had set himself long to raise the king's authority above law, which he said was only a method of government to which kings might submit as they pleased; but their authority was from God, absolute and superior to law, which they might exert as oft as they found it necessary for the ends of government. So he was looked on as a man that would more effectually advance the design of popery than if he should turn over to it. And indeed, bad as he was, he never made that slip, even in the most desperate state of his affairs." ‡ Cartwright, in fact, it is recorded, died a Protestant. Croft, Bishop of Hereford, and Wood of Lichfield and Coventry, were probably both too old and infirm to attend in parliament; the former died in May, 1691, the latter in April, 1692. Finally, the two sees of Exeter and Salisbury were vacant. So that, on the whole, of the twenty-six spiritual peers, seven may be said to have been at this time, owing to one cause or another, absent from parliament; and, of the remaining nineteen, eleven consented to take the oath of allegiance to the new government, and eight refused or withdrew from the House to avoid it.

Before, however, they took this step, some of them, Burnet tells us, moved the House for a bill of toleration and another of comprehension, "that they might recommend themselves," he is pleased to add; "by a show of moderation." But the truth is, these nonjuring prelates, while they evinced their sincerity and conscientiousness by the strongest of all tests, were most of them, in all probability, more mildly disposed towards the dissenters, and really more favourable to a measure of toleration, than some of their brethren who took a different course. The seven bishops had distinctly declared, in their famous petition, that their aversion to the distributing and publishing of the declaration for liberty of conscience did not proceed from any want of tenderness to dissenters; "in relation to whom," said they, "we are willing to come to such a temper as shall be thought fit when the matter shall be considered and settled in parliament and convocation." On the other hand, from whatever motive the measures they now recommended were brought forward, it is at all events certain that they met with no cordial acceptance from the opposite party; nor, as we shall find, was all the influence of the crown able to obtain the assent of the House to the comprehension thus moved for by the nonjuring prelates after they had withdrawn from it.

Meanwhile, when it was found that the bishops who were averse to take the oaths could not be reached by the existing law, so long as they chose to refrain from presenting themselves in parliament, a new bill was brought into the House of Commons, which was eventually passed under the name of "An Act for Abrogating the Oaths of Supremacy and Allegiance and appointing other Oaths;" and which, among other regulations, declared that every archbishop and bishop neglecting to take the new oaths should be liable to the same penalties as they would have been liable to by any statute for refusing to take the abrogated oaths of allegiance and supremacy; and, further, that every holder of any ecclesiastical office whatsoever, by whom the new oaths should not have been taken before the 1st of August, should be in the first instance suspended for six months, and at the end of that time, if he had not taken them, should be deprived. The debates upon this bill brought out very strongly the determined attachment of the majority of both Houses to the sacramental test,—the great bar which kept the dissenters without the pale of the constitution. The measure, Burnet relates, "was followed with a particular eagerness by some who were known enemies to the church; and it was then generally believed that a great part of the clergy would refuse the oaths. So they hoped to have an advantage against the church by this means. Hampden [the grandson of the famous John Hampden is supposed to be here meant] persuaded the king to add a period to a speech he made, concerning the affairs of Ireland, in which he proposed the admitting all Protestants to serve in that war. This was understood to be intended for taking off the sacramental test, which was necessary by the law to qualify men for employments, and was looked on as the chief security the Church of England had, as it excluded dissenters from all employments. And it was tried if a bargain could be made for excusing the clergy from the oaths provided the dissenters might be excused from the sacrament. The king put this into his speech without communicating it to the ministry, and it had a very ill effect. It was not only rejected by a great majority in both Houses, but it very much heightened the prejudices against the king, as bearing no great affection to the Church of England, when he proposed the opening such a door, which they believed would be fatal to them. The rejecting this made the act imposing the oaths to be driven on with the more zeal.* Accordingly, notwithstanding the exertions of Burnet, who, having been made Bishop of Salisbury, was, he tells us, "the chief manager of the debate in favour of the clergy both in the House of Lords and at the conferences with the Commons," the measure passed with no further mitigation of its original severity than the annexation of a clause leaving it to the king to allow to any twelve of the nonjuring clergy he might think fit to select "an allowance out of their ecclesiastical benefices or promotions for their subsistence, not exceeding a third part, and to continue during his majesty's pleasure, and no longer."† Burnet says, that, seeing no more could be obtained, he acquiesced the more easily, by reason that, though when the debates began, he was assured that those who seemed resolved not to take the oaths yet prayed for the king in their chapels, he afterwards found that this was not true, for they named no king or queen, so that it was easy to guess whom they meant by such an indefinite designation. "I also heard many things," he adds, "that made me conclude they were endeavouring to raise all the opposition to the government possible."

After all, the generality of the clergy took the oaths, "though," according to Burnet, "with too many reservations and distinctions, which laid them open to severe censures, as if they had taken them against their conscience."‡ In another passage he imputes much of the general corruption of principle, which, he affirms, notwithstanding an outward face of virtue and sobriety, was now fast spreading through the nation, to this conduct of the ministers of religion:—"It must be confessed," he says, "that the behaviour of many clergymen gave atheists no small advantage; they had taken the oaths and read the prayers for the present government; they observed the orders for public fasts and thanksgivings; and yet they showed in many places their aversion to our establishment but too visibly; so that the offence that this gave, in many parts of the nation, was too evident; in some places it broke out in very indecent instances, that were brought into courts of law and censured. This made many conclude that the clergy were a sort of men that would swear and pray, even against their consciences, rather than lose their benefices; and, by consequence, that they were governed by interest, and not by principle." Those of the bishops, however, who had in the first instance refused the oaths, had so far committed themselves that they could not well retract; and, accordingly, after remaining suspended for six months, they became, from the 1st of February, 1690, ipso facto, deprived under the late act. They were allowed, nevertheless, to continue at their sees for a year after this,—all the while, Burnet complains, neglecting the concerns of the church, and living privately in their palaces doing nothing; but, in truth, their hands were tied up from performing any of the duties of their office by the position in which they legally stood. Burnet states that he had, by the queen's order, moved both the Earl of Rochester and Sir John Trevor, who had great credit with them, to try whether, in case an act could be obtained to excuse them from taking the oaths, they would consent to go on and officiate in ordinations, institutions, and confirmations, and assist at the public worship as formerly; but, if we are to believe his account, "they would give no answer; only they said they would live quietly"—which he interprets, with no excess of charity, to mean, that "they would keep themselves close till a proper time should encourage them to act more openly." They were no doubt scrupulous about doing or saying anything which might have the appearance of complying with the new settlement. However, all hope of winning them over was at length given up; and their actual ejection from their sees was resolved upon. Of the eight bishops who had expressly refused to take the new oath of allegiance, Thomas of Worcester had died in June, 1689, and Lake of Chichester in August of the same year; and their places had been already filled up by the appointment, in the following October, of Dr. Stillingfleet to Worcester, and Dr. Patrick to Chichester. The other six, Sancroft of Canterbury, Kenn of Bath and Wells, Turner of Ely, Frampton of Gloucester, Lloyd of Norwich, and White of Peterborough, were all now put out of their sees on the same day, the 1st of February, 1691, being exactly a year after they had incurred deprivation under the late act; and immediately thereafter Dr. Tillotson was appointed to Canterbury, Dr. Patrick to Ely, Dr. Fowler to Gloucester, Dr. Moore to Norwich, Dr. Cumberland to Peterborough, and Dr. Kidder to Bath and Wells; Patrick being succeeded in Ely by Dr. Grove. Salisbury and Bangor, which were vacant when King William came to the throne, had, soon after that event, been given, the former to Dr. Burnet, the latter to Dr. Humphreys. Exeter, also, which had become vacant just before the Revolution, by the promotion of Lamplugh to York, had been filled up in April, 1689, by the translation of Trelawny from Bristol,* where he was in the following October succeeded by Dr. Ironside; and now in July, 1691, Croft of Hereford having lately died, Ironside was removed to that see, and was succeeded in Bristol by Dr. John Hall. The death of Cartwright of Chester, immediately after the Revolution, had made room for Dr. Strafford in that see. Dr. Timothy Hall, whom James had made a bishop in October, 1688, died in April, 1690; upon which Dr. Hough was appointed to his see of Oxford. Finally, Lamplugh of York died in May, 1691, and Barlowe of Lincoln in October of the same year; when the former mitre was bestowed upon Dr. Sharp, the latter upon Dr. Tension. Altogether, it thus appears that before he had been three years on the throne King William, without including his completion of the translation of Trelawny, had issued no fewer than eighteen congés for the election of bishops, namely six in 1689, one in 1690, and eleven in 1691; by which sixteen new prelates, all indebted for their promotion to the existing government, and recommended by their attachment to the principles of the Revolution, were introduced into the House of Lords, and of the whole twenty-six sees only ten were left in possession of persons who had been bishops in the former reign. Of these ten, Wood of Lichfield and Coventry was the only one who is not stated to have taken the oaths to the new government; and he died in April, 1692. Burnet, himself one of them, draws a flattering character of the new occupants of the episcopal bench. Tillotson and Sharp, he observes, were the two best preachers that had sat in the sees of Canterbury and York in his day; "only," he adds, "Sharp did not know the world so well, and was not so steady as Tillotson was;" and, doubtless, if these defects appeared merely in Sharp's preaching, they were the less worth minding. The new prelates, according to Burnet, "were generally looked on as the learnedest, the wisest, and best men that were in the church."† And he continues, "It was visible that in all these nominations, and the filling the inferior dignities that became void by their promotion, no ambition nor court favour had appeared; men were not scrambling for preferment, nor using arts, or employing friends to set them forward; on the contrary, men were sought for, and brought out of their retirements; and most of them very much against their own inclinations: they were men both of moderate principles and of calm tempers. This great promotion was such a discovery of the king and queen's designs with relation to the church, that it served much to remove the jealousies that some other steps the king had made were beginning to raise in the Whigs, and very much softened the ill-humour that was spread among them." In point of fact the nolo episcopari had been pronounced by several of those upon whom the royal choice had fallen with apparent sincerity, and in other instances the mitre had dropped upon heads that were not dreaming of any such honour. Even among the friends of the new order of things there were scruples about taking the places of the deprived bishops. Thus, the learned Dr. Beveridge (afterwards Bishop of St. Asaph) refused to succeed Kenn in the see of Bath and Wells. Tillotson, himself, though chiefly, it is probable, from motives of a different kind, is stated to have long resisted the wish of their majesties to elevate him to the primacy. "They had both," says Burnet, "for above a year pressed him to come into this post; and he had struggled against it with great earnestness: as he had no ambition nor aspiring in his temper, so he foresaw what a scene of trouble and slander he must enter on, now in the decline of his age. The prejudices that the Jacobites would possess all people with, for his coming into the room of one whom they called a confessor, and who began now to have the public compassion on his side, were well foreseen by him. He also apprehended the continuance of that heat and aversion that a violent party had always expressed towards him, though he had not only avoided to provoke any of them, but had upon all occasions done the chief of them great services, as oft as it was in his power. He had large principles, and was free from superstition; his zeal had been chiefly against atheism and popery; but he had never showed much sharpness against the dissenters. He had lived in a good correspondence with many of them; he had brought several over to the church by the force of reason, and the softness of persuasion and good usage; but was a declared enemy to violence and severities on those heads. Among other prejudices against him, one related to myself: he and I had lived for many years in a close and strict friendship. He laid before the king all the ill effects that, as he thought, the promoting him would have on his own service; but all this had served only to increase the king's esteem of him, and fix him in his purpose." It is related, again, that the first notice or thought Dr. Cumberland had of his appointment to Peterborough was by reading it in a newspaper at Stamford, where he was minister.* Burnet himself, who was the first bishop made by King William, was, he tells us, nominated by his majesty on his own motion, without any notification to him of the royal intention; but he must have been sure of getting upon the bench from the moment the

* The translation of Trelawny from Bristol to Exeter had been commanded, though not completed, by James before his abdication. † Burnet speaks of them as only fifteen in number, all named, as he says, by William in two years' time. His enumeration does not include Tension, whose appointment took place late in 1691.

Nor, general as was the at least outward submission of the church, was the number of ministers that openly stood out and seceded altogether insignificant. About four hundred of the inferior clergy followed the eight bishops in refusing the new oath of allegiance, and lost their livings in consequence. These, with the laity who accompanied them, formed a nonjuring church, avowedly Jacobite in its political predilections and principles, which, though ultimately reduced to a very quiescent as well as feeble condition, continued for many years after the Revolution to wage fierce controversy with the establishment on the theological aspects of the great question which divided them, as well as to give considerable uneasiness to the government on various occasions. In England, however, the open profession of nonjuring principles was little heard of after the accession of George I., when the precipitation with which the persons of that persuasion generally threw themselves into the projects that exploded in the rebellion of 1715 afforded a good apology for tightening the legal bonds by which the allegiance of the subject was sought to be secured to the family on the throne.

It has already been noticed that two measures for the relief of the dissenters—a bill of toleration and a bill of comprehension—were left as legacies to the House of Lords by the section of the episcopal bench, which the new oath of allegiance scared away from parliament. The bills were actually brought forward, as well as drawn up, by the Earl of Nottingham, the Tory secretary of state, and the single representative of his principles in the cabinet, who on this occasion, however, not only acted as the mouth-piece of his party, but advocated opinions and views which were cordially participated in by his majesty himself. Very little opposition was made from any quarter to the bill of toleration, which accordingly was soon passed under the title of "An Act for exempting their majesties' Protestant subjects, dissenting from the Church of England, from the penalties of certain laws." Proceeding avowedly upon the consideration that some ease to scrupulous consciences in the exercise of religion might be an effectual means to unite their majesties' Protestant subjects in interest and affection, it relieved dissenters from all penalties for not going to church or for attending their own places of worship, provided they were duly registered, and had not the doors locked or barred, on condition only of their taking the new oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribing the declaration against transubstantiation. Instead of the oaths, the Quakers were permitted to make and subscribe a declaration of fidelity to the government and a profession of their Christian belief. The only classes of religionists excepted from the benefits of this act were the Papists and the Socinians, or such as should deny, in preaching or writing, the doctrine of the Trinity as declared in the Thirty-Nine Articles. "Some," says Burnet, "proposed that the act should only be temporary, as a necessary restraint upon the dissenters, that they might demean themselves so as to merit the continuance of it when the term of years now offered should end. But this was rejected: there was now an universal inclination to pass the act; but it could not be expected that the nation would be in the same good disposition towards them at another time." "I showed so much zeal," he adds, "for this act, as very much sunk my credit, which had risen from the approbation I had gained for opposing that which enacted the taking the oaths." The feeling in favour of the act, then, we see was not, as he has just told us it was, universal. Indeed, it is certain that this was far from being the case.

The chief object of the comprehension bill was to admit presbyterian ministers into the church without compelling them to acknowledge the invalidity of their former ordination; and it also proposed to allow certain ceremonial forms in the public worship to be observed or omitted at discretion. The hostility to the dissenters, which found little that it could conveniently fasten upon in the simplicity of the toleration bill, took advantage of the greater vagueness of the principle of this measure, and the difficulty of applying it uniformly and consistently, to urge all sorts of objections; while at the same time its progress appears to have been further embarrassed by some counter-projects proceeding from real or professing friends of the objects it had in view. Among other things it was proposed that a body of persons, partly clergymen, partly laymen, should be commissioned to prepare a general scheme for the reformation of the church, which might be afterwards offered for the approval of the king and parliament. Burnet takes to himself the credit of having caused the failure of this proposition. "This," he says, "was pressed with great earnestness by many of the temporal lords. I at that time did [not?] imagine that the clergy would have come into such a design with zeal and unanimity; and I feared this would be looked on by them as taking the matter out of their hands; and for that reason I argued so warmly against this, that it was carried by a small majority to let it fall." "But," he goes on, "I was convinced soon after that I had taken wrong measures; and that the method proposed by these lords was the only one likely to prove effectual." Whatever credit he gained with the clergy, too, for the course he took as to this matter was insufficient to balance the censure he incurred by moving, when they came to the clause of the bill relating to subscription to the articles, that the subscribing party should be held to bind himself, not to assent and consent, but only to submit with a promise of conformity. He further supported with great zeal a proviso for allowing kneeling at the sacrament and the use of the sign of the cross in baptism to be dispensed with in the cases of such persons as, after being conferred with on the subject should solemnly protest that they were not satisfied as to the lawfulness of these forms. This was carried, though not without vehement opposition to the proposed relaxation in regard to kneeling, which, it was maintained, constituted the chief objection the dissenters had to taking the sacrament according to the mode required by law, and the abrogation of which would therefore make a nullity of the great bulwark of church and state, the test act itself. Burnet concludes his account as follows:—"Those who had moved for this bill, and afterwards brought it into the House, acted a very disingenuous part; for, while they studied to recommend themselves by this show of moderation, they set on their friends to oppose it; and such as were very sincerely and cordially for it were represented as the enemies of the church, who intended to subvert it. When the bill was sent down to the House of Commons it was let lie on the table; and, instead of proceeding in it, they made an address to the king for summoning a convocation of the clergy to attend, according to custom, on the session of parliament. The party that was now beginning to be formed against the government pretended great zeal for the church, and declared their apprehensions that it was in danger; which was imputed by many to the Earl of Nottingham's management. These, as they went heavily into the toleration, so they were much offended with the bill of comprehension, as containing matters relating to the church, in which the representative body of the clergy had not been so much as advised with. Nor was this bill supported by those who seemed most favourable to the dissenters: they set it up for a maxim, that it was fit to keep up a strong faction both in church and state; and they thought it was not agreeable to that to suffer so great a body as the presbyterians to be made more easy, or more inclinable to unite with the church. They also thought that the toleration would be best maintained when great numbers should need it, and be concerned to preserve it. So that, this good design being zealously opposed, and but faintly promoted, it fell to the ground."

But before the project of church reform was altogether dropped, a trial was made of what could be effected by means of a convocation. The address to the king, praying him to summon that body, was not from the Commons alone, as Burnet seems to state, but from both Houses, and was presented on the 19th of April. The convocation, it may be observed, though regularly assembled with every parliament since the Restoration, had done no business since the year 1662; so that the members were detained in town at considerable expense during the session merely to go through the parade duty of reading the church service in Latin. The clerical legislature had been kept thus tame and quiet, in part by the general spirit of subserviency to the crown which had taken possession of the church, but chiefly through the subjection to which the convocation had been reduced by an act of parliament passed in the reign of Henry VIII., absolutely prohibiting it from either assembling except by authority of the king's writ, or attempting to enact any canons, constitutions, or ordinances, without the royal assent and license.* The king, too, as head of the church, was admitted to have, or at least had, ever since the Reformation, exercised the power of proroguing, or adjourning, and dissolving the convocation, as well as of summoning it; so that the entire regulation of its proceedings was really in the hands of the crown, especially since the clergy had given up the right of taxing themselves, which they had done ever since the year 1665.† All this considered, the prudence of reviving the parliament of priests at the present crisis might have been reasonably doubted. In compliance with the address of the Lords and Commons, however, the king's writ was issued for a convocation to meet during the next session of parliament. This announcement immediately set in action all the latent discontent with the course affairs were taking which was so generally diffused among the clergy, and inflamed to fury the various passions to which the late change had given birth. Burnet asserts, and probably with truth, that the Jacobites, or friends of the deposed king, took advantage of the occasion to fill men's minds with all sorts of false rumours and unfounded fears. "It was said," he writes, "the church was to be pulled down, and presbytery was to be set up; that all this now in debate was only intended to divide and distract the church, and to render it by that means both weaker and more ridiculous, while it went off from its former grounds in offering such concessions. The universities took fire upon this, and began to declare against it, and against all that promoted it, as men that intended to undermine the church; severe reflexions were cast on the king, as being in an interest contrary to the church,—for the church was the word given out by the Jacobite party, under which they thought they might more

* Stat. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19.

† "It was first settled by a verbal agreement between Archbishop Sheldon and the lord chancellor Clarendon, and tacitly given into by the clergy in general, as a great ease to them in taxation. The first public act of any kind relating to it was an act of parliament in 1665, by which the clergy were, in company with the laity, charged with the tax given in that act, and were discharged from the payment of the subsidies they had granted before in convocation; but in this act of parliament of 1665 there is an express saving of the right of the clergy to tax themselves in convocation if they think fit; but that has never been done since, nor attempted as I know of, and the clergy have been constantly from that time charged with the laity in all public aids to the crown by the House of Commons."—Note by Mr. Speaker Oaston on Burnet, O.T. ii. 281. Oaston adds, that in consequence of this, but from what period he cannot say, the clergy have assumed and been allowed to exercise the privilege of voting for members of parliament in virtue of their ecclesiastical freeholds,—a privilege which several acts of parliament have acknowledged to be a right, although it certainly began without any particular law. Gileson, Bishop of London, told Oaston that he conceived this to be the greatest alteration in the constitution ever made without an express law; and if his lordship meant to refer to the abandonment of the right of self-taxation by the clergy, as well as to their acquisition of the right of voting at elections, which they got as a compensation for the other, he was perhaps right. The House of Commons itself, which the crown enjoys the same right of convening, proroguing, and dissolving, might now have been reduced to as more a formal nominality as the convocation, if it had ever relinquished its hold of the strings of the public purse.

safely shelter themselves. Great canvassings were everywhere in the elections of convocation-men, a thing not known in former times. So that it was soon very visible that we were not in a temper cool or calm enough to encourage the further prosecuting such a design.* In the mean time, however, with the view of getting in readiness the propositions to be laid before the convocation, royal letters had been directed to ten bishops and twenty dignified clergymen, commissioning them to meet and prepare such alterations of the liturgy and canons, and such plans for the reformation of the ecclesiastical courts, as might in their judgments be best suited to the exigencies of the time and to the correction of existing deficiencies and abuses. Great care, according to Burnet, was taken to name the commissioners so impartially that no exceptions could lie against any of them. Among them were all the bishops except the six under suspension, and Barlowe of Lincoln, Beaw of Llandaff, Watson of St. David's, Crew of Durham, Croft of Hereford, Wood of Lichfield and Coventry, and Hall of Oxford, all of whom were either old and in infirm health, or notoriously disaffected although they had taken the oaths to the present government—some objectionable on both these grounds.† The list also comprised Stillingfleet, Patrick, Tillotson, Sharp, Kidder, Hall, Tenison, Fowler, and Grove, all of whom were raised to the bench within the next two years. The commissioners had many meetings in the Jerusalem Chamber, and occupied themselves with the business intrusted to them very diligently for some weeks. "They had before them," Burnet tells us, "all the exceptions that either the Puritans before the war, or the Nonconformists since the Restoration, had made to any part of the church service: they had also many propositions and advices that had been offered, at several times, by many of our bishops and divines upon those heads: matters were well considered and freely and calmly debated: and all was digested into an entire correction of everything that seemed liable to any just objection."‡ He adds, however, that they had some very rigid as well as very learned men among them, though the most rigid either never came to their meetings or very soon withdrew, declaring themselves dissatisfied with all that was doing, and some openly avowing that they were against all alterations whatsoever. They thought too much had been already done for the dissenters by the Toleration Act, and would do nothing still farther to level the old distinctions between the church and her enemies. At the head of these very rigid men is said to have been Dr. William Jane, Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford; the others were Mew, Bishop of Winchester; Sprat, Bishop of Rochester; Dr. Henry Aldridge, Dean of Christ Church, Oxford; Dr. Joseph Beaumont, Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge; Dr. John Mountague, Master of Trinity College in that University; Dr. John Goodman, Archdeacon of Middlesex; Dr. William Beveridge, Archdeacon of Colchester; and Dr. Charles Alston, Archdeacon of Essex. Jane, Aldridge, Mew, and Sprat withdrew after the first meeting, under pretence of being afraid of incurring a premonition by acting under the royal letters, which they contended erected a court equally illegal with the court of ecclesiastical commission revived by the late king, of which, by the by, Sprat himself had been a member. The rest, however, proceeded with their work, and, if we may trust to the account given by a learned dissenting divine, who had, he tells us, obtained a copy of the alterations drawn up by them, "very unanimously, and without any heats."§ They agreed, it seems, among other things, that the chanting in cathedrals should be laid aside—that the Apocryphal lessons, and those from the Old Testament "which are too natural," should be thrown out,—that the legendary saints' days should be omitted in the calendar,—that the use of the cross in baptism should be recommended in a new rubric, but not made imperative,—that to those who wished it the communion should be administered without kneeling,—that the word remission should be removed from the form of absolution, "as not very intelligible,"—that for all titles and epithets applied to the king or queen in the public prayers should be substituted simply the word sovereign,—that a few obsolete or otherwise objectionable terms in the other prayers should be changed,—that the use of the surplice in each particular case should be left to be regulated by the discretion of the bishop, having a regard to the desire of the people,—that those who preferred having their children baptised without godfathers and godmothers should be allowed to present them in their own names,—and that, as to the Athanasian Creed, "lest the wholly rejecting it should, by unreasonable persons, be imputed to them as Socinianism," a rubric should be made setting forth that the curses therein denounced were not to be held as applying to each particular article, but were intended only against such as denied the substance of the Christian religion in general.†

* Dr. Edmund Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's History of his Own Time.

† The account given by an eminent clergyman of the establishment, Dr. William Nichols, in his Defence of the Church of England, somewhat varies from that of Dr. Calamy, and contains also some additional particulars. Dr. Nichols asserts that it was left to the minister to use the Athanasian Creed, or to change it for the Apostles', as he chose. "New Collects," he adds, "were drawn up, more agreeable to the Epistles and Gospels, for the whole course of the year; and these were composed with that elegance and propriety of expression, and such a flame of devotion, that nothing could more affect the hearts of the hearers and elevate their minds toward God. They were first drawn up by Dr. Patrick, who was reckoned to have great skill in liturgical composition. Bishop Burnet added to them yet farther force and spirit. Dr. Stillingfleet afterwards examined them with great judgment, carefully weighing every word in them; and Dr. Tillotson had the last hand, giving them some free and masterly strokes of his easy and flowing eloquence. Dr. Kidder, who was well versed in the Oriental tongues, made a new version of

* Own Time, ii. 33.

† The sees of Chichester, Worcester, and Bristol were vacant when the commission was issued.

‡ In an account of the proceedings of the commissioners which he gives in a Triennial Visitation Charge delivered and published in 1704, Burnet says that they had the use of a great collection of the books and papers in which the dissenters had at different times set forth their demands, and of the propositions that had been made for the purpose of satisfying them, which belonged to the most learned Bishop of Worcester (Stillingfleet).

Calamy gives it as his opinion that such alterations as these, with a qualified allowance of ordination by Presbyters, would in all probability have brought over two-thirds of the English dissenters to the established church.

But the labours of the commissioners were never so much as laid before the convocation. That body met on the 21st of November, when the Lower House immediately showed the temper in which it was, by the election of "the rigid" Dr. Jane as its prolocutor or president, and the rejection, by a great majority, of Dr. Tillotson, the person proposed by the moderate party for that office.* It is said that this vote was procured principally by the management of the two brothers, the Earls of Clarendon and Rochester, with a view to embarrass the government. When Jane was presented to Compton, Bishop of London, who in the absence of the primate sat as prolocutor of the Upper House, he delivered, as was customary, a long Latin speech, in which he extolled the Church of England, not only as standing above all other Christian communities, but as absolutely perfect, and requiring no amendment in anything; concluding, in triumphant defiance, with the celebrated expression of the unanimous barons in the time of the third Henry—Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari—We will not that the laws of England be changed. Compton, to whom Jane had formerly been chaplain,† replied with good temper, telling the inferior clergy that they ought to preserve a moderation in such things as were not essential in religion, thereby opening a door of salvation to a multitude of straying Christians; and observing that it could not but be their duty to show the same indulgence and charity to the dissenters under King William which some of the bishops had promised in their addresses to King James. This mildness, however, had no effect. At their next meeting Compton, perceiving that there was certain to be a majority against the wishes of the court, prorogued the convocation till the 4th of December, on the pretence that the royal commission, empowering them to proceed to business, had been found to be defective from not having the great seal, which it was therefore necessary to procure before anything more could be done. In the interval great exertions were made to bring over some of the stiffest of the leaders and their partisans in the Lower House, but with very little effect. When both Houses were met again in Henry the Seventh's Chapel on the appointed day, the Earl of Nottingham presented the commission properly sealed, and also a written message from his majesty, in which he declared that he had summoned the convocation not only because it was usual to do so upon the holding of a parliament, but out of a pious zeal to do everything that might tend to the best establishment of the church of England, which was so eminent a part of the Reformation, and therefore most signally deserved, and should always have, his favour and protection. His majesty, therefore, the message proceeded, did not doubt but that they would assist him in promoting the welfare of the church, so that no prejudices with which some men might have laboured to possess them should be suffered to disappoint his good intentions, or deprive the church of any benefit from their consultations. In answer to this message the bishops forming the Higher House readily and unanimously agreed upon an address, thanking his majesty for the grace and goodness he had expressed, and the zeal he had shown for the Protestant religion in general, and the church of England in particular. "We look upon these marks of your majesty's care and favour," said the address, "as the continuance of the great deliverance Almighty God wrought for us by your means, in making you the blessed instrument of preserving us from falling under the cruelty of Popish tyranny." The Lower House at first stood up for the privilege of presenting a separate address of their own; and then, when they found they could not maintain that pretension, they fell to making amendments upon that drawn up by the bishops, their objections being especially directed to what was therein said about the Protestant religion in general, which they seemed to think tended to degrade the Church of England by classing it with the other churches calling themselves Protestant. A conference and various messages between the two Houses ensued; and at last this part of the address was modified so as to contain merely an acknowledgment of his majesty's zeal for the welfare of the Church of England; "whereby we doubt not," it was added, "the interest of the Protestant religion in all other Protestant churches, which is dear to us, will be the better secured." Burnet asserts that the Lower House "expressed a resolution not to enter into any debates with relation to alterations; so that they would take no notice of the second part of the king's message;" but, in fact, it was only in the address ultimately agreed upon by both Houses that that part of the message was expressly noticed. The address, which was presented on the 12th, assured King William that, in pursuance of the trust and confidence he had reposed in them, they would consider whatever should be offered to them from his majesty without prejudice and with all calmness and impartiality. His majesty returned a gracious answer, expressing all satisfaction with the ad-

the Psalms more agreeable to the original. Dr. Tonson made a collection of the words and expressions throughout the Liturgy which had been excepted to, and proposed others in their room that were clear and plain, and less liable to objection. The use or omission of the cross in baptism, according to Nichols, was left to be determined by the convocation; as was also a proposition "that a non-conformist minister going over to the church should not be ordained according to the common form, but conditionally, much in the same manner as the baptizing of infants is ordered in the church, if there be not evidence of their being baptized before, with the addition of the episcopal benediction, as was customary in the ancient church when clerks were received who had been ordained by heretics."

* The Lower House of Convocation consists of all deans and archdeacons, one representative for every chapter, styled a proctor, and two proctors for the clergy of each diocese; making altogether 166 members.

† It is said that Jane, having been sent to the Prince of Orange by his university to make him an offer of their plate, conceived that he ought to have been rewarded with the bishopric of Exeter; and, upon that pretence being given to Trilaway, became a professed enemy to King William and the Revolution.

dress; but still it was evident that there was no chance of the Lower House being brought to another disposition. "There was at this time," says Burnet, "but a small number of bishops in the Upper House of convocation; and they had not their metropolitan with them, so they had not strength nor authority to set things forward. Therefore they advised the king to suffer the session to be discontinued." The convocation was accordingly again prorogued to the 24th of January, 1690, and on the 6th of February was, along with the parliament, dissolved; nor was it suffered to meet again for the transaction of business during the present reign. As Burnet phrases it, "they were kept from doing mischief" by a series of prorogations for a course of ten years.

And thus ended the project of a comprehension, or, in other words, of a remodelling of the established church, as entertained at the Revolution, being the last attempt of the kind that has been made. No concession for the purpose of satisfying the dissenters, no change of any kind in liturgy or canons, in doctrine or discipline, was wrung from the church at this crisis. Burnet was originally a zealous advocate for the proposed alterations; but he lived to feel and to acknowledge that it was fortunate the scheme had not succeeded. "There was," he remarks in his History, "a very happy direction of the providence of God observed in this matter. The Jacobite clergy who were then under suspension were designing to make a schism in the church, whenever they should be turned out and their places should be filled up by others. They saw it would not be easy to make a separation upon a private and personal account; they therefore wished to be furnished with more specious pretences; and, if we had made alterations in the Rubric and other parts of the Common Prayer, they would have pretended that they still stuck to the ancient Church of England, in opposition to those who were altering it and setting up new models. And, as I do firmly believe that there is a wise providence that watches upon human affairs, and directs them, chiefly those that relate to religion, so I have with great pleasure observed this in many instances relating to the Revolution; and upon this occasion I could not but see that the Jacobites among us, who wished and hoped that we should have made those alterations, which they reckoned would have been of great advantage for serving their ends, were the instruments of raising such a clamour against them as prevented their being made; for, by all the judgments we could afterwards make, if we had carried a majority in the convocation for alterations, they would have done us more hurt than good."

What perhaps more than anything else operated to excite among the English clergy, and throughout the nation, a distrust of William's attachment to the established church, was the course which he found it necessary to allow ecclesiastical affairs to take in Scotland. In that kingdom the Revolution of 1688 threw the church to the ground at the first shock. The bishops had indeed precipitated themselves upon the advancing tide of change, before it came up to them, with a most singularly unseasonable expression of their loyalty and devotion to the doomed system that was just about to break up and come tumbling down upon their heads. On the 3rd of November, only two days before the landing of the Prince of Orange, and after all public demonstrations of attachment to James had ceased in England, they drew up and sent off to London an address, in which—after telling him that they prostrated themselves in devout adoration to God for his goodness in having stilled the madness of unreasonable men, and peaceably seated his majesty, as the darling of heaven, upon the throne of his royal ancestors,—“whose long, illustrious, and unparalleled line,” said the right reverend adulators, “is the greatest glory of this your ancient kingdom”—they went on to express the amazement with which they had heard of the apprehended invasion from Holland, and concluded by stating their confidence that the same God who had already so often preserved and delivered his majesty would do so again now, by giving him the hearts of his subjects and the necks of his enemies. But in these sentiments the poor bishops stood almost alone in the midst of the people over whom they had been set up as lights and guides; at least the wishes and hopes of the vast majority of the nation set strongly in the opposite direction. Upon the last day of this month, while all things were still in suspense, the general feeling against the established church was, quietly enough, but only therefore the more emphatically, indicated, by the public burning at Glasgow of the effigies of the pope and the two Scottish archbishops. The Earl of Loudon and other students of the university were the directors of the ceremony; and it was performed without opposition from either the inhabitants or the authorities.* A few weeks later, when the game was more evidently up with the old government, the same spirit expressed itself in a more determined fashion. The last act of the Scottish privy council was the issuing of a proclamation, on the 24th of December, calling upon all his majesty's Protestant subjects to put themselves in their best posture of defence for the protection of the Protestant religion, and of their own lives, liberties, and properties, and appointing commanders, and times and places of rendezvous for the heritors of each shire, “armed and provided according to their conditions and qualities.” By this time the government, although several of its chief members were Catholics, had deemed it prudent to profess a most edifying dread and horror of popery; indeed, so early as the 4th of the present month they had issued a proclamation ordering the houses of Papists to be searched, and all arms and ammunition that should be found therein to be seized. But all this had no effect in allaying the popular fury against Episcopacy, which indeed (and no wonder, considering the atrocities of the last two reigns) had become as hateful to the mass of the nation as Popery itself. The last proclamation of the government was not yet dispersed when, not the heritors (or landed proprietors having above a certain rental), but the general population of several of the southern counties, were up in arms, to the number of six thousand men. They had collected at first on a rumour of an invasion of Papists from Ireland, whom they proceeded to face in a united body; but when this imaginary foreign enemy could nowhere be discovered they were not long in finding other employment that suited them quite as well. It was Christmas Day, and, dividing themselves into many small parties, they proceeded to the different parish churches, and, seizing the officiating ministers in their pulpits or at the altar, carried them in triumphant procession through their parishes, and then, stripping them of their canonical attire, drove them forth with derision and violence if they attempted a vain resistance, or permitted them to depart in peace on their solemn promise never to return. It is asserted that two hundred clergymen were thus summarily ejected in this part of the country; and that within a few weeks the same sweeping process had been extended over all the rest of Scotland.* In this way the people themselves had in fact abolished Episcopacy before either the legislature had pronounced any decision on the question or King William had even mounted the throne. After James had fled from London the leaders of both the Episcopalians and the Presbyterians hastened to the English capital to endeavour to secure the support of the new sovereign. The Dean of Glasgow was sent up by the Episcopal party, and directed by them to apply to Burnet, who introduced him to the Prince of Orange. To the dean's request to know what were his intentions with regard to him and his friends his highness "answered, he would do all he could to preserve them, granting a full toleration to the Presbyterians; but this was in case they concurred in the new settlement of the kingdom, for if they opposed that, and if, by a great majority in parliament, resolutions should be taken against them, the king could not make a war for them; but yet he would do all that was in his power to maintain such of them as should live peaceably in their functions." "This," adds Burnet, "he ordered me likewise to write back, in answer to what some bishops and others had writ to me upon that subject. But the Earl of Dundee, when he went down, possessed them with such an opinion of another speedy revolution that would be brought about in favour of King James, that they resolved to adhere firmly to his interests. So, they declaring in a body with so much zeal in opposition to the new settlement, it was not possible for the king to preserve that government there, all those who expressed their zeal for him being equally zealous against that order." In truth, the course thus taken by the Episcopal party made the case an extremely simple one: they made their contest with the Presbyterians a contest on the principle of the Revolution itself; and, if the Revolution succeeded, it was clear that they and their church must go to the wall. In the public proceedings that took place at London the question between the two parties was apparently kept in abeyance; but in reality an important advantage was gained for the Presbyterians, which is attributed to the artful management of Sir John Dalrymple, the president of the meeting of Scotch noblemen and gentlemen in the Council Chamber at Whitehall on the 9th of January, at which was drawn up and agreed upon the address, or advice, to the Prince of Orange, requesting him to take upon himself the administration of affairs in Scotland, and to call a convention or general meeting of the states of that kingdom, to be holden on the 14th of March following. As William, in the short speech which he addressed to them when he first called them into his presence two days before, had simply desired their advice as to what ought to be done for securing the Protestant religion and restoring the national laws and liberties, so the answer drawn up by Dalrymple, running in corresponding terms, proposed that the elections for the convention should be made by the whole number of the freeholders having the requisite amount of valued rent in counties, and the burgesses in burghs; and that both the electors and the members of the convention should simply "be Protestants, without any other exception or limitation whatsoever." By the adoption of this rule, the effect of the test which had been enacted in 1681, excluding from public employment all who would not recognise the royal supremacy and disavow the national covenant, was done away with, and the whole force of the popular sentiment, all but universally Presbyterian as that was, was admitted into the convention. Still the opposite party hoped to have a majority of the nobility, as well as all the bishops, on their side; and as, in the Scottish parliament, the peers and commons sat in the same house and voted together, the course the convention would take remained somewhat doubtful up to the day of its assembling. The Bishop of Edinburgh, who officiated at the opening of the convention, boldly prayed for the safety and restoration of King James; but the first vote, by which the Duke of Hamilton, put forward by the presbyterians, was elected president, by a majority of fifteen,^o over the Marquess of Atholl, the nominee of the other party, was conclusive as to what would follow. When the house proceeded to appoint a committee for deciding disputed elections, a demand made by the bishops to exercise their customary right of naming their proportion of the committee by their own vote as a separate estate, instead of being mixed up with and swamped by the temporal peers, was disregarded without a vote. In the circumstances in which they found themselves, the Episcopal party, on pretence that they were in personal danger from the populace of Edinburgh, and especially that a plot had been laid to assassinate their two leaders, Viscount Dundee and Sir George Mackenzie, now proposed to withdraw, and hold a separate convention at Stirling. But this design was not carried into effect; and after a few days they abandoned their legislative functions altogether, and left the Presbyterians to themselves, who now, secured from annoyance by the presence of a military force sent down by William, as well as supported and urged on by the national voice, proceeded to take their measures with as much unanimity as decision. In the answer, however, which they returned to a letter from King William on the 23rd of March, they only went the length of expressing their hope that they should "shortly, by the blessing of God, fall upon such resolutions as might be acceptable to his majesty, secure the Protestant religion, and establish the government, laws, and liberties of the kingdom upon solid foundations, most agreeable to the general good and inclinations of the people."* Though somewhat cautiously expressed, however, this was sufficiently significant, and was no doubt perfectly well understood on all hands. On the 26th, when a committee was appointed for settling the government, the members were named in equal proportions from the nobility, the knights, and the burgesses, but the bishops were altogether left out. In the act brought in by this committee for settling the crown upon King William and Queen Mary, forming the Scottish Declaration of Rights, it was averred, among other things, "that prelacy, and the superiority of any office in the church above presbyters, is and hath been a great and insupportable grievance and trouble to this nation, and contrary to the inclinations of the generality of the people, ever since the Reformation (they having reformed from Popery by presbyters); and therefore ought to be abolished."

This Act was passed on the 11th of April. On the 11th of May, when the crown was accordingly solemnly offered to and accepted by their majesties in the Banqueting House at Whitehall, and the coronation oath was administered to them by the Earl of Argyll, the chief commissioner from the convention, who read the words slowly and distinctly, their majesties repeating them after him, William paused at a clause about the rooting out of heretics; nor does he appear to have been satisfied with the explanation by which the commissioners attempted to remove his scruples. "The commissioners," we are told, "by authority of the estates, represented to his majesty that the clause of the oath in relation to the rooting out of heretics did not import the destroying of heretics; and that by the law of Scotland no man was to be persecuted for his private opinion; and even obstinate and convicted heretics were only to be denounced rebels, and outlawed, whereby their moveable goods are confiscated. Hence his majesty, at the repeating that clause in the oath, did declare that he did not mean by these words that he was under any obligation to become a persecutor. To which the commissioners made answer, that neither the meaning of the oath nor the law of Scotland did import it. Then the king replied that he took the oath in that sense, and called the commissioners and others there present to be witnesses of his so doing."* It is evident that William did not quite agree with the commissioners in their notion that there was no persecution in merely visiting heretics with the pains of outlawry and rebellion.

The convention having been turned into a parliament by an Act to which the royal assent was given on the 5th of June, his majesty continued the presidency of the assembly in the Duke of Hamilton, as his commissioner. But now the members, though all calling themselves presbyterians, began to split into parties, and to quarrel both among themselves and with the king they had just set up. The retirement of the bishops and the other friends of episcopacy, instead of producing concord and unanimity, seemed to have only removed a pressure that tended to restrain the sectarian and divergent propensities of their adversaries and to keep them a compact and harmoniously acting body. They were now divided and arrayed into hostile knots and cabals, by diverse personal animosities and rivalries, as well as by opposition of principles. A contest for the office of secretary of state, which was in fact that of prime minister, between Sir James Montgomery and the Lord Melville, had been, previous to the meeting of the parliament, decided in favour of the latter, chiefly through the influence of the episcopalians, who dreaded the rigorous temper of Montgomery, and looked upon Melville, though a presbyterian, "as an easy man, who would have credit enough to restrain the fury of that party." But his appointment "proved," continues Burnet, "a very unhappy step; for, as he was by his principles bigoted to presbytery, and ready to sacrifice everything to their humours, so he proved to be in all respects a narrow-hearted man, who minded his own interest more than either that of the king or of his country." Melville, having thus obtained the premiership, had of course the nomination of the rest of the ministry; and he selected a set of persons whom Burnet characterises generally as "weak and

* King James had also sent a letter by an Englishman of the name of Crane, who was said to be a servant of his queen; it was delivered to the convention on the 16th, when Hamilton, the president, immediately announced that the Lord Leven had arrived express with another letter from King William. It was voted, after some debate, that King William's letter should be first read; but afterwards that from King James was also read. It promised pardon to all such as should return to their duty before the last day of March, and threatened that his majesty would punish, with the utmost rigour of his laws, all such as should stand out in rebellion against him or his authority. "This menacing letter," says Kennet, "was the more ungrateful, it being countersigned by the Earl of Melfort, a person odious to all the Presbyterians of Scotland, who made up the major part of the convention. So that, instead of serving the interest of King James, it rather provoked that assembly to be the more unanimous and forward in settling the government after the example of England. The messenger that brought the said letter was first secured, and then, as if he had thought worth detaining, he was dismissed with a pass instead of an answer."—Complete History, iii. 436.

passionate men." From this and other causes the parliament opened in much ill humour. Upon the great question of religion, the king, by Melville's advice, had sent down instructions to Hamilton to agree to establish that form of ecclesiastical government most agreeable to the people; but when they came to take up this subject, the ultra-presbyterian majority, feeling their strength and the advantages of their position, demanded not only the abolition of Episcopacy and the establishment of presbytery, but also the repeal both of the royal supremacy and of the law of patronage. "And they asked," says Burnet, "so high an authority to their government, that Duke Hamilton, though of himself indifferent as to those matters, yet would not agree to them. He thought these broke in too much on their temporal concerns, and would establish a tyranny in presbytery that could not be easily borne. He writ to me very fully on that head, and I took the liberty to speak sometimes to the king on those subjects, my design being chiefly to shelter the Episcopal clergy, and to keep the change that was now to be made on such a foot that a door might still be kept open. But Lord Melville had possessed the king with a notion that it was necessary for his service that the presbyterians should know that I did not at all meddle in those matters, otherwise they would take up a jealousy of everything that was done; and that this might make them carry their demands much further. So I was shut out from all meddling in those matters; and yet I was then, and still continue to be, much loaded with this prejudice, that I did not study to hinder those changes that were then made in Scotland. And all the king's enemies in England continued still to charge him for the alterations then made in Scotland; though it was not possible, had he been ever so zealous for episcopacy, to have preserved it at that time; and I could do no more than I did, both for the order itself and for all those who adhered to it there."*

Nothing, indeed, it is clear, that the king could do, could possibly have preserved the Episcopal church as the national establishment in Scotland, unless he had taken the settlement of the question out of the hands of the parliament altogether, and, as was done by Charles II., attempted to maintain the authority of the bishops, against the fierce, determined hostility of the whole people, by the mere power of the sword. He failed even in the endeavours he made to resist the most extreme demands of the now all-powerful zealots of presbytery. At least, if they gave way to him in one or two mere points of phraseology, they yielded nothing that was essential either to persuasion or to force. On the 22nd of July they at length passed an act utterly abolishing prelacy, as a form of church government which was, and had been ever since the Reformation, a great and insupportable grievance to the nation, and contrary to the inclinations of the generality of the people. Burnet says that these words were used, because "the king would not consent to a plain and simple condemnation of it." For the present also, it was only declared in general terms, that in lieu of Episcopacy their majesties, with the advice and consent of the estates of this parliament, would settle by law that church government in the kingdom which was most agreeable to the inclinations of the people. And this was all that was done in the matter during the present session.

But when the parliament reassembled in April of the following year (1690), with Melville himself as lord high commissioner, the work was resumed and carried through in a style sufficiently direct and high-handed. On the 25th of April an act was passed ordaining that all the presbyterian ministers yet alive who had been thrust from their charges since the 1st of January, 1661, or banished for not conforming to prelacy and not complying with the courses of the time, should forthwith have free access to their churches, that they might presently exercise the ministry in their parishes without any new call thereto; "and to the effect," proceeded the act, "that these ministers may meet with no stop or hindrance in entering immediately to their charges, the present incumbents in such churches are hereby appointed, upon intimation hereof, to desist from their ministry in these parishes, and to remove themselves from the mansees (parsonages) and glebes thereunto belonging, betwixt and Whit Sunday next to come (the 15th of May), that the presbyterian ministers formerly put out, may enter peaceably thereto." By another act, passed on the 7th of June, the parliament ratified and established the Westminster Confession of Faith, as the public and avowed confession of the Scottish church; restored the government of the church by kirk-sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies; revived, renewed, and confirmed the statute of 1592, by which presbytery was originally established; rescinded, annulled, and made void all the acts passed before and since that statute in favour of episcopacy, and all other acts in so far as contrary or prejudicial to, inconsistent with, or derogatory from, the Protestant religion or presbyterian government now established; and finally declared that the government of the church should be established in the hands of, and exercised solely by, those presbyterian ministers who had been restored by the late act, and such ministers or elders only as they had admitted or received, or should hereafter admit or receive. Of these old presbyterian ministers the entire number surviving was only sixty; and this small number of persons therefore had now the filling up of all the remaining livings in the church. "Some furious men," says Burnet, "who had gone into very frantic principles, and all those who had been secretly ordained in the presbyterian way, were presently taken in. This was like to prove a fatal error at their first setting out. The old men among them, what by reason of their age or their experience of former mistakes, were disposed to more moderate counsels; but the talking in such a number of violent men put it out of their power to pursue them; so these broke out into a most extravagant way of proceeding against such of the episcopal party as had escaped the rage of the former year. Accusations were raised against them: some were charged for their doctrine, as guilty of Arminianism; others were loaded with more scandalous imputations; but these were only thrown out to defame them. And, where they looked for proof, it was in a way more becoming inquisitors than judges. So apt are all parties, in their turns of power, to fall into those very excesses of which they did formerly make such tragical complaints.* The act, after appointing the first meeting of the general assembly of the church, as thus re-established, to be held at Edinburgh on the third Thursday of October ensuing, had further declared all the churches from which the ministers had either fled or been removed, no matter how, previous to the 13th of April, 1689, or of which the incumbents had been deprived for not giving obedience to the proclamation of the estates on that day, appointing public prayers for King William and Queen Mary, to be vacant; and had authorised the presbyterian ministers exercising their ministry within any of these parishes by desire or consent of the people to continue their possession, and to enjoy the benefices and stipends for the last year and for all time coming, until the church should take further course therewith. And finally, to ensure the thoroughness of the purification, the general assembly, thus set up and thus composed, was empowered, either by itself or by such visitors as it should appoint, according to the custom and practice of presbyterian government, throughout the whole kingdom and the several parts thereof, to try and purge out all insufficient, negligent, scandalous, and erroneous ministers, by due course of ecclesiastical process and censures, and likewise to redress all other disorders in the church; and it was declared that whatsoever minister, being called before the assembly or the visitors, should either be found guilty or prove contumacious by not appearing, and should be therefore adjudged to be punished, whether by suspension or deposition, should ipso facto be suspended or deposed accordingly.

One impediment, however, still required to be removed to allow the free operation of these drastic remedies, and in order that the restored liberties of "the true kirk" might be complete. Lay patronage, abolished in 1649, had been revived after the Restoration, and was at this moment the law of the land—as, indeed, it always had been, with the exception only of the interval from 1649 to 1661; for even the act of 1592, by which presbytery first obtained a legal establishment, had bound and restricted the church, in collating to vacant benefices, to receive and admit any qualified clerk presented by his majesty or other lay patron.† The church, however, had always contended against this right of presentation in the crown and the other patrons of livings, as an oppressive grievance; and, in later times more especially, it had become more hateful than ever to all zealous presbyterians, as a badge or portion of that abhorred episcopacy, from the yoke of which the nation was now shaking itself free. The act of June 7th, 1690, accordingly, while reviving the act of 1592 in all its other provisions, expressly excepted "that part of it relating to patronages," which, it was declared, should be reserved for after consideration. We have explained in a former book what was the real nature of the system which took the place of lay patronage in 1649;* the act of parliament merely ordained, in general terms, that whosoever should, upon the suit and calling of the congregation, after due examination of his literature and conversation, be admitted by any presbytery to the exercise and function of the ministry in any parish, should thereby become entitled to the manse, glebe, and stipend, and left it to the next general assembly to determine, by some clear rule, the just and proper interests of congregations and presbyteries in providing of kirks with ministers—in other words, the shares which the congregation and the ecclesiastical court respectively were to have in the appointment; upon which the general assembly drew up a Directory, by which it was provided—first, that the congregation were to be of right entitled to hear and to make their choice from only such preachers as the presbytery should send to them; secondly, that, if they desired to hear any other, and the elders chose to make suit to the presbytery for that purpose, the presbytery should endeavour to procure them that satisfaction; thirdly, that the election should be made in the first instance by the session, and only submitted to the congregation for their approval; fourthly, that, if the majority of the congregation should dissent from the choice of the session, the matter should be submitted to the judgment of the presbytery, who should appoint a new election, unless they should find the dissent "to be grounded on causeless prejudices;" and fifthly, that, where the congregation should be "disaffected and malignant," in that case the presbytery should provide them with a minister. It is evident that under this system the appointment of ministers was in the hands of the presbyteries or church-courts much more than in those of the people; and yet this is undoubtedly the nearest approach that was ever made to the popular election of the clergy in the practice of the Scottish church. It was the system which the clergy, and probably the majority of the people also, would have been best pleased to see restored along with the rest of the old presbyterian establishment at the Revolution. One of the demands in a petition which was drawn up for presentation to the Prince of Orange soon after his landing was, "that the laical patronages be discharged, as was done in the parliament, 1649, and the people restored to their right and privilege of election, according to the warrant of God's word.* There was found to be somewhat greater difficulty, however, in arranging this matter than in effecting any of the other restorations called for by the popular voice. The revival of the practice introduced in 1649, however agreeable it might have proved to the church, and to the mass of the population, which was at the moment identified in feeling with the church, would undoubtedly have been opposed, both by the crown and by the generality of the noblemen and landed proprietors, the holders of advowsons or rights of patronage, whose influence in the parliament was of course very formidable. It appears, accordingly, that a bill for restoring the system of 1649, introduced by the Earl of Morton in concert with the presbyterian ministers, could not make its way through the House.† It is affirmed indeed that King William had specially instructed Lord Melville not to consent to any change in the law of patronage, or at least to any such change as should take the right out of the hands of the crown and the other lay-patrons. Burnet seems to think that both patronage and the royal supremacy might have been preserved if Melville had been very zealous in their defence. His lordship had assured the king that, without the settlement of presbytery, it would be impossible to carry anything, and therefore he had received full authority to agree to that; but patronage and the supremacy William declared he would not give up. "Yet," continues Burnet, "he found these so much insisted on, that he sent one to the king to Ireland for further instructions in those points: they were enlarged, but in such general words that the king did not understand that his instructions could warrant what Lord Melville did, for he gave them both up. And the king was so offended with him for it, that he lost all the credit he had with him; though the king did not think fit to disown him, or to call him to an account for going beyond his instructions."‡ The Act abolishing patronage was passed on the 19th of July. It gave the right of selecting the candidate in the first instance, which seems to have been regarded as nearly equivalent to the right of actual appointment, or at least as the most important part of that right, not, as in 1649, to the elders, but to the elders conjointly with the heritors; which term, though now used for landholders in general, then signified the landed proprietors having a certain amount of valued rent. The person thus selected by the heritors and elders was then to be proposed to the congregation, who might indeed disapprove of him, but their dissent did not necessarily involve his rejection; the matter was to be finally submitted to the presbytery, who, if they thought the reasons alleged against his settlement insufficient, might proceed to induct him into the benefice in the face of the opposition of the people. This new system then was distinguished from that of 1649 chiefly by the share in the appointment of ministers which it allowed to the superior landed proprietors, in the number of whom were of course to be found all the ancient patrons, or holders of advowsons, whose rights of presentation were now taken from them. And the act also gave these persons a direct compensation for the rights of which it deprived them; first, by conferring on the patron all the tithes of the parish to which no one else could show an heritable title; and secondly, by providing that there should be paid to him a sum of 600 marks, (about 33*l.* sterling) by the heritors, on his renouncing his right in their favour. It does not appear however that the acquisition of the right of appointing their own clergyman by the parish, in so far as such right was conferred by the new act, was made dependent upon the payment of this money, which indeed it has been doubted if the act made it compulsory upon the patron to accept. It is certain that in point of fact patronage was abolished, and popular election substituted in its stead, as soon as this law was passed; and yet it appears that in the space of more than twenty years, during which it subsisted, only four parishes in all Scotland obtained renunciations from their patrons by the payment of the 600 marks. It is somewhat difficult therefore to understand what might be the precise meaning or purpose of this provision. We are not aware that such an interpretation has ever been suggested; but perhaps the payment of the money compensation to the patron was intended to purchase the transfer of his rights only in so far as the heritors were concerned, the power of nomination in the elders, considered as representing the congregation, being held to be complete without any such payment. However, the voting of the heritors, or landholders, it must be confessed, does not appear to have been confined to the four parishes that purchased renunciations; it seems, on the contrary, to have been as general as that of the elders; and indeed the accounts we have of the practical operation of the system imply that all the heads of families were usually allowed to vote along with the heritors and elders, so loosely or liberally was the law understood and acted upon.

Meanwhile, as we have seen, a large proportion of the benefices from which episcopalian clergymen had been ejected at the Revolution were filled up, in the first instance, without the observance of any particular form of election or appointment, under the clause of the act restoring presbytery, which directed that the presbyterian ministers who had taken their places by desire or consent of the parish should continue in possession till the church should further determine. By the same act the church, considered as consisting of these presbyterian ministers, and such others as survived of those who had been deprived in 1661, was armed with absolute authority over all the other benefices in the kingdom, in so far at least as respected the ejection of the existing incumbents,

* See the paper in Wodrow, iv. 477-481. The historian is not sure that it was actually sent to the prince; but it was, he says, drawn up by ministers and gentlemen who had suffered in the preceding times of persecution, and thousands were ready to sign it.

the places of as many of whom as were thereupon turned out would of course be filled up according to the provisions of the other act abolishing patronage, shortly after passed. It is rather surprising that so rough a winnowing should have left in their livings so many of the old prelatical clergy as we are told were suffered to remain; it is said that about three hundred of them retained their churches out of a body not numbering quite a thousand in all. It will be remembered, that, where they had not run away or been driven out by violence on the first rising of the people against them, the act re-establishing presbytery only subjected them to suspension or deposition on being found insufficient, negligent, scandalous, or erroneous; if none of these charges could be made out against them, they could not be legally deprived, provided they were willing to comply with the new order of things. This large number of the former clergy that were received into the new church is sometimes quoted as a proof of the tolerance and lenity of the presbyterian ministers who were commissioned "to try and purge out" all unworthy incumbents; and sometimes regret is expressed that they gave too much way to this temper; but the dispositions in question, whether virtues or the reverse, are certainly not to be lightly attributed to the followers of Calvin and Knox. The complete extermination of the old clergy was probably deemed impracticable or inexpedient, for one thing, on account of the want there must have been at first of a sufficient number of presbyterian preachers to supply their place. But in all fairness it ought also to be admitted that the circumstance of so many of the episcopalian ministers passing unscathed through the searching inquisition that was now instituted by their enemies into their lives and qualifications, furnishes a strong presumption that they were not so generally either incompetent or unpopular as it has been usual to represent them. And it is also to be presumed, that the most conscientious and deserving among them were not in the number of the three hundred or thereby, who complied with presbyterianism in order to retain their livings.

Very various and opposite accounts are given by different authorities of the working both of the new mode of appointing ministers to parishes, and of the re-established presbyterian system generally. If we may believe Burnet, who had certainly no strong prejudices against presbyterianism, the conduct of the clergy in their church courts very soon disgusted both the king, who had been the means of restoring them to power, and even the people of Scotland themselves. The Jacobites, indeed, he tells us, did their best, to make a breach between them and his majesty, or to cool their affections for one another. In the spring of 1691, after the king's return from Ireland, many of those who had at first opposed the Revolution, and even entered into plots against the government, came up to London, and, confessing everything, took out their pardon. "They excused themselves," says Burnet, "as apprehending that they were exposed to ruin; and that they dreaded the tyranny of presbytery no less than they did popery; and they promised that if the king would so balance matters that the Lord Melville and his party should not have it in their power to ruin them and their friends, and in particular that they should not turn out the ministers of the episcopal persuasion who were yet in office, nor force presbyterians on them, they would engage in the king's interest faithfully and with zeal. They only desired that episcopal ministers might continue to serve in those places that liked them best; and that no man should be brought into trouble for his opinion as to the government of the church; and that such episcopal men as were willing to mix with the presbyterians in their judicatories should be admitted, without any severe imposition in point of opinion." All this seemed to William very fair and reasonable; and Burnet states that he himself, believing the professions that were made to be sincere, endeavoured to promote what was proposed with all his influence. But it was soon found that the object of the Jacobites was merely to separate the king from the presbyterians, who were his only real friends in Scotland, and that they were in fact intriguing and plotting for the overthrow of the government, and entering into a close correspondence with St. Germain's, at the very time when they were coming forward with these overtures of submission, and even actually taking the oaths to the new settlement. Had it not been for this conduct of the Jacobites, Burnet seems to think that the zealots of presbytery, left to themselves, would probably soon have done their own business;—that the kirk only required to be allowed rope enough to run itself over a precipice. "The truth was," he says, "the presbyterians, by their violence and other foolish practices, were rendering themselves both odious and contemptible: they had formed a general assembly in the end of the former year, in which they did very much expose themselves by the weakness and peevishness of their conduct: little learning or prudence appeared among them; poor preaching and wretched haranguing; partialities to one another, and violence and injustice to those who differed from them, showed themselves in all their meetings. And these did so much sink their reputation, that they were weaning the nation most effectually from all fondness to their government; but the falsehood of many who, under a pretence of moderating matters, were really undermining the king's government, helped in the sequel to preserve the presbyterians, as much as their own conduct did now alienate the king from them."*

Such were the opposite effects of the Revolution upon the national church in the two ends of the island;—in England consolidating and confirming the established episcopacy—in Scotland sweeping it utterly away, and in its place re-erecting the old abolished edifice of presbytery on broader and deeper foundations than ever. In both kingdoms, however, the Revolution, regarded in reference to this matter, was alike the completion of the Reformation, or at least the accomplishment of the first aim of that great movement—the attainment of the first stage to which it sought to elevate the national condition, namely, the acquisition and secure establishment of a national church in harmony with the national faith. Tried by this test, what episcopacy was to England presbytery was to Scotland—the ecclesiastical system to which the people had been attached ever since they had become Protestants, partly perhaps through some peculiarities in their character or circumstances, at any rate by the strong associations arising out of the fact that it was the system in connexion with which what they deemed the light of religious truth had been first set up among them. Both in the Bill of Right, and in the acts subsequently passed abolishing prelacy and restoring the presbyterian government, the Scottish parliament put the expediency of that proceeding on the ground of the nation, as it is expressed, “having reformed from popery by presbyters.” And to this its accordance in both countries with the general sentiment is no doubt to be attributed the continuance of the settlement of religion made at the Revolution down to our own day, without alteration in any essential respect.

The position in which the Revolution placed the generality of the Protestant Dissenters has been explained in the account given in a preceding page of the Toleration Act, which was the only measure passed in their favour—for the Corporation and Test Acts, which excluded them from public employments, were still left upon the statute-book. But even the limited relief granted by the Toleration Act was not extended to the most numerous class of nonconformists—the Roman Catholics. Nay, so far was this portion of the population from participating in the removal or relaxation of old bonds which the Revolution brought with it to all other descriptions of religionists (unless, indeed, we are to except the Socinians or Anti-trinitarians, who were excluded along with the adherents of popery from the benefits of the act of toleration) that the penal laws affecting them were actually extended, and carried to a pitch of severity and wild oppression far transcending what they had ever before reached, in the boasted era of light and liberty which succeeded the expulsion of the Stuarts. Some hot spirits, we are informed by Burnet, were for having some new and more stringent laws enacted against the papists as soon as they had got King William fairly seated on the throne; and his majesty could only restrain their zeal by frightening them with the danger of exciting another European Catholic league against this country, and giving France the advantage of making the war a quarrel of religion, in which she would have all the powers of that faith assisting her, if such a course should be followed. “This was so carefully infused into many,” says Burnet, “and so well understood by them, that the papists have enjoyed the real effects of the toleration, though they were not comprehended within the statute that enacted it.” This, however, must be understood as true only of the first few years after the Revolution, when the passage was probably written. The national craving for more and more virulent laws against popery, which had with difficulty been kept down for a time, became, before the end of the reign of William, too ardent to be repressed either by fear of Catholic leagues or any other consideration of mere state policy. Indeed, the popular bigotry was now taken advantage of by the heartless politicians of both the great parties of the day, and the persecution of the Catholics which it yearned and clamoured for became the game at which they endeavoured to out-manceuvre and turn the tables upon each other in their contention for place and power. An act was passed in the year 1699 “For the further preventing the growth of popery,” which, after a preamble complaining of the neglect of the due execution of the laws already in force, proceeded to deal with the matter in the following extraordinary fashion:—First, a reward of a hundred pounds was ordered to be paid to every person who should apprehend any popish bishop, priest, or jesuit, and prosecute him to conviction for saying mass, or exercising any other part of his office within these realms. Secondly, it was enacted that the priest so convicted should be adjudged to perpetual imprisonment. Thirdly, the keeping a school, or undertaking the education, government, or boarding of youth, by any papist, or person making profession of the popish religion, was made a crime to be visited on conviction by the same penalty. Fourthly, every person educated in the popish religion, or professing the same, who within six months after attaining the age of eighteen should not take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and also subscribe the declaration against transubstantiation, the invocation of saints, and the sacrifice of the mass,—in other words, abjure his or her religion,—was disabled and made incapable of inheriting, or taking by descent, devise, or limitation, in possession, reversion, or remainder, any lands, tenements, or hereditaments within this realm, and the next of kin being a Protestant was authorised to take possession of and enjoy what the rightful owner, in consequence of being a Roman Catholic, was thus deprived of. Fifthly, all papists, or persons professing the popish religion, were disabled and made for the future incapable of purchasing any lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, either in their own names or in those of any other persons. Sixthly, the penalty of a hundred pounds imposed by an act of James I. upon the offence of sending a child to be educated abroad in the Romish religion, was directed to be paid in whole to the informer, instead of half only to the informer and the other half to his majesty, as heretofore. And, seventhly, it was directed that if any popish parent should refuse to allow his or her Protestant child a fitting maintenance, suitable to the degree and ability of the parent, and to the age and education of the child, then upon complaint thereof made to the lord chancellor his lordship should make such order in the case as should be agreeable to the intents of the present act.*

The history of this monstrous act of parliament, as detailed by Burnet, is exceedingly curious. The bill was originally brought in by the Tory or Jacobite opposition in the House of Commons, in the hope that the court would have opposed it, and thereby drawn upon itself the odium of favouring and protecting the papists. "But the court," continues Burnet, "promoted the bill: so, when the party saw their mistake they seemed willing to let the bill fall; and when that could not be done they clogged it with many severe and some unreasonable clauses, hoping that the Lords would not pass the act; and it was said that, if the Lords should make the least alteration in it, they in the House of Commons who had set it on were resolved to let it lie on their table when it should be sent back to them. Many lords who secretly favoured papists, on the Jacobite account, did for this very reason move for several alterations, some of these importing a greater severity; but the zeal against popery was such in that House that the bill passed without any amendment, and it had the royal assent."† "And thus," as Burke has strikingly put it, "this act, loaded with the double injustice of two parties, neither of whom intended to pass what they hoped the other would be persuaded to reject, went through the legislature, contrary to the real wish of all parts of it, and of all the parties that composed it. In this manner these insolent and profligate factions, as if they were playing with balls and counters, made a sport of the fortunes and the liberties of their fellow-creatures."‡ But the act had also many sincere friends and advocates, to some of whom it even seemed not to go far enough. Among these last was Burnet himself, notwithstanding what he calls his principles of toleration, and his being, as he tells us, against all persecution for conscience sake. It is plain that what such persons wanted was nothing less than the utter extermination of the Roman Catholics, or the driving every man of them out of the country; and, indeed, Burnet confesses that this was his object. "This act," he says, "hurt no man that was in the present possession of an estate; it only incapacitated his next heir to succeed to that estate if he continued a papist; so the danger of this, in case the act should be well looked to, would put those of that religion, who are men of conscience, on the selling their estates, and in the course of a few years might deliver us from having any papists left among us." But he complains that the act wanted several necessary clauses to enforce the due execution of it: "the word next of kin was very indefinite, and the next of kin was not obliged to claim the benefit of this act, nor did the right descend to the remoter heirs if the more immediate ones should not take the benefit of it." He affirms, indeed, that the new law was not followed nor executed in any sort; but this can scarcely have been the case, except perhaps in regard to the atrocious clause depriving papists of their inheritances,—preventing the son from succeeding to the estate left by his father,—which the bishop thought so lenient and harmless a regulation because it did not take the estate from the present possessor as well as from his heir, or make a beggar of the father as well as of the son. But means were found of making even this part of the law operative in course of time.* And at any rate, when an imitation of the English act was passed three years afterwards, in the beginning of the reign of Anne, by the parliament of Ireland, such "effectual clauses" were added as, the bishop admits, were sufficient to make its full force be felt in that country. By this Irish act it was provided that estates of papists should in all cases, notwithstanding any settlements made to the contrary, be equally divided among all the children, unless the persons on whom they were settled qualified themselves by taking the oath, and receiving the sacrament according to the forms of the established church; for by this act, too, the English sacramental test was for the first time imported into Ireland—having, it is said, been tacked to the original bill by the influence of the friends of the Catholics in the English cabinet, in the hope that the measure in this shape would be opposed by the numerous and powerful body of protestant dissenters in Ireland, and so defeated. "Yet upon this occasion," says Burnet, "the Irish parliament proceeded with great caution and wisdom: they reckoned that this act, so far as it related to papists, would have a certain and great effect for their common security, and that when it was once passed it would never be repealed; whereas, if great inconveniences did arise upon this new clause, it would be an easier thing to obtain a repeal of it in a subsequent parliament, either of England or Ireland. So the act was passed, and those who thought they had managed the matter with a master-piece of cunning were outwitted by an Irish parliament."† The deviation from the English law that was made in the main provision of the Irish act was thought, it seems, both to make the latter look less invidious, and also to be "more effectual for breaking the dependence on the heads of families"—by which must be meant, better fitted to promote the diabolical object of setting the children in Catholic families at variance with their parents. It had no doubt been found that the plan of altogether wresting their estates from the children of deceased Catholics, if they did not abjure the religion of

* See instances quoted by Burke in his Speech at Bristol; and the account of the case of Roper in a note to Burnet (ii. 289), by Mr. Speaker Onslow, who remarks that, in consequence of the decision in that case, "all the papists now have their land estates in England upon a very precarious holding."

their parents, was a little too revolting to the common feelings of mankind to be easily carried into execution—and probably, too, it was thought that in Ireland the next of kin being a protestant might in most cases be a personage somewhat hard to discover.

Nor did these severe acts terminate the long course of penal or otherwise oppressive legislation, in regard to persons professing the Roman Catholic religion, which the English government had pursued from the reign of Elizabeth. In 1713 Anne's last parliament deemed it necessary to strengthen and make more effectual certain old statutes disabling popish patrons from presenting to livings in the church;* and after the suppression of the rebellion of 1715, the first parliament of George I. passed an act compelling all papists of the age of twenty-one years to register their names and estates, with the yearly rent thereof, in books to be kept by the clerk of the peace for every county. The preamble of this statute boasts of the tender regard that had been shown the papists for many years past, "by omitting to put in execution the many penal laws, which, on occasion of the many just provocations they have given, and horrid designs they have framed for the destruction of this kingdom and the extirpation of the Protestant religion, have been made against them," and asserts that they had enjoyed and did then enjoy the protection and benefit of the government, as well as the rest of his majesty's subjects. Yet, notwithstanding of this indulgent treatment, they had all, "or the greatest part of them," it is affirmed, been "concerned in stirring up and supporting the late unnatural rebellion;" among the objects of which is enumerated, not only "the destruction of the Protestant religion," but "the cruel murdering and massacring its professors"—"by which," says the invective, "they have brought a vast expense upon this nation." And the new regulation compelling them to register their estates is specially put upon the grounds that "it manifestly appears by their behaviour that they take themselves to be obliged, by the principles they profess, to be enemies to his majesty and to the present happy establishment, and watch for all opportunities of fomenting and stirring up new rebellions and disturbances within the kingdom, and of inviting foreigners to invade it; and for as much as it is highly reasonable that they should contribute a large share to all such extraordinary expenses as are or shall be brought upon this kingdom by their treachery and instigation." It would seem from this as if some intention had been entertained of taking advantage of the registration of their estates for the purpose of a separate taxation of the Roman Catholics. Nothing of this kind, however, was actually attempted; the hard words and angry menaces of the statute of 1715 were soon forgotten: during the remainder of the present period, if the penal laws against popery were not repealed or even mitigated, they were not extended or made more severe; even the next much more serious Jacobite outbreak of 1745 came and passed away without either setting the inventive powers of parliament to work to forge new fetters for the Roman Catholic part of the population, or so much as provoking another impassioned preamble.

The legislation affecting the other descriptions of dissenters, subsequent to the Toleration Act, did not amount to much. For the most part, however, it consisted in the removal, either wholly or in part, of old disabilities and restrictions, and in affording relief from inconveniences occasioned by conscientious scruples. Generally, this relaxation of the law seems to have been proceeded with as far and as fast as the state of public feeling would allow;—in some instances, indeed, the legislature rather outran the progress of opinion in favour of the principles of religious liberty. In 1701, immediately after the accession of Anne, the same zealous parliament which two sessions before had held out a similar bribe to the children of Catholics to desert the religion of their parents, passed an act authorising the lord chancellor to make such order as he should think fit against any Jew who should refuse to allow his protestant child a fitting maintenance, suitable to his own degree and quality, and to the age and education of the child. This law, we believe, still remains unrepealed.* We have noticed in the preceding chapter the act passed in 1753, for permitting persons professing the Jewish religion to be naturalised without taking the sacrament;† and its repeal within a few months in obedience to the popular clamour, or, as it was expressed, because occasion had "been taken from the said act to raise discontents and to disquiet the minds of many of his majesty's subjects."‡ And, it might have been added, to put in jeopardy the seats of many honourable members; for the parliament was now in its last session, and the prospect of a general election no doubt sharpened the vision of the legislature to the inconveniences even of a good law which chanced to be for the moment unpopular. But in truth this was a very insignificant measure after all, in comparison with another enactment relating to the same subject which had passed very quietly more than a dozen years before, and which during all that while nobody had attempted to disturb. The act of 1753 was not a general Jew naturalisation act; it only provided that any individual Jew might be naturalised, upon application to parliament, without taking the sacrament. In each case a special naturalisation act was still necessary, as before. And even with this relaxation the naturalisation of a Jew was to remain clogged with various limitations: the bill was always to contain a clause, in conformity with an act passed immediately after the accession of George I., declaring that the party should not thereby be enabled to be of the privy council or a member of either House of parliament, or to take any office or place of trust, civil or military, or to have any grant of lands, tenements, or hereditaments from the crown to himself, or any other person in trust for him;* no Jew was to be naturalised under this act who had not resided in Great Britain or Ireland for three years, without being absent more than three months at any one time, or who could not prove that he had professed the Jewish religion for three years before his naturalisation; and by another clause all Jews whatsoever were disabled from purchasing or inheriting any advowson or right of patronage in the church. But the chief misapprehension and delusion was that entertained as to the general object and effect of the act: it had no reference whatever (except in the restrictive clause just mentioned) to persons of the Jewish religion born in the country—such Jews were British subjects already, and required no naturalisation; it merely enabled foreign Jews to obtain bills of naturalisation without complying with an old act of the time of James I., which directed that all foreigners who should be naturalised should first receive the sacrament as well as take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy.† Now, in 1740 an act had been passed, which in a certain sense might be styled a general act for the naturalisation of the Jews, for it provided that, without either taking the sacrament or repeating the words upon the true faith of a Christian in the oath of abjuration, all foreign-born Jews who should have lived seven years in any of his majesty's colonies in America, without having been absent for more than two months at any one time during the period, should “be deemed, adjudged, and taken to be his majesty's natural-born subjects of this kingdom, to all intents, constructions, and purposes, as if they and every of them, had been or were born within this kingdom.”‡ By the same act, which granted naturalisation upon the same conditions of residence in one of the American colonies to all other foreigners as well as Jews, Quakers also were exempted from taking the sacrament in order to obtain that benefit: and they had already by various acts been allowed to substitute declarations and affirmations for the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and generally for all oaths in civil causes.§ Some years after this (in 1749) for removing certain doubts and scruples that had arisen, it was enacted that in all cases whatsoever in which by any act of parliament an oath then was, or ever should be, allowed, authorised, directed, or required, the solemn affirmation or declaration of any of the people called Quakers should be allowed or taken instead of such oath; provided, nevertheless, that no Quaker should “be qualified or permitted to give evidence in any criminal cases, or to serve on juries, or to bear any office or place of profit in the government.”||

As for the general body of protestant dissenters or non-conformists, the most important legislative measure affecting them, next to the Toleration Act, which the present period produced, was the Annual Indemnity Act, which was first passed in 1728, upon the accession of George II., and was repeated, we believe, every year from that date till the total repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts a century after. By the Indemnity Act persons appointed to offices and promotions for which they had omitted to qualify themselves by taking the sacrament within the time limited by the Test and Corporation Acts were allowed such an extension of the time for doing so as brought them within the protection of the next similar measure of relief; so that the mode of qualifications in question might be said to be in this way practically abolished for all who chose to escape from it, and only the stigma of a nominal exclusion from public employments remained in the case of the generality of the Protestant dissenters.

To this period belong the act against occasional conformity, passed in 1711, and that for preventing the growth of schism, passed in 1714; but, as both of these statutes, in all their material enactments, were repealed in 1718, it is unnecessary to add anything here to the account that has already been given of them in the preceding chapter.*

The history of the two established churches, subsequently to their settlement at the Revolution, also presents a few incidents which require to be shortly noticed.

As long as Queen Mary lived, William left the management of the affairs of the English church wholly in her hands. “He found,” says Burnet, “he could not resist importunities, which were not only vexatious to him, but had drawn preferences from him which he came soon to see were ill bestowed: so he devolved that care upon the queen, which she managed with strict and religious prudence: she declared openly against the preferring of those who put in for themselves, and took care to inform herself particularly of the merits of such of the clergy as were not so much as known at court, nor using any methods to get themselves recommended: so that we had reason to hope, that, if this course should be long continued, it would produce a great change in the church and in the temper of the clergy.” Her majesty's chief confidant and counsellor was Archbishop Tillotson, whose tolerant temper, however, and liberal principles did not tend to procure him much favour or influence among the clergy over whom he had been placed. “They complained,” continues Burnet, “of everything that was done, if it was not in their own way; and the archbishop bore the blame of all. . . . He grew very uneasy in his great post: we were all soon convinced that there was a sort of clergymen among us that would never be satisfied as long as the toleration was continued; and they seemed resolved to give it out that the church was in danger, till a prosecution of dissenters should be again set on foot; nor could they look at a man with patience, or speak of him with temper, who did not agree with them in these things.*" In the end of the year 1694, first the archbishop and then the queen were suddenly cut off; on which the primacy was bestowed on Dr. Tenison, who presided over the church for the remainder of William's reign and for the whole of that of Queen Anne. Tenison seems to have owed both this his last and highest promotion and also his first considerable preferment in the church to his corporeal rather than his mental qualities; he had been recommended to Chancellor Nottingham by Tillotson, some years before the Revolution, to be placed in the ministry of St. Martin's, London, according to Lord Dartmouth, "as a strong-bodied man, therefore fit to take care of so large a parish;"† and now, when Tillotson died, Burnet tells us that, although Stillingfleet was admitted, from his learning and talent, to be the man best deservng the vacant post, all the Whigs "concurred to desire Tenison, who had a firmer health, with a more active temper, and was universally well liked for having served the cure of St. Martin's in the worst times with so much courage and discretion; so that at this time he had many friends and no enemies." Tenison was, however, a man of some professional learning, though of no shining talent; and his government of the church, during twenty years of considerable heat and contention, was, on the whole, moderate and judicious—evidencing a steady but, nowise hard or ungentle bridle-hand, nor anything either of the over tenacity or the over activity which might have been looked for from one so distinguished for his robust constitution and other gifts of body. For, indeed, in the national clergy he had by no means the most peaceably disposed portion of the population under his special command or superintendence. The repeal of the penal statutes against protestant non-conformity produced a pause in the old battle with the dissenters for some years after the Revolution; but the unaccustomed tranquillity outside the establishment seemed only to have driven the spirit of strife inwards, or to have left the clergy, deprived of other adversaries, no means of expending their superfluous pugnacity except by getting up a war of factions among themselves. "The toleration of all the sects among us," Burnet writes, under the year 1700, "had made us live more quietly together of late than could be expected when severe laws were rigorously executed against dissenters. No tumults or disorders had been heard in any part of the kingdom, these eleven years, since that act passed: and yet the much greater part of the clergy studied to blow up this fire again, which seemed to be now, as it were, covered over with ashes."‡ And then, proceeding more particularly to describe the division which rent the clergy of the establishment into two hostile parties, he says,

"All moderate divines were looked upon by some hot men with an ill eye, as persons who were cold and indifferent in the matters of the church: that which flowed from a gentleness, both of temper and principle, was represented as an inclination to favour dissenters, which passed among many for a more heinous thing than leaning to popery itself."* It was now, according to Burnet, that the names High Church and Low Church first began to be used; the latter appears to have been originally applied to their opponents as an epithet of disparagement by those who at the same time took the former to themselves as a title of honour. "Those men," continues Burnet, in the passage before us, "who began now to be called the High Church party had all along expressed a coldness, if not an opposition to the present settlement: soon after the Revolution some great preferments had been given among them, to try if it were possible to bring them to be hearty for the government; but, it appearing that they were soured with a leaven that had gone too deep to be wrought out, a stop was put to the courting them any more." Henceforth, as may be supposed, the hostility of the High Church party to the government, and, in as far as they durst show it, to all parts of the settlement in church and state made at the Revolution, and to the whole course of policy, domestic and foreign, that flowed from that settlement, or was entered upon and pursued with a view to maintaining it, became more decided than ever. Their opponents they affected to regard as at once usurpers of the patrimony of the church, and betrayers of her interests and her principles. In another passage, in the beginning of his account of the reign of Anne (which we have already had occasion to quote in the last chapter), Burnet explains the imputations they intended to convey by the nickname (for such it appears originally to have been) of the Low Church—"All that treated the dissenters with temper and moderation, and were for residing constantly at their cures, and for labouring diligently in them; that expressed a zeal against the Prince of Wales, and for the Revolution; that wished well to the present war, and to the alliance against France, were represented as secret favourers of presbytery, and as ill-affected to the church, and were called Low Churchmen: it was said that they were in the church only while the law and preferments were on its side; but that they were ready to give it up as soon as they saw a proper time for declaring themselves. With these false and invidious characters did the high party endeavour to load all those who could not be brought into their measures and designs."† In fact, the Low Churchmen were the Whigs, the High Churchmen the Tories of ecclesiastical politics; and the two church parties kept up the same continual warfare and struggle for supremacy as the two state parties.

volution, had been the state of suspended animation in which that body was held by being called together at the opening of every new session of parliament only to be adjourned before it could proceed to business. In their irritation and impatience some more fiery spirits had begun at last to show symptoms of a disposition to question the right of the crown thus to muzzle the church, or at least the legality of the process by which the convocation had been hitherto kept inefficient and silent,—its prorogation by the archbishop in his capacity of president of the Upper House. Several publications appeared about the year 1700 advancing such pretensions, the most remarkable of which was one by the celebrated Atterbury, afterwards Bishop of Rochester—"one Atterbury," as Burnet calls him, "who had indeed very good parts, great learning, and was an excellent preacher, and had many extraordinary things in him, but was both ambitious and virulent out of measure, and had a singular talent in asserting paradoxes with a great air of assurance, showing no shame when he was detected in them, though this was done in many instances; but he let all these pass without either confessing his errors or pretending to justify himself; he went on still venting new falsehoods in so barefaced a manner that he seemed to have outdone the Jesuits themselves."* We may gather from all this how greatly Burnet and his party felt annoyed by Atterbury's controversial powers and the unscrupulous use he made of them. One curious effect, we may remark, was produced by the new position into which the two church parties were now thrown; an effect, however, often exemplified in party warfare. Just as in the revolutions of state politics the Tories, when in opposition, have usually forgotten much of their natural love of prerogative, and the Whigs, when in power, a considerable portion of that jealousy of prerogative, which is equally the proper spirit of their principles and professions; so now, in the church, the Tories were become the questioners and deniers of that kingly authority which, in other circumstances, they had been wont to look up to as the very breath of their nostrils; and it was left to be asserted and defended by their opponents, the Low clergy, the representatives, as they might be considered, of the old puritans, who truly had never before distinguished themselves on that side of the question. Burnet perceives clearly enough that one party at least had shifted its ground: Atterbury, he observes, "attacked the supremacy of the crown with relation to ecclesiastical matters, which had been hitherto maintained by all our divines with great zeal; but now the hot men of the clergy did so readily entertain his notions, that in them it appeared that those who are the most earnest in the defence of certain points, when they seem to be for them, can very nimbly change their minds upon a change of circumstances." But the hot men, in truth, might as to this matter have retorted upon the cold men pretty much in the same style.

When King William, in the last year of his reign, threw himself into the hands of the Earl of Rochester and the Tories, one of the stipulations made by the new ministry was, that a convocation should have leave to sit. Atterbury's book was now republished, with important additions and corrections; and the controversy on the subject of it, maintained on the other side principally by Dr. Wake, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, and Dr. Kennet, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough, was recommenced and carried on with increased eagerness and violence. Meanwhile, on the 10th of February, 1701, the same day on which the parliament was opened, the two Houses of Convocation met, as usual, in St. Paul's, where they first heard service in the cathedral, and then proceeded to the Chapter House. The Lower House chose for their prolocutor Dr. Hooper, Dean of Canterbury, whom Burnet allows to have been "a man of learning and good conduct hitherto;" but, he adds, "he was reserved, crafty, and ambitious; his deanery had not softened him, for he thought he deserved to be raised higher." The representatives of the parochial clergy then proceeded to follow up their election of Hooper by some very decided steps in assertion of the novel rights they had been lately taught to claim. According to Burnet, "the things the convocation pretended to were, first, that they had a right to sit whensoever the parliament sat; so that they could not be prorogued but when the two Houses were prorogued: next they advanced that they had no need of a license to enter upon debates, and to prepare matters, though it was confessed that the practice for an hundred years was against them; but they thought the convocation lay under no farther restraint than that the parliament was under; and as they [the parliament] could pass no act without the royal assent, so they confessed that they [the convocation] could not enact or publish a canon without the king's license."* In vindication of these pretensions, when, on the 25th of February, the third day of their meeting, the schedule, or order, signed by the archbishop, proroguing both Houses in the usual form, was brought down to the Lower House, then sitting in Henry VII.'s Chapel, they continued their session in defiance of it, and, after a short debate, adjourned themselves to the same day (the 28th) named in the archbishop's prorogation, but to this, their own place of meeting, instead of to the Jerusalem Chamber, another room in Westminster Abbey, which was the regular synodical apartment in which the prorogation had, as was customary, directed that both Houses should re-assemble. On being farther prorogued, however, to the 6th of March, they consented on that day to give attendance upon the bishops in the usual place, only protesting that their so doing should not be construed into any abandonment of their rights. At this sitting the two Houses agreed in voting the usual address to the king ; and on their next day of meeting, the 20th of the same month, the Lower House occupied themselves, harmlessly enough, in drawing up a representation touching certain pernicious, dangerous, and scandalous positions contained in Toland's "Christianity Not Mysterious," which had been published four or five years before. On the 31st, however, they resumed the question of privilege, and, after having voted their right to adjourn themselves, sent up their prolocutor with a message to the archbishop and bishops, praying their lordships to grant them a Free Conference upon the subject in debate between them. This was an assumption of the forms of the House of Commons of the boldest sort ; even in parliament a Free Conference was one of the rarest of occurrences, a deviation from the ordinary course of proceeding reserved for occasions of the last degree of difficulty or urgency ; and in the practice of the convocation the thing had never, till now, been heard of. At the next meeting, on the 8th of April, an answer was returned by the bishops, in which they asserted that, so far from a Free Conference being the regular way of settling a difference between the two Houses, no instance of any kind of conference whatever desired by the Lower House was to be found in the registers : "they have, indeed," continued their lordships, "been called up ad colloquium upon occasion ; and some here present cannot but remember that they were so called up in the convocation in the year 1689, by the Bishop of London, being then president in the vacancy of the see of Canterbury ; but the consequences of it were such as do by no means encourage the doing of the like at this present time." When this answer had been read to the members of the Lower House, summoned for that purpose, with their prolocutor at their head, to the Jerusalem Chamber, the archbishop prorogued the convocation to the 8th of May. "But the prolocutor," continues the detailed account of these transactions in Kennet's History, "with several of the Lower House, returned to Henry VII.'s Chapel (though divers members refused to join with them, as well knowing the whole convocation was legally prorogued, and all things were to continue in the same state till the next synodical day), and sate there as a House for some time, and then adjourned themselves to the next day. An affectation of independence that was unknown to former convocations, and never before attempted by any presbyters in any episcopal church." The two Houses might now be considered as at open war. When they both re-assembled on the day to which the convocation had been prorogued, the Lower House, after receiving a very gentle reproof from the archbishop, seemingly without attending to it, delivered by their prolocutor a paper both justifying their own proceedings and recriminating upon the bishops for certain alleged irregularities in theirs. This put the Upper House in a downright passion. "Their lordships take notice," thus ran one passage in a long reply which was immediately drawn up, "that in this paper the lower clergy do solemnly profess that they do not in the least desire that his grace or their lordships, should depart from any of their just rights; and the archbishop and bishops cannot but wish that their actions were agreeable to this profession; but those have been quite contrary, and carried up to higher degrees of disrespect and invasion of the metropolitan and episcopal rights (even such rights as are supported by the law of the land and the king's writ), than ever was attempted by any Lower House of Convocation before this time, or perhaps by any body of presbyters where episcopacy was settled and acknowledged of divine and apostolical institution; unless it were by such presbyters as designed to destroy that institution, which the archbishop and bishops are fully persuaded the body of the Lower House do not, though the actions of a part of them manifestly tend that way." And then the paper went on to enumerate the particular instances of "the exorbitant claims and practices" of the inferior clergy, "in separate adjournments; in appointing committees of the whole House; in giving leave, as a House, to their members to be absent; in not answering the archbishop or bishops in writing when so required; in demanding a free conference; in pretending a power of making a distinct recess, and some other practices;" "which," it concluded, "together with some reports raised upon them, have given the greatest blow to this church that hath been given it since the Presbyterian Assembly that sat at Westminster in the late times of confusion. God grant that these reports, and the present conduct of divers in the Lower House, may not bring on the like again!" At the same time five bishops were appointed to inspect and report upon all the acts of both Houses of the present convocation, in concert with any of their members, not exceeding ten in number, whom the other House might name for that purpose. "But in a new and unprecedented way of contempt," continues Kennet, "the Lower House answered that they did not think fit to appoint such a committee. And when the schedule of prorogation was, as usual, brought down to the Lower House, to be intimated to them by the prolocutor, he refused to intimate the archbishop's schedule, and adjourned the House to the next day." The archbishop's prorogation was to the 16th. The Lower House seem to have continued their sittings from day to day; but, according to Burnet, "they entered into such a secrecy, that it could not be known what they sat so close upon." He tells us also, that "many of the most eminent and learned among them not only refused to sit with them on those days, but thought it was incumbent on them to protest against their proceedings." The actual protest, however, shows that the opposition was in point of numbers a very insignificant minority, consisting at the most of only fifteen individuals.* At last it appeared that they had been engaged in drawing up a sort of impeachment of Burnet himself for certain erroneous and dangerous doctrines alleged to be contained in his lately published 'Exposition of the Thirty-Nine Articles.' Burnet was very curious to know what objections could be made to his book, which he believed to be nearly immaculate;* and he earnestly begged that the dispute between the two Houses about other matters might be suspended till this should be settled; but when it was at last agreed, upon his repeated request, that the paper of complaint against him should be received, it was found to be so general, that it was sent back to be amended and drawn out in a more detailed form. This was on the 6th of June, and on the same day the archbishop prorogued the convocation to the 13th. In the mean time a committee of the Upper House, which had been appointed to consider the various questions that had arisen, agreed upon the following, among other, resolutions:—"That the Lower House of Convocation has no manner of power judicially to censure any book; that the Lower House of Convocation ought not to have entered upon the examination of a book of any bishop of this church without first acquainting the president and bishops with it; that the Lower House of Convocation's censuring the book of the Bishop of Sarum in general terms, without mentioning the particular passages on which the censure is grounded, is defamatory and scandalous." The same committee also resolved that the minority in the Lower House had "acted as became true sons of the Church of England," and deserved "the protection of the Upper House for their dutiful and worthy behaviour;" while, on the other hand, the majority, or, as they were styled, "the prolocutor and some others," had been guilty of manifest disobedience and contempt. These hard words (which appear to have been adopted by the general body of the bishops on their re-assembling) were not very likely to bring the rebellious clergy to submission; but the contest in which so many months had been spent was put a stop to at this point, for the present, by the prorogation of the convocation, on the 24th of June, by royal writ directed to the archbishop, at the same time with the parliament, whose counterpart it had been throughout the session in the general character of its proceedings. For, indeed, the Lower House of Convocation had only all this while been following, or sometimes outrunning, the Tory House of Commons, which also had signalled itself by a violent struggle about certain matters of privilege with the other House, several of whose members it had impeached without any result, both ordinary and free conferences being another by thirteen; but two of the subscribers to the former are not among those to the latter.

* "Though there have been some books writ on purpose against it, and many in sermons and other treatises have occasionally reflected with great severity upon several passages in it, yet this has been done with so little justice or reason that I am not yet convinced that there is one single period or expression that is justly remarkable on, or that can give me any occasion either to retract or so much as to explain any one part of that whole work."—Own Time, ii. 228.

had recourse to with no effect except the more to embroil the fray.* According to Burnet the inferior clergy had been all along encouraged in their conduct by Rochester and his associates in the government: these new servants of his majesty "were displeas'd," he says, "with the bishops for adhering to the old ministry; and they hoped, by the terror of a convocation, to have forced them to apply to them for shelter."† On the other hand, the bishops, he tells us, were unanimous in the stand they made against the pretensions of the Lower House, with the exception only of Compton of London, Sprat of Rochester, and Trclawny of Exeter. For the line taken by these three their right reverend brother is 'at no loss to account, rightly or wrongly. "The Bishop of London," he says, "had been twice disappointed of his hopes of being advanced to the see of Canterbury; so, for several years, he was engaged with the Tory party, and opposed the court in everything, but with little force or authority. The Bishop of Rochester had been deeply engaged in the former reigns, and he stuck firm to the party, to which, by reason of the liberties of his life, he brought no sort of honour." "These bishops," he continues, "gave no great reputation to the proceedings of the Lower House, to which they adhered. They likewise entered their dissent to the resolutions taken in the Upper House. From the fire raised thus in convocation a great heat was spread through the whole clergy of the kingdom: it alienated them from their bishops, and raised factions among them everywhere."‡

Nor was this fire quenched for a long time, but, blazing out afresh every year, it continued to convulse the church, and more or less to agitate the country, to the end of the reign of Anne. With the new parliament, which met in the end of December of this same year, a new convocation also assembled as usual; when the battle between the two Houses, about the power of adjournment, was immediately resumed with as much fury as ever. But while it was every day waxing hotter and hotter, first the prolocutor of the Lower House, Dr. Woodward, died (13th February, 1702),§ and then the king (8th March); upon which latter event the convocation was obliged to admit itself to be in law dissolved, though a few of the more fiery spirits among the clergy, supported by their friend Rochester in the Lords, would very fain have made out that the late act continuing the existing parliament for six months after the demise of the crown also continued the convocation, which they contended was a part of the parliament. But the attorney-general declared this pretension to be an invasion of the queen's ecclesiastical supremacy; and the Judges also were all of opinion that the late act had nothing to do with the convocation, which was not so much as mentioned in it.

The accession of Anne almost turned the heads of the Tory and high church clergy, and probably by that very means prevented them from acquiring the power and ascendancy which they might now have secured had their proceedings been less incautious and violent. Throughout the greater part of her reign the convocation sat regularly at the same time with the parliament; but the session was seldom anything else than one long, stormy altercation between the two Houses, for the most part about the same point of privilege that had originally set them against each other, or, rather, which had been taken up as the most convenient bone of contention around which their mutual animosities might gather and encounter; but, on one or two occasions, involving also some other matters which in like manner derived nearly their whole importance from the opposing passions to which they served as excitement and fuel. But, as we have just intimated, the bishops, with everything against them, the queen at heart with the high church majority of the Lower House, and court and government openly adverse or secretly thwarting them, managed to maintain their ground, and sometimes even to drive back their assailants with loss and discredit, merely by the greater moderation and coolness which they opposed to the impetuosity and overconfidence of the other party, who, with the advantages they now seemed to possess, never could believe in the possibility of their own defeat until they found themselves actually discomfited and sprawling in the mud.

Thus, for example, in the convocation which met at the same time with Anne's first parliament, in May, 1702, the Lower House, secure in their possession of the queen's favour, proposed, as we have already seen,* that the question in dispute between them and the bishops should be submitted to the decision of her majesty. "It would have been a strange sight," exclaims Burnet, "very acceptable to the enemies of the church, chiefly to papists, to see the two Houses of Convocation pleading their authority and rights before a committee of council, that was to determine the matter." So the bishops declined referring the rights of the church even to royal interpretation; and, when the Lower House upon this addressed the queen, desiring her protection, and begging her to hear and settle the dispute of her own authority, her majesty received the application favourably, and said that she would consider of it and send them her answer, but no further answer was ever returned. It was believed that the opinion of the Judges and law officers had been taken, and was against the pretensions of the inferior clergy; "and therefore," as Burnet says, "the ministers chose rather to give no answer, and that it should seem to be forgot, than that such an one should be given as would put an end to the debate, which they intended to cherish and support." Nor did the Lower House make anything more of an application to the House of Commons; all that they could obtain from the Commons was "a general vote, which amounted to nothing, that they would stand by them in all their just rights and privileges."* They then tried another tack, hoping by a resolution which they passed, affirming the divine and apostolical right of episcopacy, at once to wipe off from themselves the imputation of being favourers of presbyterianism, and either to fasten that stigma upon the bishops, if they should refuse to concur in the resolution, or to entrap them by such a bait into a concurrence which might have been construed as a breach of Henry VIII.'s act, prohibiting the convocation from making any new canon without permission of the crown under the penalties of a premunire. How this attempt was defeated has been already told: † the bishops answered that they acquiesced in what was already declared on the subject of the resolution in the preface to the Book of Ordinations, but did not think it safe either for themselves or the Lower House, to go farther in that matter without a royal license. In the next session (of 1703-4) the convocation, says Burnet, "continued their former ill practices; but little opposition was made to them, as very little regard was had to them: they drew up a representation of some abuses in the ecclesiastical discipline, and in the consistorial courts; but took care to mention none of those greater ones of which many among themselves were eminently guilty, such as pluralities, non-residence, the neglect of their cures, and the irregularities in the lives of the clergy, which were too visible."‡ The next year (1704-5), the convocation, he tells us, in the same contemptuous tone, which however betrays quite as much anger as contempt, was "so little considered, that scarce any notice was taken of them, and they deserved that no mention should be made of them." "The Lower House," he adds, "continued to proceed with much indecent violence: they still held their intermediate sessions, and brought up injurious and reflecting addresses to the Upper House, which gave a very large exercise to the patience and forbearance of the archbishop and bishops. The archbishop, after he had long borne with their perverseness, and saw no good effect of it, proceeded to an ecclesiastical monition against their intermediate meetings: this put a stop to that, for they would not venture on the censure that must in course follow, if no regard was had to the monition. At the final prorogation the archbishop dismissed them with a wise, well composed speech: he laid open to them their indecent behaviour, and the many wrong steps they had made: to this he added a severe but grave reprimand, with much good advice. The governing men among them were headstrong and factious, and designed to force themselves into preferences by the noise they made, and by the ill-humour that they endeavoured to spread among the clergy, who were generally soured, even in relation to the queen herself, beyond what could be imagined possible."*

§ "At his lodgings in Westminster," says Kennet, "in very unhappy circumstances." Woodward was dean of Burnet's diocese of Salisbury; and, according to Kennet, "had grown popular by opposing his diocesan, to whom he owed his preferments." He had lodged a complaint against Burnet in this very convocation, in prosecuting which his enemies alleged that he forgot the rules both of common sense and common veracity.

In October, 1706, a new convocation met, along with the new parliament: "it was chosen," says Burnet, "as the former had been, and the members that were ill-affected were still prevailed on to come up, and to continue in an expensive but useless attendance in town." The rupture between the two Houses was now carried so far that all communication between them was put a stop to—the inferior clergy holding their meetings, and debating all sorts of questions, in open defiance of the authority of their bishops. These extreme proceedings, however, increased the numbers of the opposition in the Lower House, and above fifty members signed a protest against the conduct of the majority, which they presented to the archbishop. Even the queen herself now found it necessary to discountenance the violence of the High Church party. While they were deliberating in the Lower House how to vent their indignation on the protesters, who had retired from the convocation as soon as they had given in their protest, they were summoned to the Jerusalem Chamber, where the archbishop read them a letter that had been written to him by her majesty, in which, after expressing her concern at seeing that the differences between the two Houses were still kept up, and were indeed rather increased than abated, she went on to declare her determination to maintain both her own supremacy and the due subordination of presbyters to bishops, as alike essential parts of the constitution of the church; adding, that the archbishop and bishops, if they acted, as she expected they would do, in conformity to these principles, should be sure of the continuance of her protection and favour, which also should not be wanting to any of the clergy, so long as they were dutiful to her and their ecclesiastical superiors, and preserved the temper becoming persons in holy orders. And the archbishop was not only directed to read this reproof to the Lower House, but also to prorogue the convocation to such time as he thought fit. "They were struck with this," continues Burnet, "for it had been carried so secretly that it was a surprise to them all. When they saw that they were to be prorogued, they ran very indecently to the door, and with some difficulty were kept in the room till the prorogation was intimated to them: they went next to their own house, where, though prorogued, they sat still in form, as if they had been a house, but they did not venture on passing any vote. So factious were they, and so implicitly led by those who had got an ascendancy over them, that, though they had formerly submitted the matters in debate to the queen, yet now, when she declared her pleasure, they would not acquiesce in it.*" But the change that had taken place in the House of Commons had now given the Whigs the ascendancy in the government; and Tenison and his brethren in the Upper House of Convocation were supported by Godolphin and Sunderland in the cabinet, from which Harley and St. John, the friends of the high church majority in the Lower House, had been compelled to retire. The frowns of the court, however, did not frighten the clergy, or drive them from their course: the next winter (of 1706-7), as Burnet expresses it, "the same temper that had for some years possessed the Lower House did still prevail among them." This year the proposed union with Scotland afforded them matter for much tragical declamation; they even talked of calling upon the House of Commons to join them in opposing that measure: on this they were prorogued by royal order for three weeks, during which interval the Act of Union was carried through both Houses of Parliament, and their interference became useless. But this course only gave rise to a new pretension on the part of the Tory clergy: as soon as they met again they drew up a representation, in which they contended that to prorogue the Convocation during the sitting of parliament was a stretch of prerogative never before attempted; and they wanted the bishops to join them in resisting such a violation of their common rights and privileges. The bishops replied by ordering a search of the records; from which it appeared that there were seven or eight instances of such prorogations, and thirty or forty more of the convocation sitting before or after the parliament, or sometimes even when there was no parliament in existence. So little foundation was there for the main position taken by the clergy, and from which they deduced all their recent pretensions, that the convocation was a part of the parliament. Another letter in the queen's name was now written to the archbishop, directly and sharply rebuking the conduct of the Lower House, which her majesty declared was an attempt to invade her supremacy, and which, if persisted in, she would be compelled, with whatever reluctance, to visit with the penalties provided by the law. When the Lower House was summoned to hear this letter read, only a very few of the members made their appearance; the prolocutor himself, Dean Stanhope, had gone out of town "without so much," says Burnet, "as asking the archbishop's leave;" who thereupon pronounced him contumacious. Stanhope was urged by some of his party to set the archbishop and his edict at defiance; but, on consideration, he thought proper to make his submission.

Burnet makes no mention of any sitting of the convocation at the same time with the first British parliament, in the winter of 1707-8; and that which was summoned and returned along with the next parliament in November, 1708, was prevented from ever assembling during that winter by a succession of prorogations at the royal command; it being "too evident," says Burnet, "that the same ill temper that had appeared in former convocations did still prevail, though not with such a majority." "The secret encouragement," he continues, "with which they did most effectually animate their party was, that the queen's heart was with them; and that, though the war, and the other circumstances of her affairs, obliged her at present to favour the moderate party, yet, as soon as a peace brought on a better settlement, they promised themselves all favour at her hands. It was not certain that they had then any ground for this, or that she herself, or any by her order, gave them these hopes; but this is certain, that many things might have been done to extinguish those hopes which were not done, so that they seemed to be left to please themselves with those expectations, which kept still life in their party: and, indeed, it was but too visible that the much greater part of the clergy were in a very ill temper, and under very bad influences—enemies to the toleration, and soured against the dissenters."*

During the next session of parliament (1709-10), which is memorable for the prosecution of Sacheverell, we hear nothing of the convocation; the series of prorogations was probably continued so as to prevent it from ever meeting. But when Sacheverell's affair, and the intrigues of Mrs. Masham together, had thrown out the Whig ministers and brought back the Tories, the clergy found themselves in a new era. A new parliament and a new convocation met on the same day, the 25th of November, 1710. The clergy of the Lower House chose Dr. Atterbury for their prolocutor; and then came down a royal rescript in a style very different from that to which they had of late years been accustomed, a license empowering the convocation to enter upon such consultations as the present state of the church required, and particularly to consider of such matters as her majesty should lay before them, accompanied by a letter to the archbishop, directing that an account should be drawn up by the two Houses of the late excessive growth of infidelity and heresy, and that they should take into consideration how to redress abuses in excommunications—how rural deans might be made more serviceable—how tithes (registers of land) might be more exactly made and preserved—and how a correction might be applied to the abuses in licenses for marriage. In all this, according to Burnet, neither the archbishop nor any of the bishops were so much as consulted with; everything was dictated by Atterbury, who had the confidence of Harley, the prime minister. As for Tenison, he was prevented from attending after the first meetings by a sharp attack of the gout: the royal license, by an unprecedented deviation from the usual form, had named Compton, Bishop of

London, and Hooper of Bath and Wells (the same that was prolocutor of the Lower House in 1701), as the only substitutes the archbishop could appoint; but Compton was also unwell; and Hooper, "seeing," says Burnet, "how invidiously he was distinguished from his brethren, in which he had not been consulted, pretended ill health; and we were at a stand till a new license was sent us, in which the Bishops of Winchester (Trelawny), Bristol (Robinson), and St. David's (Bisse), were added to be of the quorum. The two last were newly consecrated, and had been in no functions in the church before; so the queen not only passed over all the bishops made in king William's reign, but a great many of those named by herself, and set the two last in a distinction above all their brethren."* A great stir was made in this convocation about a variety of matters, but, as usual, absolutely no business was done. Most of the winter was spent in considering a work published by the learned and ingenious but eccentric William Whiston, who, having been turned out of his professorship of mathematics at Cambridge for his heretical notions, had written this vindication of himself and his doctrines, and dedicated it to the convocation; but, after many difficulties and objections had been got over, and the two Houses had at last agreed upon a deliverance to be submitted to the queen for her assent, her majesty contrived to lose the paper, and, although another copy was sent to her, persisted in declining to take any notice of it. Upon the state of religion and the church, the two Houses could come to no agreement; so no statement upon that subject was laid before the queen; but each House printed a separate representation of its own, that of the inferior clergy, which was drawn up by Atterbury, being, according to Burnet, "a most virulent declamation, defaming all the administrations from the time of the Revolution." "The bishops," concludes the account given by this historian, "went through all the matters recommended to them by the queen, and drew up a scheme of regulations on them all; but neither were these agreed, to by the Lower House; for their spirits were so exasperated, that nothing sent by the bishops could be agreeable to them. At last the session of parliament and convocation came to an end."

The next winter (1711-12) began with a new dispute between the two Houses; the bishops proposing to take up the business of the preceding year at the point at which it had been stopped by the prorogation, Atterbury and the Lower House insisting that, as in parliament, a prorogation by royal writ made it necessary that all proceedings should be begun afresh. The result was, that the unfinished business of the last year was dropped altogether. But an act having been passed in the last session of parliament for building fifty new churches in London and Westminster, an office for consecrating churches and churchyards was proposed by the bishops; "and probably," says Burnet, "this will be all the fruit that the church will reap from this convocation." Other two subjects were taken up, indeed, the one by the Lower, the other by the Upper House; but only to end in nothing. Several books had been published by Jacobite and nonjuring divines, containing notions that were thought to savour of popery; in particular Dr. George Hickes, the eminent Anglo-Saxon scholar, had promulgated something like the Roman Catholic doctrine of there being a real sacrifice in the eucharist; and a clergyman of the name of Brett had preached and printed a sermon in which he maintained the necessity of priestly absolution in a very high strain, asserting that no repentance could be of any avail without it. A motion was made in the Lower House to censure these opinions; "but it was so ill supported," says Burnet, "that it was let fall." The bishops seem to have stood aloof from this business; but they also had a heresy of their own. This was a conceit, said to have been originally started by the learned Henry Dodwell, and to have obtained extensive circulation, that there was no validity in baptism unless when performed by a clergyman episcopally ordained. "This," observes Burnet, "made the dissenters pass for no Christians, and put all thoughts of reconciling them to us far out of view; and several little books were spread about the nation to prove the necessity of re-baptising them, and that they were in a state of damnation till that was done." "Nothing," he adds, "of this kind was so much as mentioned in the year 1660, when a great part of the nation had been baptised by dissenters."† To put a stop to this new doctrine, the bishops drew up a declaration, pointing out the irregularity of baptism by persons not in holy orders, but stating also that, according to the practice of the primitive church, and the constant usage of the Church of England, no baptism, if it were only performed in the orthodox mode, ought to be reiterated. In the Upper House, Bishop Sprat, who had no reputation as a theologian, was the only person who refused his assent to this exposition; but when it was sent down to the Lower House, "they would not so much as take it into consideration," Burnet tells us, "but laid it aside, thinking that it would encourage those who struck at the dignity of the priesthood."‡ Thus passed another winter in contention between the two Houses, and a busy doing of nothing. In the next year the convocation seems to have met only to present the usual formal address to the crown; and in 1714 the two Houses presented a joint address, concluding with the expression of their wishes and prayers that her majesty might be able to transmit the protection of the church and state "to a Protestant successor in the illustrious House of Hanover."§ The majoriety in the Lower House, therefore, can scarcely be considered as Jacobiti-

cally inclined at this time. The close of the reign of Anne, we may here notice, was marked by several changes among the heads of the church. Sharp, Archbishop of York, died in February, 1714, and was succeeded by Dawes, Bishop of Chester, one of the most eminent of the party styled Hanover Tories. In the preceding year Atterbury had been raised to the bench as Bishop of Rochester, on the death of Sprat; and Dr. John Robinson (the diplomatist of the peace of Utrecht) had been translated from Bristol to London, as successor to Compton, who died in the beginning of July, in his eighty-first year,—“a generous and goodnatured man,” says Burnet, “but easy and weak, and much in the power of others.”* Archbishop Tenison still survived; but he also died in the end of the year 1715, about a year and a half after the accession of King George. He was succeeded by Dr. Wake, translated from Lincoln, a prelate of distinguished learning and ability.

Meanwhile the restless volcano, which had so long disturbed the church and the public mind, was fast approaching its final extinction. The convocation which sate in the earlier part of the year 1714, along with Queen Anne's last parliament, had found a new case of heresy whereupon to exercise its powers of censure, in a book published two years before by the famous Dr. Samuel Clarke, entitled “The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity.” The work, which was considered to be objectionable chiefly on account of the undue pre-eminence which it was thought to assign to the first person in the Trinity, had already excited a good deal of controversy when the subject was taken up by the Lower House of Convocation. That House soon came to a resolution condemning the doctor and his doctrines; but the bishops, who had from the first entertained the question coldly enough, readily availed themselves of an explanation of his opinions, which Clarke was induced to submit to them, as an excuse for dropping it altogether. The Lower House, nevertheless, or rather, perhaps, the more by reason of the indifference shown by the bishops, persisted in their course, and on one of the last days on which they sate they voted that the doctor's paper was no recantation of his heretical assertions, nor any such satisfaction for the great scandal he had occasioned, as should put a stop to the further investigation of the matter. The effect of these proceedings, as may be supposed, was to give a great impetus to the controversy that had been previously going on, and vastly to inflame and exasperate the zeal of the combatants on both sides. To such a height, indeed, was the dispute carried, that it was deemed expedient, before the end of the year, to address certain royal injunctions to the archbishops and bishops, entitled “Directions for the preserving unity in the Church, and also for preserving the peace and quiet of the State;” in which the clergy were strictly commanded to confine themselves in explaining the doctrine of the Trinity to such ways of expression as had been commonly used in the church—to abstain from bitter invectives and scurrilous language against all persons whatsoever—and not to presume, in their sermons and lectures, to intermeddle in any affairs of state or government, or the constitution of the realm, save only on feasts and fasts appointed by public authority, and then no farther than the occasion should absolutely demand.

The convocation appears to have been allowed to sit as usual for the next two years; but its proceedings, if any, were unimportant. In 1717, however, the Lower House discovered a new case of erroneous doctrine, upon which it fell probably with the more avidity that the delinquent was a bishop, a member of the other House. Dr. (then only Mr.) Benjamin Hoadly had already incurred the animadversion of the Lower House of Convocation in the last reign for a sermon preached by him before the lord mayor in 1705, which was denounced as “containing positions contrary to the doctrines of the church expressed in the first and second parts of the homily against disobedience and wilful rebellion.” Hoadly, in fact, in vindicating the Revolution, had necessarily attacked the doctrines of divine right and passive obedience, which, whether or no they still formed part of the creed of the church, had unquestionably by that event been obliterated for ever from the constitutional theory of the state. He had continued throughout the last reign to advocate the same principles, and had so greatly distinguished himself by his eloquence and ability on that side, that in 1709 the Whig House of Commons which impeached Sacheverell voted, “That the Rev. Mr. Benjamin Hoadly, rector of St. Peter's Poor, London, for having often justified the principles on which her majesty and the nation proceeded in the late happy Revolution, had justly merited the favour and recommendation of this House, and that an humble address be presented to her majesty, that she would be graciously pleased to bestow some dignity in the church on Mr. Hoadly for his eminent services both to the church and state.” Anne answered the Commons that she would take a proper opportunity to comply with their desires; but before she found any such the government fell again into the hands of the Tories, who of course found no opportunity a proper one for anything of the kind. George I., however, upon coming to the throne, made Hoadly one of his chaplains, and soon after appointed him Bishop of Bangor—the beginning of a long course of professional prosperity; for Hoadly afterwards wore in succession the mitres of Hereford, Salisbury, and Winchester, over the last of which dioceses he presided for twenty-seven years, not dying till 1761, at the age of eighty-five. The attack of the convocation was provoked partly by a book which he published soon after his elevation to the episcopal bench, entitled, “A Preservative against the Principles and Practices of the Nonjurors,” partly by a sermon he had preached before the king, and then printed, on "The Nature of the Kingdom of Christ." A committee appointed by the Lower House drew up a representation censuring both these performances, as tending—"1. To subvert all government and discipline in the church of Christ, and to reduce his kingdom to a state of anarchy and confusion. 2. To impugn and impeach the regal supremacy in causes ecclesiastical, and the authority of the legislature to enforce obedience in matters of religion by civil sanctions." On this report being printed, such a storm of controversy arose as even the fury of opposing theologians had scarcely ever before given birth to. Hoadly defended his own cause almost alone against a host of adversaries,—Sherlock (afterwards Hoadly's successor in Bangor and also in Salisbury, and finally Bishop of London), Potter (at this time Bishop of Oxford, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury), Hare (afterwards successively Bishop of St. Asaph and of Chichester), Law, the celebrated author of "The Serious Call," and many others of less name. The controversy branched out, ere long, into many of the most remote and intricate questions not only of theology, but of politics and private morals; and the publications which it produced are said to have amounted to about seventy in all. "After turning over some forty or fifty tracts," says a late writer, "and consuming a good many hours on the Bangorian controversy, I should find some difficulty in stating with precision the propositions in dispute. . . . There was nothing whatever in Hoadly's Sermon injurious to the established endowments and privileges, nor to the discipline and government, of the English church, even in theory. If this had been the case he might be reproached with some inconsistency in becoming so large a partaker of her honours and emoluments. He even admitted the usefulness of censures for open immoralities, though denying all church authority to oblige any one to external communion, or to pass any sentence which should determine the condition of men with respect to the favour or displeasure of God. . . . Another great question in this controversy was that of religious liberty as a civil right, which the convocation explicitly denied. And another related to the much debated exercise of private judgment in religion, which, as one party meant virtually to take away, so the other, perhaps, unreasonably exaggerated. Some other disputes arose in the course of the combat, particularly the delicate problem of the value of sincerity as a plea for material errors."^{57*} Hoadly's intellect, though not a far-seeing or subtle one, was one of great clear-sightedness and logical dexterity; and in mere argumentation, therefore, he was likely to have the best of it, the more as the views he espoused, whether really true or false, were obviously of a sort much more easy to be defended in debate than those of his opponents; but, on the other hand, he could not but be a good deal embarrassed by his position as a member of the Anglican church, which assuredly has nowhere, in its standards of doctrine, professed any such extreme Protestantism as his system involved, any more than it has his political liberalism and purely rationalist morality. In one other material respect, however, his self-command and mildness of character gave him a decided advantage over some of his assailants, whose zeal outstripped all bounds of decency. A Dr. Snape, who had been among the first to pounce upon the obnoxious sermon, in a letter which he addressed to the Bishop of Bangor, called upon him to ask his conscience whether certain evasive words were not omitted in the sermon as it was at first composed, and whether he had not been with difficulty prevailed upon by a person, to whom he had shown it in its original state, to insert them by way of caution? "If you think fit to answer in the negative," added Snape, "a person of as high a station as your lordship will charge himself with the proof of the affirmative." The rest of the story is thus told by Tindal:—"The bishop, two days after, in an advertisement, solemnly denies all this, and challenges the doctor to name his author. The doctor, pressed by the solemnity of the challenge, names the Bishop of Carlisle [Nicholson], the author of the well-known Historical Libraries], who, being called upon to prove what he had asserted, disputed awhile with Dr. Snape, affirming he had not said the words were put in before the sermon was preached, but before it was published; owning, withal, that he knew there was such a person in the world who had averred the same. The Bishop of Carlisle, being pressed to name him, names Dr. White Kennet, and writes to him of what had passed, telling him he did not question but he would own his own words. Dr. Kennet positively denied the fact, saying, 'I never affirmed, never suggested to any mortal, that the late sermon of the Bishop of Bangor was preached with my knowledge or submitted to my correction.' Notwithstanding this, the Bishop of Carlisle asserted in print that Dr. Kennet was the man that told him he had prevailed with the Bishop of Bangor to put in the forementioned words. In short, the Bishop of Carlisle pledges his eternal salvation that Dr. Kennet did say so: Dr. Kennet, in one of his papers, says, God so help him and judge him, if he did. They went on advertising against each other, till the Bishop of Carlisle resolved to give no more answers to whatever should be said. However, the Bishop of Bangor, resolving that calumny should lie where it ought to lie, published a long advertisement, as Dr. Kennet did another, to fix the fact upon the Bishop of Carlisle, and to convict him of forgetfulness at least, in charging a fact upon the Bishop of Bangor which was not true, and quoting a witness for it who knew nothing of the matter."^{58*} Even Sherlock indulged in much violent and acrimonious personality, enlivening his refutation of Hoadly's reasonings with some very precipitate attacks on the moral conduct of his adversary, which the latter had no difficulty in triumphantly repelling. The convocation, in the mean while, had been stopped in an early stage of its proceedings by a royal prorogation, which put an end to its debates for that year; and since then, although this clerical assembly has continued, as formerly, to be summoned, and to meet, with every new parliament, it has never been suffered to sit for the transaction of business, being always prorogued as soon as the mere preliminary formalities have been gone through.*

The suppression of the convocation in modern times has taken from the clergy of the English church their only arena of debate, and even chamber of common deliberation, thus leaving the greatest corporation in the kingdom without any such organ for making its voice be publicly heard as is possessed even by the smallest. The representation of the church, if so it may be called, by the bishops in the House of Lords is all that now remains either of its ancient legislative authority, as one of the estates of the realm, or even of its power of independent self-regulation. Of the church of Scotland the liberty of public debate and internal legislation may be said to be a necessary part of the constitution—to its democratic and republican character the very breath of life;—and accordingly that establishment has preserved to our own day, and can scarcely lose so long as it continues to exist, its presbyteries, synods, and general assemblies. But in another important particular the system of the Scottish church, as settled at the Revolution, was innovated upon before that event was many years old. The law of 1690, which gave the filling up of vacant churches to the heritors and elders, was repealed in 1712, and the rights of the ancient patrons restored by an act, the preamble of which asserts that that way of calling ministers had proved inconvenient, and had occasioned great heats and divisions in parishes.† There is no doubt that this act of 1712 was a most unpopular measure in Scotland, where, whatever inconveniences it might profess to be intended to remedy, it was generally looked upon both as opposed to the true spirit and principles of presbyterianism, and as a direct violation of the Treaty of Union, passed only five or six years before, by which it was stipulated that no alteration should ever be made in any part of the worship, discipline, or government of the Scottish church, as established by the act of 1690 ratifying the Confession of Faith, and by all the other acts relating thereto passed in prosecution of the Declaration of Rights. But, as the Scottish Declaration of Rights made no mention of patronage, it was probably held that the law regulating that matter was not one of those which were thus made for ever unalterable. Not only the general temper and conduct of the government, however, but several other proceedings and incidents, at this time, conspired to impress the people of Scotland with strong apprehensions, that the restoration of patronage was only preparatory to an ecclesiastical revolution of a much more sweeping kind. Under the protection of Harley and Bolingbroke, and favoured by the partialities of the court, episcopacy was now advancing pretensions, and manifesting an aggressive character, such as it had not ventured upon in either kingdom since the earlier part of the reign of Charles I. In this same session of parliament another act had been passed, not only, for the first time since the Revolution, tolerating the worship of persons of the episcopal communion in Scotland, but granting something like an establishment to that mode of worship, by repealing an act of the year 1695, which prohibited their pastors from baptising children or solemnising marriages episcopally performed, by compelling the established clergy to publish the banns for such marriages, and by hedging round the sect thus singled out with various other protections and immunities.* Some minor circumstances also seemed to indicate the same tendency of events.† The act of repeal was further complained of as unfair, inasmuch as, while it restored the patrons to the rights of which the act of 1690 had deprived; them it left them in possession of certain new rights; in particular the property of the unexhausted tithes, which had then been for the first time bestowed upon them in part compensation for what they were made to surrender. All this was strenuously urged upon parliament by the commission of the general assembly while the bill was in progress; and the aversion to the new law was undoubtedly general both among the clergy and among the people. Many attempts were afterwards made to obtain its repeal; and, indeed, from 1750 down to so late a date as the year 1784, it continued to be an annual instruction of the general assembly to the commission to seize every opportunity of effecting that object. Nor was the law universally enforced till many years

* The convocation, it is proper to observe, is not a national, but only a provincial synod. The convocation of the province of York does not appear to have ever been in the habit of meeting regularly; the convocation of whose proceedings an account has been given in the text, and which still subsists in form, is that of the province of Canterbury only.

1690. Evidence taken by the Committee of the House of Commons which sat on Church Patronage in Scotland in 1834; we would refer particularly to the evidence of Dr. Cook, which is unfavourable, to that of Dr. MacCrie on the other side, and above all to that of Dr. Lee, who treats the question with the least of a bias, and whose facts and illustrations are at the same time collected from by far the widest range of reading and research.

* Stat. 10 Anne, c. 7.

† It is very well known that in a number of churches in the north [of Scotland] during that very year, the year 1712, the English Liturgy was introduced; immense numbers of copies of the Book of Common Prayer were sent to Scotland, and they were used in divine service, particularly in the presbytery of Aberdeen and in the neighbourhood; . . . at the same period, a professor of divinity was appointed in the only college in which the King has the power of presenting professors of divinity—a professor who was known to be an episcopalian, and who had not so much as studied divinity at all, and of course who had not obtained a licence to preach; this was Professor Scrimaceor, in the university of St. Andrew's, who was long afterwards removed for his disaffection; all these circumstances, and others which I could mention, had excited great alarm in the minds of the members of the Church of Scotland, with regard to the permanency of the establishment."—Evidence of Dr. Lee, in Report on Church Patronage, Scotland, p. 416.

after its enactment; it is said, indeed, that at one time it became for some years almost inoperative, in consequence of a clause in an act of parliament passed in 1719, by which it was declared that the jus devolutum, or legal right of the presbytery to fill up the vacant charge within six months, should not be prevented from taking effect by any presentation from the patron issued in favour of a person who should not signify his willingness to accept the charge.* It would appear that presentations had been accustomed quietly to take advantage of the presentation as if it had been a mandate which they had no power to resist, and that they now shrunk from the odium of making themselves distinctly consenting parties to the transaction by the formal acceptance demanded by this act.† Such scruples or apprehensions, however, were in course of time overcome; and from about the year 1725, when a presentation was issued it was generally accepted of in terms of the late act, while the general assembly and the other church courts, although still professing to regard the law of patronage as a grievance, had now also adopted the principle and the practice of yielding obedience to it and seeing it carried into effect so long as it remained the law.
